April 30, 2012: A major mining company reported that it intends to re-open a gold mine concession in the eastern Congo's Ituri region. The Mongbwalu mine (near the town of Mongbwalu) is really a mining area, covering some six thousand square kilometers. Several security officials, however, believe attempts to take control of the concession could spark renewed warfare. Individual or small-scale teams of miners have occupied the huge concession. Many of these miners are former rebels and militiamen, so they can readily pick up arms and fight the Congolese Army for control of the area. The miners have something to fight for. Gold miners can earn up to $80 a day, which is high pay in the Congo. How many are there? Good question. Estimates vary, though 50,000 artisanal miners working in and near the concession is one figure. Some sources say there could be well over 100,000 who work part-time.

May 3, 2012: The army has engaged some 500 well-armed militiamen in several firefights in North Kivu province. As a result, some 5,000 villagers have fled the battle area in Masisi territory. Approximately half of the displaced have crossed the border into Rwanda to escape the fighting. The militiamen are former Congolese soldiers. Some of the rebels are former Mai Mai militiamen but many of them belonged to the National Congress for the Defense of the People (CNDP). Thus is Laurent Nkunda's old group, which was originally a Congolese Tutsi organization. Nkunda was arrested in January 2009, by Rwandan forces operating in the Congo. According to Rwandan sources he remains under house arrest in Rwanda. The revived CNDP militia leaders began defecting from the Congolese Army earlier this year. The defectors claim they remain loyal to former CNDP leader Jean Bosco Ntaganda, who denies any ties to the rogue militiamen. Ntaganda has been indicted by the International Criminal Court (ICC) for war crimes. The Congolese government has resisted arresting him, though in April President Joseph Kabila indicated that Ntaganda should be turned over to the ICC. On May 2nd the government once again called for Ntaganda's detention after senior government officials in North Kivu province claimed that Ntaganda has links to the notorious Democratic Forces for the Liberation of Rwanda (FDLR). The FDLR's original cadres were Rwandan Hutus, connected to the 1994 Rwandan genocide. The FDLR allegations are new, since Ntaganda is regarded as a hero by many Congolese Tutsis.

May 7, 2012: The Congolese Army claims that it has retaken the Masisi area (eastern Congo) from M23 rebels. The M23 rebellion began after the Congolese government claimed it intended to arrest Bosco Ntanganda.

May 11, 2012: Rwanda reported that 10,000 refugees have fled from the Congo intro Rwanda and Uganda. The refugees are trying to escape fighting instigated by the M23 rebel faction. About 55,000 Congolese refugees, many of them Congolese Tutsis, are now living in Rwanda.

May 12, 2012: The UN reported that government forces are fighting M23 rebels near the town of Bunagana (North Kivu province, near the Rwanda and Uganda borders).

May 15, 2012: The UN Security Council condemned the May 14th, attacks that seriously injured 11 Pakistani soldiers assigned to peacekeeping duty with the United Nations Organization Mission in the Democratic Republic of Congo (MONUSCO) in the Congo. About a thousand people in the town of Bunvakiri (South Kivu province) attacked a base camp manned by the peacekeepers. At least seven of the Pakistanis were wounded by gunfire. Members of a Mai-Mai militia, the Raia Mutomboki, may have been in the crowd. The name Raia Mutomboki supposedly translates as The Angry or The Angry Citizens.

May 28, 2012: Some UN officials believe that Rwanda is helping support the M23 mutiny in North Kivu province. Some mutineers, who defected to the government, claimed they were recruited and trained in Rwanda, then were sent across the border to join the rebellion. Rwanda continues to deny any involvement. General Bosco Ntaganda was born in Rwanda and the CNDP was originally a defense force of Congolese Tutsis. June 18, 2012: The March 23rd Movement (acronym is M23) rebels have seized a strip of territory along the Congo-Rwanda border. Both the UN and the government claim that M23 now controls an important border area, despite heavy attacks by government forces, including attack helicopters. M23 insists that they are not acting on behalf of former Congolese Army (FARDC) general, Bosco Ntaganda, but the government insists it has evidence that Ntaganda is M23's leader. Ntaganda took over the National Congress for the Defense of the People (CNDP) after Laurent Nkunda was arrested in early 2009. The CNDP was largely manned by Congolese Tutsis. Ntaganda's force was integrated into the Congolese Army in 2009, as part of the peace process. This is why the M23 rebels are sometimes referred to as mutineers. The seizure of territory near Rwanda boosts those in the Congolese government who have been insisting since early May that Rwanda is involved with the M23 conspirators. Over the past six weeks the Rwandan government has repeatedly denied it is supporting the M23 faction. That may be true but it does appear that the M23 rebels are receiving supplies that are moving through Rwandan territory. International mediators are trying to encourage negotiations between M23 and the government, but at the moment the government says it is not interested. The government intends to defeat M23 on the battlefield.

June 7, 2012: Ugandan Lord's Resistance Army (LRA) rebels attacked a park ranger guard position in the Congo's Garamba National Park. A group of park rangers discovered a large group of LRA fighters (possibly 50) in the park after investigating gunshots fired near an elephant herd. An hour-long firefight ensued and the park ranger patrol retreated. The park rangers believe they wounded several LRA rebels.

June 11, 2012: Several international agencies are saying that there is credible evidence that M23 rebel group, which is largely composed of former CNDP rebel fighters, is receiving aid from groups outside of the Congo. These new claims are in line with a UN report leaked in late May. Today the government claimed that 200 to 300 of the M23 rebels were recruited and trained in Rwanda. The government does not want to antagonize the Rwandan government. It does want Rwanda to help convince the mutineers to end their rebellion. The Rwandan government, however, denies any involvement in the M23 revolt. The CNDP was for the most part an organization run by Congolese Tutsis and the leadership of the Rwandan government is predominantly ethnic Tutsi.

June 12, 2012: Over 120 people have been killed in ethnic massacres (tribal fighting) during the last 30 days. The most serious massacre occurred between May 17, and May 22, in the Masisi region (North Kivu province). Two Mai-Mai militias (Raia Mutomboki and Kifuafua) are believed to be responsible for the Masisi murder spree. The Mai-Mai allegedly targeted natives of Rwanda. Most of the M23 rebels are from Rwanda, so the implication is the Mai-Mai militias moved into the Masisi region after M23 fighters left the area around May 7. Both rogue militias began as tribal defense organizations. The Kifuafua Mai-Mai militia was originally a Tembo tribal militia which formed in the mid-1990s. It fought against the Rwandan Hutu Democratic Forces for the Liberation of Rwanda (FDLR) militia. In 2010, the Kifuafua became angry with the central government because they felt they were being cheated out of political jobs some of their members were promised during peace negotiations. The Raia Mutomboki was another local militia in South Kivu province. Its militiamen clashed with the FDLR in 2011, in the Shabunda area. The Raia Mutomboki also participated in an attack on alleged FDLR supporters in March 2012. There are several other Mai-Mai militias that from time to time crop up in North and South Kivu provinces. The Mai-Mai tend to appear then disappear. Often times a new militia is just an old one with a new leader and the militia takes the new leader's name. These include the Yakutumba Mai-Mai militia which was once run by a former army officer named Yakutumba. Other Mai-Mai that have operated in the Kivus include the Aochi, the Nyakiliba, the Mulumba, and the Kirikicho. The remnant National Congolese Resistance (RNC) militia is also considered to be a Mai-Mai militia.

June 15, 2012: The UN Security Council condemned the army mutiny by the M23 rebel faction. The Security Council asked countries in the region to help stop the flow of supplies to the mutineers and urged other nations in the region to assist in demobilizing all armed militias in the region. The UN also reported that an estimated 200,000 refugees have fled fighting between the M23 rebels and the army. Other militias in North and South Kivu have been involved in chaotic fighting as well. Since mid-May, the mutiny in North Kivu province has had effects in other parts of the eastern Congo and could re-ignite a new regional war.

June 17, 2012: M23's senior commander in the border region, Colonel Vianney Kazarama, said that his forces had seized a large quantity of weapons from the Congolese Army after a June 14 battle. Fighting continues around the towns of Mbuzi and Runyoni (Rwandan border area).

June 18, 2012: The March 23rd Movement (acronym is M23) rebels have seized a strip of territory along the Congo-Rwanda border. Both the UN and the government claim that M23 now controls an important border area, despite heavy attacks by government forces, including attack helicopters. M23 insists that they are not acting on behalf of former Congolese Army (FARDC) general, Bosco Ntaganda, but the government insists it has evidence that Ntaganda is M23's leader. Ntaganda took over the National Congress for the Defense of the People (CNDP) after Laurent Nkunda was arrested in early 2009. The CNDP was largely manned by Congolese Tutsis. Ntaganda's force was integrated into the Congolese Army in 2009, as part of the peace process. This is why the M23 rebels are sometimes referred to as mutineers. The seizure of territory near Rwanda boosts those in the Congolese government who have been insisting since early May that Rwanda is involved with the M23 conspirators. Over the past six weeks the Rwandan government has repeatedly denied it is supporting the M23 faction. That may be true but it does appear that the M23 rebels are receiving supplies that are moving through Rwandan territory. International mediators are trying to encourage negotiations between M23 and the government, but at the moment the government says it is not interested. The government intends to defeat M23 on the battlefield.

June 18, 2012: The March 23rd Movement (acronym is M23) rebels have seized a strip of territory along the Congo-Rwanda border. Both the UN and the government claim that M23 now controls an important border area, despite heavy attacks by government forces, including attack helicopters. M23 insists that they are not acting on behalf of former Congolese Army (FARDC) general, Bosco Ntaganda, but the government insists it has evidence that Ntaganda is M23's leader. Ntaganda took over the National Congress for the Defense of the People (CNDP) after Laurent Nkunda was arrested in early 2009. The CNDP was largely manned by Congolese Tutsis. Ntaganda's force was integrated into the Congolese Army in 2009, as part of the peace process. This is why the M23 rebels are sometimes referred to as mutineers. The seizure of territory near Rwanda boosts those in the Congolese government who have been insisting since early May that Rwanda is involved with the M23 conspirators. Over the past six weeks the Rwandan government has repeatedly denied it is supporting the M23 faction. That may be true but it does appear that the M23 rebels are receiving supplies that are moving through Rwandan territory. International mediators are trying to encourage negotiations between M23 and the government, but at the moment the government says it is not interested. The government intends to defeat M23 on the battlefield.

June 21, 2012: Since the mid-1990s, when the great Congo War erupted, over five million people have died due to the conflict. That is the right way to word it – due to the conflict. Most of the dead died from exposure, starvation, and disease. Earlier this month, the UN reported that 204 peacekeepers have died in the conflict. The UN deployed armed soldiers in 2000.

June 24, 2012: Another seven Congolese army officers and some 170 soldiers have reportedly deserted and joined the M23 militia.

June 26, 2012: Despite new laws, illegal gold (conflict gold) is still being sold. Several reports have documented active trading in the town of Mongbwalu. Significant amounts of smuggled tantalum and tungsten are also reaching international markets.

June 29, 2012: The UN released a report on how Congolese rebel militias finance themselves. Crime is a favorite method. Rebel militias have robbed banks. The International Bank for Africa, in Goma, has been robbed twice. They also run extortion rackets, though they like to say they are collecting taxes. The rebels take cows from defenseless civilians. They set up illegal roadblocks, then take a percentage of a vehicle's load as a transit fee. The biggest racket is smuggling precious metals, especially gold.

July 2, 2012: A new UN report has confirmed that Rwanda is supporting rebel militias in the eastern Congo. Officials indicated that the U.S. had temporarily blocked release of the UN investigation. However, the U.S. claimed that it had asked Rwanda to help prevent supplies from reaching the M23 rebels. The UN report said that Rwanda has provided weapons and recruits. Some Rwandan soldiers have also aided M23. Rwanda has denied the allegations.

July 6, 2012: M23 rebels attacked and seized the town of Bunagana (Uganda-Congo border). Some 600 Congolese soldiers fled into Uganda., where security forces disarmed them and gave them refugee status. Over 2,000 Congolese civilians also fled into Uganda. One UN peacekeeper died fighting in the area on July 5.

July 9, 2012: M23 rebels pulled out of the town of Rutshuru, which they seized July 8. M23 claimed that its fighters withdrew in order to prevent civilian casualties if a battle erupted in the town. A senior rebel officer said that M23 would continue to hold the town of Bunagana (Uganda-Congo border).

July 10, 2012: The army is sending a U.S.-trained infantry battalion to Goma. The battalion is currently in northern Congo, conducting operations against the Ugandan rebel Lord's Resistance Army. The UN is also repositioning troops near the town of Goma, sending in a Ghanaian infantry unit. A special forces contingent with Egyptian, Jordanian, and Guatemalan special forces troops is also heading toward the town. The UN indicated that it is preparing to defend Goma from attack by M23 rebels. UN briefers said that M23 fighters have good equipment and are well-supplied.

July 12, 2012: UN and Congolese Army helicopter gunships attacked a M23 rebel position near Bukima village, 35 kilometers north of Goma (near the Rwandan border).

July 13, 2012: The UN reported that it has reinforced peacekeeping units in North Kivu province. Another contingent of UN forces has moved into Goma. The army reported that it had recaptured the towns of Rutshuru and Kiwanja. Both towns had been under the control of M23 fighters. M23 claimed that its fighters withdrew from the town and would retake them if M23 supporters in the towns are threatened by government security forces.

July 14, 2012: Uganda has beefed up military and police units along the Congo-Uganda border, in order to stop spill-over violence from battles between the Congolese Army and the M23 rebel militia. Special police security units have increased patrols in and near the town of Nteko.

July 15, 2012: The Congo and Rwanda have signed an agreement to eliminate armed rebel groups in the eastern Congo. Key leaders of both countries put their personal stamp of approval on the deal, face to face. The agreement is designed to insure that the Rwandan government is not supplying the M23 rebels. The African Union said that it is willing to send peacekeeping troops to the eastern Congo in order to stop armed rebel groups.

July 16, 2012: The M23 rebel military, led by General Bosco Ntaganda, continues to hold the town of Bunagana, on the Congo-Uganda border. M23's rebel fighters now face a reinforced UN peacekeeping contingent. However, M23 has demonstrated that it is able to defeat the Congolese Army (FARDC) any time it decides to make a concerted effort. The rebels appeared to be driving toward Goma, the capital of North Kivu province. However, the UN has reinforced the town. Still, the rebels have positioned their main force to threaten Goma, which is a major transit point for Congolese mineral shipments (tin and tantalum, mainly). M23 can also control other trade routes (like Bunagana) north of Goma, or at least close them. M23 maintains that it is willing to negotiate with the government and will turn over the towns they control to UN forces if the government agrees to talks. M23 has around 1,500 to 2,000 fighters in the area most of them ethnic Tutsis. Many of them once served in the National Congress for the Defense of the People (CNDP) militia and were subsequently integrated into the Congolese Army after the 2009 peace agreement. In March and April of this year they began defecting from the Congolese Army. M23 takes its name from the date the Congolese peace agreement was signed, March 23, 2009.July 16, 2012: The M23 rebel military, led by general Bosco Ntaganda, continues to hold the town of Bunagana, on the Congo-Uganda border. M23's rebel fighters now face a reinforced UN peacekeeping contingent. However, M23 has demonstrated that it is able to defeat the Congolese Army (FARDC) any time it decides to make a concerted effort. The rebels appeared to be driving toward Goma, the capital of North Kivu province. However, the UN has reinforced the town. Still, the rebels have positioned their main force to threaten Goma, which is a major transit point for Congolese mineral shipments (tin and tantalum, mainly). M23 can also control other trade routes (like Bunagana) north of Goma, or at least close them. M23 maintains that it is willing to negotiate with the government and will turn over the towns they control to UN forces if the government agrees to talks. M23 has around 1,500 to 2,000 fighters in the area most of them ethnic Tutsis. Many of them once served in the National Congress for the Defense of the People (CNDP) militia and were subsequently integrated into the Congolese Army after the 2009 peace agreement. In March and April of this year they began defecting from the Congolese Army. M23 takes its name from the date the Congolese peace agreement was signed, March 23, 2009.

July 18, 2012: Congo-K - Aid as prelude to code revision'

The Promines program co-financed by the World Bank's International Development Association (IDA) to the tune of $90 million and by Britain's Department for International Development, which is throwing in $40 million, was inaugurated in Kinshasa on July 5 by minister of mines Martin Kabwelulu.

July 20, 2012: M23 is solidifying its control of the town of Bunagana (Uganda-Congo border) and a strip of territory west of the town (Congolese side). M23 also controls the Runyonyi and Jomba areas. The Congolese government stated that it believes M23 intends to attack North Kivu's capital, Goma.

July 22, 2012: The Rwandan government denied accusations that it is supporting the M23 rebel movement in the Congo.

July, 2012 - Warlord Thomas Lubanga becomes first person convicted by the International Criminal Court since it was set up 10 years ago. He is sentenced to 14 years in jail for using child soldiers in his rebel army in 2002 and 2003.

July 24, 2012: The army fought with M23 rebel forces in and around the town of Kibumba and Rugari (North Kivu province, eastern Congo). The two towns are north of the provincial capital, Goma. UN forces employed helicopter gunships in the battle. The UN also estimated that at least 260,000 Congolese have fled their homes since April in order to escape M23 fighters. Rebels and government forces traded heavy weapons fire around two eastern villages on Friday, forcing thousands of civilians to flee towards the provincial capital days ahead of a regional summit due to tackle the rebellion.

July 25, 2012: The UN is seeking more support for the Congolese Army. Congolese soldiers report that they are not receiving their pay, that they are under-paid when they do, and that their living conditions are poor. All of that is true. The request may help have a political angle. Improving Congolese Army conditions would make it less likely that Congolese soldiers would rebel and join various rebel militia groups still operating in the eastern Congo.

August 1, 2012: M23 is getting the headlines but the FDLR (Democratic Forces for the Liberation of Rwanda) is still operating in the eastern Congo. The FDLR is primarily a Rwandan Hutu tribal force and has ties to the Hutu radicals who instigated the 1994 genocide. In many ways the Hutu-Tutsi struggle in Rwanda is continuing in the eastern Congo. Though Rwanda now stands accused of supporting the M23 rebels, the Congolese government has let Rwandan Army units track and pursue FDLR rebels in the eastern Congo. Rwanda and Congo have coordinated military operations against the FDLR.

August 2, 2012: The UN Security Council stated that foreign nations must end their support for Congolese rebels, specifically the M23 rebel group. Essentially the UN condemned Rwanda without naming Rwanda.

August 9, 2012: The government rejected calls for negotiations with the M23 rebel group and said that it will not negotiate with the rebels. It still considers the rebels to be mutineers from the Congolese Army (FARDC). The government also said that it would not support any peacekeeping force in the eastern Congo that included Rwandan troops. The government prefers UN peacekeepers and it wants UN forces to take a more active role in confronting M23.

August 15, 2012: The Rwandan government said that the UN Group of Experts on the Congo is acting in bad faith. Rwanda contended the UN report was filled with inaccuracies. Rwanda contended that it has not supplied M23 with weapons and that M23 has access to weapons (including heavy weapons, like multiple rocket launchers) that were seized in 2008, by the CNDP militia and then hidden. The government accused one member of the UN study group of having a benign view of radical Hutu organizations like the FDLR and had published an article that described the FDLR as victims of the Rwandan Tutsi government. Essentially, Rwanda claimed that the UN study exhibited an anti-Tutsi tribal bias. Welcome to African politics and political interpretation.

August 18, 2012: The Congo is a topic at the Southern African Development Community (SADC) annual summit. The South African government told the summit that Rwanda must end its support for Congolese rebels in the eastern Congo. South Africa was referring to UN and Congolese accusations that Rwanda supports the M23 rebel movement.

August 19, 2012: The stand-off with the M23 rebel group continues in the Bunagana area. Since the beginning of the month, a tentative ceasefire has been arranged between the Congolese Army and the M23 fighters but the government believes that the M23 militia is reorganizing and preparing for another round of fighting.

August 21, 2012: The government responded to critics who argue that Zimbabwe should not be allowed to deploy peacekeeping troops in the Congo. The government said that Zimbabwean troops contributed to stability when they deployed into the Congo during the Great Congo War. Others remember Zimbabwean participation quite differently. The Zimbabwean forces reportedly committed many atrocities and plundered Congolese mineral resources. Zimbabwe sent troops to the Congo in 1998, and only withdrew them in 2001. A UN study found evidence that Zimbabwean Army officers and senior members of Zimbabwe's governing ZANU-PF party made money by selling and smuggling Congolese resources. It is also argued that Angola should not be allowed to participate in an AU sponsored peacekeeping force that may deploy into the eastern Congo. Angolan and Namibian forces also intervened in 1998. The Zimbabwean, Angolan, and Namibian forces are sometimes referred to as the SADC (Southern African Development Community) contingent in the Great Congo War, or the SADC Alliance. At the time Zimbabwe's dictator, Robert Mugabe, justified sending troops because he contended the Uganda and Rwanda had invaded the Congo. In 2009, the Angolan government stated that SADC's Standby Brigade was ready to intervene in the Congo, if asked. SADC has 15 members, Malawi, Angola, Congo, Republic of Congo, South Africa,

Namibia, Botswana, Mauritius, Lesotho, Mozambique, Madagascar, Swaziland, Zambia, Zimbabwe, and the Seychelles. (Austin Bay)

August 24, 2012: MONUSCO now has around 4,000 peacekeeping troops deployed in the northeastern Congo. The last thing Congo needs is more ethnic strife, but Congo's northeastern Ituri district is once again experiencing ethnic tensions that include echoes of tribal separatism. The FRPI (Patriotic Resistance Front in Ituri) militia group now controls an area around Lake Albert (about 100 kilometers south of Ituri's capital, Bunia). The FRPI claims that it has formed an alliance with the PFDDI (Popular Front for Durable Development in Ituri), the RAF (Revolutionary Armed Forces) militia, and the IAFI (Integrated Armed Forces of Ituri). Allegedly the alliance wants the Congolese government to make Ituri a province. Ituri, as Kibali-Ituri, was a Congolese province from 1962 to 1966. It is now governed by the Ituri Interim Administration as part of Congo's Orientale province. However, Rwanda and also Uganda have been accused of supporting various rebel groups in the eastern Congo, including the M23 Movement which still controls a large chunk of territory in the Congo's North Kivu province, including a strip near the Ugandan border. The UN's Group of Experts on the Congo (GoE Congo) has accused Rwanda of providing M23 with material and financial support. Rwanda denies the accusation. However, many of the M23 rebels were associated with Laurent Nkunda's CNDP (National Congress for the Defense of the People) militia. Rwanda supported the CNDP until January 2009. The CNDP was regarded as a Congolese Tutsi militia. The M23 Movement takes its name from March 23, 2009, the date M23 the 2009 peace agreement that was signed. The agreement was supposed to end the war and chaos in the eastern Congo. It promised rebel groups that they would have political rights and various economic opportunities. M23 rebels contend that the government has violated the peace agreement. M23 began operations in April 2012. (Austin Bay)

August 31, 2012: Several international organizations have suggested that a peacekeeping force composed of African Union (AU) nations deploy into the eastern Congo. UN officials in Africa began discussing it publicly late last year but the idea has circulated in the diplomatic community for several years. The concept of an African peacekeeping brigade of some sort has bounced around at least since the 1970s. The code phrase for the Congo is deploying a neutral regional force, or some variation. The AU would likely sponsor the force, if it is organized, and the UN might sponsor it as well. Critics point out that the UN peacekeeping force is an international force. They point that out not to criticize the AU but to note that the UN is losing interest in the Congo and its intractable problems. That is the dirty little public secret about the UN Stabilization Force in the Congo (MONUSCO) operation. MONUSCO still deploys around 20,000 personnel (soldiers, police, administrators, etc.) in the Congo but UN members are frustrated and are tired of paying the bill. The diplomats reply that a regional force would bring a regional political commitment to stopping the chaos and bloodletting in the eastern Congo. That political commitment ought to translate into regional efforts to stop the smuggling of minerals and weapons that help finance the various militias and gangs operating in the eastern Congo. In early August the defense ministers of Burundi, Republic of Congo (Brazzaville), Rwanda, Angola, Tanzania, and Uganda met with the Congolese defense minister and discussed the idea of creating an African regional force for policing the eastern Congo, and there was interest in creating the force.

September 14, 2012: Democratic Republic of Congo: one kick can promote tolerance'

Masisi – Few activities in the world are as effective as sports in bridging differences, building community, or educating young people about peace. The JRS inter-school football tournament, 'Pamoja Tutashinda', or 'together we'll win' in Kiswahili, allowed for students, referees and spectators to forget about divisions between the local and displaced populations, about ethnic differences, in eastern Democratic Republic of Congo. The football competition sent a clear message to the population: a united community is a stronger community.

The tournament: Over a period of four months, from March to July, 54 teams from as many secondary schools weathered muddy pitches throughout the Masisi district giving life to intense games. Despite a few inevitable objections from one team or another, the motto of the competition was fair play and honesty among students on the field. In the weeks prior to the tournament, JRS staff offered training to coaches, referees and linesmen not only on tactics and offside rules but also on enforcing discipline and promoting fairness among players.

September 15, 2012: South Korea recently put another "Sejong The Great" class destroyer into service after nine months of sea trials. This is the third, and possibly last, of these Aegis equipped warships. The first one entered service four years ago. These ships are also called KDX-III (Korean Destroyer Experimental) class guided missile destroyers, and were designed to operate far from South Korea. This was part of a plan to give South Korea an international (or at least regional) naval capability. That plan changed two years ago after North Korea sank a South Korean corvette with a torpedo and shelled a South Korean island off the west coast. Now South Korea is scrambling to build more coast protection vessels and enhance anti-submarine capabilities. The KDX III was preceded by the 3,900 ton KDX-I in 1998, and the 5,500 ton KDX-II in 2002. The 9,900 ton KDX-IIIs are approximately the same size as the U.S. Navy's Arleigh Burke class guided missile destroyers. Actually, the KDX III is a little larger than the Burkes, and have 128 VLS cells for missiles, compared to 96 on the Burkes. The VLS tubes usually carry 80 SM-2 anti-aircraft missiles, 32 cruise missiles and 16 rocket launched anti-submarine torpedoes. There are also six anti-submarine torpedo tubes. There is also a 6 inch (127mm) gun, two 30mm auto-cannon and a multiple cell launcher of Rolling Airframe Missiles for anti-missile defense. The KDX can also carry two helicopters. The KDX-III is the first Korean ship large enough to carry the AEGIS system, and may get anti-missile upgrade (which some Japanese Aegis ships have). Built in South Korea, the KDX IIIs cost about $930 million each. Instead of building more KDX IIIs, there is more interest in having more KDX IIs, and modernizing the ones already in service. Six KDX IIs are already in service, and they are adequate for dealing with North Korea and China. Meanwhile, the third KDX III had an additional hundred tons of torpedo protection added to its hull. South Korea is also seriously considering upgrading the Aegis air defense systems on the KDX III so that it can use the anti-missile version of the SM-2 anti-aircraft missile, or the even more capable SM-3 anti-missile missile. South Korea says that its KDX-III Aegis radar can currently spot any ballistic missile launch in North Korea.

September 25, 2012: Congolese living near the Congo-Uganda border told media that the unofficial ceasefire between M23 rebels and the Congolese Army continues to hold. The local Congolese apparently reported on the situation using cell phones. Phoned-in reports from locals are a bit like refugee reports. They are not always accurate and some times they are just rumors. However, the eastern Congo is huge and reporters cannot move around easily due to bad roads, bandits, and warfare. A reliable local source with a cell phone is often (if not always) more trustworthy than any government source or a rebel spokesman.

September 28, 2012: Democratic Republic of Congo: victims of sexual violence find the courage to share their experiences' Updates: Goma – It was a day like any other in one of the literacy centres for displaced women, managed by the Jesuit Refugee Service in North Kivu in eastern Congo. But here the students were not just learning to read and write, they were exploring delicate issues of sexual and other violence, as part of a healing process. The course brings a sense to structure to the lives of these displaced women. It not only offers them a place where they can improve their survival skills, it is a private and safe space where they can share experiences of violence in this war-torn region. When the JRS training officer touched the argument of sexual violence, the women, one by one, raised their hands and spoke about their experiences. Opening up and speaking about their experiences, they shared their memories of feeling vulnerable, their desire for protection by authorities and their right to justice for the crimes committed against them. It was the first time these women had spoken among themselves about their traumatic experiences of sexual violence at the hands of armed men groups and civilians. The issue is taboo and when made public typically leads to the stigmatisation of women survivors of sexual violence by their communities.

Witness: JRS spoke to two women who courageously decided to speak out, run the risk of social stigmatisation. The first, Diane*, was ambushed by Congolese military while looking for firewood. After desperately trying to defend herself, the men finally overpowered her. Thrown against a tree, hit repeatedly on the back and head, they tore off Diane's clothes and raped her. Although she courageously reported the attack to the police, the soldiers, Diane said, were just transferred to another district. Diane revealed that from that day on she has felt terrible and lost all ability to concentrate.

The second woman, Divine*, was a widow forced to flee her home village to seek safety in a camp for internally displaced persons (IDPs) during the war. Here, a man broke into Divine's home in the middle of the night and raped her. Consequently, she became pregnant and gave birth to twins in the camp. Divine's family disowned her, refused to help her or the children and accused her of being responsible for the rape. Since then the young woman has been afraid of cultivating crops on her land. Divine asks that the perpetrator be brought to justice and that she be guaranteed some form of financial reparation.

Sexual-and gender-based violence plagues communities in the Democratic Republic of Congo. According to a 2011 study published in the American Journal of Public Health, 48 women every hour are subjected to sexual-and gender-based violence throughout Congo. The consequences of these crimes on the physical and mental health of victims are devastating. Due to the inadequacy of the Congolese judicial system and the widespread climate of impunity for perpetrators of sexual violence (frequently members of armed group and the military), the survivors are rarely guaranteed the justice.

Protection: In North Kivu, the dignity of women and their right to physical, mental and moral integrity is constantly violated. Women urgently need protection against rape and all other forms of violence, the responsibility, in primis, of the Congolese authorities. In line with their respective mandates, the UN peacekeeping force, MONUSCO, and the UN refugee agency (UNHCR) should also play a fundamental role in the protection of the rights of the displaced.

October 1, 2012: UN observers reported that the M23 rebel has begun to act like a government in the border area it controls. The M23 enclave borders on Rwanda and Uganda. Local sources claimed that M23 officials are collecting taxes in the area. One reported that M23 is imposing a transit tax on individuals passing through the enclave.

October 3, 2012: The Congolese military acknowledged that earlier this year it planned to transfer General Bosco Ntaganda from his Congolese Army post in the eastern Congo. Ntaganda is the leader of the M23 rebel group. Corruption was the reason the government was going to transfer him to another part of the Congo. The government is basically arguing that the real reason for the rebellion is that Ntaganda was not going to give up his control of various mining and smuggling operations.

October, 2012 - The UN Security Council announces its intention to impose sanctions against leaders of the M23 rebel movement and violators of the DRC arms embargo. A UN panel says Rwanda and Uganda are supplying M23 with weapons and support, which both countries deny.

October 16, 2012: A new UN investigation has alleged that Rwanda's defense minister is directly involved with the M23 rebel movement. According to the investigators, there is also evidence that the Ugandan government has ties to the M23 rebels. The contention that Rwanda's defense minister is somehow in M23's chain of command, however, is explosive. Both Rwanda and Uganda vehemently reject accusations that their governments support M23. Rwandan General James Kabarebe is the Minister of Defense. He allegedly helped create the M23 group.

October 19, 2012: M23 rebels attacked a Congolese Army (FARDC) position near the town of Kirolirwe (North Kivu province, eastern Congo). There were also reports of firefights near the town of Sake. M23 said that its fighters launched the attack in order to seize weapons from the Congolese Army. M23 claimed that another ethnic Congolese Tutsi rebel group also collaborated in the attack and said the group consisted of former members of the National Congress for the Defense of the People (CNDP). This is the first reported engagement since early September.

October 20, 2012: The UN Security Council said that it will impose direct sanctions on the M23 rebel movement leaders and will stiffen penalties imposed on countries and organizations supplying M23 with money and weapons. The announcement is not without irony. Rwanda became a member of the Security Council (rotating membership) on October 18 and will serve on the Council for two years. The Security Council also passed a non-binding resolution condemning M23 for its attacks on civilians, humanitarian aid groups, and UN peacekeepers.

October 26, 2012: The Congo's vast Virunga National Park continues to serve as a haven for rebels. A Mai Mai militia group attacked a park facility and killed two park rangers and a Congolese soldier. Five of the Mai Mai militiamen died in the attack. M23 allegedly has a base camp inside the park.

In late October, 2012: The UN Group of Experts Released Report not for the first time, recommends tough sanctions against Uganda and Rwanda for supporting rebels DRCongo's M23 rebel group. The latest report has accuses Uganda and Rwanda of supporting DRCongo's M23 rebel group. But why do Uganda and Rwanda continue to get away with such activities? The reasons are both economic and geo-strategic. Although there are doubts that such sanctions will ever be implemented, this nevertheless represents a moral victory for the Congolese people who have long told the world that external players are partly responsible for the turmoil in Eastern Congo.

October 31, 2012: Congo-K - Mining code reforms: state wants bigger share'

Kinshasa is revising its 2002 mining code in the hope of getting a fatter share of profits from the sector. This forms part of a wider trend in Africa that worries mining operators.According to information gleaned on the sidelines of a conference staged by the Chambre de Commerce Belgique-Luxembourg-ACP in Brussels on Oct

November 1, 2012: The Congo's M23 (March 23rd) rebel group has given itself a new name. M23 now wants to be called the Congolese Revolutionary Army (CRA). The rebel group claimed it has around 2,000 fighters and is seeking more recruits. Several observers have estimated that M23 fields 1,000 fighters. Whatever its strength and whatever its name, M23's leaders have gained confidence since their rebellion began in Spring 2012. On October 23 an M23 spokesman said that the rebel group would take control of more Congolese territory if the national government continued to refuse to conduct direct peace negotiations. The spokesman said that M23's territorial aims could extend well beyond the enclave it currently controls and beyond North Kivu province.

November 5, 2012: Rwanda accused a group of Congolese Army soldiers of intentionally violating the Congo-Rwanda border. The incident occurred near the town of Kibumba (13 kilometers north of the Congolese border city of Goma). Rwanda claimed that the Congolese soldiers crossed the border on a reconnaissance mission. A Rwandan military spokesman called the border crossing a provocation. The term provocation indicates the Rwandans believe the incident was intentional. After the Congolese crossed the border, a firefight erupted between the Congolese soldiers and a detachment of Rwandan soldiers leaving one Congolese soldier dead and a Rwandan soldier wounded. Both the Rwandan and Congolese governments regard the incident as serious. It is the first confirmed firefight between Congolese and Rwandan military units since 2001.

November 9, 2012: M23 rebels accused the Congolese Army of attacking its position near Kitagoma (Uganda-Congo border). The alleged attack left ten civilians dead. The rebels claimed that government forces had broken the ceasefire in the area and called the attack a provocation. The Congolese government denied that its forces had attacked Kitagoma and said that the town is under the complete control of the rebel movement. The government said that Kitagoma is deep in rebel territory and that its troops could not possibly have launched an attack on the town.

November 14, 2012: The UN has been investigating a series of massacres in the eastern Congo, allegedly committed by the Raia Mutomboki and Nyatura Mai-Mai militia groups. Both groups have used the Congolese Army's focus on M23 to expand their areas of control. UN investigators have found evidence that since late April 2012, the militias have murdered 264 in the eastern Congo.

November 14, 2012: Congo-K: State to acquire 35% of shares in new companies'

The Federation des Entreprises Congolaises (FEC) is deeply concerned about a clause in the mining code that's currently being drafted.

November 14, 2012: Democratic Republic of Congo: stop the forgotten conflict in Masisi'

Updates: Masisi (North Kivu), Rome – Since last August, communities living in Masisi district in eastern Democratic Republic of Congo (DRC) have been displaced on a daily basis and at least 18 have been murdered, caught between tit-for-tat attacks by opposing rebel groups. Unless the peacekeeping forces (MONUSCO) and the Congolese army urgently intervene to protect the civilian population, more innocent lives will be lost. Over the last six months, MONUSCO forces have been supporting the Congolese army in putting down the rebellion by the March 23 Movement (M23) in the nearby district of Rutshuru. Focused on responding to the security threat caused by M23 rebels, the Congolese army left several parts of Masisi district unprotected, conceding freedom of movement to rebel groups – some in formal alliances with M23.

During this period, more than 320,000 people have been forcibly displaced in North Kivu. Although most of this is the result of the conflict between government and M23 forces in Rutshuru, many have been displaced by the violence in Masisi. "This has caused an unjustifiable lack of protection for the population in Masisi district. While it is clearly necessary that civilians attacked by M23 be protected, this should not happen at the cost of innocent lives – mainly women and children – elsewhere in the region. The population feels abandoned by MONUSCO forces which has failed in its mandate", said a JRS staff member in Masisi. The Jesuit Refugee Service in Masisi has witnessed first-hand the consequences of the alarming escalation of violence between rebel groups from the Hunde and Hutu communities, as well as between other armed groups active in the area. In addition to the immediate consequences of the violence, the attacks leave many groups – women, children, older people, those with disabilities and health problems – in particularly vulnerable circumstances, without assistance from aid agencies and support from other community members.

A climate of fear currently reigns in the Hutu and Hunde communities in Masisi. Increased attention needs to be urgently provided by the international community, one which answers the pleas for security and humanitarian aid and pushes Congolese political, civil and military authorities to guarantee the protection of these populations. Otherwise free reign will continue to be given to militias responsible for the killing of innocent children, women and men.

Recent events: Between 27 and 29 September 2012, a number of Hunde villages near Loashi and Shoa districts were burned down by members of Nyatura, a Hutu militia group.

On 30 September, Hunde motorcyclist was murdered in Loashi, allegedly by a Hutu militia.

On 30 September, despite heavy rains and the presence of a MONUSCO base less than a kilometre away, members of the Hunde community burned several huts in the Kilimani camp for internally displaced persons (IDPs), forcing many residents, mostly Hutus, to seek safety in other camps or with family members. Even though most people in Masisi were aware of the high risk of an attack, MONUSCO made no plans to prevent the violence and protect the IDPs.

After a few days of relative calm, following the intervention of the local authorities, the massacres recommenced. On 3 November, four Hunde women and two children were murdered by machete at the hands of the Nyatura militia. The women had been gathering food a few kilometres from Masisi town and were said to have been raped before being killed.

On 4 November, members of the Hunde community carried the bodies of the victims to the building of the local Masisi authorities, demanding their community be provided with security.

On 11 November, a Hutu man was killed by members of the Hunde militia FDC (Forces de Défense du Congo) in Ngote village. FDC members subsequently burned down several villages around Buhabo, causing further forced displacement. Hutu community members later carried the body to the Masisi town council, demanding their community be protected, as was done a week earlier by the Hunde community.

On 12 November, a Hutu armed group responded by burning down several Hunde villages around Masisi town. Thousands of people have reached Masisi town in seeking safety from the violence. In Mashaki village five dead bodies have been found; a woman and six children are still missing. Later that day, several Hutu villages were burned down. Most IDPs in Kilimani have yet to return to the camp for fear of further violence and due to cuts in food delivery since 30 September. They continue to live in extremely precarious conditions without any assistance.

JRS in North Kivu: JRS started to work in North Kivu in 2008, in the camps for displaced populations around Goma. After the sudden closure of the camps in September 2009, JRS followed the people to their areas of origin and to places of new displacement. JRS currently works in two areas of North Kivu: Masisi and Mweso districts.

Masisi: Established in 2010, JRS has since expanded its services to five official and other makeshift IDP camps, offering formal and informal education and emergency assistance. In addition to the construction and renovation of secondary schools, JRS teams provide education materials and teacher training in 84 secondary schools. Special attention is paid to the needs of women. As such, literacy courses and skills training are provided for women, many of whom are victims of sexual violence. The third component of the project is to provide one-to-one assistance to older people and persons with disabilities. Where necessary, staff refer these individuals to other agencies. More recently, with the establishment of five unofficial camps, JRS has begun providing food and plastic sheeting in three of the camps where people are living in extreme poverty.

November 2012 - M23 troops briefly enter Goma, the main city in the resources-rich east, then withdraw on promise government will release some of their supporters.

November 15, 2012: Some 700 M23 rebels engaged a Congolese Army unit near Rugari (30 kilometers north of Goma) at around 5 in the morning. Army commanders claimed to have killed 44 M23 fighters. The Rugari battle definitely breaks what had been a tentative ceasefire in the area. M23 claimed that Congolese Army units attacked its position at Kitagoma on November 9, a charge the government vehemently denied.

November 17, 2012: M23 rebels took the town of Kibumba. The town is 30 kilometers north of Goma. A rebel column continued moving south towards Goma.

UN peacekeepers were informed that M23 rebels have access to very good military equipment. M23 fighters have night vision devices and know how to use them in night time combat operations.

November 18, 2012: M23 rebels struck a village on the outskirts of Goma.

The rebel force hit the village with mortar and machine gun fire.

November 19, 2012: Several mortar rounds struck the city of Goma and killed four people. The mortar shells may have been fired from Rwandan territory. UN peacekeepers had engaged M23 rebel fighters on November 18 as the main rebel force advanced toward the city of Goma. Helicopter gunships and artillery supported the UN peacekeepers. The UN forces appear to be fighting a delaying action. The UN Security Council has condemned M23's advance on Goma. Interestingly enough, the M23 advance on Goma is strikingly similar to the CNDP's advance on Goma in 2008. However, the CNDP did not attack the city.

Meanwhile, M23 said that it had positioned a large force on the outskirts of Goma. M23 has a checkpoint about 100 meters from a Congolese Army checkpoint just outside of Goma. M23 issued an ultimatum to the effect that if the government refused to start negotiations it would continue its operations in the Goma rea. An M23 spokesman demanded that Congolese Army units withdraw from Goma. The government refused to begin face to face negotiations to discuss M23's grievances and said that the Congolese Army would defend the city of Goma.

November 20, 2012: The rebel group M23 entered the city of Goma after scattering several Congolese Army units. M23 fighters controlled the airport and occupied the city's central district. The Congolese government claimed that it still had forces in the city, but by the end of the day international observers confirmed that M23 had taken control of the city. Goma is the capital of North Kivu province.

November 21, 2012: A column of M23 rebels took the town of Sake, 27 kilometers west of Goma. Meanwhile, an M23 commander in Goma said M23 would advance on Kinshasha and overthrow the Congolese government. An advance on Kinshasha from the eastern Congo would be quite an undertaking, essentially marching through the heart of the Congolese jungle. The threat, however, serves a political purpose. It is another signal that M23 wants everyone to think it has national ambitions. Perhaps it does. The threat also establishes a negotiating position. The threats take on more meaning now that Vital Kamehre, the opposition politician who finished third in last year’s presidential election, has urged the government to negotiate with M23.

November 21, 2012: Democratic Republic of Congo: precarious lives of displaced persons in Masisi'

Updates: On the one hand displaced Congolese are living in constant fear of the imminent arrival of the March 23 Movement (M23) rebels, which have already taken control of Goma, the North Kivu capital in eastern Congo. On the other hand, day in, day out they are suffering the effects of the violent attacks of numerous rebel groups in the area. This is the precarious situation in which the inhabitants of Masisi district, approximately 100 kilometres from Goma, have been living for the past several days.

Flight in the forest: "We abandoned our homes unable to bring food with us. We fled into the forest with only one objective in mind, our safety. And we don't have any idea of when or how we will return home", said Paluku*, an inhabitant of Masisi, who fled his home on Sunday 25 November following the outbreak of fighting between the Congolese army and an ethnic Mai-Mai militia group. Severe fighting began on Sunday after the Mai-Mai militia, which is believed to be allied with the M23, attempted to take control of the weapons of the Congolese army. The rebels, many of whom defected from the ranks of the national army last April, were reported to have marched towards other areas of North Kivu, including Masisi, in the last seven days, in an attempt to defeat other armed groups active in the area. "When we heard gunfire, we witnessed the mass flight of the population of Masisi. In the beginning, many sought safety in the parish, then they began fleeing towards Nyabiondo. People had a look of fear in their eyes", said a staff member of Masisi.

A sense of insecurity: Many people, including internally displaced persons (IDPs), found refuge in the nearby Bukombo camp, where they crowded together in school buildings. "We don't have anything to eat or drink. Above all, the women and children are in a state of shock. And we don't have any idea of when we'll finally have peace. Today we fled from the Mai-Mai militias, tomorrow it may be from M23", Paluku told a JRS staff member.
Notwithstanding the deterioration of the crisis in North Kivu following the fall of Goma to M23 rebels, JRS teams in Masisi district briefly re-established its formal and informal education activities, including the construction of a secondary school. Bora Mwazo, a 24-year-old displaced mother of four, is one of the students of the JRS literacy and vocational training courses. She decided to return to the school in Masisi where she is learning to be a tailor, despite the climate of insecurity and fear. "People say the M23 rebels will arrive shortly in Masisi, and when that happens I don't know how I will be able to flee with my children or where I'll be able to go. But today I wanted to come to school to find a little peace and forget about the war", the women said a few days ago. The state of Bora Mwazo and her family is unknown at the moment. What is certain is that the young woman feared the arrival of M23 forces and eventually fled fighting between the army and the Mai-Mai militia. We do not know whether or not she managed to find refuge from the various armed groups. Regardless of the armed groups responsible for the violence, Bora's situation is emblematic of the insecurity in the lives of those living in Masisi and North Kivu. Meanwhile, after an outbreak of recent violence, JRS has been forced to suspend all activities in Masisi. Danilo Giannese, Advocacy and Communications Officer, Jesuit Refugee Service Great Lakes Africa

November 21, 2012: Democratic Republic of Congo: clashes in Goma leave thousands in urgent need of assistance'

Updates: Bujumbura – Tens of thousands of women, children and men are currently fleeing areas around the North Kivu capital Goma, in eastern Congo, as a consequence of a violent armed advance conducted by the rebel group, March 23 Movement (M23) which took control of the city yesterday. According to Jesuit Refugee Service (JRS) and other humanitarian field staff, the civilian population, including thousands of families living in camps for internally displaced persons (IDPs) in other areas of North Kivu, are reportedly in desperate need of food, shelter and other material assistance. However, most humanitarian and UN agencies have evacuated most of their field staff for security reasons. "We have evacuated nearly all our staff from Goma. Given the security situation, all our activities, including assistance programmes in the camps, have been suspended. However, our teams in nearby Masisi and Mweso are still in situ as the roads out of the country are too dangerous. We're particularly concerned about our local teams who are currently separated from their families in Goma. Fortunately, they've been in contact with their families and everyone is safe", said JRS Great Lakes Advocacy and Communications Officer, Danilo Giannese, who himself was forced to leave Goma a few days ago. "The situation is tragic. The consequences of the ongoing crisis in Goma are especially acute for individuals living in particularly vulnerable circumstances, such as children, older people, those with disabilities and health problems. They are often unable to flee the fighting, find safe haven or support themselves", continued Mr Giannese.

Abandoned to their fate: Since the evacuation of most JRS staff, teams are unable to answer questions regarding the fate of the women, men and children in the most vulnerable circumstances. "Did they survive the fighting yesterday? Did they find a temporary shelter from the tropical rains common to the region in this season? Did they find something to eat and medicines for their aliments? It's terrible, but we just don't know.

Forced to evacuate from the most volatile areas, we don't have any information, for instance, on the fate of Hakizimana Uhwirire, a 25-year-old wheelchair-bound man" added Mr Giannese. Last month, after his temporary home in an IDP camp in North Kivu was burned down following an incursion of armed groups in Masisi, JRS transferred Hakizimana's family to another camp on the outskirts of Goma. Hakizimana, his mother and younger brother, believed they had finally reached a safe haven far away from the violent conflicts in Masisi district, the consequences of which were documented by JRS in a press release published on 14 November. "Here we will be safe, we will not risk our lives and we can think of rebuilding our existences", he told a JRS staff member that very day. When humanitarian organisations operating in the camp built his new home, his eyes filled with hope that a new life was about to start for him and his family in improved conditions and peace. He expressed the desire to go back to school and work as a shoemaker in the camp to earn some money for his family. Hakizimana's hopes lasted less than thirty days: crumbling as M23 rebels advanced towards Goma. Engaged in violent clashes, both the Congolese army and the M23 rebels have committed a number of human rights violations, such as abduction of civilians, looting and destruction of properties. Danilo Giannese, Advocacy and Communications Officer, Jesuit Refugee Service, Great Lakes Africa and James Stapleton, International Communications Coordinator, Jesuit Refugee Service

November 22, 2012: The government suspended General Gabriel Amisi, chief of staff of the Congolese Army. A UN investigation accused Amisi of selling weapons to criminals (poachers) and several rebel groups, particularly the Mai Mai Raia Mutomboki militia.

M23 rebel commanders rejected requests made by several international leaders that they withdraw their forces from the Congolese city of Goma. A senior rebel commander said that, on the contrary, the rebel army would seize more territory. Another said that the group would continue to hold Goma, pending negotiations with the Congolese government. Among the leaders asking M23 to withdraw were the presidents of neighboring Rwanda and Uganda. Both nations have been accused of helping the rebel movement.

November 24, 2012: The leaders of Congo, Uganda, Kenya and Tanzania urged the M23 rebel group to accept a cease fire and to quit threatening to topple the Congolese government. The four leaders met in Uganda for a special summit. The leaders also told the rebel group to withdraw from Goma (North Kivu province, on the Rwanda-Congo border). The group also proposed deploying a regional peacekeeping force supplied by neutral nations. The force would deploy as a joint force to Goma's airport. The leaders of Uganda, Kenya and Tanzania, however, also asked the president of the Congo, Joseph Kabila (who attended the summit) to listen to the rebels' grievances.

November 25, 2012: In mid-summer 2012, media and UN observers in the eastern Congo estimated that the M23 rebel group fielded 1,000 fighters, with 2,000 fighters being the highest estimate. There were, however, reports of new recruits showing up (perhaps from Rwanda) and a steady trickle of defectors from the Congolese Army (FARDC). Several of the defectors identified themselves as Congolese Tutsi tribesmen. Like the initial group of mutineers which formed M23, several defectors indicated that they had served in the CNDP (National Congress for Defense of the People) militia prior to joining the FARDC. The CNDP was a predominantly Congolese Tutsi militia. M23 never gave an official strength figure, but its leaders always claimed the organization had more manpower than the Congolese government and international observers said it had. When M23 changed its name to the Congolese Revolutionary Army (CRA) its leaders asserted that the new name reflected the movement's increasing strength. It also demonstrated that it had a national mission. The name change has not stuck and most media continue to refer to the organization as M23. However, it does indeed represent a major challenge to the Congolese government in Kinshasha. Within the past two weeks, a UN analyst said M23 fielded between 2,500 and 3,000 fighters. Other international observers estimate that M23 may have as many as 6,000 fighters. The UN's 3,000 figure and the 6,000 figure are best guesses, but the bottom line is that the movement has indeed attracted more volunteers. Based on recent M23 operations, 6,000 is a very reasonable figure. The rebels took the city of Goma on November 20. For M23, seizing Goma is a major military and political victory. Goma, the capital of North Kivu province, has over a million residents and is the most important city in Congo's vast eastern region. Taking Goma from the army (which had some assistance from UN peacekeeping forces) certainly demonstrated that the rebel group can field a strong offensive striking force while simultaneously holding its base camps in the border area it took in July and August. The rebels also have smaller columns operating to the west of Goma. When considering the distances and the area, 6,000 fighters might be on the low-side.

Taking Goma is also an information warfare boon for M23. For reporters, Goma is much easier to reach than a jungle base camp. M23 commanders have been making public statements about political change in the Congo and international television crews have been recording the speeches and showing the crowds. Reporters in Goma have now had a chance to get a closer and longer look at the rebels and their weapons. The rebels have some first-rate equipment. For example, the UN claimed that peacekeepers have seen M23 fighters using night-vision equipment. It also appears that M23 fighters have a lot of weapons that once belonged to the Congolese Army, though when and precisely how the weapons were acquired depends on who tells the story. There are numerous allegations of corrupt Congolese Army officers selling weapons and supplies to M23 although rebel commanders claim they took the weapons in battle and that they have also seized several FARDC ammunition caches. No doubt M23 fighters have picked up weapons on the battlefield. Goma was a FARDC supply base and a base for UN peacekeepers. However, this spoils of battle explanation also works as a cover story masking supply shipments from sources in Rwanda. The Congolese government and UN investigators have repeatedly accused Rwanda of supplying M23. (Austin Bay)

November 28, 2012: Congo-K - New mining code: associated minerals under scrutiny'

The mining industry is biting its fingernails about current changes in Congo-K's mining legislation.

December 1, 2012: M23 rebels pull out of Goma, leaving the government and the UN to deal with the chaos inside the city of one million. M23 fighters still control the less populous areas around the city. M23 had captured Goma on November 20th but quickly found that it did not have enough manpower to police the city and control other parts of North Kivu.

December 5, 2012: Democratic Republic of Congo: further bloodshed and exhaustion facing internally displaced persons in Masisi' Bujumbura – Bloodshed, destruction and massive population displacement continues to terrorise the population of Masisi, a mineral rich area in North Kivu, eastern Congo. At least 28 people were killed in Masisi since 29 November, as a consequence of on-going fighting between rival armed groups. Violent clashes among various rebels, as well as fighting between these rebel groups and the Congolese army has been on the rise since last August. Consequently, thousands of women, children and men have been displaced from their homes in Masisi. In addition, a climate of fear and reciprocal mistrust reigns between the two major communities living in the area, the Hundes and the Hutus.

Updates: The Jesuit Refugee Service (JRS) believes that highlighting the forgotten conflict in Masisi and ensuring protection of the local population are urgent priorities for the international community, the Congolese authorities, the UN peacekeeping mission (MONUSCO) and the political actors of the Great Lakes Region. "We appreciate the ongoing diplomatic efforts to end the violence perpetrated by the rebels who took control of Goma on 20 November causing tens of thousands people to flee. However, equal determination should be used to restore peace and security to populations in Masisi, exhausted from the conflict", said JRS Great Lakes Africa Director, Isaac Kiyaka, SJ.

Night attacks: According to the information collected by JRS teams in Masisi, on the night of 29 November members of the Nyatura, a Hutu militia, attacked Kihuma village, around Buabo, burning down houses and firing gunshots at Hunde villagers. Five people were murdered, including one in a nearby medical centre. "They arrived at four in the morning and the village looked like the hell. I took my six children and fled into the forest without food or clothes. People ran where they could and I saw children falling in the river", explains 60-year-old Loomo*.

Lives in flight: In less than two weeks, Loomo has fled three times, walking a total distance of approximately 21 kilometres, in order to save the lives of herself and her children. "We constantly feel threatened. I know we will be forced to flee again because another conflict will certainly erupt. We need our authorities to guarantee security. We cannot continue to live in this way: people are tired and we are losing the desire to live", continues Loomo who is now seeking refuge with her children in a primary school.

Vengeance: During the same day of the attack in Kihuma on 29 November, young Hunde militiamen immediately reacted by killing 11 Hutu people in the surrounding area of Buabo, including five men who supposedly belonged to the Nyatura militia. The day after, twelve more people were killed during an armed incursion in various Hutu villages around Lushebere. Several houses were burned down. and the population fled the village en masse.

Moise*, a 30-year-old Hutu man, lives and works in Masisi town, which is primarily populated by Hunde people. He has described an increased climate of reciprocal fear based on ethnic tensions between the two communities in the past few months. "When I walk in the city, people call me 'Nyatura, Nyatura' (Hutu militiaman), but I’m not a member of an armed group. I just want to live in peace with the rest of the population. Unfortunately, I feel I'll be forced to flee Masisi forever, if not, they may kill me", explains Moise.

Context: On 14 November, JRS released a press statement documenting the murders of at least 18 people, including four women and two children assassinated by machetes; a massive population displacement; and the destruction of camps for internally displaced persons (IDPs). The humanitarian situation in North Kivu further deteriorated throughout the month as a result of violence by the March 23 Movement (M23), a rebel group supported by the Rwandan and the Ugandan governments according to a recent report of the UN Group of Experts on the DRC, but denied by Kigali and Kampala. The M23 took control of Goma on 20 November causing the displacement of more than 140,000 additional people and the interruption of most humanitarian relief throughout the affected territory. Following discussions between government leaders of the International Conference on the Great Lakes Region, the rebel movement agreed to withdraw to 20 kilometres from Goma city, in return for the opening of direct negotiations with the Congolese government.

December 6, 2012: In the northern city of Kano police arrested eight Boko Haram men who sought to attack a police patrol with a bomb. But the thrown bomb did not go off and the police went after the attackers.

December 8, 2012: Uganda proposed that a new peacekeeping force, composed of African troops, be organized (and paid for by the UN) for service in Congo. This force would be allowed to fight and maintain order.

December 9, 2012: The government began peace talks with M23. But after ten days little was accomplished except an agreement to resume negotiations in early January. The M23 wants an official ceasefire, signed by president Kabila. Congo is not willing to do that, believing that they might be able to muster enough military force to crush M23. The government also accuses M23 of not withdrawing 20 kilometers from the city limits, as they had agreed to.

December 9, 2012: In the northern city of Kano, several days of raids have led to the arrest of 28 Boko Haram members and the seizure of many weapons and other terrorist material.

In the south (Delta State) the 82 year old mother of the Finance Minister was kidnapped. The victim, who is an MD and college professor, was taken from her home by at least ten armed men. Two days later, in the west (Yobe State), the wife of a retired army general was also taken. These two cases got a lot of publicity but many other kidnappings did not. Taking people for ransom has become a big business in the south and the police are often involved. In the case of the Finance Ministers mother, two policemen were soon arrested and accused of being involved in the kidnapping. This did not lead to the release of the victim and the kidnappers are demanding $1.27 million in ransom (20 percent of their original demand).

December 10, 2012: In the northeast (Yobe state) Boko Haram attacked a police headquarters and were repulsed. A dozen (or more) Islamic terrorists and one policeman died. Yobe state has become one of the main battlegrounds in the campaign against Boko Haram.

The government has asked for American help in dealing with Boko Haram, and the commander of AFRICOM has made it clear that Boko Haram is not going to be defeated by military action alone. If the U.S. provides major assistance to Nigeria it will be via AFRICOM. “Africa Command” (AFRICOM) is similar in organization to other commands (Central, or CENTCOM, for the Middle East, and South, or SOUTHCOM, for Latin America, etc). AFRICOM coordinates all American military operations in Africa. Before 2007, those operations were coordinated between two commands (the one covering Europe and the one covering Latin America). The establishment of AFRICOM meant more money for counter-terror operations in Africa and more long range projects. One thing most African nations wanted from AFRICOM was military and counter-terrorism trainers. The problem with this is that the people so trained are often then employed as enforcers for the local dictator. Even providing training for peacekeepers can backfire, for those peacekeeping skills can also be used to pacify your own people. This will be a problem in Nigeria as well, as long as there is so much corruption in the government and military. But at the same time the U.S. cannot ignore the growing cooperation between Boko Haram and al Qaeda type organizations (especially those in northern Mali, which has become a new sanctuary for al Qaeda). Boko Haram is becoming part of the terrorist threat to the U.S. and the West.

In the north local tribal and religious leaders, who still have some standing among the people, place the blame for Boko Haram on the northern politicians. This is especially true of the state governors, who use fraud and force to get elected and once in office steal as much as they can. Federal level anti-corruption efforts have concentrated on the governors and ex-governors (all of them much wealthier than they were before becoming governors). But these savvy and corrupt politicians have been difficult to prosecute, convict, and jail. The justice system favors those with a lot of cash and few scruples. And that's why you have Boko Haram up north, who exist, by their own admission, mainly to reduce corruption and crime.

Boko Haram is particularly brutal with the national police. In part, this is because the police tend to be quick to kill Boko Haram members along with friends and family of the Islamic radicals. This is illegal but the police are notoriously corrupt and inclined to break the law themselves.

While the government proclaims the massive oil thefts in the Niger Delta and the growing Islamic terrorism of Boko Haram in the north as under control, the reality is quite different. In both cases the federal government sees sending in the military as the solution. But it isn't. The Nigerian military is a blunt instrument. Although well trained and led, at least by African standards, the military relies too much on brute (and often excessive) force and can be bought off by oil thieves and Islamic radicals. In the Niger Delta the military, especially the navy, is being bribed to let the oil theft continue. The government does not want to discuss that problem openly. In the north Boko Haram has much less cash and is instead using terror tactics against the military leadership. Death squads seek out key military leaders and kill them. At the same time, all army commanders in the north are made aware of the fact that the Boko Haram assassins concentrate on the officers who are most energetic and effective against Islamic radicals.

December 10, 2012: Mathieu Ngudjolo Chui is acquitted by the International Criminal Court of war crimes and crimes against humanity. Mathieu Ngudjolo Chui (born 8 October 1970) is a colonel in the Congolese army and a former senior commander of the National Integrationist Front (FNI) and the Patriotic Resistance Force in Ituri (FRPI). He was controversially acquitted AGAIN of war crimes at Hague by Judge Bruno Cotte on the grounds that the prosecution had not proven beyond reasonable doubt that he was responsible for the crimes committed, a decision which led to criticism of the ICC. He is also known as Mathieu Cui Ngudjolo or Cui Ngudjolo.

On 6 February 2008, he was arrested by the Congolese authorities and surrendered to the International Criminal Court (ICC) to stand trial on six counts of war crimes and three counts of crimes against humanity. The charges include murder, sexual slavery and using children under the age of fifteen to participate actively in hostilities.

December 13, 2012: Boko Haram members have killed nearly 800 people so far this year. The military and police have killed more in response, but about half the police victims were civilians, the rest were Boko Haram or criminals mistaken for Islamic radicals. As the military and police increase their operations in the north, so does Boko Haram. Northerners are growing tired of all this, even though Boko Haram tries (more so than the security forces) to avoid civilian casualties. This doesn’t always work and Boko Haram bombs and gunfire kill a growing number of innocent civilians. Support for Boko Haram is declining, despite all the efforts of the security forces.

December 14, 2012: The UN has agreed to review its rules of engagement in the Eastern Congo, where they have 20,000 peacekeepers. Congolese complain that the peacekeepers rarely do much. This was very obvious during the current M23 uprising. The UN had more armed men (peacekeepers) in North Kivu than the M23 had, yet the peacekeepers refused to intervene. The Congolese Army was no match of M23 and the UN force might have been. Peacekeeper commanders explained that they did not engage M23 because they wanted to avoid civilian casualties. In general, UN peacekeepers tend to be peaceful. The UN makes a distinction between peacekeeping (lots of guard duty and “show of force” operations) and peace making (actually fighting those who disturb the peace). The UN has a more difficult time getting nations to contribute troops to peacekeeping operations if too many of those troops are killed or wounded. That would be the case if the UN peacekeepers took on the Tutsi fighters of M23. It’s no secret that the Tutsi are, by African standards, very effective soldiers. Even when organized as militia forces (little training and few experienced leaders) the Tutsi are formidable. The UN knows that taking on the Tutsi would cause a lot of peacekeepers casualties, something that the UN cannot tolerate.

December 21, 2012: The UN has accused M23 and the Congo Army of war crimes during the fighting around Goma. Congolese soldiers are accused of looting and raping as they retreated from Goma. The soldiers and bandits have also been looting and raping in refugee camps. This is pretty standard practice with the army and most of the militias. M23 was accused of summarily executing people in Goma. M23 said it was punishing corrupt officials and other criminals. M23 was also accused of seizing vehicles and other goods inside Goma.

December 23, 2012: The UN has sent several hundred peacekeepers into Goma to try and deal with the crime situation (which is out of control in the absence of adequate policing).

December 28, 2012: The UN has warned M23 members that they will be prosecuted as war criminals if they continue firing on UN helicopters. This new hostility towards UN helicopters comes from the UN use of armed helicopters to try and stop the M23 advance on Goma last November. The helicopter machine-guns killed or wounded dozens of M23 men and M23 has not forgotten.

2012 - Formation of the Dag Hammarskjold Inquiry Trust announced.

January 3, 2013: The U.S. has imposed more sanctions on the M23 (Tutsi) and FDLR (Rwandan Hutu) militias in eastern Congo.

2013 - The Dag Hammarskjold Trust presents its report at the Peace Palace in The Hague, The Netherlands

January 6, 2013: The government and the M23 rebels resumed peace talks. Two weeks of such talks last month accomplished little. The M23 uprising was all about corruption, and the rebels are particularly angry about the rigged 2011 Congolese presidential elections. That was not supposed to happen. M23 had agreed to disband in 2009, as part of a peace deal in return for promises of clean government. The current unrest is taking place in North Kivu province, which is on the borders of Rwanda and Uganda. The population of six million is similar to that found in South Kivu (population five million) to the south. The M23 rebels have about 5,000 armed men and are faced by 9,000 army troops and 6,700 UN peacekeepers. The problem is that the Tutsi are much better fighters and the government/UN force is not strong enough to destroy M23. Corruption is a major problem in Congo and that is what M23 is so upset about. M23 is a small group representing a few hundred thousand Tutsi in a nation of over 71 million. But so debilitating is the corruption and ethnic disunity that the national government is unable to cope. Rwanda is accused of supporting M23 or even plotting to annex North and South Kivu. Rwanda, a nation of 5.7 million dominated by its Tutsi (about 800,000) minority, is interested in protecting the Tutsi minority in Congo but denies secret support of the Tutsi rebels or plans to annex Kivu. The problem here is that the Tutsi are, by most measures, the good guys. There are only about 2.5 million Tutsi (in Rwanda, Burundi, Congo, and Uganda) and they represent a distinct culture in the region. The Tutsi are more disciplined, better educated, wealthier, and less corrupt. The Tutsi also dominate local governments, if only because they are better administrators and, when armed and organized, more effective fighters. Most other ethnic groups in the area are jealous, hostile, or just afraid of the Tutsi.

The Tutsi problem goes back over 600 years. In the 1500's the Tutsi (plural-Watutsi) nomads moved south from their ancient home in the semi-desert Sahel. With a different complexion (an important point for the Tutsi) and a foot taller than the local Hutu, it did not take long for the Tutsi to take over and install their own brand of Apartheid. The area eventually evolved into two Tutsi ruled empires, each roughly covering the territory of modern Burundi and Rwanda. In 1899, the Germans moved in and made both areas colonies. The British replaced the Germans in 1916 and passed the area over to the Belgians in the 1920's. It was assumed that, when the areas became independent nations, the Hutu (over 80 percent of the population) would run the place. The more aggressive and warlike Tutsi had other ideas and the Hutu knew it. In 1959, the Hutu of Rawanda rose up against the Tutsi (who held most positions of local power), slaughtered thousands of them, and drove several hundred thousand into exile (mainly in Uganda). Several thousand of these exiles formed an army and attempted a comeback in 1990. This comeback waxed and waned until the Hutu of Rawanda struck back in 1994, slaughtering nearly a million people (Tutsi and Hutu "sympathizers"). The Tutsi rebels, better organized and trained than the Hutu dominated Rwandan army, took control of the government as most of the Hutu killers and their families fled to refugee camps in Congo (then called Zaire) and other neighboring countries. In Kivu the Hutu killers organized militias and continued raiding into Rwanda, as well as attacking the Tutsi minority in eastern Congo. Rwanda sent troops across the border to shut down the Hutu militias. This caused a Tutsi led general inspired uprising there against the corrupt and inept Mobutu government of Congo. That led to the removal of Mobutu after 26 years in power. The newly elected government turned out to be as corrupt and inept as Mobutu. The UN was less concerned with this than the need to stop the fighting in eastern Congo. This was accomplished in 2009, but the peace deal assumed the corruption and misgovernment problem would be addressed. This would include disarming all the militias, especially the ones composed of Rwandan Hutu exiles. None of that happened and nine months ago the Congolese Tutsi began to rebel once more. Most of the Congolese Tutsi who had quite M23 to accept the amnesty and join the army deserted and rejoined M23.

What is often missed in all this is that the Tutsi, Hutu, and most other tribes in this part of Africa are variations on the ancient Bantu people (from West Africa). The Tutsi, like several other of the hundreds of different cultures in Africa, simply developed a superior skill set. That is a common pattern throughout human history. Since the differences were cultural, not genetic, many of the non-Tutsi tribes the Tutsi came into contact adopted Tutsi ways and, in effect, became Tutsi. When European nations moved in and turned Central Africa into colonies in the 19th century, they noted the superior habits of the Tutsi (and the fact that they ran much of the area and dominated the economy) and used a lot of Tutsi to staff the colonial administration. Yet the Tutsi remained a minority and resented for their success. At the same time, the Tutsi will defend themselves and continue to fight corruption and bad government. Normally this would be considered commendable. But the world wants things to quiet down in Africa, especially in the Congo. As long as the Tutsi are around this won't happen because the continuing chaos in eastern Congo is a direct result of Tutsis trying to defend themselves against genocide. A simple solution would be for the Congolese Tutsi to move back to Rwanda and Burundi. But those nations are already overcrowded, so the Tutsi continue to push for clean government in Eastern Congo.

Finally, there is the money issue. Eastern Congo is full of valuable natural resources (especially rare minerals essential to modern electronics). These are largely extracted illegally, under the protection of various militias and government officials. This is what finances M23 and many of the other militias as well. But most of the profits end up with government officials (especially president Kabila) and the foreign entrepreneurs who put up the money (billions of dollars) and expertise to build the mines in the middle of nowhere and arrange to get the minerals and diamonds out. The Tutsi would prefer to see all this done legally but there is no law in Kivu.

While the Tutsi have been in Eastern Congo for centuries, most arrived in the 20th century and are considered foreigners: aggressive and capable foreigners. The Congolese Tutsi are too capable to be eliminated but too few to take over. The U.S. goes along with condemning the violence in Eastern Congo but recognizes the good intentions of the Rwandan Tutsi and is reluctant to join in the UN consensus that the Tutsi are the cause of all the problems in Congo. The Tutsis have one ally in the region, Uganda. This is largely because Tutsi refugees in Uganda helped the present government overthrow former dictator Idi Amin and the Tanzania backed government that succeeded Amin.

In Goma there continues to be disorder because the city government was not fully reconstituted after M23 left on December 1st. In particular there's a lot of popular unrest against the 1,100 criminals who escaped from the city prison after M23 entered the city. Many of these men are still at large and local vigilante groups have lynched at least nine of them. The vigilante groups try to provide local security in the absence of adequate police or soldiers to do that.

Over 25,000 people fled the fighting around Goma. At least 2,000 Tutsi civilians fled to nearby Rwanda. Over 400,000 people fled their homes since last April, when M23 began recruiting Tutsi who had joined the Congolese Army. These army deserters were often former M23 members dissatisfied with the corruption and inept leadership in the Congolese Army. Most of those who fled their homes later returned after M23 drove away the Congolese soldiers. This large movement of people led to massive looting of homes and public buildings. Over 250 schools were looted or damaged along with many more government buildings and businesses.

January 8, 2013: The M23 rebel group declared a unilateral ceasefire in North Kivu province. M23 commanders said they would support a new round of peace talks with the Congolese government. The commanders also said that one goal of M23 is to improve the living conditions of all Congolese living in the eastern Congo. M23 has accused the government of ignoring the eastern Congo.

January 14, 2013: The government of Rwanda continues to insist that the Democratic Forces for the Liberation of Rwanda (FDLR) militia is rebuilding and regrouping in the Congo. The FDLR is run by former Hutu radicals who participated in the 1994 Rwandan genocide. The Rwandan government recently claimed that it has evidence that the FDLR has 4,000 new recruits and intends to train them in North Kivu province. Rawanda has also accused the Congolese Army of providing direct support for the FDLR. Rwanda has claimed that the Congolese Army knows the FDLR has elements in the town of Mudja, Rusayo, and Kanyati (North Kivu province). There are also reports of FDLR activity in the capital of North Kivu province, Goma. The M23 rebel group briefly took control of Goma but withdrew.

January 21, 2013: African diplomats (through the African Union and UN) have confirmed that several countries have been approached about providing troops for the proposed Neutral International Force (NIF) that would be deployed in the eastern Congo. There’s a hold-up, however, in creating the force. At least one country has said it want to retain direct command and control of its forces instead of committing them to a joint command.

January 26, 2013: The government claimed that the M23 rebel movement is once again threatening the capital of North Kivu province, Goma. The government said that M23 has failed to withdraw to a point 20 kilometers north of Goma, which it had agreed to do.

January 29, 2013: Diplomats reported another hold up in signing the UN-sponsored M23 peace agreement. The agreement includes the creation of the so-called Neutral International Force of around 2,500 soldiers which would deploy in the eastern Congo. The force would not actually be neutral. Its mission is clearly intervention. It will be deployed to prevent rebel groups from seizing territory. The force would be added to the current UN peacekeeping force, MONUSCO. In early January several sources reported that the NIF would have 4,000 troops assigned.

February 2, 2013: The UN reported that the Union of Revolutionary Forces of the Congo (UFRC) rebel group presents a new threat to the government. In mid-January the newly-formed UFRC announced that it intended to overthrow the Congolese government and try President Joseph Kabila for treason. The UFRC also accused the Kabila government of reneging on the March 23, 2009 peace agreement. This is the chief complaint of the M23 rebel movement. The UFRC is headquarters in the capital of South Kivu province, Bukavu.

February 5, 2013: Uganda urged regional leaders to go ahead and sign the UN brokered M23 peace agreement. Eight countries are involved in the UN negotiations: Uganda, the Congo, Rwanda, the Republic of Congo (Brazzaville), Burundi, South Africa, Tanzania, and Angola.

February 6, 2013: The on-going delay in signing the peace agreement with M23 involved disagreements over the process among several of the nations involved in the negotiations. The UN emphasized that there was no disagreement over the goals of the peace agreement. The peace agreement was supposed to have been signed on January 28. The deal reportedly gives South Africa a major role in insuring that the agreement is implemented.

February 7, 2013: The new peace agreement mediated by the UN remains unsigned. However, today the M23 rebel group and the Congolese government indicated that they are discussing reaching a final peace settlement by the end of February. In the meantime, M23 and government agreed to live by the March 23, 2009 peace agreement. That is where M23 takes its name, the March 23rd Movement. The government signed that agreement with the National Congress for the Defense of the People (CNDP) militia. Most of M23's fighters belonged to the CNDP.

February 8, 2013: South African police arrested 19 Congolese rebel operatives who were trying to procure weapons and communications gear in South Africa. The rebels had also acquired a farm near the town of Modimolle and were preparing to turn it into a training facility. Government prosecutors said that police had infiltrated the group. According to investigators, the group wanted to buy rocket-propelled grenade launchers and 5,000 AK47s. It was also seeking surface to air missiles satellite telephones. The group had held several meetings in various cities in South Africa, including Johannesburg.

February 10, 2013: Police arrested the commander of the Union of Revolutionary Forces of the Congo (UFRC) rebel organization. Authorities identified the commander as Gustave Bagayamukwe Tadji. The UFRC announced in January that it intended to overthrow the government of President Joseph Kabila. Bagayamukwe was arrested in South Kivu province.

February 14, 2013: Over 8,500 Central Africa Republic (CAR) refugees have fled into the Congo in the last week. The refugees began arriving on February 7, as fighting broke out near the town of Mobaye. Pro-CAR government forces clashed with the Seleka coalition rebel group.

February 16, 2013: UN Says Delayed Congo Peace Deal Due To Be Signed February 24, In Addis Ababa' A delayed UN-sponsored peace deal aimed at ending two decades of conflict in the east of the Democratic Republic of the Congo is due to be signed in the Ethiopian capital Addis Ababa on February 24, the United Nations said on Saturday. A delayed U.N.-mediated peace deal aimed at ending two decades of conflict in the east of the Democratic Republic of the Congo is due to be signed in the Ethiopian capital Addis Ababa on February 24, the United Nations said on Saturday. African leaders failed to sign the deal last month due to the concerns of some countries over who would command a new regional force that would deploy in eastern Congo and take on armed groups operating in the conflict-torn region. The so-called intervention brigade would be contained within the existing U.N. peacekeeping force in Congo, known as MONUSCO. U.N. Secretary-General Ban Ki-moon sent out invitations on Friday for the February 24 signing ceremony and intended to travel to Ethiopia for the event, his spokesman, Martin Nesirky, said. "All the invited presidents have committed to either be there or delegate power to sign," Nesirky said.

Rwandan Deputy U.N. Ambassador Olivier Nduhungirehe posted on Twitter that the "African Union, the International Conference on the Great Lakes Region, Southern African Development Community Chairs, as well as 10 Heads of States of the region will attend the signing ceremony." Envoys have said that one of the main reasons the deal was not signed in January was that three countries in the 15-member Southern African Development Community regional bloc - South Africa, Tanzania and Mozambique - felt they did not have enough information on the enforcement brigade. The creation of an enforcement brigade within a U.N. peacekeeping mission is new for the United Nations, according to officials in the world body. Peace enforcement missions allow the use of lethal force in serious combat situations, while peacekeeping operations are intended to support and monitor an already existing ceasefire, diplomats and U.N. officials say.

A new Security Council resolution would be needed to approve the intervention unit and is likely to be supported by the 15-member council, envoys have said. U.N. peacekeeping chief Herve Ladsous has made clear that the brigade would fight under the banner of MONUSCO, which means it would be under the same command as regular MONUSCO troops, who conduct patrols and support the Congolese security forces. But diplomats had said South Africa, Tanzania and Mozambique, which are the most likely candidates to supply the several thousand troops of the brigade, believed it should have its own command. The countries take the view that MONUSCO has not performed well under its current command, such as when it allowed M23 rebels to occupy the eastern city of Goma last year for 11 days before they withdrew.

REBELS IN MINERAL-RICH EAST: The M23 rebels began taking large swathes of the mineral-rich east early last year, accusing the government of failing to honor a 2009 peace deal. That peace deal ended a previous rebellion and led to the rebels' integration into the national army. They have since deserted the army. The Congolese army has failed to quell the growing 10-month insurgency by M23, which has dragged Congo's eastern region back toward war and, according to U.N. experts, has received cross-border support from Rwanda and Uganda. Rwanda and Uganda strongly deny the accusations of involvement. Ladsous said that if approved by the U.N. Security Council, the enforcement unit would be equipped with a three-pronged mandate to prevent the expansion of armed groups in eastern Congo as well as to "neutralize" and disarm them. It would have the aid of unmanned surveillance drones to hunt down armed militias difficult to spot in the vast territory of eastern Congo. Ladsous said the drones would provide an element of deterrence because the rebels would know they were being watched. The planned use of drones, is also new for the United Nations, U.N. officials say. Congo's prime minister said that the drones could be deployed as early as June.

February 19, 2013: The UN again claimed that the M23 rebels were assisted by Rwanda and Uganda and because of that another M23 offensive is possible. Rwanda and Uganda deny the accusations.

February 20, 2013: How to keep peace in the Congo where there isn't any peace? The UN has tried to deal with this question since the 1960s. The Congo’s enormous size, lack of infrastructure, ethnic complexity, and shortage of technically trained personnel has repeatedly frustrated international peacekeepers. For that matter, it has frustrated every Congolese government, including the old Belgian colonial government. The endemic destructive corruption exacerbates every other political, economic, social, and geographic challenge. The M23 rebel movement in the eastern province of North Kivu provides a case in point. The leaders of M23 claim they rebelled because the current government, led by President Joseph Kabila, failed to comply with important elements in the agreement. For example, the government failed to provide the civil service and military jobs it promised. Why? Bureaucratic corruption and tribal rivalries (ethnic component) are the most fundamental reasons for the government's failure. The lack of infrastructure and technically competent personnel also play a role. The Congolese Army is a hodge podge, consisting of a few brigades loyal to the Kabila government (these are deployed throughout the Congo, but special attention is given to the capital, Kinshasha), a couple of counter-insurgency battalions (being trained by either the UN, EU training teams, or US AFRICOM), and a poorly organized collection of ill-trained soldiers and former rebel militiamen. Some of the rebel militia units were not demobilized but were incorporated whole-cloth into the Congolese Army. On short notice an entire battalion can defect and become, once again, a rebel militia.

UN Security Council resolution 1925 tasked the current UN force in the Congo, MONUSCO (UN Organization Stabilization Mission in the Democratic Republic of Congo), with concluding military operations in the eastern Congo, with particular emphasis on South and North Kivu provinces and Orientale province. Like the Kivus, Orientale confronts several rebel groups and is also subjected to Lord's Resistance Army attacks on unprotected villages. The LRA threat was one reason the Security Council specified another task: improving the Congolese government's ability to protect Congolese civilians. To accomplish that MONUSCO was also tasked with helping the Congolese government consolidate its control of Congolese territory. Now think about it. This task amounts to nation building in the broadest sense, the consolidation of state authority throughout the territory claimed by the state. MONUSCO still has a very large force in the Congo, 17,700 peacekeeping troops and 1,400 international police officers. However, to consolidate state control over the Congo would require a much larger force, on the order of several hundred thousand soldiers supported by several hundred thousand construction workers. The mission assigned is impossible. This broaches a discussion of what is possible. Several non-governmental organizations have long urged the UN to focus on resolving local issues. The NGOs mean local. Based on their own experience in sub-Saharan Africa the NGOs argue that settling village to village disputes and settling tribal and clan disputes is the best way to keep the peace – in other words, creating small zones of peace. This has been called the “mosaic” approach to peace-making. Kenya and several NGOs used this method in southern Sudan to settle disputes between Nuer and Dinka tribes. The peace theory crowd (yes, this group exists) call it local intervention or local level intervention. The UN has approached the Congo situation at the nation-state level (eg, dealing through whatever government is in Kinshasha) or by focusing on regions in the Congo (eg, the current MONUSCO mission in the Kivus and Orientale). According to the "local peace first" crowd, the UN's focus on holding national elections was a mistake and indicative of its focus on national peacekeeping. (Austin Bay)

Meanwhile, in the south Katanga (now Shaba) province tribal rebels and bandits are becoming more active. The rebels want an independent Kantanga, which possesses enormous mineral riches. The rebels believe, with some justification, that the national government steals most of the taxes levied on the mining companies.

February 24, 2013: Forty-six leading Congolese and international NGOs welcome Peace in DRCongo' Security and Cooperation Framework, but call for further action to make peace a reality. Groups say agreement is not enough and outline concrete steps that need to be taken. Reiterate call for UN, US and EU to appoint Special Envoys and greater regional involvemen.

Goma/Kinshasa/ Rome/ Washington DC - A group of prominent Congolese and international NGOs today called on countries in the Great Lakes region, along with their international partners, to ensure that the Peace, Security and Cooperation Framework Agreement signed in Addis Ababa is given the political backing necessary to bring an end to war in the eastern Congo. In a published policy response and letters to DRC President Kabila, UN Secretary General Ban Ki-moon, African Union Chairperson Dlamini Zuma, US President Barack Obama and the High Representative of the Union for Foreign Affairs and Security Policy, Catherine Ashton, the groups welcomed the Framework Agreement as an opportunity for a new kind of decisive engagement in a conflict that has persisted for two decades and ravaged the lives of millions of Congolese.

However, they also suggest that the Agreement will be hollow without specific additional measures, including the appointment of a high-profile UN Special Envoy with the power to mediate on both a domestic and regional level; the inclusion of Congolese civil society and Kinshasa's main bilateral and multilateral donor partners in the proposed national oversight mechanism; and the tying of donor aid to clear and agreed benchmarks and genuine collaboration between government, donors, and civil society. The groups also called for the creation of a donor fund to support projects aimed at deepening regional economic integration to emphasize the benefits of regional stability; UN-mediated negotiations with armed groups that avoid the impunity characteristic of past deals; and substantial donor engagement to promote demobilization of rebel soldiers and regional economic integration. "We need a new approach, a peace process based on the principles of justice", says Raphael Wakenge, Coordinator of the Congolese Initiative for Justice and Peace (ICJP). "Past peace deals have often closed their eyes toward impunity, allowing war criminals to be integrated into the army, police and security services. This has undermined the legitimacy of the peace process and the reputation of the security services, including the judiciary."

The Framework Agreement is based on two main points: bringing an end to foreign backing of Congolese rebellion movements, and fostering the comprehensive reform of state institutions such as the national army, police and judicial sectors. The groups today called on the facilitators and the eleven state signatories of the Framework to make sure that there are clear benchmarks in order to carry out these goals. They further suggested that donors should tie their aid to progress in the peace process. "The Framework Agreement is a strong promise to the Congolese people, but past peace processes have stumbled due to a lack of transparency, weak international engagement and the absence of a comprehensive process", says Federico Borello, Great Lakes Director for Humanity United. "This time, it is imperative to tackle once and for all the Congo's root problems of impunity, regional interference, and state weakness. Without them, our best chance for peace will fail." In addition, the groups also called on the international community, to show steadfast commitment that goes beyond the technocratic approach of recent years. In addition to calling for a UN Special Envoy, the groups called on the United States and the European Union to name special envoys to support the process, and on the African Union, the International Conference on the Great Lakes (ICGLR) and the Southern Africa Development Community (SADC) to continue providing support to the process. They also called for a donor conference to commit the resources necessary to promote cross-border economic collaboration and deep-rooted reform of Congolese institutions. "There has not been a solid peace process in the Congo since 2006, despite the escalation of violence since then", says Jason Stearns, Usalama Project director for the Rift Valley Institute. "The Framework Agreement provides hope, but it will require substantial political and financial capital to overcome entrenched interests."

Groups releasing the policy paper today included: The Jesuit Refugee Service Great Lakes, Action Aid, Action des Chrétiens pour l'Abolition de la Torture (ACAT), Action Humanitaire et de Développement Intégral (AHDI), Action pour la Paix et la Concorde (APC), Association pour le Développement des Initiatives Paysannes (ASSODIP asbl), Christian Aid, COJESKI Nyiragongo, Collectif des Organisations des Droits Humains et de la Démocratie au Congo (CDHD), Comité des Observateurs des Droits de l'Homme (CODHO), CordAid, Danish Refugee Council, Dynamique

Synergie des Femmes, Enough Project, Eurac, Forum de la Femme Ménagère (FORFEM), Groupe Justice et Libération , Humanity United, IFDP, International Refugee Rights Initiative, ISS, Justice Plus, Ligue des Electeurs (L.E), Ligue pour la Cohabitation Pacifique et de Prévention des Conflits (LCPC), MDF, Norwegian Refugee Council, Peace and Human Rights Centre (PHRC), Réseau pour la Réforme du Secteur de Sécurité et de Justice (RRSSJ), Youth Program for the Development of Africa (YPDA)

March 7, 2013: Democratic Republic of Congo - Education prevents violence and discrimination against women' Goma – For women from eastern Congo, leaving the village or camp for internally displaced persons (IDPs) to go harvest the fields or look for firewood frequently puts them at risk of sexual violence, including rape, by rebel groups, soldiers or unscrupulous civilians, as well as discrimination and social marginalisation daily. In the first six months of 2012, nearly 2,500 women and girls registered as rape victims in one hospital run by HEAL Africa in Goma. The NGO estimates that as many as two thirds of women and girls in North Kivu province have experienced sexual violence. On the African continent, women consist of half of the population, but represent 80 percent of the informal economy and produce more than 70 percent of the continent's food. According to the Special Representative of the Secretary-General on Sexual Violence in Conflict, Zainab Hawa Bangura, protecting these women from violence and fostering opportunities for self-sufficiency is crucial for the security of the continent at large. For the Jesuit Refugee Service, education is a fundamental instrument for protecting women from sexual violence and helping them to gain respect and consideration in their communities. Teaching women and girls to read and write, and to learn a trade with which they can earning a living, means offering them a protected environment in which to feel safe, share their problems, socialise together and acquire a new understanding of their role in society. "The best immediate solution is to offer women opportunities which allow them to take up activities in and around their villages and IDP camps. We need to offer women opportunities from which they can then earn a living to feed their children and send them to school", explained Angélique Chayeka, JRS Masisi Informal Education Project Director.

A better future: In 2012, JRS involved more than 600 women and girls in their informal education activities in Masisi and Mweso, areas of North Kivu province characterised by a significant presence of armed groups and on-going forced displacement of the population. These activities include vocational training such as bag and clothing production, hairstyling, and literacy courses. In addition, in JRS training centres, women participate in awareness raising exercises on sexual violence and, when necessary, receive support from JRS staff. "We believe we're helping women to build a better future and gain respect and consideration of their community, including of the men. Women who know how to read, write and take care of their own families become examples for others. Education can help women deal with issues of sexual violence", added Chayeka. Mariette Kahindo is a 45-year-old displaced woman who participated in JRS courses in Masisi. She fled her village in 2001 due to conflict, and is a widow and mother of four children. Mariette specialised in producing bags that in Masisi are used, above all, by students for their pens and notebooks. She also learned how to read and write. "I'm really concentrated on the work I do and this allows me to take care of my family on my own, without having to beg for help from others wandering around from one place to the next. With the money I earn I have rented a house, and am able to pay my children's school fees. Since I began working, my relationships with the community have improved", said Mariette.

Finding self-confidence: According to JRS staff in North Kivu, education gives hope back to women and girls who take courses, many of whom live in marginalised conditions in IDP camps. Moreover, after spending time together in class, girl students learn to open up to each other and understand each other's problems, creating a sense of reciprocal solidarity and strength to face daily challenges. "Here I feel safe. Attending the bag production and literacy courses from 8am to 1pm I know I'm in a safe place. I learn a trade and this occupies my thoughts. With the other women and JRS staff, we speak about how to get on and overcome everyday problems in life", said Gentille Miramuhoro, 26-year-old mother of two. For Francisca Sendegeya, Informal Education Project Director for JRS in Mweso, education encourages women to take their lives into their own hands. "In this part of Congo, women face marginalisation and discrimination. But when they come into our centres we see that they gain a new sense of self-confidence. They feel involved in what they are learning and in the work they carry out. This gives a different meaning to their lives. For instance, they say they are ready to speak out against sexual violence and help their friends who may be victims".

February 19, 2013: The UN once again claimed that the M23 militia is receiving support from external sources. A recent UN investigatory report said that Uganda and Rwanda both provided M23 with material support.

February 20, 2013: The UN is continuing to investigate the source of a false report that claimed that the Rwandan FDLR Hutu extremist militia group had a battalion which was operating with the Congolese Army and MONU.S.CO peacekeepers. The claim was made in January and a fake email, attributed to a MONU.S.CO officer, appeared on the internet. MONU.S.CO denounced the email as a fraud and called it misinformation. Leaders of the FDLR were involved in the 1994 Rwandan genocide.

February 24, 2013: Representatives of 11 Central African countries announced that they have reached an agreement to support the UN's Peace Security and Cooperation Framework. The framework provides security and economic mechanisms for building peace in the region. The countries include South Sudan, Angola, Rwanda, Uganda, Mozambique, Tanzania, South Africa, Central African Republic, Zambia, Congo and the Congo Republic (Brazzaville). The framework agreement is designed to help countries combat rebel organizations like the Congo's M23 group.

February 25, 2013: Two rival factions of M23 reportedly fired on one another. The clash occurred in the town of Rutshuru (North Kivu province, Ugandan border). Eight people died in the incident. M23 has split into two main groups, one loyal to political leader Jean-Marie Runiga and the other to M23's senior military commander, Sultani Makenga. M23 denied the incident occurred and said the firefight was with an FDLR militia group.

March 1, 2013: The UN estimated that in 2005 over 45,000 women were raped in the Congo's South Kivu province.

March 2, 2013: The UN reported that Congolese Army units are now returning to the towns of Rutshuru and Kiwanha. M23 rebels have pulled out of the area following confirmation that the organization has indeed split into two factions. Apparently the faction controlled by M23 military commander Sultani Makenga has won the power struggle. The losing faction, led by Bosco Ntaganda (who organized M23) and political leader Jean-Marie Runiga has scattered. Ntaganda is reportedly hiding in the Congo's Virunga National Park.

March 3, 2013: Relief agencies in Katanga Province report that separatist militia groups usually based in northern Katanga are now regularly seen in southern Katanga.

March 8, 2013: The Congolese Army reported that it has been fighting for over a week with a rebel militia in the Kitchanga area (North Kivu province). The rebel group is named the Alliance of Patriots for a Free and Sovereign Congo. The UN has provided attack helicopter support to the Congolese Army. The fighting has killed at least 80 people.

March 11, 2013: The Congolese government has formally agreed to support the UN's Peace Security and Cooperation Framework. A spokesman for M23 said that the rebel group would not support the agreement because it was not included in the negotiation process.

March 18, 2013: Bosco Ntaganda, the rebel Congolese general who formed the M23 rebel movement, has surrendered. Ntaganda went to the U.S. Embassy in Rwanda (in Kigali) and said he was turning himself in to the International Criminal Court.

March 18, 2013: General Bosco Ntaganda (born c. 1973), is also known as "the Terminator" the military chief of staff of the National Congress for the Defense of the People (CNDP), an armed militia group operating in the North Kivu province of the Democratic Republic of the Congo (DRC) voluntarily handed himself into the U.S. Embassy in Rwanda asking to be transferred to the International Criminal Court (ICC) in the Hague, Netherlands. His surname is sometimes given as Tanganda or Ntanganda, he is a former member of the Rwandan Patriotic Army and allegedly a former Deputy Chief of the General Staff of the Patriotic Forces for the Liberation of Congo (FPLC). As of early March 2013, he is wanted by the International Criminal Court (ICC) for the war crimes of enlisting and conscripting children under the age of fifteen and using them to participate actively in hostilities. Until March 2013 he had been leading an armed mutiny in North Kivu as the head of the rebel group M23 Movement.

March 22, 2013: Bosco Ntaganda was taken into custody by the International Criminal Court. He is known for indicted by the ICC for war crimes.

March 23, 2013: 300 Kata Katanga militiamen have attacked Lubumbashi, the capital of Katanga province. Fighting is reported inside the city and near the UN compound.

March 25, 2013: The Congolese government reported that the March 22 attack on Lubumbashi had been defeated. The attack did not hinder mining operations in Katanga. Officials did concede that the attack was embarrassing.

March 27, 2013: More information is appearing regarding Bosco Ntaganda's surrender. U.S. intelligence officers helped arrange Ntaganda's surrender at the U.S. Embassy in Kigali, Rwanda. Some 700 fighters in Ntaganda's M23 faction have also surrendered. However, the Congo's war with M23 is not over. Sultani Makenga's faction, however, remains in the field. Makenga's faction (which is now the only existing M23 group active) is occupying a position just outside the capital of North Kivu province, Goma. However, Uganda has reportedly organized negotiations between Makenga and the Congolese government.

March 28, 2013: The UN Security Council approved the creation of an intervention brigade for deployment in Congo's eastern provinces. The unit will be allowed to conduct independent offensive operations or offensive operations with the Congolese Army. The goal of these offensive operations is to neutralize and disarm militant groups. This is the first UN peacekeeping force to have such a specifically offensive mission and the Security Council said that its creation will not be regarded as a precedent. The unit will serve for one year.

March 31, 2013: Sultani Makenga, the surviving leader of M23, may be cutting a deal with the Congolese government. Uganda is facilitating peace talks between Makenga’s faction and the Kabila government. According to Ugandan sources, the Congo will allow 1,500 M23 fighters to join its security forces. However, M23 officers must be vetted and will only be allowed to join on an individual basis depending on their human rights. Makenga will not be allowed to join.

April 3, 2013: DR Congo: targeting secondary school education for displaced children'

Bujumbura – "Going back to school, to study and be with my friends help me feel normal again. It helps me forget the war and the sorrow of no longer being at home in my village", said 17-year Samuel Shukuru, one of the thousands of displaced children who found refuge in camps around Goma, a strategic city in eastern Congo, following the armed advance, in November 2012, of rebels of the March 23 Movement (M23).For the last few weeks Samuel has frequented Nyabyunyu institute, one of the six secondary schools supported as part of the emergency education project of the Jesuit Refugee Service on the edge of Goma. "Following the arrival of M23 rebels into Goma in November, the schools and churches were the first places where displaced person found refuge. Classrooms were completely destroyed as people used the desks and doors as firewood for heating and cooking. The military and rebels also occupied the school buildings. Consequentially, both displaced and local children were denied the right to education for months", explained JRS Great Lakes Programme Officer, Mariana Morales Arce.

Integration, displaced pupils in class: As part of the new project, JRS has already renovated three schools and provided support to a total of six institutes, including the provision of scholastic materials and teacher training. "By allowing displaced children to return to school and encouraging their integration with their local peers, we hope to help bring a sense of normality back to their lives. This is why in exchange for JRS support, we ask headmasters to commit themselves to meet us halfway by covering the tuition fees of displaced children whose parents has lost their sources of income", said Ms Morales Arce. There are more than one thousand pupils living in the immediate proximity of five of the six JRS-supported schools. Approximately half of these pupils were displaced from their home villages as a result of the conflict and are currently living in nearby camps. "Normally the displaced children stay in the camps all day as their families do not have the means to send them to school. Now we have begun cooperating with JRS, raising awareness about the issue to convince families to send their children to school. Given the circumstances of the families, we won't ask them to pay tuition fees and our teachers will work to promote harmonious relations between all students", said a representative of the teachers in Nyabyunyu Institute, Célestin Munanira.

The choice of secondary education. The decision to provide secondary school education is derived from the fact that humanitarian intervention during emergencies like the one in Congo is limited to the provision of primary education. This is also the case in Masisi and Mweso, remote areas in North Kivu province where JRS has decided to build, renovate and provide support for secondary education to keep the hope of a better future alive among adolescents. "When they told me I could enroll in school again, I went there in a hurry. Before, I stayed in the camp all day. With nothing to do, I was bored. Now I want to study and start living again", said Samuel.

April 5, 2013: The U.S. government has offered a reward of $5 million for information leading to the arrest of Sylvestre Mudacumura, commander of the Democratic Forces for the Liberation of Rwanda (FDLR). The International Criminal Court (ICC) has charged Mudacumura with crimes against humanity and war crimes. He allegedly played a major role in carrying out the 1994 Rwandan genocide.

April 13, 2013: The UN announced that the intervention brigade which will fight armed groups in the eastern Congo will deploy 3,069 soldiers. The UN Security Council approved the unit on March 28 and gave it the mandate of conducting targeted offensive operations – which is diplo-speak for offensive combat. Malawi, Tanzania and South Africa will each provide battalions with 850 soldiers (2,550 soldiers). The remaining authorized 519 troops will serve in three separate companies: an artillery battery, a special forces company and a recon company. A Tanzanian general will command the unit.

April 16, 2013: The UN reported that the men who have been accused of raping 126 women in the village of Minova (North Kivu province) in November 2012 were serving in a Congolese Army battalion trained by the U.S.. The battalion was a light infantry battalion of 750 soldiers who received training by U.S. AFRICOM as part of a Congolese Army reform program. According to UN investigators, 33 soldiers participated in the rapes.

April 18, 2013: The Congolese government and the provincial government of Katanga remain at loggerheads over a government ban on exporting copper and cobalt concentrates. Katanga is Congo's only copper and cobalt exporter. The Congolese government contends the ban will force mining companies to process ores in Congo. This will increase the value of Congolese copper and cobalt exports. Several international mining companies have objected to the ban. However, the most important resistance is coming from Katanga where governor Moise Katumbi said he will not enforce the national ban. Katanga does not have sufficient electricity and processing capacity to process all of its ore into concentrate. At the moment companies have three months to sell unprocessed ore.

April 19, 2013: A spokesman for the Kata Katanga militia announced that the group is guerrilla movement fighting for Katangan autonomy. According to militia leaders, the people of Katanga province do not benefit from their own mineral wealth. The spokesman accused the national government of stealing Katangan mining royalty money.

After the March 23 attack the Kabila government and the Katanga provincial government both assured international mining companies that Katanga was safe. However, the attack into the heart of Lubumbashi has, for good reason, produced many doubters. The Kata Katanga are now claiming they are fighting for Katangan autonomy (April 19). The latest rumor is that many Katangans believe Joseph Kabila will not be president after the 2016 elections. That means they have concluded that a Katangan will not be in charge in Kinshasha. Katangan secession might be an old idea whose new time has almost come. (Austin Bay)

There is little overt public support for secession, at least in southern Katanga. There are, however, two committed secessionist organizations, Co-ordination for a Referendum on Self-Determination for Katanga (CORAK) and the Katangese People's Congress (CPK). The CPK has been active for decades. In 1992 it sought official recognition from the Organization of African Unity (OAU, the African Union's predecessor) as a Katangan liberation movement. The OAU denied recognition and said the CPK could not show that the Katangan people were suffering mass human rights violations by the government (then led by Mobutu).

On March 23, 2013 300 to 350 Kata Katanga fighters attacked Lubumbashi. They tried to seize the provincial government and parliament buildings but failed. They did manage to enter and take effective control of the UN compound in the city. The Congolese Army, reinforced by members of the elite Republican Guard (special presidential guards who were protecting the airport), counter-attacked. 35 people died and another 60 were wounded in the battles within the city. The militiamen were not well armed. The entire force may have had only three dozen AK-47s and a few rocket launchers. Most of the fighters carried knives, spears or bows and arrows. A total of 245 militiamen in the UN compound surrendered to the UN. MONU.S.CO later transferred the 245 fighters to Congolese government control.

In January 2013 the governor of Katanga asked MONU.S.CO (UN Stabilization Mission in Congo) to send peacekeeping troops to assist the Congolese Army in protecting the Zambian border region, The concern was that Mutanga would try to replicate what M23 had done in North Kivu province – carve out a piece of border territory and hold it. In February, authorities reported a militia killed 14 civilians near Manono.

In 2011, reports of rogue militia activity in northern Katanga (especially along Katanga's Zambian border) became more frequent. The Gedeon militia figured prominently in the reports. The Kata Katanga showed up and were reportedly allies of Mutanga. In fact, there were reports that the Gedeon militia and Kata Katanga were now one in the same. Lubumbashi's international airport suffered sporadic attacks attributed to separatist rebels.

On September 7, 2010 an armed group attacked Lubumbashi's main prison. Over 900 inmates escaped, including the leader of what was arguably the most dangerous of the north Katangan Mai Mai militias, Kyungu Mutanga. Mutanga, better known by his nom de guerre, Gedeon, was imprisoned for war crimes (committed in Katanga) in 2006 and sentenced to death in 2009. The Gedeon militia was based in what was called Katanga's Terror Triangle, 10,000 square kilometers of jungle within the triangle formed by three cities, Mitwaba, Pweto and Manono (the hometown of President Joseph Kabila.) Mutanga's criminal force would attack, pillage and burn unprotected villages anywhere inside or within marching distance of the triangle.

In May 2010, a militia group calling itself the Kata Katanga raised its flag in one of Lubumbashi's main squares. In KiSwahili, Kata Katanga means "carve out Katanga" (as in separate it from Congo).

The war and the continuing chaos damaged several Katangan mining operations. Mining output began to pick up in 2006 and 2007. It accelerated in 2010 and 2011. China has invested heavily in Katanga. One source claimed that Chinese companies own 60 of Katanga's 75 processing plants and that China buys approximately 90 percent of Katanga's mineral exports.

In KiSwahili, mai (mayi) means water. Supposedly, Mai Mai fighters could spray themselves with a magic potion to deflect bullets. The Mai Mai militias operating in the eastern Congo have proved to be a decidedly mixed bag. The term was supposed to indicate an autonomous militia organized to oppose imperialist or foreign (ie, non-Congolese) force invading Congolese territory. In fact, Laurent Kabila formed and supplied several Mai Mai militias in northern Katanga for the express purpose of opposing invading Rwandan forces. Well, magic water does not work as well as a bulletproof vest. The Mai Mai militia concept has not worked out well, either. As time passed, in the eastern Congo “Mai Mai militia” has come to mean an armed group which portrays itself (depending on the situation) as either a rebel guerrilla movement or a local para-military defense force but in reality operates as a paramilitary gang loyal to its own commander. In turn, eastern Congo Mai Mai militia commanders (gang leaders) are expected to provide loyal militiamen with access to money, women and banana beer.

During the war and in its aftermath, Mai-Mai militias savaged parts of northern Katanga. Katanga has a north-south split. The mining areas in southern Katanga are rich and comparatively well-developed. Northern Katanga, however, is very poor and undeveloped. Its forests and jungles have few roads – so the area is ideal territory for a militia to carve out its own private duchy.

During The Great Congo War (1998-2003), pro-Kabila forces managed to keep Katanga's key cities and mining areas under their control. Control is a loose term. Zimbabwe, which sent forces to help Kabila defend the area, was allegedly paid off with train-loads of Katangan copper and cobalt ore.

The Congo War of 1996-1997 led to the collapse of Mobutu's regime. In late spring 1997, forces loyal to rebel leader Laurent Kabila (a Katangan and father of the current Congolese president, Joseph Kabila) seized Lubumbashi and threatened the Congo's capital, Kinshasha. Lubumbashi is the Congo's second largest city (after Kinshasha) and is the hub of the Congo's lucrative mining business. In some respects (such as clout with the global economy), controlling Lubumbashi is more important than controlling Kinshasha. Thanks to the mines, the city has railroad links to both the Atlantic and Indian Oceans.

Dictator Mobutu Sese Seko ran the Congolese government from 1965 to 1997. In 1972 Mobutu had Katanga renamed Shaba. The 1977 and 1978 invasions are usually referred to as the Shaba invasions. After Mobutu's death in 1997, the province became Katanga again. The 1978 invasion (Shaba 2) was particularly violent. FNLC guerrillas plundered the mining complex at Kolwezi and committed atrocities against civilians (Congolese and foreign) who worked in the mines. Defeating both invasions required international military intervention. The 1978 international intervention included a spectacular combat parachute drop by a French Foreign Legion airborne infantry unit.

When the Congo became independent in 1960, Katanga secessionists, led by Moise Tshombe, tried to carve out their own separate country. Elisabethville (now Lubumbashi) was the center of the Katangan resistance. The Congolese government (led by Patrice Lumumba) regarded Tshombe as a Belgian proxy and claimed that Belgium wanted an independent Katanga so it could continue to control the province's mineral deposits. The commercial deposits include cobalt, copper, zinc, cadmium, uranium, germanium, and manganese. America's World War II atomic bombs used Congolese uranium. Katanga also has coal mines. The Katangan secessionist struggle and general chaos spreading throughout Congo sparked a UN intervention (ONUC, UN Operation in Congo). UN forces eventually clashed with the defense force Tshombe created with the help of Belgian advisers and the Katangan Gendarmerie. Tshombe's Katanga government conceded defeat in January 1963. However, the hard-core Katangan separatists did not disappear. In 1977 and again in 1978, a group called the National Front for the Liberation of the Congo (FNLC) invaded Katanga from bases in Angola. Organized by a former Katangan Gendarmerie officer in 1967, the FNLC styled itself as an anti-Mobutu political and military force. Many FNLC fighters were former Katangan gendarmes.

April 23, 2013: Trouble continues to plague the eastern Congo, but at the moment rising tensions in the Congo's southern regions has the attention of the UN and several foreign governments. Troubles in mineral-rich Katanga province are anything but new. Reviewing the history will help put the present trouble in context.

April 24, 2013: Civilians living north of Goma have refused to comply with demands by M23 rebels that they participate in a protest demonstration against the UN decision to deploy an intervention brigade for offensive operations in the eastern Congo. A demonstration had been planned for April 15th in the town of Kibumba (north of Goma). According to local residents, M23 leaders had to call off the protest since they refused to participate.

April 25, 2013: The U.S. State Department warned American citizens traveling in the eastern Congo that armed militias, armed bandits, and rogue units in the Congolese Army are serious security threats.

April 30. 2013: M23 rebels declared that they are ready to fight the new UN Intervention Brigade when it deploys in the eastern Congo. M23 officers had previously threatened Tanzanian and South African leaders that they and their men will fight the brigade. Tanzania and South Africa are both providing troops.

May 1, 2013: A senior UN diplomat acknowledged that deploying the new Intervention Brigade to conduct UN-ordered offensive operations against rebel militias could hinder future UN humanitarian operations in Congo and central Africa. The official said that she hoped the brigade's deployment would serve as a deterrent and that military operations would be limited.

May 2, 2013: M23 rebel fighters declared that they will not begin a new round of peace negotiations unless the government agrees to a ceasefire. M23 recently claimed that the Congolese Army is working with Rwandan Hutu rebels in the Democratic Forces for the Liberation of Rwanda (FDLR) militia. Now M23 reports that an FDLR unit is advancing toward an important M23 position, and it appears that the FDLR move is coordinated with Congolese Army movements.

UN Special Envoy for the Great Lakes Region (central Africa) Mary Robinson acknowledged that the UN's Intervention Brigade could cause problems for future UN humanitarian aid operations in Africa. The brigade has a mandate to conduct "targeted offensive operations" which is diplo-speak for offensive combat operations. The brigade is the first UN peacekeeping operation to be given an explicit offensive mandate. Critics of the Intervention Brigade concept have warned that it is a mistake for the UN to field an offensive force. The critics argue that it sets a terrible precedent. In a future humanitarian crisis, armed groups may forcibly oppose basic humanitarian aid operations like refugee relief in a combat zone because they believe the humanitarian operation will inevitably lead to the deployment of a combat brigade which will attack them. Some Intervention Brigade supporters are concerned that the nations supplying the troops for the brigade could suffer attacks on their citizens who are living or working in the Congo or nearby countries.

May 7, 2013: A rogue militia ambushed a UN convoy on the road between the towns of Walungu and Bukavu (South Kivu province). One Pakistani soldier serving with the MONUSCO peacekeeping force was killed in the attack.

May 8, 2013: The UN condemned the rogue militia attack on a UN Organization and Stabilization Mission (MONUSCO) convoy in South Kivu province which killed a Pakistani peacekeeper. The UN called the attack a war crime. A preliminary report claimed that the militia was trying to take hostages.

May 11, 2013: A hundred Tanzanian troops committed to the UN's new intervention brigade have deployed in the eastern Congo. The troops are the lead element in a 1,280 soldier Tanzanian contingent that will serve with the brigade. The core of the Tanzanian contingent will be an 850 man infantry battalion. The brigade will eventually deploy 3,069 international troops. Malawi and South Africa are also providing contingents.

May 14, 2013: The government acknowledged that former M23 rebel fighters have been allowed to join the Congolese Army through the army's reintegration program. North Kivu provincial officials claim that over 500 former rebels (from various militias) have joined Congolese Army units since late 2012. The officials have complained to the national government that the reintegration program creates security risks for Congolese civilians. The North Kivu officials are particularly worried about M23 rebel fighters who have rejoined the Congolese Army. The most prominent former M23 fighter to be reintegrated is Colonel Nzala Ngomo, who at the time was commanding a Congolese Army battalion and defected to M23 in November 2012. As of May 1, he is now fully reinstated as an officer in the Congolese Army. The North Kivu officials see the unrestricted reintegration of M23 fighters as rebel infiltration.

May 14, 2013: CONGO-K Outcry over new mining legislation'

Mining companies are engaged in an angry tug-of-war with Kinshasa as the government puts the final touches to revisions in a mining code that came into force just 10 years ago. The government deems that the industry doesn't contribute enough to Congo-K's budget and thus wants to impose higher taxes.

May 15, 2013: Armed Mai-Mai militiamen attacked a Congolese Army camp and recruitment center outside the town of Beni (North Kivu province). The attack kicked off a two-hour long firefight between the gunmen and Congolese Army soldiers. 23 gunmen were killed, three soldiers and five army recruits.

May 16, 2013: South Africa reaffirmed its commitment to support the UN's intervention brigade in Congo. However, South African defense officials said that many senior South African military officers believe the South African military is currently over-committed. South Africa is involved in several peacekeeping efforts in Africa. The new intervention brigade mission will require shifting scarce resources from other missions. South Africa's participation in the intervention brigade is regarded as critical by the UN.

May 20, 2013: M23 rebels attacked a Congolese Army (FARDC) position ten kilometers north of Goma (capital of North Kivu province). This was the first armed battle between M23 fighters and the Congolese Army since late 2012. M23 acknowledged that a firefight occurred in the area but said that its fighters were attacked by Democratic Forces for the Liberation of Rwanda (FDLR) militiamen. After the M23 fighters drove off the FDLR attack, Congolese Army artillery began shelling their position and M23 accused the government of over-reacting.

Terror attacks on nations manning the brigade may seem far-fetched but they cannot be completely discounted. The model here is Uganda, which has troops serving in the UN and African Union's AMISOM Somali peacekeeping operation. Uganda has suffered several terror attacks which have been tied to Somali Islamist extremists who oppose AMISOM. Intervention Brigade advocates portray the brigade as the military field force component of the UN's new Framework security and development agreement. The Framework is UN shorthand for the Peace, Security, and Cooperation Framework for Eastern Democratic Republic Of the Congo and the Region (i.e. central African and Great Lakes region). Brigade advocates point out that there are at least 25 active, armed rebel militias in the eastern Congo. The militias seed violent chaos, making it all but impossible to conduct humanitarian relief operations, much less establish and run the long-term economic, training, and political stability operations the region needs. Brigade advocates contend the offensive mandate is an attempt to set conditions for sustainable economic and political development. (Austin Bay)

May 20, 2013: At least 19 soldiers and rebel fighters were killed when M23 rebels fought with a pro-government militia group north of Goma. The government said it lost four Congolese Army soldiers and that the rebels lost 15 killed. Observers described the fighting as the heaviest in the area since November 2012.

The World Bank has promised Central Africa $1 billion in aid. Congo will get money for medical services, education, and electrical generation projects.

May 22, 2013: UN observers reported more skirmishing around Goma (North Kivu). Two days of shellfire (probably mortar fire) has wounded 15 civilians in Goma. At least one child was killed by shellfire. The fire came from M23 rebel positions.

May 23, 2013: The UN Secretary visited Goma and delivered a speech. He declared that improving security and development must go forward simultaneously in Congo. Before his arrival M23 said that it would observe a ceasefire. The rebels demanded that the government sign a ceasefire agreement.

The UN announced that the deployment of the Intervention Brigade will be delayed. The UN and contributing nations are experiencing severe logistical difficulties. Diplomats are also saying that South Africa has told them that its military will need more time to fully deploy its troop contingent, in part because South Africa is already extensively involved in other peacekeeping operations.

South Africa does have a lead contingent on the ground in Goma. Tanzania has a contingent in Goma as well, which is where the brigade headquarters will be. Malawi has committed troops to serve in the brigade. Since 13 South African peacekeepers were killed in the Central African Republic (CAR) earlier this year, a number of South Africans have questioned the Intervention Brigade deployment. The critics argue that South Africa is already doing more than its share of sub-Saharan peacekeeping.

The UN reported that a MONUSCO peacekeeping unit from the Indian Army is deployed on the north side of Goma. The unit is supported by armored vehicles.

May 28, 2013: A civilian group in north Kivu province has accused the Rwandan government of sending four battalions of soldiers into the Congo. The Rwandans allegedly fought a battle near the town of Mutaho (north of Goma, near the airport). Rwanda denied the accusation. Four battalions is a large body of troops and it is very unlikely that a large group of Rwandan soldiers entered the Congo. M23 rebels and Congolese forces have been skirmishing in the area.

May 29, 2013: M23 rebels said they are willing to agree to an extended ceasefire. Over the last ten days M23 and the Congolese Army have engaged in several firefights north of the city of Goma (capital of North Kivu province). An M23 spokesman said that the rebels are positioned near Goma's airport and they can target the airport very easily because they have fighters on a hill overlooking the airport. M23 also accused allies of the government (likely a pro-government militia) of attacking its fighters while they were securing fresh water supplies. M23 takes its name from the March 23, 2009 peace agreement, which was supposed to end the chaotic fighting in North Kivu province. The M23 rebels contend the government broke its side of the agreement. One major M23 criticism is that the rebels did not receive their fair share of positions in the Congolese Army.

June 1, 2013: The South African government said that it supports deployment of the UN's Intervention Brigade in the eastern Congo but it hopes that Congo and the M23 rebel group will restart peace negotiations. However, South African media is giving a lot of attention to the Intervention Brigade's peace enforcement mandate – that is UN peacekeeping jargon for an offensive mission. Senior members of the ruling African National Congress (ANC) political party have also raised the issue of foreign support for some of the rebel militias the brigade will likely confront. A spokesman did not specifically mention Rwanda but Rwanda has been accused of providing M23 with money, weapons, and training. Rwanda denies the accusation.

June 3, 2013: The Tanzanian brigadier general who has been designated as commander of the Intervention Brigade, BG James Aloizi Mwakibolwa, said that the brigade will operate as part of the UN Monitoring and Stabilization Mission in Congo (MONUSCO). Some UN sources now refer to the brigade as MONUSCO's Force Intervention Brigade. The brigade will be based in North Kivu province and have 3,069 soldiers. Mwakibolwa sees four essential tasks for the unit: neutralizing armed groups, reducing the threat posed to Congolese government authority, providing security for Congolese civilians, and creating space for stabilization activities (UN jargon for establishing secured areas). The brigade will carry out targeted offensive operations in order to neutralize the armed groups. The Congolese Army may or may not participate in the offensive operations conducted by the Intervention Brigade.

June 5, 2013: The UN believes that nations involved in the Framework initiative for stabilizing central Africa must be prepared to fight the Democratic Forces for the Liberation of Rwanda (FDLR) rebel group. The FDLR was founded by Rwandan Interahamwe Hutu extremists who organized and participated in the 1994 Rwandan genocide. The Tutsi-led Rwandan Patriotic Front invaded Rwanda from Uganda, stopped the genocide, and defeated the Interahamwe. Surviving Interahamwe fled into the eastern Congo. The Interahamwe were radical members of the Hutu tribe-dominated National Republican Movement for Democracy and Development (MRND) which ruled Rwanda from 1975 to 1994. Rwanda has claimed that the FDLR receives support from sources in the Congo. The Rwandan government will not negotiate with the FDLR and that's why the Intervention Brigade may include the FDLR on its list of targeted militias and rebel groups.

June 6, 2013: UN officials in Congo stated that Secretary General Ban Ki Moon's visit to the country and his stop in Goma has had a positive diplomatic outcome. The M23 rebel movement is indicating that it will resume peace negotiations in Uganda after having been suspended since early May.

June 9, 2013: M23 said that it had sent a representative to Uganda's capital, Kampala, to participate in a new round of peace talks with the Congolese government.

June 10, 2013: Logistic problems continue to delay the deployment of the UN's Intervention Brigade. This comes as no surprise. Central Africa in general lacks transportation infrastructure. There are few paved roads. The intercontinental airports in the national capitals are adequate but airfields in the hinterland are a very mixed lot. Many airfields in eastern Congo are dirt fields that can only handle small planes (think Cessna) and helicopters. The UN currently uses Goma's airport (North Kivu province) as a logistical "airhead" (airfield as a logistics terminal) but it is inadequate. Everyone knows it needs improvements. The airport and the city lack sufficient facilities for storing supplies. Experienced military commanders and planners know a combat operation should never rely on one key supply source, and the UN Intervention Brigade has an offensive combat mission. The Goma airport is vulnerable to rebel attack. During the last week of May, M23 rebels repeatedly hit the airport with mortar fire. M23 suspended the attacks so UN Secretary General Ban Ki Moon could fly in to Goma for a speech. Media reported that UN personnel said the Secretary General's very large travelling entourage encountered numerous transportation and logistic problems in eastern Congo. A second UN-sponsored group was also in the region. According to one official, supporting the two groups proved to be a logistical nightmare. Supporting the Intervention Brigade is far more complicated and there are problems here that may not be solved. This would limit the mobility and effectiveness of the Intervention Brigade. (Austin Bay)

June 14, 2013: M23 representatives in Kampala, Uganda accused the Congolese government of reneging on a promise to re-start peace negotiations. On June 9 both the Congolese government and M23 agreed to begin a new round of talks.

June 15, 2013: UN sources reported that approximately 25 percent of the personnel pledged to serve in the Intervention Brigade have arrived in the Congo. Logistical problems in Goma (North Kivu province) continue to plague force deployment. The brigade has an authorized end strength of 3,069 soldiers. Malawi, Tanzania, and South Africa are providing the combat troops.

June 16, 2013: M23's senior field commander, general Sultani Makenga, said that his fighters are prepared to defend their land against the UN's Intervention Brigade.

June 20, 2013: The Ugandan government said that both M23 and the Congo government now have negotiating teams in Kampala.

June 21, 2013: M23 continues to run government-like operations. UN officials in Congo were outraged when M23 told reporters that it had arrested several men for illegal weapons possession. M23 says it does not allow crime in its area and it operates its own courts. UN diplomats accused M23 of operating an illegal parallel governmental administration.

June 26, 2013: The UN accused M23 rebels of murdering Congolese civilians. UN security personnel reported that M23 claims it is conducting area search operations (patrols). However, M23 rebels arbitrarily arrest and harass civilians. UN personnel have evidence that M23 fighters executed 26 Congolese farmers between June 16 and 19. The farmers lived in the villages of Busanza and Jomba. M23 immediately denied the accusations and accused the UN of lying.

June 27, 2013: MONUSCO (United Nations Organization Stabilization Mission in the Congo) has begun deploying 100 Egyptian Army special operations troops to Congo's Katanga province. The Egyptian special forces unit will likely conduct operations against the Bakata Katanga separatist militia. MONUSCO said that several peacekeeping battalions (conventional units) have already deployed to Katanga.

June 28, 2013: The government is considering selling tin ore stockpiled in the eastern Congo. Over 400 tons of tin ore mined before the ban on exporting conflict minerals went into effect is stored in Goma (North Kivu province). Reportedly, two Chinese export companies want to buy the tin ore.

June 30, 2013: The UN believes that sympathetic Rwandan officials and military officers continue to provide support for the M23 rebel movement. However, overall support for M23 from Rwanda is much less than it was in late 2012. UN investigators claim they have evidence that M23 still recruits inside Rwanda and certain Rwandan officials turn a blind eye to the operation. UN investigators also reported that there is evidence which supports Rwandan allegations that some Congolese Army units have collaborated with the Democratic Forces for the Liberation for Rwanda (FDLR) rebel group. The FDLR was founded by Hutu extremists who were directly involved in the 1994 genocide.

A Mai Mai militia attacked a jail in the town of Beni (North Kivu province) and released 250 prisoners. One Congolese Army soldier was killed in the attack. Witnesses reported that the attacker used explosives to breach the prison walls and doors. Beni is a major gold producing area in North Kivu.

Sanctions have failed to curtail the trade in Congolese gold. Gold smuggling has “almost” no oversight. This should surprise no one. The Congolese government estimated in 2009 that smugglers export 40 metric tons (worth $1.6 billion) of Congo-produced gold every year. The Ituri district and North Kivu province (M23’s stomping ground) are the Congo’s primary gold-producing areas. Ituri was part of Congo’s Orientale province, and according to some Congolese, it still is a district. Ituri, however, is a special district. Since 2003, an interim administration runs Ituri (which borders Uganda).

July 1, 2013: Congolese civilians reported that M23 has expanded its enclave and taken control of several villages in the Masisi area (near Goma, North Kivu province). This could be the case, but often these occupations are short-lived. M23 often conducts probes to gauge Congolese Army and UN peacekeeping force strength in a particular area.

July 4, 2013: Since late March, when the UN officially created the Intervention Brigade, South African government officials have repeatedly expressed concern with the brigade's explicit offensive mission in the Congo. South Africa participates in many UN peacekeeping operations and indicated that many South African citizens fear that the offensive mandate sets a bad precedent. Future peacekeeping missions could be more difficult and more dangerous because rebels will see the peacekeepers as a foreign invader. Other governments around the world have expressed similar concerns. South Africa is still dealing with the blowback from this year's Central African Republic (CAR) peacekeeping fiasco. In January 2013, South Africa sent 400 soldiers to serve with an emergency peacekeeping force in the CAR. Before their unit was fully deployed, Seleka guerrillas (the main CAR rebel force) attacked the peacekeepers. The peacekeeping mission became a combat mission. South Africa suffered 13 killed in action and 27 wounded. The South African people were understandably shocked at the high number of casualties. Many South Africans thought the UN gave the South African soldiers an impossible mission. UN planning was inadequate and local intelligence was very poor. The South African government is assuring its citizens that there will never be another CAR disaster. The government and officers in the South African National Defense Force (SANDF, South African military) are insisting that the Intervention Brigade be completely ready to fight before the operation begins. The South African contingent consists of an 850-soldier infantry battalion. South Africa has a very professional military which believes in realistic training (fight like you train, train like you fight). The CAR operation was slapped together in haste. That is not the South African style. Recently the South African military reported that personnel assigned to the brigade have been conducting some very specific training exercises. At a training area in South Africa, Intervention Brigade soldiers attacked a simulated rebel-held enclave. The simulated enclave was built to resemble the border enclave occupied by M23 rebels. South African attack helicopters and jet fighter-bombers supported the attack. Why leak the training details? M23 reads press reports. The South African government wants M23 to know that if South African infantry assaults its enclave, South Africa's high-quality infantrymen will have high quality air support and fire support. M23 should consider surrender. That way everyone stays alive. (Austin Bay)

July 14, 2013: The Congolese Army fought with M23 rebels near the town of Mutaho, seven kilometers north of Goma.

July 18, 2013: There was heavy fighting between M23 rebels and the Congolese Army 12 kilometers north of Goma (Kibati area).

July 19, 2013: The African Union (AU) announced that it will deploy a new peacekeeping mission of 3,600 soldiers to the Central African Republic (CAR).

July 23, 2013: The United States demanded that the Rwandan military end its support of M23 rebels. The U.S. said that it was concerned that the Rwandan Army was still supporting the M23 militia in the Congo. The U.S., however, indicated that it did not have evidence that Rwanda had authorized support for M23.

Oil industry analysts reported that a new discovery in Uganda could add 500,000 barrels a day in output. The announcement boosts prospects for building a pipeline from Uganda to the Kenyan seaport of Lamu.

July 31, 2013: Rwanda believes that the use of the UN IBDE to forcibly disarm militias around Goma could undermine peace talks.

August 4, 2013: UN forces in the Congo are now using an Italian-made unarmed surveillance drone.

August 10, 2013: The film KONY 2012 personalized the terror created by the Ugandan rebel group, the Lords Resistance Army (LRA). Despite an international force deployed to fight the LRA in the CAR and Congo, LRA senior commander Joseph Kony is still in the field and LRA fighters still attack civilians in the Congo and the CAR. Despite the failure to capture Kony, many hail the film because it brought global attention to Central African security issues. Moreover, they argue that the anti-Kony effort has had positive effects by forcing the UN to devote more soldiers to protecting civilians in the Congo. That is probably true but at the margins. Chaos in the CAR and parts of Congo (especially eastern Congo) and South Sudan is a bigger threat to lives and property than the LRA. Eliminating Kony won't end political chaos or the threats posed by other armed groups, such as the rogue militias in eastern Congo. (Austin Bay)

August 15, 2013: The Lord's Resistance Army continues to be a major security concern in the Central African Republic (CAR). There the Seleka coalition has formed a new government and is conducting arbitrary arrests and extrajudicial killings. Seleka fighters are also suspected of conducting gang rapes.

August 17, 2013: MONUSCO peacekeepers operating in the Congo province of Katanga have rescued 82 children who had been kidnapped by the Mai-Mai Bakata-Katanga militia. The operations against the militia took place between August 11 and August 15.

August 18, 2013: Seleka rebel leader Michel Djotodia was sworn in as president of the CAR.

Rwanda said the Congolese Army fired a rocket into Rwandan territory.

August 22, 2013: The UN IBDE saw its first military action when IBDE artillery fired on M23 rebels north of Goma. The IBDE is a special UN brigade of 3,000 soldiers, though only 2,000 are currently deployed (Tanzanian and South African infantry battalions plus artillery unit). The brigade will ultimately have three infantry battalions (the third battalion supplied by Malawi). Other UN forces from MONUSCO are also deployed in the area.

August 24, 2013: M23 militiamen fired two mortar rounds into Goma and sent some of their gunmen into the outskirts of Goma. In late July the UN declared Goma to be within a security zone and warned M23 to stay away.

August 26, 2013: The UN IBDE (intervention brigade) is now fighting M23 rebels near the city of Goma (North Kivu province). The IBDE was created to destroy armed rebel groups in the Congo. The IBDE is also supporting Congolese Army operations against M23. Most of the action is near the town of Kibati (ten kilometers north of Goma).

Rwanda claimed that on August 27th a Congolese Army unit near the town of Mutaho (north of Goma) fired mortar shells into Rwanda.

August 28, 2013: A UN peacekeeper from Tanzania was killed and three were wounded in action against the M23 rebel militia near the city of Goma. Tanzanian infantry serve with the UN's Intervention Brigade (IBDE), which is operating outside Goma. The Congolese Army claimed that "several dozen" M23 rebels were killed in combat between Kibati and the town of Kibumba and 12 were captured. This operation began when the Congolese Army, supported by attack helicopters and artillery, attacked the M23 fighters. Rwanda accused the Congolese Army of shelling Rwandan territory and killing a Rwandan civilian. UN observers in the Rwanda-Congo border area (near the city of Goma) claimed that M23 rebels fired mortar shells into Rwanda.

August 29, 2013: Tanzania has asked Uganda to act as a mediator between its government and Rwanda. The Tanzanian government acknowledged that its statement earlier this summer, that all Central African nations should talk with their respective rebel groups, deeply offended Rwanda. Rwanda completely rejects negotiations with the genocidaires in the FDLR. Interhamwe Hutu radicals (who now run the FDLR) orchestrated the 1994 genocide, which left over 800,000 Rwandans dead.

August 29, 2013: Congo-K: mines at the heart of ethnic allegiances'

AFRICA MINING: In this enormous country where central power is weak, ethnic allegiance counts above everything, particularly in the mineral resources sector where the political and economic stakes are high. Whoever controls the copper, cobalt, diamond and cassiterite mines of this vast land controls the manna which will finance the presidential and provincial elections of the future and the military operations needed to repel foreign forces. Since the end of the Second Congo War in 2003, the province of Katanga has succeeded in attracting back foreign investors into copper and cobalt extraction, even though Gécamines, the local producer of the red metal, is taking time to get back up to speed. As a result, the peoples of Katanga are currently dominating the sector through their different community associations – the Sempia for the Bembas in the rich south, the Divar for the Lundas, also in the south, and the Balubakat for the Lubas in the north.

The mining sector has not yet recovered from the sudden death in an aircraft accident on February 12 2012 of Augustin Katumba Mwanke, considered by the late Laurent Désiré Kabila as his son. Katangan like Kabila senior and a Bemba, Katumba had become Kabila's indispensable financial adviser and right hand man. Also known as "AK 47", he helped many civil servants from the Congolese mining administration to promotion and has left behind him a huge vacuum which is proving difficult to fill.

Nothing suggests that the situation will stabilise in the near future. On the contrary, the sources of future turbulence are accumulating. Mines minister Martin Kabwelulu, an outsider who has nevertheless succeeded in establishing his authority in the sector, is in poor physical form to the extent that his detractors consider that he will be unable to complete the difficult reform of the mining code currently in progress. Who will succeed him? Perhaps Simon Tuma-Waku, who has already held the post. As for Moïse Katumbi Chapwe, the subtle but powerful governor of Katanga, who is thought to have presidential ambitions, should, on the other hand, be replaced before the end of next year by a north Katangan.

In this context of uncertainty, Dan Gertler, an Israeli entrepreneur who is Congolese by adoption, has more political and financial power than anyone. Having arrived in Congo-K at the age of 23, this inveterate gambler found his way through the pitfalls of the regime of Laurent Kabila to become the latter's diamond king and has now adapted to that of his son by establishing himself as the major force in the Katangan copper and cobalt sectors. The foreign mining companies, if, like Gertler's partner, Glencore, they are not part of the inner circle, use the services of a local mining expert with a solid contact network. They also call in influential Congolese legal advisers to make their precious assets as secure as possible in the uncertain environment which reigns in the country.

August 30, 2013: The Congolese Army has taken several strategic positions in the Kibati hills overlooking the city of Goma by pushing M23 rebels off the ridges. Meanwhile, Rwandan Army units moved toward the border. The Rwandan government claims that the Congolese Army has repeatedly shelled Rwandan territory.

M23 rebels fought with Congolese Army units near the city of Goma. The Congolese Army forces were backed by elements of the UN Intervention Brigade (IBDE).

August 31, 2013: The UN confirmed that M23 rebels are responsible for shelling Rwandan territory. Rwanda had claimed that the Congolese Army had fired artillery into the Rwandan town of Gisenyi (Rwanda-North Kivu province border).

September 1, 2013: Rwanda again called the radical Hutu militia the Democratic Forces for the Liberation of Rwanda (FDLR) a “state within a state” inside the Congo. The FDLR was founded by Hutus belonging to the Interahamwe movement (which organized and carried out the 1994 Rwanda genocide). The main victims (the Tutsi minority) managed to defeat the Hutu killers, and since then the FDLR has operated out of the eastern Congo. Rwanda contends that that the Congolese Army cooperates with the FDLR and lets the FDLR maintain base camps in the Congo. Rwanda has very legitimate security concerns in the eastern Congo and uses that to justify occasional military intervention in the eastern Congo. The deal Rwanda intends to forge in Central Africa is one that trades the M23 rebel movement for the end of the FDLR. Rwanda denies allegations that it supports M23.

However, M23 is a predominantly Congolese Tutsi. The Rwandan government is dominated by Rwandan Tutsis.

September 5, 2013: Congolese and Rwandan leaders met in Uganda and agreed that the Congo and M23 need to begin a new round of peace negotiations.

September 6, 2013: The UN reported that investigators had found evidence supporting allegations that Seleka rebels in the Central African Republic (CAR) committed widespread atrocities. The worst violations occurred in the northern CAR. The Seleka rebels now control the government. What does it mean to be the government in the CAR? In this case Seleka controls the capital, Bangui, and their leader, Michel Djotodia, has declared himself the CAR president. Outside of Bangui the country is in chaos. The UN is considering funding a new African Union (AU) peacekeeping force in the CAR.

Tanzanian soldiers serving with the UN IBDE in the Congo denied rumors that they had captured four Rwandan commandos.

September 7, 2013: Uganda insists reports that the Allied Democratic Forces rebel group had launched an attack in western Uganda were false. The Ugandan Army investigated the incident and found that on September 6th, eleven Congolese army soldiers were fleeing attacks by rebels inside the Congo and had mistakenly crossed the Congo-Uganda border. This was misreported as a rebel attack.

September 8, 2013: A spokesman for M23 said the group will disband when the Rwandan Hutu Democratic Forces for the Liberation of Rwanda (FDLR) is disarmed. M23 made it clear that FDLR disarmament must precede the dissolution of M23.

In Congo M23 rebel militiamen blocked a road outside of the town of Rutshuru (60 kilometers north of Goma, in North Kivu province). The rebels also ambushed several vehicles traveling on roads leading to Rutshuru.

September 9, 2013: The Congolese government agreed to restart peace negotiations with the M23 rebel group. This came after two weeks of on and off combat with M23. Both the Congolese Army and the UN's new Intervention Brigade (IBDE) have fought with M23 in and around the city of Goma (North Kivu province). The IBDE serves with other UN forces in MONUSCO (UN Stabilization Mission in the Congo).

September 9, 2013: Some 60 people in the CAR were killed when forces loyal to former president Francois Bozize fought with Seleka rebel militiamen in the town of Bossangoa (northwestern CAR). The town is Bozize's hometown. Bozize was toppled by the Seleka coalition in March 2013.

A court in the republic of Congo (Brazzaville) sentenced 6 soldiers to long prison terms for their role in a series of explosions at a military weapons depot in the capital during March 2012. Some 300 people were killed by the explosions and 2,300 were wounded, while some 17,000 people lost their homes. 1 of the soldiers was convicted of arson and sentenced to 15 years in prison. A former army colonel, who also served on the national security council, was sentenced to 5 years hard labor for his role in the incident.

September 10, 2013: Uganda is investigating reports that the M23 Congolese rebel group has recruited Ugandan nationals. In the past Ugandan officials dismissed similar allegations, but recently an M23 militiaman from Uganda crossed the border and defected to Ugandan authorities. He claimed that M23 recruiters approached him and told him they were recruiting people to work for the UN in the Congo. Instead he was taken to an M23 base in Lumangabo, Congo and given military training.

September 11, 2013: MONUSCO's currently deploys 20,519 total uniformed personnel. That breaks down to 18, 587 soldiers, 512 military observers, and 1,420 armed police.

September 12, 2013: The UN reported that its peacekeeping forces in the Congo will not receive the unarmed Italian reconnaissance drones until the first week of December 2013. In late August and early September, UN peacekeeping offices touted the imminent arrival of an unarmed recon aerial vehicle provided by the Italian company Finmeccanica.

September 15, 2013: The Republic of Congo (Brazzaville) has sent 200 more combat soldiers to serve with the international peacekeeping force in the Central African Republic (CAR). The Congo-Brazzaville government said that it was concerned about increasing violence in the CAR. Currently 150 Congo (Brazzaville) soldiers are deployed in the CAR. Meanwhile, the new president of the CAR, Michel Djotodia, has announced that his rebel coalition, the Seleka, has been disbanded. However, no one in the CAR and none of the peacekeepers serving in the international force know what Djotodia's statement means. Seleka militiamen still control the CAR's key towns.

UN officials complain that UN peacekeeper tactics for protecting vulnerable civilians in the Congo are inadequate. One problem is that the peacekeeper (MONUSCO) bases are poorly located. More of a problem is the standing orders which prevent peacekeepers from attacking rogue militias unless fired upon does not protect vulnerable communities. UN officials are pushing for a reassessment of these tactics in the current meeting of national leaders at the UN headquarters. There is growing international enthusiasm for changing the rules of engagement for peacekeepers operating in the more dangerous places like Congo. The current commander of the UN forces in the Congo told his superiors that to be effective the UN must defeat "emerging threats." This sounds a lot like the mandate for the Intervention Brigade.

September 19, 2013: The UN confirmed that since July 2013, Tanzania has expelled 28,000 illegal Burundian migrants. Many of the Burundians had been in Tanzania since the 1970s, when they fled the Burundi civil war.

September 21, 2013: Congolese Army forces retook four villages in north Kivu province from M23 militiamen. The fighting was in the Libero region near the Rwandan border.

September 23, 2013: Uganda announced that it is heightening security measures. The recent terror attack on the mall in Nairobi, Kenya are the main reason. Ugandan Army and Burundian Army troops serve in the African Union Mission in Somalia (AMISOM) peacekeeping force along with Kenyan military forces. In July 2010, the Somali terrorist group Al Shabaab launched two terror attacks in Uganda's capital, Nairobi, and killed seventy-seven people.

September 24, 2013: The UN has begun referring to the UN Intervention Brigade (IBDE) as the multi-national Force Intervention Brigade (or FIB). The UN has floated the acronym of FIB for the brigade but unfortunately a fib is an English word for a falsehood. After a month in action, however, the IBDE is for real. Though the Malawi infantry battalion still has not arrived, to no one's surprise the Tanzanian and South African battalions have been quite successful. The brigade's artillery unit has been extremely effective in providing fire support to both the brigade and Congolese forces engaging M23 fighters. Though the UN has not made any definitive statements about employing the IBDE against the Rwandan Hutu Democratic Forces for the Liberation of Rwanda (FDLR) militia, several observers in North Kivu have mentioned the FDLR as a potential next target. That makes a lot of sense. Rwanda wants the FDLR eliminated. Rwanda has apparently withdrawn its support for M23, so hitting the FDLR would be a quid pro quo. Uganda has acted as mediator between the Congolese government and M23 representatives. Another likely target for the IBDE is the Allied Democratic Forces (ADF), a Ugandan rebel group with bases in Congo's North Kivu province. The ADF has ties to Somalia's militant Islamist Al Shabaab terrorist organization. Smashing the ADF would be a reward for Uganda's diplomatic efforts. (Austin Bay)

September 25, 2013: Central African leaders and the UN have asked the Congolese government to strike a deal with the M23 rebel group. The latest round of talks began on September 10th and the talks continue in Uganda.

September 27, 2013: Several dozen civilians were attacked and wounded in North Kivu province. Victims were unable to identify a particular militia.

In CAR Islamic terrorists (probably from Sudan) kidnapped a Catholic priest from a mission station in the town of Bouar. The crime probably occurred on September 27th. The kidnappers also looted the mission. A local resident working at the mission was also kidnapped but was later released. Former Seleka rebels also attacked the village of Herba and killed 2 people.

September 28, 2013: Police and customs officials in North Kivu province seized almost 400 kg (880 pounds) of coltan (a mineral form of tantalum, which is used in the manufacturing of many high-technology electronics devices).

October 1, 2013: China's aid- for- resources deal is once again stirring political controversy in the Congo. The deal is for at least $6.5 billion dollars (and possibly as much as $9 billion). In exchange for guaranteed access to copper, cobalt, and other minerals, Chinese construction companies will build roads, medical clinics, hospitals, and educational facilities. However, some funds

China provided have already disappeared. Opposition leaders claim that $300 million is not accounted for.

October 2, 2013: The president of Uganda challenged dissident general David Sejusa to try and launch a revolution to overthrow him. Sejusa has been living in exile in Great Britain since May 2013. Prior to entering exile, Sejusa had been chief of Uganda's intelligence services. Recently Sejusa called on the people of Uganda to remove president Museveni from power.

Congo announced that talks with M23 negotiators in Uganda's capital, Kampala, will continue for at least another week. The Congo commended Uganda for helping organize the talks.

October 3, 2013: Kenya asked Uganda to help track down individuals suspected of helping organize the recent Islamic terrorist attack on the Westgate mall in Nairobi. Kenyan police believe a German national with connections to Al Shabaab fled into Uganda after the attack.

October 4, 2013: The U.S. has formally sanctioned the government of Rwanda for its support of the M23 Congolese rebel organization. The U.S. has concluded that Rwandan officials have provided aid, despite the Rwandan government's denials. The Rwandan government immediately objected to the U.S. sanctions, but opposition political leaders welcomed the U.S. decision. The American sanctions deal with U.S. military equipment sales and U.S. military education and training services.

At the UN in New York, the leaders of Rwanda and Uganda argued that their countries are not responsible for the chaos in Congo's eastern provinces. The presidents of both countries said they cannot bring peace to the eastern Congo. That is the job of the Congolese government and the Congolese people. Both Rwanda and Uganda claim that the Congolese government cannot control its own army and foreigners are not responsible for that situation.

October 5, 2013: Rwanda criticizes US sanctions over Congolese M23 child soldiers'

Rwadan President Paul Kagame has rebuked the U.S. State Department's decision to sanction his country over its alleged association with the M23 rebel group. President Kagame said the decision fits into the plan of exiled Hutu rebels in the Democratic Republic of Congo and elsewhere who, according to him, seek to destroy what the Rwandan people are trying to build. He also questioned why his country was being held accountable for the faults of others. The U.S. State Department announced that under the Child Soldiers Prevention Act of 2008, it is putting Rwanda, Sudan, Myanmar, Central African Republic and Syria on sanction for their use of or association with groups who use child soldiers. The sanctions particularly concern military aid. The U.S. Government announced that Rwanda would not receive U.S. International Military Education and Training Funds as well as U.S. Foreign Military Financing in the 2014 fiscal year. Linda Thomas-Greenfield, the U.S. assistant secretary of state for African Affairs said the U.S. government's goal is to work with these countries it has sanctioned to ensure that "any involvement and recruitment of child soldiers" are stopped.

The United Nations and the government of the Democratic Republic of Congo had earlier accused the Rwandan government of supporting the Tutsi-dominated M23 rebel group. But the Rwandan government has insistently denied this charge. Spokesman for the Rwandan Armed Forces, Brigadier General Joseph Nzabamwita said the U.S. has enough information about his country's activities to know it is not in any alliance with the rebel group. He said "Rwanda's commitment to a sustainable solution that seeks to bring an end to the DRC conflict and its consequences, including the use of child soldiers, remains unchanged." Many observers have questioned the sanctions, especially since three countries – South Sudan, Chad and Yemen – who are suspected of using child soldiers were exempted from the sanctions and two others – Somalia and the Democratic Republic of Congo – received partial waivers. It is unclear how deep the supposed alliance between the Rwandan government and M23 rebel group goes. But the Tutsi-dominated government has twice invaded the DRC to unsettle Hutu rebels. President Paul Kagame of Rwanda came to power after the 1994 genocide – one of the most bloody events in the history of the nation which left close to 800,000 people dead. The country still struggles to overcome the effects of that violent outbreak.

October 8, 2013: In the Central African Republic (CAR) at least 30 people have been killed in fighting in and around the town of Garga (200 kilometers north-west of Bangui, the capital). For 2 days fighters loyal to former president Bozize have been clashing with local defense groups there. Forces loyal to the Seleka group, which now controls the country, have also approached the town. Most of the townspeople have fled into the countryside to escape the chaos. Former rebels (in this case likely Seleka rebel fighters) looted a clinic in the area. Meanwhile, the UN and African Union are trying to organize a peacekeeping force of 3,500 troops for the CAR.

October 9, 2013: M23 rebels in Congo's North Kivu province have been observed improving their positions near the Congo-Rwanda border. M23, however, said that the UN was merely observing normal troop movements and then accused the Congo of reinforcing its military positions in the area.

October 10, 2013: Armed militias thrive in Congo largely because of illegal mining. It's estimated that rebel groups in the Congo stole around $500 million worth of minerals in 2012. That included an estimated 12 tons of gold smuggled out via Uganda or Burundi and sold to jewelers in the United Arab Emirates or brokers in the Persian Gulf. The rebels also smuggle large quantities of tantalum, tin, and tungsten.

October 12, 2013: The UN complained that M23 rebels had fired on one of their helicopters as it flew an M23 held area. M23 told the UN that they were warning shots, as they did not like UN helicopters to watch them.

October 13, 2013: The UN has indicated that the Intervention Brigade (IBDE) may target other rogue militias in the Congo after M23 is either defeated or disbands following negotiations. The FDLR (Democratic Forces for the Liberation of Rwanda) is certainly a potential target. Formed by many of the Rwandan Hutu leaders who engineered the 1994 genocide, the FDLR has already been damaged by attacks. Rwandan and Congolese troops have been moving against the FDLR and that has taken a toll. Several senior FDLR leaders have died in these operations. The FDLR has also suffered in a series of battles with a local militia (the Raia Mutomboki). Still, the FDLR's main armed organization, FOCA (Forces Combattantes Abacunguzi), fields at least 2,500 armed men. 2 FDLR splinter factions continue to operate in the eastern Congo, the FDLR-RUD and the FDLR-Soki. The FDLR-RUD has a few hundred fighters (400 to 500). There are no figures for the FDLR-Soki, although its leader (Soki Sangano Musuhuke) was allegedly killed in July 2013. Many splinter factions simply fall apart when the leader dies, but for the moment the FDLR-Soki is recognized as an armed faction. The IBDE could also see action against the Ugandan rebel force the Allied Democratic Forces (ADF), which operates in North Kivu province. The ADF has links to Somalia's Islamist Al Shabaab organization. 2 Katangan separatist militias have also been mentioned as possible targets, the Mai-Mai Gedeon and Mai-Mai Kata- Katanga (which has ties to older Katangan separatist movements). Finally, the IBDE could see action against remnant Lord's Resistance Army cells operating in the Congo.

October 13, 2013: The UN condemned an M23 rebel attack on a UN helicopter. The incident occurred near Rumangabo in the eastern Congo.

October 14, 2013: The government again accused Rwanda of helping M23 and believes that M23 is preparing to launch a new series of attacks in the eastern Congo.

October 15, 2013: Army and M23 rebels fought near the rebel held town of Kanyanahoro and at least one rebel was killed.

October 19, 2013: A UN investigation found that some 200 former M23 combatants said they were recruited by M23 in either Rwanda or Uganda.

October 20, 2013: The government of Angola claimed that a contingent of Republic of Congo (Brazzaville) soldiers got lost and accidentally crossed the border into Angola's Cabinda enclave. The Angolan explanation followed a Republic of Congo accusation that Angola had launched an invasion of Republic of Congo territory.

October 21, 2013: Peace negotiations between M23 and the government have been officially suspended. M23 has demanded that the Congolese government give senior M23 commanders amnesty. The government does not want to give amnesty to people it calls mutineers. UN mediators warned both sides that the breakdown in talks could lead to another round of fighting. Negotiators had reached agreement on several major issues, but neither side was willing to give on the amnesty demand. At the moment, UN observers estimate that M23 controls around 700 square kilometers of Congolese territory. That zone is divided into several enclaves. The largest enclaves are on the Rwandan and Ugandan borders.

The army forces attacked M23 near the town of Kanyamohoro (15 kilometers north of Goma). Troops around Goma were supported by heavy artillery fire.

October 25, 2013: Rwanda claimed that its territory was shelled by Congolese Army forces and that it will not tolerate attacks on its territory. At the same time, some 5,000 Congolese civilians had fled into Rwanda to avoid fighting between the army and M23.

October 26, 2013: After two days of stiff fighting the army succeeded in driving M23 rebels from several key positions along the Ugandan and Rwandan borders. This included forcing M23 to abandon the town of Kibumba (20 kilometers north of Goma).

October 24, 2013: The government is blaming M23 for the breakdown in negotiations which has led to the latest round of fighting in North Kivu province.

The Rwandan government accused the UN of ignoring the threat posed to Rwanda and peace in central Africa by the FDLR.

Meanwhile, M23 rebels acknowledged that they have withdrawn from the town of Rumangabo. M23 had occupied the town since late 2012.

The Congolese Army reported that it is fighting an M23 force in the town of Kiguri (about 25 kilometers north of Goma). Soldiers took control of Kiwanja on October 27, after taking Kibumba (Rwandan border) the day before. Army units are consolidating their control over these towns.

October 28, 2013: A Tanzanian peacekeeper was killed during a firefight between Congolese forces and M23 rebels in the town of Kiwanja. The peacekeeper was part of a contingent assigned to protect civilians in the area. Kiwanja is north of Goma, the capital of North Kivu province.

October 29, 2013: The Seleka rebel group, which now controls the CAR (Central African Republic), is increasingly accused of bad behavior (crimes against humanity) that include random executions of innocent civilians, mass rape, and looting. The largely Moslem Seleka tends to target Christians.

October 30, 2013: The U.S. believes that the latest surge of fighting between Congolese forces and M23 rebels could ignite a larger regional war in central Africa and urged all parties in the conflict to re-open peace negotiations.

November 1, 2013: Uganda has told Kenya that it believes Jamil Mukulu, a key leader in the ADF (Allied Democratic Force) rebel group, may have assisted the Somalia Islamist militants who attacked a mall in Nairobi in September. The ADF always had militant Islamist connections. Mukulu calls himself the ADF's Supreme Commander. According to the Ugandan government, the ADF has several bases in the Congo's North Kivu province.

November 2, 2013: M23 and army units continued to fire on one another around Runyoni (North Kivu province). The situation in the area is chaotic, though the army appears to control the area and has seized key positions near the town of Bungana.

November 3, 2013: M23 rebel leaders announced that they are declaring a ceasefire. The declaration follows a series of defeats by army units. Most of the fighting has occurred near the Congo-Uganda border.

November 4, 2013: Every person in the town of Bunagana is now a refugee. Many residents have fled into Uganda. Congolese Army units and M23 rebels have been fighting in and around the town for several days. Army units supported by tanks and rocket fire attacked an M23 position on a hill near Bungana and forced the defending rebels to retreat.

Elsewhere in the area army, troops are now in control of the town of Bunagana (North Kivu province).

November 5, 2013: The government claimed that it has scored a significant victory over the M23 rebel movement and repeated that it will not accept a ceasefire deal with M23. This followed a rebel announcement that it now intends to disarm and pursue political discussions. The rebels said that M23 commanders were preparing their troops for disarmament and demobilization. If that is not quite surrender, it is close. Observers in eastern Congo confirmed that M23 fighters withdrew from two bases (Tshanzu and Runyoni) and that a large contingent of rebels have surrendered with their weapons. Another group fled across the border into Uganda. A senior M23 commander reportedly fled to Rwanda. The army is now preparing to disarm the FDLR, which was organized by radical Hutus who helped organize and lead the 1994 genocide in Rwanda.

However, South African losses in the CAR earlier this year embittered many South African citizens. The CAR may not be in the cards since a South African infantry battalion is the IBDE's most professional component. The operational speculation inevitably leads to a strategic question: will we see more IBDEs in the future? Will "hard" peacekeeping or peacekeeping with teeth (meaning offensive war waged by the UN)

become UN policy? (Austin Bay)

November 6, 2013: The UN Intervention Brigade (IBDE) was not directly involved in the recent series of battles between the Congolese Army and M23 rebels but was in the area. That meant a lot to the Congolese Army and the rebels. The battles began at the end of October and ended with M23 routed, retreating, and suing for peace. The IBDE gave the Congolese Army a lot of confidence when the brigade engaged M23 in late August. IBDE participation encouraged the army to press the rebels and the army won its first tactical victories over M23 in almost two years. Now the question is, will the IBDE's relative success in the eastern Congo lead UN decision makers to use it against other rebel forces like the FDLR (Democratic Forces for the Liberation of Rwanda)? Employing the brigade in the Congo's south (Katanga province) has already been discussed. The UN could use the brigade to quell the chaos in the Central African Republic (CAR).

November 22, 2013: DR CONGO-Jesuit Refuge Service team member killed'

Masisi: JRS staff member in the Democratic Republic of Congo (DRC), Yohana Bushu, was shot two weeks ago and died in hospital a few hours later. 'Papa Bushu', as he was known, had worked for JRS as a security guard since 2011. He died on his fortieth birthday following an attack by an armed group. He was returning home from a visit to his aunt 12 kilometres from Masisi in the eastern Congolese province of North Kivu. Bushu leaves eight children and a pregnant wife behind. "His widow, eight months pregnant, is still in hospital. I've been with her to talk and to console her a little. It is important to be with her now", said Regina Missanga OLG, a JRS team member in Masisi. Less than a year ago, Bushu's sister was killed in the fighting around Masisi. Without a husband, her six-month-old baby was left to Bushu. "Today she is a strong baby girl", said Regina.

Insecurity: The death of a JRS team member is a stark reminder of the dangers of working in a humanitarian context. Despite this month's military defeat of the rebel M23 Movement, violence and impunity continue in eastern DRC. Following the week of its thirty-third anniversary, JRS remembers all those who have given their lives in the service of others. "This tragic news underlines how the mission of JRS is being carried out in an environment of high risk to the lives of all team members and how important it is at the same time to be present to the suffering people", said the JRS International Director, Peter Balleis SJ, in his message of condolence to the teams. "The exact circumstances of Bushu's death are still unclear, but this situation of insecurity is a daily reality for our teams. We'll continue to accompany the family, and to give hope that all is not lost. God is still present", said Isaac Kiyaka SJ, JRS Great Lakes Africa Director.

Hopes for peace. "The team is sad. They're still sad. They don't understand, and they fear too", said Regina. On 15 November, JRS teams in Masisi held a ceremony in memorial of Bushu. A classroom of the JRS Pedro Arrupe Centre for literacy and livelihoods training has been named in his honour. "The entire team was there to commemorate and pay homage to Bushu", said Inés Oleaga ACI, Project Director in Masisi. "We shared a prayer, we named a classroom in his honour, and we shared lunch". Bushu was buried in a coffin made with materials from Felipe Berrios SJ, who runs a carpentry workshop for young people in Masisi. Bushu will be remembered as a man of compassion, whose advice was deeply respected and sought by many. "Three days later, traditional mourning has finished and life continues in Masisi, a place where the dead are always present", said Inés. "Does that mean we have lost hope? Not at all, but for the moment our hope is not in the authorities' justice; rather in the experience of knowing that we've not been abandoned and peace will reign one day in Masisi".

November 27, 2013: Rebel Ugandan military officer general David Sejusa (also known as Tinyefuza) has called on Ugandans to peacefully remove current president Yoweri Museveni. Sejusa was head of Ugandan intelligence services until he defected and fled to Great Britain in April 2013. He has now allied with the Freedom and Unity Front (FUF), which is run by Ugandan exiles opposed to Museveni. Museveni, however, has stated that Sejusa wants to start an armed rebellion.

November 29, 2013: Congolese President Joseph Kabila visited the town of Rutshuru (North Kivu province). M23 rebels occupied Rutshuru for over a year. Kabila told residents that he intends to end the 20 years of war which have plagued the Congo.

November 30, 2013: The Sheka Mai-Mai militia has told the government and the head of MONUSCO that it will disarm. The Sheka Mai-Mai is is led by Sheka Ntabo Ntaberi, who refers to his group as a self-defense force. However, militiamen under his command have been accused of murder and mass rape.

December 1, 2013: The Ugandan military reported that its forces killed 14 LRA fighters in the CAR. The Ugandan Army used intelligence information provided by the U.S., which also has 100 special operations advisers assigned to help African military units fight the LRA and bring LRA senior commander Joseph Kony to justice. Among the LRA dead was Colonel Samuel Kangul, who has been identified as fourth in the LRA's chain of command. Kangul was reportedly the LRA's chief supply officer. The Ugandan military stopped anti-LRA operations after Seleka rebels took over the CAR in April of this year. Surveillance operations recommenced during the summer.

December 3, 2013: MONUSCO peacekeepers have now deployed drone recon aircraft in the Congo. Two Italian-made Falco surveillance drones are operating out of Goma (North Kivu province).

December 4, 2013: An estimated 1,000 M23 militia fighters are now interned in Uganda. Their final status is yet to be determined.

December 5, 2013: The Congo government and the UN continue to discuss the next target of MONUSCO's (UN Organization Stabilization Mission in the Congo) Intervention Brigade (IBDE). Several UN officials have mentioned the Democratic Forces for the Liberation of Rwanda (FDLR), the Rwandan Hutu rebel group. The UN recently estimated the FDLR has 1,500 armed fighters and could well be a tougher opponent than the M23 rebel group the IBDE and Congolese forces defeated in early November. The FDLR is led by Hutus directly involved in the 1994 Rwandan genocide. Rebellion is one thing, genocide another. The FDLR may have no choice but to fight to the last. Uganda would like the IBDE to go after the Islamist extremist rebel group the Allied Democratic Forces (ADF). Uganda has told the UN that ADF terrorists have kidnapped around 300 people in the last year. The ADF has ties to the Somali Islamist rebel group, Al Shabaab, which is an ally of Al Qaeda. The Ugandan military says it has evidence that the ADF has received ammunition, weapons, and other supplies from Islamist groups. The weapons include heavy recoilless rifles (107 millimeter, according to one source). Uganda has peacekeepers operating in Somalia with the AU's AMISOM force. The ADF began in 1996, as a minor opposition group run by Moslem tribesmen. It was largely destroyed in 2004, but the fanatic survivors persisted, and now support from other Islamic terrorist groups have enabled ADF to grow and become more radical.

December 8, 2013: The UN estimated that 72,000 people have fled from their neighborhoods in Bangui, the capital of CAR. Many of them have collected near the city's international airport. The airport is also the headquarters of French military forces and the African Union peacekeeping troops in the CAR.

December 9, 2013: French soldiers in the CAR engaged militia gunmen in a series of firefights in the capital, Bangui. On December 5, the UN authorized the French contingent to reinforce African Union peacekeepers in the CAR. The French military has an offensive mandate similar to that of the UN's Intervention Brigade (IBDE) in the Congo. The French forces have orders to disarm rival Christian and Muslim tribal militias and the French forces are allowed to use lethal force against militia groups that refuse to disarm. The Seleka rebel movement, which toppled CAR president Francois Bozize in March 2013, drew its strength from Muslim tribes, many of them from the northern CAR. Since Bozize's government fell, however, the country has descended into chaos. Observers in Bangui indicated that the Seleka rebel commander who became the interim president, Michel Djotodia, no longer has control of Seleka's various militia factions. There are Seleka rebels fighting with the Muslim militias in Bangui. However, no one is quite sure if a particular militia is loyal to the rebel government. Some 450-500 people have been killed in Bangui since December 5, the day a Christian tribal militia loyal to Bozize entered the city. France now has around 1,600 soldiers in the CAR.

December 10, 2013: In late November reports cropped up in the Congo, Uganda, and Central African Republic (CAR) that Joseph Kony, the notorious senior commander of the Ugandan rebel group, the Lords Resistance Army (LRA), was prepared to discuss surrender terms. The Ugandan military said it welcomed the news. Rumors regarding Kony's impending surrender crop up every couple of years. The most serious appeared in 2006 and 2007. But he didn't come in from the bush. The International Criminal Court (ICC) has indicted Kony on numerous charges of war crimes and crimes against humanity. At one time the Ugandan government told an LRA mediator that if Kony surrendered he would be tried in Ugandan courts, not by the ICC. Kony apparently didn't believe the offer was real. As it is, the official Ugandan government line is that it will not protect Kony from the ICC. Not surprisingly the November reports proved to be false. LRA cadres continue to launch occasional attacks in the Congo and the CAR, though said LRA attacks reported in the region during the January-June 2013 time frame were down by 50 percent compared to 2012. In November South Sudan dispatched an army battalion to provide security in an area residents claimed was threatened by the LRA.

December 11, 2013: Two French peacekeepers were killed in fighting in Bangui, the capital of the CAR.

Uganda reported that 19 Lord's Resistance Army (LRA) fighters have surrendered to Ugandan troops operating in the CAR. The Ugandan Army contingent operating in the CAR has an African Union (AU) mandate.

December 12, 2013: The Congo government has signed an agreement with representatives of the M23 rebel group which officially ends M23's insurgency. Negotiators signed the deal in Nairobi. The agreement calls for an amnesty program. However, the government said that there will be no blanket amnesty.

UN officials reported that 2,300 rebel fighters in eastern Congo have surrendered since the end of October. Many of the surrendering rebels belonged to M23 but several hundred members of the Rwandan Hutu Democratic Forces for the Liberation of Rwanda (FDLR) have also surrendered.

UN peacekeepers in Congo's North Kivu province have found a large M23 weapons and ammunition dump on a hill near the village of Chanzu (Congo-Uganda border). Officials said soldiers found heavy weapons at the dump and enough ammunition to supply M23 for up to a year.

December 13, 2013: Anicet Dologuele, a senior CAR political leader and a former chairman of the Central African Development Bank said that the French and African peacekeeping forces in the CAR have a very difficult job. French and MISCA soldiers are going to have to fight a war against the Seleka rebel movement and interim president Michel Djotodia has to do more to try to stop the militia violence. At one time Djotodia was Seleka's senior commander.

December 14, 2013: Ugandan rebel general David Sejusa announced he has formed a political party dedicated to overthrowing Ugandan president Yoweri Museveni, the Freedom and Unity Front. Sejusa has been in exile in London since May 2013. Museveni has been in power 28 years. Sejusa alleges that Museveni intends to hand over power to his son, Muhoozi Kainerugaba.

Republic of Congo (Brazzaville) soldiers raided a compound belonging to Colonel Marcel Ntsourou, a former senior intelligence agency officer who is now on the outs with the government. The raid took place in Brazzaville. Ntsourou is charged with involved in the 2012 major explosion at a weapons depot which left 280 dead and injured 2,500. Ntsourou and his bodyguards returned fire and an extended firefight ensued that left over 40 dead, including two soldiers. Ntsourou was subsequently arrested. The Brazzaville rumor mill claimed that Republic of Congo president President Denis Sassou Nguesso believed Ntsourou intened to launch a coup and used the explosion as an excuse to arrest him.

The CAR'S interim president and one-time Seleka leader, Michel Djotodia, announced that he is willing to discuss amnesty for both Muslim and Christian militias now fighting one another. Djotodia has acknowledged that he no longer has effective control over many former Seleka rebel groups. When Djotodia made the announcement he said that he had been contacted by Christian and animist tribal militia leaders. The leaders told him they wanted representation in a transitional government.

UN peacekeepers reported an unidentified armed group killed at least 20 people in an attack on two villages in North Kivu province. Civilians in North Kivu accused a Ugandan Islamist rebel group (ADF-NALU, or Allied Democratic Forces-National Army Liberation of Uganda) of being responsible.

December 16, 2013: The UN says it has evidence that M23 rebels now in Rwanda are trying to recruit new members.

December 20, 2013: The Congo government said that some former M23 will be eligible for amnesty. Former rebels who are not guilty of committing serious crimes can apply for amnesty. The government agreed to an amnesty program in the December 12 agreement which officially ended M23's insurgency. The amnesty program will cover "acts of insurrection" committed from May 8, 2009 to the date the Congolese parliament officially approves the peace settlement.

December 22, 2013: Muslim demonstrators in Bangui protested the presence of French troops in the CAR and the militia disarmament campaign being directed by the French peacekeepers. The Muslims demonstrators also alleged that the French had entered the CAR to protect Christians and no one else. French officials said the Muslim demonstrators were supporters of the Seleka rebel group. Central African Republic's former rebel group Seleka protested Sunday against French troops conducting a disarmament operation.

December 23, 2013: In Kiwanja (north Kiu province) Congolese troops arrested a rebel leader Kakule "Shetani" Muhima. wholeads the Mai Mai Shetani militia. Muhia's nickname is Shetani, which translates as Satan. In late November Muhima had indicated he wanted to sign a peace deal with the government. However, Muhima is wanted on numerous charges, including looting.

France has 1,600 soldiers in the CAR. African nations have deployed around 3,000 peacekeepers to the CAR as part of the MISCA peacekeeping operation. Burundi, Chad, Cameroon, Republic of Congo (Brazzaville) and Gabon have contributed forces. Burundi has a contingent in Bangui. Gabon has troops in Bouar (western CAR). The Congo (Brazzaville) and Cameroon contingents are based in northwestern CAR (towns of Paoua and Bossangoa). Chad has troops in Bangui, Bangassou (southeast) and Ndele (north). The Chad contingent in Bangui is withdrawing after officials accused the Chadian soldiers of siding with the Muslim militias. Burundian soldiers accused Chadian soldiers of attacking them while they were disarming a militia in Bangui. The Burundians returned fire and wounded three Chad soldiers.

December 25, 2013: French peacekeepers in Bangui, capital of the Central African Republic (CAR), deployed armored vehicles to defend the Bangui airport. An estimated 70,000 civilians have collected near the airport to escape the fighting between Muslim militias and Christian and animist tribal militias. The situation in the CAR is chaotic. The hard core Muslim militias are manned by Seleka rebels, though they are no longer loyal to the Seleka interim government. The interim CAR government refers to them as rogue militias. The Christian and animist militias now refer to themselves as the anti-balaka, which means anti-machete in the Sango language. Christian and animist tribal leaders accuse the Muslim militias of attacking unarmed civilians and mutilating and killing them with machetes.

December 27, 2013: The UN's Force Intervention Brigade (IBDE) is back in action in the eastern Congo. Elements of the IBD attacked rebels in the Allied Democratic Forces ADF-National Army for the Liberation of Uganda (ADF-NALU). The IBDE attack included fire from the brigade's armed helicopters which supported an attack by the Congolese Army (FARDC) on the town of Kamango. ADF rebels seized the town earlier in the month and then kidnapped and murdered several civilians. The ADF is an Islamist organization and the Ugandan government contends that the ADF is allied with Somalia's radical Al Shabaab Islamist militia. Earlier this month 200 IBDE soldiers and an armed helicopter aided the Congolese Army in an operation against the Rwandan rebel group, the Democratic Forces for the Liberation of Rwanda (FDLR). The FDLR is an extremist Hutu group Senior FDLR commanders helped plan and execute the 1994 Rwandan genocide. UN officials now estimate that the FDLR has 1,500 to 1,800 fighters, but only 30 percent of the current fighters are Rwandan Hutus. The group has recruited the other 70 percent of its members from tribes in the eastern Congo.

December 27, 2013: The African Union reported that six Chadian peacekeepers were killed on December 25 in Bangui, capital of the CAR. Another 15 Chadian soldiers were wounded. The soldiers were ambushed in the capital's Gobongo neighborhood. One Chadian vehicle was destroyed.

December 28, 2013: Between December 11 and December 20, two American C-17 transports moved 500 Burundian infantrymen from Burundi to the CAR. The C-17s also airlifted the units' equipment, to include several light armored personnel carriers. Security at the Bangui airport was provided by French peacekeepers. Thousands of refugees could be seen at the airport, some huddled within 50 meters of the runway.

December 30, 2013: The Congolese Army drove off an attack on the airport in the capital city, Kinshasha. Rebels also fired on an army barrack and a television station in the city. The government claimed that around 70 followers of Katanga province religious leader Paul Joseph Mukungubila launched the raids. Some 40 of the attackers died in the firefights with the army. The government said the army did not suffer any casualties. The attackers were very poorly armed. Mukungubila's followers accuse the government of launching an illegal attack on a church in Lubumbashi. Mukungubila fanatically opposes the government of president Joseph Kabila. The government said Mukungubila's supporters conducted the attacks for the sole purpose of sowing panic in the capital.

Former CAR president Francois Bozize denied accusations that he is backing Christian anti-balaka (anti-machete) militia groups in the country. Bozize was overthrown by Seleka rebels. The Seleka movement drew its strength from predominantly Muslim tribes.

Patrick Karegeya, a former Rwandan Army colonel who once commanded the Rwandan government's external intelligence service was found murdered in a hotel in Johannesburg, South Africa. Rwanda opposition politicians accused the Rwandan president of assassinating the colonel. Karegeya became a political opponent of the president who fired him in 2006. Karegeya had been in exile since 2007.

January 2, 2014: A Congolese Army colonel leading an operation against Ugandan Alliance of Democratic Forces and National Army for the Liberation of Uganda (ADF-NALU) rebels was killed when his jeep was ambushed near the town of Matembo (North Kivu province). The rebels hit the jeep with a rocket-propelled grenade. The colonel commanded a special operations battalion.

January 3, 2013: The UN estimated that fighting in the CAR has displaced one million people. That is about 20 percent of the population. Around 500,000 displaced people have collected in makeshift refugee camps in the Bangui area.

January 5, 2014: A grenade attack in a Bangui, CAR market wounded four people. One of the wounded was a Burundian soldier serving with the streets of the MISCA African peacekeeping force.

January 7, 2014: In the south Congolese Army soldiers fought with Mai Mai Kata soldiers and rebel fighters were killed in a series of firefights which went on for eight hours. The Katanga rebels entered the city during the night. The government claimed its forces counter-attacked and the rebels retreated from the city. In March 2013 around 200 Kata Katanga rebels raided Lumbumbashi. During Fall 2013 the group threatened to launch another attack on the city. Kata Katanga is Swahili and translates as Secede Katanga. The group is sometimes referred to as the Mai Mai Gedeon (Gideon), after its leader and senior commander, Gedeon Kyungu Mutanga. Katanga has tried to secede from the Congo on several occasions. Mineral-rich Katanga is by far the country's wealthiest province.

January 8, 2014: The EU (European Union) announced that defense ministers may send a joint military force to the CAR to aid peacekeeping efforts. The EU force would be structured as a rapid deployment force with 1,000 to 1,200 soldiers (reinforced battalion task force). The unit would have a fire support element (light artillery), a medical unit and a transport helicopter element. EU have agreed to make a decision on the force by the end of this month.

January 10, 2014: Michel Djotodia, former senior commander of the Seleka rebel movement, resigned as interim president of the CAR (Central African Republic). This caused celebrations in the streets of the capital.

January 12, 2014: Congolese national park rangers in Virunga National Park fought with a group of Rwandan FDLR (Hutu Democratic Forces for the Liberations of Rwanda) rebels. One ranger and three rebels died in the engagementand two rangers were wounded. One rebel was captured after the firefight. Park authorities claimed that the rebels attacked the park ranger force. The rangers have been trying to deny rebels bases in the park and also monitor rebel movements through the park.

January 13, 2014: Rwanda claims that political opponents and dissidents in Rwanda are attempting to start a new war in central Africa. This followed a South African police report which concluded that former Rwandan Army colonel Patrick Karegeya was murdered on January 2 by strangulation (a curtain cord around his neck). At one time Rwanda accused Karegeya of planning grenade attacks in Rwanda's capital, Kigali.

January 14, 2014: The UN is urging the Congolese government to address land disputes in North and South Kivu provinces (eastern Congo). Outside groups have provided rebel groups in the eastern Congo with money and weapons in exchange for access to gold and other valuable minerals (coltan, for example). However, a recent study showed that land disputes between neighboring tribes remains a major cause of gconflict in the region. Weak and corrupt government institutions exacerbate the situation. Disputes escalate into violent confrontations and then all out battles between tribal militias because no one trusts the justice system to be fair. The system is either regarded as being corrupt or, in many places, it does not exist. There is no centralized system for registering land ownership or recognizing land use rights. This is a common cause for unrest and poverty in many countries.

January 15, 2014: The UN peacekeeping mission announced that one of its surveillance drones was wrecked when it ran off the runway at the airfield in Goma (eastern Congo). The UN forces are using Falco unmanned aerial vehicles.

Tanzanian soldiers serving with the Intervention Brigade (IBDE) have deployed near the town of Beni (North Kivu province). The Congolese Army is currently conducting an offensive operation in the area against the Ugandan ADF-NALU rebels (Allied Democratic Forces-National Army for the Liberation of Uganda). The UN said that the IBDE could assist the Congolese Army in the operation.

January 17, 20134: The U.S. condemned the murder of a leading Rwandan exile and stated that it is disturbed by charges that Rwandan president Paul Kagame is involved in violent attacks on his political opponents.

The European Union plans to send an additional 1,000 soldiers to the CAR to reinforce the peacekeeping effort. Estonia is committed to sending troops with the new contingent. Six other countries, including Finland and Poland, are considering sending soldiers.

January 20, 2014: CAR legislators voted to make the mayor of Bangui interim president. Catherine Samba-Panza will replace former Seleka rebel leader Michel Djotodia. Djotodia agreed to resign in early January.

January 21, 2014: Gunmen in the CAR ambushed a convoy and killed 22 Moslem civilians. The gunmen fired rocket-propelled grenades at the convoy then attacked with small arms and machetes.

January 24, 2014: An explosion at a Congolese Army weapons dump near Mbuji Mayi (Kasai-Orientale province) killed at least ten people. Investigators claimed that the explosion was caused by a lightning strike.

January 28, 2014: It is believed that the ADF-NALU (Allied Democratic Forces-National Army for the Liberation of Uganda) force has grown in strength. The ADF-NALU rebels now deploy between 1,200 and 1,500 fighters. Previous estimates credited the ADF with 800 fighters. There is also evidence that Arabic speaking trainers have conducted combat training classes for the ADF-NALU at its bases in the Congo. The Congolese Army is currently conducting offensive operations against the ADF-NALU in North Kivu province (near the Ugandan border). The army has named the offensive operation “Sokola.” In Lingala that means “clean out.” The army has reportedly occupied Mwalika as well as Mumundioma (45 kilometers north-east of Beni). The Ugandan government has claimed that Mwalika serves as the ADF’s major training base and has referred to the town as an ADF sanctuary. An ADF contingent was also reportedly seen operating near the town of Ituri, capital of Congo’s Orientale Province.

January 31, 2014: The UN warned that M23 rebels could still regroup and reorganize. The warning was general but diplomats acknowledged it was directed at Rwanda. Rwanda has been accused of supporting M23. On its part, Rwanda accused Congo of supporting the FDLR. Rwanda’s UN ambassador also accused the Congolese government of being crybabies. Congo called Rwanda arrogant.

January 31, 2014: Burundian opposition leaders are warning that political situation in the country is once again deteriorating. The mandate for the UN office monitoring political reforms in Burundi comes up for renewal in March 2014.

February 1, 2014: People in North Kivu province are complaining that the government and MONUSCO have not done enough to stop illegal roadblocks. Various militia groups have used roadblocks as a source of income Truck drivers and even pedestrians must pay the militia to pass. However, there are also reports that soldiers have run the same scam. The going rate for one person is around 100 Congolese francs (about ten cents).

February 4, 2014: The FDLR is accused of recruiting child soldiers. The charge came amid new rumors that the UN's Intervention Brigade (IBDE) was preparing to conduct operations against the FDLR.

February 5, 2014: The Congolese government has officially approved an amnesty law for rebel groups. Though rebel commanders can still face charges, the law provides amnesty for many rebel militia fighters who surrendered and disarmed. UN mediators had been putting pressure on the government to pass the law. The law will apply to M23 rebels.

February 7, 2014: Peacekeepers from Chad escorted several thousand Moslems from Bangui (the capital of the CAR). The Moslems claim they are threatened by anti-Balaka militia groups. Meanwhile, the French government announced that it will continue to keep its peacekeeping contingent in the CAR.

February 9, 2014: Rwandan peacekeepers in Bangui, capital of the CAR, stopped a mob from lynching two Moslem civilians. The peacekeepers fired warning shots but the mob did not disperse. The peacekeepers then fired at the mob killed one person. The incident occurred in Miskine, a neighborhood on the north side of Bangui. Low-level sectarian violence between Christians and Moslems continues to occur in Bangui. France has 1,600 peacekeepers in the CAR. The African Union has deployed an additional 5,000 soldiers. The Rwandan contingent serves with the AU force.

The war crimes trial of former Congolese rebel leader Bosco Ntaganda continues in the Netherlands. Prosecutors presented evidence that Ntaganda had ordered his militiamen to murder civilians and to rape woman.

The government of the Republic of Congo (Brazzaville) is accused of torturing dissidents and conducting violent attacks on opposition political leaders. But now there is evidence that that the human rights situation in the Congo Republic is deteriorating. Until recently, the UN regarded the Congo Republic as something of a success. But there have been several documented violent assaults on opposition leaders. The government is also accused of corrupting the judicial system and attacking trade unionists.

Gunmen in Bangui, capital of the Central African Republic (CAR), assassinated a member of the country's new transitional government. The UN called the assassination of Jean-Emmanuel Ndjaroua a criminal act and an attack on attempts to stabilize the situation in the CAR.

February 10, 2014: The ICC trial of former Congolese M23 militia commander Bosco Ntaganda has begun. Ntaganda faces five counts of crimes against humanity and 13 counts of war crimes. The criminal charges stem from investigations of Ntaganda's operations in Ituri province in 2002-2003. At that time he was a senior commander in the Union of Congolese Patriots militia.

The Congolese government claimed that its forces have killed at least 230 members of the ADF-NALU in operations that began in January.

February 10, 2014: Soldiers operating near the Congo-Uganda border (North Kivu and Oriental provinces) overran a major ADF-NALU (Allied Democratic Forces-National Army for the Liberation of Uganda) rebel base. The Ugandan government thanked the Congolese government and claimed that the base was an ADF headquarters. The ADF reportedly had a headquarters at a base in the Congo's Rwenzori Mountains. The ADF-NALU is an Islamist organization and has ties to Somalia's Al Shabaab militant Islamist group. The army, supported by UN peacekeepers, began an offensive against the ADF-NALU on January 17.

February 13, 2014: The UN does not believe claims by the peacekeeping officials disputed recent claims by FDLR (Democratic Forces for the Liberation of Rwanda) that the Rwandan rebel group is disarming. FDLR commanders made the claim and added that the group is willing to begin negotiations with the Rwandan government. Though an estimated 50 FDLR rebels have surrendered since November 2013, there is no evidence the FDLR as a whole is disarming or intends to disarm. The FDLR still has an estimated 1,800 fighters. The UN has made it clear that the FDLR is a potential target for the Intervention Brigade (IBDE). Rwanda continues to reject negotiations with the FDLR. The Rwandan government argues that the FDLR is commanded by genocidaires involved in the 1994 Rwandan genocide-and the Rwandan government is right. The UN peacekeeping mission in Congo does stand by its mid-January assessment that around 8,000 militiamen have surrendered or disarmed since the Congolese Army (assisted by the IBDE) attacked and routed M23 rebels in early November 2013.

February 14, 2014: The UN s investigating claims that in North Kivu province a militia group burned down three villages and murdered 70 people in early February. The militia group has not been identified but local sources claim that the bodies are buried in a mass grave.

February 15, 2014: AU confirmed that its peacekeepers in CAR have begun arresting anti-Balaka militia leaders. The anti-Balaka are primarily Christian militias which were organized to combat attacks by Moslem Seleka rebel groups and tribal militias. However it appears that some anti-Balaka groups of launching indiscriminate attacks.

February 16, 2014: France will reinforce its 1,600 peacekeepers in the CAR with another 300 to 400 soldiers in the coming weeks.

February 17, 2014; Ugandan troops operating in the Central African Republica may have killed LRA (Lord's Resistance Army) deputy commander Okot Odhiambo in October 2013. An LRA defector told the Ugandan soldiersthat Odiambo was wounded in an ambush on October 27 and subsequently died of his wounds. The ICC has indicted Odhimabo on numerous charges of crimes against humanity.

February 19, 2014: The UN is deploying an additional special operations infantry company to Katanga province. At the moment the UN has 450 to 500 soldiers in Katanga. However, MONUSCO believes it must counter the attacks by the Kata-Katanga (Bakata Katanga) separatist rebel group. Kata-Katanga has launched several raids on the provincial capital, Lumumbashi. The reinforcing company is an Egyptian special forces unit with 120 troops. The UN may position the company north of Lubumbashi, in the Manono-Mitwaba-Pweto triangle area. The area is known as the Triangle of Death.

February 20, 2014: Congolese police in the town of Bukavu (South Kivu province) broke up a political rally for Vital Kamerhe, a critic of Congolese president Joseph Kabila who has emerged as one of Kabila's main political rivals. Kamerhe heads the Union for the Congolese Nation party. He was at one time an ally of Kabila. Kamerhe has accused Kabila of wanting to change the constitution and electoral procedures so he can remain in power.

February 25, 2014: MONUSCO reported that it is using its surveillance unmanned aerial vehicles (UAVs) to monitor movements of the FDLR (Rwandan Hutu rebel militia). The surveillance drones are based in Goma (North Kivu province).

February 26, 2014: Patrice Ngaissona, a leader in the Central African Republic's anti-Balaka militia movement and accused of inciting violence, was arrested in the Republic of Congo (Congo-Brazzaville). French and AU peacekeepers in the CAR tried to arrest Ngaissona in mid-February.

February 26, 2014: Democratic Republic of Congo: entrepreneurs cycle to make a living’

JRS Newsroom – Goma - Many people in eastern Congo move from camp to camp in search of safety. This repeated displacement disrupts lives, support networks and family ties. Access to the land is hindered, as is their ability to earn a living. Trying to bring stability to people in these circumstances has become a major focus of the Jesuit Refugee Service in eastern Democratic Republic of Congo (DRC). One step in this direction has been to help internally displaced persons (IDPs) in Nzulo camp in the eastern city of Goma by providing microcredit to establish small business activities. Teams provide loans to IDPs to buy bikes that they can use to transport coal, food and water to and from the camp. The activities began at the end of 2013, following the presentation of the first bicycles to participants in Nzulo camp. "Each bicycle is worth the equivalent of 80 US dollars. The participants selected for the programme will progressively pay back the cost", said Paulo Welter SJ, JRS DRC Director. The entrepreneurs will aim to maintain weekly payments of four US dollars. "In this way, these entrepreneurs will clear any debt after twenty weeks and gain ownership of the bicycle", added Fr Paulo.

North Kivu. In other areas of North Kivu, such as Masisi and Mweso, JRS livelihood activities include workshops in tailoring, baking, carpentry and weaving skills. "Life for IDPs is difficult because we live in land which is not ours. We left our fields so food is the most difficult thing to find. We also abandon school because we lack school fees. Here in Congo there is much hardship because we have all become displaced. I was a child soldier. I think this one reason why people become bandits because they lack work, so they take up arms", explained François*, one of the participants. "Goma is situated at the foot of Nyiragongo volcano. As such, the ground in the area is very rocky, making transportation of basic goods a tiresome task. Bicycles are a great help.

It isn't easy work, but it is an income", said Joseph Mbabazi, JRS DRC Focal Point for Advocacy. With a population of 7,000, Nzulo camp has welcomed over 2,000 internally displaced persons in the last few months. The military defeat of the rebel M23 Movement in November 2013 has brought tentative stability to some districts, but many areas remain unstable due to the presence of numerous other armed groups. Moreover, local populations continue to fear the sporadic attacks by the M23. "Some people are returning to their home districts. Others choose to stay", said Mr Mbabazi.

Inspiration. The idea for the microcredit initiative around Goma came to Paulo after he won a bicycle in a competition. "It inspired me to reflect on the uses of a bicycle, especially for transportation and earning a little something. The aim is to help, in a small way at first, to reduce hunger by ensuring economic self-reliance. Some income can also bring hope. It is a way of restoring dignity", continued Fr Paulo. Sponsors from Paulo's home in Brazil have secured the purchase of thirty more bicycles. As the number increases, the scheme will expand to other camps around Goma. The selection of participants was undertaken in partnership with the International Organisation for Migration (IOM). "I invite all participants to ensure they use this opportunity to its full potential. IOM will be glad to assist JRS in the monitoring of the activity", said IOM Congo representative, Flora Camain in a speech in Nzulo. The entrepreneurs have now completed six weeks of the repayment schedule, and all the participants, according to Mr Mbabazi, are on track. "Such activities foster self-respect and autonomy. We hope to do more in this area to help displaced persons avoid apathy and create employment", said Mr Mbabazi. François is optimistic that he can use his skills to benefit both himself and his new community. "Now I can begin to take care of myself", he said. * Name has been changed for security reasons. (Text ends)

February 28, 2014: Republic of Congo (Brazzaville) and Angola are conducting a joint border inspection in the Pangui region. The countries intend to draw a definitive boundary in order to avoid future armed incidents between security forces.

March 2, 2014: Two UN attack helicopters (likely belonging to the IBDE's helicopter element) attacked an ADF base camp near Saha Sitisa (northeast of Beni). The army began a series of anti-ADF operations in mid-January.

March 3, 2014: MONUSCO (UN Stabilization Mission in the Congo) peacekeepers and Congolese soldiers are pursuing a group of Ugandan rebels belonging to the ADF-NALU (Allied Democratic Forces-National Army for the Liberation of Uganda). The UN and Congolese troops attacked the ADF near the town of Beni (North Kivu province). Six UN peacekeepers from Nepal patrolling the town of Beni were wounded when two men on a motorcycle threw a hand grenade at the peacekeepers. The UN force involved in the operations includes elements of the Intervention Brigade (IBDE).

March 4, 2014: The Congolese Army said it intends to attack the FDLR (Democratic Forces for the Liberation of Rwanda) militia positions in North Kivu province. South African police reported that armed gunmen attacked the Johannesburg home of exiled Rwandan general Faustin Kayumba Nyamwasa, who is a political opponent of Rwandan president Paul Kagame. Nyamwasa survived an alleged assassination attempt in 2010.

South Africa has expelled three Rwandan diplomats it contends were involved in the March 4th raid on the home of exiled Rwandan general Faustin Kayumba Nyamwasa. Rwanda immediately retaliated by expelling six South African diplomats. Rwanda accused South Africa of harboring individuals responsible for planning terrorist attacks in Rwanda.

March 7, 2014: The International Criminal Court (ICC) has convicted Congolese militia leader Germain Katanga of crimes against humanity and war crimes for his involvement in the February 2003 assault on Bogoro (Ituri province). Katanga commanded the Patriotic Resistance Forces (FRP) militia.

March 8, 2014: DR CONGO: the life of a displaced woman, finding the strength to carry on'

JRS Newsroom: Mweso – Fuelled by competition for rich minerals, war, violence and instability have ravaged the eastern Democratic Republic of Congo for nearly two decades. With the devastation of the economy and infrastructure, impunity has reigned. Sexual and other forms of violence against women, particularly displaced women, are commonplace.

Mapendo is just one of the survivors; this is her story. Mapendo (meaning love) comes from Mihara, a small village in the North Kivu province of eastern Congo. Having fled the violence of the FDLR rebels, she now lives in Mweso camp.

This is also the story of Sifa, Vumila, Maniriho, Dusabe. The names of the women change, as do their villages and their aggressors. Yet their suffering does not, nor does their desire to start again each day, their strength to survive, and especially their desire to provide a better future for their children. It was 2009 when Mapendo and her family fled for a few nights seeking safety in the rainforest. The FDLR rebel forces had reached her village and other nearby towns. They had begun pillaging property, killing men and raping women.

Many families had already taken refuge in the camps for internally displaced persons (IDPs) in Kashuga, Mweso or Ibuga. Hoping peace would return in a few days, Mapendo and her husband did not go far. One day they were found.

Mapendo had been repeatedly raped, and her husband killed, in front of her three children. She was 27 years old at the time. The next day, in October 2009, Mapendo left her village to go to Mweso camp. Life is not easy in the camps, especially for a woman alone. The homes – made of mud and straw – are certainly not comfortable. In fact, the roofs leak unless they are covered by plastic sheeting. The lucky ones have a mat on which the whole family can sleep, and maybe even a blanket to protect them against the cold and dampness of the night. Families have few household utensils: a plate on which everyone eats, a water container, and a bucket for washing. Few people have much else.

The most important thing Mapendo had to learn when she got to the camp was how to find food. It was easy in Mihara. She had land to cultivate.

The land in North Kivu is very fertile. Food can be harvested four times a year. One could live well, if only there was peace. Life is much more difficult in the IDP camps. There is no land to cultivate and, therefore, no food. The UN World Food Programme distributes food, but there is never enough; and they haven't distributed any food rations since last November. Ever since the Congolese army (FARDC) defeated the M23 rebel movement, it is assumed that IDPs can go back home in safety. But this is not true. The M23 was not responsible for the displacement of the population in this part of the world. It was other smaller or larger groups whose destructive presence continues as before.

In exchange for a couple of potatoes, some corn, or a handful of beans, Mapendo must start each day by asking locals to allow her to work in their fields. She travels ... for miles, on foot, of course, with her youngest son strapped to her back and the other two jogging along beside her. There is no money to send them to school. After working all day, she must walk even further to get firewood; and of course return home before dark. On her way home, she will have to carry the firewood on her back and her child around her neck. When she is lucky, she may get enough food and firewood for two days, which allows her to take a much-needed rest the following day. Likewise, there are days when she receives very little food in exchange for her labour. There are also days when she finds little wood or when she comes across men from one of the armed rebel groups.

Almost all displaced women have been victims of sexual violence at some time in their lives. Most have been victims several times; many consider it a necessary evil, almost normal, especially for single women. In search of protection, some displaced women, who have been raped in the IDP camps, become the companion of a man who already has another woman. The next day begins in search of someone who can give her a job. (Text ends)

March 9, 2014: The UN now plans to have AU (African Union) peacekeeping forces in CAR (Central African Republic) switch to UN control in September 2014. The AU force currently has around 6,000 soldiers. The UN is seeking an additional 6,000 soldiers from African nations, to bring the force to 12,000. Between 1,600 and 2,000 French soldiers are also deployed in the CAR.

March 9, 2014: The UN claimed that anti-balaka militias have driven Moslem tribespeople out of the western half of the Central African Republic. The UN accused the militias of religious cleansing. There are between 650,000 and 700,000 internally displaced people (refugees) inside the CAR. 230,000 of the IDPs are now in the capital, Bangui.

March 10, 2014: Burundi's troubles continue to mount. On March 8 members of the opposition Movement for Solidarity and Democracy held a rally in the capital, Bujumbura. Police broke up the demonstration and arrest over 20 opposition political activists. The government said it will charge the activists in insurrection (treason). Observers in Burundi claimed that this is the worst political crisis since the civil war ended.

March 12, 2014: Congolese Army and the UN's Intervention Brigade (IBDE) attacked a Democratic Forces for the Liberation of Rwanda (FDLR) rebel contingent in North Kivu province. The UN reported that an offensive against the FDLR had begun earlier this month. One UN unit is currently operating inside Congo's Virunga National Park. The UN force engaged an FDLR contingent on March 9 inside the park. Elements of the Malawi infantry battalion are now serving with the IBDE and are participating in the anti-FDLR offensive.

March 13, 2014: The Congolese government claimed that the Congolese Army and UN offensive against Ugandan rebels in the Allied Democratic Forces-National Army for the Liberation of Uganda (ADF-NALU) has been a major success. Congolese forces have seized the ADF's last major base in Congo, near the village of Saasita. Some ADF guerrillas have fled into the Virunga National Park.

A judge in France sentenced a former Rwandan senior intelligence officer to 25 years in prison on the charge of genocide. The court found Pascal Simbikangwa guilty of complicity in crimes against humanity and genocide. Simbikangwa directed intelligence operations for Rwandan president Juvenal Habyarimana. Who was an ethnic Hutu. He died in a plane crash in April 1994.

March 14, 2014: France accused the EU of failing to support peacekeeping efforts in the CAR. The EU had initially agreed to send a battalion (800 to 1,000) additional peacekeepers to the CAR. However, the French government said that the EU had failed to commit soldiers and provide equipment. France has slightly over 2,000 troops in the CAR. Another 400 will arrive in the next month.

March 15, 2014: There is no hard figure for the number of people killed in the Congo since 1997 when the Mobutu dictatorship collapsed. A recent published estimate said four million. Another said six million. Both figures are very large, but one figure is 50 percent larger than the other. One reason for the disparity is determining what constitutes death due to armed conflict. In 2002 observers reported that several thousand internally displaced people died of exposure as they fled combat near the town of Bunia (Ituri region, eastern Congo). They were not shot and killed, but disease, weather and exhaustion killed them. These people are indeed casualties of war and if they are included the higher loss figures become more reasonable estimates.

March 20, 2014: The Congolese Army, supported by UN units, continues to conduct operations against Democratic Forces for the Liberation of Rwanda (FDLR) guerrillas in North Kivu province. FDLR fighters have fled into Virunga National Park.

March 22, 2014: Observers in the CAR reported that anti-balaka militia attacks on Moslem tribespeople continue in and around the capital of Bangui. Moslems have sought the protection of international peacekeeping forces in Bangui.

March 23, 2014: The U.S. is reinforcing its special operations contingent which is aiding the Uganda-led hunt for LRA (Lord's Resistance Army) senior commander Joseph Kony. The U.S. currently deploys around 100 special operations troops which advise and support the hunt for Kony. The reinforcements include 150 U.S. Air Force special operations personnel and several CV-22 Osprey tilt rotor aircraft.

March 28, 2014: The UN Security Council extended MONU.S.CO's mandate to March 31, 2015. The peacekeeping operation is authorized 19,815 soldiers, 760 military observers, 391 armed policemen and 1,050 paramilitary policemen (police in formed police units).

March 29, 2014: Anti-balaka (anti-Moslem) militias in the CAR reportedly control the major roads leading to the capital, Bangui. Peacekeeping forces can move through the areas but when the peacekeepers leave the militias return. The UN estimates that it needs at least another 6,000 peacekeeping soldiers in the CAR.

April 1, 2014: The EU (European Union) confirmed that it will deploy the EUFOR RCA peacekeeping contingent to the Central African Republic (CAR).

The EU agreed in January to send the peacekeeping contingent and planned on deploying the force in late February. The EU failed to meet the February deployment date. The EUFOR RCA operation will be tasked with providing security in Bangui (CAR capital). The contingent will deploy 1,000 troops.

The Congolese government reported that the Kata Katanga (Bakata Katanga) guerrilla group is reorganizing in the Pweto-Mitwaba–Manono area of Katanga province. That region is known as the Triangle of Death. The guerrilla group wants Katanga to secede from the Congo.

April 2, 2014: The Rwandan government has begun a series of services and memorial events for the victims of the 1994 Rwandan genocide. Those mass murders began in April 1994.

April 3, 2014: Though the UN Security Council has extended MONU.S.CO's peacekeeping mandate for another year, the latest resolution (UNSCR 2147) makes it clear the MONU.S.CO must begin preparing for withdrawal. That’s right, the seemingly endless Congo peacekeeping operation which began in 1999 has now been ordered to formulate an exit strategy. The UN peacekeeping office made it clear that the withdrawal will be very gradual. Redeployment may not begin until late 2014 or early 2015. Moreover, the Intervention Brigade (IBDE) will still be tasked with conducting offensive operations (neutralization operations) against armed groups which refuse to lay down their arms.

April 26, 2014: ALJAZEERA News - Many dead in DR Congo stampede’

At least 14 dead following power failure at stadium during tribute festival for singer King Kester Emeneya.

A stampede at a crowded tribute festival for a popular music star has killed at least 14 people in the Democratic Republic of Congo. A power failure at a stadium in the town of Kikwit, organised to commemorate the life of popular local singer King Kester Emeneya, plunged the venue into darkness causing a crush, officials and witnesses said.

"The provisional toll, which we deeply regret, stands at 14 dead, including two policemen, and eight wounded," Camille Sesep, a spokesman for the provincial government of Bandundu told the AFP news agency. The provincial government blamed the "enthusiasm of the audience" for the deaths. Crowds had amassed in Emenya's hometown of Kikwit, 500km from the capital Kinshasha, to celebrate the memory of the popular singer who died earlier this year in Paris.

Thousands of people attended Emeneya's funeral in Kinshasa last month after he died from heart problems in his adopted home of France at the age of 57. King Kester Emeneya, whose given name was Emeneya Mubiala Kwamumbu, enjoyed a long career in music, with hundreds of songs to his name. Following the stampede, authorities cancelled the festival which was scheduled to last through Sunday.

April 3, 2014: Chad announced it will withdraw its 850 peacekeepers from the CAR. Chadian soldiers have been accused by Christian tribes in the CAR of supporting Moslem militias and the Seleka rebel movement. Chad is a Moslem nation. Chad's contingent served with the African Union's MISCA operation.

April 5, 2014: UN peacekeeping officers have told investigators that they believe Rwanda sent around 900 soldiers into Congo in August 2013. The Rwanda force supplied March 23 Movement (M23) guerrillas with weapons and ammunition. The Rwandan government continues to deny it provided M23 with any support. UN officers contend that the support provided by Rwanda in August 2013 gave M23 the ability to stall a UN-led attack. In October-November 2013 a second UN-Congolese Army offensive shattered M23.

April 9, 2014: Mai-Mai Kata Katanga separatist guerrillas attacked the village of Katende (southwest of the town of Pweto in Katanga province).

April 14, 2014: The Rwandan government arrested three people on charges of planning terror attacks in Rwanda and conducting other subversive activities. One man was a musician, one a radio commentator, and the third was also a former Hutu guerrilla fighter who had gone through the demobilization program. Government officials claimed that police had seized a stash of hand grenades during one of the arrests.

April 17, 2014: Burundi expelled a senior UN official after the UN Mission in Burundi (BNUB) charged that the government was providing the youth wing (youth league) of its party with weapons. In the past the government has used the youth wing as a street militia to threaten and attack political opponents.

April 21, 2014: The Ugandan military claimed that it has evidence that Jamil Mukulu, the senior commander of the Allied Democratic Forces-National Army for the Liberation of Uganda (ADF-NALU) has fled from his fortified headquarters camp in the eastern Congo. UN peacekeepers, including elements of the Intervention Brigade, supported a Congolese Army offensive against the ADF-NALU. The offensive began in March and continued through mid-April. The offensive destroyed seven ADF-NALU bases in Congo's Virunga National Park. The ADF headquarters camp in Medina proved to be a five-square kilometer facility with bunkers, underground storage sites for weapons and supplies, and numerous observation posts. Fighting in the Medina area was particularly intense. Resistance was reported as late as April 16.

April 22, 2014: A coalition unit of African soldiers operating in the CAR captured a low-level Lord's Resistance Army (LRA) leader. The unit also rescued 10 people the LRA band had kidnapped. The captured LRA officer was identified as a lieutenant. He was captured after a firefight between his band and the anti-LRA troops. Uganda is the lead nation in the anti-LRA coalition. The U.S. military recently reinforced its anti-LRA contingent. Around 250 American personnel are currently engaged in the anti-LRA operation. The U.S. also committed four CV-22 Osprey tilt-rotor aircraft, two C-130 transports and two KC-135 tankers to the anti-LRA effort.

April 23, 2014: MONUSCO announced that it will provide financial assistance, logistical support and technical assistance in Congo's upcoming elections. The UN does not want a repeat of the violence which occurred during the November 2011 presidential election when 41 people were killed and over 700 were injured.

April 25, 2014: Former members of the Seleka rebel movement in the CAR demanded that the country be partitioned into Christian and Moslem areas. Hard-core guerrillas in Seleka were from predominantly Moslem tribes in the northern CAR. The Seleka group advocating partition is based in the town of Bambari (north central CAR). Bambari has become a sanctuary for Moslems displaced in the south. The group wants to call the new country the Republic of Northern Central Africa. However, several Christian tribes also live in the north. They oppose partition. These tribes also claim that Chad and Sudan are pushing partition because they would be able to control the new country. Partition would require mass population displacement. Several thousand Moslem tribals live in the capital, Bangui, particularly in an area known as PK-5. Moslems accused Christian militias of trying to drive them out of Bangui. The CAR has a population of 4.7 million people. Around 80 to 85 percent of the people are Christians or animists.

April 27, 2014: The CAR government reported that anti-balaka militia groups have trapped around 10,000 Moslems in the town of Boda (southern CAR).

April 28, 2014: Conflict between Christian and Moslem tribes in the Central African Republic (CAR) continues. A convoy of 18 trucks organized by the CAR government and protected by African soldiers serving with the MISCA peacekeeping operation moved an estimated 1,300 Moslems from a refugee camp near the capital, Bangui, to a safe-zone in northern CAR. The Moslems feared attacks by Christian anti-balaka (machete) militias.

April 29, 2014: The UN Security Council has directed MONUSCO (United Nations Organization Stabilization Mission in Congo) civilian administrators and staff to prepare to end the mission next year and transition into a much smaller support, training and governmental advisory operation. The number of military personnel and police committed to that future operation has yet to be determined.

May 3, 2014: The Rwandan Hutu rebel group, the Democratic Forces for the Liberation of Congo (FDLR), continues to operate in the eastern Congo's North Kivu province. Identifying FDLR fighters can be difficult. However, Congolese have given the UN a tip. The locals claim the FDLR fighters prefer to wear gum boots (gum rubber boots). FDLR fighters also tend to carry pangas (a long knife). The UN also noted that local officials in Katanga province believe that on April 5 FDLR fighters participated in an attack on a convoy near the town of Kabulo in Katanga's Kalemie territory. FDLR men are adopting this stealthy demeanor to avoid retribution from the growing number of militias and regular troops looking for them.

May 4, 2014: The U.S. told Congo that it must respect constitutional term limits imposed on the president. The U.S. made that statement after supporters of Congolese president Joseph Kabila suggested he would run for a third term.

May 5, 2014: The medical NGO, Doctors Without Borders, has suspended major clinic operations for at least one week in the Central African Republic (CAR). The organization will continue to provide emergency care. Doctors Without Borders said it is taking the action because the CAR government has failed to condemn and take appropriate security measures after 16 people were killed at the clinic in the town of Boguila (northern CAR) on April 26. At the moment the government claims the attack was an armed robbery. Doctors Without Borders blames the attack on rebel Seleka fighters (ie, Muslim Seleka fighters) who have regrouped in northern CAR.

May 6, 2014: UN criticized the ruling of a Congolese court which only convicted two soldiers of rape while releasing 13 senior officers. During November 2012 at least 97 women and 33 girls were raped in the town of Minova (eastern Congo).

May 7, 2014: The UN reported that the Ugandan rebel Lords resistance Army (LRA) conducted 65 attacks during the first three months of 2014. The attacks occurred in the Congo and Central African Republic. The UN also claimed that Joseph Kony, the LRA's senior commander, is now hiding in the Kafia Kingi region of South Sudan. The Kafia Kingi enclave is disputed territory and is currently occupied by Sudanese security forces (Khartoum). Kafia Kingi is adjacent to Sudan's South Darfur state. Sudan rejected the UN accusation. Meanwhile, the African Union Regional Task Force (AURTF) continues to conduct anti-LRA operations in South Sudan, the CAR and Congo. African nations have committed 5,000 soldiers to the task force. The Ugandan Army (supported by American Special Forces) continues to lead the overall operation. UN peacekeepers in the Congo also provide the AURTF with support and intelligence. AU and UN officials believe that several LRA regulars have moved into the CAR's chaotic north-eastern area.

Seleka rebels in the Central African Republic (CAR) announced that they have a new senior commander, General Joseph Zindeko. Around 500 Seleka fighters met in the town of Ndele (northern CAR) and selected Zindeko. Seleka have also been seen reorganizing near the town of Bambari (central CAR area). Seleka has said that it intends to resist Christian anti-balaka militias.

May 10, 2014: The government of Sudan (Khartoum) accused Uganda to supporting Sudanese rebel organizations, particularly the Sudanese Revolutionary Front (SRF). The SRF is an umbrella organization which includes the Justice and Equality Movement (JEM). Uganda denied the accusation. Uganda counter-claimed that Sudan has renewed its support for the Lords Resistance Army (LRA).

May 11, 2014: A wanted former Congo rebel leader was killed in the Republic of Congo (Brazzaville). Udjani Mangbama at one time commanded a rebel Congolese militia in Equateur province. He had been convicted of crimes against humanity in absentia. Republic of Congo security police reported that a small force of rebels or bandits attacked a police checkpoint near the village of Owando (500 kilometers north of Brazzaville) after the men refused to identify themselves. Four policemen were killed along with Mangbama seven other attackers.

May 13, 2014: The Uganda-led African Union Regional Task Force (AURTF) is intensifying operations against Lord's Resistance Army (LRA) remnants in the Central African Republic (CAR). Despite numerous recent reports that LRA senior commander Joseph Kony is holed up in the Sudan-occupied Kafia Kingi region of South Sudan, the AURTF is concentrating on the CAR because it believes a majority of the LRA's fighters are there.

The UN estimates that the LRA still has a force of 500 people. However, that figure likely includes abducted women and children who serve as slaves (food and weapons bearers).

May 14, 2014: There is another wave of reports of elephant poaching occurring in Congo's Garamba National park. Park rangers estimate that 33 elephants have been killed in the park since late March 2014. The Ugandan rebel Lords Resistance Army (LRA) is on the short list of suspects. The LRA trades elephant ivory and meat for supplies.

May 14, 2014: Security in Congo's mineral-rich Katanga province continues to deteriorate. Earlier this year UN observers warned that militia attacks in Katanga were increasing in number and intensity. Since January Katanga has endured at least 35 Mai-Mai militia attacks. Attackers pillaged and burned several villages. Most of the attacks took place in the Kalemie, Manono, Mitaba, Pweto, and Moba regions.

May 15, 2014: Earlier this month M23 rebels who fled to Uganda agreed to accept the Congolese government's amnesty proposal. So far some 1,300 former M23 rebels have signed the amnesty documents. By accepting amnesty, the rebels agree to never again fight against the Congolese government. The former rebels are being held in a Ugandan military camp.

May 16, 2014: South Africa reported that its forces serving with the UN Intervention Brigade in eastern Congo are bivouacked on Triple Tower Mountain near the village of Kibati (North Kivu province). Army units are also in the area. South African and Tanzanian officers in the IBDE said that there is a lull in the fighting in the area.

May 20, 2014: A group of former Seleka rebels in the Central African Republic (CAR) declared that it has successfully reorganized. The group claimed that it has a new chain of command and that it is now taking control of rogue bands of former Seleka fighters.

May 21, 2014: The UN and the government have launched another rebel disarmament campaign. The campaign intends to either disband or eradicate some 54 militias which continue to operate in Congo. International donors have promised to provide around $200 million for the program. The program is the Congo's third major disarmament, demobilization and reintegration (DDR) program. The first two failed. On May 15 the U.S. announced that it will increase funding support for demobilization programs in Congo. Presumably the other funding will come from the European Union.

May 22, 2014: Responding to growing complaints of UN peacekeepers refusing to protect threatened (by bandits, rebels or terrorists) civilians the UN did a study of the issue and found that in 80 percent of 507 situations where UN peacekeepers were authorized to use force to protect civilians from these attacks the peacekeepers refused to act. This was just for activity between 2010 and 2013 and the problem goes back much further than that. Pressure to change this falls on the nations responsible to contributing most of the $8 billion a year peacekeeping budget (United States, Japan, France, Germany, United Kingdom, China, Italy, Russia, Canada and Spain) and the nations contributing most of the peacekeepers (India, Bangladesh, Pakistan, Ethiopia, and Rwanda). The latter nations complain that they did not contribute troops to engage in the level of fighting (and casualties) that would be required to respond to every request to protect civilians. This would be considered peacemaking, not peacekeeping and the UN has recognized the problem by calling on nations to contribute troops expressly for fighting.

In Congo the UN recently formed a combat brigade for explicitly aggressive combat operations, but most nations that contribute peacekeeping troops expect their soldiers to carry out relatively low-risk duties. The UN is often at fault when it orders civilians to be protected and ignoring the fact that the UN member nations providing troops had ordered their commanders in the area to limit the danger their soldiers would be exposed to. There is now pressure on the UN to get nations contributing peacekeepers to allow their soldiers to more frequently use force to protect civilians. This will make it harder (or more expensive) to get peacekeepers. It is already difficult to recruit the number of peacekeepers that are needed.

May 23, 2014: The International Court of Justice convicted former Congolese militia leader Germain Katanga on charges of war crimes and crimes against humanity and four war crimes. The war crimes charges included pillaging. He was not directly tied to a specific murder but he did procure weapons which his militia used to massacre villagers in northeastern Congo. He will serve twelve years in prison.

May 24, 2014: French peacekeepers in the CAR fought with a group of former Seleka militants near the town of Bambari (northeastern CAR).

In the Central African Republic (CAR) government leaders insist that illegal militias and armed groups are attempting to destabilize the government. Cited were two recent attacks, one in which two Burundian peacekeepers were shot and killed as they tried to stop a riot. The other incident was bloodier. On May 28 a group of Moslem gunmen attacked a Christian church in Bangui (the CAR capital) killing 17 people and kidnapped another 27.

May 29, 2014: The army announced that its forces had, over the last four days, driven a group of Ugandan Allied Democratic Force (ADF) rebels from the villages Lesse and Abya (North Kivu province). The soldiers killed 64 ADF fighters and captured one while suffering five wounded. The army also seized several large caches of weapons and ammunition. Apparently elements of the UN Intervention Brigade (IBDE) were involved in the operation. One reason to believe this is the huge disparity in casualties (64 ADF dead, no Congolese dead). Someone is procuring very accurate tactical intelligence and someone is applying very effective firepower. That is more typical of the IBDE.

May 30, 2014: Over 100 guerrillas belonging to the FDLR agreed to surrender. The group met with UN and army personnel in North Kivu province and disarmed.

May 31, 2014: The army continues to pursue Allied Democratic Forces (ADF) rebels in North Kivu province. ADF fighters have fled into Virunga National Park. Army units, with UN support, are also pursuing a Mai-Mai militia force operating in the area. The national park's jungles and rugged terrain provide a refuge for several defeated militias. In early May, an army unit, supported by a Malawian detachment in the UN Intervention Brigade (IBDE) killed two FDLR fighters in Virunga National Park.

June 1, 2014: The UN has placed 105 Democratic Forces for the Liberation of Rwanda (FDLR) rebels who surrendered in late May in a camp in in the town of Kanyabayonga (North Kivu province). All of the men who surrendered are ethnic Hutus. A spokesman for the group has asked the Rwandan government to negotiate with them about terms for returning to Rwanda. The fighters now have families in Congo and they want to bring their families to Rwanda. The leaders who founded the FDLR were involved in the 1994 Rwandan genocide. The UN estimates that another 1,400 FDLR rebels remain in Congo.

June 2, 2014: The Congolese government is being accused of killing at least 300 people in retaliation for attacks by a sectarian Katangan opposition group (Ministry for Restoration of Black Africa or MRAN). In December 2013 supporters of MRAN's leader, Joseph Mukungubila Mutombo (also known as The Eternal Prophet), launched several coordinated attacks in Congo's capital, Kinshasha. The attackers struck the airport, a military barrack and seized a state TV station. The government denied that it has killed members of Mukungubila's group. However, European investigators have evidence that between 200 and 250 Mukungubila supporters (mostly civilians) were killed by government forces in Katanga province. Another 70 have been killed in Kinshasha. The government has denied the charges and says they are completely false. Mukungubila was a candidate for president in the 2006 election.

Burundi and Georgia have both announced that they will send more peacekeepers to the CAR. This will include a Georgian infantry company (140 soldiers) while Burundi said that it is prepared to deploy another battalion of 450 soldiers plus 280 additional police officers. The Burundian forces will serve with the MISCA peacekeeping contingent. The UN plans to take over the MISCA operation in September 2014.

The Congo government once again accused Rwanda of harboring M23 rebel commanders who are wanted for war crimes. Rwanda has denied the charge.

June 5, 2014: Uganda claims that the civil war in South Sudan is causing a decline in Uganda's GDP growth rate by .1 (one-tenth) of a percent, dropping it from 5.8 percent (2013 growth rate) to 5.7 percent this year.

June 6, 2014: Over 250 prisoners escaped from a Congolese jail in Bukavu (capital, South Kivu province) after prisoners overpowered a guard. Three people were killed in the prison break.

June 8, 2014: The UN is reinforcing South Kivu province after group of men raided a village and killed 38 people and left another 15 wounded. On June 7 a group armed with guns and knives attacked the Bafuliru tribal village of Mutarule (50 kilometers south of the capital, Bukavu). The South Kivu provincial government said that it believes cattle rustling precipitated the assault on the village. Members of the Barundi-Banyamulenge tribe and the Bafuliru tribe in the area are involved in a violent dispute over cattle ownership.

June 9, 2014: Peacekeepers in CAR reported limited success in a voluntary disarmament operation in Bangui. In the capital's PK-5 district (regarded as a Moslem neighborhood), peacekeepers collected 69 grenades, 15 guns and 200 assorted munitions. They also collected 13 bows and 62 arrows. In Boy-rabe (Christian area) the peacekeepers collected three mortars, three grenades, three rockets and “several dozen” assorted munitions.

Several days of on and off fighting in the CAR between Moslem militiamen and a group of Christian tribesmen left 23 dead. The fighting occurred around the town of Bambari and the village of Liwa. Bambari is in central CAR and Liwa is about ten kilometers away. Moslem militiamen claimed that Christians killed two Moslem men in Liwa. Militiamen responded by attacking Christians in Liwa and Bambari with grenades. The militiamen then burned over 100 homes.

June 11, 2014: Congolese and Rwandan government officials accused each other of ordering their militaries to launch cross-border attacks. The accusations were made after Congo claimed that a Rwandan Army unit crossed the border into North Kivu province and kidnapped a Congolese soldier. Both countries said that their militaries had fired across the border and the shooting escalated form light infantry weapons to heavy weapons. The shooting began in the early morning hours and ended by 8 AM local time.

Central African Republic (CAR) wants the International Criminal Court (ICC) to investigate crimes committed since 2012 during outbreaks of inter-communal violence in her country. CAR wants the ICC to investigate crimes committed by Seleka rebels (who are predominantly Moslem) and Christian self-defense militias (anti-balaka militias).

June 12, 2014: Congolese Army and Rwandan Army units fired at one another across their border. The gunfire included mortar fire and an exchange of heavy artillery (this usually means tube artillery). The artillery exchange occurred in an area some 18 kilometers north of Goma (capital of Congo's North Kivu province).

June 13, 2014: Congolese Army and Rwandan Army soldiers once again exchanged gunfire. This is the third straight day of reports of hostile fire. The exchanges included rockets. Observers claimed that they heard artillery and heavy machine guns. The Congolese government claimed that it has ordered Congolese units in the area to exercise restraint.

June 15, 2014: The Congolese government claimed that around 200 militiamen in the Democratic Forces for the Liberations of Rwanda (FDLR) rebel group have voluntarily disarmed. Based on current estimates, 200 fighters is around 15 percent of the FDLR's total strength (1,400 to 1,500 militiamen). The disarmed militiamen are now in UN-run camps in eastern Congo. The main camp is located in Kanyabayonga (North Kivu province). UN observers reported that most of the fighters in the camp are less than 20 years old, which means they were born after the Rwandan genocide of 1994. The FDLR was founded by Rwandan Hutus who orchestrated and participated in the genocide.

June 17, 2014: Is the UN's Congo Intervention Brigade (IBDE) going regional? Earlier this month the UN Organization Stabilization Mission in Congo (MONUSCO) signed an agreement with the International Conference on the Great Lakes Region (ICGLR) to create links between MONUSCO, the IBDE and various ICGLR security mechanisms. The ICGLR includes Angola, Burundi, the Central African Republic (CAR), Republic of Congo (Brazzaville), Congo (Democratic Republic of Congo), Kenya, Uganda, Rwanda, South Sudan, Sudan, Tanzania and Zambia.

June 18, 2014: Is this another attempt to become a "president for life?" Probably. Burundian opposition groups are objecting to government attempts to change the constitution before the upcoming national elections. The government wants to let President Pierre Nkurunziza run for a third term. Nkurunziza's opponents are arguing that changing the constitution amounts to declaring a dictatorship.

June 19, 2014: The Bakata Katanga militia claimed that sometime in July 2014 it will proclaim the independence of Congo's Katanga province. A spokesman said that the militia will make the proclamation in the city of Lubumbashi (Katanga's provincial capital).

June 20, 2014: Rwandan is accusing Congo of starting the series of border skirmishes that began on June 11 and continued until June 13. In turn, the Congolese government accused Rwanda of starting the firefights.

June 22, 2014: The UN is continuing to investigate the border skirmishes that occurred June 12 and June 13 along the Congo-Rwanda border. UN observers reported that the Rwanda-Congo border remains “tense.” Congolese troops remain on alert. Civilian observers reported seeing three Congolese Army armored vehicles in the area north of Goma where the border skirmishes occurred.

June 24, 2014: Between 50 and 60 people were killed in fighting between Christian and Muslim tribesmen near the town of Bambari (central CAR, 370 kilometers northwest of Bangui). At least 22 people were killed in the village of Liwa (seven kilometers from Bambari). Clashes continued for two days in and around Bambari.

Rwanda and Congo confirmed that in mid-June they both sent teams to participate with a UN-sponsored Joint Verification Mission (JVM). The JVM is tasked with conducting observation missions and investigating violent incidents in the region. JVM is investigating the June 12 and June 13 border skirmishes between Rwanda and Congo.

June 25, 2014: Opposition party leaders in Uganda warned Ugandan president Yoweri Museveni to stop using the Ugandan Army to intimidate his political opponents. The FDC (Forum for Democratic Change) opposes Museveni. It is currently led by a retired Ugandan Army general, Mugisha Muntu who has accused Museveni of misusing government security forces.

June 27, 2014: Seleka rebels and several Christian anti-balaka militias in the CAR have agreed to form a joint committee to conduct peace negotiations. The conflict resolution organization PARETO will sponsor the negotiations. The objective is to move from local agreement to national reconciliation.

June 28, 2014: Rwanda has accused UN peacekeepers in Congo of letting a senior FDLR (Democratic Forces for the Liberation of Rwanda) leader illegally travel to Italy. FDLR leader Rumuli Michel visited Italy on a travel permit issued in June 2014 by Herve Ladsous, a senior official in the UN's peacekeeping operations office in New York. Rwanda asserted that this is a violation of UN sanctions.

June 30, 2014: Uganda announced that it is ready to commit a battalion of soldiers to a regional rapid intervention force. The official name of the intervention force would be the Eastern African Standby Force. The Ugandan military said the unit would have 736 soldiers. Rwanda indicated that it is considering committing a motorized infantry battalion to the force. The Rwandan unit would have 850 combat soldiers and 35 medical personnel.

July 2, 2014: Critics are describing the UN and African Union peacekeeping effort in the Central African Republic (CAR) as ineffective and too little too late. The numbers make the critics' case. Over 600,000 people in the CAR are refugees (displaced people); 1.7 to 1.8 million people confront food shortages. However, the criticisms also sound very familiar. Almost every UN and international peacekeeping operation the central Africa (the region) draws the same complaints. Central Africa is a difficult place in which to operate. Military units and aid organizations confront numerous logistics problems. There are few all-weather roads. There are few all-weather airfields. Keeping several thousand soldiers in the field is also expensive.

July 3, 2014: Citing recent attacks on UN peacekeepers serving in the Congo, the UN Security Council has sanctioned the ADF-NALU (Allied Democratic Forces-National Army for the Liberation of Uganda) rebel militia. The sanctions include bans on travel by ADF leaders and supporters and denying the ADF access to its financial assets (asset freeze). Like other rebel groups in the eastern Congo, the ADF occasionally manages to sell valuable minerals (including gold) to illicit dealers. The ADF is a Ugandan rebel organization with Islamist links. It has base camps in the eastern Congo (North Kivu province). Within the last year the Congolese Army and UN Mission in Congo (MONUSCO) peacekeepers have attacked and over-run several ADF camps, including a training facility. The UN's Intervention brigade (IBDE) has participated in at least one of these anti-ADF operations. MONUSCO estimates that the ADF still has 1,200 and 1,500 militia fighters.

July 4, 2014: Several central African governments have told the Rwandan Hutu Democratic Forces for the Liberation of Rwanda (FDLR) that they will suspend anti-FDLR military operations for six months if the rebels agree to surrender peacefully. MONUSCO is involved in the initiative. The Angolan government is playing a major role in the effort. Hutu radicals involved in the 1994 genocide founded the FDLR. The UN's Intervention Brigade has conducted anti-FDLR operations in the Congo. The UN estimates that the FDLR still has 1,300 fighters in the bush. Some 200 FDLR fighters have surrendered since late 2013. A decade ago the FDLR claimed it had 25,000 fighters.

July 4, 2014: ION - Congo-K finally makes it back into EITI, DRC can at last breathe a sigh of relief. After long months of silence, the board of the Extractive Industries Transparency Initiative that was meeting in Mexico City on July 1-2 gave Kinshasa the green light to become a full member of the organization after standing outside the door since 2010.

July 5, 2014: An unidentified group armed with guns, machetes and spears attacked two police stations and a military garrison in the towns of Kasese, Ntoroko and Bundibugyo (western Uganda) killing at least 17 people. Ugandan security forces killed around 40 of the gunmen. The government said the attacks were coordinated.

July 8, 2014: Uganda said that a complicated dispute involving the Bakonzo tribe sparked the July 5 attacks in the Rwenzori region (western Uganda). The government first feared that Allied Democratic Forces (ADF-NALU) Islamist rebels launched the attack. The attackers belonged to the Obusinga bwa Rwenzururu, a radical Bakonzo movement. The Bakonzo radicals had been fighting with members of the neighboring Bamba tribe. Since July 5, the Ugandan Army and police have killed a total of 60 attackers. The military garrison is near one of Uganda's oil fields. Uganda intends to begin daily oil production in 2017. The Ugandan Army has reinforced Rwenzori.

July 9, 2014: Opposition political groups in Burundi are opposing a constitutional change being pushed by President Pierre Nkurunziza, who is a Hutu. His opponents claim that the changes he proposes will permanently entrench Hutu power – with Nkurunziza as the entrenched leader. Nkurunziza intends to run for a third term in the 2015 national elections.

July 12, 2014: Michel Djotodia is once again head of the CAR's Seleka rebel movement. Djotodia was reinstated as senior commander at a meeting held in the northern CAR town of Birao. Djotodia helped found the Seleka movement and was senior commander when Seleka seized power in 2013. He served as president then stepped down in January 2014 after his administration failed to stop the violent anarchy throughout the country. Christian tribes also accused him of favoring Muslim tribes. The anti-balaka militias formed to resist attacks by Seleka rebels. Djotodia claimed that he lost control of some of the most extreme Seleka groups. Djotodia has been in exile in Benin.

July 21, 2014: The CAR's interim president asked Christian "anti-balaka" (anti-machete) militias and the Muslim Seleka rebel movement to agree to a new ceasefire. The Republic of Congo (Brazzaville) has agreed to mediate for this. The Republic of Congo has invited various Christian factions and Seleka (which is also highly factionalized) to meet in Brazzaville and discuss ways to halt hostilities. Currently, 8,000 international peacekeeping troops are deployed in the CAR. The French contingent has been reduced slightly, to around 2,000 soldiers.

July 22, 2014: A group of 20 armed men attacked the Congolese Army's Colonel Tshatshi headquarters base in the national capital, Kinshasha. Though the Congolese military responded by sending several tanks, witnesses reported the firefight lasted 20 minutes. The military said that soldiers from the Presidential Guard killed eight of the attackers. One government report described the attackers as civilians. The Colonel Tshatshi Military Camp was attacked in December 2013 by followers of mystic political Gideon Mukungubila (Paul Joseph Mukungubila Mutumbo). Gideon Mukungubila's movement is based in Katanga province.

July 25, 2014: The Ugandan government is investigating reports of mass graves found in western Uganda. Allegedly, the graves contain the bodies of people killed in a recent spate of tribal violence between Bakonzo tribal radicals and the Bamba tribe. Police found five bodies in a grave in the Bundibugyo district. Four more were discovered nearby.

July 28, 2014: MONUSCO peacekeepers and the Congolese Army are conducting a joint offensive in North Kivu province. Elements of the Intervention Brigade are involved. The operation is targeting two armed groups: the Cheka Mai Mai and the Alliance for the Sovereign and Patriotic Congo (APCLH) militias. Despite the fancy name, the APCLH is a Mai Mai militia. The Cheka operates in the Walikale area. The APCLH has bases in the Masisi area. Both areas have numerous mineral deposits and mines. MONUSCO peacekeepers are clearing the road from the village of Pofi to Kashebere. This road eventually leads to the provincial capital, Goma. That could indicate several things, obviously that MONUSCO intends to use the road. But it also suggests that MONUSCO is going after a Cheka finance operation. Militias frequently set up roadblocks and collect tolls (such extortion is popular with irregular forces) in the form of either money or goods. The UN reported that the Congolese forces participating in the operation had occupied Angoa (another mining area).

July 29, 2014: The hunt for Ugandan Lords Resistance Army (LRA) senior commander Joseph Kony continues and the focus remains on the Central African Republic. However, the Ugandan military is complaining that Seleka rebels are hindering anti-LRA operations. Uganda is conducting two different operations in the CAR: the anti-LRA counter-insurgency sweeps and peacekeeping missions. The UN recently asked Uganda to provide soldiers for the expanded peacekeeping effort in the CAR the UN will deploy later this year. The UN Multidimensional Integrated Stabilization Mission in the CAR (MINUSCA) is authorized 12,000 peacekeepers. 2,000 Ugandans already serve with the African Union peacekeeping force in the CAR. The UN requested Uganda deploy an additional 850-man battalion in the northern CAR (likely the Chad border). The Ugandan government however, has objected to sending its soldiers north. Ugandan forces currently operating in the CAR focus on the south-east, east and central areas. The south-east is where the small LRA bands primarily operate. Uganda regularly sends “hunter patrols” into the area.

July 31, 2014: The UN continues to be pleased with the performance of the Intervention Brigade’s (IBDE) added to their peacekeeping force. In March 2013 the IBDE was given a controversial operational mandate: neutralize armed groups. To accomplish that mission the IBDE was authorized to conduct offensive operations. Three African nations supplied the troops: Tanzania, South Africa and Malawi. It took the UN longer than anticipated to build and deploy the brigade. The brigade began operations in July 2013, without the participation of its Malawi contingent. The Malawi battalion arrived in late October 2013. In October and early November 2013 the IBDE and Congolese Army Rapid Reaction Units (ie, better trained and equipped Congolese Army units) quickly defeated the M23 guerrilla group in eastern Congo. The IBDE is authorized 3,069 soldiers in its three infantry battalions, artillery battery, reconnaissance company and special forces company. The IBDE has also employed South African Rooivalk attack helicopters in its operations.

August 1, 2014: Today marks the eighth anniversary of the signing of Angola's Memorandum of Understanding for Peace and National Reconciliation. The Memorandum dealt with the separatist movement in Angola's northern Cabinda Province. The government signed the Memorandum with the Cabinda Forum for Dialogue (FCD). The agreement gave the Exclave of Cabinda a special status within Angola. It also called for the demobilization of FCD rebel fighters. The agreement did not end the insurgency. Angola kept the province under military control. The Front for the Liberation of the Enclave of Cabinda (FLEC) has continued to wage a very low-level rebellion.

August 2, 2014: UN observers in the CAR report that civilians continue to get killed in fighting between armed militias. At least 26 civilians were killed in the crossfire when an armed group attacked the village of Batangafo (Ouham prefecture area).

August 4, 2014: The government announced that Congolese Army units and UN peacekeepers have freed over 300 Congolese civilians who had been abducted by the Ugandan rebels belonging to the ADF-NALU.

August 5, 2014: Congolese security forces and police arrested a senior opposition political leader after he took part in a demonstration opposing an extension of presidential term limits. Jean-Bertrand Ewanga is the general secretary of the Union for the Congolese Nation (UNC) political party. He serves in parliament. He was arrested in Kinshasha. Ewanga contends that President Joseph Kabila intends to retain power in violation of the law.

August 6, 2014: A human rights organization and observers in the UN monitoring office in Burundi have accused the ruling party, the National Council for the Defense of Democracy-Forces for the Defense of Democracy (CNDD-FDD), of conducting a campaign of intimidation (ie, violent intimidation) against opposition parties and government critics. The CNDD-FDD’s youth wing, the Imbonerakure, are largely responsible for the violence.

August 9, 2014: The Congolese Army (FARDC) and MONUSCO peacekeepers have launched the next phase of their Iron Shield offensive operation in Ituri province. The offensive is targeting the Ituri Patriotic Resistance Front militias (FRPI) and the Ugandan rebel Alliance of Democratic Forces (ADF-NALU) rebels in Ituri province. ADF-NALU is a predominantly Muslim rebel movement. On August 8 Congolese soldiers captured four FRPI militiamen and freed a captured Congolese soldier.

August 10, 2014: Mahamat Kamoun has become the Central African Republic's prime minister. He is the first Muslim to hold the office. The government is attempting to create a multi-sectarian front in order to end the Muslim versus Christian violence.

August 12, 2014: The UN estimated 527,000 people are internally displaced within the CAR. Around 100,000 of the displaced are in the capital, Bangui.

August 18, 2014: UN officials warned that offensive action by the Congolese Army and UN peacekeepers against the Rwandan rebel FDLR is increasingly likely. One UN officials said that certain FDLR factions have refused to disarm. These factions deploy around 1,500 fighters. When the UN offered a limited amnesty earlier this year, 186 FDLR fighters and 430 dependents accepted the deal.

August 19, 2014: UN observers in Congo reported that Pygmy tribe militiamen attacked and burned several Bantu villages in the Luba area of Katanga province between August 10 and 12. A Pygmy tribe militia led by Mubone Mbuyu claimed that the attacks were reprisals for atrocities committed against Pygmies. The Pygmies claimed that militiamen in a Bakata-Katanga militia (a separatist movement in Katanga) attacked their village at Kasinge on August 7. Three men were murdered and the village was burned. In the past the Bakata-Katanga have attacked Pygmy villages and refugee centers. The Katangan separatists and a Pygmy militia fought in May 2014. Pygmies, because of their short stature, have long been persecuted and tend to live by themselves deep in the jungle. There they acquired a reputation of being experts in getting around the bush and as hunters. The wide availability of cheap firearms since the 1990s has evened the combat odds and the Pygmies are now able and inclined to shoot back when attacked. Pygmy's short stature (150cm/under five feet for adult males) is believed to be an ancient genetic adaptation to life in the tropical rain forests of Central Africa. There are believed to be half a million Pygmies living in Congo, less than one percent of the Congo population.

August 20, 2014: The UN and Rwanda are arguing over the number of Rwandan refugees still in the Democratic Republic of Congo and what to do about them. Rwanda claims it has access to a secret MONUSCO report that says 153,000 Rwandans (overwhelmingly Hutu) are in the Congo and that 120,000 of these Rwandan Hutus are under the control of the Democratic Forces for the Liberation of Rwanda (FDLR) militia.

August 26, 2014: UN ordered MONUSCO peacekeepers to conduct a joint operation against the Rwandan Hutu rebel Democratic Forces for the Liberation of Rwanda (FDLR) militia. The FDLR was founded by members of the Hutu regime which conducted the 1994 genocide.

August 27, 2014: the UN Mission for the Stabilization of peace in the DRC (MONUSCO) estimated the over 500,000 displaced people have collected in Congo's Katanga province. The displaced people are living in terrible conditions and are suffering from disease and malnutrition. The displaced have exacerbated tribal tensions and are one of the reasons Bantus and Pygmies have been fighting in northern Katanga.

August 30, 2014: Work has begun on a movie about a Congo peacekeeping operation in 1961. The movies focuses on an Irish unit (A Company, 35th Battalion) which experienced extensive combat. The UN's current Intervention Brigade IBDE) may be the first UN peacekeeping unit to be given an offensive mandate but it is far from the first peacekeeping unit to engage in heavy give and take combat. “A Company” was involved in a major action in Jadotville (now Likasi, Katanga province) in September 1961. On September 13, around 3,000 Katangan separatist militiamen attacked the Irish and besieged the town. The 154 Irish peacekeepers held out for six days. When they ran out of ammo and supplies, they were forced to surrender. They were held as prisoners for a month, then repatriated. Irish peacekeepers were not always so fortunate. Baluba tribe warriors killed nine Irish peacekeepers in the Congo in November 1960 and were described as having been mutilated.

September 1, 2014: The government and UN both stated that the Rwandan Hutu Democratic Forces for the Liberation of Rwanda (FDLR) is failing to disarm and demobilize. In mid-August the UN said that it is prepared to use the MONUSCO’s Intervention Brigade (IBDE) to neutralize (destroy) FDLR cadres operating inside Congo.

September 3, 2014: The government appointed Brigadier General Emmanuel Lombe to command Congolese Army (FARDC) operations against rebel groups in North Kivu province (eastern Congo). Lombe will command units involved in Operation Sokola which are focusing on the Ugandan rebel Allied Democratic Forces (ADF) militia. Lombe replaces General Lucien Ambamba Bahuma who died of a stroke August 30. UN military officers serving with MONUSCO peacekeeping units thought highly of Bahuma’s military skills. Bahuma had improved Congolese Army unit training in North Kivu.

September 9, 2014: In late August at least twelve individuals kidnapped by a Lords Resistance Army band operating in Congo managed to escape their captors. Reports like these tend to have a lag time of a week to a couple of months. The escapees have to flee and seek help. In this case the escapees said the LRA band got in a firefight with a Congolese security force and they escaped during the clash.

September 10, 2014: The number of cases of ebola virus in Congo are increasing. The World Health Organization reported that Congo had 62 confirmed cases in one area in the west, near Republic of Congo-Brazzaville. However, the figure is very tenuous. Confirmed means confirmed by knowledgeable medical personnel. No one knows many people may be infected.

September 11, 2014: A court in the Republic of Congo (Brazzaville) convicted a former senior intelligence officer of attempting a coup d'etat. His punishment will be hard labor for life. The case of Colonel Marcel Ntsourou has stirred a great deal of interest throughout central Africa. In 2012 a fire at an arms depot produced a huge explosion which destroyed several blocks of Brazzaville and killed over 100 people. The government later claimed that the fire and explosion were supposed to provide a distraction for a coup. The coup did not occur. However in 2013, when police arrived at Ntsourou's fortified home to search the premises, Ntsourou and his supporters fired back. At least 35 people died in the firefight (some sources report up to 50).

September 13, 2014: Ugandan security forces claimed that they have stopped a terrorist attack by the Somali Islamist Al Shabaab terror group. Ugandan security officials said that Al Shabaab terror cell intended to attack the U.S. embassy in Kampala, Uganda.

September 16, 2014:The Mai Mai Kifuafua militia asked the government to commit to protecting civilians and villages in the territory the militia currently controls. A senior Mai Mai Kifuafua commander told the government and UN that some 2,800 militiamen are prepared to disarm if they are assured that the Congolese Army will protect the Walekale region from attacks by other rebel groups, specifically the Rwandan FDLR.

September 20, 2014: The government continues to replace senior Congolese Army leaders. This is criticized because the president is selecting generals who are personally loyal to him. The president recently appointed General Gabriel Amisi as a commander of one of three "national defense zones." The zones are an attempt to reorganize the army. Amisi will be commander in the western zone, which includes the capital, Kinshasha. But all is not well with the appointment. In 2012 UN investigators claimed that when Amisi commanded army units in eastern Congo he sold weapons (possibly Congolese Army weapons) to various rogue militias and rebel groups in eastern Congo. The government suspended Amisi –essentially suspended his military commission.

However, in August 2014 he was reinstated as a general in the Congolese Army.

September 22, 2014: Congolese sources reported that the commander of the "Tigers" faction of the FDLR has said his guerrillas are tired of fighting. They would prefer to disarm, leave Congo, return to Rwanda and turn their organization into a political party. However, they do not believe the Rwandan government will allow them to do this. Several members of the faction have been indicted for war crimes.

UN urged the Congolese government to rapidly disarm the Rwandan Hutu rebel Democratic Forces for the Liberation of Rwanda (FDLR) militia. The UN has issued several statements that look like political preparation for launching new attacks on the FDLR by MONUSCO's Intervention Brigade (IBDE).

September 25, 2014: The Ugandan government said that it will not deploy peacekeepers in the Central African Republic (CAR). The UN had asked Uganda to supply at least two battalions of peacekeepers. Uganda initially agreed to send 400 peacekeepers (potentially 800, in other words one battalion) but insisted that the peacekeeping force be based in south-eastern CAR at facilities already used by the Ugandan military. The Ugandan Army uses these bases to conduct operations against the Lords Resistance Army (LRA). The UN, however, said that it wanted Ugandan forces to deploy to the CAR's capital, Bangui. The UN and Uganda continued to negotiate, with Uganda insisting that its peacekeepers be allowed to conduct anti-LRA operations. Apparently the UN and Uganda could not reach a compromise.

September 27, 2014: The U.S. admitted that it cannot adequately monitor mineral mining and smelting operations in order to determine if rebel groups, criminal organizations and rogue militias are selling and profiting from the minerals. The U.S. and other developed countries have passed various laws to deter the mining, transport and selling of conflict minerals (in the U.S. case, the 2010 Dodd-Frank Wall Street Reform and Consumer Protection Act). The term refers to valuable minerals that are illegally-mined or illegally-acquired in conflict-ridden regions. The Congo, particularly eastern and southern Congo, are the classic examples of mineral-rich, conflict-ridden areas. In concept, the laws would prevent the movement of these minerals from the region and, failing that, would penalize individuals and companies who refine or smelt the illegal ores and minerals. In early September the United States published a list of several hundred operations world-wide that are suspected of processing, using or transporting conflict minerals. But the U.S. could not be certain. Why? Call it guerrilla mining and guerrilla smelting. The report used Congo as an example. "Artisanal miners that process small amounts of materials and are known to be employed in eastern Congo. Because these producers of metals are "off the grid," it is very difficult to trace exactly where these small amounts of materials are smelted. There is also evidence of guerilla smelting operations throughout Africa that create makeshift smelters which produce an intermediary product of tantalum, tungsten and tin, and then ship the product overseas to scrap yards and informal metal traders and exchanges. The materials are often transshipped to another country and then flaked or shaved prior to being sent to a smelter." These laws were touted as essential legal tools for battling criminal organizations and rogue militias. The laws were also seen as a vehicle for curbing corruption in developing countries – the corruption that often feeds conflicts. (Austin Bay)

September 28, 2014: In the capital and other large cities thousands demonstrated their opposition to Joseph Kabila's efforts to run for a third term (of five years) as president. The current constitution only allows two terms and that would mean Kabilia would be out by the end of 2016.

October 2, 2014: The 940 FDLR militiamen who have surrendered and are in demobilization camps in the Congo are being neglected and starved by the Congo government. It is believed that at least 100 demobilized FDLR fighters and their family members have died of starvation or disease while in a demobilization camps. This is largely result of government corruption and as news of this sort of thing gets around other rebels are less likely to consider surrendering.

October 3, 2014: The UN warned the FDLR (Democratic Forces for the Liberation of Rwanda) that it is subject to attack unless its remaining 1,500 fighters in eastern Congo surrender by January 2015 for disarming, surrendering and demobilizing.

October 8, 2014: In Bangui (capital of the CAR) a new round of clashes between rival militias broke out leaving at least five people dead. A hand grenade attack wounded several civilians in a Bangui street while elsewhere in Bangui a crowd murdered a Muslim man. The murder was described as a revenge slaying for the murder of a taxi driver by Muslims.

October 9, 2014: Gunmen in Bangui ambushed a UN (Pakistan-Bangladesh) convoy and killed one UN peacekeeper from Pakistan and wounded another.

October 10, 2014: Gunmen in Bangui (CAR) fired on a UN police patrol and wounded six UN policemen.

October 14, 2014: Eight gunmen from the CAR Peoples Democratic Assembly the Central African Republic town of Baboua kidnapped a Polish missionary. Rwandan and Burundi continue to argue over the discovery of 40 bodies on their border in Lake Rweru. Burundi claimed that the bodies were dead Rwandans but Rwanda denied this. Several of the bodies were found in mid-August on the Burundian side of the lake wrapped in plastic sheeting.

October 16, 2014: Uganda and South Sudan have signed a new joint military accord. Uganda will begin buying weapons for the government of South Sudan and insists that this will not violate the current ceasefire agreement between the South Sudan government and South Sudanese rebels.

October 18, 2014: A rebel group murdered at least 30 people in the town of Beni (North Kivu province, eastern Congo) and the chief suspect was ADF rebels. Villagers had reported a rebel group entering Congo from Uganda. Some soldiers were sent to the area from a base some 55 kilometers from Beni. This was the second attack in the area within a week.

October 21, 2014: UN attack helicopters and armored vehicles have arrived in the Beni region. The helicopters and armor will be used to protect civilians and UN facilities from further attacks by suspected ADF-NALU (Ugandan Allied Democratic Forces) rebels.

October 22, 2014: The Central African Republic (CAR) government announced that it will create a rapid intervention force to help protect vulnerable civilians. The force will also lead the effort to rebuild the CAR's military.

October 24, 2014: In the east (North Kivu province) MONUSCO (UN Organization Stabilization Mission in the Congo peacekeepers) facilities and personnel have suffered rock throwing attacks during the last week. The locals are angry over the inability of the peacekeepers to halt the violence from rebels and bandits. Locals are particularly angry about recent attacks by Ugandan rebels crossing the border to plunder and kill civilians. The UN will not pursue the Ugandan attackers across the border. To the locals, the UN appears to be less aggressive against the Ugandan raiders than the local rebels. The trigger for the current upsurge in anti-UN violence was the death of two protesters who attacked peacekeepers on the 21 st , seeking to lynch some of them for not protecting the people. The peacekeepers fought back, killing two of the attackers (who did not have firearms). This brought out more people to protest. For example UN officials at the airport in Beni had to flee a rock throwing crowd of young men. More worrisome for the peacekeepers is that many villages and town neighborhoods are forming self-defense militias. Armed mostly with clubs, knives, machetes and spears, these groups tend to carry out vigilante actions and some turn into bandits.

The UN reported that on October 23 Islamic militants murdered 30 people in a predominantly Christian village in the CAR. The village of Yamale is 400 kilometers north of the capital, Bangui. Muslim gunmen also attacked several other villages in the area.

October 26, 2014: Rwanda announced that it will not permit BBC broadcasts in the Kinyarwanda language. The Rwandan government objected to a BBC broadcast which questioned official Rwandan government accounts of the 1994 Tutsi genocide.

October 27, 2014: The UN announced that given renewed attacks on civilians in eastern Congo, UN peacekeepers will have to be more “proactive, not reactive” in responding to rebel militias. The UN statement followed more complaints from Congolese civilians in North Kivu province.

October 29, 2014: MINUSCA peacekeepers in the CAR have freed (during various military operations) 67 hostages who had been kidnapped by militia groups.

October 31, 2014: The MINUSCA peacekeeping force in the Central African Republic (CAR) now deploys 7,600 soldiers and policemen. MINUSCA assumed control of peacekeeping operations in mid-September. The operation will eventually deploy 10,000 soldiers and 1,820 police officers.

The Burundian government said it had evidence that Islamist terrorist groups (specifically the Somali al Shabaab) had cells within Burundi. The U.S. and Belgium have both issued travel warnings advising visitors to avoid Burundi.

November 3, 2014: Several hundred protestors demonstrated in Beni. People are angry because they believe the government and the UN are not doing enough to protect them from attacks by terrorists and rogue militias. One group of protestors attempted to destroy a statue of Congolese president Joseph Kabila.

November 4, 2014: Republic of Congo (Brazzaville) confirmed reports of a new off-shore oil and natural gas discovery. The new field has an estimated one billion barrels. According to one commercial source, that is a conservative estimate. Republic of Congo and Gabon have an estimated four billion barrels of oil in other off-shore fields.

November 6, 2014: A group of senior UN officials is investigating UN security operations in eastern Congo. Since early October the Ugandan rebel Allied Democratic Forces (ADF) militia has killed at least 100 civilians in various attacks in North Kivu province (primarily in and around the town of Beni). Congolese civilians are complaining that the Congolese Army and UN peacekeepers have failed to provide adequate security visited eastern Democratic Republic of Congo to address the UN mission's failure to contain rebel groups and instill security in the region. In late October civilian protestors attacked the UN headquarters at Beni's airport. Scattered protests have continued in Beni. Currently, MONUSCO has 150 Tanzanian soldiers and 100 Malawian soldiers from the UN's Intervention Brigade (IBDE) deployed in Beni.

November 7, 2014: A Congolese military court sentenced former Congolese general Jerome Kakwavu to ten years in jail. The court convicted him of war crimes. Kakwavu commanded the rebel Armed Forces of the Congolese People (FAPC) militia. The court sentenced the former rebel leader turned army general to ten years in jail for these war crimes. The FAPC operated in eastern Congo's around Ituri. Kakwavu was made a general in the Congolese Army in December 2004 when the FAPC agreed to end its insurgency and integrate with the national army. He was arrested on war crimes charges in 2005.

November 8, 2014: Security officials in Burundi reported that late on the evening of November 7th a group of men armed with machetes wounded two men and began looting homes in Burundi's capital, Bujumbura. Over the last two months violent attacks by armed groups have increased in Bujumbura and Somalis are suspected. The Somali terrorist organization, Al Shabaab, had threatened to launch more attacks as revenge for Burundi's participation in the African Union peacekeeping operation in Somalia.

November 11, 2014: The commander of M23 Congolese rebels has threatened to renew combat operations. Around 1,300 M23 fighters are currently being held in demobilization camps in Uganda. However, Bertrand Bisimwa, senior M23 commander (sometimes identified as M23's president) contends that the Congolese government has not fulfilled its commitments per the February 2014 amnesty declaration and May 2014 peace agreement. One of Bisimwa's key complaints is that the Congolese government has failed to release imprisoned M23 fighters inside the Congo.

November 12, 2014: In the east (North Kivu province) ADF (Ugandan Allied Democratic Forces) rebels continue operating along the Uganda border, as they have for a month, leaving at least 120 dead (mostly civilians) recently. It is unclear why the rebels are going after civilians. The LRA fighters tend to use abductees as supply bearers (porters) or sex slaves.

November 14, 2014: Attacks by the Ugandan rebel Lords Resistance Army (LRA) are increasing once again. The LRA has killed 22 people in 2014. It has abducted 432 people this year.

November 18, 2014: Congolese police in Kinshasha appear to have killed 51 young gang members and kidnapped another 33. Between November 2013 and February 2014 a police anti-gang program either killed or “disappeared” suspected gang members.

November 20, 2014: A Christian anti-balaka militia fought with a UN peacekeeping force in the town of Cantonnier (CAR, near Cameroon border). At least six people were killed and ten wounded in the skirmish. The fight began when UN peacekeepers tried to disarm the militia.

November 21, 2014: How do the CAR’s Seleka rebels fund their organization? Selling gold is one way. A Seleka militia unit has controlled the gold mine near the village of Ndassima since 2012. The militia receives monthly “protection payments” from mine workers and those who provide services to the miners.

November 23, 2014: Opposition political leaders from ten political parties in Burundi have asked the country’s national election commission to suspend voter registration. The opposition leaders say that the governing party is already engaged in massive electoral fraud. Many of the voter registrars belong to the governing CNDD-FDD party. The government is also trying to intimidate the opposition by threats of violence.

November 24, 2014: During November 20 - 22 ADF rebels killed 100 people in a series of attacks around the town of Beni (North Kivu province). ADF fighters using guns and machetes attacked several small villages near Beni. In one instance the ADF attackers wore Congolese Army uniforms. Survivors said that the ADF rebels sought out and murdered people who had given the government information about ADF whereabouts.

November 25, 2014: The U.S. government urged the Congolese Army to do more to protect vulnerable civilians in eastern Congo. The Americans believe the latest attacks and atrocities are the work of the Ugandan ADF terrorist group.

November 26, 2014: Congolese soldiers arrested six Ukrainian UN peacekeepers in Goma (North Kivu province). The peacekeepers were accused of stealing Congolese Army (FARDC) uniforms.

November 28, 2014: The Twa Pygmy tribe in Katanga province is once again accusing the Luba tribe of attacking and pillaging its villages. The Luba are Bantus. Currently there are around 77,000 refugees in northeastern Katanga and the majority of them are Twa. So far 1,737 violent incidents have occurred in central and northern Katanga, the majority in the Manono, Mitwaba and Pweto area (the “triangle of death”, or “Pweto triangle”). Violent incidents include torture, forced labor, theft (looting), extortion, rape and arson.

November 30, 2014: A Christian anti-balaka militia umbrella organization in the CAR has told the government that it is ending its role as a coordinator for armed groups and will become a political party. The new party name will be the Central African Party for Unity and Development.

December 3, 2014: UN and European diplomats are worried that President Joseph Kabila is intending to remain in office after 2016. According to the 2006 constitution, the president is term-limited. The idea is to prevent a return to a “strong man” dictatorship.

December 4, 2014: The government is ready to begin repatriating former M23 rebel fighters from neighboring countries where they are currently in demobilization camps. Around 1450 M23 fighters are in camps in Uganda. Several hundred more are in Rwanda. Congo wants the fighters to return without their weapons. The rebels have been promised amnesty in exchange for promises to forgo any future rebellion and anti-government action.

The CAR now has one of the world's largest refugee problems. Renewed sectarian violence has produced over 850,000 refugees and 187,000 have fled to neighboring countries. Most stayed in the CAR, many in camps around the capital, Bangui. In December 2013 CAR had an estimated 350,000 to 400,000 refugees (internally displaced people, IDPs).

December 5, 2014: The UN is prepared to reduce the size of its Congo operation if the government demonstrates that it is able to keep the peace. The UN statement, however, comes at an awkward moment. North and South Kivu provinces have witnessed an increase in attacks on civilians. Over 200 civilians were killed in October and November. Most of the attacks have been attributed to the Ugandan rebel Allied Democratic Forces (ADF-NALU) militia.

December 6, 2014: Fourteen people died and another ten were wounded in sectarian violence in the Central African Republic (CAR). Several hundred Christian tribesmen sought shelter in a church in the town of Bambari (north central CAR). The Christians said Moslems attacked their homes after a Moslem man was slain in retaliation for a shooting by Seleka rebels. The rebels killed a soldier who was escorting a member of the new transitional parliament. The government is pleading for the Christian and Moslem communities to end the cycle of violence.

December 7, 2014: The Rwandan Hutu Democratic Forces for the Liberation of Rwanda (FDLR) rebel group has failed to completely disarm. Once again UN peacekeepers are threatening to use the Intervention Brigade (IBDE) in an offensive operation to enforce UN orders. FDLR insists that the government has failed to follow-through on promises to house and feed demobilized FDLR fighters. There is recent evidence supporting the FDLR claim that Congolese-run demobilization camps were little more than prisons. The Congo wants to send the FDLR fighters back to Rwanda -- repatriation is the term. However, many FDLR fighters contend (with reason) that returning to Rwanda is a death sentence. The Rwandan government argues that they participated in the 1994 Rwandan genocide (and many original FDLR fighters did). An estimated 1,200 to 1,500 fighters remain in the field, most of them in eastern Congo. The Rwandan government insists that the UN and Congo end the FDLR insurgency. In late November, the Rwandan government claimed that the FDLR was re-grouping in eastern Congo.

President Kabila has formed a new government and included ministers from groups that he has had problems with. This is apparently part of an effort to gain support for his effort to run for president again despite the constitution forbidding it.

December 8, 2014: The Ugandan rebel Allied Democratic Forces (ADF-NALU) militia is believed responsible for killing nearly 40 civilians in North Kivu province in the last two days. ADF has killed over 250 people in this area in the last two months and the locals are desperate for some help from the government or peacekeepers to stop the violence.

December 8, 2014: Congo president Joseph Kabila announced that he has formed a new "unity" national government. In the new government a senior member of the Movement for the Liberation of Congo opposition political party will serve as vice-prime minister. Critics said that Kabila is attempting to divide his political opponents and accused him of preparing to change the constitution so he can remain in power after 2016.

December 9, 2014: Observers in the Central African Republic (CAR) warned that tensions are once again rising. A report from the UN's peacekeeping office said that MINUSCA's current operational objective is to stop violence between anti-Balaka militias and Seleka rebels in and around the CAR's capital, Bangui. The anti-Balaka fighters come from predominantly Christian tribes. The Seleka movement (or Seleka alliance) comes from Moslem tribes.

December 12, 2014: In a speech delivered in Kenya at a Kenya independence celebration, Ugandan president Yoweri Museveni declared that African nations need to withdraw from the International Criminal Court (ICC) treaty. Museveni claimed that the ICC is now used as a tool for oppressing Africans. The African Union recently asked the ICC to refrain from prosecuting an African head of state or deputy head of state while the accused remains in power. The ICC recently decided to drop crimes against humanity charges against Kenya's president, Uhuru Kenyatta. However, the ICC refused to drop charges against Kenyan vice-president William Ruto. Museveni's declaration is ironic. Museveni sought help from the ICC in dealing with the Ugandan rebel Lords Resistance Army (LRA). The ICC (backed by ample evidence) charged LRA senior commander Kony with crimes against humanity.

December 14, 2014: Operations against the ADF-NALU continue in eastern Congo near the Uganda-Congo border. Elements of nineteen Congolese Army battalions are participating. The UN's IBDE is involved. MONUSCO estimates that the ADF has about 150 fighters inside Congo.

December 15, 2014: Congolese president Joseph Kabila declared that foreign nations were violating Congo's sovereignty by telling him to observe constitutional limits on presidential re-election. Congo's president is limited to two five-year terms. Kabila's second term ends in 2016.

December 16, 2014: A spokesman for the M23 rebel movement claimed that between 1,500 and 1,600 former M23 fighters have left their internment camp in Uganda. The fighters were afraid that if they were forced to return to Congo they would jailed or executed. According to a diplomatic deal negotiated between Uganda and Congo, M23 fighters are to return to the Congo to be demobilized. The M23 fighters retreated into Uganda in November 2013 after losing a series of battles to UN peacekeepers and the Congolese Army. The Ugandan military, however, said that the M23 fighters were in the hills near the internment camp and were not missing.

December 19, 2014: Whether criminal slaughter, tribal war or political terrorism, the result is mass murder. UN investigators announced that they have evidence that since October an armed group (or several armed groups) in the Beni area (North Kivu province) have murdered at least 256 people (many of them children). The weapons of choice were machetes and axes. UN officials said they have not been able to determine what group is responsible. Residents of Beni and some Congolese officials have accused the Ugandan rebel Allied Democratic Forces and National Army for the Liberation of Uganda (ADF-NALU) of committing the massacres.

December 21, 2014: Anti-Balaka militiamen fought with UN peacekeepers in the Central African Republic (CAR) town of Berberati. One anti-Balaka fighter and one civilian were killed in the incident. UN peacekeepers recovered several weapons (types not identified). UN Multidimensional Integrated Stabilization Mission in the CAR (MINUSCA) officials also reported a clash occurred on December 20 near the town of Bambari. Anti-Balaka militiamen fought with fighters loyal to a former Seleka commander, General Ali Darass. Seven people died in the incident.

December 28, 2014: Another 150 FDLR (Democratic Forces for the Liberation of Rwanda) fighters surrendered. UN officials had earlier hinted that the IBDE's next target might be the FDLR Hutu extremist group. This threat from the UN's peacekeeping office sounded more like an announcement. Before that only 200 FDLR fighters had surrendered and another 1,300 remained in the bush in eastern Congo. Now that is closer to 1,100.

December 29, 2014: Since the Great Congo War erupted in the mid-1990s, every Congolese province has experienced anarchic violence. In impoverished, corrupt Congo, all too often anarchic violence quickly expands into a small but deadly war. When anarchic violence erupts, unprotected civilians are uprooted or robbed, sometimes raped, often killed. If the violence persists, relief agencies evacuate their personnel. In these terrible circumstances, Congolese civilians, aid groups and human rights organizations have legitimate cause to demand protection. In Congo --with the possible exception of the Kinshasha-based Presidential Guard-- the best available armed defense is provided by UN peacekeepers.

UN peacekeepers serving with the UN Operation in the Congo (ONUC) first deployed to Congo in 1960 when Belgium left and Katangan separatists rebelled. The current UN deployment, initially designated the UN Mission in the Democratic Republic of Congo (MONUC), was authorized in 2000. In 2001 MONUC deployed around 3,000 troops. Year by year the troop commitment increased. In 2005 MONUC deployed around 15,000 uniformed personnel (soldiers, observers and police). Since 2010 the UN has kept at least 20,000 uniformed personnel in Congo, the number occasionally approaching 22,000. In November 2014, the UN had 19,461 soldiers in Congo, 481 military observers and 1,091 uniformed police. Add another 4,000 UN civilians and volunteers. Cost estimates vary. For Congo peacekeeping and stabilization operations mid-2014 to mid-2015 the UN has budgeted $1.4 billion. From 2001 to 2014, Congo peacekeeping operations cost UN members over $8 billion. By some estimates, the figure exceeds $10 billion. That is a major, sustained effort over an extended period of time.

In 2010 MONUC became MONUSCO (UN Organization Stabilization Mission in the Democratic Republic of Congo). The name changed because the UN Security Council's policy emphasis had shifted from peacekeeping to political stabilization. MONUSCO was to shift from focusing on peacekeeping to nation building.

Cynics claimed the name change meant UN was declaring victory so it could leave. UN peacekeeping officials replied, no, changing from "Operation" to “Stabilization” signaled the UN would withdraw troops as Congo’s security forces became strong enough to defend Congolese civilians.

Every diplomat, military officer and development expert knew to achieve that goal Congo needed more than a few good infantry brigades; it needed reliable, honest and strong government institutions. MONUSCO, working with other international donors and agencies, would focus on strengthening and in some cases creating Congolese government institutions. Anti-corruption efforts would receive special emphasis. Security, of course, was essential. Peacekeeping troops would provide a reassuring security presence but increasingly focus on improving Congolese Army units and police units.

Five years after MONUC became MONUSCO, several Congolese provinces (especially the Kivus and Katanga) experience bouts of low-level war.

However, the UN can make a case that the severity of internal warfare has decreased; concurrently, regional tensions related to internal Congolese warfare have been reduced. Anarchic violence, however, continues, and the fundamental problem seeding anarchy, weak and crooked government institutions, has not been resolved. Despite MONUSCO's efforts, poor, untrustworthy, self-interested, morally-corrupt leadership undermines respect for governmental authority. President Kabila wants to change election laws and amend the constitution so he can continue as president beyond 2016. Graft and cronyism (usually with a tribal dimension) render incapable already weak government institutions. MONUSCO wants to improve the country's tax collecting but some provinces thoroughly distrust the central government. Deep distrust spurs thoughts of separatism.

As 2014 ends, Congo is definitely not stabilized. Critics are declaring MONUSCO a failure. However, in 2004 critics had declared MONUC an abject disaster. But when compared to Congo 2004, Congo 2014 is more stable. Perhaps Congo 2016-2017 is the next appropriate measure. A successful 2016 national, election, with Kabila respecting the constitution and peacefully transferring power to his elected successor, would be a major step toward more stability, less anarchy and measuring MONUSCO's success. (Austin Bay)

Investigation on the functioning of the infiltration network and occupancy of the Democratic Republic of Congo by Rwanda system

EXCERPTED FROM APARECO PRESS
RELEASE FEBRUARY 12, 2015 PARIS, FRANCE

The occupation of the Democratic Republic of Congo by its two eastern neighbors, Rwanda and Uganda is not, far from it, a view of the mind. The APARECO leading a pioneering struggle to stop this international conspiracy occupation of DR Congo for its balkanization present here briefly the mechanism of this vast undercover network and its occupation system key men (Rwandan officers and their Congolese accomplices) that animate. Because the time has come for all Congolese elite and its people are finally taking the actual measurement of the true degree of occupation of our country and the urgency of his start to stop this project méphistophélique Rwandan and Ugandan Tutsi lobby.

This paper presents a brief summary therefore a long and difficult investigation of several years. You therefore describes very briefly how a vast underground network of the Rwandan Tutsi lobby has managed to infiltrate in the Army and the Congolese National Police more than 25,000 soldiers and 354 Rwandan officers including 32 generals, 140 colonels and 70 majors ...! Most of these infiltrators have fraudulently received identity names of Congolese ethnic groups and were dispersed particularly in 7th, 8th, 9th and 10th Military Region based in the Eastern Province and those of Maniema, North and South Kivu in eastern DR Congo.

Their mission is to prepare the balkanization of our country and its annexation to Rwanda and Uganda. This paper reveals the identities of more officers and Rwandan politicians in Kigali and Kinshasa, which are the pillars and pivots of this powerful network infiltration and occupancy system designed and implemented by Kigali in Kinshasa .

For reasons of efficiency clandestine our struggle against the enemy in the field, we opted not to go public very much operational information collected, Rwanda and the DRC on the famous Rwandan Tutsi network . But once liberated country, all information will be delivered to Congolese youth for its historical baggage, so that such a calamity never happens to our Fulani. This is why, in our investigation, we moved up to the period of the second Republic to unearth the roots and origins of this work of ants, shot with a rare patience by the Rwandan Tutsi lobby since the time his exile in Zaire and elsewhere in Africa and in the world since the 1970s.

I. Officers and NCOs Rwandan infiltrators within the FAZ arrested and imprisoned in the MRSA during the 1996-1997 aggression.

Albeit belatedly and tentatively, Marechal Mobutu had finished, before the evidence of facts, to take the true measure of the danger posed by the phenomenon of infiltration Zairian Armed Forces (FAZ) by moles (spyware) that rongeaint the Rwandan from within like a worm in the fruit. For proof, and only an indication, because we do not have data from other provinces of the Republic at the time, in March 1997, two months before the end of the IIè Republic, 11 Rwandan officers and noncommissioned officers whose names and grades below, and operated as spies or moles of Rwanda in the FAZ had been neutralized and imprisoned in the Action and Military Intelligence Service (MRSA), the Staff of Action Regiment commanded at the time by Colonel Laba (deceased). You will notice that after the occupation by Rwandan troops, all those Rwandan moles, with some exceptions, have been promoted, as a reward for services rendered to their country Rwanda, by the first Rwandan spy who is today at the top of the institutions of the DRC Hyppolite Kanambe alias Joseph Kabila not to mention it.

Here is the list of 11 moles Rwandan arrested by the MRSA between 1996 and 1997

1) Colonel Bivengeti, he is currently promoted to Brigadier General in the Military Prosecutor FARDC

2) Major Rwasibo, former Commander Logistics Base FAZ, he is currently "Military Adviser" of Azarias Ruberwa and member of the Staff of the parallel "Tutsi power" in Kinshasa.

3) Captain Assoni, former Intelligence Officer (OR) EMG FAZ, it is currently promoted to Colonel and Chief of Staff in South Kivu.

4) Lieutenant Mastaki Mobiriki, former Company Commander in the 311th, the second Rwandan invasion of August 2, 1998312th Para Battalion in Camp CETA in Ndjili, he was killed in the operations of the second Rwandan invasion of August 2, 1998.

5) Major Bora Uzima, former DSP, it is currently promoted Brigadier General. He Kabila" had managed to escape from the prison of GLM in Gombe.is also one of the main perpetrators of the death of L.-D. Kabila that "Joseph Kabila" had managed to escape from the prison of GLM in Gombe.

6) Lieutenant Barendere, former Company Commander of the Gendarmerie Congolese National Police (PNC)Officer (OR) in the Directorate General Intelligence and Special (DRGS) of the Nationale to Kahungula, he is currently promoted to Colonel and Intelligence and Special (DRGS) of the Congolese National Police (PNC)

7) Lieutenant Bisengimana, former Commander of the Second Company to the directs and controls the Army and the Congolese National Police.parallel, made up exclusively of Tutsi Rwandan officers, who actuallythe Congolese National Police (PNC); he is the head of the General StaffCivil Guard, it is currently promoted to Major General and Inspector General of

8) Second Lieutenant Kanold, now promoted to Colonel and within the Special PNC (DGRS).Intelligence Officer of the General Intelligence Directorate and Special reserves PNC (DGRS).

9) Chief Warrant Officer Twahirwa, a former sergeant in the 312th Para tracks to date.Battalion Camp CETA and the Communications School. We have not found his his tracks to date.

10) First Sergeant Major Kabukeyi, former NCO RSD Intelligence (Special Detachment of searches) in MRSA. No trace.

11) Corporal Tagar, corporal Logistics Base and Storage Blog of the body guard no trace

Remember that this list is not exhaustive because it contains the names of no trace Rwandan Tutsi spies who were arrested in the military garrison of Kinshasa.

And there were several other Rwandan moles in other garrisons across the country, which must be added the other moles who had managed to escape from Zaire and Rwanda join to escape the prison. All these spies and Rwandan Tutsi officers who operate within the FAZ were organized into networks that was using the Rwandan staff of the AFDL to collect operational information within the FAZ during the entire period of the war of aggression that led to the fall of Marechal Mobutu from power.

Apart from this core that existed in the FAZ, General Paul Kagame had entrusted the mission of the invasion of Zaire to Colonel James Kabarebe, designated in 1995 "Chief Military Operations and Head of Zaire sector." He was simultaneously in charge of recruiting and training Rwandan soldiers who were to be used for operations within the

AFDL. It was in this capacity that he recruited in 1995 his nephew Hyppolite Kanambe, alias "Commander Hyppo" effective member of the Army Rwandan Patriotic (APR) he appointed into the intelligence within the AFDL under his orders. And it will take in Kisangani identity of "Joseph Kabila". It will play an important role in intelligence, logistics as well as the operations of the AFDL that were the basis for the massacre of more than 2 milllion Rwandan Hutu and Congolese in the east of the DRC and across the equatorial forest. This officer of the Rwandan Patriotic Army (RPA) will then, as we know, a very active part in the despicable assassination of President Laurent Kabila in January 2001.

For years, the cease-fire agreements imposed on DR-Congo by the international community, were used instead of trick to facilitate the infiltration of Rwandan soldiers in the FARDC and PNC. The enemies of Congo presented whenever these agreements as of sesame that were to bring peace in DR Congo. But history has shown us that their primary objective was not declared a reinforcement of Rwandan presence in the FARDC and PNC, in order to be able to sit the occupancy of the DRC. Among the operations from these agreements we can mention the "demobilization of negative forces" and "reintegration of armed groups into the FARDC."

Apart from this core that existed in the FAZ, General Paul Kagame had entrusted the mission of the invasion of Zaire to Colonel James Kabarebe, designated in 1995 "Chief

Military Operations and Head of Zaire sector." He was simultaneously in charge of recruiting and training Rwandan soldiers who were to be used for operations within the

AFDL. It was in this capacity that he recruited in 1995 his nephew Hyppolite Kanambe, alias "Commander Hyppo" effective member of the Army Rwandan Patriotic (APR) he appointed into the intelligence within the AFDL under his orders. And it will take in Kisangani identity of "Joseph Kabila". It will play an important role in intelligence, logistics as well as the operations of the AFDL that were the basis for the massacre of more than 2 milllion Rwandan Hutu and Congolese in the east of the DRC and across the equatorial forest. This officer of the Rwandan Patriotic Army

(RPA) will then, as we know, a very active part in the despicable assassination of President Laurent Kabila in January 2001.

For years, the cease-fire agreements imposed on DR-Congo by the international community, were used instead of trick to facilitate the infiltration of Rwandan soldiers in the FARDC and PNC. The enemies of Congo presented whenever these agreements as of sesame that were to bring peace in DR Congo. But history has shown us that their primary objective was not declared a reinforcement of Rwandan presence in the FARDC and PNC, in order to be able to sit the occupancy of the DRC. Among the operations from these agreements we can mention the "demobilization of negative forces" and "reintegration of armed groups into the FARDC." These two transactions arising from various so-called peace agreements mainly:

the "Lusaka Agreement", the "Sun City Agreement", the "Kampala Accord" and "Addis Abeba Agreement". All these agreements have facilitated, one after the other, the infiltration of Rwandan soldiers in the FARDC and PNC through the manipulation of men and trafficking in fake rebel movements created and equipped by Rwanda and Uganda, which have succeeded in the eastern DR Congo. These include the RCD-Goma, MLC, the CNDP and the M23 ...

But our investigation have revealed that in recent years, this infiltration of Rwandan troops in DRC is on a much larger scale and of a quasi-official way, through an extensive network that was set up by the highest authorities of the governments of Rwanda and the Democratic Republic of Congo.

June 2015: The Panel of experts appointed by Sec-General Ban Ki-moon concludes there is enough information and new evidence to justify pursuing further investigation in the mysterious death of former Sec. General Dag Hammarskjold.

CONGO POLITICS

President Kabila Denounces ‘Foreign Interference’, Promises Vote

November 18, 2016
Congolese President Joseph Kabila, has broken his silence over the political turmoil rocking his country. In a televised address to the nation, Kabila has warned against what he termed as foreign interference in the country’s political crisis. Kabila appeared to be reacting to remarks by some United Nations Security Council diplomats, who visited Congo at the weekend to push for a peaceful transition of power.

2016 - 6 December - The Swedish draft resolution is presented to the UN General Assembly. The UN General Assembly adopted a resolution to pursue investigations into Dag Hammarskjold's death. It was, remarkably, the third resolution since 2013.

CONGO POLITICS
Protests Begin as President Joseph Kabila Stays on

HOW AFRICA December 20, 2016

Gunfire could be heard in several districts of Kinshasa early Tuesday as demonstrators demanded that Kabila steps down after his mandate expired at midnight.

A chief diplomat to Congolese president Joseph Kabila had confirmed on Monday that the president will remain in office when his mandate expires to save the country from chaos.

He stressed that Kabila can only step down when a new president is elected but elections are not due until next year.

The government and elections officials have blamed logistical and financial problems for the delay in the vote, currently scheduled for April 2018.

“If for any reason, the president yielded to the pressure, as he is being asked to do, and I do not see that he is going to yield to any pressure, if he resigned or anything else, he would then be violating the constitution and he could then be put on trial because he would plunge the country into an indescribable chaos,” Barnabe Kikaya, chief diplomat to DR Congo president said.

Reacting to the calls for Kabila to step down, opposition leader Ettiene Tshisekedi called on the population to protest peacefully.

“I launch a solemn appeal to the Congolese people not to recognise the…illegal and illegitimate authority of Joseph Kabila and to peacefully resist (his) coup d’etat,“ Tshisekedi said.

Some opposition leaders had agreed Kabila can remain in office until elections hold in April.

The constitutional court has also ruled that Kabila, leader since his father was assassinated in 2001, can stay on.
The international community has called on Kabila to step down so as to avoid triggering massive crisis and possibly another civil war

Felix Tshisekedi prepared an international conference on the Grand Inga hydropower project. Tshisekedi prepares an international conference on the Grand Inga hydropower project. With African Union support, the DRC will in late April play host to dozens of VIPs to discuss the development of the Congo River scheme that comprises several vast dams (Africa Intelligence dated 09/03/2020)

News & Media

Probe into the death of UN boss Dag Hammarskjöld,60 years ago needs SA's help

Democratic South Africa has skeletons in the closet that it needs to address. One of these is the death of Dag Hammarskjöld, the Secretary-General of the United Nations (UN) in a plane crash shortly after midnight on 17 to 18 September 1961. The plane went down as it approached Ndola, a mining town in Northern Rhodesia (today's Zambia) bordering the Congo.

On board were 15 other people. Hammarskjöld planned to meet Moïse Tshombe, leader of the secessionist Katanga province, to find a solution to the conflict in the Congo. All but one, Hammarskjöld's bodyguard Harold Julien, died. He succumbed to his injuries six days later in a local hospital. He could have been saved if treated properly. His eyewitness report was also neglected.

Foul play has never been eliminated. Hammarskjöld had engaged in crucial negotiations bringing the secession of the Katanga province to an end. This was followed with concerns by Western interests. His engagement in the decolonisation of Africa provoked dismay among the white minority settler regimes. The crash, therefore, immediately provoked suspicions that it was not an accident. As recently as September 2019, António Guterres, the current UN Secretary-General stated in a letter to the General Assembly:

It remains our shared responsibility to pursue the full truth of what happened on that fateful night in 1961. We owe this to Dag Hammarskjöld and to the members of the party accompanying him. However, we also owe this to the United Nations.

New evidence substantiates the early suspicions of possible foul play. This means a UN Secretary-General and those in his company were possibly the victims of an attack in air. This ought to be verified.

Apartheid South Africa had interests in the region and followed closely the events unfolding in the Congo. It must be taken for granted that there are records, which offer additional information to verify assumptions. But access to classified documents needs a state's active support.

New investigations

Fifty years after Hammarskjöld's death, the Zambian-born scholar Susan Williams published a book which pointed to omissions, flaws and failures of the earlier investigations. It triggered a new inquiry conducted by an independent commission of jurists. It submitted a report in 2013, which concluded:

There is persuasive evidence that the aircraft was subjected to some form of attack or threat as it circled to land at Ndola. … The possibility that the plane was in fact forced into its descent by some form of hostile action is supported by sufficient evidence to merit further inquiry.

As a result, official investigations by the UN resumed. The United Nations Association Westminster Branch in London has provided regular updates on developments since then.

In 2017 the former Chief Justice of Tanzania, Mohamed Chande Othman, was appointed as Eminent Person, tasked with further investigations. He concluded in his first report that (an aerial attack) would have been possible using resources existing in the area at the time (and) that there is likely to be much relevant material that remains undisclosed.

Justice Othman identified "the continued non-disclosure of potentially relevant new information in the intelligence, security and defence archives of member states" as "the biggest barrier to understanding the full truth" about what happened.

He stressed that it depends on the UN member states to become active in the search for further evidence in their national archives. The burden of proof had, therefore, shifted to them. They should show that they have conducted a full review of records and archives in their custody or possession, including those that remain classified, for potentially relevant information.

In support of Othman's report, Guterres in 2017 that relevant member states appoint an independent and high-ranking official to conduct a dedicated and internal review of their archives, in particular their intelligence, security and defence archives, to determine whether they hold relevant information.

The UN General Assembly extended Othman's mandate in early 2018. He presented his second report in September 2019.

New information, Othman concluded highlights the fact that there were many more foreign mercenaries in and around Katanga, including pilots, than had been considered by earlier inquiries.

These had the logistics and necessary conditions (suitable planes and airfields) to intercept with the plane approaching. For Othman it remains plausible that an external attack or threat was a cause of the crash.

New information also confirmed that the crash site was discovered much earlier than officially reported – and testifies to the deliberate neglect of the only survivor. As Othman notes, this calls into question the acts of various governments directly after the crash and leaves open the issue of why the earlier crash discovery time was not reported.

Othman based his conclusions partly on reports of the independent, high-ranking official appointed by several UN member states. But, states such as South Africa, the US and the UK, where most discoveries could be expected, did not comply.

A challenge to South Africa

South Africa subsequently assigned a high-ranking official at its foreign relations department in May 2019 with the task to look into potential sources, which could offer new information. But no report has so far been submitted.

On delivering his most recent report, Othman recommended

- that an independent person is appointed to continue the work.
- that key member states again be urged to (re)appoint independent high-ranking officials to determine whether relevant information exists within their security, intelligence and defence archives.
- that a conclusion be reached over whether member states have complied with this process.

- that key documents be made public.

In December 2019 another Swedish draft resolution was adopted to extend Othman's mandate, with a record number of 128 co-sponsoring countries, including South Africa, out of the UN's 193 member states. Once again, the resolution was not supported by the US and the UK.

It is one thing for the US and the UK to be unwilling to assess and disclose classified material. It's quite possible that they want to avoid any embarrassment.

But South Africa has no reason to want to hide anything. There were plausible reasons for the apartheid regime's refusal to cooperate with the probe into Hammarskjöld's death. But these no longer stand under a democratic government.

It is inconceivable that the country's archives contain no information on what happened at Ndola. Concerned about apartheid, Hammarskjöld had visited South Africa in early 1961. South African agencies and individuals played an active role in the region. This needs to be more closely investigated.

Henning Melber, Extraordinary Professor, Department of Political Sciences, University of Pretoria and Barney Pityana, Professor Emeritus of Law, University of South Africa

This article is republished from The Conversation under a Creative Commons license. Read the original article.

Congolese Authorities detain AFP correspondent Pierre Sosthen Kambidi without charge

Soldiers are seen near Mutwanga, Democratic Republic of Congo, on May 24, 2021. Military officers recently detained journalist Pierre Sosthène Kambidi and are holding him without charge. (AFP/Alexis Huguet)

New York, September 24, 2021 — Congolese authorities should immediately release journalist Pierre Sosthène Kambidi and ensure the press across the country can work without fear or intimidation, the Committee to Protect Journalists said today.

On September 20, plainclothes military officers arrested Kambidi, a correspondent for Agence France-Presse and the local news website Actualite.cd, at the Sultani Hotel in the capital, Kinshasa, according to one of Kambidi's lawyers, Gode Kabongo, who spoke to CPJ by phone; Actualite.cd publication director Patient Ligodi, who visited the journalist in detention on September 22 and spoke to CPJ by phone; and reports by Actualite.cd and Radio France Internationale (RFI), the French public broadcaster, where Kambidi occasionally contributes coverage.

The journalist was taken into custody and initially questioned as a witness in the case of the 2017 killing of U.N. experts Michael Sharp and Zaida Catalan in the country's Kasai Central region, and was subsequently accused of the alleged crimes of terrorism, criminal association, and insurrection, according to the reports by Actualite and RFI. Kambidi has not been formally charged and is being held at the office of the auditor-general, an authority responsible for military justice in the country, according to Ligodi and those reports.

According to Ligodi and another report by RFI, Kambidi's arrest was connected with the prosecutor's desire to know how Kambidi came to possess footage of the killings of Sharp and Catalan, as well as how he knew details surrounding their deaths. Kambidi had participated extensively in reporting about the killings and other violence in the area, according to posts on Twitter by Sonia Rolley, an RFI reporter who covers the region, and Axel Gordh Humlesjö, an investigative journalist working for Sveriges Television, Sweden's public broadcaster.

"Journalist Pierre Sosthène Kambidi should never have been arrested, and his detention without charge by military authorities sends a chilling message to the press in the Democratic Republic of the Congo," said Angela Quintal, CPJ's Africa program coordinator, in Durban, South Africa. "Congolese authorities must respect Kambidi's right to keep his sources confidential, and should immediately release him and drop any investigation into his work."

Military prosecutors questioned Kambidi about the case without a lawyer present on September 21, and U.N. experts appointed by the U.N. secretary general to assist in the investigation of Sharp and Catalan's deaths participated via videoconference, RFI reported.

The following day, after Kambidi was granted access to a lawyer, authorities from the military further questioned him for about eight hours, according to Bienvenu-Marie Bakumanya, deputy director of the AFP bureau in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, who spoke to CPJ by phone after visiting Kambidi today to deliver him food. U.N. experts participated in this session as well, Bakumanya said.

Auditor-General Lucien-Rene Likulia Bakumi responded to CPJ's phone call for comment by referring questions to Cyprien Muwawu, the magistrate responsible for Kambidi's case. CPJ called Muwawu for comment, but no one answered.

Stéphane Dujarric, the spokesperson for U.N. Secretary General António Guterres, responded to CPJ's emailed questions, including about the U.N. experts' involvement in the questioning of Kambidi when his lawyer was not present. In his emailed reply, Dujarric reiterated points made in today's midday briefing at U.N. headquarters in New York, a video of which was posted on the U.N. website. The experts assisting the investigation into Sharp and Catalan's killings do not "interrogate witnesses or suspects directly," he said, adding that "support provided by the U.N. includes guidance to ensure that the investigation is conducted in a manner consistent with international law." He further added that at no point during the two days of questioning that the experts attended was Kambidi "asked or pressured" to "reveal his sources."

Who are the most evil humans in history that most people have never heard of?

Sufyan Ahmad

Student at Bachelor of Dental Surgery DegreesUpdated 2y

"Cut off the heads of the men and hang them in the villages, have sexual intercourse with the native women and hang children and women on crosses."

King Leopold II of Belgium to his generals, refering to people of his personal colony in the Congo.

A child victim of Belgian atrocities in Congo stands with a missionary, Congo, ca. 1890-1910

_____-

His majesty King Leopold II.

Background:

The Congo Free State was a corporate state in Central Africa privately owned by King Leopold II of Belgium founded and recognized by the Berlin Conference of 1885. In the 23 years (1885-1908) Leopold II ruled the Congo, he massacred 10 million Africans by cutting off their hands and genitals, flogging them to death, starving them into forced labour, holding children ransom and burning villages. The ironic part of this story is that Leopold II committed these atrocities by not even setting foot in the Congo. Under Leopold II's administration…

A Congolese man looking at the severed hand and foot of his five-year-old daughter who was killed, and allegedly cannibalized, by the members of Anglo-Belgian India Rubber Company militia.

(Just imagine yourself instead of this man)

The man in photograph is Nsala.

Photograph was taken by Alice Seeley.

Her written account about this photograph is in the book, Don't Call Me Lady: The Journey of Lady Alice Seeley Harris:

He hadn't made his rubber quota for the day so the Belgian-appointed overseers had cut off his daughter's hand and foot. Her name was Boali. She was five years old. Then they killed her. But they weren't finished. Then they killed his wife too. And because that didn't seem quite cruel enough, quite strong enough to make their case, they cannibalized both Boali and her mother*. And they presented Nsala with the tokens, the leftovers from the once living body of his darling child whom he so loved.*

The ABIR Congo Company (founded as the Anglo-Belgian India Rubber Company and later known as the Compagnie du Congo Belge) was the company appointed to exploit natural rubber in the Congo Free State. ABIR enjoyed a boom through the late 1890s, by selling a kilogram of rubber in Europe for up to 10 fr which had cost them just 1.35 fr.

Men holding hands severed from victims .

A catholic priest quotes a man, Tswambe, speaking of the hated state official Léon Fiévez:

From all the bodies killed in the field, you had to cut off the hands*. He wanted to see the number of hands cut off by each soldier, who had to bring them in baskets…A village which refused to provide rubber would be completely swept clean*

An illustration from HM Stanley's "The Congo and the founding of its free state; a story of work and exploration.

Under the reign of Leopold II, the Congo's unique wildlife was fair game for sport killing by almost any hunter who could book passage and pay for a hunting license.

King leopold II was also depicted in "Heart of darkness" by Joseph Conrad.

References:

. Father stares at the hand and foot of his five-year-old, severed as a punishment for failing to make the daily rubber quota, Belgian Congo, 1904

http://atrocitieswatch.org/king-leopold-of-belgium-in-congo/

Related Links

Which famous person in history who is idolized, was actually a horrible person?

What were the most 'badass' moments of history?

Who is the most badass person in history that no one knows about?

Who was the loneliest person in recorded history and why?

What was the day in history in which most people died?

Who is the most misunderstood historical figure?

Jarred Dunn

, studied History at The University of Texas at Austin Updated Oct 3, 2020 · Upvoted by

Stephen Leach

, MA History and politics studentand

Edward Down

, MA Literature & History (1980)

WARNING: Graphic images ahead

This is Will Brown.

In 1919, Will had found work in a meat-packing plant in Omaha, Nebraska. Black laborers were heavily recruited by the area's meatpacking industry, and Will was among many African-Americans that had fled endemic racism and violence in the southern United States.[1]

This is also Will Brown.

Image: The Omaha Courthouse Lynching of 1919

Will was accused of raping Agnes Loeback, a nineteen-year-old white woman. The assault took place near midnight on September 25, 1919, not far from her home.

Loeback and her companion Milton Hoffman were walking home after seeing a late movie. A man with a gun confronted the couple, allegedly stealing a watch, money, and jewelry. The gunman ordered Milton to stay back while he dragged Loeback into a nearby ravine.[2]

News of the crime swept through the city. The local newspaper *The Omaha Bee*quickly blamed a suspect; their headline proclaimed that a "Black Beast" had assaulted a white girl."[3]

The opening paragraph did not mince words.

“The most daring attack on a white woman ever perpetrated in Omaha occurred one block south of Bancroft street near Scenic Avenue in Gibson last night.”[4]
Agnes’s brother, Joseph Loeback, led armed men in a search of the vicinity. Joined by his friend Frank Raum, Loeback accompanied police detectives while they scoured the streets for clues.

They soon found a neighbor who identified a “suspicious negro” living in a house with another white woman. The “suspicious negro” was William Brown. Brown barricaded himself inside the home, but Loeback and his determined friends broke through. They found Will hiding under his bed.[5]

The police and their vigilante crew seized Brown and dragged him to Loeback’s house.

Loeback and Hoffman identified Brown as their assailant. Her description of him tallied with that of a mugger in the vicinity three weeks earlier. Agnes also identified the clothing, including a white felt hat that had been worn by a man seen in the Gibson neighborhood. Later, however, Agnes stated that her attacker was black, but “I can’t say whether he [Brown] is the man or not.”

Hoffman, arriving at the Loeback home, identified Brown “with not the least bit of doubt but what he is the Negro who” held him at gunpoint while he raped Agnes. By then a crowd of some 250 men and women had gathered around the house, shouting that Brown should be lynched.[6]
The crowd outside of Loeback’s house grew, driving the mob's bloodlust ever higher. Police managed to free Will and took him to the county courthouse, which they considered to be a safer location.[7]

They were wrong.

Over the next twenty-four hours, and incited by local newspaper articles, a howling swarm surrounded the courthouse, demanding that Brown be turned over for justice.

Police took cover inside, dodging bullets from amateur snipers stationed across the street. Authorities were forced to herd prisoners to the relative safety of the roof.[8]

The crowd had slipped beyond reason and negotiation.

Rioting, looting, and burning shattered the rest of the city. Black men and women were beaten, robbed, and assaulted as the mob contagion swept through normally placid streets.

Not even the mayor and city commissioner were safe, as both were abused and nearly lynched themselves.[9]

City commissioner Harry B. Zimman tried to talk to the growing mob, only to be drowned out by shouts of “Lynch the damn Jew.” He suffered a few blows before being helped back inside by friends.

Mayor Ed Smith came out the east doors on Seventeenth Street to confront the mob, calling upon them to let the law take its course. His appeal was short-lived. He was hit with a baseball bat or other blunt object (a Leonard Weber later said he hit the mayor over the head with a gun) and a dozen other blows. “No, I will not give up the man,” Smith said. “I’m going to enforce the law even with my own life.”

The crowd took his words to heart, shouting “hang him” and “string him up.” With a noose around his neck, the mayor was dragged along Harney Street to the Sixteenth Street traffic signal tower. The rope was thrown over a bar and tightened around Smith’s neck when Russell Norgaard saved the mayor’s life by removing the rope.[10]

Image: Rioters surrounding the courthouse. https://history.nebraska.gov/sites/history.nebraska.gov/files/doc/publications/NH2010Lynching.pdf

The seething mass finally proved too much for the besieged police inside the courthouse.

Multiple accounts exist on exactly how Brown was turned over to the crowd. The sheriff, fearing for the lives of his deputies, claimed he “surrendered Brown” for fear that they would all be killed. Other accounts claimed black prisoners gave him to the rioters.[11]

Ladders were placed against the west side of the burning courthouse, and two men, one with a rope, the other carrying a shotgun, rushed up a ladder to the second floor. From there they performed an acrobatic climb to reach Brown and his defenders two floors up.

By now it was dark, and automobile headlights illuminated the window ledges and cornices for their ascent, while about thirty rioters groped their way through smoked-filled stairways to reach Brown.[12]
Brown's executioners would not be denied their quarry. They tied a rope around his neck and dragged him to the side of the building.

What followed was as horrific a sight as onlookers had ever seen.

Brown was mercilessly beaten with fists, clubs, or any other weapon that rioters could grasp. He was then hung from a telegraph post so that the members of the crowd, many of them armed, could riddle his swaying body with dozens of bullets. A seized police car provided a ready-made toy, and they tied Brown's hands to the back of the vehicle. His mutilated body was dragged through cheering streets.[13]

When the dragging was done, the mob then constructed a makeshift pyre. With more shouts of joy, the masses dumped Brown's body on wooden pyre, igniting it with oil from the nearby signal lanterns used for street repairs.[14]

Even this was not enough. Brown's corpse was tied to the back of a car for one more tour of the streets. The rest of the city had to see that justice had been done.

His body was later dumped in an unmarked grave outside of town.[15]

In light of this vicious crime against Will Brown, it is helpful to ask the obvious question: Who are the people that mutilated him? Who were the people roaring with approval while they did so?

Look again at the photo above of Brown's charred body.

Specifically, look closer at the people standing above him.

The expressions are not ones of horror or disgust. These men wanted to be there. They were enjoying themselves Lynching in the United States was not just one more tool in the racist state's bid for permanence. It also became something more horrific and mundane; the equivalent to a night out at the movies.

Multiple accounts of families attending lynchings described them as a "picnic-like atmosphere," despite the horrors inflicted on its victims. Souvenirs from the victims' bodies were highly prized and even fought over after the show was over.[16]

In 1904, after Luther Holbert allegedly killed a local white landowner, he and a black woman believed to be his wife were captured by a mob and taken to Doddsville, Mississippi, to be lynched before hundreds of white spectators.

Both victims were tied to a tree and forced to hold out their hands while members of the mob methodically chopped off their fingers and distributed them as souvenirs. Next, their ears were cut off. Mr. Holbert was then beaten so severely that his skull was fractured and one of his eyes was left hanging from its socket.

Members of the mob used a large corkscrew to bore holes into the victims' bodies and pull out large chunks of "quivering flesh," after which both victims were thrown onto a raging fire and burned. The white men, women, and children present watched the horrific murders while enjoying deviled eggs, lemonade, and whiskey in a picnic-like atmosphere.[17]

Image: New Podcast: Strange Fruit - Voices of a Lynching - Radio Diaries

Thirteen years later, in Memphis Tennessee, a mob kidnapped Ell Persons from a prison train. Persons was set to stand trial for rape and murder, but he would not live to see his day in court.[18]

The mob had announced the lynching time and location in advance, and thousands of people attended, backing up traffic for miles. Food and gum vendors sold their wares to the many spectators as Mr. Persons was doused with gasoline and set on fire. A ten-year-old black child was forced to sit next to the fire and watch him die.

When members of the crowd complained that Mr. Persons would die too quickly if burned, the fire was extinguished, and attendees fought over Mr. Person's clothes and remnants of the rope to keep as mementos. Two men cut off his ears for souvenirs, after which the head of Mr. Person's corpse was removed and thrown into a crowd in Memphis's black commercial district.[19]

In the same year and in the same state, Lation Scott suffered a lynching after being accused of "criminal assault."[20]

Thousands gathered near a vacant lot across the street from the downtown courthouse and children sat atop their parents' shoulders to get a better view as Mr. Scott's clothes and skin were ripped off with knives.

A mob tortured Lation Scott with a hot poker iron, gouging out his eyes, shoving the hot poker down his throat and pressing it all over his body before castrating him and burning him alive over a slow fire. Mr. Scott's torturous killing lasted more than three hours.[21]
Markets existed for trophies culled from the victim's bodies. Hearts, livers, bones, fingers, and toes were all available for a price, ready for display in your home. The grisly tokens could function as a testament to your willingness to protect your heritage, or as a simple memento from a memorable day.[22]

If actual pieces of flesh were too gruesome for a collector, postcards preserving the event were also widely available.[23]

Arrests of the smiling, gawking denizens in these photos were rare. Rarer still were actual prosecutions; legal authorities at the time were far more concerned with enshrining their power and maintaining a violent status quo.[24]

For me, the most frightening aspect of these nameless, ghostly mobs are their immediacy. This is not ancient history.

It is one hundred years ago, just outside of living memory.

Image: Modern Poetry ∫ The MOD Blog

Will Brown's brutal execution was almost certainly a crime against an innocent man. During his brief incarceration in the besieged county jail, it was apparent that he was physically incapable of assaulting anyone.

A physical examination showed Brown was "too twisted by rheumatism to assault anyone." An unidentified Omaha World-Herald reporter allegedly interviewed Brown in jail and "confirmed by his observation the man's crippled condition." His chronic rheumatism meant Brown would be unable to overpower Loeback and Hoffman, concluded Jim McKee, a Lincoln Journal writer.[25]

His innocence was not material to the masses outside demanding blood.

After ruminating on the horrors of this story, I kept returning to Will Brown's final moments. I can only imagine his fear as the searing flames and the deafening shouts crept closer to his cell. I can only imagine the crippling panic in his final moments as he was handed over to the jeering mob.

These events happened far too close to the present to take any comfort in soothing thoughts of a long-buried past.

Image: Headstone for William Brown. It was placed there by a donor one hundred years after he died.[26] His unmarked grave was finally marked for history. Potters Field Cemetery - William Brown

"The past is never dead. It's not even past."

—William Faulkner, Requiem for a Nun.[27]

Footnotes

[1] America's Black Holocaust Museum

[2] Lest We Forget: The Lynching of Will Brown, Omaha's 1919 Race Riot

[3] https://history.nebraska.gov/sites/history.nebraska.gov/files/doc/publications/NH2010Lynching.pdf
[4] A Horrible Lynching
[5] https://history.nebraska.gov/sites/history.nebraska.gov/files/doc/publications/NH2010Lynching.pdf
[6] https://history.nebraska.gov/sites/history.nebraska.gov/files/doc/publications/NH2010Lynching.pdf
[7] Lest We Forget: The Lynching of Will Brown, Omaha's 1919 Race Riot
[8] A Horrible Lynching
[9] The Omaha Courthouse Lynching of 1919
[10] https://history.nebraska.gov/sites/history.nebraska.gov/files/doc/publications/NH2010Lynching.pdf
[11] A Horrible Lynching
[12] https://history.nebraska.gov/sites/history.nebraska.gov/files/doc/publications/NH2010Lynching.pdf
[13] https://history.nebraska.gov/sites/history.nebraska.gov/files/doc/publications/NH2010Lynching.pdf
[14] https://history.nebraska.gov/sites/history.nebraska.gov/files/doc/publications/NH2010Lynching.pdf
[15] https://history.nebraska.gov/sites/history.nebraska.gov/files/doc/publications/NH2010Lynching.pdf
[16] How white Americans used lynchings to terrorize and control black people
[17] Equal Justice Initiative's report
[18] Memphis Burning
[19] Equal Justice Initiative's report
[20] Lethal Punishment
[21] Equal Justice Initiative's report
[22] Equal Justice Initiative's report
[23] The Evidence of Things Unsaid

[24] Equal Justice Initiative's report
[25] https://history.nebraska.gov/sites/history.nebraska.gov/files/doc/publications/NH2010Lynching.pdf
[26] Potters Field Cemetery - William Brown
[27] The Past Is Not Past. Or Is It? | Harper's Magazine

Related Links

Which famous person in history who is idolized, was actually a horrible person?

What were the most 'badass' moments of history?

Who is the most badass person in history that no one knows about?

Who was the loneliest person in recorded history and why?

What was the day in history in which most people died?

Who is the most misunderstood historical figure?

Which country is the unluckiest?

Anthony Anderson Advocate (2021–present) Feb 4

The Democratic Republic Of Congo

The Country has been unlucky due to historical oppression and instability.

King Leopold II of Belgium brought congo. During his reign, belgiums had perpetrated the genocide agains the congolese people and many had their hands cut off.

In 1960, the Congo crisis begins after the Democratic Republic Of Congo gots it's independence from the belgium the same year. Patrice Lumbumba is removed from power and Lumbumba was executed in 1961.

Joseph Desire Mobutu later known as Mobutu Sese Seko is brought into power in 1965 through the CIA backed military coup which ousted congo's first president Joseph Kasa Vubu.

Mobutu Begins oppressing the congolese people and his political opponents and begins stealing thousands of dollars from the congolese people.

In 1996, The First Congo War breaks out

During the First Congo War Mobutu is overthrown in may 1997 and replaced by the congolese rebel leader Laurent Desire Kabila.

In 1998, the Second Congo War breaks out

During the Second Congo War, Laurent Desire Kanika is assassinated by his bodyguard in 2001 and laurent kabila's son Joseph Kabila later became president.

Joseph Kabila

After the first and second congo war, the country has not yet recovered and the provinces which were affected by First and Second Congo War are still in instability to this day. The Country is still in Poverty and Congolese people are still unemployed and c

Footnotes

[1] America's Black Holocaust Museum

[2] Lest We Forget: The Lynching of Will Brown, Omaha's 1919 Race Riot

[3] https://history.nebraska.gov/sites/history.nebraska.gov/files/doc/publications/NH2010Lynching.pdf

[4] A Horrible Lynching

[5] https://history.nebraska.gov/sites/history.nebraska.gov/files/doc/publications/NH2010Lynching.pdf

[6] https://history.nebraska.gov/sites/history.nebraska.gov/files/doc/publications/NH2010Lynching.pdf

[7] Lest We Forget: The Lynching of Will Brown, Omaha's 1919 Race Riot

[8] A Horrible Lynching

[9] The Omaha Courthouse Lynching of 1919

[10] https://history.nebraska.gov/sites/history.nebraska.gov/files/doc/publications/NH2010Lynching.pdf

[11] A Horrible Lynching

[12] https://history.nebraska.gov/sites/history.nebraska.gov/files/doc/publications/NH2010Lynching.pdf

[13] https://history.nebraska.gov/sites/history.nebraska.gov/files/doc/publications/NH2010Lynching.pdf

[14] https://history.nebraska.gov/sites/history.nebraska.gov/files/doc/publications/NH2010Lynching.pdf

[15] https://history.nebraska.gov/sites/history.nebraska.gov/files/doc/publications/NH2010Lynching.pdf

[16] How white Americans used lynchings to terrorize and control black people
[17] Equal Justice Initiative's report
[18] Memphis Burning
[19] Equal Justice Initiative's report
[20] Lethal Punishment
[21] Equal Justice Initiative's report
[22] Equal Justice Initiative's report
[23] The Evidence of Things Unsaid
[24] Equal Justice Initiative's report
[25] https://history.nebraska.gov/sites/history.nebraska.gov/files/doc/publications/NH2010Lynching.pdf
[26] Potters Field Cemetery - William Brown
[27] The Past Is Not Past. Or Is It? | Harper's Magazine

Related Links

Which famous person in history who is idolized, was actually a horrible person?

What were the most 'badass' moments of history?

Who is the most badass person in history that no one knows about?

Who was the loneliest person in recorded history and why?

What was the day in history in which most people died?

Who is the most misunderstood historical figure?

King Leopold II killed ~10 million Congolese people on his private colony in the Congo, which was not the state of Belgium's territory, but the King's personal property, and he killed them for profit. Isn't this an example of a capitalist Genocide? King Leopold II killed no one.

Kevin Richardson

Former Academic Researcher Thu

Yep, the Congolese cut off their own hands and let people take their pictures to tarnish the good name of King Leopold II.

You won't find any historians saying explicitly that the Belgians killed over 11 million people in the Congo. What you will find is historians saying that the actions of King Leopold II in his private 'colony' of the Congo Free State led to a population decrease of (roughly) between 10 and 13 million people in the Congo. The difficulty comes from defining responsibility for those deaths, as well as the figures themselves. Certainly, the actions of Leopold's administrators and soldiers directly led to a great many deaths, primarily through the infamous 1892 domainal system decree that privatized rubber extraction rights for areas within the Congo, destroying the traditional economic systems and enforcing a labour tax on the Africans. [I address this matter quite extensively in this lengthy response] Essentially what this meant was that local leaders had to supply labourers without payment, in order to meet quotas on rubber production and harvest. Adam Jones, a genocide scholar, wrote that:

the result was one of the most brutal and all-encompassing corvee institutions the world has known....Male rubber tappers and porters were mercilessly exploited and driven to death.

If quotas weren't met or the labourers rebelled, villages were burnt, families killed, and hands were cut off to prove back to prove that bullets were not being wasted (the infamous 'severed hands' policy of bringing the right hands of victims, dead or alive).

A young boy with a severed hand, mutilated by Congolese militias after his father failed to meet his rubber quota. .The Belgian Congo under King Leopold II employed mass forced labour of the indigenous population to extract rubber from the jungle.

Boy punished for failing to meet rubber quota.

An image depicting the destruction of Lungundo village, which was demolished in order to establish rubber plantations. The Belgian Congo under King Leopold II employed mass forced labour of the indigenous population to extract rubber from the jungle.

The growing depopulation of the state was noticed by missionaries and other foreign visitors, and was attributed to disease (sleeping sickness especially) but also the forced labour policies. In some areas, the populations had been decimated. A mission station at Bolobo had once numbered 40,000 — when Roger Casement, the British consul visited, there were less than 1,000. Casement found African after African with stories of brutalities and massacres conducted by soldiers with official policies and protection. In 1908, and partially as a result of Casement's report, the Belgian parliament annexed the Congo Free State. That is when the Belgians began trying to estimate population figures. The 1924 population estimate by the Belgian officials that had taken control of the state from Leopold was a population of 10 million, confirmed by later more accurate censuses. Compared to the population estimates of 1898 and using specific local examples (such as the missionary account of Bolobo mentioned above) it was extrapolated and calculated that the population of the Congo Free State/Belgian Congo had decreased by somewhere between 10 and 13 million. The key reasons were murder, starvation, exhaustion and exposure, disease and low birth rates. This is the crux of the debate — it is very important to separate deaths from population decrease through lack of births. Leopold's actions in pursuing strict economic returns at the cost of African lives was not unique in Africa (the BSAC was heavily criticized for similar actions during the 1890s in what would become Southern Rhodesia), but a staggering number of people died because of the impact his forced labour and the social and health implications his policies had on Congolese society. Certainly, there is no doubt that the population did decrease between 1885 and 1908 (and afterwards), but by what amount remains a little contentious.

Guy Vanthemsche himself has been criticized for seeming to shift blame from Leopold to the contentious ‘disease’ argument, and thereby reducing Leopold’s actions to a side-show of wider natural demographic disasters of unintentional European making, but nevertheless his key point — that the figures are largely imprecise — remains valid.)

The Yale Genocide Research Program might be of interest to you for this topic and for others, as it provides a very good oversight of colonial genocides throughout the world. Adam Hochschild discusses this in his book King Leopold’s Ghost, specifically p.233 and Chapter 15. I can provide some other sources if you want, but they all use the same figures for depopulation, namely those of the Belgians in 1924 and after.

Mark Twain also wrote in condemnation of the Congo. A number of authors were roped into the Congo Reform Association’s campaign against Leopold. That was essential, because without publicity it was easy for the wider public to put it out of their minds—much as abolitionism (slave trade and slavery alike) took off once there were ample accounts, especially those from former slaves, that put a fine point on it.

Commentators that Peter Bate involved in his 2004 documentary White King Red Rubber Black Death pointed to something else: the fact that the two major figures in exposing Leopold, E. D. Morel and Roger Casement, were basically destroyed in the first years of the First World War. Morel was a pacifist, and so appeared pro-German; Casement, well, he very literally was destroyed as a traitor working for Ireland at the behest of Germany. It actually helped to discredit their earlier work, and with Leopold dying within a year of losing the Congo to the Belgian government, it seemed like everything was neatly wrapped up so far as the public was concerned. Without actively providing ongoing data, Africa was easy to forget;

if that data wasn't forthcoming or properly highlighted, no major outrage resulted until much later (see Germany in SW Africa or Tanganyika).

I'd note that another major figure in opposition to these Congolese predations, Arthur Conan Doyle, suffered a similar fate. His growing obsession with the Spiritualist movement and his devotion of much of his later career to that subject have seen people forget that he was also a tremendous agitator for reform and the redress of injustices both at home and abroad. It's easy to remember him for insisting that the spirit of Oscar Wilde had delivered a new manuscript to the world through Doyle's hand; it's easy to forget that he devoted years to getting several wrongly-convicted men out of prison, to say nothing of writing loudly and at length about the Congo.

The funny thing is that I remember Doyle primarily for being an unabashed apologist for the Empire even after the camp disasters of the Boer War became known. He was a weird dude. I understand that he did not himself however have a big role in the Congo Reform Association, but that he was one of the authors enlisted for its publicity. Whether he played that up, of course, was his business—and he certainly broke with Morel and Casement over their pacifist/anti-Empire stance on WWI.

Related Links

How did King Leopold II of Belgium manage to "trick" the other European powers into letting him have such a huge and rich colony like the Congo?

King Leopold supervised the massacre of over 10 million Congolese so why don't we hear about his crimes as much as Hitler's or Stalin's?

Why has Belgium still not compensated the Congolese after all the atrocities, pain of cruelty, and damage they caused? Why is it hard to return all the icons and belongings stolen in the Congo? Why is it among countries supporting war in the Congo?

Is it true that some Belgians do not know that Belgium has killed more than 10 million people in Congo in the past?

How do Belgium people feel about their king Leopold II after all the massacres in Congo?

Is Leopold II one of the most evil men in history for the deaths of around 2-15 million

The Eastern Congo Tribune: Blog Objectives

Ntanyoma R. Delphin

As this Blog website is no longer updated, please visit us on the following link: http://www.easterncongotribune.com Comme ce Blog website n'est plus fonctionnel, priere visiter mes recents articles sur: http://www.easterncongotribune.com

The Blog's initiator, whose names are regularly written down on the bottom of different articles/posts, was born in Minembwe and grown up in a remote village of the Democratic Republic of Congo (DRC), South-Kivu region, Mwenga county, precisely in Itombwe zone. Though unfortunate, the socio-political and cultural environment in DRC and specifically in the region has forced us to largely lean on community/ethnic identities before identifying as belonging to the state.

However, I will have to apologize that the reader will probably pick this feature up in different discussions as we do hardly dissociate ourselves with these feelings. My experience tends to convince me that the DRC state went lengthy absent in our daily life; we consequently found driven into identities that in turn brought exclusion–discrimination on one hand; frustration–assimilation on the other.

Additionally, the absence of responsible state for decades worsened the socio-economic conditions of the ordinary citizens; while poverty and inequality are rising sharply resulting from illegal accumulation of national resources by rulers. Recently, regional powers have found a breach to widely interfere within the DRC's fragile socio-political environment; leading to wars, community armed confrontation, targeted killings and massacres etc.

The blog intends to remind few things. Foremost, it stresses that ordinary citizens have to consider that access to national resources through distribution and redistribution is a right that we never have to give it up. The loophole on our side remains to believe that sharing national resources depends on the willingness of "leaders".

The blog insists on the fate of our people and that of the future generations by calling for the positive change to the extent that everyone must enjoy the inheritance of the potentially rich DRC. Furthermore, there has to be a mechanisms and competent structures subordinated to the sovereign people aiming at distributing and redistributing national wealth.

That is, the blog believes that federalism political system would be the appropriate model for managing Congolese socio-cultural and regional diversities away of patronage, nepotism and despotic decisions; easing public services provision that can sustain development.

The blog advocates the use of non-violent means to bring the change. We all have experienced damages accompanying armed confrontations and inter-community violence. There is a need of drawing experience from different places where Congolese, especially those from Eastern part have moved and live as consequence of wars and apply it for the future. It believes that the rule of law, justice, truth and rehabilitation of victims have to be established. However, the blog emphasizes that justice for all; truth and rehabilitation require to be looked into a reconciliatory angle as we still need to live together.

Leaders and state stakeholders are advised to undertake a holistic approach to solve Congolese problems and prevent a possible backsliding by eradicating corruption, embezzlement and mismanagement. Finally, manipulation and interference from regional powers have to be banned as well as resorting to arms to get aired.

Your contribution will always be needed. Wherever you have a time and read a post/article, the blogger feels glad if you leave a comments, a comment box is on the bottom of each page-post.
You may also need to read previous articles/posts, have a look in archives, rightside of each post. Need to follow and get automatically posts into your inboxes, click on + FOLLOW on the bottom.

You may wish to discuss any topic that looks relevant and interesting; there is a possibility of requesting the blogger's views on any topics, just drop a message into my mail box (rkmbz1973@gmail.com). Confidentiality is guarranteed.

Thank you so much.
Twitter: https://twitter.com/Delphino12

Email: rkmbz1973@gmail.com
Blog: http://www.edrcrdf.wordpress.com

EN REPONSE A MONSIEUR NTANYOMA DELPHIN A PROPOS DE L'INTERVIEW ACCORDEE PAR MONSIEUR LE COMMISSAIRE GENERAL DE LA POLICE A Mme MUGALU, PRESENTATRICE DE L'EMISSION « OLYNCIA SHOW »

Dossier D'Actualites
Ntanyoma R. Delphin

Je note l'intérêt que Mr Ntanyoma Delphin manifeste quant à l'interview que j'ai accordée à Mme Mugalo dans le cadre de son émission « Olyncia Show ». Je l'en remercie. Mais il me semble être aussi un devoir que de recadrer certaines choses qui n'ont pas été bien appréhendées par l'intéressé et de fixer l'opinion à cet effet.

Il sied avant toute chose de souligner que le métier d'armes en général et celui de policier en particulier se veut d'être un métier de respectabilité et d'honorabilité compte tenu du fait qu'il s'agit essentiellement de service à la République par un don de soi. Le policier n'a donc pas vocation à être un créateur d'emploi, il est appelé à servir la République et à ce titre lui est entièrement consacré.

Il y a plus tôt lieu de comprendre que sur le plan des principes, il est inconcevable que les policiers qui sont formés aux frais de la République ou par le mécanisme de coopération ne puissent pas rentrer pour servir le Pays dans le cadre du Maintien et du Rétablissement de l'Ordre Public. Je note par conséquent avec satisfaction que cela ne soit jamais arrivé pour ce qui est de la Police Nationale Congolaise.

La participation à la sécurisation des biens et des personnes, à la mise en confiance des investisseurs qui se bousculent aux portillons est, depuis toujours, le credo des policiers pour lesquels le trésor public consent tant des sacrifices notamment pour l'aspect lié à la formation. Le partenariat Public-Privé inauguré par les instances gouvernementales dans divers projets porteurs de croissance a besoin de cette main d'œuvre sécuritaire.

L'autre volet concerne l'utilisation judicieuse des policiers en tenant compte des aptitudes de chacun selon le cursus qui est le sien et la spécialité qui est la sienne. Le contrôle biométrique qui venait d'être fait est un élément qui entre en ligne de compte pour cette perspective et j'ajoute à ce propos que la Loi n° 13/013 du 1er juin 2013 portant statut du personnel de carrière de police est un instrument qui nous aide à intégrer les éléments de la traçabilité qui prennent notamment en charge cet aspect de formation pour une utilisation optimale des cadres et agents de la Police Nationale Congolaise. Les adéquations entre la formation reçue et l'utilisation du policier seront ainsi mieux réalisées.

Plus encore, il est juste de signifier que le domaine sécuritaire en République Démocratique du Congo est en pleine mutation dont peuvent témoigner les différents instruments juridiques qui ont été votés par le Parlement et promulgués par le Président de la République et Chef de l'Etat ainsi que d'autres pris au niveau gouvernemental sous forme d'actes règlementaires qui les uns les autres font une part belle à la dimension sociale à laquelle vous faites allusion et qui sans doute pourra se voir améliorée au vu des performances gouvernementales dans l'assainissement du secteur économico-financier. Le social tenant de l'accroissement substantiel des ressources, il y a donc lieu d'espérer que demain sera mieux qu'aujourd'hui.
Mr Ntayoma Delphin insinue que la Police Nationale Congolaise fait partie de celles moins performantes. Ceci n'est certainement pas vrai dans la mesure où notre Pays ne regorge pas le taux le plus élevé de criminalité continentale et les exploits réalisés par nos forces de l'ordre dans les différentes missions de pacification à travers le continent prouvent à suffisance de notre capacité de gestion des faits criminels dans le sens de les enrayer et de les endiguer.

En sus, sur le plan purement interne, il sied de considérer les performances réalisées par notre Police dans la sécurisation des grands événements et cérémonies officielles. Un regard rétrospectif peut nous renseigner sur la sécurisation de la cérémonie du cinquantenaire de l'Indépendance de notre Pays, les élections de 2011 pour lesquelles, il y a eu plus de peur que de mal, le sommet de la francophonie, la sécurisation de la ville de Goma après le retrait des forces rebelles de M23, la sécurisation des entités autrefois sous contrôle des forces négatives.
Du point de vue de la criminalité urbaine, l'opération « Likofi », lancé depuis le dernier trimestre de l'année 2013, a donné des résultats probants contre le phénomène dit « kuluna » et des efforts supplémentaires sont envisagés pour mette fin à des phénomènes similaires. Les apports technologiques tant satellitaires que le procédé d'appel d'urgence avec le Centre National de Commandement, de Contrôle et de Coordination contribueront à mitiger ces phénomènes.

Did the European people of his time know about the atrocities of King Leopold II?

Stephen Tempest qualified amateur historian Mon

No, they didn't. Not for many years.
The Congo was very difficult to reach, and of course there were no telecommunication systems in those days to get news out. There were no more than a couple of thousand Europeans in the entire Congo region, and almost all of them were employed by Leopold and under his control.

Besides, most of the atrocities were carried out far inland, in even more remote regions, and often did not directly involve any Europeans at all. The infamous business with the severed hands was the system developed with the locally-recruited Congolese soldiers of the Force Publique to report back to their European officers how many people they had killed recently, as a reprisal for failing to meet the rubber collection target or punishment for rebellion, during their forays into the backwoods. The officer would be presented with a basket of hands, and an account of how much ammunition had been fired, but even he often wouldn't see the actual killing or mutilation.

"It's horrible but exceedingly useful. […] "I should have been horrified at the idea in Europe! But it seems quite natural to me here. Don't show this letter to anyone indiscreet."— Lieutenant Emile Lémery of the Force Publique, private letter.
He was actually talking here about the cannibalism practised by the Congolese troops under his command.

A few people, mostly missionaries, did travel to the Congo independently, and some reported back on what they had seen. However, for the most part King Leopold was able to dismiss their accusations as baseless slander, conspiracy theories, and liberal whining. His lawyers were active threatening legal action against anyone who libelled him, and for many years this was sufficient to keep his reputation clean.

Leopold posed as a selfless humanitarian, spending his own money (the Congo Free State was not controlled by the Belgian government nor financed by Belgian taxpayers) to spread civilisation and Christian values to the people of the Congo, and many people took him at his word and admired him for that.

One of the most influential missionaries who reported back to Europe about the atrocities in the Congo was the Englishwoman Alice Seeley Harris, who in 1898 received permission from the Free State government to travel with her husband

John Harris as a Baptist missionary to the interior of the colony. This was 14 years after King Leopold had set up the Congo Free State.

Alice Seeley Harris in later life (she was 28 when she went to the Congo)

Harris taught English at a mission school in Barinda, but she was also a keen photographer. In 1904, two men arrived at the mission seeking refuge. One of them, named Nsala, was carrying a small bundle. Inside it were the severed hand and foot of his five-year-old daughter Boali, who had been mutilated then killed by soldiers of the Force Publique.

Harris persuaded Nsala to pose for a photograph with the remains of his daughter on the verandah of her house. She and her husband then sent the photograph, along with others she had taken, back to the UK, where their missionary organisation published them in a pamphlet titled Congo Slavery in 1904. The images horrified public opinion in Europe.

Meanwhile, a young shipping clerk named Edmond Morrel was also campaigning against King Leopold. Morrell had a French father and English mother, and had lived in the UK since the age of four; he worked in Liverpool for a shipping company which did business with the Congo Free State, and in his spare time wrote articles for the newspapers about Africa.

Edmond Morrel

Morrel had heard the early whispers of atrocity stories coming out of the Congo, but at first — like most people who heard them — he dismissed them as fairy stories, or isolated incidents by native troops getting out of control. In 1900, however, he made a startling discovery: the official trade figures published by the Congo Free State were apparently being systematically falsified.

He knew this because, in the course of his job, he could gain access to the actual value of the shipments going in and out of the Free State. The only way Leopold's government could be making the level of profit they did, he realised, would be if they were extracting rubber by forced labour on a massive scale, rather than paying their workers a fair wage.

Morrel brought his concerns to his boss, who refused to listen. So instead Morrel went public — became a whistleblower, in the modern phrase — resigned his job and became a full-time journalist and campaigner.

Morrell was joined by other activists who were concerned about affairs in the Congo, but for several years they struggled to arouse public awareness. They wrote articles, published books, and held public meetings, but without making much impact.

Their campaign suffered a further blow early in 1903. A British soldier who had served as a mercenary officer for the Force Publique, Guy Burrows, published a book entitled The Curse of Central Africa, which contained lurid stories of atrocities he had witnessed or heard about being committed on King Leopold's orders. However, the King then sued Burrows for libel — and won his case, because Burrows was unable to prove his allegations. Burrows was fined £500 and the book was banned.

In May 1903, however, Morrel's campaign received an unexpected boost. An American missionary, William Morrison, gave a talk in London about conditions in the Congo, hosted by the Aborigines' Protection Society (a human rights organisation originally set up in 1837, with strong Quaker influence). Several Members of Parliament were in the audience, and two weeks later they arranged for a debate on the issue in the House of Commons.

As a result of this debate, Parliament decided that it should conduct an investigation of conditions in the Congo, and if abuses were found consult with the other signatories of the Treaty of Berlin (which had authorised the creation of the Congo Free State) to 'abate the evils'.

On 4 June 1903, therefore, the British consul in the Congo Free State, Irish-born Roger Casement, received a telegram instructing him to 'go to the interior' and inspect what was happening there.

Roger Casement

Casement spent four months travelling in the remote rubber-producing regions, liaising primarily with the European and American missionaries and the local villagers he was introduced to by them, rather than working through the official Free State government. His reports home and his private journal show him becoming more and more shocked and horrified at what he discovered: by September he was writing to the British Foreign Office describing King Leopold's rubber trade in these terms:

> Of all the shameful and infamous expedients whereby man has preyed upon man, this vile thing dares to call itself commerce.

Casement returned to Britain and handed over his completed report to the government in December 1903. The same week, he met Edmond Morrel, and encouraged him to intensify his efforts to publicise the Congo atrocities. Morel accordingly founded a new organisation, the Congo Reform Association, on 23 March 1904. Shortly before, the government had decided to publish Casement's report, despite pressure from King Leopold to keep it confidential.

The Congo Reform Association also published the photographs taken by Alice Seeley Harris — and in 1905, when she and her husband returned to the UK, they recruited them as officers of the association. Mr and Mrs Harris carried out over 600 public meetings and speaking engagements during the next two years on behalf of the CRA, using the new technology of the magic lantern to show their photographs of brutalised victims of King Leopold's regime.

The CRA also set up branches in several other countries, most prominently the American Congo Reform Association (ACRA) which included Mark Twain and Booker T. Washington among its members.

In an attempt to divert attention from the growing public pressure being created by the CRA and the work of Harris, Morrel, and Casement, King Leopold ordered his own inquiry into the Congo Free State. This commission, headed by a senior judge, Edmond Janssens, toured the Congo taking depositions and published their own report in October 1905.

The Janssens Commission did not completely exonerate the Congo Free State government of wrong-doing, but they did assert that most of the abuses were due to 'misinterpretation of the King's directives' or a 'lack of clear instructions'; and anyway, the worst offenders were the private companies operating by concession in the Congo, not the King';s agents themselves. (Never mind that the King was, in fact, the primary shareholder in most of those private companies as well.)

The report of the Janssens Commission failed to stem the rising tide of outrage against King Leopold, especially in Britain and the US. Even attempts to paint the criticism as merely the prejudice and jealousy of the English-speaking world against its rivals were no longer as effective as they had been.

In 1906 further outrage was sparked in the US when it was discovered that King Leopold was paying an American lawyer, "Colonel" Henry Kowalski (he wasn't actually a colonel) the hefty sum of BeFr 100,000 (over $2 million in today's money) per year to lobby the US government not to look too closely at the Congo Free State's activities. Back then, attempts by foreign governments to secretly influence US policy in their favour through the payment of 'election contributions' were frowned upon.

The idea began to emerge that the Congo Free State should be dissolved, and the elected Belgian government should take control of the territory away from their king. In Belgium itself, the opposition parties, including the Socialists and Liberals, campaigned on this platform during the 1906 election against the Conservatives under Smet de Naeyer, who were opposed to the idea. For the time being, the Conservatives held fast. In June 1906 King Leopold proclaimed defiantly that "My rights over the Congo cannot be shared."

However, in July of that year, the British Foreign Secretary Sir Edward Grey announced that he now favoured "the Belgian solution" to the problem — that is, that the Congo should be taken away from King Leopold and placed under Belgian sovereignity. Grey was in dialogue with Morrel and sympathetic to his aims, but also cautious about disturbing the international balance of power (too cautious, according to radicals in the CRA).

Near the end of 1906, though, something extraordinary happened. The Kowalski scandal in the US prompted an angry debate in the Senate condemning King Leopold: and on 11 December President Theodore Roosevelt made a public announcement that he would cooperate with the British government to force King Leopold to hand over control of the Congo to Belgium. Such a declaration was a major break with the historical US tradition of isolationism from the affairs of the Old World.

Leopold spent 1907 struggling to hold on to as much as possible in the face of this increasing international pressure. He came up with a scheme under which he would cede political control of the Congo to the Belgian government, but retain its revenues for himself. This idea, unsurprisingly, was rejected outright by the government.

Having lost patience, the US government instructed its ambassador in Brussels to put more pressure on the Belgian government. The British government agreed to join them in this action, and on 23 January 1908 the two countries, the US and UK, issued a joint demand (a démarche, in the diplomatic language of the day) to Belgium insisting that it fulfill its obligations under the Berlin Treaty to ensure ‘the freedom of trade, the rights of missionaries, and the humane treatment of natives’ in the Congo Basin.

In response to this pressure, the Belgian prime minister Schollaert finally made a deal with King Leopold. The king would hand over the Congo Free State to Belgium without strings and without keeping any of it for himself; but in return he would be paid compensation: 50 million francs in 15 yearly installments. On 12 October 1908 a law was passed abolishing the Congo Free State and replacing it by the Belgian Congo.

Leopold himself died just over a year later.

The death toll in the Congo will never be known, since no accurate censuses were taken. Most estimates range in the 10 million mark — half the population — though the majority of deaths were due to disease, particularly trypanosomiasis (sleeping sickness), accompanied by famine and internal wars rather than deliberate massacres.

Related Links

Why doesn't anyone talk about King Leopold II of Belgium and just demonize Hitler the most?

Why does no one talk about King Leopold II who killed more than 10 million Africans? Do African people’s lives have the same value as people from Europe or America?

Can you give me an account of the atrocities of King Leopold II of Belgium to the Congolese and the effect it has had on them today? Why is his name not as infamous as Hitler's?

How responsible was Leopold II for the atrocities in Belgian Congo? Was he aware of everything?

Why is Hitler considered worse than King Leopold II?

How do Belgium people feel about their king Leopold II after all the massacres in Congo?

Did King Leopold II know about the atrocities that were happening during his rule?

What extent was Leopold II involved in ruling the Congo? Did he directly order the atrocities (villages razed, limb mutilations, etc.) that took place there?

Did King Leopold II of the Belgians know what was happening in The Congo?

What is the reason nobody talks about King Leopold of Belgium like Hitler? Is it because he killed only black people?

How was it possible for the Belgian government to remain ignorant of King Leopold's atrocities in the Congo for so long? Was that just a pretext for not taking any action?

Hitler and Stalin are considered two of some of the worst people in history, but we never hear about King Leopold II. Was King Leopold II worse than them?

Why has the Jewish holocaust received much more historical and media acknowledgment than the holocaust in the Congo in which 10 million were slaughtered by Leopold II of Belgium?

Why is Hitler universally condemned to hell when King Leopold II who did roughly the same thing on a smaller scale is not even heard of by a lot of people, not to mention proportionally condemned for what he did?

Was Patrice Lumumba's assassination a success? What was the political aftermath of the killing? Did the Belgians & the US achieve the political goals they saw Lumumba as a barrier to? Was the assassination considered a political gain for the West?

Kevin Richardson

PhD in History, The University of Texas at Austin Wed

In broad terms, yes — the status quo that eventually stabilized after the assassination of Lumumba was more in favor of the US than it was for the Soviets.

To understand the goals of foreign powers in the Congo after its independence, we have to look at a fair bit of history.

The Belgians had vested economic interests in the Congo, and were by all accounts rushed out of the colony — they had originally intended for a decades-long process of decolonization, but, as tended to be the case with these patronizing plans for independence in the indefinite future, the colonizers' plans were upset by local unrest. The Évolué upper class of Congolese — those that had been "Westernized" — began agitating for political freedom in the mid-'50s, and the looming decolonization of the surrounding countries put the Belgian Congo in a precarious decision, and, after serious riots in early 1959, the Belgian government suddenly decided to fast-track independence. Congo would be free not in several decades, but several months. The problem here was that the Congo was massively unprepared for self-rule. Fewer than 10 Congolese had a college education at the time of independence, and the apparatus of the state, military, and economy was largely staffed by Belgians, as there had been no effort to train locals for these roles. For Belgium, the intention here was obvious — a nominally independent Congo would still be largely controlled by Belgian nationals, particularly in the mining sector, where Belgium had derived much of the wealth of the colony in recent years.

Patrice Lumumba and the MNC party he led upended these plans. Unlike Joseph Kasa-Vubu's ABAKO or Moïse Kapend Tshombe's CONAKAT, MNC worked to appeal to the Congolese population as a whole rather than a particular local national group.

Lumumba pictured in Brussels at the Round Table Conference of 1960 with other members of the MNC-L delegation

MNC won the 1960 elections and Lumumba ended up as the head of the government. Lumumba had made it clear that the Congo was to be truly independent of Belgium in no uncertain terms and became a tremendously popular figurehead.

The clash between the Congolese people and Belgian neocolonial efforts began on independence day. A Force Publique officer — a Belgian national — agitated his Congolese troops by insisting nothing had changed in terms of command, and in doing so, he sparked a mutiny. This mutiny soon spread through the country, and, instead of calling in Belgian soldiers to put down the mutiny, Lumumba dismissed the Belgian officers entirely. Lumumba worked to pacify the soldiers and was successful with units closer to the capital, but in much of the country, the mutinying soldiers exacted vengeance on the colonizers by targeting Belgian nationals and Belgian-owned property. A Congolese government divided between a more pro-

Belgian Kasavubu and independent Lumumba did begrudgingly agree to Belgium sending in some troops, but by then, it was too late.

Less than two weeks after independence, Moise Tshombe's CONAKAT declared the secession of Katanga province — where the valuable mining interests were located. From the start, the Belgians were clearly behind the move — they immediately threw their support behind Katanga, and Belgian nationals were quickly placed into the same high-level positions they had hoped to hold in the Congo as a whole.

Lumumba, with a paralyzed army in the midst of rebellion, turned to the UN for support. The UN was initially helpful — a resolution was quickly passed that called for the withdrawal of all Belgian troops and their replacement with a multinational peacekeeping force. Unfortunately for Lumumba, while the peacekeepers soon came, he found that their directives were infuriatingly narrow — they were not to help suppress the rebel Katanga and South Kasai provinces (the latter had seceded a month after Katanga under similar circumstances), and the Congolese Army was making little headway against the Belgian-backed rebels. He turned to the United States for support, but President Dwight D. Eisenhower refused to provide unilateral support.

So, after having exhausted all other avenues, Lumumba made the fateful decision that led to his assassination. He turned to the Soviet Union for support. Unlike the prevaricating Western powers or the neutral UN, the Soviets were happy to oblige. They began sending in advisors and materiel, and the Congolese Army began making headway in South Kasai.

la
Pastera
museo del Che

The sudden involvement of the Soviets finally sparked the interest of the Eisenhower Administration in the conflict that they had been trying to stay out of. With Domino Theory fresh in everyone's minds, the Congo was particularly worrying to the US. Its rich natural resources included the very Uranium mines that fed the Manhattan Project, and keeping the largest country in Africa out of Soviet hands suddenly became a top priority.

© picture-alliance/dpa

The assassination of Lumumba that materialized was complex, and it reflected the complex politics of the Congo at the time. The internal struggle between Kasavubu and Lumumba gave the US leverage in Léopoldville, while Tshombe in Katanga was also keeping in touch with Kasavubu as his situation worsened. To make a long story short, a soft coup was performed and Lumumba's government was dissolved at the order of Kasavubu. An army colonel, by the name of Mobutu, then stepped in and declared a coup, ostensibly to stabilize the situation, but, when Lumumba tried to flee to Stanleyville — an MNC stronghold, he was arrested. Soon after, was flown to Elizabethville in Katanga, beaten and tortured, and then murdered and buried in an unmarked grave.

With Lumumba dead and Mobutu temporarily in charge, a rapprochement began with the Congolese factions. Mobutu — himself working closely with the US — soon reinstated Kasavubu and the Soviets were ordered out of the country. With the independence-minded Lumumba out of the picture, the new government was much more amenable to American interests. But the rebel provinces remained at large. Worse, survivors of MNC had fled to Stanleyville and set up their own competing government, which was at this point leaning heavily into Soviet hands.

Soon after the death of Lumumba, the attitude of the UN also changed, and in mid-1961, the UN forces in the Congo were given a mandate to start disarming mercenary groups that had been flooding into Katanga. However, their attitude remained moderate until the death of UN General Secretary Dag Hammarskjöld in a plane crash at Ndola, on the way to negotiations that were set to put an end to the conflict.

Officials searching through debris after the plane carrying Dag Hammarskjold crashed in Northern Rhodesia. Credit... Central Press/Hulton Archive, via Getty Images

U Thant, his replacement, took a much more hawkish stance. UN forces were given a mandate to put down the rebellion by force in late 1961, and soon enough, South Kasai was defeated. Continued Belgian support of Katanga continued into 1962, but the UN remained forceful and ultimately occupied the region at the end of the year, reunifying it with the Congo and forcing Tshombe to flee the country.

Though the UN forces had put down this first stage of the rebellion, the MNC remnants that had taken hold of Stanleyville would become known as the Simba rebels.

Unlike the Katangans, they were a more populist and vaguely communist force, and they enjoyed the nominal support of the Soviets and overt support from Cuban internationalist forces. As the Simbas swept through the Eastern Congo, reports of atrocities against Westerners grew. Meanwhile, back in Leopoldville, a rapprochement had occurred between the government and former rebel Tshombe. Tshombe was brought back into the government, and he called on the same mercenaries he relied on in Katanga to put down the Simbas. These mercenaries spearheaded an offensive that began pushing back the Simbas in 1964, and at the end of the year, they would enter Stanleyville on the heels of US and Belgian paratroopers, who had made a surprise assault on the city (Operation Dragon Rogue) to rescue western hostages.

By 1965, the rebels had finally been defeated across the country. Unfortunately, the political machinations that had provided fuel for the crisis remained. The 1965 elections saw a struggle between Kasavubu and Tshombe finally put to an end by the intervention of Mobutu, who performed a second coup. Ostensibly claiming to restore stability, Mobutu would never quite give up on power.

Mobutu, having been the US's man from the start, was probably the best the US could hope for — a single strong man in a stable positionable to keep pro-Soviet elements out of power. He was willing to leave the foreign mining interests unbothered, and he was even willing to help out with other US foreign policy goals in the region — supporting FNLA rebels against communist-aligned Angola. So in these narrow terms — keeping a regime friendly to US interests in power in the Congo — Lumumba's assassination was a success.

But in broader terms, it's not quite so clear. The Congo Crisis was an absolute disaster for the Congo. The economy was devastated and thousands were left killed. Almost the entire Belgian and Western population fled the country, taking money and expertise in running the country with them. Mobutu, meanwhile, was amenable to American interests, but by all accounts, a disaster for the Congo. Mobutu became a byword for corruption and his regime became the quintessential kleptocracy. If anything, the Congo Crisis — including the assassination of Lumumba — was a catastrophe from which the only saving grace for the United States was that it didn't fall to communism.

If you're interested in further reading, I'd very much suggest checking out "Battleground Africa: Cold War in the Congo, 1960–1965" by Lise Namikas.

As you can probably tell, the period is immensely complicated and this is by far the best resource I've found that covers the whole period in detail.

Related Links

What if Patrice Lumumba wasn't assassinated?
What's the basis for US approval to assassinate Patrice Lumumba?
Why was Patrice Lumumba assassinated?

How was assassination of Patrice Lumumba carried out? Who sponsored his murder, and why?

Was Patrice Lumumba's assassination a success?
What if JFK had survived his assassination?

What was the purpose of torturing Lumumba if the Belgians, US and their Congo allies were already planning on killing him anyways? Was he tortured for information?

Why was Patrice Lumumba assassinated, and why did he post such a big threat after independence?

Why did US and Belgian governments sponsor assassination plot of Patrice Lumumba, the first legally elected prime minister of the Democratic Republic of the Congo? How did they plan his murder?

Was the assassination of Patrice Lumumba right?
Was Lumumba a communist?

How involved was President John F. Kennedy in the assassination of Congolese Leader Patrice Lumumba?

Was the US government's response to the Congolese Lumumba government correct?
What are reasons for the extreme partisanship in American politics today?

Why don't many Congolese hate Belgians who killed millions of Congolies but hate Rwandans who are their close African neighbor?

DEMOCRATIC REPUBLIC OF CONGO:
A REVIEW OF 20 YEARS OF WAR

Authors: Jordi Calvo Rufanges and Josep Maria Royo Aspa Support researchers: Elena Fernández Sandiumenge, Laura Marco Gamundi, Eira Massip Planas, María Villellas Ariño

INTRODUCTION

This study is the result of a mix of ground investigation made in the past few years in the Democratic Republic of Congo (from here on, DRC) and in the neighboring countries of the Great Lakes region by the School for a Culture of Peace. During those stays, numerous interviews to a wide range of local and international actors from the military, political and social fields, both governmental actors and international institutions, and to nongovernmental actors and members of the civil and armed opposition, were undertaken. Moreover, the study is the product of monitoring and analysis of current international events from a number of sources and media of local, regional and international character, as well as from local and international organizations; and from other authors and the specialized literature on the topic. The analysis of armaments is based on the main reports written by the UN

Group of Experts on the exploitation of the DRC's natural resources and on the research on armas transfers carried out by centers such as SIPRI, Small Arms Survey and GRIP, amongst others. On the other hand, this study incorporates the analysis of official governmental reports of EU members, which are, at the same time, amongst the main producers and sellers of armament in the globe. In regard to the Spanish case, the official reports of the Spanish government, as well as their critical interpretations made by campaigns such as Arms under control or the Study Center for Peace J.M. Delàs have been considered. Lastly, the main databases of arms trade have been taken into account: SIPRI and NISAT for a global viewpoint, ENAAT for the European one, and the Center Delàs for the Spanish one. In regards to militarisation, the primary sources used have been the military spending databases of SIPRI and the annual reports of IISS. The study is made of nine chapters, introduced by a methodological briefing. The second chapter seeks to identify the root causes of the conflict, followed by a third chapter on the main armed actors which intervene directly in it. The analysis of armaments is exposed in the fourth chapter, structured in three differentiated subparts. The quantitatively more salient values of exports in the defense field to the DRC are shown according to the databases of SIPRI, NISAT, ENAAT and the EU's official reports. The more significant transfers of armament are also analyzed from a qualitative point of view, as well as their diversion towards armed groups and the identification of weapons found on the ground. Furthermore, the main armament exports to the neighboring coun-tries that have been or continue to be implicated at a higher or lower degree in the conflict are also analyzed: Burundi, Uganda and, especially, Rwanda. Finally, a parallel analysis of militarism in the DRC regarding both military spending (in chapter 5) and armed forces on the ground together with their countries of origin and number of effectives will be presented. The sixth chapter dwells into the economy of war and the role that natural resources play in the conflict, as well as the initiatives taken to regulate it. The seventh chapter presents an overlook of the current political situation and chapter 8 analyses the gender dimension of the armed conflict. Lastly, some preliminary conclusions are drawn for each of the studied parts.

2. ROOTS OF THE DRC CONFLICT DEMOCRATIC REPUBLIC OF CONGO: A REVIEW OF 20 YEARS OF WAR

Joseph Kabila, the son of Laurent Kabila, elected in 2006 as president in the first democratic elections for more than 40 years, although it has not been translated in a cessation of violence. This war continues to be one of the most severe and forgotten nowadays. Nearly two million people continue to be displaced as a consequence of the violence and the insecurity which persist, at the beginning of 2016, in the east of the country. There are 1.6 million displaced people and 170,000 refugees from other countries, and nearly another half of a million of Congolese people are in the neighboring states. The Government has been unable to solve the deep roots of the conflict in the east -when it has not been responsible for its continuity- and has failed in its attempt to extend the State's control to the whole territory. The situation is complex due to the multiplicity of actors involved and to the diverse dimensions of the conflict at its local, regional and international scale, linked not only to the exploitation of natural resources, but also to the dynamics of power, in a region where Rwanda and other regional countries play a fundamental role, but also in a globalized world where the great powers (USA, China) compete to extend their areas of influence. Nowadays, the situation is characterized by the persistence of the political instability and the existence of various outbreaks of violence in the east, despite the Congolese Government's efforts and its international sponsors, which try to promote the demobilization of the armed groups, the reform of the security sector and projects of development, with slender results. The main focus of insurgent violence and of armed activity by the Armed Forces of the DRC (FARDC) are to be found, in the first place, in the districts of Haut Uélé and Bas Uélé (Orientale province, in the north-east) due to the internationalization of northern Uganda's conflict and the presence of the armed group with Ugandan origins named Lord's Resistance Army (LRA), situated in the bordering area between the Central African Republic, the DRC and South Sudan. On the other hand, in the north of the North Kivu province, there is another armed group, also with Ugandan origins, the Allied Democratic Forces (ADF). Moreover, scattered over the provinces of North Kivu and South Kivu (on the border with Uganda, Rwanda and Burundi, in the east), we find the Forces Démocratiques pour la Libération de Ruanda (FDLR), an armed group with Hutu Rwandan origins, of which part of its members are responsible for the 1994 Rwandan genocide, and the remaining of the armed group with Tusti Rwandan origins, the M23, which, despite having been defeated in December 2013, some of its members continue to be active. It is also worth mentioning the factions of the Forces Nationales de Libération (FNL) with Burundian origins, which from being a practically eradicated group, has resurged and been reactivated due to the evolution of the situation in Burundi. Finally, it has to be pointed out that the Ituri district (Orientale province, in the country's north-east) has been progressively normalized. Nevertheless, besides those armed groups, there are studies which indicate the existence of at least another 70 active groups and militias of different sizes in the Kivus. There is a myriad of elements which have led to this current fragmentation, but amongst them stand out the lack of alternatives; the failure of the demobilization and integration in the FARDC process, which in certain periods has co-opted and supported some of the groups at the expense of the others; the availability of the economic resources, which has contributed to transform the alternative of the war economy into a modus vivendi; the instrumentalization of violence in the 2011 elections, during which various movements emerged, and political parties resorted to the use of militias to obtain political leadership and marginalize the adversaries, a fact which triggered the mobilization of local communities to protect themselves from its neighbors, entering an action-reaction circle. All these factors, amongst others, perpetuate this situation of instability which hinders its resolution. 8 DEMOCRATIC REPUBLIC

OF CONGO: A REVIEW OF 20 YEARS OF WAR The FARDC In 2003, the Congolese Armed Forces were refunded as a product of the peace accords reached at the national level, and the Armed Forces of the DRC (FARDC) were created. The country has more than 150,000 soldiers and combatants of armed group from the different security bodies of the State, as well as from the remaining of the Armées Zaitoises and the Garde Présidentielle -from Mobutu's epoch-, the former Congolese Armed Forces (FAC) of the 1998-2003 period, and the tens of thousands of combatants product of the national peace process, the various Mai Mai militias, and the foreign fighters. After the several disarmament, demobilization, reintegration, repatriation and resettlement processes (tens of thousands soldiers belong to foreign armed groups that have been repatriated), and the security sector's reform, the new FARDC ended up having 150,000 members and the Congolese National Police in between 110,000 and 150,000 members, with which it seeks to grant the security of a territory of Western Europe's size. Nevertheless, the program of reintegration in the FARDC presented serious deficiencies and did not deal with parallel leadership chains -many of the soldiers remain loyal to their former leaders- nor excluded from its ranks the perpetrators of human rights violations, nor included any international humanitarian law and human rights education. The FARDC continue to be divided along geographic and identity lines, and many of the 60,000 soldiers deployed in the east continue to be responsible for abuses and serious violations of the human rights of the civil population. Years afterwards, thousands of demobilized minors have been recruited again by force or voluntarily to fill, essentially, the ranks of the FDLR, the Mai Mai militias and the M23 (the former CNDP). The CNDP / M23 After the signature of the 2002 and 2003 peace agreements, one of the main Congolese armed groups made out of the Congolese Tutsi population, the DRC-Goma (a satellite armed group of Rwanda), integrated the national transitory Government. However, some sectors of this community continued to feel politically excluded, and created in 2006 the Congrés National pour la Défense du Peuple (CNDP) with the support of Rwanda, led by the general

Laurent Nkunda, with the aim of defending and protecting the Banyarwandan community and assure its political representation in the Congolese institutions and its recognition as Congolese citizens. It also stood as the representative and defender of the rights of the Congolese population which had fled to Rwanda. It claimed to combat the discrimination faced by the Banyarwandan community, defend itself from the FDLR and promote federalism in the country. In 2006 and 2012, it integrated and left several times the FARDC, until they created in 2012 the M23 group (Mouvement du 23 mars) and confronted again the FARDC, which defeated them in December 2013 thanks to the participation of an UN offensive intervention brigade outside of the UN mission mandate (MONUSCO). Nevertheless, many of the M23 combatants are to be found as refugees in Rwanda and Uganda after the 2013 defeat and, because the attempts at repatriation and amnesty have failed, they can reactivate at any time. Nkunda was betrayed by one of its lieutenants, Bosco Ntaganda, and has been detained in Rwanda since 2009. Ntaganda surrendered himself to be judged by the International Penal Court in 2013. Mai Mai militias The name “Mai Mai” (also “Mayi Mayi”) has its origins in the Swahilian and Lingalan term “maji”, which means water, and refers to the magic properties of the liquids and ointments with which the militiamen sprayed them before the combat and which, as they claimed, protected them from the bullets and made them invulnerable. These traditional warriors were known by the Congolese for having terrorized the eastern part of the country during the 1964 Simba/Mulele rebellion (“Simba” meaning lion in Swahili), led by the young Laurent Kabila, which was crushed by Mobutu. However, their ferocity and resistance had already become famous in that period. They usually have an ethnic and territorial description. The violence exerted by the Hutu Rwandan armed groups in the Kivu in 1995 and the Banyarwanda community’s militias, together with the invasion of Rwanda and the forces led by Laurent Kabila in 1995, triggered their resurgence. They act as militias of civil self defense with nationalist features, opposed to the intervention of Rwanda in Congolese internal issues, and by extension they demand the expulsion of the Banyarwanda community. The militiamen are youth from different communities from the two

3. ARMED ACTORS IN THE EAST OF THE DRC DEMOCRATIC REPUBLIC OF CONGO: A REVIEW OF 20 YEARS OF WAR

In 2003, the Congolese Armed Forces were refunded as a product of the peace accords reached at the national level, and the Armed Forces of the DRC (FARDC) were created. The country has more than 150,000 soldiers and combatants of armed group from the different security bodies of the State, as well as from the remaining of the Armées Zaitoises and the Garde Présidentielle -from Mobutu's epoch-, the former Congolese Armed Forces (FAC) of the 1998-2003 period, and the tens of thousands of combatants product of the national peace process, the various Mai Mai militias, and the foreign fighters. After the several disarmament, demobilization, reintegration, repatriation and resettlement processes (tens of thousands soldiers belong to foreign armed groups that have been repatriated), and the security sector's reform, the new FARDC ended up having 150,000 members and the Congolese National Police in between 110,000 and 150,000 members, with which it seeks to grant the security of a territory of Western Europe's size. Nevertheless, the program of reintegration in the FARDC presented serious deficiencies and did not deal with parallel leadership chains -many of the soldiers remain loyal to their former leaders- nor excluded from its ranks the perpetrators of human rights violations, nor included any international humanitarian law and human rights education. The FARDC continues to be divided along geographic and identity lines, and many of the 60,000 soldiers deployed in the east continue to be responsible for abuses and serious violations of the human rights of the civil population. Years afterwards, thousands of demobilized minors have been recruited again by force or voluntarily to fill, essentially, the ranks of the FDLR, the Mai Mai militias and the M23 (the former CNDP). The CNDP / M23 After the signing of the 2002 and 2003 peace agreements, one of the main Congolese armed groups made out of the Congolese Tutsi population, the DRC-Goma (a satellite armed group of Rwanda), integrated the national transitory Government. However, some sectors of this community continued to feel politically excluded, and created in 2006 the Congrés National pour la Défense du Peuple (CNDP) with the support of Rwanda, led by the general Laurent Nkunda, with the aim of defending and protecting the Banyarwanda community and assure its political representation in the Congolese institutions and its recognition as Congolese citizens. It also stood as the representative and defender of the rights of the Congolese population which had fled to Rwanda. It claimed to combat the discrimination faced by the Banyarwandan community, defend itself from the FDLR and promote federalism in the country. In 2006 and 2012, it integrated and left several times the FARDC, until they created in 2012 the M23 group (Mouvement du 23 mars) and confronted again the FARDC, which defeated them in December 2013 thanks to the participation of an UN offensive intervention brigade outside of the UN mission mandate (MONUSCO). Nevertheless, many of the M23 combatants are to be found as refugees in Rwanda and Uganda after the 2013 defeat and, because the attempts at repatriation and amnesty have failed, they can reactivate at any time. Nkunda was betrayed by one of its lieutenants, Bosco Ntaganda, and has been detained in Rwanda since 2009. Ntaganda surrendered himself to be judged by the International Penal Court in 2013. Mai Mai militias The name “Mai Mai” (also “Mayi Mayi”) has its origins in the Swahilian and Lingalan term “maji”, which means water, and refers to the magic properties of the liquids and ointments with which the militiamen sprayed them before the combat and which, as they claimed, protected them from the bullets and made them invulnerable. These traditional warriors were known by the Congolese for having terrorized the eastern part of the country during the 1964 Simba/Mulele rebellion (“Simba” meaning lion in Swahili), led by the young Laurent Kabila, which was crushed by Mobutu. However, their ferocity and resistance had already become famous in that period. They usually have an ethnic and territorial description. The violence exerted by the Hutu Rwandan armed groups in the Kivu in 1995 and the Banyarwanda community's militias, together with the invasion of Rwanda and the forces led by Laurent Kabila in 1995, triggered their resurgence. They act as militias of civil self defense with nationalist features, opposed to the intervention of Rwanda in Congolese internal issues, and by extension they demand the expulsion of the Banyarwanda community. The militiamen are youth from different communities from the two 3. ARMED ACTORS IN THE EAST OF THE DRC DEMOCRATIC REPUBLIC OF CONGO: A REVIEW OF 20 YEARS OF WAR 9 provinces, who live in conditions of vulnerability and for whom being part of the self-defense militias becomes a matter of subsistence and social recognition.2 Throughout the 90s it was estimated that they could have around 30,000 members. The Mai Mai militias are a particular phenomenon of the DRC's east. In the Pretoria and Sun City agreements of 2002 and 2003, they succeeded in taking part in the transitory Government and were integrated in the Armed Forces. Nevertheless, the internal tensions and the personal rivalries between the different militias, the delays in their integration Map 3.1. Grupos armados en las provincias de Kivu Nord y Kivu Sud, RDC Source: The Landscape of Armed Groups in the Eastern Congo, Jason K. Stearns & Christoph Vogel, Congo Research Group, December de 2015 2. Cros, M.-F., i Misser, F. (2006), Géopolitique du Congo (RDC), Brussels, Éditions Complexe. 10 DEMOCRATIC REPUBLIC OF CONGO: A REVIEW OF 20 YEARS OF WAR in the Army, the grievances in its core due to them being treated as secondary soldiers, the scarce resources allotted to its sustenance and salaries, and the broken promises, made that the major part of its members returned to their communities of origin. The Mai Mai militias are not a monolithic organized structure, but around twenty organizations, nowadays more than seventy, which in particular moments have created alliances to negotiate and defend themselves from the aggressions of other armed actors present in the country. They have varied in legitimacy and in their relationship with the population, and have evolved from the nationalist feeling to the extortion and pillage of the population they claim to protect. Nowadays it is a phenomenon which responds mainly to the absence of the State's authority and, in some cases, which is closer to delinquency than to the protection of the communities of origin. In many cases, it has progressively led to the formation of autonomous armed groups with members of the communities' civilian population, and the links with the chef de village and the chef coutumier are every time more diverse depending on the Mai Mai being analyzed. In some cases those traditional leaders continue to head the militias, which are also led by former military officials of the Forces Armées Zairoses of Mobutu, of the Congolese Armed Forces of Kabila father or of the FARDC (that is, that they integrated them and, afterwards, dissatisfied, left their offices). Those have become warlords paid by local politicians or notables, or on their own, and have attacked other communities and areas to obtain economic benefits (precious woods, charcoal, cattle, extortion, roads' control) and control or participate in the exploitation of natural resources. In this way, the different Mai Mai militias act nowadays like the rest of groups, commit pillage and abuses of the population and hijack thousands of minors, particularly PARECO, APCLS, Yakutumbra, Sheka, Simba and Raia Mutomboki. The categories "Tutsi" and "Hutu" are flexible and contain elements of ethnicity, lineage, clan, so-cial status or economic activity, as has been highlighted by Gerard Prunier (1995) and Itziar Ruiz-Giménez (2003) among others. The arrival of Belgian colonialism instated the Hamitic myth, according to which the Tutsis -in between the 10 and 15% of the population- from Nubia and Ethiopia which had come migrating in the XIIth and XIIIth centuries would be considered a superior race, more civilized and close to Europe, which would have succeeded in dominating the local population, the Bahutus and the Batwa. This myth, of scant scientific rigor, became the base upon which the indirect government dominated by the Tutsis in Rwanda and Burundi was built. This stereotyped myth and the discriminating colonial policies fed an aggressive inferiority complex among the Hutu, resulting in successive waves of violence in the fifties and sixties which prompted the Hutu majority to power after independence (1962). This majority had created a discourse against the Tutsis, considering them foreign invaders opposed to the Hutus, depicted as being the legitimate inhabitants of the country. Nevertheless, before the German occupation (1897) of the Rwandan, Burundi and Tanzania region, Bantus and Batutsis had historically gone through a process of integration and cohabitation. To those groupings it has to be added to the living population currently situated in Congolese territory. In the course of the 50s, the UN, following a European democratization and successive negotiated withdrawal plan, urged Belgium to increment the participation of the Hutus in public life. In 1959, the Belgians had replaced half of the Tutsi hierarchy with Hutus. That very same year, the Hutus created the Party of the Movement of Hutu Emancipation (Parmehutu) and the monarchist Tutsis created the Rwandan party of National Union (UNAR), in the midst of violent confrontations. At the beginning of 1960, two years before the proclamation of the Republic of Rwanda and the separation from Burundi, the UN overlooked the elections which gave the Hutu party a wide majority. Between 1961 and 1973, the Parmehutu killed 20,000 Tutsis and triggered the fleeing of about 300,000 people in the successive years (mostly Tutsis) towards Burundi, Uganda, Tanzania and Zaire (the current DRC). The remaining Tutsis suffered the confiscation of their land and the exclusion from all the State's bodies, as well as criminalization for their supposed collaboration with the various invasions that the exiled Tutsis of the UNAR attempted during that period. In 1973, a coup d'état carried out by some sectors of the Parmehutu who disagreed with the foreign policy and the inequitable distribution of the privileges done by the president Gregoire Kaybanda, ousted the latter from power. His minister of Defense, the colonel Juvenal Habyarimana, who had conducted the coup, established a one party State in 1975, and governed it through the National Revolutionary Movement for Development (MRND), with the support of France. The segregation of the Tutsis that he promoted The stereotipation of the Hamitic myth and the discriminatory colonial policies fed an aggressive inferiority complex among the Hutu, which resulted in successive waves of violence in Rwanda DEMOCRATIC REPUBLIC OF CONGO: A REVIEW OF 20 YEARS OF WAR 11 brought 300,000 to flee, creating a strong feeling of Tutsi grievance among the exiled population and the wish to recapture power. In 1987, in the Tutsi refugee camps of Uganda, the Rwandan Patriotic Front (RPF) was created, with the goal of toppling the Hutu Government of Rwanda. Towards the end of 1980, the abrupt drop in the price of coffee (which represented around 75% of the exports of Rwanda) triggered a socioeconomic collapse and the beginning of a serious crisis in the country. In October 1990, the RPF began its offensive in Rwanda, brought to an end thanks to the intervention of Belgian troops (the traditional referent of the Tutsis), France (which benefited from the Hutu hegemony) and the Zaire. In June 1991, the first mandatary signed the new Constitution which envisaged multipartism, separation of the State's power and a limitation of two presidential mandates. In August 1992, in front of the systematic violation of the Magna Carta, repeated armed confrontations and attempts by the Tutsi refugees dispersed among the neighboring countries to return to the country, the UN negotiated a ceasefire and called for peace conversations to take place at the beginning of 1993 in Arusha (Tanzania). On the 6th April 1994, Habyarimana and the president of Burundi (also a Hutu) died in an air strike. A few hours later, the UN mission to maintain peace in the country (UNAMIR) abandoned Rwanda, together with 600 French residents. The death of Habyarimana gave rise to a genocide against the Tutsis, as well as against moderate Hutus and the Twas, which caused the death of around five hundred thousand people and a million of people (90% of which were Tutsis) in a hundred-day lapse. This number is bound to an important controversy.3 At the beginning of July, the RPF took Kigali with the support of Uganda and the American consent, with a great impact in terms of violence, as it is estimated that around 300,000 people died in what has come to be called the second genocide, an offensive during which crimes against humanity could have also been committed, although there is no con-sensus either around the issue. The UN sent troops to grant the establishment of a Government of national unity, in which the major general Paul Kagame, one of the commandants of the RPF, became the strong man. Moreover, the offensive of the RPF triggered the exodus of approximately two million Rwandan refugees. This population basically moved to the east of the DRC -also to Burundi and, in a lower quantity, to Tanzania- in the so-called Operation Turquoise. This French operation created a secured zone in the southeast of Rwanda that facilitated the fleeing to the DRC of these two million people, among which hided those responsible of the Rwandan genocide. Despite the major part of them being civilians, they were used by the Rwandan political and military leadership willing to recuperate the power in Rwanda, so that the Rwandan refugee population was perceived by its Hutu leaders as an instrument to manipulate the international community, seduce the Congolese president, Mobutu Sese Seko, with the humanitarian aid received to alleviate the crisis, and threaten the new Government in Kigali.4 Since then, in order to counteract this Hutu leadership in the Congolese exile that aims to overthrow the Kagame regime, Rwanda has participated and intervened in Congolese internal affairs, first in order to help Lauren Desiré Kabila topple Mobutu (who had given cover to those responsible of the Rwandan genocide) in 1997 and, afterwards, to try to overthrow Kabila. In the year 2000, Kagame, the regime's 'strong man', was declared president of the country and, in 2003; a plebiscite legitimized him as president in the midst of repression and threats. In October of that same year, the first direct multiparty parliamentary elections in Rwanda (which observers denounced as showing wide irregularities, threats and pressure to the political opposition) gave an ample majority to the RPF. From then on, despite the economic successes achieved by the Kagame Government with international support and the supposed success in reconciliations the country, the former guard of the RPF has controlled the whole country, legitimizing and justifying the climate of police control through the threat of the FDLR present in the DRC. This argument has also served to repress and silence the political dissidence, which had even appeared in the core of the RPF, which forced some of its leaders to go into exile for fear of retaliation. According to various researchers, the US, the UK and its allies justify the development and military aid that Rwanda received with the narrative of the genocide and the feeling of guilt that the international community has for having failed to intervene. Thus Rwanda receives international support despite the climate of repression and the human rights violations that its Government commits nowadays.

The FDLR After the genocide which took place in Rwanda in 1994, among the more than two million Rwandan refugees which fled to the DRC, there were the members of the former Rwandan Armed Forces (FAR) and the Interhamwe militias, which belonged mainly to the Hutu ethnicity, were responsible of the genocide and had been defeated by the RPF. This triggered its regrouping with the aim of perpetrating new attacks in Rwanda, with the permissive and even the connivance of the Congolese Government of Mobutu. To this initial nucleus, known as the Armée de Libération du Rwanda (ALIR), were added young Congolese from the Banyarwanda community recruited voluntarily or by force in the provinces of North Kivu and South Kivu. From that point, it started to launch its military operations against Rwanda. In the year 2000, ALIR merged with other Hutu political-military sectors which had their base in Kinshasa, and together formed the Forces Démocratiques de Libération du Rwanda (FDLR) in 2001, although the FDLR officially denied being linked to the ALIR. Both the ALIR first, and then the FDLR afterwards, collaborated and received the economic and military support of Kinshasa. The governmental support and tolerance continued overtly up to the beginning of 2009, when the Congolese Government decided to change its policy towards the FDLR and collaborate with Rwanda. Nevertheless, as several reports from the UN and NGOs testify, some sectors of the FARDC have continued to support the FDLR and supply military material to them. The group has seen its military capacity decrease with the passage of time and the different military offensives of the FARDC and Rwanda. Indeed, of the 6,000-8,000 combatants it had at the beginnings of the 2000s, at the beginning of 2016 it did not have more than 2,000. The FDLR has a support network and lobbies in different countries of the African continent and Europe (in Germany, Belgium, France and the Nordic countries) and in North America (Canada and the US). The goals of the FDLR are to topple the current Government of Rwanda and to promote a political dialogue, democracy and the respect for fundamental liberties in the Rwandan society. The main reivindication of the FDLR -prior to a pacific return to the country- is the holding of an inclusive inter-Rwandan dialogue. The group has maintained relationships of cohabitation and protection with the local population, although this relationship has also swung towards authoritarianism and the submission of the civilian population, victim of recurrent abuses, retaliations, human rights violations, forced recruitment and pillages. Nowadays, the major part of the FDLR financial resources come from the commercialization of products from the mining areas that it controls in the east, as well as taxes and selling of crops such as palm oil and cannabis. The Ugandan armed groups: the LRA and the ADF The Allied Democratic Forces – National Army for the Liberation of Uganda (ADF-NALU) is an Islamist rebel group led by Ugandan and Congolese combatants that operate in the mountain range of Rwenzori (North Kivu, in between the DRC and Uganda). In its origins it had around 1,2000 and 1,500 militiamen recruited mainly from the two countries and Tanzania, Kenya and Burundi, although nowadays it does not have more than 250 fighters. It is the only group in the area con-sidered an Islamist organization, and it is included in the list of terrorist groups of the US. It was created in 1995 by the merging of a few Ugandan armed groups exiled in the DRC (Rwenzururu, ADF) and was successively named ADF. In the group, an ideology which has its roots in the mar-ginalized Islamist movements of Uganda, linked to the conservative Islamist movement Salaf Tabliq, prevails. In its first years, it was instrumentalised by Mobutu’s Zaire (and later also by Kabila) to pressure Uganda. It also had the support of Kenya and Sudan, and had a strong underground support in Uganda. In the beginning, it pursued the instauration of an Islamic state in Uganda, but in 2000, it consolidated in the communities which hosted it in the DRC, becoming more of a local threat for the Congolese administration despite its limited activity. At the beginning of 2013, the group initiated a wave of recruitment and hijackings, and increased its attacks against the civilian population. The ADF have its operation base around Beni and Butembo (Grand Nord, the northern region of the North Kivu province) as traders, and have contacts and support among the Congolese dealers. According to several local analysts, the group is being used by companies which exploit wood as a supervisor in the territory of Grand Nord and Ituri. It also cultivates fields and taxes the transportation of goods. Officials from the Ugandan Army have had contact with the ADF, and they would have supplied them with weapons. The difficulties to dismantle the ADF stem from the cross-border community collaboration with the armed group, the weakness The goals of the FDLR are to topple the current Government of Rwanda and to promote a political dialogue, democracy and the respect for fundamental liberties in the Rwandan society DEMOCRATIC REPUBLIC OF CONGO: A REVIEW OF 20 YEARS OF WAR 13 of the Congolese Army and the increasingly tense relationship between the DRC and Uganda. Throughout the year 2014, the FARDC launched a military offensive, Sukola I (in Lingala, “cleanse”), with unequal results. Towards the end of 2014 and 2015, approximately 450 civilians died supposedly in the hands of the group. In April 2015, its leader, Jamil Mukulu, was detained in Tanzania and consequently extradited to Uganda. Although weakened, the group maintains its military capacity and the remaining hierarchy continues untouched. On the other hand, Uganda’s northern region has suffered since 1986 from a conflict in which the opposition armed group Lord’s Resistance Army (LRA), moved by the religious messianism of its leader Joseph Kony, has tried to overthrow the Government of Yoweri Museveni, establish a regime based on the Bible’s Ten Commandments and pull out the country’s north from marginalization. The violence and insecurity caused by the LRA’s attacks against the civilian population, the kidnapping of minors to expand its ranks (nearly 25,000 since the beginning of the conflict) and the confrontations between the armed group and the Armed Forces (together with the pro government militias) and the serious human rights violations perpetrated by all sides, Government included, has caused the death of around 200,000 people and the forced displacement of around two million people at the peak of the conflict. The LRA extended its activities to the neighboring countries (the DRC, the Central African Republic, and Sudan) where it established its bases, given the incapacity of the DRC and the Central African Republic to prevent it, and the complicity of Sudan. In between 2006 and 2008, the peace agreements in relation to the cessation of the hostilities, were held successfully,5 despite ultimately failing. In December 2008 the armies of Uganda, DRC and Meridional Sudan (SPLA, which in July 2011 became an independent state, South Sudan) carried out an offensive against the LRA which triggered the disaggregation of the group towards the northeastern region of the Central African Republic, the southeast of Sudan and the southwest of South Sudan, where the offensive continued, since then by small groups with a certain degree of autonomy. The military operations to dismantle the LRA pushed the group (or some of its units, particularly the one led by Joseph Kony) even more towards the north, fragmenting and internationalizing its composition. Dozens of members of the LRA have deserted during the last years, have been captured or have died as a consequence of the encounters with the Armed Forces, up to the point that the number of members has been reduced to a few hundreds, mostly minors, although not for that reason it has lost its lethal capacity. In 2011, the US decided to provide around a hun-dred military assistants to support the central African countries and the military operation promoted by the AU (the initiative of Regional Cooperation against the LRA [RCI-LRA]) in order to capture the group's leader, Joseph Kony. The LRA would be using guerilla tactics, attacking isolated communities where security, the State's presence, accessibility and communications are very limited. The aim of many of those attacks in the later years has been to ensure the survival of the group through the pillage of food, medicines and weapons and the hijacking of minors. The FNL

The origins of the Forces Nationales de Libération (FNL) in Burundi dates back to the end of the 70s, concretely in 1979, when the Party for the Liberation of the Hutu People (PALIPEHUTU) was created as a consequence of the State's violence and impunity of those responsible for the crimes and, particularly, the exclusion of broad sectors of the population, an exclusion with ethnic, regional, political and gender elements. In 1991, the military arm of the movement, the National Liberation Forces (FNL), began to launch attacks from the refugee camps placed in Tanzania and the DRC, especially since the 1993 coup. This was the last group to accept the signature of the Arusha peace agreement, and remained active until 2009, when it joined the political deal by renouncing to violence. Nevertheless, the 2010 elections, considered a fraud by the opposition, became an obstacle which triggered an involution in the country due to the reconfiguration of some insurgent sectors. Moreover, it has to be highlighted the rising authoritarianism and the persecution of the political opposition by the Government, which has pushed part of the opposition to get back to armed fighting as a means to pressure the Government. The remaining of the FNL and other Burundian actors are to be found in eastern DRC, in the South Kivu province, concretely in the Fizi river plain, situated in the border between Burundi and the DRC. Another territory in which the FNL is present is in the Fizi, in between the Uvira plateau and Ubwari peninsula. The FRPI Ituri district, in the southeastern part of the Orientale province bordering Uganda, suffered 5. Royo, Josep M. (2008), Escenarios de paz y de guerra en el norte de Uganda, Quadern de Construcció de Pau núm. 14 DEMOCRATIC REPUBLIC OF CONGO: A REVIEW OF 20 YEARS OF WAR a serious conflict in between 1998 and 2003 characterized for being a reflection of the armed conflict that was experiencing the country as a whole, as the Governments of Uganda, Rwanda and the DRC had local armed actors on the ground to maximize their interests. The withdrawal of the Ugandan troops in 2003 left a power vacuum that various local militias and warlords tried to fill. This evolution forced an international intervention (the European Union's Artemis Operation led by France). Nowadays the tension in the region has been considerably reduced due to the presence of the MONUSCO troops, the advances in the DDR process and the undergoing military operations. The tensions in Ituri were the result of several factors, which include the traditional confrontations over land property (the Lendu, who constitute half of the region's population, are agriculturalists, while the Hema, pastoralists), exacerbated intra communitarian tensions (the fight over political power, the preeminence of the Hema community during the period of Belgian colo-nialism) that have been manipulated, instrumentalized and rekindled by economic and political interests, mainly by Uganda and Rwanda. This region, like the east and southeast of the country, has abundant natural resources, like wood, gold, diamonds, coltan, uranium and, more recently, oil. This area has been controlled since the beginnings of the conflict by the Ugandan Armed Forces, its main goal being to exert a monopoly over the critical local natural resources. Nevertheless, the instability persists due to the continuous incursions of the Front de Résistance Patriotique d'Ituri (FRPI). The FRPI was created in November 2002 out of the Ngiti community's youth, allies of the Lendu community and the Front des Nationalistes et Intégrationnistes (FNI) groups, demobilized in August 2007 and transformed into a political party. The group, opposed to Thomas Lubanga Dyilo6's Union des Patriotes Congolais (UPC), the main Hema militia, attained a membership of 9,000 in 2003 and has even received the support of Uganda. Although around the 15,000 members of the FRPI were demobilized in 2006 and their main leader, Germain Katanga, was arrested and transferred to the ICC under accusations of war crimes and crimes against humanity, many of the non-demobilized factions or those that participated in the DDR process and subsequently re-organized themselves, continue to commit acts of pillage and extortion of the civilian population, to cut roads to recruit minors. The FARDC have since 2015 been carrying out a military operation to force this group to give up using arms.

God bless Congo!

What are your opinions on the YouTube channel "The Alternative Hypothesis"?

Kevin Richardson Follow Researcher, Biologist, Historian, Anthropologist. (2008–present) Dec 15

In a post yesterday, I responded to White nationalist blogger Ryan Faulk's shoddy calculations of the death toll during the Congo Free State. Picking up where we left off, in the remainder of Faulk's article, he tries to either minimize the atrocities or to absolve Leopold and the Belgian authorities of any blame. But first, I would like to offer some more background on Faulk to provide an idea of who we're dealing with here. He subscribes to an extreme biological determinist position through which he views not only history but practically every other social phenomenon. On his site, he lays out his philosophy, which he refers to as "First Worldism."

First Worldism is the view that the policy stances and government outcomes we classify as "first world" and "third world" are a function of population genetics. The "first world" peoples are primarily, though not exclusively, European, with minorities of other races having people who have, on aggregate, genetic predispositions to first-world traits.

First-world traits are:
Anti-authoritarian views of knowledge and truth,
A lower level of social sensitivity, conformity and consensus-seeking support for free speech Opposition to heavy government intervention and regulating of private property (i.e. the consensus-economies of West, Central, South, Southeast and East Asia), support for free markets

Lower crime, higher diligence and self-control, higher IQs.
Less interest in grievance politics and bloc-politics

Source: The Alternative Hypothesis

Argument 1: Leopold didn't have control of the whole Congo

Faulk first argues that the Belgium regime didn't have effective control over the entire region for the whole period of the Congo Free State, so it can't be responsible for all the deaths. He cites a statement by the Belgian embassy in London issued in response to a BBC documentary.

Finally, the cultivation of rubber was geographically restricted to the equatorial rainforest around the northern Congo basin and to a lesser extent to the Kasai region (totalling one fifth of Congo's territory). The estimated 10 million deaths for the whole of Congo cannot be ascribed to the Belgians, simply because at the beginning of the colonisation, they were not even present or active in the whole of Congo.

Source: Mythologies About Leopold's Congo Free State

But this doesn't really hold up to scrutiny. As noted in the previous post, the population was likely dense around the Congo River and its basin area, i.e., the area under Leopold's effective control for the longest time. The reason Stanley's original population estimate of 26 million is considered unreliable is that he used estimates of population density around the river, which were much higher, to calculate the population of the interior.

Furthermore, the worst abuses occurred in the 1890s after new inventions caused the price of rubber to skyrocket. At the same time, the Congo Free State was building railroads and expanding its control over the interior. The Congo Free State also engaged in military conflicts beyond the territory of its nominal control.

Argument 2: The Congo Free State lacked the manpower to kill that many Here Faulk tries to argue that the relatively small size of the Congo Free State bureaucracy and military forces is sufficient evidence it is implausible that so many people could have died under the regime. This is reminiscent of a tactic of Holocaust denial. The scale of the atrocity is so unimaginable that it's deemed impossible prima facie.

First, he looks at the Force Publique, Leopold's private army made up of African soldiers and

If we average the size of the FP in 1892 and 1908, we get 15,450 men in the FP at any one time. And with 3.286 tours of duty, this means that there were roughly 50,769 men in the FP during the entirely of Leopold's rule. This translates to roughly 197 men killed for each member of the FP in order to reach 10 million kills. This seems like an extremely dubious figure.

Source: Mythologies About Leopold's Congo Free State

Faulk is arguing against a straw man here. The mainstream position isn't that Congo Free State security forces killed 10 million but that this number died as a direct or indirect result of Belgian rule. Many of these deaths were due to starvation and disease.

But these factors can't be considered acts of God, exculpating the Belgian regime. Agriculture suffered as laborers died or were redirected from food production to meet unrealistic rubber quotas.

CONGO L'arrivée du caoutchouc d'une factorerie

alamy
Image ID: G3AN9X
www.alamy.com

alamy
Image ID: C13KGT
www.alamy.com

alamy
Image ID: 2AJH946
www.alamy.com

alamy

Image ID: P67J64
www.alamy.com

Starvation and exhaustion weakened immune systems and raised mortality while displacement accelerated the spread of infectious disease as formerly immobile populations were forced to relocate.

In a report on a more recent conflict in the Democratic Republic of Congo, the International Rescue Committee observes that only 0.4 percent of the estimated 5.4 million casualties is directly attributable to violence: “the majority of deaths have been due to infectious diseases, malnutrition and neonatal- and pregnancy-related conditions.”

But just for the sake of argument, let’s look at the number that Faulk considers so “dubious:” 197 deaths per soldier.

In “Congo: The Epic History of a People,” Belgian historian David Van Reybrouck notes the exceptional cruelty of the infamous Belgian commander Leon Fievez. In his first four months of service alone, he was responsible for punitive expeditions that killed 572 people. In one expedition, he oversaw the looting and burning of more than 160 villages in a matter of days. Over the course of the expedition, nearly 1,350 people were killed and crops were destroyed. Van Reybrouck also notes that Fievez had the most profitable operation in the region.

Furthermore, focusing solely on the regular army overlooks some of the main sources of violence. The coercive apparatus of the rubber industry was supplemented by irregular local forces. Some of the worst atrocities happened within the territory of concessionary companies like the Anglo-Belgian India Rubber Company (ABIR). The company adopted a post system under which a couple of European administrators extracted rubber from the populace using a local militia of 60-100 sentries made up of native Congolese or former slaves.

And because severed hands were accepted in lieu of tax, some Congolese would fight small wars with each other just to make up the difference in their unreasonably high rubber quotas.

Argument 3: Lack of documentation

Here Faulk argues that there is a lack of adequate documentation. And he's right, if you ignore a mountain of eyewitness accounts by journalists, missionaries, diplomats and reformers. He shrugs off the claim that Belgian officials might have destroyed records.

On issue historians face when condemning Leopold II is a lack of documentation; even a BBC documentary blithely accused Leopold of destroying the relevant records. It's not a charge that is easy to respond to; how does one prove that no records were destroyed?

Source: Mythologies About Leopold's Congo Free State
While you can't prove a negative, there is evidence that official records from the era were destroyed coming from an eyewitness in the administration. In chapter 19 of "King Leopold's Ghost" titled "The Great Forgetting" (p. 293), Horschild gives an account of a military aide to the king who witnessed the large-scale incineration of records in 1908 shortly before the handover of the free state from Leopold to the Belgian government. According to the aide, Gustave Stinglhamber, the king said, "I will give them my Congo, but they have no right to know what I did there." Next, Faulk argues that the existing evidence implicates the native forces:

But it shouldn't matter, because from 1904 to 1908, in response to public outcry over the Congo, an independent council created by Italy, Switzerland and Belgium conducted an ongoing investigation and released periodical reports called The Official Bulletin of the Congo Free State.

Of course this council did not report extreme genocide going at the behest of Leopold's government. In fact, they reported that the abuses occurred almost exclusively when FP detachments were sent out WITHOUT a European commander, and that the presence of European commanders was what prevented atrocities and rape.

(It is interesting to read these bulletins and see just how matter-of-fact they are about it; it's just assumed that blacks will rape unless kept in order by whites.)

Source: Mythologies About Leopold's Congo Free State
So what we have here is a perversion of the Nuremberg Defense. The officers, who were entirely European, aren't held responsible for their soldiers who didn't follow orders. But most historians argue that the Commission of Inquiry report corroborates most other accounts of the atrocities, especially the sentry system under ABIR.

Their account doesn't absolve the Belgian officers so much as it reveals the colonialist bias of those compiling the report who are incredulous that their fellow Europeans could be implicated in such barbarity, so they blame it on a combination of poor White oversight and the unchecked "sanguinary impulses" of the natives. The Belgian commanders would issue euphemistic orders, like "remind them of their duty," so either the soldiers misinterpreted this, or it's far more likely that they knew exactly what was expected and acted accordingly.

"The order given to the commanding officer of a detachment was generally expressed in the following way: "so and so is instructed to punish or chastise such and such a village." The Commission knows of several expeditions of this type the results of which were frequently murderous. One cannot be astonished at it. For in the course of delicate operations which have for their purpose the taking of hostages and the intimidating of natives a supervision is not always possible to hold in check the sanguinary instinct of the black, for when the order of punishment comes from a superior authority it is very hard to keep the expedition from assuming the character of a massacre accompanied by pillage and the destruction of property. Military action of this character always exceeds its purpose, the punishment being out of proportion to the fault.

Source: Mythologies About Leopold's Congo Free State

This line of reasoning is mind-boggling. It’s essentially saying that the Belgian authorities can’t be held liable e when the very purpose of the expedition is to coerce labor out of a group of people by brute force. How are those who gave the order somehow less culpable in the act merely because of overzealousness on the part of those who carried it out?

When discussing the mutilations, the Commission similarly denies that any white men took part. But other accounts contradict this narrative. Leon Rom, a Belgian officer who is said to be the model for Joseph Conrad’s Kurtz, was reported by journalist and explorer Edward Glave to have gallows in his front yard and decorated his flower beds with two dozen severed heads.

A Catholic priest relayed an account of the aforementioned commander Leon Fievez given by a local man:

All blacks saw this man as the devil of the Equator...From all the bodies killed in the field, you had to cut off the hands. He wanted to see the number of hands cut off by each soldier, who had to bring them in baskets...A village which refused to provide rubber would be completely swept clean. As a young man, I saw [Fiévez's] soldier Molili, then guarding the village of Boyeka, take a net, put ten arrested natives in it, attach big stones to the net, and make it tumble into the river...Rubber causes these torments; that's why we no longer want to hear its name spoken. Soldiers made young men kill or rape their own mothers and sisters.

Faulk then makes another dishonest argument that since mutilation wasn’t written down in official policy that it wasn’t widespread, condoned or encouraged by the regime documentation that that was Leopold's policy, nor did the investigation find any evidence that it was Leopold's policy. In fact, the investigation claimed that this was done by indigenous members of the FP, particularly when a European officer was absent.

And in terms of mutilation – chopping off hands and feet – there is zero

Source: Mythologies About Leopold's Congo Free State
It's true there wasn't much official policy of any kind, and that was a huge problem. Officials had limitless discretion and a mandate to maximize profit, so the practice was widespread, particularly as a means to prevent expensive ammunition from being wasted on hunting. As Van Reybrouck notes:

At various places, therefore, there arose the practice of cutting off the right hand of those they had shot and taking it along as proof of what the bullet had been used for… During the debriefing [the tax collector] was expected to present the hands as pieces justificatives—as receipts for expenses incurred. Next, Faulk questions the practice on the basis that it is intuitively impractical.

In addition, chopping off limbs seems to be a ridiculous policy given that the biggest problem Leopold had was a labor shortage. It is also known that limb mutilation had occurred both before and after the Congo Free State – and without any reliable statistics, there's no way to know if it even increased during the Congo Free State.

Source: Mythologies About Leopold's Congo Free State

Again, he echoes Holocaust deniers who point to the absurd waste of manpower to carry out the genocide so they are skeptical that the Nazi regime would rationally decide to devote resources to such an undertaking during wartime. It's an attempt to apply rationality to an inherently irrational act of mass murder.

A lot of the mutilations and executions weren't of adult laborers but of their children, who were frequently taken hostage and/or subjected to rape and torture. And as the case of Fievez illustrates, the most brutal and deadly operations were also the most profitable. So there's nothing to say that high death tolls or mutilations can't coexist with high productivity.

And while the practice of chopping off hands as a trophy in warfare might have existed prior to the free state, it wasn't regularized into some barbaric form of bookkeeping by a state that exists to extract profit through naked violence on an industrial scale.

Argument 4: Denying Black agency

Here Faulk makes one of his most disingenuous arguments by accusing those who assign blame to Leopold of infantilizing the people of the Congo.

There are two more important facts to consider. The first is that there were roughly 200 Europeans in the Congo Free State administration at any one time, versus around 13,000 black FP troops at any one time. And so the mutilating, raping and killing that was done had to have been done overwhelmingly by the black FP troops.

Now at the time, the Belgians blamed Leopold II for what the black FP troops were doing because they viewed blacks as "half-devil and half-child"; and whites were responsible for their action in the same way a dog owner is responsible for a dog's action.

"Sure, the blacks did the killing, but they're YOUR responsibility. Blacks do what blacks do."

Modern day white "liberals" would of course be aghast at such thinking. But it creates a problem for intellectual consistency, they're condemning Leopold for a standard that treats blacks as pets for whom the owner is to be in charge of and responsible for.

Source: Mythologies About Leopold's Congo Free State
His dog analogy misrepresents the entire notion of chain-of-command that forms the basis of military organization. A soldier is not a dog. Individual agency aside, soldiers operate on orders. No one in their right mind would argue that when Belgian officers sent their soldiers out on punitive expeditions, they were totally ignorant of what they would or did do. And if they were ignorant, then they're just as culpable for exercising lax oversight. And he's lying about the number of Belgians. Records show that the Belgian population alone was 1,500, not counting other White European representatives of concessionary companies from different countries.

Argument 5: Propaganda

Finally, Faulk ventures into flat-out denial, arguing—again without evidence— that Leopold's critics misrepresented the regime by exaggerating the atrocities:

And so if a dishonest or ignorant newspaper editor got some pictures or description of a battle in that war, he would have plenty of gory pictures and gruesome details, and he could then say, "this is Leopold's Congo" to dishonestly seed the idea that this was normal Congo Free State policy for all Congolese. In addition, if say some men in the FP chopped off the hands of 20 people, well, 20 images can fill up an entire page, and would make it look like mutilation is happening all the time; and he could then say, "this is Leopold's Congo". You could then show the horrible hospitals, dirty and lacking supplies, without the context that this was actually an improvement over the "folk medicine" of the Congolese. But just images of the horrible hospital conditions, and then say "this is Leopold's Congo".

Source: Mythologies About Leopold's Congo Free State

But the evidence isn't just a few pictures. Much of it comes from eyewitness accounts of Protestant missionaries from all over the world. At the time, Leopold accused the Protestants of libeling the Catholic Belgians, but even Catholic newspapers in Belgium and elsewhere reported the atrocities. And for a person with nothing to hide, Leopold went to great lengths to harass and silence his critics.

"The Alternative Hypothesis?"

Most of his final summary just rehashes the points that have already been refuted in detail, so I'll just focus on a couple.

Leopold's Congo did not have any form of population statistics. And so there is no record of how many people died in the Congo; this makes it easy for people to pull numbers out of there. Moreover, it is the Congo, it is a place where people die all the time for horrible reasons and live in conditions that Europeans even at that time would consider torture. 200 Belgian administrators are not going to change that. So here he's massively downplaying the extent to which a colonial regime can exacerbate existing phenomena, like disease and starvation.

The rubber quota was just a form of taxation. In fact, throughout history, labor rendered to the state was the most common way in which people paid taxes, since most people didn't have currency. And that is how most of the Congolese paid their taxes, and Leopold's policy was that no man's tax should be over 40 hours per month.

The difference being is that with taxation, one usually gets something out of it in the form of public goods like education or infrastructure. The Congolese got nothing and had much taken from them. They were dispossessed of their land, which was nationalized and made the private property of Leopold. Their condition was in many ways worse than slavery because a slave master at least had some obligation to look after the well-being of his property. The Congo Free State and its concessions were only concerned with how much value they could extract, and would do so by any means necessary.

And I've never heard of a case where the IRS took a person's family hostage and mutilated them because they didn't pay enough taxes. Also, the rubber quotas were set by central authorities without consideration of local conditions, such as the number of laborers in a village, so they were in almost all cases impossible to meet.

As for the reforms limiting work to 40 hours, if they were even implemented at all in practice, they were done so only after the commission's report in 1904 or possibly not even until the Belgian Congo period in 1908. Some historians have noted that despite the supposed reforms, it was business as usual in the Congo well after the Congo Free State period since the personnel did not change at all.

In terms of cutting off limbs, that was a practice that predates and postdates Leopold's Congo. In addition, several of the photos of Africans with limbs chopped off have Europeans posing with them; do you imagine that they would pose with them if they had done it themselves? Do you think they would want to take photos because they were proud of doing that themselves?

Again, Faulk is severely misrepresenting the facts. The Europeans he mentions posing with the severed limbs were missionaries trying to sound the alarm about the horrors of the Congo, not colonial officials.

And activists, looking for a flashy number, say "10 million" and quickly cobble together imagery, anecdotes and personal accounts, without doing the first level of research and ask "is this possible" or try to figure out if indicators of past population showed a decline or increase in population over the period. A similar thing happened in Britain during the industrial revolution as politicians learned of the frightful conditions of factories, ignorant of the fact that it was an improvement of the even more frightful conditions of peasant life. At least that is one alternative hypothesis.

So Faulk ends by insulting the work of historians who have devoted much of their lives to these questions and have done much more than “first-level research.” He concludes with the standard assumption that colonialism was a net benefit to the colonized comparable to the Industrial Revolution and that somehow the lives of the Congolese people were made better or unaffected by displacement and a cruel regime of forced labor.

The Congo Free State was a great pyramid of suffering and exploitation with King Leopold at the apex. In the absence of oversight or firm rule of law in an environment where brutality was incentivized, large-scale violence was inevitable. The losses incurred in the initial period, when the main source of income was ivory, drove the worst excesses in the rubber boom of the 1890s. Local officials were taken off salaries and put on a commission system based on rubber output, which motivated them to unimaginable cruelty out of self-interest. Follow Kevin Richardson

THE CONGO FREE STATE

Why doesn’t Belgium recognize genocide in Congo they committed against millions of black Africans?

Idy Udofa Follow Lives in Africa Wed

Belgium is a white country, and congo is a black country and historically, Black lived didnt matter much from the whole perspective The thing you need to know about white people and mostly western european white is that no matter how bad their leader or their icon is, they will try as much as possible to white wash his image and make him a saint, and go as far as downplaying his crimess, you can see this attitude in churchill as a brotosh national hero, same withj leopold as a belgium national hero , had the crimes been committed by someone else who isnt white european you will hear europeans talk about it forever, the same way germany constantly reminds turkey about a gennocice that occured but somehow germany forgot the genocide it committed during the same period in namibia, so that is just the way of the white, they try as much as possible to whitewash and downplay their crimes the new version of events is that congo was property of leopold, as if the belgians didnt know what was going on, notice how they will try and seperate the crimes from the people of belgium but when it comes to attrocities commited by other say the chinese, we begin to hear the whole of china is guilty, the whole of japan is guilty and the whole of islam is guilty, so the long and short of why you dont hear abput it is that Belgium is a whhite country and this is their mode of operation. Follow Idy Udofa

Related Links

USA did not recognize genocide of American natives, France didn't recognize Rwanda and Algeria, Belgium- Kongo, Russia - circassian, Italy- Ethiopian genocides. Why Turkey is so much on the spot? Is genocide recognition only a political tool?

Why are there a large number of Africans living in Belgium?

Why doesn't the United States recognize the massacres of Native Americans as "genocide"?

Why is the Belgian genocide in the Congo not viewed in the same light as the Holocaust?

Is there racism against black people in Belgium?

Why don’t many Congolese hate Belgians who killed millions of Congolies but hate Rwandans who are their close African neighbor?

Why doesn't Belgium recognize the Congolese genocide?

Has Belgium ever formally apologized for the Congolese genocide?

Did the Belgians cause genocide in Rwanda? I watched, Hotel Rwanda where a guy narrated how the belgians separated two groups, tall and thin nosed, and the short, or thick nosed and one group was left to be in charge of the others.

Why do so many people think Africans inhabited Ireland, and that St. Patrick committed a genocide?

Do you think there is white genocide in South Africa?

Did black Africans living in South Africa ever express their intention to wipe out the white race?

How did the Belgians force the native Africans to work in the Congo Free State?

To what extent is the Belgian presence in Rwanda responsible for the genocide?

Would Hitler be infamous if he had killed blacks/Africans and not whites like King Leopold II of Belgium did to the Congolese?

Did the Bantu expansion decrease the diversity of Africa?

Ygor Coelho Avid reader on history of peoples and population genetics.1y

Yes, when you have a massive population boom of an originally much smaller population, like that of the Bantu peoples, mostly replacing the other populations of much of the continent (despite varying, but invariably minor, amounts of admixture with the indigenous peoples), a sort of genetic blottleneck happens, with not that much time left (3,000–3,500 years at most) for the populations to drift apart from each other again intensively enough to restore at least some of the former, much more ancient (and therefore more diverse) genetic structure.

The Bantu expansion basically brought the majority of Central Africa, East Africa and South Africa - which had their own primordial indigenous as well as non-indigenous genetic admixtures - strongly towards the genetic cluster of West Africa. The pre-Bantu populations were mainly hunter-gatherers and pastoralists.

There are exceptions, though. The Kikuyu, the Luhya, the Tutsi are Bantu-speaking peoples that are clearly very strongly shifted to non-Bantu and non-West African genetic clusters. A bit less so, the South/Southeast Bantus also had some pretty relevant degree of admixture with indigenous Khoisan-like peoples.

Unfortunately there haven't been a lot of ancient DNA samples successfully retrieved and analyzed in all of Africa until now, but there are more than enough to indicate that roughly before 1,000–3,000 years (the dates of the arrival fo the Bantu expansion varied from one region to another) the genetic structure of most of the eventual Bantu-majority lands was very different and far more diverse. Look:

Modern Bantu-speaking peoples, who form the large majority of all Africans living from Cameroon and Kenya towards the south, occupy a much smaller portion of the total modern and ancient genetic diversity of the territory of what is now known by some as "Bantu Africa":

Follow Ygor Coelho

Related Links

Did the Bantu mainly kill of the existing populations during their expansion?

What did the original people of Africa look like before the Bantu expansion?

Are West Africans considered Bantu?

Why do Bantu/Niger-Congo Christians get angry when Northeast/Horn Africans say that they are not their kins (which is true)? Why do they want people who have nothing to do or look like them to identify with them?

How did the Bantu expansion affect the native populations of the areas into which they expanded?

Why do Bantu Black Africans complain about "East" African (more like Bantu African) slave trade, when it was their kind who sold them not the Muslims?

There is a new DNA study attached below that shows modern West Africans and sub-Saharan Bantu speakers are not native to the region and that they only arrived there around 500 BC. So where did they come from?

Why did the Bantu expansion occur?

What is the difference between West Africans and Bantu people?

Are African-Americans mainly Bantu, Nilotic or Khoi-San?

How much did "The Bantu Expansion" change the African continent?

The idea of Bantu expansion from West Africa to Central Africa makes no sense. Why do Europeans stick to this false theory? What's the agenda?

Did the Bantu expansion wipe out other native ethnic groups from southern and central, Eastern Africa?

What caused the migration of the Bantu people to take over much of Southern Africa?

Are Nilo-Saharans like the Dinka and Masai closely related to West Africans and the Bantu tribe? Or are they more closely related with East Africans genetically?

RDC : Kabila pourrait poursuivre les auteurs de l'enquête « Congo Hold-up » Les avocats de l'ancien président de la République démocratique du Congo Joseph Kabila ont annoncé jeudi que leur client "se réserve le droit de porter plainte" contre les médias et ONG qui l'ont accusé dans un rapport d'avoir siphonné 138 millions de dollars en cinq ans

Joseph Kabila, the outgoing president of the Democratic Republic of the Congo, sits in a garden at his personal ranch

Les avocats de l'ancien président de la République démocratique du Congo Joseph Kabila ont annoncé jeudi que leur client « se réserve le droit de porter plainte » contre les médias et ONG qui l'ont accusé dans un rapport d'avoir siphonné 138 millions de dollars en cinq ans.

Le clan de l'ancien président Kabila était mis en cause dans l'enquête intitulée « Congo Hold-up », basée sur 3,5 millions de documents bancaires confidentiels, obtenus par le média d'investigation français en ligne Mediapart et l'ONG « Plateforme pour la protection des lanceurs d'alerte en Afrique (PPLAAF) ».
« Suite à la violation grave et intentionnelle de ses droits fondamentaux, notre client se réserve le droit de saisir incessamment les instances judiciaires compétentes tant en République démocratique du Congo qu'à l'étranger », a déclaré Me Raphaël Nyabirungu, chef du collectif d'avocats congolais de M. Kabila.

Des collectifs d'avocats sont constitués en France, en Afrique du Sud et en RDC, a indiqué Me Nyabirungu.

M. Kabila a été victime de « l'acharnement de la part des médias internationaux politiquement orientés, manipulés et instrumentalisés » qui ont reçu la mission « d'intensifier la crise politique en RDC aux fins de maintenir le contrôle du sol et du sous-sol congolais », a-t-il estimé.
Professeur de droit pénal, M. Nyabirungu s'est dit étonné que les médias se soient focalisés sur un seul homme, M. Kabila, « qui n'a causé aucun tort à aucun de leurs pays, sans présenter une seule preuve, une seule transaction en son nom ou à son profit, sans indiquer un seul compte en son nom ».

Vantant le patriotisme de l'ancien président Kabila, Me Nyabirungu a indiqué que l'enquête « Congo Hold-up » était truffée « d'insinuations malveillantes d'une hargne rare », qui mettent en cause « l'intégrité » des médias et ONG auteurs de l'enquête.

Les données qui accusent le clan Kabila ont été analysées par 19 médias internationaux et 5 ONG pendant six mois sous la coordination du réseau European Investigative collaborations (EIC).

Âgé aujourd'hui de 50 ans, Joseph Kabila est arrivé au pouvoir à 29 ans, en janvier 2001, après l'assassinat de son père Laurent-Désiré Kabila qui avait renversé en 1997 l'ancien dictateur Mobutu Sese Seko.

Il a été président jusqu’en janvier 2019, lorsque l’actuel chef de l’État et ancien opposant Félix Tshisekedi lui a succédé.

Quel souvenir gardez-vous de Patrice Lumumba ?

Suivre Alexandre Roswilo

, Précédent lieu : Afrique (1975–2019)3 ans

Lumumba[1] était un dirigeant jeune et courageux trop en avance sur son temps à travers ses idées . Heureusement pour l’Afrique et le reste du monde, il est devenu une balise pour ceux qui luttent pour leur liberté et leur indépendance.

[2]

La dernière lettre qu'il l'écrit à sa femme resume son combat :

"Ma compagne chérie,

Je t'écris ces mots sans savoir s'ils te parviendront, quand ils te parviendront et si je serai en vie lorsque tu les liras. Tout au long de ma lutte pour l'indépendance de mon pays, je n'ai jamais douté un seul instant du triomphe final de la cause sacrée à laquelle mes compagnons et moi avons consacré toute notre vie. Mais ce que nous voulions pour notre pays, son droit à une vie honorable, à une dignité sans tache, à une indépendance sans restrictions, le colonialisme belge et ses alliés occidentaux – qui ont trouvé des soutiens directs et indirects, délibérés et non délibérés, parmi certains hauts fonctionnaires des Nations-Unies, cet organisme en qui nous avons placé toute notre confiance lorsque nous avons fait appel à son assistance – ne l'ont jamais voulu.

[3]

Ils ont corrompu certains de nos compatriotes, ils ont contribué à déformer la vérité et à souiller notre indépendance. Que pourrai je dire d'autre ? Que mort, vivant, libre ou en prison sur ordre des colonialistes, ce n'est pas ma personne qui compte. C'est le Congo, c'est notre pauvre peuple dont on a transformé l'indépendance en une cage d'où l'on nous regarde du dehors, tantôt avec cette compassion bénévole, tantôt avec joie et plaisir. Mais ma foi restera inébranlable.

Je sais et je sens au fond de moi même que tôt ou tard mon peuple se débarrassera de tous ses ennemis intérieurs et extérieurs, qu'il se lèvera comme un seul homme pour dire non au capitalisme dégradant et honteux, et pour reprendre sa dignité sous un soleil pur.

Nous ne sommes pas seuls. L'Afrique, l'Asie et les peuples libres et libérés de tous les coins du monde se trouveront toujours aux côtés de millions de congolais qui n'abandonneront la lutte que le jour où il n'y aura plus de colonisateurs et leurs mercenaires dans notre pays. A mes enfants que je laisse, et que peut-être je ne reverrai plus, je veux qu'on dise que l'avenir du Congo est beau et qu'il attend d'eux, comme il attend de chaque Congolais, d'accomplir la tâche sacrée de la reconstruction de notre indépendance et de notre souveraineté, car sans dignité il n'y a pas de liberté, sans justice il n'y a pas de dignité, et sans indépendance il n'y a pas d'hommes libres.

[4]

Ni brutalités, ni sévices, ni tortures ne m'ont jamais amené à demander la grâce, car je préfère mourir la tête haute, la foi inébranlable et la confiance profonde dans la destinée de mon pays, plutôt que vivre dans la soumission et le mépris des principes sacrés. L'histoire dira un jour son mot, mais ce ne sera pas l'histoire qu'on enseignera à Bruxelles, Washington, Paris ou aux Nations Unies, mais celle qu'on enseignera dans les pays affranchis du colonialisme et de ses fantoches. L'Afrique écrira sa propre histoire et elle sera au nord et au sud du Sahara une histoire de gloire et de dignité. Ne me pleure pas, ma compagne. Moi je sais que mon pays, qui souffre tant, saura défendre son indépendance et sa liberté. Suivre Alexandre Roswilo

Vive le Congo ! Vive l'Afrique !

Patrice Lumumba[5] "

Notes de bas de page

[1] Patrice Lumumba — Wikipédia

[2] Image on face2faceafrica.com

[3] Image on mbuze.com

[4] Image on alobi.cd

[5] La dernière lettre de Patrice Lumumba à sa femme – JeuneAfrique.com

Questions similaires

Est-ce que la zaïrianisation était une bonne démarche ? (au sens de l'idée)

Qui est Patrice Lumumba ?

Qui sont les plus grands hommes d'Etat africains qui ont marqué leur pays que vous connaissez ?

Les colons belges ont souvent été dépeints de façon négative (Tarzan, Tintin…). la gestion du Congo Belge a t'elle été plus violente que dans les autres colonies d'Afrique?
Soyons sérieux, si c'était le président R.D.Congolais qui a eu cet gifle, où serait l'auteur ?
Avez-vous déjà entendu parler de l'effet Mandela ? Qu'en pensez-vous ? Avez-vous, comme moi, réalisé que c'est fort intriguant ?
Quels sont les faits peu connus sur Thomas Sankara ?
Comment les Belges voient-ils l'histoire coloniale du Congo aujourd'hui ?
Quelle est la capitale du Congo ?
Paul Biya est-il un dictateur ?
A combien s'élève la fortune de Joseph Kabila Kabange, ancien président de la RDC ?
Guinée Conakry Que s'est-il passé lorsque Sékou Touré de Guinée a décidé en 1958 de quitter l'empire colonial français et d'opter ainsi pour l'indépendance de son pays?
Combien de temps Jospeh Kabila continuera-t-il à diriger la RDC ?
Que pensent les autres nations des Congolais de la RDC?
Je suis congolais, que savez-vous de mon pays(RDC) ?

What inspired the cruelty of King Leopold's Congo Free State?

Kevin Richardson Follow PhD in History, The University of Texas at Austin Thu

In his Red Rubber, Edmund Dene Morel makes clear on page 53 (of the later 1920 edition) that Roger Casement, then his informant as HM Consul at Boma, conveyed that "Of the fact of this mutilation and the causes inducing it there can be no shadow of doubt. It was not a native custom prior to the coming of the white man; it was not the outcome of the primitive instincts of savages in their fights between village and village; it was the deliberate act of the soldiers of a European administration, and these men themselves never made any concealment that in committing these acts they were but obeying the positive orders of their superiors."

That said, the specific horrors of mutilation and its terroristic component may have drawn some precedent from punishments meted out by the slave raiders who attended Hamid al-Murjabi (Tippu Tip) in the East, and the chilling effect of same, but it's impossible to know—I've seen no smoking gun that proves it. If so, that would be doubly ironic, because Leopold's regime was supposed to suppress those parties' activities.

As to the counterproductive sense, you may be laboring under the belief that the worker was usually the one punished directly with the severing of limbs. This was not the case. To compel the quota of rubber, a common feature was hostage-taking. Beyond the mistreatment in general of these people while caged (especially women and girls, who were subject to sexual violence that European informants can't even bring themselves to discuss specifically) failure to meet the quota would result in the hostages' mutilation. One of the most haunting images of the entire campaign against Leopold involves a father named Nsala, sent his murdered daughter's hand and foot as a reminder, after murdering his family as a warning for his defiance:

So some of this was also rank cruelty meant to reinforce terror. I'm not sure if the cannibalism claims are true, but that's also a terror tactic.

When working-age men were mutilated, it was often in reprisal for their flight or their resistance, again as a message to others to render their service—although occasionally, it was simply violence to instill terror across a wider region. To rein in independent acts of predation by soldiery, soldiers were supposed to return the severed hands or genitals of cadavers ("to prove they had killed men" as Peter Bate's documentary Congo: White King Red Rubber Black Death from 2004 notes, but also to account for the ammunition they reported having expended). e: This means that the African soldiers of the ABIR (the Force Publique) were also potentially subject to death or discharge (and possibly mutilation?) for failing to bring these trophies to the small corps of European commanders who were fearful of any sign of defiance and so also demanded these kinds of acts to prove that reprisals and punishments against those who resisted company demands were carried out. What's worse, those who were especially efficient reportedly received bonuses based on the number of hands or other body parts (smoked for preservation), which encouraged the mutilation of the living and the dead both.

So really, this was either punishment for those who were truly defiant or sought to escape (as a message to others not to resist) or punishment by the mutilation and murder of related women and children to send a message to the men to work harder and produce more—not to force men who were still actively producing to work with one hand or foot. It's as horrible as it sounds, because it rendered the entire Free State—an area so recently crushed by invasive slave trading and unable to mount strong defensive campaigns against Leopold's agents—more like a prison camp.

One of the problems of the history of the Congo Free State is that most of the internal documentation was destroyed rather systematically when it became clear that the Belgian government was likely to dismantle the Free State and take it over. The key European actors never left much of a record of their own either, almost like they weren't very proud of it. I'm not in my office, or I'd have a look at Adam Hochschild just to see if he spotted any concordances; if the practice was widespread among the slavers of the eastern Congo in the 1860s/70s (most of whom were tied to Zanzibar directly or by degrees) it may arise in the writing of David Livingstone, Henry Morton Stanley, or one of the Central European travelers (Emil Holub maybe, or even Emin Pasha) or missionaries in the wider area. Because ending slave trading in that region was a significant issue for the Kongokonferenz 1884-85 there may be some data there. I'll have a look tomorrow.

Related Links

What actions did King Leopold of Belgium commit in Congo that make him evil?

Why doesn't anyone talk about King Leopold II of Belgium and just demonize Hitler the most?

Who was worst: Hitler, Cecil Rhodes or Leopold II from Belgium?

King Leopold II killed ~10 million Congolese people on his private colony in the Congo, which was not the state of Belgium's territory, but the Kings personal property, and he killed them for profit. Isn't this an example of a capitalist Genocide?

How do Belgium people feel about their king Leopold II after all the massacres in Congo?

How did King Leopold II of Belgium manage to "trick" the other European powers into letting him have such a huge and rich colony like the Congo?

How much control did King Leopold have over the Congo Free State?

What extent was Leopold II involved in ruling the Congo? Did he directly order the atrocities (villages razed, limb mutilations, etc.) that took place there?

Why has the Jewish holocaust received much more historical and media acknowledgment than the holocaust in the Congo in which 10 million were slaughtered by Leopold II of Belgium?

Why is Hitler considered worse than King Leopold II?

Do Belgians get taught in school about the atrocities their country commited in Africa?

Thierry Etienne Joseph Rotty Senior Controller at NATO 2y

Not really. The situation is much more complex than most people think, especially in Britain and the US. Congo Free State was the private property of King Leopold

II. The King, however, never set foot in it and never made a single cent profit. Neither did he know about the atrocities.

What happened is this: a private company, the “International Association of the Congo” (IAC) got the sovereignty over Congo Free State and exercised it on behalf of King Leopold II. The major shareholders were British and Dutch businessmen, and only a single Belgian he operated in the name of the King.

The IAC sold concessions to businessmen from mainly Britain and the US, but most European countries were represented. The IAC was mainly run by Belgians. The atrocities, however, began when concession holders demanded higher profit margins. The Belgian administrators, who were partially paid in a percentage of the profits, had no problem committing these atrocities.

King Leopold II, however, was never aware of them. The AIC was, at least officially, operating at a loss. They constantly asked for more funds and Leopold II sank his private fortune in the company and when that was gone, had to loan money from the Belgian State.

When these atrocities became public, the British and to a lesser extent the Americans, realizing most concession holders were either Americans or British, began a slander campaign against Leopold II and he got blamed.

Each time Leopold II sued British newspaper, he has won the case in British courts as these newspaper could not produce a single piece of evidence implicating the King. The harm was done, however, and Leopold II is viewed the world over a genocidal maniac while in reality, he was the victim of the scrupulous machinations of the Belgian administrators.

Utterly broke and not able to pay back his loans to the Belgian State, he turned Congo over to the Belgian State. He did install a Royal Commission to investigate these crimes but it was too little and too late.

Things became better until 1914 when World War One broke out. Suddenly the natural resources of Belgian Congo were essential for the Allied war effort.

The British insisted on higher production quotas … and the violence reached levels never heard of before. The Belgian government could do whatever t wanted, the Allies were looking the other way as they needed the resources.

Between the two Wars, things got better again, but the whole cycle of violence was repeated in Wolrd War Two when the Allies again needed the resources. This time the horror didn't stop in 1945 as the world was plunged into the Cold War and the uranium ore was vital for the American nuclear weapons production.

The Belgian military operated clandestinely to suppress any form of revolt or insurgency, no matter how small … now with the full backing of the Britsh and Americans. The atrocities continued well into the 1960s.

NATO even operated a clandestine base near the Shinkolobwe mine to ensure the continuous flow of uranium ore.

So, as you can see, the topic is rather complicated and the Belgian version is usually that crimes were committed but school books don't go too deep into the subject.

I have given you the simplified version, in reality, various company interest also came into play, there were private company armies active, mercenaries, spies, etc., not to mention the role the Catholic Church played in hammering Catholicism into the locals. The stakes were just too high and the ordinary Congolese people paid the price.

But forget the version where Leopold II was the evil genius or that the Belgians were the only culprits here. The Belgians committed the bulk of the crimes, there is no denying that, but other countries happily looked the other way when it suited them.

The really amazing thing is that not a single one of my Congolese friends has ever complained about it. They always say it is in the past and we should look towards a better future. No idea how they can muster that kind of kindness.

Related Links

Why weren't kids taught about the atrocities by King Leopold in school?

What are Belgians taught in school about king Leopold II and of course the DRC?

Do schools in countries like France, Belgium, and England teach about their old colonial past or do they suppress that part of history?

Does Belgium bear any moral responsibility for the atrocities in the Congo and subsequently in Rwanda?

Why has Belgium still not compensated the Congolese after all the atrocities, pain of cruelty, and damage they caused? Why is it hard to return all the icons and belongings stolen in the Congo? Why is it among countries supporting war in the Congo?

Why were Belgian colonialists so particularly brutal in the Congo?

How many people did the Belgians kill in the Belgian Congo during the reign of Leopold II?

Has Belgium ever formally apologized for the Congolese genocide?

Why do Africans complain about being taught European history in school when there is nothing stopping us from doing so?

Why is the Congolese genocide not taught in school?

RE: Do Belgians get taught in school about the atrocities their country commited in Africa?

Thierry Etienne Joseph Rotty Senior Controller at NATO lived in Belgium Answered Sep 11, 2019. I lived in many countries in my life and visited many more. I can say that in general: Do XX get taught in school about atrocities their country committed in YY? Where XX is a country and YY is a country or colony. This answer is no in the general case, including for:

Belgium ; Congo Atrocities in the Congo Free State - Wikipedia
Germany ; Namibia Herero and Namaqua genocide - Wikipedia
The Netherlands ; Indonesia Aceh War - Wikipedia
Great-Brittain; South-Africa British concentration camps - Wikipedia
France ; Algeria Sétif and Guelma massacre - Wikipedia
Portugal ; Mozambique Portuguese Colonial War - Wikipedia
Turkey ; Armenia Armenian Genocide - Wikipedia
United States ; Philippenes Philippine–American War - Wikipedia
And not to mentions the countless killings of the own population Genocides in history - Wikipedia

Andreas De Wulf , lived in Belgium Updated Sep 12, 2019

For years I've been defendeding the Congolese point in this discussion, but I've finally had enough. What is your overarching point here?
The answer is — and I'm paraphrasing myself:

Barely, but not necessarily out of ill will. The royal house is controversial. What happened under Léopold (1885–1908) was not Belgian. Never more than 2,000 Belgians were present there — usually well under a 1,000. They were expected to keep their mouths shut. Belgium was a dictatorship of rich men until 1893 and afterwards the little influence poor people had was dearly needed to stick up for their own. Exploitation and dire circumstances were rampant within Belgium too. And Léopold was still above the state of Belgium.

Moreover, the Casement Report — which brought these abuses to light — was revenge from the British Empire, which was still condoning the Zanzibari slave trade in secret. A British subject had been summarily executed while trying to sell weapons to slavers in the Eastern Congo — the 'Stokes Affair'. One White dealer of death was what motivated them. Don't be fooled.
Now it's my turn — thank you very much: Have you been taught about the atricities that happened there in just the past 25 years ALONE there?

A victim of Black-on-Black crime. As pan-Africanist and White supremacists would happily agree : "Nothing to be interested in as a White man!" ("In Rwanda Nobody Was Interested": 15 Rwandan Genocide Facts)

Defendeding the Congolese Cause

Andreas De Wulf lived in Belgium Updated Sep 12, 2019

For years I've been defendeding the Congolese point in this discussion, but I've finally had enough. What is your overarching point here?
The answer is — and I'm paraphrasing myself:

Barely, but not necessarily out of ill will. The royal house is controversial. What happened under Léopold (1885–1908) was not Belgian. Never more than 2,000 Belgians were present there — usually well under a 1,000. They were expected to keep their mouths shut. Belgium was a dictatorship of rich men until 1893 and afterwards the little influence poor people had was dearly needed to stick up for their own. Exploitation and dire circumstances were rampant within Belgium too. And Léopold was still above the state of Belgium.

Moreover, the Casement Report — which brought these abuses to light — was revenge from the British Empire, which was still condoning the Zanzibari slave trade in secret. A British subject had been summarily executed while trying to sell weapons to slavers in the Eastern Congo — the 'Stokes Affair'. One White dealer of death was what motivated them. Don't be fooled.

Now it's my turn — thank you very much: Have you been taught about the atricities that happened there in just the past 25 years ALONE there?

A victim of Black-on-Black crime. As pan-Africanist and White supremacists would happily agree : "Nothing to be interested in as a White man!" ("In Rwanda Nobody Was Interested": 15 Rwandan Genocide Facts)

One of the most evil men of our time. But nobody wants to demonize him because, let's be honest here, he's Black — despite his victims also being Black

Q: Did you know how many days it took for the total death count in tiny Rwanda in 1994 (then-population: 8 million) to surpass the Israeli-Palestine and Apartheid South Africa conflicts combined?

A: About 3 days… And it went on for 100 days. 800,000+ total.

Q: Do you know how many foreign troops could have stopped that conflict?

A: Roméo Dallaire of the UN mission asked for just 5,000.

Now where was your country? Where were you?

I'll tell you where Belgium was. Not it's corrupt government, but its citizens. Its special operations had been sent by the feckless UN to "keep the peace". They were not to use their weapons. Well, in the early morning of DAY 1 of the genocide (April 7, 1994), they were to escort the moderate prime minister Uwilingiyimana. They were ambushed. The PM was killed. 10 special ops were tortured to death. Deliberately, to send a message. (Local head of the UN mission Roméo Dallaire drove past several times so must have witnessed the spectacle.) Result? Belgium withdrew. "White people obviously had no place in Africa!" The ghosts of those who clung to those soldiers who had been protecting them in hideouts like churches and schools would however beg to disagree. They asked to be shot, rather than to die by rape and machetes anyway. They are imploring on you now to think for your own, and not heed the calls of White and Black supremacists who want to keep the continents separated according to race! Those Belgian soldiers who came back were scarred for life. My former daycare nanny's son was one of them. He killed himself.

When Europe suffered it's World Wars, it was the whole World's affair. When Africa did, "We have done enough already! Let us rather wash our hands in innocence!" (wink wink)

Former French foreign minister under president Mittérand, Alain Juppé, aided the genocidaries! Because they spoke French. Yet he nearly became president himself in 2017. So let us focus on the problems at hand in the 21th century before we do those of the 19th century please. ("King Kabila II" for sure is on many more a Congolese mind than is King Léopold II.) (Sorry you had to catch my ire — nothing personal.)

African Biographics

It’s been over 20 years since the assassination of the Democratic Republic of Congo's former president Laurent-Désiré Kabila at the hands of his child soldiers. Kabila was the leader of the rebellion that overthrew President Mobutu of Zaire in 1997 and restored the country's name. What many don’t know about him is how he spent most of his life in exile, engaged in the illegal gold and diamond trade and wild schemes to overthrow the dictatorship of Joseph-Désiré Mobutu, his immediate predecessor. Along the way, he briefly recruited Che Guevara in 1965, and the armies of Uganda and Rwanda, which helped bring him to power in 1997. In this episode of African Biographics we look at the rise and fall of Laurent Desire Kabila of the DRC.

Sources:
https://reliefweb.int/report/angola/h...https://www.blackpast.org/global-afri...
https:/www.sahistory.org.za/people/l...https://www.britannica.com/biography/...
https://www.theafricareport.com/57205...https://mg.co.za/article/2001-01-19-w...

Laurent Désiré Kabila: Review of African Political Economy Vol. 29, No. 93/94, State Failure in the Congo: Perceptions & Realities (Le Congo entre Crise et Régenération) (Sep. - Dec., 2002), pp. 616-619 (4 pages) Published By: Taylor & Francis, Ltd. https://www.theguardian.com/news/2001... Kabila Returns, In a Cloud of Uncertainty THOMAS TURNER, African Studies Quarterly | Volume 1, Issue 3 | 1997

ethik-life

Le 17 janvier 1961, au début de la nuit, l'ancien Premier ministre Lumumba et ses deux compagnons, Maurice Mpolo et Joseph Okito, sont exécutés par un peloton de la gendarmerie-armée katangaise commandé par un officier mercenaire belge, en présence de plusieurs ministres du Katanga en sécession.

Patrice Lumumba, devenu Premier ministre du Congo le jour de l'indépendance, le 30 juin 1960, l'a été pendant 67 jours seulement, avant d'être révoqué en septembre, puis assigné à résidence, arrêté ensuite, et transféré enfin au Katanga, pour y trouver la mort le soir même.

Soixante ans plus tard, grâce surtout au minutieux travail de la commission d'enquête de la Chambre des représentants belge et de ses experts, une part de lumière peut éclairer et permettre de mieux comprendre ces événements tragiques, leur enchaînement et les responsabilités tant au Congo qu'à l'étranger, y compris celles, irréfutables, de responsables belges.

Deux a priori doivent être évités : l'assassinat de Lumumba n'est pas dû à son discours du 30 juin 1960 devant le roi Baudouin, comme certains le croient encore ; il n'est pas non plus le résultat d'un complot organisé minutieusement depuis la rupture avec la Belgique, le 14 juillet. C'est le résultat d'un lent processus par lequel une coalition large, mais hétéroclite, s'est engagée, en y voyant la solution possible pour régler la crise que traversait le Congo et surtout pour y conserver chacun son pouvoir ou son influence.

Six mois contre Lumumba : les responsables belges sont intervenus directement ou indirectement de manière persistante pour affaiblir le gouvernement Lumumba, dès juillet 1960, contribuer à renverser le Premier ministre, obtenir son assignation à résidence et son incarcération, et faire réaliser le transfert de Lumumba au Katanga, où il sera assassiné.

Personne n’expliquera jamais ouvertement les raisons de cette politique, mais il est clair que Lumumba était considéré par ces responsables belges comme le leader congolais qui pouvait contrecarrer l’influence belge et occidentale au Congo indépendant.

Six mois de chaos, de l’indépendance à l’assassinat de Lumumba
Quelques jours après l’indépendance, le 30 juin 1960, le Congo s’embrase avant de sombrer dans le chaos. La Force publique, mi-armée, mi-gendarmerie coloniale, se mutine. Les premières violences contre les Européens provoquent leur exode massif. La Belgique se lance dans une guerre coloniale et soutient la sécession du Katanga minier.

Les Etats-Unis ne veulent pas d’une guerre au cœur de l’Afrique en pleine guerre froide, pays occidentaux contre communistes. L’ONU intervient. Les premiers Casques bleus débarquent le 16 juillet. La crise devient internationale.

La crise politique plonge le pays en pleine confusion. Le colonel Mobutu signe son premier coup d’Etat. Le cadre européen a fui. De sécessions en rébellions, le Congo plonge dans la tragédie d’une guerre civile de quatre ans.

►►► A lire aussi : Congo 1960, il y a 60 ans Episode 9 : le 6 juillet 1960, le Congo s’embrase Episode 10 : le 14 septembre 1960, le premier coup d’Etat de Mobutu et "l’élimination politique" de Lumumba

Le dernier jour, le 17 janvier 1961

Vers six heures du matin, le 17 janvier 1961, le chef de la Sûreté congolaise, Victor Nendaka, sort Lumumba et neuf autres prisonniers politiques de leur cellule du camp militaire de Thysville (aujourd'hui Mbanza-Ngungu), à 150 km de Léopoldville (Kinshasa aujourd'hui). Une nouvelle mutinerie a éclaté, et certains craignent la libération de Lumumba, arrêté pour avoir rejeté sa révocation comme Premier ministre.

Nendaka sépare trois prisonniers des autres : Patrice Lumumba, Okito, le vice-président du Sénat, et le ministre Mpolo. Les trois hommes sont amenés en camion à une heure de route, pour monter ensuite dans un petit avion et rejoindre Moanda, sur la côte atlantique : ce petit aéroport isolé n'est pas contrôlé par les Casques bleus de l'ONU.

Destination Elisabethville, au Katanga en sécession

Ferdinand Kazadi et Jonas Mukamba, deux membres du collège des commissaires, l'exécutif mis en place en septembre par le colonel Mobutu après son coup d'Etat, ont quitté Léopoldville en DC4 pour Moanda. Les deux commissaires sont kasaïens, et connus comme hostiles à Lumumba.
Les prisonniers montent à bord, avec les deux commissaires et une escorte de trois soldats. Le pilote reçoit l'ordre de joindre Elisabethville, la capitale du Katanga en sécession. Jusqu'à la dernière minute, une autre destination était possible : Bakwanga, au Sud-Kasaï, lui aussi en sécession. Le transfert s'impose pour éloigner Lumumba et le "mettre en lieu sûr", comme on l'écrit officiellement.

Les trois prisonniers sont constamment battus dans l'avion, et le pilote doit même demander d'arrêter les coups, parce qu'ils déstabilisent l'appareil.
Le président katangais d'accord, mais pris de court

Le DC4 annonce son arrivée et atterrit peu avant 17 heures. C'est la surprise. Le président du Katanga en sécession, Moïse Tshombe, avait accepté le transfert la veille, sous conditions, mais il ne s’attendait pas une arrivée aussi rapide. Le pouvoir central à Léopoldville le prend de vitesse et le met au pied du mur.

Le ministre katangais de l’Intérieur, Godefroid Munongo, est au pied de l’avion, avec une escorte armée d’une centaine d’hommes et un blindé léger. Plusieurs agents belges sont présents. Des soldats de l’ONU assistent à la scène de loin.

Les trois hommes sont amenés sans ménagements dans une villa réquisitionnée, la maison Brouwez. Ils sont très violemment frappés et battus à plusieurs reprises par des mercenaires ou des agents belges, par des ministres katangais, et, selon certaines sources, par Tshombe lui-même.
Trois exécutions dans la nuit, en présence de Tshombe

Les ministres katangais délibèrent en conseil pendant une heure et demie, ils boivent beaucoup de whisky. Il y a sans doute déjà un consensus sur le projet de tuer Lumumba, reste à décider comment. La décision collective est prise avant 20 heures. Un convoi quitte la villa Brouwez vers 20h30 et part à 50 km de là, avec un peloton de gendarmes katangais, sous les ordres du capitaine belge Gat, officier mercenaire de la sécession, et s’arrête près d’une savane boisée. Le commissaire de police belge Verscheure est lui aussi présent, avec deux autres agents belges au service du Katanga. Les Belges ce soir-là sont des exécutants, et le ministre Munongo dirige toute l’opération.

Le président Tshombe et quatre ou cinq ministres katangais assistent aux exécutions. Les trois prisonniers sont abattus l’un après l’autre, Patrice Lumumba en dernier lieu. Il est 21h43, comme le révèlera l’agenda du commissaire de police avec l’ajout à côté de l’heure : "L. dood (L. mort)", en néerlandais. L’arbre auquel il a été adossé est encore marqué aujourd’hui des très nombreux impacts de balles.

Les cadavres détruits par deux policiers belges

Les trois hommes sont enterrés sommairement. Les villageois des alentours ont entendu les fusillades. Le lendemain matin, ils découvrent la terre remuée, une main sort du sol ; ils préviennent les autorités. Les officiels veulent cacher les assassinats, et veulent éviter un éventuel culte autour des trois cadavres si la vérité était connue. Deux policiers belges sont chargés de la sinistre besogne de faire disparaître les trois cadavres en les découpant et en les détruisant dans de l'acide. L'un d'entre eux emporte comme en trophée deux dents de Patrice Lumumba.

Des versions fantaisistes et des faits certains

De nombreuses versions de cette journée ont circulé pendant quarante ans, avec des récits parfois romancés, souvent contradictoires, et marqués surtout par la volonté de certains de diminuer ou de cacher leur responsabilité, ou le souci d'embellir leur rôle.

Le travail des quatre historiens experts de la commission d'enquêta a duré près de dix-huit mois, en 2000 et 2001, et a permis de découvrir des éléments neufs et d'établir les faits certains. Mais les experts ont privilégié les sources écrites au détriment des témoignages oraux et se sont parfois montrés moins soucieux des points de vue des Congolais eux-mêmes.

Enfin, les experts et les parlementaires ont surtout clarifié le "comment", alors que subsistent beaucoup de questions sur le "pourquoi" de l'assassinat.

Les conseillers belges influents, invisibles et muets ce jour-là

Pour comprendre le rôle des Belges du Katanga dans ces derniers événements, il faut les distinguer entre eux, même s'ils sont en contact en permanence :

Les représentants officiels belges, comme le consul et les diplomates du "Bureau conseil", l'ambassade officieuse belge auprès du Katanga, et, à leurs côtés, les influents conseillers belges auprès des responsables katangais.

Les nombreux agents belges qui se sont mis au service des autorités katangaises, par exemple comme militaires ou policiers, qui n'ont officiellement aucun lien avec la Belgique, même s'ils ont été encouragés à s'engager au Katanga.

Lors de cette dernière journée, seuls les Belges aux ordres des Katangais sont "exécutants" sur le devant de la scène. Les représentants et conseillers belges se tiennent quant à eux volontairement à l'écart sans s'impliquer en aucune manière, alors qu'ils sont d'habitude présents et influents. Ces derniers ont toujours affirmé avoir déconseillé à Tshombe d'accepter le transfert de Lumumba : ils en connaissent les conséquences, et ils savent qu'un assassinat serait ensuite une lourde hypothèque sur la sécession katangaise.
Leur absence ce jour-là et par la suite s'explique certainement par la volonté de n'être en rien impliqués dans l'assassinat.

Retour sur six mois de crise, à partir de juillet 1960

Juillet – août 1960 : la Belgique veut affaiblir le gouvernement Lumumba
La rupture des relations diplomatiques entre le Congo est décidée le 14 juillet 1960 par le président Kasa-Vubu et le Premier ministre Lumumba. Les deux leaders congolais dénoncent ensemble le soutien de la Belgique à la sécession du Katanga et l'intervention militaire de l'armée belge. Il s'agit pour eux d'une agression.

L'armée belge a en effet reçu "carte blanche" du gouvernement : elle a lancé une guerre coloniale et échoué dans le projet d'une occupation militaire du Bas-Congo pour en faire un "protectorat militaire". L'armée belge intervient aussi au Katanga et y désarme l'armée congolaise, ce qui permet à Moïse Tshombe de proclamer l'indépendance de cette riche province minière. Le Katanga est reconnu, non pas en droit mais de fait, et Bruxelles installe une "mission technique belge" à Elisabethville.

La puissante Union minière, au Katanga, et la Société générale de Belgique, qui la contrôle, soutiennent ouvertement la sécession et plaident en ce sens auprès du roi Baudouin et du Premier ministre.

Fin juillet : l'option katangaise, pour mettre Lumumba hors-jeu "L'option katangaise" consiste à imaginer reconstruire un "nouveau Congo", à partir d'une fédération de provinces autonomes ou d'une confédération d'Etats indépendants. A la fin juillet, le ministre belge des Affaires étrangères Wigny conclut : "Tout ralliement d'autres provinces au Katanga est donc à encourager".

Il s'agit d'affaiblir Lumumba, dont le gouvernement et l'armée se débattent dans un Congo qui s'embrase. Le roi Baudouin, dans son discours exceptionnel du 21 juillet, défend l'option katangaise, sans la citer comme telle : "Des ethnies entières nous ont conservé leur amitié, et nous adjurent de les aider. Notre devoir est de répondre à ceux qui nous demanderont notre collaboration".
Par ailleurs, la Belgique soutient aussi militairement et financièrement, à partir du 9 août, la sécession du Sud-Kasaï, producteur du diamant congolais.
Le 16 août, le secrétaire général de l'ONU et Lumumba : "C'est lui ou moi"
A la mi-août, c'est la rupture brutale entre Patrice Lumumba et le secrétaire général de l'ONU. Dag Hammarskjöld le fait savoir en privé, en utilisant la formule : "C'est Lumumba ou Hammarskjöld, pas de place pour les deux". L'ONU est engagée au Congo depuis la mi-juillet avec des milliers de soldats occidentaux et des pays non alignés et a exigé le départ des militaires belges.
Lumumba estime que l'ONU doit l'aider à réduire la sécession katangaise et à rétablir son autorité sur tout le territoire congolais. Hammarskjöld rappelle que le mandat est d'assurer la paix et la sécurité, mais de rester neutre, sans intervenir dans un conflit intérieur. Le secrétaire général de l'ONU veut mettre fin à la sécession par la négociation, Lumumba par la force.

Le Premier ministre congolais fait appel à l'Union soviétique et obtient une aide logistique aérienne pour transporter ses troupes et réduire la sécession du Sud-Kasaï, à partir de la mi-août. Ce sera au prix d'une répression brutale, qui explique la forte hostilité du Kasaï ensuite envers Lumumba et le chef d'Etat-major Mobutu.

Par contre, à Brazzaville, la capitale de l'ancien Congo français devenu indépendant le 15 août, le président Youlou, un proche du président Kasa-Vubu, s'inquiète avec son entourage de conseillers et de lobbymen français de la contagion communiste que rechercherait Lumumba.

Le 18 août 1960, le président américain Eisenhower:"Débarrassez-moi de lui !" Le président américain Eisenhower lance en Conseil national de sécurité, le 18 août, après la visite de Patrice Lumumba aux Etats-Unis "Get rid of him ('Débarrassez-moi de lui') !". Le chef de la CIA, Allen Dulles, en déduit que "Patrice Lumumba doit être chassé du pouvoir par tous les moyens". Dulles interprète la phrase comme une autorisation de tuer.

D'après les proches de Lumumba, le président Eisenhower réagit de la sorte après la réponse de Lumumba à un journaliste américain : "Les traités signés par les Belges pourraient être révisés". "Y compris sur l'uranium ?", demande le journaliste. "Oui, y compris sur l'uranium". A l'époque, l'uranium du Congo est indispensable à l'arsenal nucléaire américain, cela en pleine guerre froide contre l'Union soviétique.

Le Premier ministre Lumumba accueilli par le secrétaire d'Etat des Etats-Unis, le 24 juillet 1960. © Tous droits reserves

Août 1960 : l'opposition à Lumumba au Congo s'organise

A partir du mois d'août, une opposition de plus en plus marquée émerge à Léopoldville. En réaction, le gouvernement Lumumba, au retour du voyage du Premier ministre, proclame l'état d'exception, restreint certaines libertés et instaure la censure. Cette escalade provoque des réactions des syndicats, des journaux, d'une partie de l'armée, et de la puissante Eglise catholique, qui dénonce l'idée de Lumumba de nationaliser l'université catholique de Lovanium. Certains parlent d'un début de dictature.

50 millions de francs : les fonds secrets belges

La Belgique ne reste pas inactive. Pour Bruxelles, dès le début du mois d'août, l'objectif est d'écarter politiquement Patrice Lumumba.

La Belgique a dû fermer son ambassade à Léopoldville, mais une équipe belge s'active à Brazzaville, sur l'autre rive du fleuve Congo. Louis Marlière, un officier belge, coordonne le service Action et André Lahaye, un ancien de la Sûreté congolaise, est chargé du Renseignement.

Un officier belge, le major Loos, attaché au cabinet des Affaires africaines, à Bruxelles, est en liaison étroite avec Brazzaville. Il finance plusieurs actions clandestines pour affaiblir le Premier ministre Lumumba, en utilisant d'importants "fonds secrets", pour un montant de 50 millions de francs belges de l'époque, sans compter les budgets de la Défense. Les fonds servent à la diffusion de tracts contre Lumumba, ou de faux tracts incendiaires signés par lui, à une radio clandestine et au financement de journaux, d'organisations et de partis hostiles à Lumumba.

En parallèle, le consul belge, avec deux diplomates, dont Etienne Davignon, suit l'action politique.

"Renverser Lumumba selon nos vœux"

Le Premier ministre belge, Gaston Eyskens, insiste avec fermeté à la mi-août auprès d'un conseiller belge du président Kasa-Vubu : "Il faut que le président démette Lumumba". Et le ministre Wigny transmet au président congolais les arguments pour justifier en droit la révocation du Premier ministre.

Un télex des diplomates belges Davignon et Westhof évoque clairement au début septembre "un renversement du gouvernement (Lumumba) selon nos vœux". Plusieurs responsables politiques et quelques ministres congolais sont alors prêts à s'écarter de la ligne Lumumba, jugé par eux excessif et autoritaire. Les responsables belges multiplient les contacts avec eux et les encouragent dans leurs projets.

Le ministre des Affaires africaines : "L'homme du Katanga, du roi, et des sociétés"

A la faveur d'un remaniement du gouvernement belge, un nouveau ministre des Affaires africaines entre en fonction. Harold d'Aspremont Lynden est un homme-clé dans la crise. Il était à la tête de la Mission technique du Katanga. Il est ouvertement favorable à l'option katangaise. Il a la confiance du Palais et du Premier ministre Eyskens. L'opposition le présente comme "l'homme du Katanga, du roi et des sociétés". Le ministre Wigny se dit mécontent de cette nomination. L'option katangaise est renforcée.

A ce stade, une vaste coalition de fait est donc formée, mais sans réelle coordination, et parfois même dans la confusion. Pour la Belgique, l'objectif est de " neutraliser " politiquement Patrice Lumumba.

Le 5 septembre 60 : Kasa-Vubu révoque le Premier ministre Lumumba
A la surprise des Belges, le président Kasa-Vubu prend l'initiative de révoquer le Premier ministre Lumumba dans la soirée du 5 septembre et de nommer un nouveau

Premier ministre. Le plan belge prévoyait par contre, quelques jours plus tard, une motion de défiance votée au Sénat congolais, avec des manifestations ou des grèves. Mais Patrice Lumumba réagit aussitôt, et le Parlement finit par donner les pleins pouvoirs au Premier ministre, qui affirme alors exercer aussi les pouvoirs du chef de l'Etat. Suivent neuf journées de totale confusion, avec deux gouvernements parallèles, une armée congolaise divisée, et certains Casques bleus africains prêts à soutenir Lumumba, alors que Dag Hammarskjöld considère Lumumba dans l'illégalité depuis qu'il a rejeté sa révocation.

LE 14 SEPTEMBRE

le coup d'Etat du colonel Mobutu
Le coup d'Etat du colonel Mobutu, le 14 septembre, consacre l'élimination politique de Patrice Lumumba. Le président et les deux gouvernements sont neutralisés, mais en pratique, le président Kasa-Vubu conserve sa marge de manœuvre, tandis que Patrice Lumumba perd le contrôle de la situation, et est plusieurs fois arrêté puis libéré.

Mobutu met en place un exécutif de techniciens et de politiques, le "Collège des commissaires généraux", dont le ministre Bomboko devient président. Enfin, un groupe informel, le "groupe de Binza", rassemble notamment Kasa-Vubu, Mobutu, Bomboko et Nendaka, le chef de la Sûreté. Ce groupe restreint accueille régulièrement des responsables belges ou le chef de station de la CIA à Léopoldville, Larry Devlin. C'est le lieu où se préparent par consensus les grandes décisions qui seront assumées par le collège des commissaires.

"Mettre (Lumumba) hors d'état de nuire"

L'objectif de la Belgique est alors de faire arrêter Lumumba. L'argument est qu'il s’est mis hors la loi en proclamant qu’il restait Premier ministre : "Lumumba est devenu un factieux", écrit le ministre Wigny, qui insiste alors sur le "devoir (pour les autorités congolaises) de le mettre hors d’état de nuire", comme l’écrit le ministre Wigny, le 6 septembre, ou comme l’écrit le ministre d’Aspremont, le 5 octobre, en demandant "l’élimination définitive" de Lumumba.

Les experts de la commission d’enquête montreront clairement que l’expression signifie bien une élimination " politique " définitive et non une élimination "physique", comme certains la suggéreront plus tard.
"L’opération ne réussira qu’une fois"

Durant cette période chaotique, les responsables belges craignent en effet un renversement de la situation au profit de Lumumba. Le colonel Mobutu lui-même est tiraillé, et il a déjà fait relâcher Lumumba, dont il était proche, alors qu’il était en même temps indicateur de la Sûreté congolaise, comme nous l’a confié l’agent belge qui le voyait chaque semaine. Pour les ministres belges est clair, il faut faire arrêter Lumumba, car, écrit Wigny, dans un télex : "Pareille opération ne réussira qu’une seule fois. S’ils échouent, ils compromettent salut pays et leur existence personnelle". Autrement dit, une libération constituerait un grand danger pour les dirigeants de Léopoldville.
Des actions clandestines, qui échouent

Durant toute cette période, en parallèle, s’organisent des actions clandestines, des livraisons d’armes et des tentatives d’enlèvement ou d’assassinat. Il existe au moins une tentative d’empoisonnement par substitution de médicaments, imaginée par la CIA.

Les responsables belges sont informés ou organisent certaines actions secrètes. Deux Belges agissant sans mandat prétendent pouvoir organiser l’assassinat de Patrice Lumumba, mais les deux opérations n’en restent qu’au stade de projets fantaisistes.

Ensuite, "Georges", un majordome présenté par l’historien Jo Gérard, proche de l’extrême droite, est recruté à Bruxelles comme tueur à gages. Il lui est promis un million de francs belges, mais le "tueur" est un escroc, qui disparaît avec l’acompte versé par les fonds secrets.

Des actions secrètes, "couvertes"

Plus sérieusement, un officier belge est directement chargé par le général Cumont, chef d’état-major de l’armée belge, d’organiser l’enlèvement de Lumumba pour l’amener à Brazzaville. L’opération est très vite connue de trop de monde, et l’officier renonce en s’apercevant qu’il s’agissait peut-être d’assassiner Patrice Lumumba.

Mais tout ceci reste désordonné, comme l’écrivent les experts de la commission Lumumba : "Si le désir de meurtre était là chez certains, il était trop diffus, trop encombrant pour que des moyens sérieux soient donnés à des intermédiaires pour passer à l’acte. En fait, à l’automne 1960 en Belgique, personne n’a voulu prendre sur soi la responsabilité d’un processus conduisant à l’élimination physique de Lumumba, donc ce processus ne s’est pas enclenché".

Il y a 60 ans, l’assassinat de Patrice Lumumba, un cri me politique avec des responsabilités belges

Le 17 janvier 1961, au début de la nuit, l’ancien Premier ministre Lumumba et ses deux compagnons, Maurice Mpolo et Joseph Okito, sont exécutés par un peloton de la gendarmerie-armée katangaise commandé par un officier mercenaire belge, en présence de plusieurs ministres du Katanga en sécession.

Patrice Lumumba, devenu Premier ministre du Congo le jour de l'indépendance, le 30 juin 1960, l'a été pendant 67 jours seulement, avant d'être révoqué en septembre, puis assigné à résidence, arrêté ensuite, et transféré enfin au Katanga, pour y trouver la mort le soir même.
Soixante ans plus tard, grâce surtout au minutieux travail de la commission d'enquête de la Chambre des représentants belge et de ses experts, une part de lumière peut éclairer et permettre de mieux comprendre ces événements tragiques, leur enchaînement et les responsabilités tant au Congo qu'à l'étranger, y compris celles, irréfutables, de responsables belges.
Deux a priori doivent être évités : l'assassinat de Lumumba n'est pas dû à son discours du 30 juin 1960 devant le roi Baudouin, comme certains le croient encore ; il n'est pas non plus le résultat d'un complot organisé minutieusement depuis la rupture avec la Belgique, le 14 juillet. C'est le résultat d'un lent processus par lequel une coalition large, mais hétéroclite, s'est engagée, en y voyant la solution possible pour régler la crise que traversait le Congo et surtout pour y conserver chacun son pouvoir ou son influence.

Six mois contre Lumumba : les responsables belges sont intervenus directement ou indirectement de manière persistante pour affaiblir le gouvernement Lumumba, dès juillet 1960, contribuer à renverser le Premier ministre, obtenir son assignation à résidence et son incarcération, et faire réaliser le transfert de Lumumba au Katanga, où il sera assassiné.
Personne n'expliquera jamais ouvertement les raisons de cette politique, mais il est clair que Lumumba était considéré par ces responsables belges comme le leader congolais qui pouvait contrecarrer l'influence belge et occidentale au Congo indépendant.

Six mois de chaos, de l'indépendance à l'assassinat de Lumumba
Quelques jours après l'indépendance, le 30 juin 1960, le Congo s'embrase avant de sombrer dans le chaos. La Force publique, mi-armée, mi-gendarmerie coloniale, se mutine. Les premières violences contre les Européens provoquent leur exode massif. La Belgique se lance dans une guerre coloniale et soutient la sécession du Katanga minier.
Les Etats-Unis ne veulent pas d'une guerre au cœur de l'Afrique en pleine guerre froide, pays occidentaux contre communistes. L'ONU intervient. Les premiers Casques bleus débarquent le 16 juillet. La crise devient internationale.

La crise politique plonge le pays en pleine confusion. Le colonel Mobutu signe son premier coup d'Etat. Le cadre européen a fui. De sécessions en rébellions, le Congo plonge dans la tragédie d'une guerre civile de quatre ans.
A lire aussi : Congo 1960, il y a 60 ans Episode 9 : le 6 juillet 1960, le Congo s'embrase Episode 10 : le 14 septembre 1960, le premier coup d'Etat de Mobutu et "l'élimination politique" de Lumumba

Le dernier jour, le 17 janvier 1961

Vers six heures du matin, le 17 janvier 1961, le chef de la Sûreté congolaise, Victor Nendaka, sort Lumumba et neuf autres prisonniers politiques de leur cellule du camp militaire de Thysville (aujourd'hui Mbanza-Ngungu), à 150 km de Léopoldville (Kinshasa aujourd'hui). Une nouvelle mutinerie a éclaté, et certains craignent la libération de Lumumba, arrêté pour avoir rejeté sa révocation comme Premier ministre.

Nendaka sépare trois prisonniers des autres : Patrice Lumumba, Okito, le vice-président du Sénat, et le ministre Mpolo. Les trois hommes sont amenés en camion à une heure de route, pour monter ensuite dans un petit avion et rejoindre Moanda, sur la côte atlantique : ce petit aéroport isolé n'est pas contrôlé par les Casques bleus de l'ONU.

Destination Elisabethville, au Katanga en sécession

Ferdinand Kazadi et Jonas Mukamba, deux membres du collège des commissaires, l'exécutif mis en place en septembre par le colonel Mobutu après son coup d'Etat, ont quitté Léopoldville en DC4 pour Moanda. Les deux commissaires sont kasaïens, et connus comme hostiles à Lumumba.

Les prisonniers montent à bord, avec les deux commissaires et une escorte de trois soldats. Le pilote reçoit l'ordre de joindre Elisabethville, la capitale du Katanga en sécession. Jusqu'à la dernière minute, une autre destination était possible :

Bakwanga, au Sud-Kasaï, lui aussi en sécession. Le transfert s'impose pour éloigner Lumumba et le "mettre en lieu sûr", comme on l'écrit officiellement.

Les trois prisonniers sont constamment battus dans l'avion, et le pilote doit même demander d'arrêter les coups, parce qu'ils déstabilisent l'appareil.
Le président katangais d'accord, mais pris de court
Le DC4 annonce son arrivée et atterrit peu avant 17 heures. C'est la surprise. Le président du Katanga en sécession, Moïse Tshombe, avait accepté le transfert la veille, sous conditions, mais il ne s'attendait pas une arrivée aussi rapide. Le pouvoir central à Léopoldville le prend de vitesse et le met au pied du mur.

Le ministre katangais de l'Intérieur, Godefroid Munongo, est au pied de l'avion, avec une escorte armée d'une centaine d'hommes et un blindé léger. Plusieurs agents belges sont présents. Des soldats de l'ONU assistent à la scène de loin.

Les trois hommes sont amenés sans ménagements dans une villa réquisitionnée, la maison Brouwez. Ils sont très violemment frappés et battus à plusieurs reprises par des mercenaires ou des agents belges, par des ministres katangais, et, selon certaines sources, par Tshombe lui-même.
Trois exécutions dans la nuit, en présence de Tshombe

Les ministres katangais délibèrent en conseil pendant une heure et demie, ils boivent beaucoup de whisky. Il y a sans doute déjà un consensus sur le projet de tuer Lumumba, reste à décider comment. La décision collective est prise avant 20 heures. Un convoi quitte la villa Brouwez vers 20h30 et part à 50 km de là, avec un peloton de gendarmes katangais, sous les ordres du capitaine belge Gat, officier mercenaire de la sécession, et s'arrête près d'une savane boisée. Le commissaire de police belge Verscheure est lui aussi présent, avec deux autres agents belges au service du Katanga. Les Belges ce soir-là sont des exécutants, et le ministre Munongo dirige toute l'opération.

Le président Tshombe et quatre ou cinq ministres katangais assistent aux exécutions. Les trois prisonniers sont abattus l'un après l'autre, Patrice Lumumba en dernier lieu. Il est 21h43, comme le révèlera l'agenda du commissaire de police avec l'ajout à côté de l'heure : "L. dood (L. mort)", en néerlandais. L'arbre auquel il a été adossé est encore marqué aujourd'hui des très nombreux impacts de balles.
Les cadavres détruits par deux policiers belges
Les trois hommes sont enterrés sommairement. Les villageois des alentours ont entendu les fusillades. Le lendemain matin, ils découvrent la terre remuée, une main sort du sol ; ils préviennent les autorités. Les officiels veulent cacher les assassinats, et veulent éviter un éventuel culte autour des trois cadavres si la vérité était connue. Deux policiers belges sont chargés de la sinistre besogne de faire disparaître les trois cadavres en les découpant et en les détruisant dans de l'acide. L'un d'entre eux emporte comme en trophée deux dents de Patrice Lumumba. Des versions fantaisistes et des faits certains

De nombreuses versions de cette journée ont circulé pendant quarante ans, avec des récits parfois romancés, souvent contradictoires, et marqués surtout par la volonté de certains de diminuer ou de cacher leur responsabilité, ou le souci d'embellir leur rôle.

Le travail des quatre historiens experts de la commission d'enquêta a duré près de dix-huit mois, en 2000 et 2001, et a permis de découvrir des éléments neufs et d'établir les faits certains. Mais les experts ont privilégié les sources écrites au détriment des témoignages oraux et se sont parfois montrés moins soucieux des points de vue des Congolais eux-mêmes.

Enfin, les experts et les parlementaires ont surtout clarifié le "comment", alors que subsistent beaucoup de questions sur le "pourquoi" de l'assassinat.
Les conseillers belges influents, invisibles et muets ce jour-là
Pour comprendre le rôle des Belges du Katanga dans ces derniers événements, il faut les distinguer entre eux, même s'ils sont en contact en permanence :

Les représentants officiels belges, comme le consul et les diplomates du "Bureau conseil", l'ambassade officieuse belge auprès du Katanga, et, à leurs côtés, les influents conseillers belges auprès des responsables katangais.
Les nombreux agents belges qui se sont mis au service des autorités katangaises, par exemple comme militaires ou policiers, qui n'ont officiellement aucun lien avec la Belgique, même s'ils ont été encouragés à s'engager au Katanga.
Lors de cette dernière journée, seuls les Belges aux ordres des Katangais sont "exécutants" sur le devant de la scène. Les représentants et conseillers belges se tiennent quant à eux volontairement à l'écart sans s'impliquer en aucune manière, alors qu'ils sont d'habitude présents et influents. Ces derniers ont toujours affirmé avoir déconseillé à Tshombe d'accepter le transfert de Lumumba : ils en connaissent les conséquences, et ils savent qu'un assassinat serait ensuite une lourde hypothèque sur la sécession katangaise.

Leur absence ce jour-là et par la suite s'explique certainement par la volonté de n'être en rien impliqués dans l'assassinat.

"Le juif" (Tshombe) d'accord pour transfert du "Diable" (Lumumba) Le Katanga a d'abord refusé le transfert, puis l'a accepté, mais avec des conditions, par un télex envoyé par les Belges du Katanga et où il faut comprendre que "le Diable" est Lumumba et "le Juif" est Tshombe : "Votre message ce matin relatif transfert le Diable et contrairement réponse transmise midi, le Juif être d'accord si demande officielle lui transmise pour transfert Katanga sous responsabilité gouvernement congolais". Le transfert ne se fera finalement pas ces jours-là, mais 45 jours plus tard.

Dans les semaines qui suivent, les responsables belges poursuivent et commencent à réaliser trois objectifs :

Normaliser les relations entre Bruxelles et le gouvernement central ;
Mettre en place une coalition des Congolais "modérés", un axe politique et militaire Léopoldville, Katanga et Sud-Kasaï, opposé à la zone lumumbiste ;
Et mettre en œuvre un transfert de Lumumba soit au Sud-Kasaï, soit au Katanga, les deux sécessions dont les chefs veulent la mort de Patrice Lumumba.

Le 13 janvier 61, la panique à Léopoldville : Lumumba libéré par les mutins ?
Le président Kasa-Vubu et Moïse Tshombe négocient une réconciliation nationale, mais Lumumba en est l'obstacle principal. Léopoldville et Bruxelles commencent à normaliser leurs relations. Le transfert de Lumumba s'impose par un consensus tacite.

Et soudain tout s'accélère : la garnison de Thysville se mutine la nuit du 12 au 13 janvier. Les mutins pourraient libérer les prisonniers. C'est la panique chez les dirigeants de Léopoldville, pour lesquels il faut éloigner Lumumba au plus vite. Deux destinations sont possibles : le Sud-Kasaï ou le Katanga : dans les deux cas, l'issue ne fait pas de doutes. Et surtout, le président Kennedy va entrer en fonction.

Le plan Kennedy, grave menace pour les dirigeants de Léopoldville Le politologue Herbert Weiss nous a confié en 2010, que Thomas Kanza, ministre-ambassadeur du gouvernement Lumumba à l'ONU, avait connaissance du plan du futur président Kennedy pour sortir de la crise congolaise. Mais il y a eu "une fuite"? , explique Weiss, de source sûre, et "certains membres du groupe de Binza avaient appris ce projet". Nous pouvons supposer aujourd'hui que le chef de station de la CIA à Léopoldville, qui assistait parfois aux réunions du groupe, est à l'origine de cette fuite…

Chaque jour compte : Kennedy doit entrer en fonction le 20 janvier. Une fois investi, le plan Kennedy prévoyait une réunion du Parlement congolais, avec tous les leaders congolais présents, y compris Lumumba, protégé par l'ONU, pour savoir si le Premier ministre avait toujours la confiance du Parlement.
Or il est évident au Congo que, depuis l'arrestation de Lumumba, on est engagé dans une lutte sans merci : ce sera l'un ou l'autre camp, le retour du vaincu entraînerait la mise à l'écart définitive de ses adversaires.
Le 14 janvier, le télex crypté de Bruxelles : "Reprendre le plan"
Le 14 janvier, le conseiller militaire du ministre des Affaires africaines est informé de la mutinerie et de la menace d'une libération de Lumumba. Il demande dans un message crypté "très secret" au colonel belge Marlière, à Léopoldville, de "reprendre le plan vis-à-vis de Joseph", c'est-à-dire Lumumba. Pour Bruxelles et pour Léopoldville, il faut réaliser le transfert aussi vite que possible.

Le 14 janvier, la demande au Katanga : "Accorder transfert"

Le commissaire congolais à la Justice Kandolo adresse la demande officielle du collège des commissaires à Tshombe, le 14 janvier : "Collège commissaires généraux se permet d'insister afin d'obtenir accord transfert Lumumba à (sic) Katanga. Malgré inconvénients inévitables serait opportun accorder transfert dans région sûre. Commissaire Kandolo insiste au nom de ses collègues". Ce message radio est rédigé par Lahaye, l'adjoint de Kandolo. Il est transmis en copie au Katanga par l'ambassadeur avec cette phrase : "Il vous paraîtra sans doute indiqué appuyer l'opération envisagée et insister auprès autorités katangaises". Les Belges de Léopoldville collaborent activement au transfert et demandent l'appui de leurs collègues au Katanga.
Le 14 janvier, l'ordre du président Kasa-Vubu à la Sûreté : "Assurer le transfert"

Le 14 janvier, en parallèle à la demande des commissaires, le président Kasa-Vubu donne l'ordre à Victor Nendaka, le chef de la Sûreté congolaise, d'"assurer le transfert des prisonniers" de Thysville. Nendaka demande au commandant du camp de "mettre à sa disposition les dix détenus politiques" et prend en charge l'organisation pratique du transfert.
A Léopoldville, il y a un consensus général : tous les dirigeants congolais souhaitent le transfert de Lumumba au Katanga. La décision finale va pour eux de soi. Le 16 janvier, le télex du ministre d'Aspremont : "Transférer dans les délais les plus brefs" Bruxelles prend connaissance de la demande congolaise le 16 janvier seulement. Le ministre des Affaires africaines télexe aussitôt au consul belge au Katanga : "A transmettre au président Tshombe. Citation : Minaf Aspremont insiste personnellement auprès président Tshombe pour que Lumumba soit transféré Katanga dans les délais les plus brefs. Fin citation.

Prière me tenir au courant".

Il s'agit clairement de convaincre Tshombe d'accepter et de vaincre ses hésitations. Les experts ont établi que ce message est transmis à Tshombe le soir du 16, alors que le transfert est déjà engagé. Tshombe s'en amusera en répondant au conseiller belge : "Vous me le déconseillez, et votre ministre insiste". Même si le message n'a en fait pas eu d'effet concret, il est évidemment révélateur de l'intention du ministre belge d'obtenir le transfert souhaité.

Le Sud-Kasaï ou le Katanga ?

Le lendemain, Kasa-Vubu annonce à son homologue du Congo Brazzaville: "J'ai décidé le transfert à Bakwanga de certains prisonniers ". Le président congolais assume donc la décision. Bakwanga est le chef-lieu de la sécession du Sud-Kasaï : car il reste encore une hésitation sur la destination de Lumumba : les réticences du Katanga amènent les dirigeants de Léopoldville à envisager le Sud-Kasaï, dirigé par Albert Kalonji, un ennemi juré de Lumumba. Il semble que le Sud-Kasaï refuse l'arrivée de Lumumba. Le plan de vol rédigé le matin du 16 janvier par l'agent Lahaye lors d'une réunion avec des responsables de la Sabena prévoit les deux destinations.

"C'était signer l'arrêt de mort"

Les experts signalent à plusieurs reprises que pour les officiels à Bruxelles, un transfert n'impliquait pas nécessairement la mort.

Il semble pourtant évident lors de cette période, pour les responsables et agents belges au Congo et pour les leaders congolais, qu'un transfert conduirait à la mort. Transférer Lumumba consiste en effet à le livrer à ses pires ennemis, dont certains lui ont promis publiquement la mort.
Nous disposons de très nombreuses indications en ce sens. Le ministre katangais Munongo, donne des instructions, déjà en août 1960 : "Tout laisse supposer que Lumumba tentera de venir au Katanga […].

Il FAUT l'en empêcher à tout prix. IL DOIT, en ce cas, DISPARAITRE".

Dans un rapport rédigé pour minimiser son rôle à l'époque, la CIA affirme ne pas avoir "conspiré" dans un plan de transfert, mais bien que "la station au Congo avait déjà connaissance du plan du gouvernement central de transférer Lumumba dans les mains de ses pires ennemis, où il risquait d'être tué ('where he was likely to be killed')".

Enfin, le Belge chef de cabinet du président Tshombe, déclare à la RTBF en 2013 : "Nous, ses conseillers européens, avons unanimement invité Tshombe à refuser cette demande dont l'issue ne faisait pas de doute. C'était signer (l') arrêt de mort (de Lumumba)". Un conseiller belge témoigne aussi de "la haine des principaux ministres" katangais contre Lumumba.

Enfin, aucune des instructions des officiels belges de cette période ne précise que Patrice Lumumba doit être bien traité en cas de transfert et jugé dans les règles de droit.

Tshombe, président du Katanga en sécession et son chef de cabinet, le Belge Jacques Bartelous. Photo transmise par J. Bartelous – RTBF

Le 16 janvier, un accord Kasa-Vubu-Tshombe

Finalement, ce sera la Katanga. Le président Kasa-Vubu et le katangais Tshombe tiennent le 16 janvier une conversation téléphonique décisive, où il a été question d'une normalisation des relations entre le gouvernement central et la sécession, ce qui bien sûr conforterait la position katangaise.

A partir du témoignage du représentant de l'ONU au Katanga, il est établi que le transfert de Lumumba fait partie de la négociation. On ne connaît pas le détail du donnant-donnant, mais il s'agit sans doute d'une forme de reconnaissance implicite du Katanga.

Enfin, le lendemain de l'assassinat, le 18 janvier, les autorités katangaises annoncent officiellement l'arrivée de Lumumba "à la demande du président Kasa-Vubu et avec l'accord du gouvernement katangais". Tshombe assume donc ouvertement sa part de responsabilité sur ce point : il accepte l'arrivée de Lumumba au Katanga.

Les Belges impliqués dans le transfert, décision prise par les Congolais Les Belges, et en première ligne le ministre d'Aspremont, ont donc mis tout leur poids dans la négociation à l'échelon politique et pour l'organisation de l'opération. Pour le transfert, soulignent les experts, il y avait "parfaite identité de vue entre les politiciens congolais et les conseillers belges".
Dans la matinée du 17 janvier, tous les Belges impliqués sont informés : les Affaires étrangères, les Affaires africaines et la Sûreté de l'Etat, à Bruxelles, et les conseillers et responsables belges à Brazzaville, à Léopoldville et au Katanga.

Soudain, le flux des télex et des messages radio entre Belges s'interrompt pour plusieurs jours. Pourtant, dès le lendemain des exécutions, le matin du 18 janvier, la nouvelle est connue de plusieurs officiels belges du Katanga. Bruxelles ne sera informée officiellement que le 23 janvier.

Les Etats-Unis ont déjà infléchi leurs positions, et s'inquiètent officiellement le 18 janvier auprès de la Belgique : "Ces initiatives contrecarrent très gravement action diplomatique que déploient constamment Etats-Unis".
Après le 17 janvier, un curieux black-out

Il n’est pas concevable que l’information essentielle sur la mort de Lumumba n’ait pas été transmise au plus tôt… Le téléphone a sans doute été préféré aux télex, de manière à éviter tout écrit compromettant. Ce black-out est manifestement destiné à ne jamais soupçonner l’implication des Belges dans une décision qui a été prise par les seuls dirigeants katangais… Ce serait donc un règlement de compte entre Congolais : ceci restera la version la plus répandue jusqu’en 2000.

La "part irréfutable de responsabilité" de certains acteurs belges
Le poids des mots : la commission d’enquête de la Chambre conclut en 2001 à la "responsabilité morale" du gouvernement belge dans les circonstances qui ont conduit à l’assassinat de Patrice Lumumba. Le ministre belge des Affaires étrangères réagira ensuite en parlant de "la part irréfutable de responsabilité de certains acteurs belges dans les évènements qui ont conduit à l’assassinat". La famille Lumumba estime, quant à elle, elle qu’il fallait user des termes "responsabilité tout court" de la Belgique officielle.

La participation décisive et continue des officiels belges

Restent des zones d’ombres, même si la participation continue des responsables belges est clairement établie, que ce soit dans la déstabilisation, dans la mise à l’écart politique, dans l’assignation à résidence, dans les plans d’enlèvement ou d’assassinat, dans l’arrestation et dans le transfert de Lumumba et de ses compagnons, sans jamais demander un jugement en bonne et due forme, comme promis par le président Kasa-Vubu.
L’assassinat lui-même, concluent les experts "ne relève pas d’un complot explicite" et est de la responsabilité des dirigeants katangais, mais les responsables belges le savaient possible et ont appuyé le transfert "sans exclure la possibilité que (Lumumba) y soit mis à mort". Ils ont donc laissé faire un assassinat prémédité, tout en détournant leur regard de la scène du crime.

Pourquoi tuer Lumumba ?

Reste une question-clé : pourquoi cet acharnement de certains responsables belges et congolais ? Certains mettent en avant des arguments non rationnels, dont la vengeance après le discours du 30 juin, ressenti comme une injure à la Belgique et au roi. D'autres insistent sur l'opposition ou même la haine que pouvait provoquer Lumumba chez ses adversaires, qui mettent l'accent sur ses réactions entières, et parfois radicales ou impulsives, sur ses déclarations changeantes et sur ses conflits politiques, notamment lors de la scission de son parti, le Mouvement national congolais (MNC). Cela serait trop simple pour justifier un assassinat. Lumumba a aussi été accusé, mais à tort, d'être communiste.

Lumumba n'était pas communiste

Patrice Lumumba était un jeune autodidacte, un grand tribun, mais avec seulement quelques mois d'expérience de la gestion politique. Il était nationaliste et soucieux de justice sociale. Il s'est engagé dans le combat pour l'indépendance fin 1958, et est devenu pour certains une figure prophétique, mais il n'était pas communiste.

La "menace communiste" était une véritable obsession pour les Belges avant comme après l'indépendance, avec d'innombrables indications en ce sens. Une note d'Harold d'Aspremont Lynden, alors conseiller du Premier ministre Eyskens en atteste en juillet 1960 : "Lumumba personnellement n'est que l'agent d'exécution d'un gigantesque complot manigancé par l'Est".
L'historienne Sophie Gijs a pu avec raison parler du "pouvoir de l'absent" en étudiant l'éventuelle influence communiste au Congo. L'historien José Gotovitch décrit cette " peur viscérale du communisme " jusqu'à l'indépendance et ajoute : "Cette crainte obsessionnelle du communisme détermina la politique des puissances occidentales, après l'indépendance".

Patrice Lumumba avait eu des contacts en Belgique avec des progressistes et des anticolonialistes, dont des communistes. Et son parti a été financé par les pays de l'Est, ce que Mobutu, alors proche de Lumumba, avait révélé aux services belges.

L'appel aux Soviétiques et la rupture entre Congolais

Par ailleurs, la décision de faire appel à l'aide soviétique en août 1960 a été sans doute décisive dans le contexte de la guerre froide. L'aide soviétique est restée en réalité très limitée, mais l'épouvantail communiste a puissamment joué.

Sur la scène politique congolaise, à partir du mois d'août 1960, les contradictions s'accentuent, avec une escalade de mesures de plus en plus extrêmes de part et d'autre, jusqu'à la rupture définitive.
Un assassinat politique, pour sauvegarder la présence néocoloniale

La vraie raison de la détermination continue et de l'action décisive des responsables belges est politique : Patrice Lumumba voulait renverser l'ordre colonial et son prolongement néocolonial, qui maintenait une influence persistante des Belges dans la conduite politique et économique du Congo indépendant.

Pour aller plus loin : Les secrets de l'affaire Lumumba, (à partir du rapport des experts de la commission d'enquête parlementaire sur l'assassinat de Patrice Lumumba), L.

De Vos, E. Gérard, J. Gérard-Libois, P. Raxhon, Racines, 2005

Congo 1960, tomes 1 et 2, J. Gérard-Libois et B. Verhaegen, Les dossiers du CRISP, 1961

Congo 1961, B. Verhaegen, Les dossiers du CRISP, 1962

Sécession au Katanga, J. Gérard-Libois, Les études du CRISP, 1963

Qui a tué Patrice Lumumba ? Jacques Brassine et Jean Kestergat, Duculot, 1981

Patrice Lumumba. La crise congolaise revisitée, Jean-Claude Willame, Karthala, 1990

L'assassinat de Lumumba, L. De Witte, Karthala, 2000
Mémoires noires, les Congolais racontent le Congo belge, 1940-1960, F. Ryckmans, Racine RTBF, 2020, ainsi que Mémoires noires d'une indépendance et Journal d'une indépendance, émissions radio RTBF de 2000 et de 2010.

A lire aussi : la série "Congo 1960", publiée sur le site RTBF Info, à partir de janvier 2020 :

Congo 1960 – épisode 1 : le 20 janvier 1960, il y a 60 ans, la Table ronde, le Front commun des Congolais

Congo 1960 – épisode 2 : le 27 janvier 1960, les Congolais annoncent : l'indépendance, ce sera le 30 juin

Congo 1960 – épisode 3 : le 20 février 1960, la fin de la Table ronde, le " pari congolais " des Belges, un pari qui sera perdu

Congo 1960 – épisode 4 : mars 1960, retour sur la décolonisation, de la colonie " modèle " au Congo indépendant, de 1940 à 1960

Congo 1960 – épisode 5 : avril 1960, la Table ronde économique, hold-up sur l'économie du Congo belge

Congo 1960 – épisode 6 : mai 1960, les premières élections au Congo, l'alliance autour de Patrice Lumumba arrive en tête
Congo 1960 – Episode 7 : le 24 juin 1960, lutte pour le pouvoir au sommet – Kasa-Vubu est élu président et Lumumba devient Premier ministre
Congo 1690 – Episode 8 : le 30 juin 1960, le Congo est indépendant – la fête et le coup de tonnerre
Congo 1690 – Episode 9 : le 6 juillet 1960, le Congo s'embrase
Congo 1960 – Episode 10 : le 14 septembre 1960, le premier coup d'Etat de Mobutu et l'" élimination politique " de Lumumba
Le 4 janvier 1959, le soulèvement de Léopoldville

Juillet – août 1960 : la Belgique veut affaiblir le gouvernement Lumumba
La rupture des relations diplomatiques entre le Congo est décidée le 14 juillet 1960 par le président Kasa-Vubu et le Premier ministre Lumumba. Les deux leaders congolais dénoncent ensemble le soutien de la Belgique à la sécession du Katanga et l'intervention militaire de l'armée belge. Il s'agit pour eux d'une agression.

L'armée belge a en effet reçu "carte blanche" du gouvernement : elle a lancé une guerre coloniale et échoué dans le projet d'une occupation militaire du Bas-Congo pour en faire un "protectorat militaire". L'armée belge intervient aussi au Katanga et y désarme l'armée congolaise, ce qui permet à Moïse Tshombe de proclamer l'indépendance de cette riche province minière. Le Katanga est reconnu, non pas en droit mais de fait, et Bruxelles installe une "mission technique belge" à Elisabethville.

La puissante Union minière, au Katanga, et la Société générale de Belgique, qui la contrôle, soutiennent ouvertement la sécession et plaident en ce sens auprès du roi Baudouin et du Premier ministre.

Fin juillet : l’option katangaise, pour mettre Lumumba hors-jeu
"L’option katangaise" consiste à imaginer reconstruire un "nouveau Congo", à partir d’une fédération de provinces autonomes ou d’une confédération d’Etats indépendants. A la fin juillet, le ministre belge des Affaires étrangères Wigny conclut : "Tout ralliement d’autres provinces au Katanga est donc à encourager".

Il s’agit d’affaiblir Lumumba, dont le gouvernement et l’armée se débattent dans un Congo qui s’embrase. Le roi Baudouin, dans son discours exceptionnel du 21 juillet, défend l’option katangaise, sans la citer comme telle : "Des ethnies entières nous ont conservé leur amitié, et nous adjurent de les aider. Notre devoir est de répondre à ceux qui nous demanderont notre collaboration".

Par ailleurs, la Belgique soutient aussi militairement et financièrement, à partir du 9 août, la sécession du Sud-Kasaï, producteur du diamant congolais.
Le 16 août, le secrétaire général de l'ONU et Lumumba : "C'est lui ou moi"
A la mi-août, c'est la rupture brutale entre Patrice Lumumba et le secrétaire général de l'ONU. Dag Hammarskjöld le fait savoir en privé, en utilisant la formule : "C'est Lumumba ou Hammarskjöld, pas de place pour les deux". L'ONU est engagée au Congo depuis la mi-juillet avec des milliers de soldats occidentaux et des pays non alignés et a exigé le départ des militaires belges.

Lumumba estime que l'ONU doit l'aider à réduire la sécession katangaise et à rétablir son autorité sur tout le territoire congolais. Hammarskjöld rappelle que le mandat est d'assurer la paix et la sécurité, mais de rester neutre, sans intervenir dans un conflit intérieur. Le secrétaire général de l'ONU veut mettre fin à la sécession par la négociation, Lumumba par la force.
Le Premier ministre congolais fait appel à l'Union soviétique et obtient une aide logistique aérienne pour transporter ses troupes et réduire la sécession du Sud-Kasaï, à partir de la mi-août. Ce sera au prix d'une répression brutale, qui explique la forte hostilité du Kasaï ensuite envers Lumumba et le chef d'Etat-major Mobutu.

Par contre, à Brazzaville, la capitale de l'ancien Congo français devenu indépendant le 15 août, le président Youlou, un proche du président Kasa-Vubu, s'inquiète avec son entourage de conseillers et de lobbymen français de la contagion communiste que rechercherait Lumumba. Le 18 août 1960, le président américain Eisenhower : "Débarrassez-moi de lui !"

Le président américain Eisenhower lance en Conseil national de sécurité, le 18 août, après la visite de Patrice Lumumba aux Etats-Unis "Get rid of him ('Débarrassez-moi de lui') !". Le chef de la CIA, Allen Dulles, en déduit que "Patrice Lumumba doit être chassé du pouvoir par tous les moyens". Dulles interprète la phrase comme une autorisation de tuer.

D’après les proches de Lumumba, le président Eisenhower réagit de la sorte après la réponse de Lumumba à un journaliste américain : "Les traités signés par les Belges pourraient être révisés". "Y compris sur l’uranium ?", demande le journaliste. "Oui, y compris sur l’uranium". A l’époque, l’uranium du Congo est in américain, cela en pleine guerre froide contre l’Union soviétique.

Le Premier ministre Lumumba accueilli par le secrétaire d'Etat des Etats-Unis, le 24 juillet 1960. © Tous droits réservésdispensable à l’arsenal nucléaire

Août 1960 : l’opposition à Lumumba au Congo s’organise

A partir du mois d’août, une opposition de plus en plus marquée émerge à Léopoldville. En réaction, le gouvernement Lumumba, au retour du voyage du Premier ministre, proclame l’état d’exception, restreint certaines libertés et instaure la censure. Cette escalade provoque des réactions des syndicats, des journaux, d'une partie de l'armée, et de la puissante Eglise catholique, qui dénonce l'idée de Lumumba de nationaliser l'université catholique de Lovanium. Certains parlent d'un début de dictature.

50 millions de francs : les fonds secrets belges

La Belgique ne reste pas inactive. Pour Bruxelles, dès le début du mois d'août, l'objectif est d'écarter politiquement Patrice Lumumba.
La Belgique a dû fermer son ambassade à Léopoldville, mais une équipe belge s'active à Brazzaville, sur l'autre rive du fleuve Congo. Louis Marlière, un officier belge, coordonne le service Action et André Lahaye, un ancien de la Sûreté congolaise, est chargé du Renseignement.

Un officier belge, le major Loos, attaché au cabinet des Affaires africaines, à Bruxelles, est en liaison étroite avec Brazzaville. Il finance plusieurs actions clandestines pour affaiblir le Premier ministre Lumumba, en utilisant d'importants "fonds secrets", pour un montant de 50 millions de francs belges de l'époque, sans compter les budgets de la Défense. Les fonds servent à la diffusion de tracts contre Lumumba, ou de faux tracts incendiaires signés par lui, à une radio clandestine et au financement de journaux, d'organisations et de partis hostiles à Lumumba.
En parallèle, le consul belge, avec deux diplomates, dont Etienne Davignon, suit l'action politique.

"Renverser Lumumba selon nos vœux"

Le Premier ministre belge, Gaston Eyskens, insiste avec fermeté à la mi-août auprès d'un conseiller belge du président Kasa-Vubu : "Il faut que le président démette Lumumba". Et le ministre Wigny transmet au président congolais les arguments pour justifier en droit la révocation du Premier ministre. Un télex des diplomates

belges Davignon et Westhof évoque clairement au début septembre "un renversement du gouvernement (Lumumba) selon nos vœux". Plusieurs responsables politiques et quelques ministres congolais sont alors prêts à s'écarter de la ligne Lumumba, jugé par eux excessif et autoritaire. Les responsables belges multiplient les contacts avec eux et les encouragent dans leurs projets. Le ministre des Affaires africaines : "L'homme du Katanga, du roi, et des sociétés"

A la faveur d'un remaniement du gouvernement belge, un nouveau ministre des Affaires africaines entre en fonction. Harold d'Aspremont Lynden est un homme-clé dans la crise. Il était à la tête de la Mission technique du Katanga. Il est ouvertement favorable à l'option katangaise. Il a la confiance du Palais et du Premier ministre Eyskens. L'opposition le présente comme "l'homme du Katanga, du roi et des sociétés". Le ministre Wigny se dit mécontent de cette nomination. L'option katangaise est renforcée.

A ce stade, une vaste coalition de fait est donc formée, mais sans réelle coordination, et parfois même dans la confusion. Pour la Belgique, l'objectif est de " neutraliser " politiquement Patrice Lumumba.

Le 5 septembre 60 : Kasa-Vubu révoque le Premier ministre Lumumba
A la surprise des Belges, le président Kasa-Vubu prend l'initiative de révoquer le Premier ministre Lumumba dans la soirée du 5 septembre et de nommer un nouveau Premier ministre. Le plan belge prévoyait par contre, quelques jours plus tard, une motion de défiance votée au Sénat congolais, avec des manifestations ou des grèves.

Mais Patrice Lumumba réagit aussitôt, et le Parlement finit par donner les pleins pouvoirs au Premier ministre, qui affirme alors exercer aussi les pouvoirs du chef de l'Etat. Suivent neuf journées de totale confusion, avec deux gouvernements parallèles, une armée congolaise divisée, et certains Casques bleus africains prêts à soutenir Lumumba, alors que Dag Hammarskjöld considère Lumumba dans l'illégalité depuis qu'il a rejeté sa révocation.

LE 14 SEPTEMBRE le coup d'Etat du colonel Mobutu

Le coup d'Etat du colonel Mobutu, le 14 septembre, consacre l'élimination politique de Patrice Lumumba. Le président et les deux gouvernements sont neutralisés, mais en pratique, le président Kasa-Vubu conserve sa marge de manœuvre, tandis que Patrice Lumumba perd le contrôle de la situation, et est plusieurs fois arrêté puis libéré.

Mobutu met en place un exécutif de techniciens et de politiques, le "Collège des commissaires généraux", dont le ministre Bomboko devient président. Enfin, un groupe informel, le "groupe de Binza", rassemble notamment Kasa-Vubu, Mobutu, Bomboko et Nendaka, le chef de la Sûreté. Ce groupe restreint accueille régulièrement des responsables belges ou le chef de station de la CIA à Léopoldville, Larry Devlin. C'est le lieu où se préparent par consensus les grandes décisions qui seront assumées par le collège des commissaires.

"Mettre (Lumumba) hors d'état de nuire"

L'objectif de la Belgique est alors de faire arrêter Lumumba. L'argument est qu'il s'est mis hors la loi en proclamant qu'il restait Premier ministre : "Lumumba est devenu un factieux", écrit le ministre Wigny, qui insiste alors sur le "devoir (pour les autorités congolaises) de le mettre hors d'état de nuire", comme l'écrit le ministre Wigny, le 6 septembre, ou comme l'écrit le ministre d'Aspremont, le 5 octobre, en demandant "l'élimination définitive" de Lumumba.

Les experts de la commission d'enquête montreront clairement que l'expression signifie bien une élimination " politique " définitive et non une élimination "physique", comme certains la suggéreront plus tard.
"L'opération ne réussira qu'une fois"

Durant cette période chaotique, les responsables belges craignent en effet un renversement de la situation au profit de Lumumba. Le colonel Mobutu lui-même est tiraillé, et il a déjà fait relâcher Lumumba, dont il était proche, alors qu'il était en même temps indicateur de la Sûreté congolaise, comme nous l'a confié l'agent belge qui le voyait chaque semaine. Pour les ministres belges est clair, il faut faire arrêter Lumumba, car, écrit Wigny, dans un télex : "Pareille opération ne réussira qu'une seule fois. S'ils échouent, ils compromettent salut pays et leur existence personnelle". Autrement dit, une libération constituerait un grand danger pour les dirigeants de Léopoldville.
Des actions clandestines, qui échouent

Durant toute cette période, en parallèle, s'organisent des actions clandestines, des livraisons d'armes et des tentatives d'enlèvement ou d'assassinat. Il existe au moins une tentative d'empoisonnement par substitution de médicaments, imaginée par la CIA.

Les responsables belges sont informés ou organisent certaines actions secrètes. Deux Belges agissant sans mandat prétendent pouvoir organiser l'assassinat de Patrice Lumumba, mais les deux opérations n'en restent qu'au stade de projets fantaisistes.
Ensuite, "Georges", un majordome présenté par l'historien Jo Gérard, proche de l'extrême droite, est recruté à Bruxelles comme tueur à gages. Il lui est promis un million de francs belges, mais le "tueur" est un escroc, qui disparaît avec l'acompte versé par les fonds secrets.

Des actions secrètes, "couvertes"

Plus sérieusement, un officier belge est directement chargé par le général Cumont, chef d’état-major de l’armée belge, d’organiser l’enlèvement de Lumumba pour l’amener à Brazzaville. L’opération est très vite connue de trop de monde, et l’officier renonce en s’apercevant qu’il s’agissait peut-être d’assassiner Patrice Lumumba.

Mais tout ceci reste désordonné, comme l’écrivent les experts de la commission Lumumba : "Si le désir de meurtre était là chez certains, il était trop diffus, trop encombrant pour que des moyens sérieux soient donnés à des intermédiaires pour passer à l’acte. En fait, à l’automne 1960 en Belgique, personne n’a voulu prendre sur soi la responsabilité d’un processus conduisant à l’élimination physique de Lumumba, donc ce processus ne s’est pas enclenché".

Le 10 octobre : Lumumba, "prisonnier à résidence"

Finalement, Mobutu franchit le pas : le soir du 10 octobre, un commando de 200 soldats congolais vient arrêter Patrice Lumumba, dont la résidence est protégée par l’ONU, qui ne cède pas à l’ultimatum congolais. Les Casques bleus sont renforcés et filtrent les visiteurs. Mais la résidence est encerclée par un second cordon de soldats congolais chargés de l’arrêter s’il tentait de sortir. En pratique, Lumumba est à la fois protégé et menacé d’arrestation, et donc prisonnier, mais à résidence. L’ONU l’a averti clairement : sa protection "ne lui est accordée que lorsqu’il est à son domicile". Patrice Lumumba prendra la fuite fin novembre et perdra dès lors la protection des Casques bleus.

La Belgique a joué un rôle majeur dans l’opération pour faire arrêter Lumumba : les agents belges ont persuadé Mobutu de passer à l’action contre une grosse somme d’argent. Des fonds secrets sont accordés par le ministre d’Aspremont Lynden à une importante assistance technique et militaire à l’armée congolaise, le vrai but étant de convaincre Mobutu de faire arrêter Lumumba.

Par la suite, les ministres belges pèseront de tout leur poids pour empêcher les tentatives de réconciliation entre les leaders congolais.
En octobre, le major Loos précise dans un télex qu'un leader congolais "proclame sa volonté de voir disparaître Lumumba physiquement". L'idée commence à faire tacitement son chemin dans certains esprits.
Le 18 octobre, le roi Baudouin informé d'un projet d'assassinat : "Une réaction accablante"

Un officier belge au Katanga, le major Weber, tient une correspondance parallèle avec le roi Baudouin par l'intermédiaire de son chef de cabinet. Weber signale le 18 octobre l'intention de Kasa-Vubu et de Tshombe de "neutraliser complètement (et si possible physiquement) Patrice Lumumba". Le chef de cabinet note un point d'interrogation en marge, mais le roi, informé, n'y donne aucune suite écrite, alors qu'il réagit par écrit à d'autres points du même courrier.
L'absence apparente de réaction officielle du roi peut être considérée comme un blanc-seing ou un accord tacite à l'idée d'un assassinat, sauf si le roi a réagi sans qu'on en ait la trace, par exemple lors d'une audience privée. Par ailleurs, les experts n'ont retrouvé aucune indication selon laquelle un ministre aurait été informé, ce qui serait de règle. Les experts en concluent que "la correspondance, mais surtout la réaction du roi sont soit naïves, soit calculées, mais en tout cas accablantes".

Le 13 novembre : les partisans de Lumumba au pouvoir au nord-est du Congo

Nouveau coup de théâtre : à la mi-novembre, des ministres lumumbistes prennent le pouvoir à Stanleyville, aujourd'hui Kisangani, le fief électoral de Lumumba, avec le soutien d'une partie de l'armée, et se proclament "gouvernement légal". Toute la province Orientale bascule, avec des régions voisines alliées aux lumumbistes, comme le nord du Katanga et une grande partie du Kasaï.

Le Congo se disloque, la guerre civile au nord du Katanga, en août 1960. Ceges – GeorgesLe Congo se disloque en trois grandes zones : celle contrôlée par Léopoldville, les deux sécessions du sud-est, et la zone lumumbiste, dont l'armée passe à l'offensive. Le 1er janvier, le grand Kivu bascule à son tour. Mobutu obtient de la Belgique de pouvoir faire passer son armée par le Burundi pour contrattaquer le Kivu, et demande des armes et des véhicules pour l'opération. L'armée congolaise échoue lamentablement.
Les lumumbistes contrôlent plus du tiers du Congo

Les partisans de Lumumba et leurs alliés contrôlent plus du tiers du pays. Les lumumbistes disposent dès lors d'une base à partir de laquelle ils peuvent espérer réunifier le Congo. La zone lumumbiste dispose d'une frontière avec le Soudan indépendant, lui-même voisin et allié à l'Egypte du colonel Nasser, leader tiers-mondiste et allié de Lumumba.

Le gouvernement Lumumba connaît à la mi-novembre une défaite à l'ONU, qui reconnaît la légitimité de la délégation de Kasa-Vubu. Lumumba craint que l'ONU ne lui assure plus sa protection, alors que ses partisans contrôlent Stanleyville : il prend la décision de fuir avec quelques proches et de rejoindre les ministres fidèles en province Orientale. Il sera capturé avant d'y arriver.

Le 27 novembre : la fuite de Lumumba

Le 27 novembre, vers 22 heures, sous une pluie battante, Lumumba, caché dans une voiture, quitte sa résidence et monte ensuite dans un petit convoi de plusieurs voitures et d'un camion de soldats fidèles, qui prend la route vers l'est : Stanleyville est à plus de 2000 km C'est la panique chez les responsables belges et à la CIA, qui redoutent "l'installation d'un gouvernement central révolutionnaire à Stanleyville", comme l'écrit l'ambassadeur Rothschild au Katanga, avec des "conséquences imprévisibles et certainement très graves, avec appui égyptien et soviétique considéré comme certain". Le Collège des commissaires demande l'aide de l'ONU pour rechercher Lumumba, mais L'ONU annonce : "Aucune aide ou assistance ni aux poursuivants ni aux poursuivis".

Une traque acharnée

Les Belges pressent les Congolais d'agir. Un agent congolais, Gilbert Pongo, reçoit l'aide de la CIA et de la Belgique pour retrouver les fuyards. Ils seront localisés lors d'une étape où Lumumba est reconnu et acclamé par la population, avant d'y improviser un meeting. L'information arrive à Léopoldville. La Sabena, la compagnie aérienne belge, prête à l'inspecteur Pongo un avion de reconnaissance à basse altitude piloté par un spécialiste belge. L'avion parcourt tous les itinéraires possibles avant de retrouver le convoi, qui devait traverser une rivière dans la région du Kasaï. Lumumba passe en pirogue mais revient chercher sa famille, les militaires congolais capturent Lumumba et deux de ses compagnons. Lumumba est battu et menacé de mort. Le lendemain, le pilote belge tente de convaincre Pongo de partir immédiatement vers le Katanga pour y faire juger Lumumba, mais Pongo refuse et suit les

LE 2 DÉCEMBRE: Lumumba arrêté, violemment battu devant Mobutu

Les photographes sont là : Lumumba n'a plus de lunettes, il a les bras liés derrière le dos, un soldat le tire par les cheveux pour les photos. Les prisonniers sont emmenés au camp des paracommandos, où l'attend Mobutu. Lumumba est battu devant lui, avant d'être mis au cachot. Les autorités congolaises prennent contact avec Elisabethville pour un transfert rapide au Katanga. Les Belges appuient la demande. Le lendemain, pourtant, Lumumba et ses deux compagnons sont transférés et mis au cachot au camp militaire de Thysville.

Wake Up Africa!
Why hasn't the Congo River been used to generate hydroelectric power, since a successful dam would reportedly generate enough power for all of Africa?

Alton Allen Knowledgeable In African and African Diaspora History: Mon

I think there are plans to do just that, however there's considerable push back from environmentalists.

RECOGNISING that legal, socially beneficial and responsibly operated activities such as the construction of large infrastructure can nonetheless cause, or are likely to cause, severe and either widespread or long-term damage to the environment;

ALARMED that development could be detrimental to the Lower Congo's rich freshwater biodiversity, displace ca. 6,300 people (International Rivers, 2014) and disturb the ecology of the marine Congo canyon; and

CONCERNED that the development plans for the Congo could bypass procedures to ensure that projects are awarded transparently and via competitive bidding (CORAP, 2021);

134 - Protecting the Lower Congo River from large hydro-electric dam developments

Related Links

What is the Euro-centric view that Africa's past was "nothing but the unrewarding gyrations of barbarous tribes"?

Is Egypt part of the Great Sahara Desert?
Do you know any urban legends or horror stories from your country or city?
Is Africa too poor to install renewable energy facilities?
Are African countries moving towards renewable energy?

Has history vindicated a former leader of your country who was previously ridiculed for his or her ideas/policies at the time? What is the story?

Is your country doing enough to achieve carbon neutrality?

Why is it so hard for an African child like myself to make legit money online? Why is itSo hard to even get help?

Do we have more poor people in Africa than in other continents?

Why are people attacking Mummy G O in Nigeria?
How bad is it in Nigeria?

Without colonialism forcing several independent Afriqan nations (distinct "nation-states", tribes, clans or Kingdoms) together into today's countries, how many upon the whole continent will there be? Which the most powerful? Is there a map of this?

If you think that Native African people should identify as black people, can you explain to me why?

What is the richest cultural heritage in Africa?
What are three major differences of the Northern African culture from the Asian culture?

Did Central Africa develop slower because the need for innovation was lower? People in Egypt, the Middle East, or Europe lives in areas humans couldn't survive & come up with advanced ideas/better technology that leads them to advanced societies.

Françoise Marie Master's Degree in Public Administration, Syracuse University
Jan 10
The choice of Central Africa is intentional.

Central Africa is the Heart of Darkness where time stopped and nothing remarkable ever happened.
The legendary British explorer Stanley coined the expression "Africa, the Dark Continent" but he admitted that he had read 130 books before his travels to Central Africa, Congo. He also wrote that he started his journeys from Zanzibar.

Why Zanzibar?

The legendary Zanzibarite explorer and merchant, Tippu Tip, real name Ḥamad ibn Muḥammad ibn Jumʿah ibn Rajab ibn Muḥammad ibn Saʿīd al Murjabī had mapped the Congo (northeast, southeast, south-north central Congo) where he had built a huge commercial empire where Swahili was spoken and Islam practiced. He actually accompanied Stanley he later accused of stealing his country.

Central Africa is where the Congo Rainforest, the second lung of the earth after the Amazon Forest, is located and where the African jungles are concentrated.

Some people in the West learn about Africa through jungle books like the Tarzan Saga. The existence of a ski resort in Central Africa DRC seems like a joke but it is absolutely true. You can go skiing in the Rwenzori Mountains at the border with Uganda.

More importantly, Central Africa is not limited to the DRC; it also covers Chad and Cameroon. In addition, there are savannah zones in Central Africa and Chad is also a Saharan country. To put it simply, Central Africa also has snow-capped mountains, Saharan zones and savannah areas.

Central Africa - Wikipedia

Core region of African continent Central Africa is a subregion of the African continent comprising various countries according to different definitions. Angola , Burundi , Cameroon , the Central African Republic , Chad , the Democratic Republic of the Congo , the Republic of the Congo , Equatorial Guinea , Gabon , Rwanda , and São Tomé and Príncipe are members of the Economic Community of Central African States (ECCAS). [1] Six of those states (Cameroon, the Central African Republic, Chad, the Republic of the Congo, Equatorial Guinea, and Gabon) are also members of the Economic and Monetary Community of Central Africa (CEMAC) and share a common currency, the Central African CFA franc . [2] ECCAS state, part of Middle Africa ECCAS state only The African Development Bank defines Central Africa as Cameroon, the Central African Republic, Chad, the Democratic Republic of the Congo, the Republic of the Congo, Equatorial Guinea, and Gabon. [3] Middle Africa is an analogous term used by the United Nations in its geoscheme for Africa . It includes the same countries as the African Development Bank's definition, along with Angola and São Tomé and Príncipe. [4] List of Central African countries [edit] Background [edit] The Central African Federation (1953–1963), also called the Federation of Rhodesia and Nyasaland , was made up of what are now the nations of Malawi , Zambia , and Zimbabwe . Similarly, the Anglican Church of the Province of Central Africa covers dioceses in Botswana , Malawi, Zambia, and Zimbabwe, while the Church of Central Africa, Presbyterian has synods in Malawi, Zambia, and Zimbabwe. These states are now typically considered part of East or Southern Africa . [5] Geography [edit] The basin of Lake Chad has historically been ecologically significant to the populations of Central Africa, especially with the Lake Chad Basin Commission serving as an important supra-regional organization in Central Africa. History [edit] Prehistory [edit] Archeological finds in Central Africa have been discovered dating back, over 100,000 years. [6] According to Zagato and Holl, there is evidence of iron-smelting in the Central African Republic and Cameroon that may date back to 3000 to 2500 BCE. [7] Extensive walled settlements have recently been found in Northeast Nigeria, approximately 60 km (37 mi) southwest of Lake Chad dating to the first millennium BCE. [8] Trade and improved agricultural techniques supported more sophisticated societies, leading to the early civilizations of Sao , Kanem , Bornu , Shilluk , Baguirmi , and Wadai . [9] Around 2500 BCE, Bantu migrants had reached the Great Lakes Region in Central Africa. Halfway through the first millennium BCE, the Bantu had also settled as far south as what is now Angola . Ancient history [edit] Sao civilization [edit] The Sao civilization flourished from

ca. the 6th century BCE to as late as the 16th century CE in northern Central Africa. The Sao lived by the Chari River south of Lake Cha

https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Central_Africa

Congo Ski Club

File:Vegetation Africa.png - Wikimedia Commons

Description Vegetation Africa.png The main biomes in Africa. Drawn by hand using maps. Date 1 March 2009, 18:05 (UTC) Source Author Other versions File:Africa - Vegetazione.PNG This biogeographical map image could be re-created using vector graphics as an SVG file . This has several advantages; see Commons:Media for cleanup for more information. If an SVG form of this image is available, please upload it and afterwards replace this template with {{ vector version available | new image name }} . It is recommended to name the SVG file "Vegetation Africa.svg" – then the template Vector version available (or Vva) does not need the new image name parameter. Template:RetouchedPicture Africa I, the copyright holder of this work, hereby publish it under the following licenses: This file is licensed under the Creative Commons Attribution-Share Alike 2.5 Generic , 2.0 Generic and 1.0 Generic license. You are free: to share – to copy, distribute and transmit the work to remix – to adapt the work Under the following conditions: attribution – You must give appropriate credit, provide a link to the license, and indicate if changes were made. You may do so in any reasonable manner, but not in any way that suggests the licensor endorses you or your use. share alike – If you remix, transform, or build upon the material, you must distribute your contributions under the same or compatible license as the original. https://creativecommons.org/licenses/by-sa/2.5 CC BY-SA 2.5 Creative Commons Attribution-Share Alike 2.5 true true Permission is granted to copy, distribute and/or modify this document under the terms of the GNU Free Documentation License ,

Version 1.2 or any later version published by the Free Software Foundation ; with no Invariant Sections, no Front-Cover Texts, and no Back-Cover Texts. A copy of the license is included in the section entitled GNU Free Documentation License . http://www.gnu.org/copyleft/fdl.html GFDL GNU Free Documentation License true true This file is licensed under the Creative Commons Attribution-Share Alike 3.0 Unported license. You are free: to share – to copy, distribute and transmit the work to remix – to adapt the work Under the following conditions: attribution – You must give appropriate credit, provide a link to the license, and indicate if changes were made. You may do so in any reasonable manner, but not in any way that suggests the licensor endorses you or your use. share alike – If you remix, transform, or build upon the material, you must distribute your contributions under the same or compatible license as the original. This licensing tag was added to this file as part of the GFDL licensing update . http://creativecommons.org/licenses/by-sa/3.0/ CC-BY-SA-3.0 Creative Commons Attribution-Share Alike 3.0 true true You may select the license of your choice. Original upload log [edit] This image is a derivative work of the following images: File:Vegetation.png licensed with Cc-by-sa-2.5,2.0,1.0, GFDL 2008-05-01T23:31:3 https://commons.wikimedia.org/wiki/File:Vegetation_Africa.png

Why is there no civilization from the rainforests in Africa like the Congo Rainforest but we have civilizations from American rain forests like Maya?

Alton Allen Knowledgeable In African and African Diaspora History: Wed

Instead of asking why was there no , ask were there?, because you're basing your question with an assumption, Mayans did not built their civilizations in a rain forest, it was just forested, no one like living in a rain forest, it sucks and full of bugs, however folks do live on the edge of the rain forest 🌳🌳🌳🌳🌳🌳🌳

Ilustration of the ruler of Loango, from Dapper's Description of Africa (1668)

Earliest human settlement, in what is now the DRC, stretches back some 10 000 years. The earliest settlers were in all likelihood short statured hunter-gathers, now known (though controversially so) as pygmies. Some 1 300 years ago these Stone Age peoples were followed by Bantu and Nilotic speaking hunter-gatherer groups, who settled initially in the northern savannah areas. In time the new-comers adopted or developed the cultivation of tropical crops, cattle husbandry and iron working technology which enabled them to subdue and displace the original pygmy populations, gradually driving them into the mountains and the thicker parts of the rain forest.

In the Congo area a number of extensive and complex trading states emerged in the savannah; the Kongo kingdom, the Luba Empire, the Lunda kingdom, the Zande kingdoms, and the kingdom of Kuba. While chiefdoms did emerge within the rainforests, they never rivaled the savannah states for size and complexity.

The Kingdom of Kongo (1400– 1914)

The first of these, the Kongo kingdom, was founded by invaders from the north east who settled south of the Congo River in the late 1300s and grew to encompass the north of modern Angola and the western areas of the DRC (Library of Congress 1993)

Foundation of the Kingdom

The first king of the Kingdom of Kongo Dya Ntotila was Lukeni lua Nimi (circa 1280-1320).The name Nimi a Lukeni appeared in later oral traditions and some modern historians, notably Jean Cuvelier, popularized it. Lukeni lua Nimi or Nimi a Lukeni, became the founder of Kongo when he conquered the kingdom of the Mwene Kabunga (or Mwene Mpangala), which lay upon a mountain to his south.

He transferred his rule to this mountain, the Mongo dia Kongo or "mountain of Kongo", and made Mbanza Kongo, the town there, his capital. Two centuries later the Mwene Kabunga's descendants still symbolically challenged the conquest in an annual celebration. The rulers that followed Lukeni all claimed some form of relation to his kanda or lineage and were known as the Kilukeni. The Kilukeni kanda or "house" as recorded in Portuguese documents would rule Kongo unopposed until 1567.

After the death of Nimi a Lukeni, his brother, Mbokani Mavinga, took over the throne and ruled until approximately 1367. He had two wives and nine children. His rule saw an expansion of the Kingdom of Kongo to include the neighbouring state of Loango and other areas now encompassed by the current Republic of Congo.

The Mwene Kongos often gave the governorships to members of their family or its clients. As this centralization increased, the allied provinces gradually lost influence until their powers were only symbolic, manifested in Mbata, once a co-kingdom, but by 1620 simply known by the title "Grandfather of the King of Kongo" (Nkaka'ndi a Mwene Kongo).

The high concentration of population around Mbanza Kongo and its outskirts played a critical role in the centralization of Kongo. The capital was a densely settled area in an otherwise sparsely populated region where rural population densities probably did not exceed 5 persons per square kilometer. Early Portuguese travelers described Mbanza Kongo as a large city, the size of the Portuguese town of Évora as it was in 1491. By the end of the sixteenth century, Kongo's population was probably close to half a million people in a core region of some 130,000 square kilometers. By the early seventeenth century the city and its hinterland had a population of around 100,000, or one out of every five inhabitants in the Kingdom (according to baptismal statistics compiled by Jesuit priests). This concentration allowed resources, soldiers and surplus foodstuffs to be readily available at the request of the king. This made the king overwhelmingly powerful and caused the kingdom to become highly centralized.

By the time of the first recorded contact with the Europeans, the Kingdom of Kongo was a highly developed state at the center of an extensive trading network. Apart from natural resources and ivory, the country manufactured and traded copperware, ferrous metal goods, raffia cloth, and pottery. The Kongo people spoke in the Kikongo language. The eastern regions, especially that part known as the Seven Kingdoms of Kongo dia Nlaza (or in Kikongo Mumbwadi or "the Seven"), were particularly famous for the production of cloth.

The Luba state coalesced some 100 years after the Kongo and to the east of it, in the upper reaches of the Lualaba River, around lakes Upemba and Kisale. The Lunda kingdom emerged 15th century through the unification of its composite chiefdoms in the south west on the patterns laid down by their Luba neighbours. In the sixteenth century its territory was overrun by the expanding Luba empire, and, unable to resist the invaders, some of the Lunda migrated to Angola where they founded new states.

The kingdom of Kuba was founded to the north of the Kasai River, and of its tributary the Sankura, by invaders from the west in about 1600. The complex forest-river-savannah ecology of its territory enabled it to develop into a vigorous trading state that was able to maintain its integrity until it fell to the advance of Belgian colonial expansion (Giblin 1999)

Capuchin Missionary Celebrating Mass, Sogno, Kingdom of Kongo.

In the late fifteenth century Portuguese explorers established contact with the Kongo kingdom, and traders and missionaries followed on their heels. Initial friendly relations between the Kongo and the Portuguese soured as a result of Portuguese rapacity and especially their insatiable demand for slaves. In later years the expansion of the Portuguese coastal enclaves brought control over land as a new focus of conflict (Library of Congress 1989, 1993, Columbia Encyclopedia 2001).

Catholic Priest Burning Idol House, Sogno, Kingdom of Kongo.

In the early 1600s, weakened by conflicts with the Portuguese and other neighbours, internal struggles for power and the ravages of the slave trade, the kingdom progressively disintegrated. Over time it lost control over its constituent parts and the trade routes that had been the source of its wealth and power. By 1700 the kingdom was a spent force (Library of Congress 1993).

The Lunda experienced a resurgence of their fortunes with the establishment of the Zembe kingdom in Katanga and northern Zambia in about 1740. The state's wealth and expansion was fueled by trade in slaves and ivory with the Portuguese on the coast. In the mid-nineteenth century the kingdom came close to collapse as it fended off penetration by Swahili slave traders from the east. The kingdom was saved by cooperation with the British South African Company, only to be partitioned between the Belgians and the British (Gordon 2004).

The Luba kingdom, in the meanwhile, had become increasingly unstable and was wracked by internal dynastic struggles. Its expansion was checked by the rise of Lunda polities to the south and west, the Kuba kingdom to the north. The weakened state was not able to resist the penetration of slave traders from east Africa and the state disintegrated in the late nineteenth century. original links for some of the text no longer in use..😔

Ok did the above answer your question?

Related Links

Why did Africa fail to develop a sophisticated civilization that could compete with Asian and European civilizations?

Why didn't any significant ancient civilization - like Indus Valley, Mesopotamia, Egypt and Mayan civilizations - flourish in Australia and the Southern part of Africa?

If early forms of man started in Africa, shouldn't there be evidence of an ancient civilization there that predates Ancient Mesopotamia?

Were there ancient civilizations in Africa that were on the same level as the Egyptians at the same time?

Is a tropical rainforest a difficult environment for human civilization to develop in a sophisticated manner, the way that civilizations in moderate climates have done?

Did the Congolese region in Subsaharan Africa play any part in ancient civilization? Why are there no ancient ruins in the Congo region?

How and why was Africa unable to overcome it having the Sahara and rain forest which prevented easy migration and it not having domesticated animals; barriers, which stopped it from making advanced military guns before European colonisations of it?

Do archeologists have any idea which ancient civilization left ruins in the Amazon Rainforest? Could it be a new unknown civilization?

Why did Africa never develop even with the Egyptian civilization?

Why aren’t there any ancient cities/temples in the African rainforest (not Africa as a whole) comparable to those in the rainforests of Asia or South America?

Why is it that, despite the head start, Africa did not develop a civilization such as Mesopotamia?

Why there are no old advanced civilizations in Brazil, like Mayans, Incas or Aztecs?

Why didn't a civilisation form around the Congo River, or may it have done, but the conditions in the area prevented preservation? In ancient times as ones did around the Nile, Danube, Indus, Motagua, Tigris and Yellow Rivers?

Why were white civilizations so much more advanced than African/Indian civilizations that they were able to enslave them?

Can Brazil be forced to stop destroying the Amazon rainforest?

Sao civilisation - Wikipedia

The Sao civilization (also called So) flourished in Central Africa from ca. the fourth or sixth century BC to as late as the sixteenth century AD. The Sao lived by the Chari River basin in territory that later became part of Cameroon and Chad . They are the earliest civilization to have left clear traces of their presence in the territory of modern Cameroon. [2] Sometime around the 16th century, conversion to Islam changed the cultural identity of the former Sao. Today, several ethnic groups of northern Cameroon and southern Chad, but particularly the Sara , Kotoko , claim descent from the civilization of the Sao. Origins [edit] The Sao civilisation began as early as the sixth or fourth century BC, and by the end of the first millennium

BC, their presence was well established around Lake Chad and near the Chari River . [3] The city states of the Sao reached their apex sometime between the ninth and fifteenth centuries AD. [4] Although some scholars estimate that the Sao civilization south of Lake Chad lasted until the fourteenth or fifteenth century, the majority opinion is that it ceased to exist as a separate culture sometime in the 16th century subsequently to the expansion of the Bornu Empire . [5] The Kotoko are the inheritors of the former city states of the Sao. [6] Culture [edit] It had been suggested that the Sao were descendants of the Hyksos who conquered Ancient Egypt that they moved south from the Nile valley into middle Africa under pressure from invaders, or that they originated in the Bilma Oasis north of the lake Chad. [7] However, a more widely accepted theory is that the Sao were simply the indigenous inhabitants of the Lake Chad basin and that their ultimate origins lie south of the lake. [8] And recent archaeological research indicates that the Sao civilization developed indigenously from earlier cultures in the region (such as the Gajiganna culture, which began at around 1,800 BCE and began to build fortified towns by about 800 BCE), gradually increasing in complexity. [9] [10] [11] [12] Sao artifacts show that they were a sophisticated civilization working in bronze , copper , and iron . [13] Finds include bronze sculptures and terra cotta statues of human and animal figures, coins, funerary urns, household utensils, jewelry, highly decorated pottery, and spears. [14] The largest Sao archaeological finds have been made south of Lake Chad. G.T. Stride presented these important facts about the Sao civilization: [T]he So people possessed considerable political and artistic genius. Although they never combined effectively to form an empire, they developed city-states which were the centres of intense local patriotism ... Each city was surrounded by strong defensive walls and dominated the life of the surrounding countryside which it both protected and governed. Government was by an elaborate hierarchy, headed by a divine ruler ... Except on ceremonial occasions, the rulers made few public appearances and even then remained

https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Sao_civilisation

The Sao civilization (also called So) flourished in Central Africa from ca. the fourth or sixth century BC to as late as the sixteenth century AD.[1] The Sao lived by the Chari River basin in territory that later became part of Cameroon and Chad. They are the earliest civilization to have left clear traces of their presence in the territory of modern Cameroon.[2] Sometime around the 16th century, conversion to Islam changed the cultural identity of the former Sao. Today, several ethnic groups of northern Cameroon and southern Chad, but particularly the Sara, Kotoko, claim descent from the civilization of the Sao.

And recent archaeological research indicates that the Sao civilization developed indigenously from earlier cultures in the region (such as the Gajiganna culture, which began at around 1,800 BCE and began to build fortified towns by about 800 BCE), gradually increasing in complexity. Sao artifacts show that they were a sophisticated civilization working in bronze, copper, and iron.Finds include bronze sculptures and terra cotta statues of human and animal figures, coins, funerary urns, household utensils, jewelry, highly decorated pottery, and spears. The largest Sao archaeological finds have been made south of Lake Chad.

La maçonnerie de pierre sèche : une technique architecturale vernac...

Introduction Pays africain peuplé d'une mosaïque de groupes ethniques ayant des spécificités culturelles, et donc, architecturales et doté d'une diversité environnementale, le Cameroun justifie son...
https://journals.openedition.org/ephaistos/5729?lang=en

Dry stone masonry: a centuries-old vernacular architectural technique in the Mandara Mountains

In Sub-Saharan Africa, dry-stone structures are no longer unique to the region situated between the Limpopo and Zambezi Rivers, where such architecture was particularly characteristic of Great Zimbabwe and led to diffusionist denials of its African origin. While it is a rare cultural feature, some characteristic elements of this architectural style are found over larger areas. This is for example the case of Cameroun, a country situated in central Africa, where the development of this style of architecture took place, although the scientific popularization of this architectural style has developed only recently. Its use in the northern Mandara Mountains of Cameroon began during the period when Great Zimbabwe reached its apogee. In fact, results from archaeological works conducted on three of sixteen archaeological sites revealed contemporaneity with the period when the impressive dry-stone structures of southern Africa appeared like the architectural style through which the greatness of political and religious local authorities is expressed.

https://www.researchgate.net/publication/236160994_Monumental_architecture_in_mountain_landscapes_The_diy-ged-bay_sites_of_northern_Cameroon

The DGB sites are complexes of dry-stone terraces and platforms in the Mandara Mountains of northern Cameroon. They constitute the earliest well-established evidence for human occupation of this region and raise important questions about the nature of monumentality, relationships with social complexity and areal culture history.

The Standing Stones of Bouar - La Civilisation mégalithique de Bouar. Prospection et fouilles 1962–1966. By Pierre Vidal Etudes oubanguiennes 1. Laboratoire d'Ethnologie et de Sociologie comparative, Université de Manterre. Paris: Firmin-Didot. 1969. Pp. 142, 13 fig. et plans, 4 cartes, 42 photos. | The Journal of African History | Cambridge Core

The Standing Stones of Bouar - La Civilisation mégalithique de Bouar. Prospection et fouilles 1962–1966. By Pierre Vidal Etudes oubanguiennes 1. Laboratoire

d'Ethnologie et de Sociologie comparative, Université de Manterre. Paris: Firmin-Didot. 1969. Pp. 142, 13 fig. et plans, 4 cartes, 42 photos. - Volume 11 Issue 4

https://www.cambridge.org/core/journals/journal-of-african-history/article/abs/standing-stones-of-bouar-la-civilisation-megalithique-de-bouar-prospection-et-fouilles-19621966-by-pierre-vidal-etudes-oubanguiennes-1-laboratoire-dethnologie-et-de-sociologie-comparative-universite-de-manterre-paris-firmindidot-1969-pp-142-13-fig-et-plans-4-cartes-42-photos/C8153D9781065D6BDB5802543F30969F

Tazanu, les Megalithes de Bouar

Megalithes de Bouar Temoin d'une civilisation ancienne en Afrique Centrale par Akonkwa Bushunju Paterne La région de Bouar, située dans le nord-ouest de la République Centrafricaine est, du point de vue archéologique, d'une grande richesse scientifique. Situés sur la ligne de partage des eaux des bassins tchadiens et congolais, les monuments mégalithiques ont fait l'objet d'études approfondies. La zone mégalithique couvre 130 km de long sur 30 km de large et s'étend sur une surface d'environ 7500 km². Les mégalithes du nord-ouest de la République Centrafricaine sont connus sous l'appellation de « Tazanu », « pierre debout » terme généri que de la langue Gbaya-Kara pour désigner les monuments mégalithiques de la région de Bouar. Les mégalithes ont été signalés pour la première fois par le Commandant J. d'Aubraumont. Le séjour de l'anthropologue français Pierre Vidal dans la région a permis une première étude en 1966, suivie par les travaux d'Etienne Zangato de l'Université de Paris X (Nanterre) et de Nicholas David de l'Université de Calgari au Canada. La zone mégalithique de Bouar présente un intérêt scientifique et culturel évident. Les mégalithes de Bouar ont gardé leurs caractéristiques originelles. Elles se distinguent du point de vue architectural, fonctionnel et géomorphologique par : Leur situation toujours à la source d'un cours d'eau, Leur orientation toujours vers l'est ou dans la direction du cours d'eau, Leur épaisseur à peu près identique, La présence des cistes à la périphérie du site, Leur caractère concentrique. Cependant, on note une tendance à la dégradation liée au phénomène d'érosion, des actions anthropiques (utilisation des pierres comme matériaux de construction, passage d'animaux) et des prélèvements. Comparaison avec d'autres biens similaires Les civilisations mégalithiques se sont développées sous diverses formes dans le monde entier. En Europe, on les rencontre à Stonehenge en Grande- Bretagne, en France par les menhirs et les dolmens du Morbihan. En Afrique du Nord, d'importants ensembles mégalithiques sont connus dans tout le Maghreb (Tunisie, Algérie, Maroc, pour ne citer que ces pays). En Afrique subsaharienne, des mégalithes existent également, notamment au Sénégal sur la rive droite du fleuve Gambie, en Mauritanie, au Mali (dans la région de Niafunké, le site de Tundidaro comprend 150 pierres dressées). Aussi, d'autres ensembles sont connus au Niger, au Togo et au Tchad qui représentent des tombeaux, protégeant ainsi des sépultures par des pierres dressées comme à Bouar. En Ethiopie, enfin, on les retrouve dans les massifs montagneux du Harrar et à l'est d'Addis-Abeba, une civilisation de mégalithes gravés s'est développée. Le site funérair Tazunu Dokoko Réalisation et l'utilisation des mégalithes à Bouar La Centre Afrique (622 984 km2 pour 5millions d'habitants) est une terre de peuplement ancien, depuis la préhistoire, mais aussi une zone de confluence des grands courants de migrations qui ont conditionné son p

http://www.shan-newspaper.com/web/page-francaise/1629-tazanu-les-megalithes-de-bouar.html

Courtesy of Google Translate

The region of Bouar, located in the north-west of the Central African Republic is, from an archaeological point of view, of great scientific wealth. Located on the watershed of the Chadian and Congolese basins, the megalithic monuments have been the subject of in-depth studies. The megalithic zone covers 130 km long by 30 km wide and covers an area of approximately 7,500 km².

The megaliths in the northwest of the Central African Republic are known as "Tazanu", "standing stone" a generic term in the Gbaya-Kara language to refer to the megalithic monuments of the Bouar region.

Kongo people - Wikipedia

The largest ethnic group of the Democratic Republic of Congo, also found in Angola and ROC Kongo Person Mwisikongo , Mukongo , People Bisi Kongo , Esikongo , Bakongo , Besi Kongo Language Kikongo Country Kongo dia Ntotila (or Ntotela) , Loango , Ngoyo and Kakongo The Kongo people (Kongo : Bisi Kongo , EsiKongo , singular: MwisiKongo ; also Bakongo , singular: Mukongo) [3] [4] are a Bantu ethnic group primarily defined as the speakers of Kikongo). [5] They have lived along the Atlantic coast of Central Africa , in a region that by the 15th century was a centralized and well-organized Kingdom of Kongo , but is now a part of three countries. [6] Their highest concentrations are found south of Pointe-Noire in the Republic of the Congo , southwest of Pool Malebo and west of the Kwango River in the Democratic Republic of the Congo , north of Luanda , Angola and southwest Gabon . [5] They are the largest ethnic group in the Republic of the Congo, and one of the major ethnic groups in the other two countries they are found in. [6] In 1975, the Kongo population was reported as 4,040,000. [7] The Kongo people were among the earliest sub-Saharan Africans to welcome Portuguese traders in 1483 CE, and began converting to Catholicism in the late 15th century. [6] They were among the first to protest slavery in letters to the King of Portugal in the 1510s and 1520s, [8] [9] then succumbed to the demands for slaves from the Portuguese through the 16th century. The Kongo people were a part of the major slave raiding, capture and export trade of African slaves to the European colonial interests in 17th and 18th centuries. [6] The slave raids, colonial wars and the 19th-century Scramble for Africa split the Kongo people into Portuguese, Belgian and French parts. In the early 20th century, they became one of the most active ethnic groups in the efforts to decolonize Africa, helping liberate the three nations to self governance. They now occupy influential positions in the politics, administration and business operations in the three countries they are most found in. [6] The origin of the name Kongo is unclear, and several theories have been proposed. [10] According to the colonial era scholar Samuel Nelson, the term Kongo is possibly derived from a local verb for gathering or assembly. [11] According to Alisa LaGamma , the root may be from the regional word Nkongo which means "hunter" in the context of someone adventurous and heroic. [12] Douglas Harper states that the term means "mountains" in a Bantu language, which the Congo river flows down from. [13] The Kongo people have been referred to by various names in the colonial French, Belgian and Portuguese literature, names such as Esikongo (singular Mwisikongo), Mucicongo , Mesikongo , Madcongo and Moxicongo . [10] Christian missionaries, particularly in the Caribbean , originally applied the term Bafiote (singular M(a)fiote) to the slaves from the Vili or Fiote coastal Kongo people, but later this term was us

https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Kongo_people

Detailed and copious description about the Kongo people who lived next to the Atlantic ports of the region, as a sophisticated culture, language and infrastructure, appear in the 15th century, written by the Portuguese explorers.

Later anthropological work on the Kongo of the region come from the colonial era writers, particularly the French and Belgians (Loango, Vungu, and the Niari Valley), but this too is limited and does not exhaustively cover all of the Kongo people. The evidence suggests, states Vansina, that the Kongo people were advanced in their culture and socio-political systems with multiple kingdoms well before the arrival of first Portuguese ships in the late 15th century.

http://arf-int.net/index.php/his-story/historiography

Database connection error (2): Could not connect to MySQL.Database connection error (2): Could not connect to MySQL. http://arf-int.net/index.php/his-story/historiography

Leo Frobenius (1873-1938)
Leo Frobenius, Histoire de la Civilisation Africaine

When they the first European navigators of the end of the Middle Ages arrived in the Gulf of Guinea and landed at Vaida, the captains were astonished to find the streets well cared for, bordered for several leagues in length by two rows of trees; for many days they passed through a country of magnificent fields, a country inhabited by men clad in brilliant costumes, the stuff of which they had woven themselves!

More to the South in the Kingdom of Congo, a swarming crowd dressed in silk and velvet; great states well ordered, and even to the smallest details, powerful sovereigns, rich industries, -- civilized to the marrow of their bones. And the condition of the countries on the eastern coasts -- Mozambique, for example -- was quite the same.

“The idea of the ‘barbarous Negro’ is a European invention, which has as a consequence, dominated Europe until the beginning of this century

All these questions go back to inferiorization by design.

One of the inferiorization by design tactics is : copy & paste but never give any credit. Congoism (Congo Red, Congo Blue, Congo Orange) in the textile industry is explained away by the Berlin Conference aka Congo Conference not by the sophisticated textile industry of the Kingdom of Kongo.

Congo red - Wikipedia

congo red Names IUPAC name disodium 4-amino-3-[4-[4-(1-amino-4-sulfonato-naphthalen-2-yl)diazenylphenyl]phenyl]diazenyl-naphthalene-1-sulfonate Identifiers 573-58-0 Y ChEMBL ChemSpider ECHA InfoCard 100.008.509 MeSH Congo+red UNII InChI=1S/C32H24N6O6S2.2Na/c33-31-25-7-3-1-5-23(25)29(45(39,40)41)17-27(31)37-35-21-13-9-19(10-14-21)20-11-15-22(16-12-20)36-38-28-18-30(46(42,43)44)24-6-2-4-8-26(24)32(28)34;;/h1-18H,33-34H2,(H,39,40,41)(H,42,43,44);;/q;2*+1/p-2/b37-35+,38-36+;; Y Key: IQFVPQOLBLOTPF-HKXUKFGYSA-L Y InChI=1/C32H24N6O6S2.2Na/c33-31-25-7-3-1-5-23(25)29(45(39,40)41)17-27(31)37-35-21-13-9-19(10-14-21)20-11-15-22(16-12-20)36-38-28-18-30(46(42,43)44)24-6-2-4-8-26(24)32(28)34;;/h1-18H,33-34H2,(H,39,40,41)(H,42,43,44);;/q;2*+1/p-2/b37-35+,38-36+;; Key: IQFVPQOLBLOTPF-COCKEIKOBB [Na+].[Na+].[O-]S(=O)(=O)c5cc(/N=N/c1ccc(cc1)c4ccc(/N=N/c3cc(c2ccccc2c3N)S([O-])(=O)=O)cc4)c(N)c6c5cccc6 Properties C 32 H 22 N 6 Na 2 O 6 S 2 Molar mass 696.665 Except where otherwise noted, data are given for materials in their standard state (at 25 °C [77 °F], 100 kPa). Y verify (what is Y N ?) Infobox references Chemical compound Congo red is an organic compound , the sodium salt of 3,3′-([1,1′-biphenyl]-4,4′-diyl)bis(4-aminonaphthalene-1-sulfonic acid). It is an azo dye . Congo red is water-soluble, yielding a red colloidal solution; its solubility is greater in organic solvents. However, the use of Congo red has long been abandoned, primarily because of its carcinogenic properties. [1] History [edit] Congo red was first synthesized in 1883 by Paul Böttiger, who had been employed at Friedrich Bayer Company in Elberfeld, Germany. He was looking for textile dyes that did not require a mordant step. The company was not interested in this bright red color, so he filed the patent under his own name and sold it to the AGFA company of Berlin. AGFA marketed the dye under the name "Congo red", a catchy name in Germany at the time of the 1884 Berlin West Africa Conference , an important event in the Colonisation of Africa . The dye was a major commercial success for AGFA. In the following years, for the same reason, other dyes were marketed using the "Congo" name: Congo rubine, Congo corinth, brilliant Congo, Congo orange, Congo brown, and Congo blue. [2] Once of economic significance, Congo red has fallen into disuse as have all benzidine -derived dyes, owing to their carcinogenic activity. It is prepared by azo coupling of the bis(diazonium) derivative of benzidine with naphthionic acid . [3] Behavior in solution [edit] Congo red (pH indicator) below pH 3.0 above pH 5.2 3.0 ⇌ 5.2 Due to a color change from blue to red at pH 3.0–5.2, Congo red can be used as a pH indicator . Since this color change is an approximate inverse of that of litmus , it can be used with litmus paper in a simple parlor trick: add a drop or two of Congo red to both an acid solution and a base solution. Dipping red litmus paper in the red solution will turn it blue, while dipping blue litmus pa

https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Congo_red

Congo blue

Definition, Synonyms, Translations of Congo blue by The Free Dictionary
https://www.thefreedictionary.com/Congo+blue

The Kingdom of Kongo, West-Central Africa is called a kingdom but it was a globalized empire with several houses, vassal kingdoms in Africa (Matamba, Ngoye, Kakongo, Ndongo, Loango), embassies in Rome (with the Papacy), Lisbon, in Holland (with the Dutch Court) and in Brazil and above all a satellite kingdom in Brazil (Palmares ruled by Ganga Zumbi dynasty) and settlements in pre-columbian America (Mondongo Rocks in Florida).
Mondongo is a Kongo Bantuism. It is on the long list of Kongo Bantuism in the Americas (Two Congo Rivers [in Panama and El Salvador], Congo Laguna, Congo Lake, Congo Bay, Congo Hills, Congo Volcano, Congo Canyon etc.).

The major exports of the Kongo Empire to Europe were textiles. The Kongo textiles were so resistant that they were used by Portuguese navigators as sails.

http://en.lisapoyakama.org/the-sophisticated-economy-of-the-kongo-empire/

Imagination remains forever marked by the explorers' narratives restored by the German historian Leo Frobenius, who described the inhabitants of Kongo as people "clothed in silk and velvet (…) civilized to the bone marrow" [3]. Several palm trees were methodically cultivated for the purposes of the textile industry. Their fibers were used to make high-quality fabrics. Brocade was called Incorimba . Velvet was called Enzaca , damas called Infulas , satins Maricas , taffeta called Tanga , the "armoisins" Engombos .

https://www.metmuseum.org/exhibitions/listings/2015/kongo/blog/posts/kongo-textiles-renaissance-european-collections

https://www.metmuseum.org/exhibitions/listings/2015/kongo/blog/posts/kongo-textiles-renaissance-european-collections

One of the wonders of Kongo: Power and Majesty, on view through January 3, 2016, is the group of luxury textiles finely woven from golden palm fiber, then hand-cut and rubbed in the weaver's hands. The result is a rich interplay of tone and texture that reminded me at first of aerial views of crop circles cut into fields of ripening grain.

The textiles, however, are far more complex as virtuoso pieces. Their making was described with admiration by Antonio Zuchelli (1663–1716), an Italian missionary to the Kongo. He notes how the local weavers finished their cloth "with a knife they cut the cloth in the proper spots and rub it well with their hands, so that it looks like patterned velvet."

Europeans compared what they saw to luxurious Italian silk velvets with elaborate woven patterns, but they admired pieces that were "so beautiful," in the words of the Portuguese sea captain Duarte Pacheco Pereira (ca. 1460–1533), "that those made in Italy do not surpass them in workmanship." What really surprised them was the way in which Kongo cloths were woven not from silk but from raffia, which made them miraculously soft to the touch. The designs were less often a source of comment, although in 1656, John Tradescant the Younger (1608–1662) described a cloth in his museum in Lambeth—now in the Pitt Rivers in Oxford—as "A Table-cloath of grass very curiously waved."

When one looks at these luxury textiles with twenty-first-century eyes, the timeless artistry of the design is particularly striking. Bands of sophisticated geometric patterns spiral across the textile surfaces, similar to the interlace patterns on Kongo ivory oliphants, which are carved from curving elephant tusks. Such repeating motifs were not merely decorative but had profound significance within Kongo society.

Exhibition curator Alisa LaGamma explains in her introductory chapter to the exhibition catalogue how the spiral movement is a visual metaphor for the path taken by the dead, which is central to Kongo thought and imagining. That concept communicates through the finished designs, explaining why these were elite display pieces in Kongo society, and why they were an important component in diplomatic exchanges with the Portuguese from the fifteenth century.

An interesting puzzle—and a prompt to further research—is the European format of the cloths themselves, which are shaped to European taste in their format and structure. Even the elaborately made pompoms at their corners imitate those made of silk or wool on European cushions. A fascinating insight into the status of luxury cushions within an Italian, early fifteenth-century context is provided by the Salimbenis' fresco from Urbino showing scenes from the life of Saint John the Baptist.

Some of the finest surviving Kongo cloths are still to be found in collections formed in Europe from the sixteenth to the eighteenth century. Known as Kunstkammern, or "art rooms," these cabinet collections at first concentrated mostly on small-scale European treasures that were precious and intricate or demonstrated skill or virtuosity. But during the sixteenth century, in the so-called Age of Exploration, these collections diversified to explore all things curious, rare, and exotic that had been brought from an expanding range of global contacts. What were Europeans to make of what Shakespeare unforgettably called the "brave new world" opening up all around them?

From Stockholm to Florence, London to Prague, Kongo luxury cloths were preserved in court and cabinet collections formed by rulers, princes, and urban elites. The first two recorded examples appear in Prague in 1607—in the Kunstkammer of the Holy Roman Emperor Rudolf II of Prague (r. 1576–1612), where they remain today—but the royal houses of Sweden and Denmark swiftly followed.

Kongo cloths are also recorded in the seventeenth century as prize pieces acquired by doctors, scientists, and scholars. The Milanese physician Ludovico Settala (1552–1633) and his son Manfredo (1600–1680) formed one of Italy's most famous scientific museums, which included several examples. There is a drawing of a folded one, annotated as "a small mat to make a cushion to sit on, made of straw of rare beauty…made in Angola or Congo." Settala's scholarly network included the Jesuit scholar Athanasius Kircher (1602–1680), founding director of the the Musaeum Kircherianum in Rome, who acquired pieces described in 1709 as "four mats made with admirable skill in the Kingdom of Angola….they look like a silk cloth notwithstanding they are made of very thin palm threads."

But how were these cloths originally acquired? We are slowly finding out more about the web of European dealers, the international trading companies, and the merchants who supplied collectors, but the cultural, political, and trading exchanges in which textiles first changed hands in Kongo itself are still a mystery. Did European visitors bring examples of their own cushions to Kongo and commission copies in local materials and techniques? Or did Kongo leaders commission them as items of commerce, exploiting new markets? Either way, their presence in European collections from the sixteenth century attests to the fascination they aroused as virtuoso textiles, which made distant worlds tangible.

The DRC, Central Africa, is the cradle of mathematics thanks to the Ishango Bone, the oldest math tool, which is also a lunar calendar. Not too many people know that. The main question is why.

Congo to request return of famous Ishango Bone

The Congolese Institute for Nature Conservation (ICCN) plans to formally request the return of the Ishango Bone, a valuable artefact excavated in the DRC during Belgian colonialisation. https://www.thebulletin.be/congo-request-return-famous-ishango-bone

Mathematical Treasure: Ishango Bone

Author(s): Frank J. Swetz (The Pennsylvania State University) Perhaps the oldest mathematical artifact in existence, the Ishango Bone (above), was unearthed in 1950 in the then Belgian colony of the Congo (now the Democratic Republic of Congo). It was discovered by the Belgian anthropologist Jean de Heinzelin de Braucourt (1920-1998) and named after the region in which it was found. The bone, probably a fibula of a baboon, large cat, or other large mammal, has been dated to the Upper Paleolithic Period of human history, approximately 20,000-25,000 years ago. It is

10 cm long and bears an articulated, organized series of notches readily identifying it, to many observers, as a tally stick. However, its original purpose remains a subject of debate. The Ishango Bone is now housed at the Museum of Natural Sciences in Brussels, Belgium, with whose cooperation the image above was obtained. For more information and images, see: Museum of Natural Sciences, Royal Belgian Institute of Natural Sciences: Ishango Bone (2007-2009) or Ishango Bone (2001) Smithsonian National Museum of Natural History: Ishango Bone Alison S. Brooks, David M. Helgren, et al, "Dating and Context of Three Middle Stone Age Sites with Bone Points in the Upper Semliki Valley, Zaire," Science, New Series, vol. 268, no. 5210 (Apr. 28, 1995), pp. 548-553. Index to Mathematical Treasures Frank J. Swetz (The Pennsylvania State University), "Mathematical Treasure: Ishango Bone," Convergence (March 2014)

https://www.maa.org/press/periodicals/convergence/mathematical-treasure-ishango-bone

Proto-Mathematics of the Ishango Bone in The DR Congo

Spread the loveLikeSub-Saharan Africa can claim to be the home of proto-mathematics, given that the two oldest mathematical artifacts, the

https://africaglobalnews.com/proto-mathematics-of-the-ishango-bone-in-the-dr-congo/

Ishango Bone

This fossil mammal bone has three rows of tally marks along its length. They may have been used to add or multiply. Exhibit Item Discovered by: Jean de Heinzelin Age: About 25,000 years old Site: Ishango, Democratic Republic of Congo

http://humanorigins.si.edu/evidence/behavior/recording-information/ishango-bone

There's evidence that prehistoric people understood simple mathematics and astronomy. The oldest evidence comes from the 37,000 year-old Lebombo bone.

http://www.thestargarden.co.uk/History-of-mathematics.html

1. Ancient arithmetic ↑

There's evidence that prehistoric people understood simple mathematics, as well as astronomy. The oldest evidence comes from the Lebombo bone, which is about 37,000 years old and was found in Swaziland[1]. It has 29 notches carved into it, which could have been used to record numbers, making it a tally stick. Stronger evidence comes from the Ishango bone, which was found on what is now the border between Uganda and the Democratic Republic of the Congo[2].

The Ishango bone is about 20,000 years old and has a series of notches carved into it in three columns. Patterns in these numbers may show that they were made by someone who understood addition, subtraction, multiplication, division, and prime numbers.

Prime numbers are numbers greater than one that are only divisible by themselves and one. They are the 'building blocks' of mathematics in a similar way to how atoms are the building blocks of chemistry. The first ten prime numbers are 2, 3, 5, 7, 11, 13, 17, 19, 23, and 29

The Ishango Bone - 22,000 Year Old Math Calculator

The Ishango bone is a bone tool, dated to the Upper Paleolithic era. It is a dark brown length of bone, the fibula of a baboon,[1] with a sharp piece of quartz affixed to one end, perhaps for engraving. It was first thought to be a tally stick, as it has a series of what has been interpreted as tally marks carved in three columns running the length of the tool, but some scientists have suggested that the groupings of notches indicate a mathematical understanding that goes beyond counting. It has also been suggested that the scratches might have been to create a better grip on the handle or for some other non-mathematical reason.[2]

The Ishango bone was found in 1960 by Belgian Jean de Heinzelin de Braucourt while exploring what was then the Belgian Congo.[3] It was discovered in the African area of Ishango, which was centered near the headwaters of the Nile River at Lake Edward (now on the border between modern-day Uganda and Congo). The bone was found among the remains of a small community that fished and gathered in this area of Africa. The small settlement had been buried in a volcanic eruption.[4][5] The artifact was first estimated to have originated between 9,000 BC and 6,500 BC.[6] However, the dating of the site where it was discovered was re-evaluated, and it is now believed to be more than 20,000 years old.

Did Central Africa develop slower because the need for innovation was lower? People in Egypt, the Middle East, or Europe lives in areas humans couldn't survive & come up with advanced ideas/better technology that leads them to advanced societies.

Françoise Marie Master's Degree in Public Administration, Syracuse UniversityJan 10

The choice of Central Africa is intentional.

Central Africa is the Heart of Darkness where time stopped and nothing remarkable ever happened. The legendary British explorer Stanley coined the expression "Africa, the Dark Continent" but he admitted that he had read 130 books before his travels to Central Africa, Congo. He also wrote that he started his journeys from Zanzibar.

Why Zanzibar?

The legendary Zanzibarite explorer and merchant, Tippu Tip, real name Ḥamad ibn Muḥammad ibn Jumʿah ibn Rajab ibn Muḥammad ibn Saʿīd al Murjabī had mapped the Congo (northeast, southeast, south-north central Congo) where he had built a huge commercial empire where Swahili was spoken and Islam practiced. He actually accompanied Stanley he later accused of stealing his country.

Central Africa is where the Congo Rainforest, the second lung of the earth after the Amazon Forest, is located and where the African jungles are concentrated.
Some people in the West learn about Africa through jungle books like the Tarzan Saga. The existence of a ski resort in Central Africa DRC seems like a joke but it is absolutely true. You can go skiing in the Rwenzori Mountains at the border with Uganda.

More importantly, Central Africa is not limited to the DRC; it also covers Chad and Cameroon. In addition, there are savannah zones in Central Africa and Chad is also a Saharan country. To put it simply, Central Africa also has snow-capped mountains, Saharan zones and savannah areas.

Central Africa - Wikipedia

Core region of African continent Central Africa is a subregion of the African continent comprising various countries according to different definitions. Angola , Burundi , Cameroon , the Central African Republic , Chad , the Democratic Republic of the Congo , the Republic of the Congo , Equatorial Guinea , Gabon , Rwanda , and São Tomé and Príncipe are members of the Economic Community of Central African States (ECCAS). [1] Six of those states (Cameroon, the Central African Republic, Chad, the Republic of the Congo, Equatorial Guinea, and Gabon) are also members of the Economic and Monetary Community of Central Africa (CEMAC) and share a common currency, the Central African CFA franc . [2] ECCAS state, part of Middle Africa ECCAS state only The African Development Bank defines Central Africa as Cameroon, the Central African Republic, Chad, the Democratic Republic of the Congo, the Republic of the Congo, Equatorial Guinea, and Gabon. [3] Middle Africa is an analogous term used by the United Nations in its geoscheme for Africa . It includes the same countries as the African Development Bank's definition, along with Angola and São Tomé and Príncipe. [4] List of Central African countries [edit] Background [edit] The Central African Federation (1953–1963), also called the Federation of Rhodesia and Nyasaland , was made up of what are now the nations of Malawi , Zambia , and Zimbabwe . Similarly, the Anglican Church of the Province of Central Africa covers dioceses in Botswana , Malawi, Zambia, and Zimbabwe, while the Church of Central Africa, Presbyterian has synods in Malawi, Zambia, and Zimbabwe. These states are now typically considered part of East or Southern Africa . [5] Geography [edit] The basin of Lake Chad has historically been ecologically significant to the populations of Central Africa, especially with the Lake Chad Basin Commission serving as an important supra-regional organization in Central Africa. History [edit] Prehistory [edit] Archeological finds in Central Africa have been discovered dating back, over 100,000 years. [6] According to Zagato and Holl, there is evidence of iron-smelting in the Central African Republic and Cameroon that may date back to 3000 to 2500 BCE. [7] Extensive walled settlements have recently been found in Northeast Nigeria, approximately 60 km (37 mi) southwest of Lake Chad dating to the first millennium BCE. [8] Trade and improved agricultural techniques supported more sophisticated societies, leading to the early civilizations of Sao , Kanem , Bornu , Shilluk , Baguirmi , and Wadai . [9] Around 2500 BCE, Bantu migrants had reached the Great Lakes Region in Central Africa. Halfway through the first millennium BCE, the Bantu had also settled as far south as what is now Angola . Ancient history [edit] Sao civilization [edit] The Sao civilization flourished from

ca. the 6th century BCE to as late as the 16th century CE in northern Central Africa. The Sao lived by the Chari River south of Lake Cha
https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Central_Africa

Congo Ski Club

File:Vegetation Africa.png - Wikimedia Commons

Description Vegetation Africa.png The main biomes in Africa. Drawn by hand using maps. Date 1 March 2009, 18:05 (UTC) Source Author Other versions File:Africa - Vegetazione.PNG This biogeographical map image could be re-created using vector graphics as an SVG file . This has several advantages; see Commons:Media for cleanup for more information. If an SVG form of this image is available, please upload it and afterwards replace this template with {{ vector version available | new image name }} . It is recommended to name the SVG file "Vegetation Africa.svg" – then the template Vector version available (or Vva) does not need the new image name parameter. Template:RetouchedPicture Africa I, the copyright holder of this work, hereby publish it under the following licenses: This file is licensed under the Creative Commons Attribution-Share Alike 2.5 Generic , 2.0 Generic and 1.0 Generic license. You are free: to share – to copy, distribute and transmit the work to remix – to adapt the work Under the following conditions: attribution – You must give appropriate credit, provide a link to the license, and indicate if changes were made. You may do so in any reasonable manner, but not in any way that suggests the licensor endorses you or your use. share alike – If you remix, transform, or build upon the material, you must distribute your contributions under the same or compatible license as the original. https://creativecommons.org/licenses/by-sa/2.5 CC BY-SA 2.5 Creative Commons Attribution-Share Alike 2.5 true true Permission is granted to copy, distribute and/or modify this document under the terms of the GNU Free Documentation License ,

Version 1.2 or any later version published by the Free Software Foundation ; with no Invariant Sections, no Front-Cover Texts, and no Back-Cover Texts. A copy of the license is included in the section entitled GNU Free Documentation License . http://www.gnu.org/copyleft/fdl.html GFDL GNU Free Documentation License true true This file is licensed under the Creative Commons Attribution-Share Alike 3.0 Unported license. You are free: to share – to copy, distribute and transmit the work to remix – to adapt the work Under the following conditions: attribution – You must give appropriate credit, provide a link to the license, and indicate if changes were made. You may do so in any reasonable manner, but not in any way that suggests the licensor endorses you or your use. share alike – If you remix, transform, or build upon the material, you must distribute your contributions under the same or compatible license as the original. This licensing tag was added to this file as part of the GFDL licensing update . http://creativecommons.org/licenses/by-sa/3.0/ CC-BY-SA-3.0 Creative Commons Attribution-Share Alike 3.0 true true You may select the license of your choice. Original upload log [edit] This image is a derivative work of the following images: File:Vegetation.png licensed with Cc-by-sa-2.5,2.0,1.0, GFDL 2008-05-01T23:31:33

https://commons.wikimedia.org/wiki/File:Vegetation_Africa.png

Sao civilisation - Wikipedia

The Sao civilization (also called So) flourished in Central Africa from ca. the fourth or sixth century BC to as late as the sixteenth century AD. The Sao lived by the Chari River basin in territory that later became part of Cameroon and Chad . They are the earliest civilization to have left clear traces of their presence in the territory of modern Cameroon. [2] Sometime around the 16th century, conversion to Islam changed the cultural identity of the former Sao. Today, several ethnic groups of northern Cameroon and southern Chad, but particularly the Sara , Kotoko , claim descent from the civilization of the Sao. Origins [edit] The Sao civilisation began as early as the sixth or fourth century BC, and by the end of the first millennium

BC, their presence was well established around Lake Chad and near the Chari River . [3] The city states of the Sao reached their apex sometime between the ninth and fifteenth centuries AD. [4] Although some scholars estimate that the Sao civilization south of Lake Chad lasted until the fourteenth or fifteenth century, the majority opinion is that it ceased to exist as a separate culture sometime in the 16th century subsequently to the expansion of the Bornu Empire . [5] The Kotoko are the inheritors of the former city states of the Sao. [6] Culture [edit] It had been suggested that the Sao were descendants of the Hyksos who conquered Ancient Egypt that they moved south from the Nile valley into middle Africa under pressure from invaders, or that they originated in the Bilma Oasis north of the lake Chad. [7] However, a more widely accepted theory is that the Sao were simply the indigenous inhabitants of the Lake Chad basin and that their ultimate origins lie south of the lake. [8] And recent archaeological research indicates that the Sao civilization developed indigenously from earlier cultures in the region (such as the Gajiganna culture, which began at around 1,800 BCE and began to build fortified towns by about 800 BCE), gradually increasing in complexity. [9] [10] [11] [12] Sao artifacts show that they were a sophisticated civilization working in bronze , copper , and iron . [13] Finds include bronze sculptures and terra cotta statues of human and animal figures, coins, funerary urns, household utensils, jewelry, highly decorated pottery, and spears. [14] The largest Sao archaeological finds have been made south of Lake Chad. G.T. Stride presented these important facts about the Sao civilization: [T]he So people possessed considerable political and artistic genius. Although they never combined effectively to form an empire, they developed city-states which were the centres of intense local patriotism ... Each city was surrounded by strong defensive walls and dominated the life of the surrounding countryside which it both protected and governed. Government was by an elaborate hierarchy, headed by a divine ruler ... Except on ceremonial occasions, the rulers made few public appearances and even then remained

https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Sao_civilisation

The Sao civilization (also called So) flourished in Central Africa from ca. the fourth or sixth century BC to as late as the sixteenth century AD.[1] The Sao lived by the Chari River basin in territory that later became part of Cameroon and Chad. They are the earliest civilization to have left clear traces of their presence in the territory of modern Cameroon.[2] Sometime around the 16th century, conversion to Islam changed the cultural identity of the former Sao. Today, several ethnic groups of northern Cameroon and southern Chad, but particularly the Sara, Kotoko, claim descent from the civilization of the Sao.

And recent archaeological research indicates that the Sao civilization developed indigenously from earlier cultures in the region (such as the Gajiganna culture, which began at around 1,800 BCE and began to build fortified towns by about 800 BCE), gradually increasing in complexity. Sao artifacts show that they were a sophisticated civilization working in bronze, copper, and iron.Finds include bronze sculptures and terra cotta statues of human and animal figures, coins, funerary urns, household utensils, jewelry, highly decorated pottery, and spears. The largest Sao archaeological finds have been made south of Lake Chad.

La maçonnerie de pierre sèche : une technique architecturale vernac...

Introduction Pays africain peuplé d’une mosaïque de groupes ethniques ayant des spécificités culturelles, et donc, architecturales et doté d’une diversité environnementale, le Cameroun justifie son...

https://journals.openedition.org/ephaistos/5729?lang=en

Dry stone masonry: a centuries-old vernacular architectural technique in the Mandara Mountains

In Sub-Saharan Africa, dry-stone structures are no longer unique to the region situated between the Limpopo and Zambezi Rivers, where such architecture was particularly characteristic of Great Zimbabwe and led to diffusionist denials of its African origin. While it is a rare cultural feature, some characteristic elements of this architectural style are found over larger areas. This is for example the case of Cameroun, a country situated in central Africa, where the development of this style of architecture took place, although the scientific popularization of this architectural style has developed only recently. Its use in the northern Mandara Mountains of Cameroon began during the period when Great Zimbabwe reached its apogee. In fact, results from archaeological works conducted on three of sixteen archaeological sites revealed contemporaneity with the period when the impressive dry-stone structures of southern Africa appeared like the architectural style through which the greatness of political and religious local authorities is expressed.

https://www.researchgate.net/publication/236160994_Monumental_architecture_in_mountain_landscapes_The_diy-ged-bay_sites_of_northern_Cameroon

The DGB sites are complexes of dry-stone terraces and platforms in the Mandara Mountains of northern Cameroon. They constitute the earliest well-established evidence for human occupation of this region and raise important questions about the nature of monumentality, relationships with social complexity and areal culture history.

The Standing Stones of Bouar - La Civilisation mégalithique de Bouar. Prospection et fouilles 1962–1966. By Pierre Vidal Etudes oubanguiennes 1. Laboratoire d'Ethnologie et de Sociologie comparative, Université de Manterre. Paris: Firmin-Didot. 1969. Pp. 142, 13 fig. et plans, 4 cartes, 42 photos. | The Journal of African History | Cambridge Core

The Standing Stones of Bouar - La Civilisation mégalithique de Bouar. Prospection et fouilles 1962–1966. By Pierre Vidal Etudes oubanguiennes 1. Laboratoire d'Ethnologie et de Sociologie comparative, Université de Manterre. Paris: Firmin-Didot. 1969. Pp. 142, 13 fig. et plans, 4 cartes, 42 photos. - Volume 11 Issue 4

https://www.cambridge.org/core/journals/journal-of-african-history/article/abs/standing-stones-of-bouar-la-civilisation-megalithique-de-bouar-prospection-et-fouilles-19621966-by-pierre-vidal-etudes-oubanguiennes-1-laboratoire-dethnologie-et-de-sociologie-comparative-universite-de-manterre-paris-firmindidot-1969-pp-142-13-fig-et-plans-4-cartes-42-photos/C8153D9781065D6BDB5802543F30969F

Tazanu, les Megalithes de Bouar

Megalithes de Bouar Temoin d'une civilisation ancienne en Afrique Centrale par Akonkwa Bushunju Paterne La région de Bouar, située dans le nord-ouest de la République Centrafricaine est, du point de vue archéologique, d'une grande richesse scientifique. Situés sur la ligne de partage des eaux des bassins tchadiens et congolais, les monuments mégalithiques ont fait l'objet d'études approfondies. La zone mégalithique couvre 130 km de long sur 30 km de large et s'étend sur une surface d'environ 7500 km². Les mégalithes du nord-ouest de la République Centrafricaine sont connus sous l'appellation de « Tazanu », « pierre debout » terme généri que de la langue Gbaya-Kara pour désigner les monuments mégalithiques de la région de Bouar. Les mégalithes ont été signalés pour la première fois par le Commandant J. d'Aubraumont. Le séjour de l'anthropologue français Pierre Vidal dans la région a permis une première étude en 1966, suivie par les travaux d'Etienne Zangato de l'Université de Paris X (Nanterre) et de Nicholas David de l'Université de Calgari au Canada. La zone mégalithique de Bouar présente un intérêt scientifique et culturel évident. Les mégalithes de Bouar ont gardé leurs caractéristiques originelles. Elles se distinguent du point de vue architectural, fonctionnel et géomorphologique par : Leur situation toujours à la source d'un cours d'eau, Leur orientation toujours vers l'est ou dans la direction du cours d'eau, Leur épaisseur à peu près identique, La présence des cistes à la périphérie du site, Leur caractère concentrique. Cependant, on note une tendance à la dégradation liée au phénomène d'érosion, des actions anthropiques (utilisation des pierres comme matériaux de construction, passage d'animaux) et des prélèvements. Comparaison avec d'autres biens similaires Les civilisations mégalithiques se sont développées sous diverses formes dans le monde entier. En Europe, on les rencontre à Stonehenge en Grande- Bretagne, en France par les menhirs et les dolmens du Morbihan. En Afrique du Nord, d'importants ensembles mégalithiques sont connus dans tout le Maghreb (Tunisie, Algérie, Maroc, pour ne citer que ces pays). En Afrique subsaharienne, des mégalithes existent également, notamment au Sénégal sur la rive droite du fleuve Gambie, en Mauritanie, au Mali (dans la région de Niafunké, le site de Tundidaro comprend 150 pierres dressées). Aussi, d'autres ensembles sont connus au Niger, au Togo et au Tchad qui représentent des tombeaux, protégeant ainsi des sépultures par des pierres dressées comme à Bouar. En Ethiopie, enfin, on les retrouve dans les massifs montagneux du Harrar et à l'est d'Addis-Abeba, une civilisation de mégalithes gravés s'est développée. Le site funérair Tazunu Dokoko Réalisation et l'utilisation des mégalithes à Bouar La Centre Afrique (622 984 km2 pour 5millions d'habitants) est une terre de peuplement ancien, depuis la préhistoire, mais aussi une zone de confluence des grands courants de migrations qui ont conditionné son p

http://www.shan-newspaper.com/web/page-francaise/1629-tazanu-les-megalithes-de-bouar.html

Courtesy of Google Translate

The region of Bouar, located in the north-west of the Central African Republic is, from an archaeological point of view, of great scientific wealth. Located on the watershed of the Chadian and Congolese basins, the megalithic monuments have been the subject of in-depth studies. The megalithic zone covers 130 km long by 30 km wide and covers an area of approximately 7,500 km².

The megaliths in the northwest of the Central African Republic are known as "Tazanu", "standing stone" a generic term in the Gbaya-Kara language to refer to the megalithic monuments of the Bouar region.

Kongo people - Wikipedia

The largest ethnic group of the Democratic Republic of Congo, also found in Angola and ROC Kongo Person Mwisikongo , Mukongo , People Bisi Kongo , Esikongo , Bakongo , Besi Kongo Language Kikongo Country Kongo dia Ntotila (or Ntotela) , Loango , Ngoyo and Kakongo The Kongo people (Kongo : Bisi Kongo , EsiKongo , singular: MwisiKongo ; also Bakongo , singular: Mukongo) [3] [4] are a Bantu ethnic group primarily defined as the speakers of Kikongo). [5] They have lived along the Atlantic coast of Central Africa , in a region that by the 15th century was a centralized and well-organized Kingdom of Kongo , but is now a part of three countries. [6] Their highest concentrations are found south of Pointe-Noire in the Republic of the Congo , southwest of Pool Malebo and west of the Kwango River in the Democratic Republic of the Congo , north of Luanda , Angola and southwest Gabon . [5] They are the largest ethnic group in the Republic of the Congo, and one of the major ethnic groups in the other two countries they are found in. [6] In 1975, the Kongo population was reported as 4,040,000. [7] The Kongo people were among the earliest sub-Saharan Africans to welcome Portuguese traders in 1483 CE, and began converting to Catholicism in the late 15th century. [6] They were among the first to protest slavery in letters to the King of Portugal in the 1510s and 1520s, [8] [9] then succumbed to the demands for slaves from the Portuguese through the 16th century. The Kongo people were a part of the major slave raiding, capture and export trade of African slaves to the European colonial interests in 17th and 18th centuries. [6] The slave raids, colonial wars and the 19th-century Scramble for Africa split the Kongo people into Portuguese, Belgian and French parts. In the early 20th century, they became one of the most active ethnic groups in the efforts to decolonize Africa, helping liberate the three nations to self governance. They now occupy influential positions in the politics, administration and business operations in the three countries they are most found in. [6] The origin of the name Kongo is unclear, and several theories have been proposed. [10] According to the colonial era scholar Samuel Nelson, the term Kongo is possibly derived from a local verb for gathering or assembly. [11] According to Alisa LaGamma , the root may be from the regional word Nkongo which means "hunter" in the context of someone adventurous and heroic. [12] Douglas Harper states that the term means "mountains" in a Bantu language, which the Congo river flows down from. [13] The Kongo people have been referred to by various names in the colonial French, Belgian and Portuguese literature, names such as Esikongo (singular Mwisikongo), Mucicongo , Mesikongo , Madcongo and Moxicongo . [10] Christian missionaries, particularly in the Caribbean , originally applied the term Bafiote (singular M(a)fiote) to the slaves from the Vili or Fiote coastal Kongo people, but later this term was us

https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Kongo_people

Detailed and copious description about the Kongo people who lived next to the Atlantic ports of the region, as a sophisticated culture, language and infrastructure, appear in the 15th century, written by the Portuguese explorers.

Later anthropological work on the Kongo of the region come from the colonial era writers, particularly the French and Belgians (Loango, Vungu, and the Niari Valley), but this too is limited and does not exhaustively cover all of the Kongo people. The evidence suggests, states Vansina, that the Kongo people were advanced in their culture and socio-political systems with multiple kingdoms well before the arrival of first Portuguese ships in the late 15th century.

http://arf-int.net/index.php/his-story/historiography

Database connection error (2): Could not connect to MySQL.Database connection error (2): Could not connect to MySQL.

http://arf-int.net/index.php/his-story/historiography

Leo Frobenius (1873-1938)

Leo Frobenius, Histoire de la Civilisation Africaine

When they the first European navigators of the end of the Middle Ages arrived in the Gulf of Guinea and landed at Vaida, the captains were astonished to find the streets well cared for, bordered for several leagues in length by two rows of trees; for many days they passed through a country of magnificent fields, a country inhabited by men clad in brilliant costumes, the stuff of which they had woven themselves!

More to the South in the Kingdom of Congo, a swarming crowd dressed in silk and velvet; great states well ordered, and even to the smallest details, powerful sovereigns, rich industries, -- civilized to the marrow of their bones. And the condition of the countries on the eastern coasts -- Mozambique, for example -- was quite the same.

“The idea of the ‘barbarous Negro’ is a European invention, which has as a consequence, dominated Europe until the beginning of this century

……..

All these questions go back to inferiorization by design.

One of the inferiorization by design tactics is : copy & paste but never give any credit. Congoism (Congo Red, Congo Blue, Congo Orange) in the textile industry is explained away by the Berlin Conference aka Congo Conference not by the sophisticated textile industry of the Kingdom of Kongo.

Congo red - Wikipedia

congo red Names IUPAC name disodium 4-amino-3-[4-[4-(1-amino-4-sulfonato-naphthalen-2-yl)diazenylphenyl]phenyl]diazenyl-naphthalene-1-sulfonate Identifiers 573-58-0 Y ChEMBL ChemSpider ECHA InfoCard 100.008.509 MeSH Congo+red UNII

InChI=1S/C32H24N6O6S2.2Na/c33-31-25-7-3-1-5-23(25)29(45(39,40)41)17-27(31)37-35-21-13-9-19(10-14-21)20-11-15-22(16-12-20)36-38-28-18-30(46(42,43)44)24-6-2-4-8-26(24)32(28)34;;/h1-18H,33-34H2,(H,39,40,41)(H,42,43,44);;/q;2*+1/p-2/b37-35+,38-36+;; Y
Key: IQFVPQOLBLOTPF-HKXUKFGYSA-L Y
InChI=1/C32H24N6O6S2.2Na/c33-31-25-7-3-1-5-23(25)29(45(39,40)41)17-27(31)37-35-21-13-9-19(10-14-21)20-11-15-22(16-12-20)36-38-28-18-30(46(42,43)44)24-6-2-4-8-26(24)32(28)34;;/h1-18H,33-34H2,(H,39,40,41)(H,42,43,44);;/q;2*+1/p-2/b37-35+,38-36+;; Key: IQFVPQOLBLOTPF-COCKEIKOBB [Na+].[Na+].[O] S(=O)(=O)c5cc(/N=N/c1ccc(cc1)c4ccc(/N=N/c3cc(c2ccccc2c3N)S([O-])(=O)=O)cc4)c(N)c6c5cccc6 Properties C 32 H 22 N 6 Na 2 O 6 S 2 Molar mass 696.665 Except where otherwise noted, data are given for materials in their standard state (at 25 °C [77 °F], 100 kPa). Y verify (what is Y N ?) Infobox references Chemical compound Congo red is an organic compound , the sodium salt of 3,3′-([1,1′-biphenyl]-4,4′-diyl)bis(4-aminonaphthalene-1-sulfonic acid). It is an azo dye . Congo red is water-soluble, yielding a red colloidal solution; its solubility is greater in organic solvents. However, the use of Congo red has long been abandoned, primarily because of its carcinogenic properties. [1] History [edit] Congo red was first synthesized in 1883 by Paul Böttiger, who had been employed at Friedrich Bayer Company in Elberfeld, Germany. He was looking for textile dyes that did not require a mordant step. The company was not interested in this bright red color, so he filed the patent under his own name and sold it to the AGFA company of Berlin. AGFA marketed the dye under the name "Congo red", a catchy name in Germany at the time of the 1884 Berlin West Africa Conference , an important event in the Colonisation of Africa . The dye was a major commercial success for AGFA. In the following years, for the same reason, other dyes were marketed using the "Congo" name: Congo rubine, Congo corinth, brilliant Congo, Congo orange, Congo brown, and Congo blue. [2] Once of economic significance, Congo red has fallen into disuse as have all benzidine -derived dyes, owing to their carcinogenic activity. It is prepared by azo coupling of the bis(diazonium) derivative of benzidine with naphthionic acid . [3] Behavior in solution [edit] Congo red (pH indicator) below pH 3.0 above pH 5.2 3.0 ⇌ 5.2 Due to a color change from blue to red at pH 3.0–5.2, Congo red can be used as a pH indicator . Since this color change is an approximate inverse of that of litmus , it can be used with litmus paper in a simple parlor trick: add a drop or two of Congo red to both an acid solution and a base solution. Dipping red litmus paper in the red solution will turn it blue, while dipping blue litmus pa

https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Congo_red

Congo blue

Definition, Synonyms, Translations of Congo blue by The Free Dictionary

https://www.thefreedictionary.com/Congo+blue

The Kingdom of Kongo, West-Central Africa is called a kingdom but it was a globalized empire with several houses, vassal kingdoms in Africa (Matamba, Ngoye, Kakongo, Ndongo, Loango), embassies in Rome (with the Papacy), Lisbon, in Holland (with the Dutch Court) and in Brazil and above all a satellite kingdom in Brazil (Palmares ruled by Ganga Zumbi dynasty) and settlements in pre-columbian America (Mondongo Rocks in Florida).

Mondongo is a Kongo Bantuism. It is on the long list of Kongo Bantuism in the Americas (Two Congo Rivers [in Panama and El Salvador], Congo Laguna, Congo Lake, Congo Bay, Congo Hills, Congo Volcano, Congo Canyon etc.).

The major exports of the Kongo Empire to Europe were textiles. The Kongo textiles were so resistant that they were used by Portuguese navigators as sails.

http://en.lisapoyakama.org/the-sophisticated-economy-of-the-kongo-empire/
Imagination remains forever marked by the explorers' narratives restored by the German historian Leo Frobenius, who described the inhabitants of Kongo as people "clothed in silk and velvet (…) civilized to the bone marrow" [3]. Several palm trees were methodically cultivated for the purposes of the textile industry. Their fibers were used to make high-quality fabrics. Brocade was called Incorimba . Velvet was called Enzaca , damas called Infulas , satins Maricas , taffeta called Tanga , the "armoisins" Engombos .

https://www.metmuseum.org/exhibitions/listings/2015/kongo/blog/posts/kongo-textiles-renaissance-european-collections

https://www.metmuseum.org/exhibitions/listings/2015/kongo/blog/posts/kongo-textiles-renaissance-european-collections

One of the wonders of Kongo: Power and Majesty, on view through January 3, 2016, is the group of luxury textiles finely woven from golden palm fiber, then hand-cut and rubbed in the weaver's hands. The result is a rich interplay of tone and texture that reminded me at first of aerial views of crop circles cut into fields of ripening grain.

The textiles, however, are far more complex as virtuoso pieces. Their making was described with admiration by Antonio Zuchelli (1663–1716), an Italian missionary to the Kongo. He notes how the local weavers finished their cloth "with a knife they cut the cloth in the proper spots and rub it well with their hands, so that it looks like patterned velvet."

Europeans compared what they saw to luxurious Italian silk velvets with elaborate woven patterns, but they admired pieces that were "so beautiful," in the words of the Portuguese sea captain Duarte Pacheco Pereira (ca. 1460–1533), "that those made in Italy do not surpass them in workmanship." What really surprised them was the way in which Kongo cloths were woven not from silk but from raffia, which made them miraculously soft to the touch. The designs were less often a source of comment, although in 1656, John Tradescant the Younger (1608–1662) described a cloth in his museum in Lambeth—now in the Pitt Rivers in Oxford—as "A Table-cloath of grass very curiously waved."

When one looks at these luxury textiles with twenty-first-century eyes, the timeless artistry of the design is particularly striking. Bands of sophisticated geometric patterns spiral across the textile surfaces, similar to the interlace patterns on Kongo ivory oliphants, which are carved from curving elephant tusks. Such repeating motifs were not merely decorative but had profound significance within Kongo society.

Exhibition curator Alisa LaGamma explains in her introductory chapter to the exhibition catalogue how the spiral movement is a visual metaphor for the path taken by the dead, which is central to Kongo thought and imagining. That concept communicates through the finished designs, explaining why these were elite display pieces in Kongo society, and why they were an important component in diplomatic exchanges with the Portuguese from the fifteenth century.

An interesting puzzle—and a prompt to further research—is the European format of the cloths themselves, which are shaped to European taste in their format and structure. Even the elaborately made pompoms at their corners imitate those made of silk or wool on European cushions. A fascinating insight into the status of luxury cushions within an Italian, early fifteenth-century context is provided by the Salimbenis' fresco from Urbino showing scenes from the life of Saint John the Baptist.

Some of the finest surviving Kongo cloths are still to be found in collections formed in Europe from the sixteenth to the eighteenth century. Known as Kunstkammern, or "art rooms," these cabinet collections at first concentrated mostly on small-scale European treasures that were precious and intricate or demonstrated skill or virtuosity. But during the sixteenth century, in the so-called Age of Exploration, these collections diversified to explore all things curious, rare, and exotic that had been brought from an expanding range of global contacts. What were Europeans to make of what Shakespeare unforgettably called the "brave new world" opening up all around them?

From Stockholm to Florence, London to Prague, Kongo luxury cloths were preserved in court and cabinet collections formed by rulers, princes, and urban elites. The first two recorded examples appear in Prague in 1607—in the Kunstkammer of the Holy Roman Emperor Rudolf II of Prague (r. 1576–1612), where they remain today—but the royal houses of Sweden and Denmark swiftly followed.

Kongo cloths are also recorded in the seventeenth century as prize pieces acquired by doctors, scientists, and scholars. The Milanese physician Ludovico Settala (1552–1633) and his son Manfredo (1600–1680) formed one of Italy's most famous scientific museums, which included several examples. There is a drawing of a folded one, annotated as "a small mat to make a cushion to sit on, made of straw of rare beauty…made in Angola or Congo." Settala's scholarly network included the Jesuit scholar Athanasius Kircher (1602–1680), founding director of the the Musaeum Kircherianum in Rome, who acquired pieces described in 1709 as "four mats made with admirable skill in the Kingdom of Angola….they look like a silk cloth notwithstanding they are made of very thin palm threads."

But how were these cloths originally acquired? We are slowly finding out more about the web of European dealers, the international trading companies, and the merchants who supplied collectors, but the cultural, political, and trading exchanges in which textiles first changed hands in Kongo itself are still a mystery. Did European visitors bring examples of their own cushions to Kongo and commission copies in local materials and techniques? Or did Kongo leaders commission them as items of commerce, exploiting new markets? Either way, their presence in European collections from the sixteenth century attests to the fascination they aroused as virtuoso textiles, which made distant worlds tangible.

The DRC, Central Africa, is the cradle of mathematics thanks to the Ishango Bone, the oldest math tool, which is also a lunar calendar. Not too many people know that. The main question is why.

Congo to request return of famous Ishango Bone

The Congolese Institute for Nature Conservation (ICCN) plans to formally request the return of the Ishango Bone, a valuable artefact excavated in the DRC during Belgian colonialisation. https://www.thebulletin.be/congo-request-return-famous-ishango-bone

Mathematical Treasure: Ishango Bone

Author (s): Frank J. Swetz (The Pennsylvania State University) Perhaps the oldest mathematical artifact in existence, the Ishango Bone (above), was unearthed in 1950 in the then Belgian colony of the Congo (now the Democratic Republic of Congo). It was discovered by the Belgian anthropologist Jean de Heinzelin de Braucourt (1920-1998) and named after the region in which it was found. The bone, probably a fibula of a baboon, large cat, or other large mammal, has been dated to the Upper Paleolithic Period of human history, approximately 20,000-25,000 years ago. It is 10 cm long and bears an articulated, organized series of notches readily identifying it, to many observers, as a tally stick. However, its original purpose remains a subject of debate. The Ishango Bone is now housed at the Museum of Natural Sciences in Brussels, Belgium, with whose cooperation the image above was obtained. For more information and images, see: Museum of Natural Sciences, Royal Belgian Institute of Natural Sciences: Ishango Bone (2007-2009) or Ishango Bone (2001) Smithsonian National Museum of Natural History: Ishango Bone Alison S. Brooks, David M. Helgren, et al, "Dating and Context of Three Middle Stone Age Sites with Bone Points in the Upper Semliki Valley, Zaire," Science, New Series, vol. 268, no. 5210 (Apr. 28, 1995), pp. 548-553. Index to Mathematical Treasures Frank J. Swetz (The Pennsylvania State University), "Mathematical Treasure: Ishango Bone," Convergence (March 2014)

https://www.maa.org/press/periodicals/convergence/mathematical-treasure-ishango-bone

Proto-Mathematics of the Ishango Bone in The DR Congo

Spread the loveLikeSub-Saharan Africa can claim to be the home of proto-mathematics, given that the two oldest mathematical artifacts, the

https://africaglobalnews.com/proto-mathematics-of-the-ishango-bone-in-the-dr-congo/

Ishango Bone

This fossil mammal bone has three rows of tally marks along its length. They may have been used to add or multiply. Exhibit Item Discovered by: Jean de Heinzelin Age: About 25,000 years old Site: Ishango, Democratic Republic of Congo

http://humanorigins.si.edu/evidence/behavior/recording-information/ishango-bone

A brief history of mathematics: From Plato's philosophy of mathematics to modern mysteries

There's evidence that prehistoric people understood simple mathematics and astronomy. The oldest evidence comes from the 37,000 year-old Lebombo bone.

http://www.thestargarden.co.uk/History-of-mathematics.html

1. Ancient arithmetic ↑

There's evidence that prehistoric people understood simple mathematics, as well as astronomy. The oldest evidence comes from the Lebombo bone, which is about 37,000 years old and was found in Swaziland[1]. It has 29 notches carved into it, which could have been used to record numbers, making it a tally stick. Stronger evidence comes from the Ishango bone, which was found on what is now the border between Uganda and the Democratic Republic of the Congo[2].

The Ishango bone is about 20,000 years old and has a series of notches carved into it in three columns. Patterns in these numbers may show that they were made by someone who understood addition, subtraction, multiplication, division, and prime numbers.

Prime numbers are numbers greater than one that are only divisible by themselves and one. They are the 'building blocks' of mathematics in a similar way to how atoms are the building blocks of chemistry. The first ten prime numbers are 2, 3, 5, 7, 11, 13, 17, 19, 23, and 29

The Ishango Bone - 22,000 Year Old Math Calculator

The Ishango bone is a bone tool, dated to the Upper Paleolithic era. It is a dark brown length of bone, the fibula of a baboon,[1] with a sharp piece of quartz affixed to one end, perhaps for engraving. It was first thought to be a tally stick, as it has a series of what has been interpreted as tally marks carved in three columns running the length of the tool, but some scientists have suggested that the groupings of notches indicate a mathematical understanding that goes beyond counting. It has also been suggested that the scratches might have been to create a better grip on the handle or for some other non-mathematical reason.[2]

The Ishango bone was found in 1960 by Belgian Jean de Heinzelin de Braucourt while exploring what was then the Belgian Congo.[3] It was discovered in the African area of Ishango, which was centered near the headwaters of the Nile River at Lake Edward (now on the border between modern-day Uganda and Congo). The bone was found among the remains of a small community that fished and gathered in this area of Africa. The small settlement had been buried in a volcanic eruption.[4][5] The artifact was first estimated to have originated between 9,000 BC and 6,500 BC.[6] However, the dating of the site where it was discovered was re-evaluated, and it is now believed to be more than 20,000 years old.

Quels sont les plus grands pays francophones par superficie ?

Amado Rivero (חמש ינא) · Suivre Francophile chez La vie 9 mo

Eh bien, je vais essayer de répondre à la question en me basant sur les pays membres de la francophonie,[1]et traditionnellement (et actuellement) considérés comme des pays francophones, même si la langue française n'est pas la plus parlée dans ces pays, si leur histoire, le gouvernement et eux-mêmes bien sûr, s'identifient comme faisant partie du monde francophone, puis ils sont pris en compte. Très bien, commençons!

Par superficie, la liste serait comme ça:

1.République Démocratique du Congo, 2.34 millions de km2.[2]

Le plus grand pays francophone du monde. (1)

2.Le Québec, 1.36 millions de km2.[3]

Le plus grande pays (2) francophone du continent américain.

3.Tchad, 1.28 millions de km2.[4]

Le deuxième plus grand pays francophone d'Afrique, le troisième du monde.

4.Niger, 1.26 millions de km2.[5]

Le troisième plus grand pays francophone d'Afrique.

5.Mali, 1.24 millions de km2.[6]

Le quatrième plus grand pays francophone d'Afrique, cinquième du monde.

6.Mauritanie, 1.03 millions de km2.[7]

Le cinquième plus grand pays francophone d'Afrique.

7.France,(3) 672 Mille km2.[8]

Le plus grand pays francophone d'Europe.

8.République Centrafricaine, 622 Mille km2.[9]

Le sixième plus grand pays francophone d'Afrique.

9.Madagascar, 587 Mille km2.[10]

Le plus grand pays francophone de l'océan indien, et aussi la plus grande île francophone du monde.

10.Cameroun, 475 Mille km2.[11]

Le plus grand pays francophone du golfe de Guinée, septième en Afrique continentale, dixième plus grand pays francophone au monde.

Remarques:

(1) Certains pays historiquement liés à la France ont été exclus de la liste car soit ils ne sont pas des membres officiels de la francophonie, comme l'Algérie (même si le français est encore largement parlé dans le pays, si l'Algérie est considérée pour la liste, ce serait en fait le plus grand pays francophone du monde), soit ils sont membres, mais pas traditionnellement considérés comme des pays francophones, comme l'Égypte. Sinon, ces pays auraient fait partie des dix premiers.

(2) Le Québec est répertorié, même s'il n'est pas un pays indépendant, mais plutôt une région d'un autre pays, le Canada

(3) La superficie totale de la France comprend les territoires d'outre-mer dans le chiffre.

Dans beaucoup de ces pays, le français est officiellement reconnu avec d'autres langues maternelles et, dans certains cas, la connaissance du français dans ces pays n'est pas aussi répandue, mais reste la langue (ou l'une d'entre elles) des questions administratives et officielles. Selon les critères, la liste pourrait changer, c'est juste une façon que j'ai trouvée pour essayer de répondre à la question.
J'espère que cette liste t'as aidé.

Si vous souhaitez en savoir plus sur l'histoire, la culture et la géographie des pays francophones, vous pouvez rejoindre l'espace Francophonie, créé avec cet objectif. Je vais laisser le lien ci-dessous

Francophonie Thomas de La Marnierre (トマ・サレ) , Hervée Tia et Alexandre Courvoisier sont des contributeurs

Sincères amitiés.

[1] Francophonie — Wikipédia
[2] République démocratique du Congo — Wikipédia
[3] Québec — Wikipédia
[4] Tchad — Wikipédia
[5] Niger — Wikipédia
[6] Mali — Wikipédia
[7] Mauritanie — Wikipédia
[8] France — Wikipédia
[9] République centrafricaine — Wikipédia
[10] Madagascar — Wikipédia
[11] Cameroun — Wikipédia

Did the Congolese region in Subsaharan Africa play any part in ancient civilization? Why are there no ancient ruins in the Congo region?

Matt Riggsby MA Archaeology, Boston University 8mo

There was a substantial kingdom there in the later Middle Ages/early modern period which traded with Europe, made a pro-forma conversion to Christianity, and provided several native bishops. But there's an ongoing issue in African archaeology, particularly in the southern half of Africa. Societies there had a very strong tendency to build with perishable materials like wood, thatching, earth, and even living plants (for example, cultivating thorny shrubs as barriers and property markers). These are all relatively inexpensive, easy to use materials, but they don't get preserved well in the archaeological record. Earthen materials blend back in with the dirt, and plants decay, leaving little or nothing behind. There are few apparent remains of buildings which don't come from rather late, notably the occasional remains of churches which missionaries insisted be built of stone. (There are also stone cattle corrals, but those tend to be found much farther south than the Congo, and the occasional settlement like Great Zimbabwe, but those tend to be both relatively late, not "ancient," and likewise not near the Congo.)

That said, there are remains of substantial constructions around the Congo region. They're just not visible from the ground. Aerial photography and satellite images can reveal marks on the landscape quite clearly which can't be seen close up, and they indicated a great deal of work on the landscape. They're used in many regions to find the outlines of cultivated fields Archaeologists have discovered large areas of dikes and other low earthworks to control water and set up areas for cultivation around the Congo. It's clear people were doing a lot of earth moving, but it takes some work to find the evidence.

Related Links

Why when asked about ancient subsaharan civilization ruins, Afrocentrists can only give the Great Zimbabwe when it is not even ancient it is Medieval at best? And they like to give settlements like Timbuktu and Kush that are foreign influenced?

Even satellite images of the Congo basin have revealed some large seemingly ancient man-made shapes, still no concrete archeological findings were made in Congo. Is the truth that Congo lacks ancient civilization hard to accept?

Why does Congo have no ancient BCE civilization history?

Was there any ancient civilisation in Africa (like say Romans)? If not what are the reasons that such a huge land did not develop a great civilisation.

What do Congolese think of the fact that no advanced ancient civilization existed in Congo but there were many in Europe and Asia, even in America?

Why didn't a civilisation form around the Congo River, or may it have done, but the conditions in the area prevented preservation? In ancient times as ones did around the Nile, Danube, Indus, Motagua, Tigris and Yellow Rivers?

Why did Subsaharan Africa never have spectacular ancient cities like the Romans did?
Why were no civilizations found in African territories near the Congo River?

Why are ancient African civilizations not as popularly known as ancient civilizations from other parts of the world?

Which civilization is older, Nubia or Egypt?

Why is the ancient Sudan civilization, which is 5,000 years old, not mentioned every time people speak of brilliant top civilization?

If early forms of man started in Africa, shouldn't there be evidence of an ancient civilization there that predates Ancient Mesopotamia?

Why did civilization not develop in Africa?
What are African ancient civilizations?

Why is it that, despite the head start, Africa did not develop a civilization such as Mesopotamia?

Were there urbanized developments in the Kingdom of Kongo by the 1800s? How has technology changed in terms of homes?

Kevin Richardson · Follow PhD in History, The University of Texas at Austin
Thu

In Kongo, as in the Kingdom of Kongo, city centers existed when the Portuguese arrived in the late 15th century—see John Thornton's various works on the subject.

UNESCO earlier this year added to its World Heritage List the Mbanza Kongo, Vestiges of the Capital of the former Kingdom of Kongo (Angola) – one of the largest constituted states in Southern Africa from the 14th to 19th centuries – as an acknowledgement of its "outstanding universal value."

A 16th-century depiction of the capital of the kingdom of Loango, in what is today's Congo-Brazzaville. The drawing was first published in a book called History of the Kingdom of the Kongo by Filippo Pigafetta, published in Rome in 1591.

This image is of the city viewed from the Kongo River. It was published in 1668 by Olfert Dapper. In both images, you can see the Royal Palace, the largest building. The writing on the left points out the Royal Palace. The church (Christian) is the structure on the far right, with the adjacent domed building being the Portuguese Fort. The headland behind that in the foreground is labeled as ‘the Spring Wall’, which was most likely the source of the city`s pure drinking water. Slaves can be seen carrying water from the river up the cliff to the city. The banner reads – ‘The Bansa or Residence of the King of the Kongo called St. Salvador’.

A photograph from the 1800s of the ruins of the church of Mbanza Kongo or Sao Salvador as it came to be known.

So urbanization was known, at least on the Atlantic side. Urbanization in its 18th/19th century form further east isn't as clear, although large town centers (arguably cities) were present wherever one had a clear state system. Because, as far as I know, the only serious archaeological excavations from this era are at Sanga, we can't speak very well about more extended trends coming out (perhaps) of the so-called Chifumvabe Complex of the Great Lakes region.

The technology of dwellings is another matter. The general sense has long been one of "if it ain't broke, don't fix it," but there's a lot of variability in what was used to build. Although we often think of weave and daub (a mix of earth and cattle dung) which is remarkably non-odoriferous and very effective at insulation and protection, or construction via overlapping woven mats (in South West Africa), the construction further north would have turned on other materials, but I'm not finding any clear consensus on exactly what. It's hard to believe that NO change took place, because shifting values and ideas about everything from family and wealth to politics could affect spatial distribution inside and outside the homestead—a point that you see a little bit with Bourdieu and critical histories of anthro but less so applied in this region. There's some attestation that Luba homes (for example) were square, lined along central streets in small villages, though there would also be a compound of a primary family or other authority (or just a wealthy one).

So I've been looking at general texts, and I don't see any discussion of it—so I'll have a look in the more specialized literature to see if anyone says anything about dwellings themselves. The fixation on pottery and "tracking ethnicity" is really annoying for those who seek to get meaning about real people and their lives/thoughts, a point Vansina made in 1966 and continued in later works. His 1990 Paths in the Rainforests might be interesting in this regard, as might Pierre de Maret's essay in Stahl, ed., African Archaeology: a Critical Introduction (Oxford: Blackwell, 2005): 420-40. Some areas of African archaeology are moving at quite a good clip, but those in more difficult areas politically still receive scant attention even from scholars who are originally from those countries. I'll report back if any epiphanies arise.

[TL;DR is really "we know there were, but not exactly where or how many, how large, or how exactly configured/built, because the work hasn't been done yet." Sadly, we often spend too much time complaining about the work that hasn't been done, when we'd rather be doing the work—but political instability in various countries and a lack of funding work against academics who seek to.] Follow Kevin Richardson

Related Links

Was there a giant flood in the 18-19th century where many old buildings and houses were buried in the mud? Why don't we know anything about it?

How do I build a low cost house with modern technology?
How has technology changed our lives?
How was life in the mid 1800s?
How does technology affect art?
Why were houses built so close together in the 1800s and early 1900s?
How did class differences affect the way urban dwellers lived in the late 1800s?
What were village houses like in 19th century England?
How good was food in the 1800s?

Did Britain feel growing regret through the 19th century seeing their lost colonies in North America grow into a huge industrial power with a large continent of land and resources?

During the Industrial Revolution of the late 1800s, many people moved to cities in order to work in factories. What did this rapid increase in urbanization lead to?

Why did American farms/homesteads develop as individual properties far from each other while English homes were in central villages surrounded by the farmland?

In what ways did the rise of a true middle class in Europe during the late 19th century become apparent? I know that the late 19th and early 20th centuries were very transformative for Europe with the rise of a real middle class.

What color were houses in the 1800s?
What is urbanization?

Pourquoi la Grèce antique est-elle le début de la civilisation occidentale au lieu de l'Afrique ancienne?

Michel Hevia Maîtrise en Histoire ancienne et Archéologie, Université Paris X (Diplôme obtenu en 1992) Mis à jour le 1 an Dire qu'une culture ou qu'une civilisation est le début d'une autre est un phénomène d'identification de nature idéologique qui nécessite bien des faisceaux de preuves qu'une simple affirmation.

Il serait plus correct et facile de prouver qu'une civilisation sur le plan historique hérite d'une autre civilisation, ou plutôt de plusieurs autres civilisations.

Il faudrait aussi avoir une idée de quand date cette supposée « civilisation occidentale ».

De quand date la supposée « Civilisation occidentale » ?

L'antiquité tardive et le haut-Moyen-Âge ?
La grande coupure qui marque l'apparition d'une civilisation d'Europe occidentale, vient de la partition de l'Empire romain : la séparation définitive de l'Orient hellénisé et de l'Occident latinisé. La deuxième coupure a été la conquête arabe qui consacre la coupure nord-sud, l'Espagne et la Sicile prenant alors une place à part.

Quel que soit le point de départ cette civilisation de l'Europe Occidentale est marquée par l'oubli de la culture grecque, et son ancrage dans l'héritage romain et chrétien, avec un apport important germanique et païen. Les apports de l'hellénisme ne sont qu'indirects à travers la civilisation romaine qui a été une civilisation très synthétique : Latine, certes, mais aussi grecque, égyptienne, hellénistique, punique, gauloise, etc.

2. La Renaissance ?

On peut aussi envisager une autre coupure pour affirmer l'émergence d'une civilisation occidentale : la Renaissance est une bonne candidate dans ce qui à été l'amorce de la civilisation occidentale avec la redécouverte de l'antiquité hellénistique dans l'art, les sciences, la philosophie. C'est la fin de l'Empire Romain d'Orient avec la chute de Constantinople face aux Ottomans qui provoque un afflux de réfugiés en Italie et accélère cette redécouverte. Ainsi la Grèce antique n'est pas le début de la civilisation occidentale, mais une de ses sources via l'empire Byzantin, et aussi à travers un autre vecteur qu'a été l'Espagne andalouse bien avant la Renaissance. Mais pas tout le savoir antique, uniquement une petite partie, le savoir des savants, mais pas tous. Ceci a débouché sur la plus importante révolution sur les esprits : le raisonnement cartésien, la raison contre l'obscurantisme. Or la Grèce antique a connu des savants dignes de ce nom, mais ce n'était que l'exception. L'humain antique était très superstitieux, et s'adonnait à de nombreux rituels et mystères. Ces croyances ont survécu largement à travers l'époque médiévale et moderne ; et existe encore.

3. La Révolution Industrielle

L'époque des Lumières (XVIIIe s.) est vraiment propre à l'Occident européen. Le développement rapide des sciences et des techniques est sans commune mesure avec celui qu'a connu l'antiquité. C'est surtout l'accentuation de ce qu'a été la « révolution cartésienne ». Mais en plein XIXe siècle, il y avait encore des gens pour émettre des théories de « génération spontanée » pour expliquer l'apparition de certains papillons…

La civilisation de la Grèce Antique a été l'un des apports à la civilisation occidentale.

Cet apport a été indirect, via la période hellénistique puis la civilisation romaine, l'idée de civilisation gréco-romaine étant un raccourci trompeur.

Les savants de la Grèce classique avaient déjà commencé une synthèse des connaissances antiques. Ainsi Thalès a certainement voyagé en Égypte et en Assyrie au -VIe siècle, et d'autres à travers la diaspora des colonies sur tout le pourtour méditerranéen.

La période hellénistique à partir des conquêtes d'Alexandre a été l'un des premiers brassage multi-culturels de l'Orient, et surtout d'effort de synthèse des connaissances de l'Antiquité, avec ses bibliothèques, et de véritables centres de recherches et d'expérimentation : Alexandrie, Antioche, Pergame, Athènes, Syracuse. Pour cela est né un vecteur de culture indispensable : la langue grecque sous sa forme de la langue véhiculaire qu'a été la koinè à partir de la fin du IVe siècle avant notre ère.

Puis Rome a pris le relai, et dès le IIe siècle existait un bilinguisme culturel dans l'aristocratie romaine, au contact des cités du sud de l'Italie.

Ainsi, la Grèce antique est un apport essentiel à la civilisation occidentale, par l'intermédiaire des romains, des byzantins et de l'Andalousie. Elle n'en est pas le début, car s’il existe quelques similitudes pour certains aspects culturels, les différences en sont bien plus nombreuses.

Qu’en est-il de l’Afrique comme « début » ?

Le monde antique du Moyen-Orient était en contact avec l’Afrique, puisque l’Égypte fait partie du Moyen-Orient, et avait des contacts réguliers avec les grecs et le Levant (Canaan puis Phénicie). Ce monde antique était en contact également avec l’Afrique du nord, avec les colonies phéniciennes de Carthage, et de Maurétanie (Tanger). Il existait des colonies grecques en Libye. Mais l’essentiel de l’apport antique africain est passé par l’hellénisme et par Rome.

Il existe sans doute un apport africain antique à la civilisation occidentale. Mais tout comme la Grèce, cet apport n’est pas « le début » de la civilisation occidentale, qui possède sa dynamique propre. Suivre Michel Hevia

Questions similaires

Quelle est la civilisation la plus ancienne sur la Terre ?

Pourquoi l'Afrique n'a-t-elle pas réussi à développer une civilisation sophistiquée, capable de rivaliser avec les civilisations asiatiques et européennes ?

Quelle est la civilisation antique la plus obscure que la plupart des gens ne connaissent pas ?
La France est-elle le centre historique de la civilisation occidentale ?

Y a-t-il une cause commune dans le déclin des grandes civilisations du passé (romains, mayas, etc…) ? Est-ce susceptible de se reproduire dans nos civilisations modernes ?

L'Afrique a tant donné au monde comme par exemple la connaissance aux savant grecs, pour ne pas citer autre chose. Pourquoi dit-on que l'Afrique n'est pas encore entrée dans l'Histoire?

Pourquoi dit-on que la civilisation gréco-romaine est le socle de la civilisation occidentale ou moderne ?

Quelles sont les mœurs sexuelles de la Grèce antique que nous trouverions dérangeantes ?

Si la civilisation a commencé en Egypte comme nous l'ont dit les livres d'Histoire, pourquoi alors l'Afrique est-elle sous-développée et dépendante ?

La Grèce antique était-elle simplement une extension de l'Égypte ancienne et de la Mésopotamie ?

L'Afrique est-elle pauvre à cause de la colonisation ? Si la colonisation n'avait jamais eu lieu, comment se présenterait l'Afrique ?

La vie était-elle meilleure dans la Grèce antique ou dans la Rome antique ? Pourquoi ?
Pourquoi la Grèce antique est-elle si importante pour nous aujourd'hui ?
Quelle est la plus ancienne civilisation européenne ?
Y a-t-il eu une influence de l'Afrique Noire sur la civilisation grecque ?

Les stars d'Afrique · Suivre

Publication par David-GDK jeu. Ganga Zumbi, un véritable héros africain.Il est né à Kongo vers 1630, réduit en esclavage et expédié au Brésil pour travailler comme esclave dans une plantation.

Il a réussi à s'échapper, a levé une armée d'Africains esclaves et a fondé son propre royaume à Palmares, avec un palais et une cour.

How do Congolese currently view Mobutu Se-se-seko?

Kevin Richardson · Follow

Researcher, Biologist, Historian, Anthropologist. (2008–present) Sat

Great answer Roland Wamara. A few notes to add: Mobutu Sese Seko is seen as the most ominous leader ever by most Congolese. However, many, as Roland Wamara notes, still see him as the most brilliant yet perplexing leader in the modern world, especially the Congolese “combattants” who are are known for their radical actions against Congolese politicians, musicians and religious ministers supporting the current Congolese regime to visit or hold public events outside their country of origin. Those who dare to violate this embargo have been humiliated, drawing on different politics of shaming, or violently assaulted and some churches vandalized. They are more radical in their tactics and claims.

ZAIRE

LEOPARDS

JEUNE
PARIS
RICHE

ZAIRE
SHOWGEAR

ANTWERPEN

ZAÏRE
ZAÏRE
ZAÏRE
FLEURS
DU
ZAÏRE

To "combattants" in DRC, France, the UK, The US, Belgium, South Africa, and beyond, the Zairean flag is a sign of historic pride and defiance to whatever is currently called "Congolese liberalism". Today, the symbol often appears at "pro-Zaire" rallies and is a lightning rod in DRC's calcifying political divide.

Combattants in Brussels, Belgium Singing Zaire National Anthem

Ideologically, they espouse, and helped to create, a strident form of wounded nationalism that has become a dominant discourse in Congolese national life. Yet, even at this level, their rhetoric has not remained static over the last 25 years.

In one sense, they belong to a longer-term pattern of Congolese social life, where the frantic fluidity, inventiveness and creativity of Congolese cultural forms, social structures and political formations—but also their incessant tendency towards fragmentation and division—reflect desperate attempts to control or remain attached to networks of patronage: patronage that is continuously leaking out of the region; networks that are themselves constantly in the process of being violently disrupted.

Thus, the mikiliste were cultural patrons, offering money and tributary forms of friendship to the musicians, journalists and pastors who dominate the Kinois public sphere. The combatants, by contrast, are implacably hostile to these groups, doling out threats and beatings and banning cultural performers from entering Europe.

At the end of February, in Paris, they set fire to the Gare de Lyon in Paris ... with violent methods, these Congolese opponents tried everything to prevent the concert at the AccorHotels Arena in France by Fally Ipupa, one of the superstars of the country.

Source: Opinion. À Paris, les "combattants" congolais se sont trompés de bataille Josue Dennis Chance has touched on this here.

Sources:

Combattants: Activists or Criminals? A Reflection on Ethnoregionalism and Political Violence among Congolese Immigrants in South Africa - Kujenga Amani
Opinion. À Paris, les "combattants" congolais se sont trompés de bataille RDC : qui sont ces "combattants" qui s'opposent au président Kabila ?
Follow Kevin Richardson

Related questions

What were the achievements of Mobutu Sese Seko?

In Africa, how tall was Congo's (Zaire) Mobutu Sese Seko? Which languages did he speak, and how many children did he have?

Who is worse, Mobutu or Kabila?

Is Mobutu the main reason for the poverty and chaos nowadays in Democratic Republic of Congo?

Mobutu was the last relic of the Cold War in Africa to leave a legacy of chaos and corruption in Zaire (now the Democratic Republic of Congo), but what if Mobutu Sese Seko never came to power?

How did Mobutu prevent the Balkanisation of the Congo?

Why is Hitler adored by most African leaders, for example, Robert Mugabe, Idi Amin, Yoweri Museveni, Francisco Macìas Nguema, Mobutu Sese Seko, etc?

Was the Democratic Republic of the Congo (Zaire) better during the Mobutu years or the post-Mobutu years?

What happened to president Mobutu Sesotho Seko's alleged fortune of millions of dollars after his death?

Who was worse, Idi Amin, Jean-Bedel Bokassa or Mobutu Sese Seko?

Has Belgium ever formally apologized for the Congolese genocide?

Why doesn't Belgium recognize the Congolese genocide?

What do you think of Tony Blair?

Which African leader do you feel is more despotic and infamous, Idi Amin, Mengistu Halie Mariam, Mobutu Sese Seko, Omar al-Bashir, Charles Taylor, or Robert Mugabe?

Was Mahatma Gandhi a British agent?

What were the achievements of Mobutu Sese Seko?

Theophilus E.Daniel-Kagbare · Follow Student of Africa Updated 2y

He achieved quite a lot. One of the biggest thinkers of recent times. Against the backdrop of Belgium King Leopold II's arm-chopping colonial experience, he was a ray of light in the dense jungle.

He rode the tide of history, in the heat of the Cold War, when side-kicks were much sought after by both sides, he positioned himself to great advantage. To himself.

He was patronized by America, aided by the CIA, hosted in the White House by Jack Kennedy, chartered the supersonic Concorde. Beloved by China.

How many sons of Gbadolite, his village, was or is that illustrous?

Mobutu, the quintessential kleptocrat

He transformed his place of birth into Africa's Versailles with an estimated $400million. Louis XIV would turn in his grave. He may well have outdone the Sun King himself.

He amassed a fortune of over $5billion while racking debt of about $14bn for his country.

He perfected the art of kleptocracy, and set the example for many African leaders, like Nigeria's Gen. Sani Abacha of Nigeria, Jammeh of The Gambia, etc., to follow.

"…When he left power he was universally excoriated as Africa's greatest kleptocrat," noted Mobutu's obituary in the Guardian in 1997.

He changed the country's name to Zaire; his name to an Authentic African name. From Joseph Desire to Mobutu Sese Seko Koko Ngbendu was za Banga (can you feel it?). In the spirit of Authentice he was not tainted by America's Enterprise, democracy; he cannot be accused of leveraging his contact with a succession of US Presidents to impact his country; unlike Felix Houphoet-Boingy of Ivory Coast, who was also massively used to undermine governments of surrounding countries, his personal friendship and connection with foreign leaders did not translate to economic prosperity.

Is nt that Nationalism?

He spread his horny seed around the country. Sadly, he stopped short of King Solomon's record.

Mobutu Sese Seko's life is a testament to the fact that the West actively undermined progressive, patriotic governments in Africa, like Patrice Lumumba's, which Mobutu overthrew. And propped up idiots like him.

He is a lasting monument to the works of the Central Intelligence Agency in Africa.

He is fondly remembered by his people:

"We are working because Mobutu is no longer alive. He was like my father. . I loved and worshipped him. He was not a dictator- he was a good man who wanted to unify people."

The above view is almost shared by foreignpolicy.com which describe him as a nation builder. No wonder there. He fostered foreign policy shenanigans for their patrons in Angola, Rwanda, etc, providing bases to launch mayhem. He built so well the nation crumbled under his watch and has been reeling from his legacy since.

He set many records from the back.

Follow Theophilus E.Daniel-Kagbare

Related Links

How do Congolese currently view Mobutu Sese Seko?

Mobutu was the last relic of the Cold War in Africa to leave a legacy of chaos and corruption in Zaire (now the Democratic Republic of Congo), but what if Mobutu Sese Seko never came to power?

In Africa, how tall was Congo's (Zaire) Mobutu Sese Seko? Which languages did he speak, and how many children did he have?

Who is worse, Mobutu or Kabila?

Why is Hitler adored by most African leaders, for example, Robert Mugabe, Idi Amin, Yoweri Museveni, Francisco Macìas Nguema, Mobutu Sese Seko, etc?

Who was worse, Idi Amin, Jean-Bedel Bokassa or Mobutu Sese Seko?

Why during the reign of Mobutu, Zaire (now rechristened as DRC) was relatively stable? While nowadays rebels seem to be everywhere, particularly in Eastern and Southern DRC, after the Congo Wars.

What happened to president Mobutu Sesotho Seko's alleged fortune of millions of dollars after his death?

Which African leader do you feel is more despotic and infamous, Idi Amin, Mengistu Halie Mariam, Mobutu Sese Seko, Omar al-Bashir, Charles Taylor, or Robert Mugabe?

How did Mobutu prevent the Balkanisation of the Congo?

Why and how was Mobutu Sese Seko of Zire able to continue his regime for 32 years without the international community getting involved?

Why did Mobutu Sese Seko support the South African apartheid government?
How did Mobutu fall from power?
What are some Nelson Mandela's achievements?
What were Arjuna's achievements without Gandiva?

Who was worse, Idi Amin, Jean-Bedel Bokassa or Mobutu Sese Seko?

Zack Omoro Follow Former Kenyan Infantry Officer 1y

“Big, Black, Uncouth, uneducated” This is how the colonial British officers demanded new recruits to be absorbed in the colonial Armies. With this kind of mental arrangement, it was easier to brainwash them to do the bidding of the colonial masters against their own kindred.

On being commissioned to the officer corp, these young servicemen took over the reins of power with a mentality that to be tough against anything resembling resistance against the government. Power got into their heads and urged on by the bipolar situation of the day they could not change perpetually heeding to the calls from their European masters.

It is not right to speculate on who was more murderous. One life lost for purely political reasons or is one life too many. The three were bad and murderous and it would be callous of us to attempt to measure their murderous obsessions. Follow Zack Omoro

Related Links

Uganda: What do Ugandans think about Idi Amin?

What was Jean-Bédel Bokassa's true intentions of crowning himself Emperor of the Central Africa?

Why did Idi Amin dislike Asians in Uganda?

Which African leader do you feel is more despotic and infamous, Idi Amin, Mengistu Halie Mariam, Mobutu Sese Seko, Omar al-Bashir, Charles Taylor, or Robert Mugabe?

Did Idi Amin really eat people?

As African, do you think Idi Amin did a good thing by expelling Asians from Uganda in 1972? Why or why not?

Who is worse, Mobutu or Kabila?

Why did Idi Amin order all foreign nationals to leave his country? What was his motive behind that policy?

Why did Saudi Arabia give sanctuary to Idi Amin?

What were the achievements of Mobutu Sese Seko?
What bad things did Idi Amin do?
Did Idi Amin really praise Hitler for what he did to the Jews?
What good things did Idi Amin set up?
How and why did Idi Amin kill his wife?
What was wrong with Idi Amin?

Related Answer
What is Mobutu Sese Seko's dictatorship era?

Claudio Oliveira · Follow Mar 15

Mobutu and his political party were far-right wing extremists supported by right wing governments and political parties in Africa like the South Africa apartheid government, FNLA and UNITA in Angola also Rhodesia and Renamo in Mozambique. He was anti-communist and also a supporter of Hutu rebels during the genocide he also gave them bases in east Congo. He ruled Zaire (DRC) in 1965–1997. He was the only president who kept stability in the Congo throughout the Cold War and till the end of his presidency sadly he got overthrown by communists.

Follow Claudio Oliveira

Related Links

Is dictatorship always wrong? Doesn't history have any examples of good dictatorships/dictators?

What were the achievements of Mobutu Sese Seko?

Who was worse, Idi Amin, Jean-Bedel Bokassa or Mobutu Sese Seko?
Why did Mobutu Sese Seko support the South African apartheid government?
How do Congolese currently view Mobutu Sese Seko?

I see Donald Trump parallels to Mussolini, Hitler, Mobutu Sese Seko, Robert Mugabe, and Idi Amin. Can you convince me otherwise?

What do Donald Trump, Mobutu Sese Seko, Ferdinand Marcos and Jonas Savimbi have in common?

Who is the most brutal dictator in recent history?
Could there ever be a global dictatorship?
Is the EU a dictatorship?

What happened to president Mobutu Sesotho Seko's alleged fortune of millions of dollars after his death?

Was the Marcos government a dictatorship?

How did Prabowo Subianto come so close to winning in 2014 when he basically was calling for a return to dictatorship? Is Indonesia still vulnerable to a strongman?

Why did Mao support Congo's military dictator Mobutu Sese Seko who was endorsed by Belgium, the United States, and other bourgeoisie nations for his anti-communist stand?

Is Singapore a dictatorship?

Related Answer:
Why during the reign of Mobutu, Zaire (now rechristened as DRC) was relatively stable? While nowadays rebels seem to be everywhere, particularly in Eastern and Southern DRC, after the Congo Wars.

Didier Champion · Follow Lived in Kigali, Rwanda3y

Mobutu was not perfect, but I think DRC needs a good version of Mobutu with a progressive mindset that Mamadou Ndala described.

Under Mobutu, DRC was self-sufficient. The Congolese people had abundant food. I vividly remember when my family found refuge there after a civil war in Rwanda. The people of DRC were quite prosperous. Over 20 years later, I returned to see some places we used to live and I was very shocked.

Instead of progress, things got very worse.

If you were to ask me today, I would say that DRC needs a good dictator to stabilize the country. Bring back safety and security, rule of law, and encourage the Congolese Diaspora to come back home to develop their country.

In my opinion, this is what is keeping DRC behind?

Bad leadership. The absence of rule of law and ability to govern.

Lack of safety and security in some regions, especially in Eastern DRC.
Mediocre infrastructure. Outside of cities, no roads to link places.

Wrong priorities. Too much focus on natural resources instead of focusing on developing a skilled and well trained human resource.

Brain Drain. The educated Congolese have left the country.
However, you would need to be very autocratic to enforce the rules. Get rid of all incompetent leaders (Kabila I was a disaster. His son (Kabila II) is terrible as well).

The main issue of DRC is leadership. Apart from Lumumba who was murdered by CIA, the rest have been terrible. Mobutu was alright for DRC, but he “played” with the wrong folks. In the upcoming election, I had high hopes for Moise Katumbi, but he was not allowed to run. My guess is that Kabila knew that his party would not have had any chance with him.

Moise Katumbi is very popular in DRC and seems to be very genuine about developing DRC.

Photo credit: CONGOLESELIFESTYLE

Didier Champion's answer to What is the elections conflict in DRC?

Follow Didier Champion

Related Links

Is Mobutu the main reason for the poverty and chaos nowadays in Democratic Republic of Congo?

Was the Democratic Republic of the Congo (Zaire) better during the Mobutu years or the post-Mobutu years?

How did Mobutu prevent the Balkanisation of the Congo?

How come Mobutu's government fell in the 1st Congo War, but the government of Laurent and Joseph Kabila survived the 2nd Congo War?

Why doesn't the DRC rename itself Zaire again?
Which is better, DRC or Zimbabwe?

What was actually going on in DRC once Angola and Zimbabwe took part in the war of Congo?

Why were Belgian colonialists so particularly brutal in the Congo?
Why was Zaire renamed as the Democratic Republic of Congo?

Mobutu was the last relic of the Cold War in Africa to leave a legacy of chaos and corruption in Zaire (now the Democratic Republic of Congo), but what if Mobutu Sese Seko never came to power?

Is Kagame considered an instigator of the Second Congo War which killed 5 million people?

Has the governments of DRC and Congo-Brazzaville ever considered changing their country names?

What is the main cause of the conflict in the Democratic Republic of the Congo?

Why during the Congo's independence, Congo has virtually zero doctors, intellectuals? Even Patrice Lumumba was educated at the level of a clerk. So why did the pioneers of the independence movement think the newly independent country would succeed?

How did Rwanda beat Zaire so easily in the first Congo War despite being so much smaller?

In Africa, how tall was Congo's (Zaire) Mobutu Sese Seko? Which languages did he speak, and how many children did he have?

Lois Ochan · Follow 4y

Mobutu was born out of wedlock to a traditional chief of the Ngbandi ethnic group in Lisala, Belgian Congo today known as Democratic Republic of Congo. Mobutu's mother, Marie Madeleine Yemo then met and married Albéric Gbemani, a cook for a Belgian judge, who adopted Mobutu.

The wife of the Belgian judge apparently took a liking to Mobutu and taught him to speak, read, and write the French language fluently. He must've obviously spoken his local dialect - Ubangian and possibly learnt English later in life.

History states that he was courted by a number of world leaders, for access to the numerous minerals in Congo, during his rule. I believe this MAY have led to him picking up on a few other languages but not necessarily speaking them fluently.

Mobutu was between 1.87m (6′1) and 1.90m (6′3).

He had at least twenty-two children:[73]

With Marie-Antoinette (first wife): Niwa, Phillip, Ngombo, Manda, Konga, Ngawali, Yango, Yakpwa, Kongolu, Ndagbia (9)

With Bobi Ladawa (second wife): Nzanga, Giala, Toku, Ndokula (4)

With Kosia Ladawa (mistress, twin sister of his second wife): Ya-Litho, Tende, Sengboni (3)

With "Mama 41": Senghor, Dongo, Nzanga (3)

With Mbanguula: A son (1)

With an unknown woman from Brazzaville: Robert (1)

On trips across Zaire he appropriated the droit de cuissage (right to deflower) as local chiefs offered him virgins; this practice was considered an honor for the virgin's family.[74]

Footnotes

[1] Mobutu Sese Seko - Wikipedia

Follow Lois Ochan

Related Links

How do Congolese currently view Mobutu Sese Seko?
What were the achievements of Mobutu Sese Seko?
How many languages did Stalin speak?

How tall was Zaire or Congo's Mobutu Sese Seko, which languages did he speak, how many children did he have?

Why does Mobutu Sese Seko have a long name? Was he born as “Mobutu Seko Kuku Ngbendu Wa Za Banga”?

How did Mobutu prevent the Balkanisation of the Congo?

Mobutu was the last relic of the Cold War in Africa to leave a legacy of chaos and corruption in Zaire (now the Democratic Republic of Congo), but what if Mobutu Sese Seko never came to power?

Did Adolf Hitler have any type of normal sex life?

Was the Democratic Republic of the Congo (Zaire) better during the Mobutu years or the post-Mobutu years?

How tall was Adolf Hitler?
How many languages does the average African speak?
Was Hitler really 5.9" tall?

Why did SS recruits have to be at least 180 centimeters tall if Hitler himself was only 175 centimeters tall?

If a child is raised by parents who speak different languages, will the child always speak the mother's language first and use it more often?

Was Adolf Hitler physically strong?

What has President Mobutu achieved during his reign?

Chris Huffman · Follow 2y

Well, the guy has been dead 20 years but he is not forgotten. There is even a current ‘movement’ to bring his body back to the Congo for a proper burial in his homeland. What I see and hear from Congolese friends that grew up with Mobutu is a muffled approval of his conduct after many, many years. It is the whole “it could be worse” issue..or it actually is/was worse. Mobutu sese seko kuku nbendu wa za banga lives in the hearts of many Zairois.

Who is worse, Mobutu or Kabila?

Claudio Oliveira · Follow Mar 15

I don’t understand how it could be anyone other than Kabila.

They both were/are great thieves. But at least Mobutu kept order. At least he did something in return. Kabila does nothing at all. Or he holds a motorcade parade while his country is burning, not unlike Nero playing his lute. He was and remains (for all intents and purposes) a pseudo-president. The DRC is not a "democratic republic" — it is an undemocratic anarchy.

There is this bird in Europe, called a cuckoo, and it lays an egg inside another bird's nest. The newborn cuckoo then parasites off that nest.

Could someone please explain to me why a teenage "Joseph Kabila" was posing here with Rwanda's national security advisor general James Kabarebe?

At the same time, Laurent Kabila's biological daughter was assassinated while his son had to flee abroad amidst accusations of being an imposter who wanted to commit a coup.

Why did Mobutu Sese Seko declare the Tutsis should be banished from Zaire?

Kevin Richardson · Follow

PhD in History, The University of Texas at Austin Dec 17

The law in question, I think, is Mobutu's decree (really) of 1981 that rescinded citizenship from all banyaRwanda. Most of these were "Tutsi" by classification, and they had come in waves following the "Hutu" takeover of Rwanda. Under the leadership of a charismatic Grégoire Kayibanda, democratically elected Hutus took control of government and Parliament. That revolution which abolished the monarchy, established for the first time in the history of Rwanda a government-run by the majority Hutus. As a result, thousands of Tutsis who were members of the repressive regime, including their Umwami (King), fled to neighboring countries of Uganda, Congo, and Tanzania and beyond. The immigration of so many people—hundreds of thousands—led to pressure on the land and a strong "nativist" reaction. The reasons for taking a stand against banyaRwanda (and Tutsi in particular) in North Kivu, however, was for (local) electoral and simple stability reasons; by siding with the local, territorial leadership against "interlopers," he was shoring up his own base in a potentially unstable region. By 1993 things had deteriorated so badly that local people had organized militias to "cleanse" the local area of "invaders" (The Rwandan Patriotic Front (RPF), Rally for Congolese Democracy (RCD) or Democratic Forces for the Liberation of Rwanda (FDLR). From that point, ethnically-based fighting spilled wholesale out of Rwanda and Burundi and into eastern Zaire. The result was a variety of parties assaulting each other and, eventually, turning their attention to Mobutu himself.

Photo Illustration by Brigette Supernova/The Daily Beast.

(Peterson & Edward S. Herman's The Politics of Genocide and Enduring Lies, both books give a readable basic overview of one of the messiest periods of this entire cluster-you-know-what that was "whatever Mobutu touched."

TL,DR: Nativist politics in a multi-ethnic polity.

Follow Kevin Richardson

Related Links

Why did the Hutu dislike the Tutsis and vice versa?

How did the Rwanda Hutu's identify who were Tutsis, Bantus, Congolese, etc., when the Rwanda terror massacre happened in 1994?

How can one tell whether someone is Hutu or Tutsi?
What do the people of Rwanda think of Kagame as their leader ? (Both Tutsis and Hutus)
Who won the civil war in Rwanda, the Tutsi or the Hutu and how?

Why is Rwandan President Paul Kagame silent on the Kipupu massacre perpetrated by the Ngumino rebel group (supported by Rwanda) which killed 220 people? Are Ngumino in Eastern Congo are there to protect Banyamulenge-Tutsi ethnic group?

Is Kagame Hutu or Tutsi?

How do the Rwandan neighbors (in particular Burundi, the DRC, Uganda and Tanzania) consider or view Rwanda and its leadership under Paul Kagame?

If Paul Kagame doesn't support Rwandan rebel group in Congo, then why did he threaten to kill former Tanzanian President, Jakaya Kikwete for advising him to negotiate with the Hutu rebels so that African Great Lakes can find peace in the region?

Why did the Hutus hate the Tutsis? And what did they think of the Twa?
Why do the Hutus hate the Tutsis?
What are relations like between Tutsi and Hutu peoples in Rwanda in 2015?

How did Belgium's colonisation of Rwanda lead to ethnic or religious strife (most likely, the 1994 genocide)? Did the Belgians introduce the racial hatred amongst the Tutsis to massacre the Hutus in 1950s?

What evidence is there that DRC president Joseph Kabila is a Tutsi from Rwanda?

What caused conflict between the Hutus and the Tutsis?

What is the history of Mobutu Seseko?

Chris Spencer

.
Follow
Former Campaigns Officer (2008–2010)2y

There was no such person. If you mean Mobutu Sese Seko, read the Wikipedia article. Mobutu Sese Seko - Wikipedia

What was Mobutu secrets about the Congo?

Françoise Marie

.
Follow
Master's Degree in Public Administration, Syracuse University1y

https://www.cia.gov/library/readingroom/docs/DOC_0000680536.pdf Mobutu and the Congo : CIA Special Report - Weekly Review CONGO: Recovering Mobutu's Ill-Gotten Gains

How did Mobutu prevent the Balkanisation of the Congo?

Helen Okins

.

Follow

Bachelor in Leadership and Governance, Leadership Academia University1y

First. Who was the person of Mobutu? This man was not an ordinary person. He owned a fiercely independent character in many way :

1. Personality: You are afraid of him from far and near since in his own land. And outside of Zaïre
2. Government: He maintained for years a monopartism of governance. Only MPR was recognized for many years as the unique political party. Multipartism was banned

He had a personalized diplomacy

He was a military man

He claimed to be an authentic nationalist

He even campaigned for his doctrine “Recours a l’authenticité” meaning “back to our traditional & social system as black African Congolese “

He clearly said many times that he didn’t want westerners to be involved in his country (Zaire and the Zairanization) governance

He would have never allow the Balkanization of Zaire as he carried this country as his own Endless necessity. See, until death will set us apart

He kind of maintained a respectable relations with his borders (the 9 countries) even if they hide dark conflicts until the sudden entrance of AFDL. None of them could defeat Mobutu. The man was powerful in many ways

Why did Mobutu Sese Seko support the South African apartheid government?

Philip Machanick

·

Follow
Works at Rhodes University1y
He was a corrupt thug who invented the concept of kleptocracy and, to stay in with Western powers, adopted a stance of anything-but-Soviet including developing relations with China. Since the apartheid regime claimed to be anti-Communist, he was able to get on friendly terms with them as well as other dictatorial regimes.

Positive proof that, whatever you think of Stalinism and the USSR as a failed state, "anti-Communism" is not a valid counter. Follow Philip Machanick

What happened to president Mobutu Sesotho Seko's alleged fortune of millions of dollars after his death?

Brent Monday · Follow History buff, but interested in religious discussions. 3y

Originally Answered: What happened to president Mobuto Sesotho Seko's alleged fortune of millions of dollars after his death?

There were many rumors in the late 90's that the fortune Mobutu had squirreled away was in the billions of dollars. This was not the case, although, billions of dollars probably ran through his hands.

He used the Concorde jet as a personal jet and even had a runway built to accommodate the Concorde at his estate in Equator…his home district in DRC. The thinking is that he spent most of the money to stay in a lifestyle that was far removed from the common folks of DRC.

If I am not mistaken, the Swiss government eventually returned several millions of dollars to the government of Congo. Returning money was always problematic because so many of the government leaders under Mobutu also had squirreled away ill-gotten monies and they had not interest in highlighting the amounts Mobutu had squandered.

I do know his children are scattered across the globe and none of them live in the kind of lifestyle that they had known while their father had been leader of DRC.

Related Links

What is the history of Kikuyu people?
What were the achievements of Mobutu Sese Seko?
Who was worse, Idi Amin, Jean-Bedel Bokassa or Mobutu Sese Seko?

How do Congolese currently view Mobutu Sese Seko?
Did Mobutu Sese Seko prevent Congo from becoming a communist state?
Who is worse, Mobutu or Kabila?
What is the history of kalium?

What went wrong with the History Channel? It seems nobody has any respect for it anymore.

What is the history of Munnuru Kaapu?
What is the history of Kamrunag?
What are some good examples of the phrase "history repeats itself"?

Was the Democratic Republic of the Congo (Zaire) better during the Mobutu years or the post-Mobutu years?

If you could go back in time and change one event in the history of the world, what would you change?

Why did Mobutu Sese Seko declare the Tutsis banished from Zaire?
How did Mobutu prevent the Balkanisation of the Congo?

Why more and more the Zairean flag is highlighted during the Congolese demonstrations? Are the arguments made by our compatriots to display this flag valid? What are the arguments that can justify the flag of the Mobutu regime?

Françoise Marie · Follow Master's Degree in Public Administration, Syracuse University 1y

The DRC is regarded by many as a vassal state of both Rwanda and Uganda. Mobutu would have never let it happen.

For countless Congolese, there is no fame in being from the DRC.

They were proud Zairians and now they see their once proud and strong country, the Zaire (the size of Western Europe), be at the mercy of Rwandan and Ugandan military and paramilitary forces.....

What are the arguments that can justify the flag of the Mobutu regime?

Mobutu was a strong man. During Mobutu's regime, Zaire was calling the shots in the Great Lakes Region. Mobutu and his Zaire were respected not only in the Great Lakes Region but all across Africa.

Even his worst enemies and opponents agree that Mobutu was a strong man that instilled fear and respect.

Mobutu's legacy: Show over substance

Yet for 32 years he was courted by the West, feared by his citizens and treated with respect by African contemporaries.

Mobutu was a charismatic ruler. Many Congolese really miss him because of his natural and personal charisma.

Revisited - Congolese nostalgic for era of Mobutu, the 'leopard of Zaire'

More than 20 years after the fall of the charismatic Congolese dictator Mobutu Sese Seko, who ruled the vast African country with an iron fist from 1965 to 1997, many Congolese look back fondly on the era of "Papa Marshal", as he was nicknamed. Our reporters went to DR Congo to explore the legacy of the longtime strongman.

Mobutu is fondly remembered for things he did right: Yes, President Mobutu was a dictator. But like all dictators, he did some things right. We are forever grateful for what he did right.

Territorial integrity: After years of chaos following the Congo independence, Mobutu achieved territorial integrity and prevented the balkanization of the Congo.

National consciousness : Mobutu instilled it in all us. We are proud to be part of a greater whole despite our ethnic and regional differences.

Authenticity: Mobutu managed to reconnect us all with our rich cultural heritage and pre-colonial history. Authenticity was a vast cultural reform program.

Promotion of arts: Mobutu personally promoted numerous artists, not only musicians but painters and sculptors. Congolese artists became famous worldwide because he financially supported them. Congo is ranked among the top African countries with remarkable art

How Congo’s Culture Can Move Forward Learning from the Past
Mobutu Is Building an ‘Authentic’ Zaire
What Mobutu Did Right
Legacy of Guile, Greed and Graft

By JOHN DANISZEWSKI AND BOB DROGIN MAY 17, 1997

The legacy is not all bad. Analysts say Mobutu helped preserve Zaire’s territorial integrity, especially when he used foreign mercenaries to quash a series of secessionist revolts early in his reign. Even critics say Mobutu's iron-fisted rule kept Africa's third-largest nation from splintering.

"Zaire went through many years of stability under Mobutu," said Vincent Farley, a former diplomat and Africa expert at the Carter Center in Atlanta, Ga. "I give Mobutu credit for establishing a national entity. It hasn't split apart."

Related Links

Zairean flag was the greatest and most unique African flag at the time. Why did the Congolese change their Zairean flag to DRC Flag? Aside from that, they should've kept the name too to avoid confusion with the Republic of Congo.

How would flying the former South African flag go down now in South Africa?

Why do both Congos (Democratic Republic of the Congo and the Republic of Congo) use the name "Congo"? And why are they separate?

Where does this flag belong to? I saw it some time ago in a demonstration in Barcelona. It looks like the reverse version of the Belgian flag (red in the pole then yellow and black) with a black goat in the middle.

Why was Zaire renamed as the Democratic Republic of Congo?
Why do some blacks claim that the original Arabs were black? What is their argument?

What do the 27 stars on the Brazilian flag mean?

Why was Zaire so much more stable and organised than the current Democratic Republic of the Congo?

Wearing a flag goes against the rules of the flag, but why is it ignored and considered patriotic rather than disrespectful?

Which African countries need to update their flag the most?

During the modern imperialism, did Germany really plant flags in Africa? So did they actually plant their flag there or is it figuratively? I think it is figurative?

Should Corsica and Sardinia change their regional flags to not offend the Muslim immigrants from Maghreb?

Has Belgium ever pair reparations for their Congolese genocide?

What does the star on the Ghana flag mean?

Is it reasonable to call it insurrection when the national flag is pulled down over government property and another nation's flag is put in its place?

Anthony M Anderson Student 1y · Follow

It wasn't mobutu who renamed the country Zaire into the democratic republic of Congo. It was Laurent Desire Kabila who did this in 1997, the same year mobutu was deposed by laurent Kabila's rebel group ADFL together with Uganda, Angola, Rwanda, Eritrea and Burundi during the First Congo War. After mobutu was deposed, Laurent Kabila became president and renamed the country the Democratic Republic of Congo.

Pétrole : Le Ghana a-t-il réellement découvert d'un gisement de pétrole ?

Jean Verpeaux , Toujours etonne par le politiquement correct Mis à jour le 20 janv. 2019

Le gisement de JUBILEE a été trouvé en deep offshore au Ghana en 2007 par Kosmos Energy sur une nouvelle thématique pétrolière dite de marges abruptes, qui a depuis été explorée à divers endroits dans le monde dont par Exxon qui a récemment fait de grandes découvertes en Guyana.

Il a été développé par son partenaire Tullow et est en production depuis 2010 suite à une développement accéléré (première phase avec un potentiel de 120.000 baril/jour). Après ce développement rapide et limité dont le but était de récupérer très vite les investissements d'exploration en attendant des projets plus ambitieux, l'opérateur a connu quelques vicissitudes qui ont conduit à une nette sous-réalisation des objectifs de production après 2012 ; l'évolution du cours de bourse de Tullow reflète d'ailleurs ces mésaventures. Le turret qui permet la rotation du FPSO (bateau de production) selon le courant et le vent a en particulier connu des problèmes, qui ont nécessité des travaux supplémentaires pour mettre en place un système d'ancrage fixe.

Il semblerait que la production de cette phase soit actuellement stabilisée au x environs de 80.000 baril/jour d'après le site de Tullow, ce qui paraît peu par rapport à la taille du gisement, annoncée initialement à plusieurs milliards de barils. Mais des phases additionnelles de développement sont à l'étude, toujours d'après Tullow qui parle de 180.000 baril/jour à brève échéance.

Un second gisement est en cours de développement par le même opérateur (Tullow) sur la licence de TEN (Tweneboa-Enyenra-Ntomme), et a commencé à produire en 2016 avec un second FPSO d'une capacité de 80.000 baril/jour, niveau maintenant atteint. Ce gisement est limitrophe de la Côte d'Ivoire et des développements additionnels sont sans doute possibles mais nécessitent un accord entre les deux pays ; les discussions semblent avoir bien avancé sur ce plan. Suivre Jean Verpeaux

Questions similaires

Comment le pétrole a été découvert ?
Qui a découvert que le pétrole pouvait fournir de l'énergie ?
Comment le pétrole a-t-il été créé par la planète ?
Pourquoi le pétrole fait pousser les villes dans le désert ?

En quoi le pétrole récemment découvert en Antarctique peut-il déstabiliser la géopolitique mondiale ?

Y aurait-il eu internet sans la découverte du pétrole ?
Comment investir dans le pétrole ?
Quel est le pays qui a le plus de pétrole ?

Pourquoi les puits de pétrole sont-ils surtout présent dans des milieux inhospitaliers comme des déserts ou au fond de l'océan ?

Est-ce que le pétrole de schiste est l'avenir du pétrole ?
Comment a été découverte l'essence ?

Pourquoi le Tchad est-il relativement pauvre, malgré ses riches gisements de pétrole, d'or et d'uranium ?

Quel volume de pétrole a déjà été extrait du sous-sol par l'être humain ? Combien en reste-t-il ?

Quel était le premier homme à découvrir le pétrole ?
Pourquoi le baril de pétrole Texan vaut-il zéro dollar ?

Pourquoi la Chine envoie-t-elle des forces anti-émeute aux îles Salomon ?

Mathis Flt · Suivre

Pour ce type de raisons : -pacte commercial entre la Chine et les îles,celles ci étant très pauvres elles cherchent le maximum d'aides financières.

-petite communauté Chinoises présente dans l'archipel, et donc sous le giron de Pekin. Ce sont des ouvriers qualifiés.

-puisque pacte économique il y a , Pekin achete la majorité des resources de l'île (métaux rares très convoités, ressources halieutiques).

-l'influence en Océanie de la Chine est également une des raisons pour lesquelles Pekin a envoyé des forces anti-émeutes, histoire de dire aux australiens qu'ils ne sont plus les seuls influents de la région.

en outre la Chine a investi dans ces îles pour la richesse de ses sous sols (investissement = machines , ouvriers qualifiés , logistiques et donc terminaux commerciaux / nouvelles liaisons aériennes).

l'instabilité politique des Salomon menace ces investissements et pourrait remettre en question les traités signés avec la Chine puisque l'opposition critique les méthodes d'extraction pratiquée qui détruisent la beauté de l'archipel. C'est pourquoi Pekin a utilisée la force, afin de protéger ses intérêts aussi bien stratégiquement que commerciaux.

j'espère avoir répondu au mieux à la question. Suivre Mathis Flt

Questions similaires

La Grande-Bretagne a rétrocédé Hong Kong à la Chine. Pourquoi n'en fait-elle pas de même pour les Malouines et Gibraltar ?

La Chine, Taiwan ou Israël autorisent l'utilisation de la géolocalisation des individus. Ne pensez-vous pas que ces dispositifs risquent de perdurer sous prétexte par ex d'assurer la sécurité de tous ? "Big Brother" arrive-t-il à grands pas?

La Chine a-t-elle dépassé la Russie du point de vue de la puissance militaire ?

Israël annexera la Cisjordanie le 1er juillet 2020 pourquoi la communauté internationale ne dit et fait rien face à cette colonisation illégale ?

Quels bénéfices pourraient tirer les habitants de Taïwan d'une réunification pacifique avec la République Populaire de Chine (et de l'abandon du statu quo actuel)?

L'administration Trump a soutenu les émeutes à Hongkong, peut on imaginer la Chine soutenir à son tour les manifestations des afro-américains réponse du berger à la bergère ?

Pourquoi la Chine a-t-elle des vues sur la Nouvelle-Calédonie ?

Pourquoi la Chine impose-t-elle une décision unilatérale en restreignant le droit de navigation dans le détroit de Taiwan ?

Pourquoi les émeutes aux États-Unis font plus parler et réagir les gens que le massacre des rohingyas, la répression des ouigours, leses bombardements au Yémen et autres conflits grave et majeurs dans le monde ?

Est-ce que la Chine profite de la situation de la Covid-19 pour mettre la main sur Hong Kong ?

Emmanuel Macron a-t-il un plan pour empêcher la Nouvelle-Calédonie de tomber dans le giron de la Chine ?

Algérie/France, Chine/Occident, Russie/OTAN, Corse/métropole française, Corée du Sud/Japon, Chine/Japon, les politiques entretiennent-ils du ressentiment, un désir de vengeance auprès de leur population ?

La Chine renoncera-t-elle un jour à ses revendications concernant les îles Spratleys et les îles Paracels ? Si ce n'est pas le cas, quelle serait la voie à suivre pour les pays voisins qui revendiquent également ces îles ?

Le contrat de 31 milliards d'euros signé entre la France et l'Australie pour la fourniture de 12 sous-marins est-il également un message envoyé à la Chine lui indiquant qu'ils ne lui laisseront pas le champ libre dans le Pacifique Sud ?

Pourquoi la France semble-t-elle si "anti-américaine" ?

Related Answer
Why did Mobutu Seseko renamed Zaire to DRC?

Anthony M Anderson , Student Answered Dec 14, 2020

It was Mobutu SeSe seko who renamed the country Congo Kinshasa in to Zaire in 1972, and then It was Laurent Desire Kabila into the Democratic Republic of Congo (DRC). Laurent Desire Kabila did this in 1997, the same year when Mobutu was deposed by laurent Kabila's rebel group ADFL together with Uganda, Angola, Rwanda, Eritrea and Burundi during the First Congo War. After mobutu was deposed, Laurent Kabila became president and renamed the country into the Democratic Republic of Congo.

Related Answer
What were the achievements of Mobutu Sese Seko?

Theophilus E.Daniel-Kagbare , Student of Africa Updated Jul 22, 2019

He achieved quite a lot.

One of the biggest thinkers of recent times.

Against the backdrop of Belgium King Leopold II's arm-chopping colonial experience, he was a ray of light in the dense jungle.

He rode the tide of history, in the heat of the Cold War, when side-kicks were much sought after by both sides, he positioned himself to great advantage. To himself.

He was patronized by America, aided by the CIA, hosted in the White House by Jack Kennedy, chartered the supersonic Concorde. Beloved by China.

How many sons of Gbadolite, his village, was or is that illustrous?

Mobutu, the quintessential kleptocrat

He transformed his place of birth into Africa's Versailles with an estimated $400million. Louis XIV would turn in his grave. He may well have outdone the Sun King himself.

He amassed a fortune of over $5billion while racking debt of about $14bn for his country.

He perfected the art of kleptocracy, and set the example for many African leaders, like Nigeria's Gen. Sani Abacha of Nigeria, Jammeh of The Gambia, etc., to follow.

"…When he left power he was universally excoriated as Africa's greatest kleptocrat," noted Mobutu's obituary in the Guardian in 1997.

He changed the country's name to Zaire; his name to an Authentic African name. From Joseph Desire to Mobutu Sese Seko Koko Ngbendu was za Banga (can you feel it?). In the spirit of Authentice he was not tainted by America's Enterprise, democracy; he cannot be accused of leveraging his contact with a succession of US Presidents to impact his country; unlike Felix Houphoet-Boingy of Ivory Coast, who was also massively used to undermine governments of surrounding countries, his personal friendship and connection with foreign leaders did not translate to economic prosperity.

Is nt that Nationalism?

He spread his horny seed around the country. Sadly, he stopped short of King Solomon's record.

Mobutu Sese Seko's life is a testament to the fact that the West actively undermined progressive, patriotic governments in Africa, like Patrice Lumumba's, which Mobutu overthrew. And propped up idiots like him.

He is a lasting monument to the works of the Central Intelligence Agency in Africa.

He is fondly remembered by his people:

"We are working because Mobutu is no longer alive. He was like my father. . I loved and worshipped him. He was not a dictator- he was a good man who wanted to unify people."

The above view is almost shared by foreignpolicy.com which describe him as a nation builder. No wonder there. He fostered foreign policy shenanigans for their patrons in Angola, Rwanda, etc, providing bases to launch mayhem. He built so well the nation crumbled under his watch and has been reeling from his legacy since.

He set many records from the back.

Related Links

What is the history of Kikuyu people?
What were the achievements of Mobutu Sese Seko?
Who was worse, Idi Amin, Jean-Bedel Bokassa or Mobutu Sese Seko?
How do Congolese currently view Mobutu Sese Seko?
Did Mobutu Sese Seko prevent Congo from becoming a communist state?
Who is worse, Mobutu or Kabila?
What is the history of kalium?
What went wrong with the History Channel? It seems nobody has any respect for it anymore.
What is the history of Munnuru Kaapu?
What is the history of Kamrunag?
What are some good examples of the phrase "history repeats itself"?

Was the Democratic Republic of the Congo (Zaire) better during the Mobutu years or the post-Mobutu years?

If you could go back in time and change one event in the history of the world, what would you change?

Why did Mobutu Sese Seko declare the Tutsis banished from Zaire?
How did Mobutu prevent the Balkanisation of the Congo?

Pourquoi la plupart des pays africains restent pauvres ?

Nancy Kawaya passionée de lecture; psycho, philo, dév.personnel... 4 ans J'aimerais juste proposer quelques pistes de réflexion pour mieux comprendre pourquoi les pays africains sont encore "pauvres".

D'abord il faut savoir que les pays africains ne sont pas pauvres, ils sont très riches en ressources naturelles! L'ironie c'est qu'ils sont pauvres parce qu'ils sont riches.

"Pourquoi les pays africains restent dépendants de l'Occident ?" Parce qu'ils sont "riches" mais ils ne savent pas gérer. Donc voilà, on nous aide à gérer nos ressources mais rien ne change! Alors on dit quoi ? Que fait l'aide au développement ? Où sont les diamants ? Où est l'or ? Où est le Coltan ? Où est le cacao ? Où est le cuivre? …

À qui profite le crime ?

Aux pays vers lesquels les resources des pays africains sont exportées, aux dirigeants africains, aux multinationales… Mais certainement pas aux africains eux-mêmes !!!

Il faut que nous nous fassions une opinion juste et claire.

Les africains ont besoin d'une vraie révolution parce que tout est fait pour que nous restions pauvres at vitam aeternam.

Dès que nous (les africains et les amoureux du continent) serons prêts mentalement et psychologiquement, l'Afrique sortira sa tête de l'eau!

Le problème c'est que nous attendons un libérateur mais comme dit le Che, le peuple se libère lui-même.

Suivre Nancy Kawaya

Questions similaires

Quels sont les pays du monde qui enfoncent toujours l'Afrique toujours plus dans la pauvreté?

Pourquoi la majorité des pays noirs sont pauvres ?

Quels sont les pays d'Afrique les plus riches, et quelle est la source principale de leur fortune?

À quoi ressemble la pauvreté dans votre pays ?
Pourquoi la plupart des pauvres restent-ils pauvres ?

Quels sont quelques exemples de pays qui sont rapidement passés de riches à pauvres ?

Pourquoi les Africains sont-ils pauvres ?
Quel pays africain donnerais-tu tout pour habiter ? Pourquoi ?
Pourquoi les pays africains sont-ils sous-développés ?
Y a-t-il un pays qu'on croit pauvre alors qu'il ne l'est pas ?

Comment l'Afrique est-elle devenue un continent qui représente la pauvreté, au lieu de l'abondance ? Les avons-nous "infantilisés" ?

Quels sont les exemples de pays qui sont rapidement passés de pauvres à riches ?

Pourquoi Madagascar reste-t-il un pays aussi pauvre, alors qu'il y a tant de richesses dans son sous-sol ?

Quel pays n'a pas de pauvreté ?

Comment expliquer que l'Afrique soit un continent si riche en ressources mais si pauvre économiquement ?

Qui sont les humains les plus méchants de l'histoire dont la plupart des gens n'ont jamais entendu parler ? Who are the most evil humans in history that most people have never heard of?

«Coupez la tête des hommes et pendez-les dans les villages, ayez des relations sexuelles avec les femmes autochtones et suspendez les enfants et les femmes à des croix.»

Hamid Sam Grand passionné de faits anciensTraducteur · 3 janv.

Sufyan Ahmad
Student chez Bachelor of Dental Surgery Degrees

Le roi Léopold II de Belgique à ses généraux, en référence aux habitants de sa colonie personnelle au Congo.

Un enfant victime des atrocités belges au Congo se tient aux côtés d'un missionnaire, Congo, ca. 1890-1910

Sa majesté le roi Léopold II.

Contexte:

L'État libre du Congo était un État privé d'Afrique centrale appartenant au roi Léopold II de Belgique fondé et reconnu par la Conférence de Berlin de 1885. Au cours des 23 années (1885-1908), Léopold II a dirigé le Congo, il a massacré 10 millions d'Africains par coupant leurs mains et leurs parties génitales, les flagellant à mort, les affamant dans les travaux forcés, détenant une rançon pour les enfants et brûlant des villages. La partie ironique de cette histoire est que Léopold II a commis ces atrocités en ne mettant même pas les pieds au Congo. Sous l'administration de Léopold II…

Un Congolais regarde la main et le pied coupés de sa fille de cinq ans qui a été tuée, et prétendument cannibalisée, par les membres de la milice anglo-belge India Rubber Company.

(Imaginez-vous juste au lieu de cet homme)

L'homme en photo est Nsala.

La photographie a été prise par Alice Seeley.

Son récit écrit sur cette photographie se trouve dans le livre Don’t Call Me Lady: The Journey of Lady Alice Seeley Harris:

Il n’avait pas atteint son quota de caoutchouc pour la journée, alors les surveillants nommés par les Belges avaient coupé la main et le pied de sa fille. Son nom était Boali. Elle avait cinq ans. Puis ils l'ont tuée. Mais ils n’étaient pas terminés. Puis ils ont tué sa femme aussi. Et parce que cela ne semblait pas assez cruel, assez fort pour défendre leur cause, ils ont cannibalisé Boali et sa mère. Et ils ont présenté à Nsala les jetons, les restes du corps autrefois vivant de son enfant chéri qu'il aimait tant.

La société ABIR Congo (fondée sous le nom d'Anglo-Belgian India Rubber Company et plus tard connue sous le nom de Compagnie du Congo Belge) a été la société désignée pour exploiter le caoutchouc naturel dans l'État indépendant du Congo. ABIR connut un essor jusqu'à la fin des années 1890, en vendant un kilo de caoutchouc en Europe jusqu'à 10 fr qui ne leur avait coûté que 1,35 fr.

Des hommes se tenant la main séparés des victimes.

Un prêtre catholique cite un homme, Tswambe, parlant du fonctionnaire détesté de l'Etat Léon Fiévez:

De tous les corps tués sur le terrain, il fallait couper les mains. Il voulait voir le nombre de mains coupées par chaque soldat, qui devait les apporter dans des paniers… Un village qui refusait de fournir du caoutchouc serait complètement nettoyé.

Une illustration tirée de «Le Congo et la fondation de son État libre; une histoire de travail et d'exploration».

Sous le règne de Léopold II, la faune unique du Congo était un jeu équitable pour le sport tué par presque tous les chasseurs qui pouvaient réserver un passage et payer un permis de chasse.

Le roi Léopold II a également été représenté dans «Heart of Darkness» de Joseph Conrad. Suivre Hood Homie

Questions similaires

Qui, dans l'histoire, a tué le plus grand nombre de personnes à lui seul ?

Quelle est la chose la plus troublante jamais faite par un personnage historique populaire et que la plupart des gens ne connaissent pas ?

Qui était l'homme le plus méchant de l'histoire ?
Qui est la personne la plus étrange dans l'histoire de l'humanité ?

Qui est une personne qui est passée inaperçue dans l'histoire et qui n'aurait pas dû ?

Qui a été la personne la plus malchanceuse de l'histoire de l'humanité ?
Qui était le pire homme de l'histoire ?
Selon vous, qui a été la personne la plus rusée de l'histoire ?
Pourquoi les humains sont-ils si méchant ?

Qui dans l'histoire est considéré comme une mauvaise personne alors qu'il ne l'est pas en réalité ?

Quelle personne dans l'histoire mérite que ses actes soient connus ?
Quel a été le jour le plus anormal et incroyable de toute l'histoire de l'humanité ?

Qui est la personne la moins importante de l'histoire dont nous avons probablement tous entendu parler ?

Qui sont les humains les plus pervers de l'histoire dont la plupart des gens n'ont jamais entendu parler ?

Quelle est la personne la plus célèbre de l'histoire dont nous ne savons vraiment pas à quoi elle ressemble ?

Related Answer
Besides Congo and Zaire, are there other names for the Congo River?

Chris Spencer Lived in Democratic Republic of the Congo (1973–1991) 1y

It is called various things in local languages - though most of them just translate as "the river." In Kikongo it is nzadi, which is the origin of the name Zaire. Upstream of Kisangani, it is known as the River Lualaba, while the most distant source is the Chambeshi River.

Related Links

Why did the Democratic Republic of the Congo change its name from "Zaire" to "Congo" when there is another country with the name "Congo"?

What are 5 good facts on the Congo River?
Why do many Congolese love the Congo River?
Why was Zaire renamed as the Democratic Republic of Congo?
What is the importance of the Congo River?
What is the history of the Congo River?

Should the Democratic Republic of Congo and the Republic of the Congo be renamed "East Congo" and "West Congo" just like Germany had done before?

What is so special about the Congo River?
What is the difference between Congo Brazzaville and Congo Kinshasa?
Why is Congo called Brazzaville?
Who came up with the name Congo river?

Why do both Congos (Democratic Republic of the Congo and the Republic of Congo) use the name “Congo”? And why are they separate?

Why did Zaire cease to be the name of what is now the Democratic Republic of Congo?

Should DR Congo be partitioned?
Why congo river is dangerous?

Related Answer
What is the main cause of the conflict in the Democratic Republic of the Congo?

John Prendergast

Activist. Author. Enough Project & Satellite Sentinel Project Co-Founder. Special Advisor - Not On Our Watch. http://www.enoughproject.org/7y

There is no single cause of conflict in the DRC. The conflict in Congo is a complex web of inter-connected needs, interests, and grievances that exist not only domestically in Congo, but also externally in neighboring states, such as Rwanda and Uganda, that have historically been involved in influencing Congolese politics, economics, and national security to protect their own perceived interests in the region.

The primary drivers of conflict in Congo can be broken down into three over-arching categories: political, economic, and military. Politically, conflict is driven for consolidation of political power that allows for access to state resources and revenues—usually for personal profit. This conflict is driven between groups with various political, tribal and/or ethnic affiliations and is played out at local and national levels. Economically, conflict is driven by the government, rebel groups, and external actors for control over Congo’s vast natural resource wealth, including some of the worlds largest strategic mineral reserves. This conflict is played out primarily in Congo’s eastern provinces and southern Katanga province. Militarily, conflict is driven due to the government’s inability to extend complete control over its security services. Deep divisions within the military, as well as individual corruption and opportunism have created a national army that has been implicated in large-scale theft, extortion, human rights violations, and mutiny. This conflict is played out primarily in the east and in Kinshasa. As a sum of their parts, these various drivers of conflict have lead to chronic instability and conflict in Congo.

Related Answer

Why did the Democratic Republic of the Congo change its name from “Zaire” to “Congo” when there is another country with the name “Congo”?

Phillip Scott, former Lifeguard, Aquatic Manager and human observer
Answered Jul 11, 2017

It is named after the region that associated with Congo river. Further before it was Zaire it was “The Republic of Congo”. It is same nomiculture used to name the “"United States of America”, “"United Arab Emerites” and "Union of Soviet Socialisr Republics”.

In 1965 Joseph Motibu came to power changing Countries name to Zaire and his own to Mobutu Sese Seko. He came to power through coup and was strongly supported by USA despite never been democratically elected. When he lost power they reverted to old name though the Democratic was added to try give it more credibility though it's a dubious democracy at best.

Related Links

Why did the Democratic Republic of the Congo change its name from “Zaire” to “Congo” when there is another country with the name “Congo”?

What are 5 good facts on the Congo River?
Why do many Congolese love the Congo River?
Why was Zaire renamed as the Democratic Republic of Congo?
What is the importance of the Congo River?
What is the history of the Congo River?

Should the Democratic Republic of Congo and the Republic of the Congo be renamed "East Congo" and "West Congo" just like Germany had done before?

What is so special about the Congo River?
What is the difference between Congo Brazzaville and Congo Kinshasa?
Why is Congo called Brazzaville?
Who came up with the name Congo river?

Why do both Congos (Democratic Republic of the Congo and the Republic of Congo) use the name “Congo”? And why are they separate?

Why did Zaire cease to be the name of what is now the Democratic Republic of Congo?

Should DR Congo be partitioned?
Why congo river is dangerous?

Related Answer
What are you tired of explaining about DR Congo?

Andreas De Wulf Knows English Updated 1y

That just because you are not Black, you should still care about this place. Its people are some of the warmest on Earth! They don't dislike you because of your race or creed!

That just because you are Black, you don't automatically understand Congolese. You don't "make good" with them by pitying them or blaming dead white guys. You get good with them by making your voice heard so that they could finally have true democracy, and a Marshall Plan! And they don't care who has been killing them: Arabs, Belgians or fellow Blacks! As long as it STOPS!

Christmas in Congo among civil cervants, 1957 (rights reserved to Peter Verlinden's book "Paradise Lost — Being a Child in Congo")

That class has been a much bigger dividing line than race. Europeans could learn a lot from Americans and Africans as it relates to that. But Americans need to stop insisting the whole world is like them WRT racism. You can only understand European colonialism if you understand class. And you can only understand African suffering if you understand tribe. The strict racial segregation in Belgian Congolese bigger towns and cities (later copied by Apartheid South Africa!) itself was inspired by the (White-on-White) classism in Belgium! Commoner Belgians had no vote when Leo acquired the Congo in 1885. Heavy child labor was but abandoned after WWI.

One can only imagine what they were so giddy about. (L: Belgian King Baldwin ; R: Congolese dictator Joseph-Désiré Mobutu)

That Belgians with colonialist links are not necessarily racist at all. Some are!! But they are not homogeneous, and the very worst ones (like those who ordered Lumumba's murder) had no personal links to the Congo at all!! Basically blacklisting them out of the debate, to placate imaginary Congolese communists, perversely gives free reign to the sugar-tongued neocolonials in the suits. Having an occasional dumb or uninformed opinion is not racism. Neither Congolese nor Rwandans are snowflakes… Perhaps it is YOU who can actually only love them, if they are exactly like you?!

This man (E. Davignon)'s nickname was the "stagiaire plénipotentiaire"[1] (diplomatic intern — he was just 28 years old — with full powers to represent the Belgian state, without having to check back with Brussels first) at the time for foreign minister Pierre Wigny — but if you ask him (even this year 2019 — he's still working in his late '80s), "He was but a glorified janitor!" Nobody ever bothered him about it, presumably because he wears a suit and didn't officially want to have anything to do with colonialism anymore (just like his boss). Belgium for ya.

That Belgians were not chased out of the Congo because they were White, or not communist. They fled because the Belgian Army had in secret bombarded Matadi among other feats, to provoke violence so that Katanga (where most of the mines were, where the uranium for the Manhattan Project came from) would have an excuse to secede. Lumumba himself had asked for respect for those Belgians who too work for Congo's future. (~"And if their conduct [on a case-by-case basis], leaves much to be desired, we will expell them legally.")

"… And for your death warrant, sign here please." ((joke)) — Lumumba and Eyskens the Elder, respectively the Congolese and Belgian prime ministers on June 30 of 1960

That the Congolese my grandparents lived "next door" to in the Northeastern jungles in the '50s, were normal, decent, politically unaffiliated people whom you could talk to… They were as purely African as you could get. But they were also practical ; rather than ideological. As were my grandparents — having just emerged from the poverty of wartime occupation 5 years prior. Neither side had any trouble adopting something superior to what they knew! We are all a bunch of undeserving sassy sissies as compared to those generations' legacies.

Not our family photo album, but it could have been. This is 10 years before Martin Luther King could only still dream of White kids and Black kids playing hand in hand. (And yes I'm well aware that didn't happen everywhere!! Which proves my point that "the" colonialism didn't exist. There were many "colonialisms" simultaneously.)

That it's shameful to label Africans as "Uncle Toms" or "Uncle Ruckus's" because they don't think like you do. In actuality, some of those Black people who could bridge racial divides did more good for their people than those who sat at the sidelines pouting!

These were Congolese diaspora in Belgium protesting with a flag often used by the Dutch-speaking far right opposition, just to stick it to the corrupted, soft-spoken powers that be. ("The enemy of my enemy…")

THANK YOU FOR READING !!! HAPPY 2020 !!!

Footnotes

[1] "Congo 1964: het gaat om oorlogsmisdaden"

Related Answer

Besides Congo and Zaire, are there other names for the Congo River?

Chris Spencer

Lived in Democratic Republic of the Congo (1973–1991) 1y

It is called various things in local languages - though most of them just translate as "the river." In Kikongo it is nzadi, which is the origin of the name Zaire. Upstream of Kisangani, it is known as the River Lualaba, while the most distant source is the Chambeshi River.

Related Links

Why did the Democratic Republic of the Congo change its name from "Zaire" to "Congo" when there is another country with the name "Congo"?

What are 5 good facts on the Congo River?
Why do many Congolese love the Congo River?

Why was Zaire renamed as the Democratic Republic of Congo?
What is the importance of the Congo River?
What is the history of the Congo River?

Should the Democratic Republic of Congo and the Republic of the Congo be renamed "East Congo" and "West Congo" just like Germany had done before?

What is so special about the Congo River?
What is the difference between Congo Brazzaville and Congo Kinshasa?
Why is Congo called Brazzaville?
Who came up with the name Congo river?

Why do both Congos (Democratic Republic of the Congo and the Republic of Congo) use the name "Congo"? And why are they separate?

Why did Zaire cease to be the name of what is now the Democratic Republic of Congo?
Should DR Congo be partitioned?
Why congo river is dangerous?

Related Answer
What is the main cause of the conflict in the Democratic Republic of the Congo?

John Prendergast

Activist. Author. Enough Project & Satellite Sentinel Project Co-Founder. Special Advisor - Not On Our Watch. http://www.enoughproject.org/7y

There is no single cause of conflict in the DRC. The conflict in Congo is a complex web of inter-connected needs, interests, and grievances that exist not only domestically in Congo, but also externally in neighboring states, such as Rwanda and Uganda, that have historically been involved in influencing Congolese politics, economics, and national security to protect their own perceived interests in the region.

The primary drivers of conflict in Congo can be broken down into three over-arching categories: political, economic, and military. Politically, conflict is driven for consolidation of political power that allows for access to state resources and revenues—usually for personal profit. This conflict is driven between groups with various political, tribal and/or ethnic affiliations and is played out at local and national levels. Economically, conflict is driven by the government, rebel groups, and external actors for control over Congo's vast natural resource wealth, including some of the worlds largest strategic mineral reserves. This conflict is played out primarily in Congo's eastern provinces and southern Katanga province. Militarily, conflict is driven due to the government's inability to extend complete control over its security services. Deep divisions within the military, as well as individual corruption and opportunism have created a national army that has been implicated in large-scale theft, extortion, human rights violations, and mutiny. This conflict is played out primarily in the east and in Kinshasa. As a sum of their parts, these various drivers of conflict have lead to chronic instability and conflict in Congo.

Related Answer

Why did the Democratic Republic of the Congo change its name from "Zaire" to "Congo" when there is another country with the name "Congo"?

Phillip Scott , former Lifeguard, Aquatic Manager and human observer
Answered Jul 11, 2017

It is named after the region that associated with Congo river. Further before it was Zaire it was "The Republic of Congo". It is same nomiculture used to name the ""United States of America", ""United Arab Emerites" and "Union of Soviet Socialisr Republics".

In 1965 Joseph Motibu came to power changing Countries name to Zaire and his own to Mobutu Sese Seko. He came to power through coup and was strongly supported by USA despite never been democratically elected. When he lost power they reverted to old name though the Democratic was added to try give it more credibility though it's a dubious democracy at best.

Related Links

Why did the Democratic Republic of the Congo change its name from "Zaire" to "Congo" when there is another country with the name "Congo"?

What are 5 good facts on the Congo River?
Why do many Congolese love the Congo River?
Why was Zaire renamed as the Democratic Republic of Congo?

What is the importance of the Congo River?
What is the history of the Congo River?

Should the Democratic Republic of Congo and the Republic of the Congo be renamed "East Congo" and "West Congo" just like Germany had done before?

What is so special about the Congo River?
What is the difference between Congo Brazzaville and Congo Kinshasa?
Why is Congo called Brazzaville?
Who came up with the name Congo river?

Why do both Congos (Democratic Republic of the Congo and the Republic of Congo) use the name “Congo”? And why are they separate?

Why did Zaire cease to be the name of what is now the Democratic Republic of Congo?

Should DR Congo be partitioned?
Why congo river is dangerous?

Related Answer
What is it like living in Congo?

Neethu , Lived in Congo for 6 years Answered Jun 3, 2018

I have lived in Congo for 8 years.. I t was an amazing experience.. Initially when I came with my husband, took sometime to adiust. But made good friends and the Indian community here is really good..They welcome new people and guide them well.. Yes there is the problem of security. If u have a good driver it's all good.

Sometimes during elections we had to go for holidays to India.. As the situation was not good.. Yes, still we can't walk on road freely, people tend to rob you. So better be with your driver.

Loved the culture and few cuisines. Love thier dressing style. Their hairstyles. Most are them are friendly.. If we learn the local language Lingala, Its really helpful.

Related News
Is living in Kinshasa (Congo) difficult?

Aurrou, lives in Kinshasa, Congo Answered Mar 24, 2020

Overall yes, it is.

But it also depends on your expectations, how long you want to stay and what you need to feel good. In my opinion what is difficult:

Not being able to walk around: there are no public parks, no proper pedestrian side walks and everyone is hustling in the street.

Everything is energy consuming: because of the safety issues, you need to be careful when you take transportation and/or call a taxi driver you know and wait between 5 and 30 minutes for him to come; going to the streets is exhausting because everyone is hustling; traffic jam everywhere all the time (but Sundays).

Electricity and water supplies are unstable which impact your daily life if you do not have a tank and a generator.

Eating well at a reasonable cost: I am vegetarian and I found it difficult to include variety in my diet. I would get the local veggies from the market and always eat the same food when I would go out. There are many other options at the supermarket but it is extremely expensive.

Overall the quality of life is low, you need a great salary to maintain the living standards you are used too (Western Europe).

But as I said it depends on your expectations, if you are looking to get out of your comfort zone and discover an intriguing country, you will enjoy your time.

Related Links

Are there parts of DR Congo that haven't been explored?

Should the Republic of the Congo and the Democratic Republic of the Congo unite to form one country?

What is it like living in Congo?
Is it safe to live in Kinshasa, DR Congo?
Why DR Congo is so poor?

Should DR Congo be partitioned?
Why is Congo the poorest country in the world?
What is Isiro in DR Congo?

Should the Democratic Republic of Congo and the Republic of the Congo be renamed "East Congo" and "West Congo" just like Germany had done before?

What is Bandundu in DR Congo?
How good is DR Congo for expats?
What are the main activities in Isiro, DR Congo?
What is DR of congo's stand over Islamophobia?
Why are there 2 Congos in Africa? Could they ever unite into 1 nation?
Is living in Kinshasa (Congo) difficult?

Related Answer
Are there parts of DR Congo that haven't been explored?

Andreas De Wulf, knows English Updated May 21, 2021

By Central African Forager Peoples ("Pygmies")? Who have been living there for 10,000s of years? Probably not.

Other Black people, who are there only since a couple of 1000 years, tend(ed) to live in interspersed villages. They are reluctant to venture too far into the rainforest.

White people followed in their trail.

So it's not unthinkable that some patches have been left out. Or (more likely) that many patches have been occasionally visited every X years by a hunter who got lost, without consequences… So there could still be unidentified species hiding there.

A few years back (2012), a new monkey (the first in 28 years) was 'discovered' (although it was known to local hunters) in Lomami province (which isn't even that remote):

New monkey discovered

Scientists say they have discovered a new species of monkey living in the remote forests of the Democratic Republic of Congo.

https://edition.cnn.com/2012/09/12/world/africa/dr-congo-new-monkey/index.html

Here's a fun anecdote to illustrate that the answer is most likely 'yes':

Also in 2012, a completely untouched and nearly-intact fighter-plane, which had crash-landed in WW2, was found in Egypt — a country of close to 100 million.

Frozen in the sands of time: Eerie Second World War plane discovered in the Sahara... 70 years after it crashed in the desert

Somebody then tracked down its (vaguely described) location:

Having found the crash site location for myself, I can now reveal that bit about it being 200 miles from the nearest town is completely untrue.

The crash site is a mere 31.3 miles from the centre of the nearest town.

More over it is just 6.5 miles from the nearest asphalt road and only 26 miles from the nearest village.
(WWII P-40 Fighter Plane found in the Western Desert, Egypt.)

Related Answer
Should the Republic of the Congo and the Democratic Republic of the Congo unite to form one country?

Gilbert Nii-Okai Addy, Guitarist : Classical, Jazz, World Music Answered Jul 12, 2018

By the same token , should Ghana merge with the Ivory Coast , Burkina Faso and Togo into one country ?

Senegal and The Gambia - ethnically the same people - did try to merge once and that attempt was monumentally unsuccessful .

As a Senegalese friend once said to me ethnicity is not the same thing as culture and we Africans find it hard if not painful to acknowledge that , culturally , our colonial experiences have changed us in myriad ways .

According to thus Senegalese friend , the Senegalese and Gambians are ethnically the same people but have been made different by the different colonial systems they experienced and the cultural legacies they left behind .

In Cameroon, there is a poorly reported civil war going on today because the anglophones - who elected to join Cameroon rather than Nigeria - in the West if the country want to break away from the francophone majority .

What is most likely to happen in West Africa over the next 50 -80 years , by the end of this century, is that the population explosion underway in Nigeria is going to overwhelm all the countries in the ECOWAS region and countries like Ghana , Togo and Benin -and possibly even the Ivory Coast west of Ghana , will inevitably become Nigerian in all but name , assuming they even continue to exist , which is by no means guaranteed .

In Central Africa , there is a similar demographic explosion underway in the DRC which will inevitably overwhelm the Republic of Congo.

Fifty years from now this question will be either very academic or very irrelevant.

GNA

BREAKING NEWS David-GDKmm Connaissances: Anglaismer.

L'artiste Maître Gims a offert une montre de la marque Audemars Piguet d'une valeur de plus 100 000€ au président Félix Tshisekedi, il n'existe que dix exemplaires de cette montre dans le monde.

Maître Gims a également offert deux disques de diamants au président congolais.

Grâce à la collaboration de Maître Gims avec la marque Audemars Piguet il a pu vendre les dix exemplaires de la montre dans un gala et a récolté une somme totale de 1 500 000€ directement reversé à l'UNICEF, un geste fort de l'artiste.

Wake Up Africa!
Democratic Republic of Congo (DRC) Great Potential in Healthcare Industry

Posted by Jayesh Saini Tue

With over two decades of conflict, DRC went through much damage to its infrastructure despite the great wealth and resources. Now, as calm and peace is taking effect, the government and the people of DRC are determined to build their country to a stable, economically endowed and prosperous nation. It is evident that healthy population is a key pillar in achieving that kind of a nation.

DRC has an estimated population of 85 million people as at July 2018 with 63% of the population being under the age of 24 and another 31% being between 25 – 54 years. This clearly shows that DRC is made up of a generally young population of productive ages. This is the population that must remain healthy to build the country to a latter glory. Remaining healthy is paramount for the rebuilding of the nation.

Being an investor, Jayesh Saini says there is great potential in healthcare industry – in development of infrastructure for pharmaceutical manufacturing, healthcare service delivery and also in providing health insurance solutions. He had observed that there is need for and willingness by the government to partner with private entities to boost healthcare development in the country, noting that many citizens of DRC travel to Kenya and other African countries to seek for health services which do not warrant such travel and could be easily availed if the infrastructure was developed.

The DRC economy has been growing steadily despite the previous adversities and having a world standard of healthcare system will easily attract foreign capital investment due to observed development and security resulting from a determined people to build their country. Currently, most of the medical services are provided by the government in a three-level system. Jayesh observes that as much as the government is doing a commendable job, there is a dire need for specialty and higher levels of health facilities to meet the health requirements of the country. He also noted that there is a great need for health workers especially nurses and doctors. This can be boosted by developing incentives to retain trained personnel and also through increased facilities. He believes encouraging more private sector participation is one way the needs can be met.

As the infrastructure is being developed, Saini says it is important to make the health financing more robust as currently about 40% of financing is done by individuals. With lack of strong insurance coverage, people rely on out of pocket payments, yet many individuals cannot afford and therefore avoid health facilities making health outcomes poor. The other source of financing is humanitarian assistance based foreign aid that normally targets outbreaks or specific diseases such as Ebola, HIV/AIDS and TB which have global funding. It should be observed that besides the outbreaks of Ebola, DRC health issues are easily treatable or manageable as they are mainly malaria, diarrheal diseases, malnutrition, lower respiratory tract infections, HIV/AIDS and tuberculosis. It should also be noted that the country still needs continued therapy for post trauma (war) related mental health complications and conditions.

Related Answer

Why was Zaire so much more stable and organised than the current Democratic Republic of the Congo?

Andreas De Wulf Knows English 9mo

Because Mobutu at least cared enough about his country not to allow it be colonized by:

- The Soviets (Simba rebellion),
- Mao's China (Kwilu rebellion),
- your occasional local prospective warlord,
- or the racist dictators in charge of certain countries to the DRC's east (Congo Wars)

And yes, those dictators don't see Congolese as equal humans. . . African cultural differences can be as large as American racial ones.

The chaos of the Congo crisis killed an estimated half a million in the early ‘60s… Mobutu, for all his many flaws, remedied that. When he was chased away in the 1st Congo War in 1997, the killing started anew. And didn’t stop until about 5 million souls expired… The deadliest event since WW2 globally.

You need strong leadership in a place as large and inaccessible as that — 1/3rd of the contiguous USA in land area. It’s inevitable.

The de facto ruler of the DRC over the past 20 years was Joseph Kabila — who inherited that position when his adoptive father Laurent was assassinated. There exists a curious photo of him as a teenager next to Rwanda’s longtime Defense minister. Small world! Many (if not most) Congolese see him as a pawn who forged elections to stay in power — and let Rwanda & Uganda do whatever they wanted in the East. (Including mining coltan — what goes inside your cellphone.)

Right: Joseph Kabila Left: James Kabarebe

For a long time, Kabila didn’t even speak any of the 3 languages spoken in the Congolese capital…

The regime in Rwanda, in particular, has had a policy of assassinating Congolese popular leaders each time one was emerging from the fray.

← Mamadou Ndala, one of those prospective leaders

During Mobutu's rule, Zaïre was still accessible. . . Mobutu didn't do much himself, but at least he didn't prevent others from being helpful.

For example, when a novel deadly virus struck near the Ebola river in 1976, a Belgian team of virologists and missionary nuns worked together with the locals of Yambuku to treat the ill and contain the outbreak.

All of that has fallen by the wayside due to anarchy.
When your village is raided and people lose limbs and the women are raped, the survivors become paranoid. That's why there have been reports of aid workers being attacked.

I can attest to a story of a Belgian (ex special forces) who was tasked by Doctors Without Borders to transfer a large shipment of measles vaccines across the DRC. The trucks broke down in some place. He had to scramble a replacement part in Kinshasa, hire a rental plane from the '80s (without autopilot — the pilots had to lean against the yoke the whole flight), land in a remote town on the main road (after local police cleared it from traffic)… only for the trucks to arrive just in time before the vaccines would have started melting. Those random events determined whether 100,000s were safe or not from a deadly measles outbreak. Undoubtedly, during other times, the Congolese weren't as lucky. Anarchy really is not remotely fun.

Recently there has been some premature good news (first time in 1/4 century!) in that it appears that a new Congolese president (Tshisekedi — a fraud too, but at least not a pawn of Kabila's) has increasingly consolidated power, blindsiding Kabila and his henchmen.

Related Answer
Why is Congo the poorest country in the world?
Michael Clay likes maps and geopolitics. 5y

The Congo actually isn't the poorest, believe it or not. I get what you're saying though; it's down there. Like, really down there. How did it get so fucked up?

Shortest answer: Europe.

Short answer:

This guy: King Leopold II of Belgium, aka, the Butcher of Congo.

Longer answer:

Between 1885 and 1908, what we now know as the Democratic Republic of the Congo was called the Congo Free State, and was more or less the personal property of His Majesty here. When Europe was carving up Africa at the Berlin Conference in 1885, he was able to wrangle the huge area for tiny Belgium by insisting that his existing venture there, the International Association of the Congo, was doing great things for the welfare and enlightenment of the natives.

And so, the rest of the European powers just kind of went along with it and let him have the region. Except it wasn't a Belgian colony or protectorate, like, say British Nigeria. It was essentially the property of Leopold himself through the IAC. This means that there wasn't really anybody around who wasn't on his payroll, and if you were on his payroll, it was probably wise to keep your mouth shut about, uh, you know…little things.

Like using mercenaries to force most of the population into slave labor—I mean, give the natives some honest jobs.

Or chopping hands off of disobedient or under-productive slaves—I mean, wisely punishing hooligans and parasites.

Or the general insanely brutal conditions that would lead to upwards of 20% of the Congo's native population dying by 1908.

Because Leopold didn't have to answer to anybody, his men were free to commit atrocities even more heinous than in the rest of the African colonies. The only reason the madness ended in 1908 was because of some investigations and publications that led to massive public outrage, the arrest of various officials, and Leopold officially handing the Congo over the Belgium's actual government. Things improved, but not by much; one of the main reasons the government took the land was because of various commercial interests that wanted to get in on Leopold's exploitation game.

Regardless, the precedent was set. Whatever native institutions that had been there were obliterated, and millions of people were taught that slavery and torture were the best ways to go about things, allowing warlords and dictators to replace colonial governors and keep region in a constant state of chaos.

The story of Africa as a whole is a tragic quagmire; the Congo is even more tragic because one man was left to wreak havoc unchecked for decades.

Related Answer
How poor is the Democratic Republic of the Congo?

Françoise Marie Master's Degree in Public Administration, Syracuse University2y

Originally Answered: Why was the democratic Republic of Congo poor?
You should absolutely read the following document to understand why the DRC, my country is poor in terms of level of income whereas it is one of the wealthiest countries regarding natural resources.

https://enoughproject.org/files/A_Criminal_State_Enough_Oct2016_web.pdf

A Criminal State

Understanding and Countering Institutionalized Corruption and Violence in the Democratic Republic of Congo

By Sasha Lezhnev (October 2016)

The Democratic Republic of Congo is not a failed state—for everyone. It is a failure for the vast majority of Congolese who suffer from abysmal security, health care, and education services. However, it is an efficient state for ruling elites and their commercial partners who seek to extract or traffic resources at the expense of Congo's development.

Over the past 130 years, Congo has had many elements of violent kleptocracy, a system of state capture in which ruling networks and commercial partners hijack governing institutions and maintain impunity for the purpose of resource extraction and for the security of the regime. Ruling networks utilize varying levels of violence to maintain power and repress dissenting voices.

From the days of Leopold to the present, top officials in Congo and their associates have created seven "pillars" of violent kleptocracy.5

They are:

1. Let the security forces pay themselves. Mobutu said, “You have guns, you don’t need a salary.”6 In order to prevent being overthrown by force, the regime allows army commanders to become wealthy by exploiting resources and citizens, thus fueling cycles of conflict.

2. Stay in power, or possibly lose everything. Leaving office can mean that regime-connected elites lose their ill-gotten gains and immunity from prosecution. Pro-democracy movements are thus repressed, often violently, as they are threats to the corrupt system.

3. Ensure there is little to no accountability for regime-connected elites. Impunity is the glue that holds the system together. Judicial systems target regime opponents or low-level figures, not high-level perpetrators of corruption or human rights abuses.

4. Create parallel state structures and co-opt rebel groups to weaken political threats. Parallel chains of command are set up to ensure loyalty; rebels are brought into the army without vetting or real integration. The bloated army then commits abuses and collaborates with armed groups.

5. E*nsure that high-level officials benefit from corruption. If appointed to a military post or government office, the official is expected to pass payments up the chain. This system, “rapportage,” has led the real tax burden for Congolese citizens to be around 55 percent.7

6. *Personally profit from natural resource deals, underspend on servi*ces, and hijack reforms. The regime receives bribes from certain outsiders to sell resources at very low prices, then outsiders flip8 them for large profits, depriving the Congolese state of massive revenue.9 Transparency reforms such as the Extractive Indsutries Transparency Initiative (EITI) help a bit, but the main vehicles for corruption—state-owned companies and their foreign shell company partners—remain opaque. The government deliberately underspends on public services, as its focus is on patronage.

7. Confuse everyone by creating uncertainty on policies in order to increase corruption. The government creates institutions that contradict its own laws or policies, and state agencies impose and collect their own taxes, which increases predation.

These “pillars” have made the Congolese state largely an institutional façade for an enterprise of theft and predation. This is why the government resists serious reform of its army, justice sector, and state-owned companies, which are at the heart of many crises in Congo.

You should also read the following article in order to understand that many Congolese poor are not that poor because figures are not always facts.

A new class | Future Cities

International companies opening up in Kinshasa face a mouth-watering future sales market. For the first time in many years, a Congolese middle class is emerging. People who can rent a house, buy a car, travel and shop.

The McKinsey Global Institute is calling Kinshasa one of the biggest growth markets in the world. Its youthful population (half of all Kinois are younger than 14 years of age) is one reason for this. The major reason, however, is that in ten years' time, twenty percent of all these young people will be earning a middle-class income (between 7.5 and 20 thousand dollars a year). Quite a phenomenon when you consider that, under Belgian rule, Congolese could only be educated up to the third year of secondary school. Mobutu also did his best, out of fear of critical voices, to avoid the rise of a middle class with real spending power.

In practice, the Congolese are not in quite such financial dire straits as the figures suggest Nevertheless, with an average annual income of less than 200 Euros, Congo is still the poorest country in the world according to figures from the International Monetary Fund. How can this be, in the light of McKinsey's prediction?

The first factor is, no one knows exactly what the average annual income in Congo is. Seventy percent of Congolese earn their living in the informal economy. So their earnings never appear on the official balance sheet. In practice, the Congolese are not in quite such financial dire straits as the official figures suggest. Two thirds of Kinois have enough money for a mobile telephone and to put credits on it.

As an assistant director you can earn two thousand dollars a month

Also, the economy has been growing at an annual rate of more than seven percent for some years now, putting Congo among the top ten fastest growing economies in the world. International companies that can see the potential in Kinshasa and set themselves up there are providing employment. No one knows how many jobs are being created in this way. Statistics are as hard to find in Congo as mountain gorillas in the Dutch countryside – even the real population of Kinshasa can only be guessed at. The figure on a hand-written note from the Census Ministry is three million less than a report from the United Nations.

https://home.kpmg/content/dam/kpmg/za/pdf/2017/12/DRC-2017H2.pdf

DRC Economic Snapshot H2, 2017

The country remains highly exposed to commodity price weakness, particularly in the copper mining sector. The informal sector accounts for more than 80% of the economy

Democratic Republic of Congo

Economic development in the DRC has been severely undermined by decades of instability and violence. Poor economic management aggravated by repeated political crises has constrained economic freedom and trapped much of the population in persistent poverty. Arbitrary taxation, poor infrastructure, marginal enforcement of property rights, and weak rule of law have driven many people and enterprises into the informal sector, which accounts for more than 80 percent of economic activity.

Related Links

Why is the Democratic Republic of the Congo so poor, and what is the solution?

Why is the Republic of Congo much more developed than the Democratic Republic of the Congo?

What is the difference between Congo and DR Congo?

What is the main cause of the conflict in the Democratic Republic of the Congo?

What is the Democratic Republic of the Congo famous for?
What is the difference between Zaïre and the Democratic Republic of Congo?

How did Joseph Kabila become the President of the Democratic Republic of the Congo?

How dangerous is the Democratic Republic of Congo?
How poor is the Democratic Republic of the Congo?
Would a nationalist Democratic Republic of the Congo be dangerous?

Should the Republic of the Congo and the Democratic Republic of the Congo unite to form one country?

Why did the Democratic Republic of the Congo change its name from “Zaire” to “Congo” when there is another country with the name “Congo”?

Is the Democratic Republic of Congo more like Angola or like Zambia?
Why was Zaire renamed as the Democratic Republic of Congo?

Did the Zarianasion of the Democratic Republic of Congo contribute to the fall of this country?

Related answer
Do native peoples in the Democratic Republic of Congo, Rwanda, and Uganda generally recognize that mountain gorillas are valuable living treasures which can also enhance their tourism industry?

Françoise Marie

· Follow Master's Degree in Public Administration, Syracuse University Mar 11

You may think that legedary ranger, Andre Bauma, is not from a "native tribe" of Congo. He is. He is world famous.

https://news.mongabay.com/2021/10/gorilla-baby-boom-sparks-hope-in-drc-but-threats-to-great-apes-persist/

For three years in a row, Virunga National Park in the eastern Democratic Republic of Congo (DRC) has been reporting new births in gorilla families.

According to park officials, the baby boom is thanks to conservation efforts in Virunga that have promoted wildlife development.

Conservationists warn that armed groups in the park still pose a threat to gorillas, as do moves to reclassify parts of protected areas for mining.

As a clear morning dawned on May 18, 2021, a baby was born. She was a gorilla, born to the Mapuwa family, one of 10 gorilla families in Virunga National Park, in the eastern Democratic Republic of Congo. A month later, news broke that another gorilla, Mafuko from the Bageni family, was born on June 6 in the park.

Challenges persist despite 'baby boom'

The Congolese Institute for Nature Conservation (ICCN) estimates that more than 350 gorillas live in the protected areas of Virunga, Kahuzi-Biega and Maiko in the eastern DRC.

These include eastern lowland gorillas (Gorilla beringei graueri), also known as Grauer's gorillas, and mountain gorillas (Gorilla beringei beringei). These gorillas face a triple threat: the destruction of their natural habitat by deforestation, danger from local and foreign armed groups in protected areas, and poaching encouraged by the illegal trade in baby gorillas.

The Congolese government has officially recognized community ownership of a conservation area linking two national parks in the Democratic Republic of Congo, giving hope for the survival of the Grauer's gorilla, a critically endangered species.

The gorilla, found only in DRC, faces threats from habitat loss, poaching for bushmeat, and the effects of lingering civil unrest in the region.

The Nkuba Conservation Area is co-managed by local communities and the Dian Fossey Gorilla Fund, with the latter providing jobs and training initiatives for women.

The years-long effort to develop the conservation area and now to maintain it points to the importance of engaging local communities in conservation.

In eastern Democratic Republic of Congo (DRC), critically endangered Grauer's gorillas (Gorilla beringei graueri) share their forest home with rural communities – which could help save their shrinking populations and habitat.

The DRC government officially recognized community ownership of three forest concessions, which combined are called the Nkuba Conservation Area, in April. The 1,580-square-kilometer (610-square-mile) patch of protected area, about twice the size of New York City, is situated between the Maiko and Kahuzi-Biéga national parks.

Legends and Legacies of Conservation in Africa

Moments. I have personally lost many of my colleagues and others have left their jobs as rangers. But our patience, courage and our sacrifice have enabled us to rise above these difficulties. Now we have many people who support the park and our work – it gives me great joy and pride to see it flourish once again. On a personal note, my children give me great joy. Every morning before I leave the house they ask me to say Hi to the gorillas and this makes me extremely proud. A Key Talent | First of all, I think endurance is one of my talents because it allows me to continue my work in spite of many difficulties. Secondly, I am disciplined. Thirdly, I work with a team. You shouldn't try to do things on your own; you need good people around you because strength comes from teamwork.And lastly, you cannot have fear. Fear keeps you from doing your work. My colleagues and I have experienced many difficult moments in Virunga National Park but fear is a bad thing in life and you cannot succumb to it. Lessons I Have Learnt | We have gone through many difficult moments with regards to the politics of this country. Before, there was corruption, disheartened rangers, lack of money; others quit their jobs. But I learned that if we continue to

https://www.thelegacyproject.co.za/2015/11/18/andre-bauma-ranger-orphan-care-taker-at-virunga-national-park/

Andre Bauma is a ranger and orphan care-taker at Virunga National Park in the Democratic Republic of the Congo. In 2014 Virunga: The Movie was directed by Orlando van Einsiedel, which focused on the conservation work of rangers within Virunga National Park and the activity of a British company Soco International, which began exploring for oil within the UNESCO World Heritage Site in April of that year. There are only 800 mountain gorillas left in the world and Bauma treats them like they were his own children, it is truly remarkable to see such a bond between animal and man. He is based at the Senkwekwe Centre which is the only facility in the world that cares for mountain gorilla orphans. The gorillas in this centre were victimised by poachers or animal traffickers and it is likely that they saw their family members getting murdered. Andre's late father, taught him how to care for animals and he wants to continue his legacy.

Episode 12: Andre Bauma & the mountain gorillas of Virunga

In this episode of Wild Lives by Faunographic we chat to Andre Bauma, a legendary ranger, guide and wildlife rescuer who has devoted his life to caring for the mountain gorillas of Virunga National Park, in the Congo.

Rodrigue Mugaruka Katembo - Wikipedia

Rodrigue Mugaruka Katembo (born 1976 in Katana, South Kivu, DR Congo) is a park ranger from the Democratic Republic of the Congo. He was one of the winners of the 2017 Goldman Environmental Prize for his work protecting Virunga National Park.[2] Katembo risked his life to uncover corruption in the attempts by SOCO International to drill for oil in the park. SOCO's presence threatened the survival of the critically endangered mountain gorillas of which an estimated 480 out the remaining 800 live within the park.[3] The video footage he secretly recorded of SOCO contractors was included in the Netflix documentary Virunga.[4] In 2020 it was announced that Leonardo DiCaprio was producing a feature film adaptation of the documentary; the film was being written and produced by Barry Jenkins.[5] As warden, Katembo has also faced illegal charcoal harvesters, armed poachers and multiple militias.[3]

Katembo's parents were Protestant farmers. At age 14 his hopes of becoming a pastor were thwarted when he was forced to join an armed militia. Katembo has stated that, although his time as a child soldier was traumatizing, he learned skills that later helped him protect against threats within the park.[3]

Ndakasi, a beloved mountain gorilla who went viral after posing for a relaxed selfie with rangers, has died after a long illness aged 14.
She passed away in the arms of one of the rangers who rescued her as a baby, Andre Bauma, at a gorilla orphanage at Virunga - Africa's oldest national park - in the Democratic Republic of Congo.

Mr Bauma rescued Ndakasi as a two-month-old in 2007 after poachers killed her parents. Ndakasi was still clinging to her dead mother when they found her.

With no relatives, rangers decided it was too unsafe to let Ndakasi back out into the wild. She was raised at the orphanage, where Mr Bauma is the manager.

Related Answer by Alex Sibley

I have spent over 10yrs volunteering and traveling in Africa Answered Mar 10

I can’t answer for the Congolese as I have never been to the DRC but I have been to Rwanda 3 times and been lucky enough to spend over 2 years in Uganda working for a charity that also organized gorilla trekking permits for its interested volunteers aswell as being even luckier to get to trek through bwindi impenetrable forest and observe a family of gorillas aswell as go on many safaris and visit a rhino sanctuary in Uganda and I can honestly say that the staff that work for the Ugandan Wildlife Authority in particularly (I may have got this name wrong) are passionate about protecting the wildlife in their countries and will go out of their way to protect the gorillas, rhino and all the other wildlife and educate the tourists and locals to try and change locals perspective on the value these animals play in both encouraging tourism and explaining the role they play in the ecosystem. Yes poaching is still a very real threat (both to the animals but also the staff who will risk their lives without a second thought in order to protect the animals they watch over) so while I can’t speak for everyone I believe that more and more East Africans are aware of the positive impact on tourism these gentle giants can have. But more so they love and respect these animals not just as a meal ticket. But as with most third world countries there will always be incredibly poor people who are just trying to survive. Aswell as the greed of the rich that only care about earning more money regardless of the result for the Ugandan wildlife. I hope despite my waffling that this has answered your question □□□

Related Links

What sparked the conflict in the Democratic Republic of the Congo? Did Paul Kagame's RPF from Rwanda enter eastern Congo and cause unfair crimes?

Why do many Congolese don't believe the fact that there were Rwandaphone chiefdoms in North Kivu (a province in East Congo) before the Belgian colonists who destroyed them?

Paul Kagame is seen as model leader for African states and turns Rwanda out of poverty into the "Singapore of Africa", but why many Africans from countries like DR Congo, Tanzania, Uganda and Burundi don't consider Paul Kagame as their model leader?

Is Rwanda responsible for the war in the eastern part of the Democratic Republic of Congo?
What country is preferred for gorilla trekking, Uganda or Rwanda? Why?

How can the Democratic Republic of Congo achieve its potential? The land is fertile and filled with natural resources, which could make Congo one of the most prosperous countries in Africa. How Can DRC overcome its factionalism and truly unite?

Why does Rwanda always seem to have problems with their neighbors, Uganda, Burundi and the DRC?

What is the best way to see gorillas in Rwanda or elsewhere in East Africa?

Why did Belgium create two tiny and demographically similar countries next to each other and next to a giant colony of their own in Central Africa? Why wouldn't they make Rwanda and Burundi part of DR Congo?

Zaire is significantly larger than Uganda and Rwanda combined. How were these two countries able to defeat Zaire, which Quels sont les animaux les plus terrifiants du monde actuel ?/What are the most terrifying animals in the world today?

AVERTISSEMENT : IMAGES POUVANT HEURTER LA SENSIBILITÉ

Vincent Person Master en Droit, Universités (Diplôme obtenu en 2015)
Traducteur · 6 mo

Edward McDonald Cette réponse peut ne pas être une traduction fidèle de la réponse de

Edward McDonald

Certains diront les tigres, les hippopotames ou les orques, mais pour moi, l'animal le plus terrifiant (en dehors des humains) est le chimpanzé.

Il s'agit en fait d'humains moins intelligents (mais tout de même très intelligents) et plus sauvages. Ils ont la force de déchirer littéralement les humains, leurs cris sont terrifiants et ils attaquent en groupe. Pour moi, mourir à cause d'un groupe de chimpanzés est 10 fois pire que de mourir à cause d'un tigre. Au moins, un tigre ferait le travail rapidement en me mordant le cou.

Il s'agit d'une femme qui a élevé un chimpanzé depuis qu'il était enfant, dans ses vieux jours elle lui a donné de l'alcool, de l'acide et d'autres drogues qui l'ont fait agir encore plus follement qu'un chimpanzé hors de son habitat naturel. Finalement, il a perdu la tête et a attaqué la femme. Je ne vais pas vous expliquer toute l'histoire, car elle est mieux expliquée sur YouTube, mais c'était horrible, je pouvais entendre les cris et le chimpanzé devenir fou.

Voici ce que le chimpanzé lui a fait. Ses yeux ont été arrachés, ses lèvres ont été arrachées et un os au milieu de son visage a été écrasé. Ce type d'attaque ne serait pas le résultat d'un tigre, ou d'un requin. Ils se contentent généralement de vous mordre et de vous laisser vous vider de votre sang. Une mort assez indolore comparée au fait de se faire frapper le crâne à plusieurs reprises sur le sol en béton, de se faire manger le visage et de se faire déchiqueter les lèvres. Elle ne pouvait même pas voir ce qui se passait car ses yeux étaient littéralement arrachés.

Gardez à l'esprit qu'il s'agit d'un seul chimpanzé, mais imaginez maintenant que cela se produise avec 20 chimpanzés. dans la nature, les chimpanzés forment généralement des groupes de 10 à 20 chimpanzés. imaginez que vous vous promenez dans leur habitat et que vous entendez des cris au loin, suivis d'un bruissement de feuilles. Vous levez les yeux pour voir 20 chimpanzés au loin, tous gémissant bruyamment et se balançant de branche en branche. Ils finissent par s'abattre sur le sol, vous foncent dessus à quatre pattes (ils sont bien plus rapides que les humains) et vous rattrapent, vous laissant le visage déchiqueté par 20 chimpanzés quatre fois plus forts que vous. Mais croyez-moi, leurs muscles sont énormes et très denses.

Voici des chimpanzés sans poils où vous pouvez voir à quel point ils sont musclés.

Response similaire
Quels sont les animaux les plus terrifiants du monde actuel ?/ What are the most terrifying animals in the world today?

AVERTISSEMENT : IMAGES POUVANT HEURTER LA SENSIBILITÉ

Vincent Person Master en Droit, Universités (Diplôme obtenu en 2015)Traducteur 6 mo

Edward McDonald
Cette réponse peut ne pas être une traduction fidèle de la réponse de Edward McDonald dans Quora en anglais :

Certains diront les tigres, les hippopotames ou les orques, mais pour moi, l'animal le plus terrifiant (en dehors des humains) est le chimpanzé.

Il s'agit en fait d'humains moins intelligents (mais tout de même très intelligents) et plus sauvages. Ils ont la force de déchirer littéralement les humains, leurs cris sont terrifiants et ils attaquent en groupe. Pour moi, mourir à cause d'un groupe de chimpanzés est 10 fois pire que de mourir à cause d'un tigre. Au moins, un tigre ferait le travail rapidement en me mordant le cou.

Il s'agit d'une femme qui a élevé un chimpanzé depuis qu'il était enfant, dans ses vieux jours elle lui a donné de l'alcool, de l'acide et d'autres drogues qui l'ont fait agir encore plus follement qu'un chimpanzé hors de son habitat naturel. Finalement, il a perdu la tête et a attaqué la femme. Je ne vais pas vous expliquer toute l'histoire, car elle est mieux expliquée sur YouTube, mais c'était horrible, je pouvais entendre les cris et le chimpanzé devenir fou.

Voici ce que le chimpanzé lui a fait. Ses yeux ont été arrachés, ses lèvres ont été arrachées et un os au milieu de son visage a été écrasé. Ce type d'attaque ne serait pas le résultat d'un tigre, ou d'un requin. Ils se contentent généralement de vous mordre et de vous laisser vous vider de votre sang. Une mort assez indolore comparée au fait de se faire frapper le crâne à plusieurs reprises sur le sol en béton, de se faire manger le visage et de se faire déchiqueter les lèvres. Elle ne pouvait même pas voir ce qui se passait car ses yeux étaient littéralement arrachés.

Gardez à l'esprit qu'il s'agit d'un seul chimpanzé, mais imaginez maintenant que cela se produise avec 20 chimpanzés. dans la nature, les chimpanzés forment

généralement des groupes de 10 à 20 chimpanzés. imaginez que vous vous promenez dans leur habitat et que vous entendez des cris au loin, suivis d'un bruissement de feuilles. Vous levez les yeux pour voir 20 chimpanzés au loin, tous gémissant bruyamment et se balançant de branche en branche. Ils finissent par s'abattre sur le sol, vous foncent dessus à quatre pattes (ils sont bien plus rapides que les humains) et vous rattrapent, vous laissant le visage déchiqueté par 20 chimpanzés quatre fois plus forts que vous. Mais croyez-moi, leurs muscles sont énormes et très denses.

Voici des chimpanzés sans poils où vous pouvez voir à quel point ils sont musclés.

Alors que la plupart des animaux prédateurs s'attaquent au cou pour tuer rapidement, les chimpanzés visent le visage, les mains, les pieds et les organes génitaux d'une personne.

Ce n'est pas du tout une façon très amusante de terminer ses jours.

EDIT : Il semble que j'ai eu tort de dire que la propriétaire a été attaquée, c'est en fait l'amie de la propriétaire qui a été la victime. La propriétaire est celle qui a passé l'appel à l'ambulance.

Alors que la plupart des animaux prédateurs s'attaquent au cou pour tuer rapidement, les chimpanzés visent le visage, les mains, les pieds et les organes génitaux d'une personne.

Ce n'est pas du tout une façon très amusante de terminer ses jours.

EDIT : Il semble que j'ai eu tort de dire que la propriétaire a été attaquée, c'est en fait l'amie de la propriétaire qui a été la victime. La propriétaire est celle qui a passé l'appel à l'ambulance.

Quelles sont les photos incroyables qui montrent à quel point le monde a changé en 100 ans ?

Ray Lancaster Formateur en communication et en langues (1995–aujourd'hui)
3 ans

Réponse originale : Quelles sont ces formidables photos qui illustrent à quel point le monde a changé en 100 ans ?

Cette photo ne surprendrait pas grand monde si elle avait été prise la semaine dernière dans une région peu urbanisée d'Afrique, à l'abri de tout smartphone, fake news ou colis Amazon, mais exposée à la pauvreté, la maladie, l'exploitation et l'analphabétisme.
Le fait qu'elle ait été prise en 1907, comme l'atteste la légende, surprendra encore moins.

La différence entre 1907 et aujourd'hui, cependant, c'est que les quatre femmes sur la photo ne sont pas en Afrique. Elles sont exposées dans une espèce de zoo humain à Paris.

Cette pratique aussi voyeuriste qu'odieuse était courante en Europe aux 19ème et début du 20ème siècles. Elle attirait des foules immenses de curieux.

Où est passé le général John Numbi de la République démocratique du Congo ?

Jerome Cohen Contradicteur polyvalent. (1970–aujourd'hui) 22 avr.

Réponse originale : Ou est parti le general JHON Numbi de la RDCongo ?

Selon Mediacongo:

Le «général» John Numbi est désormais en exil à Harare, au Zimbabwe, il y a de cela deux semaines, selon le tweet de l'Association Congolaise pour l'Accès à la Justice (ACAJ). « Le Gl JOHN NUMBI a quitté la RDC et s'est REFUGE au ZIMBABWE il y a 2 semaines! Son chargé de sécurité LUNDA wa NGOIE est arrêté. Le Gvt congolais et la Communauté Internationale devraient presser vite le Zimbabwe pr qu'il soit ramené en RDC » , lit-on sur le Twitter de Georges Kapiamba, coordonnateur de cette ONG.

Many countries were involved in the Second Congo War (e.g., Zimbabwe, Burundi, Uganda, Rwanda, Namibia, Angola, Chad, Sudan, etc.), but what were they fighting for?

Tywin Rokana Answered Jun 2, 2021

Yeww it's so sad to read misguided answers by people like KeAun Charles who obviously by the look at her profile is not African and doesn't live in Africa. She basically reduced the DRC war to a mindless war by greedy African countries fighting each other over resources and scores to settle. I think Quora should ask people to provide references when writing about foreign issues such as regional politics and conflicts. Am sorry to say KeAun Charles (an American) is not qualified to write on Southern African issues.

The DRC war was a SADC initiative to stop the Rwanda/Congo conflict from spilling into the traditionally peaceful SADC region. The SADC region is made up of countries in Southern Africa - Angola, Botswana, DRC, Namibia, Mozambique, Malawi, Zambia, Zimbabwe and South Africa. Of course, Tanzania joined later on.

As we all know, the Rwandan civil war is well known. Hutu rebels responsible for the Rwandan genocide fled to the DRC and Paul Kagame went in pursuit for them, sending a Tutsi army into Congolese territory. Due to the DRC being a weak/unstable country, the Rwandan militia starting advancing towards Kinshasa the capital city of DRC. Paul Kagame's plan was to unseat the DRC leader and take over the country.

It was at this point that the DRC president Laurent Kabila sought help from the SADC region. SADC is the brainchild of Robert Mugabe, the former president of Zimbabwe. DRC was lucky to have a Pan Africanist like Robert Mugabe at the helm of SADC, otherwise it could have been a different story.

The Chairman of SADC, Robert Mugabe organized a SADC army to bring peace to DRC and stop the advancing Rwandan rebels. The army was dispatched on time and it repelled the Rwandan rebels quite efficiently, preventing the imminent invasion of DRC by Rwandan rebels.

SADC countries which participated in the DRC war are Angola, Zimbabwe and Namibia. In terms of military strength and experience, Angola and Zimbabwe are basically regional powers. South Africa stayed out of the war as usual because Nelson Mandela was influenced by westerners. He was not much of a Pan Africanist but a traitor who wanted to see the fall of DRC to Rwandan rebels. This is a statement from the Financial Times archives (1998):

According to a Financial Times report, after talks yesterday in Cape Town with Namibian leader Sam Nujoma, South African President Nelson Mandela said Windhoek had agreed to halt military supplies to Kabila. "That may have been the situation before we met," Mandela suggested, "but I don't think President Nujoma is going to insist on that.

Basically, whereas Robert Mugabe was displaying regional leadership in an effort to maintain peace and prevent the invasion of DRC, Nelson Mandela was playing the westerner's puppet, opposing the intervention.

Westerners including NGOs criticized the intervention, which is quite baffling. Many times Africans are accused of not being able to help themselves, yet here were the westerners criticizing a SADC peacekeeping mission. Which tells me something. Westerners wanted to see bloodshed and chaos, so that they would come to exploit the situation, loot resources and prop themselves up as the "saviours". This trick has been used many times by westerners, not just in Africa but in the Middle East, Asia, Latina America and South America.

The facts are that the SADC intervention prevented a potential invasion of DRC that could have caused a lot of bloodshed and loss of life. The SADC forces are no longer in DRC but the DRC is still under threat, not just from the Tutsi militia, but from the Hutu rebels as well. Millions of women have been raped and killed in the DRC. Where is the western peacekeeping force which criticized the SADC intervention in 1996? It's nowhere to be seen, poooof, disappearing like wind.

The DRC war started in 1996. Fast forward to 2021. We have another conflict in Southern Africa. This time it's in Mozambique. The rise of ISIS and Al Shabaab in Mozambique began in 2017. Mozambique cant defend itself just like the DRC. The ISIS affiliated insurgents Al Shabaab have been inflicting random attacks on civilians since 2015, beheading, kidnapping and killing civilians. At one point 50 people were beheaded in a sports field. There has been more than 1700 attacks since 2017. Over 670,000 have been displaced by the war. In March 2021, dozens of civilians were killed and hundreds of tourists fled by bus and helicopter.

Al Shabaab Attacks in Mozambique since 2017:

People displaced by violence in northern Mozambique in 2020

*Data covers Cabo Delgado, Niassa and Nampula provinces

Source: UN Office for the Co-ordination of Humanitarian Affairs (OCHA)

BBC

Guess what? The US Secretary for African Affairs asked the Zimbabwean government to intervene in the Mozambican conflict. This is the same US government which criticized Zimbabwe for intervening in the DRC conflict. But Angola and Zimbabwe have declined. It looks like westerners have a short memory. Angola and Zimbabwe are not going to do any thankless tasks again.

As for South Africa, they are just a paper tiger which likes isolating itself in regional matters. They have not fought any real war.

Zimbabwe Defends DRC

Zimbabwe: Government defends DRC intervention - Angola

English News and Press Release on Angola and 7 other countries; published on 27 Oct 1999 by TNH https://reliefweb.int/report/angola/zimbabwe-government-defends-drc-intervention

History of DRC War Part 1

https://www.remzfamily.com/contemporary-history-of-dr-congo-part-1/

UN Fails to Disarm Hutu Rebels

UN-backed forces failed to disarm Rwandan rebels, say experts

UN efforts to disarm the Rwandan-Hutu rebels in the eastern part of the Democratic Republic of Congo have failed and international action is needed to restrict their financing, according to a new rep…

https://www.france24.com/en/20091125-un-forces-disarm-rwandan-rebels-hutu-dr-congo-africa

Al Shabaab Insurgency in MozambiqueMozambique conflict: Why are US forces there?

Islamic militants operating in the north have been the cause of growing concern in the region.

https://www.bbc.com/news/world-africa-56441499

US Secretary Asks Zimbabwe To Intervene in Mozambique

Zimbabwe Asked by U.S. to Help Combat Militants in Mozambique

(Bloomberg) -- The U.S. asked Zimbabwe to help put down an Islamist insurgency in neighboring Mozambique that's destabilizing a region rich in natural gas, people familiar with the matter said. The request came in a phone call between U.S.

https://www.bloombergquint.com/politics/zimbabwe-asked-by-u-s-to-help-combat-militants-in-mozambique

DR Congo Still Struggling Against FDLR Hutu rebels

DR Congo launches strikes against FDLR Hutu rebels

The Democratic Republic of Congo launches its first strikes as part of a long-awaited offensive against Rwandan Hutu rebels.

https://www.bbc.com/news/world-africa-31617135

Mandela Opposes Help for DRC Laurent Kabila

https://www.africa.upenn.edu/Hornet/irin_82198.html

Related Links

Could Mozambique authorities resist the Islamist insurgency in the north of the country? Or is it probable that the insurgents will step by step control more territories?

Is the Mozambique government using military conscription in the Cabo Delgado insurgency?

First it was Congo in the late 1990s to early 2000s, now it's Mozambique in 2021. Why can't the Rwandan Army stay within its own borders?

Is the Mozambique government going to ban Islam because of the insurgency in Cabo Delgado?

Why is the crisis in Mozambique being “ignored”?

Why is Rwandan President Paul Kagame silent on the Kipupu massacre perpetrated by the Ngumino rebel group (supported by Rwanda) which killed 220 people? Are Ngumino in Eastern Congo are there to protect Banyamulenge-Tutsi ethnic group?

Why is Portugal sending military troops in Mozambique? Does it always have many interests (economic, strategical) here since the independence of this country?

What was the situation in Portuguese Mozambique in 1972-1973 ? I have read that the insurgents were active in only a few provinces, that they were pretty much contained, and that they weren't a threat to the main cities. Is this true?

What is going on with the Islamist insurgency in Mozambique?

When we entered into Mozambique as refugees, my father lied about us being from Burundi, when we are Rwandans. Is there any way I can change it back, and be recognized as Rwandan?

CONGO FREE STATE
Quelle image avez-vous de la monarchie belge?

Céphas Sokegbe · Suivre Libre penseurMis à jour le 6 mo

Le génocide oublié, orchestré par Léopold II au Congo

Ces images sont un peu sensibles. Elles présentent des images du génocide orchestré par la monarchie belge bien sûr en Afrique précisément au Congo.

J'avais suivi un documentaire à propos, sur YouTube. Je me donnerai la peine de retrouver le lien, un jour peut être.

Ce soir en parcourant Facebook je retrouve une de mes pages préférées qui en repartage cette histoire. J'espère que ça vous apportera quelque chose.

Celle-ci me fend le cœur. Ce père avec une main coupée se tient assis face aux membres coupés du corps de son enfant.

D'autres images existent, mais c'est préférable que nous en restions sur celles là.

À quel moment les humains sont tombés aussi bas ? Et pourquoi au juste ?

Pour mieux comprendre lisez ce qui suit.

Le génocide oublié des Belges au Congo (10 millions de morts)

C'est un pan de l'histoire oublié. Un massacre de masse, une tuerie inouïe de cruauté. Plus d'un tiers de la population massacré.

Un système qui devait permettre au royaume belge de jouir des richesses économiques que procurait le Congo.

L'ouvrage "Il pleut des mains sur le Congo" (A lire) retrace un massacre de masse oublié dans les limbes de l'histoire, celui perpétré par l'administration belge du roi Léopolod II entre 1885 et 1908.

C'est un pan terrifiant de l'histoire souvent occulté. Probablement 10 millions de morts, un sacrifice humain inouï de cruauté, une véritable mécanique de mort mise en place pour permettre à un modeste royaume européen de satisfaire ses appétits économiques, tout cela sous la pression d'un monarque prêt à tout pour avoir sa part du "gâteau africain".

Conan Doyle dira à ce sujet que c'est " le plus grand crime de tous les temps"

Léopold II (1865-1909) est au cœur de l'ouvrage "Il pleut des mains sur le Congo", qui retrace les 23 années d'enfer "démocidaire" au Congo. L'enjeu ? L'exploitation de l'ivoire et du caoutchouc par l'administration belge.

Le titre de l'ouvrage fait référence à la pratique de cette même administration qui demandait de couper une main de chaque indigène tué, afin de justifier l'usage de chaque balle des fusils de ses fonctionnaires.

Le récit de cette monstruosité coloniale évoquée par Marc Wiltz — monstruosité qui a décimé un tiers de la population du Congo de l'époque — s'appuie sur les textes des explorateurs et écrivains de l'époque, tels Joseph Conrad, Conan Doyle ou Marc Twain.

La "mission civilisatrice" de l'Europe, d'une Belgique justifiant et occultant les crimes commis sur les populations indigènes du Congo, exterminées sans aucun d'état d'âme par l'homme blanc, est omniprésente dans ces pages sincères, et comme poreuses d'une abjection glaciale. Tout cela au nom d'un roi "humaniste" et "philanthrope", comme était alors perçu le roi des Belges.

Marc Wiltz offre avec cet ouvrage la compréhension d'un pan d'histoire oublié, voire renié et qui replace la part de ténèbres d'une Europe se revendiquant pourtant déjà des lumières, une Europe convaincue de sa supériorité sur les populations africaines, tant d'un point de vue politique, économique que moral. Une Europe qui n'a pourtant jamais voulu reconnaître ou réparer ce meurtre de masse, le premier de son histoire.

Arol KETCH avec Pascal Herard - 03.05.2021

La lecture de ce livre pourrait plus vous aider.

J'ai appris que récemment des monuments en Belgique qui faisaient l'éloge de la monarchie étaient enlevés ou détruites.

Personnellement je crois qu'on en a pas besoin. Pourquoi ?

Simplement parce que c'est l'histoire. Et on mérite de connaître l'histoire. Nos enfants ont besoin de la connaître. Il ne sert à rien d'effacer ou de vouloir renier.

Comprendre le passé, nous permet de mieux agir dans le présent pour préparer un meilleur futur.

Merci d'avoir lu.

Quelle est la capitale du Congo ?

Thomas , Intéressé par la géographie.

Répondu 28 sept. 2020 Tout dépend, deux États se nomment Congo.

La République du Congo a Brazzaville comme capitale.
La République démocratique du Congo (RDC) a Kinshasa comme capitale.
Fait intéressant, les deux capitales se touchent et sont uniquement séparées par le fleuve Congo.

Questions similaires

Comment expliquez-vous que les enfants scolarisés en Afrique ou à l'île Maurice etc.. aient un meilleur niveau que les enfants nés en France lorsqu'ils arrivent en France ? Je ne comprends toujours pas.

Quelles sont les différences au niveau de l'éducation entre les Nigérians et les Camerounais ?

Le problème de certains pays d'Afrique surtout francophone ne serait-il pas leur système éducatif ?

Quel est l'avenir d'un écolier haïtien ?
Que pensez vous du fait de système éducatif sénégalais ?

L'éducation finlandaise est toujours la première au monde. Quel aspect leur fait avoir le meilleur système éducatif au monde ?

Pourquoi le système éducatif finlandais est-il considéré comme le meilleur du monde ? Est-ce justifié ?

Pourquoi le système éducatif finlandais évite la compétitivité dans les écoles ?
Pourquoi Pix est désormais une certification de l'éducation nationale ?
Pourquoi le taux de réussite au bac 2020 est-il de 40% à Abidjan ?

AFRICA.

·

Follow Posted by Frank Abah Apr 28

He is George McLaurin the first b|ack man admitted to Oklahoma University in 1948, he was forced to sit in a corner away from his fellow wh!te men.

But his name remains on the honor list as one of the top three students in college.

These are his words:

" Some colleagues looked at me like I was an an!ma|, no one spoke to me, for teachers I didn't even exist, they rarely answered my questions. I dedicated so much to myself, that after my teammates started looking for me and teachers started taking me into consideration. I stopped being invisible to them ".

Education has more power than weapons.

Credit: United Africa.

CPJ-With DRC elections scheduled for next year, access to information and political news is critical for the Congolese public to make informed decisions.

Police officers are seen in the northeastern Democratic Republic of Congo on May 10, 2021. DRC police recently detained three journalists for more than a week in an insult case. (AFP/Alexis Huguet)

Dakar, May 10, 2022 — Congolese authorities should immediately drop all criminal proceedings against journalists Albert Muhila, Dieu Agba, and Patrick Gbondo, and reform the country's laws to ensure journalists are not jailed in connection with their work, the Committee to Protect Journalists said Tuesday.

On April 22, officers with the Congolese National Police Mobile Intervention Group arrested the three journalists, who work as reporters and presenters with the privately owned broadcaster Radio Mwana Mboka, at the station's office in the northwestern town of Bumba, according to a report by the local press freedom group OLPA and Radio Mwana Mboka program manager and chief of staff José Dossa, who spoke to CPJ in a phone interview.

Authorities released the journalists from Bumba Central Prison on May 4 after they paid 180,000 Congolese francs (US$90) each to Bumba prosecutor Fidèle Atafu, according to Agba, who spoke to CPJ via phone. He said Atafu told them each journalist was responsible for paying him a further 180,000 francs and he would call them within five days, but Agba said the journalists had yet to be contracted about the additional money.

Police said the journalists were detained in relation to a criminal insult complaint over an April 20 broadcast in which they all appeared, Agba told CPJ. He said police did not identify who filed that complaint. In that broadcast, guests of the program criticized the governing capacity and electability of politician Jean-Pierre Lihau Ebua, according to Agba, Dossa, and the OLPA. CPJ was unable to independently review that broadcast.

"Congolese authorities should immediately drop any legal proceedings against journalists Albert Muhila, Dieu Agba, and Patrick Gbondo and ensure they can cover issues of public interest without fear of arrest," said Angela Quintal, CPJ's Africa program coordinator, in New York. "With DRC elections scheduled for next year, access to information and political news is critical for the Congolese public to make informed decisions about their country's future."

Agba told CPJ on May 9 that he had not received any new information about the case, and no court date had been scheduled. When CPJ called Atafu on May 3, he confirmed that the journalists were in custody but said he could not provide further details on their case. He did not answer CPJ's subsequent follow-up calls seeking comment.

Jean-Pierre Lihau Ebua is the DRC's deputy prime minister, an elected representative from Bumba, and the minister of public service and modernization of public administration, according to Agba and a biography page published by the prime minister's office. CPJ called him for comment, but he did not answer.

If convicted of insulting a member of the government, the journalists could face up to one year each in prison under Article 136 of the Congolese penal code. Convictions for insulting someone not in government can carry up to two months in prison under Article 75 of that code.

When CPJ called Serge Mongolu, governor of Mongala province, which includes Bumba, he hung up as soon as CPJ asked about the arrests.

Wake Up Africa!
What are the mind-blowing facts about the Democratic Republic of Congo?

Answered by Samuel Muzeze May 11

DISCLAIMER: MY ENGLISH IS NOT PERFECT SO I APOLOGIZE FOR MISTAKES□□.

Let's go

It is the second biggest country on the continent of Africa after Algeria

It is home to more than 100Million people some stats go as far as +120Million

Kinshasa the capital is the capital of the country and it overtook Lagos as the most populous city in Africa in 2020 due to the fact that Kinshasa is experiencing a bigger growth than Lagos.

Despite the wars and destabilization, they have managed to have a gdp on par with Tanzania despite the contrast in good governance and peace between the two nations. ($50–60Billion)

It is classified as a super-diverse country.

It is a multi-ethnics country with more than 250 languages and dialects.

It is one of if not the richest country on earth in terms of Raw Materials ($24 Trillion worth of minerals).

It possesses the second lung of the world, namely the Equatorial Forest.

The Grand Inga Dam project will have the capability of providing half of the continent current electricity needs.

70% of the Allies bullets were made of Congolese Copper in WW1

The Uranium used in the two nuclear dropped on Japan was actually from Congo, precisely the ex-Katanga provinces, the Shinkolobwe Mine in present Haut-Katanga provinces.

(Under the Belgian Congo) The Force Publique (the colonial army, mostly made of congolese but with Whites officers and few if not any black officers) conquered Rwanda-Urundi and some part of Tanzania alongside the British Empire in their campaign against Germany in WW1

There is a market name Gambela in Kinshasa (Congo's capital) in honor of the siege of Saïo in WW2 which resulted in a Italian defeat in Ethiopia against the Congolese (Belgian Congo)

Congo have always been super influential in Africa, ranging from Fashion to Music

They produce more than 90% of the world's cobalt and possesses more than 70% of the world's Coltan.

They have the biggest reserves of rare Earth Materials in Africa.

They are the second African diamond producer with 14million carats a year after Botswana despite, once again the contrast of Industrialization of the sector. (Most diamonds mines in Congo are artisanal or semi-industrial where as in Botswana or even neighboring Angola, they are industrialized and are industrializing it).

They have the second longest river in Africa after the nile, the mighty Congo River.

(Under the Kongo Kingdom) They were one of the first one before European alongside the Songhai/Mali Empire of sailing, and settling in the Americas. Later they had multiple medium and small sized puppet states in Present-day Brasil the Qilombos.

Congo is one of the few nations on earth possessing its own wrting system, the Mandombe scripts

[illegible]

37. [illegible]

37. [illegible]

38. [illegible]

38. [illegible]

38. [illegible]

38. [illegible]

38. [illegible]

38. [illegible]

39. [illegible] 1977 [illegible]

There’s is more to say like the okapi or the gorillas but ill leave it to the comments !

Let’s finish this by some pictures alright ?

2/2

1960

1/2

@MACKWANTAS!!!

@MackWantashi

@MackWantashi

AFP: Tensions rise ahead of DR Congo presidential election

AFP - Yesterday 10:42 PM

DR Congo's presidential election is over a year away, but political tensions are escalating in the vast and volatile country as candidates line up and fears grow that the vote will be fraudulent.

Felix Tshisekedi has already declared he will stand for president again in polls planned for late 2023

Elections in the central African nation frequently turn violent, with dozens of protesters killed. They are also often criticised by observers.

But the last presidential election in the Democratic Republic of Congo, in 2018, heralded the first peaceful transfer of power in Kinshasa since independence from Belgium in 1960.

The vote was nonetheless marred by accusations of irregularities and the European Union and others cast doubt over its credibility.

According to official results, incumbent President Felix Tshisekedi won, replacing former leader Joseph Kabila after 18 years in power.

Tshisekedi has declared he will stand for president again in a poll planned for late 2023.

However, fears of tampering are already stalking the electoral process, and pressures around political circles in the capital have begun to mount.

Tshisekedi's ruling coalition in the national assembly recently rejected an amendment to electoral law that would have banned politicians from distributing money during campaigns, for example.

It also struck down an effort to force the publication of votes by polling station. At present, DR Congo's electoral commission publishes a single tally of results.

"With these rejections, the electoral law enshrines tampering and fraud," said opposition MP Claudel Lubaya.

Martin Fayulu, a politician who claims he was robbed of victory in the 2018 election, told AFP that if Tshisekedi wins the 2023 poll "the country will be at war".

Fayulu, along with former president Kabila, who retains swathes of popular support, have both announced that they will contest the coming election.

- Little confidence -

Runner up in the last presidential elections Martin Fayulu says 'the country will be at war' if the incumbent wins again

On May 10, the president of the constitutional court Dieudonne Kaluba was removed from his position after a process of drawing lots for the role.

The unusual method for picking the role had never before been used in the country, and it raised suspicion the government was trying to control the court, which has the final say over disputed elections.

Ex-prime minister Augustin Matata is also running for president next year

In November, the court under Kaluba had dropped a corruption inquiry into former prime minister Augustin Matata -- who is also running for president next year.

There are whispers of interference at the electoral commission too.

Prominent Catholic and Protestant groups in DR Congo recently criticised Tshisekedi for allegedly placing a close friend in charge of the commission, for example.

Tresor Kibangula, an analyst at New York University's Congo Research Group think tank, said recent developments do not bode well for the future.

"The process does not enjoy the confidence of many people," he said, referring to the run-up to the 2023 poll.

There are also doubts about whether the election will take place next year.

The electoral commission, for example, has complained of receiving "homeopathic doses" -- or insufficient funds -- to organise the vote.

The DR Congo is notoriously corrupt. It ranked 169th out of 180 nations on Transparency International's 2021 Corruption Perception Index.

And far away from Kinshasa, much of the east of the nation of 90 million people is also prey to myriad armed groups and civilian massacres are a regular occurrence. bmb/at/eml/bp

Kinshasa, May 25, 2022 — Authorities in the Democratic Republic of the Congo must hold to account those responsible for stripping and beating journalists Cédar Sabiti, Samuel Matela, and Junior Batu Ngole while they were detained, and ensure that the press can report and comment on matters of public interest freely and without fear of reprisal, the Committee to Protect Journalists said Wednesday.

Sabiti and Matela told CPJ by phone that on May 18, Freddy Sombo, the head of the National Intelligence Agency (ANR) in the northwestern province of Tshuapa, summoned Sabiti, a reporter for the privately owned Radio Tshuapa for Development, Matela, a reporter for privately owned Radio Liberal FM, and Ngole, a reporter for privately owned Radio Boende, for questioning at ANR's provincial headquarters in the capital, Boende. When the journalists arrived, Sombo yelled at them and accused them of tarnishing ANR's image during a May 17 radio program hosted by Matela called "Let's Talk About Education," Sabiti told CPJ.

During the program, Sabiti and Ngole were critical of alleged irregularities during last year's final examinations, which determine if students can go to college, and the prohibitive costs of those exams, Sabiti told CPJ. The three journalists denounced the alleged practice of some Boende schools in bribing teachers, invigilators, police, and intelligence officers to ignore cheating, and opined that the issues would be repeated this year.

Ngole told CPJ that Sombo then ordered his agents to strip the journalists and lock them in the ANR jail cells, where six officers beat the journalists with truncheons and deprived them of food for the rest of the day. Sombo did not answer CPJ's calls for comment.

"It is intolerable that radio journalists Cédar Sabiti, Samuel Matela, and Junior Batu Ngole were detained and subjected to cruel and degrading punishment by intelligence officers, who acted violently and unlawfully because their boss felt aggrieved about the journalists' commentary on a matter of enormous public interest," said Angela Quintal, CPJ's Africa program coordinator, in New York. "The Congolese government must act swiftly to stop the abuse of power by the country's intelligence agents, who appear to have become a law unto themselves. They should begin by disciplining and prosecuting these officers as a deterrent to others."

After a night in custody, the journalists were taken to the Boende High Court on May 19, where prosecutor Norbert Mampalanga interviewed them without a lawyer, said Sabiti. The prosecutor then ordered their unconditional release, as they had not committed an offense, according to Sabiti.

Matela was admitted to a local health clinic on May 19 and was treated for three days because of the beatings he endured in custody, according to Sabiti, who added that Tshuapa Governor Pancrace Boongo visited the clinic on May 21 to inquire about Matela's health. Boongo did not answer CPJ's calls for comment. CPJ could not confirm the details of Matela's injuries.

Gaby Kuba, national president of the National Press Union of the Congo, tweeted his condemnation of the assault on the journalists.

Tharcisse Kasongo Mwema, spokesperson for Congolese President Félix Tshisekedi, told CPJ by phone that he was out of the country and that the president was unaware of the journalists' alleged mistreatment by ANR agents. CPJ's repeated calls to Mampalanga and Matrick Muyaya, a spokesperson for the Minister of Communication and Media, were not answered.

David-GDK Une voiture 100% Made in Congo

Connaissances : Anglais 22 mai

Mad Max, c'est ainsi que les 12 apprentis ont baptisé le véhicule fabriqué à base de pièces récupérées, et dont la forme est inspirée du célèbre modèle du constructeur automobile britannique Land Rover.

Une voiture 100 % made in Congo. L'idée parait la folle, mais dans cet atelier de l'Institut Technique Industriel de Goma, dans l'Est de la RDC, on y croit. Ici, chaque élève connaît sa partition. Âgés de 15 à 20 ans, ils mettent les dernières touches à ce véhicule, après deux années de travail acharné.

"A chaque instant que nous avons un moteur à remettre en état, il s'agit d'un diesel, nous avons toujours une pompe d'injection qu'on doit vérifier son fonctionnement et se rassurer qu'il délivrait un début consistant en fonction des données des réglages" explique Crispin Muyalalo, enseignant à l'ITG.

Mad Max, c'est ainsi que les 12 apprentis ont baptisé le véhicule fabriqué à base de pièces récupérées, et dont la forme est inspirée du célèbre modèle du constructeur automobile britannique Land Rover. Pour arriver à ce résultat, ils ont dû faire face à de nombreuses difficultés matérielles et financières. Pas de quoi stopper les rêves de ces constructeurs en herbe, devenus source d'inspiration dans leurs communautés respectives.

"Lorsque nous avons sorti ce projet, nous avons constaté qu'il y avait de sentiments de joie dans des habitants de la ville et du coup tout le monde s'intéressait du projet , ils ont fait de la propagande sur les réseaux sociaux nous avons compris qu'ils avaient une intention, mais il nous faut du financement, ils peuvent avoir l'intention, mais comme il y pas encore du financement c'est rien , mais nous sommes sûr qu'avec le temps il y aura des investisseurs" souligne pour sa part Samuel Ntamwenge , élève congolais.

"Nous utilisons des éléments de récupération dorénavant déclassé donc il y a certains faits liés au budget qu'on ne serait pas en mesure de détailler, mais alors le projet nous a pris autour de 2500 dollars. On aimerait que par le bien de cette œuvre que le monde et la RDC sachent qu'il des talents en RDC est que des jeunes que nous encadrons sont en mesure de faire quelque chose de grand, parce qu'en partant des éléments de récupération, ils ont en mesure de matérialiser quelque chose de visible" renchérit Crispin Muyalalo, enseignant à l'ITG.

Ça y est, le moment est venu de prendre la route. Mad Max, qui répond aux normes internationales, fonctionne avec un moteur Diesel, tandis qu'un bidon installé à l'arrière fait office de réservoir.

Première phase de test réussie donc. Pour développer d'autres prototypes, les jeunes apprentis espèrent que le gouvernement congolais et d'autres investisseurs, les aideront à passer à l'étape supérieure.

DRC journalist Gauthier Sey Tshiang sentenced to one year in prison, fined over reports on public official

DRC journalist Gauthier Sey Tshiang has appealed his one-year prison sentence over his reporting on an official. (Photo: Gauthier Sey Tshiang)

Kinshasa, October 7, 2022 — Authorities of the Democratic Republic of the Congo should not oppose journalist Gauthier Sey Tshiang’s appeal of his sentencing to one year in prison and a financial penalty over reporting about a public official, the Committee to Protect Journalists said Friday.

On September 19, the Kinshasa Gombe Peace Court sentenced Gauthier Sey Tshiang, director of the privately owned online media outlet Netic News, to one year in prison for damaging imputations, or making statements to harm an individual's reputation, spreading false rumors, and fraud over his reporting on Jean Simon Mfuti Kiaku, acting director of the DRC's National Social Security Fund (CNSS), according to a copy of the judgment, which CPJ reviewed. The court also ordered Sey to pay US$10,000 in damages to Mfuti, who brought the case against the journalist, according to Sey and his lawyer, Guy Mafuta Kabongo, who spoke to CPJ by phone and messaging app.

Mafuta said that he filed an objection to the September 19 judgment because Sey was convicted in absentia, as the journalist could not be in the court for medical reasons. Sey, who has not been arrested, appealed the judgment and the case is due back in court on October 10, the two said.

"DRC authorities should not oppose the appeal of journalist Gauthier Sey Tshiang. He should have never been convicted or sentenced to one year in prison for his reporting on a public official," said Angela Quintal, CPJ's Africa program coordinator, in New York. "Congolese legislation should also be reformed to ensure journalism is not criminalized and reporters do not need to fear jail time for their work."

Sey told CPJ that Mfuti filed a complaint against him in February 2022 at the disciplinary commission of the Congolese journalists union, Union Nationale de la Presse du Congo (UNPC), and then at the Kinshasa Gombe Peace Court over his coverage of Mfuti's record.

Local media reported that the UNPC's disciplinary committee on March 9 barred Sey from working as a journalist for three months over breaches of professionalism under the Code of Ethics and Deontology of the Congolese Journalist, which regulates the press in the country. Sey told CPJ that he appealed the committee's decision and in the meantime continued to report.

Contacted via a messaging app, Merveilles Baelenge, reporting secretary of the UNPC disciplinary committee, told CPJ that Sey is allowed to continue reporting under the UNPC rules while his appeal is pending. Baelenge also objected to Mufti's complaint with the court. "I [made] it clear to Mufti's collaborators that [while] Sey's file is with our commission, it is not possible to prosecute Sey in court," Bayelenge told CPJ.

DRC soldiers attack journalist David Ramazani, police detain Janvier Bamunoba Democratic Republic of the Congo soldiers attacked journalist David Ramazani (right) and police briefly detained journalist Janvier Bamunoba in Bunia on October 20, 2022. Photo Credit: Ramazani)

Kinshasa, November 7, 2022 – Authorities in the Democratic Republic of the Congo should thoroughly and transparently investigate the soldiers who attacked journalist David Ramazani and the police who briefly detained journalist Janvier Bamunoba, the Committee to Protect Journalists said Monday.

Bamunoba, a camera operator with the privately owned Buniaactualité TV broadcaster, was at the airport in Bunia, the capital of eastern Ituri province, on October 20 to cover the return of musician J-Five Matete, who had recently won a competition in the capital Kinshasa, when police officers detained him, according to Bamunoba, who spoke to CPJ by phone, and news reports.

After learning of Bamunoba's detention, David Ramazani, the director of Buniaactualité TV and the Buniaactualité.cd news website, told CPJ by phone that he went to the airport to help his colleague.

When he arrived, three DRC armed forces soldiers in uniforms of the Republican Guard stopped him, refused to let him enter, slapped him, punched him in his face, and threatened to whip him if he continued to advocate for his colleague's release, according to Ramazani and a video of the incident taken by another journalist and reviewed by CPJ.

"Soldiers assaulting journalist David Ramazani as he advocated for the release of his colleague Janvier Bamunoba is a compounding and grim indication of how little respect DRC authorities have for the freedom of the press," said Angela Quintal, CPJ's Africa program coordinator, from Durban, South Africa. "Those responsible for the attack and harassment of journalists Ramazani and Bamunoba should be held accountable. Impunity must not continue to prevail in cases where Congolese journalists are victims of state violence."

Officers accused Bamunoba of filming a fight between a woman and a DRC Air Transport Authority (RVA) agent in an airport waiting room, which Bamunoba told CPJ he denied. Officers reviewed the journalist's camera and phone, and no images of the fight were found, Bamunoba told CPJ.

"Before my release, the police chief forced me to sign a waiver prohibiting me from publishing this fight in the media," Bamunoba said, adding that he was released with his camera and phone after four hours.

Ramazani told CPJ he has severe pain in his right eye and has received treatment from an eye doctor, adding that the soldiers "didn't even want to listen to me or see my press card that I was holding in my hand."

Abeli Mwango, Bunia urban police commander, told CPJ via messaging app that he was informed of Bamunoba's arrest via social media and had no further information. CPJ's calls to Johnny Luboya N'Kashama, the military governor of Ituri, rang unanswered.

According to a report by Amnesty International, military authorities have used their power to undermine people's rights with impunity, including the right to freedom of expression, since the declaration of a state of siege in North Kivu and Ituri province in May 2021, when all civil power was transferred to the army and police.

COUNTRY FACT FILE

Location
In The Center of Africa

Official Title of The State
Democratic Republic of the Congo: commonly referred to as DR Congo, Congo-Kinshasa or The Congo, is a country located in central Africa. It is the second largest country in Africa by area next to Algeria and the tenth largest in the world.
Republique Democratique du Congo (French)

Flag description:

Sky blue field divided diagonally from the lower hoist corner to upper fly corner by a red stripe bordered by two narrow yellow stripes; a yellow, five-pointed star appears in the upper hoist corner; blue represents peace and hope, red the blood of the country's martyrs, and yellow the country's wealth and prosperity; the star symbolizes unity and the brilliant future for the country.

Neighbours

Congo on W., Central African Republic, Burundi, Tanzania on E., Zambia, Angola on S. Land boundaries; total 10, 730 km. Border countries; Angola 2,511 km, Burundi 233 km, Central African Republic 1,577 km, Congo 2,410 km, Rwanda 217 km, South Sudan 628 km, Tanzania 459 km, Uganda 765 km, Zambia 1,930 km.

Founder of The Nation

Joseph Casavubu. Prior to European colonization, several native kingdoms had emerged in the Congo. The Congo free state was established in 1885 with Leopold

II of Belgium as absolute monarch. It became the Belgian colony of middle Congo in 1908. The Congo is strategically placed region at the centre of Africa, and because of its various mineral resources and its size. Congo (formerly Zaire) gained its independence from Belgium in 30th June, 1960, following a period of political instability.

Local division
26 provinces.

Government type Republic – presidential Legislation chamber Bicameral Parliament

Form of State Republic

President is both Chief of State and Head of Government. President is elected for a five-year term and is eligible for a second term. A unitary multi-party republic with two legislative bodies. The Senate 108 seats, members are appointed by provincial councils, and the National Assembly 500 seats, members are elected by popular vote to serve for five-year terms.

Executive branch

Executive President with a Prime Minister, Bicameral Parliament. Separated by chief of State and head of government. President elected by popular vote to serve for five-year terms without presidential term limits. Head of government is to be appointed by the president.

Former Rulers

1960-1965 Mr. Joseph Kasavubu, head of state
1960 to 1961 Patrice Emery Lumumba, head of government
1965-1997 Colonel Joseph Desire Mobutu (later known as Mobutu Se-se-seko)
1997-2001 Laurent-Desire Kabila Sr.
2001 – Present Joseph Kabila Kabange Jr.

Judicial chamber

Constitutional court ; Appeals court ; Civil courts & tribunals ; High Military Court.

Capital city Kinshasa Altitude 325 mtrs/1066 ft.

Geographic coordinates 4.19S , 15.18E. Located on the Congo river together with Brazaville, Congolese capital, making it the most populous transborder-metropolitan area. It was once named Leopoldville in honour of Leopold II of Belgium, the late ex-president Mobutu Sese-Seko in his coming to power initiated a policy of "Africanizing the names of people and places" in the country, and renamed it Kinshasa, in 1965, for a village named previously Kinchassa, that once stood near the site. It sometimes called Congo-Kinshasa (of the Congo), as usually opposed to Congo-Brazaville (of Congo Republic), while Kinshasa lies to the south of the Congo river, Brazaville lies to the north of the Congo river. Founded in 1881.

Names of main towns

Lubumbashi, Kissangani, Mbuji-Mayi, Kananga, Goma, Kolwezi, Likasi, Bukavu, Matadi, Mbandaka.

Date of independence

30th June, 1960

Religions (Major)
Roman Catholic 70%, Protestant 20%, Kimbanguist (form of Christianity) 10%, Muslim 10%, other (includes syncretic sects and indigenous beliefs) 10%.

Main spoken languages

French (official), Lingala, Kiswahilli, Tshiluba, Kikongo spoken.
Currency unit

Congolese Franc (CDF) =100 centimes

Area in Km2

2,344,858.00

Country area comparison in Africa

2 out of 55 states.

Demographic terms ;-

Average annual population growth rate 3.165 %

Birth rate 42.26 births per 1,000 populatio

Death rate 11.39 deaths per 1,000 population

Average life expectancy ; 54.73 years

Male 52.93 years ; Female 56.59 years;

Illiteracy rate (%)

Male: 16, Female: 48

Average per capita income

USD 300

Population density

7.2/km2

Urban population (%)

39

Contributor groups (%)

Farming, Fishing: 55, Industry: 11, Social service: 34 Main Export Items

Diamonds, Gold, Copper, Cobalt, Wood products, Coffee, Tea.
Economy is based on;-
Minerals and Agriculture. Very poor infrastructure due to administrative mismanagement and neglect. Limited exploitation of agriculture potential due to over-reliance on mineral extraction. Challenge of managing international mineral prospecting companies so that they give a better deal to the Congolese. Recurrent hyperinflation.

Climate

Tropical

Extremes;-

Lowest point; The Atlantic coast 0 mtr.

Highest point; Marguerita peak on Mt. Ngaliema 5,110 mtrs.

Weather of the Capital city (Kinshasa) average annual temperature 24.9oC.

Altitude
325mtrs/10ft

Hottest Month
March, April, 22-32oc.

Coldest Month
July 18-27oc.

Driest Month

July & August 3mm average Rf.

Wettest Month

November 221 mm average Rf.

Measures

Metric system.

Time zone

Kinshasa & Mbandaka 1 hour ahead of GMT/UTC. Shaba & Kashikima 2 hours ahead of GMT/UTC.

Public holidays

1 January (New year), 4 January (Martyrs of Independence), 17 January (Heroe's day), 1 May (Labour day), 17 May (Liberation day), 30 June (Independence day), 1 August (Parent's day), 14 October (Youth day), 17 November (Army day), 25 December (X-mas), All Christian holidays.

Ethnic groups

Over 200 African ethnic-groups of which the majority are Bantus, Mongo, Luba, Kongo (all Bantus), Mangbetu-Azande (Hamitic) make up about 45% of the population.

Topographic & Environmental concern

The Congo includes the bulk of the River Congo basin. The vast central low lying plateau covered by lands toward the N. and the high mountains on the E. surrounded the central region a short strip of territory borders the Atlantic ocean.

Dense tropical rainforest in central river basin and eastern highlands. The River Congo is 2,718 miles long & it's an outlet to the Atlantic ocean. Environment: poaching bush animals for dietry threatens wildlife populations; water pollution; deforestation; refugees responsible for significant deforestation, soil erosion, and wildlife poaching; mining of minerals (coltan - a mineral used in creating capacitors, diamonds, and gold) causing environmental damage.

Economy Overview

Industry

Mining, mineral processing, textiles, leather products, consumergoods products, food processing, cement, commercial ship-repair.

Chief crops

Coffee, cotton, rice, sugarcane, bananas, coconuts, manioc, mango, tea, cocoa, palm oil, cassava, root-crops, corn, fruits : wood products.

Natural resources

Copper, Tin, Gold, Cobalt, Manganese, Lead, Cadmium, Iron, Znc, Tungsten, Silver, Radium, Gem-diamonds, Uranium, Coal, Tantalum, Hydro-power, Timber logs and suspected deposits of Petroleum.

Land in use (%)

Arable land: 3

Grassland: 7

Forest woods: 77

Other: 13

Marine:

Coastline; 37 km, on the Congo River estuary (Muanda).

Commercial Sea port:-

The Main port is Matadi on the river Congo estuary (Muanda), it's the main outlet to the Atlantic Ocean. River transport services also used.

Development prospect;-

Even though Chinese contractors have broken ground on several projects linked to the $6bn mines-for-infrastructure deal signed with the Congolese state in 2007, which was amended in 2009 under pressure from the International Monetary Fund, execution has been slow. The China Railways and Sinohydro consortium still plans to finance $6bn in infrastructure projects and mining developments in exchange for access to 10m tn of copper and 600,000tn of cobalt through the Sicomines joint venture formed with parastatal mining company Gécamines. However, the largest mine managed by Sicomines, the one at Dikuluwe, is flooded, causing delays to all stages of its development. The government is working with the Chinese government and the World Bank to rehabilitate the country's dilapidatedrail infrastructure.

In May, the three partners launched a $600m effort to improve 700km of railway lines in Kasaï and Katanga provinces. In October, the government invited mining companies to come up with the $200m that had been promised by its Chinese partners but which had been delayed, in order to jump-start exports of copper and cobalt. The government praised for creating economic growth of about 6.5 percent in 2011 thanks to higher prices for copper and cobalt. National copper production rose to 500,000tn and is set to reach 700,000tn in 2015, more than two times the total in 2009. Cobalt production nearly doubled between 2010 and 2011, reaching 100,000tn. In June, production of zinc for the first half of 2011 rose to 9,200tn, which was the equivalent of total production of the mineral in 2010. That growth is not spread equally across sectors. The sole industrial diamond mining concern, the parastatal Minière de Bakwanga, halted its operations towards the end of 2008 and only slowly began to restart its activities early in 2011. Current production only represents about half of the record level of 35m carats reached in 2005.

New oil exploration on permits awarded in the Albertine Graben and Cuvette Centrale could generate substantial revenue. Brazilian firm HRT is convinced that the Cuvette region presents similar geological formations to the Amazon, where companies have made sizeable discoveries in recent years. Business Monitor International predicts output growth of 13.7 percent across the country's principal mining sub-sectors, including copper, cobalt and gold over the next three years. Gold will lead the way with an average of 25.7 percent growth due to new projects from Anglo Gold Ashanti and Randgold in Orientale province. In March, Canada's Kilo Goldmines announced that it had discovered 2m oz of gold at the Adumbi deposit at its Somituri project.

GDP growth was equally strengthened by the performance of the construction sector, which grew 10.1 percent in 2010, and services. They were followed by strong growth in agriculture, coffee production and logging. Exports grew to about $11bn in 2011 from $8.3bn in 2010. They should rise to $15bn by 2015, but such numbers are dependent on minerals and oil, which account for 97.2 percent of the total. The central bank says that the government's foreign reserves rose from $1bn in 2009 to $1.3bn in 2010 and were set to hit $1.5bn at the end of 2011.The financial authorities hope inflation, which averaged around 13 percent in 2011, will drop below 10 percent in 2012. The country's weak electricity supply is an obstacle to industrial and mining growth. The problems stem from the age of the Société Nationale d'Electricité's (SNEL) infrastructure and lack of maintenance at production facilities. An exceptionally dry year greatly reduced the capacity of the hydroelectric plants at Inga, aggravating other problems in the sector. President Kabila sacked SNEL's management for the company's poor performance in 2011. The mining industry may have no other choice but to install its own capacity of some 1,000MW by 2015, without which landmark projects like Tenke Fungurume, which plans to quadruple its current production to 100,000tn per year by that time, will not be possible. Contractors broke ground on four hydro-electric dams in 2011, the two most important being the 150MW project at Zongo II in Bas-Congo and the 64MW dam at Grande Katende in Kasaï Occidental. According to the energy ministry, they will not be operational for at least another three years.

Top 24 Richest And Poorest Countries Of Africa – 2020 Edition

By Stephanie Rheingold Last updated Oct 23, 2021

The Democratic Republic of Congo

Credit: Wikipedia

The Democratic Republic of Congo has a mixture of economic sectors such as mining, fishing, forestry, agriculture, and copper and cobalt. While the country's total GDP of $48.46 billion may seem high in comparison to other African countries, but that is mostly do to it's large population.

> With 89.56 million people living in the country, it bring the GDP per capita figure to an astounding low of $495.08. This places the country in the top ten poorest countries in Africa by that metric. Nonetheless, this country is a perfect example of a mixed economy that is trying to build towards the future.

According to the African Development Bank Group, growth dropped from 5.8% in 2018 to 4.3% in 2019, due to a slowdown in extractives, the economy's main driver despite a fall in the price of some raw materials (copper and cobalt). Agriculture has suffered from low productivity while energy shortages have hindered industrialization efforts. Growth has been driven by domestic demand, particularly private investment and public consumption, contributing even more to the social-economics gaps in the country.

Nominal GDP Rank: #11
Nominal GDP Per Capita Rank: #46

Was Zairianization a good move? (in the sense of the idea)

Alexander Roswilo

.

Follow
Previous location: Africa (1975 – 2019) Updated on 3 years
Undoubtedly under the BACKGROUND. Unfortunately, it was a total failure in FORM;

Above all, it is necessary to understand that Zairianization is not simply a cultural reform. It is a process of nationalization on the economic, cultural and social level [1].

[2]

In fact, such a process has not only been implemented in the Belgian Congo. But also in several other African countries. During independence, most African countries face a political, economic and social transition that requires major reforms. Economically, there will be … (more)

Footnotes
[1] THE ZAIRIAN EXPERIENCE: 2. ZAIRIANIZATION - Le Blog de Charles Kabuya
[2] Image on blogspot.com
Similar questions

Why was Rhodesia renamed Zimbabwe?

Why can't Africa be unified?

Why is the Democratic Republic of the Congo so unstable?

Do you think that the European "freedom in the hijab" campaign was a good idea and was France right to block it?

What peoples have valiantly resisted foreign domination and emerged victorious?

Is it true that Pétain was De Gaulle's mentor? Or is it a romanticized view of history?

Is it a good thing to have put an end to Operation "Barkhane" in Mali?

A town hall in Alsace will impose a fine of €1,000 for throwing rubbish on public roads. Is this a good or a bad idea?

If France has no interest in Mali, why is TotalEnergies sending equipment there by sea?

What was the real purpose of Zairianization?

Why are Kinshasa and Brazzaville separated by the Congo? Were they a single city before, and why don't the 2 Congos form a single one?

Alain Bausart · Follow Location: Liège, Belgium 1 year

These two countries have never been united.

They were both founded at the end of the 19th century by the colonizers. Their limits were set arbitrarily by the Europeans, without taking into account the opinion of the Africans.

North of the Congo River: it was the French Congo, which became the Republic of the Congo. (colloquially Congo-Brazza). Capital Brazzaville. (braza)

South of the river: it was the Belgian Congo, which became: Congo-Leo, Zaire, finally the Democratic Republic of Congo (colloquially Congo-Kinshasa). Capital Léopoldville became Kinshasa.

These two capitals are built on the banks of the Congo River, which is the main river in this region. And what a river! 2km wide between Brazzaville and Kinshasa; eighth longest river in the world but the second for its flow.

Although they are only four km apart and are the 2 closest capitals in the world; these 2 cities do not seem to have a significant relationship between them. In any case: there is no bridge.

Similar questions

What is the Congolese economy (DRC) missing to take off?

Why is the Democratic Republic of the Congo so unstable?

Why don't Congo Brazzaville and Congo Kinshasa merge to form a united Congo?

What is the capital of Congo?

Why do sub-Saharan Africans treat North Africans as if they are not Africans?

What is the political and economic situation in Kinshasa?

Why does France not want to take over in Congo-Brazzaville to save its interests, because the country risks sinking into a war of succession?

Why are the Crusades viewed positively in the West, when in fact they were acts of crime and violence?

Why is the Democratic Republic of the Congo not changing its capital?

Why is Africa on the margins of development?

Congolese journalist Chilassy Bofumbo denied provisional release, back in court tomorrow.

Congolese journalist Chilassy Bofumbo (center, in white T-shirt) was denied provisional release by the High Court in Mbandaka, the capital of DRC's western Équateur province, on June 21, 2022. CPJ called for the immediate release of Bofumbo, who has been imprisoned since November. (Photo: José Maza)

Kinshasa, June 27, 2022 – Authorities in the Democratic Republic of the Congo should unconditionally release journalist Chilassy Bofumbo and all other members of the press jailed for their work, and ensure that the media in the country can work without fear of arrest, the Committee to Protect Journalists said Monday.

On Thursday, June 23, a judge at the High Court in Mbandaka, the capital of the DRC's western province of Équateur, declined a June 21 request by Bofumbo's lawyer, Edmond Mbokolo, for the journalist to be granted provisional release, according to Mbokolo, who spoke to CPJ over the phone, and media reports. Mbokolo told CPJ that Bofumbo is scheduled to appear in court again on June 28.

"Chilassy Bofumbo and all other members of the press behind bars for their work in the Democratic Republic of the Congo should be released without delay," said Angela Quintal, CPJ's Africa program coordinator, from Johannesburg, South Africa. "The prolonged and ongoing detention of journalists in the DRC is a grim indicator for press freedom in the country."

Bofumbo is the editor-in-chief of the local broadcaster Radio Télévision Sarah, a correspondent for the Kinshasa-based Flash Info Plus news website and the Bukavu-based Radio l'Essentiel online broadcaster, and a coordinator for FILIMBI, a nongovernmental organization that promotes civil participation among Congolese youth, according to CPJ research. Bofumbo's June 21 court appearance was the first since November 2021, when he was arrested while covering a protest, charged with various crimes, and his case was sent for review to the Court of Cassation in Kinshasa, the capital, according to CPJ research and Mbokolo.

Bofumbo appeared on CPJ's 2021 prison census, which annually documents all journalists jailed around the world for their work on December 1. Separately, at least two other journalists — Patrick Lola and Christian Bofaya — were arrested in Mbandaka in January 2022 over their coverage of protests in Équateur province in late 2021, according to CPJ reporting.

DRC journalist Chilassy Bofumbo acquitted; two other reporters remain behind bars.

Journalist Chilassy Bofumbo (middle) stands with friends following his release and acquittal on July 5, 2022. His shirt has a graphic of his face and says in French, "Free Chilassy Bofumbo. Journalism is not a crime." (Credit: Arnold Mawango)

Kinshasa, July 5, 2022 — A judge at the High Court in Mbandaka, the capital of the Democratic Republic of the Congo's western Équateur province, on Tuesday acquitted and released journalist Chilassy Bofumbo, who had been jailed since he covered a November 2021 protest, according to the journalist, who spoke to CPJ by messaging app and tweeted his release. Two other journalists — Patrick Lola and Christian Bofaya — remain jailed in the central prison of Mbandaka, the capital of Équateur province, according to their lawyer, Pontife Ikolombe, who spoke to CPJ by phone.

"The acquittal of journalist Chilassy Bofumbo is welcome news, although he should never have been arrested or detained for over seven months," said Angela Quintal, CPJ's Africa program coordinator, from Durban. "Authorities in the DRC should swiftly and unconditionally release journalists Patrick Lola and Christian Bofaya, who have spent nearly six months behind bars. Press freedom remains on trial in the DRC."

Bofumbo is editor-in-chief of local broadcaster Radio Télévision Sarah, a correspondent for the Flash Info Plus news website and Radio l'Essentiel online broadcaster, and a coordinator for FILIMBI, a nongovernmental organization that promotes civil participation among Congolese youth, according to CPJ research. On June 28, 2022, the prosecutor called for Bofumbo to be imprisoned for three years and fined, according to media reports.

Freelance reporter Lola and Bofaya, a reporter for privately owned E Radio, have been held since January 10 over protest coverage. Their case remains under consideration of the national-level Court of Cassation in DRC's capital Kinshasa, as CPJ documented.

What is not commonly known from the history of African Empires?

Felipe Rowder

World History, Culture, Geography & some other stuff 2y

Almost everything is not unknown, but ignored. I don't know why it's difficult to have content creators get into the area. I have been ranting particularly about two Microsoft games of the same franchise: Age of Empires (II & III). It's a series of strategy games that take place in the Middle Ages & they show most known civilizations or civ groups, like the Lithuanians, the Vietnamese or the Inca (to emphasize the civs don't need to be that popular). Well, I've been ranting about them only adding three African civs: Malians, Ethiopians & Berbers; but they have almost every meter of Europe & East Asia covered. Furthermore, Malians, in the game, are in reality West Africans, because their units include the Gbeto (female warrior-hunters that served for the king of Dahomey).

So they are different civs. & Berbers can better enter the Arab set, so I'm unwilling to count them. Zero references to Zimbabwe, Kongo, Kanem or Adal: there was “nothing” there from the game's perspective. Same with AoE III: ZERO reference to Africans in the entire XV to XIX centuries, like if there was only void south of the Sahara. I've seen games like Civilization that try to change that, but to a minor level: Civ5 featured only Songhai, Ethiopia & the Zulu. To their defense, their grouping was worse in South East Asia (only Thailand). So it's not necessarily that they are not known about, it's that they are not shown in the media as often as it would be desirable. On the “why”, I've no idea: games would be much more fun adding all those too. Just to emphasize the underestimation level. This is how the son of the king of Kongo was drawn in its era:

P. Augusto Guglielmi tirou do vivo.

Lith. de M.ns Louis da C.ma Nos N. dos Martyres N.º 15 a 21

O PRINCIPE D. NICOLAU

Filho d'El Rei do Congo D. Henrique 2.º

NA OCCASIÃO DA VISITA QUE O MESMO PRINCIPE FEZ A S.M.A RAINHA DE PORTUGAL EM NOVEMBRO DE 1845

& this is today western view:

The first one is a king, the second one is a tribal chief.

That means that, yeah, you can re-enact the fall of Constantinople or Tenochtitlan; but for the fall of Zimbabwe, you'll need to keep surfing on the web.

Related Links

What was the best empire in African history?

Was there ever an African empire?

What was the biggest empire in Africa?

What were the different African empires throughout history?

What is true African history?

What was the most powerful empire in ancient Africa?

Let’s Discuss Ancient and Medieval Africa: When is the first evidence of an African Empire?

Posted by Mr Nancy Knowledgeable In African and African Diaspora History: ThuI will have to go with Kerma, below I’ll explain why .

The general political situation in the Neolithic Southern Nile Valley (left), pre-Kerma around c. 4th millennium BC (centre), and a Medjay warrior depicted on a bucranium (cattle skull) from Mostagedda, Middle Egypt, (right), illustrating the use of Hieroglyphs among the southern populations living among the Egyptians

See where Kerma is in the purple ? it would take all those other polities creating a large Empire to be known as Kush.

So if by Empire we are talking about a state gobbling up multiple states, many may think Egypt because the land area was large, but Kerma at it’s height took over all the surrounding polities under a unified front, I guess one could argue the same for the early unification of the upper and Lower Egypt, but these were multiple entities from as far away as Punt even.

Post-Neolithic Sudan:

The standing remains of a c. 4000 year old monument. The Western Deffufa, a massive mud brick temple in the center of Kerma, capital of the first Kingdom of Kush.

The rise of Kerma (c. 2500 BC) saw the absorption of these tribes into a strong centralized state, known as Kush, which ended up rivaling Egypt itself. This period sees some of the first monumental construction activities in Sudan, organized labor, advanced metallurgy, cross-continental trade networks and the earliest use of Egyptian hieroglyphs as well as being embroiled in violent conflict with their northern neighbor, annexing lower Nubia and raiding as far north as Thebes. A thousand years after its establishment, the Kingdom of Kerma was conquered by the New Kingdom. 500 Years of occupation blurred the lines between Kush and Egypt, as the material culture of the two countries became nearly indistinguishable.

Aerial view of a historic reconstruction of the central district of the Royal City of Kerma, somewhere around c. 2050 - 1750 BC, showing the Western Deffufa, a massive mud-brick religious monument, still standing today at 18 meters in height , surrounded by elite residential areas. This central area was walled with massive earthen ramparts with bastions. A large necropolis, shrines, palaces and agricultural villages extending north and south towards the fertile plain of the Nile surrounded this district.

The rise of Kerma (c. 2500 BC) sees the absorption of these tribes into a strong centralized state, known as Kush, which ended up rivaling Egypt itself. This period sees some of the first monumental construction activities in Sudan, organized labor, advanced metallurgy, cross-continental trade networks and the earliest use of Egyptian hieroglyphs as well as being embroiled in violent conflict with their northern neighbor, annexing lower Nubia and raiding as far north as Thebes. A thousand years after its establishment, the Kingdom of Kerma was conquered by the New Kingdom. 500 Years of occupation blurred the lines between Kush and Egypt, as the material culture of the two countries became nearly indistinguishable.]

The Kingdom of Kush: A proper introduction [Illustrated]

“Oh Great God, swift one. Who comes to him who calls. Watch my sister for me, the woman born in the same womb as me. Do for her as I have done for you. Spontaneous miracles that cannot be denied. Elevate her children and make them prosper, even as you did for me.” From Taharqa’s prayer to Amun, https://wildfiregames.com/forum/topic/21602-the-kingdom-of-kush-a-proper-introduction-illustrated/ The following is important as to why I think Kerma was the first Empire.

The El Kab inscription

The tomb belonged to Sobeknakht, a Governor of El Kab, an important provincial capital during the latter part of the 17th Dynasty (about 1575-1550 BC).

The inscription describes a ferocious invasion of Egypt by armies from Kush and its allies from the south, including the land of Punt, on the southern coast of the Red Sea. It says that vast territories were affected and describes Sobeknakht's heroic role in organizing a counter-attack.

The text takes the form of an address to the living by Sobeknakht: "Listen you, who are alive upon earth . . . Kush came . . . aroused along his length, having stirred up the tribes of Wawat . . . the land of Punt and the Medjaw*. . ." It describes the decisive role played by "the might of the great one, Nekhbet", the vulture-goddess of El Kab, as "strong of heart against the Nubians, who were burnt through fire", while the "chief of the nomads fell through the blast of her flame".*

The discovery explains why Egyptian treasures, including statues, stelae and an elegant alabaster vessel found in the royal tomb at Kerma, were buried in Kushite tombs: they were war trophies.]

Related Links

What was the best empire in African history?

Was there ever an African empire?

What were some of the most important African empires? How was their relationship with Europe/Asia? What happened to them?

How did West African empires start, and why did they fall?

What happened to Africa's ancient empires?

What were the different African empires throughout history?

hat are some ruins from African civilizations that have not been discovered yet?

Mr Nancy

We don't know, they haven't been discovered yet, sure there are ruins that are not widely known, here are just a few of them.

Loropani

Reminiscent of old Zimbabwe far to the South of Africa is these ruins in Burkina Fasso the link the gold producing cities to the south of the savanna empires had contacts to the forest empires like the Ashanti and others.

The 11,130m2 property, the first to be inscribed in the country, with its imposing stone walls is the best preserved of ten fortresses in the Lobi area and is part of a larger group of 100 stone enclosures that bear testimony to the power of the trans-Saharan gold trade. Situated near the borders of Côte d'Ivoire, Ghana and Togo, the ruins have recently been shown to be at least 1,000 years old. The settlement was occupied by the Lohron or Koulango peoples, who controlled the extraction and transformation of gold in the region when it reached its apogee from the 14th to the 17th century. Much mystery surrounds this site large parts of which have yet to be excavated. The settlement seems to have been abandoned during some periods during its long history. The property which was finally deserted in the early 19th century is expected to yield much more information.Brief Synthesis

The dramatic and memorable Ruins of Loropéni consist of imposing, tall, laterite stone perimeter walls, up to six metres in height, surrounding a large abandoned settlement. As the best preserved of ten similar fortresses in the Lobi area, part of a larger group of around a hundred stone-built enclosures, they are part of a network of settlements that flourished at the same time as the trans-Saharan gold trade and appear to reflect the power and influence of that trade and its links with the Atlantic coast.Recent excavations have provided radio-carbon dates suggesting the walled enclosure at Loropéni dates back at least to the 11th century AD and flourished between the 14th and 17th centuries, thus establishing it as an important part of a network of settlements.

Ruins of Loropéni

The 11,130m2 property, the first to be inscribed in the country, with its imposing stone walls is the best preserved of ten fortresses in the Lobi area and is part of a larger group of 100 stone enclosures that bear ...

https://whc.unesco.org/en/list/1225/gallery/

Yegala ruins Sierra Leon

African archaeology is still in it's infancy case in point in Sierra Leon we have the Yegala ruins Sierra Leon but nothing is known about them despite the site being abandoned at the turn of the last century.I bet the Sahara also is yet to reveal most of it's secrets,as well as the forest zones but urbanization in West Africa were contemporary with the 1st dyn kings of Kemet,the above Dhar tichtitt.

Ancient Kano

A VIEW OF A PART OF KANO CITY (INSIDE THE WALL).

Koumbi Saleh

Africans build in stone when materials is available they use Adobe styles when confronted by the desert Kirikongo is a successful village founded in the early first millennium AD and most likely abandoned ~ AD 1400. With the establishment of an occupational chronology it will be possible to model the development or foundation point of various mounds within the group over time. In order to analyze social dynamics, it is necessary to establish contemporaneity between component parts.Koumbi Saleh:The Koumbi Saleh tumulus has a circumference of 2.4 kilometers and occupies 44 hectares of land. It was formerly surrounded by a wall, most of which is no longer traceable on the ground, but vestiges of its monumental gate are still visible. Remnants of other encircling walls suggest either different stages of fortification development or a city fortified by a double- or triple-wall defense system. Within the walls, the city was densely built up on higher and lower elevations. Archaeologists have identified three principal thoroughfares as well as numerous narrow, straight streets and a large square, which probably served as a market, and many small squares. These public spaces demarcated the sixty blocks of single- and multi-story stone houses on the city's higher elevation. Rows of shops connected to the houses' street fronts opened onto the streets. In this section of the city (measuring 700 by 700 meters) were located.

THE OLDEST HOUSE in CDOMASSEE.

No. 3.

the royal palace and the residences of officials and rich merchants. Surrounding the elevated quarters is the city's lower section (measuring 500 by 700 meters).Ashanti Town of Kumasi and yes forest dwelling west Africans built towns like this before western contacts with grid iron streets.

More on the Ashanti dwellings

The Ashanti (or Asante) Empire (or Confederacy), also Asanteman (1701–1957), was a West Africa sovereign state of the Ashanti people of Ashanti, Ghana. The Ashantis (or Asantefo) are of Akan origin, the Ashantis a powerful, militaristic and highly disciplined people of West Africa inhabiting an area known as 'Akanland'. Their military power, which came from effective strategy and an early adoption of European Firearms, created an empire that stretched from central Ghana to present day Benin and Ivory Coast, bordered by the Dagomba kingdom to the north and Dahomey to the east. Due to the empire's military prowess, sophisticated hierarchy, social stratification and culture, the Ashanti empire had one of the largest historiographies of any indigenous Sub-Saharan African political entity.

Today the Ashanti monarchy continues as a constitutionally protected, sub-nation state and traditional state in Ghana.

The Kingdom of Kongo (1400– 1914)The first of these, the Kongo kingdom, was founded by invaders from the north east who settled south of the Congo River in the late 1300s and grew to encompass the north of modern Angola and the western areas of the DRC (Library of Congress 1993)Foundation of the Kingdom The first king of the Kingdom of Kongo Dya Ntotila was Lukeni lua Nimi (circa 1280-1320).The name Nimi a Lukeni appeared in later oral traditions and some modern historians, notably Jean Cuvelier, popularized it. Lukeni lua Nimi or Nimi a Lukeni, became the founder of Kongo when he conquered the kingdom of the Mwene Kabunga (or Mwene Mpangala), which lay upon a mountain to his south. He transferred his rule to this mountain, the Mongo dia Kongo or "mountain of Kongo", and made Mbanza Kongo, the town there, his capital. Two centuries later the Mwene Kabunga's descendants still symbolically challenged the conquest in an annual celebration. The rulers that followed Lukeni all claimed some form of relation to his kanda or lineage and were known as the Kilukeni. The Kilukeni kanda or "house" as recorded in Portuguese documents would rule Kongo unopposed until 1567.

This was a very important central African medievil state it sent embassies to the vatican and Portugal it became Christian one of it's elite became a Bishop and it's upper class male members became military knights in Portugal,they were also corrupt as they made war for the sole purpose of selling slaves although their King banned the slave trade, the elites continued to do so in defiance which caused a vicious response from the neighbouring Angolans,their cities broke-up their people returned to tribal unites and even clan based, although it was a slow rot that took centuries and ended with 19th and 20th century crimes against humanity first under king Leopold of Belgium followed by civil wars the rise and fall Ma-Butu Sissako One the five richest individuals in the world when he died and his nation one of the five poorest,and the mess continues today.

The kingdom of Kongo and the Portuguese: diplomacy, trade, warfare and early Afro-European interactions (1483-1670)

https://isaacsamuel.substack.com/p/the-kingdom-of-kongo-and-the-portuguese

Related:What are some ruins from African civilizations that have not been discovered yet?

Sven Jeske

History geek before the word 'geek' was even invented Sun

This is a tower from the well-known ancient city of Great Zimbabwe (unsurprisingly, in Zimbabwe).

The city of Great Zimbabwe was inhabited from ca. 9th to 15th century. Their territory encompassed basically the whole interior of Southern Africa, according to old Portuguese maps, that were made after the Portuguese talking to Zimbabwe's successors, the kingdom of Mwenemutapa. Smaller settlements of Old Zimbabwe have been found all over Zimbabwe proper, and some in neighboring countries.

It is estimated that roughly 300 Zimbabwean settlements can be found in what is today western Mozambique, which…

Mr Nancy. ·

Knowledgeable In African and African Diaspora History:Sun

We don’t know, they haven’t been discovered yet, sure there are ruins that are not widely known, here are just a few of them.

Loropani

Reminiscent of old Zimbabwe far to the South of Africa is these ruins in Burkina Fasso the link the gold producing cities to the south of the savanna empires had contacts to the forest empires like the Ashanti and others.

The 11,130m2 property, the first to be inscribed in the country, with its imposing stone walls is the best preserved of ten fortresses in the Lobi area and is part of a larger group of 100 stone enclosures that bear testimony to the power of the trans-Saharan gold trade. Situated near the borders of Côte d'Ivoire, Ghana and Togo, the ruins have recently been shown to be at least 1,000 years old. The settlement was occupied by the Lohron or Koulango peoples, who controlled the extraction and transformation of gold in the region when it reached its apogee from the 14th to the 17th century. Much mystery surrounds this site large parts of which have yet to be excavated. The settlement seems to have been abandoned during some periods during its long history. The property which was finally deserted in the early 19th century is expected to yield much more information.Brief Synthesis

The dramatic and memorable Ruins of Loropéni consist of imposing, tall, laterite stone perimeter walls, up to six meters in height, surrounding a large abandoned settlement. As the best preserved of ten similar fortresses in the Lobi area, part of a larger group of around a hundred stone-built enclosures, they are part of a network of settlements that flourished at the same time as the trans-Saharan gold trade and appear to reflect the power and influence of that trade and its links with the Atlantic coast.Recent excavations have provided radio-carbon dates suggesting the walled enclosure at Loropéni dates back at least to the 11th century AD and flourished between the 14th and 17th centuries, thus establishing it as an important part of a network of settlements.

Ruins of Loropéni

The 11,130m2 property, the first to be inscribed in the country, with its imposing stone walls is the best preserved of ten fortresses in the Lobi area and is part of a larger group of 100 stone enclosures that bear …

https://whc.unesco.org/en/list/1225/gallery/

Yegala ruins Sierra Leon

African archaeology is still in it's infancy case in point in Sierra Leon we have the Yegala ruins Sierra Leon but nothing is known about them despite the site being abandoned at the turn of the last century.I bet the Sahara also is yet to reveal most of it's secrets,as well as the forest zones but urbanization in West Africa were contemporary with the 1st dyn kings of Kemet,the above Dhar tichtitt.

Ancient Kano

A VIEW OF A PART OF KANO CITY (INSIDE THE WALL).

Koumbi Saleh

Africans build in stone when materials is available they use Adobe styles when confronted by the desert Kirikongo is a successful village founded in the early first millennium AD and most likely abandoned ~ AD 1400. With the establishment of an occupational chronology it will be possible to model the development or foundation point of various mounds within the group over time. In order to analyze social dynamics, it is necessary to establish contemporaneity between component parts.Koumbi Saleh:The Koumbi Saleh tumulus has a circumference of 2.4 kilometers and occupies 44 hectares of land. It was formerly surrounded by a wall, most of which is no longer traceable on the ground, but vestiges of its monumental gate are still visible. Remnants of other encircling walls suggest either different stages of fortification development or a city fortified by a double- or triple-wall defense system. Within the walls, the city was densely built up on higher and lower elevations. Archaeologists have identified three principal thoroughfares as well as numerous narrow, straight streets and a large square, which probably served as a market, and many small squares. These public spaces demarcated the sixty blocks of single- and multi-story stone houses on the city's higher elevation. Rows of shops connected to the houses' street fronts opened onto the streets. In this section of the city (measuring 700 by 700 meters) was located.

THE OLDEST HOUSE in CDOMASSEE.

No. 3.

the royal palace and the residences of officials and rich merchants. Surrounding the elevated quarters is the city's lower section (measuring 500 by 700 meters).Ashanti Town of Kumasi and yes forest dwelling west Africans built towns like this before western contacts with grid iron streets.

More on the Ashanti dwellings

The Ashanti (or Asante) Empire (or Confederacy), also Asanteman (1701–1957), was a West Africa sovereign state of the Ashanti people of Ashanti, Ghana. The Ashantis (or Asantefo) are of Akan origin, the Ashantis a powerful, militaristic and highly disciplined people of West Africa inhabiting an area known as 'Akanland'. Their military power, which came from effective strategy and an early adoption of European Firearms, created an empire that stretched from central Ghana to present day Benin and Ivory Coast, bordered by the Dagomba kingdom to the north and Dahomey to the east. Due to the empire's military prowess, sophisticated hierarchy, social stratification and culture, the Ashanti empire had one of the largest historiographies of any indigenous Sub-Saharan African political entity.

Today the Ashanti monarchy continues as a constitutionally protected, sub-nation state and traditional state in Ghana.

The Kingdom of Kongo (1400– 1914)The first of these, the Kongo kingdom, was founded by invaders from the north east who settled south of the Congo River in the late 1300s and grew to encompass the north of modern Angola and the western areas of the DRC (Library of Congress 1993)Foundation of the Kingdom The first king of the Kingdom of Kongo Dya Ntotila was Lukeni lua Nimi (circa 1280-1320).The name Nimi a Lukeni appeared in later oral traditions and some modern historians, notably Jean Cuvelier, popularized it. Lukeni lua Nimi or Nimi a Lukeni, became the founder of Kongo when he conquered the kingdom of the Mwene Kabunga (or Mwene Mpangala), which lay upon a mountain to his south. He transferred his rule to this mountain, the Mongo dia Kongo or "mountain of Kongo", and made Mbanza Kongo, the town there, his capital. Two centuries later the Mwene Kabunga's descendants still symbolically challenged the conquest in an annual celebration. The rulers that followed Lukeni all claimed some form of relation to his kanda or lineage and were known as the Kilukeni. The Kilukeni kanda or "house" as recorded in Portuguese documents would rule Kongo unopposed until 1567.

This was a very important central African medievil state it sent embassies to the vatican and Portugal it became Christian one of it's elite became a Bishop and it's upper class male members became military knights in Portugal,they were also corrupt as they made war for the sole purpose of selling slaves although their King banned the slave trade, the elites continued to do so in defiance which caused a vicious response from the neighbouring Angolans,their cities broke-up their people returned to tribal unites and even clan based, although it was a slow rot that took centuries and ended with 19th and 20th century crimes against humanity first under king Leopold of Belgium followed by civil wars the rise and fall Ma-Butu Sissako One the five richest individuals in the world when he died and his nation one of the five poorest,and the mess continues today.

The kingdom of Kongo and the Portuguese: diplomacy, trade, warfare and early Afro-European interactions (1483-1670).

https://isaacsamuel.substack.com/p/the-kingdom-of-kongo-and-the-portuguese

Related Links

Why are ancient African civilizations not as popularly known as ancient civilizations from other parts of the world?

Are there any ancient African civilizations that have been discovered?

Is it true that Africa had no civilization or history?

How many major ancient civilizations have been discovered in Africa?

What are African ancient civilizations?

Which country was the first to be discovered in Africa?

Were there several magnificent African Kingdoms or Civilizations?

How did Africans bring civilization to Europe?

Who discovered America, Columbus or Africans

What are some civilizations that are not from Africa?

Let’s Discuss Ancient and Medieval Africa How has Africa contributed to world civilization

Mr Nancy.

Knowledgeable In African and African Diaspora History:Feb 1

Hi Ben this question has been asked many times, if you are asking about ancient and medieval civilizations, I suppose you know of the Nile Valley civilizations of Egypt and Kush, you may also know of the civilizations of the Niger bend, the civilizations of the forest kingdoms gave a bunch of gifts in the arts, music,medical knowledge, fractal mathematics and even language expression, not mention agro techniques especially rice cultivation, so you could breakdown these civilizations in a variety of ways and their impact on the world, mainly through trade goods, there are so many ways I couldn’t get to them all but here’s just a few.

THE ERA OF AGRICULTURAL ELABORATION,

6500–3500 BCE

Parallel to trends in other world regions of early agriculture, so also in Africa the period 6500–3500 bce was a time of growth in the variety and proportional contribution of agriculture to the diet. The Niger-Congo farmers brought two savanna legumes, the African groundnut (Vigna subterranea) and the black-eyed pea (V. unguiculata), into cultivation during this time. The Sudanic agripastoralists of the southern Sahara and the Sahel added melons and gourds of several varieties to their original emphasis on sorghum, and also began raising castor beans, spreading these crops to ancient Egypt by or before the third millennium bce. Niger-Congo farmers and Sudanic agripastor-alists separately domesticated an additional major grain crop, pearl millet (Pennisetum glaucum). In the Ethiopian highlands reconstructed early farming lexicon reveals that the Cushites during this time began to supplement their stock raising with two highland African grain crops, finger millet and t'ef.

The seventh to fourth millennium bce was also a period of world history in which crops and animals domesticated in one seminal region first spread to other such world regions. In Africa between 6000 and 4000 bce, Cushitic peoples domesticated the donkey, native to the Red Sea hills and the arid foothills of the northern Ethiopian highlands. Donkeys then spread via Egypt to the Middle East, where they became the earliest important beasts of burden. Sheep and goats, as noted, spread the opposite direction even earlier, in the second half of the seventh millennium, and rapidly became important animals in the Sudanic and Cushitic agro pastoral traditions. From the Sudanic herders both goats and cattle spread west to the Niger-Congo societies of West Africa, again at a still uncertain period, but certainly before 3000 bce. An early a crop of the Sudanic agro pastoralist tradition, sorghum, may have spread equally early to the Niger-Congo cultivators. African groundnuts and black-eyed peas diffused the other way, from Niger-Congo farmers to their Sudanic and Cushitic counterparts, reaching as far as northern Kenya by the third millennium bce.

An especially interesting historical problem far from being solved is the question of how three important grain crops domesticated in Africa, sorghum, pearl millet, and finger millet, reached India between 3000 and 1000 bce, without passing through the Middle East first. Might seagoing trade have already connected northwestern Africa and India by that time?

What may surprise is that Egypt was not an initiating region of these seminal developments. The indigenous Afrasian communities of the Egyptian Nile in the The seventh millennium were still hunter-gatherers. They gradually transformed their subsistence economy by adopting two staple crops, barley and wheat, along with sheep and goats from the Middle Eastern center of domestication. Melons, gourds, and donkeys reached them from the Sudanic agro pastoralists to the south; surprisingly, cotton did not. Word borrowings in ancient Egyptian confirm that Sudanic herders also significantly influenced Egyptian beliefs and practices relating to cattle.

https://www.researchgate.net/publication/289833647_Africa_in_World_History_The_Long_Long_View

On the Origins and Dissemination of Domesticated Sorghum and Pearl Millet across Africa and into India: a View from the Butana Group of the Far Eastern Sahel - African Archaeological Review

https://link.springer.com/article/10.1007/s10437-018-9314-2

DNA reveals donkeys were domesticated 7,000 years ago in East Africa

When and where donkeys were domesticated has been a long-standing mystery. DNA now reveals they were tamed much earlier than horses.

https://www.sciencenews.org/article/donkey-domestication-dna-east-africa

Late antiquity to medieval trade routes much of the East African city states and some in land South African states were involved in those trade.

Figure 1. A mtepe on the beach at Zanzibar, *c.*1890. Note the mangrove poles stacked on the beach and next to the ship (Photo: Probably E. D. Ropes; Courtesy, Peabody Essex Museum, Salem, MA).

http://www.swahiliweb.net/ziff_journal_3_files/ziff2006-07.pdf

It was in craft like these that the Zanj sailed the Indian ocean along with their Persian Arab Indian and Chinese trading partners

A miniature from a Persian Manuscript(Al-Maqamat) showing a Swahili(Zanji) Trading ship.-1237 C.E

The Young Historian

http://theyounghistorian7.blogspot.com/2012_01_01_archive.html

Fractals a Part of African Culture
https://fractalenlightenment.com/18685/fractals/fractals-a-part-of-african-culture

Visit the above inside there is a Ted Talk vid on how African Fractals influence our modern computers.

SOCIAL MEDIA eContent Hiring to read:
Leadership Shows the Way for Productivity

John Rampton

Super Power = Online Growth | $210 Million in Online Sales in 2022 | Unicorn Builder

Hello from London,

The calamity unfolding in Turkey and Syria is on an enormous scale. The final death toll will be in the tens of thousands, I suspect. Two huge earthquakes have struck so far. When earthquakes strike in densely populated urban areas, especially where buildings have been put up quickly and with insufficient care for preparing for an earthquake, the human toll is typically high. When people are caught asleep—the first quake struck soon after 4am local time—natural disasters are often more deadly. Add the difficulties of wintry weather, the risk of exposure for those trapped in debris and the troubles of a war zone and already vulnerable refugees. All this points to an exceptionally grim outcome.

Meanwhile, in India, other matters have grabbed public attention. Every now and then popular fury about corruption erupts in that country. When I was a correspondent there, a decade ago, I often reported from great gatherings of enraged protesters who railed against the “seasons of scams” and the misdeeds of politicians and crony capitalists. Among the worst was something known as “round-tripping,” a ruse in which funds were siphoned out of India, sent via front companies (often based in Mauritius) and brought back onshore. Public money vanished, and private individuals linked to politicians got very rich.

At the time I also got to know a rising opposition figure, one Narendra Modi. In Gujarat, the state he ran, Mr Modi explained to me his ideas for cleaning up India. He didn’t lead the anti-corruption protests at the time, but deftly benefited from them.

So reading about the accusations of fraud against Gautam Adani’s companies offers a strange sense of déjà vu. It should be acknowledged that Mr Adani, from whose enterprises $120bn of value has been wiped, following allegations of fraud by an American research firm, denies any wrongdoing. The Adani Group has also issued a lengthy rebuttal of the allegations. But like those scandals a decade ago, the Adani story is morphing from a financial tale to a political one.

Mr Modi himself now risks entering the protesters’ crosshairs. He has long been close to Mr Adani. Whatever the truth of the allegations, that association could become toxic given the public storm. The two men worked in parallel in Gujarat: one as its chief minister, the other in a private business that forged ties to the state government as it won contracts to develop infrastructure and land. Mr Adani was one of a clutch of tycoons who backed Mr Modi as he broke into national politics. One telling detail: Mr Modi made heavy use of planes owned by Mr Adani during his successful campaign to be prime minister in 2014.

How big a storm is brewing? The next few days will show. Mr Modi remains dominant in India, but he knows how badly other politicians have been tainted by scandal. He can’t stay silent forever. The opposition has been blocked from debating the matter in parliament, so instead expect street demonstrations—something many urban Indians relish. Just possibly, the otherwise-split opposition and regional parties might be able to unite behind this case.

There is plenty more going on this week. Staying in South Asia, Pakistanis will be weighing the legacy of Pervez Musharraf, a former president who died at the weekend. He was once lauded, but was eventually accused of treason and went into exile. And after a mysterious Chinese balloon entered American airspace and was subsequently shot down, relations between the world's two biggest powers appear to be growing more rancorous again.

Just as gripping, for many, is the emerging battle to dominate the world of search. Rumour has it that Microsoft is poised to announce a plan to build artificial intelligence, of the sort that powers the popular ChatGPT bot, into its Bing search engine. That would pose an obvious challenge to Google.

We'll also be reporting on the battle facing Emmanuel Macron, France's president. There will be a big strike on Tuesday among people who object to Mr Macron's plans to raise France's unusually low retirement age. If you're wondering why France lags other democracies in doing this, then read our Explainer.

As always, we welcome all of your messages. In particular I'd like to know what you are expecting as Russia prepares to mark a year of its war of aggression on February 24th. Madeleine Ströje, a retired ambassador in Sweden, has an intriguing proposition for Crimea. She suggests that the territory should be controlled by neither Russia nor Ukraine, and instead become an example of peaceful co-operation, perhaps administered by peacekeepers from the OSCE. Madeleine's idea to internationalise Crimea is bold, for sure. But how could outsiders persuade either country to go along with it? Meanwhile, James Trepanier asks about the treatment of pro-Russia Ukrainians living in territories liberated from Russian occupation. The answer so far, James, seems to be that such individuals mostly depart along with the invaders.

Please continue to write to me at economisttoday@economist.com, or follow me on Twitter.

Adam Roberts, Digital editor

Our subscriber-only Culture newsletter:

Introducing Plot Twist, our new culture newsletter

Broaden your perspective with our weekly culture newsletter. The books you read, the films you watch, the music you listen to: they all matter, and not just because they ought to be enjoyable. Culture is how we see the world—and the arts are ever-more entwined with politics. Each week our correspondents unpick these links, sharing recommendations and insights from their reporting. They spotlight important authors and performers, and tell you about the works of art and stories they love—and the ones they don't.

Our latest column on workplace culture:

The relationship between AI and humans

Do an image search for the word “business” or “manager”, and what comes back? Nothing that remotely resembles business or managers. It isn’t just that the people are attractive. It is what they are doing. Many stock photos feature well-dressed types sitting around a table. One of them is holding forth and everyone else is laughing madly, like cult members hearing that the Rapture has been brought forward a week.

Most read by subscribers this week:

- How a balloon burst Sino-American talks
- Joe Biden’s effort to remake the economy is ambitious, risky—and selfish
- Russia’s technocrats keep funds flowing for Vladimir Putin’s war
- Why Vladimir Putin is not a pariah in China
- The world’s most, and least, democratic countries in 2022

Enjoyed this newsletter?

Read three free articles each month on Economist.com—register for free. If you are not a subscriber, enjoy full access by subscribing here,

If you subscribe to The Economist, we have good news: there is a new business and technology newsletter just for you. Sign up here.

SOCIAL MEDIA eContent Hiring to read:Disaster strikes for Turkey and Syria

If African countries got rid of the French Franc, what would France's real GDP be?

Pierre Leclercq
Location: France
😂

The French Franc?

It ceased to exist in 1999, so no one uses it anymore.

Perhaps you are talking about the CFA Franc?

This currency has absolutely no connection with the GDP of France.

The CFA Franc was made to help several African countries adopt a stable currency (look at Bitcoin to see how many Africans are desperate for a stable currency).

In order to stabilize the CFA Franc, France offered to play the role of a trusted third party for a reserve fund guaranteeing the currency.

France earns nothing on these funds, they just keep them safe and pay interest to participating countries.

France is favorable to cryptocurrencies and could well help build a crypto CFA Franc.

Similar questions

What country would never betray France?

Which countries hate France the most?

Why don't the French who claim everywhere that their country earns nothing in the CFA franc ask France to get out of the management of this currency to avoid these accusations?

What image do France and the French have in other European countries?

Which country is closest to France?

Why is the currency of 15 African countries still made in France, and why

Diversity, Equity, Inclusion and Belonging... with a Purpose

Some people believe that there isn't a higher purpose to anything and that we are meant to live in the moment, experience and accept the random acts of chaotic and disorganized life events, and embrace with joy whatever comes our way during our traverse in this earthly journey.

While that's debatable, it certainly is not true (at least in theory) for an organization.

In a business, everything exists for a reason and must have a purpose, and nothing exists for the sake of itself or just to experience the randomness of a series of chaotic and disorganized events in organizational life.

At least in paper, whatever exists in an organization must exist, be there and have its right place and time for a purpose. In fact, the purpose of an individual thing at work must connect to something even higher (a higher purpose), that is, the achievement of business goals and the long-term sustainability and success of the organization.

Everything in the organization having a purpose for the organization is a business principle, though many organizations and leaders often violate this principle. It being true as a general business principle means that it also must be true for every individual thing in the business: every role in the organization; every person the organization hires; every managerial and leadership position; every skill that employees bring to the table and are trained for; every strategic initiative; every tactical action; and every transaction. Nothing exists for its own sake. It all has a purpose.

Sometimes, we are fortunate enough to witness and experience something that exists for one purpose, but has collateral positive effects on a whole lot of other things. Generally, this is the case (at least in theory) for the work that HR does. Everything HR does must have a purpose and connect to the goals of organization, just like all other functions. This is how HR becomes a conduit that ensures the success of the organization.

In the specific case of HR, however, ensuring the success of the organization is only possible with people and talent. When done right, contributing to the success of the organization with people also means helping people succeed.

We have said it before: HR can't be pro-people if it isn't pro-business, and it can't be pro-business if it also isn't pro-people. HR is a business function that wears the people's hat. HR works on business challenges and opportunities with people-centered solutions. Now, the beauty of HR is that helping people succeed isn't a collateral effect of the purpose of helping the business succeed, it is part of it. That's our twofold raison d'être.

We are very fortunate to sit at an extraordinary intersection in which we can make two things happen simultaneously, and one because of the other: people and business success. This is an opportunity that not too many other functions have.

HR serving two purposes is true for all it does, and very specifically to all things Diversity, Equity, Inclusion and Belonging (DEIB). Nothing DEIB can exist for the sake of itself and wait for the random and chaotic acts of its existence to happen. DEIB must make things happen with its two purposes in mind: to help people and the organization succeed.

Unfortunately, when we examine the reality of DEIB, it seems that organizations decided to kill its soul and remove the purpose from its existence, turning DEIB into something for its own sake. A transactional function, so to speak, and not a purposeful one, as it should be.

Creating a Diversity Office without power and resources to do its work is doing DEIB for the sake of itself. Hiring a Chief Diversity Officer without giving them the authority and leverage to make change happen is doing DEIB for the sake of itself. Delivering DEIB leadership training without measuring its results and enforcing accountability from the leaders on all things DEIB is doing DEIB for the sake of itself. Measuring and reporting DEIB data with beautiful graphs without educating business leaders on the meaning and implications of that data, and the decisions they need to make informed by it, accordingly, is doing DEIB for the sake of itself.

And sadly, we find ourselves in our current predicament: for many reasons, DEIB has become a thing for itself and not a thing with a purpose. And this isn't because DEIB doesn't have a purpose, because it does (two, in fact). It is because it was turned into a transaction, a "check the box" kind of thing.

As we mentioned before, in business, when a thing doesn't have a purpose, it will eventually lose the battle for limited internal resources that everybody is trying to grab.

We can point our fingers in many different directions to identify the culprits of this predicament. More often than not, it is business leaders who, for example, after each horrific episode of racial injustice (at least in America) suddenly have a Zen moment (which is really PR/brand Zen, not really Zen) and go on a frenzy of saying how much they care about DEIB and start their performative or virtue signaling outburst, only to get bored with it or disaffected from it all too soon. And so, they doom DEIB to failure. Did they even care about DEIB in the first place? Was it all for PR purposes? Was any of it real, at all?

Now, does HR bear any responsibility in DEIB becoming a thing for itself and not a thing with a purpose? Certainly, but we our aware of this fact: it's almost impossible for a Diversity Office and its officers to row against the current for eternity. They have done what they could do to fire up DEIB's soul and make sure that everybody knows DEIB has a purpose (well, two purposes), only to find themselves disempowered by intentional or inadvertently neglect from those who are responsible to assign resources and give them leverage.

I know that there are many HR people with DEIB responsibility who see DEIB as a thing for itself and not a thing with a purpose. But, for the overwhelming majority of people working on DEIB, DEIB still has a strong purpose.

How do we fire it up, again?

Some ideas:

1. Why are you doing DEIB? This is an important, not a rhetorical question. I have noticed a significant proliferation of DEIB experts delivering training all over the place. I don't think there is anything wrong with it and I don't have anything against it. Quite the opposite, I celebrate that so many amazing people and experts have focused their attention on DEIB. The problem is when training becomes a thing for itself, and without a purpose. Training is not the purpose, it is the means to execute on DEIB's true purpose. Unfortunately, I think we are losing sight of the forest for the tree. The tree being the training, and the forest being the power of the purpose of DEIB to transform organizations. I used to think that if all we could do for DEIB was a training, then we should take it. But now I think that such a practice has harmed DEIB, because the exception due to budgetary reasons became the organizational cultural norm. So, the question remains: why are you doing this? What is your own purpose as a DEIB professional? Is it to deliver training? Or is it to improve people's lives and help your workplace succeed? The answers will determine completely different paths of action. In particular, if you are doing DEIB because you care for the people and the organization (the true purposes of DEIB) then you will probably be more resilient in the face of adversity and more creative in the way you move DEIB's transformational power and purpose forward

2. Did you connect DEIB with the higher (organizational) purpose? Let's make this one easy. Write down everything you are currently doing for DEIB. Now, think about the business goals. Connect DEIB and business goals. Is there a strong, direct and unequivocal line that connects whatever you do in DEIB with the business goals? Yes: then, good. No: does it make sense to continue doing that thing? To be able to connect DEIB and business goals you must know what the business goals are, but also you must be able to scrutinize (unemotionally) the work you are doing. It is not the "DEIB tactic" you should be attached to, but the purpose (or two) of DEIB, in which case pivoting on the tactics that don't make sense makes sense.

3. Are you firing up your business leaders? I get it. DEIB fails more often than not because business leaders, through intentional or inadvertent neglect, make it fail. But, why is that so? Is it that they don't care? Is it that they don't understand? Is it that they are so blatantly oblivious to how important DEIB is for the people or the business that they choose to do nothing about it if not for PR purposes? What is it? I don't want to think that they don't care (I hope they do). So, maybe it is that they don’t understand and/or they are simply unaware or blind to the power of DEIB beyond PR. Rather than feeling hopeless about it, I think it is a magnificent opportunity to go back to the DEIB drawing board and think again and better on how to get it done. To fire up your business leaders you must speak their language: money. Money as in making more of it or saving some of it. How do you do this? Just connect the dots. And by “just” I don’t mean to say that it’s easy, I mean to say that it is the way. It is, the only way. For example, to make more money you need to increase productivity and performance. This is possible via a number of actions, one of them is making people feel respected at work and recognized for what they do. These latter two increase engagement and satisfaction, which are conducive to higher performance. Bam! One connection down! Cutting cost down? Business leaders will say: fire people. You will say: we can save more money by reducing turnover on critical lines of business. How about we focus more on belonging to achieve this? Bam!

Ultimately, this is my main point (if it isn’t obvious already): nothing exists for its own sake in business. Everything has a purpose, and that purpose connects with something higher which, generally, is helping the business succeed. In the case of HR, everything we do has two, not one purpose: helping the business and helping the people succeed. And the two are connected. One happen because and with the other. This is very especially true for DEIB. DEIB doesn’t exist for its own sake and, if by any chance it does somewhere, it will not have a strong stance in the face of the many ebbs and flows in business life. DEIB must have a purpose, or two: business and people success. When DEIB is transactional (for its own sake) it doesn’t achieve anything sustainable in the long run or, in fact, impactful. However, when DEIB has a purpose and you operate with that in mind, you can make some wonders happen: for the business and the people. For DEIB to have a purpose and execute on it, given the current state of affairs in the economy, you will have to re-kindle and fire up the interest of business leaders in DEIB. Check above how to make it happen. And now, enjoy the purposeful journey. Make things happen rather than waiting for the chaos and randomness of DEIB life to just happen. DEIB has a purpose. And it's a beautiful one.

Written by Enrique Rubio, Founder of Hacking HR

To reinforce this message we are delivering the Hacking HR first conference of the year: “The Inclusion and Belonging Global Conference” (February 6-9, link to register in the comment section of this post).

Can you name an African leader who inspires you?

Eric Orthwein

The secret to success is to make your vacation your vacation 22 Jan.

There are three and they are dead, including two murderers.

Patrice Lumumba (1925–1961), Prime Minister of the Democratic Republic of the Congo from June to September 1960, overthrown in a coup by Mobutu, with the help of the CIA. He will suffer a tragic end which is in truth the fruit of a destabilization orchestrated by the Belgian, Congolese and American authorities via the CIA. They will go so far as to cut up his body and dissolve it in acid… He is considered by the Congolese to be a national hero.

Thomas Isidore Sankara (1949–1987), President of Burkina Faso from 1983 to 1987, shot dead during the coup by Blaise Comparé. Sankara was nicknamed the Che Guevara of Africa (with Patrice Lumumba)

Here is what Wikipedia says:

"During these four years of presidential mandate, Thomas Sankara led a forced march, including by repressing certain unions and opposition parties, a policy of national emancipation, development of the country, protection of the environment, fight against corruption or the liberation of women. He manages to eradicate hunger in the country, which is hailed by international bodies. He also wanted the name of Upper Volta to be changed from colonization to one from the African tradition: Burkina Faso, which is a mixture of moréand Dioula and means "country [or "homeland"] of upright/honest men."

Nelson Mandela (1918–2013), President of the Republic of South Africa from 1994 to 1999. After 27 years in prison, he became President of the Republic under the signs of tolerance, forgiveness and reconciliation and in the grand concept of the Rainbow Nation or plural society. Which was not easy in the country of Apartheid…

Eric O.

Of him, we still have his eternal smile...

Similar questions

You lead 100 people whose lives are in danger and you must choose one of two paths. One will save 95 people but 5 will die. The other has an equal chance of saving everyone but if it fails everyone will die. Which one would you choose -YOU ?

Why do some people say that British and French leaders care about the welfare of African leaders but they don't care about Africans?

What was Gaddafi's African Union project?

Can you tell me something inspiring?

Why do Africans succeed more outside of Africa?

What can be done today for Africa to regain its total independence?

SOCIAL MEDIA eContent Hiring to read: Bond markets see no recession

Insider Business

Howdy readers. I'm Phil Rosen, reporting from New York.

On this day in 1940, Disney debuted "Pinocchio," and the nosy puppet became one of the most beloved characters in film history.

I bring this up because some people say that, unlike the marionette, markets don't lie.

In that case, it may be wise to heed a key bond market signal that's saying we'll avoid a recession after all.

Sign up here to receive Insider's full 10 Things Before the Opening Bell newsletter — directly in your inbox.

And hear more from Insider's market experts by joining our LinkedIn group.

1. Depending on who you ask, a recession may be far off or it may have already happened.

But if you look at the bond market, there's a clear answer that seems to be forming: The US economy won't enter a downturn this year or next.

That's because the spread between corporate bonds and Treasury yields is steadily narrowing, according to DataTrek Research.

Underlying strength in debt markets suggests resilience, rather than teetering.

The spread between corporate bond yields and US Treasuries helps measure the risk appetite of bond traders. That spread widens in times when pain looks more likely and investors want to be compensated more for taking on higher risk.

This likely comes as a surprise to some investors, because a year of climbing interest rates and elevated inflation has led most forecasters to expect a recession sooner than later.

"When markets are uncertain about future cash flows, spreads increase to compensate investors for that risk," DataTrek co-founder Nicholas Colas wrote in a note. "When markets grow more comfortable that earnings are stable or even increasing, spreads tend to decline."

Over the past several months, the spread on the yields between those bonds has slipped to levels below the average seen in the five years before 2020, a time of relatively calm waters.

That signals economic strength, and should be reason for optimism in the year ahead and beyond, the firm noted. As Colas put it:

"Today's spreads are just slightly below the 2015-2019 averages, which says the corporate debt market is no more worried about a sudden decline in corporate earnings than it was in a period of relative financial and economic stability."

What's an indicator you are watching to keep tabs on the likelihood of a recession? Let us know in the comments.

In other news:

2. Bank of America recommended these 15 stocks right now. This batch of names can give portfolios an extra boost when they beat earnings and sales expectations, Jim Carey Hall explained. See his full list.

3. It'll be easier to find a home in certain places this year compared to others. Housing inventory looks poised to grow while mortgage rates come down — home lending firm Knock recommended scoping out these 10 cities for your next buy.

4. This 54-year-old high school teacher owns 64 single-family homes in Chicago. Dominic Kosteris bought his first home in 1996, and now he's profiting about $45,000 a month. He explained his strategy to real estate investing and how to achieve financial freedom.

5. Artificial intelligence stock C3.ai extended its massive rally. The mania surrounding ChatGPT has spilled over into a range of names with exposure to AI, such as C3.ai. The stock's Monday rally happened without any related company news.

This is a condensed version of Insider's 10 Things Before the Opening Bell newsletter. To see items 6-10, sign up here to receive the full newsletter in your inbox.

Plus, Insider has a wide array of industry-specific newsletters — see them all here.

This newsletter was curated by Phil Rosen.

SOCIAL MEDIA eContent Hiring to read: Is Late Night Eating Hindering Your Fat Loss Goals?

For many years, we have been aware that late-night snacking can negatively affect our health and weight management.

But is there any truth to the idea that eating food late at night is particularly bad for us?

In this article, we look closely at whether or not you should really avoid food at night.

We will explore the potential risks of eating too close to bedtime as well as some strategies for making smart dietary choices after dark.

With all of this, we will hopefully arrive at an informed conclusion about the benefits of avoiding certain foods at night – or not.

So if you're curious about whether you should be giving into your cravings after hours or skipping out on snacks in the evening altogether, read on and find out!

Food & Recovery

Food is essential for recovery because it provides the body with the necessary nutrients and energy to repair and rebuild damaged tissues.

Adequate intake of protein, carbohydrates, and healthy fats is crucial for various processes and for maintaining overall health.

But protein, carbs, and fats are not really the only important things in a good nutrition plan.

Specific vitamins and minerals, such as vitamin C, magnesium, zinc, and iron, also play essential roles in the complex process of recovery.

Without enough food, the body will struggle to recover - whether we're talking about recovery from a workout, an injury, or even illness.

This is why it's important to consume a balanced and nutritious diet, especially if you are physically active.

To summarize - quality food in sufficient quantities is one of the most important factors in the quest for recovery.

Eating During Daytime

Even though intermittent fasting has been quickly ramping up in popularity, we can’t deny that eating food during the day has a number of benefits.

One of the most significant is that it can help keep us satiated or feeling full so that we are less likely to think about or crave food throughout the day.

When we eat a balanced meal in the morning or at lunch, it gives our bodies the energy and nutrients it needs to function effectively while also helping reduce feelings of hunger and cravings later on.

This means that daytime nutrition is essential when it comes to getting energy to complete daytime activities.

Food At Night Is Crucial!

Contrary to popular belief, it is actually beneficial to eat more food at night, as this is a time for recovery.

The body undergoes a number of important processes during sleep, such as repairing damaged tissues, replenishing energy stores, and regulating hormones.

These processes require energy and nutrients, which can be supplied by food.

Eating a balanced and nutritious meal at night can help support the body's recovery efforts and promote overall health.

This is also a good time to avoid heavy and high-fat meals, or caffeine, which could disrupt sleep.

To summarize - the myth that you should avoid food after 6 pm is just that, a myth.

The truth is that our bodies are designed to be active throughout the day and recover during the night.

And as you just learned, recovery is nothing without some proper food fuel.

This is why avoiding food at night is a bad decision, which should be replaced with rather mindful food choices that provide sufficient nutrients for proper recovery.

Essential Considerations

Now, with all of the above in mind, we don’t mean to say you should indulge in comfort foods once the sun sets.

Though nighttime nutrition is just as important as eating during the daytime, there are some important considerations to keep in mind.

Here are our 5 most important ones:

You are best off avoiding huge meals right before bedtime - have your last meal within 2-3 hours before going to bed

Consume a product with slow-digesting protein, such as cottage cheese, natural yogurt, or any other dairy product (psst, you’re fasting for 8 hours while sleeping!)

Keep in mind that it isn’t all about the calories - you need some water too!

Avoid any caffeinated beverages within the last 6 hours before going to bed

Last but not least, focus on whole foods

Conclusions

So, there you have it - the body undergoes a number of important processes during nighttime & sleep, such as repairing damaged tissues, replenishing energy stores, and regulating hormones.

These processes require energy and nutrients, which can be supplied by food.

Eating a balanced and nutritious meal before bed can help support the body's recovery efforts and promote overall health.

Therefore, it is not necessary to avoid food at night, and in fact, it's beneficial to consume a meal at night to fuel the recovery process.

The key focus shouldn't be on the nutrition timing, it's more important to focus on nutrition quality & quantity.

If you are overeating your caloric deficit numbers, then late-night eating should be avoided.

Do YOU avoid food at night, and why? Comment Below!

If African countries got rid of the French Franc, what would France's real GDP be?

Pierre Leclercq
Location: France
😂

The French Franc?

It ceased to exist in 1999, so no one uses it anymore.

Perhaps you are talking about the CFA Franc?

This currency has absolutely no connection with the GDP of France.

The CFA Franc was made to help several African countries adopt a stable currency (look at Bitcoin to see how many Africans are desperate for a stable currency).

In order to stabilize the CFA Franc, France offered to play the role of a trusted third party for a reserve fund guaranteeing the currency.

France earns nothing on these funds, they just keep them safe and pay interest to participating countries.

France is favorable to cryptocurrencies and could well help build a crypto CFA Franc.

Similar questions

What country would never betray France?

Which countries hate France the most?

Why don't the French who claim everywhere that their country earns nothing in the CFA franc ask France to get out of the management of this currency to avoid these accusations?

What image do France and the French have in other European countries?

Which country is closest to France?

Why is the currency of 15 African countries still made in France, and why

Let’s Discuss Ancient and Medieval Africa: How has Africa contributed to world civilisation?

Mr Nancy Knowledgeable In African and African Diaspora History: Feb 1

Hi Ben this question has been asked many times, if you are asking about ancient and medieval civilizations, I suppose you know of the Nile Valley civilizations of Egypt and Kush, you may also know of the civilizations of the Niger bend, the civilizations of the forest kingdoms gave a bunch of gifts in the arts, music,medical knowledge, fractal mathematics and even language expression, not mention agro techniques especially rice cultivation, so you could breakdown these civilizations in a variety of ways and their impact on the world, mainly through trade goods, there are so many ways I couldn’t get to them all but here’s just a few.

THE ERA OF AGRICULTURAL ELABORATION,

6500–3500 BCE

Parallel to trends in other world regions of early agriculture, so also in Africa the period

6500–3500 bce was a time of growth in the variety and proportional contribution of agriculture to the diet. The Niger-Congo farmers brought two savanna legumes, the African groundnut (Vigna sub terranea) and the black-eyed pea (V. unguiculata), into cultivation during this time. The Sudanic agro pastoralists of the southern Sahara and the Sahel added melons and gourds of several varieties to their original emphasis on sorghum, and also began raising castor beans, spreading these crops to ancient Egypt by or before the third millennium bce. Niger-Congo farmers and Sudanic agripastoralists separately domesticated an additional major grain crop, pearl millet (Pennisetum glaucum). In the Ethiopian highlands reconstructed early farming lexicon reveals that the Cushites during this time began to supplement their stock raising with two highland African grain crops, finger millet and teff.

The seventh to fourth millennium bce was also a period of world history in which crops and animals domesticated in one seminal region first spread to other such world regions. In Africa between 6000 and 4000 bce, Cushitic peoples domesticated the donkey, native to the Red Sea hills and the arid foothills of the northern Ethiopian highlands. Donkeys then spread via Egypt to the Middle East, where they became the earliest important beasts of burden. Sheep and goats, as noted, spread the opposite direction even earlier, in the second half of the seventh millennium, and rapidly became important animals in the Sudanic and Cushitic agripastoral traditions. From the Sudanic herders both goats and cattle spread west to the Niger-Congo societies of West Africa, again at a still uncertain period, but certainly before 3000 bce. An early a crop of the Sudanic agro pastoralist tradition, sorghum, may have spread equally early to the Niger-Congo cultivators. African groundnuts and black-eyed peas diffused the other way, from Niger-Congo farmers to their Sudanic and Cushitic counterparts, reaching as far as northern Kenya by the third millennium bce.

An especially interesting historical problem far from being solved is the question of how three important grain crops domesticated in Africa, sorghum, pearl millet, and finger millet, reached India between 3000 and 1000 bce, without passing through the Middle East first. Might seagoing trade have already connected northwestern Africa and India by that time?

What may surprise is that Egypt was not an initiating region of these seminal developments. The indigenous Afrasian communities of the Egyptian Nile in the The seventh millennium were still hunter-gatherers. They gradually transformed their sub-sistence economy by adopting two staple crops, barley and wheat, along with sheep and goats from the Middle Eastern center of domestication. Melons, gourds, and donkeys reached them from the Sudanic agro pastoralists to the south; surprisingly, cotton did

not. Word borrowings in ancient Egyptian confirm that Sudanic herders also significantly influenced Egyptian beliefs and practices relating to cattle.

https://www.researchgate.net/publication/289833647_Africa_in_World_History_The_Long_Long_View

On the Origins and Dissemination of Domesticated Sorghum and Pearl Millet across Africa and into India: a View from the Butana Group of the Far Eastern Sahel - African Archaeological Review

https://link.springer.com/article/10.1007/s10437-018-9314-2

DNA reveals donkeys were domesticated 7,000 years ago in East Africa

When and where donkeys were domesticated has been a long-standing mystery. DNA now reveals they were tamed much earlier than horses.

https://www.sciencenews.org/article/donkey-domestication-dna-east-africa

Late antiquity to medieval trade routes much of the East African city states and some in land South African states were involved in those trade.

Figure 1. A mtepe on the beach at Zanzibar, *c.*1890. Note the mangrove poles stacked on the beach and next to the ship (Photo: Probably E. D. Ropes; Courtesy, Peabody Essex Museum, Salem, MA).

http://www.swahiliweb.net/ziff_journal_3_files/ziff2006-07.pdf

It was in craft like these that the Zanj sailed the Indian ocean along with their Persian Arab Indian and Chinese trading partners

A miniature from a Persian Manuscript(Al-Maqamat) showing a Swahili(Zanji) Trading ship.-1237 C.E

The Young Historian

A Nile Valley Studies Production:- This Blog is dedicated to the study of World History with a focus and emphasis on African cultures. "This page and the creator in no way endorses Afrocentrism, Eurocentrism, Black Centrism, or any ideology based on Race." Nile Valley Studies relies on Genetic, Written, Cultural, and Artistic sources to present unbiased facts on History. If you have questions, concerns, or complaints please Email me.

http://theyounghistorian7.blogspot.com/2012_01_01_archive.html

Fractals a Part of African Culture

Fractal geometry has emerged as one of the most exciting frontiers in the fusion between mathematics and information technology. Fractals can be seen in many of the swirling patterns produced by computer graphics, and have become an important new tool for modeling in biology, geology, and other natural sciences. While fractal geometry can take us into the far reaches of high tech science, its patterns are surprisingly common in traditional African designs, and some of its basic concepts are fundamental to African knowledge systems.

African Fractals introduces readers to fractal geometry and explores the ways it is expressed in African cultures. Drawing on interviews with African designers, artists, and scientists, Ron Eglash investigates fractals in African architecture, traditional hairstyling, textiles, sculpture, painting, carving, metalwork, religion, games, quantitative techniques, and symbolic systems. He also examines the political and social implications of the existence of African fractal geometry. Both clear and complex, this book makes a unique contribution to the study of mathematics, African culture, anthropology, and aesthetic design.

Fractals a Part of African Culture

https://fractalenlightenment.com/18685/fractals/fractals-a-part-of-african-culture

Visit the above inside there is a Ted Talk vid on how African Fractals influence our modern computers.

What are some ruins from African civilizations that have not been discovered yet?

Mr Nancy

We don't know, they haven't been discovered yet, sure there are ruins that are not widely known, here are just a few of them.

Loropani

Reminiscent of old Zimbabwe far to the South of Africa is these ruins in Burkina Fasso the link the gold producing cities to the south of the savanna empires had contacts to the forest empires like the Ashanti and others.

The 11,130m2 property, the first to be inscribed in the country, with its imposing stone walls is the best preserved of ten fortresses in the Lobi area and is part of a larger group of 100 stone enclosures that bear testimony to the power of the trans-Saharan gold trade. Situated near the borders of Côte d'Ivoire, Ghana and Togo, the ruins have recently been shown to be at least 1,000 years old. The settlement was occupied by the Lohron or Koulango peoples, who controlled the extraction and transformation of gold in the region when it reached its apogee from the 14th to the 17th century. Much mystery surrounds this site large parts of which have yet to be excavated. The settlement seems to have been abandoned during some periods during its long history. The property which was finally deserted in the early 19th century is expected to yield much more information.Brief Synthesis

The dramatic and memorable Ruins of Loropéni consist of imposing, tall, laterite stone perimeter walls, up to six metres in height, surrounding a large abandoned settlement. As the best preserved of ten similar fortresses in the Lobi area, part of a larger group of around a hundred stone-built enclosures, they are part of a network of settlements that flourished at the same time as the trans-Saharan gold trade and appear to reflect the power and influence of that trade and its links with the Atlantic coast.Recent excavations have provided radio-carbon dates suggesting the walled enclosure at Loropéni dates back at least to the 11th century AD and flourished between the 14th and 17th centuries, thus establishing it as an important part of a network of settlements.

Ruins of Loropéni

The 11,130m2 property, the first to be inscribed in the country, with its imposing stone walls is the best preserved of ten fortresses in the Lobi area and is part of a larger group of 100 stone enclosures that bear ...

https://whc.unesco.org/en/list/1225/gallery/

Yegala ruins Sierra Leone

African archaeology is still in it's infancy case in point in Sierra Leon we have the Yegala ruins Sierra Leon but nothing is known about them despite the site being abandoned at the turn of the last century.I bet the Sahara also is yet to reveal most of it's secrets,as well as the forest zones but urbanization in West Africa were contemporary with the 1st dyn kings of Kemet,the above Dhar tichtitt.

Ancient Kano

A VIEW OF A PART OF KANO CITY (INSIDE THE WALL).

Koumbi Saleh

Africans build in stone when materials are available they use Adobe styles when confronted by the desert Kirikongo is a successful village founded in the early first millennium AD and most likely abandoned ~ AD 1400. With the establishment of an occupational chronology it will be possible to model the development or foundation point of various mounds within the group over time. In order to analyze social dynamics, it is necessary to establish contemporaneity between component parts.Koumbi Saleh:The Koumbi Saleh tumulus has a circumference of 2.4 kilometers and occupies 44 hectares of land. It was formerly surrounded by a wall, most of which is no longer traceable on the ground, but vestiges of its monumental gate are still visible. Remnants of other encircling walls suggest either different stages of fortification development or a city fortified by a double- or triple-wall defense system. Within the walls, the city was densely built up on higher and lower elevations. Archaeologists have identified three principal thoroughfares as well as numerous narrow, straight streets and a large square, which probably served as a market, and many small squares. These public spaces demarcated the sixty blocks of single- and multi-story stone houses on the city's higher elevation. Rows of shops connected to the houses' street fronts opened onto the streets. This section of the city (measuring 700 by 700 meters) was located.

THE OLDEST HOUSE in CDOMASSEE.

No. 3.

the royal palace and the residences of officials and rich merchants. Surrounding the elevated quarters is the city's lower section (measuring 500 by 700 meters).Ashanti Town of Kumasi and yes forest dwelling west Africans built towns like this before western contacts with gridiron streets.

More on the Ashanti dwellings

The Ashanti (or Asante) Empire (or Confederacy), also Asanteman (1701–1957), was a West Africa sovereign state of the Ashanti people of Ashanti, Ghana. The Ashantis (or Asantefo) are of Akan origin, the Ashantis a powerful, militaristic and highly disciplined people of West Africa inhabiting an area known as 'Akanland'. Their military power, which came from effective strategy and an early adoption of European Firearms, created an empire that stretched from central Ghana to present day Benin and Ivory Coast, bordered by the Dagomba kingdom to the north and Dahomey to the east. Due to the empire's military prowess, sophisticated hierarchy, social stratification and culture, the Ashanti empire had one of the largest historiographies of any indigenous Sub-Saharan African political entity.

Today the Ashanti monarchy continues as a constitutionally protected, sub-nation state and traditional state in Ghana.

The Kingdom of Kongo (1400– 1914)The first of these, the Kongo kingdom, was founded by invaders from the north east who settled south of the Congo River in the late 1300s and grew to encompass the north of modern Angola and the western areas of the DRC (Library of Congress 1993)Foundation of the Kingdom The first king of the Kingdom of Kongo Dya Ntotila was Lukeni lua Nimi (circa 1280-1320).The name Nimi a Lukeni appeared in later oral traditions and some modern historians, notably Jean Cuvelier, popularized it. Lukeni lua Nimi or Nimi a Lukeni, became the founder of Kongo when he conquered the kingdom of the Mwene Kabunga (or Mwene Mpangala), which lay upon a mountain to his south. He transferred his rule to this mountain, the Mongo dia Kongo or "mountain of Kongo", and made Mbanza Kongo, the town there, his capital. Two centuries later the Mwene Kabunga's descendants still symbolically challenged the conquest in an annual celebration. The rulers that followed Lukeni all claimed some form of relation to his kanda or lineage and were known as the Kilukeni. The Kilukeni kanda or "house" as recorded in Portuguese documents would rule Kongo unopposed until 1567.

This was a very important central African medievil state it sent embassies to the vatican and Portugal it became Christian one of it's elite became a Bishop and it's upper class male members became military knights in Portugal,they were also corrupt as they made war for the sole purpose of selling slaves although their King banned the slave trade, the elites continued to do so in defiance which caused a vicious response from the neighbouring Angolans,their cities broke-up their people returned to tribal unites and even clan based, although it was a slow rot that took centuries and ended with 19th and 20th century crimes against humanity first under king Leopold of Belgium followed by civil wars the rise and fall Ma-Butu Sissako One the five richest individuals in the world when he died and his nation one of the five poorest,and the mess continues today.

The kingdom of Kongo and the Portuguese: diplomacy, trade, warfare and early Afro-European interactions (1483-1670)

https://isaacsamuel.substack.com/p/the-kingdom-of-kongo-and-the-portuguese

Related:What are some ruins from African civilizations that have not been discovered yet?

Sven Jeske

History geek before the word 'geek' was even invented Sun

This is a tower from the well-known ancient city of Great Zimbabwe (unsurprisingly, in Zimbabwe).

The city of Great Zimbabwe was inhabited from ca. 9th to 15th century. Their territory encompassed basically the whole interior of Southern Africa, according to old Portuguese maps, that were made after the Portuguese talking to Zimbabwe's successors, the kingdom of Mwenemutapa. Smaller settlements of Old Zimbabwe have been found all over Zimbabwe proper, and some in neighboring countries.

It is estimated that roughly 300 Zimbabwean settlements can be found in what is today western Mozambique, which…

Mr Nancy. ·

Follow

Knowledgeable In African and African Diaspora History:Sun

We don't know, they haven't been discovered yet, sure there are ruins that are not widely known, here are just a few of them.

Loropani

Reminiscent of old Zimbabwe far to the South of Africa is these ruins in Burkina Fasso the link the gold producing cities to the south of the savanna empires had contacts to the forest empires like the Ashanti and others.

The 11,130m2 property, the first to be inscribed in the country, with its imposing stone walls is the best preserved of ten fortresses in the Lobi area and is part of a larger group of 100 stone enclosures that bear testimony to the power of the trans-Saharan gold trade. Situated near the borders of Côte d'Ivoire, Ghana and Togo, the ruins have recently been shown to be at least 1,000 years old. The settlement was occupied by the Lohron or Koulango peoples, who controlled the extraction and transformation of gold in the region when it reached its apogee from the 14th to the 17th century. Much mystery surrounds this site large parts of which have yet to be excavated. The settlement seems to have been abandoned during some periods during its long history. The property which was finally deserted in the early 19th century is expected to yield much more information.Brief Synthesis

The dramatic and memorable Ruins of Loropéni consist of imposing, tall, laterite stone perimeter walls, up to six metres in height, surrounding a large abandoned settlement. As the best preserved of ten similar fortresses in the Lobi area, part of a larger group of around a hundred stone-built enclosures, they are part of a network of settlements that flourished at the same time as the trans-Saharan gold trade and appear to reflect the power and influence of that trade and its links with the Atlantic coast.Recent excavations have provided radio-carbon dates suggesting the walled enclosure at Loropéni dates back at least to the 11th century AD and flourished between the 14th and 17th centuries, thus establishing it as an important part of a network of settlements.

Ruins of Loropéni

The 11,130m2 property, the first to be inscribed in the country, with its imposing stone walls is the best preserved of ten fortresses in the Lobi area and is part of a larger group of 100 stone enclosures that bear … https://whc.unesco.org/en/list/1225/gallery/

Yegala ruins Sierra Leon

African archaeology is still in it's infancy case in point in Sierra Leon we have the Yegala ruins Sierra Leone but nothing is known about them despite the site being abandoned at the turn of the last century.I bet the Sahara also is yet to reveal most of it's secrets,as well as the forest zones but urbanization in West Africa were contemporary with the 1st dyn kings of Kemet,the above Dhar tichtitt.

Ancient Kano

A VIEW OF A PART OF KANO CITY (INSIDE THE WALL).

Koumbi Saleh

Africans build in stone when materials is available they use Adobe styles when confronted by the desert Kirikongo is a successful village founded in the early first millennium AD and most likely abandoned ~ AD 1400. With the establishment of an occupational chronology it will be possible to model the development or foundation point of various mounds within the group over time. In order to analyze social dynamics, it is necessary to establish contemporaneity between component parts.Koumbi Saleh:The Koumbi Saleh tumulus has a circumference of 2.4 kilometers and occupies 44 hectares of land. It was formerly surrounded by a wall, most of which is no longer traceable on the ground, but vestiges of its monumental gate are still visible. Remnants of other encircling walls suggest either different stages of fortification development or a city fortified by a double- or triple-wall defense system. Within the walls, the city was densely built up on higher and lower elevations. Archaeologists have identified three principal thoroughfares as well as numerous narrow, straight streets and a large square, which probably served as a market, and many small squares. These public spaces demarcated the sixty blocks of single- and multi-story stone houses on the city's higher elevation. Rows of shops connected to the houses' street fronts opened onto the streets. In this section of the city (measuring 700 by 700 meters) were located.

THE OLDEST HOUSE in CDOMASSEE.

No. 3.

the royal palace and the residences of officials and rich merchants. Surrounding the elevated quarters is the city's lower section (measuring 500 by 700 meters).Ashanti Town of Kumasi and yes forest dwelling west Africans built towns like this before western contacts with grid iron streets.

More on the Ashanti dwellings

The Ashanti (or Asante) Empire (or Confederacy), also Asanteman (1701–1957), was a West Africa sovereign state of the Ashanti people of Ashanti, Ghana. The Ashantis (or Asantefo) are of Akan origin, the Ashantis a powerful, militaristic and highly disciplined people of West Africa inhabiting an area known as 'Akanland'. Their military power, which came from effective strategy and an early adoption of European Firearms, created an empire that stretched from central Ghana to present day Benin and Ivory Coast, bordered by the Dagomba kingdom to the north and Dahomey to the east. Due to the empire's military prowess, sophisticated hierarchy, social stratification and culture, the Ashanti empire had one of the largest historiographies of any indigenous Sub-Saharan African political entity.

Today the Ashanti monarchy continues as a constitutionally protected, sub-nation state and traditional state in Ghana.

The Kingdom of Kongo (1400– 1914)The first of these, the Kongo kingdom, was founded by invaders from the north east who settled south of the Congo River in the late 1300s and grew to encompass the north of modern Angola and the western areas of the DRC (Library of Congress 1993)Foundation of the Kingdom The first king of the Kingdom of Kongo Dya Ntotila was Lukeni lua Nimi (circa 1280-1320).The name Nimi a Lukeni appeared in later oral traditions and some modern historians, notably Jean Cuvelier, popularized it. Lukeni lua Nimi or Nimi a Lukeni, became the founder of Kongo when he conquered the kingdom of the Mwene Kabunga (or Mwene Mpangala), which lay upon a mountain to his south. He transferred his rule to this mountain, the Mongo dia Kongo or "mountain of Kongo", and made Mbanza Kongo, the town there, his capital. Two centuries later the Mwene Kabunga's descendants still symbolically challenged the conquest in an annual celebration. The rulers that followed Lukeni all claimed some form of relation to his kanda or lineage and were known as the Kilukeni. The Kilukeni kanda or "house" as recorded in Portuguese documents would rule Kongo unopposed until 1567.

This was a very important central African medievil state it sent embassies to the vatican and Portugal it became Christian one of it's elite became a Bishop and it's upper class male members became military knights in Portugal,they were also corrupt as they made war for the sole purpose of selling slaves although their King banned the slave trade, the elites continued to do so in defiance which caused a vicious response from the neighbouring Angolans,their cities broke-up their people returned to tribal unites and even clan based, although it was a slow rot that took centuries and ended with 19th and 20th century crimes against humanity first under king Leopold of Belgium followed by civil wars the rise and fall Ma-Butu Sissako One the five richest individuals in the world when he died and his nation one of the five poorest,and the mess continues today.

The kingdom of Kongo and the Portuguese: diplomacy, trade, warfare and early Afro-European interactions (1483-1670).

https://isaacsamuel.substack.com/p/the-kingdom-of-kongo-and-the-portuguese

Related Links

Why are ancient African civilizations not as popularly known as ancient civilizations from other parts of the world?

Are there any ancient African civilizations that have been discovered?

Is it true that Africa had no civilization or history?

How many major ancient civilizations have been discovered in Africa?

What are African ancient civilizations?

Which country was the first to be discovered in Africa?

Were there several magnificent African Kingdoms or Civilizations?

How did Africans bring civilization to Europe?

Who discovered America, Columbus or Africans?

What are some civilizations that are not from Africa?

Let’s Discuss Ancient and Medieval Africa: When is the first evidence of an African Empire?

Posted by Mr Nancy.

Mr Nancy Knowledgeable In African and African Diaspora History:Thu

I will have to go with Kerma, below I’ll explain why .

The general political situation in the Neolithic Southern Nile Valley (left), pre-Kerma around c. 4th millennium BC (centre), and a Medjay warrior depicted on a bucranium (cattle skull) from Mostagedda, Middle Egypt, (right), illustrating the use of Hieroglyphs among the southern populations living among the Egyptians

See where Kerma is in the purple ? it would take all those other polities creating a large Empire to be known as Kush.

So if by Empire we are talking about a state gobbling up multiple states, many may think Egypt because the land area was large, but Kerma at it’s height took over all the surrounding polities under a unified front, I guess one could argue the same for the early unification of the upper and Lower Egypt, but these were multiple entities from as far away as Punt even.

[Post-Neolithic Sudan:

The standing remains of a c. 4000 year old monument. The Western Deffufa, a massive mud brick temple in the center of Kerma, capital of the first Kingdom of Kush.

The rise of Kerma (c. 2500 BC) sees the absorption of these tribes into a strong centralised state, know as Kush, which ended up rivalling Egypt itself. This period sees some of the first monumental construction activities in Sudan, organised labour, advanced metallurgy, cross-continental trade networks and the earliest use of Egyptian hieroglyphs as well as being embroiled in violent conflict with their northern neighbour, annexing lower Nubia and raiding as far north as Thebes. A thousand years after its establishment, the Kingdom of Kerma was conquered by the New Kingdom. 500 Years of occupation blurred the lines between Kush and Egypt, as the material culture of the two countries became nearly indistinguishable.

Aerial view of a historic reconstruction of the central district of the Royal City of Kerma, somewhere around c. 2050 - 1750 BC, showing the Western Deffufa, a massive mud-brick religious monument, still standing today at 18 meters in height , surrounded by elite residential area's. This central area was walled with massive earthen ramparts with bastions. A large necropolis, shrines, palaces and agricultural villages extending north and south towards the fertile plain of the Nile surrounded this district.

The rise of Kerma (c. 2500 BC) sees the absorption of these tribes into a strong centralised state, know as Kush, which ended up rivalling Egypt itself. This period sees some of the first monumental construction activities in Sudan, organised labour, advanced metallurgy, cross-continental trade networks and the earliest use of Egyptian hieroglyphs as well as being embroiled in violent conflict with their northern neighbour, annexing lower Nubia and raiding as far north as Thebes. A thousand years after its establishment, the Kingdom of Kerma was conquered by the New Kingdom. 500 Years of occupation blurred the lines between Kush and Egypt, as the material culture of the two countries became nearly indistinguishable.]

The Kingdom of Kush: A proper introduction [Illustrated]

“Oh Great God, swift one. Who comes to him who calls. Watch my sister for me, the woman born in the same womb as me. Do for her as I have done for you. Spontaneous miracles that cannot be denied. Elevate her children and make them prosper, even as you did for me.” -From Taharqa’s prayer to Amun, …

https://wildfiregames.com/forum/topic/21602-the-kingdom-of-kush-a-proper-introduction-illustrated/

The following is important as to why I think Kerma was the first Empire.

The El Kab inscription

The tomb belonged to Sobeknakht, a Governor of El Kab, an important provincial capital during the latter part of the 17th Dynasty (about 1575-1550BC).

The inscription describes a ferocious invasion of Egypt by armies from Kush and its allies from the south, including the land of Punt, on the southern coast of the Red Sea. It says that vast territories were affected and describes Sobeknakht's heroic role in organising a counter-attack.

The text takes the form of an address to the living by Sobeknakht: "Listen you, who are alive upon earth . . . Kush came . . . aroused along his length, he having stirred up the tribes of Wawat . . . the land of Punt and the Medjaw. . ." It describes the decisive role played by "the might of the great one, Nekhbet", the vulture-goddess of El Kab, as "strong of heart against the Nubians, who were burnt through fire", while the "chief of the nomads fell through the blast of her flame".

The discovery explains why Egyptian treasures, including statues, stelae and an elegant alabaster vessel found in the royal tomb at Kerma, were buried in Kushite tombs: they were war trophies.]

Related Links

What was the best empire in African history?

Was there ever an African empire?

What were some of the most important African empires? How was their relationship with Europe/Asia? What happened with them?

How did West African empires start, and why did they fall?

What happened to Africa's ancient empires?

What were the different African empires throughout history?

What is not commonly known from the history of African empires?

What is not commonly known from the history of African empires?

SOCIAL MEDIA eContent Hiring to read: World History, Culture, Geography & some other stuff

2y

Felipe Rowder

Almost everything is not unknown, but ignored. I don't know why it's difficult to have content creators get into the area. I have been ranting particularly about two Microsoft games of the same franchise: Age of Empires (II & III). It's a series of strategy games that take place in the Middle Ages & they show most known civilizations or civ groups, like the Lithuanians, the Vietnamese or the Inca (to emphasize the civs don't need to be that popular). Well, I've been ranting about them only adding three African civs: Malians, Ethiopians & Berbers; but they have almost every meter of Europe & East Asia covered. Furthermore, Malians, in the game, are in reality West Africans, because their units include the Gbeto (female warrior-hunters that served for the king of Dahomey). So they are different civs. & Berbers can better enter the Arab set, so I'm unwilling to count them. Zero references to Zimbabwe, Kongo, Kanem or Adal: there was “nothing” there from the game's perspective. Same with AoE III: ZERO reference to Africans in the entire XV to XIX centuries, like if there was only void south of the Sahara. I've seen games like Civilization that try to change that, but to a minor level: Civ5 featured only Songhai, Ethiopia & the Zulu. To their defense, their grouping was worse in South East Asia (only Thailand). So it's not necessarily that they are not known about, it's that they are not shown in the media as often as it would be desirable. On the “why”, I've no idea: games would be much more fun adding all those too. Just to emphasize the underestimation level. This is how the son of the king of Kongo was drawn in its era:

P. Augusto Guglielmi tirou do vivo.

Lith. de M.ns Louis da C.ma Nos N. dos Martyres N.º 15 a 21

O PRINCIPE D. NICOLAU

Filho d'El Rei do Congo D. Henrique 2.º

NA OCCASIÃO DA VISITA QUE O MESMO PRINCIPE FEZ A S.M.A RAINHA DE PORTUGAL EM NOVEMBRO DE 1845

& this is today western view:

The first one is a king, the second one is a tribal chief.

That means that, yeah, you can re-enact the fall of Constantinople or Tenochtitlan; but for the fall of Zimbabwe, you'll need to keep surfing on the web.

Related Links

What was the best empire in African history?

Was there ever an African empire?

What was the biggest empire in Africa?

What were the different African empires throughout history?

What is true African history?

What was the most powerful empire in ancient Africa?

Global News: How did the North Korean state media hide this condition from the public?

Sharing anything interesting Answered by Simran Subedi Tue

Kim Il-Sung was the founder and first leader of North Korea, serving from 1948 until his death in 1994. During his long rule, he was revered as a god-like figure by the North Korean people and was heavily guarded by the state. To maintain his image as a powerful and healthy leader, North Korean propaganda officials took great lengths to hide his medical conditions from the public.

One such condition was a baseball-sized tumor on the back of his head. To hide this, officials only released photos of him taken from his left side, which carefully concealed the tumor. This rare photo showing the tumor is one of the few candid images of the leader and provides a glimpse into the lengths the North Korean state would go to maintain its image of strength and power. Despite his illness, Kim Il-Sung remained in power for 46 years, ruling over North Korea and shaping the country into what it is today.

Related Links

In what ways has Gustaf Häkansson's story served as an inspiration to others?

What was the belief surrounding the cause of plagues during the medieval period?

Why was the practice of "breeding" Irish women with African men widespread in the 1600s?

What happened to Irena when she was caught by the Nazi soldiers?

What remarkable act of mercy did the German pilot, Franz Stigler, display towards the British bomber plane during the conflict?

What insane facts about WW2 do you know which are lesser known facts for the rest of us?

What is the most insane experiment done during WW2 in concentration camps?

How did Wojtek become a part of the Polish Army during World War II?

Has any country planned to nuke the moon? Why was Project A119 scrapped?

What was the significance of the "Poison Squad"?

What does the last alcohol party on US Navy ships in July 1914 represent in terms of the impact of war on personal relationships?

How did Mao Zedong assert his power and dominance over other world leaders?

What happened to Aimo Koivunen during his escape from the Soviet forces?

What makes Yang Kyoungjong's story unique compared to other Korean conscripts?

Masmedia News: What is the most trusted newspaper in the world?

George Delsol

Formerly Retired Professor at Université Toulouse III Paul Sabatier (1972 – 2012) 10 mo

Audiens : le salaire et la retraite en or du directeur général

Unibail : un promoteur qui va se goberger grâce aux JO

Le Canard enchaîné

Journal satirique paraissant le mercredi

Une déclaration exclusive du président Bouteflika

"L'Algérie vit un moment de la plus haute impotence !"

MACRON EN ROUTE POUR LES EUROPÉENNES

RENAISSANCE SANS PLOMB

ACCUSÉ DE RÉCEPTION

Polygames forever ?

Les valeurs de l'ovalie

Indispensable doyen

Abdelaziz Bouteflika : "Avec moi, pas de gilets jaunes !"

Trump habillé pour trois hivers

Le Pen, Tapie et le "pot de pisse"

I hesitated to answer this question, but finally I thought that no Quran had boarded this plane. It was the one that led me to browse one morning over breakfast one of the most unreliable newspapers in the world. But, perhaps the most interesting is the context which had allowed me to have a place in this plane which landed, that day, in Tunis.

So that you don't misunderstand my previous activities, I was a simple university student, involved in research, who never entered politics. A brief reminder of the context in which this story takes place is necessary. In 2003, President Chirac created the National Cancer Institute (Inca) and seven Cancéropôles. At that time, Philippe Douste-Blazy was Deputy Mayor of Toulouse and, importantly, on September 21, 2001, the AZF explosion took place, resulting in the death of thirty-one people. The economy of the Toulouse region based mainly on Airbus, Philippe Douste-Blazy had the idea of creating another economic pole, on the devastated site of AZF-Langlade: the Cancérôpole (now called Oncopole). This new economic pole, would combine research and care against cancer, Big Pharma (Sanofi and Pierre Fabre), start-ups and associate public and private. A few months later, in 2004, he was appointed Minister of Health and Social Protection, and he resigned from his post for reasons of non-cumulation of mandates, but he did not abandon his project for a cancéropôle. Before he was minister, I didn't know Philippe Douste Blazy very well, whom I met occasionally in the boarding school canteen, and I only exchanged a few accepted remarks with him concerning his father, who was a professor of biochemistry.

One evening in 2004, I received a phone call at 9 p.m.: “Good evening Georges, Philippe Douste-Blazy on the phone, are you all right?). Recognize that it is rare for a minister of health to call you at 9 p.m. to inquire about your health! Good evening Mr. Minister, what earned me the honor of your call? Here is Georges, I am with two of my friends whom you know, who were two colleagues whose names I will not mention, who were very involved in politics, and they suggested your name to me to coordinate the Cancéropôle that I would like to create on the site AZF. Could you come to the town hall tomorrow morning around 10 am if that suits you? After that, everything went very quickly. Philippe Douste-Blazy asked me to structure the research on the AZF-Langlade site. More precisely, my mission was to organize the exchange of information between researchers from Inserm, CNRS and Paul-Sabatier University. In other words, I had to bring the “Cancéropôle Toulouse" project to life before the first buildings appeared. This is how during the 2 years that followed, I was pampered in particular by Philippe Douste-Blazy who, after spending a few months at the Ministry of Health, was appointed Minister of Foreign Affairs in 2005. Without a doubt, the Quai d'Orsay (regalian ministry), both outside and inside, is more prestigious than the Ministry of Health. I was even invited to the July 14 garden party at the Elysée. But there, I came up against my wife's veto; we had planned to go as a family. My mission was progressing satisfactorily, and one day, a call from the ministry informed me that I was invited to an official visit by the Minister of Foreign Affairs to Tunisia. He wanted to take advantage of this trip to establish links between the Toulouse Cancéropôle/Oncopole and the Salah-Azaiz Institute, which is the reference center in Tunisia for the diagnosis and treatment of cancer. This is where my answer to the question of which is the least reliable newspaper in the world should have started? To my great surprise, this trip was made with the Falcon of the “French Republic”. Professor D Khayat, a well-known oncologist born in Tunisia and Ch de Boissieu, an equally well-known economist, business leaders and journalists were part of the trip. The first meeting was held at the embassy, with various French and Tunisian officials, journalists, and the question came up: Minister, what do you think of human rights in Tunisia? I don't remember the precise terms of his reply, which was very diplomatic, like “the situation is improving, but progress is still desirable, perhaps in the field of information”. Of course, President Ben Ali's censorship strictly controlled the press. The next day, I wanted to see how the Tunisian press reported on Philippe Douste-Blazy's press conference. I no longer remember the newspaper, "Le Temps" or the "Presse de Tunisie", but that doesn't matter since all the newspapers had to have the same tone. On the first page a photo of the minister surrounded by the ambassador, with in bold: "On an official visit to Tunisia, The French Foreign Minister welcomes the progress of human rights in Tunisia” (see page 4). The headline did not match the minister's response to a reporter. So I rushed to page 4 and after careful reading: Nothing! Maybe there was a page fault? In vain I skimmed carefully, twice, all the pages of the newspaper, everything was said on the first page of the newspaper. I was able to see on Wikipedia that, according to Lise Garon, professor of public communication at Laval University and specialist in political communication between the Arab world and the West, the Tunisian press in the time of Ben Ali had "the imperative the watchword of offering a smooth image of the country to the outside", showing a form of "internal unanimity".

The next day, with the Tunisian Minister of Health, we were treated to a visit to the Salah-Azaïz Institute, the reference center for the diagnosis and treatment of cancer. Given my specialty, pathological anatomy, and that of David D Khayat, the visit to the institute was limited to the pathological anatomy laboratory and the medical oncology department. I knew the head of this laboratory who was doing high quality work given the limited means at his disposal. The delegation numbered about forty people. Upon entering the laboratory, we were gripped by a strong smell of paint and quickly realized that we had to avoid rubbing against the walls. My colleague showed us around his laboratory and at the end of the visit, taking me aside, he said to me: “I thank you very much Sir, when the management knew that the delegation was going to visit my laboratory, it was completely repainted 2 days ago”. I must admit that I found these thanks touching. I thought: at least my visit will have served some purpose. The afternoon was free and I accepted my colleague's invitation to attend a meeting of “The Tunisian Cancer League” chaired by the head of the medical oncology department. I met, in a modest place, about ten admirable people. With extremely limited resources, they had acquired a building near the institute where all patients living far from Tunis were housed free of charge for the duration of their treatment (chemotherapy or radiotherapy).

A few months later, I was back to my usual activities. From my proposals the majority of the research teams that I had contacted had been retained (now in the "Toulouse Cancer Research Center") and especially the meeting of the three pathological anatomy laboratories of the CHU on the site of the 'Oncopole. Probably one of the finest pathological anatomy laboratories in Europe. I had also proposed to locate the hematology department on this site, which has been done. My participation in this great achievement, you will only find it in the press of the time. Afterwards, my name quickly disappeared from the shelves .

Similar questions

What is the newspaper with the largest circulation in the world?

What is your opinion on the newspaper Le Monde?

What is the best French newspaper?

What is the most widely read newspaper in the world?

What is the best French newspaper for objective information?

What is the most reliable IPTV service without interruption?

ECONOMIC News: How did China make its people rich by increasing their purchasing power?

Claude Hotte

Studied Analytical Chemistry at University of Liège (diploma obtained in 1985) 20 dec.

Ouch... you are very misinformed!

I worked in China and I know this country well where it is rather the oligarchs of the Communist Party who have benefited from a policy that I will call "anthill".

The Chinese (the little ants) work a lot, with very low salaries and a handful of privileged people of the regime (the queens) are billionaires.

China is one of the countries with the most wealth. The distribution of wealth is very unequal.

Similar questions

What can France do to counter the rise of China in Africa?

How did China become a superpower in such a short time?

Has China overtaken Russia in terms of military power?

How can China expect to have a growth of +2% when the rest of the world foresees a decrease?

Is China a developed country or a developing country? For what ?

How powerful is Xi Jinping in China?

Is there an equivalent to the English expression Above and Beyond?

Paul Nicolet Knowledge: English Updated 27 Jan. (After hesitation, modified answer; original in comments)

That's a very good question.

"Above and beyond" is a pretty English expression, a sort of witticism (how can one be beyond the above?) expressed in a rather musical way (above and beyond, that sounds good).

It originally comes from a formula addressed to recipients of the Medal of Honor, as indicated by a comment: "For conspicuous gallantry and intrepidity at the risk of his [or her] life above and beyond the call of duty". By extension, it is used to more generally qualify services of superior quality to expectations - it is a formula of exaggeration.

There is no direct equivalent to this expression. However, we can look for possible translations in French.

The literal translation would be "above and beyond". But even if it works, and even contains a kind of repetition/alliteration, it is a bit heavy and still less pleasant than the English version.

With a comic effect, we could use Buzz Lightyear's formula: "To Infinity and beyond!".

To restore the meaning more than the meaning, here are some proposals: "More than perfect", "Even better than expected", "You exceed all our expectations"...

Similar questions

What is the French equivalent of the English expression "it's not rocket science"?

Why, in English, are there two words for "to do"?

What does the English expression "once in a blue moon" correspond to in French?

How to translate the expression “bon courage” into English?

What does the English expression "catch 22" mean?

In English, what is the difference between the expressions “You and me”

What do you think is wrong with people who think the Earth is flat?

Michel Verheughe I navigated by sextant, in time. Oct. 15

If you meet a person who believes that the earth is flat, ask him why, in Argentina or South Africa, the moon is upside down like here in this image:

The moon on the left, seen in Europe and on the right, in the southern hemisphere. If this person manages to explain it, send me a message, I'm very curious!

Similar questions

Why don't the "theoreticians" of the Flat Earth simply go to the "edge of the Earth" and thus prove to everyone that it is flat?

9% of French people believe that the Earth is flat… How is it possible that so many people believe in this “theory”?

Why do some people still maintain that the Earth is flat?

Why not send flat-earth proponents into space and show them the shape of the earth?

What is an image, which does not come from space, which proves that the Earth is not flat?

How would we live if the Earth was flat?

Black History & Politics

Posted by Cheryl Brown Mon

Philip B. Downing (1857-1934) was an African American inventor from Providence, Rhode Island. He is best known for his two most significant inventions, the street letter box, and operating street railway switches. Philip had a long career in Boston, Massachusetts as a postal clerk. Retiring in 1927 after working for more than thirty years. In the late nineteenth century and the early twentieth century, at least five patents were filed by Philip with the United States Patent Office. The most significant and recognized inventions of his were the street letter box, and the operating street railway switches. Shortly after 1880 when Philip met and married Evangeline Howard, he had two children. Antonia Downing, and Philip Downing Jr. Around this time the census records indicated that Philip had moved to Boston, Massachusetts.

File:Old mail box.jpg - Wikipedia

https://en.m.wikipedia.org/wiki/File:Old_mail_box.jpg

Source: Wikipedia, Black History

Reporting The Real Deal

Read Reporting The Real Deal for Black History facts, news, politics, education, and current news affecting African Americans.

http://reportingtherealdeal.com

SOCIAL MEDIA eContent Hiring to read: The Last Hour of Your Day: How to Optimize It For Success

World Read Aloud Day Replay

Thank you for being a part of World Read Aloud Day!

World Read Aloud Day was an absolute blast, and we had readers from near & far participating.

We even saw thousands of folks joining in from each of the 50 states and countries like Italy, Romania, Georgia, Columbia, Canada, Argentina, and many more - how cool is that?

And if you missed our live event, don't worry; there's a replay on our YouTube channel (go subscribe), plus grab your copy of the activity book while it's still available. It’s time to dive into some great reads!

WATCH NOW

Who let the monsters out?

Jeff's dynamic reading of Monsters Have Manners at WRAD was such a riot that we made the book available NOW on Amazon!

BUY NOW

It's time to inject some monstrous manners into classrooms all over the world. Get your copy today and introduce kids to monster-style politeness - it may just be contagious!

Is Rocky Marciano's boxing style hard for most professional boxers to copy?

Jawed Akrim

Boxing fan, big-fight analyst, tactician & historianThu

To be perfectly honest, Marciano's old school brawler style in it's purest form is all but extinct…in no way does this detract or belittle his unique legacy. He was a great fighter of his time & an all time great, but that style isn't worth copying anymore…it's far too risky !

His era is long gone & I just can't see anyone boxing with Marciano's approach — in this modern heavyweight era.

To simplify his old school approach, he often took at least one punch to land one of his own . Essentially it was a trade off, of his toughness against his opponent's…Now this bread & butter approach may have worked in that bygone era, when his opposition too weighed below 200lbs.

In this modern era of gargantuan heavyweights — you simply can't afford to take a punch to land one of your own. It doesn't take Einstein to figure out, what may happen to Marciano's face, if he used this same style against a precision hitter such as a Tyson, Holmes or Lewis.

Like almost all other sports, boxing has evolved & changed — for better & worse. In many ways, Mike Tyson was a revamped version of Marciano or Frazier. Now one thing that these three great, smallish heavyweights had in common — was freak genetics…so their legendary freakishness simply precludes 99% of heavyweights out there from using their style because the majority simply lack the pre- requisite, brawler's tool- box.

Related Links

Who punched harder, Rocky Marciano or Mike Tyson?

From 1950 to 1955, if Rocky Marciano had wanted to fight the absolute best heavyweights in the world at the time, who would he have fought that he didn't actually fight?

Who would win in a fight between Rocky Marciano and Muhammad Ali? Why?

Why is Rocky Marciano never considered a top heavyweight of all time?

Who would win in a fight between; Rocky Marciano and Joe Frazier (both in their prime)?

How would a boxing match between Sonny Liston and Rocky Marciano have gone?

Can Rocky Marciano really be considered as a heavyweight?

What is the difference between American Style boxing and Mexican Style boxing?

Who would win in a boxing bout, Francis Ngannou or Rocky Marciano?

Who would win in a match between Prime Roy Jones Jr and Rocky Marciano

Shanee Moret

Founder, Inbound Marketing Strategist, Community Builder

DJIBOUTI

National Flag and Emblem

Locator Map

TEXT HIGHLIGHTS: Diaries updates, key events, brief analysis and relating news articles in timeline

Overview

Djibouti, a small country in the Horn of Africa, was part of a region colonized by the French and was part of the Land of Punt in the ancient past. In the late-19th century, French Somaliland was established when ruling Somali and Afar sultans signed the land over to France.

From 1862 until 1894, the land to the north of the Gulf of Tadjoura was called Obock and was ruled by Issa Somalis and Afar Sultanates, local authorities with whom France signed various treaties between 1883 and 1887 to first gain a foothold in the region. The French subsequently founded Djibouti city in 1888, with the area at the time uninhabited. A few years later, in 1896, the French made the town the capital of French Somaliland. Djibouti City was inhabited first by Issa Somalis.

Djibouti (Arabic: جيبوتي, French: Ville de Djibouti, Somali: Magaalada Jabuuti, Afar: Gabuuti) is the capital city and largest settlement of Djibouti, home to 604,013 inhabitants, with over 60% of the nation's population residing in Djibouti city or its surrounding suburbs, and is also the economic centre of the country. Located in the coastal Djibouti Region on the Gulf of Tadjoura, it is regional administrative and commercial hub.

Origins of name: "Jibuti" is meaning in Afari "melting pot".

Djibouti named after "Djibouti" the main port.

In 1869, after the opening of the Suez Canal France expanded it’s interest in northeast Africa offering friendship and assistance to the Sultans around the Gulf of Tadjoura.

By 1897 the boundaries of a protectorate had been agreed and the area was designated as French Somaliland.

Djibouti was first known as French Somaliland when it was established as a French colony in 1888. Independence came relatively late: in 1967 a majority of the population voted in a referendum to remain part of the French Community. The country was then renamed the French Territory of Afars and Issas (the two principal ethnic groups). Djibouti gained independence in June 27th, 1977. Hassan Gouled Aptidon (an Issa-Somali) became the first President and remained in charge until he opted to step down in 1999. He established a one party state dominated by the Rassemblement Populaire pour le Progres (RPP). From 1991-6 the Afars in the North of the country conducted a rebellion against the government, led by the Front pour la Restauration de l'Unite et de la Democratie (FRUD). The civil war ended with the signature of peace and national reconciliation accords in 1996. Ahmed Dini, who led the Afar insurgency from 1991 to 1994, signed an agreement with the government in 2001 and led an opposition party until his death in 2004.

Between 1897 and 1917: A Franco-Ethiopian railway was built linking Addis Ababa with the port of Djibouti. The completion of the Djibouto-Ethiopian rail link prompted the growth of Djibouti Ville, a city region and the main port.

In December 1942: The British invasion of French Somaliland, about 4,000 British troops occupied the town of Djibouti.

In 1946: Djibouti was part of the French overseas Somaliland colony. Renamed French Territories of Afars and Issas (TFAI), two main populations the Afars & Issas in the region.

Djibouti is of major strategic importance due to its location at the end of the Red Sea.

In 1958: The colony gained a degree of self-rule when it became an overseas territory of France and in 1967 its name was changed to the French Territory of Afars and Issas (TFAI)

After a referendum in 1977 Djibouti gained full independence from France as the Republic of Djibouti on the 27th June, 1977.

The country was the last of France's colonies to gain independence, after voting earlier for such independence day to come.

Mr. Hassen Gouled Aptidon, becomes founder president of the "Republic of Djibouti". Since independence, Djibouti city has served as the administrative and commercial capital of the Republic of Djibouti. Since then the country has been ruled as a one-party state by a 65-member unicameral National assembly.

Djibouti has the status of both a city and a state. Djibouti is administratively divided into the five districts of Djibouti, Dikhil, Ali -Sabieh, Obock, and Tadjoura. It is also the seat of the Inter-Governmental Authority on Development (IGAD) as well as several other continental and international organizations. The city is the cultural and industrial center of Djibouti.

Headship since independence: Head of State

A Republic in East Africa on the Gulf of Aden.

Djibouti is a name for the State & the City, that lies across the gulf of Aden from Yemen. Settled around the 3rd century BC by the Arab ancestors of the Afars, it later populated by Somali Issas, through close contacts with the Arabian peninsula for more than one thousand years, the Somali and the Afar ethnic groups in this region became among the first on the African continent to adapt Islam, which believed it was part of the Ottoman empire in Habesh province b/n 1555 to 1884, the involvement of the French in the region had begun in earnest when they took control of the northern port of Obock, then it became the French protectorate of French Somaliland in 1888, the completion of the Djibouto-Ethiopian rail link in 1917 prompted the growth of Djibouti Ville, a city region and the main port. It became a French overseas territory of Afar and Issas (TFAI) in 1946.

Why the name: Djibouti? Ever wondered why a country would be carrying the same name as its capital city? Well … many always wondered what was the meaning of Djibouti, and then why the country carried the same name as its capital city. Located in the coastal Djibouti region on the Gulf of Tadjoura, Djibouti is known as the Pearl of the Gulf of Tadjoura. The origin of the name Djibouti is very controversial. However, there are two versions which are more or less plausible.

The first one is based on an ancient Issa legend whereby the name Djibouti (Jab Bouti) came from a fabulous animal Bouti which used to live in those areas and was a ferocious beast killing goats, and sheeps, and terrorizing hearders. After a relentless hunt, the men defeated the beast, and named the area Jab Bouti or the Bouti's defeat.

The second version comes from the Afari word "Jibuti" is meaning for "melting pot". Then Djibouti named after "Djibouti" the main port. In other version of Afaris, the current region of Djibouti remains Gabod (plateaux or uplands). The Arab sailors then called it Gabouti, and later on, French colonial masters have turned it into Djibouti.

As you read these two versions, someone realizes quickly that Djibouti is the land of two main groups: the Issas and the Afars. From 1860 to 1894, the region north of the Gulf of Tadjoura was known as Obock, and was ruled by Issa Somalis, and Afar Sultans, with whom the French signed several treaties to start the colonization of the area. That is why they (the French) later (between 1967 and 1977) called it the French Territory of the Afars and Issas (Territoire Français the Afars et des Issas (TFAI). The French founded Djibouti city in 1888, and later made it the capital of French Somaliland in 1896. In the 1900s, the city considerably grew in size thanks to the construction of the Imperial Ethiopian Railway which linked Djibouti to southern Ethiopia and the Ogaden.

Djibouti city is strategically positioned near the world's busiest shipping lanes (the Red Sea and the Gulf of Aden) and acts as a refueling and transshipment center. The Port of Djibouti is the principal maritime port for imports to and exports from neighboring Ethiopia. Additionally, the city hosts a number of foreign embassies, foreign military bases (French, American, German, Japanese, etc), and is the headquarters of many international organizations, non-profit organizations and companies. Djibouti-Ambouli International Airport is the main domestic airport, connecting the capital to various major global destinations. Since June, 1977, the city has served as the capital of the Republic of Djibouti. Together with Somaliland (northern Somalia), Eritrea, and the Red Sea territory of Sudan, the Republic of Djibouti is thought to be the most likely location of the land known to ancient Egyptians as Punt, a kingdom which had close ties with ancient Egypt during the reign of Pharaoh Sahure and Queen Hatshepsut. The pearl of Gulf of Tadjoura, Djibouti, which of the two legends, in your opinion, is closer to the real origin of the name Djibouti?

Djibouti gained it's independence in 27th June 1977, it's the succession to French Somaliland, later known as the Territory of France Afar & Issas (T.F.A.I), which was created in the first half of the nineteenth century as a result of French, the protective power's interest, in the horn of Africa. Mr. Hassen Gouled Aptidon, becomes the founding president for the "Republic of Djibouti", on June 27, 1977, turned Djibouti into a one party rule to serve as president unopposed until the breakout of a civil war, known as the Afar insurgency in 1991.

Djibouti's first multi-party presidential elections held in 1999 resulted in the election of a family clan member Mr. Ismael Omar Guelleh, ex-Interior minister, who grew up his childhood in Dire Dawa city of Ethiopia when the ex-president was to retire the same year, was re-elected to a second final term in 2005. President Ismael Omar Guelleh has two terms and faces another election for his third term in April, 2011. It is not clear if the incumbent president would be eligible to stand for presidential contest again as the Djiboutian constitution bans the president from more than two consecutive terms of six-years, but critics lament changes he made to the constitution last year that scrubbed a two-term limit from the nation's bylaws.

The horn of African nation, Djibouti hosts the only US military base in Africa, the United States has maintained very close ties with the Red sea tiny state. And the French, Djibouti's protective power have also military presence on the sub-region. President Ismael Omar Guelleh's People's Rally for Progress (PRP), has ruled since independence in June, 1977. Mr. Ismael Omar Guelleh who was first elected in 1999, amended the constitution in March, 2010 to allow him to extend his rule by two more six-year terms. Djibouti borders the Red sea and the Gulf of Aden and is seen as strategic partner in the US-led fight against terrorism and piracy. In Djibouti, riot -Police moved against an estimated 6,000 people at an opposition rally on February 18, 2011 in pre-emptive action to prevent a popular uprising, and opposition politicians said five people were killed and dozens wounded. A second rally planned for March 4, did not happen after security forces filled the streets, opposition leaders have been jailed.

Accession to power of president Ismael Omar Guelleh - 9th April,1999 elected.

Tentative Election calendar, April

Djibouti – Timeline Diaries, and related key notes:

825 - Islam introduced to the area.

1862 - France acquires the port of Obock.

1888 - French colony of Somaliland established over the region.

1892 - Djibouti becomes capital of French Somaliland.

1897 - Ethiopia acquires parts of Djibouti after signing a treaty with France.

1917 - Railway connecting the port of Djibouti with the Ethiopian hinterland reaches Addis Ababa.

1946 - Djibouti made an overseas territory within the French Union with its own legislature and representation in the French parliament.

1958 - A referendum was held in neighboring Djibouti (then known as French Somaliland), on the eve of neighbouring Somalia's independence in July 1960, to decide whether or not to join the Somali Republic or to remain with France. The referendum turned out in favour of a continued association with France. Then Djibouti joined the French Community.

1967 - Referendum takes place during which Afar people and Europeans vote to remain part of the French Community: French Somaliland renamed the French Territory of Afars and Issas (TFAI).

1977 - The French Territory of the Afars and the Issas (TFAI) becomes independent as Djibouti with Hassan Gouled Aptidon as founder president.

1979 - People's Progress Assembly party set up with a view to uniting the Afar and Issa peoples.

1981 - Djibouti becomes a one-party state with the People's Progress Assembly as the sole party.

1992 - A constitution allowing for a limited multiparty system adopted: fighting erupts between government troops and the Afar Front for the Restoration of Unity and Democracy (FRUD) in the northeast of the country.

1994 - The government and the main faction of FRUD sign a power-sharing agreement officially ending the civil war: the radical faction of FRUD continues to fight.

1995 - French Judge Bernard Borrel dies under mysterious circumstances in Djibouti. He was advising the Djibouti government, and reportedly investigating arms smuggling.

1999 - President Hassan Guled Aptidon announces that he will not run in the presidential election: Ismael Omar Guelleh elected president.

February 2000 - The government and the radical faction of FRUD sign a peace agreement finally putting an end to the civil war.

March 2000 - Former Prime Minister and leader of the radical faction of FRUD Ahmed Dini Ahmed returns to Djibouti after nine years in exile.

December 2000 - Coup attempt said to have been masterminded by sacked police chief General Yassin Yabeh Galab fails and Yassin charged with conspiracy and breaching state security.

January 2002 - German warships and 1,000 sailors arrive in Djibouti to patrol shipping lanes in Red Sea area, in support of US actions in Afghanistan.

September 2002 - 1992 Law allowing only three other parties to compete with ruling party expires, paving way for full multi-party politics.

September 2002 - Djibouti says it won't be used as a base for attacks against another country in the region. Some 900 US troops set up camp in support of US-led war on terror.

January 2003 - Coalition supporting President Ismael Omar Gelleh - the Union for Presidential Majority - wins Djibouti's first free multi-party elections since independence in 1977.

September 2003 - Government begins drive to detain and expel illegal immigrants, thought to make up 15% of population.

April 2004 - At least 50 people died in flooding in the capital.

April 2005 - Presidential elections: Incumbent President Ismael Guelleh is the sole candidate.

April 2006 - More than 90 passengers drown when a boat carrying hundreds of pilgrims capsizes shortly after leaving port.

May 2006 - First human bird flu case in sub-Saharan Africa confirmed in Djibouti.

November 2006 - A UN report says several countries, including Djibouti, have flouted a 1992 arms embargo on Somalia by supplying the rival Islamist administration in Mogadishu. Djibouti denies the allegation.

March-April- 2007 Drought declared in some inland areas. United Nations World Food Program (WFP) says some 53,000 people could go without food rations unless funding is found.

October 2007 - Mass protests against international arrest warrants issued in France for officials accused of blocking probe into 1995 death of French judge Bernard Borrel.

January 2008 - Djibouti begins legal battle with France in the International Court of Justice in The Hague over the probe into the death of French judge Bernard Borrel.

February 2008 - Ruling coalition wins all 65 seats in parliamentary elections which are boycotted by the three main opposition parties.

June 2008 - Fighting breaks out between Djiboutian and Eritrean troops in the disputed Ras Doumeira border area. At least nine Djiboutian soldiers killed. US condemns Eritrean "aggression" but Eritrea denies launching an attack.

International Court of Justice rules that France is not obliged to share information it gathered in investigation into the 1995 death of French judge Bernard Borrel.

April 2009 - UN Security Council says Eritrea has failed to fulfill its obligation to withdraw troops from disputed border area of neighboring Djibouti. Eritrea denies having troops on Djiboutian soil.

December 2009 - UN Security Council approves tough sanctions against Eritrea for supplying weapons to opponents of the Somali government and refusing to resolve border dispute with Djibouti. The Djibouti government welcomes the move.

April 2010 - Parliament approves constitutional amendment allowing president to run for a third term.

June 2010 - Eritrea, Djibouti agree to resolve their border dispute peacefully.

February 2011 - Thousands gather for rare protest demanding regime change. At least two people are killed in confrontation with police.

March 11, 2011: Djibouti police arrested four opposition leaders. Djibouti opposition groups claimed that the four leaders were going to demonstrate against the current government. The arrests were illegal and thus an attempt to intimidate the opposition.

April – 2011 Ismael Omar Guelleh wins a third term as president in an election boycotted by the opposition.

June to September – 2011 Horn of Africa hit by worst drought in 60 years.

December 2011 - First consignment of troops from Djibouti arrives in Somali capital, Mogadishu, to bolster the African Union force there.

February 2012 - IMF approves $14 million loan to boost Djibouti's drought - hit finances.

February 2013 - Opposition groups contest parliamentary elections after their 2008 boycott. They reject the result, which gave the governing Union for the Presidential Majority 49 of 65 seats and plan protests.

March 14, 2013: A Djibouti's Constitutional Council denied an opposition party challenge to the country's February national election results. The council is the highest legal authority in Djibouti. The ruling means that Djiboutian president Ismail Omar Gulleh will continue to control the legislature. Djibouti's main opposition group, the Union of National Salvation (UNS), claimed the election was rigged. The complaint was dismissed on technical grounds. The council said the UNS petition was not filed on time.

September 19, 2013: DJIBOUTI: USN issues new call to president Omar Guelleh'

ION The Union pour le Salut National (USN, opposition coalition) has reiterated the call it made in April to President Ismaël Omar Guelleh asking him to intervene to take the dialogue between it and the government out of deadlock.

September 20, 2013: Djibouti commences U.S.$600 Million Rail to Link Ethiopia, S. Sudan'

ERTA: ADDIS ABABA - The Djibouti Government said that its rail project under construction would facilitate business activities and improve revenue for countries in the East African region.The rail project is being undertaken by

China Civil Engineering Construction Corporation (CCECC) at a cost of 600 million dollars and financed by the China EXIM Bank. Djibouti's Transport Minister, Moussa Ahmed, had on Tuesday inaugurated a committee to supervise the project expected to be completed within two years. Ahmed, who is attending the Joint Rail Commission meeting in Addis Ababa told News Agency of Nigeria (NAN) on Thursday that the railway line "will facilitate access to different markets in the region and will also link Djibouti to South Sudan through Ethiopia." Meanwhile Ethiopia's Transport Minister, Workneh Gebeyehu said that the new railway line would change the socio-economic conditions of the two countries as well as generate jobs for youths. Workneh appealed to the project handlers and the government of Djibouti to ensure its completion within the time frame for the speedy realization of its economic benefits to the countries. The Ethiopian Government is also undertaking a similar project handled by the Chinese company linking Addis Ababa with Djibouti. The Ethiopian project is also expected to be completed within the next two years, the Ethiopian transport minister said.

Djibouti tells US to remove drones from its Soil’

EAN - By Jacey Fortin (September 27, 2013) Safety concerns have shuttered one of the United States' most important -- and most secretive -- bases for drone operations, forcing the American military to move its fleet of unmanned craft away from the international airport in the tiny desert country of Djibouti. Djibouti, whose capital city goes by the same name, is an arid country of just 8,880 square miles (23,000 square kilometers) tucked between Ethiopia, Eritrea and Somalia. Its port lies at the nexus of the Red Sea and the Gulf of Aden, along one of the world's busiest shipping routes. And, since 2002, the U.S. military has made Camp Lemonnier "the primary base of operations for U.S. Africa Command in the Horn of Africa." It is the central hub for surveillance drones and armed drone operations into Yemen, where al Qaeda in the Arabian Peninsula is based: and Somalia, home to the al-Shabab, whose fighters perpetrated the gruesome massacre in Nairobi, Kenya, this weekend.

There are about 4,000 U.S. troops, contractors and personnel at Camp Lemonnier, which was first established as a colonial outpost by the French Foreign Legion and is situated next to the Djibouti-Ambouli International Airport, at the edge of the capital city. But, for the Djiboutian government, that proximity has become a problem. At least five drones based in Djibouti have crashed since January 2011, which is around the time the U.S. military began drastically ramping up its drone program in Djibouti. By last year, unmanned vehicles were taking off from Camp Lemonnier several times a day, and at least eight Predator drones, capable of firing missiles, were based there. But, with Djibouti growing increasingly concerned about drone crashes that could harm civilians or crash into commercial aircraft (no drone accidents have caused fatalities in Djibouti yet, but at least one crashed near a residential neighborhood) the government there has forced the Pentagon to move its drone operations farther afield. The U.S. drone program is no stranger to controversy. It was a Djibouti-based drone that took the life of al Qaeda operative and American citizen Anwar al-Awlaki, who was an born in the U.S. and studied there before returning to Yemen, and whose teenage son also died in the strike.

That particular drone mission has been criticized perhaps more than any other, raising concerns about the legality of unmanned strikes against suspected militants. But the situation on the ground in Djibouti shows that drone warfare -- along with the infrastructure, security and secrecy required to sustain it -- can also be objectionable to friendly host countries. The relationship between Djiboutian nationals and the U.S. military grew especially tense this summer, after the military contractor KBR, Inc. (NYSE:KBR) took over base-support services under a contract worth $35 million -- less than half the cost of the old contract. In order to deliver those savings, KBR pursued cost-cutting measures that included cutting its support staff from about 1,000 workers - mostly Djiboutian citizens -- down to 600. In response, the remaining 600 staffers went on strike, leaving troops to pitch in on camp upkeep wherever possible. Though the strike has been resolved, it hurt the relationship between the U.S. military and the Djiboutians, notwithstanding the military's ongoing hearts-and-minds outreach projects in the capital city. According to the Washington Post, the Horn of Africa drone program is now operating from a makeshift airstrip in the country's arid hinterlands, called Chabelley Airfield. It took a seven-month scramble -- and $13 million -- for the military to make the transition complete. It is unclear how long this situation will persist, or whether the U.S. will have to find another hub for drone surveillance and warfare in the Horn of Africa. If so, it would be a major setback: the Department of Defense was making plans last year to bulk up the base with up to $1.4 billion in investments over the next few years. In addition, the U.S. has been looking to extend its drone operations to more bases all around the world -- but this snafu in Djibouti does not bode well for those efforts.

September 30, 2013: Djibouti - Small FRUD attack in the north’

ION - At about 2 am on September 27, some 15 members of the Afar rebel movement, the Front pour la Restauration de l'Unité et la Démocratie (FRUD) attacked the Bobo’to military camp, two kilometres from Alayli

Dadda in the northern part of Obock district and 20 or so kilometres from the border with Eritrea.

October 26, 2013: DJIBOUTI - Abdourahman Boreh blocked in Dubai'

EAN: There is no end in sight to the chase between Djiboutian President Ismail Omar Guelleh and his former friend now dissident and rival Abdourahman Mahamoud Boreh.

Repeated arrests used to hound independent journalists - RWB'

Reporters San-Frontières: (December 18, 2013) Reporters Without Borders is alarmed by a wave of arbitrary arrests of journalists working for La Voix de Djibouti, an independent news website, and the increasingly violent methods that the police are using with journalists. Four journalists have been arrested in the past 10 days, some of them have been mistreated, and two of them are still being held in a completely illegal manner. "The way this systematic harassment is conducted would be absurd except that journalists are being deprived of their freedom and their health is being threatened," Reporters Without Borders said. "A journalist has been released one day and arrested again the next, without reason. "President Ismael Omar Guelleh's government is no longer even trying to hide its determination to persecute the country's only independent news outlet. We call for the immediate release of Moustapha Abdourahman Houssein and Mohamed Ibrahim Waiss, who are being held in illegal and dangerous conditions." Houssein was re-arrested yesterday as he was going to Hodan police station, where he had previously been held, to recover personal effects. He is now being held at Nagad detention centre, where he has reportedly been tortured and is now on hunger strike.

Houssein was previously arrested together with Sahal Elmi Talan, a young reporter, as they were covering the eviction of street vendors by police from Djibouti City's central market on 14 December. They were released two days later. While detained, Houssein was hit with force on the ear by the police director-general, Col. Abdillahi Aldi Farah, in person. A medical certificate confirms that the blow ruptured his eardrum. Houssein had also been arrested and roughed up on 4 December. Waiss was arrested on 12 December while covering a demonstration by women demanding that the government keep its promise to rehouse them after their neighbourhood was demolished. He was transferred to the capital's main Gabode prison on 16 December on an order issued by the state prosecutor. Farah Abadid Hildid, a journalist with La Voix de Djibouti who is also vice-president of the Djibouti Human Rights League (LDDH) and a member of the opposition MRD party, was arrested on 7 December and released on the evening of the same day. Djibouti is ranked 167th out of 179 countries in the 2013 Reporters Without Borders press freedom index établi par Reporters San-frontières.

US military steps up operations in the Horn of Africa’

BBC, Djibouti - By Frank Gardner, security correspondent (February 14, 2014)

The US is dramatically increasing the tempo of its military operations in the Horn of Africa in an effort to counter violent extremism, in the wake of last year's Westgate attack in Nairobi. Missile strikes by US drones against al -Shabab and al-Qaeda leaders are "vital" and will continue according to the government of Djibouti, from where the controversial drone strikes are launched. Washington has been building up a large military base in Djibouti and training regional armies to fight al-Shabab in Somalia.

'Complex problem' Beneath a blazing sun, gunmetal grey helicopters line the runway at this former French Foreign Legion base, now leased by Washington from the government of Djibouti. The helicopters and rows of other US aircraft are equipped for long-range missions, some covert, some more conventional. The Pentagon's recently created East Africa Response Force (EARF) is here. Its soldiers flew at short notice to South Sudan in December to protect the US embassy and its staff, a lesson learnt from the catastrophic attack on the poorly defended US consulate in Benghazi. The US taskforce here, under the catchy title of "Combined Joint Task Force Horn of Africa," or CJTF-HOA, was set up nearly 12 years ago.

Back then, Washington's aim was to stop al-Qaeda operatives from migrating westwards from Pakistan into East Africa, by interdictions and showing nations in the region how to improve their security. This week I put it to the Task Force Commander, US Brigadier-General Wayne Grigsby, that while that migration may have been checked, the Horn of Africa region is hardly a success story when it comes to security. Al -Shabab in Somalia have become proficient in laying roadside bombs and have launched attacks beyond their borders in Kenya and Uganda, while al-Qaeda in Yemen has three times succeeded in getting explosive devices on board international flights. All this, while CJTF-HOA was doubling in size. "It's a complex problem," admits Gen Grigsby, who only assumed command this year. But he says the Pentagon's aim is to get others in the region to take on the burden of defeating al-Shabab. "Our mission here is to enable our East African partners to actually neutralise violent extremists throughout eastern Africa. "It also enables strategic access and freedom of movement. The purpose is to protect the United States and its interests abroad."

'Garrison town' Djibouti, an impoverished former French colony, has close links to the region's two most troubled nations, Yemen and Somalia, where US boots on the ground would not be popular. But Djibouti has decided to throw in its lot with Washington and the West, becoming effectively the region's garrison town. The French still maintain a major base here with over 2,000 servicemen and women, their Mirage fighter jets thundering down the runway shared with the civilian international airport. The Germans, Italians and Japanese are all here, conducting counter-piracy operations in the Gulf of Aden and beyond. But the biggest presence by far is American - there are more than 4,000 people on the base at Camp Lemonnier.

Housed in a compound within a compound are hundreds of highly secretive Special Forces operatives from JSOC - US Joint Special Operations Command. They bypass normal camp authority, taking their orders direct from their own command in Florida. Huge men with beards and steely expressions, they keep to themselves, often deploying at night. Their primary target is the command leadership of al-Shabab across the border in Somalia. Since four gunmen from that group killed more than 60 shoppers in Nairobi's Westgate mall in September, Washington has injected a new urgency into its hunt to track down the leaders before they can plan more attacks.

Drone strikes: One controversial tool in JSOC's arsenal is the use of missile strikes by unmanned Reaper drones. Until last September they took off from this base but after a number of crashes and near misses the Djibouti government asked the Americans to move them out to a desert runway. The drone strikes have continued, sometimes killing civilians and attracting condemnation from human rights groups as "extrajudicial killings". So I asked Djibouti's Foreign Minister, Mahmoud Ali Youssuf if this bothered him. "We feel that really Djibouti is one of the top targets of al -Shabab in the region," he replied, adding that: "These people are very dangerous, the al - Shabab and al-Qaeda elements. So whatever it takes. "If we can contain them, ok, if we can get rid of them it's better. "But we don't have to waste time in asking each and every time ourselves if we should use drones or not". It certainly looks like America is here to stay. Fresh building work is still under way at the camp. So as long as this remains a troubled region and Djibouti is happy to play host, Washington has a firm foothold on the Horn of Africa. The drone strikes against militant leaders look set to continue.

PRESS: News website correspondent still incommunicado 48 hours after arrest’

Reporters Without Borders (RWB) calls on interior minister
Hassan Darar Houffaneh and justice minister Ali Farah Assowehto of Djibouti immediately reveal why La Voix de Djibouti correspondent Houssein Ahmed Farah was arrested two days ago, where he is being held and what his current status is. "According to our information, Farah is still at Djibouti's central police station, where he is being refused visits," Reporters Without Borders (RWB) said. "No reason has so far been given for his detention. It is intolerable that we are still without any news of this journalist 48 hours after his arrest." Reporters Without Borders continues to be concerned about his state of health. Farah was arrested at around 11 a.m. on 8 August in Djibouti-Ville by two police officers, Col. Abdoulkader Ibrahim Gona and Colonel Abdillahi Hassan Boulaleh.Reporters Without Borders has meanwhile learned that Djibouti's authorities have just blocked access to five Somali news websites Waagacusub.com, Sunatimes.com, Galmudug news. com, Halbeegnews.com and Qurbejoog.com. Waagacusub.com recently posted confidential documents about transfers of money between Djibouti's intelligence services and officials in Somaliland, a breakaway Somali territory that adjoins Djibouti. This is not the first time Djibouti's authorities have blocked news websites. The former web radio Farah works for and which is now a news website– La Voix de Djibouti lavoixdedjibouti.com - cannot be accessed from within Djibouti. To circumvent this censorship, Reporters Without Borders created a mirror site lavoixdedjibouti.rsf.org that enables Internet users in Djibouti to access the website. La Voix de Djibouti's website recently posted some of the confidential documents that had been revealed by Waagacusub.com.

PROTEST: Djibouti police clash with opposition protesters for 2nd day'

DJIBOUTI (Reuters) February 27, 2013: - Djibouti police clashed with protesters who are demanding the release of opposition leader Sheikh Bashir Abdourahim. Djibouti security forces fought running battles with opposition supporters for a second day in an attempt to disperse protests against the ruling coalition's parliamentary election victory, witnesses said. Djibouti hosts the United States' only military base in Africa and is an important ally in the U.S.-led fight against militant Islam. The former French colony's port is also used by foreign navies protecting the Gulf of Aden's shipping lanes, some of the busiest in the world, from Somali pirates.

Riot police fired tear gas to scatter hundreds of chanting demonstrators outside the Justice Ministry who were demanding the release of Sheikh Bashir Abdourahim, a prominent opposition figure whose family said he had been arrested on Monday. "Not only did they steal our election victory, they're throwing into jail the people we voted for," Ali Saleh, a university student, told Reuters. Protesters pledged to keep up the unrest until President Ismail Omar Guelleh's government collapses. The dispute over the poll raises the specter of instability in the tiny but strategically important Red Sea state. Guelleh's Union for the Presidential Majority (UMP) declared victory in the election, claiming 49 out of the National Assembly's 65 seats. The opposition rejected the vote as flawed and promised demonstrations. International observers however reported no major incidents during the electoral process.

Ismael Guelleh has effectively presided over a one-party state since coming to power in 1999. The opposition accuses the 65-year-old leader of mounting oppression against Djibouti's 920,000-strong population. Relatives of Abdourahim, a moderate Islamist who heads the Movement for Democracy and Freedom (MODEL) party, said he had been badly beaten during his detention. In a radio broadcast, Interior Minister Hassan Darar appealed for calm, but made no reference to Abdourahim. Authorities have not confirmed his arrest. By Abdourahim Arteh/Reuters

ECONOMY: Success stories deserve to tell’

ASSESMENT By, Mohammed Ubo (March 2, 2014): With the help of the geostrategic location at the economic gate way to Africa, President Ismail with his patriotic attitude has achieved wide range of economic successes along with other admirable milestone cases in diverse sectors. Taking the advantage of 372 kilometer of Djibouti coastline with annual catch of around 50,000 tons of fish, president Geele has accomplished to move from the single traditional port which Djibouti has used for a long time and managed to build new two ports. According to many economic analysts, these new ports would make Djibouti the hub of the logistical operations in the region and the economic power house of East Africa for the years to come. Mr. Geele has as well secured a strong stable monetary system along with brilliant banking system resulted an investment led economy right across the country. He has succeeded to make Djibouti a model of peace, security and development in the region and in the world at large. This has created a peaceful coexistence among the different ethnic groups within the Republic which has become a dynamic catalyst for this prevailing economic progress. He accomplished to build a number of ports and terminals including oil terminal and container port in Doraleh in 2006 and 2009 respectively. He helped to revive the dying Somali literature which all Somali origins were concerning for many years and has instituted to care the Somali language. During his time in power his government has delivered a number of plausible economic sector reforms delivered annual growth of 5% for many years which is impressive by any standard (African development Bank, 2012). These success stories and others in a long list have crafted to re-elect him with a wide margin of victory in 2011 election despite the rejections from the oppositions.

Although Djibouti has little natural resources which are mostly untapped, Geele with a great deal of bravado disproved and has broken the cycle of poverty and despair during his period in office. He achieved a considerable economic growth in 2013 with the help of extensive port services and revival of foreign direct investment (FDI) which could be good chapters to learn. The Total cost of Doraleh project was US$339 and will work in a capacity of 1.2 to 1.8 million TEUs per year by 2015 (Islamic Development Bank, 2013). Mr. Said Omar Gueleh, General Manager of Djibouti Port once said: “Within the past 10 years, the strategic planning for us has been the development of specialized terminals by encouraging private sector investments. This has resulted to the construction of new specialized platforms, a grain and fertilizer terminal, an oil terminal and a Container Terminal, free zone development.” This wide-ranging progress has grasped the attention of both regional and international investors and activated the influx of the international community to invest this geographically small country which has a strategically thinking leadership. As a result many people predominately from Middle East and the Gulf have been busying with building ports, roads, hotels and etc which immensely contributed the economic well-being of the country. His government also planned the redevelopment of the railway line between Djibouti and Ethiopia which will boost the trade between the two countries. Mr. Geele took the country economically from 1 % growth in 1999 to 5 % in 2013 real GDP growth, with country comparison to the globe at 60 in 2012 estimation (African development Bank, 2013).

President Geele realized to shape a stable monetary system with dynamically functioning central bank along with loads of professional commercial banks which the majority of the African leaders failed to figure. He has formulated a sound and sustainable stable monetary system with Djiboutian franc 177.72 per US dollar in 2013 estimation and that stability has not merely existed few years but has gone for a long number of straight years. In economic point of view, that stable monetary system is a corner stone for both domestic and international investments as investors` main concern in their businesses is the fluctuations of the monetary system.

Prior to president Geele, the economy has been dominated only by port trading and logistical operations but very fortunately during this era of Geele, the country accomplished to receive huge revenues from many other sectors. These sectors include telecommunications, commerce, banks, transport, hotels, tourism and etc which become economic turning point that encouraged private investment and reduced unemployment. Taking the advantage of the land locked countries of Ethiopia and South Sudan, the government of Geele reached and signed to build an oil pipeline agreement among South Sudan—Ethiopia—Djibouti in February 2012 which will generate massive revenues to the economy. As for the electricity and power sector which is the engine and catalyst of progress, president Geele has reached to build electricity line between Ethiopia and Djibouti which reduced the cost of the electricity and boosted up the economic growth as no country realizes economic development without low-priced and abundance of energy.

In addition Geele thrived to fabricate sound financial sector. President Geele once said this: "The fact that internationally renowned companies are coming to our free zone means that our aspiration to become a hub for exchange of goods is becoming a concrete reality. The boom witnessed in the banking sector is a further indicator evidencing the new economic shape of the country. Such investments, and many other ones, whether in the small industry sector or in the primary sector, are the precursor of jobs and sustained development so much needed by our citizens." African Development Bank elaborated in 2012 annual report that the financial sector developed swiftly between 2006 and 2010 with the coming of new banks. There were two banks in 2005 but very fortunately there are 12 banks for the time being in 2014 which generates 14% of the Djibouti gross domestic product (GDP). The only tragic mistake is the interest rate in most of those banks: 10% interest rate for housing loans, 12% for normal loans and 15% for overdrafts (African Economic Outlook, 2012). And interest is not allowed to charge in Islam.

In conclusion, the success stories of Djibouti under the leadership of president Geele, With reference to what he has achieved apart from the politics, could be a shining example for East African leaders and Africa at large. Unlike some countries in East Africa, under the leadership of Geele, Djibouti has avoided all internal unrests, cross border disputes, civil disorders, piracies and terrorism. And as aforementioned, he has achieved in many areas including building new ports and electricity line from Ethiopia which have created to pull many deprived people out of poverty. In accordance with UNDP 2009 Report, Djibouti has been one of the countries that made the greatest progress for lowering hunger and undernourishment while many countries like Egypt, Morocco, Jordan, Lebanon and Yemen have been recorded increases in hunger and undernourishment. Though some people think that president Geele has not performed well during his term in office, he has by any standard succeeded to boost the economic wellbeing of the population. As a final point, despite many social and economic challenges are ahead on president Geele, he teaches his people how to seek and search for the 21st century opportunities in peace. Mohamed Ubo is an Independent researcher

The United States and China vie for influence in the Horn of Africa'

By Robert O'Brien, Former US Representative to the United Nations (March 2, 2014):

East Africa is a national security and foreign policy hot spot for the United States. African Union forces are fighting the militant Islamist insurgency Al Shabab in Mogadishu, Somalia, where the US and UN-backed Transitional Federal Government is attempting to establish itself. Al Shabab has responded with suicide bombings in Uganda and has threatened other countries in the region. Combined Naval Task Force 151, led by the EU, patrols the Indian Ocean attempting to stem Somali piracy, some of which is sponsored by Islamic terrorist groups. Yet the pirates continue to brazenly capture ships, including American vessels, as far away as the Seychelles and Mozambique. Terrorism experts report that all of East Africa is at high risk of Al Qaeda terrorist activity, with Kenya and Uganda being the leading targets.

After a week of voting in the Sudan, African Christians in the South are expected to have overwhelmingly cast their ballots for freedom from the Arab-dominated North that currently governs the country. Despite recent hopeful signals from Sudanese President Omar Bashir, few believe that Khartoum will allow the oil-rich South to leave Sudan without bloodshed.

Sudan's extensive oil reserves, new oil finds in Somalia and Uganda and the region's rich mineral deposits also make East Africa a key strategic region for the global economy. As a commodities treasure chest, the region is of interest to China.

America's key ally with respect to all of these issues is Kenya. It is from Nairobi that the UN supports the Transitional Federal Government in Somalia. Somali pirates captured on the high seas are turned over to Kenyan courts for trial. Kenya has been an important supporter of the South Sudanese government and has reportedly trained its defense forces. The Kenyan National Security Intelligence Service (NSIS), which was formed in the aftermath of the 1998 bombing of the US Embassy in Nairobi, has assisted American law enforcement agencies in arresting a number of terrorists in the country. As a member of the British Commonwealth and a parliamentary democracy, Kenya has traditionally been an ally of the West and wary of Russian or Chinese initiatives in Africa.

Consequently, it was not helpful last month when Kenyan daily newspapers splashed classified US State Department cables disclosed by WikiLeaks on their front pages. Papers touting the "The Secret Files" and "Revealed: [US] Envoy's Road Map for 'Regime Change'" were hawked by newsboys and snapped up by Kenyans on busy Nairobi traffic circles. One cable from Embassy Nairobi reportedly stated that "most of the political and economic elite compose the vested interests that benefit from and support impunity and the lack of accountability with respect to governance, state resources, and the rule of law. This includes President Kibaki and Prime Minister Odinga…"

According to the Daily Nation, just prior to the release of the cables by WikiLeaks, U.S. Assistant Secretary of State for Africa Johnny Carson called the Kenyan prime minister to warn him about the leaked cables and to apologize for some of the comments contained therein. Putting aside the merits of the Embassy's reporting from Kenya, the effect of the leaked cables could seriously damage American relations with its important partner in East Africa at a critical time. Fortunately for the United States, for now, the Kenyan government has publicly brushed the matter aside. Assistant Secretary Carson's telephone diplomacy may have averted a freeze in relations.

Djibouti signs Defense Agreement with China'

East African News: (March 4, 2014) - The governments of China and Djibouti have signed an agreement to promote mutually beneficial co-operation in the defense industry. The agreement signed between Defense Ministers, Chang Wanquan and Hassan Darar of China and Djibouti respectively, will reportedly see the east African nation become China's defense arm in the region.

Reports indicate that Djiboutian authorities have appealed for foreign assistance in order to strengthen the country's Armed Forces and to consolidate peace in the sub-region. Hassan revealed that his country continues to face security threats, which includes terrorism and piracy. He further noted that the country is set to expand its navy and air force.

Reports indicate that the Chinese government will provide some air crafts to Djibouti.Hassan reportedly voiced his support for increased co-operation between the Chinese government and his country, particularly in technology transfer and training in the aviation and engineering sectors. He also extended his gratitude to the Asian nation for her support to his country.

During his two-day visit to Djibouti, Wanquan also held talks with the President Ismail Omar and other senior officials. Reports indicate that the Chinese government is growing to become one of the strongest partners of Djibouti. According to reports, bilateral relations between the two countries have grown steadily since diplomatic ties was established between in 1979. Consequently, the two countries have had cordial relations in the areas of culture, health, and education, reports indicate.

In 2012, the two nations reportedly signed an accord to launch a Joint Ministerial Commission in order to deepen and expand economic co-operation. Also, last year, the two nations reportedly signed a power agreement which will see Djibouti's energy supply boosted significantly. Observers say the economic and political ties between Djibouti and China is quickly transforming the small nation on the horn of Africa into a significant gateway for Chinese merchandise.

DJIBOUTI: Independent radio's website editor detained again'

(RSF) March 14, 2014 Reporters Without Borders is concerned about the detention of Maydaneh Abdallah Okieh, the website editor of the independent radio station La Voix de Djibouti (LVD), who was arrested at his home on 9 March and has been held since. "We demand the immediate release of Okieh, who was arrested arbitrarily for having covered a meeting of the National Salvation Union (USN), an opposition alliance," said Cléa Kahn Sriber, the head of the Reporters Without Borders Africa desk.

"It is the job of journalists to observe and report, and as such they must be free to do their work, which includes reporting dissenting views. Is President Ismael Omar Guelleh's government so fragile that it cannot tolerate the least criticism?" Okieh was arrested at his home in Cité Maka Moukarama, in the Djibouti City suburb of Balbala, on 9 March by gendarmes from the Balbala - based Sheik Moussa Brigade and was transferred to Gabode central prison the next day, where holding conditions are known to be dire.

The police said they had been looking for him since 4 March, when he covered a USN meeting in Balbala and saw gendarmes use violence to break up the meeting. He appeared in court on 11 March on a charge of disturbing public order. The court is supposed to issue a verdict on 18 March. Okieh spent two long spells in Gabode prison last year. He was held for six months, from 15 May to 19 October, on charges of “insulting a police officer” and “defaming the police” for posting photos on his Facebook page that showed police breaking up an opposition protest.

Before that, he was held from 4 March to 10 April on charges of inciting a rebellion and inciting illegal demonstrations. Djibouti is ranked 169th out of 180 countries in the 2014 Reporters Without Borders press freedom index. This is two places lower than in the 2013 index.

May 7, 2014: Special Operations: In A Secret Desert Base’

STRATEGY PAGE: The United States is spending nearly a billion dollars to expand its operations in Djibouti (northeast Africa). There is one official U.S. military base in Africa, the one in Djibouti. France and the United States SOCOM (Special Operations Command) have had special operations forces (commandos and special aircraft) stationed in Camp Lemonnier, which is next to the main airport outside the Djibouti capital since 2002. The U.S. recently agreed to a ten year lease for Camp Lemonnier with the annual rent payment going from $38 million to $63 million a year.

There are actually a number of satellite camps around Lemonnier, including one on the coast for training Somali coast guard personnel. Most of the details of the new construction and refurbishment of the existing stuff is classified. A lot of it obviously (via cell phone photos taken by anyone passing by) involves a basic stuff like roads, air strips and buildings as well as training areas. But a lot of new equipment is coming in and discreetly installed.

Djibouti is next to northern Somalia. France had commandos there until the 1990s, when they left and abandoned Camp Lemonnier. The U.S. moved in after September 11, 2001 and French commandos soon joined them. But you don't hear much about this corner of the War on Terror, despite the numerous terror groups in the region (especially Yemen and Somalia). Why is that? Well, it's complicated.

France has been building up their special operations capability in Djibouti since 2006, in anticipation of problems in Eritrea and Somalia, both of which are involved in disputes with Ethiopia. The Addis Ababa (Ethiopia)-Djibouti railroad is pretty lucrative for Djibouti and France because it is Ethiopia's main outlet to the sea, and fighting between Ethiopia and either of its neighbors could create problems there. American and French Special Forces facilities in Camp Lemonnier are pretty easy to spot on Google Earth. Less easy to spot is the fact that France and SOCOM also have access to one or more Ethiopian air bases. American UAVs operate from Ethiopia and Djibouti, while U-28s SOCOM air transports are seen in many other airports (Kenya and Uganda) in the region. The UAVs are sometimes armed with missiles. Some of these armed UAVs are believed to have also operated out of Yemen air bases. When not attacking al Qaeda targets in Yemen, these UAVs are sometimes seen across the Gulf of Aden in Somalia.

U.S. forces in Djibouti were increased after resistance collapsed in Iraq in 2008 and are now the command post for a network of American operations through the region. That includes a UAV facility on the Seychelles Islands (1,500 kilometers to the east) and permission to move troops and aircraft through countries like Kenya and Uganda. There is even a small, and unofficial, CIA base in Mogadishu, the traditional capital of Somalia. The CIA, and similar outfits from other nations, also work from Djibouti. But most of the effort is directed at monitoring what is going on in the region (mainly Somalia and Yemen but also Eritrea, Nigeria, Mali, Libya, Kenya, and Ethiopia) not at interfering with the local terrorists. Not much, anyway. The Djibouti base also supports operations throughout the Sahel (the semi-desert strip between the North African desert and the Central African jungles, which stretches from the Atlantic to Somalia).

One minor part of the expansion project involves moving American UAV operations away from the main French/American military base that is next to the international airport outside the capital. The UAVs will now operate from another airstrip far away from the capital. This is to prevent any accidents involving the American UAVs (mainly 1.1 ton Predators and 4.6 ton Reapers) shutting down Djibouti's main airport. There have been five accidents involving these UAVs in the last two years and Djibouti officials fear it's only a matter of time before an airliner or transport using the international airport collides with one of the UAVs. The Americans pointed out that this has never happened, but it seemed the most diplomatic thing to do was just move the UAVs to another airstrip, 10 kilometers from the current one, that the French and Americans were already using. The move will cost the United States about $13 million.

May 25, 2014: 3 killed, 15 wounded in Djibouti restaurant filled with Western military'

By Abdourahim Arteh

DJIBOUTI (Reuters) - Djibouti's Interior Ministry said on Sunday that two Somalis are suspected of having carried out a suicide bombing at a restaurant filled with Western military personnel on Saturday that killed three and wounded at least 15. Several members of European Union naval and civilian maritime security missions were among those wounded in the attack, including three members of the Spanish military airforce.

The interior ministry did not say if any group was suspected of being responsible for the bombings, the first time such an attack has been carried out in the tiny Red Sea state. Djibouti, host to a French military base and the only U.S. military base in Africa, shares its southern border with Somalia where the al Qaeda-linked group Al Shabaab continues to flourish as the government struggles to impose any order. Al Shabaab is active inside Somalia but has also carried out gun and bomb attacks abroad. Last year, the group killed 67 people at a Kenyan shopping mall. "Early indications of the investigations show that the attackers were two suicide bombers of Somali origin: a man and a veiled woman," the Interior Ministry said in a statement. National security forces took over the restaurant premises and secured the area, the ministry said.

The former French colony's port is used by foreign navies protecting the Gulf of Aden's shipping lanes, some of the busiest in the world, from Somali pirates. The European Union said on Sunday that members of the EU naval mission EUNAVFOR Atalanta and civilian maritime security mission EUCAP Nestor were wounded in the bombing. Spain's Defence Ministry said three Spanish military airforce personnel were injured in the attack, one of whom was seriously hurt by shrapnel. The three were in Djibouti as part of the EUNAVFOR Atalanta mission.

A U.S. Pentagon spokesman said late on Saturday no Defense Department personnel were injured in the attack. Djibouti has troops stationed in Somalia as part of the African Union Mission in Somalia. Somali troops and AMISOM - also comprising troops from Burundi, Uganda, Kenya, Sierra Leone and Ethiopia - drove al Shabaab out of Somalia's capital, Mogadishu, in 2011, but the group still carries out attacks in the city. On Saturday, al Shabaab militants attacked the parliament, killing at least 10 security officers.

DJIBOUTI: Somali Islamists plotting attack: Britain’

By Ilyas A.Abukar AFP (June 12, 2014)

Somalia's Al-Qaeda-linked Shebab insurgents are planning further attacks in the Horn of Africa nation of Djibouti, Britain warned Thursday, after suicide bombers last month attacked a crowded restaurant. "There are credible reports that Al-Shebab plan, and have the capability, to attack targets in Djibouti, including Western interests," the Foreign Office said, noting "there is a high threat from terrorism" in the port city.

Troops from Djibouti are part of the African Union force in Somalia fight ing the Shebab, and Djibouti's port also serves as a key base for ships taking part in international anti-piracy operations off the Somali coast. "Djibouti and Western interests within Djibouti may be seen as a legitimate target by Al-Shebab because of its support to the Somali government and its participation in the African Union peacekeeping mission," the Foreign Office statement said.

Last month at least one person was killed and several wounded when two suicide bombers blew themselves up in a restaurant, the first attack in Djibouti to be claimed by the Shebab since it joined the AU force in 2011. The Shebab said the attack was also carried out in retaliation for Djibouti's hosting of the United States' biggest military base in Africa.

The US base is used for operations across the region, including drone strikes against the Islamists in Somalia. France, the former colonial power, also has a base in the country. Britain has this week also released warnings to citizens in several East African nations -- including Ethiopia, Djibouti, Kenya and Uganda, who all have troops in Somalia -- speaking of the threat of attacks at public screenings of the World Cup.

"Previous terrorist attacks in the region have targeted places where football matches are being viewed," Britain said, adding that crowded areas including "transport hubs, hotels, restaurants and bars" are also possible targets. During the World Cup final four years ago, Shebab insurgents killed at least 76 people after setting off explosions that ripped through two restaurants in the Ugandan capital Kampala. (Text ends)

July 6, 2014: ETHIOPIA/DJIBOUTI: A single country with two chiefs: President, Ismaïl Omar Guelleh puts himself under Ethiopia’s protection’ The plan for economic integration devised by Djibouti and neighbouring Ethiopia could ultimately lead to a kind of political unification between the two countries. (ANALYSIS) - The plan for economic integration devised by Djibouti and neighbouring Ethiopia could ultimately lead to a kind of political unification between the two countries. During the last few weeks, certain Ethiopian dignitaries have hinted at it and one of them even went so far as to utter “a single country with two chiefs”. Ethiopian desire to secure its Djibouti port outlet is nothing new and some people in Addis Ababa have been talking about “an obligatory merger” with Djibouti for years. So far this trend has been latent but is now coming into the fore, because President Ismaïl Omar Guelleh (IOG) needs an Ethiopian umbrella in various sectors, including that of guaranteeing his immunity when he is no longer in power.

Weakened President: The Djibouti president was born in Dire Dawa, Ethiopia, and owns a house in Addis Ababa. He is beginning to show his age (he is 67 according to his official birth date) and his health is not what it used to be. He is currently getting over an operation at the Val -de-Grace military hospital in Paris and he is losing his mobility. Moreover, the traditional Independence Day garden party on 27 June was not held this year, the first time in decades. During the military parade, all measures were taken for him to make the least possible effort: IOG did not even get up to return the salute of the commanders of the parading troops. Nor did he appear on 21 June at the Hotel Kempinski for the presentation of Djibouti Vision 2035, even though it is under his High Patronage. The government, and in particular finance ministerIlyas Moussa Dawaleh have been working on this project for many years. Finally, the cabinet meetings, which are normally held every week, are getting further and further apart.

No successor in sight: IOG has several times reiterated that he will not run in the 2016 election and his state of health suggests that this will indeed be the case. However, from 2006 to 2009 he had also promised that he would not amend the constitution so he could run for another mandate, which he did finally do. At present, he does not give the impression of being particularly keen to prepare a successor. The best placed potential candidate for his succession, presidential secretary general, Ismaïl Tani, from the same Issa/Mamassan ethnic group as IOG, is at the moment not in the good books of the highly influential First Lady Kadra Mahamoud Haid.

In the event of choosing a non-Mamassan, the most likely candidates would be Ilyas Moussa Dawaleh, former health minister Abdallah Abdillahi Miguil, and even the Afar Prime MinisterDileita Mohamed Dileita. But such a change would probably produce strong tension inside IOG’s party Rassemblement populaire pour le progrès (RPP) – an opportunity that the opposition coalition still lying in wait, Union pour le salut national (USN), would not fail to seize. Thus, whether IOG stays in command or hands over the helm in 2016, a turbulent political time is in store and Ethiopian protection could be necessary for him. Furthermore, France and the other western powers present in Djibouti would not intervene militarily to support the regime, unless there is serious foreign aggression.

Economic merger: Many of the companies operating in Djibouti do not want to hear anything about a merger with Ethiopia, as they fear that Djibouti could move from its quite open economic system at present to the frequently more protectionist approach of Ethiopia. However, the current infrastructure projects (railways and roads, for example) favour increased economic integration and good political entente between the two countries.

Ethiopia depends on its neighbour for its trade to transit and is extremely wary of Djibouti becoming destabilised by radical Islamists or Eritrea. Djibouti, for its part, has become dependent on Ethiopia on several counts: importing electricity, attributing land in Serofta in the Oromia Regional State to cultivate cereals for the Djibouti market: another land concession near Shinile (eastern Ethiopia) to extract 100,000 cubic metres of drinking water a day and the construction of a 70 km aqueduct to Djibouti. The firm MAI Resources International (Switzerland) AG chaired by the Swiss national of Kuwaiti extraction Rashad Shawa is working with the Djibouti authorities on this particular project. Djibouti could then sell the water from Ethiopia on to other countries in the Gulf of Aden. (Text ends)

Djibouti put itself under Ethiopia - The new merging state’

(Updates) The plan for economic integration devised by Djibouti and neighboring Ethiopia could ultimately lead to a kind of political unification between the two countries. During the last few weeks, certain Ethiopian dignitaries have hinted at it and one of them even went so far as to utter “a single country with two chiefs”. Ethiopian desire to secure its Djibouti port outlet is nothing new and some people in Addis Ababa have been talking about “an obligatory merger” with Djibouti for years. So far this trend has been latent but is now coming into the fore, because President Ismaïl Omar Guelleh needs an Ethiopian umbrella in various sectors, including that of guaranteeing his immunity when he is no longer in power.

Weakened president - The Djibouti president was born in Dire Dawa, Ethiopia, and owns a house in Addis Ababa. He is beginning to show his age (he is 67 according to his official birth date) and his health is not what it used to be. He is currently getting over an operation at the Val-de-Grace military hospital in Paris and he is losing his mobility. Moreover, the traditional Independence Day garden party on 27 June was not held this year, the first time in decades. During the military parade, all measures were taken for him to make the least possible effort: Ismaïl Omar Guelleh did not even get up to return the salute of the commanders of the parading troops. Nor did he appear on 21 June at the Hotel Kempinski for the presentation of Djibouti Vision 2035, even though it is under his High Patronage. The government, and in particular finance minister Ilyas Moussa Dawaleh have been working on this project for many years. Finally, the cabinet meetings, which are normally held every week, are getting further and further apart.

No successor in sight - Ismaïl Omar Guelleh has several times reiterated that he will not run in the 2016 election and his state of health suggests that this will indeed be the case. However, from 2006 to 2009 he had also promised that he would not amend the constitution so he could run for another mandate, which he did finally do. At present, he does not give the impression of being particularly keen to prepare a successor. The best placed potential candidate for his succession, presidential secretary general, Ismaïl Tani, from the same Issa/Mamassan ethnic group as Ismaïl Omar Guelleh, is at the moment not in the good books of the highly influential First Lady Kadra Mahamoud Haid. In the event of choosing a non-Mamassan, the most likely candidates would be Ilyas Moussa Dawaleh, former health minister Abdallah Abdillahi Miguil, and even the Afar Prime Minister Dileita Mohamed Dileita. But such a change would probably produce strong tension inside Ismaïl Omar Guelleh's party Rassemblement populaire pour le progrès (RPP) – an opportunity that the opposition coalition still lying in wait, Union pour le salut national (USN), would not fail to seize. Thus, whether Ismaïl Omar Guelleh stays in command or hands over the helm in 2016, a turbulent political time is in store and Ethiopian protection could be necessary for him. Furthermore, France and the other western powers present in Djibouti would not intervene militarily to support the regime, unless there is serious foreign aggression.

Economic merger - Many of the companies operating in Djibouti do not want to hear anything about a merger with Ethiopia, as they fear that Djibouti could move from its quite open economic system at present to the frequently more protectionist approach of Ethiopia. However, the current infrastructure projects (railways and roads, for example) favor increased economic integration and good political entente between the two countries. Ethiopia depends on its neighbor for its trade to transit and is extremely wary of Djibouti becoming destabilized by radical Islamists or Eritrea. Djibouti, for its part, has become dependent on Ethiopia on several counts: importing electricity, attributing land in Serofta in the Oromia Regional State to cultivate cereals for the Djibouti market: another land concession near Shinile (eastern Ethiopia) to extract 100,000 cubic meters of drinking water a day and the construction of a 70 km aqueduct to Djibouti. The firm MAI Resources International (Switzerland) AG chaired by the Swiss national of Kuwaiti extraction Rashad Shawa is working with the Djibouti authorities on this particular project. Djibouti could then sell the water from Ethiopia on to other countries in the Gulf of Aden.

DJIBOUTI: China 'Negotiates Military Base' in Djibouti

Aljazeera (May 11, 2015)

DOHA - China is negotiating a military base in a strategic port of Djibouti, the president said, according to the AFP news agency. The move raises the prospect of US and Chinese bases side-by-side in the tiny Horn of Africa nation.

"Discussions are ongoing," President Ismail Omar Guelleh said in an interview in Djibouti, saying Beijing's presence would be "welcome". The AFP did not say when the interview was conducted.

Djibouti is already home to Camp Lemonnier, the US military headquarters on the continent, used for covert, anti-terror and other operations in Yemen, Somalia and elsewhere across Africa.

France and Japan also have bases in the port, a former French colony that guards the entrance to the Red Sea and the Suez Canal, and which has been used by European and other international navies as a base in the fight against piracy from neighbouring Somalia.

China is already financing several major infrastructure projects estimated to total more than $9bn, including improved ports, airports and railway lines to landlocked Ethiopia, for which Djibouti is a lifeline port.

Djibouti dreams of becoming new Dubai

By Karim Lebhour, AFP (May 26, 2015)

For years the Horn of Africa nation Djibouti was seen by foreign powers as a far flung military outpost overlooking the Gulf of Aden.

Now the strategic port wants to capitalise on its key position on one of the world's busiest shipping lanes, the gateway to the Suez canal.

Djibouti offers an African base across from the Arabian Peninsula at the crossroads for cargo traffic between Asia and Europe.

It may be a tiny country of around 850,000 people, but it has a bold ambition to become the commercial hub of eastern Africa, building on its role as the main port for landlocked Ethiopia, Africa's second most populous country.

To achieve that the former French colony has embarked on a series of infrastructure projects expected to cost some $US14 billion.

Offshore from historic Djibouti city, the waters are crowded with a mix of hulking warships, giant container cargo vessels and the traditional wooden fishing dhows that have plied the seas here for centuries.

But a short drive away, Chinese workers are busy building a giant new terminal dedicated to container ships from Asia.

Work is concentrated on the first of six new specialised docking terminals - each one focusing on different commodities including minerals, livestock, oil and gas - to add to the two terminals already in operation.

"More and more shipping lines are interested in Djibouti, we are now making the way to be a Dubai, even Singapore," said Suleiman Ahmed, a senior executive at Doraleh container terminal.

Cargo trade is booming:

It has increased between six and 10 per cent each year, with Djibouti enjoying growth partly because other regional ports are struggling.

Kenya's port city of Mombasa is already overstretched, while the secretive Red Sea state of Eritrea sees little if any traffic.

"Mombasa is congested, Eritrea is not a welcoming country, but Djibouti is a strategic and safe location - we rely on it," Ahmed said.

In a volatile region, Djibouti hopes to build a reputation of stability and security.

It hosts several foreign military bases, including Camp Lemonnier, the US military headquarters on the continent used for covert, anti -terror and other operations in Yemen, Somalia and elsewhere across Africa.

France and Japan also have bases in Djibouti, which has been used by European and other international navies as a base in the fight against piracy from neighbouring Somalia.

Earlier this month, President Ismail Omar Guelleh told AFP that "discussions are ongoing," with China concerning a potential military base, saying Beijing's presence would be "welcome".

Djibouti now wants to position itself as the gateway for Asia into Africa.

"From Egypt to South Africa, the eastern coast of Africa has only nine coastal countries," said Abubaker Omar Hadi, chairman of Djibouti Ports and Free Zones Authority, waving his hand over a map of the continent on the wall of his office.

"This has created 10 landlocked countries, 400 million people who have no access to the sea. They are the ones we want to serve."

For now, Djibouti mainly serves Ethiopia's 94 million consumers.

As well as its massive port expansion, Djibouti wants to add two new airports, a modern railway and build industrial areas.

At present, the country's small airport sees French Mirage fighter jets share its one runway with civilian aircraft. But the government plans to replace that with an international airport with a capacity of 1.5 million passengers annually.

A total of 14 infrastructure projects are planned in Djibouti, mainly financed by Chinese banks.

But some are wary of such huge investments for a country with less than a million people.

"There was no market research and parliament was never consulted," said opposition lawmaker Doualeh Egueh Ofleh, who said he was worried about the financial risk the projects could pose.

"When we take the loans from the World Bank and Western institutions, there was some control ... now with the Chinese, we take all possible loans for all projects without any control," he added, predicting Beijing would control the country's infrastructure if Djibouti failed to repay its debts.

But Djibouti's government is betting on strong African economic growth to recoup the investment.

"Even before Dubai, Singapore and Hong Kong, the economic and maritime hubs in the region were Aden and Djibouti," says port authority chief Abubaker Omar Hadi. "We know what to do to regain our place." (Text ends)

Ismail Omar Guelleh governs family-style’

INSIDERS DJIBOUTI (June 19, 2015)

(ION) Since he became president in 1999, Ismaïl Omar Guelleh (IOG) has built his core power base on members of his own Issa Mamassan clan. They hold numerous key posts even if allies from other ethnic groups are also represented in the upper echelons of state government. For some time, IOG's position on the national political stage has been under challenge, notably from opposition coalition Union pour le Salut National (USN), while his position in the region has been weakened by his problems with United Arab Emirates (ION 1403). As a result, he has tended to rely on his closest partisans and, more particularly, his family connections as he prepares to stand for re-election in the 2016 presidential elections.

He has, therefore, been strengthening the web of family connections which has been woven around his wife, Kadra Mahamoud Haïd, who acts as a sort of vice president, and their two daughters, presidential adviser Haibado and businesswoman Fatouma-Awo. At the same time, the first lady is discreetly preparing her son from a first marriage, Naguib Abdallah Kamil for high political responsibilities, and helping his sister, Nazli, in her business career. IOG himself has business interests in common with several of his numerous half-brothers, particularly with Saad Omar Guelleh, director general of the Port of Djibouti, which is a major source of income for the country and the presidency. One of the president’s cousins, Djama Ali Guelleh,has also managed to hold on to his position as director general of state -owned Electricité de Djibouti (EDD), which served as milking cow for the IOG regime in its early days. This exclusive investigation details all the ramifications of the family network.

DJIBOUTI: The East African: US Worried About China's Military Plans For Djibouti'

(August 11, 2015) Some members of the US Congress have urged the Obama administration to dissuade the government of Djibouti from allowing China to establish a military presence in the Horn of Africa.The concerns centre around the small, strategically situated country, which hosts a large US base used to carry out air and sea patrols and to conduct drone strikes in Somalia and Yemen.

Worries about China’s intentions in Djibouti also reflect Washington’s overall wariness of Beijing’s economic role throughout sub-Saharan Africa, which has surpassed that of the US. China and Djibouti signed a security and defence agreement last year, which analysts suggest may be a prelude to the establishment of a Chinese military installation. Djibouti President Omar Guelleh heightened US qualms when he told the AFP news agency in May that a Chinese deployment in his country would be “welcome.” The presi dent added that discussions with China about such an arrangement are “ongoing.” Beijing has made enormous investments in infrastructure, including an airport, a rail link to Ethiopia and port facilities. But an Africa specialist at a Washington think tank said, “It would make a great deal of sense for China to have a base there.”

Chinese military aircraft with a range of 4,000km would be able to operate over large swathes of Africa and the Arabian peninsula from a base in Djibouti, observed J Peter Pham, director of the African programme at the Atlantic Council.

A Djibouti facility would be a logical link in the “string of pearls” Beijing is threading around the Indian Ocean, Mr Pham said. Beijing says its interests in gaining access to ports in the region are of a purely commercial nature. However, rumours are circulating that the emerging superpower wants to construct a military facility in Obock, a seaside town with an airport north of Djibouti’s capital city.

A Chinese base anywhere in Djibouti “would not be in the US’s strategic interest,” Mr Pham said. But, he added, it is not clear that Washington would expend “the diplomatic capital” needed to dissuade President Guelleh — or China — from establishing such a presence.

The US has made considerable investments in Djibouti, but these are heavily military in nature. President Obama and President Guelleh announced, following a White House meeting two years ago, that a deal had been struck allowing the US to maintain its surveillance and strike capability at Camp Lemonnier, a former French facility that now houses about 4,000 US troops.

It was subsequently revealed that the US will pay Djibouti about $70 million a year for the next 20 years in lease fees for that base, where the US has been making some $500 million’s worth in infrastructure improvements. The Pentagon’s Combined Joint Task Force/Horn of Africa has used Camp Lemonnier since 2002. (Text ends)

China to establish first overseas military base in Djibouti
By Arthur Chatora on November 27, 2015

Africa’s biggest trading partner, China, has signed a 10-year deal with Djibouti to build a military outpost in the country. The base is China’s first overseas military base in Africa and it will be used for “escort and humanitarian operations”

China has signed a deal to open a military base in Djibouti. Above, Djibouti's President Ismail Omar Guelleh (R) and Chinese President Hu Jintao hold talks after a welcoming at the Great Hall of the People, July 18, 2012, in Beijing.

China has announced plans to establish its first overseas military base in Africa, signing a 10-year deal with Djibouti to build a military outpost in the Horn of Africa country.

According to reports, the plans signal a major policy shift for Beijing, which has traditionally invested heavily in economic endeavours such a infrastructure development, manufacturing, mining and agriculture amongst others.

IB Times reported that, “China has long had an economic foothold in Africa, but the base would be an expansion of its military prowess beyond the Asia - Pacific region”.

President Xi Jinping this week said China aims to “build a robust national defense and a strong military that corresponds to our country’s international stature, and is adapted to our national security and developmental interests,” the Xinhua news agency reported.

With the planned military outpost, China has emulated the United States, which also operates its only military base in Africa, based in Djibouti at Camp Lemonnier, used for counterterrorism operations on the continent and in the Middle East.

The military base is expected to provide logistical support for Chinese peacekeeping missions, anti-piracy operations in the Gulf of Aden and escort or security for its imports which traverse the seas.

Hong Lei, China’s Foreign Ministry spokesperson said, “Thes e facilities will help Chinese vessels to better carry out Chinese missions like escort and humanitarian operations,” the New York Times reported.

Djibouti’s President private land plot set on fire in neighboring Ethiopia. Angry protesters put a fire on the land which was given to the president of Djibouti Ismail Omar Guelle. The protesters claimed on February 12, 2016 that the land was given to the outsider while they are removed from their ancestral farmland. The government of Ethiopia says the situation is fully under control but the aggravated protest is causing loss of lives.

Sworn In

Djibouti President for Fourth Term in Office

By Mohamed Olad Hassan, VOA

May 9, 2016

Djibouti's President Ismail Omar Guelleh was sworn in for a fourth term in office Sunday in a ceremony attended by several regional heads of states and dignitaries.

Guelleh took the oath of office at his presidential residence in the capital, Djibouti City. Sudanese President Omar al-Bashir, the President of Rwanda Paul Kagame, Somali President Hassan Sheikh Mohamud and Ethiopian Prime Minister Hailemariam Desalegn were among those in attendance.

Bashir's presence

Bashir is wanted by the International Criminal Court (ICC) on charges of war crimes, genocide and crimes against humanity.

Djibouti, a tiny state in the Horn of Africa, is a party to the Rome Statute of the International Criminal Court of ICC — the founding treaty of the first permanent international court capable of trying perpetrators of genocide, crimes against humanity, and war crimes.

However, Djibouti's government failed to arrest Bashir during his visit to the country in May 2011 to attend Guelleh's previous inauguration ceremony. At the time, the ICC called on the U.N. Security Council to take action over Djibouti's refusal to arrest Bashir.

Guelleh defeated three other candidates in elections held on April 8. Opposition groups had complained of curbs on freedom of assembly before the vote, while rights groups have denounced political repression and crackdowns on basic freedoms.

Opposition reacts

Opposition politician Omar Elmi Khaire of the Union for National Salvation was Guelleh's nearest rival in the election.

Speaking with VOA Somali, he says for his party, Guelleh's inauguration Sunday meant nothing. “It means a self-elected man Guelleh has again crowned himself in public. His inauguration means nothing for the Djibouti people, but a one-man political commercial show." Khaire said.

Another opposition leader, Jama Abdirahman Jama, told VOA that Sudan's Bashir should not have been invited to the ceremony.

"He should not have invited a man wanted for war crimes against humanity to be ceremony in the first place," Jama says. "It dishonors the people of Djibouti and would jeopardize the internal aid Djibouti depends on."

Guelleh won his last election in 2011 with 80 percent of the vote. In order for Guelleh to win that election parliament had to change the country's constitution because presidents were limited to two terms.

STRATEGIC DJIBOUTI

Djibouti turning into epicenter of global politics

By Makhan Saikia, The Pioneer May 23, 2016

Today, the Republic of Djibouti, the tiny East African nation with a population of just 8,75,000, is fast becoming the hub of global powers. Being in the Horn of Africa, Djibouti holds the key to major international maritime transactions passing through the Gulf of Eden and the Red Sea in the east of the country. Djibouti, being an integral part of the erstwhile French African Empire — l'Afrique Noire — even today, the French Government has an agreement to defend its former colony. As the legend goes, many centuries ago, Yemen and Djibouti were only one country and only after a violent earthquake, both got separated (Africa from Arabia) creating the channel known today as Bab-el-Mandeb. Thus, Bab-el-Mandeb means "Gate of Tears" in Arabic after the cries of those who died in the earthquake.

Why Djibouti has become the hottest address for superpowers like the US? Djibouti declared independence from France in 1977 when it was too impoverished to be swallowed by her big neighbours like Ethiopia or Somalia. A country about the size of New Jersey then had absolutely no resources of global importance "except for sand, salt and 20,000 camels" as the Associated Press reported. Over the years, when its neighbours were too preoccupied with famine, civil wars and AIDS, Djibouti had remained a nation untouched by the traditional woes of the continent. As the 21st century came with an unprecedented wave of globalisation mostly advanced by neoliberal economic agenda and massive network of information and communication technology (ICT), its sleepiness has attracted the global powers for refashioning the identity of the country.

After the September 11 terrorist attacks on the American soil, the US military rushed to open its first ever military base dedicated to counterterrorism, named Camp Lemonnier. It is home to more than 4,000 soldiers who are mainly the part of the Combined Joint Task Force — Horn of Africa (CJTF-HOA). The most significant part of the Camp Lemonnier is that it hosts an exceptional base for launching "drone operations" into Somalia and Yemen. When American military first took the base from Djibouti's former colonial master France in 2002, it called the camp as temporary or expeditionary which consisted of only 97 acres. Today the camp covers a sprawling 600 acres with the state-of-the-art military facilities for launching any offensive against terror attacks. With $1.4 billion upgradation in 2013, the camp currently maintains a rapid response team of 150 members to specially handle future threats to diplomatic personnel abroad after the 2012 attack on the US mission in Benghazi, Libya. For most of the Djiboutians, the presence of the US military could prevent an attack or an attempt to take over their country by Islamic radical forces like the Islamic State (ISIS) or al-Qaeda. However, the way the US military is fortifying the Camp Lemonnier, it is fast spreading a strong sense of distrust among the ordinary Djiboutians about America's attitude towards them.

Next comes the continued legacy of Djibouti's former colonial power France, which maintains its largest ever military base abroad here. In conducting their "civilising mission" in Africa, the French had been highly s uccessful in cultivating a small black elite class to whom they accorded full rights as citizens on condition that they accepted assimilation into French society and rejected their African heritage, family law and customs (Meredith 2005). This took a full circle in Djibouti unlike many of its former establishments. Then came the brigades from Germany, Italy and Spain to join France to form the European Union's Anti-Piracy Force to counter Somali pirates. By 2011, Japan arrived in Djibouti to launch its first-ever military base abroad since World War II. And lately, China has joined the list by opening its first military point in Africa driven not only by economic considerations but also for security reasons. It came as a result of a Security and Defense Agreement between Beijing and Djibouti signed in early 2014 followed by a huge "cheque book diplomacy" by China. While finalising the deal, China Merchant Holdings, a state-owned enterprise, purchased a large stake in the country's vital port of Djibouti, worth $185 million and offered to develop the infrastructure facilities at the port under the supervision of the China State Construction Engineering Corporation for $420 million contract. Despite US protests, President Ismail Omar Guelleh had gone ahead with the deal and allowed China to enter the Sub-Saharan region. However, Washington has the advantage of its collective bargaining power through which it could stall any further expansion of Chinese influence in Djibouti. It seems, with China entering the field, the intensification of power play over Djibouti has really begun.

Thomas Kelly, the US Ambassador to Djibouti, compares it with Casablanca of 1940 for its growing clientele of superpowers who all just want to have their presence in the country for promoting strategic security and trade interests. The story of contemporary Africa is not just one of horrible pain and disaster (mostly man-made), but also of plenty of hope for its future generations and for the rest of us. Here Djibouti correctly fits into the power game of the Western and other emerging States which are constantly vying for space either to showcase their military might or to expand the sphere of influence so that their say in global balance of power play remains intact (or mostly enhances).

To many, Africa can well be regarded as an object in the Western gaze. But there is a growing clamour coming from the young and the educated who outrightly scorns this colonial construct and ready fighting for their rightful place in the comity of nations. Against all the odds, the Government of Guelleh strongly believes that in the next 20 years or so Djibouti will become next Dubai. Having a port in one of the most geopolitically crucial straits in the globe, Djibouti could easily become a magnet for capital and free trade forging ahead with the continued engagement of the high profile powers in the coming days. Hoping to reap on the growing clout of the external powers in the country, Foreign Minister Mahamoud Ali Youssouf confidently says, “We have some assets that Dubai never had.” His Government has an ambitious project to make Djibouti the first country in Africa to be powered solely by renewable energy possibly generating from the “Khamsin Winds” which blows through the month of June to August. For attracting foreign direct investments (FDI) and to meet out the domestic energy crunch, the Government is planning to harness solar energy sources so that power supply problem could be sorted out to a considerable extent.

Its long journey from the clutches of the French colonial administration to the current status of being the “Small Big Power”, it has grown more than its size because of the changing dynamics of global political calculations. Ali Yacoub Mahamoud, the Minister of Energy and Natural Resources, proudly underlines the increasing importance of his country, saying, “In the colonial period, everything in Djibouti was viewed negatively. They all said we only had a hot sun, dry winds, and a lot of rocks. Nothing valuable. Even the nomads felt that way. But now the negatives are positives.” Probably, his claims can well be buttressed when two emerging “Ds” — Dubai and Djibouti — are compared: Unlike Dubai, Djibouti rightly sits on the busiest shipping lane in the world. Secondly, Djibouti is the gateway to many other landlocked African countries. This makes the country especially important unlike Dubai, and it can hinge on the strategic aspect further. Finally, the most spectacular aspect of Djibouti is that it provides one of the best “digital infrastructure”, rarely available even in Dubai. Therefore, Djibouti has gone beyond the network of gigabytes and quietly passed onto the stage of unimaginable “terabytes”. It is possible because seven submarine fibre -optic cables, the kind that carry the vast majority of the world’s digital information, come ashore in Djibouti, making it the most important hub of connectivity in East Africa.

On the other hand, from the eastern coast of Djibouti, Asia is only 30 km away. Bab-el-Mandeb, the narrow sea channel roughly separates Djibouti from Yemen. In fact, at the moment the country is situated at the confluence of three emerging geopolitical regimes redefining the contours of global politics of the century: A fast rising Ethiopia with a stable political regime, renewed engagement of China, and Rouhani’s brand new nuclear Iran (hopefully tamed) in the Indian Ocean Rim and the ever greater tug of war of global hegemons spearheaded by the US and its allies. On its backyard, Djibouti is at an advanced stage of building communication network with all its African neighbours. Last year, a rail line had been opened between Djibouti to Addis Ababa and another linking the latter with the cities of Jimma, Bedele and Ambo. Besides, a grand trans -continental rail line is planned to connect Djibouti to Ethiopia all the way across the continent to the Gulf of Guinea in West Africa. Within a decade or so, plans are afoot to come up with the second international airport near Addis Ababa which will be ready to host more than 120 million passengers much larger in size than London’s Heathrow airport currently receives. Finally, Bab-el-Mandeb holds the key as it is one of the world’s prominent shipping chokepoints through which passes around 3.2 million barrels of oil a day, accounting for an estimated 4 per cent of the global oil business. As there has been a regular threat from the Somali pirates to block the Bab-el-Mandeb strait, so it has forced all the five permanent members of the Security Council to come together to fight their common enemy, a rare unity in ideological diversity displayed among them since the days of the Second World War. This definitely adds to the glamour of little Djibouti after all.

However, crutching on the lap of the competing powers, Guelleh is indirectly resisting the full-blown development of the Djiboutian State and society and gradually weakening the country's opposition for launching an attack on his Government. Djibouti, if it treads as it moves today would soon be a “theatre of war” for competing global powers. And it would turn out to serve as a gripping digest of the endemic woes (which most Africans are so well - acquainted) confronting the cradle of humanity in this part of the globe. Hope it does never become the “Gate of Tears” once again! (The writer is an independent political analyst based in Delhi)

DJIBOUTI
What are some interesting facts about the least known countries in the world?

Raghavan Usha Giriraj I love facts 6y

Djibouti - A country on the NE coast of Africa

1.Djibouti is the third smallest country in continental Africa, after Gambia and Swaziland.

2. Djibouti Lac Assal is the saltiest lake outside of Antarctica. It is even saltier than the famous Dead Sea. The salt is actively extracted for both personal use and commercial trade by the residents.

3. Lac Assal is the third lowest in the world, after the Sea of Galilee and the Dead Sea.

Image source : GETTY IMAGES

4. Christmas in Djibouti is celebrated not on December 25 but on January 7.

5. Taxi fares in Djibouti increase by 50% after sunset.

6. The Somali and Afar tribes of Djibouti are some of the very first Africans to adopt the Islamic religion.

Source :
www.travelingeast.com

Charles Sam((تشارلز سام, Analyst (2010-present) Answered Sep 17, 2018

Djibouti is a country located in the Horn of Africa. It is bordered by Eritrea in the north, Ethiopia in the west and south, and Somalia in the southeast. The remainder of the border is formed by the Red Sea and the Gulf of Aden at the east. Djibouti occupies a total area of 23,200 km.

1. Djibouti was part of the French colony of Somaliland from 1888 to 1977. It was the capital from 1894.

2. In 1967, Djibouti was renamed the ‘French Territory of the Afars and the Issas’ before becoming the fully independent ‘Republic of Djibouti’ in 1977.

3. Lac Assal, a crater lake in the centre of Djibouti, is 10 times saltier than the sea. In fact, it’s the second saltiest body of water in the world after Don Juan Pond in Antarctica.

4. At 155m below sea level, Lac Assal is the lowest point in Africa and the third lowest point in the world after the Dead Sea and the Sea of Galilee.

5. Several nations have military bases in Djibouti including France, the US and China. Djibouti's status as a model of stability in a volatile region and its proximity to the world's busiest shipping route make it particularly attractive to global military powers.

6. Those military bases include Camp Lemonnier, the only permanent US military base in Africa.

7. Djibouti is positioned on a plain known as the Afar Triple Junction where three divergent segments of the Earth's crust – the African, Somalian, and Arabian plates – are tearing away from each other.

8. In 2017, a new 750km (460mi) railway line was opened linking Addis Ababa in Ethiopia to Djibouti City. The line replaces the old disused French railway opened in 1917.

9. The railway line, opening to the public in 2018, in part prompted Lonely Planet to name Djibouti as one of their Best in Travel destinations of 2018.

10. Djibouti comprises two main ethnic groups: the Somali and the Afar.

11. The addictive narcotic khat is widely chewed by Djiboutians. The leaf is imported in bulk from Ethiopia and Kenya and gives the user a mild amphetamine-like high.

12. With a population over 600,000, the capital Djibouti City accounts for 76% of the country’s total population of 865,267.

13. At 23,200 sq km (8,958 sq mi), Djibouti is the third smallest country in continental Africa, after Swaziland (second smallest) and Gambia (smallest).

14. Hussein Ahmed Salah is the only Djiboutian athlete to win an Olympic medal. He won a bronze medal in the marathon in 1988 in Seoul, South Korea.

15. Whale sharks – the largest known fish in the world – regularly visit the coast of Djibouti, making the country a prime spot for swimming with whale sharks.

16. The Djibouti national football team was dissolved in 2017 in a bid to “stop poor results”. Ranked 185th in the world, Djibouti has never qualified for a major international tournament.

17. Djibouti is home to the bizarre dystopian landscape of Lac Abbé, a plateau dotted with hundreds of limestone chimneys, some standing 50m (160ft) high and belching puffs of steam.

Why is the Djibouti impoverished despite remaining with France for a longer period?

Related Links

Did the missionaries help the European colonizers in colonizing Africans? If so, was there any difference between the missionaries and the colonizers?

Why is it that structures in Africa normally collapse and kill the occupants?

What does "kissing teeth" or "teeth-sucking" by African or Caribbean people mean as an expression? Is there a way to spell it?

Which musicians and songs should I start with as my gate to African-pop?

What can one do in the world with a UK & Finnish passport & citizenship? This is opposed to a US or Canadian, Australian or New Zealand or a South African passport? Is it mainly that Europe is my area for legal free movement, or more than just that?

What have been some success or heroic stories of African migrants in Europe that have gone unreported in the European mainstream media?

Are there developed and developing countries? I didn't know that some countries are done developing, and are now resting on their laurels allocating zero budget for "development" projects.

With the US & EU in relative decline, are Australia & NZ well placed in the Pacific Rim for where all the future, action & economic activity is going to be? Is there also likely to be a rise of Africa & South America similar to that of China?

How well do you know Mohamedu Buhari, the Nigerian president?

What was life like in Nigeria under Yakubu Gowon?

What are traveling trends of African millenials who travel to other African countries? What do they like to see? Cities, wilderness, landmarks (castles, statues etc)?

If King Piye had executed all the descendents of the 24th dynasty, like Cambyses ii of Persia later did, then what would this history of Egypt have looked like up until Roman era? Considering the Persians, Greeks and Romans failed to subdue Kush?

How do I get an international donation for NGO activities in Ghana?

What is the largest saltwater lake in the world?

Parul Rastogi Sales Manager at Harvests Aug 12

The Dead Sea might be the most famous saline body in the world, but it’s by no means the only one.

1. Dead Sea, Jordan/Israel

The most famous of the lot, the Dead Sea – also known as the “Salt Sea” – is the natural place to start. It’s technically not a sea at all, but a landlocked salt lake between Jordan and Israel. Its waters are mainly drawn from the Jordan River, and the high salinity means no life can survive here (hence the “Dead” in its name), so don't expect any colourful fish or multihued corals. However, much amusement results from the sea’s buoyancy: bring some reading material to peruse, take to the waters and lie back – nature will do the rest.

2. Lake Assal, Djibouti

Flanked by jet-black volcanoes and striking lava fields, Lake Assal in Djibouti – in shifting hues of emerald, turquoise and blue – takes the title of being the lowest point in Africa. Vast saltpans mark its edges; the lake has long been at the centre of the area’s salt trade, on which the region’s Afar tribes still rely – though the salt caravans are now confined to the archives of history. Though the alien landscape might be inhospitable, the waters are rich in minerals and associated with umpteen health benefits.

3. Great Salt Lake, Utah, USA

The biggest salt lake in the Western Hemisphere, and the one that gave Salt Lake City its name, the Great Salt Lake finds its home in northern Utah. As if the lake's turquoise waters and white-sand beaches weren't enough to tempt travellers, Great Salt Lake State Park and Antelope Island State Park both offer superlative hiking and biking, and gorgeous long views. Antelope Island lies in the south of the lake, and becomes a peninsula when water levels are low. And did we mention the sunsets on the lake? Stuning.

Will Ethiopia, Eritrea, Somalia and Djibouti unite as one country?

Related Links

Why can’t Ethiopia annex Djibouti, since it’s such a small country and is useless?

What's wrong with East Africa? Why can't Ethiopia, Somalia, Eritrea and Djibouti prosper and see peace?

Should Ethiopia and Somalia unite? Somalia needs stability and investment, and Ethiopia needs a coast. The Ogaden region would feel more at home knowing that they are living under Somalia.

Were Djibouti & Ethiopia one country before the French colonised Djibouti?

If we peacefully unite Ethiopia, Eritrea, Somalia, and Djibouti by creating a Horn of Africa nation, what would this country look like?

Why was Ethiopia never invaded during the Islamic Conquests just like Somalia and Sudan?

Would there be a peaceful way for Ethiopia to gain a patch of land from Eritrea, Djibouti, Somaliland or Somalia and cease being landlocked?

Why are Sudan and Somalia considered part of the greater Middle East, but Ethiopia is not?

When will Ethiopia and Eritrea be one country again?
How do Ethiopia and Eritrea differ?

News Nigeria
The presence of foreign military bases in Djibouti has been dubbed "The New Scramble in Africa."

Posted by Aniekpeno Ekong Jan 17

Djibouti houses USA's permanent African military base, Italy's National Support Base, France's largest overseas military presence, Japan's only overseas military base and China's only overseas support military base.

Related Answer
In Djibouti, how does religion influence politics?

Ahmed Balfaqih , lived in Djibouti Answered Nov 9, 2015

Though Islam is the official religion in Djibouti, it has little or no influence in the running of politics of the country. Alcohol and other vices considered in Islam, are available in abundance. The fact the Djibouti had been under the occupation of France for many many years and to a certain degree still under the protection of the French, in addition to being a strategic base for he American forces in the war against terror, made it difficult for religion to have influence in the country.

Just for the record, I have vistited Djibouti more than 20 times. My family had lived there for more than 30 years there. I loved the food, and the beaches but it is very hot in the summer.

Related Links

In Zambia, how does religion influence politics?
In Australia, how does religion influence politics?
In Rwanda, how does religion influence politics?
In Cyprus, how does religion influence politics?
In Ghana, how does religion influence politics?
In Liberia, how does religion influence politics?
How much influence does religion have on Nigerian politics?
What is the influence of religion in politics?
What is the most popular religion in Sierra Leone?
What is Sierra Leone famous for?

Why is the peaceful relationship between Muslims and Christians in Sierra Leone largely ignored by the West?

In Djibouti, how does religion influence politics?
What country was Sierra Leone in the Bible?
In Cambodia, how does religion influence politics?
How far should religion influence political decisions?

COUNTRY FACT FILE

Location

On East coast of Africa separated from Arabian peninsula by the strategically vital strait of Bab-el-Mandaab.

Official title of the state

The Republic of Djibouti: is a country located in the Horn of Africa.

Republique de Djibouti (French)

Flag description:

Two equal horizontal bands of light blue (top) and light green with a white isosceles triangle based on the hoist side bearing a red five-pointed star in the center: blue stands for sea and sky and the Issa Somali people: green symbolizes earth and the Afar people: white represents peace: the red star recalls the struggle for independence and stands for unity.

Neighbours

Ethiopia on W. Eritrea on N. and Somalia on S. Gulf of Aden on E.

Land boundaries: total 516 km. Border countries: Eritrea 109 km, Ethiopia 349 km, Somalia 58 km.

Founder of The Nation
Monsier Hassan Guled Aptidon

Local divisions
6 Districts (circles)

Government type Republic semi-presidential

Legislation chamber Unicameral
Chamber of Deputies

Form of State Republic

Chief of State is the President Head of Government is the Prime Minister
A multi-party republic with one legislative house. The Chamber of Deputies 65 seats, members elected by popular vote to serve for five-year terms. President is elected by popular vote for a six-year term and is eligible for a second term.

Executive branch

President, Prime Minister, Cabinet: Council of Ministers responsible to the President. Separated by chief of State and head of Government, with executive power in the central government, and legislative power in both the government and Parliament. President elected by popular vote to serve for six-year terms, eligible for a second term. Head of Government to be appointed by the president with the legislature's approval.

Former Rulers

1971 to 1977: Ali Aref Burhan, head of instrumental self-administration

1977 to 1999: Hassan Gouled Aptidon (founder-president)

1999 to Present: Ismael Omar Guelleh (2nd president)

Judicial branch

Supreme Court

Capital city

Djibouti /Ville de Jibuti/ Altitude 8 mtr.

Geographic coordinates 11.35N , 43E Djibouti is the national capital of Djibouti state. Situated on a peninsula at the mouth of the Gulf of Tadjoura. Jibuti Afari meaning for "melting pot" is built between 1886 and 1900. Djibouti succeeded Obock the previous capital, founded about 1888 as national capital in 1891, because it had a better natural harbour and ready access to the Ethiopian Highlands.

Names of main towns

Ali-Sabieh, Tadjourah, Dikhil, Obock.

Date of independence

27th June, 1977.

Religions (Major)

Muslim 99 %.

Main spoken language

French (official), Arabic (official) Somali, Afar, English (widely spoken for commerce)

Currency unit

Djiboutian Franc (Djfr)=

Area in Km2

23,200.00

Country area comparison in Africa

48 out of 55 states

Demographic terms:

Average annual population growth rate 2.181 %

Birth rate 25.58 births per 1,000 population

Death rate 8.37 deaths per 1,000 population

Average life expectancy: 60.73 years

Male 58.31 years: Female 63.22 years

Illiteracy rate (%)

Male: 22, Female: 42

Average per capita income

USD 2, 800

Population density

14.9/km2

Urban population (%)

Contributor groups
Farming, Fishing: 3, Industry: 15, Social service: 82 Main

Export Items

Zebus-sheep, Hides & skins, leather-cereals, and re-exported Ethiopian Coffee.

Salt, livestock and fishery resources.

Economy is based on:

Trans-shipment activities, port & custom services & re-exportations.

Climate

Equatorial: Hot and humid.

Extremes:

Lowest point: Lake Assal 155 meters.

Highest point: Moussa Ali 2,028 meters.

Weather of the Capital city Djibouti (Ville de Jibuti) average temperature 30,4°C.

Altitude At sea level

Hottest Month June - August 31-41oc.

Coldest Month January 23-29oc.

Driest Month June 1 mm Rf, the climate is generally hot and dry.

Measures

Metric system.

Time zone

3 hours ahead of GMT/UTC

Public holidays

January 1 (New year), May 1 (labor day), All Muslim holidays, June 27, 28 (independence), December 25 (Christmas).

Ethnic groups
Somali Issas 60%, Afars 35%, few Europeans and Arab nationals 5%.

Topographic & Environmental concern

Mostly wasteland: the territory divided in to a low coastal plain mountains behind and an interior plateau. The plain gives way to mountains with peaks that rises to 1, 500mtrs (5, 000ft). Beyond the mountains lies an extensive plateau area. Nearly 90% of Djibouti is is arid, sandy and desolate, and at Lake Assal the land falls to 153mtr (503ft) below sea level, the lowest elevation in Africa. The climate is hot and humidity is high throughout the year but rainfall is sparse and erratic. The country is largely populated by Kushetic speaking Somalis (mostly of the Issa tribe), Danakhils, and Afars who are dependent on a pastoral economy or employment in commercial activities associated with the ralway, port, and airport of Djibouti. Environment: inadequate supplies of potable water: limited arable land: desertification: endangered species.

Economy Overview

Industry

Port services, customs, re-exportations, construction, agro-processing.

Chief crops

Fruits, vegetables,Camels, goats, sheep, animal hides.

Natural resources

Potential geo-thermal power, Gold, Clay, Granite, Limestone, Marble, Diatomite, Gypsum, Pumice, suspected deposits of Petroleum, processed Salt. At present there is no exploitation or processing of mineral products in Djibouti.

Land in use (%)

Arable land: 0.04

Grassland: 9

Forest woods:0

Other: 91

Marine:

Coastline: 314 km.

Commercial Sea port:-

Djibouti city port is situated at the terminus of the Addis -Ababa (Ethiopia) railway. The strategic location of the port has led to the creation of a free virtue of it's strategic location on the gulf of Aden, Djibouti is located on one of the busiest sea ports in the world. The port of Djibouti has been crucial for Ethiopia as a gateway to world market.

Development prospect:

Djibouti's good harbor, small size and proximity to the Gulf of Aden means that it is the preferred location for foreign military bases to keep tabs on the numerous security issues in the region, particularly Somali pirates in recent times. In return, Djibouti receives most of its Foreign Direct Investment (FDI) from France and the US, along with the Gulf Cooperation Council states – United Arab Emirates, Bahrain, Saudi Arabia, Oman, Kuwait and Qatar. Despite its vital importance to the country's economic growth, the flow of investment fell from $100m in 2009 to $27m in 2010 while port operations also suffered a slowdown in 2010. The effect of these reductions was seen in the drop in the country's GDP growth rate from 5 per cent in 2009 to 3.5 percent in 2010. However a more recent recovery in these areas has led to an estimated growth rate of 4.8 per cent in 2011 and 5.1 per cent in 2012. In a region of some notably unstable countries, not least Somalia and Yemen, Djibouti has long enjoyed a close relationship with Ethiopia, the country's main trading partner. The two are set to strengthen ties following recent agreement on rehabilitation and modernization of their vital railway links. China Railway Engineering Corporation has been awarded a key construction contract for the $1.2bn project, which is funded by the Chinese government and due for completion in 2014. Making the two countries closer still will be the Ethiopian power grid that is due soon to be hooked up to that of Djibouti.

Djibouti is strategically important to every developed country for trade, but Djoubti is reeling under immense poverty. Why?

Ke'Aun

Afrofuturist CosmopolitanJun 30

Djibouti is strategically important to every developed country for trade

It's not.

Djibouti is important to “every developed country" as a military base.

Military bases in the region, by country

Djibouti is not important as a trade hub to the developed world.

Which make sense, right? Djibouti is a tiny country with a small population; they themselves can't be a big market. So to be important to trade, they would have to provide access and services to other nearby countries.

Glance at Djibouti's neighborhood:

Ethiopia: Poor, and in a civil war

Somalia: Ditto

Yemen: Ditto

Sudan: Poor and unstable

Eritrea: Nicknamed “Africa's North Korea.” Investors and traders aren't really rushing there.

If the Horn of Africa and Yemen were stable and rich (especially Ethiopia), Djibouti would probably play a bigger role in terms of trade.

But the Horn of Africa and Yemen aren't, so Djibouti doesn't. Djibouti instead rents out real estate for global militaries to keep the sealanes clear, and that's about it. Wealth mostly bypasses the region.

Remember: Wealth is more regional than national.

Al
ioune Ngom

upvoted this

Related Links

Despite having a million people in poverty, why is Djibouti extremely expensive?

Were Djibouti & Ethiopia one country before the French colonised Djibouti?

What are the reasons why Somalia is a poor country?

Why is Djibouti not part of Somalia?

Why does every country want a piece of land in Djibouti and what is something different from other countries in Africa?

What are some countries who once were poor, but developed fast and now are one of the richest countries in the world? And how did they do it?

Why don't poor countries offer to be under the rule of developed countries to improve their conditions of living?

Why is India still a developing country?

What are the main reasons for very poor countries to stay very poor countries, despite the efforts of foreign aid to help them continuously, both financially and otherwise?

How much chance is it for a poor country to become a developed

Djibouti is strategically important to every developed country for trade, but Djoubti is reeling under immense poverty. Why?

Ke'Aun

Afrofuturist CosmopolitanJun 30

Djibouti is strategically important to every developed country for trade

It's not.

Djibouti is important to “every developed country" as a military base.

Military bases in the region, by country

Djibouti is not important as a trade hub to the developed world.

Which make sense, right? Djibouti is a tiny country with a small population; they themselves can't be a big market. So to be important to trade, they would have to provide access and services to other nearby countries.

Glance at Djibouti's neighborhood:

Ethiopia: Poor, and in a civil war

Somalia: Ditto

Yemen: Ditto

Sudan: Poor and unstable

Eritrea: Nicknamed “Africa's North Korea.” Investors and traders aren't really rushing there.

If the Horn of Africa and Yemen were stable and rich (especially Ethiopia), Djibouti would probably play a bigger role in terms of trade.

But the Horn of Africa and Yemen aren't, so Djibouti doesn't. Djibouti instead rents out real estate for global militaries to keep the sealanes clear, and that's about it. Wealth mostly bypasses the region.

Remember: Wealth is more regional than national.

AI
ioune Ngom

upvoted this

Related Links

Despite having a million people in poverty, why is Djibouti extremely expensive?

Were Djibouti & Ethiopia one country before the French colonised Djibouti?

What are the reasons why Somalia is a poor country?

Why is Djibouti not part of Somalia?

Why does every country want a piece of land in Djibouti and what is something different from other countries in Africa?

What are some countries who once were poor, but developed fast and now are one of the richest countries in the world? And how did they do it?

Why don't poor countries offer to be under the rule of developed countries to improve their conditions of living?

Why is India still a developing country?

What are the main reasons for very poor countries to stay very poor countries, despite the efforts of foreign aid to help them continuously, both financially and otherwise?

How much chance is it for a poor country to become a developed

Related Links

Why were the former black kingdoms (such as the Kingdom of Dahomey) willing to sell black slaves to white people? Didn't they know that slavery is bad?

Was there any black slave owner that own white slaves in USA?

Was it better to be a slave in US or remain in Africa under the black slave traders?

If African slave traders had not sold black Africans as slaves, would white people have seen them as slaves?

Was the Barbary slave trade as harsh for whites as the West African slave trade was for Blacks?

Why isn't the Barbary slave trade (white slaves) taught in school but the African slave trade is?

Did black African slave traders "sell" black Africans to white slavers on the West African coast?

What ever happened to the white slaves that were brought to America in the early 15 and 16 hundreds, before black slaves were imported?

Why were African slaves the more popular choice in the U.S. slave trade, when there were other "non-developed" people that could be transported by land?

During the days when slavery was legal and socially acceptable in the US, what was the best that most black Djibouti is strategically important to every developed country for trade, but Djoubti is reeling under immense poverty. Why?

Ke'Aun

Afrofuturist CosmopolitanJun 30

Djibouti is strategically important to every developed country for trade

It's not.

Djibouti is important to “every developed country" as a military base.

Military bases in the region, by country

Djibouti is not important as a trade hub to the developed world.

Which make sense, right? Djibouti is a tiny country with a small population; they themselves can't be a big market. So to be important to trade, they would have to provide access and services to other nearby countries.

Glance at Djibouti's neighborhood:

Ethiopia: Poor, and in a civil war

Somalia: Ditto

Yemen: Ditto

Sudan: Poor and unstable

Eritrea: Nicknamed “Africa's North Korea.” Investors and traders aren't really rushing there.

If the Horn of Africa and Yemen were stable and rich (especially Ethiopia), Djibouti would probably play a bigger role in terms of trade.

But the Horn of Africa and Yemen aren't, so Djibouti doesn't. Djibouti instead rents out real estate for global militaries to keep the sealanes clear, and that's about it. Wealth mostly bypasses the region.

Remember: Wealth is more regional than national.

Al
ioune Ngom

upvoted this

Related Links

Despite having a million people in poverty, why is Djibouti extremely expensive?

Were Djibouti & Ethiopia one country before the French colonised Djibouti?

What are the reasons why Somalia is a poor country?

Why is Djibouti not part of Somalia?

Why does every country want a piece of land in Djibouti and what is something different from other countries in Africa?

What are some countries who once were poor, but developed fast and now are one of the richest countries in the world? And how did they do it?

Why don't poor countries offer to be under the rule of developed countries to improve their conditions of living?

Why is India still a developing country?

What are the main reasons for very poor countries to stay very poor countries, despite the efforts of foreign aid to help them continuously, both financially and otherwise?

How much chance is it for a poor country to become a developed

EGYPT/al-Masri

National Flag and Emblem

Locator Map

TEXT HIGHLIGHTS: Diaries updates, key events, brief analysis and relating news articles in timeline

Overview

It’s name derived from Greece word ‘Aegyptus’ meaning for “dark soil”

Long known for its pyramids and ancient civilization, Egypt is the largest Arab country and has played a central role in Middle Eastern politics in modern times.

Arabs introduced Islam and Arabic in 7th century and ruled the hitherto predominantly Christian country for six centuries.
Mamlukis took control around 1250.

Egypt was conquered by the Ottoman Turks in 1517.

After completion of the Suez Canal, Egypt became a transport hub but also fell in debts.

Britain took over control of Egypt in 1882.

Egypt received in 1922 nominal independence from the UK.

Kingdom of Egypt (1922–53) held an enthronement rite for its last ruling king, Farouk I.

Headship since independence: King Farouk Monarchial Head

King Farouk I of Egypt (Fārūq al-Awwal) (11 February 1920 – 18 March 1965), was the tenth ruler from the Muhammad Ali Dynasty and the penultimate King of Egypt and the Sudan, succeeding his father, Fuad I of Egypt, in 1936. His full title was "His Majesty Farouk I, by the grace of God, King of Egypt and Sudan, Sovereign of Nubia, of Kordofan, and of Darfur." He was overthrown in the Egyptian Revolution of 1952 and forced to abdicate in favor of his infant son Ahmed Fuad, who succeeded him as Fuad II of Egypt. He died in exile in Italy.

In 1952 the Egyptian military staged a coup and overthrew the British backed monarchy acquired full sovereignty. . President Gamal Abdul Nasser pioneered Arab nationalism and the non-aligned movement, while his successor Anwar Sadat made peace with Israel and turned back to the West.

Egypt nationalized the Suez-canal four years later, in 1956.

President Gamal Abdel Nasser sought to create his own brand of Arab socialism and nationalism and propagated it as a secular Pan-Arab ideology. Using an extensive intelligence apparatus and an elaborate propaganda machine, he promoted a cult of personality projecting himself as the “Man of the People.” He built the Aswan High Dam with the Soviets financial aid. He ruled Egypt in a one-man, one-party dictatorship and crushed all dissent, particularly the Muslim Brotherhood. Today the Muslim Brotherhood is in power and Nasserism is in the dustbin of history. Nasser left a legacy of military dictatorship in Egypt and inherited the wind.

President Gamal Abdel Nasser died of heart attack on the 28th of September, 1970, his sudden death was an outpouring of national grief in Egypt, the funeral procession in Cairo drew more than five million mourners as many others mourned throughout the Arab world.

October, 1970 VP Anwar El-Sadat, sworn into office as president.

President Anwar El-Sadat assassinated by an army assassins fire while he musters military parade in Cairo on the 6th October, 1981, held in honor of the October, 1973 war against Israel.

Air Marshal Mohammed Hosni Mubarak the former Captain in the Egyptian Air Force, the latter an Air-Marshal in the Egyptian Air Force succeeded. Air Marshal Mohammad Hosni Mubarak, came into in the death of President Anwar El-Sadat on the 15th October, 1981, reaffirmed in office by a Yes-No referendum vote for a six-year term, events to go the Anwar El-Sadat ways until he forcibly resigns in early February, 2011.

President Mohammed Hosni Mubarak survived several assassination attempts, the one when he appears as OAU guest in the Ethiopian capital, Addis Ababa in May, 1995 was the most serious attempts of all.

On the 11th of February, 2011 - The Nasser (1952) to Mubarak (2011) era usually known as the ‘Republic Era’ is ended due to the depth of resentment over Hosni Mubarak three decades of authoritarian rule, he finally resigned, and handed over power to a High Command of the Armed Forces (HCAF).

Arab Republic at Northeastern corner of Africa.

Egypt: is a country situated mainly within North Africa, with its Sinai Peninsula forming a land bridge in Southwest Asia, making it a transcontinental state.

It's name derives from an ancient name Ht-ka-ptah, which meant House of the Ka of ptah. Ptah was one of the early Egyptian gods. According to historians, it is the Greeks who modified the name Ht-ka-ptah to Aegyptus to refer to the Egyptian god as they had difficulty pronouncing the h at the beginning of the original name. Egypt is home to one of the world's oldest, continuous, and the forbearer of world civilization. It's history backdates about 5000 years, a unified kingdom arose about 3200 B.C and a series of dynasties ruled in Egypt for the next millennium. The Pyramids: believed to have been constructed between 3000 BC and 1800 BC, the pyramids located west of River Nile are testimony to ancient Egyptian knowledge and engineering skills. The pyramids of Giza are the most widely known among the 10 pyramid sites. Ancient Egyptian architecture and art. Valley of the Kings, the royal tombs of Egypt, and the Sphinx. Occupied and made a British colony in 1881/2 and became a protectorate in 1914, received nominal independence in 1922 from the UK when a constitutional monarchy was established, acquired full sovereignty with the overthrow of the British backed monarchy on the 23rd of July, 1952. The Egyptian military staged a coup and overthrew the monarchy in 1952. In the person of the de-facto leader of the coup namely Colonel Gamal Abdel Nasser. Both subsequent leaders of Egypt after Nasser, Anwar El -Sadat and Mohammed Hosni Mubarak, the former a Captain in the army, the latter a Marshal in the Air Force, inevitably came from the institution with the most prestige in the country. A revolt against the King Farouqe and the Royal family overthrew the monarchy in a bloodless military coup known as "the 1952 Revolution" within few days. It was led by middle rank officers namely, the "Free Officers Movement", dethroned and sent the King exile to Italy, Colonel Gamal Abdel Nasser, met with the latter president Anwar El Sadat in Mankabad, who also based there. Colonel Gamal Abdel-Nasser, Mohammed Naguib, Amr, Al-Baghdadi, Zakharia Mohedin, Hussain Al-Shafi, Kameldine Hussain, Ali Sabri and Anwar El-Sadat and other revolutionary army figures formed the clandestine network that founded in January 1939 what came to be known as the "Mankabad oath" and formed the nucleus of the "Free Officers Movement" it was to overthrow the monarchial head, King Farouk, in 1952 then drive out the British, and nationalized the Suez-canal four years later, in 1956.

Since then, the Egyptian military has thrived on the windfalls of it's association with Colonel Gamal Abdel Nasser, a hero and champion of not only Egyptians, but of all Arabs. Well, Anwar El- Sadat's part in the 1952 revolution was, according to historians, dubious. then General Muhammed Naguib came up to the symbolic headship of the newly Arab Republic of Egypt (ARE), took control of the nation, and heralded a new period of modernization and social reforms in Egypt, two years later he forced to resign and retired from public life by Colonel Gamal Abdel-Nasser, the real architect of the 1952 movement, he was the obvious choice to succeed General Muhammed Neguib, Egypt's post-monarchial head of state on the 17th of November, 1954. Gamal Abdel Nasser, was the second president of Egypt from 1956 until his death. Along with General Mohammed Naguib, the first Egyptian president, he led the Egyptian Revolution of 1952 which overthrew the monarchy. Gamal Abdel Nasser, nicknamed the "the great Arab-African" although his status as "leader of the Arab world", severely tarnished by the Israelis victory over the Arab armies in the six days war, many in the Arab populace still view Nasser as an Architect of the Arab nationalism and symbol of the Arab dignity and freedom. He was also known for his charisma and vision of African unity and Arab grandeur, was instrumental in the establishment of the international non-Aligned movement along with Josip Brozi Tito of Yugoslavia, and Ahmed Sokarno of Indonesia. He is well known for his nationalist policies, and version of pan Arabism, also referred to a Nasserism, which won a great following in the Arab world during the 1950s and 1960s. His vice president Anwar El-Sadat, became a compromise candidate to succeed Gamal Abdel Nasser when he died of sudden heart attack on the 28th of September, 1970, his sudden death was an outpouring of national grief in Egypt, his funeral procession in Cairo drew more than five million mourners as many others mourned throughout the Arab world. Mr. Anwar El-Sadat, he who sworn into office as president in October, 1970, born in the village of Mit Aboul Kom, northwest of Cairo, he graduated from a military academy in 1938 at a time when the nationalist fervor was running high in Egypt. Following Premier Nahas Pasha's "Capitulation" to the British demands to reoccupy the country "In case of international threat of war", he previously was given various posts like president of the National assembly, vice president and secretary general of the single party, the National Union of Popular Forces NUPF, which later became the Arab Socialist Union (ASU). A well deserved nomination to replace the late Mr. Gamal Abdel Nasser, in May 1971, Mr. Anwar El-Sadat launched his "Corrective Revolution" as president and put behind bars the most prominent personalities in the Nasser regime. A year later, he expelled about twenty thousand Russians and started a "de Nasserisation" process that included the nationalization of factories, real estates, and farms "sequestrated" by Gamal Abdel Nasser in acts of such populism, to make way for a socialist society.

It is to be recalled that, the Arab Republic of Egypt had been engaged in three major wars b/n 1948 to 1973, those of the 1956 (of the Suez-canal war), the June, 1967 (of the war of six days) and the October, 1973 war (of the war of Yum Kipur or war of seventeen days) all ended up when Egypt and other Arab nations were beaten by Israel, the Israeli victory over the Arab armies in the seventeen-day war was the last and ever devastating on the Arab-Egyptian public. Only two days after Sadat's assassination, an armed gang in Asyut fought a four hour gun battle with local security forces. Asyut, a University town in Upper Egypt, has long been considered a barometer of Egyptian political mood. News reports at the time confirmed that Anwar El-Sadat passed away from his wounds two hours later, nine others were killed on the spot, including Anba Bishop Samuel of the Coptic-church, chief Chambarlain Hassan Allam, and presidential secretary Fawzi Abdul-Hafez, Mr. Sadat practically unmourned by his compatriots, only foreign dignitaries, almost all from the USA, Europe and Israel, joined the Egyptian leadership at Sadat's funeral. He was considered something of a hero, particularly after his peace initiatives with the Israelis. The late president Anwar El-Sadat led Egypt from September, 1970 for further eleven years, he under-gone a fundamental policy shift that appeared a surprising move towards the Arab-Israeli politics, he was known for his move to switch-off enmity with Israel following the war of the seventeen days in October, 1973, earned him a political upper-hand over the Israelis, later enabled him regain control of the Sinai-peninsula, part of Egypt, that lost in the war in 1967, in return for peace with Israel, in accordance of the so called "Camp-David peace agreement" of 1979, signed in the United States, thus Egypt has conducted military exercises in the region along with the western countries. He led Egypt further until the date he assassinated by an army assassins fire while he stood reviewing a ceremonial military parade in Cairo on the 6th October, 1981, held in honor of the October, 1973 war against Israel. People seemed to mind their own business or go ahead with the routine of preparing for Id Al Adha, the feast of Abrahams sacrifice of his son, Issac, as if nothing had happened, yet only a month to the day before he was killed, the President stood up as a truck from a convoy of vehicles four abreast pulled along side the VIP grand stand "thinking that the troops on board were about to salute him". A group of men in soldiers uniform sprinted from the truck and, threw tear gas and followed it up with a massive spray of automatic fire from their Russian made Kalashnikov machine-guns while other armed men showered the dais with bullets from the stationary vehicle, twenty others were seriously injured, and two of the assailants were shot dead. That Muslim fanatics group of soldiers could break regulations and carry live ammunition on a ceremonial parade is also a pointer that the suicide commandos were not acting alone. Yet to western countries, Mr. Anwar El-Sadat was something of a peace-maker with the Israelis, particularly after his peace initiatives. Many of the assailants were guilty of belonging to the banned IB, an off-shoot of the Islamist movement of Egypt, which has recruited thousands of Egyptians to fight for the Islamist causes at the time. Both subsequent leaders of Egypt after Gamal Abdel Nasser, Anwar El-Sadat and Mohammed Hosni Mubarak the former captain in the Egyptian Army, the latter an Air-Marshal in the Egyptian Air Force inevitably came from the institution with the most prestige in the country.

Air Marshal Mohammed Hosni Mubarak, came-up to replace him since he nominated to the post, has been in power since his predecessor Anwar El Sadat's assassination, and events to go onto the Anwar El -Sadat peace initiatives, as Egypt has forever remained in the orbit of the west. Believed, the United States and Israel would not hesitate to use any means at their disposal to influence events to go the Anwar El -Sadat ways. The head of state Mr. Hosni Mubarak soon to end his fifth-six year term in October, 2011, has survived several assassination attempts, the one when he appeared as OAU guest in the Ethiopian capital, Addis Ababa in May, 1995 was the most serious attempts of all. The Chief of state, who chaired the Defense & Security council of the nation as well as the ruling-party, making him the most powerful man in Egypt. The "Muslim Brotherhood" was the Arab world's oldest political group was founded by Sheik Al-Banna during the British occupation, in 1928, as an organ of social reform. It's philosophy was influenced by a theologian namely, Sayyid Qutb, who advocated the overthrow of Egypt's secular government and was eventually hanged. The IB is known to be Egypt's most powerful opposition group, which banned from politics the time since, the "Free Officers Movement" came as figurehead, has been biding it's time for nearly over eighty years, and is a potent force to reckon with. "Islam is the solution", as the IBs slogan claims.

The IB gained a 20% of the seats in the parliament since 2004, despite far from free the 2004 elections were believed Egypt's most democratic in decades, since then the Egyptian president, has dismantled the judicial oversight of elections, and now political analysts expect a widespread vote-rigging in the up-coming, November, 2011 parliamentary elections, despite the opposition calls to boycott the votes, the Islamic Brotherhood (Ahwan Musleemin) is likely to participate again with less influence on who succeeds Mr. Mohammed Hosni Mubarak in 2011 by participating in elections in exchange for wider political movement to spread it's religious ministry and it's network of social services, by building their political base, many believed, the Muslim-Brotherhood is not yet strong enough to defeat the incumbent's hand-picked successor, likely his son Mr. Gamal Mubarak, the group seems to be waiting until the time is right to mount a significant challenge, in ten or fifteen years time, they think they rise to power, and will own Egypt, a development that would bring about massive repercussions throughout the Middle east and beyond, say an Egyptian political analyst. The Islamist IB's goal, at least for the moment, is to cultivate a moderate, democratic image in the eyes of fellow Egyptians as much as with the west. The president's son and the ruling party General - secretary, Mr. Gamal Mubarak, might appear onto the post upon eventual succession to the ailing chief of state. The NDP, has done and will do anything to retain it's 33 years grip on power as repression and intimidation have alienated from a state to state. As Mr. Hosni Mubarak is 83 years old and in failing health, many segments of the Egyptian society, not least embattled democracy activists, fiercely dislike recent moves to take the road of the Haffez Al-Assad of Syria by installing elder-son Gamal Mubarak as dynastic nepotism. The ruling National Democratic Party (NDP) knows full well that it can not get a chance for another term in a free and fair election, the ruling party has secured about 80 % of the seats in Parliament, while analysts claim that many independent candidates that secured the remaining seats have links to the ruling party. The IB, which has been outlawed since 1954, but fields candidates as independents, made a surprisingly strong showing in elections in 2005, winning 20% of parliament's seats. However, thousand's of it's members were arrested in crackdowns over the past decades and it failed to win a single seat in elections held late, 2010, which believed the vote was heavily marred by fraud that allowed the NDP to win all but a small number of the chamber's 518 seats.

Major Conflicts

Arab-Israeli War

When: 1948 (1948-1949)

Who: Arabs against Israelis

Why: The Gaza Strip

Outcome: Egypt acquired the Gaza Strip

2nd Arab-Israeli War

When: 1967

Who: Arab-Israeli War Why: Resource war/water.

Outcome: Israel took charge of Sinai Peninsula, the Gaza Strip, the West Bank, East Jerusalem, and the Golan Heights.

The Suez Canal Crisis

When: October 1956

Who: Britain, France and Israel

Why: Egypt’s decision to nationalize Suez Canal

Outcome: A ceasefire

After a sweeping non-violent uprising forced the Tunisian despotic ruler Zine El-Abedine Ben Ali out of office, two weeks before the demonstration in Egypt, like Arabs everywhere, the Egyptians were mesmerized by the popular uprising in Tunisia. They Egyptians watched the Jasmine Revolution untold on Satellite TVs and saw Zine El-Abedine Ben Ali, Tunisia's ruler of more than two decades, flee. And then of course, thousands defied the government's curfew and filled the streets and squares of downtown Cairo on the 25th of January, 2011, the first day of protests, in a resounding rejection of the longtime leader's attempt to hang onto power with promises of reform and a new government, organized demonstrations in Cairo called for an immediate stand-down of the deeply unpopular regime of Mohammed Hosni Mubarak, and chanted "enough is enough, there must be a transition". Up to Friday, the 4th of February, 2011, Egypt's people power revolution known as the "Nile revolution" was by and largely peaceful, Egypt's youth snapped with rage, about seventeen Police-stations within Cairo were set-ablaze, with protesters stealing firearms and ammunition, setting not only many radical IB suspects jailed political prisoners, but also hundreds of suspected criminals, freed. Any Police-car within reach was torched, estimated dozens of Police-trucks in Cairo, Alexandria and Suez burned. The blunt and brutal response of the anti-riot Police, the regime's renowned hit-force, were unable to prevent the crowd from gathering and had to fire tear gas to get it disperse, and then Tanks and armored personnel carriers fanned out across the city of eighteen million plus guarding key government buildings, but the curfew was largely ignored, in the meantime, plainclothes-Policemen estimated as many arrest people, may shot wantonly by sharp shooters to spread terror, some were recklessly stabbed with knives by the ruling party-thugs, many more were seriously injured by overzealous policemen, but demonstrators have made a unified and coordinated plans to the finishing line, as their ultimate goal is freedom, equality, justice, liberty and prosperity. Since the largest anti - government protests in decades began on Tuesday, the 25th of January, 2011 at the Tahrir (liberation), the landmark square that had been a symbolic center of an uprising to break political grip of the nation's leaders since 1952. Best of all, the much predicted violence b/n the Islamic militants and the Coptic-Christian minority, which the ruling-NDP had for years deliberately used to discourage protests, never came to pass, on this matter, the president usually enjoys the benefit of the doubt.

Despite the death toll rose to nearly 850, some three thousand injuries have been reported since, the riot have been spreading to other main cities like the coastal city of Alexandria, Suez, Al-Shubra, Assuna, Asiyut, Ismaelia, Manssura, Al-Airish and Aswan, according to medical and security officials and witnesses at the demonstration. The demonstrators were not satisfied with the president's actions to address the public discontent as they have legitimate grievances onto the incumbent president. The president of thirty years fired his cabinet, appointed the chief of intelligence General Mohammed Omar Suleiman as VP, creating a new position which did not exist since the death of ex-president Gammal Abdel Nasser, of course, the late president Anwar El -Sadat was served as VP under the late Gamal Abdel Nasser before Nasser passed away in August 1971, but such position have been avoided since then, and now this time Mubarak appointed Air-Marshal Ahmed Shafiq, the Civil Aviation minister and his former colleague in the Egyptian Air Force, to form a new government, promising more reforms, which many Egyptians doubt he will deliver. The "most dangerous moment for a bad government is when it begins to reform itself", say political thinkers. President Mohammed Hosni Mubarak 83, confronted with the most dire threat to his three decades of authoritarian rule, faced his nation for the first time since the unrest began, on the 25th January, 2011. In a TV address, he made vogue promises of social reform in what is likely interpreted as an attempt to cling to power rather than a genuine pledge to an orderly transfer of power, to generally solve Egypt's pressing problems, or voluntarily stepped aside in the interest of the nation, according to analysts. He has promised not to run again but insists on serving-out the remainder of his term to supervise a peaceful transfer of power. He also has vowed to introduce political reforms and to fight corruption, promises he has made several times over the decades of his rule. I will not resign, he defiantly said, and has vowed he would not flee the country, saying in a nation address "Egypt is my dear homeland, I have lived in it, I fought for it and defended it's soil, sovereignty and interests, on it's soil I will die. History will judge me and all of us". Leaders of Mubarak's ruling-NDF party, including his son, Gamal Mubarak, and his longtime aides, resigned on Saturday the 5th of February, 2011. Gamal Mubarak, a 47 years old banker-turned politician, would not run for president, addressing longtime fears that he was being groomed for the post. The government's talks with the opposition including the IB in years marking a startling shift in policy after years of crackdowns by the western backed regime against the Islamists. It also raised the possibility the group could be on it's way to official recognition of it's key role in Egyptian society, but some Middle East analysts quoted as saying on the matter, "the Egyptian president missed his cue for a "dignified exit" from thirty years of iron-fisted rule. It's not clear whether Egypt's constitution allows the newly appointed VP to assume any of the president's duties while he is serving in office. As the Egyptians were inspired by the Tunisians, in the first week of the protest, the Tahrir (liberation) square became the battleground b/n pro-and anti- Mubarak groups, with the military unable or unwilling to intervene. Since the occurrence of the French revolution for example, scholars of revolution are familiar with the outcomes of demonstration effects, some going to the extent of counting as one powerful cause of the revolution and it's tendency to spread to other countries by the sheer effect of it's inspirational appeal. The Egyptian people to have the chance to chart a future for new, and more democratic Egypt. For that reason, it needs to be an orderly and a peaceful transition of power to a real democracy, not faux-democracy, meaning that, an orderly transition to a government that is responsive to the aspirations of the Egyptian people. One thing is certain: a new reality is waving around North Africa and the Arab world as a whole, Mr. Hosni Mubarak can no longer preside over an authoritarian government. Even if Mubarak is able to withstand the protests, he can not continue the leadership style he had before the protests erupted, and the west needed to be on the right side of history and not trying to keep Hosni Mubarak in power against all odds", said an influential US diplomat on the issue.

Of course, Hosni Mubarak's Egypt has been helpful on a range of global issues important to the west, such as fighting terrorism, the Arab-Israeli peace talks and onto containing the influence of Iran in the region. But the crises seems to be spreading through the region like a wildfire, since the people of Sudan have also joined it's northern neighbors onto the bandwagon. US president Barack Obama must also deal with his own promises to Egyptians and other in the Middle East, shortly after taking office in 2009, the president delivered a land mark speech in Cairo, where in an eloquent address he pointedly told his hosts that "governments must reflect the will of their people". Having delivered such a speech, Barack Obama is hard-pressed now to throw his support behind a repressive ruler at the expense of crowds clamoring for democratic rights. Hosni Mubarak, a former Egyptian Air-force commander came to power after the October, 1981 assassination of his predecessor Anwar El-Sadat by Islamic radicals. Throughout his rule, he showed a near obsession with stability, using rigged elections and unpopular Police-Force accused of widespread torture to ensure his control. He resisted calls for reform even as public bitterness grew over corruption, deteriorating infrastructure and rampant poverty in a country where 40% live below or near the poverty line. Egypt's military promises to lift the 30-years state of emergency when the "current situation" has ended, as thousands gather for fresh protests. President Mohammed Hosni Mubarak, who until the end seemed unable to grasp the depth of resentment over his three decades of authoritarian rule, finally resigned on the 11th of February, 2011, handed over power to the High Command of the Armed Forces (HCAF), administers the affairs of the country. The announcement of Hosni Mubarak fall was greeted with the loudest cheer in Egyptian history, people power had come and triumphed in the Arab world's strategically most important country. Government officials put the number of protesters killed during the uprising at 365, but human rights groups and others have said the figure is much higher according to independent groups, over 800 people have died as of the 7th of March, 2011. Egypt's military leaders under the High Command of the Armed Forces dissolved both councils of the bicameral parliament, known as the Majlis Al-Shura (the Advisory council) and the Majlis Al-Shaab (the People's Assembly), which is widely ridiculed as illegitimate, and suspended the Egyptian Constitution, which broadly restricts presidential candidates against the ex-president, to replace the chief of intelligence, and promised to hold Egypt's first real multi-party elections within six months, meeting the demands of the protesters who have been keeping-up pressure for immediate steps to transition to a democratic civilian rule after forcing the President out of power. The ruling High Command of the Armed Forces led by the ex-Minister of Defense, General Mohammed Hussain Al-Tantawi pledged to an eventually hand-over of power to an elected civilian government and reassured western allies that Egypt will abide by it's peace treaty with Israel after the ouster of the president, Mohammed Hosni Mubarak. The estimated 500,000-strong Internal Security Services (Muhabarat) are accused of some of the worst human rights abuses in the suppression of dissent against Hosni Mubarak's nearly 30-year rule. The protesters were demanding the agency be dismantled and it's leaders face a reckoning. Egypt's State Security Services (Muhabarat), which were given a free hand by emergency laws under Mohammed Hosni Mubarak to suppress dissent, are some of the most powerful symbols of this regime.

Many protest leaders say despite the fall of Hosni Mubarak and his government, the agency remains untouched in protecting the old regime and trying to sabotage the revolution. The agency believed the most pervasive security force in the Arab world, collecting intelligence on regime opponents and supporters a like. It was the planning brain behind everything during Mubarak's reign, he only trusted the State Security agency (Muhabarat). The HCAF, has replaced the head of the security, but it is not yet clear if it is considering restructuring it or redefining it's mission as it charts Egypt's path toward a freer political system and an eventual return to civilian rule. Some Egyptians say "it must be an agency-State security, not of regime-security". The crowds were still riding high on jubilation over the success in removing Hosni Mubarak after eighteen days of unprecedented popular protests, as the Egyptian public opinion immediately diverged sharply on whether Egypt's new military rulers bode well for the nation's democratic aspiration, they promised to maintain pressure on the military to carry-out through long-sought democratic reforms. The dissolution of the ruling-NDP is both just and logical for some reasons, the party was established by presidential decree in 1978, and hence the NDP was born as a ruling-party instead of becoming one through the ballot-boxes, the NDP as a ruling-party has obtained most of it's financial and physical resources from the state, is to say that financed by taxpayers indirectly, meaning disband the NDP and return it's assets to the people, not the ruler. The NDP, who has corrupted political life in Egypt for over three decades, enabled the ruling-president to maintain his grip on Egypt's legislative authority through rigged-elections. Former president Anwar El-Sadat's unilateral decision to establish the NDP in 1978 was the first step towards thwarting political pluralism in Egypt. The main opposition coalition, a loosely based grouping of the Egyptian youth and traditional opposition groups, said it would end it's main protest in Cairo's Tahrir (liberation) square but would call for weekly demonstrations after Jumaa (Friday) prayers. The opposition coalition also called for an investigation into allegations of endemic corruption within the regime and the trial of officials responsible for the deaths of over 400 protesters.

The group also listed it's demands for the first time in recent Egyptian history during a press conference. Those included are: the lifting of hated-emergency, laws: the forming of a presidential council and a broad-based unity government and creation of a new committee to amend or re-write the constitution. They called for reforms ensuring freedom of the press, freedom to form political parties and more transparent media institutions. Many are cautiously optimistic about the possibility of an indigenous democracy in Egypt. "Those who make peaceful change impossible, make a violent revolution inevitable", JFK. In latest development, Egypt's prosecutor-General announced detention of former president

Mohammed Hosni Mubarak pending inquiries into accusations of corruption, abuse of authority and the killings of protesters during the uprising that ousted him from power. It said the on-going investigation was into allegations assaults, killings and injury of protesters, squandering of public funds, and abuse of authority. The detention came hours after the 83 years-old former president was hospitalized with heart problems in the Red sea resort-town of Sharm El-Sheikh where he and his family have been living since his fall from power, he was banned from the travelling abroad and his assets have been frozen, many of his senior aides have already either been questioned or detained pending investigations, his two sons Gammal Mubarak and Alaa Mubarak were also detained for questioning and taken to the Torah prison on the outskirts of Cairo where a string of former top regime figures are already languishing in custody, facing similar investigations on corruption, former ruling-NDF party to be dissolved and it's assets to confiscate. Ex-president Hosni Mubarak Egypt's iron-fisted dictator of three decades, and his sons are expected to stand trial in an Egyptian court for human rights violations, murder, and plundering. The Egyptian Attorney-general announced that Hosni Mubarak with his sons would be tried on early August, 2011 on charges of "corruption, intentional murder of demonstrators during the 18-days popular uprising that ousted him, abuse of power to intentionally waste public-funds and unlawfully profiting from public-funds for themselves and others". Mr Essam Sharaf, who heads a caretaker administration and has limited powers under the military rulers begun his promised cabinet reshuffle as protests continue over the slow pace of political reforms. Among protester's demands are for corrupt officials who served under former president Hosni Mubarak to be tried.

The High Command of Armed Forces (HCAF) have meanwhile announced that they will restrict the use of military courts to try civilians. An estimated 850 protesters were killed during the revolt, many more were seriously injured by the police, and security plainclothes. The Egyptians have been calling for the investigation of their ruler of more than 30 years, along with that of many members of his government, tens of thousands protested once again in Cairo's central Tahrir (liberation) square demanding, the investigations are slow, they are outweighed by rights abuses by the new rulers, saying Hosni Mubarak and his family be put on trial, and many in the crowds accused the High military ruling command of protecting the former president. Egyptian fuming young revolutionaries, however, protested "we took him down in plain view of the whole world", along the way, more than 850 unarmed and peaceful protesters died, he must see his day in court of law, they demanded passionately. The ex-president has been in custody at a hospital in the Red Sea resort town of Sharm El-Sheikh since April, 2011, since his ouster, and now six months later, he was backed to a suburban Cairo

Police academy courtroom on a hospital bed as a defendant for murdering and plundering once again, his images and voices transmitted live into the courtroom to the international audience. "Yes, I am here, and I deny all the accusations, wholly!", rang-out the 83-years old ex-president speaking from one the Egypt's infamous "defendants cage" laying helplessly on a hospital bed, with a surprisingly deep and strong voice, paying a price for his misdeeds. Analysts say, "had he left office earlier, before killing protesters gratuitously, he would most probably not be where he is today, it's not really whether Hosni Mubarak is jailed, hospitalized or not at all, but rather the fact is that he has to answer for his previous actions is a hard lesson to future Egyptian leaders". As recent development, flames lit-up downtown Cairo, where massive Clashes raged in mid-September, drawing Copt-Christians angry over a recent church attack. At least 24 people were killed and more than 200 injured in the worst sectarian violence since the uprising that ousted president Mohammad Hosni Mubarak in February, 2011. The rioting lasted late into the night, bringing out a deployment of more than 1000 security forces and armored vehicles. On the 9th October, 2011, Egypt's ruling Military High Command Council has amended electoral rules to ban the use of religious slogans, a move the Islamic Brotherhood Freedom and Justice Party (IBFJP) said may prompt it to reconsider using it's traditional campaign phrase "Islam is the solution". The IBFJP was strictly banned under the ousted president Mohammed Hosni Mubarak but could ran candidates as "independents" who could be identified on electoral posters by the Islamist groups well - known slogan. Egyptians would start voting in a parliamentary election on the 28th November, 2011. Following are key dates and details on voting for the staggered lower and upper house votes that were announced by Egypt's election committee: On the 19th of November, 2011 deadly clashes once again have erupted in the Egyptian capital Cairo, according to the Ministry of health at least 38 deaths were confirmed in since as second round of uprising engulfed Cairo, and escalates to other cities like Alexandria and Suez as security forces continues their efforts to clear Cairo's Al-Tahrir (Liberation) square off-protesters. Protesters speak of their grievances and demands for the Mubarak regime to face trial on time. Protesters fear the Interim military HCAF government is trying to retain it's grip onto power ahead of parliamentary elections planned to commence by late 2011. The Egyptian High Command of the Armed Forces (HCAF) leaders promised to hasten transition to civilian rule. As of February 11, 2011, the position of President of Egypt is officially vacant following the ouster of President Hosni Mubarak. The Supreme Council of the Armed Forces, led by Mohamed Hussein Tantawi, currently act in the capacity as Head of State and Head of Government. There is an attempt to adopt a democratic system of government as to manage the need of the growing youthful population in Egypt.

What is the Muslim Brotherhood (Ahwan-Musleemin)?

The Muslim Brotherhood is a religious and political group founded on the belief that Islam is not simply a religion, but a way of life. It advocates a move away from secularism, and a return to the rules of the Quran as a basis for healthy families, communities, and states. The movement officially rejects the use of violent means to secure its goals. However, offshoots of the group have been linked to attacks in the past, and critics blame the Brotherhood for sparking troubles elsewhere in the Middle East. Many consider it the forerunner of modern militant Islamism.

When was IB created?

The Muslim Brotherhood has been part of the political scene in Egypt for more than 80 years. It was formed there by Hassan al-Banna in 1928. Teacher Al-Banna and his followers were initially united by a desire to oust the British from control in Egypt, and to rid their country of what they saw as "corrupting" Western influences.

What is its history?

In its early years, the group concentrated on religion, education and social services, but as its membership grew, it moved into the political sphere, organizing protests against the Egyptian government. In the 1940s, an armed wing of the Brotherhood was blamed for a string of violent acts, including the assassination of Egyptian Prime Minister Mahmoud Fahmi al - Nuqrashi in 1948 -- shortly after he had ordered the dissolution of the MB. Al-Banna himself was assassinated soon afterwards -- his supporters claimed he had been killed on the wishes of the government. The movement went underground in the 1950s, and decades of oppression by successive Egyptian rulers led many of the Brotherhood's members to flee abroad, while others were jailed. The MB grew throughout the 1980s as part of a general growth of interest in Islam, and the U.S.-led invasion of Iraq in 2003 saw a spike in membership.

Why is it important in Egypt?

The Brotherhood is the oldest and largest opposition group in Egypt. It has widespread support among Egypt's middle classes, and its members control many of the country's professional organizations. Up until last year, it was illegal under Egyptian law banning all parties based on religion. But in December, it dominated parliamentary elections, winning about half of the seats up for grabs.

How influential is the Islamic Brotherhood (IB) elsewhere?

There are branches of the Muslim Brotherhood in countries across the Middle East and North and East Africa, including Sudan, Syria and Saudi Arabia. There is also a branch in the U.S. Its offshoots outside Egypt are markedly more conservative in their views: The Kuwaiti branch is said to oppose the right of women to vote. Sayyid Qutb, a member of the Muslim Brotherhood in the 1950s and 1960s, developed the doctrine of jihad, and the radical group Hamas is believed to be an offshoot of the Palestinian Muslim Brotherhood.

Elections for a new president are expected to be held in November, 2011:

Egyptian Election schedule - REGISTRATION:

October 12 to 18, 2011. The election committee will accept nominations for parliamentary candidates for both houses, who will submit their documents through branches of Egypt's appeals court.

LOWER HOUSE (MAJLIS AL-SHAAB - PEOPLE'S ASSEMBLY 454 seats) VOTE:

November 28, 2011 - The first stage of the parliamentary election kicks off in nine provinces including Cairo, Port Said, Alexandria, and Assiyut in the south. December 5, 2011 - Run-off votes where no candidate wins a clear a majority will be held. December 14, 2011 - The second round of election starts in nine other provinces, including Bei Suef, Ismailia, Suez and Sohag. December 21 - The run-off vote will be held. January 3, 2012
- The third and final stage of the vote for the lower house takes place in the last nine governorates left, including al-Gharbiya, the heart of Egypt's Nile Delta and where elections have traditionally been heated, North and South Sinai and others. January 10 - 2012 - The run-off vote will be held.

UPPER HOUSE (MAJLIS AL-SHOURA - ADVISORY COUNCIL 264 seats)

VOTE:

January 29, 2012 - The start of the first stage of the vote for the upper house in the same provinces as the first round of the vote for the lower house. February 5, 2012 - The run-off vote will be held. February 14, 2012 - The second-stage of the upper house vote. The run-off vote will be on February 21. March 4, 2012 - The third and final stage of the vote for the upper house. The run-off vote will be on March 11. And to finalize the presidential contest by June, 2012.

Preliminary results!

On the 28th of November, 2011 long lines at polls as Egypt holds landmark vote, shaking-off political apathy. Egyptians turned out in long lines at voting stations in their nation's first parliamentary elections since ex-president Mohammed Hosni Mubarak's ouster, a giant step toward what they hope will be a democracy after decades of dictatorship. An official read out results constituency by constituency, but most candidates did not achieve the 50% required to avoid a run-off, which will take place next week. Islamists are expected to dominate this first democratic poll in 60 years. The Muslim Brotherhood are expected to lead the field, but a more radical group may also do well. But leaks suggest the Muslim Brotherhood is the big winner, with its Freedom and Justice Party (FJP) predicted to take about 30% of the vote. The FJP is in a coalition with smaller parties, and overall that coalition is expected to receive about 40%. Another bloc containing the al-Nur party was predicted to take some 20% of the vote. Egypt's ultraconservative Islamist party said Friday it plans to push for a stricter religious code in Egypt after claiming surprisingly strong gains in this week's initial round of voting for parliament, the first elections since Hosni Mubarak's ouster. Egypt's election commission announced only a trickle of results Friday and said 62 percent of eligible voters cast ballots in the highest turnout in Egypt's modern history, the head of High Electtoral Commission, described it as "highest since the time of the pharaohs". Preliminary counts leaked by judges and individual political groups indicated that the Muslim Brotherhood's political arm took the largest share of votes. The Muslim Brotherhood and hardline Islamist political parties in the first round of parliamentary elections last week won more than 60 percent of the vote. It’s now abundantly clear, “Egypt is on the fast track to becoming a totalitarian Islamic state”, according to Middle East analysts. Following closely behind, was the ultraconservative Islamist Nour Party and a coalition of liberal parties called the Egyptian bloc, according to those unofficial counts. The more moderate and pragmatic Muslim Brotherhood, on the other hand, has been around since 1928 and has for decades been the largest and best organized opposition movement in Egypt, despite being officially outlawed until Mubarak's ouster. Seeking to broaden its political appeal, the Brotherhood's Freedom and Justice Party has described its election platform as civil but with an Islamic background, setting them up to be more rival than ally to the harder-line Islamists.

The voting for Egypt's lower house of parliament is staggered over three stages. This week's vote, held in nine provinces, will determine about 30 percent of the 498 seats in the People's Assembly. Two more rounds, ending in January, will cover Egypt's other 18 provinces. Three more rounds before March will elect the less powerful upper house. Islamist victory in Egypt - long considered a linchpin of regional stability — would be the clearest signal yet that parties and candidates connected to political Islam will emerge as the main beneficiaries of this year's Arab Spring uprisings. It's to be recalled that Tunisia and Morocco have both elected Islamist majorities to parliament, and while Libya has yet to announce dates for its first elections, Islamist groups have emerged as a strong force there since rebels overthrew Muammar Al-Quadhafi in August.

Meanwhile, new interim Prime Minister Kamal El-Ganzouri, who was recently appointed by the military, formed a temporary Cabinet of 32 ministers, including 10 from the previous government. El-Ganzouri also served as a prime minister under Hosni Mubarak in the mid-1990s. Protesters had demanded a new premier in response to a security crackdown on demonstrations before the elections that killed more than 40 people. Also Friday, more than 5,000 protesters demonstrated in Cairo's Tahrir Square to call for a speedier transition to civilian rule and trials for security officers accused of killing protesters. Large crowds marched into the square carrying dozens of coffins wrapped in Egyptian flags to represent those killed in clashes with the police near the square in the week before the elections. Egypt's new parliament, in theory, is tasked with selecting a 100-member panel to draft Egypt's new constitution.

Election outcome:

Islamists are expected to dominate this first democratic poll in 60 years.

The Muslim Brotherhood (Ahwan Muslimeen) are expected to lead the field, but a more radical group may also do well.

An official read out results constituency by constituency, but most candidates did not achieve the 50% required to avoid a run-off, which will take place next week.

But leaks suggest the Muslim Brotherhood is the big winner, with its Freedom and Justice Party (FJP) predicted to take about 30% of the vote.

The FJP is in a coalition with smaller parties, and overall that coalition is expected to receive about 40%.

Another bloc containing the Al-Nur party was predicted to take some 20% of the vote.

Egypt's ultra-conservative Islamist party said it plans to push for a stricter religious code in Egypt after claiming surprisingly strong gains in this week's initial round of voting for parliament, the first elections since Hosni Mubarak's ouster.

Egypt's electoral commission announced only a trickle of results Friday and said 62 percent of eligible voters cast ballots in the highest turnout in Egypt's modern history, the head of High Electtoral Commission, described it as "highest since the time of the pharaohs."

Preliminary counts leaked by judges and individual political groups indicated that the Muslim Brotherhood's political arm took the largest share of votes. Following closely behind, was the ultraconservative Islamist Nour Party and a coalition of liberal parties called the Egyptian bloc, according to those unofficial counts. The more moderate and pragmatic Muslim Brotherhood, on the other hand, has been around since 1928 and has for decades been the largest and best organized opposition movement in Egypt, despite being officially outlawed until Mubarak's ouster. Seeking to broaden its political appeal, the Brotherhood's Freedom and Justice Party has described its election platform as civil but with an Islamic background, setting them up to be more rival than ally to the harder-line Islamists.

The voting for Egypt's lower house of parliament is staggered over three stages. This week's vote, held in nine provinces, will determine about 30 percent of the 498 seats in the People's Assembly. Two more rounds, ending in January, will cover Egypt's other 18 provinces. Three more rounds before March will elect the less powerful upper house. Islamist victory in Egypt — long considered a linchpin of regional stability — would be the clearest signal yet that parties and candidates connected to political Islam will emerge as the main beneficiaries of this year's Arab Spring uprisings. It's to be recalled that Tunisia and Morocco have both elected Islamist majorities to parliament, and while Libya has yet to announce dates for its first elections, Islamist groups have emerged as a strong force there since rebels overthrew Muammar Al-Quadhafi in August.

The final results in Egypt's first post-Hosni Mubarak parliamentary elections confirm an overwhelming victory for Islamist parties. the Muslim Brotherhood (Akhwan-Muslimeen) Freedom and Justice Party (FJP) won the latest number 47% of the parliamentary seats under Egypt's complex electoral system. The hardline Salafist Nur Party came second. Muslim Brotherhood (Akhwan-Muslimeen) said, "Sharia Law" ensures personal freedoms, and said the elections "made Egyptians proud" adding that the results of elections are a "victory" for the democratic alliance led by Freedom and Justice Party (FJP), which includes a number of other parties. Egyptians were voted in three phases over a six-week period to elect the 498-memers of the Peoples Assembly (Majlis Al-Shura). 10 further members would be appointed by the ruling High Command of the Armed Forces (HCAF). Egypt: Sons Gamal and Alaa are also standing trial in Egypt for complicity in the killing of protesters during the country's popular revolution. Ex-President Hosni Mubarak himself is charged with ordering the army of killing protesters during the uprising. Prosecutors at the trial of former Egyptian President Hosni Mubarak have demanded the death penalty for him. Mr. Hosni Mubarak is being tried in Cairo on charges of ordering the killing of demonstrators during unrest which led to his overthrow last year. The demand also applies to former Interior Minister Habib el-Adly and six other former security chiefs. More than 800 protesters were killed during an 18-day revolt before Mr Mubarak was ousted on 11 February. "Any fair judge must issue a death sentence for these defendants," prosecutor Mustafa Khater said, according to the AFP. "He [Mubarak] can never, as the head of the state, claim that he did not know what was going on," chief prosecutor Mustafa Suleiman told the court.

Side note: Egypt Muslim Brotherhood (Ahwan-Muslimeen) seeks presidential poll allies. Egypt's Muslim Brotherhood has called for talks to "save" the uprising ahead of a presidential election run-off. The Islamic Brotherhood says its candidate, Mohammed Mursi, won most votes in this week's first round, with some 25% of the vote. Partial figures suggest he will face Ahmed Shafiq, ex-President Mubarak's last prime minister in a second round next month. A spokesman for the Muslim Brotherhood said Egypt would be "in danger" if Mr.

Ahmed Shafiq wins, and the group would reach out to other candidates to defeat him. Mr. Mursi has already invited other presidential candidates and party leaders to hold talks, reports say. Early counts in the country's first free presidential elections put Mr. Ahmed Shafiq at roughly 24%. The nationalist Hamdin Sabbahi, a fiery opponent of the Mubarak regime who became the choice of many of those supporting the revolution, appears to be in third place. More than 11,000 out of 13,000 polling stations have declared results. However, partial results are subject to recounts and final results are due on late May. No candidate appears close to reaching the 50% threshold necessary for an outright victory. Egyptians will choose between the Muslim Brotherhood and a candidate from the Mubarak-era regime when the presidential election goes to a run-off on 16 to 17 June, state media confirm. The Islamic Brotherhood candidate, Mohammed Mursi, has a slight lead on former PM Ahmed Shafiq, with a reported 25.3% of votes against 24.9%. The two represent forces that have battled each other for decades.

Side note: Egypt state of emergency lifted after 31 years. Egypt's state of emergency, that gave security forces sweeping powers to detain suspects and try them in special courts, has ended after 31 years. It has been in place without interruption since the assassination of President Anwar Sadat in October, 1981. Lifting the law was a key demand of activists in last year's uprising against President Hosni Mubarak. Egypt's military rulers, who took charge after the ousting of Mr Mubarak, indicated they would not renew the law. Some Egyptians had feared the country - preparing for a presidential election run-off- would be left in a power vacuum without the law, which expired at midnight on Thursday. The Supreme Council of the Armed Forces (Scaf) issued a statement to reassure the country that it will "continue to carry its national responsibility in protecting the country until the transfer of power is over". "This is huge," said Hossam Bahgat, a human rights activist who had long campaigned to lift the law. "What is really crucial is the message. The security forces operated under a culture that told them they were constantly above the law. Now they need to abide by the existing legislation and they won't enjoy any extra-legal powers." US State Department spokesman Mark Toner described the lifting of the emergency law as "a step in the direction" towards democratic transition. The emergency law was a key feature of the rule of President Mubarak, who repeatedly broke promises to lift it. At one point, human rights groups estimated there were more than 10,000 people in detention - many of them disappearing in Egyptian prisons. In January the head of Scaf, Field Marshal Hussein Tantawi, partially eased the law except in the cases of "thuggery", without explaining exactly what that meant. The interior ministry is currently dealing with at least 188 people under the law, according to Human Rights Watch. However, there are some who believe the state of emergency should have been renewed. Egypt is preparing for a run-off vote in the presidential elections which will be held on 16 to 17 June, 2012.

Side note: An Egyptian court has sentenced ex-President Mohammed Hosni Mubarak to life in prison for complicity in the killing of protesters during last year's uprising. Egypt's ex-President was sentenced to life in prison on the 2nd June, 2012 for his role in the killing of protesters during last year's revolution that forced him resign from power, a verdict that caps a stunning fall from grace for a man who ruled the country as his personal fiefdom for nearly three decades. The harsh sentence against the 84-year-old former leader appeared aimed at defusing tensions ahead of a divisive runoff presidential race that pits Mubarak's last prime minister against the Muslim Brotherhood's candidate. Mubarak, the first Arab leader to be tried in his own country, remained silent inside court cage while his once-powerful sons appeared nervous and had dark circles under their eyes. His elder son Alaa whispered verses from the Quran. The 84-year-old Mubarak was then ferried in a helicopter away from the police academy that was used by the court in Cairo. Scuffles between Mubarak supporters and opponents broke out inside and outside the courtroom after the verdict was read, reflecting the deep polarization of the country since Mubarak was overthrown on Feb. 11, 2011. The former leader to be tried in person since the start of the Arab Spring in early 2011. Ex-Minister of Interior Habib Al-Adly also got a life sentence, but the acquittal of four high-ranking interior ministry officials sparked fury. Huge crowds of protesters have gathered in Cairo's Tahrir Square. Demonstrations have also been reported elsewhere. Mubarak and his two sons were also acquitted on separate charges of corruption. But as Mubarak was being transferred to prison, he suffered a "health crisis", Egyptian state TV reported.

Side note: Thousands of Egyptians are continuing to protest against the verdicts in the trial of ex-President Hosni Mubarak. Two runners-up in the presidential election first round joined the demonstration in Cairo's Tahrir Square. Mr Mubarak and his interior minister, Habib al-Adly, were sentenced to life in prison for not stopping the killing of protesters in last year's uprising. But six security chiefs were acquitted. Mr Mubarak and his two sons were also cleared of separate corruption charges. Thousands of protesters are staying in Tahrir Square overnight, urging a renewal of the revolution that toppled Mr Mubarak last year.

"We are now at a crossroad. It's either the revolution or back to the Mubarak regime," Abdellah Mahmoud, one of the demonstrators, was quoted as saying by the Associated Press. Huge crowds took to the streets on Saturday and Sunday to express their outrage that no-one had been found guilty of ordering police to open fire in January and February 2011, in attacks which left more than 850 people dead. Many people were also angry that Mr Mubarak did not receive the death penalty, as the prosecution had demanded. The 84-year-old and his sons were acquitted of corruption under the statute of limitations. The prosecutor-general has said he will appeal against all the verdicts, but the process is expected to take several weeks. Mr Mubarak's defense team has also said it will appeal. "We reject the trial. It's a big farce," Hisham Khalifa, one of the protesters in Tahrir Square on Tuesday, told the AFP news agency. The demonstration was called by youth groups who led the uprising, including the Coalition of Revolution Youth and the Maspero Youth Union. It was also backed by the Muslim Brotherhood.

Side note: Egyptian presidential hopeful former Air Marshal Ahmed Shafiq, a former PM under jailed ex-leader Hosni Mubarak, has accused his Islamist rival of harassing Christians. Mr. Shafiq, who was speaking as protests continued in Cairo over the outcome of Mubarak's trial, said the Muslim Brotherhood aimed to create a "sectarian" state. About 1,000 anti-Mubarak activists remain in Cairo's Tahrir Square, angry that he and his two sons were acquitted of corruption and six former police chiefs also escaped punishment. Mubarak himself was sentenced to life in prison after being found guilty of complicity in the killing of protesters during last year's Arab Spring uprising. But many activists were disappointed that the court did not sentence the former president to death. Mr Shafiq faces an election run-off against the candidate of the socially conservative Muslim Brotherhood, Mohammed Mursi, on 16-17 June. Mr. Ahmed Shafiq was Mubarak's last prime minister and a former Airforce commander.

On 16 and 17 June, 2012 - Egyptians go to the polls in a run-off election to decide who will be their first freely-elected president. Thirteen candidates contested the first round on 23 and 24 May, with none winning more than half of the votes in order to guarantee victory. Votes are being counted after a second and final day of elections for the country's first president since Hosni Mubarak was forced from office in 2011. Islamist Mohammed Mursi is up against former Mubarak Prime Minister Ahmed Shafiq in a second-round run-off. The vote also comes amid a bitter row over the dissolution of parliament following a court ruling on Thursday.

Mr. Mursi's Muslim Brotherhood has denounced the step as unlawful and a coup against democracy. The movement urged Egyptians to protect their revolution after the ruling High Council of Armed Forces (HCAF) declared the parliament null and void on Saturday. Two days earlier, the Supreme Constitutional Court ruled that last year's legislative polls were unconstitutional, in a decision made by judges appointed under Mr Mubarak. The dispute has laid bare the fears of some that the military council is trying to consolidate power and resist the democratic changes demanded during last year's demonstrations. Soldiers have already been stationed around the parliament with orders not to let MPs enter. Pro-revolutionary groups meanwhile say they will stage a protest in Cairo's Tahrir Square on Sunday night to keep up the pressure for reforms. Meantime, tens of thousands have gathered in Cairo's Tahrir Square to protest against a decision by the ruling military council to assume new powers. The protests were called by the Muslim Brotherhood, as it claims its candidate won last weekend's presidential poll. His rival, former PM Ahmed Shafiq, also says he has won. Meanwhile, officials said ex-President Mohammed Hosni Mubarak, ousted in last year's revolution, had been moved from jail to a military hospital after a stroke. As Egyptians voted, the generals dissolved parliament and claimed all legislative power for themselves. Correspondents say the High Council of the Armed Forces (HCAF) appears to be working on the assumption that Muslim Brotherhood (Ahwan-Muslimeen) Mohammed Mursi will win, and making moves designed to reduce or constrain the power of the president to entrench it’s own. Activists have described the moves as a "military coup". Demonstrators have been chanting slogans against the military council, in the same square where huge protests last year led to the fall of President Hosni Mubarak.

Side note: Islamic Brotherhood (IB) known locally as “Ahwan-Muslimeen” candidate Mohammed Mursi was declared Egypt's first Islamist president after the freest elections in the country's history, narrowly defeating Hosni Mubarak's last Prime Minister Ahmed Al-Shafiq in a race that raised political tensions in Egypt to a fever pitch. The country's last four presidents over the past six decades have all came from the ranks of the military. This is the first time modern Egypt will be headed by an Islamist and by a freely elected civilian. Throngs of Mursi supporters in Cairo's Tahrir Square erupted in cheers and dancing when the result was read out on live television. Some released doves with his pictures over the square where the uprising that ousted Hosni Mubarak last year was born. Others set off fireworks. Mursi's spokesman Ahmed Abdel-Attie said words cannot describe the "joy" in this "historic moment." "We got to this moment because of the blood of the martyrs of the revolution," he said. "Egypt will start a new phase in its history." The announcement was the culmination of a tumultuous, 16-month transition that was supposed to bring democratic rule, but was tightly controlled and curtailed by the military rulers who took power from Hosni Mubarak in February, 2011. Mr. Mohammed Mursi has been sworn in as Egypt's first civilian, democratically elected president at a historic ceremony in Cairo. Hours after the ceremony, he was saluted by Field Marshal Hussein Tantawi, leader of the military council which is handing over power. Mr. Mursi has promised to restore the parliament dissolved by the military. In a speech at Cairo University, the Muslim Brotherhood politician said the army must respect the people's will. He will have to sort out a very difficult relationship with an entrenched military, regional analyst Magdi Abdelhadi says. The regime of former President Hosni Mubarak is still largely intact and many in it will not work with the new president, he adds. Overthrown in February, 2012, after mass pro-democracy demonstrations, Mubarak was sentenced to life imprisonment at the beginning of this month for failing to prevent the killing of protesters by the security forces. Egypt, the biggest Arab nation, is a key US ally in the region, as well as one of the few states in the Arab world to maintain diplomatic relations with Israel. Parliament was dissolved by Field Marshal Tantawi's Supreme Council of the Armed Forces (Scaf), which assumed legislative powers under a controversial "interim constitutional declaration". But on Saturday Scaf handed over power to Mr Mursi after a military parade at the Hykestep military base on the outskirts of Cairo.

"We have fulfilled our promise which we made before God and the people," Field Marshal Tantawi said at the hand-over ceremony. "We now have an elected president, who assumed Egypt's rule through a free and direct vote reflecting the will of Egyptians." The field marshal, who saluted Mr. Mohammed Mursi and shook hands with him several times, decorated the new president with the Shield of the Armed Forces, the country's highest honor. In his speech earlier at Cairo University, Mr. Mursi said: "The army is now returning to its original role, protecting the nation and its borders." Parliament, the new president insisted in his speech, had been elected in a free and fair ballot and had been entrusted with drafting a new, democratic constitution. He hailed those killed in the uprising against President Mubarak. Families of some of the dead were in the hall and they held up photos of their sons and daughters. He vowed to raise Egypt to the rank of a modern state "where the president is the servant of his people". Mr. Mohammed Mursi was sworn in at the supreme constitutional court. The Egyptian people, he said, had "laid the foundations for a new life, for full freedom, a genuine democracy, for putting the meaning and significance of the constitution and stability above everything else". His government would be based on the democratic pillars of "the constitutional court, the Egyptian judiciary, and the executive and legislative powers". The oath of office had originally been scheduled to take place at the parliament, which is dominated by the Muslim Brotherhood-backed Freedom and Justice Party and other Islamists. Mr Mursi said he was determined that the constitutional court, which had declared November's parliamentary election to be flawed, would remain "independent , strong, effective away from any suspicion and abuse". At Friday prayer, Mr. Mursi performed prayers at Cairo's Al - Azhar Mosque, one of the most prominent seats of learning in Sunni - Islam. He has sought to allay fears among some secular and Coptic Christian Egyptians that he will use his presidency to impose Islamic law. Mr Mursi's campaign has said he plans to appoint a woman and a Coptic Christian as his vice-presidents. In his speech at Cairo University, he said all Egyptians would be equal before the law.

Side note: Egyptian President designate Mohammed Mursi's order to reconvene parliament has been rejected by the country's highest court, which says its ruling dissolving the assembly is binding. Following President Mursi's decree, the speaker of the dissolved house had called for MPs to convene. Army units outside parliament were withdrawn, allowing MPs to enter. Mr. Mursi, whose Muslim Brotherhood (Ahwan Muslimeen) won most seats, says the chamber should function until a new election is held. But Egypt's Supreme Constitutional Court, meeting, said that all its rulings and decisions were "final and not subject to appeal". The High Council of the Armed Forces (HCAF) - whose original decision to dissolve parliament was backed by the court - met in an emergency session shortly after the presidential decree was issued.. The new president's order was widely seen as a challenge to the judiciary as well as the military. Parliament speaker Saad Al-Katatni said MPs should return for a session of parliament the said time, the official MENA news agency said. Despite the apparent tensions, President Mursi and Field Marshal Hussein Tantawi, who heads HCAF, appeared together at a military cadet graduation ceremony.. The military had enforced a court order last month dissolving parliament because party members had contested seats reserved for independents. The HCAF took over the reins of power last year, after the revolution that ended former President Mohammed Hosni Mubarak's 30-year rule. The army move was initially welcomed by many of the anti-government protesters, but its presence became increasingly unpopular as critics accused its leaders of wanting to hold on to power. Mr. Mohammed Mursi, the IB candidate won the country's first free presidential election last month, and army chiefs formally handed over power on 30th June, 2012. But before his inauguration, the military granted itself sweeping powers. The commanders' constitutional declaration stripped the president of any authority over the military, gave military chiefs legislative powers, and the power to veto the new constitution, which has yet to be drafted. In his presidential decree, Mr. Mursi said new parliamentary elections would be held 60 days after the constitution had been agreed by referendum. The Muslim Brotherhood (Ahwan Muslmeen) has consistently opposed the decision to dissolve parliament.

Side note: Former Egyptian presidential candidate Abdul Moneim Abul Fotouh says the ruling military junta's addendum to the constitution is equivalent to a coup against the revolution. The statement follows the issuance of a new constitutional declaration by Egypt's ruling High Council of Armed Forces (HCAF),allowing it to reassume control over legislation and state budget after the country's constitutional court dissolved the elected parliament. Another amendment was also made which will see the new president being sworn in before the Supreme Constitutional Court instead of the lower house of parliament. Following the release of unofficial results showing Mohammed Mursi as the winner of the Egyptian presidential election in June, supporters have gathered in Cairo's Liberation Square to celebrate the Muslim Brotherhood candidate's victory. But, ominously, the Egyptian military delayed announcing the winner of the first presidential vote since last year's revolution. According to reports, the junta has made a deal with the US to complete a planned coup by bringing former premier Ahmed Al-Shafiq to power.

Side note: Egyptian President Mohammed Mursi's order to reconvene parliament has been rejected by the country's highest court, which says its ruling dissolving the assembly is binding. Following President Mursi's decree, the speaker of the dissolved house had called for MPs to convene. Army units outside parliament were withdrawn, allowing MPs to enter. Mr. Mursi, whose Muslim Brotherhood (Ahwan Muslimeen) won most seats, says the chamber should function until a new election is held. But Egypt's Supreme Constitutional Court, meeting, said that all its rulings and decisions were "final and not subject to appeal". The High Council of the Armed Forces (HCAF) - whose original decision to dissolve parliament was backed by the court - met in an emergency session shortly after the presidential decree was issued.. The new president's order was widely seen as a challenge to the judiciary as well as the military. Parliament speaker Saad Al-Katatni said MPs should return for a session of parliament the said time, the official MENA news agency said. Despite the apparent tensions, President Mursi and Field Marshal Hussein Tantawi, who heads HCAF, appeared together at a military cadet graduation ceremony.. The military had enforced a court order last month dissolving parliament because party members had contested seats reserved for independents. The HCAF took over the reins of power last year, after the revolution that ended former President Mohammed Hosni Mubarak's 30-year rule. The army move was initially welcomed by many of the anti-government protesters, but its presence became increasingly unpopular as critics accused its leaders of wanting to hold on to power. Mr. Mohammed Mursi, the IB candidate won the country's first free presidential election last month, and army chiefs formally handed over power on 30th June, 2012. But before his inauguration, the military granted itself sweeping powers. The commanders' constitutional declaration stripped the president of any authority over the military, gave military chiefs legislative powers, and the power to veto the new constitution, which has yet to be drafted. In his presidential decree, Mr. Mursi said new parliamentary elections would be held 60 days after the constitution had been agreed by referendum. The Muslim Brotherhood (Ahwan Muslmeen) has consistently opposed the decision to dissolve parliament. Egyptian President Mohammed Mursi's order to reconvene parliament has been rejected by the highest court, which says its ruling that led to the assembly's dissolution is binding. The speaker of the dissolved house has already responded to Mr Mursi's decree, calling on MPs to meet. Army units outside parliament have left and some MPs have gone in. The decision by Mr Mursi, whose Muslim Brotherhood has most seats, sets up a potential showdown with the military. However the situation is unclear as Egyptians elected Mr Mursi without a constitution and without his powers being defined. Because parliament has been dissolved, he was sworn in before the constitutional court rather than before MPs. It was the High Council of the Armed Forces (HCAF) that made the decision to dissolve parliament in June, after Egypt's Supreme Constitutional Court ruled that part of the election for parliament was unconstitutional.

Side note: Egypt in post-election political crisis: President Mohammed Mursi seeks talks on parliament row. Egypt's president has said he wants talks with other institutions to resolve a constitutional crisis over his attempts to reinstate parliament. Mr. Mohammed Mursi sparked a row with judges and the military at the weekend by issuing a decree reinstating the lower house of parliament. The chamber was dominated by Mr. Mursi's Islamist allies, and was shut down by the military before he took power. Analysts say the dispute threatens to throw Egypt into political chaos. The Supreme Constitutional Court had initially ruled that some of the seats in parliament's lower house were unconstitutional because election rules had been breached. The military then dissolved the whole chamber. But it was unclear whether the military had the authority to shut the parliament. Mr. Mursi reignited the row when he ordered parliament to reconvene, a decree that was later overruled by the court. In a statement, Mr. Mursi's office said the decision to reopen parliament was intended to fill a power vacuum. The statement said that the president was "committed to the rulings of Egyptian judges and very keen to manage state powers and prevent any confrontation". "There will be consultations among all political forces, institutions and the supreme council of judicial authorities to find the best way out of this situation in order to overcome this stage together," it added. Mr. Mursi, of the Muslim Brotherhood's Freedom and Justice Party, was elected in June in the country's first ever freely contested leadership vote.

Side note: On 19th July, 2012 Egypt's ex-spy chief Omar Suleiman dies in United States. Omar Suleiman, who for years headed Egyptian intelligence under ousted President Hosni Mubarak, has died in the USA. He died in hospital in the early hours of Thursday, the official news agency Mena reported. General Suleiman, who was in his seventies, was appointed vice-president by Mubarak in the last days of his rule. He made a bid to stand for president in this year's election but was disqualified for technical reasons. Correspondents say he was seen as an enigmatic figure both inside and outside Egypt, and played a behind-the-scenes role in issues such as relations with the US and Israel. In a statement, Egypt's interim government paid tribute to Suleiman, calling him a "patriotic, honest figure". An assistant to Gen Suleiman said his death was unexpected. "He was fine. It came suddenly while he was having medical tests in Cleveland," Hussein Kamal told Reuters news agency, adding that preparations were under way to take the body home for burial. Reem Mamdouh, a member of Suleiman's presidential campaign team, told AFP that the general's health had been declining. "His health deteriorated recently. He was in the United States with his family," he said. State news agency Mena quoted a diplomat as saying he had been suffering from lung disease and had also developed heart problems. General Suleiman headed the Egyptian General Intelligence Services (Egis) for 18 years. He became the country's first vice-president in 30 years on 29 January 2011, four days after the popular uprising against Mubarak began. Two weeks later, he appeared on state television to announce the long-time president had stepped down, prompting celebrations in Cairo's Tahrir Square - the focus of Egypt's protest movement.

After failing to win enough signatures to stand in Egypt's first post-Mubarak presidential vote earlier this year, he left the country, reportedly going to Abu Dhabi, then to Germany, then finally to the US for treatment. The BBC's Jon Leyne in Cairo says Omar Suleiman was a key figure behind the presidency of Hosni Mubarak. As spy chief, Gen Suleiman helped enforce the police state that kept Mubarak in power, he says. He is believed to have indirectly saved Mubarak's life, advising him to take an armored car on a state visit to Ethiopia in May, 1995 - his convoy was ambushed by IB Islamist militants.

Side note: Mr. Mohammed Mursi, Egypt’s newly-elected president, has asked the irrigation minister, Hisham Kandil, to form a new government. This a surprising nomination but one with some importance to Ethiopia as Hisham Kandil was the chief representative of Egypt in the recent talks on water rights in the Nile River basin. This bears watching, as the Blue Nile situation continues to develop in the future, according hydrologists.

Side note: Former Egyptian spy chief Suleiman laid to rest in Cairo. The funeral for Omar Suleiman, Egypt's former spy chief, took place amid tight security Saturday, attended by several thousand mourners, politicians, religious scholars and military leaders. Suleiman succumbed Thursday to complications from amyloidosis, a disease that affects multiple organs, including the heart and kidneys, according to the Cleveland Clinic in the United States, where the 76-year-old died. Suleiman's body, flown by private jet from the United States, arrived at the VIP terminal in the Cairo Airport at dawn Saturday. Several dozen supporters wearing black T-shirts waited outside the terminal carrying the Egyptian flag. They chanted slogans denouncing Israel and the United States. The ceremony coincided with the second day of Ramadan. The military funeral began with prayers at the Al Rashadan mosque in Nasr City in eastern Cairo. Suleiman's coffin, wrapped in the Egyptian flag, was borne on a horse-drawn carriage through the streets, accompanied by a marching band to the Madinet Nasr Cemetery. Military police wearing red berets carried his coffin past screaming mourners carrying posters of Suleiman and chanting denouncements of the newly elected president, Mohamed Morsy, and the Muslim Brotherhood. Morsy spent six months behind bars during Suleiman's tenure as head of intelligence. Morsy delegated his grand chamberlain and Brig. Gen. Abdul-Monem Foda as his representatives. Grand Mufti Ali Gomaa and a delegation from Al-Azhar, Egypt's highest Islamic institution, also were present, as were Field Marshal Hussein Tantawi, head of the High Council of the Armed Forces (HCAF), and his chief of staff, Sami Anan. Suleiman was briefly appointed vice president under President Hosni Mubarak during the uprising that toppled the longtime Egyptian leader last year. It was Suleiman who, in February 2011, announced Mubarak's resignation and declared that SCAF would run the country's affairs. Suleiman's death came as a surprise to Egyptians.

He had entered the race for Egypt's first democratically elected president in the eleventh hour, but failed to gather enough signatures to be on the ballot. He was disqualified by a panel that included members connected with the Mubarak regime, suggesting the move was not politically motivated. Suleiman had headed Egypt's intelligence since 1993, maintained close ties with the CIA, and was often criticized by human rights groups for his heavy-handed approach with suspected militants. Born into poverty in the town of Qena, he enrolled in Egypt's prestigious military academy and was decorated for his performance in the wars against Israel in 1967 and 1973. In June 1995, both Suleiman and Mubarak survived an assassination attempt during an African summit in Addis Ababa, Ethiopia. Suleiman was credited for saving Mubarak's life that day. A divisive figure in Mubarak's regime, during the revolution Suleiman led negotiations with various pro-change groups, including the Muslim Brotherhood. His stance was mainly to end the "Million Man" protest in Tahrir Square and create a "reform" package or else face a military coup. When asked by a CNN correspondent what he wanted from the protesters during the 18-day uprising that toppled Mubarak, he replied, "Go home." In an interview with a Western news channel last year, Suleiman remarked, "Egyptians are not ready for democracy."

Side note: Egypt's president tapped a young, little-known water minister to form a new government. At 49, Hesham Kandil becomes the youngest prime minister in Egypt's history. "My government in the first place will be a government of technocrats," he told Egypt's state news agency after meeting with President Mohamed Mursy. Kandil said that he will focus on implementing Mursy's program. Educated in the United States -- he earned master's and doctoral degrees at the University of North Carolina -
- Kandil joined Egypt's government after the ouster of Hosni Mubarak in February, 2011. Three weeks after Mubarak fell, Kandil was appointed minister of irrigation and water resources under Prime Minister Essam Sharaf. Before that, he had been a water specialist with the African Development Bank and participated in the Nile Basin Initiative, according to his biography. Mursy's appointment may disappoint business leaders who had hoped for someone with financial expertise to lead Egypt and its fragile economy. Other critics say he lacks the political experience needed for the job. In last month's presidential election runoff, Mursy, the Muslim Brotherhood candidate, edged out Ahmed Shafiq -- Mubarak's last prime minister - winning nearly 52% of the votes. Mursy resigned from the Muslim Brotherhood and its Freedom and Justice Party shortly after the results were announced in an apparent effort to send a message that he will represent all Egyptians. He was sworn into office on June 30, but the powerful High Council of the Armed Forces (HCAF) wields legislative power, having ordered the dissolution of parliament after the country's highest court ruled that it had been elected under invalid laws. Mursy tried to call it back into session, but the court reaffirmed its decision, so the military council retains lawmaking powers until a new parliament is sworn in near the end of the year.

Side note: New Egyptian Cabinet Sworn In by President Mohammed Mursi' Egypt's new cabinet has been sworn in by newly-elected President Mohammed Mursi at a ceremony in Cairo. The ministers were selected by Prime Minister-designate Hisham Qandil, who earlier called for Egyptians to rally behind "a people's government." Only four ministers from President Mursi's Muslim Brotherhood were given posts. Field Marshal Hussein Tantawi, who ruled Egypt after Hosni Mubarak stepped down, remains as defense minister. The military retains broad powers, including legislative authority. President Mursi has been criticized for the time he has taken to name a prime minister and form a government. He promised an inclusive government, with women and Christians represented. The cabinet line-up includes only two women - one of them is a Christian. His nomination of Mr Qandil, the outgoing water resources minister, surprised many observers, who had been expecting a well-known figure. 'We are all Egyptians'Speaking at a news conference in Cairo ahead of the ceremony, Mr Qandil appealed for Egyptians to pull together to support the new government. "I call on all Egyptians to rally behind our elected president and to work with the government to achieve all of our goals. "We have to stop asking who is a Copt, a Muslim or a Salafi. I don't see that. All I see is that we are all Egyptians and this should be the main principle." Mr Qandil will hold a meeting with members of his government on Saturday to discuss the next steps on seeking an International Monetary Fund (IMF) loan, he said, according to the Reuters news agency. Seven ministers will remain from the outgoing military-appointed cabinet - including Mumtaz al-Said, who will serve as finance minister, and Mohammed Kamal Amr, who stays on as foreign minister. Former prime minister Kamal Ganzouri becomes a presidential adviser. The re-appointment of Field Marshal Tantawi, head of the Supreme Council of the Armed Forces (Scaf), is in line with an interim constitutional declaration issued after June's presidential election run-off. The Scaf assumed presidential powers after Hosni Mubarak was forced to step down as president in February 2011. Its declaration and decision to dissolve parliament only days before caused outrage and overshadowed the nominal transfer of power to President Mursi on 30 June. Of the ministers appointed, only four are members of the Muslim Brotherhood's Freedom and Justice Party (FJP), which Mr Mursi used to lead. They were given posts in higher education, housing, youth and information - the ministry which regulates the media. Another key post, the minister of religious endowments (Awqaf), went to Osama al - Abd, the president of al-Azhar University. There had been speculation that an ultraconservative Salafist cleric, Mohammed Yusri Ibrahim, would be appointed. Field Marshal Hussein Tantawi was formally sworn in by President Mohammed Mursi. Meantime, Coptic-Muslim clashes erupt in Egypt. At least 16 people have been wounded after Muslims attacked a church and Christian homes in a village near the Egyptian capital, Cairo, officials say. The unrest in Dahshur, about 40km (25 miles) south of Cairo, started after a Muslim man died of wounds sustained in an earlier clash on Friday. Violence frequently flares between Egypt's Muslim majority and its Coptic Christian minority. It is the first instance since Mohammed Mursi took over as president in June. Last October, a suicide attack on a church in Alexandria killed 24 people. Police in Dahshur early on Wednesday fired teargas to stop a Muslim mob from setting fire to a church, but the rioters instead torched several Christian properties and three police cars, officials said. Ten policemen were among the 16 injured, according to the authorities. The office of the local Coptic archbishop of Giza said the entire Christian population of Dahshur had now fled, according to the Associated Press. The rioters "looted and torched shops, including a jewelry shop... and terrorized the local community, forcing them to leave their homes", the agency quoted the statement as saying. Tension first erupted on Friday after a Christian laundry worker was accused by a Muslim client of singeing his shirt while ironing it. Villagers from both sides threw fire-bombs at each other, fatally wounding a Muslim. The man died of his injuries on Tuesday and was buried overnight, sparking the latest unrest. About 10% of Egyptians are Coptic Christians. They fear that more radical forms of Islam, resurgent since the fall of former President Hosni Mubarak, could imperil their safety in Egypt.

Side note: Sinai Problem Resurfaces for Egypt' According to Frank Gardner, the BBC security correspondent, the violence in the far north of the Sinai Peninsula is an uncomfortable reminder of the security concerns that persist there, decades after Egypt and Israel signed the Camp David peace treaty. This barren, partly mountainous triangle wedged between Africa and Asia has always been harder to police than the heavily populated Nile Valley and Delta of mainland Egypt. Amongst its estimated 400,000 inhabitants the scattered tribes that live in the Sinai are Bedouin (or "Badu", Arabic for desert dwellers), ethnically different from mainland Egyptians. Many of them feel marginalized from the government's programs of investment and economic development applied to the mainland. They see the massive development of tourist infrastructure along the Gulf of Aqaba coast in resorts like Sharm- El- Sheikh, Dahab and Nuwaiba but complain of little benefit to them. The once deserted coastline where tribes like the Bani M'zaina grazed their sheep, goats and camels has effectively been colonized since the 1980s by Cairenes, Alexandrines and other mainland Egyptians, employed in an industry that has seen millions of package tourists jetting in on direct flights from Europe. So instead, some of the Bedouin have turned their talents to an ancient skill: smuggling. Whether it is drugs, guns, explosives or cigarettes, no-one knows the hidden wadis and mountain passes of south Sinai like they do, nor the undulating dunes of north Sinai that border the Gaza Strip and Israel. For the Egyptian security forces sent to police these remote outposts this is almost a punishment posting, a banishment to an alien land where they can quickly lose their way beyond the gates of their bases. When it comes to security in the Sinai there are a number of overlapping factors which help explain why the area remains a problem today for both Egypt and Israel. In November 1982, Israel handed over the final tranche of eastern Sinai that it had captured from Egypt during the 1973 Yom Kippur War. As a student at the time I watched the Egyptian Army move in as the Israelis left behind abandoned trenches, security wells for disposing of suspicious objects and tourist signs in Hebrew. The sleepy, one-hotel resort that Israelis called Ofira grew into the mega development that Sharm El Sheikh is today. Under the terms of the Camp David peace treaty of 1979 two bases were also set up, in north and south Sinai, to house mostly US troops from the Multinational Force and Observers (MFO) whose job was primarily to stop Egyptian and Israeli forces from clashing. But neither the presence of those peacekeepers nor the spectacular success of Sharm El Sheikh as a resort has kept the Sinai out of trouble. In 2005 over 80 people were killed in bomb attacks in Sharm, something which the governor of South Sinai assured me the following year could never happen again after improvements to security. But in the north there have been countless attacks in the past two years on the gas pipelines running between Egypt and Israel. The perpetrators are believed to be a mix of those who do not approve of the cold peace between the two countries and local Bedouin with a grudge against their government. Secret subterranean tunnels have long been burrowed beneath the border between Egypt and the Gaza Strip, a key smuggling route for Palestinians unable to leave their territory. But after Sunday's attack by militants on an Egyptian border port, Egypt's military now says it is determined to close the tunnels down. Whatever takes place along the borders of the Gaza Strip, smuggling through the Sinai is not about to stop. With the Gulf of Suez on one side and the Gulf of Aqaba on the other, the business is simply too lucrative for too many people, some quite possibly in official positions. With smuggling come other forms of crime and wherever it exists there will always be a potential security vacuum, especially when economic opportunities are so limited for local inhabitants. I have known Bedouin tribesmen, masters of courtesy and hospitality when I have stayed with them, to boast proudly of arms caches hidden in desert valleys they say "the police will never find in a thousand years". With their proximity to Israel, the sparsely governed deserts of the Sinai Peninsula are a tempting location for jihadists stung by criticisms that al-Qaeda has largely failed to score an attack on Israel. Some may well look wistfully at the map and decide this could join southern Yemen and Pakistan's tribal territories as a convenient rear base in which to train, arm and plan attacks. The tourist resorts along the coast, with their scantily clad Russians, Scandinavians and other European holidaymakers were previously seen as a "soft target" for jihadists, although their attacks of 2005-2006 killed more Egyptian Muslims than foreigners. Since then, though, there is no question that security around the resorts has improved dramatically. The domestic backlash in Egypt this week over the killing by militants of Egyptian border guards on Sunday has clearly goaded the Cairo government into a firm response while possibly making it harder for jihadists to find local support in the Sinai. On Wednesday Egypt's military read out a statement on national television that was both a direct appeal and something of an admission of its own shortcomings: "We call on the tribes and residents of Sinai to cooperate," it said, "to regain security control of Sinai".

Sinai Peninsula At A Glance’

Huge desert peninsula of about 60,000 sq km (23,000 sq miles) with a population of only a few hundred thousand Distinct identity from rest of Egypt: populated by native Bedouin and a substantial minority of Palestinian extraction.

Of great strategic importance, linking Egypt to the Middle East, and site of Egyptian border with Israel and only non-Israeli border with Gaza.

Under Israeli occupation from 1967 to 1982, it remains under special security regime mandated by 1979 peace treaty, which significantly restricts Egypt's freedom of military action and requires deployment of multinational peacekeeping forces.

There has been a surge in jihadist activity in the past decade, but analysts say discriminatory treatment by Cairo underpins local unrest.

Updates - Egypt's President Mohammed Mursi sacks officials after Sinai attacks' Egyptian President Mohammed Mursi has sacked the country's intelligence chief and the governor of the country's North Sinai province. Hours earlier, the Egyptian military launched an offensive in the region against suspected Islamist militants which it says has killed 20 people. The campaign comes after militants killed 16 Egyptian border guards in the area on Sunday. On Wednesday, more attacks followed on checkpoints in the town of al-Arish. Those attacks left a number of people wounded and the military offensive was launched hours later. The sacking of the country's intelligence chief was announced in a statement on state - run TV. "Gen Mohamed Murad Mowafi is given retirement starting from today," presidential spokesman Yasser Ali said. Gen Mowafi had been quoted in Egyptian media as saying that the intelligence services had received warning of Sunday's attack. However, he said they had only passed the matter on to the relevant authorities, saying that the intelligence services' job was only to collect information. Mr Mursi has appointed an acting intelligence chief, Gen Mohamed Raafat Abdel -Wahed. He also dismissed the commander of the presidential guard, as well as several other top security officials. Sunday's attack was the deadliest and most brazen against Egyptian troops in the Sinai region for decades, and Mr Mursi had faced criticism for not taking decisive action in response. Wednesday's military offensive in Sinai killed 20 people in the village of Touma, according to military officials, while the Sheikh Zuwaid area to the west was also hit. Military spokesmen said the initial operation had been a "success" and that it was ongoing. This is the first time Egypt has fired missiles in Sinai since the 1973 war with Israel, when it attempted to recapture the Sinai peninsula, security officials told Associated Press. Egyptian military presence in Sinai is limited and requires Israeli approval under the terms of the 1979 peace treaty between the nations which returned Sinai to Egyptian control. State news agency Mena said that during the air raids, hours after the al-Arish checkpoints were attacked, "terrorists" had used rockets and rocket-propelled grenades to try to shoot down the military aircraft "but they failed". Tensions are very high in the area, where Islamist extremists are said to have gained a foothold in recent months, taking advantage of the security vacuum left after former President Hosni Mubarak was ousted last year, reports the BBC's Yolande Knell in Sinai. The Egyptian soldiers killed in Sunday's attack were buried on Tuesday in a funeral marked by angry calls for vengeance. Some protesters chanted slogans against the Muslim Brotherhood, and according to witnesses, tried to assault Prime Minister Hisham Qandil. Both Israeli and Egyptian officials blamed Sunday's attack on Islamist militants - though Egypt's Muslim Brotherhood, the group to which President Mohammed Mursi belongs, accused the Israeli spy agency Mossad of being responsible. Israel rejected that claim as "non-sense". Egypt's military spokesman said the initial operation against militants in Sinai had been a "success". Egypt sends reinforcements as offensive builds. Egypt has deployed extra troops, tanks and other armored vehicles to the Sinai peninsula in an escalation of its military offensive in the area. The reinforcements follow the killing of 16 border guards by suspected Islamist militants on Sunday. The army has also begun sealing off tunnels into Gaza, according to Egypt's Mena news agency. Earlier reports that fresh fighting had broken out in al-Arish have been denied by a source quoted by the agency. According to Nile News TV, violent clashes had broken out between police and armed men outside a police station in the town. A heavy military presence is building up in al-Arish. Meantime, Egypt army 'kills gunmen in village raid' At least six suspected militant gunmen have been killed by the Egyptian army in the Sinai peninsula, officials say. They were killed during raids on hideouts in a village near al-Arish town in the north of the region, AP news agency reports. An offensive against Islamist militants in Sinai was launched last week after 16 border guards were killed. It was the most brazen attack against Egyptian troops in the Sinai region for years. Sunday's killings in al-Ghora village, some 30km (19 miles) south of al-Arish, are the first reported casualties among the suspected militants since the military operation began. A security source told the AFP news agency the suspected militants were armed with rocket launchers, grenades and automatic weapons. State television, which gave no details of the fighting, said three soldiers had also been killed. Analysts say that the security situation in the Sinai has deteriorated following the fall of Egypt's long-time President Hosni Mubarak last year, which Islamist extremists appear to have exploited. The area in Sinai where the borders of Egypt, Israel and Gaza meet has also become a hotbed of smuggling - through tunnels into Gaza. Bedouin leaders in the Sinai agreed to help the army in its offensive and they also backed plans to destroy the smuggling tunnels into Gaza.

Updates: Bedouin tribal leaders in Egypt's Sinai peninsula have agreed to help restore security in the lawless border area with the Gaza Strip and Israel. In talks with Interior Minister Ahmed Gamal al -Din, they also backed plans to destroy smuggling tunnels into Gaza. The move comes as Egyptian troops mass in the area in an operation to contain Islamist militants who have built up a presence there. The militants are suspected of killing 16 Egyptian border guards. Egypt has deployed extra troops, tanks and other armored vehicles. It also closed the Rafah border with the Gaza Strip following the killings. The border - the only way in or out of the enclave without passing through Israel - was reopened, but only for Palestinians wishing to return to Gaza. Also military sources said six suspected militants had been arrested in the northern Sinai region. It was not immediately clear whether they were linked to the border attack. Egypt's state-run Nile TV put the number arrested at nine.

Updates: Egypt leader Mohammed Mursi orders army chief Tantawi to resign' Egyptian President Mohammed Mursi has ordered the retirement of the powerful head of the country's armed forces, Field Marshal Mohamad Hussein Tantawi, a presidential spokesman has said. He also said a constitutional declaration aimed at curbing presidential powers had been cancelled. Mr Mursi, who was elected in June, is a member of the Muslim Brotherhood (Ahwan-Muslimeen). Relations between Islamists and the military have been increasingly tense since the fall of President Hosni Mubarak. "Field Marshal Hussein Tantawi has been transferred into retirement from today," presidential spokesman Yasser Ali said in a statement. He added that a career army officer, General Abdel -Fattah al-Sisi, would replace Field Marshal Tantawi as both armed forces chief and defense minister. Field Marshal Tantawi, 76, has not yet indicated whether he accepts the moves. Chief of staff Sami Annan is also retiring, the spokesman announced. BBC’s Middle East correspondent Kevin Connolly says the dismissal of senior military officers will be seen by Egyptians as a decisive move in a struggle for real power between the country's newly elected politicians and the generals who have exercised power for many years. As head of the High Council of the Armed Forces (HCAF), Field Marshal Tantawi became Egypt's interim ruler after President Hosni Mubarak was ousted following mass protests in February of last year. Under the interim constitutional declaration issued by HCAF before Mr. Mohammed Mursi was sworn in, the president could not rule on matters related to the military - including appointing its leaders. HCAF also dissolved parliament, which is dominated by the president's Islamist allies. Tensions between the Egyptian presidency and the military have been exacerbated since Islamist militants in the Sinai peninsula killed 16 border guards in a raid earlier week. BBC’s correspondent says Mr. Mursi appears to be seizing on that failure - which shocked many Egyptians. The presidential spokesman said General Annan and Field Marshal Tantawi had been appointed as presidential advisers and were given Egypt's highest state honor, the Grand Collar of the Nile.

Updates: The head of Egypt's Higher Military Council, Mohammd Hussein Tantawi, has been replaced by the country's new President Mohammed Mursi, after 17 years in office. Field Marshal Mohammed Tantawi was Egypt's acting head of state after Hosni Mubarak resigned from the presidency last year amid mass street protests. Born in 1935, and of Nubian origin, Field Marshal Tantawi was far from a fresh face for the Egyptian leadership. He was a long-time trusted associate of Mr. Hosni Mubarak, and, like all Egyptian previous presidents since the 1952 revolution that overthrew the monarchy, Field Marshal Tantawi had a strong military background. He started out as an infantryman in 1956 and went on to study for a master's degree in military science. He served in the 1956 Suez Crisis and the 1967 and 1973 Middle East wars, all against Israel. In 1991, following Iraq's invasion of Kuwait, he was on the coalition side for the first Gulf War. He received Kuwait Liberation medals from Egypt, Kuwait and Saudi Arabia. He served in the Egyptian government as minister of defense and military production for 21 years and became general commander for the armed forces in 1995. Field Marshal Tantawi was often discussed as a possible runner for the presidency. However, many thought that his age and reported ill health were barriers against him. He was also said to lack political ambition and support among the armed services' rank and file. A US diplomatic cable from March 2008 published by Wikileaks described Field Marshal Tantawi as "charming and courtly" but also "aged and change-resistant". "He and Mubarak are focused on regime stability and maintaining the status quo through the end of their time. They simply do not have the energy, inclination or world view to do anything differently," the cable read. While this called into question Field Marshal Tantawi's reformist credentials, the Higher Council of Armed Forces (HCAF) moved quickly to reassure Egypt's demonstrators that it would respect their "legitimate demands" following the fall of Mohammed Hosni Mubarak. In another communiqué, the council also said it would "remain committed to all its regional and international treaties," implicitly confirming the landmark 1979 peace treaty with Israel known as the “Camp-David Agreement” would stay intact - providing reassurances for Washington and Israel. The army was widely praised for allowing the massive protests to unfold and eventually for shepherding Mr. Hosni Mubarak out of power. It was seen as a unifying force on the streets, less brutal and corrupt than the interior ministry police (Mukhabarat) or pro-Mubarak gangs. It helped Field Marshal Tantawi enjoy a short honeymoon with his people. However, this later expired amid anger over the slow pace of democratic reforms in Egypt.

Meantime, Egypt President Mursi explains army chief replacement' The Egyptian President has said his move to order the retirement of two of the country's top generals was for "the benefit of this nation". He was speaking after replacing the powerful head of the armed forces, Field Marshal Mohammed Hussein Tantawi, and the chief of staff, Gen Sami Annan. Mr Mursi also issued a constitutional declaration giving him broad legislative and executive powers. The generals assumed presidential powers after the fall of Hosni Mubarak. Mr Mursi annulled a key constitutional declaration issued in June which gave the military legislative powers and budgetary controls as well as the right to oversee the process of drawing up a new permanent constitution. It is not clear how the Supreme Constitutional Court will react to Mr Mursi's move to nullify the decree. Meanwhile, the army has so far shown no sign of challenging the surprise replacement of Field Marshal Tantawi. State media quoted a military source as saying there was no "negative reaction" from within the armed forces. In Cairo, thousands of people gathered overnight in Tahrir Square, expressing their support for Mr Mursi's move.

Updates: The new President of Egypt is taking the concept of getting work done in the first 100 days in office very seriously. Mohammed Mursy forced out the long serving head of the military Field Marshal Mohammed Hussein Tantawi, his number two, and a handful of other generals. At the same time, Mursy nullified the constitutional declaration made by the military council before he took office June 30th. His message is clear. And while the military wanted to sustain its grip on power, Mursi was able to wrestle control after what was seen as a military lapse in the Sinai. Mursy is taking a bold stand, Ordering counter-attacks against militant hideouts over the weekend near al-Arish in Northern Sinai, after 16 border guards were killed in a surprise attacks when they were breaking fast at sundown during Ramadan. But the president is going down a tricky road. Mohammed Al-Issis, a political economist at the American University in Cairo, said Mursy's strategy is particularly difficult since it is "not clear who the enemy is. " Recent events, he said, provided an early indication of where the Sinai is headed. The attacks, and changes at the top in the military, have far reaching implications -- not the least of which is the attempted rebuilding of the Egyptian economy. Nearly a year and a half after the uprisings against the 30 year rule of Mohammed Hosni Mubarak, Egypt is struggling to find its footing. The Sinai may be vast, but scenes of attacks in the north have real potential to spook tourists who were just getting comfortable with coming back to Red Sea resorts in the south. Tourism is the number one foreign exchange earner in the country, but revenues dropped in 2011 to just under $9 billion, from $12.5 billion the year before the uprisings. The southern Sinai, especially Sharm El -Sheikh, is the main foreign tourist destination. There is a genuine cash crunch, with foreign exchange reserves at roughly $14 billion - half the level of early 2011. Strategists say the cash will last only four months if revenues don't start coming in at a faster pace. The Egyptian government is still pegging growth during the current fiscal year at 3.5% to 4%, but economists who closely track the Middle East and North Africa region, known as MENA, are beginning to mark down expectations. Alia Moubayed, of Barclays, says the security challenge "not only puts the recovery in this particular region on negative outlook, but highlights the volatility of the challenges that this new government and president will face." Strategically, it was thought that Mursy and Tantawi could work together against a common enemy in the Sinai. This was expected to include Bedouin tribal leaders who also want to bring their territory under control. That plan moves ahead, but Tantawi and his team are not part of it. The new president wants to get this military challenge under control -- hence the strong and quick use of force -- so he can focus on the bigger picture, which remains hazy. The International Monetary Fund mission is still planning to visit Egypt this month to jump-start negotiations on a $3.2 billion loan program. Talks took place last spring but there was reluctance to push ahead with that program until a government was in place with a new plan of action. Knowing the importance of Egypt to the broader region, Gulf players with ample oil and gas revenues are stepping up funding. Qatar has said it would inject $2 billion into the Egyptian Central Bank, and Saudi Arabia earlier this year pledged a billion dollars. Candidate Mursy campaigned on delivering what he called a Renaissance Project for Egypt, an economic blueprint that engages wider swaths of society. One of the key criticisms of the Mubarak regime was that the reform program started too late in the middle of the last decade and then trickled down too slowly. London based Arabia Monitor, commenting after attacks in Sinai, said the new government "faces the difficult challenge of striking the right balance between propping up the economy, achieving fiscal consolidation, and improving the socio-economic conditions that helped overturn the old order." The budget deficit could top 9% this year, but most agree this is not the time for austerity. It is a time to wrest back control of the trouble spot on the volatile border with Israel and Gaza and get Egyptians back to work, and the economy growing again. CNN News

Updates: Egypt president names Copt and woman among assistants' Egyptian leader Mohammed Mursi has appointed a Christian intellectual, a female university professor and two Islamists as presidential assistants. Samir Murqus, a liberal Coptic writer, was named assistant for democratic transition, officials announced. Pakinam al-Sharkawi, who teaches political sciences at Cairo University, will be in charge of political affairs. During his election campaign Mr Mursi said he would appoint Copts among his advisers, possibly as vice-president. However, he named Mahmoud Mekki, a veteran judge who campaigned for judicial independence under Hosni Mubarak, as his deputy. Copts, who make up about 10% of Egypt's 82 million people, were also disappointed that the new cabinet includes only one Christian. The two other assistants appointed on Monday are members of the two Islamist parties which dominated parliament before it was dissolved in June after a court found the election law had been unconstitutional. Imad Abdul Ghafour, the head of the ultraconservative Salafist Nour party, is in charge of relations with civil society, while Issam al-Haddad of the Muslim Brotherhood's Freedom and Justice Party, will look after external relations and international co-operation. Mr Mursi also named on Monday the first 17 members of his "presidential advisory team", with whom he will hold regular meetings. They include former presidential candidate Mohammed Salim al-Awwa, Muslim Brotherhood leader Essam al-Aryan, political expert Seif al-Din Abdul Fattah and writer Sekina Fouad. BBC News Africa

Updates: Egypt troops step up campaign against Sinai militants' Egyptian security forces have killed 11 militants since launching an offensive in the Sinai peninsula earlier this month, the defense ministry has said. The operation, launched after 16 border guards were killed in an attack on 5 August, has also led to the arrest of 23 suspects and seizures of weapons. Forces would be redeployed on Wednesday to "complete the hunt for terrorist elements", the ministry added. The build-up of troops and heavy weapons has caused concern in Israel. Since 1982, when Israeli troops withdrew, Sinai has remained under a special security regime mandated by the peace treaty the two countries signed in 1979, which restricts Egypt's freedom of military action. On Monday, Egyptian President Mohammed Mursi stressed that his country was committed to all international treaties and, without naming Israel, said no other states should worry about its actions in Sinai. "Egypt is practising its very normal role on its soil and does not threaten anyone and there should not be any kind of international or regional concerns at all from the presence of Egyptian security forces," he said. Checkpoints: Egypt launched "Operation Eagle", which has involved thousands of troops backed by tanks and heavy equipment, after the 16 border guards died in a raid on their base near the Rafah crossing with the Gaza Strip. After killing the soldiers, the militants crossed the border with Israel in an apparent attempt to carry out another attack. However, they were killed in Israeli air strikes. No-one has said they were behind the attack, although suspicions have centered on jihadist groups which are known to operate in eastern Sinai. In the first few days of Operation Eagle, security forces carried out several raids on alleged militant hideouts, but none have been reported since. Troops also set up checkpoints on main roads and around the main towns of northern Sinai. Initially, some were targets of hit -and-run attacks. The campaign is being led by the Defense Minister and head of the armed forces, Gen Abdul Fattah al-Sisi, who was appointed by President Mursi in a shake-up of the military's leadership on 12 August. On Monday, the military's chief-of-staff promised local leaders that his troops will "not permit any criminal hideouts in the land of Sinai, and current measures taken ensure that no innocent will be harmed". Lt -Gen Sidqi Subhi also said they did not aim to "counter thoughts with weapons, but they raise arms in the face of those who carry arms". BBC News Africa: 29 August, 2012

Egypt's President Mohammed Mursi removes prosecutor general'

Egyptian President Mohammed Mursi has removed Prosecutor General Abdel Maguid Mahmoud from his post. He was appointed envoy to the Vatican, with Mr Mursi's office giving no official reason for the switch. But Mr Maguid later said he would stay in his post in defiance of Mr Mursi's order, state-run Mena news agency said. The row comes a day after 24 supporters of ousted President Hosni Mubarak were acquitted of organizing attacks on protesters during last year's uprising. Hundreds of demonstrators rallied in the capital Cairo against the acquittals. They accused the judges of "complicity" with the former Egyptian leadership and said they wanted to "purify justice".

'Battle of the Camels': The group on trial had been accused of sending men on camels and horses to break up a protest in Cairo in 2011.In the incident, later called the Battle of the Camels, Mubarak supporters charged protesters in Tahrir Square. It became one of the most notorious incidents of the uprising and left nearly a dozen people dead. Some senior members of the old regime were among those accused. They included Fathi Srur and Safwat al-Sherif, former speakers of Egypt's two houses of parliament. Prosecutors said Mr Sherif, who was also the secretary general of Mubarak's National Democratic Party (NPD), had "contacted MPs, members of the NDP and financiers of the party, inciting them to disperse the protests in Tahrir Square by force and violence". Mr Mahmoud was appointed in July 2006. Officials quoted by Reuters said that an assistant to the general prosecutor would take up the responsibilities until a new prosecutor general was appointed. Meantime, Egypt reopens Pyramid of Chefren to tourists. Egypt has reopened one of its great pyramids as it attempts to revive a tourism industry hit by last year's uprising. Antiquities Minister Muhammad Ibrahim reopened the Pyramid of Chefren (Khafre) and six ancient tombs at Giza after a long restoration project. He said he was keen to stress that Egypt is a safe country for tourists. The BBC's Jon Leyne in Egypt says visitor numbers have only just begun to pick up after last year's revolution. The problem, he says, is that many Westerners still see Egypt as something of a war zone. Mr Ibrahim, who inspected the newly opened monument, said other archaeological sites were due to be opened across Egypt in the coming months. Egypt's tourism industry was badly hit last year following the unrest that ousted President Hosni Mubarak. Scenes of violent protests, mainly in the capital Cairo, were broadcast around the world. The country is still suffering from a weak economy and a volatile security situation. The Pyramid of Chefren is the second largest at Giza and the tomb of the Pharaoh Khafre from ancient Egypt's fourth dynasty. It rises to a height of 136m (446ft) BBC News Middle East (October 11, 2012)

November 4, 2012: Bishop Tawadros new pope of Egypt's Coptic Christians'

Bishop Tawadros has been chosen as the new pope of Egypt's Coptic Christians, becoming leader of the largest Christian minority in the Middle East. His name was selected from a glass bowl by a blindfolded boy at a ceremony in Cairo's St Mark's Cathedral. Three candidates had been shortlisted. The 60-year-old succeeds Pope Shenouda III, who died in March aged 88. He succeeds as attacks on Copts are on the increase, and many say they fear the country's new Islamist leaders. The other two candidates were Bishop Raphael and Father Raphael Ava Mina. They were chosen in a ballot by a council of some 2,400 Church and community officials in October. Their names were written on pieces of paper and put in crystal balls sealed with wax on the church altar. A blindfolded boy - one of 12 shortlisted children - then drew out the name of Bishop Tawadros, who until now was an aide to the acting leader, Bishop Pachomius. Bishop Pachomius then took the ballot from the boy's hand and showed it to all those gathered in the cathedral. Strict measures were in place to make sure there was no foul play during the televised ceremony: the three pieces of paper with candidates' names were all the same size and tied the same way. Copts say this process ensures the selection is in God's hands. Bishop Tawadros will be enthroned in a ceremony on 18 November. The new pope has studied in Britain, and has also run a medicine factory, the BBC's Jon Leyne in Cairo reports. He is a man of broad experience and with managerial skills, our correspondent says, adding that he will need all those talents to lead the Copts as they face an uncertain future in a country now debating the role of Islam following last year's revolution. The BBC correspondent says no-one in Egypt expects the new pope to introduce radical changes to the deeply conservative church. Pope Shenouda died in March. Under his leadership, the Coptic Church expanded significantly, including outside its traditional Egyptian base. He was a passionate advocate of unity among the Christian churches, and also clashed with then President Anwar Sadat, particularly over their conflicting views on the future of Egypt's relationship with Israel. Coptic Christians have long complained of discrimination by the Egyptian state and the country's Muslim majority. But when President Hosni Mubarak was ousted last year and succeeded by the Muslim Brotherhood, their fears grew. In October 2011, 25 people died in clashes with the security forces after a protest march in Cairo over the burning of a church. Many leading Copts believe the new pope should play a less overtly political role. Activists hope that ordinary Copts can make their voices heard by winning more seats in the now democratically elected parliament. Yet the new pope may want to make his views known quickly on how prominent a role Islamic, or Sharia, law should play in the new constitution currently under negotiation. - Estimates of the number of Coptic Christians in Egypt range from 5.6m to 11m Descended from ancient - Egyptians: Coptic language is derived from ancient Egyptian-Split from Eastern Orthodox and Roman Catholics in 451AD in row over nature of Christ on most issues doctrinally similar to Eastern Orthodox Church - So from this ancient ritual, some very modern problems face Egypt's new Coptic pope. BBC News Middle East

Cairo's Tahrir Square fills with anti-Morsi protesters'

Tens of thousands of protesters opposed to Egypt's president and the sweeping new powers he assumed last week are in Cairo's Tahrir Square, hours after a new constitution was hastily approved. The Islamist-dominated constituent assembly finished voting on the draft in the early hours on Friday. The draft will now be sent to Mr Morsi, who is expected to call a referendum. The Supreme Constitutional Court is due to rule on Sunday on whether the assembly should be dissolved. Senior judges have been in a stand-off with the president since he granted himself sweeping new powers. An emergency decree issued last week said Mr Morsi's decisions could not be revoked by any authority, including the judiciary, until the new constitution had been ratified and a fresh parliamentary election is held. It also stated that the courts could not dissolve the constituent assembly. Mr Morsi says he will give up his extraordinary powers once the new constitution is approved by a referendum. Live TV feeds from Tahrir Square showed tens of thousands of people in the square. Demonstrators chanted slogans, including, "The people want the fall of the regime", one of the rallying cries against ex-President Hosni Mubarak, who was toppled last year. In the city of Alexandria, supporters and opponents of Mr Morsi clashed on the streets, but there were no immediate reports of injuries. The Muslim Brotherhood and other Islamist parties have called on their supporters to join a rally in Cairo on Saturday. Protesters confronted Mr Morsi at Friday prayers at the al - Sharbatli mosque after the preacher defended the president's recent actions, comparing them with incidents in the life of the Prophet Muhammad. The BBC's Jon Leyne, in Cairo, says that infuriated worshippers, who chanted against the president, while Mr Morsi himself got up to say that did not agree with the preacher. It is an illustration of how inflamed and divided opinion is across Egypt, our correspondent says.

Divisive move: Mr Morsi insists the powers he has taken are meant to be temporary and will protect the transition to a constitutional democracy. However, their extent has raised fears that he might become a new strongman. UN Human Rights Commissioner Navi Pillay has written to Mr Morsi, asking him to reconsider his decree. In her letter, Ms Pillay "warned that approving a constitution in these circumstances could be a deeply divisive move", her spokesman said. Mr Morsi's decree of 22 November gave the 100-member constituent assembly until January to complete the draft constitution. Opponents filed 43 separate lawsuits challenging the process. When the Supreme Constitutional Court said it would soon rule on the lawsuits, supporters of the president on the assembly decided to pass a rushed draft to head off the threat of dissolution. During a marathon session that began on Thursday and continued through the night, the assembly voted on and passed all 234 articles. Among the historic changes to Egypt's system of government, the draft limits the amount of time a president can serve to two four-year terms. It also introduces some civilian oversight of the military establishment. The draft keeps in place an article defining "principles of Sharia", or Islamic law, as the main source of legislation. November 30, 2012:

Egypt clashes erupt despite proposal to end crisis’

Islamists fought protesters outside the Egyptian president's palace on Wednesday, while inside the building his deputy proposed a way to end a crisis over a draft constitution that has split the most populous Arab nation. Stones and petrol bombs flew between opposition protesters and supporters of President Mohamed Mursi who had flocked to the palace in response to a call from the Muslim Brotherhood. Two Islamists were hit in the legs by what their friends said were bullets fired during the clashes in streets around the compound in northern Cairo. One of them was bleeding heavily. A leftist group said Islamists had cut the ear off one of its members, inflicting serious head wounds on him. Riot police began to deploy between the two sides to try to end the violence which flared after dark despite an attempt by Vice President Mahmoud Mekky to calm the political crisis. He said amendments to disputed articles in the draft constitution could be agreed with the opposition. A written agreement could then be submitted to the next parliament, to be elected after a referendum on the constitution on December 15. "There must be consensus," he told a news conference, saying opposition demands must be respected to overcome the crisis.

Opposition leader Amr Moussa, a former foreign minister and secretary-general of the Arab League, said Mursi should make a formal offer for dialogue if his opponents were to consider seriously Mekky's ideas for a way out of the political impasse. "We are ready when there is something formal, something expressed in definite terms, we will not ignore it," Moussa told Reuters during talks with other opposition figures. Opposition leaders have previously urged Mursi to retract a decree widening his powers, defer the plebiscite and agree to revise the constitution, but have not echoed calls from street protesters for his overthrow and the "downfall of the regime".

UNDER SIEGE: Mursi had returned to work at his compound a day after it came under siege from protesters furious at his assumption of extraordinary powers via an edict on November 22. The president, narrowly elected by popular vote in June, said he acted to stop courts still full of judges appointed by ousted strongman Hosni Mubarak from derailing a constitution meant to complete a political transition in Egypt, long an ally of Washington and signatory to a 1979 peace deal with Israel. Rival groups skirmished earlier outside the presidential palace on Wednesday. Islamist supporters of Mursi tore down tents erected by leftist foes, who had begun a sit-in there.

"They hit us and destroyed our tents. Are you happy, Mursi? Aren't we Egyptians too?" asked protester Haitham Ahmed. Mohamed Mohy, a pro-Mursi demonstrator who was filming the scene, said: "We are here to support our president and his decisions and save our country from traitors and agents." Facing the gravest crisis of his six-month-old tenure, Mursi has shown no sign of buckling, confident that Islamists can win the referendum and a parliamentary election to follow. Many Egyptians yearn for an end to political upheaval that has scared off investors and tourists, damaging the economy. Mekky said street mobilization by both sides posed a "real danger" to Egypt. "If we do not put a stop to this phenomenon right away ... where are we headed? We must calm down." U.S. Secretary of State Hillary Clinton weighed into Egypt's political debate, saying dialogue was urgently needed on the new constitution, which should "respect the rights of all citizens". Clinton and Mursi worked together last month to broker a truce between Israel and Hamas Islamists in the Gaza Strip. "It needs to be a two-way dialogue ... among Egyptians themselves about the constitutional process and the substance of the constitution," Clinton told a news conference in Brussels. Washington is worried about rising Islamist power in Egypt, a staunch U.S. security partner under Mubarak.

"LAST WARNING": The Muslim Brotherhood (Ahwan Muslimeen) had summoned supporters to an open-ended demonstration at the presidential palace, a day after about 10,000 opposition protesters had encircled it for what organizers dubbed a "last warning" to Mursi. "The people want the downfall of the regime," they chanted, roaring the signature slogan of last year's anti-Mubarak revolt. Officials said 35 protesters and 40 police were wounded. The "last warning" may turn out to be one of the last gasps for a disparate opposition that has little chance of scuttling next week's vote on a constitution drawn up over six months and swiftly approved by an Islamist-dominated assembly. State institutions, with the partial exception of the judiciary, have mostly fallen in behind Mursi. The army, the muscle behind all previous Egyptian presidents in the republic's six-decade history, has gone back to barracks, having apparently lost its appetite to intervene in politics. In a bold move, Mursi sacked Mohamed Hussein Tantawi, the Mubarak-era army commander and defense minister, in August and removed the sweeping powers that the military council, which took over after Mubarak fell, had grabbed two months earlier. The liberals, leftists, Christians, ex-Mubarak followers and others opposed to Mursi have yet to generate a mass movement or a grassroots political base to challenge the Brotherhood. Investors have seized on hopes that Egypt's turbulent transition, which has buffeted the economy for two years, may soon head for calmer waters, sending stocks 1.6 percent higher after a 3.5 percent rally on Tuesday. Egypt has turned to the IMF for a $4.8 billion loan to help it out of a crisis that has depleted its foreign currency reserves. The government said on Wednesday the process was on track and its request would go to the IMF board as expected. The board is due to review the facility on December 19. CAIRO (Reuters), by Yasmine Saleh and Marwa Awad (December 5, 2012)

Egyptian constitutional referendum, 2012’

A constitutional referendum was held in Egypt in two rounds on 15 and 22 December 2012. Egyptians living abroad were scheduled to vote between 8 and 11 December. Voting for expatriates had been delayed until 12 December 2012 and was extended until 17 December 2012. Voters were asked whether they approve of the draft constitution that was approved by the Constituent Assembly on 30 November 2012. Unofficial results reported on 23 December 2012 found that only 32.9% of the electorate voted and that the constitution was approved with 63.8% of the vote in favor over the two rounds of polling.

During the campaign, supporters of the draft constitution argued that the constitution would provide stability. Most opponents argued that the constitution was too favorable to the Muslim Brotherhood and did not grant sufficient minority rights. However, the Salafi Front also opposed the constitution, arguing that it should have been based more closely on Sharia law. The supreme committee for supervising the constitution referendum was formed on 3 December 2012. Mohammad Salim Al-Awa stated that a new Constituent Assembly would be formed within three months through general elections if the draft Constitution was voted down. The new assembly would have six months to write the new constitution. The general secretary of the constitution referendum supreme committee resigned for health reasons.

Background: The Constituent Assembly was originally elected by Parliament in March 2012, before being dissolved by a court in April after it was deemed unconstitutional. A second Assembly was elected by Parliament during the summer. The second Constituent Assembly produced on 30 November 2012 a 234 article draft constitution, after it approved each article individually during a 19 hour meeting starting on 29 November. Judicial response: Egyptian Judges Club members agreed to boycott the referendum. However the decisions of the club are non-binding on its members. Judge Mohamed Awad, who is a member of the Judges for Egypt reform movement, said that 90 percent of judges would monitor the referendum. Mohamed Gadallah, the legal adviser to the Egyptian president, stated that Egypt's Supreme Judicial Council would oversee the referendum. The judges that were on strike responded that the Supreme Judicial Council decision was not final and that judges could individually refuse to participate.

The result of a controversial referendum on Egypt's new constitution’

Updates: The process has been delayed as officials check allegations of fraud. Early unofficial results have suggested more than 60% of voters said "yes" to the document, which is endorsed by President Mohammed Morsi. But officials are still investigating opposition allegations of fraud and the result will now come on Tuesday. There has been violent unrest in the past few weeks over the constitution. If the document passes, elections must take place within two months and the deep polarization in the country is likely to continue, the BBC's Bethany Bell in Cairo reports. In the meantime, legislative powers will pass to parliament's upper chamber, the Islamist-controlled Shura Council.

'Vote for stability' State media reports of the results following Saturday's second and final round of the referendum suggested that some 63% of voters had backed the charter. Turnout was low, estimated at 30%. A member of the supreme election commission said on Monday appeals and allegations of irregularities in the voting process were still being investigated. He said the results would be announced on Tuesday. Earlier, another member of the commission, Mohamed el-Tanobly, told Agence France-Presse it wanted the referendum to "really reflect the will of the Egyptian people". The opposition National Salvation Front said on Sunday the vote had been marred by "fraud and violations". It said these included polling stations opening late, Islamists seeking to influence voters and a lack of judges to supervise. Spokesman Amr Hamzawy told a news conference the National Salvation Front had urged the commission to investigate the irregularities but he also appeared to anticipate a "yes" vote.

He said: "We do not consider this constitution legitimate. We will continue to attempt to bring down the constitution peacefully and democratically." The opposition says the draft constitution fails to protect the freedoms and human rights that were sought in the uprising that ended Hosni Mubarak's rule last year. It accuses the president of pushing through a text that favors Islamists and does not sufficiently protect the rights of women or Christians.

But the Freedom and Justice Party, the political wing of Mr Morsi's Muslim Brotherhood, said it hoped the "yes" vote would begin to heal divisions and bring stability. On the Freedom and Justice Party Facebook page, its leader, Saad al-Katatni, wrote that its members were "extending our hands to all political parties and all national forces", adding: "We will all start a new page". However, the crisis is continuing to affect the country's economic status. On Monday, the ratings agency Standard and Poor's downgraded Egypt's long-term credit rating because of the ongoing tension.

Lowering the country's long-term rating to B- from B, it said: "A further downgrade is possible if a significant worsening of the domestic political situation results in a sharp deterioration of economic indicators such as foreign exchange reserves or the government's deficit." The latest unrest began after Mr Morsi issued a decree on 22 November stripping the judiciary of the power to challenge his decisions. After an outcry, the president revoked much of the decree, but he refused to back down on the referendum on the draft constitution. BBC News Africa (December 23, 2012)

Egypt: Voting Turnout in Referendum 32.9 Percent - Election Commission'

Updates: out of 33 percent of all eligible voters cast their vote in Egypt's constitution referendum, head of the commission overseeing the referendum Judge Samir Abul Maati said. Out of 17,058,317 voters (32.9 percent), 10,693,911 voted "yes" (63.8 percent) is while 6,016,101 voted "no" (36.2 percent).The number of valid votes is 16,755,012 while that of invalid votes is 303,395. The first round of the referendum took place on December 15 in 10 governorates and the second took place on December 22 in 17 governorates. At the press conference announcing the final results, Abul Maati said that commission members were chosen according to the law, adding, "We were not chosen for our persons, but for our positions." The commission received complaints from different bodi es about violations that occurred during the voting process, Abul Maati said. The reported violations included the absence of judicial supervision, the invalidity of the procedures, violations outside polling stations, and the prevention of observers and journalists from entering polling stations, he explained. Abul Maati stated that the commission is only responsible for receiving and examining these complaints and resolving them, adding that "the general prosecution is the only body that can investigate electoral crimes." "After examining complaints, the results of some sub-committees were annulled because of flaws that require annulling their results," Abul Maati said. HYPERLINK "http://en.aswatmasriya.com/" Aswat Masriya (Cairo) December 25, 2012

Egypt - New Constitution Finally Approved'

Updates: Final results of Egypt's 2012 draft constitution were released by the country's Higher Electoral Commission, showing an approval rate of over 63 per cent after two rounds of voting. The latest round took place on Saturday, December 22, 2012 with voters from 17 governorates taking part in the poll whose turnout was about 30 per cent. The first round held on December 15, 2012 in 10 governorates.

The Xinhua news agency reported that the release of results was delayed to give electoral officials time to check appeals and allegations of fraud by the opposition. The National Salvation Front promised at a press conference on Sunday, December 23, 2012 to appeal against the results of the constitutional referendum, alleging that there had been fraud and other violations. Meanwhile, President Mohamed Mursi over the weekend ordered Parliament's Upper Chamber, the Shura Council, to convene after the release of official results of the constitutional referendum. The new constitution gives the Shura Council powers to legislate until the Lower House of Parliament is elected within the next two months, the AP news agency said.

President Mursi has held legislative powers for months since a court disbanded the Lower House, saying the law governing the election of its members was unconstitutional. The President also over the weekend appointed 90 members to the Shura Council in an attempt to make the body more representative. The Council is expected to focus on passing a new law on the rules for Parliamentary elections. Under the new constitution, Sharia remains the main source of legislation while Al -Azhar, Sunni Islam's leading authority, is to be consulted on matters concerning Sharia. On the other hand, Christianity and Judaism are to be the main source of legislation for Christians and Jews. The right to beliefs is protected and the State's obligations are limited to Islam, Christianity and Judaism. Presidential mandates are limited to two four-year terms of office. (December 25, 2012)

Egypt's Upper House Takes Power, President Addresses Upper House’

Updates: Egyptian President Mohamed Mursi will address the Shura Council (upper house of parliament), which now holds legislative power, on Saturday. Mursi temporarily held legislative power following the dissolution of the People's Assembly, but now that the constitution has passed, the upper house will act as legislature until a new assembly is elected. The Shura Council, who convened on Wednesday following the appointment of 90 new members, is expected to draft a new parliamentary elections law to pave the way for the election of a lower house of parliament within the next two months. Source: Aswat Massriya (Cairo) (December 27, 2012)

Egyptian president cancels visit to Ethiopia in light of violence at home'

January 26, 2013: President Morsi will not participate in an African summit, preferring to lead current meeting with defense council dealing with Egypt's turbulent situation: Teargas once again overwhelms Egypt's air. President Mohamed Morsi cancels his trip to Addis Ababa for the African summit scheduled for Sunday due to the ongoing unrest in Egypt. Presidency Spokesman Yasser Ali says Morsi is currently in an emergency meeting with the National Defense Council, which includes the ministers of justice and information as well as the head of the national security apparatus.

The meeting is set to discuss the violence and deaths that occurred Friday during protests marking the second anniversary of Egypt's revolution and how to hold accountable those responsible. Nationwide clashes between protesters and police on Friday left at least 10 dead, including nine in Suez and hundreds injured. Meanwhile, in the coastal city of Port Said clashes continue after a court handed 21 of the 73 defendants in the Port Said massacre trial the death sentence early on Saturday. Seventy-three defendants, including nine security officials, three Masry football club officials and a number of fans, are on trial for their suspected role in Egypt's worst-ever football tragedy, where more than 70 died in an attack on fans. The trial of the remaining defendants will be looked into on 9 March. At least 15 have been killed so far in the ongoing Port Said clashes, including two police officers. Ahram Online,

Egypt: Pope Tawadros rebukes Morsi over Cathedral clash'

BBC News: April 9, 2013 - The leader of Egypt's Coptic Christians has accused the country's president of "negligence" following deadly clashes outside the main cathedral in Cairo. Pope Tawadros II said Mohammed Morsi had failed to protect the building, where two people died after being attacked by an angry mob of Muslims. The remarks were the strongest issued against President Morsi by Pope Tawadros since he took office in 2012. The weekend clashes between Muslims and Copts were Egypt's worst in months. The two people - at least one of whom was a Christian - were killed after attending a funeral for four Christians who died in sectarian violence in Khosous, about 10 miles (15km) north of Cairo, the previous day. A Muslim was also killed in those clashes, which began after inflammatory symbols were drawn on an Islamic institute, provoking an argument. The dispute escalated into a gun battle between Christian and Muslim residents, while Christian-owned shops were also attacked. Coptic Christians, who make up about 10% of the population, have long complained of discrimination and have suffered an increase in attacks by Muslims since the fall of President Hosni Mubarak in 2011.

'Action not words' In a telephone interview on the private ONTV channel, Pope Tawadros said Mohammed Morsi had "promised to do everything to protect the cathedral but in reality we don't see this". He said the failure to do so "comes under the category of negligence and poor assessment of events”.” We need action not only words... There is no action on the ground," he said, adding that "the Egyptian Church has never been subject to such [attacks] even in the worst ages". The violence erupted on Sunday when mourners leaving St Mark's Cathedral clashed with local residents. Police fired tear gas to break up the violence. More than 89 people were injured, the state news agency said.

Mourners inside the cathedral had earlier chanted slogans against President Morsi. Witnesses told local TV stations that the violence started when a mob attacked the Copts as they left the cathedral, pelting them with stones and petrol bombs. The Christians responded by throwing stones back, the witnesses said, until police arrived and attempted to quell the unrest, firing tear gas into the cathedral compound. Afterwards, Mr Morsi denounced the violence in a phone call to Pope Tawadros. "Any attack against the cathedral is like an attack against me personally," he was reported as saying. He also called for an immediate investigation. The Islamist Freedom and Justice Party (FJP), the political arm of Mr Morsi's Muslim Brotherhood movement, posted a statement on its Facebook page stressing its "utter rejection and condemnation of violence".

Egyptian President reportedly being held hours after being ousted'

July 4, 2013: Ousted President Mohammed Morsi was reportedly being held at an undisclosed location Wednesday night, hours after the military toppled him and suspended the constitution. Ahmed Aref, a spokesman for the Muslim Brotherhood party, told Reuters both Morsi and an aide were being held but he didn’t know their location. A security official said they were at a military intelligence facility, Reuters said.

In anouncing Morsi's ouster earlier in the day, Egypt's top military commander said he had been replaced by the chief justice of the constitutional court as interim head of state. In addition, Gen. Abdel - Fattah el-Sissi said the country's constitution has been temporarily suspended and new elections would be held. At least 14 people were killed in clashes between Morsi's supporters and opponents following the announcement, Reuters said, citing the state news agency MENA. Eight of the dead were reported to be in the northern city of Marsa Matrouh, with three killed and at least 50 wounded in Alexandria. Another three were killed in the southern city of Minya.

In Washington, President Obama issued a statement Wednesday night saying the administration was "deeply concerned" by the decision to remove Morsi and urged the military to avoid "any arbitrary arrests" of the president and his supporters. Obama also said in light of Morsi's ouster he had "directed the relevant departments and agencies to review the implications under U.S. law for our assistance to the government of Egypt." At the same time, a security official in Cairo said the head of Morsi's Muslim Brotherhood political party and the organization's deputy chief had been arrested, reportedly in connection with an escape from prison in 2011.

The state-run newspaper Al-Ahram said arrest warrants were being issued for 300 members of the Brotherhood, Reuters reported. Millions of anti - Morsi protesters in Tahrir Square and around the country erupted in cheers at the news of Morsi's ouster, setting off fireworks and shouting "God is great" and "Long live Egypt." Morsi said on his presidential Facebook page that the military's action "represents a military coup and it is unacceptable." A U.S. official said nonessential diplomats and embassy families had been ordered to leave Egypt amid the unrest. The State Department issued a warning urging U.S. citizens in the country to leave.

In appointing Adli Mansour the new interim leader, el-Sissi also said a government of technocrats would be formed with "full powers" to run the country. He did not specify how long the transition period would last or when new elections might be held. Top military officials and opposition leaders met Wednesday and agreed on a political roadmap for the country's future, el-Sissi said. A new presidential cabinet will be formed as well as a national reconciliation committee, which will include youth movements that have been behind anti-Morsi demonstrations. El-Sissi also warned said the military would deal “decisively” with any violence sparked by the announcements.

Before el-Sissi's address, Egyptian troops, including commandos in full combat gear, were deployed across much of Cairo, including at key facilities, on bridges over the Nile River and at major intersections. Witnesses told Reuters that the army erected barbed wire and barriers around Morsi's work compound, and moved in vehicles and troops to prevent supporters from getting to his palace. A travel ban was put on Morsi and the head of his Muslim Brotherhood, Mohammed Badie, as well as Badie's deputy Khairat el-Shater, officials told the Associated Press. Minutes before the military's deadline for Morsi to resolve the nation's political crisis passed Wednesday afternoon, the embattled leader called for "national reconciliation," but vowed he would never step down.

Millions were in the main squares of major cities nationwide, demanding Morsi's removal, in the fourth day of the biggest anti -government rallies the country has seen, surpassing even those in the uprising that ousted against his autocratic predecessor Hosni Mubarak. Critics say Morsi set the nation on a path toward Islamic rule. Khaled Daoud, spokesman of the main opposition National Salvation Front, which pro-reform leader Mohamed ElBaradei leads, said that ElBaradei, Sheik Ahmed el-Tayeb, grand imam of Al-Azharmosque, and Pope Tawadros II, patriarch of Egypt's Coptic Christian minority, were part of the Wednesday meetings with military leaders. Employees at Egypt's state TV station said military officers were present in the newsroom monitoring its output, but not interfering with their work.

In an emotional 46-minute speech late Tuesday, Morsi vowed not to step down and pledged to defend his constitutional legitimacy with his life in the face of three days of massive street demonstrations calling for his ouster. The Islamist leader accused Mubarak loyalists of exploiting the wave of protests to topple his regime and thwart democracy. "There is no substitute for legitimacy," said Morsi, at times angrily raising his voice, thrusting his fist in the air and pounding the podium. He warned that electoral and constitutional legitimacy "is the only guarantee against violence."

Clashes in Cairo and elsewhere in the country left at least 23 people dead, most in a single incident near the main Cairo University campus. The latest deaths take to 39 the number of people killed since Sunday in violence between opponents and supporters of Morsi, who took office in June last year as Egypt's first freely elected leader. At the U.S. State Department media briefing Wednesday, spokeswoman Jen Psaki restated the administration's priority on the democratic process. "It's never been about one individual," she told reporters. "It's been about hearing and allowing the voices of the Egyptian people to be heard." Pentagon Spokesman George Little said there has been no change in terms of the U.S. military pre-positioning assets in and around Egypt in the event they are called upon to assist the U.S. embassy in Cairo.

Accession to power of President Mohammed Mursi – By Election

Tentative election calendar – November

EGYPT – Acknowledging Historical events, Public speculation and debates et-al'

February 9, 2013: Unrest In Egypt Over Port Said Football Riot Sentences'

News tip: Rival football fans in Egypt have protested over sentences handed down over riots at a match in Port Said in February last year. The court upheld 21 death sentences and handed down prison terms to other defendants over the violence, which claimed 74 lives. Most victims were supporters of a Cairo team, and fans there criticized the sentencing for not going far enough. In Port Said, fans of the local team accused the court of unfairness. Many people believe police in the city stood by during the rioting in revenge for the role of football supporters in the unrest which toppled Hosni Mubarak as president a year before. Police deny the accusation. Ahead of Saturday's sentencing, the army assumed policing in Port Said, which saw fresh unrest last week. Police in at least 10 of Egypt's 29 provinces have been holding an unprecedented strike in protest at being used by the government of Islamist President Mohammed Morsi to confront protesters. Hanging sentence: Fans had surged through the streets to attend a rally at their stadium, and a police club and the Egyptian football federation building were set alight in the chaos. Both buildings are close to the team's stadium and a senior security official was quoted as saying by AFP news agency that some fans had stormed the club and torched it. Confirming the capital punishment sentences, Judge Sobhi Abdel-Maguid specified "the death penalty by hanging".

Port Said governorate security chief Essam Eddin Samak and nine other defendants were each sentenced to 15 years in jail. Six received 10-year jail terms and two were sent to prison for five years. A single defendant got a 12-month jail term and 28 of the accused, including seven policemen, walked free. The court's verdicts, broadcast live on TV, were initially cheered by fans of Cairo's al-Ahly team, who are known as the Ultras. "First we were happy when we heard the 21 death sentences," one fan told AFP news agency. "We were cheering and didn't hear the rest of the verdict. Then we were very angry." Two demonstrators died on Saturday in Cairo in clashes with police, the head of the city's ambulance service told the BBC. One was killed following inhalation of tear gas and the second by birdshot. The clashes, near Tahrir Square, were originally thought to be connected to the football riot trial, but it later transpired to be unrelated. Unrest in the area flared up last week when police tried to open Tahrir Square to traffic. In Port Said, fans of local team al -Masri were already angry that all of those sentenced to death were supporters of the team. Two senior police officers were jailed but seven other security officials were acquitted, fuelling local resentment. Some demonstrators tried to block the Suez Canal by untying speedboats and setting them adrift while others sought to interrupt car ferry traffic. Military police recovered five of the speedboats and brought them back to shore, but two were still drifting, one witness told Reuters news agency. However, the canal was protected by troops backed by tanks, and military helicopters hovered above the crowd. Before Saturday, the canal, a global shipping route, was considered off-limits by protesters, correspondents say. At least seven people - civilians and security officials - died earlier this week in unrest in the city. The original death sentences imposed on the 21 defendants in January sparked a local revolt.

Port Said 2012 football deaths

74 people killed in Port Said stadium on 2 February 2012

Clashes broke out between rival fans of Port Said club al -Masry and Cairo's al-Ahly

Fans flooded on to pitch, attacking Ahly players and fans as match ended

Most died of concussion, cuts and suffocation

The largest death toll in Egypt's football history

February 10, 2013: Egyptians Turn To Black Market For Hard Currency'

A run on Egypt's pound has left foreign currency in short supply and driven some dealers into the streets in search of people with U.S. dollars to sell, spawning a new black market. The currency's decline was triggered by a political uprising that swept Hosni Mubarak from power in 2011 and it has officially lost 8 percent of its value since Dec. 30. Black market rates are even weaker, a sign that although the central bank managed to stem the slide in official trade last week, Egyptians are nervous about holding on to pounds. Some dealers tout discreetly outside regulated foreign exchange bureaus and banks in Cairo, illegally offering a better rate to those looking to sell hard currency. "There are no dollars.

Everyone that walks in asks for dollars but supply is scarce," said one of the dealers. The central bank took steps last week to manage the rate including narrowing the pound's trading band. It was last bid at 6.71 to the dollar on Sunday in interbank trade. That is 13.4 percent weaker than its level on the eve of the uprising that led to Mubarak's downfall, pitching Egypt into two years of turmoil that has scared off tourists and investors. On Cairo's streets, one dealer offered to sell dollars at a rate of 6.95 on Thursday - 3.5 percent weaker than the official price. Another asked for 6.89 pounds to the dollar.

The pound's decline has been reflected in a drop in Egypt's foreign reserves, which fell to $13.6 billion at the end of January - below the $15 billion level needed to cover three months' imports. The reserves stood at $36 billion on the eve of the uprising against Mubarak. Complicating a business climate already weighed down by political unrest, some importers say they are having to source their foreign exchange needs from what they call the parallel or open market. One senior executive at an Egyptian company that imports goods from abroad said companies were able to source their dollar needs from the black market, but forecast that supply would tighten further in the coming weeks.

"Corporations are not having problems arranging for U.S. dollars from the open market. However, there is a spread that ranges between 16 to 20 piasters between the bank rates and the open market," he said. Speaking on condition of anonymity because he was discussing an illegal market, he forecast that dollar supply would dry up further because of factors such as political uncertainty. "What will happen? Most probably you will start seeing products disappearing from supermarket shelves," he said. "The challenges that we are facing now are nothing compared to what we could be heading to."

CENTRAL BANK GOVERNOR NOT WORRIED: Central bank governor Hisham Ramez has said he is not worried about the emergence of a black market. Bonook El Youm, a weekly supplement published by the financial daily Al-Alam Al-Youm, "quoted him as saying he is confident the authorities have the tools to eliminate it completely. There is no sign of dealers being targeted by the police.

Officials at the central bank did not respond to calls or emails from Reuters requesting comment on the subject. Bankers seeking to meet their clients' foreign currency needs through official channels face a wait of weeks or months, said one who deals with major corporate clients. "I used to order it and get it on the next day or the following one at most," said the banker, speaking on condition of anonymity because he was not permitted to talk to the media. The decline in foreign reserves drove the central bank to introduce the system of regular U.S. dollar auctions in late December to avoid a full blown currency crisis. The weighted average bid at those auctions has been setting the official exchange rate in banks and foreign currency bureaus. Banks had been allowed to buy or sell dollars or their equivalent to other banks in a band of 0.5 percent above or below the average bid at the auction.

The central bank narrowed the band, setting a limit of 0.01 pounds above or below the weighted average bid. Dealers say the currency has recovered somewhat since hitting a black market low of around 7.5 pounds to the dollar in late January, when deadly street violence flared during protests marking the second anniversary of the anti -Mubarak revolt. But some forecast that the pound could come under further pressure with political instability pushing back the prospects of Egypt concluding a deal with the International Monetary Fund seen as vital to securing a $4.8 billion loan. "The current FX management framework could continue to play for time, though (the Egyptian pound) will remain vulnerable in the meantime," Bank of America Merrill Lynch said in a report last week. "Domestic U.S. dollar demand is likely to strengthen and the gap between the official and parallel rates is likely to widen." Simon Kitchen, strategist for investment bank EFG-Hermes, added: "It's difficult to see a long term equilibrium in the FX market until the political situation improves and we at least see a deal with the IMF."

February 11, 2013: Brotherhood Man Spurned For Role As Egypt's Top Cleric'

Egypt's leading religious scholars spurned the ruling Muslim Brotherhood's choice and picked an apolitical Islamic law professor on Monday to be the country's top cleric. The post of grand mufti of Egypt carries wide influence over legislation and social affairs. "Dr Shawki Ibrahim Abdel-Karim Allam, professor of Islamic law in Tanta University, got the highest number of votes and the matter has been sent to the president to issue his decision," a statement from al-Azhar seat of learning said. President Mohamed Mursi, a Muslim Brotherhood member, is expected to formalize his appointment soon. The contender groomed by the Brotherhood, Abdul Rahman al-Bar, 50, a 30-year veteran of the conservative Islamist group and member of its decision-making Supreme Guidance Council, was not even in the top three nominees, officials said. The grand mufti delivers televised sermons on major Muslim holidays and is empowered to issue opinions (fatwas) on any matter, influencing legislation on social and cultural issues, public behavior and court rulings.

Allam chairs the department of jurisprudence in the Sharia law faculty in al-Azhar's university in the northern Nile delta town of Tanta. The mufti's office gave his age as 55. He will serve until the normal retirement age of 60. "This is big vote of trust in me and I hope to God that I will be up to the task," Allam told Reuters. He declined to discuss his views until the president makes the appointment. A panel of Islamic scholars took the decision after "detailed study of the applicants based on scientific legal standards, the adoption of al-Azhar's moderate agenda and an estimation of their psychological and moral suitability", the official statement said. Insiders said the Brotherhood had pushed for Bar despite warnings that his candidacy would be seen as part of a power grab to dominate all state institutions. "It seems some council members were sensitive to the strong public resistance to Bar's nomination, which led them to change their mind," a senior official in the mufti's office said. He said the new mufti had no political or sectarian religious affiliations. The selection was made amid anti-Mursi public protests on the second anniversary of the resignation of veteran President Hosni Mubarak, ousted by a pro-democracy uprising.

February 11, 2013: Update 1-UAE Attracts $8billion in Investment In 2012 After Arab Spring' The United Arab Emirates attracted about 30 billion dirhams ($8.2 billion) of direct foreign investment last year, the UAE's prime minister said. Large amounts of capital fled Egypt, Tunisia, Syria, Yemen and other Arab countries in search of safe havens after political and economic turmoil erupted in those countries in early 2011. Because of its political stability and Dubai's status as an international business centre, the UAE has attracted a large share of the capital.

Sheikh Mohammed bin Rashid al-Maktoum's office said in a statement that the UAE had received 30 billion dirhams in all foreign direct investment last year. But speaking earlier the Sheikh insisted that it would be wrong to think the UAE was benefitting from the Arab Spring, as stability in countries hit by the unrest would benefit the whole region including the UAE. "If we had peace and stability, we would have more than 30 billion...," Sheikh Mohammed, who is also Dubai's ruler, said during an open forum for the public to quiz government officials.

Dubai's real estate market began to recover last year from a crash in the previous few years, partly because foreign investors saw the emirate as a safe haven, property analysts said. The UAE attracted $7.68 billion of foreign direct investment from all countries in 2011, up from $5.50 billion in 2010, according to the United Nations Conference on Trade and Development. Sheikh Mohammed also said the UAE had invested much more than 30 billion dirhams in countries hit by the Arab Spring. The oil - rich UAE has pledged billions of dollars in aid to help stabilize cash-strapped Arab states since the uprisings began, and UAE companies have shown interest in investing in North Africa.

February 11, 2013: Egypt Orders Cleric Held Over Elbaradei Death Call'

Egypt's public prosecutor ordered the arrest of a Muslim cleric who said leaders of the main opposition coalition should be condemned to death under Islamic law for seeking to topple President Mohamed Mursi, the state news agency said on Monday. Hardline Salafi Muslim cleric Mahmoud Shaaban was ordered held for questioning over comments in an online video clip for the religious channel al-Hafez calling for the death of leaders of the opposition National Salvation Front. He singled out liberal NSF politician Mohamed ElBaradei and leftist presidential candidate Hamdeen Sabahy. Shaaban "will be detained for questioning over charges that he incited the death of leaders of the NSF", MENA news agency reported. The NSF has called for regular protests against Mursi, the Muslim Brotherhood politician elected president in June, accusing him of trying to monopolize power. ElBaradei, a former head of the U.N. nuclear watchdog, criticized the Islamist-led authorities last week for not acting to stop Shaaban. The government subsequently deployed a police guard at his home and outside the houses of other opposition figures. Shabaan had said that the NSF leaders wanted power and were "burning Egypt" to get it. "It is clear now their sentence in God's law is death," he said in the video posted on YouTube on February 2.

February 11, 2013: Egypt Protesters, Police Clash On Mubarak Anniversary'

Protesters demanding the departure of Egyptian President Mohamed Mursi clashed with police outside his palace on Monday on the second anniversary of the overthrow of veteran autocrat Hosni Mubarak. Dozens of youths threw rocks at the Ettihadiya palace after a peaceful march by thousands of demonstrators who accused Mursi's conservative Muslim Brotherhood of hijacking Egypt's democratic revolution and seeking to monopolize power. Police responded by firing water cannon and teargas from the walls of the presidential compound, which have been raised in some places and shielded by barbed wire after petrol bombs set fire to a building in the grounds last week. The clashes, which appeared smaller and less violent than previous bouts of anti-Mursi unrest, were broadcast live on some television channels. "We may be few in numbers but we will not back down from fighting criminals dressed up in police uniform," said Ahmed Farghaly, a protester outside the presidential palace. Riot police later emerged to chase the protesters away from the palace and into side - streets.

The presidency's spokesman Yasser Ali called on all parties to condemn the clashes. "Violence will burn the fingers of those who call for it and use it ... The presidency supports the continuation of peaceful protests and freedom of expression but any attempt to veer off peaceful protesting will be dealt with firmly," Ali said on state television late on Monday. He dismissed speculation that President Mursi may sack the existing cabinet and form a national unity government, saying it had "no basis in truth". The main Cairo rally was in the central Tahrir Square, focal point of three weeks of demonstrations in 2011 that led to Mubarak's resignation. Mubarak, who ruled Egypt with an iron fist for 30 years, was sentenced to life imprisonment last June for his role in killing protesters after a trial seen as setting a precedent for holding Middle East autocrats to account. Opposition parties are now demanding Mursi be put on trial over the deaths of nearly 60 demonstrators in anti-government protests that erupted on January 25, but the public prosecutor says there is no evidence to link the democratically elected president with the deaths.

February 11, 2013: Libya To Shut Egypt, Tunis Borders For Anniversary'

Libya will shut its borders with Tunis and Egypt for five days as a security measure ahead of the country's two-year anniversary marking the ouster of Muammar Gaddafi, the prime minister said on Monday. Ali Zeidan announced the closure during a news conference as part of list of security measures following concerns about potential militia violence surrounding the celebrations. "As of midnight on February 14th until the 18th, no one will be allowed to cross the Libyan borders between Egypt or Tunis as a security precaution," he told reporters on Monday. On February 17, Libyans will mark two years since an armed revolt ended Gaddafi's rule and celebrations are planned to begin on February 15. But many Libyans, particularly those in the east, are urging citizens to take to the streets to protest the government's inability to so far provide security by disarming militias or moving towards writing a constitution. Security is particularly a concern in the east of the country where violence towards foreigners and police assassinations have become a regular occurrence by unknown extremist militias. On January 25, the United Kingdom urged their nationals to leave Benghazi citing a "specific and imminent" threat to Westerners days after a deadly attack by Islamist militants in neighboring Algeria. Flights to Libya were suspended by Lufthansa and Austrian Airlines until after the February 17 citing "tensions on the ground" in the country. Many international organizations, including the United Nations mission in Libya and Western embassy staff will be on lockdown starting on February 14 as a safety measure. Security in Tripoli and Benghazi have been increased in the past week, with several random check points by Libyan police and militias affiliated with the interior ministry popping up on all major roads. "We will focus on tightening security at airports also in order to avoid any issues that will derail the celebrations," Zeidan said.

February 12, 2013: Italian Ex-spy Chief Gets 10 Years In CIA Case'

Italy's former military intelligence chief was sentenced to 10 years in jail for his role in the kidnapping of an Egyptian Muslim cleric in an operation organized by the United States. An American former CIA station chief was this month sentenced in absentia to seven years in jail after imam Abu Omar was snatched from a Milan street in 2003 and flown to Egypt for interrogation during the United States' "war on terror". The Milan appeals court sentenced Niccolo Pollari, former head of the Sismi military intelligence agency, to 10 years in prison and his former deputy Marco Mancini to nine years. The court also awarded a provisional 1 million Euros in damages to the imam, the Ansa news wire reported, as well as 500,000 Euros to the imam's wife.

Nicola Madia, a lawyer for Pollari, said he was disturbed by the decision and that his client would appeal to Italy's highest court. Pollari will not have to go to jail until the appeals process has been exhausted. Madia said Pollari had not been able to defend himself properly because successive Italian governments had declared the case to be covered by state secrecy laws. The sentences are part of the fallout from a campaign waged by then U.S. president George W. Bush after the Sept. 11, 2001, attacks on the United States. Abu Omar says he was tortured for seven months after being flown to Egypt in what was known as an "extraordinary rendition" operation. He was resident in Italy at the time of his abduction. Former

CIA Rome station chief Jeffrey Castelli and two other American officials were convicted in their absence by the Milan appeals court for their part in the plot, but are unlikely to serve their sentences. Human rights groups have been fighting to expose heavy-handed tactics used by the CIA during the Bush administration.

February 12, 2013: Egypt Activist Gendi Died After Car Crash, Not Torture - Doctor'

An Egyptian activist whose death provoked violent protests was killed in a car crash and was not tortured to death by police, a senior forensic official said. Fellow campaigners had said Mohamed el-Gendi, 23, was rounded up along with other youth protesters on Jan. 25, the second anniversary of the start of the Egyptian revolt against autocrat Hosni Mubarak. Security sources said he was taken to a state security camp, interrogated and tortured, drawing parallels with the brutal tactics used by Mubarak's henchmen during his rule. The interior ministry had already denied the accusations saying Gendi was hit by a car on Jan. 28, and taken to Cairo's Hilal hospital where he died some days later. That account was backed up by the assistant of Egypt's top forensic doctor, Emad al -Deib, who told Egypt's Al-Hayat channel on Tuesday: "The forensic report confirmed that the death of Mohamed el-Gendi was due to a car accident and dismissed he was subjected to any torture." Violent protests erupted during Gendi's funeral in Cairo and in his home town in the Nile Delta Town of Gharbiya last week.

February 12, 2013: Egypt's El-Baradei Urges Consensus To Win IMF Loan'

Egyptian opposition leader Mohamed ElBaradei called on Tuesday for a national consensus to secure an urgently-needed IMF loan and save the country from economic collapse within months. Ratings agency Moody's cut Egypt's credit rating on Tuesday, citing doubts about its ability to secure a requested $4.8 billion International Monetary Fund loan and the economic impact of a new round of political unrest. Moody also cited a further weakening in Egypt's external payments position given a large drop in foreign reserves in January as the country battles to stave off a currency crisis. ElBaradei, a former head of the U.N. nuclear watchdog, urged Islamist President Mohamed Mursi to appoint a strong, inclusive government with what he called a professional finance minister to work with the IMF. "No one will give a cent to Egypt ... without seeing real national cooperation," he told Al-Hayat TV in an interview. ElBaradei was the second major leader of the opposition National Salvation Front (NSF) to call this week for an agreement on a package of economic priorities, apparently setting political differences with Mursi aside for a while. Amr Moussa, a former Arab League chief and co-leader of the NSF, called for the government and opposition to agree to postpone parliamentary elections expected in April for six months and work together on the economy. "We have in the Front top economic experts that see it is crucial to get the loan as a certificate of confidence in the Egyptian economy. But it will not happen without national consensus and a package of (economic) measures," ElBaradei said. "There should be political stability and a return of security and simultaneously the economy (will recover) and automatically tourism and investment will return," he added.

Egypt's central bank has said foreign reserves fell to $13.6 billion in January, below the $15 billion level needed to cover three months worth of imports. The NSF has been leading anti-Mursi public protests for months and has boycotted talks sponsored by Mursi to demand a national unity government, changes to the Islamist-leaning constitution, the sacking of the top public prosecutor, and the prosecution of police brutality. There was no immediate response from the government to Moussa's and ElBaradei's calls for an economic consensus. The second biggest Islamist movement, the Nour Party, said on Tuesday the loan agreement must be approved by a body of senior scholars at Al -Azhar, the state's top religious institution whose new role is embedded in the constitution. The United States urged Egypt this week to move fast to agree a loan deal with the IMF, reform its energy sector and guarantee investors against "arbitrary acts" to avert a deeper slide in its economy. Moussa demanded an urgent "reordering of priorities to mobilize all capacities to confront the present serious situation". He suggested Mursi's government and the opposition, made up of liberal, social democratic, leftist and Salafi parties, agree on a four-point initiative to restore public finances, reschedule the energy debt, revive tourism and investment and shield the poor from extra burdens. ElBaradei said Egypt faced an economic collapse "in two to three months" unless the government started to listen to the opposition and economic experts. Asked about the opposition's real objective, he said: "We don't want to oust Dr. Mursi. It's much bigger than that: we want the country to move on."

February 12, 2013: Egypt Court Jails Israeli For Two Years - Court Sources'

An Egyptian court sentenced an Israeli man to two years in prison for crossing illegally into the Sinai peninsula, court sources said. Egypt said in December it had arrested the man after he slipped into the Sinai's Taba region and took photographs of security buildings. State media at that time identified the man, Andrei Pshenichnikov, as a 24-year-old army officer. Israel had no comment on the case, but an official speaking on condition of anonymity denied the man held by Egypt was in the military. Pshenichnikov's mother told Israel Radio in December her son had completed compulsory military service and had lived in Palestinian territory in the occupied West Bank before heading to Egypt with plans to meet up with friends in Cairo. Israeli media described him as a pro-Palestinian activist, and reported a month ago at the time of his arrest that Pshenichnikov had crossed into Egypt with plans to enter the Gaza Strip, an Islamist-ruled territory off limits to Israelis. The ruling by the court in the Nuweiba area of Sinai was issued on Monday. The court sources said Pshenichnikov had not given a convincing explanation for why he crossed into Egypt illegally when he could have entered as a tourist. Sinai has suffered from lax security since Egypt's 2011 uprising, which overthrew President Hosni Mubarak. Egypt regained the peninsula, which Israel occupied during a 1967 war, after the two signed a peace deal in 1979. The two countries have maintained an uneasy peace since then, and their relations have been marred by several high-profile cases in which Egyptian authorities accused Israel of espionage. Israeli tourists have continued to holiday in the Sinai, although in lower numbers since a spate of bomb attacks on resorts from 2004 to 2006.

February 12, 2013: U.S. Concerned At "Climate Of Impunity" In Egypt'

The United States expressed concern on Tuesday about growing political polarization in its major ally Egypt and a "climate of impunity" over abuses by police and security forces in the most populous Arab nation. At a news conference after a four-day visit, U.S. Assistant Secretary of State for Human Rights, Democracy and Labor Michael Posner avoided direct criticism of the Muslim Brotherhood-led government of President Mohamed Mursi. But he said young people's economic and political concerns, which had led to recent violent protests, should be addressed, and the government should "reach out widely" to other political and social forces and hold consultations on concerns about the Islamist -tinged constitution it pushed through in December. "While recognizing the need for the Egyptian government to take specific steps to build confidence and to address valid concerns, we condemn this violence unequivocally," Posner said. Noting that the authorities had the right and duty to ensure public order and stop violence by protesters, he said: "At the same time there are credible reports that police and security forces have used excessive force. "We have heard reports of cases throughout Egypt where the police have resorted to torture and other forms of cruel treatment of those in their custody. There are also reports of deaths in custody," he said.

Some abuses were under investigation but there had been few successful prosecutions so far. "This contributes to a climate of impunity and a lack of meaningful accountability for these actions," Posner said, adding that authorities had also failed to identify and punish perpetrators of "an alarming number of rapes and other acts of violence against women". Asked whether human rights were better or worse in Egypt than under former President Hosni Mubarak, toppled in a popular uprising two years ago, he declined to make a comparison but said young people's expectations were higher now. Pressed about opposition calls for an early presidential election to bridge the growing rift in society, he said it was vital that all political forces engage in the campaign for parliamentary elections due in April. He declined repeatedly to discuss the idea of an early presidential poll. Mursi was elected last June to serve a four-year term. Posner met the Egyptian foreign and justice ministers, a senior aide to Mursi, the nation's top Muslim cleric and a range of civil society leaders. He reaffirmed Washington's concerns about legislation under discussion regulating non-governmental organizations and the right to demonstrate, saying it was vital but should respect international standards.

February 13, 2013: Egyptian Cabinet Backs Bill On Protests, Critics Cry Foul'

Egypt's Islamist-led government approved a draft law on demonstrations on Wednesday that backers say meets international democratic standards but critics believe will give the state too much power to stifle protest. The bill will be sent to the Shura council, the Islamist-dominated upper house of parliament, which currently has sole legislative power during Egypt's transition to democracy. "This law has been drafted to restore peace to protests, which are considered to be among the strongest rights granted to the nation," Justice Minister Ahmed Mekky said, according to the state news agency MENA. Heba Morayef, Egypt director of Human Rights Watch, countered: "This law seems designed to actually increase restrictions, whereas the existing legal framework, which dates back to the early 20th century, was bad enough. "If one protester commits a crime, it gives the police the right to disperse the entire protest," Morayef told Reuters. Close to 60 people died in violent protests against Islamist President Mohamed Mursi between Jan. 25, the second anniversary of the start of Egypt's popular uprising, and Feb. 4. Protests on everything from political rights to economic grievances have become a routine feature of public life in the last two years, prior to which they were severely repressed. Under the draft law, Mekky said, peaceful protest would be a right that must be protected and this would require formal notification of demonstrations at least three days in advance. Police may order the route of a protest march to be changed.

CRITICISM: Morayef said the draft law would give police too sweeping powers to disperse protests, and included unacceptable restrictions on demonstrating within 200 meters (yards) of government buildings, parliament, embassies, courts, places of worship, police stations, courts and military zones. However, Mekky said the draft gives the police the duty to protect protests. It aims to avoid any confusion between the right of peaceful assembly, which the state is obliged to protect, and acts of aggression against people and property, or obstruction of highways and public facilities. The authorities would have the right to seek a court injunction banning a demonstration, and the bill would outlaw blocking roads and squares and wearing masks or scarves obscuring the face. One contentious article would prohibit carrying banners or chanting slogans that include insults, defamation or contempt of "heavenly" religions, or that stir sedition, violence or hatred or include an offence to state bodies and institutions. Visiting U.S. Assistant Secretary of State for Human Rights Michael Posner said on Tuesday that it was important that the Egyptian government "respect international principles of free assembly and association and the critical role civil society plays in any democratic society". Thousands of Egyptian riot police and conscripts have gone on strike to demand the interior minister's resignation, saying he is too close to the country's Islamist leadership, security sources said on Wednesday. The Interior Ministry said the walkout was based on an erroneous belief that the government planned to ban demonstrations, pitching the police into confrontation with protesters.

February 13, 2013: Egyptian Court Orders Release Of One Of Mubarak's Aides'

A Cairo court on Wednesday ordered the release from prison of one of deposed Egyptian President Hosni Mubarak's closest aides after he was granted a retrial in a corruption case. Four other high-ranking officials from Mubarak's government, including a former prime minister, were also given retrials in their graft cases, according to state media. Many former officials have been convicted on graft and other charges since Mubarak fell to a popular uprising in February 2011, but activists say the long, complicated legal proceedings have failed to produce real justice. Zakaria Azmi, Mubarak's former chief of staff, was sentenced last May to seven years in jail and fined 36.4 million Egyptian pounds ($6 million) on charges of making illegal gains. An appeals court recently ordered a retrial in that case, and a separate criminal court ruled on Wednesday that Azmi must be released under a law that says a suspect can not be held in prison for more than 18 months.

Azmi has been in detention for about 22 months, state news agency MENA reported. The former top aide, one of the most senior members of Mubarak's inner circle, will still face travel and financial restrictions but not be confined to his home. Mubarak is in a military hospital. Last month a Cairo court granted him a retrial after he was jailed for life over the killing of protesters by security forces trying to quell the uprising against him. Also, an appeals court annulled the verdicts of former prime minister Ahmed Nazif, former interior minister Habib al-Adli and former finance minister Youssef Boutrous-Ghali in a separate graft case, MENA said. Boutros-Ghali fled abroad before his trial, while the other two have been in prison. The three had been convicted of squandering 92 million Egyptian pounds in public funds in a case involving irregularities in the procurement of vehicle license plates. Former tourism minister Zoheir Garrana was also granted a retrial in a case in which he is accused of illegally issuing licenses to tourism companies, MENA said. All four former officials also face separate graft cases, while Adli is further charged with involvement in the killing of protesters.

February 13, 2013: Egyptian Police Strike, Seek Interior Minister's Ouster'

Thousands of Egyptian riot police and conscripts have gone on strike to demand the interior minister's resignation, saying he is too close to the country's Islamist leadership, security sources said on Wednesday. The action takes place after security forces and anti-government demonstrators have clashed in the capital and other cities. At least 59 people were killed in protests between Jan. 25, second anniversary of the uprising that toppled former president Hosni Mubarak, and Feb. 4. The strikers, mostly conscripts but led by police officers, say Interior Minister Mohamed Ibrahim is "in thrall to the Islamist president" and must resign, said a general at the Cairo security directorate, who declined to give his name. Another officer also told Reuters that Ibrahim, who is a general, was too close to President Mohamed Mursi. They were also upset that he had directed the state security force to protect the headquarters of the Muslim Brotherhood, Egypt's dominant political group. The Interior Ministry confirmed that some police officers and soldiers were on strike and said it had told commanders to listen to their demands. The ministry said the cause of the strike was that riot police erroneously believed the government planned to ban demonstrations which would pitch them into confrontation with protesters. Pro-opposition daily Al Masry Al Youm splashed pictures of a rare police demonstration on its front page on Wednesday. It said officers were protesting against the "Brotherhoodization" of the ministry and demanding legal changes and danger money for having to deal with political violence. A police major, who requested anonymity because he is not authorized to speak to the media, said: "Ibrahim is not neutral and has given orders to police to guard the headquarters of the Muslim Brotherhood.

"He does not work to represent the interests of his personnel," the major said. The riot police feel they are dragged into politics by being forced to confront protesters during mass rallies, he said. "This ends up stoking hatred between the ministry and the people," the major said. The strikes have spread to state security camps in Daqahliya, Gharbiya, Sharqiya, Menya and Damietta provinces, the security sources said. The Interior Ministry has been at the forefront of clashes involving protesters, mainly young, who complain that Mursi has done little to reform the police since Mubarak was ousted two years ago. Police and security officials were involved in the torture of detainees in the Mubarak era, according to human rights groups and activists. Police reform was a demand of the 2011 revolution but no police officer has been punished for the deaths of around 850 protesters during the uprising. Both the general and the major said the riot police personnel have demanded that former Interior Minister General Ahmed Gamal be reinstated as he was more neutral. Hundreds of policemen demonstrated outside the security directorate in the port city of Alexandria, most wearing civilian clothes, to demand that Ibrahim step down. "The people demand the reform of the Interior Ministry," they chanted. "Leave, leave, Ibrahim!" Video footage circulated earlier this month showed a protester beaten and dragged naked across the ground by policemen during a protest in front of the presidential palace.

February 13, 2013: Divided Syria Confronted By All-out War'

MiG warplanes roar low overhead to strike rebels fighting to oust President Bashar al-Assad on the fringes of Damascus, while artillery batteries pound the insurgents from hills overlooking a city divided between all -out war and a deceptive calm. Whole families can be obliterated by air raids that miss their targets. Wealthy Syrians or their children are kidnapped. Some are returned but people tell grim tales of how others are tortured and dumped even when the ransom is paid. People also tell of prisoners dying under torture or from infected wounds: of looting by the government's feared shabbiha militias or by rebels fighting to throw out the Assad family. That is one Damascus. In the other, comprising the central districts of a capital said to be the oldest continually inhabited city in the world, the restaurant menus are full, the wine is cheap and the souks are packed with shoppers. Employees report for work, children go to school and shops are open, seemingly undeterred by the din and thud of war. The two cities exist a few miles apart - for now. For Damascus and its outskirts are rapidly descending into civil war and everything that comes with it - lawlessness, looting, kidnapping and revenge killings. Like the rest of the country, the capital and its suburbs are crawling with armed gangs. "Anybody can come to you pretending he is security and grab you in broad daylight, put you in a car and speed off and nobody dares interfere or rescue you," says Lama Zayyat, 42. "A girl in the 7th grade was kidnapped and her father was asked to pay a big ransom. The same happened to other children," she said. Nobody really knows who is behind the kidnappings. In one gang, one brother is in charge of abductions while another brother negotiates with the victims. The fear is palpable.

NO SECT HAS BEEN SPARED: The war has not yet reached the heart of the capital, but it is shredding the suburbs. In the past week, government troops backed by air power unleashed fierce barrages on the east of the city in an attempt to flush out rebel groups. Most of central Damascus is controlled by Assad's forces, who have erected checkpoints to stop bomb attacks. The insurgents have so far failed to take territory in the centre. Just as loyalist forces seem unable to regain control of the country, there looks to be little chance the rebels can storm the centre of Damascus and attack the seat of Assad's power. For most of last week the army rained shells on the eastern and southern neighborhoods of Douma, Jobar, Zamalka and Hajar al-Aswad, using units of the elite Republican Guard based on the imposing Qasioun mountain that looms over the city. The rebels, trying to break through the government's defense perimeter, were periodically able to overrun roadblocks and some army positions, but at heavy cost. Jobar and Zamalka are situated near military compounds housing Assad's forces, while Hajar al-Aswad in the south is one of the gateways into the city, close to Assad's home and the headquarters of his republican guard and army. Since the uprising began two years ago, 70,000 people have been killed, 700,000 have been driven from Syria and millions more are displaced, homeless and hungry. No section of society has been spared, whether Christians, Alawites or Sunnis, but in every community it is the poor who are suffering most. Electricity is sporadic. Hospitals are understaffed as so many doctors - often targeted on suspicion of treating rebel wounded - have fled. Hotels and businesses barely function. Outside petrol stations and bakeries, queues are long and supplies often run out, meaning people have to come back the next day. Those who can afford it pay double on a thriving black market. The scale of the suffering can be seen in the ubiquitous obituary notices on the walls of Damascus streets - some announcing the deaths of whole families killed by shelling. As if oblivious of these private daily tragedies, the government insists the situation is under control, while the rebels say the Assads' days are numbered.

NOWHERE NEAR OVER: Ordinary Syrians are convinced their ordeal is nowhere near over. While they believe Assad will not be able to reverse the gains of the rebels, they cannot see his enemies prevailing over his superior firepower, and Russian and Iranian support. "The regime won't be able to crush the revolution and the rebels won't be able to bring down the regime," said leading opposition figure Hassan Abdel-Azim. "The continuation of violence won't lead to the downfall of the regime, it will lead to the seizure of the country by armed gangs, which will pose a grave danger not only to Syria but to our neighbors". "Right now no one is capable of winning," said a Damascus-based senior Arab envoy. "The crisis will continue if there is no political process. It is deadlock." Other diplomats in Damascus say the United States and its allies are getting cold feet about arming the rebels, fearing the growing influence of Islamist radicals such the al-Nusra Front linked to al-Qaeda, banned last year by Washington. Some remarks recur again and again in Damascus conversations: "Maybe he will stay in power, after all", and, above all, "Who is the alternative to Assad?" "At first I thought it was a matter of months. That's why I came here and stayed to bear witness to the final moments," said Rana Mardam Beik, a Syrian-American writer. "But it looks like it will be a while so I am thinking of going back to the U.S." Loyalty to Assad is partly fed by fear of the alternative. Facing a Sunni - dominated revolt, Syria's minorities, including Christians and Assad's own Alawites - an offshoot of Shi'ite Islam - fear they will slaughtered or sidelined if the revolution succeeds and Sunni fundamentalists come to power.

MINORITIES' FEAR: Many Christians are already trying to emigrate to countries such as Sweden, diplomats say. "The minorities have every right to be frightened because no one knows what is the alternative. Is it a liberal, civic, pluralistic and democratic state, or is the alternative an Islamist extremist rule that considers the minorities infidels and heretics?" said Abdel Azim. The government tells the minorities the only alternative to Assad is Islamism. Loyalist brutality against the Sunni majority is in danger of making this a self-fulfilling prophecy, by sucking in jihadi extremists from Libya to Saudi Arabia. "I am not with the regime but we are sure that if Bashar goes the first people they will come for are the Alawites, then the Shi'ites and then us Christians. They are fanatics," said George Husheir, 50, an IT engineer. At the Saint Joseph Church in Bab Touma, the old Christian quarter of Damascus, Christians in their dozens, mostly middle-aged and older couples, gathered for mass on a Friday morning. "We don't know what the future holds for us and for this country," said the priest in his sermon. "The Christians of Syria need to pray more." Nabiha, a dentist in her 40s, said: "Bashar is a Muslim president but he is not a fanatic. He gave us everything. Why shouldn't we love him. Look at us here in our church, we pray, we mark our religious rituals freely, we do what we like and nobody interferes with us." The fear of the Christians extends to the Alawite and minority Shi'ites. "If Bashar goes we definitely have to leave too because the Sufianis (Sunni Salafis) are coming and they are filled with a sectarian revenge against us," said one wealthy middle class Shi'ite.

COSTLY WAR: Alongside sectarian hatreds, class and tribal acrimony is also surfacing. Wealthy Sunnis in the capital are already in a panic about poor Sunni Islamists from rural areas descending on their neighborhoods. "When they come they will eat us alive", one rich Sunni resident of Damascus said, repeating what a cab driver dropping him in the posh Abou Roummaneh district told him: "Looting these houses will be allowed." Yet many activists feel protective of the revolution, despite the brutal behavior of some Islamist rebels. "People talk about chaos and anarchy after Assad, but so what if we have two years of a messy transition? That is better than to endure another 30 years of this rule," said Rana Darwaza, 40, a Sunni academic in Damascus. Prominent human rights lawyer Anwar al-Bunni said the suffering is a price that had to be paid. "Those on the ground will continue to fight even with their bare hands", he said. He said there are thousands of prisoners in horrific conditions in Assad's jails. Some suffocate in overcrowded cells while others die under torture or from untreated wounds. "They don't give them medical treatment or pain killers or antibiotics. They leave them to die," he said. Close watchers of Syria predict that if there is no settlement in a few months the conflict could go on for years. Yet the economy is collapsing, leaving the government to rely on dwindling foreign reserves, private assets and Iranian funds. There is no tourism, no oil revenue, and 70 percent of businesses have left Syria, said analyst Nabil Samman. "We are heading for destruction, the future is dark", he added. Added to the religious animosity between the Sunni majority and the Alawite minority who took control when Hafez al-Assad seized power in 1970 are social and economic grievances fuelled by the predatory practices of the elite. This resentment extends to young middle class Syrians who feel they have lost a way of life and that their country is being used by regional powers for proxy war. "All the regional point-scoring is taking place in Syria. We have Libyan fighters and Saudis fighting for freedom in Syria, why are they here? Let them go and demand freedom in their own countries?," said banker Hani Hamaui, 29. Two years into the uprising, Assad is hanging on. Some will always back him and others want him dead. But many just want an end to the fighting. They may have to wait for some time. Signs daubed on the gates to the city by Assad's troops are a reminder that the battle for Damascus will be costly. "Either Assad, or we will set the country ablaze", they say.

February 13, 2013: Egypt Floods Gaza Tunnels To Cut Palestinian Lifeline'

Egyptian forces have flooded smuggling tunnels under the border with the Palestinian-ruled Gaza Strip in a campaign to shut them down, Egyptian and Palestinian officials said. The network of tunnels is a vital lifeline for Gaza, bringing in an estimated 30 percent of all goods that reach the enclave and circumventing a blockade imposed by Israel for more than seven years. Reuters reporters saw one tunnel being used to bring in cement and gravel suddenly fill with water on Sunday, sending workers rushing for safety. Locals said two other tunnels were likewise flooded, with Egyptians deliberately pumping in water. "The Egyptians have opened the water to drown the tunnels," said Abu Ghassan, who supervises the work of 30 men at one tunnel some 200 meters (yards) from the border fence. An Egyptian security official in the Sinai told Reuters the campaign started five days ago. "We are using water to close the tunnels by raising water from one of the wells," he said, declining to be named. Dozens of tunnels had been destroyed since last August following the killing of 16 Egyptian soldiers in a militant attack near the Gaza fence. Cairo said some of the gunmen had crossed into Egypt via the tunnels - a charge denied by Palestinians - and ordered an immediate crackdown. The move surprised and angered Gaza's rulers, the Islamist group Hamas, which had hoped for much better ties with Cairo following the election last year of Egyptian President Mohamed Mursi, an Islamist who is ideologically close to Hamas. A Hamas official confirmed Egypt was again targeting the tunnels. He gave no further details and declined to speculate on the timing of the move, which started while Palestinian faction leaders met in Cairo to try to overcome deep divisions.

CRITICISING CAIRO: Hamas said on Monday the Egyptian-brokered talks, aimed at forging a unity government and healing the schism between politicians in Gaza and the occupied West Bank, had gone badly but had not collapsed. While Gaza's rulers have been reluctant to criticize Mursi in public, ordinary Gazans are slightly more vocal. "Egyptian measures against tunnels have worsened since the election of Mursi. Our Hamas brothers thought he would open up Gaza. I guess they were wrong," said a tunnel owner, who identified himself only as Ayed, fearing reprisal. "Perhaps 150 or 200 tunnels have been shut since the Sinai attack. This is the Mursi era," he added. The tunnelers fear the water being pumped underground might collapse the passage ways, with possible disastrous consequences. "Water can cause cracks in the wall and may cause the collapse of the tunnel. It may kill people," said Ahmed Al -Shaer, a tunnel worker whose cousin died a year ago when a tunnel caved in on him. Six Palestinians died in January in tunnel implosions, raising the death toll amongst workers to 233 since 2007, according to Gazan human rights groups, including an estimated 20 who died in various Israeli air attacks on the border lands. Israel imposed its blockade for what it called security reasons in 2007. The United Nations has appealed for it to be lifted. At one stage an estimated 2,500-3,000 tunnels snaked their way under the desert fence but the network has shrunk markedly since 2010, when Israel eased some of the limits they imposed on imports into the coastal enclave. All goods still have to be screened before entering Gaza and Israel says some restrictions must remain on items that could be used to make or to store weapons. This ensures the tunnels are still active, particularly to bring in building materials. Hamas also prefers using the tunnels to smuggle in fuel, thereby avoiding custom dues that are payable on oil crossing via Israel.

February 13, 2013: Diesel Shortage Pushes Egyptians To The Brink'

Fathy Ali is beyond anger as he queues for hours in a line of 64 trucks and buses to fill his tank with scarce subsidized diesel fuel, known in Egypt as "Solar." "This has become part of my life. I come and wait for hours or days, depending on my luck," the chain-smoking bus driver said at a besieged gas station on Cairo's Suez High Road, wrapped in a scarf and thick coat for the long ordeal. "At the start it used to upset me a lot but now I've kind of given up." Diesel supplies are drying up as a cash-strapped government struggles to cap a mounting bill for subsidies it has promised the IMF it will reform to secure an elusive $4.8 billion loan desperately needed to keep a sagging economy afloat. The situation appears near breakdown with growing shortages, unsustainable subsidies and foreign exchange reserves running out, raising the risk that fuel bottlenecks lead to food shortages and pose a risk to political stability.

Foreign reserves are down below $15 billion, less than three months' imports, despite deposits from Qatar and Turkey. The Egyptian pound has lost 8 percent of its value this year and a black market has emerged for hard currency. The nation's strategic reserve of diesel fuel is down to three days' supply, the official MENA news agency "ed a government official as saying last week. Bakeries that use diesel to make staple subsidized bread have been told to keep 10 days' fuel supply but not all have the capacity. The Muslim Brotherhood-led government of President Mohamed Mursi this week postponed for up to three months a rationing system for subsidized fuel due to start in April in what looks like an attempt to avoid upsetting voters before parliamentary elections due that month. But reforms cannot be delayed for long, economists say. "Fuel shortages are a symptom of the strains on Egypt's unsustainable subsidy system," said Simon Kitchen, an economist at EFG-Hermes in Cairo.

DOWN-MARKET: Two government measures have aggravated the problem. In December, the subsidy on 95-octane petrol used by the wealthiest Egyptians was scrapped. That drove some motorists down-market to buy lower-grade fuel, raising the demand for subsidized 92-octane gasoline. Then in a drive to curb theft, smuggling and other abuses, the government restricted distribution of heavily subsidized low-grade gas oil used by trucks, tractors and buses to filling stations owned and operated by the military. That caused longer lines at the pumps and increasing economic disruption. At several filling stations, queues led to fights breaking out this week, Egyptian media reported.

The situation is so serious that Mursi held an emergency meeting with ministers about it on Tuesday night and instructed the energy minister to ensure sufficient supply, according to presidential spokesman Yasser Ali. Minister for Petroleum and Mineral Resources Osama Kamal said subsidizing Solar, sold at a give-away price of 1.25 Egyptian pounds ($0.19) a liter, costs the government $35 million a day. Altogether, energy subsidies will cost 120 billion Egyptian pounds in the fiscal year to end-June, up from 115 billion pounds the previous year, he said. They account for almost all of the forecast 135 billion pound budget deficit. Until, when the diesel shortage became the number one topic of television and radio talk-shows, the government seemed to be in denial. "There is no shortage," Kamal said. "There is a crisis in the distribution of Solar, not in the availability of it." Asked whether a shortage of hard currency was constraining fuel imports, he said: "Financial resources are still available for imports but they must be reserved for the most important priorities."

To drivers and tour operators, the result is the same. Khaled el -Manawi, a senior board member of the Egyptian travel agents' association, said the government was harming his industry, already hard hit by political turmoil, by withdrawing subsidized fuel from tourist boats. Businessman George Bishoy, who owns a fashion accessories store in the affluent Cairo suburb of Heliopolis, said his business had suffered a lot from delays in the delivery of imported goods. The daily al-Ahram "ed drivers complaining about the emergence of a black market in which a liter of diesel is sold at double the normal price. The spokesman of the independent drivers' union, Tarek el-Bahary, told Reuters: "The Solar problem is devastating. Drivers are suffering daily and the elected president has failed to solve this crisis." "The number of trucks has not increased, the number of trips has not increased but the government is unable to provide the Solar and unable to come up with creative solutions to solve the problem," he said

February 14, 2013: Ruling Party Aims For Outright Majority In New Parliament'

The Muslim Brotherhood's political party aims to win an outright majority in Egypt's forthcoming parliamentary elections without making alliances with other more hardline Islamist groups, its leader said on Thursday. Saad el-Katatni, 61, became the Freedom and Justice Party (FJP) leader in October, replacing Mohamed Mursi who had become the first elected president of Egypt since the overthrow of veteran authoritarian President Hosni Mubarak in 2011. "The Freedom and Justice Party will aim to get a majority (in parliament). We expect more popular support and an increase in our number of seats beyond what we held in the previous parliament," Katatni told a news conference. The FJP won about 40 percent of the vote in a parliamentary election last year, short of an absolute majority, although Islamist groups won a total of about 70 percent of the seats. The assembly was dissolved by a court order months later because the electoral rules were deemed unconstitutional. Katatni was the speaker of that short-lived parliament. Since the fall of Mubarak, Islamists have moved to the forefront of politics with organizational skills and finances unmatched by liberal and leftist rivals. But the Brotherhood-led government has faced growing hostility from opponents who accuse it of striving to monopolies power rather than seek consensus on political rights and economic reform, sparking protests that have turned violent.

Although he earlier pledged to forge a broader political front before the parliamentary vote, Katatni said the FJP would not make deals with other Islamist groups such as the Salafist al-Nour party, its biggest religious rival. "The FJP will coordinate to find alliances with other political forces but until now we have not decided yet who we will seek to form an alliance with," he said. "The Salafi parties and in particular Al-Nour have announced they do not wish to ally with the FJP," Katatni said, signaling fierce competition among Islamists in the next election. An official at the presidency told Reuters the vote was slated for the end of April or early May and would likely involve three rounds of voting, guarded by the armed forces. Next week, the constitutional court will submit its review of a parliamentary election law to the Shura council, the sole legislative body during the transition, which will adopt the law by the following week, judicial sources said.

February 14, 2013: Egyptian Regulator Appeals Against Court's YouTube Ban'

Egyptian authorities appealed against a court order banning the video file - sharing site YouTube for a month over an amateur video that denigrates the Prophet Mohammad, saying the ruling was unenforceable. "The National Telecommunication Regulatory Authority has presented an appeal to halt implementation of the verdict," said a statement from the Ministry of Communications and Information Technology. Egypt's administrative court ordered the ministries of communication and investment to block YouTube, owned by Google, inside the country because it had carried the film "Innocence of Muslims", said the state news agency MENA. The low-budget 13-minute video, billed as a film trailer and made in California with private funding, provoked a wave of anti-American unrest in Egypt, Libya and dozens of other Muslim countries in September. The video depicts the Prophet as a fool and a sexual deviant. For most Muslims, any portrayal of the Prophet is considered blasphemous. A statement issued after talks between ministry officials and the telecoms regulator said it was technically impossible to shut down YouTube in Egypt without affecting Google's Internet search engine, incurring potentially huge costs and job losses. "The government cannot carry out the contents of the verdict within Egypt's borders," the statement said. The only step the authorities could take was to block the offending film within Egypt, which had already been done. Only the United States had the capability to shut down YouTube, it said. "Blocking YouTube would affect the search engine of Google, of which Egypt is the second biggest user in the Middle East," the statement said. This would cause losses to the economy of up to hundreds of millions of Egyptian pounds (tens of millions of dollars) and affect thousands of jobs, it added. In a statement, Google said it had created a simple mechanism for legal authorities to request the blocking of content viewed as illegal.

February 14, 2013: Arabs Mired In Messy Transitions Two Years After Heady Uprisings' Two years on, the euphoria has long gone. The flame of revolt that first flared in Tunisia, previously one of the Arab world's quietest corners, consumed autocrats there, in neighboring Egypt and, more violently, in Libya. Contained in Bahrain, it flickered on in Yemen where in time a veteran leader was pushed aside. In Syria, it is still being fiercely fought over. All Arab countries have felt the heat. Gritty political transitions are under way in nations where "revolution" has triumphed, ushering in contests over power, identity and religion, continued economic and social malaise, new opportunities for Islamist radicals, lawlessness and a surge in sexual violence against women that has gained publicity. Among a host of unintended consequences is an outflow of weapons and fighters from Libya after the overthrow of Muammar Gaddafi that has helped to destabilize neighboring Mali. Another is rising tension between Sunni and Shi'ite Muslims across a region already buffeted by rivalry between Shi'ite Iran and U.S.-aligned Sunni powers led by Saudi Arabia. In Bahrain, the Saudis helped to crush protests led by the Shi'ite majority, and in Syria, mainly Sunni rebels are battling Iran's principal Arab ally, President Bashar al-Assad, whose rule is built around his Shi'ite-rooted Alawite minority. Many Arabs are proud of their new freedom to speak out and to take to the streets against real and perceived wrongs, but it has proved trickier than many expected to create prosperity, fill power vacuums left by entrenched rulers and convert police states into stable democracies governed by the rule of law.

"WORK AND DIGNITY": Unemployment, poverty and rising prices, which helped to fuel the revolts in Tunisia and Egypt, remain grievances in economies hit by unrest that has deterred tourists and foreign investors. "Our basic demand was work and dignity, but now under the Islamists we don't have either," said Aymen Ben Slimane, an unemployed young man in the Tunisian capital. "We have no confidence in them to achieve the goals of our revolution." Last week's assassination of opposition politician Chokri Belaid plunged Tunisia into its worst crisis since the uprising and raised fears of violence in a country where an Islamist

-led government faces strong liberal and secular opposition. Zouhour Layouni, a 22-year-old student in a headscarf, said Tunisia had won freedom of expression and could accommodate differences between Islamists like her and their opponents. "The assassination of Belaid is an exception," she said. "Now we ask secular people to give us time and they will see the results. Our hope is that Tunisia will be united." Tunisia's troubles and those of other Arab nations in early stages of transition should come as no surprise. "These revolutions require a long-term perspective. It would have been unrealistic to think that in two years these countries would have transformed themselves into perfectly functioning democracies," said Eric Goldstein of Human Rights Watch. "It's important not to underestimate how much 25 years of dictatorship and the politics of fear and intimidation have distorted the political landscape," he said, adding that Tunisian political parties lacked experience in negotiating their differences peacefully. "They are learning as they go."

SOARING EXPECTATIONS: Well-organized Islamist groups such as Egypt's Muslim Brotherhood and Tunisia's Ennahda party have won elections after revolts they did not start, but after years of preaching that "Islam is the solution" both have collided with the complexity of managing modern economies and governing unruly societies. "People are angry because they feel the revolution did not change their lives," Ennahda's leader Rached Ghannouchi told Reuters this week, acknowledging how hard it is to meet popular expectations raised by the overthrow of Zine al -Abidine Ben Ali. Relatively moderate Islamist parties face pressure from ultra-orthodox Salafis, whose drive to write stricter codes into new constitutions and laws dismays their liberal opponents. Some Salafis, but by no means all, are ready to pursue their goals through violence. The attacks on U.S. diplomatic missions in Tunis, Cairo and Benghazi in September, following an anti-Islam video that surfaced in America, illustrated the danger. A smattering of Arab voices reflecting on the ferment of the last two years provides individual insights, even if they cannot encompass the complexity of changes in the Middle East that will take years, if not decades, to shake down. In Egypt, liberal activist Abdelrahman Mansour, who helped organize protests on Jan. 25, 2011 that snowballed into an uprising against Hosni Mubarak, said Islamists had failed to bring Mubarak-era officials to account or to establish a real democratic transition after an interim period of military rule. "Instead, Islamists staged a series of power grabs that marginalized other political forces," he said, arguing that the military and their Islamist successors had sidelined youth groups and others who had prepared plans for reform of the interior ministry, judiciary and other state institutions. "Their aim was to contain the revolution and its youth by convincing the average Egyptian citizen that the youth were the ones destroying the revolution, not the ones who ignited it." Samir Wisamee, an Islamist activist, said Mubarak's removal and the holding of free and fair elections were major gains, but also lamented "the lack of accountability within the Interior Ministry and the cycle of violence that plagues the country".

SYRIA'S AGONY: While hundreds of people have died in unrest in post - Mubarak Egypt, the violence is dwarfed by that in Syria, where the United Nations says nearly 70,000 have now been killed since a revolt against Assad began with peaceful protests in March 2011. Syrian opposition campaigner Fawaz Tello, now in exile, said he was saddened by the human cost of freedom extracted by Assad's "savage" ruling system and by international inaction. But his biggest disappointment was a Syrian opposition that he said lacked leadership, political acumen and administrative skill. "It has not managed to connect effectively with the spirit of the revolution and it is responsible for corrupting the revolt by trying to buy loyalties of the rebels," he said. "But I'm proud that a defenseless people who have challenged a totalitarian system that has been strengthening itself for the last half a century are on their way to victory," Tello said. After so much carnage, the outcome of Syria's conflict is far from clear. Nor can anyone be sure what will emerge in other countries where Arabs rose up for freedom and dignity. Nathan Brown, at the Carnegie Endowment for International Peace, said the uprisings expressed "disgust in the prevailing political order and a hope that if societies could just get their politics right they would solve their pressing problems". Structures that kept self-serving Arab leaders in power had been toppled, "but there was no systematic thought about what should positively replace these systems, and building good ones has been far harder than anticipated", he said. "The biggest obstacle to such a process in Egypt and Tunisia - the two most hopeful countries two years ago - has not been the actions or attitudes of any particular actor but the deep polarization among various camps and the inability to bridge differences or even find a common language."

February 15, 2013: Top Egypt Archaeologist Sees Hope For Future In Past'

The keeper of Egypt's archaeological treasures sees hope for the nation's future in its pharaonic past. Mohammed Ibrahim, head of the antiquities ministry, likens Egypt's turbulent emergence from autocracy to the periods of decline that afflicted the nation on the Nile between the fall and rise of its three ancient kingdoms. "We have passed through similar periods like that, even in antiquity," said Ibrahim, custodian of the pyramids, tombs and temples that bear witness to one of the world's oldest civilizations. "Every time Egypt passes through this period, it recovers very quickly, very strongly." But for now, Ibrahim's ministry, is suffering from the repercussions of unrest that has hit the economy hard, driving away the tourism which pays his ministry's bills. Excavation work led by the ministry has ground to a halt because of the financial squeeze. The unrest has also stopped many foreign-financed digs by deterring the archaeologists. But the 59-year old Egyptologist is upbeat: foreign archaeologists are starting to come back. And while the periods of decline between the ancient kingdoms could last 200 years, he expects Egypt to bounce back much sooner this time around. "Egypt will be something new," he told Reuters in an interview at his offices in the medieval citadel that towers over the mosques of Cairo's Islamic quarter.

Head of Egyptian antiquities since late 2011, Ibrahim fills a post occupied for a decade by Zahi Hawass, who left office several months after the uprising that swept former President Hosni Mubarak from power after 30 years of autocratic rule. With a doctorate in Egyptology from France, his career includes time as director of Sakkara, an ancient necropolis south of Cairo best known for the stepped pyramid that was a forerunner of the pyramids at Giza. The job of managing Egypt's ancient antiquities is more complicated today than it was in Mubarak's era. The rise of Islamists repressed by the deposed autocrat has brought with it calls from a radical, if tiny, fringe for the destruction of pharanoic monuments on the grounds that are contrary to Islam. Ibrahim says the issue has been exaggerated out of all proportion by the Egyptian media. Investigations were only able to uncover one such fatwa, or religious edict, he said. Nevertheless, Ibrahim asked Egypt's Sunni Muslim authorities, including the prestigious al-Azhar mosque and university, to speak out. "They all said we have more than one fatwa saying that pharaonic monuments are not against Islam, or Islam is not against pharaonic monuments," Ibrahim said. "So now this case is closed."

RECOVERING STOLEN ARTEFACTS: Ibrahim has also been trying to recover artifacts stolen at the height of the uprising in 2011. The greatest losses were at the Egyptian Museum in Tahrir Square, where some 40 artifacts went missing. "We found about 15 objects, 29 artifacts are still missing," said Ibrahim. He takes pride in the fact that the museum housing King Tutankhamen’s treasures has been kept open through the spasms of turmoil since the revolt to "send a positive message". In an effort to draw back tourists, Ibrahim has reopened tombs and temples closed for years due to restoration. These include Sakkara's sprawling underground Serapeum, the catacombs where mummified sacred bulls, or Apis, were buried. The Serapeum had been closed since the late 1990s.

Six tombs have also been reopened at Giza plateau, together with the Pyramid of Chephren, the second largest. He says the Grand Egyptian Museum being built near the Giza pyramids will be completed by August, 2015. In another initiative to boost visitor numbers, Ibrahim said the aviation ministry would soon open routes from Red Sea beach resorts to Luxor and Aswan. "This also might encourage them to go ... at least for a day," he said. In Luxor, home to the Valley of the Kings, Ibrahim laments hotel occupancy rates have slumped to 17 percent in the winter months that should mark the high season for cultural tourism. "Egypt is still safe and welcoming those who want to come here," said Ibrahim. "If you want to help us, the only thing we need from you is to come back."

February 15, 2013: Islamists Rally Against Violence In Egypt'

Thousands of Islamists protested in Cairo on Friday against violence that has marred anti-government demonstrations, showing support for President Mohamed Mursi, the Muslim Brotherhood politician elected head of state last year. The "Together against Violence" rally was called by a hardline Salafi Islamist group that waged an armed revolt against the state in the 1990s. Al-Gama'a al-Islamiya, whose leadership renounced violence more than a decade ago, has entered mainstream politics since autocratic president Hosni Mubarak was overthrown in 2011. The Muslim Brotherhood and its Freedom and Justice Party said it backed Friday's rally in a symbolic way but did not mobilize supporters for the event, meaning the numbers were smaller than at previous Islamist protests. Around 60 people have been killed in Egypt since late January in unrest touched off by the anniversary of the uprising against Mubarak and exacerbated by a court ruling that sentenced 21 people to death over a soccer stadium disaster a year ago. It has been the worst bloodshed since Mursi assumed office, underlining the instability that continues to thwart government efforts to restore a sense of normalcy and revive an economy in crisis by attracting fresh investment and tourism. The unrest has been stirred by anger at Mursi and his Islamist backers, who the opposition says have betrayed the revolution and sought to monopolize power - accusations dismissed by the Muslim Brotherhood. Repeating the pattern of recent weeks, Mursi's opponents rallied again on Friday, this time gathering outside El-Quba, one of the presidential palaces in the northern suburbs of Cairo. The activists dubbed it "Checkmate Friday". The protesters numbered several hundred by early afternoon.

WARNING FROM CLERIC: Recent protests have routinely turned violent, with government buildings, police stations and the presidential palace coming under fire from petrol bombs and rocks. But, "the person who came (to power) through ballot boxes will not leave by petrol bombs," said a cleric who led the crowd in Friday prayers as the rally got under way outside Cairo University. "He who came to power by direct, free choice will not leave by the rocks thrown by children." The crowd grew to several thousand after prayer. "No to Violence. Yes to sharia (Islamic law)," declared a banner held aloft from the crowd. "With our blood and souls we will sacrifice ourselves for Islam!" chanted the crowd. "The people want an iron fist," read another banner. Some people journeyed in from the provinces for the rally. At one point, the mother of Khaled al - Islambouli, one of the Islamists behind President Anwar Sadat's 1981 assassination, appeared on stage, drawing cheers as she waved to the crowd. "Mohamad Mursi is a legitimate leader who was elected by the will of the people," said Mohamad Omar, from Mansoura, north of the capital. He came on a bus chartered by al-Gama'a al-Islamiya. "The opposition's methods of violence, petrol bomb-throwing, igniting fires and causing destruction is not accepted by the Islamists," added Alaa Abdulwahab, a 45-year old who had traveled from Minya, a four-hour journey south of Cairo. Mursi's most prominent liberal and leftist opponents have distanced themselves from the violence, saying they support only peaceful agitation. Islamist leaders and their rivals all renounced violence at crisis talks on January 31 chaired by al-Azhar, a Sunni Muslim seat of religious learning. Islamist groups such as al-Gama'a al-Islamiya were repressed by Mubarak during his 30 years in power. But they have moved into the heart of public life since his fall, alarming secular-minded Egyptians who worry they aim to dominate the new Egypt.

February 15, 2013: Egypt Seizes Two Tons Of Explosives Bound For Sinai'

Egypt seized two tons of explosives hidden in a truck carrying a shipment of fruits and vegetables bound for Sinai on Friday, security sources said. The country's security forces are trying to reassert control over the Sinai, which borders Israel and the Gaza Strip and has descended into lawlessness since the revolt that overthrew President Hosni Mubarak two years ago. "We found the amount in a shipment, concealed under some fruits and vegetables... We found the explosives packed inside 100 plastic bags," a security source said. In January, Egypt seized six anti -aircraft and anti-tank rockets in the Sinai peninsula that smugglers may have intended to send to the Hamas-ruled Gaza strip. The confiscated explosives were of a type used for demolishing stones in quarries. When interrogated, the truck driver said he was unaware he was transporting explosives and that a businessman had asked him to take the goods to Sinai where it would be collected.

February 15, 2013: Islamist Work'

An Egyptian opposition activist said on Friday he had been abducted by men who threatened him over his anti-Islamist activities, tied his hands and scalded his back with hot water before dumping him in a remote area. Ibrahim Hanafi had been working with the Freedom Front for Peaceful Change, collecting evidence of what he saw as "violations" by the Muslim Brotherhood, the Islamist movement that backs President Mohamed Mursi. "They blindfolded me and tied my hands behind my back ... They told me to stay away from the Muslim Brotherhood and politics and said that was a warning," Hanafi told Reuters. He said he had been abandoned with ripped clothes in a remote area outside Cairo. A Muslim Brotherhood spokesman said the group had nothing to do with the attack, or any involvement in other "indecent cases". A security source confirmed that Hanafi had been found beaten and tied up. Opposition activists say a number of campaigners have been attacked in recent months after criticizing the Islamist-led government that came in after the overthrow of Hosni Mubarak, who had repressed Islamist groups. Hanafi said he had been abducted on Thursday night. A fellow activist earlier said he had been taken four days ago, but Hanafi said he had been at home for part of that time with his phone switched off. Around 60 people have been killed since late January in unrest touched off by the second anniversary of the uprising, much of it the result of protests by those who accuse Mursi of hijacking the revolution and seeking to monopolize power. Mursi's supporters and opposition groups organized rival rallies.

February 15, 2013: Islamists Rally For Egypt's Mursi In Cairo'

Thousands of Islamists rallied in Cairo on Friday in support of Mohamed Mursi, the Muslim Brotherhood president who has been the target of protester rage in weeks of violent demonstrations. Repeating the pattern of recent weeks, Mursi's opponents rallied again on Friday, this time gathering outside El-Quba, one of the presidential palaces in the northern suburbs of Cairo. The activists dubbed it "Checkmate Friday". The protest, which drew several hundred people by afternoon descended into violence as night fell. State media reported that "troublemakers" had thrown rocks and petrol bombs. Security forces unleashed tear gas and water cannon, it said. The pro-Mursi rally was called by a hardline Salafi Islamist group, Al - Gama'a al-Islamiya, in what it described as a protest under the banner "Together Against Violence".

The group waged an armed insurrection against the state in the 1990s but its leadership renounced violence more than a decade ago. It has entered mainstream politics since autocratic president Hosni Mubarak was overthrown in 2011. The Muslim Brotherhood and its Freedom and Justice Party said it backed Friday's rally in a symbolic way but did not mobilize supporters for the event, meaning the numbers were smaller than at previous Islamist protests. Around 60 people have been killed in Egypt since late January in unrest touched off by the anniversary of the uprising against Mubarak and exacerbated by a court ruling that sentenced 21 people to death over a soccer stadium disaster a year ago. It has been the worst bloodshed since Mursi assumed office, underlining the instability that continues to thwart government efforts to restore a sense of normalcy and revive an economy in crisis by attracting fresh investment and tourism. The unrest has been stirred by anger at Mursi and his Islamist backers, who the opposition says have betrayed the revolution and sought to monopolize power - accusations dismissed by the Muslim Brotherhood. Recent protests have routinely turned violent, with government buildings, police stations and the presidential palace coming under fire from petrol bombs and rocks. Trouble also flared outside of Cairo on Friday. In al-Mahalla al-Kubra, an industrial town, protesters set fire to a local government building, state TV reported. In Alexandria, the security forces briefly fought protesters when they tried to force their way into a police station, witnesses said.

WARNING FROM CLERIC: The pro-Mursi rally in Cairo grew to several thousand after prayer. "The person who came (to power) through ballot boxes will not leave by petrol bombs," said a cleric who led the crowd in Friday prayers at the rally. "He who came to power by direct, free choice will not leave by the rocks thrown by children." "No to Violence. Yes to sharia (Islamic law)," declared a banner held aloft from the crowd. "With our blood and souls we will sacrifice ourselves for Islam!" chanted the crowd that assembled outside Cairo University. "The people want an iron fist," read another banner. Some people journeyed in from the provinces for the rally. At one point, the mother of Khaled al -Islambouli, one of the Islamists behind President Anwar Sadat's 1981 assassination, appeared on stage, drawing cheers as she waved to the throng. "Mohamad Mursi is a legitimate leader who was elected by the will of the people," said Mohamad Omar, from Mansoura north of the capital. He came on a bus chartered by al-Gama'a al-Islamiya. "The opposition's methods of violence, petrol bomb-throwing, igniting fires and causing destruction is not accepted by the Islamists," added Alaa Abdulwahab, a 45-year-old who had travelled from Minya, a four-hour journey south of Cairo. Mursi's most prominent liberal and leftist opponents have distanced themselves from the violence, saying they support only peaceful agitation. Islamist leaders and their rivals all renounced violence at crisis talks on January 31 chaired by al-Azhar, a Sunni Muslim seat of religious learning. Islamist groups such as al-Gama'a al-Islamiya were repressed by Mubarak during his 30 years in power. But they have moved into the heart of public life since his fall, alarming secular-minded Egyptians who worry they aim to dominate the new Egypt.

February 15, 2013: Egyptian Says He Was Abducted For Anti-Islamist Work'

An Egyptian opposition activist said he had been abducted by men who threatened him over his anti-Islamist activities, tied his hands and scalded his back with hot water before dumping him in a remote area. Ibrahim Hanafi had been working with the Freedom Front for Peaceful Change, collecting evidence of what he saw as "violations" by the Muslim Brotherhood, the Islamist movement that backs President Mohamed Mursi. "They blindfolded me and tied my hands behind my back ... They told me to stay away from the Muslim Brotherhood and politics and said that was a warning," Hanafi told Reuters. He said he had been abandoned with ripped clothes in a remote area outside Cairo.

A Muslim Brotherhood spokesman said the group had nothing to do with the attack, or any involvement in other "indecent cases". A security source confirmed that Hanafi had been found beaten and tied up. Opposition activists say a number of campaigners have been attacked in recent months after criticizing the Islamist-led government that came in after the overthrow of Hosni Mubarak, who had repressed Islamist groups. Hanafi said he had been abducted on Thursday night. A fellow activist earlier said he had been taken four days ago, but Hanafi said he had been at home for part of that time with his phone switched off. Around 60 people have been killed since late January in unrest touched off by the second anniversary of the uprising, much of it the result of protests by those who accuse Mursi of hijacking the revolution and seeking to monopolies power. Mursi's supporters and opposition groups organized rival rallies.

February 15, 2013: Egyptian Activist Found Beaten, Dumped Outside Cairo'

Updates: An Egyptian opposition activist was found beaten and tied up in the desert near Cairo on Friday, four days after he went missing from a protest demanding the removal of President Mohamed Mursi, a security source and a fellow campaigner said. Ibrahim Hanafi, who was rescued and treated for bruises on his back, had been working with the Freedom Front for Peaceful Change, collecting evidence of what he saw as "violations" by Islamist politicians, said the group's general coordinator Essam El Sharif. "Our colleagues in the movement and the police found him tied to a tree, naked and bound with a letter that carries threats ... against anyone who talks (negatively) about the Brotherhood," he added, referring to the Islamist Muslim Brotherhood group that propelled Mursi to power. A Muslim Brotherhood spokesman said the group had nothing to do with Hanafi's beating, or any involvement in other "indecent cases".

Opposition groups say a number of campaigners have been attacked in recent months after criticizing the Islamist-led government that came in after the revolt that ended decades of rule by strongman Hosni Mubarak. Tensions have risen in Egypt in recent weeks with frequent clashes between riot police and protesters opposed to Mursi, who the opposition accuses of hijacking the revolt and seeking to monopolies power. Around 60 people have been killed since late January in unrest touched off by the anniversary of the uprising against Mubarak. Mursi's supporters and opposition groups organized rival rallies. A security source confirmed Hanafi had been found beaten and bound, but did not say whether he had been tied to a tree or mention the letter.

February 15, 2013: Top Egypt Archaeologist Sees Hope For Future In Past'

The keeper of Egypt's archaeological treasures sees hope for the nation's future in its pharaonic past. Mohammed Ibrahim, head of the antiquities ministry, likens Egypt's turbulent emergence from autocracy to the periods of decline that afflicted the nation on the Nile between the fall and rise of its three ancient kingdoms. "We have passed through similar periods like that, even in antiquity," said Ibrahim, custodian of the pyramids, tombs and temples that bear witness to one of the world's oldest civilizations. "Every time Egypt passes through this period, it recovers very quickly, very strongly."

But for now, Ibrahim's ministry, is suffering from the repercussions of unrest that has hit the economy hard, driving away the tourism which pays his ministry's bills. Excavation work led by the ministry has ground to a halt because of the financial squeeze. The unrest has also stopped many foreign-financed digs by deterring the archaeologists. But the 59-year old Egyptologist is upbeat: foreign archaeologists are starting to come back. And while the periods of decline between the ancient kingdoms could last 200 years, he expects Egypt to bounce back much sooner this time around. "Egypt will be something new," he told Reuters in an interview at his offices in the medieval citadel that towers over the mosques of Cairo's Islamic quarter.

Head of Egyptian antiquities since late 2011, Ibrahim fills a post occupied for a decade by Zahi Hawass, who left office several months after the uprising that swept former President Hosni Mubarak from power after 30 years of autocratic rule. With a doctorate in Egyptology from France, his career includes time as director of Sakkara, an ancient necropolis south of Cairo best known for the stepped pyramid that was a forerunner of the pyramids at Giza. The job of managing Egypt's ancient antiquities is more complicated today than it was in Mubarak's era. The rise of Islamists repressed by the deposed autocrat has brought with it calls from a radical, if tiny, fringe for the destruction of pharanoic monuments on the grounds that are contrary to Islam. Ibrahim says the issue has been exaggerated out of all proportion by the Egyptian media. Investigations were only able to uncover one such fatwa, or religious edict, he said. Nevertheless, Ibrahim asked Egypt's Sunni Muslim authorities, including the prestigious al-Azhar mosque and university, to speak out. "They all said we have more than one fatwa saying that pharaonic monuments are not against Islam, or Islam is not against pharaonic monuments," Ibrahim said. "So now this case is closed."

RECOVERING STOLEN ARTEFACTS: Ibrahim has also been trying to recover artifacts stolen at the height of the uprising in 2011. The greatest losses were at the Egyptian Museum in Tahrir Square, where some 40 artifacts went missing. "We found about 15 objects, 29 artifacts are still missing," said Ibrahim. He takes pride in the fact that the museum housing King Tutankhamen’s treasures has been kept open through the spasms of turmoil since the revolt to "send a positive message". In an effort to draw back tourists, Ibrahim has reopened tombs and temples closed for years due to restoration. These include Sakkara's sprawling underground Serapeum, the catacombs where mummified sacred bulls, or Apis, were buried. The Serapeum had been closed since the late 1990s. Six tombs have also been reopened at Giza plateau, together with the Pyramid of Chephren, the second largest. He says the Grand Egyptian Museum being built near the Giza pyramids will be completed by August, 2015. In another initiative to boost visitor numbers, Ibrahim said the aviation ministry would soon open routes from Red Sea beach resorts to Luxor and Aswan. "This also might encourage them to go ... at least for a day," he said. In Luxor, home to the Valley of the Kings, Ibrahim laments hotel occupancy rates have slumped to 17 percent in the winter months that should mark the high season for cultural tourism. "Egypt is still safe and welcoming those who want to come here," said Ibrahim. "If you want to help us, the only thing we need from you is to come back."

February 16, 2013: Egypt's Political Rivals Meet Amid Tension'

Liberal and Islamist political leaders met privately on Saturday to try to ease tensions that have sparked protests in which some 60 Egyptians have died since late January, politicians said. The protests erupted after the second anniversary of the uprising which overthrew Hosni Mubarak and reflected competing visions for Egypt's future. Political turbulence has slowed negotiations for a $4.8 billion dollar loan from the International Monetary Fund. Politicians said Mohamed ElBaradei, a prominent liberal activist and leader of the National Salvation Front (NSF), met Saad el - Katatni, head of the Muslim Brotherhood's ruling Freedom and Justice Party (FJP). Another leader of the NSF, Sayed el-Badawi, also took part in the talks. Previously the NSF had boycotted the idea of talks with President Mohamed Mursi of the Muslim Brotherhood, who has been the target of protester rage in weeks of violent demonstrations.

February 16, 2013: Foreigners Arrested For Trying To Spread Christianity In Libya'

Four foreigners have been arrested in the eastern Libyan city of Benghazi on suspicion of being Christian missionaries and printing books about Christianity, a security official said on Saturday. "They were arrested at a publishing house where they were printing thousands of books that called for conversion to Christianity," security official Hussein Bin Hmeid said. "Proselytizing is forbidden in Libya. We are a 100 percent Muslim country and this kind of action affects our national security." Hmeid said the government-affiliated security apparatus called the Preventative Security, for which he is a spokesman, had arrested an Egyptian, a South African, a Korean and a Swede who was travelling on a U.S. passport. "We are still holding interrogations and will hand them over to the Libyan intelligence authorities in a couple of days," Hmeid said, without giving further details. The Preventative Security apparatus is a parallel security body created during the 2011 war that ousted Muammar Gaddafi and made up of several rebel brigades which fought in the conflict. Libya's central government has yet to impose its authority on a myriad of armed groups who have yet to lay down their arms, and with skeletal national security forces, often relies on them for security.

February 17, 2013: Egypt Pound Will Not Collapse - Presidential Aide'

The Egyptian pound will not collapse and its incremental depreciation has stabilized, a senior aide to Islamist President Mohamed Mursi said on Sunday. The Egyptian pound will not collapse and its incremental depreciation has stabilized, a senior aide to Islamist President Mohamed Mursi said on Sunday. Essam Haddad, Mursi's deputy chief of staff and foreign policy adviser, told Reuters in an interview that he did not expect the pound to fall further after it lost more than 8 percent against the dollar since the start of the year. "I think it has reached a level of stability," he said. "So as long as it (depreciation) is going incrementally and in a way that is market-sensitive, then there is no harm in this," Haddad said. More than two years of political instability following the overthrow of President Hosni Mubarak in 2011 has triggered a flight into dollars. The Egyptian pound has faced extra pressure since late last year, when violent protests against President Mohamed Mursi erupted, setting back hopes for economic recovery. Violence flared again in Egypt on Sunday, with thousands blocking access to the harbor in Port Said to demand justice over the deaths of dozens of people in riots last month. That violence was triggered by anger over the death sentences handed down to 21 people from Port Said for their involvement in a soccer stadium disaster in the city a year ago. Presidential adviser Haddad said of the Egyptian currency: ""What we have to be very careful of is to (avoid) a drastic change, or a complete fall or collapse. And this is something we are not seeing in the foreseeable future and we hope that it will recover."

BLACK MARKET: A black market in hard currency has sprung up in recent weeks due to a shortage of dollars, with street traders "weighing the pound at more than 7 to the dollar compared to an official rate of 6.73. Regulated foreign exchange bureaus are swamped by demand for dollars and cannot meet the demand, the head of the foreign exchange department at the Chambers of Commerce said. A senior business leader affiliated with the ruling Muslim Brotherhood, Hassan Malek, told Reuters in an interview that people expected further devaluation of the pound. "I'm not, of course, a technical (expert) but people expect a little bit of devaluation in the future," he said when asked whether he expected a further depreciation of the currency to help exports and tourism. He said the economy was going through a very difficult period because the transition to democracy launched by the 2011 uprising that toppled former President Hosni Mubarak was not yet complete and institutions were not working fully. Asked about such concerns, Haddad said: "When the situation starts to stabilize more on the political side, I believe the Egyptian pound will be even stronger." There had been calls from the business community to change the exchange rate to boost the economy by improving exports and making Egypt more attractive for foreign investors, and those changes had now occurred, he said.

"Market forces will act on this and decide what is the best value for the Egyptian pound," Haddad added. Egypt's central bank governor said late on Sunday he had no fears of dollarization and added the bank had reduced the amounts offered at its U.S. dollar auctions in order to set aside hard currency for imports of crucial goods. Foreign investors are eyeing Egyptian households' dollar holdings as a critical gauge of trust in the authorities. Investors are watching closely for evidence of a significant rise in ordinary Egyptians' dollar holdings. "I am not worried about dollarization," Hisham Ramez said in an interview with CBC channel late on Sunday. "Household dollarization is at far lower rates than those that would scare one," he said. In an attempt to control the rate of the pound's decline, Egypt's central bank introduced regular dollar auctions in December. Having initially offered sums of $75 million per auction, the bank has reduced the amounts sold. Last week it offered $40 million at each of its dollar sales. Reserves have fallen to $13.6 billion, less than the $15 billion needed to cover three months worth of imports. "Of course it's not something good, not something comfortable," Ramez said, adding he had taken steps to counter this such as prioritizing certain imports including foodstuffs, production machines and their spare parts, and fertilizers. He said speeding up measures to secure a $4.8 billion IMF loan Egypt has requested would help the reserves recover. "A lot of investors are waiting for this," said Ramez.

February 17, 2013: Egypt President's Son Drops Government Job After Furore'

One of Egyptian President Mohamed Mursi's sons withdrew from taking up a job with a firm affiliated to the civil aviation ministry on Sunday amid media accusations of nepotism.

The decision by Omar Mursi to forgo a human resources post at the Holding Company for Airports and Air Navigation showed the role of independent media in holding leaders to account in the new Egypt, following the uprising that toppled President Hosni Mubarak in 2011. Hosni Mubarak was widely believed to have been grooming his own son, Gamal, a businessman, to succeed him. Gamal and his brother Alaa are in jail awaiting trial on charges of corruption and illegal land dealings.

Sources at the ministry said the monthly salary for Omar Mursi's position would not have exceeded 900 Egyptian pounds ($130) but activists said it was unfair for the president's son, who graduated last year, to be given a government post when millions of citizens have been jobless for years. Activists threatened on Sunday to protest outside the civil aviation ministry if the president's son took up his post. On his Facebook page, Omar Mursi wrote: "I took a test for the position knowing I would be attacked and rumors and lies would be spread about me ... Yet I chose not to complete the paperwork to take up this position. "The question remains 'How can I find a job in my dear country Egypt?' he said.

February 17, 2013: Alcohol Sale To Be Banned In Egypt's New Suburbs'

Two years after the Egyptian revolution that ousted an authoritarian regime, liberals are increasingly concerned that the ruling Islamists are out to curb personal freedoms and build a society in their own image. Alcohol, prohibited by most Islamic scholars, is one area where the new authorities are introducing controversial change. Nabil Abbas, the vice president of the New Urban Communities Authorities (NUCA), told Reuters on Sunday that the government would no longer issue licenses for the sale of alcohol in new residential settlements on the outskirts of Cairo, Alexandria and other big cities. "NUCA has stopped renewing licenses to sell alcohol but the current ones will continue until they expire," Abbas said. "Representatives of the residents in new suburbs complained that the sale of alcohol leads to problems including attacking women and randomly ringing doorbells of people's homes." Egyptians opposed to the country's Islamist leaders condemned the move as an infringement on personal freedoms.

Dina Fahmy, a 30-year-old interior designer, said she did not believe that safety was the reason behind the government's decision. "First this Islamist government will ban alcohol in the new urban communities, then slowly they will try to start banning it elsewhere and then God knows what's next," Fahmy said. "I don't believe this move is driven by safety reasons but rather by the leaders' attempt to impose their Islamist vision. "This move is going to negatively affect tourism and annoy many Egyptians as it signals the start of an assault on their personal freedoms and choices." Islamist President Mohamed Mursi's government increased taxes on alcoholic beverages in December but backed down after the move was criticized. Earlier this month, an Egyptian court ordered the suspension of online video service YouTube for a month for broadcasting a film insulting the Prophet

Mohammad. A satirical poster circulated online on Sunday in response to the alcohol curb. It listed some of Egypt's main problems including road accidents, police brutality and poverty then showed a cartoon of Mursi dressed as Superman and saying "Must save Egypt from porn, alcohol and YouTube".

WORRIES IN TOURISM INDUSTRY: Though most mainstream Islamic scholars agree that Islam forbids alcohol outright, some have voiced different views. These include Saad El-Din Helaly, a professor of jurisprudence at Al-Azhar University and a member of the Supreme Council of Islamic Affairs, who was among the contenders this month for the post of Grand Mufti, which carries wide influence over legislation and social affairs. On a popular television show last year, Helaly argued that only grape-based alcoholic beverages are forbidden as well as inebriation, but not drinking other kinds of alcohol in moderation. Karim Mohsen, managing director of tourism firm Sylvia Tours and board member of the Egyptian Travel Agents Association, said any moves to ban alcohol in hotels and restaurants could hurt Egypt's ailing tourism industry, hard hit by political turmoil. "The fear where tourism is concerned is not of banning alcohol stores. The fear is that alcohol would be banned from hotels which would impact foreign tourists, and in restaurants it could also impact Arab tourists," Mohsen said. "But the current move could also give a negative message to both final clients and decision-makers in tourism," he added.

February 17, 2013: Dollars Start Running Out For Egypt's Currency Bureaus'

Egypt's currency bureaus are being overwhelmed by demand for dollars amid a supply shortage fuelled by political crisis, the head of the foreign exchange department at the Chambers of Commerce said. Mohamed el - Abyad said foreign exchange offices can only supply 20 percent of the dollars for which they receive orders. "With the dollar shortage there is a semi-halting of our operations," he told Reuters in an interview. More than two years of political instability following the overthrow of President Hosni Mubarak in 2011 has triggered a flight into dollars and disrupted foreign investments. That has caused a devaluation of the local pound, which has dropped over 8 percent against the dollar in the past two months, and drained the country's foreign reserves. The currency crisis has also driven some dealers into the streets in search of people with dollars to sell, spawning a new black market. In an attempt to control the rate of the pound's decline, Egypt's central bank introduced a regular dollar auctions in December. Since then it has cut the amount of dollars it offers, to $40 million in its latest auction last week from an initial $75 million.

Abyad said the central bank's decrease in the amount of dollars offered is "due to the decline in their supply of dollars and not because the market does not need it." Egypt's foreign reserves fell to $13.6 billion at the end of January - below the key $15 billion level needed to cover three months of imports. They stood at $36 billion on the eve of the uprising against Mubarak. "The outflow of foreign investment and the flight of capital in fear of the situation in the country is what created the dollar crisis," Abyad added. Egypt is negotiating a $4.8 billion International Monetary Fund loan but talks have stalled pending a revision of the country's economic reform program. Prime Minister Hisham Kandil said last week the government had finished revising its program, and hoped the IMF team would return this month to resume loan talks. The chief IMF spokesman said he was unaware of the Fund receiving the revised program. "(...There are no) clear or specific outlines of where we are going with the Egyptian economy," Abyad said.

February 17, 2013: Egypt Protesters Block Access To Port, Demand Justice'

Thousands of Egyptian protesters blocked access to the harbor and rallied outside state buildings in Port Said on Sunday to demand justice over the deaths of dozens of people killed in riots last month. That violence was triggered by anger over the death sentences handed down to 21 people from Port Said for their involvement in a soccer stadium disaster in the city a year ago in which more than 70 people were killed. Sunday's day of "civil disobedience" was called by hardcore soccer fans from Port Said's al - Masry, the club that had been playing a home match against Cairo's Al Ahly when the stadium disaster occurred in February 2012. Witnesses said around 3,000 people took part in the protest, demanding the death sentence for those responsible for the January 26 violence set off by a verdict read out in Cairo. "With our lives, with our blood, we will sacrifice ourselves to you martyrs: Either we avenge you or we die like you!" they chanted. "The disobedience will last for one day and could continue if the protesters' calls for the death sentence for the killers of martyrs are not granted," said Ahmad Mutwalli, a political activist in Port Said. The protesters also disrupted train services. But General Ahmed Najeeb, head of the General Authority of Port Said, said the protest had not affected shipping activity at the Mediterranean port. Port Said was one of three provinces near the Suez Canal where President Mohamed Mursi declared a 30-day state of emergency in response to last month's unrest.

February 17, 2013: Rise Of Islamists Frays Strategic UAE-Egyptian Relations'

Days before his overthrow, Egyptian President Hosni Mubarak received a senior visitor from the United Arab Emirates (UAE), one of several Gulf monarchies long supportive of the most Arab populous country and its veteran strongman. What transpired between Mubarak and Foreign Minister Sheikh Abdullah bin Zayed al-Nahayan is not known, beyond the fact that a letter from UAE ruler Sheikh Khalifa bin Zayed al -Nahayan was delivered. But the significance of the Feb. 8, 2011 visit was clear: It was a gesture of understanding and concern for a longtime friend who had been a trusted diplomatic ally for most Gulf Arabs, not least in their confrontation with non-Arab Iran. Fast forward to 2013 and the picture is starkly different. The UAE-Egyptian relationship has been strained by the regional spread of Islamist influence - Egypt now has an elected Islamist president - with implications not only for the two protagonists but all Arab states hit by the uprisings against dictators and dynasties that began two years ago. Poorer, densely populated Arab states like Egypt often look to Gulf states for investment and financing, as well as overseas work for their nationals, a need ever more acute with rulers under unprecedented pressure to produce jobs and services. The UAE, home to around 380,000 Egyptian expatriates and a major investor in Egypt, pledged $3 billion of aid to Cairo in 2011. But the funds have not yet been transferred, an Egyptian source familiar with the matter told Reuters, mainly due to the political instability in post-revolution Egypt. A break in relations between the Arab political heavyweight and the Gulf financial powerhouse would be unthinkable. But the unfamiliar chill in their dealings reflects an increasingly complicated relationship between these two groups of countries. Gulf states historically have sent aid and investment to less moneyed fellow Arabs, and in return have received diplomatic support and sometimes military protection. The UAE-Egypt spat "does have a huge bearing on the success of the Arab transitions", said Jane Kinninmont of the British think tank Chatham House.

HUGE ECONOMIC NEEDS: "Here you have a number of countries which are going through transitions but which have huge economic needs. The obvious place for them to look is the wealthy Gulf Arab countries." Arab countries received 62 percent of all Gulf aid from 1970 to 2008, according to a study by researchers Bessma Momani and Crystal Ennis in the Cambridge Review of International Affairs. For its part, the UAE needs to tread a careful line, analysts say. Aggravating Egypt's Muslim Brotherhood could also affect UAE relations with other countries, like Syria, where Islamists are playing a major role in the revolt against President Bashar al-Assad. And irking Egypt's new rulers could also push Cairo closer to Shi'ite Iran, arch-adversary of the Gulf Arabs. Gulf Sunni Muslim rulers fear that, despite being a Sunni group itself, the Brotherhood is soft on Iran, unlike Mubarak. "The Emirates recognize that Egypt's centrality in Arab affairs is an important counter to Iran," said Frederic Wehrey, Middle East program senior associate at Carnegie Endowment for International Peace think-tank. Gulf Arab states need a prosperous Egypt for a host of reasons, not least to protect their own investments. But history shows that financial help from the region sometimes reflects shifts in the diplomatic climate - even if governments insist their assistance is not political.

For example Jordan's ties with Gulf were hurt in 1990 when it refused to join an alliance against Iraq after it invaded Kuwait. Many Palestinians and Jordanians lost jobs in the Gulf where they enjoyed welfare state benefits as expatriate workers. There are implications, too, for Gulf Arab states. Most saw Mubarak's fall as the result of a U.S. decision to cast adrift an erstwhile ally and common adversary of Iran, rather than as an acceptance of an unstoppable revolution. Crucially, Gulf Arab rulers alarmed by Mubarak's ouster were further disconcerted by the subsequent ascent to power of the Muslim Brotherhood, Mubarak's sworn foe and a group once cited in a U.S. diplomatic cable as the UAE's "mortal enemy". If Washington was ready to deal with the Muslim Brotherhood in Cairo, could it do the same in the Gulf, if a new democratic dispensation swept away the region's tradition of princely rule?

ANXIETY: There is no shortage of evidence of UAE worries about the reach of Islamists. On Jan. 27 the UAE announced 94 of its citizens would go on trial on charges of seeking to seize power, accusing them of being in communication with the Brotherhood. Many are believed to be members of al-Islah, an Islamist group suspected of links to the Brotherhood, a movement founded in Egypt in 1928 and which is banned in the Gulf Arab state. Islah says it has no connection to the global Brotherhood. Some analysts say the arrests are meant to send a message that Islamist activities will not be tolerated, rather than reflecting a belief they pose a significant security threat. "The UAE has a rule: zero tolerance for political organizations of any sort whether Islamists or non-Islamists, and these guys (Emiratis and Egyptians) broke the law. Pure and simple," UAE political scientist Abdelkhaleq Abdullah said. But the UAE has continued to strike a firm tone in public. In October, Sheikh Abdullah, the foreign minister, said: "The Muslim Brotherhood does not believe in the nation state. It does not believe in the sovereignty of the state." An Emirati source close to the government said the minister's comments were directed at the Brotherhood, not Egypt, and the UAE saw the bilateral relationship as a strategic one.

On January 1, a local newspaper reported that the UAE had also arrested 11 Egyptians on suspicion of training Islamists in how to overthrow governments. The Brotherhood replied by saying the 11 were wrongfully arrested. Local media in the UAE said the Gulf Arab states had rejected a subsequent request by Cairo to free the detainees. For its part, the Brotherhood has sought to reassure Gulf Arabs it has no plan to push for political change beyond Egypt's borders. Egyptian President Mohamed Mursi has said there is no plan to "export the revolution" - comments welcomed by the UAE. Both Egypt and the UAE publicly assert that they have a special relationship. After all, Sheikh Abdullah had a meeting with Mursi, whose roots are in the Brotherhood, in Egypt in September 2012 and delivered an invitation for him to visit the UAE. A response is awaited.

PERIODS OF STRAIN: And yet the discordant tone will stir questions over Gulf Arab willingness to make good on promises of support to Egypt, which desperately needs funds to avert financial crisis. While Gulf Arabs have pledged large sums to Egypt, helping stabilize its currency, they are motivated by their own interests, Richard LeBaron, a former U.S. ambassador to Kuwait, wrote in a study for the Atlantic Council think-tank. He said most Gulf Arab states, wary of the Brotherhood, had adopted a "wait and see" attitude toward new leaders in Egypt and Tunisia before committing significant additional funds and seemed not to sense any urgency in making such decisions. Carnegie Endowment's Wehrey wrote that while UAE-Egypt ties could face more turbulence, matters could be resolved due to shared interests including a need to counter Iranian influence and the Brotherhood's need for Gulf investment. "A key first step is for both sides to avoid strident and provocative statements that fuel the rancor that currently afflicts the relationship," he said.

February 17, 2013: Egypt Chief Of Staff Says Army Will Avoid Politics'

Egypt's armed forces, for decades at the center of power, will avoid involvement in politics but could have a role if things became "complicated", the chief of staff said. It also expects rival political groups to solve disputes by dialogue, Major General Sedki Sobhi told Reuters The military ran Egypt for six decades from the end of the colonial era and through an interim period after the overthrow of former air force chief and president Hosni Mubarak two years ago. About 60 people have been killed since late January in protests that erupted after the second anniversary of the uprising. Speaking to Reuters at an industry event in Abu Dhabi, said that in a week or 15 days some kind of national dialogue would take shape between the ruling Muslim Brotherhood and opposition groups. The army would not back any political party, he said. "We are not political, we don't want to participate in the political situation because we suffered a lot because of this in the last six months," he said. "But sometimes we can help in this problem, we can play this role if the situation became more complicated," he said without elaborating. Diplomats and analysts suggest the army, fearful of further damaging a reputation that took a beating during a messy transition period when it was in charge, would only act if Egypt faced unrest on the scale of the revolt that toppled Mubarak. Protests and violence now are nowhere near that stage. Sobhi's remarks were less categorical than those of General Abdel Fattah al-Sisi, the army chief, who said on January 29 that unrest was pushing the state to the brink of collapse and the army would remain the "solid and cohesive block" on which the state rests. In recent months, opposition groups have criticized Islamist President Mohammed Mursi's perceived drift towards authoritarianism, which they say fuelled this year's unrest. The instability has provoked unease in Western capitals, where officials worry about the direction of a powerful regional player that has a peace deal with Israel. Asked about security in Egypt, Sobhi downplayed violence during protests earlier this month. "We cannot say it is a very serious or very dangerous," he said. Liberal and Islamist political leaders met privately on Saturday to try to ease the latest tensions. Politicians said Mohamed ElBaradei, a prominent liberal activist and leader of the National Salvation Front (NSF), met Saad el-Katatni, head of the Muslim Brotherhood's ruling Freedom and Justice Party (FJP). Another leader of the NSF, Sayed el-Badawi, also took part in the talks. Previously the NSF had boycotted the idea of talks with President Mursi of the Brotherhood, who has been the target of protester rage in weeks of violent demonstrations.

February 18, 2013: As Vote Nears, Tensions Flare Among Egypt Islamists'

President Mohamed Mursi's decision to fire a hardline Islamist as an adviser has laid bare rivalries between Egypt's two biggest Islamist groups as parliamentary elections approach. The sacking of Khaled Alameddin of the Salafi Nour Party on Sunday has led his movement to step up criticism of the Muslim Brotherhood that propelled Mursi to power, narrowing the already slim chances of the two movements working together in the election. Alameddin broke down in tears during a news conference on Monday, saying he had been accused of abusing power. The presidency has yet to issue a statement on why Alameddin was dismissed. "I formally demand an apology from the president. I won't accept an apology less than that," Alameddin said. Another of Mursi's advisers from the Nour Party, Bassam El-Zarka, announced his resignation at the news conference, apparently in solidarity with Alameddin. The Nour Party, which emerged from the ultra-conservative religious movement Daawa Salafiya, came second to the Muslim Brotherhood in Egypt's last parliamentary elections, the results of which were overturned by a court ruling last June. New elections are due to begin in April or May. Since the last legislative vote, the two movements have both cooperated and clashed. Nour backed a Brotherhood rival, Abdel Moneim Abol Fotouh, in the first round of the presidential election. But it swung behind Mursi in the second-round run-off against Ahmed Shafik, Mubarak's last prime minister. Mursi employed several Nour Party members as advisers. The groups cooperated to drive through an Islamist-tinged constitution approved in a December referendum, deepening a national divide between Islamists and their opponents.

WIDENING DIFFERENCES: But in recent weeks the Nour Party has sought to distance itself from the Brotherhood, whose popularity has been dented by a deepening economic crisis and a stand-off with political rivals who say it wants to monopolies the institutions of state. The Nour Party did not take part in a pro-Mursi rally called last Friday by another hardline Islamist party. "The Brotherhood has become more radioactive from the Nour Party's standpoint now," said Shadi Hamid, director of research at the Brookings Doha Center. "They (Nour) want to present themselves as the pure Islamic alternative." Nour has sought to defuse tension between Mursi's presidency and Egypt's liberal and leftist opposition, an apparent attempt to burnish its image as a responsible, mature political player. The Brotherhood's Freedom and Justice Party (FJP) has poured cold water on the initiative. The FJP, which won about 40 percent of seats in the last elections, said last week it aimed to secure an outright majority in the next parliament. Nour Party spokesman Nader Bakkar said Alameddin had been dismissed without proper investigation, and took a stab at Mursi over accusations that his family had recently benefited from connections by securing state employment for one of his sons. A media furor over the appointment of Omar Mursi at a firm affiliated to the civil aviation ministry forced him to forgo the job on Sunday. Hamid at the Brookings Doha Center said there was no "natural affinity" between the two Islamist groups. "There has always been a tense relationship," he said.

February 18, 2013: Egypt Flooded Tunnels To Cut Gaza Arms Flow -aide'

Egypt will not tolerate a two-way flow of smuggled arms with the Gaza Strip that is destabilizing its Sinai peninsula, a senior aide to its Islamist president said, explaining why Egyptian forces flooded sub-border tunnels last week. The network of tunnels has been a lifeline for some 1.7 million Palestinians in Gaza, bringing in an estimated 30 percent of all goods that reach the enclave and circumventing a blockade imposed by Israel for more than seven years. But Essam Haddad, national security adviser to President Mohamed Mursi told Reuters in an interview: "We don't want to see these tunnels used for illegal ways of smuggling either people or weapons that can really harm Egyptian security." He said that under a deal brokered by Cairo to end fighting in November between Israel and the Hamas movement that rules the Gaza Strip, the Israeli stranglehold on the coastal territory had been considerably relaxed. Egypt has eased border controls to allow in construction materials, notably from Qatar.

"Now we can say that the borders are open to a good extent - it could still be improved - and the needs of the Gazan people are allowed in. Building materials are allowed in for the first time," Haddad said. "And on the other side, we would not like to see arms smuggled through these tunnels either in or out, because we are now seeing in Sinai and we have captured actually across Egypt heavy arms that could be used in a very dangerous way." Sixteen Egyptian border guards were killed last August in a militant attack in Sinai near the Gaza fence that shocked Egyptians and highlighted lawlessness in the desert region adjoining Israel and the Gaza Strip. Cairo said some of those gunmen had crossed into Egypt via the Gaza tunnels - an accusation denied by the Palestinians. Dozens of tunnels have been destroyed since that incident. Egypt said it had seized two tons of explosives hidden in a truck carrying a shipment of fruit and vegetables bound for Sinai. In January, Egypt seized six anti-aircraft and anti-tank rockets in the peninsula that smugglers may have intended to send to Gaza.

WEAPONS SMUGGLING INCREASED: Despite the flooding of the tunnels, which sparked bitter complaints from Palestinians, Haddad said relations with Hamas, ideologically close to the Muslim Brotherhood movement now ruling in Cairo, were good. Egypt has been trying, so far without success, to coax Hamas and the Fatah nationalist movement that runs the Palestinian Authority which controls the West Bank to agree on a national unity government and elections. But Haddad made clear that President Mohamed Mursi would scrupulously respect Egypt's 1979 peace treaty with Israel, and that daily cooperation with the Jewish state continued as normal, even though there were no contacts at a presidential level.

An Israeli security delegation visited Cairo for talks last week and two Israeli warships passed through the Suez Canal, one flying the Star of David flag for the first time in years. Asked whether he saw a threat to Egyptian security from al Qaeda Islamist militants, Haddad said a structured al Qaeda network with its connections and operations did not exist in Egypt. But its extremist ideology knew no borders. "Everybody has noticed that since the collapse of (former Libyan leader Muammar) Gaddafi's army, the amount of weapons smuggling across the whole region has really increased dramatically," he said. "This is something that is really alarming because you don't know who will be getting these arms. And when you see there are anti-aircraft missiles inside Egypt and anti-tank weapons inside Egypt ... you will question who is doing this and why. "That is why we want to strengthen our western border," Haddad said, adding that this was the government's top security priority now. Egyptian security authorities are still investigating whether a militant cell arrested in Cairo this month had links to an al Qaeda network.

February 18, 2013: Masked Men Fire On Egyptian Lawmaker's Car In Theft Attempt'

Masked men opened fire on an Egyptian lawmaker's vehicle in an attempted carjacking, a security source and state media said on Monday, days after a similar attack on the central bank governor's car. Many Egyptians complain of a breakdown in security in the two years since a popular uprising ended former President Hosni Mubarak's decades -long rule, and of a spike in crimes such as robbery and sexual assault. Four unidentified men shot at the car of Osama Fekry, a member of the hardline Islamist Nour Party, state news agency MENA reported. A security source told Reuters the attack happened as Fekry was driving from Cairo to his hometown in the Nile Delta. Three bullets hit the car, a BMW, but Fekry was not wounded, the source added. A Nour Party official said he could not immediately comment on the attack which happened late on Sunday. Islamist President Mohamed Mursi has struggled to restore security since he was elected in June. About 60 people were killed in a wave of violent street protests between Jan. 25, the second anniversary of the uprising's start, and Feb. 4. Armed men attacked the car of Egypt's central bank governor, killing a guard, wounding the driver and stealing the vehicle. The governor, Hisham Ramez, was not in the car at the time.

February 18, 2013: Egypt's Constitutional Court Rejects Election Law, May Delay Poll'

Egypt's constitutional court rejected five articles of a draft election law on Monday and sent the text back to the country's temporary legislature for redrafting in a ruling that may delay a parliamentary poll due in April.
"The court has returned the draft parliamentary electoral law to the Shura Council after making five observations on five articles which it found unconstitutional," a statement said. The court said the election law was technically flawed and contradicted articles in the new constitution which the Shura council members themselves had drawn up. The five articles the court highlighted involved limits on lawmakers' political affiliations, the ability of lawmakers to change their status from professionals to peasants, provisions for Egyptians to vote abroad and the division of constituencies. The statement said the technical problems pertained to "the wording of the law" and "contradictions within the law". "The report by the constitutional court on the electoral law reveals the level of professional weakness of the Shura council and the haste in which the new constitution was drawn up," said politician and former member of parliament Mostafa Naggar. The liberal Wafd Party said "the Muslim Brotherhood has violated the constitution it drew up" and the Social Democratic Party hailed the constitutional court's statement.

A source in President Mohamed Mursi's office said before the decision that if the court found fault with the law, it could delay its passage, and hence the election, by a couple of weeks, but probably not months. Mursi had been expected to promulgate the electoral law by Feb. 25 and set a date two months later for voting, probably in more than one stage for different regions because of a shortage of judicial poll supervisors. The constitutional court, made up partly of judges from ousted former President Hosni Mubarak's era, has intervened repeatedly in the transition, dissolving the Islamist-dominated parliament elected after the 2011 pro-democracy uprising. Its composition was changed by the new constitution passed by a referendum in December. The Freedom and Justice Party said it respected the court's decision, saying in a statement that prior scrutiny of the law was a guarantee of "the stability of the legislative institutions, and spared the country the negative affects of the dissolution of representative councils". Mursi was criticized in October for issuing a decree giving himself powers to override the judiciary. He backed down and dropped the decree weeks later following widespread protests.

February 19, 2013: Egypt Announces Big Fuel Price Rises For Some Industries'

Egypt's government announced new fuel prices for many sectors of the economy on Tuesday which industry sources said were 50 percent higher than previous levels, triggering protests by factory owners affected by the increase. Several hundred people employed in the brick manufacturing industry - one of the sectors affected - blocked roads in Cairo and Minya, south of the capital, to protest at the price rises, a security source said.

With the economy in crisis, the Egyptian government is under pressure to rein in a deficit enlarged by energy subsidies that account for a fifth of the budget. The government must curb the subsidies to secure a vital $4.8 billion International Monetary Fund loan, economists say. In the official gazette the government said the price of fuel oil, which is widely used in energy-intensive local industries, would be 1,500 Egyptian pounds ($220) per ton. This would apply for all industries other than bakeries, electricity producers and food manufacturers to be named by the ministry of industry. Government's announcement gave no comparative figure or say when the new prices would come into effect, but industry sources said they had been raised from 1,000 pounds previously.

Prices of locally-produced natural gas, fuel oil and diesel for manufacturers of cement and bricks were also raised by 50 percent, the industry sources said. As part of moves to cut subsidy spending, the government plans to start rationing subsidized gasoline through a system of smart cards at the beginning of July, the minister of petroleum said on Monday. The final ratification of the IMF loan was postponed in December at Egypt's behest because of political unrest. Since then, the country's reserves of foreign exchange have fallen to $13.6 billion, below the $15 billion level required to cover three months' worth of imports, and the currency has fallen by 8 percent against the U.S. dollar to a record low. ($1 = 6.7316 Egyptian pounds)

February 19, 2013: Protests Paralyze Factories In Suez Canal City'

Thousands of Egyptian workers joined a protest wave in Port Said on Tuesday, paralyzing factory production in the Suez Canal city despite President Mohamed Mursi's efforts to soothe unrest by acting to restore its free port status. Witnesses said at least 10,000 people took part in the third day of demonstrations to demand justice for dozens of people killed during rioting in the Mediterranean port last month. The head of the Suez Canal Authority said movements on the canal - an artery for global shipping and one of Egypt's biggest foreign currency earners - were unaffected by the protests in Port Said, which lies at the waterway's northern entrance. Port Said was one of three provinces near the canal where Mursi declared a 30-day state of emergency after last month's unrest, which was linked to soccer violence but reflected wider economic discontent with the Islamist government in Cairo.

"The regime is provoking the people of Port Said and not tending to their demands. We will not retreat from civil disobedience and will continue to escalate matters day after day," said Amani El Elaidy, one of the protesters. Unrest flared in Port Said after death sentences were given to 21 fans of its al-Masry soccer club for involvement in a stadium disaster a year ago when more than 70 people died.

Day of "civil disobedience", called by hardcore al -Masry supporters, had a much greater impact on the local economy than the previous two days. Factory production was halted in the city's investment zone and schools were empty, with many teachers and students joining the protests. The protesters called for the appointment of a neutral judge to investigate the deaths of around 40 people in Port Said last month. They also demanded the removal of Port Said's governor and Egypt's interior minister. On the evening Mursi presented a draft law to the Shura Council - Egypt's temporary legislature - to reinstate Port Said's free trade zone and allot 400 million Egyptian pounds ($60 million) annually from the Suez Canal's revenues to develop cities along the waterway. The Council agreed to this, state television said on Tuesday, but the move fell short of the city's demands. "Port Said's streets are boiling because of President Mohamed Mursi's neglect ... Mursi does not consider Port Said to be on Egypt's map," said another protestor, Mohamed Said.

Egypt set up the duty-free trade zone in the 1970s. However, former president Hosni Mubarak - toppled by an uprising two years ago - decided to phase out its privileges more than a decade ago, damaging the local economy. Al-Masry fans also prevented thousands of workers commuting from neighboring cities including Ismailia and Sharkia from getting to factories in the Port Said investment zone.

February 19, 2013: Egypt Files New Charges Against Hosni Mubarak's Last Premier'

Egypt's public prosecutor has filed new criminal charges against the last prime minister of ousted President Hosni Mubarak over alleged illegal real estate sales, judicial sources said on Tuesday. The charges against Ahmed Shafik, who was also the defeated run-off candidate in Egypt's first free presidential election last year, relate to deals struck in 2005. Shafik, who fled to the United Arab Emirates after losing to Islamist President Mohamed Mursi, was appointed prime minister shortly before Mubarak was overthrown two years ago. The new charges against Shafik include illegally selling and profiting from the sale of villas belonging to the Airforce Officers' Association, as well as money laundering, the sources said.

The prosecutor also referred charges against Shafik's three daughters to a criminal court in Cairo as the heirs of their mother, Shafik's late wife. Dozens of legal cases have been opened against Mubarak's associates since he stood down on February 11, 2011 during mass protests. The prosecutors earlier filed charges against Shafik in September last year. The court has yet to set a date for his trial but the prosecutor has asked a judge to call on the UAE authorities to return Shafik to Egypt. Egypt's MENA state news agency reported on Tuesday that 10 other members of the Airforce Officers' Association had also been referred to the court for alleged involvement in embezzlement. Last year a judge ordered that Shafik be detained on his return to Egypt to face accusations of illegally allocating 40,000 square meters of land to Mubarak's two sons Alaa and Gamal.

February 19, 2013: Egypt In Political Clinch As Economic Cliff Looms'

Analysis: Two years after a pro-democracy uprising, Egypt resembles a rickety bus rolling towards a cliff, its passengers too busy feuding over blame to wrench the steering wheel to safety. Foreign exchange reserves are dwindling. Tourism is moribund. Investment is at a standstill. Subsidized diesel fuel and fertilizer are in short supply, while the cost of subsidies is swelling the budget deficit unsustainably. The Egyptian pound has lost 14 percent of its value since the 2011 revolt. Dollars are scarce. An IMF loan that could unlock wider aid is on hold. Unemployment is rising. Public security has deteriorated, and arms smuggling is rife.

With little regard for the looming economic cliff, politicians in the most populous Arab nation are trading blows over an Islamist -tilted constitution, political violence and an alleged power grab by the Muslim Brotherhood. To President Mohamed Mursi and his supporters in the Freedom and Justice Party, the Brotherhood's political arm, this is just a tough home stretch in Egypt's delayed transition to democracy. With the strongest national machine, they confidently expect to win parliamentary elections in April or May, completing their conquest of the new democratic institutions, then set about reforming the country along conservative Islamic lines. "We are going through a bottleneck," said Essam Haddad, the president's national security adviser. "We'd like to get through this bottleneck as quickly as possible, and without cracking the bottle." Cash injections from Qatar, the Brotherhood's main foreign backer, are holding the country's head just above water, and Haddad says a big informal economy will keep Egypt going.

IMF LOAN UNSURE: Others are less sure. U.S. ambassador Anne Patterson warned this month that the dearth of foreign currency could cause food and fuel shortages and put social stability at risk in a country where two - fifths of the population lives on less than $2 a day. Contacts with the International Monetary Fund continue by telephone and email, but there is no sign of an IMF mission returning to Egypt to conclude a $4.8 billion loan agreement vital to stabilize the economy. The IMF demanded in December that Egypt amend its economic adjustment program to qualify for the loan. Diplomats say an IMF deal could unlock up to $12 billion in funding from a range of sources including the World Bank, the European Union, the United States and Gulf Arab countries. Haddad made clear the government would not risk implementing before polling day the unpopular subsidy cuts and austerity measures required by the global lender. "It is very well known by the IMF that nobody would do such an action just before the elections," he said. "However, our message is very clear. Thes e reforms are essential for the economic recovery. There is no other choice."

Some liberal opposition leaders, who have failed to pressure Mursi into amending disputed articles in the constitution or replacing a weak cabinet led by pale Prime Minister Hisham Kandil with a national unity government, are now offering a pact on a platform of economic priorities. Hassan Malek, the Muslim Brotherhood's top business leader, played down that idea, saying opposition politicians Mohamed ElBaradei, a former U.N. nuclear agency chief, and Amr Moussa, a former head of the Arab League, were only speaking for themselves and could not deliver their National Salvation Front. The leftist Popular Current party of Nasserite firebrand Hamdeed Sabahi, a key member of the NSF, and hard-line Islamist Salafi parties have distanced themselves from the IMF program. Malek said in an interview the economy was going through a sticky patch because the transition to democracy launched by the 2011 revolt that toppled former President Hosni Mubarak was not yet complete and institutions were not working fully. "The Egyptian economy is not going to collapse," he said. Malek is trying to lure home Egyptian billionaires and Mubarak-era economic reformers, some of whom had their assets seized or were convicted in absentia after the uprising.

"BROTHERHOODISATION" DENIED: The opposition intelligentsia in Cairo and young street activists who spearheaded the anti-Mubarak uprising and feel their revolution has been confiscated, denounce what they call a growing "Brotherhoodization" - a drive to infiltrate and control all institutions. In one example, veteran al-Ahram journalist Hani Shukrallah, a respected commentator, blamed Brotherhood pressure on the government-owned media group for his enforced retirement. The paper's new management denied political motives. Yet there is little sign of any monopolization of state power or civil society so far. It looks more like the kind of rotation of elites that occurred in Turkey when the mildly Islamist AK party won election a decade ago. The armed forces and to some extent the Interior Ministry and security services remain autonomous power centers that appear to have reached a modus vivendi with Mursi based on mutual non-interference rather than being under his thumb.

A vibrant independent media forced the president's son this week to forgo a job with a state-affiliated company by raising accusations of nepotism. Shrill late-night television talk-shows offer a wide range of trenchant opinion. The judiciary is still full of Mubarak-era holdovers who show little inclination to do the Brotherhood's bidding. Neither the government nor opposition parties control the young street. And a clumsy effort to gain more sway over the religious authorities failed last week when senior Muslim scholars picked an apolitical Islamic lawyer as Egypt's top cleric in preference to the Brotherhood's preferred candidate. Haddad said any talk of Brotherhoodization was "black propaganda trying to exclude a whole sector of society". He noted that Brotherhood members had been excluded from many state institutions and the armed forces under Mubarak.

Ziad Bahaa el-Din, a former investment authority chief who is now vice-president of the opposition Social Democratic party, says the Brotherhood, like past Egyptian rulers, is trying to secure its grip on power before tackling the country's problems. "This has happened ever since (Ottoman pasha) Muhammad Ali slaughtered the Mamluks in the early 19th century," he said in an interview. "(Gamal Abdel) Nasser locked up the Muslim Brothers and the Communists in 1954. (Anwar) Sadat locked up his opponents in 1971. "The difference now is that people's acceptance is no longer there. You cannot control public opinion, and the kind of economic problems we are facing cannot be postponed for a couple of years," he added. Dan Kurzer, a former U.S. ambassador to Cairo now teaching at Princeton University, said Egypt was only in "round three of a 15-round heavyweight contest". Among the players in the ring, he sees the Brotherhood, the military, the internal security forces, the revolutionary street, and what he called "the fourth heavyweight - old regime loyalists who may be off balance, in jail or in exile but who will be energized if the economy collapses".

February 20, 2013: Egypt Tries To Lure Back Exiled Businessmen'

Egypt's government allowed convicted businessmen who fled the country since a popular uprising to negotiate an end to corruption charges from abroad, an attempt to lure them home to help revive a stricken economy. Numerous wealthy businessmen have left Egypt since President Hosni Mubarak was overthrown in 2011 to avoid being jailed for corrupt dealings during the veteran leader's three decades in power. With them went large sums of money that the government now needs desperately to shore up an economy shattered by two years of political turmoil and social unrest.

Several figures from the political and business elite with close ties to the Mubarak family have been tried and convicted in absentia of making private gain from the sale of public property or graft -tainted state contracts. Among them were Hussein Salem, who was convicted in absentia in 2011 to seven years in jail and fined more than $4 billion for money laundering and profiteering. The government said on Wednesday it had amended a law to offer arbitration via an intermediary in Egypt to investors targeted by criminal proceedings. The law had previously required the investor to attend arbitration in Egypt. "It means that those with final court verdicts issued against them and have fled abroad can go through reconciliation and return the money ... without having to stand in court or be put in jail," said Achraf Chazly, a corporate lawyer. "This is driven by a desperate need for money... They want to encourage these people to return and re-invigorate the economy," he said.

A stand-off between President Mohamed Mursi's allies in the Muslim Brotherhood and their secular and liberal opponents has scotched hopes that a drought in investment will end soon. The local currency has tumbled 8 percent against the dollar this year as Egypt's international reserves fell to $13.6 billion, less than the $15 billion needed to cover three months' worth of imports. The reserves had stood at $36 billion on the eve of the uprising against Mubarak. Cairo-based political analyst Elijah Zarwan said the government's attempt to entice back exiled businessmen was "growing out of perceived economic necessity, given the parlous state of the country's finances, and also the perceived political necessity - a fear that wealthy businessmen who are close to the old regime might foment problems at home".

Hassan Malek, chairman of the Egypt Business Development Association and a senior informal adviser to Mursi, told Reuters on Sunday he had been involved in efforts to persuade wealthy Egyptians to return and invest in the country, though he said court cases should be solved first. Under the amendment agreed on Wednesday, reconciliation would lead to the cancellation of jail sentences and unlock the investors' frozen assets. It added a "clause stipulating that in the case of a court verdict issued in absentia convicting (someone), it is possible to take measures to re - examine the case". This would be at "the request of, and in the presence of, a special defender of the investor". The result of reconciliation would be "cancellation of the order to arrest and jail him, and ending the ban on dispensing and managing their assets, and dropping the criminal case for the investor".

February 20, 2013: Egypt Govt Offers Convicted Investors "Reconciliation"

The Egyptian government moved on Wednesday to entice back convicted investors who have fled the country, offering them arbitration that could overturn verdicts issued in absentia and that may lead to "full reconciliation". With the country deep in economic crisis, the move signals that Egypt may be seeking to draw on the finances and expertise of exiled business leaders associated with ousted president Hosni Mubarak. In a statement, the government said such a reconciliation would lead to the cancellation of jail sentences and unlock the investors' frozen assets. The cabinet have agreed to amend a law related to investor guarantees and incentives, it said. This would add a "clause stipulating that in the case of a court verdict issued in absentia convicting (someone), it is possible to take measures to reexamine the case". This would be at "the request of, and in the presence of a special defender of the investor". The result of reconciliation would be "cancellation of the order to arrest and jail him, and ending the ban on dispensing and managing their assets, and dropping the criminal case for the investor". It said it did not extend to co - defendants in the case and that they "would not benefit from it".

February 20, 2013: Egypt Court Allows Policemen To Grow Islamic Beards'

An Egyptian court ruled on that policemen may grow beards, ending a decades-old convention barring them from making what is often seen here as a display of Islamic piety.

Dozens of police officers were suspended from work in February for breaking the de facto ban on beards introduced under deposed President Hosni Mubarak. They had protested outside the Interior Ministry, calling on Islamist President Mohamed Mursi - who is bearded himself - to secure their reinstatement. Cairo's High Administrative Court rejected a request by the Interior Ministry to let it suspend officers who defied the unwritten rule. "The court ruled ... that police officers have the right to grow beards," judge Maher Abu el-Enin said. Hosni Mubarak used the police to crush Islamist groups he saw as enemies of the state. During his rule, sporting any kind of beard precluded Egyptians from holding senior government posts. The decision backed a similar ruling by a lower court and the decision makes the verdict final. The Interior Ministry's spokesman was not immediately available to comment. Men across Egyptian society wear beards, including many leftists, but the pressure for ending the police ban came from religious officers who wish to emulate the Prophet Mohammad. Mursi's Muslim Brotherhood, the state's most organized Islamist movement, has come to power through elections since the popular uprising that toppled Mubarak in February 2011. The ruling is expected to raise worries among minority Christians, liberal-minded Muslims and others who fear that emboldened Islamists will try to force their beliefs and customs on society. Mursi said during his campaign for the presidency that he had no objection to members of the security forces growing beards.

February 20, 2013: Egypt State Grain Buyer Steps Aside As Currency Reserves Fall'

One of the most powerful figures on the global wheat market, Nomani, said on Wednesday he has left his job as vice chairman of Egypt's state grains buyer GASC, at a time when the country is struggling with falling foreign currency reserves. For more than three years he has overseen strategic buying for the world's biggest importer of wheat, and the government stressed on Wednesday that the country had ample stocks for production of bread, the national staple. "I got promoted to become an adviser to the minister of trade and supplies, which means that I will no longer handle the wheat bidding and buying process, starting now," Nomani told Reuters. For a profile of Nomani, see Nomani said Mamdouh Abdel Fattah had taken over as acting deputy head of the GASC (General Authority for Supply Commodities) for a period of one year, but it was not yet clear if this was renewable or not. Egypt's foreign currency reserves have fallen to $13.6 billion, less than the $15 billion needed to cover three months' worth of imports. In an attempt to control the rate of a drop in the Egyptian pound's value, the central bank introduced regular dollar auctions in December. The Egyptian economy has been hit by more than two years of turmoil since the popular uprising that swept Hosni Mubarak from power in February 2011. The unrest has driven away tourists and investors. Central bank governor Hisham Ramez said this week that he had taken steps to prioritize certain imports including foodstuffs, production machines and their spare parts, and fertilizers. The cabinet said that Egypt already had stocks of wheat to last 101 days and this would rise to 126 days as more imports arrive. GASC set a tender to buy an unspecified amount of wheat from global suppliers for April 10-20 shipment.

February 21, 2013: Egyptian Presidential Decree'

Egyptian President Mohamed Mursi on called parliamentary elections beginning April 27 and ending in June, according to a presidential decree. The new parliament will convene on July 6, the decree said.

February 21, 2013: Egypt's Mursi Calls Elections Beginning April 27'

President Mohamed Mursi on Thursday called parliamentary elections that will begin on April 27 and finish in late June, a four-stage vote that the Islamist leader hopes will conclude Egypt's turbulent transition to democracy. The vote will take place in a country deeply divided between Islamist parties that have come out on top in all elections held since Hosni Mubarak was ousted in 2011 and more secular-minded opposition parties that have struggled to get organized. The Islamist-led administration hopes the election of the new parliament will help stabilize Egypt so an economy in deep crisis can start to recover from spasms of unrest and violence that have dogged the transition. The new parliament will convene on July 6, according to a decree issued by Mursi. The Shura Council, the upper house of parliament, earlier adopted an electoral law that cleared the way for Mursi to set the date for the lower house election. Under the new Egyptian constitution adopted in December, Mursi must secure parliament's approval for his choice of prime minister, giving the chamber more power than it had under Mubarak, when it was no more than a rubber stamp.

With Egypt so polarized, the stakes are high for the Freedom and Justice Party, the political arm of the Muslim Brotherhood. The party has said it will seek an outright majority in the vote, an outcome that would allow Mursi administration to press ahead with its plans for a country caught in political limbo despite the Islamist victory in last year's presidential vote. Opposition groups have accused Mursi and the Brotherhood of seeking to dominate the post-Mubarak order, accusations denied by the Islamists but which have fuelled protests against his rule. The opposition must now decide whether to take part in the vote and try to gain a foothold in Egypt's elected institutions or boycott in an attempt to deny legitimacy to the process, analysts said. "This confronts them with a real dilemma," said Nathan Brown, professor of political science at George Washington University and an Egypt expert. "If you have a majority that is very sympathetic to the president, then the president can do an awful lot," said Brown. "If you have a parliament that is fractured, you could have a system of infighting and even gridlock."

IMF AGREEMENT: The Mursi government is seeking to revive Egypt's stagnant economy with a $4.8 billion loan agreement with the International Monetary Fund. But approval of an IMF deal and the austerity measures it would imply could hit the Brotherhood's popularity ahead of the elections. Each stage of the vote will comprise an initial two days of voting, with a further two days of voting slated for run-offs for closely contested seats. Mohamed Gadallah, a legal adviser to Mursi, had earlier said the voting would begin on April 28. The vote would be held in phases in different regions because of a shortage of poll supervisors. The last lower house election, which was won by Islamists, lasted from late November 2011 until January the following year. Mursi had been expected to ratify the electoral law by February 25. The lower house was dissolved last year after the court ruled the original law used to elect it was unfair.

On Monday the Constitutional Court demanded changes to five articles of the revised electoral law. The Shura Council accepted this ruling and adopted the legislation without a vote on Thursday. "The decision of the Constitutional Court is binding and we have no right to vote on it. It must be carried out," said Ahmed Fahmy, the Council's speaker. The new law bars members of parliament from changing their political affiliation once elected. Under ousted president Hosni Mubarak, independents were often cajoled into joining the ruling National Democratic Party (NDP), which monopolized parliament and political life before the 2011 revolution. The law also stipulates that one third of the lower house should be designated for independents and bans former members of the now-defunct NDP from participating in politics for at least 10 years

February 21, 2013: Egypt To Seek IMF Talks As It Reveals Grim Economy Data'

Egypt plans to invite an IMF mission to Cairo within a week, the government said on Thursday, flagging an early resumption of negotiations for a $4.8 billion loan as it struggles with an acute foreign currency shortage. Planning Minister Ashraf al-Araby said foreign investment had all but dried up, predicted a huge budget deficit as food and fuel subsidy bills soar, and announced data also underlining the depth of Egypt's crisis before elections expected in spring. Araby said growth had been just 2.2 percent year-on-year in the December quarter, noting that strong investment was needed to reach seven percent - an annual rate economists see as needed to soak up the waves of young people entering the labor market. He also predicted the budget deficit could hit 10 percent of annual economic output in the financial year to June, a level Egypt cannot afford without outside help. "The Egyptian economy is recovering extremely slowly due to the security and political situation," Araby's ministry said in a statement. Analysts had expected the government of President Mohamed Mursi to try to delay a deal with the International Monetary Fund until after the parliamentary elections, as the loan's terms will demand highly unpopular austerity measures.

However, Araby predicted rapid movement. "God willing, we expect to invite the IMF delegation within days," he told a news conference. Asked to be more specific, he said: "Within days, no more than a week." Egypt's upper house of parliament adopted a revised electoral law on Thursday, clearing the way for Mursi to call the lower house polls expected to be held in April or May. Egyptians are angry as the crisis drags ever more of them into poverty. Cairo reached an initial agreement with the IMF on the loan in November but postponed ratification the next month due to violence on the streets. This followed Mursi's move to expand his powers and push through a new constitution seen by opponents as favoring his backers in the Muslim Brotherhood and more hardline parties. Araby announced foreign investment in Egypt was dire in the six months to the end of December - the first half of Egypt's financial year. "We had almost an absence of new direct foreign investments during the first half of the year," he said.

POUND HAS TUMBLED VERSUS DOLLAR: Egypt's pound has tumbled 8 percent against the dollar this year as its international reserves fell to $13.6 billion, less than the $15 billion needed to cover just three months' imports. This drop has inflated the budget deficit by forcing up the cost of subsidizing energy and food staples, such as bread. The government announced new fuel prices for many sectors of the economy on Tuesday which industry sources said were 50 percent higher than previous levels, drawing protests by factory owners affected by the increase. Private industry and individuals are struggling to borrow or get access to dwindling supplies of dollars. Mahdi Ibrahim, who runs an import - export business with Brazil, expressed anger about problems in getting hold of even relatively small sums in dollars - difficulties which are forcing businesses to turn to the black market for funds. "I have pulled all my money out of the bank because of the restrictions on my ability as a client to buy dollars or transfer hard currency abroad. I have business to take care of abroad," he told Reuters

February 21, 2013: Egypt's Mursi To Call April Election -presidential Source'

Egyptian President Mohamed Mursi will call a parliamentary election starting in April, a presidential source told Reuters, saying the vote would be held in three or four stages. Earlier in the day the Shura Council, the upper house of parliament, adopted an electoral law as amended by the Constitutional Court, clearing the way for Mursi to set a date for the lower house election. "The president will issue a decree soon, it could be tonight, calling for elections to start in April," the source told Reuters. The vote would be held in phases in different regions because of a shortage of poll supervisors. The last lower house election, which was won by Islamists, lasted from late November 2011 until January the following year. Mursi had been expected to ratify the electoral law by Feb. 25. The lower house was dissolved last year after the court ruled the original law used to elect it was unfair. (Reporting by Yasmine Saleh and Marwa Awad: Writing by Marwa Awad: Editing by David Stamp and Mark Heinrich)

February 21, 2013: Egypt Election To Begin April 28: Presidential Adviser'

Egyptian parliamentary elections will begin on April 28 and be held in four stages, Mohamed Gadallah, a legal adviser to President Mohamed Mursi, told Reuters. "Parliamentary elections for 2013 will begin on April 28, over four stages," presidential adviser Mohamed Gadallah said.

February 21, 2013: Egypt Passes Electoral Law, Paves Way For Elections'

Egypt's Shura Council, the upper house of parliament, adopted on Thursday an electoral law as amended by the Constitutional Court, clearing the way for President Mohamed Mursi to set a date for lower house elections. Mursi is expected to ratify the electoral law by Feb. 25 and announce voting will be held in about two months' time to choose the lower house, which was dissolved last year after the court ruled the original law used to elect it was unfair. The new chamber is likely to have to decide on tough economic measures that the International Monetary Fund is demanding in return for a $4.8 billion loan which Egypt needs to tackle an economic crisis. The Constitutional Court demanded changes to five articles of the revised electoral law. The Shura Council accepted this ruling and adopted the legislation without a vote. "The decision of the Constitutional Court is binding and we have no right to vote on it. It must be carried out," said Ahmed Fahmy, the Council's speaker. The new law bars members of parliament from changing their political affiliation once they are elected. Under ousted president Hosni Mubarak, independents were often cajoled into joining the ruling National Democratic Party (NDP), which monopolized parliament and political life before the 2011 revolution. The law also stipulates that one third of the lower house should be designated for independents and bans former members of the now defunct NDP from participating in politics for at least 10 years. Elections will probably be held in more than one stage in different regions because of a shortage of poll supervisors.

February 21, 2013: Egyptian Author Questioned For Contempt Of Religion'

Egyptian prosecutors have questioned an award-winning novelist over accusations he insulted religion, in the latest of a series of cases to cause concern over freedom of expression in Islamist-run Egypt. Writer Youssef Ziedan said he had been interrogated for four hours this week about his 2009 novel "Arab Theology", which has become a best seller since it was republished recently. The prosecutors were examining a three-year-old report from the Islamic Research Centre, a state-sponsored body of religious scholars, which said Ziedan had offended followers of Islam, Christianity and Judaism alike. Ziedan asked why the authorities are investigating "Arab Theology", which discusses the origins of religious violence, while Egypt faces major political, social and economic problems. "It was really shocking and strange to find myself talking about philosophy with state security officers, especially now at a time the state is suffering from extreme turmoil and street violence which should be the focus of their work," Ziedan told Reuters after his interrogation.

Egyptian law prohibits insults against Islam, Christianity and Judaism, laying down penalties of up to five years in jail. Egypt has a large Christian minority but its historic Jewish community has dwindled to almost nothing in recent decades. The law has long been on the books but was enforced only occasionally under deposed President Hosni Mubarak. However, campaigners have raised concerns about freedom of thought and expression under President Mohamed Mursi, an Islamist elected last year after the 2011 uprising that toppled Mubarak. Ziedan, a Muslim known for discussing non-traditional religious ideas in his novels, said he was questioned by the state security prosecutor in a case brought by public prosecutor Talaat Ibrahim. Mursi appointed Ibrahim in November after sacking the previous incumbent, a Mubarak-era official. The opposition has accused Mursi of defying a law that prevents the firing of public prosecutors. Some judges and public figures saw the move as an attempt by the Muslim Brotherhood, which supports Mursi, to control the judiciary. Brotherhood spokesman Yasser Mehraz said his group had nothing to do with the Ziedan investigation. "Generally speaking, we at the Brotherhood believe that different ideas should exist and ideas should be fought only by ideas," he said.

"FLEXING THEIR MUSCLES": Human rights activist Gamal Eid said the "Arab Theology" case had been revived by a Salafi - one of those who want Egypt to follow a yet stricter interpretation of Islam than the Brotherhood favors. "The Islamic Research Centre's report was made in 2010 but a hardline Salafi Islamist person recently sent it to the (prosecution) officials," said Eid, who sent an aide to the interrogation. "Of course the case shows the continuation of Islamists' flexing their muscles and their attempts to shape the country according to their own form of Islam."

"Arab Theology" appeared at the end of 2009 and was recently reprinted. So far it has sold about 40,000 copies, far above average sales of books in Egypt of 4,000 to 6,000 at best. "The Islamic Research Centre's report also accused me of inciting strife in society and ... of mocking religions and spreading radical thoughts," said Ziedan. "I admit that my ideas are against all radical Islamist groups, which include the Brotherhood," he said, but added: "The book is entirely philosophical and anti-violence." His work "Azazeel" (Beelzebub) won the 2009 International Prize for Arabic Fiction, backed by the Booker Prize Foundation. However, some Christians said the book insulted their religion. Prosecutors also questioned Ziedan about that book before the revolution, but took no further action. Such cases have increased since Islamists gained power last year. In December, a 27-year-old Egyptian Christian was jailed for three years for posting online an anti-Islam film that ignited Muslim protests around the world. In November, seven Egyptian Christians living abroad were sentenced to death in absentia for participating in the video. A court sentenced Egyptian comic actor Adel Imam, renowned across the Arab world, to three months in jail and a fine of 1,000 Egyptian pounds ($150) in April for insulting Islam in his films and plays. Imam was acquitted on appeal.

Ziedan said such cases, including his own, were a sign of the times. "I see the case, like many other former ones against writers and creative people, as a form of pressure that has become a trend in the Brotherhood's world."

February 21, 2013: Egyptian Planning Minister Announces'

Foreign investment in Egypt was almost non-existent in the six months to the end of December, Planning Minister Ashraf al-Araby said on Thursday, illustrating the depth of the economic crisis facing the Arab world's most populous nation. He added that the country needed strong investment to reach the 7 percent annual economic growth rate commonly cited by economists as the level needed to lower unemployment and soak up new entrants to the labor market. Growth was only 2.2 percent year-on-year in the three months to the end of December, he told a news conference.

February 21, 2013: An opposition leader called for election boycott’

An opposition leader called for Egyptians to boycott elections due to start in April, saying the process under Islamist President Mohamed Mursi would be "an act of deception". Islamists, who have won every election since the 2011 overthrow of autocrat Hosni Mubarak, dismissed any suggestion that the parliamentary polls would lack credibility and predicted a strong turnout. While divisions between the Islamists and opposition remain deep, Mursi appeared ready to soothe anger among the Christian minority over the election schedule. The speaker of Egypt's upper house said Mursi would change the dates to avoid Coptic Christians having to vote during their Easter celebrations. Mursi called the lower house elections on Thursday, aiming to conclude Egypt's turbulent transition to democracy. However, liberal politician Mohamed El -Baradei drew comparisons with the last parliamentary polls to be held under Mubarak in 2010, a vote which was widely seen as rigged.

ElBaradei, a former U.N. nuclear agency chief, noted he had called for a boycott in 2010 "to expose sham democracy". "Today I repeat my call, (I) will not be part of an act of deception," he said on his Twitter account. The Muslim Brotherhood, which backs Mursi, rejected any call to boycott the voting which has been scheduled in four stages from April 27 to June. Essam Erian, a senior member of the Brotherhood's Freedom and Justice Party, said the polls would be carried out under "complete judicial supervision" as well as being followed by Egyptian, regional and international media. Voting would be monitored by Egyptian and foreign civil society and human rights organizations, he said on his Facebook page, adding that he expected wide participation.

COPTIC ANGER: Egyptian elections have been supervised by judges since the revolution. The relatively small numbers of judges have required the drawn-out process, allowing them to oversee voting in different regions on different days. The opposition says Mursi should not have called the elections until a number of disputes had been settled, chiefly a new constitution produced by an Islamist-dominated assembly which contributed to serious street violence last year. Mursi's announcement of the dates drew fire from Coptic Christians, who make up about 10 percent of the population, as the schedule would interfere with their Easter festival. Ahmed Fahmy, the speaker of the Shura Council, said Mursi would respond to these worries. "The president answered the requests of the Coptic members and will issue a statement changing the dates of the elections," he told lawmakers. The state news agency MENA "ed a presidential aide as saying a statement on new dates would be issued "within hours". Islamists have used well-organized campaign operations to win every election since the revolution, while the liberal and leftist opposition has been beset by divisions. Previous opposition boycott threats have failed to materialize. The National Salvation Front (NSF), which groups a number of parties opposed to the Islamists including ElBaradei's, is due to decide in the coming week whether to join a boycott. "This is Dr. ElBaradei's own position and own opinion," said NSF spokesman Khaled Dawood, but he added that other NSF leaders were sympathetic to the idea of a boycott. "This is yet another individual move by the Muslim Brotherhood and President Mursi, establishing facts on the ground and then asking you to basically go with the rules of the game they've set on their own," he said.

February 22, 2013: Divided Egypt Opposition Attacks Mursi On Election Call'

Egypt's opposition attacked President Mohammed Mursi on Friday for calling elections during a national crisis, but face a test of unity in challenging Islamists who have won every poll since the 2011 revolution. No sooner had Mursi called the parliamentary polls on Thursday than liberals and leftists accused him of deepening divisions between Islamists and their opponents. Some threatened to boycott voting which starts on April 27th and finishes in late June. Voting is held in stages due to a shortage of election monitors and Mursi's choice of dates upset the Christian minority, which makes up about 10 percent of the population. AlKalema, a Christian Coptic group, criticized the presidency for setting the first round to fall on the community's Easter religious holiday. "This is total negligence of the Coptic community but an intentional move to exclude them from political life," AlKalema said in a statement. Egyptian tycoon Naguib Sawiris made similar statements criticizing the vote timing. Egypt's state TV Channel One and Nile TV said later in separate scrolling news headlines that the presidency would change the date of the parliamentary vote because it falls on Coptic Easter holidays, in an effort to appease the Coptic minority. But no official statement was issued by the presidency to that effect.

Islamists, including the Muslim Brotherhood which backs Mursi, dominated the old lower house, which was dissolved last year by court order. The new parliament will face tough decisions as Egypt is seeking an IMF loan deal which would ease its financial crisis but demand unpopular austerity. Mursi called the elections, to be held in four stages around the country, hoping they can conclude Egypt's turbulent transition to democracy which began with the overthrow of autocrat Hosni Mubarak by popular protests. Islamists hailed elections as the only way out of Egypt's political and economic crisis. However, liberal politician Mohamed ElBaradei said holding polls without reaching a national consensus would further "inflame the situation". "The insistence on polarization, exclusion and oppression along with ... the deteriorating economic and security situation will lead us to the abyss," ElBaradei, a former United Nations agency chief, said on his Twitter feed. Egypt is split between the Islamists, who want national life to observe religion more closely, and opposition groups which hold a wide variety of visions for the future. Across Egypt there were scattered protests in Alexandria and Port Said, while a demonstration in Cairo's Tahrir Square was muted as a sandstorm enveloped the capital. Like the fractious opposition, the demonstrators had widely varying demands. Some called on Mursi to step down while others pressed for the military, which long backed Mubarak and his predecessors, to step back in to run Egypt.

BOYCOTT DECISION: The National Salvation Front (NSF), which groups a number of parties opposed to the Islamists, said it would hammer out its stand on the elections. "We will meet early next week to decide on whether we will boycott or go ahead with elections. But as you can see, the opposition overall is upset over this unilateral decision on part of the presidency. This was a rushed decision," said NSF spokesman Khaled Dawood. Dawood said Egypt should have other priorities such as changing the controversial new constitution produced last year by an assembly dominated by Islamists. "Solve these issues first then talk about elections," added Dawood. While the opposition can agree on attacking Mursi, previous boycott threats have fizzled out. It remains fractured and disorganized, unlike the well-financed and efficient Islamist election machines which have triumphed in votes for the presidency and parliament. "We face a difficult political decision and time is running out. The opposition faces a test of its ability to remain united," said Amr Hamzawy, a professor of politics at Cairo University and former liberal lawmaker.

ISLAMISTS READY FOR VOTE: Islamist parties and groups welcomed the new elections and dismissed the boycott threat. "Elections are the only way out of the crisis. The people must be able to choose those they see fit. The majority of political forces will not boycott the elections," said Tarek al-Zumor of the Building and Development Party. Essam Erian, member of the Muslim Brotherhood's ruling Freedom and Justice Party, said parliament would unite Egypt's political life. "The coming parliament will hold a variety of national voices: Islamist, conservative, liberal and leftist. Everyone realizes the importance of the coming period and withholding one's vote is a big mistake," Erian said on his Facebook page. Islamists are likely to form coalitions and dominate the new parliament as they did in the previous short-lived lower house, which was dissolved after the Constitutional Court struck down the law used to elect it.

February 23, 2013: Egypt Parliament Election Start Moved To April 22'

Egypt's parliamentary elections, previously scheduled to begin on April 27, have been brought forward to start on April 22, the presidential spokesman said on his Facebook page on Saturday. Egypt's parliamentary elections, previously scheduled to begin on April 27, have been brought forward to start on April 22, the presidential spokesman said on his Facebook page on Saturday. Members of Egypt's Coptic Christian minority had criticized the planned timing of the elections because some voting would take place during their Easter holiday.

February 23, 2013: Speaker'

Egypt's President Mohamed Mursi will modify the dates of upcoming parliamentary elections after requests from Christian lawmakers to change them, the speaker of parliament's upper house said on Saturday. Egypt’s President Mohamed Mursi will modify the dates of upcoming parliamentary elections after requests from Christian lawmakers to change them, the speaker of parliament's upper house said on Saturday. Members of the Coptic Christian minority had objected to the election dates Mursi announced on Thursday, as some voting would be held during their Easter celebrations. "The president answered the requests of the Coptic members and will issue a statement changing the dates of the elections," Ahmed Fahmy, the speaker of the Shura Council, told lawmakers. He did not say when Mursi would make an announcement.

February 23, 2013: Egypt Brings Forward Election Start To Defuse Christian Row'

Egypt brought forward the start of parliamentary elections to April 22 on Saturday to defuse a row with the Christian minority, who said the original schedule would conflict with their Easter celebrations. Egypt brought forward the start of parliamentary elections to April 22 on Saturday to defuse a row with the Christian minority, who said the original schedule would conflict with their Easter celebrations. This should satisfy Coptic Christians, who make up 10 percent of the population. But the rift between Egypt's ruling Islamists and the opposition remained as deep as ever, with one leading liberal politician, Mohamed ElBaradei, saying he would boycott the polls.

The decision by Islamist President Mohamed Mursi to start the four-stage vote five days earlier than scheduled was announced by his spokesman on Facebook. Islamists, who have won every election since the 2011 overthrow of autocrat Hosni Mubarak, dismissed any suggestion that the parliamentary polls would lack credibility and predicted a strong turnout. Mursi called the lower house elections on Thursday, aiming to conclude Egypt's turbulent transition to democracy. However, ElBaradei, a former U.N. nuclear agency chief, drew comparisons with the last parliamentary polls to be held under Mubarak in 2010, a vote which was widely seen as rigged. ElBaradei noted he had called for a boycott in 2010 "to expose sham democracy". "Today I repeat my call, (I) will not be part of an act of deception," he said on his Twitter account. ElBaradei boycotted the presidential election that brought Mursi to power last June. The Muslim Brotherhood, which backs Mursi, rejected any call to boycott the voting which has been scheduled in four stages from April 27 to June. Essam Erian, a senior member of the Brotherhood's Freedom and Justice Party, said the polls would be carried out under "complete judicial supervision" as well as being followed by Egyptian, regional and international media. Voting would be monitored by Egyptian and foreign civil society and human rights organizations, he said on his Facebook page, adding that he expected wide participation.

DRAWN-OUT PROCESS: Egyptian elections have been supervised by judges since the revolution. The relatively small numbers of judges have required the drawn-out process, allowing them to oversee voting in different regions on different days. Under the new schedule, voting will be completed on June 24, with the new lower house due to meet on July 2. It aims to avoid making Copts vote during the most important festival of the Christian calendar. The opposition says Mursi should not have called the elections until a number of disputes had been settled, chiefly a new constitution produced by an Islamist-dominated assembly which contributed to serious street violence last year. Islamists have used well - organized campaign operations to win every election since the revolution, while the liberal and leftist opposition has been beset by divisions. Previous opposition boycott threats have failed to materialize. The National Salvation Front (NSF), which groups a number of parties opposed to the Islamists including ElBaradei's, is due to decide in the coming week whether to join a boycott. "This is Dr. ElBaradei's own position and own opinion," said NSF spokesman Khaled Dawood, but he added that other NSF leaders were sympathetic to the idea of a boycott. "This is yet another individual move by the Muslim Brotherhood and President Mursi, establishing facts on the ground and then asking you to basically go with the rules of the game they've set on their own," he said. (Additional reporting by Ahmed Tolba and Ali Abdelatti: Writing by David Stamp: Editing by Rosalind Russell and Stephen Powell)

February 24, 2013: Egypt Seeks Tourism Boost After Iran's Ahmadinejad Visit'

Egypt's tourism minister is heading to Tehran, the government said on Sunday, as Cairo tries to halt sliding visitor numbers and thaws relations with Iran after a 30-year freeze.

Minister Hisham Zaazou will visit the Iranian capital from Monday under a drive "to restore tourism activity into Egypt and discover new and diverse markets", the Tourism Ministry said in a statement. Last month President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad became the first Iranian leader to visit Egypt since Tehran's 1979 Islamic revolution, and called for a strategic alliance with Cairo. Egypt's tourism sector has suffered since a popular uprising toppled president Hosni Mubarak in 2011. Waves of riots and instability have driven many tourists away. Tourism used to account for more than a tenth of Egypt's gross domestic product (GDP) before the uprising. In 2010, around 14.7 million visitors came to Egypt, generating around $12.5 billion, but this slumped to 9.8 million people in 2011, bringing in $8.8 billion.

February 24, 2013: Ten Chadian Soldiers Killed In Northern Mali'

Ten Chadian soldiers were killed in operations targeting al Qaeda -linked Islamist rebels along northern Mali's mountainous border with Algeria, Chad's army said on Sunday. The Chadian troops were carrying out operations in an area of the Adrar des Ifoghas mountains where 13 Chadian soldiers and 65 al Qaeda-linked rebels were killed in clashes on Friday. "In the course of the clean-up operations, the bodies of 28 other terrorists were found in the combat zone ... Ten more of our soldiers fell," said a statement from the army general staff read on state radio. "The final toll from the clashes ... and clean-up that followed is as follows: 93 terrorists ... on the side of the enemy. We deplore the deaths of 23 soldiers and 30 wounded," the statement said.

February 24, 2013: Egypt's Mursi Invites Opposition To Dialogue On Elections’

Egyptian President Mohamed Mursi invited opposition parties to a meeting to discuss concerns about upcoming parliamentary elections, which some parties have threatened to boycott, and agree on ways to ensure their fairness. The invitation was similar to offers Mursi has made previously that were spurned, and the National Salvation Front opposition coalition immediately rejected the offer to meet. "I tell everyone of all colors of the spectrum, to all dear brothers in different parties across Egypt, I approach them by name, by party, by persons to sit tomorrow and put down guarantees for transparent and fair elections," Mursi said in a recorded appearance on a television talk program on Mehwar channel aired late on Sunday.

Mursi also sought to dispel speculation that there were growing tensions between the army and the presidency. Some Egyptians, frustrated with what they view as Mursi's poor performance over the past seven months, have called for the military again to run Egypt. Egypt's military has been a central force in politics since army officers staged an overthrow of the monarchy in 1952. "There could never be disagreement between the armed forces and the presidency because the president and the armed forces are not two factions, they are one, and the Supreme Council of the Armed Forces is extremely professional," Mursi said on the show. In addition, Mursi said he has a strong relationship with the intelligence apparatus. "The General Intelligence is directly subject to the presidency of the republic, subject to me...I support, trust, protect and love them, and wish them well because through them Egypt's security is protected internally and externally," he said.

Egypt brought forward by five days the start of the elections to April 22 to defuse a dispute with the Christian community, which makes up a tenth of the population, after they said the original schedule would conflict with their Easter celebrations.

TRANSITION TO DEMOCRACY: Mohammed Mursi said the elections could conclude Egypt's turbulent transition to democracy, which began two years ago with the overthrow of autocrat Hosni Mubarak by popular protests. Various opposition groups have said they would boycott the legislative elections, a move that could delegitimize the electoral process, which is due to take place in four stages and culminate with the sitting of the new lower house of parliament in July. The opposition has said that by deciding to hold elections Mursi and his Muslim Brotherhood movement trivialized the deaths of around 60 people in anti-government protests since January and was only concerned with securing parliamentary seats. They accused the Brotherhood of seeking to dominate all state institutions and said the electoral constituencies were "tailor-made" for the Brotherhood's Freedom and Justice Party and that there were no real guarantees of fair elections.

The National Salvation Front (NSF), which groups a number of parties opposed to the Islamists, is due to decide in the coming week whether to join the boycott as a movement. But it immediately rebuffed Mursi's call for a dialogue on elections. "It makes me angry. You take the decision (to hold elections) and then say, 'Come to talk to me'," Khaled Dawoud, an NSF spokesman, told Reuters. Some of the NSF's main parties have individually said they would boycott, including the Dostour party of Mohamed ElBaradei, a former U.N. nuclear agency chief. He drew comparisons with the last parliamentary polls to be held under Mubarak in 2010, a vote that was widely seen as rigged. Mursi's television comments were aired almost seven hours later than the time the presidency had announced and well past midnight, which provoked dismissive reactions from opponents. Bassem Youssef, a popular satirist who lampoons public figures, wrote on Twitter: "Has anyone seen Mohammed Mursi?" A joke from political activists that made the rounds on social networking sites ran: "According to which timing is the program being aired? Egypt's, Qatar's or the United States?" referring to the United States' and Qatar's foreign policies, seen as backing the Brotherhood.

February 25, 2013: Egypt Balloon Crash Kills 19, Mostly Foreign Tourists

At least 19 people, most of them Asian and European tourists, died on Tuesday when a hot air balloon caught fire and crashed near the ancient Egyptian town of Luxor after a mid-air gas explosion, officials said. The balloon came down in farmland a few kilometers (miles) from the Valley of the Kings and pharaonic temples popular with tourists. Rescue workers gathered the dead from the field where the charred remains of the balloon, gas canisters and other pieces of wreckage landed. One Egyptian was also killed, Health Minister Mohamed Mostafa Hamed told Reuters, listing the other victims as tourists from Japan, China, France, Britain and Hungary. Earlier, officials had said all the dead were foreigners.

The balloon crashed on the west bank of the Nile river, where many of the area's major historical sites are located. Konny Matthews, assistant manager of Luxor's Al Moudira hotel, said she heard an explosion at about 7 a.m. (0500 GMT). "It was a huge bang. It was a frightening bang, even though it was several kilometers away from the hotel," she said by phone. "Some of my employees said that their homes were shaking." Ahmed Aboud, head of an association representing Luxor balloon operators, said the fire had begun in the pipe linking the gas canisters to the burner. He said it was an accident. The deaths were caused by burns and injuries sustained in the fall, said Mohamed Mustafa, a doctor at the hospital where the injured were treated. The pilot survived by jumping from the basket, Aboud said. The British government said two British citizens and a British resident of Egypt had been killed. "We can also confirm that one other British national was involved and is in a stable condition," a British foreign ministry statement said. Two French citizens were killed, according to France's foreign ministry. The Japanese embassy in Cairo said it believed four Japanese had been aboard and had sent staff to Luxor to confirm this. Transport accidents are frequent in Egypt. Dozens of children were killed in November when the bus they were on collided with a train. Accidents affecting foreign tourists are rarer, but not unusual. Five Germans were killed in December in a bus crash near a Red Sea resort.

A LOUD EXPLOSION: U.S. photographer Christopher Michel, who was on board another balloon, told Britain's Sky News television that the balloon was one of eight flying at the time. "We heard a loud explosion behind us. I looked back and saw lots of smoke. It wasn't immediately clear that it was a balloon," he said. Hot air ballooning at dawn is popular with tourists, who are a mainstay of the Egyptian economy, although visitor numbers have fallen sharply since a 2011 uprising that toppled President Hosni Mubarak. Two years of political instability have kept many foreign tourists away. Tourism accounted for more than a 10th of Egypt's gross domestic product before the revolt. In 2010, about 14.7 million visitors came to Egypt, but this slumped to 9.8 million the next year. Wael Ibrahim, head of the tour guides' syndicate in Luxor, said he did not expect the accident to make the situation worse for tour operators in the area than it already was. "We've already been affected badly in Egypt," he said. Some tourists may be more wary of activities like hot air ballooning, he said, but added: "This (type of) accident could happen anywhere in the world." Last year a balloon plunged to the ground in flames in Slovenia, killing four people and injuring 28. Egyptian Civil Aviation Minister Wael el-Maadawi said a committee from the ministry was heading to Luxor to investigate the incident. He said hot air balloon flights would be stopped until an investigation into the cause of the accident. "We cannot say whether this was because of maintenance or human (error) until the investigation committee is completely done with its investigation," he told Al Jazeera TV's Egyptian channel.

February 26, 2013: Finance Minister Speaks

Egypt plans to send a revised economic reform plan to parliament within two days and to the International Monetary Fund immediately after that, Finance Minister Al-Mursi Hegazy said. "As soon as the laws are sent to parliament, they will be sent (to the IMF)," he told reporters. Asked when Egypt planned to invite an IMF delegation to resume talks on a $4.8 billion loan, Hegazy said: "I think within 10 days to two weeks."

February 26, 2013: Egypt To Send Economic Plan To Parliament In Days-minister’

Egypt will send a new economic plan needed to secure a lifeline from the International Monetary Fund to parliament within two days after releasing a summary that makes no mention of cutting subsidies and other politically-sensitive measures. Cairo is trying to secure a $4.8 billion IMF loan to shore up its finances as the economy faces a deep crisis rooted in two years of political turmoil that have drained foreign currency reserves to a critical level.

The turmoil has driven away foreign investors and tourists who are a major source of the foreign currency Egypt needs to import fuel and wheat. Finance Minister Al-Mursi Hegazy told reporters a revised economic reform plan would be sent to the parliament within two days, and then to the IMF immediately afterwards. "As soon as the laws are sent to parliament, they will be sent (to the IMF)," he told reporters, adding he expected a response from the IMF within about 10 days to two weeks after the plan was sent to them.

Asked when Egypt planned to invite an IMF delegation to resume talks on the loan, Hegazy said: "I think within 10 days to two weeks." The Fund and Egypt agreed on the loan in principle in November, but ratification was suspended at Cairo's behest in December after Mursi announced and then suspended tax increases that drew heavy criticism from the opposition. A summary of the revised plan released by the government on Monday called for a levy on stock market transactions and a flat 25 percent tax on Egyptian companies, but did not spell out plans for cutting subsidy spending or detail other tax increases. The government aims to raise 450 million Egyptian pounds ($66.8 million) a year from the stock exchange tax, Hani Qadri, Egypt's deputy minister of finance said at a press conference.

SUBSIDIES: A fifth of the state budget goes on energy subsidies alone, but cutting them is widely unpopular, making it a sensitive issue ahead of parliamentary elections scheduled to start in April. As part of its plan to cut fuel subsidies, the government raised prices for fuel oil by 50 percent last week for some industries. It also plans to implement a "a system for subsidized fuel in July and hopes energy use in the country to be at cost price within three years. Investment Minister Osama Saleh said Egypt would reopen talks with the IMF next month. Egypt's foreign currency reserves tumbled to $13.6 billion in January from $36 billion before Mubarak was overthrown in February 2011. The Egyptian pound has fallen over 8 percent since the central bank started auctioning dollars at the end of December. The government is targeting a deficit for this financial year of 189.7 billion Egyptian pounds ($28 billion), or 10.9 percent of total economic output.

February 26, 2013: Leading Egyptian Leftist Party To Boycott Elections’

Egyptian leftist opposition party, the Popular Current, led by former presidential candidate Hamdeen Sabahy, said on Tuesday it will boycott parliamentary elections due to start in April as well as national dialogue talks proposed by President Mohamed Mursi. "We will neither participate in the national dialogue nor in the elections," Heba Yassin, a spokesman for the party told Reuters. "This is to protest against the elections law that we did not participate in drafting, and about which our opinion was not taken. Also we reject the continuation of Mursi's oppressive policies that have led to nothing but more bloodshed and political problems." Sabahy came in a close third in the country's first free presidential elections, which took place in 2012.

February 26, 2013: Mursi's Opponents Say Will Boycott Egypt Elections’

An alliance of Egyptian opposition parties decided on Tuesday to boycott parliamentary elections in protest at an election law they say favors the Muslim Brotherhood, increasing the chance that Islamists will sweep the vote. The boycott by liberal and leftist parties opposed to President Mohamed Mursi aims to undermine the legitimacy of the vote and shows the polarization that has defined Egyptian politics since Hosni Mubarak was toppled two years ago. It raises the prospect of an election fought mostly between Mursi's Muslim Brotherhood and more hardline Islamist groups such as the Salafi Nour Party. The vote is to be held in four stages between late April and June.

The National Salvation Front (NSF) - an array of liberal and leftist parties struggling to compete with the Islamists - said there should be no elections for the lower house of parliament without a law guaranteeing fair polls. The law was passed this month by the Islamist -dominated upper house of parliament, which has been exercising legislative power in the absence of a lower house. The Islamists deny opposition accusations that the law divides constituencies in a way that favors the Muslim Brotherhood. "There can be no elections without a law that guarantees the fairness of the election process and a government that can implement such a law and be trusted by the people," said Sameh Ashour, a spokesman for the NSF, who also called for "real independence of the judiciary". With deep grass roots networks, the Islamists have won all elections since Mubarak was swept from power in a popular uprising that for a while brought Egyptians together in a display of unity rarely seen since then.

Divisions between the Islamists and their opponents have widened since Mursi won last year's presidential election. Tensions spilt into lethal street violence late last year when the president was accused of staging a power grab - accusations the Islamists dismissed as propaganda. Seeking to convince the opposition to take part, Mursi invited them to talks on Tuesday to address concerns about the vote, but the alliance declined to attend. "We tell President Mursi: talk with yourself and your party," Ashour said. Mursi went ahead with the talks anyway. "I hope these elections will be fully fair," he told the televised meeting attended by Islamists, smaller parties and independents. "We all bear the responsibility and I bear the most responsibility." Mursi said he hoped "our dear brothers who did not meet us today" would join the talks at a later date.

"OPPRESSIVE POLICIES": If the past is anything to go by, Mursi and the Brotherhood will press on regardless. In December, he held a referendum on a constitution opposed by the opposition, securing its approval and signing it into law despite fierce protest. "The call for boycott indicates the lack of trust the opposition has in the Brotherhood government and may also speak to their own capacities to effectively compete should they run," said Elijah Zarwan, a Cairo-based political analyst. The boycott means parties led by some of the most prominent non-Islamist politicians will sit out the vote.

These include the Popular Current led by Hamdeen Sabahy, a leftist who came third in the presidential election won by Mursi last June, and the Dustour Party led by Mohamed ElBaradei, a former U.N. nuclear agency chief. "This is to protest against the elections law that we did not participate in drafting, and about which our opinion was not taken," said Heba Yassin, a spokeswoman for Popular Current. "We reject the continuation of Mursi's oppressive policies that have led to nothing but more bloodshed and political problems." The lower house was dissolved last year after a court ruled that the previous election law used to elect it was illegal.

The Muslim Brotherhood's Freedom and Justice Party won about 40 percent of seats in the old lower house, with the Nour Party in second place. The Nour Party announced this week that it would take part in the elections. Hassan Nafaa, a political scientist and a critic of the Muslim Brotherhood, said the boycott would undermine the legitimacy of the election. But he also foresaw some parties eventually breaking the boycott. "If one of the front parties decided to enter the elections at a later stage, this will be a major blow," he said. Police arrested 55 people on Tuesday during a failed attempt to re-open Tahrir Square which has been occupied by anti-Mursi demonstrators since November, a security source said. State media described the police operation as a "peaceful process" that prompted a violent reaction from street venders who threw petrol bombs. Police removed barbed wire barricades, briefly opening the square to traffic, but they were swiftly re-erected by the youths that man them, the source said.

February 26, 2013: Barack Obama Urges Egyptian Leader To Protect Democratic Principles’

President Barack Obama urged Egyptian President Mohamed Mursi to protect democratic principles in Egypt and work to build political consensus as he prepares for parliamentary elections. Obama and Mursi spoke by telephone on Tuesday, a White House statement said. Liberal and leftist parties in Egypt have vowed to boycott the parliamentary elections to protest against a law they say favors Mursi's Muslim Brotherhood.

This has raised the prospect of an election fought mostly between the Muslim Brotherhood and more hardline Islamist groups. The elections are planned in four stages between late April and June. "The president welcomed President Mursi's commitment to serving as a president for all Egyptians, including women and people of all faiths, and emphasized President Mursi's responsibility to protect the democratic principles that the Egyptian people fought so hard to secure," the White House said. Obama encouraged Mursi and all political groups within Egypt, to try to build consensus and advance the political transition, according to the statement. The two leaders also discussed Egypt's economic situation and efforts to advance regional peace and maintain a ceasefire in Gaza.

February 27, 2013: Egypt Govt Deficit Soars In 7 Months To End-January – MENA’

Egypt's government deficit rose by more than a third in the seven months to the end of January from the same period a year earlier, state media reported. Two years of political turmoil has battered state finances by driving away foreign investors and tourists, and a sharp fall in the Egyptian pound has pushed up the cost of subsidies for imported energy and food. The deficit hit 119.8 billion Egyptian pounds ($17.8 billion) in the first seven months of the fiscal year, which begins in July, compared with 88.2 billion a year earlier, the state news agency MENA said. Citing a finance ministry report, it said the figure equaled 6.7 percent of annual gross domestic product (GDP). In a revised economic reform plan, the government said it is targeting a deficit for the whole financial year to June of 189.7 billion pounds, or about 10.9 percent of total economic output. However, this factored in economic reforms and it forecast the deficit would hit 12.3 percent of GDP without action. Egypt has said it will reopen negotiations early next month on a $4.8 billion loan from the International Monetary Fund to bolster its finances. Foreign currency reserves have also fallen to critical levels.

February 27, 2013: Egypt Govt Approves Law Allowing Islamic Bond Issues’

The Egyptian government approved a draft law on Wednesday that will allow the state to issue Islamic bonds, or sukuk, a move that could help narrow a gaping budget deficit and boost foreign currency reserves that have fallen to critically low levels. Finance Minister Al -Mursi Al-Sayed Hegazy said Egypt could raise around $10 billion a year from the sukuk market - much more than some analysts expect - but added that it would take at least three months to push through the necessary regulations.

Shaped by Egypt's first Islamist-led administration, the law will also allow private borrowers to issue sukuk. Egypt has never before issued bonds that adhere to Islamic principles, under which the payment of interest is impermissible. The law will be referred to the Islamist -dominated upper house of parliament before final approval from President Mohamed Mursi. An earlier version of the sukuk law had been criticized by Islamic scholars, forcing a rethink. With the Mursi administration facing a deep economic crisis, the issuance of Islamic bonds could provide some financial support as parliamentary elections approach. The voting is set to begin in late April and stretch into late June.

Fitch Ratings said on Wednesday the timing meant conclusion of an agreement with the International Monetary Fund on a $4.8 billion loan could be pushed back well into the third quarter. Foreign reserves have fallen to $13.6 billion - less than the $15 billion needed to cover three months worth of imports - and the deficit is forecast to hit 12.3 percent of GDP by the end of June unless economic reforms are implemented. The deficit rose by more than a third in the seven months to the end of January from the same period a year earlier, figures released on Wednesday showed. Hegazy, an expert on Islamic finance appointed earlier this year, said in January that the Islamic Development Bank, a multilateral institution, could be ready to buy around $6 billion of sukuk. He did not make clear on Wednesday whether the $10 billion annual figure referred to state issues alone, or included amounts he expected to be raised by private borrowers.

IT'S "TOTAL HYPE": Others are less optimistic. "There is a total hype over the issue. It is a minor issue that might contribute funding of 10 to 15 percent of Egypt's needs," said Osama Mourad, a financial and capital markets expert. "The problem is not with the instruments but with the general investment appetite towards Egypt in times of confusion." The economy has been hit by unrest that has driven away tourists and investors, and the Egyptian pound has lost 8.2 percent against the dollar since the end of last year. The government has said it will resume talks with the IMF next month on a loan that would unlock billions of dollars more of financial support from foreign states and international bodies. But an IMF agreement will also imply austerity measures.

Fitch Ratings said it had expected a deal in the second quarter. "But voting is now set to continue until late June, shortly before the start of Ramadan and the summer holiday season," it said. "This need not hold up negotiations, but finalizing a program would probably be more straightforward after contested elections that produced a government with a clear mandate to conclude a deal." Egypt reached an initial agreement on the loan in November but postponed final ratification following political unrest in Cairo, which led the government to put off tax increases needed to rein in the deficit. In a summary of its new plans for the economy released this week, the government said it aimed to increase the foreign currency reserves to $19 billion by the end of June. But it did not say how. The plan will form the basis of talks with the IMF. The government, in a statement released on Wednesday, described the plan as "much more gradual" than previous proposals. It said the reforms would be spread over a longer time frame, the impact of some of them would reduced while others were entirely dismissed. But it gave no details.

February 27, 2013: Factories Struggle In Egypt As Costs, Risks Rise’

The blue steel gates of Abu al-Makarim factory, once busy with staff carrying Egyptian carpets for export, are now rust-encrusted and bolted shut after worker strikes and financial problems forced the plant out of business eight months ago. The abandoned facility in Madinat Elsadat, near Cairo, is one of thousands that have fallen victim to the instability of post-revolution Egypt. Many that remain open are plagued by power cuts, strikes, poor security, and difficulty securing loans in credit markets where they are squeezed out by an indebted government.

The plight of Egypt's industrialists points to the wide range of ways which the economic environment has deteriorated in the two years since Hosni Mubarak was toppled. Because of endemic political conflict, foreign investment has shrunk and foreign currency reserves have slid to critically low levels as President Mohamed Mursi's Muslim Brotherhood prepares for parliamentary elections starting in late April. At Madinat Elsadat, 75 of the 525 factories that once operated in the complex have shut down since the revolution, according to a report by the Centre for Trade Union & Worker Services. Up to half of the factories are struggling.

Countrywide, the report estimates over 4,500 factories have shut since the revolution, swelling by hundreds of thousands the ranks of unemployed in a nation where two-fifths of the people live on or around the poverty line. The unemployment rate is around 13 percent, according to official data, but private analysts believe the actual rate is much higher.

The Abu al-Makarim Group, which had employed more than 4,000 workers at seven factories, had been struggling even before the uprising against Mubarak erupted in January 2011. The wave of industrial action that ensued was the final nail in its coffin. "There were strikes, asking for raises. Each day cost hundreds of thousands," said Hassan Abu al - Makarim, who ran the company before the revolution. "There was also a shortage in financing to buy material." It is a complaint echoed by many other businessmen. The government is borrowing heavily to finance a budget deficit forecast to hit 10 percent of national output this fiscal year. That is soaking up the money available to industry. The risks of doing business are heightened by a security vacuum which the police have been unwilling or unable to fill since Mubarak's rule ended.

In Madinat El-Sadat, set up in the 1980s to shift population out of Cairo, police are few and far between. Gangs intercept shipments and steal goods on their way out of the industrial area. "Some investors closed up and left because of the lack of security and stability," said Ahmad Shaheen, owner of a facility where fruit and vegetables are stored and frozen for export. He said his clients had in many cases hired armed guards to protect trucks during transit to and from the depot. For some business owners, the security risks come from their own employees. Workers at one Madinat Elsadat clothing factory detained the owner overnight after salary payments were delayed for two months, said Abdulaziz Ghaslan, who used to work there. "There is no control over workers anymore. They were under a lot of pressure before the revolution so when everything became so loose, they became people who do not want to be controlled, asking for their rights," he said. Ghaslan lost his job at the factory following work stoppages. Workers demanding better salaries barricaded the gates of their cement factory with concrete blocks during one recent burst of industrial action.

RISING COSTS: In some ways, the revolution still promises to benefit industrialists. By sweeping away some of the entrenched business interests and corruption that surrounded Mubarak, it offers new freedom and opportunities to investors. The slide in the Egyptian pound, down about 8 percent since late December to record lows against the U.S. dollar, is a boon to some exporters. Egyptian investment firm Citadel Capital, which owns stakes in companies which export over $300 million a year in various industries including food, says it is profiting. "Currency devaluation is affecting our business positively. If you are investing in an exporter or import substitute, then you'll benefit," Citadel founder and chairman Ahmed Heikal told Reuters, predicting that exports would rise substantially.

But many or most Egyptian companies feel they are in no position to take advantage of the positive changes because the operating environment is so poor. Energy shortages, for example, have resulted in gas supplies being diverted from businesses to the national pipeline: factories that depend on gas to function have either cut back their output or shut down altogether. The cost of subsidizing imported fuels sold by the state below market prices is becoming unsustainable for the government, and this is creating further uncertainty. Last week, the government announced a 50 percent increase in the price of fuels used by some industries, triggering protests by brick factory workers whose sector was one of those affected.

In coming months the government hopes to secure a $4.8 billion loan from the International Monetary Fund, easing the financial pressures on it, but to obtain the deal it is expected to have to commit to further subsidy cuts. Foreign investors were excited by the opportunities that Egypt had to offer just after Mubarak was toppled, said Mohamed Talaat Khalifa, a financial analyst. Would-be investors now list concerns about everything from logistics to security: some are postponing projects until the situation is clearer, he said. "There are problems with shipping, problems with the logistics and even security in transporting goods from the factory to the port," he said. As a result, insurance premiums and other costs have risen to levels where projects may no longer be economically viable. "They're definitely eager to invest in Egypt. Just as the Gulf has oil, Egypt's oil is its people...but there cannot be an appetite unless there is stability."

February 28, 2013: Egypt To Invite IMF Team For Loan Talks’

Egypt will invite the IMF on Thursday to reopen negotiations on a $4.8 billion loan, state newspaper al-Ahram reported, and the investment minister expressed hope that a deal could be done by the end of April. International Monetary Fund support is seen as crucial to help ease an economic crisis rooted in two years of political turmoil that has depleted foreign currency reserves to critically low levels. Egypt reached an initial agreement on the loan in November but postponed final ratification following political unrest in Cairo, which led the government to put off tax increases needed to rein in the budget deficit. "Today, a formal invitation will be sent to the technical delegation of the International Monetary Fund to come to Cairo to negotiate over the $4.8 billion loan to Egypt," Planning and International Cooperation Minister Ashraf al-Araby said in remarks reported by the state-run al-Ahram newspaper. On its website, the paper also "ed him as saying he expected the delegation to arrive in Cairo "within 10 days". Separately, Investment Minister Osama Saleh told journalists he expected the deal to be concluded by the end of April. "We have hope, God willing, that we can, by the end of April complete the loan," he said. Saleh added that much of the work was done last year and recent changes to the government's economic reform program amounted to "light amendments". But April is sooner than many economists believe possible, with parliamentary elections due to begin in late that month and go on until late June. They believe the Muslim Brotherhood-led administration will be reluctant to conclude a deal including austerity measures ahead of the vote. Fitch Ratings said on Wednesday the extended election timetable could delay the agreement until well into the third quarter. It had previously expected a deal in Q2.

MUFTI SAYS IMF BORROWING IS OKAY IN ISLAM: Egypt's foreign currency reserves fell to $13.6 billion in January, less than the $15 billion needed to cover three months' worth of imports to the country of 84 million people. Foreign exchange reserve figures for February are expected next week. The budget deficit is meanwhile forecast to hit 12.3 percent of GDP by end-June unless economic reforms are implemented. • Political unrest has caused the Egyptian pound to tumble 8.2 percent against the dollar since the end of last year, and the central bank is rationing the amount of dollars it sells to banks, prioritizing hard currency for essential food imports.

In a summary of its new plans for the economy released this week, the government said it aimed to increase the foreign currency reserves to $19 billion by the end of June, but did not say how. The plan will form the basis of talks with the IMF. Assuming the government can conclude a quick agreement with the Fund, the deal may face other complications. The Nour Party, Egypt's main hardline Islamist group, has said any deal must be approved by a body of senior scholars at Al -Azhar, a religious institution which should be consulted on matters related to Islamic law according to a new constitution. Outgoing Grand Mufti Ali Gomaa said Islamic law had no problem with borrowing from the Fund, even though payment of interest on loans is deemed impermissible in Islam. Gomaa said any funds would amount to "financing", not "a loan". "Calling it 'a loan' is wrong because we are partners in this bank and it is giving us this money in the manner of finance," he told Al Masry Al Youm, a daily newspaper.

February 28, 2013: Exclusive - Egypt Reconsiders Wheat Tender System In Funding Crunch-banks' Funding problems are forcing top world wheat buyer Egypt to consider abandoning its regular public tenders that have been a centerpiece of world grain trade for decades. Egypt's state grains buyer General Authority for Supply Commodities, (GASC), is exploring options beyond systematic tenders to secure future needs, banks involved in commodity trade finance for the country said. Imports to the north African country are sharply down this year, with strategic stocks falling as it endures economic and political crisis, but state and private buyers insist they have funds to keep the nation supplied with its staple bread. Falling currency reserves are hindering GASC's ability to buy wheat in a timely manner, banks said. GASC, which last week saw its influential head Nomani Nomani step aside, declined to comment. "Very clearly people are looking for alternatives because the classic route of letters of credit or cash against documents are not working as they were," said Fehmi Hannachi, head of commodity finance for Middle East and North Africa at ABC International Bank plc and board member of ABC Egypt. Karel Valken, global head of trade and commodity finance at Rabobank, said: "Letters of credit are not working to the satisfaction of all parties. It's definitely restricting the volumes and the timely arrivals of wheat and undoubtedly it's having an impact on the price. Consequently all the parties involved are looking at different ways to mitigate these issues." Egypt normally buys strategically to ensure it has wheat stocks equal to at least six months' consumption in its silos. By contrast, the government said on Wednesday that it has stocks to last until May 29, or just three months.

GASC tenders are watched avidly by international wheat traders and without them world markets would lose a vital window of transparency. Banks said trade houses were exploring options outside of GASC's current sourcing strategy, including private deals. "GASC's main objective is to feed the Egyptian population in the most cost effective way and if that means for them to go out of tender terms and do a private deal they will undoubtedly do that," said Valken. When GASC awards a tender the company selling the wheat typically asks for the issuance of an Egyptian state bank letter of credit, which is then confirmed with its own bank. A recent development has been a requirement for GASC to post cash with Egyptian banks which serves as security for the banks confirming the letters of credit on behalf of sellers. "This flow is still working, it's just becoming more difficult because of amongst other things the (country's situation with) FX reserves and consequently GASC's access to cash and credit with its own banks," said Valken. "It is definitely delaying the purchases and it's more expensive. The costs for them of importing wheat have risen due to a combination of demurrage costs and financing." Demurrage charges are incurred when a ship is delayed.

FINANCING OPTIONS: The Egyptian pound has fallen more than 8 percent since the start of January, and foreign currency reserves have tumbled to $13.6 billion in January from $36 billion before the 2011 fall of former president Hosni Mubarak. The pound's drop is putting a heavy strain on the government budget as it has pushed up the cost of state subsidies on energy and food, much of which is purchased in dollars. ABC's Hannachi said the crisis meant other options for wheat procurement were being explored. "A lot of operators abroad and local Egyptian importers are questioning the method because you open a tender which is pricing driven, but on the other side those providing the most competitive prices are not necessarily the most flexible suppliers in terms of financing," he said.

Importers are trying to find mechanisms with their suppliers to import the goods to Egypt, building stock locally to release progressively, to avoid the situation of having to pay for everything in one shot. "You could supply sugar or wheat by building stock in Egypt and only release it against partial payments based on the availability of hard currency," Hannachi added. Rabobank's Valken saw room for more structured finance in different forms to facilitate banks, grain traders and GASC. "Trade is desperately looking at alternative structures because GASC continues to be the single largest wheat buyer globally. People definitely need wheat and the government needs to put enough foreign reserves aside to make imports possible," said Valken. Egypt imports about half the 18.8 million tons of wheat it consumes a year, with business split roughly evenly between private importers and GASC. The U.S. Department of Agriculture had estimated Egypt's imports at 9.5 million tons in 2012/13. GASC has bought 235,000 tons of wheat since Jan. 1, about a third of what it purchased in the same period a year earlier. Regular participants in recent tenders include Archer Daniels Midland -controlled Toepfer, Bunge, Cargill, Louis Dreyfus, along with Egyptian traders Alex Grain and Venus.

February 28, 2013: Insight: Egypt's Army Tiptoes Through Democracy's Minefield’

As cities along the Suez Canal erupted in violence in late January, the leader of Egypt's armed forces feared for the future of the fledgling democracy. General Abdel Fattah Sisi told the elected president, Mohamed Mursi, that the situation was critical, according to Egyptian security sources familiar with the events. "The military leadership advised the president that national security was threatened following the chaos and vandalism that befell the cities of Suez and Port Said," a security source with links to the military told Reuters. The two men discussed ways to contain the unrest along the Canal, which is vital to Egypt and global trade, agreeing the army could not stand by and let the turmoil spread. Early on Saturday January 26 troops deployed in the riot-torn cities: in Suez armored vehicles arrived to protect government buildings. Mursi announced a night-time curfew in the towns. It was a telling moment in Egypt's struggle to establish a real democracy. When popular uprisings overthrew the former regime of Hosni Mubarak two years ago, the army, which had played a central role in the state for decades, determined to stand back as political parties vied for power. Many analysts believe that after Mursi was elected in June 2012, he and the military came to an understanding: the new Islamist government would not interfere in the army's interests, nor seek to change its long-standing vision of national security, while the military would give qualified support to Mursi and his backers in the Muslim Brotherhood.

But that deal has limits, as Egyptians are discovering. The army felt compelled to intervene to quell the January riots, according to security sources, though they were at pains to say it did not do so unilaterally. "The president and the national defense council made the decision to impose the state of emergency and a curfew until the situation stabilizes," said the security source with links to the military. Security and political sources told Reuters that Sisi, the defense minister, also privately urged political leaders to set aside their differences in the face of a social and financial crisis. Though the armed forces say they want to remain neutral, they believe they cannot ignore the situation on the streets. "We are not political, we don't want to participate in the political situation because we suffered a lot because of this in the last six months," Major General Sediki Sobhi, the army chief of staff, told Reuters at an industry event in Abu Dhabi. "But sometimes we can help in this problem, we can play this role if the situation became more complicated." As Egypt heads towards new parliamentary elections beginning on April 22, and as the Muslim Brotherhood and the military eye each other closely, Mursi finds himself caught in the middle. Essam Haddad, Mursi's aide on foreign affairs, told Reuters that the relationship between the armed forces and the presidency had "been developing in a very positive direction." Nevertheless, there has been recent speculation in Egyptian media and on social networking sites of tensions between Brotherhood members and the military. Haddad blamed the Egyptian media for creating "a sort of a gap, an artificial gap, an artificial misunderstanding ... If you follow some of the Egyptian media, you will find some unprecedented claims of a military coup coming."

FATAL FOOTBALL: An unfortunate confluence of events brought popular unrest to the boil in late January. As the country headed towards the second anniversary of its revolution, opponents of Mursi stepped up protests. At the same time a court was preparing to deliver verdicts on police, officials and other suspects charged with murder after 74 people died during a stampede at a football stadium in Port Said last year. It was a combustible mix. When judges in the football case sentenced 21 people to death, fury erupted in Port Said. As street protests left at least 32 people dead, the army moved in. General Osama Askar, commander of the third army division in Suez, said at the time: "This is an emergency deployment to assist the police ... this is not the army's role but we are assisting the police force in imposing law and order for now."

Behind the scenes Sisi, a former head of military intelligence, went further than merely assisting the police. On January 28, according to security sources, he spoke to Mursi's political rivals in the National Salvation Front: Mohamed ElBaradei, former head of the U.N. nuclear agency: Hamdeen Sabahy, seen by some as a leftist firebrand: and Amr Moussa, a former chief of the Arab League. Sisi treated each of the politicians with friendliness and respect, said security sources, but made his point clear: chaos in the Suez cities endangered the Canal and threatened the stability of the state. He told the political leaders they must compromise over their differences.

"The country was facing a political stalemate that had to be ended to prevent a downward spiral of events. Now is not the time to dissolve a newly elected state institution (the presidency)," said the security source with links to the military. To ram the point home, Sisi went public with his message the next day, warning that political unrest was pushing the state to the brink of collapse. The military leadership also played a role in bringing political leaders together two days later, under the auspices of the head of the venerable Azhar university. The party leaders met and signed a document renouncing violence. In a continuation of a system operated by Mubarak, the new Islamist government has agreed that decisions on the military budget will continue to be discussed in the national defense council, not parliament. In the council - which includes the president, parliament speaker and military leaders - security officials have the upper hand over civilian members. The government has also guaranteed the armed forces control over provinces along the border with Israel and along the Suez Canal, according to a Muslim Brotherhood source. Egyptian authorities announced at the end of January that shipping fees for the Canal would rise between two and five percent from May 1. The waterway is an important source of funds for the country and for the military, generating revenue of about $5 billion a year in hard currency.

'ALLIANCE OF CONVENIENCE' On February 3, Sisi dined in private with Mursi at the president's home near Cairo. The army chief acknowledges the prestige of Mursi's position as president, said two security sources. At the same time, Mursi respects Sisi, according to the president's office, army officials and the Muslim Brotherhood source. At 59, Sisi is the youngest member of the government's military council made up of commanders from various branches of the armed forces. "Generally, the alliance of convenience was that the Brotherhood would respect the military's autonomy, and that would include their economic position in the country, and in return the military would give up its opposition to Brotherhood rule," said Shadi Hamid, director of research at the Brookings Doha Centre, a think-tank based in the Gulf. At present there seem few other options, said Hamid. "It's not as if there's a more stable alternative to Brotherhood rule right now or in the foreseeable future. I see no reason for the military to reduce its support for the Brotherhood or to undermine the Mursi government right now." In Hamid's view, the street protests are a "generalized expression of anger over the status quo" but it is unclear whether they will translate into significant electoral support for Mursi's opponents. This week an alliance of opposition parties said they would boycott the parliamentary elections.

Some foreign powers appear to take the view that amid uncertain political times Egypt's armed forces remain a constant. On February 5, then U.S. Defense Secretary Leon Panetta spoke to Sisi about the political situation in Egypt, discussing the "importance of continued security assistance for Egypt so that the Egyptian armed forces can continue to address shared security objectives while modernizing their equipment and capabilities," according to a statement issued by the Pentagon. Egypt's military has worried that political instability might be used as an excuse by other countries to cut aid: some members of the U.S. Congress had tried to block a deal, agreed when Mubarak was in power, to give Egypt F-16 fighters. But U.S. and Egyptian officials announced this month that the U.S. had gone ahead with delivery of four F-16 fighter jets as part of their continuing co-operation. An Egyptian military official told Reuters: "The military leadership has told the American counterparts that the armed forces is a national institution and has nothing to do with politics ... and that supplying the Egyptian army with weapons is the strongest strategic link between Egypt and the United States."

February 28, 2013: Retrial of Egypt's Hosni Mubarak set for April, 13 - AP

Egypt's ousted President Hosni Mubarak will face a new trial beginning April 13 on charges related to the killings of protesters during the uprising against him, a court ruled Sunday. Mubarak and his former interior minister were sentenced to life in prison in June for failing to prevent the killing of protesters during the 18-day revolution in 2011 that ended his 29-year rule. In January, an appeals court overturned the sentences and ordered a retrial. Mohammed Hosni Mubarak, 84, has been in detention since April 2011 and is currently being held in a military hospital. It is seen unlikely that he will be freed before his retrial. The ruling ordering a retrial raised public anger over what was seen as a shoddy prosecution case. Critics believed Mubarak should have been convicted for directly ordering the deadly crackdown and sentenced to death. The issue of the revolution's dead is a sensitive one in Egypt, with the families of the victims demanding retribution and compensation. Mubarak's successor, Mohammed Morsi, promised during his election campaign that he would order retrials for former regime officials if new evidence was discovered. A retrial could help resolve unanswered questions over who ordered the crackdown and who executed it. Most of security officials on separate trials for the killings of protesters were acquitted.

In January, the appeals court ruled that during Mubarak's first trial, the prosecution's case lacked concrete evidence and failed to prove the protesters were killed by the police, indirectly giving credence to the testimony of top Mubarak-era officials that "foreigners" and others were behind the killings between Jan. 25 and Feb. 1, 2011. Critics scoffed at those charges, blaming Mubarak's police and sympathizers. Authors of a recently concluded confidential report by a fact-finding mission appointed by Morsi say they have established the use of deadly firearms by the police against protesters. Judge Samir Aboul-Maati said the retrial before a criminal court will also include six other senior security officials who were acquitted in the first trial. Also include Mubarak's two sons and a business associate will be retried on corruption charges. The sons, onetime heir apparent at a fraction of its market value. The business associate, Hussein Salem, was tried in absentia. He is currently in Spain.

Gamal and wealthy businessman Alaa, are in jail while on trial for insider trading and using their influence to buy state land

May 25, 2013: Mohammed Morsi underlines 'agreement' with Ethiopia over controversial GERD' Speaking on a number of issues at the AU summit, President Morsi batted away concerns about the Ethiopian Nile dam project. Egyptian President Mohamed Morsi said on Saturday that he had made an agreement with Ethiopia's Prime Minister Hailemariam Desalegn that both countries' interests would be addressed during the building of the 'Renaissance Dam' in Ethiopia, which many some experts argue will reduce Egypt's share of the Nile's potable water. Speaking to Egyptians in Ethiopia's capital Addis Ababa, where he is currently attending the 21st African Union summit, Morsi stated that there is a committee of experts from both countries that will scrutinize all the details and possible ramifications of the controversial dam. Morsi also made some optimistic statements concerning the future of the Egypt, saying that the country had left behind dictatorships, repression and corruption, in reference to the Mubarak regime. "Egypt is on the right track to democratic transition," he said. "What will take Egypt to prosperity and development is work, awareness, and production." "There are many citizens who work hard silently in all sectors to build this nation, including 17 million citizens in the private sector, six million in the public sector and six million farmers who are working in fields to provide the Egyptian people with a harvest and with food," the Islamist president added.

Suez Canal project 'will lead to turnaround: Morsi went on to speak about the government's contentious Suez Canal Corridor (SCC) project, saying it would lead to a turnaround in the country's fortunes. The SCC project, which will be operated through public-private partnerships, aims to develop Egypt's three canal governorates – Suez, Ismailia and Port Said – by 2017. The project represents a major component of President Morsi's 'renaissance' electoral program. "[The project] will attract local, Arab and foreign investments," Morsi said. Critics of the proposed legislation regulating the project say it will place the Suez Canal outside Egyptian sovereignty and grant investors substantial facilities without offering any returns to workers or the economy.

Rebel campaign ‘undemocratic: Commenting on the ‘Rebel’ campaign, which aims at "withdrawing confidence" from the Islamist president, Morsi said that those involved in the signature drive should not forget the principle of democracy that the majority choose the president. "Some people say that I barely got 52 percent of the votes in [last year's] presidential elections [after beating runner up Ahmed Shafiq in the second round], but legally and constitutionally speaking I am the legitimate president." "Everyone must accept the result of the democratic way, so we do not lose time and miss out on many chances as a result of disagreements." Campaigners holding posters bearing the word 'Rebel' ('tamarrud' in Arabic) have become a common sight in Cairo's streets and squares in recent days, as have the sight of citizens holding their national identity cards and filling out the forms heeding the campaigners' calls. The campaign aims to gather 15 million signatures to pressure Morsi into calling early presidential elections. Organizers claimed at the start of the week to have 3 million signatures so far. Source: ahramonline.

NILE: Egypt should cooperate with Ethiopia as sign of apology for ignored relations during Mubarak's era' (Translated from Arabic to English using Google Translator)

ST (June 14, 2014) - Well known former member of Egypt Parliament Abul Ezz Hariri leader of party People's Alliance says the expected visit of President-elect Abdel Fattah al-Sisi to Addis Ababa in two weeks to resolve the crisis Dam Renaissance is a good idea to restore the role of Egypt Regional area of the Nile Basin countries, especially Ethiopia. Hariri said in a statement to "veto," that this visit would put solutions to the crisis of the dam, by initiating projects aimed at economic integration between the two parties.

The former former parliamentarian demanded that during the trip to Ethiopia Sisi should be accompanied by a number of experts and consultants. He also suggested specialists offer a number of cooperative projects between the two sides which are mutually beneficial for both Egypt and Ethiopia. This gestures are equivalent (tantamount) to an apology from Egypt to Ethiopia for what has happened during the era of former President Mubarak such as ignored in relations and cooperation.

Prime Minister Ibrahim Mahlab, should quickly learn projects submitted to them by some specialists on the crisis and try to solve the crisis. Among these projects one of them is made by Dr Ahmed Shenawi, an expert on water. Ethiopia can generate electricity from the Renaissance Dam and at the same time maintain its share of the waters of Egypt, and reduce the risk of construction of the dam in addition to the cost of its operation does not exceed 20% of the cost of construction of the dam. (Text ends)

Ethiopia sees Egyptian change of heart over Nile dam’

Sudan Tribune (June 15, 2014) - ADDIS ABABA – Ethiopia on Thursday commended Egypt's unprecedented and an official decision to peacefully resolve a long-standing dispute with Addis Ababa over a controversial power plant project known as the Grand Ethiopian Renaissance Dam (GERD). "Ethiopia strongly welcomes Egypt's interest to re-launch talk over the GERD and solve the problem through dialogue," spokesperson for Ethiopia Ministry of Foreign Affairs, Ambassador Dina Mufti told journalists.

"Egypt has no other option except dialogue and win-win negotiation to find a solution that is acceptable by both sides," he added. Egypt's newly elected president, Abdel Fattah al-Sisi, has recently pledged to resolve the water dispute with Ethiopia through dialogue. Ethiopian officials said that al-Sisi is expected to pay an official visit to Ethiopia soon probably making it his first trip to a foreign nation since he assumed office in June 8. Ethiopian foreign minister Tedros Adhanom, who attended the new president's inaugural ceremony in Cairo, has held meeting with al -Sisi and other high ranking officials over the multi-billion dollar power plant project.

During their discussion Adhanom has reaffirmed Ethiopia's commitment for cooperation with Egypt based on mutual trust and confidence. Al-Sisi and Adhanom have also agreed to reactivate the tripartite technical dialogue between Sudan, Egypt and Ethiopia and harmonise existing differences by high-level political consultations. Addis Ababa insists the $ 4.6 billion dam project won't adversely affect Egypt and Sudan instead the downstream countries will be benefited from the cheap and renewable hydro power processed electricity it generates. Egypt considers the massive dam project, as a threat to its water security arguing it will eventually diminish its water share.

SUDAN REAFFIRMS SUPPORT: Meanwhile, Sudanese vice-president Bakri Hassan Saleh has reaffirmed his country's commitment to the dam project which Ethiopia is building in Nile river near the Sudanese border. Saleh who was in Addis Ababa earlier this week to attend a regional summit of the Inter-Governmental Authority on Development (IGAD) made the remarks while holding talks Ethiopian Prime Minister Hailemariam Desalegn. "Sudan will derive multiple benefits from the Grand Ethiopian Renaissance Dam project," Saleh said according to the state-run Ethiopian Radio and Television Agency (ERTA).

SOUTH SUDAN CRISIS: Saleh and Desalegn have also consulted on the six-month-long conflict in South Sudan. While commending Ethiopia's role to peacefully end the conflict in neighbouring South Sudan, Saleh called on Addis Ababa to continue exerting maximum efforts to bring lasting solution. Desalegn has also assured his country would remain committed to end the political crises in the youngest nation. “Ethiopia will continue to put pressure on the South Sudanese rivals through all channels available,” the Ethiopian premier said.

On Tuesday, rival leaders of the two SPLM rival factions, President Salva Kiir and rebel leader Riek Machar agreed to end fighting and form a unity government within two months. At a news conference on Friday, spokesperson for the Ethiopian foreign ministry Dina Mufti said IGAD-member countries have been frustrated by the failure of previous deals. He however went on to saying that the regional bloc mediating the two warring factions won’t hesitate to take action if the two sides once again violate the latest agreements. He added that a peacekeeping force drawn from Ethiopia, Uganda and Kenya will be deployed to end the conflict which has killed thousands since violence erupted in mid-December last year. (Text ends)

NILE POLITICS: Egypt to participate in NBI meeting, despite announcing it has frozen membership’ Egypt Independent (June 19, 2014) - A delegation headed by Ahmed Bahaa Eddin, left Cairo heading to Khartoum, Wednesday, to participate in the 22nd meeting of the Council of Ministers of the Nile Basin countries, held under the framework of the Basin Countries Initiative. Egypt has dispatched the delegation despite announcing it has frozen its initiative membership.

A delegation member said before departure that although Egypt has frozen its membership in the Nile Basin Initiative due to differences with Basin countries over Entebbe agreement, Egypt is keen to participate in the meeting. Egypt believes that the Entebbe agreement is incomplete as other Nile headwaters countries have signed the agreement individually, the official added.

Ministers of water resources of Sudan, South Sudan, Ethiopia, Uganda, Rwanda, Burundi, the Democratic Republic of Congo, Kenya and Tanzania will take part in the meeting which aims to discuss means of coordination and cooperation between the Nile Basin countries through development projects.

NILE POLITICS: Egypt and Ethiopia agree on tripartite dam committee will resume its work’

Ahram Online (June 27, 2014) - Egypt President Abdel Fattah al-Sisi talks to Ethiopian Prime Minister Hailemariam Desalegn as they arrive to attend the 23rd African Union Summit (AUS) in Malabo June 26, 2014. The Egyptian foreign minister along with his Ethiopian counterpart stressed that Ethiopia will understand the importance of the Nile River to Egypt and that Egypt will understand the Ethiopian need for development. Egypt and Ethiopia will form a joint committee in the upcoming three months to enhance bilateral relations between the two countries, the foreign ministers of both countries announced in a joint statement on Friday. The statement came after Egypt`s new president, Abdel-Fattah El-Sisi, met with the Ethiopian Prime Minister, Hailemariam Desalegn, after the African Union summit in Equatorial Guinea's capital Malabo.

According to the statement, the Ethiopian government is committed to avoid any potential damage that could result from the Grand Renaissance dam currently being built on the Blue Nile in Ethiopia. Sameh Shoukry, the Egyptian foreign minister, along with his Ethiopian counterpart Tedros Adhanom, stressed in the statement that Ethiopia will understand the importance of the Nile to Egypt: and that Egypt will understand the Ethiopian plans and need for development. The two ministers cited seven main points that El-Sisi and Desalegn discussed during the meeting, including respecting the dialogue and cooperation between the two countries, and the establishment of regional projects for the development of financial resources to meet the growing demand for water and to deal with water shortages. The Egyptian government is committed to constructive communication with Ethiopia.

The Ethiopian dam has been a source of concern for the Egyptian government since May last year, when images of the dam's construction stirred public anxiety about its possible effects on Egypt's share of the Nile's water. However, Ethiopian officials insisted the dam would not harm Egypt. Egypt, Ethiopia and Sudan formed a tripartite technical committee to study the possible effects of the dam. But the committee's discussions were halted last December when Sudanese President Omar Al - Bashir announced his support for the dam during a meeting with Ethiopian Prime Minister Hailemariam Desalegn. Resuming the work of the tripartite technical committee and respecting international legal principles were also among the points on which both sides had reached common ground. Egypt has demanded that Ethiopia submit the dam’s construction plans for assessment by international experts. Ethiopian Irrigation Minister Alamayo Tegno said his country was already committed to the recommendations of an international committee of experts.

NILE POLITICS: Egypt cautiously optimistic on coming Renaissance Dam talks'

Al Monitor, CAIRO (July 9, 2014) — In a state of cautious optimism, the Egyptian authorities dealing with the Nile waters file have begun to prepare for the return of technical negotiations with Ethiopia concerning the Renaissance Dam and the two countries' use of the Nile. This comes after HYPERLINK "http://www.al-monitor.com/pulse/originals/2014/01/egypt-ethiopia-renaissance-dam-negotiations-dead-end.html" negotiations ended last January and Cairo took the course of international escalation to protect its interests in the Nile.

Egypt and Ethiopia are returning to the negotiating table again, following the meeting between President Abdel Fattah al-Sisi and Ethiopian Prime Minister Hailemariam Desalegn at the African Union Summit in Equatorial Guinea on June 26. In this meeting, the two sides agreed on seven key principles that specify the two countries' uses of Nile water, in the framework of mutual benefit and avoiding harm.

According to the seven principles that were announced by the Egyptian and Ethiopian foreign ministers in a joint statement on June 27 — of which Al-Monitor obtained a copy — the negotiations must be based on respect for international law, prioritizing the establishment of regional projects to develop water resources to meet increasing demands, respect for the results of technical studies concerning the impact of the Renaissance Dam and a commitment on the part of the Ethiopian government to avoid any harm to Egypt's water use.

Speaking to Al-Monitor by phone, Egyptian Minister of Water Resources and Irrigation Hossam Moghazy said, "Preparations are currently underway for a tripartite meeting that will include Sudan, Ethiopia and Egypt to revive negotiations again in Cairo in the second half of July 2014."

Moghazy expressed optimism about the return of technical negotiations, adding, "The joint statement will impose an atmosphere of tranquility and a positive spirit throughout the negotiations, following the state of tension that existed previously."

However, the minister acknowledged that they would not rely on the results of the previous negotiations, which began in November 2013, following the issuance of a report by the HYPERLINK "http://www.al-monitor.com/pulse/originals/2014/04/egypt-ethiopia-renaissance-dam-dispute-leaked-report.html" International Panel of HYPERLINK "http://www.al-monitor.com/pulse/originals/2014/04/egypt-ethiopia-renaissance-dam-dispute-leaked-report.html" Experts (IPE) on the effects of the Renaissance Dam. The report confirmed some technical problems in the dam's design as well as harmful effects on water security in Egypt.

“Of course, we will benefit from [what has been done] previously, but we will deal with the issue with calm,” he said, adding, “The first meeting will be preparatory and we will not discuss technical issues relating to the Renaissance Dam. We will agree to establishing a mechanism for dialogue and discuss the method of action in the event of a dispute, as well as choosing technical experts.”

Moghazy cited Cairo’s interest in the continuation of political action in all countries of the Nile Basin. “In the coming period, there will be many official visits to the Nile Basin countries, in especially Tanzania and South Sudan,” he added.

The HYPERLINK "http://www.shorouknews.com/news/view.aspx?cdate=06072014&id=a57d3295-b006-4a87-9ebf-a314448fcf9a" Supreme Committee for the Nile Waters, headed by Egyptian Prime Minister Ibrahim Mehleb, met on July 6 to discuss the results of the meeting between Sisi and the Ethiopian prime minister, the mechanisms for implementing the Egyptian-Ethiopian joint statement and to agree on Egypt’s vision for managing the file after the policy of appeasement and dialogue took effect.

An Egyptian governmental source who is well informed on the Nile Basin file told Al-Monitor, “We realize that the negotiations with Ethiopia will not be easy, especially since all negotiating cards are now known by the other side. Ethiopia realizes the extent of Egypt’s objections to building the dam, and Egypt is aware of Ethiopia’s insistence on building the dam according to the previously announced specifications.”

“We await the start of negotiations in a state of cautious optimism. We had many previous experiences [in this regard], but they did not end in an agreement,” he added.

Al-Monitor spoke with Mahmoud Abu Zeid, Egypt’s former minister of water and the current head of the Arab Water Council, on this topic. “The joint statement issued after the talks between Sisi and Desalegn includes technical details related to principles for usage of the Nile waters, which can be of benefit in making the negotiations a success,” he said.

“Egypt’s previous technical positions concerning the Renaissance Dam are still open to deliberation and re-examination, but the basis [of these positions] is reaching technical and engineering solutions that minimize damage,” he added, stressing, “I don’t imagine that these dialogues will end without a substantial modification in the form or capacity of the dam.”

A technical source involved in the preparations for the meeting between Egypt, Ethiopia and Sudan told Al-Monitor, “There are a number of technical files that Cairo will focus on during the negotiations, according to the report by the IPE on the HYPERLINK "http://www.al-monitor.com/pulse/originals/2014/04/egypt-ethiopia-renaissance-dam-dispute-leaked-report.html" effects of the Renaissance Dam .”

“The most important files that Egypt will ask to be re-examined include the effect of the size of the storage lake, increasing the Renaissance Dam’s water flow to the High Dam Lake in Egypt as well as the environmental effects on Egypt,” the source added. “There are hopes that the negotiations will propose joint Egyptian-Ethiopian mechanisms for operating the dam. This will ensure Ethiopia’s interests by providing for its electricity needs and also ensure a flow of water to Egypt at annual rates corresponding to the historical rate set at 55.5 billion cubic meters.”

Despite the HYPERLINK "http://digital.ahram.org.eg/Policy.aspx?Serial=1628795" warm welcome and support expressed by political and media circles in Egypt after the issuance of the joint Egyptian-Ethiopian statement about the dispute, the statement that resulted from the negotiations between Sisi and Desalegn is not a first in the history of Egyptian-Ethiopian agreements and memorandums of understanding. These previous agreements also did not end the state of conflict over the Nile waters.

Former Egyptian President Hosni Mubarak signed a HYPERLINK "http://kenanaonline.com/users/ELstehaAveocato/posts/126862" formal cooperation HYPERLINK "http://kenanaonline.com/users/ELstehaAveocato/posts/126862" framework agreement with late Ethiopian Prime Minister Meles Zenawi in July 1993. The agreement stipulated that neither of the two countries would undertake any activity relating to the Nile waters that could harm the interests of the other and to respect international laws. However, the agreement was not implemented, because the Ethiopian parliament at the time did not ratify it.

As the convening of technical negotiations approaches later in July, Cairo is cautiously awaiting the results. Meanwhile, authorities in both countries are not giving their positions on the construction works at the Renaissance Dam site or on the possibility of suspending work there until the end of technical negotiations in anticipation of an agreement to modify some of the technical specifications for the dam. (Text ends)

Egypt – Timeline Diaries updates, and related key notes:

Circa 7000 BC - Settlement of Nile Valley begins.

Circa 3000 BC - Kingdoms of Upper and Lower Egypt unite. Successive dynasties witness flourishing trade, prosperity and the development of great cultural traditions. Writing, including hieroglyphics, is used as an instrument of state. Construction of the pyramids - around 2,500 BC - is a formidable engineering achievement.

Circa 669 BC - Assyrians from Mesopotamia conquer and rule Egypt.

525 BC – The Persian conquest.

332 BC - Alexander the Great, of ancient Macedonia, conquers Egypt, founds Alexandria. A Macedonian dynasty rules Egypt until 31 BC.

31 BC - Egypt comes under Roman rule: Queen Cleopatra commits suicide after Octavian's army defeats her forces.

642 AD - Arab conquest of Egypt

969 - Cairo established as capital.

1250-1517 - Mameluke (slave soldier) rule, characterized by great prosperity and well-ordered civic institutions.

1517 - Egypt absorbed into the Turkish Ottoman empire.

1798 - Napoleon Bonaparte's forces invade but are repelled by the British and the Turks in 1801. Egypt once more becomes part of the Ottoman empire.

1859-69 – The Suez Canal built.

1882 – The British troops take control of Egypt.

1914 - Egypt becomes a British protectorate.

1922 - Fuad I becomes King of Egypt and Egypt gains its independence.

1928 - Muslim Brotherhood founded by Hassan al-Banna.

1936 - April - Farouk succeeds his father as King of Egypt.

1948 - Egypt, Iraq, Jordan and Syria attack the new state of Israel.

1949 February - Hassan al-Banna of the Muslim Brotherhood (Ahwan Muslimeen) is assassinated.

1949 – A Committee of the Free Officers' Movement formed in clandestine.

In January, 1952 - At least 20 people are killed in anti-British riots in Cairo.

In 1952 - Coup by the Free Officers' Movement. King Farouk abdicates in favor of his infant son Ahmed Fuad II.

In 1953 - Coup leader General Muhammad Najib becomes symbolic president as Egypt is declared a republic.

In 1954 - Fellow coup leader Colonel Gamal Abdel Nasser becomes prime minister and in 1956 president, ruling unchallenged until his death in September, 1970.

In 1954 - Evacuation Treaty signed. British forces, who began a gradual withdrawal in 1936 finally leave Egypt.

In July, 1956 – President Gamal Abdel Nasser nationalizes the Suez Canal to fund the Aswan High Dam.

In October, 1956 - Tripartite Invasion of Egypt by Britain, France and Israel due to the nationalization of the Suez Canal. A ceasefire is declared in the next November.

In February, 1958 - Egypt and Syria joined to form the United Arab Republic (UAR) in the first step of their aim for Arab unity.

In 1961 - Syria withdraws from the union with Egypt, but Egypt remains known as the United Arab Republic (UAR).

In May, 1967 - Egypt, Jordan sign defense pact. Israel says it increases danger of war with Arab states.

In June, 1967 – The Six-Day War in which Israel defeats forces of Egypt, Jordan and Syria. Israel takes control of Sinai, the Golan Heights, the Gaza Strip, East Jerusalem and the West Bank.

In 1970 September – President Gamal Abdel Nasser dies of heart attack and is replaced by his Vice-President, Anwar el-Sadat.

In 1971 - Treaty of Friendship between Egypt and the Soviet Union is signed.

In 1971 - Egypt's new constitution is introduced and the country is renamed the 'Arab Republic of Egypt'.

In 1971 - The Aswan High Dam is completed. It proves to have a huge impact on irrigation, agriculture and industry in Egypt.

In October, 1973 - Egypt and Syria go to war with Israel during Israel's celebration of “Yom Kippur” to reclaim the land they lost in June 1967. Egypt begins negotiations for the return of Sinai after the war.

In June, 1975 - The Suez Canal is re-opened. It had been closed since the June, 1967 war.

In 1976 - Anwar el-Sadat ends the Treaty of Friendship with the Soviet Union.

In September, 1978 - Camp David Accords for peace with Israel are signed.

In March, 1979 - The peace treaty between Egypt and Israelis signed. Egypt is then condemned by other Arab nations and excluded Egypt from the Arab League.

In October 6, 1981 – President Anwar El-Sadat is assassinated by Jihadist army members.

A national referendum approves Air Marshal Mohammed Hosni Mubarak as the new president.

In October, 1987 - Mohammed Hosni Mubarak begins his second term.

In 1989 - Egypt rejoins the Arab League.

In October, 1993 – Mohammed Hosni Mubarak begins his third term in office after a Yes-No referendum.

In June, 1995 – President Mohammed Hosni Mubarak is the target of an assassination attempt in Addis Ababa, the Ethiopian capital, upon his arrival as guest at a summit of the Organization of African Unity (OAU).

In 1997 - Fifty-eight tourists are killed by gunmen in front of the Temple of Hatshepsut near Luxor. It is alleged that Egypt's Islamic Group (Jemaa Islamiya) is responsible.

In October, 1999 – Mohammed Hosni Mubarak begins his fourth term in office after approved by a yes – No referendum .

In December 2000 - Egypt, Lebanon and Syria agree on a billion-dollar project for a pipeline to carry Egyptian gas under the Mediterranean to the Lebanese port of Tripoli.

In February, 2002 - Hundreds of passengers are killed after their train catches fire south of Cairo.

In October, 2004- Bomb attacks target Israeli tourists on Sinai peninsula: 34 people are killed.

In November, 2004 - Funeral of Palestinian leader Yasser Arafat is held in Cairo.

In February-April 2005 - Pro-reform and opposition activists mount anti-government demonstrations.

In May, 2005 - Referendum vote backs a constitutional amendment that will allow multiple candidates to stand in presidential elections.

In July, 2005 - Scores of people are killed in bomb attacks in the Red Sea resort of Sharm al-Sheikh.

In September, 2005 - President Hosni Mubarak is re-elected for a fifth consecutive term.

In December, 2005 - Parliamentary polls end with clashes between police and supporters of the opposition Muslim Brotherhood. The National Democratic Party and its allies retain their large parliamentary majority. Muslim Brotherhood supporters, elected as independents, win a record 20% of seats.

More than 20 Sudanese migrants die after police break up a protest camp outside the UN offices in Cairo.

In February, 2006 - Up to 1,000 people die when a ferry carrying about 1,400 passengers from Saudi Arabia to Egypt sinks in the Red Sea.

In April, 2006 - Bomb attacks in the Red Sea resort of Dahab kill more than 20 people.

In August, 2006 - Egypt praises the way the guerrilla group Hezbollah held out in the war with Israel in Lebanon after earlier questioning its judgment.

In November, 2006 - Egypt is one of at least six Arab countries developing domestic nuclear programs to diversify energy sources, the International Atomic Energy Agency (IAEA) reports.

President Hosni Mubarak promises democratic and constitutional reform in an address to parliament. Opponents are skeptical.

In November, 2006 - Upsurge in arrests of Muslim Brotherhood members.

In March, 2007 - Referendum on constitutional amendments. The authorities say 76% of voters approve changes, opposition groups say the poll was rigged.

In April, 2007 - Amnesty International criticizes Egypt's record on torture and illegal detention.

More than 30 members of the Muslim Brotherhood go on trial, the first time in seven years that members of the group have been tried under military jurisdiction.

In June, 2007 - Parliamentary elections. Governing National Democratic Party wins most votes.

In October, 2007 - Independent, opposition newspapers protest against "government harassment" after seven journalists are imprisoned and an editor is put on trial.

Dustur newspaper editor Ibrahim Eissa sentenced to six months in jail for reporting rumors about President Mubarak's health. Rights groups demand change to law on reporting "false information".

In April 2008 - Military courts sentence 25 leading Muslim Brotherhood (Ahwan Musleemin) members to jail terms in crackdown targeting the organization’s funding. More than 800 arrested over a month. Brotherhood boycotted municipal elections after only 20 candidates allowed to stand.

In November 2008 - The governing NDP says it will privatize some state firms and distribute free shares to citizens. State will retain majority stakes in strategically important assets such as iron, steel, transport and tourism.

Security forces redeploy in Sinai after clashes over smuggling into Gaza Strip with local Bedouin left several tribesmen dead.

In February, 2009 - Leading opposition figure Ayman Nour freed after serving three years of five-year sentence on forgery charges that he said were politically motivated.

Bomb attack in popular tourist area of Cairo kills a French student and injures 24 other people. Authorities arrest three suspects, say small Islamist cell thought to be responsible.

In April, 2009 - Egyptian authorities say they arrested 49 people the previous year on suspicion of helping Hezbollah send money and aid to Hamas in Gaza.

In May 2009 - Egyptian police clash with Coptic Christian pig farmers trying to stop their animals being taken away for slaughter as a precaution against swine flu.

Interior Ministry says seven people with suspected links to al -Qaeda arrested in connection with Cairo bomb attack which killed a French student in February.

In June, 2009 - US President Barack Obama makes key speech in Cairo calling for a new beginning between the United States and the Muslim world.

In July, 2009 - Egyptian officials say 25 militants suspected of having al - Qaeda links were arrested for plotting attacks on ships in the Suez Canal.

In August, 2009 - Twenty-six members of an alleged cell of the Lebanese militant group Hezbollah go on trial in Cairo on charges of plotting attacks in Egypt and helping to send weapons to Hamas in Gaza.

In November, 2009 - Row between Egypt and Algeria following violence at football matches.

In December, 2009 - Foreign activists protest in Cairo against Egypt's refusal to let aid convoys into Gaza.

In January, 2010 - Coptic Christians clash with police after an apparently sectarian shooting outside a church.

In February, 2010 - Former UN nuclear chief Mohammed El Baradei returns to Egypt and, together with opposition figures and activists, forms a coalition for political change. ElBaradei says he might run in presidential election scheduled for 2011.

In March, 2010 - President Mubarak undergoes gall-bladder surgery in Germany, returning to Egypt three weeks later.

In June, 2010 - Muslim Brotherhood fails to win any seats in elections to the Shura consultative upper house of parliament: alleges vote was rigged.

In November, 2010 - Coptic Christians clash with police in Giza over construction of church.

Parliamentary polls, followed by protests against alleged vote rigging. Muslim Brotherhood fails to win a single seat, though it held a fifth of the places in the last parliament.

In January, 2011 - 21 killed in bomb at church in Alexandria where Christians had gathered to mark the New Year.

Anti-government demonstrations, apparently encouraged by Tunisian street protests which prompted sudden departure of President Ben Ali.

President Hosni Mubarak reshuffles his cabinet but fails to placate demonstrators, whose calls for his resignation grow louder. Days later he promises to step down in September.

In February, 2011 - President Hosni Mubarak steps down and hands power to the army council.

In March, 2011 - Egyptians approve package of constitutional reforms aimed at paving the way for new elections.

In April, 2011 - Former President Hosni Mubarak and his sons, Ala and Gamal, are arrested on suspicion of corruption.

In April, 2011 April-August - Protests continue in Cairo's Tahrir Square over slow pace of political change. Islamist groups come to the fore. Army finally disperses protestors in August.

In August, 2011 - Former President Hosni Mubarak goes on trial in Cairo, charged with ordering the killing of demonstrators earlier in the year.

In October, 2011 - Clashes between Coptic Christians and security forces kill 24 people.

Egypt and Israel swap 25 Egyptians in Israeli custody for a US-Israeli citizen accused of spying.

In November, 2011 - Violence in Cairo's Tahrir square as security forces clash with protesters accusing the military of trying to keep their grip on power. Prime Minister Essam Sharaf resigns in response to the unrest.
Start of parliamentary elections.

In December, 2011 - National unity government headed by new Prime Minister Kamal al-Ganzouri takes office.

In January, 2012 - Islamist parties emerge as victors of drawn-out parliamentary elections.

In March, 2012 - Pope Shenouda III, the veteran head of the Coptic Church, dies.

In April, 2012 - Crisis in relations with Saudi Arabia over the Saudi detention of an Egyptian lawyer briefly threatens the substantial aid that the Saudis provide Egypt.

In May, 2012- Muslim Brotherhood (Ahwan Musleemin) candidate Mohammed Morsi tops the first round of voting in first free presidential elections, narrowly ahead of Mubarak-era prime minister Ahmed Shafiq. Official media put turnout at a low 43%.

Military leaders announce the end of the state of emergency in place since Anwar al-Sadat's assassination in 1981, as its last renewal expires.

In June, 2012 - Muslim Brotherhood candidate Mohammed Morsi narrowly wins presidential election.

Court sentences ex-President Mubarak to life in prison for complicity in the killing of protesters during the 2011 uprising.

In July, 2012 - President Mohammed Morsi submits to a Supreme Court ruling that the parliamentary elections were invalid, after initially ordering parliament to meet in defiance of a military decree dissolving it in June.

In August, 2012 - New prime minister Hisham Qandil appoints a cabinet dominated by figures from the outgoing government, technocrats and Islamists, excluding secular and liberal forces.

Islamist fighters attack an army outpost in Sinai, killing 16 soldiers, and mount a brief incursion into Israel, highlighting the tenuousness of government control over the largely-lawless area.

President Mohammed Morsi dismisses Defense Minister Tantawi and Chief of Staff Sami Annan and strips military of say in legislation and drafting the new constitution.

In September, 2012 - Egypt kills 32 militants and destroys 31 smuggling tunnels to Gaza in an offensive against militants who attacked troops in Sinai in August.

In November, 2012 - Bishop Tawadros is chosen as the new pope of Egypt's Coptic Christians.

President Mohammed Morsi issues a decree stripping the judiciary of the right to challenge his decisions, but rescinds it in the face of popular protests.

In December, 2012 - Islamist-dominated constituent assembly approves draft constitution that boosts the role of Islam and restricts freedom of speech and assembly. Public approve it in a referendum, prompting extensive protest by secular opposition leaders, Christians and women's groups.

Government paralysis weakens the currency and delays a $4.8bn (£3bn) IMF loan.

In January, 2013 - More than 50 people are killed during days of violent street protests. The army chief warns that political strife is pushing the state to the brink of collapse.

March, 2013 - A court halts President Mohammed Morsi's plans to bring parliamentary elections forward to April, citing failure to refer the electoral law to the Constitutional Court. The main opposition National Salvation Front had announced a poll boycott earlier.

April 13, 2013: Mohammed Hosni Mubarak: Profile updates:

Hosni Mubarak ruled Egypt for almost 30 years until he was swept from power in a wave of mass protests in February 2011.

Few expected that the little-known vice-president who was elevated to the presidency in the wake of Anwar Sadat's 1981 assassination would hold on to the country's top job for so long.

Mr Sadat was assassinated by Islamist militants at a military parade in Cairo, and Mr Mubarak was lucky to escape the shots as he sat next to him. Mubarak became Egypt's fourth president after the killing of Anwar Sadat

Since then, he has survived at least six assassination attempts - the narrowest escape shortly after his arrival in the Ethiopian capital, Addis Ababa, in 1995 to attend an African summit, when his limousine came under attack.

Besides his knack for dodging bullets, the former air force commander has also managed to keep a hold on power by positioning himself as a trusted Western ally and fighting off a powerful opposition movement at home.

But with domestic unrest, his regional clout waning, his health failing, and his succession unclear, many questioned how long Mr Mubarak would be able to carry on.

Then, in a televised address on 1 February, following mass protests in Cairo and other cities, Mr Mubarak announced he had decided not to stand for re-election in September.

Protests continued and on 10 February he appeared on state television to say he was handing over powers to his vice-president, but would remain as president.

The following day Vice-President Omar Suleiman made a terse announcement saying Mr Mubarak was stepping down and the military's supreme council would run the country.

By 24 May, judicial officials announced that Mr Mubarak, along with his two sons - Alaa and Gamal - would stand trial over the deaths of anti-government protesters.

On 2 June he was found guilty of complicity in the murder of some of the demonstrators who took part in the wave of protests that began on 25 January. Along with his former Interior Minister, Habib Al -Adly, he was sentenced to life imprisonment for his crimes.

In January 2013, Egypt's Court of Cassation allowed an appeal against Mubarak's and al-Adly's convictions and ordered a retrial. Mubarak and his sons will also be retried on corruption charges for which they were acquitted.

The new trial was scheduled to begin on 13 April but as it was about to start, the presiding judge said he felt "unease" and was recusing himself. He referred the case to Cairo's appeals court to select a new panel of judges.

Early life:

Born in 1928 in a small village at Menofya province near Cairo, he insists on keeping his private life out of the public domain.

Married to a half-British graduate of the American University in Cairo, Suzanne Mubarak, and with two sons, Gamal and Alaa, the Egyptian president had been known to lead a strict life with a fixed daily schedule that began at 0600.

Never a smoker or a drinker, he built himself a reputation as a fit man who leads a healthy life.

In his younger days, close associates often complained of the president's schedule, which began with a workout in the gym or a game of squash.

Mohammed Hosni Sayyid Mubarak was sworn in on 14 October 1981, eight days after the Anwar Sadat assassination.

Despite having little popular appeal or international profile at the time, the burly military man used his sponsorship of the issue behind Sadat's killing - peace with Israel - to build up his reputation as an international statesman.

Emergency rule:

In effect, Hosni Mubarak ruled as a quasi-military leader when he took power.

For his entire period in office, he kept the country under emergency law, giving the state sweeping powers of arrest and curbing basic freedoms.

The government argued the draconian regime was necessary to combat Islamist terrorism, which came in waves during the decades of Mr Mubarak's rule - often targeting Egypt's lucrative tourism sector.

He presided over a period of domestic stability and economic development that meant most of his fellow countrymen accepted his monopolization of power in Egypt.

In recent years, Mr Mubarak felt for the first time the pressure to encourage democracy, both from within Egypt, and from his most powerful ally, the United States.

Many supporters of reform doubted the veteran ruler's sincerity when he said he was all for opening up the political process.

Leading up to his declaration not to stand again for the presidency, the US had heaped pressure on him to stand aside, calling for an "orderly transition" of power to a more democratic system.

Mr Mubarak won three elections unopposed since 1981, but for his fourth contest in 2005 - after a firm push from the US - he changed the system to allow rival candidates.

Critics said the election was heavily weighted in favor of Mr Mubarak and the National Democratic Party (NDP). They accused the Egyptian leader of presiding over a sustained campaign of suppressing opposition groups, most notably the Muslim Brotherhood.

The length of his tenure, along with his age and possible successors, had all been sensitive subjects in Egypt until January and February's mass protests allowed the Egyptian people to find a voice.

People around Mr Mubarak said his health and vigor belied his age - although a couple of recent health scares have been a reminder of his mortality.

Rumors about the president's health gathered pace when he travelled to Germany in March 2010 for gall bladder surgery. They flared every time he missed a key gathering or disappeared from the media spotlight for any conspicuous length of time.

However much Egyptian officials tried to deny them, they kept circulating, with reports in the Israeli and pan-Arab media.

The days of mass protests in Egyptian cities prompted Mr Mubarak to finally name a vice-president. On 29 January, intelligence chief Omar Suleiman was elevated to the role in what was seen as an attempt by Mr Mubarak to bolster his support in the military.

Until then there had been no obvious successor but opposition groups had feared his son, 40-year-old former investment banker Gamal Mubarak, was being groomed for a kind of dynastic inheritance dressed up as a democratic transition.

Gamal insisted he had no ambition to be president, but he had been moving steadily up the ranks of the NDP, becoming a leading advocate of economic and political reform.

Historians point out that every president since the revolution of 1952 has come from the military, and Gamal's civilian credentials may have given him trouble in gaining the support of that important constituency.

In the past, Mr Mubarak had said he would continue to serve Egypt until his last breath. In his speech on 1 February, he said: "This dear nation... is where I lived, I fought for it and defended its soil, sovereignty and interests.
On its soil I will die. History will judge me like it did others." Text ends

April 17, 2013: Egypt's Mohammed Hosni Mubarak ordered back to prison'

Former Egyptian President Mohammed Hosni Mubarak has been ordered back to prison from military hospital. Mr Mubarak's retrial will open again on 11th May, a Cairo appeals court says. He is charged alongside his former interior minister and six former security chiefs with complicity in the murder and attempted murder of hundreds of protesters in January 2011. The retrial was meant to begin on 13 April but collapsed when the presiding judge withdrew from the case. AFP news agency quotes judicial sources as saying that Judge Mahmud al-Rashidi will preside over the case at the North Cairo Criminal Court.

Life sentence: Mr Mubarak will also face a retrial or corruption charges, along with his sons, Alaa and Gamal, and businessman Hussein Salem. They were found not guilty the first time round. Mr Mubarak was convicted last June of conspiring to kill protesters during the 2011 revolt. He was sentenced to life in prison. However, a retrial was ordered in January after he appealed against the sentence, with the court citing "procedural failings". The retrial began on 13 April, but presiding Judge Mustafa Hassan Abdullah withdrew immediately, stating his "unease" about reviewing the case. A court ruled Mr Mubarak could no longer be held in prison on the charges related to the killings of protesters. His lawyer successfully argued that he had spent the maximum time in prison under temporary detention. However, he remains in custody on the corruption charges. The former leader has been in poor health since his arrest and appeared on a stretcher during his first trial and at the 13 April hearing.

About 850 people were killed in the crackdown during the 2011 uprising that ended Mr Mubarak's rule. Deaths during the uprising were largely blamed on the police at the time, but a recent leaked report implicated the army in serious human rights abuses, including the killing and torture of protesters. The leaked chapter, reportedly presented to President Mohammed Morsi late last year, contains testimony relating to civilians detained at military checkpoints who were never seen again and reports that the army delivered unidentified bodies to coroners. Egypt's Defense Minister Abdel Fatah al-Sissi denied the accusations, calling them a betrayal.

FLASHBACK: Egypt's Muslim Brotherhood (Ahwan Muslimeen) Egypt's Muslim Brotherhood as of December 2013'

Muslim Brotherhood (Ahwn Muslimeen): is Egypt's oldest and largest Islamist organisation

Founded by Hassan al-Banna in 1928. Has influenced Islamist movements worldwide. Mixes political activism with charity work . Rejects use of violence and supports democratic principles. Wants to create a state governed by Islamic law. It’s Slogan: "Islam is the solution"

Egypt's Muslim Brotherhood is perhaps facing the most serious crisis in its 85-year history.

President Mohammed Morsi, a member of the group, was ousted by the military, senior leaders and thousands of members have been detained, and its headquarters have been ransacked and burned.

Protest camps set up in the capital Cairo to call for his reinstatement have been stormed by Egyptian security forces with great loss of life. The Brotherhood described the action - which brought international condemnation - as "a massacre".

In December, the interim Egyptian government declared the group a "terrorist organisation", blaming it for a string of attacks, which the Brotherhood denied.

The movement is the country's oldest and largest Islamist organisation, meaning its ideology is based on the teachings of the Koran.

Founded by Hassan al-Banna, the Muslim Brotherhood - or al-Ikhwan al-Muslimun in Arabic - has influenced Islamist movements around the world with its model of political activism combined with Islamic charity work.

The movement initially aimed simply to spread Islamic morals and good works, but soon became involved in politics, particularly the fight to rid Egypt of British colonial control and cleanse it of all Western influence.

While the Ikhwan say that they support democratic principles, one of the group's stated aims is to create a state ruled by Islamic law, or Sharia. Its most famous slogan, used worldwide, is: "Islam is the solution."

Paramilitary wing

After Banna launched the Muslim Brotherhood in 1928, branches were set up throughout the country - each running a mosque, a school and a sporting club - and its membership grew rapidly.

By the late 1940s, the group is estimated to have had 500,000 members in Egypt, and its ideas had spread across the Arab world.

At the same time, Banna created a paramilitary wing, the Special Apparatus, whose operatives joined the fight against British rule and engaged in a campaign of bombings and assassinations.

The Egyptian government dissolved the group in late 1948 for attacking British and Jewish interests. Soon afterwards, the group was accused of assassinating Prime Minister Mahmoud al-Nuqrashi.

Banna denounced the killing, but he was subsequently shot dead by an unknown gunman - believed to have been a member of the security forces.

In 1952, colonial rule came to an end following a military coup d'etat led by a group of young officers calling themselves the Free Officers.

The Ikhwan played a supporting role - Anwar al-Sadat, who became president in 1970, was once the Free Officers' liaison with them - and initially co-operated with the new government, but relations soon soured.

After a failed attempt to assassinate President Gamal Abdul Nasser in 1954, the Ikhwan were blamed, banned, and thousands of members imprisoned and tortured. The group continued, however, to grow underground.

This clash with the authorities prompted an important shift in the ideology of the Ikhwan, evident in the writing of one prominent member, Sayyid Qutb.

Qutb's work advocated the use of jihad (struggle) against jahili (ignorant) societies, both Western and so-called Islamic ones, which he argued were in need of radical transformation.

His writings - particularly the 1964 work Milestones - inspired the founders of many radical Islamist groups, including Islamic Jihad and al -Qaeda.

In 1965, the government again cracked down on the Ikhwan, executing Qutb in 1966 and transforming him into a martyr for many people across the region.

Crackdown

During the 1980s, the Ikhwan attempted to rejoin the political mainstream.

Successive leaders formed alliances with the Wafd party in 1984, and with the Socialist Labour Party and the Socialist Liberals Party in 1987, becoming the main opposition force in Egypt. In 2000, the Ikhwan won 17 seats in the lower house of parliament, the People's Assembly.

Five years later, the group achieved its best election result up to then, with independent candidates allied to it winning 20% of the seats.

The result shocked President Hosni Mubarak. The government subsequently launched a crackdown on the Ikhwan, detaining hundreds of members, and instituted a number of legal "reforms" to counter their resurgence.

The constitution was rewritten to stipulate that "political activity or political parties shall not be based on any religious background or foundation": independent candidates were banned from running for president: and anti-terrorism legislation that gave the security forces sweeping powers to detain suspects and restrict public gatherings was introduced.

At the beginning of 2011, anti-government demonstrations, apparently encouraged by the Tunisian street protests which prompted the sudden departure of Tunisia's President Ben Ali, kicked off across the country.

Though many members of the Ikhwan joined the protests, they maintained a low profile. The group's traditional slogans were not seen in Cairo's Tahrir Square.

But as the protests grew and the government began to offer concessions, including a promise by Mr Mubarak not to seek re-election in September 2011, Egypt's largest opposition force took a more assertive role.

Rising power

In the first parliamentary elections after Mr Mubarak's overthrow in February 2011, the Ikhwan's newly formed Freedom and Justice Party (FJP) won nearly half the seats in the People's Assembly, eclipsing the earlier performances of independents allied to the movement.

The ultraconservative Salafist Nour party came second, meaning that Islamists controlled 70% of the seats in the lower house. There was a similar outcome from elections for the upper house, the Shura Council.

This allowed the Ikhwan and their allies to control the selection of candidates for the 100-member constituent assembly tasked with drafting Egypt's new constitution, prompting criticism from liberals, secularists, Coptic Christians, young people and women, who complained that the panel did not reflect the diversity of Egyptian society.

Concerns that the Ikhwan might be seeking to monopolise power were heightened when they announced they would field a candidate in the presidential election, despite having previously promised they would not.

In 2012, the FJP's then chairman, Mohammed Morsi, became Egypt's first democratically elected president. He won 51% of the vote in a deeply polarising run-off against retired air force commander Ahmed Shafiq.

Mr Morsi sought to reassure opponents of the Ikhwan by insisting that as president he wanted to build a "democratic, civil and modern state" that guaranteed the freedom of religion and right to peaceful protest.

Overthrow

Significant public opposition to Mr Morsi and the Ikhwan began building in November 2012.

Wishing to ensure that the constituent assembly could finish drafting the new constitution, the president issued an interim constitutional declaration granting himself far-reaching powers. He agreed to limit the scope of the declaration after days of opposition protests, but there was further outrage at the end of that month when the constituent assembly approved a rushed version of the constitution - despite a boycott by liberals, secularists and the Coptic Church, who said it failed to protect freedom of expression and religion.

As opposition mounted, President Morsi issued a decree authorising the armed forces to protect national institutions and polling places until a referendum on the draft constitution was held in December 2012, which critics said amounted to a form of martial law.

The army returned to barracks after the charter was approved, but within weeks it was forced to deploy in cities along the Suez Canal to halt deadly clashes between opponents and supporters of Mr Morsi and the Ikhwan. At the end of January 2013, the military warned that the political crisis might "lead to a collapse of the state".

In late April, opposition activists set up the grassroots Tamarod (Rebel) protest movement. It focused on collecting signatures for a petition, which complained about Mr Morsi's failure to restore security and fix the economy, and accused him of putting the Brotherhood's interests ahead of the country's as a whole. Tamarod also organised mass protests to mark the first anniversary of the day Mr Morsi took office. On 30 June 2013, millions of people took to the streets to demand his resignation.

The unrest and rising death toll prompted the military to warn Mr Morsi on 1 July that it would intervene and impose its own "roadmap" if he did not satisfy the public's demands within 48 hours and end the political crisis.

On 3 July, the military deployed troops and armoured vehicles in the streets. It declared that the constitution had been suspended and the chief justice of the SCC would assume presidential powers, overthrowing Mr Morsi.

The Ikhwan denounced the "military coup against the elected president and the will of the nation", and vowed that they would refuse to deal with Egypt's interim leaders.

Brotherhood supporters set up protest camps in Nahda Square and near the Rabaa al-Adawiya mosque and refused to disband them, despite repeated calls by the interim government.

After weeks of deadlock, hopes rose that the protests would remain peaceful. However, on 14 August security forces swept into the camps and the authorities imposed a state of national emergency.

Who's who in Egypt's Muslim Brotherhood'

BBC - Middle East News: (November 1, 2013)

Many leading members of Egypt's Muslim Brotherhood were detained as part of the crackdown on the organisation following the overthrow and arrest of President Mohammed Morsi in July. Some initially evaded arrest but were detained later.

Other members have come to represent the public face of the Islamist movement by appearing at pro-Morsi rallies or in international media. Here are some of the movement's key figures:

Mohammed Badie

Mohammed Badie is the Muslim Brotherhood's General Guide and in theory its leading figure.

He was born in al-Mahalla al-Kubra, north of Cairo, in 1943, and is a veterinary pathologist by training. He has taught in several Egyptian universities.

He held a number of administrative roles in the Brotherhood and served lengthy jail terms for his political activities, before assuming the leadership in 2010.

In the early stages of the protests, he appeared on the main stage of the Brotherhood's sit-in in Cairo. His remark in late July that "overthrowing Morsi was more criminal than carrying an axe and demolishing the Kaaba in Mecca" stirred controversy. His arrest was ordered on 10 July on charges of inciting the killing of anti-Morsi protesters, and a travel ban was put in place.

He went on the run but was arrested on 20 August, days after his son, Ammar, was killed in the Cairo unrest.

Mahmoud Ezzat

A leading figure in the Brotherhood since the 1960s, Mahmoud Ezzat has been described as "the gatekeeper" of the group's finances and secrets.

He joined the Brotherhood when he was 18 years old and rose through the ranks to become deputy guide in 2010. Described by Egyptian newspaper Al-Ahram as a "hardliner" within the organisation, he has been imprisoned several times and served time alongside other members, including Mr Badie and Khairat al-Shatir.

He was made temporary leader of the Brotherhood following the arrest of Mr Badie in August.

Despite his leading role, he has kept a low profile and in December 2012 was singled out as the organisation's "most dangerous man" by academic Sa'd al-Din Ibrahim, who described him as a "big enigma".

Khairat al-Shatir

The engineer, businessman and Islamist political activist has been seen as one of the group's most influential figures.

Imprisoned under former President Hosni Mubarak, he was the Brotherhood's initial candidate in last year's presidential elections before being disqualified by the election commission.

He is the deputy General Guide and thought to be a main financier of the group.

Mr Shatir was arrested on 5 July 2013, after Mohammed Morsi was ousted, and his assets frozen.

Mohammed al-Beltagi

The secretary-general of the Brotherhood's Freedom and Justice Party (FJP) and former MP was an activist on board the ship the Mavi Marmara during the 2010 Gaza flotilla raid.

On 10 July, prosecutors ordered Mr Beltagi's arrest, and four days later they ordered that his financial assets be frozen.

Despite the arrest order, Mr Beltagi appeared on an almost daily basis at the Rabaa al-Adawiyah sit-in, delivering fiery speeches on the stage.

He was eventually detained in a suburb of Giza on 29 August.

Criticism of the Muslim Brotherhood in the Egyptian media has focused on Mr Beltagi, who has been accused of being behind acts of violence allegedly perpetrated by Brotherhood members.

Gehad al-Haddad

The son of Mr Morsi's foreign affairs adviser Isam al-Haddad, Mr Haddad is a senior adviser and media spokesman for the Brotherhood. He studied at De Montfort University in the UK and is fluent in English.

Mr Haddad served as media strategist for Mr Morsi's presidential campaign in 2011, and is active with foreign media, giving interviews in English for BBC World, Sky News, The Guardian and CNN, and tweeting as @gelhaddad.

He was arrested in Cairo on 17 September.

Ahmad Arif

The Brotherhood's Arabic media spokesman is a dentist and an expert in Islamic and Christian theology. His appointment was well-received by the media, given his soft tone and moderate style, which earned him regular spots on TV talk shows.

Mr Arif appeared regularly at the Rabaa sit-in, delivering speeches from the stage. He was detained by security services on 22 August.

Abd-al-Rahman al-Barr

Often described as the "Muslim Brotherhood's Mufti", Mr Barr is the organisation's most senior religious figure and a member of the Brotherhood's Guidance Bureau. He has not been detained and has often led prayers at pro-Morsi sit-ins.

Essam el-Erian

A vice-chairman of the FJP and former member of the Guidance Bureau, Essam el-Erian was arrested on 30 October, after evading authorities for months.

While in hiding, Mr Erian urged Muslim Brotherhood supporters to keep up protests against the military and demand Mohammed Morsi's reinstatement.

A regular guest in domestic and foreign media before the crackdown, he stirred controversy over remarks in which he called Israel "a racist, invading entity that commits war crimes" and urged Egyptian Jews in Israel to come back.

He also drew criticism over remarks quoted in Al-Ahram, reportedly saying: "Tell [the UAE] that nuclear Iran is coming... The Persians are coming, not the Egyptians, and you will become slaves of the Persians." (Text ends)

The Hosni Mubarak On Trial:

January 2011 - Anti-Mubarak protests leave hundreds dead

February 2011 - President Mubarak overthrown after almost 30 years of rule

June 2012 - Former leader sentenced to life for killings of protesters during the uprisings

January 2013 - Retrial is ordered because of "procedural failings"

13 April, 2013 - Retrial begins but presiding judge immediately withdraws from the case

15 April 2013 - Court rules Mr Hosni Mubarak can no longer be held on charges related to killings of protesters

May 29th, 2013: HYPERLINK "http://www.ethiopianreview.net/index/?p=74143" Egypt summons Ethiopia's ambassador to express HYPERLINK "http://www.ethiopianreview.net/index/?p=74143" displeasure with construction of a major dam on the Blue Nile ' (Ahram Online) – Egypt's foreign ministry on Wednesday summoned Ethiopian Ambassador Mahmoud Dardir to express its displeasure with Ethiopia's construction of a major dam on the Blue Nile. Head of the ministry's African affairs committee, Ambassador Ali Hefny, along with other diplomats, met with Dardir Wednesday to convey Egypt's unhappiness with the move. Egyptian diplomats further criticized Ethiopia for going ahead with the project without taking into account the recommendations of a technical committee – tasked with studying the issue – consisting of ten specialists, including representatives of Egypt, Sudan and Ethiopia.

In an interview with Ahram Online, Egyptian ambassador to Ethiopia Mohamed Idris stated that Egypt was pursuing a "win-win scenario in which the interests of both sides can be served and accommodated. " Idris added: "We're expecting Ethiopian officials to make good on their earlier promise to act in a way that would not harm Egyptian interests." A report on the possible impact of Ethiopia's 'Renaissance Dam' is expected to be issued later this week by the committee of specialists. Sources close to the committee say the report will include concerns over the potential impact of the dam on Egypt and Sudan. It is also expected to refer to worries that cracks could develop in the dam within a few years, eventually leading to serious flooding.

Ethiopia on Tuesday began diverting the course of the Blue Nile, one of the Nile River's two major tributaries, as part of its project to build a series of new dams for electricity production. The move, called "historic" by Ethiopian government spokesperson Bereket Simon, has prompted criticism from downstream Egypt and Sudan, since the step could negatively affect both countries' water quotas. The Blue Nile provides Egypt with the lion's share of its annual 55 billion cubic meters of river water. According to the state-run National Planning Institute, Egypt will need an additional 21 billion cubic meters of water per year by 2050 – on top of its current quota of 55 billion meters – to meet the needs of a projected population of 150 million. Source:

HYPERLINK "http://english.ahram.org.eg/NewsContent/1/64/72655/Egypt/Politics-/Egypt-summons-Ethiopian-ambassador-over-Blue-Nile-.aspx"
http://english.ahram.org.eg/NewsContent … Nile-.aspx

May 30, 2013: Ethiopia dam is 'declaration of war': Al-Gamaa Al-Islamiya'

Ahram Online: Sheikh Abdel-Akher Hammad calls on Egypt to defend its honor and oppose construction of Ethiopian dam. Ethiopia's Renaissance Dam and the diversion of the Blue Nile is a declaration of war on Egypt, Sheikh Abdel-Akher Hammad of Al-Gamaa Al-Islamiya said on Wednesday. On Tuesday, Ethiopia began diverting the course of the Blue Nile, one of the Nile River's two major tributaries, as part of its project to build a dam for electricity production.

Speaking on Al-Arabiya satellite channel, Hammad claimed the move would reduce Egypt's water supply and damage national security. "If such a war is forged against us, we are ready to fight and we will embark on it with all our strength to defend our honor," asserted Hammad. Diplomatic negotiations should be the first step, he added. Hammad went on to say the crisis should have been dealt with by the Mubarak regime. The Blue Nile provides Egypt with the lion's share of its annual 55 billion cubic meters of river water. According to the state-run National Planning Institute, Egypt will need an additional 21 billion cubic meters of water per year by 2050 – on top of its current quota of 55 billion meters – to meet the needs of a projected population of 150 million.

May 30, 2013: Sudan, Egypt meet over Ethiopia Nile Dam impact'

Bloomberg: Ethiopia's government said it will try to accommodate nations concerned that their water supplies may be affected by the damming of the Blue Nile River, as Sudanese and Egyptian officials met to discuss the issue. Ethiopia, source of one of the two tributaries of the Nile River, will start filling the Grand Ethiopian Renaissance Dam on the Blue Nile at the “end of next year,” Deputy Prime Minister Debretsion Gebremichael said in an interview yesterday. The 80 billion-birr ($4.3 billion) hydropower project may begin generating 600 megawatts of electricity next year and is set for completion in 2017, he said. The schedule for filling the 74 billion cubic meter reservoir is expected to be a “major concern” for the downstream nations of Egypt and Sudan, said Debretsion. Once completed, the power plant will be Africa’s largest with the capacity to generate 6,000 megawatts. Egypt, which relies on the Nile for almost all of its water, has historically opposed upstream projects on the world’s longest river. “We are not selfish, we are not only looking at our national interest,” said Debretsion, who is also chairman of the state-owned Ethiopian Electric Power Corp. “This is an international river and we will try our best to accommodate their benefits and their interests.”

Seeking Assurance: Sudanese Water Resources and Electricity Minister Osama Abdalla Mohamed al-Hassan arrived in the Egyptian capital, Cairo, today to discuss the issue with Egyptian officials, the state -run Middle East News Agency reported. Egypt’s government and public are concerned that the dam may decrease the flow of the Nile, Mohamed Edrees, Egypt’s ambassador to Ethiopia, said in a phone interview today from Addis Ababa. “Our concern is for it not to affect our water security, to harm t he water coming to Egypt,” he said. “How to do it effectively on the ground and how to implement it, this is something to be left to the technicians to discuss and agree on.” The dam, which will be twice the size of Singapore, will be full in “five to six years,” Ethiopian Water and Energy Minister Alemayehu Tegenu said at a ceremony to celebrate the diversion of the river yesterday in Guba, 454 kilometers (282 kilometers) northwest of Addis Ababa. “We won’t fill the reservoir at one go,” he said.

‘Broad Understanding’ Sudan’s government has had consultations with Ethiopia and Egypt and there is a “broad understanding on the issue,” Foreign Ministry spokesman Abu-Bakr al-Siddiq said in a phone interview today from Khartoum, the capital. “We don’t have any problem with what the Ethiopians have done,” he said. Edrees said the diversion has no “direct implication” as it doesn’t alter the flow of the river. A technical committee made up of neutral experts and four representatives each from Ethiopia, Sudan and Egypt is expected to deliver a report on the project in a “few days,” Edrees said. “Actual dam construction” can start after the diversion was carried out a “few days ago,” said Debretsion. The altering of the course was a milestone in the project as “we managed to direct Abay on our own side,” Alemayehu said, using the Amharic name for the Nile. Members of the Ethiopian public have bought bonds worth more than 5 billion birr so far to pay for the dam, which will be financed from domestic sources only, Bereket Simon, who heads a fund-raising council for the project, said in an interview at the site yesterday.

Egyptians up in arms as Ethiopia builds giant hydro dam on Nile River: minister rules out war'

CAIRO — AP May 30, 2013: Ethiopia's construction of Africa's largest hydroelectric dam on the world's longest river threatens to affect flows of water to Nile-dependent, water-starved Egypt, where there is growing outrage, anger and fear. Egypt in the past has threatened to go to war over its "historic rights" to Nile River water but diplomats from both countries this week played down the potential for conflict. "A military solution for the Nile River crisis is ruled out," Egypt's irrigation and water resources minister, Mohammed Baheddin, said Thursday amid newspaper reports recalling the threats of war from Egypt's two previous leaders, Anwar Sadat and Hosni Mubarak. Ethiopia on Tuesday started diverting the flow of the Blue Nile for construction of the Grand Ethiopian Renaissance Dam. Eighty-five percent of Nile waters originate in Ethiopia yet the East African nation whose name has become synonymous with famine thus far utilizes very little of those waters.

Ethiopia's decision challenges a colonial-era agreement that had given downstream Egypt and Sudan rights to the Nile water, with Egypt taking 55.5 billion cubic meters and Sudan 18.5 billion cubic meters of 84 billion cubic meters, with 10 billion lost to evaporation. That agreement, first signed in 1929, took no account of the eight other nations along the 6,700-kilometer (4,160-mile) river and its basin, which have been agitating for a decade for a more equitable accord. And Ethiopia's unilateral action seems to ignore the 10-nation Nile Basin Initiative to promote cooperation. Ethiopia is leading five nations threatening to sign a new cooperation agreement without Egypt and Sudan, effectively taking control from Egypt of the Nile, which serves some 238 million people. Mohammed Abdel-Qader, governor of Egypt's Gharbiya province in the Nile Delta, warned the dam spells "disaster" and is a national security issue for the North African nation.

"Taking Egypt's share of water is totally rejected ... The Nile means everything to Egypt," said Gov. Abdel-Qader. Baheddin said Egypt already is suffering "water poverty" with an individual's share of 640 cubic meters well below the international average of 1,000 cubic meters. Egypt protests that others along the Nile have alternative water sources, while the Nile is the sole water source in the mainly desert country. Ethiopian officials say the dam is needed to provide much-needed power for development. At a ceremony marking the diversion of the Nile, Deputy Prime Minister Demeke Mekonnin said Ethiopia could export cheap electricity from the dam to energy-short Egypt and Sudan. He insisted the dam would not affect the flow of water to Egypt.

Experts say otherwise.

Alaa el-Zawahri, a dams engineer at Cairo University and an expert on a national committee studying the ramifications of the Ethiopian dam, said Egypt stands to lose about 15 billion cubic meters of water — 27 percent of annual share — each of the five years that Ethiopia has said it will take to fill the dam. The country's current share already is insufficient.

January 27, 2013: Egypt's Mohammed Morsi declares state of emergency in three cities: Egypt on the verge of collapse' Sinai which is 85% its residents are Palestinian origins sees itself not part of Egypt. Technically Egypt has no full control over Sinai based on the 1982 Camp David agreement. From 1967-1982 it was part of Israel. The Israeli Military withdrawn from Sinai with agreement Egypt would never ever has any military presence in Sinai which is Eastern part of the Suez Canal.

Port Said which is the Economic heart of Egypt and a very strategic location in a very strategic and volatile region declared independent from the Muslim government in Egypt that is on the way to destroy Egypt first and then the region as a whole. Other cities and towns alongside the Suez including Suez city and Ismailia are also declared independent from the Muslim government in Egypt. They also rejected the IMF lending money to Egypt which is 4.8 billion and the promises EU aid money which is 5 billion would be used for investment alongside the Suez Canal.

Especially the Mubarak era Egypt's Military that was a state with in a state and controlling 45% of Egypt's wealth is inflaming the situation including stopping investment alongside the Suez canal by foreigners and Egyptian civilians knowing if it is going to happen, the military will lose the Military bases and resources there. All cities and towns alongside the Suez and south of the Cairo including the 5 different Ethnic groups of Nubians, Bejas and Berbers in Egypt still are Mubarak's supporters and against the Muslim rule. Saudi Arabia media is loudly talking about Egypt saying "we gave them religion, we gave them language and we are giving them money worth Billions and its will continue. We also are sheltering 1.5 million Egyptians. What do these people want more". Saudi and other Gulf nations are undermining and disrespecting Egypt down under to their bare feet.

The point is that Egypt is in a mess. It is just the beginning. Those 10s of millions of youth are graduated but never had a job. Only 4.5% Egypt's territory is for human as well as animals and plants use including for settlement. The rest is dead desert. 98% their entire water consumption including agriculture is coming from the Nile where between 86-95% based on the rainy season is originated from the Ethiopian highland. Since 1982, Egypt is getting 1.3 billion worth military budget from USA every year which is about 40 Billion USA dollars in total. One week ago, they gave them 20 F-16 and 200 thanks.

However, all is nothing but Egypt is at war within itself. The situation will get worse than better. No nation will get peace and development as long as any religion especially fundamental Islam is ruling under the Islamic law that was in the 7th century and created by the al-Qaida types of the time which were primitive people with savage mentality and gruesome actions. Egyptians must fight the Muslim Brotherhood and other radical Islam and its foreign supporters until the people win the battle. Unless it will be too late and the situation in Egypt will be the real hell for many years to come and there will be many innocent suffering.

June 4, 2013: A senior aide of Egypt’s President Mohamed Morsi has apologized for one of the most public diplomatic and political mistakes committed by anyone in recent years. The aide neglected to tell politicians meeting with President Morsi to discuss Ethiopia’s Blue Nile River dam projects that the meeting was being broadcast live on state television. At the meeting several participants, unaware that the world was watching and listening, openly suggested ways for Egypt to sabotage Ethiopia’s dams, in particular the $4.2 billion Grand Ethiopian Renaissance Dam (GERD). The GERD is about 15 kilometers from the Ethiopia-Sudan border. The president and the politicians were discussing a report by the tripartite Egypt-Sudan-Ethiopia commission analyzing the impact of Ethiopia's dam project and its decision to divert the Blue Nile River. Ethiopia has already partially diverted the Blue Nile at the site of the GERD. One political leader, Yunis Makhyun, a member of the Islamist fundamentalist Nur Party, called the GERD a strategic threat to Egypt. He thought the Egyptian government should consider supporting an Ethiopian rebel group, in order to pressure the Ethiopian government. Ayman Nour, a member of the liberal-secular Ghad Party, suggested

Egypt buy or circulate rumors that it will buy new military aircraft (implying ne strike aircraft that could hit the dam). He speculated that this would put political pressure on Ethiopia. He also said that Egyptian political, military, and intelligence personnel might be sent to Ethiopia to “intervene” in Ethiopian domestic politics. Egypt claims 87 percent of the Nile River's water. The legal basis of this claim is a 1929 colonial-era agreement. In 1959 the Nasser government reiterated this claim. Egypt claims the right to veto upstream river projects. Ethiopia says it was not a party to the 1929 agreement. Since the public vetting of these belligerent options, the Egyptian government has stated that none of the recommendations, suggestions, or speculations by the political leaders at the meeting are Egyptian government policy. (Austin Bay)

June 5, 2013: The Egyptian government demanded that Ethiopia stop construction of the Grand Ethiopian Renaissance Dam (GERD) on the Blue Nile. The demand amounts to doubling down. After an open microphone caught senior Egyptian leaders discussing covert actions against Ethiopia, Egypt was initially embarrassed. However, protecting the Nile has proved to be a domestic political issue that unites most Egyptians.

June 7, 2013: Ethiopia rejected Egyptian demands that it cease construction of its Grand Ethiopian Renaissance Dam (GERD) project on the Blue Nile River. The government said that Egypt's complaints about the dam were not based on scientific evidence. Ethiopia also contended that Egypt lacks a coherent policy regarding Nile River water rights. A government spokesman accused the former Egyptian government led by Hosni Mubarak of supporting Ethiopian rebel groups and claimed that Mubarak's attempts to destabilize Ethiopia had failed.

June 9, 2013: Egypt rejected Ethiopia's rejection of the Egyptian demand that Ethiopia cease construction of its major Blue Nile dam projects. The government of Egypt said that Egypt will never give up a single drop of Nile River water. The Egyptian government declared that it has a plan of action. However, Egypt is willing to talk with Ethiopia.

June 10, 2013: Egyptian president Mohamed Morsi said that he does not want to go to war with Ethiopia but unless Ethiopia suspends its dam construction projects Egypt will consider "all options." The Ethiopian government issued an immediate reply and said that Ethiopia is prepared to defend the new Grand Ethiopian Renaissance Dam.

June 11, 2013: The Ethiopian government refused to stop work on any of its new dam projects. Ethiopia accused Egypt of making irresponsible threats.

June 12, 2013: A senior Egyptian defense official stated that the escalating disagreement between his country and Ethiopia over Nile River water flow “is not a military issue at this stage.”

June 13, 2013: The Ethiopian parliament approved a new Nile Water rights agreement which reduces Egypt’s traditional allotment if Nile River water. Six upstream Nile River basin countries support the agreement. Of course Egypt is not a party to the new agreement. Ethiopia’s parliament was really mocking the Egyptian government’s threats to retaliate against Ethiopia’s new dams. Ethiopian diplomats pointed out that for over ten years Ethiopia has been asking Egypt to participate in Nile River water discussions and Egypt has refused.

June 21, 2013: The head of Egypt's National Water Research Centre claimed that Ethiopia could reduce the flow of the Nile river water to Egypt by ten billion kilo-liters a year. He also claimed that every one billion kilo-liter reduction will take around 200,000 acres of farm land out of production. According to Egyptian figures, Egypt already suffers from a water deficit of around ten billion kilo-liters a year. The research center recently reported that Ethiopia’s dams could lower the river level and make upstream water ferry travel more difficult. Ethiopia rejects these claims as inaccurate and simply more Egyptian propaganda.

June 23, 2013: Ethiopia said that Egypt’s claims of a dooms-day reduction in the flow of the Nile River due to the GERD are absurd allegations. Ethiopia has consistently stated that filling the reservoir behind the Grande Ethiopian Renaissance Dam will take five to six years. Ethiopian government engineers contend that during this process the flow rate of the Nile River not be reduced to any degree that Egyptians will even notice it. The Ethiopian reservoir will hold 74 million cubic meters of water. One of the diplomatic options for resolving the row between Ethiopia and Egypt is for Ethiopia to agree to take 10 or 11 years to fill the reservoir. (Austin Bay)

June 24, 2013: Egypt protest update - Destruction and Death as Rival Protesters Clash'

VOA - Anger and frustration are boiling over in Egypt, where supporters and opponents of President Mohamed Morsi are increasingly clashing in the streets. In Egypt's second largest city, Alexandria, rival protesters turned out in force, fighting with guns and firecrackers. At least one person was killed while the offices of Mr. Morsi's political party were set on fire. Riot police moved in with armored vehicles to break up the clashes, firing tear gas in an effort to clear the streets. Thousands of Morsi supporters also demonstrated Friday in a show of support for the embattled president, vowing to stay on the streets to protect his legitimacy. Opponents, meanwhile, have been gathering in growing numbers in Cairo's Tahrir Square, waving Egyptian flags and calling for Mr. Morsi's departure.

Bigger opposition protests are planned for Sunday, the one-year anniversary of Mr. Morsi's presidency. Egyptian military officials have urged both sides to refrain from violence and settle their differences through dialogue but neither side appears willing to give in. Saber Atta defended Egypt's president during Friday's pro-Morsi rally in Cairo. "Mohamed Mursi will not fall because he has a people who love him and a group who support him. It is impossible and they (the opposition) are wrong to think that one day Mursi will have the same fate as Hosni Mubarak." Opponents accuse Mr. Morsi and his Muslim Brotherhood movement of trying to undermine secular rights and are increasing calling for the current government to fall.

Clashes between the two sides are leaving an ever-growing toll. Two people have reportedly been killed in the recent violence in Alexandria with scores of other wounded. Over the past two days, battles between Morsi supporters and opponents in the provincial regions of Fayyoum, Sharqiya and Dhekeliya have left at least three dead and 300 wounded. Egyptian opposition leader Amr Moussa Friday urged Mr. Morsi to respect the will of the people. "He should take the voice of the people seriously and the protests, the angry comments, as an expression - major expression - of dissatisfaction. Please take that seriously and accept the early elections." Mr. Morsi addressed the nation Wednesday, admitting to making some mistakes but offering few compromises. Moussa called it a miscalculation. "They don't want to recognize that there is anger and those are all people who are being pushed and directed by others. And they are missing the point, they are missing a major point in this." Mr. Morsi took the stage in Cairo's Tahrir Square on June 30 last year as a jubilant crowd celebrated him as the nation's first freely elected leader.

BOSTON HERALD - From the moment we meet, it takes the 30-something Egyptian three minutes, tops, before he expresses his crashing disappointment with his government. “On June 30, you will see another revolution,” he predicts, as we approach the Egyptian Museum. “Millions of Egyptians will fill Tahrir Square and other squares around the country. We want the Muslim Brothers out!” As we admire sarcophagi, masks and mummies in this legendary palace of antiquities, Muhammad barely can contain his frustration with current events. “The Muslim Brothers,” as he and others here call them, “have craved power for 85 years. Now they have it, and they cannot run anything. We were happy to be rid of Mubarak, but right now, we would take him back.” Egyptians rallied for 18 days in early 2011 until their autocratic president stood down. Now 85, Hosni Mubarak is on trial for corruption and complicity in killing protesters during the uprising. Muhammad is in the tourism industry. (Like others in this article, his identity is obscured for his protection.) “I used to work four days a week,” Muhammad laments. “Now, I work four days a month.”

Thanks to President Mohammed Morsi’s economic mismanagement, Egyptians have seen unemployment rise from 8.9 percent, when Mubarak got booted, to 13.2 percent today. Annual growth in the gross domestic product, which was 5 percent in 2010, slowed to 3.3 percent in 2012, according to Trading Economics.com. Foreign-exchange reserves have plunged from $36 billion in December 2010 to $16 billion last month. No surprise, the Egyptian pound, which was 5.5 to the U.S. dollar as Mubarak resigned, now is 7.0. While this exchange rate dazzles visiting Americans, Egyptians wilt beneath this 27 percent loss in buying power. The Muslim Brotherhood’s economic agenda seems to involve printing money: borrowing from Libya, Saudi Arabia, Turkey and Qatar: and awaiting a new, $4.8 billion loan from the International Monetary Fund. Egyptians also are coping with energy shortages. These include rolling blackouts and gasoline lines that Deya Abaza describes in Ahram Online as “a recurring feature of Egypt’s post-revolutionary landscape.” “My best year was 2010,” Muhammad says. “I was saving money to buy a house. Now, I have lost one-third of my savings. My dreams have been crushed.”

The self-described Rebel movement declared this day of protest. It says it has secured 15 million signatures calling on Morsi to quit, just one year after he took power, and accept early elections. If accurate, these signatures outstrip the 13.2 million votes (51.7 percent) that Morsi received on June 17, 2012, when he defeated Ahmed Shafiq, Mubarak’s last prime minister, who won 12.3 million votes (48.2 percent). “Message to Mr. Obama: A majority of the Egyptian people doesn’t like the Muslim Brothers,” a shop owner named Omar says from behind his desk. “I am a Muslim. The Muslim Brothers are using religion to advance their politics. What about our Christian brothers and friends?" Omar alludes to the post-Mubarak repression that Egypt's Copts and other Christians are enduring. "They have the right to live in this country. Christians and Muslims are woven together here, like this piece of fabric," he says, tugging at his plaid shirt. "They are Egyptian citizens."

About 10 minutes away, another shopkeeper defends Morsi and the Muslim Brothers. "Morsi is the legal president," Hisham states matter-of-factly. "He was elected. If people don't like him, they should wait three more years and then vote him out." Muhammad, the young tourism professional, responds. "Imagine you want to take a northbound train from Cairo to Alexandria. You suddenly realize that you are on the wrong train, heading south to Luxor. Do you stay on that train all the way to Luxor or do you get off as soon as you can and start heading in the other direction?" On Sunday, Egyptians will tell the world how much longer they wish to remain aboard the Muslim Brothers' Express. Deroy Murdock is a syndicated columnist and a media fellow with Stanford University's Hoover Institution on War, Revolution and Peace.

June 28, 2013: In Egypt (Port Said) a homemade bomb killed one demonstrator and wounded fifteen others. In Alexandria at least three people died in clashes between democrats and Islamic radicals.

June 28, 2013: U.S. diplomats are trying to ease tensions between Ethiopia and Egypt. Egyptian politicians were caught on live microphones discussing ways to stop Ethiopia's Nile River dam projects. The options discussed included covert military attacks and supporting rebel groups –in other words, the Egyptians were vetting war options. The U.S. has proposed that Ethiopia and Egypt establish a joint working group to examine the impact of the Grand Ethiopian Renaissance Dam (GERD). The U.S. has urged Ethiopia to minimize the impact of the dam on downstream nations. The Egyptian leaders were initially embarrassed but they discovered that the Egyptian people rally around the Nile. Despite its own numerous internal troubles, the Egyptian government has continued to threaten Ethiopia should Ethiopia fail to suspend dam construction. Egypt has diplomatic and political power. However, threatening Ethiopia with covert attack invites retaliation by Ethiopia, and at the moment Egypt is far less stable than Ethiopia. Egypt lacks the logistical capacity and long-range strike weapons to conduct a sustained military operation. Conceivably they could use the Nile River as a supply line, but barges on the river would be very susceptible to interdiction by air attack, mines, or other forms of interdiction. (Austin Bay)

June 29, 2013: Israel and the U.S. warned its citizens to not visit Egypt in the next few days because of the growing number of demonstrations there. Supporters of Islamic radical groups are clashing with pro-democracy groups and it is feared that some of the Islamic radicals may seek out and attack non-Moslems, especially foreigners. Americans and Israelis already in Egypt have been warned to stay away from demonstrations and travel as little as possible. Egypt is suffering from political gridlock and economic collapse as Islamic radicals, democrats, and supporters of the deposed Mubarak dictatorship (and that kind of government) fail to agree on a new government. The Mubarak supporters still occupy many senior positions in the courts and the military and elsewhere in the bureaucracy. The Mubarak supporters control most of the economy as well. Some Islamic radical groups are in armed opposition to the government, especially in the Sinai Peninsula, where they are sheltered by rebellious Bedouin tribesmen. The number of police and soldiers in Gaza keeps increasing, as does the resistance to government authority. Today, for example, a police general was assassinated by a group of gunmen, believed to be Islamic terrorists.

June 30, 2013: In Egypt millions of people continued to demonstrate against the Moslem Brotherhood and what is seen as this Islamic radical group’s attempt to turn Egypt into a religious dictatorship. The headquarters of the Moslem Brotherhood was ransacked by anti-government demonstrators and nationwide there were nearly a thousand casualties over the last few days with at least sixteen dead.

June 30, 2013: Egypt protests set for a showdown, violence feared - Al Jazeera'

Cairo - Egypt braced for mass protests on Sunday as pro- and anti-government protesters gathered in the capital on the first anniversary of the inauguration of country's first democratically elected president. Thousands of people opposed to President Mohamed Morsi have already gathered in Cairo's Tahrir Square calling for him to resign, while the president's supporters have vowed to defend his legitimacy to the end, leading to fears of confrontation. Morsi supporters held their own rally outside a Cairo mosque on Friday, an effort to preempt Sunday’s demonstrations, and thousands of them are holding an open-ended sit-in.

The anti-Morsi protests are being organised by a grassroots campaign calling itself Tamarod, meaning "rebellion" or "insubordination", which claims to have collected signatures from 22 million Egyptians demanding the president’s ouster.

The signature drive has no legal standing, but it has nonetheless tapped into widespread public anger towards Morsi. The president has made a number of controversial decisions since taking office, most notably a November decree which shielded his decisions from judicial review. Egypt's economy is in free-fall: The pound has dropped in value by nearly 20 percent since Morsi took office, foreign investment continues to dry up, and businesses are paralysed by widespread fuel and electricity shortages. Human rights abuses remain widespread, rights groups say, with Morsi's administration doing little to rein in the notoriously brutal security services. "We gave him the confidence to give us a new programme, to correct what Mubarak had done to Egypt, but he didn't do that. So we have the right to withdraw the confidence that the Egyptian people gave him," said Eman el-Mahdy, a spokesperson for the Tamarod campaign. "The same Egyptian people have the same right to withdraw this confidence."

Calls to resign

Morsi’s supporters liken the calls for his ouster to a coup, arguing that the only way to remove him is through new elections. They carried signs at Friday’s rally insisting that the president’s "legitimacy is a red line". "If we are saying that we have a majority, and the opposition are saying that they have a majority, how can they decide," asked Nader Omran, a spokesman and adviser to the Freedom and Justice Party - the political wing of Muslim Brotherhood. "What is the other solution for this dilemma, except the ballot box?" Tamarod campaigners have vowed to continue their protests until Morsi resigns, but it remains to be seen whether they can sustain their momentum after Sunday. Even if the protests draw large crowds, the calendar might work in Morsi’s favour: Brutally hot Cairo days are hardly conducive to protests, and the dawn-till-dusk Ramadan fast, which begins around July 8, will discourage public demonstrations. Even if Morsi did step down, which seems unlikely, it remains unclear who could replace him. Campaigners have called for a transitional government that would draft a new constitution and then hold new presidential and parliamentary elections.

Role of the military

The campaign itself has also split over the role of the military, which ruled Egypt for nearly 18 months after Mubarak stepped down. Some organisers have urged the army to step in to provide security, a move interpreted by other activists as a tacit call for a coup against the president. General Abdel Fattah al-Sisi, the defence minister, said in a statement last week that the army has tried to stay out of politics since Morsi’s election, but warned that it has a duty to "prevent Egypt from slipping into a dark tunnel of civil unrest".

There are widespread fears that Sunday’s protest could end in violence. Clashes have spread across governorates outside the capital in recent days, with four Brotherhood supporters having been killed in various attacks on the group’s offices, and two people killed in fighting in Alexandria on Friday, including a US citizen. Amid the growing unrest, tanks and other military vehicles have started to appear on the streets of Cairo. Still, the period of military rule tarnished the army’s image , and analysts say the generals have little desire to retake power. "They don’t want to be involved," said Hisham Hellyer, a Cairo-based scholar with the Brookings Institution. "If they’re pushed to be involved, it will be because of violence and social disorder, or the threat of it taking place." Source: Al Jazeera

June 30, 2013: Egypt army gives President 48 hours to compromise in crisis'

By Asma Alsharif/Tom Perry: CAIRO (Reuters) - Egypt's powerful armed forces gave Islamist President Mohamed Mursi a virtual ultimatum on Monday to share power, urging the nation's feuding politicians to agree on an inclusive roadmap for the country's future within 48 hours. A dramatic military statement broadcast on state television declared the nation was in danger after millions of Egyptians took to the streets on Sunday to demand that Mursi quit and the headquarters of the ruling Muslim Brotherhood were ransacked. "If the demands of the people are not realized within the defined period, it will be incumbent upon (the armed forces) ... to announce a road map for the future," said the statement by chief-of-staff General Abdel Fattah al-Sisi.

It was followed by patriotic music.

The people had expressed their will with unprecedented clarity in the mass demonstrations and wasting more time would only increase the danger of division and strife, he said. The army said it would oversee the implementation of the roadmap it sought "with the participation of all factions and national parties, including young people", but it would not get directly involved in politics or government. Anti-Mursi demonstrators outside the presidential palace cheered the army statement, and the main opposition National Salvation Front, which has demanded a national unity government for months, applauded the military's move.

On Cairo's Tahrir Square, thousands were celebrating the army's move: "We want a new armed forces council to govern until new elections," said accountant Mohamed Ibrahim, 50. "The army alone supports the legitimate revolutionary will of the people." There was no immediate reaction from the president's office. It was the second time in just over a week that the armed forces had issued a formal warning to the politicians, piling pressure on Mursi to concede power-sharing with the liberal, secular and left-wing opposition. Analysts said the military intervention could serve Mursi if he wished to compromise, but it risked giving his opponents an incentive to harden their demands, sensing support from the street and the generals, at the risk of triggering a coup. "The ultimatum has the ring of a potential coup," said Yasser al-Shimy of the International Crisis Group think-tank. "What makes it not a coup is it gives time for the politicians to sort out their differences

SELF-DEFENCE?

After the destruction of its offices, the Brotherhood which operated underground until the overthrow of Hosni Mubarak in 2011, said it was considering how best to defend itself. Sunday's mass rallies were bigger than anything seen since the Arab Spring uprising. Smaller crowds returned to Tahrir Square and other gathering points on Monday afternoon. Five non-Brotherhood government ministers tendered their resignations from the cabinet, apparently in sympathy with the protesters, underlining a sense of isolation for the party that won a series of elections last year.

"Both sides are still in their trenches," a senior European diplomat said just before the military statement. Eight people died in a night of fighting around the Brotherhood building, where guards fired on youths hurling rocks and fire bombs. A Brotherhood official said two of its members were hurt. Another eight people were killed and 731 injured in clashes around the country on Sunday, the health ministry said. The Brotherhood's official spokesman told Reuters that the attack had crossed a red line of violence and among possible responses might be to revive "self-defense committees" former during the 2011 uprising. "The people will not sit silent," Gehad El-Haddad said. Mursi's movement complained at the lack of police protection, which can only heighten its sense of being under siege from both the liberal opposition and state officialdom inherited from the old regime.

NOT TALKING

Liberal protest organizers, who declared Mursi ousted by people power on Sunday, gave him a new deadline of 5 p.m. on Tuesday to quit and call elections or face a new mass rally. Mursi, who has not appeared in person, earlier renewed offers via allies of dialogue and pledged to work with a new parliament if disputes over election rules can be ironed out. But he has so far offered no substantial concessions. The opposition does not trust the Islamist movement, which critics accuse of using a series of electoral victories to monopolize power. They want a total reset of the rules of a democracy imperfectly worked out over the past two years. The massive protests showed that the Brotherhood has not only alienated liberals and secularists by seeking to entrench Islamic rule, notably in a new constitution, but has also angered millions of Egyptians with economic mismanagement.

Tourism and investment have dried up, inflation is rampant and fuel supplies are running short, with power cuts lengthening in the summer heat and motorists spending hours fuelling cars. The cost of insuring government debt against default surged to record highs. Forward contracts indicated a significant fall for the pound against the dollar. Protest organizers called on Egyptians to keep occupying central squares across the country in a campaign of peaceful civil disobedience until Mursi goes, setting a Tuesday deadline. Some uniformed policemen marched among protesters in Cairo and Alexandria, chanting "the police and the people are one", and several senior officers addressed the Tahrir Square crowd. Adding to the failure to protect the Brotherhood headquarters, that cast doubt on whether Mursi could rely on the security forces to clear the streets if he gave the order. Opposition leaders, who have seen previous protest waves fizzle after a few days in December and January, were to meet on Monday afternoon to plot their next move. The United States and the European Union have urged Mursi to share power with the opposition, saying only a national consensus can help Egypt overcome a severe economic crisis and build democratic institutions.

July 1, 2013: Egypt: Protesters storm Muslim Brotherhood HQ'

By Hamza Hendawi, CAIRO (AP) — Protesters stormed and ransacked the Cairo headquarters of President Mohammed Morsi's Muslim Brotherhood group early Monday, in an attack that could spark more violence as demonstrators gear up for a second day of mass rallies aimed at forcing the Islamist leader from power. An Associated Press journalist at the scene said protesters managed to breach the compound's defenses and storm the six-story building, and later carted off furniture, files, rugs, blankets, air conditioning units and portraits of Morsi. One protester emerged with a pistol and handed it over to a policeman outside. Footage on local TV networks showed smashed windows, blackened walls and smoke billowing out of the fortified villa. A fire was still raging on one floor hours after the building was stormed. One protester tore down the Muslim Brotherhood sign from the building's front wall, while another hoisted Egypt's red, black and white flag out an upper-story window and waved it in the air in triumph.

The Brotherhood's headquarters, located in the eastern district of Cairo of Muqatam, had been the scene of clashes since Sunday evening between armed Morsi supporters barricaded inside the building and young protesters pelting it with firebombs and rocks. Security officials said at least eight protesters were killed in the violence. They spoke on condition of anonymity because they were not authorized to speak to the media. It was not immediately clear whether the Brotherhood supporters holed up inside who had been battling the protesters late Sunday fled the building overnight. Morsi's critics view the Brotherhood headquarters as the seat of real power in Egypt, consistently claiming that the Islamist group's spiritual leader, Mohammed Badie and his powerful deputy, Khairat el - Shater, were the ones actually calling the shots in the country, not the president.

The Brotherhood has in recent weeks fortified the building's walls in anticipation of the massive opposition protests in which millions took part on Sunday in a display of anger and frustration with the Islamist leader on the anniversary of his inauguration. At least 15 people were killed in clashes Sunday, including the eight in front of the Brotherhood's Cairo headquarters, and hundreds injured. Egypt's state television put the death toll at 16. There was no immediate explanation for the discrepancy. On Monday, anti-Morsi protesters were gearing up for a second day of demonstrations. Some protesters spent the night in dozens of tents pitched in the capital's central Tahrir Square and in front of the president's Ittihadiya Palace. They have vowed to stay there until Morsi resigns. The president's supporters, meanwhile, continued their sit-in in front of a major mosque in another part of Cairo.

The anti-Morsi demonstrators are calling for widespread labor strikes to start Monday in an attempt to ratchet up the pressure on the president, but it was not immediately clear whether unions would respond to the call. Organizers are also calling for sit-ins at the Cabinet building, interim parliament, and another presidential place where Morsi has been working since late last week. Sunday's protests were the largest seen in Egypt in the 2½ years of turmoil since the ouster of autocrat Hosni Mubarak in February 2011. Fears were widespread that the collisions between the two sides could grow more violent in coming days. Morsi made clear through a spokesman that he would not step down and his Islamist supporters vowed not to allow protesters to remove one of their own, brought to office in a vote deemed free and fair. During the day Sunday, thousands of Islamists massed not far from the presidential palace in support of Morsi, some of them prepared for a fight with makeshift armor, sticks and shields.

The anti-Morsi protesters aimed to show by sheer numbers that the country has irrevocably turned against him, a year to the day after he was inaugurated as Egypt's first freely elected president. But throughout the day and even up to midnight at the main rallying sites, fears of rampant violence did not materialize. Instead the mood was largely festive as protesters at giant anti-Morsi rallies in Tahrir and outside the Ittihadiya palace spilled into side streets and across boulevards, waving flags, blowing whistles and chanting. Fireworks went off overhead. Men and women, some with small children on their shoulders, beat drums, danced and sang, "By hook or by crook, we will bring Morsi down." Residents in nearby homes showered water on marchers below — some carrying tents in preparation to camp outside the palace — to cool them in the summer heat, and blew whistles and waved flags in support.

"Mubarak took only 18 days although he had behind him the security, intelligence and a large sector of Egyptians," said Amr Tawfeeq, an oil company employee marching toward Ittihadiya with a Christian friend. Morsi "won't take long. We want him out and we are ready to pay the price." The massive outpouring against Morsi raises the question of what comes next. Protesters have vowed to stay on the streets until he steps down. The president, in turn, appears to be hoping protests wane. For weeks, Morsi's supporters have depicted the planned protest as a plot by Mubarak loyalists. But their claims were undermined by the extent of Sunday's rallies. In Cairo and a string of cities in the Nile Delta and on the Mediterranean coast, the protests topped even the biggest protests of the 2011's 18-day uprising, including the day Mubarak quit, Feb. 11, when giant crowds marched on Ittihadiya.

It is unclear now whether the opposition, which for months has demanded Morsi form a national unity government, would now accept any concessions short of his removal. The anticipated deadlock raises the question of whether the army, already deployed on the outskirts of cities, will intervene. Protesters believe the military would throw its weight behind them, tipping the balance against Morsi. The country's police, meanwhile, were hardly to be seen Sunday. In the lead-up to Sunday, some officers angrily told their commanders they would not protect the Brotherhood from protesters, complaining that police are always caught in the middle, according to video of the meeting released online. "If the Brothers think that we will give up and leave, they are mistaken," said lawyer Hossam Muhareb as he sat with a friend on a sidewalk near the presidential palace. "They will give up and leave after seeing our numbers."

July 1, 2013: The army demanded that the Moslem Brotherhood dominated government resign and allow a new one, not dominated by the Moslem Brotherhood, to be formed. President Morsi was told he had to agree to this within 48 hours or the army would move in and force him to comply. This was greeted with cheers by the many demonstrators still on the streets. Morsi and the Moslem Brotherhood are held responsible for the economic depression since the Arab Spring began two years ago and for generally ignoring the needs of the people. In practice, Morsi attempts to improve the economy were most often stymied by the wealthy (and largely pro-Mubarak) families that do not favor a real democracy, but rather an oligarchy (government controlled by the wealthiest families). Morsi told the army he would not comply with their demand.

For the first time in many years, Egypt has sent tanks to patrol the Gaza border. At least a battalion (30) of tanks are now operating in Sinai, mainly near Gaza.

July 3, 2013: Egypt army deployed amid Cairo tension'

BBC News: The Egyptian military has moved into key sites in Cairo hours after its ultimatum passed for President Mohammed Morsi to resolve a political crisis. Tens of thousands of pro- and anti-Morsi protesters have gathered in areas of the capital, as Egyptians await a televised statement. Before the deadline passed, Mr Morsi repeated his refusal to step down. His aides took to social media to describe the events as a military coup but there was no confirmation of this. There are unconfirmed reports that Egyptian officials have placed an international travel ban on Mr Morsi and other senior members of the Muslim Brotherhood.

Armoured personnel carriers

The army is involved in a show of force, fanning out across Cairo and taking control of the capital, BBC correspondent Quentin Sommerville reports. He described seeing eight armoured personnel carriers heading for Cairo University in Giza, where one of the main pro-Morsi demonstrations was being held. At least 16 people were killed and about 200 wounded at the university when gunmen opened fire on protesters on Tuesday night. Another pro-Morsi protest was being held in Nasr City, where New York Times reporter Kareem Fahim tweeted that soldiers had fired into the air to disperse demonstrators.

Opponents of the president gathered in Tahrir Square in their tens of thousands. When the army's 48-hour deadline passed, cheers echoed across the square. Whether it is a military coup or not, on the streets of Cairo it certainly looks like one, our correspondent says. Before the army's ultimatum to President Morsi expired at 16:30 (15: 30 GMT), he posted a Facebook message calling for a roadmap involving an interim coalition government.

His whereabouts were not immediately clear but BBC Arabic confirmed that he was at the Cairo headquarters of the Republican Guard, a military site where he has stayed since the start of the protests. One of Mr Morsi's aides, Issam al-Haddad, wrote on his Facebook page that he was "fully aware" his words might be the "last lines I get to post on this page", adding that what was happening was a "military coup".

Defiant speech

The army had earlier held meetings with political and religious leaders to discuss the crisis. But the ruling Freedom and Justice party - the political arm of Mr Morsi's Muslim Brotherhood - stayed away from the talks. Mr Morsi's opponents have accused him and the Muslim Brotherhood of pushing an Islamist agenda onto Egypt, and that he should stand down. In a defiant televised speech on Tuesday evening, Mr Morsi said he would give his life to defend constitutional legitimacy, and blamed the unrest on corruption and remnants of the ousted regime of Hosni Mubarak.

Army chief General Abdel Fattah al-Sisi was reported to have met his top commanders on Wednesday - and a source close to the military told AFP news agency they had been discussing details of a post -Morsi roadmap.
The army's plan reportedly includes an outline for new presidential elections, the suspension of the new constitution and the dissolution of parliament. Members of the Tamarod (Rebel) movement, which has mobilised millions of demonstrators onto the streets to demand Mr Morsi's resignation, were also part of the meeting. So too were leading religious figures and opposition leader Mohammed ElBaradei. An opposition source told Reuters Mr ElBaradei would "urge the armed forces to intervene to stop the bloodshed". Muslim Brotherhood spokesman Gehad el -Haddad said the army had no right to offer such a plan.

"A roadmap is something that the constitution outlines and the president directs. It's not the role of the military." He said the Brotherhood was open to any solution, but that it had to be through "representatives of the people", and proposed speeding through parliamentary elections. "If the protests on the street prove anything they prove the people of Egypt are ready to have their say. They can sweep the parliamentary election, impeach the president, change the constitution and set the roadmap that they want, but it has to be the right of the people." Military sources earlier told the BBC that under the draft plan, the president could be replaced by a council of cross-party civilians and technocrats ahead of new elections. The president was put under further pressure by the resignation of six ministers from his government on Monday, including Foreign Minister Kamel Amr.

Elected president: Mr Morsi became Egypt's first Islamist president on 30 June 2012, after winning an election considered free and fair following the 2011 revolution that toppled Mubarak. But dissent has been growing, with protesters angry at the lack of change in post-revolution Egypt and accusing the Brotherhood of trying to protect its own interests. "This is a president threatening his own people. We don't consider him the president of Egypt," said Mohammed Abdelaziz, a leader of Tamarod. However, Mr Morsi and the Brotherhood still have significant public support, and both sides have drawn huge numbers to rallies in recent days. At least 39 people have now died since the protests began on Sunday. The instability has also hit global oil prices, sending US light crude above $100 a barrel for the first time since September last year, amid concerns supply routes through the Suez Canal could be affected.

Egyptian army places President Mohammed Morsi under house arrest'

AP – July 4, 2013: Egypt's toppled leader Mohammed Morsi was detained by authorities along with some of his key supporters hours after his ouster by the powerful military, even as the defiant president insisted that he remains the country's legitimate leader. According to two senior members of the Muslim Brotherhood, 61-year-old Morsi is being held at a military facility with top aides, media reports said today. Earlier security forces had imposed a travel ban on Morsi and other leading figures in the Muslim Brotherhood. The Egyptian police said it has orders to arrest 300 leaders and members of Morsi's Muslim Brotherhood. The head of Egypt's armed forces yesterday ousted Morsi just one year after he was elected as the country's first democratically elected president in 2012 after nearly three-decades authoritarian rule of strongman Hosni Mubarak.

Egyptian army commander General Abdel Fattah Sisi on state television issued a declaration suspending the Constitution and appointing the head of the Supreme Constitutional Court, Adly Mansour, as interim head of state. Mansour would be sworn in today, Al-Ahram online reported. Sisi called for presidential and parliamentary elections, a panel to review the constitution and a national reconciliation committee. He said the roadmap had been agreed by a range of political groups. The move came after Islamist leader refused to quit following the end of a 48-hour deadline set by the army to resolve the political crisis that arose after millions of Egyptian demanding his resignation took to the streets.

Egypt's iconic Tahrir Square, the hub of the anti-Morsi protesters -- erupted into into ecstasy as the military announced his outer. However, a statement on Morsi's Facebook page denounced the army move as a "military coup". "The procedures announced by the general command of the armed forces represents a full coup d'etat that is completely unacceptable," the statement said. In spite of the military's announcement, Morsi's statement stressed that he remains the head of state and the supreme commander of the armed forces. Morsi's statement asked Egyptian citizens - both civilians and military - to "abide by the constitution and the law and not to respond to this coup".

The official website of the Muslim Brotherhood, Ikhwan Online, said that the military’s announcement is a "conspiracy against legitimacy, a military coup that wastes popular will and brings Egypt back to despotism." Meanwhile, Islamist supporters of Morsi gathered in a Cairo suburb and reacted angrily to the announcement by the army. Some broke up paving stones, forming piles of rocks. Muslim Brotherhood security guards in hard hats and holding sticks formed a cordon around the encampment, close to a mosque. Men and women wept and chanted. Denouncing military chief Sisi, some shouted: "Sisi is void! Islam is coming! We will not leave!" At least 10 people were killed when opponents and supporters of Morsi clashed after the army announced of his removal, state media and officials said.

Eight of those reported dead were in the northern city of Marsa Matrouh. Al-Anani Hamouda, a senior provincial security official, said two members of security forces were among those killed in the clashes. "We are dealing with the situation. ... We have called for security reinforcements in the area," said senior police officer Sherif Abdelhamid. Dozens more were wounded in Fayoum, south of Cairo, where unidentified assailants broke into the local offices of the Freedom and Justice Party, the Brotherhood's political wing, MENA news agency said. The attackers looted the headquarters and set them on fire, it said. Egyptian Interior Minister Mohamed Ibrahim ordered the shut down three main three main pro-Morsi channels.

The minister had taken the decision to close all "religious channels," namely the Muslim Brotherhood-affiliated Misr 25, the Salfi oriented Al-Nas and Al-Hafez channels. Expressing concern over the situation in Egypt, US President Barack Obama asked the country's military to hand over powers to a democratically elected government as soon as possible. "We are deeply concerned by the decision of the Egyptian Armed Forces to remove President Morsi and suspend the Egyptian constitution," Obama said. "I now call on the Egyptian military to move quickly and responsibly to return full authority back to a democratically elected civilian government as soon as possible through an inclusive and transparent process, and to avoid any arbitrary arrests of President Morsi and his supporters," he said. The grand sheikh of Al-Azhar mosque said that he supported the call for early presidential elections based on an Islamic precept that the better of two evils is a religious duty. Speaking shortly after military's announcement, liberal opposition leader Mohamed ElBaradei said the "2011 revolution was re-launched" and that the roadmap meets the demand of the protesters. Egypt's leading Muslim and Christian clerics also backed the army-sponsored roadmap. Morsi came under massive pressure in the run-up to Sunday's anniversary of his maiden year in office, with his opponents accusing him of failing the 2011 revolution by concentrating power in Islamist hands.

Egypt's toppled leader Mohammed Morsi was detained by authorities along with some of his key supporters hours after his ouster by the powerful military, even as the defiant president insisted that he remains the country's legitimate leader. According to two senior members of the Muslim Brotherhood, 61-year-old Morsi is being held at a military facility with top aides, media reports said today. Earlier security forces had imposed a travel ban on Morsi and other leading figures in the Muslim Brotherhood. The Egyptian police said it has orders to arrest 300 leaders and members of Morsi's Muslim Brotherhood. The head of Egypt's armed forces yesterday ousted Morsi just one year after he was elected as the country's first democratically elected president in 2012 after nearly three - decades authoritarian rule of strongman Hosni Mubarak.

Egyptian army commander General Abdel Fattah Sisi on state television issued a declaration suspending the Constitution and appointing the head of the Supreme Constitutional Court, Adly Mansour, as interim head of state. Mansour would be sworn in today, Al-Ahram online reported. Sisi called for presidential and parliamentary elections, a panel to review the constitution and a national reconciliation committee. He said the roadmap had been agreed by a range of political groups. The move came after Islamist leader refused to quit following the end of a 48-hour deadline set by the army to resolve the political crisis that arose after millions of Egyptian demanding his resignation took to the streets. Egypt's iconic Tahrir Square, the hub of the anti-Morsi protesters -- erupted into into ecstasy as the military announced his outer. However, a statement on Morsi's Facebook page denounced the army move as a "military coup".

"The procedures announced by the general command of the armed forces represents a full coup d'etat that is completely unacceptable," the statement said. In spite of the military's announcement, Morsi's statement stressed that he remains the head of state and the supreme commander of the armed forces. Morsi's statement asked Egyptian citizens - both civilians and military - to "abide by the constitution and the law and not to respond to this coup". The official website of the Muslim Brotherhood, Ikhwan Online, said that the military’s announcement is a "conspiracy against legitimacy, a military coup that wastes popular will and brings Egypt back to despotism." Meanwhile, Islamist supporters of Morsi gathered in a Cairo suburb and reacted angrily to the announcement by the army. Some broke up paving stones, forming piles of rocks. Muslim Brotherhood security guards in hard hats and holding sticks formed a cordon around the encampment, close to a mosque. Men and women wept and chanted. Denouncing military chief Sisi, some shouted: "Sisi is void! Islam is coming! We will not leave!" At least 10 people were killed when opponents and supporters of Morsi clashed after the army announced of his removal, state media and officials said.

Eight of those reported dead were in the northern city of Marsa Matrouh. Al-Anani Hamouda, a senior provincial security official, said two members of security forces were among those killed in the clashes. "We are dealing with the situation. ... We have called for security reinforcements in the area," said senior police officer Sherif Abdelhamid. Dozens more were wounded in Fayoum, south of Cairo, where unidentified assailants broke into the local offices of the Freedom and Justice Party, the Brotherhood's political wing, MENA news agency said. The attackers looted the headquarters and set them on fire, it said. Egyptian Interior Minister Mohamed Ibrahim ordered the shut down three main three main pro-Morsi channels. The minister had taken the decision to close all "religious channels," namely the Muslim Brotherhood-affiliated Misr 25, the Salfi oriented Al-Nas and Al-Hafez channels.

Expressing concern over the situation in Egypt, US President Barack Obama asked the country's military to hand over powers to a democratically elected government as soon as possible. "We are deeply concerned by the decision of the Egyptian Armed Forces to remove President Morsi and suspend the Egyptian constitution," Obama said. "I now call on the Egyptian military to move quickly and responsibly to return full authority back to a democratically elected civilian government as soon as possible through an inclusive and transparent process, and to avoid any arbitrary arrests of President Morsi and his supporters," he said. The grand sheikh of Al-Azhar mosque said that he supported the call for early presidential elections based on an Islamic precept that the better of two evils is a religious duty. Speaking shortly after military's announcement, liberal opposition leader Mohamed ElBaradei said the "2011 revolution was re-launched" and that the roadmap meets the demand of the protesters. Egypt's leading Muslim and Christian clerics also backed the army-sponsored roadmap. Morsi came under massive pressure in the run-up to Sunday's anniversary of his maiden year in office, with his opponents accusing him of failing the 2011 revolution by concentrating power in Islamist hands.

African Union suspends Egypt For Overthrowing Elected President’

The African Union (AU) on Friday, July 5, 2013 suspended Egypt from all its activities after the Egyptian military overthrew the elected president, Mohamed Mursi, a senior AU official said. Suspension is the AU’s usual response to any interruption of constitutional rule by a member state. “As mandated by the relevant AU instruments, the African Union Peace and Security Council decides to suspend the participation of Egypt in AU activities until the restoration of constitutional order,” Admore Kambudzi, Secretary of the Peace and Security Council, said after a meeting.

Egypt's lesson for political Islam: politics comes first'

PARIS (Reuters) July 8, 2013: By Tom Heneghan, Religion Editor

When the Muslim Brotherhood won power it seemed Egypt's nascent democracy would allow the movement to realize its dream of making Islam the guiding principle in politics. The Arab Spring revolts had opened the door to full Islamist participation in politics after decades of oppression or exile. A year later, Egypt's first Islamist president, Mohamed Mursi, has been forced out, illustrating the Islamists' dilemma as they champion faith while newly empowered citizens look more for effective pluralist governance. "Islamism has always been more of a sentiment than a coherent political ideology," said Husain Haqqani, a former Pakistani ambassador to the United States. "Islamism is by definition not inclusive, but they need to be inclusive now." The main political divide elected Islamists face is often not over religion, French Islam expert Olivier Roy said. "Look at all the veiled women who were protesting against Mursi. They're not against sharia. They're against incompetence and nepotism," he said.

BORN IN EGYPT

Political Islam arose in Egypt in 1928 when Hassan al -Banna founded the Muslim Brotherhood, a revival movement to establish an Islamic state. "Islam is the solution" was its motto. Banned for decades and opposed by Islamic authorities, it organized networks around the country, especially to provide social welfare services that won it grass-roots respect. When the 2011 Tahrir Square revolt toppled former President Hosni Mubarak, the Brotherhood emerged as the country's only organized force besides the army.

But the Islamists were not equipped to tackle the daunting economic problems or tame a hostile bureaucracy. While public anger mounted over these issues, Mursi assumed special powers to help impose an Islamist - tinged constitution. John Esposito, professor of religion and international affairs at Georgetown University in Washington, said the Brotherhood's reaction to criticism betrayed the defensive reflexes of its underground past. "Good governance requires taking risks and reaching out to people you can't control, but they couldn't do that," he said. In late June, Mursi protested he had reached out to his critics but they would not work with him. "I took responsibility for a country mired in corruption and was faced with a war to make me fail," he said.

RIPPLES IN TUNISIA

In Tunisia, the birthplace of the Arab Spring, the Islamist-led government is also under pressure as politicians battle over a new constitution, hardline Salafis attack secularists and unemployment and inflation rise. The governing party Ennahda, an offshoot of the Muslim Brotherhood, also built its grass-roots network under the previous dictatorship, winning 42 percent in the 2011 election. In contrast to Islamists often jailed during Egypt's dictatorship, party founder Rachid Ghannouchi spent 22 years in exile in Britain where he said he saw how religions could operate in a pluralist political system.

Ennahda formed a government with two secular parties and has not insisted on any mention of sharia in the constitution. But its weak response to attacks by Salafi extremists on cinemas, concerts and Sufi shrines made critics suspect that it secretly sympathized with them. The party denied the charge. The assassination of secular opposition leader Chokri Belaid in February sparked a crisis and the government collapsed. Ennahda formed a second government with the same junior partners but a new prime minister and named independents to head the key ministries of interior, defense, justice and foreign affairs. It also cracked down hard on Salafi radicals. This has not gone far enough for a small group of Tunisian activists that launched a petition like the one that led to Egypt's mass protests. It wants a new caretaker government that would curb the Islamists and fix the faltering economy. "The possibility of an Egyptian scenario is unlikely in Tunisia," Ali Lareyedh, the new prime minister, responded. "Our approach is characterized by consensus and partnership."

THE TARNISHED TURKISH MODEL

In the first flush of the Arab Spring, many Arab Islamists looked to Turkey's AKP as a model that has respected faith and still won three national elections in a row. But the AKP had more political savvy and a more developed economy to work with. It gave up the goal of an Islamic state over a decade ago and focused on rapid economic growth. The AKP has not renounced the official secularism imposed by Turkey's former military rulers. The Muslim Brotherhood rapped Prime Minister Tayyip Erdogan for defending the secular state during an otherwise triumphant visit to Egypt in 2011. Erdogan and his allies started in local politics, learning skills that would pay off at the polls. "Neither the Muslim Brotherhood nor Ennahda had this kind of experience," Roy said. Still, the AKP has angered secularists by fostering a more visible Islam, helping build mosques and limiting alcohol sales. Street protests broke out this year at Istanbul's Taksim Square and elsewhere over issues ranging from the environment to city planning and an Islamic-inspired morality campaign. The protesters' main complaint was what they saw as Erdogan's growing authoritarianism after a decade in power with no effective opposition to rein him in. "That's not an Islamic issue," said Istanbul columnist Mustafa Akyol. Stung but not subdued, Erdogan has dismissed the protesters as "riff-raff" and indulged in some Muslim populism to attack them at a rally in Kayseri in Anatolia's pious heartland. "They think their vote is not equal to the votes of Ahmet or Mehmet or the shepherd in Kayseri. They have enjoyed their whiskies on the banks of the Bosphorus," he said.

FALL OF POLITICAL ISLAM?

Syrian President Bashar al-Assad, fighting an insurgency including the local branch of the Muslim Brotherhood, has called Mursi's failure "the fall of what is called political Islam." It is a setback but not likely the end of Islamists' decade-long efforts to link the power of religion to politics. Roy said the Egyptian Brotherhood and Ennahda might both split into two groups, one keeping their groups' traditional approach and the other attracting more modern activists. The coup could also push frustrated Islamists to violence. "The message will resonate throughout the Muslim World loud and clear: democracy is not for Muslims," Mursi's National Security Adviser Essam El-Haddad wrote in a farewell Facebook post. "There will be a greater feeling that Islam is targeted and this could lead to future mergers between some factions within the Brotherhood and Salafi groups that see eye to eye," said Jordanian analyst Mohammad Abu Rumman in Amman.

Egypt President Morsi's removal is not said to be a military coup d'etat’ (Ahram Analysis) - It is a popular uprising led by young Egyptians' It is wrong to describe the removal of President Mosri as a military coup. The military was just one of a amalgamation of forces who are angry with Morsi and left excluded by him and his ruling party. The leading force behind the removal of Morsi is a group of young Egyptians who believed that Morsi and the Muslim Brotherhood stole their revolution. They planed and organized the largest petition drive in history, gathering 23 million signatures, demanding Morsi to resign. Read the following article to get a better understanding of what led to the ouster of Morsi. Speaking to Reuters, Tamarod leaders detail how they mobilised masses to demand the ouster of President Mohamed Morsi, who was eventually toppled by the Egyptian army.

The 28-year-old activist in sneakers, jeans and a worn-out polo shirt invented the magic formula that drew millions of Egyptians out to demand the overthrow of Islamist President Mohamed Morsi. Now he is determined to ensure all their demands are met. On the day the army stepped in to remove Morsi last week, Badr and his two twenty-something co-founders of the "Tamarud - Rebel!" movement got a phone call from a general staff colonel, inviting them to meet the armed forces commander-in-chief. Speaking to Reuters in a bare suburban high-rise apartment lent to his protest movement by an obscure political party, Badr said it was their first contact of any sort with the military. They had to borrow a car to drive - unwashed and unshaven - to military intelligence headquarters, where they were ushered into a room with generals, a grand sheikh, the Coptic pope, a senior judge and political opposition leaders. Far from being overawed, Badr was soon arguing with General Abdel-Fattah El-Sisi about the military's roadmap for a political transition, and rejecting his suggestion that Morsi should call a referendum on his continued rule. Millions of people were demonstrating for the recall of the president, not for a referendum, the activist told Sisi. "I tell you, sir, you may be the general commander of the Egyptian army but the Egyptian people are your supreme commander, and they are immediately ordering you to side with their will and call an early presidential election," he said.

The general surrendered. A bunch of kids in T-shirts had changed the course of the Arab world's most populous nation by mobilising mass protests against the ruling Muslim Brotherhood, then threatening to turn on anyone who resists their demands. "We own the streets because we stand with the people and the will of the people, and we will always do so," Badr said. Like many activists of the Facebook generation, he cut his political teeth in the uprising that toppled veteran autocrat Hosni Mubarak in 2011. He started working as a journalist and voted for Morsi a year ago but became disillusioned. He told the generals that if they opted for a half - way solution, they would be lost. If they stuck to the referendum idea, he and his movement would walk out. "I don't have a blank cheque from the people," he told Sisi. "People signed Tamarud's petition for an early presidential election so I can't go out and tell them anything else. "If you are worried about the Brotherhood's reaction, they will also refuse a referendum, so in that case you will lose both sides. Win the Egyptian people!" A senior military source confirmed that Sisi dropped the idea of a referendum in deference to Tamarud's argument.

Winners never quit

Badr, who is not shy of saying he has presidential ambitions in the long term, was elated by his sudden power. "The idea that you are drawing the political map of your country that we believe is the most important nation in the Arab world is so great," he said. A sign pinned on the wall proclaims: "Winners never quit, and quitters never win." It seems hard to believe that two young journalists and a student, armed only with laptops and mobile phones, succeeded in two months in launching a mass movement where Egypt's divided opposition parties had struggled to gain any traction. Badr put it down to sheer hard work that he, Mohamed Abdelaziz, 28, and Hassan Shahin, 23, had put in. "No one did what we did," he said. "Most groups held conferences or at most a protest in downtown Cairo, but we toured the country and went without sleep for days so we will not give up, and we will continue inshallah (God willing)." Tamarud activists scoured towns and villages collecting signatures on a red-printed petition demanding the recall of Morsi. They say they got 22 million signatures with names, signatures and national identity numbers, nine million more than the electors who voted to elect the president. No one has checked the numbers, but they invited the United Nations to send observers to verify the petitions.

Quitters never win

As the movement grew and called for mass demonstration on June 30, the first anniversary of Morsi's inauguration, new, less familiar recruits permeated its branches. One Tamarud activist who spoke to Reuters said she resigned three days before the giant protest because she was concerned that the secret police and former Mubarak supporters were infiltrating the movement. "Suddenly, the faces had changed," said B.A., who asked not to give her full name for fear of retribution from the security services. "Many of the people I'd worked with left, and some of the new faces I knew were felul (remnants), nostalgic for Mubarak, or justifying the work of state security." The Amn Dowla state security agency, which detained and tortured dissidents under Mubarak, especially Islamists, is widely hated and feared. Formally dissolved after the 2011 uprising, it was renamed and remains mostly intact. Muslim Brotherhood leaders have alleged that former Mubarak cronies and secret policemen funded and encouraged Tamarud. Ahmed Shafiq, Mubarak's last prime minister and a former air force general now living in Abu Dhabi and accused publicly by Morsi of pulling strings behind sabotage in Egypt, says he was in close touch with the protesters. He predicted on July 1 that Morsi's reign would end within a week and said he was "in continuous coordination with colleagues in Cairo".

Whistles and red card

Badr shrugged off any suggestion that he, or his movement, could have been manipulated by Shafiq or covert forces. Other groups might have jumped on the bandwagon, but Tamarud remained in the driver's seat, he said.

Activists noted that while the Brotherhood provided transportation, food and drink for their supporters, sitting in outside a suburban Cairo mosque, the Tahrir Square crowds were given only whistles and red cards to "send Morsi off".

Badr resisted any suggestion that Tamarud should call on its followers to leave the streets and go home, saying their mobilisation was keeping vengeful Brotherhood supporters at bay.

"As long as they (Brotherhood supporters) see lots of people on the other side of the street, they will stay in their place," he said.

The Tamarud leaders have worked closely with senior liberal politician Mohamed El-Baradei and were elated when, during the interview, the interim president's office called them to say the former U.N. nuclear agency chief would be named prime minister.

They jumped out of their chairs, slapped high-fives and broke into a chant of "The army and the people, one hand!"

"El-Baradei is our Bob (daddy), the leader of the revolution," Badr said. "He won the Nobel and we will take it as well."

Their joy proved premature. ElBaradei's appointment was held up by resistance from conservative Islamists who make awkward bedfellows with the young revolutionaries.

But they are too high on exhaustion to be discouraged.

"Hope is always there. It can come and go, but it is always there," Badr said, citing an Arabic poem. He added in his own words: "By our willpower, we will turn hope into action. This revolution will succeed, this generation will not be defeated."

How can Egypt get out of crisis?

By Gerald Butt BBC Middle East Analyst (July 29, 2013): Egyptians are discovering in a more public and painful way than other Arab Spring states that removing long-standing authoritarian rule is a lot easier than replacing it with another system of governance. The priority of the popular uprisings was to topple dictatorships, and little thought was given to what might come next. The general assumption was that freeing Arab countries from autocracy would automatically herald democracy. But this is where the Arab Spring has come unstuck. For a prerequisite of democracy is politics. In order for politics to flourish one needs open debate. Yet open debate is not easy to achieve in a country like Egypt where there is no tradition, from school onwards, of the frank analysis of ideas, and the free and peaceful exchange of opinions. In the absence of all the above, Egypt is floundering as it seeks to create a post-Mubarak political system. The most dangerous symptom of this is polarisation and the absence of willingness to compromise for the sake of the country as a whole.

The political process since the fall of ousted former leader Hosni Mubarak has served only to emphasise the schism in Egyptian society. The Muslim Brotherhood won elections, but then failed to persuade millions of Egyptians that their policies were inclusive. The army responded to popular dissatisfaction with President Mohammed Morsi by toppling the Muslim Brotherhood administration and thereby alienating something between a third and half the population. That, surely, should have been the moment for calm attempts at political reconciliation. But, with Mr Morsi under lock and key and with clashes between rival groups on the streets, the military made what was arguably the most damaging decision of all: it urged anti-Morsi protesters to stage a mass rally to give the army a popular mandate to take tough measures against its opponents. In a stroke, this announcement cut the legs off the ailing figure of Egyptian democracy - for it sanctified the street as the main platform for politics, with force of numbers, rocks, tear gas and bullets taking the place of rational debate.

Bruising confrontation

The formidable challenge for Egypt today is to rescue politics from the street as the first step towards national reconciliation. The problem is finding the means to achieve this. The Brotherhood, for its part, insists that protests will continue until the military-backed government steps down and the democratically elected one is returned to power. The killings of dozens of Islamists in clashes with the army have only hardened attitudes. Up until the ousting of Mr Morsi on 3 July, the army was regarded as the sole political arbiter in Egypt. With the military now siding with the anti-Morsi camp, it has lost that role. No other Egyptian institution or individual appears to be able to take it on. Arab mediation is unlikely, given the schism in the region over the army's move, with a number of states delighted to see the Muslim Brotherhood and political Islam humiliated. Diplomatic intervention from outside the region is likely to be viewed by both entrenched sides as unwarranted interference. So in the short term, there seems little hope for anything other than bruising street confrontations between Morsi supporters on one side, and the military (and anti-Morsi crowds) on the other. Full-scale civil war in the traditional sense will be avoided simply because the Islamists lack the fire power and armaments for a full confrontation with the army. Also, unlike Syria, regional powers have no vested interests in stoking the conflict.

Hope? Nevertheless, continuing violence will mean yet more chaos, leading to increased disruption to the economy and daily life. Herein, perhaps, lies a glimmer of hope. Soaring unemployment and poverty might in the end force Egyptians to put aside their differences and demand that their leaders do the same to save the whole country from social and economic collapse. At that point, Egypt will still need men and women courageous enough to encourage free and inclusive debate, thus laying the foundations of politics and democracy that the country and all Arab Spring countries desperately need.

August 9, 2013: In the Sinai an Egyptian helicopter fired missiles at a meeting of Islamic terrorists, killing twelve people. Egypt has sent thousands of additional security personnel into Sinai, but many of the local Bedouin tribesmen and the Islamic terrorists living among them are resisting any more government control and proving very difficult to shut down.

August 10, 2013: Egypt: Al Azhar Preacher Urges Citizens to Give Interests of Homeland Top Priority' Egypt State Information Service (Cairo) - Al Azhar preacher affirmed the necessity of putting the higher interests of the homeland above all other considerations and achieving unity among all Egyptians. In his Friday sermon, Al Azhar preacher warned of the disputes that may lead to destruction and corruption and undermine the march of the Islamic nation. He urged the necessity of adhering to the good manners that Muslims kept during Ramadan, in order to unify their ranks.

August 10, 2013: In the Sinai an Egyptian helicopter fired missiles at a meeting of Islamic terrorists, killing twelve people. Egypt has sent thousands of additional security personnel into Sinai, but many of the local Bedouin tribesmen and the Islamic terrorists living among them are resisting any more government control and proving very difficult to shut down.

August 12, 2013: Egypt police expected to besiege Morsi sit-ins’

By Aya Batrawy (AP) The development sets the stage for a possible confrontation between the military-backed government and the thousands gathered at the protest sites in support of ex-President Mohammed Morsi. The protesters have said they will not leave until Morsi, ousted in a popularly supported coup on July 3, is reinstated. Weeks of efforts by the international community to end the standoff and find a peaceful resolution have so far failed. Egypt's interim prime minister warned just ahead of the Muslim Eid al-Fitr holiday that ended Sunday that the government's decision to clear the sit-ins was "irreversible." Egypt's new leadership says the protests have frightened residents of Cairo, sparked deadly violence and disrupted traffic. Leaders of the sit-in say they have been peaceful and blame security forces and "thugs" for violence. More than 250 people have killed in violence since Morsi's ouster. At the main Cairo sit-in, vendors said they have sold hundreds of gas masks, goggles and gloves to protesters readying for police tear gas. Three waist -high barriers of concrete and wood have been built against armored vehicles. The security officials said they would set up cordons around the protest sites to bar anyone from entering, and one of the officials said that could begin as soon as sunrise. But by dawn Monday, there was no indication of any troops moving and the government has not confirmed when forces would advance on the sit-ins. The Interior Ministry has said it would take gradual measures, issuing warnings in recent weeks and saying it would use water cannons and tear gas to minimize casualties. Interior Ministry officials, speaking to The Associated Press on condition of anonymity because they are not authorized to discuss details of the security plans, said they are prepared for clashes that might be set off by the cordons.

The officials said police are working with the Health Ministry to ensure ambulances are on hand for the wounded and that armored police vans are nearby to take away those arrested. A special force within the riot police trained for crowd dispersal is expected to deal with protesters. In the past, however, Egypt's riot police, many lacking the training to deal with unarmed civilians, have resorted to using lethal force. Mass rallies two weeks ago called by Egypt's military leader, Gen. Abdel -Fattah el-Sissi, showed that a large segment of Egypt's population backs the armed forces' actions against Morsi's supporters. Just before the holiday, the government said international efforts failed to reach a diplomatic solution to the standoff with Morsi's supporters, who include members of his Muslim Brotherhood. A last-ditch effort was launched over the weekend by the Sunni Muslim world's pre-eminent religious institution, Al-Azhar, to push for a resolution. There are fears that violence from police trying to clear the two sites will spread to other areas of the capital and beyond, where thousands of Morsi supporters also hold near-daily marches. The main protest camp in Cairo is between middle-class residential buildings and ground floor businesses. Its focal point is a mosque and an adjacent stage where Brotherhood leaders charged with inciting violence openly talk to journalists. Among them is former lawmaker Mohammed el-Beltagy, who vowed over the weekend to continue protesting at the sit - ins. "We will happily sacrifice our souls, not for ourselves but to free the captured nation and to ensure freedom and dignity to our people and to the coming generations," he said.

Security officials, speaking anonymously because they are not authorized to release the information, suspect Brotherhood guards around the mosque in Rabaah al-Adawiya Square are well-armed. They also say both camps have armed protesters on rooftops ready to shoot. The Interior Ministry has depicted the encampments as a public danger, saying 11 bodies bearing signs of torture were found near both sites. Amnesty International has also reported that anti-Morsi protesters have been captured, beaten, subjected to electric shocks or stabbed. At least eight bodies have arrived at a morgue in Cairo bearing signs of torture, the human rights group said. Of the more than 250 people killed since Morsi's ouster, at least 130 were his supporters who died in two clashes with security forces last month. At the Cairo sit-ins, the overwhelming majority echo the demands of the Muslim Brotherhood: Restore Morsi to power and reverse all the actions taken by the military, including suspension of the disputed constitution and disbanding of the legislature. Many of those interviewed dismissed the mass protests against Morsi in the final weekend of June that preceded the military coup. They acknowledge that Egypt is sharply divided, but worry that if they do not defend the sit -ins, they will be detained and tortured — just as many were before the 2011 uprising that toppled autocrat Hosni Mubarak.

They say they waited for hours to vote for Morsi in the elections that catapulted his Brotherhood to power after years of oppression and that the military leaders have now stolen their children's future by overturning the outcomes of the balloting. Um Roqiya said she will remain camped out with her five children, despite concerns for their safety. "We are here to defend legitimacy. If I die defending that, we are martyrs," she said while patting her 7-year-old son on the head. Her husband, longtime Brotherhood member Abdel-Latif Omran, said he can do nothing to protect his children from death because their fate has already been decided by God. Organizations like UNICEF have condemned what it calls the deliberate use of children in Egypt who are "put at risk as potential witnesses to or victims of violence." The Brotherhood says it cannot control families that choose to camp out. Neither authorities nor the guards have made clear how women and children will be able to safely leave if rocks start flying and tear gas is fired. In past clashes, birdshot and live bullets were allegedly used by both sides. Saber Mohammed Mansour, who is from Egypt's Sinai Peninsula, has spent 44 days as a guard at the main camp. Dressed in a traditional "galabiya," a long loose garment, Mansour said he is willing to die for the cause.

August 13, 2013: Massacre in Egypt'

Dozens Dead as Egyptian Forces Commit 3rd Mass Killing of Pro-Morsi Demonstrators' 'Democracy Now' a daily independent global news hour with Amy Goodman & Juan González:

Security forces have committed a new mass killing of Muslim Brotherhood demonstrators supporting the ousted president, Mohamed Morsi. Dozens of people have been reportedly killed in raids on two pro-Morsi encampments in Cairo. Alastair Beach, Cairo correspondent for The Independent, has been visiting morgues near Rabaa al -Adawiya Square where scores of bodies are reportedly being held. Speaking to us from a hospital where the injured are being treated, Beach says he has personally counted about 83 or 84 bodies today, most of them with gunshot wounds to the head, indicating they have been shot by police snipers.

Transcript

This is a rush transcript. Copy may not be in its final form.

AMY GOODMAN: We go to breaking news in Egypt, where forces have committed a new mass killing of Muslim Brotherhood demonstrators supporting the ousted president, Mohamed Morsi. Dozens of people have been reportedly killed in raids on two pro-Morsi encampments in Cairo. We turn now to Alastair Beach, Cairo correspondent for The Independent. He’s been visiting morgues in Rabaa, where scores of bodies are reportedly being held. He says he has personally counted about 83 or 84 bodies today, most of them with gunshot wounds to the head, indicating they’ve been shot by police snipers. He spoke to us from a hospital where the injured were being treated. Listen carefully.

ALASTAIR BEACH: I’m in the center of the injured people surrounding on the floor all around me. There’s five or six floors of the hospital, and they’re just telling them to move, such is the level of injuries and dying who have been there, who have been admitted. There's people being treated on the stairs. Every other minute, it seems, another body is being forced through the front door. All the while there's just [inaudible] gunfire, automatic, ringing out throughout the encampment. There's two makeshift—at least two makeshift morgues which have been established. I was in one of them in a field hospital a couple of hours ago. There were 42 bodies there at the time. I wouldn't be surprised if that number has risen. There's a second one I went to close by in which at least 31 bodies were being kept. [inaudible] and it's so chaotic that the injured are being treated in the same room as the dead bodies are being kept.

I've also been to the—at a mosque which lies at the center of the sit-in. At the moment it's crammed full with hundreds of women and children. At the center of the mosque, on the carpet, there were 10 bodies lying on the floor with a cordon surrounding them. All the while, of course, there's sustained bursts of gunfire ringing out around this pit and outside. It's an extremely precarious situation. The doctors I've spoken to have spoken of hundreds of people who have been hit. There's no [inaudible], and there wasn't enough time. This is an ongoing situation. But it is an extremely, extremely dangerous situation unfolding in Cairo right now.
AMY GOODMAN: Alastair Beach, Cairo correspondent for The Independent, reporting from a hospital in Cairo, saying there are likely hundreds of people dead as gunshots continue to ring out in Cairo.

August 14, 2013: In Egypt police moved in on two groups of Islamic radical demonstrators who had established long-term (six weeks so far) occupations of areas in the capital. The occupations were part of an effort to get recently deposed president Morsi reinstated. The protestors refused to move and force was used. Nearly 300 people died, over 80 percent of them civilians. In response small groups of Islamic radicals attacked government buildings, media centers, hospitals, and so on. By the end of the day the government had declared 30 days of martial law (a state of emergency). The Islamic radicals have tried to avoid violence because the last time they went that way in the 1990s, the extremists among them began killing civilians indiscriminately and that turned the population against them. Egyptians have not forgotten this and again feel that the Islamic radicals (in the form of the Moslem Brotherhood) are becoming a cure worse than the disease.

August 14, 2013: Egyptian troops move against pro-Morsi sit-ins'

CAIRO (AP): By Hamza Hendawi and Maggie Michael— Egyptian security forces, backed by armored cars and bulldozers, moved on Wednesday to clear two sit-in camps by supporters of the country's ousted President Mohammed Morsi, showering protesters with tear gas as the sound of gunfire rang out at both sites, state television and security officials said. At least two members of the security forces were confirmed to have died in the morning's crackdown while a group representing the protesters said as many as 25 protesters were killed in one of the camps. The smaller of the two camps was cleared of protesters by late morning, with most of them taking refuge in the nearby Orman botanical gardens and inside the sprawling campus of Cairo University. However, security forces remained on the fringes of the other camp in the eastern Nasr City district after it showered the encampment with tear gas. Television footage from there showed thousands of protesters congregating at the heart of the site, with many wearing gas masks or covering their faces to fend off the tear gas.

A security official said a total of 200 protesters have been arrested from both sites. The official spoke on condition of anonymity because he was not authorized to speak to the media.

The Anti-Coup Alliance, an umbrella of pro-Morsi supporters, said in a statement that 25 were killed and dozens injured in the attack on the Nasr City camp, claiming that security forces used live ammunition. The Interior Ministry, which is in charge of the police, said it only used tear gas and that its forces came under fire from the camp. Two policemen were killed and five were injured by gunfire, it said. A ministry statement also warned that forces would deal firmly with protesters acting "irresponsibly," suggesting that it would respond in kind if its men are fired upon. It said it would guarantee safe passage to those who want to leave the Nasr City site but would arrest those wanted for questioning by prosecutors. An Associated Press television video journalist at the scene in Nasr City said he could hear the screams of women as a cloud of white smoke hung over the protest encampment. He said a bulldozer was removing mounds of sand bags and brick walls built earlier by the protesters as a defense line in their camp. Army troops did not take part in the two operations, but provided security in the areas. Police and army helicopters hovered over both sites as plumes of smoke rose over the city skyline. The simultaneous actions by the Egyptian forces began shortly after 7 a.m. (0500 GMT). Regional television networks were showing images of collapsed tents and burning tires at both sites, with ambulances on standby. They were also showing protesters being arrested and led away by black-clad policemen.

At one point, state television showed footage of some dozen protesters, mostly bearded, cuffed and sitting on a sidewalk under guard outside the Cairo University campus. At least 250 people have died in clashes in Egypt following Morsi's ouster in a military coup that followed days of mass protests by millions of Egyptians calling for his removal. Supporters of the Islamist president want him reinstated. "The world cannot sit back and watch while innocent men, women and children are being indiscriminately slaughtered. The world must stand up to the military junta's crime before it is too late," said a statement by the Muslim Brotherhood, the Islamist group from which Morsi hails. We go to breaking news in Egypt, where security forces have committed a new mass killing of Muslim Brotherhood demonstrators supporting the ousted president, Mohamed Morsi. Dozens of people have been reportedly killed in raids on two pro-Morsi encampments in Cairo. Alastair Beach, Cairo correspondent for The Independent, has been visiting morgues near Rabaa al -Adawiya Square where scores of bodies are reportedly being held. Speaking to us from a hospital where the injured are being treated, Beach says he has personally counted about 83 or 84 bodies today, most of them with gunshot wounds to the head, indicating they have been shot by police snipers.

August 15, 2013: Death toll from Egypt violence rises to 638, according to MoH'

CAIRO (AP) — The Egyptian Ministry of Health has raised the death toll from the day's violence that followed a crackdown on two camps housing supporters of the ousted president to 638. Ministry spokesman Mohammed Fathallah told The Associated Press on Thursday that the number of injured in the previous day's violence also has risen to 3,994. Wednesday's violence began when police moved to clear two protest camps housing mainly Islamist protesters calling for Mohammed Morsi's reinstatement. The crackdown prompted clashes elsewhere in Cairo and other cities. Fathallah said 288 of the dead were killed in the larger of the two camps, in Cairo's eastern Nasr City district.

August 16, 2013: Saudi king backs Egypt's rulers against 'terrorism'

RIYADH (Reuters) - Saudi King Abdullah called on Arabs on Friday to stand together against "attempts to destabilize" Egypt, in a message of support for the military leadership and an attack on the Muslim Brotherhood. "The Kingdom of Saudi Arabia, its people and government, stood and stands today with its brothers in Egypt against terrorism," he said in a message read out on Saudi television, in an apparent reference to continuing clashes between the Muslim Brotherhood and police. "I call on the honest men of Egypt and the Arab and Muslim nations ... to stand as one man and with one heart in the face of attempts to destabilize a country that is at the forefront of Arab and Muslim history," he added. Hundreds were killed in Egypt this week when the security forces cleared protest camps set up by the Muslim Brotherhood to demonstrate against the military's ousting of President Mohamed Mursi last month. Saudi Arabia was a close ally of former President Hosni Mubarak - the veteran strongman brought down by a popular uprising in 2011 - and it fears the spread of Muslim Brotherhood ideology to the Gulf monarchies. It pledged $5 billion in aid to Egypt after the Islamist Mursi was ousted. King Abdullah's statement was Saudi Arabia's first comment on the turmoil in Egypt, a country it sees as an essential ally against Shi'ite Muslim Iran and anti-Western Islamist groups. "All those who meddle in Egypt's internal affairs are inflaming strife," he said, adding that the North African country faces "a conspiracy of plotters" trying to strike at its unity and stability.

August 17, 2013: Pro-Morsy supporters attacked Coptic churches all over Egypt'

CAIRO, Egypt: Muslim brotherhood supporters surmounted large scale attack on Coptic christian synagogs and religious institutions, which will definitely be followed by waves of attacks on moderate muslim Egyptians, will in the long run hurt their fight for their rights, and result in bringing little sympathy from the international community.

August 17, 2013: Gunbattle fought in Cairo mosque as Egypt mulls IB ban’

CAIRO (Reuters) By Issam Abdallah and Crispian Balmer - Security forces cleared a Cairo mosque after a gunbattle with followers of the Muslim Brotherhood on Saturday, while Egypt's army-backed government, facing deepening chaos, considered banning the Islamist group. Three Reuters witnesses saw gunmen shoot from a window of the al-Fath mosque, where supporters of deposed president Mohammed Mursi had taken shelter during ferocious confrontations in the heart of the Egyptian capital on Friday. Another gunman was shown on television shooting from the mosque's minaret and soldiers outside returning fire. Hours later, police moved in and secured the building, making scores of arrests as crowds on the streets cheered them on. It was not clear if anyone died in the clashes
- the fourth day of violence in Egypt, which has killed almost 800 people. Troubles were also reported in the second city Alexandria, where an office run by the Muslim Brotherhood was set ablaze. With anger rising on all sides, Prime Minister Hazem el-Beblawi proposed disbanding the Brotherhood, raising the stakes in a bloody struggle between the state and Islamists for control of the Arab world's most populous nation. "We are not facing political divisions, we are facing a war being waged by extremists developing daily into terrorism," presidential political adviser Mostafa Hegazy told reporters. "We will win this war not only with security procedures, but according to the law and within the framework of human rights." If Beblawi's proposal to disband the Brotherhood is acted on, it would force the group underground and could herald large-scale arrests against its members placed outside the law.

Many Western allies have denounced the recent wave of killings, including the United States, alarmed by the mayhem in a country which has a strategic peace treaty with Israel and operates the Suez Canal, a major artery of global trade. However, Saudi Arabia threw its weight behind the army-backed government on Friday, accusing its old foes in the Muslim Brotherhood of trying to destabilize Egypt. The health ministry said 173 people died in clashes across Egypt on Friday, including 95 in central Cairo, after the Brotherhood called a "Day of Rage" to denounce a crackdown on its followers on Wednesday that killed at least 578 people. Fifty-seven policemen died over the past three days, the interior ministry said. Among those killed on Friday was a son of Muslim Brotherhood leader Mohammed Badie, shot dead close to al-Fath mosque, which was rapidly transformed into a makeshift morgue and a refuge for hundreds of Mursi's supporters, looking to escape the bloodshed. The building was surrounded overnight and police fired volleys of tear gas into the carpeted prayer hall in the early afternoon, filling the hall with billowing white smoke and leaving those inside gasping for breath. Soon afterwards gunshots rang out from both sides.

MASS ARRESTS: Egyptian authorities said they rounded up more than 1,000 Islamists after Friday's protests, showing one handcuffed man on television with an automatic gun on his lap. Security sources said Mohamed Al-Zawahiri, the brother of al Qaeda leader Ayman Al-Zawahiri, had also been detained. "Friday was a very bad, ugly day. There were attacks on police stations, ministries. The situation is very bad," the prime minister told reporters. "There will be no reconciliation with those whose hands have been stained with blood and who turned weapons against the state and its institutions." The Brotherhood was officially dissolved by Egypt's military rulers in 1954, but registered itself as a non-governmental organization in March in a response to a court case brought by opponents of the group who were contesting its legality. Founded in 1928, the movement has deep roots in the provinces and has a legally registered political arm - the Freedom and Justice Party - which was set up in 2011 after unrest that led to the downfall of the autocratic Hosni Mubarak. The Brotherhood won all five elections that followed the toppling of Mubarak, and Mursi governed the country for just a year until he was undermined by mammoth rallies called by critics who denounced his rule as incompetent and partisan. Army chief Abdel Fattah al -Sisi says he removed Mursi from office on July 3 to protect the country from possible civil war.

CHURCHES DESTROYED: Brotherhood spokesman Gehad El-Haddad said on Saturday the police had started to arrest the sons and daughters of the organization's leadership in an effort to gain leverage. Despite the bloodshed, the Islamist group has urged its supporters to take to the streets every day this coming week, but there was no sign of large rallies by late Saturday. "Our rejection of the coup regime has become an Islamic, national and ethical obligation that we can never abandon," said the Brotherhood, which has accused the military of plotting the downfall of Mursi to regain the levers of power. In the first attack of its kind yet reported, a bomb blast ripped through the garden wall of the Egyptian consulate in the city of Benghazi on Saturday in neighboring Libya, injuring a security guard. No one claimed immediate responsibility. Worryingly for the Egyptian army, violence was reported across the country on Friday, with deaths reported in at least eight cities and towns, suggesting it might struggle to impose control on the vast, largely desert state. The government said 12 churches had been attacked and burned on Friday, blaming the Islamists for the destruction. Foreign journalists in Cairo said they faced regular harassment as they tried to report on the clashes, with a number detained by police and civilian vigilante groups unhappy with coverage of the disturbances.

HYPERLINK "http://www.ethiopianreview.com/content/48619" Massacre In Egypt’

Updates - Dozens dead as Egyptian forces commit 3rd mass killing of pro-Morsi demonstrators. Security forces have committed a new mass killing of Muslim Brotherhood demonstrators supporting the ousted president, Mohamed Morsi. Dozens of people have been reportedly killed in raids on two pro-Morsi encampments in Cairo. Alastair Beach, Cairo correspondent for The Independent, has been visiting morgues near Rabaa al -Adawiya Square where scores of bodies are reportedly being held. Speaking to us from a hospital where the injured are being treated, Beach says he has personally counted about 83 or 84 bodies today, most of them with gunshot wounds to the head, indicating they have been shot by police snipers.

Egypt’s Coptic Christians face unprecedented reprisals from the Muslim Brotherhood’

CAIRO — Islamist mobs have torched schools and businesses owned by Christians, looted churches and even paraded captive nuns through the streets of a city south of Cairo in a display of rage unseen in Egypt’s recent history. The campaign of killing and arson is retaliation for the tiny Christian community’s support of the military coup that ousted President Mohammed Morsi and his Muslim Brotherhood government. “The Muslim Brotherhood were the ones who called for aggression [against Christians]. They are responsible,” said the Rev. Khalil Fawzi, a pastor at Kasr El Dubarrah Evangelical Church, the largest evangelical congregation in the Middle East. “Either they are in control or they burn Egypt.” Since the military removed Mr. Morsi seven weeks ago, his supporters have burned at least 44 churches and ransacked more than 20 other Christian institutions throughout Egypt. Most of the attacks were in regions south of Cairo. In the capital, police and neighborhood watch groups protected many churches and Christian-owned shops. At least six Christians and one Muslim working at a Christian-owned shop have been killed since Mr. Morsi was removed July 3, human rights activists said. Nearly 900 people in all have died in clashes between security forces and Morsi supporters. Coptic Christians make up about 9 percent of Egypt’s population of 85 million, and other Christian denominations about 1 percent. The vast majority of Egyptians are Sunni Muslims.

MOB ASSAULTS NUNS: The most shocking assault against Christians occurred at a Roman Catholic school in the Bani Suef province south of Cairo when Islamists captured three nuns and several school employees. The extremists “paraded us like prisoners of war,” said Sister Manal, the school principal. After six hours of abuse, they escaped from the mob after a Muslim woman who taught at the school sheltered them in her home. In another attack in Beni Suef, a volunteer for the Coptic Orphans international adoption agency was hospitalized after more than a dozen people assaulted him as he was trying to rescue his sister and nephew. The organization, which has been active in Egypt since 1998, called the rise in violence against Copts “unprecedented.” Islamists have been assaulting Coptic Christians since the 2011 revolution that overthrew the autocratic Hosni Mubarak, but the attacks have intensified since the ouster of Mr. Morsi, the country’s first democratically elected leader. Coptic Pope Tawadros II stood beside Egypt’s leading Sunni imam, Sheik Ahmed El Tayeb, and Gen. Abdel-Fattah el-Sissi as the military leader announced the overthrow and detention of Mr. Morsi. Millions of protesters demanded

Mr. Morsi's removal in June after he imposed increasingly harsh Islamic laws and failed to revive a crippled economy. Egypt's Coptic Church last week said it backed the military's move against "armed violent groups and black terrorism."

The Muslim Brotherhood and other Islamist groups have denounced Christians at public events, over social media and on pro-Morsi TV channels. However, the Muslim Brotherhood and the radical Islamist group Gamaa Islameya have denied responsibility for the attacks. "Although some Coptic leaders may have supported or even participated in the July 3 coup, for one reason or another, no such attacks can be justifiable," Muslim Brotherhood spokesman Murad Ali said. "Ongoing acts of vandalism are aimed at damaging our reputation, demonizing our peaceful revolution and finding justification for the July 3 coup commanders and collaborators to continue their acts of repression and violence." Still, the Facebook page of the Muslim Brotherhood's local branch in the Cairo suburb of Helwan accuses the Coptic Church of siding with the military and warned, "For every action there is a reaction." Mr. Fawzi, the evangelical pastor, suspects the Islamists are trying to goad Christians into a violent response. "They hoped the Christians will retaliate by killing and a civil war would start," he said. "I praise Christians for their patriotic attitude."

POLICE FAILED TO HELP: failed to help: Human rights advocates criticize the Egyptian police and military for failing to protect Christians. "The police have never come to protect the churches or to respond after the attacks," said Ishak Ibrahim, a researcher who is tracking the attacks on the Christian community for the Egyptian Initiative for Personal Rights, a Cairo-based nonprofit. "Also, no firetrucks have been sent." "Egyptian security officials bear responsibility for their failure to protect churches and Christian communities against predictable reprisal attacks," said Joe Storck, the Middle East and North Africa director at Human Rights Watch. Gen. el-Sissi told state TV that he ordered the armed forces to repair all damaged churches in "recognition of the historical and national role pla yed by our Coptic brothers." The military, which controls up to a third of Egypt's economy, manages businesses in the construction industry and handles construction of its own buildings and roads. Even before the outbreak of violence that followed the dispersal of the pro-Morsi sit-ins last week, the Coptic community was under increasing attack, Mr. Ibrahim said. "Various Islamist groups, including the Brotherhood, have been calling for the attacks on Christians and churches," he said, "although no one knows who is actually doing the specific attacks." Coptic Christians have expressed strong support for Gen. el-Sissi’s crackdown on the Brotherhood and the arrests of many of its leaders. “I’m proud of what the army is doing and what Sissi is doing,” said Mariam Farrag, a shopkeeper in Coptic Cairo, a part of the capital with some of the world’s oldest Christian relics and sites. “Things will be great again,” she said as she smiled and restocked her shop. Source: The Washington Times

August 19, 2013: Egyptian capital becomes battle zone amid crisis’

By AYA BATRAWY CAIRO (AP) - Soldiers fired their rifles in the air to keep a crowd from attacking supporters of ousted President Mohammed Morsi as they were being taken, one by one, out of the Al-Fath mosque in Cairo where they had been besieged by security forces overnight. One man in the crowd, however, was able to reach over the soldiers and strike a detained protester with a stick. Others chanted against Morsi's Muslim Brotherhood group. The scene encapsulated the venomous mood in Cairo. The streets of Egypt's capital have become a deadly battleground between Morsi's supporters and backers of the military that overthrew him. The crisis has severed friendships and, in some cases, turned neighbor against neighbor in the city of more than 18 million people. More than 450 people have been killed in Cairo over the past four days, just over half the country's nationwide death toll during the week of violence. Hundreds of those victims died when Egyptian security forces attacked two pro-Morsi sit-ins in Cairo on Wednesday. How events play out in Cairo could largely determine whether Egypt can step back from the brink of chaos. Over the weekend, street battles raged throughout the metropolis, once a stable corner of the Middle East. Armed civilians and security forces fought armed Morsi supporters and protesters. People openly fired automatic rifles and pistols at one another on main overpasses and roads. Most residents cowered in their homes, many staying clear of windows and balconies.

Metro stations near protest sites are closed, and military tanks enforce an army-imposed state of emergency that grants security forces broad powers to make arrests. Residents have locked entrances to their apartment buildings, and police stations and prisons have come under attack. The city, normally bustling at all hours of the day and night, now slips into an eerie quiet interrupted at times by gunfire during an 11-hour curfew that starts at 7 p.m. The usually gridlocked streets are devoid of nighttime traffic. Vigilantes and police dressed in civilian clothes stand at makeshift roadblocks, frisking people without identifying themselves. Many brandish guns. The Interior Ministry warned civilians Sunday against breaking the curfew to man checkpoints. Some grocery stores are running low on merchandise, with bread cleared from the shelves and residents stocking up on water and canned food. Banks opened for just three hours Sunday after being closed for four days. Others cannot see friends and family who live on opposite ends of the city because marches and protests have made road conditions unpredictable. For taxi driver Ahmed Hosni, the blocked roads, violence and curfew have choked his income. He spends his nights instead at a civilian checkpoint in the poor neighborhood of Basateen. Hosni had voted for Morsi, but a year later joined the calls for his ouster. He also took part in mass protests last month in support of military action against "potential terrorism" by the Brotherhood. He said he was upset by the bloodshed that followed. "We are living off what we have in the coming days," said the 31-year-old, who provides for his mother and siblings. "God is with us all these coming days." Along major roads of the upscale neighborhood of Mohandiseen, apartment buildings are riddled with bullet holes, the sidewalks are strewn with broken glass, public benches have been ripped out of the ground and several cars are smashed from last week's fighting, sparked by anger at police for clearing out the sit-ins. Stores were looted in the mayhem.

Dozens of policemen and tanks stand guard outside a main mosque where the Brotherhood's supporters tried to create another encampment in Mohandiseen. Mohammed Hamed Abdel-Khairy, who owns 20 area stores that sell men's suits, stood outside one of his shops to monitor employees as they reinforced iron bars on the door and taped newspapers to the glass to keep thieves from peering in. He said three stores around him were robbed Wednesday during the clashes on El-Batal Ahmed Abdel-Aziz Street. "This will definitely affect my business. ... I don't believe we will sell at all this month," he said. Abdel-Khairy said that he carries a licensed gun and that his employees have truncheons in the stores for safety. He defended the clearing of the two pro-Morsi sit-ins by security forces. Riot police, backed by bulldozers, armored cars and snipers, killed more than 378 people in the raids on the encampments. "There was no other way," he said. "How can we eat and live if protests are cutting off roads?" He said that mistakes were made by security forces when unarmed protesters were killed alongside some brandishing weapons, but he brushed it off as God's will. He reiterated a familiar refrain sounded by many Egyptians, government officials and local media: "You are dealing with a highly trained terrorist group." That hardened sentiment is echoed elsewhere in Cairo. Brotherhood figure Salah Soltan told Al-Jazeera that he was stopped by armed men at a makeshift checkpoint who recognized him from his television appearances. The men, who he suspects were state security officials in civilian clothes, forced him and a sheik with him out of the car and took their phones and identification cards. He said the two were then threatened with violence and forced to walk through narrow alleyways where residents angry with the Brotherhood tried to attack them. He said a local sheik held the residents off with his pleas. "One group wanted to kill us, one group wanted to hand us over to the army," he said. An influential local resident intervened after neighbors pulled weapons on one another in arguments over how to deal with Soltan, who is wanted by police on charges of inciting violence. Soltan said the local leader helped sneak the two away.

A little more than two years ago, the scene in Cairo was starkly different. While there was some looting and a curfew that was less strictly enforced, Egypt was largely united in its bid to overthrow autocratic President Hosni Mubarak after 30 years. There was hope the revolution's rallying cry of "bread, freedom and social justice" would yield results. Young activists painted sidewalks, planted flowers and cleaned up the streets. Later, when Morsi was narrowly elected last year, the country's first freely elected president stood in Tahrir Square, the site of anti-government protests, and opened his suit jacket to show he didn't need a bulletproof vest or the tight security of his deposed predecessor. But Morsi, a longtime Brotherhood leader, failed to include other factions in his decision-making and cast his critics as conspirators and Mubarak-era loyalists. Political divisions deepened and the economy tumbled. A little before curfew over the weekend, men gathered for daily rituals of tea, cigarettes and conversation. A group sitting at the local corner coffee shop in the middle - class neighborhood of Shobra said the decision by the country's army chief to oust Morsi saved the country from a Syria-like scenario. They criticized Western nations that called it a coup. Ahmed Ragab sat on a plastic chair underneath a street sign plastered with a rundown sticker that urged people to "Go Down" to the streets June 30 and oust Morsi. Ragab, a government employee who took part in those protests, said he supports the crackdown on the Brotherhood. "If you have roaches in the kitchen that are eating away at your food. What do you do? You spray them," he said. "These are not Islamists. They are terrorists."

August 24, 2013: Egypt Leading activist says the revolution back at square one’

By Tom Perry: CAIRO (Reuters) - Ahmed Maher's April 6 movement helped lead the uprising that toppled Hosni Mubarak in 2011. With Mubarak now out of jail, he says the revolution is back to square one, and could take a generation to prevail. After the bloodiest week in Egypt's modern history, Maher fears the consequences of the hatred that has split the country into two rival camps: the army-led state and its backers, and the Islamists they removed from power on July 3. "Our problem is there is a wave of madness. People tell you: 'We must eradicate them'," Maher said, saying such attitudes had emerged on both sides. "There must be a third voice." The assessment from one of Egypt's best - known activists underlines the bleak outlook for the country whose January 25, 2011, uprising inspired pro-democracy revolts across the Arab world. Maher, 32, says it may now be another generation before the goals of the revolution - freedom, social justice and dignity - are secured. He spoke at a rundown Cairo office where the walls were covered with stickers bearing witness to non-stop activism since 2011: campaigns first against the generals who replaced Mubarak, and later against the elected Muslim Brotherhood-led government. Protest work itself is becoming a victim of the latest bloodshed: April 6 canceled a rally on Friday against Mubarak's release out of fears it might lead to violence.

"We view ourselves back at square one, because what is happening now could be more dangerous, more complicated than what was there before January 25, 2011," Maher said. "We don't fully understand what is happening in the new regime," he said. "There are fears of the return of the old regime, its people and methods." "There are also extremist, radical armed groups." Maher's April 6 was one of the youth movements that galvanized Egyptians during the 18-day uprising that ended when the army forced Mubarak aside on February 11, 2011. But like most secular groups, it failed to make much of a political mark once Mubarak was toppled - a failure that helped the Islamists win election after election, culminating with last year's presidential vote that brought Mohamed Mursi to power. April 6 backed Mursi in that vote, but later turned its countrywide activist network against him, echoing critics who said his Muslim Brotherhood was seeking to entrench its power even as it failed in government. It gathered 2 million signatures for the Tamarod petition campaign that helped to mobilize protests against Mursi. "When the army came to power after January 25, the alternative was the Brotherhood. Then the Brotherhood came, and the alternative was the military," he said. "The problem was the two-sided equation from the start. There must be a real alternative."

DIFFICULT TO SPEAK OUT: The Brotherhood is now facing one of the toughest crackdowns in its 85-year history. Since Mursi's downfall, the security forces have killed at least 1,000 of his supporters, most of them last week when the police used force to break up their two Cairo protest camps. Some 100 soldiers and police were also killed in bloodshed that has raised fears that an armed Islamist insurrection could ensue, even as the Brotherhood continues to disavow violence. The police are arresting Brotherhood leaders and supporters across the country. State media say Egypt is fighting terrorism. Maher said public hatred of the Brotherhood was now running so deep that it was difficult for activists to speak out about worrying trends such as the re-imposition of a state of emergency. "Everyone is directed towards the idea of the 'war on terror', and if there are violations, they are being ignored." Mubarak's release on Thursday was a symbolic victory for supporters of the veteran autocrat. Though he is being retried for ordering the killing of protesters in the 2011 uprising, there are no longer any legal grounds for his detention. "Naturally, there are fears, especially after the release of Mubarak," Maher said. "But as a revolution, we knew at the start there could be many setbacks ... We were expecting difficulties. But nobody thought it would be this complicated." "I should be depressed, and I am depressed, but I still have hope, even with these complications, the violence, these fears. I still have confidence that one day we will see a new Egypt," he said. "My generation might not see these changes. We might be paving the way for the new generation to see these changes."

August 24, 2013: Egypt reopened the only legal crossing from Gaza into Egypt, after having closed it for five days because of a terrorist threat. Since the military took control of the Egyptian government on July 3rd there have been growing restrictions on Gazans entering Egypt.

August 27, 2013: In the Egyptian capital some 10,000 Moslem Brotherhood members and supporters demonstrated against the new military government. At least six demonstrators were killed and over 50 wounded. There were smaller demonstrations in other cities. The Islamic conservatives have little public support. The army, on the other hand, has a lot of public support. That will change if the economic situation does not make some significant improvements. Meanwhile, on the Israeli border one Egyptian man was killed and another wounded when they would not stop moving towards the border fence and Israeli troops opened fire.

August 30, 2013: Egypt's Christians Restrain Anger After Church Attacks by Morsy Supporters’

MINYA (AFP) - Coptic Christians in the Upper Egyptian city of Minya are restraining their anger despite a wave of devastating attacks on their churches and institutions by enraged Islamists. Tensions are still running high more than two weeks after the attacks in the city some 250km south of Cairo but there have been no calls for vengeance, nor any fiery rhetoric. “I say to the Islamists who attacked us that we are not afraid of their violence and their desire to exterminate the Copts,” said Botros Fahim Awad Hanna, the archbishop of Minya. “If we are not hitting back, it is not because we are afraid, but because we are sensible,” he said. Enraged by a bloody crackdown mid-August on protests in support of ousted president Mohammad Mursi in Cairo, Islamists lashed out at Coptic Christians in Minya, accusing them of backing the military that toppled the head of state. The Copts, who account for some 10 million out of Egypt’s population of 80 million, had already suffered persecution in recent years. But they say they have never had such a systematic campaign as this. “We were expecting a violent reaction but not on this scale, which suggests it was well prepared,” the archbishop said.

In the greater Minya province, where Christians account for about one - fifth of the five million population, Christians say they have suffered systematic and coordinated violence since mid-August. According to Human Rights Watch, more than 40 churches have been attacked in Egypt since August 14, when the security forces launched a bloody crackdown against demonstrations demanding the return of Morsi, who was toppled by the military on July 3. The attacks have been concentrated in Minya and Assiut, in central Egypt, where attackers torched 11 and eight churches respectively, the US-based rights group said. Islamists accused Egypt’s Copts of throwing their weight behind the military coup that removed from power the Muslim Brotherhood, from which Mursi hails. The perception was fuelled by the fact that Coptic Pope Tawadros II appeared with army chief General Abdul Fattah Al Sissi when he spoke on television to announce Mursi’s removal from office. At the ruins of Saint Moses’ church in Minya, Bassam Youssef, a Copt, despairs at the sight of the rounded building with its clock tower, now ravaged by fire. “Around 500 extremists attacked the building and set it on fire,” Youssef recalled. “We did not expect such violence,” he added, showing pictures of the church before its destruction. “Look at this beautiful mosaic that decorated the interior balcony, there’s nothing left and we will need five to six years to rebuild everything.” The centre of Minya is a tangle of shops bearing a mix of Christian and Muslim names, and home to both churches and mosques, some just dozens of metres from each other. Not far from Saint Moses' church, Um Saleh watched over what is left of the Coptic school, which was also set alight.

“We heard them calling for jihad and we rushed out of the area, terrified,” she recalled. From one of the windows of the school, it is possible to see the scorched dome of the Prince Theodore church. Several metres away, a Coptic orphanage has also been burned. “May God forgive you despite what you have done,” reads a slogan daubed on the walls of the orphanage, now empty of its young wards. At the headquarters of the Jesuit Brothers’ development association in the town, Father Biman is working to clear the debris after the attacks. Fire destroyed the library, a nursery and the offices, but spared the nearby church of Saint Mark, which has stood there for 125 years. “I am very angry,” Biman says, before regaining his composure. “I also have compassion for the attackers, who have been brainwashed”. He points to his T-shirt, which has a slogan on it calling to spread love around the world. Maria Hanaa, an official at the Jesuit association, sees the attacks as a direct result of the community’s antipathy towards Morsi. “We demonstrated against president Morsi and it is the first time we did it, and we paid the price,” she says. “We marched because we felt that we were going to lose the country. We thought that they were going to bring justice, but we saw that they were only looking for power”.

September 5, 2013: In Cairo the Egyptian Interior Minister escaped injury after a bomb went off near his car. A few days later a terrorist group in Gaza took credit for the attack.

In Cairo a bomb exploded at a police station but there were no injuries. Another bomb was found on the rail line between Suez and Ismailia where it was disabled.

September 7, 2013: Egypt launched its largest military operation in Sinai since the 1973 War. Twelve villages were visited by troops who searched buildings and seemed to be looking for specific individuals. There was resistance in several villages and several dozen casualties, including nine terrorists and two soldiers dead and over a dozen terrorists arrested. These raids are to continue for at least a few days.

September 9, 2013: In Sinai 1 Islamic terrorist was killed when the terrorists clashed with soldiers along a road.

The government will enforce the prohibition against unlicensed clerics preaching in Mosques. There are believed to be about 55,000 such illegal preachers, most of them Morsi supporters.

September 11, 2013: In the northern Sinai (Rafah, a town near Gaza) 2 suicide car bombs killed 7 soldiers and 2 terrorists. Over the last week army raids in the area have killed 30 Islamic terrorists and arrested at least as many.

September 12, 2013: For the first time Egyptian armored vehicles have entered Gaza, with two M-1 tanks going past the fence marking the border zone. The tanks did not go past the wall that marks the extent of Hamas controlled territory.

September 13, 2013: As usual, Friday brought more pro-Morsi demonstrators out on to the streets. Friday is the Moslem day of prayer and the day when the Mosques have the most people showing up to pray and hear sermons. Most of the clerics are pro-Morsi. In Cairo there are also more anti-Morsi demonstrations, and police are having a more difficult time keeping the pro and anti-Morsi crowds apart.

September 14, 2013: In the Sinai Peninsula the Egyptian military launched an offensive against Islamic terrorists. Within 5 days 29 Islamic terrorists had been killed, 30 arrested, and several caches of weapons and bomb making materials were seized. The army suffered about a dozen casualties, including 3 dead. The offensive continues, mostly in the north near Gaza. Police also raided Islamic radical camps set up outside Cairo (housing demonstrators who went into the Cairo to call for Islamic president Morsi to be reinstated). Some people from these camps formed mobs to attack police stations near the camps.

September 16, 2013: The Egyptian government will shorten the nightly curfew from 7 to 5 hours and extended the state of emergency (martial law) by 2 months. The state of emergency was first declared on August 14th, when the army cleared 2 large camps outside Cairo that were occupied by Morsi supporters from other parts of the country. About 1,000 people were killed in that operation.

September 18, 2013: Egypt, like many countries that support the destruction of Israel, has long been hospitable to Islamic terrorist groups that seek to carry out attacks against Israel. As many other Arab nations have discovered, this policy often does not work out as intended. Not only have the hosted terrorists been unable to make many successful attacks on Israel, but these same Islamic radical organizations tend to turn on their hosts. This happens quite frequently. Every decade or so Egypt has had to carry out a major counter-terror campaign to eliminate the Islamic terrorists who talk about destroying Israel but instead end up attacking the Egyptian government because it is not Islamic enough.

This time around the problem is more complex, because the terrorist group Hamas has been in control of Gaza (and 40 percent of the Palestinians living adjacent to Israel) and has been hosting even more Islamic terror groups inside Gaza. This includes Islamic terrorists who also want to turn Egypt into a religious dictatorship, no matter what the cost. Hamas tried to keep these anti-Egypt radical groups under control, but the best Hamas could do was convince the Egyptians that they were doing just that. Hamas lied, and the anti-Egypt terrorists have spread to the Sinai Peninsula (a largely desert area that lies between Gaza, and Israel, and the Suez Canal). In the Sinai the terrorists have joined with the Bedouin smuggling gangs and have been attacking Egyptian police and government officials. The Bedouin want to be left alone (something these nomads have been seeking for thousands of years) and the Islamic terrorists want to use the Sinai as a base area for attacks into the more populated parts of Egypt.

There are only about a million people in the Sinai and over 83 million in the rest of Egypt. About half the Sinai population is Bedouin, the rest are Egyptians who came as government officials or to work on the Suez Canal or the new tourist enterprises in the Sinai. Discriminated against by Egyptians, and feeling disdain for Egyptian culture, many Bedouin find themselves unable to get jobs and their traditional lifestyle (herding and trade) is no longer able to support all of them. Smuggling has always been popular and people are eager to get into Israel (for jobs) and terror groups in Gaza pay well for weapons. Terrorists in Sinai have cash and will pay for shelter and other assistance from Bedouin. In the last two years the number of terrorists operating in Sinai has gone from a few hundred to over a thousand. These guys have nowhere to go but Egypt because the Israeli counter-terror measures of the last decade have made it virtually impossible to carry out terrorist attacks inside Israel.

Since another popular uprising (backed by the military) overthrew the recently elected Islamic government in early July, the Sinai terrorists have been at war with Egypt. Despite vigorous and frequent military and police raids in Sinai, most of the terrorists there have remained hidden, except when they attack the security forces or government officials. Noting that some of these terrorists still had bases in Sinai, for the last month Egypt has been shutting off access from Sinai into Gaza. That means destroying over 300 smuggling tunnels and destroying all buildings from the Gaza border fence and 500 meters into Egypt. This makes digging new tunnels more difficult and easier to detect. The one legal crossing from Gaza to Egypt is shut much of the time and when open it is carefully monitored. The Egyptian Navy has more ships guarding the Gaza coast and now fires on boats from Gaza that try to enter Egyptian waters without permission.

The Egyptians are now doing what the Israelis have been doing since Hamas took over Gaza in 2007 (two years after Israeli security forces pulled out). While Egypt has officially been at peace with Israel since 1979, the government has always supported anti-Israel attitudes in the media and among the population. Egypt also supported Palestinian resistance to Israel and has only, with great reluctance, cracked down on Hamas (which has always said its main goal was the destruction of Israel). Ever since Israel declared independence in 1948, all Arabs have been encouraged by their leaders to seek the destruction of Israel. This effort has been a colossal failure and has led to many Islamic radical groups that eventually turned on the Arab governments perceived as not eager enough to attack Israel. Thus, Egyptian leaders complain openly about their distaste for killing fellow Arabs while Israel remains untouched.

September 20, 2013: The Egyptian security forces have sent more personnel into Sinai and are openly admitting that the current raids and sweeps are meant to crush the Islamic terror groups in Sinai and isolate Gaza (a Palestinian territory run by Islamic terror group Hamas since 2007). In the last two months the Egyptians have made nearly 400 arrests in Sinai and killed over 100 Islamic terrorists. Over 10 tons of weapons have been seized so far, many of them had come from Gaza. There are now almost daily clashes in Sinai between Egyptian security forces and Islamic terrorists. Since June the Egyptian military has found and shut down some 95 percent of the Gaza smuggling tunnels. They are aiming for 100 percent by demolishing all buildings within a kilometer of the Gaza border. Shutting down the tunnels has reduced Gaza GDP by about 15 percent. The tunnels were built to get around cargo checks and customs fees at the official crossings from Egypt and Israel. Hamas made up for its lost customs income by charging the tunnel operators fees. Egypt tolerated the tunnels until this year, when they realized that they were a major source of personnel and equipment for the growing number of Islamic terrorists in Sinai. These terrorists were originally supposed to be attacking Israel but have increasingly become hostile to the Egyptian government as well. Meanwhile, the 2 months of pro-Morsi (the Islamic activist president deposed by mass demonstrations and an army coup in July) demonstrations have left over a 1,200 dead in Egypt, most of them

Morsi supporters. Most Egyptian counter-terrorism efforts are concentrated in the areas (along the Nile River) where most Egyptians live. The Sinai (where only about 1 percent of Egyptians live) has, until recently, been seen as a minor nuisance. That has changed.

September 20, 2013: In Sinai two days of police raids resulted in at least 85 arrests of terrorism suspects.

In Sinai an armored vehicle were hit by a roadside bomb, wounding two soldiers.

September 25, 2013: Egypt bans Muslim Brotherhood'

Deutsche Welle - An Egyptian court has banned the Muslim Brotherhood. But Egypt's oldest Islamist organization plans to continue its protests against the military-installed government. The government of Mohammed Morsi has been toppled. Most of the Muslim Brotherhood's leaders have been thrown in jail. And on Monday, a Cairo court dealt the movement another blow Judge Mohammed al-Sayed has imposed a ban on it. The lawsuit that led to the ban claimed that the Brotherhood represented a "harm to national security." The court also ordered the group's assets seized. The Brotherhood can appeal against the ruling. Since former President Morsi was ousted by the military on July 3, the Egyptian security forces have arrested more than 2,000 members of the Muslim Brotherhood. Nearly the entire leadership of the group now sits behind bars. Many members are in hiding - they hardly dare to leave their homes.

Revolution is getting bigger: Among them is a surgeon from a middle class neighborhood in Cairo who asked to remain anonymous. The father of a family, he has been active in the Muslim Brotherhood for years. He accuses the military government of reversing Egypt's progress: "They want to take the country back 50 or 60 years, when the Muslim Brotherhood was a banned organization and was not allowed to operate publicly. We're back in those days again." But the Islamists are continuing their peaceful demonstrations in Cairo and other major cities in Egypt. The surgeon is convinced that these protests will gain momentum in response to the court-ordered ban. "We are already considering new methods to put those responsible for the putsch under pressure and to force them to talk with us," he said. "The revolution is getting bigger. The military regime is making new enemies every day."

Social services shutdown: Some members of the Muslim Brotherhood believe that the ban will further damage the already crippled Egyptian economy, and eventually turn popular opinion against the military-backed government. In the past, the Muslim Brotherhood's nationwide network of social services helped fill gaps in the public welfare system, providing the poor with soup kitchens, help with finding jobs and free medicine. But since Morsi's ouster, the Brotherhood has had to shut down many of its aid programs. Not all Egyptians are upset about this. Critics have long accused the Brotherhood of using social services to buy support. "Mohammed Morsi was of no use to me," Mustafa Khaled, a strict Muslim, told DW. "He said good things, but he did nothing. I am a poor and have five kids. The Muslim Brotherhood hasn't done anything for me." The court-imposed ban is the opening act of a judicial marathon for the Brotherhood. In October, dozens of leading members of the organization will face trial, among them Mohammed Morsi. And in December, a court in Alexandria will decide whether to classify the Muslim Brotherhood as a terrorist organization.

Enemy of the state: Egyptian President Gamal Abdel-Nasser was the first to ban the Muslim Brotherhood in 1954, after the Islamist group fought a bloody power struggle with the army. Hosni Mubarak, who was overthrown in 2011, also threw many Brotherhood members behind bars. But overall, Mubarak granted the Brotherhood greater freedom. Under Mubarak, members were allowed to preach in mosques and run for parliament as independent candidates. After the 2011 revolution, the Brotherhood established a political wing, the Freedom and Justice Party. In March of this year, the Brotherhood registered itself as a non-government organization. But the court-imposed ban threatens to turn the Brotherhood's status as a legally permitted organization into a short intermezzo in its 85-year history.

Fears of radicalization: In front of a mosque in the south of Cairo, well known as a favorite meeting point for the Islamists, the ban is being heatedly discussed. A student with a long beard and wearing a white robe says he supports the Muslim Brotherhood. He starts railing against the country's new strongman, army chief Abdel Fattah el-Sissi: "It's just all a big show, organized by the intelligence agencies. El-Sissi offends our intelligence. Where is the freedom and human dignity in the things that el-Sissi does?" There is widespread concern in Egypt that factions of the Muslim Brotherhood could go underground and radicalize. In the past few weeks, there have been dozens of bloody attacks against the security forces, with more than 100 police officers left dead. At the beginning of September, a jihadist group based in the Sinai Peninsula tried to kill Interior Minister Mohammed Ibrahim with an explosive device. The assassination attempt failed.

Middle East North Africa (MENA) & The Egyptian Uprising'

Side note: Introduction and Historical Background - (Somaliland Sun Commentary) Middle East is mostly occupied by Arab countries and for the last five decades there had been a chaos and conflict between Israel supported by western developed countries and Palestine supported by most Arab states. Arabs fought bravely against Israel in many different battles, for example Suez war in1956, Sixth Day in 1967 war and Yom Kippur in 1973 war. Arabs had the upper hand at the beginning but after military assistance for Israel from U.S.A and Europe they defeated and conquered certain strategic locations like Sinai Peninsula and the Golan heights. After these wars most Arabian countries realized that wiping Israel out of the map was an impossible task and as long as west supported the Jews will be remaining the winners, so Israel was recognized by Egypt and later by most Arab states. Palestine remained under Israeli occupation. Their territories being devastated, their intellectuals put in harsh prisons and anyone who throws stones is responded with fire. Arabs neglected Palestinians more than forty years, they watched how they were massacred, raped and humiliated their fellow brothers.

Generally speaking, in the last three years Egypt experienced one of the most amazing historical incidence after long ruling military regime Hosni Mubarak was overthrown by civilian peaceful demonstrations where he finally resigned from his presidency. He was put in the prison and charged crimes against humanity. Egypt held free and fair elections , Muslim brotherhood defeated overwhelmingly the secular opposition led by Amr Mussa and Albaradici ,then Mohamed Mursi was crowned as the ultimate Egyptian president. He formed his government but within a year again the same thing happened after millions of Egyptians remained unemployed and they began protesting in Tahrir Square. The army made an ultimatum within 48 hours: opposition and Muslim brotherhood settle their difference or an action will be taken. There was no mutual agreement between the two and the army lead by Azzizi(already named for this post by Mursi) made a military coup where the legitimate Egyptian government was ousted from the power. Again the army rules, Mursi was jailed and still remain in the prison, then Mursi supporters started protesting but the army using tanks and snipers murdered and the death toll remain thousands. The most surprising incident is that the Egyptian Supreme Court released the dictator Hosni Mubarak by telling that there were no enough evidences for his crime against humanity. I do not know exactly what will be next but one point is sure and that is the military is back in Egyptian rule and remain that way unless muslim brotherhood do not compromise. Hosni Mubarak was released and what we wait is his nomination as president again, who knows?

Israel has allowed Egyptian F-16s to fly over Gaza. Egyptian military operations in Sinai (which Gaza borders) are restricted by the 1979 peace treaty and both nations must agree to allow more Egyptian troops in the area. The treaty considers Sinai a buffer zone, to prevent Egypt from threatening Israel with attack, as it did many times in the 1950s and 60s. But because of the growing Islamic terrorist presence in Sinai and Gaza, Israel has relaxed the restrictions. So for the first time since 1979, Egyptian warplanes were in the air along Israel's southern border.

Turkey is now accused of cooperating with Iranian counterintelligence by revealing the names of ten Iranians in Turkey who had been seen (by Turkish intelligence agents) meeting with Israeli intelligence officials. For a decade now the Islamic government of Turkey has been battling Turkish secularists and trying to improve relations with other Islamic countries (including ancient rival Iran). This new policy meant adopting an anti-Israel attitude after decades of close relations with the Jewish state. The Turkish betrayal occurred at least four years ago but was kept quiet until now by all concerned (including the Americans). But the Turkish cooperation with Iran was an open secret among senior government officials in the U.S. and Israel that eventually got to the media.

Despite this increased violence in the West Bank, Hamas has succeeded in halting most rocket attacks (by smaller rival terror groups) against Israel. That, in turn, reduces Israeli retaliatory attacks. But Egypt, Lebanon, and Syria all have major problems with Islamic radical violence. Jordan is dealing with more Islamic terror group threats but has so far kept a lid on it. Israel cooperates closely with the Jordanians on counter terrorism matters and has done so for decades. Egypt is now being more cooperative in this area. Such relations with Lebanon and the Syrian rebels in this area are much weaker and informal. So far Israel is an island of calm in an increasingly violent neighborhood.

In Gaza Hamas is under increasing criticism because of its censorship policies and efforts to impose Islamic lifestyle rules on everyone. The head of Hamas is calling for another violent Palestinian uprising against Israel.

That is only possible in the West Bank, where half a million Israelis live alongside two point one million Palestinians. There has been an increase in Palestinian attacks there over the last few months. Israeli "settlers" have been attacking right back. Last July the Israeli government announced that from now on Jewish residents of the West Bank making "price tag" (retaliatory) attacks will be treated like terrorists. This gives the police more power to investigate and prosecute these crimes. These price tag attacks are usually in retaliation for the Israeli government dismantling illegal settler structures in the West Bank or as revenge for Palestinians attacking the settlements or settlers. Price tag attacks represent a shift in settler attitudes over the last few years. For decades the settlers could be depended on to be passive after a Palestinian attack, letting the Israeli police and military look for the culprit. But now the settlers are increasingly launching "price tag" counterattacks. The price tag refers to what the Palestinians must suffer for every attack on Israelis, or for Israeli police interfering with settler activities. This is vigilante justice, and it does more damage to Palestinians than Israeli police efforts to catch and prosecute Palestinian attackers. The Palestinians are not accustomed to this kind of swift payback, and they do not like it. Israel has been under growing public and international pressure to crack down more vigorously on the vigilantes. This became especially urgent because the attacks are much more common and are even extending to feuds between factions of Jewish religious extremists. The Palestinians are still committing most of the terror attacks, but the Jewish terrorists are catching up.

In Sinai an armored vehicle were hit by a roadside bomb, wounding two soldiers.

October 6, 2013: In Egypt at least fifty-three people died from political violence. Near the Suez Canal Islamic terrorists killed six policemen. Most of the deaths occurred in the capital where police battled Islamic radicals who are trying to overthrow the military government and halt new elections.

October 7, 2013: Terrorist violence continued in Egypt, with ten policemen and soldiers killed in several attacks.

October 8, 2013: In the southern Sinai a suicide car bomber attacked an Egyptian police compound and killed two people. An Islamic radical organization took credit the next day. In two other attacks two soldiers were killed.

October 9, 2013: The United States announced it would protest the Egyptian army takeover of the government last July by withholding over seven-hundred-million in military aid. Israel protested this decision, as the Egyptian army had removed an Islamic government that was very hostile to Israel and democracy in general.

October 17, 2013: In the Sinai Egyptian police killed six Islamic terrorists who were preparing to attack a checkpoint outside al Arish airport.

October 18, 2013: In the Sinai Egyptian Islamic terrorists killed a policeman.

October 20, 2013: In Egypt gunmen fired on a wedding party outside a Christian church near the capital, killing four people.

October 22, 2013: Despite all the unrest in Egypt, the economy grew about two percent in the last year. Before the uprising began in 2011, the economy was growing at the rate of about seven percent a year. The first year saw the economy contract but by 2013 massive financial aid (mainly from oil-rich Arabs) helped turn things around. This infusion of cash also fed inflation, which is now running at over ten percent a year. Meanwhile, Islamic radicals are still trying to get the Islamic government restored. The army removed the Islamic president and other officials in July, after massive popular demonstrations called for this. The Islamic radicals have apparently gone to war with the government and the government has asked the courts to ban the Islamic political parties. The army still has more public support, but many of the Islamic radicals see themselves as on a Mission From God and are undeterred by logic and popular opinion. This is a repeat of the 1990s, when Islamic Brotherhood radicals tried to impose a religious dictatorship via a terror campaign. This time around, the terrorists are trying to limit civilian casualties, which turned popular opinion against them in the 1990s and led to their defeat. It remains to be seen if these new tactics will change the outcome.

November 1,2013: Egypt: Govt, Ethiopia, Sudan to Hold Fresh Meeting Monday On Nile Dam'

Egypt state Information Service (Cairo): Minister of Water Resources and Irrigation Mohamed Abdel Muttaleb said that Egypt, Ethiopia and Sudan will hold a new round of talks starting Monday to weigh the regional impact of a giant dam being built on a Nile River tributary in Ethiopia after earlier studies proved questionable. A meeting of water officials from the three nations in Sudan's capital, Khartoum, on 4 November will discuss the impact of the hydroelectric project on downstream countries. The minister said a new round of talks would be held between ministers and delegates of the three countries over the coming weeks. "Next week's meeting will be the first of a series of talks between the three nations aiming to reach a settlement," according to Abdel-Muttaleb. "Dialogue is fundamental to furthering the interests of the three countries, and that's what Egypt is looking forward to in the near future," he added. The minister made it clear that Egypt seeks to bolster cooperation with the Nile Basin counties as major strategic allies.

November 3, 2013: Water Resources Ministers of Egypt, Ethiopia and Sudan Will Start Meetings On Nile Water' Egypt State Information Service (Cairo): Egypt: Egyptian Minister of Water Resources and Irrigation Mohamed Abdel-Moteleb headed Monday to Sudan on a two-day visit for talks with his Sudanese and Ethiopian counterparts on the Ethiopian Renaissance Dam. The conferees will review a report of the tripartite - committee, which assessed the dam's impact on Egypt's and Sudan's quota of Nile water. The meeting is meant to reach political and institutional agreements on cooperation mechanisms between Egypt, Sudan and Ethiopia.

November 3, 2013: Egypt On Edge Ahead of Morsi Trial'

Cairo, Egypt — Security is tight ahead of the trial of Egypt's deposed president Mohamed Morsi, set to open Monday in Cairo. Animosity is running high on all sides, and a renewed wave of anti-Americanism prompted by the visit of U.S. Secretary of State John Kerry adds to the tensions. Morsi is charged with inciting murder during clashes outside the presidential palace last year, sparked by his temporary claim of extraordinary powers. Fourteen other senior members of his Muslim Brotherhood and his former government are also being tried. Other charges are pending. It is unclear if Morsi will appear in person, or by video link. He has been held in an undisclosed location since he was toppled by the military July 3rd, following mass protests. A member of his legal team has rejected the court's jurisdiction.

Ahmed Abdel Gawad said they did not recognize the legal proceedings. But in conceding the trial would go ahead, he insisted there must be a live, international broadcast of all sessions. In contrast to evidence presented in the trial of Egypt's other ousted president, Hosni Mubarak, political analyst Hisham Kassem thinks the case against Morsi could be strong. "Unlike Mubarak, Morsi did not have the services supporting him when he came under. Again unlike Mubarak he was not very clever about covering his face and I think he is going to end with enough evidence presented to be there a number of serious cases against him," said Kassem. Tensions are running high as the military-backed government continues its crackdown against Morsi supporters and other Islamists. Human Rights Watch said Saturday that 1,300 people have died in confrontations since July and asked, "What will it take for authorities to rein in security forces?" Most of the anti-interim government protests are peaceful, recently spreading to university campuses. But there are also attacks on security forces, especially in the Sinai peninsula, by militant Islamists. Pro-government media often conflate the protests and attacks as terrorist movements.

With Islamist media largely shut down, most remaining media have adopted a pro-military stance. One of the nation's most popular political satirists, Bassem Youssef, who delighted audiences by poking fun at the Morsi government, was taken off the air Friday after he skewered the current wave of neo-nationalism. One of the few issues most Egyptians can agree on - anti-Americanism - has been highlighted by the visit Sunday of U.S. Secretary of State John Kerry. Both pro- and anti-military forces feel Washington has not done enough to support their side, and officials have spoken of how they are seeking alliances elsewhere. The U.S. suspended some aid to the new government, but will continue cooperation on counter-terrorism and other key issues, including peace negotiations between Israel and the Palestinians. Political analyst Kassem thinks relations will weather the current storm. "I think we are seeing here the reality of the situation which is how deep Egyptian-American relations are and what we see as a crisis is really of face value, but behind closed doors there is a very solid relationship," he said. However, solid international ties may be, new fractures within Egyptian society appear almost daily from a myriad of sources. Nine people were killed in Assiut Saturday - not over politics, but in a dispute sparked by who was first in line to buy bread.

November 3, 2013: Egypt: Location of Mursi's Trial Changed'

ASWAT MASRIYA: The trial of Egyptian deposed President Mohamed Mursi will be held at the Academy of Police on Monday in the outskirts of Cairo, said a judicial source. Mursi's trial was scheduled to be held at a police institute located in South Cairo near the residential district of Maadi. The Islamist president, who was ousted by the military in July 3 following mass protests against his rule, is due to appear in court on charges of inciting violence.

November 4, 2013: Egypt On High Alert As Morsi Arrives for Trial'

Tunis Afrique Presse (Tunis) Cairo — Egypt's ousted former President Mohammed Morsi has arrived at a courtroom in Cairo where he is due to go on trial, state media say. He and 14 other Muslim Brotherhood figures face charges of inciting the killing of protesters in clashes outside the presidential palace. Supporters of the ousted president had vowed to major protests. Security services are now on high alert. Mr Morsi was ousted by the military in July after protests against his rule.

November 4, 2013: Egypt: Supporters of Mursi Head to Trial Scene'

ASWAT MASRIYA: Dozens of supporters of Egyptian ousted President Mohammed Mursi arrived to Cairo Police Academy on Monday morning where he is set to face trial on charges of inciting violence, said a local news portal. “Down with the military rule!” chanted some of the protesters, according to the Shorouk news portal. Mursi, who hails from the Muslim Brotherhood stands trial along with 14 other leading members of the group on accusations of inciting violence against peaceful protesters in presidential palace clashes, which took place in December 2012 and left at least 11 people killed.

November 4, 2013: Egypt: Mursi's Trial Postponed to January 8, 2014'

ASWAT MASRIYA: The trial of deposed Egyptian President Mohamed Mursi was postponed to January 8 on Monday, the presiding judge said. Mursi, ousted in July by the military following mass protests against his rule, is being tried over charges of inciting violence. The first session of Mursi's trial was adjourned twice on Monday because of repeated interruptions by him where he maintained that he is the legitimate president of Egypt. "Down with the Military rule," the Islamist president chanted during the trial.

December 1, 2013 Egypt Prepares for Constitutional Referendum - Minister'

ASWAT ASRIYA: Egypt's Local Development Minister Adel Labib said on Tuesday that all governorates have begun preparing for a referendum on the new constitution amid heavy security measures. Labib added in a press conference on Tuesday that measures to ease the process for voters and avoid manipulation are under consideration. He denied accusations that the government is pushing for a "yes" vote and explained that it merely encourages all eligible voters to participate.

Hany Mahmoud, minister of administrative development, said late on Monday that the constitutional referendum will be held in mid-January.A 50-member assembly finished drafting the constitution last week and presented it to the interim president for ratification

Egypt: New Anti-Demonstration Law in Egypt Must Be Amended, Urges UN Rights Chief’

The United Nations human rights chief today warned that a new law restricting demonstrations in Egypt is seriously flawed and must be amended or repealed The law, issued on Sunday, gives local security authorities the power to ban gatherings that would, among other things, constitute a threat to "security" or "disrupt citizens' interests" without specifically detailing the conduct. "The fact that the law criminalises acts by demonstrators which may breach 'security and public order,' without clearly defining these terms, leaves the door open to a very restrictive and repressive interpretation," said Navi Pillay, the UN High Commissioner for Human Rights. "Of particular concern are the provisions on the use of force by law enforcement officials and the excessive sanctions, including massive fines as well as prison sentences, that can be imposed on those found to be in breach of this law," she stressed. The new law prescribes a list of escalating measures that law enforcement authorities can employ, after issuing warnings, to disperse unruly demonstrators. These include tear gas, water cannon, smoke grenades, warning shots, rubber bullets, and even live ammunition which is prohibited by international standards except in unavoidable instances in order to protect lives. "This is a country whose people have proclaimed loudly, clearly, courageously and repeatedly their desire to be able to demonstrate peacefully in accordance with their international human rights," Ms. Pillay said. She added that Egyptian civil society organizations and human rights defenders have raised concerns about the law which have not been taken into account. "There is a real risk that the lives of peaceful protestors will be put at risk because of the violent behaviour of a few, or because the law may too easily be interpreted by local security authorities in a way that permits them to use excessive force in inappropriate circumstances," the High Commissioner said. Among other concerns, she noted that under the new regulation, protest organisers in most cases are bound to give at least three days' notice to the police. The law is also "much too wide -ranging in terms of restricting locations," she said. It has a sweeping ban on public meetings or assembly for political purposes in and around places of worship which number in the tens of thousands in Egypt. The country has been undergoing a democratic transition following the toppling of President Hosni Mubarak two years ago in the wake of mass protests. This past July, renewed protests, in which dozens of people were killed and wounded, led to the Egyptian military deposing President Mohamed Morsy. The Constitution was then suspended and an interim government set up.

December 5, 2013: CHATHAM HOUSE Analysis - How the Egyptian IB Failed'

By Hazem Kandil: Egypt's first freely elected president has been deposed by the army. It's not a question of religion, it's about competence Supporters of the Muslim Brotherhood claim that it was leading a revolutionary attack on Egypt's authoritarian regime when it was stopped in its tracks over the summer by a counter-revolution. This is fiction. The Brotherhood's ambition was simply to replace the old ruling party at the pinnacle of power. The 2011 uprising had redistributed power within the country's ruling 'power triangle', the uneasy partnership between military, security, and political institutions.The security sector had lost its overriding dominance of the ruling bloc, and was now forced to play second fiddle to the once marginalized military. The political slot was open for negotiations, and the Brotherhood wanted to present itself as the best candidate by appeasing the two custodians of violence.The Brotherhood never hinted at challenging the autonomy and privileges of the armed forces (economic or otherwise), and made sure it stayed on the right side of the military leadership all along. Thanks to the Brotherhood's unconditional support, Egypt's security establishment was not so much as dented during the 2011 revolt. While demonstrators were making their stand against Mubarak in Tahrir Square, Mohamed Morsi, the future President, and Saad al-Katatni, head of the Brotherhood's Freedom and Justice Party In parliament, they spared no opportunity to praise Egypt's gallant law enforcers. And when Morsi was elected President, he announced that the Interior Ministry had been rehabilitated and was performing the most patriotic of duties. The president not only dropped a fact-finding commission report detailing abuses, including the shooting of demonstrators, but audaciously congratulated police for their valuable contribution to the 2011 uprising.

Needless to say, security abuses increased substantially in his short tenure, and soon enough official coercion was augmented with Brotherhood militias. This hardly came as a surprise from an organization obsessed with foiling secular conspiracies and policing social piety. But the Brotherhood had moral and practical justifications for sacrificing revolutionaries at the altar. Morally, they felt entitled to rule after eight - and-a-half decades of political toiling. Most of the movement's leaders saw their best years wasted behind prison bars. Moreover, as the true representatives of Islam, the Brothers believed they were obliged to safeguard the faithful from secularists. On a practical level, the Brotherhood appreciated the difficulty of confronting the security forces. Although uniting the revolutionary camp under its banner would have offered it a fighting chance, the Brotherhood did not have the stomach for that. As it turned out, deferring to the military and security was not enough to consolidate power.The army, in particular, needed to relieve itself of the burden of domestic rule to focus on some of the more pressing geopolitical issues: rebuilding its capacity as a combat force, diversifying its weapon sources beyond the US, reversing the demilitarization of Sinai and pursuing means of projecting regional power. The Brotherhood was thus expected to stabilize the political arena, but they failed to deliver because of their ineptitude at political bargaining.

It was clear that none of the three political contenders (Islamists, old regime loyalists, and civil activists) was strong enough to rule alone. Alliances were necessary. Instead of siding with either old regime or revolutionary forces, the Brothers tried to play them off against each other to buy time. Old regime politicians suspected that despite their sugar-coated promises, the Brothers were not willing to share the spoils of Egypt's patronage state.And civil activists resented the Brotherhood's hijacking of their revolt. Unfortunately, the Islamists failed to appreciate that their intransigence would drive their political rivals into a tactical alliance against them, and that such an alliance was bound to force officers to revise their stance. That being said, the Brotherhood's opponents could not have fielded enough protesters to secure the cooperation of the high command had the common folk abstained. It was the Brotherhood's shocking incompetence at government that drove millions into the streets on June 30. And it was the Brotherhood's decision to turn a political clash into a religious war that guaranteed the public's blanket endorsement for brutally repressing them. The Brothers were ousted not because of their political duplicity, but because they were so bad at it. And they were later hunted down because they never understood that their countrymen preferred to risk backtracking into a functioning secular authoritarianism to the certainty of sliding into incompetent religious fascism. Dr Hazem Kandil is a lecturer in sociology and fellow of St Catharine's College, Cambridge, and author of 'Inside the Brotherhood' (Polity, 2014)

December 17, 2013: In Egypt a court found two sons of former dictator Hosni Mubarak not guilty of corruption. The courts have found innocent most Mubarak officials charged with corruption. The courts are considered corrupt as well and these acquittals are widely unpopular. Many Egyptians feared this would happen after the 2011 election because so many Mubarak supporters are major land owners and businessmen.

December 22, 2013: In Egypt (Mansoura) an Islamic terrorist bomb killed 16 and wounded over 130. The Moslem Brotherhood was blamed, even though another Islamic terrorist group took responsibility.

In Egypt the government declared the Moslem Brotherhood a terrorist organization and police began shutting down Brotherhood facilities and arresting members.

December 25, 2013: Egypt Govt Officially Announces Muslim Brotherhood As Terrorist Organisation' ASWAT MASRIYA, Cairo — The Egyptian government officially announced the Muslim Brotherhood as a terrorist organisation on Wednesday. Egypt has formally designated the Muslim Brotherhood as a terrorist group on Wednesday, said Hossam Eissa, deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Higher Education. The announcement comes a day after a car bomb exploded at a police station in Nile Delta's Mansoura, leaving 16 dead and scores injured. This step allows the government to charge whoever is part of the Brotherhood or promotes or funds it in any way with membership of a terrorist group, a cabinet statement said. Arab countries that signed the 1998 Arab Convention on the Suppression of Terrorism will be notified with this decision. The Mansoura blast is "a serious escalation for the Brotherhood's violence against Egypt and Egyptians. On the other hand, the Brotherhood condemned the bombing, describing it as an attempt to stir civil war in the country. The Brotherhood also hinted at the state's involvement in the blast. In an online statement, the hardline Sinai-based Ansar Bayt al-Maqdis group has taken responsibility for the attack which is considered one of the deadliest since Islamist President Mohamed Mursi was deposed last July. The authenticity of the statement has not been confirmed.

December 26, 2013: Egypt: Hardline Islamist Group IB Says Govt

Decision Opens Door to Violence’ ASWAT MASRIYA: Cairo — A hardline Egyptian Islamist group said that the government's decision to designate the Muslim Brotherhood as a terrorist group is unjust and opens the door to violence in a statement issued Thursday. The Islamist group al -Gamaa al-Islamiya, which backs deposed President Mohamed Mursi and the Muslim Brotherhood, was an armed group involved in violent attacks against tourists and Christians in the nineties. The group has later given up violence. "This decision eliminates any remaining chance at settling the political crisis in Egypt," the Islamist group warned. The government's decision came one day after a blast at a security building in Nile Delta's Mansoura, northeast to Cairo, which left 16 people killed and over 100 injured. Al-Gamaa al-Islamiya said that the decision came despite that another group, Sinai-based militant Ansar Bayt al-Maqdis, took responsibility for the attack. The group described the decision as one that feeds retaliation against the Islamist movement and an exculsion of it, which would lead to more division and polarisation. "It demonstrates the failure of the Coup's government to administrate the country and protect it, as it only resolves the political crisis through oppressive security methods."

December 28, 2013: In Egypt (Cairo) continuing anti-government violence at the Al Azhar University (the oldest in the Moslem world) has left three students dead and nearly a hundred arrested. These actions were all part of the increased number of demonstrations protesting the government designating the Moslem Brotherhood a terrorist organization. This has led to the arrest of about 200 protestors throughout Egypt.

In Egypt police arrested four al Jazeera reporters and accused them of working with Islamic terrorist groups. Two of the reporters were foreigners (Canadian and Australian).

In Egypt (north of Cairo) a bomb went off outside an army compound and wounded four soldiers.

In Egypt (Sinai) terrorists blew up a portion of a natural gas pipeline supplying local factories.

In Egypt the government froze the assets of 572 Moslem Brotherhood leaders. In addition 87 private schools affiliated with the Brotherhood were taken over by the government. The government has also created a list of 1,055 NGOs (Non-Governmental Organizations like charities and aid groups) that are part of or associated with the Brotherhood and froze their assets as well.

In Egypt (Cairo) police found a terrorist bomb and disabled it. Elsewhere (Sinai) police killed an Islamic terrorist as he was planting a bomb. Another 13 Islamic terrorist suspects were arrested in Sinai. Egyptian police also found and closed five more smuggling tunnels into Gaza.

Increasingly the pro-Morsi demonstrators are set upon by crowds of locals who do not want roads blocked and commerce interfered with by the demonstrators. Thousands of Brotherhood members and supporters have been arrested, but many Egyptians continue to believe that a religious dictatorship is the only way to solve the corruption and inept governance that have crippled Egypt for centuries.

Egypt Goes To War With The Moslem Brotherhood'

Updates: The recent Egyptian decision to declare the Moslem Brotherhood a terrorist organization has caused more demonstrations and terror attacks. The Brotherhood renounced terrorist violence back in the 1970s but a Brotherhood faction went rogue in the 1990s and took part in a major terrorist campaign against the government and foreign tourists. The attack on foreigners and Egyptian civilians led to the defeat of the Islamic terrorists and Brotherhood promises to behave. The Brotherhood condemned the recent terror attacks by groups in the Sinai. These have killed over a hundred soldiers and police. The Brotherhood condemns all violence, but now it's the 1990s all over again with some Brotherhood members getting involved with Islamic terrorists. Many Brotherhood members are very angry at government efforts to prosecute their leader Mohamed Morsi, despite the fact that Morsi was elected president in mid-2012. The majority of Egyptians are anti-Morsi but many of those who still back Morsi are willing to use violence to try and get Morsi back in power. Israel wants things to quiet down in Egypt, as long as the place does not turn into a Islamic terrorist sanctuary.

December 29, 2013: Egypt Will Never Give Up One Drop of Its Nile Water Quota – Minister'

Egypt State Information Service (Cairo): Minister of Irrigation and Water Resources Mohamed Abdel-Motleb disclosed that consultations are currently being underway with the Sudanese and Ethiopian counterparts to render successful the forthcoming ministerial meeting to be held Khartoum during the first week of January 2014. The meeting will probe an appropriate mechanism for pursuing the technical studies required from the Ethiopian part as well as assigning an international consultative bureau to perform them, said the Minister.

Such studies will deal with the technical details of the Renaissance Dam's storage bases, storage phases and mechanism of operations all year round, he added. The minister went on to say that Egyptian State is dealing seriously with the Renaissance Dam crisis in cooperation with the Nile basin states, noting that the meetings of the Supreme Committee for Nile Water have resulted in promoting ties with the Ethiopian side. He added that Egypt will never give up one drop of its Nile water quota, highlighting that all parties concerned should work on reaching an agreement that serves the interest of all Nile riparian countries through a comprehensive development. He affirmed that the River Congo project would not affect the Egyptian share of water that comes from the Blue Nile.

January 27, 2014: Most Egyptians now feel like the Saudis. Egyptians don't mind an "Islamic" government, but they resent having archaic lifestyle rules forced on them, or Moslem Brotherhood zealots talking about how maybe democracy isn't really Islamic. Because of that the Moslem Brotherhood is in big trouble this time because so many Egyptians are hostile to Moslem Brotherhood members and, unlike in the past, have cell phones with which to quickly tell the police what the local Islamic zealots are up to.

The Egyptians brain trust that holds most of the senior jobs at al Qaeda Center are ever mindful of how the Moslem Brotherhood was defeated in Egypt during the 1990s. It was because too many civilians died during terrorist attacks. These Egyptians also remember how the Moslem Brotherhood was crushed partly because of the many factions within it. Some of the factions eventually made deals with the government, went legit, and sold out the more radical brothers. That has not changed either.

In the 1990s the Egyptian government defeated the Moslem Brotherhood and many survivors fled Egypt and some helped found al Qaeda. Algeria finally defeated a similar movement by 2004. Syria crushed the Moslem Brotherhood in the early 1980s, after five years of violence. The Moslem Brotherhood is not invincible, but it is persistent.

It was long believed by many in the West that the Moslem Brotherhood was one form of Islamic radicalism that seemed moderate enough, and international enough, to allow for widespread use in democracies. For many members of the Moslem Brotherhood that is true. Unfortunately the brotherhood has many factions and some of them are very radical and just barely tolerant of democracy. Worse yet, the first national election the Moslem Brotherhood has won was in Egypt and the moderates and radicals in the Brotherhood subsequently spent more time arguing with each other than in dealing with problems most Egyptians were concerned about (corruption and the economy).

This is ironic because Saudi Arabia has long supported Islamic conservative groups. Yet the Saudis came out against the Moslem Brotherhood in Egypt in 2013 and against al Qaeda in the 1980s. At the same time the Saudis have no problem supporting Islamic radicals in Syria, including some who belong to al Qaeda. What is going on here? It's simple. The Saud family has always supported Islamic radicals, but only those who agreed that the Saud family should be in charge (of Saudi Arabia and as a leader of the Islamic world). Islamic radicals that changed their minds about this arrangement were crushed. Thus the Saudis supported al Qaeda until al Qaeda decided that the Sauds were not Islamic enough to be in charge. That led to a dispute in the 1990s that escalated in 2003 and, so far, the Sauds are winning. The Moslem Brotherhood in Egypt has always been hostile to the Sauds and that has been reciprocated. This was made worse by the fact that the current head of al Qaeda was once a leader in the Egyptian Moslem Brotherhood.

The Egyptian Moslem Brotherhood was deposed by the July 2013 coup in part because it did not have the support of Saudi Arabia and other oil -rich Gulf states. This is sad, because the Moslem Brotherhood was given shelter in Saudi Arabia when it was driven from Egypt (for trying to overthrow the secular government) in the 1960s. But once in Saudi Arabia the Moslem Brotherhood began plotting to overthrow the Saudi monarchy because it was not Islamic enough. That ended badly and most Saudis have not forgotten. Although the Saudis initially supported the new Moslem Brotherhood government with massive loans and grants, that soon changed when the Brotherhood got cozy with Iran. That offended most Egyptians as well as most people in Arabia. When the Moslem Brotherhood began acting like it did while in exile in Saudi Arabia half a century ago the Saudis concluded that the Moslem Brotherhood had not really changed.

Thus the Moslem Brotherhood failed once more to create an Islamic Egypt that the movements' founders began working towards back in the 1920s. The basic idea behind the Moslem Brotherhood, to use Islamic law to form an Egyptian free of corruption and oppression, has always appealed to many Egyptians (rich and poor) who were fed up with the sorry state of Egyptian culture.

In Egypt the Moslem Brotherhood is again fighting to survive. After forming a government they dominated in 2012, the Moslem Brotherhood proceeded to turn most Egyptians against them because the Moslem Brotherhood leadership paid too little attention to making Egypt work and too much attention to Moslem Brotherhood politics.

January 27, 2013: Egypt's Al-Sisi given okay for presidential run’

News updates: State Media says top generals have given green light to Abdel Fattah el-Sisi, who led the overthrow of Mohamed Morsi.The official state news agency has said Egypt's top generals have endorsed a presidential run by the army chief who led the toppling of the former president Mohamed Morsi last summer.

MENA on Monday said an official announcement by Sissi of his candidacy could take place "within hours," after the Supreme Council of the Armed Forces "unanimously delegated" him to run in presidential elections during an hours-long meeting Monday. The announcement was made shortly after interim President Adely Mansour promoted el-Sissi to field marshal, the military's highest rank, apparently as an honour before he steps down from the military as required for him to run.

Presidential elections are due to take place by end of April. El -Sisi, who toppled Islamist president Mohamed Morsi last year, is widely expected to contest the election due within six months, and win easily. Sisi has become hugely popular since the military takeover, with supporters viewing him as a decisive figure who can tackle unrest that has gripped Egypt since the 2011 uprising that brought down Hosni Mubarak's regime.

February 10, 2014: In Egypt (Sinai) terrorists blew up a portion of a natural gas pipeline. This is the fourth such attack in 2014.

February 13, 2014: After a week-long Egyptian offensive against Islamic terrorists in the Sinai Peninsula the army claimed 112 Islamic terrorists killed or wounded and 69 arrested.

February 16, 2014: In the Sinai, near the Israeli border a bomb hit a tourist bus killing three South Korean tourists and the Egyptian driver.

February 18, 2014: Egypt charged two Israelis and two Egyptians with spying inside Egypt. The two Egyptians were arrested but the Israelis were apparently back in Israel.

Egyptian Islamic terrorists warned foreign tourists to stay out of Egypt. For older Egyptians this is all too familiar. Although the Moslem Brotherhood renounced terrorist violence back in the 1970s, a Brotherhood faction went rogue in the 1990s and took part in a major terrorist campaign against the government and foreign tourists. The attack on foreigners and Egyptian civilians led to a major backlash from Egyptians in general the quick defeat of the Islamic terrorists. After that the Moslem Brotherhood promised to behave and was allowed to continue operating openly. Until recently the Brotherhood condemned the terror attacks by groups in the Sinai. These have left hundreds of Islamic terrorists, civilians, soldiers and police dead in the last year. The Brotherhood has long condemned all violence, but now it's the 1990s all over again with some Brotherhood members getting involved with Islamic terrorists. Brotherhood members are increasingly angry at government efforts to prosecute their leader Mohamed Morsi, despite the fact that Morsi was elected president in mid-2012. The majority of Egyptians are anti-Morsi but many of those who still back Morsi are willing to use violence to try and get Morsi back in power. Israel wants things to quiet down in Egypt, as long as the place does not turn into an Islamic terrorist sanctuary.

Egypt revealed that its AH-64 Apache helicopter gunships had recently fired 24 Hellfire missiles at Islamic terrorists in the Sinai. According to the 1979 peace deal with Israel Egypt is not allowed to operate any of its 35 AH-64s in Sinai but in 2012 Israel agreed to allow Egypt to operate AH-64s in Sinai against Islamic terrorists. Israel also operates 44 AH-64s and uses them frequently and successfully against Islamic terrorists.

In the Sinai Egyptian over a hundred police and soldiers have been killed fighting Islamic terrorists so far this year. Since 2011 over 450 policemen have been killed by Islamic terrorists in Egypt, most of them in Sinai. The police are taking more casualties than the army, which is only really active in Sinai.

March 24, 2014: Egypt court sentences 528 HYPERLINK "https://www.facebook.com/hashtag/morsi?source=feed_text" Morsi supporters to death'

They were convicted of charges including murdering a policeman and attacks on people and property. The group of 528 is among over 1,200 supporters of Mr Morsi on trial, including senior Brotherhood members. Authorities have cracked down harshly on Islamists since Mr. Morsi was removed by the military in July, 2013.

Egypt court sentences 528 Morsi supporters to death’

BBC News updates: A court in Egypt has sentenced 528 supporters of ousted Islamist President Mohammed Morsi to death. They were convicted of charges including murdering a policeman and attacks on people and property. The group is among some 1,200 Muslim Brotherhood supporters on trial, including senior members. Authorities have cracked down harshly on Islamists since Mr Morsi was removed by the military in July. Hundreds have been killed and thousands arrested.

They are expected to appeal. The verdict now goes to Egypt's supreme religious authority, the Grand Mufti (a senior Islamic scholar), for approval or rejection. Campaigners say that while death sentences are often handed down in Egypt, few have been carried out in recent years. The final trial session will not be held until 28 April, so there is some time left before the sentence is confirmed and there will be time to appeal in that period, says the BBC's Orla Guerin in Cairo. The Muslim Brotherhood has denounced death sentences and Washington expressed shock and concern.

In absentia:The court in Minya, south of the capital, Cairo, issued its ruling after only two sessions in which the defendants' lawyers complained they had no chance to present their case.Lawyers have accused the presiding judge of "veering away from all legal norms" and denying justice to the accused, our correspondent adds. They were convicted, among other charges, of the murder of the deputy commander of the Matay district police station in Minya. Some 147 suspects were in court for the trial - the others were convicted in absentia, reports say. The court also acquitted 16 other defendants.

There was shock at the verdict, BBC’s Orla Guerin reports.

The attacks took place in August after security forces broke up two camps of pro-Morsi supporters in Cairo, killing hundreds of people.

Mr Morsi was ousted by the military last July following mass street protests against his government. He is facing four separate trials

There has since been a severe crackdown on his Muslim Brotherhood group, as well as on other activists seen as hostile to the military-backed interim government.

The Brotherhood has been declared a terrorist organisation and authorities have punished any public show of support for it. A second group of 700 Morsi supporters is due to go on trial on Tuesday.

Dictatorship: The Muslim Brotherhood's spokesman in London, Abdullah el-Haddad, told the BBC the sentences showed that Egypt was now a dictatorship.

"It may be just a threat message and there will be appeals to the court and the decision of the court will change, but this is the new Egypt after the coup. This is the new dictatorship that [army chief and defence minister Field Marshal] Abdul Fattah al-Sisi is trying to establish."

Mr Haddad said the Muslim Brotherhood's general guide Mohammed Badie was among those convicted, though other reports say Mr Badie is only due in court on Tuesday.

The US government also questioned how the defendants could have had a fair trial in just two court sessions - one of which was Monday's sentencing.

"It sort of defies logic," said Marie Harf, deputy US State Department spokeswoman, adding that Washington was "deeply concerned" and "shocked".

"Obviously the defendants can appeal, but it simply does not seem possible that a fair review of evidence and testimony consistent with international standards could be accomplished with over 529 defendants in a two-day trial," she said.

Defence counsel Mohamed Tousson claimed the judge rushed to sentencing after being angered by a lawyer's request for his recusal at Saturday's opening hearing.

"He got very angry, and adjourned the trial for sentencing," Mr Tousson said, adding "It's a huge violation of defendants' rights."

Egypt's foreign ministry defended the court's handling of the trial, saying the sentences had been "issued by an independent court after careful study of the case". (Text ends)

Egypt military chief Abdul Fattah al-Sisi resigns’

BBC News: (March 26, 2014)

Field Marshal Abdul Fattah al-Sisi has announced that he has resigned as Egypt's military chief in order to stand for the presidency. Al-Sisi born in Cairo on 19 November 1954

Field Marshal Al-Sisi’s Rise through the ranks

Graduated from Egypt's Military Academy in 1977

Further training in UK and US

Youngest member of the Supreme Council of the Armed Forces after 2011 uprising topples Hosni Mubarak

Appointed commander-in-chief of armed forces and defence minister in 2012 by President Mohammed Morsi

Overthrows Mr Morsi, suspends constitution and installs interim government in 2013 following mass opposition protests

Promoted to field marshal in January 2014

He made the widely expected announcement on state television. Mr Sisi led the overthrow of President Mohammed Morsi in July following mass opposition protests. Correspondents say he is likely to win the presi dential poll, given his popularity and the lack of any serious rivals.

In his address, Mr Sisi told Egyptians he was "appearing in front of you for the last time in military uniform", before warning that the country was "threatened by terrorists" and saying he would work to make an Egypt "free of fear".

He also promised to tackle the country's growing economic problems, but said he could not "perform miracles" and called on Egyptians to work hard to improve their country.

Mr Sisi, 59, who said he first wore military uniform as a 15-year-old cadet in 1970, said he had "humbly" decided to bow to the will of the people.

Sounding a similar note earlier this month, he was quoted by state media saying he could "not turn his back on calls by the majority of Egyptians" for him to run for president.

To his supporters, the former army chief is a saviour who can end the political turmoil dogging Egypt since a popular uprising ended Hosni Mubarak's three decades of one-man rule in 2011.

Tens of thousands of his supporters have taken to the streets to urge him to stand.

But his opponents hold him responsible for what human rights groups say are widespread abuses, and fear that he wants a return to authoritarianism.

His announcement came hours after Egypt's interim authorities ordered the prosecution of 919 suspected Islamists and days after 528 Islamists were sentenced to death in a separate case.

If Abdul Fattah al-Sisi becomes president, he will be the latest in a line of Egyptian rulers drawn from the military: a line only briefly broken during Islamist President Mohamed Morsi's year in office.

The starting date of the nomination process for the presidential election will reportedly be announced on Sunday, after which no changes may be made to the electoral roll.

The government has yet to set a date for the vote, although earlier this month al-Ahram newspaper cited interim President Adly Mansour as saying that it would be completed by 17 July.

Leftist politician Hamdeen Sabahi, who came third in the 2012 election, is the only other candidate to have declared his intention to run.

Gen Sedki Sobhi, the current chief-of-staff of the armed forces, is expected to be named the new commander-in-chief and defence minister. (Text ends)

Russia launches a spy satellite for Egyptian military’

By Russian Space Web (April 22, 2014) With the exception of Russian Space Web, other news sites failed to report that the spy satellite Russia launched for Egypt on April 16 was first and foremost designed to boost the power of Egypt's military. Given Egypt has been threatening Ethiopia with war over the ongoing contruction of the Dam over Blue Nile, the launch of a spy satellite perhaps capable of being used as an orbital weapon should be a source of serious concern for Ethiopia.

A Russian rocket launched a new-generation surveillance spacecraft Wednesday designed to give the Egyptian military a powerful "eye in the sky." The launch of the Soyuz-U rocket took place as scheduled on April 16, 2014, at 20:20 Moscow Time (12: 20 EST) from Site 31 in the Baikonur Cosmodrome in Kazakhstan. The launch vehicle was carrying a Russian-built Egyptsat-2 satellite designed to provide high-resolution imagery for the Egyptian military and other government agencies in the country. The spacecraft was successfully delivered into its planned orbit 520 seconds after liftoff.

The development and launch campaign for Egyptsat-2 has been conducted largely in secret. Only one visual of the operational spacecraft was released to the public by its manufacturer RKK Energia after the successful launch. Notably, in its post-launch press-release, the company avoided the use of name Egyptsat-2, instead identifying the satellite as a "spacecraft for optical-electronic observation developed for the foreign customer."

RKK Energia announced that the satellite had been inserted into a 720 by 440-kilometer orbit with an inclination 51.6 degrees toward the Equator. Its ground facility established control over the satellite at 21:52 Moscow Time, the company said. Western radar detected two objects in orbit with similar parameters, probably representing the satellite and the third stage of the Soyuz-U launch vehicle. The satellite was expected to use its own propulsion system to enter a final operational orbit.

PRESS: At least 70 journalists killed around the world in 2013’

Figures compiled by the Committee to Protect Journalists show that 29 journalists were killed in Syria, 10 in Iraq and six in Egypt

CPJ (AP) April 25, 2014 At least 70 journalists were killed around the world in 2013, including 29 who died covering the civil war in Syria and 10 in Iraq, according to the Committee to Protect Journalists. The dead in Syria included a number of citizen journalists working to document combat in their home cities, broadcasters who worked with media outlets affiliated with either the government or the opposition, and a handful of correspondents for the foreign press, including an al -Jazeera reporter, Mohamed al-Mesalma, who was shot by a sniper.

Six journalists died in Egypt. Half of those reporters were killed while reporting a 14 August crackdown by Egyptian security forces on demonstrators protesting the ousting of Mohamed Morsi. "The Middle East has become a killing field for journalists. While the number of journalists killed for their work has declined in some places, the civil war in Syria and a renewal of sectarian attacks in Iraq have taken an agonising toll," the committee's deputy director, Robert Mahoney, said in a statement.

"The international community must prevail on all governments and armed groups to respect the civilian status of reporters and to prosecute the killers of journalists." The New York-based Committee to Protect Journalists has been tracking deaths among reporters and broadcasters since 1992. Most of the killings it has documented over the years involve people covering the news in the places where they live. That was the case, as well, in 2013. Many of the deaths occurred during combat, or among reporters covering conflict zones, but journalists in several countries were also murdered after reporting on sensitive subjects.

Reporters and commentators who covered police misconduct, political corruption or drug trafficking and other sensitive topics were slain in separate incidents in Brazil, Colombia, the Philippines, India, Bangladesh, Pakistan and Russia. A pair of Radio France Internationale journalists were abducted and killed after meeting a leader of ethnic Tuareg separatists in Kidal, Mali. Militants in Iraq killed five members of the news staff of Salaheddin TV in a suicide attack this month on the channel's offices in Tikrit, Iraq.

For the first time in a decade, no journalists were known to have been killed for their work in Mexico. The CPJ is still looking into the deaths of an additional 25 journalists in 2013, not included in the tally of 70, to determine whether their deaths had anything to do with their work. To date, at least 63 journalists have been killed covering the conflict in Syria, the CPJ's report said – and that tally may understate the problem. Sixty journalists have been abducted in Syria this year alone. Thirty are still missing.

April 28, 2014: Egypt: Brotherhood's chief mass death sentences’

News A judge at a mass trial in Egypt has recommended the death penalty for 683 people - including Muslim Brotherhood leader Mohammed Badie. The defendants faced charges over an attack on a police station in Minya in 2013 in which a policeman was killed. However, the judge also commuted to life terms 492 death sentences out of 529 passed in March in a separate case. Also on Monday, a court banned a youth group that helped ignite the uprising that toppled Hosni Mubarak in 2011. The decision passed in Cairo to outlaw the April 6 pro-democracy movement was based on a complaint that accused the group of "tarnishing the image" of Egypt and colluding with foreign parties. Ahmed Maher, the group's leader, was sentenced to three years in prison in December for violating a law that bans all but police-sanctioned protests.

Egypt unfair trial, death sentences make mockery of justice -AI’

PR (April 28, 2014) - Amnesty International today warned of grave flaws in Egypt's criminal justice system after a court in El Minya, Upper Egypt, confirmed death sentences for 37 people and imposed terms of life imprisonment to 491 in one case, and ruled that 683 individuals should be sentenced to death in another.

“Today’s decisions once again expose how arbitrary and selective Egypt’s criminal justice system has become. The court has displayed a complete contempt for the most basic principles of a fair trial and has utterly destroyed its credibility. It is time for Egypt’s authorities to come clean and acknowledge that the current system is neither fair nor independent or impartial,” said Hassiba Hadj Sahraoui, Deputy Director of the Middle East and North Africa Programme at Amnesty International.

“Egypt’s judiciary risks becoming just another part of the authorities’ repressive machinery, issuing sentences of death and life imprisonment on an industrial scale.” “The verdict must not be allowed to stand – the convictions of the 37 sentenced to death and 491 sentenced to life in prison must be quashed and fair retrials with no possibility of the death penalty must be ordered immediately for all the defendants.”

All 528 defendants were facing charges in connection with an attack on a police station in August 2013 and belonging to the banned Muslim Brotherhood movement. The verdicts in their cases come after a grossly unfair trial in which the judge did not review evidence or allow the defence to cross-examine witnesses. Defence lawyers and defendants alike were barred from the previous session on 24 March, in which the court indicated it would sentence all 528 to death.

Today, the same court also referred 683 defendants, including Mohamed Badie, the Supreme Guide of the Muslim Brotherhood, in a separate case involving political violence to Egypt’s Grand Mufti – who under Egyptian law must review all death sentences before the court formally imposes them. They were accused of murder, attempted murder, burning Adwa Police Station, belonging to a banned group and participating in a gathering of more than five persons with the intention of committing the above mentioned crimes. This trial also was fundamentally unfair, as reported by an Amnesty International delegate who attended the trial. AI opposes the death penalty in all circumstances and considers it to be the ultimate cruel, degrading and inhuman punishment. None of the defendants in either case was brought to court.

May 6, 2014: Egypt's el-Sissi: Muslim Brotherhood will not return’ By

SARAH EL DEEEB and LEE KEATH, AP

CAIRO (AP) — Abdel-Fattah el-Sissi, the former military chief who removed Egypt's Islamist president and who is now poised to win the post in elections this month, said the Muslim Brotherhood will never return as an organization, accusing it of using militant groups as cover to destabilize the country. El-Sissi spoke in the first TV interview of his campaign, aired Monday, vowing that restoring stability and bringing development were his priorities. The comments were a seemingly unequivocal rejection of any political reconciliation with the Brotherhood, which was Egypt's most powerful political force until el-Sissi removed President Mohammed Morsi, a member of the group, last summer.

Since ousting Morsi, el-Sissi has been riding an overwhelming media frenzy lauding him as Egypt's savior, and his status as the country's strongest figure all but guarantees him a victory in the May 26-27 election. El-Sissi's only opponent in the race is leftist politician Hamdeen Sabahi, the third-place finisher in the 2012 election won by Morsi. El-Sissi's comments were a stark signal of his intention to ensure the elimination of the 86-year-old Brotherhood as both a political and ideological force in the country. He is building on an unprecedented popular resentment of the group, after its rise to power in the last three years. Asked whether the Brotherhood will no longer exist under his presidency, el-Sissi replied, "Yes. Just like that."

"It's not me that finished it, the Egyptians have. The problem is not with me," he said. The Brotherhood and its Islamist allies won every election following the 2011 ouster of autocrat Hosni Mubarak, dominating the parliament and capturing the presidency under Morsi. The Brotherhood's electoral strength was largely rooted in a widespread grassroots organization it had built up for decades despite being banned under Mubarak. But after a year in office, millions joined protests demanding Morsi's removal, accusing his Brotherhood of monopolizing power and seeking to change the country's identity along the lines of Brotherhood ideology — prompting el-Sissi's ouster of Morsi. Since then, there's been no sign of reconciliation between the sides. The Brotherhood and its allies have denounced Morsi's removal as a military coup that has wrecked democracy, rejecting the new government and persisting in a campaign of street protests.

Security forces have waged a ferocious crackdown on Morsi supporters, clashing with protesters. Hundreds have been killed and more than 16,000 members of the though the sentence can be appealed — and he and Morsi and other senior Brotherhood figures face a string of trials. The government has branded the Brotherhood a terrorist organization. Under the weight of the crackdown, protests have waned. At the same time, Islamic militant groups have stepped up bombings and shootings against police and the military in retaliation for Morsi's removal. In the joint interview with two private Egyptian TV stations CBC and ONTV, el-Sissi directly accused the Brotherhood of being behind the campaign of bombings and shootings. He said the movement "created" Islamic militant groups to use as "covers to fight from behind ... to keep the movement away from any accusations." He said a senior Brotherhood leader had warned him that if he removed Morsi, extremist fighters from Afghanistan and elsewhere would come to Egypt to fight.

Brotherhood and other Islamists have been arrested. The Brotherhood's leader, Mohammed Badie, has been sentenced to death —

The Brotherhood denies any connection to militants. He said the Brotherhood's ideology was based on "arrogance in religion" — and the presence of that strain of thought had destabilized Egyptian society for decades. "The thought structure of these groups says that we are not true Muslims, and they believed conflict was inevitable because they consider us non-believers," he said. "It will not work for there to be such thinking again." He appealed to the public to support the police and the armed forces in their fight against terrorism. He vowed to respond to demands by the police to boost their capabilities to fight violence and said the armed forces are poised to help the police in such a task.

The 59-year-old el-Sissi retired from the military in March with the rank of field marshal to launch his candidacy. The one-hour interview was his first direct address to the public since he declared his intention to run and after the start of the official campaigning on May 2. His election campaign is likely to largely be made up of TV and media interviews and private meetings, with few street appearances, mainly because of security concerns. In the interview, he said two assassination plots against him have already been uncovered, without giving details. A second part of the interview, likely to go into more details about his economic program, is to be aired on Tuesday.

El-Sissi's candidacy has also raised concerns among some secular activists over a return of the autocracy that reigned in Egypt under Mubarak, who was also a veteran of the military. A number of prominent secular activists have been arrested in recent months, several of them under a draconian new law banning all protests without a police permit. El-Sissi defended the protest law, saying it was needed to prevent further instability and insisting that police will give permits to those who seek to hold peaceful demonstrations. "We are talking about a country going to waste. People must realize this and support us. Whoever imagines otherwise, only wants to sabotage Egypt and this won't be allowed," he said, losing his temper for the first time during the interview. "This chaos will bring it down, because of this irresponsible protesting," he said.

El-Sissi spent a part of the interview discussing his family, explaining that he met his wife as a teenager and promised her marriage when he was admitted to military college. He spoke fondly of her as a major supporter of his decision to run for president. She told him he had no choice, he said, telling him, "We of course love you, but this nation will be lost." He revealed that his two of his sons work in the government, one as a member of the General intelligence and another in the powerful Administrative Oversight agency, a government monitoring organization. A third son applied to the foreign service and was twice rejected, he said. He also has a daughter. U.S. trained el-Sissi said the military will not play a role in politics under his presidency and promised to consult with political factions. Asked if he will accept criticism, he responded with a smile, "I will put up with it" — but then said he won't accept "offenses."

In one Cairo neighborhood, Sayeda Zeinab, el-Sissi supporters organized showings of the interview at local coffee houses, where dozens gathered to watch. During advertising breaks, they sang and clapped to pro-military anthems. "After God, I worship him," 65-year-old Alia el-Sayed Saad said, raising two pictures of el-Sissi. "We are not ignorant, we can differentiate between the wicked and the honest." Turnout at the café shows was not high however — and nearby coffee shops with TVs showing a soccer game were packed with larger crowds. (Text ends)

EGYPT - New cabinet sworn in: Who’s who in El-Sisi’s new cabinet’

Ahram Online (June 17, 2014)

This is Egypt’s third cabinet since Morsi’s ouster nearly a year ago and the first under new president El-Sisi. The first cabinet under Egypt’s new President Abdel-Fattah El-Sisi was sworn in on Tuesday morning, headed by Prime Minister Ibrahim Mahlab. The new government — the third since the ouster of Islamist president Mohamed Morsi in July of last year — retains 21 existing ministers, one of whom will hold a new portfolio, and introduces 13 new ones. Headed by the president and the premier, the cabinet held its first meeting immediately after taking oath.

Ministers who will remain in their posts are:

1. Minister of Tourism – Hisham Zaazou

Zaazou, 59, continues in his post as tourism minister.

He is a political independent who was appointed tourism minister in August 2012. He was previously assistant to former tourism minister Mounir Fakhry Abdel-Nour.

Zaazou resigned in June when a member of militant Islamist group Al - Gamaa Al-Islamiya was appointed governor of Luxor. He later withdrew his resignation and continued as minister after the governor resigned.

2. Minister of Communication – Atef Helmy

Helmy was originally appointed communications minister in January 2013. He resigned from the cabinet on 1 July in protest at then-president Mohamed Morsi's failure to respond to nationwide protests against his rule. A graduate of a military technical college, Helmy obtained a diploma in computer science from Ain Shams University in 1979. After leaving the army in 1983, he began his career in the civilian IT sector, working at several Egyptian and multinational corporations, including Oracle Egypt, where he became managing director.

3. Minister of Industry – Mounir Fakhry Abdel-Nour

The 68-year-old served as tourism minister from February 2011 until August 2012 under Essam Sharaf.

Abdel-Nour claims to have refused a ministerial position under Mohamed Morsi. As secretary-general of the Wafd Party, he was the first minister from an opposition party to hold a cabinet post for 30 years. He is also the founder of the Egyptian Finance Company and was a member of the National Council for Human Rights. He is a director of the Egyptian Federation of Industries and the Egyptian Competition Authority.

4. Minister of Planning – Ashraf El-Araby

El-Araby served as planning minister from August 2012 until May 2013 under prime minister Hisham Qandil. He was replaced by Muslim Brotherhood figure Amr Darrag. An economist by training, El -Araby received his doctorate from Kansas State University in the United States. For the majority of his career, he worked at the country's National Planning Institute. From 2006 until the end of 2011, he headed the technical advisory office of former planning minister Fayza Abul -Naga. After a brief interlude, during which he worked at the Arab Planning Institute in Kuwait, El-Arabi was called back to head the ministry. He was a key part of the Egyptian team negotiating with the International Monetary Fund over a $4.8 billion loan.

5. Minister of Petroleum – Sherif Ismail

Ismail is chairman of the state-owned Ganoub El-Wadi Petroleum Holding Company which manages exploration and production concessions, establishes joint ventures with private companies and constructs oil infrastructure.

6. Minister of Religious Endowments – Mokhtar Gomaa

Gomaa is dean of the Faculty of Islamic Studies at Al -Azhar University and a member Al-Azhar's senior clerical institute. He was born in 1939 in Qalioubiya governorate. He earned his degree in Arabic in 1965 and later completed a master's degree and a doctorate. Gomaa worked at several newspapers as an Arabic proof-reader and has been a member of the Journalists' Syndicate since 1972. He is also the author of several books on religion.

7. Minister of Education – Mahmoud Abou El-Nasr

Abul-Nasr was formerly head of the ministry's technical education sector. He was a faculty member at Cairo University's mechanical engineering department.

8. Minister of Sports and Youth – Khaled Abdel-Aziz

Abdel-Aziz was the head of the Shooting Club, a private sports club in Giza, and then became chairman of the National Council of Youth. He is a member of the Egypt Party, founded and led by moderate Islamic preacher Amr Khaled. Abdel-Aziz was director of the 2006 African Cup of Nations, which Egypt hosted and won.

9. Minister of Military Production – Ibrahim Younis

Younis is a major general in the army and chairman of the Arab Organisation for Industrialisation (AOI), a military-owned company considered one of the largest industrial organisations in Egypt. The AOI supreme committee is headed by the country's president and includes several other cabinet ministers.

10. Minister of Health – Adel El-Adawy

El-Adawy served as an assistant to two former ministers of health, Ashraf Hatem and Amr Helmy.

He is also vice president of Banha University with responsibility for graduate studies and research, as well as the head of the Egyptian Society of Orthopaedics.

11. Minister of Housing – Mostafa Madbouly

Madbouly is retaining his position from the previous cabinet as he took up the position of minister of housing in February succeeding Prime Minister Ibrahim Mahleb. He is an architect and urban designer who was director of the UN's HABITAT Regional Office for Arab States. Madbouly holds a PhD in urban planning from Cairo University and a postgraduate diploma in urban management from the Institute for Housing and Urban Development Studies in Rotterdam. He served as chairman of the General Organisation of Physical Planning for almost four years.

12. Minister of Supply – Khaled Hanafy

Hanafy is chair of the Internal Trade Development Authority (ITDA), a governmental body belonging to the ministry of supply. He was appointed chair of ITDA after a decision by outgoing prime minister Hazem El - Beblawi in late November 2013. He is also dean of the International Transport and Logistics faculty at the Arab Academy for Science, Technology, and Maritime Transport.

13. Minister of Social Solidarity – Ghada Waly

Waly is the secretary-general of the Social Fund for Development (SFD), a government entity that provides start-up companies with financial help and other services. Her past experience includes a stint at the United Nations Development Program (UNDP) where she worked towards poverty reduction and job creation. She has previously called on the Egyptian government to encourage entrepreneur innovation and development in the microfinance sector.

Waly was also a board member of the Consumer Protection Agency, the first government body for consumer protection, which was created in 2006. She studied at Colorado State University in the US, earning a bachelor's in arts and humanities in 1987 and a master's in 1990.

14. Minister of Aviation – Mohamed Hossam Kamal

Kamal was appointed as the chairman of the national aviation company EgyptAir in August 2013. That same year he was also chosen as a representative for Arab airlines in the International Aviation Union.

Kamal's career in the aviation industry has seen him involved with cooperation projects for fuel and equipment purchase as well as a plan to exchange used parts to cut costs on Arab airlines.

15. Minister of Local and Administrative Development – Adel Labib

Labib, 68, served as governor of several provinces under Hosni Mubarak, including Qena in Upper Egypt, Beheira in the Nile Delta, and Alexandria. There were major protests against him in Alexandria, with some local groups accusing him of mismanagement. In 2011, prime minister Essam Sharaf appointed him governor of Qena for a second time after local protesters backed him over an unpopular alternative. He was Qena governor until June 2012 when he was replaced in a reshuffle by president Mohamed Morsi.

16. Minister of Finance – Hany Kadry Demian

Demian was first deputy finance minister for seven months from October 2012 to April 2013, when he resigned for apparent unease over the rising influence of Muslim Brotherhood-affiliated economists, according to sources from the finance ministry. Before this post, he was deputy minister for five years.

Demian has been a key Egyptian negotiator with the International Monetary Fund (IMF). In 2008, he was appointed as the Chairman of Deputies for the IMF's International Monetary and Financial Committee (IMFC). He was the IMFC's deputy at a G20 summit and chaired the IMFC communiqué drafting sessions. He was close to Youssef Boutros Ghali, a powerful finance minister from the Hosni Mubarak era who fled the country in February 2011. Demian attended Columbia University in New York, where he received a master's degree in international affairs and economic policy management.

17. Minister of Urban Development – Laila Iskandar

Although the ministry of urban development is a new addition, Iskandar served in the previous cabinet as minister of environment. Iskandar is an Egyptian social entrepreneur who has worked on environmental projects that have received international recognition, notably with garbage collectors in Cairo, for which she won the Goldman Environmental Prize in 1994 and the Social Entrepreneur of the Year award from the Schwab Foundation at the World Economic Forum in 2006. During her ministerial post, she was opposed to cement plants and sought to obtain cabinet approval to render coal an alternative source of energy due to shortages in traditional fuels like natural gas. The issue remains unresolved. Iskandar studied economics and political science at Cairo University. She then went on to gain a master's in teaching and a doctorate in education at UC Berkeley, California and Columbia University, New York respectively.

18. Minister of Defence – Sedki Sobhi

Sobhi was made a colonel general by interim president Adly Mansour, a rank historically reserved for defence ministers. Since graduating from Egypt's Military Academy in 1976, Sobhi has held a number of senior posts, including commander of the Third Army, stationed in Suez and South Sinai, and deputy chief of the Supreme Council of the Armed Forces, which he now heads.

19. Minister of Interior – Mohamed Ibrahim

Ibrahim was originally appointed in a cabinet reshuffle in January 2013, and was one of the few ministers to keep his post after the ouster of president Mohamed Morsi. Human rights activists and opposition figures have been calling for his dismissal since the dispersal of pro-Morsi protest camps in Rabaa Al-Adawiya and Nahda squares left hundreds dead. Under Ibrahim's leadership, the police have launched a broad crackdown on Islamists and more recently on secular opposition activists. Ibrahim's main challenge has been a militant insurgency in the Sinai Peninsula and a growing number of terrorist attacks across the country that have killed dozens of police and soldiers.

20. Minister of Electricity – Mohamed Shaker

Shaker is chairman of Shaker Group, a consultancy and engineering firm that specialises in electricity projects. His firm is currently designing and constructing the power generation plant of the Cairo Metro's third phase. It has also built major transmission lines and power generation plants across Egypt and other countries.

21. Minister of Manpower – Nahed El-Ashri

El-Ashri headed the department of labour relations and collective bargaining at the ministry under Morsi and in El-Beblawi's cabinet. She has worked with most of the other cabinet ministers, and has played a major role in negotiations with striking workers.

The newly-appointed ministers are:

1. Minister of Transport – Hany Dahy

Dahy served as head Egyptian General Petroleum Corporation (EGPC) from 2011 until his retirement in 2012. In his capacity as EGPC head, Dahy was one of the authorities responsible for the decision to terminate Egypt's natural gas export contract with Israel.

2. Minister of Environment – Khaled Fahmy

Fahmy served as Egypt's minister of environment during Morsi's reign from January to July 2013, quitting as part of mass resignations in the cabinet before Morsi's ouster.

He received his PhD in economics in 1984 from the University of Economic Sciences, Bruno Leuschner. He was Deputy Chief of party in Chemonics International from 2005 to 2008.

3. Minister of Foreign Affairs – Sameh Shoukry

Shoukry served as Egypt's ambassador to the United States from 2008 to 2012.

He received his bachelor's degree in law from Ain Shams University in 1975.

Shoukry previously served as secretary for information to deposed president Hosni Mubarak from 1995 to 1999. He was also Egypt's permanent representative to the United Nations in Geneva from 2005 to 2008 and ambassador to Austria from 1999 to 2003.

4. Minister of Culture – Gaber Asfour

Asfour served briefly as minister of culture following the 25 January 2011 uprising, from 31 January to 8 February 2011. A literary critic and author, Asfour held the post of the General Secretary of the Supreme Council for Culture, where he focused on the department of literary translations.

Asfour later left the department to create the National Translation Foundation, which he headed and secured funding for from the Ministry of Culture. For several years, Asfour was also editor-in-chief of Fousoul, a literary quarterly publication. In 2008 he was awarded the UNESCO-Sharjah Prize for Arab Culture.

5. Minister of International Cooperation – Naglaa El-Ahwany

El-Ahwany is the second woman to be appointed as minister of international cooperation, in the footsteps of Fayza Aboul -Naga. She was appointed as economic advisor to Egypt's cabinet in May 2011. An economic researcher at the International Labour Organization (ILO) in Cairo, she has published several studies on informal labour and rural development, issues that are particularly relevant to Egypt's economic agenda. She is also responsible for many publications on development issues, workers' rights and legal empowerment of the poor. El -Ahwany served as director of the European Studies Centre at the faculty of Economics and Political Science at Cairo University and is a member of the National Council for Women's (NCW) economic committee.

6. Minister of Investment – Ashraf Salman

Salman is currently CEO of Cairo Financial Holding, a Cairo-based investment bank of which he was a co-founder. Founded in 2008, the bank has as an authorised capital of LE500 million and a paid-in capital of LE240 million. Salman is an experienced financier, with over 20 years of experience with the public and private sector. A member of the Management Development Centre for Industry, Salman was one of the architects of Egypt's privatisation program under the Mubarak regime in the 1990s, taking part in the restructurings and valuations of public and private companies.

7. Minister of Justice – Mahfouz Saber

Saber is head of Mansoura's Appeals Court. He was the secretary-general for the parliamentary election commission in the 2010 parliamentary polls, which are widely known to have been rigged.

8. Minister of Higher Education – Sayed Abdel-Khalek

Abdel-Khalek is head of Mansoura University, where he was previously dean of the law school. He graduated from Cairo University in 1976 with a bachelor's degree in law.

9. Minister of Transitional Justice – Ibrahim El-Henedy

El-Henedy is head of Egypt's Illicit Gains Authority, which in the past has investigated corruption charges on a host of prominent figures from Mubarak's regime.

10. Minister of Scientific Research – Sherif Hamad

Hamad is the dean of engineering at Ain Shams University, where he also received his PhD in engineering in 1992. He previously served as the engineering department's dean for student affairs.

11. Minister of Irrigation and Water Resources – Hossam El-Din Moghazi

Moghazi wrote his Master's thesis on groundwater hydrology in Wadi El - Natroun, and a PhD thesis at London University on the optimal design of wells to exploit groundwater in arid regions.

He has been a professor of irrigation engineering at Alexandria University since 2000 and department head since 2010. He has worked as a consultant to the irrigation ministry on several projects.

12. Minister of Agriculture – Adel El-Beltagi

El-Beltagi has a PhD in plant physiology from a British University, and is a fellow of the World Academy of Sciences. He has headed the Global Forum for Agricultural Research since 2006, the International Association for the Development of Dryland since 2003, and the Council of Agricultural Research and Development since 2007. His research focuses on agriculture in arid lands. He has participated in the authorship of more than 140 scientific publications at the national and international level. He was awarded the State Award for Agricultural Science and Developed Technological Sciences in 2008: the Sultan Qaboos Insignia for Science, Culture and Arts: the Insignia of Independence from King Abdullah II of Jordan in 2005: the Medal of Honour from France in 2003: the Gold Medal of the Armenian Ministry of Agriculture in 2003: the Golden Pen of the International Society for Horticultural Science in 1982 and an honorary doctorate in science from Khartoum University in Sudan in 2006.

13. Minister of Antiquities – Mamdouh El-Damaty

Head of the antiquities department at Ain Shams University since 2006, El-Damaty received his BA and MA in ancient Egyptian antiquities from Cairo University, and a PhD in ancient Egyptian antiquities from a German University. He was deputy secretary of the Egyptian Museum from 1981 to 1987, and secretary of the Museum of the Faculty of Antiquities, Cairo University from 1988 to 1996. He has been on the board of directors of several cultural, scientific and archaeological institutions in Egypt.

El-Damaty received the Order of Knight from Italy's president in 2004. (Text ends)

June 23, 2014: Egyptian Court Sentences Al-Jazeera Journalists to 7 Years'

(VoA) - An Egyptian court has sentenced three Al-Jazeera journalists to seven years each in prison on charges of supporting the banned Muslim Brotherhood. The court in Cairo issued its verdict Monday in the case that has drawn international condemnation. Australian Peter Greste and his two colleagues were were arrested in December at a Cairo hotel where they were working after Egyptian authorities closed the Qatar-based television network's bureau. Ahead of the verdict, Australian Prime Minister Tony Abbott said he told Egyptian President Abdel Fattah el -Sissi that Greste was simply reporting on events and not promoting the Brotherhood.

"I did make the point that as an Australian journalist, Peter Greste, would not have been supporting the Muslim Brotherhood, he would have simply been reporting on the Muslim Brotherhood and the point I made was that in the long run, a free and vigorous media are good for democracy, good for security, good for stability," said Abbott. Greste and his two colleagues were arrested in December at a Cairo hotel where they were working after Egyptian authorities closed the Qatar-based television network's bureau. The case, and cases against other journalists, have sparked an international outcry, including from press freedom groups who have urged authorities to release any detained journalists and allow for free expression.

Last week, Egypt freed another Al-Jazeera journalist who spent 10 months in prison without being charged. Prosecutors ordered the release of Abdullah Elshamy for health reasons after a hunger strike that he began in January to protest his detention. Egyptian authorities have carried out a crackdown on the Brotherhood since Sissi, then the army chief, led the ouster of president Mohamed Morsi last July. Since then, Egypt has drafted a new constitution and voted Sissi into office, and plans to hold parliamentary elections later this year. (Text ends)

September 15, 2014: Former Army field marshal Abdul Fattah al-Sisi has been president of Egypt for 100 days. He was elected in May 2014, almost a year after he removed his predecessor, President Mohammed Morsi, from office. While some Egyptians celebrated the possibility that Mr Sisi would bring stability to their country, others feared that a return to the authoritarian security state that prevailed under Hosni Mubarak.

November 29, 2014: Egypt trials: Mubarak officials' charges and verdicts

DEFENDANT Mohammed Hosni Mubarak, former president- High-profile court cases against Mubarak-era officials in the post-revolutionary period.

CHARGES: Conspiring in the murder of protesters in 2011 - case dropped in November 2014 Corruption over the sale of gas to Israel at below-market prices - case dropped in November 2014 Other corruption - case dropped in November 2014 Embezzlement of $18m earmarked for renovation of presidential palaces

VERDICT: Convicted of embezzlement in May 2014 and sentenced to three years in prison WHEREABOUTS: Under house arrest at Maadi Military Hospital, Cairo

PROFILE:
Mohammed Hosni Mubarak, former Egyptian president

Hosni Mubarak ruled Egypt for almost 30 years until he was swept from power in a wave of mass protests in February 2011.

Few expected that the little-known vice-president who was elevated to the presidency in the wake of Anwar Sadat's 1981 assassination would hold on to the country's top job for so long.

Sadat was assassinated by Islamist militants at a military parade in Cairo, and Mubarak was lucky to escape the shots as he sat next to him.

Since then, he has survived at least six assassination attempts - the narrowest escape shortly after his arrival in the Ethiopian capital, Addis Ababa, in 1995 to attend an African summit, when his limousine came under attack.

Besides his knack for dodging bullets, the former air force commander also managed to keep a hold on power by positioning himself as a trusted Western ally and fighting off a powerful opposition movement at home.

It all came to an end in a televised address on 1 February 2011, following mass protests in Cairo and other cities. Mubarak announced he had decided not to stand for re-election later that year.

Protests continued and on 10 February he appeared on state television to say he was handing over powers to his vice-president, but would remain as president.

The following day Vice-President Omar Suleiman made a terse announcement saying Mubarak was stepping down and the military's supreme council would run the country.

On trial

By late May 2011, judicial officials announced that Mr Mubarak, along with his two sons - Alaa and Gamal - would stand trial over the deaths of anti-government protesters.

So began a protracted series of court appearances - with the former president often been seen in the dock in an upright stretcher wearing his trademark sunglasses.

He has steadfastly argued his innocence - telling a retrial in August that that he was approaching the end of his life "with a good conscience".

On 2 June 2012 he was found guilty of complicity in the murder of some of the demonstrators who took part in the wave of protests that began on 25 January 2011. Along with his former Interior Minister, Habib al -Adly, he was sentenced to life imprisonment for his crimes.

In January 2013 a court upheld an appeal against Mubarak's and al -Adly's convictions and granted retrials. Mubarak and his sons were also ordered to be retried on corruption charges for which they were originally acquitted.

Mubarak was released from prison in August that year but placed under house arrest before being transferred to a military hospital.

In May 2014, Mubarak was found guilty of embezzlement, and sentenced to three years in prison. His sons were sentenced to four years each.

In November 2014, he was finally acquitted in a retrial of conspiring to kill protesters during the 2011 uprising against his rule. At the same time, he was also acquitted of corruption charges involving gas exports to Israel.

Early life

Born in 1928 in a small village in Menofya province near Cairo, Muhammad Hosni Sayyid Mubarak insisted on keeping his private life out of the public domain while president.

Married to a half-British graduate of the American University in Cairo, Suzanne Mubarak, he was known to lead a strict life with a fixed daily schedule that began at 0600.

Never a smoker or a drinker, he built himself a reputation as a fit man who led a healthy life.

In his younger days, close associates often complained of the president's schedule, which began with a workout in the gym or a game of squash.

He was sworn in as president on 14 October 1981, eight days after the Sadat assassination.

Despite having little popular appeal or international profile at the time, the burly military man used his sponsorship of the issue behind Sadat's killing - peace with Israel - to build up his reputation as an international statesman.

Emergency rule

In effect, Mr Mubarak ruled as a quasi-military leader when he took power.

For his entire period in office, he kept the country under emergency law, giving the state sweeping powers of arrest and curbing basic freedoms.

The government argued the draconian regime was necessary to combat Islamist terrorism, which came in waves during the decades of Mr Mubarak's rule - often targeting Egypt's lucrative tourism sector.

He presided over a period of domestic stability and economic development that meant most of his fellow countrymen accepted his monopolisation of power.

But towards the end of his tenure in power, Mr Mubarak felt for the first time the pressure to encourage democracy, both from within Egypt, and from his most powerful ally, the United States.

Many supporters of reform doubted the veteran ruler's sincerity when he said he was all for opening up the political process.

Ahead of his declaration that he would not to stand again for the presidency, the US had heaped pressure on him to stand aside, calling for an "orderly transition" of power to a more democratic system.

Mr Mubarak won three elections unopposed since 1981, but for his fourth contest in 2005 - after a firm push from the US - he changed the system to allow rival candidates.

Critics said the election was heavily weighted in favour of Mr Mubarak and the National Democratic Party (NDP). They accused the Egyptian leader of presiding over a sustained campaign of suppressing opposition groups, most notably the Muslim Brotherhood.

Health fears

The length of his time in power, along with his age and possible successors, had all been sensitive subjects in Egypt until the mass protests allowed the Egyptian people to find a voice.

People around Mr Mubarak said his health and vigour belied his age - although a couple of health scares served as a reminder of his advancing years.

Rumours about the president's health gathered pace when he travelled to Germany in March 2010 for gall bladder surgery. They flared every time he missed a key gathering or disappeared from the media spotlight for any conspicuous length of time.

However much Egyptian officials tried to deny them, they kept circulating, with reports in the Israeli and pan-Arab media.

The days of mass protests in Egyptian cities prompted Mr Mubarak to finally name a vice-president. On 29 January 2011, intelligence chief Omar Suleiman was elevated to the role in what was seen as an attempt by Mr Mubarak to bolster his support in the military.

Two weeks later Mr Mubarak's three-decade rule was over, and in March he was under arrest.

In the past, Mr Mubarak had said he would continue to serve Egypt until his last breath.

In his speech on 1 February 2011, he said: "This dear nation... is where I lived, I fought for it and defended its soil, sovereignty and interests. On its soil I will die. History will judge me like it did others." (Text ends)

Egypt: British embassy suspends services for security reasons

BBC News (December 7, 2014) The British embassy in Cairo has suspended public services for security reasons, the Foreign Office has confirmed.

A spokeswoman would not confirm the nature of the security issue, but said staff were working with Egyptian officials to enable work to resume.

The British Consulate-General in Alexandria is operating as normal, the Foreign Office website said.

Alternative arrangements are in place for some embassy services.

They can be viewed on the Foreign Office website.

'Heightened threat'

Members of the public are urged not to visit the embassy, which was also closed in 2013 during the protests that saw President Mohamed Morsi ousted.

In its travel advice for Egypt, the Foreign Office urges vigilance.

It says there is a "heightened threat of terrorist attacks globally against UK interests and British nationals from groups or individuals motivated by the conflict in Iraq and Syria."

It adds: "Terrorists continue to plan attacks in Egypt. Attacks could be indiscriminate and occur without prior warning.

"Foreigners could be targeted in tourist resorts or other locations frequented by foreigners. Previous attacks have almost exclusively targeted the security forces, their facilities and other government buildings.

"You should take great care near these places."

Is Arab-Spring-Style ‘Revolution’ No Longer Looming in the Nile Basin African Countries? By Samuel Ayele Bekalo (PhD) (February 19, 2015)

(A prospective Reflection) No one quite predicted an Arab spring. Yet, three of the longest serving Arab leaders in Africa who have ruled their countries with an iron fist for decades, have fallen by the Arab Spring in 2011. Now, the likes of Robert Mugabe (of Zimbabwe) take the number one spots of the longest serving Presidents being in power for over three decades. Elsewhere, amongst the Nile basin countries, the ‘new comers’ such as Yoweri Museveni (of Uganda), Omar Al Beshir (of Sudan), Kagami (of Rwanda), Afewerki (of Eritrea) are still going on ‘strong’ after over two decades in power (not counting their years at the helm as guerrilla leaders).

Most of the Nail Basin ‘new’ leaders, as their old compatriots, came to power leading a successful gorilla wars and invariably promising the African renaissance of free market and democratic governance. After two decades, none of them have relinquished power. Nor seem to have an intention to do so in the near future. In common, they clutched to political powers for prolonged time, winning three or more consecutive ‘free elections’ on their own terms of democratic electoral system.

All of the above has been going on against the background of poor governance and economic performance as well as various forms of human rights repressions. The recent global financial crisis and food price hike, exacerbated by increasing population and erratic climate change, have not helped to alleviate the simmering political and economic discontents. According to well-established local east African newspapers, the prices of basic foods such as sugar and loaf of bread in Kenya (in most of the Nile basin countries for that matter) are reported to be equal or more than in USA. Recently, a family friend who paid me a visit to the UK from Ethiopia (one of the poorest country in the world), commented that the cost of food appears to be cheaper here than in Africa if one takes into account the quality and quantity. Given the obvious significant differences in wages and work opportunities between Africa and the West, one can imagine how basic survival is becoming increasingly unbearable for the majority of people in that part of the world. Slowly but surely, the whole situation is crimping into the conscious of the wider population, pointing only to one direction of possible public revolt.

In the light of the above, unless meaningful positive changes that appeal to the wider society are realised and unless the long-serving leaders pave the way for genuinely inclusive governance, it would be difficult to see how the current status quos can be maintained for long. In other words, how can an Arab Spring style revolution with uncertain consequences can be avoided, whether it is triggered by poor economic conditions and hunger or the brewing dissatisfaction of the monopoly of the political-economy by minorities?

The other critical question for a neutral observers in my position, who suffered from the after math of previous conflicts in the region, would be whether the long-overdue serving leaders of Nile Basin countries are paying enough attention or ignoring to address the looming situations. Evidently, from the tone of their voices, they are at least appear to be aware of the legacy and the threat of the Arab Spring style revolution to their overdue monopoly of power. What is not certain, however, is whether the leaders have the full grasps of the real problems and seek to pave way for lasting sustainable political solutions. Sceptics are quick to point out, referring to the noises coming out from government sources, that the leaders seem either not to have learnt from or care about the recent past history. The respective government's spokes persons, from Zimbabwe in Southern Africa all the way to North Sudan, were quick to say that the Arab Spring countries political dynamics are very different from those of Africans. They warn, directly or indirectly, that any resistance to their authority on their backyard will not be tolerated and will be crushed and would be futile. They add that they have the people support (albeit small) and has the legitimacy to continue to rule. To quote few examples " There will be no Egyptian-like revolution here"… " We would just lock them up in jail forever in the most humane way and that would be the end of the story." Such resolute expression of brutalization and false claims of the affection of fellow citizens, however, are neither unusual nor wise. One only needs to reflect on the most recent fate of the self-claimed the beloved Brother Leader of Libya - the late Muammar Gaddafi.

Aside the economy and democratic right issues, there is also the issue of cross countries security / insecurity which has become an entrenched feature of politics and development in the Nile Basin Africa. As I observed first-hand, conflict inside any one country or between any two will always have peculiar major ramifications for all the rest in this region. It has a tendency of resulting in the breaking and making up of states, including producing a new land-locked countries. The separation of Eritrea from Ethiopia (land-locked now) in 1993 and the independence of South Sudan (also land-locked now) in 2011 are clear examples. Not far away, Somaliland is another potential case for divorce as it has been running its affairs separately from the rest of Somalia for over 20 years. To put flame on the fire, the longest on-going civil war in Southern Somalia, is reported to be fueled by proxy war of opposing neighboring countries as well as other external players across the sea. It is a tough place to be to all concerned.

Cognizant of the problematic cross-countries security threats, the 'new' generation Nile Basin leaders have been taking a new positive measures by forming IGAD (Intergovernmental Authority on Development), which is supported by the international communities and tasked to promote and implement mutual activism and intervention. To cite an example, except Sudan and Eritrea, the remaining regional countries have sent troops to Somalia to oust the radical Islamist insurgents. More recently, Ethiopia sent peace keepers to help maintain peace in the disputed oil reach border region of Abiye in Sudan. The overall aim of IGAD appears to be (a) avoiding or minimizing the cycles of old conflicts by not harboring opposition movements on each other's soil (b) harnessing the mutual political and economy interdependent, thereby, promote development.

Although the roles of IGAD and the efforts put so far are largely commendable, it is already proven to be a complex and difficult task. Whilst the countries appear to solve some of the nationalistic political problems, they don't seem to provide solutions to the underlying mutual economic ties which, in turn, affect security and prosperity. The on-going problem of fair share of oil resources between North and South Sudan is one example. Another example is the land-locked Ethiopia, which has so far shown no desire to use the ideal port of Asab, preferring to stifle its arc-foe Eritrea economically. Unfortunately, what all these point out is that politics still appear to overshadow the region's interlocking economic potentials of rational use of natural and human resources.

Whatever the challenges and the situations are it is neither wise nor viable for the long-serving Nile Basin leaders, like all the previous dictators before them, to try to hang on power for life. Unfortunately, although the recent dramatic fall from grace of north African Arab countries leaders could send a clear message or serve as a lesson to any rational person, the people in power are appears to be typically insular to the real situations. Some still try to prolong their stay in power by re-branding the same old system under different guises, what some commentators characterize us pseudo-federal system and ethno-national system or even own terms of multi-party system. Others reposition themselves by being a strategic Western and regional ally, for example, in playing key roles in the common cause of fighting international terrorism. Nevertheless, the recent Arab springs show that even the West / International Community strategic support will not insulate autocratic regimes, when the unstoppable mass revolt commences.

Finally, it worth noting that in this global information and communication age, ordinary people are more aware today about the rights and responsibilities of citizens as well as the ruling elites than previously. The time and game of manipulation and distortion of exceeding constitutional mandate are almost up. In view of this, the remaining critical question would be, who will be the next responsible and rational leader that relinquish power on own will before it is too late and being pushed off. Although they are few and far between, there are exemplars leaders in Africa that one can follow. Attempts by the seemingly powerful out -of-touch rulers to suppress the wills and winds of democratic change have so far failed. It only eventually leads to a disastrous fall from grace and the chaos we witnessed in the aftermath of the Arab-Spring. In connection to forthcoming 'General Elections' in the neighboring East African nations of Ethiopia and Sudan, for example, we hear reports of on-going free media and legitimate opposition movements repressions. This needs not be repeated. In particular, those in the helm of power have both the responsibility and the means to avert it by doing the right thing. Dr Samuel Ayele Bekalu is a Research and Development Education Fellow based in Leeds – Bradford (UK) . Aside Development Education , his recent work focuses in examining the plights of and representing refugees and migrants from East / Horn of Africa, including the 'boat people' crossing the rough Mediterranean Sea to reach the shore of Europe and beyond. He can be reached via private e-mail and web (Samuel@ayele90.freeserve.co.uk , www.ILPA.country experts.org.uk)

Egypt's Sisi says Ethiopians 'rescued' from Libya By

Mahmoud Mourad, AFP (May 7, 2015)

CAIRO - President Abdel Fattah al-Sisi said Egypt had "rescued" 27 Ethiopians from war-torn Libya, as state television showed him greeting the group at Cairo airport Thursday.

It was not immediately clear how the Ethiopians were rescued, but Sisi's office said the group flown in on an Egyptian plane was "liberated by Egyptian and Libyan security services." "All efforts were made to bring the Ethiopians to Egypt safely... Egyptian services participated in this effort to protect, rescue and secure our Ethiopian brothers," Sisi told reporters at Cairo airport.

Their release comes weeks after a purported video released by ISIS showed the executions of some 30 Ethiopian Christians captured in Libya. Sisi said Egypt was "pained by the gruesome beheading of innocent Ethiopians in Libya" and that the rescued Ethiopians were living in dire conditions in the war-strewn country. "What is happening in Libya is a matter that concerns us and we tell the whole world that Libya should return to be a safe and stable country for its people and even to its visitors," Sisi said.

Libya has plunged into chaos since the toppling of long-time autocrat Moammar Gadhafi, with rival militias fighting for the control of country's oilfields and territories. The killing of Ethiopians came weeks after the jihadists posted a similar video showing the beheadings of 21 Coptic Christians, all but one of them Egyptians, on a beach in Libya.

The killing of Egyptian Christians had prompted airstrikes by Cairo targeting ISIS targets inside Libya. Sisi has repeatedly called for a joint Arabic military force to fight jihadists in the region, and at an Arab League summit in March leaders of the region agreed to establish such a force. The details of the joint Arab force have yet to be worked out.

Since his election last year, Sisi has been working to improve relations with Addis Ababa amid a dispute over Nile water rights. Ethiopia began diverting the Blue Nile in May 2013 to build a 6,000 megawatt dam, which will be Africa's largest when completed in 2017. This has raised fears in Cairo that Egypt's share of the Nile water would fall. In March, Ethiopia, Egypt and Sudan signed an agreement of principles on the dam to ease tensions. (Text ends)

July 6, 2015: Egypt News: Egyptian military spokesman says the army killed 241 in Sinai from 1 to 5 July. The Egyptian army spokesman “killed more than 241 terrorists in northern Sinai”, today at lunch at the Egyptian army turned their bodies in northern Sinai with the same terrorists who killed two days ago more than 30 members of the Egyptian army.

July 5, 2015: EGYPT: Army kills 63 militants in North Sinai'

Security sources in Egypt said the army killed 63 Islamist militants in raids in the wilderness of northern Sinai air raids on Sunday at a time when the country is facing increasingly violent armed attacks and taken from the area base. The sources said that troops killed the militants in the villages located between the cities of Rafah and Sheikh Zuweid. The army also found four militant hideouts and attacked them using Apache helicopters and ground troops. Also attacked vehicles belonging to the militants. recently saw the Sinai is one of the most violent clashes between security forces and militants since the army statement isolate former President Mohamed Morsi, who belongs to the Muslim Brotherhood in 2013 after mass protests against his rule. and killed mandate of the Sinai group affiliated with al Islamic State of hundreds of army and police personnel Since isolate Morsi. She knew the group in the past on behalf of supporters between the sacred before allegiance to the organization of the Islamic state. Although the Sinai, are a security headache for Egypt and its neighbors for a long time but isolate Morsi caused the escalation of violence and militant attacks which extended its scope to the outside of the peninsula. On Monday the killing of the Attorney General Hisham Barakat, a car bomb to become the largest state official to be killed since isolate Morsi. The Egyptian government officials say that the Muslim Brotherhood group linked to Sinai attacks. The group says it is a peaceful movement and want to end what it calls the military coup against Morsi across the street protests. The Egyptian Interior Ministry said in a statement on Sunday it had arrested 12 members of the Muslim Brotherhood formed three terrorist cells to carry out attacks on the men of the army, police and targeting military and police installations. As I mentioned The official news agency Middle East said that the prosecutor referred to the trial of 22 people accused of planting bombs near the vital areas including the High Court and government buildings.

EGYPT: Sinai operations will last 'until IS removed'

(News updates) Egypt has vowed to rid its Sinai Peninsula of militants after major clashes with Islamic State fighters there killed more than 100 people. Operations will not stop until the area is cleared of all "terrorist concentrations", the army said. Air strikes continued into the early hours of Thursday. The army says 17 soldiers were among those killed after militants launched near-simultaneous raids on military checkpoints in Sheikh Zuweid and Rafah. Local reports put army casualties higher.

The attack was one of the largest co-ordinated assaults in the area yet by Islamic State's (IS) local affiliate, Sinai Province. The peninsula has been under a state of emergency and a curfew since October, when dozens of soldiers were killed in a militant attack.

Separately on Wednesday, security officials said nine members of the now banned Muslim Brotherhood, including former MP Nasr al-Hafi, had been killed in a police raid on a flat in western Cairo. The security situation in Egypt has worsened since the assassination of the public prosecutor, Hisham Barakat, three days ago in the capital.

Analysts said the car bomb attack that killed Mr Barakat also bore the hallmarks of Sinai Province, which was known as Ansar Beit al -Maqdis until it pledged allegiance to Islamic State in November and changed its name.

'100% under control'

In a statement, the army said it had killed "100 members of the terrorist elements" and injured them in "large numbers" in fighting in North Sinai. It said the operation left 17 soldiers, including four officers, dead.

By late on Wednesday, an army spokesman said the situation was "100% under control" and militants had withdrawn from Sheikh Zuweid. Brig. Mohamed Samir said: "The forces on the ground are completely under control. The group who were captured are being interrogated by the investigation team."

Eyewitness earlier reported seeing militants roaming the streets of the northern town of Sheikh Zuweid, clashing with armed forces. Five army checkpoints were also targeted by car bomb attacks. The town's main police station came under mortar and RPG fire, and militants reportedly planted bombs along a road leading to a nearby army camp. Egypt sent F-16s jets to bombard the militants in several locations.

Israeli PM Benjamin Netanyahu said his country sent its "condolences to the government and people of Egypt for the fallen Egyptians slain by IS terror". He added: "We see IS at the gates, across the border in the Golan, across the border in Egypt... We must stand up to all the forces of militant Islam, those led by Iran, those led by IS."

Since October, police and army patrols have been stepped up to deal with militancy in Sinai - which has been on the rise since the military overthrew Islamist President Mohammed Morsi in July 2013. At least 600 police and armed forces personnel have since been killed. A buffer zone along the border with Gaza was also created and underground tunnels - which the military says were used to smuggle weapons from the Palestinian enclave - have been destroyed.

Following the deaths in Cairo, the Muslim Brotherhood issued a statement saying that several of its leaders had been "murdered... in cold blood" and urged Egyptians to "rise in revolt" against the actions of the government of President Abdul Fattah al-Sisi.

The interior ministry said the men had been fugitive Brotherhood leaders who were meeting to plan "acts of terrorism and sabotage". The Muslim Brotherhood, however, said they were part of its committee supporting the families of detainees and members who had been killed. (Text ends)

MARITIME: Egypt Launches Suez Canal Expansion'

(HYPERLINK "http://www.bbc.com/news/world-middle-east-33800076" BBC News: August 6, 2015) Egypt has opened a major expansion of the Suez Canal, which deepens the main waterway and provides ships with a 35km (22 mile) channel parallel to it. At the inauguration, Egyptian President Abdel Fattah al-Sisi welcomed foreign leaders aboard a historic yacht as helicopters and fighter jets flew by. The expansion aims to increase the traffic handled by the canal. Egypt’s government hopes the revenues will revive the economy – but analysts have questioned the projections. They point out that the volume of world trade has not been growing at the pace needed to deliver the sums Egypt hopes to collect.

Egyptians commenting to the international press and on Twitter appear divided over the project, with many asking if the $8.2bn (£5.3bn) spent on the expansion could have been better deployed on improving infrastructure and public services. The expansion will allow for two-way traffic along part of the route, as well as for larger vessels overall. The construction of the new lane began a year ago, on the orders of Mr Sisi. At the inauguration ceremony in the town of Ismailia, the president appeared in military uniform and sunglasses aboard the El-Mahrousa – the yacht that was the first vessel to pass through the canal when it was built in 1869.

The former military leader, elected last year as a civilian, welcomed foreign guests including French President Francois Hollande and Russian Prime Minister Dmitry Medvedev. Fighter jets and helicopters flew above the ceremony. On the streets of Cairo, banners described the expanded canal as Egypt's "gift to the world". Pro-government media have hailed the expansion of the canal as a national triumph, and a turning point after years of instability. However, many analysts doubt if the new venture will deliver the anticipated benefits.

Ahmed Kamaly, an economist with the American University in Cairo, told Reuters news agency that the Egyptian projections were “wishful thinking”. “There was no viability study done, or known of,” he was quoted as saying. He added that the immediate benefits from the expansion were more likely to be political than economic, uniting people “around a national project”. Takings from Suez could also be hit by an expansion of the Panama Canal, due to be completed next year, which will compete for traffic along the Asia-North America route.

Security was tightened for the inauguration ceremony amid fears of attack by militants allied to Islamic State. The militants, based in the Sinai peninsula, have killed hundreds of people since the military overthrew the Islamist government of president Mohammed Morsi in 2013. The original canal currently handles 7% of global sea-borne trade. The waterway connects the Mediterranean to the Red Sea, providing the shortest sea link between Asia and Europe. Its nationalisation led to a brief war in 1956, pitting Egypt against the UK, France and Israel. (Text ends)

The Egyptian chariots were fast (40km/h) and deadly

HYPERLINK "https://wondersofthepast.quora.com/" \t "_blank"
Wonders of the Past
They turned into firing platforms that wreaked havoc on the enemies.

Tutankhamun's chariot at Luxor Museum, Egypt.
Some additional images of Egyptian war chariots as they would have been used.

INCLUDEPICTURE "https://ci3.googleusercontent.com/proxy/mYDiOnUFmi9hrP9t_hzhnQwtrMNrPWR-ESYWhO2vA2-Q1JjPe1nulUTOsx8SSsa3-Q0EUAB20swt9qQFTanMUWw1h2c8X9TifFLthpV5q24jp3stH1RCSUQhOvg=s0-d-e1-ft#https://qph.fs.quoracdn.net/main-qimg-199dd4a204399efb6d592f662fd93f8b-lq" * MERGEFORMATINET
INCLUDEPICTURE "https://ci4.googleusercontent.com/proxy/RSVxqL-ANEcXgD_zMMVUf7uCdf4qHOfkP3WeU6SyGayRZ1vjvvLCh-DSUCNR4M56YGwjqWjaOA9FtEBDPH9zbKeIzKB5LvkN2xGy7bk5jJemVhS0oa8lMVq-C5g=s0-d-e1-ft#https://qph.fs.quoracdn.net/main-qimg-cd93b6d2b18e7f7a01b44d758f2f90c4-lq" * MERGEFORMATINET
From the PBS documentary Building Pharaoh's Chariot (2013). A team uncovers the advanced engineering behind an ancient Egyptian war machine.

HYPERLINK "https://www.quora.com/profile/Colleen-Anne-Coyle" \t "_blank"
Colleen Anne Coyle

Ph.D in Archaeology, University of Chicago HYPERLINK "https://archaeologyunearthed.quora.com/Archaeologists-in-Egypt-say-the-remains-discovered-in-2019-could-prove-that-Egyptians-were-carrying-out-sophisticated-mu" \t "_blank" 15m
Archaeologists in Egypt say the remains discovered in 2019 could prove that Egyptians were carrying out sophisticated mummifications about 1,000 years earlier than thought

INCLUDEPICTURE "https://ci4.googleusercontent.com/proxy/s3Oz-urdauE4giMqxZNkXqkqIXszX9iLL71LBkhqB6-8JebUkhJraPcIkTe2oasj6XYT0-BlOBgqqILyvzPSzktM7jJmPiwefm-zMC-Cs_eeH3GYozAORO1KqNo=s0-d-e1-ft#https://qph.fs.quoracdn.net/main-qimg-6636681bf5c1cf70314113b5e3d22be8-lq" * MERGEFORMATINET Painting on the wall of Khuwy's tomb.

Mummy of Pharaoh's Official Discovered Inside Limestone Sarcophagus in Egypt

INCLUDEPICTURE "https://ci4.googleusercontent.com/proxy/tX8V7y_suTmw-2z4czYoPlJkPNG80aJMMGYYrRwfXL87__OROxwbkx_WAxEG8ozGmF9c8RHTiFUuijTg32RjX1KksdfXO3G1zxf30-wFQCjJ88EVMMA=s0-d-e1-ft#https://cdn.mos.cms.futurecdn.net/Uavp729UHryAxBFJgQtgPJ-320-80.jpg" * MERGEFORMATINET

Remains of a chapel found by Khuwy's tomb had been heavily robbed by ancient stone robbers. Hieroglyphs found in the tomb indicate that Khuwy was a senior administrator who held a high rank in the court of pharaoh Djedkare Isesi. (Image credit: Egyptian Ministry of Antiquities)

The mummified remains of a high-ranking official named Khuwy were discovered in a colorful tomb that dates back 4,400 years. Archaeologists made the discovery in south Saqqara, in Egypt, the Egyptian Ministry of Antiquities announced April 2.

Next to the burial is HYPERLINK "https://www.livescience.com/64317-saqqara-tomb-hidden-shafts-discovered.html" \t "_blank" a pyramid complex built for the pharaoh Djedkare Isesi, who reigned from 2381 to 2353 B.C. The colors of the tomb's HYPERLINK "https://www.livescience.com/59588-billboard-of-hieroglyphs-contains-cosmic-message.html" \t "_blank" hieroglyphs and decorations are incredibly well-preserved, despite the passage of over 4 millennia.
Hieroglyphs in the tomb list offerings and Khuwy's many titles, including "overseer of the khentiu-she of the Great House," "Great one of the ten of Upper Egypt" and "Sole friend" — titles that indicate he was a senior administrator in the pharaoh's court, said Emilie Martinet, a postdoctoral fellow in Egyptology with the Université Paul Valéry — Montpellier. While Martinet is not part of the team that made the discovery, her research focuses on the workings of ancient Egyptian administrations. [HYPERLINK "https://www.livescience.com/58313-photos-mummies-peru-egypt.html" \t "_blank" Photos: The Amazing Mummies of Peru and Egypt]

Pyramid inspired Design

Within the tomb complex, a descending corridor leads to a vestibule (an entrance area shaped like a hallway); an entranceway on the vestibule's southern wall leads to an antechamber with a drawing that shows Khuwy sitting in front of an offering table. Two entrances on the west wall of the antechamber lead to the burial chamber.

A team of archaeologists have discovered a tomb belonging to an official named Khuwy who lived about 4,400 years ago. Hieroglyphs in this photo say that he is the "Overseer of the khentiu-she of the Great House." (Image credit: Egyptian Ministry of Antiquities)
Inside that burial chamber, the archaeologists found the remains of a limestone sarcophagus that was robbed and almost destroyed in ancient times. The remains of the mummy of Khuwy was found in the same room. [HYPERLINK "https://www.livescience.com/62512-saqqara-egypt-tomb.html" \t "_blank" Photos: Ancient Egyptian General's Tomb Discovered in Saqqara]
The design of the tomb complex is similar to chambers built underneath pyramids during Egypt's fifth dynasty period (2465 to 2323 B.C.), according to the statement.

More discoveries

The team, led by Mohamed Megahed, an archaeologist with the Egyptian Ministry of Antiquities, also investigated a pyramid located beside that of Djedkare Isesi, finding that it belonged to a queen named Setibhor. An inscription found on a column within the pyramid reads:

In addition to discovering the tomb of Khuwy, the archaeological team investigated a pyramid beside pharaoh Djedkare Isesi. An inscription they found said that it belongs to Queen Setibhor. (Image credit: Egyptian Ministry of Antiquities)
"The one who sees Horus and Seth, the great one of the hetes sceptre, the great of praise, king's wife, his beloved Setibhor."

How did Ancient Egypt maintain such a consistent form of art/writing/language over a period of 2,500 years?
HYPERLINK "https://www.quora.com/profile/Jason-Almendra" \t "_blank"
Jason Almendra

I took "Greek & Latin Roots of English" in college HYPERLINK "https://www.quora.com/How-did-Ancient-Egypt-maintain-such-a-consistent-form-of-art-writing-language-over-a-period-of-2-500-years/answer/Jason-Almendra" \t "_blank" Aug 24
Writing was restricted to the priestly class in Egypt. The prestigious writing was hieroglyphs. This was inscribed into stone. Hieratic was the simplified version written on papyrus. Demotic Egyptian was the highly abbreviated form.
Hieroglyphs

Hieratic

Hieroglyphs

INCLUDEPICTURE "https://ci5.googleusercontent.com/proxy/2LRimuQ2_DlTPYQYxggvlrnMOnJfoRByyvkEcH5CC-6YRUWRWEvOzSqvNvotBs00mmu6nVx4F4y_iubRaLVJqiReB7RjUyTkjgCuDkyCiGLEMPhFkO-JlXU2Izg=s0-d-e1-ft#https://qph.fs.quoracdn.net/main-qimg-77608fd8d395628a831677bdb180a7eb-lq" * MERGEFORMATINET
Hieratic

INCLUDEPICTURE "https://ci6.googleusercontent.com/proxy/I3g3yjHN0JkEwdBHudlkoi_DTqhWUEtYAllF8zxbLuFZt6bS7hG320JZhnMfLc88lLQMNw33t-4pRSh0vv32qGdnnHq95XfU8J9d8XdPx2NmkXSlqALghI1zUY4=s0-d-e1-ft#https://qph.fs.quoracdn.net/main-qimg-eb3c8a9e0b5df7b9e8deb2c14f5221b8-lq" * MERGEFORMATINET
Demotic

INCLUDEPICTURE "https://ci5.googleusercontent.com/proxy/KkHc8M8byHjmSOZHQzw92V-HTj1w0ljH2GMU8JZ9a_fXm670Y1vh60KJVO6OHesd_IgVS50JvbXAsfTYCeaBiXZsFVcmdMTKJKGO6T_zS23B6gkDvFwQcTvfcCs=s0-d-e1-ft#https://qph.fs.quoracdn.net/main-qimg-203ae97523ddc702b619a2d2df0eac19-lq" * MERGEFORMATINET

HYPERLINK "https://www.quora.com/Was-Ancient-Egypt-an-advanced-civilation" \t "_blank" Related Links

Was Ancient Egypt an advanced civilization?
HYPERLINK "https://www.quora.com/How-did-we-discover-ancient-Egypt" \t "_blank" How did we discover ancient Egypt?
HYPERLINK "https://www.quora.com/Which-other-country-uses-the-same-method-of-writing-hieroglyphics-as-ancient-Egypt" \t "_blank" Which other country uses the same method of writing (hieroglyphics) as ancient Egypt?
HYPERLINK "https://www.quora.com/How-did-ancient-Egypt-abandon-its-hieroglyphs" \t "_blank" How did ancient Egypt abandon its hieroglyphs?
HYPERLINK "https://www.quora.com/Why-did-Arabic-replace-the-Egyptian-language-in-Egypt-despite-the-fact-that-ancient-Egypt-was-rather-populous" \t "_blank" Why did Arabic replace the Egyptian language in Egypt despite the fact that ancient Egypt was rather populous?
HYPERLINK "https://www.quora.com/How-was-everyday-life-for-an-average-man-or-woman-in-Ancient-Egypt" \t "_blank" How was everyday life for an average man or woman in Ancient Egypt?

How old is the pyramid of Giza? There were many speculations of its age, does anyone know exactly how old?

The Great Pyramid of Giza was the tallest of all the pyramids for the last 3800 years. According to wiki: Initially standing at 146.5 metres (481 feet), the Great

Pyramid was the HYPERLINK "https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/List_of_tallest_buildings_and_structures_in_the_world" \l "History" \o "en.wikipedia.org" \t "_blank" tallest man-made structure in the world for more than 3,800 years. Throughout history the majority of the smooth white limestone casing was removed, which lowered the pyramid's height to the present 138.5 metres (454.4 ft). What is seen today is the underlying core structure. The base was measured to be about 230.3 metres (755.6 ft) square, giving a volume of roughly 2.6 million cubic metres (92 million cubic feet), which includes an internal hillock. HYPERLINK "https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Great_Pyramid_of_Giza" \l "cite_note-4" \o "en.wikipedia.org" \t "_blank" [4

INCLUDEPICTURE "https://ci5.googleusercontent.com/proxy/2l0fkD8GzrNAeAS0T-JjuydK1L3QWF0z41GfUdIrL7uowIlQqk5er7sgvTkEH99uU7JJP9O8V-ViaWhJMPxedlGsVR3007D119ksMg15aXbe-9egQnaAeL8oSDE=s0-d-e1-ft#https://qph.fs.quoracdn.net/main-qimg-d72e5fd2beb020a9df05a65f04ad4cdc-lq" * MERGEFORMATINET

Also Titled the “Oldest of the Ancient 7 Wonders of the world”. HYPERLINK "https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Egyptologists" \o "en.wikipedia.org" \t "_blank" Egyptologists conclude that the pyramid was built as a HYPERLINK "https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Tomb" \o "en.wikipedia.org" \t "_blank" tomb for the HYPERLINK "https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Fourth_Dynasty_of_Egypt" \o "en.wikipedia.org" \t "_blank" Fourth Dynasty HYPERLINK "https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Ancient_Egypt" \o "en.wikipedia.org" \t "_blank" Egyptian pharaoh HYPERLINK "https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Khufu" \o "en.wikipedia.org" \t "_blank" Khufu and estimate that it was built in the 26th century BC during a period of around 27 years. HYPERLINK "https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Great_Pyramid_of_Giza" \l "cite_note-%3A2-3" \o "en.wikipedia.org" \t "_blank" [3] INCLUDEPICTURE "https://ci4.googleusercontent.com/proxy/z-1YEEnljnTKbSTVjZR1ORcDy8qv_nUJKMWbvdATZbyYnw44Wr0u6RWC-rov-61nVWIIqnm2CSeYBGHKylLIByv_Gbe2lvU4Lv38JvTle9JqdqYrvp6UOokvGRs=s0-d-e1-ft#https://qph.fs.quoracdn.net/main-qimg-3b559e289f97f70775f8bcc52b6f1465-lq" * MERGEFORMATINET

Radiocarbon dating

Mortar was used generously in the Great Pyramid's construction. In the mixing process ashes from fires were added to the mortar, organic material that could be extracted and HYPERLINK "https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Radiocarbon_dating" \o "en.wikipedia.org" \t "_blank" radiocarbon dated
. A total of 46 samples of the mortar were taken in 1984 and 1995, making sure they were clearly inherent to the original structure and could not have been incorporated at a later date. The results were calibrated to 2871–2604 BC. The HYPERLINK "https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Old_wood" \o "en.wikipedia.org" \t "_blank" old wood problem is thought to be mainly responsible for the 100–300 year offset, since the age of the organic material was determined, not when it was last used. A reanalysis of the data gave a completion date for the pyramid between 2620 and 2484 BC, based on the younger samples So, The Great Pyramid of Giza is expected to be around 4500 years old.

HYPERLINK "https://wakeupafrica.quora.com/" \t "_blank" Wake Up Africa!

.

Posted by Aniekpeno Ekong

At the 1974 UNESCO conference Egyptology was dealt a fatal blow. 2 African scholars wiped the floor with 18 world-renowned Egyptologists. They proved in 11 different categories of evidence that the ancient Egyptians were Black. The question of “What race were the ancient Egyptians?” was resolved at the historic international Cairo Symposium, held from January 28 – February 3, 1974. The United Nations Educational, Scientific, and Cultural Organization (UNESCO) convened 20 of the world’s top Egyptologists to debate the race of the founders of ancient Egyptian civilization. It was assumed by the vast majority of European Egyptologists that the ancient Egyptians were either Caucasians or western Asiatics. At the conference only two African scholars, Cheikh Anta Diop and Theophilé Obenga, held that the Egyptians were black Africans, while the other participants took opposing positions against the Diop-Obenga thesis. Armed with a formidable body of evidence from numerous academic disciplines, Diop presented specific information to prove the black origins of Kemet. It is obvious from the conference report that Diop dominated the proceedings, and confronted with his solid arguments, most of the participants changed their positions during the conference. It is clear that the participants abandoned the old Caucasoid and western Asiatic theories and the conclusion of the official UNESCO report indicates the triumph of Diop and his colleague Obenga. SALUTE TO CHEIKH DIOP AND THEOPHILE OBENGA

INCLUDEPICTURE "https://ci3.googleusercontent.com/proxy/3VSJ24KWYnBiuNXrWmxNHQ5irDM4ssSROI9YFdx0_t2er-f9Tr-csBorD5ZdDzUhDv3FfFETHfrmSDmtOxDbF2Co-pmRd39O1mJjwMZMOWA-40u_PVxIFrU_fag=s0-d-e1-ft#https://qph.fs.quoracdn.net/main-qimg-017967aa58bb7e0247076e23f41effc9-lq" * MERGEFORMATINET

23 people upvoted this

HYPERLINK "https://www.quora.com/Why-does-Egypt-believe-if-so-it-is-the-sole-owner-of-the-waters-of-the-Nile-River-Does-Egypt-also-consider-itself-the-owner-of-the-river-bed-and-its-banks-along-the-entire-length-of-the-Nile-River" \t "_blank" Why does Egypt believe (if so) it is the sole owner of the waters of the Nile River? Does Egypt also consider itself the owner of the river bed and its banks along the entire length of the Nile River?

HYPERLINK "https://www.quora.com/profile/Ernest-W-Adams" \t "_blank"
Ernest W. Adams
Lived in Egypt HYPERLINK "https://www.quora.com/Why-does-Egypt-believe-if-so-it-is-the-sole-owner-of-the-waters-of-the-Nile-River-Does-Egypt-also-consider-itself-the-owner-of-the-river-bed-and-its-banks-along-the-entire-length-of-the-Nile-River/answer/Ernest-W-Adams" \t "_blank" Oct 10

Originally Answered: Why does Egypt believe (if so) the sole owner of the waters of the Nile River? Does Egypt also consider itself the owner of the river bed and its banks along the entire length of the Nile River?

Egypt does not believe that it is the sole owner of the waters of the Nile, nor its banks and riverbed outside of Egypt. But it doesn’t want the flow reduced because it depends on the flow for irrigation and for its rapidly-growing population. Egypt is currently embroiled in an argument with Ethiopia, which wants to build a dam that threatens to reduce the flow.

As it is, the Mediterranean Sea has suffered environmental damage because so much of the water is being drawn off for irrigation, and it evaporates from the surface of Lake Nasser. The salt level of the sea is rising. Further reductions would only worsen the problem.

Related Linkss

HYPERLINK "https://www.quora.com/With-the-Nile-flowing-to-lower-Egypt-wouldnt-that-mean-the-ancient-Egyptians-most-likely-came-from-the-south-since-you-would-most-likely-work-with-the-flow-of-the-river-instead-of-against-it" \t "_blank"
With the Nile flowing to lower Egypt, wouldn't that mean the ancient Egyptians most likely came from the south since you would most likely work with the flow of the river instead of against it?

HYPERLINK "https://www.quora.com/Why-do-Egyptian-think-they-own-the-Nile-river-when-Ethiopia-is-2-000-years-older-than-Egypt" \t "_blank" Why do Egyptians think they own the Nile river when Ethiopia is 2,000 years older than Egypt?

HYPERLINK "https://www.quora.com/Why-is-Egypt-insisting-that-the-Nile-River-belongs-to-them-when-in-fact-Ethiopia-has-100-right-to-do-whatever-they-want-with-their-own-river" \t "_blank" Why is Egypt insisting that the Nile River belongs to them when in fact Ethiopia has 100% right to do whatever they want with their own river?

HYPERLINK "https://www.quora.com/Is-it-safe-to-swim-in-the-river-Nile-in-Egypt" \t "_blank" Is it safe to swim in the river Nile in Egypt?

HYPERLINK "https://www.quora.com/Where-is-the-Nile-river-located-and-what-is-the-importance-of-the-Nile-river" \t "_blank" Where is the Nile river located and what is the importance of the Nile river?

HYPERLINK "https://www.quora.com/Why-do-we-say-Egypt-is-the-Nile-and-the-Nile-is-Egypt" \t "_blank" Why do we say Egypt is the Nile and the Nile is Egypt?

What makes the pyramids such a mystery?

HYPERLINK "https://www.quora.com/profile/Spencer-McDaniel-11" \t "_blank" Spencer McDaniel

B.A. in Classical Studies & History, Indiana University Bloomington (Expected 2022) HYPERLINK "https://www.quora.com/What-makes-the-pyramids-such-a-mystery/answer/Spencer-McDaniel-11" \t "_blank"

Jul 15
Originally Answered: HYPERLINK "https://www.quora.com/Why-are-pyramids-a-mystery?no_redirect=1" \t "_blank" Why are pyramids a mystery?
Pyramids are really not that much of a mystery. They're just big piles of stones that humans have built into a certain shape. The pyramid shape happens to be a very simple, architecturally sound shape for building a large structure and, as a result, people in many different cultures all over the world and throughout history have built monuments in this shape. The popularity of the pyramid shape has nothing to do with aliens or mystical forces and everything to do with what works architecturally.

When it comes to the ancient Egyptian pyramids in particular, there are fairly extensive records of exactly who built them, when they built them, and why they built them. We also have a pretty good idea of how they built them. Quite simply, all the surviving evidence overwhelmingly indicates that human Egyptian workers built pyramids in the third and second millennia BCE as tombs for the pharaohs.

I discuss some of the evidence to support this conclusion in HYPERLINK "https://talesoftimesforgotten.com/2020/01/03/this-is-how-we-know-the-egyptian-pyramids-were-built-as-tombs/" \o "talesoftimesforgotten.com" \t "_blank" this article I wrote in January 2020 . I won't rehash all the evidence here since it isn't necessary to answer this question, but, if you want to learn more, you can read the article I've linked.

INCLUDEPICTURE "https://ci4.googleusercontent.com/proxy/5CU1ay4rPn3rEIlR3ZhSiVgq4nwp8awO_jV0gwL5k0QN1_8DQF9YuZJzpDzsGtytGri0qUCq6qKnI3NUYLJrj_lK3i-9-hyn_dJf005zOJtZOrf0jnSaNunq8TU=s0-d-e1-ft#https://qph.fs.quoracdn.net/main-qimg-0f15f903b5c8a894e936dd3ed5c561fc-lq" * MERGEFORMATINET

ABOVE: Photograph HYPERLINK "https://commons.wikimedia.org/wiki/File:Dahschur_-_Rote_Pyramide_2019-11-10d.jpg" \o "commons.wikimedia.org" \t "_blank" from Wikimedia Commons of the Red Pyramid of Sneferu at Dahshur

Related Links
HYPERLINK "https://www.quora.com/Do-we-really-not-know-how-the-Great-Pyramids-of-Egypt-were-built" \t "_blank"
Do we really not know how the Great Pyramids of Egypt were built?

HYPERLINK "https://www.quora.com/Is-it-possible-that-the-pyramids-are-much-older-than-we-think" \t "_blank"
Is it possible that the pyramids are much older than we think?
HYPERLINK "https://www.quora.com/What-are-some-unsolved-mysteries-about-the-Egyptian-pyramids" \t "_blank"
What are some unsolved mysteries about the Egyptian pyramids?
HYPERLINK "https://www.quora.com/How-do-you-believe-the-pyramids-were-built" \t "_blank"
How do you believe the pyramids were built?
HYPERLINK "https://www.quora.com/Who-really-built-the-Great-Pyramid-of-Giza-and-other-ancient-Egyptian-pyramids" \t "_blank"
Who really built the Great Pyramid of Giza and other ancient Egyptian pyramids?
HYPERLINK "https://www.quora.com/What-is-the-explanation-for-ancient-pyramids-built-all-around-the-world" \t "_blank"
What is the explanation for ancient pyramids built all around the world?

What is the comparison between the Suez Canal and the Canal of Panama?
HYPERLINK "https://www.quora.com/profile/Dan-Gall-1" \t "_blank"
By Dan Gall

Worked at Canadian Armed Forces (retired) (1972–1997) HYPERLINK "https://www.quora.com/What-is-the-comparison-between-the-Suez-Canal-and-the-Canal-of-Panama/answer/Dan-Gall-1" \t "_blank" Mar 30
Originally Answered: HYPERLINK "https://www.quora.com/What-are-the-differences-between-the-Suez-Canal-and-the-Panama-Canal?no_redirect=1" \t "_blank" What are the differences between the Suez Canal and the Panama Canal?

The Suez Canal is basically a long ditch. Just one way in some places. but no locks. The Panama Canal you have to to up and over the mountains, and then back down the other side. Many Lockes. The Panama Canal was recently doubled in size allowing twice as many ships (and bigger ones as well)

Two images, one of the Suez Canal and another of the Panama Canal

INCLUDEPICTURE "https://ci3.googleusercontent.com/proxy/Cf34OVx94ABa4fMIqq0riPtgZkTCX6h1zZ6eHJsOBz9mhAIadxqnWjV9XTne7d2Et-Ej7LRO4UvGZW7-dGeNMQBjfoVtO0jrVtLIM8rsLXZo6Iyw1sEVKkI--qM=s0-d-e1-

ft#https://qph.fs.quoracdn.net/main-qimg-c88a40aa897237e051bb94e656345a38-lq" * MERGEFORMATINET
INCLUDEPICTURE "https://ci4.googleusercontent.com/proxy/rWTNR7wKavsoNGuy4XIdSI_UBDHTvScS5fS5KKTU9Ai61Glksubi9RVjcNOTjyO9GeLsY7EqNRFks9KWeOokpbBT94a6gXfqk6CFm2NieAOuY6sQN8YIXQK6ur0=s0-d-e1-ft#https://qph.fs.quoracdn.net/main-qimg-464da56b9c3d58e9207b34d814215310-lq" * MERGEFORMATINET

What are the differences between the Suez Canal and the Panama Canal?
HYPERLINK "https://www.quora.com/profile/Carl-Richard-Archie" \t "_blank" Carl Richard Archie Originally Answered:

The Panama Canal uses gravity and the natural buoyancy of ships to lift vessels from the Caribbean Sea to Pacific Ocean:

INCLUDEPICTURE "https://ci6.googleusercontent.com/proxy/Qn_sUtobWFrKMGyU4WHyUz3Mh_C3tl6L2iila3-1L4I8xWI99h0xm1OdVVqbLuuwc52CDhGjqpZFVZvhS47ooVDuTxeU2VThlDXTFhSEyMl11GqOjAUS5Q5Kvxg=s0-d-e1-ft#https://qph.fs.quoracdn.net/main-qimg-c434a22cdbb842b66a9d4b97591fb592-lq" * MERGEFORMATINET

The power for this lifting is done via potential energy of the water in the middle (Gatun Lake). Since the water in Gatun Lake is higher, it would flow toward the Caribbean Sea or the Pacific if left alone.

However, the locks prevent this.

The Panama Canal is water escalator, powered by potential energy.

The Suez Canal cuts a path from the Mediterranean Sea to the Red Sea. There is no change in water elevation.

Related Links
Which was more difficult to build, the Suez Canal or the Panama Canal?
Why does the Panama Canal need locks? Why not just create an even canal and let ships sail through?
Why did the US return the canal to Panama?
How much does it cost to go through the Suez Canal?

Are there tunnels under the Suez Canal?
Why is the Suez Canal blacked out on Google Earth?

HYPERLINK "https://www.quora.com/Did-the-Great-Pyramid-have-a-mummy" \t "_blank" Did the Great Pyramid have a mummy?

HYPERLINK "https://www.quora.com/profile/Jason-Almendra" \t "_blank" Jason Almendra

I took "Greek & Latin Roots of English" in college

Apparently no. The medieval Arabs used a battering ram to make a tunnel into the Great Pyramid. They went inside the “King's Chamber". They saw an empty, roughly-cut granite sarcophagus. I could sympathize with the Arabs. It must have been looted during the Hyksos invasion of the 1600s BC.

INCLUDEPICTURE "https://ci6.googleusercontent.com/proxy/No0T0p6f3OfepzVNCBXdQwwZfFRnkKkEIITzY61YYL-WaiuWMT6QcsBsolSc9Jtt7TktrS1OfkJoQdB8GyaSI06LkjQ5DGf-0jcqxfatNSRz-0VWY8aVGnWPAmGdaw=s0-d-e1-ft#https://qph.fs.quoracdn.net/main-qimg-4f2fa75e7700f1745f76432bf938f6a5-pjlq" * MERGEFORMATINET

INCLUDEPICTURE "https://ci4.googleusercontent.com/proxy/JC4KFEjJYdRVuYNb7Sp8bA_D1ln0b50ZUVEW85PSE5zzp-C8cMPtUyxCe8f9QCw57hJC2YP6LtJJSkRQy_E5iGRZDniHDtTAjkBU4G_1evg89iwo1sPFIqI=s0-d-e1-ft#https://qph.fs.quoracdn.net/main-qimg-c9c9b3b34a9b835a88c0a3e03edb7f6a" * MERGEFORMATINET

Related Links

HYPERLINK "https://www.quora.com/If-the-Egyptian-pyramids-were-used-for-burials-why-has-nobody-or-any-mummy-ever-been-found-in-a-pyramid" \t "_blank"
If the Egyptian pyramids were used for burials, why has nobody or any mummy ever been found in a pyramid?

HYPERLINK "https://www.quora.com/How-many-mummies-were-actually-found-in-the-pyramids" \t "_blank" How many mummies were actually found in the pyramids?

HYPERLINK "https://www.quora.com/If-the-Egyptian-pyramids-at-Giza-were-not-tombs-than-what-were-they" \t "_blank" If the Egyptian pyramids at Giza were not tombs, then what were they?

HYPERLINK "https://www.quora.com/Do-we-have-the-ability-to-build-pyramids-in-our-time" \t "_blank" Do we have the ability to build pyramids in our time?

HYPERLINK "https://www.quora.com/Were-the-Giza-pyramids-always-visible-or-were-they-once-buried-under-the-sand" \t "_blank" Were the Giza pyramids always visible, or were they once buried under the sand?

HYPERLINK "https://www.quora.com/Are-the-pyramids-10-000+-years-old-as-suggested-in-The-Pyramid-Code-documentary-on-Netflix" \t "_blank" Are the pyramids 10,000+ years old as suggested in 'The Pyramid Code' documentary

Why did Egypt give Sanafir and Tiran islands to Saudi Arabia, and what were the consequences?

HYPERLINK "https://www.quora.com/profile/Saleh-Seyidli-1" \t "_blank"

Saleh Seyidli

PhD in International Relations, Moscow State Institute of International Relations (MGIMO) (Expected 2023) HYPERLINK "https://www.quora.com/Why-did-Egypt-give-Sanafir-and-Tiran-islands-to-Saudi-Arabia-and-what-were-the-consequences/answer/Saleh-Seyidli-1" \t "_blank" Jun 2

Without slightest doubt the decision of Sisi's government to transfer those islands to Saudi Arabian sovereignity was one of its most (if not the most) unpopular decisions.

Sanafir and Tiran are two smal uninhabitted islands which are located in south of Guld of Aqaba and north of Red Sea.

INCLUDEPICTURE "https://ci4.googleusercontent.com/proxy/hfG03vmfUtPMXtTRzrynSlrOgwqMPEte0vQktzzp7J2X_Rr3Az5PDvj4keAk1y7VmkAsOWAoBuIWwQ5oxXHy5NuM94nka9SoXHQuU1gfifIrRyvxZaklfyx1xlw=s0-d-e1-ft#https://qph.fs.quoracdn.net/main-qimg-12af94e6ab1a9cc4864219d1e8bd16a1-

lq" * MERGEFORMATINET

The islands have a strategic location since control over them enables to supervise the entrance to Gulf of Aqaba, which is a major shipping line for Jordan and Israel.

In the past, successive Egyptian governments claimed that territory as part of Egypt based on:

1906 agreement between Ottoman government and Khedivate of Egypt, which aknowledged Egyptian adiministration over those islands. Those islands were administrated by Egypt, after declaration of independence in 1922 and after Anglo-Egyptian treaty in 1936. Israelis withdrew from those islands in 1949, 1956, 1979 and the control was effectively handed to Egypt, not any other state.

So, why would Egypt hand those territory to KSA, if for decades it claimed those territory as its own?

It has to do more with Egypt-Saudi relations, since Egypt needs Saudi investments for its growing economy and one of the ways to boost economic ties between those two countries was HYPERLINK "https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Saudi%E2%80%93Egypt_Causeway" \o "en.wikipedia.org" \t "_blank" Saudi–Egypt Causeway which goes through these two islands. My assumption is that Egypt agreed to concede those territories to KSA in exchange for economic benefits from Saudi government.

Despite the fact, that most of Egyptian public didn't support that decision and Egyptian court rejected the deal, parliament of Egypt backed Sisi's decision and in June of 2017 those islands officially became part of Saudi Arabia.

Related Links

HYPERLINK "https://www.quora.com/Which-country-is-historically-the-rightful-owner-of-Tiran-and-Sanafir-islands-in-the-red-sea-Egypt-or-Saudi-Arabia" \t "_blank"
Which country is historically the rightful owner of Tiran and Sanafir islands in the red sea? Egypt or Saudi Arabia?

HYPERLINK "https://www.quora.com/After-the-president-of-Egypt-sold-the-2-red-sea-islands-Tiran-and-Sanafir-to-Saudi-Arabia-could-Egypt-purchase-them-back-if-they-want-to" \t "_blank" After the president of Egypt sold the 2 red sea islands (Tiran and Sanafir) to Saudi Arabia, could Egypt purchase them back if they want to?

HYPERLINK "https://www.quora.com/What-are-relations-like-between-Saudi-Arabia-and-Israel" \t "_blank" What are relations like between Saudi Arabia and Israel?

HYPERLINK "https://www.quora.com/Who-would-win-a-war-between-Saudi-Arabia-and-Egypt-Why" \t "_blank" Who would win a war between Saudi Arabia and Egypt? Why?

HYPERLINK "https://www.quora.com/Why-did-Egypt-let-go-of-Sanafir-and-Tiran-islands-in-the-Red-Sea-and-handed-them-over-to-Saudi-Arabia" \t "_blank" Why did Egypt let go of Sanafir and Tiran islands in the Red Sea and handed them over to Saudi Arabia?

HYPERLINK "https://www.quora.com/Are-the-Tiran-and-Snaafyr-Islands-Egyptian-or-Saudi-Arabian" \t "_blank" Are the Tiran and Snaafyr Islands Egyptian or Saudi Arabian ?

Do Egyptians descend from ancient Egyptians?

HYPERLINK "https://www.quora.com/profile/Adam-Ramzy-2" \t "_blank" Adam Ramzy

Studied Ancient History (Graduated 2014) HYPERLINK "https://www.quora.com/Do-Egyptians-descend-from-ancient-Egyptians/answer/Adam-Ramzy-2" \t "_blank" Apr 15

Yes! Most Egyptians are direct descendants of Ancient Egyptians. Modern Egyptians are the closest genetically to Ancient Egyptians.

INCLUDEPICTURE "https://ci6.googleusercontent.com/proxy/-oaQ4LEuZyoEeZORR_vr15l4iYpE7DUcdARQwU6aZo0hVk2ZDzGTB8i8sA8FrYYrdTaDyOK9sYG5M8ZnHLu0HVItM-sri-wzL896Q4zJZcKPjJtd8A96iMxj7nA=s0-d-e1-ft#https://qph.fs.quoracdn.net/main-qimg-201d3440514500cfde5a493bc01fc358-lq" * MERGEFORMATINET

Some claim that modern Egyptians are of Arab or European origin… that's false!

INCLUDEPICTURE "https://ci6.googleusercontent.com/proxy/X-Dlek_onhyNvEgDzjpUegFhNVDAEZUOCeiMEJ9L9Bl4jSpx0hlx9-z_4KHELv0TqjmnR2yxvPk-eTE_UeZtevKGj9pvowPUCu0Uyn3EjLZGXixE03H4Zwr3-i0=s0-d-e1-ft#https://qph.fs.quoracdn.net/main-qimg-265876dd31bb0d0457774c6b1d64d34e-lq" * MERGEFORMATINET

(Egyptians 2000 years ago)

INCLUDEPICTURE "https://ci3.googleusercontent.com/proxy/CMRPnxxnMMOIBHhbbQb-S3ayWS0RIwxcCx7I14VWJfEKETbwpcFVVEG73viHSCJMqahwPi_Apjo31Kc2-7qO4Hq0S1SL3zjoHCtBtP5ywOh2GGzqc29CaQ9V1UQ=s0-d-e1-ft#https://qph.fs.quoracdn.net/main-qimg-d8823522aecfd90f2cdab725bd2c9ceb-lq" * MERGEFORMATINET
INCLUDEPICTURE "https://ci6.googleusercontent.com/proxy/T3RR5q8qHXFGF3VZoGxIDIJhZuERhFtekfocicE069M12dvdEOp_YKX5iDtSghdctk5PtqA5ebbLuT2YEMuaK0ULUF24jR0XHEgkMdychZnBVBEZDHQ7aq7a4Y8=s0-d-e1-ft#https://qph.fs.quoracdn.net/main-qimg-b3ca997c17a8043f86ea81f055fae21a-lq" * MERGEFORMATINET
INCLUDEPICTURE "https://ci6.googleusercontent.com/proxy/qDrzx7yRHYexmO6dVxtTrGvN9nX6R-2L7wrNWgtDylSmKhWmM5avfe3hJO7Hm_5tipdpALba5PdsMdmDkDaL5SQF2bLDoXx5N-y4OwRsDQ0LOBAY6h-O3LTJ3CY=s0-d-e1-ft#https://qph.fs.quoracdn.net/main-qimg-560936fbde7e8b5afb22658a2b8b26b7-lq" * MERGEFORMATINET
(Egyptians 4000 years ago — the 3rd and 4th dynasties… the 3rd dynasty is the first dynasty of the old kingdom)

This is who we are since ancient times. Modern Egyptians trace their ancestry back to this very land 14,000 years ago even before the foundation of ancient egypt.

Related Questions
HYPERLINK "https://www.quora.com/Are-modern-Egyptians-related-to-the-ancient-Egyptians-or-are-they-ethnically-Arabian" \t "_blank"
Are modern Egyptians related to the ancient Egyptians, or are they ethnically Arabian?

HYPERLINK "https://www.quora.com/Are-there-any-living-modern-descendants-of-the-ancient-Egyptians" \t "_blank"
Are there any living modern descendants of the ancient Egyptians?

HYPERLINK "https://www.quora.com/Are-modern-Egyptians-descendants-from-ancient-Egyptians-I-thought-Coptics-were-the-only-descendants-and-most-of-the-Egyptians-had-only-Arab-ancestry" \t "_blank"
Are modern Egyptians descendants from ancient Egyptians? I thought Coptics were the only descendants and most of the Egyptians had only Arab ancestry.

HYPERLINK "https://www.quora.com/It-has-been-proven-already-that-modern-Egyptians-are-the-only-descendants-of-the-Ancient-Egyptians-Why-do-some-people-with-no-connection-to-Egypt-are-trying-to-appropriate-Egyptian-history-instead-of-focusing-on" \t "_blank"
It has been proven already that modern Egyptians are the only descendants of the Ancient Egyptians. Why do some people with no connection to Egypt are trying to appropriate Egyptian history instead of focusing on their own countries and people?

HYPERLINK "https://www.quora.com/DNA-from-ancient-Egyptians-shows-they-are-related-to-modern-Egyptians-so-why-do-people-try-so-hard-to-prove-otherwise" \t "_blank"
DNA from ancient Egyptians shows they are related to modern Egyptians, so why do people try so hard to prove otherwise?

HYPERLINK "https://www.quora.com/If-thoroughly-the-Egyptian-were-black-from-the-beginning-where-are-the-people-in-the-present-time" \t "_blank"
If thoroughly the Egyptian were black from the beginning, where are the people in the present

Is it the Egyptian Revolution that failed or the Egyptian state?

HYPERLINK "https://www.quora.com/profile/Mohamed-Emara-18" \t "_blank" Mohamed Emara whos Interested in Politics HYPERLINK "https://www.quora.com/Is-it-the-Egyptian-Revolution-that-failed-or-the-Egyptian-state/answer/Mohamed-Emara-18" \t "_blank" January 28

Neither, it was the Egyptians who failed themselves.

On January 25 2011 millions of Egyptians took to the streets demanding the resignation of the longtime dictator Mubarak inspired by the recent events in Tunisia. Mubarak stepped down peacefully without ordering the security forces to shoot protesters which would escalate events into a full blown civil war, thus Egypt was spared the fate of Libya and Syria.

So far so good

The rest was on the Egyptians themselves. For the first time ever we were given the chance to elect our president and we did so and Morsi took the presidential office by winning a fair election.

Take note of the percentage of vote that he garnered, it's not ninety something fake percentage, it's a fairly reasonable one. Mohammed Morsi was and remains the only democratically elected president in the history of Egypt, while the rest of presidents came either through coups or succeeded upon the death of the predecessor:

- Naguib overthrew the king
- Nasser overthrew Naguib
- Sadat came to office after Nasser's death due to a heart attack
- Mubarak came to office after Sadat's assassination
- Sisi came to office after a coup

The people had a chance here but they blew it away. About half of those who voted for Morsi didn't do that because they believed in him, they chose him because he didn't have a military background unlike the other candidate who was a former general.

The problem with Egyptians is that they don't choose officials based on merit rather based on background. Since day one Morsi (islamist) had to contend with intense criticism and unwilling subordinates including those who elected him from the start because he was an islamist, why elect someone from the start if you have severe ideological differences with him? The people hampered Morsi's ability to govern and after only one year in office they took to the streets demanding that he step down.

Seriously?? He was elected for a time period of 4 years and should have completed it because politics isn't a game and should not be dictated by the whims of immature youths! Ironically those who demanded the implementation of democracy are now against it.

Take note of the percentage of vote that he garnered, it's not ninety something fake percentage, it's a fairly reasonable one. Mohammed Morsi was and remains the only democratically elected president in the history of Egypt, while the rest of presidents came either through coups or succeeded upon the death of the predecessor:

- Naguib overthrew the king
- Nasser overthrew Naguib
- Sadat came to office after Nasser's death due to a heart attack
- Mubarak came to office after Sadat's assassination
- Sisi came to office after a coup

The people had a chance here but they blew it away. About half of those who voted for Morsi didn't do that because they believed in him, they chose him because he didn't have a military background unlike the other candidate who was a former general.

The problem with Egyptians is that they don't choose officials based on merit rather based on background. Since day one Morsi (islamist) had to contend with intense criticism and unwilling subordinates including those who elected him from the start because he was an islamist, why elect someone from the start if you have severe ideological differences with him? The people hampered Morsi's ability to govern and after only one year in office they took to the streets demanding that he step down.

Seriously?? He was elected for a time period of 4 years and should have completed it because politics isn't a game and should not be dictated by the whims of immature youths! Ironically those who demanded the implementation of democracy are now against it.

Nominee	Mohammed Morsi	Ahmed Shafik
Party	Freedom & Justice	Independent
Popular Vote	13, 230,131	12,347,380
Percentage	51.73	48.27

4 days later the Minister of Defense ousted Morsi from power in a coup and the people supported it!

Morsi's supporters were later massacred because they refused to return home. All of the aforementioned events were supported and condoned by those who removed Mubarak and later voted for Morsi only to support a military coup later on. We have replaced a tyrant with a more brutal one and now the country is ruled by the military again disregarding democracy, human rights, freedom of speech, etc… such foreign terms are unheard in Egypt.

What's funny is that those who opposed Mubarak, voted for Morsi then supported the coup are now vehemently against el-Sisi. Have you noticed a pattern? Egyptians demanded democracy and then they sabotaged it with their own hands and now the the liberal faction that was responsible for all that keep whining about el-Sisi's methods. Why start a revolution demanding a democracy if you aren't going to commit to it from the start then come crying later?

In reality Egyptians never understood the meaning of democracy and I blame all of Egypt's problems on the hippocrate liberal faction. Many have reversed to conservatism or have been jailed or currently lick the military's boots but still it's on them.

Disclaimer: I do not support Morsi. He had a lot of shortcomings and I don't support el-Sisi either although he's better than his two predecessors and stabilized the country's economy and ensured security (without democracy ofcourse). I am just displaying the fact that the strife for democracy failed due to the naivety of those who sought for it from the start.

Why is Egypt Considered an Arab State?

HYPERLINK "https://www.quora.com/profile/Mohamed-Emara-18" \t "_blank"
Mohamed Emara HYPERLINK "https://www.quora.com/Why-is-Egypt-considered-an-Arab-country/answer/Mohamed-Emara-18" \t "_blank"
Updated March 19 Lives in Alexandria, Egypt
Genetically speaking the Arabic influence on Egyptian DNA is minimal but it's there.

Egypt experienced an Arabization process that lasted centuries after being ruled by Arab and Islamic empires for a long time. All these empires, with the exception of the Ottomans, used Arabic as the official language of administration.

Which means that the language of the elite was Arabic and if you an Egyptian want to rise up the ranks and join the upper class you will have to learn Arabic. The Arabs also built a city to be the country's new centre of administration called Fustat.

Muslim Arab conquest of Egypt

Arabic is also the language of the Qur'an, which means that Egyptian converts had to learn Arabic in order to read the Quran. This fact facilitated the Arabization process.

With time Islam became the dominant religion in Egypt, Arabic became the most spoken language and Egyptians started using Arabic names.

All that was the summing up of the history of the Arabization in Egypt.

Still Egyptians didn't view themselves as Arabs until the 20th century when Arab nationalism emerged as a political tool used to unite other Arabic speaking people.

I see a lot of people falsely claiming that it was Nasser who introduced the notion of Arabia

First Arab League summit taking place in Cairo. Participating in the summit are the leaders of Saudi Arabia, Iraq, Syria, Egypt (King Farouk seated in the middle), Jordan, Lebanon and North Yemen.

As you can see Farouk, an Albanian who also had Turkish, Circassian, French and Greek ancestry, didn't have any problem in identifying himself as an Arab despite having absolutely no Arabic heritage at all.

The first member of Muhammad Ali dynasty to call himself an Arab was Farouk's great-grandfather Ibrahim Pasha.

It is worth noting that the Egyptian upper class at the time was mainly composed of Turks and Circassians who used French as the language of the elite. Non of them had anything in common with other Arabic speaking people with the exception of:

- Some cultural similarities excluding religion and language
- All were Muslims
- All knew how to speak Arabic

They called themselves Arabs despite not actually being ones. The charter of the Arab League also referred to Egypt as an integral part of the Arab homeland.

However, Arab nationalist sentiments skyrocketed only after the monarchy was overthrown and replaced by left leaning Egyptian-Arab nationalist republic headed by Gamal Abdel-Nasser.

Nasser was an ardent Arab nationalist and a fierce supporter of Arab solidarity to the point that it's seemingly impossible to separate between Arab nationalism and Nasser.

Egyptians climbing a building to salute Nasser

Nasser was extremely popular with the Egyptians to the point that the vast majority of them readily adopted his views of Arab nationalism and started identifying themselves as Arabs.

However, after Egypt's defeat in the six days war a lot of the people became delusional with Nasser's regime and his ideas including Arab nationalism.

His successor Anwar Sadat, although not a big fan of Arab nationalism, didn't change Egypt's official policy but made it clear that Egypt is his priority. Especially after the Camp David Accords when Sadat signed a peace treaty with Israel abandoning the Arab cause of militarily liberating Palestine.

This move generated unprecedented criticism in the Arab World that resulted in Egypt's expulsion from the Arab League. Sadat responded to the critics by saying that since Hager, the mother of Ishmael the ancestor of the Arabs, was an Egyptian then Egypt is the mother of the Arabs and that it will always remain an influential country of the Arab World.

Sadat also changed Egypt's official name to the Arab Republic of Egypt and added the Hawk of Quraish symbol to the flag.

Egypt's flag (1972-1984) Sadat's successor Hosni Mubarak replaced the Hawk of Quraish with the Eagle of Saladin.

Egypt's flag (1984-present)
Mubarak presided over Egypt's return to the Arab League and maintained close ties with other Arab countries that remain strong till this day.

Hosni Mubarak and Abdilfattah el-Sisi with other Arab leaders
Not to mention the social ties with the Arab world

Umm Kulthum performing in Kuwait

Egyptian team during the Pan Arab Games

In short, yes Egypt is considered an Arab country.

Why? Because it considers itself as such. Egypt is a founding member of the Arab League and it's headquarters is located in Egypt, Arabic is the country's official language, it's official name includes the word “Arab", all Egyptians speak Arabic as a first language and share cultural similarities with other Arab countries.

So Egyptians are culturally Arabs but not genetically. This doesn't mean that Egyptians don't value their pre Islamic history. On the contrary, we take great pride in our lineage, past achievements & contributions made by the ancient Egyptians whom we look up to.

The Egyptian culture, already influenced by the Greeks & Romans, was not destroyed by the Arabs or Islam. They both enriched an already great and colourful civilization that culminated into modern Egyptian culture.

Didn't the ancient Egyptians create any record of how they built the pyramids?

Matt Riggsby MA Archaeology, Boston University HYPERLINK "https://www.quora.com/Didnt-the-ancient-Egyptians-create-any-record-of-how-they-built-the-pyramids/answer/Matt-Riggsby" \t "_blank" April 24, 2018

They did. We just haven’t found any of them until very recently.

In 2013, a French archaeologist working near the coast of the Red Sea found HYPERLINK "https://www.smithsonianmag.com/history/ancient-egypt-shipping-mining-farming-economy-pyramids-180956619/" \o "www.smithsonianmag.com" \t "_blank" a collection of papyri which directly address the construction of the pyramids . However, they mostly concern the day to day management of the construction work rather than technical details of the architecture and logistics. That gets us that much closer to understanding those items, though, and it goes a long way towards narrowing down specific dates for their construction (which are pretty much about what we thought they were; no lost antediluvian civilizations here).

The problem, of course, is that these are not the kinds of documents which tend to be preserved intentionally. That is, nobody cares to copy and recopy the account books for a construction project which has long since been completed or inscribe it in durable stone. These are ephemeral documents, where we have to rely on somebody absentmindedly tucking the document away somewhere (or more specifically, somewhere with phenomenally good preservation conditions, like a cave in a desert) and nobody else disturbing that site for a few thousand years. We are, then, very fortunate that this document exists at all.

HYPERLINK "https://www.quora.com/Do-Egyptians-think-the-assassination-of-Anwar-Sadat-was-justified" \t "_blank" Do Egyptians think the assassination of Anwar Sadat was justified?

Do Egyptians think the assassination of Anwar Sadat was justified?

HYPERLINK "https://www.quora.com/profile/Mohamed-Emara-18" \t "_blank" Mohamed Emara Lives in Alexandria, Egypt

Thanks for sending me this question, HYPERLINK "https://www.quora.com/profile/Solomon-Malekani" \o "www.quora.com" \t "_blank" Solomon Malekani !

Most Egyptians consider him a hero for succeeding where his predecessors failed, recovering Sinai and bringing peace to Egypt.

But Leftists and Islamists consider him a traitor for signing peace with Israel. Some Copts don't like him for restoring the Islamic Sharia back and for releasing Islamists from the prisons.

Leftists, Islamists and Copts all despise one another. The Leftists are secular and naturally resent the interference of religion in politics, which is exactly what Islamists want. Copts are against Islamism for the same reason and oppose the Leftists because they sponsor an Arab identity, which is rejected by Copts. Also because Copts flourished in business affairs, making them a target for the Left.

However, the one thing that unites them is their opposition to Sadat's domestic and foreign policies.

Islamists and Leftists have long been discredited in the eyes of the public and most Copts are not against Sadat. As such, the vast majority of Egyptians don't think that Sadat's assassination was justified.

HYPERLINK "https://www.quora.com/Why-is-Egypt-purchasing-the-US-Russian-and-French-fighter-jets-What-benefits-can-it-have-in-maintaining-a-diverse-set-of-war-machines" \t "_blank" Why is Egypt purchasing the US, Russian, and French fighter jets? What benefits can it have in maintaining a diverse set of war machines?

HYPERLINK "https://www.quora.com/profile/Abdelrahman-El-Ghawas" \t "_blank" Abdelrahman El-Ghawas
Military Affairs and Geopolitics Researcher HYPERLINK "https://www.quora.com/Why-is-Egypt-purchasing-the-US-Russian-and-French-fighter-jets-What-benefits-can-it-have-in-maintaining-a-diverse-set-of-war-machines/answer/Abdelrahman-El-Ghawas" \t "_blank" August 2, 2020

President Anwar Al-Saadat invented this Technique because Egypt doesn't want to rely on one source , multiple sources better than one + we need to Catch up with Israel in the Air Superiority in the region , Egypt wants to close this Military technological Gap between Egypt and Israel

INCLUDEPICTURE "https://ci5.googleusercontent.com/proxy/lXil4jXjs-tEsfdUQL7jvcxSEMzA6dKfeBMNZ3yWkh6wMi4OnfT3vSP9PIFXXKLz-cSvrUgk3XmlVCmpUB8I_l7kjPYL9gagvHmNnl-qMKMWxtwgrIOIepc=s0-d-e1-ft#https://qph.fs.quoracdn.net/main-qimg-057a8c5be4d775de19502acaad4d0f72" * MERGEFORMATINET
INCLUDEPICTURE "https://ci3.googleusercontent.com/proxy/okVHT2zHZQm46zJaKRS6Vk5_TBKxOWeStITKzH8pDqI0PrIJLVoZ04dsEwl9UBIlgvTI0b85kSVtH1KO4iGysq5QTTrx8t8tLnKB6qP4cfW0B0TJh7uRiwc=s0-d-e1-ft#https://qph.fs.quoracdn.net/main-qimg-5bd7a2b5f45251278039d88d036d7cae" * MERGEFORMATINET
Each Aircraft got it's mission that is suitable for it

And again For Logistics Nightmare this is just Amateurs Saying Even Poland does the same and no one Said anything about it so No Egypt won't face Logistics Issues , How?

we have enough Educated Man Power to dedicate them for a specific fighters to Operate and Maintain it.

We have been doing this for 30 years Egyptian Armed Forces got an experience in Mixed Western and Eastern Camps weapons and systems, Egypt got the best of both camps in Operation and Maintenance which most people won't understand because of their whole life dealing with one side. So they know how to guide and control different types of Fighters and Aircraft to execute missions.

Egypt has an experience in Operating Both Western and Eastern Weapons and Systems

All Egyptian Fighters get an Egyptian made IFF installed on it, Egyptian Made communication devices and it is connected by an Egyptian made data link
INCLUDEPICTURE "https://ci6.googleusercontent.com/proxy/M_3VvqxfXaG8SE7kwG1GdjljIg-Q37qbvda7bacAv4yd-v-4kcT2lBL-IwBixF6r1_wD36vzir9d7jfsy9rnsRdWp6CPcVYx5wOA4Tr6wDQR3oYEtD5HldU=s0-d-e1-ft#https://qph.fs.quoracdn.net/main-qimg-63a49ac03509d0013bb791d22ef75d8c" * MERGEFORMATINET
INCLUDEPICTURE "https://ci6.googleusercontent.com/proxy/cGZn-gaFF8peLZK6XtKAV9aezrhLfHo4vsq3-h44AnCZR6H7JtlR1q0eaKlpcsrEM1xUwcMkyIqNSSgpsYbdDPv-JZ7aieMjni0G3RqxmqZkZQQYAxBpxbM=s0-d-e1-ft#https://qph.fs.quoracdn.net/main-qimg-3c18e1e72fe42d6a6a818a43ad6bf2c8" * MERGEFORMATINET

HYPERLINK "https://www.quora.com/What-Is-so-special-about-Egyptians" \t "_blank"
What Is so special about Egyptians?

Y HYPERLINK "https://www.quora.com/profile/Jay-Birdsall" \t "_blank" ay Birdsall
Teacher Electrician HYPERLINK "https://www.quora.com/What-Is-so-special-about-Egyptians/answer/Jay-Birdsall" \t "_blank" November 30, 2016

For the last forty years I've been married to the most wonderful person I ever met. She was born in Cairo to Egyptian parents, and grew up there and in Alexandria. Sensitive, intelligent, beautiful, wonderful wife and mother. Her parents were the best in-laws and grandparents anyone could ask for. The day I met her was the best day of my life. What makes her so special? Maybe it's the way she starts each day looking forward to the new challenges and experiences that she will encounter. Or possibly the fact that she's thankful for the opportunity to meet new people. Perhaps it's the way she takes time each day to enrich the lives of the people she comes in contact with.

I can't say exactly why she's so special. I do know that I'm glad that I found someone with similar likes and values to share my life with.

Why did Julius Caesar lovefall for Cleopatra?

HYPERLINK "https://www.quora.com/profile/Radwa-Ahmed-109" \t "_blank" Radwa Ahmed Lived in Egypt HYPERLINK "https://www.quora.com/Why-did-Julius-Caesar-fall-for-Cleopatra/answer/Radwa-Ahmed-109" \t "_blank" March 3

When Caesar met Cleopatra, he was 52 years old, but despite he is over the age of 50, he remained to maintain his strength, As for Cleopatra, she was 22 years old, and Caesar found in her an extraordinary woman, cultured, and she has wide knowledge, a strong personality, she was tactful in a way that attracts the other party to her and make him in an instant an admirer of her, as well as her obvious beauty and her bright look, He was also attracted to her for her strong ambition and a strong desire to attain glory, which is the same characteristic as Caesar, so Caesar treated her with appreciation and respect.

The historian "Plutarch" describes Cleopatra's beauty, saying: "Her beauty was not of this unusual kind that captivates human at first glance, but her charm was strong and no one could resist her strength of character and her presence and her talk, and every word she was uttering it, she wanted to impress whoever talking with her and make him under her control".

The truth is that Caesar was not only an admirer of Cleopatra, but rather he was impressed by all of Egypt with its civilization, heritage, and people and what it has history full of great achievements, in addition to its richness and its many wealth, and its distinguished geographical location, and the symbols of People of science, philosophy and art who gathered in it.

ARAB ISRAELI WAR i.e. The Yum Kippur war of 1973
What would have happened to the Egyptian Third Army in 1973 if the ceasefire had not been imposed? Were the Israeli forces on the west side of the canal strong enough to maintain the siege? Would it have held?

HYPERLINK "https://www.quora.com/profile/Mazen-Hassan-8" \t "_blank" Mazen Hassan

HYPERLINK "https://www.quora.com/What-would-have-happened-to-the-Egyptian-Third-Army-in-1973-if-the-ceasefire-had-not-been-imposed-Were-the-Israeli-forces-on-the-west-side-of-the-canal-strong-enough-to-maintain-the-siege-Would-it-have-held/answers/28772362" \t "_blank" Updated June 1 3
Originally Answered: HYPERLINK "https://www.quora.com/Was-the-Egyptian-Third-Army-really-unsaveable-and-encircled-during-the-Yom-Kippur-war-Only-facts-based-opinions?no_redirect=1" \t "_blank" Was the Egyptian Third Army really unsaveable and encircled during the Yom Kippur war? Only facts based opinions. As an Egyptian, I studied this war more than most people.

> First of all, the name of the 3rd army is misleading, as the forces in question are the vanguard of the 3rd army (50 thousand soldiers and not the entire army)
> Until Oct 22, 1973 the supply line was open and Israeli forces at the west bank of the canal were very vulnerable, so to secure themselves, they decided to break the cease fire decision by security council and cut the supply line to the vanguard of the 3rd army.
>
> To complete maintaining the upper hand against the 3rd army, Israel tried to occupy the city of Suez, an adventure that ended up in a disaster for the Israelis. With Suez out of control, the back of the 3rd army vanguard was secured.
> On Oct 24, another cease fire was issued and a threat from the USSR to enforce it, which brought the US and USSR into direct confrontation and it had to last this time around.

The question is, what would have happened if there was no cease fire? The answer is in the following points:

Egypt would have brought forces from the east bank of the canal, cut the tiny connection between the Israeli army east and west of the canal which was less then a few kilometers.

The Israeli forces west of the canal would have been destroyed, which would be totally outnumbered by then.

The vanguard of the 3rd army had supplies to last for months and in fact improved their positions over the blockade period.

Israel tried to hit the 3rd army forces east of the canal hard to no avail before the cease fire, and there is no reason that would have changed after.

Israel lacked the forces to effectively destroy the vanguard of the 3rd army, yet they were in a position to be like the 6th army of Nazi Germany in Stalingrad

In other words, if they could, they would... Israel doesn't let a chance to destroy enemy army go. In 1967 while the Egyptian army was retreating, Israelis hit the retreating forces in any way they could, so how would they let this one go after they got hurt so bad in 1973?

One has to remember, the Egyptian objective from the war was to prolong the hostilities as long as possible, while Egypt can tolerate a long war (much bigger population), Israel can't (most able men fight), so no-cease fire, serves the Egyptians very well in this case.

There is a reason why some army soldiers would hold the enemy's commander & chief picture high up at an end of a war

INCLUDEPICTURE "https://ci4.googleusercontent.com/proxy/kpToYbhxVFRfuMCtsqccUBAwOr5Wn-ql8774OR2zOc3UZIsp5StYmRzL0kqPjCBa2VEXYl-AdFH3WjnSlIjZuF22hZ1YaJCqcRnVB5Ffj9KqSek08b1ZgSo=s0-d-e1-ft#https://qph.fs.quoracdn.net/main-qimg-85ad536fde69db915d26702b66e0ee6a" * MERGEFORMATINET

Now, I know my answer will get lots of down votes from Israelis reading it, as they don't like the truth. But to be practical, I invite any of them to discuss it openly with me and see which argument would prevail.

My argument is backed by two viable references, one of them is the HYPERLINK "http://nsarchive.gwu.edu/NSAEBB/NSAEBB98/" \o "nsarchive.gwu.edu" \t "_blank" US Congress communications and meetings that are now declassified, the other is a HYPERLINK "http://www.amazon.com/No-Victor-Vanquished-Yom-Kippur/dp/021420670X" \o "www.amazon.com" \t "_blank" well renowned book .

EDIT: I do believe "Those who are unable to tolerate the difference in opinion, don't deserve the luxury to voice their own". On the other hand, I can never tolerate double standards and the new biased approach Quora Moderation has been following for sometime now. As a result, I have decided to stop contributing until further notice and disabled comments accordingly.

Are Egyptians Caucasians/white?

HYPERLINK "https://www.quora.com/profile/Alexander-Balogun" \t "_blank"

Alexander Balogun

African history Ph.D. HYPERLINK "https://www.quora.com/Are-Egyptians-Caucasians-white/answer/Alexander-Balogun" \t "_blank" July 20

Today the Egyptian population is divided into 2 categories.

1. Indigenous population
2. Descendants of foriegn invaders and occupiers

The indigenous population are mainly in the South Eastern and Southern region of Egypt. They actually constitute the minority of the Egyptian population. These people are originally Descendants of the ancient Nile Valley people that had occupied the region even before the Mesolithic period. They don't fall into the Caucasian or White classification. They are dark skinned people, who can easily pass as blacks.

INCLUDEPICTURE "https://ci4.googleusercontent.com/proxy/BkrQCVtWrx3nApFhXi8TBh-iCD0q8GLn_d4gi_Si5_HoVQhXLIvxPuePyLj8CTy8BXR-hW1zzbBV53yBtolp_eH90QwX1Ip-VjZiTIFHYP2MUVmFBabSTik=s0-d-e1-ft#https://qph.fs.quoracdn.net/main-qimg-adf446a5d889ebf563bab20f89978c50" * MERGEFORMATINET

INCLUDEPICTURE "https://ci6.googleusercontent.com/proxy/MBX40y95CP6f-4Od3HEcYTPU2vW6MRMsKZPeBSU4J77AtkQ03Rn6kxmdm2AmoaTcmv14WGiCJ1jd5ff6rYt2O8SGs5WaBUd4I3snyJz9kIm5_YYtIn0eEYU=s0-d-e1-ft#https://qph.fs.quoracdn.net/main-qimg-580b40720e3181fcadd79076c5261b36" * MERGEFORMATINET

INCLUDEPICTURE "https://ci3.googleusercontent.com/proxy/cxeLrZcz9RoG24jOZlRfEBDLxecYysLK959n98xDiUOd7iItOjY3PqXkKL9yWS5ulnDcfyYSAsELH9JSchnWR8onf1TnWSKBXCkCkLft9QwM8Mkzv9QhSzI=s0-d-e1-ft#https://qph.fs.quoracdn.net/main-qimg-4213049777fec2e9a55e977c9ebdfb87" * MERGEFORMATINET

INCLUDEPICTURE "https://ci3.googleusercontent.com/proxy/V2oeZo-ANdtTunhjYmTCcFQL51sEe6-L3BYQRh-xordd_xzay_sT7O91McttD-Strwap49afelVzlc1Z9Gf7EX_Z-q7-S82ikZrTINuK0h7LAkBfCg4TKO8=s0-d-e1-ft#https://qph.fs.quoracdn.net/main-qimg-9dfa21d6493ff84ceb1a529d878b2a06" * MERGEFORMATINET

INCLUDEPICTURE "https://ci5.googleusercontent.com/proxy/EJ-UchfpTXYfBkihyD524Dy6XdZMD7-59LpjNs995IzY5cxwCJGpavVJm1C4rTRbB8al_02nyCQYm4UhHOKfm_ckJdAs

w_MBuaedCJVRyXGHyks6sufukUA=s0-d-e1-ft#https://qph.fs.quoracdn.net/main-qimg-9ae8a0967559d5ade1d463950165a910"
* MERGEFORMATINET
INCLUDEPICTURE
"https://ci5.googleusercontent.com/proxy/GZNVeMurnE0vq3Fcpsfv2P9obZGo4s_
KTvC20hsD6WsR42t5YKuH19xlTWUDuL4_jZRUbNsGjJsmoznXvUPu9hHnU
OonTJmAu2xfRoFoLzx96fMSDZUZjVo=s0-d-e1-ft#https://qph.fs.quoracdn.net/main-qimg-5c5135c6d7f6e6a60d8fe2aeec097ba7" *
MERGEFORMATINET
INCLUDEPICTURE
"https://ci6.googleusercontent.com/proxy/KE6H1FlRfHjGkAD4GcjuAHWUdG_p n6GQLHi-
RM4Aw8eQLqSm2hSXnjb8cOgFOiqQ6Pp0ImIbTeQ3lKz1xr399KLaSNz531brs
DNiQW8mZ3tldMY2vgc6wJA=s0-d-e1-ft#https://qph.fs.quoracdn.net/main-qimg-
5854032b46a38d37de0d965018e2b872" * MERGEFORMATINET
INCLUDEPICTURE "https://ci6.googleusercontent.com/proxy/nw1-
TXp6uC4pucBOAyKOBretBnp96WtVhdIHv1c5jv8UIcJ8RvWUwjVRY0MVzJAi
RsUv_F_ZF0CLn3ZioE0mOpONVs6jeNkULM0jqHF-bTxFY6-chP-7Mp8=s0-d-e1-ft#https://qph.fs.quoracdn.net/main-qimgc1698f6c9841f5b437bf8da0c3786d98" * MERGEFORMATINET INCLUDEPICTURE "https://ci4.googleusercontent.com/proxy/cM7-_F5hSCq1CcDJPUCS-
i_xV1NPwkz2KrBFe2HBX5OnRylo0yXds22waj7L_kxvYBUD0ZX7R8LruzyBZ
Tg7a66xqS83HPfsbmWV57jnqDTJ0EYUg1o5LZ8=s0-d-e1-ft#https://qph.fs.quoracdn.net/main-qimg-a011830d84018c4b78272326c5d768ac"
* MERGEFORMATINET

INCLUDEPICTURE
"https://ci6.googleusercontent.com/proxy/NxY8_jBvqksFaspemSYMDN0QPuOG
PFMVVIwhxjfovIjUDlHm8tRLgETSj08424s6vpN5i7UtJA6mN2XI4_X7g6woR
KHf9Q98CLLqk-nW51L6tFSSxOs7WD4=s0-d-e1-ft#https://qph.fs.quoracdn.net/main-qimg-794454f99f82979521a247353597446c"
* MERGEFORMATINET
INCLUDEPICTURE
"https://ci4.googleusercontent.com/proxy/lNuUGHr2i7StdqLHNeg2ppgeMIwc5J-Zp3WdyhclgtoF7eNW2BLWHT_FD-zXu82LpyqYtg0xbhkiw5bz839ocA3_ohYbeURHi_GfgV7BovwZP1PB36TEOA=s0-d-e1-ft#https://qph.fs.quoracdn.net/main-qimg-19127fc3ca8d26aa83989109f209cf78" * MERGEFORMATINET

On the other hand, we have the Descendants of foreign occupiers whose ancestors began to occupy Egypt as far back as the 18th century BC, during the Hyksos invasion and occupation. The Hyksos were a Caucasoid people from the Levant region.

INCLUDEPICTURE "https://ci4.googleusercontent.com/proxy/Jguf5lConxutbOowy10wf_pwzD5PjDdmM45sb8HwaYZjpiUDHHy2c75TxUUamMb21Y9bnFMnvGMASvrEWYwaz3J4sF3NKVK4GM9HbtL0Tq-Px4qyzeqq9tU=s0-d-e1-ft#https://qph.fs.quoracdn.net/main-qimg-27c2771ad113e3567e22b32f653acf6b" * MERGEFORMATINET
The above tomb painting is an ancient Art depicting the migration of the Hyksos occupiers who came from the Levant region into Northern Egypt.

You can clearly see the disparities between the foriegn occupiers at the top and the indigenous population below. They were clearly distinguishable people as explained in the ancient Arts.

The Libyans, another set of Caucasian invaders occupied Egypt and brought an end to the indigenous ancient Egyptian rule from Upper Egypt around 1,170 BC.

INCLUDEPICTURE "https://ci6.googleusercontent.com/proxy/yI_I8hGFuWw4eGqOxEoRV7OEDGYp5DlFaNhjbUMq3S_jth6pr1ARmeF8WfQ1kidY2me7BJ8PegJpFDFEsr2CyS06lWkMi06L4x7RqHlYY66ohfGgBbbLIIM=s0-d-e1-ft#https://qph.fs.quoracdn.net/main-qimg-7fa8ff9f06dbc7ea86d44bf8cc0d0040" * MERGEFORMATINET
The Libyans occupied the Northern Delta region of Egypt and their descendants also Ruled Egypt, adopting the Pharaonic tradition. They made the Northern Delta region the political region, which was always in the South during the Native Egyptian Dynasties.

The Persians occupied Egypt on 2 separate occasions. They ruled Egypt for over 100 years until they were replaced by the Greeks. The Greeks occupied Egypt for over 300 years until they were replaced by the Romans. The Romans ruled Egypt for over 500 years until they were replaced by the Arabs. Then the Mamluks, the Hawwara tribes from Libya, the Turks….

There was over 2,800 years of foreign occupation in Egypt. More years of foreign occupation in America, Canada, Australia, New Zealand…

What makes the Egyptian foreign occupation special is the close proximity the foreign invaders and occupiers had with Egypt. Making it very easy for mass migration. Again Egypt was wealthy, had the most fertile and arable land in the Mediterranean region and West Asia…. These factors were pivotal for the ancient occupation that led several foreign societies occupying and dominating the ancient Kingdom.

Just like other societies USA, Canada, Australia etc… The indigenous people of Egypt are now the minority and the several and diverse descendants of foreign occupiers and invaders make up the majority of the Egyptian population today.

Was Ancient Egypt/North Africa black?
HYPERLINK "https://www.quora.com/profile/Elliott-Brown-51" \t "_blank" Elliott Brown 27th June, 2021

All of Africa ORIGINALLY consisted of a population of tropically adapted people with dark skin. By American and European standards they were absolutely "Black". The same holds true for the ORIGINAL populations of Europe and the Arabian Peninsula.

The largest and most influential migration to date occurred during the African neolithic. Hunter gatherers, pastoralists, nomads, farmers and agriculturalists migrated throughout Africa and beyond in an event that originated in what is now the Ethiopian highlands over 20,000 years ago.

INCLUDEPICTURE "https://ci5.googleusercontent.com/proxy/f9CP4U-at6sTkPhJ4gDJ_5rnson4SwK9JFJgzXAiGzP2Y5FHm_dIcg_Eu2pKBfOGXuNUCG2Zuqwd3GxVJtijaECfqQfPBcmBGTDMm3FP4hKaiXrYIY3-RYw=s0-d-e1-ft#https://qph.fs.quoracdn.net/main-qimg-d92c50b55dba595df1379fa268157e47" * MERGEFORMATINET
SO E1b1b Africans migrated north and E1b1a Africans migrated west and south long before ancient Egypt or Sumeria existed.

Now I know what is coming. The same old trope about sub Saharan this and that. Black people are indigenous to all of Africa. Anyone in Africa who isn't black is a foreigner. Period. Science has spoken.

Was Ancient Egypt/North Africa black?
Françoise Marie

Master's Degree in Public Administration, Syracuse University HYPERLINK "https://www.quora.com/Was-Ancient-Egypt-North-Africa-black/answer/Fran%C3%A7oise-Marie-1" \t "_blank" Tue sday 27th June

North Africa has contained Blacks forever.

Using the past tense for the presence of Blacks in North Africa, Egypt included is misleading. The racist colonial concept of "nigrescence" equally applied to North Africans is key to understanding what the earliest inhabitants of North Africa looked like.

In Africa where the Negro is found completely at home, it has been noted that his distribution at one time covered Egypt, Morocco, Tripolitania, Tunisia and Algeria. The appearance of other races in North Africa modified the predominantly negroid character of the population, but even in the modification, to repeat a phrase from Sir Harry H. Johnston, both in nigrescence and in facial features the ancient negroid strain has never been completely eliminated in these lands. In Mauritania, the ancient Negroes were partly driven out by Caucasian invaders and partly absorbed—By John Coleman De Graft-Johnson

North Africa is not a "black free" region of Africa. North African Blacks are conveniently ignored or forgotten. Actually, some of the blackest Africans are found in North Africa among the Nubians of Egypt and the Tebu of Libya.

North African Blacks are a silent, invisible and discriminated community. North African Blacks mostly live in southern regions, rural areas and as isolated communities in the north and center.

North Africa is not just the coast along the Mediterranean Sea.

North Africa is not just the Mediterranean seaside.

Basic facts of history.

Invaders come by the sea.

Invaders settle in seaside towns.

Invaders hold the coast.

Invaders build forts along the sea.

Invaders get reinforcements from across the sea.

Eurasian invaders in North Africa fit the scenario perfectly. They are concentrated in littoral zones and coastal towns.

Ancient Egyptians recorded that their worst enemies were People of the Sea. Who were the People of the Sea? Eurasian invaders whose descendants are the dominant groups in North Africa, including in Egypt.

La conquête de l'Afrique
La conquête de l'Afrique
HYPERLINK "https://www.amazon.fr/conqu%C3%AAte-lAfrique-Paul-Gaffarel/dp/201289061X" \t "_blank" https://www.amazon.fr/conqu%C3%AAte-lAfrique-Paul-Gaffarel/dp/201289061X
Courtesy of Google Translate

As far as historical memories go, Africa appears to us as populated, over its entire vast expanse, by black tribes. The oldest geographical documents depict these black tribes as fixed, from time immemorial, in the regions where they still build their huts and graze their herds. On the monuments of the oldest dynasties they already appear with their characteristic features: frizzy hair, full lips, squashed nose. We can therefore consider the Negroes as the first occupants of the African continent, as the true natives.

At a time which is impossible to specify, but which is very remote, since tradition has hardly preserved the memory of it, a first flood of invaders of white race descended on the black continent and settled in the northern provinces, between the Mediterranean and the Sahara. They were very mixed peoples, some blond with blue eyes, others brown with black eyes. Where did they come from? In the absence of precise information, one can conjecture it. They came neither from the South, since the Negroes live alone in this direction, nor from the North, since a vast sea defends its approaches, and that primitive peoples could not dream of crossing it.

It was from the East and the West, via Suez and Gibraltar, that the invaders arrived; most probably the populations with black hair by the narrow strip of land which connects Asia to Africa, and the blond populations by the strait which connects the Mediterranean to the Atlantic.

As for Egypt, the Valley of the Kings and the Karnak megatemple complex are located in Upper Egypt (Pathros), in the south were the darkest and blackest Egyptians are found. Ancient Egyptians migrated from inner Africa and they first settled in Upper Egypt, their original home. Pathros, Upper Egypt is even recorded in the Bible in Ezekiel.

Ancient North Africans, Egyptians included, were not black people is a Eurocentric talecontradicted by the written word of ancient time and the most seasoned Egyptologists like Champollion-Figeac.

This quote from 1867 by a founding father of Egyptology Champollion-Figeac – "The first tribes that inhabited Egypt that is, the Nile Valley between the Syene cataracts and the sea, came from Abyssinia to Sennar. The ancient Egyptians belonged to a race quite similar to the Kennous or Barabras, present inhabitants of Nubia. In the Copts of Egypt, we do not find any of the characteristic features of the ancient Egyptian population. The Copts are the result of crossbreeding with all the nations that have successively dominated Egypt. It is wrong to seek in them the principal features of the old race." From Letters published by Champollion-Figeac (Founding Egyptologist).

"To sum up, Nubia is Egypt's African ancestor. What linked Ancient Egypt to the rest of the North African cultures is this strong tie with the Nubian pastoral nomadic lifestyle, the same pastoral background commonly shared by most of the ancient Saharan and modern sub-Saharan societies. Thus, not only did Nubia have a prominent role in the origin of Ancient Egypt, it was also a key area for the origin of the entire African pastoral tradition."

The Nubian Pastoral Culture as Link between Egypt and Africa: A View from the Archaeological Record—Maria Carmela Gatto. Yale University

In which even the university of Cambridge admits that ancient Egypt was Black African

In which even the university of Cambridge admits that ancient Egypt was Black African November 13, 2015 By MsAfropolitan 45 Comments Musicians at a banquet. Mural from the tomb of Rekhmire, vizier under Thutmosis III (1490-1439 BCE) and Amenophis II (1439-1413 BCE). 18th Dynasty, New Kingdom, Egypt. In 2006, the Cambridge University art and antiquities museum, Fitzwilliam , did a commendable thing when they, following a £1.5 million renewal project, launched their new Egypt galleries . The idea was to showcase ancient Egyptian religion, magic, writing, ritual and to redisplay the collections in a contemporary and dynamic way. But that was not all. In a rare condemnation of the historical revision of ancient Egypt, the Fitzwilliam Museum admitted that, not only does Egyptology have a European bias, but that the bias means that our understanding of the earliest human civilisation is gravely erroneous. As they put it , "People mainly look at Ancient Egypt through a European bias. This is because the majority of books on Egyptology are written by researchers of European, or North-American backgrounds." Instead, the Fitzwilliam Museum decided to adopt an Africa-Centred approach to ancient Egypt. What does an Africa-centred approach to Egyptology mean? Well , first of all, it acknowledges that Ancient Egypt "is part of African culture" and that while the word 'Egypt' is what the Ancient Greeks named ancient Egypt, the original inhabitants called it 'Kemet', which literally means 'the black land'. Therefore, by naming the museum gallery "Virtual Kemet", the curators intended to remind people that Ancient Egypt is an "African civilization and that whilst the culture had contact with people from other civilizations, it was essentially African in its culture and well as its geographical placement." The museum insists, "There are many links between ancient Egyptian and modern African culture, ranging from objects such as headrests to hairstyles such as the side lock, and this and other evidence support the idea that it was an African culture in addition to being geographically in Africa . For these reasons Egypt is seen by people of African descent as part of their cultural heritage and history. […] Egypt was an African country, and their artists depicted the Egyptians as Africans, with black skin and tightly curled hair. " [Emphases mine] If there remains any doubt about the heritage of ancient Egyptians, the museum declares, "If we look at the skin colour and also facial features on representations of Egyptians, many are what we would consider today to be Black African." However, even if "we leave colour aside for a moment, we can also find out a great deal from looking at the facial features shown on Egyptian statues. Here, there can be no doubt that we are dealing with people who were African. Faces were broad with high cheekbones and the jaws are typically strong. The noses are also broad and the lips are generally full and fleshy in appearance." It ma

HYPERLINK "https://www.msafropolitan.com/2015/11/ancient-egypt-was-black-african.html" \t "_blank" https://www.msafropolitan.com/2015/11/ancient-egypt-was-black-african.html

INCLUDEPICTURE "https://ci3.googleusercontent.com/proxy/B9x_19CssL_NeMU4fILIDPvhDOzFzFJEMU8qIYV9fZgmk_ZX97X1YQVrc3Aca8nmLfhs5t4cc2mkMPlQ2flzP-cIo6G7EIj3yzp7dID6TVux9mlhNcHWNog=s0-d-e1-ft#https://qph.fs.quoracdn.net/main-qimg-fbac944e6def31cd5a03198bc2761740" * MERGEFORMATINET

Musicians at a banquet. Mural from the tomb of Rekhmire, vizier under Thutmosis III (1490-1439 BCE) and Amenophis II (1439-1413 BCE). 18th Dynasty, New Kingdom, Egypt.

In a rare condemnation of the historical revision of ancient Egypt, the Fitzwilliam Museum admitted that, not only does Egyptology have a European bias, but that the bias means that our understanding of the earliest human civilisation is gravely erroneous. As they HYPERLINK "https://www.fitzmuseum.cam.ac.uk/dept/ant/egypt/kemet/virtualkemet/faq/" \o "www.fitzmuseum.cam.ac.uk" \t "_blank" put it , "People mainly look at Ancient Egypt through a European bias. This is because the majority of books on Egyptology are written by researchers of European, or North-American backgrounds."

Instead, the Fitzwilliam Museum decided to adopt an Africa-Centred approach to ancient Egypt.

What does an Africa-centred approach to Egyptology mean? HYPERLINK "https://www.fitzmuseum.cam.ac.uk/dept/ant/egypt/kemet/virtualkemet/faq/" \o "www.fitzmuseum.cam.ac.uk" \t "_blank" Well , first of all, it acknowledges that Ancient Egypt "is part of African culture" and that while the word 'Egypt' is what the Ancient Greeks named ancient Egypt, the original inhabitants called it 'Kemet', which literally means 'the black land'. Therefore, by naming the museum gallery "Virtual Kemet", the curators intended to remind people that Ancient Egypt is an "African civilization and that whilst the culture had contact with people from other civilizations, it was essentially African in its culture and well as its geographical placement."

The museum insists, "There are many links between ancient Egyptian and modern African culture, ranging from objects such as headrests to hairstyles such as the side lock, and this and other evidence support the idea that it was an African culture in addition to being geographically in Africa. For these reasons Egypt is seen by people of African descent as part of their cultural heritage and history. […] Egypt was an African country, and their artists depicted the Egyptians as Africans, with black skin and tightly curled hair.

LacusCurtius • Diodorus Siculus
(Vol. II) Diodorus Siculus Library of History p87 Book III (beginning) Contents of the Third Book of Diodorus On the Ethiopians who dwell beyond Libya and their antiquities (chaps. 1-11) . On the gold mines on the farthest borders of Egypt and the working of the gold (chaps. 12-14) . On the peoples who dwell upon the coast of the Arabian Gulf and, speaking generally, upon all the coast of the ocean as far as India. In this connection there is a discussion of the customs which each people follows and of the reasons why history records many things in connection with them which are entirely unique and are not believed because they are contrary to what one expects (chaps. 15-48) . On the antiquities of Libya and the history of the Gorgons and Amazons, and of Ammon and Atlas (chaps. 49-61) . On the myths related about Nysa, in connection with which there is also an account of the Titans and Dionysus and the Mother of the Gods (chaps. 62-74) . p89 1 1 Of the two preceding Books the First embraces the deeds in Egypt of the early kings and the accounts, as found in their myths, of the gods of the Egyptians; there is also a discussion of the Nile and of the products of the land, and also of its animals, which are of every kind, and a description of the topography of Egypt, of the customs prevailing among its inhabitants, and of its courts of law. 2 The Second Book embraces the deeds performed by the Assyrians in Asia in early times, connected with which are both the birth and the rise to power of Semiramis, in the course of which she founded Babylon and many other cities and made a campaign against India with great forces; and after this is an account of the Chaldaeans and of their practice of observing the stars, of Arabia and the marvels of that land, of the kingdom of the Scythians, of the Amazons, and finally of the Hyperboreans. In this present Book we shall add the matters which are connected with what I have already narrated, 3 and shall describe the Ethiopians and the Libyans and the people known as the Atlantians. 2 1 Now the Ethiopians, as historians relate, were the first of all men and the proofs of this statement, they say, are manifest. For that they did not come into their land as immigrants from abroad but were p91 natives of it and so justly bear the name of " autochthones " 1 is, they maintain, conceded by practically all men; furthermore, that those who dwell beneath the noon-day sun were, in all likelihood, the first to be generated by the earth, is clear to all; since, inasmuch as it was the warmth of the sun which, at the generation of the universe, dried up the earth when it was still wet and impregnated it with life, 2 it is reasonable to suppose that the region which was nearest the sun was the first to bring forth living creatures. 2 And they say that they were the first to be taught to honour the gods and to hold sacrifices and processions and festivals and the other rites by which men honour the deity; and that in consequence

HYPERLINK "http://penelope.uchicago.edu/Thayer/E/Roman/Texts/Diodorus_Siculus/3A*.html" \t "_blank" http://penelope.uchicago.edu/Thayer/E/Roman/Texts/Diodorus_Siculus/3A*.html

Book III (beginning)

Diodorus of Sicily wrote the following :

*They say also that the Egyptians are colonists sent out by the Ethiopians, Osiris having been the leader of the colony. And the larger part of the customs of the Egyptians are, they hold, Ethiopian.

According to Herodotus, in Histories, Book II, the Colchians were Egyptians *"because like the Egyptians they had black skin and wooly hair."

Aristotle says in Physiognomonica that "the Egyptians and Ethiopians are very black."

Herodotus Book II

Chapter 104

[1] For it is plain to see that the Colchians are Egyptians; and what I say, I myself noted before I heard it from others. When it occurred to me, I inquired of both peoples; and the Colchians remembered the Egyptians better than the Egyptians remembered the Colchians;

[2] the Egyptians said that they considered the Colchians part of Sesostris' army. I myself guessed it, partly because they are black-skinned and woolly-haired; though that indeed counts for nothing, since other peoples are, too; but my better proof was that the Colchians and Egyptians and Ethiopians are the only nations that have from the first practised circumcision.

Caucasus | Mountains, Facts, & Map
Caucasus, mountains and region lying between the Black Sea (west) and the Caspian Sea (east) and occupied by Russia, Georgia, Azerbaijan, and Armenia. The great historic barrier of the Caucasus Mountains rises up across the wide isthmus where Europe and Asia converge. Mount Elbrus is its highest peak.

HYPERLINK "https://www.britannica.com/place/Caucasus" \l "ref495092" \t "_blank" https://www.britannica.com/place/Caucasus#ref495092 The peoples of the region have exhibited an extraordinary ethnic and cultural HYPERLINK "https://www.merriam-webster.com/dictionary/diversity" \o "www.merriam-webster.com" \t "_blank" diversity since early times: the HYPERLINK "https://www.britannica.com/topic/Colchian" \o "www.britannica.com" \t "_blank" Colchians , for example, as described in the 5th century BCE by the Greek historian Herodotus , were black-skinned Egyptians, though their true origin remains unclear. Aristotle, Greek philosopher, scientist, and tutor to Alexander the Great. Aristotle is said to have written 150 philosophical treatises.

"Too black a hue marks the coward as witness Egyptians and Ethiopians and so does also too white a complexion as you may see from women, the complexion of courage is between the two." (Physiognomics, Vol. VI, 812a)

Aristotle makes reference to the hair form of Egyptians and Ethiopians: "Why are the Ethiopians and Egyptians bandy-legged? Is it because the bodies of living creatures become distorted by heat*, like logs of wood when they become dry? The condition of their hair supports this theory; for it is curlier than that of other nations, and curliness is as it were* crookedness of the hair*."* (Physiognomics, Book XIV, p. 317

There is one question that will close the debate once and for all about the racial identity of ancient Egyptians.

Are you a descendant of Ham?

Egypt is also called the Land of Ham, the biblical father of African nations.

No white man or woman has ever claimed to a descendant of Ham.

No Arab man or woman has ever claimed to be a descendant of Ham.

The Curse of Ham was used a justification for black slavery. To this very day, millions of Whites and Arabs cling to the Curse of Ham as the source for everything that goes wrong or is wrong with Blacks, including earthquakes in Haiti. Black skin is a curse, they say. Which curse? The Curse of Ham.

The Seoul Times
HYPERLINK "https://theseoultimes.com/ST/?url=%2FST%2Fdb%2Fread.php%3Fidx" \t "_blank" https://theseoultimes.com/ST/?url=%2FST%2Fdb%2Fread.php%3Fidx
Egypt: The Land of Ham

Special Contribution

By Babu G. Ranganathan

I am not African-American. I am Indian-American. I was born in India but I lived most of my life here in the United States and I am a proud citizen of this great country.

I am also a Christian. I converted from Hinduism when I was fourteen. As a Christian, therefore, I am deeply troubled that there are still quite a number of people who believe that there was a biblical justification for enslaving the black people of Africa. Those who hold to this view say that Noah, in the Book of Genesis, cursed Ham and that the black people of Africa being descendants of Ham were justifiably enslaved and treated with contempt. This belief is far from being extinct in our society so it is important that this belief is examined in the light of what the Bible actually teaches.

The particular passage in Genesis 9:25 has been grossly misinterpreted. First of all, Noah never cursed his son Ham. The actual curse was on Canaan the oldest son of Ham. Ham also had other sons but they were not cursed by Noah. The servitude (or subjugation)of the Canaanites occurred at various times in history under various rulers. Their ultimate subjugation came under the Romans (who were descendants from the line of Japeth) when the Romans destroyed their final stronghold which was the ancient city of Carthage (a Phoenician or Canaanite colony) in North Africa, thus fulfilling Noah's prophecy in Genesis 9:27 that Canaan would serve Japheth. The Canaanites were also once slaves of the Hebrew people (descendants from the line of Shem) who themselves were once slaves of the Egyptians and, thus, fulfilling the Biblical prophecy that Canaan's descendants would be a "servant of servants." The Canaanites were also at one time ruled by their brothers the Egyptians. Thus, the Biblical prophecy concerning the curse of the Canaanites had been completely fulfilled long ago.

The Bible teaches that the Black (or Negro) people are descendants of Ham (who was one of the three sons of Noah). Obviously, Noah and his three sons Ham, Shem, and Japeth each carried the genes for producing several races since ultimately all the races of mankind had descended from them. Genetically, it was possible for Noah and his three sons to carry the genes for producing different races just as it is genetically possible today, for example, for a person of European origin to carry genes for producing children with different color hair. The principle is the same. Although you and I today may not possess genes for producing different races of people, Noah and his three sons Ham, Shem, and Japeth did possess such genes.

According to the Bible the ancient Egyptians were descended from Ham through the line of Mizraim.

Ham had four sons: Cush, Mizraim, Phut, and Canaan (Genesis 10:6). The name "Mizraim" is the original name given for Egypt in the Hebrew Old Testament. Many Bibles will have a footnote next to the name "Mizraim" explaining that it means "Egypt." The name "Egypt" itself actually comes to us from the Greeks who gave the Land that name (i.e. "Aegyptos" from the Greek). In addition to the name "Mizraim," the ancient Egyptians also referred to their land as "Kemet" which means "Land of the Blacks." Western historians, however, say that the word "Kemet" refers to the color of the soil of the land rather than its people. But, the word "Kemet" is actually an ethnic term being a derivative of the word "Khem" (Cham or Ham) which means "burnt" or "black." Ham, who was one of the three sons of Noah and the direct ancestor of the Egyptians, was black. The Bible, in the Old Testament, repeatedly refers to Egypt as the "Land of Ham" (i.e., Psalm 105:23, 27; 106:22).

Regarding the ancient Egyptians, there is also considerable historical evidence, aside from the Holy Bible, that they were of Black or Negro origin. Even today the true Egyptian is not to be found in the cities but in the country sides and farmlands of Egypt. Most of the Egyptians in the cities carry a mixed ancestry of European and Asian, but mostly Asian from the immigration and invasions of various people into Egypt throughout the centuries. Very few people realize that Cleopatra was of Greek origin because the Greeks once ruled Egypt and she was descended from one of those Greek rulers. The true Egyptian found in the countryside, however, has dark brown to black skin and very pronounced Negro features. This is particularly true the further south one travels in Egypt. It was from the south that the original pharaohs and the people of Egypt settled the land. The original rulers and builders of Egyptian civilization were of completely Black or Negro origin.

An interesting piece of evidence showing how the ancient Egyptians viewed themselves is found in the tomb of Ramses III (1200 BC). On the wall of this tomb is a painting of four human figures. Each figure is identified with a particular race or group of people with whom the Egyptians had contact.

The first figure is that of a finely clothed man who is entirely black with wooly hair who represented the ancient Egyptians.

The second figure is that of barely clad fair-skinned man who represented the Europeans. The third figure is that of a finely clothed man who is entirely black with wooly hair who represented the other Blacks of Africa. The fouth figure is that of a finely clothed light brown-skinned man who represented the semitic people. Thus, the ancient Egyptians saw themselves as fully black!

It is important to understand, however, that the Negro or Black race is not monolithic. I realize that there are many scholars who make a distinction between being Negro and having black skin complexion because they take into consideration physical features (i.e. shape of nose, texture of hair, etc.) into their criteria for determining race and not just the criterion of skin color or skin complexion. However, these are all quite artifical criteria. In fact, the very classification of human races is in itself artificial since there really is only one race

- the human race within which there are variations and permutations. Even the Bible has no terminology for race. Instead, the Bible refers to the divisions found in mankind in terms of tribe, language, or nation - but never race. However, since in our modern times the word "race" is so popular in designating divisions of mankind we are going to use the term. But, it should be kept in mind that there are wide varieties of characteristics even within a single race. Even among white Europeans, for example, you have varying shades of skin tone, hair color, and other physical traits or characteristics. The same is true of the Black race, but to a much wider degree.

DNA analysis of blacks in Africa confirms that African blacks possess a greater margin of genetic variability. It seems that black Africans carry a greater number of alleles - genetic variations of the same gene(s) in their DNA as compared to Europeans and others. Thus, it is not surprising that there are much wider physical varieties among blacks. For example, in Sudan, Somalia, and South India (where I am originally from) the blacks have more fine features. In fact, even blacks of ancient Nubia (also known as Kush) comprised individuals who had both straight hair as well as wooly hair. Just as whites have varying hair color (i.e. brown, red, blond, and brunette), so too blacks have varying hair texture (i.e. wooly, straight, wavy, and curly). The black aboriginals of Australia, for example, have curly/wavy hair. Many of the aboriginals even have blond hair. Such is the wide diversity within the Black race. Ancient Egyptian statues and paintings depict a wide variety of these Black types.

Also, in certain characteristics of language and culture ancient Egypt is uniquely linked to other Black cultures of Africa and this reinforces the Black identity of ancient Egyptian civilization since these unique linguistic and cultural characteristics are not found among Indo-European peoples. For example, the ancient Egyptians like their African brethren were matriarchal whereas Indo-Europeans were and are patriarchal. An exception to this were the ancient Etruscans of Italy. Although the ancient Etruscans, who were Indo-European, were matriarchal, their matriarchal culture and budding civilization was actually due to the influence of trade with the ancient Phoenicians (Canaanities) who were Hamitic and matriarchal. The ancestors of the ancient Egyptians, therefore, were not the patriarchal Indo-Europeans from the North as white supremicists would have us believe but rather the matriarchal black Africans from the South (Upper Egypt). Geographically speaking, the southern regions of ancient Egypt are referred to as "Upper Egypt." The reason for this is explained below in another paragraph.

It should be understood that the people of North India and Europe share a common linguistic and racial heritage and that is why they are referred to on the whole as being "Indo-European." The people of South India (comprising four states and making up roughly twenty-five percent of India's total population) are linguistically and racially known as Dravidians. The Dravidians of India are generally shorter, broader-nosed, with dark brown to black skin complexion and straight or wavy hair. Both archaeological and linguistic evidence shows that it was the ancient Dravidians who built the Indus Valley civilization (also known as the Harappan Civilization which was one of the world's four oldest civilizations after Mesopotamia and Egypt). The ancient Harappan civilization existed in what is now Pakistan. The Dravidians of the Indus Valley were conquered, killed in great mass, and enslaved by white nomadic barbarian invaders called Aryans who came from the north. The Dravidians who escaped Aryan enslavement or slaughter fled to the south and were able to hold their own against any further Aryan encroachment and advancement, and that is why the linguistic and racial make up of South India is different from that of North India. Of course, over the centuries there has been so much crossbreeding between the two peoples that neither the north now is purely Aryan nor the south purely Dravidian anymore. Historian, anthropologist, and educational psychologist Dr.Clyde A. Winters has provided much painstaking research and numerous resources and references showing the ultimate cultural and phonetic/linguistic links between the peoples of South India and Black Africa. It is worth visting his site C.A. Winter's Homepage.

Another excellent, scholarly, well-documented, and highly acclaimed book for study on this subject is The African Origin of Civilization: Myth or Reality by well-known West African scientist, scholar, and Egyptologist Cheikh Anta Diop. The book is generally available at bookstores or may be ordered through any bookstore. The book may also be purchased over the internet (i.e. HYPERLINK "http://amazon.com/" \o "amazon.com" \t "_blank" Online Shopping for Electronics, Apparel, Computers, Books, DVDs & more). Although I agree with most of what Dr. Diop says in his book, I do strongly disagree with his support of Darwinian evolutionary theory concerning human origins and his belief that Judaism and its offspring Christianity is a by-product of Egyptian civilization. There is no doubt that some Judeo-Christian themes, principles, and truths existed in civilizations and cultures much older than that of the Hebrews (the Jews). The concept of one God, for example, was also believed and promoted in ancient Egypt by a certain pharaoh before there ever were Hebrews or Jews who possessed this truth. Elements of God's original truth have been scattered in all cultures of the world including that of ancient Egypt, but I believe (and with good reason) that God uniquely revealed Himself to the Jews in such a way that He gave them His truths unmixed with any errors. The Christian Scriptures teach that the Jews were not selected by God because they were deserving or because they were a great people, but precisely because of the opposite. God delights in using the lowly, undeserving, and insignificant to accomplish His great purposes, and it was God's marvelous plan and purpose to use the lowly, undeserving, and insignificant Jews as His instrument to bring all mankind unto Himself so that both Jews and Gentiles in Christ become equally His children with eternal promises and blessings.

It is important over-all to remember that there were both primitive and advanced black societies in ancient Africa just as there were also both primitive (barbarian) and advanced white societies in Europe during ancient times. However, keep in mind that Western (or White) civilization came on to the world's scene thousands of years after Blacks had already established and built their civilizations, notably Egypt.

There is good reason to believe that the ancient Greeks borrowed much of their philosophy, religion, mathematics, and sciences from the Egyptians. Of course, the Greeks definitely modified and gave their own Greek names to these concepts which they learned and borrowed from the Egyptians. Many prominent ancient Greek philosophers admitted in their own writings (of which we have a record) that they learned their scientific and mathematical concepts in Egypt. Writers and publishers of modern history textbooks make sure not to mention or include these confessions. The simple fact is that history shows that the ancient Greeks never really advanced as a society or people until they made contacts with Egypt. Then, as they say, they really took off. In fact, it would not at all be pre-mature to say that the Black society and civilization of ancient Egypt jump- started Greek civilization which in-turn jump-started all Western or European civilization. An excellent and scholarly article to read which summarizes the various historical and archaeological evidences which exist supporting the Black heritage of ancient Egypt is Ancient Egypt: Africa's Stolen Legacy published in "New African" magazine. Another one is Still Out of Africa

(HYPERLINK "http://www.mindspring.com/~jeaton/Finch/index.html" \o "www.mindspring.com" \t "_blank" http://www.mindspring.com/~jeaton/Finch/index.html) written by Dr. Charles S. Finch, III, M.D. of Morehouse School of Medicine. And, still, another very excellent and quite comprehensive website is: Ancient Africa's Black Kingdoms (HYPERLINK "http://www.homestead.com/wysinger/ancientafrica.html" \o "www.homestead.com" \t "_blank" Website Disabled). If you wish to read an excellent essay which explains why the hair found on Egyptian mummies is straight rather than wooly go to: Hanging In The Hair (HYPERLINK "http://www.homestead.com/wysinger/hair2.html" \o "www.homestead.com" \t "_blank" Website Disabled). Please understand that the purpose of my webpage, which you are now reading, is to provide only general information. It is not my purpose here in this site to present detailed documentation and references. Such necessary and important detailed documentation and references are available through contacting the sources that I mention on this page.

One must realize that geographers refer to northern Egypt as "Lower Egypt" and to southern Egypt as "Upper Egypt." The reason for this is because the Nile River in Egypt, unlike other rivers of the world, flows from the south to the north. So up the Nile is actually going south and that is why the southern part of Egypt is called "Upper Egypt" and down the Nile is actually going north and that is why the northern part of Egypt is referred to as "Lower Egypt."

In ancient times the border of southern (or "Upper") Egypt was much further south than where it is today. Upper Egypt in ancient times extended well into what is now the country of Sudan (known in ancient times as Nubia or Kush). It was from Upper Egypt (Nubia or Kush) that the first pharaoh of Egypt Narmer (also known as Menes) went out to conquer and unify all of Egypt into one nation or kingdom. It was from here (the South) that the original ancestors of the Egyptians, following the direction of the Nile River north, settled the land of Egypt. The Egyptians themselves recorded in their writings that their ancestors came from the south. For example, the Edfu text (which is an inscription still found in the Temple of Horus at Edfu) states: "Several thousand years ago, we were led by our king from the South to settle up the Nile Valleys."

Western Egyptologists and historians continue to ignore such evidence and will certainly not publish it in school history textbooks. Western Egyptologists and historians continue to use the specious argument that the ancient Egyptians and Nubians (also known as Cushites) could not have belonged to the same race because they were separate countries and throughout history they fought one another for supremacy. But, ancient history shows us that separate nations that were white also fought one another (i.e. the ancient Romans and Gauls), but no one would argue that because of this the people of those nations didn't belong to the same race. In fact, Egypt was originally a colony of Nubia (Kush or Cush) b

HYPERLINK "https://www.quora.com/It-is-an-established-fact-that-civilization-started-in-Egypt-Why-is-Egypt-not-the-most-developed-in-the-world" \t "_blank" It is an established fact that civilization started in Egypt. Why is Egypt not the most developed in the world?

HYPERLINK "https://www.quora.com/profile/Jason-Almendra" \t "_blank"
Jason Almendra

I took "Greek & Latin Roots of English" in college HYPERLINK "https://www.quora.com/It-is-an-established-fact-that-civilization-started-in-Egypt-Why-is-Egypt-not-the-most-developed-in-the-world/answer/Jason-Almendra" \t "_blank" September 5

As Sun Tzu said: geography is of the utmost importance. The only habitable part of Egypt is the Nile river valley. The rest is desert. That's also the reason why the Egyptian population is not as big as China's or India's. (Or maybe they're in space.)

INCLUDEPICTURE "https://ci5.googleusercontent.com/proxy/zNvAD7uHg1GLDTNnvS16rVi_vrqvLqa-dPj99N8W7UUWfICOBM6Dl4KpHBO9ahdGh8szXUYYHqq4L5b9ZrLTWMxJLyCu2MFoIYGrhRSudtjEvKW7RJb0Dq_ssNOO=s0-d-e1-ft#https://qph.fs.quoracdn.net/main-qimg-5f45c03a4b047cbccf40efb6520f5c52-mzj" * MERGEFORMATINET
INCLUDEPICTURE "https://ci5.googleusercontent.com/proxy/00tPB63JEJqJbnu-asVJW7j8Xs2BiAviD257sAAxcQGu9f214CqEzY1xBMuVRNaZRv_biI600IGsiFrE7yK6ruTtUhRrfff6OzGnjF0b5-dysmxWTNuw8z1NOAhD=s0-d-e1-ft#https://qph.fs.quoracdn.net/main-qimg-3724f5dbb4ca0525698520ddf7321126-mzj" * MERGEFORMATINET
INCLUDEPICTURE "https://ci4.googleusercontent.com/proxy/GPbdbAmrRBPsU5FcmALggrFRFmj3pii7mVEcs-lY5EnoWE_xp35qYVFxJOqRQVvzvYjTjyzGI7_CEcxHKs01-BkyC7D_Mhv3Y8iqObsb_lMF6iysJg__nncmE2t8=s0-d-e1-ft#https://qph.fs.quoracdn.net/main-qimg-f5360fa1e3efda857380f4cf347b7367-mzj" * MERGEFORMATINET
INCLUDEPICTURE "https://ci3.googleusercontent.com/proxy/6uIN7yXGnAEZZ3L1T-txPdKy844Efj-DfUIcTupVtz6uXwUcD3AKv1IdJoGg0Qt4ulQe4zRDv_MNKYC1JEGBoTI8lKOLwzcT4I-xG5wCP5Mo8ZtMtBGLT7kVa0mk=s0-d-e1-ft#https://qph.fs.quoracdn.net/main-qimg-7a7643f2051bdd6f6acb8713ac358c39-mzj" * MERGEFORMATINET

Related Links

HYPERLINK "https://www.quora.com/I-want-to-learn-a-Sub-Saharan-ie-not-Arabic-French-English-Portuguese-Italian-German-etc-African-indigenous-languages-that-is-used-as-broadly-widely-as-possible-Is-Swahili-the-biggest-lingua-franca" \t "_blank"
I want to learn a Sub-Saharan (ie not Arabic, French, English, Portuguese, Italian, German etc.,) African indigenous languages that is used as broadly/widely as possible. Is Swahili the biggest lingua franca?

HYPERLINK "https://www.quora.com/What-would-happen-if-all-Sub-Saharan-African-countries-abandoned-their-colonial-languages-French-English-and-Portuguese" \t "_blank" What would happen if all Sub-Saharan African countries abandoned their colonial languages (French, English, and Portuguese)?

HYPERLINK "https://www.quora.com/Is-there-a-Latin-Africa-in-the-same-way-theres-a-Latin-America-I-mean-there-are-several-African-countries-whose-official-language-is-French-or-Portuguese" \t "_blank" Is there a "Latin Africa" in the same way there's a Latin America? I mean there are several African countries whose official language is French or Portuguese.

HYPERLINK "https://www.quora.com/Is-there-any-equivalent-to-the-word-Negro-in-Spanish-and-Portuguese-that-means-the-same-thing-that-the-word-means-in-English-not-the-color-black-that-is-persons-of-sub-Saharan-descent-Like-N%C3%A8gre-in-French-Neger" \t "_blank" Is there any equivalent to the word “Negro” in Spanish and Portuguese that means the same thing that the word means in English (not the color black), that is, persons of sub-Saharan descent? Like “Nègre” in French & “Neger” in Germanic languages?

HYPERLINK "https://www.quora.com/Why-is-it-easier-to-convince-people-in-most-Subsaharan-African-countries-to-learn-and-use-the-foreign-language-of-former-colonialists-officially-than-to-accept-the-choice-of-1-or-2-of-the-most-spoken-native" \t "_blank" Why is it easier to convince people in most Subsaharan African countries to learn and use the foreign language of former colonialists officially than to accept the choice of 1 or 2 of the most spoken native languages as an official lingua franca?

HYPERLINK "https://www.quora.com/Is-French-speaking-Africa-worse-off-than-English-speaking-Africa-Economically-socially-etc" \t "_blank" Is French-speaking Africa worse off than English-speaking Africa? (Economically, socially etc.)

HYPERLINK "https://www.quora.com/Do-you-think-the-GERD-Ethiopia-dam-could-lead-to-a-war-between-Egypt-Ethiopia" \t "_blank" Do you think the GERD Ethiopia dam could lead to a war between Egypt & Ethiopia?

HYPERLINK "https://www.quora.com/profile/Mohamed-Emara-18" \t "_blank"

Mohamed Emara Lives in Alexandria, Egypt

HYPERLINK "https://www.quora.com/Do-you-think-the-GERD-Ethiopia-dam-could-lead-to-a-war-between-Egypt-Ethiopia/answer/Mohamed-Emara-18" \t "_blank" Answered July 18, 2021 · Author has 120 answers and 2.8M answer views

Maybe and maybe not.

All that Egypt and Sudan are asking for is the signing of a legally binding agreement that would regulate the filling of dams in order to mitigate the harmful effects on both countries. Ethiopia refuses to do so and rejects all proposals presented by downstream countries to resume negotiations on the dam.

Despite continuing acting unilaterally, Ethiopia's Prime Minister Abiy Ahmed keeps claiming that the dam won't affect the water rights of downstream countries. If that's the case then why is he refusing to resume negotiations? Why is he refusing to sign an agreement that would safeguard the rights of all 3 countries in the Nile basin?

The mere word of a war criminal, such as Abiy Ahmed, isn't enough to reassure Egypt and Sudan who have been acting very diplomatically despite all provocative and childish statements made by Ethiopian officials.

Ahmed is probably trying to save face after having his back handed down to him when a bunch of half-beaten and rag-tag militias humiliated his army and captured thousands of soldiers.

INCLUDEPICTURE "https://ci4.googleusercontent.com/proxy/rW9nZQI740mhplYBTDBC4rdHvcXPIckDHEudbEQmXiEtVmdmfHDHOpaPk2AkS8phpffL_kRZU-eVfYfH9aqNitiJZbKbOqrsapdrRWFViNLUvKwx705AWBs=s0-d-e1-ft#https://qph.fs.quoracdn.net/main-qimg-5dca6bef07828d6245d00786fde071bb" * MERGEFORMATINET

Captured Ethiopian personnel

INCLUDEPICTURE "https://ci3.googleusercontent.com/proxy/isPKHR7pRzYuZxaHsF8dcsX7yRRcauQM1vKY99YLSetf8gQm8DKou71h_RnoZRavoH2fnjNTCMLV2AR-3slA1f-aD9FX1l7SsP_m54DuVzk_e1MnnE661BQ=s0-d-e1-ft#https://qph.fs.quoracdn.net/main-qimg-ec72de9e37bca2f588a09a09f4d79257" * MERGEFORMATINET

Ethiopian soldiers being paraded through the streets of Mekelle

He's not thinking straight.Thus, endangering more lives with his recklessness.

Related Questions

HYPERLINK "https://www.quora.com/Would-Ethiopia-strike-Egypt-s-Aswan-Dam-in-retaliation-if-Egypt-strikes-the-Ethiopian-dam" \t "_blank"
Would Ethiopia strike Egypt's Aswan Dam in retaliation if Egypt strikes the Ethiopian dam?

HYPERLINK "https://www.quora.com/How-would-it-play-out-if-Egypt-and-Ethiopia-went-to-war" \t "_blank"
How would it play out if Egypt and Ethiopia went to war?

HYPERLINK "https://www.quora.com/Which-side-will-win-if-Egypt-attacks-Ethiopia-over-water-supply" \t "_blank"
Which side will win if Egypt attacks Ethiopia over water supply?

HYPERLINK "https://www.quora.com/If-Ethiopia-insists-on-constructing-their-huge-dam-on-the-Nile-River-wont-Egypt-go-to-war-with-the-Ethiopians-because-of-being-deprived-of-life-giving-water" \t "_blank"
If Ethiopia insists on constructing their huge dam on the Nile River, won't Egypt go to war with the Ethiopians because of being deprived of life-giving water?

HYPERLINK "https://www.quora.com/Can-Egypt-destroy-the-Ethiopian-GERD-dam" \t "_blank"
Can Egypt destroy the Ethiopian GERD dam?

HYPERLINK "https://www.quora.com/Can-Ethiopia-defend-itself-against-Egypt-in-the-case-of-war" \t "_blank"
Can Ethiopia defend itself against Egypt in the case of war?

HYPERLINK "https://www.quora.com/Can-Ethiopia-defend-itself-against-Egypt-in-the-case-of-war" \t "_blank" More answers from Mohamed Emara

HYPERLINK "https://www.quora.com/What-do-Arabs-think-of-Recep-Tayyip-Erdogan/answer/Mohamed-Emara-18" \t "_blank" What do Arabs think of Recep Tayyip Erdogan?

HYPERLINK "https://www.quora.com/Why-was-Nasser-and-Nasserism-so-problematic-in-Egypt-and-the-Arab-world/answer/Mohamed-Emara-18" \t "_blank" Why was Nasser and Nasserism so problematic in Egypt and the Arab world?

HYPERLINK "https://www.quora.com/What-do-Egyptians-think-of-Indians/answer/Mohamed-Emara-18" \t "_blank" What do Egyptians think of Indians?

HYPERLINK "https://www.quora.com/Israel-is-just-a-tiny-country-while-the-Arab-world-is-enormous-Why-cant-Arabs-accept-Israel-and-its-right-to-exist-when-Arabs-have-so-many-lands/answer/Mohamed-Emara-18" \t "_blank" Israel is just a tiny country, while the Arab world is enormous. Why can't Arabs accept Israel and its right to exist, when Arabs have so many lands?

HYPERLINK "https://www.quora.com/How-did-Israel-beat-an-entire-coalition-of-Arab-countries-three-separate-times/answer/Mohamed-Emara-18" \t "_blank" How did Israel beat an entire coalition of Arab countries three separate times?

What are some interesting facts about the least known countries in the world? HYPERLINK "https://www.quora.com/profile/Maha-Sharif-3" \t "_blank"

Maha Sharif Lived in Riyadh, Saudi Arabia HYPERLINK "https://www.quora.com/What-are-some-interesting-facts-about-the-least-known-countries-in-the-world/answer/Maha-Sharif-3" \t "_blank" August 13, 2020

UAE and Oman. Although they are both well known countries but I'm going to share an interesting fact about them -probably the most absurd and confusing borders in the world-

INCLUDEPICTURE "https://ci4.googleusercontent.com/proxy/3x5qZ3HmZwumMKsSYrZP5za_lENCvOy205PrNFDYsa8vQ2UvIbi3O8NydrcopbGZ6ud_ckmp8douAm058dVFmUnVIMClyWdVZaxFkkpX4sdnRiQOkQzETtw=s0-d-e1-ft#https://qph.fs.quoracdn.net/main-qimg-bca7eb6166a2d703cf1bdcc80ae15aa2" * MERGEFORMATINET

A country within a country within a country..

INCLUDEPICTURE "https://ci3.googleusercontent.com/proxy/7rexBlzJYKMlmlG_JSZCrAyUJ6_ZmY

NmvBOSA7S-
0K2Wm0nkWI39nrNt0LPff32NuDwjiNTjRrqsm6y4JzQvDcL6dgri_ar6-sPvfC4nvmK17xUkVBE4MS4=s0-d-e1-ft#https://qph.fs.quoracdn.net/main-qimg-294f42398ec1a7d99ac49f302fb0afda" * MERGEFORMATINET
INCLUDEPICTURE
"https://ci3.googleusercontent.com/proxy/YmLzdiXBJuiXW906_0M5th_G8FWra-
T_cN3MSWHQe-dqPbl5x-
8xy2EQNh1L0pbpMh3L7DHugj5NMo9eBooqGeyJOJmd8aj4uPVaPgD5lWd6h WHvGjXYiyY=s0-d-e1-ft#https://qph.fs.quoracdn.net/main-qimgbdc0fc394a613b1a10f72e7b6fd53d34" * MERGEFORMATINET
So there's an Omani state called Madha which is located inside UAE, and inside Madha there's a UAE town called Nahwa.

INCLUDEPICTURE
"https://ci3.googleusercontent.com/proxy/nqOtQ910JAjcOUfzZDcEY8ndgy3Lo5h
8O7XG0v_GBdfpoBZVz1X3CtHHZrriEk9OEYCEm8ze7dmcROjbZ4yj2k4cIEO WCcbIsWrMttYoepfi48Hj8FzgsV4=s0-d-e1-ft#https://qph.fs.quoracdn.net/mainqimg-323912f8a12238036c53455e84cd4414" * MERGEFORMATINET

HYPERLINK "https://www.quora.com/What-are-some-interesting-facts-about-Cleopatra" \t "_blank"
What are some interesting facts about Cleopatra?

She spoke seven languages but couldn't say no in any of them (I kid!)!!

HYPERLINK "https://www.quora.com/profile/Jason-Jimenez-92" \t "_blank"
Jason Jimenez

B.A. in Political Science (major) & History (college minor), University of California, Davis(Graduated 1996) HYPERLINK "https://www.quora.com/What-are-some-interesting-facts-about-Cleopatra/answer/Jason-Jimenez-92" \t "_blank" Updated May 26

INCLUDEPICTURE "https://ci4.googleusercontent.com/proxy/kZMK-BzAe1te7IfpeSbgfQNR1bW1nao3uiIg410r5cbXxDwm8eX5brIN2QKfrsLCMEyL
iXzENQ9WKOd0BYo2rfqKamcSz0f18kZKAmvxQ_Mzd5SYYb-

OnvKq0OE=s0-d-e1-ft#https://qph.fs.quoracdn.net/main-qimg-1d893b8bfad00083f446590b0eb0964b-lq" * MERGEFORMATINET
Cleopatra actually did speak seven languages. She was one of the most intelligent women in history. She was not beautiful by standards of the day. But she was strong independent wise, sexy and wanted.

INCLUDEPICTURE "https://ci4.googleusercontent.com/proxy/yNTBrdYs1M3ccA5qImWuW5zfj2xpi4Re-MMTVjmsGIpy7iGX-2-I1Zjt0nwQARLARv1o7eGI40l16iHevBhUVOZljiNo8GEmQ5Zv_Bzh8wtPkTOrU0lzpBtt3_w=s0-d-e1-ft#https://qph.fs.quoracdn.net/main-qimg-ae55924e397b38a947d119c6185f8db4-lq" * MERGEFORMATINET
Cleopatra's real face

Cleopatra was also considered to be a popular ruler among the people of Egypt.

Cleopatra or Cleopatra VII as she was commonly known was the last of the Ptolemies.

INCLUDEPICTURE "https://ci5.googleusercontent.com/proxy/HGhJt9vY5W1_IpajAfJPqUYdA-6kHYJkcu5DOBCJHRZLi3UdEKGawpJ0li8C13KTWD7fHbiwGgBco-BPz2HrKDaSBSkdFq6fKRHKzfUiyIE7zZqG-FVddKHo77Y=s0-d-e1-ft#https://qph.fs.quoracdn.net/main-qimg-41a057eed99fc3f9d2bca46dd440dfd3-lq" * MERGEFORMATINET
Ptolemy I Soter

Ptolemy I Soter was one of Alexander the Great's four generals who carved up his Empire after he died. Ptolemy ruled over Egypt and it's surrounding areas.

INCLUDEPICTURE "https://ci4.googleusercontent.com/proxy/xu0cxVgdOjpcXk5JB50TakhYsXpMp-4eORyoTyM2bIbJpR_rFaQThCtQzft77BH9S7cf02oGRWtDRUwEX-JjldwvnbAgb8WsB36m_uyqu2pZrvyM9YMZi6BqTwA=s0-d-e1-ft#https://qph.fs.quoracdn.net/main-qimg-733fa84a4d99d4c062c441615860ddff-lq" * MERGEFORMATINET
Ptolemy I Soter

He was the first of the Ptolemies, a Macedonian Greek bloodline that ruled Egypt for 300 years. Cleopatra was the last of the Ptolemies.

She needed Roman support Desperately because rival Egyptian rulers believed they had a claim to the throne and wanted to end her and the Ptolemies. They succeeded because Cleopatra was the last of the Ptolemies.

Cleopatra co-ruled with her younger brother Ptolemy XIV , who Cleopatra had murdered after the death of Caesar. Obviously to make way for son.

INCLUDEPICTURE "https://ci6.googleusercontent.com/proxy/py7UoMsjVgCrwrofwuH5-tabw1jsqhUbueZEM81kxdbtlS9ntiK7ajMg2FB3jzvxBbaFCJFhdw0L28WG6mRHvtd2QB8cuTscbqiQuWv9nPYzNkWd1uAkv5tREGU=s0-d-e1-ft#https://qph.fs.quoracdn.net/main-qimg-80068eb2570990f5879c93f6c3074ac0-lq" * MERGEFORMATINET
Cleopatra was not ethnically Egyptian, but she acknowledged and fully embraced its culture and the people. She was Macedonian Greek. She also went beyond previous rulers of Egypt and studied its history and language to show her love for the land.

She sired a child, Caesarion or Ptolemy XV Caesar, with Julius Ceasar. His life was ended by the order of Octavian.

INCLUDEPICTURE "https://ci4.googleusercontent.com/proxy/3aVyLRDwJJBDfBe2CPE-Vui_79fEi58Yka1rNNTOoWX9BPDPn3R8O0OrxlxbMHvDCd7ykx8iiwwR3OhtXSpBQ7bQAbUW6miNJ0ow38aU1F7_3LSdTnjGZWvYDkw=s0-d-e1-ft#https://qph.fs.quoracdn.net/main-qimg-91edd590ed20cc38e53fe4722610d9e4-lq" * MERGEFORMATINET
Caesarion

She had a total of four children. One with Julius Caesar, two twins, Alexander Helios and Cleopatra Selene and one other child with Marcus Antonius.

INCLUDEPICTURE "https://ci5.googleusercontent.com/proxy/0h49WrNr2e6tfzz3KijKa2odBtJBcrB4BUOBtVbwTmWl3ZCv-zQQpDkIa-4_iQlkzoSw1sTSvvhlQ4wtRCpWnI-eq7oje4uXqPZwdRYMrR2-9V-V2YTKYEVuiJQ=s0-d-e1-ft#https://qph.fs.quoracdn.net/main-qimg-9f67a95fad2c44934d0799c0c77cce5d-lq" * MERGEFORMATINET
Cleopatra

Cleopatra wore thick eyeliner because Egyptians of the day believed that it helped stave off infection of the eyes.

INCLUDEPICTURE "https://ci6.googleusercontent.com/proxy/dGobgSnw9kdkoNMGsqoDQiWuiAOKS4hVfNRYNIen24CR_xdcREQyYyaPjQvbVtUWiGh4Hd-PDvDLnkwXJR1ck56opj4eMTuob-2MO1Ss8QyuYSbVsEmtAroaKKY=s0-d-e1-ft#https://qph.fs.quoracdn.net/main-qimg-1894028129ddf6090da437140dc07dd6-lq" * MERGEFORMATINET
Cleopatra VII

She was actually bald like all Egyptians who shaved their heads and wore wigs because of the lice problem.

And yes all of these facts are from memory!

I hope that clears up any confusion!

Related Links

HYPERLINK "https://www.quora.com/Is-it-inappropriate-for-a-white-actress-to-play-Cleopatra-since-she-was-Egyptian" \t "_blank"
Is it inappropriate for a white actress to play Cleopatra, since she was Egyptian?

HYPERLINK "https://www.quora.com/Did-Cleopatra-really-offer-men-a-night-with-her-at-the-cost-of-their-lives" \t "_blank"
Did Cleopatra really offer men a night with her at the cost of their lives?

HYPERLINK "https://www.quora.com/What-happened-to-Cleopatras-children" \t "_blank"
What happened to Cleopatra's children?

HYPERLINK "https://www.quora.com/Would-Cleopatra-be-considered-beautiful-today-considering-modern-standards" \t "_blank"
Would Cleopatra be considered beautiful today (considering modern standards)?

HYPERLINK "https://www.quora.com/Where-are-Cleopatra-and-Mark-Antony-buried-Why-are-the-bodies-and-locations-so-elusive-What-do-you-think-of-the-new-theory-of-them-being-buried-at-Taposiris-Magna" \t "_blank" Where are Cleopatra and Mark Antony buried? Why are the bodies and locations so elusive? What do you think of the new theory of them being buried at Taposiris Magna?

HYPERLINK "https://www.quora.com/Since-Arsinoe-IV-sister-of-Cleopatra-VII-was-found-to-have-black-African-ancestry-could-Cleopatra-have-also-had-the-same-heritage" \t "_blank"
Since Arsinoe IV, sister of Cleopatra VII, was found to have black African ancestry, could

HYPERLINK "https://www.quora.com/Is-it-true-that-Cleopatra-was-not-an-Egyptian-Do-you-believe-it" \t "_blank"
Is it true that Cleopatra was not an Egyptian? Do you believe it?

HYPERLINK "https://www.quora.com/Is-it-inappropriate-for-a-white-actress-to-play-Cleopatra-since-she-was-Egyptian" \t "_blank"
Is it inappropriate for a white actress to play Cleopatra, since she was Egyptian?

HYPERLINK "https://www.quora.com/Why-is-Cleopatra-black-in-AC-Origins-when-clearly-she-was-of-Greek-ancestry-Even-taking-into-consideration-that-she-was-not-pure-Macedonian-Greek-since-many-articles-claim-she-was-of-mixed-ancestry-her-portrayal-in-ACO-seems-inaccurate" \t "_blank"
Why is Cleopatra black in AC Origins when clearly she was of Greek ancestry? Even taking into consideration that she was not pure Macedonian Greek (since many articles claim she was of mixed ancestry), her portrayal in ACO seems inaccurate.

HYPERLINK "https://www.quora.com/I-just-watched-Roman-Empire-on-Netflix-and-they-have-Cleopatras-being-played-by-a-white-Australian-actor-Was-Cleopatra-black-or-white" \t "_blank"
I just watched Roman Empire on Netflix and they have Cleopatras being played by a white Australian actor. Was Cleopatra black or white?

HYPERLINK "https://www.quora.com/Cleopatra-was-Queen-of-Egypt-but-she-wasn-t-ethnically-Egyptian-she-was-Macedonian-Greek-Her-family-the-Ptolemies-didn-t-even-speak-Egyptian-even-after-ruling-Egypt-for-300-years-Why-are-Blacks-so-upset-that-Gal" \t "_blank" Cleopatra was Queen of Egypt, but she wasn’t ethnically Egyptian—she was Macedonian-Greek. Her family, the Ptolemies, didn’t even speak Egyptian, even after ruling Egypt for 300 years. Why are Blacks so upset that Gal Gadot is playing Cleopatra?

HYPERLINK "https://www.quora.com/How-did-Cleopatra-end-up-being-the-Queen-of-Egypt-if-she-wasnt-even-Egyptian" \t "_blank" How did Cleopatra end up being the Queen of Egypt if she wasn't even Egyptian?

HYPERLINK "https://www.quora.com/How-did-Cleopatra-end-up-being-the-Queen-of-Egypt-if-she-wasnt-even-Egyptian" \t "_blank" Related Questions

HYPERLINK "https://www.quora.com/Is-it-true-that-Cleopatra-was-not-an-Egyptian-Do-you-believe-it" \t "_blank" Is it true that Cleopatra was not an Egyptian? Do you believe it?

HYPERLINK "https://www.quora.com/Is-it-inappropriate-for-a-white-actress-to-play-Cleopatra-since-she-was-Egyptian" \t "_blank"
Is it inappropriate for a white actress to play Cleopatra, since she was Egyptian?

HYPERLINK "https://www.quora.com/Why-is-Cleopatra-black-in-AC-Origins-when-clearly-she-was-of-Greek-ancestry-Even-taking-into-consideration-that-she-was-not-pure-Macedonian-Greek-since-many-articles-claim-she-was-of-mixed-ancestry-her-portrayal-in-ACO-seems-inaccurate" \t "_blank" Why is Cleopatra black in AC Origins when clearly she was of Greek ancestry? Even taking into consideration that she was not pure Macedonian Greek (since many articles claim she was of mixed ancestry), her portrayal in ACO seems inaccurate.

HYPERLINK "https://www.quora.com/I-just-watched-Roman-Empire-on-Netflix-and-they-have-Cleopatras-being-played-by-a-white-Australian-actor-Was-Cleopatra-black-or-white" \t "_blank" I just watched Roman Empire on Netflix and they have Cleopatras being played by a white Australian actor. Was Cleopatra black or white?

HYPERLINK "https://www.quora.com/Cleopatra-was-Queen-of-Egypt-but-she-wasn-t-ethnically-Egyptian-she-was-Macedonian-Greek-Her-family-the-Ptolemies-didn-t-even-speak-Egyptian-even-after-ruling-Egypt-for-300-years-Why-are-Blacks-so-upset-that-Gal" \t "_blank" Cleopatra was Queen of Egypt, but she wasn’t ethnically Egyptian—she was Macedonian-Greek. Her family, the Ptolemies, didn’t even speak Egyptian, even after ruling Egypt for 300 years. Why are Blacks so upset that Gal Gadot is playing Cleopatra?

HYPERLINK "https://www.quora.com/How-did-Cleopatra-end-up-being-the-Queen-of-Egypt-if-she-wasnt-even-Egyptian" \t "_blank" How did Cleopatra end up being the Queen of Egypt if she wasn't even Egyptian?

HYPERLINK "https://www.quora.com/Why-do-activists-focus-on-black-washing-famous-figures-Cleopatra-Alexander-the-Great-Hermione-etc-instead-of-uplifting-actual-black-figures-into-common-knowledge-and-acclaim" \t "_blank"
Why do activists focus on "black washing" famous figures (Cleopatra, Alexander the Great, Hermione etc.) instead of uplifting actual black figures into common knowledge and acclaim?

HYPERLINK "https://www.quora.com/Where-are-Cleopatra-and-Mark-Antony-buried-Why-are-the-bodies-and-locations-so-elusive-What-do-you-think-of-the-new-theory-of-them-being-buried-at-Taposiris-Magna" \t "_blank" Where are Cleopatra and Mark Antony buried? Why are the bodies and locations so elusive? What do you think of the new theory of them being buried at Taposiris Magna?

HYPERLINK "https://www.quora.com/Why-is-Gal-Gadot-being-harassed-and-threatened-for-being-cast-as-Cleopatra-as-a-white-woman-when-to-this-day-theres-still-debate-about-ancient-Egyptians-skin-colour" \t "_blank" Why is Gal Gadot being harassed and threatened for being cast as Cleopatra as a white woman when to this day there's still debate about ancient Egyptians skin colour?

HYPERLINK "https://www.quora.com/Why-do-some-people-say-that-Cleopatra-VII-was-a-woman-of-color" \t "_blank"
Why do some people say that Cleopatra VII was a woman of color?

HYPERLINK "https://www.quora.com/Why-do-many-say-that-Cleopatra-VII-wasnt-Egyptian-when-her-ancestors-lived-in-Egypt-more-than-250-years-before-she-was-born-Say-that-the-18th-dynasty-kings-whose-rule-lasted-for-about-250-years-in-Thebes-Waset-were" \t "_blank"
Why do many say that Cleopatra VII wasn't Egyptian when her ancestors lived in Egypt more than 250 years before she was born? Say that the 18th dynasty kings, whose rule lasted for about 250 years in Thebes (Waset), were so-called Middle Easterners.

HYPERLINK "https://www.quora.com/What-made-Cleopatra-so-desirable" \t "_blank"
What made Cleopatra so desirable?

HYPERLINK "https://www.quora.com/Are-the-direct-descendants-of-Cleopatra-aware-of-their-legacy" \t "_blank"
Are the direct descendants of Cleopatra aware of their legacy?

HYPERLINK "https://www.quora.com/Experts-have-stated-that-Cleopatra-was-Black-Do-you-believe-that-Cleopatra-should-only-be-played-in-movies-by-Black-Women-because-Cleopatra-was-a-Black-Queen" \t "_blank"
Experts have stated that Cleopatra was Black. Do you believe that Cleopatra should only be played in movies by Black Women because Cleopatra was a Black Queen?

HYPERLINK "https://www.quora.com/Why-do-a-lot-of-African-Americans-think-that-Cleopatra-was-black" \t "_blank"
Why do a lot of African Americans think that Cleopatra was black?

Why is the Nile River significant in Egyptian history?

Originally Answered: HYPERLINK "https://www.quora.com/Why-was-the-Nile-River-so-important-to-Egypt?no_redirect=1" \t "_blank" Why was the Nile River so important to Egypt?

INCLUDEPICTURE "https://ci3.googleusercontent.com/proxy/at_WMZa7PVySWzcmYhWRbzKMUX1Yhn3J3bmhPl63AZzTSbNCh7DfRAlB-OlXzcOgL9k-Ck4BqP0DtuWMjRkV9_s4OQBJtY5jeIp5ulLA3m_x9XnIHG5at66AvPA=s0-d-e1-ft#https://qph.fs.quoracdn.net/main-qimg-564ebe06f80ff6127d163c54416a0233-lq" * MERGEFORMATINET

Because Egypt is a country literally "son of the Nile". Until the construction of the Aswan Dam, the Nile renewed the fertility of the Egyptian lands annually. If it were not for the Nile, Egypt would be a desert land more than the Libyan Desert.

INCLUDEPICTURE "https://ci4.googleusercontent.com/proxy/tsTZNjc6y31CINwDYE7f25Hp1t6DBKVXlhSGf6g0dbnQP_NMMiW5T3eEdhqXaPVhTJNMtkAHbmbpLlQ5asJRqmMzKxApLdbipRp7rTc0dxo-taSiF3015tvZt4s=s0-d-e1-ft#https://qph.fs.quoracdn.net/main-qimg-e151ec971cd73f5d94bedd63a766a57c-lq" * MERGEFORMATINET

This refers not only to modern Egypt, a basically Muslim country, but Ancient Egypt, whose culture revolved largely around the great river.

INCLUDEPICTURE "https://ci5.googleusercontent.com/proxy/_jyxYR0sh_NNAe1qelYXymmmpBkFSPTYQ4gr3DfL6tTjXh26hTrKIv2UiBOofAVAC-AIfAPVZJX1ygz-hzPtoR2KikaV3VLwvQ7mBqs_2VvKu708AVapJdkn_wCzFg=s0-d-e1-ft#https://qph.fs.quoracdn.net/main-qimg-8f0057fc78a905bdd316e5176f62a4d0.webp" * MERGEFORMATINET

Related Links

HYPERLINK "https://www.quora.com/How-did-the-Nile-river-influence-Egyptian-civilization" \t "_blank"
How did the Nile river influence Egyptian civilization?

HYPERLINK "https://www.quora.com/Where-is-the-Nile-river-located-and-what-is-the-importance-of-the-Nile-river" \t "_blank"
Where is the Nile river located and what is the importance of the Nile river?

HYPERLINK "https://www.quora.com/What-is-the-history-of-the-emergence-of-the-Nile-River-especially-in-Egypt" \t "_blank"
What is the history of the emergence of the Nile River, especially in Egypt?

Were the earliest population of Europe black?

HYPERLINK "https://www.quora.com/profile/Edward-Longshanks-7" \t "_blank" Edward Longshanks
Graphic Design from The Ohio State University (Graduated 2017)

Originally Answered: HYPERLINK "https://www.quora.com/Were-ancient-Europeans-black?no_redirect=1" \t "_blank" Were ancient Europeans black?
No ancient Europeans were not black or negroid. Despite Neolithic Europeans having dark skin doesn't mean they looked like black Africans.Even Cheddar Man doesn't look like a Sub Saharan African he looks more South Asian.

INCLUDEPICTURE "https://ci3.googleusercontent.com/proxy/nR9WADiMqEYTC0pFytRr-qoPy3-j18zaVOWx2DJNLnyaEtzPey8xJOVpdQEkZy0YX7JoP5CNYRNAipLUiBKNnCvSC_P9nBxsuoZLW36wM7ckgJ-POxpIlXDA5tY=s0-d-e1-ft#https://qph.fs.quoracdn.net/main-qimg-05d14193fabd417c9d57ab3cf887b2e4-lq" * MERGEFORMATINET
Not even Minoans and Etruscans were black as Afrocentrics like to claim.

Minoans

INCLUDEPICTURE "https://ci3.googleusercontent.com/proxy/pQ4Gc0q6Xr7gacyZRdLAhJMsqRm2NvInTbQ1gl1aSjyLS9S9wPAQnzgV4sIPcTZxEDioaXLkVJ390iXB6sV7r0yMVILNqTH0GKkhfb42Yoptl-8bLhoEmG057eg=s0-d-e1-ft#https://qph.fs.quoracdn.net/main-qimg-6487e916d6f912292f0fd9622e9f867e-lq" * MERGEFORMATINET

INCLUDEPICTURE "https://ci5.googleusercontent.com/proxy/x_1ytE-3zDYAkVr7XHF0rHxw1PU7T2p1w1Suk2FIHueJuLfTo_x5zB1-yQOEP87hwk6Kx8SY0ydYzwU2b_K88RoBNVf0_V8mTF1FC9j7wP59LCnaGBG_DeA7fkE=s0-d-e1-ft#https://qph.fs.quoracdn.net/main-qimg-0fe0f9bf0d3fbc4e4ab1c87ba93ddc4b-lq" * MERGEFORMATINET
Etruscans

INCLUDEPICTURE "https://ci6.googleusercontent.com/proxy/F9FyfQatWqMPLaAGwz_bbpPUevXMZVcn_Ibu0yyC4pDa8qiFXtjs4bO9lv6RTWSWK_i8pZI0vSFL871NCWP0hZ_qncVFHb5jtBB09Q8-Z1rqiCTXZ8nuoGRcVkY=s0-d-e1-ft#https://qph.fs.quoracdn.net/main-qimg-8fda22e734885d8be0c0097eeebfb4e1-lq" * MERGEFORMATINET

INCLUDEPICTURE "https://ci4.googleusercontent.com/proxy/1SPlXhLYk9Ch2eqHpj8ErQf1GwKi7E8GJBVJwIruCnSBa_Cbx3X8CI82p2P3EmegkD7r_L5eUeDxZJcnQwzWjd5dX21TKFe8l6d3sNqz98Uoye_x_nDxuawC3uM=s0-d-e1-ft#https://qph.fs.quoracdn.net/main-qimg-5b8f9570c38dd480db9ee04d73ff6d46-lq" * MERGEFORMATINET

Related Links

HYPERLINK "https://www.quora.com/Were-there-any-black-Africans-in-Medieval-Europe" \t "_blank"
Were there any black Africans in Medieval Europe?

HYPERLINK "https://www.quora.com/When-did-blacks-rule-Europe" \t "_blank" When did blacks rule Europe?

HYPERLINK "https://www.quora.com/Was-Europe-civilized-by-black-Africans" \t "_blank" Was Europe civilized by black Africans?

HYPERLINK "https://www.quora.com/Were-the-earliest-population-of-Europe-black" \t "_blank" Were the earliest population of Europe black?

HYPERLINK "https://www.quora.com/Before-the-age-of-discoveries-and-the-enslavement-of-black-African-people-how-common-was-seeing-black-people-in-Europe" \t "_blank" Before the age of discoveries and the enslavement of black African people, how common was seeing black people in Europe?

HYPERLINK "https://www.quora.com/Why-are-black-people-called-African-I-don-t-like-the-term-I-am-not-from-Africa-I-like-to-be-called-black" \t "_blank" Why are black people called African? I don’t like the term. I am not from Africa. I like to be called black.

HYPERLINK "https://www.quora.com/What-was-your-experience-in-Europe-as-a-black-American" \t "_blank" What was your experience in Europe as a black American?

HYPERLINK "https://www.quora.com/How-did-black-people-end-up-in-Africa-and-White-people-in-Europe" \t "_blank" How did black people end up in Africa and White people in Europe?

HYPERLINK "https://www.quora.com/If-its-true-that-black-Americans-are-treated-better-than-black-Africans-in-certain-parts-of-Europe-why-is-that-even-a-thing" \t "_blank" If it's true that black Americans are treated better than black Africans in certain parts of Europe, why is that even a thing?

How did Europeans find black people or even figure out they were people outside of Europe?

HYPERLINK "https://www.quora.com/Why-does-Egypt-believe-if-so-it-is-the-sole-owner-of-the-waters-of-the-Nile-River-Does-Egypt-also-consider-itself-the-owner-of-the-river-bed-and-its-banks-along-the-entire-length-of-the-Nile-River" \t "_blank" Why does Egypt believe (if so) it is the sole owner of the waters of the Nile River? Does Egypt also consider itself the owner of the river bed and its banks along the entire length of the Nile River?

HYPERLINK "https://www.quora.com/profile/Ernest-W-Adams" \t "_blank"

Ernest W. Adams

Originally Answered: Why does Egypt believe (if so) the sole owner of the waters of the Nile River? Does Egypt also consider itself the owner of the river bed and its banks along the entire length of the Nile River?

Egypt does not believe that it is the sole owner of the waters of the Nile, nor its banks and riverbed outside of Egypt. But it doesn't want the flow reduced because it depends on the flow for irrigation and for its rapidly-growing population. Egypt is currently embroiled in an argument with Ethiopia, which wants to build a dam that threatens to reduce the flow.

As it is, the Mediterranean Sea has suffered environmental damage because so much of the water is being drawn off for irrigation, and it e evaporates from the surface of Lake Nasser. The salt level of the sea is rising. Further reductions would only worsen the problem.

Related Links

HYPERLINK "https://www.quora.com/Where-is-the-Nile-river-located-and-what-is-the-importance-of-the-Nile-river" \t "_blank"
Where is the Nile river located and what is the importance of the Nile river?

HYPERLINK "https://www.quora.com/How-did-the-Nile-river-influence-Egyptian-civilization" \t "_blank"
How did the Nile river influence Egyptian civilization?

HYPERLINK "https://www.quora.com/Can-you-suggest-any-reasons-why-the-sources-of-the-Nile-remained-unknown-until-late-in-the-nineteenth-century" \t "_blank"
Can you suggest any reasons why the sources of the Nile remained unknown until late in the nineteenth century?

Why the Nile is considered as a boon for Egypt?
HYPERLINK "https://www.quora.com/Why-does-Egypt-believe-if-so-it-is-the-sole-owner-of-the-waters-of-the-Nile-River-Does-Egypt-also-consider-itself-the-owner-of-the-river-bed-and-its-banks-along-the-entire-length-of-the-Nile-River" \t "_blank"
Why does Egypt believe (if so) it is the sole owner of the waters of the Nile River? Does Egypt also consider itself the owner of the river bed and its banks along the entire length of the Nile River?

What are some interesting facts about the Nile River?
HYPERLINK "https://www.quora.com/Why-havent-the-pyramids-been-fully-explored" \t "_blank"
Why haven't the pyramids been fully explored?

HYPERLINK "https://www.quora.com/profile/Ernest-W-Adams" \t "_blank" Ernest W. Adams child of two archaeologists; grew up on digs. HYPERLINK "https://www.quora.com/Why-havent-the-pyramids-been-fully-explored/answer/Ernest-W-Adams" \t "_blank" 3y

The only way to find additional hidden chambers in the pyramids of Gizeh is to read patterns of cosmic rays passing through them. We’re not allowed to tear them apart. This process does work, however, and recently revealed a chamber we didn’t previously know existed. But it’s enclosed and as far as we can tell, there’s no way in to it.

INCLUDEPICTURE "https://ci4.googleusercontent.com/proxy/VZXCAaesLJ3L5qvCHg0Ak36v-AN6z2Yx3Nt8uxfG9p8xKCpO4k-7pYbfDnF3k8fRPOUFrvT9h0cpyr6gJ19kqswdjsTp21kQM4mfisPjqgegueYCj7hcnlC4OaL4iw=s0-d-e1-ft#https://qph.fs.quoracdn.net/main-qimg-be9eae903f2d7da4744b23a4ca376868-pjlq" * MERGEFORMATINET
It appears that there is a void above the Grand Gallery in the Great Pyramid.

Your question is a little like asking why we haven’t explored all the caves in the world. Some of them simply have no way in.

Related Links

HYPERLINK "https://www.quora.com/The-blocks-at-the-top-of-the-Pyramids-are-much-older-than-the-blocks-at-the-bottom-How-can-this-be" \t "_blank"
The blocks at the top of the Pyramids are much older than the blocks at the bottom. How can this be?

HYPERLINK "https://www.quora.com/Is-it-possible-that-the-ancient-Mayan-pyramids-may-actually-be-older-than-the-ancient-Egyptian-pyramids" \t "_blank"

Is it possible that the ancient Mayan pyramids may actually be older than the ancient Egyptian pyramids?

HYPERLINK "https://www.quora.com/Why-are-ancient-pyramids-so-perfect-although-it-was-built-around-4-000-years-ago" \t "_blank"
Why are ancient pyramids so perfect although it was built around 4,000 years ago?

HYPERLINK "https://www.quora.com/Could-the-Egyptian-pyramids-be-giant-ancient-batteries" \t "_blank"
Could the Egyptian pyramids be giant ancient batteries?

HYPERLINK "https://www.quora.com/What-is-the-evidence-at-the-Egyptian-pyramids-were-built-10-000-years-before-we-believe-they-were" \t "_blank"
What is the evidence at the Egyptian pyramids were built 10,000 years before we believe they were?

HYPERLINK "https://www.quora.com/Are-the-pyramids-10-000+-years-old-as-suggested-in-The-Pyramid-Code-documentary-on-Netflix" \t "_blank"
Are the pyramids 10,000+ years old as suggested in 'The Pyramid Code' documentary

Would Egypt consider retaking control of the Gaza Strip after the 2021 Hamas war with Israel?

Michael Davison

Former Armored Recon Platoon Sgt., 188th Armored (ret.) at Israel Defense Forces (1970–1999) HYPERLINK "https://www.quora.com/Would-Egypt-consider-retaking-control-of-the-Gaza-Strip-after-the-2021-Hamas-war-with-Israel/answer/Michael-Davison-26" \t "_blank" Jun 9

I think all of the members of Egypt's government would prefer to have appendicitis than retake control of the Gaza Strip.

Anwar Sadat made it clear during the negotiations of the Camp David Accords of 1979 that Egypt had no interest in incorporating the Gaza Strip into Egypt.

Since Oslo, Egypt has kept the Rafah border crossing closed far more than it's been open. Last year it was open for a total of 60 days over the entire year.

Related Links

HYPERLINK "https://www.quora.com/Why-wont-Israel-give-back-control-of-the-West-Bank-and-Gaza-Strip-to-Jordan-and-Egypt" \t "_blank" Why won't Israel give back control of the West Bank and Gaza Strip to Jordan and Egypt?

HYPERLINK "https://www.quora.com/Doesnt-Egypt-also-block-its-border-with-Gaza-restricting-movement-of-people-and-goods-Then-why-does-Hamas-fire-rockets-only-at-Israel" \t "_blank" Doesn't Egypt also block its border with Gaza, restricting movement of people and goods? Then why does Hamas fire rockets only at Israel?

HYPERLINK "https://www.quora.com/Israel-and-Egypt-both-blockade-Gaza-so-why-is-the-criticism-so-lopsided-against-Israel-Why-does-Egypt-get-a-free-pass" \t "_blank" Israel and Egypt both blockade Gaza, so why is the criticism so lopsided against Israel? Why does Egypt get a free pass?

HYPERLINK "https://www.quora.com/Why-did-Hamas-attack-Israel-in-May-2021" \t "_blank" Why did Hamas attack Israel in May 2021?

HYPERLINK "https://www.quora.com/Why-does-Israel-allow-Hamas-to-rule-Gaza-Cant-Israel-reoccupy-the-strip-permanently-and-remove-them-from-power" \t "_blank" Why does Israel allow Hamas to rule Gaza? Can't Israel reoccupy the strip permanently and remove them from power?

Why did Israel leave Gaza?

HYPERLINK "https://www.quora.com/What-is-the-economically-poorest-country-you-have-ever-visited" \t "_blank"

What is the economically poorest country you have ever visited?

Originally Answered: HYPERLINK "https://www.quora.com/What-is-the-poorest-country-you-have-ever-visited?no_redirect=1" \t "_blank" What is the poorest country you have ever visited?

HYPERLINK "https://www.quora.com/profile/Vojta-Rod" \t "_blank"
Vojta Rod Studied Media Studies at Metropolitan University Prague (Graduated 2018) HYPERLINK "https://www.quora.com/What-is-the-economically-poorest-country-you-have-ever-visited/answer/Vojta-Rod" \t "_blank" Jan 18

Originally Answered: HYPERLINK "https://www.quora.com/What-is-the-poorest-country-you-have-ever-visited?no_redirect=1" \t "_blank" What is the poorest country you have ever visited?
Egypt

When you live in a five-star hotel, where they pick dry leaves from the bushes every morning, you don't see it. But fortunately I saw a small piece of the land. There are huge social disparities, and when you drive through the outskirts of Cairo or smaller villages, you sometimes see enormous poverty.

It may sounds like a cliché and It isn't any kind of sociology research, but the people looked mostly happy. Which is actually the most important thing.

INCLUDEPICTURE "https://ci5.googleusercontent.com/proxy/cvITP-LGtl85NJj-YJCWDzA41l72icEuYDumBp-uCmXhfnsct7AptdSWRQAsO8HfdLF--0HmcirP7R6euXBbdnvggkDqNrtDcrrA-cUdAFK8WCd3E5oAWDc9hG2lGw=s0-d-e1-ft#https://qph.fs.quoracdn.net/main-qimg-d12bcb0b57e10d2d0b0b8b23676202b5-pjlq" * MERGEFORMATINET

Related Links
HYPERLINK "https://www.quora.com/What-is-the-worst-country-you-have-ever-visited-or-lived-in-And-why" \t "_blank"
What is the worst country you have ever visited or lived in? And why?
HYPERLINK "https://www.quora.com/What-as-a-world-traveler-would-you-say-is-the-nastiest-filthiest-country-or-place-you-have-ever-visited-and-why" \t "_blank"
What (as a world traveler) would you say is the nastiest, filthiest country or place you have ever visited and why?

HYPERLINK "https://www.quora.com/What-countries-have-you-visited-Rank-them-from-best-to-worst" \t "_blank"
What countries have you visited? Rank them from best to worst.
HYPERLINK "https://www.quora.com/Which-country-have-you-visited-that-turned-out-to-be-nothing-like-how-it-is-depicted" \t "_blank"
Which country have you visited that turned out to be nothing like how it is depicted?
HYPERLINK "https://www.quora.com/What-was-the-dirtiest-country-you-ever-visited" \t "_blank"
What was the dirtiest country you ever visited?
HYPERLINK "https://www.quora.com/What-is-the-worlds-most-dangerous-tourist-destination" \t "_blank"
What is the world's most dangerous tourist destination?

HYPERLINK "https://wondersofthepast.quora.com/The-Egyptian-Blue" \t "_top" The Egyptian Blue, HYPERLINK "https://www.quora.com/profile/Alice-Giacomini-2" \t "_blank"
Alice Giacomini
aspiring archeologist HYPERLINK "https://wondersofthepast.quora.com/The-Egyptian-Blue" \t "_blank" 18h Egyptian Blue is the oldest known artificial pigment.

INCLUDEPICTURE "https://qph.fs.quoracdn.net/main-qimg-f80a7e97d5379f6609cd8fa16e0a9c16-lq" * MERGEFORMATINET
The Blue colour has been throughout the history of humanity one of the most quoted, identified by it with royalty and divinity, due to the difficulty of its obtaining.

Blue pigments were used from very old, but later than others such as red, Black, brown, or ochre, easier to get in nature and used already in the art.

But the most quoted blue pigment came from minerals such as lapis, scarce and rare, and therefore very expensive. The largest lapis deposits are located in the Hindukush of Afghanistan, where they are still exploited with procedures very similar to employees more than 3.000 years ago.

The Egyptians cared about those mines large amounts of lapis to obtain the azurite, the dust that provided the blue pigment with which they adorned their artistic works. Its price was so high that even in medieval times still cuadriplicaba the gold.

The Egyptians used it to paint wood, papyri, and canvases, colouring enamels, inlays, and vessels. But especially in the funerary field in masks, statues, and paintings of the graves, as they believed that the blue colour protected the dead from evil in the other life.

The oldest known example of the pigment dates from about 5000 years ago and was found in the painting of a tomb of the reign of ka-Sen, the last Pharaoh of the first dynasty. In the new kingdom, the Egyptian Blue was used abundantly as a pigment being found in statues, paintings of tombs, and sarcophagi.

HYPERLINK "https://wondersofthepast.quora.com/Detail-of-the-famous-hieroglyphic-carving-at-the-Temple-of-Hathor-at-Dendera-in-Egypt" \t "_top" Detail of the famous hieroglyphic carving at the Temple of Hathor at Dendera in Egypt

HYPERLINK "https://www.quora.com/profile/Silvia-Serra-3" \t "_blank"

Silvia Serra

Crazy for ancient artefacts HYPERLINK "https://wondersofthepast.quora.com/Detail-of-the-famous-hieroglyphic-carving-at-the-Temple-of-Hathor-at-Dendera-in-Egypt" \t "_blank" 15h

Definition: The so-called Dendera light is, in fact, an ancient engraving that shows two oval “cartridges” with what seems to be a snake inside each one.

INCLUDEPICTURE "https://qph.fs.quoracdn.net/main-qimg-15c7c6ab5a9ae782a2a5d02a8b09c6eb-lq" * MERGEFORMATINET

The entire illustration is supposedly reminiscent of the inside of present-day incandescent lightbulbs, which has led many people to believe that instead of being a typical set of symbolic images from Egyptian mythology, the odd representation on the temple’s wall could be evidence of advanced ancient technology in ancient Egypt.

INCLUDEPICTURE "https://qph.fs.quoracdn.net/main-qimg-c0e452c0cd577c8fc4dc3307c6b581aa-lq" * MERGEFORMATINET

Mainstream scholars explain that the so-called Dendera light is no more than a djed pillar and a lotus flower spanning a snake inside it. This is a typical representation in Egypt, symbolizing stability and fertility, respectively.

In ancient Egypt, the djed is a symbol of stability and the interpretation of the backbone of the god Osiris.

The snake, which seems to be emerging from the lotus, is believed to be a symbol of fertility, directly linked to the Nile river's annual flooding.

However, instead of this interpretation of the illustration inside the temple, some people have argued that the Temple of Hathor offers conclusive evidence of advanced technology present in ancient Egypt.

Some authors have argued that the Dendera Light is not a mythological illustration but evidence of electricity and light in ancient Egypt.

They argue that the alleged depictions of a lotus flower and a snake are much more similar to devices known today as arc lamps.

Despite the curious illustration at the temple, archeologists have failed to find evidence of anything used to manipulate electricity in Egypt and therefore suggest that this illustration is no more than one of the many mythological depictions of ancient Egypt.

Furthermore, there are no ancient texts in Egypt associated with the use of electricity in ancient Egypt.

Which was the first civilization in Africa, Egypt or Ethiopia?
HYPERLINK "https://www.quora.com/profile/Alexander-Balogun" \t "_blank"
Alexander Balogun
African history Ph.D. HYPERLINK "https://www.quora.com/Which-was-the-first-civilization-in-Africa-Egypt-or-Ethiopia/answer/Alexander-Balogun" \t "_blank" August 5, 2018
None of the mentioned Kingdoms.

Rather the first recordable civilisation in Africa was dated around 9000 BC. The location was in the Nubian desert between South of Egypt and North of Sudan, extending to parts of Southeast Libya.

During the fall of the Ice age 14,000 years ago, the Sahara was a lush land with wildlife and several lake basins. The Nubian desert in south Egypt which is called Nabta Playa, Archaeologists were able to prove that around 9000 BC that they were evidence of prehistoric religion, with a number of sacrificed cattle buried in stone-roofed chambers lined with clay.

The first practice of astronomy in human existence was also traced to the Nubian desert (Nabta Playa)The stone circle dating back to over 9000 years is among the oldest archaeoastronomical devices in human history, designed as a prehistoric calender to mark to mark 2 significant celestial phenomenon-which is associated with the onset of summer rains and the arrangement of stars in the night sky, which was used to guide themselves across the desert.

Archeological findings also proved that it was during the Mesolithic period and the people were from the Halfan culture. The Halfan people had developed an advanced urban community, domesticated animals, established an organized labour force, built structures and most importantly the first ever people recorded to practice astronomy….

Desiccation kicked in, due to Climatic change and the once lush region gradually became a desert forcing it's people to settle along the Nile River. Leaving behind megalithic structures, numerous grave sites and building structures.

HYPERLINK "http://www.ancient-origins.net/ancient-places-africa/nabta-playa-and-ancient-astronomers-nubian-desert-002954" \o "www.ancient-origins.net" \t "_blank" Nabta Playa and the Ancient Astronomers of the Nubian Desert

Some archaeologists believe that the people of Nabta Playa were the precursor civilization for the first Nile cities that arose in that region thousands of years later.

The next civilisation after that was Ta-Seti. Which by 3800 BC was at it's zenith. They were the earliest to have a monarchy system in the Nile valley and they showed the first use of Hieroglyphics even before the founding of ancient Egypt.

HYPERLINK "https://www.nytimes.com/1979/03/01/archives/ancient-nubian-artifacts-yield-evidence-of-earliest-monarchy-clues.html" \o "www.nytimes.com" \t "_blank" Ancient Nubian Artifacts Yield Evidence of Earliest Monarchy Around 3150 BC vassal kingdoms across the Nile united and Ta-Seti became the first administrative region of Upper Egypt.

HYPERLINK "https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Upper_Egypt" \l "List_of_nomes" \o "en.wikipedia.org" \t "_blank" Upper Egypt - Wikipedia Around 3100 BC Upper Egypt marched North and conquered the Delta region, subjugating it culturally and politically. Unifying the South and the North as one political unit…. The Kingdom of Egypt is born.

A lot of scholars don't talk about all these because of reasons best known to them…. Moreso it hurts them to tell the world that the oldest civilisation was from Black Africans.

HYPERLINK "https://www.quora.com/profile/Jhon-Solomon-2" \t "_blank"

Jhon Solomon comments

Lives in Ethiopia (1995-present)

HYPERLINK "https://www.quora.com/Which-was-the-first-civilization-in-Africa-Egypt-or-Ethiopia/answer/Jhon-Solomon-2" \t "_blank" Answered July 14

ETHIOPIA; SINCE ANY ONE CAN THINK, WHY WOULD ANY GROUP WITH MILITARY OR CIVILIZATION TRY TO CONTROL AN ARID DESERT OF EGYPT HAD HE THE POWER TO CONTROL THE SOURCE OF NILE AND ALL THE GREEN FERTILE LANDS IN ETHIOPIA(SOURCE OF BLUE NILE)?WHY WAS ALL THE KINGS IN SUDAN ALWAYS TRYING TO KNOCK OUT THE ONES IN EGYPT; RATHER THAN ETHIOPIA?PLUS DON'T EXPECT MUCH CIVILIZATION TO BE GOT FROM ETHIOPIA WITHOUT GODS MERCY SINCE THE LAND IS ALWAYS RAINY AND IN MANY MONUMENT DESTROY-ABLE OPPORTUNITIES IN HISTORY SINCE THE LAND IS THE MOST STRATEGIC PLACE IN THE WORLD. ONE CAN SEE THIS JUST BY LOOKING AT THE WAY ETHIOPIA IS MADE TO LOOSE ALL ITS WATER BORDERS.plus still there are evidences showing routes of ethiopians to egypt that time

Related Links

HYPERLINK "https://www.quora.com/Ethiopia-was-the-mother-to-ancient-Egypt-Without-Ethiopia-there-never-would-have-been-an-ancient-Egypt-as-we-know-it-Why-isnt-this-acknowledged" \t "_blank"

Ethiopia was the mother to ancient Egypt. Without Ethiopia, there never would have been an ancient Egypt as we know it. Why isn't this acknowledged?

HYPERLINK "https://www.quora.com/Is-Ancient-Ethiopia-older-than-ancient-Egypt-and-ancient-Nubia" \t "_blank"

Is Ancient Ethiopia older than ancient Egypt and ancient Nubia?

HYPERLINK "https://www.quora.com/Taharqa-is-termed-as-the-Black-Pharaoh-of-ancient-Egypt-He-was-from-the-so-called-Ethiopian-dynasty-that-ruled-Egypt-Did-Ethiopians-really-conquer-and-rule-Egypt-in-ancient-times" \t "_blank"

Taharqa is termed as the Black Pharaoh of ancient Egypt. He was from the so-called Ethiopian dynasty that ruled Egypt. Did Ethiopians really conquer and rule Egypt in ancient times?

HYPERLINK "https://www.quora.com/Did-Ethiopia-have-anything-to-do-with-ancient-Egypt" \t "_blank"

Did Ethiopia have anything to do with ancient Egypt?

HYPERLINK "https://www.quora.com/Was-Egypt-once-a-part-of-Ethiopia-or-was-Ethiopia-once-a-part-of-Egypt" \t "_blank"

Was Egypt once a part of Ethiopia, or was Ethiopia once a part of Egypt?

HYPERLINK "https://www.quora.com/How-powerful-was-ancient-Ethiopia" \t "_blank"

How powerful was ancient Ethiopia?

INCLUDEPICTURE "https://ci5.googleusercontent.com/proxy/YlM6Rp_1c-wD-gmpbvEcl5UJ4KMKpEht47McJKzGLZJnvlkDuwbEssLhP-HBrUrh53EA5w-fwKG7MqR-2awUp-N1RdPtTmOjJ_ZZhrG9wfJk-THy7iuJTY_4n5s=s0-d-e1-ft#https://qph.fs.quoracdn.net/main-qimg-35a0e5b350044539582a252d853b7553-lq" * MERGEFORMATINET HYPERLINK "https://www.quora.com/What-do-Europeans-think-about-Francoise-Marie-s-nonsense-that-they-used-erase-and-replace-strategy-against-the-original-black-inhabitants-in-ancient-Europe" \t "_blank"

