ALGERIA

National Flag and Emblem

Locator Map

TEXT HIGHLIGHTS: Diaries updates, key events, brief analysis and relating news articles in timeline.

Overview

Romans identified the original tribes of Algeria as the Berbers.

Former French overseas department (French Colony).

HISSTORICAL BACKGROUND

The Algerian Civil War was a civil war in Algeria fought between the Algerian government and various Islamist rebel groups from 26 December 1991 (following a coup negating an Islamist electoral victory) to 8 February 2002. The war began slowly, as it first appeared the government had successfully crushed the Islamist movement, but armed groups emerged to fight jihad and by 1994, violence had reached such a level that it appeared the government might not be able to withstand it.

By 1996–97, it had become clear that the Islamist resistance had lost its popular support, although fighting continued for several years after. The war has been referred to as 'the dirty war' (la sale guerre), and saw extreme violence and brutality used against civilians.

Islamists targeted journalists, over 70 of whom were killed, and foreigners, over 100 of whom were killed, although it is thought by many that security forces as well as Islamists were involved, as the government had infiltrated the insurgents. Children were widely used, particularly by the rebel groups. Total fatalities have been estimated at 44,000 to between 100,000 and 200,000.

The conflict began in December 1991, when the new and enormously popular Islamic Salvation Front (FIS) party appeared poised to defeat the ruling National Liberation Front (FLN) party in the national parliamentary elections. The elections were canceled after the first round and the military effectively took control of the government, forcing pro-reform president Chadli Bendjedid from office. After the FIS was banned and thousands of its members arrested, Islamist guerrillas rapidly emerged and began an armed campaign against the government and its supporters.

They formed themselves into various armed groups, principally the Islamic Armed Movement (MIA), based primarily in the mountains, and the more hard-line Armed Islamic Group (GIA), based primarily in the towns. The GIA motto was "no agreement, no truce, no dialogue" and it declared war on the FIS in 1994 after the latter had made progress in negotiations with the government. The MIA and various smaller insurgent bands regrouped, becoming the FIS-loyalist Islamic Salvation Army (AIS).

After talks collapsed, elections were held in 1995 and won by the army's candidate, General Liamine Zéroual. The GIA not only fought the AIS but both it and the government began a series of massacres targeting entire neighborhoods or villages which peaked in 1997. The massacre policy caused desertion and splits in the GIA, while the AIS, under attack from both sides, declared a unilateral ceasefire with the government in 1997. In the meantime, the 1997 parliamentary elections were won by a newly created pro-Army party supporting the president.

In 1999, following the election of Abdelaziz Bouteflika as president, violence declined as large numbers of insurgents "repented", taking advantage of a new amnesty law. The remnants of the GIA proper were hunted down over the next two years, and had practically disappeared by 2002, with the exception of a splinter group called the Salafist Group for Preaching and Combat (GSPC),

In 1954 Front de Liberation Nationale (FLN) founded by pan-Algerians

More than a million Algerians were killed in the fight for independence from France in 1962.

Heavily influenced by the cultural impact of Arab civilization.

In 9th August, 1961 Mr. Benyoucef Benkhedda an Algerian politician elected the third GPRA exile government of the FLN acting as a leader during the Algerian war of independence from until 3rd July 1962 the end of the war and the independence agreement that ended the Algerian eight years of terrible conflict, he was briefly the de-jure leader of Algeria until he was sidelined by more conservative FLN figures.

In July, 1962 Algeria's ruling-FLN party and other figures like Abdel-Hamid Mehri former party chief have helped negotiate the Evian treaty, ending the 120 years of French rule in Algeria, then it became an independent state through a popular referendum being held on the 5th of July, 1962, Mr. Ahmed Ben Bella to-become post-independence Algerian head of state and government in an uncontested election from September, 1963 to June, 1965.

Headship since independence: Head of instrumental self-administration

In July, 1963 under a new constitution, Ahmed Ben Bella elected president of Algeria.

In 19th June 1965 President Ahmed Ben Bella was deposed in a putsch led by his government colleague and his former ally in the FLN and the Algerian Defense Army-Colonel Houari Boumedienne, and placed under house arrest.

In 27 December 1978 Colonel Houari Boumedienne died of blood cancer, he was succeeded by a protégé, Colonel Chadly Benjadid.

Colonel Chadli Benjadid was president of Algeria from 1979 to 1992.

A Republic in North Africa.

The history of Algeria has almost always been bound-up with that of its neighbors Morocco, Tunisia and Libya. Algeria's ancient history has been, its successive conquest by Carthage, the Romans, the Vandals, Byzantium, Arabs, and Ottoman Turks and in modern times by France. The independence struggle against France was launched by a popular movement like the Algerian National Liberation Front (FLN) in which it was a guerilla war, it was the primary liberation movement that resulted in the Algerian war of independence and later a leading political party in Algeria, which that existed from 1954 to 1962. Algeria's ruling-FLN party and other figures like Abdel-Hamid Mehri former party chief have helped negotiate the Evian treaty, ending the 120 years of French rule in Algeria, then it became an independent state through a popular referendum being held on the 5th of July, 1962. The truth was that the Algerian situation was indicative of a general pattern of exploitation and coercion that extended throughout the African continent, as European colonial powers sought to ensure control over Africa's natural resources-especially Oil, Copper and Uranium-for the Cold War. The French had to recognize the rights of the people of Algeria to independence and self-determination to put an end to the hostilities and to withdrawal all French troops from Algeria. And this time Mr. Ferhat Abass and others, was acting as an Algerian political leader and briefly acted in provisional capacity as yet -to-become independent country's president from 1958 to 9th August 1961. In Algeria believed there was a large population of white people, or settlers originally from France who did not intend to back to France. The Algerian population there had therefore resorted to violence to try and kick the settlers out.

Mr. Benyoucef Benkhedda was an Algerian politician headed the third GPRA exile government of the FLN acting as a leader during the Algerian war of independence from 9th August, 1961 to 3rd July 1962, the end of the war, he was briefly the de-jure leader of Algeria until he was sidelined by more conservative FLN figures. And Benyoucef Bekhedda to be succeeded by Abdul-Rahman Fares as chairman of the provisional executive council of Algeria from 3rd July 1962 to 20th September 1962. And again Ferhat Abbas as briefly head of State of Algeria from 25 September, 1962 to 15 September, 1963. In 1962 Mr. Ahmed Ben Bella to-become post-independence Algerian prime minister from and head of State in an uncontested election from September, 1963 to June, 1965, and he increasingly turned to direct Algeria toward a socialist path influenced by Marxist ideology began a programme of collective farming, which it proved later a disaster and the Algerian economy to collapse. The Front de Liberation Nationale (FLN) has dominated the Algerian politics ever since, many Algerians in the subsequent generations were not satisfied, however, and moved to counter the FLNs centrality in Algerian politics, Algeria was quietly observed as pro ex-Soviet puppet state in Africa in the late 1960s. President Ahmed Ben Bella Algeria’s first post - independence president, and many fondly hailed him as the father of modern Algerian nation.

President Ahmed Ben Bella was deposed in a putsch led by his government colleague and his former ally in the FLN and the defense Army-Colonel Houari

Boumedienne on the 19th of June, 1965, and placed under house arrest until the 1980s, then he was granted self-exile to France and Switzerland until two years after the death of Colonel Houari Boumedienne of blood cancer who he ousted him in 27 December, 1978.

A colleague, Colonel Chadly Benjadid, succeeded Colonel Houari Boumedienne, he was president of Algeria from 1979 to 1992. As a protégé of Colonel Houari Boumedienne, he quickly advanced within the ranks of FLN, the ruling party to succeed his mentor as its general-secretary in 1979, to become secretary-secretary and later president. During his tenure as head of state, though his attempts to reduce state expenditure were met with increasing popular hostility, this was fuelled by the rise of the Islamic fundamentalism, which became particularly dangerous when he allowed it's articulation in a political party, the Front Islamic du Salut (FIS).

Followed by the surprising first round election victory of the Front Islamic du Salut (FIS) in the first round of multi-party elections, in December, 1991, the balloting spurred the Algerian Army to intervene and postpone the second round of elections to prevent what the secular elite feared would be an extremist-led government from assuming power. President Chadli Benjadid prevented the Islamists at his best from coming to power past the early nineties after the military forced him to resign on the 14th of January 1992 suspending the second round of voting declaring a state of emergency. It is widely to prevent the arrival of the FIS to power is the one reason opened the gates of hell on the country. Then Mr. Mohammed Boudiaf also called back SI Tayeb al-Watanni, one of the co-founders of FLN came to the Algerian political leadership. In February, 1992, after a 27 years of exile in neighboring Morocco, the Algerian military invited him back to become chairman of the high council of State (HCE) of Algeria, a figurehead body of the military junta, following the annulment of the election results. He quickly accepted, and was instantly signed into the post. Publicly, he was presented as a leader exiled for too long to be tainted by the violence and corruption of Algeria's internal post - revolutionary politics, but the downside was that he was little known to most of the Algerian public. However, his calls for comprehensive reform and an end to military domination of politics instilled hope, and he quickly gained popularity, even if many still associated him with the military clique that effectively ruled Algeria in his name. Even as head of State, Mohammed Boudiaf was completely dependent on the forces that had brought him to power, and his powers were circumscribed by the military and security establishment. In addition, the country continued to drift towards civil war, with increasing Islamist violence in the regions surrounding Algiers and brutal military counter-measures both escalating the situation. The political scene remained chaotic, the economy was

Why did Al-Andalus (Islamic Iberia) become completely Arabised and Muslim in only 400 years, whereas North Africa and the Levant took 800 years to be Arabised?

Dimitris Almyrantis

Lover of stories the world has forgotten (2016-present)10mo

That's a good question. Although I see others doubt your premise, I will agree that it is substantially true. Areas of Spain still in Arab hands in the 12th century were substantially Moslem and Arabized, while the same cannot be said to have happened in Egypt, Syria, and Africa until the 15th century at the earliest. The sole part of Africa I'm fairly sure was Arabized at the same pace as Spain was "Africa Minor" itself, modern Tunisia.

Some may rely on the idea of the convivencia, or cohabitation of Christians, Moslems, and Jews in Spain before the forced conversions of 1492, to infer that Al-Andalus was not Arabized. This would be wrong on all counts. To pick the obvious problem, when the Almohades, a radical Berber religious movement, took over Spain in the 12th century, they declared the dhimma ("protection") that had been extended to Christians and Jews after the initial conquest invalid: these all had to accept Islam or flee into exile, on pain of death (and, much as with the Christian 1492 decree, Jews who converted got stuck as hereditary underclass). Throughout the 12th to 15th centuries, it was Christian Spain and Provence that formed the heartlands of Spanish Jewry under the convivencia.

Obviously, Moslem Spain was fully Arabized after that; but more to the point, the abolition of the dhimma was more a symptom than a cause. It's the signal that the Moslem rulers felt secure enough in practical terms—that enough of the tax base, army, and bureaucracy had been Islamized—that this kind of doing away with the remnants of pre-Islamic Spain was practically possible. We can infer Andalusia had already been substantially Arabized, probably from the 11th century (from other evidence). And this must have happened through normal demographic processes, not royal decrees.

So to explain those processes: in places like Spain and Ifriqiya/Tunisia, which also saw substantial Arabization, the new Arab rulers benefitted from a mix of military colonization and a relatively well-organized Roman bureaucracy they could put to work. These areas, moreover, remained under the uninterrupted control of sedentary Arab emirates from the 7th to the 11th century.

By contrast, the bulk of the Maghreb/Africa and Syria, were far from so secure. Most of the Maghreb saw no more than a century of remote Arab suzerainty until the Berber revolt separated it from Damascus, under self-governing Ibadi and Shi'i tribal republics & caliphates. In these, the Berber ethnic element was predominant, and although a kind of Islamic universality remained in place (the founders of the Ibadi republic in Tlemcen, for instance, were of ethnic Persian stock; the Berber Ibadis and Sufris vocally repudiated the element of racial supremacy that had turned them off of Omeyyade Sunnism).

Only renewed tribal movements in the 11th to 14th centuries brought large Arab tribal confederations into the Maghreb, who then became allied with sedentary Berber-Islamic dynasties like the Marinids of Morocco (r. 1248–1465), who set about transforming the country into a state in which the Arab tribes were predominant (even then, Morocco retained powerful Berber groups into the 20th century). Even so, the 14th or 15th centuries are good breaking points to mark the point in which the Berbers retreated into the mountains rather than ruling the plains and cities.

Syria and Egypt are more complicated, since here the internal policy of the three caliphates—Omeyyade, ‘Abbasid, and Fatimite—must be understood. This is (probably) too much for any single answer.

Suffice it to say that after the fall of the Omeyyades, who were themselves not keen on converting the tax-paying dhimmi population, neither Syria nor Egypt were securely controlled by the Baghdad-based caliphate, and the ‘Abbasid dynasty was itself in crisis. The caliphate in Baghdad collapsed in the 860s, and was subsequently unable to exert reliable control outside Mesopotamia, with both Syria and Egypt falling under short-lived Turkish slave dynasties.

The Fatimites were themselves descended from a Berber tribal confederacy of the Maghreb, despite Shi’a Arab leadership, and relied on the Christian rural population to balance out the urban Sunnite Arabs of Egypt. The brief attempt to establish a central dominant culture (Druze-ism, a “universal religion” to which everyone could convert) failed, and actively contributed to the diversity. Add to this that Christian powers—the Franks and Romans—were more powerful than the Moslems in the 10th to 12th centuries, expanding well into Syria and Armenia, and you see why the establishment of an Arab monoculture was not in the cards. Many people likewise forget that another empire, the partially Nestorian-ized (and in foreign policy surely Christian-leaning) Mongols of the Persian Ilkhanate were a factor in the 13th and 14th centuries (these would eventually convert to a form of Islam, but the point remains).

The institutions that actually pushed for the “Arabization” of Egypt and Syria—to a sedentary, Islamic Arabism far removed from Bedu tribal life—were the religious schools (medreses) of Sunnism set up by the Seljuks and propagated by other mamluk-based dynasties in the 13th to 15th centuries. The Mamluk rulers of Cairo in the 14th century faced realistic prospects of a Christian invasion of Egypt from the sea (Catholic Franks) and land (‘Nestorian’ Mongols), and saw the drastic reduction of the Coptic “fifth column” as a necessity.

Related Links

How credible is the estimate that in its height 80% of the people of Al-Andalus were Muslims? Could that be an overestimation mainly based on the bigger and more cosmopolitan cities and their vicinity, but not appliable to the farther rural areas?
How far did the conversion of native Iberians to Islam go in Al-Andalus? How did Iberian Christians manage to turn most of the people in the reconquered territories ferverously Christian even well before the mass expulsions of Muslims and Jews?
Why didn't France colonize Al-Andalus?
What factors led to the decline of Al-Andalus and the rise of Christian Iberia?
Were Muslims of Al-Andalus ethnically Spaniards/Iberians or Arabs? And are the modern day Andalusians related in any way?
Was there mass emigration to northern Iberia during the first generations of Muslim Arab and Berber conquests, in the 8th up to 10th centuries A.D, or did most people stay put and just adapt to the new religious and political rule?
Why are the Arabs who conquered Andalusia called Moors?
Did most Muslims of Al-Andalus stay in the Iberian peninsula and convert to Christanity rather than go into exile? Are most people in the regions that use to be Al-Andalus descended from these converts? Are there any Muslim traditions that persisted?
Why did Islam lose in Spain in 1492 AD after they conquered it in 670 AD?
Were Umayyads and Moors the same people that conquered the Iberian Peninsula?

fraying, and Mr. Mohammed Boudiaf the 7th president of Algeria seemed unable to effectively carry-out the reforms he had promised. On the 29th June 1992 his term as HCE chairman was cut short when he was assassinated by a bodyguard during a televised public speech at the opening of a cultural center in Annaba, on his first visit outside Algiers as head of State, the murder caused intense shock in Algeria, and remains a moment of iconic importance in the country's modern history. The assassin, Lieutenant Lembarek Boumarafi, was said to have acted as a lone gunman due to his Islamist sympathies. He was sentenced to death in a closed trial in 1995, but the sentence was not carried-out. The murder has, unsurprisingly, been subject to significant controversy and a major magnet for Algerian conspiracy theories, with many suggesting that the military establishment responsible for the coup in fact assassinated him. Mr. Boudiaf has gained considerably in political stature after his death, and is now referred to by many political analysts as a martyr for Algeria, with many still arguing that he could have been the country's Savior.

Mr. Ali Hussein Kafi, elected chairman of the High Council of State (HCE), a military backed collective presidency of Algeria from 2nd July, 1992 to January 31st, 1994, he was selected as chairman of the HCE four days after the assassination of Mr. Mohammed Boudiaf. The High Council of State (HCE) was intended as a transitional government in its formation. He was the ninth president of Algeria from 31 January 1994 to 27th April 1999. However, after Mr. Chadli Benjadid was forcibly resigned by the military in January, 1992, his career prospects became more promising, in July 1993, he became minister of defense, in January 1994 he was promoted to Head of the High Council of State. In November 1995, he was elected president, a post which he retained until the next election. Liamine Zeroual was known to be politically dialogist, supporting inter-party negotiated solution to the Algerian civil war. Mr. Liamine Zeroual have been served for brief periods during the time of extreme violence in Algeria. The army began a crack-down on the FIS that spurred FIS supporters to begin attacking government targets. The government later allowed elections featuring pro-government and moderates religious-based parties, but this did not appease the activists, who progressively widened their attacks, the fighting escalated into an insurgency, which saw intense fighting b/n 1992 to 1998 resulting in over hundred thousand deaths, many attributed to indiscriminate massacres of villagers by extremists. The government gained the upper hand by the late 1990s.

The incumbent Mr. Abdel Aziz Bouteflika, with the backing of the military, won the presidency in May, 1999, re-elected to a third term in 2009 after the government successfully amended the constitution in 2008 to remove presidential term limits. The country saw an intense fighting by Islamic insurgents opposing secular rule which resulted in over 100, 000 deaths that brought Algeria to a state of civil war. Inspired by the popular uprisings in Tunisia and Egypt, opposition parties and human rights groups have been staging pro-democracy rallies in the capital, Algiers. Despite a pre-emptive action by the government, to prevent a popular uprising, public discontent with joblessness, poor housing conditions and high food prices sparked rioting in early January, 2011 across the country.

A widespread unrest in Algeria could have implications for the world economy since it's a major Oil & Gas exporter to the world market. Algeria's 19-years old state of emergency law would be revoked within short period of time, that it has been imposed since 1992, ending tight censorship and lifting a ban on political demonstrations, giving way to a complete freedom of expression within the limits of the law as opposition political groups plan for more public protests in the capital, as in the example of Tunisia & Egypt. The Algerian government under President Abdul-Aziz Bouteflika is considering additional measures such as wage - increases, importations of more food items and major reforms in order to appear responsive to the public demands.

Legislators in a strike

More than 60 lawmakers walked out of the inaugural session of parliament in Algeria recently, in protest at alleged fraud in recent elections. The MPs, mostly from an Islamist coalition, waved banners that said "Say 'no' to fraud", before leaving after a roll call of new members. The party claims the polls two weeks ago were fixed in favor of the ruling FLN party and its coalition partners. Algeria was one of the few states in the region to avoid unrest last year. Those who walked out included 49 members of the moderate Green Algeria Alliance (AVV) - who had expected to do well in the polls - and 11 members of smaller parties. "We decided to withdraw from the first session of the National Assembly and protest officially against the results of the ballot," the AVV said in a statement .

Sensing public discontent - This may lead to such a second "Arab Spring."

The president of Algeria Abdul-Aziz Butaflka, sensing something was very wrong, asked a prominent academic and former Minister of Health to go out and get a sense of what popular attitudes are. The professor reported that the people are very unhappy because the centralized economy is mismanaged, there is too much corruption and favoritism in the government, and the government officials are out-of-touch with the Algerian people. All this is nothing new to foreign observers of Algeria but it apparently was surprising to many senior government officials. The report warned of the remaining potential for a violent uprising. This may be avoided by the upcoming parliamentary elections, which will create a legislature whose main chore is to create a new constitution. This is expected to toss out the old elected dictatorship of families who were prominent in the fight against colonial France half a century ago. Many Algerians doubt that the old "revolutionary" families will give up power without a fight. Worse, Islamic political parties, recently made legal again, seem likely to win most of the votes in the April elections. This may lead to a second "Arab Spring."

Algeria: In Day 4 of hostage standoff at Sahara plant

AIN AMENAS, Algeria (AP) — At a recent event, faced with international outrage over the killing of hostages at a sprawling gas plant in the middle of the Sahara desert, Algeria was under pressure to bring an end to a four-day standoff with Islamist extremists that has killed at least 12 captives and left dozens unaccounted for. The standoff has put the spotlight on militancy plaguing the region and al-Qaida-linked groups roaming remote areas from Mali to Libya, threatening vital infrastructure and energy interests. With little official information emerging from the Algerian about why it is taking so long to end the operation near the Libyan border, a freed hostage described the harrowing moments of his escape Saturday. Ruben Andrada, 49, a Filipino civil engineer who works as one of the project management staff for the Japanese company JGC Corp, told The Associated Press that an Algerian helicopter gunship opened fire on vehicles carrying hostages and the gunmen who used them as shields. On Thursday, about 35 hostages were loaded into seven SUVs in a convoy that included 15 militants from the housing complex, Andrada said. The militants placed "an explosive cord" around their necks and were told they would explode if they tried to run away, he said. Later, they were being moved to the gas plant itself when the convoy was chased by army helicopters that fired on the vehicles, he said. "When we left the compound, there was shooting all around," Andrada said. "I closed my eyes. We were going around in the desert. To me, I left it all to fate.

"The gunman behind me was shooting at the gunship and it was very loud. Then we made a sudden left turn and our Land Cruiser fell on the right side where I was. "I was pinned down by the guy next to me. I could hear the helicopter hovering above. I was just waiting for a bullet from the helicopter to hit me." He later saw the blasted remains of other vehicles, and the severed leg of one of the gunmen. Another hostage who survived, an Irish man, reported seeing a severed head from one of the people in the vehicles. Andrada's account closely matches that of the Irishman's. Andrade said their vehicle separated from the convoy and overturned, allowing him and the others inside to escape. He sustained cuts and bruises and was grazed by a bullet on his right elbow.

They were taken to the Alazhar hospital in Algiers. He said the others sustained more serious injuries and were in the intensive care unit. He said the Algerian defense minister came to visit him in the hospital and apologized. An international outcry mounted over the Algerians' handling of the crisis. Experts noted that this is how they have always dealt with terrorists. Algerian authorities gave no clear sign of how many people are still alive or captive at the Ain Amenas plant in southeast Algeria as of Saturday morning. The plant is jointly run by BP, Norway's Statoil and Algeria's state-owned oil company. On Friday, it became clear the Algerian forces had retaken only the living quarters. The hostages and their kidnappers remained ensconced in the refinery. The site of the gas plant spreads out over several hectares (acres), with dozens of buildings, making it especially complicated for the Algerians to secure the site and even find where the hostages are being held. It includes a housing complex and the processing site, about a mile apart. "In between the two you've got a camp. There's a cliff behind the camp. And the accommodation camp itself is a large facility. It would be probably 3/4 mile long and half a mile wide," Andrew Coward, a chemical engineer familiar with the site, told the BBC.

By Friday, around 100 of the 135 foreign workers on the site had been freed, officials said. A website close to the militants said Saturday that a Romanian and a Norwegian hostage were released or found overnight in unclear circumstances, and that seven hostages are still held: two Americans, three Belgians, one Briton and one Japanese. Casualty figures varied widely. The Algerian government says 12 hostages and 18 militants died in a military attack on a convoy of militants Thursday. The militants claimed on the day of the attack that 35 hostages and 15 militants were killed, according to a Mauritanian website, ANI, which is close to the extremists. One American, from Texas, is among the dead, and the militants offered to trade two American hostages for two terrorists behind bars in the U.S., an offer firmly rejected by Washington. Britons, French and Algerians have also died in the standoff. Hundreds of Algerian and foreign workers have been freed. Philippines Foreign Affairs from the gas field and flown to Spain for repatriation to the Philippines. Statoil CEO Helge Lund said Saturday that two more Norwegian workers have escaped from the plant and are safe, leaving six more Norwegians unaccounted for. There were 17 Norwegians at the plant at the time of the attack.

Department spokesman Raul Hernandez said 34 Filipino workers have been evacuated

The attack by the Mali-based Masked Brigade had been in the works for two months, a member of the brigade told the online Mauritanian news outlet. He said militants targeted Algeria because they expected the country to support the international effort to root out extremists in neighboring Mali. Early Wednesday morning, they crept across the border from Libya, 60 miles (100 kilometers) from the natural gas plant, and fell on a pair of buses taking foreign workers to the airport. The buses' military escort drove off the attackers in a blaze of gunfire that sent bullets zinging over the heads of the crouching workers. A Briton and an Algerian, probably a security guard, were killed. Frustrated, the militants turned to the vast gas complex, divided between the workers' living quarters and the refinery itself, and seized hostages, the Algerian government said. The gas flowing to the site was cut off, though the circumstances of the cutoff remain unclear. Several of the former hostages, who arrived haggard-looking on a late-night flight into Algiers on Friday, said that the gunfire began around 5 a.m. and that the militants who stormed the living quarters almost immediately separated out the foreigners. (None of those interviewed would allow their last names to be used, fearing trouble for themselves or their families.) Mohammed, a 37-year-old nurse, said at least five people were shot to death, their bodies still in front of the infirmary when he left Thursday night. Chabane, who worked in food services, said he bolted out the window and was hiding when heard the militants speaking among themselves with Libyan, Egyptian and Tunisian accents. At one point, he said, they caught a Briton. “They threatened him until he called out in English to his friends, telling them, 'Come out, come out. They're not going to kill you. They're looking for the Americans.' A few minutes later, they blew him away," Chabane said. Paul Schemm reported from Rabat, Morocco. Associated Press writers Aomar Ouali in Algiers, Oliver Teves in Manila, Philippines, and Jan M. Olsen in Copenhagen contributed to this report

Abdulaziz Bouteflika's absence leaves Algeria pondering future'

By Aidan Lewis BBC News: June 4, 2013: It is not unusual for Algerian President Abdelaziz Bouteflika to disappear from view. The 76-year-old's health has been a source of rumor for years, and he has often gone weeks or months without making a public appearance. But his prolonged absence after being treated at a military hospital in Paris in late April for a "mini - stroke" has focused attention on whether Algeria might finally be exposed to profound change as power passes to a new generation. It also appears to have quashed recent speculation that Mr. Bouteflika could stand for a fourth term next year, and triggered intense maneuverings over the expected succession. At the same time, however, the state has continued to operate, and observers say real political change, if it comes at all, may come slowly. "We're not in an autocratic system but an authoritarian one, in which the president is just one element, and is far from having all powers concentrated in his hands," says Mohammed Hachemaoui, an Algerian political scientist currently at the German Institute for International and Security Affairs. "So his absence doesn't put the functioning of this regime at risk."

Elder statesman

Algeria is a key regional power - a youthful nation of 36 million that is a major exporter of oil and gas and has become an important ally of the West in the campaign to counter Islamist militancy. It has also remained relatively stable as leaders in its neighbors to the east - Tunisia, Libya and Egypt - were toppled in popular uprisings in 2011. Indeed, Algeria's ruling elite has proved strikingly resilient. The country is led by a man who fought in the war of independence against France and first became a minister in the year that war was won, 1962. The core of the elite has remained essentially intact ever since, through economic and political upheaval in the 1980s, a coup in 1992, and the subsequent conflict in which some 150,000 are believed to have died. Mr. Bouteflika made himself into a symbol of Algeria's ability to overcome, or at least bury the memory of, the worst of that violence.

The youthful foreign minister of a hopeful country in the 1960s and 70s, he returned as an elder statesman in 1999, granting amnesty to many of the Islamist insurgents still fighting the state. The latter part of his presidency has coincided with a dramatic rise in the price of oil, which allowed for generous public spending programmers and subsidies. Mr. Bouteflika consolidated his position in relation to the military. But authority remained diffused within an opaque and factional elite, often referred to in French as "Le Pouvoir", in which unelected officials connected to the military and the intelligence services are the ultimate arbiters of power.

'Illusion of change'

In this system, as a 2009 dispatch from the US embassy published by Wikileaks observed, officials from presidents to customs officers are "designated", rather than being selected transparently. That looks set to continue with Mr. Bouteflika's eventual replacement. While the likely contenders are slightly younger, they are "pure products of the system", says Mr. Hachemaoui. "There will be a generational change, but it won't be a generational change that causes a change of regime. It's an illusion of change." He adds that systemic corruption has made reform harder, and that the government bought itself a temporary reprieve by boosting handouts two years ago.

Big challenges remain, especially if the price or quantity of the oil and gas that Algeria exports drops significantly. There are frequent demonstrations over failings in public services, and central and southern towns saw a series of protests over unemployment and corruption in earlier this year. But there appears to be little appetite "for any kind of showdown", says James McDougall, a modern history tutor and Algeria specialist at the UK's Oxford University. "I think there's a general dissatisfaction, disenchantment, disengagement from politics. There isn't this massive pent-up oppositional energy that there was in Tunisia or Egypt. That has lots and lots of places to express itself in Algeria - in the press, the parties, and in local politicking." Change in Algeria may be subtler, he adds, as the men who monopolized power in the 1990s are replaced by leaders "thinking about where to go, rather than about just holding on to things".

In the longer term, that could herald the possibility of real reform. "We may be coming to the end of a slightly cynical formula the regime has used since the mid-90s - the formula of pre-selecting the winner informally behind the scenes, but then allowing the election to be formally contested by also-rans or by other candidates," says Hugh Roberts, professor of North African and Middle Eastern history at Tufts University in the US. "In which case the question of whether or not Algeria should finally move to genuinely free elections does begin to come onto the agenda. But I don't see it as sufficiently on the agenda at this point to enter into how Bouteflika's successor is chosen."

Possible presidential contenders

Abdelmalek Sellal, 64: Current prime minister, formerly minister of public works. Seen as competent and amiable. Has given updates on President Bouteflika's health

Ali Benflis, 68: Presidential candidate in 2004 and prime minister from 2000-2003. Former rights activist and justice minister who ran the Bouteflika campaign in 1999

Ahmed Benbitour, 67: Reformist former prime minister, who has already declared his candidacy for next year's presidential election. Popular with civil society but lacks political constituency

Ahmed Ouyahia, 60: Served as prime minister three times between 1995 and 2012. Seen as close to the army and tough on security

Accession to power of President Abdelaziz Boutteflika - May 1999 re-elected in 2004 and 2009.

Tentative election calendar - Presidential, April.

Algeria – Timeline Diaries updates and related key notes

July 1962 - Algeria gains independence from France.

Independence

some 250,000 were killed in eight-year independence war

1954: National Liberation Front launches revolt against French rule

1962: Referendum in France backs independence accord

3rd July 1962: Algeria becomes independent

Leader: Ahmed Benbela

Regions (Departments) & Sub-regions

1962-3: Ahmed Benbela Became Algeria's first premier, then president

1963 - Ahmed Ben Bela elected as first president.

1965 – A coup led by Army Colonel Houari Comedienne overthrew President Ahmed Ben Bella, pledges to end corruption.

1965: President Ahmed Benbela is ousted in a military coup, he was detained until 1979

1976 – Colonel Houari Comedienne introduces a new constitution which confirms commitment to socialism and role of the National Liberation Front (FLN) as the sole political party. Islam is recognized as state religion.

1976 December – Houari Comedienne elected president and is instrumental in launching a program of rapid industrialization.

1978 – President Houari Comedienne dies of blood cancer and is replaced by a colleague Colonel Chadli Bendjedid, as the compromise candidate of the military establishment.

1986 - Rising inflation and unemployment, exacerbated by the collapse of oil and gas prices lead to a wave of strikes and violent demonstrations

1988 - Serious rioting against economic conditions.

1989 - The National People's Assembly revokes the ban on new political parties and adopts a new electoral law allowing opposition parties to contest future elections.

1989 - Islamic Salvation Front (FIS) founded and over 20 new parties got licensed.

1990 - The FIS wins 55 per cent of the vote in local elections.

1991 - Government announces parliamentary elections in June 1991 and plans changes to electoral system including restrictions on campaigning in mosques. FIS reacts by calling general strike. State of siege declared, elections postponed. FIS leaders Abas Madani and Ali Belhadj arrested and jailed.

1991 December - In the first round of general elections the FIS wins 188 seats outright, and seems virtually certain to obtain an absolute majority in the second round.

1992 4 January - The National People's Assembly is dissolved by presidential decree and on 11 January President Chadli, apparently under pressure from the military leadership, resigns. A five-member Higher State Council, chaired by Mohamed Boudiaf, takes over.

Street gatherings banned, violent clashes break out on 8 and 9 February between FIS supporters and security forces. A state of emergency is declared, the FIS is ordered to disband and all 411 FIS-controlled local and regional authorities are dissolved.

1992 29 June – President Mohammed Boudiaf assassinated by a member of his bodyguard with alleged Islamist links. Violence increases and the Armed Islamic Group (GIA) emerges as the main group behind these operations.

1994 - Liamine Zeroual, a retired army colonel, is appointed chairman of the Higher State Council.

1995 – Liamine Zeroual wins a five-year term as president of the republic with a comfortable majority.

1996 - Proposed constitutional changes approved in a referendum by over 85 per cent of voters.

1997 - Parliamentary elections won by the newly-created Democratic National Rally, followed by the moderate Islamic party, Movement of Society for Peace.

1998 - President Zeroual announces his intention to cut short his term and hold early presidential elections.

1999 - Former foreign minister Abdelaziz Bouteflika elected as president after all opposition candidates withdraw from race, saying they had received inadequate guarantees of fair and transparent elections.

Algerian ‘Dirty war’: Sparked by dissolution of national assembly in 1992. Islamic militants waged a decade-long campaign of violence. Rights groups say up to 150,000 people were killed. Official report says security forces responsible for 6,000 civilian disappearances 1999 - Referendum approves Bouteflika's law on civil concord, the result of long and largely secret negotiations with the armed wing of the FIS, the Islamic Salvation Army (AIS). Thousands of members of the AIS and other armed groups are pardoned.

July 15, 1999 the violence continues with more than a dozen militants, and several civilians and police killed as government forces went after militant groups that have refused the government amnesty offer.

With some of the smaller militant groups accepting the government's pardon offer, and 2,300 non-violent Islamic extremist prisoners freed in an amnesty, many of the militants refused to give up and continued the violence. Some ten or twelve people a week were now dying in the violence.

In early July, fifteen of the smaller militant groups agreed to turn in their arms in exchange for pardons. But the violence continued, with ten people killed in the first week of July.

July 18, 1999 the government policy of amnesty, and aggressive searches for still defiant militants has finally reduced the level of violence. But over three hundred people have died in the last three months. This was a drop from the thousand who died in the first four months of the year.

July 19, 1999 the government proposes to allow the religious parties to operate openly once more.

July 21, 1999 GIA terrorists killed sixteen people a hundred kilometers south of Algiers, showing that, while the other Islamic parties are willing to settle with the government, the GIA is not.

July 22, 1999 in the last two days, government security forces have killed eight terrorists. This ends a period of relative calm in which terrorist killings were way down.

July 27, 1999 Iran denounced Algerian talks with Israel. This could escalate to Iranian aid for Islamic fundamentalists in Algeria. Five people were killed and three injured in continuing battles with Islamic fundamentalists.

July 28, 1999: Palestinian fundamentalist groups joined Iran in denouncing Algerian talks with Israel. Some Palestinian fundamentalists have been receiving military training from Iran.

August 1, 1999 the government announced that a referendum would be held on September 16 on the issue of amnesty for atrocities committed by Islamic fundamentalists.

August 2, 1999 Terrorists killed ten and injured five soldiers in a bomb attack 430 kilometers southeast of Algiers. In the past week, 21 have died and eleven injured in combat between government forces and fundamentalists.

August 5, 1999 a terrorist bomb exploded in Hassi Bah Bah, 270 kilometers south of Algiers. Six were killed and 61 injured.

August 7, 1999 a terrorist bomb exploded in Boufarik, 25 kilometers south of Algiers. One was killed and 18 injured.

August 10, 1999 Islamic fundamentalists have increased their attacks, with several people being killed each day. Guns, bombs and knives are being used, but there have not been any of the massacres.

August 11, 1999 Islamic fundamentalists attacked an army camp, and when reinforcements showed up, they were ambushed with several bombs. Eight soldiers were killed and several more wounded. An unknown number of fundamentalists were also injured. There were two other attacks on army bases, leaving a total of ten soldiers dead and 13 wounded. Bombs have become a favorite weapon of the fundamentalists.

August 12, 1999 Islamic fundamentalists killed four more soldiers in a bomb attack.

August 15, 1999 Islamic fundamentalists have been setting off one or two bombs a day, largely against civilian targets.

August 16: Bomb and gun attacks by Islamic fundamentalists killed nine people and injured four in several incidents. In the first half of August, some one hundred people have been killed, and 150 injured in Islamic fundamentalist attacks. Most of the victims have been civilians, with only 27 soldiers killed.

August 18: six more were killed and one injured in bomb and shooting attacks. Abdelmadjid Dichou, emir of the Salafist Group for the Gospel and the Struggle (GSPC), was assassinated by members of his group during an internal power struggle. The former leader of the group, Hassan Hattab, is now back in charge.

August 21, 1999 a terrorist bombing attack killed 14 and wounded many others.

August 22, 1999 Seventeen civilians were killed in one terrorist attack on a social gathering.

August 23, 1999 in several attacks, 21 have been killed. Two were policemen, and eight were Islamic terrorists.

August 25, 1999 six civilians and one terrorist were killed in several encounters. Moroccan security forces are holding, in secret, a nine man Islamic terrorist group responsible for at least 29 deaths in Algeria this month. They were caught a few hours after one of their operations on August 15th. It's unusual to capture an entire group, and questioning of them apparently revealed that they operated out of a base in Morocco. This led to Algeria accusing Morocco of knowingly harboring terrorists. Morocco denied the charge, but has not yet turned the group over to Algerian authorities.

August 26, 1999 four civilians were killed and sixteen injured when Islamic fundamentalists bombed a bus.

August 28, 1999 four civilians were killed and seven injured in an attack by Islamic fundamentalists on women praying for peace at a mausoleum (which the fundamentalists consider un-Islamic.).

August 30, 1999 four civilians were killed and nine injured in several attacks by Islamic fundamentalists. Nearly two hundred people have been killed by terrorists in August. Meanwhile, fighting continues within the fundamentalist organizations as hardliners terrorize less bloody minded members. The police found the body of an imam, and seven members of GSPC (Salafist Group for Preaching and Combat). The religious leader and six GSPC members had appealed to their leader to stop the terror. All were killed for their lack of fighting spirit.

September 2, 1999 six more people were killed and several injured in numerous attacks by Islamic fundamentalists.

September 5, 1999 ten policemen and four fundamentalists were killed in two incidents.

September 6, 1999 over the weekend, Islamic fundamentalists killed eighteen people.

September 9, 1999 in anticipation of the amnesty referendum, 53 armed Islamic fundamentalists turned themselves in in a rural area 380 kilometers south of the capital.

September 10, 1999 seven members of a family, the two parents and five children, were killed by Islamic fundamentalists in a town 300 kilometers south of the capital.

September 11, 1999 in the last few day, sixteen people were killed by Islamic fundamentalists, who are trying to derail a referendum on amnesty for terrorists who turn themselves in. Such fundamentalist terrorists have killed over 250 people in the last six weeks.

September 16, 1999 the vote on Amnesty for Moslem terrorists is held.

September 18, 1999 the government announced that Islamic militants had four months to take advantage of the amnesty. After that time, the government will go after them with great vigor.

September 19, 1999 Terrorists killed four people, in two separate attacks.

September 20, 1999 The Algerian government, fearful of a UN intervention, have denounced recent UN announcements about how traditional notions of sovereignty may have to be dispensed with when fundamental rights of people were at stake. Meanwhile, police clashed with fifty militants, killing seventeen 360 kilometers southwest of the capital. Border guards seized 97 pounds of explosives that was being smuggled into the country from Morocco.

September 21, 1999 only a few hundred Islamic fundamentalists have turned themselves in to take advantage of the amnesty approved by the voters on September 16. That vote saw 85 percent of the eligible voters cast a ballot, and 99 percent voted for the amnesty, the problem may be that there is no amnesty for those who committed "blood crimes" (murder or mutilation) or rape. Those that have committed these crimes are most likely fearsome enough to keep many of those eligible for amnesty from seeking it. There have already been incidents of militants with blood on their hands killing their less enthusiastic brethren. Apparently the hard core will require more than an amnesty to root them out. But the leaders of some of the Islamic political groups are behind the amnesty. The AIS has given the government a list of 7,000 members they want amnestied. But the hard line GIA and GSPC, with 5,000-7,000 members, have refused the amnesty. Some of their members will quit, but the bloodshed will continue Terrorists have killed over 250 since August 1, when the referendum vote was announced.

September 23, 1999 Islamic terrorists of the hard line GIA killed two former members of their organization at a wedding.

September 28, 1999 two police commanders and a civilian were killed by a terrorist bomb.

September 29, 1999 eight were killed and four wounded by Islamic fundamentalist terrorists in two separate incidents.

October 7, 1999 Terrorists bombed the Trans med pipeline that carries natural gas from Algeria to Italy. This is the third time the pipeline has been bombed since the conflict between the government and Islamic fundamentalists began in 1992.

October 8, 1999 in five attacks over the last two days, sixteen people were killed by Islamic extremists.

October 10, 1999 in three different operations, police killed six Islamic extremists. Most members (about 70) of a faction of the GIA have surrendered. A total of 549 members of GIA have taken advantage of the amnesty and surrendered.

October 17, 1999 five civilians were injured by an extremist bomb 300 kilometers south of the capital. The bodies of two shepherds killed by extremists were found 260 kilometers southwest of the capital. An extremist was killed by police 50 kilometers south of the capital.

October 19, 1999 one of the Islamic extremist groups (the AIS) that had agreed to surrender in June is talking about changing its mind and resuming terrorism against civilians and government officials. The larger GIA has never agreed to surrender and is responsible for most of the terrorism this year.

October 21, 1999 nine shepherds were ambushed and killed, and three were kidnapped, by Islamic extremists 100 kilometers south of the capital. Another shepherd was killed 300 kilometers southwest of the capital. In other actions, three extremists were killed and three people were killed by a bomb.

October 24, 1999 Six Moslem extremists were killed during an army sweep 350 kilometers west of the capital.

October 25, 1999 Weekend violence killed two people and injured five. One of the dead was a pro-government man who had fought the extremists for years. The other dead was a Moslem extremist who drew a gun on an army patrol. The injured were in a truck that was blown up by a bomb 400 kilometers south of the capital.

October 29, 1999 the government is beginning to attract foreign investors and firms to return to Algeria. Human rights groups have also been invited to come and observe the government's efforts to protect the population.

October 30, 1999 Several Moslem extremist attacks have left twelve civilians dead and several kidnapped. The extremists have taken to kidnapping to raise money. There have also been more incidents of extremists setting up roadblocks and then robbing people who happen by, rather than simply killing them. Some 43 people have died from the extremist violence in the past week.

October 31, 1999 Moslem extremist attacks killed two policemen and two civilians in several incidents.

November 1, 1999 over the weekend, Moslem extremist attacks left nine dead, including five civilians and four Moslem extremists.

November 7, 1999 three army officers were shot dead, and five others injured, in a restaurant by Moslem extremists in eastern Algeria. Some 240 kilometers southwest of the capital, two police and one extremist were killed in a shootout.

November 16, 1999 Islamic extremists killed 19 people, including eleven from one family, 200 kilometers west of the capital.

November 19, 1999 at a bogus checkpoint 50 kilometers south of the capital, extremists killed twenty people.

November 22, 1999 an unidentified assassin killed the number three man in the largest Islamic fundamentalist organization: the FIS (Islamic Salvation Front). Most likely culprits are the fundamentalist hardliners who do not want to make peace with the government, as the FIS has. Islamic extremists killed three more people in two incidents. It was announced that "recently," nine soldiers were injured when a bomb exploded. Algeria will have to suppress the hard line extremists without antagonizing more of the citizenry if peace is to return to the country.

November 23, 1999 Iran, long seen as a supporter of the Islamic fundamentalism in Algeria, condemned the assassination of FIS leader Abd-el-Kader Hachan.

November 25, 1999 A hundred leading Moslems issued an open letter to the president, asking him to seek a peaceful settlement with the FIS (the major fundamentalist organization that has been negotiating with the government, but has a hard line faction that backs continued terrorism and assassination of moderate FIS members.)

November 29, 1999 Moslem extremists increased their terrorism over the weekend, killing 27 and injuring ten. So far this month, Moslem terrorists have killed 150 people in an attempt to derail the government peace plan. The terrorists have lost most popular support for their Moslem fundamentalist cause, but the fundamentalists' hard core shows no sign of giving up their cause, or their methods.

December 1, 1999 a bomb went off at a military outpost 80 kilometers south of the capital. Ten soldiers were killed. Moslem extremists have been active in the area and are the prime suspects.

December 3, 1999 Four hundred miles south of the capital, eleven members of a nomad family were killed, apparently by Moslem extremist.

December 4, 1999 the army used artillery to demolish a house Moslem extremists were holding out in. All sixteen inside the building were killed.

There was a day long siege, but the extremists refused to consider surrender.

December 5, 1999 Moslem terrorists killed two people in several incidents.

December 7, 1999 Moslem terrorists killed seven and injured sixteen people in several incidents.

December 12, 1999 Moslem terrorists killed twelve people, the first such incident since the start of Ramadan.

December 14, 1999 Moslem terrorists killed eleven people and kidnapped four others 950 kilometers southwest of the capital.

December 17, 1999 Moslem terrorists killed fifteen people as they left a Mosque after evening prayers.

December 19, 1999 Members of the AIS, one of the smaller Moslem terror groups that accepted the government amnesty, have begun to return to their families after years of living in remote camps.

December 25, 1999 in the last three days, Moslem terrorists have killed some fifty people in several incidents.

January 2, 2000 in the last week, Islamic terrorists have killed seven and wounded several others. Over 150 people have died during the holy month of Ramadan.

January 3, 2000 AIS rebels are halting their demobilization because they feel that the army is not honoring the government's amnesty offer. Two bombings left three dead and five injured.

January 4, 2000 Terrorists killed seven people 80 kilometers south of the capital.

January 5, 2000 Terrorist violence continues, with seven dead and 14 wounded in an attack 50 kilometers west of the capital. Meanwhile, the government is negotiating with AIS rebels to reach a peace accord...

January 6, 2000 GIF terrorists clashed with army troops, leaving six soldiers dead. The leader of the GIF, Anta Zouabri, was spotted with the terrorists.

Top 24 Richest And Poorest Countries Of Africa – 2020 Edition

By Stephanie Rheingold Last updated Oct 23, 2021

Algeria

Credit: Wikipeida

Algeria bases most of its economy on fossil fuels and gas. In fact, 95% of Algeria's exports are based on its advanced fuel and gas industry. With a GDP of $183.69 billion and per capita GDP of $4,229.78, Algeria is one of the five richest countries in Africa.

> Due to its newfound possibilities in recent years, Algeria has been leaning towards sustainable development to create more jobs and ease the housing shortages it faces. The Algerian economy also offers a host of other sectors that show some promise in putting the country's economy in a respectable position. These sectors include agriculture, fishing, banking, and tourism. Hydrocarbon, one of the country's leading sector that accounted for 34.2% of its total GDP, is now plummeting to less than 19%, driving to overall GDP growth to 2.3%. While fiscal and current account deficits are on the rise, 7.9% and 12.6% of the country's GDP, respectively, during 2019. Compared to 7.0% and 9.6% during 2018.
>
> Nominal GDP Rank: #4
> Nominal GDP Per Capita Rank: #9

January 9, 2000 several attacks by Moslem terrorists left three terrorists and three civilians dead.

January 11, 2000 Moslem terrorists killed two and injured four civilians in several attacks.

January 13, 2000 the army has deployed to areas known to harbor terrorist hideouts in anticipation of surrenders, or renewed attacks. The government amnesty offer expires tonight. All but the GIA terrorist organization have accepted the government offer. The amnesty plan includes a government offensive against groups that do not surrender, and that operations will begin in the next few days.

January 14, 2000 the deadline for terrorists to accept the government amnesty has passed. Only the largest terrorist organization, the GIA, has refused to accept. Smaller groups, like the AIS and LIDD have accepted and their members have been leaving their hideouts and turning themselves in.

January 16, 2000 the leader of rebel group AIS, Madame Mezrag, was shot and wounded by one of his subordinates in a dispute over accepting the government amnesty. The assailant was killed by one of Mezrag's bodyguards. The dispute was over how the AIS treasury would be distributed to AIS members after the AIS surrendered.

January 18, 2000 Over 4,000 Moslem extremists have accepted the government amnesty and surrendered.

January 19, 2000 the army has held off moving against the GSPC rebel group while last minute negotiations continue.

January 21, 2000 some 80 percent of Moslem extremist rebels have accepted the government amnesty offer and surrendered. The army is beginning to move against the rebels that did not surrender.

January 22, 2000 in the last two days, 17 rebels were killed in several clashes with troops.

January 23, 2000 Troops moved to round up rebels who refused the government amnesty, resulting in 25 soldiers and 14 rebels killed.

January 24, 2000 the government drive against Moslem terrorist who refused to accept the amnesty has killed about a hundred people so far. This includes 20 civilians and 30 police.

January 26, 2000 in a village 440 kilometers west of the capital, one villager was killed and several injured by Moslem terrorists. In the last week, the government has killed 49 Moslem terrorists and arrested 22.

January 27, 2000 Moslem rebels ambushed and killed four soldiers. The bodies of three civilians were found, they had been kidnapped by rebels a few days earlier.

January 29, 2000 Security forces 400 kilometers west of the capital attacked a rebel group, killing four while the rest escaped.

January 30, 2000 it was announced today that the former head of the Moslem extremist group GIA was killed by members of the still rebellious LIDD (Islamic League of Daawa and Jihad.) The LIDD publicly admitted to the July 16 assassination. The LIDD have technically declared a ceasefire in 1997, but have still been active. The LIDD was one of the groups to accept amnesty (on January 13.)

January 31, 2000 over the weekend, 22 (or more) people were killed in several clashes. Most of the dead were a dozen village guards in the southeast.

February 1, 2000 Seven Moslem rebels and two soldiers were killed in several clashes 400 kilometers south of the capital.

February 2, 2000 several thousand members of the AIS rebel movement have returned to their homes, taking advantage of the government amnesty.

February 7, 2000 a weekend of terrorist violence left 26 terrorists and one soldier dead. Most were killed in an army attack on a terrorist base area 440 kilometers southwest of the capital.

February 15, 2000 Terrorists ambushed a bus west of the capital, killing fourteen and wounding some two dozen more. Terrorists have killed some 75 people in the last week. Most were civilians, although three were soldiers and 26 terrorists. Since the government amnesty expired on January 16, over 215 people have died, including about 80 of them terrorists. The government has been attempting to clear out terrorist base areas, but the terrorists have stepped up their attacks on civilians.

February 20, 2000 the government estimates that the eight year struggle with Moslem terrorists cost the nation some $20 billion. Much of this was from destruction of schools. Some 800 schools were partially or completely burned. Also, 156 of the 1,541 municipal buildings in the nation were forced to close down. At least 2,850 homes and 1,040 commercial buildings were destroyed. Worst of all, over 100,000 people died.

February 25, 2000 six shepherds were killed by terrorists 160 kilometers west of the capital, Algiers.

February 27, 2000 four teenage girls and a police commander were killed by terrorists.

February 29, 2000 a weekend of terrorist violence has left twenty civilians dead, including a dozen children. Nine terrorists were killed as well.

March 2, 2000 in the last several days, terrorist violence killed thirteen civilians. The army has increased operations to take down terrorists and their base camps. So far this year, over 300 have died, a third of them terrorists and most of the rest civilians.

March 7, 2000 six terrorists were killed, and two soldiers wounded, in a clash 450 kilometers west of the capital.

March 8, 2000 Terrorists killed ten people, including one policeman, in several attacks.

March 13, 2000 a weekend of terrorist violence left three dead and 14 wounded. Two of the incidents involved bombs, one of which was left in a nursery. Among the dead were one policeman and one terrorist.

March 15, 2000 Algerian President (and Minister of Defense) Abdulaziz Bouteflika has suddenly dismissed nine senior officers and reassigned seven others. The nine dismissed officers include five of the six military region chiefs and the commanders of the presidential guard, navy, reserve, and gendarmerie. No reason was given for the move, and three key officers (Chief of Staff Lamari and the heads of military intelligence and counter-intelligence) kept their jobs.--Stephen V Cole

March 16, 2000 in several incidents, rebels killed 11 civilians.

March 18, 2000 the government denied asking Israel for assistance in providing security for senior government officials. Meanwhile, in several incidents, rebels killed 19 civilians.

March 19, 2000 Army attacks on rebel bases 500 kilometers south of the capital have killed 16 rebels in the past few days.

March 22, 2000 in what locals described as a rebel bombing, a large explosion damaged a gas pipeline north of the capital. Gas deliveries were interrupted. In other attacks, rebels killed four militiamen and three civilians.

March 23, 2000 in several incidents, rebels killed five policemen and a civilian and wounding four others.

March 24, 2000 Army and police attacked a rebel base70 kilometers east of the capital, killing 14 people. Elsewhere, three civilians were killed by a bomb. Since the amnesty offer expired on January 13, at least 470 have died.

March 30, 2000 Terrorist violence left one soldier, one rebel and four civilians dead.

April 1, 2000 one rebel was killed by an army patrol in the east. The US State Department warned American citizens to avoid travel to Algeria.

April 3, 2000 Troops pursuing rebels 440 kilometers southwest of the capital killed five while losing six soldiers.

April 5, 2000 a bomb went off in a market in the northwest, killing two and injuring seven.

April 8, 2000 in the past few days, 27 civilians were killed by rebels. Among them were 13 shepherds, who are a particular target of the rebels as the shepherds are suspected of reporting rebel movements they spot.

April 12, 2000 in separate attacks, three soldiers and three shepherds were killed by rebels.

April 15, 2000 in several other rebel attacks, twelve were killed and half a dozen injured.

March 16, 2000 in several incidents, rebels killed 11 civilians.

April 17, 2000 a weekend of rebel violence left seven people injured, including four soldiers.

April 19, 2000 Rebel violence killed three and injured four, including one militiaman.

April 22, 2000 a bomb exploded in a town 50 kilometers south of the capital, minutes after the agriculture minister left the scene. One man was injured. The town is near a rebel stronghold.

April 23, 2000 over the past few days, 19 have been killed in rebel related violence. Six rebels died six civilians and a seven man customs officer patrol (which may have been due to a clash with smugglers, not rebels.)

April 24, 2000 over the weekend, two soldiers and one policeman were killed by rebels.

April 27, 2000 in the last few days, 18 rebels and nine civilians have been killed.

May 3, 2000 Rebels attacked a bus 80 kilometers south of the capital, killing 19 and injuring 26. A fake roadblock was used to stop the bus.

May 4, 2000 Rebels killed 23 near the capital using a fake roadblock.

May 7, 2000 Rebels murdered nine people, including eight children. The children were kidnapped May 1, and their father sought to find them. He was killed as well.

May 9, 2000 Rebels ambushed army troops, killing four and injuring five.

May 10, 2000 Rebels killed one policeman and seven civilians, and injured eight more in several incidents. The government vowed to pursue rebels until all were caught or killed.

May 11, 2000 five police, six rebels and one civilian were killed in several incidents.

May 13, 2000 Rebels killed six at a fake roadblock. One was killed and three injured in several other attacks.

May 16, 2000 seven people died and several more were injured in rebel attacks.

May 17, 2000 in several incidents, ten rebels, a soldier and a militiaman were killed.

May 20, 2000 in the last three days, conflict with the rebels have left fifteen people dead, including three soldiers. Several more were injured, including one soldier.

May 21, 2000 in the last few days, six soldiers, three rebels and two civilians were killed.

May 24, 2000 Rebels killed four civilians and wounded two in several attacks near the capital.

May 25, 2000 a rebel ambush south of the capital left seven soldiers dead and three wounded.

May 28, 2000 Rebel attacks killed twelve civilians.

May 31, 2000 Rebel attacks killed four soldiers and two civilians. Seven others were wounded.

June 1, 2000 Operations against rebels left thirteen rebels dead, while rebel attacks killed three civilians.

June 3, 2000 several attacks by rebels left nine civilians dead and 15 soldiers wounded in the last two days.

June 4, 2000 Rebel attacks and army operations left seven dead and twenty wounded. Two of the dead and all of the wounded were soldiers.

June 6, 2000 in the last two days, in several incidents, ten rebels were killed and three wounded. Another was captured. Three civilians were killed and several soldiers injured.

June 11, 2000 in several incidents, one rebel and one solider were killed, as well as civilians. Five others were injured.

June 12, 2000 Rebels set up a roadblock east of the capital and killed four people in a van that came their way.

June 13, 2000 Rebels killed three civilians 300 kilometers east of the capital. These murders were apparently directed at former rebels who had made peace with the government.

June 16, 2000 a bomb in a town 380 kilometers southwest of the capital killed thirteen and injured 42 others.

June 19, 2000 over the weekend, two civilians and two police were killed by rebel action, fifteen others were wounded.

June 21, 2000 in two incidents, rebels killed ten civilians and injured several others.

June 28, 2000 in two attacks, rebels killed four civilians.

July 2, 2000 in two operations, troops killed 17 rebels.

July 3, 2000 Rebels attacked south of the capital, killing eight civilians and wounding three.

July 5, 2000 in two attacks near the capital, rebels killed 14 civilians.

July 6, 2000 twenty rebels attacked a village 300 kilometers west of the capital, killing eleven civilians.

July 8, 2000 Two days of rebel violence left eight dead and 13 injured.

July 10, 2000 a weekend of rebel violence left 26 civilians dead.

July 12, 2000 six civilian campers will killed by rebels. An army truck was ambushed by rebels 600 kilometers east of the capital, leaving seven soldiers dead and two wounded. Since January, 1,200 civilians have been slaughtered by rebels, while 200 rebels have been killed. During the amnesty period from last April to this January, 900 civilians were slain. Over 100,000 people have been killed in the violence since 1992.

July 13, 2000 six soldiers were killed by rebels.

July 17, 2000 in several incidents over the weekend, rebels killed eight soldiers, three policemen and a militiaman. There are also reports that some of the rebels who took advantage of the amnesty are covertly helping the rebels who are still active. In the last few weeks, over 180 people have been killed. Most were civilians, but 30 rebels died as well.

July 18, 2000 Rebels killed six civilians south of the capital. Two of the victims were children, which is common in these attacks. The rebels often target families, and kill men, women and children. The increase in rebel attacks over the last few months shows that the rebels have not only survived the army's campaign against them, but have also gotten stronger. The government has not announced any plans for dealing with this situation.

July 22, 2000 Rebel attacks in the last four days have left 31 (mostly civilians) dead.

July 23, 2000 Army troops, backed by artillery, continue to attack rebel hideouts in the mountains 160 kilometers east of the capital.

July 24, 2000 in several attacks, a militiaman was killed and two others wounded by rebel attacks on villages they were guarding. The militia, or "village guard" are armed volunteers who protect many areas from rebel raids.

July 28, 2000 Rebels killed eight civilians and wounded six others.

July 29, 2000 Rebels killed five civilians.

July 31, 2000 over the weekend, rebel violence killed another four peopl e. Some three hundred people were killed by rebel violence in July, the biggest one month total in over a year. In the last seven years, over 100,000 have died an average of some 1,200 a month.

August 4, 2000 Rebel violence killed nine, including a bombing. The rebels have been using bombs more of late, rather than guns and knives. In order not to draw the attention of local troops or militia, the rebels often slit the throats of their victims.

August 6, 2000 in the last two days, rebel violence left five civilians and three rebels dead. One of the rebels was killed when militiamen fought off an attack, although three militiamen were injured.

August 8, 2000 an army operation killed five rebels, and wounded three others. Three civilians were killed in several other rebel attacks.

August 15, 2000 over the weekend, rebel violence left two children, one militiaman, one policeman and two rebels dead. In the last ten days, police also found and defused ten bombs.

August 16, 2000 Rebel violence left four dead and three injured. So far this month, 38 people have died from rebel activity. Sixteen of the dead were rebels.

The army has increased its hunt for particularly violent rebels and this tactic has proven successful.

August 18, 2000 a battle rebels 160 kilometers west of the capital left 25 rebels and nine soldiers dead. In two other incidents, two rebels and three soldiers were killed.

August 23, 2000 Local villagers alerted the army that a group of rebels were hiding nearby. The army attacked and seven rebels died.

August 24, 2000 Rebels attacked a police post in the north, leaving three police and one rebel dead.

August 26, 2000 a dispute over economic policy among senior government officials has caused many senior ministers to resign. Now appointments will be made, but the tensions remain over privatization and general policy.

August 28, 2000 two rebel bombs wounded four civilians and a civilian. A local newspaper said that rebel bombs were killing or injuring up to ten people a day.

August 30, 2000 in three attacks, rebels killed one and wounded five in several attacks.

September 4, 2000 Fifty kilometers south of the capital, rebels wearing army uniforms killed two civilians and wounded three.

September 5, 2000 in four attacks, rebels killed five civilians and wounded six. Some of the victims were members of government militias armed to guard against rebel attacks.

September 6, 2000 a leader of the GSPC rebel group was killed by troops 120 kilometers southeast of the capital. The GSPC is a splinter group of the larger GIA.

September 7, 2000 Rebels broke into a house 160 kilometers west of the capital, killing four members of a family. One son escaped.

September 9, 2000 Rebels violence left one rebel and one former rebel (who surrendered and was later released by police) dead, and two militiamen wounded. Iran and Algeria re-established diplomatic relations after seven years of strained relations. This eliminates another source of support for Islamic rebels in Algeria.

September 10, 2000 Rebels killed three farmers 390 kilometers west of the capital.

September 17, 2000 in several incidents of rebel violence, eleven were killed. The dead included one soldier and ten rebels.

September 19, 2000 in several incidents of rebel violence, eleven were killed. The dead included one soldier and five rebels. The government says that 5,500 rebels accepted the amnesty offer (that expired on January 19 of this year.)

September 21, 2000 in several incidents of rebel violence, thirteen were killed and six wounded. The dead included three soldiers and two rebels.

September 23, 2000 in several incidents of rebel violence, one civilian was killed and one policeman wounded.

September 24, 2000 Rebel attacks in the rich farmland villages outside the capital killed at least 40 in the past few days. This area has long been a stronghold of the GIA rebels.

September 30, 2000 in the last two days, several rebel attacks killed fifteen and wounded five. These included eight militiamen and one soldiers dead. One rebel was killed and another wounded.

October 2, 2000 The Algerian government has arrested 25 military officers (including two colonels) who were plotting a military coup. Some of the officers were linked to the Free Officers' Movement, which bases its political activities in Spain.--Stephen V Cole

October 3, 2000 Rebels raided a farm 120 kilometers west of the capital and killed an entire family of 14, including six women and four children.

October 5, 2000 in several attacks, rebels killed a dozen soldiers and wounded six others.

October 9, 2000 in two attacks, rebels killed eight shepherds and kidnapped two young girls.

October 11, 2000 Rebel violence left 24 dead, including 13 rebels and three soldiers.

October 12, 2000 Rebels ambushed an army patrol, leaving one soldier and one rebel leader dead.

October 14, 2000 Rebel attacks killed fourteen and wounded ten. Three of the dead and seven of the wounded were soldiers. The two rebel groups responsible for the attacks are GIA and GSPC. Some of these rebels are still surrendering, but the remaining hard core is becoming even more active. Rebel violence has killed 80 people so far this month.

October 15, 2000 Rebels killed eighteen, and abducted two young girls.

October 18, 2000 Rebel violence increases, with 24 dead, including nine rebels. Twelve of the victims were from one family, including five young children. The killers used axes.

October 22, 2000 continued violence left seven rebels, two civilians and one policeman dead. A woman was kidnapped: her husband was one of those killed today.

October 23, 2000 Army sweeps against rebels left eight rebels dead.

October 25, 2000 Rebel violence left three soldiers and a policeman dead.

October 27, 2000 Rebel violence killed seven and wounded several others. In two cases, rebels detonated bombs in front of homes and then shot inhabitants as they came out.

October 28, 2000 Rebel violence killed fifteen and wounded twenty. Fourteen of the wounded were soldiers, caused by a bomb under their truck.

November 2, 2000 Rebels killed three security personnel and two civilians.

November 6, 2000 several incidents with rebels left ten dead, including six rebels and one policeman.

November 9, 2000 in several incidents, one soldier, two rebels and one civilian were killed. A dozen soldiers were wounded.

November 11, 2000 in several incidents, six police, two rebels and two civilians died.

November 14, 2000 South Africa has signed a military cooperation accord with Algeria. This will involve exchanges of officers, training, and technology. It is notable that Algeria was once regarded as the Arab country closest to producing a nuclear weapon and that South Africa had produced a few nuclear weapons under the previous regime before the current government dismantled them.--Stephen V Cole

November 16, 2000 Rebel violence killed two rebels and one security guard. Two shepherd boys were also kidnapped.

November 20, 2000 a remote control bomb went off next to a military convoy 80 kilometers south of the capital, wounding two soldiers.

November 21, 2000 Rebels killed eight relatives of a police officer, plus two neighbors, 50 kilometers west of the capital.

November 22, 2000 Rebels attacked a remote village 200 kilometers west of the capital and killed ten farmers.

November 25, 2000 a former rebel leader, along with his uncle, were killed by GIA rebels (identified by a man who escaped.)

November 26, 2000 in several incidents involving rebels, two soldiers and three rebels were killed.

December 2, 2000 over the last two days, rebel's actions have left five dead and seven badly wounded.

December 4, 2000 Algeria has ordered 22 Russian-built Su-24 Fencer strike bombers in a $120 million deal. The planes will be taken from stored but flyable aircraft taken out of service by the shrinking Russian Air Force. The first two aircraft have arrived, and the rest are due by the middle of next year. Algeria has 12 Su-24M Fencer-D bombers and four Su-24MR Fencer-E recon planes in its inventory: the 22 new aircraft will give it one of the most powerful strike forces in the region.--Stephen V Cole

December 5, 2000 Fifteen have died in rebel violence, including six local militiamen and three rebels.

December 8, 2000 in the last few days, military actions left 29 dead, including 26 rebels.

December 9, 2000 in several rebel attacks, three soldiers and two rebels were killed and a civilian wounded.

December 10, 2000 in several rebel attacks, one soldier, one civilian and six rebels were killed, with one civilian wounded.

December 11, 2000 Rebels ambushed an army convoy, killing five soldiers and wounding ten. One rebel also died.

December 13, 2000 a series of actions left 24 rebels and 14 soldiers dead.

December 17, 2000 Rebels attacked a boarding school 80 kilometers south of the capital and killed 15 students and a security guard. Six other students were wounded. West of the capital, rebels attacked a bus, killing fifteen. Another attack left five dead. Since the beginning of Ramadan in late November, over 200 people have died in rebel attacks.

December 19, 2000 Rebels killed 22 civilians.

December 21, 2000 Rebels killed eleven civilians and wounded 18 others in the past two days...

December 23, 2000 Rebel violence left seven rebels, a policeman and a civilian dead.

December 25, 2000 Rebel violence killed ten people over the weekend, including two militiamen.

December 26, 2000 Rebel violence left two civilians, one militiaman and two rebels dead.

December 27, 2000 Some 300 people died from rebel violence during the month long Ramadan period. Last year, the death toll was only 180.

December 31, 2000 in the last two days, rebel activity left three civilians and two rebels dead. The rebels have been running an extortion racket in many parts of the country, and some of the deaths are a result of the enforcing payments.

January 1, 2001 Russia has modernized two Algerian combat vessels. One of them is a Koni-class frigate: the other is a Nanuchka-II missile corvette. The project cost $100 million. Details were not provided.-- Stephen V Cole January 3, 2001 in the last three days, eight civilians and one soldier were killed by rebel activity.

January 4, 2001 Rebel activity left four civilians and eleven soldiers dead.

January 6, 2001 Operations against rebels left four rebels dead. Rebel bunkers and weapons were also seized and destroyed. Newspapers reported that another operation killed 14 rebels, but the government did not confirm that.

January 7, 2001 Operations against rebels left one policeman and twelve rebels dead.

January 8, 2001 Four Russians employees of a fertilizer company were found dead in northeastern forces. The Russians had gone there to pick mushrooms. Rebels are suspected, as the rebels have long targeted non-Moslem foreigners.

January 15, 2001 Rebels killed nine civilians and wounded four.

January 17, 2001 Rebels killed a dozen civilians at a roadblock in the west. So far this year, over 100 have been killed by rebel violence.

January 19, 2001 Rebels attacked an isolated village 200 kilometers west of the capital and killed 23 civilians. Six of the victims were captured and later killed. Some of the dead were burned alive in a truck.

January 20, 2001 Rebels ambushed soldiers 90 kilometers southeast of the capital, killing two and wounding another.

January 22, 2001 in several attacks, rebels killed five civilians. The rebels continue to go after civilians in areas where they wish to terrorize locals in either supporting them, or at least not assisting the army in finding rebel camps. For this reason, shepherds are a frequent target, as are isolated villages out in the countryside where the rebel hideouts are. When the army does find a rebel camp, rebel losses are usually heavy.

January 23, 2001 Rebels killed seven civilians 160 kilometers west of the capital. An 18 year old girl was taken captive.

January 28, 2001 Rebels attacked a village 200 kilometers west of the capital, leaving 25 civilians dead. Nearly 200 people have died from rebel violence so far this year.

January 30, 2001 an army sweep 270 kilometers south of the capital left 4 rebels dead.

February 3, 2001 Rebels attacked a militia camp 430 kilometers southeast of the capital, killing one man and wounding several others. In other attacks, one civilian was killed and railroad facilities burned down.

February 7, 2001 an army sweep 80 kilometers south of the capital left 14 rebels dead. Some 70 kilometers east of the capital, rebels killed a civilian.

February 8, 2001 a former Algerian army officer declared that he had served in an anti-terrorist unit during the 1990s that dressed in civilian clothes and civilians thought to be rebel sympathizers. The accusations were published in a French newspaper. The Algerian government has denied the story.

February 9, 2001 several rebel attacks left eleven civilians dead.

February 10, 2001 Former rebel leaders, who accepted the government amnesty, have requested that they be armed and turned lose on the active rebels causing so much mayhem in the countryside. The former rebels state that the army is not really able to deal with the guerilla tactics. The former rebels know how the current rebels operate and are better able to fight and defeat them. The government has not responded to this offer.

February 11, 2001 Rebels attacked a village 100 kilometers south of the capital, leaving 27 civilians (including 13 children) dead.

February 12, 2001 Rebel violence left five civilians dead in two incidents. Two of the victims were men who had just completed their military service. This was to terrorize other young men into avoiding serving in the army.

February 17, 2001 Rebels ambushed soldiers 440 kilometers southwest of the capital. The result was 13 soldiers and six rebels dead.

February 18, 2001 Rebel violence has left 330 dead so far this year.

February 23, 2001 in several operations, 13 rebels were killed and a large cache of weapons seized.

February 25, 2001In several operations over the last two days, 27 rebels and three civilians were killed.

February 27, 2001 a group of former soldiers claim that the army participated in the murder of civilians. The army denied the charges. No conclusive evidence has yet been presented.

March 1, 2001 Rebels killed eight members of a family, including a son who had just finished military service. Rebels are trying to discourage young men from serving in the army, without much success.

March 7, 2001 over the weekend, rebels killed ten civilians in several incidents.

March 10, 2001 in the last three days, 58 rebels and five civilians were killed in several incidents.

March 12, 2001 over the weekend, rebels killed six civilians in several incidents. Ten rebels were also killed by army operations .

March 14, 2001 Rebels have struck back after army operations in the last month have killed over a hundred rebels. In the last few days, 25 civilians have been killed by rebel raids.

March 15, 2001 the army tracked several groups of rebels and killed 24 of them.

March 18, 2001 an army offensive against rebel camps left 22 rebels dead. At a fake checkpoint, rebels wounded twenty civilians. Other rebel attacks killed seven militiamen.

March 19, 2001 Rebel violence has left three policemen dead.

March 20, 2001 the army has given hundreds of rifles to villagers in the northwest, where rebel violence against civilians has been particularly intense.

March 23, 2001 Rebel violence has left eight dead and two wounded.

March 25, Security forces killed 35 rebels in several operations.

March 26, 2001 Rebel violence has left 12 civilians dead.

March 27, 2001 Police killed two rebels, while a militiaman was killed by rebels in another incident.

March 28, 2001Rebel violence has left 16 civilians dead, including eight children.

March 30, 2001 Rebel violence has left five civilians dead, including two children.

April 1, 2001 So far this year, rebel violence has killed 800 people, including 380 rebels. The rebel tactics remain the same, to massacre families they feel are providing information to the government, or allowing their sons to serve in the army. This violence has the perverse effect of causing some young men to join the rebels. The main rebel group, the GIA, says they have recruited 130 more men in the last few weeks, even as they murder the neighbors of some of these young men. South of the capital, rebels killed a family of five.

April 4, 2001 Rebel violence has left two civilians dead and three wounded.

April 6, 2001 Rebel violence has left five civilians dead.

April 7, 2001 Rebel violence has left seven soldiers, one rebel and one civilian dead. Nineteen have died from rebel violence so far in April.

April 8, 2001 a major Army operation against the rebels left over 30 rebel's dead. Meanwhile, rebel attacks left one soldier dead and 27 wounded.

April 11, 2001 Army operations against the rebels left four rebels dead.

April 14, 2001 Rebel violence has left two militiamen and six rebels dead.

April 18, 2001 Rebels killed four civilians 120 kilometers south of the capital.

April 23, 2001 Rioting broke 250 kilometers east of the capital out at the funeral of a teenager accidentally killed by a policeman last week. The local Berbers have long (for over a thousand years) resented Arab domination.

April 24, 2001 the government plans to phase out conscription and go with an all-volunteer force. Currently, half the troops are conscripts.

April 25, 2001 Berbers began demonstrating and rioting against the government.

April 27, 2001 Berbers continued to demonstrate and riot. Police reaction has left at least fifteen dead.

April 28, 2001 Berbers continued to demonstrate and riot. Police reaction has left at least 28 dead. Rebels clashed with security forces, leaving 40 troops and three rebels dead. Some 38 police and rebels were wounded.

April 29, 2001Berbers continued to demonstrate and riot. Police reaction has left at least fifty dead and hundreds wounded. Rebels killed three shepherds 340 kilometers southwest of the capital.

April 30, 2001 the president has ordered an investigation into the violence in the Berber community. The violence began on April 18th after police killed a young Berber.

May 1, 2001 Riots and demonstrations by the Berber minority have left some 80 dead and nearly 600 wounded. The Berber political party, the RDC, has withdrawn from the government. One policeman was killed and 388 injured. Berber unrest has long been a problem in Algeria, although it has been overshadowed by the Islamic rebel violence. Rebels killed ten civilians 50 kilometers south of the capital.

May 2, 2001 in the last few days, an army sweep of rebel areas in the east left at least fifty rebels dead.

May 3, 2001 Police broke up Berber demonstrations with tear gas instead of bullets, as the government proceeded with an investigation of the police and the death of some 80 Berbers in earlier demonstrations. Two soldiers died when a helicopter crashed.

May 5, 2001 Berbers continue to demonstrate against Arab domination, but the violence and police killings have stopped. This long simmering ethnic dispute is unusual because most of the Algerian population have Berber ancestors. But over the centuries, the majority of the people adopted Arab culture, as a result of Moslem Arab armies conquering the region over a thousand years ago. The local Berbers provided some of the stiffest resistance to the spread of Islam by Arab armies. As a result, a large minority (about 14 percent) still speaks the ancient Berber language and cling tightly to Berber culture (which is still common among many Arab speakers.) Although the Berbers eventually accepted Islam, they continue to resist domination by Arabs.

May 7, 2001 Some 20,000 Berbers demonstrated in Berber areas, chanting, "We are Berbers, not Arabs."

May 9, 2001 a rebel ambush in the northeast left eight policemen dead. Elsewhere, a bomb killed two soldiers and a security guard was beheaded.

May 10, 2001 Some 15,000 demonstrated in the capital for Berber rights. Shouts of "Algeria is not Arab" were heard. Police presence was minimal to avoid violence.

May 12, 2001 seven rebels, trapped in a farmhouse in the northeast, were killed by police when they refused to surrender.

May 13, 2001Operations by rebels in the east resulted in seven police and four civilians dead.

May 19, 2001 Rebel violence has left three policemen and three rebels dead, and 32 more wounded (22 of them soldiers.)

May 20, 2001 Rebels killed six religious students west of the capital. So far this month, some 60 people have died from rebel violence, including 30 troops, 15 rebels and 15 civilians. Unrest remains in Berber areas, despite the thousands of police and soldiers sent in to keep the peace.

May 21, 2001 half a million people peacefully demonstrated against the government in Berber areas.

May 23, 2001 Rebels killed six civilians 200 kilometers west of the capital.

May 25, 2001 new rioting has broken out in Berber areas, leaving at least one protester dead and many more wounded.

May 26, 2001 Police say that, while new rioting has broken out in Berber areas, the total casualties to date are 51 dead (including one policeman) and 1,300 injured (about a thousand of these were policemen). Unofficial reports say that 80 died and twice as many civilians were injured.

May 27, 2001 Rebels killed three civilians 340 kilometers southwest of the capital.

May 28, 2001 Violence broke out again in Berber areas, with hundreds of thousands demonstrating against the government.

May 28, 2001 Violence broke out again in Berber areas, with hundreds of thousands demonstrating against the government

May 30, 2001 Violence in Berber areas left five policemen wounded.

May 31, 2001 The US State Department has issued a warning for American citizens to exercise caution traveling to Algeria.

May 31, 2012 The US State Department has issued a warning for American citizens to exercise caution traveling to Algeria.

June 2, 2001 in an effort to placate enraged Berbers, seven policemen were put on trial for using excessive force against Berber demonstrators. Meanwhile, rebel violence left three policemen, one rebel and a civilian dead.

June 3, 2001 Rebels killed five civilians in the northwest.

June 7, 2001 Rebels killed six local militia 160 kilometers west of the capital.

June 8, 2001 Rebels killed five civilians 960 kilometers southeast of the capital.

June 10, 2001 Rebels killed three local militia and wounded six 130 kilometers east of the capital.

June 12, 2001 for the third day in a row, violence broke out in Khenchela, 500 kilometers east of the capital. A non-Berber area, the disputes are between soldiers and youths over mistreatment of civilians by the troops. Algeria has a very large unemployed youth population. There has been one death and over 40 wounded so far.

June 13, 2001 violent demonstrations spread the country, with Arab speaking young people joining with Berbers to protest against the government.

June 15, 2001 Massive anti-government demonstrations have left four and wounded 365.

June 16, 2001 violent demonstrations left two police and twelve civilians wounded.

June 17, 2001 Daily demonstrations broke out throughout the nation.

June 18, 2001 the government has banned all demonstrations, guaranteeing more violent confrontations. Daily demonstrations are going on throughout the nation. A rebel bomb attack killed a policeman and wounded three others. Over 1,100 people have died from rebel and civil violence this year.

June 19, 2001 Violence in Berber areas grew, leaving two policemen and five civilians dead, and over 120 people wounded. The violent demonstrations broke out in several towns and cities.

June 20, 2001 President Boutefilka has responded to the massive demonstrations by giving the armed forces more power to suppress the popular uprisings. Algeria's population is dominated by a younger, largely unemployed generation. It's not just the Berbers who are upset with all the Islamic rebel violence and economic stagnation. The Arab speaking majority is equally upset. Over 2,300 have been injured so far and the government refuses to negotiate with the rioters.

June 21, 2001 President Bouteflika admitted in a speech that there was a crises in the nation and that he would hold talks with various groups to resolve the problems. The population has been under enormous pressure since the Islamic terror began in 1992. Between the rebel terror attacks, police and army security measures and the declining economy, the population has been growing increasingly irritated and desperate.

June 22, 2001 in two months of riots and demonstrations, nearly a thousand police have been injured.

June 23, 2001 Riots in Berber areas have left three civilians and five policemen dead, and nearly a hundred people injured.

June 24, 2001 in the west, an army offensive against rebel bases killed at least twenty rebels.

June 25, 2001 in the north, 20,000 Berbers demonstrated, with many carrying or wearing pro-Berber symbols. Casualties were not reported. In the east, troops killed seven rebels during attacks on rebel bases in the mountains. Rebel violence has killed at least 80 people so far this month.

June 26, 2001The rioting has died down. So far, about a hundred have died and nearly 3,000 injured.

June 27, 2001 Rebels killed six civilians south of the capital.

June 28, 2001 Berbers held a peaceful demonstration in a town 120 kilometers east of the capital. Some 30,000 people participated. Senior members of the government are blaming France for the unrest, largely because France allows anti-government groups to operate freely in France.

June 30, 2001 Rebels invaded a cabaret in an eastern town, killing one man, robbing the patrons and taking five young women away. The women were found later with their throats slit.

July 5, 2001 a fake rebel roadblock 630 kilometers east of the capital resulted in two civilians being killed and two kidnapped (including a member of the legislature.) Thousands of police turned back thousands of Berbers trying to enter the capital for a demonstration.

July 6, 2001 Rebels killed ten civilians 80 kilometers south of the capital.

July 8, 2001 more violence broke out in Berber areas, after a demonstration by 5,000 Berbers turned violent. Casualties were not reported.

July 9, 2001 the government is finding the Berber uprising potentially more dangerous than the Islamic rebels. The government has concentrated on destroying the rebels for the last decade, while the economy has declined and unemployment increased to over twenty percent. Unless the economy is turned around, the government could have another rebellion on their hands.

July 10, 2001 Rebels killed six civilians 340 kilometers west of the capital.

July 13, 2001 the government has revealed that it is trying buying military equipment from the United States. No more details were revealed, although it seems likely that high tech surveillance gear which can be obtained nowhere else.

July 15, 2001 Rebels killed 11 civilians 70 kilometers west of the capital.

July 17, 2001 Rebels killed 12 civilians 80 kilometers south of the capital.

July 19, 2001 Some 30,000 Berbers demonstrated against the government in the majority Berber city of Bouira. The demonstration was organized by tribal elders and chiefs. Tribal organizations are still strong among the Berbers, who trace their tribal organizations back thousands of years. Meanwhile, rebels killed seven civilians 160 kilometers southwest of the capital.

July 23, 2001 seven civilians were killed by rebels outside the capital. Two rebels were killed by police elsewhere.

July 24, 2001 some 50 armed men raided a hospital in the Berber region, stealing medicines and surgical instruments. Because of the demonstrations, policing has broken down in the Berber areas, resulting in an increase in crime. Elsewhere in the country, rebels attacked travelers or people in taverns. A least one local militiaman was killed when rebels ransacked a post office.

July 26, 2001 several thousand Berbers demonstrated 250 kilometers east of the capital. There was no violence.

July 28, 2001 Rebels killed ten civilians 80 kilometers south of the capital.

July 29, 2001 the government investigation into the Berber demonstrations has made some embarrassing revelations. The man whose death in police custody sparked the riots was not accidental. He was deliberately shot. The riot police decided early on to use automatic weapons on the unarmed crowds.

July 30, 2001 Rebel activity left two civilians (including a judge) and two rebels dead.

August 1, 2001 Rebel activity left one soldier and two militiamen dead, and four militiamen wounded. In the last four weeks, rebel activity has left over a hundred dead.

August 5, 2001 over the weekend, a rebel bomb 430 kilometers west of the capital killed a policeman and wounded two others. Another ambush east of the capital killed two policemen and wounded three.

August 6, 2001 the bodies of four shepherds were found 360 kilometers west of the capital. The men had been kidnapped by rebels the day before and their flock stolen.

August 8, 2001 Massive use of police and troops have prevented or dispersed several attempts by Berbers to hold demonstrations.

August 10, 2001 Rebels killed five civilians 200 kilometers west of the capital. A member of a village militia was killed elsewhere.

August 11, 2001 several small demonstrations by Berbers over the last three days have left more than a dozen wounded.

August 12, 2001 in the west, rebels burst into a house and killed a mother and her three children. So far this month, 21 people have been killed by rebels.

August 13, 2001 Rebels manning a fake roadblock 300 kilometers southwest of the capital killed seventeen people, mostly farm workers traveling to work.

August 18, 2001 in several incidents, five rebels were killed and two soldiers and two policemen injured.

August 20, 2001Some 100,000 Berbers peacefully demonstrated in an eastern valley. Because of the remote location, police stood back. The continued Berber unrest is as much about poor economic conditions and corruption throughout the nation as it is Berber dislike for unfair treatment by the majority Arab speakers. The entire population is largely of Berber origin, and everyone is upset at the government's inability to get the economy going. The violence of Islamic rebels is seen as less of a problem, as the poor economic conditions hit nearly everyone while the violence injures far fewer people.

August 22, 2001 Rebels manning a fake roadblock 360 kilometers southwest of the capital killed seventeen people, mostly young men returning from the beach. Two teenage girls were also kidnapped.

August 28, 2001 in several incidents, six rebels and six civilians were killed. Some 80 people have died in rebel violence so far this month, with over 100,000 dead in the last nine years. The radical Islamic rebels show no sign of stopping their terrorism.

August 30, 2001 in several attacks over the last three days, rebels killed 14 civilians. Several dozen were injured, because some of the attacks were with bombs.

September 1, 2001In several incidents, rebels killed 11 civilians.

September 2, 2001 Rebels killed five civilians 260 kilometers southwest of the capital.

September 2, 2001 in several incidents, rebel activity left two policemen and seven rebels dead.

September 4, 2001 The Berber leadership announced that large demonstrations would continue, including attempts to rally in the capital. The Berbers have also announced a lot of 15 demands, which include a number of economic items and attacks against corruption.

September 9, 2001 Rebels killed ten civilians praying in a mosque in the northern port of Arzew.

September 13, 2001 a car bomb killed one civilian and injured another in eastern Algeria.

September 14, 2001 So far this year, rebel activity has left at least 2,000 dead. Although some 6,000 rebels accepted the government amnesty before the offer expired in January, 2000, many more fight on. Most rebel activity consists of terrorizing civilians. Overnight, rebels killed seven civilians in the port of Oran.

September 16, 2001 the government has called for a world wide effort against terrorism. Rebels killed four civilians 160 kilometers west of the capital.

September 17, 2001 Rebels killed eight civilians in Algiers

September 18, 2001 The Islamic radical violence that began in the early 1990s was organized and led by men who were trained in the Afghanistan camps. Thus it was no surprise that Algerians have shown up in the teams of international terrorists operating worldwide. The fanaticism and murderous attitudes of the Algerian rebels is now blamed on the ideology obtained in the Bin Laden camps.

September 24, 2001 Algerians see America as finally waking up to the full impact of Islamic fundamentalism. During the 1990s, as Algeria fought bloody minded fundamentalists, the US chided the government more than it did the fundamentalists (giving asylum to some fundamentalists who had already been convicted of mass murder in Algeria.) The mood of many Algerians is one of "I told you so."

September 30, 2001 Rebel violence leaves two policemen and two rebels dead.

October 2, 2001 a rebel bomb went off near a police station 400 kilometers south of the capital, killing one and wounding eight.

October 4, 2001 Rebels killed a prosecutor in the northeast. In an attempt to placate the Berber minority, the Berber language will be recognized as one of the nation's official languages.

October 6, 2001 Thousands rioted in the area 500 kilometers southwest of the capital to protest the failure of the government to provide essential services. One was killed and over a hundred wounded.

October 8, 2001 Rioting again broke out in Berber areas of the northeast.

October 9, 2001 Troops raided rebel hideouts 300 kilometers east of the capital and killed nine rebels.

October 11, 2001 Rioting continued in Berber areas of the northeast, leaving 24 injured (including eight policemen)

November 15, 2001 popular discontent against the government increased after heavy storms last week killed nearly 700 people in coastal areas. The government has been slow to respond. There have been some demonstrations as a result.

October 20, 2001 Rebel violence left two civilians and three rebels dead.

October 24, 2001 in the last two days, rebel violence has left eight rebels and a soldier dead.

October 26, 2001 the government said that 20,000 rebels had been killed since the rebel (Islamic radical) violence began in 1992. Another 130,000 police and civilians (mainly civilians) have been killed in the violence. The government says that only about 400 armed rebels are still at large, but that these men continue to attack civilians. So far this year, 2,000 have died in the violence. Today, police killed five rebels.

October 30, 2001 Some 300 kilometers west of the capital, rebels ambushed a truck carrying civilians and militia and killed a dozen militiamen and one civilian.

November 6, 2001 Security forces killed seven rebels, three of whom turned out to ne foreigners (a Mauritanian and two Tunisians.).

November 15, 200 popular discontent against the government increased after heavy storms last week killed nearly 700 people in coastal areas. The government has been slow to respond. There have been some demonstrations as a result.

November 20, 2001 a rebel bomb went off in a bus station in the capital, leaving 29 wounded.

November 24, 2001 Rebels made several attacks in the north, leaving 11 dead and 15 wounded. The population is becoming even angrier at the rebels for these attacks during a period while the country was recovering from storms that left nearly 800 dead.

December 1, 2001 in two incidents, one rebel and one policeman were killed.

December 5, 2001 in two attacks, rebels killed five soldiers and two civilians.

December 6, 2001 the air force is buying other L-39 subsonic armed trainers. The air force already has 39 of these aircraft, which are used as trainers and combat duties. The slower L-39 warplanes are more effective for missions against rebels.

December 8, 2001 in one attack, rebels killed 17 members of an extended family, mostly women and children.

December 14, 2001 the current Islamic radical violence in Algeria had its origins in thousands of Algerians who went to fight in Afghanistan during the 1980s. Some of those that returned from this later went back to Afghanistan when bin Laden set up his terrorist training camps. Thus trained, they returned to Algeria and set up bloody minded radical Islamic organizations. These radicals set up training camps in remote areas of Algeria and trained more terrorists. Some of these moved to Europe and North America, where many have since been arrested.

December 15, 2001 Rebel violence left eight civilians dead.

December 18, 2001 over the weekend, a rebel, two police and four civilians died in several clashes.

December 19, 2001Rebel attacks continue, with four civilians dead and six soldiers wounded.

December 20, 2001 civil unrest continues in Berber areas in the northwest. Demonstrations with over 10,000 participants continue to occur. Police have toned down their violence, and this latest bout of protest resulted in only twenty arrests (no deaths and no serious injuries.)

January 2, 2002 Rebel violence left four policemen, four civilians and 11 rebels dead.

January 5, 2002 Rebels killed three shepherds and kidnapped two others.

January 6, 2002 Rebel violence left four police and one civilian dead.

January 7, 2002 in western Algeria, gunmen burst into a gambling hall and sprayed it with bullets. While only three were wounded, it was thought to be the work of Islamic radicals, who often attack places they consider sinful.

January 13, 2002 Unrest by Berbers and unemployed young men continues throughout the nation. The government, despite its popular fight against Islamic fundamentalists, still represents a corrupt police state. Most politicians are seen as for sale and the economy is a mess.

January 14, 2002 Warships from Algeria and the US held training exercises off the Algerian coast. Meanwhile, rebels killed seven civilians in several incidents.

January 15, 2002 the bloody minded rebels have turned on each other from time to time. Police found evidence of this in a rugged area 430 kilometers southeast of the capital. GIF and GSPC rebels fought each other in a battle that left 16 rebels dead. Local villagers called police who came upon the scene.

January 16, 2002 Rebels killed five people 300 kilometers southwest of the capital.

January 18, 2002 Rebels killed two people in a hotel, 110 kilometers east of the capital.

January 19, 2002 Rebel violence left six civilians, two rebels and one soldier dead.

January 25, 2002 nothing seems to go right in Algeria. The government, run by the elderly men who led the rebellion against France in the 1950s and 60s, is corrupt and unwilling to allow democracy that might get them all arrested for stealing. The people want clean government and the Islamic radicals want a religious state. The Berber minority wants autonomy and the unemployed young men want jobs. So far, no one has any solutions that work.

January 26, 2002 in several incidents, one rebel and five civilians were killed.

January 27, 2002 Some 70 kilometers east of the capital, six rebels, a soldier and a security guard died in several incidents.

January 28, 2002 it just became known that last week the security forces killed none rebels and arrested 30 in the west.

January 29, 2002 three bombs went off in the south, leaving one dead and 19 injured.

January 31, 2002 a major army operation in the northeast left 15 rebels dead.

February 2, 2002 Rebels killed 12 civilians 80 kilometers south of the capital.

February 4, 2002 in several incidents with rebels, four security personnel and two rebels were killed.

February 5, 2002 Rebels killed 24 civilians in several incidents. The rebels have increased their terror attacks in response to reports that the American led War on Terror was going to succeed.

February 8, 2002 Rebels killed four civilians a hundred kilometers south of the capital. Despite an amnesty that got many rebels to make peace, and energetic police and military action, thousands of armed Islamic rebels continue to resist. The economy is in shambles and the dictatorship of the revolutionaries (who led the fight against the French in the 1960s) clings to power. Not a pretty picture.

February 9, 2002 the leader of the main rebel group, the GIA, was killed by police in a house south of the capital. This may lead to a civil war in the GIA, as most rebel groups are split over the issue of making peace or continuing the resistance.

February 10, 2002 Rebels reacted to the death of one of these leaders by killing six civilians just outside the capital.

February 12, 2002 Berber leaders called a general strike in the northeast to protest the resuming of police patrols in the area.

February 13, 2002 Rioting broke out again in Berber areas in the northeast as police began patrolling again. At least three civilians were wounded. The army had been taking care of local security, and the police kept off the streets because of earlier brutality by police against Berbers. Elsewhere, a rebel bomb killed three militiamen while a government official was kidnapped.

February 16, 2002 Rebels killed three civilians while troops killed four rebels in several incidents.

March 1, 2002 Police and army anti-rebel operations are having an effect, with a sharp decline in rebel activity. In the last few months, several of the rebel leaders have been captured or killed. Algerians in general are fed up with the Moslem radicals and have been increasingly cooperative with the police (providing information.) There are only a few hundred hard core rebels left, who continue to massacre civilians.

March 3, 2002 Security forces killed two rebels and seized weapons.

March 4, 2002 in several clashes, six rebels and two soldiers have died.
So far this year, rebel's violence has killed 230 people.

March 6, 2002 twenty rebels attacked a civil defense militia barracks 500 kilometers east of the capital. A dozen of the militiamen were killed and the rest fled. Elsewhere, rebels killed three civilians.

March 8, 2002 Rebels killed six civilians at a fake road block.

March 14, 2002 Rebels killed four civilians at a fake road block.

March 16, 2002Unrest continues in Berber areas, but has been less violent. Demonstrations are less violent and the police go out of their way to avoid killing any demonstrators. The government is trying to talk their way past Berber complaints. For example, Berber is to become an official language, along with Arabic. But the basic problem is that the government is corrupt, inept and undemocratic. And those problems are not likely to be fixed any time soon. The current 1960s revolutionaries (and their families) that have run the nation for the last four decades don't want to give up power.

March 17, 2002 Rebel activity left two civilians and six rebels dead.

March 18, 2002 Unrest continues in Berber areas, with over a hundred demonstrators injured. Berbers are unhappy with government offers to allow more Berber autonomy.

March 21, 2002 Rebels killed ten civilians in several attacks.

March 22, 2002 Unrest continues in Berber areas, but the police are showing much more restraint and avoiding deaths and serious injuries.

March 23, 2002 Rebel ambushes left four policemen dead.

March 24, 2002 Riot police withdrew from some Berber towns, to the cheers of the locals. Meanwhile, police killed three Islamic rebels in two incidents.

March 26, 2002 Unrest in Berber areas broke out again when police began to arrest Berber leaders.

March 29, 2002 Unrest continues in Berber areas, but the police attempts at restraint are not working. In the past two weeks, three demonstrators have died and dozens have been wounded. Last year's demonstrations left nearly a hundred dead and over 2,000 injured. The Berbers, a fifth of the population and the original inhabitants of Algeria before the Arabs invaded in the 7th century AD, want their language and culture officially recognized.

March 30, 2001 two more Berber demonstrators have died and riots in Berber areas continue.

March 31, 200 Rebel activity left two soldiers and two rebels dead.

April 1, 2002 a The GIA Islamic rebel, whose leader was killed in February, has been replaced. Rachid Abou Tourab pledged to continue the terror attacks on soldiers and civilians until Algeria is an Islamic state.

April 4, 2001 Rebel violence has left two civilians dead and three wounded.

April 3, 2002 Rebel violence has left 320 dead so far this year, with over a hundred being rebels, the rest police and civilians. Total deaths since the violence began in 1992 are now over 150,000.

April 10, 2002 although parliament has passed a law making the Berber language equal with Arabic, Berber legislators protested that the law did not go far enough. Separatist sentiment is growing and could lead to a civil war.

April 13, 2002 Rebels set off several bombs in the capital, leaving nine civilians wounded. UN the last few days, army operations has killed 15 rebels. One militiaman was also killed.

April 20, 2002 So far this year, rebel violence has left 380 dead, including at least a hundred rebels.

April 21, 2002 Over a 100,000 Berbers demonstrated the 22nd anniversary of Berber protests in favor of Berber rights.

April 24, 2002 Rebels slaughtered 16 people (including eight children and four women) 340 kilometers west of the capital. Such attacks are meant to terrorize local civilians into either supporting the rebels, or not cooperating with the police.

April 27, 2002 Rebel activity left two soldiers, two civilians and two rebels dead.

May 2, 2002 GIA, the main radical Islamic group, saw its leader killed by government security forces in February. The new GIA leader, Rachid Abu Turab, has been cementing his control over the various GIA factions.

Turab's public statements have not been encouraging. Turab said about possible peace talks: "both truce, nor dialogue, nor reconciliation, nor security but blood and blood, destruction and destruction," until an Islamic government was established in Algeria. "We will continue to destroy their crops, seize their goods, rape their women and decapitate them in their towns, villages and the deserts. We will kill them and slit their throats without respite." The "they" are anyone who doesn't agree with the GIA. To prove their point, GIA killed at least 34 civilians today. So far this year, GIA and other Islamic radicals have killed at least 300 people. Some 150 radicals have died as well.

May 4, 2002 Soldiers and rebels fought 50 kilometers east of the capital, leaving 26 rebels and eight soldiers dead.

May 6, 2002 Rebels ambushed an army convoy 110 kilometers east of the capital, killing 15 soldiers.

May 11, 2002 Rebel activity left six civilians and ten rebels dead.

May 13, 2002 Police operations killed four rebels and arrested 29 suspects 300 kilometers east of the capital.

May 15, 2002 a rebel bomb went off in a town market 260 kilometers east of the capital. Four were killed and 14 wounded. In two other incidents, seven policemen were killed.

May 16, 2002 Rebels killed three civilians. The violence has, so far this year, killed 540 people, with 180 of these being rebels and most of the others civilians killed by the rebels.

May 20, 2002 Russia is negotiating to sell Algeria MiG-29 warplanes and modern (S-300) anti-aircraft missiles. Algeria will also purchase Russian weapons and equipment needed for fighting Islamic rebels.

May 23, 2002 Rebels killed ten soldiers in an ambush outside the capital.

May 29, 2002 Rebels killed a guard and a civilian in two incidents. In the Berber areas, there were many demonstrations protesting coming elections. The Berbers are becoming more active politically and demanding autonomy for Berber areas and recognition of the Berber language (which is very different from Arabic).

May 30, 2002 Rebels killed 23 nomads 200 kilometers west of the capital.

May 31, 2002 The FLN (National Liberation Front), which lost elections in 1991 (and staged a military coup to run the country since), won a majority in the May 30 elections. The rebels were Islamic radicals whose parties had won the 1991 elections. The population has turned against the rebels because of the rebel violence. Islamic radicals discouraged people from voting, and as a result, only 47.5 percent of eligible voters voted. Berber groups also urged people not to vote.

June 4, 2002 a rebel bomb went off in the northeast, leaving four civilians wounded. Near the capital, rebels killed a pipeline guard.

June 5, 2002 in the last month, rebel activity has killed at least 200, including 50 members of the security forces. Since the beginning of the year, rebel activity has killed at least 610, including 150 members of the security forces.

June 6, 2002 Rebel violence has left two rebels dead.

June 8, 2002 Rebel violence has left seven civilians and two rebels dead.

June 9, 2002 Rebel violence has left one policeman and one rebel dead. The rebels have been using bombs more frequently, although these have tended to wound rather than kill.

June 11, 2002 Rebels fired on a bus 80 kilometers south of the capital, killing 12 civilians.

June 12, 2002 an army operation left one soldier and one rebel dead.

June 13, 2002 Rebel violence has left 34 dead so far this month, and 650 so far this year. The army and police continue to hunt the dwindling number of Islamic militants, who still see their murderous attacks on civilians as serving the cause of Islamic fundamentalism.

June 16, 2002 west of the capital, army sweeps against rebels left four rebels dead and munitions and bunkers captured.

June 18, 2002 Rebels ambushed an army patrol 350 kilometers east of the capital, leaving two soldiers dead.

June 21, 2002 two bombs went off west of the capital, killing one and wounding 31. Increasingly, the Islamic radicals are setting off bombs in urban areas and using land mines on roads.

June 22, 2002 Rebel violence has left five civilians and one militiaman dead. Since the beginning of the month, rebel violence has left 64 dead and over 100 wounded.

June 23, 2002 Rebel violence left eight civilians, two rebels and one policeman dead.

June 24, 2001 a rebel bomb killed two farmers 320 kilometers east of the capital.

June 26, 2002 Rebels ambushed construction workers in the northwest, killing six of them.

June 28, 2002 in the suburbs of the capital, rebels ambushed a bus, killing 13 civilians and wounding nine others. Thus was the second attack on a bus in the last two days. The other attack killed two civilians. Another group of rebels attacked civilians playing soccer and killed seven of them.

June 29, 2002 So far this month, rebel attacks left 107 dead and over 100 wounded. Some 730 have died so far this year. This is less than in previous years. Since 1992, over 100,000 have died in the violence. However, the government amnesty and peace program have reduced the number of rebels from 27,000 to about 700. The remaining rebels are hard core and contain many who have worked with al Qaeda. There are thought to be at least several hundred Algerian Islamic militants outside Algeria.

While the war against the Islamic radicals is showing progress, the government is having less success at eliminating the corruption and cronyism that causes so much popular anger and unrest. The men who led the revolution still dominate politics, along with their families. This sort of "ruling class" is very unpopular, especially since the economy has been wrecked by corruption and incompetence.

July 2, 2002 in the northwest, rebels bombed an army truck, killing two soldiers.

July 5, 2002 German police have arrested a senior member of the GIA (one of the main Islamic militant organizations in Algeria) on suspicion that he was plotting to kill the leader of a Paris mosque. France has authorized the four million French Moslems to elect members of a government advisory council and there is a struggle between fundamentalist and moderate Moslems for seats on the council. It's feared that GIA is trying to terrorize moderates so that fundamentalists can dominate the council.

July 7, 2002 in several actions, rebels killed five civilians.

July 10, 2002 in several actions, rebels killed ten civilians and four policemen.

July 11, 2002 So far this month, rebels have killed at least 80 people and wounded over 100.

July 14, 2002 in several actions, rebels killed nine civilians.

July 15, 2002A rebel ambush 50 kilometers east of the capital killed six soldiers.

July 19, 2002 in several actions, rebels killed ten civilians.

July 20, 2002 in the last month, rebel terrorists have killed 110 people, mostly civilians. Only a few hundred Islamic fundamentalists that remain in rebellion, but they roam the countryside terrorizing the civilian population with nighttime attacks and murders. That the government can't hunt down these last rebel groups just adds to the general dissatisfaction with the government. A severe drought is adding to the unrest, with angry demonstrations over water shortages. The population is suffering from malaise and despair, with little organized opposition. The government is unable to get a real democracy going because of corruption among government officials.

July 27, 2002 undercover security forces 300 kilometers east of the capital killed three rebels.

July 28, 2002 Unrest continues in Berber areas, and the government is waiting for the 80 percent of the population that are not Berber to start demonstrating. While the Islamic radicals are slowly be wiped out, government corruption and mismanagement seem more likely to last longer.

July 30, 2002 Police now believe that one of the 15 rebels killed last week was the new (since February) leader of the GIA (the major rebel organization.)

August 1, 2002 in the capital, police found and defused a bomb at a bus stop. In other rebel actions, two civilians were killed.

August 3, 2002 a policeman was killed by rebels.

August 4, 2002 in a major operation west of the capital, army troops killed at least 40 rebels.

August 5, 2002 in a friendly gesture towards the Berber community, the government released 61 Berber activists who had been arrested in earlier demonstrations.

August 6, 2002 Last month, rebel activity left at least 160 dead. Some 900 have died from rebel actions so far this year, including some 250 rebels.

August 7, 2002 in several incidents, troops killed six armed rebels and arrested 16 others.

August 10, 2002 a bomb went off near a beach, killing two and wounding six.

August 11, 2002 Some 300 kilometers west of the capital, troops killed three armed rebels and arrested two others.

August 13, 2002 the government has been showing on TV the filmed confessions of rebels. The amoral attitude of the rebels has eliminated any remaining sympathy there was for the rebels among the population. But there are still several hundred hard core Islamic fundamentalists out there, and their favorite tactic is to terrorize civilian populations by killing men, women and children.

August 14, 2002 Rebel violence left two militiamen dead.

August 16, 2002 in several incidents, rebel violence left 26 civilians dead. So far this month, rebel violence has killed over a hundred people.

August 17, 2002 in several incidents, rebel violence left one militiaman and three rebels dead.

August 20, 2002 despite the continuing violence, foreign companies are returning to Algeria, confident that the government has the remaining Islamic militants on the run.

August 21, 2002 Army operations in the northeast report they have surrounded some 100 rebels in the mountains.

August 22, 2002 Rebel violence left two civilians and nine rebels dead.

August 24, 2002 Army operations against rebels in the northeast left 11 dead and seven captured.

August 26, 2002 Rebel violence left two civilians dead.

August 28, 2002 Constant pressure from the army and police, plus general disgust among the civilian population, has demoralized the Islamic rebels. Most have surrendered or simply slipped back into the civilian population. There are still a few hundred rebels out in the countryside, but most are simply operating like bloodthirsty bandits (doing more killing than looting.)

September 1, 2002 a rebel ambush killed four soldiers. For the month of August, 80 rebels have died, as well as 54 civilians and soldiers.

September 2, 2002 Rebel violence left five civilians dead.

September 5, 2002 the rebel movement is in decline. Fewer young men seek to join the Islamic radical cause, mainly because most of the population is just tired of it. Many of the radicals have fled the country, which is why so many Algerians were found in Afghanistan when US troops rounded up al Qaeda members there last year.

Army operations in the northeast left four rebels dead.

September 6, 2002 in two attacks, rebels killed six civilians and kidnapped two young girls.

September 8, 2002 the government has announced that it will dismiss many men from the national police (Gendarmerie) who have been found to be corrupt or inclined to violence against civilians. Many Algerians have long called for such a purge. What forced the government's hand were the recent riots and demonstrations by Berbers, who have gotten the worst treatment from the largely non-Berber police.

September 12, 2002 Rebels killed 11 civilians 120 kilometers west of the capital.

September 13, 2002 for the first eight months of the year, rebel violence has left 1,070 dead. The capital is hosting a conference of African countries who are working out an agreement to deny terrorist organizations refuge in any African nation. In the past, it was common for terrorists and rebels in one nation to find refuge, or at least be tolerated, in a neighboring country. This has caused the entire continent problems and few want to allow that sort of thing any longer.

September 14, 2002 Rebel violence left 21 soldiers and one rebel dead in several incidents.

September 16, 2002A rebel ambush killed three soldiers in the northeast.

September 17, 2002 a remote control rebel bomb killed one soldier and wounded two others in the northeast. Elsewhere, three rebels were killed, including two leaders, when the rebels were caught trying to plant a bomb in the capital.

September 19, 2002 in the north, troops killed 22 rebels during several operations against both GIA and GSPC rebels.

September 22, 2002 Police killed two rebel leaders (Moussa Sellini and Mohamed Boudraa) of the GIA. Both men were veterans of fighting in Afghanistan and had long been hunted by the police.

September 29, 2002 Rebels killed seven civilians in the northwest.

October 1, 2002 Security forces have hunted down and killed over 50 rebels in September, mainly be going after the rebel camps hidden in the mountains and forests. The police and army operations have made it more difficult for the rebels to operate and there is a noticeable decline in tension on the streets of cities and towns.

October 9, 2002 the outlawed FIS (Islamic Salvation Front) has elected a new leader, Mourad Dhina, who lives in Switzerland. Dhina was investigated for smuggling weapons from Switzerland to Algeria, but none convicted. His political asylum was revoked, but the Swiss have allowed him to stay anyway. The Algerians continue to shelter and support (by allowing fund raising) Islamic radicals who are part of organizations that have slaughtered thousands of civilians in Algeria. But the European government refuses to accept responsibility, or admit that the Islamic fundamentalists are as bad as the Algerians say.

October 10, 2002 Berbers continue to mount public protests and to boycott elections. The Berbers have not resorted to organized violence, yet.

October 16, 2002 Rebel violence left 13 civilians and five soldiers dead.

October 18, 2002 So far this month, rebel violence has left at least 54 people dead. So far this year, at least 1,200 have died. But in the past ten years of violence, deaths have generally averaged over 10,000 a year. While the level of violence has declined in the last two years (because of amnesties and growing disillusion with Islamic radicalism among the population), there is still a hard core of several thousand Islamic radicals that refuse to surrender or stop their attacks on civilians.

October 25, 2002 Rebel violence left 21 civilians dead. So far this month, rebel violence has killed 75. For the year, over 1200 have died.

October 26, 2002 Algeria is calling for the world's nations to agree on exactly what "terrorism" is. Algeria is finally getting the upper hand on Islamic radicals who have waged a ten year terror campaign that has left over 100,000 dead. The terrorists managed to keep going by having key leaders living in exile in Europe, and raising money there. Because the European governments did not recognize the Islamic radical's activities as terrorism, they left the terror organizations alone and, in effect providing bases for the Algerian terrorists. Now that Algerian Islamic radicals have been revealed as part of al Qaeda, the policies of the European nations are seen as foolish and deadly for innocent civilians. While its long been customary for nations to give sanctuary to rebels from neighboring nations (to provide some diplomatic leverage), the European nations were doing so because of a liberal policy on political asylum. This forces the Europeans (and other democracies) to confront the meaning of "one man's terrorist is another man's freedom fighter."

October 30, 2002 Rebel violence left eight civilians dead.

November 6, 2002 Murders by Islamic radicals are down, and the government estimates that only about 650 rebels are still active. When the violence began in 1992, it was thought there as many as 27,000 activists. Some 15,200 rebels were killed during the violence. Another 6,000 accepted a government amnesty in 1999. Many of these have fled overseas (France, Middle East, North America, Afghanistan and Pakistan.)

The largest remaining rebel group, the GSPC, with 350-380 members. There are five or six other groups, some splinters from larger groups that accepted the amnesty. None of the smaller groups have more than a hundred members and some are allied with al Qaeda (at least in theory.)

November 7, 2002 Unrest grows throughout the country. First it was the Berbers, but now mobs of unemployed young men are demonstrating for all manner of shortages (jobs, transportation, housing, schools, and roads). The government is fearful of a mass uprising similar to what happened in Eastern Europe in 1989 (to bring down the communist governments.) The current government is elected, but most of the politicians have been working for the same old crowd of revolutionaries who have been running the country for their own benefit since the 1960s. Ten years of fight Islamic radicals has left over 100,000 dead. Most Algerians are fed up with Islamic radicalism and corrupt government and many younger Algerians are ready to use violence to eliminate both.

November 8, 2002 Rebel attacks left four dead.

November 13, 2002 in two incidents, rebels killed four people.

November 16, 2002 the government is treating the rebels as more of a bandit problem these days. Increasingly, local people are willing to inform on the rebels. This makes it harder for the rebels to move around freely and easier for the police to find and destroy the rebel camps. Unless the public attitude towards the Islamic radical rebels does not change, the rebels will be out of business in another year or so. But public anger at the government still remains and a new rebel organization is likely to arise unless political reforms are made.

November 17, 2002 Rebel violence has left two dead.

November 21, 2002 a rebel bomb in the southeast killed six, while in the northeast, rebels killed three civilians.

November 23, 2002 Rebels ambushed a platoon of soldiers returning from patrol, killing nine and wounding 12.

November 24, 2001 the hard core Islamic rebels are going to be difficult to root out. While the rebels are unpopular with the vast majority of the population, they have plenty of places to hide. The few hundred rebels are operating in huge areas of rural mountains and forests. Also, rebels are increasingly setting off bombs in cities.

November 25, 2002 it was revealed today that an Islamic radical killed last September 12th by Algerian troops was a key (but not senior) al Qaeda operative. The man, Emad Abdelwahid Ahmed Alwan, was a Yemeni who was sent to Algeria to "evaluate" the activities of GSPC.

November 28, 2002 in eastern Algeria, three bombs were planted, and one went off before it was found. This wounded four people. Islamic radicals are suspected.

December 1, 2002 Security forces hunted down and killed three rebels in the northwest.

December 2, 2002 Rebel violence has left four dead.

December 9, 2002 over the last week, large scale riots have broken out in several parts of the country. With the Islamic radicals on the run, popular unrest has developed against the corrupt and inept government. While the Islamic radicals were murderous and intolerant, the inept and corrupt government has killed and demoralized a lot more people. And the people are fed up. Another revolution is in the wind.

December 12, 2002 a bomb went off in a market 200 kilometers west of the capital, killing four.

December 14, 2002 increased rebel violence continued, leaving three civilians and two rebels dead. So far this month, 42 people have died in rebel violence.

December 15, 200 The US is increasing its military aid to Algeria. Special Forces are providing training and Algerian officers are coming to America for military education. Algeria is buying military equipment, but not weapons. The American aid is partly in support of the US War on Terror. Many al Qaeda members are Algerian, although most of these men are outside of Algeria.

December 21, 2002 in last week, several clashes with rebels have left seven rebels and a dozen security troops dead. Most of the dead troops are the result of ambushes. The army hopes to change this situation by getting better communications, night vision and reconnaissance droves (UAVs) from the US. This would make it much more difficult for the rebels to move around at night, which is how they operate most of the time.

December 24, 2002 four rebels were killed by police 350 kilometers southwest of the capital. Weapons and equipment were seized. The four were suspected of three mass murders (at least 40 victims) in the last year.

December 25, 2002 France has told Algeria that substantial foreign aid was dependent on economic and political reforms (mainly, eliminating the corruption.)

December 27, 2002 Thousands of Islamic terrorists have fled Algeria in the last five years, as the army and police gained the upper hand in its war against terrorism. Many of these men fled to Canada and Europe, where they have established al Qaeda cells.

December 29, 2002 the government disarmed 250 local militia after some of them surrendered their weapons to rebels without a fight. Civilians in some areas have been armed so they protect themselves from rebel attacks. But apparently, in some areas, the civilians were willing to trade their weapons to local rebels in return for freedom from attacks.

January 5, 2003 Rebel violence over the weekend left 56 dead. In one incident, rebels ambushed a military convoy in the northeast and killed 43 soldiers.

January 6, 2003 Rebels killed a mayor and an aide at a false roadblock.

January 7, 2003 the last few hundred armed rebels are proving difficult to hunt down and eliminate. These men are the hard core of the hard core and have managed to stay one step ahead of army patrols.

January 9, 2003 using remote control bombs, rebels killed eight soldiers a hundred kilometers east of the capital.

January 12, 2003 over the weekend, troops killed 16 rebels 500 kilometers southeast of the capital. The dead rebels were believed part of the group that earlier killed 43 soldiers.

January 14, 2003 Because more and more Algerian Islamic radical are showing up in European nations, the government is receiving more cooperation and foreign aid from Europe as it moves to crush the remaining Islamic radicals in Algeria.

January 18, 2003 the army says it found men from Pakistan, Afghanistan and Yemen among the 40 rebels it has killed during the last two weeks. The army has been searching for rebel camps in the Aures Mountains of eastern Algeria. The foreigners often have al Qaeda connections, or fought with Algerians against Russians in Afghanistan during the 1980s.

So far this month, rebel violence has left 114 dead, including 70 soldiers and policemen.

January 29, 2003 in several operations, the army killed five rebels.

January 31, 2003 So far this year, rebel violence has left 180 dead, including 80 rebels.

February 3, 2003 The US State Department, facing increased terrorist activity, renewed a 14 month old warning about Americans visiting Algeria.

February 10, 2003 Rebel violence left three policemen dead.

February 12, 2003 the army sees the war against the Islamic militants winding down and is now looking to rebuilding the army as a conventional force. For most of the past decade, the army has largely been employed as light infantry, for anti-terrorism duty. Algeria's 300 T-72 tanks, for example, have been starved for money to buy spare parts. To keep some tanks running, others were cannibalized for parts. The Czech Republic is offering a modernized T-72 tank, as well as armored cars and other military equipment. There were discussions of such a deal in 1997, but no purchases were made.

February 13, 2003 the army is planning on using American night vision equipment to increase night patrols in areas where rebels operate. The rebels have generally operated at night.

February 15, 2003 a rebel ambush in the northeast killed two security troops.

February 18, 2003 So far this month, rebel violence has killed 27. During its peak, in the late 1990s, rebel violence regularly killed fifty times as many people.

February 23, 2003 Rebels activity has left ten dead in several actions over the last week.

February 25, 2003 So far this year, rebel activity has left 220 dead. Several determined groups of Islamic militants continue to elude army and police efforts to catch them. The remaining militants are thought to number less than a thousand men.

February 28, 2003 Interpol will provide Algeria with a global communications system that will better help it track Algerian terrorists outside the country.

March 2, 2003 for the first time in 41 years, the French president visited Algeria and signed a cooperation agreement that will bring substantial economic and political help to Algeria.

Troops killed three rebels 450 kilometers southwest of the capital.

March 4, 2003 Rebel activity has killed about 250 people so far this year.

March 8, 2003 an army raid on a rebel camp 600 kilometers east of the capital left five soldier’s dead and three wounded. The army has been able to advance into some remote mountain regions for the first time in years, because rebel strength has decreased so much that the rebels can no longer keep the army out. Now the army is attacking and destroying the rebel camps, which are often well fortified and defended.

Also in the east, rebels kidnapped one militiaman and wounded another.

March 10, 2003 the government has ordered 42 Mi-171 helicopters, equipped for night operations (night vision goggles and better navigational systems.) Algeria got them at the bargain price of $4.3 million each. The choppers are a military version of the M-8 design, which has been in service for several decades, but has been continually upgraded. It's basically a passenger helicopter that is often armed. Roughly equal to the American UH-1 Huey, but a bit larger.

March 28, 2003 in the past two days, rebels have killed 21 civilians in the west.

April 1, 2003 since late February, 17 European tourists have disappeared in southern Algeria. All were touring the desert in four wheel drive vehicles, some with local guides. There is a group of Islamic extremists in the area that has threatened non-Moslem foreigners in the past.

April 2, 2003 another four European tourists were reported missing in the south. European nations are warning their citizens to stay out of southern Algeria.

April 4, 2003 the tourists are lost in an area 1,500 kilometers southeast of the capital. Helicopters have been searching a huge triangular area 1,700 by 1,900 by 800 kilometers. Local trackers on camels are also scouring likely areas in the region.

April 5, 2003 eight more foreign tourists have been reported mission in southern Algeria. Like the other reported mission since February, all were driving across the Sahara desert in four wheel drive vehicles.

April 7, 2003 now there are 30 European tourists missing in southern Algeria. The foreigners were traveling in five different groups. Five German police investigators have been sent to help with the search, because half the missing people are German.

April 9, 2003 The Austrian government has sent a four man investigation team to southern Algeria to help find the eight Austrians who have disappeared. Switzerland has sent two investigators (four of the missing are Swiss.) Some of the locals in southern Algeria blame poor GPS signals, but no one else has reported GPS problems now, or in the last few months. The situation is quite a mystery. This desolate area, which covers most of southern Algeria, has long been used mainly by smugglers, drug gangs and outlaws of all sorts. Nomadic herders squeeze a living out of the sparse grasslands. A lot of people have guns down there, but even kidnappers get in touch to make their demands. Islamic terrorists kill for publicity, while gangs eventually have to try and sell their booty. But none of the tourist's gear has shown up in area market places. It's a mystery, and a growing one that could go in several directions.

April 13, 2003 the government, using tips from local nomads, have discovered that at least 11 of the 31 missing Europeans in southern Algeria were, indeed, kidnapped. One gang holds ten people, another group holds one.

April 15, 2003 Locals have blamed the missing tourists for going across the desert without a local guide, depending entirely on GPS for navigation. Unfortunately, GPS cannot negotiate with hostile local nomads, nor point out which route is more difficult to navigate than it looks.

April 17, 2003 Contact has been made with one group of kidnappers in southern Algeria and negotiations are under way.

April 18, 2003 So far this month, Islamic rebel activity has left 30 people dead, 25 of them rebels. Since the start of the year, 360 have died because of Islamic rebel violence. This is one of the lowest death tolls in years.

April 24, 2003 The 31 lost Europeans is now thought to be held by a group of Islamic rebels fearful of a government crackdown. The Europeans were grabbed for use as human shields. The Europeans are thought to be held outside the town of Illizi, 1,700 kilometers southeast of the capital.

April 27, 2003 An Algerian army colonel said a truck belonging to two of the 31 missing Europeans had been found. The colonel speculated that the tourists got lost in a major sandstorm that hit the area in late February, and downplayed talk of the Europeans being kidnapped by local bandits. The truck was found 150 kilometers west of Illizi. The area is largely desert wilderness. Algeria contains 775,000 square miles (about a quarter the size of the US) of Sahara desert.

April 30, 2003 the government has sent 5,000 troops, and hired 300 local trackers and 1700 other civilians, to find the 31 missing European tourists. Based on this effort, the government claims it has located several camps of "terrorist camps" where the Europeans are being held. None of the main Islamic radical group’s long active in northern Al geria has been mentioned. Instead, the only group the government has named is a criminal gang headed by self-proclaimed Islamic radical Mokhtar Benmokhtar, who spends most of his time smuggling (cigarettes, weapons, vehicles and anything that will sell.) The Algerian army wants to move on Benmokhtar's camps, but Germany is asking for more time to open negotiations. So far, there have been no reports of ransom, or any other demands, being made by the kidnappers. In fact, it's a little unclear exactly what is going on down here, in the middle of the Sahara desert.

May 2, 2003 Police killed six rebels in eastern Algeria. In the last month, rebel violence has left 84 dead, and 62 of those have been rebels.

May 5, 2003 Rebel violence killed two people south of the capital. Meanwhile, police say they killed a leader of the HDS rebel group in the west. The HDS is down to only about 70 armed members.

May 6, 2003 the government denied it is negotiating with the unnamed groups holding 31 European tourists in southern Algeria. But local newspapers down there say that talks have been going on. Germany is threatening to send its GSG9 hostage rescue commandos: although Algeria has said it does not want foreign troops involved. Apparently someone knows something, but with journalists unable to contact the kidnappers, there's no way to confirm anything.

May 7, 2003 Soldiers patrolling a wooded area outside the capital were ambushed by rebels. Six soldiers died.

May 9, 2003 the government denies that there are any negotiations with kidnappers in southern Algeria, even though the Tourism minister (since dismissed from his job) said there were. Someone is talking to someone, but there appears to be an effort to keep the talks quiet until an agreement can be reached.

May 10, 2003 So far this year, rebel violence has left about 440 dead. This is a sharp decline from previous years. The main rebel groups, the GSPC and GIA, appear unable to recruit new fighters, and many existing ones are either surrendering, slipping back into civilian life or fleeing the country.

May 13, 2003 Algerian army commandos assaulted a rebel hideout in the Sahara desert, 1900 kilometers south of the capital. After a brief battle, which left nine rebels dead, 17 European tourists were freed. The tourists were being held by members of GSPC (Salafist Group for Preaching and Combat), one of the Islamic radical groups still fighting the government. Algeria had found the general location of the GSPC camp by intensive patrolling and talking with people who lived and worked in the region (GSPC is seen as a bunch of murderous cutthroats by most of the population.) Then, aircraft using heat sensors flew over the area at night and found the hidden camp, because of the heat given off by people in the cold desert night. Troops surrounded the area and commandos went in to make the attack.

May 14, 2003 the government won't talk about the other 15 missing European tourists, but apparently does know the general area they are in and is either trying to negotiate with the group holding them, or planning another rescue attack. It is believed that the other Europeans are being held in hills near the Libyan border. Negotiations to ransom the captive tourists apparently broke down over the huge sums (over $20 million per tourist) that were being demanded.

May 15, 2003 after seven years of fighting, the Islamic radicals are down to a few hundred hard core men. The population has largely turned against the Islamic rebels, mainly because the rebels used terror against the population to obtain aid or discourage cooperation with the government. The most common form of terror was murdering entire families, including women and children. This backfired. Recruiting became more difficult, and more people informed on the rebels despite the threats of retaliation. As is common with such groups, some of the remaining rebels are turning to banditry. Although the rebels always did a little crime on the side, overseas funding is now drying up. In the past, it was possible to solicit donations from Algerians living overseas. But since the Algerian rebel groups have been labeled international terrorists, and stories of their savage attacks on civilians have spread, collecting that money has become much more difficult. Iran and Sudan have also provided some cash in the past, but pressure from the United States and other countries has dried up a lot of that. So more and more of the rebels have to fend for themselves. Kidnapping tourists in southern Algeria (there have been no tourists in the north for years), seemed like a good idea. Collect a little ransom, buy some new trucks and SUVs, expand the cigarette smuggling business. But it didn't work out.

May 16, 2003 the earlier releases of 17 hostages was said to be the result of paying millions of dollars in ransom, not just an army rescue operation. There was an army raid, according to the freed hostages, in which several rebels were killed and some soldiers wounded.

May 18, 2003 the government is said to be negotiating with the former GSPC rebels holding 15 kidnapped European tourists near the Libyan border. In return for releasing their captives, the rebels are being offered either free passage out of the country, or amnesty according to the 1999 amnesty law. The rebels are holding out for free passage and a large ransom.

Rebels ambushed and killed three policemen 600 kilometers east of the capital.

May 21, 2003 the army has restricted the movement of journalists along the Libyan border. There, 150 kilometers north of the border town of Illizi, army commandos have been reported preparing to assault rebel positions in the hills there. A splinter group of the GSPC rebels are believed to be holding 15 kidnapped European tourists there. Over the weekend, there were false reports that the army had already made the rescue.

May 25, 2003 Rebels killed six civilians 200 kilometers west of the capital.

May 26, 2003 Earthquakes, and their aftershocks, in the last few days have left over 2,000 dead and many more injured and homeless. But the disaster also revealed government corruption (building codes not being enforced, relief supplies that should be available are not). This has increased existing dissatisfaction with government corruption and brought out Islamic radicals and other political opposition to organized active or even armed, resistance to the current government.

May 27, 2003 Rebels continued their terror campaign against civilians, killing fourteen members of a family 200 kilometers west of the capital. Such massacres are meant to intimidate people to not inform on the rebels, and to provide support (food and information on army and police movements).

May 31, 2003 The Islamic rebels holding 15 European tourists are thought to have split the prisoners into several smaller groups and hidden them in caves in an area of some 2,800 square kilometers near the Libyan border. Police and soldiers have sealed off the area, at least to foreign journalists.

June 3, 2003 Searchers near the Libyan border found four motorcycles and a jeep belonging to the fifteen European tourists being held in the area by Islamic rebels.

June 4, 2003 the government has offered to allow the rebels, holding fifteen European tourists near the Libyan border, to leave the country if they will release their prisoners. Otherwise, the army will go in and free the tourists. This would likely lead to the rebels getting killed, and would likely result in some of the tourists being killed or injured as well. The government has expressed interest in receiving help from foreign armed forces to help make a successful commando attack on the Islamic rebels holding the tourists. This would probably consist of night vision equipment and intelligence gathering capabilities.

June 6, 2003 giving in to European demands that no military action be taken, the government is allowing European governments to negotiate a ransom for the release of the ten Europeans still being held by Islamic radicals near the Libyan border. But many Algerian officials don't want to do this, as it will destroy the tourist industry in the south. If ransom is paid, other bandits and Islamic radicals in the area will see kidnapping foreigners as a quick way to riches. Just the threat of that will scare the tourists off.

June 11, 2003 Tuareg (nomads native to the Sahara) trackers working for the government, found a vehicle belonging to one of the European hostages held captive by Islamic radicals near the Libyan border. The vehicle was booby trapped, and two of the trackers were injured when they searched the van.

Rebel violence so far this year has left at least 530 dead.

June 12, 2003 Rebels killed four people in two incidents.

June 13, 2003 Police killed six rebels.

June 14, 2003 Rebels ambushed an army patrol 300 kilometers east of the capital, killing eight soldiers.

June 16, 2003 a bomb went off in a Berber town, killing four policemen. This is the second such attack in two weeks. Apparently there is now an armed Berber separatist organization operating.

June 17, 2003 the government says the 15 European hostages are still alive, and held in rebel camps near the Libyan border. Apparently ransom negotiations are under way between the governments of the hostages, with Algeria having agreed to let the rebels out of the country with their loot once the hostages are freed. Algeria does not want anyone hurt, as this is bad for the tourist business. So is kidnapping, which will be encouraged if the rebels get away with this.

June 18, 2003 the army said there are only about 700 armed rebels still operating in the country. At their peak, in the mid-1990s, there were some 27,000 rebels active. Over 100,000 have died since the rebellion of Islamic radicals began in 1992. Most of the dead have been civilians (often killed by rebels to insure support) and rebels. The GSPC is the largest remaining rebel group, with about 400 members. This group has links to al Qaeda.

So far this month, rebel activity has left 42 civilians and rebels dead, as well as 20 soldiers and policemen.

June 19, 2003 Rebel violence left four dead.

June 22, 2003 Rebels attacked a village 300 kilometers west of the capital and killed five civilians. In other incidents, seven were killed.

June 24, 2003 in northern Italy, police raided 42 houses and rounded up six members (five Tunisians and a Moroccan) of the Algerian Salafist Group for Preaching and Combat (GSPC), one of the Islamic radical groups operating in Algeria, and the one suspected of holding fifteen Europeans hostage near the Libyan border in southern Algeria. GSPC members have long used Europe as a base. The men arrested in Italy were raising money via criminal activities (various forms of theft and fraud.) European governments tolerated this for many years, but are now cracking down because of the many Algerian Islamic radicals who also work with al Qaeda.

June 25, 2003 So far this month, rebel violence has left 110 dead. It is thought that the two main rebel groups have increased their attacks to take advantage of the army and police being busy dealing with the recent earthquakes (which killed 2,278 and caused enormous damage since the first one occurred May 21. There have been over 1,000 aftershocks since then.)

June 26, 2003 Rebel violence left eight dead. Six of the victims were children, killed by rebels to intimidate villagers into supporting them.

June 28, 2003 Bubonic plague has broken out in western Algeria, but the ten people inflected have been treated.

June 29, 2003 Rebel violence left four dead, while a mass grave was found, containing 13 bodies of people killed by rebels. It is thought that the victims were rebels killed in factional fighting. Normally, rebels want their victims to be seen, as their violence is generally used to control local populations.

But in another sign that the rebel operations are losing their impact, Air France has resumed commercial flights to Algeria, after an absence of nine years.

July 1, 2003 Rebel violence left at least 130 dead in June. Rebels apparently increased their attacks because many army troops and police were diverted to take care of victims of recent earthquakes.

July 7, 2003 a weekend of rebel violence left seven dead.

July 12, 200 the government released FIS (Islamic Salvation Front) leaders Abassi Madani and Ali Belhadj. FIS won elections in 1991, but the military government refused to yield to democratically elect Islamic fundamentalists. The two men are the last of the FIS leaders to be released after serving sentences imposed by military courts in 1992. The banned FIS has mellowed somewhat, especially compared to the Islamic radicals who went to war with the government after 1991. The Islamic movement arose because of corruption and inefficiency in the military dictatorship (run by the men who led the rebellion against the French colonial government in the 1950s and 60s.)

July 14, 2003 Rebels robbed an armored truck, and killed the three guards. The attackers were wearing Afghan style clothing and carrying Russian made weapons.

July 18, 2003 Rebel violence left four dead.

July 20, 2003 the army has been ordered to loosen the siege of Islam radical kidnappers in the south. The kidnap victims are 15 Europeans and the government feels that letting the rebels and their captives move to another country might make getting the Europeans released. But if the rebels and their captives left the country, it would no longer be Algeria's problem, either.

Mali's border police were put on alert, and told to be on the lookout for Algerian Islamic radicals and their fifteen European captives trying to cross the border.

July 30, 2003 the army confirmed that one of the 15 foreign tourists (a German woman) held hostage in the south, had died of heat exhaustion several weeks ago. The 14 other hostages and their Islamic radical captors, have crossed the border into Mali and are apparently still negotiating with the government for ransom and other items in order to get the tourists freed. The Islamic rebellion in Algeria has largely failed and many of the Islamic rebels are looking out for their future. A nice, large ransom would brighten up things considerably.

August 1, 2003 Rebel violence left three dead. Three were civilians killed by a rebel road block 200 kilometers west of the capital. Only 36 people died from rebel violence in July and about 650 so far this year. In the worse years of the rebellion, over 10,000 died a year.

August 3, 2003 five rebels killed by police sweeps, while rebels killed three civilians.

August 13, 2003 Islamic rebels holding 14 Europeans for ransom in Mali have allowed food and medicine to be delivered to their captives. Negotiations for the release of the hostages continue.

August 17, 2003 The 14 European hostages, kidnapped in southern Algeria last February, have been released by Islamic radicals in Mali. A ransom was paid, although how much and by who has not been announced. The Algerian kidnappers were demanding $73 million. The hostages were in several groups and were released to local Turareg tribesmen, who are to bring the hostages to an airport for movement back to Algeria. A Turareg chief, Iyad Ag Ghali, helped in the negotiations. Iyad Ag Ghali is also a successful businessman in northwestern Mali, had led a rebellion against the Mali government until he signed a peace deal in 1991. Since then, he has brokered peace deals with other dissident groups as well.

August 18, 2003 The 14 European hostages released by Islamic radicals in Mali, are apparently now being held by Turareg tribesmen who were to guide the hostages out of the wilderness to an Algerian aircraft that would take them back to civilization. The tribesmen apparently want a share of the ransom for their services. Negotiations continue.

August 19, 2003 The 14 European hostages were finally released and flown home. All were in good shape. The Turaregs may, or may not, have been compensated for their efforts. The Turaregs pretty much control northern Mali, which is part of an arrangement that settled years of rebellious behavior by the tribes. The Turaregs played a critical role in completing the negotiations that got the Europeans released.

August 21, 2003 Negotiators who met with the Algerian rebels holding European tourists were told bluntly that the Algerians were willing to kill the Europeans and die fighting, if necessary. GSPC combat units often fight to the death, and often murder civilians they suspect of not supporting the rebel cause.

August 22, 2003 one of the main Algerian rebels groups, the GSPC (Salafist Group for Preaching and Combat), took credit for kidnapping, and holding for ransom in southern Algeria and Mali, 32 Europeans. The GSPC announcement made no mention of kidnapping for ransom.

August 23, 2003 No one in Germany or Mali are admitting anything about ransom, but it appears that the Algerian Islamic radicals got $5-16 million and that the cash came from either Germany or Libya. The Germans have steadfastly refused to pay ransom for their kidnapped citizens, feeling that this would encourage more such crimes. But only nine of the 14 European hostages were German and there was pressure to make a deal and get the captives out of there. Apparently money was paid, and the Germans are trying to discourage any ideas that this is a new German government policy. To make this point, there is talk of issuing international arrest warrants for the Algerians who kidnapped the Europeans. This would be a major shift for Europe, which has long provided sanctuary and support for the Algerian rebels. But the rebels are on the run in Algeria, support for Islamic radicals is very much in decline and this kidnapping incident went over the line (at least according to European public opinion.)

September 5, 2003 two soldiers will kill by a rebel bomb a hundred kilometers east of the capital.

September 10, 2003 The US government warned its citizens to avoid travel to Algeria. There is fear that Islamic radicals in Algeria are now going after foreigners, either to kidnap for ransom, or to kill them to make a political point. This fear comes from the Islamic rebels wanting to prevent economic reform. The decline in rebel strength has allowed more foreign investment, and influx of foreigners. The rebels want to try and reverse this.

September 20, 2003 At least twelve have died from rebel violence so far this month, with 700 killed so far this year.

The government is harassing journalists and freed rebels (who have served their time) for speaking out against government corruption and ineptitude. The country is still basically run by a military dictatorship, and a rather unpopular one at that.

September 21, 2003 Rebel violence left four dead.

September 24, 2003 at the request of the German government, Algeria has provided names of the rebels it is believed were involved in kidnapping 32 European (including 15 German) tourists in southern Algeria. The Germans taken captive, and later released, said that their captors were interested in ransom from the beginning. The German government has denied that it paid random, but is charging the kidnappers with blackmail and is issuing international arrest warrants. News reports in Germany say the government did pay ransom, but discreetly. The Algerian government has been warning Europeans for years that many of the Islamic radicals in Algeria have fled and are operating in Europe. Some of these Algerian radicals have been arrested in the post-911 sweeps. The Germans are now going after Islamic radicals with a bit more enthusiasm, as the kidnapping incident was huge news in Europe, especially Germany, for months.

September 26, 2003 Rebel violence continues to decline, although twenty have died from rebel action so far this month. The rebels have lost whatever popular support they had, but the government isn't doing so well in the popularity department either. Corruption and tyranny by the former revolutionaries, who have run the place since the French left four decades ago, are breeding a crop of non-Islamic rebels.

September 27, 2003 the army is reported to have been fighting rebels in the eastern mountains for the past two weeks.

October 1, 2003 Rebels ambushed army troops 90 kilometers south of the capital, killing eight soldiers.

October 5, 2003 there is apparently a lot of army activity in the mountains of eastern Algeria.

October 6, 2003 Rebel raiders killed a village guard 200 kilometers west of the capital. Rebel bands raid isolated villages for food and other supplies, killing local guards if there is resistance. These attacks are taking place in rural areas throughout the country.

October 9, 2003 over the last several weeks, thousands of troops have been combing the eastern mountains, seeking suspected rebel camps. Aerial reconnaissance and interrogations of captured rebels has led the army to believe they know where GSPC (Salafist Group for Preaching and Combat) camps are. The GSPC has worked with al Qaeda in the past it and it was feared that some al Qaeda may have fled from Afghanistan to Algeria. Dozens (or more) of the al Qaeda in Afghanistan were Algerian, as are many members of al Qaeda worldwide. The operations in the east have left at least 33 rebels dead and many more family members of rebels captured. Because of the war on terror, GSPC (and the smaller GIA) have lost contributions from overseas, and support from many Algerians at home.

October 12, 2003 one of the two Islamic radical organizations still fighting the government has replaced its leader. The GSPC (Salafist Group for Preaching and Combat) deposed (and possibly killed), Hassan Hattab partly because of the recent incident where 32 European tourists were kidnapped and held for ransom in southern Algeria. Hattab did nothing to stop this, even though the kidnappers belonged to the GSPC. The kidnapping made it a lot more difficult for the GSPC to operate in Europe (which is used as a base area for recruiting and fund raising). The new GSPC leader, Nabil Sahraoui (alias Abu Ibrahim Mustapha) has much closer ties to al Qaeda. The government estimates that GSPC only has about 400 armed members left.

October 16, 2003 Rebel violence has left 23 dead so far this month, far less than in the past.

October 22, 2003 The GSPC (Salafist Group for Preaching and Combat) has openly declared its cooperation and alliance with al Qaeda. This has long been suspected. The GSPC split off from the older GIA (Armed Islamic Group) because the GSPC people wanted to kill large numbers of civilians in order to terrorize the population into supporting the rebels. The GIA wanted to continue to just attack government and military targets.

While the rebels are taking a beating, the government has to face broader resistance from the general population. The people running the government are the same group of elderly revolutionaries that led the revolution against France in the 1950s and 60s. This group, now in its second generation, because corrupt early on. Corruption and mismanagement of the economy have led to high unemployment and low economic growth. The people are unhappy and another revolution is in the air. In the early 1990s, Islamic parties were popular, but these are now seen as bloody minded tyrants. But the people want a change, one way or another.

October 23, 2003 Army operations across the country destroyed four GSPC safe houses, captured and destroyed several bombs and killed five rebels. So far this month, 38 rebels have been killed, along with about a dozen civilians and police.

October 25, 2003 American "counter-terrorism" cooperation with Algeria will intensify at a time when an Algerian Islamic guerrilla group pledged its loyalty to the al Qaeda network. Washington budgeted another $700,000 to help Algeria train soldiers.

The few hundred remaining rebels (including the Salafist Group for Preaching and Combat, or GSPC, which is now publicly tied to the al Qaeda network) are getting desperate, since their numbers are down from the estimated 25,000 rebels in the 1990s. Life in Algeria is almost returning to normal, with only 90 murders during Ramadan in 2002 (compared to 1,200 a few years prior). Back in the 1990s, Ramadan had become known as the "Jihad month" for being Algeria's bloodiest time of the year. - Adam Geibel

October 27, 2003 Western and Arab intelligence sources claim that Al - Qaeda is building secret bases in Mali's Sahara desert region, particularly in the north, and the area near the Algerian border, with the help of Algerian extremists. Regional intelligence spotted an influx of Islamic extremists from Yemen, Saudi Arabia, Egypt and Pakistan, concluding that Algerian extremist groups were helping them relocate to the Sahara.

The Sahara, stretching between Mauritania and southern Libya, is only loosely patrolled by the forces of Algeria, Libya, Niger, Mauritania and Mali. For instance, Mali rejected a French demand that it crack down on people trafficking organizations that help illegal immigrants reach Europe and North America, arguing that such immigrants send home $65 million a year in remittances.

The French Ministry of the Interior has estimated that there about 120,000 Malian immigrants in France, 60 percent there illegally. There are also large Malian immigrant communities in the United States, Spain and Italy. - Adam Geibel

October 28, 2003 in several clashes, two soldiers and one rebel were killed.

October 29, 2003 Rebels killed three civilians 70 kilometers west of the capital.

November 6, 2003 Police and army operations in the west left six rebels dead and a many weapons and homemade bombs seized.

November 7, 2003 Army operations in the west left ten rebels dead and several arms caches uncovered. Several days of raids and sweeps by several thousand troops and police attempted to find rebel camps, safe houses and weapons supplies.

November 8, 2003 Rebels attacked police and civilians 120 kilometers south of the capital. There were four wounded and the rebels got away.

November 9, 2003 Rebel violence has left nearly 800 dead so far this year.

November 13, 2003 Army operations in the west killed another six rebels, while three soldiers died.

November 16, 2003 since the month long Islamic holy month of Ramadan began on October 27, 27 rebels have died. The kidnapping of tourists in the southern desert earlier this year has largely eliminated the tourist business in that part of the country. The army operations against the rebels have forced many of them to flee the country, often to France and other European countries. The rebels, who are Islamic radicals, often become part of al Qaeda cells overseas.

November 19, 2003 in two clashes, two security men were killed.

November 20, 2003 Newspapers reported that the head of the largest rebel organization (Rachid Abu of the Armed Islamic Group or GIA) had been captured. The government has not confirmed this, and similar reports in the past have turned out to be wrong. But if true, the world will now be a better place. When Rachid Abou took over leadership of the GIA in early 2002, he said he could kill all those who opposed GIAs goals (of an Islamic Republic) and that, "We will continue to destroy their harvests, take their goods, rape their women, decapitate them in the cities, the villages and the deserts." He will not be missed by most Algerians.

November 22, 2003 The Islamic radicals who have waged a civil war for the last eleven years have been marginalized. Most of the Islamic radical parties have made peace with the government, leaving only some fringe (but still vicious and murderous) groups operating. But the government remains corrupt and inefficient and another rebellion is brewing if current problems are not solved.

November 28, 2003 A Saudi prince, and nine others, was killed when their hunting expedition was ambushed by rebels. Three Saudis and four Algerians were taken captive, but police tracked the rebel group and freed the captives 40 kilometers from the scene of ambush (250 kilometers south of the capital.) The Saudis had been on a hunting expedition and were escorted by troops and police.

December 3, 2003 The United States is urging the Algerian government to hold clean elections and abide by the results. But the current Algerian government is run by the revolutionaries (and their families) who liberated the country from France four decades ago, and this bunch doesn't want to lose power and knows they would probably lose a fair election.

December 7, 2003 Two Algerians, seeking political asylum in Britain, told reporters that they belonged to the Algerian secret police and had participated in killings of civilians, killings which were then blamed on Islamic radicals. The two men also said they saw many incidents of torture of captured Islamic radicals. Accusations that the government has been responsible for many of the civilian deaths, and used torture against captured Islamic radicals, have been bouncing around for years. But firm evidence is hard to come by. The Algerian government does have a large secret police force, and the country is pretty much run like a police state.

December 15, 2003 Algerian security forces have broken up the networks that supported the terrorists in their country, while the groups themselves have fragmented. Recent clemency plans, along with a 1999 blanket amnesty for members of the Islamic Salvation Front, have taken thousands of fighters out of action. The Salafist Group for Preaching and Combat (GSPC) and the Armed Islamic Group (GIA) are said to be the only two Islamic extremist groups still active in Algeria. Both want to oust the secular government and replace it with a fundamentalist regime.

The GIA is reputed to be the blood-thirstiest of the radical Islamic gangs in Algeria, but is said to be on its last legs and now musters only about 30 members.

The GSPC, which used to be the largest and best organized of the armed formations, has been split into at least three factions by internal rivalries. Two groups were allegedly contained and the third was last reported to be on the border between Algeria and Morocco.

If these groups are blocked in Algeria, then it would be only logical for them to move south into less-controlled regions down through Mali, Mauritania and the Western Sahara to Senegal. - Adam Geibel

December 26, 2003 Mali claimed that it was taking all necessary steps to make guarantee their country did not become a rear-area base for Islamic radicals acting against their neighbors. Mali's security forces clamped down on their northern Timbuktu 40 kilometers from the border with Mauritania, 24 hours after armed Islamist fighters were spotted in the region. The group was traveling aboard dozens of all -terrain vehicles along the frontier and their intentions were unknown. While no strength figures were given, the number was large enough for the government to "significantly bolster security" in the zone.

Suspected Mauritanian military coup plotters from the June 2003 attempt may have also crossed into Mali and security forces are still seeking the Algerian terrorists who kidnapped 32 European tourists for ransom. The last hostages were released in the Malian desert in August. US soldiers were expected to arrive in the vast desert region of northern Mali in the near future, either to help train Malian forces for peacekeeping missions or "how to fight against terrorism." - Adam Geibel

January 7, 2004 in a region 350 kilometers west of Algiers, government authorities rounded up 25 people on charges of forming cells for supporting terrorists. However, in 2003 violence in Algeria blamed on radical Islamic groups sharply declined, due to the increasing efficiency of security forces and divisions among the terrorists. Less than 900 people (including 420 described as terrorists) were killed in incidents attributed to the extremists, compared to a total of 1,400 deaths in 2002 and 1,900 in 2001. More importantly, there have been no major attacks reported in the capital and other major cities for more than a year. - Adam Geibel

January 12, 2004 after receiving information of threats against American interests in Mauritania and Senegal, the United States dispatched an anti - terror team to the region on January 10. Under a $100 million antiterrorist initiative for Mauritania, Mali, Chad and Niger, this small team will be followed by more US Army personnel and California-based defense contractors over the following months. This program will help the region's governments guard their desert borders against Islamic extremists.

This first team will teach, train and reinforce the capacities of the Mauritanian army for about a week, although American officials declined to say how many experts were on the team in Mauritania or where they were based. The Mauritanians initially being trained are responsible for frontier surveillance against cross-border terrorism.

In addition to indicators of threats against Americans in Mauritania and in Senegal, the weakly policed frontiers along the Western Africa's Sahara are potential crossing points for armed Muslim extremist groups. No country in Western Africa has seen a terror attack against American or European interests to date, but there is already Al Qaeda cells in-place in the region.

Two days before, the Al Qaeda-allied Algerian Islamic militant group Salafist Group for Preaching and Combat (known by its French acronym GSPC) accused the United States of plotting to take control Algeria's key hydrocarbons industry, but did not say whether it would try to attack US investments.

There are plenty of lucrative targets in the region. In addition to Mauritania's recent discoveries, the GSPC terrorists have plenty to work with right at home. Algeria earned a record $24 billion from its oil and gas exports (or 95 percent of its foreign revenue) in 2003. American oil companies have invested billions of dollars in Algeria's oil infrastructure. Work on the third trans-Mediterranean gas-pipeline connecting Arzew to Almeria (Spain) will begin on January 14th. This 2,200 kilometer long gas - pipeline will have a capacity of 4 billion cubic meters a year, supplementing the currently saturated pipeline (which has reached its capacity of 11 billion cubic meters a year). - Adam Geibel

January 14, 2004 Algerian authorities have had some success mopping up more radical Islamic terrorist cells. Two terrorists affiliated with the GSPC and part of a cell active in the Zen mountains surrendered to the police.

At 1 A.M. the day before, Algiers's Security Agency and the government antiterrorism brigade killed one terrorist and arrested seven others in Algiers. Those seven arrested constituted a support network in Algiers that was supplying housing and food to GSPC cells.

Two terrorists were stopped at a road block, after taking possession of a Toyota truck that distributed butane gas and cross loading 25 bottles into a small tarpaulin-covered truck. The second vehicle was being driven towards an urban target. After interrogation, the surviving suspect gave up the names and locations of the other six. - Adam Geibel

January 17, 2004 the leader of the Islamic Front for Salvation (FIS) extended a general call for halting the bloodshed in Algeria, to start with the February 1 beginning of the Eid al-Adha holiday. This would be the first step for a peace program described as a "national people initiative" to solve the country's ongoing crisis with hard line Islamics. However, he also called for postponing the presidential elections scheduled for April (until their legitimacy and credibility could be established) and a general presidential amnesty for all victims of Algeria's 12-year civil war. Both of these suggestions will probably go over like lead balloons with the government.

The FIS political party, banned since 1993, has called for an end to violence before and claims to not want to subject Algeria to a theocratic form of government. The FIS' armed wing is the Islamic Liberation Army (AIS), which at its height was thought to have 4,000 men infiltrated into both eastern and western Algeria. - Adam Geibel

January 30, 2004 Troops in southern Algeria seized a rebel arms shipment containing heavy machine guns, RPGs, mortars, 200 AK-47s, sniper rifles with telescopic sites and thousands of rounds of ammunition for these weapons. The GSPC rebels had paid for this shipment, and were trying to move it north to arm new recruits in the north. Several rebels were killed in the action.

February 3, 2004 In Italy, five members (an Egyptian, an Algerian, a Moroccan and two Tunisians) of the Algerian terrorist group GSPC were convicted of terrorism and sentenced to prison. While GSPC began as an Algerian organization, its overseas branches contain members from other Arab countries and are a close ally of al Qaeda.

February 4, 2004 GSPC (Salafist Group for Preaching and Combat) is the most dangerous Islamic terrorist group in Algeria, and is down to a few hundred members, split into factions.

The other Algerian Islamic rebel group GIA is all but wiped out and said to have only a few dozen members left.

Last year, the GSPC split into at least three factions because of internal rivalries. Two groups stayed in northern Algeria and have been hurt badly by police and army operations. The third faction headed south, to the border between Algeria and Morocco.

The GSPC has openly declared its cooperation and alliance with al Qaeda. This has long been suspected. The GSPC originally split off from the older GIA (Armed Islamic Group) because the GSPC people wanted to kill large numbers of civilians in order to terrorize the population into supporting the rebels. The GIA wanted to continue to just attack government and military targets.

Last year, factional fighting in the GSPC led to the death of its leader, Hassan Hattab. A major reason for Hattab's death was the kidnapping of 32 European tourists a year ago in southern Algeria. Hattab did nothing to stop this, even though the kidnappers belonged to the GSPC. The kidnapping made it a lot more difficult for the GSPC to operate in Europe (which is used as a base area for recruiting and fund raising). The new GSPC leader, Nabil Sahraoui (alias Abou Ibrahim Mustapha) has much closer ties to al Qaeda. Back then, the government estimated that GSPC had only about 400 armed members left. But since the kidnappers collected a five million dollar ransom from European governments (for the release of their citizens), the groups is buying weapons and recruiting again.

While the Islamic rebels have been reduced to a few hundred diehards, the government has to face broader resistance from the general population. The people running the government are the same group of elderly revolutionaries that led the revolution against France in the 1950s and 60s. This group, now in its second generation, because corrupt early on. Corruption and mismanagement of the economy have led to high unemployment and low economic growth. The people are unhappy and another revolution is in the air. In the early 1990s, Islamic parties were popular, but these are now seen as bloody minded radicals. But the people want a change, one way or another.

February 9, 2004 over the weekend, rebel activity left two police and one rebel dead.

February 12, 2004 Rebels killed seven security police outside the capital. GSPC rebels also set off bombs at two construction sites around the city.

February 15, 2004 despite continued attacks, the Islamic radical rebels have lost their ability to instill widespread fear. The few hundred rebels still at large are seen as criminals, not supporters of the popular will against an oppressive government. The government is still seen as oppressive and inept, but the Islamic militants are no longer seen as the solution. Upcoming elections are supposed to be fair and the results are to be respected by the current government (which is, basically, a military dictatorship.)

February 17, 2004 Three US teams are training three 100-man Malian units in the Mali capital, the eastern town of Gao and the desert city of Timbuktu to combat arms trafficking and banditry in the North. Skeptics claim that there is no firm evidence of Al Qaeda penetration in the region and that some West African leaders deliberately exaggerate the threat in order to get donations of cash and military training.

In late January, it was reported that France's DGSE foreign intelligence service played a key role in preventing a plot by a 100-strong gang to attack participants in the Paris-Dakar rally. The group had intended to kidnap two leading racers in Mali's southern Sokolo region on January 10, but fled north into Algeria's wastelands once they realized their ambush scheme had been discovered. The French had intelligence that the kidnappers' leader was Abderrazak the Para, a former Algerian paratrooper who the Algerian authorities have tied to the Salafist Group for Call and Combat (which has ties to Al-Qaeda). - Adam Geibel

February 20, 2004 Algeria's prime minister said that rebels fighting for a Taliban-style Islamic state were no longer a threat, but might try to strike on the eve of the April 8 presidential election. An amnesty and a military offensive have cut the number of rebels from about 25,000 in the early 1990s to fewer than 1,000.

Algeria has defended efforts to lift its 12-year-old state of emergency in the face of international pressure, insisting that it should remain in place so long as the country is fighting Islamic rebels. Algeria declared a state of emergency in February 1992, shortly after military-backed authorities canceled legislative elections the radical Islamic Salvation Front (FIS) was set to win. In actuality, the state of emergency is a good way to keep a lid on internal dissent. - Adam Geibel

February 22, 2004 a casual after-dinner remark by Spain's defense minister, that he would have liked to assert sovereignty over the uninhabited Perejil Island, threatened to re-ignite an old rift between

Spain and Morocco. The two countries broke off diplomatic ties in 2002, when Moroccan soldiers occupied the island and Spain sent in troops to recapture it. Fishing rights off Morocco's Atlantic coast, illegal immigration and Spain's position on the Western Sahara dispute are the main points of friction between the two neighbors. Earlier in the month, Morocco protested a low-altitude flight by Spanish warplanes over northern Morocco and demanded an explanation

The United Nations peacekeeping mission in Western Sahara also hailed the recent decision by the Fronted POLISARIO group to release 100 Moroccan prisoners-of-war. - Adam Geibel

February 23, 2004 Spanish police announced the arrest of two Algerian men with alleged ties to Al Qaeda. The two men, arrested in two southeastern cities and accused of falsifying documents (including passports), have links to Ramzi Binalshibh, a Yemeni who was allegedly a key planner of the September 11th attacks.

Dozens of protesters rioted around 500 kilometers south of Algeria's capital, were angry that candidates from Algiers were favored over local people for jobs in the oil sector. Riots are a regular occurrence, over problems like inadequate water, electricity supplies of housing, as well as unemployment. Nearly one third of the Algerian work force are without jobs, so jobs in the oil and natural gas sector (especially with foreign firms) are coveted for their good pay and benefits. - Adam Geibel

March 8, 2004 for the first time this month, rebel violence left two policemen dead. Last month, rebel violence killed fifty people.

March 11, 2004 A hundred or so members of the GSPC (Salafist Group for Preaching and Combat) have apparently decided to help al Qaeda rebuild its training camps in southern Algeria. European police, in the past year, have arrested over a hundred GSPC members for terrorist activities. GSPC has long recruited among the Algerian refugee population in Europe. Although the GSPC went through an internal fight late last year (over the al Qaeda issue), the majority of the few hundred active members left have apparently moved south. The US is offering military aid to help the Algerians track the Islamic radicals in the deserts and mountains of southern Algeria. This arrangement may include an American base in Algeria. American aid would include UAVs to patrol those deserts and mountains, as well as Special Forces troops to train and work with the Algerian army.

March 13, 2004 Military officials have said that there are no US troops in Algeria at present but Deputy Commander of the US European Command General Charles Wald gave few details of the extent of America's cooperation with Algeria, other than saying "we have every intention in the world to help them where we can." He characterized the assistance as not always actual troop deployments but often simply information sharing. Wald had just returned from a seven-day, 11-nation tour of Africa. Wald forecasts increased military cooperation in the future. On March 22, Algeria's defense chief and others from North Africa and the Sahel region will visit the European Command in Stuttgart, Germany for talks.

It is claimed that Wald's recent visit was primarily aimed at discussing plans to build a US monitoring base in the province of Tamenrast (2,000 kilometers south of Algiers). This post would be for satellite monitoring and communications analysis. If established, it would be placed under the direct command of the Algerian army and won't have a permanent US staff.

The US embassy in Algiers quickly denied having any military bases in Algeria but asserted that they were actively working with the North African country to fight terrorism. General Wald has pointed out that the two 200 man Special Operations teams engaged in counter-terrorism training in Mali and Mauritania has already enjoyed a "huge payback." The training missions in Mali, Niger, Mauritania and Chad are part of a State Department-funded program called The Pan Sahel Initiative (PSI). - Adam Geibel

March 14, 2004 a spokesman for Algeria's influential military said that they will not intervene in the April 8 presidential election and have no preferred candidate. Army-backed authorities had cancelled legislative elections that a hard line Islamic party was poised to win in 1992. This set off fighting that has left over 150,000 people dead, largely at the hands of rebels. - Adam Geibel

March 17, 2004 Islamic rebels used a fake roadblock, 80 kilometers south of the capital, to kill seven civilians.

March 19, 2004 in the past week, army and police operations have killed at least 17 Islamic rebels, mainly from the GSPC.

March 29, 2004 the remaining Islamic radicals have fled to remote camps in the coastal mountains, and the Sahara in the far south. There are only a few hundred of these, largely GSPC, men left and they are being energetically pursued by police and troops in the north, and troops (some trained and advised by American Special Forces) in the south. But the corrupt government and high unemployment in Algeria means that GSPC can still find recruits among the unemployed young men.

March 31, 2004 Algerian intelligence officers believe that the remaining Islamic radical group is GSPC and that this outfit will now go after the growing number of foreign companies investing in the country. In particular, the few hundred armed GSPC terrorists left will target foreign oil companies. The logic of this is that by scaring away foreign investment, the economy will get worse and the people will be more willing to support the Islamic radicals (who will not change the poverty, but at least it will be Islamic poverty.) This may get the militiamen their jobs back.

April 2, 2004 one sure sign that the war with Islamic radicals is over is the dismissal of most of the 500,000 local militiamen. These civilians were paid a good wage to carry guns and just keep the Islamic radicals out of villages and neighborhoods. Thousands died, killed by groups of Islamic radicals who were able to overpower the local militia force. The government started taking back the guns and stopping the monthly payments last year. Now the process is nearly complete, and there are several hundred thousand more restive unemployed men in the country.

April 9, 2004 the presidential election resulted in current president Abdelaziz Bouteflika was reelected with 83 percent of the vote (58 percent of eligible voters turned out.) International poll watchers declared the vote fair. Bouteflika got re-elected because he is generally regarded as responsible for winning a war against Islamic radicals which has, in the last dozen years, killed over 100,000 people (in a country of 32 million).

April 10, 2004 while the Islamic radicals have been defeated, the country is still run by a few hundred families, most led by someone who was prominent in the fight to force out the French colonial government during the late 1950s and early 1960s. Corruption and inept government have created a weak economy and 25 percent unemployment. If president Bouteflika and his cronies don't clean up the corruption and get the economy going, there will soon be more, non-Islamic, rebel movements emerging. Bouteflika has brought in foreign investment and made decisions that have created more jobs. But not enough to really make a dent in the unemployment.

Several hundred Islamic radicals are still around in the northern part of the country. The population is hostile to the Islamic radicals, which makes it difficult for the radicals to carry out terrorist operations in the cities. But the threat is there.

April 19, 2004 Abdelaziz Bouteflika was sworn in for a second five -year term as president. While Bouteflikas policies of aggressive police and military action, as well as offers of amnesty, has crippled the Islamic rebel organizations, he still has problems with massive corruption in the government, economic stagnation and growing anger among the third of the population that are Berbers (a non-Arab people that have lived in the region for thousands of years). The most difficult opponent will be the corruption, because those most involved in the stealing and double - dealing are the president's closest allies and political supporters. Another revolution is just around the corner, it just hasn't been fully organized yet.

Some 110 kilometers east of the capital, a roadside bomb killed two soldiers, showing that some of the Islamic rebels are still at it.

April 21, 2004 Three men dressed as police officers, on a roadside 70 kilometers west of the capital, sprayed a passing car with gunfire, killing all three people inside. The gunmen, who were apparently rebels, then fled. Then again, the men may have been bandits who panicked.

April 23, 2004 Some 300 members of the GSPC rebel group have agreed to surrender. The government offered amnesty and secret negotiations with the rebels led to the deal.

May 4, 2004 Over the weekend, rebels killed ten people in several different incidents.

May 6, 2004 The government is negotiating for the surrender of some 300 GSPC rebels. The GSPC leader has issued a statement denying this. But it is known that GSPC, the last major rebel group, has broken up into several factions. There are thought to be fewer than a thousand armed GSPC members still active. The number might be closer to 500. No one is sure. But there has been a big fall off in GSPC attacks, and army sweeps of rural areas long frequented by the GSPC, find only long abandoned camps. Meanwhile, countries along Algeria's southern border report an increase in small groups of armed Algerians passing through. Niger troops recently killed four armed Algerians, who were believed to be Islamic radicals belonging to GSPC.

It is believed that most key GSPC rebels have fled to Europe, or are trying to set up new camps in countries south of Algeria. But the "southern strategy" in running into hostility from those nations on Algeria's southern border, and American Special Forces troops, who are training and working with Algeria's southern neighbors to beef up border security.

May 11, 2004 Former members of the GSPC, the last remaining Islamic rebel group in Algeria, report that last year, the founder and leader of the group, Hassan Hattab, was tried for "heresy and treason" by his key subordinates, and then shot to death. Hattab was killed because he wanted to negotiate an end of the violence with the government. One of the men who killed him, Amari Saifi, took a group of GSPC men to southern Algeria, where they kidnapped 32 European tourists, extracted six million dollars in ransom from the German government, and were recently caught in Chad. The GSPC is itself a splinter group of the GIA, which has made peace with the government in 1998. The GSPC split off in 1998 to protest the GIA decision to stop the rebellion.

May 15, 2004 Police in eastern Algeria arrested fifteen people for providing shelter and aid for Islamic radical rebels. Weapons and ammunition was also discovered in the houses of some of those arrested. The Islamic rebels used to have the support of the majority of Algerians, but the rebels use of terror and murder to keep civilian supporters in line eventually turned off all but a few percent of the population.

May 18, 2004 Some 300 kilometers east of the capital, two bombs went off, killing two soldiers and wounding 13 other people.

May 19, 2004 GSPC leader Amari Saifi was reported to have been arrested in Chad, where he had been held by Chadian rebels after escaping an ambush engineered by American Special Forces. Saifi, nicknamed "the Para" (because he was once an Algerian paratrooper), became the head of the GSPC last year when he shot his boss for "heresy and treason."

June 2, 2004 GSPC rebels ambushed an army convoy in eastern Algeria and killed ten soldiers and wounding 45.

June 4, 2004 GSPC leader Amari Saifi was apparently bought from his Chadian captors by the Algerian government. The Chad rebels who held Saifi, and 16 other GSPC men, offered their captives to interested parties and, in effect, auctioned them off. One of more groups representing Islamic radical groups were in the bidding. Saifi and two other senior GSPC officials, were turned over to Algerian troops in northern Niger. Algeria holds Saifi and the GSPC responsible for the deaths of thousands of Algerian civilians, soldiers and police. There will probably be a trial, preceded by a lengthily interrogation. Negotiations continue with the Chad rebels to obtain the other 14 GSPC men held captive. No one has mentioned how much money is involved here, but the Algerians have spent hundreds of millions of dollars on fighting the GSPC, and Amari Saifi is the last notable leader the GSPC has produced. A price of $5-10 million for Saifi would not be out of line.

June 5, 2004 The air force is buying fifty Russian MiG-29MT fighters for $30 million each. The MiG-29 is roughly equivalent to the American F-16, and the Russians are selling them to the Algerians for about half what F-16s would cost. The MiG-29s will replace older Russian aircraft. The last Algerian purchase of Russian warplanes was in 1992, when 22 Su-24MK fighter-bombers were bought for a cut rate price of $5.5 million each.

June 6, 2004 While Islamic rebel violence is down, it has still killed 250 so far this year, and 40 in May alone. The army has sent over 10,000 troops to eastern Algeria to search for the few remaining GSPC terror groups.

June 10, 2004 The main Islamic radical group, the GSPC, has declared that it will kill every infidel (non-Moslem) in Algeria.

June 17, 2004 GSPC leader Amari Saifi is apparently being auctioned off to the highest bidder. The Algerian government wants him, but apparently wealthy al Qaeda groups are willing to match what the Algerians are willing to pay. The Chad group (the MDJT rebels) now expect Germany to kick in a few million dollars, because their captives had kidnapped German citizens two years ago. The United States has urged MDJT to quit screwing around and hand over the GSPC prisoners. If MDJT does this, the U.S. will put in a good word for MDJT as they try and resolve their differences with the Chad government. If MDJT, which is basically a tribal organization feuding with the Chad government, collects millions of dollars for their captives, they will want to cease being rebels so they can freely spend their new found wealth.

June 20, 2004 In the last four days, police in eastern Algeria have killed seven rebels. There are several groups of GSPC rebels (totaling about 150 men) operating in the area, and are still killing police and civilians. So far this month, police and troops have killed about 40 rebels, while 20 civilians and security personnel have died. In central Algeria, there are another 180 GSPC rebels operating, and fewer than a hundred in the far south, near the border areas.

June 21, 2004 One of the rebels killed in the last few days turned out to be GSPC leader Nabil Sahraoui. There are few experienced GSPC leaders left, and unless some new ones appear, GSPC will simply disintegrate for want of effective leadership.

June 27, 2004 Rebels kidnapped two civilians south of the capital. The two were found dead two days later, and a fireman was killed when a bomb, hidden under one of the bodies, went off.

June 29, 2004 Five rebels were killed in several clashes, as troops and police continue to search for rebel camps in rural areas east of the capital. The rebels are too unpopular to hide out in populated areas. Instead, they set up camp in rural areas, kill a few shepherds or others who wander near their camps, and rely on fear among the locals to keep the camps hidden.

June 30, 2004 The government has shut down the local operations of news network al Jazeera. The government is not happy with al Jazeera's pro-terrorist reporting. Al Jazeera tends to report Islamic terrorist attacks as if they were a sporting competition, with the Islamic terrorists always being the home team. This does not bother Arab governments when the victims are non-Arabs, but it's another matter when the Islamic terrorists are operating locally and al Jazeera is cheering them on.

July 1, 2004 The death toll from rebel violence is down to about two people a day. Most of the dead are now rebels.

July 20, 2004 The GSPC, the major Islamic terrorist group, has admitted, via their web site, that their leader, Nabil Sahraoui (also known as Mustapha Abou Ibrahim) is "missing," along with several other key aides. The government claimed to have killed Sahraoui on June 20th, along with three of his subordinate leaders. GSPC has been very quiet of late, and police believe that few of the Islamic terrorists, the last organized group in the country, are still loose. The population has turned against the Islamic radical GSPC, and provide the police with information. This makes it difficult for the GSPC to maintain themselves, as police and army patrols quickly come after them whenever they show up in an inhabited area looking for food or other supplies.

This won't be the end of terrorism, however, because there is still widespread dislike for the corruption and inefficiency in the government.

August 1, 2004 A roadside bomb went off in a town 350 kilometers east of the capital, killing three men providing security for construction of an electrical distribution system. Islamic terrorists have attacked economic targets in the past, the last attack occurring this past June. There used to be a lot more such attacks, but the number of active Islamic terrorists going after economic targets is thought to be very low, perhaps only a few dozen men.

August 2, 2004 The military, which has dominated Algerian politics since independence from France in the 1960s, is apparently losing its grip on power. The army chief of staff abruptly resigned today, amid rumors that the president was going to, for the first time, appoint a civilian to run the ministry of defense. The military domination of the government has been very unpopular with most Algerians, and was the cause of over a decade of terrorism by Islamic radicals. This terror campaign is just about over, but the anger at the corrupt and inept rule of the generals continues.

August 4, 2004 The government believes that the primary police problem is now crime, not terrorism. So far this year, criminal activity has resulted in 5,000 serious incidents, and 167 murders. Not bad for a country of 33 million. Police and army operations against the remaining Islamic terrorists is still causing more deaths than crime, but the number of terrorists continues to decline. There are thought to be fewer than two hundred armed Islamic terrorists still on the lose.

August 18, 2004 Two terrorist bombs, set off as army patrols went by east of the capital, killed two soldiers and wounded another.

August 20, 2004 The Islamic terrorists have lost control of the roads. For over a decade, the terrorists were relatively free to set up roadblocks, and rob and kill people coming through. But now police and army patrols along the coastal roads have, for the first time in over a decade, enabled Algerians to freely use the roads. There are still several hundred Islamic terrorists in eastern Algeria, in the wooded hills not far from the coast. But over the last few years, more and more of the Islamic radicals were killed or driven deep into the hills. The patrols have made it too dangerous for the terrorists to operate along the roads.

August 25, 2004 A group of about 30 GSPC rebels set fire to a youth center 50 kilometers east of the capital, then ambushed soldiers and police who came down the coast road. Five soldiers and two policemen were killed. The rebels were chased back into the hills. If past experience is any guide, this group of rebels will be hunted down and all of them killed or captured.

August 31, 2004 Violence connected with Islamic radicals has left about 40 people dead during July and August. So far this year, 340 have died in the violence.

September 1, 2004 Two weeks have passed since the Islamic radical group GSPC promised a terror offensive in Algeria's cites. Nothing has happened, confirming the general belief that the GSPC no longer has the manpower to operate on a wide scale. The Islamic radicals have lost broad popularity, or fear, they once had with the general population. This means that someone will usually turn in any Islamic radicals who show up in a populated area. This is a major disadvantage for an underground movement. The GSPC tried to force local populations to be loyal by killing entire families of those suspected of informing on them. But this backfired after several years, and now the Islamic radical groups are more despised than feared.

September 6, 2004 The GSPC announced that they have selected a new leader Abou Mossab Abdelwadoud. He replaces Nabil Sahraoui, who was killed by the army last June. Sahraoui replaced a leadership crew that was captured in Chad earlier this year. The GSPC has undergone changes in leadership every few months for the last year. Abdelwadoud was known as an expert bomb maker, and has been a terrorist since 1998.

September 10, 2004 Army patrols east of the capital encountered some GSPC rebels and killed five of them.

September 12, 2004 The government is now negotiating with the Chad government in an effort to get custody of GSPC leaders held prisoner by Chad rebel group MDJT in northern Chad. Negotiations with MDJT have failed partly because of opposition from the Chad government. It is feared that some wealthy al Qaeda backer could come up with enough money to ransom the GSPC leaders, but so far this has not happened. So Algeria is trying to work out a ransom deal with both MDJT and the Chad government. While the GSPC has appointed new leaders back in Algeria, the new crew are not as capable as the ones held prisoner by the Chad rebels.

September 14, 2004 Police killed six Islamic rebels 300 kilometers west of the capital. The dead men, who were caught with weapons during a security sweep, were thought to be members of the GSPC.

September 16, 2004 Islamic radicals continue to operate, but in increasingly reduced numbers. Hundreds of the Islamic rebels have fled the country in the past few years, and their money, and other support, are key to keeping the Islamic terrorism going inside Algeria. However, police and army efforts, plus lack of support by the population, have reduced the number of Islamic radicals to a few hundred men operating in a dozen or so scattered groups.

September 20, 2004 Four GSPC rebels set up a false roadblock 120 kilometers southeast of the capital, and killed four men in a car and abducted a woman.

September 27, 2004 GSPC rebels in western Algeria ambushed a group of local civil self-defense troops, and killed six. Rebel violence has been on the increase this month, with about 53 people killed, most of them police or civilians.

October 3, 2004 Two members of the GSPC were killed in a gun battle with police in central Algeria.

October 21, 2004 The Islamic GSPC rebels have apparently been driven out of their usual camps in the hills and forests. Those that tried to rebuild those camps in the far south have met with mixed success. Meanwhile, a few groups of rebels still operate near the coast, moving around to avoid police and army patrols.

October 22, 2004 Islamic rebels used a roadblock to stop vehicles carrying young men to a soccer match 70 kilometers to the north, in the capital. The rebels killed 16 of their victims with gunfire, cutting their throats or burning them to death. This is the first major rebel massacre in a year. Army and police units were in the area, searching for rebels.

October 25, 2004 Harkat Al-Islah (Movement for Reform), the largest Islamic party in Algeria, is taking a major public relations hit as details of adultery among the senior leadership emerges. The Islamic parties have been trying to get laws passed outlawing booze and legalizing polygamy, without success. Neither violence nor conventional politics has been able to get Algerians to return to Islamic conservatism.

October 26, 2004 The rebels usually increase their attacks during the Moslem holy month of Ramadan, which began last week. At the peak of the rebel violence (1993-7), they would slaughter over a thousand people during Ramadan. But last year, the dead amounted to less than a hundred. This was the lowest death toll in over a decade.

October 29, 2004 Rebel attacks on civilians has left 21 dead in the last week.

November 2, 2004 GSPC leader Amar Saifi, was handed over to Algeria by Libyan leader Muammar Kaddafy. Saifi was captured by Chad rebels earlier this year, but negotiations to by Algeria to buy him went nowhere. Kaddafy has more clout with the MDJT rebels in Chad, because Libya has long supported various Chad rebel groups. Kaddafy used his pull to get MDJT to take the money and turn over Saifi.

November 16, 2004 Rebel violence during Ramadan left about 50 people dead. This was a large drop from last year, and a huge drop from the late 1990s, when rebel attacks would kill over a thousand people. But the fact that fifty civilians and police died in the last month indicates that there are still several groups of Islamic rebels operating. These attacks took place all across the northern coastal areas of Algeria. It's thought that the remaining rebels number only a few hundred. It is known that some have gone to Iraq, where Sunni Arab money men are hiring gunmen to fight coalition forces and the new Iraqi government. Other Algerian Islamic radicals have fled to Europe, where more and more of them are being arrested as counter-terrorist operations continue there.

November 21, 2004 Acting on a tip, police arrested a GSPC leader in a hospital 70 kilometers east of the capital. With him was an AK-47 and ammunition.

November 26, 2004 Five German tourists were reported missing in southern Algeria last week, in the same area were 32 foreign tourists were kidnapped by Islamic radicals. The Germans were found two days later, Some of these Islamic groups are still operating in the south, maintaining themselves through banditry. There's a lot of banditry down there. And some groups of GSPC Islamic radicals are still believed to be hiding in the area.

November 28, 2004 In western Algeria, several groups of Islamic rebels continue to operate, and recently killed two policemen and wounded three others.

November 29, 2004 Islamic rebels operating in the suburbs of the capital killed two civilians and stole $198,000.

December 2, 2004 A large series of police raids in eastern Algeria led to the discovery of a dozen rebel arms caches, the death of two rebels and the capture of three others. Actual Islamic rebels are thin on the grounds these days, but they left behind a lot of hidden weapons, ammunition and bomb making materials. Apparently, captured rebels have given up the locations of many of these caches.

December 5, 2004 The war with the Islamic radicals has turned into something more akin to a battle with a criminal gang. The Islamic rebel organization, GSPC, is shattered, and having a hard time getting reorganized. The Islamic rebels are widely unpopular, and many of the most radical of their number have been going off to Iraq (to get killed), Europe (to get arrested) or other Arab countries (to disappear).

December 13, 2004 In western Algeria, a large riot over lack of housing, jobs and opportunity in general, left 30 young men and six police injured. The economy has been badly mismanaged by the military dictatorship, and this has caused growing unrest.

December 25, 2004 The government believes there are still 300-500 armed Islamic rebels in the country, and many more who have fled to other countries (and comprise a large portion of al Qaeda's core members.) Scattered in small groups, either in remote camps, or hiding in urban areas, the remaining militants are largely reduced to banditry. Many of the remaining Islamic radicals want to surrender, but are reluctant because of the threat of assassination by Islamic radicals who are still into murder and violence. Many Islamic radicals who have fled Algeria, have done so to get out of the Islamic radical movement, and avoid fatal retribution for doing so. With the decline of the Islamic radical movement, the national police are now spending more time dealing with unrest over poor economic conditions, and government corruption.

December 26, 2004 An army search for rebel camps in the northwest led to an encounter that left six Islamic radicals dead.

December 28, 2004 Islamic terrorists killed seven civilians outside the capital.

January 2, 2005 Algeria earned 31 billion dollars from oil and gas exports in 2004, and this was 96 percent of export earnings. The Algerian people are angry about where much of that money went. Corruption in the government is no secret, and bureaucrats would rather hire more riot police to put down demonstrations, than auditors and investigators to find and prosecute civil servants who steal money. Over a decade of violence by Islamic radicals was partly caused by anger against the corruption. The Islamic radicals brought widespread terror and murder, not honest administration, and have been discredited. But now that the Islamic radical threat is largely gone, people are concentrating on economic issues, and the corrupt government that they see as preventing prosperity.

January 3, 2005 An Algerian army convoy was ambushed by Islamic terrorists in the early morning, killing 18 soldiers and militiamen. The ambush took place in the mountainous province of Biskra located 300 kilometers southeast of the capital. The ambush was conducted by 50 terrorists wearing afghan-style military clothes and belonging to the Islamic GSPC movement (Salafist Group for Predication and Fight) known for its links with Al Qaeda. The rebels only suffered a few injuries before dispersing.

A large scale seek-and-destroy operation started the day after, covering a zone of hundreds of square kilometers. Around 10 rebels were already encircled 10-15 kilometers away from where the attack took place. This operation is due to last several days because of the numerous caverns and hideouts that exist in this area, much like in Afghanistan.

This attack has more political than strategic value. It demonstrates that the GSPC now lacks the ability to be anything else but a nuisance to the government. Its last similar operation occurred in January 2004. The movement has indeed met several major setbacks since 2003. It was beheaded with the killings of its founder and his right arm and their successor was arrested in 2004.

Moreover, the local population increasingly reports terrorist movements and recruitment attempts. Rebels now have to live in an unfriendly territory. This denies the movements ability to gather large bands of guerrillas in one area even remote without attracting the army's attention (all 50 terrorists taking part in the ambush came in small groups from several eastern regions). Its recruitment basis is also dramatically shortened, forcing it to rely only on Islamist veterans returning from Afghanistan.--Nicolas Mazzesi

January 7, 2005 The government announced that, two months ago, it captured Nourredine Boudiafi, the head of the terrorist group GIA (Islamic Armed Group). The event was kept secret so that Boudiafi's followers could be hunted down. The GIA made peace with the government in 1998, but some members fought on, and many broke away to found the GSPC. But now the last of the GIA terrorists appear to be gone.

January 10, 2005 Troops searching for GSPC rebels southeast of the capital, managed to kill at least nine of them.

January 12, 2005 With fewer Islamic radicals to worry about, the government is now devoting more police resources to other threats, like angry students. At least a third of the students won't be able to find jobs when they graduate. Bribing a government official is known to solve the unemployment problem, and this makes students angrier. Today there were riots over the shortage of housing (there are, on average, eight people in each house and apartment), leaving three dozen students injured, and six policemen.

January 13, 2005 The government says that the terrorist group GIA has all but ceased to exist, with only 10-20 remaining members. But the larger GSPC is still thought to have 400-500 active members. GSPC is using smugglers, who normally move untaxed cigarettes into the country, to also deliver ammunition and weapons. But the GSPC is running short of cash, and the smugglers have to be paid.

January 16, 2005 The government has made a peace deal with Berber tribal chiefs. The Berber language will get official recognition and there will be more money invested in the northeast, where most Berbers live. Berbers are the original inhabitants of North Africa, and retained their language and customs after the Arab invasion over a thousand years ago.

January 18, 2005 Riots broke out in the highlands south of the capital, when word of government proposals to raise the price of butane gas fifteen percent. This gas is the main source of heating and cooking fuel in the cooler highlands, and lack of jobs makes it difficult to buy at the old price. Anti-government violence because of economic issues is growing, with another revolution over economic and corruption issues more likely.

January 27, 2005 The GSPC rebels continue to kill, leaving 40 people dead so far this month. In the past few days, two policemen were killed in the northeast.

The Islamic rebels are no longer a major threat, most of the hard core members having fled to other Arab countries, or Europe. There, the Islamic radicals are still under police pressure. In France, Spain and Germany, the police are constantly on the lookout for Algerian Islamic radicals.

February 3, 2005 In a gun battle with rebels east of the capital, one policeman and one rebel were killed.

February 4, 2005 The search for rebel camps east of the capital succeeded, when soldiers found a GSPC hideout where bombs were made. Four rebels were killed, and two AK-47s and bomb making material recovered.

February 12, 2005 GSPC appears to be moving its operations out of the country. The Islamic rebels are widely unpopular and the security forces have gotten better at finding rebel camps. There is, in effect, no place to hide in Algeria. But overseas, particularly in Europe, there are Arab communities that honor and support Islamic militants.

February 21, 2005 Some 500 kilometers east of the capital, GSPC rebels ambushed an army patrol and killed four soldiers.

February 22, 2005 The GSPC rejected the idea of a truce, and vowed to fight on. There are thought to be 300-500 Islamic terrorists left in Algeria. Thousands of others have fled overseas, mainly to France and other European nations.

February 23, 2005 The government has officially admitted that the death toll from Islamic radical violence has been, since 1992, 150,000 people. The government also calculates that the Islamic violence has cost the country $30 billion.

February 27, 200 In eastern Algeria, soldiers and police continued to sweep rural areas, looking for Islamic terrorist hideouts. Two terrorists were killed, and several hideouts discovered.

March 13, 2005 Islamic radical violence continues to flare up. In the last few days, two policemen and two rebels died in two incidents south and southeast of the capital. The war against the Islamic groups has come down to a police operation, searching for the few hundred terrorists who remain at large, armed and willing to fight. The Algerian experience is seen as a model to be followed in Iraq. That means over a decade of violence. What Algeria did was arm local militias to defend themselves from terrorist attacks. The Islamic radicals had to eat, and they depended on voluntary, or extorted, contributions from civilians, in order to survive.

The extortion and terror kept the Islamic radicals going for a long time, and now, 14 years later, there are still some of these bloody minded terrorists out there.

March 26, 2005 GSPC killed two off-duty soldiers east of the capital. This came the day after a meeting of Arab leaders in the capital. GSPC had threatened violence against that, but had not been able to penetrate the heavy security.

March 31, 2005 The government admitted that police and soldiers were probably involved in the disappearance of 6,146 civilians during over a decade of anti-terrorist operations. It's estimated that at least 150,000 died from terrorist attacks, or government security operations, during this period.

April 2, 2005 As more Islamic rebels are captured, or surrender, civilians are more inclined to pass on information to the police. Some of the captured rebels are also talking. This has led to more police raids, which are capturing, or killing, dozens of rebels a month, and capturing weapons and bomb making materials. The decline in terror related deaths seems to indicate that these operations are having the desired effect.

April 8, 2005 Islamic terrorists set up a fake roadblock and killed 14 civilians outside the capital.

April 11, 2005 Police are pursuing four GSPC rebels in southern Algeria. One was killed today, while the four were buying food from a farmer, but the other three escaped back into the hills, without their food.

April 14, 2005 Islamic radical group GSPC denies that it was responsible for the recent murder of 14 civilians at a fake roadblock. If that's true, the killers may have been freelance Islamic radicals. Robbery was not suspected, as the victims' cars were burned. Meanwhile, European nations find themselves with more active Algerian GSPC terrorists than Algeria itself. Britain recently arrested dozens of GSPC members. And France and Germany have hundreds under surveillance. GSPC prefers to operate in Europe, where strict rules of evidence and cultural barriers enables GSPC to operate without much fear of police interference. Unless, of course, a GSPC member kills a local cop. That will usually result in arrest and imprisonment.

April 27, 2005 In the last few days, GSPC made two attacks, killing four people. So far this month, about fifty people have been killed near the capital, about half of the soldiers, by GSPC and other Islamic rebel groups. The army has been carrying out aggressive sweeps in the rebel's usual rural refuges, and driving the surviving rebels into urban areas, where the police have an easier time finding them, but the rebels also have an easier time finding victims. The Islamic rebels still have a core of popular support among religious Algerians, especially young ones. But the years of terrorism, and over 200,000 dead, has made it difficult to recruit. The future of groups like the GSPC is in Europe, and many Islamic radicals are fleeing there. In Europe, the hostility from the locals, and generous (by Algerian standards) social welfare benefits, make it easier, and safer, to be an Islamic terrorist. There are also plenty of infidels (non-Moslems) to kill. The Algerian Islamic radicals failed in Algeria because they killed too many Algerian Moslems over the last twelve years. While Europeans, and especially Americans, are more difficult to get to and kill, these murders are much more politically correct for Islamic radicals.

April 30, 2005 East of the capital, a rebel bomb killed two soldiers. Meanwhile, police announced that a Armed Islamic Group (GIA) leader, Boulenouar Oukil, was captured, along with a quantity of weapons and bomb making equipment.

May 21, 2005 Army operations east of the capital left eight soldiers wounded and one civilian dead. The army continues to search for the rural camps where the few remaining Islamic radicals hide out.

May 28, 2005 The government is not making a bit deal out of it, but they now regularly work with American counter-terrorist organizations, especially with regard to terrorist activity in southern Algeria. While most of Islamic radicals have fled Algeria, some of the most dangerous ones have moved to the desert wilderness of southern Algeria. Islamic radicals have been showing up in several of the countries that skirt the southern edge of the Sahara desert. This semi-desert area, called the Sahel, is poor, and generally mismanaged by the governments that are, sort of, in control. Algeria, like most African, and Arab, governments, is not liked by its population, because of corruption and incompetence. The Islamic terrorists, while they initially promised a better deal than the government, soon demonstrated that Islamic radicalism was worse than the current governments.

June 4, 2005 Some 150 GSPC fighters went into northern Mauritania and attacked an army base guarded by fifty soldiers. Fifteen Mauritanian soldiers were killed before the GSPC force withdrew and went back to Algeria. The attackers lost at least nine men during several hours of fighting, which wounded 17 of the Mauritanian soldiers as well. The attackers stole six vehicles, and burned two others, as they got away.

June 6, 2005 As planned, a force of some 2,000 American military trainers began working in Chad, Mauritania, Mali, Niger and, Algeria. In light of the June 4th attack, the trainees were particularly alert.

June 7, 2005 Algeria says the GSPC group that attacked the Mauritanian army base is operating in Mauritania. Moreover, al Qaeda claims, with some authority, that they ordered GSPC to attack military bases, and that was what brought about the June 4th attack. The attack was apparently meant to intimidate the Mauritanian army, and make it easier for Islamic radicals to operate in the area where the borders of Algeria, Mail and Mauritania meet.

June 10, 2005 The army killed two Islamic radicals in the south, and are pursuing several others.

June 11, 2005 Algeria has been the center of Islamic radicalism in Africa for over a decade. Even more so than Egypt, where many of the intellectual founders of Islamic radicalism come from. Algeria is where most of the foot soldiers of the movement came from. Egypt defeated its Islamic radicals a decade ago, while Algeria has crushed them only in the last year. Over the last few years, many of the Algerian Islamic radicals have fled to Europe, and other Islamic countries. About a quarter of the 400 foreign terrorists captured in Iraq are from Africa, and a similar percentage of the foreign terrorists killed in Iraq are believed to be from Africa (mainly Egypt, Morocco and Algeria.) But the most dangerous Islamic terrorists are those who fled south, to set up camps in the thinly populated Sahel (the semi-desert area south of the Sahara desert). Al Qaeda, using its network of Islamic "charities" provides some of the financing for these new terrorist bases, as well as the money to send African Islamic radicals to Iraq.

June 25, 2005 Police from Algeria, Mali and Mauritania are cooperating to exchange information on Islamic radicals that might be in the area. In Mali and Mauritania, suspicious, and often innocent, Algerians are being arrested and questioned.

June 30, 2005 Troops operating along the Mali border clashed with a group of GSPC rebels, leaving 13 rebels dead, and an army helicopter damaged and forced to land. One soldier was killed during the shootout between the rebel convoy (which was apparently transporting weapons and ammunition) and the helicopter.

July 7, 2005 A roadside bomb went off 500 kilometers east of the capital, killing one soldier and wounding 13.

July 9, 2005 With Islamic radicals defeated, and most of the survivors driven into the southern deserts, or exile, the government will try to eliminate any lingering resentments by holding a referendum to get popular support for an amnesty. This would eliminate a lot of the revenge killings that would occur as the Islamic terrorists continued to surface.

July 28, 2005 Two Algerian diplomats were kidnapped on July 25th, but eventually killed, by Islamic terrorists in Iraq. This crime was widely condemned in Algeria, which has had over a decade of Islamic terrorism and is pretty fed up with it.

July 29, 2005 East of the capital, two policemen were killed and four wounded when ambushed by Islamic terrorists.

August 6, 2005 Algeria's oil income this year will be $40 billion, compared to $31 billion last year. The money buys some political peace, depending on how much is stolen by corrupt government officials.

August 9, 2005 The government believes that a group of GSPC terrorists has moved from the south of the country to the rural areas outside the capital, with the intention of making more attacks. American trainers in the Sahel region, to the south of Algeria, have increased the effectiveness of the troops down there, making life uncomfortable for the Algerian terrorists who had moved south. Only a few GSPC terrorist gangs remain, all of them led by resourceful, and lucky, master terrorists. However, the most common form of GSPC terror is mass killings of civilians, or ambushing police or army patrols. This is often followed by a pursuit through the hills and forests of coastal Algeria. Eventually, the terrorist groups are caught, and most of the members killed in a violent last stand.

August 17, 2005 Increasingly, the counter-terrorist operations are being directed against local criminals.

August 20, 2005 Islamic terrorists killed six civilians 500 kilometers east of the capital. Elsewhere, Islamic terrorists kidnapped six civilians.

August 24, 2005 In the past week, counter-terror operations, 90 kilometers west of the capital, have resulted in eleven Islamic terrorists killed, and at least three arrests. Another operation, 490 kilometers west of the capital, resulted in three arrests. Islamic terrorists determined to operate inside Algeria, are having a very hard time of it. The civilian population is generally hostile to them, and the security forces have over a decade of experience with this sort of thing. Most Islamic terrorists have fled the country, mainly to Europe.

September 8, 2005: In eastern Algeria, Islamic terrorists attacked village guards, killing three and wounding in four. In western Algeria, police arrested eight men who had been providing support for Islamic terrorists.

September 11, 2005: The new government in Mauritania has continued its opposition to Algerian Islamic terrorists. The new government declared a pardon for many criminals, to celebrate their coming to power, but excluded members of the GSPC (the Islamic radical organization behind most of the terrorism in Algeria.) GSPC members have been fleeing army and police operations along Algeria's densely populated coastal areas, and moving to the desert areas down south. This has brought the GSPC to Mauritania, and caused Mauritania to reject the Islamic radicals.

September 14, 2005: In two attacks, Islamic terrorists killed three soldiers and a policeman.

September 18, 2005: Since 2000, some 6,000 Islamic radicals have accepted government amnesty deals. But several hundred are holding out, still killing, and these will be offered another amnesty deal if a September 29 national vote approves the new amnesty arrangement. But several thousand Islamic radicals have fled Algeria, and can be found in other Moslem countries, and in Europe, where many are still involved in planning Islamic terrorism.

September 25, 2005: The government believes there are only a few small groups of GSPC Islamic terrorists still active, amounting to a few hundred men, at most. What is more worrisome is the growth of Berber nationalism. The Berbers, a people related to the ancient Egyptians, were the original occupants of Algeria. Arab armies conquered the country over a thousand years ago, but, unlike other Arab conquests, most Berbers did not adopt Arab language and customs. Today, about a third of Algerians are Berbers, and speak the Berber language, Tamazight. There has always been tension between Berbers and Arabs, and now Berbers are demanding that their language be made one of far, Berber violence has been in the form of rowdy demonstrations. But the Berber radicals could escalate to guns and bombs.

Algeria's official languages. The Arab dominated government refuses to consider this. So

September 29, 2005: Some Islamic terrorists are accepting the amnesty, with a group of ten surrendering.

September 30, 2005: The voting on the "Charter for Peace and National Reconciliation" yesterday was approved by 97 percent of the population. But the main remaining Islamic terrorist group, the GSPC, has rejected it.

October 2, 2005: A group of Islamic terrorists, rejecting the amnesty, killed three civilians.

October 5, 2005: An explosion in eastern Algeria killed two and wounded three. It's not certain if the cause was terrorism, accident or criminals.

October 9, 2005: The government believes there are still about a thousand Islamic terrorists active, but only a few hundred are armed and dangerous. While the new amnesty got an overwhelming "yes" vote, many Algerians are uneasy about letting so many terrorists, who killed so many thousands of civilians, off the hook. Some of the terrorists don't believe they will be able to walk, if they surrender and confess their sins. So the war on terror sputters on.

October 12, 2005: In the last week, there were several clashes with groups of Islamic terrorists, leaving half a dozen people dead, and more wounded. One of the terrorist groups is using police uniforms, and staging surprise attacks on police.

October 16, 2005: Islamic terrorists, believed to be members of GSPC, killed two civilians and kidnapped three others.

October 19, 2005: The Islamic terrorists who have refused the latest amnesty offer have apparently decided to go down fighting. There are several attacks a week, and after each one, police take off after the terrorists, often catching up with, and killing, some of them. Because of the efforts of some Arab language media (like al Jazeera) and pro-terrorist web sites, there are still some recruits for the Islamic terrorists. It appears that the battle with Islamic terrorists will go on for years, although at a low level.

October 30, 2005: A series of police raids in western Algeria left none rebels dead.

October 31, 2005: Over the weekend, Islamic rebels made several attacks, leaving three dead.

November 6, 2005: Two Islamic terrorists turned themselves, and their weapons, into police. This sort of thing happens once or twice a week. Some of the Islamic terrorists are leaving the country as well, heading for Europe (to rest), or Iraq (to fight and die).

November 13, 2005: The month long terrorist "Ramadan Offensive", left about 70 people dead. This is far less than during similar operations in past years, demonstrating the declining capabilities of the terrorists.

December 13, 2005: Troops clashed with about ten Islamic terrorists 160 kilometers west of the capital, killing four of them.

January 6, 2006: Some 330 kilometers southwest of the capital, Islamic terrorists killed four civilian government workers.

January 7, 2006: West of the capital, in the same area where armed Islamic terrorists were killed last month, nearly fifty people were arrested for supporting and protecting the terrorists. The support network was revealed when one of its members felt remorse and contacted the police. Many of these people had been terrorized into providing hiding places, information and food for the terrorists.

January 11, 2006: The army has surrounded some 40 Islamic terrorists in the Atlas mountains, where negotiations are under way for the terrorists to surrender and accept amnesty.

January 13, 2006: Police in western Algeria broke up an Islamic terrorist cell and made 13 arrests. Weapons, explosives, cash and false documents. The terrorists had used criminal activities to raise funds for their planned operations.

January 14, 2006: The most able and active Islamic terrorists have apparently fled the country, and they are being detected, and sometimes arrested, in Europe, Canada and some Arab countries. Some have been found (usually dead) in Iraq and Afghanistan. These Algerians overseas often operate as part of the Algerian GSPC, or the Moroccan Islamic Combat Group. The GSPC has more success recruiting among Algerians in Europe, where memories of the atrocities and terrorist tactics of the GSPC in Algeria are dim. In Algeria, GSPC is seen as a bunch of bloodthirsty fanatics.

February 9, 2006: The air force is getting MiG-29SMT Russian fighters, with the possibility of 30 more.

February 14, 2006: The government has signed a series of agreements with the U.S., to cover cooperation in scientific and counter-terrorism activities.

February 1 7, 2006: Another GSPC leader, Abu al Baraa, was killed by troops in a clash 260 kilometers east of the capital. Baraa was one of the 19 original founders of the GSPC, and one of main defenders of the terrorists against the increasing number of Islamic scholars in Algeria who are condemning terrorism.

March 5, 2006: The government pardoned some 2,000 Islamic terrorists, and released them from prison over the weekend. This was a sign of victory, not defeat. It is all part of the amnesty deal with the terrorists, that sets free captured terrorists, and those who surrender. The only exceptions are those who are known to have committed murder. Terrorist activity has declined sharply over the last year, while the number of terrorists who have accepted amnesty, and surrendered, has gone up.

In 14 years of fighting the terrorists, over 150,000 people died, mostly as victims of terror attacks on civilians. This all began when the Islamic radicals won elections in 1992, and the old revolutionaries, who had run things since the French left three decades earlier, refused to step aside. The Islamic radicals won the vote because they promised clean government. The old revolutionaries had eventually become corrupt and entrenched. This is a common pattern world-wide. The old revolutionaries, and their many accomplices, feared retribution from the Islamic radicals, who had the mandate of the people and a known sense of justice.

There was no major backlash from Western or Moslem nations when the old revolutionaries refused to accept the results of the election. That was because the example of Iran was still fresh. During the 1980s, Islamic radicals got themselves elected in Iran, and then used their position to change to laws to insure that they could not be voted out of office. It was an example of how a democratic election could produce a dictatorship. The Western democracies despaired of there ever being functional democracy in the Middle East. The Middle Eastern dictators saw the Algerian experience as proof that democracy and Islamic radicalism are both bad for the Islamic world. This fueled widespread (in the Middle East) belief, at least among those in power, that dictatorship was good.

Algeria is having elections again, and the Islamic radicals no longer have the support of a majority of the voters. The government is still corrupt, and the people are still unhappy. There will be another revolution. Probably not led by Islamic radicals, but there is no shortage of angry Algerians, willing to try something new to get a decent government.

Meanwhile, thousands of Algerian Islamic radicals are in exile, mainly in Europe. There, some are pursued by police and intelligence agencies, while most keep their heads down. Some are apparently reconsidering their life goals. There's not much future in Islamic terrorism.

August 30, 2006: The six month amnesty for Islamic terrorists has expired. Only about 300 people took advantage of the amnesty, and turned themselves in. The amnesty does not cover those who committed murder, which may be why it is believed there are some 800 Islamic terrorists still active. As part of the amnesty deal, some 2,200 imprisoned terrorists were freed. Some 14 years of Islamic terrorism left over 200,000 dead and caused some $20 billion in economic damage. Thousands of Islamic radicals have fled the country, and continue to plan and carry out terrorist acts in Europe and the Middle East.

The remaining terrorists in Algeria have little popular support, and survive by terrorizing civilians into providing food and other necessities. The army has located several groups of Islamic terrorists in mountains and forests, and continues to try and bring the terrorists in, or kill them.

September 3, 2006: Islamic terrorists ambushed a patrol and killed four policemen.

Fortunately, France has infiltrated GSPC cells inside France. Not too difficult to do, because one reason for the demise of GSPC was its factionalism and paranoia. Many GSPC losses were self inflicted, as internal struggles left many members dead from friendly fire. Al Qaeda and GSPC members have cooperated in the past, this new announcement makes the arrangement formal, and basically signals the end of GSPC. Al Qaeda has become the collector of lost souls in the world of Islamic terrorism. Its superior PR and fund raising capabilities have kept al Qaeda in the public eye, and that public includes other Islamic terrorist groups that are being picked apart by counter-terrorism efforts. While there is much media talk about increased recruiting for terrorist groups, the reality is that organized terrorist groups are fading away because of all the police attention. It's a war out there, and despite lots of enthusiasm among young Moslems, the police are inflicting far more casualties (dead and imprisoned terrorists) that the terrorists are creating victims. At least in the West. In Moslem countries, and those with large Moslem minorities, there is far more violence. For over a decade, countries like Iraq, Afghanistan, Pakistan, Algeria and Sudan have been suffering from religious violence, with Islamic radicals the chief offenders. In Iraq, Pakistan and Algeria, the battle was between secular government and Islamic radicals. The overthrow of Saddam in 2003 simply saw a Shia secular government replacing a Sunni one, and the Islamic terrorists switching from Shia to Sunni. This put al Qaeda in the lead, a role it will now play in Algeria, France and other European nations that have given refuge to Islamic radicals fleeing the fighting in Algeria.

September 14, 2006: Al Qaeda, and the main Algerian Islamic terror group, the GSPC, announced they have joined forces. This was made public an al Qaeda video. The alliance was not a surprise to intelligence agencies in Algeria and France. The two organizations have been cooperating for some time. This is a big come-down for the GSPC, which was a much bigger deal in the 1990s than al Qaeda. The GSPC led the battle to take control of Algeria from a secular dictatorship, and turn it over to a religious dictatorship. Some 200,000 people have died in 14 years of violence. But now GSPC is beaten down to a still shrinking core of survivors. A year ago there were about a thousand active GSPC members in Algeria, now there are less than half that number, plus about the same number in exile, and still active. There are also thousands of former members in exile, mainly in France, and these are the ones that have Europeans, especially the French, worried.

September 17, 2006: The exiled leaders of FIS, the major Islamic party in the 1990s war with the government, have returned from exile. FIS made peace with the government, and is trying to get permission to again operate as a political party. The secular government fears this because, while the Islamic terrorists are defeated, there are still many Islamic conservatives who remain unhappy with the corrupt government.

September 21, 2006: The merger of the Algerian Islamic terrorist group GSPC, into al Qaeda, now provides GSPC more resources in exile, while providing al Qaeda with hundreds of experienced terrorists. Thousands of GSPC operatives have fled Algeria for refuge in Europe and North America. While most have given up Islamic terrorism, some have not. Increasingly, counter-terrorism operations are coming across Algerians.

October 12, 2006: An FIS politician was shot dead in the capital. This appears to be a deliberate attack, and may indicate a feud within the FIS, which is an Islamic conservative group that has made peace with the government. In the past, radical factions split off from the FIS, to become Islamic terrorists.

In Mali, the Algerian GSPC terrorists have been feuding with Tuaregs tribesmen belonging to the Democratic Alliance for Change (DAC), a former rebel group which is no longer at war with the Mali government, but is still around as a political organization. The DAC and GSPC have been shooting at each other, and each death generates a retaliatory attacks. The Tuaregs are related to the Berber peoples of North Africa, who are thought to be a branch of the same people who lived in ancient Egypt. The Tuaregs and Arabs don't get along, which is one of the causes of the battles with the GSPC groups who have moved into the border area. Another cause is the GSPC being labeled a terrorist group by the United States. The Tuaregs noted the U.S. providing assistance to the Mali armed forces, and did not want to be tagged as allies of Islamic terrorists.

October 27, 2006: Now Algerian Islamic terrorists are fighting turf battles with tribes in adjacent nations. This month, about a dozen Algerian Islamic terrorists and Tuareg tribesmen have been killed in skirmishes in neighboring Mali. While Algerian Islamic terrorists have been defeated, there are nearly a thousand of them still active inside Algeria and adjacent countries. Many have set up camps in nations adjoining Algeria’s southern border, which is in the Sahara desert. Here, there are long borders with Mali (1,376 kilometers), Mauritania (463 kilometers, and Niger (956 kilometers). American Special Forces have been training troops in some of these adjacent countries, on counter-terrorism techniques, and how to more effectively patrol these long borders.

October 29, 2006: In the capital, GSPC terrorists set off two bombs outside police stations, killing three and wounding 29. The GSPC says that, since it is now part of al Qaeda, it will carry out attacks inside Algeria in support of al Qaeda. Not much difference from GSPCs previous strategy. However, al Qaeda is focused on attacking Western targets, something GSPC rarely did before.

November 2, 2006: In the northeast, two clashes with Islamic terrorists left three dead.

November 25, 2006: An army operation in the east resulted in two Islamic terrorists captured, and five killed.

November 26, 2006: Operations continued in the east, but the GSPC fighters ambushed an army patrol, killing seven soldiers.

November 30, 2006: In the last 14 months, nearly 800 Islamic terrorists have been captured, killed, or have accepted the amnesty. There are still a few hundred Islamic terrorists out there, most of them member so the GSPC, and now working for al Qaeda. December 21, 2006: France believes it is the chief victim of Algeria's success in defeating the GSPC Islamic terrorists, many of whom have fled to France. There are already many Algerians in France, and French is a common second language in Algeria. In the last 18 months, French police have arrested 76 people for Islamic terrorist activity, and aborted at least three terror attacks. But the French police believe that there are still hundreds of former Algerian terrorists in France, and many of them are still active. Al Qaeda, which has absorbed GSPC, is desperate for another big attack in Europe, and the former GSPC terrorists appear to be the most likely to pull something off.

December 10, 2006: Terrorists attacked a bus carrying Western oil workers near the capital. One Algerian on the bus was killed, and several foreigners wounded. The attackers were believed to be GSPC Islamic terrorists, who have said they would try to wreck the economy and drive foreigners out of the country.

December 20, 2006: Police broke up a terrorist support group with the arrest of five college students in a town 500 kilometers south of the capital. Groups like the GSPC still have some appeal for idealistic young men, and it is these people who provide what support the Islamic terrorists have left in the country.

December 22, 2006: A major sweep, some fifty kilometers east of the capital, resulted in three Islamic terrorists dead, and 14 arrested. Some of the arrested were also working with criminal gangs, which is a typical method for terrorists to support themselves, and gain access to goods and services available via the criminal underground.

December 24, 2006: On the advice of French security officials, next month's "Dakar Rally" (a vehicle race across the Sahara) will skip Mali. There is fear that Algerian Islamic terrorists (belonging to GSPC) are in the area, and might ambush or kidnap some of the racers. American Special Forces have been training Mali security forces for some time now, but the area where the GSPC remnants can hide out is vast, and controlled by tribes more congenial to Islamic radicalism, than to their own government.

December 31, 2006: Police arrested two Tunisians, who admitted that they had entered Algeria, via Libya, with the help of Islamic terrorists, to work with the GSPC.

January 2, 2007: Hassan Hattab, one of the founders of the GSPC, and about a hundred of his followers, have accepted the government amnesty. Hattab was ousted as leader of the GSPC in 2001, and his successor was killed in 2004, and GSPC has been shrinking ever since. Hattab has pretty much stayed in the background since 2001, when more radical members of the GSPC pushed a program of more violence. This turned most Algerians against the Islamic radicals, and led to the collapse of the GSPC.

January 7, 2007: As Algeria and the U.S. exchange information on Algerian Islamic terrorists, they find a common pattern. Many Algerian terrorists, who have "disappeared" from view in Algeria, are showing up in Iraq (where they are killed, captured or mentioned by prisoners), in a Western prison, or under surveillance by Western security agencies. Fewer Algerians are going to Iraq, apparently after noting the high probability of getting killed or captured there. Algerian terrorists are trying to establish themselves in the West (Europe, Canada, Australia.) The GSPC members share information via the Internet on how to work the legal and social welfare systems of Western countries, in order to stay out of jail, and get the local governments to pay for living expenses. But known GSPC members are closely watched, and know they will be picked up if they are caught planning an terrorist operations. GSPC members are also active in Arab countries, but this is more dangerous. Especially in North Africa, counter-terror operations are very active, and effective. Morocco and Libya are particularly energetic in hunting, and catching, Islamic terrorists (who threaten the local governments). Meanwhile, the GSPC leadership insists that it will carry on the struggle to establish an Islamic state in North Africa, and, in a telling and pathetic gesture, publicly calls on Osama bin Laden for "instructions."

January 12, 2007: Tunisia broke up a terrorist cell, which was mainly composed of Algerian GSPC members. But now GSPC has officially joined al Qaeda, and al Qaeda has-been trying to re-establish itself in Tunisia since its last attack there, in 2002 (when a bomb outside a synagogue killed 19 people, most of them foreign tourists). This time, al Qaeda was aiming at embassies. Tunisia has always been a prime al Qaeda target, because this country has come down hard on Islamic radicals, with the support of the Tunisian people.

Nothing like a challenge. But so far, the terrorists are losing. However, successful recruiting in Algeria and Europe, and fund raising in Europe, keep the Islamic killers coming. That has caused the governments of North Africa, Europe and North America, to cooperate closely in tracking Islamic terrorists.

Algeria is pestering France to complete the removal of landmines still in the ground along Algeria's eastern and western borders. These mines were laid over forty years ago, when Algerian rebels (against French colonial rule) were getting support from neighboring countries. France did remove some 80 percent of the mines, but left the ones too difficult to find, or in areas where they were unlikely to do any damage. The remaining mines have been a problem, and the Algerians would like the French to come back and finish the job, and to help with the cost of taking care of landmine victims.

January 19, 2007: Italy arrested two Algerians, who had left Bosnia to enter Italy and sell false documents. But the men are believed involved in Islamic terrorism as well. The two are part of terrorist diasporas from Algeria. The Algerian terrorist find that they get the warmest welcome in Europe, which is the one place where al Qaeda has not killed a lot of Moslems.

January 20, 2007: Four Algerian terrorism suspects, held without charge in Britain for over four years, have agreed to be returned to Algeria. Activists in Britain have, until now, prevented Algeria from taking custody of these men, because of fears they may be abused by Algerian police.

January 21, 2007: The government is trying to stamp out the last Islamic terrorists with a public relations campaign. The last few hundred Islamic terrorists running around are restricted to a few areas in the country where the population is still angry enough at the government (mainly over economic issues, and general incompetence) to withhold tips. The terrorists have responded by changing their tactics, and not killing a lot of civilians merely suspected of supplying information to the police, or refusing food and shelter to the terrorists. So the government is plastering these areas with posters, calling on people to provide information, and end the terror once and for all. Given the disdain most of the population has for the government, it will take more than radio spots and posters to change people’s minds.

January 23, 2007: Roadside bombs are becoming more popular with Islamic terrorists in Algeria, as one went off 360 kilometers east of the capital, killing a soldier and wounding eight others. The police believe GSPC terrorists planted the bomb, and set it off.

January 27, 2007: The GSPC (Salafist Group for Preaching and Combat), the primary Islamic terrorist organization in Algeria, has officially changed its name to Al Qaeda (or the Al Qaeda Organization in the Islamic Maghreb). The Maghreb is the Arabic word for North Africa. This recognizes several new realities. First, GSPC leadership can no longer operate from Algeria. There are too few members left in the country, and too many police and irate citizens out looking for Islamic terrorists. Second, the GSPC leadership has dispersed to several European and Arab countries, where it now works with many non-Algerians. Since GSPC is associated with an Algerian organization, it makes sense to adopt a more international name.

January 28, 2007: Over the weekend, there were several clashes 500 kilometers east of the capital, leaving one policeman and one terrorist dead. At least one al Qaeda terrorist was wounded as well.

January 30, 2007: Some 400 kilometers east of the capital, clashes between troops and Islamic terrorists have left five soldiers and ten terrorists dead. The army and police are constantly patrolling rural areas in eastern Algeria, seeking the remote camps where the few remaining al Qaeda terrorists hide out.

January 31, 2007: The government is increasing the use of anti -terrorist ads, including appeals for tips about suspected terrorist activity. The growing number of such tips, over the past few years, has led to many arrests of Islamic terrorists. As a result, the last few hundred of these terrorists are mainly out in the countryside, where few civilians can spot them.

February 10, 2007: Government corruption, and use of police to stifle opposing views, keeps the population restless. There are still enough desperate young men around to maintain the strength (a few hundred men) of the al Qaeda (formerly GSPC) terrorists in eastern Algeria. Another hundred or so GSPC (now al Qaeda) diehards hang on in the south, moving across the desert border between Mali and Algeria.

February 19, 2007: Many Algerians are demanding harsher treatment of Islamic terrorists. Over 100,000 civilians were slaughtered by Islamic terrorists in the last fifteen years, and people are eager to stamp out this kind of savagery. But a large minority (over ten percent) of Algerians still support Islamic radicalism, giving the Islamic terrorists a source of new recruits. While there are only a few hundred actual Islamic terrorists out there, that's enough to keep the media events coming indefinitely. But that's not enough to overthrow the government, or much of anything else.

The major problem in Algeria is no longer Islamic terrorists, but corrupt, inefficient government. The next rebellion will likely be based on desire for a better government, or ethnic grievances (the Berbers), not Islamic radicalism.

Getting to Europe is still a goal for many young Algerians, and when they get there, they have little incentive to get involved in Islamic terrorism. In the last five years, European police have arrested over 4,000 terrorist suspects, and nearly all have been guys talking big and doing little. Some of those picked up were hard core, and most of them are now out of circulation. Rather than plot bombings in Europe, many of the terrorists recruited young men to go train and fight in Pakistan and Iraq. Those going to Iraq usually didn't come back. Those going to Pakistan were more likely to survive, and to be watched by the police when they came back to Europe.

February 13, 2007: Seven bombs went off in eastern Algeria, killing six and wounding nearly 30. The main target appeared to be the police. Al Qaeda took credit for the attacks. This is a change for Algerian Islamic terrorists, who in the past did not use bombs much. Instead, they slaughtered people, often unarmed civilians were the victims. But since the GSPC Islamic terrorists of Algeria joined al Qaeda, they have been adopting al Qaeda tactics. That means more bombs, and less slitting throats. The victims are just as dead, but you don't, literally and figuratively, have blood on your hands. The media treats bombs differently than killing people up close and personal (with knives, guns and blunt objects.) Maybe it's because with bombs, there are survivors. When the GSPC was out slitting throats, there rarely were any survivors, and entire families would perish. Even the most opportunistic journalists was appalled by this sort of thing.

February 15, 2007: Police raided terrorist haunts in eastern Algeria, encountered armed terrorists, and killed 26 of them. Another three dozen were arrested. In France, several Algerian terrorists were also arrested. Algerian al Qaeda tries to maintain links between members in Algeria and Europe (particularly France).

February 17, 2007: Moroccan police are searching for two al Qaeda terrorists believed associated with the Algerian branch of the organization.

The recent bombings in Algeria were not popular, and the public revulsion and uproar that followed sent the surprised terrorists running for cover. Some are believed to have fled to Morocco.

February 21, 2007: Morocco has launched a manhunt for two members of al Qaeda, which in North Africa is now run by Algerians. Meanwhile, Algeria succeeded in brokering a peace deal between its southern neighbor, and the Tuareg tribes of Mali. The Tuareg, distant cousins of the ancient Egyptians, have maintained their nomadic culture, and sense of independence, for thousands of years. But in the 20th century, they came under tremendous pressure to respect national borders, and obey national (not just tribal) laws. The Mali Tauregs agreed to give up many of their weapons, and obey the law. This denies Islamic terrorists some potential allies, as tribal rebels have often helped out Islamic radicals.

February 25, 2007: Algerian police have rounded up 27 men responsible for a cache of weapons (165 shotguns, 995 rounds of ammo, and $36,000 in cash) found in the port of Constantine on February 11. The weapons were, as suspected, brought into the country by al Qaeda. While 24 of those arrested were Algerians, it was a Tunisian man who financed the operation. A Frenchman drove the weapons into the country, hidden inside his recreational vehicle. Police have identified another 14 members of the smuggling ring, who are still at large. The weapons smuggling operations earlier brought bomb making materials into the country.

February 26, 2007: Tunisian police believe that al Qaeda has moved its headquarters from Algeria to Tunisia. There have been more arrests of Islamic terrorists in Tunisia lately, and the Tunisian population is not as alert to, and hostile towards, Islamic terrorists as most Algerians are.
Terrorists are finding another danger in Algeria, the growing use of cell phones. While seemingly a boost for terrorists, in practice, cell phones make it much easier for a hostile population to turn in terrorists, and to alert police to terrorist operations in progress. Two years ago, there were only 50,000 cell phone users in Algeria, now there are 21 million. Cell phones have figured in several recent successful counter-terror operations.

March 1, 2007: Islamic terrorists made ten attacks on security personnel east of the capital, but only two people were wounded, and the terrorists were driven away. Another clash with Islamic terrorists, 200 kilometers south of the capital, left three policemen dead.

March 4, 2007: East of the capital, Islamic terrorists ambushed a police patrol, killing five police and destroying three vehicles. March 3, 2007: Islamic terrorists ambushed some foreign oil workers, and killed a Russian engineer.

March 9, 2007: Terrorist violence was down slightly in February, with 18 dead and 15 wounded, compared to 21 dead and three wounded in January. The few remaining Islamic terrorists in northeastern Algeria, appear determined to go down fighting and killing. Since the GSPC announced its merger with al Qaeda last year, there has been an increase in bombings, and a decrease in the traditional massacre of civilians with knives and guns. Apparently, al Qaeda convinced the GSPC terrorists that they would anger fewer Algerians if they blew people up, rather than slitting their throats. A decade ago, the GSPC was killing up to a hundred people a day, but now, it takes up to six months to cause that much mayhem.

March 12, 2007: The American embassy posted a notice that Islamic terrorists might be trying to put bombs on commercial aircraft carrying Westerners in Algeria.

March 13, 2007: Two Islamic terrorists were killed when the roadside bomb they were planting, east of the capital, went off accidentally.

April 2, 2007: Russian weapons salesmen are negotiating a $7 billion deal with Algeria, to provide T-90 tanks, a modern air defense system and additional warplanes.

April 4, 2007: For the last week, several thousand troops, backed by helicopters and fixed wing aircraft, have conducted sweeps of areas in eastern Algeria, where Islamic terrorists have been known to have rural camps. So far, about twenty suspects have been killed, several dozen arrested and as many as 70 forced to flee their camps.

April 5, 2007: In Mauritania, police arrested three Algerians and four Mauritanians on terrorism charges. One of those arrested was in the Mauritanian army. Al Qaeda has been trying to establish bases in countries like Mauritania, just south of Algeria. The terrorists have had some success, but have spent all their energy just surviving.

April 6, 2007: Police have arrested 120 men as terrorism suspects. These men were not planning operations in Algeria, but in Iraq. Some of the men had gone to Iraq to fight for al Qaeda, and survived to come back.

But most of those arrested were recruiting volunteers, or had volunteered but not yet made the trip. The group also raised money to pay for transportation. Most of the volunteers who went to Iraq, never made it back.

April 10, 2007: In Casablanca, Morocco, three suicide bombers set off their explosives, while a fourth was killed by police before he could do so. The four terrorists were cornered in their hideout, and refused to be taken alive. The police caught this group as part of a crackdown brought on by a terrorist bombing last month that killed several dozen people. Since then, several thousand people have been arrested. Morocco has long had Islamic terrorists active, but not that many. The terrorists are unable to carry out more than one or two attacks a year. Many have fled to Europe and Pakistan where they plot additional attacks.

April 11, 2007: Two car bombs went off in the capital, killing 33 and wounding over 200. The bombs were set off near government buildings. A third car bomb was later found and disarmed.

April 13, 2007: The family of one of April11's suicide car bomb attacks, has condemned the operation. This is in sharp contrast to such situations in other parts of the world, where the suicide attackers family is praised, and the family in turn supports the terrorist act of their loved one. No such love here, and that's part of major differences between Islamic terrorism in Algeria and elsewhere. Most Algerians have had it with Islamic terrorism, which has killed over 200,000 Algerians in the last 15 years. Even with this weeks deaths, the violence levels are way down.

April 14, 2007: Operations against terrorists, mostly in the countryside, have left 33 dead so far this month. The government suspected that the terrorists were planning urban attacks, because that had been the recent pattern in nearby Morocco. But it was thought that the terrorists were having a hard time operating in populated areas, because so many people were willing to report terrorist activity. The government thought it had reduced the terrorist forces to several hundred hiding out in rural areas, where constant patrols still produced several clashes a month. The bombings in the capital make it clear that Algerian Islamic radicals have indeed switched from their previous tactics of rural attacks, to the al Qaeda method of going for more newsworthy events in big cities. The latest attacks had the desired impact on international media, but made Islamic radicals even more unpopular inside Algeria. The senior Islamic cleric in the country condemned the attacks, and the Islamic terrorists behind them. By playing to the media, with urban attacks against civilians, al Qaeda increased their popularity among Moslems in countries where there is no Islamic terrorism (including Europe), but made themselves very unpopular in countries suffering the attacks. From a strategic point of view, this makes no sense. But terrorist bombings are not a path to victory, but a desperate ploy to try and avoid the destruction of your movement. And the media loves it. Nothing better than a spectacular disaster, carried out by a sinister organization that threatens to do it again and again. Best of all, the bad guys can never take over, because their terrorism angers the very people they depend on for shelter and support.

Some Algerians suspect that the April 11 bombings were carried out by the government. Widespread corruption in the government is still the source of much public anger. More al Qaeda terrorism in the cities increases support for the government. It's unlikely that the attacks were a government set up, as many of the victims were government employees, and al Qaeda was quick to take credit.

April 15, 2007: The U.S. embassy caused a stink by issuing a warning of further bombing attacks against public buildings in the capital. Nothing happened, but the warning caused consternation among Algerians, and the government is not happy. However, the U.S. State Department is obliged to warn its citizens overseas of American counter-terrorist efforts detect the possibility of a terrorist attack.

April 17, 2007: Several large rallies were held in the capital, protesting the Islamic terrorism. While the terrorists have the backing of only a small segment of the population, that's enough to keep it going. Satellite TV news, like al Jazeera, provide the exciting coverage needed to recruit young men willing to die for the cause (of Islamic conquest of the world.)

April 20, 2007: In Niger, Tuareg rebels attacked a uranium mine near the Algerian border. Three people were killed. The Tuareg are an ethnic group that is widespread throughout the Sahara. The Taureg tend to prefer their tribal government to national ones. The Tuareg are believed to work with Islamic terrorist groups hiding out in this part of the world. For a fee, the Tuareg will do business with just about anyone. In Niger, the French owned uranium mine has become a magnet for Tuareg attacks in the last few months.

April 21, 2007: Police have identified the suicide bombers who carried out the April 11 attacks. The investigation now concentrates on finding the support group that put together the attack. If that group can be broken up, the chances of more attacks is much lower. It's the support group that makes all the difference. The actual suicide bombers are easy to recruit. But finding people who can plan the attack, build the bombs, recruit the bombers and direct the actual attacks, is much more difficult. Several hundred Islamic terrorists are known to be hiding out along the coast, east of the capital. Some are also in the desert, far to the south, but it's much easier to survive near the coast, where there is more water, food, and sympathetic civilians.

April 22, 2007: The police have rounded up the usual suspects. In this case, 80 men who had recently visited Iraq, and were known to be Islamic radicals. Many of these men are openly promoting Islamic terrorism, and are under police surveillance. Now they are under arrest. Dozens were already in jail. The same problem was encountered in the 1980s, when thousands of young men went to Pakistan, to join the fight against the Russians in Afghanistan. This time around, it's hundreds of young men going to Iraq to fight the infidels (non-Moslems, plus the Shia Arabs, who are considered heretics by many Sunni Arabs). Most of these guys don't come back, the casualty rate being much higher in Iraq than it was in Afghanistan. But a large proportion of those who do return are inclined to continue their violent ways.

April 26, 2007: Samir Moussaab, the number two guy in al Qaeda's North African branch, was killed by police east of the capital.

April 28, 2007: Islamic terrorists, several hundred of them, remain active, operating mostly in rural areas, causing several dozen deaths a month. But many districts along the Algerian coast are being cleared of Islamic radicals. The police know this because these are areas where the Islamic radicals have little, or no, local supporters. Moreover, in these areas, most of the population is hostile to the Islamic terrorism, and quick to report any suspicious activity. A lot of this springs from memories of the massacres committed by the Islamic terrorists in the 1990s. Back then, entire families would be murdered, in an attempt to terrorize the locals into not cooperating with the police. People don't forget that sort of thing quickly.

April 29, 2007: Islamic radicals in Algeria were dismayed at the negative response to their April bombings. Not only in Algeria, but throughout North Africa and the Arab world, al Qaeda caught mostly bad press for those attacks. Popular opinion was also quite negative. This continues a trend begun two years ago, as increasingly horrific terror attacks against civilians in Iraq tuned Arab public opinion against al Qaeda, and similar groups. The trend continues, and al Qaeda is dismayed at its inability to reverse the trend.

April 30, 2007: Chasing down the associates of dead suicide bombers, from the attacks earlier this month, have led to the arrest of at least five more men, who admitted to participation in al Qaeda operations.

May 6, 2007: In Morocco, police have arrested 49 terrorist suspects, in the wake of suicide bomber attacks in March and April. The terrorists appear to be local, with no international involvement beyond Arab satellite news and Internet content that promotes Islamic terrorism. Another twenty people, who ran a terrorist recruiting operation, were also arrested. This crew sent volunteers to a terrorist training camp in Algeria. In the last four years, Morocco has arrested some 3,000 terrorism suspects.

May 8, 2007: Satellite news channel al Jazeera ran an al Qaeda recruiting video, which showed suicide bombers in an Algerian training camp preparing for the April 11 attacks that killed them, and nearly 30 civilians. This kind of exposure is a major assist for terrorist recruiting. Al Qaeda in Algeria needs all the help it can get, because the April attacks created a major backlash from the general population, and even other Islamic conservatives.

May 12, 2007: The death toll from the war with Islamic terrorism is on the rise again. In January, 21 died, 18 died in February, 45 in March and 81 in April. Most of the dead were Islamic terrorists, even in April, where terrorist bombs killed 33, but 28 terrorists died as well. The number of terrorists involved is still small, way under a thousands, but they are out to kill, and will keep trying until they are all dead, driven out of the country or arrested.

May 13, 2007: Police located and surrounded a terrorist camp about 100 kilometers west of the capital. There are believed to be about twenty rebels in the camp, which the air force has bombed. Police sweeps have picked up dozens of terrorist suspects. Some terrorists have turned themselves in, after getting caught up in a rift within al Qaeda over tactics.

May 15, 2007: Police counter-terror operations continue, with several suspects being picked up each day, as those arrested earlier give up information. Every few days there is a gun battle, as the more hardcore terrorists refuse to go quietly.

May 19, 2007: The ruling party (National Liberation Front or FLN) dominated the recent elections winning 136 seats in parliament (out of a total of 389). The pro-business Rally for National Democracy (RND) won 61, while the moderate religious party, Islamic Movement for Society and Peace (MSP) won 52. The FLN, in coalition with the Society of Peace Movement (MSP) party, together control 64 percent of the seats in parliament. May 17, 2007: Only about 35 percent of eligible voters cast a ballot in national parliamentary elections, down from 46 percent five years ago. Algeria is still run by the group that refused to recognize a vote in1992 that would have put Islamic conservatives in power. Voters are understandably apathetic.

May 20, 2007: Police have arrested the twelve men it believed responsible for the bombings last month. Also captured were large quantities of explosives and documents.

May 21, 2007: The National Police are being increased from 200,000 to 216,000, in an effort to prevent future Islamic terrorist attacks.

May 22, 2007: The terror bombings last month turned most of the population against the Islamic terrorists responsible. This, in turn, has caused a rift inside the Algerian branch of al Qaeda. There are only about 400 Islamic terrorists left in the country, and they are now divided over how to proceed. About half the terrorists want to go ahead with more terrorist attacks, on the theory that, if you can't be loved, then at least you can be feared. But the other half of Qaeda see that as pointless, because the popular hatred generated by more attacks causes more people to cooperate with the police. The terrorist team that carried out the April attacks was quickly rounded up because of widespread public cooperation. In the past, the police have used these tactical errors and internal divisions to help them crush terrorist organizations.

May 24, 2007: Less than a third of the eligible voters turned out for recent elections, because most Algerians have no faith in the military dictatorship that has run the country for nearly two decades, or any voting that is allowed. Since the 1960s, the leaders of the revolution against France monopolized power, "in the name of the people." Most of the people are screwed, and they know it. Algeria is yet another Arab tyranny, where the few live it up at the expense of the many, and any attempts at change are bought off or beaten down. The official unemployment rate of 16 percent hides a lot of underemployment and low paid jobs with no future. Migration, legal or otherwise, is the goal of most of the under 30s (70 percent of the population.) It's mainly men who are trying to get out. The only positive sign is a falling birthrate, as more women take jobs men are unwilling to do, or are unqualified for (60 percent of college students are women). The men ran the country into the ground, and the women are making the best of it.

June 6, 2007: Security forces killed 17 Islamic terrorists last month, but about 30 people have died from terrorist related violence in that period. The courts are currently trying 35 people for various terrorist related offences. There are still several dozen small groups (a dozen or more men each) of terrorists in operation. Many are in the mountain forests east of the capital. A few are far to the south, in the desert. The terrorists still have some support among the people, but many other Algerians are quick to turn in any Islamic terrorist they come across.

June 9, 2007: Spain, France and Italy have arrested dozens of North African Islamic terrorists in the last few months, and have linked some of them to recent terror attacks in North Africa. Although it is safer to live in Europe, it isn't a safe haven for terrorists, like it used to be. These European nations are cooperating more closely with their counter-terrorism counterparts in North Africa, helping to identify terrorists who have fled to Europe, and are trying to hide under a different name. Many of these terrorists resort to criminal scams to sustain themselves, and their terrorist activities. This provides an endless supply of false identity documents, but not immunity from intense government intelligence gathering operations.

June 10, 2007: East of the capital, police raided a training camp that Islamic radicals had set up for teenage recruits. The kids were also serving as lookouts and spies for terrorist operations. Thirteen teenagers were arrested, and searches of their homes, as well as the camp, revealed lots of pro-terrorist material. In the same area, a roadside bomb killed three soldiers and wounded several others.

June 11, 2007: Outside the capital, civilians have had it with Islamic terrorists still operating in the area, and are quick to tip off the cops when the Islamic radicals come by to extort food or money. This has led to more police searches of the countryside, and the sounds of gunfire, especially at night. East of the capital, police found and dismantled a bomb found in a bus. Apparently the bomb was being transported, but the guy carrying it panicked and abandoned it on the bus.

June 15, 2007: The Islamic terrorists in North Africa have fallen on hard times, with their efforts ranked below street crime and unemployment when pollsters query people about what they fear most. Attempts to set off enough bombs, to scare lots of people, have failed so far this year. Terrorist recruiters are forced to go after 12 year old kids, because so few older men want to get involved. So far this month, police have foiled seven terrorist bombing efforts. A dozen security personnel have been killed in the last two weeks, but three times as many terrorists have been killed or captured.

June 18, 2007: Islamic terrorists attacked an African diplomat traveling along the road 75 kilometers east of the capital. The terrorists set off a roadside bomb, which wounded one of the policeman in the security detail. The terrorists also fired guns at the diplomat, but there were no other injuries.

June 22, 2007: Acting on a tip, police tracked down six Islamic terrorists to an area fifty kilometers east of the capital. The six terrorists resisted arrest and were killed. Across the border in Niger, tribal rebels attacked an army base, killing fifteen soldiers, wounding 43 and taking 72 prisoners. The rebellious tribes are potential sources of support for Islamic terrorists, if there is a lot of cash involved.

June 24, 2007: Terrorists attempted to use remote control bombs to damage a coastal natural gas pipeline near the capital. The bombs were not powerful, but the terrorists did kill two security guards who discovered the devices.

June 26, 2007: The government is rolling out a new program to increase jobs and crack down on non-terrorist crime (drugs and robbery, for the most part.) Islamic terrorists are showing up less and less in opinion polls, while jobs and street crime are seen as more pressing problems.

June 27, 2007: In the hilly forests 500 kilometers east of the capital, troops have cornered several dozen Islamic terrorists, and some family members. However, one member of the group was captured, and said that the fifteen terrorists plan to use women and children as human shields if they are cornered. In another action, 260 kilometers east of the capital, troops killed Ali Abu Dahdah (the number three man in the North African branch of al Qaeda) and two of his bodyguards.

June 28, 2007: Mauritania arrested six men and accused them of working for al Qaeda. The men were caught using an Internet cafe to communicate with other terrorists. Three of the prisoners were from Morocco and three from Mauritania. This makes 31 terrorist suspects arrested in the last month.

July 4, 2007: The treasurer of al Qaeda in North Africa (Zakaria) was captured a hundred kilometers east of the capital. Three other terrorists with him were killed. Also seized was $27,000 in local currency. Documents captured with Zakaria indicate he had raised six million dollars in the last few months.

July 5, 2007: The governor of a Berber region, about a hundred kilometers east of the capital, escaped unharmed when a roadside bomb was used against him. The bomb went off too late. Islamic terrorists have been hiding out in the area, but have also suffered many reverses of late.

July 7, 2007: In a secret trial, a local journalist was sentenced to ten years in prison for spying for Israel. The journalist, Said Sahnoun, was accused of providing Israel with information on the Algerian armed forces and local Islamic terrorist activity. Israel has long used Arab journalists as sources of information, and many of these reporters didn't even know they were working for Israeli intelligence, as they passed their information on to another Arab, who had a cover story (usually involving "working for another Arab country.") Since the trial was held in secret, it was not known how Said Sahnoun was caught.

July 8, 2007: Terrorist violence in June (25 dead) was up a bit from May (when fifteen died). Last month, 19 rebels and six soldiers were killed. Thus for the first half of the year, 207 have died. While Islamic terrorists continue to be active, their operations are way down from what they were a few years ago. In addition to those killed or captured in Algeria, many have been caught in neighboring countries and in Europe. Iraq has become a death trap for Algerian Islamic radicals. Those that go to Iraq usually die, or return and leave the terrorist life. Many Algerian Islamic radicals have become demoralized because, well, most Moslems hate them. All those dead Moslems, especially the women and children, has a lot to do with it. Since the early 1990s, when Islamic terrorists became very active in Algeria, some 200,000 have died, most of the them civilians slaughtered by Islamic radicals (often entire families or villages), who used mass murder to encourage civilians to support them. This eventually backfired, as it is doing in Iraq as well.

July 10, 2007: Israeli and European intelligence agencies warned Morocco that Islamic terrorists were planning an imminent attack on Western targets in the kingdom. In response, the police arrested fifteen suspects. But most of them were Syrians, apparently in Morocco for an attempt to illegally enter Spain as economic migrants. Four of the suspects were Algerian, who may be Islamic terrorists.

July 11, 2007: A suicide truck bomb went off in an army base 100 kilometers southeast of the capital. Ten were killed and 36 wounded. Security is particularly tight in the capital, because today the All Africa Games, an athletic competition, began there. The last terrorist attacks were three months ago, when 33 were killed.

July 14, 2007: Police cornered four Islamic terrorists 170 kilometers east of the capital. The terrorists resisted arrest and were killed in a gun battle. One policeman was wounded. In a village 100 kilometers, about fifty Islamic terrorists tried to attack two police stations, but fled without causing any injuries. They left several roadside bombs behind, which were found and disposed of.

July 16, 2007: Police arrested six men who were found to have master keys to hotel rooms used for participants in the current All Africa athletic competitions. The men are believed to be thieves, not terrorists, and are cooperating with police.

July 17, 2007: Apparently, al Qaeda attempted to plan and carry out spectacular terror attacks in the capital, during the current All Africa Games. But tight security prevented the terrorists from even getting close to the city. Police still believe that there are only a few hundred Islamic terrorists, most of them openly proclaiming allegiance to al Qaeda, and hiding out in rural areas east of the capital. Most of the population is hostile to the terrorists, providing the police with lots of tips about terrorist activities. The terrorists have not found a way to get around this, other than trying hard to keep their activities secret from everyone. This is a major handicap.

July 25, 2007: In the last week, the police made multiple contacts with Islamic terrorists, killing 38 and capturing ten. Security forces have lost several dead and wounded. Among the items captured was a laptop computer containing a list of 572 terrorists who attended a meeting in Algeria in the last week. At this gathering, new leaders were appointed, and it was decided to avoid civilian casualties as much as possible. Many of the men attending the meeting were supporters, not active fighters. But the list makes it easier to go after key members of the terrorist organization.

As expected, Al Qaeda in North Africa publicly announced its new policy of avoiding civilian casualties. This is in sharp contrast to previous Algerian Islamic terrorists, who went out of their way to terrorize and kill civilians who did not support them. The terrorists have been using remotely controlled roadside bombs, to attack soldiers and police in rural areas. The new strategy strives to gain civilian support by attacking the security forces. But most Algerians have long memories, and are not giving the terrorists the needed support. Police have a constant stream of tips on where the terrorists are.

Meanwhile, in the south, Niger is asking for help in dealing with a tribal rebellion near the Algerian border. The rebels are a 2,000 man faction of the Tuareg tribes, who refuse to accept the peace deal with rest of the Tuareg settled for. Niger believes the rebels are supporting Islamic terrorists in the area, if only for the money.

July 26, 2007: Southwest of the capital, troops and police began searching for a group of a hundred or so Islamic terrorists, who are reported seeking to attack a road building project, and kidnap foreigners associated with that undertaking.

July 27, 2007: Police caught up with sixty Islamic terrorists who had attacked two police stations, east of the capital, on July 14th. At least 22 terrorists were killed, and many weapons, documents, and much cash, was recovered.

July 30, 2007: Police caught and killed terrorist leader Sid Ali Rachid, and his deputy, east of the capital. Rachid was the planner for the April bombings that killed 33, and the July 11 bombing at an army base, that killed ten. Rachid was located because of tips from local civilians. This is a common problem for the terrorists, who are widely hated for their bloodthirsty ways.

July 31, 2007: It's been revealed that last month, a prominent Algerian Islamic terror leader, Benmessaoud Abdul Qader, surrendered. He reported that there were major divisions in the terrorist leadership. Many Algerian Islamic radicals did not want to declare themselves part of al Qaeda. Qader surrendered, in part, to avoid assassination by his fellow Islamic terrorists. Death is the usual fate of dissidents in Algerian Islamic terror organizations.

August 3, 2007: There were 58 terror related deaths in July, compared to 25 in June. So far this year, Islamic terrorist activity has left 265 dead.

During the 1990s, this was a typical weekly death toll. Most of the dead have been terrorists, who have tried to stage a number of attacks after joining al Qaeda earlier this year. The terrorist efforts failed largely because most Algerians are hostile to Islamic terrorism, no matter what it's called. Tips from civilians are constantly leading police to terrorist hideouts.

August 11, 2007: Police killed 47 Islamic terrorists last month, and over two dozen so far this month. Nearly 300 people have died in Islamic terror related violence so far this year. Over 200,000 died since the Islamic terror campaign began 15 years ago. Among the Islamic terrorists killed this month, were six foreigners (three Tunisians, two Libyans and a Moroccan), all of them wanted by police in their home countries. Police have conducted several successful operations in rural areas outside the capital. Several arms caches were found, plus three enemy camps and one bomb factory.

Islamic radicals in North Africa reorganized last year, joining together as a franchise of al Qaeda. The largest Islamic terrorist group has always been in Algeria, and apparently Al Qaeda In North Africa (as the new franchise was known), decided to revive the widespread Islamic terrorism that Algeria had known in the 1990s, when the death toll was often hundreds a month. But the majority of Algerians have lost their enthusiasm for Islamic terrorism as a cure for anything. That bird has flown, and most Algerians will turn in any terrorists they come across. For this reason, the terrorists hide out in rural areas, where there is no cell phone coverage. But once they enter urban neighborhoods, where the millions of new cell phone users live, the risk of being detected and reported skyrocket. Although the terrorists use cell phones to trigger roadside bombs, the cell phone is not their friend.

August 23, 2007: An assassination attempt on a former Islamic terrorist leader last week has left everyone wondering who did it. The target of the attack, Madani Mezrag, is one of several Islamic terrorist leaders who accepted amnesty, and he is now forming a political party to oppose the military dictatorship in promised elections. Most Algerians are still unhappy with their corrupt and ineffective government, run mainly by the families of men who led the rebellion against France in the 1960s. It was the victory of Islamic parties in early 1990s elections that triggered the Islamic terrorism (after the government refused to recognize it, and the army took over.)The Islamic radicals are not as popular as they were in the 1990s. The savagery of the Islamic terrorists took care of that. But the people still want honest and efficient government, and the Islamic conservatives are still offering it.

Meanwhile, the government has agreed to participate in joint counter-terror exercises next month, with the U.S. and forces from other nations in the region. These operations will be in the desert south, where several small groups of Islamic terrorists are hiding out.

After al Qaeda insisted that it did not try to kill Madani Mezrag with a car bomb, many now suspect the government, because the current rulers have to the most to lose if the Islamic parties win a new election.

August 26, 2007: A roadside bomb went off outside the capital, wounding five people. The target was a police patrol. It was a crude bomb, which damaged the police car and injuring the two police officers.

September 3, 2007: Some 600 kilometers east of the capital, several dozen Islamic terrorists rushed into a town, murdered an elderly man, and then rigged the neighborhood with booby traps. These killed five of the policemen who responded. Other police picked up the trail of the terrorists, who had fled into the forest. Eventually, at least seven of the terrorists were trapped and killed.

September 7, 2007: Some 430 kilometers east of the capital, a suicide bomber walked into a crowd awaiting a visit from the president, and detonated his explosives. Some twenty were killed and over a hundred wounded.

September 8, 2007: A hundred kilometers east of the capital, a car bomb went off outside a navy base, killing 27 sailors and police, and three civilians. About fifty were wounded.

September 9, 2007: The government refused to allow Islamic terrorists, who had accepted amnesty and disarmed, to form political parties. The former terrorists had asked politely. Islamic political parties won national elections in 1992, but the government, dominated by revolutionaries who led the fight for independence from France in the 1950s and 60s, refused to allow the Islamic politicians to take over. The Islamic parties won by promising to eliminate the massive corruption in the government, which had allowed the economy to stagnate, was unjust and the usual stuff. The Islamic radicals tried to use terror to overthrow the government, but the old revolutionaries proved too tough.

Nearly 200,000 people died during over a decade of violence. The Islamic terror tactics were based on the idea that any Moslem who did cooperate was not a real Moslem, and should be killed, along with their family, if possible. Entire families were often slaughtered in a campaign that eventually saw the population choose the corrupt politicians over the pure, but murderous, Islamic radicals. Same pattern played out in Egypt, at about the same time, and later in Saudi Arabia and Iraq. Meanwhile, the mismanagement of the Algerian economy has left the majority of young (under 30) Algerians unemployed and unhappy. This creates another generation of rebels. Actually, it already has. Although most Algerians oppose al Qaeda and Islamic terrorism, the corruption and mismanagement of the government angers enough people, especially unemployed young men, to staff the current force of several hundred Islamic terrorists. This is a pattern common throughout the Arab world, where the inability to create effective governments, and the propensity for dictatorships, has created Islamic radicals desperate to try anything to change the situation. That eventually led to attacks on the West, seen as enemies of Islam and somehow responsible for all the ills of the Arab world.

September 19, 2007: So far this month, there have been four terrorist bombings, leaving over fifty dead. The police have made arrests, and believe that a group of Islamic radicals based in mosques, which had been recruiting suicide bombers for Iraq, is largely responsible. The government doesn't like to go around raiding mosques and arresting clergy, but it's obvious that there are still some imams who believe violence is the only way to fix the countries problems. The government isn't making much progress with the economy, with most young men (under 30) are unemployed, and there's a severe housing shortage. The sad thing is, that a religious dictatorship wouldn't help. Iran has one, and still has the unemployment and housing problems. The clergy are as corrupt as the politicians, once they are in power. It's the corruption and lack of civic spirit that causes the economic stagnation. That's why West European corporations prefer to establish new factories in East Europe or Asia. The Middle East and Africa are too corrupt and chaotic for businesses to flourish. The leaders in Algeria, and the rest of Africa, refuse to recognize this, that they are the problem.

Meanwhile, down in Mali, a rebellion by Tuareg tribesmen, who refused to accept a peace deal last year, continues out of control. One army base, near the Algerian border, is cut off because the rebels have mined the few roads in the area. But the army is slowly moving in, while the besieged base is re-supplied by air. The government calls the remaining rebels "bandits," and there's a certain truth to that. The Tuareg have long lived by their own law, and smuggling and raiding. It is feared that some of the tribes have helped Islamic terrorist groups, either for money, or just to further antagonize the government. The Tuareg tribes are present throughout eastern Mali, southern Algeria and western Niger. The rebellion is centered in Mali because the government there has regularly lied to the Tuareg, and reneged on promises.

September 22, 2007: A suicide car bomb, using over 500 pounds of explosives, failed in an attack on a police convoy carrying foreign workers. Nine people were injured, including three foreigners, but only the suicide bomber was killed. Al Qaeda claimed that more attacks would follow, in Algeria as well as France and Spain. Al Qaeda is making a big deal about driving all non-Moslems out of North Africa, and reclaiming Spain (conquered by Moslem armies 1200 years ago, and reclaimed by local Christians 500 years ago) for Islam. Most Moslems want to go to Spain for jobs, though, not re-conquest.

September 25, 2007: In the last two days, there have been half a dozen attacks by al Qaeda terrorists. These included several crude bombs. The other attacks were with guns and knives. All of this left five dead and five injured.

September 27, 2007: Al Qaeda survives in remote camps, in mountain forests along the coast, by simultaneously bribing and terrorizing locals. During the peak of the Islamic terror campaign, in the 1990s, terror tactics, to obtain support from the population, often included the murder of entire families. These memories remain, and rural residents are willing to keep quiet if the threat, or the cash bribe, is large enough. But the police have been able to find some rural residents who will talk, and that has made it necessary for the terrorist groups to switch camps frequently. There are a few dozen of these terrorists cells, usually with less than ten members. The terrorists spend most of their time dealing with survival in these rural areas, and planning their next attack. This process takes several months, and some cells get discouraged and dissolve, or try to move to Europe, where living conditions are better, and the environment is less hostile to Islamic radicals. More cells are being run down by the security forces. All this accounts for the small number of attacks, given the number of terrorists who are active.

September 30, 2007: Since Ramadan began two weeks ago, terrorist violence has killed 37 security personnel, terrorists and civilians.

The few hundred Islamic terrorists left are being hunted down by soldiers and police, and are finding civilians reluctant to hide them. There are several incidents a week when terrorists make contact with the security forces, resulting in several dozen casualties and arrests each week. Given the high unemployment among young Algerians, there are plenty of new recruits for the terrorists, but a growing shortage of older, more experienced, leaders. These terrorists, of an earlier generation, are not only getting picked off by police activity, but are getting out of the terrorism business (through exile, surrender or just fading into obscurity.) The shortage of good leadership makes it easier to catch the terrorists, and more difficult to plan and carry out attacks.

Police have determined that the suicide-bombing attempt on the Algerian president last month, was the work of a terrorist leader who had been released from prison under the amnesty deal. Some of these jailed terrorists were expected to go back to their violent ways.

October 5, 2007: A major terrorist leader, Hassan Hattab, has surrendered and accepted amnesty. Hattab was one of the founders of the GSPC, and did not agree with many other GSPC leaders, who decided to form an al Qaeda franchise. Hattab also lost faith in the ability of terrorism to bring meaningful change to Algeria.

October 13, 2007: In the last ten days, operations against terrorists have left about three dozen dead, most of them terrorists. There were also several dozen arrests, as police continued to track down those responsible for recent bombings and attacks. One of those attacks was on foreigners working in Algeria. In response to that, and al Qaeda threats to concentrate on going after foreigners, the French company Michelin has ordered the families, of its French executives and technicians, back to France. This is only about a hundred people, but the places where the families live would be difficult to guard, given the al Qaeda willingness to use suicide bombers. The Michelin factory will remain open. This plant provides jobs to nearly a thousand Algerians and is an important economic symbol. Michelin shut down its Algerian operations in 1993, when the war with Islamic terrorists was getting underway. Four years ago, the Michelin plant re-opened, and more foreign firms are coming in. Al Qaeda is trying to keep them out.

But the biggest development this week was the death of Sofiane Abu Fasila, the second in command for Al Qaeda in the Islamic Maghreb. Fasila was the guy who ran day-to-day operations, and was the chief planner of the recent terror attacks. Fasila was caught at a police checkpoint, and tried to shoot his way through, with two associates. All three terrorists were killed. Fasila was responsible for the use of suicide bombing in Algeria, a tactic that Islamic terrorists had not previously used there. This tactic angered a lot of Algerians, and made it easier for the police to track down the terrorists responsible for the attacks of the last two months. These have left over sixty people, mostly civilians, dead. This is a mistake Islamic terrorists make again and again. If they kill a lot of civilians, they turn more civilians into police informers. Without solid support from the general population, it's only a matter of time before the terrorist cells are hunted down and destroyed.

The Internet has made it easier for terrorists from many different areas to keep in touch, and reform terrorist cells destroyed in a country. That's how the Algerian terrorist organizations recovered from the huge losses of the last five years. But the Internet also makes it easier to monitor terrorist operations. While some communications never get revealed to intelligence agencies, the terrorists never know exactly which aspects of their plans are known to the police. The end result is that it's nearly impossible to carry out a large scale terrorist campaign, using the Internet for communications. But it is possible to organize smaller operations, such as the recent movement of terrorist reinforcements, and bomb making materials, into Algeria. The violence here could go on for years, especially if the Islamic terrorists continue to get cash from wealthy patrons in the Persian Gulf region.

October 14, 2007: About 40 Islamic terrorists attacked army positions 100 kilometers east of the capital, but were repulsed, and fled back into the forests. Elsewhere, three terrorists were killed by police, and more terrorist hiding places and weapons caches were found. West of the capital, 14 terrorist suspects were arrested.

October 15, 2007: About 60 kilometers east of the capital, seven soldiers were wounded when their vehicle hit a mine buried under a forest road. The troops are scouring the forested mountains along the coast, seeking terrorist hideouts.

October 17, 2007: Mauritania arrested seven of their citizens and accused them of belonging to Algerian terrorist groups. The two countries share a border, and Algerian terrorists have been fleeing south over the last few years, as the atmosphere became more hostile for terrorists in the coastal areas of Algeria (where most of the people live.) Meanwhile. Algerian security forces continued searching rural areas east of the capital, where Islamic terrorists are believed to have hideouts. Several dozen suspects have been arrested there in the last week, and several camps and weapons caches found.

October 18, 2007: For the third time since 2004, Pakistan is sending suspected Algerian Islamic terrorists back to Algeria. Twenty men are going back in a few days. Before that, forty had been sent back. Some were set free, some were arrested on old terrorism charges. Many of those Algerians held in Pakistani jails, have been there since 2001, when Pakistan began its crackdown on Islamic terrorists connected with al Qaeda and the Taliban. Hundreds of Algerian terrorists had fled to Afghanistan in the late 1990s, as the tide turned against terrorists in Algeria.

October 21, 2007: France has finally given Algeria maps of where three million French mines were planted in the late 1950s. The 1,200 kilometers of mine fields were created to make it more difficult for Algerian rebels (against the French colonial government) moving across the Tunisian and Moroccan borders. Most of those minefields are in remote areas, and have never been cleared. But each year, those tending herds in the border areas are killed or injured by the mines, as are their animals. The mines in more traveled areas have been removed over the decades. But now, with the maps, the mines in remote areas can be cleared. That will be expensive, as the mines are now covered with more sand, or have shifted position because of rain and wind. The mine maps were never a major issue between the two countries, but France never offered to provide them before either. Now, however, the French army sees an opportunity to improve its relationship with Algeria. Since the 1950s, the French army has been particularly hated by Algerians, because of the rough tactics used during the late 1950s and early 1960s, before France finally left and Algeria became independent. But over the decades, the hatred has died down.

October 27, 2007: Just on the other side of the Niger border, Tuareg rebels ambushed a patrol, killing twelve soldiers. The army denied that report, saying a few troops were wounded when their vehicle hit a mine. The rebels are a 2,000 man faction of the Tuareg tribes, who refuse to accept the peace deal with rest of the Tuareg settled for. Niger believes the rebels are supporting Islamic terrorists in the area, if only for the money. The rebels also want a cut of the cash from Niger's uranium mines. French controlled mines have been operating for years, and China will begin mining operations soon.

October 31, 2007: Courts sentenced ten Islamic terrorists to death, and twelve others to long prison sentences. These kinds of sentences encourage many captured terrorists to tell all they know about terrorist operations.

November 3, 2007: Although the terrorist amnesty program brought in about 2,000 men, several hundred refused, and continued fighting. At least a third of these have died or been captured in the last few months. Last week, several days of operations near the Tunisian border, seventeen terrorists were killed and seven captured. Large quantities of weapons and munitions were captured, along with documents. This was a typical operation, with the detailed information on terrorist hideouts coming from a captured terrorist. Just as frequently, information comes from local civilians. This despite, or perhaps because of, terrorists frequently killing any civilians they encounter in the hills or forests.

November 4, 2007: An Al Qaeda leader released a video in which he announced that a Libyan terrorist group, the Libyan Islamic Fighting Group, has joined al Qaeda. All Islamic radicals in North Africa were urged to overthrow their governments and establish an Islamic Republic. Islamic radicals in the region have been trying, without success, to do this for nearly two decades. This latest ploy, joining forces with a greatly weakened al Qaeda, is more a publicity ploy, than a practical measure.

The chief of propaganda for North African al Qaeda, Abu Abderahmane, surrendered to police, saying he regretted what he had been doing and renounced Islamic terrorism.

November 5, 2007: Tuareg rebels in Mali have agreed to hold peace negotiations in Algeria. The Tuareg tribes are related to the large ethnic Berber minority in Algeria, and have been resisting government control for centuries.

November 9, 2007: Islamic terrorists in three jeeps drove up to an airport an airport in the south, and fired rifles and RPG rockets at the aircraft. One airliner, two helicopters and a military transport were damaged. There were no injuries. The Islamic terrorists then drove off and crossed back into Niger, where they apparently have a camp.

November 10, 2007: A car bomb went off near a police station in a village 50 kilometers east of the capital. Three civilians were wounded. The car was intercepted by police before it could reach the police station. In nearby Mali, Tuareg rebels attacked a convoy guarded by soldiers. The army reported that four soldiers were missing and three were wounded.

November 11, 2007: Some 280 kilometers east of the capital, a police operation killed one Islamic terrorist and captured four others.

November 12, 2007: So far this year, about 440 have died because of Islamic terrorism. Most of the dead have been Islamic terrorists. There were several successful bombing attacks, but those responsible for most of those attacks have been killed or captured. While there is still terrorist activity in Algeria, recent arrests of Algerian terrorists in Europe, Israel and elsewhere indicates that many have fled their homeland. Algeria has become a very hostile environment for Islamic terrorists, and many of them respond by moving to another country.

November 20, 2007: Algerian terrorists have failed, in their attempt to revive their organization by merging with al Qaeda. Eight months of suicide bomb attacks have killed over a hundred people, and turned even more of the population against Islamic radicalism. In the last week, the army has killed a senior leader of "al Qaeda in North Africa," based on a tip from civilians. Another terrorist leader, Bouderbala Fateh, and two associates, was captured. The three were found in possession of 1,800 pounds of explosives and bomb making materials. These included two children's backpacks. While Islamic terrorists have some support among the population, most Algerians just want the Islamic terrorism out of their lives. Algerians still dislike the inept dictatorship that runs the country, but Islamic radicals are not seen as a viable alternative.

December 4, 2007: The armed Islamic terrorists have all been killed, or decided to go into hiding for the moment. But the terrorist PR specialists are much in evidence. Police are capturing many al Qaeda members carrying propaganda material (CD, cassettes, printed), and prepared to recruit anyone interested. But what the police are really looking for are the mysterious "al Qaeda training camps." There have been several cases recently, of al Qaeda members being arrested in Europe and Africa (Nigeria) and saying they had been trained in "Algerian terrorist camps." Few of these non-Algerians can provide precise locations for these camps. Some appear to be ones that have been captured and destroyed in the past few months. But others remain a bit mysterious. Do they exist? Apparently foreign Islamic terrorist recruits think so. Tunisians and Moroccans are being caught entering Algeria, and arrested, saying they are on their way to "al Qaeda training camps." First they have to make contact with their al Qaeda guides, which they usually have not done yet, when they are arrested. Algeria is a big place, with lots of sparsely populated areas where you could do just about anything, without being noticed. This is especially true if you had the cooperation of the few locals. These tend to be religiously conservative, or amenable to bribes or threats.

December 5, 2007: East of the capital, a group of terrorists attacked a bus carrying military personnel, but were driven off by troops.

December 6, 2007: Terrorist activity took a sharp drop in November, when only six people (four civilians and two terrorists) were killed. In October, terrorist activity left sixty dead. The new "Al Qaeda in North Africa" began the year threatening a renewed war against the Algerian government. But it all turned out to be more wishful thinking than anything else. There are still a few Islamic terrorists out and about, but they spend most of their time trying to avoid getting caught.

December 9, 2007: For the second time this year, Islamic terrorists attacked foreign (Russian) technicians at a natural gas facility west of the capital. But the two roadside bombs misfired, and no one was injured.

December 11, 2007: As in so many other countries, the proliferation of cell phone use has proved disastrous for the terrorists. In the last s even years, the number of cell phone users in Algeria has gone from 54,000 to 25 million. That means 75 percent of the adult population has a cell phone, and you can get a signal in many rural areas, as well as nearly all urban ones. As was the case in Iraq, once a cell phone using population turns against the terrorists, the timely reports to police greatly increase, making it much more difficult for terrorists to move around undetected. Meanwhile, the terrorists' favorite communications tool, the Internet , is not as widely established, with only four million users in Algeria.

December 21, 2007: Ten days ago, two al Qaeda suicide truck bombs exploded outside local United Nations headquarters. Al Qaeda claimed this was a blow against the international enemies of Islam. The attack killed 37, including 17 UN employees, and wounded over a hundred. Most of the casualties were Algerians, and this attack increased popular hatred of Islamic terrorism still more. To make matters worse, the two men driving the trucks were members of Islamic terrorist organizations who had recently been freed from prison under the amnesty. They had promised to give up their terrorist ways, and one of them was a 63 year old man dying of cancer.

Al Qaeda hopes to get an Iraq style terror campaign going in Algeria, which will cause the population to rise up in rebellion. This is absurd, but that's what the al Qaeda leadership proclaim as their goals. The reality is that most Algerians are hostile to Islamic terrorism, after over a decade of it and more than 150,000 people killed. This hostility translates into many civilians willing to tip off the police when they see, or suspect, al Qaeda activity. This has led to ten al Qaeda leaders being killed or caught in the last few months. Every week there are al Qaeda members caught, usually because of a tip from civilians. That typically results in some terrorists fighting to the death, a few being captured (along with weapons and documents) every week. Many of the current terrorists in Algeria are those who were recently released under the amnesty. There have been very few attacks, but lots of threats.

Algeria's problem is that, despite the general hatred of Islamic terrorism, the country is still run by a corrupt dictatorship that mismanages the economy and generally screws up. This is typical in the Arab world, and no one has come up with a workable solution yet. Islamic radicalism is the latest idea to be tried, and fail. Despite that, proponents of this approach will be around for a while. Unlike the previous crew (socialist nationalists), whose few remaining supporters just talk and write, Islamic terrorists must terrorize until they die, or lose interest completely. Many have done that, but some of those who fled to Europe have remained committed to mass murder in the name of God. Thus in the last week, French police arrested several more Algerians on terrorism charges. The French like to let these guys run free, so that the names of more pro-terrorist Algerian migrants can be obtained. But it was believed that the exiles were part of an active support network for the attacks in Algeria, and this needed to be stopped.

Al Qaeda is using the Internet and willing Arab media (like al Jazeera) to get their message in front of young (late teen, early 20s) Moslem men (especially students) who are the most likely new recruits. Students are particularly susceptible, because they are facing unemployment after they graduate, and their education has made them aware of why this is so. While many such men seek to emigrate to the West, or oil rich Arab countries that need foreigners to do the work, others seek an easier, and more futile, solution. Nothing-new here. Even Europe went through a spate of it in the 60s and 70s, with young Europeans killing people and blowing things up. Makes great headlines, but accomplishes nothing.

December 22, 2007: Some 550 kilometers east of the capital, police have surrounded a dozen armed terrorists, after capturing their camp and a large quantity of ammunition. Meanwhile, 450 kilometers west of the capital, terrorists killed two security men and took their weapons.

December 23, 2007: Police defeated a terrorist attempt to attack a police station 110 kilometers east of the capital. Elsewhere, police defused three bombs placed near a military checkpoint.

December 24, 2007: A roadside bomb wounded three soldiers, some 600 kilometers east of the capital.

December 26, 2007: In Mauritania, police are pursuing three suspected al Qaeda members for the murder and robbery of four French tourists. The terrorists came upon French tourists having a picnic in the countryside, and shot and robbed them. The terrorists then apparently fled to Senegal. Police had been tracking the three. A hundred or more Algerian Islamic terrorists have fled south to Mauritania and Mali, where they survive via banditry and other criminal activities.

December 27, 2007: Just across the border in Mauritania, four soldiers were killed when bandits or terrorists attacked an outpost.

January 2, 2008: The December 11th terrorist attacks in the capital led to a shake-up in the command of the security forces. It was believed that the attacks could have been detected and thwarted if the security forces had been more alert.

January 2, 2008: A suicide truck bomb, using half a ton of explosives, destroyed a police station east of the capital, killing four police officers.

January 8, 2008: The government will double the number of special counter-terrorism troops, who are used to hunt down and capture or kill Islamic terrorists.

January 9, 2008: Terrorists ambushed an army patrol 110 kilometers east of the capital, killing five soldiers and wounding ten.

January 11, 2008: In Guinea-Bissau, two al Qaeda members were arrested and charged with the December murder, in Mauritania, of four French tourists. This crime caused alarm in the region, which has benefitted from a growing number of tourists. Islamic terrorists hate Western tourists, although Moslems are a minority in West Africa. This widespread contact between Moslems and non-Moslems (mostly Christians) has caused a lot of violence, mostly the result of Islamic clergy preaching the need to attack infidels (non-Moslems).

The remaining terrorists in Algeria have little popular support, and survive by terrorizing civilians into providing food and other necessities. The army has located several groups of Islamic terrorists in mountains and forests, and continues to try and bring the terrorists in, or kill them. In response, the terrorists have switched tactics, concentrating on fewer attacks, each designed to kill the maximum number of people. These attacks also feature the use of suicide bombers, something rarely encountered in Algeria before 2006.

A year ago, a six month amnesty for Islamic terrorists attracted 300 people who turned themselves in. The amnesty did not cover those who committed murder, which may be why some 800 Islamic terrorists remained active. As part of the amnesty deal, some 2,200 imprisoned terrorists were freed. A few of these have since been found involved in Islamic terrorism again. Some 15 years of Islamic terrorism left over 200,000 dead and caused some $20 billion in economic damage. Thousands of Islamic radicals have fled the country, and continue to plan and carry out terrorist acts in Europe and the Middle East.

January 13, 2008: Islamic terrorism killed 491 people in 2007, up sharply from 126 in 2006. In reaction to their defeat in Iraq (where 500 terrorism deaths a month is a low figure), many al Qaeda operators are moving to North Africa, where it's safer (American soldiers and marines are farther away). December saw a spike in terrorism related deaths: 56 (versus six in November).

January 20, 2008: Last year, GDP went up 11 percent, while unemployment fell from 12.8 to 11.8 percent. But the unemployment rate is much higher among young men, who are still the prime recruiting pool of Islamic terrorists. The continued corruption in Algeria aids the terrorist recruiters, but not as much as the fact that about a quarter of Algerian men in their teens and twenties cannot get a job.

January 29, 2008: Near the Mali border, a group of men crossing the desert in four-wheel drive vehicles, opened fire on a passing military helicopter. The army began a search.

February 1, 2008: Near the Mali border, troops hunted down a group of Islamic terrorists and killed five, and arrested one. Most of them were foreigners, but their leader was a known Islamic terrorist. The army has been cracking down on smuggling along the southern border, and dozens of smugglers have been arrested in the past few weeks. The Islamic terrorists use the smugglers to get themselves, and weapons, back-and-forth across the border.

February 5, 2008: Police shot the driver of a suicide car bomb, in a town 65 kilometers east of the capital. The bomber went off and killed the bomber and two bystanders near a police station (the apparent target).

The police and army have been able to run down known terrorist cells thanks to all these tips. This led to the recent capture of four men involved in the December bombings directed against the UN. The four included two men who looked after, and guided, the suicide bombers to their target, and two who filmed the operation. Police believe they have killed the leader of that cell, and are seeking the bomb makers, recruiters, financers and other planners. The four men captured indicated that another attack was in the works. Typically, al Qaeda suicide bomber teams consist of about a dozen men, plus the expendable suicide bombers. Police have destroyed or broken up several of these cells in the past year. But the survivors tend to either flee the country (Europe is a popular sanctuary), or rebuild the cell and get back to work. The terrorists who go to Europe are able to raise money, often via threats and extortion directed at other Algerian exiles. Some cash comes in from wealthy Islamic conservatives in the Persian Gulf. Since merging with al Qaeda last year, the Algerian terrorists have managed to set off about one suicide bomb a month. This is not enough to seriously threaten the government, but is done mainly for the propaganda value. It helps recruiting and fund raising. The attacks do not make the bombers any more popular among the general population. So in the long run, the bombings just make it possible to carry out more bombings. Not a winning tactic, but all Al Qaeda has at the moment.

February 6, 2008: The security forces continue to hunt down the several hundred Islamic terrorists operating in the countryside. A dozen or more of the terrorists are arrested or killed each week. Unlike a decade ago, the Islamic terrorists are no longer able to scare all the locals into keeping quiet. Back then, entire families, or villages, would be slaughtered for talking to the police. Now the terrorists are too few in number, and have to keep their heads down and hope for the best. But the widespread hatred of the Islamic radicals, because of the brutal tactics of the 1990s, makes it easier for most Algerians to call the cops with reports of suspicious activity. Out in the countryside, strangers stand out, especially bearded ones carrying guns.

February 25, 2008: One group of al Qaeda terrorists was found working with a smuggling gang along the Tunisian border. This crew recently lured eight border police out one night with a false tip, ambushed and killed the cops, and stole their two vehicles. The 17 attackers were tracked down and killed over the next few days.

Over the next three years, the police force will add 45,000 more men, creating a national force of 200,000. While ostensibly to deal with Islamic terrorists, a much greater threat is civil disorder from an increasingly young and unemployed population. The corruption in the government, which refuses to allow free elections to replace it, continues to anger the population. Algerians are done with Islamic radicals, who proved better at killing civilians who disagreed with them, than in taking on the government or solving economic problems. While there are many political parties pushing for peaceful change, the government is preparing for a more violent reaction.

The Islamic terrorists are less of a problem than the smuggling gangs, and other criminal groups, but the terrorists attract far more media attention. That may change, because the new leader of al Qaeda in Algeria is believed to be Yahia Abou Ammar, whose background involves links with smuggling gangs along the Mali and Niger border. Ammar is replacing Mokhtar Belmokhtar, who is blamed for the many sloppy terror attacks, as well as the growing number of al Qaeda members getting caught. The smuggling gangs have been around for centuries, and have a Robin Hood aura about them. The smugglers are also seen as efficient, and deadly when they have to be. Ammar is expected to exploit that reputation in an attempt to rehabilitate al Qaeda's reputation. The terrorists need the help, as they are doing much less well in neighboring Morocco and Tunisia. Al Qaeda needs a big win to restore its position in the Islamic world. The defeat in Iraq, and the rise of Iranian backed terrorists like Hamas (in Gaza) and Hizbollah (in Lebanon) is more bad news. Al Qaeda considers the Iranians as heretics (because they practice Shia Islam, rather than the mainstream Sunni practices). Iran has gone out of its way to establish good diplomatic relations with Algeria. This is a further snub to the down, but not out, al Qaeda. Meanwhile, U.S. embassy staff in Algeria are warned to be careful, as there are fears that al Qaeda might be planning to kidnap an American embassy official. That would be the kind of high profile stunt terrorists aim for.

Islamic terrorists from Algeria, and the rest of North Africa, have been showing up all over the world. But some of these exiles are still involved with terrorism back in Algerian. One such fellow, a resident of Britain, was arrested in Algeria for providing the imported car used in the car bombing of a police station.

In early February, the government told Russia that it was cancelling the purchase of 28 MiG-29 fighters, and returning the ones already delivered. There were quality issues, and the fact that these aircraft were assembled from old parts. The MiG-29 has been in service for 25 years, but stocks of Cold War era spare parts are still around, and apparently put to use to build the Algerian aircraft. These are supposed to be "new," but some of their components are not and the Algerians may have a better offer from France for more modern Rafael fighters. France is seen as a more useful ally than Russia, and France wants to sell some of those Rafaels real bad.

March 2, 2008: Over the last week, some 9,000 troops assembled 62 kilometers east of the capital, trying to trap an al Qaeda leader, and his bodyguards, believed to be hiding in the hills. Four of these men were killed. Later, another two dozen men were caught setting up a roadside bomb. The terrorists fled to their base, but were caught by helicopter gunships, and most died.

March 11, 2008: Al Qaeda is taking a beating. Unable to carry out bombings, or evade the thousands of police and troops searching for its rural hideouts, they have pumped up their press release production. These denounce press reports of al Qaeda losses, and claim unsubstantiated victories over security forces. The only recent terrorist action, that could be confirmed, was the kidnapping of two Austrian tourists, who were seized while they were crossing the Sahara near the Tunisian border. Since Islamic terrorists have been hiding out in these more remote areas over the last two years, tourists have been warned away. But tourists are not forbidden to pass through these remote, desolated, areas.

March 14, 2008: Al Qaeda demanded that hundreds of jailed terrorists in Algeria and Tunisia be freed in return for the release of two kidnapped Austrians. Austria refused to back such a demand. Algeria and Tunisia refused to cooperate.

March 16, 2008: Al Qaeda has dropped its demand for a mass prisoner swap, and now demands a ransom of $8.4 million, and the release of ten jailed terrorists, for the two Austrian tourists it holds. Austria refuses to negotiate.

March 17, 2008: East of the capital, an army patrol was ambushed, leaving two soldiers dead and 17 wounded. In the south, the government forces two Christian churches to close. There are about 11,000 Christians in Algeria, and a lot more conversion efforts going on lately. The Islamic clergy has demanded that this be stopped. Islam is a very intolerant religion, with a death penalty for those who convert, and all other religions banned in some countries. Islamic clergy see no problem with demanding other religions be regulated or expelled.

March 20, 2008: In northern Mali, near the Algerian border, Tuareg (non-Arab tribesmen who were the first inhabitants of North Africa) rebels ambushed an army convoy and killed three soldiers (and captured over twenty). The Tuareg have been in sporadic rebellion since colonial rule ended and the African majority in Mali asserted its power. This attack took place in the area where al Qaeda is believing to hold two Austrian kidnapping victims who were seized in Tunisia. The terrorists keep extending the negotiations deadline, and now April 6th is the deadline. Austria says it will not pay a ransom.

March 25, 2008: For the last few days, the army has been chasing dozens of al Qaeda terrorists around a mountainous area 430 kilometers east of the capital. At least five of terrorists have been killed, and more were wounded. These terrorists appear to be from Mali, Chad and Mauritania.

March 26, 2008: In Mali, several vehicles full of Tuareg rebels drove up and fired on an army camp in a town near the Algerian border. This attack took place in the area where al Qaeda is believing to hold two Austrian kidnapping victims.

March 27, 2008: The government signed a deal with China to obtain technical help in building nuclear power plants.

March 28, 2008: A multi-billion dollar Russian jet fighter purchase deal is unraveling. Algeria has already cancelled the purchase 35 MiG-29s, and now Russia is cancelling delivery of 34 Su-30 fighters, because Algeria has not made required down-payments. The collapse of this deal is believed to be more about improving relations with Europe, and particularly France, rather than the quality of the Russian warplanes. France would like to sell Algeria Rafael fighters.

March 29, 2008: Al Qaeda has at least one death squad that is hunting down and killing clerics who speak out against Islamic terrorism, or are otherwise cooperating with the government. Several clerics have been murdered, and many more threatened.

March 31, 2008: Interrogations of captured terrorists revealed yet another plan to kill prime minister Abdelaziz Belkhadem. Several such plots have been uncovered in the past year, indicating the high priority such an operations has for al Qaeda, and the constant losses being taken by al Qaeda in Algeria by counter-terror operations.

April 5, 2008: A roadside bomb, on a rural route in the mountains 55 kilometers east of the capital, went off and killed a soldier, and wounded three others. There are many roads in these parts, making it easy for terrorists to find places to place these bombs, because any patrols will have to come by.

April 7, 2008: Another kidnapper deadline passed yesterday, as the Austrian government refused to deal for two Austrians held by Islamic terrorists in Tunisia. The kidnappers had demanded $8 million, plus several Islamic terrorists freed from jail. The new terms demand that Austria withdraw the four Austrian soldiers serving in Afghanistan, and free two Islamic terrorists jailed in Austria. The two captives are believed held in Mali.

April 9, 2008: Some 55 kilometers east of the capital, police intercepted a group of Islamic terrorists on their way to attack a construction site. Two policemen were killed and two wounded.

In Mauritania, police arrested an al Qaeda leader, who was trying to escape dressed as a woman. The arrested man, Maarouf Ould Hadib, was believed the leader of a gang that killed four French tourists last December.

April 10, 2008: In Morocco, police closing in on four Islamic terrorists, saw three of them die by setting off explosives. One policeman died in the explosion. Another terrorist survived the blast and was shot dead after he drew a sword and came at the police. Documents collected at the scene provided lead to a search for ten more Islamic terrorists .

April 11, 2008: Three car bombs went off in the capital, killing two dozen and wounding nearly 200. One of the bombs was apparently an attempt to kill the prime minister, who has been effective in developing and directing counter-terrorism programs. About a hundred kilometers east of the capital, police killed two Islamic terrorists. Meanwhile, 55 kilometers east of the capital, police arrested six terrorists, and seized explosives and weapons.

April 12, 2008: An Algerian Christian, who had converted while living in Britain, was given a two year suspended sentence for taking part in missionary activities in Algeria. In most Moslem countries, Islamic conservatives demand police action against any Moslem who converts to another religion, and punishment of any non-Moslems involved. In many Moslem countries, there are laws prohibiting such conversions. Moslems consider it their right, and duty, to convert others, but deem it illegal for anyone to try and convert them. This has long been a source of friction between Moslems and non-Moslems. The Algerian government supports these prohibitions in order to deny Islamic conservatives an issue. The government has, so far, prevented the Islamic radicals from gaining any traction, and is willing to sacrifice good relations with local Christians to assist the counter-terror effort..

April 16, 2008: Over the last week, searches for Islamic terrorists hideouts has succeeded several times, and resulted in ten terrorists killed. Documents and weapons were captured. As a result of that, another 25 terrorist sympathizers were arrested.

April 22, 2008: Four terrorists were killed by troops, some 700 kilometers southeast of the capital.

April 23, 2008: Islamic conservatives are demanding that women be allowed to wear their face veils (leaving only their eyes visible) in their passport photos.

April 24, 2008: Two men, long suspected of al Qaeda ties, were found and arrested. The men were located because of tip from a local civilian.

April 25, 2008: Some 250 former Islamic terrorists, who accepted the amnesty, are threatening to return to their violent ways if they don't get the amnesty benefits they were promised. Those who accepted the amnesty were told they would get back the jobs they left to join terrorist groups. The unemployment rate is about 12 percent.

April 26, 2008: Fifty kilometers east of the capital, troops discovered an al Qaeda hideout, and in the ensuing gun battle, killed ten terrorists who were hiding in three bunkers. The ten were planning some major terror attacks. This, and the location of the terrorist base, were discovered via information from terrorists killed earlier in the month.

April 28, 2008: Because of increased movement of illegal weapons and explosives into the country. Border guards have been ordered to shoot-to-kill if they encounter any smugglers who fail to halt. It's not terrorists who are bringing the stuff in, but the usual smugglers who know terror groups will pay well for such supplies. Al Qaeda may not have a lot of people, but they are well funded by wealthy backers in the Persian Gulf. Saudi Arabian efforts to halt this flow of cash has not been very successful, and is a source of many complaints whenever there is a meeting of Arab leaders or diplomats.

May 3, 2008: The month long cease-fire in Mali was broken when Tuareg rebels attacked an army convoy near the Algerian border. Four rebels were killed. The Tuareg are ethnic cousins of the Berbers to the north, and also don't get along with Arabs, or anyone for that matter. There is also a Tuareg revolt in neighboring Niger. Like the Berbers, the Tuareg are not attracted to Islamic radicalism or al Qaeda, but will provide support, for a price. Al Qaeda needs cash to survive, and smuggling, especially drugs, provides that. They cooperate with traditional smuggling groups, like the Tuareg in this.

May 5, 2008: After hiding out for a month, an al Qaeda bomb maker was found and captured by police in Mauritania's capital. The prisoner, Sidi Mohamed, is believed to work for al Qaeda terrorists in Algeria.

Since 1992, security forces have killed some 17,000 Islamic terrorists. Over 200,000 Algerians have died in this violence, most of them civilians killed by the terrorists for not being Islamic enough. In the last fifteen months, 2,226 terrorists have accepted the amnesty. The high unemployment tempts many young men to join al Qaeda. The terrorist organization is still considered hip among the young, or at least some of them. On the Internet, al Qaeda is having a hard time, with many Islamic militants openly criticizing the terrorist organization. But every successful operation, especially large bombings, inspire some guys in their teens or twenties to check it out.

In the last two weeks, police have captured bomb making supplies, new recruits and terrorist camps. The police have become familiar with the rural areas al Qaeda is hiding out in, and is making it more difficult for the terrorists to operate.

May 11, 2008: Al Qaeda has been busy recruiting, trying to replace heavy losses. The terrorists have also made their pitch to the Berber minority. Berber nationalism has long been a problem, not Berber religious radicalism. The Berbers, a people related to the ancient Egyptians, were the original occupants of Algeria. Arab armies conquered the country over a thousand years ago, but, unlike other Arab conquests, most Berbers did not adopt Arab language and customs. Today, about a third of Algerians are Berbers, and speak the Berber language, Tamazight. There has always been tension between Berbers and Arabs, and now Berbers are demanding that their language be made one of Algeria's official languages. The Arab dominated government refuses to consider this. So far, Berber violence has been in the form of rowdy demonstrations. But the Berber radicals could escalate to guns and bombs. So far they haven't, but al Qaeda is trying to interest the Berber radicals in a coalition, at least. This pitch isn't going down too well, as al Qaeda is seen as a bunch of losers, especially since their defeat in Iraq. The one thing al Qaeda has to offer is media recognition. Any terrorist action associated with al Qaeda gets more coverage. Since terrorism lives and dies according to how much media attention it gets, this is a persuasive pitch. Still, the Berber radicals have not shown any inclination become another al Qaeda franchise.

May 18, 2008: In the northern town of Beriane, three days of battles between gangs of Arabs and Berbers left two dead, dozens injured and hundreds homeless (because their homes were burned down.) The violence developed as gangs of young unemployed men used ethnic differences as an excuse to raise some hell. The Berbers, a people related to the ancient Egyptians, were the original occupants of Algeria. Arab armies conquered the country over a thousand years ago, but, unlike other Arab conquests, most Berbers did not adopt Arab language and customs. Today, about a third of Algerians are Berbers, and speak the Berber language, Tamazight. There has always been tension between Berbers and Arabs, and now Berbers are demanding that their language be made one of Algeria's official languages. The Arab dominated government refuses to consider this. Until recently, Berber violence had been in the form of rowdy demonstrations.

May 19, 2008: In neighboring Morocco, police arrested eleven men and charged them with plotting to carry out terror attacks in Morocco and Belgium. Islamic terrorism is not very popular in Morocco, because the attacks often kill civilians, so the police get a lot of tips.

May 21, 2008: In the south, Tuareg rebels fought with soldiers across the border in northern Mali, leaving 27 dead. The Tuareg are ethnic cousins of the Berbers to the north, and also don't get along with Arabs, or anyone for that matter. There is also a Tuareg revolt in neighboring Niger. Like the Berbers, the Tuareg are not attracted to Islamic radicalism or al Qaeda, but will provide support, for a price.

Islamic terrorists bring some cash with them from outside the country, but a lot is still obtained via extortion and kidnapping. Last year, for example, about 30 percent of the 375 known kidnappings were related to Islamic terrorism. These yielded at least $19 million in ransom. Extortion also yielded millions, but usually in the form of food and other supplies. Rural people provide this support to the terrorists in order to avoid having a family member kidnapped. Many of the non-terrorist related kidnappings are similar, with non-religious criminals involved. For many rural people, the Islamic terrorists are simply suicidal gangsters. Dangerous, yes, but just another bunch of bandits preying on country folk. Some of the terrorists are simply criminals who got religion, but most are young men motivated by all the media attention Islamic radicalism has gotten. Since the early 1990s, over 200,000 have died from Islamic radical violence. That's in a country with a population of 34 million. There is not much sympathy for Islamic radicals, and recently the courts sentenced 24 captured ones to death. Many more got long prison sentences.

May 25, 2008: Soldiers and police have identified at least half a dozen Islamic terrorist cells, most of them operating outside (a hundred or so kilometers out) the capital. There are plenty of forested mountains to hide in, and villages to obtain supplies from. The terrorists are a tough opponent, as they are willing to die, and are resourceful. They have cash, and can buy explosives, and cooperation from some civilians. Ambushes, particularly those featuring roadside bombs, can lead to small patrols (one vehicle, with up to half a dozen troops) getting wiped out. It's a bit of a war zone out there.

June 4, 2008: Outside the capital, a suicide bomber killed himself, and wounded several other people, near an army base entrance. Another bomb went off in a nearby café, wounding several more people.

In neighboring Mali, the government replaced the senior military leadership, and installed a new crew, with orders to be more successful against Tuareg rebels. The Tuareg and Berbers are remnants of the pre - Moslem people who continue to resist the imposition of Arab culture on region.

June 5, 2008: East of the capital, a roadside bomb killed six soldiers and wounded four more.

June 7, 2008: East of the capital, police ambushed Islamic terrorists, killing one and wounding two.

In Mali, an army offensive near the Algerian border left at least twenty Tuareg rebels dead.

June 8, 2008: In the capital, two bombs went off in a train station, killing thirteen. The target appeared to be a French construction firm that was working on rail facilities and a tunnel.

Counter-terror operations are less important as anger over unemployment and corruption grows. Al Qaeda is seen as a bunch of murderous maniacs, although many Berbers are inclined to shelter the terrorists, as long as the attacks do not kill Berbers. No way of telling how long that arrangement will last. The Berbers want autonomy, as well as some economic relief. In general, Algerians are more inclined to riot and attack the government for practical, economic, reasons. This has nothing to do with religion.

June 9, 2008: Conversion efforts by Protestant Evangelical groups are putting the fear of change into Moslem clerics and government officials. Six converts were recently prosecuted for "unauthorized practice of religion", but only received suspended sentences. Police, however, frequently harass converts. The Evangelicals preach responsibility and self-improvement (among other things), and have been very successful in other poor countries. In the Americas, it's the Roman Catholic church, and many more traditional Protestant denominations, that feel the heat. In Asia, it's a variety of religions. But in Algeria, this "Protestant Reformation" is more ferociously opposed by the political and religious establishment. The new message is that Islam is a failure, and the religion of losers. The Evangelicals don't put it that bluntly, but more Algerians are getting the message.

June 10, 2008: In Spain, police arrested eight Algerians who belonged to an al Qaeda cell that recruited terrorists and raised money for terrorist attacks among the Algerian exile community. Violence was threatened if expatriate Algerians did not contribute, and that made the Islamic militants unpopular with fellow Algerians.

June 14, 2008: Al Qaeda officially took credit for three bombings in the last two weeks. As deadly as the terrorism is, it is not as lethal as another illegal activity: attempts to smuggle people across the Mediterranean to Europe (and a better economic future). Last week it was discovered, when a few survivors were rescued, that a people smuggler boat went down off

Libya, killing at least 150 (including fifty Egyptians, and victims from all over North Africa.) That's ten times the number of those killed during recent Islamic terrorist attacks.

June 17, 2008: Police killed an al Qaeda leader some 50 kilometers east of the capital, and dismantled the terrorist cell he led.

June 20, 2008: The cause of both the Islamic terrorism, and the large number of people dying trying to flee across the water to Europe, is the same: government corruption, and the resulting economic stagnation. In Algeria, the government pays more attention to prosecuting Christians, than in going after corrupt and inept government officials.

June 21, 2008: Police raided a terrorist safe house 110 kilometers east of the capital, killing one terrorist and seizing weapons and documents.

France has agreed to help Algeria develop nuclear power, and entered into a military cooperation agreement meant to help curb Islamic terrorism. This is particularly important since there are now over 300 French firms with investments in Algeria. Trade between the two nations now stands at nearly $12 billion a year.

June 24, 2008: The UN head of security resigned, in the wake of revelations that Algerian security officials had warned of possible terrorist attacks, before UN facilities were attacked last December.

June 27, 2008: Some 30 Islamic terrorists ambushed a police patrol 350 kilometers east of the capital. Four policemen were killed.

June 28, 2008: Six more policemen died as security forces pursued a group of 30 Islamic terrorists along the coast, some 350 kilometers east of the capital. The terrorist have split into three smaller groups, but are still being tracked and pursued.

July 1, 2008: Spain has arrested several dozen al Qaeda members, who were raising money, and recruiting men for terrorist attacks. Some of those volunteers were for operations in Morocco and Algeria, where it has proved difficult to recruit locals (who are fed up with all the terrorism) for this.

A decade ago, the GSPC was killing up to a hundred people a day, but now, it takes up to a year to cause that much mayhem. An essential element in the survival of Islamic terrorism in Algeria is money, and volunteers (especially for the suicide bombing jobs) from Europe. There, Moslem expatriates love to cheer the terrorists on, mostly with cash contributions. The corrupt and despotic governments of most Moslem countries has created a migrant community in Europe that can hate their former rulers openly. The migrants don't much care that innocent civilians back home are the most common victims of the terrorism. Hatred, and a desire for revenge, is a powerful thing that the terrorists exploit as much as they can.

July 3, 2008: The old GSPC terrorists manage to survive, even though it reflagged itself as an al Qaeda franchise last year. There was a momentary increase in bombings, and a decrease in the traditional massacre of civilians with knives and guns. Apparently, al Qaeda convinced the GSPC terrorists that they would anger fewer Algerians if they blew people up, rather than slitting their throats. This has not worked out as planned, and the Islamic terrorists still spend most of their time on the run.

July 15, 2008: The war against Islamic terrorism continues to go against the terrorists. In Morocco, police made numerous arrests and interrupted a plot to attack tourist hotels this Summer. So far this year, Moroccan police have shut down four terrorist cells. Police believe there are about 3,000 Islamic extremists in the country, who are liable to cross the line into carrying out terrorist acts.

In Algeria, counter-terrorist operations east of the capital left al Qaeda al Tuhami dead. There are several terrorist cells hiding out in the hilly forests along the coast. The army and police have increased their searches, and paid more attention to developing local informants. Cell phones make such informants much more useful.

Algeria, and the other North African nations, have increased their counter-terror cooperation with European intelligence agencies. This is because many Algerian Islamic radicals (along with those from other North African nations) have sought refuge in Europe (legally, or illegally). These terrorists are often willing to carry out attacks wherever they are, although most would rather do so back home. But with the intelligence people in Europe and the North African nations cooperating, the Islamic radicals are more frequently getting caught, or at least kept under observation until they become very dangerous. Most Islamic radicals are more talk than action, and it's becoming a big deal trying to develop methods to predict which wannabes are most likely to cross the line into mass murder.

July 17, 2008: The U.S. has frozen the assets of four Algerian al Qaeda leaders (Salah Gasmi, Yahia Djouadi, Ahmed Deghdegh, and Abid Hammadou). This is part of an American program to interfere with terrorist financing any way they can. In the past, al Qaeda leaders were often able to freely use the international banking system, which made it easier to finance terrorist operations.

July 19, 2008: In Mali, Tuareg rebels attacked a police station and kidnapped three policemen. The Tuareg rebels already hold 92 policemen prisoner. These hostages prevent the government from attacking Tuareg villages, or in getting too violent in going after Tuareg rebels.

July 21, 2008: Mali, and its Tuareg tribal rebels, have agreed to a ceasefire. The Tuareg and Berbers (a similar people who are a large minority in Algeria) are remnants of the pre-Moslem people who continue to resist the imposition of Arab culture on region.

July 27, 2008: On the outskirts of the capital, an Islamic suicide bomber on a motorbike attacked an army convoy. He managed to kill himself, and wounded 13 soldiers. Another bomb was found nearby, and defused.

July 29, 2008: In two separatist incidents, two terrorists and a soldier were killed.

There is still a pushing and shoving contest between the government (mainly the families of the old revolutionaries, and their henchmen) and the majority of Algerians. For those in their twenties, unemployment is over fifty percent, and there's a growing anger that will be expressed one way or another. Probably with some kind of violence. The new aristocracy does not want to give up their wealth and power. Some in the government are urging massive and rapid reforms, but they are not getting a lot of cooperation from their fellow bureaucrats. The future looks bleak, bloody and violent.

July 31, 2008: Algeria's biggest problem is not Islamic terrorism, but decades of socialism. Like many post World War II Arab countries, Algeria believed the Soviet propaganda that "socialist economics," as practiced in Russia, brought quick prosperity. It didn't, and the state control over so much of the economy created economic stagnation, poverty and unemployment. When television showed up in the 60s and 70s, and people could see for themselves how much more affluent people were in market economies (Europe and the United States), opposition to socialism arose. But the old revolutionaries (who led the fight against French colonialism in the 1950s and 60s) liked things just the way they were. That's because the Soviet version of socialism was remarkably similar to how Algeria had been ruled for centuries before the French showed up in the 1830s. Back then, the nation was ruled by an aristocracy that controlled the economy as well. Very convenient, at least for the minority in charge. Over the last few decades, most Algerians have figured this out, and realized that they have been screwed. They want justice, and jobs. The Islamic radicals promised to make things right via a religious dictatorship. That turned into a bloodbath, and was eventually rejected.

August 3, 2008: An Islamic terrorist car bomb went off 150 kilometers east of the capital, wounding 25 people, including four policemen.

August 9, 2008: Police and army patrols in eastern Algeria have been chasing down al Qaeda gangs known to be hiding out in the coastal hills. Last night, an army ambush killed 12 terrorists.

August 10, 2008: Apparently in revenge for yesterday's army ambush, a suicide car bomb attacked a nearby military compound, killing six and wounding 18. Another attack, 100 kilometers east of the capital, killed three policemen.

August 12, 2008: The war between the security forces and al Qaeda has become personal, with troops tracking known terrorist cells over long periods. There are only a few hundred Islamic terrorists still at large, but they are able to find hideouts in the rural hill country of eastern Algeria. The terrorists have rebuilt their support network, and police have caught money and weapons being smuggled in. There are still plenty of angry, unemployed, young men willing to join. But the new (rebranded as al Qaeda) organization is keeping the actual number of operators small. The terrorists are now able to carry out four or more attacks a month. This is not going to win them control of the country, but it does keep them in the news. The terrorists are also trying to avoid hurting civilians. This is very difficult to do, and civilians continue to suffer from terrorist operations. Al Qaeda in Algeria is more efficient, but no more likely to succeed.

August 13, 2008: In the south, an oil engineer and two assistants, were released after having been kidnapped the day before by tribesmen. This was a typical tribal operation. The tribesmen were trying to get the government to release several of their kinsmen, who were in jail because of violence (a tribal feud over real estate). When the police jail tribesmen, the prisoners friends and families look for some stranger to kidnap, and trade for their imprisoned brethren.

Down south, in Mauritania, a feud between the politicians and the generals resulted in a coup last week. The military was seen as in the wrong here, and neighboring countries, as well as most foreign ones, and the UN, jumped all over the generals. Sensing they were in trouble, the generals promised new elections soon, and a return to politics. Meanwhile, the local Islamic terrorists rejoiced, as this political drama shut down much of the counter-terrorism effort.

August 14, 2008: The Austrian government continues to negotiate with al Qaeda for the release of two Austrians snatched by Islamic terrorists in Tunisia. The kidnappers had demanded $8 million, plus several Islamic terrorists freed from jail. The government negotiators had haggled the terrorists down to a $5 million ransom. Everyone thought a deal had been made, but then one terrorist faction insisted that there be a political sweetener, like the release of some al Qaeda members being held in jail. The Austrian government has no control over that, and has been told by North African governments that no one is getting out of jail as part of a deal to ransom European tourists. The two captives are believed held in Mali. This will be a big payday for the regional al Qaeda groups, and will pay for a lot more attacks.

August 15, 2008: Terrorist violence has increased in the last week, causing about a hundred casualties. Most alarming was that five of the terrorist operations were suicide bomb attacks, with most of the remainder being roadside bombs.

August 18, 2008: In Mali, Tuareg tribal rebels released 21 soldiers, as a sign of good faith. Last month, the rebels agreed to a ceasefire with the government, and negotiations to settle differences. The Tuareg and Berbers (a similar people who are a large minority in Algeria) are remnants of the pre-Moslem people who continue to resist the imposition of Arab culture on the region.

August 21, 2008: Suicide bombers hit a police school on the outskirts of the capital, killing over 40 and wounding about as many.

Al Qaeda's major problem is not organizing terror attacks, but repairing their image with the Algerian people. While the corrupt and inefficient government (basically a dictatorship controlled by the families of the men who led the fight, half a century ago, to free Algeria from French control) is widely hated, the Islamic terrorists are even more despised. The spreading use of cell phones had made it more difficult for the terrorists to operate, but they have adapted. What the terrorists have not been able to do is make themselves any more popular with the people, in whose name, they are doing all this killing. Although al Qaeda says it has learned its lesson from Iraq (don't kill so many civilians), the current attacks are still mainly killing civilians. And the soldiers and policemen killed have families too. The Islamic terrorists are not doing a lot of damage to the government, but they are increasing the number of locals who want al Qaeda dead and gone. This does not bode well for al Qaeda's long terms success in Algeria.

August 22, 2008: Islamic terrorists have killed or wounded some 600 people in the last 18 months. The attacks come in bunches, as a terrorist cell jells and starts carrying out operations that often take weeks or months to plan. The pattern is for the police to collect evidence from the attacks, identify the terrorist cell, wipe it out, and wait for the next one to get organized.

August 24, 2008: Troops killed ten terrorists 250 kilometers west of the capital, capturing. Assault rifles and RPGs were captured.

August 27, 2008: In the last few days, terrorists set off two roadside bombs. In the same period, six terrorist suspects were killed. One bomb went off prematurely, killing the terrorist who was on his way to emplacing it. Another was placed near a road, but exploded before the police patrol vehicles were close enough to be damaged. This is consistent with what the police know of the terrorists: that there are only a few dozen experienced ones, with the rest being rather recent recruits. These newbies get most of their training from documents downloaded from the Internet. This is a dangerous way to learn, as recent incidents indicate.

August 29, 2008: Moroccan police arrested fifteen al Qaeda terrorists, who were in the midst of planning and preparing a series of attacks. In the last five years, Morocco has prevented nearly all Islamic terrorist violence by using an informant network, and a cooperative population, to identify Islamic terrorists before they can act. Thousands of suspects have been arrested and questioned, and about ten percent are still in jail.

Talks in Algeria, between the Mali government and Tuareg rebels, has ironed out a peace deal, which includes establishing a special army unit including soldiers and ex-Tuareg rebels, to police the truce.

August 31, 2008: In the last week, Al Qaeda has killed seven soldiers and police, and one prison guard, in a number of incidents. In one case, soldiers came upon a fake police check point, run by al Qaeda disguised as police. Cars were being stopped and robbed, as a way to raise money for the cause. Another method is to raid illegal bars. While alcohol is legal in Algeria, it is highly regulated, and forbidden by the Koran. Being strict Moslems, al Qaeda has at least one cell that specializes in raiding these illegal bars and taking all the cash they can find. In one recent raid, they found one of the customers was a prison guard, and beheaded him on the spot. All this causes the government to categorize al Qaeda as a bandit problem, as a large criminal gang with a political and religious agenda.

The government believes that there are only about 500 active al Qaeda members in Algeria. The attacks are occurring mainly in rural and suburban areas. The terrorists are being very careful in establishing remote bases, communicating carefully and planning and carrying out attacks meticulously. The terrorists do not have much support among the people, and are not strong enough to bring down the government. But at the same time, the corrupt and inefficient government has not been able to do much to bring down the unemployment rate (near 20 percent, and much higher for men aged 18-30). This makes it easier for al Qaeda, and criminal gangs in general, to recruit.

September 1, 2008: Al Qaeda's terror campaign in Algeria reflects lessons learned in Iraq. A real effort is made to avoid civilian deaths. Attacks are concentrated on military and police and foreigners (al Qaeda does not want foreign investment to improve the economy). The overall death rate is much lower now. During the 1992-2005 war, Algerian Islamic terrorists killed, on average, over 10,000 people a year (most of them civilians). That's more than ten times the number al Qaeda is now killing in Algeria. But the relative lack of civilian dead enables the new generation of Algerian terrorists to publicize their actions more energetically.

September 8, 2008: Police arrested four people belonging to a terrorist cell in southern Algeria. Wiretaps of known terrorist sympathizers led to the discovery of this group, which was building a bomb and planned using the widow of an Islamic terrorist to wear and detonate the bomb.

September 9, 2008: An al Qaeda member, unhappy with the number of civilian casualties from bombing attacks, went to the police and provided information on his cell, and prevented 4-5 terrorist attacks in western Algeria. The defector also reported on how the terrorists have been using kidnapping (for ransom) to finance their operations.

September 10, 2008: In the south, an Algerian brokered peace deal between the Mali government and Tuareg rebels has worked. Both sides have released prisoners and are halting armed operations.

September 11, 2008: Based on tips, police prevented several terror attacks in eastern Algeria.

September 13, 2008: The military budget will go up ten percent next year. In addition, an amount greater than the defense budget will be spent to create manufacturing organizations that will supply the army with equipment and weapons. This is an economic development program, not, strictly speaking, a military one (since the gear could be imported more cheaply.)

September 15, 2008: In neighboring Mauritania, twelve soldiers were killed in an ambush by al Qaeda terrorists near the Algerian border. Hundreds of Algerian terrorists fled to southern Algeria in the past few years, and many operate on both sides of the borders there. This is desolate country, with lots of deserts and mountains.

September 16, 2008: Last month's terror attacks killed over a hundred people, while this month there has been nothing so far. The police and army response to the August attacks was energetic, and the public disapproval of the large number of civilians killed in the attacks increased the number of tips phoned in. Al Qaeda is aware of the need to avoid civilian casualties, but this is difficult to do as the police and soldiers often operate among civilians. When the security forces are out in the country, any approaching terrorists stand out and are usually shot before they can attack. Roadside bombs and ambushes are also difficult to carry out. But the combination of civilian casualties, from over a decade of Islamic terrorist violence, and the growing availability of cell phones, has made the terrorists more vulnerable to detection and attack by the police. There are not that many terrorist cells operating, and each time they carry out attacks , they increase the chance that someone will see and report them to the police.

September 18, 2008: Police arrested fourteen suspected terrorists, and broke up a plot to bomb the presidential palace. Throughout the country, the police have become more alert to terrorist operations, motivated by the bombings over the Summer. In the south, troops on the Mauritanian border have been warned by Mauritania that Islamic terrorists, who killed twelve soldiers three days earlier, may try to cross the border.

September 23, 2008: Al Qaeda's North Africa leader (Abu Musab Abdul Wadud), released a 29 minute long video, where he took responsibility for a recent attack in Mauritania and all the bombings over the last few months in Algeria. Wadud called for the people to rise up and overthrow the governments of North Africa. Even though many North Africans would like to do this, they are not a majority and they are faced with police state situations which make rebellion very difficult. Moreover, al Qaeda is supported by an even smaller proportion of the population. While this provides al Qaeda with millions of Algerian supporters, it's the millions of anti-terrorist Algerians with cell phones that pose the biggest threat to al Qaeda. The cell phone has become a major obstacle for Islamic terrorists (who tend to antagonize many people with their seemingly indiscriminate bombings.)

September 25, 2008: The government is locked in a dispute with the U.S. over anti-Christian activities in Algeria. Moslems consider it their right, and duty, to convert others, but deem it illegal for anyone to try and convert them. This has long been a source of friction between Moslems and non-Moslems. The government has sided with Islamic clerics and pressure groups that oppose Christian missionaries and any activity that might induce Moslems to convert. Some Moslems are very touchy, often violent about conversions to other religions. The government goes along with this violence in order to maintain the support of moderate clerics, and avoid al Qaeda accusations of being a "puppet of the West." That means Islamic militants can get away with murder, and lesser crimes, when it comes to local Christians and any Moslems who have, or might be considering, converting. Increasingly, Moslems are considering converting, seeing Islam as the religion of failure.

September 27, 2008: Islamic terrorists manning a fake checkpoint 120 kilometers east of the capital, killed two security guards.

September 28, 2008: A police search for Islamic rebels resulted in a gun battle 600 kilometers east of the capital, and the death of three terrorist suspects. There was a suicide bombing 100 kilometers east of the capital, killing three and wounding six.

The drop in violence has been accompanied by continued economic growth (5.8 percent this year.)

October 8, 2008: There was a sharp drop in violence last month, with only one suicide bomb attack, and less than a third the terror related deaths as in August. The army and police response to the August violence apparently succeeded in capturing or killing the most active terrorist cells. For the moment, anyway. But al Qaeda is determined to revive the large scale terror campaign Islamic militants had going in Algeria a decade ago. Nearly all Algerians, however, are hostile to that idea, and have been quick to report suspected terrorist activity. This has forced the terrorists to hide out in rural areas, especially in areas where there is no cell phone coverage. As in so many other countries, the proliferation of cell phone use has proved disastrous for the terrorists. In the last eight years, the number of cell phone users in Algeria has gone from 54,000 to over 25 million. That means over 75 percent of the adult population has a cell phone, and you can get a signal in many rural areas, as well as nearly all urban ones. As was the case in Iraq, once a cell phone using population turns against the terrorists, the timely reports to police greatly increase, making it much more difficult for terrorists to move around undetected. Meanwhile, the terrorists' favorite communications tool, the Internet, is not as widely established, with only four million users in Algeria.

October 10, 2008: Eight more Algerian migrants were arrested in Spain and charged with terrorism. The eight were recruiting terrorists and raising money to support terrorist efforts. This is what often happens when Islamic terrorists flee Algeria for sanctuary in Europe. But the counter-terror effort in Europe is becoming more alert to this threat, and watching the Arab migrants more carefully. Spain and Italy are most frequently the destination of illegal migration from Algeria, and police and diplomatic officials from all three countries are coordinating their efforts to deal with the problem.

October 11, 2008: In the west, four Islamic terrorists were cornered and killed. Four assault rifles and documents were recovered.

October 18, 2008: Two Islamic terrorists were killed in a police operation east of the capital. The terrorists were discovered due to a tip from civilians.

October 21, 2008: Warships from France, Italy, Portugal, Spain, Malta, Algeria, Morocco, Libya and Tunisia are holding training exercises off the coast of Algeria. These nations also cooperate in counter-terror operations and trying to control the illegal migration from North Africa to Europe. While most of these migrants are simply looking for jobs, several percent are Islamic radicals, either fleeing the police, or seeking to work with the Islamic terrorists already established in Europe. In North Africa, the Islamic radicals are on the defensive, despite widespread dissatisfaction with the tyrannical and inefficient governments that control most of the region. The terrorists' problem is that Islamic radicalism has an even worse reputation. Al Qaeda has tried to cope with this reputation problem, and expand its network of radicals, but it has not been able to get beyond a radical fringe, which are more feared than supported by the general population. But that fear does not turn into control, because too many of the people have cell phones, and no fear of using them to call the cops when Islamic terrorists are seen.

October 31, 2008: Two Austrians, held captive by al Qaeda in neighboring Mali for eight months, have been freed. The terrorists first demanded the release of al Qaeda members held prisoner in the region. When that was refused, they demanded up to $10 in ransom. That demand has apparently been negotiated down. The Austrian government insisted that it did not pay a ransom, and obtained the release of the couple via the efforts of the Mali government.

November 4, 2008: Police have shut down, for the moment, the Islamic terrorists, but not the conditions that created them. The government has made no progress in dealing with its corruption and inefficiency. The current president, nearing the end of his second term, wants to change the constitution so that he can keep running for election. The two term restriction was one of the few popular reforms, as it prevented a corrupt politician from becoming a "democratic" president-for-life via rigged elections. The public is responding to this by again backing religious conservatives. Radical clerics are increasingly demanding that Algerian Moslems take extreme actions "in defense of Islam." The 100,000 Algerian Christians are being persecuted with increasing vigor, and even threatened with death (if they converted from Islam). Moslems that do not practice Islam vigorously enough are persecuted, and sometimes killed. The government has fought back, closing 42 radical Mosques last year, and banned 53 radical imams from preaching. Like many Moslem countries, the government pays for the maintenance of mosques, and their imams. Although there are no examples of an Islamic dictatorship bringing honest and efficient government, Algerians are desperate for a solution to their decades of corrupt and inept government. Despite over a decade of Islamic terrorism, that left over 200,000 dead, and only ended in the last few years, an increasing number of Algerians are still willing to elect Islamic conservatives who promise clean government, and strict enforcement of Islamic lifestyle rules. About a third of the population (mainly in the cities) is very much against this, thus setting up the atmosphere for another civil war.

November 6, 2008: The mayor of a town 260 kilometers east of the capital, was kidnapped, and later murdered, by Islamic terrorists. By attacking local officials, the terrorists encourage less cooperation with the police and army searching for terrorist camps and supporters.

November 7, 2008: The trial of 24 Islamic terrorists, who carried out an attack this past January, sentenced twelve (who had been identified but not arrested) to death, nine to prison (for between 1.5-20 years) and three were acquitted. So far this year, over 220 have been condemned to death in absentia (while not present). This indicates that many of the worst terrorists are known, but not getting caught.

November 12, 2008: Parliament lifted the ban on the president only being able to serve two terms. The opposition decried this as making it possible for politicians to become "president-for-life." Seven other African countries have made this change in the past decade. This is not as important as it might appear. Countries with parties that have entrenched themselves in power (as is the case in Algeria), have no problem with selecting (for "election") a new guy to serve one or two terms. Even a president -for-life has to watch his back, and there is usually a committee of senior officials that have to be placated. The basic problem in these situations is the government making it difficult, or impossible, for opposition parties to operate. It's basically a dictatorship of one group. In the case of Algeria, it's the descendents of the rebels who led the fighting against the French colonial government in the 1950s and 60s.

November 18, 2008: The highest appeals court confirmed the conviction of three construction workers, who police arrested for smoking during Ramadan (the month, late in each year, when all Moslems are supposed to abstain from drinking, eating, sex, smoking and such during the daylight hours.) The judges reduced the sentence from three years to two months (which was how long the three have been in jail, thus freeing them.) In some Moslem countries, laws are passed making it a crime to violate any of the many rules good Moslems are supposed to follow. Algeria passed such a law, in 2001, making it illegal to "offend" Islam. This was kind of vague, and passed to placate Islamic conservatives who had turned on Islamic radicals, and wanted some payback. Since then, the Islamic conservatives (about half the population, to one degree or another) have used the law to arrest Christians, Moslems who have converted to Christianity, and some Moslems who are, according to hard line clerics, "offending Islam."

While the terrorists are mostly hiding out in the hills east of the capital, the rest of the country is booming. This is happening despite the corruption, which means any successful business can expect a visit from corrupt officials looking to get paid. This discourages Western companies but not Arabs or Russians, who are accustomed to operating in an atmosphere of corruption. Wealthy Persian Gulf Arabs are investing in Algeria. Again, despite the terrorist activity, most of the country is quiet and safe, and has become a hot new tourist destination.

Four years ago, the government defeated the Islamic radical movement, which had lost a ten year terror campaign, leaving 200,000 dead in the process. The radicals wanted to establish a religious dictatorship in Algeria. The surviving terrorists fled to the coastal hills east of the capital, the Sahara desert far to the south, Europe and Iraq. Those who went to Iraq tended to get killed quickly. Those who went to Europe got on welfare and either retired from terrorism, or continued to plan new attacks (and get caught and jailed for it). Those who fled to the hills and desert turned to banditry (robbery, extortion and kidnapping) to survive. Two years ago, these Islamic radicals declared that they had merged with al Qaeda. This was largely cosmetic, as al Qaeda was taking a beating in Iraq, and elsewhere around the world. There was a brief revival of terror attacks in Algeria, but that has since been declining. Meanwhile, the tyranny and economic mismanagement throughout the Islamic world continues to produce young men willing to kill for change.

November 22, 2008: Islamic terrorist activity is down nearly 50 percent compared to last year. About two-thirds of the terrorist activity, and apparently the terrorist camps, are in an area stretching several hundred kilometers east of the capital, along the coast and about a hundred kilometers into the interior. This area contains coastal mountains and forests to hide in.

December 2, 2008: Soldiers killed four Islamic terrorists on a road 140 kilometers east of the capital. Every week, there is some incident in this region, where a hundred or more Islamic terrorists are believed to be hiding. The terrorists rob and steal, and are increasingly getting caught by the security forces, or even armed civilians. As a result of that, the Islamic terrorists often travel in groups of four or more, along with a few weapons. Just in case. This makes them easier to spot, and catch, when they are travelling. Despite the success, the police know that these terrorists are still planning attacks, and will eventually carry them out if not caught first.

Peace has brought with it despair, as Algerians realize that their government is basically a corrupt military dictatorship that uses the national oil wealth to buy enough votes to get elected again and again. So more Algerians are fleeing. As Morocco and Libya have cracked down on illegal migration (by boat) to Europe, Algeria, and its long coastline, has become the source of most illegal migration from Africa to Europe (perhaps as many as 100,000 people a year). And most of those migrants appear to be Algerian. It's not just the corruption and unemployment. The collapse in oil prices (which have fallen over 60 percent this year) means a lot less money for Algeria, and even less economic opportunity. A recent opinion poll found half of all Algerian males aged 15-34 wanted to get out of the country, permanently.

December 9, 2008: Last month, Islamic terrorist violence left eight dead. In October, the death toll was 13 and 31 in the month before that. There aren't many Islamic radicals left in Algeria, and many of those are fleeing to Europe, or south into the desert and across the southern borders into Black Africa. Despite the large amount of uninhabited mountains and forests along the eastern coast, the police and army have been operating there for so long that it's difficult to stay hidden. Too many civilians are hostile to Islamic radicalism, and will phone in a tip. Algeria has become a very dangerous place for Islamic terrorists.

December 12, 2008: In a town near the Moroccan border, police cornered and killed two al Qaeda members. Six hours of negotiations failed to get the two to surrender.

December 20, 2008: Just across the border, a Tuareg rebels, working for a drug gang, attacked a small army base, killing nine soldiers, and losing eleven of their own. The Tuareg rebels sustain themselves by smuggling cheap gasoline out of Algeria, and drugs (locally produced hashish or Colombian cocaine) in (for local consumption or shipment on to Europe.) There is similar smuggling with all of Algeria’s neighbors, and Islamic terrorists are often involved. The terrorists need money, and moving drugs across the border is a quick way to raise cash.

January 6, 2009: A hundred kilometers east of the capital, police ambushed three terrorists and killed them. The dead were found to have suicide bombs in their vehicle, along with assault rifles and ammunition. The three terrorists were being tracked as they moved towards the capital, where their targets apparently were.

While the Islamic terrorists were less of a problem last year, the main cause of the Islamic movement remained. Only about a third of young men (late teens to 30) have work. Corruption in the government, and throughout the commercial sector, is rife. A recent poll found that half of these young men wanted to immigrate to Europe. So it should not be surprising that some of them still want to take up arms, in the name of Islam (and getting a job) to overthrow the government.

January 8, 2009: In the last year, fifteen al Qaeda leaders were killed or captured. The government praised the security forces, and promised continued improvements in pay and living conditions for the police and army units specializing in counter-terror operations.

January 9, 2009: A Moroccan Islamic terrorist, Hicham Alamis, who was among nine terrorists that escaped from prison last April, was recaptured in Algeria and returned to Morocco.

January 10, 2009: In the capital, unauthorized demonstrations by over 30,000 people in support of Hamas terrorism against Israel (and against the Israeli response) turned into anti-government riots. Over 60 people were injured (most of them civilians), in addition to hundreds of arrested. Most of the demonstrators were unemployed young men. In Algeria, most young men are unemployed, and have been for some time.

January 16, 2009: About 150 kilometers west of the capital, ten Islamic terrorists set up a roadblock on the coastal highway. They sought to identify and kill government employees, but only ended up encountering and killing a customs officer.

January 22, 2009: Just across the border in Mali, 31 Tuareg rebels were hunted down and killed by soldiers and police. The rebels had recently been working for a drug gang, and attacking army and police units. The rebels have also worked with Algerian Islamic terrorists, usually for pay, or favors.

Back in the real world, the Islamic terrorists continue to disappear (desertions, and men accepting amnesty, rather than Bubonic plague) and there has not been much terrorist activity (that affects the public) at all. Security forces continue to search for the few hundred men believed to still be active Islamic terrorists.

January 23, 2009: The terrorism rumor of the week concerns a dead body that was (so the unconfirmed story goes) found next to a road in rural Algeria. The man had died of Bubonic plague (a disease that has been endemic to rural North Africa for centuries, just as it is to parts of the American southwest and most of Africa and Asia). This led to reports from "unidentified American intelligence officials" that the dead guy was the victim of al Qaeda biological warfare experiments at a camp back in the forested hills of coastal Algeria. The most popular rumor had it that at least 40 al Qaeda died, and intercepted communications indicated local commanders were asking al Qaeda Supreme Headquarters in Pakistan for instructions on how to proceed. This story was first reported by a British Tabloid on the 19th, with no verifiable sources. It has since spread, with many other reporters adding embellishments. Plague is a bacterial infection, easily treated with antibiotics. There is no known cure for media events like this.

January 24, 2009: Across the border in Mali, the Tuareg rebels are offering to negotiate a peace deal, after soldiers killed 31 rebels earlier in the month.

January 29, 2009: The CIA has removed its station chief in Algeria, Andrew Warren, after he was accused of drugging and raping two women. Warren, a convert to Islam, is one of the more successful CIA counter-terror operatives, because he speaks Arabic and mixes it up with local Moslems in mosques and has a remarkable ability to keep track of local Islamic politics. The charges are a bit murky, and there is suspicion this is a ploy to keep Warren from finding out too much about scandalous behavior by Algerian officials.

January 30, 2009: In central Algeria, 600 kilometers south of the capital, a dispute between Berbers and Arabs outside a mosque left nearly 30 people injured, and many more arrested. The Berbers are less tolerant of government corruption and incompetence, and often come to blows with the majority Arabs over that, and other cultural issues.

January 31, 2009: Ali Ben Touati, a senior member of al Qaeda in North Africa, surrendered and accepted amnesty. Touati was induced to give up by some of his contemporaries, who have done so already. Islamic radicalism is now seen as another failed ideology, just like the previous radical socialism (which the elderly revolutionaries running the government still cling to). But some younger Algerians still want to give terrorist violence a chance, if only because there isn't much else to do.

February 9, 2009: Russia has agreed to take back 24 MiG-29 fighters Algeria bought for about $28 million each. There were complaints of poor quality, and Russia really couldn't fight that charge. For over two months, all of Russia's MiG-29s have been grounded over safety issues.

The government is making nice with Cuba, another dictatorship run by elderly leftist revolutionaries who have run their country into the ground economically, and refused to take responsibility for it.

February 10, 2009: Islamic violence remains present, but low. Last month, 15 died (two civilians and 13 terrorists), while in December 16 died. Police and troops continue to sweep the hilly forests along the coast, where Islamic terrorists hide out and plan attacks. Just staying hidden and alive takes most of the terrorists' time, and months go by with no successful attacks. Some of the dead or captured terrorists have explosives, even explosive vests (for suicide bombings), and showing that the murderous efforts continue.

February 11, 2009: Across the southern border in Mali, the government has completed a campaign against Tuareg rebels, arresting 22 and seizing large quantities of weapons. The rebel leadership has agreed to make peace, and cease dealing with criminal gangs and Islamic terrorists.

February 12, 2009: Two bombs went off in the east, killing eight people. The second bomb was set up near the first, and timed to go off once rescue workers came to help the victims of the first. All the dead and wounded were civilians.

February 15, 2009: Police tracked down and killed Mourad Bouzid, a 65 year old al Qaeda leader, in a town 53 kilometers east of the capital. Meanwhile, in two attacks, Islamic terrorists killed seven soldiers.

February 17, 2009: In Mali, 578 Tuareg tribal rebels surrendered their weapons in a government ceremony. These tribesmen belonged to a faction that refused to accept the 2007 peace deal between the government and the Tuareg tribes.

February 18, 2009: Al Qaeda announced that they had six Europeans who had been kidnapped in the Sahara desert over the past two months. At first, it was suspected that bandits, eager for a large ransom, had done the deed. It may well have been bandits, who often sell their captives to other groups, including terrorists, rather than risk negotiating for ransom (and getting caught or killed by security forces.). Al Qaeda has not said what they want, but it's usually the release of jailed terrorists.

February 23, 2009: Islamic terrorists attacked and killed nine security guards (who provided security for factories).

February 26, 2009: President Abdelaziz Bouteflika will seek a third five year term. The 71 year old Bouteflika heads what amounts to a military dictatorship, which is led by men who participated in the rebellion against the French colonial government half a century ago. The old revolutionaries maintain power, even with elections, by using government power to cripple opposition parties. When that didn't work in 1992, and Islamic parties won control of the government, the military staged a coup, which triggered fifteen years of Islamic terrorism in response. Although the Islamic terrorists were defeated, they were not destroyed, and a few hundred terrorists and supporters keep the killing going, if just barely. Security forces have killed 40 Islamic terrorists in the last seven months, most of them along the coast, east of the capital, but there are still at least a hundred Islamic terrorists active and carrying out attacks. While the government has the edge, as long as the nation is run by an unpopular dictatorship, there will continue to be unrest.

February 28, 2009: The government refused to allow France or Britain to use Algerian air space in the south, to search for six Westerners (including a Canadian diplomat) kidnapped by al Qaeda. Algeria claimed that allowing Western aircraft and commandos into Algeria would be an insult to national sovereignty. The Algerians are apparently looking for a suitable bribe to look the other way and allow the search.

President Abdelaziz Bouteflika declared that over half a billion dollars in agricultural loans would be forgiven. Farmers and livestock operators need the loans to finance crops and herds, especially after a year of bad harvests. Forgiving years of these loans will be very popular among rural voters, who go to the polls next month to elect, or re-elect, the president and other officials. The official reason for forgiving the loans was to boost agricultural production, and this is expected to happen as well. However, Bouteflika recently persuaded (and, apparently, bribed or threatened where necessary) parliament to eliminate the two terms restriction for presidents. First elected in 1999, Bouteflika wants a third term. Bouteflika represents the "rebels" (the men who fought the French colonial government half a century ago) who have ruled the country since independence in the 1960s. The "rebels" (and their extended families) are the establishment now. They have the power, and the oil income, and they don't want to give it up. Most Algerians want all the rebels gone.

The Islamic terrorists are trying to use suicide bombings to trigger a widespread uprising. To that end, the rebels establish bases near the capital and stage attacks from there. The police recently located and raided a rebel base fifty kilometers south of the city. There were several dozen Islamic terrorists operating out of that location, planning attacks in the capital. Most of the rebels were killed, captured or scattered. The rebel camps are often found when police capture rebels out foraging for food or other supplies. Interrogation eventually reveals the location of the camp, and a raid follows. The rebels try to move the camps regularly, but this also exposes the rebels to exposure. Local civilians in rural areas are not all fans of the Islamic rebels, and lots of the country folks now have cell phones. But the Islamic terrorists still have lots of supporters. With so much unemployment (over a third of men 18-30 are out of work), there are plenty of recruits, so many that the terrorists can be selective. There's not much money, with Persian Gulf governments finally cracking down on the wealthy patrons of Islamic radical causes. So the Algerian terrorists have to live off criminal activity and donations from locals. If there were more money, the Islamic radical groups could maintain a larger force. If the current dictatorship were overthrown and replaced by an honest government, the Islamic radicals would suffer a major blow at the grassroots level. But such a development is highly unlikely.

March 12, 2009: The government keeps pounding the Islamic radicals, but can't seem to destroy them completely. In the last six months, 120 Islamic terrorists were killed, 22 surrendered and 322 were arrested. Over 150 weapons were seized, along with bombs and bomb making materials. In the last four years, about 2,000 Islamic radicals have accepted the amnesty program. But nearly as many have been killed, captured or fled the country. Most of the current action is east of the capital, in the forests of the coastal mountains. There are apparently only a few hundred Islamic radicals still active, most of them in the coastal mountains, with a few dozen in the south and as many in the capital. There are 160,000 security personnel in the country, a force that is being expanded to 200,000 this year. The police force not only keeps the pressure on the Islamic radicals, but keeps the lid on a restive population, unhappy with decades of corrupt and inept government. The elderly anti-French rebels are apparently going to succeed in buying yet another election next month. But it gets more difficult each time.

March 13, 2009: Two Islamic terrorists were killed in the eastern mountains.

March 14, 2009: On the Tunisian border, Islamic terrorists killed a shepherd and several hundred sheep. Two bombs then killed three members of the shepherd's family. Elsewhere in the area, a policeman was killed by a terrorist attack.

March 15, 2009: Last month, mine clearing efforts destroyed 8,000 French mines planted on the Moroccan and Tunisian borders. Last year, France provided the maps of where mines were planted after World War II (as part of the campaign to defeat anti-colonial forces). So far, 372,000 mines have been removed from remote areas along the border.

March 16, 2009: Two roadside bombs killed two soldiers a hundred kilometers east of the capital. Another bomb killed two civilians 540 kilometers southeast of the capital.

March 20, 2009: Police and soldiers responding to recent attacks in the east, found and killed seven terrorists.

March 24, 2009: East of the capital, Islamic terrorists attacked a police station, killing one policeman before being driven off. In another attack nearby, a policeman was killed.

March 27, 2009: With the presidential elections approaching on April 9th, there has been a sharp increase in terrorist violence, with nearly 40 dead in the last two weeks. The few hundred Islamic radicals still fighting the government, are trying to maintain themselves in the thinly populated, hilly forests along the coast, east of the capital. There, they attempt to terrorize the local civilians into silence, and extort material support and information about what the security forces are up to. So far, the Islamic terrorists have been unable to do much beyond make an occasional attack in the remote eastern part of the country.

March 28, 2009: Al Qaeda is demanding the release of twenty Algerian, Mauritanian and Moroccan Islamic terrorists held in prisons throughout the region, in return for six Western captives the terrorists have taken (or bought from bandits) in the last few months. The Westerners are apparently being held in Mali.

March 30, 2009: Six al Qaeda members were killed, and three captured, 510 kilometers south of the capital. First there was a clash with an army unit, followed by warplanes hitting the three terrorist vehicles trying to flee. The army is still chasing some of the terrorists who escaped into the mountains.

March 31, 2009: The army interrupted a weapons pickup by a large (three dozen or more) al Qaeda group, 800 kilometers east of the capital. At least one terrorist was killed, but most of them got away.

April 2, 2009: A clash with terrorists 240 kilometers east of the capital left one policeman dead and four wounded.

April 3, 2009: Troops ambushed a group of Islamic terrorists 120 kilometers east of the capital, killing one and capturing seven. This operation is part of a major army effort to find several groups of Islamic terrorists known to be operating along the coasts. There have been several terrorists taking advantage of the amnesty lately, and some of these men had extensive knowledge of terrorist camps in the coastal forests and mountains east of the capital.

The remaining Islamic radicals in Algeria managed to set off six bombs on election day, killing one policeman. Foreign election observers declared that the election was free and fair. However, Algeria is still basically a one party state, and the state backed the 72 year old Bouteflika for a third, five year, term. The five other candidates were little known because the state controlled media ignored them. Several political parties (particularly the leftists and Islamic ones) boycotted the vote. Bouteflika promised to create three million new jobs for the many unemployed young (18-30s) men, but few believe he can do this. The economy is still dominated by party hacks and those who are favored for their loyalty to the president, not their business acumen. This is typical of the Middle East, where tyrants run efficient police states even when they declare their nations democracies. This one party rule is invariably corrupt, and mainly interested in hanging onto political, and economic, control of the nation. A medieval monarchy by any other name. The opposition from Islamic radicals is also nothing new, and has long been present to oppose inept rulers. The Islamic radicals usually fail, for the same reasons they are failing today (they are better at praying and killing than in running a government, especially a police state.)

The surviving terrorists have fled to the coastal hills east of the capital, the Sahara desert far to the south, Europe and Iraq. Those who went to Iraq tended to get killed quickly. Those who went to Europe got on welfare and either retired from terrorism, or continued to plan new attacks (and get caught and jailed for it). Those who fled to the hills and desert turned to banditry (robbery, extortion and kidnapping) to survive. Three years ago, these Islamic radicals declared that they had merged with al Qaeda. This was largely cosmetic, as al Qaeda was taking a beating in Iraq, and elsewhere around the world. There was a brief revival of terror attacks in Algeria, but that has since been declining. Meanwhile, the tyranny and economic mismanagement throughout the Islamic world continues to produce young men willing to kill for change. About 100,000 Algerians immigrate (usually illegally to Europe) each year.

April 9, 2009: President Abdelaziz Bouteflika was re-elected for the third time with 90.24 percent of the vote. Some 74 percent of the 20 million registered voters cast a ballot. Bouteflika presides over a police state run by families that were active in the liberation movement that freed Algeria, in the 1960s, from over a century of French colonial rule. Free elections were first allowed in 1989, but that resulted in an Islamic party winning, and proposing that Algeria be turned into a religious dictatorship, in order to deal with the widespread corruption and incompetent bureaucrats. The government refused to accept these election results, so the Islamic radicals turned to violence and terror. Throughout the 1990s, the violence killed over 200,000 (mostly civilians killed by the terrorists). The population gradually turned on the Islamic radicals, and the government counter-terrorist tactics shut down the Islamic radical movement. Remnants of the 1990s Islamic radical movement fight on as an al Qaeda franchise.

Political violence left 20 dead in March, compared to 33 in February. It's expected that there will be more violence this month, because of the April 9 presidential election. Al Qaeda attempts to disrupt the elections with violence were energetic, but ineffective.

April 11, 2009: Al Qaeda has proclaimed the formation of a new chapter south of Algeria, among tribal rebels and disaffected urbanites in Niger, Mali, Chad and Mauritania. This is more PR than reality. There are some Islamic terrorists in the region, and these pronouncements appear to be an attempt to unify pro-Islamic terrorist elements via the Internet and the mass media. So far, the many disaffected groups in the region have shown little interest in uniting. Too many different objectives, and al Qaeda has a reputation for being a loser.

April 12, 2009: Police arrested an al Qaeda leader, and several of his followers, 80 kilometers east of the capital. The al Qaeda group had been raising money by kidnapping local people, and obtaining ransoms of up to $4,000 per person.

April 16, 2009: Police, operating 300-600 kilometers east of the capital, killed seven Islamic terrorists in several incidents.

Police killed five Islamic terrorists some 560 kilometers east of the capital.

April 22, 2009: Islamic terrorists in Mali have released two Canadian and two European captives, in return for a $7 million ransom. The terrorists had earlier insisted on the release of several dozen imprisoned Islamic terrorists, but the governments holding these men refused to cooperate. One or more European nations paid the ransom, which will now go to financing more terrorist activity in Mali and Algeria. One of the activities getting some of this money are religious schools that indoctrinate children to become suicide bombers. Al Qaeda is quite proud of this, and featured some of these kids in a recent video. Meanwhile, two more foreign tourists (a Brit and a Swiss) are being held, and the freedom of a prominent terrorist leader is demanded, although cash ransom is probably being negotiated.

For the first three months of the year, oil exports (97 percent of all exports) declined 42 percent in value compared to last year. This has caused more unemployment and unrest. But not as much as one would expect, because so much of the oil revenue is stolen by senior government officials. Thus the chief victims of the lower oil price and demand, is the net worth of the wealthiest families.

Over 2,000 kilometers south of the capital, on the Mali and Niger borders, police are having a growing problem with thousands of Africans illegally crossing the border and then trying to make their way north, across the Sahara desert, to the Mediterranean, and then to Europe in search of jobs. Algerians living along the border are demanding that police do something about the African migrants, who compete for scarce resources and commit crimes in the dry border region.

The government has allowed 22 of 26 Christian churches to reopen, after being closed last year because the Christians involved were accused to trying to convert Moslems. Although Moslems demand the right to establish mosques and convert Christians in Western countries, they do not reciprocate in their own homelands. This is because Islam sees itself, as many religions do, as the one true faith. But Moslems has always been more aggressive about this than other religions, thus they see no contradiction in restricting non-Islamic religions in countries with a Moslem majority.

April 28, 2009: In the last six months, police and soldiers have killed or captured some 450 Islamic terrorists. Most of that activity occurred late last year, and that caused severe damage to the North African branch of al Qaeda. The group is much weakened, and spending most of its efforts on rebuilding cash reserves and finding more secure hideouts.

April 29, 2009: Four Islamic terrorists were released from Mali jails, in return for the release last week of two Canadians and two Europeans being held by al Qaeda kidnappers in Mali.

April 30, 2009: A known al Qaeda leader, Abu Harith Al Libya, was killed by police near the Mali border.

May 2, 2009: Islamic terrorists ambushed and killed two police investigators, 55 kilometers east of the capital.

May 3, 2009: Al Qaeda in Mali are still holding two Europeans, and demanding that Britain release a Jordanian Islamic terrorist by May 15th, or else the British man being held will be killed.

May 7, 2009: In a clash a hundred kilometers east of the capital, eight Islamic terrorists and two soldiers were killed.

May 8, 2009: In eastern Algeria, a clash left four Islamic terrorists and two policemen dead.

May 9, 2009: Mali began a large scale military operation, to find and destroy al Qaeda members operating along the Algerian border.

May 10, 2009: Three days of raids and patrols east of the capital left nine Islamic terrorists and three soldiers dead. The operations were seeking out terrorist camps and safe houses.

May 16, 2009: Al Qaeda in Mali are holding two Europeans, and their demand that Britain release a Jordanian Islamic terrorist by May 15th, or else the British man being held would be killed, was ignored. Instead of killing their British captive, they have now asked for a $13.5 million ransom. This is seen as an opening offer, and subject to reduction during negotiations. The terrorists apparently expect to get at least a few million dollars for their captives.

May 18, 2009: After three bomb attacks in an area 100 kilometers east of the capital in the last few days, a tip led police to an area where a group of Islamic terrorists were hiding. During the ensuing gun battle, six of the terrorists were killed.

Spanish police recently arrested 17 Algerian and Moroccan immigrants, who had formed a criminal gang. Police discovered that the gang was sending much of their profits back to Morocco and Algeria, to finance Islamic terrorist activities.

Islamic terrorist activity along the Mali and Niger borders has killed the tourism business down there. This has led to thousands of people losing their jobs and growing unrest. The three nations bordering southern Algeria are launching a series of military and police operations in the border area, in an effort to capture or kill the hundred or so Islamic terrorists known to be there.

May 20, 2009: Algeria, Mali, Niger and Mauritania have increased military cooperation along their border. This includes sharing intelligence and coordinating counter-terror operations. Algeria is also supplying the three other countries with weapons, ammunition and other military supplies. This is all part of an effort to clear al Qaeda groups, and bandits, out of the border region (which is largely desert, or semi-desert).

May 30, 2009: Police found, cornered and killed five of the Islamic terrorists who had ambushed a police patrol outside the capital ten days ago. That terrorist group, of more than twenty men, apparently dispersed after the encounter. The group the police tracked down south of the capital, contained two al Qaeda leaders, and information taken from the bodies indicated arms caches in the area, and approximate locations of the other 4-5 terrorist cells connected with this one.

While the government has been successful in wiping out most of the Islamic terrorists, there are always more. The families of the 1960s era revolution leaders, who took over after independence from France was achieve, show no interest in sharing power, much less giving it up. This oligarchy, which is so common in the Arab world, is corrupt and incompetent (especially when it comes to running the economy.) High unemployment among young men, and disgust with the corrupt and inept government, provides a steady stream of recruits. Most of them are not too bright (the smarter young guys either immigrate, or figure out how to work the corrupt system). The government has had its most success in hunting down the terrorist leadership. These men are either killed, or convinced (with the help of some economic inducements) to quit their terrorist activity, denounce Islamic terrorism and behave. While the government has been winning, they have not won. Until the governance problems are solved, there will always be Islamic terrorists out and about.

The U.S. is Algeria's largest trading partner (and for the U.S., Algeria is the second largest trading partner among Arab countries.) This brings a lot of Americans to Algeria, but some of them are also working on cooperation in counter-terror operations. This includes exchanges of information. The U.S. tracks Islamic terrorist communications worldwide, as well as financial transactions through the international banking system. This fills in important gaps in the Algerian governments knowledge of what their domestic terrorists are up to, and who they are. This has forced the Algerian terrorists to adapt, communicate less, and limit their operations. But these terrorists keep at it, a constant reminder that there are some unhappy Algerians who are willing to kill for their beliefs.

May 31, 2009: The rural areas along Algeria's Mediterranean coast has become a dangerous place for police and army patrols. In the past two weeks, there have been two instances where large (twenty or more gunmen) groups of Islamic terrorist gunmen have ambushed these patrols, killing five police in one and seven soldiers in another. These attacks are believed to be proof that at least two separate gangs of terrorists are operating out there. One attack was a hundred kilometers south of the capital, and the other was 500 kilometers east, along the coast.

June 1, 2009: Police in the capital arrested twelve terrorist suspects, based on information found on a dead terrorist. Those picked up provided even more information on terrorist activity.

There aren't many Islamic radicals left in Algeria, and many of those are fleeing to Europe, or south into the desert and across the southern borders into Black Africa. Despite the large amount of uninhabited mountains and forests along the eastern coast, the police and army have been operating there for so long that it's difficult to stay hidden. Too many civilians are hostile to Islamic radicalism, and will phone in a tip. Algeria has become a very dangerous place for Islamic terrorists. Some fight on, but at lower and lower violence levels. Peace has brought with it despair, as Algerians realize that their government is basically a corrupt military dictatorship that uses the national oil wealth to buy enough votes to get elected again and again. So more Algerians are fleeing, or vacillating between despair and a desire to fight.

June 2, 2009: Just across the border in Mali, al Qaeda announced it had killed, two days earlier, one of its British hostages (Edwin Dyer). Al Qaeda had been demanding $14 million for Dyer and another Swiss citizen they were holding. This was the first time the North African branch of al Qaeda had killed a hostage. Al Qaeda later said that Dyer was killed in response to the arrest of a prominent Islamic radical cleric. But the terrorists do need the money. Recently, in Pakistan, al Qaeda appealed for money, because so many sources of funds had dried up. International efforts to cut terrorist funding has apparently worked, as seen in the amount of effort al Qaeda has put into kidnapping and collecting ransom for foreign captives in Mali, and other Sahel states.

June 3, 2009: Because al Qaeda murdered one of its foreign prisoners, Mail said that it would no longer hold back its troops from going after the kidnappers. Previously, foreign nations (representing the captives) had convinced Mali not to go in and find and rescue the captives, but to allow ransom negotiations to continue. But now Mali is going to round up the usual suspects.

June 17, 2009: In Mali, police raided an al Qaeda base near the Algerian border. Over twenty terrorists were killed, but others managed to escape. This base was believed used by the al Qaeda group that kidnapped, and recently murdered, a British captive.

June 18, 2009: Al Qaeda terrorists ambushed a police convoy 180 kilometers east of the capital, killing 19 paramilitary security personnel (who were guarding Chinese workers and engineers, who are supervising the construction of a highway.) Meanwhile, a suicide car bomber attacked a military college just east of the capital, and killed over 40 people.

June 22, 2009: Some 600 kilometers southeast of the capital, Islamic terrorists ambushed an army patrol, killing five soldiers and taking two captive.

Al Qaeda in North Africa has associates, perhaps hundreds, in Europe. These offshore members work mainly with the fund raising (mostly from criminal activities), but some carry out terrorism related tasks (reconnaissance, recruiting). Intelligence officials in Algeria and Europe have long known that Islamic terrorists in Algeria are in regular communication with fellow Algerian radicals in Europe. Police do not reveal exactly what intercepted communications are about (fund raising, getting out of Algeria, or planning attacks in Europe), but do admit that the message traffic is growing.

So, killing all al Qaeda in North Africa will be impossible. Thanks to the Internet and cell phones, there are always a few members surviving even the most successful counter-terror operations, and those few can resume recruiting, training and attacking. But the government cannot stop attacking, for al Qaeda's main targets are corrupt government officials.

Moreover, the Islamic terrorists frequent attacks on civilians over the last two decades, has made the government look better by comparison. So there is still wide support for the fight against the terrorists. But it is a war without end as long as Algeria is a poorly run dictatorship.

June 24, 2009: Al Qaeda operations in Algeria are difficult to stamp out for several reasons. First, there is no shortage of new recruits, thanks to the corrupt and inefficient government (basically a dictatorship of families whose ancestors ran the 1960s campaign that drove out the French). High unemployment and unwillingness to reform, leaves many young men vulnerable to al Qaedas promise of a just Islamic republic (a religious dictatorship). Joining al Qaeda gives unemployed young men a license to kill and steal. Even getting killed is not an unmitigated disaster, because al Qaeda often gives the deceased man's family a cash payment.

June 25, 2009: Al Qaeda in North Africa took credit for the recent murder of the director of a foreign aid organization in Mauritania.

June 30, 2009: Police killed two Islamic terrorists east of the capital, and recovered weapons and ammunition. The last round of gun battles and arrests seems to have disrupted al Qaeda operations in Algeria, because it’s been very quiet (in terms of terrorist activity) these past few weeks.

July 3, 2009: Niger, Nigeria and Algeria agreed to spend $10 billion to build a 4,000 kilometers long pipeline to transport natural gas to Europe. The pipeline is to be operational in six years. Rebel groups in all countries promptly announced that they would attack the pipeline.

July 5, 2009: The African Union has joined Algeria in condemning the practice of paying ransoms to Islamic terrorists, to obtain the release of kidnap victims. The ransoms, often in the millions of dollars (for diplomats and Western civilians), simply makes the kidnappers stronger and better able to kidnap more people.

July 12, 2009: An al Qaeda group in Mali released a Swiss man who was held captive for six months. Mali took credit for negotiating the release, and insisted that neither Mali, now Switzerland paid a ransom. Many doubt that the Islamic group just gave up their prisoner. The way this usually works, the Islamic terrorists will eventually reveal what really happened, especially if they did receive a large amount of cash. The Islamic radical groups in the three borders area, and Mauritania to the west, have done well by kidnapping Westerners in the area. That has killed much of the tourist activity, and increased the presence of police and soldier. Both of these developments have not been popular with the locals, who prefer to be left alone to tend their herds, and make some money smuggling goods and people across the borders.

The government is trying to weaken popular support for Islamic terrorists, by promoting the Sufi sect of Islam. Only 4-5 percent of Algerians are active participants of this less radical, and more contemplative form of Islam. More Algerians prefer the more conservative and violent Salafist sect (which is similar to the Wahhabism in Saudi Arabia.) However, over a decade of Islamic violence has made many Algerians wary of Salafist radicalism. Salafism was originally very peaceful, but was radicalized during its struggle against a corrupt and inept Algerian dictatorship.

July 13, 2009: Mali, Algeria and Niger are preparing a major, joint, military and police operation along their common border, to find and destroy Islamic terrorist groups hiding out in the semi -desert Sahel region. This is a large area, with few roads, rain or people. Periodically, these nations have to cooperate to chase down troublesome bandits or rebel groups that raid in one country, then return to their base in another. Despite the large area involved, there are few places to hide. That's because you need water down here, and there are a limited number of places to get that. While the security forces have aircraft to aid their search, the Islamic groups also have pickup trucks and other vehicles to speed their movement. The three governments also have access to some American satellite reconnaissance and electronic eavesdropping capabilities via AFRICOM (which maintains a visible, but low, profile during these operations.

July 14, 2009: Al Qaeda in North Africa threatens revenge attacks against the 40,000 Chinese working in Algeria, because of the Chinese Moslems (the Uighurs, who are ethnic Turks) killed by police recently during ethnic riots in northwest China.

July 15, 2009: China issued a security alert to its citizens living in North Africa, where local Islamic terrorists have threatened new attacks. The Chinese have been targets before, of Islamic terrorist attack, and generally are careful about their security. The Algerian government does not want any embarrassing incidents with the Chinese, who have become a vital part of restoring economic growth. The many Chinese commercial projects have prospered through hard work, and Chinese government intervention to keep many of the bungling or corrupt Algerian government officials at bay. Chinese firms have road building contracts worth over $5 billion, and many of these roads go through remote areas. But improved security measures have kept terrorists from interfering with these road building operations.

July 18, 2009: Terrorists attacked a military check point, killing two soldiers.

July 19, 2009: Algeria is mediating peace talks between Mali and its Taureg tribes, who have recently agreed to halt their rebellion on the promise that peace talks would be successful.

July 20, 2009: Chinese firms won nearly $2 billion in contracts to help build a 300 kilometers railroad to link coastal areas with western highlands. This will open up that hilly region to more economic activity.

July 22, 2009: Algeria is moving its weekend to Friday-Saturday, from Thursday-Friday, to make it easier for Western, and Chinese, firms to do business in Algeria. Most Moslem nations now observe the Friday-Saturday weekend, although Islamic conservatives prefer the Thursday-Friday one.

July 23, 2009: Islamic terrorists tossed a grenade at a security checkpoint 110 kilometers east of the capital, killing two and wounding four.

Police recently arrested three men and a women, and accused them of spying for France. The four were caught with photos of security installations, and admitted to working for someone in the French embassy. France has denied any involvement. But France is very interested in how Algeria carries out its counter-terror operations. France is aware, from interrogations of its own Algerian immigrants that have turned to terrorism, that Algeria continues to be a source of terrorists. This is because, while the terrorists have been defeated, a large segment (perhaps 20 percent) of the population is still religiously conservative. Nearly half the population is young, poor (usually un, or under-employed) and angry at the government for its corruption and inability to provide jobs and prosperity.

In the south, the former Taureg rebels in Mali are joining the hunt for terrorists. The Tauregs live in the Sahel, and no one knows the parched region better. The Tauregs will be rewarded for any success they have in catching Islamic terrorists out there.

July 27, 2009: For the last week, soldiers and police have been carrying out increased patrols and search operations to locate and arrest the few remaining Islamic terrorists. These few diehards are still able to recruit unemployed young men, train them, and carry out the occasional terror attack. Libya and Mali are also cooperating on patrolling the Sahel (semi - desert region south of the Sahara) and searching for Islamic terrorist activity there. But the current operation is in the north, along the coast, where most Algerians live.

July 28, 2009: In two incidents, terrorists killed three security troops.

July 31, 2009: In response to a terrorist ambush that killed 14 soldiers last Wednesday, the military has deployed an additional 5,000 troops to hunt down the Islamic radicals responsible. The ambush took place 70 kilometers west of the capital, in an area where Islamic terrorists usually do not operate.

August 3, 2009: In the capital, about a hundred Chinese and Algerians brawled in the streets. Several Chinese shops were damaged, and dozens of people were injured. There is growing resentment at the thousands of Chinese being brought into the country to work as laborers on Chinese run and funded constructions projects. Over a third of men 18-30 are out of work, and they are angry at seeing these Chinese "taking their jobs." But the Chinese insist on bringing their own workers in, because Arab workers are considered too undisciplined and lackadaisical to enable contractors to comply with the quality requirements and timetables stipulated in the contracts. The government recognizes this, but will not dwell on it publicly. Instead, the government promotes the positive aspects of Chinese investment in the country. This does little for the many unemployed young men. There are over 700,000 Chinese in Africa, and over 50,000 in Algeria.

The government is supporting the spread of less austere forms of Islam, especially the Sufi approach (which is heavily into mysticism). But there is still a small percentage of young Algerians who are so angry at government corruption and incompetence (at running the economy) that they are willing to join or support Islamic terrorists.

Al Qaeda has declared war against Chinese present in the country, and especially the thousands of Chinese involved in building roads to the interior. This hate campaign plays well with the young, unemployed, Algerians who are most likely to join al Qaeda.

August 7, 2009: Troops and police ran down and killed 20 armed Islamic radicals east of the capital. Meanwhile, thousands of troops and police sought Islamic terrorists west of the capital, in an area that had been free of terrorist violence for the last two years. It is feared that the terrorists responsible for killing 14 troops there, have fled the area.

August 8, 2009: In Mauritania, a suicide bomber blew himself up outside the French embassy. Three other people were injured, only the bomber was killed. Police identified the bomber, and found out he was a resident of the capital, who was recruited by Islamic terrorists and indoctrinated in a camp out in the desert.

August 12, 2009: In the east, five more Islamic radicals surrendered and accepted the amnesty. Some 200 kilometers southeast of the capital, police killed three Islamic terrorists.

August 15, 2009: Islamic terrorists attacked a police observation post a hundred kilometers east of the capital. One policeman was killed, and two others wounded.

August 16, 2009: Mauritania is sending 4,000 troops to the desert areas near the Algerian border. Here, the troops will seek out and destroy terrorist camps.

The desert area, where the borders of Mauritania, Mali, and Algeria meet, has become the new base area for Islamic terrorists driven out of northern Algeria (where most of the people live). Bringing money and new ideas to existing rebel groups in Mauritania and Mali, the Algerian radicals have created a growing threat. But the African nations involved have joined together to deal with the problem. The Islamic radicals our hiding out in a wilderness, which has poor communications (both electronic and for travelling).

While China has brought much cash, and vigor, to the construction industry (building roads and other public works), there are strings attached. The Chinese insist on being allowed to bring Chinese in to do much of the work, along with other Chinese who are free to establish businesses. In a pattern repeated in many other parts of Africa, and the world, the more diligent and efficient Chinese soon start putting local merchants and companies out of business. The local businessmen are complaining, and want the Chinese competition banned.

Police are catching armed Islamic radicals in places they have not been seen for years. Three were killed earlier this month, 250 kilometers east of the capital, in an area with popular beaches and recreational facilities. Islamic militants had not been seen in the area for over a decade. But the intense army and police activity in the usual terrorist haunts has forced the Islamic radicals to seek new hideouts.

August 25, 2009: The government is touting its ability to keep the Islamic terrorists down as an opportunity for foreign tourists to return. But older travelers, who remember Algeria before the 1990s violence, will note that the Islamic radicals have left their mark. There is hardly any place in the capital to get a drink. There used to be dozens of bars and cafes that served alcoholic beverages. But as part of the deal to disband most of the terrorist groups, the government had to impose more religious restrictions on the general public. If the tourists can be persuaded to return, special bars in tourist hotels can serve the infidel foreigners. Meanwhile, the boozing has gone private for Algerians, as it tends to do in Islamic countries that ban public drinking. The alcohol ban has been a blessing for smugglers and purveyors of illegal goods. Meanwhile, corruption, and residual terrorist activity continue to discourage investment in tourist facilities. Algeria has had a bad reputation to tourists for a long time, and it will take years to overcome that.

August 26, 2009: Four Islamic terrorists surrendered, with their weapons, to police some 110 kilometers east of the capital. The men had been hiding the coastal hills, but were demoralized by the constant army patrols, and local civilians willing to turn terrorists in.

August 29, 2009: Terrorists attacked east and west of the capital, killing four soldiers and a civilian. One attack was with a car bomb, the other was the ambush of an army patrol.

September 7, 2009: The army detected and went after a five man Islamic terrorist group operating 320 kilometers southwest of the capital. One of the terrorists was killed, and another captured. Many of the Islamic terrorists are fleeing their long favored refuges in the coastal mountains. This is partly because of pressure from the military, but more to get away from civilians, who hate the Islamic radicals more than they hate the government. It used to be the other way around, but the frequent murder of suspected civilian informers (and their entire families) turned most Algerians against the Islamic radicals by the late 1990s. That has not changed, apparently because the terrorists will still kill suspected informants, in grisly ways that are meant to send a message. The message, however, has backfired. Thus another group of terrorists, who fled to a mountain hideout 420 kilometers southeast of the capital, were hit by artillery fire, after their camp was spotted.

Neighboring Morocco is having a peculiar problem with Islamic radicalism. Iran has been sending missionaries, armed with lots of cash, to Morocco, and engaged in aggressive attempts to convert Sunnis there, to the militant brand of Shia Islam favored in Iran. This has so angered Morocco that diplomatic relations with Iran were cut earlier this year. Morocco has also cracked down on Wahabi missionaries (Sunni radicals) from Saudi Arabia, and Islamic radicals in general. The king has an advantage in that he is a direct descendent of the Prophet Mohammed, and is generally popular. The Moroccan government is not as corrupt and inept as the one in Algeria, but is not a whole lot better either.

The terrorists have found all this prosperity, and their own legacy of bad behavior, poisonous. While they can carry out terror attacks, too many civilians that witness the preparations for these attacks, will inform the police. So each attack results in many valuable members of the attack team getting killed or captured. Already, hundreds of experienced Algerian terrorists are in exile, and being discovered (usually dead) in Iraq, Afghanistan, Pakistan and other places where Islamic terrorism is a problem. But several hundred are determined to continue the fight in Algeria, and to do that, they have to get as far away from Algerian civilians as possible. There are still many (usually unemployed) young Algerians willing to be recruited by Islamic radical groups. But the Algerian terrorists have to protect their leaders and technical experts. Thus the tendency to move further out into the countryside.

The crops did well this year, with six million tons of cereals produced. Normally, only two million tons are harvested, and another five million tons are imported. For years, the government had been urged to adopt a policy of financial incentives for farmers, and fewer bureaucratic restrictions. This was finally done, at the same time there was a year of good rains. Thus the spectacular growth in cereal production. Lots of happy farmers out in the countryside, which is bad news for terrorists trying to survive among "the people."

September 9, 2009: The government is holding out the prospect of pardons if all Islamic terrorists surrender. Morale is low among many of the armed terrorists, as they are living rough out in the countryside, and constantly harassed by the army. Worse, the terrorists cannot trust civilians, who now may have a cell phone, which is a very quick way to bring in the police and soldiers.

September 22, 2009: Ramadan, the annual Islamic month of fasting (by day, feasting by night) and prayer has passed largely without Islamic terrorist violence. But the police know that there are still Islamic terrorist cells out there. What the government is trying to do is crush those cells along the coast, as these groups are most able to carry out bombings in urban areas. Most of the surviving Islamic terrorists are known to have moved to remote camps further inland, in the mountains, or much further south in the semi-desert Sahel region on the southern border lands.

What is most troublesome for the government is that continued high unemployment among young men is creating a constant supply of new recruits for terrorist units. The government is generally hated because it is basically a self-serving dictatorship pretending to be a democracy. Despite all the oil money, the economy is sluggish, and it's difficult to start a new business without someone in the government getting a cut. This scares off foreign governments, as does the terrorist violence. The government is trying to change its image, but it cannot change what it is.

The government is re-equipping the military. Over ten billion dollars is being spent to buy dozens of Su-30 fighters and hundreds of armored vehicles from Russia, six frigates from Italy and over a hundred helicopters from a supplier not yet selected. It's the armored vehicles and helicopters that will have the most impact on the counter-terrorism efforts. The government has already equipped the police and army with commercial grade transport (police cars and trucks) and communications. There are some helicopters, but the army, in particular, would like more, to assist in search operations once terrorist cells have been detected. Currently, if the police or troops cannot detect the terrorists within hours, the vastness of the countryside usually enables most of the terrorists to get away, to try and kill another day.

October 4, 2009: Security forces killed another eight Islamic terrorists over the weekend.

Meanwhile, the Islamic terrorists are still active, especially in their press releases. A recent one claimed that 29 attacks were made in the last few months. But less than a dozen appear to have occurred, or at least shown up in the media (which is still fairly free to report violence and natural disasters). The Islamic radicals still have supporters, especially among men under age 30 (about a third of whom are unemployed). But if these guys had jobs, the Islamic terrorists would have a smaller recruiting base. The government can't handle the economy well, and the jobs are not there. This is a common problem in all Arab countries, even those with great oil wealth.

In a situation typical of the Arab world, the government has defeated Islamic radicals, who sought to take over the country. But the government corruption and mismanagement that gave the Islamic radicals some popular support in the first place, is still there. Just waiting for some organization to mobilize it and make another run at toppling the government. The problem is, that results in a new ruling class, which quickly becomes as oppressive and inept as the last one. Breaking the cycle with honest elections and officials is seen as a real long shot. There just isn't a lot of trust, at least not enough to create a national movement that could overthrow the current police state, and replace it with something better. If it sounds hopeless, well, so far it has been. There are reformers throughout the Arab world, trying to come up with solutions. But so far, no one has developed anything that works.

Tensions with Chinese, brought in to work on development projects financed by China, are rising. In the last eight years, trade to (and from) China has increased from $300 million a year, to nearly $5 billion. There are now over 50,000 Chinese in Algeria. Mostly men, few are Moslems, and they like to have a beer and lounge around in shorts after work. This offends conservative Algerians. Many of the Chinese open retail and wholesale businesses, which tend to be more competitive than Algerian ones. This offends Algerian businessmen, and Algerians in general, who see Chinese with jobs, while over 20 percent of Algerians are unemployed. Algeria likes the business with China, and the efficiency with which the Chinese get things done. But the side effects are causing resentment, and growing violence.

The government is trying to interest foreign firms in mining 29,000 tons of uranium that surveys have discovered in the desert south. This would provide enough nuclear fuel to produce 1,000 MW a year for 120 years. The government would also like to build two or more nuclear power plants in the next decade, but this is very expensive, and money remains tight. Exports, mainly because of lower oil prices, are down 50 percent this year, compared to last year. Thus the nation can just about cover current expenses.

October 7, 2009: Mauritania has had growing success shutting down Islamic terrorist operations in the desert area near the Algerian border. Last month, seven al Qaeda members were arrested, after being detected and tracked by border police. Before that, police found several weapons and bomb materials caches in the desert. Algerian Islamic terrorists have been driven away from population centers, but setting up bases across the border has not worked out too well either.

October 9, 2009: About a thousand kilometers southwest of the capital, police caught up with several vehicles crossing the desert carrying Islamic terrorists and their weapons. Ten terrorists and three police were killed when the terrorists stopped near the world's largest sand dune (the "Great Erg") and made a stand. They all died, and three turned out to be foreigners.

October 17, 2009: East of the capital, army search teams found and destroyed two terrorist camps, killing four Islamic terrorists in the process.

October 19, 2009: Some 500 kilometers southwest of the capital, troops caught up with senior terrorist leader, Nouh Abu Qatada al Salafi, and killed him.

Algerian terrorists have been accused of conspiring with a French nuclear physicist (who worked with CERN and the Hadron collider project) to plan and carry out terror attacks in France. French intelligence intercepted and decrypted emails exchanged between the physicist and the Algerian terrorists. This was big news because of the CERN connection and the Algerian ancestry of the physicist. But otherwise, it was fairly typical of the many attacks that are always being planned in this fashion, but rarely get carried out.

October 20, 2009: The government is taking in half the oil and gas revenue this year ($20 billion) as they did last year ($40 billion.) That means cuts in government spending, higher unemployment and more public unhappiness. The drop in global oil prices is the main culprit. Most embarrassing to the government has been the militancy of thousands of maimed military and police veterans, who are demanding better care and compensation. Several hundred of these veterans have been demonstrating in the capital, and the police have been reluctant to act against their injured brethren. But there have been other demonstrations, by non-veterans, against lack of housing and jobs, which the cops have cracked down on.

October 22, 2009: Islamic terrorists ambushed and killed six security guards (who protect foreign workers on an irrigation project being built east of the capital.) The area around the attack has seen several dozen terrorists getting caught and killed in the last few weeks.

October 27, 2009: The government signed a defense agreement with Britain. This one involves Algerian officers receiving training in Britain, and joint exercises between forces from the two nations. The agreement also covers increased joint efforts in counter-terrorism activities.

October 31, 2009: The increased counter-terror operations in the south are encountering other illegal activity, mostly smuggling. Troops recently encountered (based on a tip) two vehicles, near the Moroccan border, that were carrying 3.5 tons of marijuana. The drivers fled, leaving two assault rifles behind. A year ago, nine tons of marijuana was seized as smugglers tried to get it across the border.

November 1, 2009: The U.S. has donated five million dollars worth of military equipment to Mali. This includes 37 fully equipped (for counter-terror operations) vehicles. Mali is cooperating with Algeria to prevent Algerian Islamic terrorist groups from setting up bases in neighboring countries.

People in the slum neighborhoods of the capital are beginning to hold regular, and increasingly violent, demonstrations. The people want jobs and housing (or at least livable housing.) Police and demonstrators are injured, and there will probably eventually be deaths, which could ratchet up the violence still more.

November 4, 2009: Government analysis of known (dead, arrested or still out there) Islamic terrorists indicates that groups like al Qaeda have not had a lot of success recruiting in Algeria. Most of the identified terrorists were veterans or foreigners. Government analysts believe that only ten Algerians have been recruited into the terrorist ranks in the last three years. This seems absurdly low, given the number of young, unemployed and angry, Algerians. Then again, there are very few Islamic terrorist left in the country, and Islamic terrorism is very unpopular among the general population. While the young give some support in conversation, and email, in practice they stay away.

November 7, 2009: Police killed three Islamic terrorists 110 kilometers east of the capital, and recovered two assault rifles.

Algeria and Egypt have seen street violence, first in Egypt, then in Algeria, over football (soccer) games (the qualifying rounds for the World Cup). Fan enthusiasm escalated to major demonstrations and damaged diplomatic relations.

Algeria, Mali and Mauritania have all quietly advised tourists to stay away from the border area this Winter, or to proceed with extreme caution. The reason is several Islamic terror groups believed to be still operating in the desert and semi-desert border area.

Algeria is also taking the lead in an effort by Moslem nations to get all nations to sign an international treaty banning any act that Moslems would construe as blasphemy. In short, that means any criticism of Islam would be illegal. Some Western nations are willing to consider this, but most non-Moslem (majority) states are rather hostile to this proposal. That's largely because so many Moslem nations are not only hostile to non-Moslems, but often have laws that forbid the practice of any religion but Islam. Nevertheless, Algeria, and its allies, are willing to keep the effort going for as long as it takes, to make the world show proper respect for the One True Religion.

November 20, 2009: Algeria is threatening to sue France in the International Court of Justice over how France administered Algeria during 130 years of colonial rule (that ended in the 1960s). This could be interesting, because the main reason for France taking control of Algeria was the inability, or unwillingness, of Algerian governments to control the criminal groups, including pirates, who had been preying, for centuries, on European shipping, and civilians living on the coast. One of the first wars the U.S. was involved in was against these North African pirates. The ones based in Algeria were always among the worst. Algeria is still a source of terrorists. For example, in the last week, Italy arrested 17 Algerians who were raising money for Islamic terrorist activities back in Algeria. The gang had raised over a million dollars, mainly from criminal activities, in the last three years. Such arrests of Algerian exiles are a common occurrence in Europe, especially since Algeria defeated its own Islamic terrorist groups in the last decade.

November 21, 2009: Two Algerian men held as terrorists by the United States for seven years on terrorism charges, and were returned to Algeria, were acquitted of the terrorism charges and released by an Algerian court. The two men admitted to involvement in the illegal drug trade, and that's why they had gone from Germany to Afghanistan in late 2001.

November 29, 2009: An Algerian man, Ahmed Belbacha, held as a terrorist by the United States for seven years on terrorism charges, refused to return to Algeria when recently released. That was because the Algerian government had a strong case against him, and tried him in absentia, convicted him and sentenced him to 20 years in prison. Political activists in the U.S. have persuaded the government and courts to release hundreds of terrorist suspects held in Guantanamo Bay. In addition, other nations have been persuaded to take released terrorists who refuse to return to their home countries (on the grounds that they would not receive the same treatment, by the judicial system, as they would in the United States.) For the last two years, the U.S. has been seeking other nations to take most of the 17 Algerians held at Guantanamo, who refuse to go to Algeria for fear of prosecution.

November 30, 2009: In the south, Mauritanian troops have begun searching an area near the Mali and Algerian border, where suspected Islamic terrorists (or bandits) are believed to be holding three kidnapped Spanish aid workers.

December 3, 2009: The government increased the minimum wage 25 percent, to deal with the constant inflation (which is currently running at the rate of 5.7 percent a year). Government corruption and incompetence has ruined the economy, leaving most young Algerians with very poor employment prospects. The unemployed, or underemployed, young are prone to violence because of the poor treatment they get from their government.

Another aspect of the Arabs wallowing in victimhood, is the Algerian led effort to pass a UN resolution declaring it illegal (or, at the very least, in defiance of the UN) to commit blasphemy against Islam. What exactly this blasphemy would consist of is vague, and the Arabs want it that way. The effort is all about getting the rest of the world to feel guilty about how screwed up the Arab world is, and to offer reparations (financial, political, and so on) to make amends. Some in the West are willing to go along with this, but most are not. All other non-Moslem nations are even less willing to accommodate the Arabs.

One bright spot for the Algerian government is the continued decline of the remaining Islamic terrorists in the country. Several hundred active terrorists are still out there, but they are having increasing difficulty organizing and carrying out attacks. Thus the continued decline in Islamic terrorist violence. But there are still plenty of Algerians angry at the "ol d revolutionaries" (the families that led the 1950s war against the French colonial government) who have run the country, and exploited it for their own benefit, since the French left in the early 1960s.

December 4, 2009: The recent football (soccer) playoffs between Egypt and Algeria were turned into a series of nationalistic riots by the Egyptian government (which did not turn the police on the anti-Algerian rioters, and had the government controlled mass media stir up the rioters.) This was all about Arab politics. Egypt still considers itself the "senior" or "leading" Arab nation, but most other Arab nations see this as arrogant and just plain wrong. Egypt is accused of being delusional and a sellout (for making peace with Israel). There is also the blame shifting over the Palestinian mess. When Israel declared its independence in 1948, the Arab states, led by Egypt, rejected the UN partition plan, and told the Palestinians that the combined might of the Arab armies would crush the Jews and put the Palestinians in charge of what is now Israel. That didn't happen, and three more wars, and Arab defeats, ended in Egypt making peace with Israel and trying to negotiate a peace deal between the Palestinians and Israelis. This has not worked either, and Arab nations like to blame Egypt for the failure. Naturally, the Egyptians resent this, along with their poverty (because of no oil and a corrupt government) and dismal future (the poverty and corruption again.) The failure of Arab states to deal with their economic, cultural, corruption and political problems led to the formation of al Qaeda, and other Islamic terrorist organizations. But it's rare for an Arab state, or its inhabitants, to accept blame for any of these problems. Someone else, sometimes another Arab state, is always at fault.

December 5, 2009: Last month, the most spectacular army operations consisted of searching mountain areas (along the coast, and deep inland) for Islamic terrorists, and searching for half century old landmines along the borders. The landmine search was more stressful than the terrorist sweeps. The mines are definitely there (the French finally turned over the colonial era maps), while the Islamic terrorists are fading away because of arrests, desertion and combat wounds. There have actually been few casualties while clearing the old mines, and 5,700 were found and disposed last month. That saves a few people (and several animals) from getting killed or injured in the future. Last year, over a hundred Algerians were killed or wounded by these old mines.

December 17, 2009: In the desert south, police detected, tracked and killed four Islamic terrorists who were in the midst of planning an attack. Police ambushed the four men, and killed them in a shoot out. Islamic terrorists prefer to die fighting, since otherwise they face torture and years of imprisonment.

But the Arab form of police state is not all muscle. The "carrot and stick" approach has been around for thousands of years. For example, in the last three years, the government has distributed $166 million to victims of Islamic terrorism. As these extremists are already disliked for their seemingly random attacks on civilians, they also come off poorly in comparison with the government, which provides medical attention for the victims, security forces who often capture or kill the terrorists and, finally, cash payments to the victims. Thus, while Algerians may not like their corrupt and controlling government very much, they dislike the Islamic terrorists even more.

In the last three years, the government has prosecuted 2,691 corruption cases, leading to the conviction of 5,086. This was never big news because all these cases involved low ranking officials and civilians. The senior officials, who preside over, and profit from, widespread corruption, appear to be immune from investigation and prosecution. Although technically a democracy, Algeria has all the aspects of a police state, including security forces that can grab anyone, at any time, and hold them indefinitely. Torture is frequently used, and many enemies of the state simply disappear. The media is tightly controlled by the state (and allowed to censor itself). All this is necessary because the ruling families also control the economy, and have done a poor job running it. So the widespread poverty gives rise to unrest that only police state tactics can deal with.

December 18, 2009: In the last few days, police have arrested ten al Qaeda members, in two different cells. One group was operating outside the capital, and was detected because the terrorists were extorting "voluntary contributions" from small businesses in the area, and warning people not to tip off the police, or else. Some called the cops anyway. The other cell of four terrorists was operating 300 kilometers east of the capital, and were providing logistical services (buying and delivering supplies and weapons) to terrorist cells that actually made and planted bombs.

December 21, 2009: A group of six Islamic terrorists were detected and captured in the capital. Two assault rifles and documents were also seized.

December 26, 2009: Several dozen of Moslems blocked Christians from their church in a town a hundred kilometers east of the capital. The Moslems blocked Christians from the church for two days, and during that time, broke into the church and looted it. The police were called early on, but did nothing. The Moslems were annoyed that there was now a church in their neighborhood, along with hundreds of strangers. There was also the fear that their children might be tempted to convert.

It's a challenge finding anyone in the desert south, but the security forces have had some success. The local police have contacts, and can call in favors. Some tribes or clans don't like these arrogant northerners, and pass information to the cops. Even some of the bandits are displeased with the competition. The Americans are lending surveillance capability and more information. Thus the war has not ended, it's just moved to the Big Empty.

January 7, 2010: There's only been one terrorist attack in the last five months, and police believe that most al Qaeda groups (cells of a few, to a few dozen terrorists) have fled south. Over 200 terrorists are believed to have gone south. Some individuals have gone to Europe, but that's expensive. Going south into the desert is a desperate move, and apparently many al Qaeda members deserted, rather than go. South is the Sahara desert. It is not one huge expanse of sand, but contains mountains, oases, and, as you near the borders of Algeria's southern neighbors, semi-arid grasslands. The south is thinly populated. Tribes are more important, as are groups of bandits and smugglers. With enough money, you can survive, Money talks, which accounts for the increase in kidnappings down there. The main victims are foreign (often Western) tourists or foreign aid workers. This is a common solution for terrorists who are short of money. But this is not bringing in enough money to support a lot of terrorists, and the desertions continue. There is also growing friction with locals, who do not appreciate getting lectured to (about proper Islamic lifestyle) by a bunch of outsiders. For this reason, the al Qaeda groups tend to move around, before they become too unpopular in any one spot.

January 8, 2010: Ten Islamic terrorists were killed in an ambush 400 kilometers east of the capital. The Algerian employee of a Canadian company, who was kidnapped a few days ago, was freed. The Canadian firm has been operating in Algeria for 40 years, building water treatment, and other infrastructure projects. The firm has long been the target of Islamic radicals, but the violence has declined greatly in the last decade. It's believed that kidnapping attacks are the work of criminals, not terrorists.

January 11, 2010: Police are searching the capital for a group of terrorists. In the last few days, two terrorists were killed in a police ambush, and two army officers died when they accidentally encountered some of the terrorists fleeing the search.

January 17, 2010: The management of the state oil company, Sonatrach, including the chief executive, are under investigation for corruption. This is a big deal, because it's widely known that the state oil company has been regularly plundered by state officials. But it's a long way from investigating to putting people in jail. Most people believe that this investigation is mainly for show.

January 28, 2010: It's estimated that 100-200 Islamic terrorists are operating in the south, along the Mauritania, Mali, and Niger borders. It's desert and semi-desert down there. Thinly populated by independent minded tribes, it's hard to hunt down outsiders who can afford to pay the locals for sanctuary. The tribesmen tend to be religiously conservative, and anti-government, so the Islamic terrorists are seen as more than just generous guests. But the tribes are not eager to get caught in the middle of major counter-terror operations. So the terrorists can hide in the desolate south, but they can't really operate there. And the damned Americans are always listening, and watching, with their satellites, UAVs and electronic eavesdropping aircraft. So communicating while hiding with the tribes is difficult. Couriers are the safest way to communicate, but also the slowest and most expensive.

February 18, 2010: While Algeria is still listed (by risk management experts) as one of the top ten Islamic terror sites, the reality is that the terrorists have been driven away from the population centers. Several hundred Islamic terrorists appear to be still active, but these are either hiding, in small groups, in the mountains and forest areas along the coast, or have fled to the desert areas farther south. Despite having thousands of supporters among the general population, the terrorists are largely broke, and resort to crime to maintain themselves. In the south, there have been some kidnappings of Western tourists, but this has brought intense police and military attention, as the nations bordering Algeria do not want to lose the lucrative (and formerly growing) tourist business. Islamic terrorists are generally bad for tourism, as one of the goals of Islamic radicals is to purge Islamic society of all non-Islamic elements. That includes non-Moslem tourists. As many as 30 tourists have been taken in the last three years, and the heat is on the kidnappers, especially the 200 or so Islamic radicals who showed the local tribes how you can make big bucks with foreigners. In any event, the terrorists are not obsessed with ransoms, and will kill hostages just to score some media attention for their cause (world Islamic domination).

While outsiders focus on terrorism within Algeria, the locals are more concerned with corruption and incompetence in the government. Algeria is basically a dictatorship, run by the families of the key rebel leaders who took credit (not always deserved) for getting the French colonial government out half a century ago. The rebel leaders promised democracy and prosperity, but despite the presence of oil and an educated (by Arab standards) population, neither happened. The people are still waiting, growing angrier the longer they are put off by their liberators. The next round of violence will have nothing to do with religion.

February 18, 2010: In neighboring Niger, the military overthrew the elected president. Algeria protested, and braced for more Islamic terrorist activity in Niger, now that the army will be distracted with politics.

February 22, 2010: Algeria and Cuba has signed an agreement to cooperate in biotechnology research. Cuba has built up quite a genetic engineering capability.

February 23, 2010: Mali agreed to release four known Islamic terrorists, in order to obtain the release of a French citizen taken hostage by al Qaeda last November. Mauritania and Algeria protested the release of the four terrorists, and withdrew their ambassadors. The Mali Islamic terrorists still hold three Spanish and two Italian citizens. France had denied paying a ransom or pressuring Mali to release the terrorists, in order to get the French prisoner free. But it looks like that, as the French have done this sort of thing before. The locals are upset, because this encourages more terrorist kidnapping, and ransom money pays for more violence that gets more locals killed.

February 25, 2010: In the capital, a retired army officer killed the head of the national police, colonel Ali Tounsi. The killer was then shot. The killer was later reported as deranged, but the death of Ali Tounsi was seen as a deliberate act, to send a message to the old guard in the police and army, that it was time to step aside and let a younger generation run things.
Tounsi was a veteran of the fight against colonial France half a century ago, and has held his current job for about a decade.

February 26, 2010: In the south, Mauritanian soldiers stopped a convoy of light trucks and SUVs near the Algerian border. A gun battle ensured, with three men in the convoy killed. Among the 18 men in the convoy were some Algerians, and others, associated with Islamic terrorist groups in Algeria. The main mission of the convoy was apparently the transportation of cocaine to the north.

March 2, 2010: The recent murder of national police chief colonel Ali Tounsi is believed part of a power struggle between president Bouteflika (in power since 1999) and senior police and military officers (in power since the 1960s). Bouteflika wants to retire many of the old (old very old) officers, and replace with younger (and more loyal) officers. The older officers have responded with a vigorous anti-corruption campaign, specifically targeting Bouteflika allies. While the cops and soldiers are just as corrupt, Bouteflika does not want to go too far with these corruption investigations. After all, there's big money at stake, and the risk of losing key political allies.

March 17, 2010: In the capital, a court convicted nine men of terrorist activities (from killing to recruiting) and issued sentences of from 18 months to 20 years. Some of the cases were three years old. There are few new cases.

To justify not cooperating, Algeria insists Morocco is not a Sahel (the semi desert band of land south of the Sahara) state. While technically true, Morocco is also very much infested by Islamic radicals, and has its hands full keeping its Islamic radicals under control. Algeria only cooperates in rare and desperate (for Algeria) cases. Much international pressure is being applied to Algeria to cooperate with Morocco. But four decades of hostility is difficult to overcome. Meanwhile, terrorists are exploiting this, using Morocco and Algeria to move drugs and weapons. The lack of cooperation between the two nations makes it more difficult to hunt down and catch the smugglers and terrorists. While the local al Qaeda franchise is turning into a bunch of apolitical gangsters, many members still yearn to kill for the cause. So when these gangs make enough money, Algerian police expect to see them trying to organize more urban terror bombings.

March 18, 2010: Government efforts to foster regional cooperation, to chase down Islamic radicals trying to hide out in desert border areas, has run into a snag. Algeria does not want to deal with Morocco (which is willing to work with Algeria). It's all about a dispute over territory bordering both countries. The "West Sahara", a large strip of sparsely inhabited desert south of Morocco, along the Atlantic coast, was annexed by Morocco in the 1960s, and this was disputed by some of the half million residents, who were backed by Algeria. The locals lost, and Algeria is a sore loser.

April 3, 2010: Islamic terrorists ambushed men guarding a work crew (building an electrical transmission line) 250 kilometers east of the capital and killed seven of the security guards. Far to the south, just across the border in Mali, an anti-vehicle mine went off and injured five soldiers (who were sent to the nearest hospital, which was in Algeria.) The mine was believed to belong to Mali tribal rebels, who have made peace, but not retrieved all the mines they planted.

April 4, 2010: Police have arrested several people in the far south, who were providing supplies for Islamic terrorists living out in the desert. The group bought supplies and then left them in hidden caches where the terrorists could find them. The leader of the group was from Mali, and had enough money to hire helpers, and purchase the goods.

Some 50 kilometers east of the capital, a roadside bomb went off, killing one and wounding two. The target was a military convoy.

April 7, 2010: The government has signed a treaty with the United States, where both nations will share information on criminal activity. The main purpose of this is to make it difficult for criminals from either country to travel to the other one to hide. The treaty sets up communications between law enforcements agencies in both nations, and rules for exchanging information.

April 12, 2010: The government signed 25 economic agreements with Syria. Both nations are military dictatorships, and have similar problems trying to run a market economy and keep the ruling groups in power despite popular opposition and Islamic radicals.

The government is still working out the details on a huge (over $7 billion) arms deal with Russia. This will be paid for using revenue from Algeria's natural gas sales, and Russia will also sell technology and technical assistance for that industry as well. Russia is the major supplier of natural gas to Europe.

Most Algerians live in urban areas, and they have plenty of contact with the government. These Algerians are not happy with the continuing corruption and domination of the government by a few hundred families (descendents of the men who led the rebellion against France 60 years ago). The ruling families face a problem with their supporters (whom they share the oil wealth with), who want more than the little that is available (mainly from oil and natural gas sales). As a result, the government and military are splitting into factions. This growing lack of unity could be fatal if popular unrest grew.

April 13, 2010: Most Islamic terrorists have fled to the far south, deep into the Sahara desert. It's not just the security forces that are responsible for this, but the loss of popular support as well. This is particularly true out in the countryside, where the police rarely show up and the government presence is very light. For decades, these rural Algerians lived in fear of the Islamic radicals, who demanded silence (to the police) and material support (food, shelter, cash) for themselves. The terrorists would beat, kidnap or kill villagers that resisted. That has backfired, and now the rural villagers are increasingly hostile to, and active against, the Islamic radicals. The terror tactics don't work anymore, not because the people are now armed, but mainly because the people have had enough and won't put up with it anymore.

April 17, 2010: Islamic terrorists freed an elderly Algerian kidnap victim, when locals united to protest the crime. The area of the crime, about a hundred kilometers east of the capital, had long been full of al Qaeda sympathizers, but opposition has grown because the Islamic radicals have increasingly turned to crime to support themselves. This kidnapping took a particularly popular local businessman, and the Islamic terrorists soon realized that keeping the man would only further enrage the locals.

April 20, 2010: A French tourist and his Algerian driver were kidnapped in northern Niger, near the Mali and Algerian border.

April 27, 2010: Algeria, Mali, Mauritania and Niger have formed a counter-terrorism forces, with headquarters in southern Algeria, near the town of Tamanrasset (2,000 kilometers south of the capital). Currently, the joint force has about 25,000 troops available, and this will expand to 75,000 in the next two years.

April 29, 2010: The Algerian driver for a kidnapped French tourist, was released in the Niger desert, near the Algerian border. The Frenchman is still be held, apparently for ransom.

May 3, 2010: Some 250 kilometers east of the capital, two roadside bombs left seven security guards and a soldier dead.

May 5, 2010: Al Qaeda has apparently raised millions of dollars from ransoms for Europeans kidnapped in the desert near the south Algerian border. Two Italians were recently released, but two Spaniards are still being held. Governments will not admit to paying the large ransoms (as this is known to support the terrorist operations and encourage more kidnappings), but the money is being paid because of the intense political, popular and media pressure back home.

May 6, 2010: Al Qaeda is demanding the release of an unspecified number of Islamic terrorists, in North Africa and France, in exchange for a 78 year old French tourist it had kidnapped in Mali in April. Al Qaeda will probably later settle for a cash payment. The Frenchman had travelled to an area near the Algerian border that tourists are advised to stay away from. The Frenchman's driver was later arrested and accused of being part of the kidnapping effort.

May 13, 2010: American, Dutch, and Spanish special operations troops have been training counter-terrorism forces from Mali and Senegal. The U.S. is also helping the nations along Algeria's southern border build a communications network, and a set of protocols, so that Islamic terrorists operating in the area can't escape by simply crossing a border.

May 14, 2010: Soldiers cornered and killed three Islamic terrorists, and captured another, in a forest 350 kilometers east of the capital.

May 19, 2010: A roadside bomb, 55 kilometers east of the capital, killed two soldiers and wounded 18.

May 24, 2010: Upset with long delivery times and hassles over human rights issues, the military announced that it would reduce arms purchases from the United States, and buy similar weapons from Russia (which is prompt, cheaper, pays bribes, and doesn't care about bad behavior). The Russian weapons are not as effective. But Algeria only expects to use this stuff against terrorists, Algerian rebels or neighboring countries. So high quality weapons are not really necessary. Plus it feels nice to stick it to those self-righteous Americans.

May 25, 2010: In Mauritania, a court sentenced three al Qaeda members to death, for the attack on five French tourists in 2007 (which left four of them dead.) Sentences like this are thought to discourage others from joining al Qaeda.

Algeria has a growing problem with another form of Islamic radicalism. Iran has been sending missionaries, armed with lots of cash, and engaged in aggressive attempts to convert Sunnis there, to the militant brand of Shia Islam favored in Iran. This kind of missionary work is forbidden in Algeria, but Iran keeps dangling the prospect of nuclear energy (and weapons) technology in front of Algeria, to keep the heat off the Shia missionaries. Algeria allows Algerian religious students to go to school in Iran, but fifty of these Algerian students recently converted to Shia Islam, causing an uproar back home. Shia missionary activity so angered neighboring Morocco, that diplomatic relations with Iran were cut last year. Morocco has also cracked down on Wahabi missionaries (Sunni radicals) from Saudi Arabia, and Islamic radicals in general.

May 31, 2010: While Morocco and Algeria cooperate on terrorism issues, their 1,600 kilometer border remains closed (since 1994, when Algerian terrorists attacked a Moroccan mountain resort.) Morocco still believes the Algerian government had something to do with the 1994 attack, which is linked to a 35 year old land dispute (the Western Sahara). Morocco has tried to make nice, but Algerian paranoia and resentment keeps getting in the way. Long held grudges are a common problem in the region.

June 11, 2010: A hundred kilometers east of the capital, a suicide bomber drove a truck into a police base (for SWAT/rapid reaction forces), killing nine people (four policemen, three terrorists, one local civilian and a Chinese man from a local construction project.) Two of the terrorists were in another vehicle behind the truck bomb, apparently armed and for exploiting the explosion. But police security prevented the two terrorist vehicles from getting as close as the terrorists wanted.

June 24, 2010: Near the Tunisian border, gunmen opened fire on a wedding celebration, killing five. Police believe the attackers were al Qaeda, and are searching for the killers (who are apparently known to the cops.) There hasn't been any violence like this in the area for over a year.

The drug smuggling is actually handled by Arab gangsters that are not terrorists. Al Qaeda gets paid lots of money to provide security for the drugs as they make the long run through the Sahara. The Tuareg provide local knowledge of the terrain, and people, at least in the far south. Meanwhile, along the border, Islamic radicals openly talk (on their web sites) of planning to overthrow the governments of Algeria, Mauritania and Mali. Given the sorry track record against Algeria, Islamic terrorism in Algeria's neighbors is seen more of a nuisance than real threat. In the more populated northern Algeria, the Islamic terrorists are able to launch one or two operations a month, and spend most of their time dodging army and police efforts to find the terrorist bases (mostly in rural areas.)

Islamic militants are believed to be building fortified bunkers in the mountains along the Mali border. They are doing this in cooperation with local tribal groups, who provide cover. Local security forces on both sides of the border are always out hunting for Islamic terrorists, so no one down there openly identifies themselves as such. But an increasing number of known Islamic terrorists from the north have been killed, captured or spotted in the south, and especially along the Mali border. The Islamic radicals are armed, and have turned to kidnapping foreigners and drug smuggling to pay for supplies, bribes and gifts for their new tribal buddies. Foreigners have been warned to stay out of the area, but there are always a small number of them too dumb, or adventurous, to stay away. The Islamic terrorists are believed to be helping move 50-100 tons of cocaine (and other drugs) a year, north to Mediterranean ports. Some of the smuggling fees are shared with local tribesmen, who have long engaged in some smuggling on the side. But the drugs are very valuable cargoes, and the Islamic radicals had the international connections (all up and down the coast of West Africa, as well as in South America) to put this deal together. The local tribes are suitably impressed. So are Western counter-terror forces. While there are only believed to be a few hundred Islamic terrorists operating along Algeria's southern border, there are nearly as many American Special Forces to the south, training African troops and police on the best methods for hunting and killing the newly arrived (in the last few years) Islamic terrorists. The relations with the local tribes, especially the powerful Tuareg, are complicated. The Tuareg are not fond of Islamic terrorism, but young Tuareg are allowed to work with al Qaeda as hired guns. The pay is good, and, so far, not too dangerous. But the young Tuareg are picking up some radical ideas from their al Qaeda bosses, and that is causing some tension with tribal leaders.

June 26, 2010: The government has concluded their $7.5 billion weapons and equipment purchase deal with Russia. Included are a wide range of equipment, for ground, naval and air forces. Over the last two decades, the armed forces have not replaced a lot of their gear needed for conventional war. Most of defense spending went into filling the needs of police and paramilitary forces fighting Islamic terrorists.

June 30, 2010: Near the Mali border, vehicles carrying eleven police were ambushed by al Qaeda gunmen. All eleven policemen were killed. Their weapons and equipment were stolen. This was the worst Islamic terror attack in Algeria so far this year, and is indicative of how the terrorists have been driven out of the populous north, and driven into the southern deserts.

Algeria is getting more cooperation from its southern neighbors (Mali, Mauritania and Niger) because of the Algerian Islamic terror groups that are now operating on both sides of the border. Of particular concern for Mali, Mauritania and Niger is the fact that the Islamic militants have lots of money (from Islamic charities or criminal activities like drug smuggling and kidnapping). Of particular concern is how the al Qaeda groups offer to buy foreign kidnap victims from local tribes, and then use their better international connections to get a large ransom. The local tribes have long stayed away from kidnapping, because their villages and families are vulnerable to government retaliation. But the Islamic terrorist groups are just a bunch of heavily armed guys living rough out in the deserts and mountains. Just take their money and leave them alone. But this makes it more lucrative to grab foreign visitors, and this has ruined the tourist trade in northern Mali, Mauritania and Niger.

July 13, 2010: Mali has allowed Algeria to pursue Islamic terrorists across their mutual border, into Mali. The border is largely desert and thinly populated, so the risk to Mali civilians is small when these cross border pursuits do occur. Mali made this offer in response to the June 30 ambush of an Algerian police patrol. In the past, Algeria has not even asked for this kind of "hot pursuit" capability.

July 21, 2010: Aircraft were seen circling a remote part of the Mali-Niger border, and gunfire was heard. This was apparently a military operation against al Qaeda groups trying to maintain bases in the area.

July 22, 2010: In Mauritania, local troops, assisted by French forces, attacked an al Qaeda camp near the Mali border. Six terrorists were killed and considerable equipment and documents were captured. This was an attempt to rescue a French aid worker who had been taken prisoner four months earlier.

In Mali, French assisted local forces ended a four day operation against elusive al Qaeda groups in the border areas. At least 150 al Qaeda are believed operating in Mali, in a dozen or more different groups.

July 25, 2010: In eastern Algeria, near the coast, a suicide bomber attack against a police station only killed the bomber and a security guard. Al Qaeda took credit for the attack.

France declared war on al Qaeda forces operating along Algeria's southern border. This is in response to the al Qaeda murder of a French aid worker two days ago. Al Qaeda said this was in retaliation for a French led attack on an al Qaeda camp on the 22nd. The 78 year old Frenchman was kidnapped four months ago in Niger, then taken to Mali and moved around after that to avoid rescue. The terrorists were demanding the release of imprisoned terrorists, and threatened to kill the hostage by next week if the demands were not met. France had no intention of releasing any terrorists, as that would just encourage more kidnappings.

July 27, 2010: Mauritania has mobilized thousands of police and soldiers to tighten control of its Algerian and Mali border crossings. This is in reaction to rumors and intel reports of increased al Qaeda activity in the area.

The Algerian government is having a harder time hiding incidents of corruption among members of the ruling party, and their families. Favoritism (for jobs and contracts) and outright theft are increasingly spotlighted via the growing number of people with cell phones and Internet access. Even newspapers are reporting more of this, much to the discomfort of the government.

July 30, 2010: French counter-terrorism commanders believe that the 78 year old Frenchman al Qaeda claims to have kidnapped, and recently killed, actually died of a heart problem. The French are trying to find the body, and the al Qaeda men who were holding the hostage. France has been quietly assisting in the battle against al Qaeda in the Sahel region (semi-desert land just south of the Sahara) for years. But now that assistance will be greater and more public. The U.S. has also been assisting, but not with troops. America has provided training, weapons and equipment.

August 1, 2010: The army cleared 5,960 landmines from eastern and western border areas. This effort was made possible by the French finally turning over the maps of minefields they planted in the 1950s and 60s.

August 6, 2010: Al Qaeda assassins killed the uncooperative mayor of a town fifty kilometers east of the capital. The Islamic terrorist seek to force local officials to back off from helping counter-terrorism efforts.

August 9, 2010: Soldiers killed an Islamic terrorist 110 kilometers east of the capital, and went in search of the camp the dead terrorist came from.

August 10, 2010: West of the capital, five soldiers were wounded when a newly planted landmine went off. The mine apparently belonged to a local al Qaeda group that is buying mines on the black market, and using them to protect their camps and drug smuggling operations.

August 14, 2010: Bomb experts dismantled three bombs, found 54 kilometers east of the capital. The bombs were sound as troops searched the local forests for al Qaeda camps and weapons caches.

August 16, 2010: Police arrested seven Libyans and accused them of being Islamic terrorists.

August 19, 2010: Three soldiers were killed by a roadside bomb that was set off 60 kilometers east of the capital.

August 26, 2010: About a hundred kilometers east of the capital, troops killed three Islamic terrorists.

August 28, 2010: About a hundred kilometers east of the capital, troops killed seven Islamic terrorists. One soldier was also killed. The al Qaeda groups have long established camps in the mountain forests in this region. The police and army constantly hunt for the camps.

September 1, 2010: A suicide truck bomb went off near a military convoy, east of the capital. Two soldiers were killed and over twenty wounded. Al Qaeda later took credit for the attack.

The drug smuggling is actually handled by Arab gangsters that are not terrorists. Al Qaeda gets paid lots of money to provide security for the drugs as they make the long run through the Sahara. The Tuareg provide local knowledge of the terrain, and people, at least in the far south. Meanwhile, along the border, Islamic radicals openly talk (on their web sites) of planning to overthrow the governments of Algeria, Mauritania and Mali. Given the sorry track record against Algeria, Islamic terrorism in Algeria's neighbors is seen more of a nuisance than real threat. In the more populated northern Algeria, the Islamic terrorists are able to launch one or two operations a month, and spend most of their time dodging army and police efforts to find the terrorist bases (mostly in rural areas.)

Al Qaeda has established a lucrative cocaine smuggling operation in West Africa. As a result, the Islamic militants are believed to be building fortified bunkers in the mountains along the Mali border. They are doing this in cooperation with local tribal groups, who provide cover. Local security forces on both sides of the border are always out hunting for Islamic terrorists, so no one down there openly identifies themselves as such. But an increasing number of known Islamic terrorists from the north have been killed, captured or spotted in the south, and especially along the Mali border. The Islamic radicals are armed, and have turned to kidnapping foreigners and drug smuggling to pay for supplies, bribes and gifts for their new tribal buddies. Foreigners have been warned to stay out of the area, but there are always a small number of them too dumb, or adventurous, to stay away. The Islamic terrorists are believed to be helping move 50-100 tons of cocaine (and other drugs) a year, north to Mediterranean ports. Some of the smuggling fees are shared with local tribesmen, who have long engaged in some smuggling on the side. But the drugs are very valuable cargoes, and the Islamic radicals had the international connections (all up and down the coast of West Africa, as well as in South America) to put this deal together. The local tribes are suitably impressed. So are Western counter-terror forces. While there are only believed to be a few hundred Islamic terrorists operating along Algeria's southern border, there are nearly as many American Special Forces to the south, training African troops and police on the best methods for hunting and killing the newly arrived (in the last few years) Islamic terrorists. The relations with the local tribes, especially the powerful Tuareg, are complicated. The Tuareg are not fond of Islamic terrorism, but young Tuareg are allowed to work with al Qaeda as hired guns. The pay is good, and, so far, not too dangerous. But the young Tuareg are picking up some radical ideas from their al Qaeda bosses, and that is causing some tension with tribal leaders.

The contested area is largely desert, and has a population of less than 300,000. Logic would have it that the area is better off as a part of Morocco. But there are still thousands of locals who would rather fight for independence, than submit to Morocco. Some resistance of this is tribal, with the Moroccans seen as another bunch of alien invaders (the area was administered, until 1976, as a Spanish colony). If the fighting breaks out again, possibly inspired by Islamic radicals, it could go on for years, just as it does in many other parts of Africa, and the immediate neighborhood.

Polisario is an armed rebel group that could prove very useful to al Qaeda. Back in 1991, Morocco finally won the war against Polisario Front rebels, who were seeking independence for the Western Sahara (a region south of Morocco). Polisario is powerful in Mauritania, where the rebel group has official recognition and maintains several refugee camps. Because Polisario was so well-subsidized by Algeria, back when Algeria was a radical state, Polisario still has enough diehards out there to keep lots of people in Western Sahara unhappy. This provides a potential resource for al Qaeda and other Islamic radicals. For two decades, the UN has been trying and work out a final peace deal between Polasario and Morocco. In the 1990s, Algeria cut off all support for Polasario. But that, and UN efforts to mediate the differences, have just not worked.

September 7, 2010: Al Qaeda is using cash, and coercion, to increase its power in the area south of Algeria. This can be seen in how al Qaeda arranged the release of one of their members (Omar Ahmed Ould Sidi Ould Hama) from a Mauritanian prison last month. This was apparently part of a secret deal to get two Spanish aid workers released by al Qaeda. Hama was aided by the intercession of UN recognized rebel group Polisario, and officials in Mali (where Hama was expelled to) who looked the other way as Hama promptly disappeared. Malian officials and Polisario have both been seduced by al Qaeda cash. Hama had been convicted of masterminding the kidnapping of three Spanish aid workers in late 2009, and sentenced to life. Now he is free again.

September 12, 2010: Security forces battled Islamic terrorists 600 kilometers east of the capital, killing two of them and wounding several more.

September 16, 2010: Islamic terrorists in Niger kidnapped five French citizens and two Niger associates, who worked at a French-run uranium mine. The thirty armed men and their captives were last seen driving off towards Mali and Algeria. The mines employ 2,500 people, including fifty foreigners and has been operating since the 1970s.

September 19, 2010: Mauritanian troops attacked al Qaeda gunmen in northern Mali (250 kilometers west of Timbuktu.) The fighting left 12 terrorists and eight soldiers dead. The terrorists suffered more wounded and captured.

Al Qaeda in North Africa released an audio recording on the Internet, taking credit for the recent kidnapping of five French citizens in Niger. There was no other proof.

September 22, 2010: A roadside bomb went off 79 kilometers east of the capital, killing two policemen.

The government has been resisting efforts to fight corruption. Anti - corruption activists are being harassed and prosecuted, usually on trumped up charges.

The government is prosecuting two Christian construction workers for openly breaking the Ramadan fast. Many Moslem nations have laws that punish those violating religious customs. During the month of Ramadan, all Moslems are not supposed to not eat or drink during daylight. Non-Moslems are expected to not eat or drink in public during Ramadan. The two construction workers were eating their lunch at a construction site when they were arrested. Algeria has prosecuted, or persecuted, its Christian minority before. According to the government, the Algerian political system is secular. But religion is still important. The area where the two Christians were arrested on the 13th, is largely Berber. An increasing number of Berbers are converting to Christianity, as a protest against the continued persecution of Berbers. The government says that only 11,000 (out of 34 million) Algerians are Christian. But Christian religious leaders say the number is 30,000 and growing fast, especially among Berbers. The government fears these Berber Christians. The Berbers, a people related to the ancient Egyptians, were the original occupants of Algeria. Arab armies conquered the country over a thousand years ago, but, unlike other Arab conquests, most Berbers did not adopt Arab language and customs. Today, about a third of Algerians are Berbers, and speak the Berber language, Tamazight. There has always been tension between Berbers and Arabs, and now Berbers are demanding that their language be made one of Algeria's official languages. The Arab dominated government refuses to consider this. Berbers are now demonstrating to protest the prosecution of the two Berber Christians.

Algeria warned France not to pay a ransom to Islamic terrorists in order to get the five French uranium mine employees back. Officials point out that a lot of the recent al Qaeda activity has been paid with ransom money.
Algeria is particularly incensed at the ten million dollars quietly paid by Spain to Islamic radicals earlier this year to free three Spanish hostages taken in Mauritania and moved to Mali. Italy has also paid millions to Islamic militants in the past two years, to recover their citizens. The U.S., France and Britain say they do not pay ransoms, as it only encourages kidnappers. France believes some of the ransom millions paid to Islamic terrorists in the last year is financing planned terror attacks inside France.

September 24, 2010: French anti-terrorism officials warn of possible terror attacks in France, by North Africa based Islamic terrorists. France has sent reconnaissance aircraft and commandos to Niger to help find those who recently kidnapped uranium mine employees. The al Qaeda threat to the uranium operations there is a matter of great importance. Nuclear plants generate 80 percent of electricity in France, and the two mines in Niger produce most of the nuclear fuel for these plants (and seven percent of global production.)

September 29, 2010: Al Qaeda released a video showing the five Frenchmen they had kidnapped in Niger last month. The Islamic terror group wants a large ransom, but if that is paid, the group can carry out even more attacks and kidnappings. Meanwhile, there is enormous media pressure in France to get the five men released any way possible.

The four nations are also cutting deals with the tribes along the smuggling routes, and the smugglers themselves, to obtain information on the Islamic terrorists. This is a tricky business because the smugglers, who have long moved cigarettes, drugs and other heavily taxed, but portable, items across borders, are now caught between local police and heavily armed al Qaeda. But the Islamic radicals are seen as just another gang, or bunch of gangs, by the tribesmen. Al Qaeda has already started to annoy the tribes with their religious righteousness and ruthless attitudes. The tribesmen make good money for helping to move the cocaine north, but the al Qaeda fanatics are making themselves unwelcome.

The four nations running the new intel center would like more help from Western nations, particularly the United States. But because of the corruption in these African nations, you have to be careful what you give them, lest it end up on the intel black market. The susceptibility to bribes also means that the African intel agencies can be breached by al Qaeda itself. The African intel agencies don't like to discuss the corruption problem, and publicly deny that it exists. But it does. This corruption issue is at the heart of a struggle between France and Algeria for leadership of anti-terrorism efforts in the region. The French have better resources, but the Algerians are local. Then again, the Algerians have an ancient reputation for treating their southern (more African and less Arab) neighbors badly, and this still causes tension.

September 30, 2010: Senior intelligence officials from Mali, Niger, Mauritania and Algeria met in Algeria and worked out a deal to set up a joint anti-terrorism intelligence center in Algeria. Here, intel on terrorists from all four nations would be pooled, analyzed and shared. Command of the center would rotate among the four nations. Last March, Algeria hosted counter-terrorism officials from Burkina Faso, Chad, Libya, Mali, Mauritania and Niger, but was only able to get vague promises that everyone would "coordinate."

October 2, 2010: East of the capital, Islamic terrorists used a roadside bomb to kill five soldiers and wound ten. Troops continue to scour the coastal mountains, extending several hundred kilometers east of the capital, for small groups of Islamic radicals.

October 6, 2010: The president of Russia visited Algeria and signed six, largely minor, agreements. Algeria is buying more of its military gear from Russia, and allowing Russian firms to invest in developing Algerian oil and gas deposits.

Algeria is proud of their victory over an Islamic rebellion, even though diehard extremists continue to operate. It's been five years since the peace and amnesty deal with terrorists went into effect in Algeria. Since then, over 7,500 Islamic terrorists accepted the amnesty and surrendered, and nearly 1,300 who continued to fight, were killed. The Islamic radical groups appeared to be on their way to extinction, when they were rescued by a shift in cocaine distribution networks (from the North Atlantic to West Africa and overland to the Mediterranean coast). The new route provided al Qaeda with a lucrative opportunity to earn cash guarding the drug shipments, and get close to smugglers in the region. This provided contacts and access to illegal weapons. West Africa has become a new playground for the Islamic terrorists, and that enables them to keep operations going further to the north in Algeria.

October 10, 2010: France has commandos and reconnaissance forces (aircraft, intel specialists) in Burkina Faso, Mali and Niger, to help in the search for five Frenchmen kidnapped by al Qaeda last month in Niger. The captives are believed to be held in Mali, and France is trying to work out deals with local Tuareg tribesmen to locate and free the captives. This much French military force on Algeria's southern border is annoying to Algeria, but seen as politically essential to France, which must demonstrate that it can protect its citizens working in the region.

October 12, 2010: A bomb went off in a town near the Tunisian border, leaving five government officials who had come to inspect a building project (new ho

October 25, 2010: Just outside the capital, a roadside bomb killed two soldiers and wounded three others. Nearby, another such bomb was found and disarmed.

October 30, 2010: A roadside bomb killed a soldier and wounded two others, some 120 kilometers east of the capital.

Islam is the state religion of Algeria, although freedom to practice other religions is supposed to be guaranteed. This is not enough for many Islamic conservatives in the government. There have been an increasing number of prosecutions of Moslems, and non-Moslems, for religious offenses. Recently, a Moslem man was sentenced to two years in prison for breaking the Ramadan fast last August. Each year, there is a month long period (Ramadan) where Moslems are supposed to fast during daylight. In some Moslem countries, police punish those who do not observe the fast. In Algeria, Christians have been prosecuted for not fasting during Ramadan, although higher courts have ruled against these convictions. Algeria, like all Islamic nations, has its religious conservatives. These are usually a large minority of the population, and the government often accommodates the conservatives in an attempt to prevent the appearance of Islamic radicals and terrorists. But because the Internet and satellite TV now provides Islamic radicals propaganda and connections, this accommodation approach no longer seems to work.

The U.S. and France are trying to discreetly help Algeria, Mali, Niger and Mauritania deal with the problems al Qaeda has introduced. As outlaws, al Qaeda is hostile to all these local governments. If al Qaeda were not concentrating on its drug and kidnapping business, it would be trying to overthrow these governments and impose a religious dictatorship. But this did not work in Algeria, and it definitely would not work with these Sahel (the semi-desert region between the Sahara and the tropical grasslands and jungles to the south) nations. The Sahel states are more diverse and less well organized. And they are generally hostile to al Qaeda, and even some of the rebellious tribes give the Islamic terrorist groups a hard time. But money, guns and religious fanaticism are a potent combination. France and the U.S. are providing aerial and electronic surveillance to find out exactly where al Qaeda is hiding, while both nations also provide training for local troops, as well as new equipment. The U.S. and France would like to send their own commandos in to do the job, but this is very unpopular with the local governments, which are all Islamic and fundamentally hostile to non-Moslem soldiers operating in their midst. The Sahel has always been a frontier area, thinly populated and lightly ruled. Cash and guns gives you a lot more power and freedom-of-action in frontier areas than in more densely populated, and heavily policed places like northern Algeria.

October 31, 2010: Al Qaeda has a "good news/bad news" situation in Algeria. The good news, for the terrorists, is that their southern (Sahara desert) faction, led by Abdelhamid Abu Zeid (the "emir of the south") has struck it rich with kidnapping Europeans and guarding cocaine shipments to Europe. This flood of cash is buying protection in the south (tribes and government officials can be bribed) and more resources for terror attacks in the north (where most Algerians live, along the Mediterranean coast).

The bad news (for the terrorists) is that all this money breeds corruption within the terrorist organization as well. This has always been a problem with al Qaeda, especially when there was a lot of money available.
Moslem, and especially Arab, countries are very corrupt, and the terrorist organizations these cultures spawn are no different. This despite the fact that Islamic radicals preach the elimination of corruption. Many of those who preach this, are unable, or unwilling, to practice it when temptation comes along. Al Qaeda in the Sahel is bringing in over $5 million a year. The few hundred al Qaeda down there are hiring more gunmen, and trying to convert these guys to the cause. But the tribesmen down there are wary of these fanatic city boys from the north. They take the money and keep the Islamic terrorists at a distance.

November 3, 2010: The government will resume arming civilian self-defense forces in areas suffering from Islamic terrorist violence.

In southern Algeria, police operations found five Islamic terrorist hideouts and killed six Islamic militants. One of the dead was a known terrorist leader.

November 8, 2010: Moroccan police fought rebellious tribesmen in the disputed Western Sahara, leaving several dozen dead and wounded. Some 2,000 people were arrested. The tribesmen were demonstrating for housing and government jobs. There is fear that the violence will lead to a resumption of the rebellion. Back in 1991, Morocco finally won the war against Polisario Front rebels, who were seeking independence for the Western Sahara (a region south of Morocco). Polisario is powerful in Mauritania, where the rebel group has official recognition and maintains several refugee camps. Because Polisario was so well-subsidized by Algeria, back when Algeria was a radical state, Polisario still has enough diehards out there to keep lots of people in Western Sahara unhappy. This provides a potential resource for al Qaeda and other Islamic radicals. For two decades, the UN has been trying and work out a final peace deal between Polasario and Morocco. In the 1990s, Algeria cut off all support for Polasario. But that, and UN efforts to mediate the differences, have just not worked. The contested area is largely desert, and has a population of less than 300,000. Logic would have it that the area is better off as a part of Morocco. But there are still thousands of locals who would rather fight for independence, than submit to Morocco. Some resistance is tribal and cultural, with the Moroccans seen as another bunch of alien invaders (the area was administered, until 1976, as a Spanish colony). If the fighting breaks out again, possibly inspired by Islamic radicals, it could go on for years, just as it does in many other parts of Africa, and the immediate neighborhood.

November 10, 2010: Britain and Algeria have agreed to regularly exchange intelligence on Islamic terrorism matters, as well as cooperate with counter-terrorism training and technology developments.

November 11, 2010: A roadside bomb went off 120 kilometers east of the capital, hitting a truck carrying security guards, and killed three people. In the south, five teenage Mauritanian members of al Qaeda, operating across the border in Mali, have defected to the Mauritanian government. Al Qaeda has been recruiting the local teenagers, but many of the kids grow disillusioned with the Islamic radicals, and try to get out. Local governments are making it easier for the teenage recruits to defect.

Algeria is warning its southern neighbors Mali, Niger and Mauritania that they are making a mistake by accepting American and French help in dealing with al Qaeda. Mali, Niger and Mauritania disagree, believing al Qaeda is seen more of a criminal gang in the south not, as it is in Algeria, an Islamic radical group.

November 15, 2010: Not surprisingly, considering the large amounts of cash al Qaeda has obtained from kidnapping and drug smuggling operations, there are numerous reports of Arabs seeking to buy weapons in several Sahel (an area just south of the Sahara) countries. The Arab terrorists are approaching criminal gangs or corrupt government officials, and offering high prices, in cash, for weapons and other equipment. Corrupt officials are often reluctant to deal with Islamic terrorists, because counter-terrorism forces often have access to powerful investigative tools that could make life uncomfortable for government officials operating on the edge of the law. But if the price is right, someone will sell. The Arab buyers are believed to have gone as far east as Chad (which borders Sudan).

November 19, 2010: Police found, and killed, the chief al Qaeda financial man in the region, Izza Rezki. He was located in the suburbs of the capital, and refused to be taken alive. Al Qaeda later denied that this was actually Izza Rezki.

November 27, 2010: Two Islamic terrorists were killed some 250 kilometers east of the capital.

November 28, 2010: Troops and Islamic terrorists clashed 200 kilometers west of the capital, leaving four soldiers and two terrorists dead.

The American supported counter-terrorism alliance of Algeria, Mauritania, Mali and Niger has been having more success in tracking the remaining Islamic radical groups, but corruption and bad government in each of these countries ensures that there will always be more terrorist recruits, and ordinary people willing to give some support to the terrorists. Algeria has taken the lead in this coalition, because Algeria defeated a large Islamic radical uprising in the last two decades, and has reduced the Islamic extremists remaining to the same threat level as criminal gangs. Algeria has secretly become a major supporter of American counter-terror operations (at least according to Wiki leaks). Most Arab leaders can't publically admit to working closely with the Americans, as the official line is that America is the enemy because of its support for Israel.

December 7, 2010: In the rural areas 100-300 kilometers east of the capital, people are becoming more angry over the continued presence of al Qaeda groups. The Islamic radicals support themselves through theft, kidnapping and extortion. Although there aren't many of these radicals (a few hundred at most), they need a steady supply of cash to maintain their camps in the mountains. Cell phones and the Internet enable the al Qaeda recruiters to connect with new prospects, and replenish the losses from the constant army patrols. But most of the al Qaeda recruits are from the cities, and the rural population is getting fed up with this and even conducting demonstrations demanding more police and army action against the terrorists.

December 8, 2010: Over the last few days, troops from Mali and Mauritanian captured 13 drug smugglers, and killed two. Most of these men were found to be members of the Polisario Front, and operators of a major drug smuggling operation (moving cocaine from Guinea-Bissau, where it is flown in from South America, to the Mediterranean coast). Polisario Front members were known to be involved in smuggling and other illegal activities, but their involvement in moving cocaine was only suspected. This implies cooperation with al Qaeda, which apparently has worked out deals with the Islamic terrorist group.

December 10, 2010: Army sweeps east of the capital left at least ten al Qaeda men dead, and several of their camps destroyed.

December 13, 2010: East of the capital, troops found five al Qaeda hideouts and camps, and killed three terrorists. Those that fled are being pursued.

December 16, 2010: Morocco and Polisario have resumed peace talks, in an attempt to end decades of violence. Polisario has been in bad shape since 1991, when Morocco finally won its war with the Polisario Front rebels, who were seeking independence for the Western Sahara (a region south of Morocco). Polisario remained powerful in Mauritania, where the rebel group has official recognition and maintains several refugee camps. Because Polisario was so well-subsidized by Algeria, back when Algeria was a radical state, Polisario still has enough diehards out there to keep lots of people in Western Sahara unhappy. This was known to provide recruits and sanctuary for al Qaeda and other Islamic radicals. For two decades, the UN has been trying and work out a final peace deal between Polasario and Morocco. In the 1990s, Algeria cut off all support for Polasario. But that, and UN efforts to mediate the differences, have just not worked. The contested area is largely desert, and has a population of less than 300,000. Logic would have it that the area is better off as a part of Morocco. But there are still thousands of locals who would rather fight for independence, than submit to Morocco. Some resistance is tribal and cultural, with the Moroccans seen as another bunch of alien invaders (the area was administered, until 1976, as a Spanish colony). If the fighting breaks out again, possibly inspired by Islamic radicals, it could go on for years, just as it does in many other parts of Africa, and the immediate neighborhood. Getting involved in the cocaine smuggling provides money, some of which goes got guns and vehicles, making the Polisario fighters more formidable.

December 18, 2010: Over the last week, military operations along the coast, 100 kilometers east of the capital, have left a dozen rebels dead. Arrests were also made, and several camps found and shut down. Weapons and documents were captured. Some of the rebels escaped, and are still being sought.

The American supported counter-terrorism alliance of Algeria, Mauritania, Mali and Niger has some intractable problems. Algeria and Mauritania consider themselves Arab (although many Mauritanians consider themselves non-Arab), while Mali and Niger do not. The non-Arabs are either black Africans or ancient non-Arab tribes, two groups that have never got on well with the Arabs. There's not much trust and a lot of mutual disdain. Then there's the corruption problem. The al Qaeda drug smuggling gangs bribe police and troops wherever possible. Thus captured smugglers are not likely to stay captured long, as negotiations for their release are quickly undertaken. The troops or police who captured the al Qaeda men can get rich by arranging a daring "escape." American anti - terror operatives have to deal with the situation, sometimes getting into a bidding competition to gain access to the captured terrorists.

Operations like this are why more and more al Qaeda operatives are heading south, to join the cocaine smuggling operation in West Africa. But this takes al Qaeda operatives away from Algerian population and government centers. It also turns the terrorists into gangsters, since they can't fight the Algerian government (and overthrow it), from the smuggler bases far to the south. This, as much as anything else, is killing al Qaeda in the region.

December 25, 2010: For most of this month, some 4,000 soldiers and police have been searching areas east of the capital, killing or capturing nearly a hundred al Qaeda members and finding over 20 hideouts and camps. The security forces believe they have destroyed a major part of the al Qaeda network, and gathered information leading to the surviving members of al Qaeda in North Africa. A key factor in the success of this sweep has been the American EP-3 electronic monitoring aircraft (based in Rota, Spain), which have been flying patrols over suspected terrorist base areas for months. The EP-3s can intercept terrorist communications in rural areas, and this provided data, including locations, of the terrorist hideouts and rural camps. These aerial patrols were kept secret, so the terrorists would not limit the use of their radios and cell phones.

December 27, 2010: In the east, four police commanders were arrested for trying to cover up the murder of a man arrested for being drunk. Police are a major source of criminal activity, and the government is under pressure to clean up this problem, and government corruption in general.

December 31, 2010: Counter-terror operations in the last three weeks, east of the capital, killed over fifty al Qaeda terrorists, destroyed several bases arrested dozens of suspects. Large quantities of weapons and documents were captured, revealing the extent of al Qaeda operations in North Africa.

January 4, 2011: In Morocco, police arrested 27 people and accused them of trying to establish a support network for terror attacks, and al Qaeda operations (intelligence, fundraising, training and recruiting) in general.

January 7, 2011: In Niger, Islamic terrorists kidnapped two Frenchmen in the capital. The kidnappers fled towards Mali. Police and French special operations troops took off in pursuit. The kidnappers were caught up with twice, and each time there was gunfire. The kidnappers refused to surrender. The two hostages and most of the kidnappers were killed. Terrorists particularly like to kidnap Westerners, because they can eventually receive ransoms of a million dollars or more per hostage.

To the south, Mali admits that it has a few hundred al Qaeda members are hiding in its northern desert. But Mali is angry at France, and most other Western nations, for declaring northern Mali too dangerous for tourists. Mali is making an effort to develop better relations with the tribes in the north, using economic aid, and more police patrols to chase down bandits (and catch al Qaeda drug smugglers and find terrorist camps). Unfortunately, corruption and incompetence limit the effectiveness of counter-terror operations. Mali doesn't like foreigners to speak openly of these problems, but makes little progress in fixing things.

The government also has problems with income, and fluctuations in oil and gas prices. In 2009, they took in half the oil and gas revenue ($20 billion) as they did in 2007 ($40 billion.) Oil prices have been higher in the past year, but the additional revenue often gets diverted by government officials, and ends up in foreign bank accounts. All this means erratic government spending, higher unemployment and more public unhappiness. Most embarrassing to the government has been the militancy of thousands of maimed military and police veterans, who have been demanding better care and compensation. When veterans demonstrate in the capital, the police are reluctant to act against their injured brethren. But there have been plenty of other demonstrations, by non-veterans, against lack of housing and jobs, which the cops have cracked down on. People are unhappy and frustrated. A recent opinion poll found half of all Algerian males aged 15-34 wanted to get out of the country, permanently. But that is not easy, as people smugglers have to be paid, and most unemployed young Algerians haven't got the cash needed to leave the country. There have been similar riots, for similar reasons, in neighboring Tunisia. But one thing all North African governments are good at is dealing with unruly citizens. Riot police and other paramilitary forces have been able to contain the riots so far.

Despite all the oil money, the economy is sluggish, and it's difficult to start a new business without someone in the government getting a cut. This scares off foreign governments, as does the terrorist violence. The government is trying to change its image, but it cannot change what it is. Even with the sharp decline in Islamic terrorist violence in the last decade, there is still enough violence to make potential investors uneasy. The government corruption is a larger impediment. For example, the government has stalled paying Japanese construction companies nearly 20 percent (over $1.2 billion dollars) of the money due for work done building 400 kilometers of highways.

January 9, 2011: In late December, the government began removing many food price subsidies, forcing people to pay over fifty percent more for things like cooking oil and sugar. Middlemen and distributors were also accused of raising prices still further (beyond normal markups). This is seen as another example of the corruption in government and throughout Algerian society. In the last week, riots broke out in several cities, and so far six people have been killed and over 400 injured. This led the government to rescind most of the prince increases yesterday. The violence was about more than food subsidies. Some 70 percent of the population is under age 30. There is persistent high unemployment among young men. with over a third of men 18-30 are out of work. The government is generally hated because it is basically a self-serving dictatorship pretending to be a democracy.

January 11, 2011: In Tunisia, the government tried to reduce the rioting by closing the universities. But the unrest has spread far beyond the students. Anyone with a cell phone can get connected to demonstration groups leading the unrest.

January 13, 2011: President Ben Ali promised to step down in three years, when he is up for another rigged election. This did not calm things down, as Tunisians are really, really angry at years of corruption and bad government.

Former president Zine El Abedine Ben Ali had banned political parties that would not follow is leadership, and no faction within his group was immediately able to take control. The people want real democracy, and government officials promptly said that would happen.

January 14, 2011: The president (for life) of Tunisia (Zine al Abedine Ben Ali) resigned and fled the country. Ben Ali had been in charge (via a coup) for 23 years. Although there had been escalating demonstrations (against rising prices, and unemployment), Ben Ali believed he could survive it. But when he asked the army to use more force (killing more people) to break up the demonstrations, the army and presidential security commanders refused, and advised Ben Ali to flee.

January 17, 2011: After several days of attempts, a new, interim (until elections can be held in a few months) unity government has been formed. Political prisoners have been released from jail and the new government contains a number of long-time opposition figures. Lots of agendas, lots of opportunities, lots of possibilities. In some prisons, internal unrest has led to all prisoners being let out.

The looted homes of the departed Tunisian president, and those of his extended family, were open to the public. The orderly crowds filing through these palatial residences were appalled at the wealth, especially compared to the poverty most Tunisians have to contend with. Meanwhile, neighborhood militias are forming, mainly to keep gangs of looters out. There aren't enough soldiers and police to guard everything, and priority is being given to state owned buildings (especially utilities and places where weapons are stored.) Some weapons have been stolen, and the government is anxious to placate most people before armed militias appear, and threaten civil war.

The Tunisian uprising is similar to the pattern that played out in Eastern Europe (in 1989), when growing dissatisfaction with communist rule led to more and more demonstrations. The army commanders, leading lots of armed conscripts, knew that ordering the troops to open fire could result in mutiny and civil war. So the generals told their bosses that it was time to shut down the communist police states that had dominated Eastern Europe since the late 1940s. In Arab states, the arrangements are a bit different. There is no communist theology, and Big Brother Russia (Soviet Union) to mould and guide the communist nations. In most Arab countries, a group of able politicians make deals with the wealthier families and agree to run the place for their mutual benefit. Senior government and military officials come from this same small group that represents a few percent of the country. It's all very medieval, with the rest of the population considered ignorant peasants, to be manipulated and taxed indefinitely. But in the last half century, radio, TV, cell phones, the Internet and more education have made the "peasants" all too aware of their situation, and how it can be changed. Once enough people in a dictatorship become desperate, and bold, enough to rise up and throw off their unelected (at least by a fair vote) rulers, the ruling families have a big problems to deal with. This is the first time this has happened in the Arab world (the 2005 uprising in Lebanon was against Syria, not the local ruling clans). Previous uprisings were military takeovers, or one faction of the ruling class forcing out another.

Keeping the ruling families from taking over again will be difficult, because the opposition parties are a varied lot (from communists to Islamic conservatives) that lack experience, financial and organizations resources, unity and money. But the interim government is doing whatever it can to quiet things down, including dropping all restrictions on media and political parties. The interim government is also arresting the most unpopular members of the Ben Ali government, a move that is clearly aimed at defusing popular anger. The prisoners know the drill that they can later buy their way out of jail. But for now, it's best to look contrite and go along.

A month of escalating demonstrations in Tunisia left about 80 people dead. The Internet, particularly Twitter, was mentioned as a key organizing tool for the demonstrators. Cell phones able to access the Internet were another key factor. These forms of mobile, and difficult to block, communication are making it possible for the unrest to continue, in an effort to prevent the ruling families from organizing a new government that will keep the same crowd (that supported Ben Ali) in power. Some countries, when faced with this sort of thing, simply shut down the cell phone systems. But government troops are dependent on cell phones as well, and the army and police radio systems are not sufficient.

January 18, 2011: There has been some large demonstrations in cities in the last week or so, but nothing like what happened in neighboring Tunisia. Algerian security forces have been able to keep the demonstrations under control, but Algerian leaders are nervous. All Arab dictators and monarchs are nervous. Such general uprisings are rare, but they usually end up with the same small (from a few dozen to a few hundred) group of powerful families back in charge. True dictatorship is hard to sustain, as the family coalitions prefer some kind of police state that makes it easier for the powerful families to retain, and expand, their wealth. It has been this way for thousands of years, and the Arab "old rich" are big fans of tradition. There were some large demonstrations in other Arab states, in reaction to those in Tunisia, but nothing large enough to scare the governments into escalating as happened in Tunisia.

January 28, 2011: Larger, and more violent, anti-government demonstrations are showing up in Algeria, in the last two weeks (since the dictatorship in neighboring Tunisia was overthrown). So far, the violence has led to about ten deaths, and over a thousand wounded. The people want economic, and political, justice, and an end to the "emergency rule" (sort of martial law, with increased police powers) that has been in force for two decades. Like their counterparts throughout the Arab world, the demonstrators want competent government, less corruption and more economic growth. The young want jobs, opportunity and a future, things too many of them don't have now.

Algeria, and the other North African nations, are all Arab dictatorships, and all worried about the growing, and increasingly organized, popular demonstrations against the ruling groups. It's basically a revolt of the young (teenage to early 30s) men who suffer high unemployment (often 30 percent or more) and encounter constant reminders that education and talent is no match for political connections when it comes to getting a job.

The dictatorships all operate in the same model. The government is run by a skillful politician who has set up a system whereby those who support the dictatorship get jobs or economic opportunities. In this way, about ten percent can live off the other 90 percent. The problem with this system is that it tends to try and be hereditary, and that means that after a few generations, natural selection sees to it that the ruling class is less able and the unhappy other 90 percent has more political talent, often enough to overthrow the government.

The only problem here is avoiding the leaders of the revolution from establishing another. That is supposed to be avoided via democracy, but some of the democracies established in the wake of the 1989-91 collapse of communist governments turned into dictatorships pretending to be democracies. Most of the Arab states are already doing that, and the patronage and corruption system dictatorships thrive on is more resilient that the dictators themselves. Thus while the dictator of Tunisia (Zine al Abedine Ben Ali) may have been gone for two weeks, thousands of his cronies (government ministers and bureaucrats) are hanging on to power. This will always happen, and is difficult to deal with, as many government employees have needed skills for keeping basic government functions going. In Tunisia, it’s been a struggle in the last two weeks to force out Ben Ali's key henchmen, the guys who actually supervised the details of oppression and corruption. These guys are often less able to flee into comfortable exile, and the further down the food chain you go, the more desperation you will encounter.

Another unique factor in Tunisia was the small size (and budget) of the armed forces. Most Arab dictatorships lavish more money on more soldiers (especially the officers and NCOs). In Tunisia, Ben Ali had little oil wealth or foreign aid for the military, no hostile neighbors, and the officers felt less pampered and loyal, and willing to kill protestors. In Egypt, Libya and Algeria, there are more soldiers more willing to kill for the boss. But in all these nations, most of the soldiers have friends or kin who are unemployed and unhappy. Many children of the ruling class support change, even if it hurts their economic situation. If enough people get caught up in the idea of change, it's hard to stop.

There's been a growing sense among educated, and young, Arabs that the world has passed them by and that it's not someone else's fault. In other words, the problems, and the solutions, are in Arab hands. There have been lots of revolutions in Arab nations over the century, and the only form of government that seems to have any staying power, democracy, has been the least popular. There have been socialist and religious dictatorships, as well as many monarchies (Jordan, Morocco and most Gulf States). And with socialism and Islamic radicalism discredited, the dictatorships are now just plain-old-dictatorships. It's all about the money, and the power to get the money with the least effort.

The leftist and religious radicals are still out there, but the majority of people in the street don't want leftist or religious leaders. They want democracy. The leftists and religious zealots can form parties and participate, but the new idea is to let the people rule the people, for the people. It's a novel idea in the Arab world, and it has the traditional rulers checking their guns, and their offshore bank accounts.

In Algeria, the Islamic terrorist groups continue to flee the security forces, which persist in searching the coastal forests, and southern deserts for them. Most of the Islamic radicals have fled south, or left the country. In the south, there is opportunity in the form of transporting cocaine north to the Mediterranean, where it is smuggled to Europe. A tiny bit of the cocaine stays in North Africa, to supply the small ruling classes. The big market is across the water, in the much larger economies of Europe, and to the east, where the oil wealth of the Persian (or Arabian) Gulf can afford to sustain a lot of mistakes.

January 29, 2011: Several large demonstrations (one with as many as 10,000 people) took place, mainly outside the capital, and in areas, particularly those with large numbers of Berbers, that have always been more hostile to the government. There were sufficient security forces to contain these demonstrations.

February 2, 2011: An Italian woman tourist, along with her driver and tour guide, was kidnapped in the southwestern Sahel are of Algeria. Thousands of other foreign tourists proceeded to flee Algeria (which had implemented new security measures to reassure tourists, whose spending provides at least 50,000 jobs.) The kidnappers were apparently al Qaeda related (although many bandits in the south have taken up kidnapping.)

February 7, 2011: The government has banned a large demonstration in the capital, planned for the 12th.

February 12, 2011: The government has cut off Internet access for Algerians, to try and hinder the organization of larger demonstrations. Some 30,000 troops and police have been moved to the capital to deal with any large demonstrations.

February 14, 2011: Democracy demonstrations took place in the capital and several smaller cities and towns. But none were so large that the security forces could not handle them.

The U.S. and France are trying to discreetly help Algeria, Mali, Niger and Mauritania (as well as Djiboutis, Ethiopians and Somalis in the east) deal with the problems al Qaeda has introduced. As outlaws, al Qaeda is hostile to all these local governments. If al Qaeda were not concentrating on its drug and kidnapping business, it would be trying to overthrow these governments and impose a religious dictatorship. But this did not work in Algeria, and it definitely would not work with these Sahel nations. The Sahel states are more diverse and less well organized. And they are generally hostile to al Qaeda, and even some of the rebellious tribes give the Islamic terrorist groups a hard time. But money, guns and religious fanaticism are a potent combination. France and the U.S. are providing aerial and electronic surveillance to find out exactly where al Qaeda is hiding, while both nations also provide training for local troops, as well as new equipment. The U.S. and France would like to send their own commandos in to do the job, but this is very unpopular with the local governments, which are all Islamic and fundamentally hostile to non-Moslem soldiers operating in their midst. The Sahel has always been a frontier area, thinly populated and lightly ruled. Cash and guns gives you a lot more power and freedom-of-action in frontier areas than in more densely populated, and heavily policed places like northern Algeria.

There is growing fear that Islamic terrorists are trying to establish new base areas in the Sahel (the thousand kilometer wide, semi-desert area south of the Sahara, from the Atlantic coasts of Senegal and Mauritania, through Mali, Burkina Faso, Algeria, Niger, Nigeria, Chad, Sudan, Ethiopia, to the Indian Ocean in Somalia and Eritrea. The Algerian branch of al Qaeda has largely moved to southern (Sahara desert and Sahel) bases. Led by Abdelhamid Abu Zeid (the "emir of the south"), these terrorists have struck it rich with kidnapping Europeans and guarding cocaine shipments to Europe. This flood of cash is buying protection in the south (tribes and government officials can be bribed) and more resources for terror attacks in the north (where most Algerians live, along the Mediterranean coast). The bad news (for the terrorists) is that all this money breeds corruption within the terrorist organization as well. This has always been a problem with al Qaeda, especially when there was a lot of money available. Moslem, and especially Arab, countries are very corrupt, and the terrorist organizations these cultures spawn are no different. This despite the fact that Islamic radicals preach the elimination of corruption. Many of those who preach this, are unable, or unwilling, to practice it when temptation comes along. Al Qaeda in the Sahel is bringing in over $5 million a year. The few hundred al Qaeda down there are hiring more gunmen, and trying to convert these guys to the cause. But the tribesmen down there are wary of these fanatic city boys from the north. They take the money and keep the Islamic terrorists at a distance.

Next door in Tunisia, the formation of a new government leads many to believe that the same old crew of crooks will remain in charge. An increasing number of Tunisians are trying to migrate (illegally) to Europe.

The government has an advantage over the recently deposed dictators in Tunisia and Egypt: Algeria has more oil money and larger, well paid, and battle tested security forces. These advantages have, so far, enabled the government to prevent the popular dissatisfaction with the government from reaching a critical mass on the streets. But the government also knows that most Algerians hate their rulers, and want to replace them with an attempt at real democracy. The outcome remains in doubt.

February 15, 2011: The country is still under a "state of emergency" (a form of martial law) that has been in force since 1992 (the start of the war with Islamic radicals that largely ended a decade ago). The government says it will end the state of emergency this week, as a way to quiet people down. While Tunisia and Egypt had large demonstrations recently that drove their dictators out of power, this is not working in Algeria, at least not yet. Algeria has been having smaller demonstrations for years, which have been too small to shake the government. The complaints are the same ones (unemployment and corruption) that caused unrest in Tunisia and Egypt. But the protestors have not been able to form the large crowds that police could not contain. Algeria has had more smaller demonstrations for a longer period, and the government has learned how to contain these. The government has also managed to keep the main opposition groups divided over the issue of large demonstrations. The main trade unions and legal Islamic groups have refused, so far, to back large demonstrations or strikes.

February 19, 2011: Demonstrators assembled in the capital, calling for real democracy, and were attacked by pro-government thugs while police stood by and did nothing. This sort of thing has been going on daily for over a week.

The Libyan government cut Internet access overnight, but it was back on the 20th. The government also began jamming satellite broadcasts for al Jazeera news.

Meanwhile, to the west, neighboring Morocco is also witnessing a growing number of pro-reform demonstrations and some violence. But no calls to replace the monarchy.

Islamic radicals were never able to establish much presence in Libya, but there are still some in Algeria, and they are quiet for now, apparently waiting to see how the revolution will play out.

In neighboring Libya, full scale rebellion appears to be underway. Libya has, since the 1960s, been under a far stricter dictatorship, run with the cooperation of tribal and ethnic group leaders. This form of rule is corrupt and inefficient, causing growing poverty and unemployment, but does take advantage of tribal and ethnic loyalties and local (and paid-off) leadership. As in the rest of the Arab world, it's a generational thing. Libya, like many Arab nations, has a ruling family that has paid attention to taking care of the security forces, so that when force was needed, it would be applied. But there has been growing unrest, and in some large cities, like Benghazi, the government has lost control. Egypt has set up refugee camps on its border with Libya, to deal with 20,000 refugees so far, and more on the way. There appear to be splits in the security forces as well, with a growing number of desertions. Democracy has become a popular new cause among the young, even if they have a job in the security forces. But a civil war may not produce a democracy, just a new group that has enough power to control the population, and oil income. The current government, under the Kaddafi family, has squandered much of that money, and that's a big part of what the current unrest is all about.

February 22, 2011: While the government has promised to end 19 years of martial law ("state of emergency") by the end of the month, police and pro-government thugs continue to block daily pro-reform demonstrations from sustaining themselves in city and town centers. Algeria is somewhat unique in the Arab world in that it is still mobilized to deal with an active Islamic terror group. Thus a lot of Algeria's oil income is going to provide good jobs for large and, so far, reliable and loyal, security forces. But some members of the government are also calling for real democracy, believing that the unrest against authoritarian government will only grow. There is popular unrest more because of unemployment and corruption, but these problems spring from the corruption and mismanagement of a self-appointed ruling class. Algerians, unlike many other Arab countries, are still weary from over a decade of war with Islamic terrorists, and not as willing to endure more such violence. Some of these Islamic radicals are still around, just enough to remind everyone about the bad-old-days.

February 23, 2011: Due to disruption caused by the popular uprising in Libya, some 800,000 barrels a day of Libyan oil (one percent of world production) is not getting exported. This is half of Libya's normal daily output, which mostly goes to Europe. Middle Eastern nations, particularly Saudi Arabia, say they can make up all of Libya's lost output, for however long it takes.

Although Algeria's ruling elite appears to have a firm grip on power, strikes, protests and riots in early 2011 prompted President Abdelaziz Bouteflika to offer a series of concessions.

The 19-year state of emergency was lifted. Two months later, the president promised to amend the constitution to "strengthen democracy". And in September 2011, he permitted private radio and television stations. The government also launched a spending programme to reduce the high unemployment rate and diversify the economy.

February 25, 2011: The United States closed its embassy in Libya and continued to evacuate American citizens. Nearly all the 6,000 Americans in Libya will be out within a week.

The new government in Libya is being formed city by city, town by town and district by district out in the countryside. Even in Kaddafi's area of core support (western Libya and the national capital Tripoli), the majority of the population opposes him. In response, Kaddafi is offering cash, weapons and goods (like a car) for those who can bring in supporters willing to fight. That's working, but the long-term loyalty of these new recruits is suspect. Same is true with the African mercenaries that stand out so vividly as they patrol the capital. These men are rebels from Chad, Sudan and other sub-Saharan countries, who have been living in Libya, or came north for the money (a few thousand dollars a month, with one month up front as a signing bonus). These African gunmen are ruthless, and confident that they can escape south if it all ends badly for the employer. Kaddafi has long backed rebel groups in places like Chad (where Libya has some territorial disputes) and other nations down there. Money, guns and sanctuary does get you some gratitude, and willingness to sign up for what is shaping up as a bloody last stand.

About 100,000 foreign workers have fled Libya in the past few weeks. Most of them have been Tunisians and Egyptians, who were the closest source of inexpensive labor. Most of these Tunisians and Egyptians were able to make it back to their native countries. There are a few thousand Algerians working in Libya, and most of these have fled, at least until it's clear what the new government will be like. The new crew will also need cash. Most oil shipments were halted during the last week of February, although rebels are gradually taking control of oil facilities. But most of the foreign technicians and managers have fled, leaving the native Libyan staff unable to run the oil extraction and shipping system at full capacity.

A final battle in Tripoli could be very bloody, as the Kaddafi clan, and their core supporters, face prosecution for all sorts of bad behavior, and their stolen oil money is already being sought by war crimes prosecutors. These guys have openly proclaimed their willingness to die fighting. Many will change their minds, but some won't. Rebel leaders have an opportunity to keep the casualty count down by coming up with ways to get members of the Kaddafi crowd to surrender. The international community is already in the process of freezing the Kaddafi clan's assets (tens of billions of dollars) and preparing to prosecute. There is less enthusiasm for getting directly involved in the fighting. The Kaddafis have few friends left (Venezuela, Serbia, Zimbabwe, for example).

The United States is moving aircraft and warships in anticipation of orders to provide support for Libyan rebels. There are many options, including a no-fly zone (to keep Kaddafi's warplanes on the ground), delivering weapons and supplies to the rebels or even air support. The Libyan rebels have grabbed most of the country, mainly using locals (armed and unarmed) and cooperative police and soldiers. Kaddafi's security forces have either gone to Tripoli (the capital and core of Kaddafi's support) or fled the country. Staying in Libya is a less savory option, because getting later found out as one of "Kaddafi's thugs" could be fatal. The Libyan rebels have apparently agreed to let the army handle taking Tripoli. The Libyan armed forces are not a particularly powerful or professional organization. But against Kaddafi's thousands of professional thugs (members of numerous intelligence and security agencies, plus mercenaries), some sort of organized force is needed. The army is incorporating volunteers (usually men who had served in the army) and trying to gather as many working weapons (especially armored vehicles and aircraft) as possible. There's lots of decrepit, elderly, military equipment in Libya (Kaddafi was an indiscriminate shopaholic when it came to weapons), a reminder of how so much oil wealth was wasted. Most of this stuff is junk, but some is a challenge for anyone with technical skills and a desire to fight.

Meanwhile, Islamic radicals are in a state of shock. A major reason for the existence of Islamic radical groups like al Qaeda is to overthrow the many dictatorships found in the Arab world, and replace them with Islamic religious dictatorships. But now these Arab despots are being overthrown by secular uprisings, with the intention of establishing democracies. Al Qaeda believes democracies are un-Islamic. Most Islamic radical groups in Algeria and across North Africa have already been defeated during the last two decades, and now the remaining Islamic radicals are turning to kidnapping, robbery and the drug trade to keep going. These new democracies are not going to help the cause at all.

March 1, 2011: In the last week, the number of demonstrators assembling to demand an end to corruption and government incompetence has fallen to less than a hundred, even in the capital. Government concessions (ending 19 years of martial law, tolerance for free media and opposition political parties) has given many reformers other outlets, for the moment. But the goal in Algeria remains the same, to end the dictatorship and make the economy more efficient. The government has loudly and, in detail, promised it would clean up its act and make things better. If there is no progress in the next few months, the demonstrators will return in force, angrier than before.

March 2, 2011: Libyan diplomats and agents have been seen recruiting Tuareg tribesmen in Niger, Mali, Algeria and Burkina Faso, to fight in Libya to keep Kaddafi in power. Kaddafi has been hiring Tuareg to fight for him for decades, so there is a willingness of young Tuareg to take the money ($10,000 to sign up and several thousand a week thereafter) to risk their lives for a desperate dictator. Apparently Kaddafi has the cash and trucks to recruit and transport several thousand of these Tuareg mercenaries.

March 3, 2011: The ICC (International Criminal Court) has launched an investigation into the crimes of the Kaddafi clan (the father and his three sons), as well as senior government officials. This makes it easier to restrict the international movement of Kaddafi, his close associates, and the billions of dollars they have in overseas banks.

March 4, 2011: A large weapons and munitions storage base outside Benghazi blew up, killing at least twenty and destroying large quantities of military material. Rebels blamed pro-Kaddafi agents, but it could have been due to untrained rebels mishandling weapons or munitions.

March 7, 2011: NATO began sending its AWACS aircraft to monitor aircraft activity over northern Libya. The AWACS can fly over international waters and still monitor air activity several hundred kilometers into Libya. Several nations are also using their spy satellites to monitor what's going on down there, and some of that information is probably making its way to the rebels.

Kaddafi has been reported to have made several attempts at diplomacy with the rebels, but so far, no one has been willing to talk terms with the dictator. Western and Arab nations are concerned about Libya sliding into perpetual war and chaos, much like Somalia. No one wants to send in troops, because it would be expensive, and politically embarrassing if you were one of the many countries that condemned the U.S. invasion of Iraq and overthrow of dictator Saddam Hussein. Efforts are being made to spin the situation in the media, to make military aid acceptable, but this takes time. Meanwhile, the Libyan rebels are not united at all, with numerous factions. There's really no one for foreign nations to negotiate or coordinate with.

The government is also using its better connections (via long time control of all mass media) to get out a growing number of false claims about the success of their fighting forces. The pro-Kaddafi columns can roll down the highway and into a rebel held city, fight for a few hours, issue press releases claiming victory, and then withdraw because of the numerous, and persistent, rebel gunmen. The Kaddafi forces can roll through, or push back, the rebels, but not exterminate them. That will require sustained attacks on the civilian population, which even many Kaddafi supporters are reluctant to undertake. Foreign mercenaries, however, are less restrained in the mass murder department.

No foreign government has openly given military aid to the rebels, but cargo ships are arriving in Benghazi with food and other supplies, which can also be used by the rebel fighters. Meanwhile, there's growing evidence that Arab and NATO nations are quietly slipping in special operations troops and essential supplies (special radios and such). Government forces are causing thousands, tens of thousands, of casualties, which medical facilities are overwhelmed with. The pro-Kaddafi forces apparently have order to fire on any resistance, armed or unarmed. The situation is ugly, much worse than most media reports describe it.

Next door, a war is being fought along the coastal highway. On the west end of the country, dictator Muamar Kaddafi controls most of the capital, Tripoli, along with its many military bases. On the east end, there is Benghazi, in the hands of rebels. In the middle (closer to Benghazi) is the oil shipping facility at Ras Lanuf. Control the oil and you control the national wealth. Kaddafi's forces control the city of Sirte (Kaddafi's home town), just to the west of Ras Lanuf (which is 620 kilometers from Tripoli). Rebels and Kaddafi forces are contesting Zawiya (the only large town between Tripoli and the Tunisian border) and Tobruk (the only major city between Benghazi and the Egyptian border). The rebels have more armed men, but most are civilian volunteers, armed with assault rifles and not much else. There is not much training or discipline, and little experienced military leadership. The government has some warplanes and armed helicopters, as well as some tanks and artillery. The government forces also have some civilian volunteers and a growing number of foreign mercenaries (from Tuareg tribes to the south, as well as Eastern Europe and Syria). The government forces also have better discipline. Many senior men from the security forces and the military have remained with Kadaffi, for the moment.

Thousands of additional troops and police have been sent to the Libyan border, to provide security among the hundreds of thousands of refugees there, or expected to arrive. There are few pro-Kaddafi border guards there, although that can change from day to day. The Algerian government remains, quietly, an ally of Kaddafi. Military dictators tend to stick together. Kaddafi also has friends in Syria, another decades old Arab dictatorship.

As for the rebellions sweeping the Arab world, Algeria has an advantage over other Arab dictatorships, in that Algeria has just come off a long (over a decade) and successful battle with Islamic militants. Then there is the always restive Berber minority, which mainly demonstrates a lot, and vigorously. Thus the government has a large, well trained, experienced and highly paid security force for all this. Any potential rebel movements have some very professional and experienced opposition.

March 8, 2011: The government has been quick to shut down any demonstrations, and has publicly reminded workers in the oil industry that they have always been well taken care of. But raises to public employees have been uneven, and those who did not get the highest increases are unhappy. Thousands of local defense guards (largely part -time watchmen originally organized in the 1990s to deal with widespread Islamic terrorism) are demonstrating for a raise. Most of the 94,000 guards have jobs, in areas of high unemployment that are no longer needed. But they want a retroactive raise, and at least 10,000 got into the capital and in front of the parliament building. Meanwhile, the government has announced huge (over $200 billion) investment plans for the rest of the decade, to build infrastructure and support job growth. But such promises have been made before, and somehow never panned out. This time, the charm offensive is more sustained and extensive. Local officials have been ordered to try harder, a lot harder, to do something for the poor and unemployed who come to them for aid. Thus the sudden surge of reports from all over the country about how cranky officials have suddenly taken happy pills and undergone amazing transformations. Meanwhile, the security forces continue to search for al Qaeda, at least along the coastal areas. But there are fewer Islamic radicals to find. Most of the hard-core have gone south, to join the al Qaeda organization in West Africa, that is getting rich by providing security for moving cocaine shipments north, as well as from kidnapping and anything else that will produce a big payday.

March 8, 2011: Five civilians were killed when their vehicle triggered a roadside bomb some 270 kilometers south of the capital. The civilians were moving along a road that is frequently used by military patrols.
Someone screwed up, but the Islamic terrorists are already very unpopular in Algeria, and this sort of incident just reinforces the hatred. Most of the remaining Islamic terrorists appear to have moved south, into more thinly populated areas. There, especially along Algeria's southern borders, al Qaeda sustains itself with smuggling cocaine from Guinea-Bissau, where it is flown in from South America for movement overland to the Mediterranean coast. While this has turned the local branch of al Qaeda into gangsters, this is a natural evolution for many terror groups. Some of these Islamic terrorists are seduced by all the money, and the drugs, while many others are simply better armed and equipped to continue their terrorist activities.

The government continues to condemn the NATO enforcement of the recent UN resolution (to halt Libyan government attacks on Libyan civilians). This action was originally backed by the Arab League, but this organization of Arab states (most of them run by despots or monarchs) changed their minds once the bombs hit Libya. Algerian leaders were always against attacking neighboring Libya. There, the leader (Kaddafi), while quite eccentric, was a despot that the Algerian leadership could understand and work with. A democratic government in Libya will encourage Algerian reformers.

The government has promised reforms, and most Algerians still want some meaningful (more jobs and less corruption) changes. They will wait a bit longer, if only because the security forces are plentiful and, unlike the rest of the government, competent. The desire for change is strong, and unless the current dictatorship (descended from families of those who led the 1950s-60s revolt against French rule) can truly change, violence will return.

March 30, 2011: Over the last two months, the weekly pro-reform demonstrations have become smaller and smaller. The government made some concessions, but also has much more efficient security services courtesy of two decades of fighting Islamic radicals. While these terror groups have been defeated, there are still remnants out there, terrorizing civilians in remote areas and making a few attacks a month, just enough to remain in the public consciousness and keep the security forces on their toes. But the rebellious spirit appears to have been transferred to economic issues, with more and more groups going on strike for more pay, housing and better working conditions. The only ones getting raises are the police, although their working conditions these days are quite stressful.

April 5, 2011: The government fired five senior media officials, after these men, and over two dozen more employees of state media operations, participated in an anti-government demonstration the day before.

April 12, 2011: In the capital, over 10,000 students marched on the presidential palace, demanding real reforms. Dozens of students were arrested or injured by police. The massed police forces stopped the students from getting to the government palace.

In the capital, the president gave his first speech in response to the unrest that began three months ago, as part of the unrest sweeping the Arab world. The president pretended to offer change, but didn't, and Algerians realized that immediately. The popular unrest continues.

April 15, 2011: Some 110 kilometers east of the capital, Islamic terrorists killed 13 soldiers while they attacked an army camp. Two of the attackers were also killed.

April 17, 2011: Some 75 kilometers east of the capital, six soldiers and two terrorists were killed in two clashes. Thousands of security forces troops have been withdrawn from operations against Islamic terrorists, in order to deal with the growing number of anti-government demonstrations. This has reduced the pressure on the few hundred Islamic terrorists still active in the northern part of the country, and made it possible for more attacks to be launched on the security forces.

Libyan rebels claim they captured Algerian mercenaries fighting for the Libyan government. The captured Algerians were also carrying drugs (hashish) and may have been Algerian criminals attracted by the high pay Kaddafi was offering to those from neighboring countries who would come and help defend his government.

Thousands of teachers and other specialists, all employees of the government, have been on strike for weeks. The government is attempting to wait out the rebellious spirit that has inspired numerous strikes and demonstrations in Algeria. So far, this strategy is working, but it is not guaranteed to win. The large, well paid security forces (army and police) have remained loyal. While all Algerians are unhappy at how poorly the ruling party has mismanaged the economy, the jobs of many in the security forces are seen as threatened by a new government. The revolution might still succeed, but it will either be over lots of dead bodies, or because most of the security force personnel are somehow persuaded to switch sides.

April 18, 2011: The government has made itself even less popular by calling for NATO, and Libyan rebels, to stop attacking the government of Libyan dictator Moamar Kaddafi. So have other dictatorships like Cuba and Iran. In addition, Algerian officials have been the source of many reports about al Qaeda activity in Libya, the idea apparently being to connect the rebellion in Libya with growing al Qaeda power. There's little evidence to back this up. Al Qaeda has been more active in North Africa, mainly in Algeria, because the Islamic terror group has become the security arm of drug smugglers, who bring cocaine (flown or shipped in from South America) and hashish (produced in West Africa) north, where most of it is smuggled into Europe.

April 19, 2011: In the last week, twenty (or more) members of the security forces were killed by Islamic terrorists, representing a major increase in activity by the Islamic radicals. In the same period, ten terrorists were killed and three were arrested.

April 23, 2011: Thousands of demonstrators gathered in the capital to call for reforms (and the overthrow of the current government). Police used force to keep the demonstrators away from government buildings.

April 26, 2011: NATO accused Algeria of allowing agents of Libyan dictator Moamar Kaddafi to recruit over 400 mercenaries from Moroccan (Polasario) rebels living in Algeria. The mercenaries were enticed by the pay (up to $5,000 a month).

April 27, 2011: Some 80 kilometers west of the capital, two policemen were killed by a roadside bomb.

April 28, 2011: Some 120 kilometers west of the capital, five policemen were killed by a bomb, and several more were wounded.

April 30, 2011: Some 140 kilometers southwest of the capital, five village guards were killed by a bomb, and four were wounded. Such attacks are common when Islamic terrorists are attempting to intimidate local security forces and compel them to allow the Islamic radicals to do what they want in the area.

Some 2,000 kilometers south of the capital, police arrested seven Algerian and Moroccan men and accused them of supplying and financing Islamic terrorist operations.

Although demonstrations are banned, thousands of students gathered in the capital to call for reforms (and the overthrow of the current government). At least twenty demonstrators were hospitalized with injuries.

May 2, 2011: The government announced a 25 percent increase in spending, to reduce unrest. The money will go to raising the pay of government workers, increasing food subsidies, building more housing and creating more jobs.

May 4, 2011: The former head of the state oil company, who was removed from the job last year, was sentenced to two years in jail for corruption.

May 6, 2011: A roadside bomb went off 350 kilometers east of the capital, killing five soldiers and wounding five others. A hundred kilometers east of the capital, a journalist (Ahmed Nezar) was shot dead, apparently while pursuing a story about the Islamic terrorists in the area.

May 7, 2011: The government has openly admitted that relations with the Libyan rebels are not good. The Libyan rebels accuse Algeria of supporting the long-time Libyan dictator Kaddafi. Algeria and Libya have had their ups and downs over the last few decades, there has always been close cooperation in fighting Islamic radicals. Since Islamic radical groups are part of the rebel coalition in Libya, Algeria is still cozy with Kaddafi. When the Arab League voted to approve a no-fly zone over Libya, only Syria and Algeria voted opposed it. Algeria has ordered its reinforced border guard force to shoot anyone trying to cross Libyan border without permission. The government continues to accuse Libyan-based Islamic terrorists of contributing to the increase of terrorism within Algeria. There's little evidence of this, as the continuing battle with Kaddafi loyalists seems to be keeping Libyan Islamic terror groups busy. The recent growth of terrorist violence in Algeria has more to do with so many Algerians joining in the call for reform throughout the Arab world. This has pulled soldiers and police away from counter-terror efforts and made the general population less vigorous in helping the cops. So far, the uprising has not put the dictatorship in any real danger. But the uprising continues, and the longer it does, the more danger the government is in.

May 13, 2011: Islamic terrorists attacked an army base 360 kilometers east of the capital, killing seven soldiers and wounding two. Reinforcements arrived and pursued the terrorists, killing three of them.

May 14, 2011: In neighboring Tunisia, police arrested two men (an Algerian and a Libyan), who were transporting explosives, and identified them as members of al Qaeda. The arrest took place 140 kilometers from the Libyan border, and that's where the two are believed to have come from. Weapons were also found in a nearby cave.

May 15, 2011: Over the weekend, there were two clashes about 150 kilometers southeast of the capital, leaving one soldier and two terrorists dead.

Al Qaeda terrorists continue to be more active, but their attacks appear to be spontaneous, not carefully planned and organized. Al Qaeda in Algeria is demoralized because of the death of their supreme leader (Osama bin Laden) and because the large, anti-government demonstrations turned out to be anti-al Qaeda as well. The Islamic terrorists can't find any love, and that makes them sad.

May 23, 2011: The demonstrations have diminished greatly over the last two weeks, but the anger remains. The government promises real reforms (which would result in a new government if there were fair elections), but many Algerians are dubious. The government has mustered its loyal followers and has made life difficult for the opposition (most of the population.) But the opposition is still there and the people are still angry. This is a pause, not a halt, to the pro-reform demonstrations and political activity.

May 24, 2011: On the Niger border, troops killed three Islamic terrorists and arrested another.

May 26, 2011: About a hundred kilometers east of the capital, volunteer security police spotted a suicide bomber approaching a local defense base, and shot the Islamic terrorist before he could set off his explosives.

June 4, 2011: East of the capital, a roadside bomb killed four policemen.

June 5, 2011: Algeria ordered financial institutions to identify any assets belonging to Libya and the Kaddafi family, and freeze them (prevent the owners from moving or using the assets). This is in compliance with international sanctions on Libya. Algeria has long had good relations with Libya, but has decided that getting on well with the international community is more important.

Algeria believes that the loosely organized "Al Qaeda In North Africa" is going to try and increase its activity in the wake of bin Laden's death, and the fall of the Kaddafi government in Libya. Kaddafi has been very effective against Islamic radical opponents. But now many of these Islamic radicals are prominent members of the new rebel government. However, there has not been a lot of new recruiting, or terror operations, among the North African Islamic radicals. There's been more talk, but the Islamic terrorists are largely disappointed that most of the rebels are pro-democracy, and often quite hostile to Islamic radicalism.

The government continues to have problems with religious intolerance. While 99 percent of the population is Moslem, there are Islamic radical factions who believe non-Moslems should not be allowed to operate in an "Islamic nation" like Algeria. So the 60,000 Christians are subject to growing persecution and discrimination. Nearly all these Algerian Christians are converts from Islam. This is blasphemy to Islamic conservatives, and it's become increasingly common for Algerian Christians to be prosecuted and imprisoned for even discussing religion with Moslems. The government has also made it more difficult for Christians to build churches, or convert existing buildings to religious use. When Western diplomats ask the government about this intolerance, the response is either denials or insistence that this kind of behavior is expected from good Moslems. What the government is actually doing is pandering to Islamic conservatives to discourage them from resuming their support for Islamic terrorists.

June 14, 2011: The U.S. believes that, despite decades of good relations with Libya, and its ruling Kaddafi family, Algeria decided, soon after the civil war broke out in Libya, to not get involved. Over the last few months, Algerian officials have become more active in assisting the international effort to oust the Kaddafis. American intelligence has not detected any aid for Kaddafi coming from Algeria. This would include money, supplies or mercenaries.

June 15, 2011: Parliament passed a bill increasing subsidies for basic goods. This is another effort to hold off the threat of widespread reform demonstrations, which could lead to the overthrow of the military dictatorship.

June 20, 2011: Several hundred former soldiers demonstrated the capital, demanding that the army make good on its promises to take care of troops who were disabled while fighting Islamic terrorists in the 1990s. Promises were made to the soldiers but, like so many other promises made by the government, they were not kept.

A bomb went off near the capital, wounding two soldiers bringing water to other troops.

June 25, 2011: The government admitted that they were in contact with the rebels in neighboring Libya. While the Algerian leadership favors Libyan tyrant Kaddafi, the Algerians believe that the rebels are going to win.

Another roadside bomb went off 150 kilometers southeast of the capital, killing one soldier.

June 26, 2011: Some 70 kilometers east of the capital, a roadside bomb killed two soldiers. These bombs have become a favorite terrorist tactic, as the terrorists don't have the resources for much of anything else.

June 27, 2011: Using information obtained from captured terrorists, police found and disabled twelve bombs in the capital. The bombs had been built for attacks (as roadside bombs) on patrols, or to be placed near military bases or police stations. These bombs often kill or injure nearby civilians, which makes the general population more likely to tip off the police about the location and activities of the terrorists.

In the south, Mauritania and Mali found and attacked an al Qaeda base near their common border. The base was attacked and fifteen terrorists were killed and nine captured. Others escaped and are still being pursued. The base was defended by trenches and landmines and was also a hideout for local gangsters. Al Qaeda has turned into a drug smuggling gang in this part of the world, in order to pay for their terrorist operations.

In neighboring Morocco, the monarchy is making the same kinds of promises. The difference is that the monarchy does not pretend it is anything but a monarchy, and most Moroccans believe that the king might come through with some democratic reforms. Unrest is still a possibility, but at least the king has a better relationship with his people than the military leadership does in Algeria. Both countries have major problems with corruption and poor economic performance. The people throughout North Africa want some real reform in those two areas. So far, it isn't happening.

The government is reviving strong relationships with France. In light of the Libyan rebellion and continued Islamic terrorism, these seems like a prudent move. The French are willing to get more foreign investments coming into the country, if the government can do something about the corruption that cripples any new economic activities (and existing ones as well). It's always about corruption. It's not just the government, businesses are nearly as corrupt as the government. For example, it is estimated that over half the imported goods (especially those coming from China and South Korea) are counterfeit. The government seizes a lot of these (and then often quietly sells them into the local markets).

June 29, 2011: The government is going through the process of modifying the constitution, something demanded by pro-reform opposition groups. But most reform groups see this as a sham, and refused to participate. Once the government finishes the "constitutional reform" it will be obvious that the government was just playing for time, and widespread unrest will return. This, opposition parties believe, will finally bring down the military dictatorship that has dominated the government for over four decades.

June 30, 2011: The government is buying two Steregushchy (or "Tiger") class corvettes from Russia. These heavily armed warships are built for coastal patrol and defense.

July 2, 2011: At Tizi Ouzu, fifty kilometers east of the capital, six people were wounded by two roadside bombs.

July 4, 2011: Responding to growing public anger, fifteen soldiers were arrested for accidentally killing an innocent security guard during a counter-terror sweep east of the capital last month.

July 5, 2011: Near the southern border, Mauritanian troops killed twenty al Qaeda members and scattered even more in a pursuit that crossed the border into Mali. Ten terrorists were captured.

July 11, 2011: The Italian foreign minister became the first Western official to agree that al Qaeda has been getting weapons, especially portable anti-aircraft missiles, out of looted Libyan bases, and moving them into and through neighboring countries, like Algeria.

July 13, 2011: Some 80 kilometers east of the capital, a suicide bomber killed three.

July 15, 2011: On the Tunisian border, police killed two armed Islamic terrorists.

July 16, 2011: Two suicide bombers attacked, 70 kilometers east of the capital, leaving four dead.

July 19, 2011: In the south, troops intercepted a group of seven armed foreigners, apparently coming from Niger and headed for Libya. The men refused to surrender and attempted to flee. But during a running gun battle, all seven were killed. The men were believed to be al Qaeda members.

July 19, 2011: A suicide bomber attacked a police station 70 kilometers east of the capital, killing a policeman and wounding several others. Like most such attacks, al Qaeda took credit.

July 22, 2011: On the Moroccan border, Moroccan border guards intercepted a group of armed men trying to cross from Algeria. There was a gun fight, leaving one soldier dead. The armed men, apparently Islamic terrorists based in Algeria, fled back into Algeria.

July 25, 2011: A group of three Islamic terrorists were caught by police 60 kilometers east of the capital. They were two suicide bombers and their handler trying to get into the capital. All three were killed. The man in charge of the group was later identified as the 23 year old son of a leader of the FIS, one of the major Islamic terror groups the government defeated in the 1990s.

July 27, 2011: Police identified a suicide bomber, in a town 300 kilometers east of the capital, and tried to arrest him. But the man detonated his explosives, killing only himself.

July 30, 2011: The king of Morocco has called for improved relations with Algeria. Relations between the two countries have been cool since the 1970s, and the border has been closed since 1994. The main dispute is over some disputed desert territory in southern Morocco.

July 31, 2011: A roadside bomb killed two soldiers, 370 kilometers southwest of the capital. Nearby, another such bomb was found and disabled.

On a more fundamental level, the government has increased food imports over 50 percent this year, in order to keep food prices down. Food costs have been rising worldwide, but this has been particularly painful for the many poor families in the Arab world. The government has also noticed that some of the anti-government violence in the Arab world this year could be traced back to high food prices.

Meanwhile, the population remains angry, but peaceful. The government is trying to keep it that way. For example, the government pointed out that over 73,000 people had been convicted of corruption in the last few years. What bothers most Algerians is that the worst offenders (senior officials and major business owners) never seem to get punished. The government repeated promises of many and wide-ranging reforms. But the belief is that the ruling families are going to do everything short of actually giving up power and the wealth they have stolen over several decades. Most Algerians are angry about all this, but two decades of Islamic terrorism, and often savage government response, has held down any enthusiasm for violent revolution. At least so far, and the government hopes it stays that way. The government knows that if they can get the economy growing, they can avoid retribution and removal from power, for a long time. The government is also easing up on the police-state practices. For example, journalists who "insult" the state or, more importantly, senior officials (by, for example, accusing someone of corruption or incompetence) will no longer be jailed, but fined.

August 2, 2011: Libyan rebels continue to accuse Algeria of quietly supporting the Libyan government. No proof has been presented, but the two countries share a long border in desolate country. There is apparently some smuggling going on, as there has been for centuries. But nothing large scale. The border is long and in semi-desert territory.

August 3, 2011: The navy has ordered an amphibious assault ship, which carries a battalion of infantry, 36 vehicles, three landing craft and up to eight helicopters.

August 14, 2011: A suicide truck bomb hit a police station in Tizi Ouzou (100 kilometers east of the capital) before dawn, killing the bomber and wounding 14 policemen and 15 civilians. Al Qaeda later took credit.

August 17, 2011: An Islamic terrorist roadside bomb, 100 kilometers east of the capital (in Tizi Ouzou), killed a driver for the police, and a bus driver.

August 19, 2011: Two recent terror attacks east of the capital, claimed by al Qaeda, were more noise than substance. The point appears to be that government efforts to destroy al Qaeda in northern Algeria have failed. Not so, those efforts have not finished, and won’t as long as there is so much government corruption and economic stagnation. The army and police heavily patrol the mountainous areas east of the capital, long the hideout for al Qaeda, and, for centuries before, rebels of all sorts. In the far south, the army has increased its activity in the Saharan Desert wastelands that al Qaeda now uses as a refuge, and waypoint for the drug shipments the Islamic terrorists now guard for a living.

August 23, 2011: Sixty kilometers east of the capital, police killed three Islamic terrorists.

August 26, 2011: Two suicide bombers attacked a military academy west of the capital. This killed 18 and wounded 26. Two of the dead were Syrian officers studying at the academy. Al Qaeda took credit, and said the attack was in response to Algerian support for Libyan dictator Moamar Kaddafi.

August 29, 2011: The government announced that the wife, and three children of Moamar Kaddafi had been granted asylum in Algeria. The Kaddafis had travelled from Tripoli in a large convoy (of several dozen vehicles) and had to fight at least one group of Libyan rebels. The trip, largely through the desert, took several days, including mistakenly driving into Tunisia at one point. The Algerian government now fears that allowing the Kaddafis in may lead to more violent pro-reform demonstrations inside Algeria.

Refugees from Libya are a minor problem compared to the rising cost of food. In the last eight years, the government has nearly tripled (to $8 billion a year) the money it spends on food imports. In response, more farming is being encouraged.

Hundreds of Tuareg tribesmen have fled Libya for Algeria. Libyan rebels accused Tuareg men of serving deposed dictator Kaddafi as mercenaries and have been attacking the nomadic Tuareg.

September 1, 2011: The government said that it would not grant sanctuary to Moamar Kaddafi, and suggested that it was temporarily shutting down the official border crossings with Libya. Kaddafi could still sneak in, but such an illegal crossing would make him an outlaw in Algeria.

September 2, 2011: Algerian leaders announced that they will recognize the new Libyan government, once it has announced who its top officials are.

September 4, 2011: Algeria has refused members of Kaddafi's armed forces or intelligence services permission to enter Algeria. The Algerian border has been closed to all traffic, to ensure that any further illegal shipments into Libya are at least reduced. The Algerian government is trying to undo the damage it caused by backing Kaddafi after NATO and the UN declared Kaddafi's government off-limits last March.

September 6, 2011: The twelve members of deposed Libyan dictator Moamar Kaddafi's family, who arrived in Algeria last week, have been moved to the Clube des Pins resort west of the capital. This is a luxury facility, normally only used by the ruling elite of Algeria. The government wants to keep the Kaddafis out of sight until a decision is made on what to do with them. The Libyan government wants these refugees returned, for criminal investigations and possible indictment of the adults. Algeria has refused this demand, for now.

September 8, 2011: The Sahel countries (Algeria, Mali, Niger and Mauritania) concluded a meeting in Algeria where they agreed to continue cooperation in the fight against al Qaeda activity (mainly drug smuggling, and all the attendant violence and corruption) in the region. The U.S. has been supplying money, trainers, weapons and equipment to this effort.

September 13, 2011: The government has agreed to allow competing electronic (radio and TV) media. But there was no date mentioned, when commercial stations could start broadcasting. Thus it may never happen. The strict libel laws against journalists will also been dropped, eventually. Government control of the media has long hobbled reform efforts. But the Internet and cell phones have changed that. Commercial radio and TV will change it further, and put more pressure on the current military dictatorship to loosen up. Some day. Maybe.

The new rulers in neighboring Libya have growing evidence that Algeria allowed weapons and other supplies to be smuggled into Libya during the last few months, as a NATO air and sea blockade prevented any legal access. China is believed responsible for some of the arms shipments, which came in via Algeria before being trucked across the border. The Algerian government is believed to have facilitated this, and is now denying everything.

September 14, 2011: Islamic terrorists have been paying more attention to making money than making bombs of late. Some 80 percent of the cocaine reaching Europe is coming in via Africa. Al Qaeda has become the security arm of drug smugglers, who bring cocaine (flown or shipped in from South America) and hashish (produced in West Africa) north, where most of it is smuggled into Europe. At the same time, the Arab states of North Africa have become more hostile to Islamic terrorism, but still receptive to new ways of making a lot of money. Thus a growing number of al Qaeda activists are being corrupted by all this new wealth. It’s an old problem with zealots, and it means the activists keep the same brand name, but slip into a new business model.

September 16, 2011: The U.S. embassy issued a terrorist alert, warning foreign oil firms that Islamic terrorists were planning to use missiles against the chartered freighter aircraft the oil companies make heavy use of. The missiles were believed to be coming from Libya.

The government was alarmed at an Internet based call for large demonstrations tomorrow. The government blamed Israel.

September 17, 2011: Algerian reform groups tried to use Internet social media to organize large pro-reform demonstrations today. The effort failed. While most Algerians want reform, they don't want any more violence, not after two decades of Islamic terrorism.

September 19, 2011: The first of the new privately owned TV stations will be on the air next year. The government recently announced that the decades old government monopoly on electronic media was being lifted. The Internet had a lot to do with this, as it had already lifted the government monopoly, and there was nothing the government could do about it.

September 23, 2011: Police in neighboring Tunisia report battles with armed men (presumably pro-Kaddafi gunmen) trying to sneak in. At least six of the infiltrators have been killed in the last week, and many more were driven back into Libya. The action took place in the area where the Libyan, Tunisian and Algerian borders meet.

September 24, 2011: Islamic terrorists fired an RPG rocket at an airfield 250 kilometers east of the capital. The target was apparently a military helicopter, but no damage was done.

September 26, 2011: The new Libyan government is demanding that Algeria do something about pro-Kaddafi gunmen operating out of Algeria, and crossing the border to make attacks inside Libya. Both countries share a long, mostly desert border, south of Tunisia. Algeria protests that it cannot monitor this entire borderland. Libya points out that the Kaddafi gunmen must have access to water, fuel and food, and there are only a few places where those items are available in the desert border region.

East of the capital, troops encountered and fought a large group (about 33) of Islamic terrorists. At least five of the terrorists were killed, and the rest escaped into the forests. Some of those were believed to be wounded, and one or more bodies may have been carried away.

September 27, 2011: The government warned members of Moamar Kaddafi's family taking shelter in Algeria to keep quiet about political matters, or face being sent back to Libya. This came in response to Kaddafi's daughter Aisha making a statement to the press about how her father was well and still fighting.

September 30, 2011: Hardliners in the government have rejected calls for another amnesty, to try and get the remaining Islamic terrorists to halt their violence. The hardliners point out that past amnesty had not brought in the hardcore Islamic terrorists, who went on to recruit replacements for those who did surrender. Worse, many of those who did surrender went back to Islamic terrorism. For the hardliners, killing or imprisoning all the Islamic terrorists is the only solution. The mood in the country supports the hardliners.

The government, lacking any heavy public pressure, is not making much progress in announcing, much less carrying out, political and economic reforms. The corruption, mainly to benefit the ruling families (including many descended from the anti-colonial rebels of half a century ago) continues, as does public anger at it. But two decades of Islamic terrorism has made the public reluctant to engage in another revolution. Not just yet, but eventually.

The government believes that many of the weapons looted from abandoned government warehouses in Libya are finding their way to Algeria. Some weapons recently captured from Islamic terrorists and gangsters could be traced back to Libya.

It's all about smuggling cocaine and hashish north, through Algeria, to Europe. The drug smuggling is actually handled by Arab gangsters that are not terrorists. Al Qaeda gets paid lots of money to provide security for the drugs as they make the long run through the Sahara. The Tuareg provide local knowledge of the terrain, and people, at least in the far south. The Algerian government is afraid that the Tuareg will be tempted, by a big payday, to provide sanctuary for Kaddafi, or help in smuggling him to Zimbabwe, which has offered sanctuary.

October 1, 2011: For the last week, the government has been fending off accusations from the new Libyan government that Algeria is working with Libyan Tuareg tribes to shelter former Libyan ruler Moamar Kaddafi. The Algerians deny this, and point to their own long and difficult relationship with the Tuareg. Kaddafi and his family were on much better terms with the Tuareg. For example, last March, Libyan diplomats and agents were seen recruiting Tuareg tribesmen in Niger, Mali, Algeria and Burkina Faso, to fight in Libya to keep Kaddafi in power. Kaddafi has hired Tuareg to fight for him for decades, so there was a willingness among young Tuareg to take the money ($10,000 to sign up and several thousand a week thereafter) to risk their lives for a desperate dictator. In contrast, the relations with the local tribes, especially the powerful Tuareg, were always more complicated for Algeria. This is because, while the Tuareg are not fond of Islamic terrorism, young Tuareg are allowed to work with al Qaeda as hired guns. The pay is good, and, so far, not too dangerous. But the young Tuareg are picking up some radical ideas from their al Qaeda bosses, and that is causing some tension with tribal leaders. The mere fact that Tuareg are working for al Qaeda in southern Algeria has angered Algerian officials.

October 2, 2011: Along the Niger border, police intercepted a convoy smuggling in arms from Libya. An hour long gun battle left eight Islamic terrorists dead, and three arrested. Several Libyans were involved.

October 5, 2011: At least 17 people were arrested, as a demonstration was dispersed in the capital. T

The government revealed that police had intercepted a suicide car bomb last July, as it was on its way to bomb the parliament building. Three men in the car were shot dead before they could detonate the explosives.

October 9, 2011: Police dispersed a crowd of several hundred people, who were gathering near the presidential palace to protest high unemployment. At least 25 of the protestors were arrested. There are not enough Algerians willing to demonstrate, in numbers large enough to overwhelm the police.

October 12, 2011: The new al Qaeda leader, Ayman al Zawahri, released a video in which is urged Algerians to rebel against their government. This had little effect.

There is growing violence by Islamic conservatives. Not like in the 1990s, but rather calls to outlaw alcohol and some forms of entertainment. Several bars have been attacked in the capital.

October 16, 2011: The government will cut spending by 10 percent next year, largely to reflect a 25 percent increase in spending this year to blunt popular unrest and prevent an "Arab Spring" type uprising. Algeria was vulnerable to such an uprising, as it is one of the more incompetent dictatorships in the Arab world. Politics and the economy is dominated by a few dozen families, most of them headed by a prominent leader in the 1950s rebellion against French colonial rule. But the undemocratic government the rebel leaders set up in the 1960s, simply replaced foreign overlords with local ones, and less competent ones at that. But a rebellion led by Islamic militants in the 1990s was defeated after a decade, with great bloodshed (by both sides). Most Algerians are not in the mood for another rebellion, not just yet. Meanwhile, the corruption and mismanagement continue. There is enough oil money to allow the ruling families and their supporters to live well, but not enough to keep most Algerians happy. The government has done as little as possible to address demands for reform. A new law to eliminate restrictions on media is mostly a sham, and the secret police still discourage public opposition to the government.

October 17, 2011: A roadside bomb 50 kilometers east of the capital went off and killed a civilian.

October 21, 2011: In neighboring Mauritania, officials claim to have killed an al Qaeda leader, and several of his associates, in an air raid. Al Qaeda later denied this.

October 23, 2011: At a Polisario refugee camp near the Moroccan border, three European aid workers were kidnapped, apparently with the help of some Polisario officials, by al Qaeda members. This may have something to do with the declining prospects of Polisario, which has been in bad shape since 1991. Back then, Morocco finally won its war with Polisario Front rebels, who were seeking independence for the Western Sahara (a region south of Morocco). Polisario remained powerful in Mauritania, where the rebel group has official recognition and maintains several more refugee camps. Because Polisario was so well-subsidized by Algeria, back when Algeria was a radical state, Polisario still has enough diehards out there to keep lots of people in Western Sahara unhappy. This was known to provide recruits and sanctuary for al Qaeda and other Islamic radicals. For two decades, the UN has been trying to work out a final peace deal between Polasario and Morocco. In the 1990s, Algeria cut off all support for Polasario. But that, and UN efforts to mediate the differences, have just not worked. The contested area is largely desert with a population of less than 300,000. Logic would have it that the area is better off as a part of Morocco. But there are still thousands of locals who would rather fight for independence, than submit to Morocco. Some resistance is tribal and cultural, with the Moroccans seen as another bunch of alien invaders (the area was administered, until 1976, as a Spanish colony). If the fighting breaks out again, possibly inspired by Islamic radicals, it could go on for years, just as it does in many other parts of Africa, and the immediate neighborhood. Getting involved in cocaine smuggling provides money, some of which goes got guns and vehicles, making the Polisario fighters more formidable. Mali and Mauritanian police are increasingly arresting members of the Polisario Front who are involved with a major drug smuggling operation (moving cocaine from Guinea-Bissau, where it is flown in from South America, to the Mediterranean coast). Polisario Front members have long been involved in smuggling and other illegal activities, but their involvement in moving cocaine is relatively recent. This implies cooperation with al Qaeda, which apparently has worked out deals Polisario.

October 24, 2011: The government refused a Libyan request to return members of recently killed Libyan tyrant Moamar Kaddafi's family. In late August, Kaddafi's wife, daughter and two sons (along with all their children) arrived and were granted asylum. The Kaddafi family has been hidden away in a posh country estate and ordered to keep quiet. So far they have, but they appear headed for comfortable exile. But the Kaddafis will be a constant headache for the Algerian government, as the new Libyan government seeks to extradite and prosecute the Kaddafis, and seize stolen money they are living off.

October 26, 2011: Algerian troops searching for three kidnapped aid workers in the southern desert, encountered four suspected al Qaeda members, and killed them in a gun battle. The three captives are believed to have been taken to Mali, although Mali denies this. However, it's easier to hide captives in Mali than in Algeria (which is better policed.)

October 30, 2011: Police arrested three al Qaeda members and accused them with taking part in the recent kidnapping of three European aid workers. The three captives are known to be alive, but no ransom demand has been made yet.

November 3, 2011: The few dozen families that run the country are confident that they have escaped the wrath of the Arab Spring uprisings. That's only partially true, as most Algerians are unhappy with their government, but not quite angry enough to rebel. Give it time. That's what Algerians a worried about.

November 7, 2011: The government closed 900 mosques and prayer rooms, claiming that these venues were suspected of being used by Islamic conservatives to preach and organize Islamic radicalism and terrorism.

November 12, 2011: The government claims that Nigerian Islamic terror group Boko Haram has established connections with the Algerian branch of al Qaeda. No proof was offered, other than the fact that the Algerian/North African branch of al Qaeda now runs a major drug smuggling operation (moving cocaine from Guinea-Bissau, where it is flown in from South America, to the Mediterranean coast). But those smuggling routes are over a thousand kilometers from Nigeria and there is no other evidence that North African Islamic radicals have been in Nigeria. While these terrorists have been seen in northern Niger (along the Algerian border), police and counter-terror activity has made it difficult for the al Qaeda groups to move away from the Algerian border region. So, aside from some Nigerians visiting the al Qaeda groups, there is not much of a connection.

November 16, 2011: A tour guide was convicted of plotting to kidnap foreign tourists and sell them to al Qaeda. He was sentenced to five years in prison. He and four others were arrested for this a year ago. It's been common throughout the Arab world for kidnappers to sell some of their victims to Islamic terror groups. This may not bring in as much cash, but it’s safer.

November 22, 2011: Some 600 kilometers east of the capital, soldiers tracked and caught up with a group of Islamic terrorists, killing six of them.

Algeria is also suffering from rocky relations with the new governments in Tunisia and Libya. The recently overthrown dictators in those two nations had long been friendly and cooperative with the military dictatorship in Algeria. While technically in favor of this year's revolutions in Tunisia and Libya, Algeria was suspected of trying to support the dictators. Algeria did give sanctuary to members of Libyan dictator Kaddafi's family, and several other senior Kaddafi officials as well.

November 25, 2011: In the south, Niger, Mauritania and Mali complain that Algeria, which has much larger armed forces than their southern neighbors, is not pulling its weight in the battle against al Qaeda. The Islamic terrorists have established bases in Mali, often defended by trenches and landmines. These bases are usually shared with local gangsters. Al Qaeda has turned into a drug smuggling gang in this part of the world, in order to pay for their terrorist operations. This means that the Islamic terror network has become a major power in the Sahel, the semi-desert region that goes from the west coast of Africa, through southern Algeria, all the way east to Ethiopia. It's a region populated by a few nomads, plus the occasional tourist and smuggler. Now that al Qaeda has set up shop, the tourists have fled and the local smugglers have some competition. Flush with drug profits, al Qaeda, and their local (bought and paid for) allies are well armed and equipped (with SUVs, trucks and satellite phones) keep the local security forces at bay, or at least unable to wipe out the terrorist activities. Algeria responds by pointing out that its laws do not allow its troops to cross borders in pursuit of terrorists. The southern neighbors see this as a lame excuse for not wanting to do their share.

Algeria is also suffering from rocky relations with the new governments in Tunisia and Libya. The recently overthrown dictators in those two nations had long been friendly and cooperative with the military dictatorship in Algeria. While technically in favor of this year's revolutions in Tunisia and Libya, Algeria was suspected of trying to support the dictators. Algeria did give sanctuary to members of Libyan dictator Kaddafi's family, and several other senior Kaddafi officials as well.

November 26, 2011: The EU (European Union) has agreed to send technology and police experts to help Mali, Niger and Mauritania deal with its growing Islamic terrorism problem.

November 28, 2011: Police arrested two men and accused them of participating in the kidnapping of three foreign aid workers last month.

December 4, 2011: In the Kabylie region, a hundred kilometers east of the capital, a doctor was released by kidnappers (who had taken him on November 15th.) The family says no ransom was paid. It’s illegal to pay ransom, and since last year, kidnappers have been forced to release their captives by a popular uproar in the region over kidnappings. There have been about 70 kidnappings in the region in the last six years, mainly by al Qaeda groups and for ransom.

December 5, 2011: Mauritanian police announced they had arrested two refugees from Algeria and charged them with participating in the kidnapping of three foreign aid workers in Algeria last month. The two men said their group had sold the three captives to al Qaeda.

December 6, 2011: Noting the electoral success of Islamic parties in neighboring Tunisia, Algeria refused requests to allow Islamic parties to again operate in Algeria. This ban has been in place since the 1990s Islamic terrorist effort to take control of the country. This terror campaign also made the Islamic radicals very unpopular, despite promises that their rule would reduce corruption and government mismanagement.

December 8, 2011: Al Qaeda has admitted it kidnapped five foreigners (two French, one Dutch, one Swede and a South African) last month in Mali. Al Qaeda denied responsibility for the recent kidnapping of three aid workers in Algeria. The terrorists claim the two French captives are spies and that all five were taken in revenge for al Qaeda members recently arrested in Mali. The terrorists are demanding ransom of over $20 million for each of the European captives. While there is public pressure in Europe to pay ransoms, the governments don't want to because they recognize that the money supports Islamic terrorism and encourages more kidnappings. The African governments oppose paying big ransoms as well, because the terrorists do most of their damage locally. To make matters worse, there are three factions in the AQIM and they don't always get along. Right now, the three factions are competing to see which one can kidnap for foreigners and gain the most ransom.

Mali, Niger and Mauritania see Algeria as part of the problem, because Algeria limits its cooperation with its neighbors, and will not allow foreign troops to pursue Islamic radicals into Algeria. Al Qaeda is less of a problem in Algeria than are the remnants of the Islamic terror groups that were a major threat in the 1990s. Algeria sees the Islamic terror groups in the far south as sand bandits and much less of a threat than the several hundred Islamic terrorists remaining in the north. One must also remember that Algeria is still run by a military dictatorship that did not appreciate the help the West gave to rebel movements in Tunisia and Libya. There, Algeria lost long-time allies, replaced by democratic governments which accuse Algeria of supporting the deposed dictators. The situation is likely to remain tense for a bit, and sand bandits are considered a distraction by Algeria.

The Wagadou Forest was one of their main base areas. Learning from their mistakes in Algeria (where Islamic radicals tried to use murder and terror to gain the cooperation of civilians), AQIM does not use violence against civilians unless attacked. AQIM spreads the money around and is polite. AQIM hires local men for support jobs and tries to recruit locals to become Islamic radicals. The locals are wary of al Qaeda, for they know of the death and destruction the group brings with it. People throughout the region know how savage the Algerian Islamic radicals were to civilians during the 1990s rebellion. But the people in the Sahel (the semi -desert south of the Sahara) are poor and the money is accepted, as long as the terrorists are peaceful. Some of the young tribesmen are tempted to join al Qaeda, much to the dismay of their parents and elders. Thus the government raids on al Qaeda bases is spurred in part by the fear that al Qaeda will gain control over the rural population and threaten the governments of the countries south of Algeria.

Over the last five years Al Qaeda been organizing a new chapter south of Algeria, among tribal rebels and disaffected urbanites in Niger, Mali, Chad and Mauritania. This was called Al Qaeda in the Maghreb (North Africa), or AQIM. This was more PR than reality at first. There are some Islamic terrorists in the region, and these pronouncements appear to be an attempt to unify pro-Islamic terrorist elements via the Internet and the mass media. So far, the many disaffected groups in the region have shown little interest in uniting, especially under the leadership of al Qaeda. Too many different objectives and al Qaeda has a reputation for being a loser. But the terrorists have extracted over a $100 million in ransoms from kidnapping Western visitors, and millions more by working for drug smugglers. This has enabled the group to expand from less than a hundred paid staff, to over 300. The money went to bribing local officials and tribal leaders, as well as buying vehicles, weapons, satellite phones and much more.

December 10, 2011: For the last six months, troops from Mauritania and Mali have been seeking out and killing al Qaeda members hiding in the Wagadou Forest (actually a thousand hectares/2,500 acres of brush and trees in a semi-desert area), which lies astride the border. Al Qaeda has apparently been there since early last year. The Wagadou Forest has become a way station for cocaine and hashish that al Qaeda escorts from Guinea-Bissau to the Mediterranean coast. This, and kidnap ransoms, is how al Qaeda finances itself in West Africa these days. Until this year, al Qaeda had an informal agreement with Mali, whereby al Qaeda would behave itself (no kidnappings or terror attacks) and the Mali government would leave the terrorists alone. But pressure from neighbors, NATO and the United States changed that, and Mali agreed to try and shut down al Qaeda operations.

December 11, 2011: The government has refused to allow American and French UAVs to cross the southern border while tracking drug gangs and Islamic terrorists. The UAVs are based in Libya and are patrolling the Libyan and Niger border areas.

Algeria and Mauritania signed a number of economic cooperation agreements.

The appearance of MOJWA presents the possibility of a war among Islamic radical groups. MOJWAs three captives were taken at a Polisario refugee camp near the Moroccan border. The three European aid workers may have been taken with the help of some Polisario officials. This may have something to do with the declining prospects of Polisario, which has been in bad shape since 1991. Back then, Morocco finally won its war with Polisario Front rebels, who were seeking independence for the Western Sahara (a region south of Morocco). Polisario remained powerful in Mauritania, where the rebel group has official recognition and maintains several more refugee camps. Because Polisario was so well -subsidized by Algeria, back when Algeria was a radical state, Polisario still has enough diehards out there to keep a lot of people in Western Sahara unhappy. Polisario was known to provide recruits and sanctuary for al Qaeda and other Islamic radicals. For two decades, the UN has been trying to work out a final peace deal between Polasario and Morocco. In the 1990s Algeria cut off all support for Polasario. But that, and UN efforts to mediate the differences, have just not worked. The contested area is largely desert with a population of less than 300,000. Logic would have it that the area is better off as a part of Morocco. But there are still thousands of locals who would rather fight for independence rather than submit to Morocco. Some resistance is tribal and cultural, with the Moroccans seen as another bunch of alien invaders (the area was administered, until 1976, as a Spanish colony). If the fighting breaks out again, possibly inspired by Islamic radicals, it could go on for years, just as it does in many other parts of Africa and the immediate neighborhood. Getting involved in cocaine smuggling provides money, some of which goes towards buying guns and vehicles, making the Polisario fighters more formidable. Mali and Mauritanian police are increasingly arresting members of the Polisario Front who are involved with a major drug smuggling operation (moving cocaine from Guinea-Bissau, where it is flown in from South America, to the Mediterranean coast). Polisario Front members have long been involved in smuggling and other illegal activities but their involvement in moving cocaine is relatively recent. This implies cooperation with al Qaeda, which apparently has worked out deals with Polisario.

December 12, 2011: An al Qaeda splinter group, MOJWA (Movement for Oneness and Jihad in West Africa) announced itself by releasing a video of three European aid workers (a man and two women) they had kidnapped in an Algerian refugee camp last October. Actually, the three may have been kidnapped by a criminal group and then sold to Islamic radicals. MOJWA is unique because its leadership is black African. There has long been a lot of tension between Arabs and black Africans. The Arabs disdain the blacks and that causes a lot of tension and resentment. It appears that MOJWA is striving to show they can be more extreme and effective than the Arab dominated al Qaeda. MOJWA claims inspiration by 19th century West African Moslem leaders, who fought European colonial powers.

December 14, 2011: Separatist rebel group Polisario claims to have arrested several people involved with the kidnapping of three European aid workers in a Polisario refugee camp last October. Some of those arrested were taken by Polisario gunmen operating in Mauritania.

December 19, 2011: The government announced an agreement with Niger to carry out joint border patrols to help control the smugglers, gangsters, and Islamic terrorists operating along the border.

December 21, 2011: Without much fanfare, Algerian troops finally responded to calls from their southern neighbors and sent a convoy of troops into Mali to help with operations against Islamic terrorists.

December 26, 2011: The government has named a retired general to command police and army units assigned to counter-terrorism operations against the remaining al Qaeda and Islamic radical groups in Algeria, Libya, Niger, and Mali. While the Islamic terrorists have been greatly weakened in Algeria, some of them have crossed Algeria's southern borders and formed more Islamic terrorist cells by recruiting unemployed locals and raising lots of money via drug smuggling and kidnapping.

The president of Algeria, sensing something was very wrong, asked a prominent academic and former Minister of Health to go out and get a sense of what popular attitudes are. The professor reported that the people are very unhappy because the centralized economy is mismanaged, there is too much corruption and favoritism in the government, and the government officials are out-of-touch with the Algerian people. All this is nothing new to foreign observers of Algeria but it apparently was surprising to many senior government officials. The report warned of the remaining potential for a violent uprising. This may be avoided by the upcoming parliamentary elections, which will create a legislature whose main chore is to create a new constitution. This is expected to toss out the old elected dictatorship of families who were prominent in the fight against colonial France half a century ago. Many Algerians doubt that the old "revolutionary" families will give up power without a fight. Worse, Islamic political parties, recently made legal again, seem likely to win most of the votes in the April elections. This may lead to a second "Arab Spring."

December 29, 2011: Islamic terrorists, sustained by drug gang cash and kidnap ransoms, are growing south of Algeria. This includes the appearance of a more radical splinter group - MOJWA (Movement for Oneness and Jihad in West Africa). These two terror groups currently hold twelve Europeans for ransom and expect to get at least a million dollars for each of them. This would enable the terrorists to recruit a lot more impoverished young locals and equip them with vehicles and weapons. European nations are under pressure by African countries to not pay the ransom but to help track down the captives and rescue them (dead or alive). The European governments are under domestic pressure to pay the ransoms, as the voters back home are more concerned about the captive Europeans than North African victims to European financed terrorism.

January 2, 2012: Algerian police killed the al Qaeda chief for northwest Africa, Sidi Mohand Ormadein, and his deputy. The police identified the two at a roadblock, which led to a brief gun battle.

January 3, 2012: Police stopped four SUVs coming from Niger and arrested the occupants when they found the vehicles full of weapons. These were apparently just smugglers, who did not expect to encounter police in a remote part of the border. But patrols along the border have been increased since thousands of weapons (mainly assault rifles, machine-guns, and RPGs) were stolen from Libyan bases during nearly a year of violent disorder. Lots of ammunition and portable missiles disappeared as well.

January 10, 2012: In a southern oil town, police injured ten people suppressing a spontaneous demonstration against corruption and police brutality (especially a recent incident where cops mistreated elderly people during a bus stop disturbance). Protestors were also unhappy with a shortage of housing and jobs. People note that the construction contracts are given out to cronies of officials and a lot of the money is stolen. Jobs are given out as political favors, not to those who can best do the job.

Sensing a huge anti-government sentiment among the voters Islamic parties are pulling out of a pro-government coalition. The Islamic parties are betting that the military dictatorship that has run the Algerian democracy for decades is ready to allow a free and (fairly fair) election so they can step down gracefully and escape prosecution. That might work.

January 12, 2012: The government is under growing political and popular pressure for being out of touch. The government has consistently sided with dictators in the last year of Arab Spring uprisings. The government was also very upset with what happened next door in Libya, when NATO airpower enabled untrained and poorly armed (but very angry and enthusiastic) civilians to overthrow the large and well organized security force of a decades old police state. While not as brutal and theatrical as the Libyan dictatorship, the Algerian strongmen maintain power using the same combination of corruption and terror. The Algerian dictatorship (it's more of a committee of thieves than a single guy in charge) is hustling to make friends with Western states, especially those who might be called on to supply warplanes and smart bombs for the liberation of Algeria. The recently deceased dictator of Libya (Moamar Kaddafi) was a very unpopular fellow among most national leaders. He was loved by some African nations to the south, who received billions of dollars in Libyan aid for building religious schools and mosques. Kaddafi also supported many rebel groups in Africa, and elsewhere, which led to a lot of violence and death. Overall, Kaddafi was not popular. Noting how that worked out, the Algerian leadership that used to be a lot more unfriendly to Western governments has changed. The Algerian dictatorship is looking for love in all the right places.

January 12, 2012: The long promised media law was revealed, and it still gave the government a lot of control over journalists and media outlets. The government had assured reformers that the new media law would eliminate all the restrictions imposed in 1990. The government lied.

January 16, 2012: The governor of Illizi Province (in the southeast) was kidnapped by three armed Algerian men and taken across the border into Libya. The next day, Libyan troops found and arrested the kidnappers and rescued their Algerian captives. At first, the kidnappers were identified as al Qaeda, but it was later found that they were just ordinary criminals. That was an easy mistake to make, as al Qaeda has been using kidnapping of foreigners and prominent locals to raise money. Sometimes the victims are taken by ordinary criminals and then sold to al Qaeda (which has the resources to obtain a larger ransom).

January 20, 2012: Across the southern border, in Mali, a new Tuareg rebel group staged attacks on two towns. The rebels were repulsed, with 46 of them killed. Two soldiers also died. Some of the rebels were found to have earlier served as mercenaries for the recently deceased Libyan dictator Moamar Kaddafi.

Two armed al Qaeda men were ambushed and killed by police 60 kilometers east of the capital.

January 22, 2012: Police arrested three al Qaeda members in the northeastern port town of Annaba. The men were planning to use speedboats loaded with explosives to attack large Western (military or commercial) ships. The three had been recruited by an al Qaeda leader who had earlier been arrested.

January 26, 2012: The government is one of the leading opponents to intervention in the Syrian rebellion. The popular uprising against the Assad family dictatorship in Syria has been going on for a year now, and many Arab League members wanted to intervene as they did in Libya, mainly to stop the killing. Algeria opposed that operation as well. Algeria is, along with Syria, are the only military dictatorships in the 22 member Arab League. Although the Algerian government is under pressure to become a true democracy not much real progress is being made. The military rulers of Algeria are delaying real change for as long as they can.

January 31, 2012: In Mali, Tuareg rebels and soldiers clashed near the Algerian border.

February 8, 2012: Just across the border in Mali, Tuareg rebels seized the town of Tinzawaten.

February 9, 2012: The government signed an agreement with Libya to cooperate on patrolling their common border more intensively to cut down on arms smuggling and illegal crossings in general.

February 13, 2012: Near the Mali, border three Islamic terrorists and a soldier were killed during a gun battle.

February 14, 2012: The army has ordered 120 T-90S tanks from Russia, for about $3.4 million each. This is the most recent tank design the Russians offer.

February 17, 2012: In the southeast, near the Libyan border, police found a stash of weapons (including some shoulder fired anti -aircraft missiles) smuggled in from Libya.

February 19, 2012: Some 70 kilometers east of the capital a roadside bomb killed four people on a bus and wounded ten others. The bomb was intended for a military convoy but hit civilians instead.

February 22, 2012: Some 50 kilometers east of the capital police ran down and killed five al Qaeda men. In the last four days, anti -terrorist operations east of the capital have killed sixteen terrorists.

February 25, 2012: The government has called for an end to violence in Syria. While many members of the Algerian dictatorship would like to see the Assad family keep power in Syria, it is more important to keep the "Arab Spring" movement out of Algeria. So far, the "old revolutionaries" (the families that led the 1950s war against the French colonial government) continue to run Algeria and exploit it for their own benefit. This has been going on since the French left in the early 1960s. They do this via rigged elections and a very efficient security force. Using government power to cripple opposition parties does not always work. For example, in 1992 Islamic parties won an election that would have given them control of the government. The military staged a coup to halt that, which triggered fifteen years of Islamic terrorism in response. Although the Islamic terrorists were defeated, they were not destroyed and a few hundred terrorists and supporters keep the killing going, if just barely. While the government has the edge, as long as the nation is run by an unpopular dictatorship there will continue to be unrest.

In Algeria a MOJWA suicide car bomber attacked an army base 2,000 kilometers south of the capital and killed himself while wounding 23 people.

March 3, 2012: In Mali government forces attempting to reinforce a border town (Tessalit) besieged by Tuareg rebels are driven back by another Tuareg force. American C-130s have been parachuting supplies to the besieged troops.

March 4, 2012: Some 60 kilometers east of the capital, police ambushed a group of armed al Qaeda men, killing one and causing the others to flee.

An al Qaeda splinter group, MOJWA (Movement for Oneness and Jihad in West Africa), has three European aid workers (a man and two women) they had kidnapped in an Algerian refugee camp last October and are demanding $39 million ransom. The U.S. warns that paying any ransom simply enables the terrorists to carry out more attacks. This warning does not always persuade European politicians to pay attention to short term problems (people and press demanding anything be done to free the captives) and long term ones (financing terrorists).

March 8, 2012: Just across the southern border in Mali, Algerians nervously watch yet another tribal rebellion by Tuaregs. This time it's a little different. Basically it's all about smuggling cocaine and hashish north through Algeria to Europe. The drug smuggling is actually handled by Arab gangsters that are not terrorists. Al Qaeda gets paid lots of money to provide security for the drugs as they make the long run through the Sahara. The Tuareg provide local knowledge of the terrain and people, at least in the far south. The Algerian government is afraid that the Tuareg will be tempted, by a big payday, to provide sanctuary for al Qaeda, as well as providing new recruits for Islamic terrorist operations (especially those that raise a lot of cash, like kidnapping Westerners). While the Tuareg are not fond of Islamic terrorism, young Tuareg are allowed to work with al Qaeda as hired guns. The pay is good and, so far, not too dangerous. But the young Tuareg are picking up some radical ideas from their al Qaeda bosses and that is causing some tension with tribal leaders. The mere fact that Tuareg are working for al Qaeda in southern Algeria has angered Algerian officials. Most of the 1.5 million Tuareg in the region are living in nations bordering Algeria (Burkina Faso, Libya, Mali, and Niger). Mali has faced rebellious Tuareg for decades and made peace with most of them in 2007. The current bunch of Tuareg rebels insist that they have no connection with al Qaeda or MOJWA, but many other Tuaregs do and there's no denying that. On the southern border of Algeria the Sahara desert turns into the semi-desert Maghreb, a band of barely livable land stretching from the Atlantic coast to Somalia.

March 12, 2012: Algeria, along with nine North African countries (including Libya, Tunisia, and Egypt) agreed to the "Tripoli Plan" for improving border security. This is meant to hamper smuggling and terrorist operations.

In France, Mohammed Merah (armed and holding out in his apartment while surrounded by police) confessed to recently murdering four men and three children. He was of Algerian descent and had gone to Afghanistan and Pakistan to take part in Islamic terrorism and work with al Qaeda. He returned to France and sought to continue his terrorist activities. His recent victims had been soldiers or Jews. France has always been very tolerant of Islamic radicals, as long as they behave in France. That is not likely to change, which annoys countries like Algeria quite a lot. That's because many Islamic terrorists, wanted for murder in Algeria, go to France and are able to live there and plan their next operation against Algeria.

The Tuaregs have been a problem for centuries, as they are ethnically distinct from the Malian majority in the south. These ethnic differences are complicated by Tuareg participation in smuggling cocaine and hashish north, through Algeria, to Europe. The drug smuggling is actually handled by Arab gangsters that are not terrorists. Al Qaeda gets paid lots of money to provide security for the drugs as they make the long run through forests, then the Sahara. The Tuareg provide local knowledge of the terrain, and people, at least in the far south. The Algerian government is afraid that the Tuareg will be tempted, by a big payday, to provide sanctuary for al Qaeda, as well as providing new recruits for Islamic terrorist operations (especially those that raise a lot of cash, like kidnapping Westerners). While the Tuareg are not fond of Islamic terrorism, young Tuareg are allowed to work with al Qaeda as hired guns. The pay is good and, so far, not too dangerous. But the young Tuareg are picking up some radical ideas from their al Qaeda bosses and that is causing some tension with tribal leaders. The mere fact that Tuareg are working for al Qaeda in southern Algeria has angered Algerian officials. Most of the 1.5 million Tuareg in the region are living in nations bordering Algeria (Burkina Faso, Libya, Mali, and Niger). Mali has faced rebellious Tuareg for a long time and made peace with most of them in 2007. The current bunch of Tuareg rebels insist that they have no connection with al Qaeda or MOJWA, but many other Tuaregs do and there's no denying that. On the southern border of Algeria the Sahara desert turns into the semi-desert Sahel, a band of barely livable land stretching from the Atlantic coast to Somalia.

March 21, 2012: In neighboring Mali, soldiers mutinied in the capital and seized the presidential palace (but not the elected president) and TV station. The troops announced they were taking over because the military had not been allowed to deal with the Tuareg tribal rebellion in the north, where the rebels had seized some towns and villages. The current fighting in the north has caused over 70,000 people to flee their homes to get away from the violence.

March 22, 2012: Mohamed Merah, a French citizen born of immigrant Algerian parents was killed by police after a 32 hour siege. Merah's parents were economic immigrants, as they left in the 1980s, before the terrorism campaign began in the early 1990s. Mohamed Merah, like many Arab migrants to the West, had a hard time adjusting to a new culture and, in effect, went to war with his adopted country. France had known about Mohamed Merah's terrorist activities for years but never had enough evidence to arrest him. He was being watched but not very closely.

March 23, 2012: In neighboring Mali the situation is chaotic. Members of the 7,000 man army staged a coup in the capital and the president went into hiding among loyal troops. News of the coup caused demoralization among the several thousand troops in the north, where several thousand Tuareg tribesmen are trying to establish a separate state. As troops withdrew to the south the Tuaregs began advancing and occupying towns and military bases.

The coup is led by mid ranking officers who insist that new presidential elections will be held, as soon as "national unity" (all opposition is silenced) and "territorial integrity" (the Tuareg rebels are defeated) is taken care of. No word on how long that might take, but it appears that the scheduled presidential elections next month are not going to happen. The mutinous soldiers were upset at a perceived lack of support by the government. The troops wanted more weapons and equipment to deal with the Tuareg rebels up north. The government preferred more emphasis on negotiation.

May 2, 2012: Al Qaeda released a list of 58 attacks they claim to have made in the Kabyle region (about a hundred kilometers east of the capital) over the last five months (since November 26, 2011). The terrorists claim to have killed 53 policemen in these raids. The government admits some of the police deaths and many more civilians killed in these attacks. Al Qaeda does not like to discuss civilians killed in terror attacks directed at security forces. Many of the al Qaeda "attacks" were claimed by police or soldiers as attacks on Islamic terror groups. The government also claims to have killed more than three times as many terrorists during that period. What everyone can agree on is that most of the country has been free of Islamic terrorism for years. The only remaining hot sports are the Kabyle (where al Qaeda fights to maintain bases in the mountain forests along the coast) and the far south (where the 463 kilometer long border with Mali is). Northern Mali, and the border with Algeria, is now under the control of Islamic terrorists. This is not good for Algeria.

May 6, 2012: East of the capital a bomb killed a soldier.

May 10, 2012: Parliamentary elections were held and the ruling party won 48 percent of the 462 seats. Mr Bouteflika's National Liberation Front (FLN) won parliamentary elections for which 23 new political parties were allowed to be established. Though hailed as Algeria's most free and fair poll in years, it was marred by widespread apathy.

A pro-military party got 15 percent, giving the military dictatorship another lease on life. The seven Islamic parties got only 13 percent of the seats. The opposition claimed fraud, pointing out that international observers were not allowed to examine most electoral records and that only 42 percent of eligible voters turned out.

May 18, 2012: A bomb went off outside a coast guard base east of the capital, killing two military men.

May 21, 2012: An army patrol on the Libyan border intercepted five Islamic terrorists travelling in an all-terrain vehicle. Three of the terrorists were killed and two captured. The vehicles contained a dozen assault rifles and several RPGs. There were also documents indicating the five men were members of al Qaeda.

June 1, 2012: East of the capital an improvised mortar killed two soldiers .

For the last three months several hundred members of al Qaeda (many of them Algerians) have been assisting Tuareg rebels, and local Islamic radicals, in establishing a separate Tuareg state in northern Mali. The Tuaregs have been a problem for centuries, as they are ethnically distinct from the Malian black African majority in the south. These ethnic differences are complicated by Tuareg participation in smuggling cocaine and hashish north, through Algeria, to Europe. The drug smuggling is actually handled by Arab gangsters that are not terrorists. Al Qaeda gets paid lots of money to provide security for the drugs as they make the long run through forests, then the Sahara. The Tuareg provide local knowledge of the terrain, and people, at least in the far south. The Algerian government is afraid that the Tuareg will be tempted, by a big payday, to provide sanctuary for al Qaeda, as well as providing new recruits for Islamic terrorist operations (especially those that raise a lot of cash, like kidnapping Westerners). While the Tuareg in general are not fond of Islamic terrorism, young Tuareg are allowed to work with al Qaeda as hired guns. The pay is good and, so far, not too dangerous. But the young Tuareg are picking up some radical ideas from their al Qaeda bosses and that is causing some tension with tribal leaders. This is especially true now that some of these young guys have joined a local Islamic radical group (Ansar Dine) that wants to impose a religious dictatorship on Tuaregs in northern Mali. The mere fact that Tuareg are working for al Qaeda in southern Algeria has angered Algerian officials. Most of the 1.5 million Tuareg in the region are living in nations bordering Algeria (Burkina Faso, Libya, Mali, and Niger). Mali has faced rebellious Tuareg for a long time and made peace with most of them in 2007. The current Tuareg rebels insisted that they have no connection with al Qaeda, but many other Tuaregs do and there's no denying that. The Tuareg Mali rebels have declared an alliance with the Islamic rebels (Ansar Dine) and an agreement to give Islamic terrorists sanctuary but not allow the imposition of Sharia law.

Al Qaeda groups, based in the far south, are demanding $57 million in ransom for nine captives (two foreign aid workers and seven Algerian diplomats). The government is not willing to pay that kind of money, which will just encourage and subsidize more kidnappings.

Despite all this, there is some resistance. One of the more widespread opposition activities is the illegal consumption of alcohol. To placate and undercut the Islamic parties (often Islamic terrorists who accepted amnesty over the last two decades) the government has put tighter restrictions on alcohol consumption. Production of beer, wine, and harder stuff is legal but the government has made it harder and harder to get a license to sell the stuff. This has resulted in the proliferation of illegal bars and clubs. The cops look the other way, despite complaints from Islamic politicians and activists. If the Islamic activists want to raid these places, they do so at their own risk. Most Algerians still like to have a little wine or beer regularly and are willing to fight a gang of Islamic fanatics to defend that. All this helps keep the Islamic and secular Algerians from protesting government corruption and misrule.

The government has noted how the oil-rich monarchies in the Persian Gulf remain in power and are using the same techniques. That means giving out jobs and other economic opportunities to the most ambitious and educated. These benefits can be withdrawn, a threat which discourages many from organizing violent resistance. Demonstrations are illegal and this carrot and stick approach has kept people off the streets. Government employees have had their pay increased 50 percent in the last four years and billions have been spent on subsidies for many consumer goods. Life is better and resistance seems futile. No one wants another round of bloodshed, not yet. This sort of national trauma is not unique to Algeria. Lebanese are still leery of violent solutions because of their 1975-90 civil war. Same situation in Iran because of the 1980s war with Iraq (where people are still getting over the 2004-7 sectarian terrorism). But eventually the bad memories are overshadowed by the present persecution.

June 3, 2012: The elections last month were generally seen as another successful scam by the military dictatorship to prolong their rule. The government has managed to keep the "Arab Spring" movement out of Algeria with stunts like this. So far, the "old revolutionaries" (the families that led the 1950s, war against the French colonial government) continue to run Algeria and exploit it for their own benefit. This has been going on since the French left in the early 1960s. They do this via rigged elections and a very efficient security force. Using government power to cripple opposition parties does not always work. For example, in 1992, Islamic parties won an election that would have given them control of the government. The military staged a coup to halt that, which triggered fifteen years of Islamic terrorism in response. Although the Islamic terrorists were defeated, they were not destroyed, and a few hundred terrorists and supporters keep the killing going, if just barely. While the government has the edge, as long as the nation is run by an unpopular dictatorship there will continue to be unrest.

September 9, 2012: A senior AQIM commander, Algerian Nabil Makhloufi, was killed in a car accident in northern Mali.

September 29, 2012: In the capital several hundred people demonstrated, demanding to know who took their family members during the 1990s war with Islamic terrorists. As many as 10,000 people just disappeared. Six years ago the government got 6,146 families to accept compensation and stop demanding that the government admit that the army or police kidnapped and killed people suspected of supporting terrorists. Many families did not accept the money and still insist on the government admitting it secretly kidnapped and killed people. So did the Islamic terrorists, and it was never clear in some cases which side was responsible for someone disappearing.

September 30, 2012: Islamic terrorists (MUJAO) in northern Mali announced that they had killed an Algerian diplomat they kidnapped five months ago. MUJAO had demanded that Algeria release three Islamic terrorists they had (and pay lots of money) in return for the diplomat. The Algerians refused and the terrorists killed the diplomat yesterday.

There is a debate within the government whether or not to back armed intervention in Mali. ECOWAS (Economic Community of West African States) has organized an intervention force of 3,300 troops, and France and other Western nations are willing to help. UN approval is being sought. Algeria has long opposed such interventions, especially if its former colonial rule France was involved. But the Islamic terrorist control of northern Mali directly threatens Algeria and the Mail government is not able to deal with the situation. Self-interest is expected to prevail when the UN asks Algeria if it approves of this intervention on its border.

October 4, 2012: The government has identified 146 Algerian Islamic terrorists working in Mali for AQIM (Al Qaeda in the Islamic Maghreb) and MUJAO (Movement for Unity and Jihad in West Africa), which is basically a Mauritanian faction of AQIM. Al Qaeda has the most money and weapons and uses this to exercise control over the other Islamic radicals in Mali. AQIM and MUJAO are sometimes at odds with Ansar Dine, which feels it should be in charge because it is Malian. But for the moment all three groups cooperate in order to maintain their control of northern Mali. The Algerian terrorists are among the most experienced, many having survived the 1990s war against the Algerian government (which the terrorists lost, killing over 100,000 civilians, terrorists, police, and soldiers in the process). The movement of so many Algerian Islamic terrorists to Mali in the last six months is the main reason there have been so few Islamic terror attacks in Algeria this year.

December 10, 2012: In neighboring Tunisia soldiers clashed with a group of Islamic terrorists, leaving one soldier dead. Troops continued the pursuit and arrested eight of the terrorists.

December 13, 2012: In neighboring Tunisia troops pursued a group of Islamic terrorists and arrested 16 of them. Also found were three terrorist training camps, apparently run by three Algerian members of al Qaeda. Documents were captured indicating this was an attempt to establish a Tunisian branch of al Qaeda.

December 21, 2012: Troops cornered and killed four Islamic terrorists 120 kilometers south of the capital.

December 24, 2012: Algeria and Tunisia have agreed to increase security cooperation and are signing a formal treaty to that effect .

January 1, 2013: Six Islamic terrorists were killed 50 kilometers east of the capital. A large quantity of weapons was seized.

January 2, 2013: Seven Islamic terrorists were killed 50 kilometers east of the capital. One of them was Izza Rezki, a senior leader (and fundraiser) in the local al Qaeda organization.

January 3, 2013: Two Islamic terrorists were killed 50 kilometers east of the Algerian capital. Several successful operations against Islamic terrorists in the last three days were carried out because of information obtained from two Islamic terrorists captured in late December.

January 11, 2013: France begins bombing al Qaeda forces in Mali. Al Qaeda goes on the web to call all their supporters to oppose this "French aggression". France is trying to halt an al Qaeda advance into southern Mali, where 90 percent of the population lives. France has a small number of warplanes stationed in Ivory Coast, Mali, and Chad.

January 12, 2013: The leaders of Libya, Algeria, and Tunisia agreed to increase border security, intelligence sharing, and cooperation against Islamic terrorist groups. This is all in reaction to the increased al Qaeda presence in Mali.

The government announced that it will be closing its border with Mali, as the increased fighting with the Islamic terrorist groups in northern Mali is likely to drive more people north. Algeria supports the French offensive against al Qaeda and has allowed French military aircraft to fly over Algeria. French Rafael fighter-bombers can make attacks into Mali from French bases as long as they can fly through Algeria.

January 14, 2013: On the Mali border troops attacked a four wheel drive vehicle trying to sneak into Algeria. The vehicle was mounting a heavy machine-gun and the five men inside were armed with AK-47s. Troops killed three of the intruders and wounded two others as they vehicle was stopped. Algeria has a 2,000 kilometer long border with Mali.

January 16, 2013: A group of 32 Islamic terrorists from Mali attack the Tiguentourine gas field in the southeast, 100 kilometers from the Libyan border. This facility produces ten percent of Algeria's natural gas and is operated by over 800 Algerians and foreign workers. The terrorists first attack a bus carrying foreign workers to the local airport. Two security guards are killed as the 2 AM attack is repulsed. The terrorists, dressed in army uniforms, proceed to the gas field facilities and overwhelm security and begin seeking out foreign workers. They take several hundred Algerian and foreign workers prisoners. The plan is to grab as many foreign workers as they can and take them back to Mali, where they will be held for ransom. The foreign workers are to act as human shields to enable the terrorists to get across the heavily guarded Algerian border with Mali. To avoid that border security, the terrorists left Mali two months earlier and carefully travelled via Niger and Libya.

January 17, 2013: In Tiguentourine the Islamic terrorists demanded that the army, which had quickly surrounded the gas facility, withdraw. Lacking sufficient manpower to guard all their captives, many slip away. Later in the day the army attacks the residential complex, where the terrorists and their hostages are. Most of the hostages are freed, but eleven surviving terrorists move, with seven foreign workers. Some terrorists tried to drive away with hostages but were attacked by the army, making it clear that no one would leave, even with workers serving as human shields.

January 18, 2013: Algeria tries to negotiate a surrender of the surviving terrorists and their hostages. The terrorists demand that France stop fighting Islamic terrorists in Mali.

January 19, 2013: Algerian commandoes attacked the remaining terrorists, most of whom were killed. The commandos were sent in when it was believed that the terrorists were killing their remaining hostages and planning to set off explosives to destroy the plant. This, it was feared, would be cover for some of the terrorists to drive away in the darkness with some of their captives.

January 20, 2013: Algerian military engineers carefully search the Tiguentourine gas facilities for bombs, bodies, and surviving terrorists or workers. Three terrorists were taken alive and 30 more bodies found. Security forces rescued 685 Algerian and 107 foreign workers . The terrorists killed 37 foreigners and one Algerian. The victims included seven Japanese, six Filipinos, three Americans, three Britons, two Rumanians, and one from France. Only one of the 32 terrorists was from Algeria and one of the leaders was apparently a Canadian (of Arab ancestry and speaking English with a Canadian accent). One of the terrorists had once worked in the gas complex and provided detailed maps of the plant layout for the terrorists to work from. The plant was not destroyed because, when the terrorists first stormed in, plant security set off an alarm that enabled plant workers to shut down gas flow and prevent explosives from setting off a huge gas fed fire.

Algeria is still in contact with Islamic terrorists in Mali, who are demanding $57 million in ransom for nine captives (two foreign aid workers and seven Algerian diplomats). The government is not willing to pay that kind of money, which will just encourage, and subsidize, more kidnappings.

In the last year Algeria has increased counter-terrorism and desert operations training for troops. The al Qaeda occupation of northern Mali made it clear that more Islamic terrorist operations could be expected in southern Algeria.

Just across the southern border in Mali, Algerians have nervously watched yet another tribal rebellion by Tuaregs. This one began a year ago and is a little different. Basically, it's all about smuggling cocaine and hashish north, through Algeria, to Europe. The drug smuggling is actually handled by Arab gangsters that are not terrorists. Al Qaeda gets paid lots of money to provide security for the drugs as they make the long run through the Sahara. The Tuareg provide local knowledge of the terrain, and people, at least in the far south. The Algerian government has long feared that the Tuareg would be tempted, by a big payday, to provide sanctuary for al Qaeda, as well as providing new recruits for Islamic terrorist operations (especially those that raise a lot of cash, like kidnapping Westerners). While the Tuareg are not fond of Islamic terrorism, young Tuareg were allowed to work with al Qaeda as hired guns. The pay was good and, until recently, not too dangerous. But the young Tuareg picked up some radical ideas from their al Qaeda bosses, and that caused some tension with tribal leaders. The mere fact that Tuareg are working for al Qaeda in southern Algeria has angered Algerian officials. Most of the 1.5 million Tuareg in the region are living in nations bordering Algeria (Burkina Faso, Libya, Mali, and Niger). Mali has faced rebellious Tuareg for decades and made peace with most of them in 2007. The current bunch of Tuareg rebels insisted that they have no connection with al Qaeda or MOJWA. That was a lie, and by last June their al Qaeda allies had turned on the Tuareg and taken control of the major towns and cities in northern Mali. The Tuareg fighters have been pushed out into the countryside and are now willing to fight the Islamic terrorists. Algeria is trying to make something of that by using contacts within Tuareg tribes to obtain intelligence on what is going on in northern Mali. On the southern border of Algeria the Sahara desert turns into the semi -desert Maghreb, a band of barely livable land stretching from the Atlantic coast to Somalia. Southern Algeria is mostly desert, the harsh Sahara. It’s not easy to cross and easy to monitor the few main roads that go from oasis to oasis.

While the current government is corrupt, self-serving, and run by families prominent in the 1950s rebellion against France, most Algerians are not eager for more violence. There was an Islamic radical uprising in the 1990s that left over 200,000 dead. The Islamic radicals were beaten but not entirely eliminated. They have tried to maintain a presence in northern Algeria ever since, if only to support their drug smuggling operation that has kept them in business for the last decade. This involves moving cocaine from Guinea-Bissau, where it is flown in from South America, to the Mediterranean coast and thence to Europe. You can keep the police away from that with bribes but the police and army are less corruptible when it comes to Islamic terrorism. Most of the surviving Algerian Islamic terrorists operate in the desert south or outside the country (elsewhere in North Africa, Europe, and anywhere al Qaeda is active). It was no surprise to the Algerians that only one of the 32 Islamic terrorists who attacked Tiguentourine was Algerian. There aren't that many Algerian Islamic radicals left and they are spread thin. Many have, in effect, "retired" overseas. This is especially true if they managed to get asylum in the West.

The government also has to convince foreign companies, especially those that contribute crucial foreign technical experts to help run oil and gas operations, that it is safe. Security around the Tiguentourine was actually quite good but not good enough to keep out a large group of terrorists with inside information and a well thought out plan for getting in. Where the terrorists failed was in their belief that human shields would get them past Algerian troops. Algeria is well aware that a lot of their current problems with Islamic terrorists come from the $100 million in ransom the terrorists have collected in the last decade by kidnapping Europeans. The Algerians decided that they would rather take the heat from the West for killing Westerners used as human shields rather than allow the Islamic terrorists to gain more millions.

January 22, 2013: Intelligence personnel will be analyzing DNA, documents, and other material found on the Islamic terrorists who attacked the Tiguentourine facility. The three surviving terrorists are being interrogated and surviving workers who spent time near the terrorists are being asked to recount anything they can remember. NATO, Tunisia, Libya, and other nations are sharing intelligence to get a better picture of who the attackers were, how they operated, and the prospects for another attack like this.

January 27, 2013: Islamic terrorists attacked a natural gas pipeline 125 kilometers southeast of the capital, killing two guards. Dozens of foreign hostages are killed by Islamist militants during a four-day siege at a remote gas complex. The attackers were repulsed when Algerian special forces storm the site. PM Abdelmalek Sellal says the attackers entered Algeria from northern Mali.

January 29, 2013: Tunisia has sent more troops to guard oil and gas facilities in the south, near the Algerian border.

January 30, 2013: The government has agreed to increase intelligence sharing and military cooperation with Britain. This is partly to improve counter-terrorism efforts and partly to get British oil workers back to work in Algeria.

February 4, 2013: In Mali Tuareg tribesmen seized two Islamic terrorist leaders who were trying to get to the Algerian border. One of the men (Mohamed Moussa Ag Mohamed) was in charge of enforcing Sharia (Islamic) law in Timbuktu and was one of three top leaders of Malian Islamic terror group Ansar Dine. He ordered attacks that caused considerable damage to holy places and ancient artifacts the Islamic radicals considered heretical. The other leader taken was Oumeini Ould Baba Akhmed, who planned and carried out at least one kidnapping operation (to grab Westerners).

February 5, 2013: Border guards were ordered to shoot on sight anyone seen trying to sneak across the border.

February 6, 2013: Near the Libyan border (some 540 kilometers southeast of the capital), about 50 Islamic terrorists attacked an army base. With the assistance of warplanes and attack helicopters the attack was defeated and at least two of the attackers (apparently from Libya) were killed. The army pursued the attackers and captured one of them alive.

The lack of foreign workers is going to hurt oil and gas production. Another casualty of all the violence in the south, and the al Qaeda call for more kidnapping of Westerners, is a decline in foreign tourism. In 2011, there were 1,807 foreign tourists visiting the southern deserts. That's several million dollars going to a very poor part of the country. But last year tourist visits fell by 64 percent to 643. This year it is expected to decline even more sharply.

The government has ordered troops to deploy around oil facilities, especially those using foreign workers. More armed civilian guards are being hired for this. Before last month's attack on a natural gas facility, most of the oil and gas operations in the south had unarmed security forces. There were always armed troops and police nearby but now the gates and grounds will be handled by armed men.

While most Western nations are now warning their citizens to stay out of Algeria, Japan needs the Algerian oil and is seeking ways to make it safer for its citizens to work in Algeria. This will include more intelligence gathering efforts. This has to be done in cooperation with the Algerians, who are inclined to help because Japan is now the major Western nation willing to let its oil specialists remain in Algeria.

French warplanes and commandos are searching for seven French citizens who were kidnapped in the last few years and are being held in Mali near the Algerian border. French warplanes have found and bombed some of the al Qaeda camps in the area.

Western intelligence agencies are telling Algeria, and Libya, that there are a lot of Islamic terrorists operating in southern Libya and it will be from there that more attacks will be launched on Algerian, Libyan, and Tunisian gas and oil facilities. American intelligence also found some Islamic terrorists who were involved in both last month's attack in southern Algeria and the one in Libya (Benghazi) last September that killed the U.S. ambassador to Libya.

Western and Algerian intelligence efforts indicate that Islamic terrorists in the region see last month's attack in Algeria and the Mali operations as a success and are planning more such efforts. Islamic terrorists have long had a flexible definition of victory. Despite this, Algeria still refuses to send troops outside the country (as in Mali) or allow foreign forces to operate inside Algeria. Even many senior Algerian officials admit this was a mistake because their troops were not trained well enough to avoid many foreigners being killed during the January attack on a natural gas facility in the south. Western nations continue pressuring Algeria to accept help, if only to better defend themselves.

Most of the surviving Algerian Islamic terrorists operate in the desert south or outside the country (elsewhere in North Africa, Europe, and anywhere al Qaeda is active). There aren't that many Algerian Islamic radicals left and they are spread thin. Many have, in effect, "retired" overseas. This is especially true if they managed to get asylum in the West. But there are still thousands of them out there, including the "retired" ones. These guys still support the cause and s ome have been coming out of retirement.

Algeria is proud of their victory over an Islamic rebellion in the 1990s, even though diehard extremists continue to operate. It's been eight years since the peace and amnesty deal with terrorists went into effect. Since then over 8,000 Islamic terrorists accepted the amnesty and surrendered, and over 2,000 who continued to fight were killed. The Islamic radical groups appeared to be on their way to extinction, when they were rescued by a shift in cocaine distribution networks (that now goes Across the Atlantic from South America to Guinea Bissau in West Africa and overland to the Mediterranean coast). The new route provided al Qaeda with a lucrative opportunity to earn cash guarding the drug shipments and get close to smugglers in the region. This provided contacts and access to illegal weapons. West Africa has become a new playground for the Islamic terrorists and that enables them to keep operations going further to the north in Algeria and west in Mali. The West and many of the neighbors criticize Algeria for their soft approach to the Islamic terrorists in the region. This, however, is largely driven by local politics. Most Algerians are not eager for more violence. There was an Islamic radical uprising in the 1990s that left over 200,000 dead. The Islamic radicals were beaten but not entirely eliminated.

February 8, 2013: The West is pressuring Algeria to be more assertive and less conciliatory with Islamic radicals. Even with all the Algerian Islamic terrorists operating in Mali and last month's attack on their natural gas facility, Algeria continues to resist cooperating with regional counter-terrorism efforts and still allows Islamic radicals (who have renounced violence) to operate openly. Some of these tame Islamic radicals have gone feral and shown up in Mali and in other Islamic terrorist strongholds. Algeria believes there are advantages to keeping the enemy close, despite some recent setbacks.

February 18, 2013: Acting on a tip from locals, troops in the south found the base of seven Islamic terrorists from Mali. Four of the terrorists were killed but three got away, apparently headed for Mali.

February 20, 2013: The U.S. has put its diplomatic personnel in Algeria on high alert because intelligence indicated there is a high risk of a terrorist operation against them. At the same time Algeria announced increased security around oil and gas facilities.

February 22, 2013: Two raids in the north left a dozen al Qaeda men dead. More importantly 13 weapons and many documents were seized.

February 24, 2013: The Tiguentourine natural gas facility in the south resumed limited production. The plant had been closed since the January terrorist attack that left 37 workers dead. Heroic efforts by key members of the security and operational staff prevented the plant from being heavily damaged. This was done by shutting down the gas flow early on, something the terrorists could not figure out how to reverse with all the key technical staff dead, fled, or silent.

February 25, 2013: Abdelhamid Abou Zeid (born Mohammed Ghadir: 1965 to 25 February 2013) was reported killed along with 40 militants by Chadian troops near the region of Tigargara, Northern Mali. Abou Zeid was an Algerian national who was born in 1965 and one of the top three commanders of al-Qaeda in the Islamic Maghreb, a Mali-based Islamist militant organization.

March 2, 2013: In Mali Chadian and French troops found and destroyed a major al Qaeda camp near the Algerian border. Among the dead were two Algerians (Abdel Hamid Abu Zeid and Mokhtar Belmokhtar) who were high ranking al Qaeda leaders.

Seizures of illegal drugs (hashish, cocaine, and heroin) tripled last year (from 53 tons 2011 to 157 tons). This is an indication of growing affluence in Algeria, but the hashish and cocaine are coming from the south mainly for export to Europe. This smuggling is a primary source of income for al Qaeda and other Islamic radical groups, and the seizures are an indication of its success and the extent of Algerian efforts to stop it .

France has not yet been able to get DNA proof that the man Chadian troops killed in northern Mali on March 2nd was Mokhtar Belmokhtar (the planner of the January natural gas facility attack in southern Algeria that got 37 workers killed). Al Qaeda says Belmokhtar is still alive but offer no proof. The supreme leader of al Qaeda in North Africa (Abdel Malek Droukdel) is believed to still be hiding out in northern Algeria and he would be the one to appoint a successor to Belmokhtar. There has been no such announcement yet. Meanwhile, the destruction of so many al Qaeda bases in Mali, and the death of hundreds of hard-core Islamic terrorists there, have demoralized Islamic radicals throughout North Africa. At the same time all counter-terrorism forces in the region are trying to take advantage of all this by seeking out Islamic terrorists fleeing Mali.

Editor's note: Abou Zeid was the chief rival of Mokhtar Belmokhtar, and one of the senior members of Al Qaeda in Africa (AQIM), a Mali -based Islamist militant organization. He is believed to have killed British national Edwin Dyer in 2009, and 78-year-old Frenchman Michel Germaneau in 2010. He had kidnapped over 20 Westerners between 2008 and 2013. When he controlled Mali's town of Timbuktu, he imposed a violent form of Islamic sharia law, engaging in amputations and destroying Sufi shrines. He led a contingent of Islamists in central Mali and led an assault on the small town of Diabaly in January 2013. At the time, he and his men were believed to be holding at least four French citizens kidnapped in Niger in 2010. His death was first reported by Algeria's independent Ennahar TV on 28 February 2013. On 1 March 2013, President of Chad Idriss Deby said his forces killed Abou Zeid during fighting in northern Mali. His death was confirmed by an Al Qaeda member on 5 March 2013.

March 6, 2013: The government continues to remain one move ahead of the kind of rebellion that hit other similarly corrupt governments during the “Arab Spring”. Enough of the most corrupt and inept members of the government are being dumped, along with some economic progress, to keep angry mobs off the streets. People are still angry because there is still a lot of corruption and lost economic opportunities around for all to see. In Algeria the Arab Spring at least served to provide some needed motivation to fix the mess decades of bad government created. Algerians are hoping to have a bloodless revolution, largely because they do not want a repeat of the bloody war with Islamic radicals in the 1990s. To that end, even senior people in the government are helping out by turning on the most corrupt and inept members of the leadership and even going public with details of the massive thefts of oil income over the years. European firms that have long done business with the Algerian company are going public with details and this helps persuade their Algerian counterparts to admit what everyone in Algeria already suspects. While these European revelations are largely the result of European efforts to clean up their own corruption, it helps reformers in foreign countries like Algeria.

March 7, 2013: Why watching the Gulf of Guinea - Special to CNN'

United States has assessed the implications of Iranian threats to close the Strait of Hormuz, the world’s most critical energy chokepoint, a crisis has loomed in another critical maritime energy corridor: the Gulf of Guinea.

The strategic importance of West Africa’s Gulf of Guinea – the stretch of coastline spanning from Gabon to Liberia that includes 15 states which have huge economic importance to the United States and the West as a whole – is hard to overstate. For one, the U.S. is expected to import a quarter of its oil from the Gulf of Guinea nations by 2015. Indeed, 70 percent of Africa's oil production comes from the Gulf of Guinea. And with the recent discovery of offshore hydrocarbon deposits, these numbers are only going to rise. And yet this crucial naval passage has witnessed an alarming spike in piracy and maritime crimes in recent years that rivals the Horn of Africa. Last year, the International Maritime Bureau attributed only 75 attacks to pirates operating in Somalia and the Gulf of Aden, down from 237 in 2011. In the Gulf of Guinea, in contrast, piracy is on the rise, with 58 incidents recorded in 2012 alone. The IMB has raised the alarm that the Gulf will overtake the Horn of Africa as the world's top piracy hotspot. The problem is that almost all the coastal states lack the capacity to handle the problem, and regional organizations have proven ineffective. Editor

April 3, 2013: For the first time ever Chinese warships are visiting Algeria. Two Chinese warships that had recently been on anti-piracy duty off Somalia are in Algeria for a four day good will visit and to train with the Algerian Navy. This is also an opportunity for the Chinese to show off their warships, which in the last two decades have gone from being clones of Cold War Russian ships to inexpensive versions of more modern designs. Algeria is rebuilding its navy and has already bought some Russian warships.

Some 120 kilometers south of the capital Islamic terrorists ambushed a convoy transporting a provincial governor. The attack failed and the terrorists fled after they had killed one of the governor's security guards.

April 17, 2013: The government has organized local religious leaders and teachers into an organization being funded to promote the traditional (to North Africa) Malekite version of Sunni Islam. This is meant to counteract the more radical Wahhabi form of Islam that is so dominant in Saudi Arabia (and frequently exported since the 1970s via all that oil money). Al Qaeda was founded by Wahhabis and similar minded Salafists (from Egypt). Malekites are fundamentalists, but more mystical and less into Islamic terrorism. Malekites believe it is better to influence other through example rather than terror. The local Islamic terrorists who left hundreds of thousands of Algerians dead in the 1990s were Salafists and are not well liked in Algeria. The government is trying to take advantage of this anti-Salafist sentiment to persuade religious young Algerians to adopt the Malekite tradition. That might work, but the Salafists and Wahhabi are still considered cool by the young, if only because of all the bloody mayhem they have created in the last four decades.

The rapid defeat of the Islamic terrorists who attacked a natural gas facility in January has demoralized the local Islamic terrorists. The failed gas field raid was quickly followed by the defeat of al Qaeda in Mali and the destruction of their bases down there. Many Algerian Islamic terrorists had gone to Mali last year and by February many of them were suddenly dead or fleeing in all directions. Few came back to Algeria, mainly because Algerians were angry about al Qaeda attacking a key source of national wealth (the natural gas field). The government capitalized on that and has intensified counter-terrorist operations in the last two months. Thus the Algerian Islamic terrorists are now in survival/ rebuilding mode. They are not gone, but they are much weakened and very much on the defensive.

China is becoming a major presence in Algeria. Over the last decade Chinese firms have invested $1.5 billion here. Currently some 30,000 Chinese are working in Algeria for fifty Chinese companies. Most of the Chinese are working on transportation (road and railroad) projects. Although Algeria has lots of unemployment, there are few people with the necessary skills for these projects, so China brings in skilled workers from China. Some of those Chinese will settle down in Algeria, but not as many as in non-Arab Africa. The Arabs are not as accepting of foreigners as many other cultures are. While many oil-rich Arab states import foreigners for most of the civilian jobs, these workers are not encouraged to stay and there are strict laws governing the presence of the foreign workers. Algeria sees the Chinese investments, especially in infrastructure, as a way to get the local economy growing and thus provide jobs for the many young Algerians who are increasingly angry about being unemployed. The Chinese workers are very efficient and tend to get their projects done on time and on budget. This makes the Chinese popular with the government which, mainly because of corruption, is notoriously inefficient, especially when it comes to building things for the public.

April 27, 2013: President Bouteflika suffered a mild stroke while visiting France.

The president suffered a stroke and spent three months in France receiving treatment. Since returning in July, he has stayed largely out of the public eye. Despite this, he carried out a major cabinet reshuffle in September, and two months later the FLN announced that it had nominated the 76-year-old to stand for a fourth term in office in 2014.

The 77 year old Bouteflika is one of the 1950s revolutionaries who led the battle for independence. He has been president since May 1999, and has continued the post-revolution of rigged elections and corruption. This is what the Islamic radicals rebelled against in the 1990s. That uprising was defeated mainly because the Islamic radicals seemed even worse than the corrupt “old revolutionaries.” Most Algerians are still unhappy with their government but not willing to suffer through another revolution, not yet.

Three local defense force volunteers were killed 70 kilometers east of the capital. The attackers were believed to be Islamic terrorists, which the 94,000 local defense force volunteers watch out for. First organized in 1994, the defense volunteers were a key element in defeating the Islamic terrorist uprising of the 1990s.

April 28, 2013: An air force patrol spotted four vehicles carrying armed men crossing the Libyan border. Soldiers were sent to intercept and the resulting gun battle left five Islamic terrorists and three soldiers dead.
Another ten terrorists fled into the desert and troops pursued them. This was the largest clash with Islamic terrorists since the terrorist raid on a natural gas field near the border in January.

May 2, 2013: In the south (Chlef province) police arrested a man wearing an explosive belt and prevented a suicide bomber attack. The arrested man was recruited by al Qaeda.

May 5, 2013: Police attacked several hundred young people demonstrating outside parliament and demanding economic reforms that would create more jobs. Several demonstrators were arrested and dozens injured. The unemployment rate of those under 35 is over 20 percent and many who are employed don’t get paid much. The government has created a lot of pointless and low-paid government jobs that just make those getting them more eager for a real job. More jobs are not being created because of decades of government corruption and rules that discourage entrepreneurs and new businesses that would threaten those run by friends of the government. Despite this discontent, no one has been able to get large scale and persistent demonstrations going. This is partly because the police have been able to detect and disrupt attempts to organize larger protests. This is largely due to the internal intelligence services, which became larger and more effective during the anti - terrorism campaign of the 1990s, and did not “demobilize” after the terrorists were defeated a decade ago. So when the Arab Spring came along two years ago, the Algerian government was ready (which similar governments in neighboring Tunisia and Libya were not).

The defeat of al Qaeda in Mali has sent hundreds of experienced Islamic terrorists looking for a new refuge. Algeria, because of its large and experienced counter-terrorism forces, is not seen as a suitable destination. Tunisia and Libya, on the other hand, are. Many of these Mali refugees have also gone to Europe, despite the large and alert counter-terrorism forces there.

In the Atlas Mountains, just across the Tunisian border, police and soldiers have been searching for about fifty Islamic terrorists who are operating near the Kasserine Pass. Tunisian security personnel are searching a hundred square kilometers of sparsely populated forests and mountains without much success. Algerian border security in that area has been increased, in case the terrorists try to flee into Algeria. This is the first time Tunisia has had to deal with armed Islamic terrorists since 2007. These armed men have been active in the area for at least six months. Some of these terrorists recently fled Mali and others are from Algeria. These were joined by a smaller group (a dozen or so) of Tunisian Islamic terrorists who had apparently not been active until joined by all these new men and a few local recruits. Eleven of the 32 terrorists killed nearby in an attack on an Algerian natural gas field in January, were Tunisian, which provided a hint that there were a lot more Islamic terrorists in Tunisia than the government wanted to admit.

May 8, 2013: More ethnic violence has broken out in the south (Ghardaia, 600 kilometers south of the capital), where at least a dozen were injured in street fighting between Arabs and Berbers. There was also a religious element to the hostility as the local Berbers belong to a Shia sect. Algerians Arabs tend to be Sunni and Sunni conservatives consider Shia heretics. An increasing number of Berbers are also converting to Christianity, as a protest against the continued persecution of Berbers. This further infuriates the Sunnis. The government says that only 11,000 (out of 34 million) Algerians are Christian. But Christian religious leaders say the number is 30,000 and growing fast, especially among Berbers. The government fears these Berber Christians and Berbers in general. The Berbers, a people related to the ancient Egyptians, were the original occupants of Algeria. Arab armies conquered the country over a thousand years ago, but, unlike other Arab conquests, most Berbers did not adopt Arab language and customs. Today, about a third of Algerians are Berbers and speak the Berber language, Tamazight. There has always been tension between Berbers and Arabs, and now Berbers are demanding that their language be made one of Algeria's official languages. The Arab dominated government refuses to consider this.

May 9, 2013: Over the last few days security forces killed seven Islamic terrorists in the Atlas Mountains near the Tunisian border. That makes 31 Islamic terrorists killed in this area so far this year. Others are believed to have fled to Tunisia, where they are apparently active and being sought.

May 24, 2013: Algerian terrorist leader Mokhtar Belmokhtar (the planner of the January natural gas facility attack in southern Algeria that got 37 workers killed) is believed responsible for planning two recent attacks in nearby Niger. Belmokhtar was thought to have been killed in March, but that turned out to not be the case. Belmokhtar and supreme leader of al Qaeda in North Africa (Abdel Malek Droukdel) are believed to still be hiding out in Algeria. The recent destruction of so many al Qaeda bases in Mali and the death of hundreds of hard-core Islamic terrorists there have demoralized Islamic radicals throughout North Africa. At the same time all counter-terrorism forces in the region are trying to take advantage of all this by seeking out Islamic terrorists fleeing Mali. Belmokhtar appears to have made it out and is being sought in Algeria, Tunisia, Libya, and several countries to the south.

May 31, 2013: In the past week Tunisian police have arrested six more Islamic terrorists, bringing the number who have been killed or captured during search operations in the Atlas Mountains near the Algerian border to 45. Algerian security forces have been more active on the border. There are still some Islamic terrorists operating in the mountains along the east Algerian coast. Most of these men keep their heads down because of the heavy police and army presence.

June 1, 2013: Just across the Tunisian border a roadside bomb wounded three soldiers searching a remote portion of the Atlas Mountains for several dozen Islamic terrorists hiding there.

June 3, 2013: The U.S. announced a $5 million dollar reward for Algerian terrorist leader Mokhtar Belmokhtar (dead or alive). Belmokhtar is believed responsible for a lot of the terrorist violence in Algeria and elsewhere in the region this year. The reward was one of several recently announced for African terrorist leaders.

June 6, 2013: In Tunisia, just across the border, a roadside bomb killed two soldiers and wounded two others near Mount Chaambi.

In the Atlas Mountains, just across the Tunisian border, police and soldiers continue searching for about fifty Islamic terrorists who are operating near the Kasserine Pass and Mount Chaambi. Tunisian security personnel are searching a hundred square kilometers of sparsely populated forests and mountains without much success. So far twenty soldiers and police have been hurt, with three killed (all in recent attacks). Algerian border security in that area has been increased, in case the terrorists try to flee into Algeria or obtain reinforcements from Algeria. This is the first time Tunisia has had to deal with armed Islamic terrorists since 2007. These armed men have been active in the area for at least six months. Some of these terrorists recently fled Mali and others are from Algeria. These were joined by a smaller group (a dozen or so) of Tunisian Islamic terrorists who had apparently not been active until joined by all these new men and a few additional local recruits. There has been a lot of evidence that Tunisia is providing more Islamic radicals for terrorist groups. Eleven of the 32 terrorists killed in the attack on an Algerian natural gas field in January were Tunisian, which provided a hint that there were a lot more Islamic terrorists in Tunisia than the government wants to admit.

The government tried to placate the Islamic parties with new lifestyle laws (restricting alcohol consumption, for example) but this just made more Algerians angry. The government fears that the Islamic political parties, which only recently became legal again, might regain some of the popular support they lost during the Islamic terror campaign of the 1990s and that that could lead to another "Arab Spring" in Algeria. The first Arab Spring had little effect but the popular anger against the government has grown since then. Now, with the government paralyzed by a comatose president that the elderly leadership will not even admit is out -of-action, popular anger grows, despite improved economic conditions and declining terrorist activity.

June 9, 2013: Elderly (76 years old) president Abdelaziz Bouteflika has been gone for six weeks, hospitalized in France and apparently in a coma after a stroke. This has been declared (unofficially) a state secret and media that talks about it are being shut down. But in the Internet age you can’t stop the news that easily and there is growing public anger at the inaction this older generation of rulers has cursed the country with. The government is at least aware of this. Two years ago Bouteflika himself sensed that something was very wrong. He ordered a survey of public attitudes and was told that the people were very unhappy because the centralized economy was mismanaged, there was too much corruption and favoritism in the government, and the government officials were out - of-touch with the Algerian people. Then there was the way elections were handled. It was commonly believed the voting was rigged and government resistance to foreign election monitors seemed to confirm this. All this was nothing new to foreign observers of Algeria, but it apparently was surprising to many senior Algerian officials. The report warned of the potential for a violent uprising. This was supposed to be avoided with parliamentary elections last year that would create a legislature whose main chore was to create a new constitution. This was expected to toss out the old elected dictatorship of families who were prominent in the fight against colonial France half a century ago. As Algerians expected, the old "revolutionary" families did not give up power but they did surrendered some of it. This was apparently because the vote was so overwhelmingly against the ruling party in some districts that it was considered prudent to surrender these rather than risk local uprisings. The 2012 elections saw the ruling party win only 48 percent of the 462 seats. A pro-military party got 15 percent, giving the military dictatorship another lease on life. The seven Islamic parties got only 13 percent of the seats. The opposition claimed fraud, pointing out that international observers were not allowed to examine most electoral records and that only 42 percent of eligible voters turned out.

June 11, 2013: The government finally admitted that president Abdelaziz Bouteflika had a full stroke two months ago.

Two years ago Bouteflika himself sensed that something was very wrong. He ordered a survey of public attitudes and was told that the people were very unhappy because the centralized economy was mismanaged, there was too much corruption and favoritism in the government and the government officials were out-of-touch with the Algerian people. Then there was the way elections were handled. It was commonly believed the voting was rigged and government resistance to foreign election monitors seemed to confirm this. All this was nothing new to foreign observers of Algeria, but it apparently was surprising to many senior Algerian officials. The report warned of the potential for a violent uprising. This was supposed to be avoided with parliamentary elections last year that would create a legislature whose main chore was to create a new constitution. This was expected to toss out the old elected dictatorship of families who were prominent in the fight against colonial France half a century ago. As Algerians expected the old "revolutionary" families did not give up power, but they surrendered some of it. This was apparently because the vote was so overwhelmingly against the ruling party in some districts that it was considered prudent to surrender these rather than risk local uprisings. The 2012 elections saw the ruling party win only 48 percent of the 462 seats. A pro-military party got 15 percent, giving the military dictatorship another lease on life. The seven Islamic parties got only 13 percent of the seats. The opposition claimed fraud, pointing out that international observers were not allowed to examine most electoral records and that only 42 percent of eligible voters turned out.

June 13, 2013: The state controlled media finally released recent (day old) video of their elderly (76 years old) president Abdelaziz Bouteflika. There was no sound for the video and Bouteflika looked weak and not back in charge (as the government claimed). Bouteflika has been gone for six weeks, hospitalized in France after a stroke. At first this was declared (unofficially) a state secret and Algerian media that talked about it were shut down. But in the Internet age you can't stop the news that easily and there is growing public anger at the inaction from this older generation of rulers, that are seen as responsible for all the corruption and poor economic performance. The government is at least aware of this. Now most Algerians are demanding a new generation of leaders and Bouteflika is seen as old, ill, and unable to lead. But the elderly allies of Bouteflika cling to their disabled leader and refuse to share power or reform. This could get ugly because it's common knowledge in the medical community that major strokes can take months, or years, to recover from and to all appearances Bouteflika is in no shape to run the country. This means he will not be able (or not want) to run for reelection next April or lead any resistance to the growing calls for change.

June 20, 2013: The government said it would blacklist foreign companies that had bribed Algerian officials. This is a common technique for governments under pressure to "do something" about corruption and is an effort to avoid the fact that the corrupt officials are the main problem, not the foreign companies who are told they must offer bribes if they want the business. The problem lies mainly with the local officials, and the blacklist tends to backfire when it comes to some categories of equipment (military, oil production) because there are few suppliers. In Algeria the big problem with corruption is not foreign firms willing to pay but that the entire procurement bureaucracy and the senior officials they report to are in on the scam and everyone gets a cut.

June 23, 2013: MUJAO, a Mauritanian faction of AQIM (Al Qaeda in the Islamic Maghreb) has offered to trade an Algerian diplomat (one of several Algerians it holds) for three Islamic terrorists held in Algeria. MUJAO did not identify which terrorists it wanted released and threatened to kill their captive if Algeria did not agree to the swap. MUJAO is holding several of the seven Algerians seized in April 2012, as Tuareg rebels and Islamic terrorists took control of northern Mali. They lost control a year later to a French-led offensive. MUJAO had previously demanded millions of dollars in ransom for each of its captives, but Algeria refused to pay because they knew that would just make the terrorists more powerful (lots of cash does that) and even more dangerous. It's unclear where MUJAO is holding their captives now. If the hostages are still in northern Mali they are likely to be found by the continuing French-led counter-terrorism operations there. It's more likely MUJAO has either gotten the hostages to southern Li bya or wants to unload them for whatever they can get before the French-led search finds them.

June 24, 2013: There is less and less Islamic terrorist activity, and that is partly because many of the Islamic radicals have fled. First many went to Mali last year, but after the terrorist defeat in Mali earlier this year, many Algerian Islamic radicals fled for southern Libya and even Tunisia. Algeria is too well covered by anti-terror activity to be considered a sanctuary.
Libya is a different matter. Since Kaddafi was overthrown in 2011, Libya has turned into something of a sanctuary for Islamic terrorists. Not so much because the government allowed it, but more because the government could not prevent it. Benghazi was the largest urban area that was hospitable to Islamic terrorists, mainly because it was the last large city to have law and order restored by government security forces (and pro-government armed groups). That battle is still going on. Meanwhile in the south (away from the narrow "green" coastal area), the vast and thinly populated semi-desert and desert areas will not come under any government control for some time. Here the Islamic terror groups can operate more freely. The south is the next big battleground, for a much longer war. While Algeria appreciates the absence of terrorists in its territory, it is eager to help Libya take care of the problem there.

June 27, 2013: On the Libyan border (1,800 kilometers southeast of the capital) troops tracked down a cornered a group of Islamic terrorists who had secretly crossed the border. Seven of the Islamic terrorists were killed and troops continued searching for others. The army believes Islamic terror groups in Libya have been planning large attacks in Algeria.

July 12, 2013: In the east (Khenchela province), two civilians were killed and two wounded when they encountered a roadside bomb on a country road. The four were returning from a fishing trip and the Islamic terrorists apparently mistook them for a police patrol.

Algerian terrorist leader Mokhtar Belmokhtar (the planner of the January natural gas facility attack in the southeast that got 37 workers killed) has taken responsibility for planning two spectacular attacks in neighboring Niger last month. Belmokhtar was thought to have been killed in March but that turned out to not be the case. In response the U.S. has put a $5 million price on his head. Belmokhtar and supreme leader of al Qaeda in North Africa (Abdel Malek Droukdel) are believed to be still hiding out in southern Algeria, or just across the border in Libya. The recent destruction of so many al Qaeda bases in Mali, and the death of hundreds of hard-core Islamic terrorists there has demoralized Islamic radicals throughout North Africa. At the same time all counter-terrorism forces in the region are trying to take advantage of all this by seeking out Islamic terrorists fleeing Mali. Belmokhtar appears to have made it out and is being sought in Algeria, Tunisia, Libya and several countries to the south.

In Algeria the terrorism campaign was a little longer and a lot bloodier (over 100,000 dead) than in Egypt (a few thousand dead). As in Algeria, there have been more terrorist attacks since then, but on a much lower level of intensity. Egyptians, like Algerians, have had it with Islamic terrorists and their false promises. Both countries are still trying to do something about the persistent corruption that makes their lives so miserable. In both countries the military is as corrupt as every other aspect of government. Many Algerians see the Egyptian situation as confirmation that you cannot do business with the Islamic radicals, who want a religious dictatorship and really do believe that democracy is un-Islamic.

July 17, 2013: In Egypt the army deposed an elected Islamic radical government on July 3rd. Some comparisons are being made to a similar situation in Algeria two decades ago. The comparisons tend to ignore some important differences. First, the Algerian Islamic parties were blocked from taking power and went on to garner popular support during their decade-long uprising by reminding Algerians of all the good things that would have happened if the generals had not stepped in. In Egypt the Islamic parties had a year to act and they mostly did things that disappointed or frightened Egyptians. Moreover Egypt has had a recent bout of Islamic terrorism, when Islamic radicals launched a major terror campaign and were crushed in the 1990s, largely because the public turned against them. Some of the leaders of that terror campaign fled Egypt, and one of them now is the head of al Qaeda. Several of these Moslem Brotherhood leaders (and many followers) helped organize al Qaeda.

July 19, 2013: Outside the capital a checkpoint confrontation led to the death of a senior al Qaeda leader and four of his associates. Weapons and documents were found in their vehicle.

July 22, 2013: On the Tunisian border, 630 kilometers southeast of the capital, police intercepted a truck trying to cross the border carrying a ton of phosphate fertilizer (often used for making bombs).

July 29, 2013: Just across the border in Tunisia, eight soldiers were killed in an Islamic terrorist ambush near Mount Chaambi.

August 1, 2013: Just across the border in Tunisia, soldiers fought with a group of Islamic terrorists near Mount Chaambi . There were no casualties and the terrorists escaped.

August 2, 2013: Just across the border in Tunisia, soldiers and warplanes launched a major operation to find and kill Islamic terrorists hiding near Mount Chaambi.

August 3, 2013: In the northeast (Kabylie) Islamic terrorists ambushed an army patrol and killed one soldier and wounded two.

August 4, 2013: Just across the border in Tunisia, two soldiers were killed and four wounded when their armored vehicles hit a landmine. In the Tunisian capital police killed an Islamic terrorist and arrested five others during a raid.

August 6, 2013: In the northeast (Kabylie) Islamic terrorists ambushed a police patrol and killed three policemen.

Meanwhile in the Atlas Mountains, just across the Tunisian border, police and soldiers have spent over four months hunting for up to fifty Islamic terrorists who are operating near the Kasserine Pass and Mount Chaambi . Tunisian security personnel are searching a hundred square kilometers of sparsely populated forests and mountains without much success. This is the first time Tunisia has had to deal with armed Islamic terrorists since 2007. These armed men have been active in the area since January. Some of these terrorists recently fled Mali and others are from Algeria. These were joined by a smaller group (a dozen or so) of Tunisian Islamic terrorists who had apparently not been active until joined by all these new men and a few additional local recruits. There has been a lot of evidence that Tunisia is providing more Islamic radicals for terrorist groups. Eleven of the 32 terrorists killed in the attack on an Algerian natural gas field in January were Tunisian, which provided a hint that there were a lot more Islamic terrorists in Tunisia than the government wants to admit.

August 8, 2013: Tunisian and Algerian security forces are increasingly coordinating their operations on their mutual border. At the moment there is a lot more Islamic terrorist activity in Tunisia, especially by several dozen terrorists hiding in the Atlas Mountains on the Tunisian side of the border. Algerian police and troops have been mobilized to make sure these thugs stay on the other side of the border, or die while trying to enter Algeria.

Mokhtar Belmokhtar was also the planner of the January natural gas facility attack in southern Algeria that got 37 workers killed. Belmokhtar has a reputation for always escaping the many efforts to kill or capture him, and the U.S. is offering a $5 million reward for him dead or alive. Belmokhtar was number two or three in the North African al Qaeda organization (Al Qaeda in the Islamic Maghreb or AQIM) but formed his own splinter group in late 2012. AQIM and the Belmokhtar splinter group had members from all over North Africa but mostly from Algeria, and while defeated in Mali, it was not destroyed there. Al Mourabitoun has announced that it is planning attacks against French citizens and businesses in Africa, as well as targets in Egypt (to support the recently deposed Moslem Brotherhood government there). Al Mourabitoun will probably not try to carry out more attacks in Algeria, where the security forces are eager to nail Belmokhtar for the many attacks he has previously carried out in his homeland. Belmokhtar appears to be moving around in Niger and southern Libya.

August 21, 2013: A notorious Algerian Islamic terrorist (Mokhtar Belmokhtar) has merged his al Qaeda splinter group with a Mauritanian Islamic terror group to form a new group: Al Mourabitoun. The Mauritanian component of Al Mourabitoun is the MOJWA (Movement for Oneness and Jihad in West Africa, largely composed of black African Islamic radicals and led by Mauritanians). MOJWA is unique among Islamic terrorist groups because its leadership is black African. Mauritanian security forces have made it very difficult for MOJWA to operate in Mauritania, and that’s why so many MOJWA members moved to Mali in the last year. Since France intervened in Mali this year, MOJWA and the Belmokhtar group have moved. The new group has already been operating, largely in Niger where it recently carried out several daring attacks (including a prison break in June and twin bombings in May).

August 22, 2013: There was a rare terrorist attack in the mountains of Western Algeria, which left three of four hunters dead and beheaded. Police are seeking the killers, who may not be Islamic terrorists but probably are.

August 24, 2013: Border police in Western Algeria are intercepting more drug smugglers bringing in hashish and cocaine via Morocco. This indicates that the al Qaeda controlled drug smuggling operation from tropical Africa (south of the Sahara desert) is recovering from the disruption inflicted by the French-led intervention in northern Mali last January. This operation led to increased security on all of Mali's borders and the entire southern Algeria frontier. Al Qaeda lost a lot of people in Mali this year and this hurt the drug smuggling operation al Qaeda was running via Mali.

August 25, 2013: Just across the border in Mali French troops arrested a senior al Qaeda leader (Mousbaa Nadir) who was thought to be hiding in Algeria.

August 28, 2013: Three soldiers were killed and four wounded west of the capital (Ain Defla province) by a roadside bomb. The army patrol was searching the coastal hills for Islamic terrorists believed to be hiding there.

August 31, 2013: Tunisia announced restrictions on border crossings with Algeria and Libya. Local authorities would have to vouch for anyone coming in or going out. This is all about preventing Islamic terrorists up north in the Atlas Mountains from getting out and for stopping anyone from Libya coming to the aid of these terrorists.

September 5, 2013: In a rural village 300 kilometers east of the capital some 300 people demonstrated about water shortages outside a government building. Police were called and 19 people were arrested while breaking up the crowd. There are more demonstrations like this as people demand more from their corrupt and often incompetent government.

September 8, 2013: In two incidents 110 and 50 kilometers east of the capital security forces killed two Islamic terrorists. Weapons and ammo were seized in both incidents.

September 10, 2013: Algerian Islamic terrorist Mokhtar Belmokhtar has shown up in a new video, refuting claims that he was killed. Belmokhtar is infamous for organizing the January raid on a natural gas facility in southern Algeria that got 70 people killed (including all the attackers). Last month he announced the formation of a new Islamic terrorist group (Al Mourabitoun) that merged African Islamic terrorists (mostly from Mauritania) with the largely Algerian and other Arab men Belmokhtar had been leading. Belmokhtar likes to let people believe he is invincible. That began when Belmokhtar survived fighting Russians in Afghanistan during the 1980s. After that he fought, and lost, an Islamic terrorist uprising in Algeria during the 1990s. After that he joined al Qaeda and carried out several attacks. Last year he split from al Qaeda and formed another Islamic terror group in Mali. He soon had to flee the French-led invasion of northern Mali and is now believed to be in Niger or Libya.

The government has come out in opposition to any foreign intervention in the Syrian civil war. Algeria has long called for an end to violence in Syria but only through negotiation. While many members of the Algerian dictatorship would like to see the Assad family retain power in Syria, it is more important to keep the "Arab Spring" movement out of Algeria. So far, the "old revolutionaries" (the families that led the 1950s war against the French colonial government) continue to run Algeria and exploit it for their own benefit. This has been going on since the French left in the early 1960s. They do this via rigged elections and a very efficient security force. Using government power to cripple opposition parties does not always work. For example, in 1992, Islamic parties won an election that would have given them control of the government. The military staged a coup to halt that, which triggered fifteen years of Islamic terrorism. Although the Islamic terrorists were defeated, they were not destroyed, and a few hundred terrorists and supporters keep the killing going, if just barely. While the government has the edge, as long as the nation is run by an unpopular dictatorship there will continue to be unrest.

September 12, 2013: Over the last four months some 12,000 troops have been sent to the Tunisian border. There, sixty new outposts and small bases were established and have apparently succeeded in preventing any of the Islamic terrorists active just across the border from entering Algeria. Tunisian forces have been searching for this group (of at least 30 armed men) but have only encountered them a few times since January. The terrorists have staged some bombings and ambushes but have apparently devoted most of their efforts to not getting found. Algeria fears that if the Tunisian forces get too close the Islamic terrorists will try to escape via Algeria. Some of the Tunisian terrorists are believed to have been men who were in northern Mali and fled the French-led January offensive.

September 12, 2013: On the Libyan border near the Zintan crossing several hundred Libyans fled into Algeria to get away from a tribal feud that had left 11 dead and over 20 wounded in the past few days.

September 22, 2013: East of the capital (Boumerdes province) troops ambushed a group of Islamic terrorists and killed two of them.

September 27, 2013: East of the capital (Boumerdes province) troops clashed with Islamic terrorists and after four hours of fighting killed five of them.

At the moment Bouteflika's most dangerous enemies are the senior people in the intelligence and security agencies who are keen on cleaning up the corruption. There are also a lot of military officers who favor the ant i-corruption drive. Fortunately for Bouteflika, many senior military commanders are corrupt, some because they felt refusing the economic perks that were offered when they achieved high rank should not be refused. Bouteflika believes the loyalty of the military is essential to keeping his corrupt crew in power. Now there is a split within the military and many corrupt leaders are moving more of their assets out of the country, just in case. If there's another large-scale uprising and the military refuses to suppress it (or, worse, splits or falls apart because of disagreements among officers) the current government is done. Bouteflika also realizes that most of the troops are keen on anti -corruption efforts. In short, it's a dangerous time in Algeria.

Two years ago Bouteflika himself seemed to sense that something was very wrong. He ordered a survey of public attitudes and was told that the people were very unhappy because the centralized economy was mismanaged, there was too much corruption and favoritism in the government, and the government officials were out-of-touch with the Algerian people. Then there was the way elections were handled. It was commonly believed the voting was rigged and government resistance to foreign election monitors seemed to confirm this. All this was nothing new to foreign observers of Algeria, but it apparently was surprising to many senior Algerian officials. The report warned of the potential for a violent uprising. This was supposed to be avoided with the 2012 parliamentary elections that were supposed to create a legislature whose main chore was to create a new constitution. This was expected to toss out the old elected dictatorship of families who were prominent in the fight against colonial France half a century ago. As Algerians expected the old "revolutionary" families did not give up power but they surrendered some of it. This was apparently because the vote was so overwhelmingly against the ruling party in some districts that it was considered prudent to surrender these rather than risk local uprisings. The 2012 elections saw the ruling party win only 48 percent of the 462 seats. A pro-military party got 15 percent, giving the military dictatorship another lease on life. The 7 Islamic parties got only 13 percent of the seats. The opposition claimed fraud, pointing out that international observers were not allowed to examine most electoral records and that only 42 percent of eligible voters turned out. If the vote had been run fairly, Bouteflika and his allies would be gone.

Bouteflika had planned to run for reelection after his current term ends next April. That has changed because of the stroke, and now the plan is to halt the anti-corruption effort and get a Bouteflika ally elected as the next president. This could get messy, as it means rigging the election, just the sort of corrupt behavior the reformers are trying to shut down. Meanwhile, Bouteflika is having more problems controlling the news. This was obvious when news of his stroke was declared (unofficially) a state secret and Algerian media that talked about it were shut down. But in the Internet age you can’t stop the signal that easily and there is growing public anger at the inaction of this older generation of rulers that are seen as responsible for all the corruption and poor economic performance. The government is at least aware of this and the fact that most Algerians are demanding a new generation of leaders. Bouteflika is seen as old, ill, and unable to lead. But the elderly allies of Bouteflika cling to their disabled leader and refuse to share power or reform. These old guys are backed by their clans, which contain lots of younger men who want the good times to continue. This could get ugly. While Bouteflika is in no shape to run the country, he appears to realize that. Thus, his maneuvers to remove senior people who have anti-corruption attitudes and replace them with those who don’t mind the dirty deals.

Bouteflika had a stroke back in April and spent 6 weeks in France receiving treatment. He returned in June and has now sufficiently recovered to direct a crucial battle against the anti -corruption drive. Bouteflika is doing this by removing or transferring any senior officials who are or appear to be allies with the anti-corruption groups, especially those in the military.

While most Algerians want the government to clean up the rampant corruption, many senior government officials resist these efforts and that has produced a strange power struggle. The outcome of this conflict will decide whether there will be another revolution. The anti-corruption effort is led by several senior Intelligence officers, some of them from the Berber minority. Most of the corrupt officials and citizens belong to the extended family of the elderly (76 years old) president Abdelaziz Bouteflika and clans of several other families that led the country after freedom was achieved in the 1960s.

September 28, 2013: So far this year the security forces have killed 140 Islamic terrorists and arrested another 49. Most of this action took place along the borders with Mali, Tunisia, and Libya. Thousands of additional troops have been sent to the borders of these countries (plus Morocco), to prevent Islamic terrorists from moving in or out and to keep weapons smugglers out. This has led to an increase in smugglers being caught, although drugs and consumer goods are still the most common cargo. There have been more weapons coming in from Mali and Libya. On the Morocco border the traffic is mainly fuel, which costs 4 times as much in Morocco because that country has to import all its fuel. The most aggressive and violent drug smugglers are coming out of Niger, where al Qaeda still runs the drug smuggling. Troops from Algerian and Niger cooperate to spot and go after these smugglers, who tend to travel in convoys of 4x4 pickups and SUVs full of drugs and armed men. You don't just arrest these guys, you have to fight them and some of the convoys contain 10 or more vehicles.

October 1, 2013: Last month army personnel cleared over 4,800 mines along the eastern and western borders. Many of these mines date back to the 1960s.

October 2, 2013: Tunisian police arrested 4 Islamic terrorists near the Algerian border. In the last 3 days police have arrested 31 actual (armed) or suspected Islamic terrorists in Tunisia. While several dozen armed Islamic terrorists are operating in the Atlas Mountains near the Algerian border, there are hundreds more throughout the country trying to organize an uprising that would establish a religious dictatorship. Most Tunisians want nothing to do with this.

October 3, 2013: West of the capital a roadside bomb went off, wounding 3 civilians. In the southern oasis town of Ghardaia, violence between Arab and Berber residents over water and religion led to 4 arrests and 6 policemen wounded while breaking up riots.

Parliament is introducing stricter laws against terrorism and smuggling. The smugglers often work for Islamic terrorists, getting weapons and personnel in and out of the country. The new laws will make it easier to go after the smugglers.

October 10, 2013: Algerian security forces on the southern borders with Mali and Libya killed 8 Islamic terrorists and captured weapons, documents, and vehicles. Unlike the operations in the Atlas Mountains up north, the border patrols have been more successful at killing and capturing Islamic terrorists.

October 11, 2013: Across the border in Tunisia, soldiers raided a house near the Kasserine Pass where a terrorist leader and some followers were reported (by a local informant) to be. After an hour long gun battle the Islamic terrorists escaped, leaving behind a phone and some ammo. Tunisian border police and soldiers have spent over 4 months hunting for up to 50 Islamic terrorists who are operating near the Kasserine Pass and Mount Chaambi in the Atlas Mountains just across the border. Tunisian security personnel are searching a hundred square kilometers of sparsely populated forests and mountains without much success. This is the first time Tunisia has had to deal with armed Islamic terrorists since 2007. These armed men have been active in the area since January. Some of these terrorists fled Mali earlier this year and others are from Algeria.

The government believes that 4 diplomats taken captive by Islamic terrorists in Mali in April 2012 are still alive. But there is no direct contact with the captors and trying to free the 4 is difficult. The government does not want to pay ransom, so as not to encourage more such attacks.

Oil and natural gas account for 95 percent of exports and the foreign currency needed to buy imports. Most food is imported and over the last three decades the economy has stagnated because of corruption and continued belief in centralized control. If the current leadership (who have been in power since France left in the 1960s) wants to prevent another rebellion they have to fix the economy. But as long as the leaders refuse to allow foreign investment and local entrepreneurs to operate freely economic revival is not happening. Official unemployment is 10 percent but that includes a lot of marginal jobs provided by the government. For men under 30, the government admits there is a much higher unemployment rate (over 20 percent), and these are the people who would start and sustain another revolution. Few of these young men are attracted to Islamic terrorism any more, but most want some economic and social changes and so far all the government offers are admissions that there is a problem but no real solutions. Meanwhile, oil income is shrinking because current oil and gas fields are running dry and government investment restrictions and inept management hamper efforts to find new fields. The population increases and those who do not flee the country become angrier and more impatient.

October 14, 2013: The January raid on a natural gas facility in southern Algeria (near the Tunisian border) that got 70 people killed (including all the Islamic terrorist attackers) has resulted in much tighter security around the facility and all others. The foreign firms are satisfied with the new security arrangements and are allowing their citizens to return to work at the plant. Without the foreigners, full production has not been resumed and a lot of other technical work had to be postponed.

October 17, 2013: In northeastern Tunisia two policemen were killed as a group of Islamic terrorists was being pursued.

October 19, 2013: In northeastern Tunisia police have killed 10 Islamic terrorists over the last few days.

October 23, 2013: In neighboring Tunisia seven policemen were killed fighting Islamic terrorists south of the capital. Tunisia blames some of its Islamic terrorist problems on a lack of law and order in Libya and the ability of the Islamic terrorists to bring in weapons stolen from Kaddafi era armories. Islamic terrorists also maintain bases in the south, especially the southeast near the Niger border. These are the bases that can send terrorists into neighboring Algeria or straight north to Tunisia. The Algerian border is well guarded, so many terrorists head for Tunisia where they have established bases in the Atlas Mountains near the Mediterranean coast. Tunisian soldiers and police have been searching for these bases all this year, without much success.

October 25, 2013: The government revealed that troops had recently discovered a large cache of weapons hidden near the Libyan border. In addition to assault rifles, RPG launchers, and rockets and landmines, there were also 500 shoulder fired anti-aircraft missiles and 100 larger anti-aircraft missiles. The government did not reveal the country that produced the weapons, but it is likely they were Russian made weapons from Libya. Smugglers have been getting those weapons, stolen from unguarded military warehouses during the 2011 rebellion. Some of these stolen weapons have been showing up all over the Middle East and Africa. This cache was probably left by smugglers who were waiting for the increased security in the area to diminish before trying to move the weapons.

October 26, 2013: The government announced the discovery of another oil field, one with up to 1.3 billion barrels of oil (worth over $150 billion). The new field was 112 kilometers from what is currently the largest oil field in the country.

October 28, 2013: Police arrested 20 people living in Tlydjen, a town on the Tunisian border, and accused them of providing support for Islamic terrorists. Police had been seeking out people who, for ideological of financial reasons, support Islamic terrorists. Taking down this network creates another portion of the border where Islamic terrorists cannot operate freely.

October 30, 2013: Neighboring Tunisia suffered its first suicide bombing. The bomber walked onto a beach at a tourist resort 150 kilometers south of the capital and detonated his explosives. The bomber died but no one else was injured. Police quickly found and arrested another bomber and found a bomb workshop in a local house.

At least 34 foreign workers have returned to the natural gas facility in southern Algeria (near the Tunisian border) where 70 people died (including all the Islamic terrorist attackers) in January when al Qaeda took control of the place. That resulted in much tighter security around that facility and all others. The foreign firms are satisfied with the new security arrangements and have allowed their citizens to return to work at the plant. Without the foreigners, full production has not been resumed and a lot of other technical work had to be postponed. Oil and natural gas accounts for 95 percent of exports and the foreign currency needed to buy imports. Most food is imported and over the last three decades the economy has stagnated because of corruption and continued belief in centralized control. If the current leadership (who have been in power since France left in the 1960s) wants to prevent another rebellion, they have to fix the economy. But as long as the leaders refuse to allow foreign investment and local entrepreneurs to operate freely, economic revival is not happening. Official unemployment is 10 percent but that includes a lot of marginal jobs provided by the government. For men under 30, the government admits there is a much higher unemployment rate (over 20 percent) and these are the people who would start and sustain another revolution. Few of these young men are attracted to Islamic terrorism any more, but most want some economic and social changes, and so far all the government offers are admissions that there is a problem but no real solutions. Meanwhile, oil income is shrinking because current oil and gas fields are running dry and government investment restrictions and inept management hamper efforts to find new fields. Despite that, one new field has been discovered, and that means less pressure on the government to clean up the corruption in the oil industry. Meanwhile, the population increases and those who do not flee the country become angrier and more impatient.

October 31, 2013: Additional soldiers and police are patrolling the Tunisian and Libyan borders to keep Islamic terrorists out and to look for terrorist camps or supply caches.

November 2, 2013: In the west (near al Sawrah) soldiers caught up with a group of Islamic terrorists and killed five of them. The army had received a tip that Islamic terrorists were going to try and sneak into al Sawrah and establish a safe house.

November 5, 2013: In a southern desert area an army patrol rescued 61 illegal migrants from Niger and Guinea. The illegal migrants had started their journey in Niger but two of their vehicles had broken down. Algeria and Niger are under growing pressure from Europe to do more to halt the illegal immigrants, who risk death in the desert and at sea as they try to get into Europe.

November 11, 2013: A Chinese automobile manufacturer (FAW, with annual sales of $61 billion) made a deal with an Algerian company to set up an automobile assembly plant in Algeria that would put together 10,000 cars a year. Most of the components and technology would come from China. FAW would invest over $60 million to get the operation going.

November 19, 2013: Four Islamic terrorists were sentenced to 20 years in prison for kidnapping 15 tourists in 2003. The four were working for al Qaeda at the time.

In Niger the government shut down camps used by illegal migrants after the bodies of 92 people (most of them women and children) were found in the desert. Their vehicles had broken down in late October and the illegal migrants ran out of water after five days and died.

Over the last five years Polisario got involved in the cocaine smuggling operation run by al Qaeda. This provides money, some of which goes to guns and vehicles, making the Polisario fighters more formidable. Mali and Mauritanian police are increasingly arresting members of the Polisario Front who are involved with a major drug smuggling operation (moving cocaine from Guinea-Bissau, where it is flown in from South America, to the Mediterranean coast). Polisario Front members have long been involved in smuggling and other illegal activities, but their involvement in moving cocaine is relatively recent. This implies cooperation with al Qaeda, which apparently has worked out deals with Polisario. This has alarmed other nations in the region, but Algeria refuses to back away from its long-standing support for an independent state of Western Sahara. This is despite the fact that such a nation would be run by criminals and terrorists and be dependent on foreign aid and criminal activities to survive. For Algeria it's all about national pride, at least for the increasingly unpopular Algerian leadership. These are the people who originally provided the support to keep Polisario going in the first place. This is yet another reason for Algerians to be unhappy with their government. Most Algerians see Polisario and the Western Sahara issue as an expensive mistake and are more concerned with economic issues at home.

In the 1990s, Algeria cut off all support for Polasario. But that, and UN efforts to mediate the differences, have just not worked. The contested area is largely desert with a current population of less than 600,000. Logic would have it that the area is better off as a part of Morocco. But there are still thousands of locals who would rather fight for independence than submit to Morocco. Some resistance is tribal and cultural, with the Moroccans seen as another bunch of alien invaders. The area was administered, until 1976, as a Spanish colony. Most Western Saharans have made peace with Moroccan rule. Polisario still has several thousand armed men based in the refugee camps and refuses to accept Moroccan rule of Western Sahara. If the fighting breaks out again, possibly inspired by Islamic radicals, it could go on for years, just as it does in many other parts of Africa and the immediate neighborhood.

This is all connected with the declining prospects of Polisario, which has been in bad shape since 1991. Back then, Morocco finally won its war with Polisario Front rebels, who were seeking independence for the Western Sahara (a region south of Morocco). Polisario remains powerful in Mauritania, where the rebel group has official recognition and maintains several more refugee camps. In the beginning (the 1960s) Polisario was so well-subsidized by Algeria, back when Algeria was a radical state, that Polisario still has enough diehards out there to keep a lot of people in the Western Sahara unhappy. This policy was known to provide recruits and sanctuary for al Qaeda and other Islamic radicals. For two decades the UN has been trying to work out a final peace deal between Polasario and Morocco.

November 20, 2013: Algeria has succeeded in neutralizing Algerian Islamic terrorists who sought to take control of the government, but it having growing problems with another group of Moroccan terrorists (Polisario) that it helped create decades ago. This action caused problems with neighboring Morocco and the problem recently got worse. The two countries recently recalled ambassadors and there is talk of escalation. This has made cooperation (in counter-terrorism or anything else) with Morocco impossible and provided Islamic terrorists with a safe haven in Polisario refugee camps in Algeria (90,000 refugees) and Mauritania (24,000).

December 2, 2013: Just across the border in Tunisia one soldier was killed and another wounded by an Islamic terrorist landmine near the Mount Chaambi. Tunisian border police and soldiers have spent nearly a year hunting for several dozen Islamic terrorists operating near the Kasserine Pass and Mount Chaambi in the Atlas Mountains just across the border. Tunisian security personnel are searching a hundred square kilometers of sparsely populated forests and mountains without much success. This is the first time Tunisia has had to deal with armed Islamic terrorists since 2007. These armed men have been active in the area since January. Some of these terrorists fled Mali after the January 2013 French advance into northern Mali and others are from Algeria. Tunisia has had more success arresting or killing Islamic terrorists who have shown up in urban areas this year and is still finding evidence of some hiding out in the Atlas Mountains.

December 4, 2013: In the southern desert the army picked up the trail of an AQIM (Al Qaeda in the Islamic Maghreb) leader and three companions. The army wanted to capture the man (Khalil Ould Addah, number three in the AQIM leadership) alive but when it appeared he might escape through the desert during the night, ordered a helicopter to fire on the two SUVs Addah and his followers were in. Their bodies were later found and some useful intel was recovered. The two SUVs had come from northern Mali and Addah was believed headed for a meeting of the AQIM leadership somewhere in Algeria.

December 12, 2013: Additional soldiers and police are patrolling the Tunisian and Libyan borders to keep Islamic terrorists out and to look for terrorist camps or supply caches. The most difficult border is the 960 kilometers long one with Tunisia. That’s because it is near the coast, where most of the population, roads and Islamic terrorist hideouts in forests of the coastal mountains are. Further south you have fewer roads, people and trees to hide the smugglers and terrorists. In the desert regular ground and air patrols have a good chance of spotting trucks that are typically used for valuable goods, like weapons and explosives for Islamic terrorists, who pay a lot of money to get this stuff across the border. The borders with Libya, Niger and Mali are largely in the Sahara desert, which offers few places to hide and large distances to be crossed before you reach anything of value. There are few roads and these are patrolled and monitored by checkpoints. This has become a major problem for the Islamic terrorists. The northern routes, near the Mediterranean are not much safer, mainly because most of the professional smugglers (who make a living a sneaking goods across the border) won't deal with Islamic terrorists and let the army and police know this. That enables bribes to be paid, but only if the smuggling group (often family or clan organizations) keeps its word. The terrorists are always offering large bonuses to smugglers, but few want to endanger their livelihood for a one time score. Moreover, other smugglers will turn in those among them who deal with terrorists, so as to avoid a police crackdown on the entire group and area where Islamic terrorists or weapons are found getting in. The smugglers know that even if you get past the border zone you are not safe because the Algerian patrols continue all along the coast and the security forces are always looking for evidence (especially from terrorists or criminals they can interrogate) about smuggling activity. Thus smugglers regard dealing Islamic terrorists or weapons as toxic. The police know this and, in effect, put less pressure on "clean" smuggling in order to make it more difficult for "dirty" smuggling to take place at all. This has made life very hard for Islamic terrorists in Algeria.

December 13, 2013: In the east (Tizi Ouzou province) troops killed two Islamic terrorists.

December 18, 2013: The United States designated Mokhtar Belmokhtar an international terrorist and that makes him liable for arrest worldwide and prohibits anyone from dealing with him. Belmokhtar is infamous for organizing the January 2013 raid on a natural gas facility in southern Algeria that got 70 people killed (including all the attackers and three American civilians). In 2013 he announced the formation of a new Islamic terrorist group (Al Mourabitoun) that merged African Islamic terrorists (mostly from Mauritania) with the largely Algerian and other Arab men Belmokhtar had been leading. This group has also been blacklisted by the United States. Belmokhtar likes to let people believe he is invincible. That began when Belmokhtar survived fighting Russians in Afghanistan during the 1980s. After that he fought, and lost, an Islamic terrorist uprising in Algeria during the 1990s. Then he joined al Qaeda and carried out several attacks. Last year he split from al Qaeda and formed another Islamic terror group in Mali. He soon had to flee the French-led invasion of northern Mali and is now believed to be in Niger or Libya.

In the east (Constantine province) troops ambushed a group of Islamic terrorists and killed all three of them. Seized were three AK-47s and much else.

December 25, 2013: In the southern oasis town of Ghardaia violence between Arab and Berber residents over water and religion has gone on for two days. The police, who are largely Arab, are accused of being biased against the Berbers. The ethnic tensions have been active since 2008 and there was another outbreak of violence last October.

December 29, 2013: Agreements were signed with Libya to increase economic and security cooperation. Both nations will send more troops and police to their mutual border and the forces on both sides will coordinate operations more closely.

December 30, 2013: In the Libyan city of Misrata Libyan security forces arrested Saifallah Ben Hassine, the leader of Tunisian terror group Ansar Sharia. Hassine was released from a Tunisian prison in 2011 after the revolution in an amnesty. He was serving a 43 year sentence for Islamic terrorism (he was a collaborator with Osama Bin Laden even before September 11, 2001) and he promptly resumed those activities by organizing Ansar Sharia and making attacks on politicians that opposed his goal of turning Tunisia into a religious dictatorship. Ansar Sharia is responsible for most of the Islamic terrorism in Tunisia and has openly claimed allegiance with al Qaeda. The group also operates in Libya and cooperates with similarly named (but separate) groups in Libya. Ansar Sharia claimed that their leader was not captured and it’s still uncertain if he was.

January 1, 2014: Despite threats by Islamic terrorists that they would attack New Year’s Eve celebrations in Tunisia, nothing much happened. The security forces took the threats seriously and took precautions. At least seven suspected Islamic terrorists were arrested for taking part in attack preparations.

January 5, 2014: Just across the border in Tunisia army artillery shelled suspected Islamic terrorist activity in the mountains near the coast. The army believes there are still about 30 Islamic terrorists hiding in the mountains. While unable to hunt these men down after more than a year of effort, the constant air and foot patrols and liberal use of artillery and air strikes on anyone spotted up in those forests and hills has kept the terrorists more concerned about their survival than plotting attacks elsewhere.

January 10, 2014: The U.S. declared Tunisian group Ansar Sharia to be international Islamic terrorists. Also designated was the group's leader Seifallah Ben Hassine.

The security forces are not a total loss as they have been successful in destroying most Islamic terrorists in the country and keeping these groups from reviving. But the military ignored all the signs that the resurgent Islamic terrorist groups in Libya and Mali were capable of striking vulnerable Algerian oil and gas facilities in the largely desert south. The attack revealed that the military had not prepared for such an eventuality and were caught by surprise. The foreign firms believe the military has not yet come to fully appreciate the threat. The best army and police units are still in the north where most of the population lives. There is better security on the Mali border but the Libyan frontier is regularly violated by many smugglers and some of these criminals are believed to help Islamic terrorists come and go as well, if only because the terrorists pay well.

Foreign firms that operate much of the Algerian oil and gas industry are still uneasy about the ability of the military to protect facilities out in the desert. The January 2013 Islamic terrorist raid on a natural gas plant near the Libyan border is blamed on poor performance by the Algerian security forces, and the government refuses to accept the assessment of the foreigners. Algeria cannot afford to expel the foreign firms and has not interfered with the foreigners upgrading their own security. In the past the government opposed the foreign firms creating their own security forces and for years that seemed to be no problem. But after the 2013 attack the foreign firms realized that the rumors of inept and corrupt military leadership were true and that they had to defend themselves or leave. They let the government know how they felt.

January 11, 2014: In the south, there has been less Islamic terrorist activity on the Mali border in the last year and the government is publicizing this in an effort to revive the tourist industry down there. The Islamic terrorist violence in the south after 2008 saw tourism shrink dramatically (from 30,000 visitors a year to a few hundred). The government made it clear that troops are assigned to provide security for tourist sites and tourists.

January 16, 2014: Algeria's Bouteflika returns from Paris after check-up’

BBC News - Algeria's President Abdelaziz Bouteflika, 76, has returned home after a medical check-up at a hospital in Paris, state media reports. He flew back earlier than scheduled because of an "overall improvement" in his health, the APS news agency reports. Mr Bouteflika, who suffered a mini-stroke last year, was admitted to the French Val-de-Grace hospital on Monday.

Presidential elections are due to be held in Algeria in April. The ruling National Liberation Front (FLN) has nominated him to run for a fourth term, but he has not yet accepted the nomination. Last year, Mr Bouteflika received medical treatment in France for three months after suffering a mini-stroke. His critics say he leads an authoritarian regime, and should hand power to a younger generation.

He became president in May, 1999 and is regarded as being among the last of a generation of leaders who fought in the 1954-1962 war of independence from France. A leaked US diplomatic cable in 2007 suggested he might be suffering from terminal stomach cancer and in the last few years he has rarely appeared in public or travelled outside the capital. (Text ends)

January 19, 2014: The government has upgraded already close security cooperation with Mali. Algeria has increased its patrols along its Mali border over the last year. The new agreements make possible more joint operations against Islamic terrorists operating near the border.

January 22, 2014: The government has ordered several thousand additional police to the southern city of Ghardaia where ethnic and religious violence has been out-of-control for a month now.

January 23, 2014: About 120 kilometers south of the capital police ambushed and killed four Islamic terrorists. Last week two Islamic terrorists had been killed in the same area, indicating that Islamic terrorists had returned to an area that was popular with terrorist groups in the 1990s.

January 29, 2014: In the southeast the Amenas gas plant, the scene of a major Islamic terrorist attack a year ago is expected to be back to full production in February. The 2013 attack greatly reduced production. The plant normally produces 11-12 percent of Algeria's natural gas, most of which is exported. Before the attack the foreign firms that operate the plant had planned an expansion but that is still on hold because of the 2013 attack and the belief that the government has not upgraded security sufficiently.

February 2, 2014: A new agreement with Tunisia improved cooperation on security matters, especially those related to Islamic terrorists.

At the moment Bouteflika's most dangerous enemies are the senior people in the intelligence and security agencies who are keen on cleaning up the corruption. There are also a lot of military officers who favor the anti - corruption drive. Fortunately for Bouteflika many senior military commanders are corrupt, some because they felt refusing the economic perks that were offered when they achieved high rank should not be refused. Bouteflika believes the loyalty of the military is essential to keeping his corrupt crew in power. Now there is a split within the military and many corrupt leaders are moving more of their assets out of the country, just in case. If there's another large-scale uprising and the military refuses to suppress it (or, worse, splits or falls apart because of disagreements among officers) the current government is done. Bouteflika also realizes that most of the troops are keen on anti -corruption efforts. In short, it's a dangerous time in Algeria.

Back in 2011 Bouteflika himself seemed to sense that something was very wrong. He ordered a survey of public attitudes and was told that the people were very unhappy because the centralized economy was mismanaged, there was too much corruption and favoritism in the government and the government officials were out-of-touch with the Algerian people. Then there was the way elections were handled. It was commonly believed the voting was rigged and government resistance to foreign election monitors seemed to confirm this. All this was nothing new to foreign observers of Algeria, but it apparently was surprising to many senior Algerian officials. The report warned of the potential for a violent uprising. This was to be avoided with the 2012 parliamentary elections that was supposed to create a legislature whose main chore was to create a new constitution. This was expected to toss out the old elected dictatorship of families who were prominent in the fight against colonial France half a century ago. As many Algerians expected the old "revolutionary" families did not give up power, but they surrendered some of it. This was apparently because the vote was so overwhelmingly against the ruling party in some districts that it was considered prudent to surrender these rather than risk local uprisings. The 2012 elections saw the ruling party win only 48 percent of the 462 seats. A pro-military party got 15 percent, giving the military dictatorship another lease on life. The seven Islamic parties got only 13 percent of the seats. The opposition claimed fraud, pointing out that international observers were not allowed to examine most electoral records and that only 42 percent of eligible voters turned out. If the vote has been run fairly Bouteflika and his allies would be gone.

In 2013 it was believed that the plan was to get a Bouteflika ally elected as the next president. It was feared that this would get messy as it meant rigging the election even more than usual. This is just the sort of corrupt behavior gets a growing number of Algerians very angry. Meanwhile Bouteflika is having more problems controlling the media. This was obvious when news of his stroke was declared (unofficially) a state secret and Algerian news outlet that talked about it was shut down. But in the Internet age you can't stop the signal that easily and there was growing public anger at the inaction of this older generation of rulers that are seen as responsible for all the corruption and poor economic performance. The government is at least aware of this and the fact that most Algerians are demanding a new generation of leaders. Bouteflika is seen as old, ill and unable to lead. But the elderly allies of Bouteflika cling to their disabled leader and refuse to share power, or reform themselves. These old guys are backed by their clans, which contain lots of younger men who want the good times (for them) to continue. This could get ugly. While Bouteflika is in no position to reform the country he appears to realize that. Thus his maneuvers to remove senior people who have anti - corruption attitudes and replace them with those who don't mind the dirty deals.

President Abdelaziz Bouteflika, who suffered a stroke last April and was hospitalized in France, is running for another five year term. This is very unpopular. A growing number of political parties are openly refusing to participate because this is seen as another rigged election. Bouteflika was first elected in 1999 then re-elected in 2004 and 2009. The vote rigging got worse with each election. The 76 year old president recently spent a few days in France getting more medical tests. Bouteflika is seen representing the corruption and cronyism that has crippled economic growth for half a century. Most of the corrupt officials and citizens belong to the extended family of the elderly president and clans of several other families that have led the country after freedom was achieved in the 1960s. Bouteflika had a stroke back in April and returned in June and soon was sufficiently recovered to direct a crucial battle against the anti -corruption activists in the government who saw the stroke as a sign to make a move. Bouteflika responded by removing or transferring any senior officials who appeared to be allies of the anti -corruption groups, especially those in the military.

The civil war in Syria has attracted a lot of Algerian Islamic terrorists and nearly 300 are believed to have died in Syria since 2011. The Syrian violence has radicalized a few more Algerian young men, but it has taken more out of the country and led to a noticeable reduction in Islamic terrorist activity over the last two years.

February 3, 2014: In the southern oasis town of Ghardaia violence between Arab and Berber residents over water, ethnicity and religion has gone on since late December. Nearly a hundred people have been arrested and there have been over a hundred casualties. The police, who are largely Arab, are accused of being biased against the Berbers. The ethnic tensions in this area, 600 kilometers south of the capital, have been growing since 2008 and there was another outbreak of violence in October 2013. The Arabs accuse the 800,000 Berbers in the south of supporting al Qaeda. In addition to the ethnic tensions there are also disagreements over religion. The Arabs belong to the Maliki school of Islam while the Berbers are largely from the less common Ibadi school. About 30 percent of Algerians are Berber, but the percentage is higher in the south. Ghardaia is an ancient Berber city of 90,000 that contains many Ibadi shrines. Arabs have recently desecrated some of these shrines, which resulted in violent Berber reprisals when those images appeared on the Internet. The government is concerned for several reasons. For one thing there are oil fields are nearby. Worse, the sustained unrest among the Berbers could be the first breeze in a storm of reform that could engulf the entire country. The government has seen this ill wind coming for some time.

February 3, 2014: In the east (Boumerdes province) a bomb went off near a police checkpoint killing and civilian and wounding two others.

February 4, 2014: In the southwest (Adrar province) police captured arms smugglers who were transporting three rifles and a large quantity of ammunition

February 8, 2014: The government ordered another 3,000 police reinforcements to join the 3,000 already sent to the southern oasis town of Ghardaia. There, violence between Arab and Berber residents over water, ethnicity and religion has gone on since late December. The fighting flared up again on the 25th when Arabs rioted to get arrested Arab rioters freed from jail. Over a hundred people have been arrested and there have been neatly 200 casualties (including four dead). The police, who are largely Arab, are accused of being biased against the Berbers. The ethnic tensions in this area, 600 kilometers south of the capital, have been growing since 2008 and there was another outbreak of violence in October 2013. The Arabs accuse the 800,000 Berbers in the south of supporting al Qaeda. In addition to the ethnic tensions there are also disagreements over religion. The Arabs belong to the Maliki school of Islam while the Berbers are largely from the less common Ibadi sect. About 30 percent of Algerians are Berber, but the percentage is higher in the south. Ghardaia is an ancient Berber city of 90,000 that contains many Ibadi shrines. Arabs got the unrest started by desecrating some of these shrines. This led to violent Berber reprisals, especially when images of the damage appeared on the Internet. The government is concerned for several reasons. For one thing there are oil fields are nearby. Worse, the sustained unrest among the Berbers could be the first breeze in a storm of reform that could engulf the entire country. The government has seen this ill wind coming for some time. The tensions in Ghardaia continue and more violence is expected.

February 16, 2014: Just across the border in Tunisia some Islamic terrorists wearing army uniforms set up a checkpoint and killed four people (three of them government employees) and then left before the security forces found out and came looking for them. The terrorists took the two vehicles their victims had been driving. Two days earlier the army had captured an Islamic terrorist in the same area.

February 18, 2014: The government denied that there was a feud raging between the intelligence service and the military. For months there have been rumors of senior people in the intelligence and security agencies who are keen on cleaning up the corruption and pressuring the government to support this effort. There are also a lot of military officers who favor the anti-corruption drive and the government responded by accusing the reformers of being disloyal and plotting a coup. Fortunately for Bouteflika many senior military commanders are corrupt, some because they felt refusing the economic perks that were offered when they achieved high rank might be interpreted as disloyalty. Bouteflika believes the loyalty of the military is essential to keeping his corrupt crew in power. Now there is a split within the military and many corrupt leaders are moving more of their assets out of the country, just in case. If there’s another large-scale uprising and the military refuses to suppress it (or, worse, splits or falls apart because of disagreements among officers) the current government is done. Bouteflika also realizes that most of the troops are keen on anti - corruption efforts.

February 21, 2014: In the southeast (400 kilometers from the capital) police seized a weapons workshop and the two men who operated it. Five guns, gunpowder and 400 recently made bullets were seized. It’s unclear if the operators of the workshop supplied Islamic terrorists as well as local criminals (or anyone who wanted an unregistered firearm).

February 22, 2014: Algeria's President Bouteflika to run for re-election’

BBC - Algeria's president, who has not publicly addressed the country for nearly three years, will be running for a fourth term in April. Abdelaziz Bouteflika, 76, suffered a stroke last year and critics say he is still too ill to govern.

His candidature was announced by Prime Minister Abdelmalek Sellal. "Even if he has not completely recovered physically, I can assure you he is in possession of all his mental and intellectual faculties," he said. Algeria has the largest land area of any African state, is rich in oil and gas, and under President Bouteflika has been an ally of the US.

The president, in power since 1999, is one of the few remaining veterans of the war of independence against France. He is credited by his supporters with curbing a brutal insurgency by Islamist extremists and restoring economic stability. But he has had persistent health problems and his rule has recently been dogged by corruption scandals implicating members of his inner circle.

Despite regular elections, power in Algeria remains in the hands of a small group of military and intelligence leaders. The question of whether Mr Bouteflika would seek re-election has dominated Algerian politics in recent months, with normally concealed differences between senior party and military officials emerging in public. This month, a retired senior general urged him to step down "with dignity" and not stand for re-election. One opposition figure called on the president to publish his medical records before seeking office again.

Mr Bouteflika has appeared only rarely on television and always in a wheelchair since returning from a four-month convalescence in Paris after his stroke. He appears to have limited movement on one side of his body.

Despite his illness, correspondents say he is still likely to win the 17 April election. His National Liberation Front party has ruled Algeria for nearly three decades and opposition political groups are weak. (Text ends)

February 24, 2014: Russia reports that Algeria will order two more Kilo class diesel-electric subs. In late 2013 Algeria received the two Russian Kilo class boats they ordered in 2009. The Kilos weigh 2,300 tons (surface displacement), have six torpedo tubes and a crew of 57. They are quiet, and can travel about 700 kilometers under water at a quiet speed of about five kilometers an hour. Kilos carry 18 torpedoes or SS-N-27 anti-ship missiles (with a range of 300 kilometers and launched underwater from the torpedo tubes.) The combination of quietness and cruise missiles makes Kilo very dangerous to all surface ships. China, India, Vietnam and Iran have also bought Kilos. Nearly 60 Kilos have been built or are under construction.

February 27, 2014: Soldiers seized a truck near the Libyan border and found it to be carrying 40 unguided rockets and several SAM-7 portable anti-aircraft missiles. This was an al Qaeda operation and two of the men with the shipment were captured while several others escaped across the border into Libya.

February 28, 2014: Prominent reformist politicians are refusing to participate in the upcoming presidential election because aging (and quite ill) incumbent Abdelaziz Bouteflika and that means the voting will be rigged. Opposition political parties are calling for a widespread boycott of the election. Bouteflika is 76, suffered a stroke in 2013 and does not look well at all. Despite his infirmities several of Bouteflika's allies are putting their ailing boss forward for another term in order to avoid a nasty fight to select a successor. The Bouteflika gang consists of powerful families that took over after the French left in the 1960s and have used corruption and coercion to get rich and monopolize political power. The rigged elections, corruption and economic stagnation (largely a result of the corruption) are creating growing unrest. While the government got some love for crushing the Islamic terrorist uprising in the 1990s that good will has largely dissipated.

March 1, 2014: In the capital police blocked and dispersed another anti - government demonstration.

March 2, 2014: East of the capital (the Kabylie region) police raided a terrorist hideout and killed three Islamic terrorists.

March 4, 2014: The government ordered 42 M-28N helicopter gunships and four Mi-26T2 heavy transports from Russia for $2.7 billion.

March 5, 2014: East of the capital (the Kabylie region) police at a checkpoint, fearing an attack by Islamic terrorists, fired on a car that would not stop in the pre-dawn darkness. The four people in the vehicle turned out to be innocent civilians but the gunfire killed one of them and wounded two others. It's unclear why they did not stop. There are fe w incidents like because it's widely known that the soldiers and police will open fire if you don't stop. The last incident like this happened in 2011 when two people were killed at a checkpoint.

March 8, 2014: Officials from Mali and Algeria met in Algeria to work out ways the two countries could improve security on their mutual border. Mali is being very cooperative because they want the border reopened. Algeria closed the official border crossings in January 2013 to make it more difficult for Islamic terrorists to get into Algeria from Mali. This shut down trade and that hurt Mali more than Algeria. Meanwhile Algeria sent more troops to the border area and went after the smugglers and others trying to cross illegally. Mali is willing to coordinate efforts to secure the border and if a mutually agreeable deal can be worked out the border will reopen.

March 12, 2014: In the capital police disrupted an anti-government protest and dispersed the 60 or so demonstrators. Police said the demonstration was illegal. According to the government just about every hostile demonstration is illegal. But people keep coming out.

March 14, 2014: Near the Tunisian border soldiers attacked a group of Islamic terrorists that were sneaking in from Tunisia. When confronted on the road the Islamic terrorists fled their vehicles and tried to escape into the forest. Troops pursued and killed seven of them. The troops seized seven rifles, 3,600 rounds of ammo, grenades, radios and night vision gear as well as two vehicles. One of those was later identified as a senior Islamic terrorist leader who has been wanted since the 1990s. Another Islamic terrorist was killed a hundred kilometers east of the capital.

Just across the border in northwest Tunisia troops clashed with some Islamic terrorists and killed three of them. Another four had been killed in a similar clash in February. Algeria has increased security on the Tunisian border over the last year to keep Islamic terrorists based in Tunisia out of Algeria.

Some 500 kilometers east of the capital, on the Algerian side of the Tunisian border a police raid caught up with nine Islamic terrorists, killing three and arresting the rest. Some of them were Tunisian but most were Algerian. The mountains and forests on the border have long been a hideout for smugglers, bandits and Islamic terrorists.

March 17, 2014: In the southern city of Ghardaia weekend violence between Arabs and Berbers left three dead and dozens wounded.

March 19, 2014: About a hundred kilometers east of the capital (in the largely Berber Kabylie region) an army patrol encountered and killed three Islamic terrorists.

March 21, 2014: In the capital 5,000 people assembled in a sports stadium to hear secular and Islamic conservative politicians denounce the decision by the 77 year old president to run for a fourth term. President Bouteflika is still recovering from a stroke and has been inept at managing the economy, corrupt and ruthless in crippling political opponents but quite competent when it comes to rigging elections. Bouteflika is unpopular and Algerians are becoming bolder and louder in their protests. The government believes that using more force against the protestors might trigger more resistance and possibly even armed resistance.

Algeria has taken a lead role in the international effort to make it illegal to pay ransoms to Islamic terrorists. Having suffered from Islamic terrorists for over two decades, Algeria has ample evidence that ransoms paid to Islamic terrorists simply leads to more kidnappings and murders. In short, paying ransom in general is counter-productive although each kidnapping is very much a tragedy for those involved. Algeria has made a lot of progress in getting African nations to outlaw the payment of ransoms. In making its case Algeria points out that a third of the kidnappings by Islamic terrorists takes place in Africa. It’s no secret that the Islamic terrorists consider large ransoms a major source of income needed to finance more terrorism. While the logic is impeccable, in practice it’s difficult to stop the ransoms from being paid.

Arabs got the unrest started by desecrating some of these shrines. This led to violent Berber reprisals, especially when images of the damage appeared on the Internet. The government is concerned for several reasons. For one thing there are oil fields are nearby. Worse, the sustained unrest among the Berbers could be the first breeze in an uprising that could engulf the entire country. The government has seen this ill wind coming for some time. The tensions in Ghardaia continue and more violence is expected, especially before the presidential election on April 17th.

An example of the intensity of the public anger can be seen down south in the oasis town of Ghardaia . Over the last three months the government has gradually sent more than 10,000 additional police to deal with the persistent unrest. In Ghardaia the violence between Arab and Berber residents is all about water rights, jobs, land, ethnicity and religion. Arabs also accuse the 800,000 Berbers in the south of supporting al Qaeda. The unrest has been going on since late December. Over a hundred people have been arrested and there have been over 200 casualties (including at least 13 dead). Over a hundred building has been burned down along with dozens of vehicles. Thousands have fled the city and many businesses stay closed for days or weeks at a time. The police, who are largely Arab, are accused of being biased against the Berbers. The ethnic tensions in this area, 600 kilometers south of the capital, have been growing since 2008 and there was another outbreak of violence in October 2013 that was put down. As bad as the ethnic tensions have been there are also disagreements over religion. The Arabs belong to the Maliki school of Islam while the Berbers are largely from the smaller Ibadi sect. About 30 percent of Algerians are Berber, but the percentage is higher in the south. Ghardaia is an ancient Berber city of 90,000 that contains many Ibadi shrines. The province Ghardaia is in is on the edge of the Sahara Desert and contains only 200,000 people.

March 22, 2014: President Abdelaziz Bouteflika is finding that the usual methods of dealing with an unruly population no longer work. Most Algerians want Bouteflika and his corrupt cronies out of power. As long as Bouteflika still has the support of the security forces he can hang on, but as public anger grows that will spread to the soldiers and police, who have a better sense of the public mood than the wealthy and corrupt officials and businessmen who surround Bouteflika. This could get ugly and to avoid losing power the government offered to change the constitution to, in theory, give people more access to government decision making. Most Algerians see this another scam that provides the illusion of democracy while the reality is still rigged elections and bureaucrats doing what they want, not what the people need.

March 22, 2014: Thousands join rare Algeria rally’

BBC - Thousands of Algerian opposition supporters have called for a boycott of next month's presidential election, during an unprecedented mass rally. Islamist and secular opposition parties at the rally denounced 77-year-old President Abdelaziz Bouteflika's attempt to win a fourth term of office. They say a stroke last year has left him unfit to govern.

Mr Bouteflika, in power since 1999, scrapped constitutional rules in 2008 limiting him to two terms in office. He has rarely been seen in public in recent months, but correspondents say the backing of the governing National Liberation Front (FLN), army factions and business elites almost guarantees him election victory.

The real Algeria: Chanting "boycott" and "the people want the regime out" about 5,000 people packed into the sports stadium where various opposition leaders denounced Mr Bouteflika's re-election bid and demanded reforms to a political system they see as corrupt. Large opposition gatherings are unusual in Algeria, where FLN elites and army generals have dominated politics since independence from France in 1962.

"The people here are the people who have been excluded, who have been put aside, but this is the real Algeria," Rally for Culture and Democracy (RCD) party spokesman Mohsen Belabes told cheering crowds. "The regime will collapse, but Algeria will survive." Correspondents say Mr Bouteflika ordered heavy spending from Algeria's oil earnings on housing, public services and infrastructure projects to offset social unrest after the Arab Spring uprisings across North Africa in 2011.

But the parties within the opposition are not united and remain weak, analysts say. Evidence of this disunity was evident at Friday's rally, where rival Islamist and secular supporters heckled and taunted at each other across the stadium. The president is one of the few remaining veterans of the war of independence against France. But he has had persistent health problems and his rule has recently been dogged by corruption scandals implicating members of his inner circle.

Mr Bouteflika, who has been in power for nearly 14 years, is said to want to push through constitutional reforms before the election to create a "civil society" and limit the political influence of the Department of Intelligence and Security (DRS). (Text ends)

April 6, 2014: Some 320 kilometers east of the capital (Jijel) police raided an Islamic terrorist hideout and killed a female member of a local terrorist cell. Police seized several weapons, computers and other evidence.

April 8, 2014: In the south (Ghardaia) more unrest between Berbers and Arabs left 35 people injured, including 17 policemen.

April 10, 2014: Just across the border in Tunisia a roadside bomb went off near an army patrol but caused no injuries.

Just across the border in Tunisia a roadside bomb wounded a farmer driving by on a tractor. The tractor was being escorted by an army armored vehicle which was apparently the target. Although twenty Tunisian soldiers and police were killed in 2013 while trying to clear Islamic terrorists out of this border area, things have been a lot quieter so far this year. But that changed today because in addition to the roadside bomb Tunisian warplanes found and bombed an Islamic terrorist camp in the same area where the roadside bombing occurred. Troops later reached the bombed site but found no bodies.

April 11, 2014: More violence broke out down south in the oasis town of Ghardaia leaving two policemen and about ten civilians injured . Over the last four months the government has gradually sent more than 10,000 additional police to deal with the persistent unrest. In Ghardaia the violence between Arab and Berber residents is all about water rights, jobs, land, ethnicity and religion. Arabs also accuse the 800,000 Berbers in the south of supporting al Qaeda. The unrest has been going on since late December. Over a hundred people have been arrested and there have been over 400 casualties (including at least 13 dead). Over a hundred building has been burned down along with dozens of vehicles. Thousands have fled the city and many businesses stay closed for days or weeks at a time. The police, who are largely Arab, are accused of being biased against the Berbers. The ethnic tensions in this area, 600 kilometers south of the capital, have been growing since 2008 and there was another outbreak of violence in October 2013 that was put down. As bad as the ethnic tensions have been there are also disagreements over religion. The Arabs belong to the Maliki school of Islam while the Berbers are largely from the smaller Ibadi sect. About 30 percent of Algerians are Berber, but the percentage is higher in the south. Ghardaia is an ancient Berber city of 90,000 that contains many Ibadi shrines. The province Ghardaia is in is on the edge of the Sahara Desert and contains only 200,000 people. Arabs got the unrest started by desecrating some of these shrines. This led to violent Berber reprisals, especially when images of the damage appeared on the Internet. The government is concerned for several reasons. For one thing there are oil fields are nearby. Worse, the sustained unrest among the Berbers could be the first breeze in an uprising that could engulf the entire country. The government has seen this ill wind coming for some time.

The tensions in Ghardaia continue despite strenuous government efforts to deal with it and more violence is expected, especially before the presidential election on April 17th. Berbers are found throughout North Africa, west of Egypt and down to the semi-desert Sahel (where the closely related Tuareg tribes live). The six million Berbers of Algeria are considered the most abused in the region.

April 12, 2014: Islamic terrorists released a video of one of the three Algerian diplomats taken captive by Islamic terrorists in Mali in April 2012. This is the first message from the kidnappers since January 2013. Originally seven Algerians were taken but since then three have been released and one killed. Now there is proof that one of the three is still alive. There has been no direct contact with the captors since a French led invasion of northern Mali in January 2013. It was believed the Islamic terrorists holding the Algerians were on the run and it was hoped that the French would find and free them. That has not happened and now the Islamic terrorists holding one of the Algerians feel secure enough to resume demanding ransom. The government does not want to pay ransom, so as not to encourage more such attacks.

April 13, 2014: About 120 kilometers east of the capital (in the largely Berber Kabylie region) troops ambushed some Islamic terrorists and killed two of them. Later in the day, further east (Khenchela, near the Tunisian border) troops killed four more Islamic terrorists.

Bouteflika has been in power since 1999 and he held on mainly because the oil price shot up because of growing demand from India and East Asia. The Algerian government took in over $700 billion dollars during the last fifteen years and Algerians could not help but notice that senior politicians and their families became enormously rich while the rest of the economy stagnated and the unemployment rate kept going up. In response to this the government has been more active in prosecuting corrupt officials, but it's always the lower ranking ones. The most senior people and their families are largely immune. These families became rich via the simple technique of adding 10-20 percent to the cost of government contracts and distributing that money among themselves. Nothing unique about that, nor about how as long as the security forces are well paid and content the plundering can continue indefinitely. Only a major uprising can upset this and that is very hard to get going as long as the people running the government know who to pay off, who to chase out of the country and who to imprison or murder. Many Algerians believe the current crooks running things are losing their touch and many Algerians see growing opportunities for another revolution. That, however, is no panacea because these rebellions against corrupt older rebels often results in a new generation of corrupt officials taking over. This is an ancient problem in nations that have lucrative natural resource exports. With lots of money flowing through a small group of people (the government) it is all too easy for those in power to take a cut and pay off enough subordinates to keep this scam going indefinitely, or until replaced by another gang of crooks.

April 16, 2014: The presidential election is held tomorrow and the voters are not happy at the fact that the incumbent (Abdelaziz Bouteflika) is being reelected even though he is too infirm (via age and a recent stroke) to campaign himself, much less govern. The give other candidates believe the government will rig the vote. Most Algerians want Bouteflika and his corrupt cronies out of power but that is not happening as long as Bouteflika still has the support of the security forces. He does have that support so he can hang on. As public anger grows there is a the growing risk of dissatisfaction spreading to the soldiers and police, who have a better sense of the public mood than the wealthy and corrupt officials and businessmen who surround Bouteflika. This could get ugly and to avoid losing power the government offered to change the constitution to, in theory, give more people more access to government decision making. Most Algerians see this another scam that provides the illusion of democracy while the reality is still rigged elections and bureaucrats doing what they want, not what the people need.

April 17, 2014: The incumbent president (Abdelaziz Bouteflika) was reelected to a forth five year term. He received 81 percent of the vote in what is widely regarded as a rigged election.

April 18, 2014: Across the border in the Chaambi Mountains an army patrol suffered one dead and three wounded when their vehicle hit a landmine on a rural dirt road.

April 19, 2014: About a hundred kilometers east of the capital Islamic terrorists ambushed an army convoy and killed 14 soldiers while at least twenty were wounded. Over a thousand troops were sent to the area to seek out and capture or kill those responsible for the attack (the worst in several years).

April 20, 2014: In the town of Tizi Ouzou (about a hundred kilometers east of the capital) troops clashed with a crowd of over 400 Berbers protesting police brutality and ill treatment of Berbers.

April 24, 2014: Across the border in the Chaambi Mountain town of Kasserine a Tunisian soldier was wounded when his patrol clashed with some Islamic terrorists. Such patrols have been scouring the area in preparation for a major sweep of the mountains.

April 25, 2014: A hundred kilometers east of the capital troops killed two Islamic terrorists and recovered weapons and ammunition. The soldiers involved are part of the force assembled to find those responsible for an ambush on the 19th. This brings to ten the number of Islamic terrorists killed since the 19th.

April 28, 2014: Newly reelected Abdelaziz Bouteflika took the oath of office in a televised ceremony that was embarrassing for all concerned. Bouteflika was in a wheelchair and struggled to get through the 94 words in the oath. His speech was obviously abbreviated and largely incoherent. Bouteflika is 77 and suffered a stroke in 2013 that he has obviously not recovered from. Despite his infirmities several of Bouteflika's allies put their ailing boss forward for another term in order to avoid a nasty fight to select a successor. The Bouteflika gang consists of powerful families that took over (as leaders of the rebellion against the French) after the French left in the 1960s and have used corruption and coercion to get rich and monopolize political power. The rigged elections and economic stagnation (largely a result of the corruption) are creating growing unrest. While the government got some love for crushing the Islamic terrorist uprising in the 1990s that good will has largely dissipated.

April 30, 2014: Just across the Tunisian border in the Chaambi Mountains thousands of troops and police began a major operation to find hidden Islamic terrorist camps. Algeria also moved more troops to the border area opposite the Chaambi Mountains to prevent any fleeing Islamic terrorists from entering Algeria. These big sweeps in the Chaambi Mountains usually come up empty but often they get close enough to hidden terrorist camps to cause some of the terrorists to move, sometimes across the border, until the search operation is over. Tunisia insists that this operation is different and will continue until the terrorists are found or troops have set up small bases in the region blocking the known routes through the mountains terrorists and smugglers use to get around covertly.

Tunisia is now offering amnesty to Islamic terrorists. This is the same kind of amnesty Algeria has successfully used since 2005. That means as long as you have not killed anyone (or are sure no one can prove you did), you are eligible. In Algeria this process cost the terrorist groups a lot of manpower, with many factions losing most of their people. Moreover, some of the former terrorists went to work for the police who were seeking the hard core Islamic terrorists that had plenty of blood on their hands. The Tunisian government also revealed that it had recently arrested eight Islamic terrorist supporters who had been providing logistical support for hundreds of Islamic terrorists hiding out in the Chaambi Mountains near the Algerian border. These are the sort of people the amnesty is aimed at because without a source of supply (food, ammo, batteries for radios and such, clothing and so on) and people able to smuggle it to remote camps, Islamic terrorists won't last long in wilderness areas like the Chaambi Mountains.

May 6, 2014: Over the last two days troops in the south (Tin-Zaouatine, on the Mali border) have killed at least ten Islamic terrorists caught trying to enter Algeria. Most of the dead terrorists were foreigners. The interlopers had arrived via the Adrar des Ifoghas Mountains, which are mostly in Mali and have long been a popular area for terrorist bases.

May 8, 2014: The blatant manner in which the government rigged the April 17 th presidential election prompted many opposition groups to form a new coalition. Thus the ANC (Alliance Nationale pour le Changement or National Alliance for Change) was quickly put together with high hopes and bleak prospects. That's because ANC success is unlikely because this alliance contains groups split by ethnic, religious, political and economic beliefs. The families that have ruled the country for half a century are focused on maintaining their political power and retaining their embezzled fortunes. Nevertheless the national mood has grown angrier and the trend of more and more protest demonstrations is apparently escalating. This sort of thing leads to injuries and deaths among the protestors which in turn leads to more people willing to consider armed resistance. But many Algerians still have bitter memories of the 1990s when a major uprising of Islamic conservative groups left over 200,000 dead and inflicted enormous economic damage. Fear of going through that again continues to damper enthusiasm for another revolution.

May 13, 2014: Some 50 kilometers east of the capital soldiers ambushed some Islamic terrorists and killed two of them. So far this year the security forces have killed 39 Islamic terrorists and made dozens of terrorism related arrests.

May 16, 2014: The government ordered its Libyan embassy shut down temporarily and most embassy personnel back to Algeria until things calm down in the Libyan capital.

May 19, 2014: The border with Libya was closed because a retired general there has organized a large force of fighters from the armed forces and tribal militias to go after the Islamic terrorist groups that have found sanctuary there. Algeria will reopen the border when things settle down. Most Algerian firms, including the state owned energy company, recalled workers they had in Libya and reduced or suspended Algerian operations in Libya. Algerian officials expect things to settle down sooner rather than later in Libya.

May 21, 2014: Algeria has approved allowing foreign companies to explore for shale gas deposits. These lie inland in a band across central Algeria from the eastern to the western borders. Algeria is believed to have some of the largest shale gas deposits in the world. Thus Algeria has potential shale gas deposits that are the energy equivalent of over five billion barrels of oil which is nearly as large as U.S. deposits and more than five times what Israel has found. The foreign energy firms will confirm how much recoverable shale gas is actually there. Moreover the Algerian reserves are far from the nearest source of water (the Mediterranean) and billions of dollars would have to be spent on infrastructure (pipelines to get sea water to the wells and other pipelines to get the gas to the coast and liquefaction plants so the gas could be exported). All this requires that Algeria remain at peace for the next few decades, which may be the most difficult task of all considering the growing social discontent at the corruption and misrule.

May 24, 2014: Just across the border in Tunisia an army armored vehicle hit a landmine, killing two soldiers and wounding three others.

May 27, 2014: In neighboring Tunisia Islamic terrorists unsuccessfully attacked the home of the Interior Minister in Kasserine. This is near Mount Chaambi, a remote area where Islamic terrorists have been active for years. The attack did kill four policemen before the attackers fled taking their casualties with them. The Interior Minister is the primary security official in the country and his efforts have been particularly successful against Islamic terrorists in the last year.

The families that have ruled Algeria for half a century are focused on maintaining their political power and retaining their embezzled fortunes no matter what. Nevertheless the national mood has grown angrier and the trend of more and more protest demonstrations is apparently escalating. This sort of thing leads to injuries and deaths among the protestors which in turn leads to more people willing to consider armed resistance. But many Algerians still have bitter memories of the 1990s when a major uprising of Islamic conservative groups left over 200,000 dead and inflicted enormous economic damage. Fear of going through that again continues to damper enthusiasm for another revolution.

The government expects GDP to grow 4.5 percent this year, compared to three percent in 2013. That news is supposed to cheer up Algerians but it is not working. The blatant manner in which the government rigged the April 17th presidential election prompted a lot more anti-government sentiment. Many opposition groups formed a new coalition, the ANC (Alliance Nationale pour le Changement or National Alliance for Change), to agitate for much-needed reforms. But the ANC was quickly put together with high hopes and bleak prospects. That's because ANC success is unlikely because this alliance contains groups split by ethnic, religious, political and economic beliefs. Thus it should be no surprise that the ANC is already paralyzed by internal disputes over exactly what to do.

May 30, 2014: More troops have been sent to guard the borders with Libya, Mali and Tunisia. These three countries have seen an increase in unrest or Islamic terrorist activity recently and it is feared that this will send more Islamic terrorists fleeing to Algeria for sanctuary. As inhospitable as Algeria is for Islamic terrorists the situations in Libya, Mali and Tunisia are becoming even more unpleasant. Algeria has always had problems with its land borders, which are 6,343 kilometers long and include frontiers with seven countries. Moreover most of these borderlands are in the thinly occupied desert. Before aircraft were invented it was impossible to secure these borders. But even with aircraft a tightly sealed border remains impossible. Libya, Mali and Tunisia comprise 52 percent of Algeria's borders and the 1.376 kilometer long Mali border is particularly troublesome since it is all desert and very popular with smugglers and other outlaws from the regions to the south. The smugglers, not the Islamic terrorists crossing borders are becoming a major problem. The smugglers tend to move a lot of counterfeit stuff, to the point that nearly a third of the goods offered for sale in Algeria are counterfeits. Most of these come from East Asia (mainly China) as well as a number of Arab countries. These counterfeits are often defective and, in the cases of food, medicine and spare parts for vehicles or machinery, downright dangerous. The government has been ineffective at dealing with the counterfeits, in part because a lot of officials at the ports and major border crossings take bribes to allow in large shipments of counterfeit goods.

June 1, 2014: The government has sent another 5,000 troops to the Libyan border just in case the recent fighting between Islamic terrorist groups and many tribal and military groups that oppose the Islamic radicalism, spills over into Algeria. So far that has not happened, mainly because most of the fighting is in eastern Libya.

June 12, 2014: Across the border in Tunisia police clashed with a group of Islamic terrorists, killed two armed men and seized weapons and documents.

June 15, 2014: In the capital several Mali Tuareg separatist groups signed an agreement to hold peace talks with each other and the Mali government to create a permanent settlement to the many disputes between the Tuareg and the Mali government.

June 19, 2014: In Tunisia intelligence officials revealed they had discovered terrorist plans to target Jews and Westerners in Tunisia, Egypt and Algeria for attack during Ramadan (June 28-July 28). Tunisia is one of the more secular Arab countries and attracts more Western tourists as a result but Algeria and Egypt are also popular tourist destinations for Westerners. The Islamic terrorists are going after the tourist trade because it is an important part of the economy and the source of forbidden (according to Islamic conservatives) cultural influences.

June 20, 2014: Just across the border in Tunisia an army patrol encountered a landmine planted by local Islamic terrorists. One soldier was killed and five wounded. Tunisian forces have been seeking out a few dozen Islamic terrorists who, for over a year, have evaded detection in the coastal mountains near the Algerian border.

June 21, 2014: The government has agreed to buy 980 Fuchs armored vehicles from a German firm. These are six wheeled armored vehicles similar to the American Stryker. Wheeled armored vehicles are more suitable for Algeria, which has lots of roads or trackless deserts that allow wheeled vehicles to operate effectively.

Algeria has had some recent successes in dealing with its long, largely unguarded borders. These are 6,343 kilometers long and include frontiers with seven countries. Moreover most of these borderlands are in the thinly occupied desert. Before aircraft were invented it was impossible to secure these borders. But even with aircraft a tightly sealed border remains impossible. About half that area is dangerous because of the Islamic terrorist threat in those countries. Libya, Mali and Tunisia comprise 52 percent of Algeria’s borders and the 1,376 kilometer long Mali border is particularly troublesome since it is all desert and very popular with smugglers and other outlaws from the regions to the south. Thus the Algerian effort to promote peace in northern Mail. This is having some success. Tunisia and Libya have also become less dangerous because Algeria is a hostile refuge for Islamic terrorists fleeing increasingly successful counter-terrorism efforts.

June 23, 2014: Many opposition groups have formed a new coalition but after meeting recently found that organizing for much-needed reforms was difficult because of numerous differences. This is an old problem in Algeria thus the opposition is stuck in a cycle of high hopes and bleak prospects. The opposition is split by ethnic, religious, political and economic beliefs. This creates disputes over exactly what to do as well as how to do it. Meanwhile the grassroots anger at the corrupt government grows. The families that have ruled Algeria for half a century are focused on maintaining their political power and retaining their embezzled fortunes no matter what. This has produced the needed unity among the families despite occasional disagreements. Nevertheless the national mood has grown angrier and the trend of more and more protest demonstrations is apparently escalating. This sort of thing leads to injuries and deaths among the protestors which in turn leads to more people willing to consider armed resistance. But many Algerians still have bitter memories of the 1990s when a major uprising of Islamic conservative groups left over 200,000 dead and inflicted enormous economic damage. Fear of going through that again continues to damper enthusiasm for another revolution.

July 23, 2014: News Ethiopian jailed in China's first khat smuggling case.

An Ethiopian was sentenced to seven months in jail for trafficking khat to China, marking the first such case in the country, which classed the plant as an illegal drug this year. The verdict was handed down earlier this month by the Intermediate People's Court of Hangzhou, capital of east China's Zhejiang province. The defendant, Ibrahim Abdulsemed Abdosh, was also fined 30,000 yuan (about $4,878), the judge in the case, Liu Yun, told Xinhua Tuesday.

Chinese customs officers at the Hangzhou International Airport found0.63 kilograms of khat carried by the man, who had flown there from Ethiopia's capital, Addis Ababa, on January 13, Liu said. She said the man was aware of China's ban on khat, a leafy plant chewed as a stimulant, but attempted to escape the immigration inspection. The plant is widely consumed in Africa but uncommon in China, she said. The World Health Organization has listed khat as a drug of abuse that can create psychological dependence.

July 10, 2014: France revealed that it had arrested several Arab migrants, including one Algerian, who were plotting with AQIM to blow up French cultural institutions, including the Eiffel Tower. The Algerian man had been in communication with AQIM via encrypted email, which French intelligence had monitored and decrypted. Hundreds of Algerian Islamic terrorists fled to Europe after the Islamic terrorist uprising was defeated in the 1990s and continued to support Islamic radicalism. This included recruiting others in Europe (especially Arab migrants or their children) for attacks in Europe or back in North Africa. This has not produced a lot of attacks but there have been some and the threat continues to exist.

July 11, 2014: In the capital dozens of Islamic conservatives demonstrated to protest a decision to reopen synagogues that had been closed, for safety reasons, since the 1990s. While there were 140,000 Jews living in Algeria in 1954 that number steadily declined, especially after Algeria became independent in 1962 and Islamic conservatives and nationalists pressured all non-Moslems to leave. Today there are only a few dozen Jews left in Algeria and the few remaining mosques are more historical sites than houses of worship.

July 12, 2014: Islamic terrorists used a roadside bomb to kill seven soldiers on a road 500 kilometers west of the capital.

This year the annual Bastille Day parade in Paris commemorated World War I and all the nations that fought alongside France to expel the German invaders. Thus France invited Algeria (and neighboring Morocco and Tunisia) to send troops or representatives to march. This triggered a debate in Algeria where many still resent the fact that Algerian participation in the two World Wars was often coerced. But many veterans (the World War I ones are all dead but many World War II vets are still around) are proud of their contribution. All three North African countries, former colonies that were set free after World War II, sent people to march in the parade.

July 14, 2014: AQIM (Al Qaeda in the Islamic Maghreb) posted a message on the Internet agreeing with Saudi Arabia and al Qaeda in denying the legitimacy of the new ISIL caliphate in eastern Syria and parts of Iraq (the east and northeast). This caliphate is basically an Iraqi Islamic terrorist effort that no Islamic terrorist groups outside Iraq support. While there are many (dozens, or more) Algerian Islamic terrorists in ISIL the senior Algerian Islamic terrorists back in North Africa want nothing to do with this new caliphate.

In neighboring Tunisia dozens of Islamic terrorists attacked two army checkpoints, killing 14 soldiers and wounding 23. This took place just across the border in the Chaambi Mountains. Earlier this year thousands of Tunisian troops and police conducted a major operation to find hidden Islamic terrorist camps. This effort had little success. At the same time Algeria also moved more troops to the border area opposite the Chaambi Mountains to prevent any fleeing Islamic terrorists from entering Algeria. These big sweeps in the Chaambi Mountains usually come up empty but often they get close enough to hidden terrorist camps to cause some of the terrorists to move, sometimes across the border, until the search operation is over. Tunisia believes the Islamic terrorists in these mountains are sustained by supporters in cities and towns who get supplies and new recruits to them. Thus Tunisia is now paying more attention to the Islamic terrorist support network in the cities and towns.

July 16, 2014: In the capital the government is hosting peace talks between Mali and the Tuareg rebels in northern Mali. For any peace deal to work the Islamic terrorists have to be kept out of the Tuareg territories of northern Mali and this requires some help from Algeria. For decades the main source of Islamic terrorists in North Africa has been Algeria. Thus both countries want their mutual border to be an effective barrier to Islamic terrorists and smugglers. Algeria closed the official border crossings in January 2013 to make it more difficult for Islamic terrorists to get into Algeria from Mali. This shut down trade and that hurt Mali more than Algeria. Meanwhile Algeria sent more troops to the border area this year and went after the smugglers and others trying to cross illegally. Mali is coordinating efforts to secure the border in order to keep the border crossings reopen. Meanwhile Algeria has long range plans for increasing security along all its previously unguarded borders. These borders are 6,343 kilometers long and include frontiers with seven countries. Moreover most of these borderlands are in the thinly occupied desert. Before aircraft were invented it was impossible to secure these borders. But even with aircraft a tightly sealed border remains impossible. About half that area is dangerous because of the Islamic terrorist threat in those countries. Libya, Mali and Tunisia comprise 52 percent of Algeria's borders and the 1,376 kilometer long Mali border is particularly troublesome since it is all desert and very popular with smugglers and other outlaws from the regions to the south. Thus the Algerian effort to more effectively patrol those borders. Most of those caught sneaking in are smugglers, mainly because Algeria is now considered a hostile refuge for Islamic terrorists fleeing increasingly successful counter-terrorism efforts in the Sahel.

July 19, 2014: In neighboring Tunisia the government ordered a crackdown on mosques and radio and TV stations that support Islamic terrorism. This is an aftereffect of recent attacks on two army checkpoints near the Algerian border. In the last week at least 60 people have been arrested on suspicion of supporting Islamic terrorism.

Foreign firms that operate much of the Algerian oil and gas industry are still uneasy about the ability of the military to protect facilities out in the desert. The January 2013 Islamic terrorist raid on a natural gas plant near the Libyan border is blamed on poor performance by the Algerian security forces. But the government refused to accept this assessment by the foreigners. Algeria cannot afford to expel the foreign firms and has not interfered with the foreigners upgrading their own security. In the past the government opposed the foreign firms creating their own security forces and for years that seemed to be no problem. But after the 2013 attack the foreign firms realized that the rumors of inept and corrupt military leadership were true and that they had to defend themselves or leave. They let the government know how they felt.

In the south, there has been less Islamic terrorist activity on the Mali border in the last year and the government is trying to revive the economy down there. The Islamic terrorist violence in the south after 2008 saw tourism shrink dramatically (from 30,000 visitors a year to a few hundred) and the rest of the economy went with it. The government made it clear that troops are assigned to provide security for tourist sites and tourists as well as economic activity in general.

July 22, 2014: The government is pressuring imams (Islamic clergy who run mosques and religious schools) to tone down their sermons that endorse or encourage Islamic terrorism. Most imams are anti -Islamic radicalism but there are exceptions and even moderate imams note the continued attraction of Islamic terrorism to young men. To connect with these young men imams will discuss Islamic radicalism and often in a neutral or positive way that the government is trying to discourage. There are few openly Islamic radical imams around, a result of the savage campaign in the 1990s to suppress a rebellion by Islamic terrorist groups that left over 200,000 Algerians dead. But the grievances (corrupt and inept government) still remain and prospects for improvement are dim.

This is particularly the case after the April presidential election was rigged (as usual) to ensure incumbent (Abdelaziz Bouteflika) got yet another term even though he is too infirm (because of age and a recent stroke) to campaign himself, much less govern. Most Algerians want Bouteflika and his corrupt cronies out of power but that is not happening as long as Bouteflika still has the support of the security forces. As public anger grows there is a the increasing risk of dissatisfaction spreading to the soldiers and police, who have a better sense of the public mood than the wealthy and corrupt officials and businessmen who surround Bouteflika. This could get ugly and to avoid losing power the government offered to change the constitution to, in theory, give more people more access to government decision making. Most Algerians see this another scam that provides the illusion of democracy while the reality is still rigged elections and bureaucrats doing what they want, not what the people need. Bouteflika has been in power since 1999 and a few dozen families of prominent leaders of the fight against France in the 1950s and 1960s and have been running things since independence from France was achieved in 1962. Until this problem is solved the potential violent unrest will remain.

July 23, 2014: Islamic terrorist leader Mokhtar Belmokhtar (the planner of the January 2013 natural gas facility attack in southern Algeria that got 37 workers killed) of Islamic terror group Al Mourabitoun claimed responsibility for the recent suicide bombing in northern Mali that killed a French soldier. This attack, he said, was made to refute French claims that Islamic terrorists had been largely eliminated in the north. The French claim was accurate and Al Mourabitoun has not been very active at all, anywhere in North Africa. In April Belmokhtar had released a statement on the Internet announcing his return to al Qaeda. He had split from that organization in late 2012. Belmokhtar is believed to be operating from a base in southern Libya. Al Mourabitoun was formed in August 2013 when two Islamic terrorist factions merged. The new group has been detected operating in northern Mali and Niger (where it had carried out several daring attacks, including a prison break in June and twin bombings in May 2013). One faction was an al Qaeda splinter group led by Belmokhtar who had a reputation for always escaping the many efforts to kill or capture him. Belmokhtar was number two or three in the North African al Qaeda organization (Al Qaeda in the Islamic Maghreb or AQIM) but formed his own splinter group in late 2012. In November 2013 France announced that it had killed the second-in-command of Al Mourabitoun near the northern town of Tessalit and was still searching for Belmokhtar, despite reports that he might have died during an air attack in 2013. The French and American pressure in the Sahel has left Belmokhtar short of cash and prospects, so returning to al Qaeda is a way to remedy those problems. Al Qaeda has always had access to more cash and other resources than most other terrorist organizations and that's why it remains such a visible player among Islamic terrorists.

July 24, 2014: An Air Algerie airliner disappeared from radar over northern Mali and crashed. French aircraft were sent to the area to search for the airliner and soon found it. Mali asked France to send troops to help with the investigation and secure the crash site. The next day French troops, with the help of local residents, reached the wreckage. All 116 people aboard were killed. There is no evidence that the Islamic terrorists had anything to do with the crash. French troops quickly found and removed the flight recorders, which were intact except for the voice recordings from the cockpit. The current hypothesis is that the airliner was brought down by bad weather and/or mechanical problems. The investigation of the wreckage will eventually sort all this out. The downed airliner was flying from Burkina Faso to Algeria.

(News updates) Confirmed: Algerie plane with 116 onboard crashed in Mali, French warplanes search the plane. REUTERS (July 24, 2014) – An Air Algerie flight with 110 passengers onboard, nearly half of them French citizens, crashed on Thursday after the jet disappeared over northern Mali en route from Burkina Faso to Algiers, an Algerian official said. There were few clear indications of what might have happened to flight AH5017, or whether there were casualties, but Burkina Faso's transport minister said the crew asked to adjust their route at 9.38 p.m. EDT because of a storm in the area.

"I can confirm that it has crashed," the Algerian official told Reuters, declining to be identified or give any details about what had happened to the aircraft on its way north. French Foreign Minister Laurent Fabius said the Air Algerie flight was still missing, but had probably crashed. "Despite intensive search efforts no trace of the aircraft has yet been found," Fabius told journalists in Paris. "The plane probably crashed."

French President Francois Hollande canceled a planned visit to overseas territories and said all military means on the ground would be used to locate the aircraft. Two French Mirage warplanes have been scouring the vast desert area around the northern Malian city of Gao for the aircraft, which had 51 French nationals on board. "The search will take as long as needed," Hollande told reporters. "Everything must be done to find this plane. We cannot identify the causes of what happened," he said. Niger security sources said planes were flying over the border region with Mali to search for the flight.

Two Mali-based diplomats said in addition to the area around Gao, where the plane is believed to have last been in contact with authorities, searcher were also scouring the rugged region around Aguelhoc toward the Algerian borders. An aid worker in Mali who asked not to be named said his organization had received several calls from residents based in the villages of Tessalit and Tinzawaten in the northeastern region of Kidal after hearing a loud explosion.

It was not immediately clear if this was linked to the crash. But searching in northern Mali will be complex task. The area where the flight is suspected to have crashed is a vast, sparsely inhabited region of scrubland and desert dunes stretching to the foothills of the Adrar des Ifoghas mountains.

It is a stronghold of Tuareg separatist rebels, who rose up against the government in early 2012, triggering an Islamist revolt that briefly seized control of northern Mali. Security sources said the French military was leading the search in the difficult terrain. The Malian government, which is holding talks with the separatists in neighboring Algeria, has only a weak presence in the region and relies on French and U.N. peacekeepers for aircraft and logistical support. Whatever the cause, another plane crash is likely to add to nerves over flying after a Malaysia Airlines plane was downed over Ukraine last week, a TransAsia Airways crashed off Taiwan during a thunderstorm on Wednesday and airlines temporarily canceled flights into Tel Aviv due to the conflict in Gaza.

FRENCH PASSENGERS: Algeria’s state news agency APS said authorities lost contact with flight an hour after it took off from Burkina Faso, but other officials gave differing accounts of the times of contact, adding to confusion about the plane’s fate. Swiftair, the private Spanish company that owns the plane, confirmed it had lost contact with the MD-83 operated by Air Algerie, which it said was carrying 110 passengers and six crew.

It said it took off from Burkina Faso at 9.17 p.m. EDT and was due to land at 1.10 a.m. EDT but never reached its destination. An Algerian aviation official said the last contact Algerian authorities had with the missing Air Algerie aircraft was at 9.55 p.m. EDT when it was flying over Gao, Mali. Burkina Faso officials said the flight asked the control center in Niamey, Niger, to change route at 9.38 p.m. EDT because of a storm in the Sahara.

An Air Algerie representative in Burkina Faso, Kara Terki, told a news conference that all the passengers on the plane were in transit, either for Europe, the Middle East or Canada. Burkina Faso authorities said the passenger list comprised 27 Burkinabe, 51 French, eight Lebanese, six Algerians, two from Luxembourg, five Canadians, four Germans, one Cameroonian, one Belgian, one Egyptian, one Ukranian, one Swiss, one Nigerian and one Malian. The Lebanese Foreign Ministry said its embassy in Abidjan estimated the number of Lebanese citizens on the flight was at least 20. Some of these may have dual nationality.

A spokeswoman for SEPLA, Spain's pilots union, said the six crew were from Spain. She could not give any further details. The MD-83 is part of the McDonnell Douglas MD-80 family of twin-engined jets that entered service in 1980. A total of 265 of the MD-83 model were delivered before McDonnell Douglas, by then part of Boeing, halted production in 1999. "Boeing is aware of the report. We are awaiting additional information," a spokesman for the U.S. planemaker said.

According to the Ascend Fleets database held by British-based Flightglobal, there are 187 MD-83s still in operation, of which 80 percent are being flown in the United States. The aircraft's two engines are made by Pratt & Whitney, a unit of United Technologies Swiftair has a relatively clean safety record, with five accidents since 1977, two of which caused a total of eight deaths, according to the Washington-based Flight Safety Foundation. Air Algerie's last major accident was in 2003 when one of its planes crashed shortly after take-off from the southern city of Tamanrasset, killing 102 people. In February this year, 77 people died when an Algerian military transport plane crashed into a mountain in eastern Algeria. (Text ends)

July 26, 2014: In neighboring Tunisia Islamic terrorists clashed with an army patrol near the Algerian border. Two soldiers were killed and four were wounded before the Islamic terrorists fled, carrying their dead and wounded with them.

August 2, 2014: The government has managed to evacuate over 5,000 Algerians from Libya. Growing violence against Islamic terrorist militias has caused much damage to the economy there, which employs a lot of foreigners from nearby Arab nations.

August 3, 2014: In neighboring Tunisia Islamic terrorists attacked an army base near the Algerian border. The attack was repulsed but one soldier was killed and a civilian was wounded.

August 12, 2014: Soldiers killed two Islamic terrorists 450 kilometers west of the capital. The army had received a tip and troops recovered two assault rifles and documents from the bodies. This coastal area is rural and the primary hideout of the remaining Islamic terrorists in Algeria along with a similar coastal area to the east near the Tunisian border.

August 15, 2014: Algeria will again host, on September 1st, peace talks between Mali and the Tuareg rebels of northern Mali. For any peace deal to work the Islamic terrorists have to be kept out of northern Mali and this requires some military help from Algeria. For decades the main source of Islamic terrorists in North Africa has been Algeria. Thus both countries want their mutual border to be an effective barrier to Islamic terrorists and smugglers. Mali has cooperated in securing the border.

While Algeria got most of its endangered citizens out of Libya Egypt is having more difficulty. This is mainly because there are over 500,000 Egyptians in Libya and not all of them have been able to get to the Tunisian, Algerian or Egyptian borders. Egypt suggested a joint Algerian/Egyptian military effort to quiet things down but Algeria was not interested, at least not yet.

Algeria has also made it for difficult for Islamic terrorists to get in and out of the country. Since earlier this year the Mali border has become very difficult for Islamic terrorists to get across. Instead the few Islamic terrorists still operating in Mali move through Libya. Algeria has also improved security on its eastern borders with Tunisia and Libya. This has been crucial with Libya because another civil war has broken out there between Islamic terrorist militias and those who want to shut down these extremist organizations.

August 18, 2014: The government has managed to create an island of tranquility in a sea of Islamic terrorism. Iraq, Syria, Gaza and Egypt may be aflame with terrorist activity but Algeria has managed to make itself a very inhospitable place for Islamic terrorists to operate. Algeria still has lots of political (an unpopular “elected” dictatorship) and economic (corruption, high unemployment) problems, but there is also a population that does not want another Islamic revolution as it suffered in the 1990s. Moreover, many local Islamic terrorists have been drawn to the better prospects in Libya, Syria and Iraq.

August 23, 2014: In Germany the government agreed to allow Algeria to buy 980 Fuchs armored vehicles from a German firm. These are six wheeled armored vehicles similar to the American Stryker. Wheeled armored vehicles are more suitable for Algeria, which has lots of roads or trackless deserts that allow wheeled vehicles to operate effectively. The deal involves setting up a factory in Algeria to assemble the vehicles and the transfer of some manufacturing technology to Algeria. Exports like these require government approval in Germany and sometimes, when the exports are to a Middle Eastern country, there is opposition because the weapons might be used by the buyer to hurt civilians.

August 24, 2014: In Egypt the foreign ministers of Libya, Egypt, Algeria, Tunisia, Sudan, Chad and Niger met to discuss what to do about the growing chaos (and apparent civil war) in Libya. About the only thing everyone could agree on was to not get involved. Egypt proposed forming an armed intervention force and soon discovered that no one else was interested.

In Mali Islamic terrorists released two of the three Algerian diplomats taken captive there in April 2012. It was also learned that the third captive had died of an illness. In April 2014 a video of one of the captives was released, and that was the first message from the kidnappers since January 2013. Originally seven Algerians were taken but since then three have been released and one killed. There has been no direct contact with the kidnappers since a French led invasion of northern Mali in January 2013. It was believed the Islamic terrorists holding the Algerians were on the run and it was hoped that the French would find and free them. That apparently did not happen and in April those holding one of the Algerians felt secure enough to resume demanding ransom. The government said it did not want to pay ransom, so as not to encourage more such attacks. It is unclear exactly how the two were freed and all Mali will say was that it was after extensive negotiations. This seems to indicate that one of the northern Tuareg tribes came to be holding the captives and arranged their release for some favors, or to avoid a raid by French commandos.

August 30, 2014: Niger has allowed the United States to establish a surveillance base in the north, where Niger has borders with Algeria, Libya and Chad. This area has long been a key transit route through the Sahara Desert and is heavily used by smugglers and Islamic terrorists. The United States has been operating UAVs out of Niger for several years now.

Just across the border six armed men failed in an attempt to kill a secular member of the Tunisian parliament. Three of the gunmen forced their way into the house while three others stood guard outside. After it was clear that their target had escaped and police alerted the six fled towards the Kasserine Pass area, which is a known hideout for Islamic terrorists.

Secular Tunisian politicians have been frequent targets of Islamic terrorist death squads.

A court sentenced a Mauritanian man to prison for two years for taking videos of a policeman stealing. The policeman was never arrested for the crime. Incidents like this are what fuel growing public anger towards the government.

September 1, 2014: The second foreign firm (Norwegian Statoil) that ran the Amenas gas plant in the southeast has agreed to return to its operations there. The British firm BP returned earlier this year. A 2013 Islamic terrorist attack on the plant greatly reduced production. The plant normally produces 11-12 percent of Algeria's natural gas, most of which is exported. Before the attack the two foreign firms operating the plant had planned an expansion but that is still on hold because of the 2013 attack and the belief that the government has not upgraded security enough. BP and Statoil now agree that Algeria has upgraded its security sufficiently to allow both firms to resume full operations, including plans for expansion. This is important for Algeria because the Amenas attack led foreign companies to back away from investing in Algerian oil or gas projects. As a result Algerian oil and gas production were down nine percent for the first three months of 2014 and revenue from that was down 12 percent.

September 2, 2014: The United States is providing Tunisia with $60 million worth of military aid. Tunisia needs the equipment, weapons and training this aid will provide. The U.S. believes that Tunisia has been the most successful of the "Arab Spring" revolutions and that its post - revolution government has been one of the more successful in fighting Islamic terrorists. The U.S. has also agreed to sell Tunisia a dozen UH-64 helicopters and other military equipment. But what the Tunisians really want is American help in finding (with intel analysis, air recon or whatever) the few remaining Islamic terrorists operating in Tunisia. While it was the first country to carry out an Arab Spring uprising and a new Tunisian government was installed in 2012 there has been some persistent Islamic terrorist activity. In part this was due to the new government allowing Islamic radicals to be released from jail and permitted to operate in the open as long as they did not turn to terrorism or anything illegal inside Tunisia.

These radicals have tried, so far without success, to get the new government to establish a religious dictatorship that would enforce Islamic (Sharia) law. After less than a year of good behavior the local Islamic terrorists also got violent. So far the terrorists have had a hard time. Most of the population is hostile to them and the security forces are pretty efficient. Algeria has helped by sealing its border but the long border with Libya is another matter.

September 3, 2014: Algeria and Tunisia have agreed to a joint energy exploration efforts as well as supplying border towns on the other side with natural gas where appropriate.

September 5, 2014: Italy delivered an 8,800 ton amphibious transport ship (LPD) Algeria ordered in 2011. The ship has a floodable dock for landing craft and a flight deck for helicopters. There are also hospital facilities. The crew has been training in Italy since 2013. Most Algerians live along the coast and this ship would be useful for disaster relief as well as military uses.

Algerian police have also discovered another people smuggling operation, apparently related to the one that gets economic refugees to Europe. This one involved recruiting young men fighting for ISIL in Syria and moving them to Libya for more terrorist training and then through Algeria to southern Europe (as refugees) to carry out terror attacks. In some cases the terrorists are accompanied by wives and children. Police arrested 160 Syrians believed associated with this network.

The Libyan border remains closed and despite that Libyan Islamic terrorists and smugglers are still trying to move people and goods in and out. The increased border security recently led to the discovery of a Libyan Islamic terrorist group that had turned to people smuggling. Some 200 Syrians were arrested near the Libyan border, along with the Libyans they had paid to get them to the Algerian coast and onto a boat that would take them to Europe and salvation via refugee status. This smuggling has become big business and most of it was coming via Libya because there the border security was the weakest in North Africa. But now the Libyan coast is more heavily patrolled and many Libyan coastal towns are unsafe because of the militia violence. So Algeria becomes an attractive conduit for the smuggling, despite better border security and policing in general.

September 10, 2014: While it's been a month since the last Islamic terrorism related fatality in Algeria there was an even more ominous death on August 23 rd . That was when a football (soccer) player from Cameroon was killed by a piece of slate thrown at him by some angry

Algerian football fans after a game in the largely Berber Kabylie region. While the young Berbers may be particularly angry at the decades of government corruption and mismanagement they are emblematic of the increasing anger among all young Algerians and a growing number of older Algerians as well. International football officials threatened to ban Algerian fans from international games if this anger did not diminish, at least at the games. That may or may not happen, but the incident was another signal to the government that a growing number of Algerians are abandoning forbearance and demonstrating more outright anger and violence towards rigged elections and government inability to address national problems, especially lack of economic opportunity and high unemployment.

September 13, 2014: An Algeria based faction of AQIM (Al Qaeda in the Islamic Maghreb), calling itself Jund al Khalifa renounced its ties to al Qaeda and declared its allegiance to ISIL. In July AQIM leaders had reaffirmed their allegiance to al Qaeda and condemned ISIL, which had recently declared a new caliphate (Islamic empire run by ISIL). Small groups of AQIM have been hiding out in the coastal mountains east of the capital for years and troops and police are constantly searching for these Islamic terrorists in the thinly populated mountains and forests along the coast.

September 17, 2014: Just across the border in Tunisia police cornered and killed an Algerian Islamic terrorist (Abu Ayman al Wahrani) long wanted on both sides of the border. Another Islamic terrorist was with Wahrani and he also died in the gun battle.

September 19, 2014: Italy delivered an 8,800 ton San Giorgio class aamphibious transport ship (LPD) to Algeria. The ship had been ordered in 2011 and has a floodable dock for landing craft and a flight deck for helicopters. There are also hospital facilities. The crew has been training in Italy since 2013. Most Algerians live along the coast and this ship would be useful for disaster relief as well as military uses.

The Algerian LPD is called the Kalaat Beni-Abbes and is armed with a 76mm cannon, Aster vertical launch anti-aircraft missiles (with a range up to 15 kilometers) and two remotely controlled 25mm autocannon. The dock in the rear has nine small landing craft. The flight deck can hold five medium (UH-1 size) helicopters. The vehicle/hanger deck (below the flight deck) can hold 15 armored vehicles and there are accommodations for 440 troops. The ship is operated by a crew of 150. The ship also has a small hospital with an operating room. Troop accommodations can be used to handle some patients as well as civilians in general. Fuel and other supplies allow the ship to stay at sea for 20 days at a time.

The San Giorgio class amphibious transport ship is one of the smaller LPD class ships. Italy has three of them, which entered service in the late 1980s and early 1990s. The San Giorgio class ships are 133 meters (435 feet) long and displace only 8,000 tons, while most other LPDs are 20,000 tons or larger. The San Giorgio sacrifices many things (vehicle, helicopter and landing ship capacity) but they can still carry a small (400 men) battalion of troops, 36 vehicles, six landing craft (in a well in the rear of the ship) and up to six helicopters. Armament consists of two 25mm autocannon. The Algerians received an upgraded San Giorgio.

By way of comparison, the Chinese Type 071 class LPDs is 210 meters (689 foot) long and displaces 20,000 tons. The Chinese ship can carry some more troops (up to 800) and helicopters, but the same number of landing craft and vehicles. Armament consists of a 76mm gun, four 30mm anti-missile autocannon and four 18 tube decoy/chaff dispensers (for anti - missile work). The big difference is that the San Giorgios are cramped, have less space for supplies and are not really suitable for long range work.

The 071 class ships are similar to the American 25,000 ton San Antonio class or the French 21,500 ton Mistral class. The 071's have the smallest crew (120), compared to 180 in the Mistral and San Giorgio and 396 for the San Antonio. The three existing San Giorgios were built in the late 1980s and early 1990s and serve in the Italian Navy. There are plans to replace the San Giorgios with a new class of 20,000 ton ships.

The Islamic State, also known as the ISIS or ISIL in Iraq, is viewed as more focused on consolidating territory it has amassed in Syria and Iraq than on attacking the West. Some even caution that military strikes against the Islamic State could antagonize that group into planning attacks on Western targets, and even benefit other militant organizations if more moderate factions of the rebellion are not ready to take power on the ground. The Islamic State’s recent statements, including a video using a British captive as a spokesman, have sought to deter American action against the group and threatened attacks only as revenge for American strikes. At the same time, the rise of the Islamic State has blunted the momentum of its rival groups in Syria, including the Nusra Front, once considered to be among the most capable in the array of Syrian rebel groups. The Islamic State's expansion across northern Iraq and in oil-rich regions of eastern Syria has sapped some of the Nusra Front's resources and siphoned some of its fighters — who are drawn by the Islamic State's battlefield successes and declaration of a caliphate, the longtime dream of many jihadists. American intelligence officials estimate that since the Syrian conflict began, about 15,000 foreigners, including more than 100 Americans and 2,000 Europeans, have traveled to the country to fight alongside rebel groups. Syria's porous borders make it relatively easy to get in and out of the country, raising concerns among Western officials that without markings on their passports they could slip back undetected into Europe or the United States.

September 20, 2014: In the east (Jijel Province) soldiers, acting on a tip, found two Islamic terrorists in the mountains and killed them. Weapons, ammo and other equipment were recovered.

September 21, 2014: In the southeast, near the Libyan and Niger borders, a local tribe, the Tibu are crossing into Libya to join Libyan Tibu in a fight for control of a local oil field. There is not much government in Libya at the moment so local officials in Algeria appear to have told the Algerian Tibu that the Algerian security forces would stay out of this as long as the Tibu kept the violence in Libya. It's common in Africa for tribes to have people on both sides of international borders and it is customary for countries to ignore tribal people freely crossing back and forth as long as nothing illegal is involved (like large scale smuggling or criminals escaping from one country to another).

In the mountains about a hundred kilometers east of the capital a French tourist was kidnapped by Islamic terrorists (Jund al Khalifa) who soon released a video of the captive asking the French government to stop bombing ISIL targets in Iraq and Syria. France refused.

September 22, 2014: Algerian Islamic terrorist group (Jund al Khalifa) released (via the Internet) a video of them beheading a French tourist they had recently kidnapped. Jund al Khalifa had demanded that France halt bombing attacks on ISIL (Islamic State in Iraq and the Levant) in Syria and France refused. After the beheading video appeared the U.S. State Department again warned Americans to be very careful if they visit Algeria, or any other Moslem country known to contain an active faction affiliated with ISIL.

September 28, 2014: In the west (150 kilometers south of Oran) Islamic terrorists shot dead two soldiers who were checking security at a power plant.
October 2, 2014: In the northeast Tunisian warplanes and helicopters could be seen just across the border attacking a group of Islamic terrorists. Tunisia later reported that troops on the ground were also involved.

October 3, 2014: In the southeast the army detected two trucks crossing the border illegally from Niger. Troops ambushed the vehicles resulting in five Islamic terrorists killed and four captured. All were Niger natives except for one Libyan. The two vehicles were destroyed in the gun battle.

October 6, 2014: In the southeast the army detected a number of vehicles (two trucks and six motorcycles) crossing the border illegally from Niger. Troops ambushed the vehicles and persuaded the twenty foreigners (12 from Sudan and eight from Chad) to surrender. Weapons were found and the army is trying to determine if these men or gangsters, Islamic terrorists or, as is often common in this part of the world, both. This is the third such armed incursion from Niger in the last month. The other two incidents resulted in five intruders killed and seven arrested. The government has sent more troops to the Niger border to prevent what appears to be an effort by Niger based Islamic terrorists to set up a base in Algeria.

October 7, 2014: Some 400 kilometers southeast of the capital soldiers killed three Islamic terrorists.

October 8, 2014: For the last week the government has been seeking fifteen members of Jund al Khalifa, including the group's leader, for responsibility for the recent kidnapping and videoed beheading of a French tourist. All fifteen of the wanted men are Algerians most of them veterans of the Islamic terrorism campaign in the 1990s. The government believes the Jund al Khalifa crew are the ones responsible for most of the Islamic terrorist attacks west of the capital in the last few years and now these guys have made themselves hated by most Moslems for this grisly murder. The government wants Jund al Khalifa found and destroyed and apparently many Algerians agree with that approach.

The murder of the French tourist not only visibly angered most Algerians but Moslems in France as well. There have been some public demonstrations by French Moslems denouncing ISIL and Jund al Khalifa.

In addition to a lot of tourists from France there are also 30,000 French citizens living in Algeria. If Jund al Khalifa wanted to kidnap more foreigners there are plenty of French available, although some of them are Moslem. But ISIL has not hesitated to behead or crucify Moslems they disagreed with. When the French tourist was recently kidnapped, several Algerians who were hiking with him were freed so the Jund al Khalifa crew have some concern for their popular image inside Algeria. Actually, Islamic radicalism lost most of its popular appeal in the 1990s when Islamic terrorists organized a rebellion and murdered over 100,000 civilians who did not agree with them (or enthusiastically aid them). Some of the Islamic terrorists still operating in Algeria seem to acknowledge that connection and avoid further antagonizing civilians.

October 11, 2014: The 3,000 troops sent to Bouïra Province, east of the capital, to search for Islamic terrorists responsible for kidnapping and beheading a French tourist in September killed five Islamic terrorists today. Yesterday these troops encountered and killed three Islamic terrorists in the same area.

October 12, 2014: More ethnic violence (between Berbers and Arabs) broke out down south in the oasis town of Ghardaia leaving two civilians dead and several building burned. Violence last April left two policemen and at least ten civilians injured. Earlier in the year the government has sent more than 10,000 additional police to deal with the persistent unrest. In Ghardaia the violence between Arab and Berber residents is all about water rights, jobs, land, ethnicity and religion. Arabs also accuse the 800,000 Berbers in the south of supporting al Qaeda. The province of Ghardaia is on the edge of the Sahara Desert and contains only 200,000 people. The unrest has been going on since late 2013. Over a hundred people have been arrested and there have been over 400 casualties (including at least 15 dead). Over a hundred building has been burned down along with dozens of vehicles. Thousands have fled the city and many businesses stay closed for days or weeks at a time. The police, who are largely Arab, are accused of being biased against the Berbers. The ethnic tensions in this area, 600 kilometers south of the capital, have been growing since 2008 and there was another outbreak of violence in October 2013 that was put down violently. As bad as the ethnic tensions have been there are also disagreements over religion. The Arabs belong to the Maliki school of Islam while the Berbers are largely from the smaller Ibadi sect. About 30 percent of Algerians are Berber, but the percentage is higher in the south. Ghardaia is an ancient Berber city of 90,000 that contains many Ibadi shrines. Berbers are found throughout North Africa, west of Egypt and down to the semi-desert Sahel (where the closely related Tuareg tribes live). The six million Berbers of Algeria are considered the most abused in the region. Ghardaia Arabs got the recent unrest started by desecrating some of these shrines. This led to violent Berber reprisals, especially when images of the damage appeared on the Internet. The government is concerned for several reasons. For one thing there are oil fields are nearby. Worse, the sustained unrest among the Berbers could be the first breeze in an uprising that could engulf the entire country.

October 13, 2014: Police began three days of demonstrations demanding better pay and working conditions plus the replacement of the inexperienced (in police matters) man appointed head of the national police. A week ago the government said it would consider the pay and working conditions demands but rejected calls to replace the head of the national police. The demonstrations, including one in front of the presidential palace in the capital, were unprecedented. Another police complaint is the heavy workload. Police have been called out over 10,000 times since 2012 to deal with civilians demonstrating against the government. This has been happening all over the country and constantly, even though such demonstrations are illegal.

October 18, 2014: Morocco claimed that an Algerian border guard (in the northwest, near the coast) fired three shots into a crowd of Moroccans badly wounding one of them. This caused a diplomatic crises that took more than a week to deal with. Algeria has been having a hard time with Morocco for about a year now, mainly because of a group of Moroccan terrorists (Polisario) that Algeria helped create decades ago. Polasario has always caused problems with neighboring Morocco and the problem recently got worse. In 2013 the two countries recalled ambassadors and there was talk of escalation. This made cooperation in counter-terrorism efforts (or anything else) with Morocco impossible. Meanwhile provided Islamic terrorists have found safe haven in Polisario refugee camps in Algeria (90,000 refugees) and Mauritania (24,000). This is all connected with the declining prospects of Polisario, which has been in bad shape since 1991. Back then, Morocco finally won its war with Polisario Front rebels, who were seeking independence for the Western Sahara (a region south of Morocco). Polisario remains powerful in Mauritania, where the rebel group has official recognition and maintains several refugee camps. In the beginning (the 1960s) Polisario was so well-subsidized by Algeria, back when Algeria was a radical state, that Polisario still has enough diehards out there to keep lots of people in Western Sahara unhappy. This situation has also provided recruits and sanctuary for al Qaeda and other Islamic radicals. For two decades, the UN has been trying to work out a final peace deal between Polasario and Morocco. In the 1990s Algeria cut off all support for Polasario. But that, and UN efforts to mediate the differences, have just not worked. The contested area is largely desert with a current population of less than 600,000. Logic would have it that the area is better off as a part of Morocco. But there are still thousands of locals who would rather fight for independence than submit to Morocco. Some resistance is tribal and cultural, with the Moroccans seen as another bunch of alien invaders. The area was administered until 1976 as a Spanish colony. Most Western Saharans have made peace with Moroccan rule. Polisario still has several thousand armed men based in the refugee camps and refuses to accept Moroccan rule of Western Sahara. If the fighting breaks out again, possibly inspired by Islamic radicals, it could go on for years, just as it does in many other parts of Africa and the immediate neighborhood.

October 26, 2014: Soldiers ambushed and killed two Islamic terrorists 320 kilometers east of the capital. Two AK-47s and other equipment were recovered.

October 29, 2014: In the southwest (Adrar province) police raided a smuggler hideout and killed four smugglers who attempted to shoot their way out. Police seized weapons, vehicles, two satellite phones and drugs the men were smuggling. The police are mostly concerned with weapons frequently smuggled into or out of nearby Mali. The Algerians have some help with that on the other side. Earlier in the day French troops clashed with a group of at least 30 Islamic terrorists just across the border in Mali, a battle that left one French soldier and at least twenty Islamic terrorists dead. The French discovered that Islamic terrorists had recently returned to this area, probably after coming in from Libya and were looking for them. These mountains along the Mali border have long been a terrorist and smuggler hideout.

In the southeast the army has another problem with the growing number of Islamic terrorist camps being set up in southwest Libya (where the borders of Libya, Algeria and Niger meet). Algeria and Niger are hard pressed to prevent all illegal crossings. As many Islamic terrorists are caught doing so, many more make it through.

Meanwhile Algeria responded to the September beheading by forming a special task force of 3,000 troops and sending them to Bouïra Province where the murder took place. The troops had orders to hunt down and eliminate (kill or capture) any Islamic terrorists still operating in that hilly and heavily forested region. An Islamic terrorist group known to be present in the area recently declared its allegiance to ISIL and was believed responsible to the atrocity. This area has been home to Islamic terrorists for decades and since 2005 about 80 Algerians have been kidnapped by Islamic terrorists there and held for ransom. As a result the locals are always wary and most will report Islamic terrorist activity to the police. With arrival of cell phone service after 2002 tipping off the police became a lot easier.

November 2, 2014: In Tunisia an Islamic terrorist beheading in late September, just across the border in Algeria, led to a sharp (over 30 percent) drop in tourists from France. Since France is the main source of foreign tourists, this is expected to cause a six percent drop in tourist activity for 2014. Tourism accounts for seven percent of the GDP and Tunisia is considered the safest of the "Arab Spring" countries. Algeria has suffered worse tourism losses, mainly because of the intense Islamic terrorist violence in the 1990s that continued in much diminished intensity despite the Islamic terrorist defeat by the end of the 1990s. Tunisia has been successful against Islamic terrorism because most of the population opposes the religious fanatics. Yet a minority of Tunisians, a few percent of 11 million people, support the Islamic terrorists and that led to 1,500 Tunisians being arrested so far this year on terrorism charges. The government believes that at least 3,000 Tunisians went to Syria to join ISIL and several hundred have come back, most still enthusiastic about Islamic terrorism and urging others to join the mayhem.

November 5, 2014: In neighboring Tunisia four soldiers were killed and eleven wounded when Islamic terrorists attacked the bus they were on near the Algerian border.

November 11, 2014: An Air Force MiG-25 jet reconnaissance aircraft crashed during a training mission. Algeria obtained twenty MiG-25s from Russia in the late 1970s but only about a dozen are still believed to be operational. They are useful for photo-reconnaissance over the vast borders in the desert south.

November 13, 2014: Algerian and Egyptian officials met for the seventh time since 2011 to discuss their cooperation on dealing with Libya. Neither side wants to intervene militarily, although Egypt is believed to be doing just that clandestinely. Both countries admit to increasing their border security with Libya and sharing intelligence on Islamic terrorists, especially those operating in Libya.

November 16, 2014: In the south border guards found and destroyed two SUVs sneaking in from Mali. The five men in the vehicles were killed and the vehicles were found to be loaded with weapons to be sold in Algeria.

Meanwhile on the Libyan border another vehicle was destroyed, killing two men. This vehicle had small arms and rockets on board.

November 26, 2014: Police revealed that they have identified an Islamic terrorists killed in October as one of those Jund al Khalifa members responsible for the beheading of a French citizen in September. Since early October the government has been seeking fifteen members of Jund al Khalifa, including the group's leader, for responsibility for the September kidnapping and videoed beheading of a French tourist. All fifteen of the wanted men are Algerians and most of them veterans of the Islamic terrorism campaign in the 1990s. The government believes the Jund al Khalifa crew are the ones responsible for most of the Islamic terrorist attacks west of the capital in the last few years and now these guys have made themselves hated by most Moslems by taking credit for this grisly murder and aligning themselves with ISIL (Islamic State in Iraq and the Levant) . The government wants Jund al Khalifa found and destroyed and apparently many Algerians agree with that approach.

Turkey has warned its citizens to exercise caution when visiting parts of Algeria where Islamic terrorists have been known to operate.

November 27, 2014: Algeria has hosted three rounds of peace talks between Mali and the Tuareg rebels of northern Mali. This third round just ended without a final agreement. The main obstacle now is the degree of autonomy the Tuareg dominated north would have. For any peace deal to work the Islamic terrorists have to be kept out of northern Mali and this requires some military help from Algeria. For decades the main source of Islamic terrorists in North Africa has been Algeria. Thus both countries want their mutual border to be an effective barrier to Islamic terrorists and smugglers. Mali has cooperated in securing the border.

November 28, 2014: The security forces are waging a major campaign against smuggling. Algeria and its neighbors also want to make their mutual borders an effective barrier to Islamic terrorists as well as smugglers. Algeria closed the official border crossings with Mali in January 2013 to make it more difficult for Islamic terrorists to get into Algeria. This shut down trade and that hurt Mali more than Algeria. The Libyan border has also been closed because of the civil war going on there and the presence of so many Islamic terrorists. Meanwhile Algeria sent more troops to the Mali and Libyan borders this year to deal with the smugglers and others trying to cross illegally. Mali is coordinating efforts to secure the border in order to get the border crossings reopened. Meanwhile Algeria has long range plans for increasing security along all its previously unguarded borders. These borders are 6,343 kilometers long and include frontiers with seven countries. Moreover most of these borderlands are in the thinly occupied desert. Before aircraft were invented it was impossible to secure these borders. But even with aircraft a tightly sealed border remains impossible. About half that area is dangerous because of the Islamic terrorist threat in those countries. Libya, Mali and Tunisia comprise 52 percent of Algeria's borders and the 1,376 kilometer long Mali border is particularly troublesome since it is all desert and very popular with smugglers and other outlaws from the regions to the south. Thus the Algerian effort to more effectively patrol those borders. Most of those caught sneaking in are smugglers, mainly because Algeria is now considered a hostile refuge for Islamic terrorists fleeing increasingly successful counter-terrorism efforts in the Sahel. The smuggled goods most commonly encountered are alcohol, drugs, fuel, weapons, consumer goods, illegal migrants headed for Europe and Islamic terrorists.

The incumbent president (Abdelaziz Bouteflika) was briefly in a French hospital recently and is still disabled from his stroke. In early April Bouteflika was reelected to a forth five year term. He received 81 percent of the vote in what is widely regarded as a rigged election. The voters are not happy at the fact that Bouteflika was reelected even though he is too infirm (via age and a recent stroke) to campaign himself, much less govern. The five other candidates believed the government would rig the vote and they were apparently right. Most Algerians want Bouteflika and his corrupt cronies out of power but that is not happening as long as Bouteflika still has the support of the security forces. He does have that support so he can hang on. As public anger grows there is a the growing risk of dissatisfaction spreading to the soldiers and police, who have a better sense of the public mood than the wealthy and corrupt officials and businessmen who surround Bouteflika. This could get ugly and to avoid losing power the government offered to change the constitution to, in theory, give more people more access to government decision making. Most Algerians see this another scam that provides the illusion of democracy while the reality is still rigged elections and bureaucrats doing what they want, not what the people need. A growing number of Algerians see another civil war, this one against the corrupt and incompetent families that have dominated the government for so long. All it will take is the right spark, an event that will set off something the loyal security forces cannot, or do not want to, handle.

Bouteflika has been in power since 1999 and he held on mainly because the oil price shot up because of growing demand from India and East Asia.

The Algerian government took in over $700 billion dollars during the last fifteen years and Algerians could not help but notice that senior politicians and their families became enormously rich while the rest of the economy stagnated and the unemployment rate kept going up. In response to this the government has been more active in prosecuting corrupt officials since 2011 but it's always the lower ranking ones. The most senior people and their families are largely immune. These families became rich via the simple technique of adding 10-20 percent to the cost of government contracts and distributing that money among themselves. Nothing unique about that, nor about how as long as the security forces are well paid and content the plundering can continue indefinitely. Only a major uprising can upset this and that is very hard to get going as long as the people running the government know who to pay off, who to chase out of the country and who to imprison or murder. Many Algerians believe the current crooks running things are losing their touch and many Algerians see growing opportunities for another revolution. That, however, is no panacea because these rebellions against corrupt older rebels often results in a new generation of corrupt officials taking over. This is an ancient problem in nations that have lucrative natural resource exports. With lots of money flowing through a small group of people (the government) it is all too easy for those in power to take a cut and pay off enough subordinates to keep this scam going indefinitely, or until replaced by another gang of crooks.

November 29, 2014: More ethnic violence (between Berbers and Arabs) broke out down south in the oasis town of Touggourt where two men were killed and twenty wounded during demonstrations (against unemployment, housing shortages and insufficient drinking water) that turned violent. Such violence has been common down here for over a year, but until recently most of it was in the nearby city of Ghardaia. The most recent unrest there was in October, which left two civilians dead and several building burned. Violence last April left two policemen and at least ten civilians injured in Ghardaia. Earlier in 2014 the government sent more than 10,000 additional police to deal with the persistent unrest and that helped keep things quiet. In Ghardaia the violence between Arab and Berber residents is all about water rights, jobs, land, ethnicity and religion. Arabs also accuse the 800,000 Berbers in the south of supporting al Qaeda. The province of Ghardaia is on the edge of the Sahara Desert and contains only 200,000 people. The unrest has been going on since late 2013. Over a hundred people have been arrested and there have been over 400 casualties (including at least 17 dead). Over a hundred building has been burned down along with dozens of vehicles. Thousands have fled the city and many businesses stay closed for days or weeks at a

Is couscous Arab or Berber food?

Salwa Halabia Creates healthy homemade food with Middle Eastern flairUpdated May 10

Couscous is a cuisine of North Africa (Amazigh/Berber), the Middle East, the Mediterranean, and has become popular worldwide. Couscous is usually a coarsely ground grain of durum wheat, similar to pasta made from semolina, however, couscous can also be made from grains such as barley and millet. It is prepared by steaming or boiling the couscous, and like pasta is usually served al dente.

A gorgeous Moroccan Couscous presentation.

The earliest origin of domesticated wheat is believed to be in the Middle East and Nile Valley of Egypt around 9,600BC. This spread to other parts of Europe, the Mediterranean, and Northwest Africa over the next few thousand years.

Durum wheat, specifically, might have become a thing from around 7,000 BC due to artificial selection by humans of specific wheat that was free-threshing – essentially meaning it was very easy to get the grains out just by shaking the ears of wheat.

The earliest evidence of milling is from 6000BC, though flour could have been made in a more rudimentary form before that. As couscous is made from ground wheat, it seems unlikely it could have been made any earlier than 6,000BC. Of those scholars who have conjectured an origin period, it's actually much more recent.

The summary is really that no one has much evidence of anything until the 13th century when it's listed in Moorish Spanish cookbooks. But, everyone seems to agree it is of Berber origin and spread from there.

Couscous Origin, Couscous History + Difference between couscous types

Couscous Origin / Couscous History: The history of couscous, how couscous is made and made of, the difference between Israeli couscous, pearl couscous etc.

https://foodfuntravel.com/couscous-origin-couscous-history-difference-israeli-couscous-pearl/

My favorite couscous meal is called Mougrabieh: made from chicken (usually legs or thighs, but a whole chicken can be cut up and used as well) that is boiled deboned, and cut into pieces, fried pieces onions and chickpeas are added, then, while the couscous is placed in a steamer directly above the chicken and steamed. Couscous can also be boiled on the side.

It is flavored with caraway seeds, allspice, nutmeg, cinnamon, bay leaves, minced garlic, salt, pepper, butter, the thickened reserved chicken broth, and a touch of lemon juice.

This can be served with gently steamed spinach leaves and topped with toasted pine nuts for an appetizing presentation.

This is a very popular and nourishing dish prepared by most Levantine families.

time. The police, who are largely Arab, are accused of being biased against the Berbers. The ethnic tensions in this area, 600 kilometers south of the capital, have been growing since 2008 and there was another outbreak of violence in October 2013 that was put down violently. As bad as the ethnic tensions have been there are also disagreements over religion. The Arabs belong to the Maliki school of Islam while the Berbers are largely from the smaller Ibadi sect. About 30 percent of Algerians are Berber, but the percentage is higher in the south. Ghardaia is an ancient Berber city of 90,000 that contains many Ibadi shrines. Nearby Touggourt has a population of about 34,000. Berbers are found throughout North Africa, west of Egypt and down to the semi-desert Sahel (where the closely related Tuareg tribes live). The six million Berbers of Algeria are considered the most abused in the region. Ghardaia Arabs got the recent unrest started by desecrating some of these shrines. This led to violent Berber reprisals, especially when images of the damage appeared on the Internet. The government is concerned for several reasons. For one thing there are oil fields are nearby. Worse, the sustained unrest among the Berbers could be the first breeze in an uprising that could engulf the entire country.

December 1, 2014: Just across the border in Tunisia Islamic terrorists kidnapped an off-duty policeman and his brother. who were driving together when halted by the terrorists. The brother was later released but the policeman was beheaded.

December 2, 2014: A second batch of seriously wounded Libyans was allowed to cross the border and receive medical treatment. The first batch (of 39) was let in during November. Algeria has allowed thousands of Libyan refugees in as well. Taking the wounded is done in cooperation with Libyan medical organizations. Algeria has sealed itself off from the current civil war in Libya.

December 11, 2014: The government revealed that they had recently found and killed a second Islamic terrorist involved in the killing of a French tourist last September. In November police revealed that they had identified an Islamic terrorist killed in October as one of those Jund al Khalifa members responsible for the beheading of a French citizen in September. Since early October the government has been seeking fifteen members of Jund al Khalifa, including the group's leader, for their role in the September kidnapping and videoed beheading of a French tourist. All fifteen of the wanted men are Algerians and most of them veterans of the Islamic terrorism campaign in the 1990s. The government believes that Jund al Khalifa crew are the ones responsible for most of the Islamic terrorist attacks west of the capital in the last few years and now these guys have made themselves hated by most Moslems by taking credit for this grisly murder and aligning themselves with ISIL (Islamic State in Iraq and the Levant) The government wants Jund al Khalifa found and destroyed and apparently many Algerians agree with that approach.

December 12, 2014: In the southwest (213 kilometers from the capital) Islamic terrorists murdered the mayor of a town. Exactly why the man was killed was not revealed nor were details of the Islamic terrorist connection.

December 14, 2014: France announced that in the last year its forces had killed nearly 200 Islamic terrorists in Africa. This was carried out by 3,000 French troops deployed in Mali, Mauritania, Niger, Burkina Faso and Chad. Most of the French activity is in northern Mali along the Algerian border.
France and Algeria also recently announced more cooperation in fighting Islamic terrorism, especially along Algeria's southern borders.

December 17, 2014: In neighboring Tunisia Islamic terrorists released a video in which Tunisians loyal to ISIL (Islamic State in Iraq and the Levant) took credit for the murder last year of two secular Tunisian politicians and promised more killings of those who oppose ISIL.

December 18, 2014: The government announced continued close cooperation with the United States in efforts to deal with Islamic terrorism. This involves new measures for which details were not released.

December 20, 2014: The government faces a major crises because the price of oil had declined 50 percent since 2013 (from $1110 to $55 a barrel). Oil and gas are nearly all (97 percent) of the country's export revenues, and 40 percent of GDP. This oil revenue is an essential tool for keeping an increasingly unhappy population quiet. For example in 2011 the government announced huge (over $200 billion) investment plans for the rest of the decade, to build infrastructure and support job growth. But such promises had been made before, and somehow never panned out. This time the charm offensive was more sustained and extensive. Local officials were ordered to try harder, a lot harder, to do something for the poor and unemployed who come to them for aid. This resulted in a sudden surge of reports from all over the country about how cranky officials had suddenly taken happy pills and undergone amazing transformations. This time the investment plans have largely been fulfilled, at least so far and that had managed to keep a lid on popular discontent. Current government spending plans assume an oil price of $100 a barrel. Some programs can be cut or delayed while some money can be borrowed. But not enough of this will make up for revenue lost when oil stays at $55 a barrel. If that happens, the situation gets dangerous and possibly ugly as the populations suffers more economic privation.

Meanwhile there is the other danger from Islamic terrorists operating just across the borders with Libya, Tunisia, Niger and Mali. Fortunately Tunisia has its Islamic terrorism problem under control and in Libya the current civil war (between Islamic terrorists and everyone who opposes them) has kept the pressure off the Algerian border. The current threat is mainly from the south (Mali and Niger) and that is where the government has deployed the most troops and police to improve border security. The government has made life much more difficult for smugglers along these borders. For example in one recent week on the Niger border police arrested over 150 smugglers (nearly all of them from nations to the south), seized over twenty vehicles along with 210 tons of food, 55,000 liters (13,000 gallons) of fuel and over fifty tons of other goods. Dozens of weapons were also found, but these appeared to be for self-defense not resale. Some smuggler hideouts and storage sites on the Algerian side of the border were also found and seized. What the government is mostly concerned about is Islamic terrorists moving back and forth across the border. But most of the traffic is smugglers of goods and those are taken down as they are encountered.

Then there are the efforts made to deal with the aftereffects of past conflicts. Last month army personnel cleared nearly 3,500 mines along the eastern and western borders. Many of these mines date back to the 1950s and 1960s. The landmine search has been was more stressful than the terrorist sweeps and gets a lot less publicity. The number of mines cleared each month increased dramatically in 2007 when the French finally turned over the colonial era maps of the minefields. France planted over three million French mines in the late 1950s. The 1,200 kilometers of mine fields were created to make it more difficult for Algerian rebels (against the French colonial government) moving across the Tunisian and Moroccan borders. Most of those mine fields are in remote areas, and have never been cleared. But each year those tending herds in the border areas are killed or injured by the mines as are their animals. The mines in more traveled areas have been removed soon after Algeria became independent in the 1960s. But now with accurate maps of the mine fields, the mines in remote areas can be cleared. That has been expensive, as the mines are now covered with more sand, or have shifted position because of rain and wind. The mine field maps were never a major issue between the two countries but France never offered to provide them until 2007 when the French army saw an opportunity to improve its relationship with Algeria. Since the 1950s, the French army has been particularly hated by Algerians, because of the rough tactics used during the late 1950s and early 1960s, before France finally left. But over the decades, the hatred has died down. Before 2007 over a hundred Algerians were killed or wounded by these old mines each year. These losses have been greatly reduced since 2007. So far over 750,000 mines have been cleared and the current rate is about 50,000 a year.

December 20, 2014: Soldiers ambushed the Islamic terrorist leader responsible for beheading a French tourist last September. Abdelmalek Gouri and two of his followers were killed some 50 kilometers east of the capital. Gouri was a veteran of the 1990s Islamic terrorist campaign to take over Algeria. He has been on the run for nearly two decades and was known to have remained active. In 2014 Gouri announced that his faction was joining ISIL. It took three days to confirm the identity of Gouri.

December 26, 2014: In the west (Tiraet province) police arrested a college professor and another man and accused them of recruiting for ISIL (Islamic State in Iraq and the Levant).

January 8, 2015: The government announced that it had reduced illiteracy from 22 percent of the population to 14 percent since 2008. The government has been less successful at reducing the unemployment rate, which is more likely to cause violent street protests than illiteracy.

Why is Algeria important and famous?

Ledjh Timizar Lives in Algiers, Algeria January 9, 2020

Why is Algeria important and famous?

Algeria is the largest country in Africa and the Arab world, the tenth largest country in the world, the 2nd most populous Arab country after Egypt,.

It holds in the south the best part of the largest desert in the world, the Sahara.

It holds under its desert 70 % of the Albien aquifer, the largest freshwater reserve in the world straddling Algeria, Tunisia and LIbye.

In addition to conventional gas, Algeria has the third or fourth largest shale gas supply in the world.

It has the highest human development index in Africa for the high development category after Seychelles (100,000 inhabitants) and Mauritius (1.3 million inhabitants), compared with Algeria 44 million inhabitants on a huge territory.

On the military level, it constitutes the second army of Africa after Egypt

It holds the most important Roman ruins after Italy. It was in Algeria that Saint Augustine, father of the church and Apuleius was born, a writer in Latin

50 years ago Algeria was known in the world for having recovered its independence with arms in hand, for being the Mecca of revolutionaries around the world and for being the champion of the non-aligned countries. Today on the diplomatic level, it is at the lowest ebb after its dark decade of terrorism. But from time to time she remembers everyone's good memories thanks to the exploits of her football team. Otherwise for common mortal Algeria evokes couscous, dates and Raï music.

Timgad, Algéria

What took the French so long to conquer Morocco, given that they conquered Algeria in 1830?

Vassim Malak Master in Electricity, Algeria (Graduated 2017) January 25

Why Algeria is less touristic compared to Morocco?

About the weather, northern Algeria outside the desert is located between the 37th and the 35th parallel and that over its entire length or 1622 km of coastline on the Mediterranean Sea: 360,000 km2 out 2.382 million km2 and this is more than the surface area of Germany, Italy or the United Kingdom,…

Why did France take over Algeria?
I find that most explanations for the 1830 invasion are not accurate enough or not profound enough. I have long since resolved to find some more form of a suitable explanation. The Barbary pirates, originating from North Africa, were the cause of many European outrages. The pirates, reaching as far a…

How old is Algeria?
M.Fouzi's answer was good but I find it incomplete : If you want to know how old “Algeria” (the word) is , read this : The word Algeria is derived from the Arabic name given to the capital Algiers or Al-Jazāʾir “ الجزائر“ . Given by the berber founder of the city , it translates to “ the islands “…

Conflict with other European powers over who should get Morocco.

Ahmed Abdelhaq Zaydan Lived in Meknès, Morocco (1996–0) August 4, 2018

France wanted to conquer Morocco to create an entire southern France in Northern and Western Africa as a single solid bloc.

Somewhat close to the French vision, it had to permit the UK and Spain in Northern and Western Africa

However it was opposed in this objective by the United Kingdom and Spain both of whom desired Morocco for their own colonial empires. This created a debate between the 3 powers of whom should get Morocco.

Spain tried to jump the gun with its invasion of Morocco in the Hispano-Moroccan War (1859–60) which only ended when the UK threatened to intervene on Morocco's behalf. However Spain refused to end the war without gaining some territory which resulted in the concession of the Sidi Ifni.

The Hispano-Moroccan War

To make a long history short:

The conflict resolved itself in the 1890s only for Germany to enter

Spain's power had been waning for some time now and its death blow was the Spanish–American War when the United States humiliated Spain. This caused the French and the UK to no longer take Spain seriously. Furthermore came the Egypt dispute which the UK had occupied since 1881 against French wishes.

This resulted in a Anglo-Franco agreement in which France lets the UK keep Egypt in exchange for France taking Morocco. Although with two concessions:

1. France continues to own 50% of the Suez Canal
2. France giving a slice of northern Morocco to Spain

With British support, France prepared a series of treaties for the Moroccan Sultan to sign with the goal of "helping" Morocco (but in reality Morocco was signing over its independence).

The German Emperor Wilhelm, aware of France's ambitions, visited Morocco and proclaimed that Germany would protect Moroccan independence thus sparking the First Moroccan Crisis where the Sultan rejected the French treaties believing Germany would go to war on his behalf.

Germany hoped the crisis would rally other nations to its anti-France cause.

Further delaying the French conquest of Morocco

However to the horror of the Germans, the entire world (including the islamic Ottoman Empire) supported France at the Algeciras Conference. Although a second Morocco crisis occurred in 1911, eager to at least win something, Germany agreed to step aside on the condition that France cede terrirory in Central Africa to Germany's African colonies.

In Orange, the territory that France granted the German colony of Cameroon in exchange for Morocco

Thus France was finally able to conquer Morocco in 1912.

What are some of the most surreal places in Algeria?

Vassim Malak Master in Electricity, Algeria (Graduated 2017) January 25
Woderfull Algeria

From the lofty heights of the Tell Atlas mountains to the grievously charming desert expanse of Ahaggar Chain; Algeria is a country of a beautiful and diversified nature, offering a wide variety of natural conspicuous landscapes and beautiful temper wonderment. The diversity of the Algerian culture,…

What pictures will motivate people to visit Algeria?
Etc etc, it's a 2,381,741 km² I think an answer in Quora wouldn't be enough, but I think the sample of thebimages I posted till now are good for a start.…
Why is Algeria so underdeveloped?

NOTE: This answer was written in 2015, and the original question was something along the lines of “Why is it that Algeria has the lowest infrastructure?”. The original person asking also claimed that he had been to Algeria before and saw nothing but poverty, generally making hyperbolic comments abou…
Algeria is the largest country in Africa and the Arab world, the tenth largest country in the world, the 2nd most populous Arab country after Egypt,.

It holds in the south the best part of the largest desert in the world, the Sahara.

It holds under its desert 70 % of the Albien aquifer, the largest freshwater reserve in the world straddling Algeria, Tunisia and LIbye.

In addition to conventional gas, Algeria has the third or fourth largest shale gas supply in the world.

It has the highest human development index in Africa for the high development category after Seychelles (100,000 inhabitants) and Mauritius (1.3 million inhabitants), compared with Algeria 44 million inhabitants on a huge territory.

On the military level, it constitutes the second army of Africa after Egypt

It holds the most important Roman ruins after Italy. It was in Algeria that Saint Augustine, father of the church and Apuleius was born, a writer in Latin

50 years ago Algeria was known in the world for having recovered its independence with arms in hand, for being the Mecca of revolutionaries around the world and for being the champion of the non-aligned countries. Today on the diplomatic level, it is at the lowest ebb after its dark decade of terrorism. But from time to time she remembers everyone's good memories thanks to the exploits of her football team. Otherwise for common mortal Algeria evokes couscous, dates and Raï music.

Timgad, Algéria

©2019 George Steinmetz

NOTE: This answer was written in 2015, and the original question was something along the lines of “Why is it that Algeria has the lowest infrastructure?”. The original person asking also claimed that he had been to Algeria before and saw nothing but poverty, generally making hyperbolic comments about being extremely underdeveloped. I’ve decided to update this answer in 2020 as there are things that have changed since 2015. Here’s what I said a long time ago!

Lowest infrastructure? What does that even mean?
So you say you've been to Algeria...

Did you see these? It's Houari Boumediene Airport, the country's hub. The majority of tourists and travellers to Algeria will have been through this airport - most likely you too. Looks nice and modern, don't you think? Or maybe you forgot...

A lot of travellers to Algeria will stay within the capital, Algiers. Perhaps you wanted to get around. Most capital cities in less developed countries won't have certain types of infrastructure like passenger trains. Not in Algiers!

Here's what they call the Algerian Metro! It was launched in 2011. I'll be honest, it's not much on its own (1 line, 19 stops, another line planned) but that's not the only way to get around in Algiers. Maybe the metro is a bit expensive for you to take all the time. How about having this on Algiers' roads?

For a country with 'underdeveloped' infrastructure, this is amazing! And yes, it IS air-conditioned. But if you think this is just because it's the capital, see this.

Here's another one, this time it's in another city in Algeria called Oran. Funnily enough, from Algiers you can actually go by train across a lot of the Mediterranean coast by the train below.

Rails aside, the Algerian government did recently announce (EDIT: I have no idea when! Maybe 2015?) a plan to invest $55 billion in road infrastructure. Here's a picture of the East-West Highway, not too far off Oran:

It's supposed to be finished this year (EDIT: “mostly complete” as of 2016) . It's an $11 billion dollar, six-lane highway across Algeria at 756 miles long. Did I mention it might be one of the largest projects of its type in the world? And boy, is it useful for Algeria!

Personally, the bus isn't my favourite mode of transport and I'll be honest: You might ride something decent like this.

Or something not as amazing:

But rarely ever THIS:

For most Algerians, it is indeed... the bus. Not the camel.

To answer your question, Algeria is so underdeveloped for either two reasons:

1. It just seems underdeveloped but developments are ongoing and in large investments.

2. Foreign investment is generally uncommon and rather bureaucratic.

You can't really consider Algeria to be a third world country. The term 'third world' itself is disliked by academics and the whole '1st/2nd/3rd World' way of labelling countries. It's a vague and outdated term.

Perhaps Algeria is third world but consider this picture:

Let's even assume this is what the majority of Algerians live like but how about a different 3rd world country like this:

These pictures are both third world countries. These are both within the same category in terms of economic development but as run down as the flats above may look, it's definitely better than living in huts without even a door.

I don't know what part of Algeria you went to... Maybe the desert. If that was so, please understand that the run-down places you may have seen in the desert may have been a mirage xD

Two things I will give you though:

1. Unemployment is indeed a big issue in Algeria. The government are trying to combat this by giving interest-free loans for people to start their own businesses.

Problem is, it's being misused and money is being given to entrepreneurs without them even having a business plan of any sort.

2. Not the airport but the airLINE, Air Algérie. It's not particularly great. Thankfully, the airline has finally come up with a plan to turn itself around. It's got a new CEO and new planes are being delivered each month. It's gonna need 'em what with the OpenSkies agreement being launched soon(An agreement that aims to make the airline industry as fair as possible for all airlines). Air Algérie are going to end up facing a lot of competition. (EDIT: It’s 2020 and Air Algérie still maintains a monopoly. Oh well!)

Why is Algeria important and famous?

Ledjh Timizar Lives in Algiers, Algeria January 9, 2020

Algeria is the largest country in Africa and the Arab world, the tenth largest country in the world, the 2nd most populous Arab country after Egypt,.
It holds in the south the best part of the largest desert in the world, the Sahara.

It holds under its desert 70 % of the Albien aquifer, the largest freshwater reserve in the world straddling Algeria, Tunisia and Libya.

In addition to conventional gas, Algeria has the third or fourth largest shale gas supply in the world.

It has the highest human development index in Africa for the high development category after Seychelles (100,000 inhabitants) and Mauritius (1.3 million inhabitants), compared with Algeria 44 million inhabitants on a huge territory.

On the military level, it constitutes the second army of Africa after Egypt

It holds the most important Roman ruins after Italy. It was in Algeria that Saint Augustine, father of the church and Apuleius was born, a writer in Latin

50 years ago Algeria was known in the world for having recovered its independence with arms in hand, for being the Mecca of revolutionaries around the world and for being the champion of the non-aligned countries. Today on the diplomatic level, it is at the lowest ebb after its dark decade of terrorism. But from time to time she remembers everyone's good memories thanks to the exploits of her football team. Otherwise for common mortal Algeria evokes couscous, dates and Raï music.

Timgad, Algéria

Why Algeria is less touristic compared to Morocco?
About the weather, northern Algeria outside the desert is located between the 37th and the 35th parallel and that over its entire length or 1622 km of coastline on the Mediterranean Sea: 360,000 km2 out 2.382 million km2 and this is more than the surface area of Germany, Italy or the United Kingdom,…

Why did France take over Algeria?

I find that most explanations for the 1830 invasion are not accurate enough or not profound enough. I have long since resolved to find some more form of a suitable explanation. The Barbary pirates, originating from North Africa, were the cause of many European outrages. The pirates, reaching as far a…

How old is Algeria?

Vassim Malak Master in Electricity, Algeria (Graduated 2017) January 25

M.Fouzi's answer was good but I find it incomplete : If you want to know how old “Algeria” (the word) is , read this : The word Algeria is derived from the Arabic name given to the capital Algiers or Al-Jazāʾir “ الجزائر“ . Given by the berber founder of the city , it translates to “ the islands “…

What took the French so long to conquer Morocco, given that they conquered Algeria in 1830?

Ahmed Abdelhaq Zaydan Lived in Meknès, Morocco (1996–0) August 4, 2018

Conflict with other European powers over who should get Morocco. France wanted to conquer Morocco to create an entire southern France in Northern and Western Africa as a single solid bloc.

Somewhat close to the French vision, it had to permit the UK and Spain in Northern and Western Africa

However it was opposed in this objective by the United Kingdom and Spain both of whom desired Morocco for their own colonial empires. This created a debate between the 3 powers of whom should get Morocco.

Spain tried to jump the gun with its invasion of Morocco in the Hispano-Moroccan War (1859–60) which only ended when the UK threatened to intervene on Morocco's behalf. However Spain refused to end the war without gaining some territory which resulted in the concession of the Sidi Ifni.

Are people from North Africa considered black?

Originally Answered: Are Northern Africans black

Dipak Chakraborty Lives in Madison, WI Oct 9

No they aren't.

Najla Bouden

They are light skinned. It's great. The world needs more beautiful and intelligent folks.

Because of Mediterranean climate. Just like southern europe, Turkey and Levant region[Israel, Lebanon and Syria].

≠ ENST L'élite ne baisse
jamais les bras

And historic mass migration from Eurasia.

North Africa is far less humid than Sub Saharan africa.

59% humidity. It's as cold as Milwaukee right now.

Algiers Latitude : 36°N.

Far higher than the equator and tropic of cancer. So the climate is not hot and humid[Higher than Houston, TX(29°N)].

Algeria is desert. Vast majority of the population live in the northern region. Near the mediterranean Sea.

Sub Saharan Africa is closer to the equator.

That means “tropical wet” climate zone. Hot all the time. And humid.

Hot and Humid : Dark skin.

Hot and dry : Lighter Skin.

Middle East/North Africa becomes colder during the winter. Colder during the night. But Sub Saharan Africa will always be hot and humid.

Why do deserts get so cold at night?

By Harry Baker

First Published 7 months ago

Temperatures in the Sahara can drop an average of 75 degrees Fahrenheit (42 degrees Celsius) overnight.

Why Does It Feel Hotter When It's Humid? Science!

BY ADAM KRUEGER | TEXAS
PUBLISHED 7:18 PM CT JUL. 07, 2016

"It's not the heat, it's the humidity." Ever heard that phrase? I hear it all the time in the summer, and have even said it several times on TV. It refers to the fact that high humidity makes it feel hotter than the actual air temperature.

Humid air holds heat more efficiently than dry air. This means that during the winter, an appropriate amount of humidity can make your home more comfortable, and reduce the need for your furnace to continually replenish indoor heat. ... Balanced humidity also safeguards your indoor air quality.

10-Jul-2014

https://www.griffithenergyservices.com › ...

How Humidity Affects Your Home and How to Manage It

Why aren't people in the Middle East black when it's hotter than the majority of Africa?

Dipak Chakraborty Aug 14

Because middle east is only “Hot” but Africa is hot and “Humid”. It's Tehran🇮🇷 Lagos🇳🇬 Look at the difference [Humidity] : 89%🇳🇬 vs 16%🇮🇷 Tehran is hotter and “whiter” than Lagos. Cities like Kuwait city, Baghdad and Dubai are way hotter than Lagos, Dakar and Kinshasa. But the humidity in the middle east is way way lower. Negligible. Sub Saharan Africa is closer to the equator. That means “tropical wet” climate zone. Hot all the time. Middle East becomes colder during the winter. But Lagos will always be hot and humid. Evergreen forest. So the humidity makes Africans Black. And middle east is desert. Can you survive in a place where the temperature is 30°C and the humidity is 90% ?? I can't. I will probably die. Lol!! 🤣But I can survive in a place where the temperature is 48°C and the humidity is 20%. There won't be any problem[Like northern India, Agra (Taj Mahal)]. So the sub Saharan African climate is the worst in the world[Along with southern India] and that's why they are black. “Hot and humid” IQ. It's dependent on climate.

Read it Northern Africans are Caucasian.

Higher IQ. North Africans are caucasian. But they aren't white

Related Links

Why do the people of North Africa have almost nothing in common with the rest of Africa or African people?

Why do people not consider North Africans as white although North Africans look pretty European?

Are North Africans genetically European/white?

What makes many people use the term 'sub Saharan' to apply to all black Africans? Are people really this ignorant and believe that all North Africans are white? You don't have to be mixed with 'sub Saharan' to be a dark skinned North African

Why are North Africans white? Is it still safe to call them Africans or being African has nothing to do with skin colour?

Did black Africans originally live in North Africa?

Were the Egyptians black?

What kind of skin color did North Africans have in the past? How were they treated by the Romans and end so on?

At what point did North Africans become “white”?

Why are Northern Africans lighter skinned than other Africans?

L'Algérie aurait-elle pu rester française ?

Super Dupont A étudié Science et Conscience à Écoles d'ingénieurs Mis à jour le 11 janv.

Mon coeur, à moitié pied-noir, a envie de hurler "bien sûr" en réponse à cette question.

Mais si j'utilise plutôt mon cerveau, je vais donner une réponse nuancée. Ni oui, ni non.

D'un point de vue historique, oui, l'Algérie aurait pu rester française - ou autre chose aussi, d'ailleurs. A travers l'histoire, cette zone a quasiment tout le temps subi une domination étrangère - arabe, marocaine, ottomane, française, et on pourrait même remonter à plus loin, avec Rome et Carthage. L'Algérie en tant que nation est une fiction.

D'un point de vue militaire, oui, l'armée française avait gagné la guerre d'Algérie. Le FLN exsangue en 1960 ne doit sa survie qu'à la concession de De Gaulle.

D'un point de vue géopolitique, probablement pas. Le centre de gravité de la France se trouve depuis un millénaire au nord de la Loire, ses enjeux - économiques, territoriaux, diplomatiques - sont avant tout européens. Maintenir l'Algérie française aurait fait basculer ce centre de gravité sur la Méditerranée. A l'époque, la France n'était pas taillée pour cela, n'aurait pas su gérer la complexité et les priorités concurrentes pour jouer sur ces deux tableaux. C'est d'ailleurs moins vrai aujourd'hui. Avec l'ampleur et l'efficacité que l'Union Européenne a maintenant atteint (oui, j'ai bien dit "efficacité", messieurs les eurosceptiques), au XXIème siècle, arrimer l'ensemble du pourtour méditerranéen à l'UE est une étape naturelle d'un point de vue géopolitique. Mais seulement géopolitique et économique, sur d'autres aspects cela pose des difficultés que je vais évoquer ci-dessous.

D'un point de vue économique, oui, maintenir l'Algérie Française était non seulement possible, mais aurait même abouti à une formidable réussite des deux côtés. Cela aurait fourni un relais de croissance dans les années 70–80, grâce à la réserve de croissance de la population algérienne et aux hydrocarbures, cela aurait grandement réduit les problèmes économiques (donc sociaux) de l'Algérie dans les années 90, et aurait entraîné des délocalisations internes, du nord au sud de la Méditerranée, au lieu d'envoyer toute notre industrie en Chine. Dans ce scénario alternatif, c'est le Maghreb qui devient le principal atelier de l'Europe.

Pib par habitant, Algérie, 1970–2020, USD constant (base 2010)

Pib par habitant, France, 1970–2020, USD constant (base 2010)

Le point de vue démographique est probablement l'aspect décisif. Analysons d'un point de vue purement numérique: si l'Algérie Française avait maintenu la même natalité débridée et anarchique que l'Algérie indépendante a connu, alors clairement non, la situation serait vite devenu intenable, car déséquilibrée et dans un cercle vicieux conflictuel entre algériens et métropolitains. En 1960, il y a plus de 4,5 métropolitains pour un algérien (46m / 10m d'habitants). En 2020, c'est 3 pour 2. Impossible d'imaginer une Algérie Française dans de telles conditions ; au mieux, c'est la France qui devient Algérienne.

Mais dans une Algérie Française, une politique démographique volontaire aurait pu accélérer la transition démographique, et maintenir ce ratio en dessous de 1 algérien pour 3 métropolitains. Cela aurait assuré la stabilité des politiques éducatives et économiques, et grandement amélioré la richesse par habitant de l'Algérie. Moins de jeunes, avec plus de diplômes, et plus de travail.

Les autres aspects, politiques et culturels, sont alors essentiellement des conséquences de la résolution ou non de ce problème démographique. D'un point de vue politique, l'Algérie se porterait bien mieux aujourd'hui sans cette clique mafieuse issue du FLN qui a mis le pays en coupe réglée depuis 60 ans. Au sein de la France, elle aurait bénéficié d'une technocratie efficace et bien moins corrompue, d'instances de contrôle, de partis politiques d'alternance.

Le problème culturel était en principe le plus simple à résoudre. Comme la nation algérienne n'existait pas, il suffisait de reconnaître des tribus comme autant de communautés, une langue officielle (le français) avec plusieurs langues secondaires reconnues, arabes (darija, hassanya, voire judéo-arabe), berbères (kabyle, chaoui, et sans doute 2 ou 3 autres), peut-être aussi l'espagnol et le pataouete. De même, une structuration pragmatique d'un islam local sous supervision étatique aurait évité bien des problèmes ultérieurs. Enfin, un chemin basé sur l'éducation et une forme d'assimilation aurait offert aux indigènes, individuellement, la possibilité d'accéder à des droits comparables à ceux des Français, plus ou moins vite en fonction de leurs capacités et de leur bonne volonté. Tout cela ne sort pas de mon imagination fertile, au contraire cela s'inscrit dans la continuité de l'administration de ce territoire au cours des siècles. En particulier, c'est exactement le modèle des califats arabes.

Tatouage berbère: le tatouage est absolument interdit dans l'Islam, mais la tradition est restée bien ancrée dans les populations berbères du Maroc et de l'Algérie - jusqu'à sa mise en cause récente par les courants islamistes importés au XXeme siècle

Malheureusement, la réalité tranchait à l'opposé de ces principes d'intégration culturelle. La France des années 50 et 60 baignait encore dans son idéal jacobin centralisateur, donc hors de question de reconnaître de multiples langues et communautés. La séparation de l'Église et de l'État de 1905 rendait inimaginable un arrangement qui mette sous contrôle étatique la religion locale. Enfin, le racisme bien ancré des colons européens a saboté presque toutes les initiatives qui visaient à améliorer le sort des indigènes. Peut-être que l'Algérie aurait pu rester française, mais certainement la France de l'époque n'aurait pas su se l'approprier.

Voilà pourquoi je regrette mais je comprends la décision de De Gaulle de donner son indépendance à l'Algérie. Ces arguments pragmatiques l'ont amené à considérer que l'Algérie ne pouvait rester française.

Questions similaires

Finalement, si l’Algérie était restée française, la France ne serait-elle pas devenu un pays à majorité musulmane ? De manière générale, à quoi ressemblerait la France aujourd'hui si l’Algérie était restée française ?

Un Algérien d'un certain âge m'a montré la carte d'identité Française qu'il possédait en 1962, juste avant l'indépendance. Il y était noté "Français musulman". Y avait-il bien un système d'apartheid à l'époque de l'Algérie Française ?

Pourquoi il n'y a qu'avec l'Algérie que les relations sont souvent tendues alors que la France a occupé d'autres pays ?

L’Algérie et la France sont-elles en train de se rapprocher ?

Comment était l'Algérie avant d'être française ?

Pourquoi la France a-t-elle perdu la guerre d'Algérie ?

Combien de personnes ont été tuées lors de la colonisation française de l'Algérie ?

Quel est le problème profond que l’Algérie a avec la France ?

La France devrait-elle soutenir l'indépendance de la Kabylie ?

Quelles personnes en France n'ont toujours pas digéré l'indépendance de l'Algérie ?

Pourquoi les Arabes détestent l'Algérie ?

Pourquoi on demande tout le temps à la France de s'excuser à l'Algérie pour la Guerre d'Algérie et pas à l'Algérie de s'excuser pour les actes du FLN durant la même période ?

Est-ce qu’il est vrai que lors de la colonisation de l'Algérie, les Français ont voulu naturaliser les Kabyles, les envoyer vers la métropole, et les traiter comme les Français de souche vu leurs phénotypes européens ?

Est-ce que le Maroc va attaquer l'Algérie ?

Pourquoi la France a-t-elle perdu la guerre d'Algérie alors qu'elle a tué beaucoup plus d'Algériens qu'elle n'a subi de pertes ? (Question traduite)

How would modern-day Algeria be if it had remained under French rule?

Andrew Thomasson Engineer at Solar Radiation Management (SRM) (1911–present) Apr 12

On equal grounds, with equal citizenship to everyone, and no stupid racism or xenophobia, Algeria would be a wealthy part of France in 2021.

Related Links

What is the most realistic way for France to have permanently kept Algeria?

Why did France fight a vicious war In Algeria and killed hundreds of thousands unlike other colonies?

Is it true that the main reason why General de Gaulle gave independence to Algeria is because he was afraid that if Algeria remains French then France would eventually become a Muslim majority country?

Why could France not convert Algeria to part of France?

Was Algeria better off as an integral part of France, or is it better off independent?

Why did France take over Algeria?

Why did France lose the Algerian War?

Had the Algerian War been conducted differently, might France have prevailed? What changes would have yielded a 'French Algeria' to the present day?

How is the Algerian War (1954-1962) viewed in modern day France?

Why was Northern Algeria so heavily developed by France compared to other French colonies?

Why is France obsessed with Algeria?

Why did France give up Algeria?

Why is Algeria not part of Francophonie?

Would Algeria have been richer today if it was still part of France?

What could France have done differently to keep Algeria?

Is Algeria culturally close with France?

Anes Ouadou born and lived in Algeria up to the age of 28 years old5y

Algeria has its own cultural identity that it shares with the countries of North Africa, mainly Morocco and Tunisia and to a lesser degree with Libya. this culture is based on the land, religion and the people. if we look at these three criteria we find nothing common with France for the land, Algeria and France are separated by the Mediterranean sea, the climate of northern Algeria is kind of similar to southern France, but so is the case for northern Morocco and southern Spain, France try to spread the claim that Algeria and France are one country separated by the see just like Paris is separated by the Seine river.

If we look at the people, we have two main races in Algeria, the Amazigh (also referred to as Berbers although I don't like this nomination) who are the indigenous of the land, they have been there for thousands of years, I have read many claims of their origin, but as far as I know they are all speculations. we also have the Arabs who came as conquerors in the 7th century, and since then they mixed with the local populations. the difference between the Arabs and other conquerors is that they didn't have problem mixing with the indigenous people specially through marriage. This mixed marriage still exist up to date and it is considered a normal thing (I am actually one of those, my mother is Amazigh and father is Arab, and so are many of my friends). They also brought Islam which later became the dominating religion of the area for the religion, as mentioned above Islam is the dominating religion of north Africa. before that, the main religion was worship of idles, paganism. while Christianity did exist, it was the religion of the Romans and later the Byzantines who controlled the region. they weren't interested in preaching their religion like the Arabs did. they treated the locals as slaves and humiliated them, this pushed them away from Christianity.

the French didn't differ much from the Romans, they invaded the country in 1830 for its resources, and used it to redistribute their excessive population which happened to be christian. they tried to force the local people to become christian but that didn't work, so they switched to the systematic destruction of anything related to the existing culture. They destroyed the mosques and the schools, forbid any type of learning. In fact they didn't allow the Algerians to learn anything, it was until few years before the independence that Algerian kids were allowed into public schools that only teaches french language and culture (after independence 95 % of the male population and 98% of the female population were illiterate).

for why there are no Christians in Algeria, beside the fact that Islam was deeply rooted in the the minds a hearts of the Algerians, Christianity was the religion of the oppressor, people who came from Europe were given privileges not given to the locals. Exception was made for the Algerian Jews who lived in Algeria for centuries (most of them are descendants of the Jews who were expelled from Spain by the catholic king and queen along with the Muslims in 1492), they were given the chance to become full french citizens and enjoy the same privileges as the European citizens, many of them accepted that, so they were considered as traitors by the remaining populations.

there also another reason why most of the population of European origin decided to leave the country. after the ceasefire was signed between the french army in Algeria and the FLN (Front de liberation national) who were leading the fight for independence in March 19th 1962, a group of soldiers and officers in the french army were not happy with it and they created an organization called OAS (organization de l'arme secrete) which translates to "the secret army organization". this organization is responsible for most (if not all) the violence that happened between the ceasefire and the independence in July 5th 1962. in less than 4 months, 100,000 people died because of the actions of this organization. they targeted the Algerians as revenge and to try to scare them from voting for independence in the referendum that was later held in July 1st 1962, and they also targeted the European population and put the blame on Algerians to try to goad them to join the organization and to put pressure on the french government and army, but that didn't succeed. they also tried to destroy as much of the infrastructure as possible to prevent the new Algerian state from benefiting from them. Follow Anes Ouadou

Related Links

What is the most realistic way for France to have permanently kept Algeria?

Why was Northern Algeria so heavily developed by France compared to other French colonies?

Why could France not convert Algeria to part of France?

Why did France fight a vicious war In Algeria and killed hundreds of thousands unlike other colonies?

How would modern-day Algeria be if it had remained under French rule?

Why did so many Algerians migrate to France after the Algerian War of Independence?

Why did France give up Algeria?

How are Algerians treated in France?

Did French soldiers kill civilians during the Algerian War?

How do the French and the Algerians view the Algerian war?

What could France have done differently to keep Algeria?

Why is Algeria so underdeveloped?

How should France apologize to Algeria?

Why did France take over Algeria?

Why did France lose the Algerian War?

Why could France not convert Algeria to part of France?

Oldie. Repost. Yassine Sarti Updated 1y

Algeria was in all respects part of France. Algeria was divided into three departements (provinces) of France. For comparison, neighboring countries Tunisia and Morocco were technically sovereign nation states under French protection (protectorates). Territories of West Africa were administered as direct colonial territories.

The biggest obstacle to the complete assimilation of Algeria into France was religion. The French did not want to welcome such a large Muslim population. Thus, while Algeria was fully French, the Muslim and Jewish populations were not. In 1860, the French issued a decree stating that all Algerian Muslims and Jews could apply for citizenship. While that sounds like a great gesture, it was a lot more complicated. First of all, the citizenship decree was the result of the efforts of one man, Napoleon III, a man who was very sympathetic to the indigenous Algerians and seemed to have been left with a certain love for the country after visiting it in 1860, writing a letter in 1863:

Algeria is not a colony in the traditional sense, but a Muslim kingdom; the locals, like the colonists, have a legal right to my protection. I am just as much emperor of the Muslims of Algeria, as I am of the French. But he in no way represents what most French people thought of Algerians, Muslims, Jews or Africans. Not to mention what the French settlers thought of them, them having no benefit in seeing an increase in the rights of the native populations. From the Algerian point of view, the problem was that in order to obtain citizenship, you had to be prepared to abandon Islamic and Jewish laws, and their courts. It basically boiled down to rejecting Islam (and Judaism), or so it was understood back then. In the first decade of this decree, only a few hundred Algerians, Muslims and Jews, applied for citizenship. This was an attempt by France to secularize (read: de-Islamize) Algeria, and assimilate the Muslims and Jews. And it didn't work.

In the 1880s, all Algerian Jews were automatically granted French citizenship. Over the course of a few decades, Algerian Jews went from having names like Moshe and Mimoun to donning names like Jacques. Such quick assimilation was unthinkable for the Muslim Algerian masses. Algeria’s Muslims admired French culture and they wanted to be part of France, but only on their own terms. The French, on the other hand, were willing to allow Muslims to a seat at the table, but only in a French context.

Famous French paining depicting the 1852 release of Abdelkader, the legendary Algerian resistance leader. Napoleon III has his hand kissed by Abdelkader's mother. Abdelkader stands slightly to her right. Follow Yassine Sarti

Why did France give up Algeria?

Dan Dragan I am not afraid of historical hot potatoes 7y

I don't think the French gave up Algeria, it was taken from them. Why did they give up on Algeria? Because it caused them more trouble than it was worth (money wise, blood wise, politically wise). Because colonial, imperial ideas became unpopular in France, and, having been themselves oppressed by a "superior" race, once they gained back their freedom most of them could no longer justify oppressing native Algerians on the same basis of European might and right especially with media showing in gory details the results of punitive actions. The Algerian guerrilla groups were quite efficient and their actions were part of a larger movement against colonial powers that followed WW II (many national awakenings are attributed to it) that caused colonial powers (of which France was one) fighting ability, already weakened because of the war to be stretched even thinner. The military technology gap between natives and Europeans narrowed so it wa no longer spear vs musket, it was submachine gun vs submachine gun.

Most of all, I guess that, unlike US, the majority of French people could not cope with the hypocrisy of declaring yourself the epitome of freedom on Earth while at the same time shedding loads of blood in the name of bringing that freedom, democracy, prosperity e.t.c. to a bunch of people that clearly don't want you there and have done nothing to harm you. French are, as a nation, far more interested in other cultures and more traveled abroad. As such, they are more aware of their country's image and what the government does in their name. A lesson in there somewhere. Follow Dan Draga

Related Links

Why could France not convert Algeria to part of France?

Why did France lose the Algerian War?

Why was Northern Algeria so heavily developed by France compared to other French colonies?

Is it true that the main reason why General de Gaulle gave independence to Algeria is because he was afraid that if Algeria remains French then France would eventually become a Muslim majority country?

What is the most realistic way for France to have permanently kept Algeria?

Why did France fight a vicious war In Algeria and killed hundreds of thousands unlike other colonies?

Why did Algeria want independence from France?

Is Algeria culturally close with France?

How is the Algerian War (1954-1962) viewed in modern day France?

What could France have done differently to keep Algeria?

How would modern-day Algeria be if it had remained under French rule?

Is it true that France was militarily winning its war in Algeria in the late 1950s before it decided to withdraw from Algeria for political reasons?

Was Algeria better off as an integral part of France, or is it better off independent?

Why is France obsessed with Algeria?

Why did France take over Algeria?

What if France would not have invaded Algeria in 1830?

Randy McDonald A fan of cities, islands, migration and Trek and more 5y

Some sort of French retaliation against Algeria, for its claimed (legitimate) debts against France and for its sponsorship of piracy, may have been inevitable. If France had not embarked on a wholesale conquest and colonization of Algeria, the effects would be significant. French imperialism, and the eventual second French empire, would get off to a later start. I'm willing to bet that the overall empire would look much like the actual empire, with a concentration in Africa and secondary loci in the Caribbean basin and in the Asia-Pacific region, but the details may vary.

Algeria probably would eventually be colonized, given that such was the fate of North African countries next to a rising Europe. I would bet that France would end up being the likely colonizer. I suspect that the colonization would look more like that of adjacent Morocco and Tunisia, with protectorates imposed over native administrations.

The position of Jews in France may vary interestingly. In our history, the Sephardim of North Africa were embraced relatively early on as potential French allies against Muslims, to the point that Algerian Jews were given French citizenship in 1870. This will likely not happen if we get a later French protectorate.

The lives of millions of people will be changed directly. What about the many hundreds of thousands of Algerians who died in the French conquests? What about the hundreds of thousands of people who came from across the Mediterranean to become pieds noirs? What about all their descendants?

Related Links

Why could France not convert Algeria to part of France?
Did Algeria exist before 1830?
Why did France take over Algeria?

Was Algeria a country before french colonisation?
Why was Northern Algeria so heavily developed by France compared to other French colonies?
How would modern-day Algeria be if it had remained under French rule?
What is the most realistic way for France to have permanently kept Algeria?
What would happen if France tried to invade Algeria again?
Why is France obsessed with Algeria?
Is it true that the main reason why General de Gaulle gave independence to Algeria is because he was afraid that if Algeria remains French then France would eventually become a Muslim majority country?
Why did France give up Algeria?
Why did France fight a vicious war In Algeria and killed hundreds of thousands unlike other colonies?
For what reasons or motives did France have to colonize Algeria?
Is Algeria culturally close with France?
Why do people think that Algeria would have been better if it had been part of France?

Why is France obsessed with Algeria?

Dahyun Kim BA from University of California, Los Angeles Updated Jan 8

There are several reasons why France has historically been obsessed with Algeria.

Proximity - If you look at the map you will realize how strategic Algeria is to France. It's located fairly close, just across the sea. Thus it acted as a crucial bridge between France and its African colonies.

Annexation - At one time France had the goal to make Algeria an integral part of France. It was administered as a French district (departement), not as a mere colony, and so they were heavily involved in local politics. This is why there is so much bad blood between French and Algerians. This is similar to the complicated relationship between British and Irish or Japanese and Koreans today.

Favorable Climate - Being located on the Mediterranean coast, Algeria has a very attractive Mediterranean climate similar to that of south of France which has always been popular with the French elites (Nice, Monaco, St Bartz etc).

Fetishism - During the Revolutionary and Napoleonic eras many artists began to develop strong interests in Islamic and Eastern cultures due to their perceived exoticism, particularly among the romantics. C.f. Japonisme during Impressionist era Eurabia - Some fringe French elites proposed mixing European and Arabic/Muslim peoples to create a one giant superpower. Some conspiracists believe this is the ultimate endgame for the European Union project and France's immigration policy.

Related Links

Why was Northern Algeria so heavily developed by France compared to other French colonies?

Is it true that the main reason why General de Gaulle gave independence to Algeria is because he was afraid that if Algeria remains French then France would eventually become a Muslim majority country?

Why did France fight a vicious war In Algeria and killed hundreds of thousands unlike other colonies?

What is the most realistic way for France to have permanently kept Algeria?

Why doesn't Algeria push France to recognize Algerian genocide? Will countries like Morocco, Tunisia, Turkey, Azerbaijan, etc. recognize it as well?

How would modern-day Algeria be if it had remained under French rule?

Why did France give up Algeria?
Why could France not convert Algeria to part of France?

Why did Algeria want independence from France?

How is the Algerian War (1954-1962) viewed in modern day France?

Was Algeria better off as an integral part of France, or is it better off independent?

Why did France lose the Algerian War?

Why did France take over Algeria?

Is Algeria culturally close with France?

Why is Algeria not part of Francophonie?

Snapshots of Algerian History

Follow Posted by Melia Janssen Nov 7

Rais Hamidou in Algeria was named "le Château des Deux Moulins"or" Rais Hamidou Castle" was built by a baron in the colonial era when France occupied Algeria. It became a school in the 1950's where both French and Algerians attended this school together and all the teachers were French. After Algeria's independence in 1962, it changed hands a few times before being abandoned with ensuing rumours emerging of it being haunted.

A restoration went underway in 2012 with plans for further expansion.

What is a sacred mountain in Saudi Arabia?

Saleh A. Al-Sulaimon Studied at Takushoku University Dec 6

Standing on Mount Arafat is one of the rituals of Hajj. Rather, it is the pilgrimage, as it is not considered a pilgrim who did not stand in Arafat even if he performed the rest of the rituals. (الحج عرفة The pilgrimage is Arafat). There are mountains in which important sites and incidents occurred, such as Mount Thawr and Mount Uhud, but no Islamic rituals are associated with them.

Related Links

What is the most sacred mountain in Asia?

Which are the world's most sacred mountains?

As a Muslim, do you consider Saudi Arabia a sacred country, since it owns and rules the holy cities Mecca and Medina?

How does Saudi Arabia check that someone is a Muslim when entering Mecca?

Can a mountain be sacred?

What is the most sacred thing in life?

What are the mountains of Saudi Arabia known for?

What is the biggest mountain in Saudi Arabia?

Why are mountains sacred?

What is going on in Saudi Arabia?

What mountain is the mountain of God?

What kind of mountains are in Saudi Arabia?

What are the characteristics of mountains in Saudi Arabia?

Saudi Arabia: Are all Saudis rich?

What are the sacred sites of Islam?

Are tensions between Algeria and Morocco calming down? It's worsening as Morocco now believes it has broken the balance thanks to Israel and the United States

Ahmed Abdelhaq Zaydan Follow Lived in Meknès, Morocco (1996–0)11h

The reason why North Africa isn't a hotbed of conflict is because pre-2011 there was a balance between the two natural regional powers, Algeria and Morocco. They were matched in population, military strength and diplomacy. This made war costly and the chance of victory being slim for both nations.

Then Morocco signed into the pro-US camp

Morocco normalized with Israel in late 2020 and this opened countless closed doors to it. To use two examples:

Morocco, Israel to build 2 drone factories

Morocco and Israel are preparing to build two factories for unmanned aircraft in the North Africa state's Al-Aoula region, media reported yesterday. Moroccan and Israeli official sources told Shephar...https://www.middleeastmonitor.com/20211217-morocco-israel-to-build-2-drone-factories/

The goal is for Morocco to be able to produce its own Israeli-designed drones. In the event of a war of attrition, Morocco's domestic weapons production would be very beneficial. Especially if Moroccan factories are capable of replacing drones lost in combat. This is a capability Algeria lacks.

Israeli drone

U.S. Proposes $1 Billion Arms Sale to Morocco After Israel Deal

(Bloomberg) -- The U.S. has proposed selling as much as $1 billion in weapons including Reaper drones to Morocco, just a day after President Donald Trump paved the way for a diplomatic deal with Israel by recognizing the country's claims of sovereignty over Western Sahara. https://www.bloombergquint.com/politics/u-s-proposes-1-billion-arms-sale-to-morocco-after-israel-deal

The United States is also opening its weapons shop to Morocco as well. Generally the United States avoided selling highly advanced weaponry to the Arab nations to avoid dulling Israeli superiority when it came to arms. But now that Morocco has normalized, Morocco can pick whatever arms it likes.

This new military superiority as well as diplomatic support has emboldened Morocco

That's why after the normalization agreement was signed, Morocco began to take actions against Algeria like:

Western Sahara: Moroccan Drone Strike Kills Polisario Front Commander

Western Sahara: Moroccan Drone Strike Kills Polisario Front Commander

https://worldview.stratfor.com/situation-report/western-sahara-moroccan-drone-strike-kills-polisario-front-commander

Algeria accuses Morocco of fatal attack on three truck drivers

The Algerian presidency said the killing of the three Algerian truck drivers in a roadside bombing on Monday "will not go unpunished."

https://www.al-monitor.com/originals/2021/11/algeria-accuses-morocco-fatal-attack-three-truck-drivers

The Moroccan government believes that it has finally broken the balance

Algeria is beset with economic difficulties due to the decline of oil prices and lacks the newfound diplomatic support and production capabilities that Morocco has or will have soon.

While Morocco has been making international deals, Algeria has had protest after protest as well as an economic decline due to oil prices jumping around

This has given the Moroccan government the perception that an Algerian-Moroccan war has a high chance of ending in Moroccan victory. Which is why Morocco no longer fears the consequences of provoking Algeria.

In 1963, Morocco invaded Algeria but withdrew due to France and the United States refusing to help Morocco while Cuba, Egypt and the Soviet Union gave Algeria troops and equipment. If a second round was fought today, Morocco can count on American and Israeli support while Algeria has noone to aid it with the possible exception of Russia.

How is Algeria reacting?

It wants to normalize with Israel too now.

Algeria Eyes Israel Normalization Through Palestinian Mediation

Amid Algeria's recurrent accusations directed towards Morocco for reestablishing ties with Israel, Algiers is said to seek mediation for normalization with Tel Aviv.
https://www.moroccoworldnews.com/2021/12/345923/algeria-eyes-israel-normalization-through-palestinian-mediation

To make normalization palatable, the Algerian government has asked the Palestinian Authority to discuss the topic with Israel in hopes that the Palestinians can strike a deal that will benefit all three.
What Algeria intends to gain from this is unknown.

It's possible that Algeria hopes that through normalization it can persuade Israel to not ruin the balance that North Africa has.

I hope that clarifies things for you

Related Links

What are the main cultural differences between Morocco and Algeria?

In regards to Algeria and Morocco, which countries are their allies and enemies (on an international level)?

Do people from Morocco, Algeria and Tunisia go to nightclubs often? Isn't that unislamic or do they not care so much anymore as it used to be?

How would Algeria enter (and possibly defeat) Morocco if a war occured?

What Algeria really benefit supporting polisario and being anti western country? I mean pulling same rope with Morocco could benefit both countryes much more right?

In a military confrontation between Algeria and Morocco, who would probably win in the air and on the ground?

Who exactly would win a conventional war between Morocco and Algeria right now?

If Tunisia, Morocco, and Libya decided to go to war against Algeria, what would happen? Will any nation interfere? If so, which nations would interfere? Which side would they be on? Who would win?

Why won't Algeria and Morocco make peace?

Aside from politics, are there any strong cultural, ethnic, or regional differences between Morocco and Algeria that make them two separated countries instead of one?

Why does Morocco have border disputes with almost every neighbouring countries (Algeria, Spain and Western Sahara)?

Which has the better quality of life: Morocco or Algeria?

What would happen if Morocco, Algeria and Tunisia became one single country?

How can Algeria and Algerians stop Morocco and Morrocans to steal elements of the Algerian culture and sell them to the West and Westerners as "Made in Morrocco"?

Why does Algeria oppose Moroccan rule over Western Sahara?

Quel est le pays où on parle français et où il fait vraiment bon vivre sur le plan du climat, de la stabilité politique, du pouvoir d'achat et de la qualité de vie ?

Alexandre Sombardier Suivre DEA en Géopolitique et Sciences Politiques, Universités Paris VIII (Diplôme obtenu en 2002) Mis à jour le 1 an Réponse originale : Quel est le pays ou on parle français et ou il fait vraiment bon vivre sur le plan du climat, de la stabilité politique et du pouvoir d'achat ?

Q : Quel est le pays où on parle français et où il fait vraiment bon vivre sur le plan du climat, de la stabilité politique et du pouvoir d'achat ?

Étant donné que les expressions 'où on parle français' et 'il fait bon vivre sur le plan du climat, de la stabilité politique et du pouvoir d'achat' sont assez subjectives et ouvertes sur le plan de l'interprétation, je propose (roulement de tambour)… le Grand Duché de Luxembourg !

96 % des Luxembourgeois parlent français (bien que ça ne soit la langue maternelle que d'une petite partie d'entre eux) et c'est un des états les plus prospères et les plus stables du monde. Le climat y est (de mon point de vue iséro-rhodanien) tolérable, disons. Un peu trop humide à mon goût, mais les goûts et les couleurs…. (Belle qualité de vie, stabilité politique exemplaire, climat tempéré…)

Sinon, bien évidemment on pourra proposer la France, le Canada (enfin si on n'a pas peur des hivers longs et très rigoureux), la Belgique (enfin la Communauté française de Belgique… sachant que sur le plan de la stabilité politique… c'est compliqué !), une partie de la Suisse, etc. Suivre Alexandre Sombardier

Questions similaires

Les gens des pays africains qui parlent français détestent-ils la France et la langue française ?

Quels sont les 10 pays qui comptent le plus de Français en proportion ? (hormis la France bien évidemment)

La France a-t-elle le niveau de vie le plus élevé au monde ?

Quel pays, qui n'est pas francophone, parle le mieux français ?

Quels sont les pays les plus francophiles ?

Quels sont pour vous les pays où il fait le moins bon vivre et pourquoi ?

Quels sont les plus grands pays francophones par superficie ?

Quels sont les points forts de la France par rapport aux autres pays ?

Quelles sont les différences entre le français de France et le français du Canada ?

Quel pays a la meilleure qualité de vie : la France, l'Espagne ou l'Allemagne ?

Quel pays est le plus anti-français ?

Quelle est la différence entre la politique et le politique ?

À votre avis, la France est-elle un bon pays pour vivre en ce moment ?

Quel est le pays le plus francophone de l'Afrique ?

Pourquoi les pays anglophones d'Afrique peinent-ils à se développer, alors que les pays francophones affichent une croissance soutenue ? La France a-t-elle joué un rôle dans tout ça ?

Pourquoi les 350 000 Algériens qui vivaient en France (métropolitaine) en 1962 ne sont-ils pas repartis pour l'Algérie quand elle est devenue indépendante ?

Mina Daoud, Français et fier de l'être! Mis à jour le 1 juil.

Ça sent le troll ou nationaliste panafricain à plein nez 🤔
Ça serait la première fois au monde qu'un pays, aussi faible et pauvre, se priverait de l'argent dont il a tant besoin tout ça pour contraindre un autre pays de renoncer à sa souveraineté.

En tous cas, il ne pourra plus jamais se plaindre du soi-disant néocolonialisme français, puisqu'il aurait alors tenté de s'ingérer dans la politique domestique française.

Et puis, soyons sérieux, nous savons tous que la France peut changer de fournisseur d'uranium aussi vite que vous et moi pouvons acheter des paniers de yoplait plutôt que les danettes que nous achetons régulièrement— surtout quand à peine 10% des importations françaises d'uranium proviennent du Niger !

Franchement, si vous êtes assez âgé pour utiliser ce site, vous devriez savoir que l'immigration est avant tout un outil purement économique et que la France n'accueille pas la misère africaine pour dédommager l'Afrique de quoique ce soit ou lui rendre hommage.

Aussi, je trouve votre question assez paradoxale voire hypocrite quand on sait que les pays africains ont une politique d'immigration bien plus restrictive que la France et l'Occident, même envers eux-mêmes.

Pourquoi voudriez-vous priver la France de ce que vous vous permettez de faire ? Cessez donc vos enfantillages !

Questions similaires

Finalement, si l’Algérie était restée française, la France ne serait-elle pas devenu un pays à majorité musulmane ? De manière générale, à quoi ressemblerait la France aujourd'hui si l’Algérie était restée française ?

Un Algérien d'un certain âge m'a montré la carte d'identité Française qu'il possédait en 1962, juste avant l'indépendance. Il y était noté "Français musulman". Y avait-il bien un système d'apartheid à l'époque de l'Algérie Française ?

Pourquoi on demande tout le temps à la France de s'excuser à l'Algérie pour la Guerre d'Algérie et pas à l'Algérie de s'excuser pour les actes du FLN durant la même période ?

Pourquoi il n'y a qu'avec l'Algérie que les relations sont souvent tendues alors que la France a occupé d'autres pays ?

Pourquoi la France ne s'excuse-t-elle pas une bonne fois pour toutes pour la colonisation vis à vis de l'Algérie ?

Pourquoi la France a-t-elle perdu la guerre d'Algérie alors qu'elle a tué beaucoup plus d'Algériens qu'elle n'a subi de pertes ? (Question traduite)

Avant la colonisation française en 1830, l'Algérie (ou les territoires qui la formaient) avait-elle déjà été longuement sous domination étrangère ?

Pourquoi les français sont persuadés que les personnes qui ont eu leur BAC en ALGERIE (comme moi) n'ont pas le niveau pour étudier en FRANCE ?

Pourquoi les français préfèrent-ils aller en Tunisie ou au Maroc plutôt qu’en Algérie ?

Si les «pieds-noirs» n'avaient pas quitté l'Algérie après l'indépendance, une cohabitation aurait-elle été possible avec les musulmans, comme les afrikaners et les noirs en Afrique du Sud, et l'Algérie s'en sortirait-elle mieux ?

Pourquoi un bon pourcentage des Algériens nés avant l’indépendance (1962) disent que « l'Algérie était beaucoup plus heureuse et prospère du temps de la colonisation française »?

Les maghrébins sont-ils stigmatisés en France ? Si oui, pourquoi ?

La France est-elle tenue de remettre ses archives à l'Algérie qui les réclame ? Comment l'Algérie pourrait-elle s'en servir ?

Pourquoi les Français étaient-ils si attachés à garder l'Algérie ?

La France devrait-elle soutenir l'indépendance de la Kabylie ?

Cette réponse peut ne pas être une traduction fidèle de la réponse de Steven Haddock dans Quora en anglais : Étudie Programmes de Master à Université du Québec à Montréal (2026 (attendu))Traducteur · 27 mars

Quels sont les effets de la colonisation que nous pouvons encore observer aujourd'hui ? /What are some effects of colonization that we can still see today?/

Vincent Person Les chemins de fer africains Suivre Master en Droit, Universités (Diplôme obtenu en 2015)Traducteur · 1 an

Steven Haddock LL.B. degree, 25 years in litigation, administrative law, collections, bankrupty and professional regulation

Comme vous pouvez le voir, sauf en Afrique australe. Ils sont plutôt inutiles. Même s'ils se connectaient entre eux, ce qui n'est pas le cas, ils utilisent tous des jauges différentes. Chacun de ces chemins de fer a été construit pour extraire une ressource particulière et l'amener sur la côte pour la vendre.

Comparez avec l'Afrique il y a mille ans

Ce sont les routes commerciales "naturelles" en Afrique, où les gens échangent des choses qu'ils ont en surplus avec des endroits où ils en ont en pénurie. L'un des plus gros échanges était celui du sel d'Afrique de l'Est contre de l'or en Afrique de l'Ouest. En haut à gauche, près des États Mossi, se trouve Tombouctou, qui est un centre commercial important. Voici à quoi ressemblent les "ruines" de Tombouctou

Cependant, lorsque les Européens sont arrivés au XVe siècle, le commerce de l'or a été perturbé et tout a commencé à circuler outre-mer. Cela a dû sembler une bonne idée, mais bientôt les Africains n'ont plus ou peu de contrôle sur leurs ressources et cette situation a duré pendant près d'un siècle.

Voici une carte ferroviaire de mon pays, le Canada

Maintenant, imaginez qu'il n'y ait que trois chemins de fer - un de Vancouver à l'intérieur de la Colombie-Britannique qui n'atteint pas Jasper, un de Churchill à Winnipeg avec une ligne vers St. Paul, MN, et un de Halifax à Toronto. C'est à peu près le système de transport qu'avait le Canada lorsqu'il a cessé d'être une colonie et est devenu un dominion. Il a fallu beaucoup d'efforts pour relier tout cela. Suivre Vincent Person

Questions similaires

Pourquoi ne parle-t-on jamais des colonisations qui n'ont pas été faites par les occidentaux, comme les colonisations inter-africaines ou orientales ?

Pourquoi l'idée de colonisation s'est-elle enracinée dans les États européens et non dans d'autres parties du monde ?

Quels sont les avantages de la colonisation ?

Faut-il maudire la colonisation ?

La colonisation a-t-elle eu des effets positifs et négatifs sur l'Afrique ?

La colonisation a-t-elle été un mal nécessaire pour l'Afrique ?

Quels sont les inconvénients de la colonisation en Afrique ?

Pourquoi la colonisation historique a-t-elle été en grande partie effectuée par les pays européens ?

La colonisation a-t-elle eu également des effets positifs sur l'Afrique ?

Pourquoi les petits fils des colons n'aiment pas qu'on parle aujourd'hui des ravages du colonialisme ? Phénomène qui et pourtant continue jusqu'à nos jours.

Pourquoi les différentes nations ont toutes voulu, dans l'histoire ou aujourd'hui, essayer de coloniser leurs voisins ?

Les adeptes de la colonisation sont-ils conscients d'avoir fait éclater des structures traditionnelles qui ont permis à des populations entière de traverser l'Histoire dans la paix et la sérénité ?

Que serait-il notre vie d'aujourd'hui s'il n'y avait jamais la pratique de colonisation ?

Quelle est l'importance de la colonisation pour les Africains ?

Comment l'histoire du colonialisme est-elle enseignée aujourd'hui dans les pays qui ont été colonisés par le passé ?

Les autorités ont-elles préféré dénoncer un complot derrière les incendies qui déciment le nord-est de l'Algérie plutôt que de reconnaître le sous-équipement du pays et leur incurie ?

Slimane Azayri Maniaque des mains propres Mis à jour le 20 août

Les autorités ont-elles préféré dénoncer un complot derrière les incendies qui déciment le nord-est de l'Algérie plutôt que de reconnaître le sous-équipement du pays et leur incurie ?

Les autorités algériennes ont visiblement échoué dans la mise en oeuvre de la lutte anti-incendies, notamment en terme d'organisation et de disponibilité de moyens propres, surtout aériens, qui auraient été totalement absents sans l'aide des pays tels que la France, la Tunisie, l'Italie et la Suisse.

D'un autre côté, il apparaît de plus en plus clair que les départs de feu par leur nombre élevé, leur densité dans les territoires touchés, leur grande majorité à partir des routes carrossables et d'autres caractéristiques atypiques au regard de l'historique des années écoulées, résultent d'actes criminels commis par des individus non encore identifiés. C'est du moins le constat auquel aboutit, sur la base d'observations satellitaires, le directeur de l'Agence spatiale algérienne selon le compte rendu ci-dessous du journal en ligne TSA-Algérie.

Concernant le but de ces actes criminels, deux thèses, qui ne s'excluent pas forcément, circulent:

~ une tentative de retour de généraux écartés des centres du pouvoir depuis la chute de Bouteflika en créant une instabilité qui provoquerait le départ du président Tebboune et de ses soutiens militaires.

~ une volonté de renforcer les rangs des tenants de l'indépendance de la Kabylie et provoquer des affrontements avec des partisans de l'arabo-islamisme, prélude à une guerre civile qui provoquerait l'éclatement du pays. Cette deuxième thèse suppose la participation de puissances étrangères et leur présence aux commandes de l'opération de destruction de l'Algérie.

Incendies de Tizi-Ouzou : ce que les satellites ont vu
13/08/2021 - 18:37

Les incendies de forêts enregistrés depuis lundi à travers le pays, notamment dans la wilaya de Tizi Ouzou, sont d'origine « criminelle », a affirmé le directeur général de l'Agence spatiale algérienne (ASAL), Azzedine Oussedik, soulignant que ces feux ont été « tous enregistrés à proximité des routes ».

M. Oussedik, qui était jeudi l'invité du journal de 19h00 de Canal Algérie, a fait remarquer que les « départs de feu (Tizi-Ouzou) sont tous à proximité des routes et des pistes, alors que depuis 2003 nous n'enregistrons que quelques feux sur ces endroits, soit 1/10, causés généralement par un mégot de cigarette ou bien suite à un barbecue. Et là c'est également un signe très important que ces départs de feu sont d'origine criminelle », selon le compte rendu de l'agence officielle.

Il a indiqué que dès le lundi 9 août, date du début des incendies, l'Agence a mobilisé ses ingénieurs et ses équipes pour « programmer le maximum d'images satellitaires au-dessus des régions touchées essentiellement à Béjaïa, Tizi Ouzou et Jijel comme première étape ».

« Nous avons également mobilisé des satellites internationaux pour identifier les lieux des départs de feux », a-t-il ajouté, précisant que les incendies qui ont touché Tizi-Ouzou sont concentrés, selon des satellites internationaux, au niveau du « sud-est de la wilaya, notamment dans les localités de Larbaa Nath Iraten, Aïn el Hammam et Béni Yenni essentiellement ».

M. Oussedik a noté que l'Agence spatiale algérienne, qui suit depuis sa création en 2003 les incendies de forêts, a remarqué que « les départs de feux sont répartis un peu partout dans la wilaya, mais, cette fois-ci, ils sont localisés dans le sud-est de Tizi Ouzou connu par sa très forte concentration de la population et d'habitations », précisant que « les espèces connues dans cette région sont très inflammables ».

Le DG de l'ASAL a également fait savoir que « trois feux ont été déclenchés en même temps à 11h08, à savoir à Aïn El Hammam, à Ouacif et au sud-est de la commune d'Azazga ».

Autre indice révélé par M. Oussedik « pour conforter l'hypothèse d'un acte criminel » est le déclenchement des feux dans les localités d'Aït Lahcene dans la commune de Béni Yenni, Azazga et Mizrana à 23h08.

« Les départs de feux à cette heure-ci est impossible sur le plan de la climatologie et des conditions », a-t-il dit, relevant que les données de l'Agence ont été remis entre les mains des services compétents pour « les identifications futures et pour l'identification des auteurs de ces actes ».

Par ailleurs, M. Oussedik a estimé à 23.000 hectares les pertes au niveau de Tizi Ouzou, 6.500 hectares à Béjaïa et 1.800 dans la wilaya de Jijel.

Par : Rédaction Suivre Slimane Azayri

Questions similaires

Pourquoi on demande tout le temps à la France de s'excuser à l'Algérie pour la Guerre d'Algérie et pas à l'Algérie de s'excuser pour les actes du FLN durant la même période ?

Les Algériens sont en colère contre leur gouvernement et sa gestion calamiteuse des incendies. Pourquoi assiste-t-on à cette incurie ?

En Algérie, comment se serait conclu une attaque de commissariat de police par des délinquants armés de mortiers pyrotechniques ?

Pourquoi la France a-t-elle perdu la guerre d'Algérie alors qu'elle a tué beaucoup plus d'Algériens qu'elle n'a subi de pertes ? (Question traduite)

Que pensez-vous des Algériens ou plus précisément des Berbères après l'incident d'hier ?

La France doit-elle s’excuser pour son passé colonial, comme le demande l’Algérie ?

Macron a-t-il raison de s'excuser (encore) envers les harkis, en proposant des indemnités, alors que l'indépendance de l'Algérie date de près de 60 ans et qu'aucun de ses prédécesseurs n'était intervenu ?

Pourquoi l'Algérie qualifie-t-elle la France de « faillite mémorielle » ?

La France est-elle tenue de remettre ses archives à l'Algérie qui les réclame ? Comment l'Algérie pourrait-elle s'en servir ?

Pourquoi l’Algérie est devenue une poubelle après le départ des coopérants ?

Est-il vrai que le gouvernement Algérien, comme l'en accuse le gouvernement Français, refuse d'accueillir certains de ses propres citoyens quand ils sont expulsés depuis la France ?

Qu'est-ce qui empêche des pays comme l'Algérie et le Maroc à se développer ?

Pourquoi les responsables algériens n’admettent pas et ne veulent pas reconnaître que l’Algérie est une création française ?

Pourquoi la France ne demande-t-elle pas pardon au peuple algérien pour les horreurs commises en son nom durant sa colonisation brutale de l'Algérie alors que le roi des Belges vient de présenter ses excuses aux Congolais pour des faits similaires ?

Pour quelle raison les "Algériens autochtones" avaient-ils un statut de "sous-citoyens" sous le régime de l'Algérie française ?

La France devrait-elle soutenir l'indépendance de la Kabylie ?

Laurent N J'ai eu plusieurs vies 27 juil.

Cela serait un bon moyen de mettre la pression sur l’Algérie. Par exemple pour qu’elle cesse de faire des leçons de morale à ses voisins, pour l’obliger à reprendre ses migrants illégaux, ou encore en contrepoint de son soutien au Polisario… Mettre la pression quoi !

Et également mettre enfin l'Algérie devant ses propres problèmes et responsabilités. Comme n'importe quel autre pays.

Car le dossier kabyle est (très) lourd : tentatives d'arabisation forcée, de ré-islamisation forcée, persécutions politiques et administratives, éradication culturelle voire même racisme anti-amazighe… et la situation ne fait qu'empirer depuis les révoltes de 2001 (le Printemps Noir).

Les Kabylies, petite et grande, ne sont pas une simple région de l'Algérie, elles en sont le cœur historique, foyer de toutes les révoltes contre les envahisseurs, arabes, turcs, français. Avec les autres peuples berbères, chaouis, mzabites, touaregs ils sont les vrais autochtones de l'Algérie. Mal ou peu islamisés, ils conservent peu ou prou de très nombreux rites et modes de vie chrétiens.

L'irrédentisme kabyle (différent de l'indépendantisme) doit être soutenu par la France. Au nom du respect des identités.

Vive la Kabylie et vive la France

Questions similaires

À quoi joue le Maroc en soutenant le Mouvement pour l'autodétermination de la Kabylie ?

Quelles personnes en France n'ont toujours pas digéré l'indépendance de l'Algérie ?

Pensez-vous qu'à terme la Kabylie finira par obtenir son indépendance du reste de l'Algérie ?

La Kabylie pourra-t-elle prospérer après son indépendance de l'Algérie?

Pensez-vous que la France et l'Algérie pourraient un jour se réconcilier émotionnellement ?

Les pays occidentaux cesseront-ils de soutenir le régime d'Alger suite aux lourdes et graves accusations soulevées par le président du MAK (Mouvement pour l'Autonomie de la Kabylie) lors de sa conférence de presse d'aujourd'hui ?

Avec une volonté commune, la France et Algérie pourraient-elles se réconcilier ?

Le gouvernement Algérien est-il depuis toujours anti Français et si oui, devrions-nous faire de même avec eux ?

Rapport Storra : La France et l'Algérie veulent-elles vraiment se réconcilier ?

Pourquoi il n'y a qu'avec l'Algérie que les relations sont souvent tendues alors que la France a occupé d'autres pays ?

Pourquoi l'Algérie qualifie-t-elle la France de « faillite mémorielle » ?

Pourquoi la France ne reprendrait-elle pas le Liban comme auparavant sous son protectorat ?

Pourquoi le Maroc, l'Algérie et la Tunisie sont-ils des pays séparés alors qu'ils ont tous un héritage berbère, arabe et français ?

L'Algérie et la France sont-elles en train de se rapprocher ?

Pourquoi les Français sont-ils qualifiés de colonisateurs en Afrique du Nord, alors que le Maghreb fut d'abord colonisé par les Arabes (au détriment des Kabyles)?

Pourquoi les Français pensent-ils que les Maghrébins sont arabes?

Michel Lasbleis Anciennement Chef d'entreprise à la retraite 7 mai

Il se trouve qu'il y a bien longtemps, lors de mon service militaire (en 1974 !!!), mon voisin de chambrée était un Kabyle. Nous avons sympathisé et il m'a longuement expliqué qu'il n'était pas Arabe, bien que musulman et parlant arabe. Bref, c'était (en tout cas à mes yeux) un Kabyle arabisé, dont les parents avaient choisi la France comme lieu de villégiature, bien que leurs ancêtres avaient combattu notre pays avec beaucoup de détermination pendant la colonisation de l'Algérie. De ce fait, je ne trouve pas étonnant que pour bon nombre de Français les Maghrébins sont des Arabes. D'ailleurs, je ne crois pas que cette confusion soit volontaire, ni faite pour provoquer. Suivre Michel Lasbleis

Que pensez-vous des Marocains ?

Lucas Bories Suivre Lieu : Caen, France (2005–aujourd'hui)Mis à jour le 1 an Je les aimes bien et j'ai une opinion positive sur eux. Pourquoi ?

Parce que apparemment,environ 80 pour cent des Marocains ont une opinion positive sur les Français.

Aussi parce pas mal de Marocains parlent le Français.

Et aussi parce que apparemment,la décolonisation se serait relativement bien passé.

Je vais profitez de ce que j'ai écrit pour vous dire pourquoi j'aime le Maroc .

J'aime ce pays parce que:

C'est une monarchie
Son histoire est très riche et longue
Les bâtiments historiques sont magnifiques (Ruines de Sijilmassa par exemple)
Leur mosquées sont belles
Leur armée,l'Armée royale,juste le nom est badass
Leur devise Dieu,la Patrie,le Roi

Bon vous avez compris,j'aime le Maroc et les Marocains

Et Hassan II,quelqu'un d'intelligent et d'intéressant (et en plus il parlait Français,et l'arabe marocain aussi,sans doute)

J'aimerais avoir la double nationalité Franco-Marocaine.

J'aimerais apprendre l'arabe marocain.

Fontaine hommage rappelant les négociations pour l'indépendance du Maroc (Aix-les-Bains)

Questions similaires

Pourquoi les Arabes du Levant se considèrent-ils « plus arabes » que les Maghrébins ?

Pourquoi le Maroc, l'Algérie et la Tunisie sont-ils des pays séparés alors qu'ils ont tous un héritage berbère, arabe et français ?

Pourquoi les "kabyles" ne se considèrent pas arabes ?

Pourquoi les Français d'origine arabe ne portent-ils jamais de prénom français ?

Pourquoi les femmes maghrébines rejettent les hommes maghrébins ? Pourquoi elles préfèrent se métisser, et pourquoi il est de plus en plus rare de voir des couples maghrébins ?

Les français détestent-ils les maghrébins ?

Pourquoi les Maghrébins sont-ils également appelés des Arabes ?

Pourquoi beaucoup d'Arabes nés en France se sentent-ils plus arabes que français ?

Les maghrébins sont-ils stigmatisés en France ? Si oui, pourquoi ?

Pourquoi les Arabes détestent l'Algérie ?

Les Algériens, Marocains et Tunisiens parlent-ils un arabe assez proche pour se comprendre d'un pays à l'autre ?

Ma fille sera-t-elle considérée comme Maghrébine ou comme Française en France en sachant qu'elle y est née et qu'elle a un prénom français et un nom maghrébin ?

Pourquoi les gens avec des origines étrangères ont-ils des prénoms français sauf les maghrébins ?

Les Maghrébins sont-ils des Arabes ?

Les Français aiment-ils les arabes ?

Pourquoi les Français pensent-ils que les Maghrébins sont arabes?

Celestin Louison □ Entrepreneur chez Commerce international (2017–aujourd'hui) Mis à jour le 2 déc.

Parce'que.. l'Islam. Depuis quelques années maintenant, les gens deviennent de plus en plus débiles à ce sujet, donc pour eux - "bah c'est tous les mêmes". Un peu comme ces idiots qui disent que les chinois et les japonais se ressemblent tous… Gros malins.

Ma grand-mère est Kabyle, elle ne parle pas l'arabe mais uniquement le français et le kabyle, elle est chrétienne comme beaucoup de familles en Kabylie. Ils ont également leur propre culture et ainsi de suite.

D'ailleurs, petit message à ceux qui parlent de l'Algérie sans avoir lu un seul bouquin sur le sujet pourtant fascinant : En Kabylie les "chefs d'états" et les "Héros de l'histoire" sont très souvent des femmes. Pendant la colonisation Française, le chef de guerre Kabyle, donc celui qui a eu à gérer parmi les plus grandes batailles, était une femme. Que les généraux français qualifiaient à l'époque de tout bonnement incroyable et d'une rare beauté. Quand ça arrivera au Qatar on en reparlera ?

Lalla N'Soumer :

Photo prise sur Wikipédia.

Ou bien Cyria, princesse guerrière Kabyle assez peu connue des français mais qui éclata en moonwalk les légions romaines, les écrits sur elle sont assez badass je trouve :

Représentation prise sur google.

Edit : Au vu des commentaires, je partage donc avec vous la reine Dihya (ou Kahina), qui combattit l'invasion Arabe lors de la conquête des musulmans au Maghreb. Dihya mourut au combat dans les Aurès. Elle est considérée comme une voir LA plus grande icône berbère.

En 2016 sa statue fait l'objet d'un incendie criminel. Les habitants mettent en cause les autorités algériennes pour n'avoir rien fait. Ces criminels sont jusqu'à ce jour non-identifiés. Ce sont de jeunes chaouis révoltés par cet acte qui sans moyens, ont participé à sa restauration. Des militants ont notamment mis en avant plusieurs revendications, en appelant les autorités locales à restaurer la statue grâce à des spécialistes, et en exigeant le changement de la plaque du monument afin d'y ajouter la langue amazighe.

Il n'y pas à rougir d'être originaire du Maghreb, même si le rassemblement des peuples berbères est une construction de la France et d'autres nations occidentales, ces pays regorgent d'histoires incroyables, uniques et de cultures qui n'ont strictement rien avoir avec celle des Arabes.

-

hors sujet:

J'espère que le Hirak aura raison de la dictature dégueulasse du FLN et que les islamistes qui y sont très nombreux seront dégagés à coup de catapulte dans un lieu où ils ne nuiront personne. Comme en Arabie Saoudite ! Quoi que, même eux n'ont pas l'air d'en vouloir, cette hypocrisie j'te jure…

Bref, comme le disent si bien les algériens - "Le crie d'un peuple, le réveil d'une nation".

Photo prise sur google du Hirak avec le slogan. Suivre Celestin Louison

Questions similaires

Si vous avez déjà visité plusieurs pays d'Afrique, quel est le pays qui vous a le plus marqué. Sinon, si vous comptez revenir en Afrique, quel pays irez-vous en premier ?

Aimeriez-vous vivre en Afrique ?

Pourquoi ne dois-je jamais aller en Afrique ?

Y a-t-il des endroits en Afrique qui ressemblent à l'Europe ?

Que trouvez-vous différent en Afrique ?

Si vous deviez vivre dans un pays d'Afrique, lequel choisiriez vous et pourquoi ?

Quel est votre endroit préféré en Afrique ?

Quels pays africains recommanderiez-vous à quelqu'un qui n'est jamais allé en Afrique ?

Dans quel pays d'Afrique fait-il bon vivre ? Où me recommanderiez-vous de m'installer ?

Quel pays aimeriez-vous visiter en Afrique ? Pourquoi ?

Quel pays africain donnerais-tu tout pour habiter ? Pourquoi ?

Si vous pouviez visiter trois pays africains, lesquels seraient-ils ?

Citez cinq (5) pays d'Afrique que vous avez ou voudriez visiter ?

Quelles sont les choses à savoir absolument avant de partir en Afrique ?

Quelles sont les villes les plus étonnantes d'Afrique ?

Why didn't France decay like Spain during the XIX century? Both had a huge inestability and they lost their colonies.

Anton Sachs Read and studied a lot, loves history Jul 3

French had very limited overseas colonies by 1800, an none of them affected French economy very much.

Spain, on the other hand had a spendthrift government, and relied on God and yearly flota delivering gold and silver from Americas. Despite the flota, Spanish crown was continually in debt.

After Napoleonic wars Spain lost all its South American colonies, and all the rest after Spanish-American war.

France was exact opposite - it gained huge colonies in Africa (and Mexico). Additionally its populace was by then consisted of educated, trained workers, and its scientists were second to none.

Related Links

Why didn’t Spain invade France during the 16th century? They had it surrounded yet never took it.
Could Spain convince its former colonies to reunite with Spain, with each colony holding an autonomous dominion-like status?
What if Spain conquered France?
Why did Spain keep the Philippines as a colony for 333 years?
Which country would win a war between 16th century France and 16th century Spain?
Have any of Spain's colonies surpassed it in any way?
How did Portugal, given its proximity, never become conquered by Spain?
Why didn't Hitler invade Spain?
Why was Germany never a big colonial power compared to France, England, or Spain?
Why didn't the Allies use Spain to invade France, instead of Normandy?
Why don't African French colonies revolt and abandon the "colonial pact"?
Why did Spain stay neutral during both world wars?
Why didn't France have an empire the way that Spain and Portugal did?
Why didn't Prussia completely take over France in the Franco-Prussian War?
Why didn't Great Britain defeat the colonies in 1777, before Spain, France, and the Dutch joined the war?

Est-il vrai que le gouvernement Algérien, comme l'en accuse le gouvernement Français, refuse d'accueillir certains de ses propres citoyens quand ils sont expulsés depuis la France ?

Alexandre Puissant Suivre Sabrina Djaafar
Lieu : Alger, Algérie 3 oct.

Oui c'est vrai.
Le gouvernement algérien ne veut pas donner l'autorisation à la France de rapatrier ses citoyens sans papiers (haraga). La France a recensé quelques milliers d'origine Algérienne.

C'est pour cette raison ou en partie à cause de cela que la France a décidé de diminuer de moitié le Visa.

Questions similaires

Pourquoi il n'y a qu'avec l'Algérie que les relations sont souvent tendues alors que la France a occupé d'autres pays ?

Le gouvernement algérien a-t-il atteint le sommet de l'imbécillité en interdisant le survol de son territoire aux avions français ?

Macron a-t-il raison de s'excuser (encore) envers les harkis, en proposant des indemnités, alors que l'indépendance de l'Algérie date de près de 60 ans et qu'aucun de ses prédécesseurs n'était intervenu ?

Pourquoi un bon pourcentage des Algériens nés avant l'indépendance (1962) disent que « l'Algérie était beaucoup plus heureuse et prospère du temps de la colonisation française »?

Pourquoi la France ne demande-t-elle pas pardon au peuple algérien pour les horreurs commises en son nom durant sa colonisation brutale de l'Algérie alors que le roi des Belges vient de présenter ses excuses aux Congolais pour des faits similaires ?

Quel est le problème profond que l'Algérie a avec la France ?

La France doit-elle s'excuser pour son passé colonial, comme le demande l'Algérie ?

Pensez-vous comme certains ont pu le dire que "l'Algérie n'était pas une nation, seule la France a fait du pays une nation" ?

Les gouvernements Algériens successifs ont-ils voulu jeter de la poudre aux yeux à leur peuple, afin de faire oublier leur incapacité à diriger leur pays en stigmatisant sans cesse la France ?

Pourquoi Emmanuel Macron a-t-il tenu des propos durs à l'égard de l'Algérie ?

Croyez-vous que la France devrait présenter ses excuses aux ex-colonies pour les abus du passé colonial, comme le Mexique l'a demandé récemment à l'Espagne ?

Alexandre Roswilo Précédent lieu : Afrique (1975–2019) 2 ans

Réponse originale : Croyez-vous que la France devrait présenter ses excuses aux ex-colonies pour les abus du passé colonial, comme le Mexico l'a demandé récemment a Espagne ?

Il s’agit d’une amnésie collective ou non pas la France mais la plupart des pays européens engagés dans l’aventure coloniale se sont confondus .

Il est normal de pointer l’Allemagne comme responsable de la shoah mais lorsqu’il s’agit de la colonisation, on parle de vikings, de mongols et tous autres peuples antiques ou moyenâgeux pourtant les évènements dont nous parlons datent pour la plupart de moins d’un siècle et les pays concernés sont à côté de l’Allemagne qui assument elle les atrocités de la shoah qui datent de la même période historique .

Le président allemand demande "le pardon" d'Israël

L'Allemagne insiste sur sa responsabilité dans la Shoah | Europe

[2]

[3]

Génocide des Herero : la Namibie attend toujours les excuses de l'Allemagne – JeuneAfrique.com

Mieux beaucoup se justifient gentiment en avouant que leur objectifs étaient simplement d'exploiter à blanc les colonies et leurs habitants comme beaucoup d'autres l'ont fait à travers l'esclavage et non de les exterminer comme les Nazis l'ont voulu avec les juifs et compagnies . Quoi de plus noble .

Aimé Césaire ; "Discours sur le colonialisme " Page 77 - 78 :

Oui, il vaudrait la peine d'étudier, cliniquement, dans le détail, les démarches d'Hitler et de l'hitlérisme et de révéler au très distingué, très humaniste, très chrétien bourgeois du XXe siècle qu'il porte en lui un Hitler qui s'ignore, qu'un Hitler l'habite, qu'Hitler est son démon, que s'il le vitupère c'est par manque de logique, et qu'au fond, ce qu'il ne pardonne pas à Hitler, ce n'est pas le crime en soi, le crime contre l'homme, ce n'est pas l'humiliation de l'homme en soi, c'est le crime contre l'homme blanc, c'est l'humiliation de l'homme blanc, et d'avoir appliqué à l'Europe des procédés colonialistes dont ne relevaient jusqu'ici que les Arabes d'Algérie, les coolies de l'Inde et les nègres d'Afrique.

Concernant la France.

Des excuses , il est trop tard et cela ne servira à rien car les mêmes bourdes se sont répété tous les dix ans au Biafra , au Rwanda , en Lybie et j'en passe .

[7]

Pourtant , ce ne sont plus des colonies mais des États qui grandissent sans cesse et continuent de vivre les travers et surtout les pilages de leur élite politique avec la plupart du temps le soutient ou la complicité de la France . Plus encore c’est ces mêmes pays qui hériterons paradoxalement de la primauté de la langue française elle-même d’ici peu .

[10]

La France a mis en Afrique une industrie de pillage qui a survécu à la colonisation . Beaucoup de Français rêvent et espèrent même que cette industrie survive à la concurrence chinoise .

Et c'est justement ça que la plupart des Africains ne pardonnent pas à la France .

Ce que nous ne pardonnons pas à la France , ce n'est guère la colonisation mais ce sentiment continue de mépris vis-à-vis de l'Afrique .

La politique française en Afrique a été un long fleuve d'incompétence caractérisée , d'opportunisme , d'ingérence et de pillage sans cesse dévoilé de grands lobbies politiques et économiques . Les Africains en sont sortis profondément traumatisés et dégoûtés .

Les plus grandes figures historiques françaises sont des esclavagistes ou des racistes assumés . Cela embêtent peu de Français .

En Afrique, des grandes figures historiques comme Sankara,Lumumba ou Mandela , ont cela de remarquable non seulement de toujours avoir combattu pour la liberté de leur peuples mais aussi et surtout d'avoir encouragé et cultivé la tolérance . Il n'a jamais été question de haïr qui que ce soit surtout la France ou l'Occident où de piller les ressources de X ou de Y . En face qu'avez-vous à nous proposer à part arrogance ou un sentiment de supériorité.

Beaucoup de Français ou d'intellectuels en général et d'origine africaine en particulier en ont profondément souffert et en sont sorti traumatisés de cette politique de la métropole .

Mais qu'est-ce qui se passe concrètement dans la société française ?

Un jour j'en parlais avec un ainé très brillant qui m'a donné cette réponse remarquable :

"Beaucoup d'Africains ne comprennent pas la France parce que très peu connaissent un terme de la langue française qui résume mieux la culture française vis-à-vis d'autres peuples en général : il s'agit du chauvinisme .

Il n’y a pas que les Africains qui en sont victimes mais beaucoup d’autres à travers le monde dont en Europe , les Belges, les Espagnols, les Roumains et j’en passe .”

C’est dommage vraiment dommage .

Pour ma part , je pense qu’il faut vite pardonner et les Africains grandiraient mieux gagneraient à le faire mais ne jamais oublier .

Adhérer par exemple à des courants nationalistes pseudo-panafricanistes ou des théories afro-centristes ne feront qu’aggraver les choses mieux l’intolérance ou la haine . Certains Africains et compagnies sont malheureusement sur cette sombre voie .

Réponse de Alexandre Roswilo à Faut-il prendre avec distanciation le dernier clip de Nick Conrad ou le condamner sans réserves ?

Le plus important c'est le pardon mieux l'avenir à travers la mondialisation, ses défis et le statut de citoyen du monde qu'il offre . Concernant la France, nous n'entendrons pas un pays où la plupart de l'élite politique et des pourfendeurs s'accrochent désespérément à son passé .

Notes de bas de page

[1] Image on tchadinfos.com

[2] https://upload.wikimedia.org/wikipedia/commons/1/13/Himmler_besichtigt_die_Gefangenenlager_in_Russland._Heinrich_Himmler_inspects_a_prisoner_of_war_camp_in_Russia%2C_circa..._-_NARA_-_540164.jpg
[3] Image on scuolazoo.com
[4] http://www.berlinestanous.com/medias/images/ge-nocide-hereros.png
[5] https://www.larevuedesressources.org/IMG/pdf/CESAIRE.pdf
[6] Image on assemblee-nationale.fr
[7] Image on lexpress.fr
[8] Image on lprs1.fr
[9] Image on humanite.fr
[10] Image on ladmedia.fr
[11] Image on la-croix.com
[12] Image on wp.com
[13] Image on over-blog-kiwi.com
[14] Image on ekladata.com
[15] Image on jarofquotes.com
[16] Image on wp.com
[17] Image on ouest-france.fr
Suivre Alexandre Roswilo

Questions similaires

Pensez-vous qu'un jour les ex-colonies françaises demanderont des réparations pécuniaires massives à la France pour l'occupation de leurs territoires et avec quelle chance de succès ?

Est-ce que la France s'est excusée pour son passé colonial ?

La France doit-elle s’excuser pour son passé colonial, comme le demande l’Algérie ?

Les anciennes colonies françaises d’Afrique devraient-elles suivre l’exemple des anciennes colonies portugaises en chassant la France par la force pour s’en débarrasser ?

Le président du Mexique vient de demander au roi d'Espagne Felipe VI de s'excuser pour la conquête espagnole. Que pensez-vous de ces actions ?

Alors que les empires coloniaux sont morts, est-il normal que la France soit le dernier pays européen à maintenir des possessions extra-européennes ?

Pourquoi la France s’accroche tant à ses anciennes colonies africaines contrairement à l’Angleterre ?

Pourquoi l'état français ignore son histoire de colonialisme ?

La France est-elle prospère à cause de la colonisation ? Si la colonisation n'avait jamais eu lieu, comment se présenterait la France ?

Pourquoi l'Espagne refuse-t-elle de s'excuser pour la conquête du Mexique ?

FRANCOPHONIE
Est-il vrai que la plus grande ville francophone au monde est Kinshasa ? Devant Paris et Montreal ?

Bruno Mis à jour le 27 nov.

Oui. Kinshasa est officiellement la plus grande ville francophone du monde. Mais en pratique : 'non'. Pas du tout. Dans la rue, vous entendez principalement le lingala (et le swahili). Il n'y a pratiquement pas de français parlé dans la rue. Le français n'est que la langue officielle. L'enseignement et les annonces sont en français. Seuls 50% des Congolais parlent couramment le français. Selon Jonas Kumakinga, le système éducatif congolais laisse beaucoup à désirer. Aujourd'hui, le français est moins bien parlé qu'autrefois et est sous pression, dit-il. Le lingala et le swahili sont de puissants concurrents pour le français. Ceux qui parlent un français parfait sont souvent étiquetés comme prétentieux par le Congolais ordinaire. "Parce qu'ils parlent si bien le français, ils se prennent pour des Blancs", dit professeur Lye M. Yoka, écrivain et directeur de l'Institut National des Arts (INA). José Konde vend des perruques sur le grand marché de Kinshasa. « Le français est une langue autoritaire », dit-il efficacement. « C'est une langue étrangère pour moi. Nous sommes congolais, nous avons l'habitude de parler en lingala.>> Le lingala est constamment entendu dans les chansons populaires qui colorent la vie quotidienne à Kinshasa. L'anglais obtient également de bons résultats auprès des jeunes Congolais qui admirent les États-Unis et l'Afrique du Sud. Suivre Bruno

Questions similaires

Entre la ville de Québec, Paris, et Kinshasa, à quel endroit, à mi-chemin, pourrions-nous érigé comme haut lieu de la Francophonie ?
Hormis Paris, quelle est la plus grande ville francophone au monde ?
Quelle ville est la plus développée, Londres ou Paris ?
Pourquoi Bruxelles est-elle une ville francophone ?
Si vous pouviez vivre à Toulouse (France) ou Montréal (Canada), quelle ville choisiriez-vous ? Et pourquoi ?
À quel point les villes de Québec et de Paris sont-elles différentes ?

Quelles sont les plus grandes villes francophones du monde ?
Est-ce que Montréal est une ville plus anglophone que francophone ?
Pourquoi Kinshasa et Brazzaville sont-elles séparées par le Congo ? Étaient-elles une seule ville auparavant, et pourquoi les 2 Congos n'en forment-ils pas un unique ?
Quelle est la première ville francophone du monde ?
Paris appartient-elle exclusivement à la France ou à toute la francophonie ?
Paris mis à part, quelles sont les plus grandes villes d'Île-de-France ? Y en a-t-il de celles qui comptent 100 000 habitants ou plus ?
Quels sont les plus grands pays francophones par superficie ?
Est-il possible de mettre en quarantaine une grande ville comme Paris ou Montréal ?
Paris peut-elle être considérée comme la plus belle ville du monde ?

Pourquoi l'état français ignore son histoire de colonialisme ?

Philippe Beaulieu Citoyen Mis à jour le 2 ans

Mon fils, actuellement en 4ème, étudie depuis quelques semaines le colonialisme européen et français depuis le XVème siècle, et ses cours présentent les choses sous un jour loin d'être favorable pour la France… Partant du principe que les programmes d'histoire sont validés par une des institutions de l'état français, l'Education nationale, j'ai du mal à voir où il ignorerait son histoire coloniale. Mais bon, depuis quelques temps, on a vu fleurir ce genre de questions tendancieuses sur Quora ou les réseaux sociaux où par inculture ou par esprit partisan, certains veulent faire croire que la France occulterait son passé colonial. Suivre Philippe Beaulieu

Questions similaires

Est-ce que la France s'est excusée pour son passé colonial ?
Que pensez-vous de l'affirmation de Anasse Kazib « L'Histoire de la France s'est fondée sur le colonialisme et l'impérialisme »?
Quels empires/puissances coloniales ont commis le plus grand nombre d'atrocités dans l'histoire, et pourquoi ?
Que pense le peuple français de la surexploitation des ex colonies par la France ?
Emmanuel Macron veut-il rétablir l'empire colonial français ?
La France a-t-elle encore un pouvoir sur ses anciennes colonies ?
Pourquoi la France a-t-elle du mal à regarder son histoire coloniale en face ?
Quelles sont les colonies actuelles de France ?
Pourquoi est-ce que le monde ne dit rien sur le colonialisme économique imposé à l'Afrique par la France ?

La France doit-elle s’excuser pour son passé colonial, comme le demande l’Algérie ?
Quels ont été les avantages du colonialisme français ?
Pourquoi la France n'a-t-elle pas comme toutes ses colonies viré tous les Français de chez elle ?
Pourquoi la France a tant de mal avec l’intégration ?
La France doit-elle s'excuser perpétuellement pour avoir eu des colonies en Afrique ?
Est-ce que la France a été colonisée ?

Did France commit war crimes in its war against Algerian freedom fighters?

Andréa Mathias Master in Literature & Journalism, University of Paris (Graduated 1996) Nov 23

Atrocities were committed by both sides. Once Algeria became a country, one of its first acts was to massacre in large numbers the harkis, the auxiliaries of the French army Corps d'anciens volontaires musulmans de l'armée française. Enlevés par des membres de l'ALN le 23 avril 1962, ils sont mis à mort le soir même dans des conditions atroces.

I'm not saying that one crime excuses another, but your so-called freedom fighters weren't choirboys either

Related Links

Why did France fight a vicious war In Algeria and killed hundreds of thousands unlike other colonies?
Why did France lose the Algerian War?
How is the Algerian War (1954-1962) viewed in modern day France?
Did French soldiers kill civilians during the Algerian War?
Is it true that the main reason why General de Gaulle gave independence to Algeria is because he was afraid that if Algeria remains French then France would eventually become a Muslim majority country?
How would modern-day Algeria be if it had remained under French rule?
How do the French and the Algerians view the Algerian war?
Why is France obsessed with Algeria?
Why won't France officially apologize for its crimes in Algeria?
Why were the North Vietnamese and the Viet-Cong never charged or prosecuted for

Pourquoi la France ne s'excuse-t-elle pas une bonne fois pour toutes pour la colonisation vis à vis de l'Algérie ?

Marc Laubier ancien chargé de coursMis à jour le 1 an q :Pourquoi la France ne s'excuse-t-elle pas une bonne fois pour toutes pour la colonisation vis à vis de l'Algérie ?

Il est rationnellement impossible de comprendre pourquoi l'Algérie qui n'existait pas comme pays indépendant en 1830 réclame des excuses à la France pour cause de colonisation sans en exiger pareillement de la Turquie.

La Régence d'Alger a été une colonie ottomane de 1518 à 1830 et il semble que ce soit complètement oublié. On se demande pourquoi[1] ?

D'un autre côté , comment les envahisseurs arabes qui ont colonisé l'Afrique Romano-Byzantine et l'Asie Occidentale sans jamais décoloniser peuvent -ils demander des excuses ? Les arabes

"peuple et gouvernements, refusent obstinément de reconnaitre leur passé noir de nation colonialiste brutale[2][3][4][5][6][7]" (Nour Boukhari dans la séquence de réponses)
En résumé, Paille & Poutre : Plus de détails sous le lien

Notes de bas de page
[1] L'Empire ottoman en Afrique : perspectives d'histoire critique
[2] Les routes de l'esclavage (1/4) - 476-1375 : au-delà du désert - Regarder le documentaire complet | ARTE
[3] Les brimés du califat

[4] https://www.cairn.info/revue-pardes-2003-1-page-33.htm
[5] http://www.akadem.org/medias/documents/6_dhimmi.pdf
[6] Les dhimmî dans l'Empire islamique médiéval
[7] Qu'est-ce qu'un «dhimmi» ?
Suivre Marc Laubier

Questions similaires

L'Afrique est-elle pauvre à cause de la colonisation ? Si la colonisation n'avait jamais eu lieu, comment se présenterait l'Afrique ?

Pourquoi parle-t-on presque toujours de la relation France/Algérie et si peu de la colonisation française en Tunisie et au Maroc ?

Pourquoi il n'y a qu'avec l'Algérie que les relations sont souvent tendues alors que la France a occupé d'autres pays ?

Pensez-vous que Macron doit s'excuser pour la colonisation de l'Algérie, la Tunisie, le Maroc ...?

Pourquoi l'Algérie remet-elle maintenant sur la table la question mémorielle avec la France ?

Pourquoi la France ne s'est pas encore excusée pour ses crimes durant la guerre d'Algérie ?

Pourquoi le Vietnam ne s'est-il jamais plaint de la colonisation française contrairement à l'Algérie ?
Pendant la colonisation en Algérie, est-il vrai que la France a octroyé la nationalité française aux indigènes juifs, mais pas au peuple musulman ? Si oui, pourquoi?

Pourquoi l'Algérie ne s'excuse-t-elle pas auprès de la France pour sa tentative ratée de colonisation? Que se serait-il passé si les Sarrasins n'avaient pas été arrêtés à Poitiers?

Pourquoi la France passe-t-elle son temps à s'excuser pour l'Algérie, le Rwanda, l'esclavage, Napoléon, etc.?

Pourquoi la France a-t-elle perdu la guerre d'Algérie ?

Pourquoi on demande tout le temps à la France de s'excuser envers l'Algérie pour les morts de la Guerre d'Algérie et pas à l'Algérie de s'excuser pour les actes du FLN durant la même période ?

La France doit-elle s’excuser pour son passé colonial, comme le demande l’Algérie ?

François Hollande comme Emmanuel Macron ont reconnu l'injustice et la brutalité de la colonisation française en Algérie. Pourtant, les Algériens semblent toujours attendre plus. Qu'attendent-ils et pourquoi ?

Pensez-vous que la France et l’Algérie pourraient un jour se réconcilier émotionnellement ?

Pourquoi la France ne s'est pas encore excusée pour ses crimes durant la guerre d'Algérie ?

Gallence François Lieu : France1 an

Parce que les algériens ont commis autant de crimes que les soldats français, voire pire !

J'ai lu l'histoire d'un ancien soldat français qui avait été le seul rescapé d'un guet-apens tendu pas des fellagas ! Il avait raconté que ses camarades blesses avaient été achevé par égorgement et les morts avaient tous été émasculées et leur parties génitales avaient été mises dans leur bouche !

Et ne parlons pas des attentats meurtriers qui tuaient des dizaines d'innocents, dont souvent des femmes et des enfants pieds noirs dans les rues principales et les marchés des grandes villes.

Alors que les algériens viennent après cela demander des excuses me semble assez honteux. D'autant qu'ils ont été en suite des dizaines de milliers a venir immigrer en France, grace aux accords conclus entre les deux pays !

Si on considère que la France était un pays colonialiste qui avait causé beaucoup de torts a l’Algérie et que les algériens avaient légitimement le droit de demander leur liberté, alors, pourquoi en suite sont ils venus par milliers s'installer en France chez leur soi disant bourreaux? Apparemment c'est qu'ils appréciaient le système Français et qu'en suite ils ont compris leur douleurs quant ils ont été dirigés par leurs propres concitoyens. (FLN en tête)

Toutes les guerres sont horribles et vouloir obtenir d'un camps ou de l'autres des excuses me semble assez dérisoire ! (surtout 60 ans après)

Cependant, il y a des cas comme les crimes nazis qui eux ne peuvent avoir d'excuses et n'ont pas de prescription ! Mais il s'agit là d'une exception …

Conclusion:

Je joins un extrait de la fin de l'article de Jean Sevillia qui a fait une puissante synthèse sur la guerre d'Algérie (voir la lien inscrit plus bas …)

" Le FLN a livré quant à lui l'Algérie à une dictature corrompue et au chaos économique, en entretenant, pour soutenir son pouvoir, la haine de la France, le mythe d'une guerre d'extermination qui aurait fait jusqu'à 1,5 million de morts (la réalité se situe probablement aux alentours de 250 000). Dans le même temps les Algériens ont continué à immigrer toujours plus nombreux en France, rare exemple d'un peuple choisissant d'aller vivre auprès de ses prétendus tortionnaires.

La vision caricaturale qui a été imposée de la guerre d'Algérie, avec la complicité de nombreux intellectuels de gauche, survit aujourd'hui chez les jeunes franco-algériens qui sont issus de cette immigration, quand même ils appartiennent à la troisième ou quatrième génération née dans notre pays. Elle nourrit chez eux une rancœur qui empêche leur pleine assimilation. D'où l'urgence de rétablir une vision plus équilibrée de cette tragédie. Suivre Gallence François

Questions similaires

Pourquoi la France a-t-elle perdu la guerre d'Algérie ?

La France a perdu des guerres contre le Mexique, Haïti, l'Algérie, le Vietnam. La France a-t-elle déjà gagné une guerre sans alliés ?

Que pensent les Français de la guerre d'Algérie, aujourd'hui ?

Pourquoi on demande tout le temps à la France de s'excuser envers l'Algérie pour les morts de la Guerre d'Algérie et pas à l'Algérie de s'excuser pour les actes du FLN durant la même période ?

Pourquoi la France a-t-elle perdu la guerre d'Algérie alors qu'elle a tué beaucoup plus d'Algériens qu'elle n'a subi de pertes ? (Question traduite)

Pourquoi certains français ayant participé à la guerre d'Algérie refusent-ils d'évoquer cette période de leur vie ?

Pourquoi il n'y a qu'avec l'Algérie que les relations sont souvent tendues alors que la France a occupé d'autres pays ?

Comment était l'Algérie avant d'être française ?

La guerre d'Algérie était-elle une guerre civile ?

Pourquoi la guerre d'Algérie, est un sujet tabou ?

Y a-t-il une nouvelle guerre entre l'Algérie et la France, qui gagne ?

Le rapport sur la guerre France Algérie de Benjamin Stora est-il objectif ou n'a-t-il pour but que de contenter les deux parties ?

Pourquoi la France ne s'excuse-t-elle pas une bonne fois pour toutes pour la colonisation vis à vis de l'Algérie ?

Quels sont les crimes commis par les Algériens lors de la guerre d'Algérie ?

Est-ce que la France s'est excusée pour son passé colonial ?

Quelles sont les choses qui vous font ou vous ont fait perdre la foi en l'humanité ? (What are some things that make or have made you lose faith in humanity?)

Hervée Tia ne juge pas un sac à l'étiquetteTraducteur · 1 an Fardin Khan Cette réponse peut ne pas être une traduction fidèle de la réponse de Fardin Khan dans Quora en anglais : C'est l'histoire de ma grand-mère.

Pendant le Hadj ou le Oumra (un pèlerinage islamique), il est demandé aux musulmans de faire le tour de la Kaaba 7 fois. Ça s'appelle le Tawaf.

Cette construction carrée de couleur noire est appelée Kaaba. Sur cette image, vous pouvez voir des personnes faire le Tawaf.

Pendant le Hadj, ce lieu entier est pris d'assaut par des millions de personnes.

Venons-en à l'histoire.

Ma grand-mère a effectué le Hadj avec son propre frère.

Elle faisait le Tawaf à ses côtés. Il lui tenait la main pour la soutenir et aussi pour éviter qu'elle perdît son chemin.

Ma grand-mère du fait de sa vieillesse faisait le tawaf un peu lentement. Son frère s'est très vite lassé de son rythme (ils n'avaient pas encore achevé le premier tour).

En constatant que son frère était agacé par sa lente progression, elle a essayé de hâter le pas. Mais ses jambes l'ont lâchée très vite.

Ce qui s'en est suivi était très, très, très triste.

Il l'a maudite à cause de sa lenteur et l'a abandonnée parmi ces millions de personnes, en lui disant qu'il ne pouvait pas gâcher son Tawaf à cause d'elle.

Ma grand-mère s'est assise et a fondu en larmes.

Les gens effectuent le Hadj pour effacer tous les péchés de leurs vies. Dans ce lieu saint, il y a quelqu'un qui a probablement commis le pire péché de sa vie.

Ce qui m'a surpris est que son frère est un éminent intellectuel et docteur. Sa carte de visite comporte un incroyable nombre de diplômes qu'il a obtenus à travers le monde. Mais ce qu'il a fait m'a emmené à perdre la foi en l'humanité.

NDLA:

J'aimerais tous vous remercier pour vos mots de compassion et de réconfort concernant ce malheureux incident en rapport avec ma grand-maman ! Par la grâce de Allah, elle a pu effectuer son Tawaf d'elle-même et est retournée à l'hôtel saine et sauve !

Par ailleurs, si vous avez des membres de votre famille qui prévoient d'effectuer le Hadj/Oumra, s'il vous plaît assurez-vous qu'une personne responsable, attentionnée et de confiance les accompagne afin de rendre leur pèlerinage confortable et paisible. Suivre Tariq Xyz

Questions similaires

Quelles sont les choses ou les images qui vous redonnent foi en l'humanité ?
Comment avez-vous perdu votre foi en l'humanité ?
Quel est le discours qui vous a redonné foi en l'humanité ?
Qu'est ce qui a ravivé votre foi en l'humanité ?
Quelle tendance actuelle vous fait perdre la foi en l'humanité ?
Avez-vous envie d'avoir foi dans l'humanité ?
Quel a été le moment qui a restauré votre foi en l'humanité ?
Quelles photographies restaurent votre foi en l'humanité ?
Quelles sont les raisons qui pourraient me redonner foi en l'humanité ?
En tant qu'homme, quelles sont les choses que font les femmes qui vous font craquer ?
Quelle est la seule chose que vous faites en privé qui pourrait vous embarrasser si le public le savait ?
À quelles occasions et face à quelles personnes, la mauvaise foi pourrait être utile ?
Avez-vous perdu foi en l'humanité ?
Quel acte de bienveillance vous a redonné foi en l'humanité ?
Quelle est la chose qui vous est arrivée qui vous a fait vous remettre en question ?

Pourquoi le Maroc, l'Algérie et la Tunisie sont-ils des pays séparés alors qu'ils ont tous un héritage berbère, arabe et français ?

Nathalie Suivre ,a plus d'un livre dans son sacdim.

Les marocains sont marqués par la haute montagne tandis que les algériens sont méditerranéens. L'Algérie a vécu sous toutes les républiques françaises (sauf la première) jusqu'à ce que les algériens ont pris les armes contre la France et ont créé une république révolutionnaire. Les marocains en revanche ont pris fait et cause pour leur sultan humilié puis exilé reconduisant leur allégeance ancienne au trône alaouite.

La Tunisie (ou pays de Tunis), qui se dessinera comme tel à l'époque de la domination ottomane, répond à l'ancien territoire de Carthage. La domination française favorisera là aussi l'émergence d'un mouvement nationaliste.

Questions similaires

Pourquoi les français préfèrent-ils aller en Tunisie ou au Maroc plutôt qu'en Algérie ?

Pourquoi les Berbères ressemblent-ils aux Arabes alors que génétiquement il s'agit de 2 populations bien différentes ?

Pourquoi les Berbères ne se rebellent-ils pas contre les musulmans et ne suivent-ils pas leurs anciens modes de vie et croyances ? Pourquoi préfèrent-ils rester musulmans ?

Pourquoi les Arabes détestent l'Algérie ?

Pourquoi les Français pensent-ils que les Maghrébins sont arabes?

Les Algériens, Marocains et Tunisiens parlent-ils un arabe assez proche pour se comprendre d'un pays à l'autre ?

Les Algériens sont-ils des Arabes ou des Berbères, ou un brassage entre les deux ?

Pourquoi parle-t-on presque toujours de la relation France/Algérie et si peu de la colonisation française en Tunisie et au Maroc ?

Pourquoi les Maghrébins sont-ils également appelés des Arabes ?

Pourquoi Abdelmoumen(calife des Almohades) est-il revendiqué comme

François Hollande comme Emmanuel Macron ont reconnu l'injustice et la brutalité de la colonisation française en Algérie. Pourtant, les Algériens semblent toujours attendre plus. Qu'attendent-ils et pourquoi ?

Joseph Gabriel B.A Japanese & Spanish, University de Canberra (1985)
Répondu 17 mars 2021

J'en ai marre d'entendre à longueur de journée parler de ces crimes crapuleux conduit par la colonisation, qu'elle soit anglaise, allemande ou française. Les bienfaits de la colonisation sont beaucoup plus grands que les crimes commis par cette colonisation. Bien sûr les crimes demandent compensation, les bienfaits personne en parle. Peut-être faudrait il demander compensation pour les crimes commit par le FLN aussi.

Questions similaires

Pendant la colonisation en Algérie, est-il vrai que la France a octroyé la nationalité française aux indigènes juifs, mais pas au peuple musulman ? Si oui, pourquoi?

Finalement, si l'Algérie était restée française, la France ne serait-elle pas devenu un pays à majorité musulmane ? De manière générale, à quoi ressemblerait la France aujourd'hui si l'Algérie était restée française ?

Pourquoi l'Algérie ne s'excuse-t-elle pas auprès de la France pour sa tentative ratée de colonisation? Que se serait-il passé si les Sarrasins n'avaient pas été arrêtés à Poitiers?

Pourquoi les Français sont-ils qualifiés de colonisateurs en Afrique du Nord, alors que le Maghreb fut d'abord colonisé par les Arabes (au détriment des Kabyles)?

Pourquoi le Vietnam ne s'est-il jamais plaint de la colonisation française contrairement à l'Algérie ?

La France a-t-elle répandu l'analphabétisme en Algérie pendant la colonisation ?

Que la France ait colonisé l'Algérie, certes, mais est-il exact que les Arabes aient colonisé le Maghreb Berbère et qu'ils l'occupent toujours ?

Combien de personnes ont été tuées lors de la colonisation française de l'Algérie ?

La France doit-elle s'excuser pour son passé colonial, comme le demande l'Algérie ?

Pourquoi le Maroc, l'Algérie et la Tunisie sont-ils des pays séparés alors qu'ils ont tous un héritage berbère, arabe et français

Est-ce que la France s'est excusé pour son passé colonial ?

Marc Laubier ancien chargé de coursMis à jour le 1 an Réponse originale : Est-ce que la France s'est excusé pour son passé colonial ?

q : Est-ce que la France s'est excusé pour son passé colonial ?
'est programmé pour le jour où les arabes décolonisent le Maghreb et le Moyen Orient où les arabes présentent des excuses pour la colonisation en Espagne et en Italie, en Inde, où les arabes, les perses et les kurdes présentent des excuses et des réparations pour le Seyfo , un génocide qui dure de 1830 jusque 1915 où les Turcs présentent des excuses et des réparations pour le génocide arménien de 1915, Où les pays maghrébins présentent des excuses pour la mise en esclavage des européens et des Américains suite à la piraterie en atlantique et méditerranée durant les 18èm et 19ème siècle où les pays arabes présentent des excuses pour la traite des africains et leur castration sans compter les morts en route où les maliens présentent des excuses pour avoir vendu leurs frères africains aux marchands nantais et bordelaise ou les turcs, qui se veulent descendants des ottomans, présentent des excuses pour avoir razzié des enfants chrétiens pour en faire des janissaires convertis de force à l'islam ou les turcs, qui se veulent descendants des ottomans, d'avoir razzié et vendu des filles pour en faire des concubines de harem, A J+1 de cette décolonisation (et de celle des poches en Inde conquises au tournant du 7ème et du 8ème siècle), à J+1 de ces demandes de pardon, la France présentera des excuses pour son passé colonial.

Quand on prétend donner des coups de pied au luc des gens, il faut d'abord s'assurer qu'il reste des clous sur ses chaussures un autre quorail propose d'allonger la liste

On peut lire

Jacques Marseille, Empire colonial et capitalisme français. Histoire d'un divorce

Daniel Lefeuvre, Chère Algérie 1997 Suivre Marc Laubier

Questions similaires

Croyez-vous que la France devrait présenter ses excuses aux ex-colonies pour les abus du passé colonial, comme le Mexique l'a demandé récemment à l'Espagne ?

Pourquoi la France ne s'est pas encore excusée pour ses crimes durant la guerre d'Algérie ?

Que pense le peuple français de la surexploitation des ex colonies par la France ?

Pourquoi l'état français ignore son histoire de colonialisme ?

Pourquoi la France ne s'excuse-t-elle pas une bonne fois pour toutes pour la colonisation vis à vis de l'Algérie ?

Pourquoi la France n'a-t-elle pas comme toutes ses colonies viré tous les Français de chez elle ?

La France doit-elle s’excuser pour son passé colonial, comme le demande l’Algérie ?

La France doit-elle s'excuser perpétuellement pour avoir eu des colonies en Afrique ?

La France a-t-elle encore un pouvoir sur ses anciennes colonies ?

La colonisation a-t-elle été rentable pour la France ?

What are some cool facts about the Berbers?

Sam Imazighen Follow Grew up in a small amazigh town isolated in the mountains. Apr 27

We call ourselves imazighen which means free people.
Our ancestors came here from Eurasia atleast 12000 years ago thats why we’re considered indeginous.
We are around 60% of the population of the maghreb.(morocco,algeria,tunisia)
There are dozens of amazigh groups and thousands of tribes,those tribes are devided into baraniss tribes and butr tribes.
Baraniss are the majority of the amazigh population. The name Barānis is a plural form of their eponymous forefather, Burnus, who is described as son of Māzīgh a legendary Berber ancestor. (hence the name Amazigh)
Butr tribes are largely subsaharan in ancestry due to their location in the sahara and their long history of goods and slave trade with subsahara

Some baraniss amazigh groups: Riffians: Numbered around 6 million they are the majority in the region of the rif in morocco,had their own short lived state during the 20th century.
The Moroccan singer Ibtissam Tiskat is a riffian on both sides of her family:

2. Shilha: Shleuh or shilha are the amazigh of the anti atlas and sous in moroccco. numbered around 8 million

Siham elazzaoui,the winner of the amazigh beauty pageant of 2018 is a shilha:

.

3. Kabyles,kabyles live in the kabylia region of Algeria. numbered around 7 million.

Zineedin zidane the famous footballer is a kabyle

4. chaouia,the chaouia live in the Aures mountains of algeria. numbered around 3 million djo sabri (djamel sabri) is a chaoui and an iconic singer in the aures region and algeria:

Butr groups:

Mozabites,they live the m’zab natural region in the sahara in Algeria. numbered around a 150 thousand:

Mozabite. 26.

The tuareg: They are the bulk of butr tribes and are nomadic people who travel between the south of the sahara and subsahara and west africa,numbered around 3 million.

The famous band Tinawerin are tuareg:

BONUS FACT: all baranis groups can understand eachother to some degree but don't understand butr groups,also butr groups don't understand Baraniss groups. Follow Sam Imazighen

Related Links

Were the Berbers and Arabs of North Africa originally black? If so, how did they end up being lighter skin today?

From an unbiased point of view, what race are the Berbers of Africa? Which foreign invasions were able to conquer North Africa? When did this occur?

What kind of skin color did North Africans have in the past? How were they treated by the Romans and end so on?

Berbers are the first inhabitants of North Africa but where did they originally come from? And why are there many different groups of Berbers who don't share much in common?

Is there any evidence that the black race inhabited North Africa before the white race?

Why do some people insist that Berbers are not real Africans when the term Africa itself is of Berber (Amazigh) origin?

Do the Berbers descend from the Phoenicians?

Did black Africans originally live in North Africa?

Are pure North Africans white?

Do Berbers have West Asian origins or African?

Are Berbers/Amazigh related to the Celts?

Do black Africans who live south of the Sahara generally regard the Arab and Berber people living in the Maghreb as also Africans?

Are Moors and Berbers the same race of people?

Are Tuaregs black despite being Berber?

Who are the real ethnic Berbers, the Amazigh or the Tuareg people?

Comment réagissent les Algériens au décès d'Abdelaziz Bouteflika ?

Omar Chad Fait ses études à l'école de la vie! 18 sept.

Perso, j'ai rien ressenti, j'ai vu sa mort comme celle d'un mort des confins lointains. Il a gouverné (si on peut appelé ça de la gouvernance!) le pays pendant des années tout en étant incapable physiquement , et moralement. La corruption avait atteint tout azimuth, profitant de la rente pétrolière, et de son incapacité à gérer le pays, l'Algérie a gâchée une somme colossale, rien que pour accomplir de grands projets imaginaires!

Questions similaires

Pourquoi les Marocains ne supportent pas les Algériens, qui ont pourtant une culture similaire ?
Que pensez-vous des Algériens ou plus précisément des Berbères après l'incident d'hier ?
Pourquoi autant de polémique sur les Algériens ?
Que pensent les Algériens des Français ?
Elections en Algérie : pourquoi rien n'a vraiment changé malgré le départ de Bouteflika ?
Que pensez vous de ce qu'il se passe en Algérie ?
Que va changer le décès du Général Ahmed Gaïd Salah en Algérie ?
Pourquoi les Algériens sont-ils aussi fiers de leur pays ?
Que dites -vous sur l'Algérie ?

Quels sont les risques d’une grave déstabilisation de l'Algérie après la mort de

Qu'est-ce qu'on ne voit qu'au Maghreb et pas ailleurs ?

Omar Aissaoui

2 ans
vous étes impartial ! si non vous ne connaissez pas assez le Maroc du moins les Marocains,pour ce ,je vous conseille de prendre beaucoup de temps tout en visitant toutes les régions du Maroc pour émettre vos jugements infondés ! Le Maroc a une Histoire ,un Passé une civilisation ;ce n'est pas une création d'activiste ou d'aventuriers comme vous l'imaginez ou supposez!

Abdelwaheb Hammami

, a étudié à Tunisie
Répondu 2 nov. 2019
Le visiteur de la TUNISIE, le plus petit pays du MAGHREB est ébloui par sa grandeur historique,par la richesse de son patrimoine historique qui la met au premier rang mondial par plusieurs de ses aspects,car on y trouve:

1-LES RUINES DE CARTHAGE

Le premier empire de l'antiquité qui domina le bassin occidental de la Méditerranée de 814 av.jc à 146 av.jc

L'empire de Carthage à son apogée

*Ses navigateurs sont les premiers à atteindre les iles britanniques et les cotes ouest de l'Europe : c'est le PERIPLE D'HIMILCON (500–380 av.JC)

Ireland
(Isola Sacra)
Britain
(Albion)
Cornwall
(Cassiterides)
Brittany
(Oestrymnides)
Gaul
Massalia
Tartessos
Gadir
Lixos
Carthage

*Les premiers à atteindre les cotes ouest la l'Afrique : c'est le PERIPLE D'HANNON (VI ème s.av jc)

La première république de l'histoire de l'humanité

C'est l'avis du célèbre philosophe grec, ARISTOTE (384–322 av.jc) :

Son système politique est loué par Aristote (IVe s. avant J.C.) « Carthage jouit d'une Constitution plus complète que celle des autres États ». Il déclare aussi : « Les Carthaginois […] possèdent des institutions excellentes; et ce qui prouve bien toute la sagesse de leur Constitution, c'est que, malgré la part de pouvoir qu'elle accorde au peuple, on n'a jamais vu à Carthage de changement de gouvernement, et qu'elle n'a eu, chose remarquable, ni émeute, ni tyran »(POLITIQUE,livre 2 chapitre VIII)

2-LES RUINES DE L'AFRICA ROMANA

L'Afrique romaine,c'est la province romaine qui englobait la TUNISIE actuelle ,une partie de la LIBYE actuelle et l'Est de l'ALGERIE actuelle…….C'est elle qui donna son nom au continent :l'AFRIQUE.

Parmi les vestiges les plus brillants de l'époque romaine:

*L'amphithéatre d'EL-JEM

Appelé aussi colisée de http://thysdrus.Il date du III ème s. Il n'est dépassé que par le colisée de ROME.

La plus belle collection au monde de mosaiques romaines

Le musée du BARDO(banlieue de TUNIS)est l'un des plus importants musées du bassin méditerranéen et le second musée du continent africain après le musée égyptien du Caire par la richesse de ses collections

. Il retrace l'histoire de la Tunisie sur plusieurs millénaires et à travers plusieurs civilisations par le biais d'une large variété de pièces archéologiques Le musée rassemble l'une des plus belles et des plus grandes collections de mosaïques romaines du monde grâce aux fouilles entreprises dès le début du XXè siècle sur les différents sites archéologiques du pays dont Carthage, Hadrumète, Dougga ou encore Utique.

Certaines des œuvres exposées n'ont pas d'équivalent, telle la mosaïque « dite de Virgile »

Virgile(poète romain 70–19 av.jc auteur de l'ENEIDE écoutant CLIO (muse et déesse de l'histoire)et MELPOMENE(muse et déesse du chant,de l'harmonie et de la tragédie)

222 Best tunisie mosaique images | Mosaic, Ancient romans, Mosaic art
Un champ de ruines romaines

Ruines anciennes à Tunisie : Découvrez 10 Ruines anciennes à Tunisie - TripAdvisor

3-LES VESTIGES DE L'IFRIQIYA MUSULMANE

C'est en TUNISIE que les arabes ont fondé la première ville KAIROUAN de son vrai nom AL-QAYRAWAN (القيروان) en 670. De là ils ont entrepris l'islamisation de tout le MAGHREB et la conquete de l'ESPAGNE (al-ANDALUS=الاندلس)

La grande mosquée OKBA IBN NAFII

Le style de son minaret (different du style du moyen orient)inspira tous les constructeurs de mosquéés dans le MAGHREB.

La mosquée "Abou Zamaa al-Baloui"

C'est l'un des compagnons du prophète décédé en Ifriqiya en 634 et enterré à Kairouan après sa fondation.

Le mausolée de l'imam souhnoun

SOUHNOUN (776–854) est un célèbre faqih qui a le mérite de propager la doctrine malékite au MAGHREB.

4-LE PAYS DE LA TOLERANCE

Mehrez ibn khalaf

La mosquée Sidi Mehrez à TUNIS.MEHREZ IBN KHALAF est un faqih qui a vécu à TUNIS au XI ème http://siècle.Il a chassé les chiites de leurs demeures et y installa les juifs qui se trouvaient,à l'époque à la périphérie de la ville.

L'ile de Jerba

Elle se trouve à l'extreme sud est de la TUNISIE.Elle est le symbole de la tolérance religieuse.On y trouve un mélange confessionnel explosif sous d'autres cieux :des musulmans sunnites,des musulmans kharigites (actuellement est la religion officielle de l'etat d'Oman) et des juifs qui vivent ensemble en harmonie totale. Ceux-ci y possèdent l'un de leurs hauts lieux religieux dans le monde.Des pelerins du monde entier y affluent chaque année ,c'est la synagogue AL-GHRIBA

Surnommée La Ghriba ("l'étrange","l'étrangère"… en arabe), la synagogue de Djerba est située à 11 km au sud d'Houmt-Souk, la capitale de l'île. C'est une attraction touristique incontournable à Djerba, même si malheureusement, les touristes qui séjournent dans les hôtels clubs ne soupçonnent guère son existence. Il faut dire qu'elle est isolée en rase campagne, loin des plages, au centre de l'île, à 1 kilomètre du village d'Erriadh, l'une des deux bourgades juives de Djerba. L'intérieur orné de bois peints, de mosaïques et de vitraux est tout à fait remarquable. Il faut se déchausser et mettre une kippa. Ce serait la plus vieille synagogue du monde, datant de 586 avant J. C ! Elle fut fondée par des prêtes du temple de Salomon après sa destruction par Nabuchodonosor la même année. Les restes du Temple seraient encore visibles à certains endroits, mais il n'y a aucune preuve de leur véracité. On y voit des rabbins lire des passages de la Thora. Un endroit chargé d'histoire et plein d'émotion, témoignant aussi de la tolérance des Tunisiens. La synagogue de La Ghriba fait l'objet d'un pèlerinage annuel, à l'occasion de la fête juive de Lag Ba'omer (33ème jour de la Pâque juive) qui rassemble chaque année plusieurs milliers de pèlerins.

ENFIN L'UNE DES BEAUTES DE LA TUNISIE EST, ENTRE AUTRES ,SON OLIVERAIE QUI FAIT D'ELLE L'UN DES PRINCIPAUX PRODUCTEURS MONDIAUX D'HUILE D'OLIVE EN CONCURRENCE AVEC L'ESPAGNE ET L'ITALIE

Gérôme Goodman Suivre Abdelwaheb Hammami

Questions similaires

Que ne doit-on absolument pas faire au Maroc ?
Qu'est-ce qu'on doit jamais faire si je visite le Maroc ?
Pourquoi les français préfèrent-ils aller en Tunisie ou au Maroc plutôt qu'en Algérie ?
Pourquoi le Maroc, l'Algérie et la Tunisie sont-ils des pays séparés alors qu'ils ont tous un héritage berbère, arabe et français ?
Quel pays du Maghreb est le plus prometteur ?
En tant que Maghrébin, vous sentez-vous Africain ? Si non, pourquoi ?
Qu'est-ce qui vous dérange à propos de la culture marocaine ?
Pourquoi ceux qu'on appelle des Maghrébins s'appellent ainsi tout en sachant qu'ils sont sur le continent africain ?
Quelles sont les choses qu'on aime au Maroc ?
En tant que non-arabe, quelle partie du monde arabe aimez-vous le mieux, le Maghreb (Algérie, Tunisie, Maroc), le Levant (Égypte, Syrie, Liban, Irak) ou la péninsule arabique (KSA, Émirats arabes unis, Qatar), et pourquoi ?
Qu'est-ce qui manque le plus aux Marocains quand ils vont à l'étranger ?
Quelles sont les grandes différences culturelles entre les pays du Maghreb ?
Pourquoi les Maghrébins sont-ils également appelés des Arabes ?
Les Algériens, Marocains et Tunisiens parlent-ils un arabe assez proche pour se comprendre d'un pays à l'autre ?
Qu'est-ce qui empêche des pays comme l'Algérie et le Maroc à se développ

Pourquoi la France est un pays si faible autorisant tant de migrants depuis l'Algérie ou le Maroc qui ne sont pas des pays en guerre et n'a alors pas assez de place pour les migrants de pays en guerre qui auraient vraiment besoin (afghans, syriens) ?

Vassili Fiodorovitch Patrouchev Vétéran. Sécurité internationale. Consulting géopolitique13 nov.

C'est de qui cela ? De vous : "Heute zeigte sich der Himmel noch recht freundlich. Allerdings entstanden hier die Wolken wie aus dem Nichts und das ist eben ein Zeichen dafür dass die Luft recht labil ist und dass die nachste Storung nicht weit von uns entfernt ist."

Questions similaires

Pourquoi il n'y a qu'avec l'Algérie que les relations sont souvent tendues alors que la France a occupé d'autres pays ?

Pourquoi la France a-t-elle perdu la guerre d'Algérie alors qu'elle a tué beaucoup plus d'Algériens qu'elle n'a subi de pertes ? (Question traduite)

L'Algérie et le Maroc constituent-ils une future menace militaire pour la France ?

Est-ce que le Maroc va attaquer l'Algérie ?

Le rapport sur la guerre France Algérie de Benjamin Stora est-il objectif ou n'a-t-il pour but que de contenter les deux parties ?

La France a-t-elle perdu la guerre d'Algérie ?

Pourquoi on demande tout le temps à la France de s'excuser envers l'Algérie pour les morts de la Guerre d'Algérie et pas à l'Algérie de s'excuser pour les actes du FLN durant la même période ?

Pourquoi l'Algérie est-elle toujours désavantagée dans les accords bilatéraux (santé, séjour, etc.) avec la France?

Pourquoi Emmanuel Macron n'appelle-t-il pas l'Algérie et le Maroc à cesser l'escalade militaire ?

Pourquoi certains Algériens font n'importe quoi en France ?

Migrants à Ceuta: que se passe-t-il entre l'Espagne et le Maroc, accusé « d'agression » et de « chantage »?

Fernando Bel Larrañaga A étudié à University of Navarra (Diplôme obtenu en 1998) 7 mo

De quel pays êtes-vous ? France, Belgique ? Imaginez qu'entre sept et dix mille espagnols entrent dans votre pays illégalement d'un coup en agressant gravement les policiers de votre pays avec des bâtons, des jets de pierres, etc. J'ai une vidéo sur Youtube montrant que ce n'était pas pacifique Définiriez-vous cela comme un sympathique mouvement touristique ou une invasion programmée par le gouvernement marocain, sachant que ses gendarmes ont ouvert les portes de leur côté de la frontière à tous ceux qui étaient convoqués par les réseaux sociaux d'Internet?

Notre stupide gouvernement communiste espagnol a amené dans un de nos hôpitaux le chef du Front Polisario (en guerre avec Maroc) car il est infecté par Covid-19.

Questions similaires

Pourquoi tant de migrants marocains envahissent soudainement la ville espagnole de Ceuta et que fait l'Union européenne et la France ?
Pourquoi Abdelmoumen(calife des Almohades) est-il revendiqué comme Marocain par les Marocains, alors qu'il venait d'une tribu localisée en Algérie actuelle ?
Que se passe-t-il avec le Maroc et l'Espagne qui se disputent Melilla et Ceuta ?
Pourquoi ces territoires sont-ils tombés sous contrôle espagnol et pourquoi le Maroc n'a-t-il pas réussi à les reconquérir ?
Pourquoi le Maroc n'est-il pas considéré comme un pays européen alors qu'il n'est qu'à 14 km de l'Espagne ?
Pourquoi les Marocains n'organisent-ils pas une marche verte pour ramener Ceuta et Melilla d'Espagne?
Pourquoi le Maroc est-il constamment présenté comme un pays arrière ?
Pourquoi le gouvernement marocain ne demande-t-il pas officiellement la restitution des 2 enclaves espagnoles Ceuta et Melilla au gouvernement espagnole ?
Pourquoi L'Espagne conserve Ceuta et Melilla alors qu'elles se situent au Maroc ?
Immigration : que se passe-t-il dans l'enclave espagnole de Ceuta ?
Pouvez-vous m'expliquer le conflit entre le Maroc et l'Espagne ?
Si le Maroc récupère Melilla et Ceuta, les civils blancs seront-ils expulsés comme en 1962 ?
Pourquoi les Marocains fuient-ils le Maroc ?
Les Marocains peuvent-ils voir l'Espagne de Tanger ?
L'Espagne ressemble-t-elle plus à la France ou au Maroc ?
Que vont devenir les migrants mineurs arrivés à Ceuta ?

Est-ce vrai, j'ai entendu ça quelque part, que les Allemands et les Maghrebins étaient très proches génétiquement ?

Louis Gabriel philosophe-linguiste-historien amateur 10 mo

Réponse originale : Est ce vrai, j'ai entendu ça quelque part, que les Allemands et les Maghrebins étaient très proches génétiquement ?

Oui, absolument. Les Allemands et les Maghrébins sont très proches génétiquement. Ils sont d'ailleurs proches aussi génétiquement des Chinois, des Australiens, des Russes, des Bushmans et des Inuits.

En fait, tous les humains de la terre sont très proches génétiquement, beaucoup plus proches que la plupart des autres espèces entre eux.

La diversité génétique à l'intérieur de notre espèce est de 0,1% ce qui veut dire que la différence génétique entre vous et n'importe quel autre humain sur cette planète n'est jamais supérieur à 1 sur 1000. Chez nos plus proches cousins les chimpanzés, la diversité génétique est de 1%, soit 10 fois plus élevé.

Pour cela il n'y a qu'une seule explication : toute la population mondiale d'aujourd'hui descend d'un groupe restreint d'individus.

N'en déplaise aux racistes

Questions similaires

Pourquoi l'Allemagne a-t-elle pardonné à la France d'avoir volé le territoire ethno-linguistiquement allemand d'Alsace-Lorraine ?

Est-ce que les Allemands voient Hitler comme les Français voient Napoléon malgré les horreurs qu'ils ont pu faire ?

Pourquoi les Berbères ressemblent-ils aux Arabes alors que génétiquement il s'agit de 2 populations bien différentes ?

Quelle est l'origine ethnique (dont beaucoup sont blonds aux yeux bleus) de la population kabyle de Grande-Kabylie, en Algérie ?

Le français est-il plus facile que l'allemand ?

Les Algériens, Marocains et Tunisiens parlent-ils un arabe assez proche pour se comprendre d'un pays à l'autre ?

Pourquoi les "kabyles" ne se considèrent pas arabes ?

Qui étaient les Berbères, qui vivaient dans le Nord de l'Afrique, bien avant que les arabes arrivent ?

Est-il encore utile d'apprendre l'allemand étant donné que les Allemands parlent très bien l'anglais ?

Génétique et Hérédité : pourquoi les Européens du Nord sont plus grands que les Européens du Sud ?

Why are people so obsessed with the genetics and ethnicities of North African people? Will the arguments and debates ever be put to rest?

Ali Sarpin, Former Writer Sat

I guess it's because various people are trying to claim the Berbers of today as the ancients.

Berbers of today are more related to West Eurasian whites and Arabs, however, the pre-Berber Iberomaurusians were not.

The modern Berbers originated in southern Libya (and West-Central Asia prior to that). They arrived in Africa post 12,000 BC .

''Genetic data from present-day populations (11⇓–13) suggests that North African ancestry has contributions from four main sources: (i) an autochthonous Maghrebi component related to a back migration to Africa ~12,000 y ago from Eurasia*; (ii) a Middle Eastern component probably associated with the Arab conquest; (iii) a sub-Saharan component derived from trans-Saharan migrations; and (iv) a European component that has been linked to recent historic movements*.''

Even then, newer DNA studies are showing that 70% of Berber men descend from E-M183. This means that modern Berbers are actually a very new people in the region.

70% of Maghrebian men come from a common ancestor that lived only 2,500 years ago - NEWS ARCHIVE

70% of Maghrebian men share a common ancestor, a sort of great-great-grandfather that lived 2,500 years ago. This is found in a study carried out by researchers from the Universitat Pompeu Fabra (UPF) and the Institute of Evolutionary Biology (IBE), a joint centre of the CSIC and the UPF, which was based on the genetic data from more than 200 volunteers from northern Africa, the Middle East and the Iberian Peninsula. Since it is responsible for determining maleness and thus is transmitted from fathers to male offspring only, the Y chromosome is very useful to study the historic and demographic processes of the past. To shed light on the history of the northern African population, a team of researchers led by Francesc Calafell and David Comas analysed the E-M183 Y-chromosomal variant, which was found in 75% of Maghrebian men and is therefore the most frequent paternal lineage in the region. Once the Y chromosome from North African E-M183 variant-carrier men was sequenced, scientists found out that the lineage is 2,500 years old. "Previous research suggested it originated in the Neolithic, that is, 4,500 years ago, or even in the Palaeolithic, 12,000 years ago; that is why such dating has been controversial within the scientific community", Francesc Calafell, professor of the UPF and leader of the Genomics of Individuality research group of the IBE, says. "Such date shows that its origin is extremely recent, especially if we take into account the great mass of people that share this lineage." A very complex genetic scenario As a result of several migrations and its cultural diversity, the genetic variety in Northern Africa is considerable. Different groups, Phoenicians, Romans, Vandals and Byzantines among them, have populated the region through history, and two different populations defined by their language coexist in the region: Arabians and Berebers. The evolutionary history of the Y chromosome in humans seems to have happened in waves, and some variants have become more frequent due to cultural changes or technological innovations. "Our estimations of the E-M183 variant's origin are in line with the end of the third Punic war, 146 BC, when Cartago (Tunisia now) was defeated and destroyed, and the Roman hegemony in the Mediterranean kicked off", states Neus Solé, main author of the research recently published in Scientific Reports. "Approximately 2,000 years ago, the North of Africa was one of the richest Roman provinces, and quite probably this resulted in a demographic growth of the E-M183 variant." The E-M183 variant, found in the Canary Islands too The E-M183 Y-chromosomal variant was also found in Guanche mummies, so it seems that northern Africa is the most likely origin of the aborigines of the Canary Islands. Given that the most ancient aborigine individuals had already been dated 2,200 years old, such findings back the hypothesis that the E-M183 sprang in the North of Africa. "Data and mutation taxes used in this research reveal that t

https://www.ibe.upf-csic.es/news/-/asset_publisher/PXTgqZXxlocA/content/id/137280035/maximized#.YdripybP200

The modern Berbers absorbed the Iberomaurusians who were a pre-Berber people that were half black/half West Asian.

The Iberomaurusians were not the Berbers of today and the genes of the Iberimaurusians are mostly found in the people of Western Sahara at 30% max. Even then, 30% isn't much.

Considering that the Iberomaurusians were literally half black, half West Asian, and Western Sahara people are mostly West Asians, the Iberomaurusians were much darker-skinned than the West Sahara people.

West Sahara people.

The Iberomaurusuan African DNA emerged from an ancient people distantly related to the immediate ancestors of modern West Africans, which shows close links to the Hadza of Tanzania, but may have back migrated into Africa somewhere around South East Asia (Papuan New Guinea) before mixing with other Africans.

Claiming Berbers as the Iberomaurusians is like claiming Cape Verdeans (who are half black West African/half West Asian) as Berbers. The Iberomaurusians had a culture that was distinctively theirs and unique. It represented a crossroad between Africa and West Asia, whilst modern Berbers appear more genetically and culturally related to West Eurasians and Arabs. Much of their African culture has disappeared.

The ancestors of today's Berbers who were the ancient Libyans absorbed and in some cases, brutally murdered the Iberomaurusians. The ancient Greeks called the Iberomaurusians "Atlanteans" and even detailed exactly what happened.

"Setting out from the city of Cherronesus, the account continues, the Libyan Amazons embarked upon great ventures, a longing having come over them to invade many part of the inhabited world. The first people against whom they advanced, according to the tale, was the Atlantians, the most civilized men among the inhabitants of those regions, who dwelt in a prosperous country and possessed great cities; it was among them, we are told, that mythology places the birth of the gods, in the regions which lie along the shore of the ocean, in this respect agreeing with those among the Greeks who relate legends, and about this we shall speak in detail a little later."

Upon entering the land of the Atlantians they defeated in a pitched battle the inhabitants of the city of Cernê, as it is called, and making their way inside the walls along with the fleeing enemy, they got the city into their hands; and desiring to strike terror into the neighbouring peoples they treated the captives savagely, put to the sword the men from the youth upward, led into slavery the children and women, and razed the city.

So, trying to claim Iberomaurusians are modern Berbers is a blatant attempt to take away their African culture, which was the very culture that created the animism in which many polytheistic cultures/civilizations emerged from.

Iberomaurusians were animistic/polytheistic and their culture was relative to the West Africans of today as well the ancient Greeks who worshipped various Gods. Berbers of today are Muslims and are culturally more related to Arabs and other Middle Eastern peoples.

The ones of today are largely descended from Ancient Libyans who absorbed the Iberomaurusians. Any genetic continuation comes from that absorption. And as mentioned, the closest descendants are those in the Western Sahara and Mauritania.

RelatedLinks

What is the genetic makeup of Moroccans like? Is it true that European-like or conversely Sub-Saharan African-like ancestry has only arrived in Morocco and its vicinity only in relatively recent historical times, as some claim?

Where do the North African Berber people come from? Why do they look so white?

Why are North Africans white? Is it still safe to call them Africans or being African has nothing to do with skin colour?

Why do people deny North African, Berber, Arab and Sub Saharan African DNA in modern Iberia when there is clear evidence both in culture, architecture and population that it clearly exist's? Even I am entirely Iberian and I get mistaken for Arab?

What is so great about Money Heist on Netflix?

Why do North Africans look brown?

Why do the people of North Africa have almost nothing in common with the rest of Africa or African people?

Why are people from North African countries white?

Is it possible that the Berbers have conquered North Africans in the past? Because Berbers are white light brown and have their own language and culture than the rest of Africa? Is there evidence for this?

Which Sub-Saharan African ethnic group is the closest genetically to all non-Africans

Que se passerait-il si l'Axe gagnait en Afrique du Nord avant l'opération Barbarossa ?

Zilin Wang A étudié à University de l'Illinois à Urbana-Champaign7 mo

Comme la majeure partie des forces armées de l'Axe était en Europe pour se préparer à la guerre contre l'Union soviétique, l'opération Barbarossa et une grande partie du front de l'Est seraient à peu près les mêmes. La principale différence est que l'Axe a capturé le canal de Suez, le lien entre le Royaume-Uni et ses colonies en Inde et en Asie du Sud-Est. Cela renforcerait la perception du Japon impérial que l'Empire britannique était vulnérable. Ainsi, la guerre contre les colonies européennes en Asie du Sud-Est par le Japon impérial aurait pu commencer plus tôt.

La principale différence dans l'opération Barbarossa pour l'Union soviétique était le prêt-bail américain, la moitié de l'aide qui allait de l'Alaska à l'Extrême-Orient, à une époque où le Japon impérial et l'Union soviétique avaient conclu un pacte de non-agression. En obligeant le Japon impérial à rompre le pacte de non-agression, l'Axe pourrait avoir une chance de couper cette aide.

Bien que l'Axe ait occupé la Norvège et rendu risquée la route arctique des États-Unis à l'Union soviétique, seulement 7 % des expéditions ont été perdues. Si les sous-marins étaient plus agressifs dans cette zone, cela aurait un impact énorme sur le déroulement de l'opération Barbarossa.

La troisième option pour l'Axe est que l'Iran devienne un membre à part entière de l'Axe et attaque le Caucase et l'Asie centrale, détournant les forces soviétiques des principaux théâtres de l'opération Barbarossa. Malheureusement, le partage d'une frontière avec l'Inde contrôlée par les Britanniques (aujourd'hui le Pakistan) l'a rendu vulnérable aux attaques de deux armées alliées. De plus, les troupes de l'Axe dans le Sinaï devraient combattre à travers la Palestine, la Transjordanie sous contrôle britannique et mettre l'Irak aux côtés de l'Axe pour fournir une assistance à l'Iran. Comme le montre la situation au Moyen-Orient aujourd'hui, cela serait rendu difficile par la situation politique très complexe de la région.

La plus grande différence que l'Axe puisse faire est que Mussolini abandonne son rêve d'un Nouvel Empire romain, ce qui était difficile à faire compte tenu de sa personnalité et de l'attrait de l'idée pour ses partisans. Cette idée a aliéné de nombreuses personnes en Égypte qui considéraient les Italiens non comme des libérateurs de l'influence britannique, mais comme remplaçant un suzerain colonial par un autre. Si l'Axe avait promis la libération de la domination coloniale britannique et française, il ne serait pas difficile de recruter des habitants pour soutenir l'Axe. Francisco Franco avait mené avec succès une stratégie similaire avec le Maroc espagnol, en présentant la République espagnole comme une institution antireligieuse.

Pour Hitler, c'est la réticence de l'Allemagne nazie à compromettre son idéologie qui a finalement conduit à la défaite de l'opération Barbarossa. Si l'Axe avait promis aux Ukrainiens et à d'autres groupes de l'Union soviétique leurs propres États indépendants, ils auraient pu être accueillis comme des libérateurs remplaçant plutôt la domination soviétique par la leur. De nombreux Russes anticommunistes qui voulaient un gouvernement post-stalinien en Russie se sont finalement rangés du côté de l'Union soviétique en raison de la politique génocidaire d'Hitler et de ses plans pour faire de la Russie une partie du Grand Reich allemand.

Questions similaires

Que se passerait-il si la Terre s'arrêtait brutalement de tourner pendant 42 secondes ?

S'il n'y avait pas eu d'hiver, comment cela aurait-il affecté l'opération Barbarossa ?

Compte tenu du succès de l'invasion initiale de l'Union soviétique et si Hitler avait laissé ses généraux assumer entièrement la stratégie et la tactique, à quel point les Allemands étaient-ils proches de la victoire ?

Pourquoi le troisième Reich n'a-t-il pas pris au sérieux la campagne militaire en Afrique du Nord ?

Qu'est-ce qui aurait pu se passer différemment si les nazis n'avaient pas engagé de ressources militaires en Afrique du Nord ?

Pourquoi Rommel a-t-il perdu en Afrique du Nord ?

Si Léopold III de Belgique ne s'était pas rendu à l'Allemagne en 1940, cela aurait-il changé le cours de la Seconde Guerre mondiale ?

Si les Français avaient continué à se battre pendant la guerre en 1940 et s'ils s'étaient repositionnés en Afrique du Nord, est-ce que les Allemands auraient pu organiser une invasion réussie de l'Afrique du Nord française ?

Si les Soviétiques avaient décidé de pousser les Alliés hors de l'Europe occidentale à la fin de la Seconde Guerre mondiale, auraient-ils pu le faire ?

Si Hitler avait été tué par les membres du complot Valkyrie, la fin de la Guerre aurait-

Le français est-il de fait une langue nationale en Algérie ?

Samir Berkani Anciennement Errant dans la Cité 5 janv.

Le Français devrait être reconnu comme une langue nationale au même titre que l'Arabe et le Berbère.Loin d'une quelconque posture idéologique faisant de cette langue un banal héritage colonial, cette langue a permis un tant soit peu à l'élite algérienne de se former et a ouvert l'accès à la civilisation occidentale en ayant connu elle-même une évolution historique qui a accompagné le développement des sciences dures et des sciences humaines en France.Alors pourquoi nous priver des apports de cette langue d'autant plus que la linguistique et les sciences de la communication sont suffisamment développées en France (sémantique dont le pionnier est De Saussure lui-même Français pour n'en citer que lui!!!)

Questions similaires

Pourquoi il n'y a qu'avec l'Algérie que les relations sont souvent tendues alors que la France a occupé d'autres pays ?

En tant que français quelles sont les erreurs que l'on fait en parlant l'anglais de calquage de schéma grammaticaux de notre langue sur la langue anglaise ?

Les gens des pays africains qui parlent français détestent-ils la France et la langue française ?

Pourquoi les français préfèrent-ils aller en Tunisie ou au Maroc plutôt qu'en Algérie ?

Pourquoi certains Algériens font n'importe quoi en France ?

Est-il possible à l'avenir que l'arabe soit une deuxième langue officielle en France ?

Pourquoi le français est la plus belle langue du monde ?

Pourquoi les Arabes détestent l'Algérie ?

Pourquoi le français est-il une langue latine, alors que les Gaulois sont celtes et les Francs sont germaniques ?

Pourquoi les Algériens, au moins ceux en France, parlent si bien le français ?

Pourquoi les pays européens doivent s'excuser pour leur passé colonial ?

Romain Fontaine

Opérateur de l'information Mis à jour le 7 mo

Les excuses ne sont pas à sens unique. L'un les présente, l'autre les accepte : c'est un processus qui vise à abolir ensemble la culpabilité résultant d'une faute, d'un manquement.

Veuille accepter mes excuses,
Cher ami, je les accepte bien volontiers.

Le regret est un état de conscience plus ou moins douloureux causé par un mal, physique ou moral que l'on a pu provoquer. Il peut alors être suivi d'un pardon, qui est l'action de tenir pour non avenue une faute, une offense, de ne pas en tenir rigueur au coupable et de ne pas lui en garder de ressentiment.

Je regrette ce qui s'est passé,

Je te pardonne, soyons amis.

L'Allemagne déclare : « À la lumière de la responsabilité historique et morale de l'Allemagne, nous allons demander pardon à la Namibie et aux descendants des victimes. » Un premier geste fut jugé insuffisant par leurs descendants et les autorités namibiennes, qui exigeaient des excuses officielles et des réparations (plus d'un milliard d'euros au final). Nous ne sommes pas dans un processus d'excuses, mais de règlement d'un contentieux (sérieux en l'occurrence, puisqu'il s'agit d'un crime contre l'Humanité).

La posture de Macron est plutôt de considérer que « La France a un rôle, une histoire et une responsabilité politique au Rwanda », elle est restée « de fait aux côtés d'un régime génocidaire » mais « n'a pas été complice. » Pas d'excuse, pas de demande de pardon.

En campagne électorale à Alger en 2017, Emmanuel Macron avait parlé de la colonisation comme d'un crime contre l'humanité, une vraie barbarie. Aujourd'hui, les Algériens veulent des excuses et des vraies. La position de la France est : reconnaissance de ce qui s'est passé, pas de repentance.

Je mets de côté le drame humain que furent les conquêtes, l'esclavage, la colonisation et leurs conséquences : On estime que Gengis Khan (XIIème siècle) a exterminé un cinquième de la population mondiale. Les grands empires furent tous prédateurs, parasites, colonisateurs, parfois exterminateurs : les Romains, les Mongols, les Omeyyades, les Ottomans, les Espagnols, les Britanniques, le second Empire, l'empire du Japon… : on fait quoi ?

On fait quoi ? On nie (comme la Turquie) ou on présente des excuses et/ou on dédommage. Et ça change quoi (je mets bien de côté l'aspect mémoriel et humain) ? Rien. Car la mise en coupe réglée, de l'Afrique notamment, continue. Par la grâce de la financiarisation de l'économie mondiale, par la grâce des nouveaux empires, non pas venus des steppes, mais de Wall street ou de Pékin par exemple.

Il s'agit d'un jeu du trompe-couillon cher aux Marseillais : je te demande pardon pour mieux t'entuber. Je pense qu'il faut sortir de ce cirque, pourquoi pas en organisant une bonne vieille journée mondiale contre les crimes de tous les colonialismes, tous.

Puis on s'attaque enfin sérieusement au cœur du problème : stopper le colonialisme actuel des transnationales bénies par la Phynance internationale, réviser le fonctionnement du FMI et de la Banque mondiale.

À qui profite la déforestation de la Côte d'Ivoire à coup de RoundUp pour la culture du cacao : aux travailleurs des plantations ? à la Côte d'Ivoire ? Non. Aux marchés. À la finance. À Nestlé (par exemple).

Des excuses pour que rien ne change. Telle est l'embrouille.

Questions similaires

Alors que les empires coloniaux sont morts, est-il normal que la France soit le dernier pays européen à maintenir des possessions extra-européennes ?

Quelle est la meilleure façon pour un pays colonisateur de faire repentance sincère de ses actions passées, sachant que son peuple actuel n'est pas responsable des actions de ses ancêtres ?

Pourquoi les pays européens ont donné l'indépendance à leurs colonies ? Je ne pense pas qu'ils l'ont fait par pure gentillesse, y avait-il un avantage économique ou politique ?

Pensez-vous que le colonialisme européen fut mauvais ?

Pourquoi la colonisation historique a-t-elle été en grande partie effectuée par les pays européens ?

Est-ce que la France s'est excusée pour son passé colonial ?

Votre pays a-t-il déjà été colonisé ? Laquelle des coutumes persiste encore dans votre pays aujourd'hui depuis l'ère coloniale après sa fin ?

La France doit-elle s'excuser pour son passé colonial, comme le demande l'Algérie ?

Pourquoi l'Europe abuse-t-elle encore de ses pays colonisés ?

Quel pays non-européen aurait pu facilement coloniser le monde comme l'Europe mais ne l'a pas fait ? Question traduite.

Française en Tunisie et au Maroc

Pourquoi parle-t-on presque toujours de la relation France/Algérie et si peu de la colonisation française en Tunisie et au Maroc ?

Pierre Boutin A travaillé à Armée du Salut (2012–2015) 4 ans

N'étant pas historien, je te ferai une reponse très sommaire, et, j'espère, pas trop inexacte :

Parce que l'Algérie, contrairement au Maroc et à la Tunisie, a été une colonie de peuplement. Des générations et des générations de Pieds-Noirs ont vécu sur son territoire pendant plus d'un siècle (grosso modo depuis la mi-XIXème jusqu'à la mi-XXème).

Parce que la décolonisation a donné lieu à une guerre catastrophique, avec son lot d'horreurs et d'exactions, sur lesquelles, côté francais, on se contente bien souvent de jeter un voile pudique.

Parce qu'elle est liée à d'importants mouvements de populations : pendant et immédiatement après la guerre, un retour massif et précipité des Pieds-Noirs en Europe d'une part, puis une émigration économique de travailleurs algériens d'autre part.

Parce qu'à l'ère postcoloniale, et jusqu'à aujourd'hui, 55 ans après l'Indépendance, le traumatisme n'a pas été encore été tout-à-fait surmonté, tous les enseignements historiques n'ont pas encore été tirés.

Parce qu'aussi, plus simplement, l'Algérie reste plus importante, en termes de superficie et de population, que ne le sont le Maroc et la Tunisie!

Questions similaires

Pendant la colonisation en Algérie, est-il vrai que la France a octroyé la nationalité française aux indigènes juifs, mais pas au peuple musulman ? Si oui, pourquoi?

Pourquoi les français préfèrent-ils aller en Tunisie ou au Maroc plutôt qu'en Algérie ?

Avant la colonisation française en 1830, l'Algérie (ou les territoires qui la formaient) avait-elle déjà été longuement sous domination étrangère ?

Pourquoi le Maroc, l'Algérie et la Tunisie sont-ils des pays séparés alors qu'ils ont tous un héritage berbère, arabe et français ?

Un Algérien d'un certain âge m'a montré la carte d'identité Française qu'il possédait en 1962, juste avant l'indépendance. Il y était noté "Français musulman". Y avait-il bien un système d'apartheid à l'époque de l'Algérie Française ?

Pourquoi la France ne s'excuse-t-elle pas une bonne fois pour toutes pour la colonisation vis à vis de l'Algérie ?

Pourquoi il n'y a qu'avec l'Algérie que les relations sont souvent tendues alors que la France a occupé d'autres pays ?

La France est-elle prospère à cause de la colonisation ? Si la colonisation n'avait jamais eu lieu, comment se présenterait la France ?

La France a-t-elle répandu l'analphabétisme en Algérie pendant la colonisation ?

Pourquoi l'Algérie ne s'excuse-t-elle pas auprès de la France pour sa tentative ratée de Pourquoi les pays magrébins refusent-ils de reprendre leurs ressortissants entrés clandestinement sur le territoire français ?

Chri Chri Précédent lieu : Afrique centrale (2007–2015)12 nov.

Je me lance (mais il y a une réponse de Mina Daoud très complète et fouillée), ils sont tout simplement trop nombreux car il y a trop de naissances et c'est un problème civilisationnel. Il faudrait réguler les naissances, comme l'a fait la Chine. Il y avait 6 à 7 enfants par femme dans les années 1950 et Mao encourageait la natalité car il imaginait une guerre contre la grande Russie. Mais quand ils ont compris qu'ils ne pouvaient pas sortir du tiers monde avec 6 enfants par femme, ils ont pris des mesures strictes (récemment assouplies). Il faut quand même noter que malgré la possibilité d'avoir 2 enfants, le retour en arrière est compliqué, une femme chinoise ne veut pas de second enfant (j'en sais quelque chose) car on a conditionné les Chinois, on leur a par exemple dit qu'un étudiant coûtait cher (ce qui est vrai) et il n'y a aucune aide sociale, faire des enfants dans le but de toucher un RSA ou gagner des points de retraite, ce n'est même pas imaginable! Les PMA (pays moins avancés, à ne pas confondre avec les pays en voie de développement qui ont un PIB par habitant inférieur à la moyenne mondiale mais rattrapent leur retard) doivent absolument réguler les naissances! D'ailleurs, Macron, fraîchement élu en juillet 2017, avait déjà compris le problème et déclaré ceci : le « défi de l'Afrique est différent (des pays européens au sortir de la guerre), il est beaucoup plus profond, il est civilisationnel ». Et de conclure : « Quand des pays ont encore sept à huit enfants par femme, vous pouvez décider d'y dépenser des milliards d'euros, vous ne stabiliserez rien. » Ça calme, hein? Les gauchos l'ont bien sûr traité de raciste et il est devenu un modèle de bien-pensance!

Mais comment fait-on moins de bébés? On aide les femmes qui ont un bébé et on supprime les aides au-delà du premier enfant, y compris pour le premier. Quand la mesure est passée en Chine, il y a bien sûr eu une période de flou. Mon épouse est née en 1980, ses parents ne l'ont pas déclarée car elle était le second enfant. Elle n'a donc pas de luku, elle n'a pas d'existence administrative. Ils l'ont finalement déclaré dans une autre province et elle doit s'y rendre chaque fois qu'elle a besoin de papiers. C'est tellement compliqué qu'ils se sont arrêtés à deux et leurs deux filles n'ont qu'un enfant. Il faut donc donner des milliards à l'Afrique pour inciter les femmes à avoir un enfant et un seul. La femme africaine qui touche 150€ par mois est très heureuse mais si elle a un second enfant et qu'on lui supprime ces 150€, très vite elle va arrêter d'en faire! Parallèlement à cela, il faut accompagner cette mesure par une communication pour ces populations: faites un seul enfant, l'état ne pourra pas les nourrir! Et il faut pousser l'éducation des femmes! Une femme diplômée et exerçant un métier fait moins d'enfants!

Or ça, c'est un vrai problème dans les pays musulmans où les femmes ne jouissent pas des mêmes libertés que les hommes! Il y a donc un programme mondial pour l'éducation des femmes (et même un prix UNESCO depuis 2016) mais il donne peu de résultats à ce jour… En Afrique, l'île Maurice a réussi, les femmes sont très actives, n'ont pas d'enfants, plus aucune immigration mauricienne en Europe, le solde migratoire doit même être négatif…

Il faut aussi se demander pourquoi les Africaines font des enfants? D'une part, un enfant meurt plus facilement en Afrique qu'en Europe, ne serait-ce qu'à cause du palu (et on est en train de découvrir un vaccin donc la démographie va exploser). D'autre part, les enfants sont la caisse de retraite. Quand vous arrêtez de travailler, l'état ne vous donne rien. Si vous avez eu 8 enfants, même s'ils donnent chacun l'équivalent de 30€, vous pouvez vivre normalement.

Questions similaires

Pourquoi il n'y a qu'avec l'Algérie que les relations sont souvent tendues alors que la France a occupé d'autres pays ?

La France a-t-elle raison de réduire de 50% le nombre de visas accordés aux ressortissants du Maghreb, à cause de leur refus de reprendre leurs ressortissants expulsés ?

Pour quelles raisons Macron vient-il d'annoncer que la France allait réduire drastiquement le nombre de visas accordés au Maroc, à l'Algérie et à la Tunisie ?

Le gouvernement algérien a-t-il atteint le sommet de l'imbécillité en interdisant le survol de son territoire aux avions français ?

Pourquoi le Français est-il mal aimé des autres pays ?

Y a-t-il des pays qui aiment les Français?

Pourquoi les Français se sentent-ils les meilleurs en Europe et essaient de dévaloriser les autres pays dès qu'on les compare à la France ?

Pourquoi l'Algérie ne défend pas les Ouïghours ?

Pourquoi l'Algérie interdit l'usage du Français ?

Pour quelle raison principale pensez-vous que la France n'a pas réussi à faire en sorte

Pourquoi le Maroc est-il plus fort que l'Algérie ?

François Legallio Anciennement Toujours la tête dans les corrections 7 mo

Fort en quoi ?

Démographiquement c'est faux, économiquement c'est faux, militairement c'est faux, au niveau éducatif c'est faux. Diplomatiquement l'Algérie est plus influente, je ne vois guère qu'en matière de tourisme que le Maroc est plus "fort" mais cela importe dans la société marocaine des effets indésirables.

Questions similaires

Si une guerre Algérie Maroc éclatait qui gagnerait ?
Pourquoi le Maroc est-il toujours jaloux de l'Algérie ?
Pourquoi les Marocains ne supportent pas les Algériens, qui ont pourtant une culture similaire ?
Pourquoi il n'y a qu'avec l'Algérie que les relations sont souvent tendues alors que la France a occupé d'autres pays ?
Pourquoi l'Algérie ne défend pas les Ouïghours ?
Pourquoi le Maroc, l'Algérie et la Tunisie sont-ils des pays séparés alors qu'ils ont tous un héritage berbère, arabe et français ?
Pourquoi le Maroc ne rompt pas toutes ses relations avec l'Algerie ?
Pourquoi les Marocains n'ont-ils pas de "NIF" contrairement aux Algériens?
Pourquoi les français préfèrent-ils aller en Tunisie ou au Maroc plutôt qu'en Algérie ?
Pourquoi les marocains détestent-ils les

Le Maroc a besoin de quoi pour rattraper les pays européens ?

Jean-Francois Dufour-Poirier 99% poussières d'étoiles 1% magique.1 an Il serait bon, avant toute autre chose, de savoir exactement quels sont les points d'avancements que vous ciblez. Car, si je le dis, c'est que souvent, j'entends dire que l'Occident est en retard sur l'Asie, plus particulièrement, la Chine, ce qui suscite alors la question, nous sommes en retard sur quoi exactement ? Le crédit social ? Est-ce exactement ça que nous désirons en Occident ? Un système qui permettra de discriminer les gens selon leurs antécédents financiers, de santé, et bien d'autres ?

Non, je dois avouer que je n'aime pas la formulation de la question, car pour savoir où nous en sommes, j'ai toujours pensé que c'était face à soi-même qu'il faut se comparer. Alors, si je reformule, ça va ainsi : En quoi le Maroc a t-il changé entre hier (20e siècle) et aujourd'hui (21e siècle), et, qu'en sera-t-il de demain ?

Une question difficile pour maintes raisons, en commençant par les changements mondiaux qui sont en train de s'opérer. Comme, par exemple, le fait que, ni mon père, ni le tient, n'ont jamais eux la chance de communiquer ensemble, comme nous, nous le faisons en ce moment, en passant par l'Internet, mais aussi, la langue française. C'est que nous sommes, en tant qu'espèce, en train de s'ouvrir sur la réalité plurielle de notre monde ; d'un côté, il y a le désir de conserver son identité, et de l'autre, l'envie de faire partie d'un monde sans frontière, sans pays, et, avec une structure de gouvernance mondiale. Et, dans l'ensemble de tous les pays du monde, c'est un peu sur cet échiquier que nous nous retrouvons en ce moment.

Comment le Maroc peut-il continuer à s'ouvrir sur le monde, sans perdre son identité culturel, c'est comme demander, comment les pays européens peuvent-ils demeurer eux-mêmes, tout en devenant l'Union Européenne. Ou encore, comment faire en sorte que les petits commerces puissent survivre, lorsque de grandes chaînes de succursales internationales s'implantent dans un pays ?

Tout ça cache un thème beaucoup plus puissant qui est celui du capitalisme sauvage, alias, Ruthless capitalism, qui, petit à petit, est en train de mettre à mal l'état providence.

Dans un tel contexte, le mieux pour un royaume, c'est d'investir dans son propre patrimoine ; d'utiliser la monnaie de son pays afin de mettre en chantier des projets qui multiplient la valeur de son territoire, et, d'établir de bonnes relations avec ses voisins.

Que cette valeur dont je parle, ne doit pas être calculée de manière entièrement financière, mais aussi, en terme de souveraineté alimentaire, en production d'énergies vertes et pérennes, en taux de littératie, et pourquoi pas, avec des projets porteurs comme celui de reconquérir les terres perdues en raison de la désertification ?

C'est donc dire, Maroc, soi toi-même, selon tes spécificités, tes rêves, ton imaginaire.

Questions similaires

Si une guerre Algérie Maroc éclatait qui gagnerait ?
Pourquoi le Maroc est-il toujours jaloux de l'Algérie ?
Pourquoi les Marocains ne supportent pas les Algériens, qui ont pourtant une culture similaire ?
Pourquoi il n'y a qu'avec l'Algérie que les relations sont souvent tendues alors que la France a occupé d'autres pays ?
Pourquoi l’Algérie ne défend pas les Ouïghours ?
Pourquoi le Maroc, l'Algérie et la Tunisie sont-ils des pays séparés alors qu'ils ont tous un héritage berbère, arabe et français ?
Pourquoi le Maroc ne rompt pas toutes ses relations avec l’Algerie ?
Pourquoi les Marocains n'ont-ils pas de "NIF" contrairement aux Algériens?

Pourquoi les français préfèrent-ils aller en Tunisie ou au Maroc plutôt qu'en Algérie ?
Pourquoi les marocains détestent-ils les Algériens ?

Why is France obsessed with Algeria?

Thierry Baudassé Lived in Lima, Peru (2020–2021)1y

If there is a topic which is not obsessing the French it's Algeria. Algeria was a stupid dream made by some intellectuals like Alexis de Tocqueville in 1830. It didn't work and almost pushed us into a civil war. It's the equivalent of Irak for the USA and if we warned the US that they shouldn't go to Irak it's because we remember the big mistake of colonization of Algeria. At the moment I write the French obsessions are:
where am I going for vacations?

when will I be able to go back to a restaurant, a cinema, etc… "as before"?
For a lot of people: will my firm/job survive the recession we have ahead?

Related Links

Why was Northern Algeria so heavily developed by France compared to other French colonies?

Is it true that the main reason why General de Gaulle gave independence to Algeria is because he was afraid that if Algeria remains French then France would eventually become a Muslim majority country?

Why doesn't Algeria push France to recognize Algerian genocide? Will countries like Morocco, Tunisia, Turkey, Azerbaijan, etc. recognize it as well?

Why did France fight a vicious war In Algeria and killed hundreds of thousands unlike other colonies?

Why did so many Algerians migrate to France after the Algerian War of Independence?

What is the most realistic way for France to have permanently kept Algeria?

Did France commit war crimes in its war against Algerian freedom fighters?

What if France would not have invaded Algeria in 1830?
Is Algeria culturally close with France?
How would modern-day Algeria be if it had remained under French rule?
Why could France not convert Algeria to part of France?
How do the French and the Algerians view the Algerian war?
Why did France fail in Algeria after 132 years?
Was Algeria better off as an integral part of France, or is it better off independent?
Why did France take over Algeria?

Que pensez-vous de l'Algérie (l'équipe nationale d'Algérie) ?
Amphicyon Ingens Suivre Réponse originale : Que pensez vous sur l'Algérie ? 🙄 (L'équipe nationale de l'Algérie) moi j'aime pas l'équipe d'Algérie car quand elle joue contre la France les supporters vivant en France sifflent l'hymne du pays où ils vivent avec des droits et des revenus issus de la redistribution du système français, mais se gardent bien de retourner vivre au bled ! J'aime pas l'équipe d'Algérie parce que quand l'équipe gagne, certains en profitent pour causer des troubles dans les rues. Non la mentalité de nationalistes complexés et agressifs des supporters fait qu'on n'aime pas les Fennechs. Dommage car c'est une bonne équipe.

Questions similaires

François Hollande comme Emmanuel Macron ont reconnu l'injustice et la brutalité de la colonisation française en Algérie. Pourtant, les Algériens semblent toujours attendre plus. Qu'attendent-ils et pourquoi ?

Pourquoi on demande tout le temps à la France de s'excuser envers l'Algérie pour les morts de la Guerre d'Algérie et pas à l'Algérie de s'excuser pour les actes du FLN durant la même période ?

Pensez-vous que Macron doit s'excuser pour la colonisation de l'Algérie, la Tunisie, le Maroc ...?

La France est-elle tenue de remettre ses archives à l'Algérie qui les réclame ? Comment l'Algérie pourrait-elle s'en servir ?

Que pensez-vous des Algériens ?

Combien de personnes ont été tuées lors de la colonisation française de l'Algérie ?

Pourquoi la France a-t-elle colonisé l'Algérie ?

Quelles personnes en France n'ont toujours pas digéré l'indépendance de l'Algérie ?
Quel est le problème profond que l'Algérie a avec la France ?
Pourquoi l'Algérie remet-elle maintenant sur la table la question mémorielle avec la France

Vu le genre de sottise qu'on publie en Algérie, tout esprit critique a-t-il quitté ce malheureux pays ?

Nisrina Delpierre Au bureau 1 an Je vois surtout une certaine passion/haine de votre côté vis à vis de l'Algérie, si on devait commenter toutes les sottises que l'on partage sur les réseaux sociaux.. à mon sens ce genre de publication ne représente en aucun cas notre voisin le peuple algérien, ils sont tout simplement, comme beaucoup de pays du coin, mal dirigé, très mal, et vous le savez plus que moi au vu de vos superbes contribution sur l'Afrique.

Questions similaires

Pourquoi on demande tout le temps à la France de s'excuser envers l'Algérie pour les morts de la Guerre d'Algérie et pas à l'Algérie de s'excuser pour les actes du FLN durant la même période ?
Pourquoi le Maroc, l'Algérie et la Tunisie sont-ils des pays séparés alors qu'ils ont tous un héritage berbère, arabe et français ?
Pourquoi l'Algérie n'a-t-elle pas encore commencé son travail mémoriel contrairement à la France ?
Pourquoi les Algériens sont-ils si fiers de leur pays mais dans le même temps le fuient en masse ?
Où en est le Hirak en Algérie ?
Pourquoi un bon pourcentage des Algériens nés avant l'indépendance (1962) disent que « l'Algérie était beaucoup plus heureuse et prospère du temps de la colonisation française »?
Pourquoi les français préfèrent-ils aller en Tunisie ou au Maroc plutôt qu'en Algérie ?
Que va changer le décès du Général Ahmed Gaïd Salah en Algérie ?
Est-il vrai que le Maroc est plutôt un pays de droite et l'Algérie plutôt un pays de gauche ?
Peut-on visiter l'Algérie ?

Pourquoi Emmanuel Macron a-t-il tenu des propos durs à l'égard de l'Algérie ?

Andréa Mathias Lieu : Paris, France 6 oct.

J'aurais aimé qu'il les tint plus tôt. Il n'aurait pas été aussi facile alors de l'accuser de chasser sur les terres de l'extrême droite. Mais la mauvaise foi ne connaît pas de limite.

Maroc, Tunisie et Algérie ont mis plus que de la mauvaise volonté à recevoir leurs ressortissants expulsés de France pour cause de radicalisation. Le gouvernement français a donc réduit la délivrance de visa. Et le ton est monté. Surtout avec le gouvernement algérien qui n'est absolument pas coupable de chauffer sa population a blanc pour des raisons politiques. Cela se saurait…

Questions similaires

Est-ce que Emmanuel Macron sera réélu en 2022?

Pourquoi l'Algérie est-elle toujours en colère après les propos d'Emmanuel Macron ?

Pourquoi il n'y a qu'avec l'Algérie que les relations sont souvent tendues alors que la France a occupé d'autres pays ?

Emmanuel Macron est-il réellement un si mauvais président ?

En se rendant à la commemoration du massacre du 17 octobre 1961, Emmanuel Macron a-t-il fait un pas vers l'apaisement avec l'Algérie ?

Emmanuel Macron a-t-il de réels adversaires pour l'élection présidentielle de 2022 ?

Pourquoi Emmanuel Macron ne gracie-t-il pas la peine de l'auteur de la gifle ?

Pourquoi Emmanuel Macron « reconnaît » la responsabilité de la France dans l’assassinat d’Ali Boumendjel en Algérie ?

Emmanuel Macron est-il dur avec ses ministres ?

Pourquoi le gifleur de Macron a-t-il crié : "Montjoie ! Saint Denis!" ?

Macron a-t-il raison de s'excuser (encore) envers les harkis, en proposant des indemnités, alors que l'indépendance de l'Algérie date de près de 60 ans et qu'aucun de ses prédécesseurs n'était intervenu ?

Le gouvernement Algérien est-il depuis toujours anti Français et si oui, devrions-nous faire de même avec eux ?

Emmanuel Macron a dit dans un de ses propos <<l'Afrique, c'est le continent de l'avenir>>. De quoi serait-il en train de parler selon vous ?

Est-ce vrai que La France est un «ennemi traditionnel et éternel», déclare un ministre algérien ?

Pourquoi a-t-on arrêté deux personnes dans l'affaire de la gifle à Emmanuel Macron ?

Pourquoi les Marocains ne supportent pas les Algériens, qui ont pourtant une culture similaire ?

Zayneb Vanessa Suivre TPN et TPAmer

C'est une blague, c'est quoi cette question de victime, Mon père est marocain et il m'a jamais mal parlé des algériens, il m'a toujours dit ce sont nos frères etc, mais par contre j'ai déjà vu maintes fois des algériens autour d un repas critiquer les marocains à mort, plusieurs fois, je suis dans une ville où ya énormément d'Algériens et quand je suis invitée quelques part et je précise pas que je suis Marocaine alors la ça tayeh à fond mon pays! (Ça je l'ai jamais vu chez les marocains par contre) et quand je dit que je suis Marocaine d'un coup tout le monde "plaisante".
Moi ta question je la formulerais plutôt autrement: pourquoi les algériens détestent autant les marocains ?!

Je dit ce que j'ai vu et le racisme que j'ai subi des innombrables fois de la part d'algeriens alors que moi mon père m'a élevé en sorte à ce que je respecte et je vois les algériens comme des frères et pas comme des ennemis!

Questions similaires

Pourquoi les français préfèrent-ils aller en Tunisie ou au Maroc plutôt qu’en Algérie ?

Pourquoi les Algériens disent-ils que les Marocains pillent leur culture et volent leur Histoire ?

Pourquoi les Algériens sont-ils si fiers de leur pays mais dans le même temps le fuient en masse ?

Pourquoi le Maroc, l'Algérie et la Tunisie sont-ils des pays séparés alors qu'ils ont tous un héritage berbère, arabe et français ?

Pourquoi Abdelmoumen(calife des Almohades) est-il revendiqué comme Marocain par les Marocains, alors qu'il venait d'une tribu localisée en Algérie actuelle ?

Est-il plus ou moins possible de faire la différence entre un(e) Algérien(ne), un(e) Marocain(e), un(e) Tunisien(ne), sur la base de leurs traits (comme un Espagnol, un Français, un Allemand) ou est-ce impossible ?

Pourquoi les Français regardent les Marocains avec mépris ?
Pourquoi le Maroc est-il plus fort que l'Algérie ?
Que pensez-vous des Algériens ?
Pourquoi les "kabyles" ne se considèrent pas arabes ?

Comment se fait-il que l'Égypte soit un pays membre de l'Organisation internationale de la Francophonie et non l'Algérie?

Remi Beral Lieu : France (1999–aujourd'hui)1 an Je pense que l'Egypte est membre de l'Organisation Internationale de la Francophonie grâce à ses liens très étroits avec la France depuis deux siècles, notamment en égyptologie. Qu'on se rappel Champollion qui déchiffrait les hiéroglyphe, Auguste Mariette qui le premier tenta de protéger le patrimoine égyptien des destructions ottomanes et des pillages européens, Jean-Philippe Lauer, l'immense spécialiste des pyramides qui aura passé 80 ans à étudier l'ancien empire et à qui on doit une grande partie de nos connaissances sur l'évolutions des pyramides et sur leur constitution. On peut noter également la campagne de Napoléon qui a lancé l'égyptologie, Ferdinand de Lesseps qui a construit le canal de Suez, le quartier, les quartiers Haussmanniens du Caire, …

Les touristes français sont parmi les plus nombreux dans le pays et la langue française est très appréciée.

Questions similaires

Qu'est-ce qui empêche des pays comme l'Algérie et le Maroc à se développer ?

Pourquoi l'Arabie Saoudite voulait-elle vraiment intégrer l'Organisation internationale de la francophonie (OIF)?

Comment transporter de l'argent d'un pays à l'autre facilement et légalement ?
Pourquoi l'Algérie n'est pas membre de la Francophonie ?

Pourquoi le Maroc, l'Algérie et la Tunisie sont-ils des pays séparés alors qu'ils ont tous un héritage berbère, arabe et français ?

Pourquoi il n'y a qu'avec l'Algérie que les relations sont souvent tendues alors que la France a occupé d'autres pays ?

Quel est le pays le plus francophone de l'Afrique ?
Est-il vrai que le Maroc est plutôt un pays de droite et l'Algérie plutôt un pays de gauche ?

Les pays occidentaux cesseront-ils de soutenir le régime d'Alger suite aux lourdes et graves accusations soulevées par le président du MAK (Mouvement pour l'Autonomie de la Kabylie) lors de sa conférence de presse d'aujourd'hui ?

Les premiers habitants de l’Égypte étaient-ils des Noirs ?
Peut-on qualifier les pays du Maghreb de pays arabes ?

Pourquoi l'Égypte est-elle généralement considérée comme faisant partie du Moyen-Orient et du monde arabe et non de l'Afrique ?

L’Algérie a décidé de revoir ses relations diplomatiques avec le Maroc, qu’elle accuse d’être impliqué dans les incendies qui ont ravagé le nord de l’Algérie. D'où proviennent ces accusations ?

La France a-t-elle encore son mot à dire sur l'Algérie ?
La France est-elle tenue de remettre ses archives à l'Algérie qui les réclame ?
Comment l'Algérie pourrait-elle s'en servir ?

Les pieds-noirs français d'Algérie ont-ils une cuisine unique à cause d'un mélange des cultures ?

Florence Bacchi A étudié à Lycée Dumont d'Urville Toulon6 mo

La cuisine pieds-noirs est un melting pot gastronomique d'origine maghrébine, juive, espagnole, maltaise et française.

Avant l'indépendance, les communautés musulmanes, juives et chrétiennes échangeaient des recettes de cuisine sur les marchés, entre voisins ou par invitation lors du ramadan, de la pâque juive ou des pâques chrétiennes.

Ces recettes d'un terroir passé vont bientôt se perdre avec les dernières mama pieds-noirs et leur "c'est bon comme là-bas !" ou "mange ma fille, t'es maigre"!

Et puisqu'on peut changer plus que la viande dans le couscous mais aussi les légumes.

Le couscous loubia

A base de haricots blancs, de cumin, de paprika, d'ail et de piment.

Le couscous aux fèves et aux petits pois

Peut se manger sans viande et avec beaucoup de beurre ou d'huile d'olive.

La calentica ou calentita

Du mot espagnol caliente, cette galette à base de farine de pois chiches et de cumin est la grande sœur de la cade nicoise-toulonnaise mais en plus crémeuse et plus épaisse.

La frita

Mélange de légumes mijotés (poivrons tomates), elle se déguste en coca (chausson) ou avec deux œuf cassés dessus.

La salade juive

Tomates, poivrons grillés tricolores, olives noires et un filet d'huile d'olive.

Voilà un petit aperçu de la cuisine pieds-noirs. Ce serait dommage de ne pas la perpétuer, elle a une histoire qui nait sur les marchés d'Alger ou d'Oran où la bonne humeur et la chaleur humaine étaient souvent au rendez-vous.

L'Algérie n'a pas été que du sang et des larmes.

Questions similaires

Pourquoi les français préfèrent-ils aller en Tunisie ou au Maroc plutôt qu'en Algérie ?
Comment était l'Algérie avant d'être française ?
Pourquoi la nourriture en Algérie a meilleur goût que en France ?
Y a-t-il une différence entre la cuisine marocaine et la cuisine algérienne ?
Que pensent les peuples d'Afrique (Maroc, Algérie, Tunisie, etc.) du nord de la France ?
Faut il aussi des excuses de l'Algérie vis à vis des pieds noirs ?
Comment voyez-vous l'Algérie ?
Quel est le meilleur plat en Algérie ?
Question polémique : que préférez-vous le couscous marocain, algérien ou tunisien ?

Quels plats du Maghreb (Maroc, Algérie, Tunisie) sont inconnus en France ?
Quels sont les plats typiquement français (et non régionaux) ?
Et-ce que Batna figure parmi vos villes préférées en Algérie ? Si oui ou non, pourquoi ?

Pourquoi certains français ayant participé à la guerre d'Algérie refusent-ils d'évoquer cette période de leur vie ?

Quels sont les plats traditionnels français oubliés ?
Comment la France est-elle arrivée à déculturer le peuple algérien ?

Pourquoi les Algériens viennent-ils en France s'ils détestent ?

Eugenio Orlandi Mis à jour le 16 janv.

Il y a une relation d'amour et de haine entre les Algériens et la France. Haine d'avoir été soumise et amour pour certains aspects de la civilisation française. C'è que les Algériens n'ont pas compris c'est qu'avec l'indépendance ils ont perdu le contrôle de la France: si les Algériens demandaient le droit de vote au lieu de l'indépendance, étant l'Algérie territoire français métropolitain, sans l'indépendance aujourd'hui la France aurait eu 106 millions d'habitants: 46 millions de musulmans au pouvoir, 40 millions de chrétiens et 20 millions ni musulmans ni chrétiens. La guerre d'indépendance algérienne fut aussi la première guerre de l'indépendance française: la France a perdu la première et a gagné la seconde.

Questions similaires

Pourquoi les Algériens sont-ils si fiers de leur pays mais dans le même temps le fuient en masse ?

Pourquoi il n'y a qu'avec l'Algérie que les relations sont souvent tendues alors que la France a occupé d'autres pays ?

Un Algérien d'un certain âge m'a montré la carte d'identité Française qu'il possédait en 1962, juste avant l'indépendance. Il y était noté "Français musulman". Y avait-il bien un système d'apartheid à l'époque de l'Algérie Française ?

Pourquoi on demande tout le temps à la France de s'excuser envers l'Algérie pour les morts de la Guerre d'Algérie et pas à l'Algérie de s'excuser pour les actes du FLN durant la même période ?

Les gens des pays africains qui parlent français détestent-ils la France et la langue française ?

Les maghrébins sont-ils stigmatisés en France ? Si oui, pourquoi ?

Pourquoi la France ne s'excuse-t-elle pas une bonne fois pour toutes pour la colonisation vis à vis de l'Algérie ?

Pourquoi certains Algériens font n'importe quoi en France ?
Pourquoi beaucoup d'Arabes nés en France se sentent-ils plus arabes que français ?

Pourquoi la France a-t-elle perdu la guerre d'Algérie alors qu'elle a tué beaucoup plus d'Algériens qu'elle n'a subi de pertes ? (Question traduite)

Pourquoi les Arabes détestent l'Algérie ?
Pourquoi Hitler détestait-il les Français ?
Pourquoi les Algériens, au moins ceux en France, parlent si bien le français ?
Que pensez-vous des Algériens ?
Quel est le problème profond que l'Algérie a avec la France ?

Was Algeria a colony of France, or was it an extension of French territory in Africa?

Orlando Barrios · Follow I'm one of the many outcomes of colonialism. It's not that bad, actually. Oct 27

A settlement colony: the original idea was to sent French nationals to Algeria to cement their control, and the territories so settled became Départments of France. The rest of Algeria wasn't departmentalized until 1950. As for the locals, they were supposed to 'evolve' into becoming French.

Que pensez vous de ce qu'il se passe en Algérie ?

Merouane Bennaceur Précédent lieu : Alger, Algérie (2001–2021)2 ans

Il faut tout d'abord connaître le début de l'histoire, donc nous sommes en 1999 c'est plus ou moins la fin de la décennie noire en Algérie, l'ancien président quitte le pouvoir, et le pays a besoin d'un nouveau président. Depuis l'indépendance en 1962 et jusqu'à la 1999 c'etait le FLN (Front de Libération Nationale qui a lutté pour l'indépendance de l'Algérie) et l'Armée nationale qui choisissent le président soit directement soit indirectement comme en 1999 en accordant leur soutien à Abdelaziz Bouteflika, et comme le FLN avait une certaine légitimité à ce moment là, Il a donc été élu au suffrage universel, le mandat présidentiel en Algérie est de 5 ans et on ne peut cumuler que 2 mandats selon la constitution .

Alors après de bon résultats durant le premier quinquennat, il a été élu une seconde fois et à ce moment là il était très populaire, sauf qu'a la fin de son deuxième mandat en 2008 et sous prétexte qu'il avait d'autres réformes encore meilleures à faire passer, il a changé la constitution pour autoriser le cumul illimité de mandats (il rechangea la constitution en 2016 pour revenir à 2 mandats maximum) et à partir de ce moment là, il commença à devenir impopulaire déjà à cause de ça et à cause d'autres problèmes liés à son régime dont la fuite des cerveaux, corruption généralisée, l'octroi des marchés publics aux proches du gouvernement qui se sont enrichis de plus en plus avec l'argent du contribuable etc.

Tout s'aggrava encore plus avec un AVC qu'il a eu en 2013, moment à partir duquel il reste partiellement paralysé jusqu'à aujourd'hui et en fauteuil roulant, mais malgré ça il a entamé un 4ieme mandat en 2014 (et donc il aura cumulé 20 ans de présidence à la fin de ce mois), et donc les Algériens souffraient plus ou moins en silence car généralement dés qu'une personnalité politique ou un journaliste osait s'opposer c'était soit des disparitions bizarres ou des années de prisons pour des motifs imaginaires, et malgré ça les Algériens ont gardé espoir et ont cru que le 4ieme mandat était le dernier, mais contre toute attente et malgré son état de santé il s'est présenté (avec le soutien du FLN et d'une alliance des principaux partis Algériens) donc le peuple a craint qu'il remporte encore une fois les élections soit légalement soit en fraudant, et s'est révolté en dénonçant tous les méfaits de ce régime durant ces 10 dernières années de mal-gérance, et sont sortis depuis le 22 Février dernier et chaque Vendredi depuis en masse pour demander à l'acuel président de ne plus se représenter et ont exigé le départ de tous le gouvernement ainsi que la dissolution de tous ces partis qui nuisent au pays, et ont été d'accord pour garder le FLN avec sa légitimité au musée, sauf que la réponse du gouvernement a été contre toute attente toute autre donc au lieu d'ecouter l'action populaire, ils ont procédé à des remaniements, ont promis comme à leurs habitudes des changements , des référendums pour faire participer le peuple, un grand débat national, et ont prolongé le 4ieme mandat sans donner de date de fin et par la même occasion reporté les élections présidentielles qui devaient avoir lieu le 18 Avril.

Actuellement, toutes ces décisions du gouvernement n'ont que renforcé l'unité du peuple Algérien ainsi le dernier Vendredi même les policiers et CRS en tenue ont refusé de tirer des flashball et autres lacrymogènes etc. sur leurs frères et sœurs pacifistes et ont rejoint les manifestations à travers tous le territoire national, manifestation qui demandent à présent la démission de tous les gouvernement et le maintien des élections présidentielles, l'étau se resserre pour le gouvernement actuel et on attends toujours qu'il répondent favorablement à leur peuple, donc affaire à suivre .

Questions similaires

Pourquoi les français préfèrent-ils aller en Tunisie ou au Maroc plutôt qu'en Algérie ?
Que pensez-vous des Algériens ?
Est-ce que le Maroc va attaquer l'Algérie ?
Pourquoi autant de polémique sur les Algériens ?

Pourquoi un bon pourcentage des Algériens nés avant l'indépendance (1962) disent que « l'Algérie était beaucoup plus heureuse et prospère du temps de la colonisation française »?

L'Algérie est-il un pays sans avenir ?
Les Algériens du Nord-Ouest de l'Algérie sont-ils des Arabes ?
Faut il des excuses de la France envers l'Algérie ?
Dans combien d'années, l'Algérie sera-t-elle capable d'occuper la France ?
Pourquoi l'Algérie n'arrive-t-elle pas à décoller ?

Comment le reste du monde voit-il l'Algérie ?

Anciennement Chef d'entreprise à la retraite 1 an L'Algérie est un pays qui a un potentiel incroyable. Mais, ce potentiel est gâché me semble-t-il par une administration sclérosante et par une démographie hors de contrôle. Loin de moi l'idée de donner des leçons (la France aussi est douée dans l'art de se saborder), mais j'essaie de répondre honnêtement à votre question, tout en affirmant haut et fort que la solution ne peut venir que du peuple algérien !

Questions similaires

Que pensez-vous des Algériens ?
Pourquoi les Arabes détestent l'Algérie ?
Comment était l'Algérie avant d'être française ?
Les États-Unis peuvent-ils envahir l'Algérie ?
Comment voyez-vous l'Algérie ?
Que pensez-vous de l'Algérie ?
Pourquoi certains Algériens font n'importe quoi en France ?
Pourquoi l'Algérie ne devrait jamais être visitée ?

Pourquoi les Algériens sont-ils si fiers de leur pays mais dans le même temps le fuient en masse ?

Pourquoi l'Algérie est-elle hors-jeu en Libye ?

Pourquoi il n'y a qu'avec l'Algérie que les relations sont souvent tendues alors que la France a occupé d'autres pays ?

Pourquoi autant de polémique sur les Algériens ?
Pourquoi le Maroc est-il plus fort que l'Algérie ?
Quels pays aiment l'Algérie ?
Pourquoi les Français étaient-ils si attachés à garder l'Algérie ?

Quels sont les meilleurs business en Algérie ?

Vincent Lieu : Lyon, France 4 ans

Je ne connais pas du tout le marché algérien, mais les meilleurs business sont ceux qui répondent de manière inédite à un besoin existant. Personne ne crée le besoin. Nous répondons à un besoin existant, mal identifié.

Baladez-vous dans les alentours avec un carnet dans votre poche, l'oeil bien ouvert, et observez les gens. Mieux, demandez-leur ce qu'ils veulent. Que manque-t-il côté transport en algérie ? En immobilier ? En livraison ? En nourriture ? En formation ? En conseil aux entreprises ? Choisissez un secteur que vous connaissez déjà (vous ou vos associés) et trouvez ce qui manque aux gens, ce que vous pourrez faire différemment de vos concurrents et des autres.

Première étape d'une création d'entreprise : identifiez un besoin, et parlez des solutions que vous pouvez apporter autour de vous pour récolter des avis.

Bon courage !

Questions similaires

Quel business peut marcher en Algérie ?
Pourquoi les français préfèrent-ils aller en Tunisie ou au Maroc plutôt qu'en Algérie ?
Quels sont les meilleurs business en Algérie ?
L'iptv en Algérie marche t-il bien ? Et quels sont les serveurs intéressants ?
Dans quel domaine peut-on investir en Algérie ?
Où en est le Hirak en Algérie ?
Pourquoi la nourriture en Algérie a meilleur goût que en France ?

Pourquoi les Arabes détestent l'Algérie ?
Que dites -vous sur l'Algérie ?
Pourquoi faut il un visa pour allez en Algérie ?
Pourquoi l'Algérie a-elle un faible taux de tourisme comparé à ses voisins ?
Que pensez-vous de l'Algérie ?
L'Algérie est-il un pays sans avenir ?
Le racisme contre les Algériens noirs est-il une réalité ou un mythe en Algérie ?
Aimez-vous l'Algérie ?

Les Algériens, Marocains et Tunisiens parlent-ils un arabe assez proche pour se comprendre d'un pays à l'autre ?

Imzo Bud Marocain Mis à jour le 1 an

Les Marocains et les Algériens de l'Ouest ont des dialectes extrêmement similaires. Les Tunisiens et les Algériens de l'Est ont eux aussi des dialectes très ressemblant. La Marocains et les Tunisiens se comprennent sans aucun problème (et là je parle d'expérience), j'ai eu plus de mal à comprendre le dialecte des Doukkalas (à quelques centaines de kilomètres de ma ville natale), que celui de Tunis. De plus en règle générale les marocains comprennent sans problèmes les dialectes machriqis.

Si je devais relever une différence entre les deux dialectes, et ça découle de ma propre expérience, les tunisiens arabisent les termes scientifiques alors que les marocains vont soit les garder tels quels, soit utiliser un terme arabe. Les tunisiens disent "al matriss", les marocains disent "la matrice" ou المصفوفة(al masfufa)

Qu'est ce qu'un "pied noir" ?

Jean-Paul Renoir 2 ans A étudié à New York University Stern School of Business (Diplôme obtenu en 1971)

Lorsque l'algérie était constituée de trois départements français, les français d'algérie qui étaient d'origine Européenne, étaient appelés "Pied Noirs". L'expression vient du fait que lorsqu'à la fin du xviiième siècle ils débarquèrent en Algerie colonie francaise, ils portaient des chaussures ou bottines de travail noires. Les locaux qui portaient ou des babouches cuir jaune, ou des sandales cuir et tissues neutres, les avaient nommés ainsi.

Questions similaires

Que signifie « Cheh » ?
Que veut dire D2R ?
Que signifie "et ron et ron petit patapon" ?
Qu’est-ce qu’un “porpoise” en français ?
Qu'appelle-t-on la "fragilité blanche" ?
Qu’est-ce qu’un Français ne pourra jamais comprendre ?
Quelle est la définition d'une "racaille" pour vous ?
Que sont des "gressins" ?
Qu’est-ce qu’un riche ?
Vétérans d’Algérie, avez-vous été vacciné contre la malaria ou le paludisme avant?

Que pensent les Algériens des Français ?

Rtroll FaceY Lieu : Bejaia11 sept.

L'Algérie est devisé entre les les Algériens Francophile(particulièrement dans la capitale les grande ville du littoral ainsi que la Kabylie) et le reste qui est un peu plus conservateur, plus rigoriste dans certains cas ,donc comme chaque pays du monde on a toujours les libéraux ouvert d'esprit qui aiment la diversité des autres cultures, et les conservateurs beaucoup plus réticent a ouvrir leurs cœur au étrangers, maintenant c'est vrai que La France occupe une place importante dans l'histoire de l'Algérie que certain la haïssent mais globalement on a dépassé tout ça, ce n'est que le gouvernement qui continue a utiliser la carte Colonialisme de la France pour faire de la politique.
Questions similaires

Pourquoi les Algériens sont-ils si fiers de leur pays mais dans le même temps le fuient en masse ?

Que pensez-vous des Algériens ?
Pourquoi certains Algériens font n’importe quoi en France ?
Que pensent les Français de la guerre d'Algérie, aujourd'hui ?
Pourquoi autant de polémique sur les Algériens ?
Pourquoi les Algériens, au moins ceux en France, parlent si bien le français ?
Comment était l'Algérie avant d'être française ?
La France a-t-elle encore son mot à dire sur l'Algérie ?
Est-ce que les Algériens peuvent tous lire le français ?
Les français détestent-ils les maghrébins ?
Pourquoi la France n'aime pas l'Algérie ?
Que pensez-vous de l'Algérie ?
Que pensent vraiment les tunisiens des algériens ?

Pourquoi les Français sont surtout plus racistes vers les Algériens ?
Est-il vrai que les Français n'aiment pas parler de la guerre d'Algérie ?

Pourquoi la France passe-t-elle son temps à s'excuser pour l'Algérie, le Rwanda, l'esclavage, Napoléon, etc.?

Didier Ernotte Scénariste 7 mo

Au-delà de la discussion sur les excuses réelles ou supposées du gouvernement français ou de Ségolène Royale en son temps. Revenons à la réalité…S'excuser ?? De quoi ? D'avoir fait comme tout le monde ? Oui, la France a fait des conquêtes, oui elle a colonisé et oui il y a eu de l'esclavage et bien sûr elle se sert en Afrique encore aujourd'hui. Comme TOUTES les grandes civilisations avant elle et après elle. On appelle cela l'histoire et ce n'est pas un roman à l'eau de rose. Alors si la France doit s'excuser, tout le monde doit le faire et à mon avis la France ne sera pas celle qui devra se morigéner le plus. Elle a au moins apporté aussi des bienfaits, ce qui n'est pas dans les moyens de tout le monde.
Ouvrons les dossiers que l'on balance un peu…

Les invasions Almohades au 8e siècle en Espagne et en France arrêtées de justesse par un certain Charles le Martel ? On en parle ? Viol, pillage, guerre. Que nous ont-ils laissé de bons, de brillant ? Rien, nada, que tchi !

La traite des esclaves en Centre Afrique et au Congo du fait des Berbères ça ne compte pas ? Ah non c'est vrai, ils ne sont pas blancs, alors on ne peut pas les critiquer. Faut les comprendre fallait bien qu'ils mangent hein.

Les invasions ottomanes, arrêtées de justesse aux portes de Vienne ? Atrocités habituelles et banales (viol, esclavage, etc.) Heureusement, on les a bien niqué à Lépantes, sinon ils seraient encore les maîtres de la Méditerranée. D'ailleurs faudrait voir à surveiller le nouveau maître de cette brillante civilisation turque notre petit moustachu version Reycep Erdogan. Ses ports sont la porte d'entrée des Chinois en Europe. Le génocide arménien, on en dit un mot ? Non… Dommage.

Les invasions mongoles ? Quand aura-t-on les excuses des descendants de Gengis, de Kubilai, de Temujin ? Le premier du nom aurait tué 20 % des populations sur son passage. Ah non c'est vrai, ils sont Chinois maintenant alors on ne peut rien dire. Laissons les Ouïghours mourir en paix. Silence on tue !

Nos bons amis anglais ? Aahhh là c'est du lourd madame, le dossier indien on l'ouvre ? Quand Chruchill en pleine guerre et même après, laisse crever de faim des millions (pas des milliers) d'Indiens ? Ne parlons même pas du pillage de l'Écosse, de l'Irlande, des tortures, etc. Le « common wealth » la richesse commune ah ah ah. Le « Royaume uni » est une farce tragique, son seul lien ce sont les baïonnettes anglaises. On le voit bien depuis le Brexit.

Et puis on les oublie, mais les gentils Danois et Norvégiens si propres si verts si sociaux ? Leurs ancêtres étaient des sauvages qui ont pillé et ravagé toutes les côtes Européennes pendant deux siècles ! Je parle des Vikings qui font les beaux jours de Netflix. T'es chrétien ? Pan un bon coup de hache.

Bon, je peux continuer encore très très longtemps, la liste est aussi longue que l'humanité elle-même. Et puis une dernière chose très importante…

Les excuses à quoi vont-elles servir ? Je suis désolé madame je ne le ferais plus sniff. Je promets de ne plus exploiter, asservir, piller mes petits camarades, de ne plus les harceler dans la cour de récréation.

Quelle blague ! Encore aujourd'hui, mais de manière plus hypocrite, le monde est un gâteau que tout le monde veut s'arracher. La Russie et l'Ukraine, la Turquie et les ressources gazières en méditerranée, la Chine et son appétit vorace en mer de Chine (appellation illégale). Et les grands vainqueurs toute catégorie, pillage, torture, guerre, bref le pack complet des atrocités « All-In » ce sont nos amis américains. Cela fait 50 ans qu'ils font la police du monde et nous le vende avec un paquet cadeau « Liberté, démocratie et libre marché » qu'ils en soient grandement remerciés.

Questions similaires

Finalement, si l'Algérie était restée française, la France ne serait-elle pas devenu un pays à majorité musulmane ? De manière générale, à quoi ressemblerait la France aujourd'hui si l'Algérie était restée française ?

Pourquoi il n'y a qu'avec l'Algérie que les relations sont souvent tendues alors que la France a occupé d'autres pays ?

Pourquoi la France ne s'excuse-t-elle pas une bonne fois pour toutes pour la colonisation vis à vis de l'Algérie ?

Pourquoi on demande tout le temps à la France de s'excuser envers l'Algérie pour les morts de la Guerre d'Algérie et pas à l'Algérie de s'excuser pour les actes du FLN durant la même période ?

Pourquoi la France ne s'est pas encore excusée pour ses crimes durant la guerre d'Algérie ?

Pourquoi Napoléon Ier est-il si vénéré par les Français malgré le rétablissement de l'esclavage et toutes les atrocités commises par son armée sous ses ordres?

Pourquoi le Vietnam ne s'est-il jamais plaint de la colonisation française contrairement à l'Algérie ?

Les avis divergent énormément . La France est-elle réellement complice du génocide des tutsis au Rwanda ? Quelle est la responsabilité de Mitterrand et surtout celle de Kagame (attentat avion) ?

L'Algérie a-t-elle reconnu les souffrances infligées à l'Europe pour avoir réduit en esclavage plus d'un million d'Européens en 2 siècles ?

Pourquoi la France a-t-elle perdu la guerre d'Algérie alors qu'elle a tué beaucoup plus d'Algériens qu'elle n'a subi de pertes ? (Question traduite)

La France a-t-elle répandu l'analphabétisme en Algérie pendant la colonisation ?

La France doit-elle s'excuser pour son passé colonial, comme le demande l'Algérie ?

Pensez-vous comme certains ont pu le dire que "l'Algérie n'était pas une nation, seule la France a fait du pays une nation" ?

Pourquoi l'Algérie ne s'excuse-t-elle pas auprès de la France pour sa tentative ratée de colonisation? Que se serait-il passé si les Sarrasins n'avaient pas été arrêtés à Poitiers?

La France doit-elle s'excuser perpétuellement pour avoir eu des colonies en Afrique ?

Avez-vous, vous ou une personne de votre famille, subie la guerre en Algérie ? Est-ce vous voudriez bien en témoigner ?

Thierry Arnould Lieu : France (1966–aujourd'hui) 6 mo

Mon père a fait la guerre d'Algérie. Elle est arrivée quand il avait l'âge de faire son service militaire et il a donc du faire un long service militaire en Algérie.

Ayant fait des études de géologie il s'est retrouvé en service de cartographie, pas trop près du front.

Il n'a jamais voulu en parler, mais quand je lui ai demandé pourquoi, il m'a dit qu'il avait vu là-bas les choses les plus affreuses de sa vie (et pourtant il avait vécu une petite partie de la Seconde Guerre mondiale) et qu'il y avait perdu trop d'amis.

Je lui ai demandé qui avait fait des choses affreuses, il m'a répondu que les deux côtés l'avaient fait, mais que du côté français ça n'avait commencé qu'en mesure de rétorsion.

Je n'en sais pas plus.

J'ai conservé quelques diapos des photos qu'il avait faites à cette époque, mais hormis les paysages elles n'étaient pas différentes des photos que j'ai moi-même faites pendant mon service militaire (qui n'était que d'un an).

Questions similaires

Pourquoi on demande tout le temps à la France de s'excuser envers l'Algérie pour les morts de la Guerre d'Algérie et pas à l'Algérie de s'excuser pour les actes du FLN durant la même période ?

Pourquoi la France ne s'est pas encore excusée pour ses crimes durant la guerre d'Algérie ?

Pourquoi il n'y a qu'avec l'Algérie que les relations sont souvent tendues alors que la France a occupé d'autres pays ?

Pourquoi certains français ayant participé à la guerre d'Algérie refusent-ils d'évoquer cette période de leur vie ?

Pourquoi un bon pourcentage des Algériens nés avant l'indépendance (1962) disent que « l'Algérie était beaucoup plus heureuse et prospère du temps de la colonisation française »?

Le rapport sur la guerre France Algérie de Benjamin Stora est-il objectif ou n'a-t-il pour but que de contenter les deux parties ?

La guerre d'Algérie était-elle une guerre civile ?

Pourquoi la France a-t-elle perdu la guerre d'Algérie alors qu'elle a tué beaucoup plus d'Algériens qu'elle n'a subi de pertes ? (Question traduite)

Pourquoi l'Algérie est-elle toujours désavantagée dans les accords bilatéraux (santé, séjour, etc.) avec la France?

Pourquoi la France a-t-elle perdu la guerre d'Algérie ?

Avez-vous, vous ou une personne de votre famille, subi la guerre en Algérie ? Est-ce vous voudriez bien en témoigner ?

Thierry Arnould Lieu : France (1966–aujourd'hui) 6 mo

Mon père a fait la guerre d'Algérie. Elle est arrivée quand il avait l'âge de faire son service militaire et il a donc du faire un long service militaire en Algérie. Ayant fait des études de géologie il s'est retrouvé en service de cartographie, pas trop près du front.

Il n'a jamais voulu en parler, mais quand je lui ai demandé pourquoi, il m'a dit qu'il avait vu là-bas les choses les plus affreuses de sa vie (et pourtant il avait vécu une petite partie de la Seconde Guerre mondiale) et qu'il y avait perdu trop d'amis.

Je lui ai demandé qui avait fait des choses affreuses, il m'a répondu que les deux côtés l'avaient fait, mais que du côté français ça n'avait commencé qu'en mesure de rétorsion.
Je n'en sais pas plus.

J'ai conservé quelques diapos des photos qu'il avait faites à cette époque, mais hormis les paysages elles n'étaient pas différentes des photos que j'ai moi-même faites pendant mon service militaire (qui n'était que d'un an).

Rebecca Delferrière , Urbaniste (2016-présent) Répondu 21 juil. 2021

Mon grand-père a été envoyé en Algérie à ses 18 ans, en 1957. Il parle très peu de cette période de sa vie. Je sais juste qu'il était basé au Fort Fouchet à Tinfouchy, dans le désert du Sahara. Par contre, il a gardé énormément de photos

Son képi, Section administrative spécialisée

Mon grand-père et des autochtones en 1958

En 2018 je me suis rendue en Algérie et j'ai eu l'occasion de discuter avec des personnes qui ont malheureusement connu cette guerre. Leur récit était juste affreux, je ressentais de la gêne de savoir que le pays dans lequel je suis née a autorisé de telles atrocités. Ce qui me chagrine également, c’est qu’un jour toutes les personnes ayant vécu cette guerre ne seront plus là pour la raconter, la mémoire collective s’éteint peu à peu…

48

Questions similaires

Pourquoi on demande tout le temps à la France de s'excuser envers l'Algérie pour les morts de la Guerre d'Algérie et pas à l'Algérie de s'excuser pour les actes du FLN durant la même période ?

Pourquoi la France ne s'est pas encore excusée pour ses crimes durant la guerre d'Algérie ?

Pourquoi il n'y a qu'avec l'Algérie que les relations sont souvent tendues alors que la France a occupé d'autres pays ?

Pourquoi certains français ayant participé à la guerre d'Algérie refusent-ils d'évoquer cette période de leur vie ?

Pourquoi un bon pourcentage des Algériens nés avant l’indépendance (1962) disent que « l'Algérie était beaucoup plus heureuse et prospère du temps de la colonisation française »?

Le rapport sur la guerre France Algérie de Benjamin Stora est-il objectif ou n'a-t-il pour but que de contenter les deux parties ?

La guerre d'Algérie était-elle une guerre civile ?

Pourquoi la France a-t-elle perdu la guerre d'Algérie alors qu'elle a tué beaucoup plus d'Algériens qu'elle n'a subi de pertes ? (Question traduite)

Pourquoi l'Algérie est-elle toujours désavantagée dans les accords bilatéraux (santé, séjour, etc.) avec la France?

Pourquoi la France a-t-elle perdu la guerre d'Algérie ?

Est-ce que la France a été colonisée ?

Pourquoi le Maroc, l'Algérie et la Tunisie sont-ils des pays séparés alors qu'ils ont tous un héritage berbère, arabe et français ?

Nathalie Suivre a plus d'un livre dans son sacdim.

Les marocains sont marqués par la haute montagne tandis que les algériens sont méditerranéens. L'Algérie a vécu sous toutes les républiques françaises (sauf la première) jusqu'à ce que les algériens ont pris les armes contre la France et ont créé une république révolutionnaire. Les marocains en revanche ont pris fait et cause pour leur sultan humilié puis exilé reconduisant leur allégeance ancienne au trône alaouite.

La Tunisie (ou pays de Tunis), qui se dessinera comme tel à l'époque de la domination ottomane, répond à l'ancien territoire de Carthage. La domination française favorisera là aussi l'émergence d'un mouvement nationaliste.

Questions similaires

Pourquoi les français préfèrent-ils aller en Tunisie ou au Maroc plutôt qu'en Algérie ?
Pourquoi les Berbères ressemblent-ils aux Arabes alors que génétiquement il s'agit de 2 populations bien différentes ?
Pourquoi les Berbères ne se rebellent-ils pas contre les musulmans et ne suivent-ils pas leurs anciens modes de vie et croyances ?
Pourquoi préfèrent-ils rester musulmans ?
Pourquoi les Arabes détestent l'Algérie ?
Pourquoi les Français pensent-ils que les Maghrébins sont arabes?
Les Algériens, Marocains et Tunisiens parlent-ils un arabe assez proche pour se comprendre d'un pays à l'autre ?
Les Algériens sont-ils des Arabes ou des Berbères, ou un brassage entre les deux ?
Pourquoi parle-t-on presque toujours de la relation France/Algérie et si peu de la colonisation française en Tunisie et au Maroc ?
Pourquoi les Maghrébins sont-ils également appelés des Arabes ?
Pourquoi Abdelmoumen (calife des Almohades) est-il revendiqué comme?

Pourquoi les Algériens, au moins ceux en France, parlent si bien le français ?

Alexandre Roswilo

Précédent lieu : Afrique (1975–2019)2 ans

C'est des préjugés .

[1]

Il est important de comprendre comme c'est le cas avec l'anglais qu'il y'a des français et non un français .

[2]

Exemple pratique :

Demandez à un Français ce que sait qu'un maquis . Puis demandez à un Ivoirien . Vous serez surpris .

[3]

Les Burkinabés vous parlerons eux dans un contexte précis de Tchapalodrome :

[4]

Un Camerounais dira : "Je suis une élite dans ce village " . Un Français lui dira : "je fais partie de l'élite de ce village ".

[5] (L'élite du village !)

Un Congoloais de Brazza ou de RDC dira : "je suis sapé comme un mannequin " . Un Français dira par contre : "je suis très élégant".

[6]

Les Belges ;

♥ Français ♥	♥ Belge ♥
Soixante-dix	Septante
Quatre-vingt-dix	Nonante
Blanco	Tip-ex
Endive	Chicon
Sucre glace	Sucre impalpable
Scotch	Papier collant
Serviette	Essuie
Poignée	Clinche
Combiné	Cornet
Déchèterie	Parc à conteneur
Polaire	Polar
Semaine banalisée	Blocus
Terminale	Rhéto(rique)
Maire	Bourgmestre
Téléphone portable	GSM
Message/texto	SMS
Stylo-bille	Bic
Avoir du mal	Avoir dur (« J'ai dur… »)
Ne pas avoir du mal	Avoir facile (« J'ai facile… »)
Sopalin	Essuie-tout
Frigidaire	Frigo
Espiègle	Arsouille
Bavarder	Babeler
Bas/collant	Bas-collant
Petite bête (ou araignée)	Bibiche
Gâteau (sec)	Biscuit
Briller	Blinquer
Ventre/nombril	Boudine/Boutroule
Mauvaises herbes	Cruaux
Boucles (cheveux)	Crolles
Orthophoniste	Logopède
Tissu pour la vaisselle	Lavette
Non	Nenni !
Nettoyer	Reloqueter

[7]

Pour les Canadiens :

Mot québécois	Équivalent en Europe
Être plein ou être bourré	Avoir trop mangé
Fesser	Frapper
Flos	Gosses (enfants)
Frais chié	Prétentieux
Froque	Manteau
(Avoir le) Goût (de)	Avoir envie
Innocent	Imbécile
Jaser	Parler, discuter
Niaiser	Se moquer de
Party	Fête
Pentoute	Pas du tout
Peinturer	Peindre
Présentement	Actuellement, en ce moment
Quessé	Qu'est-ce que
Sacoche	Sac à main pour femmes
Secousse	Durée indéterminée
Stationnement	Parking
Tsé	Tu sais

2

[8]

Québécois	Français
Tabernak	Putin, fais chier
Plotte	Prostitué
Je m'en calice	Je m'en fous
Viarge	Vierge
Dans le fond	En gros
Brisé	Cassé
Une pièce	Un dollars
Sacrer	Jurer
Chum	Mec
Blonde	Petite copine
Laite	Moche
Fif	Gai
Niaiseux	Imbécile
Tanto	Avant ou après
Gosse	Couilles
Breuvage	Boisson
Ca va tu ?	Est-ce que ca va ?

[9]

Les peuples ne parlent pas le français de la même manière . Chaque peuple à ses expressions que les autres ne comprennent pas ou mal et c'est ça qui fait sa particularité mieux son français .

Il existe un anglais américain autant qu'un anglais britannique , indien ou nigérian avec des expressions ou locutions propres à chacun .

American vs. British Grammatical Differences

take a vacation	↔	go on holiday go downtown	↔	visit a city centre
take a bath	↔	have a bath
raise a child	↔	bring up a child
I demanded that he apologize.	↔	I demanded that he should apologise.
We insisted that something be done about the problem.	↔	We insisted that something should be done about the problem.
in the hospital	↔	in hospital
Sam just went home.	↔	Sam's just gone home.

ESLBUZZ

[10]

C'est le cas avec le français avec les dérivées belge , canadien , sénégalais, ivoirien , congolais , camerounais , tunisien et d'autres .

Vouloir parler le français comme un Français ne signifie pas bien le parler . Mieux le parler comme un Canadien ou un Congolais ne veut pas dire qu'on le parle mal .

Notes de bas de page
[1] Image on institutfrancais-suede.com
[2] Image on radiofrance.fr
[3] Image on pinimg.com
[4] Image on wordpress.com
[5] Image on quoracdn.net
[6] Image on arte.tv
[7] Image on blogspot.com
[8] Image on pinimg.com
[9] Image on blogspot.com
[10] Image on pinimg.com

Comment les Carthaginois ont-ils fait pour que leurs éléphants soient si agressifs ? How did the Carthaginians get the elephants to be so aggressive?

Jerome Cohen
Un ami des animaux depuis toujours, de toutes espèces.Traducteur · 30 août

Nathaniel Rice Bi, animal researcher Cette réponse peut ne pas être une traduction fidèle de la réponse de Nathaniel Rice dans Quora en anglais :

Maltraitance animale. Vraiment.
Ça et le fait que les éléphants de guerre de Carthage étaient aussi agressifs que les autres.

Bon, les éléphants ne sont pas les animaux les plus gentils de la planète. En fait, ce sont des cons. Les éléphants foncent sur tout ce qu'ils considèrent comme une menace et le font avec une force incroyable. C'est pourquoi les éléphants de guerre étaient (initialement) attractifs pour des dirigeants comme Alexandre le Grand et c'est pourquoi les gens ont commencé à les utiliser.

Donc, pour commencer, les éléphants sont des murs massifs de destruction qui ont des problèmes de gestion de la colère. Des forteresses ambulantes. Ils étaient des tanks avant que les tanks soient cool.

Et comme si les éléphants captifs d'aujourd'hui n'étaient pas déjà maltraités (dans la plupart des cas), ils l'étaient encore plus dans l'Antiquité.

Les mahouts (les conducteurs d'éléphants) de l'Antiquité étaient armés d'un assortiment de perches et de crochets pointus pour "diriger" (aiguillonner) les éléphants.

En plus de ces coups désagréables, certains éléphants de guerre (pas tous) étaient équipés de howdahs, de grandes selles à toit qui offraient un abri et une position avantageuse pour les archers ou les lanciers. Des études montrent que les éléphants, aussi forts soient-ils, ne peuvent pas porter ces selles sans être blessés.

Quel est le rapport entre ce discours sur le bien-être des animaux et l'agressivité des éléphants de guerre de Carthage ?

Eh bien, les éléphants ne sont pas idiots. Il est clair que les éléphants de guerre n'étaient pas très bien traités dans l'Antiquité. Et quand les animaux ne sont pas bien traités, ils développent des problèmes émotionnels et se déchaînent - surtout les animaux très intelligents comme les éléphants. C'est pourquoi on entend tant d'histoires horribles d'animaux de cirque qui tuent des artistes.

Alors, quand on prend un animal déjà capricieux, qu'on lui met une énorme selle lourde qu'il peut à peine supporter, qu'on ne s'en occupe pas correctement, qu'on l'aiguillonne avec des bâtons et qu'on le plante quand il n'obéit pas, c'est la recette pour un cauchemar enragé, furieux et traumatisé.

Hannibal et les autres utilisateurs d'éléphants dirigeaient simplement cette rage abusive vers leurs ennemis.

Je veux dire, il vaut mieux que les soldats de votre ennemi finissent en brochette sur les défenses de l'éléphant que les vôtres.

Questions similaires

Qu'arrivait-il aux légionnaires romains qui étaient vaincus au combat mais qui survivaient ? Y avait-il un reproche ou une sanction publique ?

Est-il impossible qu'il y eut des légionnaires romains voire des centurions noirs ?

Est-ce qu'on a retrouvé les restes des éléphants avec lesquels Hannibal a traversé les Alpes ?

Pourquoi le falx des Daces fut-il si dévastateur contre les légionnaires romains ?

Comment les Romains ont-ils entraîné des éléphants de guerre ?

Comment les éléphants d’Hannibal ont-ils survécu à la traversée des Alpes ?

Pourquoi les Romains combattaient-ils des lions ?

Pourquoi est-il inhumain de monter à dos d'éléphant mais pas à cheval alors que les éléphants sont beaucoup plus forts que les chevaux ?

Puisque les Romains ont utilisé des unités auxiliaires de nombreuses cultures, pourquoi n'ont-ils pas gardé des unités grecques de Phalange comme auxiliaires ? Il n'y a sûrement rien qui puisse les battre de front sur un terrain plat.

Les éléphants de guerre avaient-ils des noms ?

Pourquoi les Maghrébins sont-ils également appelés des Arabes ?

Samir سمير Farid فريد Lieu : Maroc (1977–aujourd'hui) 2 ans

Réponse originale : Pourquoi les maghrébins sont-ils également appelés des arabes ?
Je comprends pas l'idée derrière cet acharnement identitaire, et je n'y vois aucune utilité pour améliorer le quotidien des maghrébins qui souffrent de tout sauf d'une pseudo persécution des peuples non arabes.

Il ya quelques jours, j'ai lu une réponse d''un Quoran prétendant être d'origine franco-Kabyle, qui prétend que les arabes n'ont rien apporté à l'humanité, ni même à l'islam, dans sa prose, on lit que les arabes ne sont que des caravaniers bédouins pilleurs, et que les perses, les turcs et les amazighs sont les seuls à avoir apporté du bien au monde arabo_musulman, oubliant que l'âge d'or de ce monde était l'œuvre du concours de toutes les composantes de ce monde, de la péninsule ibérique jusqu'aux frontières de la Chine, des terres où tous se considéraient comme étant une communauté de croyants.

Au Maghreb, nos vrais problèmes sont à chercher dans la misère politique et la corruption, et pas dans une adolescence identittaire. Suivre Samir سمير Farid فر فري

Questions similaires

Pourquoi les Berbères ressemblent-ils aux Arabes alors que génétiquement il s'agit de 2 populations bien différentes ?
Pourquoi les Arabes du Levant se considèrent-ils « plus arabes » que les Maghrébins ?
Si vous êtes nord-africain/maghrébin : considérez-vous que vous êtes arabe ou amazigh/berbère ?
Pourquoi ceux qu’on appelle des Maghrébins s'appellent ainsi tout en sachant qu'ils sont sur le continent africain ?

Pourquoi les gens avec des origines étrangères ont-ils des prénoms français sauf les maghrébins ?
Pourquoi le Maroc, l'Algérie et la Tunisie sont-ils des pays séparés alors qu'ils ont tous un héritage berbère, arabe et français ?
Pourquoi beaucoup d'Arabes nés en France se sentent-ils plus arabes que français ?
Est-ce que les Berbères sont d'origine arabe ?
Quel est la différence entre arabe et maghrebin ?
Pourquoi les femmes maghrébines rejettent les hommes maghrébins ? Pourquoi elles préfèrent se métisser, et pourquoi il est de plus en plus rare de voir des couples maghrébins ?
Pourquoi les Arabes préfèrent migrer vers les pays occidentaux plutôt que les pays arabes riches ?
Pourquoi les arabes détestent-ils les chiens ?
Pourquoi les "kabyles" ne se considèrent pas arabes ?
Qui étaient les Berbères, qui vivaient dans le Nord de l'Afrique, bien avant que les arabes arrivent ?
Pourquoi les Arabes ne forment-ils pas une vraie "Union Arabe" (pas la Ligue Arabe) sur le modèle de l'Union Européenne sachant qu'ils sont culturellement et linguistiquement plus homogènes

Que se passerait-il si l'Axe gagnait en Afrique du Nord avant l'opération Barbarossa ?

Zilin Wang A étudié à University de l'Illinois à Urbana-Champaign7 mo

Comme la majeure partie des forces armées de l'Axe était en Europe pour se préparer à la guerre contre l'Union soviétique, l'opération Barbarossa et une grande partie du front de l'Est seraient à peu près les mêmes. La principale différence est que l'Axe a capturé le canal de Suez, le lien entre le Royaume-Uni et ses colonies en Inde et en Asie du Sud-Est. Cela renforcerait la perception du Japon impérial que l'Empire britannique était vulnérable. Ainsi, la guerre contre les colonies européennes en Asie du Sud-Est par le Japon impérial aurait pu commencer plus tôt.

La principale différence dans l'opération Barbarossa pour l'Union soviétique était le prêt-bail américain, la moitié de l'aide qui allait de l'Alaska à l'Extrême-Orient, à une époque où le Japon impérial et l'Union soviétique avaient conclu un pacte de non-agression. En obligeant le Japon impérial à rompre le pacte de non-agression, l'Axe pourrait avoir une chance de couper cette aide.

Bien que l'Axe ait occupé la Norvège et rendu risquée la route arctique des États-Unis à l'Union soviétique, seulement 7 % des expéditions ont été perdues.

Si les sous-marins étaient plus agressifs dans cette zone, cela aurait un impact énorme sur le déroulement de l'opération Barbarossa.

La troisième option pour l'Axe est que l'Iran devienne un membre à part entière de l'Axe et attaque le Caucase et l'Asie centrale, détournant les forces soviétiques des principaux théâtres de l'opération Barbarossa. Malheureusement, le partage d'une frontière avec l'Inde contrôlée par les Britanniques (aujourd'hui le Pakistan) l'a rendu vulnérable aux attaques de deux armées alliées. De plus, les troupes de l'Axe dans le Sinaï devraient combattre à travers la Palestine, la Transjordanie sous contrôle britannique et mettre l'Irak aux côtés de l'Axe pour fournir une assistance à l'Iran. Comme le montre la situation au Moyen-Orient aujourd'hui, cela serait rendu difficile par la situation politique très complexe de la région.

La plus grande différence que l'Axe puisse faire est que Mussolini abandonne son rêve d'un Nouvel Empire romain, ce qui était difficile à faire compte tenu de sa personnalité et de l'attrait de l'idée pour ses partisans. Cette idée a aliéné de nombreuses personnes en Égypte qui considéraient les Italiens non comme des libérateurs de l'influence britannique, mais comme remplaçant un suzerain colonial par un autre. Si l'Axe avait promis la libération de la domination coloniale britannique et française, il ne serait pas difficile de recruter des habitants pour soutenir l'Axe. Francisco Franco avait mené avec succès une stratégie similaire avec le Maroc espagnol, en présentant la République espagnole comme une institution antireligieuse.

Pour Hitler, c'est la réticence de l'Allemagne nazie à compromettre son idéologie qui a finalement conduit à la défaite de l'opération Barbarossa. Si l'Axe avait promis aux Ukrainiens et à d'autres groupes de l'Union soviétique leurs propres États indépendants, ils auraient pu être accueillis comme des libérateurs remplaçant plutôt la domination soviétique par la leur. De nombreux Russes anticommunistes qui voulaient un gouvernement post-stalinien en Russie se sont finalement rangés du côté de l'Union soviétique en raison de la politique génocidaire d'Hitler et de ses plans pour faire de la Russie une partie du Grand Reich allemand.

Questions similaires

Que se passerait-il si la Terre s'arrêtait brutalement de tourner pendant 42 secondes ?
S'il n'y avait pas eu d'hiver, comment cela aurait-il affecté l'opération Barbarossa ?
Compte tenu du succès de l'invasion initiale de l'Union soviétique et si Hitler avait laissé ses généraux assumer entièrement la stratégie et la tactique, à quel point les Allemands étaient-ils proches de la victoire ?

Pourquoi le troisième Reich n'a-t-il pas pris au sérieux la campagne militaire en Afrique du Nord ?
Qu'est-ce qui aurait pu se passer différemment si les nazis n'avaient pas engagé de ressources militaires en Afrique du Nord ?
Pourquoi Rommel a-t-il perdu en Afrique du Nord ?
Si Léopold III de Belgique ne s'était pas rendu à l'Allemagne en 1940, cela aurait-il changé le cours de la Seconde Guerre mondiale ?
Si les Français avaient continué à se battre pendant la guerre en 1940 et s'ils s'étaient repositionnés en Afrique du Nord, est-ce que les Allemands auraient pu organiser une invasion réussie de l'Afrique du Nord française ?
Si les Soviétiques avaient décidé de pousser les Alliés hors de l'Europe occidentale à la fin de la Seconde Guerre mondiale, auraient-ils pu le faire ?
Si Hitler avait été tué par les membres du complot Valkyrie, la fin de la Guerre aurait-

Le français est-il de fait une langue nationale en Algérie?

Samir Berkani Anciennement Errant dans la Cité 5 janv.

Le Français devrait être reconnu comme une langue nationale au même titre que l'Arabe et le Berbère.Loin d'une quelconque posture idéologique faisant de cette langue un banal héritage colonial, cette langue a permis un tant soit peu à l'élite algérienne de se former et a ouvert l'accès à la civilisation occidentale en ayant connu elle-même une évolution historique qui a accompagné le développement des sciences dures et des sciences humaines en France.Alors pourquoi nous priver des apports de cette langue d'autant plus que la linguistique et les sciences de la communication sont suffisamment développées en France (sémantique dont le pionnier est De Saussure lui-même Français pour n'en citer que lui!!!)

Questions similaires

Pourquoi il n'y a qu'avec l'Algérie que les relations sont souvent tendues alors que la France a occupé d'autres pays ?
En tant que français quelles sont les erreurs que l'on fait en parlant l'anglais de calquage de schéma grammaticaux de notre langue sur la langue anglaise ?
Les gens des pays africains qui parlent français détestent-ils la France et la langue française ?
Pourquoi les français préfèrent-ils aller en Tunisie ou au Maroc plutôt qu'en Algérie ?
Pourquoi certains Algériens font n'importe quoi en France ?
Est-il possible à l'avenir que l'arabe soit une deuxième langue officielle en France ?

Pourquoi le français est la plus belle langue du monde ?
Pourquoi les Arabes détestent l'Algérie ?
Pourquoi le français est-il une langue latine, alors que les Gaulois sont celtes et les Francs sont germaniques ?
Pourquoi les Algériens, au moins ceux en France, parlent si bien le français ?

Française en Tunisie et au Maroc
Pourquoi parle-t-on presque toujours de la relation France/Algérie et si peu de la colonisation française en Tunisie et au Maroc ?

Pierre Boutin A travaillé à Armée du Salut (2012–2015) 4 ans

N'étant pas historien, je te ferai une reponse très sommaire, et, j'espère, pas trop inexacte: Parce que l'Algérie, contrairement au Maroc et à la Tunisie, a été une colonie de peuplement. Des générations et des générations de Pieds-Noirs ont vécu sur son territoire pendant plus d'un siècle (grosso modo depuis la mi-XIXème jusqu'à la mi-XXème).

Parce que la décolonisation a donné lieu à une guerre catastrophique, avec son lot d'horreurs et d'exactions, sur lesquelles, côté francais, on se contente bien souvent de jeter un voile pudique.

Parce qu'elle est liée à d'importants mouvements de populations : pendant et immédiatement après la guerre, un retour massif et précipité des Pieds-Noirs en Europe d'une part, puis une émigration économique de travailleurs algériens d'autre part.

Parce qu'à l'ère postcoloniale, et jusqu'à aujourd'hui, 55 ans après l'Indépendance, le traumatisme n'a pas été encore été tout-à-fait surmonté, tous les enseignements historiques n'ont pas encore été tirés.

Parce qu'aussi, plus simplement, l'Algérie reste plus importante, en termes de superficie et de population, que ne le sont le Maroc et la Tunisie!

Questions similaires

Pendant la colonisation en Algérie, est-il vrai que la France a octroyé la nationalité française aux indigènes juifs, mais pas au peuple musulman ? Si oui, pourquoi?

Pourquoi les français préfèrent-ils aller en Tunisie ou au Maroc plutôt qu'en Algérie ?

Avant la colonisation française en 1830, l'Algérie (ou les territoires qui la formaient) avait-elle déjà été longuement sous domination étrangère ? Pourquoi le Maroc, l'Algérie et la Tunisie sont-ils des pays séparés alors qu'ils ont tous un héritage berbère, arabe et français ?

Un Algérien d'un certain âge m'a montré la carte d'identité Française qu'il possédait en 1962, juste avant l'indépendance. Il y était noté "Français musulman". Y avait-il bien un système d'apartheid à l'époque de l'Algérie Française ?

Pourquoi la France ne s'excuse-t-elle pas une bonne fois pour toutes pour la colonisation vis à vis de l'Algérie ?

Pourquoi il n'y a qu'avec l'Algérie que les relations sont souvent tendues alors que la France a occupé d'autres pays ?

La France est-elle prospère à cause de la colonisation ? Si la colonisation n'avait jamais eu lieu, comment se présenterait la France ?

La France a-t-elle répandu l'analphabétisme en Algérie pendant la colonisation ?

Pourquoi l'Algérie ne s'excuse-t-elle pas auprès de la France pour sa tentative ratée de Pourquoi les pays magrébins refusent-ils de reprendre leurs ressortissants entrés clandestinement sur le territoire français ?

Chri Chri Précédent lieu : Afrique centrale (2007–2015)12 nov.

Je me lance (mais il y a une réponse de Mina Daoud très complète et fouillée), ils sont tout simplement trop nombreux car il y a trop de naissances et c'est un problème civilisationnel. Il faudrait réguler les naissances, comme l'a fait la Chine. Il y avait 6 à 7 enfants par femme dans les années 1950 et Mao encourageait la natalité car il imaginait une guerre contre la grande Russie. Mais quand ils ont compris qu'ils ne pouvaient pas sortir du tiers monde avec 6 enfants par femme, ils ont pris des mesures strictes (récemment assouplies). Il faut quand même noter que malgré la possibilité d'avoir 2 enfants, le retour en arrière est compliqué, une femme chinoise ne veut pas de second enfant (j'en sais quelque chose) car on a conditionné les Chinois, on leur a par exemple dit qu'un étudiant coûtait cher (ce qui est vrai) et il n'y a aucune aide sociale, faire des enfants dans le but de toucher un RSA ou gagner des points de retraite, ce n'est même pas imaginable! Les PMA (pays moins avancés, à ne pas confondre avec les pays en voie de développement qui ont un PIB par habitant inférieur à la moyenne mondiale mais rattrapent leur retard) doivent absolument réguler les naissances! D'ailleurs, Macron, fraîchement élu en juillet 2017, avait déjà compris le problème et déclaré ceci : le « défi de l'Afrique est différent (des pays européens au sortir de la guerre), il est beaucoup plus profond, il est civilisationnel ». Et de conclure : « Quand des pays ont encore sept à huit enfants par femme, vous pouvez décider d'y dépenser des milliards d'euros, vous ne stabiliserez rien. » Ça calme, hein? Les gauchos l'ont bien sûr traité de raciste et il est devenu un modèle de bien-pensance!

Mais comment fait-on moins de bébés? On aide les femmes qui ont un bébé et on supprime les aides au-delà du premier enfant, y compris pour le premier. Quand la mesure est passée en Chine, il y a bien sûr eu une période de flou. Mon épouse est née en 1980, ses parents ne l'ont pas déclarée car elle était le second enfant. Elle n'a donc pas de luku, elle n'a pas d'existence administrative. Ils l'ont finalement déclaré dans une autre province et elle doit s'y rendre chaque fois qu'elle a besoin de papiers. C'est tellement compliqué qu'ils se sont arrêtés à deux et leurs deux filles n'ont qu'un enfant. Il faut donc donner des milliards à l'Afrique pour inciter les femmes à avoir un enfant et un seul. La femme africaine qui touche 150€ par mois est très heureuse mais si elle a un second enfant et qu'on lui supprime ces 150€, très vite elle va arrêter d'en faire! Parallèlement à cela, il faut accompagner cette mesure par une communication pour ces populations: faites un seul enfant, l'état ne pourra pas les nourrir! Et il faut pousser l'éducation des femmes! Une femme diplômée et exerçant un métier fait moins d'enfants!

Or ça, c'est un vrai problème dans les pays musulmans où les femmes ne jouissent pas des mêmes libertés que les hommes! Il y a donc un programme mondial pour l'éducation des femmes (et même un prix UNESCO depuis 2016) mais il donne peu de résultats à ce jour… En Afrique, l'île Maurice a réussi, les femmes sont très actives, n'ont pas d'enfants, plus aucune immigration mauricienne en Europe, le solde migratoire doit même être négatif…

Il faut aussi se demander pourquoi les Africaines font des enfants? D'une part, un enfant meurt plus facilement en Afrique qu'en Europe, ne serait-ce qu'à cause du palu (et on est en train de découvrir un vaccin donc la démographie va exploser). D'autre part, les enfants sont la caisse de retraite. Quand vous arrêtez de travailler, l'état ne vous donne rien. Si vous avez eu 8 enfants, même s'ils donnent chacun l'équivalent de 30€, vous pouvez vivre normalement.

Questions similaires

Pourquoi il n'y a qu'avec l'Algérie que les relations sont souvent tendues alors que la France a occupé d'autres pays ?

La France a-t-elle raison de réduire de 50% le nombre de visas accordés aux ressortissants du Maghreb, à cause de leur refus de reprendre leurs ressortissants expulsés ?

Pour quelles raisons Macron vient-il d'annoncer que la France allait réduire drastiquement le nombre de visas accordés au Maroc, à l'Algérie et à la Tunisie ?

Le gouvernement algérien a-t-il atteint le sommet de l'imbécillité en interdisant le survol de son territoire aux avions français ?

Pourquoi le Français est-il mal aimé des autres pays ?
Y a-t-il des pays qui aiment les Français?

Pourquoi les Français se sentent-ils les meilleurs en Europe et essaient de dévaloriser les autres pays dès qu'on les compare à la France ?

Pourquoi l'Algérie ne défend pas les Ouïghours ?
Pourquoi l'Algérie interdit l'usage du Français ?
Pour quelle raison principale pensez-vous que la France n'a pas réussi à faire en sorte

Pour quelles raisons Macron vient-il d'annoncer que la France allait réduire drastiquement le nombre de visas accordés au Maroc, à l'Algérie et à la Tunisie ?

Eddy Leclerc Chef de projet informatique 28 sept.

J'ai lu les 3 première réponses, elles parlent de politique politicienne. Vous n'avez donc pas votre réponse.

En fait, depuis quelques mois (plus de 12) déjà, le ministre de l'intérieur Français s'est déplacé dans ces pays (Maroc, Algérie et Tunisie) afin de discuter avec eux de leurs ressortissants présents sur le territoire français sans droit, ni titre. Il semblerait qu'ils aient refusés d'accepter leurs retours (pas de fourniture de laisser passer). Les statistiques font que moins de 1% des personnes qui devraient être reconduites dans ces pays le sont effectivement. Les 99% autres n'ont pas eu l'honneur d'avoir ce document. La France ne peut donc pas renvoyer ces personnes dans leurs pays (règles internationales).

Cherchant à trouver un moyen de forcer la main, il a été trouvé cette méthode. Pour les 6 mois prochains Visas limité à 50% pour ressortissants du Maroc et de la Tunisie, 30% pour Algérie. Sur la base des chiffres des 6 derniers mois.

Lié aux élections ou pas, est un autre sujet.

Questions similaires

La France a-t-elle raison de réduire de 50% le nombre de visas accordés aux ressortissants du Maghreb, à cause de leur refus de reprendre leurs ressortissants expulsés ?

Pourquoi les français préfèrent-ils aller en Tunisie ou au Maroc plutôt qu'en Algérie ?

Pourquoi les pays magrébins refusent-ils de reprendre leurs ressortissants entrés clandestinement sur le territoire français ?

Pourquoi le Maroc, l'Algérie et la Tunisie sont-ils des pays séparés alors qu'ils ont tous un héritage berbère, arabe et français ?

Il me semble que la France et l'Allemagne ont des liens plus forts que les Français et les Britanniques ; la France a-t-elle oublié son histoire ?

Pourquoi la France a-t-elle colonisé l'Algérie ?
Pour quelle raison la France durcit-elle l'octroi de visas pour les Tunisiens, Algériens et Marocains ?
La France a décidé de diminuer les visas pour l'Algérie et le Maroc, quelles conséquences ?
Pensez-vous que Macron doit s'excuser pour la colonisation de l'Algérie, la Tunisie, le Maroc ...?
Est-il vrai que le gouvernement Algérien, comme l'en accuse le gouvernement Français, Acceptez-vous mon invitation de visiter la Tunisie ? Si non, pourquoi ?

Patrice Blanchard Suivre 45 ans de découverte du monde.ven.

Réponse originale : Acceptez vous mon invitation de visiter la Tunisie ? Si non, pourquoi ?

Merci pour la D2R Mohamed

Je n'accepterais pas d'aller en Tunisie même sur invitation pour les raisons suivantes:

J'ai déjà visité la Tunisie. Oh je suis allé à Djerba et à Tozeur, ce n'est pas vraiment la Tunisie mais comme j'ai déjà eu l'occasion d'aller dans d'autres pays d'Afrique du Nord, et que j'aime être surpris, je ne pense pas que je le serais assez pour voir le reste du pays.

J'aime voir le monde et découvrir des nouvelles choses, il est donc probable que j'irais dans un pays qui me fera découvrir de nouvelles choses.

Ou du moins dans un pays où j'ai encore beaucoup de choses à découvrir.

Le Rajhastan?

Le monde est tellement grand.

Questions similaires

Pourquoi le Maroc, l'Algérie et la Tunisie sont-ils des pays séparés alors qu'ils ont tous un héritage berbère, arabe et français ?

Pourquoi les français préfèrent-ils aller en Tunisie ou au Maroc plutôt qu'en Algérie ?

Que ne doit-on absolument pas faire au Maroc ?
Que pensez-vous de la Tunisie ou des tunisiens en particulier ?

Pourquoi les gens avec des origines étrangères ont-ils des prénoms français sauf les maghrébins ?

À quoi joue le Maroc en soutenant le Mouvement pour l'autodétermination de la Kabylie ?

Vous qui avez vécu en Tunisie, vous recommandait-on de ne jamais tourner le dos à un musulman ?

Les pays occidentaux cesseront-ils de soutenir le régime d'Alger suite aux lourdes et graves accusations soulevées par le président du MAK (Mouvement pour l'Autonomie de la Kabylie) lors de sa conférence de presse d'aujourd'hui ?

Que pensent vraiment les tunisiens des algériens ?

Si vous pouviez voyager dans le temps, quelle ancienne merveille du monde aimeriez-vous visiter ? Pourquoi ?

Quel est l'avenir de la Tunisie après 10 ans ?
Pourquoi doit-on visiter la Tunisie ?

Que se passerait-il si le Maroc, l'Algérie et la Tunisie devenaient un seul pays ?

Qu'est-ce qu'on ne voit qu'au Maghreb et pas ailleurs ?

Est-il possible de voyager en Tunisie, compte tenu des conditions sanitaires qui se dégradent les tours opératrices, peuvent-elles suspendre les voyages via la Tunisie ? Les vols peuvent-ils être suspendus dans les semaines ?

Les Algériens, Marocains et Tunisiens parlent-ils un arabe assez proche pour se comprendre d'un pays à l'autre ?

Imzo Bud MarocainMis à jour le 1 an

Les Marocains et les Algériens de l'Ouest ont des dialectes extrêmement similaires. Les Tunisiens et les Algériens de l'Est ont eux aussi des dialectes très ressemblant. La Marocains et les Tunisiens se comprennent sans aucun problème (et là je parle d'expérience), j'ai eu plus de mal à comprendre le dialecte des Doukkalas (à quelques centaines de kilomètres de ma ville natale), que celui de Tunis. De plus en règle générale les marocains comprennent sans problèmes les dialectes machriqis.

Si je devais relever une différence entre les deux dialectes, et ça découle de ma propre expérience, les tunisiens arabisent les termes scientifiques alors que les marocains vont soit les garder tels quels, soit utiliser un terme arabe. Les tunisiens disent "al matriss", les marocains disent "la matrice" ou المصفوفة(al masfufa)

Questions similaires

Pourquoi les Algériens sont-ils si fiers de leur pays mais dans le même temps le fuient en masse ?
Que pensez-vous des Algériens ?
Pourquoi certains Algériens font n’importe quoi en France ?
Que pensent les Français de la guerre d'Algérie, aujourd'hui ?
Pourquoi autant de polémique sur les Algériens ?
Pourquoi les Algériens, au moins ceux en France, parlent si bien le français ?
Comment était l'Algérie avant d'être française ?

La France a-t-elle encore son mot à dire sur l'Algérie ?
Est-ce que les Algériens peuvent tous lire le français ?
Les français détestent-ils les maghrébins ?

Qu'est ce qu'un "pied noir" ?

Jean-Paul Renoir A étudié à New York University Stern School of Business (Diplôme obtenu en 1971) 2 ans

Lorsque l'algérie était constituée de trois départements français, les français d'algérie qui étaient d'origine Européenne, étaient appelés "Pied Noirs". L'expression vient du fait que lorsqu'à la fin du xviiième siècle ils débarquèrent en Algerie colonie francaise, ils portaient des chaussures ou bottines de travail noires. Les locaux qui portaient ou des babouches cuir jaune, ou des sandales cuir et tissues neutres, les avaient nommés ainsi.

Questions similaires

Que signifie « Cheh » ?
Que veut dire D2R ?
Que signifie "et ron et ron petit patapon" ?
Qu’est-ce qu’un “porpoise” en français ?
Qu'appelle-t-on la "fragilité blanche" ?
Qu’est-ce qu’un Français ne pourra jamais comprendre ?
Quelle est la définition d'une "racaille" pour vous ?
Que sont des "gressins" ?
Qu’est-ce qu’un riche ?
Vétérans d’Algérie, avez-vous été vacciné contre la malaria ou le paludisme avant

Do Moroccans, Tunisians, and Algerians look down on Libyans? Why is Libya always excluded when these three people mention Maghreb?

Hamilcar Lives in Carthage, Tunis, Tunisia (1920–present) Updated Tue

Do Moroccans, Tunisians, and Algerians look down on Libyans?
No. We do not look down on Libyans. There are surely some people who do, most don’t. Just like with any other society.

Why is Libya always excluded when these three people mention Maghreb?

Most people do not exclude them, if you ask them if Libya is part of the Maghreb, they will surely say yes. But there are cultural differences for historical reasons.

Morocco (except for the north), Algeria, and Tunisia were under French influence, which also means they use French loanwords, unlike Libyans.

The three previously mentioned states are also closer when it comes to the socioeconomic factors. Libya, thank to oil and a smaller population, was much wealthier. Libya is in civil war now, but officially, it is still a rich country.

Libya is the largest oil economy by proven oil reserves in Africa, followed by Nigeria and Algeria, and one of the richest economies in the world by the ratio of oil reserves to the size of the population.
Source: Libya Financial Sector Review, February 2020, by the World Bank Group

Libyans did not leave Libya in large numbers. Even before independence, there was no significant Libyan population in Italy, which colonized Libya until its independence. Contrary to other Maghrebis in relation to France.

Many North Africans settled in the city (Paris) in the 1920s, making up the largest immigrant group to the city during that period. Clifford D. Rosenberg, the author of Policing Paris: The Origins of Modern Immigration Control Between the Wars, wrote that in the post-World War I period Muslims from Algeria, Morocco, and Tunisia may have only adopted a North African identity after coming to Paris.
Source: Hussey, Andrew. Paris: The Secret History. ISBN 1608192377, 9781608192373. p. 253

The ties deepened even more with the start of the Algerian war (1954–62). Tunisia and Morocco became independent in 1956 and the Algerian FLN's armed wing had camps within these two states.

After 1956 and 1962, respectively, people from the previously mentioned countries migrated to France and joined the pre-independence community.

Table of population of Maghrebi origin in France, numbers are in thousands:

Country of origin (2011)	Immigrants	1st generation born in France	2nd generation born in France (aged under 60 only)	Total
Algeria	737	1 170	563	2 470
Morocco	679	698	130	1 507
Tunisia	246	280	129	655
Total Maghreb	1 662	2 148	821	4 631

You see? No significant Libyan population.
The table looks similar with it any other foreign country which is home to a noteworthy Maghrebi diaspora.

Arabs in Italy in the 2020 Census[1]

Ancestry	Population	% of Italy population
Moroccan	414,249	0.700%
Egyptian	128,095	0.216%
Tunisian	93,350	0.158%
Algerian	18,468	0.031%
Somali	8,515	0.014%
Syrian	6,356	0.011%
Iraqi	5,408	0.009%
Lebanese	3,855	0.007%
Libyan	2,667	0.005%

In a nutshell, this means less interactions and had an impact on the pop culture as well.

The explanation why French-born Algerian musician Rim'K (and others as well) mentions Algeria, Morocco and Tunisia (Algérie, Maroc, Tunisie) only when he referred to Maghreb United (3:30).

One of the reasons why comments (not exclusively from the video) on the internet look like this:

Like I said, this is not because people look down on Libyans, but rather for other reasons.

But if you ask the same commenters about Libya, they will say that Libya is part of the Maghreb (alongside Mauritania).

Emblem of the Maghreb Union.

An organization, which became irrelevant because of the tensions between Algeria and Morocco. But the map gives you an idea on how they are not being excluded.

L'Algérie se réarme dans le domaine naval, pensez-vous qu'un jour (sans compter que nous sommes dans l'otan) elle sera capable de nous attaquer ?

Alexandre Durant Bac +5 de Institut Supérieur Du Commerce De Paris (Diplôme obtenu en 2001) 26 oct.

Sur un plan purement militaire ça serait compliqué la France figure toujours parmi les 10 premières armées du monde. Même si l'Algérie a en effet une marine conséquente (la première d'Afrique) elle est loin derrière la France au global.

Questions similaires

N'est-ce pas les musulmans marocains, algériens et sénégalés, diabolisés aujourd'hui, qui par leur courage et leur bravoure ont défendu la France contre l'invasion nazie ?

L'Algérie et le Maroc constituent-ils une future menace militaire pour la France ?
Un conflit armé pourrait-il se déclencher entre l'Algérie et la France ?

Que se passerait-il si un pays de l'OTAN, par exemple la Turquie, attaquait un autre pays de l'OTAN, comme la Grèce ?

Pourquoi le royaume autocratique marocain s'acharne-t-il contre l'Algérie en déployant une armée du Net mobilisée 24 h/24 ?

L'Algérie va-t-elle attaquer le Maroc ?
Pourquoi la France a-t-elle perdu la guerre d'Algérie ?

Pensez-vous que la France et l'Algérie pourraient un jour se réconcilier émotionnellement ?

Le rapport sur la guerre France Algérie de Benjamin Stora est-il objectif ou n'a-t-il pour but que de contenter les deux parties ?

Si une guerre Algérie Maroc éclatait qui gagnerait ?

1000 militaires français ont publié une lettre au gouvernement mettant en garde contre une guerre raciale due au militantisme islamique. La perspective d'une guerre civile en France, voire d'un coup d'État contre le gouvernement, est-elle réelle ?

Les relations entre le Maroc et l'Algérie peuvent-elles dégénérer en conflit armé ?
Est-ce que le Maroc va attaquer l'Algérie ?

L’Algérie a décidé de revoir ses relations diplomatiques avec le Maroc, qu’elle accuse d’être impliqué dans les incendies qui ont ravagé le nord de l’Algérie. D'où proviennent ces accusations ?

Que pensez-vous du spectre d'un conflit armé qui plane entre le Maroc et l'Algérie ? (Selon les médias)

Why do Berbers look vastly different from other indigenous Africans?

Mayla Dixon Updated 1y

Because they are mainly West Eurasians who back-migrated to North Africa around 12 000 years ago.

(A Riffian Amazigh woman from Morocco. Source: Google image)

Which would also explain why they have high levels of Eurasian admixture in their autosomal DNA.

Ancient genomes from North Africa evidence prehistoric migrations to the Maghreb from both the Levant and Europe

"Genetic data from present-day populations (11⇓–13) suggests that North African ancestry has contributions from four main sources: (i) an autochthonous Maghrebi component related to a back migration to Africa

~12,000 y ago from Eurasia; (ii) a Middle Eastern component probably associated with the Arab conquest; (iii) a sub-Saharan component derived from trans-Saharan migrations; and (iv) a European component that has been linked to recent historic movements.*"

The Tuareg Berbers are of the same stock as the (eurasian) North African Berbers. The difference is they migrated southwards and had much more interactions (trade, marriage, slave trade) with black Africans who were living in the Sahara and the Sahel for thousands of years, which would correlate with a higher amount of West African components in their DNA.

(A young Tuareg Woman from Niger. Source: Pinterest)

I'll keep saying this : people need to stop trying to segregate Africa. A Riffian Amazigh is no less African than a Ghanaian Akan or a Kenyan Luo.

Est-ce que les Algériens peuvent tous lire le français ?

Omar Chad Anciennement Contremaître (1979–2010) Mis à jour le 2 ans

Évidemment, non ! Les Algériens nés post-indépendance ont été scolarisés suivant le régime bilingue (arabe – français) ; mais la priorité des cours jusqu'à la moitié des années 70 était favorable à la langue française, presque tous les cours se faisaient en français : c'est à partir des années 75 que l'arabe a commencé à prendre le dessus en arabisant tous les programmes scolaires, les deux langues (français et anglais) y sont restées . L'ironie du sort est que les programmes universitaires ont toujours été maintenus en français. Malheureusement, avec un taux d'assimilation peu reluisant, les capacités linguistiques de l'étudiant ne pouvaient être que laconiques.

Tous ceux qui ont été scolarisés, nonobstant la gratuité des cours, n'ont pas pu atteindre l'université.

Voilà pourquoi j'ai répondu que non !

Questions similaires

Pourquoi les Français ne reconnaissent-ils pas le génocide algérien ?
Que pensent les Algériens des Français ?
Pourquoi les Algériens, au moins ceux en France, parlent si bien le français ?
Les Algériens du Nord-Ouest de l'Algérie sont-ils des Arabes ?
La plupart des Marocains peuvent-ils parler français ?
Le français est-il de fait une langue nationale en Algérie ?

Est-ce pour ne pas choquer les anciens que le français n'a pas le statut de langue co-officielle en Algérie avec l'arabe et le kabyle ?

Pourquoi certains Algériens font n'importe quoi en France ?
Pourquoi beaucoup d'Arabes nés en France se sentent-ils plus arabes que français ?

Est-ce que les Français savent que les Kabyles ne sont pas des Arabes ?
Est-il vrai qu'il existe des sentiments de haine entre Français et Algériens ?
Que pensez-vous des Algériens ?

La langue française s'écrit de gauche à droite, et a hérité des chiffres arabes. Mais la langue arabe, s'écrit de droite à gauche. Est-ce que dans la langue arabe, les chiffres sont-ils inversés ? Pour écrire cent vingt-trois, 123 ou 321.

Qu'est-ce qui change entre le français parlé en France et le français parlé en Belgique ou en Algérie ?

Pourquoi les Algériens viennent-ils en France s'ils détestent ?

Pourquoi les Algériens sont-ils si fiers de leur pays mais dans le même temps le fuient en masse ?

Vital-Joseph Philibert Rédacteur en chef du site www.pg5i.eu (2015–aujourd'hui)1 an Votre question est très intéressante car elle me permet de rappeler que pratiquement tous les étrangers présents sur notre territoire sont attachés à leurs pays d'origine et pas seulement les Algériens. Je m'en suis rendu compte avec tous les ressortissants d'Europe Centrale et Orientale qui viennent tenter leur chance chez nous car leurs pays se désertifient et qu'ils n'y ont, de fait, plus aucune perspective. L'Algérie est par ailleurs, à l'instar de certains des territoires sus mentionnés, rongée par la corruption et de surplus confrontée à des conflits religieux qui créent un climat social délétère et dissuadent les jeunes Algériens d'y rester. Il ne faut pas non plus oublier que des millions de travailleurs algériens ont été « exportés » en France pour combler le manque de main d'œuvre et ce, dès le lendemain de la 1ière guerre mondiale. A Saint-Etienne eut lieu, en 1942, la dernière catastrophe minière qui fit 67 victimes dont 24 Polonais, Tchèques et Slovaques et 28 Algériens. Toutes ces personnes décédées pour la prospérité économique française, ont disparu parce qu'elles se trouvaient dans les niveaux les plus profonds de la mine, ce qui a rendu leur sauvetage impossible. La plupart des veuves et de leurs enfants est restée en France, beaucoup ont été naturalisés français mais tous ont gardé des attaches avec leur pays d'origine. Si les Polonais se sont mieux intégrés que les Algériens c'est parce qu'ils étaient catholiques. Si les Algériens ne se sentent jamais réellement français, c'est parce qu'ils sont musulmans et c'est pourquoi tous ces discours sur la laïcité et le communautarisme sont des non-sens, typiquement français.

En quoi les "Algériens fuient en masse" , ca laisse a croire que des dizaines de milliers quittent l'Algérie chaque mois/ année, hors les Algériens sont ceux qui migrent le moins comparé à leur voisins d'après le centre d'études stratégiques de l'Afrique :

Éthiopie 49 220 migrants
Nigeria 17 487 migrants
Guinée 12 158 migrants
Côte d'Ivoire 11 966 migrants
Maroc 9 558 migrants
Gambie 7 711 migrants
Mali 6 953 migrants
Algérie 6 444 migrants

Questions similaires

Pourquoi les français préfèrent-ils aller en Tunisie ou au Maroc plutôt qu'en Algérie ?

Pourquoi certains Algériens font n'importe quoi en France ?

Pourquoi le Maroc, l'Algérie et la Tunisie sont-ils des pays séparés alors qu'ils ont tous un héritage berbère, arabe et français ?

Que pensez-vous des Algériens ?

Pourquoi les Marocains ne supportent pas les Algériens, qui ont pourtant une culture similaire ?

Pourquoi certains Marocains n'aiment-ils pas les Algériens?
Pourquoi les Arabes détestent l'Algérie ?
Pourquoi les algériens sont-ils si nationalistes ?
Pourquoi les Français ne reconnaissent-ils pas le génocide algérien ?

Pourquoi il n'y a qu'avec l'Algérie que les relations sont souvent tendues alors que la France a occupé d'autres pays ?

Qu'est-ce qui empêche des pays comme l'Algérie et le Maroc à se développer?

Que pensez-vous de l'Algérie ?

Pourquoi les Algériens disent-ils que les Marocains pillent leur culture et volent leur Histoire ?

Pourquoi on demande tout le temps à la France de s'excuser envers l'Algérie pour les morts de la Guerre d'Algérie et pas à l'Algérie de s'excuser pour les actes du FLN durant la même période ?

Pourquoi Abdelmoumen(calife des Almohades) est-il revendiqué comme Marocain par les Marocains, alors qu'il venait d'une tribu localisée en Algérie actuelle ?

Pourquoi l'Algérie remet-elle maintenant sur la table la question mémorielle avec la France ?

Jean-Michel Ravina Anciennement DAF, Dirigeant, ex Mensa, Retraité 9 mo

Vous connaissez le principe du bouc émissaire. Quand cela ne va pas, c'est forcément la faute de quelqu'un, de l'ex colonisateur pour ne pas changer. Près de 60 ans après l'indépendance, ce n'est pas crédible. La France n'a pas mis 60 ans pour se remettre de la guerre14–18 avec 39–45 entre.

Questions similaires

Quel est le problème profond que l'Algérie a avec la France ?

Pourquoi il n'y a qu'avec l'Algérie que les relations sont souvent tendues alors que la France a occupé d'autres pays ?

La France doit-elle s'excuser pour son passé colonial, comme le demande l'Algérie ?

Pensez-vous comme certains ont pu le dire que "l'Algérie n'était pas une nation, seule la France a fait du pays une nation" ?

Pourquoi la France ne s'excuse-t-elle pas une bonne fois pour toutes pour la colonisation vis à vis de l'Algérie ?

Pourquoi on demande tout le temps à la France de s'excuser envers l'Algérie pour les morts de la Guerre d'Algérie et pas à l'Algérie de s'excuser pour les actes du FLN durant la même période ?

Rapport Storra : La France et l'Algérie veulent-elles vraiment se réconcilier ? Pourquoi la France a-t-elle perdu la guerre d'Algérie ?

Pensez-vous que la France et l'Algérie pourraient un jour se réconcilier émotionnellement ?

Pourquoi l'Algérie, qui a acquis son indépendance veut-elle faire de la France une partie de son territoire ?

Avec une volonté commune, la France et Algérie pourraient-elles se réconcilier ?

Quelles sont les raisons réelles de l'occupation de l'Algérie par la France ? L'Algérie aurait-elle pu rester française ?

Le rapport sur la guerre France Algérie de Benjamin Stora est-il objectif ou n'a-t-il pour but que de contenter les deux parties ?

Quel est et a été l'impact de la guerre d'Algérie sur la politique française ?

Que pensez-vous de l'Algérie ?

Mahamadou Ousmane Ingénieur d'Etat Mis à jour le 14 déc.

Un très beau pays, un peuple fier et patriotique… contrairement à certaines idées, je trouve les Algériens accueillants. Un beau paysage diversifié, des traditions que j'ai beaucoup aimé..je rêve toujours de retourner passer mes vacances: admirer ces belles plages (tichi,Boulimat..), les cascades de kifrida,le désert du sud et ces veilles cités historiques (ghardaia…).. les spécialités culinaires Algériennes (Arabe,kabyle…etc).

Tant de choses qui me font aimé ce beau pays.. une nation qui se construit d'elles même après avoir vécu tant de choses (guerre d'indépendance, terrorisme…).. maintenant l'Algérie est l'une des plus grandes nations du continent et du Maghreb, sur tous les plans…..

Benoît Gardonio, Français depuis toujours Répondu 3 nov. 2017 Réponse originale : Vous pensez quoi de l'algerie ?

Que c'est un beau pays avec une histoire riche et des traditions qui le sont tout autant. Que le peuple algérien est un peuple fier de son identité et de ses racines et qu'il a raison de l'être.

Précisons que je suis français, né dans les années 80. J'ai été élevé dans l'idée que les peuples colonisés par mon pays avaient autant de légitimité que le peuple français de revendiquer leur indépendance politique. Donc, contrairement à certains de mes compatriotes, généralement plus âgés que moi, je ne suis pas nostalgique de ce qu'on appelle parfois "l'Algérie française", une sorte d'oxymore detestable : comment l'Algérie pourrait-elle être en même temps française?

J'aimerais un jour pouvoir visiter ce grand pays, de ses rivages méditerranéens jusqu'aux frontières sahariennes.

Questions similaires

Pourquoi les Algériens sont-ils si fiers de leur pays mais dans le même temps le fuient en masse ?

Que pensez-vous des Algériens ?
Pourquoi certains Algériens font n'importe quoi en France ?
Que pensent les Français de la guerre d'Algérie, aujourd'hui ?
Pourquoi autant de polémique sur les Algériens ?
Pourquoi les Algériens, au moins ceux en France, parlent si bien le français ?
Comment était l'Algérie avant d'être française ?
La France a-t-elle encore son mot à dire sur l'Algérie ?
Est-ce que les Algériens peuvent tous lire le français ?
Les français détestent-ils les maghrébins ?
Pourquoi la France n'aime pas l'Algérie ?
Que pensez-vous de l'Algérie ?
Que pensent vraiment les tunisiens des algériens ?
Pourquoi les Français sont surtout plus racistes vers les Algériens ?
Est-il vrai que les Français n'aiment pas parler de la guerre d'Algérie ?

Albert Camus parlait-il l'arabe ?

Bachir Fouzi Connaissances : Arabe3 ans

Albert Camus, prix Nobel de littérature, l'un des plus grands écrivains français, était un Pied-Noir d'Algérie qui parlait pataouète et n'hésitait pas à l'utiliser dans ses œuvres.

Si le pataouète est la langue des Européens d'Algérie des faubourgs et du bled, il faut aussi mentionner l'existence du sabir, parler des Arabo-Berbères pratiquant la langue française. Il s'agit là davantage d'un accent que d'une langue en création, même si des mots arabes s'y mêlent. Bien des Pieds-Noirs des campagnes s'exprimaient avec un accent empruntant autant au pataouète des villes qu'au sabir des champs. Et bien des mots et expressions arabes se glissaient dans leurs phrases.

Avec le temps, pataouète et sabir se seraient sans doute encore rapprochés pour finir par ne plus faire qu'une seule langue dont la formation aurait certainement été accélérée par la mobilité croissante des personnes et le développement des moyens de communication qui ont marqué la fin du XXe siècle.

C'est un parler simple et fort en gueule, fanfaron, coloré, tout en exclamation et gestuelle, porté par la chaleur, un certain sens du tragique et l'appétit de vivre. Le parler pied-noir est une sorte de « pudding (ou de couscous) linguistique » et dont les ingrédients sont le français, l'espagnol, l'arabe, l'italien, le maltais (dans une moindre mesure) et des expressions juives. L'origine du parler pied-noir est multiple. Elle correspond à la colonisation de l'Afrique du Nord (et de l'Algérie en particulier) dès les années 1830, par les différents groupes ethniques du Bassin méditerranéen.

Chaque groupe s'établit dans une région déterminée mais aux contours élastiques : c'était à chacun selon la puissance de sa voix, en somme.

Les Italiens (originaires principalement de Naples et des iles du golfe de Naples : Procida, Ischia, Capri, mais également de Toscane, du Piémont, de Vénétie, de Sardaigne et de Sicile) ont «colonisé» l'Est algérien (Bône, Philippeville). Les Espagnols (venus principalement du Levant : provinces d'Alicante, Murcie, Valence, Carthagène ; et d'Andalousie, de Catalogne et des iles Baléares) colonisèrent l'Ouest algérien (Oranie).

Les Maltais investirent la région de Constantine et de Bône ; les Français de métropole répandus dans toute l'Algérie, s'installèrent surtout dans la région d'Alger et dans la plupart des grandes villes.

Alger, comme toute capitale, aurait constitué le creuset représentatif de la population d'Algérie si elle avait compté davantage d'Espagnols. Le melting-pot pied-noir est en effet très marqué par l'Espagne. On le constatera à la lecture du lexique : la part des mots espagnols ou d'origine espagnole est écrasante. Il parait qu'il y a dans le parler pied-noir trois fois plus de mots espagnols (environ 180) que de mots italiens (environ 60), et à peu près autant de mots espagnols que de mots arabes (environ 210).

C'était au début du xxe siècle. La scolarisation se poursuivait à bonne allure, le mélange des langues avait pris, avec le français pour base et l'arabe pour liant, et miracle de l'intégration le pied-noir était parlé par toutes les couches de la population, avec plus ou moins d'emprunts à l'arabe et quelques mots espagnols et italiens, catalans ou savoyards, ariégeois ou gascons, corses ou provençaux, parisiens ou lorrains.

Les emprunts à l'arabe sont prépondérants. L'arabe imprègne le français «naturel» : hasard, de azzahr (jeu de dés) ; safran, de zahafran, sucre, de soukkar, sofa, de sufa (coussin)... et le français populaire ou argotique : clebs, de kelb (chien), toubib, de tbeb (médecin)...

Les emprunts directs ont surtout trait aux activités paysannes (djebel, oued, bled...), aux interjections (aïwa ! akarbi !...), à des impératifs (chouf !...) et aux injures!.

On peut se demander si ce n'est pas par simple commodité que le parler pied-noir a emprunté à l'arabe des mots de la vie quotidienne qui permettaient de se faire comprendre. Des mots simples comme kif-kif, souk, gourbi ou fatina comblaient certaines lacunes de son vocabulaire. Il est en tout cas intéressant de remarquer cette adoption directe de la langue autochtone par les Pieds-Noirs. Peut-être ce fut une tentative d'intégration (inconsciemment) inachevée!

La presse locale de l'époque (L'Écho d'Oran, Alger Républicain, etc.) utilisé le pataouète afin de parler directement au lecteur.

Sources :

LE PARLER PIED-NOIR
Le "parler pied noir"-Le Pataouète

Questions similaires

Les pieds noirs parlaient-ils arabe ?
Quelle est la similitude entre l'hébreu et l'arabe ?
Quel peuple arabe parle et maîtrise le mieux l'Arabe classique ?
Pourquoi l'arabe est-il si difficile à apprendre ?
Qu'est-ce qui vous a marqué dans "L'étranger" d'Albert Camus ?
Quel livre d'Albert Camus me conseillerez-vous de lire ?
Êtes-vous plutôt Camus ou Sartre ?

Est-ce par mépris que dans "L'étranger" d'Albert Camus les Arabes ne sont jamais nommés ?

Pourquoi les Arabes détestent l'Algérie ?
Est-il vrai que la lettre P n'existe pas en arabe ?
Pourquoi l'amitié de Sartre et de Camus s'est-elle brisée ?
Pourquoi les Maghrébins sont-ils également appelés des Arabes ?
Qu'est-ce la signification philosophique de « La Chute » d'Albert Camus ?
Faut-il apprendre l'arabe pour voyager en Algérie ?

Que diront les lexicologues arabes si je leur lance un défi : l'arabe est une langue bizarre, avec ses règles de grammaire surtout, ayant l'air d'être émises aléatoirement ?

Pensez-vous que Macron doit s'excuser pour la colonisation de l'Algérie, la Tunisie, le Maroc ...?

André Teissier du Cros Président honoraire et Fondateur chez Comité Bastille (2006–aujourd'hui)1 an Réponse originale : Pensez-vous que Macron doit s'excuser pour la colonisation de l'Algérie, la Tunisie?

Si Emmanuel Macron doit s’excuser de ces colonisations, alors la France doit aussi s’excuser de la colonisation de la Bretagne, de la Corse, de la Franche-Comté, et autres (Indochine, Afrique occidentale et équatoriale, Nouvelle Calédonie, Polynésie…)

La Grande-Bretagne doit s’excuser d’avoir colonisé environ un tiers du territoire français pendant 150 ans et d’avoir colonisé le pays de Galles, l’Irlande et l’Écosse sans parler de l’Inde et d’un grand nombre de territoires qui au XIXe siècle représentaient un quart de l’humanité.

Mais de son côté la France doit s’excuser d’avoir colonisé l’Angleterre en 1066 avec Guillaume le conquérant.

L’Espagne et le Portugal furent de grands colonisateurs avant l’Angleterre et la France…

En outre il est grand temps que l’Italie s’excuse d’avoir fondé l’empire romain qui pendant plusieurs siècles a colonisé la meilleure partie de l’Europe et du monde méditerranéen.

Et puis enfin, que dire de la Grèce d’Alexandre le Grand? des Celtes qui ont colonisé toute l’Europe avant les Romains et pillé plusieurs fois Rome? Et ailleurs n’oublions pas d’autres colonisateurs des Amériques, les derniers étant les Incas? En Équateur ils ont encore de bonnes histoires à raconter sur les joyeux traitements qu’ils subirent il y a juste quelques siècles.

Et l’Empire Arabe? Et l’Empire du Mali en Afrique avant que les Europeens suivent les traces esclavagistes des Arabes?

Croyez-vous qu’il soit vraiment constructif d’ouvrir cette boîte de Pandore? Ne vaudrait-il pas mieux parler de l’avenir au lieu d’éternellement refaire l’histoire?

Pourquoi Macron passe-t-il son temps à s'excuser pour la guerre d'Algérie ? Il n'a rien d'autre à faire que de victimiser la France.

Jerome Hanout · Suivre

a soutenu des luttes, en a croisé d'autres27 janv.
"La France" , comme beaucoup des états actuels, s'est construite au service d'une élite : l'aristocratie, et en particulier la maison royale capétienne. Souvenez vous de Louis 14 disant "l'état c'est moi", sans doute en réponse aux philosophes qui réclamaient plus de transparence et de raison dans le fonctionnement de l'administration.

Cette élite a été remplacée par une partie de la classe bourgeoise. Ou plutot a fusionné avec elle. Les armées napoléoniennes, devenues françaises, en sont l'exemple le plus frappant. La revolution a été de ce point de vue là n'a été qu'un sommet dans un mouvement de fond bien plus long.

Lors de la Restauration, aprés Napoleon le nouveau royaume se tourne vers l'outre-mer, la Mediterranée. Il conquiert l'Algérie entre autre. Plus tard on conquerra en Afrique Noire sous d'autres regimes republicains ou second empire. Conquète veut dire prédation, comme les conquistadores en amerique du sud, les anglais en acadie, les allemands en bielorussie…oups j'ai éte trop loin dans la comparaison ? Helas non, il n'y a pas à gratter beaucoup pour trouver des villages brulé avec les habitants dedans. Il se trouve que dans le cas de l'Algérie ça s'est vu que les français d'Algérie etaient des citoyens de seconde zone, mieux que les sous-citoyens "musulmans" comme l'administrtion française, et "de" Gaulle les appelleront encore même après 62.

Les rapatriés c'était les gilets jaunes, mais pas que. Ce dont il s'est excusé hier c'est la police qui tire sur la foule. Mais avec tout le respect que je dois aux français d'Algerie dont beaucoup etaient juifs, ce n'a été qu'un épisode d'un feuilleton sanglant orchestré par des politiciens dont aucun n'a jamais été inquiété. Ces gens ont oeuvré dans la continuité de "la France" depuis toujours. Par devoir.

Mais…la France est elle un idéal ou un ramassis élitiste ?

En France l'armée a developpé une doctrine de lutte contre l'émancipation des populations indigenes, "contre subversive". Ce sont de tres tres bons officiers, puisqu'ils ont gagné la guerre d'Algérie, "pour 10 ans", et que par la suite cette doctrine s'est imposée, a été vendue en Amérique pour toutes les juntes, et, pour fonder Guantanamo. Ça fonctionne. "Pour 10 ans", et, si on a des troupes consentantes, et, paradoxalement empathiques et curieuses des autres. Les intéressés reconnaitront Aussaresse, produit de l'ecole française.

Au Portugal les militaires chargés de faire le ménage au Mozambique, sale besogne, ont refusé. Et ils ont eu de la chance, le dictateur était mort et enterré parce que sinon… les vieilles personnes aiment beaucoup les hommes forts et rassurants, les cours betonnées et les certitudes d'antan, qu'on appelle "traditions". Et il y a toujours des jeunes hommes qui aiment leur grand mere, et venerent leur pere mort à la guerre.

On peut passer son temps à s'excuser, ou à oublier comme Francis Heaulme. Mais fondamentalement la France est un état colonial, un fauve magnifique, Louis 14. A l'intérieur comme à l'extérieur. La seule chose que Macron pourrait faire de mieux que demander pardon pour la France, c'est de changer son paradigme de gouvernance, à la France… c'est à dire la transformer en un état fédéral comme le sont tous ses voisins et partenaires mondiaux. Moi je prefererais carrément qu'on la sépare, mais bon, en ce moment ce ne serait pas bienvenu.

Je pense qu'il ne s'arrétera de s'excuser que quand il franchira à l'étape suivante. S'il est réélu avec une majorité de toutous intelligents à l'assemblée.

Questions similaires

La France a perdu des guerres contre le Mexique, Haïti, l'Algérie, le Vietnam. La France a-t-elle déjà gagné une guerre sans alliés ?

Pourquoi on demande tout le temps à la France de s'excuser envers l'Algérie pour les morts de la Guerre d'Algérie et pas à l'Algérie de s'excuser pour les actes du FLN durant la même période ?

Pourquoi il n'y a qu'avec l'Algérie que les relations sont souvent tendues alors que la France a occupé d'autres pays ?

Imaginons qu'Eric Zemmour se présente aux élections présidentielles et qu'il devienne président de la République Française en 2022, que se passera-t-il ensuite ?

Pourquoi la France ne s'excuse-t-elle pas une bonne fois pour toutes pour la colonisation vis à vis de l'Algérie ?

Quel Président de la République Française a eu le mandat le plus tranquille sans guerre, catastrophe ou crise majeure ?

Pour quelles raisons Macron vient-il d'annoncer que la France allait réduire drastiquement le nombre de visas accordés au Maroc, à l'Algérie et à la Tunisie ?

Pourquoi la France a-t-elle perdu la guerre d'Algérie alors qu'elle a tué beaucoup plus d'Algériens qu'elle n'a subi de pertes ? (Question traduite)

Pourquoi la France ne s'est pas encore excusée pour ses crimes durant la guerre d'Algérie ?

Les propos d’Emmanuel Macron concernant les caricatures du prophète Mohammed pourraient-ils conduire à une guerre entre la France et les pays musulmans ?

Pourquoi l'état français ne publie pas les archives militaires qu'il détient prouvant que la France a spolié des territoires marocains pour les annexer à l'Algérie pendant sa colonisation ?

Trump devrait-il déclarer la guerre à la France ?
Quelle a été la réaction de la France quand la guerre des Malouines a débuté ?

Quelle a été la plus grosse erreur d'Emmanuel Macron depuis son élection à la présidence de la France ?

Si la France était menacée par une puissance étrangère et que la guerre se profilait, quel président français (à l'âge où il était en exercice) voudriez-vous pour gérer cette épreuve ?

Footnotes:
Hugh Roberts, Berber Government: The Kabyle Polity in Pre-colonial Algeria , IB Tauris , 2014, p. 195

Gaïd, Mouloud (1975). L'Algérie sous les Turcs (in French). Maison tunisienne de l'édition.

Jump up to:[a] [b] Micheal Clodfelter (9 May 2017). Warfare and Armed Conflicts: A Statistical Encyclopedia of Casualty and Other Figures, 1492–2015, 4th ed. McFarland. p. 25. ISBN 978-0-7864-7470-7.

Jump up to:[a] [b] [c] [d] Cervantes in Algiers: a captive's tale by María Antonia Garcés p.25
Jump up to:[a] [b] An Historical Geography of the Ottoman Empire p.107*ff*

"But as early as 1516 Mostaganem fell into the hands of the Turks. From then on, being the rival of Spanish Oran, it saw its importance increase." Algeria Hildebert Hisnard p.158 A history of the Maghrib in the Islamic period Jamil M. Abun-Nasr p.155

Jump up to:[a] [b] Cervantes in Algiers: a captive's tale by María Antonia Garcés p.49*ff Power and Penury: Government, Technology and Science in Philip II's Spain* by David C. Goodman p.247

"the failure at Mostaganem, which brought the collapse of grandiose projects of alliance with Morocco" in MEDITERRANEAN AND THE MEDITERRANEAN WORLD IN THE: AGE OF PHILIP II -2 by Fernand Braudel p.855

Why are Maghrebis okay with Arab colonization but are not okay with the French and Ottoman one?

Adam Rahali Student of the World (1996–present) Jan 27

Original question: Why are Maghrebis okay with Arab colonization but are not okay with the French and Ottoman one? When you say Maghrebis, do you mean all the inhabitants of the Maghreb, or only the Arabic-speaking ones? That's a very important distinction, and the term can easily mean either. I'll assume that you refer to the former for this question. As for the term Maghreb, it usually refers to Morocco, Algeria, Tunisia, Mauritania and Libya. (I will not mention the Western Sahara conflict, but feel free to google it if you're curious.)

Disclaimer: I'm a Canadian-Moroccan of Arabo-Amazigh descent. I speak Arabic as a first language (plus French, English, and some Spanish and German), but many/most of my ancestors were Amazighs, who adopted Arabic over the centuries. Most recently, my great-grandfather from the Souss learned it after migrating to an Arabic-speaking city near Rabat.

Here's the Maghreb!

Related Links

Can what Arabs did before the Europeans in Subsaharan Africa, in countries like Sudan, Somalia, and Tanzania, be considered a process of colonization? Why don't people usually talk about this Arab acculturation and colonial expansion in Africa?

Why didn't the Arabs colonize sub Saharan Africa?

Why won't Morocco allow self-determination for the Sahrawi people, when it is guaranteed under the UN chart? Is it colonialism? (or) if there's other issue, please educate me. Thanks.

Why do Egyptians speak bad English even though Britain colonized it for 72 years while people in Morocco speak good French even though France colonized it for only 44 years?

Why do you think that Maghreb and Arab countries like Somalia and Sudan are not Arab countries when you are from the Levant, you are less Arab than those?

What is the difference between Arab colonization and European colonization? What even happened during the colonial period in general?

Which Maghrebi dialect (Moroccan, Algerian or Tunisian) is the least difficult to understand for native Arabic speakers from Bilad Al-Sham, Masr and Al-Khalij and why?

Do all Lebanese look Arab or do some look French/European?

If the Arabs should have a "Free Palestine", Should the Arab colony countries of Algeria, Tunisia, Libya, and Morocco disband themselves and go to the Arabian desert and let the Berbers get their homeland back as compensation?

Did Lebanese people decide whether they are French or Arab?

Which one is Somalia, Arab or African?

If the 280 million African Arabs (Egypt, Sudan and the Maghreb) unified into one nation, wouldn't the Arabs rule Africa?

I see in many Maghrebian people some hatred in their eyes when they look at me for example so why do they come to live in France if they hate this country and the French?

Do you think Maghreb will give up the French language in the future?

Why wasn't Saudi Arabia colonized by the British or the French like the rest of the countries in the MENA region?

Faut il des excuses de la France envers l'Algérie ?

Zazie Queneau Connaissances : Anglais 1 an

Q : Faut il des excuses de la France envers l'Algérie ?
Énième mouture de la même question ces derniers jours.

C'est LE sujet du moment en Algérie ?
Vous en rêvez la nuit ?
Vous nous haïssez à ce point ?
C'est le dernier challenge YouTube ? À qui arrivera à placer le sujet dans la conversation ?
Je conçois que le sujet soit important pour vous.

Mais pour moi personnellement je, qui tombe là-dessus pour la trouzmillième fois en — combien, deux semaines ? — ça commence à faire lourd. Surtout sur le Quora anglophone, où vous semblez prendre le monde entier à témoin de notre noirceur et de notre vilenie, à nous, sales francaouis.

J'ai toujours considéré tous mes concitoyens de la même manière (plutôt bienveillante) quelle que soit leur origine ou celle de leurs ascendants.

Je vomis le racisme, la xénophobie, la haine sous toutes ses formes.

Il ne m'est jamais venu à l'idée de détester les gens originaires de pays avec lesquels le mien a été en guerre, même récemment.

Alors si vous nous détestez tellement, pourquoi ne pas simplement claquer la porte ? Je ne sais pas, moi, n'importe quoi plutôt que cette obstination aveugle !

Pourquoi la France ne s'est pas encore excusée pour ses crimes durant la guerre d'Algérie ?

Pourquoi la France ne s'excuse-t-elle pas une bonne fois pour toutes pour la colonisation vis à vis de l'Algérie ?

Pourquoi la France ne demande-t-elle pas pardon au peuple algérien pour les horreurs commises en son nom durant sa colonisation brutale de l'Algérie alors que le roi des Belges vient de présenter ses excuses aux Congolais pour des faits similaires ?

Pensez-vous que Macron doit s'excuser pour la colonisation de l'Algérie, la Tunisie, le Maroc ...?

Pourquoi la France ne reconnaît-elle pas les massacres commis contre le peuple algérien ?

Est-ce que la France s'est excusée pour son passé colonial ?

Croyez-vous que la France devrait présenter ses excuses aux ex-colonies pour les abus du passé colonial, comme le Mexique l'a demandé récemment à l’Espagne ?

Pourquoi la France après les excuses de la Belgique au Congo, ne fait pas des excuses au pays africains pour la guerre d'Algérie, la guerre civile au Cameroun ou l'assassinat de chef d'États africains ?

Etc. etc. etc.
Et je vous laisse chercher sur le Quora anglophone.
N'en jetez plus, la cour est pleine !

Questions similaires

Pourquoi les Arabes détestent l'Algérie ?

Pourquoi on demande tout le temps à la France de s'excuser envers l'Algérie pour les morts de la Guerre d'Algérie et pas à l'Algérie de s'excuser pour les actes du FLN durant la même période ?

Pourquoi la France ne s'excuse-t-elle pas une bonne fois pour toutes pour la colonisation vis à vis de l'Algérie ?

La France doit-elle s'excuser pour son passé colonial, comme le demande l'Algérie ?
Pourquoi Emmanuel Macron a-t-il tenu des propos durs à l'égard de l'Algérie ?

Le rapport sur la guerre France Algérie de Benjamin Stora est-il objectif ou n'a-t-il pour but que de contenter les deux parties ?

Quel est le problème profond que l'Algérie a avec la France ?
Pourquoi la France a-t-elle perdu la guerre d'Algérie ?

Pourquoi l'Algérie, qui a acquis son indépendance veut-elle faire de la France une partie de son territoire ?

Que pensez-vous des Algériens ?

Macron a-t-il raison de s'excuser (encore) envers les harkis, en proposant des indemnités, alors que l'indépendance de l'Algérie date de près de 60 ans et qu'aucun de ses prédécesseurs n'était intervenu ?

Pourquoi la France a-t-elle perdu la guerre d'Algérie alors qu'elle a tué beaucoup plus d'Algériens qu'elle n'a subi de pertes ? (Question traduite)

Pourquoi les Algériens qui sont hyper nationalistes quand ils sont en France ne peuvent pas s'arrêter de pleurer quand on leur dit qu'ils vont retourner dans leur beau pays ?

Pensez-vous que Macron doit s'excuser pour la colonisation de l'Algérie, la Tunisie, le Maroc ...?

Pourquoi la France passe-t-elle son temps à s'excuser pour l'Algérie, le Rwanda, l'esclavage, Napoléon, etc.?

First of all, most Maghrebis would argue that there were no Arab nor Ottoman colonizations! The only one of the three that was really what we would define as a colonization is the French one (and the Italian/Spanish ones that you forgot to mention, plus historically the Iberian colonizers).

To start with, let's define colonization. According to the Merriam-Webster, the word can take many meanings, such as: "to take control of a people or area especially as an extension of state power", or "to migrate to and settle in (an inhabited or uninhabited area)". I personally think that the term is really ambiguous, and that any conquest could be defined as a form of colonization. For example, the Roman conquest of France. Romans conquered France, is that a form of colonization? Ok, now they influenced the locals to speak Latin, and encouraged Latins to migrate there, is that colonization? If conquests don't last long, can we even consider it? The term is too vague, and most people use it to refer specifically to European conquests from the 15th to the 20th centuries. One element defining it was the enforcement of the language and religion unto natives, and the discriminatory ethnic and racial policies. Also, lots of settlements and migrations happened, many times by confiscating land from natives and/or expelling them and giving it to colonists. I think that's a better way to define colonization, at least in the context of your question. But in any case, I can contextualize all I want, and you'll end up taking the answer that you want, because that's what it's all about, right?

Screenshots of history, from the fall of the WRE to a Mediterranean Byzantine, from a nascent Arab Caliphate to the dominant Umayyads

Byzantine Empire
Sassanid Empire
North Sea
Baltic Sea
Rhine R.
Loire R.
ATLANTIC OCEAN
FRANKISH KINGDOM
LOMBARDS
(568)
Venice
Ravenna
Rome
(572)
Bari
Corsica
Sardinia
Calabria Sicily
VISIGOTHIC KINGDOM
Strait of Gibraltar
NORTH AFRICA
Mediterranean Sea
Danube R.
DALMATIA
BALKAN MTS.
BULGARS
AVARS
SLAVS
BALKANS
Constantinople
Black Sea
Dnieper R.
Volga R.
Caspian Sea
Aral Sea
Jaxartes R.
BYZANTINE EMPIRE
Ephesus
Antioch
PALESTINE SYRIA
Damascus
Jerusalem
Alexandria
EGYPT
Nile R.
Red Sea
Mecca
MESOPOTAMIA
Tigris R.
Euphrates R.
Ctesiphon
SASSANID EMPIRE (PERSIA)
Persian Gulf ARABS
Indus R.
N
W
E
S
0 250 500 miles
0 250 500 kilometers

Lombards
Avars
Danube Bulgars
Ravenna
Basques
Rome
Duchy of Benevento
Visigothic Kingdom
Thessalonica
Constantinople
Black Sea
Abasgians
Iberia
Armenia
BYZANTINE EMPIRE
Carthage
Syracuse
Antioch
Berbers
Mediterranean Sea
ARAB CALIPHATE
Jerusalem
Alexandria

First, I'll start with the Arab conquests. The Arab Caliphates invaded the Byzantine empire in the Levant, in Egypt and in Africa, and then later some local Amazigh kingdoms too. The reasons as to why they did so are really complex and would realistically need their own answer. In any case, many Amazigh tribes willingly converted to Islam (again, for many complex reasons), and worked with the Caliphate to continue the conquests in Africa, Iberia and later up to France. Eventually, Amazigh subjects found themselves heavily discriminated by the Umayyads as non-Arabs and forced to pay the Jizya, a tax normally applied to Dhimmis, alongside taxes meant for Muslims. They revolted, because of course it's unfair and haram, and won! Thus, most of the Maghreb west of Ifriqiya was freed.

Aftermath of the Berber Revolts

But that wasn't the end of Arabic influence. The Amazighs hated the discriminatory policies taken by the Caliphate, but they weren't really anti-Arab, and they continued to follow Islam too. And, as you would know, Arabic is the language of Islam, and it has a really special status in most Muslim societies. As such, the language proliferated and was spread throughout the populace. Many Amazigh tribes would choose or help Arab dynasties take power, for various reasons. And Arab dynasties were not discriminatory, and treated their subjects fairly. North African dynasties, no matter their ethnic origin, would encourage the usage of Arabic in the administration and the religious life, as devoutness, prestige and trade interests gave the language a lot of value for both the government and the population. Arabic thus flourished in city centres and amongst the elite, akin to Latin in Europe.

Loss of the Maghreb by the Fatimids

Another event that pushed Arabization in North Africa happened a couple centuries later, the Hilalian invasion. Bedouin tribes from Yemen were sent by the Shiaa Fatimid dynasty, centred in Cairo at the time, to punish their disloyal Amazigh subjects in Africa who refused to pay tribute anymore, and to devastate their lands and economies. The Bedouin tribes did as such, until they were stopped by the Amazigh Almohad dynasty from Morocco, who made them their vassal and settled them in various regions of North Africa, as their now loyal subjects.

Almohad holdings

The migration of the Hilalian tribes, despite them not being that numerous, left a great legacy, as they came into contact with many Amazigh tribes and shared with them their language, both by trade and by marriage. As Arabic was a desirable language, it eventually grew in the region, until it became a majority in some places of the Maghreb, especially in the rich plains and the city centres, whereas Amazigh stayed a dominant force in the country-side and in more isolated areas, such as mountains, oasis, or deserts.

Post-colonial Africa with dates

Finally, the last push for Arabization in the Maghreb was done by the colonial and post-colonial states. Post-colonial governments, usually constituted of European-educated Arab urbanites, were increasing literacy rates, something that the Europeans purposefully wanted to avoid doing. State Arabization was a policy chosen to boost internal stability and allegiance to the state, and was seen as a tool of solidarity in the MENA region. Dreams of a strong Arab Union, or even of a local Maghrebi Union, that would defend the ex-colonies of the region from European imperialism followed suit, but this never came to be.

As you can see, the only discriminatory Arab state, the Umayyads, held the Maghreb for only about 50 to 120 years, depending on the region. Afterwards, many Amazigh tribes were free to choose what they would do, and they still accepted Islam and Arabic. If that doesn't tell you anything, nothing will. Other pushes for Arabic happened, such as following the Hilalian invasions, and after the end of European colonization. Another thing to note is that no dynasty would force Arabic unto Amazigh tribes, and many were free to take the Arab identity, and many did so. That's why there wasn't much bad blood between the two communities before the colonial era, since the links between them were strong, and they all belonged to one large extended family. And that's why most Maghrebis don't talk of an Arab colonization, because it was never enforced unto them, and thus it was never perceived as such.

One reason why there are rifts today between the two communities is due to the discriminatory measures taken by the Europeans, who tried to use Amazigh tribes against Arab tribes, and who treated them all unequally anyways, but to different degrees. (Same thing for the Jews, who were given French citizenship freely to act as a balance against Algerian Arabs, a proposition that many humans would take if given the chance. Now, Algerians are extremely anti-Israel, guess why!)

Another issue is, of course, the discriminatory measures taken by the post-colonial states, who enforced Arabic and banned Amazigh, but as you can see that is all a pretty recent phenomenon, and not something that can be blamed on "Arab colonization", because it wasn't really an issue historically.

Ottoman dominance and rivalry with Habsburg Spain

The Ottoman Empire in 1683 AD,
at its greatest extent
1300 - 1359
1359 - 1451
1451 - 1512
1512 - 1520
1520 - 1566
1566 - 1683
Vienna
Budapest
Venice
Belgrade
Sofia
Black Sea
Constantinople
Rome
Baku
Caspian Sea
Tunis
Athens
Algiers
Mediterranean Sea
Damascus
Tripoli
Baghdad
Alexandria
Jerusalem
Cairo
Medina
Mecca
Red Sea

Now, the Ottomans. I would simply say that the Ottomans aren't badly seen in North Africa because they assisted the region against the Iberian conquests and imperialistic advances, and protected North African Islam (the Ottomans claimed the Caliphate, and all Maghrebis but Moroccans recognized the Sultan as such). They also didn't treat their North African subjects discriminatorily and didn't enforce Turkish (in cities, most were fellow Muslims who spoke or understood Arabic, a language the Ottomans had plenty of experience with, and thus had no need to use Turkish). As such, Ottomans are seen in the Maghreb as defenders of Islam, and their legacy is about that. No significant or forced Turkification happened, no massive bloodshed, no genocides, no blatant discrimination. The Ottomans helped retook cities that were once under Muslim control, such as Oran, they rescued Andalusian and Jewish refugees who fled Christian persecutions and the inquisitions, they and helped the Maghreb flourish in trade and become a feared naval power. In Morocco, some might remember the Ottoman attempts at conquering the country, whose failure is both taken as a symbol of national pride and of sibling rivalry, but the Ottomans have been good friends at times too, and were seen as allies against an aggressive and unreasonable Christendom. That's why nobody talks of Ottoman colonization, because it's not perceived as such either, the opposite actually.

Colonial map of Africa by European power

Lastly, the French (and other Europeans). This period is indubitably seen as an era of weakness and shame by all Maghrebis, and the word colonization is properly used here. The Europeans were known to be extremely racist and discriminatory, with the White Man's burden and all that. Some horrible policies taken, that were inhuman crimes really, are so disgusting that I simply do not have the heart to write them here, google at your own risk. The French forced many Algerians to flee their lands, and then partitioned these "new acquisitions" over to European colonists. Land confiscations were common too in Morocco and Tunisia, something that drove Maghrebis to poverty and famine. The French, Italian or Spanish languages were imposed onto the natives and were required if you wished to live in cities and have a real job. Many Maghrebis were "encouraged" to abandon Islam for Christianity if they wanted to better their lives. Massacres and genocides were frequent, natives were forced to abandon their historical traditions and adopt European customs, and no matter how much one tried, they would still be treated as subhumans by the government anyways, while finding themselves licking colonist boots for life, without prospects of reaching a decent life. The Europeans ignored previous loyalties, and split the land between them without care for historical borders, suzerainty or allegiances, only European interests. Morocco especially lost a lot of land to France and Spain, which eventually went to Algeria, Mauritania and the short-lived Western Sahara. Europeans, especially the French, kept meddling in local affairs, and tried to pit tribes against tribes to increase French control and influence, while diminishing local and traditional authorities, such as the Moroccan Sultan or the Tunisian Bey. Algerian traditions were almost 100% uprooted, the Beys and Emirs were gone, and the only laws recognized were French laws. Algeria became a French département, which saw it's settler population climb to almost 15%, on historically Algerian lands that were stolen by force. Famines would be recurrent, and people would die by the tens of thousands because they had no lands to grow food on, and the French would raid them anyways to keep their numbers low. During many of the inter-European wars, Maghrebis would be forcibly conscripted, or "encouraged" to join the army, and then sent to do the dirty work of the White Man. But when time came to take pictures that would stand in the annals of time, to reward them, to pay pensions, etc., Europeans suddenly forgot who came to their aid when they needed it and sent them back home, in utter disrespect and shame. The French even massacred some Senegalese soldiers who asked for at least some semblance of a pay following WW2. Spain was brutal in the Rif, it regularly massacred villages and used chemical warfare, and they still were unable to win without French assistance. As of today, the region is still known to have high rates of cancer due to the chemicals used at that time. The Maghreb, over the decades, kept revolting and asking for better rights, especially to a state that claims "Liberte, Egalite, Fraternite", to no avail. The Europeans only left because of WW2, which left them unable to retain control over the region due to general bankruptcy. And even then, the Algerian war for independence was an extremely bloody conflict, one that eventually shifted into a one-sided genocide under the French. As of today, the French government haven't really apologized or paid reparations or pensions, it's all magically "forgotten", as if that didn't happen, and they dare taunt their ex-colonies from time to time. Many French people still claim that these were "the good ol' days", and that it wasn't really so bad. Trains anybody!?!

So yeah, you can see a bit why Maghrebis refer to the European colonization as "colonization" proper, and not the Arab or Ottoman conquests. Because, under various Arab or Turkish rulers, the locals, no matter their ethnicity, were treated fairly, as long as they were loyal of course. People had rights, they felt protected and they weren't at risk of genocide. These historical periods are seen positively and with pride in the history of the Maghreb, because Maghrebis got the chance to contribute to their own societies under their own laws, of their own free will, without being humiliated or fearing for their lives. Something that wasn't the case under European imperialism, when North African cultures were at risk of eradication, and the Maghrebi people found itself subjugated to unjust foreign governments who truly gave no shit about them, and who only cared about what they could extract and bring back to the metropole, and on which fertile lands they could steal and settle.

B-but, trains, right!?!

Related Links

Can what Arabs did before the Europeans in Subsaharan Africa, in countries like Sudan, Somalia, and Tanzania, be considered a process of colonization? Why don't people usually talk about this Arab acculturation and colonial expansion in Africa?

Why didn't the Arabs colonize sub Saharan Africa?

Why won't Morocco allow self-determination for the Sahrawi people, when it is guaranteed under the UN chart? Is it colonialism? (or) if there's other issue, please educate me. Thanks.

Why do Egyptians speak bad English even though Britain colonized it for 72 years while people in Morocco speak good French even though France colonized it for only 44 years?

Why do you think that Maghreb and Arab countries like Somalia and Sudan are not Arab countries when you are from the Levant, you are less Arab than those?

What is the difference between Arab colonization and European colonization? What even happened during the colonial period in general?

Which Maghrebi dialect (Moroccan, Algerian or Tunisian) is the least difficult to understand for native Arabic speakers from Bilad Al-Sham, Masr and Al-Khalij and why?

Do all Lebanese look Arab or do some look French/European?

If the Arabs should have a "Free Palestine", Should the Arab colony countries of Algeria, Tunisia, Libya, and Morocco disband themselves and go to the Arabian desert and let the Berbers get their homeland back as compensation?

Did Lebanese people decide whether they are French or Arab?
Which one is Somalia, Arab or African?

If the 280 million African Arabs (Egypt, Sudan and the Maghreb) unified into one nation, wouldn't the Arabs rule Africa?

I see in many Maghrebian people some hatred in their eyes when they look at me for example so why do they come to live in France if they hate this country and the French?

Do you think Maghreb will give up the French language in the future?

Why wasn't Saudi Arabia colonized by the British or the French like the rest of the countries in the MENA region?

Quel est l'intérêt de Macron de déclassifier toutes les archives sur la guerre d'Algérie ?

Frédéric Cagliari Précédent lieu : Aix-les-Bains Mis à jour le 12 sept.

Parce que la transparence c'est mieux que de rester à s'envoyer des fions avec le gouvernement algérien. Il est grand temps que les historiens puissent bosser correctement, et ça coupe l'herbe sous le pied des débiles qui claironnent partout que la France a des trucs à cacher. On a trop longtemps laissé la porte ouverte aux mensonges et aux absurdités, si vous voulez aller de l'avant faut crever l'abcès.

Je prends l'exemple de Thomas Sankara, la France a fait figure d'assassin tout désigné, malgré l'indignation des responsables des services secrets de l'époque, ben depuis que les dossiers sont déclassifiés, l'enquête a rebondi au Libéria, et Compaoré est appelé à rendre des comptes, mais rien qui accable la France d'une façon ou d'une autre.

Le secret n'a jamais fait qu'alimenter les ragots, et une mémoire apaisée a besoin que tout soit mis sur la table. Je comprends pas bien les gens qui disent que c'est dans un but électoral ou pour faire diversion, d'une tout le monde s'en branle à part les éditorialistes, et de deux le taux d'abstention des quartiers est notoirement supérieur à la moyenne, donc faut vraiment être con pour espérer en faire une réserve de voix.

Bref! Critiquer quelqu'un quand il fait oeuvre de vérité c'est quand même un comble, quelques soient ses raisons ce genre d'efforts devrait toujours faire consensus et être salué, mais non... Même ça faut le critiquer!

Questions similaires

Pourquoi on demande tout le temps à la France de s'excuser envers l'Algérie pour les morts de la Guerre d'Algérie et pas à l'Algérie de s'excuser pour les actes du FLN durant la même période ?

Pourquoi Emmanuel Macron a-t-il tenu des propos durs à l'égard de l'Algérie ?

En se rendant à la commemoration du massacre du 17 octobre 1961, Emmanuel Macron a-t-il fait un pas vers l'apaisement avec l'Algérie ?

Pourquoi la France ne s'est pas encore excusée pour ses crimes durant la guerre d'Algérie ?

Le rapport sur la guerre France Algérie de Benjamin Stora est-il objectif ou n'a-t-il pour but que de contenter les deux parties ?

Quel est et a été l'impact de la guerre d'Algérie sur la politique française ?

Pourquoi la France passe-t-elle son temps à s'excuser pour l'Algérie, le Rwanda, l'esclavage, Napoléon, etc.?

Pourquoi la France a-t-elle perdu la guerre d'Algérie alors qu'elle a tué beaucoup plus d'Algériens qu'elle n'a subi de pertes ? (Question traduite)

Pensez-vous que Macron doit s'excuser pour la colonisation de l'Algérie, la Tunisie, le Maroc ...?

Pourquoi Emmanuel Macron n'appelle-t-il pas l'Algérie et le Maroc à cesser l'escalade militaire ?

La France a perdu des guerres contre le Mexique, Haïti, l'Algérie, le Vietnam. La France a-t-elle déjà gagné une guerre sans alliés ?

Pourquoi la France a-t-elle perdu la guerre d'Algérie ?

Pourquoi Emmanuel Macron « reconnaît » la responsabilité de la France dans l'assassinat d'Ali Boumendjel en Algérie ?

Pensez-vous comme certains ont pu le dire que "l'Algérie n'était pas une nation, seule la France a fait du pays une nation" ?

L'Algérie aurait-elle pu rester française ?

La France doit-elle s'excuser pour son passé colonial, comme le demande l'Algérie ?

Pierre de Lacroix Anciennement International consultant (1999–2018) 1 an J'ai déjà écrit là dessus. D'abord ça ne servira à rien, ensuite on ne va pas refaire l'Histoire et le passé des pays. Sinon, pourquoi ne pas demander aussi à l'Italie des excuses pour l'invasion de la Gaule par Jules Cesar et le traitement qu'il a réservé à Vercingétorix? Pour mémoire, l'intervention française en Algérie était nécessaire parce que la Régence d'Alger n'obeissait plus aux instructions de la Sublime Porte suite aux protestations de la France au sujets des razzias sur les côtes provençales par les algériens! Les algériens ont aussi leur part de responsabilité dans ce qui leur est arrivé. Pour terminer, demandez à des algériens vivant en Algérie s'ils sont contents de leurs gouvernements et s'ils ne regrettent pas la période française au moins sur certains aspects de la vie quotidienne… La Guerre d'Algérie était une erreur, et on aurait dû s'inspirer de ce qu'avait fait Mountbatten aux Indes, et partir sans demander à l'armée d'intervenir et de faire ce pourquoi elle n'est pas faite, c'est à dire la police intérieure. Une fois que les hostilités ont été lancées, les comportements des deux côtés ont été aussi blâmables.

Questions similaires

Pourquoi on demande tout le temps à la France de s'excuser envers l'Algérie pour les morts de la Guerre d'Algérie et pas à l'Algérie de s'excuser pour les actes du FLN durant la même période ?

Pensez-vous que Macron doit s'excuser pour la colonisation de l'Algérie, la Tunisie, le Maroc ...?

Finalement, si l'Algérie était restée française, la France ne serait-elle pas devenu un pays à majorité musulmane ? De manière générale, à quoi ressemblerait la France aujourd'hui si l'Algérie était restée française ?

Pourquoi la France a-t-elle perdu la guerre d'Algérie ?
Est-ce que la France s'est excusée pour son passé colonial ?
La France doit-elle s'excuser perpétuellement pour avoir eu des colonies en Afrique ?

La France est-elle tenue de remettre ses archives à l'Algérie qui les réclame ? Comment l'Algérie pourrait-elle s'en servir ?

Croyez-vous que la France devrait présenter ses excuses aux ex-colonies pour les abus du passé colonial, comme le Mexique l'a demandé récemment à l'Espagne ?

Pourquoi un bon pourcentage des Algériens nés avant l'indépendance (1962) disent que « l'Algérie était beaucoup plus heureuse et prospère du temps de la colonisation française »?

Pensez-vous comme certains ont pu le dire que "l'Algérie n'était pas une nation, seule la France a fait du pays une nation" ?

Pourquoi l'Algérie remet-elle maintenant sur la table la question mémorielle avec la France ?

Pourquoi la France ne s'excuse-t-elle pas une bonne fois pour toutes pour la colonisation vis à vis de l'Algérie ?

La France a-t-elle répandu l'analphabétisme en Algérie pendant la colonisation ?

Pourquoi la France passe-t-elle son temps à s'excuser pour l'Algérie, le Rwanda, l'esclavage, Napoléon, etc.?

Pourquoi l'Algérie ne s'excuse-t-elle pas auprès de la France pour sa tentative ratée de colonisation? Que se serait-il passé si les Sarrasins n'avaient pas été arrêtés à Poitiers?

Pourquoi on demande tout le temps à la France de s'excuser envers l'Algérie pour les morts de la Guerre d'Algérie et pas à l'Algérie de s'excuser pour les actes du FLN durant la même période ?

Frederic VanHolderbeke ingénieur de École nationale des ingénieurs de Metz (Enim) (Diplôme obtenu en 1988)1 an Réponse originale : Pourquoi on demande tout le temps à la France de s'excuser à l'Algérie pour la Guerre d'Algérie et pas à l'Algérie de s'excuser pour les actes du FLN durant la même période ?

Je pense qu'il faudrait, mais le rapport qui a du être remis ce jour au Président devrait le prévoir, remettre toute l'histoire des liens entre la France et l'Algérie à plat : depuis 1830 et aussi pourquoi on y est allé (pour chasser les arabes qui y commettaient des exactions), en passant par l'époque coloniale avec ses bons et mauvais points (construction d'infrastructures, d'hopitaux…. et population locale restreinte aux basses besognes) et enfin la guerre, avec ses atrocités DES 2 COTES.

Mais pour ca faut des couilles. Les aura t-on? pas sur.

En tous cas moi aussi j'en ai marre de ces demandes systématiques de repentance a sens unique. On ne reproche plus aux allemands d'aujourd'hui les crimes du nazisme. Ici ca doit être pareil. Et si ca ne plait pas à Aline, Pierre, Abdul ou Aicha, ils peuvent quitter ce beau et généreux pays ! Pour l'Algérie par exemple.

Questions similaires

La France a perdu des guerres contre le Mexique, Haïti, l'Algérie, le Vietnam. La France a-t-elle déjà gagné une guerre sans alliés ?

Pourquoi les Arabes détestent l'Algérie ?

Finalement, si l'Algérie était restée française, la France ne serait-elle pas devenu un pays à majorité musulmane ? De manière générale, à quoi ressemblerait la France aujourd'hui si l'Algérie était restée française ?

Comment le reste du monde voit-il l'Algérie ?

L'anglais remplacera-t-il bientôt le français comme deuxième langue de la Tunisie, du Maroc et de l'Algérie ?

Pensez-vous comme certains ont pu le dire que "l'Algérie n'était pas une nation, seule la France a fait du pays une nation" ?

Pourquoi l'état français ne publie pas les archives militaires qu'il détient prouvant que la France a spolié des territoires marocains pour les annexer à l'Algérie pendant sa colonisation ?

Pourquoi il n'y a qu'avec l'Algérie que les relations sont souvent tendues alors que la France a occupé d'autres pays ?

Pour quelles raisons Macron vient-il d'annoncer que la France allait réduire drastiquement le nombre de visas accordés au Maroc, à l'Algérie et à la Tunisie ?

Pourquoi la France ne s'est pas encore excusée pour ses crimes durant la guerre

François Hollande comme Emmanuel Macron ont reconnu l'injustice et la brutalité de la colonisation française en Algérie. Pourtant, les Algériens semblent toujours attendre plus. Qu'attendent-ils et pourquoi ?

Sabrina Djaafar Connaissances : Anglais 1 an

Vous parlez au nom du peuple algérien alors que si je me réfère au lien, c'est l'état qui demande des excuses.

En tant qu'algérienne, je trouve que s'est normal de vouloir des excuses et que la France reconnaisse la guerre d'indépendance ainsi que les injustices faites au peuple algérien entre 1830 et 1962, et pas seulement au algérien à tous les pays colonisés.

A l'heure actuelle, si la France a reconnu entièrement les injustices faites ainsi que les crimes coloniaux vis à vis du peuple algérien, je dis que le président algérien joue la comédie pour occuper le peuple au lieu de résoudre les problèmes du pays.

Questions similaires

Pendant la colonisation en Algérie, est-il vrai que la France a octroyé la nationalité française aux indigènes juifs, mais pas au peuple musulman ? Si oui, pourquoi?

Finalement, si l’Algérie était restée française, la France ne serait-elle pas devenu un pays à majorité musulmane ? De manière générale, à quoi ressemblerait la France aujourd'hui si l’Algérie était restée française ?

Pourquoi l'Algérie ne s'excuse-t-elle pas auprès de la France pour sa tentative ratée de colonisation? Que se serait-il passé si les Sarrasins n'avaient pas été arrêtés à Poitiers?

Pourquoi le Vietnam ne s'est-il jamais plaint de la colonisation française contrairement à l'Algérie ?

Pourquoi les Français sont-ils qualifiés de colonisateurs en Afrique du Nord, alors que le Maghreb fut d'abord colonisé par les Arabes (au détriment des Kabyles)?

Comment était l'Algérie avant d'être française ?
La France a-t-elle répandu l’analphabétisme en Algérie pendant la colonisation ?

Que la France ait colonisé l'Algérie, certes, mais est-il exact que les Arabes aient colonisé le Maghreb Berbère et qu'ils l'occupent toujours ?

Pourquoi le Maroc, l'Algérie et la Tunisie sont-ils des pays séparés alors qu'ils ont tous un héritage berbère, arabe et français ?

Pourquoi il n'y a qu'avec l'Algérie que les relations sont souvent tendues alors que la France a occupé d'autres pays ?

Quelle est la vérité la plus brutale sur Emmanuel Macron ?

L'anglais remplacera-t-il bientôt le français comme deuxième langue de la Tunisie, du Maroc et de l'Algérie ?

Pourquoi Emmanuel Macron parle-t-il comme un vieux ?

François Hollande a-t-il été le président le plus intègre ou a-t-il été corrompu dans des affaires dont on ne parle pas ?

Combien de personnes ont été tuées lors de la colonisation française de l'Algérie ?

Pourquoi l’état français ne publie pas les archives militaires qu’il détient prouvant que la France a spolié des territoires marocains pour les annexer à l'Algérie pendant sa colonisation ?

Jean-Marie Gouarné 29 sept.

Une question qui pose d'autres questions…
En admettant que l'État français détienne des archives occultes que l'auteur de cette question (qui ne cite pas ses sources d'information) est seul à connaître et qui démontreraient une spoliation du Maroc au profit de l'Algérie, en quoi la France aurait-elle un intérêt légitime à exhumer des dossiers qui ne pourraient qu'aggraver la crise algéro-marocaine ?

Partout dans le monde les frontières bougent depuis des millénaires; les frontières du Maroc ne font pas exception. Selon quels critères peut-on considérer qu'un déplacement de frontière est plus "spoliateur" qu'un autre ? Sauf erreur, à la fin du XVIIIème siècle, le Maroc s'est agrandi vers l'est en avançant jusqu'à Oujda au détriment de la Régence d'Alger, qui était elle-même un protectorat (théorique) de l'Empire ottoman. Peut-on en conclure que, à cette époque, c'est le Maroc qui a "spolié" des territoires "algériens" ?

Mais aussi, comment la France aurait-elle pu organiser des transferts de territoires entre le Maroc et l'Algérie sans qu'il en reste aucune trace dans les archives du Royaume et dans la mémoire des populations concernées ?

Questions similaires

Pendant la colonisation en Algérie, est-il vrai que la France a octroyé la nationalité française aux indigènes juifs, mais pas au peuple musulman ? Si oui, pourquoi?

Est-ce qu’il est vrai que lors de la colonisation de l'Algérie, les Français ont voulu naturaliser les Kabyles, les envoyer vers la métropole, et les traiter comme les Français de souche vu leurs phénotypes européens ?

En tant que Français, que pensez-vous de la politique coloniale menée par la France en Algérie et au Congo ?

Pourquoi la France a-t-elle perdu la guerre d'Algérie ?

Que la France ait colonisé l'Algérie, certes, mais est-il exact que les Arabes aient colonisé le Maghreb Berbère et qu'ils l'occupent toujours ?

Pourquoi la France n'a-t-elle pas comme toutes ses colonies viré tous les Français de chez elle ?

Pensez-vous comme certains ont pu le dire que "l'Algérie n'était pas une nation, seule la France a fait du pays une nation" ?

Pourquoi l'Algérie ne s'excuse-t-elle pas auprès de la France pour sa tentative ratée de colonisation? Que se serait-il passé si les Sarrasins n'avaient pas été arrêtés à Poitiers?

Pourquoi l'Algérie, qui a acquis son indépendance veut-elle faire de la France une partie de son territoire ?

Pourquoi la guerre de l'indépendance de l'Algérie à durée pour presque 8 ans malgré que la France pouvait se retirer de l'Algérie plutôt ?

Pourquoi les Français ne reconnaissent-ils pas le génocide algérien ?

Pourquoi on demande tout le temps à la France de s'excuser envers l'Algérie pour les morts de la Guerre d'Algérie et pas à l'Algérie de s'excuser pour les actes du FLN durant la même période ?

Que pensez-vous du rapport Stora sur "les questions mémorielles portant sur la colonisation, et la guerre d'Algérie" et sur la réconciliation franco-algérienne ?

Avant la colonisation française en 1830, l'Algérie (ou les territoires qui la formaient) avait-elle déjà été longuement sous domination étrangère ?

Pourquoi la polygamie est-elle pénalisée en France, sous prétexte qu'elle ne fait pas partie de sa culture, alors que les officiels français incitent nos Etats africains à dépénaliser l'homosexualité qui ne fait pas partie de notre culture ?

Pensez-vous comme certains ont pu le dire que "l'Algérie n'était pas une nation, seule la France a fait du pays une nation" ?

Mathieu Dutour Sikiric A travaillé à École Normale Supérieure 7 nov.

Avant la colonisation Française, il y avait la Régence d'Alger qui a existé sur la période 1516–1830.

Cet état était au départ une dépendance pure de l'empire ottoman mais a progressivement gagné une certaine indépendance. La géographie de la régence a varié pendant l'histoire.

Certaines des régions d'Algérie telle la Kabylie et les Aurès ont eu une indépendance a un moment ou un autre. Ces régions ont aussi résisté le plus aux Français et ont plus contribué à la guerre d'indépendance. Il est raisonnable de dire que l'Algérie a son indépendance en 1962 était la plus unifiée qu'elle est jamais été. L'aurait elle été sans la colonisation est une question ouverte.

Voici ci dessous quelques cartes depuis wikipedia:

Questions similaires

Pourquoi il n'y a qu'avec l'Algérie que les relations sont souvent tendues alors que la France a occupé d'autres pays ?

Un Algérien d'un certain âge m'a montré la carte d'identité Française qu'il possédait en 1962, juste avant l'indépendance. Il y était noté "Français musulman". Y avait-il bien un système d'apartheid à l'époque de l'Algérie Française ?

Pourquoi on demande tout le temps à la France de s'excuser envers l'Algérie pour les morts de la Guerre d'Algérie et pas à l'Algérie de s'excuser pour les actes du FLN durant la même période ?

Pourquoi un bon pourcentage des Algériens nés avant l'indépendance (1962) disent que « l'Algérie était beaucoup plus heureuse et prospère du temps de la colonisation française »?

Finalement, si l'Algérie était restée française, la France ne serait-elle pas devenu un pays à majorité musulmane ? De manière générale, à quoi ressemblerait la France aujourd'hui si l'Algérie était restée française ?

La France est-elle devenue une nation multiple et divisée, comme le laisse penser "l'archipel Français" ? Ou a t'elle toujours été ainsi ?

Avec une volonté commune, la France et Algérie pourraient-elles se réconcilier ?

Pourquoi les 350 000 Algériens qui vivaient en France (métropolitaine) en 1962 ne sont-ils pas repartis pour l'Algérie quand elle est devenue indépendante ?

Pourquoi l'Algérie, qui a acquis son indépendance veut-elle faire de la France une partie de son territoire ?

Pensez-vous que la France et l'Algérie pourraient un jour se réconcilier émotionnellement ?

Pourquoi l'Algérie remet-elle maintenant sur la table la question mémorielle avec la France ?

Pourquoi la France a-t-elle perdu la guerre d'Algérie ?

Pourquoi la guerre de l'indépendance de l'Algérie à durée pour presque 8 ans malgré que la France pouvait se retirer de l'Algérie plutôt ?

Pourquoi la France ne s'excuse-t-elle pas une bonne fois pour toutes pour la colonisation vis à vis de l'Algérie ?

Pourquoi la France a-t-elle perdu la guerre d'Algérie alors qu'elle a tué beaucoup plus d'Algériens qu'elle n'a subi de pertes ? (Question traduite)

Qu'est-ce qui a poussé Emmanuel Macron à avouer que le colonialisme français en Afrique était une erreur ? Et pourquoi dit-il qu'il veut ouvrir une nouvelle page avec les anciennes colonies françaises ?

Marc Laubier Plus d'un livre dans son sac 2 ans q: Qu'est-ce qui a poussé Emmanuel Macron à avouer que le colonialisme français en Afrique était une erreur ? Et pourquoi dit-il qu'il veut ouvrir une nouvelle page avec les anciennes colonies françaises ?

Il ne faudrait pas confondre "déclaration politique" avec "aveu". Il s'agit d'inciter les chefs d'état qui participent de loin à l'opération Barkan de remobiliser leur opinion. Il lance donc un appât dans la mare pour faire venir le poisson.

Un président de la république française qui ignore que la colonisation existait avant la 3ème république, ça fait franchement désordre. Ce type ignore que les habitants du Sénégal ont envoyé de cahiers de doléance à l'assemblée nationale en 1788.

Et pourquoi dit-il qu'il veut ouvrir une nouvelle page avec les anciennes colonies françaises ? Je plussoie la réponse de User-9960260458562575338, et je poursuis.

Il devrait avoir le courage de remballer les français et les européens de la force barkan et les laisser les maliens se débrouiller avec les armées du G5 Sahel.

La vraie prise de conscience consisterait à se dire que les africains gémissent systématiquement au néo-colonialisme mais que dès qu'ils ont un problème, c'est l'armée française qu'on appelle parce que les armées locales ne savent pas faire et, semble-t-il, le démontrent chaque jour d'opération. Ils ont un comportement de client comme s'ils payaient pour le service. Il faut arrêter de gonfler la dette avec ce type d'investissement à fonds perdus qui ne rapporte rien, pas même l'estime et la considération du client.

L'assistanat ça suffit !!

Questions similaires

Si la France en a marre d'être accusée de néocolonialisme en Afrique pourquoi ne débarrasse-t-elle pas volontairement le plancher ?

Vous sentez-vous bien représentée lorsque Macron ne rate pas une occasion pour faire de la repentance à outrance sur notre passé colonialiste alors que bien des gens, Français comme Africains, en ont tiré bénéfice ?

Pensez-vous qu'un jour les ex-colonies françaises demanderont des réparations pécuniaires massives à la France pour l'occupation de leurs territoires et avec quelle chance de succès ?

Partagez-vous la déclaration selon laquelle la France continue à sa colonisation de l'Afrique sous forme sournoise et qu'elle empêche les États Africains de prospérer ?

La France doit-elle s'excuser perpétuellement pour avoir eu des colonies en Afrique ?

La France est traitée de néocolonialiste et de voleuse en Afrique, pourquoi insiste-t-elle pour y rester si elle est vomie ?

La France a-t-elle vraiment assassiné des présidents africains et déstabiliser plusieurs pays africains après la colonisation ?

Pourquoi la France n'a-t-elle pas comme toutes ses colonies viré tous les Français de chez elle ?

Que pense le peuple français de la surexploitation des ex colonies par la France ?
Pourquoi l'Afrique est colonisée par la France ? Et de quel droit ?
La colonisation a-t-elle été rentable pour la France ?

Les anciennes colonies françaises d'Afrique devraient-elles suivre l'exemple des anciennes colonies portugaises en chassant la France par la force pour s'en débarrasser ?

Pourquoi le fils du président Denis Sassou Nguesso est mis en examen en France ? Et pourquoi les politiques/PDG français qui ont des biens mal acquis ne sont pas jugés en Afrique ? Est-ce que la France est un pays impérialiste ?

Que deviendra la France sans ses colonies d'Afrique ?

Le Franc CFA utilisé en Afrique de l'Ouest et en Afrique centrale est-il une monnaie d'assujettissement des anciennes colonies de la France ?

La France a-t-elle encore son mot à dire sur l'Algérie ?

Zoubir Berdi 2 ans

Sur le principe la France devrait considérer l'Algérie comme n'importe quel autre pays avec lequel elle de fortes relations économiques et un mouvement humain important. Sauf que…

Sauf que la France a vis-à-vis de l'Algérie une position plus compliquée. Pèle-mêle cela donne:

En tant qu'ancienne puissance coloniale, elle a en sa possession sous forme d'archives 132 ans de l'histoire de l'Algérie. Toutes les archives ne sont pas déclassées. C'est dire la sensibilité de certains dossiers concernant ce pays.
Le pouvoir algérien n'a pas changé depuis l'indépendance du pays à ce jour.

La France a gardé à l'indépendance de l'Algérie un relationnel économique (sociétés françaises), éducatif (enseignants et coopérateurs) et humain (immigrés) important.

Les consulats français en Algérie délivrent plus de visas qu'à n'importe quel autre pays hormis la Chine.

Les Algériens ne considèrent pas la France comme un pays totalement étranger. Oui c'est comme ça! Ils se considèrent un peu chez eux en France d'où certains comportements que beaucoup de français ne comprennent pas et surtout n'acceptent pas.
Les vols les plus denses à partir d'Algérie sont vers la France et de très loin.

Les Algériens se soignent d'abord en Algérie et ensuite en France. (la Nomenklatura et les Algériens aisés se soignent presque exclusivement en France)

Le droit algérien même arabisé, est inspiré presque en totalité du droit hérité à l'indépendance du pays.

La première communauté immigrée en France est d'origine algérienne.

Les étudiants algériens sont la première communauté estudiantine étrangère en France. Plus de 70% ne rentrent pas en Algérie à la fin de leur cursus.

La langue française est enseignée dans les écoles primaires algériennes et la langue universitaire scientifique (sciences, technologie et médecine) en Algérie est le Français.

Les Algériens ont avec la France un relationnel passionnel; ce qui explique leur amertume et leur déception à chaque fois que la France restreint les avantages qui leur avaient été accordés à l'indépendance du pays.

Le contentieux algéro-français sur certains biens en Algérie n'est pas encore réglé. Je pourrais allonger la liste mais l'essentiel est dit.

Comment voudriez-vous qu'avec tout ça, la France puisse avoir une politique "normale" envers l'Algérie? La normalité politique étant celle qu'elle a avec d'autres pays du monde.

Sa politique se doit de tenir compte de ces particularités et aussi de l'esprit particulier des Algériens: esprit où se mêlent rigueur et humeur avec la même intensité.

Je dois corriger une idée fausse : non les Algériens ne considèrent pas la France comme la cause de leurs soucis. Ils attendaient simplement plus que de la "normalité" d'un pays avec lequel ils ont tant de choses en commun.

L'implication ouvertement pro-marocaine de la France dans la décolonisation du Sahara Occidental est mal perçue en Algérie. Cette situation gâche la relation algéro-marocaine et empêche la naissance d'une Union Maghrébine qui aurait beaucoup apporté à ses membres. Les Algériens dans leur majorité considèrent cette immixtion comme la rémanence d'un esprit colonial.

Je profite du sujet pour faire une digression:

Il est totalement faux de dire que l'Algérien est un fainéant qui ne travaille pas: Renault ou d'autres industriels français qui ont employés des travailleurs algériens n'avaient pas eu à se plaindre de la "paresse algérienne".

Si le pays n'est pas développé malgré des richesses fossiles importantes c'est du à des choix économiques désastreux et au manque de réformes idoines. Ceci a enfermé le pays dans une bureaucratie qui empêche tout progrès.

Les nostalgiques de l'Algérie Française font un comparatif qui doit cesser car basé sur des paramètres erronés:

Ils comparent l'économie de l'Algérie coloniale à celle de l'Algérie indépendante et crient à tue-tête que les Algériens ne travaillent pas et qu'ils avaient mis à terre la florissante économie laissée par les pieds-noirs.

Ils oublient de dire que 9 millions d'autochtones algériens étaient réduits au service de ces colons qui bénéficiaient ainsi d'une main-d'oeuvre corvéable à merci. Qu'ils travaillaient et produisaient sous la couverture d'une armée acquise à leurs idées coloniales. Tout mouvement de protestation était noyé dans une répression des plus féroces.

La population algérienne de l'époque était d'environ 10 millions dont 1 million environ, d'origine européenne mais 95% des richesses étaient entre les mains de ces pieds-noirs. On oublie que c'était pratiquement du servage.

A l'indépendance ce déséquilibre devait cesser et les règles du travail redéfinies: l'Algérie indépendante n'est pas une Algérie coloniale et donc la production de richesse ne devait plus répondre à la seule orthodoxie économique mais à une approche qui permettrait un bien -être social pour lequel tant de martyrs avaient péris. Cela ne s'est pas fait comme souhaité, plusieurs méthodes ont été testées et les bons choix n'ont pas été retenus. Mais il n'est pas trop tard et cela viendra.

Prenez un colon X dans un pays méditerranéen, donnez-lui en quantité les meilleures terres, mettez en place des lois qui lui donnent raison contre toute contestation de la part de la main-d'oeuvre qu'il emploie, protégez-le par une police et une armée acquises à ses idées, ouvrez-lui le marché de la France métropolitaine et contemplez les résultats: Grandioses n'est-ce-pas?

X pourrait être arabe, malgache, mongol ou péruvien il obtiendrait les mêmes résultats. Continuer à glorifier jusqu'à la béatitude le X pied-noir n'est plus de mise.

Je comprend parfaitement sa nostalgie et la douleur qu'il a ressenti à quitter un pays aussi magnifique mais ce n'est pas en ressassant négativement des faits si anciens qu'il améliorera son relationnel avec l'Algérie d'aujourd'hui. Après tout il n'avait qu'à rester! Et accepter de participer à la construction d'une nouvelle Algérie.

La porte algérienne est ouverte…

J'ai répondu un peu dans tous les sens car j'ai lu certaines réponses qui allaient dans tous les sens.

Pardon d'avoir été si long.

Questions similaires

Comment était l'Algérie avant d'être française ?
Pourquoi les Algériens, au moins ceux en France, parlent si bien le français ?

Pourquoi la France a-t-elle perdu la guerre d'Algérie ?
Pourquoi certains Algériens font n’importe quoi en France ?

Pourquoi l'Algérie est-elle toujours désavantagée dans les accords bilatéraux (santé, séjour, etc.) avec la France?

L’Algérie et la France sont-elles en train de se rapprocher ?
Que va changer le décès du Général Ahmed Gaïd Salah en Algérie ?

Pourquoi l'Algérie, qui a acquis son indépendance veut-elle faire de la France une partie de son territoire ?

Pourquoi les responsables algériens n’admettent pas et ne veulent pas reconnaître que l’Algérie est une création française ?

Pourquoi il n'y a qu'avec l'Algérie que les relations sont souvent tendues alors que la France a occupé d'autres pays ?

Pourquoi l'Algérie n'a-t-elle pas encore commencé son travail mémoriel contrairement à la France ?

Pourquoi l'Algérie n'a-t-elle jamais été libre ?

Un Algérien d'un certain âge m'a montré la carte d'identité Française qu'il possédait en 1962, juste avant l'indépendance. Il y était noté "Français musulman". Y avait-il bien un système d'apartheid à l'époque de l'Algérie Française ?

Pourquoi la France a-t-elle perdu la guerre d'Algérie alors qu'elle a tué beaucoup plus d'Algériens qu'elle n'a subi de pertes ? (Question traduite)

Pourquoi les 350 000 Algériens qui vivaient en France (métropolitaine) en 1962 ne sont-ils pas repartis pour l'Algérie quand elle est devenue indépendante ?

Pourquoi les Français sont-ils qualifiés de colonisateurs en Afrique du Nord, alors que le Maghreb fut d'abord colonisé par les Arabes (au détriment des Kabyles)?

Jean-Marie Gouarné Mis à jour le 7 mo

Cela tient au fait que certains pays parmi ceux qui ont été colonisés par les Européens au 19ème siècle ont conservé et cultivé l'une des pires pathologies sociales européennes: le nationalisme. Et le nationalisme a généralement tendance à favoriser dans chaque pays une vision sélective de l'histoire. Dans le cas (extrême) de l'Algérie, l'islamo-panarabisme (qui est un élément important de la panoplie idéologique du pouvoir nationaliste en place) a pour but et pour effet d'imposer une légende nationale dans laquelle l'héritage berbère est consciencieusement minimisé et surtout dans laquelle les envahisseurs arabes du Moyen-Âge sont représentés comme des visiteurs pieux et désintéressés accomplissant une mission religieuse avec l'accord des populations autochtones reconnaissantes. Il ne faut pas en rire: il y a encore des gens qui croient réellement à cela. Or une telle reconstruction de l'histoire amène évidemment à désigner les Français comme les premiers et les seuls "colonisateurs".
Tous les régimes nationalistes nés au XXème siècle de la décolonisation cherchent à se définir comme les représentants de nations qui ont toujours existé telles qu'elles sont aujourd'hui et à faire oublier que les cadres politiques et/ou les classes sociales qu'ils représentent sont en réalité des produits de la colonisation. Cela les amène à une posture intellectuelle tendant essentiellement à masquer tout ce qui avait précédé la période coloniale la plus récente et à le remplacer dans la mémoire collective par un passé simplifié, lisse, et de nature à légitimer leur politique actuelle.

C'est ainsi que, dans la mythologie "décoloniale" inhérente à la propagande nationaliste, le Maghreb est perçu comme s'il avait toujours été arabe. Et si, à la rigueur, on admet qu'il y a eu une conquête arabe aux 7ème et 8ème siècles (car ce sanglant chapitre d'histoire est tout de même difficile à escamoter), c'est pour dire que les Arabes n'ont fait qu'accomplir leur destin de "race supérieure" en venant apporter les bienfaits de la vraie civilisation et de la vraie religion à des populations dont on imagine qu'elles vivaient dans la jâhilîya (l'ignorance de Dieu, et par extension la barbarie pré-islamique), c'est-à-dire qu'elles étaient ignares et primitives (ce qui rejoint étrangement le discours des colonialistes européens du 19ème siècle qui se flattaient d'apporter le "progrès" à des populations "arriérées"). Les oppositions qu'ont rencontrées les conquérants arabes sont minimisées, dévalorisées, voire simplement niées. Peu importe l'horreur qu'ont vécue les Imazighen à l'arrivée des Arabes, peu importe la longue résistance qu'ils ont opposée à cette colonisation, peu importe la guerre d'indépendance de 739–743 par laquelle une partie des tribus berbères ont regagné de haute lutte leur indépendance contre le califat Omeyyade: ce sont des chapitres d'histoire soigneusement filtrés dans les programmes scolaires et quasiment censurés dans la société civile. Ce phénomène, toutefois, n'est pas uniformément répandu dans tout le Maghreb; il se manifeste de façon particulièrement aiguë en Algérie, pays ayant été le plus fortement et le plus directement soumis à l'administration coloniale française et où le rejet de la France est parfois perçu comme un élément clé de la construction nationale.

Certains vont jusqu'à présenter la conquête arabe comme exclusivement dirigée contre l'occupation byzantine, et par conséquent à qualifier de supplétifs au service des Grecs les combattants berbères qui ont résisté à cette invasion… Ignorance ou mauvaise foi ? Cette vision est incompatible avec des faits par ailleurs connus. Dans les années 680, c'est sous commandement berbère que la coalition berbéro-byzantine a remporté la victoire de Tahouda et délogé les Arabes de Kairouan. En 698, après avoir chassé les Byzantins de Carthage, perle du Maghreb et symbole fort de participation des Berbères à la civilisation méditerranéenne, le gouverneur arabe a fait raser la ville (dont les civils ont été exterminés), au lieu de la laisser aux autochtones. Ce sont les Berbères seuls, définitivement abandonnés par les Grecs, qui ont supporté le poids de la lutte lors de la phase finale de la conquête arabe (698–709). Ce sont aussi les Berbères qui ont subi les massacres et les confiscations de terres, y compris dans des secteurs où les Byzantins n'avaient jamais mis les pieds. Ce sont encore les Berbères qui, une génération plus tard, après s'être ralliés à l'islam, lassés d'être traités comme des musulmans de seconde zone et de servir de troupes coloniales pour le compte du califat de Damas, ont mené la guerre de décolonisation qui, en 743, a abouti à libérer de la domination arabe les territoires correspondant aujourd'hui au Maroc et à l'ouest de l'Algérie. Ils ont alors, il faut l'admettre, manqué une occasion historique: ils n'ont pas réussi à se doter d'une structure étatique forte, capable de préserver l'unité et l'indépendance du Maghreb, qui aurait ainsi été à l'abri des guerres locales dévastatrices du Moyen-Âge et des entreprises coloniales des Temps Modernes, et qui serait peut-être redevenu le pôle majeur de la civilisation occidentale qu'il avait été pendant l'Antiquité. Le monde actuel subit encore les conséquences de cet échec…

Malgré cela, le mot "colonisation", ayant acquis de nos jours une connotation résolument péjorative, on ne souhaite évidemment pas l'appliquer à la conquête arabe qui est le résultat d'une "guerre sainte" et qui a apporté l'islam dans une terre païenne (ce qui, pour certains, excuse toutes les violences). On préfère le réserver à la conquête française, qui provenait d'une civilisation non-musulmane donc "inférieure". Certains vont même jusqu'à affirmer sans complexe que la conversion des Berbères à l'islam serait la "preuve" que les Arabes n'étaient venus que pour des raisons religieuses, sans aucun objectif de domination coloniale, et qu'ils se seraient installés avec la bénédiction unanime des autochtones. C'est un peu comme si on disait que les esclaves noirs d'Amérique approuvaient leur esclavage parce qu'ils avaient adopté le christianisme qui était la religion de leurs maîtres. Ce n'est ni la première ni la dernière fois qu'on invoque la religion à l'appui d'un parti pris politique en mélangeant tout et n'importe quoi.

Dans la tradition musulmane ancienne, le monde était mentalement partagé en deux espaces, le Dar al-Islam et le Dar al-Harb, désignant respectivement l'ensemble des pays soumis à l'islam et l'ensemble des pays non encore soumis et de préférence à conquérir. La possibilité d'une régression du Dar al-Islam, c'est-à-dire de la conquête par des infidèles d'un territoire peuplé de musulmans et/ou ayant adopté l'islam comme religion d'État, était initialement impensable, tandis que le Dar al-Harb était (et reste pour les islamistes fanatiques) un territoire de guerre, un territoire à prendre. Cette vision du monde, sérieusement ébranlée depuis le Moyen-Âge par le recul de la domination musulmane en Espagne puis dans les Balkans, n'a peut-être plus cours officiellement, mais elle a laissé des traces. L'occupation d'un pays musulman par une puissance non musulmane constitue, en soi et indépendamment de la violence de l'occupant, un traumatisme insupportable car le Dar al-Islam est un territoire considéré comme irréversiblement acquis. L'extrême brutalité de certains épisodes de la colonisation française au Maghreb est la cause consciente la plus souvent invoquée du ressentiment contre les Français, mais la cause fondamentale, semi-consciente, de ce ressentiment, provient de ce que la France était une puissance non-musulmane, une puissance venue du Dar al-Harb qui, en foulant le sol du Dar al-Islam, a en quelque sorte “inversé les rôles” et commis l’inadmissible. Tout cela est rarement dit dans les media, c’est généralement confiné dans le non-dit, mais dans les mentalités le plus grave des crimes commis par la France au Maghreb est probablement d’avoir conquis une terre musulmane en étant un pays de mécréants, de kouffar. Cette vérité est plus ou moins refoulée car à notre époque il n’est pas politiquement utile d’exprimer des griefs à caractère directement religieux contre un pays étranger qui se veut laïc. La rhétorique revendicative est donc obligée de s'appuyer sur des valeurs issues de la culture des ex-colonisateurs européens (notamment les droits de l’homme, l'égalité entre les peuples, et tout ce qui en découle), car le seul moyen de parvenir à l'objectif, qui est de culpabiliser l'ancienne puissance coloniale, c'est de dénoncer la contradiction entre ses propres valeurs morales d'aujourd'hui et sa politique coloniale d'autrefois. Cependant, il est certain que les massacres et autres exactions commis par la France pour “pacifier” le Maghreb seraient plus facilement pardonnés, voire complètement oubliés, s’ils avaient été commis par un conquérant venu de l’intérieur du Dar al-Islam. Il est donc logique que l’infamante qualification de “colonialiste” soit réservée à la France, et qu’on n’ose pas appliquer le même mot aux actes de domination commis dans le passé par des musulmans.

On peut faire à ce sujet un constat très significatif. La plus importante domination étrangère qu’ait subie l’ensemble du monde arabe au cours des Temps Modernes (XVIème au XXème siècle) a été celle de l’Empire Ottoman. Pourtant, le ressentiment exprimé au Proche-Orient à propos des anciennes dominations étrangères vise principalement les puissances occidentales qui ont brièvement occupé la région après le démantèlement de l’Empire Ottoman qui, quant à lui, est apparemment “pardonné”. Les Turcs sont des musulmans, et apparemment l'influence de l'islamisme est telle que la colonisation d'un pays musulman ne s'appelle plus colonisation dès lors que le colonisateur est également musulman…

Il faut dire aussi que les colons français, lorsqu'ils ont envahi l’Algérie avec leurs gros sabots et leur niveau d'instruction médiocre en matière d'histoire des civilisations, ont souvent manqué de finesse (c'est le moins qu'on puisse dire !) et ont plus d'une fois utilisé sans vergogne le mot "arabe" à tort et à travers. Par l’usage abusif de ce mot pour désigner indistinctement tous les résidents d’origine non-juive et non-européenne, les colons et l'administration française ont fait le jeu du panarabisme et minimisé l’identité berbère de la région, accréditant le mythe d’un Maghreb “arabe depuis toujours”. Mais il est vrai que les Européens n’en sont pas à un amalgame près: dans les mentalités populaires au nord de la Méditerranée, Alger était parfois considérée comme une ville turque (parce que de 1516 à 1830 la Régence d'Alger était théoriquement un protectorat ottoman).

Le système idéologique nationaliste, au Maghreb, implique inévitablement d'une part la diabolisation de la période coloniale française et d'autre part la neutralisation de l'histoire berbère et pré-musulmane de la région. C'est la combinaison de ces deux tendances qui, logiquement, amène à faire comme si la colonisation française était la seule colonisation étrangère dont le Maghreb ait été victime depuis l'origine des temps.

La mythologie nationaliste maghrébine culmine particulièrement en Algérie, dont le régime politique est d'autant plus embarrassé que son existence même est un pur produit du colonialisme français et que, pour justifier sa légitimité et faire oublier les difficultés économiques, sociales, ethniques et religieuses qu'il a du mal à surmonter, il doit se construire une image de représentant d'une "Algérie éternelle", arabe et musulmane depuis toujours. Le fait que le mot "Algérie" ait été inventé par les Français après 1830, que l'ancienne Régence d'Alger n'ait jamais contrôlé plus du tiers de ce qui constitue aujourd'hui l'Algérie, que l'élite dirigeante d'Alger se soit enrichie pendant trois siècles par la piraterie et le trafic d'esclaves sans faire le moindre effort de modernisation, que la grande majorité du territoire ait été dominée par des clans indépendants (surtout berbères), et que le statut géopolitique du pays ait été longtemps celui de zone-tampon entre les royaumes de Tunisie et du Maroc, tout cela est aujourd'hui assez largement censuré. On retrouve là des idées analogues à ce qu'on a connu en France sous la Troisième République et le régime de Vichy: ces idées qui faisaient remonter la "France éternelle" à "nos ancêtres les Gaulois", alors que le mot "gaulois" (qui vient du latin gallus) a été inventé par les conquérants Romains, et que la France actuelle n'est que le produit des colonisations successives de l'Hexagone par des envahisseurs celtes, italiens, germaniques, berbères, scandinaves et j'en passe.

C'est ainsi que la Charte d'Alger qui, en 1964, présente les fondements idéologiques du régime issu de la guerre d'indépendance, définit clairement l'Algérie comme "un pays arabo-musulman", et n'accorde qu'une concession ambiguë aux autres cultures ayant participé à la construction du pays en ajoutant que "cette définition exclut toute référence à des critères ethniques et s'oppose à toute sous-estimation de l'apport antérieur à la pénétration arabe". Cette rhétorique embarrassée se contredit elle-même car il est paradoxal d'affirmer l'identité arabo-musulmane du pays alors qu'on prétend exclure toute référence à des critères ethniques. Elle manifeste surtout une position extrêmement dévalorisante pour la culture berbère, qui n'est pas citée et qui est présentée non sans désinvolture dans l'enveloppe fourre-tout des "apports antérieurs à la pénétration arabe" qui sont visiblement considérés comme secondaires. Un peu plus loin dans le même texte, il est dit que “l’essence arabo-musulmane de la nation algérienne a constitué un rempart solide contre sa destruction par le colonialisme”, ce qui veut dire a contrario que la culture berbère a compté pour rien dans la construction nationale. Dans un autre passage, il est question de “la suppression brutale des institutions, l’appropriation directe des terres, des moyens d’échanges et de l’appareil étatique par une minorité étrangère”, mais le propos vise exclusivement l’invasion française, alors qu’il s’appliquerait aussi bien à ce qu’ont subi les populations autochtones lors de l’invasion arabe (à un seul bémol prêt: au Moyen-Âge les colonisateurs arabes ne se sont pas exactement appropriés l’appareil étatique, ils ont surtout détruit le peu qui en restait, conséquence logique de la bédouinisation subie par une grande partie du territoire pendant les décennies qui ont suivi l’invasion).

Il est donc logique que la colonisation arabe soit également un sujet tabou, car, toujours d'un point de vue nationaliste-panarabiste, on ne peut pas admettre que le Maghreb soit un pays berbère, et que les Berbères aient été, pendant toute l'Antiquité et le début du Moyen-Âge, des Occidentaux, culturellement beaucoup plus proches des Espagnols, des Italiens et des Français du Midi, que des Arabes.

Comme s’il fallait oublier le temps de Publius Terentius Afer (Térence en Français), Berbère né à Carthage, devenu un grand auteur dramatique romain du 2ème siècle av. J.-C., qui a mis dans la bouche d’un de ses personnages cette belle réplique universaliste: “Je suis un homme; je considère que rien de ce qui est humain ne m'est étranger”, à des années-lumière des tristes querelles communautaires que nous connaissons. Comme s’il était gênant que, pendant les siècles précédant la conquête arabe, la première langue du Maghreb ait été le tamazight et que la seconde langue ait été, comme partout autour de la Méditerranée, le latin (langue internationale qu'une forte minorité de Berbères "de souche" parlait couramment). Comme s’il était interdit de savoir que le site d'Alger a été occupé pendant plus d'un millénaire par la cité berbère d'Ikosim, un comptoir commercial d'abord fondé par des Phéniciens et qui, comme Carthage, a été une porte du Maghreb largement ouverte sur l'international. Comme si on ne voulait pas reconnaître que la seule époque de l'histoire avant 1962 durant laquelle le territoire de l'actuelle Algérie a été à la fois unifié et indépendant à été, aux 2ème et 1er siècles avant J-C, celle du royaume numide fondé par Massinissa (ou Masnsen en tamazight)… un royaume berbère.

L’incendie criminel, survenu à Baghaï en 2016, de la statue de la Kahina (la reine guerrière des Aurès, héroïne de la résistance contre l’invasion arabe autour de l’an 700), est une manifestation récente de la phobie qui anime certains milieux extrémistes algériens et/ou islamistes à l’égard des symboles de l’histoire berbère. Une phobie qui, 15 ans après l'affaire Guermah et le Printemps Noir de 2001, était toujours présente.

C’est en Algérie que culmine une réécriture nationaliste de l'histoire tendant à effacer simultanément le passé berbère et l'empreinte française. Ces deux tentatives d'oubli apparemment disjointes relèvent en réalité d'un seul et même combat. L’anti-berbérisme s’appuie sur une logique spécieuse selon laquelle, puisque les Français ont très épisodiquement (et de manière aussi inconsistante que maladroite) tenté d’utiliser l’identité berbère pour diviser la société algérienne, alors l’identité berbère n’est qu’un artifice du colonialisme. Bel exemple de rhétorique tendancieuse s’appuyant sur le vrai pour prouver le faux. En cherchant à faire passer le sentiment identitaire berbère pour une création du colonialisme, on essaie tout simplement de masquer que c'est le nationalisme arabo-musulman, né du contact avec l'Europe occidentale et renforcé par les relations spéciales du FLN avec l'Égypte de Nasser pendant la guerre d'indépendance, qui est un produit d'importation récente en Algérie.

Peut-être veut-on aussi faire payer à la communauté kabyle le fait d’avoir refusé, au XIXème siècle, de se soumettre inconditionnellement aux mouvements d’inspiration arabo-islamique contre la colonisation française (bien que la suite de l’histoire ait largement démontré les dangers du radicalisme religieux). Quand, dans les années 1930, alors que le courant nationaliste qui allait mener à l’indépendance commençait à prendre de l’ampleur, les oulémas professaient que “quiconque s’éloigne de la langue arabe s’écarte du même coup de l’adoration de Dieu, et quiconque s’écarte de l’adoration de Dieu encourra de sa part un terrible supplice”, la menace visait évidemment la langue berbère tout autant que la langue française. L'histoire de la guerre de libération Algérienne est aussi l'histoire de la marginalisation systématique et parfois de l'élimination violente, au sein du mouvement d'indépendance, de tout ce qui représentait la berbérité et la laïcité, au profit de la tendance arabo-islamiste dure. C'est dans ce contexte qu'est intervenue par exemple en 1957 la liquidation physique (par des agents du FLN) d'Abane Ramdane, dont les principes politiques étaient réputés, comme le dira plus tard le président Ben Bella, "entachés de berbérisme et tournant le dos à l'islam". Et le caractère artificiel et exogène de l'arabo-islamisation forcée du mouvement est devenu encore plus évident depuis qu'on connaît l'ampleur de l'influence égyptienne, et donc du panarabisme nassérien, sur l'évolution du FLN: une influence étrangère qui équivalait à une condamnation à mort de l'identité berbère.

Certes, au début du 21ème siècle, il a bien fallu accorder une petite concession à la culture berbère en reconnaissant le tamazight comme "une langue nationale et officielle", mais il suffit de lire les articles 3 et 3bis de la Constitution algérienne pour comprendre que cette reconnaissance ne va pas beaucoup plus loin que celle du Breton, du Basque ou du Kanak en France, et que la langue berbère est traitée comme si elle n'était qu'un dialecte provincial. En France, nous avons bien connu, au lendemain de la révolution jacobine, un phénomène de "francisation" visant à éradiquer les langues régionales dans le cadre d'un projet nationaliste et centralisateur, mais le mouvement d'arabisation mené en Algérie par le FLN depuis l'indépendance, tout en se situant lui aussi dans le cadre d'un projet nationaliste, va beaucoup plus loin car il vise à favoriser non pas une langue autochtone parmi d'autres, mais une langue importée au détriment d'une langue qui est non seulement autochtone mais qui, en plus, est ou a été parlée dans toute l'Afrique du nord.

Mais comme si tout cela n'était pas déjà assez compliqué, il convient d'ajouter que le Maghreb n'a pas subi que des agressions extérieures. Il a aussi, comme beaucoup d'autres régions du monde, été victime d'envahisseurs venus de l'intérieur. L'exemple le plus brutal se situe quelques siècles après l'invasion arabe initiale (essentiellement menée par des Yéménites, de 647 à 709) et quelques autres siècles avant l'invasion française. Je parle de l'éphémère empire des Banu Abd al-Mumin qu'on appelle plus communément les Almohades (1147–1269), issu d'un clan berbère du Haut-Atlas marocain mais dont le véritable fondateur, Abd al-Mumin ben Ali (également nommé Abdelmoumen), était originaire de Nedroma aux environs de Tlemcen. Un empire qui, en un temps record, a conquis le Maghreb du Maroc à la Tripolitaine ainsi que tout Al-Andalus (c'est-à-dire l'Espagne musulmane). Les Almohades étaient ce qu'on appelle aujourd'hui des "islamistes radicaux". Ils ont mis en oeuvre un fanatisme religieux qui ne correspondait pas aux valeurs et aux traditions du monde musulman, en général plutôt tolérant. Ils ont pratiqué à grande échelle la conversion forcée, obligeant juifs et chrétiens à devenir musulmans sous peine de mort (ce sont eux qui, par exemple, ont introduit en Espagne la persécution des juifs que les chrétiens allaient continuer par la suite). Ils ont harcelé et réduit au silence les savants les plus brillants de leur temps, à commencer par le fameux Ibn Rochd plus connu sous le nom d'Averroès, accusé de "trahir la religion", et ont interdit les métiers de philosophe et de musicien. En détruisant l'avance intellectuelle qu'avait Al-Andalus par rapport à l'Europe du nord, ils ont précipité le déclin scientifique, moral et politique de l'Islam d'occident. Dans ce qui constitue aujourd'hui l'Algérie, le principal "exploit" d'Abd al-Mumin a été la destruction totale de Tlemcen avec élimination physique de tous ses habitants. Les massacres de masse étaient d'ailleurs pour lui une activité banale, comme en témoigne l'exécution de 30.000 habitants de Marrakech à la même époque. De nos jours, on parlerait de crime contre l'humanité, mais en tout état de cause on peut considérer que l'aventure Almohade a été une très mauvaise affaire pour le Maghreb, et qu'elle a fait plus de dégâts que la pire des colonisations étrangères. Et pour comble de tragique, les Almohades n'ont même pas bien fait ce qu'ils étaient censés savoir faire le mieux: la guerre. En effet, après avoir massacré des musulmans par dizaines de milliers sous prétexte de purification religieuse, ils ont trouvé le moyen, malgré la supériorité de leurs forces, de se faire écraser par les chrétiens espagnols en 1212 à la bataille de Las Navas de Tolosa, préparant ainsi la chute d'Al-Andalus. Ainsi, l'empire Almohade a fait plus de mal qu'une croisade et n'a été qu'une entreprise d'auto-destruction de l'Islam maghrébin et ibérique qui, à cause de lui, s'est retrouvé en position d'infériorité à la fin du Moyen-Âge alors qu'auparavant il était à la pointe de la civilisation en Occident. Pourtant, certains considèrent aujourd'hui Abd al-Mumin comme un "héros national" algérien. Ce qui démontre (une fois de plus) à quel point le nationalisme est aveugle et ignorant, au point de ne pas voir l'existence d'une agression coloniale quand le colonisateur appartient au même groupe ethnique et religieux que le colonisé.

Tout cela est bien dommage, car on ne peut malheureusement pas minimiser l'importance des agressions subies par les peuples maghrébins avant l'arrivée des Français sans dissimuler du même coup le fait que le Maghreb a été, pendant longtemps, un espace de civilisation particulièrement brillant qui a su tirer parti de toutes les cultures méditerranéennes avec lesquelles il a été en contact étroit sans jamais perdre sa propre culture berbère. Pour les Maghrébins, oublier le passé pré-arabe, ce serait comme si les Égyptiens oubliaient le temps des pyramides. Ressasser exclusivement et indéfiniment les tragédies et les crimes de l'époque française, une époque certes encore proche mais néanmoins aussi révolue que les précédentes, c'est renoncer à connaître les grandeurs et les souffrances des autres époques, et donc laisser dans l'ombre la plus grande partie de l'immense patrimoine historique d'une région qui a tout de même joué un rôle important dans le développement de la civilisation. Mais pour en finir avec cette focalisation obsessionnelle, il faudrait des hommes de la trempe de l'émir Abd-el-Kader, à la fois adversaire acharné de la colonisation française, grand érudit autant que grand chef de guerre et habile diplomate, profondément religieux mais ouvert aux autres cultures, doté d'une large vision géopolitique, connu et respecté dans le monde entier malgré sa défaite, qui a su créer le premier État algérien autonome des temps modernes (malheureusement trop tard pour empêcher la colonisation), mais qui était tout le contraire d'un vulgaire nationaliste. Hélas, on est loin du compte et si, à Alger, on honore la statue d'Abd-el-Kader, sa pensée est un peu oubliée, voire falsifiée…

EDIT - Compte tenu des commentaires de Raph Zribi et Eugène Dalett, je précise que, la question étant posée de manière générale sur l'Afrique du nord, ma réponse est également générale. De propos délibéré, elle ne rend pas compte de la diversité des histoires nationales et communautaires, dont la connaissance est indispensable à une bonne compréhension de tout ce qui se rapporte à la colonisation et à la décolonisation du Maghreb, mais qui est trop riche pour être correctement adressée dans le cadre de cette réponse.

Pourquoi il n'y a qu'avec l'Algérie que les relations sont souvent tendues alors que la France a occupé d'autres pays ?

Abdelwaheb Hammami Licence d'histoire de Université de lettres et sciences humaines Tunisie 9 avril (Diplôme obtenu en 1970) 2 ans

Pour répondre objectivement à cette question il n'y a pas mieux que de s'appuyer sur des sources françaises de l'époque et c'est au lecteur de se faire l'idée adéquate sur les relations entre la FRANCE et l'ALGERIE:

1-LA CONQUETE:

Les Français ont conquis l'Algérie à partir de 1830 par la force des armes. Et de ce fait tous les moyens étaient bons pour eux pour arriver à leur fin,usant des pires atrocités qui, de nos jours sont qualifiées de génocides,crimes contre l'humanité…

Un des conquérants français qui se vantait de couper les tetes des algériens en guise de remède à ses soucis !!!!!Quel cynisme !!!!

Quelques textes illustrent bien le terrorisme des conquérants français:

"Tout ce qui vivait fut voué à la mort ; tout ce qui pouvait être pris fut enlevé, on ne fit aucune distinction d'âge ni de sexe. Cependant l'humanité d'un petit nombre d'officiers sauva quelques femmes et quelques enfants. En revenant de cette funeste expédition, plusieurs de nos cavaliers portaient des têtes au bout de leurs lances et une d'elles servir, dit-on, à un horrible festin"

Pellissier de Reynaud, cité par C.-A. Julien, ibid., p. 92.

L'année précédente, le général Cavaignac avait utilisé le même procédé pour obtenir la reddition de la tribu des Sbéahs. Le général Canrobert en a donné le récit suivant "On pétarada l'entrée de la grotte et on y accumula des fagots de broussailles. Le soir, le feu fut allumé. Le lendemain quelques Sbéahs se présentèrent à l'entrée de la grotte, demandant l'aman à nos postes avancés. Leurs compagnons, les femmes et les enfants étaient morts"

C.-A. Julien, op. cit, p. 320. « Aman » signifie sûreté.

La répression menée conjointement par l'armée (y compris l'aviation et les navires de guerre en rade de Bougie et Djidjelli qui bombardèrent l'arrière-pays), la police et les milices des colons, fit plusieurs milliers de morts, dans la région de Sétif et de Kherrata notamment . "Jamais depuis 1842, et le maréchal de Saint-Arnaud, l'Algérie n'avait connu, même aux jours les plus sombres de son histoire, de répression plus féroce contre un peuple sans défense... Sur les routes, à travers les sentiers, dans les champs, dans les rivières, et dans les ravins, ce n était que cadavres entrouverts où s'engouffrait la gueule sanglante de chiens affamés... Çà et là des villages entièrement rasés éléments d'une humanité primitive- fuyant sous les balles meurtrières des civilisés. Dans les charniers de morts peut-être étaient-ils quelques coupables. Il y avait sûrement en tout cas des dizaines d'innocents."

Le Courrier algérien du 26 mai 1946, cité par M. Kaddache, op. cit., p. 717.

LE RESULTAT:les morts algériens de l'implacable conquête de l'Algérie1 ont été évalués entre 250 000 et 400 000, voire plus2. Les victimes de la déstructuration du vieux mode de production communautaire, en particulier lors de la grande famine de 1868 suite à une récolte désastreuse3, furent bien aussi nombreuses, et peut-être plus : au total il y eut disparition peut-être bien d'un quart à un tiers de la population algérienne de 1830 à 1870.

2-LA SOUMISSION

Les français se sont comportés en pays conquis ou le vaincu est soumis au bon vouloir du vainqueur.

Il y eut en Algérie aussi dépossession de 2,9 millions d'ha sur 9 millions cultivables : le tiers en quantité, mais plus en qualité car ce sont les meilleures terres qui furent prises - du fait des confiscations, des expropriations pour cause d'utilité publique, de saisies pour dettes de paysans insérés de gré ou de force dans le système monétaire et ayant dû mettre leurs terres en gage. Quant à l'œuvre d'éducation, tant vantée, d'après les chiffres officiels, 5 % de la population était scolarisée dans les écoles françaises en 1914, moins de 15 % en 1954 ; et elle n'augmenta qu'in fine durant la guerre de libération et du fait du plan de Constantine du général de Gaulle. La langue arabe, reléguée au second plan, n'était enseignée dans le système français que dans les trois « médersas » officielles, puis les « lycées franco-musulmans » après la seconde guerre mondiale. Le congrès des maires d'Algérie de 1909 avait voté une motion demandant « la disparition de l'enseignement indigène », au désespoir de l'apôtre de l'école républicaine française Charles Jeanmaire, qui fut de 1884 à 1908 le recteur de l'académie d'Alger.

La discrimination est aussi fiscale : les « impôts arabes » spécifiques (« achour », « hokor », « lezma », « zakat ») sont payés par les Algériens jusqu'en 1918, dans la continuité du beylik de l'époque ottomane, et avec sensiblement les mêmes taux. S'y ajoutent les « centimes additionnels » et la corvée formellement, l'assimilation fiscale fut édictée en 1918. Ce furent ainsi largement les paysans algériens, dont entre le 1/3 et le 1/5 de leurs revenus s'envolait en impôts, qui financèrent la colonisation française, c'est à dire leur propre dépossession. Au politique, l'égalité dans une citoyenneté commune fut refusée pendant longtemps ; puis, avec le statut de l'Algérie de 1947, furent institués deux collèges distincts élisant chacun le même nombre de représentants : au prorata de la population, un électeur français équivalait à huit électeurs algériens.

La pire des discriminations est celle qui fut instituée à travers de ce qu'on a appelé "le code de l'indigénat"Le Code de l'indigénat dans l'Algérie coloniale

Des restrictions à la liberté

Une liste de 27 infractions spécifiques à l'indigénat a été établie en 1874. Augmentée en 1876 et 1877, elle comporte en 1881, par exemple, les infractions suivantes : réunion sans autorisation, départ du territoire de la commune sans permis de voyage, acte irrespectueux, propos offensant vis-à-vis d'un agent de l'autorité, même en dehors de ses fonctions, etc... Outre le séquestre, l'indigène peut être puni d'une amende ou d'une peine d'internement. À ces peines individuelles peuvent s'ajouter des amendes collectives infligées aux tribus ou aux douars, dans le cas d'incendies de forêts.

Inutile de dire que l'exercice des libertés publiques, celles de réunion ou de circulation - totalement supprimées, de 1862 à 1890, puis légèrement assouplies - est extrêmement restreint.

Codifiées en 1881, les infractions spéciales constituent progressivement un véritable code de l'indigénat. Il faut les distinguer des crimes et délits commis en violation de la loi française, lesquels sont du ressort de la loi française.

(Source : “Qu’est-ce qu’un Français ? Histoire de la nationalité française depuis la Révolution”)

3-LA GUERRE D'ALGERIE 1954–1962

Elle commença le 1er novembre 1954.Elle fut accompagnée d'atrocités inimaginables.D'ailleurs celles-ci on débuté en 1945 avec les "évenements de Sétif et Guelma

Quand la victoire de la démocratie sur la barbarie nazie est apparue imminente, certains musulmans d'Algérie ont espéré que serait enfin mis en application le droit des peuples à disposer d'eux-mêmes.

Parmi eux Messali Hadj, chef du PPA (Parti Populaire Algérien), interdit depuis 1939. Mais celui-ci est jeté en prison par les autorités françaises et 20.000 de ses partisans défilent le 1er mai 1945 à Alger en sa faveur.

Le matin du 8 mai, une nouvelle manifestation survient à Sétif aux cris de «Istiqlal [Indépendance], libérez Messali». Les militants du PPA ont la consigne de ne pas porter d'armes ni d'arborer le drapeau algérien mais un scout musulman n'en tient pas compte et brandit le drapeau au coeur des quartiers européens.

La police se précipite. Le maire socialiste de la ville, un Européen, la supplie de ne pas tirer. Il est abattu de même que le scout. La foule, évaluée à 8.000 personnes se déchaîne et 27 Européens sont tués dans d'atroces conditions. L'insurrection s'étend à des villes voisines, faisant en quelques jours 103 morts dans la population européenne.

La répression est d'une extrême brutalité. L'aviation elle-même est requise pour bombarder les zones insurgées. Après la bataille, les tribunaux ordonnent 28 exécutions et une soixantaine de longues incarcérations (*).

Officiellement, les autorités françaises estiment que le drame aura fait 103 morts chez les Européens et 1.500 chez les musulmans. Les autorités algériennes parlent aujourd'hui de 45.000. Les historiens spécialistes évoquent quant à eux 2.500 à 6.000 morts. Une guerre que la France a longtemps reniée;On parlait ,officiellement, d'événements et des actions militaires ,d'opérations de maintien de l'ordre. Et ce n'est qu'en 1997 que les pouvoirs publics ont autorisé l'ouverture de certaines archives.En 1999 l'assemblée nationale finit par reconnaitre que les événements d'Algérie étaient bel et bien une guerre.

Une véritable guerre,que l'historien français BENJAMIN STORA qualifiait de "guerre ensevelie" , et que les pouvoirs publics ont mis longtemps à reconnaitre…POURQUOI ???? La raison est toute simple : La France voulait éluder certaines vérités compromettantes sur sa politique militaire en Algérie qu'on peut qualifier aujourd'hui de crimes de guerre,de crimes contre l'humanité,de génocide …..Cela consiste à utiliser systématiquement la torture et la liquidation arbitraire des opposants algériens et meme des français qui sympatisent avec le FLN,essentiellement des communistes.

Laissons les documents de l'époque parler de la torture qui a caractérisé la guerre d'Algérie.

Méthodes de tortures pendant la guerre d'Algéérie

La théorie de la guerre contre-révolutionnaire, élaborée à l'École supérieure de guerre (ESG) par Lacheroy, Trinquier et Jacques Hogard, est sous-tendue par une idéologie nationale-catholique élaborée par la Cité catholique, groupe intégriste dirigé par Jean Ousset, ex-secrétaire personnel de Charles Maurras, le fondateur de l'Action française. Georges Sauge, qui participe avec Ousset à l'élaboration de cette doctrine, a ainsi déclaré :

«La logique de la guerre révolutionnaire, ce n'est pas la guerre en soi, mais le discours politique et idéologique qui le sous-tend ; or la guerre contre-révolutionnaire que ces officiers avaient conçue n'avait pas de logique ni de support idéologique.»

Le militant Georges Sauge, en « croisade » contre les communistes déclare:« Ces jours qui ébranlèrent Alger peuvent amorcer un mouvement que l'histoire retiendra comme une signification providentielle en faveur des Francs et de leur mission civilisatrice au service de Dieu (...) Les militaires représentent (...) la vérité, la grandeur, la puissance de notre patrie, qu'ils protègent dans le dernier verrou de la liberté : la dignité de l'homme sur la terre d'Afrique. » l'historienne Raphaëlle Branche écrit ainsi :« Certains signes montrent que Paris a peut-être davantage l'oreille ouverte aux violations des droits de l'homme que par le passé. Dans cette lettre, par conséquent, Jean Reliquet revient avec insistance à la question des tortures […] Autrement dit, il ne connaît que la partie émergée de l'iceberg car il ne dispose que des informations qui lui parviennent en sa qualité de procureur général […] Pourtant, à cette époque, la torture est massivement pratiquée à Alger et pas uniquement en vue d'obtenir des renseignements, comme on l'a souvent dit, mais bien pour terroriser la population […] elle touche désormais tout le monde, « sans distinction de race, ni de sexe ». Autrement dit, des Européens aussi sont torturés par l'armée française. Et l'ampleur prise par la pratique de la torture « pour tous » dans ces mois-là est bel et bien une nouveauté. Des communistes, des progressistes, des membres des centres sociaux ont été arrêtés, détenus au secret, torturés à Alger dans les premiers mois de l'année 1957, par le 1er RCP mais aussi par d'autres. Un régiment en particulier semble d'ailleurs s'être « spécialisé » dans les Européens : le 1er REP, des légionnaires basés à la villa Susini […] Aucune distinction de sexe n'est opérée : les femmes aussi sont détenues puis torturées, ce qui constitue là encore une nouveauté.»

Robert Bonnaud 1929–2013 historien et militant anti-colonialiste analyse en ces termes la sublimation et la rhétorique justificatrice qui porte les militaires à commettre de tels actes:« Histoire absurde, sadisme gratuit ? Non. Dans ce pays, l'énorme majorité des suspects, et aussi de ceux qui ne le sont pas, aident réellement les patriotes, ne serait-ce que par leur silence. On ne court pas grand risque, par des tortures ou des brimades intempestives, de se mettre à dos la population : le peuple algérien a perdu confiance en notre faux libéralisme et nos promesses menteuses... Le maintien de notre domination a exigé, exige, exigera des tortures de plus en plus épouvantables, des exactions de plus en plus générales, des tueries de plus en plus indistinctes. Il n'y a pas d'Algérien innocent du désir de dignité humaine, du désir d'émancipation collective, du désir de liberté nationale. Il n'y a pas de suspect arrêté à tort et torturé par erreur. »

En 1961, un article paru dans le journal clandestin anticolonialiste Vérité-Liberté expliquait:

«À la ferme Ameziane, centre de renseignement et d'action (C.R.A.) de Constantine, elle se pratique à l'échelle quasi industrielle.(...) C'est à la ferme Ameziane que sont conduits tous les suspects pris par les unités de l'Est algérien. L'arrestation des « suspects » se fait par rafles, sur renseignements, dénonciation, pour de simples contrôles d'identité. Un séjour s'effectue dans les conditions suivantes : à leur arrivée à la « ferme », ils sont séparés en deux groupes distincts : ceux qui doivent être interrogés immédiatement et ceux qui « attendront», à tous on fait visiter les lieux et notamment les salles de tortures « en activité » : éléctricité(gégène), supplice de l'eau, cellules, pendaisons, etc. Ceux qui doivent attendre sont ensuite parqués et entassés dans les anciennes écuries aménagées où il ne leur sera donné aucune nourriture pendant deux à huit jours, et quelquefois plus encore.

Les interrogatoires, conduits conformément aux prescriptions du guide provisoire de l'officier de renseignement (O.R.), chapitre IV, sont menés systématiquement de la manière suivante : dans un premier temps, l'O.R. pose ses questions sous la forme « traditionnelle » en les accompagnant de coups de poing et de pied : l'agent provocateur, ou l'indicateur, est souvent utilisé au préalable pour des accusations précises et... préfabriquées. Ce genre d'interrogatoire peut être renouvelé. On passe ensuite à la torture proprement dite, à savoir : la pendaison (...), le supplice de l'eau (...), l'électricité (électrodes fixées aux oreilles et aux doigts), brûlures (cigarettes, etc.) (...) les cas de folies sont fréquents (...) les traces, cicatrices, suites et conséquences sont durables, certaines même permanentes (troubles nerveux par exemple) et donc aisément décelables. Plusieurs suspects sont morts chez eux le lendemain de leur retour de la « ferme ».

Les interrogatoires-supplices sont souvent repris à plusieurs jours d'intervalle. Entre-temps, les suspects sont emprisonnés sans nourriture dans des cellules dont certaines ne permettent pas de s'allonger. Précisons qu'il y a parmi eux de très jeunes adolescents et des vieillards de 75, 80 ans et plus. À l'issue des interrogatoires et de l'emprisonnement à la ferme, le « suspect » peut être libéré (c'est souvent le cas des femmes et de ceux qui peuvent payer (...) ou interné dans un centre dit « d'hébergement » (à Hamma-Plaisance, notamment) ; ou encore considéré comme « disparu » (lorsqu'il est mort des suites de l'interrogatoire ou abattu en « corvée de bois » aux environs de la ville. (...)

Les « interrogatoires » sont conduits et exécutés par des officiers, sous-officiers ou membre des services du C.R.A. (...) Les chiffres - car il y en a - sont éloquents : la capacité du « centre » entré en activité en 1957, est de 500 à 600 personnes, et il paraît fonctionner à plein rendement en permanence. Depuis sa constitution il a « contrôlé » (moins de huit jours de prison) 108 175 personnes ; fiché 11 518 Algériens comme militants nationalistes sur le secteur ; gardé pour des séjours de plus de huit jours 7 363 personnes ; interné au Hamma 789 suspects. »

Pourquoi l'Algérie est-elle toujours désavantagée dans les accords bilatéraux (santé, séjour, etc.) avec la France?

Louis-Marie Aubé Lieu : Paris, France1 an

Petit-fils de l’histoire d’Algerie, d’un département à jamais perdu. Sans revenir sur l’histoire passée qui n’est ni celle de ceux qui écrivent l’histoire actuelle (la jeunesse française et algérienne) , ni celle de ceux qui sont aux commandes (les dirigeants français et algériens)

Je suis souvent ettonné par la haute teneur explosive des sujets franco algérien. Et l'incapacité des dirigeants Algériens et d'une partie des ressortissants en France à vivre autrement qu'en réactionnaires vis à vis de l'histoire FrancO-Algérienne, alors qu'il me semble que l'on peut pas construire une trajectoire de vie de génération en génération sur le passé de son pays.

Cet avis péremptoire étant donné, si les accords bilatéraux sont si défavorables à l'Algérie, je ne comprends pas La part significative d'algériens en France(ou même bi-nationnaux) Et la non équivalence je ne comprends pas des lois comme le regroupement famillial ni les quotas « avantageux » de l'Algerie, D'ailleurs je ne le comprends pas vis à vis de la France mais aussi de tout d'autres pays, ni les règles business qui font qu'un algérien peut posséder des entreprises en France mais pas l'inverse, Ni les entrées facilités d'algériens sur le sol français quand l'inverse est d'une difficulté particulièrement pénible obligeant les français à mille subterfuges.

Et puis quand on parle santé Je suis amusé, on peut peut-être parler du nombre d'algériens en France ou pas qui en bénéficient (coucou les dirigeants de l'Algerie) versus le nombre de français qui en bénéficient en Algérie, et pour quel niveau de prise en charge (je parle au global, pas de mesquinerie…)

Pour une raison qui m'étonne toujours les meilleurs relais de la victimisation Algérienne, restent souvent les bénéficiaires des avantages des deux pays (Résidents, bi-nationaux et les dirigeants Algériens)

Je souhaite donc bon courage à tous les français qui voudraient s'installer en Algérie en se fondant sur des accords bilatéraux ou de réciprocité.

Nb:1/à la relecture de la question, quand je lis « toujours » il y a déjà un os, faudrait il comprendre que les accords sont imposés à L'Algérie? et dans ce cas quel est l'intérêt pour la France (bonne question A poser sur Quora)?

2/ il me semblait que s'il y'a accord c'est qu'il y'a des avantages et inconvénients(en tout cas vécus comme tels à l'époque) , il serait donc opportun dans un post complémentaire de les reprendre un par un pour Tenter de les lister)

3/ vous l'aurez compris c'est une réponse à l'emporte pièce

Questions similaires

Pourquoi il n'y a qu'avec l'Algérie que les relations sont souvent tendues alors que la France a occupé d'autres pays ?

La France a-t-elle encore son mot à dire sur l'Algérie ?

Pourquoi les Algériens qui sont hyper nationalistes quand ils sont en France ne peuvent pas s'arrêter de pleurer quand on leur dit qu'ils vont retourner dans leur beau pays ?

Pensez-vous comme certains ont pu le dire que "l'Algérie n'était pas une nation, seule la France a fait du pays une nation" ?

Pourquoi la guerre de l'indépendance de l'Algérie à durée pour presque 8 ans malgré que la France pouvait se retirer de l'Algérie plutôt ?

Comment était l'Algérie avant d'être française ?
Que pensez-vous des Algériens ?

Le rapport sur la guerre France Algérie de Benjamin Stora est-il objectif ou n'a-t-il pour but que de contenter les deux parties ?

Pourquoi la France a-t-elle perdu la guerre d'Algérie alors qu'elle a tué beaucoup plus d'Algériens qu'elle n'a subi de pertes ? (Question traduite)

Que pensez-vous de l'Algérie ?
Pourquoi certains Algériens font n'importe quoi en France ?

Pourquoi les 350 000 Algériens qui vivaient en France (métropolitaine) en 1962 ne sont-ils pas repartis pour l'Algérie quand elle est devenue indépendante ?

Pourquoi la France ne s'excuse-t-elle pas une bonne fois pour toutes pour la colonisation vis à vis de l'Algérie ?

L'Algérie aurait-elle pu rester française ?

La France est-elle tenue de remettre ses archives à l'Algérie qui les réclame ?
Comment l'Algérie pourrait-elle s'en servir ?

Comment les Français et les Algériens perçoivent-ils la guerre d'Algérie ? How do the French and the Algerians view the Algerian war?

Andréa Mathias Lieu : Paris, FranceTraducteur 6 mo

Gérard Briais European by reason: Cette réponse peut ne pas être une traduction fidèle de la réponse de Gérard Briais dans Quora en anglais :

Très différemment, c'est le moins que l'on puisse dire.

Les Algériens sont encore extrêmement sensibles pour ne pas dire agressifs sur la question.

Les Français ont tourné la page et ne veulent plus en entendre parler.

Je ne discute pas du caractère positif ou négatif d'une telle attitude, je me contente de l'exposer pour que chacun comprenne bien de quoi il s'agit.

Les Allemands ont été capables de faire une autocritique complète sur leur histoire douloureuse, les Français non.

Edit : Je dois préciser que l'attitude des Vietnamiens est à l'opposé de celle des Algériens : les Vietnamiens ont vaincu l'armée française comme ils ont ensuite tenu en échec la superpuissance américaine : être victorieux donne confiance et évite de mariner dans le ressentiment pour finalement exiger des excuses et des réparations.

Les Allemands n'ont pas fait l'objet d'une immigration massive de leurs anciennes colonies, les Français oui.

Les Allemands commencent à souffrir d'actes isolés d'incivilité de la part d'immigrés, les Français sont confrontés depuis des années à une très forte hostilité des enfants d'immigrés de la troisième génération qui n'est pas sans conséquence sur la montée du Front national dans ce pays.

Dans ces conditions, l'incompréhension ne peut être que totale entre les deux pays.

Je ne suis même pas sûr que la disparition de tous les acteurs de cette guerre puisse apaiser les esprits comme ce fut le cas entre Français et Allemands.

Questions similaires

Pourquoi on demande tout le temps à la France de s'excuser envers l'Algérie pour les morts de la Guerre d'Algérie et pas à l'Algérie de s'excuser pour les actes du FLN durant la même période ?

Pourquoi certains français ayant participé à la guerre d'Algérie refusent-ils d'évoquer cette période de leur vie ?

L'Algérie aurait-elle pu rester française ?
Que pensent les Français de la guerre d'Algérie, aujourd'hui ?

Un Algérien d'un certain âge m'a montré la carte d'identité Française qu'il possédait en 1962, juste avant l'indépendance. Il y était noté "Français musulman". Y avait-il bien un système d'apartheid à l'époque de l'Algérie Française ?

Pourquoi il n'y a qu'avec l'Algérie que les relations sont souvent tendues alors que la France a occupé d'autres pays ?

Pourquoi la France a-t-elle perdu la guerre d'Algérie ?
La guerre d'Algérie était-elle une guerre civile ?
Comment était l'Algérie avant d'être française ?
Pourquoi l'Algérie n'est-elle pas resté française ?

Pourquoi la France ne s'est pas encore excusée pour ses crimes durant la guerre d'Algérie ?

Pensez-vous comme certains ont pu le dire que "l'Algérie n'était pas une nation, seule la France a fait du pays une nation" ?

Pourquoi les Français ne reconnaissent-ils pas le génocide algérien ?

Le rapport sur la guerre France Algérie de Benjamin Stora est-il objectif ou n'a-t-il pour but que de contenter les deux parties ?

Le gouvernement Algérien est-il depuis toujours anti Français et si oui, devrions-nous faire de même avec eux ?

Comment la France est-elle arrivée à acculturer le peuple algérien ?

Thang Pham bigboss chez Myself (2003–aujourd'hui) 8 mo

C'est plutôt le FLN qui a acculturé le peuple algérien en lui bourrant la tête avec la haine de la France et son nationalisme rance, alors que l'héritage culturel de l'Algérie est d'une richesse absolument incroyable.

L'histoire de l'Algérie n'a pas commencé en 1832 mais des siècles, voire des millénaires avant, et durera longtemps après. Le FLN et ses intellectuels affiliés privent les Algériens à la fois de leur héritage millénaire et de leur futur pour les enfermer dans un disque rayé qui passe en boucle de 1832 à 1962…

Questions similaires

Pourquoi il n'y a qu'avec l'Algérie que les relations sont souvent tendues alors que la France a occupé d'autres pays ?

N'est-ce pas les musulmans marocains, algériens et sénégalés, diabolisés aujourd'hui, qui par leur courage et leur bravoure ont défendu la France contre l'invasion nazie ?

Pourquoi la France ne reconnaît-elle pas les massacres commis contre le peuple algérien ?

Pourquoi autant de polémique sur les Algériens ?

Pensez-vous comme certains ont pu le dire que "l'Algérie n'était pas une nation, seule la France a fait du pays une nation" ?

La France doit-elle s'excuser pour son passé colonial, comme le demande l'Algérie ?

Quel est le problème profond que l'Algérie a avec la France ?
Comment était l'Algérie avant d'être française ?

Pourquoi les Algériens, au moins ceux en France, parlent si bien le français ?

Pourquoi les Marocains ne supportent pas les Algériens, qui ont pourtant une culture similaire ?

Why is Algeria's abbreviation DZA?

Islam Benfifi Lived in Algeria 7mo

Because Algeria (and Algiers too) in both Algerian Arabic and Berber languages is called "Dzayer".

The official name though uses the Modern Standard Arabic word: "Al-Jazā'ir", which is where "Dzayer" ultimately comes from.

Al-Jazā'ir means "islands" in Arabic, and it refers to a small group if islets not far from Algiers.

Under the Ottoman rule, Algiers was the seat of government and it lended its name to the whole territory since then, until the present day.

Related Links

Is Algeria an Arab Country?
What do you know about Algeria?
Why is Algeria not part of Francophonie?

Why does Spanish reverse the L and R in 'Argelia' when the word is Algeria, Algerie, Algerien, etc?

Is the name "Nadir" common in Algeria?
What is it like to live in Algeria?
Is Algeria culturally close with France?
Where is Algeria located?
Is Aljediya another name for Algeria?
Does Algeria have the internet?

Do North Africans (Egyptians, Algerians, Moroccans, etc.) experience racism from afrocentrists for not being black?

Sadly, the answer is yes! Anthony M Anderson Loves Africa Jan 16

North africans have definitely experienced racism from afrocentrists who claim that north africans were all black before the muslim conquest of the region. I have seen this trend happening online and mostly against north african diaspora.

The 17 year old egyptian mariam moustafa was beaten to death by a group of black girls in the united kingdom cause they thought that mariam wasn't a real egyptian. This is an example of how afrocentrism can make pseudohistory claims that ancient egyptians were all black before muslim invaders came in and thus can also brainwash youths who haven't studied history yet which could to brainwashed youths to violently or threaten white people! Here is how an egyptian was typically harrased by an african american:

Anyways, I'm half english and african and therefore i have experienced harrasment from most quora users cause i debunked afrocentric claims on ancient egyptians

Whoosh the point over your head.

he's asking for data. See the word "most?"

You have no data. You have pulled a bunch of images and created your own narrative.

Sorta like what you accuse Black people of doing.

Upvote

That's not true. He's not interested in the truth. He piling on because he thinks there's no consequence — that's the truth.

There's zero harm that African-Americans or any African feels a connection with Ancient Egyptians. And, it's not a stretch that it is true. Not all African-Americans descend exclusively from slaves. There were black Europeans all over Europe (Britain, Ireland, France, Germany, etc.) for hundreds if not thousands of years. That too is truth.

He's not interested in truth or accuracy. You're likely not either.

Upvote · 2

Anthony M Anderson · Sat

I know it's not harmful but it mostly offends other people when afrocentrists try to claim every civilization as being black!

Upvote · 5 Reply

Becky B · 2h ago

So why would that be offensive?

You just confirmed your intent is to put Black people in their place. Under your foot.

Upvote · 1

Becky B · 2h ago

Whoosh the point over your head.

he's asking for data. See the word "most?"

You have no data. You have pulled a bunch of images and created your own narrative.

Sorta like what you accuse Black people of doing.

Upvote

although these major skin tones were all present....

If your dad is the English half, then genetically you are not African you are Caucasoid- which explains your affinity to believing in the Eurocentric view of Ancient Egyptians, on the outside your mother gave you her skin color but according to your Y-DNA your just a s white as your dad.

Upvote

Lastly, afrocentrists have made racist claims like this one shown below

Quels sont les plats typiques Algériens ?

Ahmed Bourenane · Suivre Je lis bcp sur la nutrition5 h

Bonjour,
En plus du couscous, que les kabyles appelle Seksou, Barboucha chez les chaouis, Taâm chez les arabes, Outchou chez les mozabites, nous avons le fameux frites omelette. Certes, ce n'est pas un plat, il s'agit d'un sandwich.

Ce sandwich très populaire et bon marché, les algériens le mangent souvent dans de petites gargotes.

Pour confectionner ce sandwich, rien de plus simple. On prend une casserole qu'on met sur le feu, on y met un petit filet d'huile végétale, ensuite les frites sur les lesquelles on casse deux œufs. On remue légèrement, histoire de répartir les jaunes d'œuf, ensuite on saupoudre du sel.

Vous prenez ensuite une baguette française (c'est le pain le plus consommé chez nous), vous la couper en deux dans le sens de la longueur, vous badigeonnez les deux faces du pain de la harissa (une sauce piquante très courante en Afrique du Nord) et voilà !

A manger accompagné du soda bien de chez nous, le Hammoud !

Questions similaires

Y a-t-il une différence entre la cuisine marocaine et la cuisine algérienne ?

Comment la garantita, un plat à base de pois chiche est devenu le casse-croute favori des plagistes en Algérie ?

Question polémique : que préférez-vous le couscous marocain, algérien ou tunisien ?
Quel est le meilleur plat en Algérie ?
Pourquoi les français préfèrent-ils aller en Tunisie ou au Maroc plutôt qu'en Algérie ?
Pourquoi les algériens sont-ils si nationalistes ?
Pourquoi la nourriture en Algérie a meilleur goût que en France ?
Quels sont les plats typiques de la cuisine tunisienne ?
Quels plats du Maghreb (Maroc, Algérie, Tunisie) sont inconnus en France ?
Quels sont les plats français les plus appréciés au Maroc ?
Quelles sont les origines des Algériens ?
Quels sont les trois plats typiques de votre pays ?
Quel est votre plat favori au Maroc ?
Qu'est-ce qui est bon au Maroc ou en Algérie qu'il n'y en a pas en France?
Quels sont les meilleurs plats marocains que vous avez déjà dégusté ?

Is Algeria an Arab Country?

Ehsan Qashkuli · Follow

Iranian history lover and everything related to it Fri

Img 1. Berber women

No. Algeria like many other North African countries have a large Non-Arab population. One of these tribes or ethnicities is called the Amazigh. I have talked with many of them and they are good people and very intelligent. He was a nationalistic although I admit that majority of Berbers don't have nationalistic feelings and live peacefully. They are said to be a very ancient set of people (Cro-Magnon) who mixed with South-African and European migrations that moved into the area.

Further reading:

Berbers - Wikipedia
Early European modern humans - Wikipedia

Related Links

What race is an Algerian?

How come Algeria is the biggest country on the African continent and it's not well known at all?

Do Algerians self-identify as black?
Are Algerians Arabs?
Are Algerian and other North African people Arabs?

Do Algerians view themselves as white? If not why do they seem not to identify themselves with the African race?

Why do Algerians look European?
What do North Americans think of Algeria and Algerians?
What are some interesting facts about Algeria?
Why do Algerians like Hitler?
What if whites became the majority in Algeria?
Is Algeria a religious country?
Why is Algeria considered Arab, but why not Spain?
What does a half French half Algerian person look like?
Which Arab countries are indeed Arabized?

Est-il encore vrai que les habitants du Maghreb ont peu de respect pour les leurs qui vivent en France ou dans d'autres pays occidentaux ?

Adil El Nhayli français d'origine marocaine, vivant au CanadaMis à jour le 9 févr.

Déjà il ne faut jamais faire de généralités sur l'opinion des gens en fonction de leur situation géographique ou leur origine. Donc de manière globale, les habitants du Maghreb n'ont pas de mépris pour les personnes de leur pays qui vivent en France ou en Occident. Après il y'a des attitudes, des clichés ou des idées reçues chez certaines catégories de maghrébins qui vivent au Maghreb envers certaines catégories de maghrébins vivant en Occident.

Par exemple :

Les maghrébines qui ont grandi en Occident sont considérées par certains maghrébins du Maghreb comme étant plus occidentalisées, et donc plus "faciles" que les filles qui vivent au Maghreb, ce qui est absolument faux, surtout à notre époque.
Les maghrébins du Maghreb qui viennent de milieux bourgeois ou fortunés, qui ont fait leurs études dans les missions françaises, peuvent avoir une image très négative des maghrébins de France (mis à part les gens qui sont issus de leurs milieux et qui sont partis vivre en France pour leurs études universitaires) car ils savent que ces maghrébins issus de l'immigration viennent souvent de classes qui étaient pauvres, voir très pauvres dans leur pays d'origine. Je suis déjà tombé sur un riche Casablancais qui m’a demandé si je vivais dans un ghetto alors que je suis né et que j'ai grandi dans une des communes les plus bourgeoises des Yvelines..

L'habitude de certains marchands maghrébins au Maghreb que les touristes maghrébins d'Occident peuvent se permettre de dépenser plus, vu qu'ils ont des euros ou des dollars, et que donc ils se permettent de donner des prix plus élevés à ces derniers.

Le stéréotype que les Maghrébins d'Occident vivant comme des clochards toute l'année, à récurer les toilettes des blancs, pour venir se la péter en été au bled avec leur argent durement gagné, à se pavaner et se prendre pour des riches (spécialement vrais pour les Marocains d'Italie, dont beaucoup travaillent dans la construction et vivent à 10 dans une chambre pour venir se pavaner au Maroc avec des grosses montres et des grosses voitures).

Mais mis à part ces quelques clichés, il n'y a pas de mépris des uns par rapport aux autres. Les Maghrébins d'Occident interagissent principalement avec les membres de leurs familles et les amis quand ils sont en vacances "au bled", et les interactions en dehors de ce cercle dépendent des affinités.

Questions similaires

Pourquoi le Maroc, l'Algérie et la Tunisie sont-ils des pays séparés alors qu'ils ont tous un héritage berbère, arabe et français ?

Est-il vrai que ce sont les immigrés qui provoquent le plus d'incidents en France ?

Le Maghreb est-il raciste envers les personnes noires ?
Pourquoi les femmes maghrébines rejettent les hommes maghrébins ?

Pourquoi elles préfèrent se métisser, et pourquoi il est de plus en plus rare de voir des couples maghrébins ?

Peut-on qualifier les pays du Maghreb de pays arabes ?
Pourquoi les Maghrébins sont-ils mal vus en France ?

Les pays occidentaux cesseront-ils de soutenir le régime d'Alger suite aux lourdes et graves accusations soulevées par le président du MAK (Mouvement pour l'Autonomie de la Kabylie) lors de sa conférence de presse d'aujourd'hui ?

La France est-elle entrain de sombrer auprès de l'opinion des pays arabes avec cette histoire des caricatures sur Mahomet ? Comment sortir par le haut de cette tempête qui est entrain de fracturer la société ?

Pourquoi les Algériens qui sont hyper nationalistes quand ils sont en France ne peuvent pas s’arrêter de pleurer quand on leur dit qu’ils vont retourner dans leur beau pays ?

En tant que non-arabe, quelle partie du monde arabe aimez-vous le mieux, le?

Qu'est-ce qui est bon au Maroc ou en Algérie qu'il n'y en a pas en France?

Samir سمير Farid فريد Lieu : Maroc (1977–aujourd'hui) 10 mo

Je dirais les lever et les coucher du soleil dans le désert, c'est absolument fabuleux.

Les remparts des vieilles médinas et les vestiges des cités impériales.

Les veillées de prière au Ramadan,

Les délices du Ramadan,

Les dattes Majhoul éventuellement,

Et surtout la réunion familiale chateureuse autour d'un couscous,

Questions similaires

Pourquoi le Maroc est-il plus fort que l'Algérie ?
La France a-t-elle encore son mot à dire sur l'Algérie ?
Qu'est-ce qui empêche des pays comme l'Algérie et le Maroc à se développer ?
Comment voyez-vous l'Algérie ?
Pourquoi l'Algérie n'est-elle pas resté française ?

Pourquoi il n'y a qu'avec l'Algérie que les relations sont souvent tendues alors que la France a occupé d'autres pays ?

Quel est le problème profond que l'Algérie a avec la France ?
Comment était l'Algérie avant d'être française ?
Est-il vrai qu'il existe des sentiments de haine entre Français et Algériens ?
Aimez-vous l'Algérie ?

Pourquoi certains Marocains n'aiment-ils pas les Algériens?

Pensez-vous qu'à terme la Kabylie finira par obtenir son indépendance du reste de l'Algérie ?

Faut il aussi des excuses de l'Algérie vis à vis des pieds noirs ?
Qu'est-ce que l'Algérie a de différents des autres pays ?
Pourquoi l'Algérie et le Maroc se détestent-ils ?

Combien de "Pieds Noirs" (Algériens d´origine européenne) sont restés en Algérie après la victoire du FLN et la déclaration de l´indépendance du pays ?

Pierre Jamain Anciennement Gérant de S.A.R.L. (Labo photo professionnel) à Labo photo professionnel (1970–2000) 2 ans

Selon la chercheuse Hélène Bracco, ils étaient encore trente mille en 1993. Puis la guerre civile larvée de la décennie noire a fait fuir un grand nombre de ceux qui étaient devenus des «Algériens d'origine européenne », particulièrement visés par les menaces des islamistes — Aujourd'hui, les chiffres, difficiles à établir, diffèrent d'une source à l'autre. Ils seraient «autour de quatre mille cinq cents » selon M. Guy Bonifacio, président de l'Association des Français de l'étranger (ADFE) d'Oran, mais seulement trois cents selon M. Francis Heude, le consul français à

Questions similaires

Si les «pieds-noirs» n'avaient pas quitté l'Algérie après l'indépendance, une cohabitation aurait-elle été possible avec les musulmans, comme les afrikaners et les noirs en Afrique du Sud, et l'Algérie s'en sortirait-elle mieux ?

Finalement, si l'Algérie était restée française, la France ne serait-elle pas devenu un pays à majorité musulmane ? De manière générale, à quoi ressemblerait la France aujourd'hui si l'Algérie était restée française ?

Un Algérien d'un certain âge m'a montré la carte d'identité Française qu'il possédait en 1962, juste avant l'indépendance. Il y était noté "Français musulman". Y avait-il bien un système d'apartheid à l'époque de l'Algérie Française ?

Pourquoi on demande tout le temps à la France de s'excuser envers l'Algérie pour les morts de la Guerre d'Algérie et pas à l'Algérie de s'excuser pour les actes du FLN durant la même période ?

Pourquoi la France a-t-elle perdu la guerre d'Algérie alors qu'elle a tué beaucoup plus d'Algériens qu'elle n'a subi de pertes ? (Question traduite)

Pourquoi un bon pourcentage des Algériens nés avant l'indépendance (1962) disent que « l'Algérie était beaucoup plus heureuse et prospère du temps de la colonisation française »?

Pourquoi la France a-t-elle perdu la guerre d'Algérie ?
Pourquoi l'Algérie ne défend pas les Ouïghours ?
L'Algérie aurait-elle pu rester française ?
La Kabylie pourra-t-elle prospérer après son indépendance de l'Algérie?

Maintenant que l'on a assez de recul, la France a t-elle tirée plus de bénéfices que de maléfices à propos de l'indépendance de l'Algérie ? Et quels sont-ils ?

Que pensent les Français de la guerre d'Algérie, aujourd'hui ?
Pourquoi les français d'Algérie étaient-ils appelés les pieds noirs ?
Faut il des excuses de la France envers l'Algérie ?

En 1945, les troupes nord-africaines Algériens, Tunisiens et Marocains ont participé aux batailles de libération, à Marseille, Monte Cassino, la plaine des Flandres sur les bords du Rhin . Pourquoi ne pas créer une journée nationale en leur

Les pieds noirs parlaient-ils arabe ?

Slimane Azayri Non conformiste et marginalMis à jour le 1 an Né en 1953, avant l'independance de l'Algérie, je n'ai pas connu personnellement de pieds-noirs parlant l'arabe dialectal. Je dois cependant préciser que je suis né et ai grandi en Kabylie du Djurdjura où les pieds~noirs ne s'étaient jamais installés vu que les terres montagneuses ne les intéressaient pas.

D'après les dires de mes parents et des personnes de leur génération, peu de pieds~noirs apprenaient l'arabe dialectal ou les autres langues locales. C'était les algériens ou autochtones ~ analphabètes pour la plupart~ qui apprenaient sur le tas quelques mots de francais pour pouvoir communiquer plus mal que bien avec les européens auxquels ils avaient affaire.

Dans ma région d'origine (Ain El Hammam, ex~Michelet) ou une congrégation religieuse chrétienne avait créé un hôpital (dénommé Sainte~Eugénie), les religieuses, appelées "soeurs blanches" originaires surtout de France métropolitaine, qui le faisaient marcher , parlaient correctement le kabyle qui est la langue de la population de l'endroit.

Les propos ci~dessus ne s'appliquent pas aux juifs d'Algérie qui ne sont pas des pieds~noirs mais des algériens autochtones. Ils parlaient couramment l'arabe dialectal, aussi bien que les autochtones de confession musulmane qui constituent l'immense majorité.

Questions similaires

Albert Camus parlait-il l'arabe ?
Pourquoi les Maghrébins sont-ils également appelés des Arabes ?

Pourquoi beaucoup d'Arabes nés en France se sentent-ils plus arabes que français ?

Qu’est-ce que «نفديك» veut dire en arabe ?
Les Maghrébins sont-ils des Arabes ?
Pourquoi très peu de personnes dans le monde apprennent-elles l'arabe?
Pourquoi dit-on que l'arabe est la langue la plus riche ?
Pourquoi les "kabyles" ne se considèrent pas arabes ?
L’arabe est-il une langue africaine ?
Pourquoi les Arabes détestent-ils les Kabyles ?
Que veut dire « choukran » en arabe ?

Est-ce que la langue arabe parlée au Moyen Orient est très différente de celle parlée au Maghreb ? Est-ce que les 2 types de locuteurs se comprennent facilement ou peuvent identifier le pays d'origine via l'accent ou des expressions particulières ?

Quel pays arabe est le plus occidental ?
Quel peuple arabe parle et maîtrise le mieux l'Arabe classique ?
Qu'est-ce que les Arabes ont apporté au monde ?

Do Arabians see Levantines and Maghrebis as fully Arabs or merely as Arabic speakers?

Rami Canaan Former Employee Updated Jan 26

Generally yes but there are some racists who say “oh you Canaanites, we made you Arabs” or “you are just Roman and Greek remnants”. The problem is not with the racists, the problem is with the false history that racists think is true based on the “standard narrative”.

Arabs were first mentioned in the Fertile Crescent near Syria not Hijaz and Najd. The greatest Arab Kingdoms where all in the Fertile Crescent before Islam. Ghasasneh Kingdom, Nabateans, Homs Kingdom, Palmyra Kingdom, Emirate of Aziz The Arab, and Osroene Kingdom, and Chalcis kingdom.

The Ummayads did Arabize the Levant and our language was mostly Aramaic and Greek but there was already Arab presence with a strong history in central and South Palestine and in multiple cities in Syria, Jordan, Iraq , and Lebanon.

Being an Arab after Islam is not the same as before. If you are speaking Arabic and part of the Arab league then you can identify as an Arab now. We do share alot of values and we unite in multiple of events as one people. we do share a special bond and I do value many Arab countries like I do for Palestine but that doesn't mean we come from the same origin. It is important to understand the history of Arabs outside the Gulf before Islam to understand the full picture of Arabs.

These are Arab kingdoms in the Fertile Crescent before 64 BC

These are Arab kingdoms in the Fertile Crescent before 64 BC

Related Links

Are people from the Levant actually Arabs, or have they been Arabized?
Are Levant Arabs actually Greeks and Romans Persians who turned Arab?

Is it true that Gulf Arabs are actually the pure Arabs while Levantine Arabs are mixed from different tribes that invaded that region?

How do Gulf and Levantine Arabs differ?

Why are the Persian Gulf Arabs darker than Levantine and Maghrebi Arabs as well as Turks, Persians, Armenians and some Indians?

What are the major differences between Gulf Arabic and Levantine Arabic?
Why do some Arabs from the Levant look like Europeans?

Who has more European blood or ancestry, Levantine Arabs or Iranians?
What is the race of Arabs, I mean Arabs from Gulf countries?
Do Arabs believe that present Jews are descended from Levant?
What do "other Arabs" think about the Gulf Arabs?
Are Arab Maghrebis closer to Levantine Arabs or to Berbers?

Are most Arabs today ethnic Arabs from the people in the Maghreb to the people of the levant to the people of the Arabian peninsula? Is it correct to say that due to all the Arab conquests and migrations and mixing?

What are the origins of Levantine Arabs?
Why do Gulf Arabs say that they look nothing like Levantines?
Levantine Arabs and Gulf Arabs almost look identical, you can't tell the difference ?

ALGERIA
Snapshots of History
Boughera El-Ouafi · Follow Posted by Hamid Mon

Most likely, he is the first indigenous African to have won a gold medal at the Olympic Games.

Born in Algeria in 1898 (but at the time his "identity papers" were French), simple helper at the Renault factory in Paris, he had participated in 2 Olympic games in the marathon events.

In 1924, in Paris where he finished 7th, and at the 1928 Amsterdam Olympics where he won the gold medal.

71

Quels plats du Maghreb (Maroc, Algérie, Tunisie) sont inconnus en France ?

Kemal Al Gazzah Ingénieur chez Many entreprises (1994–aujourd'hui)1 an Je pense que le plat le plus inconnu en France est la Mloukhia.

Ce plat n'est pas préparé au centre et à l'ouest Algérien ainsi qu'au Maroc.

Son aire géographique correspond à l'Ifriqiya ou l'Afrika , région qui englobe la Tunisie, l'est Algérien et la Tripolitaine et qui a donné son nom à tout le contient Africain.

Il s'agit d'un plat préparé avec la poudre d'une plante appelé corète potagère

Au Maghreb, cette poudre de corète, dont la cuisson délicate donne à ce plat toute sa saveur, demande plusieurs heures de mijotage à feu doux. D'abord frite dans l'huile, elle est ensuite délayée avec de l'eau bien chaude et demande alors une certaine force, pour que les deux composants (huile et eau) se mêlent jusqu'à former un liquide verdâtre qui deviendra marron foncé au fil de la cuisson lente et des temps de repos de la sauce.

Le plat est préparé avec de la viande de mouton ou bœuf.

On le mange chaud avec du pain de blé traditionnel ou avec la baguette italienne.

Il est servi aussi au cours des cérémonies de mariage et se prépare le jour de l'an du calendrier lunaire, Hégire.

Ce plat est aussi connu au Mali, Niger et au Tchad ainsi qu'en Egypte et dans les pays du Levant mais avec une préparation assez différente de celle du Maghreb.

Questions similaires

Pourquoi les français préfèrent-ils aller en Tunisie ou au Maroc plutôt qu'en Algérie ?
Question polémique : que préférez-vous le couscous marocain, algérien ou tunisien ?
Qu'est-ce que les Marocains aiment manger ?
Quels sont les plats favoris des Marocains ?
Y a-t-il une différence entre la cuisine marocaine et la cuisine algérienne ?
Quelles sont les resources principales de la Tunisie, du Maroc et de l'Algérie ?
Qu'est-ce qui est bon au Maroc ou en Algérie qu'il n'y en a pas en France?
Quels sont les plats typiques Algériens ?
Quels sont les plats français les plus appréciés au Maroc ?
Quel est le meilleur plat en Algérie ?

Quels usages très positifs des sociétés du Maghreb mériteraient d'être adoptés en France ?
Quels sont les plats traditionnels français oubliés ?
Comment faire une sauce algérienne ?
Pourquoi la nourriture en Algérie a meilleur goût que en France ?
Que pensent les peuples d'Afrique (Maroc, Algérie, Tunisie, etc.) du nord de la France ?

Quels usages très positifs des sociétés du Maghreb mériteraient d'être adoptés en France ?

Richard Trigaux (Yichard Muni) , Bac + 2, physique, électronique
Répondu 31 août 2018

En tout premier bien sûr l'abstinence d'alcool. Au lieu de braire pour avoir davantage de drogues.

Davantage de sens collectif, au lieu de chacun pour soi.
Le chèche. Bon d'ac, le chèche c'est pour ne pas se déshydrater dans le désert.

Mais en Europe ça éviterait de transmettre les rhumes et la grippe, en ayant tout de même l'air plus cool que le masque chirurgical.

Quand un gosse fait une idiotie dans la rue, tout le monde a le droit de le réprimander. En France si on fait ça, les parents accourent pour donner raison au gosse. C'est pas malin.
Ne pas enquiquiner les gens sur leur religion.
Le thé à la mente, en levant la théière 50cm au-dessus du verre.
Le vrai taboulé, pas le truc aux oignons qu'on trouve sous ce nom.
L'adobe, et l'architecture des courbes et des dômes.
La centrale solaire géante de Ouarzazate.
Et bien sûr le soleil!!!

Geoffray Tranber , Le sérieux est le bouclier de la connerie :-))
Répondu 25 août 2018

Lors d'une mission d'un an à Casablanca, dans une grosse banque Marocaine, j'ai été très admiratif de la manière dont plusieurs jours par an, des collegiens sont accueillis et occupés, pour les familiariser avec la vie (si excitante) de l'entreprise.

Et il n'y avait pas juste les 2 filleuls des dirlos de la boîte : c'est vraiment une sacré bande qui est reçue et occupée chaque année, par des taches qui montrent les confiance qui leur est faite. Ils ne font pas que des photocopies.

C'est chaleureux et indulgent.

Nous, on n'a pas ça.

Maintenant… ne nous leurrons pas : une fois les mêmes jeunes sur le marché du travail, sur place, le taux de chômage est très élevé.

Mais en tous cas, la qualité de la démarche inter-generationnelle, faisait chaud au cœur.

:-))

Questions similaires

Dans quelles villes françaises y a-t-il le moins de Français d'origine maghrébine ?

Pourquoi ceux qu’on appelle des Maghrébins s'appellent ainsi tout en sachant qu'ils sont sur le continent africain ?

Vaut-il mieux être Noir ou Arabe/Maghrébin de nos jours en France ?

Existe-t-il un seul accent maghrébin en français ou plusieurs accents maghrébins différents ?

Pourquoi le Maroc, l'Algérie et la Tunisie sont-ils des pays séparés alors qu'ils ont tous un héritage berbère, arabe et français ?

Pourquoi les gens avec des origines étrangères ont-ils des prénoms français sauf les maghrébins ?

Pourquoi les Maghrébins sont-ils mal vus en France ?

Est-il encore vrai que les habitants du Maghreb ont peu de respect pour les leurs qui vivent en France ou dans d'autres pays occidentaux ?

Pourquoi un bon pourcentage des Algériens nés avant l’indépendance (1962) disent que « l'Algérie était beaucoup plus heureuse et prospère du temps de la colonisation française »?

A quels problèmes doivent faire face les différents pays du Maghreb ?

Ma fille sera-t-elle considérée comme Maghrébine ou comme Française en France en sachant qu'elle y est née et qu'elle a un prénom français et un nom maghrébin ?

Quelles sont les villes ou régions françaises où il y a le moins d’originaires du Maghreb ?

Qui est mal vu en France : les hommes maghrébins ou les femmes maghrébines ?

L'anglais remplacera-t-il bientôt le français comme deuxième langue de la Tunisie, du Maroc et de l'Algérie ?

Faites-vous partie des gens intéressés par la connaissance de certaines formes d'arabe du Maghreb (daridja algérienne, marocaine, tunisienne) et/ou de berbère (kabyle, chleuh, rifain, chaoui) ? Quelles sont vos motivations ?

Pourquoi les écoles enseignent-elles l'algèbre, la trigonométrie et le calcul alors que personne ne les utilise ? Why do schools teach algebra, trigonometry, and calculus when nobody even uses it?

Pierre Damez Random Quoran (2016–aujourd'hui)Traducteur · ven.

Thomas B Walsh Author, Blogger, and Retired Fortune 100 Executive

C'est une vieille blague:

Étudiant: Je ne comprends pas pourquoi je dois apprendre l'algèbre ou la trigonométrie. Y a-t-il vraiment des gens qui utilisent ces trucs ?

Professeur: Toi non, tu ne les utiliseras pas, mais les élèves intelligents oui.

Je suis à la retraite depuis longtemps maintenant, mais j'ai recruté pas mal de diplômés de l'université à mon époque. Nous recevions BEAUCOUP de CV. Pour réduire cette pile, je recherchais des candidats qui avaient suivi des cours de mathématiques et/ou de codage, et pas l'histoire du Rock and Roll.

Wake Up Africa!
Algeria's President Abdelmajid Tebboune banned France from Algeria's airspace, and recalled Algeria's Ambassador to France when President Macron said Algeria was not a real country before colonialism in October 2021.

Posted by Aniekpeno Ekong 14h

He increased minimum wage to $170 monthly, and eliminated taxes for people earning less than $216 monthly in 2020.

He announced that the country will give $92 monthly to unemployed young people aged 19-40 in February 2022.

The social grant payments will start being made in March 2022.

Pourquoi les français préfèrent-ils aller en Tunisie ou au Maroc plutôt qu'en Algérie ?

Olivier Carriere Anciennement Souscripteur assurance énergie (1989–2018)
2 ans

Avant, en tant que français je croyais que l'immense majorité des algériens nous détestait en gros résumé à cause de cette boucherie de la guerre d'independance. Et puis j'y suis allé en tant qu'assureur de la Sonatrach, société d'état dédiée au gaz et au pétrole, extrêmement puissante du fait des réserves énormes de ce pays qui alimente l'Europe via trois gazoducs trans-méditérannéns et des flottes de méthaniers. Deux voyages très intéressants à Alger, Skikda, Hassi R'mel et Arzew. Et je m'étais trompé. Tous les gens qui n'étaient pas partie prenante avec l'entourage de la Sonatrach et qui n'avaient aucune intention de me caresser dans le sens du poil étaient accueillants, gentils, drôles, curieux et sincères. Les paysages de l’Algérie sont beaux et très variés. Maintenant pour beaucoup de touristes le visa est une plaie et l’offre de logements, bof. Pour résumer, allez en Algérie vous ferez des belles rencontres humaines.

Questions similaires

Pourquoi le Maroc, l'Algérie et la Tunisie sont-ils des pays séparés alors qu'ils ont tous un héritage berbère, arabe et français ?

Pourquoi les Algériens sont-ils si fiers de leur pays mais dans le même temps le fuient en masse ?

Pourquoi les Marocains ne supportent pas les Algériens, qui ont pourtant une culture similaire ?

Pourquoi certains Algériens font n’importe quoi en France ?
Que pensez-vous des Algériens ?
Pourquoi le Maroc est-il plus fort que l'Algérie ?
Pourquoi certains Marocains n'aiment-ils pas les Algériens?
Que pensez-vous de l'Algérie ?
Pourquoi les Algériens, au moins ceux en France, parlent si bien le français ?
Que pensent les Algériens des Français ?

Pourquoi parle-t-on presque toujours de la relation France/Algérie et si peu de la colonisation française en Tunisie et au Maroc ?

L'anglais remplacera-t-il bientôt le français comme deuxième langue de la Tunisie, du Maroc et de l'Algérie ?

Que pensez-vous des Marocains ?
Les français détestent-ils les maghrébins ?
Pourquoi les Marocains fuient-ils le Maroc ?

Pourquoi l'Algérie accuse-t-elle le Maroc d'avoir tué 3 chauffeurs routiers avec un drone Turc TB2 ?

Samir سمير Farid فريد· Suivre Lieu : Maroc (1977–aujourd'hui) ven.

C'est malin de préciser que c'était des drones turcs, et pas américains ou israéliens alors que le Maroc dispose des trois, sinon, ils se trouvaient dans une zone tampon interdite aux civils et qui n'est traversée parce aucune route internationale.

Algérie : tout s'écroule et le régime attaque la France et le français

15 juillet 2020 Yves Montenay

L'Algérie va très mal : avec un pétrole à 40 $, la ruine approche, les militaires ont gardé le pouvoir et le virus n'arrange rien. La vieille recette est de taper sur la France et sur la position du français en Algérie. À mon avis ça n'arrangera rien, au contraire.

Parallèlement, le pouvoir algérien envoie de temps en temps un mot aimable à Paris, qui semble signifier » Ne faites pas attention, ces critiques ne sont que des discours de politique intérieure« . C'est ce qui se passe à nouveau en ce mois de juillet 2020.

Vu de France, il semble que le régime ait recours à ces vieilles ficelles pour détourner l'attention des Algériens des vrais problèmes. Et, sur ce point, il est à l'unisson des islamistes, qui veulent bloquer toute ouverture vers l'extérieur.

Le mouvement de protestation Hirak est donc vu avec sympathie en France, puisqu'il pose le vrai problème, celui du « système » algérien, en place depuis l'indépendance

Cet article a été repris par Contrepoints le nivellement par le haut où il a interessé + de 20.000 lecteurs

La prise du pouvoir par les militaires

D'abord une réflexion très générale : dans le monde entier, les guerres d'indépendance s'appuient certes sur un sentiment populaire, souvent d'ailleurs cultivé par un ennemi du pouvoir colonial, en général l'URSS puis la Russie, parfois la Chine, comme au Cambodge.

Mais l'objectif concret des révoltés est d'amener leur chef et son parti au pouvoir, que ce soit Ho Chi Minh et le parti communiste au Vietnam ou Boumediene et le Front de libération nationale (FLN) en Algérie. Étant précisé pour l'Algérie que « l'armée des frontières » commandée par Houari Boumédiène, futur président, est restée à l'extérieur sans combattre, et n'est entrée qu'après le cessez-le-feu de 1962, justement pour prendre le pouvoir. Donc guerres d'indépendance, oui, guerres de libération, non.

En Algérie, il y aura donc bientôt 60 ans que l'armée est au pouvoir, avec des variantes dont l'une, celle de Bouteflika, jeune adjoint de Boumédiène en 1962, vient de se terminer.

Le massacre de l'économie algérienne

L'économie algérienne a été particulièrement massacrée pour plusieurs raisons :

Le départ d'une grande partie des gens qualifiés

Il y a d'abord eu le départ des Pieds-noirs, y compris les quelques dizaines de milliers qui ont essayé de rester après l'indépendance.

Je me souviens de ce patron d'une entreprise de construction dont le personnel était en majorité musulman, et qui a essayé de rester plusieurs années pour finalement regagner la France à la suite de brimades répétées, emmenant avec lui son personnel.

Les cadres qualifiés musulmans des entreprises françaises sont souvent également partis, notamment parce que le clientélisme et la corruption les empêchaient de travailler normalement.

Et l'exode continue, du fait de manque de liberté politique, de pressions sociales et religieuses et des obstacles à la promotion par la compétence. On a même vu des cadres algériens rentrés au pays en repartir.

L'idéologie socialiste de l'époque

L'alliance avec l'URSS combinée avec les proclamations nationalistes ont fait de l'Algérie un pays officiellement socialiste.

Elle a certes dû renoncer à cet adjectif pour recevoir l'argent du FMI au milieu de la guerre civile des années 1990, mais les mauvaises habitudes bureaucratiques étaient prises et durent encore. Ce « socialisme national » avait également l'avantage de légitimer les militaires et de leur donner un outil de contrôle de la société.

Cela a mené à la création de « sociétés nationales » qui ont presque toutes été des échecs coûteux.

Même la Sonatrach, qui a remplacé les entreprises pétrolières françaises et qui disposait d'une énorme marge financière, est un échec relatif, pour les mêmes raisons que les autres compagnies pétrolières nationales, vénézuélienne ou mexicaine par exemple.

La rente pétrolière y a servi de caisse noire aux dirigeants, les cadres ne sont pas toujours nommés sur des critères de compétence et le résultat final est une baisse de la production faute d'investissements et la sous-traitance ou la coopération généralisée avec des entreprises étrangères, c'est-à-dire justement ce que l'on voulait officiellement éviter.

Tout cela a bien entendu généralisé une corruption par « pompage » des recettes publiques, qui a eu comme conséquence de bloquer le développement du pays, puisque chaque tentative de production nationale était interdite pour ne pas léser les intérêts de la personnalité ayant la main sur les importations, importations payées avec le pétrole, après un petit détour vers un paradis fiscal.

Un autre exemple de cette corruption bloquant le développement a été à mon avis la fameuse loi des 51 % de capital algérien imposée aux investisseurs étrangers, ce qui en a découragé la plupart et obligé les autres à des « arrangements » coûteux.

Or les pays qui se sont développés, tant au nord qu'au sud, l'ont fait en encourageant les investisseurs étrangers qui apportent de l'argent et du personnel qualifié.

Pour mes lecteurs français, je rappelle que le peuple algérien est très conscient du manque de démocratie et d'une corruption freinant de développement. Il s'est révolté plusieurs fois, et, depuis le 22 février 2019, ont eu lieu chaque vendredi d'énormes manifestations, «Le hirak » (traduction littérale « le mouvement »), qui ont abouti dans un premier temps à la renonciation du président Bouteflika à se représenter pour un cinquième mandat en dépit de sa santé plus que catastrophique.

Mais l'armée est alors réapparue « en pilotage direct », puis en faisant ouvertement élire comme président un relatif inconnu, au profil de haut fonctionnaire non islamiste, Abdelmajid Tebboune.

Le hirak a continué jusqu'à sa suspension par le confinement, et son éventuelle reprise est en débat.

Le nouveau pouvoir alterne bonnes paroles et répression. Mais comme sa nature n'a pas changé, les Algériens craignent le retour des mêmes défauts. Et de toute façon demeure l'énorme handicap de la mauvaise qualification des Algériens.

Un peuple sous qualifié

Les Français d'origine algérienne, ainsi que les Algériens résidant en France, sont présents à tous les niveaux de la société française, comme en témoignent les noms de famille arabes que l'on trouve dans toutes les professions. Il y a deux raisons à cela, d'abord l'arrivée des meilleurs cerveaux algériens, médecins notamment, et ensuite le système scolaire français, extrêmement imparfait certes, mais néanmoins nettement en meilleur état que l'algérien si on croit la presse de ce pays et de nombreux témoignages.

Une des raisons du retard du système scolaire algérien est son arabisation brutale dans les années 1970, et donc l'importation de nombreux enseignants égyptiens, pas forcément choisis parmi les meilleurs, très souvent traditionalistes religieusement et formant par l'apprentissage par cœur, contrairement à l'analyse critique qui est en principe la base du système français.

Rajoutons que dans ces années 1970, cet enseignement en arabe était en langue étrangère pour les jeunes Algériens car l'arabe officiel n'était la langue maternelle de personne, la population parlant une sorte de créole partiellement francisé, la darija, ou une langue berbère ou encore le français.

Le remède à tout cela : tapons sur la France et le français !

Bref, la situation algérienne est toujours mauvaise. Et l'explication officielle n'a pas changé : « c'est la faute de la France » !

Les grands dirigeants français, Napoléon III ou de Gaulle, dès 1943 pour ce dernier, ont été beaucoup plus lucides que les Pieds-noirs, constatant que l'avenir de l'Algérie ne pouvait se concevoir en écartant 80 à 90 % de la population.

Les réformes du premier n'ont pas survécu à son départ en 1871, et ont au contraire permis aux Pieds-noirs, qui y étaient opposés, de se proclamer les « vrais républicains » et d'inventer « l'Algérie française » qui étendait à l'Algérie toutes les lois françaises, sauf le droit de vote pour les musulmans.

Mais les militaires algériens ont nourri la demie vérité d'une « colonisation épouvantable », et qu'ils auraient éliminée par la force, ce qui n'est plus du tout la vérité, l'indépendance résultant d'un plébiscite organisé par De Gaulle. Les programmes scolaires algériens et l'information officielle font sans cesse allusion à cette « victoire » de l'armée qui légitimerait son pouvoir sur le pays.

Pour nourrir cette légitimité, et éviter qu'elle ne soit entamée par des échecs gouvernementaux répétés, il faut noircir la France et dénoncer ses pressions pour sauver « ses intérêts ». Intérêts qui n'existent plus depuis 50 ans et qui ont été remplacés notamment par des intérêts chinois.

En pratique seule subsiste des coopérations culturelle et antiterroriste demandées par les 2 parties.

Remous diplomatiques

Dernier incident un peu hypocrite : en mai 2020, l'Algérie a décidé de rappeler « immédiatement » son ambassadeur à Paris « suite au caractère récurrent de programmes diffusés par des chaînes de télévision publiques françaises attaquant le peuple algérien et ses institutions, dont l'Armée nationale populaire, la digne héritière de l'Armée de libération nationale » d'après un communiqué du ministère des Affaires étrangères algérien.

Pourtant, les Algériens savent parfaitement que les médias français sont indépendants de l'État, ce qui n'est pas le cas chez eux … où je pense qu'on trouverait facilement de nombreuses émissions pas très aimables pour la France !

Parallèlement, l'ambassadeur de France en Algérie, Xavier Driencourt partira à la retraite le 2 août 2020, ayant atteint la limite d'âge. Ce départ prévu de longue date tombe donc à un moment délicat, et on s'interrogeait encore ce 5 juin sur le nom de son successeur. Le candidat idéal, François Gouyette, ambassadeur en Arabie, fin connaisseur du Moyen-Orient et arabophone, a comme handicap d'atteindre lui aussi la limite d'âge en 2021.

Certes, il y a régulièrement des « réchauffements » entre les présidents français et algériens. C'est une fois de plus le cas en cette mi-juillet 2020. Mais jusqu'à présent, le poids de la politique intérieure algérienne l'a fait retomber dans ses errements habituels, puisque sa cause structurelle demeure, à savoir la légitimation de la direction du pays par l'armée.

Haro sur la langue française !

Et puisqu'il faut taper sur la France, tapons aussi sur le français puisque les francophones ont accès à des informations pas toujours agréables pour le régime. Et que le français est un obstacle pour les islamistes, qui pèsent sur tous les gouvernements algériens.

Ainsi, le ministre algérien de l'Enseignement supérieur vient de demander aux étudiants de rédiger leurs thèses et mémoires en langue anglaise dès la rentrée prochaine ! Heureusement, il ne suffit pas de le décréter pour que cela se concrétise…

Mieux encore : le parti islamiste MSP demande que la future constitution algérienne prévoie « la criminalisation de l'utilisation de la langue française dans les institutions et documents officiels ».

Le journal algérien La liberté du 12 juillet 2020 rappelle que « 3 éléments sont la cible permanente des fanatiques religieux : les femmes, les arts, et les langues étrangères ».

Le dirigeant du MSP, Abderrazak Makri persiste et signe en attaquant *« Les enfants de la France » (*comprendre les « traîtres ») qui se consacrent à la défense de la langue française et des intérêts français et ont une attitude servile à l'égard de la France ».

Pourtant le français est une langue algérienne

Pendant la colonisation, une partie de la population algérienne a adopté le français, et après l'indépendance, la « grande coopération » demandée par l'Algérie a envoyé dans ce pays des dizaines de milliers de jeunes Français qui ont permis de lancer la scolarisation des Algériens à grande échelle.

Cette période scolaire en français a fourni des cadres à l'Algérie pendant 50 ans. Ces derniers ont transmis l'usage du français comme langue de travail. Usage encore renforcé par les familles à cheval sur les pays francophones et l'Algérie, par les nombreux Algériens ayant effectué leurs études supérieures dans ces mêmes pays francophones, ou par le cas particulier des Kabyles qui ont le français comme deuxième langue comme peut le constater tout voyageur.

Finalement le français est une langue de l'Algérie et non une langue étrangère, contrairement à ce que le pouvoir ou des religieux ne cessent de répéter.

Citons parmi mille autres cette tribune de Khaoula Taleb Ibrahimi, Professeure en science du langage à l'Université d'Alger 2, parue dans La liberté le 1er juin 2020 : « Nous avons besoin d'une politique des langues dans tous les paliers de notre système éducatif, de l'école primaire à l'université, hardie, raisonnée et rationnelle… Et cela doit se faire sans chauvinisme, sans dogmatisme, sans populisme ni démagogie et sans donner à une langue une position hégémonique au détriment d'une autre … Malgré le profond mouvement populaire en faveur de la démocratie, le pouvoir continue ses pratiques autoritaires sur le mode de l'injonction et du mépris des réalités objectives du pays ». Pour ceux qui ne connaissent pas l'Algérie, je précise que ces «réalités objectives » sont l'usage de la darija, des langues berbères et du français.

Rajoutons que la connaissance du français par une grande partie des Algériens permettrait une installation simple et rapide d'entreprises françaises, belges, suisses, canadiennes, comme au Maroc. Ce pays en a largement bénéficié, et en a tiré un double bénéfice puisque les entreprises marocaines se développent maintenant en Afrique subsaharienne francophone.

Et l'anglais ?

Le premier changement de langue, l'arabisation, a été une catastrophe.

Le passage à l'anglais en serait une autre, en partie pour les mêmes raisons : une langue non maternelle et encore plus ignorée par la population, pas de corps enseignant et pas de débouchés, sauf pour certains métiers restreints comme la recherche scientifique de haut niveau.

Mais ce dernier point ne concerne que quelques centaines ou quelques milliers de spécialistes qui feront comme dans tous les autres pays : apprendre l'anglais. Il n'est pas nécessaire de bouleverser le l'Algérie pour cela !

Et puis n'oubliez pas que de l'aveu même de The Economist, journal de l'élite anglophone mondiale, des cadres internationaux parlant le français ou l'espagnol en plus de l'anglais éliminent les purs anglophones ou les anglo-arabophones, sauf dans quelques pays du Moyen-Orient.

Rappelons que les chercheurs français, comme ceux les autres pays, travaillent en français et publient en anglais, langue qu'ils ont appris comme les autres matières de leur formation. Et puis, comment exiger de passer un doctorat en anglais quand tout ce qui précède est ou devrait être en arabe ?

Je maîtrise le français, l'anglais et l'allemand, et mon expérience de cadre dirigeant dans 12 pays a illustré deux évidences : on travaille beaucoup mieux dans sa langue maternelle ou de formation et la traduction est un exercice excellent pour préciser les idées.

Je rajoute que beaucoup de textes conçus en anglais sont moins précis que leur équivalent en français, d'une part parce qu'il y a davantage de polysémie en anglais qu'en français et d'autre part parce qu'ils n'ont pas subi l'épreuve de la traduction.

C'est pour cette raison que la cour de justice de l'Union européenne à Luxembourg est un temple de la traduction, avec le français comme langue des débats internes, malgré les pressions anglo-saxonnes.

Et puis, même si l'anglais était un remède, il faudra combien de décennies pour l'implanter à la base, alors que le français est là !

Sans même parler du gâchis humain que serait la mise à l'écart de l'élite francophone…

Refuser le modèle moyen-oriental

Je connais le Moyen-Orient, arabe, turc et perse. Cela m'a convaincu de la nécessaire ouverture linguistique et culturelle des sociétés musulmanes pour éviter les dérives catastrophiques et souvent sanglantes de cette région.

Or on n'étudie pas les mêmes textes en français et en arabe.

Les rapports du Programme des Nations unies pour le développement (PNUD) des années 2000 nous rappellent que les principales œuvres mondiales ne sont pas traduites en arabe, et l'examen des lieux de lecture arabophone montre la prépondérance des ouvrages religieux.

Une grande langue étrangère largement connue par le peuple algérien est donc nécessaire pour échapper aux dictatures extrémistes.

Cela pourrait être l'anglais, l'espagnol ou le français, mais, comme dit, pourquoi torturer encore plus la société algérienne alors que le français y est déjà assez largement connu.

Par ailleurs, l'anglais est souvent utilisé comme une simple langue de communication et non comme l'ouverture à une culture, du moins au Moyen-Orient.

Je vais être franc et direct : si une partie des Algériens et leurs amis français ou occidentaux sont attachés au maintien du français en Algérie, une des raisons est qu'il permet de sortir de l'univers moyen-oriental et du conservatisme politique, voire du fanatisme religieux qui y règne. Beaucoup d'Africains du nord se sentent plus proches de l'autre rive de la Méditerranée que de la Syrie ou de l'Irak. Les chercheurs arabes travaillant en Occident ont une vue catastrophique du Moyen-Orient. Voir par exemple « Le monde arabe a-t-il un avenir ? » d'Abdelatif Laroui.

Il ne s'agit pas seulement de langue ou de religion, mais de développement économique et humain. Il faut que dès l'enfance, les Algériens aient d'une autre source d'information que les télévisions wahhabites.

Yves Montenay
Blog d'Histoire, Culture, Economie et Géopolitique
Crédit photo de couverture : Alger Lors de la manifestation du vendredi 15 mars 2019 – Credit PPAgency

Questions similaires

Pourquoi les français préfèrent-ils aller en Tunisie ou au Maroc plutôt qu'en Algérie ?

Pourquoi Abdelmoumen(calife des Almohades) est-il revendiqué comme Marocain par les Marocains, alors qu'il venait d'une tribu localisée en Algérie actuelle ?

Pourquoi on demande tout le temps à la France de s'excuser envers l'Algérie pour les morts de la Guerre d'Algérie et pas à l'Algérie de s'excuser pour les actes du FLN durant la même période ?

L'Algérie dispose-t-elle de drones en cas de conflit avec le Maroc ?
Le Maroc et l'Algérie vont-ils s'engager dans un conflit armé ?
Pourquoi la France a-t-elle perdu la guerre d'Algérie ?
Que livraient les 3 camions Algériens détruits par le Maroc ?

Pourquoi le royaume autocratique marocain s'acharne-t-il contre l'Algérie en déployant une armée du Net mobilisée 24 h/24 ?

L'Algérie va-t-elle attaquer le Maroc ?

L'Algérie se réarme dans le domaine naval, pensez-vous qu'un jour (sans compter que nous sommes dans l'otan) elle sera capable de nous attaquer ?

Pourquoi l'Algérie et le Maroc se détestent-ils ?
Pourquoi le Maroc est-il plus fort que l'Algérie ?
Est-ce que le Maroc va attaquer l'Algérie ?
Pourquoi les Arabes détestent l'Algérie ?

Les relations entre le Maroc et l'Algérie peuvent-elles dégénérer en conflit armé ?

Quels sont les résultats probables de la crise Maroc-Algerie?

Bouali · Suivre Lieu : Maroc (1959–aujourd'hui) sam.

Ce bras de fer entre les deux gouvernements d'Algérie et du Maroc a duré presque 45 ans et continue encore.

C'est un conflit bidon et mal géré.

Alors ,c'est le rôle des deux sociétés civile d'imposer la paix et l'ouverture des frontières.

Le Maroc et l'Algérie reste des cousins.

L'union fait la force et arrêtons d'ajouter l'huile sur le feu.

Questions similaires

Les algériens croient-ils vraiment que le Maroc est à l'origine des feux de foret en Kabylie comme l'a annoncé le président Tebboune ?

Qu'est-ce qui empêche des pays comme l'Algérie et le Maroc à se développer ?
Si une guerre Algérie Maroc éclatait qui gagnerait ?

À quoi joue le Maroc en soutenant le Mouvement pour l'autodétermination de la Kabylie?

Pourquoi le Maroc est-il constamment présenté comme un pays arrière ?
Pourquoi l'Algérie et le Maroc se détestent-ils ?
Quel est le problème profond que l'Algérie a avec la France ?
Pourquoi l'Algerie s'immisce dans l'affaire du Sahara Occidental ?
Pourquoi l'Algérie a-t-elle rompu ses relations diplomatiques avec le Maroc ?
Est-ce que le Maroc va attaquer l'Algérie ?
Pourquoi le Maroc ne rompt pas toutes ses relations avec l'Algerie ?
Le Maroc et l'Algérie vont-ils s'engager dans un conflit armé ?
Quelles sont les raisons de la crise financière de 2020 ?

Pourquoi l'Algérie remet-elle maintenant sur la table la question mémorielle avec la France ?

Dans quelle mesure une guerre est-elle possible entre l'Algérie et le Maroc ?

Réponse similaire
Pourquoi durant la colonisation de l'Algérie de 1830 à 1962, les Français n'ont pas encouragé l'enseignement de la langue française aux Algériens ?

Ledjh Timizar , lieu : Alger, Algérie Mis à jour le 23 janv. 2020

85 % des Algériens étaient illettrés à l'indépendance en 1962.
Non-écoliers algériens pendant les années 50

@ L G E R I E O R @ N D E S @ N N E E S 5 0

Les Algériens qui parlent le français à l'heure actuelle le doivent à l'école algérienne post- indépendance, notamment pendant les années soixante et soixante dix, pas à l'école française. Ils ont communiqué leur pratique du français à leurs enfants, ça n'a rien à voir avec une culture élitiste.

Écoliers algériens 70 ans plus tard:

Alors oui, les Pieds Noirs se fichaient royalement du rayonnement de la langue française parmi les "indigènes"car au pays des aveugles les borgnes sont rois.

Réponse similaire

Pourquoi l'Algérie n'est pas membre de la Francophonie ?

Super Dupont, ancien(ne) étudiant(e) en Science et Conscience à Écoles d'ingénieurs
Répondu 29 juil. 2017

Parce que l'Algérie est au main d'une clique mafieuse, qui pille le pays et lave les cerveaux de son peuple en accusant la France de toutes leurs propres turpitudes.

Cette clique utilise tout ce qui a rapport à la France - dont la francophonie - dans un objectif de dénigrement politique.

Le document en lien dans la réponse de Fabrice Neyret dit la même chose que moi, mais en tournant les choses de manière politiquement correcte (le chercheur qui a écrit ne peut pas se permettre de se brouiller avec son objet d'étude): "Au mépris de considérations pédagogiques, l'arabisation a été l'instrument d'un clan politique ; elle a été un moyen de conquête d'une partie du pouvoir. Elle était en même temps utilisée par le régime en place qui recherchait une légitimité dans la référence à l'islam et dans l'hostilité à la France. "

Questions similaires

Finalement, si l’Algérie était restée française, la France ne serait-elle pas devenu un pays à majorité musulmane ? De manière générale, à quoi ressemblerait la France aujourd'hui si l’Algérie était restée française ?

Pendant la colonisation en Algérie, est-il vrai que la France a octroyé la nationalité française aux indigènes juifs, mais pas au peuple musulman ? Si oui, pourquoi?

Pourquoi l'Algérie n’est pas membre de la Francophonie ?

Pourquoi les Français sont-ils qualifiés de colonisateurs en Afrique du Nord, alors que le Maghreb fut d'abord colonisé par les Arabes (au détriment des Kabyles)?

Pourquoi la France ne demande-t-elle pas pardon au peuple algérien pour les horreurs commises en son nom durant sa colonisation brutale de l'Algérie alors que le roi des Belges vient de présenter ses excuses aux Congolais pour des faits similaires ?

Est-ce pour ne pas choquer les anciens que le français n'a pas le statut de langue co-officielle en Algérie avec l'arabe et le kabyle ?

Avant la colonisation française en 1830, l'Algérie (ou les territoires qui la formaient) avait-elle déjà été longuement sous domination étrangère ?

Pourquoi la colonisation française était-elle différente en Algérie qu'au Maroc ou en Tunisie?

Combien de personnes ont été tuées lors de la colonisation française de l'Algérie ?
Les algériens détestent-ils la France à cause de la colonisation ?

Réponse similaire
Combien de "Pieds Noirs" (Algériens d´origine européenne) sont restés en Algérie après la victoire du FLN et la déclaration de l´indépendance du pays ?

Pierre Jamain, anciennement Gérant de S.A.R.L. (Labo photo professionnel) chez Labo photo professionnel (1970-2000) Répondu 6 févr. 2020

Selon la chercheuse Hélène Bracco, ils étaient encore trente mille en 1993. Puis la guerre civile larvée de la décennie noire a fait fuir un grand nombre de ceux qui étaient devenus des «Algériens d'origine européenne », particulièrement visés par les menaces des islamistes — Aujourd'hui, les chiffres, difficiles à établir, diffèrent d'une source à l'autre. Ils seraient «autour de quatre mille cinq cents » selon M. Guy Bonifacio, président de l'Association des Français de l'étranger (ADFE) d'Oran, mais seulement trois cents selon M. Francis Heude, le consul français à Alger.

Réponse similaire
Que va changer le décès du Général Ahmed Gaïd Salah en Algérie ?

Ledjh Timizar, lieu : Alger, Algérie Mis à jour le 31 janv. 2020

En tous cas pas une vague migratoire. J'ai ouï dire que Marine Lepen avait grande crainte d'un raz de marée de Sarrazins en provenance d'Algérie pour cause de remous politiques et qu'il urgeait d'envoyer Charles Martel à Poitiers. Et bien dites vous bien que ce n'est pas notre genre la fuite devant l'adversité.

Je ne comprends pas cette obsession : chaque année on prédit que l'Algérie est sur le point de sombrer dans le chaos et que la France est tenue de s'attendre à un débarquement de réfugiés algériens. Et pourquoi donc je vous prie? Moi je ne vois pas le rapport, et d'une et secondo il se trouve que nous avons déjà connu la mort d'un homme fort, celle du Président Boumédienne, que nous sommes passés par des situations bien pires en 1987 avec le baril de pétrole descendu à 15 dollars avec en sus une dette colossale du FMI sur le dos. Nous sommes passés par la période de l'annulation de la victoire du FIS aux élections législatives en 1990, ensuite nous avons été traumatisés par l'assassinat du Président Boudiaf en 1992. Le tout suivi immédiatement de ce que l'on appelle la Décennie Noire faite de massacres ininterrompus contre la population civile, prémices des atrocités daeschiennes.

Et nous ne nous sommes pas sauvés ni en France ni chez nos voisins, nous avons fait front dans les villages en créant des milices d'auto-défense et dans les villes en continuant à mener une vie normale malgré les attentats quasi quotidiens, les faux barrages et les assassinats ciblés sur les intellectuels, les artistes et les scientifiques.

Alors si nous avons tenu bon contre tous ces coups de boutoir de notre chienne de vie, pourquoi voudrait-on que nous envahissions la France sous prétexte que le deuil ne nous siérait pas si bien ?

Questions similaires

Si les «pieds-noirs» n'avaient pas quitté l'Algérie après l'indépendance, une cohabitation aurait-elle été possible avec les musulmans, comme les afrikaners et les noirs en Afrique du Sud, et l'Algérie s'en sortirait-elle mieux ?

Un Algérien d'un certain âge m'a montré la carte d'identité Française qu'il possédait en 1962, juste avant l'indépendance. Il y était noté "Français musulman". Y avait-il bien un système d'apartheid à l'époque de l'Algérie Française ?

Finalement, si l'Algérie était restée française, la France ne serait-elle pas devenu un pays à majorité musulmane ? De manière générale, à quoi ressemblerait la France aujourd'hui si l'Algérie était restée française ?

Pourquoi on demande tout le temps à la France de s'excuser envers l'Algérie pour les morts de la Guerre d'Algérie et pas à l'Algérie de s'excuser pour les actes du FLN durant la même période ?

Pourquoi la France a-t-elle perdu la guerre d'Algérie alors qu'elle a tué beaucoup plus d'Algériens qu'elle n'a subi de pertes ? (Question traduite)

L'Algérie doit-elle s'excuser auprès de la France pour ses actes contre l'armée française pendant la guerre d'indépendance algérienne ?

Pourquoi l'Algérie ne défend pas les Ouïghours ?
Pourquoi l'Algérie n'est-elle pas resté française ?

Pourquoi un bon pourcentage des Algériens nés avant l'indépendance (1962) disent que « l'Algérie était beaucoup plus heureuse et prospère du temps de la colonisation française »?

Pourquoi il n'y a qu'avec l'Algérie que les relations sont souvent tendues alors que la France a occupé d'autres pays ?

Pourquoi la France a-t-elle perdu la guerre d'Algérie ?
Pourquoi les français d'Algérie étaient-ils appelés les pieds noirs ?
La Kabylie pourra-t-elle prospérer après son indépendance de l'Algérie?

Comment et pourquoi les Algériens ont-ils été incapables d'arrêter les Français avant le bombardement d'Alger en 1815, puis avant l'invasion, le bombardement et la conquête, la colonisation et la prise de contrôle de toute l'Algérie ?

Comment serait l'Algérie aujourd'hui si elle était restée française ?

Réponse similaire

Quelles sont les ressources de l'Algérie ?

Anis précédent lieu : Alger, Algérie Répondu 18 août 2019

Bonjour ,
l'Algérie est un grand pays. Et dans ce grand pays se trouvent un nombre varié de ressoures ;

Ressources Naturelles :

L'Algérie est rich en Pétrole et en Gaz Naturel ainsi que le Gaz de Schist

Les métaux rares ainsi que le charbon , argile , phosphates …

Ainsi que l'eau !

Mais il ne faut pas oublier les ressources humaines :

L'Algérie dispose d'une population de 42 millions d'habitants ; la pluspart de ces habitants a se trouvant en dessous des 30 ans. Ainsi cette population assez jeune represente un force de travail importante,paye des taxes ,fournit des soldats et fait de l'Algérie une puissance regional au Maghreb.

Mais il ne faut pas oublié les binationaux ! Ce sont ces jeunes hommes et femmes qui vont contribuer a l'Algérie de demain , prés de 40.000 d'entre eux sont retourné en Algérie en 2019 afin de benefcier de l'aide de l'Etat Algérien et monter leur propre sociétés.

Questions similaires

Pourquoi n'avez-vous pas encore visité l'Algérie ?
Pourquoi certains Algériens font n'importe quoi en France ?
D'Algérie ou du Maroc, quelles sont vos trois villes préférées et pourquoi ?
Aimeriez-vous visiter l'Algérie ?
Pourquoi le Maroc est-il plus fort que l'Algérie ?
Que pensez-vous de l'Algérie ?
Quels sont les avantages de la position géographique de l'Algérie ?
Pourquoi le Maroc est-il toujours jaloux de l'Algérie ?
Que dites -vous sur l'Algérie ?
Quels sont des faits peu connus au sujet de l'Algérie ?
Qu'est-ce que l'Algérie a de différents des autres pays ?

Pourquoi il n'y a qu'avec l'Algérie que les relations sont souvent tendues alors que la France a occupé d'autres pays ?

Que pensez-vous des Algériens ?

Pourquoi les français préfèrent-ils aller en Tunisie ou au Maroc plutôt qu'en Algérie ?
Comment le reste du monde voit-il l'Algérie ?

Pourquoi les Berbères ressemblent-ils aux Arabes alors que génétiquement il s'agit de 2 populations bien différentes ?

Aslan Vartaia A étudié Anthropologie à Université de la SorbonneMis à jour le 8 mo

Les Berbères n'ont probablement jamais été une population homogène,toute l'Afrique du Nord,de l'Égypte aux iles Canaries,de la Tunisie jusqu'au cœur du Mali et du Niger fut leur territoire,en conséquence,des mélanges eurent lieu au cours de l'histoire,des études génétiques montrent un apport relativement récent d'origine Subsaharien,il y a 7–10 siècles,ce qui coïncide avec l'arabisation du Maghreb,et le début de la traite d'esclave trans-Saharienne,cet apport est principalement du côté maternel,ainsi les Égyptiens par exemple ont en moyenne 20% de leur patrimoine génétique maternel issu de populations de l'Ouest de l'Afrique,ce qui n'était pas le cas des anciens Égyptiens,ce qui va de pair avec les Maghrébins,chez lesquels 8–20% de leur patrimoine maternel vient d'Afrique Subsaharienne,un nombre qui est plus élevé chez certains populations Sahariennes comme les Touaregs,qui peut aller jusqu'à 60%,ce qui explique leur apparence métissée,l'apport paternel Subsaharien chez tous ces groupes est pratiquement nul cependant

Pour les Berbères c'est plus compliqué,de multiples migration d'Orient ont altéré le patrimoine génétique des Nord Africains,la plus connue est l'expansion arabe,mais d'autres l'ont précédé,notamment la naissance de la culture Capsienne il y a 10.000 ans,qui a introduit l'agriculture et probablement la langue berbère et qui est sans doute en partie originaire du Proche-Orient,après tout, le cheval et le chien sont d'origine Eurasienne,non Africaine,et pourtant ces deux espèces abondent en Afrique du Nord depuis au moins l'Antiquité, suggérant d'anciens contacts entre l'Eurasie et l'Afrique du Nord,les ancêtres des Berbères sont issus de plusieurs vagues migratoires d'Eurasie et d'Afrique de l'Est, la majeure partie des haplogroupes Moyen-Orientaux et Européens retrouvés au Maghreb sont d'origine néolithique, et non pas Arabe ou Andalou comme peuvent l'imaginer beaucoup de gens,ce qui explique la diversité des phénotypes qu'on observe aujourd'hui au Maghreb,des populations plus ou moins hétérogènes ont toujours co-habités au Maghreb depuis des milliers d'années,cependant les plus anciennes représentations de Berbères les montrent plutôt comme ayant eu le teint clair et des caractéristiques " européennes ",voyez par vous même

Fresques d'origine égyptienne,vieilles de 3500 représentant les Libyens (ancêtres des Berbères) :

Reconstitution d'un homme de Mechta Afalou,représentant de la culture Ibéromaurusienne,vieille de plus de 30.000 ans,et originaire du Maghreb,les Ibéromaurusiens de type Mechta-Afalou étaient morphologiquement extrêmement proches des Cro-Magnons Européens, originaires du Maghreb,ils se répandirent dans l'actuel désert du Sahara,et furent sa principale population humaine durant des millénaires, on trouve leurs squelettes jusqu'au coeur du Niger,les Ibéromaurusiens étaient phénotypiquement et génétiquement distincts des actuels Africains Subsahariens qui ne sont apparus que relativement tôt en Afrique de l'Ouest (le plus vieux crâne de type noir Africain/Bantu retrouvé n'est vieux que de 8000 ans),des études génétiques faites sur les Ibéromaurusiens ont démontré qu'il y a 12.000 ans,ceux-ci arboraient déjà des caractéristiques " européennes " comme les cheveux roux, blonds et les yeux clairs, ils étaient également très robustes et grands comme les Cro-

Magnons,1.75–1.80m en moyenne, une étude génétique de 2018 suggère que tous les Maghrébins ont hérité de 20–50% de leur patrimoine génétique des Ibéromaurusiens :

Expansion territoriale de l'homme de Mechta-Afalou

Le Sahara tel qu'il fut il y a 10.000 ans

Peintures rupestres du Sahara (Tassili n'Ajjer,sud de l'Algérie),vieilles de 10.000 ans

Vous remarquerez que les personnes représentées ont deux plumes d'autruche dans les cheveux comme les Égyptiens ont représenté les Libyens 7500 ans après la réalisation de ces peintures

Des femmes blanches,rousses et blondes chevauchant des vaches il y a 10.000 ans dans l'actuel désert du Sahara

Les Français à l'époque coloniale semblaient aussi avoir notifié cette diversité,par exemple, François Élie Roudaire,géographe français,célèbre pour son fameux projet d'une mer intérieure au Sahara écrivit dans son ouvrage " Une mer intérieure en Algérie " :

" Nulle part les contrastes de la nature ne sont plus frappans qu'au sud de la province de Constantine. La chaîne de montagnes la plus élevée de l'Algérie, le Djebel-Aurès, dont les points culminans dépassent 2,300 mètres d'altitude, y domine de toute sa hauteur les régions basses et sablonneuses du Sahara. Ce sont deux mondes opposés qui se touchent : d'un côté, un massif aux pics neigeux, aux larges flancs couverts de pâturages et de forêts, aux nombreux cours d'eau arrosant une suite à peine interrompue de pittoresques villages qui rivalisent entre eux pour la richesse et la fertilité de leurs jardins ; de l'autre, une plaine desséchée par un soleil brûlant, un horizon sans limites, quelques oasis perdues dans l'espace ; au nord, les descendans de l'ancienne race berbère, les Kabyles Chaouïas, chez lesquels abondent les types blonds aux yeux bleus, peuple laborieux, sédentaire, ayant l'amour du sol ; au sud, les Arabes nomades aux cheveux noirs, au visage bronzé, qui n'ont d'autre toit que leur tente, d'autre travail que leur marche incessante à travers le désert, d'autres ressources que leurs troupeaux de chameaux et de moutons. "

La Société historique algérienne à l'époque coloniale a décrit les Haraktas,une grande tribu des Aurès comme suit :

« Les deux grandes tribus les Haraktas et les Kherareb occupent le cercle d'Ain-Beida qui, en majeure partie, sont de race berbère mêlée avec la race arabe. Ce mélange n'a pas altéré d'une manière sensible le type national du berbère primitif. Sa tête est moins allongée que celle de l'arabe pur. ses traits sont plus courts, ses cheveux sont généralement blonds, son caractère indépendant et son instinct belliqueux. »

Pour résumer,les Nord Africains modernes sont le fruit de multiples migrations,mais dont le fond ethnique est d'origine berbère, issu des plus milliers d'années d'isolation en Afrique du Nord,les ancêtres des Berbères ont développé un identité génétique propre à eux, c'est à dire indigène au Nord de l'Afrique,ce qui donne la grande diversité de phénotypes observés au Maghreb,il n'y a pas un physique berbère,même si il est vrai que les Berbères sont plus souvent plus clair de peau que les maghrébins " arabisés " qui ont des ancêtres arabes, mais l'inverse est vrai aussi,les Berbères au teint mate sont différenciables des Arabes pour celui qui a l'œil,les Arabes Saoudiens sont eux aussi, phénotypiquement,variés,ils ne sont après tout qu'un agglomérat de diverses populations d'Orient,dans la tradition Arabe,les Arabes de pure souche sont les Yéminis,les anciens Sabéens,en arabe Qahtan (قحطان),tandis que les Arabes du Nord,ancêtres des Quraych (قريش) dont est issu le prophète Mohammed (Que la paix soit sur lui),se réclament de la descendance d'Adnan,petit-fils d'Ismael,fils d'Abraham,donc d'origine Irakienne,d'où leur nom de Al-Adnani,ou mousta'ribah en arabe المستعربة

Berbères du Haut Atlas Marocain :

Chaouis,de l'est Algérien,une des populations Berbère qui est le plus proche des Européens physiquement,une récente étude génétique sur les Chaouis montre que les habitants de l'Aurès ont un profil génétique très particulier, porteurs d'anciens haplogroupes typiquement Berbères et rares en dehors des Aurès,ces haplogroupes ou marqueurs Berbères atteignent 85% des lignées mâles Chaoui ce qui en fait une des population Berbère les plus " pures " si ça veut dire quelque chose

EMPORIO ARMANI

LOS ANGELES
CALIFORNIA
GUESS

hocine amnaci

Berbères Libyens

Berbères du Rif Marocain,qui sont pour la plupart issus de tribus berbères Algériennes,Tunisiennes et Libyennes

Bouchra Benaissa,une petite fille berbère du Rif,qui fut confondu avec Madeleine McCann,une petite fille d'origine anglaise qui fut kidnappée au Portugal

La presse espagnole rapporta cette photo d'un touriste espagnol en vacances au Rif,et de là se propagea la rumeur que la petite Madeleine fut kidnappée par des Marocains,qui ne peuvent vraisemblablement pas avoir d'enfants blonds,ses parents furent donc obligés de montrer l'acte de naissance de leur petite fille

Questions similaires

Pourquoi le Maroc, l'Algérie et la Tunisie sont-ils des pays séparés alors qu'ils ont tous un héritage berbère, arabe et français ?

Quelle est l'origine ethnique (dont beaucoup sont blonds aux yeux bleus) de la population kabyle de Grande-Kabylie, en Algérie ?
Quel est la difference entre Kabyle et Berbere ?
Pourquoi les "kabyles" ne se considèrent pas arabes ?

Si vous êtes nord-africain/maghrébin : considérez-vous que vous êtes arabe ou amazigh/berbère ?

Pourquoi les Maghrébins sont-ils également appelés des Arabes ?
Les Kabyles sont-ils des descendants de peuples nordiques ?
Les kabyles sont-ils arabes ?

Pourquoi les Berbères ne se rebellent-ils pas contre les musulmans et ne suivent-ils pas leurs anciens modes de vie et croyances ? Pourquoi préfèrent-ils rester musulmans ?

Pourquoi les Arabes détestent-ils les Kabyles ?
Les Algériens sont-ils des Arabes ou des Berbères, ou un brassage entre les deux ?
Pourquoi les Arabes détestent l'Algérie ?
Que pensent vraiment les tunisiens des algériens ?
Pourquoi les Français pensent-ils que les Maghrébins sont arabes?

Pourquoi les Français sont-ils qualifiés de colonisateurs en Afrique du Nord, alors que le Maghreb fut d'abord colonisé par les Arabes (au détriment des Kabyles)?

Alger mardi 2 avril 2019. 19 heures : l'armée demande la démission de Bouteflika. 21 heures : Bouteflika remet sa démission. Qui dirige l'Algérie ?

Alexandre Roswilo · Suivre Précédent lieu : Afrique (1975–2019) 2 ans

J’ai essayé de faire comprendre ces dernières semaines que si un chef d'État à un pouvoir important, il est à la tête d’un système qui à un pouvoir encore plus considérable et l’armée est l’une de ses composantes les plus importantes .

[1]

Patrick Crosset avez vous lu mon post : Réponse de Alexandre Roswilo à Comment se fait-il que l'armée dans les pays africains dispose d'autant d'independance par rapport au gouvernement ? Elle prend parfois position ouvertement contre celui ci, comme au Zimbabwe récemment.

[2] (Ahmed Gaïd Salah[3] , le chef d'état-major de l'armée algérienne)

J'y décris la place mieux le pouvoir des armées dans les pays africains .

I-L'Armée nationale populaire algérienne dans le monde

Selon le site américain spécialisé Global Fire Power (GFP) qui fournit une analyse sur des données concernant les armées de 137 pays dans le monde . Il en ressort un classement basé sur la capacité potentielle de chaque pays à faire la guerre sur terre, sur mer et dans les airs, en utilisant des armes conventionnelles.[4]

[5] (Global Fire Power : Classement militaire 2019)

Selon son classement 2019 , l'Algérie est la 27émè armée[6] du monde mieux , elle est la deuxième en Afrique juste derrière l'Égypte et devant l'Afrique du sud .[7]

II-L'Armée algérienne et l'exercice du pouvoir

Il faut comprendre qu'en Algérie l'armée[8] n'est jamais loin quand il s'agit de "faire le ménage" comme en l'Égypte[9] . Depuis 1962, beaucoup d'officiers ont tenu des fonctions publiques et il est généralement reconnu que l'armée a toujours été impliquée dans la politique nationale dans les coulisses.[10]

[11] (Houari Boumédiène ; 2nd chef d'État de l'Algérie)

Le 19 juin 1965, le colonel Houari Boumédiène[12] , alors ministre de la Défense, renversa le président Ahmed Ben Bella . Jusqu'à sa mort en 1978 , Boumédiène était en plus de chef d'État de l'Algérie et d'état-major de l'armée algérienne , il était le président du FLN (Front de libération nationale) [13] , célèbre parti historique algérien et à la tête du pays depuis l'indépendance . Après lui , Chadli Bendjedid[14] , un autre militaire prendra la tête du pays ainsi que du FLN . Le 11 janvier 1992 , il démissionne mais pour comprendre celle-ci , il faut revenir sur un fait important .

[15] (Chadli Bendjedid , 3émè chef d'État de l'Algérie)

En octobre 1988, des manifestations contre le président Chadli Bendjedid eurent lieu dans toutes les villes algériennes.L'armée, en tirant sur les manifestants, fit plus de 500 morts et choqua la population par la brutalité de la réponse.[16] La réponse du président fut d'entreprendre une réforme. Le 23 février 1989, il proposa une nouvelle constitution par voie référendaire qui supprimait le parti unique, la référence au socialisme , et instaurait les libertés d'expression, d'association et de réunion .

[17] (Algérie : La «révolution» du 5 octobre 1989)

Au début de l'année 1991, trente-trois partis de très divers courants politiques obtinrent une existence légale, parmi eux le front des forces socialistes, le Rassemblement pour la culture et la démocratie, le parti social démocrate mais aussi et surtout le Front islamique du salut (FIS)[18] .Le 12 juin 1990, le FIS remporta les élections locales avec 54 % des voix, ce parti avait ainsi le double du score du FLN. Le 26 décembre 1991, les résultats des législatives est un choc pour les représentants politiques algériens. Malgré 39 % d'abstention, le FIS gagne facilement le premier tour des élections à l'assemblée nationale algérienne avec 48 % des votes, ils gagnèrent 118 des 232 sièges avec un taux de participation de 59 % . Dans ce sens, une victoire du FIS au second tour et la nomination d'un gouvernement dominé par le FIS semblaient alors inévitables.

[19]

[20] (FIS : Front islamique du salut)

III-La tragédie Mohamed Boudiaf et la guerre civile

C’est en ce moment que tout allait s’emballer . Tous les officiers généraux et supérieurs de l'armée algérienne entrèrent en scène le 11 janvier 1992 . Autour du ministre de la Défense, il y avait une cinquantaine de personnes réunies, dont le chef d'état-major, le directeur du Département du Renseignement et de la Sécurité (DRS), le directeur du contre-espionnage, les directeurs centraux du ministère ainsi que les chefs des six régions militaires .

[21]

L'histoire en Algérie donnera à ce groupe le nom des « Janviéristes »[22] , appelés parfois les « Décideurs » . Car en Fait , ils ont décidé, d'interrompre le second tour , prévu pour le 16 janvier. Ils ont justifié le coup de force par les arguments suivants :

1-Le Front islamique du salut (FIS) veut s'emparer du pouvoir par la force.

2-Si le FIS arrivait au pouvoir, il ne respecterait ni la constitution, ni les lois et ruinerait le pays politiquement et économiquement.

3-Il y a nécessité d'assurer l'ordre et de rétablir l'autorité de l'État.

4-Il est urgent de promouvoir le décollage économique et de lutter contre le chômage.

Mieux , l’armée est soutenue dans son action par les partis politiques laïcs et démocrates. Les « janviéristes » ont acquis une « nouvelle légitimité » en s'autoproclamant « sauveurs de l'Algérie », en se posant au nom de la « défense de la démocratie » comme garants de la « laïcité » contre la menace de l'« intégrisme ».

[23]

Le coup d'arrêt du processus électoral prend la forme d'un véritable coup d'État : dissolution de l'assemblée nationale, démission forcée du président Chadli Bendjedid le 12 janvier 1992, preuve de la fragilité de sa fonction (l'armée l'avait porté au sommet en 1979), arrestation de tous les principaux responsables islamistes et dissolution du Front islamique du salut (FIS).

[24] (Mohamed Boudiaf ; chef d'État du 16 janvier au 29 juin 1992)

Mohamed Boudiaf , transfuge du FLN en exil depuis près de 28 ans au Maroc , est rappelé en catastrophe en Algérie pour devenir le président du Haut Comité d'État[25] , en charge provisoire des pouvoirs de chef de l'État. Cinq mois après et à peine, un épisode les plus traumatisants de l'histoire de ce pays allait se dérouler devant les caméras de la chaine publique algérienne et parcourir le monde . Le 29 juin 1992[26] , en visite dans la ville d'Annaba et en pleine conférence , Mohamed Boudiaf meurt sous les balles d'un sous-lieutenant du Groupement d'intervention spécial (GIS), Lambarek Boumaarafi[27] . Jusqu'à aujourd'hui les motivations de ce jeune officier demeure un mystère [28] . S'agit-il d'une action isolée commise par un militaire ayant des sympathies islamistes ou celle d'un complot plus vaste impliquant des généraux de l'armée ?

[29] (Mohamed Boudiaf quelques secondes avant son assissinat le 29 juin 1992)

Le pays allait sombrer dans une guerre civile . Dans la majeure partie du pays, les activistes restants du FIS, ainsi que certains islamistes plus radicaux que le FIS, prirent le maquis avec des armes de fortune.

IV-L'armée esseulée et sa carte Abdelaziz Bouteflika

En 1994, en pleine guerre civile à l'issue incertaine, les militaires proposent à Abdelaziz Bouteflika de revenir au pouvoir. Il refuse la présidence. L'offre est renouvelée en 1999. Il accepte. En décembre 1998, il fait part de sa décision de se présenter, en qualité de candidat « indépendant », à l'élection présidentielle anticipée de 1999. Bouteflika est élu président de la République avec 73,8 % des voix à l'issue d'un scrutin au cours duquel tous ses adversaires se retirent pour dénoncer les conditions d'organisation du vote. [30]

[31] (Abdelaziz Bouteflika ; chef d'Étatd'Algérie du 27 avril 1999 au 2 avril 2019)

[32]

[33]

Voilà donc comment l'actuel "Homme fort et contesté d'Algérie" sait hisser au pouvoir . C'est grâce à l'armée [34] . Vingt ans après , cette armée lui réclame sa démission . C'est donc facile de comprendre qui dans ce pays dirige .

[35]

Conclusion :

Il faut retenir que l'Algérie est un pays encore plus complexe que l'Égypte ou le reste des pays du Maghreb . Comprendre ses rouages politiques mieux les frontières du pouvoir entre l'armée et les civiles , est très difficile . Ce pays a vécu son "printemps arabe" vingt ans avant les autres durant la fin des années 1980 ainsi que la poussée islamiste qui a entraîné une guerre civile durant les années 1990.

[36]

C’est en peu de mots un pays riche et moderne doté d’une armée puissante mais dont le militantisme extrémiste de certains partis populaires n’est jamais loin [37] . Les Algériens en sont tous conscient et comprennent clairement l’aspect hyper délicat de la transition en cours et de ses enjeux . Quoi de mieux de les laisser trouver une solution à leurs problèmes puisque c’est eux qui les comprennent mieux .

[38]

Notes de bas de page

[1] Image on 20mn.fr
[2] Image on radiofrance.fr
[3] Ahmed Gaïd Salah — Wikipédia
[4] Global Firepower
[5] 2019 Military Strength Ranking (BETA)
[6] 2019 Algeria Military Strength
[7] 2019 Military Strength Ranking (BETA)
[8] Armée nationale populaire (Algérie) — Wikipédia
[9] https://www.cairn.info/revue-les-champs-de-mars-ldm-2012-1-page-21.htm
[10] Armée nationale populaire (Algérie) — Wikipédia
[11] Image on lematindz.net
[12] Houari Boumédiène — Wikipédia
[13] Front de libération nationale (Algérie) — Wikipédia
[14] Chadli Bendjedid — Wikipédia
[15] Image on lematindz.net

[16] Guerre civile algérienne — Wikipédia
[17] Image on ksari.com
[18] Front islamique du salut — Wikipédia
[19] Image on alterinfo.net
[20] Image on wikimedia.org
[21] Image on mondafrique.com
[22] Janviéristes — Wikipédia
[23] Image on jeuneafrique.com
[24] Page sur algeriepatriotique.com
[25] Haut Comité d'État — Wikipédia
[26] Ce jour-là : le 29 juin 1992, le président Mohamed Boudiaf est assassiné – JeuneAfrique.com
[27] Lambarek Boumaarafi — Wikipédia
[28] Algérie: Mais qui donc a tué l'ex-président Mohammed Boudiaf? | Slate Afrique
[29] Page sur lematindz.net
[30] Algérie : le cercle des généraux disparus (sous Bouteflika) – JeuneAfrique.com
[31] Image on rt.com
[32] Image on lecourriercauchois.fr
[33] Image on franceantilles.fr
[34] Algérie : Bouteflika et ses généraux – JeuneAfrique.com
[35] Page sur gettyimages.com
[36] Image on over-blog-kiwi.com
[37] Le contrôle étatique de l’islam en Algérie : un héritage de l’époqu...
[38] Image on huffingtonpost.com

Questions similaires

Que pensez-vous de l'Algérie ?
Pourquoi l’Algérie ne défend pas les Ouïghours ?

Pourquoi on demande tout le temps à la France de s'excuser envers l'Algérie pour les morts de la Guerre d'Algérie et pas à l'Algérie de s'excuser pour les actes du FLN durant la même période ?

Les gouvernements Algériens successifs ont-ils voulu jeter de la poudre aux yeux à leur peuple, afin de faire oublier leur incapacité à diriger leur pays en stigmatisant sans cesse la France ?

Combien de "Pieds Noirs" (Algériens d´origine européenne) sont restés en Algérie après la victoire du FLN et la déclaration de l´indépendance du pays ?

Pourquoi l’Algérie remet-elle maintenant sur la table la question mémorielle avec la France ?

La Kabylie pourra-t-elle prospérer après son indépendance de l'Algérie?

Pourquoi le royaume autocratique marocain s'acharne-t-il contre l'Algérie en déployant une armée du Net mobilisée 24 h/24 ?

Comment réagissent les Algériens au décès d'Abdelaziz Bouteflika ?
Que va changer le décès du Général Ahmed Gaïd Salah en Algérie ?

Pourquoi la guerre de l'indépendance de l'Algérie à durée pour presque 8 ans malgré que la France pouvait se retirer de l'Algérie plutôt ?

Pourquoi l'Algérie a-t-elle rompu ses relations diplomatiques avec le Maroc ?

La France est-elle tenue de remettre ses archives à l'Algérie qui les réclame ? Comment l'Algérie pourrait-elle s'en servir ?

L’Algérie a décidé de revoir ses relations diplomatiques avec le Maroc, qu’elle accuse d’être impliqué dans les incendies qui ont ravagé le nord de l’Algérie. D'où proviennent ces accusations ?

L'Algérie est-il un pays sans avenir ?

Que pensez-vous des Algériens ?

Stéphanie Houle-Lachance · Suivre Si ma réponse est utile, je la partagerai. 3 ans Pour ceux que j'ai eu l'occasion de rencontrer ici au Canada, j'ai eu de très bonnes expériences. J'ai généralement rencontrés des gens très sociables, chaleureux et surtout ayant une belle opinion sur l'interculturalité. J'ai eu la chance de discuter avec plusieurs et vraiment ce fût une expérience enrichissante. Je crois aussi que les algériens sont des gens travaillants et fiers de leur patrie. :)

RE: Que pensez-vous des Algériens ?

Ilola Tcham, lectrice-correctrice de langue française

Française et grandie en France, je ne me souviens que très vaguement de la "guerre en Algérie" qui, à l'époque, n'était pas même nommée "guerre"…

Mais j'ai acquis, durant mes premières années de l'adolescence, baignées dans un discours où se mêlaient la peur et le ressentiment anti-algérien, une impression de "dignité" que donnait ce peuple, se battant pour son indépendance.

Puis j'ai découvert un peu de la littérature francophone algérienne… ce qui a renforcé mon intérêt et mon respect.

Donc, j'ai passé les deux premiers tiers de ma vie à ressentir une profonde estime et même une certaine admiration pour un tel peuple qui, comme d'autres peuples avant lui, écrivait son histoire avec un courage que nous trouvions sans cesse exalté dans nos livres d'histoire… et avec qui nous partagions, par ailleurs, certains éléments culturels, l'amour des lettres…"Un grand peuple", me semblait-il !

Aujourd'hui, arrivant à l'autre bout de ma vie, j'avoue que… je ne sais plus trop : ce que nous "entendons" de l'Algérie n'est plus aussi séducteur ni porteur, mais… sans doute n'en entendons pas, non plus, le plus intéressant…

Un peu dommage, tout de même, que l'échange n'ait pas su s'accroître entre deux peuples jouissant de leur pleine liberté… et qui ont malgré tout tant partagé durant plus d'un siècle.

Questions similaires

Pourquoi certains Algériens font n’importe quoi en France ?

Pourquoi les Marocains ne supportent pas les Algériens, qui ont pourtant une culture similaire ?

Pourquoi les Algériens sont-ils si fiers de leur pays mais dans le même temps le fuient en masse ?

Pourquoi les algériens sont-ils si nationalistes ?
Que pensez-vous de l'Algérie ?
Pourquoi les Arabes détestent l'Algérie ?

Finalement, si l’Algérie était restée française, la France ne serait-elle pas devenu un pays à majorité musulmane ? De manière générale, à quoi ressemblerait la France aujourd'hui si l’Algérie était restée française ?

Pourquoi les Algériens, au moins ceux en France, parlent si bien le français ?

Pourquoi il n'y a qu'avec l'Algérie que les relations sont souvent tendues alors que la France a occupé d'autres pays ?

Comment le reste du monde voit-il l'Algérie ?
Que pensent vraiment les tunisiens des algériens ?
Pourquoi les Algériens sont-ils aussi fiers de leur pays ?
Que pensez-vous des Algériens ou plus précisément des Berbères après l'incident d'hier ?
Pourquoi autant de polémique sur les Algériens ?
Comment était l'Algérie avant d'être française ?
Pourquoi les immigrés venus en occident, deviennent plus ancrés dans leurs cultures (Maghreb, Afrique noire, Indochine) que ceux restés aux pays ? Et quels sont les dégâts psychologiques sur leurs enfants ?

Jean-Pierre Mannella · Suivre Technicien de laboratoire sam.

Réponse originale : Pourquoi les immigrés venu en occident, deviennent plus encrés dans leurs cultures (Maghreb, Afrique noir, Indochine) que ceux rester aux pays ? Et quels sont les dégâts Psychologiques sur leurs enfants ?

Vous vous trompez, ça peux concerner toutes les ethnies.

L'emigré garde un souvenir "figé" de son pays d'origine une sorte de "photo" immuable… son pays change avec le temps, les mœurs y changent, mais ces changements, l'émigré parfois ne les perçois pas.

Ma mère l'a vécu avec mon père, parti d'Italie vers la fin de la guerre… il n'y est revenu avec ma mère (francaise d'origine) qu'au milieu des années 60.

Avant leur venue, il lui a décris l'Italie telle qu'il s'en souvenait… une Italie à peine sortie de la guerre…

Et ma mère a vue une Italie en plein boom économique avec les mœurs des années 60 qui étaient a des millions d'années lumière de l'Italie de Mussolini…

Ce ne fut pas ma mère la plus choquée par ce séjour… □

Questions similaires

Pourquoi la France n'impose-t-elle pas que ses nouvelles générations issues de l'immigration portent des prénoms français ? En sachant que les prénoms maghrébins particulièrement sont pénalisants à vie et confinent dans un statut d'immigré?

Pourquoi les Occidentaux se croient-ils supérieurs à tout le monde et n’acceptent rien à apprendre des autres cultures?

Est-il vrai que ce sont les immigrés qui provoquent le plus d'incidents en France ?

Quels sont les pays d'Afrique les plus riches, et quelle est la source principale de leur fortune ?

Les français perdent-ils leur culture, leur histoire et leur civilisation au profil de l'islam ?
Quel est le pays le plus dangereux en Afrique ?

Pourquoi vouloir bloquer l'immigration des pays africains, et pas celle des pays occidentaux ? Les immigrés africains n'ont-ils en général pas plus besoin d'aide que les immigrés occidentaux ?

Les Français sont-ils amicaux envers les immigrants qui peuvent s'assimiler dans leur culture et parler français ?

Quels sont les phénomènes psychologiques les plus impressionnants en marketing et techniques de vente ?

D'après vous, est-ce que les immigrés qui ne s'assimilent pas doivent quitter la France ?

Pourquoi les Algériens disent-ils que les Marocains pillent leur culture et volent leur Histoire ?

Le sentiment anti-français à l'ère de la désinformation n'a jamais été aussi élevé dans des régions africaines amenées à avoir la croissance de population la plus importante ces prochaines décennies. Peut-on le voir comme une menace pour la France ?

Parmi les faits psychologiques, quels sont les plus incroyables ?

Si vous avez déjà visité plusieurs pays d'Afrique, quel est le pays qui vous a le plus marqué. Sinon, si vous comptez revenir en Afrique, quel pays irez-vous en premier ?

Pour quelle raison principale pensez-vous que la France n'a pas réussi à faire en sorte que les enfants issus de l'immigration maghrébine se sentent français ?

Et pendant ce temps, que pensent l'Iran, le Qatar, le Venezuela, voire l'Algérie des potentiels soucis d'approvisionnement (pour la plupart des pays occidentaux), en gaz et pétrole russes ?

Samir سمير Farid فريد · Suivre ولسوف يعطيك ربك فترضى 11 h

Pour le Qatar il ya pas de soucis, il a la capacité d'augmenter sa production et ses livraisons de gaz liquéfié, les européens peuvent assurer la logistique.

Pour le Venezuela, il faut voir du côté des américains qui doivent alléger leurs sanctions et négocier avec le pouvoir contesté à Caracas.

Pour l'Iran, c'est compliqué, la Russie a changé brutalement sa position dans les pourparlers sur l'accord nucléaire avec les occidentaux, un responsable iranien a exprimé la non compréhension de la nouvelle position de la Russie, mais il est évident que Poutine va interdire à l'Iran de compenser les parts manquées en cas de sanctions occidentales, et il peut leur faire très mal en Syrie s'ils prennent une position qui profiterait à ses adversaires.

Pour L'Algérie, le problème est différent, elle s'erait tirée une balle dans le pieds il ya quelques mois en fermant le gazoduc qui la relie à l'Espagne via le Maroc, si elle veut aujourd'hui bénéficier de la manne qui se présente, elle doit négocier avec le Maroc pour qu'il accepte de laisser le gaz algérien transiter par son sol, ce n'est pas ce qui va faire plaisir aux généraux d'Alger, mais ça sera pour le grand bien de nos frères algériens.

Questions similaires

Pourquoi on demande tout le temps à la France de s'excuser envers l'Algérie pour les morts de la Guerre d'Algérie et pas à l'Algérie de s'excuser pour les actes du FLN durant la même période ?

Qu'est-ce qui empêche des pays comme l'Algérie et le Maroc à se développer ?

Que pensent l'Algérie, le Maroc, la Tunisie, la Turquie, le Bangladesh, et les autres pays musulmans de la victoire des Talibans en Afghanistan ?

En tant que non-arabe, quelle partie du monde arabe aimez-vous le mieux, le Maghreb (Algérie, Tunisie, Maroc), le Levant (Égypte, Syrie, Liban, Irak) ou la péninsule arabique (KSA, Émirats arabes unis, Qatar), et pourquoi ?

Les pays occidentaux cesseront-ils de soutenir le régime d'Alger suite aux lourdes et graves accusations soulevées par le président du MAK (Mouvement pour l'Autonomie de la Kabylie) lors de sa conférence de presse d'aujourd'hui ?

Comment et pourquoi les Algériens ont-ils été incapables d'arrêter les Français avant le bombardement d'Alger en 1815, puis avant l'invasion, le bombardement et la conquête, la colonisation et la prise de contrôle de toute l'Algérie ?

Est-ce que le projet d'Eurabia (tel que craint par Oriana Fallaci) est toujours d'actualité par l'échange du pétrole saoudien contre "immigration facilitée" en faveur des frères maghrébins ?

Pourquoi les pays du pourtour méditerranéen se disputent ils pour la plus grande part des réserves de gaz, alors qu'on enseigne aux enfants dès leur plus jeune âge qu'il vaut mieux partager que de se battre pour la plus grande part ?

Est-il possible que le Japon soit dépendant du Moyen-Orient pour environ 90% des importations de pétrole brut ?

L'Amérique est-elle en train de tomber et est-il possible que la Russie devienne le premier pays mondial ?

Que pensez-vous des déclarations de la France, de l'Allemagne et du Royaume-Uni selon lesquelles l'Iran est responsable de l'utilisation de drones pour attaquer Saudi Aramco, l'entreprise publique de traitement du pétrole en Arabie Saoudite ?

Comment se fait-il que les pays occidentaux ne savent pas que les pays de l'Est ont des équivalents de l'OTAN comme l'OTSC et d'autres traités d'alliances, plus efficaces que le vieux pacte de Varsovie ?

Quel pays serait le favoris de l'UE et des USA pour étendre sa souveraineté sur la Dorsale de Lomonossov entre le Canada, le Danemark et la Russie ?

Pourquoi Trump attaquerait-il l'Iran lorsqu'on sait que la plus grande partie du pétrole du Moyen-Orient part en direction de l'Asie ? N'y a-t-il pas un risque d'impliquer la Chine qui ne pourra pas supporter une interruption de ses importations ?

Si l'Iran entre en guerre ouverte et totale contre les USA et Israël, quelles seraient les conséquences en France ?

Est-ce que le Maroc va attaquer l'Algérie ?

Yves Montenay Anciennement Enseignant et chef d'entreprise à Divers (1965–2000) 24 nov.

Logiquement elle ne devrait pas. Elle n’est pas sûre de gagner et peut-être cela déclencherait des troubles

Mais le pouvoir absolu rend fou. Il peut aussi avoir l’espoir que le nationalisme de guerre pourrait faire oublier la gestion catastrophique :

Algérie : tout s’écroule et le régime attaque la France et le français

L’Algérie va très mal : avec un pétrole à 40 $, la ruine approche, les militaires ont gardé le pouvoir et le virus n’arrange rien. La vieille recette est de taper sur la France et sur la position d…

https://www.yvesmontenay.fr/2020/07/15/algerie-tout-secroule-et-le-regime-attaque-la-france-et-le-francais/

RE: Est-ce que le Maroc va attaquer l'Algérie ?

Semar Redouane Répondu 9 déc.

Pour l'instant les rapports de force entre les deux pays ne plaident pas en faveur d'une attaque de l’Algérie . Mais la guerre peut arriver si le Maroc continue dans ses provocations (en tuant 3 civils algériens , il a porté la provocation à un niveau très élevé) . Le Makhzen pense qu'il peut remettre en cause les rapports de force sur le plan militaire avec l’Algérie avec une alliance avec Israël , cette politique est extrêmement dangereuse pour plusieurs raisons , la course à l'armement va appauvrir le Maroc , Israël ne fait pas de cadeau , et la situation économique du peuple Marocain est très mauvaise , Israël va contrôler de plus en plus le Maroc et peser sur ses choix de politique internationale et nationale et une bonne partie du peuple marocain est déjà à la base contre la normalisation avec Israël , cette alliance dangereuse est très impopulaire. Enfin si l’Algérie sent que les rapports de force dans un ou deux ans vont en défaveur de sa domination stratégique , elle peut engager la guerre de peur d'être attaquée , les algériens savent qu'il y'a une volonté expansionniste chez le Maroc et il veut s'accaparer des parties du territoire algérien , et ils ne le laisseront pas faire d'une manière ou d'une autre. En tout cas en provoquant la guerre au Sahara occidentale, en refusant au peuple sahraoui son droit à l'autodétermination ,en faisant de l’Algérie un ennemi et en voulant porter atteinte à son unité en soutenant le MAK , en s'alliant avec Israël, le Maroc ou plus précisément le Makhzen joue avec le feu et mène une politique agressive et dangereuse pour toute la région. L’Europe doit arrêter le fou de M6 avant qu'il ne casse tout , déjà qu'il pense être capable de dicter à l'Europe ce qu'elle doit penser et faire à l'égard de la question sahraoui , cette arrogance va être catastrophique pour tout le monde

RE: Est-ce que le Maroc va attaquer l'Algérie ?

Samir Berkani , ancien(ne) Errant dans la Cité Répondu 24 nov.

Il n'y a aucun intérêt est ce que le Maroc attaque l'Algérie et encore moins de point de vue de la géostratégie mondiale qui est substantiellement liée à l'économie.Le Maroc cherche à se frayer un chemin dans ce boulevard qui est l'ouverture du marché mondial et si cela se produirait, il perdra ces pays qui plaident pour son intégration franche en tant pays pouvant jouer un rôle dans l'économie mondiale.A mon humble avis, il existe des élites intellectuelles et politiques dans les deux pays suffisamment conscientes pour s s'opposer à une guerre entre deux peuples qui partagent la même culture et la même histoire… Du moins c'est ce que j'espère…

Questions similaires

Pourquoi il n'y a qu'avec l'Algérie que les relations sont souvent tendues alors que la France a occupé d'autres pays ?

Si une guerre Algérie Maroc éclatait qui gagnerait ?

Pourquoi Abdelmoumen(calife des Almohades) est-il revendiqué comme Marocain par les Marocains, alors qu'il venait d'une tribu localisée en Algérie actuelle ?

Dans quelle mesure une guerre est-elle possible entre l'Algérie et le Maroc ?
Pourquoi l'Algérie a-t-elle rompu ses relations diplomatiques avec le Maroc ?
L'Algérie va-t-elle attaquer le Maroc ?
Pourquoi le Maroc est-il plus fort que l'Algérie ?
Les relations entre le Maroc et l'Algérie peuvent-elles dégénérer en conflit armé ?
Que va changer le décès du Général Ahmed Gaïd Salah en Algérie ?
Comment voyez-vous l'Algérie ?
Pourquoi le Maroc est-il toujours jaloux de l'Algérie ?
Quel est le problème profond que l'Algérie a avec la France ?
Pourquoi le Maroc a-t-il attaqué l'Espagne en 2002 ?
La France a-t-elle encore son mot à dire sur l'Algérie ?
L'Algérie et le Maroc constituent-ils une future menace militaire pour la France ?

Algérie : tout s'écroule et le régime attaque la France et le français

Yves MontenayBlog d'Histoire, Culture, Economie et Géopolitique 15 juillet 2020

L'Algérie va très mal : avec un pétrole à 40 $, la ruine approche, les militaires ont gardé le pouvoir et le virus n'arrange rien. La vieille recette est de taper sur la France et sur la position du français en Algérie. À mon avis ça n'arrangera rien, au contraire.

Parallèlement, le pouvoir algérien envoie de temps en temps un mot aimable à Paris, qui semble signifier » Ne faites pas attention, ces critiques ne sont que des discours de politique intérieure« . C'est ce qui se passe à nouveau en ce mois de juillet 2020.

Vu de France, il semble que le régime ait recours à ces vieilles ficelles pour détourner l'attention des Algériens des vrais problèmes. Et, sur ce point, il est à l'unisson des islamistes, qui veulent bloquer toute ouverture vers l'extérieur.

Le mouvement de protestation Hirak est donc vu avec sympathie en France, puisqu'il pose le vrai problème, celui du « système » algérien, en place depuis l'indépendance.

La prise du pouvoir par les militaires

D'abord une réflexion très générale : dans le monde entier, les guerres d'indépendance s'appuient certes sur un sentiment populaire, souvent d'ailleurs cultivé par un ennemi du pouvoir colonial, en général l'URSS puis la Russie, parfois la Chine, comme au Cambodge.

Mais l'objectif concret des révoltés est d'amener leur chef et son parti au pouvoir, que ce soit Ho Chi Minh et le parti communiste au Vietnam ou Boumediene et le Front de libération nationale (FLN) en Algérie. Étant précisé pour l'Algérie que « l'armée des frontières » commandée par Houari Boumédiène, futur président, est restée à l'extérieur sans combattre, et n'est entrée qu'après le cessez-le-feu de 1962, justement pour prendre le pouvoir. Donc guerres d'indépendance, oui, guerres de libération, non.

En Algérie, il y aura donc bientôt 60 ans que l'armée est au pouvoir, avec des variantes dont l'une, celle de Bouteflika, jeune adjoint de Boumédiène en 1962, vient de se terminer.

Le massacre de l'économie algérienne

L'économie algérienne a été particulièrement massacrée pour plusieurs raisons :

Le départ d'une grande partie des gens qualifiés

Il y a d'abord eu le départ des Pieds-noirs, y compris les quelques dizaines de milliers qui ont essayé de rester après l'indépendance.

Je me souviens de ce patron d'une entreprise de construction dont le personnel était en majorité musulman, et qui a essayé de rester plusieurs années pour finalement regagner la France à la suite de brimades répétées, emmenant avec lui son personnel.

Les cadres qualifiés musulmans des entreprises françaises sont souvent également partis, notamment parce que le clientélisme et la corruption les empêchaient de travailler normalement.

Et l'exode continue, du fait de manque de liberté politique, de pressions sociales et religieuses et des obstacles à la promotion par la compétence. On a même vu des cadres algériens rentrés au pays en repartir.

L'idéologie socialiste de l'époque

L'alliance avec l'URSS combinée avec les proclamations nationalistes ont fait de l'Algérie un pays officiellement socialiste.

Elle a certes dû renoncer à cet adjectif pour recevoir l'argent du FMI au milieu de la guerre civile des années 1990, mais les mauvaises habitudes bureaucratiques étaient prises et durent encore. Ce « socialisme national » avait également l'avantage de légitimer les militaires et de leur donner un outil de contrôle de la société.

Cela a mené à la création de « sociétés nationales » qui ont presque toutes été des échecs coûteux.

Même la Sonatrach, qui a remplacé les entreprises pétrolières françaises et qui disposait d'une énorme marge financière, est un échec relatif, pour les mêmes raisons que les autres compagnies pétrolières nationales, vénézuélienne ou mexicaine par exemple.

La rente pétrolière y a servi de caisse noire aux dirigeants, les cadres ne sont pas toujours nommés sur des critères de compétence et le résultat final est une baisse de la production faute d'investissements et la sous-traitance ou la coopération généralisée avec des entreprises étrangères, c'est-à-dire justement ce que l'on voulait officiellement éviter.

Tout cela a bien entendu généralisé une corruption par « pompage » des recettes publiques, qui a eu comme conséquence de bloquer le développement du pays, puisque chaque tentative de production nationale était interdite pour ne pas léser les intérêts de la personnalité ayant la main sur les importations, importations payées avec le pétrole, après un petit détour vers un paradis fiscal.

Un autre exemple de cette corruption bloquant le développement a été à mon avis la fameuse loi des 51 % de capital algérien imposée aux investisseurs étrangers, ce qui en a découragé la plupart et obligé les autres à des « arrangements » coûteux.

Or les pays qui se sont développés, tant au nord qu'au sud, l'ont fait en encourageant les investisseurs étrangers qui apportent de l'argent et du personnel qualifié.

Pour mes lecteurs français, je rappelle que le peuple algérien est très conscient du manque de démocratie et d'une corruption freinant de développement. Il s'est révolté plusieurs fois, et, depuis le 22 février 2019, ont eu lieu chaque vendredi d'énormes manifestations, «Le hirak » (traduction littérale « le mouvement »), qui ont abouti dans un premier temps à la renonciation du président Bouteflika à se représenter pour un cinquième mandat en dépit de sa santé plus que catastrophique.

Mais l'armée est alors réapparue « en pilotage direct », puis en faisant ouvertement élire comme président un relatif inconnu, au profil de haut fonctionnaire non islamiste, Abdelmajid Tebboune.

Le hirak a continué jusqu'à sa suspension par le confinement, et son éventuelle reprise est en débat.

Le nouveau pouvoir alterne bonnes paroles et répression. Mais comme sa nature n'a pas changé, les Algériens craignent le retour des mêmes défauts. Et de toute façon demeure l'énorme handicap de la mauvaise qualification des Algériens.

Un peuple sous qualifié

Les Français d'origine algérienne, ainsi que les Algériens résidant en France, sont présents à tous les niveaux de la société française, comme en témoignent les noms de famille arabes que l'on trouve dans toutes les professions. Il y a deux raisons à cela, d'abord l'arrivée des meilleurs cerveaux algériens, médecins notamment, et ensuite le système scolaire français, extrêmement imparfait certes, mais néanmoins nettement en meilleur état que l'algérien si on croit la presse de ce pays et de nombreux témoignages.

Une des raisons du retard du système scolaire algérien est son arabisation brutale dans les années 1970, et donc l'importation de nombreux enseignants égyptiens, pas forcément choisis parmi les meilleurs, très souvent traditionalistes religieusement et formant par l'apprentissage par cœur, contrairement à l'analyse critique qui est en principe la base du système français.

Rajoutons que dans ces années 1970, cet enseignement en arabe était en langue étrangère pour les jeunes Algériens car l'arabe officiel n'était la langue maternelle de personne, la population parlant une sorte de créole partiellement francisé, la darija, ou une langue berbère ou encore le français.

Le remède à tout cela : tapons sur la France et le français !

Bref, la situation algérienne est toujours mauvaise. Et l'explication officielle n'a pas changé : « c'est la faute de la France » !

Les grands dirigeants français, Napoléon III ou de Gaulle, dès 1943 pour ce dernier, ont été beaucoup plus lucides que les Pieds-noirs, constatant que l'avenir de l'Algérie ne pouvait se concevoir en écartant 80 à 90 % de la population.

Les réformes du premier n'ont pas survécu à son départ en 1871, et ont au contraire permis aux Pieds-noirs, qui y étaient opposés, de se proclamer les « vrais républicains » et d'inventer « l'Algérie française » qui étendait à l'Algérie toutes les lois françaises, sauf le droit de vote pour les musulmans.

Mais les militaires algériens ont nourri la demie vérité d'une « colonisation épouvantable », et qu'ils auraient éliminée par la force, ce qui n'est plus du tout la vérité, l'indépendance résultant d'un plébiscite organisé par De Gaulle. Les programmes scolaires algériens et l'information officielle font sans cesse allusion à cette « victoire » de l'armée qui légitimerait son pouvoir sur le pays.

Pour nourrir cette légitimité, et éviter qu'elle ne soit entamée par des échecs gouvernementaux répétés, il faut noircir la France et dénoncer ses pressions pour sauver « ses intérêts ». Intérêts qui n'existent plus depuis 50 ans et qui ont été remplacés notamment par des intérêts chinois.

En pratique seule subsiste des coopérations culturelle et antiterroriste demandées par les 2 parties.

Remous diplomatiques

Dernier incident un peu hypocrite : en mai 2020, l'Algérie a décidé de rappeler « immédiatement » son ambassadeur à Paris « suite au caractère récurrent de programmes diffusés par des chaînes de télévision publiques françaises attaquant le peuple algérien et ses institutions, dont l'Armée nationale populaire, la digne héritière de l'Armée de libération nationale » d'après un communiqué du ministère des Affaires étrangères algérien.

Pourtant, les Algériens savent parfaitement que les médias français sont indépendants de l'État, ce qui n'est pas le cas chez eux … où je pense qu'on trouverait facilement de nombreuses émissions pas très aimables pour la France !

Parallèlement, l'ambassadeur de France en Algérie, Xavier Driencourt partira à la retraite le 2 août 2020, ayant atteint la limite d'âge. Ce départ prévu de longue date tombe donc à un moment délicat, et on s'interrogeait encore ce 5 juin sur le nom de son successeur. Le candidat idéal, François Gouyette, ambassadeur en Arabie, fin connaisseur du Moyen-Orient et arabophone, a comme handicap d'atteindre lui aussi la limite d'âge en 2021.

Certes, il y a régulièrement des « réchauffements » entre les présidents français et algériens. C'est une fois de plus le cas en cette mi-juillet 2020. Mais jusqu'à présent, le poids de la politique intérieure algérienne l'a fait retomber dans ses errements habituels, puisque sa cause structurelle demeure, à savoir la légitimation de la direction du pays par l'armée.

Haro sur la langue française !

Et puisqu'il faut taper sur la France, tapons aussi sur le français puisque les francophones ont accès à des informations pas toujours agréables pour le régime. Et que le français est un obstacle pour les islamistes, qui pèsent sur tous les gouvernements algériens.

Ainsi, le ministre algérien de l'Enseignement supérieur vient de demander aux étudiants de rédiger leurs thèses et mémoires en langue anglaise dès la rentrée prochaine ! Heureusement, il ne suffit pas de le décréter pour que cela se concrétise…

Mieux encore : le parti islamiste MSP demande que la future constitution algérienne prévoie « la criminalisation de l'utilisation de la langue française dans les institutions et documents officiels ».

Le journal algérien La liberté du 12 juillet 2020 rappelle que « 3 éléments sont la cible permanente des fanatiques religieux : les femmes, les arts, et les langues étrangères ».

Le dirigeant du MSP, Abderrazak Makri persiste et signe en attaquant *« Les enfants de la France » (*comprendre les « traîtres ») qui se consacrent à la défense de la langue française et des intérêts français et ont une attitude servile à l'égard de la France ».

Pourtant le français est une langue algérienne

Pendant la colonisation, une partie de la population algérienne a adopté le français, et après l'indépendance, la « grande coopération » demandée par l'Algérie a envoyé dans ce pays des dizaines de milliers de jeunes Français qui ont permis de lancer la scolarisation des Algériens à grande échelle.

Cette période scolaire en français a fourni des cadres à l'Algérie pendant 50 ans. Ces derniers ont transmis l'usage du français comme langue de travail. Usage encore renforcé par les familles à cheval sur les pays francophones et l'Algérie, par les nombreux Algériens ayant effectué leurs études supérieures dans ces mêmes pays francophones, ou par le cas particulier des Kabyles qui ont le français comme deuxième langue comme peut le constater tout voyageur.

Finalement le français est une langue de l'Algérie et non une langue étrangère, contrairement à ce que le pouvoir ou des religieux ne cessent de répéter.

Citons parmi mille autres cette tribune de Khaoula Taleb Ibrahimi, Professeure en science du langage à l'Université d'Alger 2, parue dans La liberté le 1er juin 2020 : « Nous avons besoin d'une politique des langues dans tous les paliers de notre système éducatif, de l'école primaire à l'université, hardie, raisonnée et rationnelle… Et cela doit se faire sans chauvinisme, sans dogmatisme, sans populisme ni démagogie et sans donner à une langue une position hégémonique au détriment d'une autre … Malgré le profond mouvement populaire en faveur de la démocratie, le pouvoir continue ses pratiques autoritaires sur le mode de l'injonction et du mépris des réalités objectives du pays ». Pour ceux qui ne connaissent pas l'Algérie, je précise que ces «réalités objectives » sont l'usage de la darija, des langues berbères et du français.

Rajoutons que la connaissance du français par une grande partie des Algériens permettrait une installation simple et rapide d'entreprises françaises, belges, suisses, canadiennes, comme au Maroc. Ce pays en a largement bénéficié, et en a tiré un double bénéfice puisque les entreprises marocaines se développent maintenant en Afrique subsaharienne francophone.

Et l'anglais ?

Le premier changement de langue, l'arabisation, a été une catastrophe.

Le passage à l'anglais en serait une autre, en partie pour les mêmes raisons : une langue non maternelle et encore plus ignorée par la population, pas de corps enseignant et pas de débouchés, sauf pour certains métiers restreints comme la recherche scientifique de haut niveau.

Mais ce dernier point ne concerne que quelques centaines ou quelques milliers de spécialistes qui feront comme dans tous les autres pays : apprendre l'anglais. Il n'est pas nécessaire de bouleverser le l'Algérie pour cela !

Et puis n'oubliez pas que de l'aveu même de The Economist, journal de l'élite anglophone mondiale, des cadres internationaux parlant le français ou l'espagnol en plus de l'anglais éliminent les purs anglophones ou les anglo-arabophones, sauf dans quelques pays du Moyen-Orient.

Rappelons que les chercheurs français, comme ceux les autres pays, travaillent en français et publient en anglais, langue qu'ils ont appris comme les autres matières de leur formation. Et puis, comment exiger de passer un doctorat en anglais quand tout ce qui précède est ou devrait être en arabe ?

Je maîtrise le français, l'anglais et l'allemand, et mon expérience de cadre dirigeant dans 12 pays a illustré deux évidences : on travaille beaucoup mieux dans sa langue maternelle ou de formation et la traduction est un exercice excellent pour préciser les idées.

Je rajoute que beaucoup de textes conçus en anglais sont moins précis que leur équivalent en français, d'une part parce qu'il y a davantage de polysémie en anglais qu'en français et d'autre part parce qu'ils n'ont pas subi l'épreuve de la traduction.

C'est pour cette raison que la cour de justice de l'Union européenne à Luxembourg est un temple de la traduction, avec le français comme langue des débats internes, malgré les pressions anglo-saxonnes.

Et puis, même si l'anglais était un remède, il faudra combien de décennies pour l'implanter à la base, alors que le français est là !

Sans même parler du gâchis humain que serait la mise à l'écart de l'élite francophone…

Refuser le modèle moyen-oriental

Je connais le Moyen-Orient, arabe, turc et perse. Cela m'a convaincu de la nécessaire ouverture linguistique et culturelle des sociétés musulmanes pour éviter les dérives catastrophiques et souvent sanglantes de cette région.

Or on n'étudie pas les mêmes textes en français et en arabe.

Les rapports du Programme des Nations unies pour le développement (PNUD) des années 2000 nous rappellent que les principales œuvres mondiales ne sont pas traduites en arabe, et l'examen des lieux de lecture arabophone montre la prépondérance des ouvrages religieux.

Une grande langue étrangère largement connue par le peuple algérien est donc nécessaire pour échapper aux dictatures extrémistes.

Cela pourrait être l'anglais, l'espagnol ou le français, mais, comme dit, pourquoi torturer encore plus la société algérienne alors que le français y est déjà assez largement connu.

Par ailleurs, l'anglais est souvent utilisé comme une simple langue de communication et non comme l'ouverture à une culture, du moins au Moyen-Orient.

Je vais être franc et direct : si une partie des Algériens et leurs amis français ou occidentaux sont attachés au maintien du français en Algérie, une des raisons est qu'il permet de sortir de l'univers moyen-oriental et du conservatisme politique, voire du fanatisme religieux qui y règne. Beaucoup d'Africains du nord se sentent plus proches de l'autre rive de la Méditerranée que de la Syrie ou de l’Irak. Les chercheurs arabes travaillant en Occident ont une vue catastrophique du Moyen-Orient. Voir par exemple « Le monde arabe a-t-il un avenir ? » d’Abdelatif Laroui.

Il ne s’agit pas seulement de langue ou de religion, mais de développement économique et humain. Il faut que dès l’enfance, les Algériens aient d’une autre source d’information que les télévisions wahhabites.

Yves Montenay

Crédit photo de couverture : Alger Lors de la manifestation du vendredi 15 mars 2019 – Credit PPAgency

Quelle est la véritable histoire de l'Algérie depuis ses débuts?

Anis Précédent lieu : Alger, Algérie (1999–0) 2 ans

Ma réponse ici pourrait apporter un bref résumé sur l'histoire de l'Algérie depuis -202 AV J.C jusqu'à l'invasion Omeyyad.

Donc pour reprendre de la ou je me suis arrêté, les Omeyyades arrivent en Afrique du Nord, ils ne tardent pas à soumettre l'Egypte et entrent dans les territoires de la Libye et la Tunisie moderne où ils sont confronté encore une fois, à l'armée Romaine (Empire de l'Est). Le territoire Tunisien était une préfecture romaine nommé Préfecture du prétoire d'Afrique dirigé par un préfet…ce dernier pour des raisons économiques et de sécurité (peur des omeyyades) refuse d'obéir à l'Empereur de l'Orient et se déclare indépendant. Avec les Berbères (Royaume de l'Aurès et Royaume d'Altava — Wikipédia). Ils vont essayer de tenir face au Califat Omeyyade, Tout d'Abord sous le Roi d'Altava ; Koceïla — Wikipédia

Royaume de l'Aurès (4) et le Royaume d'Altava (1)

Dernier Roi d'Altava, Koceila

Koceila défait les Arabes et réussit à tuer le général Obka Ibn Nafaa, ainsi que virer les arabes de la Tunisie moderne en prenant leur base principale à Kairouan. Suite à sa mort c'est la reine Dihya, ou comme l'appellent les arabes 'El Kahina' qui va prendre le relais.

Dihya était la Reine des Aurès elle réussit à défaire les Arabes et de capturer la ville de Carthage ainsi qu'entendre son pouvoir jusqu'à Ghadames en Libye (cela va durer 5 ans) Elle va employer un politique de terre brûlée et perdre sa popularité parmis les berbères qui, ne l'oublions pas, se convertissent de plus en plus à l'Islam. Sa mort s'en suit après une bataille dans le nord de la Tunisie, dans un endroit nommé 'Tabraka'

Le règne Omeyyad en Algérie ne vas pas durer, car suite au révoltes berbères contre le souverain de Tanger, c'est tout l'Ouest ALgérien qui va être libéré, ainsi des royaumes feront leur apparition, tout d'abord l'Émirat de Tlemcen, on pense que son fondateur est celui qui déclencha la grande révolte berbère mais ce ne sont que des supposition. Son premier souverain, Abou Qurra — Wikipédia va se va declarer Caliphe de sa tribu, ils prendra la ville de Tobna et fera le siège de la ville de Kairawan a la tete de "300,000 cavaliers" dit-on.

Il faut comprendre un truc en Algérie, a l'époque appelé le 'Maghreb Central' était divisée en plusieurs tribus ces tribus, voulant s'unir mais pas sous un chef qui viendrait des leurs, pour qu'une tribue ne domine pas sur une autre; ils prennent comme Imam, le fils d'un général Perse ayant combattue contre les arabes dans la conquête Arab de la Perse. Ce dernier se nommait Ibn Rustom, il est élu par les tribus Algériennes comme leur Imam et ceci début l'Imamat de Tiaret et la dynastie Rustomid.

L'influence Rostémid, grace au courant Ibadit, réussi à intégrer des populations Libyennes et Tunisiennes sous leur drapeau. On dit aussi que l'émirat de Sijilmassa faisait allégeance au Imam de Tiaret étendant le pouvoir Rostémid dans le centre Marocain et le nord de la Mauritanie moderne.

La chute de ce Imamat viendras d'une population pas encore soumise a un pouvoir central du Maghreb (Idrissides de Fez , Rostémides de Tiaret ou Aghlebides de Raqqada) , cette population se dénomme "les Kutama"

Les Kutama ne reconnaissait ni l'Imam de Tiaret ni le pouvoir de Raqqada, un homme nommé Obeid Allah Al-Chiaai va reprendre le dogme Ismaélite dans la région et va séduire les chef locaux de l'Est Algérien. C'est le début du Califat Faitimid.

(On va sauter quelque événements) Les Fatmides délocalisent leur capitale passant d'El Mehdiyya a la Caire. Ils laissent a leur place, en tant qu'Emirs, les Zirides :

Les Zirides poussent leur conquêtes jusqu'à l'Atlantique et réussissent a établir des Emirats en Andalousie, c'est d'ailleurs eux qui mettent les fondation a l'Émirat de Grenade et le fameux palais d'Alhamra.

Des litiges familiaux vont faire qu'une branche des zirides, nommés les Hamadides va se séparer de leur pouvoir et établir leur propre royaume. C'est la naissance du premier Sultanat d'Afrique du Nord : La dynastie Hammadid.

Les Hamadids vont s'étendre a leur tour au Maroc ainsi qu'au profit des Zirides maintenant établis en Tunisie. Enfin ils devront faire face a la deuxième invasion Arab celle-ci va être provoqué par le changement de courant religieux par les Zirides puis les Hammadides qui vont cesser de reconnaître le Caliphe de la Caire comme commandant du monde Musulman, mais plutot son rival, le Calife de Bagdad. Les Hammadides résistant bien tant que mal mais c'est un homme nommé Abdul Mu'min qui va soumettre les arabes et les envoyer en Andalousie, c'est aussi le fondateur de la Dynastie d'Abd Mu'min aussi connu sous le nom des 'Almohad'

Même si le dogme des Almohad et donc le secte en lui meme, est fondé par Ibn Toumert, c'est Abdul Mu'min , un citoyen Hammadid qui va prendre commande des berbères afin d'en finir avec les Almoravides et réunir tout le maghreb et l'Andalousie.

Suite a la chute de ce Caliphat, les Magrheb se devise de nouveau en 3 entités politiques : le Maghreb centrale va être dominé par le Sultanat Ziyyanid.

Les Ziyyanides vont étendre leur pouvoir sur l'ouest Marocain, et parfois sur l'est Algérien et conquérant meme Tunis. Leur regne, le plus long des dynasties Algériennes est de 300 ans. La fin de ce royaume vient au profit du Royaume/ Régence d'Alger, fondée par Kyraddine Barberousse.

Kyraddine Barberousse, Avec 'fondateur de l'Etat Algérien' en bas.

Le Royaume d'Alger, ne va pas être un simple royaume, mais plutôt une monarchie élective ou le 'Sultan' est élu par l'armée , le Diwan (un sorte de Parlement) ou les Corsaires. Ce royaume va aussi reconnaître le Sultan Ottoman comme Calife et commandant du monde musulman, ce dernier réserve le droit de donner son accord a qui est élu à Alger. Mais il ne va jamais être en désaccord a part une fois, en 1687 et c'est a cette année ou une grande révolte a lieu a Alger, renversant les 'Agha' (generaux) et a leur place sont élu des véritables "Sultans d'Alger", qui ont une liberté économique et politique totale vis a vis les Ottomans.

Etat d'Alger en 1560

Etat d'Alger en 1771

Cette Etat va accueillir les derniers musulmans de l'Andalousie, et établir des relations avec les puissances Européennes et d'Amérique du Nord. Sa domination sur l'ouest de la méditerranée va atteindre son apogé durant le 16éme - 17ème siècle ou n'importe quel navire voulant passer sur le détroit de Gibraltar devait payer un hommage au Sultan d'Alger (un somme d'argent/ marchandise - un sorte de droit de passage). La fin de la Régence d'Alger vient avec l'affaiblissement de sa marine durant la bataille de Navarino, permettant a la France de l'envahir.

La résistance à ce nouveau envahisseur, va se diviser sur 3 plans:

-La résistance de l'Emir

-La résistance du Bey de Constantine

-La résistance du Sultan des Beni Abbas

Et pour ne pas être trop long/chiant a lire je vais m'arreter la.

Merci de votre patience.

Questions similaires
Pourquoi l'Algérie n'a-t-elle jamais été libre ?
L'Algérie est-il un pays sans avenir ?
Que pensez-vous de l'Algérie ?
Quelles sont les origines des Algériens ?
Pouvez-vous me raconter l'histoire de l'Algérie depuis ses débuts ?
Que connaissez-vous de l'histoire de l'Algérie et de la culture de ce pays ?
Pourquoi visiter l'Algérie ?

Pourquoi les 350 000 Algériens qui vivaient en France (métropolitaine) en 1962 ne sont-ils pas repartis pour l'Algérie quand elle est devenue indépendante ?

Comment le reste du monde voit-il l'Algérie ?
Quels sont des faits peu connus au sujet de l'Algérie ?
Que va changer le décès du Général Ahmed Gaïd Salah en Algérie ?
Aimez-vous l'Algérie ?
Comment était l'Algérie avant d'être française ?
Pourquoi les Français étaient-ils si attachés à garder l'Algérie ?
Quels sont les crimes commis par les Algériens lors de la guerre d'Algérie ?

Où en est le Hirak en Algérie ?

Mohamed Semeunacte · Suivre A travaillé à Algérie2 ans

L'Algérie… ou le pays où faire les choses comme tout le monde est absolument inconcevable !

Une indépendance ? Yep ! Mais pas comme les voisins (bon on était pas non plus responsables sur ce coup)

Une guerre civile ? Yep ! Mais qui dure 20 ans et qui se finit dans le "pardon" national.

Une infrastructure ? Yep ! Mais une autoroute Est-Ouest parce que… objectivement le reste du pays n'a pas besoin de routes.

Une (r)évolution ? Yep ! Mais on va se contenter de dilapider 250 Milliards d'euros… puis on va pardonner les non-remboursements hein ?!

Bref… où en le Hirak ?!

C'est une arnaque… une de plus.

Perso, j'ai toujours aimé Bouteflika, pas pour son action politique (duh…) mais pour la stabilité dont il était, en quelque sorte, le garant.

L'homme était validé par ceux qui ont réellement du pouvoir en Algérie et cela a sorti le pays tant bien que mal de 20 ans de guerre civile.

Maintenant, on veut faire les comptes, on veut assainir le pays, on veut se débarrasser des corrompus et blablabla…

Il n'y aura pas d'élections le 4 juillet et il n'y en aura pas tant qu'il n'y aura pas d'hommes (ou de femmes soyons fous…) qui fera le consensus.

Le consensus parmi qui ? Ceux qui ont réellement le pouvoir en Algérie.

Et là, 3 cas de figures :

On trouve cette personne. Super ! Je peux vous le dire d'emblée, elle est exactement comme celles et ceux qui sont sur la sortie aujourd'hui. Mais le pays restera stable, c'est probablement la meilleure issue aujourd'hui.

On ne trouve pas cette personne. Là, c'est mauvais ! La patience de celles et ceux qui chantent dans les rues les vendredis se finira certainement… mais elle sera plus longue que celle de l'armée.

On ne trouve pas cette personne et l'ingérence étrangère devient la seule vraie politique du pays. Là, c'est très mauvais ! Bienvenue en Syrie II.

En Algérie, l'armée ne fait pas dans le détail et en étant dans les premiers producteurs de combustibles fossiles de la planète… l'ingérence n'en fera pas non plus.

Si l'Algérie ne règle pas, vite, le problème parmi les siens… les choses vont déraper… et le bled "y tahrek" (va brûler) pour de bon !

Le mot de la fin

Pour celles et ceux qui regarde les événements de loin et qui espèrent "la liberté" pour les Algériens… allez demander aux Tunisiens, aux Egyptiens, aux Afghans, aux Irakiens et aux Syriens comment ils sont contents de la "liberté" dont ils jouissent aujourd'hui.

Pourquoi la France crée-t-elle des centres culturels français partout en Afrique, mais n'autorise aucun centre culturel africain en France ?

George Géal-Killy · Suivre Curieuse des cultures en général lun. Réponse originale : Pourquoi la France cree des centres culturelles Francais partout en Afrique, mais ne permet aucun centre culturelle Africain en France ?

Parce que vous êtes soit un troll soit handicapé.

La France crée des centres culturels français partout dans le monde et pour trouver l'adresse des centres culturels africains en France il vous suffit de passer moins de temps à prendre les gens pour des idiots sur Quora et plus de temps à taper les mots clés sur Google.

N'est-ce pas les musulmans marocains, algériens et sénégalés, diabolisés aujourd'hui, qui par leur courage et leur bravoure ont défendu la France contre l'invasion nazie ?

Art Multi · Suivre Lieu : France (1900–aujourd'hui) 27 janv.

Bonsoir. Vous êtes prié de respecter la mémoire de ces ancêtres au lieu de l'insulter.

Que ce qu'ils ont fait pour les générations futures fasse réfléchir votre génération et suivantes au lieu de revendiquer un héritage dont votre génération est loin d'être méritante. Bonne soirée.

Questions similaires

Pourquoi les français préfèrent-ils aller en Tunisie ou au Maroc plutôt qu'en Algérie ?
Comment trouvez-vous le Maroc ?
Que ne doit-on absolument pas faire au Maroc ?

Pourquoi les touristes européens raffolent tant des destinations comme Marrakech ?
Pourquoi le Maroc soutient-il le président autoproclamé du Vénézuela ?
Avez-vous déjà visité le Maroc ?

Tourisme: Est-il vrai que le Maroc est considéré comme l'un des pays les plus sûrs pour voyager ?

Qui aime visiter le Maroc et pourquoi ?
Le Maroc est-il un pays émergent ?
Que pensez-vous du Maroc en tant que touriste ?
Qu'est-ce qu'on doit jamais faire si je visite le Maroc ?

Comment voyez-vous le Maroc ?
Quelle est la meilleure destination touristique des Marocains en 2020 ?
Quelles sont les choses qu'on aime au Maroc ?
Pourquoi le Maroc est-il constamment présenté comme un pays arrière ?

Pensez-vous que Macron doit s'excuser pour la colonisation de l'Algérie, la Tunisie, le Maroc ...?

محمد البياضي(Mohamed El Biadi) · Suivre Lieu : Morroco. Ouezzane (1960–aujourd'hui) ven.

Une bonne partie des français est d'origine maghrébine.Un des rêves d'une bonne partie des maghrébines est de devenir française.Le français reste encore la langue des banques au Maghreb,la langue des acts administratifs(comme l'act de naissance).La carte d'identité nationale est en français et en arabe.Les études se fonds toujours en français…Là où tu vas il y a du français.Les arabes lorsqu'ils avaient colonisé le Sud de l'Espagne il n'y a jusqu'à maintenant aucune excuse envers l'Espagne…Les Israéliens ont été expulsé de leur terre par les arabes pour des siècles,et aucune excuse envers eux.Si l'Algérie a été colonisée pour plus d'un siècle et n'a pas été exterminée c'est grâce à la France,qui a éliminé les dictateurs algériens au profit de la population algérienne.Parce que les nouveaux dictateurs algériens qui cherchent des excuses ,après avoir repris le plein pouvoir.Et maintenant si ces dictateurs ne cessent pas d'esclaver les algériens ordinaires et démocratiques,il faudrait une nouvelle force qui colonniserait l'Algérie pour arranger les choses.

Questions similaires

Finalement, si l’Algérie était restée française, la France ne serait-elle pas devenu un pays à majorité musulmane ? De manière générale, à quoi ressemblerait la France aujourd'hui si l’Algérie était restée française ?

La France doit-elle s’excuser pour son passé colonial, comme le demande l’Algérie ?

Pourquoi les Français sont-ils qualifiés de colonisateurs en Afrique du Nord, alors que le Maghreb fut d'abord colonisé par les Arabes (au détriment des Kabyles)?

Pourquoi on demande tout le temps à la France de s'excuser envers l'Algérie pour les morts de la Guerre d'Algérie et pas à l'Algérie de s'excuser pour les actes du FLN durant la même période ?

François Hollande comme Emmanuel Macron ont reconnu l'injustice et la brutalité de la colonisation française en Algérie. Pourtant, les Algériens semblent toujours attendre plus. Qu'attendent-ils et pourquoi ?

Pourquoi la France ne s'excuse-t-elle pas une bonne fois pour toutes pour la colonisation vis à vis de l'Algérie ?

Pourquoi il n'y a qu'avec l'Algérie que les relations sont souvent tendues alors que la France a occupé d'autres pays ?

Jean-Marie Gouarné Mis à jour le 21 déc.

La tension avec la France est une nécessité qui découle logiquement de la genèse de l'Algérie moderne.

Avant la colonisation française, environ un tiers des populations du territoire était soumis à une oligarchie urbaine appelée Régence d'Alger, dont les structures et les objectifs n'avaient rien à voir avec ceux d'un État moderne, qui s'enrichissait au moyen de divers trafics (piraterie, esclavage, etc) peu compatibles avec la modernisation du pays, et dont les orientations politiques dépendaient largement du bon vouloir des raïs (chefs de guerre et corsaires, généralement d'origine européenne) et des janissaires (milice exclusivement recrutée dans l'Empire Ottoman). Cette Régence n'avait aucune solidarité d'intérêt avec la population autochtone, qu'elle méprisait cordialement et sur laquelle elle exerçait, là où elle le pouvait, une domination de type colonial. Elle était, en théorie, un gouvernement vassal de l'Empire Ottoman, dont elle était en réalité pratiquement indépendante. Tout le reste du pays était morcelé en petites entités politiques, qui étaient soit des régences urbaines autres que celle d'Alger, soit des zones tribales. Il n'existait pas d'État algérien, pas de nation algérienne, et le mot Algérie lui-même n'était pas inventé. Ce sont les Français qui, une fois installés sur place, ont aboli la Régence d'Alger, décidé que tous les territoires situés entre la Tunisie et le Maroc seraient politiquement unifiés, et que leur capitale serait Alger. Comme cet ensemble de territoires n'avait pas de nom, ils ont inventé le nom du pays à partir du nom de la capitale.

Bien entendu la ville d'Alger (Al-Jazā'ir) existait depuis très longtemps, puisqu'elle avait été créée au milieu du 10ème siècle par Bologhine ibn Ziri, fondateur de la dynastie berbère des Zirides, sur l'emplacement de la cité antique d'Ikosim fondée par des Phéniciens et disparue dans les troubles du Bas-Empire romain après 800 ans d'existence. Alger avait connu des fortunes diverses, atteignant un pic de prospérité au 17ème siècle avec une population d'environ 100.000 habitants, avant de connaître un déclin dramatique puisqu’elle comptait moins de 50.000 habitants à l’arrivée des Français. Mais son statut n’avait rien à voir avec celui d’une capitale nationale. D‘abord parce que la Régence d’Alger ne dominait qu’une petite partie de l’actuel territoire algérien. Ensuite parce que la population de la ville, extrêmement cosmopolite, n’était pas représentative de l’arrière-pays, avec lequel elle n’avait pas beaucoup de points communs en-dehors de la religion. Enfin parce que, pendant les trois siècles qui ont précédé la colonisation française, Alger n’a jamais été dirigée par des autochtones: sachant quelles étaient les origines des janissaires et des raïs, l’invasion française de 1830, dans un premier temps, n’a fait que remplacer des étrangers par d’autres étrangers. Bien avant l’apparition du colonialisme français dans la région, Alger était déjà en quelque sorte une ville coloniale. C’est bien ce qu’ont compris les populations de l’intérieur, qui (c’est le moins qu’on puisse dire) n’ont pas fait grand chose pour venir au secours de la Régence d’Alger. C’est seulement quand les Français se sont mis en tête de créer un territoire colonial unifié, commandé à partir d’Alger, qu’est née, en réaction, une véritable conscience nationale algérienne. Le nom du pays lui-même provient d’un artifice colonial moderne: le mot «Algérie», désignant la totalité d’un pays, est officiellement consacré le 14 octobre 1839 dans une instruction du général Virgile Schneider, ministre de la Guerre français, où figure la phrase suivante: "Le pays occupé par les Français dans le nord de l'Afrique sera à l'avenir désigné sous le nom d'Algérie". De plus, jusqu’aux premières années du 20ème siècle, seuls les colons européens d’Algérie se désignaient comme «Algériens». Si certains croient que l’Algérie existait avant la colonisation française parce que la ville d’Alger existait depuis le Moyen-Âge, c’est à cause de la confusion entre un nom de ville choisi par un monarque berbère il y a plus de mille ans, et un nom de pays choisi par un militaire français il y a moins de deux siècles.

Si les élites dirigeantes algériennes qui se succèdent et se ressemblent depuis 1962 gardent une attitude crispée à l’égard de la France, c’est parce que leur seule légitimité repose sur leur rôle dans la lutte contre le colonialisme, alors que le système politique qu’elles contrôlent et entretiennent est (aussi bien symboliquement par le choix du nom de l’État que par sa structure bureaucratique, autoritaire et centralisée) la continuation en version arabo-musulmane du pouvoir colonial français.

Le premier projet d'État algérien indépendant et moderne a été conduit de 1832 à 1847 par l'émir Abdelkader ibn Muhieddine, dit El Djezairi c'est-à-dire l'Algérien. Encore faut-il préciser que l’émir, quand il exprime son idée d’un État unifié, emploie encore l’expression watan al Jaza'ir, c’est-à-dire «pays d’Alger»: l’assimilation entre le pays et sa (future) capitale n’est pas encore acquise. Or si ce projet a pu voir le jour, c'est à la fois grâce à l'invasion française et contre l'invasion française. La modernisation du pays, et sa transformation en une nation, impliquaient deux conditions préalables.

La première condition était la suppression de la Régence d'Alger, système archaïque et corrompu mais encore trop bien installé pour pouvoir être renversé par une révolution locale, et dont seule une intervention étrangère pouvait venir à bout. On oublie trop souvent que, en 1830, le pays était dans une situation calamiteuse, avec une production agricole en chute libre, une démographie en déclin, des révoltes en série suivies de répressions violentes, et aucune perspective de modernisation. Une révolution s'imposait; dans un monde idéal l'Algérie se serait pacifiquement libérée elle-même, elle n'a pas pu le faire; les Français en ont profité, le changement est venu du dehors et par la force.

La seconde condition était l'union politique d'un ensemble suffisamment important de tribus, ce qui ne pouvait avoir lieu que pour faire face à un adversaire extérieur commun car les clans n'étaient pas spontanément disposés à se soumettre à une autorité centrale. Certes, Abdelkader n'a pas réussi à fédérer autour de lui suffisamment de tribus pour réussir, et il a finalement été obligé de se soumettre (toutefois, l'émir Abdelkader a été et reste éminemment respecté par les Français car il est implicitement reconnu comme le premier véritable homme d'État algérien).

Quant à l'abolition de l'esclavage, condition essentielle de passage au statut de nation moderne, même Abdelkader ne l'a pas sérieusement envisagée, et ce fut une réforme française (1848).

Une grande partie de la complexité relationnelle entre l'Algérie et la France provient de cet historique. Pour se construire, l'Algérie a du franchir trois étapes violentes et douloureuses qui, toutes, ont impliqué la France, à savoir:

Le renversement de la Régence d'Alger, qui représentait un véritable boulet pour l'avenir du pays;

L'unification politique que ni les royaumes berbères de l'Antiquité, ni les Carthaginois, ni les Romains, ni les Arabes, ni les Turcs n'avaient jamais réussie et qui n'a eu lieu (difficilement) que sous la domination française;

L'indépendance nationale, qui s'est évidemment réalisée contre la France.

Avec un siècle ou deux de recul supplémentaire, tout cela pourrait être vu comme un passé commun susceptible de créer plus d'affinités que de dissensions. En France, on n'a pas gardé de haine envers les Romains ou les Francs, or ce sont les envahisseurs romains qui ont créé la Gaule, et ce sont les envahisseurs francs qui l'ont transformée en France. En Algérie, on n'a pas gardé de haine envers les Arabes yéménites qui, aux 6ème et 7ème siècles, ont conquis le Maghreb par la force brutale (sans même réussir à l'unifier), et encore moins contre les Masmouda (cousins berbères du Haut-Atlas marocain) qui, au 12ème siècle en créant l'empire fanatique des Almohades, ont réalisé l'invasion coloniale la plus sanglante qu'ait connu le pays dans tout le 2ème millénaire.

Mais dans l'immédiat, la pression des courants nationalistes qui sévissent un peu partout (en Algérie mais aussi en France) suscite le besoin de croire à tout prix que le pays qui est actuellement le nôtre a toujours existé, et que les luttes qu'il a accomplies ont toujours été justes. Du point de vue d'un nationaliste algérien, il est intolérable que l'origine de l'État algérien puisse devoir quelque chose à la colonisation française, et la nation doit d'autant plus s'affirmer contre la France qu'elle est soupçonnée d'être une création française. Du point de vue d'un nationaliste français, les bonnes intentions associées à la conquête de l'Algérie excusent tout ce qui s'est réellement passé, et les seules atrocités de la guerre d'indépendance ont été commises par le FLN.

Bien sûr, pour tous ceux qui, d'un côté ou de l'autre de la Méditerranée, s'intéressent réellement à l'histoire et gardent la tête froide, tout cela est dépassé. Mais face à la montée des populismes, les politiques des deux pays sont obligés de se livrer à des jeux d'acteurs. L'État algérien (toujours menacé d'une grave crise de légimité par rapport à son propre peuple) a besoin de prolonger le plus longtemps possible une ambiance de «guerre de libération» contre la France, au moins pour maintenir la cohésion nationale et détourner l'attention des problèmes politiques plus concrets. Du côté français, on ne veut à aucun prix voir l'Algérie sombrer dans une crise politique majeure, donc il est exclu de souffler sur les braises en ripostant trop énergiquement, mais les dirigeants doivent être très prudents pour ne pas exciter les réactions populistes en France (on a bien vu, par exemple, la flambée de protestations que le président Macron a provoquée dans son propre pays quand, croyant faire plaisir aux Algériens, il a évoqué l'idée de «crimes contre l'humanité» à propos des exactions commises par l'armée française).

Les tensions franco-algériennes sont donc, d'abord et avant tout, des postures politiques, des parades verbales ayant à la fois pour causes et pour effets l'ignorance de l'histoire et le besoin de trouver des échappatoires faciles dans un contexte de crise morale. Ces postures sont d'autant plus séduisantes qu'elles sont favorisées par la question religieuse, qui s'ajoute à l'opposition des nationalismes.

Quant à l'explication facile selon laquelle les guerres de la colonisation et de la décolonisation auraient été plus violentes entre la France et l'Algérie qu'entre d'autres colonisateurs et d'autres colonies, elle ne peut satisfaire que les ignares. Aussi violente qu'elle ait été, aussi intolérable qu'elle soit par rapport aux critères éthiques actuellement en vigueur dans les démocraties, la colonisation française est probablement la moins violente de toutes celles qu'a subies le Maghreb au cours des deux derniers millénaires.

L'Algérie et la France souffrent encore d'avoir été trop proches et d'avoir négocié leur séparation dans les pires conditions possibles. C'est dommage, car c'est une immense perte d'énergie et d'opportunités. On en vient presque parfois à regretter le niveau de dialogue entre les militaires français et Abdelkader dans les années 1830: de part et d'autre on ne se faisait pas de cadeaux et on s'entretuait sans merci, mais le respect subsistait entre belligérants et aucun n'accusait l'autre d'être le "criminel". Paradoxalement, la guerre de libération, au 20ème siècle, qui dans l'absolu n'a pas fait plus de victimes que la lutte contre Abdelkader, ne laisse pas d'autre souvenir que celui d'une sale guerre. On réaliserait un immense progrès si, dans chacun des deux pays, on s'intéressait à l'histoire profonde, la sienne et celle de l'autre, et si on regardait de plus près comment se sont construites les nations, au Maghreb et en Europe occidentale. C'est en assumant les influences extérieures qui ont forgé son identité nationale qu'un peuple se grandit, et non en les dévalorisant. Comme disait Romain Gary, le patriotisme est «l'amour des siens» tandis que le nationalisme est «la haine des autres», et l'animosité prolongée envers un autre pays cache souvent une frustration, voire une honte refoulée, par rapport à son popre pays. On se regarderait avec plus de bienveillance entre Algériens et Français si, dans nos deux pays, il y avait un peu plus de patriotisme et un peu moins de nationalisme.
Suivre Jean-Marie Gouarné

Questions similaires

Finalement, si l’Algérie était restée française, la France ne serait-elle pas devenu un pays à majorité musulmane ? De manière générale, à quoi ressemblerait la France aujourd'hui si l’Algérie était restée française ?

Un Algérien d'un certain âge m'a montré la carte d'identité Française qu'il possédait en 1962, juste avant l'indépendance. Il y était noté "Français musulman". Y avait-il bien un système d'apartheid à l'époque de l'Algérie Française ?

Pourquoi la France ne s'excuse-t-elle pas une bonne fois pour toutes pour la colonisation vis à vis de l'Algérie ?

Pourquoi on demande tout le temps à la France de s'excuser à l'Algérie pour la Guerre d'Algérie et pas à l'Algérie de s'excuser pour les actes du FLN durant la même période ?

La France est-elle tenue de remettre ses archives à l'Algérie qui les réclame ? Comment l'Algérie pourrait-elle s'en servir ?

Pensez-vous comme certains ont pu le dire que "l'Algérie n'était pas une nation, seule la France a fait du pays une nation" ?

Pourquoi l'Algérie est-elle toujours désavantagée dans les accords bilatéraux (santé, séjour, etc.) avec la France?

Pourquoi certains Algériens font n'importe quoi en France ?

Pourquoi le Maroc, l'Algérie et la Tunisie sont-ils des pays séparés alors qu'ils ont tous un héritage berbère, arabe et français ?

Pourquoi la France a-t-elle perdu la guerre d'Algérie ?
Que pensez-vous des Algériens ?

Est-ce vrai que selon Mohamed Sifaoui, l'Algérie est le pays le plus raciste?

Pourquoi un bon pourcentage des Algériens nés avant l'indépendance (1962) disent que « l'Algérie était beaucoup plus heureuse et prospère du temps de la colonisation française »?

La France a-t-elle encore son mot à dire sur l'Algérie ?
Pourquoi les Français étaient-ils si attachés à garder l'Algérie ?

Today African borders were drawn based on ex-European colonial territories & not based on nation-states/ethnicity. French N. Africa controlled a big portion of territory in N. Africa, but today it's split into multiple countries. Why did this happen?

Related Answer:
Kevin Richardson PhD in History, The University of Texas at Austin Fri Follow

For North Africa, that characterization is mostly inaccurate. Morocco had been an independent kingdom with Moroccan identity for centuries before French and Spanish protectorates were established in 1912.

Algeria had been a province of Ottoman North Africa from the 1600s to 1830, although Constantinople's control over Algeria was very weak after 1800 and Algeria was autonomous. In 1830, France invaded the coastal cities of Algiers, Oran and Annaba (Bône), and slowly spread French military control into the coastal and Atlas mountain hinterlands over the next 40 years. Here is a map from 1877 showing French territorial control just beginning to extend into the Sahara.

Tunisia was, like Algeria, an Ottoman province from the 1600s to 1881; also similar in that Tunisia was largely autonomous from metropolitan Ottoman control in the 1800s.

So, like Morocco, Algeria and Tunisia had already existed as political units prior to French colonial conquest in the 19th century, and were not colonial creations of the French. On the other hand, the French did change the borders in the Sahara somewhat. For example, this map from the 1880s or 1890s portrays the Morocco kingdom extending control into the Tuat region. If you compare that map to a modern map that circles the Tuat region in blue, you can tell that French military victories pushed the border far to the west between 1890 and 1900, and further colonial adjustments happened up to 1930. So, while Ottoman Algeria consisted of the coastal and mountain region in the far north, French colonial rule extended Algeria's borders deep into the Sahara.

Secondly, we also have to remember that Algeria had a very different colonial experience than Tunisia or Morocco. While Algeria was from the outset treated as a settler-colony and organized into overseas departments of France starting in 1848, with the intent of assimilation and integration into France. By 1954, there were over 1 million French-Algerians in Algeria.

By contrast, Tunisia and Morocco were officially protectorates of France (Morocco also had regions that were protectorates of Spain). So, French rule in Tunisia was consistently mediated by a Bey of the Sharifian dynasty who was de jure in charge of all internal matters of Tunisia (though in practice, the Bey was strongly influenced by French pressure). Ditto, Morocco was formally a sovereign state ruled by sultans of the Alaouite dynasty. But, of course, in both instances, France would interfere and force uncooperative Beys or Sultans into exile, and maneuver a more pliable ruler onto the throne.

Ditto, both Tunis and Morocco saw significant European settlement and landholding (between 100,000 and 200,000 European settlers) during the protectorate era, though not as many as in Algeria.

These different legal regimes and different levels of assimilation/settlement also spilled over into differences in the road to independence. Tunisian independence struggle saw protests and assassinations between 1952 and 1954, then two years of negotiations before the protectorate was withdrawn and independence granted in 1956. Moroccan independence struggle kicked off when French governors sent Sultan Mohammed V of Morocco into exile in 1953 for demanding independence from French and Spanish protectorates. Popular protests ensued, and the French were forced to recall Mohammed V in 1955 and enter into negotiations, which resulted in the withdrawal of the protectorate in April 1956.

By contrast, Algerian protests against discriminatory policies that favored European Algerians and demands for independence were met by far greater levels of the French resistance, because Algeria was considered an integral part of France, and because there were over 1 million French citizens in Algeria. Thus, independence protests resulted in security crackdowns in Arab areas, escalating into an 8-year long war for independence between 1954-1962.

Protests against French occupation in Algeria took place in France, too. After eight people were killed while demonstrating against the war, thousands in Paris turned up for their funeral. 1962. Photo by Keystone-France/Gamma-Keystone via Getty Images

And just as the three countries reached independence differently, the post-independence governments showed different ideological tendencies. After independence, Morocco's Sultan Mohammed V changed his title to King, and Morocco continues to be a Monarchy to this day.

Tunisia began independence as a republic, but Prime Minister Habib Bourguiba declared Tunisia a monarchy a year later in 1957, and ruled as president of a one-party state for the next thirty years until 1987. Bourguiba's ideological orientation is described as nationalist, pursuing neutrality in foreign affairs while promoting state-planned modernization of the economy and secularism.

Finally, the FLN government that emerged in Algeria after the War for Independence was avowedly socialist, with presidents Ahmed Ben Bella (1963-65) legalizing agricultural co-operatives and nationalizing remaining French industries in Algeria; and Houari Boumédiène (1965-78) promoting state-planned industrialization and oil development under "revolutionary" economic plans.

So, any Pan-Arab plan to bring together these three countries into a North African Arab Union after 1962 would have to smooth over the differences between Moroccan monarchy, Tunisian nationalism, and Algerian socialism. It would also have to contend with the self-interest of post-independence leaders, and the authentic challenge of Moroccan, Algerian and Tunisian nationalism, which had been engendered during the independence struggle.

French West Africa and French Central Africa

Unlike in North Africa, in West Africa and Central Africa, it is much more accurate to talk about territorial borders as colonial formations.

Also, much of French West Africa and French Central Africa came to independence at the same moment in 1960. The politics around this widespread wave of independence are complex. I am going to over-simplify and say that it was a mix of:

Nationalist independence movements in these colonies pressing for independence

The pressure of the Algerian war on France and French fears of losing her colonies to spreading anti-colonial conflicts.

Specifically in Cameroon and Togo, those colonies' status as United Nations trust territories, which entailed a level of international oversight.

The fall of the French Fourth Republic in 1958 and the open question of what the Fifth Republic's relationship with Africa would look like. (Colonies? free association? total independence?)

In the end, in 1958, Charles de Gaulle allowed each colony to hold a referendum, and the African colonies opted for independence.

Why did these colonies emerge as separate countries and not instead as a West African Union and a Central African Union in 1960?

Well, because the nationalist ideal was powerful and widespread among Francophone (and Anglophone) African intelligentsia from the 1930s on. By the late 1950s, this intelligentsia formed the leadership of most of the leading pro-independence political parties in French African territories, and articulated their visions for the future to the colonial populations as visions of national independence.

Now, there were particular African leaders like Modibo Keïta of the French Sudan colony (now Mali) and Léopold Sédar Senghor of French Senegal who formulated the idea for the Mali Federation, which was an experiment at forming Senegal and Mali into a larger federation.

Location of Mali Federation

Ditto, after independence, there were leaders like Kwame Nkrumah of Ghana, Ahmed Sékou Touré of Guinea, and Modibo Keïta of Mali who tried again to join into a trans-national federation called the Union of African States in 1961. That fell apart because they could not get Upper Volta (Burkina Faso) involved, so Ghana shared no border with the other two members. Also, because Ghana is Anglophone while Guinea and Mali are Francophone, and Ghana enjoyed a much larger and more industrialized economy than the other two members, meaning Ghana was sending manufactures to the other two members, and receiving livestock or agricultural produce that Ghana didn't really need.

So, both the Mali Federation and the Union of African States quickly failed as Supra-national federations.

Also, after independence, West Africa and Central Africa faced a similar dilemma of different ideological orientations of the post-independence leadership.

Some leaders like Félix Houphouët-Boigny of Côte d'Ivoire or Gabriel Léon M'ba of Gabon preferred to seek close diplomatic and economic relations with France, believing that would be the quickest way to economic development and prosperity.

Other leaders like Ahmed Sékou Touré of Guinea believed in a pan-Africanist socialist economic and diplomatic approach deeply skeptical of French economic engagement as "neo-colonialism".

Finally, there were also leaders like Ahmadou Babatoura Ahidjo of Cameroon, whose primary interest at independence was securing and expanding his own power, and promoting his Muslim, northern political base at the expense of southern, Christian political rivals.

So, while some like Ahmed Sékou Touré might be interested in joining a broader federation and moving beyond the nation-state, other leaders at independence might have less interest in such a project, or might resist the ideological priority of the Nkrumahs and Toures. Some like Ahidjo were only interested in their own power. Follow Kevin Richardson

Related Links

Should countries in Africa be based on ethnic boundaries instead of old European colonial ones?

Why should African colonial borders not be withdrawn?

Why is Mali (and apparently the rest of Africa) so concerned with maintaining colonial borders? These borders were almost all drawn by colonial occupiers. Isn't there a movement in Africa to redraw borders based on ethnic or even historical lines?

Africans often claim that European colonialism made Africa poor, does that mean that Africans were well off before European colonialism?

What would have happened to Africa if it hadn't been colonized?

How many countries would be in Africa today if Europeans had not made the artificial boundaries?

Which countries in Africa were never colonized?
Were there states in Africa before European colonial rule?

What did the European countries gain from Africa during the colonial times?

What would Africa look like today had there been no European colonialism?
Which European countries were under colonial rule?
Why don't African French colonies revolt and abandon the "colonial pact"?

What would France have to have done to have kept hold of its African territories?

What country in Africa were the majority of black slaves from?

Borders (geography): Why does Africa still conform to the boundaries set by the colonial powers?

Pourquoi dit-on que le colonialisme vient de gauche ?

Anthony Lapeyre Licence en Histoire, Université d'Orléans (Diplôme obtenu en 2000) Mis à jour le 59 m

En fait après la guerre de 1870, les républicains vont tenter de détourner les Français de l'idée de revanche et de canaliser leur ardeur vers l'expansion coloniale.

On cite souvent le discours prononcé par Jules Ferry le 28 juillet 1885 comme acte fondateur du colonialisme français :

“Ce qui manque de plus en plus à notre grande industrie, ce sont les débouchés. Il n’y a rien de plus sérieux. Or ce programme est intimement lié à la politique coloniale. Il faut chercher des débouchés.

Il y a un second point que je dois aborder : c’est le côté humanitaire et civilisateur de la question. Les races supérieures ont un droit vis-à-vis des races inférieures. Je dis qu’il y a pour elles un droit parce qu’il y a un devoir pour elles. Elles ont le droit de civiliser les races inférieures.

Enfin, si la France veut rester un grand pays, qu’elle porte partout où elle le peut sa langue, ses mœurs, son drapeau, ses armes et son génie. Rayonner sans agir, c’est abdiquer, et, dans un temps plus court que vous ne pouvez le croire, c’est descendre du premier rang au troisième ou au quatrième.”

et la réponse de Clémenceau, montre bien le clivage :

“En supposant que la théorie de M. Jules Ferry sur les profits des expéditions coloniales soit justifiée, les dépenses de cet ordre ne sont jamais que des dépenses de luxe [superflu]. Il y a à vos pieds des hommes, des Français qui demandent des dépenses utiles, fructueuses [...].

Les races supérieures ont sur les races inférieures un droit qu’elles exercent, ce droit, par une transformation particulière, est en même temps un devoir de civilisation. Voilà en propres termes la thèse de M. Ferry, et l’on voit le gouvernement français exerçant son droit sur les races inférieures en allant guerroyer contre elles et les convertissant de force aux bienfaits de la civilisation. Races supérieures, races inférieures, c’est bientôt dit ! Pour ma part, j’en rabats singulièrement depuis que j’ai vu des savants allemands démontrer scientifiquement que la France devait être vaincue dans la guerre franco-allemande parce que le Français est d’une race inférieure à l’Allemand. Depuis ce temps, je l’avoue, j’y regarde à deux fois avant de me retourner vers un homme et vers une civilisation, et de prononcer : homme ou civilisation inférieurs. […] et vous verrez combien de crimes atroces, effroyables, ont été commis au nom de la justice et de la civilisation. Je ne dis rien des vices que l’Européen apporte avec lui : de l’alcool, de l’opium qu’il répand partout, qu’il impose s’il lui plaît. [...] Non, il n’y a pas de droits de nations dites supérieures contre les nations dites inférieures ; il y a la lutte pour la vie, qui est une nécessité fatale, qu’à mesure que nous nous élevons dans la civilisation, nous devons contenir dans les limites de la justice et du droit ; mais n’essayons pas de revêtir la violence du nom hypocrite de civilisation ; ne parlons pas de droit, de devoir ! La conquête que vous préconisez, c’est l’abus pur et simple de la force que donne la civilisation scientifique sur les civilisations rudimentaires, pour s’approprier l’homme, le torturer, en extraire toute la force qui est en lui au profit du prétendu civilisateur. Ce n’est pas le droit : c’en est la négation. Parler à ce propos de civilisation, c’est joindre à la violence l’hypocrisie. [...]

Déroulède, Barrès ou Maurras ne sont pas favorables à la colonisation…

De l'autre côté de l'échiquier politique un Jaures ou un Blum peuvent se montrer colonialiste à certains moment de leur carrière, surtout par pacifisme.

Après l'hécatombe de 14–18, l'empire est vu comme une sorte de garantie contre le déclin et un certain consensus droite-gauche se fait sur son existence.

A l'époque de la décolonisation des voix s'élèveront encore à droite pour appeler à dépenser pour "la Corrèze plutôt que le Zambèse"….

Dire que le colonialisme vient de la gauche est certainement abusif, car la droite à certaines périodes a pu se montrer pro-coloniale aussi. Mais il faut bien avouer que la gauche française a légitimité la conquête en lui donnant une justification initiale. Suivre Anthony Lapeyre

Questions similaires

On entend souvent dire que "la France est riche parce qu'elle a pillé/pille encore d'autres pays (notamment ses anciennes colonies). Est-ce cohérent ? La France a-t-elle des atouts qui lui sont propres et lui permettent d'être "au top" malgré tout ?

Les anciennes colonies françaises d'Afrique devraient-elles suivre l'exemple des anciennes colonies portugaises en chassant la France par la force pour s'en débarrasser ?

La France doit-elle s'excuser perpétuellement pour avoir eu des colonies en Afrique ?

Si seule la gauche est pro-immigration, alors pourquoi les grandes vagues migratoires en provenance d'Afrique ont-elles eu lieues dans les années 1960-70 quand la France était dirigée par des gouvernements de droite ?

Pourquoi dit-on que la colonisation est un mal nécessaire ?

Pourquoi le nazisme est dit d'extrême droite alors que par définition c'est du socialisme donc de gauche ?

Pourquoi les professeurs en France sont-ils quasiment tous de gauche ?
Pourquoi dit-on que le Japonais et le Français sont assez similaires ?

Que pensez-vous de l'affirmation de Anasse Kazib « L'Histoire de la France s'est fondée sur le colonialisme et l'impérialisme »?

Pourquoi la France a-t-elle du mal à regarder son histoire coloniale en face ?
Pourquoi dit-on que le FN de Marine Le Pen est raciste ?
Pourquoi la plupart des médias français sont de gauches ?
La colonisation a-t-elle été rentable pour la France ?
Pourquoi les gens de gauche sont très souvent méprisants envers les gens de droite ?

Pourquoi l'état français ignore son histoire de colonialisme ?

Le Maroc va-t-il enterrer le projet de gazoduc transsaharien entre l'Algérie et le Nigéria ?

Ciro Bou 1 an

Effectivement après l’Algérie , le Maroc a lui aussi annoncé un projet de gazoduc transsaharien . Pour l'instant Il existe déjà deux gazoducs en Afrique du Nord-Ouest, le "West African Gas Pipeline" qui relie le Nigéria au Ghana, en passant par le Bénin et le Togo, et le gazoduc Maghreb-Europe ("Pedro Duran Farell ") qui relie l’Algérie à l’Europe via l’Espagne (Cordoue) en passant par le Détroit de Gibraltar et le Maroc.
Les deux projets ont le même objectif, reliés les deux gazoduc existants et du coup permettre de transporter le gaz naturel du golf de guinée notamment du Nigeria jusqu'en en Europe. Mais ces deux pays ont deux projets bien différents:

Le projet proposé par l'Algerie devrait relier Warri au Nigeria à Hassi R'Mel en Algérie en passant par le Niger. Sa longueur serrai de 4 128 kilomètres et sa capacité annuelle de trente milliards de mètres cubes.

Si l'Algérie était restée française, où seraient le niveau de vie et le PIB des Algériens ?

Greg Lutingrad · Suivre Anciennement 5 h

Définissez Algériens dans ce contexte ?

Car, dans une Algérie française telle qu'elle était conçue, il y avait deux catégories de population.

Un pays a testé ce système, intenable sur le long terme : le Zimbabwe, phare bien connu du développement en Afrique Australe. Et si la dégradation est surtout apparue après la fin de ce système, c'est bien parce que rien ne permet sa pérennité ni une alternance de qualité.

C'est binaire au fond :

Soit on continue comme avant, avec quelques Européens qui ont un niveau de vie élevé, d'autres Européens entre moins et beaucoup moins bien lotis, quelques rares indigènes caution du système qui forment une fausse classe moyenne et énormément d'indigènes paupérisés. Si on distinguent les Européens des autres, on a des Européens moins riches qu'en France en moyenne et des indigènes dans la misère en moyenne. Si on ne distinguent pas, un PIB par habitant strict, Cf. n'importe quel pays du tiers monde avec élite prévaricatrice (grosso modo, tous) : la moyenne est très mauvaise et sans doute pas follement meilleure qu'aujourd'hui.

Soit on change le système, plus ou moins vite (intensité de la guerre d'indépendance), et on abouti à une situation comparable à l'actuelle, qui n'est pas glorieuse.

Donc, comment arriver à une meilleure situation ?

Un seul véritable moyen : Eviter de rater les bonnes occasions dans le cadre d'une décolonisation engagée et non pas combattue, ce qui évite de liquider les élites qui pouvaient arriver à développer l'Algérie, au lieu de donner le pouvoir par défaut au FLN, qui se targue encore aujourd'hui de sa victoire pour confisquer le pouvoir (et le fric) à son profit.

Ce qui est de la pure fiction, le bourrage de crane sur "l'Algérie c'est la France" continuant de faire des ravages aujourd'hui, inutile de dire à quel point c'était compliqué à l'époque. Suivre Greg Lutingrad

Questions similaires

François Hollande comme Emmanuel Macron ont reconnu l'injustice et la brutalité de la colonisation française en Algérie. Pourtant, les Algériens semblent toujours attendre plus. Qu'attendent-ils et pourquoi ?

Finalement, si l'Algérie était restée française, la France ne serait-elle pas devenu un pays à majorité musulmane ? De manière générale, à quoi ressemblerait la France aujourd'hui si l'Algérie était restée française ?

Pourquoi on demande tout le temps à la France de s'excuser à l'Algérie pour la Guerre d'Algérie et pas à l'Algérie de s'excuser pour les actes du FLN durant la même période ?

Pourquoi la France a-t-elle perdu la guerre d'Algérie alors qu'elle a tué beaucoup plus d'Algériens qu'elle n'a subi de pertes ? (Question traduite)

Pourquoi les Algériens sont-ils si fiers de leur pays mais dans le même temps le fuient en masse ?

Si la colonisation de l'Algérie n'avait jamais eu lieu, comment se présenterait la situation de ce pays par rapport au reste de l'Afrique et quel serait son PIB ?

Les Québécois de souche française devraient-ils avoir la possibilité de «retourner» en France et combien de Québécois seraient réellement intéressés, selon-vous, si c'était possible ?

Si les «pieds-noirs» n'avaient pas quitté l'Algérie après l'indépendance, une cohabitation aurait-elle été possible avec les musulmans, comme les afrikaners et les noirs en Afrique du Sud, et l'Algérie s'en sortirait-elle mieux ?

Pourquoi un bon pourcentage des Algériens nés avant l'indépendance (1962) disent que « l'Algérie était beaucoup plus heureuse et prospère du temps de la colonisation française »?

Pourquoi le Maroc, l'Algérie et la Tunisie sont-ils des pays séparés alors qu'ils ont tous un héritage berbère, arabe et français ?

Pourquoi il n'y a qu'avec l'Algérie que les relations sont souvent tendues alors que la France a occupé d'autres pays ?

Qu'est-ce qui empêche des pays comme l'Algérie et le Maroc à se développer ?

Combien de personnes ont été tuées lors de la colonisation française de l'Algérie ?

Est-ce qu'il est vrai que lors de la colonisation de l'Algérie, les Français ont voulu naturaliser les Kabyles, les envoyer vers la métropole, et les traiter comme les Français de souche vu leurs phénotypes européens ?

Quel serait l'animal éteint le plus terrifiant s'il était encore en vie aujourd'hui ?

Quel est votre endroit préféré en Afrique ?

Samir سميرFarid فريد, a étudié à Mohamed V Rabat Répondu 17 nov. 2018

Je vis au Maroc, donc en Afrique, et ce qui est particulier dans ce pays, c'est qu'il est à 15 km de l'Europe, alors qu'il a des racines de plus de 2700 km en Afrique,

Et dans ce pays il ya de tout, des montagnes et de la neige, des plages et des canyons, des déserts et des forêts , des plaines fertiles et des ergs, des arabes, des berbères, des africains et des européens, des musulmans, des chrétiens et des juifs, des antilopes, des faucons, des cobras, des dromadaires, des macaques, des lynxs, des panthères, et des rares spécimens du lion de l'Atlas en captivité, des chênes verts et lièges, des sapins, des pins, des tilleuls, des palmiers dattiers, des acacias et les emblématiques arganiers, des capitales islamiques impériales, des mellahs juifs, des cathédrales et des édifices coloniaux européens, des vestiges romains et phéniciens, l'université Al Quaraouyynes, la Mosquée Al koutoubia, la tour Hassane, Mogador, et Volubilis,

Le Maroc est un mélange subtil d'influences africaines, berbères, arabes et européennes, c'est une identité à facettes variables mais unique,
Suivre Samir سميرFarid فريد

Questions similaires

Quel est votre endroit préféré en Afrique ?
Pourquoi ne dois-je jamais aller en Afrique ?

Si vous avez déjà visité plusieurs pays d'Afrique, quel est le pays qui vous a le plus marqué. Sinon, si vous comptez revenir en Afrique, quel pays irez-vous en premier ?

Que trouvez-vous étrange en Afrique ?

Dans quel pays d'Afrique fait-il bon vivre ? Où me recommanderiez-vous de m'installer ?

Si vous deviez vivre dans un pays d'Afrique, lequel choisiriez vous et pourquoi ?

Que trouvez-vous différent en Afrique ?
Dans quel pays aimeriez-vous vivre ? Et pourquoi ?
Quel pays africain donnerais-tu tout pour habiter ? Pourquoi ?
Quel pays aimeriez-vous visiter en Afrique ? Pourquoi ?
Dans quel pays aimeriez-vous vivre plutôt que la France et pourquoi ?
Quels sont pour vous les pays où il fait le moins bon vivre et pourquoi ?
Quelles sont les choses à savoir absolument avant de partir en Afrique ?

Quels pays africains recommanderiez-vous à quelqu'un qui n'est jamais allé en Afrique ?

Comment est-ce que c'est de vivre dans un village en Afrique ? Pourriez-vous donner un exemple individuel en détail, s'il vous plaît ?

North Atlantic Ocean
ITALY
Piombino
SPAIN
Mediterranean Sea
Mazara del Vallo
Cordoba
Koudiet Draoucha
Almeria
El Haouaria
Gela
Beni Saf
TUNISIA
MOROCCO
Mellitah
Hassi R'Mel
Wafa
LIBYA
ALGERIA
NIGER
Niger
NIGERIA
Gas pipelines
Trans-Saharan Maghreb–Europe
Medgaz

Le projet soutenu par le Maroc devrait quant à lui mesurer environ 5 660 kilomètres. Il longerait la côte Ouest Africaine en traversant 14 pays (Nigeria, Bénin, Togo, Ghana, Côte d'Ivoire, Liberia, Sierra Leone, la Guinée, la Guinée Bissau, la Gambie, le Sénégal, la Mauritanie,le Sahara occidental et le Maroc. Le prix est estimé pour l'instant entre 20 et 25 milliards de dollars.

Mais un projet va t-il enterrai l'autre ?

Pour l'instant les deux projets en sont au même point ,mais le 7 décembre la Communauté économique des États de l'Afrique de l'Ouest (Cedeao) a annoncé que la réunion des États membres qui s'est tenu les 9 et 10 décembre à Ouagadougou, au Burkina Faso, étudiera de près la question des gazoduc. Ce qui est ressorti de cette réunion c'est de fusionner le projet NMGP du Maroc avec celui d'extension du réseau de gazoduc de l'Afrique de l'Ouest (WAGPEP) , projet entamé par la CEDEAO (Communauté économique des États de l'Afrique de l'Ouest) qui a pour but d'etendre le réseau de gazoduc existant jusqu'au Sénégal. Les tracés des deux projets sont assez similaire ce qui a amener a l'éventuelle décision d'une fusion des deux projet. tracé du projet WAGPEP :

Pour moi d'un avis personnel cela va se jouer en fonction des relation entre ces pays et des pays plus influents, et oui , le but initial de ces projets et le transport du gaz vers l'Europe, et cela pourrait permettre à l'Europe de diversifier ses sources d'approvisionnement en gaz naturel on voit bien qu'il y a des enjeu pour la France quand on voit le premier point du compte rendu de la séance qui s'est déroulé a l'assemblé national le 10 décembre 2020 soit en même temps que la réunion de la CEDEAO :

Assemblée nationale
XVe législature
Session ordinaire de 2020-2021

Compte rendu intégral

Première séance du jeudi 10 décembre 2020

SOMMAIRE

Présidence de Mme Annie Genevard

1. Accord de coopération avec les États membres de l'Union monétaire ouest-africaine

PRÉSENTATION

M. Franck Riester, ministre délégué chargé du commerce extérieur et de l'attractivité
M. Jacques Maire, suppléant M. Jean François Mbaye, rapporteur de la commission des affaires étrangères
M. Rodrigue Kokouendo, suppléant Mme Marielle de Sarnez, présidente de la commission des affaires étrangères pour en revenir a la question de départ je pense effectivement que le Maroc a de grandes chances d'enterrer le projet de gazoduc entre l'Algérie et le Nigeria car il a en ce moment des meilleurs relations diplomatiques et économiques avec les pays dit "occidental" ce qui a mon avis va être décisif pour la suite.

MOTION DE REJET PRÉALABLE

bref, on verra ce qu'il en ai dans les prochains mois voir les prochaines années. Suivre Ciro Bou

Questions similaires

Pourquoi le Maroc, l'Algérie et la Tunisie sont-ils des pays séparés alors qu'ils ont tous un héritage berbère, arabe et français ?

Pourquoi l'Algerie s'immisce dans l'affaire du Sahara Occidental ?

Pourquoi les français préfèrent-ils aller en Tunisie ou au Maroc plutôt qu'en Algérie ?

Si une guerre Algérie Maroc éclatait qui gagnerait ?

Qu'est-ce qui empêche des pays comme l'Algérie et le Maroc à se développer ?

Pourquoi le Maroc est-il plus fort que l'Algérie ?

Comment le reste du monde voit-il l'Algérie ?

Pourquoi il n'y a qu'avec l'Algérie que les relations sont souvent tendues alors que la France a occupé d'autres pays ?

Est-ce que le Maroc va attaquer l'Algérie ?

Les relations entre le Maroc et l'Algérie peuvent-elles dégénérer en conflit armé ?

La France a-t-elle encore son mot à dire sur l'Algérie ?

Les pays occidentaux cesseront-ils de soutenir le régime d'Alger suite aux lourdes et graves accusations soulevées par le président du MAK (Mouvement pour l'Autonomie de la Kabylie) lors de sa conférence de presse d'aujourd'hui ?

Les algériens croient-ils vraiment que le Maroc est à l'origine des feux de foret en Kabylie comme l'a annoncé le président Tebboune ?

Pensez-vous qu'à terme la Kabylie finira par obtenir son indépendance du reste de l'Algérie ?

La Kabylie pourra-t-elle prospérer après son indépendance de l'Algérie?

Pourquoi l'état français ne publie pas les archives militaires qu'il détient prouvant que la France a spolié des territoires marocains pour les annexer à l'Algérie pendant sa colonisation ?

Paul Henri Doumenc 29 sept.

Parce-qu'elle ne l'a pas fait. À une époque, un officier français rêvait de le faire, je ne me souviens plus lequel. Mais ça ne s'est pas fait. Donc je ne vous pas de quelles archives vous parlez. Peut-être rangées avec les archives sur la visite des petits hommes verts.

En plus, si la France a colonisé le Maroc, c'est parce-que le Maroc lui a demandé. Suivre Paul Henri Doumenc

Questions similaires

Pendant la colonisation en Algérie, est-il vrai que la France a octroyé la nationalité française aux indigènes juifs, mais pas au peuple musulman ? Si oui, pourquoi?

Pourquoi l'Algérie ne s'excuse-t-elle pas auprès de la France pour sa tentative ratée de colonisation? Que se serait-il passé si les Sarrasins n'avaient pas été arrêtés à Poitiers?

Est-ce qu'il est vrai que lors de la colonisation de l'Algérie, les Français ont voulu naturaliser les Kabyles, les envoyer vers la métropole, et les traiter comme les Français de souche vu leurs phénotypes européens ?

La France doit-elle s'excuser pour son passé colonial, comme le demande l'Algérie ?

Pourquoi la polygamie est-elle pénalisée en France, sous prétexte qu'elle ne fait pas partie de sa culture, alors que les officiels français incitent nos Etats africains à dépénaliser l'homosexualité qui ne fait pas partie de notre culture ?

Pourquoi le Vietnam ne s'est-il jamais plaint de la colonisation française contrairement à l'Algérie ?

Combien de personnes ont été tuées lors de la colonisation française de l'Algérie ?

Pourquoi un bon pourcentage des Algériens nés avant l'indépendance (1962) disent que « l'Algérie était beaucoup plus heureuse et prospère du temps de la colonisation française »?

Pourquoi la France n'a-t-elle pas comme toutes ses colonies viré tous les Français de chez elle ?

La France a-t-elle répandu l'analphabétisme en Algérie pendant la colonisation ?

Were the Berbers and Arabs of North Africa originally black? If so, how did they end up being lighter skin today?

Marc Restrepo music enthusiast Jun 13

Ancient Berbers, or indigenous people of the East Africa would certainly have been of a darker complexion originally, but overtime people migrated into these regions and intermixed. By the time of the rise and fall of Islam, 1000–1700, their society would have been very diverse with a slight leaning towards brown skin, but I'm sure it wasn't uncommon to see very fair skinned moors or even white looking ones.

The term Arab can mean many things to many people, but the definition of “mixed” seems most appropriate to me. ʿarav is closely associated with the word ʿerev meaning a "mix of people"

Of course the term black is a corporate designation designed by the United States for reasons of disassociation.. The truth is black is not a unifying characteristic, but merely a description of dark skin.

Just for illustration purposes, the original people of that region probably closely resembled these photos below before they began mixing with northerners. Just imagine dark skin people with more “euro-centric” facial features and less coarse hair.

Related Links

From an unbiased point of view, what race are the Berbers of Africa? Which foreign invasions were able to conquer North Africa? When did this occur?

Do black Africans who live south of the Sahara generally regard the Arab and Berber people living in the Maghreb as also Africans?

Is there any evidence that the black race inhabited North Africa before the white race?
Are Tuaregs black despite being Berber?

Why do so many black people in America claim to be Moors from North Africa?
Are people from North Africa considered black?

Why are North Africans white? Is it still safe to call them Africans or being African has nothing to do with skin colour?

Why are people of North Africa fair skinned?
Did black Africans originally live in North Africa?

Why do people not consider North Africans as white although North Africans look pretty European?

As an Algerian what do you think of Africans who claim that you're not indigenous to North Africa and that you're simply the descendants of Arab invaders?

Luna Morino

Passionate about it. 2y

The Algerians probably laugh it off as people who are trying to take their history because they are ashamed of their own.

Algerians are mostly native berbers

Any sub sahraran looking people are either immigrants or children of immigrants or a result of the trans saharan trade.

Related Links

How do North Africans feel about Afrocentrics telling them that they are descendants of invaders?

Why do North African countries not consider themselves as Africans but as Arabs?

What do you know about the indigenous people of north Africa?

Why do the people of North Africa have almost nothing in common with the rest of Africa or African people?

Is there racism towards Sub-Saharan Africans in North Africa?

Should Algerian Kabyles accept the fact that their genetics include both Arabian & Amazighi roots? Most other Amazighis accept the reality of intermarriage, common culture, & shared experience with Arabs & still hold to their Amazighi origin.

Why do North Africans don't consider themselves to be "black" or African, even though there are similarities?

Why are North Africans white? Is it still safe to call them Africans or being African has nothing to do with skin colour?

Why do other Africans and the world refuse to accept North Africans when they identify as Africans?

What is The original people in North Africa?
What race am I if I'm Algerian, North African, and Arab?
Did Arabs invade North Africa and Berbers lands?
How are black Africans treated in North Africa?
Did black Africans originally live in North Africa?
Are the pale skin people in North Africa native Africans?

Historians have often cited North Africa as the 'bread basket' of the Roman Empire, but every image I've seen of Libya and Tunisia shows a dry and sandy landscape. What am I missing?

Peter Kvint Works at Illuminati (2008–present) Jan 2

The climate. The climate was warmer and more humid. Therefore, the desert was in many places cornfields. The urban population of Tunisia was abducted and sold as slaves.

Related Links

How did North Africa go from being one of the Roman Empire's wealthiest regions to a regional backwater?

Why was North Africa considered the breadbasket of the Roman Empire, considering how infertile it is? Was it just because of Egypt?

Why didn't North Africa become part of Europe? Europeans have many times been able to fully integrate these lands into Europe. Take full control of the Mediterranean. Looks good.

Why did the Roman Empire conquer the Middle East then North Africa, and not focus on Europe only?

Why do some people claim Roman Empire, North Africa and the Egyptians were black?

How is the Roman Empire viewed in modern-day North Africa and the Middle East?

Since North Africa and the Middle East used to be Roman provinces, have they maintained much if anything of Roman culture?

How is it that Egypt and the Mediterranean part of the Maghreb (Roman Africa) were the "breadbaskets" of an entire Empire, even though they were already very populated lands, but today they aren't agricultural powerhouses?

Why can't Libya, Morocco, Algeria, and Tunisia unite and form a nation named "United States of North Africa"?

Why was North Africa so important for the Roman Empire, given that it's mostly desert?

Why did the Romans only invade North Africa?

Did the ancient Romans have an idea of 'Europe' such that they viewed their North African and Middle Eastern possessions as not part of the same continent as the rest of their empire?

If the Roman Empire was "Western" but North Africa is not, why were there several Roman Emperors of North African origin but none of Germanic or Celtic origin?

Why has North Africa not been an economic powerhouse since the fall of the Roman Empire?

North Africa was one of the richest provinces of the Roman Empire. What happened that made it diminish so much after Rome's collapse?

How many people were killed during the French colonization of Algeria?

François Chevallier Lives in Paris1y

The exact number cannot be established save for the war of independence : 300.000 native Algerians vs 30.000 French. During the colonial period, and especially at the time of the conquest, there were famines that might have caused hundreds of thousands of deaths. So estimates would be below a million, but the Algerian government’s official claim is currently 1,5 million. The bodycount is currently at the heart of a political agenda in Algeria.

French authorities have kept statistics about the population of Algeria from 1856 onwards. At the time, it was evaluated to 2,5 million people 90% of which were Native Muslims, about 100k French and another 100k Jews. Figures are missing for the conquest period starting in 1830 and it is likely that the toll of native deaths has been heavy. In particular, Abd el Kader's scorched earth policies triggered famines, the first victims of which were the natives.

During the early colonial period, statistics are very precise for Europeans while disputed for Muslims. The first reliable figures are of 1906, and report 4,5 million Muslim natives and about 700k non-Muslims. Which means that it had doubled in a 50 year time, with a significant drop of infant mortality due to the introduction of European medicine as in all colonies. However, there are also well documented reports of famines and locust invasions in the 1866-1870 period. But once again, we cannot be not talking about millions of deaths considering the available data and the small population of Algeria and other North African countries.

Most Algerian historians, but also a number of French ones including at the time, consider that the French provoked these famines. Although this is difficult to establish, there might be some truth to that. As Algeria was depopulated and backwards, the early French agenda planned to make it a settlement colony like Australia. The climate and soil were considered excellent, akin to Southern France. The French population was to be boosted by immigration from Spain and Italy, and the Jews were given French citizenship in 1870. All those people went to French schools and had a French citizen status, as opposed to the indigenes (natives). It was very much an apartheid system like the one that long prevailed in South Africa. Local rebellions have indeed been brutally repressed, but it didn't reach a wide scale until the war of independence.

The presence of the European population, numbering one million in 1960, was a key factor in the outbreak of the war. Unlike Morocco and Tunisia which were protectorates and became independent in 1956, France couldn't give up Algeria easily because of the numerous European colonists, who wanted both to stay there and remain French. The war lasted from 1954 until 1962, and the French were responsible for bombings, massacres and torture. Casualties are esteemed to be 30k on the French side versus 300k ethnic Algerians side out of a population of ten million. The big difference is explained by the modern and large French military equipment.

The number of displaced persons among the native population is reckoned to be over a million. There were atrocities on both sides, and all Europeans eventually had to leave on boats in the summer of 1962. A sad story was the "harkis", native Algerians who sided with the French. Their numbers grew after 1957 reaching estimates of 100.000. They were placed first in line by the French with a high number of casualties. At the time of independence, about 30.000 managed to escape to France, and most of those who remained have been executed by the FLN (National Liberation Army) or massacred.

The numbers of casualties given above rely on existing historical sources, and seem to have been accepted on both sides for several decades, although the relationship between the two countries was always strained. But mostly since the arrival of the Internet, figures of several millions of Algerians massacred by the French are now being routinely mentioned. It doesn't make sense since the population of Algeria was barely 10 million at the time of independence. The use of the word "genocide" has even appeared, although the population was multiplied fourfold during the colonial era. Yet, the vast majority of the French now acknowledge the war was wrong and don’t deny the atrocities that took place, but Algerian accusations are going very far indeed. So where is the truth?

The fact is Algeria’s political life after independence is widely unknown abroad. Yet, any superficial research on the topic will tell you how the country has been miserably run. After almost 30 years of single party rule, the first elections were cancelled in 1991 once Islamists had been elected. These were responsible for whole a decade of terror in the 1990’s, murdering civilians from all social backgrounds in hundreds of thousands - the exact number could not be established. Intellectuals and journalists paid a terrible toll. In order to preserve peace, Islamists were given general amnesty, elections were rigged -for real-, maintaining a senile president as a front four times in a row, while power remained in the hands of the army for another two decades.

The first measures taken by Algeria’s new government elected last year was to demand official apologies from the French for the war and the colonial era. If the country’s situation is grim indeed, 60 years of disastrous Algerian rule should perhaps be taken into account as well. But it seems better inspired to focus on the sins of Frenchmen, many of whom are no longer alive, than those of Algerian Islamists most of whom are still around and well. While the scars of the French colonial past are endlessly scratched, the civil war of the 1990’s is a taboo in the national media.

Algeria’s population has multiplied fourfold again since independence, reaching now 44 million. Quality of life is very bad, and it is predictable that the next political turmoil will trigger massive demands to emigrate. Inevitably, the first target will be that country across the sea they so much hate but seemingly cannot do without.

Do people in Northern African countries (Egypt, Libya, Tunisia, Algeria, Morocco) really feel themselves Africans?

Suliyeman Bouboul Studies at William Morris Sixth Form (Expected 2022) 1y

Yes I have the perfect example of this, my father is from Morocco and he is black and identifies as a African man from Morocco

My dad with my auntie

Related Links

Which is a richer country: Algeria, Tunisia, Egypt, Morocco? And why?
Why are the people in Africa black?

Morroco, Tunisia, Egypt, Algeria and most of North Africa are part of the Arab world. Do you still consider them African?

How is that the people of Morocco, Algeria, Libya & Egypt are very fair in complexion in comparison to the rest of the population of the continent of Africa?

Do Egyptians, Moroccans, Tunisians, Algerians, and Libyans consider themselves to be African, Arab, both, or neither?

Do people in Algeria, Morocco and Tunisia still speak French?

Were Egypt, Morocco, Algeria, Tunisia, and Libya originally the land of the ancient black Africans like the kings and mummies who built the first civilisation?

Sometimes I wonder if people from Northern Africa like Egypt, Morocco, Tunisia, Algeria, and Libya are proud to be called Africans, or do they just accept their fate because they have no choice?

Why aren't Libya, Algeria, Tunisia, and Morocco considered part of the Middle East just like Egypt?

Are people from North Africa considered black?

If the Arabs should have a "Free Palestine", Should the Arab colony countries of Algeria, Tunisia, Libya, and Morocco disband themselves and go to the Arabian desert and let the Berbers get their homeland back as compensation?

What do North Africans think of sub-Saharan Africans?

Why don't North African countries (Algeria, Libya, Morocco and Tunisia) try to stop illegal immigrants before they reach the Mediterranean Sea to Europe?

What would happen if Morocco, Algeria and Tunisia became one single country?

Are North Africans, especially Kabylians from Algeria, considered "Africans" by Black Africans from Africa?

Morroco, Tunisia, Egypt, Algeria and most of North Africa are part of the Arab world. Do you still consider them African?

Zakaria Moukkar a Moroccan born and raised 4y

I am going to start my answer by a quick geography reminder :
Bellow is a map of Africa, as you can easily notice : Morocco + Algeria + Tunisia + Egypt are in the African continent.

Belonging to a continent isn’t related to any ideology nor religion not even the race. In fact, north Africa countries have various identities which can be related to the locals (Amazigh) or to Arabs that came in, 1357 years ago. And I am not telling that in order to answer the question but just to clear up the idea that north Africa has this kind of Arab sticker on its front.

Even if some countries as Morocco aren't in the African union due to some political issues (see western/Moroccan sahara in the Map), you can't say it's not African. The same way you can't say England is no more European after the Brexit.

And I was very amazed by the claiming you brought up : "Africa for Africans! Arabs get out!" It's even funny and stupid ! All Arabs born in Africa are simply Africans, and they are more Africans than Arabs.

Therefore, this is my real answer : Don't worry everybody is trying to get out of Africa, even "Black Africans" :)

Related Links

Is it true that the main reason why General de Gaulle gave independence to Algeria is because he was afraid that if Algeria remains French then France would eventually become a Muslim majority country?

What is the most realistic way for France to have permanently kept Algeria?

Why did France fight a vicious war In Algeria and killed hundreds of thousands unlike other colonies?

Why could France not convert Algeria to part of France?
Is Algeria culturally close with France?
Was Algeria better off as an integral part of France, or is it better off independent?
How would modern-day Algeria be if it had remained under French rule?
Why do people think that Algeria would have been better if it had been part of France?
Why did France lose the Algerian War?
What if France would not have invaded Algeria in 1830?

How is the black population in Libya, Algeria, Morocco, Tunisia, and Egypt?

Ali Zouaoui Lived in Menzah 93y

Aside from some passive and very rare racism, they live just like anyone else.

There aren't many of them here actually (in my classroom, there are like 30 teens, most of them are tanned whites (the norm in Tunisia), some are white and there's only one black and he is like anyone else).

However keep in mind that i live in the capital so I don't know if i'm qualified to answer this question properly, because i'm sure there are more blacks in the southern regions.

Where is Algeria located?

Cari Carr Married to a North African for 25 years.

In North Africa with Morocco to the West, and Libya and Tunisia to the East.

El Si , Proud Algerian Answered Jun 10, 2020

France used Algeria as it’s “second country”, often using the term “l’Algerie c’est la France” and referring to it as a municipality of France - cities such as Algiers and Oran were heavily populated with French people, such as pied noirs as well as direct immigrants and invaders. Therefore, France used Algeria, especially Algiers and Oran, as a hotspot for development, mostly in the French quarters of Algiers. It is clear when you visit Algiers that there is French architecture, mixed along with Algerian architecture, even on the same street. You will often find that on one side of the street there are French-designed buildings and homes (albeit built by Algerians for the French), and that on the other there are “poorer” Algerian-designed buildings and homes. The “French-developed” areas of Algeria were created for the heavy amounts of French “settlements” across these locations.

Related Links

What do you know about Algeria?
What do people get wrong about Algeria?
Which is bigger: Algeria or Sudan?
What is it like to live in Algeria?
Why is Algeria so underdeveloped?
What is the capital of Algeria?
Why did France give up Algeria?
What problems does Algeria face? Answered Jun 10, 2020
Is Algeria culturally close with France?

How come Algeria is the biggest country on the African continent and it's not well known at all?

Why was Northern Algeria so heavily developed by France compared to other French colonies?

Kevin Richardson Researcher, Biologist, Historian, Anthropologist. (2008–present) 1y

There are a few things to consider when talking about French Algeria and its development, and I'm going to focus on three—geography, ideology, and demographics. This is not exhaustive — there are numerous other factors influencing the development of French Algeria and the relationship between the colony and the metropole, but I feel that these give a fair overview of some of the major factors.

Algiers 1946

Firstly, geography — Algeria, compared to other French colonies at the time (the French Caribbean, French India, and French Guyana) as well as the colonies that would follow (Madagascar, French Indochina, French West and Central Africa, and French South Pacific) is considerably closer, being just across the Mediterranean. This served a few purposes. Firstly, the colony was more easily managed, as military forces could be more easily transported to and from the Metropole—indeed, the French Foreign Legion maintained a large presence in Algeria and considered it to be a sort of home base. This proximity also allowed for a greater sort of military occupation to be possible—as materiel could be transported across the Mediterranean more effectively than across the Atlantic, the French armies in Northern Africa were able to engage in long-term campaigns against local polities (such as that of Abd el-Kader) and potentially rebellious native communities, allowing for a greater level of centralization of the colony. It bears to be said that this centralization carried a heavy cost for the natives—there are accounts of French troops suffocating villages of Algerian natives by forcing them into caves and lighting fires outside to burn out the oxygen. On a governmental level, this military occupation (especially early in the colonial history) was profitable for the French and the emerging European settler colonial class (Pied-Noirs) in terms of agricultural output and labor, but, again, devastating economically for the Algerians themselves due to changes in land ownership laws and a generally indifferent colonial administration. This allowed for transitioning many areas into plantations and French-style cities, codifying implicitly French cultural and social domination along with the military. Transportation of resources was also considerably easier—labor was brought from Algeria into France throughout the 19th and 20th Centuries and the French engaged in massive construction projects throughout Northern Algeria, especially under the reign of Napoleon III. Lastly, just to touch upon it, the position of Algeria's northern coast upon the Mediterranean, as well as laws granting European settlers farmland and relative liberties for white "Algerians" (here differentiated from the Berber and Arab natives) led to a fairly large population of European settler colonists, the aforementioned Pied-Noirs. This population eventually became largely urban and had a mutually beneficial relationship with the French state—they helped to maintain French control over the natives while profiting from French policies regarding education, land ownership, and citizenship rights.

With regards to ideology, Algeria was colonized during a period of emerging conceptions of French Liberalism. Alexis de Tocqueville wrote a series of letters on Algeria that depict the French goals for Algeria at various points in its early colonial history—initially, France saw this land as a chance to prove its ideals of human equality, that any person brought up with French civilization could achieve equality and become French. This idea would be played with over the course of the following century and a half, occasionally being abandoned as the French would shift colonial policy, but would eventually culminate in Algeria becoming a (nearly) full department of France, with most of the rights associated with this. Indeed, de Tocqueville points to a view of French imperialism that supports the rhetoric of the "mission civilisatrice," wherein the French held that proper education and exposure to "proper" civilization would allow any people to become French. This included re-planning cities in the French style and redesigning homes to abandon former traditional styles, as well as policies of forced deveiling or Algerian Muslim women (part of an overall system of colonial justification that Spivak has referred to as "white men saving brown women from brown men," which is to say that this policy was based on racist and sexist conceptions of civilization). Again, I bring this up partly to reinforce the idea that this development that Algeria received was not without cost, frequently violating the rights and, quite literally, the bodies of the colonized.

The last element I'll touch upon is demographics. As I've mentioned before, the Pied-Noirs maintained a large (at its height, approximately 30% of Northern Algeria) population, making Algeria more of a settler colony than the other contemporary French colonies. As such, additional resources were pushed into the colony to develop churches, town squares, expand boulevards, and quite literally remake the image of France in North Africa. Schools were also established for Pied-Noirs, though these schools frequently barred admission for Arabs and Berbers.

I hope that I've managed to touch upon some of the reasons for Algerian development. Again, this is in no way an exhaustive list of reasons, but meant to touch upon some of the large reasons why French colonial legacies still have an impact upon Algeria today. I also hope that it's clear that this development was frequently one-sided - while the French did provide resources to the colony, it in return gave back a considerable amount to the metropole and often suffered considerably under French rule.

Here are the sources that I used:

Writings on Empire and Slavery by Alexis de Tocqueville, edited and translated by Jennifer Pitts; notably, the Essays on Algeria — this gives insight into the way that French liberal ideology understood the French civilizing mission and the relation between France and its colony.

A Dying Colonialism by Frantz Fanon, as well as Camus' The First Man both give a look at later French ideology and its impact upon the colony — Fanon notably works with the Algerian resistance (FLN) while Camus, being a Pied-Noir, has a left-wing white settler view, but they do discuss French colonial ideology to a fairly large degree.

Modern Algeria: A History from 1830 to the Present by Charles-Robert Ageron is a good introductory work on Franco-Algerian history, touching upon many of the important themes in Algeria's colonial history, with a heavy focus on the impact that colonization had upon the native peoples, as well as the politics of labor. That said, it is a survey work and doesn't dive into incredible depth on the Revolution, the conquest, or policies of development, but it does touch upon them and provides a good starting point for further reading.

Related Links

Is it true that the main reason why General de Gaulle gave independence to Algeria is because he was afraid that if Algeria remains French then France would eventually become a Muslim majority country?

What is the most realistic way for France to have permanently kept Algeria?

Why did France fight a vicious war In Algeria and killed hundreds of thousands unlike other colonies?

Why could France not convert Algeria to part of France?
Is Algeria culturally close with France?
Was Algeria better off as an integral part of France, or is it better off independent?

How would modern-day Algeria be if it had remained under French rule?
Why do people think that Algeria would have been better if it had been part of France?
Why did France lose the Algerian War?
What if France would not have invaded Algeria in 1830?
Why did France give up Algeria?
How is the Algerian War (1954-1962) viewed in modern day France?

Why did France fight a vicious war to keep Algeria, but not when it lost Morocco, Tunisia and West Africa?

Why is France obsessed with Algeria?
How do the French and the Algerians view the Algerian war?

Will the USA also recognize Algerian genocide by France, like they recognized Armenian genocide?

Andréa Mathias Master in Literature & Journalism, University of Paris (Graduated 1996) Apr 26

There was only one genocide in Algeria and it was the act of Algerians killing other Algerians: the harkis, those auxiliaries of the French army considered as traitors and massacred without trial.

Corps d'anciens volontaires musulmans de l'armée française. Enlevés par des membres de l'ALN le 23 avril 1962, ils sont mis à mort le soir même dans des conditions atroces.

It goes without saying that the Algerian government has never recognised these massacres which lasted from July to August 1962 and resulted in 100,000 deaths.

Genocide:- 'Extermination of a people or race'. A word that is very much in evidence these days. It didn't work very well in Algeria - lots of non French people still there. Used by Aboriginals in Australia too and a lot of them still around too. Also used by……..you name one! Britain invaded many countries creating its Empire, but military muscle was never used and those countries benefitted by their presence. And they left those countries voluntarily in course of time - remaining friendly to them all. Anyway, digging up the mistakes or otherwise of the past does no-one any good.

Related Links

Were people really nailed to crosses during the Armenian genocide?
Why does Israel not officially recognize the Armenian genocide?
Why is the US officially recognizing the Armenian genocide such a big deal?

What is America's Armenian genocide? What is a dark past of America's that they refuse to acknowledge? Not necessarily a genocide, but something that was swept under the rug by America.

What are the intentions behind the US's recognition of Armenian genocide?
Did Hitler recognize the Armenian genocide?

Why doesn't Algeria push France to recognize Algerian genocide? Will countries like Morocco, Tunisia, Turkey, Azerbaijan, etc. recognize it as well?

Why does Turkey deny the Armenian genocide so vehemently when the genocide was done by the Ottomans, not the current Turkish state?

What are the countries that recognize the Uighur genocide?

What implications are there in officially recognizing the Armenian genocide as a genocide?

If America had not pulled out of the Vietnam War, would America have won the war?
Why does the Republic of China not recognize Mongolia as an independent country?
Why don't Turkey and Azerbaijan recognize the Armenian genocide?
What factors of the Vietnam War made it 'unwinnable' for US involvement?
Why did the US bomb Laos?

Related Answer
What do people think about Algeria and Algerians?

Marco daSilva Updated Jul 14, 2016

I am from south America, I like Algeria and the Algerian government, because it actively supports all revolutionaries around the world, it s independent and not a puppet state, Cuba sent weapons to revolutionary Algeria to fight France and Morocco in the 1960s.

The Spaniards and Portuguese have generally warmer relationship with the Algerians, I think the majority of the French and Moroccan despise Algerians, this is from what I have observed.

I don't understand why the Algerian government don't switch to English or Spanish as the second main language far away from the francophone world, just like what the Rwandan government has done.

Ben Bella in Cuba with Fidel and Che.

Many Portuguese remember the Algerian football player Rabah Madjer, he played in FC Porto for 5 seasons scoring 50 goals.

Related Answer

How true is it that Algeria does not like black people or that it is a racist country? I'm wondering how a family would respond to a son marrying a black woman.

Feriel Chalouche, lives in Algeria Answered Jul 23, 2020

I am Algerian and I know many Algerian families where one of the spouses is a black Algerian. We do have black people in our Sahara (desert) and they don't face racism as far as I know (except for few cases by an ignorant minority who hates on everyone and everything). We are all Algerians and mostly muslims and what unites us is far more valuable than what divides us (be it color or political views or other)

One of my closest friends (white Algerian girl) is going to marry her boyfriend (black Algerian) after quarantine and the issue of him being rejected by the family because of color wasn't even thought of because it's simply not possible.

The criteria for accepting a suitor in Algeria is generally his financial situation (he must have a stable and respectable job) and his good reputation, for the girl it's mostly good reputation and physical appearance.

However, I am not sure about how any Algerian family would react to a son/daughter marrying a black woman/man from other African countries, they do not respond well to outsiders (unless European) so I guess many would be against it out of racism and prejudice (Shame on them)

If you are sure this is the person you want to spend your life with, and your family is just opposing out of ignorance and racism, go for it! You deserve to be happy and they could use a slap (metaphorically haha) to get out of their bubble!

Algerian women:

North of the country

South (Sahara):

The pictures are from public websites

Miss Algeria 2019

Related Answer
What is it like to be in Algeria if you are not Algerian?

Ziaddinè Chahoudi studied at Shia Islam Answered Apr 24, 2018

Depend on which nationalities you belong to, it would be…

Tunisian: Algerians feel close bond, and many Algerians love Tunisia. No problem there.

Sahelian (Malians, Nigeriens) to Sub-Saharan (Nigerians, Kenyans): Algerians would wonder why they stay here.

Egyptian: very fine, of course.

Libyan: poor you mate.

Moroccan: also no problem unless some Moroccan nationalist sites began to issue about how great Morocco and how bad Algeria.

Western Saharan: okay? Algerians, some are sympathetic, some don't care.

French: you colonizer have never apologized for war crimes, right?

Turkish: great, thanks. Many Turkish soap dramas, too.

Palestinian: you are our brothers!

Italian, Spanish, German: Europeans only

American: same as European
So it depends on how foreigners view Algeria and Algerians on their circles.

Related Links

Why did the Algerian Civil war happen?
What was it like to live in Algeria in the nineties, during the "Civil War"?
How are Algerians treated in France?
What is it like to be in Algeria if you are not Algerian?
What would I need to know if I married an Algerian man?

How true is it that Algeria does not like black people or that it is a racist country? I'm wondering how a family would respond to a son marrying a black woman.

Why did France lose the Algerian War?
What is something that most people don't know about the Algerian War?

Why did so many Algerians migrate to France after the Algerian War of Independence?
What will happen if a European man marries an Algerian Muslim woman in Algeria?

Is it okay for an Algerian 29 year old man living in Algeria to want to marry and live with a 52 year old divorced woman with 2 grown children in the UK?

I have never met this man I am falling for, he lives in Algeria, me in America. Why would he want me instead of a Muslim from his own country?

What do Algerians think about Pakistan?
What does it feel like to be Algerian? Do you even know where Algeria is?

I met this incredible Algerian man online 9 months ago. We have since met in Tunisia for 2 weeks. I intend to visit him later in the future, and we have spoken about…

Related Answer
Why did Algeria want independence from France?

This was as a result of colonialism and conquest. During and after pre-colonialism, the westerners came with their religion and the Africans find it appealing and thereby embracing it. This has made many African detest their traditions and also brainwashed to believe their tradition is fetish . A typical African will be proud to name her child "Diana" but would fret and pick offense if she's named Osun,Amadioha etc.

A typical African would derived pleasure in riding a car made model of MAZDA but same would reject a car modelled Ikenga, Ogun etc. All these reminds me the real definition of inferiority complex Beril Çelikgil MSc. Middle East Studies, Qual Researcher, E-Com. Spec.

Answered Aug 25, 2014

With the French occupation, Algerians had to struggle with two main problems. First, being rule by a foreign, non-Muslim power and faing humiliation from foreigners. Second, many Algerians had to give their lands to the new government, colonist. French first buy and possessed Ottoman beylik lands but, as demands raised to obtain more land for European settlements, the state seized more land, lands which are used by locals. French politicians formed a company to acquire agricultural land soon after the invasion and subsidized its settlement by European farmers. According to a royal ordinance in 1845, in areas where Europeans were a substantial part of the population, colons elected mayors and councils for self-governing. In the "mixed" communes, where Muslims established a good amount of population, government was in the hands of appointed and some elected officials.

Imagine that France came to Algeria in 1830 and president de Gaulle said “from this day forward France considers that in all of Algeria there is only one category of inhabitants: there are only Frenchmen in the full sense with the same rights and duties." on 4 June 1958. The reason is quite obvious, I think. If you adopt a system based on classifying the society, giving European settlers the right to be citizen and treating local Algerians as subjects of the state, it is inevitable to face a liberation war.

Related Links

Why could France not convert Algeria to part of France?

Is it true that the main reason why General de Gaulle gave independence to Algeria is because he was afraid that if Algeria remains French then France would eventually become a Muslim majority country?

Why did France give up Algeria?

Why was Northern Algeria so heavily developed by France compared to other French colonies?

How would modern-day Algeria be if it had remained under French rule?

Why did France fight a vicious war In Algeria and killed hundreds of thousands unlike other colonies?

Was Algeria better off as an integral part of France, or is it better off independent?

Is Algeria culturally close with France?
Why did France take over Algeria?

What is the most realistic way for France to have permanently kept Algeria?

Why did France lose did Algerian war given that they killed way more Algerians than they suffered casualties?

Why did France lose the Algerian War?

Why was Northern Algeria an integral part of France, rather than a colony like the rest of West Africa?

How do the French and the Algerians view the Algerian war?
Why is France obsessed with Algeria?

Africa in Real Time
What went wrong with Africa in terms of development?

Answered by Jean-Mari Bergh Mon

Colonization, wars (civil and otherwise), the slave trade, and more recently capitalism. Don't believe the propaganda saying Europeans brought civility to Africa. They brought their tools of oppression, used and abused Africa, and then made Africans take the blame for the consequences.

I'm not saying Africans are better than Europeans. Europeans just won the day when it might meant right. Doesn't mean one is smarter or better than the other.

Related Links

What are the best countries to study automotive and settlement?
The river Po flows through which country?
Is a diploma in public management considered a critical skill in South Africa?

Why is climate change given more political attention than the suffering people of second and third world countries?

In what country is Holy Wednesday sometimes called "Skaredá středa," or "Ugly Wednesday"?

Can you tell me a kids moral story from your country? It doesn't have to be a popular story.

Why does Greece always depend on other Western countries for its survival?
Which are the 38 German-speaking countries?

What is your opinion of reports of electric cars harming rainforests because their production consumes vast amounts of cobalt, nickel, manganese and rare earths that are mined in the rainforests of Africa, Southeast Asia and South America.?

How well do Kenyans, Ugandans, Zimbabweans, and Zambians understand Nigerian pidgin, most especially in movies and songs?

If you were the dictator of your country, what would you change?
Is there a country which has never missed an Olympics?

Why do most European countries get loans with little or no interest rate while the reverse is the case for African countries?

Do you know any student researching about the role of the media in Africa-China relations and willing to co-author a paper on that?

In which country does the cycle race of 'La Vuelta' primarily take place?

How many Algerians were killed by France?

Juba Zelalsan

Knows Algerian history from prehistoric time to present1y

Are we talking about the number of Algerians killed from 1830–1962 or just during independence war ?

If we are talking about 1830–1870, then you have to take into account that the total population of Algeria in 1830 was around 3 million people, in 1870 it was still 3 million people which means that during the 40 bloody years of conquest there were millions of Algerians either killed in fights or due to starvation since France was using scorched earth policy or through what the french call les enfumades (a method which consists of making people suffocate by smoke to death).

In 1866–1868 there was "la grande famine algérienne" which was caused by the former policy and extreme weather conditions, it was painted by Gustave Guillaumet

This famine alone accounted for 820 000 deaths in 1866.

From 1954–1962:

For Algerian sources the numbers vary between 300,000 up to 2 million people.

French sources cite numbers ranging from 30,000 up to 1,300,000 people, most French historians accept 300,000 as the correct estimate.

Overall, a number between 5–7 million people is a correct estimate.

What race is an Algerian?

Ismail

Store Manager at Self-Employment (2016–present)3y

Originally Answered: What race are Algerians?
Algerians are just mixed!! You can find Arabs, Berbers (the indigenous inhabitants of the Maghreb) , Europeans due to the Roman, Byzantin and Vandal settelment, you can also find people from carthaginian descents (Carthaginians are the Phoenicians who setteled in North Africa, and it's really rare to find People from Turkish descent, So don't believe those who claim that Algerian are only berbers or only arabs, We're Mixed.

here's two pictures of Some Algerians … Just an Example!

The famous Algerian painter Mohammed Racim, Is from Turkish origines…

The Algerian football player Idir Ouali, has a european look..

The problem here with the Algerians is that they keep hating each other, and each one of them keep claiming that he/she belongs to some ethnic groups without any scientific evidence, for example you can find someone who claim that he’s Berber without any DNA test, just because he hates arabs!!
18.8K views
View 35 upvotes
35
2

Cari Carr

.

Follow

Married to a North African for 25 years.Oct 31

Sometimes I wonder if people from Northern Africa like Egypt, Morocco, Tunisia, Algeria, and Libya are proud to be called Africans, or do they just accept their fate because they have no choice?

Say, whaaaaattttt?????

Africa is a continent, not a country. There are 54 countries in Africa.

The people I've met are perfectly aware that they live on the continent of Africa and they're cool with that.

Your last comment tells me you haven't spent much time in Africa, which is stunningly beautiful.

North Africa is absolutely gorgeous.

Of course, there are extremely impoverished areas. There are ghettos. We also have those here in the United States.

This isn't Africa, it's the Mississippi Delta.

(PCORI)

(People's World)

And this is a homeless camp in Los Angeles, courtesy of The Guardian. You can find similar encampments in most cities and towns in the United States.

Is it true that Algeria, Egypt, and South Africa are the three most wealthy and the only wealthy countries in Africa?

Jamie Oglethorpe Proudly South African 3y

.

Maybe. There are so many ways of measuring wealth.

Nominal Gross Domestic Product (Nominal GDP)[1]

2016 Rank	Country	Nominal GDP ($ billions)	Nominal GDP per capita (US$)	Notes
1	Nigeria	406.0	2,929.525
2	Egypt	332.3	3,740.249	2015 data[7]
3	South Africa	294.1	4,768.235
4	Algeria	160.8	4,082.572
5	Morocco	100.6	3,195.564

Nominal GDP in US Dollars

Nominal Gross Domestic Product per capita

2016 Rank	Country	Nominal GDP ($ billions)	Nominal GDP per capita (US$)	Notes
50	Seychelles	1.427	15,400.056
33	Equatorial Guinea	7.884	9,604.286
26	Mauritius	11.865	9,421.541
22	Gabon	14.166	7,530.435
15	Libya	33.2	6,157.797
23	Botswana	12.701	5,896.556
27	Namibia	11.210	5,005.166
3	South Africa	294.1	4,768.235
4	Algeria	160.8	4,082.572
12	Tunisia	43.2	3,919.332
2	Egypt	332.3	3,740.249	2015 data[7]
5	Morocco	100.6	3,195.564

Nominal GDP per capita in US Dollars

[List of African countries by GDP (nominal) - Wikipedia]

Human Development Index

Rank		Country	HDI
Rank in Africa	HDI Rank		HDI (Data refer to 2015 in the 2016 HDR)	Change compared between 2016 report and 2015 report
High human development
1	63	Seychelles	0.782	▲ 0.010
2	64	Mauritius	0.781	▲ 0.004
3	83	Algeria	0.745	▲ 0.009
4	97	Tunisia	0.725	▲ 0.004
5	102	Libya	0.716	▼ 0.008
Medium human development
6	108	Botswana	0.698	–
7	109	Gabon	0.697	▲ 0.007
8	111	Egypt	0.691	▲ 0.001
9	119	South Africa	0.666	–

List of African countries by Human Development Index - Wikipedia

Nigeria is 20th on this list

Given these lists, I would rather live in Seychelles or Mauritius. Being Proudly South African, I hope that our new president will start moving us up all of these lists.

Footnotes
[1] Gross domestic product - Wikipedia

Related Links

Is South Africa superior to other African countries like Nigeria, Kenya, Egypt, Algeria, or even Morocco?

Why is Egypt considered the greatest military power in Africa (2020) over countries like South Africa, Algeria and Nigeria?

How come Algeria is the biggest country on the African continent and it's not well known at all?
Which is a richer country: Algeria, Tunisia, Egypt, Morocco? And why?
Is South Africa really dangerous?
Why is Egypt one of the most important countries in Africa?
Is South Africa the most developed country in Africa?
Is Egypt considered part of Africa even though it only shares land with it?
Which are the richest countries in Africa?
What is the wealthiest country in Africa that is NOT South Africa?

Why are the North African countries (Tunisia, Algeria, Morocco, Libya and Egypt) much wealthier and developed than the sub-Saharan African countries (except South Africa)?

Which country went from being very wealthy to very poor?
Which country did South Africa colonize?
Are Whites beginning to leave South Africa?

Currently, South Africa is the wealthiest country in Africa with $770 billion in wealth but only $358.839 billion in GDP in 2019. What is happening with the balance?

How many Algerians were killed by France?

Juba Zelalsan Knows Algerian history from prehistoric time to present 1y

Are we talking about the number of Algerians killed from 1830–1962 or just during independence war ?

If we are talking about 1830–1870, then you have to take into account that the total population of Algeria in 1830 was around 3 million people, in 1870 it was still 3 million people which means that during the 40 bloody years of conquest there were millions of Algerians either killed in fights or due to starvation since France was using scorched earth policy or through what the french call les enfumades (a method which consists of making people suffocate by smoke to death).

In 1866–1868 there was “la grande famine algérienne” which was caused by the former policy and extreme weather conditions, it was painted by Gustave Guillaumet

This famine alone accounted for 820 000 deaths in 1866.

From 1954–1962:

For Algerian sources the numbers vary between 300,000 up to 2 million people.

French sources cite numbers ranging from 30,000 up to 1,300,000 people, most French historians accept 300,000 as the correct estimate.

Overall, a number between 5–7 million people is a correct estimate.

What race is an Algerian?

Ismail Store Manager at Self-Employment (2016–present) 3y

Originally Answered: What race are Algerians?

Algerians are just mixed!! You can find Arabs, Berbers (the indigenous inhabitants of the Maghreb) , Europeans due to the Roman, Byzantin and Vandal settelment, you can also find people from carthaginian descents (Carthaginians are the Phoenicians who setteled in North Africa, and it's really rare to find People from Turkish descent, So don't believe those who claim that Algerian are only berbers or only arabs, We're Mixed.

here's two pictures of Some Algerians … Just an Example!

The famous Algerian painter Mohammed Racim, Is from Turkish origines…

The Algerian football player Idir Ouali, has a european look..

The problem here with the Algerians is that they keep hating each other, and each one of them keep claiming that he/she belongs to some ethnic groups without any scientific evidence, for example you can find someone who claim that he's Berber without any DNA test, just because he hates arabs!

Sometimes I wonder if people from Northern Africa like Egypt, Morocco, Tunisia, Algeria, and Libya are proud to be called Africans, or do they just accept their fate because they have no choice?

Cari Carr · Follow Married to a North African for 25 years.Oct 31

Say, whaaaaattttt?????

Africa is a continent, not a country. There are 54 countries in Africa.

The people I've met are perfectly aware that they live on the continent of Africa and they're cool with that.

Your last comment tells me you haven't spent much time in Africa, which is stunningly beautiful.

North Africa is absolutely gorgeous.

Of course, there are extremely impoverished areas. There are ghettos. We also have those here in the United States.

This isn't Africa, it's the Mississippi Delta.

(PCORI)

(People's World)

And this is a homeless camp in Los Angeles, courtesy of The Guardian. You can find similar encampments in most cities and towns in the United States.

Is it true that Algeria, Egypt, and South Africa are the three most wealthy and the only wealthy countries in Africa?

Jamie Oglethorpe Proudly South African 3y

.

Maybe. There are so many ways of measuring wealth.

Nominal Gross Domestic Product (Nominal GDP)[1]

2016 Rank	Country	Nominal GDP ($ billions)	Nominal GDP per capita (US$)	Notes
1	Nigeria	406.0	2,929.525
2	Egypt	332.3	3,740.249	2015 data[7]
3	South Africa	294.1	4,768.235
4	Algeria	160.8	4,082.572
5	Morocco	100.6	3,195.564

Nominal GDP in US Dollars

Nominal Gross Domestic Product per capita

2016 Rank	Country	Nominal GDP ($ billions)	Nominal GDP per capita (US$)	Notes
50	Seychelles	1.427	15,400.056
33	Equatorial Guinea	7.884	9,604.286
26	Mauritius	11.865	9,421.541
22	Gabon	14.166	7,530.435
15	Libya	33.2	6,157.797
23	Botswana	12.701	5,896.556
27	Namibia	11.210	5,005.166
3	South Africa	294.1	4,768.235
4	Algeria	160.8	4,082.572
12	Tunisia	43.2	3,919.332
2	Egypt	332.3	3,740.249	2015 data[7]
5	Morocco	100.6	3,195.564

Nominal GDP per capita in US Dollars

[List of African countries by GDP (nominal) - Wikipedia]

Human Development Index

Rank		Country	HDI
Rank in Africa	HDI Rank		HDI (Data refer to 2015 in the 2016 HDR)	Change compared between 2016 report and 2015 report
High human development
1	63	Seychelles	0.782	▲ 0.010
2	64	Mauritius	0.781	▲ 0.004
3	83	Algeria	0.745	▲ 0.009
4	97	Tunisia	0.725	▲ 0.004
5	102	Libya	0.716	▼ 0.008
Medium human development
6	108	Botswana	0.698	–
7	109	Gabon	0.697	▲ 0.007
8	111	Egypt	0.691	▲ 0.001
9	119	South Africa	0.666	–

List of African countries by Human Development Index - Wikipedia

Nigeria is 20th on this list

Given these lists, I would rather live in Seychelles or Mauritius. Being Proudly South African, I hope that our new president will start moving us up all of these lists.

Footnotes
[1] Gross domestic product - Wikipedia

Related Links

Is South Africa superior to other African countries like Nigeria, Kenya, Egypt, Algeria, or even Morocco?

Why is Egypt considered the greatest military power in Africa (2020) over countries like South Africa, Algeria and Nigeria?

How come Algeria is the biggest country on the African continent and it's not well known at all?

Which is a richer country: Algeria, Tunisia, Egypt, Morocco? And why?
Is South Africa really dangerous?
Why is Egypt one of the most important countries in Africa?
Is South Africa the most developed country in Africa?
Is Egypt considered part of Africa even though it only shares land with it?
Which are the richest countries in Africa?
What is the wealthiest country in Africa that is NOT South Africa?

Why are the North African countries (Tunisia, Algeria, Morocco, Libya and Egypt) much wealthier and developed than the sub-Saharan African countries (except South Africa)?

Which country went from being very wealthy to very poor?
Which country did South Africa colonize?
Are Whites beginning to leave South Africa?

Currently, South Africa is the wealthiest country in Africa with $770 billion in wealth but only $358.839 billion in GDP in 2019. What is happening with the balance?

What is the hardest dialect of Arabic, Moroccan or Algerian?

Abdelhak Benachour Lives in Algeria (1988–present) Sep 23

Al-Bayan newspaper (UAE) made a poll in 2015 and asked people about the most difficult Arabic dialect and the results were the following:
Algerian dialect 58%
Moroccan dialect 33%
Libyan dialect 25%
Tunisian dialect 16%
Yamani dialect 8%
Lebanese dialect 8%.

Whether this poll was accurate or not, Maghreb dialects remain the most difficult for most Arabs.

Related Links

Is it true that the main reason why General de Gaulle gave independence to Algeria is because he was afraid that if Algeria remains French then France would eventually become a Muslim majority country?

What is the most realistic way for France to have permanently kept Algeria?

Why did France fight a vicious war In Algeria and killed hundreds of thousands unlike other colonies?

Why could France not convert Algeria to part of France?
Is Algeria culturally close with France?
Was Algeria better off as an integral part of France, or is it better off independent?
How would modern-day Algeria be if it had remained under French rule?
Why do people think that Algeria would have been better if it had been part of France?
Why did France lose the Algerian War?
What if France would not have invaded Algeria in 1830?
Why did France give up Algeria?
How is the Algerian War (1954-1962) viewed in modern day France?

Why did France fight a vicious war to keep Algeria, but not when it lost Morocco, Tunisia and West Africa?

Why is France obsessed with Algeria?
How do the French and the Algerians view the Algerian war?

La bataille de l'Afrique est-elle en train de se perdre pour la France et l'Europe, au profit des Chinois (avec l'argent) et des Russes (avec Wagner, la "main" de Poutine, qui n'hésite pas à assassiner) avec le but de piller les matières premières ?

Andréa Mathias Lieu : Paris, France 3 oct.

La bataille de l'Afrique comme vous dites n'est pas encore perdue mais il y a incontestablement un ras-le-bol de la France chez les Africains.
Que ceux-ci soient "travaillés" par des propagandistes est indéniable mais reconnaissons que nos agissements en Afrique ne sont pas non plus d'un parfait angélisme.

L'avantage qu'ont les Français sur les Russes et les Chinois est la connaissance du terrain et des populations. Je ne doute pas de lire dans la presse le récit des futurs déconvenues des deux derniers. Le prix à payer sera bien plus élevé qu'ils ne le pensent…

Questions similaires

Pour nous pays africains qui sommes sous l'emprise de l'impérialisme colonial français, pensez-vous que signer des accords de protection avec la Russie ou même la Chine nous permettra de nous débarrasser de la France et de sa monnaie imposée ?

Pourquoi la France ne s'allie-elle pas avec la Russie et la Chine au lieu de s'allier avec les américains qui ne font que nous trahir et nous imposer la politique qui les arrange ?

Comment les Russes sont-ils parvenus à chasser la France de la République centrafricaine ?

Je n'ai jamais vu autant de pubs de recrutement pour l'armée de terre, de l'air et de mer. La France est-elle en train de préparer une nouvelle guerre ou quoi ? Et contre qui ?

Pourquoi les Européens ne s'entendent pas avec la Russie ?

Que peut faire la France pour contrer la montée en puissance de la Chine en Afrique ?

Face aux accusations fréquentes de pillages et de déstabilisations de l'Afrique dont fait l'objet la France, êtes-vous pour un retrait des troupes françaises de l'Afrique afin de laisser les Africains se débrouiller tout seul ?

Pourquoi la Russie a-t-elle choisi de se distancer et de combattre le reste de l'Europe au lieu de collaborer avec elle ?

Pourquoi est-ce que la France ne se précipite-t-elle pas pour aider les pays comme l'Arménie et l'Ukraine comme elle fourre son nez en Afrique ?

Si la France décidait de se rapprocher géopolitiquement de la Russie et de s'éloigner des États-Unis, qu'est-ce que cela lui apporterait et qu'est-ce que ça changerait selon vous ?

Est-ce que la Russie en tant que puissance exerce son influence en Afrique comme le font la France, les USA et autres puissances ?

La Russie et la Chine ont-elles vraiment une attitude agressive par rapport à la France et l'UE ?

Que se passerait-il si la France se retire un jour totalement de l'Afrique, autant militairement qu'économiquement (Tout pays confondue) ?

La Chine se prépare-t-elle à une guerre avec la Russie ?

Quels avantages Poutine voit-il dans une politique de surenchère avec l'Occident ? Question traduite.

Avant la colonisation française en 1830, l'Algérie (ou les territoires qui la formaient) avait-elle déjà été longuement sous domination étrangère ?

Jean-Marie Gouarné Mis à jour le 14 nov.
Avant 1830 les territoires qui constituent l'Algérie actuelle étaient assez hétérogènes et n'avaient pratiquement jamais constitué un État. Le nom actuel du pays, "Algérie", a été inventé par les Français pour désigner l'ensemble des territoires regroupés sous l'autorité du gouvernement d'Alger (Al-Jazā'ir). Donc avant la colonisation française l'Algérie n'était pas un bloc et avait rarement été dominée dans son ensemble par une puissance extérieure.

Il existe bien sûr une certaine ambiguïté à cet égard. En réalité, depuis la décomposition de l'Empire romain ces territoires ont subi à plusieurs reprises tantôt des invasions dévastatrices à grande échelle, tantôt l'installation de petites enclaves étrangères sur la côte. Mais avant 1830 il n'y a jamais eu de véritable domination d'ensemble par une autorité étrangère.

On peut laisser de côté l'Antiquité et les premières années du Moyen-Âge car à ces époques tous les pays méditerranéens ont été sous la domination de Rome puis de Byzance, et le Maghreb était dans le même cas. En ces temps lointains, on ne disait pas encore Al-Jazā'ir ; la ville était connue sous son nom Amazigh d'Ikosim (Icosium en Latin).

La conquête arabe des VIIème et VIIIème siècles a mis en place une nouvelle domination, dont les effets se poursuivent encore aujourd'hui puisqu'elle a implanté l'Islam et une forte composante de culture arabe dans un pays qui pourtant, d'un point de vue ethnique, est resté essentiellement Berbère (Amazigh). L'invasion n'a pas été facile pour les Arabes, et il ne leur a pas suffi d'éliminer l'Empire Byzantin (successeur de Rome): la résistance des Berbères a été tellement forte que la conquête a duré 70 ans (641-711). Techniquement, la domination arabe n'a pas été durable; en fait, elle a été encore plus éphémère que la domination française de 1830–1962, car dès les années 740 des entités politiques indépendantes se sont dressées contre l'Empire Omeyyade puis Abbasside. Malgré le maintien d'une forme d'allégeance politique et religieuse envers le Califat, on peut considérer que l'actuel territoire algérien, pendant la plus grande partie du Moyen-Age, n'a été ni unifié ni soumis à une réelle domination étrangère.

Il faut quand même citer les deux "empires" musulmans occidentaux nés sur le territoire de l'actuel Maroc, qui se sont succédés au milieu du Moyen-Âge, à savoir les Almoravides (al-Murābiṭūn) aux 11ème et 12ème siècles, puis les Almohades (al-Muwaḥḥidūn) aux 12ème et 13ème siècles. Les Almoravides ont étendu leur domination jusqu'à l'ouest de l'actuelle Algérie, et les Almohades qui ont poussé jusqu'en Tripolitaine (ouest de la Libye) ont donc conquis au passage ce qui constitue actuellement l'Algérie et la Tunisie. Tous deux ont également englobé Al-Andalus (soit une grande partie de la péninsule ibérique). On peut se demander s'il s'agit vraiment de dominations étrangères, car ces conquérants, dont la puissance a été d'ailleurs assez éphémère, étaient eux-mêmes des berbères et n'ont pas remis en question les structures socio-politiques tribales traditionnelles. Le principal (et le plus brutal) des conquérants Almohades, Abd al-Mumin, était d'ailleurs originaire d'un territoire qui, aujourd'hui, fait partie de la wilaya de Tlemcen, dans l'ouest algérien. Ces conquêtes (surtout celle des Almohades caractérisée par une extrême violence à caractère djihadiste) ont provoqué leur lot de massacres et de pillages, mais elles ne sont pas comparables à des occupations étrangères stables, même si les populations en ont souffert autant sinon plus que des excès du colonialisme à venir. Par ailleurs, elles soulignent le fait qu'il n'existait pas la moindre esquisse de cadre national algérien au Moyen-Âge. Il était surtout question, en ces temps là, de luttes de pouvoir entre berbères, compliquées par des tentatives ponctuelles d'intrusion externe, notamment du fait des Arabes et des Normands.

Les choses ont changé au début du XVIème siècle, face aux entreprises coloniales européennes qui commençaient à exercer une certaine pression sur l'Afrique, et compte tenu d'un climat de décadence politique générale du Maghreb. Les notables d'Alger, dans ce contexte, ont fait appel à des corsaires de l'Empire Ottoman, originaires de l'île grecque de Lesbos, les frères Baba-Oruç, connus dans les pays francophones sous le nom de Barberousse. Une fois installés à Alger, les Barberousse ont pris le pouvoir. Ils ont mis fin à la menace d'une conquête espagnole puis, par une suite de guerres contre les royaumes berbères indépendants, ont plus ou moins unifié sous le contrôle (théorique) d'Alger l'essentiel de ce qui constitue l'Algérie d'aujourd'hui et créé une forme rudimentaire de gouvernement central connue sous le nom de Régence d'Alger. Ils n'ont pas pour autant fait disparaître l'autonomie des clans berbères de l'arrière-pays: à la veille de la conquête française, on estime que la Régence n'avait d'autorité réelle et directe que sur un tiers de la population. En réalité, la première tentative de construction d'un véritable État national algérien a été celle de l'émir Abdelkader dans les années 1830 et 1840; encore faut-il préciser que cette tentative très éphémère n'a été rendue possible que par l'abolition de la Régence par les Français au moment de l'occupation d'Alger (1830), donc trop tard pour faire obstacle à la colonisation.

Sachant que les Barberousse étaient des corsaires ottomans et que, en 1516, la Régence a fait acte d'allégeance envers le Califat d'Istambul, certains pensent que l'Algérie était de ce fait une dépendance de l'Empire Ottoman. Cette vision simpliste est largement erronée.

L'idée d'une "occupation ottomane" est apparemment confortée par la présence permanente des janissaires (mot français dérivé du turc yeni çeri qui signifiait "nouvelle milice" et désignait un ordre militaire à statut très particulier de l'Empire ottoman). Cependant, cette milice étrangère (dont l'effectif n'a jamais dépassé 15.000 hommes), a plus joué le rôle ambigu d'une garde prétorienne au service de la Régence que celui d'une véritable force d'occupation coloniale. Elle a surtout contribué à complexifier (et donc à affaiblir) la société algérienne pour au moins deux raisons. D'abord, le corps des janissaires était politiquement turbulent et, à plusieurs reprises, est entré en rébellion avec le pouvoir. Ensuite, il a indirectement compliqué les conflits ethniques en donnant naissance à la communauté des Kouloughlis (descendants d'unions entre janissaires et femmes autochtones mais exclus des privilèges des janissaires), qui a constitué une force politique souvent opposée à la Régence, parfois favorable aux rebelles Kabyles, et toujours en lutte contre les janissaires (dont elle a contribué à briser définitivement la puissance en 1817). La question des janissaires et des Kouloughlis est complexe et représente un aspect aujourd'hui trop mal connu de l'histoire de l'Algérie; elle mériterait d'être davantage étudiée. Mais en tout cas on ne peut pas sérieusement soutenir que l'Algérie a été "tenue" par une armée d'occupation turque.

En réalité le lien avec Istanbul était plus une alliance opportuniste qu'une soumission: les Ottomans étant en guerre avec l'Espagne, ils étaient pour Alger le meilleur appui politique et militaire possible. Par la suite, l'empire de Charles Quint dont l'Espagne faisait partie s'est disloqué, les Ottomans ont eu affaire à d'autres ennemis (Autriche, Pologne, Russie) qui ne s'intéressaient pas au Maghreb, et la Régence d'Alger est devenue une puissance régionale importante qui n'avait plus besoin de protection.

Elle est devenue aussi une puissance de proie, avec une flotte de corsaires redoutée partout en Méditerranée et dans l'Atlantique et, loin d'être un pays dominé, elle a fait partie des dominants. C'est incontestablement Alger qui a pratiqué le plus intensivement le "corso", une forme de guerre maritime essentiellement tournée contre des cibles civiles (navires de commerce, pêcheurs et populations côtières), dont les objectifs étaient de capturer non seulement des marchandises et des navires, mais aussi des esclaves. Malheureusement pour l'Algérie, cette époque de puissance (trop tributaire de la piraterie et de l'esclavage) n'a pas permis un développement économique et social à la hauteur du potentiel du pays. Une très grande partie du pouvoir politique à Alger était aux mains des "raïs", les chefs corsaires. Quant aux Européens, principales victimes des raïs, ils étaient presque tout le temps en guerre les uns contre les autres, et n'avaient donc aucun moyen de riposter efficacement. C'est ainsi que, pendant près de trois siècles, Alger a pu vivre des profits faciles de la piraterie et de l'esclavage, et même devenir une belle et opulente cité, en se dispensant de tout effort de modernisation. Avec le recul, on peut dire que la Régence d'Alger a peut-être fait plus de mal à l'Algérie qu'une occupation étrangère, car elle n'a réalisé aucune œuvre sérieuse de construction nationale et n'a fait que masquer par une richesse artificielle des institutions décadentes et des pratiques aussi contraires aux valeurs coraniques qu'aux principes d'efficacité politique les plus élémentaires. Mais, clairement, la Régence d'Alger était une puissance indépendante, son allégeance envers l'Empire ottoman étant purement théorique.

Toutefois, le fait que la Régence d'Alger n'ait pas été elle-même totalement subordonnée à une puissance étrangère n'exclut pas toute discussion sur une éventuelle domination étrangère des territoires qui constituent aujourd'hui l'Algérie. En effet, la Régence elle-même était dans une large mesure un corps étranger par rapport aux populations autochtones. Les janissaires étaient, par définition, des militaires étrangers, même si leur lien de subordination envers le sultan d'Istanbul était très ténu. Les corsaires formaient quand à eux une corporation puissante, la Taïfa des raïs, évidemment sans grande affinité avec les «indigènes». Les raïs étaient pour la plupart des aventuriers apatrides, originaires d'Europe (occidentale ou ottomane), établis provisoirement ou durablement à Alger et convertis à l'islam pour des raisons sans doute très opportunistes. Certains d'entre eux avaient commencé leurs carrières comme esclaves, avant de s'élever dans la hiérarchie et de devenir eux-mêmes des professionnels de la piraterie… et de l'esclavage. On peut par exemple citer le Calabrais Uluç Ali Pacha (né Giovanni Dionigi Galeni et qui finira grand amiral de la flotte ottomane), les Corses Hassan (né Pietro Paolo Tavera) et Mami Pacha (né Fillipu d'Arbarella), le Vénitien Hassan Veneziano, les Sardes Hassan l'Eunuque (qui fut le bras droit de Khayr ed-Din Barberousse) et Ramdan Pacha, les Albanais Mami (ou Mohammed) Arnaute (connu pour avoir capturé le célèbre écrivain espagnol Miguel de Cervantes) et Mourad Raïs, et beaucoup d'autres. Subordonnée ou non à l'Empire ottoman, la Régence d'Alger pourrait donc légitimement être considérée en soi comme un pouvoir étranger en position d'occupant par rapport à ce qu'on perçoit de nos jours comme le peuple algérien. Le problème est d'autant plus compliqué que les dirigeants actuels, dont il est pourtant raisonnable de penser qu'il n'ont rien à voir avec les raïs et les janissaires d'autrefois, semblent vouloir établir une sorte de continuité entre la Régence d'Alger et l'État national algérien post-colonial, dans un état d'esprit que révèle ce passage d'un discours prononcé il y a quelques années par un haut responsable de la défense, le général Gaïd Salah: «Nous ne devons jamais oublier cette glorieuse période de notre histoire militaire et nationale où la marine algérienne détenait le règne incontestable des mers et constituait la force suprême et redoutable, notamment en Méditerranée». Si on ajoute à cela la présence d'une statue récente du raïs Hamidou ben Ali à Alger, et le fait que plusieurs navires de combat de la marine nationale portent des noms de raïs de la grande époque de la piraterie, on peut conclure que même si la Régence d'Alger n'a pas grand chose à voir avec ce qui, d'un point de vue sociologique et géopolitique, définit l'actuelle Algérie, il existe dans la communication (sinon dans les convictions) du gouvernement algérien une certaine tendance à revendiquer comme «national» l'héritage de la Régence. À notre époque où la culpabilité des puissances ayant pratiqué l'esclavage est systématiquement dénoncée, le but du gouvernement algérien n'est pas de se glorifier des razzias des corsaires de la Régence; il est surtout de démentir les arguments selon lesquels l'Algérie est une création coloniale française en invoquant une continuité entre la Régence (renversée par les Français en 1830) et l'Algérie moderne. Cette position implique la reconnaissance a posteriori, pour cette Régence, d'un statut d'État national algérien. D'un autre côté, le fait que la Régence d'Alger n'ait été ni arabe ni berbère, qu'elle n'ait eu pratiquement aucun centre d'intérêt commun (hormis la religion) avec les populations autochtones, qu'elle ait été effacée aussi facilement et aussi rapidement en 1830, et qu'elle n'ait joué aucun rôle dans la résistance à la colonisation française, plaiderait plutôt pour l'idée qu'il s'agissait plus d'un corps étranger, sans véritable enracinement local, que d'un État national. Sans aller plus loin dans ce débat, la question de savoir si la Régence d'Alger était une domination étrangère ou une oligarchie algérienne n'est pas totalement close. La vérité est probablement entre les deux. Il semble en tout cas qu'on ne puisse pas sérieusement considérer que l'Algérie a été turque avant d'être française.

Au début du XIXème siècle, quand l'évolution du contexte international a mis fin à la grande piraterie et imposé des restrictions au trafic d'esclaves, la Régence s'est trouvée en grave difficulté à un moment où par ailleurs les Turcs n'avaient plus aucun intérêt à la soutenir. Elle s'est trouvée à la fois déstabilisée par de graves troubles politiques internes s'ajoutant à l'hostilité des tribus de l'arrière-pays et diplomatiquement isolée sur le plan international quand, les guerres ayant cessé en Europe et en Amérique du Nord, les grandes puissances occidentales ont eu les mains libres pour "s'occuper" du corso algérien, en visant directement le port d'Alger. La première riposte significative est venue en 1815 des Américains: l'US Navy a brutalement mis fin à la carrière du fameux raïs Hamidou ben Ali (le plus célèbre et le plus redouté des corsaires de l'époque) et menacé de bloquer le port. Une seconde opération, Anglo-Hollandaise, a abouti en 1816 à un bombardement dévastateur du port. La France est ensuite entrée en scène en organisant pour de bon le blocus du port d'Alger de 1827 à 1829. Jusque là, il n'était question que de représailles limitées et aucune grande puissance n'envisageait vraiment d'occuper le pays. La Régence semble avoir cru que les choses n'iraient jamais plus loin et n'a rien fait pour s'adapter, une erreur fatale qui a causé sa chute et la perte de l'indépendance du pays. Quand la France a finalement lancé, en 1830, une véritable offensive terrestre et navale contre Alger, la ville est tombée en trois semaines. On connaît la suite: cette fois, les Français ne se sont pas contentés de bombarder et de négocier; ils ont débarqué et ils sont restés…

Mais il est évident que si, en 1830, la Régence d'Alger avait réellement été une annexe de l'Empire ottoman, les Turcs ne seraient pas restés les bras croisés, et que les Français n'auraient pas pu envisager de s'y attaquer dans le contexte géopolitique de l'époque.

On peut donc considérer que, à moins de remonter très loin en arrière dans l'histoire, l'Algérie n'avait jamais vraiment été longtemps, avant 1830 sous une domination étrangère aussi complète et aussi directe que celle de l'administration française. On peut même dire que, en mettant bout à bout les brèves dominations arabe, turque et française, l'Algérie n'a pas été longtemps "dominée" dans son histoire, même si elle a été souvent envahie et a subi de nombreux empiètements.

Suivre Jean-Marie Gouarné

Questions similaires

Finalement, si l’Algérie était restée française, la France ne serait-elle pas devenu un pays à majorité musulmane ? De manière générale, à quoi ressemblerait la France aujourd'hui si l’Algérie était restée française ?

La France est-elle prospère à cause de la colonisation ? Si la colonisation n'avait jamais eu lieu, comment se présenterait la France ?

L'Afrique est-elle pauvre à cause de la colonisation ? Si la colonisation n'avait jamais eu lieu, comment se présenterait l'Afrique ?

Pourquoi parle-t-on presque toujours de la relation France/Algérie et si peu de la colonisation française en Tunisie et au Maroc ?

Comment les Africains vivant sur des terres autrefois sous la domination coloniale française voient-ils cette époque de leur histoire ?

Pourquoi les Français sont-ils qualifiés de colonisateurs en Afrique du Nord, alors que le Maghreb fut d'abord colonisé par les Arabes (au détriment des Kabyles)?

Pendant la colonisation en Algérie, est-il vrai que la France a octroyé la nationalité française aux indigènes juifs, mais pas au peuple musulman ? Si oui, pourquoi?

Que la France ait colonisé l'Algérie, certes, mais est-il exact que les Arabes aient colonisé le Maghreb Berbère et qu'ils l'occupent toujours ?

Pourquoi la colonisation française était-elle différente en Algérie qu'au Maroc ou en Tunisie?

Pourquoi durant la colonisation de l'Algérie de 1830 à 1962, les Français n'ont pas encouragé l'enseignement de la langue française aux Algériens ?

Pourquoi la France ne s'excuse-t-elle pas une bonne fois pour toutes pour la colonisation vis à vis de l'Algérie ?

Pourquoi il y avait plus que d'un million de colons français en Algérie avant La Guerre d'Algérie ?

Est-ce qu'il est vrai que lors de la colonisation de l'Algérie, les Français ont voulu naturaliser les Kabyles, les envoyer vers la métropole, et les traiter comme les Français de souche vu leurs phénotypes européens ?

Pourquoi le Vietnam ne s'est-il jamais plaint de la colonisation française contrairement à l'Algérie ?

Pourquoi un bon pourcentage des Algériens nés avant l'indépendance (1962) disent que « l'Algérie était beaucoup plus heureuse et prospère du temps de la colonisation française »?

Algérie, est-ce vraiment possible que la population fût fortement éduquée en 1830 comme l'affirme Abdelmadjid Chikhi ?

Sofiane Connaissances : Anglais 10 mo

Avant 1830, comme dans tout les pays musulmans, l'enseignement sur le territoire algérien est dispensé dans les écoles coraniques (Kouttabs). Elles fonctionnent soit à la mosquée soit dans des locaux particuliers ou chez le taleb (l'enseignant) dans certains villages. L'élève dispose d'une planche de bois (la louha) sur laquelle on peut écrire avec une encre facilement effaçable à l'eau. La base de l'enseignement est le Coran. On lui apprend à lire et à écrire l'arabe pour qu'il puisse apprendre et réciter les versets du Livre dans sa version originelle. Le taleb est formé dans une zaouïa, dispersés sur l'ensemble du territoire nord africain. On y perpétue un enseignement théologique. À la fin de ses études, le taleb rentre dans son douar natal où il ouvre une Kouttab. On a évalué à environ 2 000 le nombre d'écoles coraniques à l'intérieur de la régence d'Alger, qui représente le tiers de la superficie du département d'Alger de l'époque coloniale, pour une population estimé à 2 millions d'individus selon l'enquête française des commissions de 1833–1834.

Pour la population juive du territoire algérien, c'est à peu près le même système éducative. Chaque communauté suffisamment importante se doit d'avoir son école. On doit obligatoirement apprendre à l'âge de cinq ou six ans et les cours sont donnés à la synagogue et quelques fois dans la maison du maître (makré dardiki). Une communauté choisi de préférence son enseignant parmi ses membres, dans le cas contraire il fait appel au tribunal rabbinique qui envoie un enseignant. Les programmes sont établis et n'ont pas changé depuis leur origine (avant la destruction du deuxième temple à Jérusalem). L'éducation est tellement prioritaire qu'on considère qu'il n'y a pas d'illetrés dans la population juive. À propos d'un juif qui ne sait pas lire, le Talmud affirme qu'il ne peut s'agir que d'un enfant emmené en captivité par des non juifs.

Même si le système éducatif dans le territoire algérien est différent de ce qu'on peut trouver en Europe, il est présent, ancien et efficace pour l'époque. Le taux d'alphabétisation en 1830 est quasiment le même qu'au pays des Lumières.

Donc oui la population en Algérie (régence d'Alger) en 1830 était fortement éduqué pour son époque (elle n'était pas peuplé de pirates analphabètes et sauvages comme on peut le lire parfois). Elle recevait une éducation qui répondait parfaitement aux besoins d'une population croyante et rurale, elle savait lire, écrire et compter.

(vous vous demandez pourquoi la population musulmane d'Algérie est devenu fortement illettrée pendant la colonisation ? C'est une autre question que je vous laisse le soin de poser sur Quora ^^)

Questions similaires

Pourquoi les 350 000 Algériens qui vivaient en France (métropolitaine) en 1962 ne sont-ils pas repartis pour l'Algérie quand elle est devenue indépendante ?

Pourquoi la guerre de l'indépendance de l'Algérie à durée pour presque 8 ans malgré que la France pouvait se retirer de l'Algérie plutôt ?

Finalement, si l'Algérie était restée française, la France ne serait-elle pas devenu un pays à majorité musulmane ? De manière générale, à quoi ressemblerait la France aujourd'hui si l'Algérie était restée française ?

Quel est le problème profond que l'Algérie a avec la France ?

Pourquoi la France a-t-elle perdu la guerre d'Algérie alors qu'elle a tué beaucoup plus d'Algériens qu'elle n'a subi de pertes ? (Question traduite)

Pourquoi un bon pourcentage des Algériens nés avant l'indépendance (1962) disent que « l'Algérie était beaucoup plus heureuse et prospère du temps de la colonisation française »?

Pourquoi il y avait plus que d'un million de colons français en Algérie avant La Guerre d'Algérie ?

Que va changer le décès du Général Ahmed Gaïd Salah en Algérie ?

Est-ce qu'il est vrai que lors de la colonisation de l'Algérie, les Français ont voulu naturaliser les Kabyles, les envoyer vers la métropole, et les traiter comme les Français de souche vu leurs phénotypes européens ?

Comment était l'Algérie avant d'être française ?
La France a-t-elle répandu l'analphabétisme en Algérie pendant la colonisation ?
L'Algérie aurait-elle pu rester française ?
Rapport Storra : La France et l'Algérie veulent-elles vraiment se réconcilier ?

Pourquoi il n'y a qu'avec l'Algérie que les relations sont souvent tendues alors que la France a occupé d'autres pays ?

Pourquoi l'Algérie n'a-t-elle jamais été libre ?

De Gaulle avait-il donné l'indépendance à l'Algérie, car il ne voulait pas que son village devienne Colombey les deux mosquées ?

Anthony Lapeyre · Suivre Licence en Histoire, Université d'Orléans (Diplôme obtenu en 2000) sam.

De Gaulle est le père de la dissuasion. Il a très bien compris que si l'Algérie avait pu être utile comme profondeur stratégique à la France partir de l'occupation, la possession de la bombe atomique sanctuarisait le territoire métropolitain et lui retirait une grande partie de son utilité.
A partir de là il a jugé qu'il valait mieux laisser les Algériens décider de leur avenir que de s'engager dans une guerre qui aurait durer et couter.

Comme dans bien des cas il a pensé à l'avenir avec clairvoyance.

Réponse similaire
Si les «pieds-noirs» n'avaient pas quitté l'Algérie après l'indépendance, une cohabitation aurait-elle été possible avec les musulmans, comme les afrikaners et les noirs en Afrique du Sud, et l'Algérie s'en sortirait-elle mieux ?

Simon Labrunie , politologue de café du commerce Répondu 27 mai 2018

S'ils n'avaient pas quitté l'Algérie, c'est qu'une cohabitation aurait été possible. Ou du moins qu'ils l'auraient cru. Ils ne seraient pas restés en pensant qu'ils allaient se faire massacrer ou déposséder. Mais pour cela, il aurait fallu que les choses soient très différentes. La situation des deux communautés connues comme "Pieds-Noirs" (Européens d'Algérie et Juifs indigènes naturalisés français) était bien différente de celle des Afrikaners.

L'Algérie française était, évidemment, une dépendance de la France. Les Européens en Algérie étaient des citoyens français, et se considéraient comme des "Français d'Algérie", y compris ceux qui n'étaient pas d'origine française. Malgré l'accent pied-noir et les mots pataouètes, ils parlaient la même langue que les métropolitains.

Donc leur "rapatriement" en France restait toujours possible, au moins en tant que "plan B". (Pour les Juifs, évidemment, c'était beaucoup plus compliqué. Ils se considéraient comme passionnément français, mais la métropole, ce n'était pas "chez eux". Peut-être auraient-ils pu rester, si (1) leur naturalisation avait été moins ancienne, et leur association au pouvoir colonial moins forte, et (2) Israël n'avait pas été créé entre temps.)

Les Afrikaners n'ont plus de lien avec les Pays-Bas depuis le début du 19° siècle. Ils se considèrent comme… des Africains. Leur langue a tellement divergé du néerlandais que l'intercompréhension est difficile.

Les Pieds-Noirs étaient moins d'un million, pour plus de 40 millions de métropolitains. En revanche, intégrer 3 millions d'Afrikaners dans les Pays-Bas déjà surpeuplés avec leurs 17 millions d'habitants est inimaginable. Les Afrikaners n'ont pas le choix : l'Afrique du Sud, c'est leur passé et leur avenir.

L'apartheid sud-africain, sous sa forme institutionnelle, est apparu dans les années 50, bien après que l'Afrique du Sud soit devenue largement indépendante (un "dominion") en 1910. Auparavant, c'était plutôt de la discrimination ordinaire, banale pour l'époque. Donc, la lutte anti-apartheid était une affaire "intérieure" plutôt qu'un problème entre une colonie et sa métropole

Le régime colonial français en Algérie était un apartheid créé et institué par la métropole. Donc, il était presque impossible de séparer la lutte pour pour l'égalité de la lutte pour l'indépendance. Si bien que la plupart des dirigeants du FLN étaient prêts à passer les Pieds-Noirs par profits et pertes, et certains souhaitaient même explicitement leur départ ("la valise ou le cercueil") : mettre la France dehors, c'était mettre les Français dehors. (De plus, les meilleurs des chefs indépendantistes, comme Ferhat Abbas, ont été écartés immédiatement après l'indépendance : Crise de l'été 1962 — Wikipédia.)

Au contraire, l'ANC avait la chance d'avoir des dirigeants d'une grande qualité comme Mandela. Ils avaient compris, en particulier, que la situation sud-africaine ne relevait pas seulement d'un banal schéma colonial, et qu'il n'était ni possible ni souhaitable que les Blancs (y compris les Afrikaners) s'en aillent.

Quant à savoir si l'Algérie s'en sortirait mieux… on peut penser que l'économie algérienne aurait pu mieux aller, si ceux qui la faisaient marcher étaient restés dans le pays. Mais, là encore, il aurait fallu que de nombreuses conditions soient remplies :
que les Pieds-Noirs acceptent la réorientation de l'économie coloniale vers l'indépendance économique ; que le FLN ne suive pas la même politique de soviétisation que dans notre monde (ça aurait fait fuir les Européens "qui comptent", entrepreneurs et autres) ; que la gabegie pétrolière ne prenne pas les mêmes proportions que dans notre monde ; que le FLN n'utilise pas les islamistes pour étouffer les revendications démocratiques, conduisant à une atroce guerre civile.

Questions similaires

Pourquoi l'Algérie, qui a acquis son indépendance veut-elle faire de la France une partie de son territoire ?

Pensez-vous comme certains ont pu le dire que "l'Algérie n'était pas une nation, seule la France a fait du pays une nation" ?

Pourquoi un bon pourcentage des Algériens nés avant l'indépendance (1962) disent que « l'Algérie était beaucoup plus heureuse et prospère du temps de la colonisation française »?

Pourquoi on demande tout le temps à la France de s'excuser envers l'Algérie pour les morts de la Guerre d'Algérie et pas à l'Algérie de s'excuser pour les actes du FLN durant la même période ?

Pourquoi les 350 000 Algériens qui vivaient en France (métropolitaine) en 1962 ne sont-ils pas repartis pour l'Algérie quand elle est devenue indépendante ?

Si les «pieds-noirs» n'avaient pas quitté l'Algérie après l'indépendance, une cohabitation aurait-elle été possible avec les musulmans, comme les afrikaners et les noirs en Afrique du Sud, et l'Algérie s'en sortirait-elle mieux ?

Finalement, si l'Algérie était restée française, la France ne serait-elle pas devenu un pays à majorité musulmane ? De manière générale, à quoi ressemblerait la France aujourd'hui si l'Algérie était restée française ?

Un Algérien d'un certain âge m'a montré la carte d'identité Française qu'il possédait en 1962, juste avant l'indépendance. Il y était noté "Français musulman". Y avait-il bien un système d'apartheid à l'époque de l'Algérie Française ?

Pourquoi la France a-t-elle perdu la guerre d'Algérie alors qu'elle a tué beaucoup plus d'Algériens qu'elle n'a subi de pertes ? (Question traduite)

Combien de "Pieds Noirs" (Algériens d´origine européenne) sont restés en Algérie après la victoire du FLN et la déclaration de l´indépendance du pays ?

Pourquoi il n'y a qu'avec l'Algérie que les relations sont souvent tendues alors que la France a occupé d'autres pays ?

Rapport Storra : La France et l'Algérie veulent-elles vraiment se réconcilier ? Quelles personnes en France n'ont toujours pas digéré l'indépendance de l'Algérie ?

Comment était l'Algérie avant d'être française ?

Pensez-vous que la France et l'Algérie pourraient un jour se réconcilier émotionnellement?

Pourquoi les Algériens, au moins ceux en France, parlent si bien le français ?

Danielle Pérard 24 févr.

Il me semble que c'est de moins en moins vrai.

Du moins, chez les jeunes générations qui n'ont pas connu l'Algérie française. Ce qui est vrai, c'est que la plupart le comprennent sans problème et s'expriment de manière tout à fait compréhensible. Mais avec des fautes assez fréquentes.

Ce qui n'était pas le cas pour les Algériens qui venaient en France peu de temps après l'indépendance. Disons, dans les 20 ou 30 ans qui ont suivi.

Actuellement, il faut vraiment parler avec des gens instruits pour qu'ils parlent sans fautes ou sans maladresses.

Ce qui me donnerait à penser que le français est probablement de moins en moins parlé en Algérie.

Simple supposition.

Réponse similaire
Pourquoi les Français ne reconnaissent-ils pas le génocide algérien ?

Pierre Leclercq, lieu : France Mis à jour le 12 oct. 2019

La communauté Française a été systématiquement harcelée et pourchassée après l'indépendance, y compris les natifs ayant fait le choix de combattre pour la France.

Si génocide il y a, c'est un génocide envers les Français qui rappelons le ont créé ce pays de toute pièce, sur une zone essentiellement désertique, traversée par quelque peuplades nomades, et ont mis en place toutes les infrastructure d'un pays digne de ce nom.

La vraie question serait plutôt, mais quand donc vont-ils cesser de se poser en victimes et vivre leur propre vie, raison pour laquelle ils ont demandé leur indépendance?

La France au cours de son Histoire s'est fait envahir maintes et maintes fois, et à chaque fois, nous avons combattus, et nous sommes relevés, toujours plus forts.

Jamais, nous ne nous plaignons d'avoir eu à subir toutes ces guerres.

Le jour où ces supposées victimes comprendront cela, elles seront passées de l'enfance, à un stade plus proche de l'âge adulte.

En attendant, à tous ceux qui sont maintenant en France, pourquoi donc cette indépendance si c'était pour fuir votre pays, si chèrement acquis?

Grandir prend du temps, mais ne vous inquiétez pas, un jour viendra, où vous aussi serez des adultes.

Réponse similaire
La France a-t-elle encore son mot à dire sur l'Algérie ?

Zoubir Berdi Répondu 19 oct. 2019

Sur le principe la France devrait considérer l'Algérie comme n'importe quel autre pays avec lequel elle de fortes relations économiques et un mouvement humain important. Sauf que…

Sauf que la France a vis-à-vis de l'Algérie une position plus compliquée. Pèle-mêle cela donne:

En tant qu'ancienne puissance coloniale, elle a en sa possession sous forme d'archives 132 ans de l'histoire de l'Algérie. Toutes les archives ne sont pas déclassées. C'est dire la sensibilité de certains dossiers concernant ce pays. Le pouvoir algérien n'a pas changé depuis l'indépendance du pays à ce jour.

La France a gardé à l'indépendance de l'Algérie un relationnel économique (sociétés françaises), éducatif (enseignants et coopérateurs) et humain (immigrés) important.

Les consulats français en Algérie délivrent plus de visas qu'à n'importe quel autre pays hormis la Chine.

Les Algériens ne considèrent pas la France comme un pays totalement étranger. Oui c'est comme ça! Ils se considèrent un peu chez eux en France d'où certains comportements que beaucoup de français ne comprennent pas et surtout n'acceptent pas.

Les vols les plus denses à partir d'Algérie sont vers la France et de très loin.

Les Algériens se soignent d'abord en Algérie et ensuite en France. (la Nomenklatura et les Algériens aisés se soignent presque exclusivement en France)

Le droit algérien même arabisé, est inspiré presque en totalité du droit hérité à l'indépendance du pays.

La première communauté immigrée en France est d'origine algérienne.

Les étudiants algériens sont la première communauté estudiantine étrangère en France. Plus de 70% ne rentrent pas en Algérie à la fin de leur cursus.

La langue française est enseignée dans les écoles primaires algériennes et la langue universitaire scientifique (sciences, technologie et médecine) en Algérie est le Français.

Les Algériens ont avec la France un relationnel passionnel; ce qui explique leur amertume et leur déception à chaque fois que la France restreint les avantages qui leur avaient été accordés à l'indépendance du pays.

Le contentieux algéro-français sur certains biens en Algérie n'est pas encore réglé. Je pourrais allonger la liste mais l'essentiel est dit.
Comment voudriez-vous qu'avec tout ça, la France puisse avoir une politique "normale" envers l'Algérie? La normalité politique étant celle qu'elle a avec d'autres pays du monde.

Sa politique se doit de tenir compte de ces particularités et aussi de l'esprit particulier des Algériens: esprit où se mêlent rigueur et humeur avec la même intensité.

Je dois corriger une idée fausse : non les Algériens ne considèrent pas la France comme la cause de leurs soucis. Ils attendaient simplement plus que de la "normalité" d'un pays avec lequel ils ont tant de choses en commun.

L'implication ouvertement pro-marocaine de la France dans la décolonisation du Sahara Occidental est mal perçue en Algérie. Cette situation gâche la relation algéro-marocaine et empêche la naissance d'une Union Maghrébine qui aurait beaucoup apporté à ses membres. Les Algériens dans leur majorité considèrent cette immixtion comme la rémanence d'un esprit colonial.

Je profite du sujet pour faire une digression:

Il est totalement faux de dire que l'Algérien est un fainéant qui ne travaille pas: Renault ou d'autres industriels français qui ont employés des travailleurs algériens n'avaient pas eu à se plaindre de la "paresse algérienne".

Si le pays n'est pas développé malgré des richesses fossiles importantes c'est du à des choix économiques désastreux et au manque de réformes idoines. Ceci a enfermé le pays dans une bureaucratie qui empêche tout progrès.

Les nostalgiques de l'Algérie Française font un comparatif qui doit cesser car basé sur des paramètres erronés:

Ils comparent l'économie de l'Algérie coloniale à celle de l'Algérie indépendante et crient à tue-tête que les Algériens ne travaillent pas et qu'ils avaient mis à terre la florissante économie laissée par les pieds-noirs.

Ils oublient de dire que 9 millions d'autochtones algériens étaient réduits au service de ces colons qui bénéficiaient ainsi d'une main-d'oeuvre corvéable à merci. Qu'ils travaillaient et produisaient sous la couverture d'une armée acquise à leurs idées coloniales. Tout mouvement de protestation était noyé dans une répression des plus féroces.

La population algérienne de l'époque était d'environ 10 millions dont 1 million environ, d'origine européenne mais 95% des richesses étaient entre les mains de ces pieds-noirs. On oublie que c'était pratiquement du servage.

A l'indépendance ce déséquilibre devait cesser et les règles du travail redéfinies: l'Algérie indépendante n'est pas une Algérie coloniale et donc la production de richesse ne devait plus répondre à la seule orthodoxie économique mais à une approche qui permettrait un bien -être social pour lequel tant de martyrs avaient péris. Cela ne s'est pas fait comme souhaité, plusieurs méthodes ont été testées et les bons choix n'ont pas été retenus. Mais il n'est pas trop tard et cela viendra.

Prenez un colon X dans un pays méditerranéen, donnez-lui en quantité les meilleures terres, mettez en place des lois qui lui donnent raison contre toute contestation de la part de la main-d'oeuvre qu'il emploie, protégez-le par une police et une armée acquises à ses idées, ouvrez-lui le marché de la France métropolitaine et contemplez les résultats: Grandioses n'est-ce-pas?

X pourrait être arabe, malgache, mongol ou péruvien il obtiendrait les mêmes résultats. Continuer à glorifier jusqu'à la béatitude le X pied-noir n'est plus de mise.

Je comprend parfaitement sa nostalgie et la douleur qu'il a ressenti à quitter un pays aussi magnifique mais ce n'est pas en ressassant négativement des faits si anciens qu'il améliorera son relationnel avec l'Algérie d'aujourd'hui. Après tout il n'avait qu'à rester! Et accepter de participer à la construction d'une nouvelle Algérie.

La porte algérienne est ouverte…

J'ai répondu un peu dans tous les sens car j'ai lu certaines réponses qui allaient dans tous les sens.

Pardon d'avoir été si long.

Questions similaires

Les gens des pays africains qui parlent français détestent-ils la France et la langue française ?

Pourquoi les Français ne reconnaissent-ils pas le génocide algérien ?

Pourquoi il n'y a qu'avec l'Algérie que les relations sont souvent tendues alors que la France a occupé d'autres pays ?

Pourquoi les algériens sont-ils si nationalistes ?
Pourquoi certains Algériens font n'importe quoi en France ?
Les maghrébins sont-ils stigmatisés en France ? Si oui, pourquoi ?
Pourquoi 75% des français qui émigrent au Québec rentrent en France dans les 5 ans ?

Pourquoi beaucoup d'Arabes nés en France se sentent-ils plus arabes que français ?
Pourquoi les Arabes détestent l'Algérie ?

Quels sont les pays de l'Afrique francophone où l'on parle le plus français ?
Quels sont ceux où l'on parle moins le français ?

Quel est le journal français le plus crédible en France ?
Quelle langue ressemble le plus au français ?
Pourquoi les hommes en France sont-ils si beaux ?
La France a-t-elle encore son mot à dire sur l'Algérie ?
La plupart des Marocains peuvent-ils parler français ?

Wonders of the Past: "The Triumph of Bacchus"

Posted by Alice G. Mar 13

Considered to be one of the most beautiful Roman mosaics in the world, from the ancient city of Sétif (in modern-day Algeria). 3rd century CE, now on display at the Sétif Archaeological Museum.

Other mosaics of Bacchus, 3rd/4th century CE (Archaeological Museum of Cherchell ~ Algeria)

Pourquoi l'Algérie retire-t-elle son accréditation à la chaîne d'informations France 24 ?

Samir سمير Farid فريد

Anciennement Fonctionnaire 9 mo

j'ai aussi supprimé cette chaîne de ma télé, sa ligne éditoriale est écœurante: tout musulman est islamiste, tout islamiste est terroriste, tout anti-homosexualité est homophobe, tout anti-sioniste est antisémite, tout anti-genre est sexiste, et tout anti-spidermen est arachnophobe.

Bref, vaut mieux l'éviter que de prendre des anti-migraines après.

Réponse similaire
Pourquoi l'Algérie n'a-t-elle jamais été libre ?

Jean-Marie Gouarné Mis à jour le 26 juil. 2020

La création de l'Algérie dans sa configuration actuelle, en tant que nation, est le résultat de l'abolition de la Régence d'Alger en 1830, puis de l'unification politique des territoires situés entre Tunisie et Maroc dans les décennies suivantes. Or tous ces changements ont été imposés par un envahisseur étranger, la France, et non par une révolution locale.
Il ne faut évidemment pas négliger les royaumes berbères de l'Antiquité et du Moyen-Âge, ni le prodigieux développement de la civilisation dans tout le Maghreb lorsque la région s'est intégrée à la culture et à l'économie du monde méditerranéen (Proche-Orient, Grèce, Rome). Mais il ne s'agissait pas encore d'Algérie.

Il y a bien eu une expérience d'État national indépendant et vraiment algérien, de 1832 à 1847, sous le règne de l'émir Abdelkader. Cet État éphémère, premier prototype de l'Algérie moderne, tout en luttant contre la conquête française, a préparé le chemin à l'unité nationale, que les Français ont ensuite consolidée (jusqu'à ce qu'elle se retourne contre eux), et que le FLN a réussi à préserver après l'indépendance. L'État d'Abdelkader, durant sa brève existence, était indiscutablement indépendant. Mais l'Algérie d'Abdelkader était-elle plus "libre" que les zones occupées par les Français ? Cela se discute, sachant que cet État indépendant, s'il représentait un véritable progrès par rapport au despotisme anarchique des chefs de clans, et même si l'émir était une des meilleures "têtes pensantes" de la planète, était tout de même un émirat classique de son temps avec tout ce que cela impliquait (dictature, théocratie, esclavage, subordination des femmes, pratiques de "guerre totale" contre les tribus insoumises, etc).
Détail intéressant, l'émir était déjà, tout comme les dirigeants actuels du FLN, un apôtre de l'arabisation allant jusqu'à se laisser considérer lui-même comme un

Arabe pour légitimer son autorité alors qu'il était évidemment berbère comme la plupart des Algériens, ce qui revenait à admettre implicitement la dévalorisation de l'élément kabyle et la survalorisation de l'élément arabe dans l'héritage national, signe de l'influence persistante de préjugés raciaux datant du haut Moyen-Âge et peu propices à l'émancipation des peuples. Cet État, selon les normes de son temps, était réputé honorable aussi bien au Maghreb qu'en Europe, y compris pour les Français qui considéraient Abdelkader comme un vrai chef d'État (et non comme un terroriste), mais il était très éloigné de qu'on appelle liberté dans la culture ouest-européenne.

C'est pour cela que l'Algérie est née "non-libre". C'est une nation très jeune, créée par la force il y a moins de deux cents ans dans le cadre d'une opération de conquête coloniale sur un territoire qui, pendant des siècles, n'avait jamais été vraiment unifié et avait constamment subi des ingérences étrangères plus ou moins violentes. Après le départ des Français, l'Algérie, tout en restant unifiée, est devenue politiquement indépendante, donc libre sur le plan du droit international. Mais bien sûr, l'indépendance d'un pays n'est pas la même chose que la liberté de ceux qui y vivent. Il y aurait beaucoup à dire sur le manque de liberté dont souffre une grande partie du peuple algérien.

Selon un principe sociologique non démontré scientifiquement mais jamais démenti, le degré de liberté qui règne dans un pays à un moment donné est lié à l'importance de sa classe moyenne dans l'organisation sociale. C'est d'ailleurs la montée en puissance de la classe moyenne (paysannerie aisée et bourgeoisie) qui, plus que la littérature des "philosophes des Lumières", a imposé les idées de liberté en France au XVIIIème siècle. Or, en Algérie, l'importance de la classe moyenne n'est pas à la hauteur de la puissance économique et géopolitique du pays. Déjà, il est bien connu que cette classe moyenne était quasi-inexistante avant 1830 (mais cela n'avait rien d'original, car c'était le cas dans la plus grande partie du monde y compris en Europe de l'est). La classe moyenne ne s'est réellement développée que par le biais de la colonisation, et sous une forme bancale: elle était essentiellement constituée de fonctionnaires. C'est cette classe moyenne bureaucratique qui a continué à exister sans remise en question fondamentale après l'indépendance. Selon un très bon article paru en 2018 dans le numéro 36 de NAQD, "la majorité des classes moyennes en Algérie sont des classes non compétitives", ce sont "des clients de la classe-État". Et comme, par ailleurs, l'économie algérienne post-coloniale est avant tout une économie de rente (adossée principalement aux hydrocarbures) à peine déguisée en économie "socialiste", ces classes moyennes étaient "habituées à la confiscation facile des rentes en s'arrangeant donc avec le régime en place", donc dotées d'une culture et de comportements qui l'éloignaient des classes moyennes laborieuses (ouvriers qualifiés, artisans, cadres du secteur privé, petits entrepreneurs, professions libérales, etc) qui sont les piliers de la démocratie. Le passage de l'économie dite "socialiste" (mais en réalité rentière) à une économie qui se veut "de marché" à la fin du XXème siècle n'a pas arrangé les choses, car il a durement frappé (voire franchement laminé) la classe moyenne, sans parvenir à faire suffisamment décoller l'industrie pour développer une nouvelle classe moyenne, plus laborieuse. La société Algérienne reste donc plombée par une classe moyenne à la fois menacée de prolétarisation et toujours excessivement bureaucratique.

Autrement dit, l'Algérie a toujours été privée des conditions socio-économiques qui, généralement, sont porteuses de liberté au sens où nous l'entendons du côté nord de la Méditerranée.

Mais a-t-on le droit de pointer spécialement du doigt l'Algérie actuelle comme un pays non-libre ? Même si ce pays ne représente pas pour nous l'idéal de la démocratie, les Algériens font-ils vraiment partie des peuples les plus mal lotis en termes de liberté ? Nous autres Français (qui avons une réputation de donneurs de leçons parfois méritée) nous plaignons l'Algérie pour son manque de liberté comme nous le faisions pour l'Espagne à l'époque de Franco et pour toute l'Europe de l'est au temps du "rideau de fer". Mais si on comparait objectivement l'Algérie à la Chine, à la Russie, aux pays d'Asie centrale issus de la décolonisation russe, au Proche-Orient, et bien sûr à d'autres pays africains décolonisés à la même époque, bref à la moitié de la planète, on s'apercevrait peut-être que la tyrannie n'y est pas forcément pire qu'ailleurs. Le bouilllonnement des idées en Algérie ne démontre pas seulement le potentiel intellectuel du pays, il démontre aussi qu'il y a quand même suffisamment de liberté pour que des idées n'allant pas systématiquement dans le sens des intérêts de la minorité dirigeante puissent s'exprimer malgré les menaces constantes qui pèsent sur les adeptes du changement.

Le manque de liberté en Algérie est avant tout une question de perception. Pourquoi s'en inquiète-t-on en France alors que des phénomènes d'oppression clanique similaires et souvent bien pires qui se produisent ailleurs nous laissent quasiment indifférents ? Parce que nous sommes proches. Proches par le passé d'abord, car l'échec de l'accession de l'Algérie à la liberté a été en premier lieu un échec français. Proches par le présent, car une part de l'Algérie (et pas la moins dynamique) est en France ou la fréquente de près, et par conséquent s'est accoutumée aux modes de pensée européens en matière de liberté, ce qui par capillarité augmente le "ressenti" de la société française à l'égard de ce qui se passe en Algérie en matière de liberté.

Réponse similaire
L'Algérie aurait-elle pu rester française ?

Super Dupont, ancien(ne) étudiant(e) en Science et Conscience à Écoles d'ingénieurs Mis à jour le 11 janv. 2021 · A reçu un vote positif de Kevin Loussert , lieu : France et

Ernest Foucault , Doctorat Histoire & Sciences Politiques, Institut d'Études Politiques de Paris (1973)

Mon coeur, à moitié pied-noir, a envie de hurler "bien sûr" en réponse à cette question. Mais si j'utilise plutôt mon cerveau, je vais donner une réponse nuancée. Ni oui, ni non.

D'un point de vue historique, oui, l'Algérie aurait pu rester française - ou autre chose aussi, d'ailleurs. A travers l'histoire, cette zone a quasiment tout le temps subi une domination étrangère - arabe, marocaine, ottomane, française, et on pourrait même remonter à plus loin, avec Rome et Carthage. L'Algérie en tant que nation est une fiction.

D'un point de vue militaire, oui, l'armée française avait gagné la guerre d'Algérie. Le FLN exsangue en 1960 ne doit sa survie qu'à la concession de De Gaulle.

D'un point de vue géopolitique, probablement pas. Le centre de gravité de la France se trouve depuis un millénaire au nord de la Loire, ses enjeux - économiques, territoriaux, diplomatiques - sont avant tout européens. Maintenir l'Algérie française aurait fait basculer ce centre de gravité sur la Méditerranée. A l'époque, la France n'était pas taillée pour cela, n'aurait pas su gérer la complexité et les priorités concurrentes pour jouer sur ces deux tableaux. C'est d'ailleurs moins vrai aujourd'hui. Avec l'ampleur et l'efficacité que l'Union Européenne a maintenant atteint (oui, j'ai bien dit "efficacité", messieurs les eurosceptiques), au XXIème siècle, arrimer l'ensemble du pourtour méditerranéen à l'UE est une étape naturelle d'un point de vue géopolitique. Mais seulement géopolitique et économique, sur d'autres aspects cela pose des difficultés que je vais évoquer ci-dessous.

D'un point de vue économique, oui, maintenir l'Algérie Française était non seulement possible, mais aurait même abouti à une formidable réussite des deux côtés. Cela aurait fourni un relais de croissance dans les années 70–80, grâce à la réserve de croissance de la population algérienne et aux hydrocarbures, cela aurait grandement réduit les problèmes économiques (donc sociaux) de l'Algérie dans les années 90, et aurait entraîné des délocalisations internes, du nord au sud de la Méditerranée, au lieu d'envoyer toute notre industrie en Chine. Dans ce scénario alternatif, c'est le Maghreb qui devient le principal atelier de l'Europe.

Pib par habitant, Algérie, 1970–2020, USD constant (base 2010)

Pib par habitant, France, 1970–2020, USD constant (base 2010)

Le point de vue démographique est probablement l'aspect décisif. Analysons d'un point de vue purement numérique: si l'Algérie Française avait maintenu la même natalité débridée et anarchique que l'Algérie indépendante a connu, alors clairement non, la situation serait vite devenu intenable, car déséquilibrée et dans un cercle vicieux conflictuel entre algériens et métropolitains. En 1960, il y a plus de 4,5 métropolitains pour un algérien (46m / 10m d'habitants). En 2020, c'est 3 pour 2. Impossible d'imaginer une Algérie Française dans de telles conditions ; au mieux, c'est la France qui devient Algérienne.

Mais dans une Algérie Française, une politique démographique volontaire aurait pu accélérer la transition démographique, et maintenir ce ratio en dessous de 1 algérien pour 3 métropolitains. Cela aurait assuré la stabilité des politiques éducatives et économiques, et grandement amélioré la richesse par habitant de l'Algérie. Moins de jeunes, avec plus de diplômes, et plus de travail.

Les autres aspects, politiques et culturels, sont alors essentiellement des conséquences de la résolution ou non de ce problème démographique. D'un point de vue politique, l'Algérie se porterait bien mieux aujourd'hui sans cette clique mafieuse issue du FLN qui a mis le pays en coupe réglée depuis 60 ans. Au sein de la France, elle aurait bénéficié d'une technocratie efficace et bien moins corrompue, d'instances de contrôle, de partis politiques d'alternance.

Le problème culturel était en principe le plus simple à résoudre. Comme la nation algérienne n'existait pas, il suffisait de reconnaître des tribus comme autant de communautés, une langue officielle (le français) avec plusieurs langues secondaires reconnues, arabes (darija, hassanya, voire judéo-arabe), berbères (kabyle, chaoui, et sans doute 2 ou 3 autres), peut-être aussi l'espagnol et le pataouete. De même, une structuration pragmatique d'un islam local sous supervision étatique aurait évité bien des problèmes ultérieurs. Enfin, un chemin basé sur l'éducation et une forme d'assimilation aurait offert aux indigènes, individuellement, la possibilité d'accéder à des droits comparables à ceux des Français, plus ou moins vite en fonction de leurs capacités et de leur bonne volonté. Tout cela ne sort pas de mon imagination fertile, au contraire cela s'inscrit dans la continuité de l'administration de ce territoire au cours des siècles. En particulier, c'est exactement le modèle des califats arabes.

Tatouage berbère: le tatouage est absolument interdit dans l'Islam, mais la tradition est restée bien ancrée dans les populations berbères du Maroc et de l'Algérie - jusqu'à sa mise en cause récente par les courants islamistes importés au XXeme siècle

Malheureusement, la réalité tranchait à l'opposé de ces principes d'intégration culturelle. La France des années 50 et 60 baignait encore dans son idéal jacobin centralisateur, donc hors de question de reconnaître de multiples langues et communautés. La séparation de l'Église et de l'État de 1905 rendait inimaginable un arrangement qui mette sous contrôle étatique la religion locale. Enfin, le racisme bien ancré des colons européens a saboté presque toutes les initiatives qui visaient à améliorer le sort des indigènes. Peut-être que l'Algérie aurait pu rester française, mais certainement la France de l'époque n'aurait pas su se l'approprier.

Voilà pourquoi je regrette mais je comprends la décision de De Gaulle de donner son indépendance à l'Algérie. Ces arguments pragmatiques l'ont amené à considérer que l'Algérie ne pouvait rester française.

Pourquoi l'Algérie est-elle toujours en colère après les propos d'Emmanuel Macron ?

Louis Gabriel philosophe-linguiste-historien amateur 5 oct.

Peut-être parce que la vérité fait mal. Et surtout qu'en Algérie rien de mieux qu'une petite colère contre la France pour détourner les regards de l'incompétence du gouvernement. Une colère contre le Maroc, ça marche aussi mais rien de mieux que ces perfides colonisateurs
Cependant, ce n'était pas au président de la république de tenir ce discours. Son rôle est de veiller à ce que la diplomatie puisse se faire dans le calme et la sérénité. Mais là aussi, on peut imaginer quelques arrières-pensées

Laurent De Coudenhove Compositeur et Organiste - Universalité du Temps libre Répondu 5 oct.

Ce n'est pas d'expliciter un fait qui disculpe.

La déclaration des droits de l'Homme et du Citoyen, votre Loi, a été bafouée, de un en envahissant un autre pays, alors que nous sommes protecteurs et pacificateurs, de deux, en aliénant une population conquise sous l'indigénat de trois, en refusant la voie légale de l'autodétermination des peuples, à majorité confondante, de fermer les yeux sur ce péril que la vie de l'indigénat pour tout peuple conquis, nous l'avons subi à moindre mesure, les allemands n'en ayant que contre une minorité, minorité qui si se révolte, entre en guerre contre le pays le plus industrialisé en armement et en équipement

La guerre d'Algérie a duré combien d'années au nom du drapeau Français, figure de proue du batîment Amiral France, à Liberté tu m'auras, à necéssité fait Loi, car nul n'est au dessus de la Loi de la France, la déclaration des Droits de l'Homme et du Citoyen. Mais bien mal acquis ne profite.

Maintenant qu'il doive des remboursements financiers, fallait pas attendre.

Nous avons consquis la France au nom de la France, en invitant les travailleurs nécessaires à l'investissement de la France. Nous libérer des contraintes de métiers (que nous avons des bras et des jambes pour faire) (mais un temps que nous pouvons occuper à nous investir en seconde couche, la couche qui tape de ses doigts.

Parce que nous avons quelque chose à dire et là le premier piège. Tout le monde a des bras, tous le monde a des jambes, tous le monde a des cerveaux, tout le monde a des envies.

Nous avons perdu les cadences infernales à 39 h à 35 h est un soulagement pour 4 heure de ceux qui travaillent 8 heures par jour à la pelle.

Nous avons acquis des RTT (tellement c'est pas embêtant de tenir le stylo, ranger des papiers, taper à l'ordi)

Pour ceux qui travaillent (genre à la chaine de genre, soudeur op1 ne fait que ça de la journée) ils ne sont pas des machines.

Nous avons depuis les 35 h une bonne résolution adaptable du temps de travail, où quelqu'un qui veut finir un projet le soir même en a même l'opportunité informatique #LDCUS

Les gars qui travaillent, on discute pour savoir s'il y en a de plus pénibles.#ldcus

Donc je ne vous disais pas, quoique, mais imaginez la dette que nous avons d'abord envers le pays.

Nous reconnaissons que des crimes de guerre, suite à une invasion d'un pays qui n'était pas le notre, ont été commis par la France, ce pays que je vous décrivais, est un fait.

Vous disais-je qu'avant de commencer un quelconque budget financier de dette, il faudrait commencer par Haïti , puis s'investir dans certains pays d'Afrique, en compensation d'avoir avec la complicité de l'armée, détruit tout matériel et biens construits pendant la période dans le pays.

Nous parlerons donc de devoir financier et d'investissement après, même avec l'Algérie qui m'a l'air d'un pays Libre et Fier, et qui a du lait

Mais donc vous êtes sous le coup de la loi de France, disais-je,

Nous devons faire amende honorable. Et ensuite vivre cette volonté de propulser la paix, car l'Algérie nous protègera.

C'est un peu ça le pardon

#LDCUS

#ldcus

Réponse similaire
Pourquoi l'Algérie remet-elle maintenant sur la table la question mémorielle avec la France ?

Ludovic Tiengou, a étudié à Université Rennes 2 – Haute-Bretagne Répondu 6 juil. 2021

Ma foi c'est une bonne vieille tactique politique

Pour masquer vos emmerdes il vous faut un bouc émissaire à blamer. Pour le pouvoir algérien (dictature deconnecté de son peuple et assise sur une poudriere sociale), c'est donc la France le grand vilain pas beau responsable de tout les maux dont l'Algérie souffre.
Et comme en plus la politique francaise s'est totalement pris les pieds dans le tapis depuis le debut du XXIeme concernant la politique d'intégration, cela fait pas mal de monde en France qui entre en caisse de resonnance. Ils pensent avoir trouver là une facon de se donner de l'importance en relayant une tactique cousue de fil blanc Bien aidé en celà par des politicards francais deconnectés des realités et plus enclin à écouter celui qui gueule tres fort que l'avis majoritaire, voilà pourquoi ce début stérile revient encore et toujours sur le tapis.

La France du XXIeme n'a pas à s'excuser de ce qui s'est passé dans les siècles precedents.

Ou alors il va falloir que l'Algérie s'excuse aussi des raids des pirates venu d'Alger et qui ont ravagés les cotes du sud de la France à la recherche d'esclaves. Mais aussi qu'elle s'excuse des attentats aveugles du FLN qui ont tués des tas d'innocents francais (oui les algeriens sont citoyens francais à l'époque avec trois députés).

Donc avant de hurler à la repetance il faudrait peut etre que le pouvoir algérien et ceux qui hurlent à ses cotés regardent un petit peu leur propre Histoire. Juste pour s'assurer qu'ils n'ont pas, eux aussi, quelques belles casserolles à se faire pardonner non?

Réponse similaire
Quel est l'intérêt de Macron de déclassifier toutes les archives sur la guerre d'Algérie ?

Frédéric Cagliari, précédent lieu : Aix-les-Bains Mis à jour le 12 sept. 2021

Parce que la transparence c'est mieux que de rester à s'envoyer des fions avec le gouvernement algérien. Il est grand temps que les historiens puissent bosser correctement, et ça coupe l'herbe sous le pied des débiles qui claironnent partout que la France a des trucs à cacher. On a trop longtemps laissé la porte ouverte aux mensonges et aux absurdités, si vous voulez aller de l'avant faut crever l'abcès.

Je prends l'exemple de Thomas Sankara, la France a fait figure d'assassin tout désigné, malgré l'indignation des responsables des services secrets de l'époque, ben depuis que les dossiers sont déclassifiés, l'enquête a rebondi au Libéria, et Compaoré est appelé à rendre des comptes, mais rien qui accable la France d'une façon ou d'une autre.

Le secret n'a jamais fait qu'alimenter les ragots, et une mémoire apaisée a besoin que tout soit mis sur la table. Je comprends pas bien les gens qui disent que c'est dans un but électoral ou pour faire diversion, d'une tout le monde s'en branle à part les éditorialistes, et de deux le taux d'abstention des quartiers est notoirement supérieur à la moyenne, donc faut vraiment être con pour espérer en faire une réserve de voix.

Bref! Critiquer quelqu'un quand il fait oeuvre de vérité c'est quand même un comble, quelques soient ses raisons ce genre d'efforts devrait toujours faire consensus et être salué, mais non... Même ça faut le critiquer!

Questions similaires

Pourquoi la chaîne France 24 est-elle prétendument hostile à l'Algérie ?
Pourquoi la chaîne France 24 est-elle persona non grata en Algérie ?

Pourquoi est-ce que le journal télévisé du 13h de TF1 du 18 février 2021 n’a pas été diffusé ?

L'Algérie aurait-elle pu rester française ?

La France est-elle tenue de remettre ses archives à l'Algérie qui les réclame ?
Comment l'Algérie pourrait-elle s'en servir ?

Pourquoi l'Algérie qualifie-t-elle la France de « faillite mémorielle » ?
Pourquoi Éric Zemmour a-t-il été mis sous surveillance par le Maroc ?

Rapport Storra : La France et l'Algérie veulent-elles vraiment se réconcilier ?

La Kabylie pourra-t-elle prospérer après son indépendance de l'Algérie?

Pourquoi l'Algérie n'a-t-elle pas encore commencé son travail mémoriel contrairement à la France ?

Pourquoi l'Algérie, qui a acquis son indépendance veut-elle faire de la France une partie de son territoire ?

Comment BFM TV est devenue la risée des chaînes d'informations ?

Pourquoi Macron passe-t-il son temps à s'excuser pour la guerre d'Algérie ? Il n'a rien d'autre à faire que de victimiser la France.

Pourquoi la guerre de l'indépendance de l'Algérie à durée pour presque 8 ans malgré que la France pouvait se retirer de l'Algérie plutôt ?

Pourquoi la France a-t-elle perdu la guerre d'Algérie ?

Should Algeria establish relations with Israel?

Michael Davison Retired Industrial Engineer and Production Manager in Israel Updated Feb 22

That would be entirely up to the Algerian government. First they would have to acknowledge that their support for attempts at mass murder and genocide have repeatedly failed and stop indoctrinating ordinary Algerians with a daily dose of Hatred for Israel.

Algeria would also have to admit to the expulsion of some 140,000 Jews and the theft of all the assets, personal and collective, of those Jews.

Mission Impossible. Have you ever heard of a thief willingly returning the stolen loot?

Related Links

Why were the French so committed to keep Algeria?

Why did France give up Algeria?

Are there anti-German feelings in Greece now (2022), as I heard from a friend? Why is that? One of the reasons I heard was the electricity prices. Is that true?

What do people in Algeria think of Israel?
Is Algeria culturally close with France?
What is it like to live in Algeria?
Why does Algeria support the polisario?
What is the relationship between Pakistan and Israel ?
Should Kabylie declare independence from Algeria?
What is the relationship between Algeria and France nowadays?
What are the reasons of enmity between Israel and Iran?

Why does Morocco has the best relationship to Israel unlike any other major Muslim country (specially Algeria)?

What do you know about Algeria?
Who are the allies and enemies of Algeria?
What is the relationship like between Vietnam and Algeria?

De votre selection
Pourquoi la France a-t-elle colonisé l'Algérie?

Anis Étudiant 2 ans

Réponse originale : Pourquoi la France a-t-elle colonisé l'Algérie ? Bonsoir, Malgré la présence de réponses, j'ai décidé de répondre à cette question ET au meme temps, défaire quelque mythes qui persistent de nos jours ;

I-Pourquoi la France a elle coloniser l'Algérie ?

C'est simple, Charle X cherchait à augmenter la popularité parmis les Français mais aussi d'en finir avec l'influence Algérienne dans l'ouest méditerranéen. L'Algérie, ou devrai-je plutôt dire la Régence d'Alger (El-Djazair), a cette époque n'était plus aussi puissante qu'elle fût au 17éme et 16éme siècle mais malgrés cela, continuait à percevoir le paiement de tribut annuel que lui devait de nombreux pays (Régence de Tunis, Republique de Genes et de Naples , Suéde, le Denmark- Norvége , l'Espagne et Le royaume de Fez). Le coup d'éventail donné par le Sultan-Dey Algérien , Hussein ibn Hussein, connu sous le nom de Hussein Dey a donné a Charles X un casus belli afin d'accomplir ces ambitions.

Je tiens a préciser que la colonisation de l'Algérie ne s'est pas fait afin de "liberer des esclaves de la cote barbaresque" ceci est TOTALEMENT faux et inventé de la part des historiens de guerre Français afin de donner de la légitimité à leur invasion.

D'après l'historien Habert Michel dans son livre intitulé "Histoire d'un parjure" affirme que :

La « sainte et glorieuse croisade» de 1830 devait, disait-on, débarrasser l'Europe et la Chrétienté d'un nid de pirates et d'esclavagistes. On le dit encore : les mythes sont tenaces. Quand la royale armada fit voile pour Alger, les raïs algériens avaient, depuis des années, amarré leurs chebeks. Quant aux esclaves chrétiens, il ne restait dans les bagnes d'Alger qu'une centaine de prisonniers de guerre, des Grecs de la guerre de Morée pour la plupart.

II-Pourquoi le coup de l'éventail ?

La France avait acheté beaucoup de blé de la part de deux marchands Juifs d'Alger : M. Bacri et Boushnak, ces marchands eux mêmes avaient des dettes envers le Sultan. On lui a expliqué que si la France ne payer pas ces dettes, les marchands non plus. Le Sultan a tenter de negocier, en vain, avec Pierre Deval le consul général de la France à Alger et le soupçon de collaborer avec les marchands, alors durant une réunion le 29 avril 1827, le Dey frappa Deval avec un chasse-mouches.

Ce qui a déclenché le siège d'Alger, de 1827 à 1830 jusqu'au débarquement de Sidi Frudj.

Voici l'explication la plus fidèle avec les faits historiques. Bonne soirée.

Pourquoi les mémoires de la guerre d'Algérie semblent-elles toujours irréconciliables ?

Yapluki Yapluki dim.

A l'époque, l'Algérie était un pays de type Européen, avec des écoles, des administrations, des transports en commun, et des campagnes. Économie florissante en pleine expansion.
Du jour au lendemain, ces populations civiles et pacifiques se sont retrouvées face à une escalade de massacres, bombes d'un côté, militaires de l'autre, puis découpage façon sushi de métropolitains contre exécutions sommaires de locaux… de quoi faire des traumatismes pour au moins une génération. Puis du jour au lendemain, une bonne partie de la population est rapatriée en France. Ils étaient en Algérie depuis plusieurs générations, c'était souvent des gens aisés, avec des terres, des ouvriers, des commerces…, ils se retrouvent sans rien avec une valise dans un pays, la France, qu'ils ne connaissaient pas. Beaucoup de leurs anciens amis locaux se sont fait massacrer façon boucher car considérés comme collabos. Voila pour le contexte tel que transmis par quelques vieux des deux camps.

Petite anecdote vue dans le sud de la France récemment. Un très vieux monsieur, en bordure du marché dominical, vend quelques fruits et légumes. Il est venu d'assez loin à vélo, avec une petite remorque. Une dame qui semble être habituée lui achète quelques tomates et une salade. La croisant je lui demande si ce monsieur a de bons produits. Elle m'explique que ces produits sont corrects, mais qu'elle lui achète toujours un petit quelque chose parce qu'à plus de 90 ans il n'a pas de revenus décents. C'est un Harki : algériens pro-français lors de la guerre d'Algérie. La France en a rapatrié quelques-uns à la fin de la guerre, les autres ont été massacrés et leurs familles mises au ban. Mais ceux qui sont arrivés en France, n'ont jamais vraiment été pris en charge, aucun droit, parcage dans des camps…. C'était plutôt ceux que l'on cachait sous le tapis. Maintenant ils sont presque tous morts de vieillesse, donc plus de problème de conscience. Mais celui là à plus de 90 ans se débattait toujours. Son bout de terrain, son vélo, sa vie lui convenait et un énorme sourire quand je lui ai pris quelques tomates. Le dimanche suivant, j'ai préparé un sac de vieux vêtements de mon père et je lui ai donné. Je ne savais pas si j'allais le vexer, mais vu ses ses vieilles loques, il devait en avoir besoin. Finalement il m'a chaleureusement remercié. J'avais donc découvert quelques détails sur cette guerre d'Algérie dont finalement je ne connaissais pas grand-chose.

Quelques semaines plus tard, le vieux monsieur n'était plus là. J'ai croisé une habituée et lui demandais des nouvelles… vu son âge. Elle me disait qu'il allait bien mais que les nouveaux surveillants du marché, l'avaient viré assez malproprement et avaient jeté sa marchandise son vélo et sa remorque. Il n'avait pas le droit d'être là, il faut payer la taxe. Sans vélo, il ne pouvait plus venir. D'autre habitués passant par là, la discussion s'anime. Ce que j'en ai retenu, c'est que deux vigiles algériens avaient virés à coup de pompes un vieux de 90 ans parce qu'il était harki. Ces vigiles sont les petits enfants des gens qui ont combattu en Algérie pour obtenir leur indépendance. Nés en France, passés par l'école française, mais chez eux, on leur enseigne toujours que les harkis, même très vieux, sont des traîtres.

Les français ont oublié beaucoup de choses sur la guerre d'Algérie. Il reste quelques vieux pieds-noirs traumatisés. Certains ont encore le souvenir d'un discours du président algérien d'après indépendance : "Nous conquérons l'Europe avec le ventre de nos femmes". Maintenant que les acteurs de l'époque sont presque tous morts, des politiciens ressortent cette vieille histoire totalement hors contexte pour certainement en tirer un bénéfice. Je me demandais pourquoi, je crois que je commence à comprendre, les français ont oublié, mais pas les algériens, et maintenant, ils représentent un électorat conséquent.

Réponse similaire

Est-ce qu'une guerre Maroc Algérie entraînerait des conflits entre Marocains et Algériens en France ?

Hamid Sam, Pacifiste Répondu 26 août 2021

Pas du tout. Bon du moins, c'est ce que je pense.
Il y'a une différence entre notre origine, c'est-à-dire le lieu auquel on appartient indirectement(à cause de nos parents où nos ancêtres) et le lieu dont on est familier parceque c'est le lieu ou l'on est né et ou l'on a grandit. C'est également le lieu où on a la nationalité (un élément qui est très important).

Maintenant pour revenir à la question, on ne va quand même pas se quereller pour des choses qui se passent à des milliers de kilomètres de nous. Ce serait de l'absurdité si c'était le cas. Bien au contraire, on s'asseirait autour d'un pot afin de discuter paisiblement des guerres qui hantent nos pays d'origine.

On discutera sur les causes de la guerre, ses conséquences, les belligérants…

Une guerre entre deux États n'est pas une guerre entre deux peuples. Les États font leur guerre pendant que les peuples vivent en harmonie.

Questions similaires

Pourquoi Abdelmoumen(calife des Almohades) est-il revendiqué comme Marocain par les Marocains, alors qu'il venait d'une tribu localisée en Algérie actuelle ?

Finalement, si l’Algérie était restée française, la France ne serait-elle pas devenu un pays à majorité musulmane ? De manière générale, à quoi ressemblerait la France aujourd'hui si l’Algérie était restée française ?

Pourquoi on demande tout le temps à la France de s'excuser envers l'Algérie pour les morts de la Guerre d'Algérie et pas à l'Algérie de s'excuser pour les actes du FLN durant la même période ?

Pourquoi les 350 000 Algériens qui vivaient en France (métropolitaine) en 1962 ne sont-ils pas repartis pour l'Algérie quand elle est devenue indépendante ?

Pourquoi un bon pourcentage des Algériens nés avant l’indépendance (1962) disent que « l'Algérie était beaucoup plus heureuse et prospère du temps de la colonisation française »?

De nombreux témoignages font état de corps mutilés (émasculation) de soldats français tombés face au FLN durant la guerre d'Algérie. A-t-on pu établir si ces mutilations étaient perpétrées ante ou post-mortem ?

Pourquoi la France a-t-elle perdu la guerre d'Algérie alors qu'elle a tué beaucoup plus d'Algériens qu'elle n'a subi de pertes ? (Question traduite)

Pourquoi la France ne s'est pas encore excusée pour ses crimes durant la guerre d'Algérie?

La France est-elle tenue de remettre ses archives à l'Algérie qui les réclame ? Comment l'Algérie pourrait-elle s'en servir ?

Pourquoi l'Arabie saoudite est-elle incapable de gagner la guerre au Yémen, malgré toutes

Why are the Presidents of Algeria and Tunisia white?

Anis Lives in Earth (1999–present) 3y

Hey.

Algeria and Tunsia are predominantly of Amazigh ethnicity, The Amazigh people have lived on the mediterranean cost for thousands and thousands of years and therefor resemble other people of the MENA region.

Skin colour map (indigenous people). The twin role played by the skin – protection from excessive UV radiation and absorption of enough sunlight to trigger the production of vitamin D – means that people living in the lower latitudes, close to the Equator, with intense UV radiation, have developed darker skin to protect them from the damaging effects of UV radiation. In contrast, those living in the higher latitudes, closer to the Poles, have developed fair skin to maximize vitamin D production.

Sources	Chaplin G. , Geographic Distribution of Environmental Factors Influencing Human Skin Coloration, American Journal of Physical Anthropology 125:292–302, 2004; map updated in 2007.
Link to web-site	http://www.vitalgraphics.net/ozone/

There more south you go , the darker the skin.

This is an Algerian :

(Our prime minister)

And this is also an Algerian

(A man somewhere near Biskra)

And these beautiful woman are also Algerian

(Woman of Tamenrasset)

Please do not call us Arabs , we dont take is an insult , but are proud of our ancestors.

Réponse similaire
Pourquoi la France n'a-t-elle pas gardé un morceau d'Algérie et d'Indochine après l'indépendance ? Comme l'Espagne au Maroc avec Ceuta et Melilla.

Patrice Delgado, programmeur informatique Répondu 15 mai 2020

Réponse originale : Pourquoi la France n'a pas gardé un bout de l'Algerie et de l'Indochine après l'indépendance ? Comme l'Espagne au Maroc avec Ceuta et Melilla Peut-être parce que les français n'étaient en Indochine ou au maghreb que depuis 1832 pour l'Algérie. Bien plus tard pour les autres pays.

Peut être aussi parce que les villes gardées par l'Espagne, en plus de n'être qu'à quelques kilomètres de l'Espagne, étaient espagnoles depuis peu après la fin de la "reconquista", avec une population espagnole.

Questions similaires

Est-il possible de réconcilier la France et l'Algérie?

Un Algérien d'un certain âge m'a montré la carte d'identité Française qu'il possédait en 1962, juste avant l'indépendance. Il y était noté "Français musulman". Y avait-il bien un système d'apartheid à l'époque de l'Algérie Française ?

Pourquoi les pieds-noirs étaient en danger en Algérie, alors qu'ils étaient assez nombreux (10% de la population totale), et avaient le support de la France ? Ne pouvaient-ils pas se constituer un état indépendant au sein de l'Algérie ?

Pourquoi l'Algérie ne s'excuse-t-elle pas auprès de la France pour sa tentative ratée de colonisation? Que se serait-il passé si les Sarrasins n'avaient pas été arrêtés à Poitiers?

Quelle est la différence entre la France des années 70 et la France d'aujourd'hui ?

Pourquoi les 350 000 Algériens qui vivaient en France (métropolitaine) en 1962 ne sont-ils pas repartis pour l'Algérie quand elle est devenue indépendante ?

Pourquoi la France ne s'excuse-t-elle pas une bonne fois pour toutes pour la colonisation vis à vis de l'Algérie ?

Avant la colonisation française en 1830, l'Algérie (ou les territoires qui la formaient) avait-elle déjà été longuement sous domination étrangère ?

Et si la France d'aujourd'hui était amenée en l'an 117 (à l'apogée de l'Empire romain), pourrait-elle conquérir le monde ? Qu'est-ce qui se passerait ?

Pourquoi on demande tout le temps à la France de s'excuser envers l'Algérie pour les morts de la Guerre d'Algérie et pas à l'Algérie de s'excuser pour les actes du FLN durant la même période ?

Pourquoi la France a-t-elle perdu la guerre d'Algérie alors qu'elle a tué beaucoup plus d'Algériens qu'elle n'a subi de pertes ? (Question traduite)

Qu'est-ce qui a changé entre la France des années 70 et la France d'aujourd'hui ?

Pourquoi la France a-t-elle perdu la guerre d'Algérie ?

Pourquoi un bon pourcentage des Algériens nés avant l'indépendance (1962) disent que « l'Algérie était beaucoup plus heureuse et prospère du temps de la colonisation française »?

Est-ce qu'il est vrai que lors de la colonisation de l'Algérie, les Français ont voulu naturaliser les Kabyles, les envoyer vers la métropole, et les traiter comme les Français de souche vu leurs phénotypes européens ?

Les Grecs ont-ils vraiment souhaité en 1860, après le massacre de Damas, que l'émir Abdelkader soit nommé roi de la Grèce ?

Nomikos Sakis · Suivre Histoire, langues, linguistique Mis à jour le 1 an Il n'y a rien qui puisse affirmer cela.

Maintenant, dans le contexte de l'époque, il faut savoir que la dynastie régnante, celle de Wittelsbach, incarnée Othon de Bavière, était assez détestée, notamment leur roi ...

D'ailleurs, ce monarque aura finalement été obligé de céder le trône de Grèce, vers 1862 pour voir ensuite apparaître une monarchie constitutionnelle incarnée par une dynastie en provenance du Danemark.

Dans un tel contexte de troubles, il était sûrement facile pour certains de dire par exemple :

"Ah si seulement ça pouvait être quelqu'un comme Abdelkader notre prochain roi".

Ou alors du style: "Ça c'est le genre de leader dont la Grèce a besoin !"

On peut tout à fait supposer qu'ils aient pu dire cela ...

Possible qu'il y ait eu quelques voix disant qu'ils auraient voulu avoir quelqu'un de la même trempe que l'émir plutôt qu'un vieux despote bavarois cloîtré dans ses propriétés et à la tête d'une monarchie absolue...

Et cette deuxième moitié du 19e siècle était propice à de tels rumeurs,… mais que ces bruits aient pu faire circuler le désir de faire d'Abdelkader le prochain roi de Grèce, probablement pas..

Trente années d'indépendance vis-à-vis de l'empire ottoman et vouloir faire revenir un souverain musulman à la tête du pays, je ne crois pas que ça aurait été ce genre de désir partagé.

Surtout que durant la guerre d'indépendance grecque, les insurgés chrétiens n'avaient pas seulement à faire aux forces ottomanes et à leurs alliés albanais musulmans, mais aussi aux forces égyptiennes de Mehmet Ali et son fils Ibrahim Pacha...

Et parmi ces troupes, il y avait aussi des barbaresques tunisiens et algériens à leur service.

Les Algériens étaient parmi ceux qui avaient forcé le débarquement des forces d'Ibrahim à Navarin (1825) pour ensuite exécuter une invasion du Péloponnèse, planifiée à la demande du Sultan Ottoman, en échange de territoires grecs à gouverner, tel que des îles… notamment la Crète.

Pensez-vous que la France et l'Algérie pourraient un jour se réconcilier émotionnellement ? Que doit faire chaque partie pour y arriver ?

Mathieu Dutour Sikiric A travaillé à École Normale Supérieure Mis à jour le 9 oct.

Réponse originale : Pensez-vous que la France et l'Algérie pourraient un jour se réconcilier émotionnellement ?

Non. Ce qu'il faut comprendre c'est qu'il y a eu une guerre d'Algérie parce qu'il y avait beaucoup d'amour et de respects entre les deux peuples. Mais l'islam les séparaient. Si la colonisation avait totalement échoué alors il n'y aurait pas eu besoin de faire une guerre d'Algérie pour décoloniser. C'est parce qu'il y avait cet amour qu'il y a eu une guerre.

Car comme tous les amoureux vous le dirons, l'amour peut se transformer en haine assez facilement. Le passage à l'indifference, c'est pour après. Et après l'indifférence, il peut y avoir peut être une "réconciliation émotionnelle" comme vous dites.

L'Algérie en est encore au stade de la haine. La France est passée par là, on comprend ce qui se passe. Les nations se construisent par la haine. Et vu comment les choses sont parties, beaucoup d'eau passera sous les ponts avant la réconciliation. Précision pour les sceptiques: La haine de la France fait parti de l'hymne national algérien et est mentionné à tout bout de champs dans le débat public.

Questions similaires

Finalement, si l'Algérie était restée française, la France ne serait-elle pas devenu un pays à majorité musulmane ? De manière générale, à quoi ressemblerait la France aujourd'hui si l'Algérie était restée française ?

Pourquoi on demande tout le temps à la France de s'excuser envers l'Algérie pour les morts de la Guerre d'Algérie et pas à l'Algérie de s'excuser pour les actes du FLN durant la même période ?

Pourquoi il n'y a qu'avec l'Algérie que les relations sont souvent tendues alors que la France a occupé d'autres pays ?

Pourquoi les 350 000 Algériens qui vivaient en France (métropolitaine) en 1962 ne sont-ils pas repartis pour l'Algérie quand elle est devenue indépendante ?

Quel est le problème profond que l'Algérie a avec la France ?

La France est-elle tenue de remettre ses archives à l'Algérie qui les réclame ? Comment l'Algérie pourrait-elle s'en servir ?

Pourquoi un bon pourcentage des Algériens nés avant l'indépendance (1962) disent que « l'Algérie était beaucoup plus heureuse et prospère du temps de la colonisation française »?

Quelles personnes en France n'ont toujours pas digéré l'indépendance de l'Algérie ?

Pourquoi la France ne s'excuse-t-elle pas une bonne fois pour toutes pour la colonisation vis à vis de l'Algérie ?

Avec une volonté commune, la France et Algérie pourraient-elles se réconcilier ?

Pourquoi l'Algérie, qui a acquis son indépendance veut-elle faire de la France une partie de son territoire ?

Pourquoi la France a-t-elle perdu la guerre d'Algérie alors qu'elle a tué beaucoup plus d'Algériens qu'elle n'a subi de pertes ? (Question traduite)

Pensez-vous comme certains ont pu le dire que "l'Algérie n'était pas une nation, seule la France a fait du pays une nation" ?

Pourquoi certains Algériens font n'importe quoi en France ?

Pourquoi les Algériens qui sont hyper nationalistes quand ils sont en France ne peuvent pas s'arrêter de pleurer quand on leur dit qu'ils vont retourner dans leur beau pays ?

Pourquoi les Français ne reconnaissent-ils pas le génocide algérien ?

Naos · Suivre ven.

Un génocide est une extermination de masse dans le but de faire disparaitre une population on parle aussi l'ethnocide. Il faudrait que les faits soient établis par des preuves matérielles. Y a t'il eut des chambres à gaz ? ou sont les corps ? Et surtout que la population victime de génocide diminue, comme en Amérique du Nord.

J'ai lu un article de l'historien Mostafa Lacheraf qui parle de 6 millions (Curieux ce chiffre ?) d'Algériens exterminés entre 1830 et 1962. Un autre auteur sur Mediapart compare le génocide (?) Algérien de 30 à 58% (quel est le bon chiffre ?) de la population, avec le génocide Nazi, contre les juifs, en annonçant 5,1 millions (?) juifs tués sur une population de 11 millions (?). (Alors que l'institut de la mémoire juive de Pologne parle de 2 830 000 juifs tués en Pologne et Ukraine par les Nazis et les Bolcheviques entre 1941 et 1945). Un autre article qui annonce un chiffre de 70 000 morts (?) pour le massacre de Sétif en 1945. Ces chiffres sont balancés comme cela, sans documents matériels vérifiables ! Les historiens Français n'arrivent pas à avoir accès aux archives Algériennes… Pourquoi ?

Comment les Français musulmans, ont-ils put devenir indépendant, s'ils avaient été exterminés ?

Questions similaires

Pourquoi les Algériens, au moins ceux en France, parlent si bien le français ?
Pourquoi les Français d'origine étrangère ne sont-ils pas plus fiers d'être Français ?
Pourquoi la France ne reconnaît-elle pas les massacres commis contre le peuple algérien?
Est-ce que les Algériens peuvent tous lire le français ?
Pourquoi autant de polémique sur les Algériens ?
Pourquoi les algériens sont-ils si nationalistes ?
Pourquoi les Français et les Belges ne s'aiment-ils pas ?

Pourquoi les Marocains ne supportent pas les Algériens, qui ont pourtant une culture similaire ?

Pourquoi les Français sont surtout plus racistes vers les Algériens ?
Pourquoi les Français ne sont-ils pas intéressés à immigrer aux Etats-Unis ?
Pourquoi les Français de façon générale ne sont pas très patriotes ?
Que pensent les Algériens des Français ?
Pourquoi les français ne semblent pas aimer la France ?
Pourquoi certains Marocains n'aiment-ils pas les Algériens?
Pourquoi Hitler détestait-il les Français ?

Brian Gogarty
De 1914 à 1918, la France a envoyé au front 500 000 soldats des colonies, 165 000 d'Afrique de l'Ouest, 18 000 d'Afrique équatoriale, 172 000 Algériens, 100 000 Tunisiens et Marocains et 40 000 Malgaches. Quel a été leur rôle dans la victoire ?

Suivre Étudiant en Histoire 1 an Question intéressante puisqu'on a souvent tendance à oublier le rôle des troupes coloniales pendant la Première Guerre mondiale. Mais avant d'entrer dans le vif du sujet, précisons un peu le contexte.

(Les soldats des colonies sont généralement oubliés lorsqu'on pense à cette guerre, pourtant ils ont bien combattu.)

Contexte

Comme on le sait, en 1914 presque tout le continent africain était aux mains des pays européens, principalement la France et le Royaume-Uni.

Les troupes coloniales existaient déjà depuis longtemps mais seulement dans les colonies, leur rôle était de défendre et d'étendre les empires coloniaux européens. En revanche, on hésitait beaucoup à les engager dans une guerre européenne.

Cependant, à partir de 1910, le général français Charles Mangin a beaucoup plaidé pour exploiter les troupes africaines afin de compléter les effectifs de l'armée française en cas de guerre en Europe. Et il a su convaincre nombre de ses collègues.

(Charles Mangin, le partisan d'une armée africaine, qu'il appelait la "Force noire".)

D'où venaient ces soldats ?

Dès le début de la Première Guerre mondiale en 1914, la France a dû mobiliser toutes ses ressources disponibles pour combattre dans cette guerre totale. Politiciens et généraux français se sont alors résolus à envoyer leurs troupes coloniales se battre en France.

Dans les colonies, les Français recrutaient de préférence des soldats au sein de groupes ethniques réputés pour leur combativité. En Afrique du Nord, ils enrôlaient des tirailleurs parmi les Berbères et les Arabes algériens, marocains et tunisiens.

(Des soldats nord-africains)

En Afrique de l'Ouest, ils recrutaient des tirailleurs sénégalais, qui avaient une excellente réputation. Petite précision : malgré leur nom, les tirailleurs sénégalais n'étaient pas tous sénégalais, ils venaient en fait de toutes les colonies françaises d'Afrique de l'Ouest.

Toutes ces troupes coloniales étaient composées d'hommes engagés volontairement ou enrôlés de force parmi la population locale et placés sous le commandement d'officiers français. Beaucoup ont été engagés de force, ce qui a d'ailleurs causé des révoltes qui ont été violemment réprimées par l'armée.

Ont-ils bien combattu ?

Les soldats des colonies ont participé à toutes les grandes batailles en France : la Marne, Verdun, la Somme, le Chemin des Dames, la défense de Reims, l'offensive des cents jours… et ce sous des climats auxquels ils n'étaient pas forcément habitués, ce qui était encore plus difficile pour eux.

Mais dans l'ensemble, ces troupes coloniales se sont très bien battues, ce qui a été d'ailleurs remarqué par l'état-major français. Elles jouissaient en général de très bons états de service.

(Les soldats coloniaux se sont souvent distingués au combat.)

Pas de la "chair à canon"

Au passage, je tiens à briser une idée reçue : contrairement à ce qu'on croit souvent, les soldats des colonies n'étaient pas de la "chair à canon".

Bien sûr, ils étaient envoyés au combat sans ménagement, mais pour autant ils n'étaient pas non plus envoyés délibérément au massacre contre les mitrailleuses ennemies. Leurs pertes ne dépassaient généralement pas celles des troupes françaises de métropole.

Ont-ils joué un grand rôle dans la victoire ?

Malgré leur bravoure régulière au combat, les troupes coloniales n'ont en réalité pas joué un rôle important dans la victoire car elles étaient relativement peu nombreuses.

Les soldats coloniaux étaient une minorité.
En effet, pendant la Première Guerre mondiale, la France a mobilisé en tout autour de 8 millions de soldats, dont environ 9 % venaient des colonies. Certes, ce n'est pas rien comme pourcentage, mais ce n'est pas non plus énorme.

Que sont-ils devenus ensuite ?

Les soldats coloniaux ont reçu des soldes et des pensions comme les soldats français, et ceux qui le méritaient ont même été décorés. Et ils ont même été les troupes les plus applaudies lors des défilés après la guerre, ils étaient très populaires auprès de la population française.

(Des troupes africaines lors du défilé de la victoire à Paris, le 14 juillet 1919.)

En revanche, le gouvernement français a refusé d'accorder la citoyenneté aux habitants de ses colonies, contrairement à ce qui avait été espéré, ce qui en a déçu plus d'un.

La guerre suivante

Pour conclure, je tiens à dire deux mots sur la Seconde Guerre mondiale.

Si les troupes coloniales ont joué un rôle relativement mineur dans l'armée française pendant la Première Guerre mondiale, en revanche ce fut très différent lors de la Seconde.

En effet, après la défaite de 1940, l'armée française reconstituée par de Gaulle était majoritairement composée des soldats des colonies, qui se sont à nouveau illustrés au combat en Afrique du Nord, en Italie, en France, et enfin en Allemagne.

(Paris, le lendemain de sa libération en août 1944. Ceci est l'une des images qui illustrent la libération de la France du joug nazi. Une libération à laquelle les troupes des colonies françaises ont bien participé.)

Sources

Mes cours universitaires d'histoire, ainsi que :
1914-1918: les "indigènes" dans la bataille
Grande Guerre : ces soldats venus des colonies
Enseigner la mémoire ?

Questions similaires

Les Français coloniaux ont beaucoup investi dans les pays d'Afrique du Nord, agrandissant les villes et des infrastructures. Pourquoi les Français n'ont-ils pas fait de même en Afrique de l'Ouest et dans leurs colonies en Afrique subsaharienne ?

Si les Français avaient continué à se battre pendant la guerre en 1940 et s’ils s’étaient repositionnés en Afrique du Nord, est-ce que les Allemands auraient pu organiser une invasion réussie de l’Afrique du Nord française ?

Le Franc CFA utilisé en Afrique de l'Ouest et en Afrique centrale est-il une monnaie d’assujettissement des anciennes colonies de la France ?

Face aux accusations fréquentes de pillages et de déstabilisations de l’Afrique dont fait l’objet la France, êtes-vous pour un retrait des troupes françaises de l’Afrique afin de laisser les Africains se débrouiller tout seul ?

Que deviendra la France si les Africains arrivèrent à se débarrasser complètement d’elle ?

La France est le plus grand prédateur en Afrique et a longtemps été vu à travers. La France n'a longtemps été qu'une puissance régionale moyenne en Europe. Pourquoi sont-ils encore si influents en Afrique ?

La France pouvait-elle continuer les combats en juin 1940 et avait-elle les moyens d'évacuer le reste de l'armée territoriale en Afrique avec la Royale et la compagnie générale transatlantique ?

Pourquoi aucun des États africains ne fut capable de contrer la colonisation ? Ils étaient en face des Européens, et pouvaient facilement en prendre note.

À quel point la France domine-t-elle encore ses anciennes colonies en Afrique de l'ouest ?

Pourquoi l'Afrique est colonisée par la France ? Et de quel droit ?

De 1914 à 1918, le Maghreb envoie 180 000 travailleurs en France pour remplacer la main-d'œuvre partie au front. 100 000 Algériens et 40 000 Marocains sont envoyés en France métropolitaine. Dans quels secteurs de l'industrie étaient-ils employés ?

Que deviendra la France sans ses colonies d'Afrique ?

La chute de la France en Afrique sera-t-elle progressive et négociée ou brutale et sanglante ?

Pourquoi la plupart des pays africains ont été colonisé par la France ?

Pourquoi la France trouve-t-elle toujours des prétextes pour s'ingérer militairement et économiquement dans ses anciennes colonies subsahariennes au mépris de la volonté des populations locales, si ce n'est que pour spolier leurs matières premi

Que reste-t-il aujourd'hui des accords d'Evian signés en 1962 entre la France et l'Algérie ?

Philippe Beaulieu Citoyen19 mars

L'Algérie indépendante !
Les accords d'Evian sont en fait huit accords entre le gouvernement français et le gouvernement provisoire algérien.

Le Premier est bien entendu un accord de cessez le feu, tous les autres sont des accords sur la passation de pouvoir entre l'administration française de l'Algérie et la nouvelle administration de l'Algérie indépendante et les rapports du nouvel état indépendant avec la France.

Question Simmilaire
Pourquoi autant de polémique sur les Algériens ?

John Mekites

Il faut differancier les algeriens de france des algeriens d'algerie. Les algeriens de france en grand nombre sont les enfants des collabo algeriens, pendant la guerre de l'independance en algerie. Les collabo algeriens come les collabo francais en 1940 c'etaient des gens de la pire espece.

Questions similaires

Est-il possible de réconcilier la France et l'Algérie?

Un Algérien d'un certain âge m'a montré la carte d'identité Française qu'il possédait en 1962, juste avant l'indépendance. Il y était noté "Français musulman". Y avait-il bien un système d'apartheid à l'époque de l'Algérie Française ?

Pourquoi les pieds-noirs étaient en danger en Algérie, alors qu'ils étaient assez nombreux (10% de la population totale), et avaient le support de la France ? Ne pouvaient-ils pas se constituer un état indépendant au sein de l'Algérie ?

Pourquoi l'Algérie ne s'excuse-t-elle pas auprès de la France pour sa tentative ratée de colonisation? Que se serait-il passé si les Sarrasins n'avaient pas été arrêtés à Poitiers?

Quelle est la différence entre la France des années 70 et la France d'aujourd'hui ?

Pourquoi les 350 000 Algériens qui vivaient en France (métropolitaine) en 1962 ne sont-ils pas repartis pour l'Algérie quand elle est devenue indépendante ?

Pourquoi la France ne s'excuse-t-elle pas une bonne fois pour toutes pour la colonisation vis à vis de l'Algérie ?

Avant la colonisation française en 1830, l'Algérie (ou les territoires qui la formaient) avait-elle déjà été longuement sous domination étrangère ?

Et si la France d'aujourd'hui était amenée en l'an 117 (à l'apogée de l'Empire romain), pourrait-elle conquérir le monde ? Qu'est-ce qui se passerait ?

Pourquoi on demande tout le temps à la France de s'excuser envers l'Algérie pour les morts de la Guerre d'Algérie et pas à l'Algérie de s'excuser pour les actes du FLN durant la même période ?

Pourquoi la France a-t-elle perdu la guerre d'Algérie alors qu'elle a tué beaucoup plus d'Algériens qu'elle n'a subi de pertes ? (Question traduite)

Qu'est-ce qui a changé entre la France des années 70 et la France d'aujourd'hui ? Pourquoi la France a-t-elle perdu la guerre d'Algérie ?

Pourquoi un bon pourcentage des Algériens nés avant l'indépendance (1962) disent que « l'Algérie était beaucoup plus heureuse et prospère du temps de la colonisation française »?

Est-ce qu'il est vrai que lors de la colonisation de l'Algérie, les Français ont voulu naturaliser les Kabyles, les envoyer vers la métropole, et les traiter comme les Français de souche vu leurs phénotypes européens ?

La France a-t-elle commis un génocide en Algérie ?
Jérôme Spiesser

Lieu : Montreuil, Île-de-France, Francemer.

Non, en aucun cas.

L'Armée française a commis des massacres ou des crimes de guerre en Algérie (utilisation de la torture), c'est indéniable, mais aucune de ces exactions n'est assimilable à un génocide.

Un génocide répond à une définition précise :

Destruction totale ou partielle d'un groupe national, ethnique, racial ou religieux.

Or, rien dans le déroulement de la guerre d'Algérie ne se rapproche de la définition d'un génocide. Ce qui défini un génocide, ce n'est pas le nombre de morts mais la volonté politique de détruire un groupe national, ethnique ou religieux.

Questions similaires

Pourquoi les 350 000 Algériens qui vivaient en France (métropolitaine) en 1962 ne sont-ils pas repartis pour l'Algérie quand elle est devenue indépendante ?

Finalement, si l'Algérie était restée française, la France ne serait-elle pas devenu un pays à majorité musulmane ? De manière générale, à quoi ressemblerait la France aujourd'hui si l'Algérie était restée française ?

Pourquoi on demande tout le temps à la France de s'excuser envers l'Algérie pour les morts de la Guerre d'Algérie et pas à l'Algérie de s'excuser pour les actes du FLN durant la même période ?

Pourquoi un bon pourcentage des Algériens nés avant l'indépendance (1962) disent que « l'Algérie était beaucoup plus heureuse et prospère du temps de la colonisation française »?

Un Algérien d'un certain âge m'a montré la carte d'identité Française qu'il possédait en 1962, juste avant l'indépendance. Il y était noté "Français musulman". Y avait-il bien un système d'apartheid à l'époque de l'Algérie Française ?

Pourquoi il n'y a qu'avec l'Algérie que les relations sont souvent tendues alors que la France a occupé d'autres pays ?

Est-ce qu'il est vrai que lors de la colonisation de l'Algérie, les Français ont voulu naturaliser les Kabyles, les envoyer vers la métropole, et les traiter comme les Français de souche vu leurs phénotypes européens ?

Pourquoi la France a-t-elle perdu la guerre d'Algérie alors qu'elle a tué beaucoup plus d'Algériens qu'elle n'a subi de pertes ? (Question traduite)

Pourquoi les pieds-noirs étaient en danger en Algérie, alors qu'ils étaient assez nombreux (10% de la population totale), et avaient le support de la France ? Ne pouvaient-ils pas se constituer un état indépendant au sein de l'Algérie ?

Devra t'on s'attendre à des révélations sur le rôle de la France dans le génocide rwandais

Pourquoi l'Algérie accuse-t-elle le Maroc d'avoir tué 3 chauffeurs routiers avec un drone Turc TB2 ?

Mohammed Grini · Suivre Lieu : Alger, Algériedim.

Selon le communiqué de la présidence algérienne, « plusieurs facteurs désignent les forces d'occupation marocaines au Sahara occidental comme ayant commis, avec un armement sophistiqué, ce lâche assassinat ». Selon le site spécialisé algérien MENADEFENSE - All about defense from Marrakech to Bengladesh, les camionneurs algériens ont été tués à Bir Betlili au Sahara occidental par un drone armé marocain(de fabrication turque, ndlr).

Il a été confirmé que les deux camions détruits par ce drone se trouvaient dans une zone non dangereuse comme le prétend les médias assujettis au Makhzen.

Trois ressortissants algériens ont été tués le 1er novembre dans un bombardement attribué au Maroc. Ils roulaient à bord de camions quand ils ont été bombardés à Bir Lahlou sur la route reliant Nouakchott, en Mauritanie, à Ouargla, dans le Sud de l'Algérie.© TV5MONDE

D'autres sources citées par BBC News Arabic(voir vidéo ci-dessous)confirment que les trois camionneurs Algériens ont été tués par un drone selon des témoins oculaires.

Vidéo des camions attaqués

Lire l'article :

Assassinat de trois Algériens: que cherche le Maroc ?
Tension extrême dans les relations algéro-marocaines après l'annonce par la présidence algérienne ce mercredi 3 novembre de l'assassinat de trois Algériens.
https://www.tsa-algerie.com/assassinat-de-trois-algeriens-que-cherche-le-maroc

Questions similaires

Pourquoi les français préfèrent-ils aller en Tunisie ou au Maroc plutôt qu'en Algérie ?

Pourquoi Abdelmoumen(calife des Almohades) est-il revendiqué comme Marocain par les Marocains, alors qu'il venait d'une tribu localisée en Algérie actuelle ?

L'Algérie dispose-t-elle de drones en cas de conflit avec le Maroc ?

Pourquoi on demande tout le temps à la France de s'excuser envers l'Algérie pour les morts de la Guerre d'Algérie et pas à l'Algérie de s'excuser pour les actes du FLN durant la même période ?

Que livraient les 3 camions Algériens détruits par le Maroc ?
Le Maroc et l'Algérie vont-ils s'engager dans un conflit armé ?
Pourquoi la France a-t-elle perdu la guerre d'Algérie ?
L'Algérie va-t-elle attaquer le Maroc ?

Pourquoi Emmanuel Macron n'appelle-t-il pas l'Algérie et le Maroc à cesser l'escalade militaire ?

Que pensez-vous du spectre d'un conflit armé qui plane entre le Maroc et l'Algérie ? (Selon les médias)

L'Algérie se réarme dans le domaine naval, pensez-vous qu'un jour (sans compter que nous sommes dans l'otan) elle sera capable de nous attaquer ?

Pourquoi les Arabes détestent l'Algérie ?
Si une guerre Algérie Maroc éclatait qui gagnerait ?
Pourquoi le Maroc a-t-il attaqué l'Espagne en 2002 ?

Pourquoi le royaume autocratique marocain s'acharne-t-il contre l'Algérie en déployant une armée du Net mobilisée 24 h/24 ?

Qu'est-ce qui empêche des pays comme l'Algérie et le Maroc à se développer ?

Pierre Jamain

Anciennement Gérant de S.A.R.L. (Labo photo professionnel) à Labo photo professionnel (1970–2000)Mis à jour le 2 ans

Concernant le Maroc et depuis une dizaine d'années le développement industriel est remarquable avec les constructions d'usines automobiles de Renault et Peugeot qui ont été suivis par 200 équipementiers automobile ce qui en tout représente 158000 emplois, le Maroc est devenu le 1er exportateur et producteur d'Afrique et prévoit de produire 1 million de véhicules à l'horizon 2022. L'industrie aéronautique est aussi en forte progression avec Airbus suivi par une centaine d'équipementiers aéronautiques avec environ 17000 emplois dont beaucoup hautement qualifiés.

L’Algérie à cause de sa rente pétrolière et gazière n’a pas beaucoup cherché à attirer les entreprises étrangères et la baisse du prix du pétrole commence à lui poser des problèmes.

Questions similaires

Pourquoi les Algériens disent-ils que les Marocains pillent leur culture et volent leur Histoire ?

Pourquoi le Maroc, l'Algérie et la Tunisie sont-ils des pays séparés alors qu'ils ont tous un héritage berbère, arabe et français ?

Pourquoi le Maroc est-il constamment présenté comme un pays arrière ?

Pourquoi Abdelmoumen(calife des Almohades) est-il revendiqué comme Marocain par les Marocains, alors qu'il venait d'une tribu localisée en Algérie actuelle ?

L'Algérie est-il un pays sans avenir ?

Que se passerait-il si le Maroc, l'Algérie et la Tunisie devenaient un seul pays ?

Pourquoi les Algériens sont-ils si fiers de leur pays mais dans le même temps le fuient en masse ?

Le Maroc est-il un pays émergent ?

Est-il vrai que le Maroc est plutôt un pays de droite et l'Algérie plutôt un pays de gauche ?

Si une guerre Algérie Maroc éclatait qui gagnerait ?

Quel est le plus beau vêtement du monde ?

Francois De Casson Works at Groupe Expedia (société de technologie Updated 2y

Je pense à un vêtement que j'ai eu l'occasion d'observer lors d'un mariage algérien.

La chedda de Tlemcen est une tenue traditionnelle algérienne, plus précisément de la ville de Tlemcen, mais également portée dans l'ouest du pays notamment à Oran et Mostaganem. Cest un pur produit de l'artisanat tlemcénien, elle était portée par les princesses tlemcéniennes d’antan

C'est une robe de mariée particulièrement spectaculaire par son accumulation de dorures, bijoux et couleurs. Elle est par ailleurs d'une grande délicatesse dans la fabrication. Sa beauté est à couper le souffle et donne à celle qui le porte une dimension à la fois d'éternité et de fragilité.

L'éternité d'un moment, bien qu'évanescent, qui restera à jamais dans la mémoire des mariés et des convives.

La fragilité de la beauté qui irrémédiablement se flétrira, vaincue par l'Ennemi, à savoir le temps qui nous dévore.

Ce vêtement est inscrit au patrimoine culturel immateriel mondial de l'UNESCO.

Liste du patrimoine culturel immatériel de l'humanité en Algérie — Wikipédia

Questions similaires

Y a-t-il des divergences d'opinion concernant les standards de beauté parmi les pays du monde ?

Quel est le plus beau vêtement que vous possédez ?
Quel est le vêtement le plus cher du monde ?
Quel pays a les meilleurs vêtements traditionnels ?
D'après-vous, quel est la chose/endroit le plus beau au monde ?
Quel est pour vous, la femme la plus belle au monde ?
Quels sont les styles en vêtement ?
Quel vêtement attire toujours le regard ?
Quelles sont les robes les plus incroyables ?
Quels pays ont les femmes les plus laides du monde ?

News Nigeria
Ghazala Bent Aamar is an Algerian brave woman who pioneered a unique and unprecedented way to protect Algerian women from being harassed by French soldiers during the French occupation of Algeria

Posted by Aniekpeno Ekong 7h

Once a French platoon approaches an Algerian village women used to run to the yarn and cover their bodies with dung/manure forcing the French soldiers to keep a distance.

Algeria has lost 1.5 million martyrs in their fight against the French occupation. The history will always remember the struggle of the brave Algerian men and women.

Note: Ghazala’s photo was recolored using coloring software

Risitas
Pourquoi les Français n'arrivent-ils pas à tourner la page de l'Algérie et du colonialisme ?

Hellomer.

Réponse originale : Pourquoi les francais n'arrivent pas à tourner la page de l'Algérie et du colonialisme ?

Concrètement les 99,99% des français s'en fichent du colonialisme. Quasiment tous les participants à la guerre d'Algérie sont morts.

ça a coûté de l'argent, c'est tout que ça a fait. Aucun candidat à la présidentielle n'en a parlé. Ce n'est plus les préoccupations d'aujourd'hui.

Response similaire

Avant la colonisation française en 1830, l'Algérie (ou les territoires qui la formaient) avait-elle déjà été longuement sous domination étrangère ?

Jean-Marie Gouarné Mis à jour le ven. · Vote positif par Michel Gehin, précédents lieux : France (1970 - 1992)

Avant 1830 les territoires qui constituent l'Algérie actuelle étaient assez hétérogènes et n'avaient pratiquement jamais constitué un État. Le nom actuel du pays, "Algérie", a été inventé par les Français pour désigner l'ensemble des territoires regroupés sous l'autorité du gouvernement d'Alger (Al-Jazā'ir). Donc avant la colonisation française l'Algérie n'était pas un bloc et avait rarement été dominée dans son ensemble par une puissance extérieure.

Il existe bien sûr une certaine ambiguïté à cet égard. En réalité, depuis la décomposition de l'Empire romain ces territoires ont subi à plusieurs reprises tantôt des invasions dévastatrices à grande échelle, tantôt l'installation de petites enclaves étrangères sur la côte. Mais avant 1830 il n'y a jamais eu de véritable domination d'ensemble par une autorité étrangère unique.

On peut laisser de côté l'Antiquité et les premières années du Moyen-Âge car à ces époques tous les pays méditerranéens ont été sous la domination de Rome puis de Byzance, et le Maghreb était dans le même cas. En ces temps lointains, on ne disait pas encore Al-Jazā'ir ; la ville était connue sous son nom Amazigh d'Ikosim (Icosium en Latin).

La conquête arabe des VIIème et VIIIème siècles a mis en place une nouvelle domination, dont les effets se poursuivent encore aujourd'hui puisqu'elle a implanté l'Islam et une forte composante de culture arabe dans un pays qui pourtant, d'un point de vue ethnique, est resté essentiellement Berbère (Amazigh). L'invasion n'a pas été facile pour les Arabes, et il ne leur a pas suffi d'éliminer l'Empire Byzantin (successeur de Rome): la résistance des Berbères a été tellement forte que la conquête a duré 70 ans (641-711). Techniquement, la domination arabe n'a pas été durable; en fait, elle a été encore plus éphémère que la domination française de 1830–1962, car dès les années 740 des entités politiques indépendantes se sont dressées contre l'Empire Omeyyade puis Abbasside. Malgré le maintien d'une forme d'allégeance politique et religieuse envers le Califat, on peut considérer que l'actuel territoire algérien, pendant la plus grande partie du Moyen-Age, n'a été ni unifié ni soumis à une réelle domination étrangère.

Il faut quand même citer les deux "empires" musulmans occidentaux nés sur le territoire de l'actuel Maroc, qui se sont succédés au milieu du Moyen-Âge, à savoir les Almoravides (al-Murābiṭūn) aux 11ème et 12ème siècles, puis les Almohades (al-Muwaḥḥidūn) aux 12ème et 13ème siècles. Les Almoravides ont étendu leur domination jusqu'à l'ouest de l'actuelle Algérie, et les Almohades qui ont poussé jusqu'en Tripolitaine (ouest de la Libye) ont donc conquis au passage ce qui constitue actuellement l'Algérie et la Tunisie. Tous deux ont également englobé Al-Andalus (soit une grande partie de la péninsule ibérique). On peut se demander s'il s'agit vraiment de dominations étrangères, car ces conquérants, dont la puissance a été d'ailleurs assez éphémère, étaient eux-mêmes des berbères et n'ont pas remis en question les structures socio-politiques tribales traditionnelles. Le principal (et le plus brutal) des conquérants Almohades, Abd al-Mumin, était d'ailleurs originaire d'un territoire qui, aujourd'hui, fait partie de la wilaya de Tlemcen, dans l'ouest algérien. Ces conquêtes (surtout celle des Almohades caractérisée par une extrême violence à caractère djihadiste) ont provoqué leur lot de massacres et de pillages, mais elles ne sont pas comparables à des occupations étrangères stables, même si les populations en ont souffert autant sinon plus que des excès du colonialisme à venir. Par ailleurs, elles soulignent le fait qu'il n'existait pas la moindre esquisse de cadre national algérien au Moyen-Âge. Il était surtout question, en ces temps là, de luttes de pouvoir entre berbères, compliquées par des tentatives ponctuelles d'intrusion externe, notamment du fait des Arabes et des Normands.

Les choses ont changé au début du XVIème siècle, face aux entreprises coloniales européennes qui commençaient à exercer une certaine pression sur l'Afrique, et compte tenu d'un climat de décadence politique générale du Maghreb. Les notables d'Alger, dans ce contexte, ont fait appel à des corsaires de l'Empire Ottoman, originaires de l'île grecque de Lesbos, les frères Baba-Oruç, connus dans les pays francophones sous le nom de Barberousse. Une fois installés à Alger, les Barberousse ont éliminé la dynastie autochtone et pris le pouvoir. Ils ont mis fin à la menace d'une conquête espagnole puis, par une suite de guerres contre les royaumes berbères indépendants, ont plus ou moins unifié sous le contrôle (théorique) d'Alger l'essentiel de ce qui constitue l'Algérie d'aujourd'hui et créé une forme rudimentaire de gouvernement central connue sous le nom de Régence d'Alger. Ils n'ont pas pour autant fait disparaître l'autonomie des clans berbères de l'arrière-pays: à la veille de la conquête française, on estime que la Régence n'avait d'autorité réelle et directe que sur un tiers de la population. En réalité, la première tentative de construction d'un véritable État national algérien a été celle de l'émir Abdelkader dans les années 1830 et 1840; encore faut-il préciser que cette tentative très éphémère n'a été rendue possible que par l'abolition de la Régence par les Français au moment de l'occupation d'Alger (1830), donc trop tard pour faire obstacle à la colonisation.

Sachant que les Barberousse étaient des corsaires ottomans et que, en 1516, la Régence a fait acte d'allégeance envers le Califat d'Istambul, certains pensent que l'Algérie était de ce fait une dépendance de l'Empire Ottoman. Cette vision simpliste est largement erronée.

L'idée d'une "occupation ottomane" est apparemment confortée par la présence permanente des janissaires (mot français dérivé du turc yeni çeri qui signifiait "nouvelle milice" et désignait un ordre militaire à statut très particulier de l'Empire ottoman). Cependant, cette milice étrangère (dont l'effectif n'a jamais dépassé 15.000 hommes), a plus joué le rôle ambigu d'une garde prétorienne au service de la Régence que celui d'une véritable force d'occupation coloniale. Elle a surtout contribué à complexifier (et donc à affaiblir) la société algérienne pour au moins deux raisons. D'abord, le corps des janissaires était politiquement turbulent et, à plusieurs reprises, est entré en rébellion avec le pouvoir. Ensuite, il a indirectement compliqué les conflits ethniques en donnant naissance à la communauté des Kouloughlis (descendants d'unions entre janissaires et femmes autochtones mais exclus des privilèges des janissaires), qui a constitué une force politique souvent opposée à la Régence, parfois favorable aux rebelles Kabyles, et toujours en lutte contre les janissaires (dont elle a contribué à briser définitivement la puissance en 1817). La question des janissaires et des Kouloughlis est complexe et représente un aspect aujourd'hui trop mal connu de l'histoire de l'Algérie; elle mériterait d'être davantage étudiée. Mais en tout cas on ne peut pas sérieusement soutenir que l'Algérie a été "tenue" par une armée d'occupation turque.

En réalité le lien avec Istanbul était plus une alliance opportuniste qu'une soumission: les Ottomans étant en guerre avec l'Espagne, ils étaient pour Alger le meilleur appui politique et militaire possible. Par la suite, l'empire de Charles Quint dont l'Espagne faisait partie s'est disloqué, les Ottomans ont eu affaire à d'autres ennemis (Autriche, Pologne, Russie) qui ne s'intéressaient pas au Maghreb, et la Régence d'Alger est devenue une puissance régionale importante qui n'avait plus besoin de protection.

Elle est devenue aussi une puissance de proie, avec une flotte de corsaires redoutée partout en Méditerranée et dans l'Atlantique et, loin d'être un pays dominé, elle a fait partie des dominants. C'est incontestablement Alger qui a pratiqué le plus intensivement le "corso", une forme de guerre maritime essentiellement tournée contre des cibles civiles (navires de commerce, pêcheurs et populations côtières), dont les objectifs étaient de capturer non seulement des marchandises et des navires, mais aussi des esclaves. Malheureusement pour l'Algérie, cette époque de puissance (trop tributaire de la piraterie et de l'esclavage) n'a pas permis un développement économique et social à la hauteur du potentiel du pays. Une très grande partie du pouvoir politique à Alger était aux mains des "raïs", les chefs corsaires. Quant aux Européens, principales victimes des raïs, ils étaient presque tout le temps en guerre les uns contre les autres, et n'avaient donc aucun moyen de riposter efficacement. C'est ainsi que, pendant près de trois siècles, Alger a pu vivre des profits faciles de la piraterie et de l'esclavage, et même devenir une belle et opulente cité, en se dispensant de tout effort de modernisation. Avec le recul, on peut dire que la Régence d'Alger a peut-être fait plus de mal à l'Algérie qu'une occupation étrangère, car elle n'a réalisé aucune œuvre sérieuse de construction nationale et n'a fait que masquer par une richesse artificielle des institutions décadentes et des pratiques aussi contraires aux valeurs coraniques qu'aux principes d'efficacité politique les plus élémentaires. Mais, clairement, la Régence d'Alger était une puissance indépendante, son allégeance envers l'Empire ottoman étant purement théorique.

Toutefois, le fait que la Régence d'Alger n'ait pas été elle-même totalement subordonnée à une puissance étrangère n'exclut pas toute discussion sur une éventuelle domination étrangère des territoires qui constituent aujourd'hui l'Algérie. En effet, la Régence elle-même était dans une large mesure un corps étranger par rapport aux populations autochtones. Les janissaires étaient, par définition, des militaires étrangers, même si leur lien de subordination envers le sultan d'Istanbul était très ténu. Les corsaires formaient quand à eux une corporation puissante, la Taïfa des raïs, évidemment sans grande affinité avec les «indigènes». Les raïs étaient pour la plupart des aventuriers apatrides, originaires d'Europe (occidentale ou ottomane), établis provisoirement ou durablement à Alger et convertis à l'islam pour des raisons sans doute très opportunistes. Certains d'entre eux avaient commencé leurs carrières comme esclaves, avant de s'élever dans la hiérarchie et de devenir eux-mêmes des professionnels de la piraterie… et de l'esclavage. On peut par exemple citer le Calabrais Uluç Ali Pacha (né Giovanni Dionigi Galeni et qui finira grand amiral de la flotte ottomane), les Corses Hassan (né Pietro Paolo Tavera) et Mami Pacha (né Fillipu d'Arbarella), le Vénitien Hassan Veneziano, les Sardes Hassan l'Eunuque (qui fut le bras droit de Khayr ed-Din Barberousse) et Ramdan Pacha, les algérien. Le problème est d'autant plus compliqué que les dirigeants actuels, dont il est pourtant raisonnable de penser qu'il n'ont rien à voir avec les raïs et les janissaires d'autrefois, semblent vouloir établir une sorte de continuité entre la Régence d'Alger et l'État national algérien post-colonial, dans un état d'esprit que révèle ce passage d'un discours prononcé il y a quelques années par un haut responsable de la défense, le général Gaïd Salah: «Nous ne devons jamais oublier cette glorieuse période de notre histoire militaire et nationale où la marine algérienne détenait le règne incontestable des mers et constituait la force suprême et redoutable, notamment en Méditerranée». Si on ajoute à cela la présence d'une statue récente du raïs Hamidou ben Ali à Alger, et le fait que plusieurs navires de combat de la marine nationale portent des noms de raïs de la grande époque de la piraterie, on peut conclure que même si la Régence d'Alger n'a pas grand chose à voir avec ce qui, d'un point de vue sociologique et géopolitique, définit l'actuelle Algérie, il existe dans la communication (sinon dans les convictions) du gouvernement algérien une certaine tendance à revendiquer comme «national» l'héritage de la Régence. À notre époque où la culpabilité des puissances ayant pratiqué l'esclavage est systématiquement dénoncée, le but du gouvernement algérien n'est pas de se glorifier des razzias des corsaires de la Régence; il est surtout de démentir les arguments selon lesquels l'Algérie est une création coloniale française en invoquant une continuité entre la Régence (renversée par les Français en 1830) et l'Algérie moderne. Cette position implique la reconnaissance a posteriori, pour cette Régence, d'un statut d'État national algérien. D'un autre côté, le fait que la Régence d'Alger n'ait été ni arabe ni berbère, qu'elle n'ait eu pratiquement aucun centre d'intérêt commun (hormis la religion) avec les populations autochtones, qu'elle ait été effacée aussi facilement et aussi rapidement en 1830, et qu'elle n'ait joué aucun rôle dans la résistance à la colonisation française, plaiderait plutôt pour l'idée qu'il s'agissait plus d'un corps étranger, sans véritable enracinement local, que d'un État national. Sans aller plus loin dans ce débat, la question de savoir si la Régence d'Alger était une domination étrangère ou une oligarchie algérienne n'est pas totalement close. La vérité est probablement entre les deux. Il semble en tout cas qu'on ne puisse pas sérieusement considérer que l'Algérie a été turque avant d'être française.

Albanais Mami (ou Mohammed) Arnaute (connu pour avoir capturé le célèbre écrivain espagnol Miguel de Cervantes) et Mourad Raïs, et beaucoup d'autres. Subordonnée ou non à l'Empire ottoman, la Régence d'Alger pourrait donc légitimement être considérée en soi comme un pouvoir étranger en position d'occupant par rapport à ce qu'on perçoit de nos jours comme le peuple

Au début du XIXème siècle, quand l'évolution du contexte international a mis fin à la grande piraterie et imposé des restrictions au trafic d'esclaves, la Régence s'est trouvée en grave difficulté à un moment où par ailleurs les Turcs n'avaient plus aucun intérêt à la soutenir. Elle s'est trouvée à la fois déstabilisée par de graves troubles politiques internes s'ajoutant à l'hostilité des tribus de l'arrière-pays et diplomatiquement isolée sur le plan international quand, les guerres ayant cessé en Europe et en Amérique du Nord, les grandes puissances occidentales ont eu les mains libres pour "s'occuper" du corso algérien, en visant directement le port d'Alger. La première riposte significative est venue en 1815 des Américains: l'US Navy a brutalement mis fin à la carrière du fameux raïs Hamidou ben Ali (le plus célèbre et le plus redouté des corsaires de l'époque) et menacé de bloquer le port. Une seconde opération, Anglo-Hollandaise, a abouti en 1816 à un bombardement dévastateur du port. La France est ensuite entrée en scène en organisant pour de bon le blocus du port d'Alger de 1827 à 1829. Jusque là, il n'était question que de représailles limitées et aucune grande puissance n'envisageait vraiment d'occuper le pays. La Régence semble avoir cru que les choses n'iraient jamais plus loin et n'a rien fait pour s'adapter, une erreur fatale qui a causé sa chute et la perte de l'indépendance du pays. Quand la France a finalement lancé, en 1830, une véritable offensive terrestre et navale contre Alger, la ville est tombée en trois semaines. On connaît la suite: cette fois, les Français ne se sont pas contentés de bombarder et de négocier; ils ont débarqué et ils sont restés…

Mais il est évident que si, en 1830, la Régence d'Alger avait réellement été une annexe de l'Empire ottoman, les Turcs ne seraient pas restés les bras croisés, et que les Français n'auraient pas pu envisager de s'y attaquer dans le contexte géopolitique de l'époque.

On peut donc considérer que, à moins de remonter très loin en arrière dans l'histoire, l'Algérie n'avait jamais vraiment été longtemps, avant 1830 sous une domination étrangère aussi complète et aussi directe que celle de l'administration française. On peut même dire que, en mettant bout à bout les brèves dominations arabe, turque et française, l'Algérie n'a pas été longtemps "dominée" dans son histoire, même si elle a été souvent envahie et a subi de nombreux empiètements.

Questions similaires

Pourquoi on demande tout le temps à la France de s'excuser envers l'Algérie pour les morts de la Guerre d'Algérie et pas à l'Algérie de s'excuser pour les actes du FLN durant la même période ?

Pendant la colonisation en Algérie, est-il vrai que la France a octroyé la nationalité française aux indigènes juifs, mais pas au peuple musulman ? Si oui, pourquoi?

Un Algérien d'un certain âge m'a montré la carte d'identité Française qu'il possédait en 1962, juste avant l'indépendance. Il y était noté "Français musulman". Y avait-il bien un système d'apartheid à l'époque de l'Algérie Française ?

Pourquoi les 350 000 Algériens qui vivaient en France (métropolitaine) en 1962 ne sont-ils pas repartis pour l'Algérie quand elle est devenue indépendante ?

Pourquoi l'Algérie ne s'excuse-t-elle pas auprès de la France pour sa tentative ratée de colonisation? Que se serait-il passé si les Sarrasins n'avaient pas été arrêtés à Poitiers?

Pourquoi les pays colonisés par la France n'arrivent pas à tourner la page comme la France l'a fait envers l'Allemagne ? Pourtant 3 invasions en moins d'un siècle et des millions de morts sont à compter.

Pourquoi un bon pourcentage des Algériens nés avant l'indépendance (1962) disent que « l'Algérie était beaucoup plus heureuse et prospère du temps de la colonisation française »?

Pourquoi parle-t-on presque toujours de la relation France/Algérie et si peu de la colonisation française en Tunisie et au Maroc ?

Pourquoi les Français étaient-ils si attachés à garder l'Algérie ?

Pourquoi le plan Hersant en Algérie qui consistait à garder français un secteur géographique clé de l'Algérie conten

ظهور قنوات جزائرية جديدة على قمر استرا (Canal Algerie و Algerie 3)

Heluweb Connaissances : Arabesam.

ظهرت قبل ايام قليلة قنوات جديدة جزائرية على القمر Astra اسم القنوات الاولى ه Canal Algerie و الثانية Algerie 3 اذا كنت من دولة الجزائر و مللت من القنوات الموجودة في تلفازك، فإن هده القنوات سوف تغير الجو التلفازي إلى افلام جديدة وبرامج لم تشاهدها من قبل.

رغم وجود عدد كبير من قنوات الجزائر إلا أنها لا تقدم ما يريده المشاهد الحزائري، هدا السبب ما يجعل المشاهدين يبحثون دائما عن قنوات جديدة بها محتوى متنوع غير ممل.

Algerie 3 وCanal Algerie

لا تقلق لن تواجه مشاكل تقنية في ايجاد هذه القنوات يكفي ان تدخل تردد العمودي و اختيار القمر المذكور ومبروك عليك القنوات الجديدة التي تقدم برامج شيقة ومتنوعة للمشاهدين وتجعلهم لا يشعرون بالملل أبدًا اثناء البث

قبل الخوض في اعطائك ملف الموجود فيه معلومات عن القمر والتردد ننصحك بعمل متابعة لموقعنا لإننا نقدم دائمًا كل ما هو جديد في القنوات سواء الجزائرية، المغربية، المصرية، التونسية...

هناك عدد كبير من المتابعين يبعثون لنا رسائل كثيرة عن القنوات الجديدة في الأقمار الاصطناعية، نقول لكم اننا نبحث و نعمل كل ما بوسعنا من أجل تقديم لكم كل ما هو حديد في عالم القنوات، و أيضًا نعمل على حل كافة

ظهور قنوات جزائرية جديدة على قمر استرا(Algerie 3 وCanal Algerie)

Canal Algerieاسم القنوات الاولى هي Astraظهرت قبل ايام قليلة قنوات جديدة جزائرية على القمر اذا كنت من دولة الجزائر و مللت من القنوات الموجودة في تلفازك، فإن هده Algerie 3و الثانية القنوات سوف تغير الجو التلفازي إلى افلام جديدة وبرامج لم تشاهدها من

https://heluweb.com/algerie-3-and-canal-algerie/

المشاكل التي تواجهونها خطوة خطو

بعد الانتهاء من وصف القناة وتقديمها تفضلو بتحميل الملف الذي يحتوي على معلومات القنوات بكل تفصيل.

Peut-on visiter l'Algérie ?

Patrick Crosset A travaillé à Afrique 3 ans

Oui bien sûr. C’est un très beau pays, les gens sont très accueillants, on y mange très bien, et il y a des paysages magnifiques.

Malheureusement, comme c’est peu touristique (internationalement), les hébergements ne sont pas à la hauteur. La procédure d’obtention du visa est aussi un peu longue (comptez entre 1 à 2 semaines) et un peu chère (85 €).

Algeria seen from the Sky by Patrick Crosset on Africa is Back

Quel pays l'Algérie déteste-t-elle le plus ?

Bouali · Suivre Directeur d'Entreprise du btp (2020–aujourd'hui) 27 avr.

C'est le gouvernement Algérien qui est en conflit avec le gouvernement Marocain.

Concernant les peuples Algériens et Marocains ,il n'y a pas de conflits, car ils sont des cousins et s'adorent entre eux.

Les deux pays sont gérés par des tyrans et des charlatans qui pensent qu'à leurs intérêts personnels.

Les deux peuples vivent aux quotidien dans la misère et les dirigeants vivent dans le luxe d'un équilibre instable.

Les deux sociétés civiles Marocaines et Algériennes sont mortes et n'ont que ce qu'elles méritent.

Chaque peuple à le gouvernement qu'il mérite.

Les français détestent-ils les maghrébins ?

Anonyme 3 ans

Disclaimer: La plupart des français sont, comme beaucoup de monde partout ailleurs, accueillants, curieux, gentils, intéressants, ils ont un sens de l’humour, de la rigueur, de la méthode. Ils aiment les ragots, les ouï-dire, les bruits de couloirs ils en raffolent, se taper la femme de son meilleur ami dès que l’opportunité se présente.. Un peuple vif et vivant. Une grande nation qui comptent des gens nobles au grand cœur aussi qu’une légion de méprisables. Nous les maghrébins de France nous nous reconnaissons également dans tout cela.

La France malheureusement s’est faite championne du dénigrement de ses citoyens musulmans qui, par coincidence sont pour la plupart maghrébins. L’enjeu est de taille avouons le, la plus grande communauté musulmane de toute l’Occident. Un ensemble de citoyens à dompter. Non pas pour ce qu’ils font mais pour ce qu’ils sont.

S’il était question seulement de violence péri-urbaines comme en sont accusés les hispaniques ou les noirs aux États Unis, on aurait fait avec. Ils sont actuellement proprement représentés au plus haut sommet de l’état américain. .

Vous pouvez imaginer une Ilhan Omar - Wikipedia en France? Un Ahmed Boutaleb - Wikipedia? Ou bien un Sadiq Khan - Wikipedia? C’est impossible!

Eh bien aux dernières nouvelles, une sommité des salons parisiens, un hystérique du nom de Finkelkraut n’apprécie pas que Londres ait eu l’outrecuidance d’élire un maire d’origine pakistanaise (Victoire de Sadiq Khan à Londres : Finkielkraut y voit une dimension antisémite... - Vidéo dailymotion). Je vous laisse présager sa réaction, si cela s’était passé à Paris…

Et puis je me dit, je suis quand même de mauvaise fois. Je dois regarder ailleurs et par hasard je tombe sur une autre sommité , polémiste, expert en rien du tout mais le genre de personne qui ont le verbe facile et la plume correcte et il s’en sert avec brio pour diffuser un point de vue dogmatique et idéologique face encore une fois à l’ennemi imaginaire, qui avouons-le ne fait peur à personne, le fameux défouloir maghrébin.

Eric le téméraire nous dit que le voile ce n’est pas bien. Car la raison en est l’endogamie. Ok je compatis. Oui les maghrébines sont très sexy et belles et il doit en avoir visionné des vidéos de beurettes rebelles.

Et puis je me dis je vais quand même voir s’il est le type à pratiquer ce qu’il prêche. Parce que quiconque qui connait les maghrébins sait que nous avons tout le spectre génétique de la terre à l’exception de celui des Inuits. Ca va du Berbère roux aux yeux bleu au Maure hâlé du grand Désert, notre perception de la race n’est pas celle des Européens. Pour faire simple nous sommes le fruit de la plus vielle orgie raciale de la planète.

Alors je jette un coup d’œil, et puis je trouve cela:

Découvrez l'origine du nom CHICHPORTICH

Je me dis ce n’est pas grave. C’est de l’inversion accusatoire. Quand Houellebecq nous parle de la soumission ce qu’on cherche à accomplir c’est la soumission des maghrébins… A qui ? A quoi? Aux nouvelles lois qu’on va leur sortir petit à petit.. Parce que s’ils n’arrivent pas à changer les lois comme on le prétend alors changeons les lois nous mêmes. Commençons par le voile. Il est plus ostentatoire parce que autrement on passerait pour des inquisiteurs.

Après tout on aime regarder ces maghrébines toutes nues aussi.

Affiche de propagande réalisée par le cinquième bureau d'action psychologique de l'armée, incitant les femmes musulmanes à se dévoiler.

Alors pas de voile à l'école, et puis à l'Université, à l'Entreprise?? On y travaille..

On dit que le maghrébin a la double allégeance, il est peu fiable, mais avoir la plus jeune député de France parler en un anglais approximatif devant une parterre de fous américains de nous , ses concitoyens français. Cela ne choque personne.

Face à une telle avalanche de haine et de préjugés, et là je me suis garder d'être bref au maximum. Le Maghrébin n'est pas détesté en France, il est méprisé. Il est de notre devoir tous d'être vigilants de jeter les ponts et de nous connaitre.

Questions similaires

Pourquoi les femmes maghrébines rejettent les hommes maghrébins ? Pourquoi elles préfèrent se métisser, et pourquoi il est de plus en plus rare de voir des couples maghrébins ?

Les maghrébins sont-ils stigmatisés en France ? Si oui, pourquoi ?
Pourquoi les Français regardent les Marocains avec mépris ?

En tant que français de « souche » , avez-vous des amis maghrébines ou musulmans, comment vivent ils les polémiques ? Est-ce qu'ils sont réellement comme les médias les décrivent ?

Pourquoi les hommes maghrébins sont-ils durs avec les maghrébines ?

Pourquoi les Marocains ne supportent pas les Algériens, qui ont pourtant une culture similaire ?

Pourquoi les Arabes détestent l'Algérie ?

Ma fille sera-t-elle considérée comme Maghrébine ou comme Française en France en sachant qu'elle y est née et qu'elle a un prénom français et un nom maghrébin ?

Pourquoi beaucoup de Françaises aiment les rebeux et surtout les marocains ?
Quels sont les pays que les Marocains détestent le plus ?

Les Algériens, Marocains et Tunisiens parlent-ils un arabe assez proche pour se comprendre d'un pays à l'autre ?

Lynne H., Connaissance : Arabe Mis à jour le 21 déc.

Réponse courte: oui. Réponse longue: Pas tout à fait.

Déjà, comme vous pouvez vous l'imaginer, les frontières des pays telles qu'elles sont définies aujourd'hui ne datent pas d'il y a si longtemps que ça. L'Afrique est l'un des continents où on se rend vite compte que le découpage des territoires s'est fait un peu au hasard, à la règle, pendant l'ère coloniale (notamment celle des empires).

Aujourd'hui, l'Afrique du Nord c'est ça (Mauritanie comprise dans tout ce qui est Union du Maghreb Arabe etc.)

Mais aux environs de 1670 c'était ça:

Et vers 1850 c'était ça:

Avec une longue histoire mélangeant phéniciens, carthaginois, romains, berbères, ottomans, arabes, espagnols, français…. les pays d'Afrique du nord ne se sont pas construit un mais plusieurs dialectes qui ont évolués à travers le temps et l’espace.

On a donc des accents divers, une manière de conjuguer légèrement différente et un vocabulaire plus ou moins imprégné d’une langue étrangère ou d’une autre selon les régions et les villes, au sein d’un même pays.

Je me rends compte que tout ça reste assez vague, je vous donne donc un exemple: aujourd’hui, un algérien vivant au nord-ouest de son pays aura beaucoup plus de facilité à comprendre un tunisien qu’un autre algérien vivant au sud-est (Ça n’empêche pas certains de mes amis algériens de se moquer gentiment de notre accent qu’ils trouvent un peu trop chantonnant à leur goût).

De même, étant née et ayant vécu à Tunis, j’ai été surprise d’entendre pour la première fois une conjugaison légèrement différente de la part de quelqu’un ayant grandit dans le Sahel tunisien. (Ex: “ena” qui veut dire “moi” est utilisé sans distinction pour les hommes et pour les femmes dans la partie nord de la Tunisie. À partir du Sahel tunisien, vous entendrez une différence entre “ena” et “eni” selon le genre de la personne).

Cette même conjugaison est plus commune dans certains pays voisins, comme la Libye: Explaining the particle "rahu" (Used in North African (Maghrebi) Arabic : ici on nous explique que dans beaucoup de pays on n’utilise plus la forme au féminin de la particule “rahu” , alors qu’en Tunisie, si.

Pour compliquer un peu les choses, puisque les accents, la conjugaison et le vocabulaire peuvent différer 1) au sein d’un même pays et 2) d’un pays à un autre, la suite logique est que 3)plus on s’éloigne géographiquement et moins on a de liens historiques, moins on se comprend.

Ainsi, lors de ma dernière visite au Maroc, je n’ai, pour ainsi dire, compris qu’un mot sur 10 à chaque fois.

Notre guide sur place a même dit avoir “appris le tunisien” comme langue à part entière pour pouvoir communiquer avec les touristes.

Au final: est-ce qu’on se comprend? De manière générale oui. Mais il est toujours utile d’apprendre ici et là quelques variations pour ne pas se retrouver face à une tête qui veut juste dire “echmaaneha” (“qu’est-ce que ça veut dire?”).

De plus, les séries tv, musiques, réseaux sociaux et autres ont permis un plus large partage de nos dialectes entre nous.

Edit: vu le nombre de commentaires qui me tombent dessus pour me demander de changer de carte ("Hérésie! Le Sahara occidental est un territoire du Maroc!") ou qui tiennent à dire "nous ne sommes pas arabes!" alors que je n'ai fait mention nulle part d'identité ethniques, je désactive les commentaires. Vos combats politico-ethno-religieux hors-sujet, vous pouvez les inclure dans vos propres posts si ça vous chante. La thématique actuelle est linguistique.

Response similaire
Les maghrébins sont-ils stigmatisés en France ? Si oui, pourquoi ?

Gérard Briais, Flâneur Parisien Mis à jour le 8 juil. 2018 · Vote positif par Aurélie Chan , précédents lieux : France (1983 - 2002)

Soyons honnêtes, tous les maghrébins ne sont pas bien traités.

La première raison est incontestablement la mise en avant de faits divers incriminant des maghrébins. Allez demander aux résidents chinois d'Aubervilliers ce qu'ils en pensent. L'amalgame est vite fait entre de petites racailles et une communauté entière.

La deuxième raison incombe à l'économie des cités. C'est un vaste sujet, surtout pour un ancien urbaniste comme moi et la cohésion sociale (ou son manque) a souvent pour cause première le manque de moyens des municipalités qui se sont vues assigner la lourde tâche d'accueillir des masses importantes de populations immigrées.

La troisième raison est l'instrumentalisation d'un soi-disant racisme profond des français par certains partis et associations qui déversent de l'huile sur le feu et montent en épingle des incidents épars présentés comme significatifs. Cela fait son effet et peut aboutir à augmenter un certain ressentiment déjà latent des maghrébins (pour faits de colonialisme essentiellement) à l'encontre des frankaouis et engendrer une certaine animosité voire pire. Chaque action engendrant, en bonne cybernétique, une contre réaction, il est facile pour d'habiles agitateurs de monter les uns contre les autres…

Questions similaires

Pourquoi les femmes maghrébines rejettent les hommes maghrébins ?

Pourquoi elles préfèrent se métisser, et pourquoi il est de plus en plus rare de voir des couples maghrébins ?

Les maghrébins sont-ils stigmatisés en France ? Si oui, pourquoi ?
Pourquoi les Français regardent les Marocains avec mépris ?

En tant que français de « souche » , avez-vous des amis maghrébines ou musulmans, comment vivent ils les polémiques ? Est-ce qu'ils sont réellement comme les médias les décrivent ?

Pourquoi les hommes maghrébins sont-ils durs avec les maghrébines ?

Pourquoi les Marocains ne supportent pas les Algériens, qui ont pourtant une culture similaire ?

Pourquoi les Arabes détestent l'Algérie ?

Ma fille sera-t-elle considérée comme Maghrébine ou comme Française en France en sachant qu'elle y est née et qu'elle a un prénom français et un nom maghrébin ?

Pourquoi beaucoup de Françaises aiment les rebeux et surtout les marocains ? Quels sont les pays que les Marocains détestent le plus ?

Pourquoi en Algérie les historiens et les Algériens en général refusent de croire que l'Émir Abdel-Kader fut un jour franc-maçon en accusant la France (coloniale) d'avoir fabriquée des documents de toutes pièces ? L'Émir fut-il réellement initié ?

L'Emir Abdelkader était une curiosité quand il était détenu en France (puisque c'était contre son gré). Toute la bourgeoisie française voulait le voir et le connaitre. Ils l'invitaient à leurs soirées et fêtes. il a de ce fait était en contact avec des franc maçons, il a surement du sympathiser avec nombre d'entre eux sans pour autant qu'il soit devenu franc maçon. Si son séjour s'était déroulé en Allemagne nazi, il serait (pour beaucoup) un sympathisant nazi. L'Emir Abdelkader était un musulman soufi, d'une grande intelligence et de culture. Sa seule préoccupation quand il était en France était de retrouver sa liberté et rejoindre un pays musulman selon les promesses qu'il a eus (il se sentait trahi) et il l'etait.

Quelles sont les raisons réelles de l'occupation de l'Algérie par la France ?

Sabrina Djaafar, Aime les voyages Mis à jour le 25 janv. · Vote positif par

Aurélie Chan , précédents lieux : France (1983 - 2002)

J'allais supprimer ma réponse puis j'ai décidé de rajouter d'autres explications pour ne pas cité que une seule raison.
La raison est bien la présence de la piraterie barbaresques en Afrique du Nord.

La première a été en 1664, la France envahit l'Algérie au niveau de la ville de Jijel et occupa le territoire pendant plusieurs mois avant d'être contrainte de partir. En 1682, l'amiral Duquesne bombarde Alger en représailles à la piraterie berbère de la Méditerranée.

Vers 1798 le Dey d'Alger, Ali V Ben Ahmed, a accepté de donner à la France de grandes quantités de céréales. Plusieurs millions de francs ont été prêtés.

Lorsque Napoléon prit le pouvoir en 1799, il entreprit de créer une sorte de paix stable. Il cherchait à obtenir une sorte de paix avec Alger et la Régence. Cependant, les relations entre les diplomates français et algériens se détériorent progressivement. La piraterie a continué et de nombreux Français ont été réduits en esclavage, contribuant grandement à la colère de Napoléon.

Il faut noter que ces conflits agacent considérablement Napoléon, à tel point qu'il élabore des plans d'invasion de l'Algérie. Ils ont vu le jour 22 ans plus tard.

Les tensions atteignirent un point de rupture le 30 avril 1827, lorsque Dey Hussein frappa Deval au visage avec son chasse-mouche (ou manche d'éventail) dans ce fameux coup d'éventail .

En 1827, il y a eu la guerre navarin le trio Russe, France et Grande Bretagne contre l'empire ottoman pour libérer la Grèce. L'empire ottoman a perdu avec une baisse des navires en méditerranée.

En 1830, Charles X envahit Alger.

Comment était l'Algérie avant d'être française ?

Jerome Allain, Directeur artistique / infographiste (2001-présent)

Mis à jour le 13 juin 2021

Tout dépend de quelle Algérie nous parlons…
L'Algérie contemporaine que nous connaissons est une pure création de l'État français.

L'Algérie pré-française était un ensemble de chefferies et royaumes divers (la régence d'Alger) sous la tutelle officielle de l'empire ottoman, jouissant d'une grande autonomie, dont une partie au moins des revenus provenait de la piraterie en méditerranée (au point que ces actes de piraterie maritime furent une des raisons qui motiva son invasion par la France : il s'agissait pour celle-ci de mettre fin aux nombreux problèmes engendrés par cette piraterie).

Tout comme les gaulois en leur temps, il n'y avait pas une Algérie, mais des Algéries, souvent en lutte les unes avec les autres pour préserver, conquérir ou étendre les pouvoirs des différents chefs de factions ou royaumes ou sultanats qui peuplaient ce territoire.

Majoritairement agricole, avec des zones côtières qui concentraient une bonne part des richesses du pays en raison d'un commerce important avec beaucoup d'autres pays - dont la France - mais un arrière-pays et une paysannerie pauvre et bien souvent pressurée d'impôts divers, l'Algérie pré-française ne se distinguait pas par une quelconque révolution industrielle ou technologique mais plutôt par une arriération chronique dûe au fait que les dirigeants des royaumes ou régions cherchaient nettement plus à asseoir leur propre prospérité que celle des sujets dont ils avaient la charge (et au vu de l'Algérie moderne on est en droit de penser que ce système de gouvernement tend à être traditionnel).

Pour finir, je dirais que l'Algérie avant d'être française présentait beaucoup de points communs avec la France avant qu'elle ne devienne la France : une multitude de chefs de plus ou moins grande importance rattachés par des liens tribaux ou de féodalité, quelques grandes métropoles prospères et beaucoup de petites bourgades et villages, une paysannerie nombreuse majoritaire sans aucun pouvoir politique ou voix au chapitre sur la bonne marche des affaires qui la concernait, une bourgeoisie cherchant à étendre et défendre ses privilèges à tout prix et des chefs (l'élite) bien souvent prêts à toutes les compromissions si l'envahisseur promettait d'aller exterminer le voisin pour lui prendre ses terres.

Cette division chronique des forces maghrébines facilita grandement la conquête de l'Algérie par la France.

À noter que tout au long de l'histoire de ce pays, les peuples berbères ont eu une influence prépondérante dans la résistance à tous les envahisseurs qui se sont succédés sur cette terre.

À bien y réfléchir, ce n'est pas si différent de l'Algérie d'aujourd'hui…

Questions similaires

Un Algérien d'un certain âge m'a montré la carte d'identité Française qu'il possédait en 1962, juste avant l'indépendance. Il y était noté "Français musulman". Y avait-il bien un système d'apartheid à l'époque de l'Algérie Française ?

Pourquoi les Français sont-ils qualifiés de colonisateurs en Afrique du Nord, alors que le Maghreb fut d'abord colonisé par les Arabes (au détriment des Kabyles)?

Si les «pieds-noirs» n'avaient pas quitté l'Algérie après l'indépendance, une cohabitation aurait-elle été possible avec les musulmans, comme les afrikaners et les noirs en Afrique du Sud, et l'Algérie s'en sortirait-elle mieux ?

Est-ce qu'il est vrai que lors de la colonisation de l'Algérie, les Français ont voulu naturaliser les Kabyles, les envoyer vers la métropole, et les traiter comme les Français de souche vu leurs phénotypes européens ?

Pourquoi le Maroc, l'Algérie et la Tunisie sont-ils des pays séparés alors qu'ils ont tous un héritage berbère, arabe et français ?

Pourquoi un bon pourcentage des Algériens nés avant l'indépendance (1962) disent que « l'Algérie était beaucoup plus heureuse et prospère du temps de la colonisation française »?

Pourquoi le plan Hersant en Algérie qui consistait à garder français un secteur géographique clé de l'Algérie contenant plus d'Européens que de musulmans n'a pas été mis en place ?

Pourquoi les pieds-noirs étaient en danger en Algérie, alors qu'ils étaient assez nombreux (10% de la population totale), et avaient le support de la France ? Ne pouvaient-ils pas se constituer un état indépendant au sein de l'Algérie ?

Comment le Califat Omeyyade a-t-il pu conquérir l'actuel Maghreb aussi rapidement ?
Y a-t-il eu un manque de résistance locale ou d'organisation ?

Combien de "Pieds Noirs" (Algériens d´origine européenne) sont restés en Algérie a

Quel est le problème profond que l'Algérie a avec la France ?

Mathieu Dutour Sikiric · Suivre A travaillé à École Normale Supérieure 6 mo

Le problème fondamental c'est que la France a développé l'Algérie dans le but d'en faire une partie de la France.

Cela a évidemment échoué mais la France a fait un travail très important en Algérie et quand la France est partie elle a laissé beaucoup de choses.

Cela amène a des questions embarrassantes. Combien d'hôpitaux ont été construit par l'occupant précédent, c'est à dire l'empire Ottoman? (réponse: 0).

Ou une question plus fondamentale: Y avait il une nation algérienne avant la colonisation? Le simple fait que la question puisse se poser est révélateur d'un problème existentiel de l'Algérie avec la France. L'Algérie ne pardonnera jamais à la France de l'avoir construit.

Questions similaires

Quelles personnes en France n'ont toujours pas digéré l'indépendance de l'Algérie ?
Pourquoi l'Algérie qualifie-t-elle la France de « faillite mémorielle » ?
Est-il possible de réconcilier la France et l'Algérie?

Pourquoi la France a-t-elle perdu la guerre d'Algérie alors qu'elle a tué beaucoup plus d'Algériens qu'elle n'a subi de pertes ? (Question traduite)

Pourquoi l'Algérie remet-elle maintenant sur la table la question mémorielle avec la France ?

Pourquoi il n'y a qu'avec l'Algérie que les relations sont souvent tendues alors que la France a occupé d'autres pays ?

La France a-t-elle commis un génocide en Algérie ?

Pourquoi l'Algérie, qui a acquis son indépendance veut-elle faire de la France une partie de son territoire ?

Faut il des excuses de la France envers l'Algérie ?
Pensez-vous que la France et l'Algérie pourraient un jour se réconcilier

Initially, how long did the colonists expect to colonize Africa for? Was it supposed temporary or permanent?

Nadhiya Athaide · Follow Iranian Historian & Curator10h

There was really no such thing as a "temporary colony".

Europeans colonized Africa with the intent of staying and creating new states & livelihoods. They gradually came to view those lands as rightfully theirs. Those who were living there before would simply have to accept and deal with their presence.

France settled more than 1.4 million European “Pied Noirs’ in Algeria. While they were guaranteed that they could remain after independence in 1962, the Algerian public unsurprisingly turned against them. The Algerians saw Pied Noirs as remnants of the brutal war and colonization, and they began massacring Pied Noir families and communities by the hundreds.

Hundreds of thousands of Pied Noirs then began to pour into France by the boatloads. Charles De Gaulle essentially shut the borders on tens of thousands of them and detained thousands more in detainment camps. Many in the French government quite blatantly said “they’re not our problem anymore, they should stay in Algeria or go elsewhere”. Even more surprisingly, many mainlanders in France wanted nothing to do with them. The war in Algeria had become increasingly unpopular in its final years and many began to view the Pied Noirs as responsible for the war and massive casualties.

Pied Noirs struggled for decades to integrate themselves into society, they were never truly viewed as French by large segments of society.

Their story is just one of many examples of settlers who had absolutely zero intentions of returning to their place of origin. And even today, if you watch documentaries of Pied Noirs, many of whom are still alive, they always express a longing to return to Algeria. Some even refuse to identify themselves as French, they truly believe Algeria is theirs.

Related Links

If nations started or wanted to start colonizing Africa again, who would stop them?

Is Africa poor because of colonization? If colonization never happened, how would Africa have been?

What did the colonists do?
Why was Africa undeveloped before colonization?
Was colonization on the whole good for Africa?
What would have happened to Africa if it hadn't been colonized?
Is colonization truly responsible for Africa's plight?
How did Europeans migrate to colonize Africa?

Why didn't Africa colonize Europe instead of Europe colonizing Africa?
What were some benefits that the colonists brought to the colonised countries?

AfriStar

CDM / Algérie-Cameroun: la FIFA a enfin rendu son verdict après les réclamations de l'Algérie

David-GDK dim. · Follow Posted by

Après plusieurs mois de tourmente dans le dossier chaud de qualification à la prochaine coupe du Monde de Football 2022 au Qatar, la Fédération Internationale de Football Association (FIFA) via un communiqué vient de trancher après que l'Algérie ait posé des réclamations à l'issue du match retour disputée contre les lions indomptables du Cameroun.

C'est une affaire qui a tenu en haleine le monde du football, à l'issue du match de qualification à la prochaine Coupe du Monde entre Algérie et le Cameroun, les Fennecs algériens victorieux au match aller au Cameroun 1-0 et battus au retour 2-1, éliminés en raison des deux buts Camerounais chez eux, n'ont de cesse demander à la FIFA de faire rejouer le match en raison d'une fraude de l'arbitre gambien.

Après analyse des faits, la FIFA vient de prendre une décision importante : Nous regrettons que, selon votre appréciation, les décisions des arbitres aient pu influer négativement sur le cours de la rencontre. Nous avons pris bonne note des éléments de votre courrier et nous pouvons d'ores et déjà vous garantir que l'ensemble des incidents survenus pendant le match ont été examinés avec soin par les deux arbitres « vidéo », conformément aux Lois du Jeu et au protocole d'assistance vidéo à l'arbitrage.

Cette déclaration de l'instance mondiale du football amenuise un peu plus les espoirs de l'Algérie de disputer une phase finale de Coupe du monde de Football.

Les Fennecs peuvent toujours faire appel auprès de la commission d'éthique, voire même au niveau du TAS. Mais, le temps presse, et pas sûr que cette dépense supplémentaire de moyens et d'énergies aboutisse à quelque chose.

Source: AfrikMag

Questions similaires

Pourquoi ceux qu'on appelle des Maghrébins s'appellent ainsi tout en sachant qu'ils sont sur le continent africain ?

Pourquoi les femmes maghrébines rejettent les hommes maghrébins ? Pourquoi elles préfèrent se métisser, et pourquoi il est de plus en plus rare de voir des couples maghrébins ?

Pourquoi les Maghrébins sont-ils également appelés des Arabes ?
Les maghrébins sont-ils stigmatisés en France ? Si oui, pourquoi ?
Pourquoi les Arabes du Levant se considèrent-ils « plus arabes » que les Maghrébins ?

En tant qu'Africain, êtes-vous capable de reconnaître le pays d'origine d'un autre Africain en observant simplement son physique ?

Pourquoi les Berbères ressemblent-ils aux Arabes alors que génétiquement il s'agit de 2 populations bien différentes ?

Pourquoi les Africains subsahariens traitent-ils les Nord-africains comme s'ils n'étaient pas africains ?

Pourquoi les hommes maghrébins sont-ils durs avec les maghrébines ?

Quelle est l'origine ethnique (dont beaucoup sont blonds aux yeux bleus) de la population kabyle de Grande-

Response similaire
Quels sont les cas où les animaux tuent leurs propriétaires ?/What are some cases where animals kill their owners?

Loïc Boursin Étudiant chez École Polytechnique de l'Université de Nantes (2017–aujourd'hui)Traducteur · dim.

Nathaniel Rice Bi, animal researcher & amateur wildlife historian

Voici Humphrey le Hippo, peut-être l'animal le plus tristement célèbre qui ait mis son propriétaire dans la boue.

Humphrey était un hippopotame appartenant au fermier Marius Els en Afrique du Sud.

Comme nous le savons tous, les hippopotames sont parmi les animaux les plus dangereux d'Afrique. Ils sont d'une rapidité aveuglante, extrêmement grincheux, et peuvent sans effort réduire en bouillie même l'homme le plus fort.

Mais malgré les signes d'avertissement clairs, Els a gardé Humphrey. Il a nourri l'hippopotame, le montait comme un cheval, a joué avec lui et a même nagé avec lui. Comme le décrit Els, Humphrey "est comme un fils pour moi". Marius Els a également gardé une girafe et un rhinocéros dans sa ferme.

Les signes avant-coureurs étaient clairs. Quelques mois auparavant, Humphrey avait poursuivi un homme et son petit-fils en haut d'un arbre. Une fois, il s'était échappé de son enclos, et promené sur un terrain de golf. Il a même été accusé d'avoir tué le bétail d'autres fermiers.

En 2011, Els a été retrouvé rongé, piétiné et traîné dans une rivière par nul autre que Humphrey, son "fils".

Surprise, Humphrey était un animal sauvage, pas un animal de compagnie, et a malheureusement été probablement euthanasié après l'incident. Dans sa tentative de se faire un nouvel ami, Els a mis la vie d'autres personnes — et finalement la sienne — en danger.

Ne prenez pas les hippopotames pour des animaux de compagnie. Ils sont dangereux et en voie de disparition.

Questions similaires

Selon vous, quel animal pourrait être un excellent animal de compagnie, mais ce n'est pas courant de le voir et pourquoi ?

Est-ce qu'il existe un animal de compagnie qui ne nécessite pas que l'on s'occupe de lui ?

Quelles sont les photos d'animaux les plus effrayantes ?
Quel animal est le plus facile à garder comme animal de compagnie ?

Quels animaux, autres que les chats et les chiens, peuvent être domestiqués en quelques années seulement ? Y a-t-il des animaux dont la domestication nécessiterait des décennies ?

Que ressent un animal si on tue un de ses semblables devant lui ?

2/3 des propriétaires d'animaux de compagnie déclarent que leur chien ou leur chat est leur principale source d'amour, bien avant leur conjoint, leurs amis ou leur famille. Qu'en pensez-vous ?

Est-il vrai que les serpents n'ont aucun lien avec leurs propriétaires et les attaquent quand ils en ont envie ?

Pourquoi les lions mâles tuent-ils leurs petits ?
Quelles sont les anecdotes les plus étonnantes sur les animaux ?

Quels animaux ne pourront jamais être domestiqués ? Pourquoi ?/Which animals can never be tamed? And why?

Alexandre Maq , entrepreneur (2020-présent) Traducteur · Traduit le 14 févr. 2021

Marty Severiano Johncox M.A. en Journalism, University of Oregon (Diplôme obtenu en 1989)

Réponse originale : Quels animaux ne pourront jamais être domestiqués ? Pourquoi ?

Y a-t-il des animaux qui ne peuvent pas être domestiqués par les êtres humains?

Zèbres. En théorie, ils pourraient être apprivoisés et montés comme des chevaux. En réalité, ils sont méchants comme l'enfer.

Toute espèce de proie qui peut prospérer autour des lions, des léopards, des crocodiles et des hyènes doit avoir un sérieux problème d'attitude.

Les chevaux sauvages ne peuvent pas être brisés: les tentatives de domestication des zèbres - Thomson Safaris

Faire souffrir un lion.

Faire mal à un autre lion.

Faire mal à un putain de crocodile !

Dans une fosse de mosh avec des gnous.

Et, bien sûr, mettre la blessure sur un autre zèbre. Bonne chance en tapant une selle sur l'une de ces bestioles et en la montant.

Il faudrait des centaines d'années d'élevage sélectif pour domestiquer le zèbre et le rendre assez grand pour transporter la plupart des gens, sans vouloir les tuer. Les chevaux peuvent déjà faire cela et il n'y a plus beaucoup d'utilité pour les chevaux non plus.

S'il vous plaît mettez un vote positif si vous trouvez cette réponse utile (NdT: si cette réponse vous à plu n'hésitez pas à allez mettre un vote positif à la réponse originale)

Questions similaires

Selon vous, quel animal pourrait être un excellent animal de compagnie, mais ce n'est pas courant de le voir et pourquoi ?

Est-ce qu'il existe un animal de compagnie qui ne nécessite pas que l'on s'occupe de lui ?
Quelles sont les photos d'animaux les plus effrayantes ?
Quel animal est le plus facile à garder comme animal de compagnie ?

Quels animaux, autres que les chats et les chiens, peuvent être domestiqués en quelques années seulement ? Y a-t-il des animaux dont la domestication nécessiterait des décennies ?

Que ressent un animal si on tue un de ses semblables devant lui ?

2/3 des propriétaires d'animaux de compagnie déclarent que leur chien ou leur chat est leur principale source d'amour, bien avant leur conjoint, leurs amis ou leur famille. Qu'en pensez-vous ?

Est-il vrai que les serpents n'ont aucun lien avec leurs propriétaires et les attaquent quand ils en ont envie ?

Pourquoi les lions mâles tuent-ils leurs petits ?
Quelles sont les anecdotes les plus étonnantes sur les animaux ?

Pourquoi ce complexe de supériorité des Kabyles envers les autres Algériens en France ?

Ayb – Ben, ancien(ne) Msc. Engineering Répondu 28 sept. 2019

Questions similaires

Pourquoi les français préfèrent-ils aller en Tunisie ou au Maroc plutôt qu’en Algérie ?

Pourquoi le Maroc, l'Algérie et la Tunisie sont-ils des pays séparés alors qu'ils ont tous un héritage berbère, arabe et français ?

Pourquoi les Algériens sont-ils si fiers de leur pays mais dans le même temps le fuient en masse ?

Quelles différences entre la colonisation en Algérie et en Tunisie ? L'occupation en Tunisie a duré plus d'un siècle mais pourtant on entend pas parlé de traumatisme tunisien pourquoi ?

Pourquoi Abdelmoumen(calife des Almohades) est-il revendiqué comme Marocain par les Marocains, alors qu'il venait d'une tribu localisée en Algérie actuelle ?

Pourquoi parle-t-on presque toujours de la relation France/Algérie et si peu de la colonisation française en Tunisie et au Maroc ?

En tant que non-arabe, quelle partie du monde arabe aimez-vous le mieux, le Maghreb (Algérie, Tunisie, Maroc), le Levant (Égypte, Syrie, Liban, Irak) ou la péninsule arabique (KSA, Émirats arabes unis, Qatar), et pourquoi ?

Quelle est la différence de culture entre l'Algérie et la Tunisie ?

Que pensent l'Algérie, le Maroc, la Tunisie, la Turquie, le Bangladesh, et les autres pays musulmans de la victoire des Talibans en Afghanistan ?

Qu'est-ce qui empêche des pays comme l'Algérie et le Maroc à se développer ?

Pourquoi les Marocains ne supportent pas les Algériens, qui ont pourtant une culture similaire ?

Est-il plus ou moins possible de faire la différence entre un(e) Algérien(ne), un(e) Marocain(e), un(e) Tunisien(ne), sur la base de leurs traits (comme un Espagnol, un Français, un Allemand) ou est-ce impossible ?

Que pensez-vous de la Tunisie ou des tunisiens en particulier ?

En tant que français de « souche » , avez-vous des amis maghrébines ou musulmans, comment vivent ils les polémiques ? Est-ce qu'ils sont réellement comme les médias les décrivent ?

Pourquoi les Berbères ressemblent-ils aux Arabes alors que génétiquement il s'agit de 2 populations bien différentes ?

How similar are Maltese and Maghrebi dialects of Arabic?

Karl Farrugia, lived in Malta Answered Mar 4, 2016

For me, as a student of Arabic, the 3 major giveaways of Maghrebi Arabic are:

The jim having the J sound in John

The first person singular present including a noon at the beginning

The general tendency to drop the short vowel after the second root letter

These 3 characteristics are also found in Maltese:

The jim has quite a variety of pronunciation in various parts of the Arab speaking world. You may hear it sounding like a French j in the Levant, or a g for Goat in Egypt. In Maghrebi Arabic, this would generally sound like the J in John.

Maltese has both the Maghrebi and Egyptian sounds, in the form of ġ and g respectively. However, there is a tendency that the latter is more reserved for words deriving from Sicilian or English. Semitic words that originally utilised a jim would be replaced by the ġ. So a camel, جمل, would be ġemel in Maltese.

In standard Arabic, the first person singular present would take an aliph as a prefix to the root. So, the verb 'to drink', شرب, shariba, would conjugate to اشرب, ashrab, 'I drink'

In Maghrebi dialects, a noon is added as a prefix like the first person plural. So that becomes نشرب, neshreb, 'I drink'.

In Maltese, this would conjugate as nixrob, pronounced as nishrob.

This is a bit harder to give concrete examples, as it varies between words, and even from one Maghrebi dialect to another. However, one example may be the word for 'ten'. In fully vocalised Standard Arabic this would look like عَشَرَة, thus 'ashara (I'm using the ' for the 'ain). In some dialects, the vowel sound after the second root, in this case the sh, would either be dropped, or barely spoken, so it sounds more like 'ashra.

In Maltese this is għaxra.

There are some other characteristics that make Maltese very close to Maghrebi Arabic. For example Tunisian has a tendency to join words together and dropping some sounds to make a more "compact" word. This could be seen particularly in the teen numbers. Whereas standard Arabic would say ثلاثة عشر, thalathat 'ashar, for thirteen, Tunisians would say ثلطاش, thlattaash. This was carried over in Maltese, as thirteen would be 'tlettax'.

So in terms of closeness to Arabic in general, as the other answers have pointed out, this is partial in nature. I believe that by the latest estimates, the Maltese vocabulary contains something between 40% and 60% deriving from Arabic (the differences depend on which study is followed), with the rest being a mix of Italian (or Sicilian, to be precise), English, and French.

However, from that portion of the vocabulary that does derive from Arabic, as well as grammatically, Maltese could easily be identified as a Maghrebi form of Arabic.

Related Links

The /p/ sound is very common in different languages. Why didn't any Arabic dialect develop it, despite dialects otherwise having sounds that Classical Arabic lacks? Is it a coincidence, or is there something about Arabic phonology that prevents this?

Were the North Africans known as Moors black? Why or why not?
Are North Africans considered white?
Why don't Arab countries give nationality to immigrants?

Which Arabic dialect is most likely to eventually be recognized as a distinct language from the other Arabic dialects linguistically, geographically, and/or politically?

Why don't previous German colonies in Africa speak German as their National language?

In North Africa, did it ever happen that Arabs adopted the Berber language and became 'Berberized'?

Are people from North Africa considered black?

To Arabic speakers, how different are the dialects? Is the dialects most different in grammar, in vocabulary, or mostly just different in pronunciation? Are local dialects often written and if so are they mutually intelligible?

What language did people speak in North Africa when the Arabs arrived?

AfriStar

Algérie – Cameroun : le ministre des Sports veut faire appel de la décision de la FIFA, une partie perdue d'avance

· Suivre Publication par David-GDK 9 mai

Tandis que la FIFA a bel et bien tranché sur la réclamation de l'Algérie suite au barrage perdu face au Cameroun, le ministre des Sports algérien ne veut pas en rester là !

Tandis que la FIFA a bel et bien tranché sur la réclamation de l'Algérie suite au barrage perdu face au Cameroun, le ministre des Sports algérien ne veut pas en rester là !

Le dossier semblait pourtant clos. Après des semaines d'attente, l'Algérie a officiellement été informée par la FIFA de sa décision concernant les recours déposés suite au barrage de Coupe du monde perdu face au Cameroun (1-2).

L'AFP a eu confirmation que l'instance internationale n'avait pas donné suite aux réclamations des Algériens concernant l'arbitrage contesté de Bakary Gassama.

Une affaire qui n'est peut-être pas totalement terminée puisque Abderrazak Sebgag, le ministre de la jeunesse et des Sports algérien, a annoncé publiquement que les Fennecs allaient explorer toutes les voies de recours possibles !

« Nous avons reçu une lettre de la Fédération internationale de Football, ou elle nous informe de sa décision finale à propos du recours déposé par la FAF. Et l'Algérie a le droit le plus absolu de saisir toutes les instances compétentes, conformément aux statuts de la FIFA », a assuré le ministre.

Problème pour les Fennecs, il est probable que les chances de recours de l'Algérie soient d'ores et déjà quasi-nulles. Selon la Gazette du Fennec, la FAF n'a pas la possibilité d'interjeter appel de cette décision auprès du Tribunal Arbitral du Sport, l'instance traditionnellement saisie pour ce genre de litiges, ne disposant pas de nouveaux éléments matériels à même de constituer un dossier. L'affaire semble donc bien difficile à relancer pour les autorités algériennes...

Pourquoi visiter l'Algérie ?

Omar Chad · Suivre Anciennement Contremaître (1979–2010) 4 ans

Pourquoi visiter l'Algérie, dites-vous ?

L'Algérie, après la division du Soudan en deux pays distincts, est devenu le plus grand pays du continent Africain, recèle parmi ses édifices préhistoriques des édifices romains existants encore aujourd'hui sont pourtant tout aussi intéressants à visiter et étant moins fréquentés par les touristes sans se faire bousculer par l'afflux de visiteurs.

La nature est somptueuse, depuis les plaines verdoyantes du Tell, les rivages de la Méditerranée et jusqu'aux confins du désert du Sahara, en passant par les hauts plateaux de l'Atlas ou encore le massif du Hoggar du Tassili.

L'Algérie compte plusieurs sites classés patrimoine de l'Unesco : les Oasis à Foggaras (est un système d'irrigation ou des galeries souterraines ont été creusées dans les couches des grés du continental intercalaire. Elles pénètrent dans la partie supérieure de la nappe et assurent l'écoulement de l'eau par gravité vers les dépressions basses ou sont plantés les palmiers), et les Ksour du grand Erg occidental, les peintures rupestres préhistoriques de Tassili n'Ajjer, les vestiges romains de Tipasa, Djemila, Timgad, et la vallée du M'Zab et ses villages fortifiés, la ville antique de Constantine et la Casbah d'Alger.

Pendant la période estivale: en été il fait très chaud à l'intérieur du pays, conseil est de rester au bord de la mer. Pour se rendre à l'intérieur du pays, la période conseillée s'étale de novembre à mars, car à cette époque, les écarts de température entre la le jour et la nuit sont les moins violents ; au de là de cette période les vents de sables se font sentir de plus en plus, donc les déplacements sont encore à éviter. .

Tout en jouissant d'un magnifique rivage méditerranéen s'étalant sur 1200 Km de côte avec ses multitudes plages, ce pays est resté à l'écart du tourisme de masse,(faute d'une mauvaise politique de la gestion du Tourisme) a su quand même préserver ses côtes des immeubles. Donc, l'Algérie regorge de vestiges allant de la préhistoire au règne ottoman en passant par la période romaine. On y trouve encore des populations vivant dans les habitations traditionnelles en terre organisées en hameaux fortifiés à l'abri des minarets, comme si rien n'avait changé depuis des milliers d'années.

Malgré une grande zone désertique, l'Algérie ne manque pas de forêts et de parcs naturels. Sur les dix parcs algériens, la majorité se trouvent sur la côte méditerranéenne –en passant par l'Est Algérien celui d'El Kala, de Gouraya (Yemma) ou encore celui de Taza (situé dans la wilaya de Jijel. Connu surtout pour ses grottes, il abrite de vastes plages de sable ainsi que des grottes et des falaises)- ou autres. Le parc de Chréa, situé à 50 km au sud d'Alger non loin de la ville de Blida est peuplé de cèdres et ses sommets culminent à plus de 1900 mètres d'altitude.

Autant dire que l'Algérie est une destination idéale pour les amateurs d'expéditions et d'aventure ou encore les adeptes du désert puisque presque la totalité de sa superficie est occupée par des zones arides.

Ils n'ont que l'embarras du choix entre rochers, falaises, dunes de sable ou plateaux d'altitude.

C'est un pays authentique, dont le tourisme est encore peu développé, ce qui peut aussi compliquer les déplacements dès que vous chercherez à vous éloigner de la côte et des sentiers battus, faute d'infrastructures routières, hôtelières, d'offices de tourismes, guides ou de moyens de transport adaptés. L'hospitalité et l'accueil chaleureux des algériens sont légendaires, surtout en zone rurale.

Mer, vallées ou montagnes -jusqu'à 3000 mètres pour le mont Tahat du Hoggar-, lacs (ou les oiseaux migrateurs viennent s'y réfugier l'hiver), dunes de sable, forêts de cèdres ou palmeraies du désert des oasis, la variété du paysage est la richesse de ce vaste pays.

Pour les amoureux du couché du soleil, le Mont de l’Asskrem dans la zone de Tamanrasset est tout à fait magnifique pour admirer ce phénomène naturel le plus beau au monde, ou le soleil en se couchant parait à l’œil de son admirateur tout proche.

Aussi riche en monuments historiques et avec sa diversification de son paysage est de loin plus beau que le Maroc mais moins touristique, l'Algérie se mérite. Il faut persévérer pour découvrir certains lieux mal indiqués dont l'effort en vaut la peine.

Ce qui émerge le plus du lot, est l’hospitalité accueillante des gens, qui reste toujours fidèle à la tradition.

Nota Bene : Par respect pour la tradition musulmane, habillez-vous modestement tout en évitant de déambuler en ville avec les jambes nues.

Ruines Romaines de Tipaza

Que pensez-vous des Algériens ou plus précisément des Berbères après l'incident d'hier ?

Medy None (2020–aujourd'hui) Mis à jour le 7 mo

Triste, c'est tout, un homme a été lyncher et brûler vifs, car la foule, savait (entendez pensait, mais au bled, penser quelque chose, c'est savoir quelque chose…c'est ouf), cet homme était monter d'Alger pour aider, il en est mort…

Le plus bizarre semble qu'il est été exfiltrer du commissariat, pourquoi y était-il enfermer aucune idée, mais pas pour des faits de pyromanie.

Bref c'est triste, ayant vue pas mal de vidéos de personne brûlée vives en Afrique (Afrique du sud…) ou en Amérique central (mexique, guatemala…), je pensait que c'était des actes qui ne pouvait pas arriver en Algérie, j'me suis bien gourer…

L'effet de foules, associer au message présidentiel (qui dit que la moitié des incendies sont d'origines criminel) met de l'huile sur le feu si je puis-dire.

En France ce brave type serait sortie de garde a vue et aurais probablement repondu aux questions de jouranlistes, en Algerie les seules réponses viendront d'un médecin legiste…

La France, la Suisse, et l'Italie on envoyer des Canadair, en eseprant que cela puisse aider.

Tahia'El'Djazair …

Triste.

Edit - La plupart des feux sont bien d'origines criminels

Edit - L'homme lyncher vu l'un de ses amis y participer, a méditer…

Edit - J'aime les algériens (j'en suis un, donc difficile de ne pas m'aimer)

Edit - Cet acte est unique, pas extrêmement rare, mais unique, il n'es arriver qu'une fois…

Edit - Le gouvernement met de l'huile sur le feu sans mauvais jeux de mots …

Edit - Le gouvernement veux mettre le chapeau sur le Maroc… c'est qui est vraiment minable de la part de ce gouvernement de pacotilles…

Questions similaires

Que pensez-vous des Algériens ?
Pourquoi les "kabyles" ne se considèrent pas arabes ?
Pourquoi ce complexe de supériorité des Kabyles envers les autres Algériens en France ?

Pensez-vous qu'à terme la Kabylie finira par obtenir son indépendance du reste de l'Algérie ?

En Afrique du Nord, comment savoir si quelqu'un est berbère ou arabe ?

Pourquoi un bon pourcentage des Algériens nés avant l'indépendance (1962) disent que « l'Algérie était beaucoup plus heureuse et prospère du temps de la colonisation française »?

Comment réagissent les Algériens au décès d'Abdelaziz Bouteflika ?

Les pays occidentaux cesseront-ils de soutenir le régime d'Alger suite aux lourdes et graves accusations soulevées par le président du MAK (Mouvement pour l'Autonomie de la Kabylie) lors de sa conférence de presse d'aujourd'hui ?

Les kabyles sont-ils arabes ?
Les Algériens du Nord-Ouest de l'Algérie sont-ils des Arabes ?

Pourquoi la France a-t-elle colonisé l'Algérie ?/Why did France take over Algeria?

Gérard Briais , L'histoire est une drogue dure... Traduit le 28 déc. 2019 · Vote positif par
Ernest Foucault Doctorat Histoire & Sciences Politiques, Institut d'Études Politiques de Paris (1973)

Réponse originale : Pourquoi la France a-t-elle conquis l'Algérie ?

Il n'est pas dans mes intentions de remettre en cause la condamnation universelle du colonialisme, mais il faut cesser d'utiliser des arguments grotesques pour étudier la question de la conquête de l'Algérie.

Anes Ouadou nous dit : L'invasion française de l'Algérie peut être considérée comme un autre épisode des croisades, surtout quand on parle de la France.

Dois-je rappeler à Anes Ouadou que dès 719, les Omeyyades ont envahi le sud de la France, trois cents ans avant les Croisades ? Que les raids berbères ont été pratiqués pendant des siècles sur les côtes françaises ? (Le massif des Maures ne s'appelle pas ainsi pour rien) Ne pourrait-on pas plutôt dire que les Croisades sont une réponse à l'agression musulmane ? N'est-il pas encore extraordinaire de louer les conquêtes arabes et de condamner l'expansion française alors qu'il s'agissait en fait des mêmes épisodes guerriers.

Anes Ouadou nous dit alors : L'Algérie avait une forte flotte qui lui a permis de devenir la puissance numéro un à l'ouest de la Méditerranée. Quelle belle façon de raconter l'histoire pour Anes Ouadou. La flotte en question n'est ni une marine de guerre ni une marine marchande mais essentiellement une flotte de pirates dont l'histoire est bien connue :

Barbaresques — Wikipédia

Le fait que cette activité ait décliné après que la flotte anglaise ait presque détruit la flotte de pirates en 1812 empêche effectivement les Français de tirer un argument de conquête mais ne diminue pas les abus commis pendant des siècles.

La question du blé est tout à fait exacte et la régence d'Alger a aidé la France révolutionnaire. En 1819, une commission parlementaire française est convoquée pour étudier les chiffres de Bacri et Busnach, deux Juifs Livornois vivant à Alger qui détenaient à eux seuls la quasi-totalité du commerce de la Régence. Les négociations se sont éternisées, mais rien ne prouve que les Français n'étaient pas disposés à payer la dette de sept millions de francs. De plus, les Algériens minimisent toujours l'épisode de l'éventail mais le roi de France s'est vraiment senti insulté.

L'utilisation d'arguments biaisés est une des raisons majeures qui empoisonnent les relations que les Français ont avec les Algériens.

Related Links

Why did the rest of the world allow the Rwanda genocide?
How involved was France in the Rwandan genocide?
What events led to the Rwandan genocide?
Explain how UN failed to stop genocide in Rwanda?
Did the Belgians cause genocide in Rwanda? I watched, Hotel Rwanda where a guy narrated how the belgians separated two groups, tall and thin nosed, and the short, or thick nosed and one group was left to be in charge of the others.
How was the UN responsible for the Rwandan genocide?
Who was responsible for the Rwandan genocide?
Who were the victims of the genocide in Rwanda?
Rwanda: How has Rwandan society changed since the 1994 genocide?

Why do France and Belgium not apologize and compensate Rwanda for….

Response similaires
Est-ce que les fennecs sont protégés en Algérie ?/ Are fennec foxes protected in Algeria?

Jerome Cohen Ami des animaux depuis plus d' 1/2 siècle.Traducteur · 15 mai

Hamilcar Lieu : Carthage, Tunis, Tunisia (1999–aujourd'hui)

Oui, le fennec est protégé par la loi algérienne. C'est aussi l'animal national du pays et le surnom de l'équipe nationale de football d'Algérie.

The Fennec Fox: Algeria's National Animal - Algeria.com

With its disproportionately large ears, slanted eyes and pointy nose, the attractive little fennec fox (Vulpes.

https://www.algeria.com/blog/the-fennec-fox-algeria-s-national-animal/

Cette espèce est protégée dans tous les États d'Afrique du Nord, à l'exception de la Libye, et la population est classée dans la catégorie " préoccupation mineure " de la liste rouge des espèces menacées de l'UICN.

Elle est protégée au Maroc, en Algérie, en Tunisie et en Egypte, où elle a été documentée dans plusieurs zones protégées.

La liste rouge des espèces menacées de l'UICN

Créée en 1964, la liste rouge des espèces menacées de l'UICN est devenue la source d'information la plus complète au monde sur l'état de conservation des espèces animales, végétales et fongiques.

The IUCN Red List of Threatened Species

Established in 1964, the IUCN Red List of Threatened Species has evolved to become the world’s most comprehensive information source on the global conservation status of animal, fungi and plant species.

https://www.iucnredlist.org/species/41588/46173447

International Union for the Conservation of Nature 2015. Vulpes zerda. The IUCN Red List of Threatened Species. Version 2021-3

Related Links

How can one distinguish between an Arabian red fox and a fennec? The two look pretty similar to me.

Do fennec foxes live in Algeria?
Are fennec foxes legal as pets in North Carolina?
What is cuter to you, a fennec fox or a kinkajou?
What is it like to live in Algeria?
How much does a baby fennec fox cost?
Can two different foxes breed with each other, e.g., a fennec and an arctic fox?
How dangerous is Algeria?
Are fennec foxes friendly?
How is the working life in Algeria?

News Nigeria
The term Moor is an exonym first used by Europeans to designate the inhabitants of the North Africa (modern day Morocco, Algeria, Tunisia and Mauritania), the Iberian Peninsula, Sicily and Malta during the Middle Ages.

Posted by Aniekpeno Ekong May 10

Europeans of the Middle Ages and the early modern period variously applied the name to Arabs, North African Berbers, as well as Muslim Europeans.

During the colonial era, the Portuguese introduced the names "Ceylon Moors" and "Indian Moors" in South Asia and Sri Lanka, and the Bengali Muslims were also called Moors.

In the Philippines, the longstanding Muslim community, which predates the arrival of the Spanish, now self-identifies as the "Moro people", an exonym introduced by Spanish colonizers due to their Muslim faith.

In 711, troops mostly formed by Moors from northern Africa led the Umayyad Caliphate conquest of Hispania. The Iberian Peninsula then came to be known in as al-Andalus, which at its peak included most of Septimania and modern-day Spain, Portugal and southern France.

In 827, the Moors occupied Mazara on Sicily, developing it as a port. They eventually went on to consolidate the rest of the island. Differences in religion and culture led to a centuries-long conflict with the European kingdoms which tried to reclaim control of Moorish areas; this conflict was referred to as the Reconquista, and it was viewed as an extension to the Crusaders campaigns further to the east that ended earlier.

The fall of Granada in 1492 marked the end of Moorish rule in Spain and the beginning of the European colonial era.

Modern day Spanish musical bands such as Gipsy Kings still plays Moorish music and songs.

Pourquoi l'Algérie est-elle un pays riche avec une population jeune qui tarde à accepter la démocratie ?

Slimane Azayri , Non conformiste et marginal Répondu 17 juil. 2021

Voici ma réponse à une question semblable publiée dans mon blog en décembre 2011.
Algérie: démocratie, où es-tu ?

Pour la énième fois depuis l'indépendance, il y a presque un demi-siècle, l'Algérie est de nouveau engagée dans un processus de réformes politiques. Leur répétition, souvent très largement infructueuse, ne serait pas sujette à questionnements s'il ne s'agissait que d'actualiser ou compléter les règles sur lesquelles sont basées l'organisation et le fonctionnement des institutions politiques et définies leurs relations réciproques. Mais est-ce bien le cas du processus de réformes en cours ? Personnellement, j'en doute fort pour les raisons suivantes :

1. Les constitutions de 1963 et 1989 – celle de 1976 ne comptant pas car très inspirée des constitutions excessivement idéologiques et sans grande utilité pratique en vogue à l'époque en ex- Union soviétique et chez ses satellites d'Europe de l'Est – ont sombré toutes les deux à la première crise politique rencontrée par le pays :

- Pour la première, avec les luttes violentes pour le pouvoir déclenchées après l'indépendance et conclues par le coup d'état de juin 1965 ;

- pour la deuxième, avec le mouvement insurrectionnel lancé par la mouvance islamiste, voulant profiter des opportunités offertes par l'ouverture démocratique post octobre 1988 pour mettre en place par tous les moyens un régime totalitaire.

2. Les pratiques autocratiques des groupes dirigeants caractérisées par la tendance des pouvoirs exécutifs successifs à phagocyter totalement les pouvoirs législatif et judiciaire.

3. L'absence de véritable alternance politique, étant donné que les changements du personnel politique, y compris au sommet du pouvoir, se font toujours suivant le mode de la cooptation clanique, régionaliste et familiale.

4. La pratique politicienne de la tromperie et du camouflage par des réformes limitées aux façades ou apparences dans le but, d'une part, de tromper et endormir les algériens et, d'autre part, donner à la communauté internationale l'impression que ses exigences en matière de bonne gouvernance et de respect des droits humains sont satisfaites ou du moins commencent à l'être.

La suffisance et la vanité aux commandes de l'Etat

Aux facteurs négatifs exposés plus hauts, s'ajoute la méthode de travail utilisée par la commission chargée de procéder aux consultations des différentes forces et personnalités politiques, économiques et sociales au sujet des réformes projetées : ces dernières se présentent devant la dite commission pour exposer leurs propositions tels des élèves à un oral d'examen ou bien des chercheurs d'emploi à un entretien d'embauche (!?). Ce qui est significatif des a priori sous tendant cette façon de faire : ainsi les dirigeants actuels qui, de par leur position aux commandes de l'Etat, sont les premiers responsables de la crise (oui, je dis bien « crise », car, sinon, pourquoi des réformes politiques ?) ont manifestement la prétention de se considérer comme les plus capables d'en sortir le pays (!?). Dans ces conditions, il n'est pas étonnant de voir les courants politiques bien ancrés dans la société rejeter clairement cette initiative présidentielle dont l'audience et la crédibilité se trouve ainsi sérieusement limitée dès le départ.

La voie royale des réformes démocratiques

Si le but recherché est vraiment d'œuvrer à la réussite de réformes politiques de fond, il est important de traiter sur un même pied d'égalité tous les acteurs présents sur le terrain, qu'ils appartiennent au pouvoir ou à l'opposition. Pour cela, l'une des deux méthodes pourrait être utilisée :

- soit créer, par décision présidentielle, une commission nationale électorale indépendante chargée d'organiser du début à la fin l'élection d'une assemblée constituante souveraine, laquelle rédigera et votera non seulement le texte d'une nouvelle constitution pour la république mais aussi les lois subséquentes destinées à servir d'appui à la démocratisation du champ politique (lois sur les partis, les élections, la presse, etc.)

- Soit créer, toujours par décision présidentielle, une commission nationale indépendante, représentative de tous les courants politiques du pays (à l'exception, toutefois, de ceux recourant à la violence ou la prônant), chargée d'élaborer le contenu des réformes politiques à engager, en particulier un projet de nouvelle constitution ou bien des amendements à celle actuellement en vigueur, et définir les différentes opérations – notamment électorales – qui en découlent – ainsi que les méthodes et le calendrier de leur réalisation.

Algérie: démocratie, où es-tu ?
https://slimaneazayri.blog4ever.com/algerie-democratie-ou-es-tu

A découvrir aussi
Des non jeûneurs face à des magistrats asservis à des centres de décision occultes

La lutte des noirs aux U.S.A
Coup de force après coup de force

Questions similaires

Dans un certain pays africain, seuls ceux qui sont membres du parti au pouvoir et ceux qui sont proches du président sont autorisés à devenir riches. Un tel pays peut-il devenir développé, riche et prospère ?

En 60 ans, l'Algérie aurait-elle pu entrer dans le top 20 du PIB des nations, si elle avait été dirigée par un gouvernement démocratique, au lieu de conserver ses anciens dinosaures du FLN qui l'ont coulé ?

Pourquoi les Français n'arrivent-ils pas à tourner la page de l'Algérie et du colonialisme ?

Maintenant que Éric Zemmour a officiellement perdu l'élection, pourquoi ne rentre-t-il pas en Algérie ?

Algérie, est-ce vraiment possible que la population fût fortement éduquée en 1830 comme l'affirme Abdelmadjid Chikhi ?

Pourquoi l'Algerie est un pays sous développé malgré ses richesses ?
Peut-on qualifier les pays du Maghreb de pays arabes ?

Pourquoi les pieds-noirs étaient en danger en Algérie, alors qu'ils étaient assez nombreux (10% de la population totale), et avaient le support de la France ?

Ne pouvaient-ils pas se constituer un état indépendant au sein de l'Algérie ?
Est-il possible pour des pays arabes de devenir laïcs ?
Pourquoi l'Algérie n'a-t-elle jamais été libre ?

ARAB MAGHREB UNION (AMU)
Why don't Morocco, Tunisia and Algeria - being so similar in many ways - form a Maghrebi Union modelled on the EU?

Ahmed Abdelhaq Zaydan Lived in Meknès, Morocco (1996–0)Thu

It's because Morocco killed the project

The Arab League was formed to serve as a diplomatic front for Arab countries however by the late 1970s, the Gulf States sought something more than diplomatic unity and so the Gulf Cooperation Council (GCC) was formed in 1981. The GCC was meant to serve as an economic union and more, such as having a united military force so it sent shockwaves throughout the Arab World.

GCC members

Two reactions occurred. The Middle Easterners reacted with:

"You formed a club without me? Fine, I never wanted to be in your dumb club anyway. It's so dumb I'm going to make my own club and not invite you to see how you feel!"

And so the Arab Cooperation Council (ACC) was formed. However there wasn't much to unite the ACC countries and so it died out within a decade.

Arab Cooperation Council - Wikipedia

The North Africans had a better chance because Algeria, Libya, Mauritania and Tunisia had more of a common ancestry, culture and history that a GCC replica had a better chance of surviving.

So the Arab Maghreb Union (AMU) was formed

However unlike the GCC, the AMU had a revolving presidency where member countries took turns leading the organization. At first King Hassan II of Morocco (r. 1961-1999) agreed until it was Algeria's turn to be the leader. Then King Hassan II announced that for an entire year, Morocco would not respect anything the AMU did and would reject any decisions. The Algerians responded by announcing that when it was Morocco's turn to lead that they too would reject the AMU for a year.

Algeria and Morocco are the heavyweights for North Africa and with both countries refusing to participate once every five years essentially killed the organization. Gaddafi of Libya (r. 1969-2011) did try to offer a solution: Libya would take Algeria and Morocco's turns. Both the Algerians and King Hassan II saw this as a very bad idea and rejected it as well.

Thus the AMU is now a zombie

It still exists and makes announcements every 2 years or so but Algeria and Morocco have essentially left the organization unofficially and don't want to participate in it as long as the other is still a member.

Related Links

Why is Morocco more touristic than Algeria and Tunisia?
Why does Algeria oppose Moroccan rule over Western Sahara?

Why are Morocco, Algeria and Tunisia separate countries despite all having a Berber, Arab and French history?

Why did the Ottoman Empire not fight to keep Egypt, Tunis, and Algeria the way they did for Libya? What made Libya so special?

How is the black population in Libya, Algeria, Morocco, Tunisia, and Egypt?
Why is Tunisia so much more Westernized than Algeria, Morocco, or Libya?
How religious are people in Morocco, Algeria and Tunisia?

Why were Morocco and Tunisia made a French protectorate, but Algeria annexed as part of France?

What is the problem between Morocco and Algeria regarding Western Sahara?
How did the pre-colonial Maghreb countries (Tunisia Algeria and Morocco)

Pensez-vous que Macron doit s'excuser pour la colonisation de l'Algérie, la Tunisie?

André Teissier du Cros , Président honoraire et Fondateur chez Comité Bastille (2006-présent) Répondu 1 juil. 2020

Réponse originale : Pensez-vous que Macron doit s'excuser pour la colonisation de l'Algérie, la Tunisie?

Si Emmanuel Macron doit s'excuser de ces colonisations, alors la France doit aussi s'excuser de la colonisation de la Bretagne, de la Corse, de la Franche-Comté, et autres (Indochine, Afrique occidentale et équatoriale, Nouvelle Calédonie, Polynésie…)

La Grande-Bretagne doit s'excuser d'avoir colonisé environ un tiers du territoire français pendant 150 ans et d'avoir colonisé le pays de Galles, l'Irlande et l'Écosse sans parler de l'Inde et d'un grand nombre de territoires qui au XIXe siècle représentaient un quart de l'humanité.

Mais de son côté la France doit s'excuser d'avoir colonisé l'Angleterre en 1066 avec Guillaume le conquérant.

L'Espagne et le Portugal furent de grands colonisateurs avant l'Angleterre et la France…

En outre il est grand temps que l'Italie s'excuse d'avoir fondé l'empire romain qui pendant plusieurs siècles a colonisé la meilleure partie de l'Europe et du monde méditerranéen.

Et puis enfin, que dire de la Grèce d'Alexandre le Grand? des Celtes qui ont colonisé toute l'Europe avant les Romains et pillé plusieurs fois Rome? Et ailleurs n'oublions pas d'autres colonisateurs des Amériques, les derniers étant les Incas? En Équateur ils ont encore de bonnes histoires à raconter sur les joyeux traitements qu'ils subirent il y a juste quelques siècles.

Et l'Empire Arabe? Et l'Empire du Mali en Afrique avant que les Europeens suivent les traces esclavagistes des Arabes?

Croyez-vous qu'il soit vraiment constructif d'ouvrir cette boîte de Pandore?

Ne vaudrait-il pas mieux parler de l'avenir au lieu d'éternellement refaire l'histoire?

Est-ce que l'Algérie est en train de connaître sa révolution, à l'instar de la Tunisie ou de l'Égypte ?

Alexandre Roswilo précédents lieux : Afrique (1975 - 2019) Mis à jour le 19 févr. 2020

Belle question !

"Sa révolution à l'instar de la Tunisie ou de l'Égypte!"

[1]

Quel genre de révolution avons-nous eu en Tunisie et en Égypte ?

Il faut être froid devant la réalité des cas tunisien et égyptien :

- la Tunisie : C'est paradoxalement des individus qui avaient déjà eu des rôles significatifs dans l'ancien régime de Zine el-Abidine Ben Ali qui sont revenus au affaire et plus fort que jamais . Béji Caïd Essebsi [2] , l'actuel chef d'État , a été très proche de Zine el-Abidine Ben Ali .

[3]

- l'Égypte est simplement revenu à la case départ . Mieux le règne des maréchaux continuent . Cette puissant
… (plus)

Notes de bas de page
[1] Image on france24.com
[2] Béji Caïd Essebsi — Wikipédia

Questions similaires

Pourquoi parle-t-on presque toujours de la relation France/Algérie et si peu de la colonisation française en Tunisie et au Maroc ?

Que pensez-vous de la révolution pacifique en Algérie, appelée 'Hirak' ?
Quel résultat envisagez-vous pour la révolution algérienne ?
Combien de personnes ont été tuées lors de la colonisation française de l'Algérie ?

Pourquoi on demande tout le temps à la France de s'excuser envers l'Algérie pour les morts de la Guerre d'Algérie et pas à l'Algérie de s'excuser pour les actes du FLN durant la même période ?

Pourquoi parle-t-on beaucoup de l'indépendance de l'Algérie mais presque jamais de celle du Maroc ou de la Tunisie ?

Quels sont les enjeux, en Algérie et à l'étranger, derrière la réélection ou non de Bouteflika en Algérie ?

Pourquoi les pieds-noirs étaient en danger en Algérie, alors qu'ils étaient assez nombreux (10% de la population totale), et avaient le support de la France ? Ne pouvaient-ils pas se constituer un état indépendant au sein de l'Algérie ?

Pourquoi le Maroc, l'Algérie et la Tunisie sont-ils des pays séparés alors qu'ils ont tous un héritage berbère, arabe et français ?

Pourquoi la France a-t-elle perdu la guerre d'Algérie alors qu'elle a tué beaucoup plus d'Algériens qu'elle n'a

Quels sont les facteurs expliquant que l'Algerie est devenu une colonie française et le Maroc et la Tunisie seulement un protectorat ?

Cariou Ingénieur en Pilote et Emplois et carrières dans l'action sociale, École de l'air (Diplôme obtenu en 1982) 7 mai

Tout ça, c'est du passé.

On oublie ce qu'il y a eu avant.

Au début des temps modernes, au XVIe siècle, dans la Régence d'Alger comme dans les autres ports, Bougie ou Oran, les corsaires obéissent à un dey ou un pacha au pouvoir discrétionnaire, théoriquement vassal du sultan d'Istamboul mais en fait indépendant.

Leur principale source de revenus est la guerre de course en Méditerranée, en d'autres termes la piraterie. Des receleurs européens revendent le fruit des rapines en passant par le port franc de Livourne, en Italie.

On évalue à un million le nombre d'Européens de l'Ouest qui sont enlevés par les Barbaresques au cours de batailles navales et de razzias sur les côtes européennes, entre le XVIe et le XVIIIe siècle. Les prisonniers sont réduits en esclavage dans les propriétés et les harems d'Afrique du Nord.

L'Histoire nous gonfle avec 130 ans de présence française en Afrique du Nord sans jamais parler des siècles et des siècles de barbaresques précédents le long des côtes et parfois bien au-delà.

Questions similaires

Un Algérien d'un certain âge m'a montré la carte d'identité Française qu'il possédait en 1962, juste avant l'indépendance. Il y était noté "Français musulman". Y avait-il bien un système d'apartheid à l'époque de l'Algérie Française ?

François Hollande comme Emmanuel Macron ont reconnu l'injustice et la brutalité de la colonisation française en Algérie. Pourtant, les Algériens semblent toujours attendre plus. Qu'attendent-ils et pourquoi ?

Pourquoi l'Algérie ne s'excuse-t-elle pas auprès de la France pour sa tentative ratée de colonisation? Que se serait-il passé si les Sarrasins n'avaient pas été arrêtés à Poitiers?

Pourquoi les français préfèrent-ils aller en Tunisie ou au Maroc plutôt qu'en Algérie ?

Pourquoi un bon pourcentage des Algériens nés avant l'indépendance (1962) disent que « l'Algérie était beaucoup plus heureuse et prospère du temps de la colonisation française »?

Pourquoi les Français sont-ils qualifiés de colonisateurs en Afrique du Nord, alors que le Maghreb fut d'abord colonisé par les Arabes (au détriment des Kabyles)?

Quelles différences entre la colonisation en Algérie et en Tunisie ? L'occupation en Tunisie a duré plus d'un siècle mais pourtant on entend pas parlé de traumatisme tunisien pourquoi ?

Pourquoi le Maroc, l'Algérie et la Tunisie sont-ils des pays séparés alors qu'ils ont tous un héritage berbère, arabe et français ?

Pourquoi les pieds-noirs étaient en danger en Algérie, alors qu'ils étaient assez nombreux (10% de la population totale), et avaient le support de la France ?

Ne pouvaient-ils pas se constituer un état indépendant au sein de l'Algérie ?
La France a-t-elle répandu l'analphabétisme en Algérie pendant la colonisation ?

La France a-t-elle répandu l'analphabétisme en Algérie pendant la colonisation ?

Thierry Dumoulin, lieu : Alsace Répondu 20 avr. 2021

Quand les français ont débuté la colonisation de l'Algérie, les taux d'alphabétisation de la France et de l'Algérie étaient quasi similaire : environ 12% (soit moins que la proportion de français parlant anglais couramment en ce moment).

L'enseignement primaire se faisait essentiellement des 2 cotés par un enseignement confessionnel.

Les français ont donc favorisé la création des écoles juives et chrétiennes mais ont compliqué le maintien des écoles musulmanes. Non pas pour aculturer les peuples algériens (je tiens au pluriel car l'Algérie en tant qu'état-nation est une création artificielle de la France) mais pour mater toute révolte.

En ce sens, rien n'interdisait les musulmans d'apprendre le français dans les écoles catholiques. Oui, ce n'est pas respectueux de la culture d'autrui mais ca reste une colonisation et la colonisation c'est mal (mon pays impose légalement une loi d'opinion sur ce sujet et je ne veux pas être hors la loi).

Entre 1836 et 1886, date où l'école publique est devenue obligatoire, la France métropolitaine s'est métamorphosée. Elle est devenue plus laïque dans son mode de pensée. Elle est devenue également bien plus instruite. Environ les trois-quarts de la population française savait lire et écrire en 1886.

En Algérie, la population chrétienne et juive a connu une évolution a peu près similaire à la métropole.

L'apprentissage de la langue arabe n'étant pas facilité par l'administration française et la population musulmane ne manifestant que peu d'intéret à apprendre le français, l'alphabétisation de la population musulmane a donc régressé à un taux proche du zéro absolu.

Période de 1886 à 1919

La population européenne et la population juive d'Algérie bénéficie de l'école publique obligatoire. Il n'y a pas de différence notable entre l'enseignement frnçais de métropole et d'Algérie.

En revanche, la population musulmane n'a pas accès à l'instruction publique. Ils ne sont pas citoyen français mais sujet. En ce sens, l'instruction publique n'est pas obligatoire. Seuls quelques privilégiés y ont accès (les fils de chefs de tribus ou de village par exemple). L'instruction supérieur n'est pas accessible à la population musulmane. En 1919, l'alphabetisation de la population musulmane n'arrive même pas au niveau de 1836…

Période de 1919 à l'indépendance

La France rattrape son erreur, les musulmans ont accès en masse à l'instruction publique mais le retard est trop important. A l'indépendance, le retard ne sera pas comblé entièrement : l'alphabetisation de la France métropolitaine était de 92% en 1962 et 85% de l'Algérie.

Et depuis l'indépendance?

Et bien le FLN, plus préoccupé à détourner de l'argent que d'administrer sa population a un bilan affligeant. Le taux d'alphabétisation de l'Algérie diminue d'années en années.

85% en 1962, 22% aujourd'hui….

Alors oui la France a ses torts en ayant priorisé l'accès à l'instruction publique aux population juives et européennes mais cette polémique entamée par le gouvernement algérien est un pétard mouillé pour que la population algérienne ne constate pas leur absolu nullité.

Questions similaires

Pourquoi les Français sont-ils qualifiés de colonisateurs en Afrique du Nord, alors que le Maghreb fut d'abord colonisé par les Arabes (au détriment des Kabyles)?

Pourquoi le Vietnam ne s'est-il jamais plaint de la colonisation française contrairement à l'Algérie ?

Pourquoi la France n'assume-t-elle pas son passé colonial ?
Pourquoi les Français n'arrivent-ils pas à tourner la page de l'Algérie et du colonialisme ?

Pourquoi la France ne s'excuse-t-elle pas une bonne fois pour toutes pour la colonisation vis à vis de l'Algérie ?

Combien de personnes ont été tuées lors de la colonisation française de l'Algérie?

Pourquoi les pieds-noirs étaient en danger en Algérie, alors qu'ils étaient assez nombreux (10% de la population totale), et avaient le support de la France ? Ne pouvaient-ils pas se constituer un état indépendant au sein de l'Algérie ?

La France est-elle prospère à cause de la colonisation ? Si la colonisation n'avait jamais eu lieu, comment se présenterait la France ?

La France doit-elle s'excuser perpétuellement pour avoir eu des colonies en Afrique ?

Quel est le problème profond que l’Algérie a avec la France ?

Comment était l'Algérie avant d'être française ?

François Choltus Précédent lieu : Metz, France 2 ans

L'Algérie n'existait pas en temps qu'état ou même de nation. Ce que l'on appelle l'Algérie était sous domination ottomane au moins officiellement. La régence d'Alger ne contrôlait guère que les environs immédiats d'Alger. La domination ottomane a été particulièrement cruelle. La régence vivait principalement de la piraterie et de la prise et du commerce d'esclaves essentiellement européens. Les ottomans se contentaient de prélever l'impôt par des raids de pillage et n'ont légués aucune infrastructure ni aucun soin de la population. Le seul point un peu positif a été de maintenir un système de répartition de l'eau entre les tribus à peu près correct d'origine berbère.

Il est à noter que sous le régime ottoman, les arabes et les kabyles avaient interdiction de vivre dans la ville d'Alger sous peine de mort. Seuls les ottomanes, les kouloughlis (métis de turcs et d'arabes ou de berbères), des chrétiens islamisés et des esclaves. On y parlait même pas arabe mais un sabir de turc,d'arabe,d'italien, d'espagnol, de français et de kabyle. Étrangement, ce sont les français qui ont permis qu'Alger devienne une ville algérienne.

Questions similaires

Pourquoi la France a-t-elle perdu la guerre d'Algérie ?

Finalement, si l’Algérie était restée française, la France ne serait-elle pas devenu un pays à majorité musulmane ? De manière générale, à quoi ressemblerait la France aujourd'hui si l’Algérie était restée française ?

Comment le reste du monde voit-il l'Algérie ?
Pourquoi certains Algériens font n’importe quoi en France ?
Pourquoi l'Algérie ne devrait jamais être visitée ?
La France a-t-elle encore son mot à dire sur l'Algérie ?

Avant la colonisation française en 1830, l'Algérie (ou les territoires qui la formaient) avait-elle déjà été longuement sous domination étrangère ?

Pourquoi on demande tout le temps à la France de s'excuser envers l'Algérie pour les morts de la Guerre d'Algérie et pas à l'Algérie de s'excuser pour les actes du FLN durant la même période ?

Un Algérien d'un certain âge m'a montré la carte d'identité Française qu'il possédait en 1962, juste avant l'indépendance. Il y était noté "Français musulman". Y avait-il bien un système d'apartheid à l'époque de l'Algérie Française ?

Pourquoi un bon pourcentage des Algériens nés avant l'indépendance

Why did Al-Andalus (Islamic Iberia) become completely Arabised and Muslim in only 400 years, whereas North Africa and the Levant took 800 years to be Arabised?

Dimitris Almyrantis Lover of stories the world has forgotten (2016-present) 10mo

That's a good question. Although I see others doubt your premise, I will agree that it is substantially true. Areas of Spain still in Arab hands in the 12th century were substantially Moslem and Arabized, while the same cannot be said to have happened in Egypt, Syria, and Africa until the 15th century at the earliest. The sole part of Africa I'm fairly sure was Arabized at the same pace as Spain was "Africa Minor" itself, modern Tunisia.

Some may rely on the idea of the convivencia, or cohabitation of Christians, Moslems, and Jews in Spain before the forced conversions of 1492, to infer that Al-Andalus was not Arabized. This would be wrong on all counts. To pick the obvious problem, when the Almohades, a radical Berber religious movement, took over Spain in the 12th century, they declared the dhimma ("protection") that had been extended to Christians and Jews after the initial conquest invalid: these all had to accept Islam or flee into exile, on pain of death (and, much as with the Christian 1492 decree, Jews who converted got stuck as hereditary underclass). Throughout the 12th to 15th centuries, it was Christian Spain and Provence that formed the heartlands of Spanish Jewry under the convivencia.

Obviously, Moslem Spain was fully Arabized after that; but more to the point, the abolition of the dhimma was more a symptom than a cause. It's the signal that the Moslem rulers felt secure enough in practical terms—that enough of the tax base, army, and bureaucracy had been Islamized—that this kind of doing away with the remnants of pre-Islamic Spain was practically possible. We can infer Andalusia had already been substantially Arabized, probably from the 11th century (from other evidence). And this must have happened through normal demographic processes, not royal decrees.

So to explain those processes: in places like Spain and Ifriqiya/Tunisia, which also saw substantial Arabization, the new Arab rulers benefitted from a mix of military colonization and a relatively well-organized Roman bureaucracy they could put to work. These areas, moreover, remained under the uninterrupted control of sedentary Arab emirates from the 7th to the 11th century.

By contrast, the bulk of the Maghreb/Africa and Syria, were far from so secure. Most of the Maghreb saw no more than a century of remote Arab suzerainty until the Berber revolt separated it from Damascus, under self-governing Ibadi and Shi'i tribal republics & caliphates. In these, the Berber ethnic element was predominant, and although a kind of Islamic universality remained in place (the founders of the Ibadi republic in Tlemcen, for instance, were of ethnic Persian stock; the Berber Ibadis and Sufris vocally repudiated the element of racial supremacy that had turned them off of Omeyyade Sunnism).

Only renewed tribal movements in the 11th to 14th centuries brought large Arab tribal confederations into the Maghreb, who then became allied with sedentary Berber-Islamic dynasties like the Marinids of Morocco (r. 1248–1465), who set about transforming the country into a state in which the Arab tribes were predominant (even then, Morocco retained powerful Berber groups into the 20th century). Even so, the 14th or 15th centuries are good breaking points to mark the point in which the Berbers retreated into the mountains rather than ruling the plains and cities.

Syria and Egypt are more complicated, since here the internal policy of the three caliphates—Omeyyade, 'Abbasid, and Fatimite—must be understood. This is (probably) too much for any single answer.

Suffice it to say that after the fall of the Omeyyades, who were themselves not keen on converting the tax-paying dhimmi population, neither Syria nor Egypt were securely controlled by the Baghdad-based caliphate, and the ʻAbbasid dynasty was itself in crisis. The caliphate in Baghdad collapsed in the 860s, and was subsequently unable to exert reliable control outside Mesopotamia, with both Syria and Egypt falling under short-lived Turkish slave dynasties.

The Fatimites were themselves descended from a Berber tribal confederacy of the Maghreb, despite Shi'a Arab leadership, and relied on the Christian rural population to balance out the urban Sunnite Arabs of Egypt. The brief attempt to establish a central dominant culture (Druze-ism, a "universal religion" to which everyone could convert) failed, and actively contributed to the diversity. Add to this that Christian powers—the Franks and Romans—were more powerful than the Moslems in the 10th to 12th centuries, expanding well into Syria and Armenia, and you see why the establishment of an Arab monoculture was not in the cards. Many people likewise forget that another empire, the partially Nestorian-ized (and in foreign policy surely Christian-leaning) Mongols of the Persian Ilkhanate were a factor in the 13th and 14th centuries (these would eventually convert to a form of Islam, but the point remains).

The institutions that actually pushed for the "Arabization" of Egypt and Syria—to a sedentary, Islamic Arabism far removed from Bedu tribal life—were the religious schools (medreses) of Sunnism set up by the Seljuks and propagated by other mamluk-based dynasties in the 13th to 15th centuries. The Mamluk rulers of Cairo in the 14th century faced realistic prospects of a Christian invasion of Egypt from the sea (Catholic Franks) and land ('Nestorian' Mongols), and saw the drastic reduction of the Coptic "fifth column" as a necessity.

Related Links

How credible is the estimate that in its height 80% of the people of Al-Andalus were Muslims? Could that be an overestimation mainly based on the bigger and more cosmopolitan cities and their vicinity, but not appliable to the farther rural areas?

How far did the conversion of native Iberians to Islam go in Al-Andalus? How did Iberian Christians manage to turn most of the people in the reconquered territories ferverously Christian even well before the mass expulsions of Muslims and Jews?

Why didn't France colonize Al-Andalus?
What factors led to the decline of Al-Andalus and the rise of Christian Iberia?

Were Muslims of Al-Andalus ethnically Spaniards/Iberians or Arabs? And are the modern day Andalusians related in any way?

Was there mass emigration to northern Iberia during the first generations of Muslim Arab and Berber conquests, in the 8th up to 10th centuries A.D, or did most people stay put and just adapt to the new religious and political rule?

Why are the Arabs who conquered Andalusia called Moors?

Did most Muslims of Al-Andalus stay in the Iberian peninsula and convert to Christanity rather than go into exile? Are most people in the regions that use to be Al-Andalus descended from these converts? Are there any Muslim traditions that persisted?

Why did Islam lose in Spain in 1492 AD after they conquered it in 670 AD? Were Umayyads and Moors the same people that conquered the Iberian Peninsula?

Why doesn't France leave Algeria alone?

Pierre Jamain

Formerly Manager of SARL (Professional Photo Lab) at Professional Photo Lab (1970 – 2000) 2 years

It is rather the opposite, periodically Algerian governments to divert attention from their bad governance and their corruption ask for apologies and repentances on the colonial past, which does not deter millions of Algerians from settling in the terrible colonizing country.

Similar questions

Why are there tensions between Algeria and Morocco?

Why do France and Algeria, which are so close and love each other, pretend to hate each other and close the border?

Why Algeria has so far failed to recover its independence?

Why doesn't France cede Corsica to Italy?

Why don't you like France?

Does France still have a say in Algeria?

Why does France refuse the independence of Algeria?

Alexis Varin

Those interested in the archives have read many books 12 oct.

France is just waiting for Algeria to let it go today. Except that Algeria clings to France to insult it sent these troubles made in France and to continue to develop a false history of colonization. Algeria does not know how to manage itself and to maintain power nothing better than to continue to speak of the common enemy otherwise it has been a long time that Algeria would no longer exist the Kabyles would have crossed out the south too etc etc.

Similar questions

Is the independence of Algeria a success?

If the "pieds-noirs" had not left Algeria after independence, would cohabitation with Muslims have been possible, such as the Afrikaners and blacks in South Africa, and Algeria would be fine? better?

Why did the 350,000 Algerians who lived in (metropolitan) France in 1962 not return to Algeria when it became independent?

An elderly Algerian showed me the French identity card he had in 1962, just before independence. It was noted "French Muslim". Was there really an apartheid system at the time of French Algeria?

Why did Algeria's War of Independence last for almost 8 years despite France being able to withdraw from Algeria earlier?

Why is it only with Algeria that relations are often tense when France has occupied other countrie

Are we witnessing the birth of a new form of colonization in the West, particularly in France, by African migrants whose number continues to increase day by day?

Remi Beral Location: France (1999 – today) 14 Oct.

It is not the number that makes the colonization but the behavior. For example the Greeks were few in Egypt yet Ptolemaic Egypt was a Greek kingdom. The Romans were few in number in Gaulle yet there were many Roman colonies in Gaulle which made it possible to ensure control of the region. We could speak of colonization if the immigrants kept their culture of origin without becoming acculturated and aspired to take power. However, it is not the case.

Similar questions

Why do we say that colonization is a necessary evil?

Is France prosperous because of colonization? If colonization had never taken place, what would France look like?

What are the disadvantages of colonization in Africa?

What are the consequences of colonization?

Is colonization a necessary evil?

Why are the French called colonizers in North Africa, when the Maghreb was first

Are Kabyles smarter than other Algerians?

Super Hoover 5 p.m.

Yet another bitch question with the sole purpose of dividing Algerians in particular and Africans in general, Westerners have been trying to do this for at least 600 years and it hasn't worked what does he make you believe will it bear fruit now?

The Amazighs in general have the goal of bringing together all of Africa, or to a lesser extent its north, the Westerners have tried to negotiate with the Kabyles for a long time to encourage them to form their own countries, everyone agreed on almost everything apart from the borders of Tamazgha, where the Westerners wanted to separate all of Africa into a small region easy to manipulate the Kabyle wanted to unite all the north as the map shows, support has ceased since so as an answer to the question I would answer: if you want gas or oil we sell to everyone, and if you want to spend beautiful days in the company of Algerians you are welcome, our reception of entranés is legendary.

But if you want to preach anything you can shove it up your ass.

Related:Are Kabyles smarter than other Algerians?

Celestin Louison

Entrepreneur at Commerce international (2017 – present) Updated 26 Jul.

There is definitely a clumsy form of racism in your question…

The Kabyles are certainly not " smarter" than the rest of the population of Algeria and the Maghreb countries or the world!

I know many bewildered, miserable and uneducated extremists in Kabylie and like in any other place on this planet for that matter...

What I understand in your question, tell me if I'm wrong, is that the Kabyles may "integrate" better into Western societies. Which would have nothing to do with intelligence for once.

Just know that some things need to be educated, such as the desire for openness and humanism that must underlie current societies in order to prosper and exchange.

Algeria still has a little trouble with that. Some people see it as an ode to dubious compromises, especially with Western countries. We all know the reasons, which does not exclude the Algerian people from having the right to time to recover.

This is perhaps less of a concern in some Berber regions, and notably in Kabylia, where Sufi intellectuals and historians have been instrumental in easing tensions and targeting the real issues for an upward exit. They, for example, called on the Kabyles to speak of Islam in scientific terms to return to a moment in the history of teaching openness and humanism.

This requires upstream, a highly diversified philosophical and literary education - from Greek philosophers to French poets and writers.

Similar Questions

Finally, if Algeria had remained French, wouldn't France have become a country with a Muslim majority? In general, what would France look like today if Algeria had remained French?

Why are Morocco, Algeria and Tunisia separate countries when they all have Berber, Arab and French heritage?

Why do the Berbers look like the Arabs when genetically they are 2 very different populations?

Why do Arabs hate Kabyles?

Are the Kabyles descendants of Nordic peoples?

Why do the "kabyles" not consider themselves Arabs?

Wouldn't Algeria, which is equipped with Russian military equipment, have done better to supply itself to France?

Romain Colombon Former student in Human Sciences 24 oct.

She couldn't for political reasons. Military contracts are political, it comes down to asking who do you want to be protected by. I do not see in this Algeria getting closer to its former colonizer, who serves as a scapegoat for all its internal problems. Then buying French weapons also means getting closer to the West and NATO, which raises two concerns:
A democratic country would risk asking for accounts, which can be embarrassing for the Algerian authorities. An authoritarian country like Russia asks nothing of it, on the contrary it supports dictatorships that resemble it.

Algeria has a more or less latent conflict with Morocco, because of Western Sahara. Morocco turned to the West for its armament. Its Royal Air Forces are equipped with French (Mirage F1 and 2000–9) and American (F-16) fighters, for example. My enemy's friend can hardly be my protector...

This is not an absolute impossibility in the long term either, but it would require long diplomatic work and many changes.

Similar questions

Could Nazi Germany have survived if it hadn't gone to war?

Is the Russian army stronger than the French army?

How have the jihadists in the Sahel found so many weapons and logistical means to resist the French army for several years? Are they the puppets that serve the interests of a Western state lurking in the shadows?

Why is Saudi Arabia ranked ahead of France in terms of military power?

Why is Putin's Russia policy so aggressive?

Is there a new war between Algeria and France, who wins?

Why are the Algerian authorities blocking the return to the country of their expelled nationals?

For having worked in Algeria and having spoken about it with officers of the Algerian gendarmerie. They only said "why do we have to bring 'scum' home if we can leave it to you, we have everything to gain"

Related Links: https://fr.quora.com/#:~:text=1-,add%20a%20comment,Town%20in%20Algeria%20%2D%20Patrick%20Crosset%27s%20post%20in%20Africa%20is%20Back%20%3F,-1.2k%20%C2%A0views

Similar questions

Why is it only with Algeria that relations are often tense when France has occupied other countries?

Why are Algerians so proud of their country but at the same time fleeing it en masse?

Why do Algerians, at least those in France, speak French so well?

Why do Maghreb countries refuse to take back their nationals who have entered French territory illegally?

Why do some Algerians do anything in France?

Why did the 350,000 Algerians who lived in (metropolitan) France in 1962

Algeria, land of North African contrasts

Your trip Posted by Landmarks History I am creative, curious, passionate and versatile

Travel essentials - your trip

Travel essentials, no matter the trip Ultimately, my favorite thing to do in this world (outside of spending time with my family) is travel; and although I usually brag in my blog about only using carry-on.....there is a list of items that I

https://votrevoyage.fun/index.php/essentials-of-travel/

Algeria, a land of contrasts in North Africa, is the 11th largest country in the world and the 2nd largest in Africa. The main cities of Algeria are Algiers the capital and Oran. About 80%-90% of Algeria is made up of the Sahara Desert and has one of the largest sand dunes. To the north, the Mediterranean Sea stretches over 1,200 km of coastline, while to the south, the desert stretches over almost two million square kilometres. Although Algeria remains underdeveloped when it comes to tourist attractions, there is still plenty to see and do in this African country. So book cheap flights to Algiers and get ready for an exciting holiday in Algeria.

From the prehistoric rock art of Tassili n'Ajje to the impressive palaces and botanical gardens of Algiers, there is certainly something for everyone. For many tourists, just soaking up the atmosphere of the country's ancient cities, attractions and desert region is enough to inspire them to plan their next visit to this captivating country. Many people choose to vacation in Algeria, enjoying the sunny weather, warmth and beauty of the Mediterranean coastline. Also found in the Oran region are a number of bustling resorts where visitors can indulge in various relaxing recreational activities. Some of the country's attractions that visitors cannot afford to miss while on vacation in Algeria include

The Botanical Gardens of Algiers: The Botanical Gardens of Algiers are known locally as the Jardin d'Essai du Hamma and are open after a long period of renovation. Created in 1832, these gardens are the oldest in the world and are one of the main attractions of the capital. The garden is divided into a French garden, an English garden and a zoo, each with its own specialty, where you can admire thousands of animal and plant species.

Notre Dame d'Afrique: This impressive Roman Catholic church overlooks the Bay of Algiers and is perched atop a cliff 410 feet above sea level. It is heavily influenced by French architecture and is a major attraction of Algiers. A daily mass in French is offered but visitors come here to enjoy the splendid beauty of its architecture. So don't wait to book cheap tickets to Algeria because the country has something to offer everyone.

Ben Aknoun Zoo: Located southwest of Algiers, this zoological garden is one of Algeria's top tourist attractions and, in fact, one of the oldest in Africa. The zoo has many restaurants, hotels and picnic areas where visitors can spend their free time and recharge their batteries.

Tipaza: Algeria is also home to several heritage sites and Tipaza is one of them. Once a famous Roman military colony, Tipaza has fascinating ruins of the city's Great Basillica, its Roman baths, its amphitheater and numerous mosaics . For more it's here...

Did France spread illiteracy in Algeria during colonization?

Thierry Dumoulin Location: Alsace 1 year

When the French began the colonization of Algeria, the literacy rates of France and Algeria were almost similar: around 12% (i.e. less than the proportion of French speaking English fluently at this time).

Primary education was essentially done on both sides by denominational education.

The French therefore favored the creation of Jewish and Christian schools but complicated the maintenance of Muslim schools. Not to aculturate the Algerian peoples (I want to use the plural because Algeria as a nation-state is an artificial creation of France) but to put down any revolt.

In this sense, nothing prohibited Muslims from learning French in Catholic schools. Yes, it's not respectful of other people's culture but it's still colonization and colonization is bad (my country legally imposes a law of opinion on this subject and I don't want to be outside the law).

Between 1836 and 1886, when public school became compulsory, metropolitan France was transformed. She became more secular in her way of thinking. She also became much more educated. About three-quarters of the French population could read and write in 1886.

In Algeria, the Christian and Jewish population experienced an evolution roughly similar to that of mainland France.

Since learning the Arabic language was not facilitated by the French administration and the Muslim population showed little interest in learning French, the literacy of the Muslim population therefore declined to a rate close to absolute zero. .

Period from 1886 to 1919

The European population and the Jewish population of Algeria benefit from compulsory public schooling. There is no notable difference between French education in mainland France and Algeria.

On the other hand, the Muslim population does not have access to public education. They are not French citizens but subjects. In this sense, public education is not compulsory. Only a privileged few have access to it (the sons of tribal or village chiefs, for example). Higher education is not accessible to the Muslim population. In 1919, the literacy of the Muslim population did not even reach the level of 1836...

Period from 1919 to independence

France is making up for its mistake, Muslims have mass access to public education, but the delay is too great. At independence, the delay will not be entirely filled: literacy in metropolitan France was 92% in 1962 and 85% in Algeria.

And since independence?

Well, the FLN, more preoccupied with embezzling money than administering its population, has a distressing record. Algeria's literacy rate is decreasing year after year.

85% in 1962, 22% today….

So yes, France has its faults in having prioritized access to public education for the Jewish and European populations, but this controversy initiated by the Algerian government is a wet firecracker so that the Algerian population does not see their absolute nullity.

Similar questions

Why are the French called colonizers in North Africa, when the Maghreb was first colonized by the Arabs (to the detriment of the Kabyles)?

Why has Vietnam never complained about French colonization unlike Algeria?

Why did France colonize Morocco and Algeria?

An elderly Algerian showed me the French identity card he had in 1962, just before independence. It was noted "French Muslim". Was there really an apartheid system at the time of French Algeria?

Why doesn't France apologize once and for all for the colonization of Algeria?

Why were the Pieds-noirs in danger in Algeria, when they were quite

What do Algerians think of a fifth term for Abdelaziz Bouteflika?

Anise Previous location: Algiers, Algeria (1999 – 0) 4 years

Even if I'm not a fan of Bouteflika, I must admit that when he arrived in 99, the country was in ruins and he managed to rebuild it and give it a fairly modern look.
But, Bouteflika is no longer able to fulfill these functions of president since 2013. And even, he should never have been elected a third time, it is not normal to see, in a supposed “democratic system”, that a candidate can be re-elected 3 times!? And we see him looking for a 5th term!? No but !

But the Algerians know very well, for a good part of the country, that it is no longer he who rules, but rather an oligarchy made up of businessmen and some generals of the army, in particular “Gaid Salah” who we see very often and who is one of the only generals to have kept his position during the purges.

These people do not have a modern vision of the economy, they are old and time has passed them. If Bouteflika is “re-elected”, for me Algeria will no longer progress, and we will be behind our neighbors (we are already a little behind in economic diversification).

I still love my country….but with these leaders, Algeria is doomed to stagnate.

And knowing my compatriots, a revolution would be possible.

Similar questions

Bouteflika's resignation, will it be a big change for Algeria?

Young Algerians: What memories do you have of Mohamed Boudiaf?

Who was Mohamed Boudiaf? How did he mark the history of Algeria?

What do you think is President Bouteflika's record after 20 years in power in Algeria?

From when was the "law and order operation" in Algeria renamed "Algerian war"?

Why do French descendants of Algerians, born in the 90s/2000s, feel less French than all the other people Should France have kept one or two towns landlocked in Algeria after ceding independence?

Paul Henri Doumenc

Game.

Why, continue to pay to support Algerians? France did not cede independence. France won the war in Algeria and decided to get rid of it. France has spent astronomical sums to keep the Algerian economy afloat, money that France lacked to rebuild itself after the war, at one point we must say stop.

Similar Links

An elderly Algerian showed me the French identity card he had in 1962, just before independence. It was noted "French Muslim". Was there really an apartheid system at the time of French Algeria?

Why do we always ask France to apologize to Algeria for the dead of the Algerian War and not Algeria to apologize for the actions of the FLN during the same period?

Finally, if Algeria had remained French, wouldn't France have become a country with a Muslim majority? In general, what would France look like today if Algeria had remained French?

Why were the Pieds-noirs in danger in Algeria, when they were quite numerous (10% of the total population), and had the support of France? Couldn't they constitute an independent state within Algeria?

Why doesn't Algeria apologize to France for its failed attempt at colonization? What would have happened if the Saracens had not been stopped at Poitiers?

Is it true that during the colonization of Algeria, the French wanted to naturalize the Kabyles, send them to the

How to explain that since the independence of Algeria, Pieds-Noirs have not felt the need to resettle there?

Mohammad Grini Location: Algiers, Algeria 1:00 p.m.

In 1962, Algeria gained independence. No longer feeling attached to this country which was part of France (French Algeria), nearly a million Pieds-noirs left it to join their true homeland. On the other hand, those who considered themselves to be full-fledged Algerians stayed and live normally with their citizens.

These French who stayed in Algeria

While in the summer of 1962 the massive repatriation of French people was organized, two hundred thousand of them chose not to leave Algeria. We went to meet them.

https://www.telerama.fr/monde/ces-francais-restes-en-algerie,78940.php

Similar questions

Why were the French so attached to keeping Algeria?

If the "pieds-noirs" had not left Algeria after independence, would cohabitation with Muslims have been possible, such as the Afrikaners and blacks in South Africa, and Algeria would be fine? better?

Where did the Jews of Algeria go after the independence of Algeria in 1962?

Why were the Pieds-noirs in danger in Algeria, when they were quite numerous (10% of the total population), and had the support of France? Couldn't they constitute an independent state within Algeria?

Could Algeria have remained French?

How do you see the near future of Algeria?

Why doesn't Algeria being the second in Africa manufacture its own equipment instead of getting it from the Russians?

Ogre-Mercenary DEUG in Media, Culture and Communication and History , Sorbonne Nouvelle University - Paris 3 (Diploma obtained in 1992) 17 Nov.

Original question: Why does Algeria being the second in Africa not manufacture its own equipment instead of getting it from the Russians?

In my opinion for two reasons:

The first is the curse of rent. It is very, very tempting for a state that has significant natural resources to be content to live off the export of its natural resources. In general, this leads to an underdevelopment of other sectors (among other problems), which of course inhibits the development of the industry.

The second is the complexity of the production of armaments (I assume that the "equipment" you mention is the famous Russian military equipment purchased by Algeria). The know-how necessary to produce even small arms is a very difficult thing to acquire, not to mention the massive investments necessary to develop an industry of this type. It also takes a lot of time, because it is not enough to spend billions of Algerian Dinars for the factories to start producing. Before that, you have to train engineers, skilled workers, find the necessary resources (for example rare metals like chromium or tungsten)… And we are only talking about a relatively simple industry, which does not involve electronic components sharp. Russia, being cut off from the European market, can no longer produce tanks, missiles or planes, even its automobile sector is suffering because it is not capable of producing the advanced electronic components which ensure the functioning of all these machinery. She knows how to make some simple components, but for anything that is more advanced technology, it requires decades of continuous investment that she has not made. Algeria, if it wanted to embark on such an adventure, would not only need a stable and massive investment plan, but also time, probably one or two generations, in order to train the people who will train the future workers of the sector… nor aircraft, even its automotive sector is suffering because it is not able to produce the advanced electronic components that keep all these machines running. She knows how to make some simple components, but for anything that is more advanced technology, it requires decades of continuous investment that she has not made. Algeria, if it wanted to embark on such an adventure, would not only need a stable and massive investment plan, but also time, probably one or two generations, in order to train the people who will train the future workers of the sector… nor aircraft, even its automotive sector is suffering because it is not able to produce the advanced electronic components that keep all these machines running. She knows how to make some simple components, but for anything that is more advanced technology, it requires decades of continuous investment that she has not made. Algeria, if it wanted to embark on such an adventure, would not only need a stable and massive investment plan, but also time, probably one or two generations, in order to train the people who will train the future workers of the sector… is not capable of producing the advanced electronic components that make all these machines work. She knows how to make some simple components, but for anything that is more advanced technology, it requires decades of continuous investment that she has not made. Algeria, if it wanted to embark on such an adventure, would not only need a stable and massive investment plan, but also time, probably one or two generations, in order to train the people who will train the future workers of the sector… is not capable of producing the advanced electronic components that make all these machines work. She knows how to make some simple components, but for anything that is more advanced technology, it requires decades of continuous investment that she has not made. Algeria, if it wanted to embark on such an adventure, would not only need a stable and massive investment plan, but also time, probably one or two generations, in order to train the people who will train the future workers of the sector…

This, in my opinion, is why Algeria is not ready to manufacture its own military equipment. And I pass on the structural problems of the country which, without constituting an impossible barrier to cross, would dramatically slow down the development of such an industry...

Similar questions

Why is it only with Algeria that relations are often tense when France has occupied other countries?

Why do we always ask France to apologize to Algeria for the dead of the Algerian War and not Algeria to apologize for the actions of the FLN during the same period?

Why do Moroccans not support Algerians, who nevertheless have a similar culture?

Why do some Algerians do anything in France?

For us African countries who are under the influence of French colonial imperialism, do you think that signing protection agreements with Russia or even China will allow us to get rid of France and its imposed currency?

Why many migrants from Algeria have been able to remain modest and

COUNTRY FACT FILE

Location
In NW Africa from Mediterranean Sea into the Sahara Desert.

Official title of the state
Democratic and Popular Algerian Republic (English)

Arabic - Al-Jumhūriyyah Al-Jazāʾiriyyah Ad-Dīmuqrāṭiyyah Ash-Shaʿbiyyah (الجمهورية الجزائرية الديمقراطية الشعبية,); French - République algérienne démocratique et populaire French

Flag description

Two equal vertical bands of green (hoist side) and white; a red, five-pointed star within a red crescent centered over the two-color boundary; the colors represent Islam (green), purity and peace (white), and liberty (red); the crescent and star are also Islamic symbols, but the crescent is more closed than those of other Muslim countries because the Algerians believe the long crescent horns bring happiness.

Neighbours
Libya, Tunisia on E. Morocco on W.
Mauritania, Mali, Niger on S. Land boundaries; total 6343 km. Border countries; Libya 982 km, Mali 1376 km, Mauritania 463 km, Morocco 1559 km, Niger 956 km, Western Sahara 42 km.

Founder of The Nation
Ferhat Abass & Ahmed Benbela

Local division
48 department (Wilayat)

Government type
Republic – presidential

Legislation chamber
Bicameral Parliament

Form of Government
Republic
A multi-party with two legislative bodies

Head of State is the President who is elected every 5 years.
The President is not limited by any term length. Council of the nation 192 seats by party, members are elected indirectly to serve for six-year terms. The National People's Assembly, 389 seats by party, members are elected by direct popular vote to serve for five-year terms.

Executive branch
President, Prime minister, Bicameral parliament.
The President is both the chief of State and head of government.
President elected by popular vote to serve for five-year terms without presidential term limits, (the November, 2008 constitution amendment abolished presidential term limits).

Former Rulers
1963 - 1965 Ahmed Ben Bella
1965 - 1978 Colonel Houari Boumédienne
1979 - 1992 Colonel Chadli Bendjadid
1992 –1994 Mohammed Boudiaf/Ali Kafi
1994 – 1999 Liamine Zéroual
1999 – Present Abdelaziz Bouteflika

Judicial chamber
Supreme Court

Capital city
Algiers (Al-Jazair) Altitude 59 mtrs/194 ft
Geographic coordinates 36.45N, 3.03E. It's name derived from Arabic word "El-Djazair", meaning for "the islands", situated on the west side of a bay of the Mediterranean sea. And believed to be founded on AD 944.

Name of main towns
Constantine, Annaba, Setif, Sidi bel-abbes, Blida, Skikda, Bejaia, Tlemeen.

Date of independence
5th July, 1962.

Religions (Major)
Muslim (sunni), a State religion.

Main spoken languages
Arabic/French (official), Berber widely spoken.

Currency unit
Algerian Dinar (DZD) =100 Centimes.

Area in Km2
2,381,741,00.

Country area comparison in Africa
1 out of 55 states.

Demographic terms;
Average annual population growth rate ;- 1.177 %
Birth rate 16.71 births per 1,000 population
Death rate 4.66 deaths per 1,000 population
Average life expectancy ;- 74.26 years
Males 72.57 years ; Females 76.04 years;

Main Export Items
Hydrocarbons, Crud oil, Petroleum products, Natural gas, Wines, Tobacco, foodstuffs.

Economy is based on Oil and Gas condensate.

Climate
Temperate on the east varying to hot and dry in the South.

Extremes;-
Lowest point; Chott Melrhir 40 mtrs.
Highest point; Tahat 3,003 mtrs.

Weather of the Capital city Algiers - (Al-Jazair) annual average temperature 16.4oC.

Altitude	59 mtrs/194 ft
Hottest Month	August 29 oc
Coldest month	January 9-15 oc.
Driest Month	July 1mm average Rf.
Wettest Month	December 140 mm average Rf.

Measures
Metric system.

Time zone
GMT/UTC+0 in the winter months, GMT/UTC+1 hour in the summer.

Public holidays
November 1, July 5, June 19, All Muslim holidays.

Ethnic groups
Arabs 75%, Berbers 25%.

Topographic & Environmental concern
The tall location on the coast comprises fertile plains 50-100 miles wide with a moderate climate and adequate two major chains of the Atlas mts. running roughly EW and reaching 7000 ft. enclose a dry plateau region, below lies the Sahara mostly desert with major mineral resources. Environment: soil erosion from overgrazing and other poor farming practices; desertification; dumping of raw sewage, petroleum refining wastes, and other industrial effluents is leading to the pollution of rivers and coastal waters.

Economy Overview

Industry
Petroleum-crude, natural gas, light industries, mining, electrical, petro-chemicals, food processing.

Chief crops
Grains (wheat, barley, oats), wine grapes, potatoes, dates, tomatoes, oranges, olives, citrus. : Sheep, cattle.

Natural resources;
Mercury, crude-oil, iron ore, uranium, lead, zinc, coal, copper, natural gas, phosphates.

Land in use
Arable land 13%.

Marine:
Coastline; 998 km.

Commercial Sea ports:-
Algiers (El-djazir), Oran

Development prospect;-
The government responded to the pressures of the Arab Spring of Middby starting a process of political reforms that is due to be completed by mid-2012. Large-scale infrle East and North Africa (MENA) astructure projects such as the East-West highway and the Algiers metro have helped cushion this – the rails for the metro, for example, are being manufactured locally. The growth of the domestic market will be critical, as the economy still remains dependent on oil and gas, making up over 95% of exports. Agricultural reforms have been successful, boosting local agri-business firms such as Cevital, and international ones such as Danone and Arla. Algeria maintains $150bn in foreign reserves, thanks to the prudent management of hydrocarbon revenue, allowing it to deflect social tension at the expense of fiscal rectitude. Algiers raised civil service salaries and the minimum wage, while President Abdelaziz Bouteflika's wish to "eliminate all superfluous expenses" from the 2011 budget remains a dead letter. In May 2011, the government pushed through another exceptional budget measure, raising spending by 25% to $112bn.

Regulations intended to give local companies a clear advantage over foreign firms by limiting foreign ownership to 49% have dampened investor interest. The government has tinkered with the regulations so that foreign investors can retain control by partnering up with at least two Algerian investors who will share 51%. The IMF warns that such measures will also prohibit majority foreign-owned banks from setting up in the country.

The construction and oil and gas industries remain some of the strongest sectors. In 2012, the Italian government is due to seal final approvals of the Galsi gas pipeline that will provide a direct link between the two countries. Meanwhile Sonatrach, Petrovietnam Exploration Production Corporation and PTT Exploration and Production Algeria are developing a 20,000 barrel-per-day prospect on the Bir Seba field. The country's telecoms market has lagged behind its North African neighbours as the government's battle for control of Egypt's Orascom Telecom's Djezzy brand drags on. The national telecoms regulator launched its first bids for a 3G mobile licence in September 2011. At the same time as Tunisians were overthrowing the regime, violent protests that left five people dead in Algeria in January 2011 were interpreted by the government as a reaction against the high cost of living. The government increased subsidies on stable goods such as sugar, oil, cereals and milk.

Was General de Gaulle aware of the massacres of October 17, 1961?

Hamid Sam

.

Follow Passionate about politics. Tue.

Yes

Summary of an article from France 24 I read today:

General De Gaulle would have been informed by Bernard Tricot, his advisor on Algerian affairs of the massacre as well as the number of deaths amounting to about fifty even if officially there were less than 10 dead. He would also have advised General De Gaulle to take a stand in this case in order to show everyone that he does not tolerate police blunders.

One should normally see the responsibilities released as any illegal act but this was not the case.

The reason? According to journalist Patrice Arfi, General De Gaulle was in a weak position within his own party. He claims that the head of his government (Michel Debré) was in a position of influence vis-à-vis De Gaulle. This guy was extremely hostile to Algerian issues, specifically Muslim issues.

If you notice the far-right politicians (LEPEN, Bardella, Zemmour), they all say they are attached to Gallic politics. A Quoran has already asked the question of whether General De Gaulle was a racist, the one who answered has balanced all the words of General De Gaulle on the Muslims of France. He recalled that France is not a Muslim country and that Muslims and Arabs should remain a minority. These are his own words; to General De Gaulle. I thus ask myself the question of whether General De Gaulle's desire to shed light on the massacre was sincere or just a decoy?

Laurent N

.

Follow

I've had severallives playing.

Why can't the French turn the page on Algeria and colonialism?

It is a matter of annuities.

It is the memorial rent that allows the children of mujahideen (FLN fighters) to ensure the survival of the system of prevarication of the oil rent set up by a mafia and clan junta.

A semolina problem in Constantine: it is the fault of the France. The same problem in Oran: it is the fault of these Moroccan pennies.
A demonstration against the government in Algiers: it is a plot by the ambassador of France and the DGSE.

It's always the others. Easy.

Meanwhile the mafia and clan military junta has plunged the country into Islamism thanks to its policy of Arabization, into poverty thanks to advanced socialism, into civil war etc.

On the other hand, to obtain France a student visa for his son, the Algerian general is ready for all the rodomontades.

Algerians deserve better than that.

Similar questions

Was Charles de Gaulle the only Truly Patriotic and Effective French president or has there been a better one than him since his death?

Why did General de Gaulle, as President of the Fifth Republic and therefore Head of the Armed Forces, sometimes wear his brigadier general's outfit?

Was Charles de Gaulle a racist?

Why did General de Gaulle pardon Pétain, when he deserved the death penalty?

Did De Gaulle get along with all his ministers?

Do you like the figure of General de Gaulle?

Was General de Gaulle a royalist?

Doesn't it shock you that political figures pay tribute to Charles de Gaulle when he had refused in his will their presence at his funeral (and therefore, one can think, tributes)?

What were Charles de Gaulle's flaws?

Can De Gaulle be considered the best French president of all time?

How would you describe the dispute between Morocco and Algeria?

Originally, it was the same Berber peoples from different tribes. So this dispute does not make sense.

It is maintained by leaders who look for external enemies to mask internal problems.

The sauce is well known.

Similar questions

Why are we asking the France all the time to apologize to Algeria for the dead of the Algerian War and not to Algeria to apologize for the actions of the FLN during the same period?

Why are Morocco, Algeria and Tunisia separate countries when they all have Berber, Arab and French heritage?

What do you think of Algerians?

As a French "native", do you have Maghreb or Muslim friends, how do they live the polemics? Are they really as the media portrays them?

Why is Algeria so concerned about its neighbor Morocco? jealousy? inactivity? envy?

Do Algerians, Moroccans and Tunisians speak Arabic close enough to understand each other from one country to another?

Is it more or less possible to differentiate between an Algerian, a Moroccan, a Tunisian, on the basis of their traits (such as a Spaniard, a Frenchman, a German) or is it impossible?

Will English soon replace French as the second language of Tunisia, Morocco and Algeria?

Why are Algerians so proud of their country but at the same time fleeing it en masse?

Why don't Moroccans support Algerians, who have a similar culture?

Comment décririez-vous le différend entre le Maroc et l'Algérie ?

Nathalie

.

Suivre

Connaissances : Françaisdim.

Les algériens sont un peuple sans histoire doté d'un état artificiel et belliqueux, contaminé par la violence, l'islamisme et le républicanisme français. Les marocains sont un peuple servile, doté d'un régime médiéval, ils sont pauvres et leurs moeurs délurées. Les marocains sont marqués par la haute montagne ou l'océan tandis que les algériens sont des méditerranéens. L'Algérie a vécu sous toutes les républiques françaises sauf la première jusqu'à ce que les algériens ont pris les armes contre la France et ont créé une république révolutionnaire. Les marocains en revanche ont pris fait et cause pour leur sultan humilié puis exilé reconduisant leur allégeance ancienne au trône alaouite. Aujourd'hui encore le Maroc attire les touristes tandis que l'Algérie peine à oublier une épouvante guerre civile.

Similar questions

Why are we asking the France all the time to apologize to Algeria for the dead of the Algerian War and not to Algeria to apologize for the actions of the FLN during the same period?

Why are Morocco, Algeria and Tunisia separate countries when they all have Berber, Arab and French heritage?

What do you think of Algerians?

As a French "native", do you have Maghreb or Muslim friends, how do they live the polemics? Are they really as the media portrays them?

Why is Algeria so concerned about its neighbor Morocco? jealousy? inactivity? envy?

Do Algerians, Moroccans and Tunisians speak Arabic close enough to understand each other from one country to another?

Is it more or less possible to differentiate between an Algerian, a Moroccan, a Tunisian, on the basis of their traits (such as a Spaniard, a Frenchman, a German) or is it impossible?

Will English soon replace French as the second language of Tunisia, Morocco and Algeria?

Why are Algerians so proud of their country but at the same time fleeing it en masse?

Why don't Moroccans support Algerians, who have a similar culture?

Why is Algeria an underdeveloped country despite its wealth?

Fredrick K

.

Follow

Freelancersam.

Top 5 reasons

Image Source: Flickr

Much of the Western world sees the advanced infrastructure of France, Germany or the United States and therefore assumes that these countries are more developed than many developing countries. Yet many developing countries are just as rich as these so-called developed countries. The truth is that there is no fixed rule for determining whether a country is developed or not. Developed and undeveloped countries simply have different economies and rates of development. Here are 5 reasons why Algeria is an underdeveloped country despite being a rich country.

The population of Algeria is large.

Fertility rates are the key to understanding a country's population. The higher the fertility rate, the more children the average woman will have in her lifetime. This means that the population is growing and aging at the same time. With Algeria having a very low fertility rate of 2.5 children per woman, the population is aging rapidly. By 2035, the population will decrease by 8% and by 2075, it will decrease by 30%. A low fertility rate is a sure sign of underdevelopment. The combination of a large population and a low fertility rate means that Algeria has a huge need for social and economic resources. Algeria has no way of providing for all these people without a considerable increase in investment.

Algeria has a young population and a lack of skilled labor.

Algeria's high birth rate means that there will be a large youth population in the future. However, these young people are not educated and do not have jobs. They are therefore a burden on the Algerian economy and government. The government has tried to encourage private investment and has also encouraged young people to continue their education. But there are simply not enough jobs to absorb all the new educated workers. So there are a large number of unemployed young people. Young people are a burden on the Algerian government and economy. Algeria's young population has many problems: - Young people are not educated. - They are unemployed. - They are a burden on the government. - They are a burden on the economy.

Algeria's economy is small and based on oil exports.

The size of the Algerian economy is small compared to other North African countries. Libya's economy is much larger than Algeria's. Libya produces a very large amount of oil from that country's vast oil fields. Revenues from oil exports are almost enough to pay for everything Algeria needs from foreign nations. Algeria's economy is also lagging behind. The government is trying to encourage private investment. But almost all of the country's business activities are controlled by the government. Therefore, the Algerian economy does not change much. Algeria has the natural resources to become an important producer of food and other goods. But the government does not allow it because Algeria wants to export oil.

Corruption is widespread within the government.

It is very difficult to do business in Algeria. It is very difficult to obtain a licence to engage in any commercial activity. To obtain a permit, a business owner must bribe government officials. This is particularly true in the energy, mining and construction sectors. Corruption also exists in the field of education. Many businessmen send their children to private schools. But they have to bribe school officials so that their children can go. Corruption is very high in the Algerian government. It is difficult to change this situation because many people profit from corruption. It's a good way to make money, get a permit, or get admitted to a good school.

The education system is weak.

The low youth literacy rate, the weakness of education programmes and the weakness of the government education system all contribute to Algeria's low level of development. The literacy rate is only 66% among young Algerians. This means that only one in six people can read and write. In addition, only 56% of young Algerians go to school. This is a very low percentage compared to other countries in the region. Education in Algeria is poorly organized. The government does not control most schools. These schools are run by religious groups, the military, or other groups that are interested in the government's education system.

Summary

Algeria may be one of the richest countries in Africa, but it is an underdeveloped country. The reason for this is that the Algerian population is large, its economy is small and its population is young. All these factors contribute to a very low level of development. The government has tried to encourage private investment and has also encouraged young people to continue their education. But there are simply not enough jobs to absorb all the new educated workers. So there are a large number of unemployed young people. The education system is weak and the literacy rate of young people is very low. Corruption within the Algerian government is widespread.

Similar questions

Why do the French prefer to go to Tunisia or Morocco rather than Algeria?

Which countries in Africa are the richest, and what is the main source of their wealth?

In a certain African country, only those who are members of the ruling party and those who are close to the president are allowed to become rich. Can such a country become developed, rich and prosperous?

What does the poorest place in the richest country and the richest place in the poorest country look like?

Is France rich and developed just because it has stolen resources from other countries?

Why in Algeria are the people hungry when this country has a lot of natural wealth?

Why is Algeria a rich country and its population poor?

Why is France considered the most advanced country in Europe?

What is preventing countries like Algeria and Morocco from developing?

Have all developed and rich countries developed and enriched themselves by exploiting poor and underdeveloped Unusual 'Mushroom rock' (also called Pedestal rock) in Tamanrasset, Saharian desert, Algeria.

Kathleen Pennell's Posts

.

Follow

Posted by

Kathy Pennell

Jun 9

This naturally occurring rock is formed as a result of wind erosion and weathering and this unique shape is due to the different rate of wind erosion at the top and bottom of the rock.

Source: Earth Unreal

Why does Algeria oppose Moroccan rule over Western Sahara?

Ahmed Abdelhaq Zaydan

Lived in Meknès, Morocco (1996–0)3y

Because Algeria sees Morocco as a threat and is worried over what the future may hold in store if Morocco succeeds in the Western Sahara.

Since the 1930s, Moroccan Nationalists have envisioned a rebirth of the Moroccan Empires of old starting with Allal al-Fassi's Greater Morocco dream which played a major role in Istiqlal's official ideology. (Istiqlal was ,until the mid 1960s, Morocco's dominant political faction.)

Now whether or not Morocco should take all of the envisioned Greater Morocco has been debated by the Nationalists but on two aspects, there was agreement:

- Western Algeria is Moroccan.
- Morocco should be the leader of Northern and Western Africa.

This stems from history.

Western Algeria has historically been ruled by Morocco at various points. Although the last time Morocco invaded Western Algeria was in 1831 with Sultan Abdel Rahman's failed assault which was repelled by Ottoman forces. (1) Although Morocco never gave up this goal.

Which brings us to the present.

Since the late 1950s, Morocco has been ambitious and expansionist. Seeking to assert its control over land it claims belong to it and the region it claims it is the traditional leader of.

This can be seen with Morocco's conflicts with Spain:

- Ifni War over Spanish Cape Juby
- Perejil Island crisis
- The battle over Ceuta, Spain's African Gibraltar (a brief look at Morocco's claim on Ceuta and Melilla)

Ceuta and Melilla are two Spanish cities in Northern Morocco. Spain continues to rule them while Morocco continues to loudly complain about it.

As well as Morocco's growing presence in Western Africa:

- Morocco's ambitious investments in Sub-Saharan Africa full of risks and rewards | GRI

- '85% of Morocco's Foreign Direct Investment is in Africa' - AfDB
- Morocco to become part of ECOWAS (ECOWAS is the West African version of the European Union)
- Senegal's President Asks Morocco to Train Senegalese Imams

King Mohammed VI with Nigerian President Buhari

This naturally sparks fears within the Algerian State due to the fact that Morocco's intentions aren't vague in the slightest. Morocco wishes to lead the region not work alongside it. However not only would Algeria be dominated by Morocco in such a scenario, it would partitioned as Morocco would strip it of lands that would be considered historically Moroccan.

Which brings us to the Western Sahara.

Algeria saw an attempt to stonewall or destroy Morocco's ambitions by inflicting a defeat in the Western Sahara. First Algeria deployed an intervention force that was crushed by the Moroccans at the Battle of Amgala in January 1976.

This dissuaded Algeria from deploying any more troops but instead it shifted to supporting the Polisario with arms, money and training hoping to weaken Morocco through a prolonged insurgency.

Polisario soldiers march

Ultimately Morocco defeated the insurgency and occupies most of the Western Sahara but not all.

The Present map of control

The Polisario remains a credible threat to Moroccan interests and thus Morocco maintains most of its military force within the Western Sahara. Which is beneficial to Algeria as it dissuades Morocco from starting anything.

That's why Algeria opposes Morocco in the Western Sahara.

(1) A History of Modern Morocco, Susan Miller p. 12

Related Links

Why does Morocco have border disputes with almost every neighbouring countries (Algeria, Spain and Western Sahara)?

Does Morocco treat Western Sahara badly?

Moroccans: How do you feel about Western Sahara and its bid for independence?

Is Western Sahara a country or a part of Morocco?

Why won't Morocco give up Western Sahara?

Why does Morocco want to control Western Sahara?

Why does Algeria support Western Sahara?

Why is Morocco on bad terms with its 3 neighboring countries (Algeria, Spain, and Western Sahara) despite being the only land borders of Morocco?

Why is the Western Sahara so desired by Morocco?

What are the main cultural differences between Morocco and Algeria?

News about Israel and the region

-

Things are heating up between Algeria and Morocco, Israel involved?

Posted by

Nimrod Birsha

,
studied Photovoltaics at Delft University of Technology Diploma obtained in 2010

The Algerian army publishes a rare publication on the activity of the air force.

The cold war has long raged between the two countries, breaking out from time to time, against a backdrop of Algerian support for the organization working for the independence of Western Sahara, occupied by Morocco. Now, as mentioned, the Algerian army has released infrequent documentation of the activities of its air force, which is considered a large and advanced corps.

KAD-GHANI on Twitter

"SU-30 MKA Algerian Air Force (12th Regiment, Oum El Bouaghi Air Base) https://t.co/KPqYCCe7R8"

https://t.co/KPqYCCe7R8

Algeria flexes its muscles against Morocco: The Algerian Air Force recently released a series of photos and videos of an extensive training session that includes the launch of a Kh-31 supersonic missile into firing real on a dummy radar. The two countries are accelerating the arms race between them, in particular through the purchase of dozens of new fighter planes.

This kind of publication is considered rare and less known in our region, and in the videos you can see the Algerian fighter planes, type SU-30 MKA, belonging to the 12th air regiment. In published documentation, Algerian pilots are seen on training simulators, then filmed taking off for training missions, refueling in the air and launching a live missile against the radar of an anti-aircraft battery. .

The video itself looks like an invested local Air Force production and includes cockpit footage and quite a bit of fighter jet aerobatics, accompanied by sounds of patriotic music. Algeria has a relatively large and advanced air force, and in its fleet there are 55 SU-30 combat aircraft, about 50 MiG-29, and they are among the only ones in the world that also operate MiG- 25 who have the ability to reach great heights and incredible speed.

KAD-GHANI on Twitter

"maintenance center"

https://t.co/g3g6SL5Ewh

The Algerians recently ordered another 16 SU-30s from Russia and have begun upgrading their familiar SU-24s from Russian operations in Ukraine in the war between them. In addition, Algeria is said to have purchased dozens of Mi-28 combat helicopters and modernized its Mi-24 combat helicopters. All this in addition to the agreement to buy Russian SU-57 type stealths. Currently, Algeria is the only country outside of Russia to purchase this aircraft.

All of this is happening as, across the border, Morocco recently purchased 25 F-16Vs from the United States, the most advanced model of the iconic fighter jet, and in addition it has been reported that they were interested in buying the stealth F-35. Buying the stealth from the United States, is reportedly the issue discussed during Israeli Defense Minister Bnei Gantz's visit to the kingdom, at the king's personal request.

F-16V

Morocco is in the midst of an intensification of purchases for its defense, including the purchase of billions of dollars of weapons to modernize the armies and the navy. Israel is expected to take a significant share of the market with unmanned aircraft and other systems.

Why did Algeria suspend its friendship treaty with Spain?

Slimane Azayri

Open and Review June 23

"To err is human, to persist in one's error is diabolical", professed, more than a thousand years ago, Saint Augustine [354-430, father of the Church and bishop of ancient Hippo, now Annaba], the child of Tagaste [former Numidian city], the current Souk Ahras, a wilaya [administrative region] located in eastern Algeria.

The Sahrawi bone of contention

The President of the Spanish Government, Pedro Sánchez, he does worse by adding a dose of ostentation to his demonism. Questioned by parliamentarians from his country on the subject of relations with Algeria and on the reversal of the Spanish position in the Saharawi file [on March 18, Madrid radically changed its position on this file by supporting the Moroccan autonomy project] , Pedro Sánchez boasted of having sold Western Sahara [territory located in the south of Morocco and claimed by Rabat and by the Sahrawi Arab Democratic Republic (SADR) proclaimed by the Polisario Front in 1976. The latter, supported by the Algeria, claims the total independence of Western Sahara. This former Spanish colony is considered a "non-autonomous territory" by the UN] to the Moroccan occupier [according to the Algerian terminology. Morocco considers Western Sahara as part of its southern provinces and proposes an autonomy plan within the framework of its sovereignty.].

And it was the straw that broke the camel's back. Pedro Sánchez's Spain is no longer a credible partner for Algeria, which has just taken a series of firm decisions commensurate with the Spanish drift. "Algeria has decided to proceed with the 'immediate' suspension of the treaty of friendship, good neighborliness and cooperation which it concluded on October 8, 2002 with the Kingdom of Spain, indicated yesterday [June 8], a declaration by the Presidency of the Republic."

The Spanish authorities have embarked on a campaign to "justify the position they have adopted on Western Sahara in violation of their legal, moral and political obligations as the administering power of the territory, which weigh on the Kingdom of Spain until that the decolonization of Western Sahara be declared accomplished by the United Nations ", specified the same source. (…)

https://www.courrierinternational.com/article/vu-d-algerie-la-colere-d-al

Similar questions

Why do we always ask France to apologize to Algeria for the dead of the Algerian War and not to Algeria to apologize for the acts of the FLN during the same period?

Why doesn't Algeria apologize to France for its failed attempt at colonization? What would have happened if the Saracens had not been stopped at Poitiers?

Why do a good percentage of Algerians born before independence (1962) say that "Algeria was much happier and more prosperous during the time of French colonization"?

Finally, if Algeria had remained French, wouldn't France have become a country with a Muslim majority? In general, what would France look like today if Algeria had remained French?

What's going on with Morocco and Spain fighting over Melilla and Ceuta? Why did these territories fall under Spanish control and why did Morocco fail to reconquer them?

Why did the 350,000 Algerians who lived in (metropolitan) France in 1962 not return to Algeria when it became independent?

How and why were the Algerians unable to stop the French before the bombardment of Algiers in 1815, and then before the invasion, bombardment and conquest, colonization and takeover of all of Algeria?

Should France have given full French citizenship to Muslim Algerians in the 1950s, partitioned Algeria into 2, or almost abandoned everything and repatriated Europeans and part of the Harkis as it did in 1962-1964?

Why didn't France keep a piece of Algeria and Indochina after independence? Like Spain in Morocco with Ceuta and Melilla.

Why doesn't France apologize once and for all for the colonization of Algeria?

Could Algeria have remained French?

Bouabdallah Tahar

.

Follow

Knowledge: Arabic June 21

The question should not be asked and not even thought of asking. Algeria is a nation bringing together a people forged through its millennial history shaped by its language by its Arab-Berber culture by its religion and by its Afro identity. Maghreb.

Super Dupont

Studied Science and Consciousness at Engineering Schools Updated 1 year

My half-black-footed heart wants to scream "of course" in response to this question.

But if I use my brain instead, I'll give a nuanced answer. Neither yes nor no.

From a historical point of view, yes, Algeria could have remained French - or something else too, for that matter. Throughout history, this area has almost always been subject to foreign domination - Arab, Moroccan, Ottoman, French, and we could even go back further, with Rome and Carthage. Algeria as a nation is a fiction.

From a military point of view, yes, the French army had won the war in Algeria. The bloodless FLN in 1960 owes its survival only to De Gaulle's concession.

From a geopolitical point of view, probably not. France's center of gravity has been north of the Loire for a millennium, its stakes - economic, territorial, diplomatic - are above all European. Maintaining French Algeria would have shifted this center of gravity to the Mediterranean. At the time, France was not cut out for that, would not have known how to manage the complexity and the competing priorities to play on these two tables. This is less true today. With the scope and effectiveness that the European Union has now achieved (yes, I did say "effectiveness", gentlemen Eurosceptics), in the 21st century, securing the whole of the Mediterranean rim to the EU is a a natural step from a geopolitical point of view.

From an economic point of view, yes, maintaining French Algeria was not only possible, but would even have resulted in tremendous success on both sides. This would have provided a growth relay in the 1970s–80s, thanks to the Algerian population growth reserve and hydrocarbons, it would have greatly reduced Algeria's economic (therefore social) problems in the 1990s, and would have led to internal relocations, from the north to the south of the Mediterranean, instead of sending all our industry to China. In this alternative scenario, it is the Maghreb which becomes the main workshop of Europe.

GDP per capita, Algeria, 1970–2020, constant USD (base 2010)

GDP per capita, France, 1970–2020, constant USD (base 2010)

The demographic point of view is probably the decisive aspect. Let's analyze from a purely numerical point of view: if French Algeria had maintained the same unbridled and anarchic birth rate that independent Algeria has known, then clearly not, the situation would have quickly become untenable, because unbalanced and in a vicious circle of conflict between Algerians and metropolitans. In 1960, there are more than 4.5 metropolitans for an Algerian (46m / 10m inhabitants). In 2020, it's 3 for 2. Impossible to imagine a French Algeria in such conditions; at best, France becomes Algerian.

But in a French Algeria, a voluntary demographic policy could have accelerated the demographic transition, and maintained this ratio below 1 Algerian for 3 metropolitans. This would have ensured the stability of educational and economic policies, and greatly improved Algeria's per capita wealth. Fewer young people, with more diplomas, and more work.

The other aspects, political and cultural, are therefore essentially consequences of the resolution or not of this demographic problem. From a political point of view, Algeria would be much better off today without this mafia clique from the FLN which has put the country in a state of control for 60 years. Within France, it would have benefited from an efficient and much less corrupt technocracy, from supervisory bodies, from alternating political parties.

The cultural problem was in principle the easiest to solve. As the Algerian nation did not exist, it was enough to recognize tribes as so many communities, an official language (French) with several recognized secondary languages, Arabic (Darija, Hassanya, even Judeo-Arabic), Berber (Kabyle, Chaoui , and probably 2 or 3 others), perhaps also Spanish and Pataouete. Similarly, a pragmatic structuring of a local Islam under state supervision would have avoided many later problems. Finally, a path based on education and a form of assimilation would have offered the natives, individually, the possibility of accessing rights comparable to those of the French, more or less quickly depending on their capacities and their goodwill. . All this does not come out of my fertile imagination, on the contrary it is part of the continuity of the administration of this territory over the centuries. In particular, it is exactly the model of the Arab caliphates.

Berber tattoo: tattooing is absolutely forbidden in Islam, but the tradition remained well anchored in the Berber populations of Morocco and Algeria - until it was recently challenged by Islamist currents imported in the 20th century

---

Unfortunately, the reality contrasted with these principles of cultural integration. France in the 1950s and 1960s was still steeped in its centralizing Jacobin ideal, so it was out of the question to recognize multiple languages and communities. The separation of church and state in 1905 made an arrangement that brought local religion under state control unimaginable. Finally, the entrenched racism of the European settlers sabotaged almost every initiative that aimed to improve the lot of the natives. Perhaps Algeria could have remained French, but certainly the France of the time would not have known how to appropriate it.

That's why I regret but I understand De Gaulle's decision to give independence to Algeria. These pragmatic arguments led him to consider that Algeria could not remain French.

Similar questions

Finally, if Algeria had remained French, wouldn't France have become a country with a Muslim majority? In general, what would France look like today if Algeria had remained French?

An elderly Algerian showed me the French identity card he had in 1962, just before independence. It was noted "French Muslim". Was there really an apartheid system at the time of French Algeria?

Are Algeria and France getting closer?

Why did France lose the war in Algeria?

Is it possible to reconcile France and Algeria?

Is France required to hand over its archives to Algeria, which is requesting them? How could Algeria use it?

Why did the 350,000 Algerians who lived in (metropolitan) France in 1962 not return to Algeria when it became independent?

How was Algeria before being French?

Do you think as some have said that "Algeria was not a nation, only France made the country a nation"?

Why do we always ask France to apologize to Algeria for the dead of the

Is racism against black Algerians a reality or a myth in Algeria?

Kanhlayany Kousonsanong

.

Follow

Master 's degree in The Americas and Civilization of the Far East , University of Rennes 2 – Haute-Bretagne (Graduated in 2010) 1 year

Is racism against black Algerians a reality or a myth in Algeria?

Do you remember Miss Algeria 2019?

Khadidja Benhamou, however, was not unanimous because considered "black". Not Algerian enough because her hair was too black and curly, and her complexion too dark.

Miss Black Algeria: a first that provokes a surge of racism on social networks

I am ignorant about the criteria of beauty in Algeria but I find these reactions odious even offensive on the beauty of this young woman.

Is it true that she doesn't look Algerian, or is it a fantasy to consider herself rather Western/Caucasian/European in this country?

I guess Algerians have a lot of diverse origins.

MISS

Miss Algerie 2013
05
Algerie

Miss Algeria 2018, Nihed Markria.

Miss Algeria 2013 on the left presents her successor, Fatma-Zohra Sabrine Chouib.

Frankly you do not find that Miss Algeria 2013, Rym Amari looks like Bella Thorne. Moreover, she herself has been criticized for being too European…

Meriem Leitim, Miss Algeria 2006.

Algeria's highway "East West" is 1720 km long.

Yussif Issah Oyen

OTC Drugs Seller at Pharmaceuticals (2013–present)Jun 7

we are gradually getting there!

Are discussions about the Algerian war still taboo in France and Belgium? I think this war is why so many French people see Arabs as a threat?

Louis-Gabriel

.

Follow

amateur philosopher-linguist-historian May 1

The Algerian war was never taboo in Belgium, which had nothing to do with it. Belgium is not an annex of France (no offense to some of our friends across Quebec).

And in France, apart from a few old people who sweeten strawberries in retirement homes, the war in Algeria no longer interests anyone.

Similar Questions

Finally, if Algeria had remained French, wouldn't France have become a country with a Muslim majority? In general, what would France look like today if Algeria had remained French?

An elderly Algerian showed me the French identity card he had in 1962, just before independence. It was noted "French Muslim". Was there really an apartheid system at the time of French Algeria?

1,000 French soldiers have published a letter to the government warning of a race war due to Islamic militancy. Is the prospect of a civil war in France, or even a coup against the government, real?

Why did France lose the war in Algeria?

Why don't Moroccans have a "NIF" unlike Algerians?

Why do some French people who took part in the Algerian war refuse to talk about this period of their life?

Could an armed conflict break out between Algeria and France?

Why is it only with Algeria that relations are often tense when France has occupied other countries?

Why is hunting still authorized in France, when it is prohibited in most European countries and represents an ecological disaster?

How do the French and the Algerians perceive the war in Algeria?

ANGOLA

National Flag and Emblem

Locator Map

TEXT HIGHLIGHTS: Diaries updates, key events, brief analysis and relating news articles in timeline.

Overview

Hoisin hunter-gatherers are some of the earliest known modern human inhabitants of the area. They were largely replaced by Bantus during the Bantu migrations, though small numbers of Khoisans remain in parts of southern Angola. The culture is mainly native Bantu mixed with Portuguese aspects.

Angola was a former Portuguese colony for 500 years, but until the 1920s, there was little investment and the Portuguese presence was confined to the coastal towns. There a creole or mestizo class evolved. The interior was exploited as a source of slaves. Even after the abolition of slavery, it was a source of contract labor. Angolans began to agitate for independence in the mid-1950s. Three nationalist groups were formed: the MPLA in 1956, the FNLA in 1958 and UNITA in 1966. In 1961, the armed struggle was launched. But the principle of independence was not conceded until 1974, much later than in most African countries. Portugal hastily arranged a conference with the 3 movements, all of which had gained Organization of African Unity (OAU) recognition, to work out the transitional arrangements to independence. The agreement was set out in the Alvor Accord of January 1975. It provided for a transitional government to prepare a constitution and for elections to be held before Independence Day, set for 11 November 1975. But the agreement broke down and the movements fought each other for control of the capital. The Portuguese settlers left en masse. Elections were never held.

On Independence Day the MPLA controlled the capital. They declared themselves the government and imposed a one-party constitution to be guided by Marxist-Leninism. The other movements retreated to their rural bases. The MPLA's victory was secured with military hardware from the Soviet Union and Cuban troops. The FNLA and UNITA had secured less help from their backers - the USA, apartheid South Africa and Mobutu's Zaire. Although the FNLA soon gave up the armed struggle, UNITA continued to fight a long guerrilla war which was to last until 2002. Throughout this period, UNITA moved with impunity in the countryside while the MPLA controlled the towns.

Two attempts at brokering a peace (the Bicesse Accords of May 1991 and the Lusaka Protocol of 1994) failed. Both were monitored by small UN peacekeeping forces, UNAVEM I and II. The UN Security Council also imposed a series of sanctions on UNITA from 1993. These also failed to stop the fighting. The MPLA therefore decided at its Party Congress in December 1998 to pursue a final military offensive against UNITA. It asked the UN to leave. After 3 years of fighting, government forces succeeded, firstly by killing UNITA's leader in February 2002 and subsequently by coming to an agreement with UNITA commanders to end the war: the Luena Memorandum of Understanding of April 2002. Isaias Samakuva was subsequently elected the new UNITA leader at the Party's 9th Congress in 2003. He was re-elected in July 2007.

Although peace has been achieved throughout most of the country, the problem of the enclave of Cabinda remains unresolved. A low level guerrilla war has been conducted for over 30 years by rebel groups fighting for the independence of the province. The Angolan Government has alternately tried negotiations and military force to no avail. A ceasefire agreement was signed on 1 August 2006 but it did not attract the support of all the Cabinda factions.

Origin of name: The nation is named after King Ngola of Quimbudos.

Movement for Popular Liberation of Angola (MPLA) declares a government defeating the other ones, with Luanda it's Capital. The Movement for Popular Liberation of Angola(MPLA), named Dr. Antonio Augostino Neto, founding-president for the officially titled "Peoples Republic of Angola", when the premiership goes to a party colleague, Mr. Lopo Do-Nacimento. Dr. Augostino Neto, served as the first state president of Angola between 1975 to1979 leading the MPLA in the war for independence and the civil war in Angola.

Headship since independence: Head of State

Followed the death of founding President Augostino Neto while underwent surgery for cancer in a hospital in Moscow, in ex-Soviet Union in August, 1977, the ex-minister of external affairs Jose Eduardo Dos Santos nominated to the vacant post.

A Republic in southwestern Africa

Includes the enclave of Cabinda, which geographically separated from the rest of the country, it was an overseas colony of Portugal from 1575 to 1951, from an overseas colony turned to overseas territory in 1951. After change of government in a wave of revolution in April, 1974 , that brought the then president of Portugal Alberto Salazar era to an end, following the April, 1974 carnation revolution in Portugal, which deposed the Alberto Salazar's successor Dr. Marcelo Caitano, the three political warring-fronts vied for Angolan political power, one of the three was the MPLA, to which Augostino Neto belongs. In due to internal change of government, the colonial master Portugal obliged to hand-over independence to the three main nationalist movements with Cabinda an integral part of Angola. The fighting for liberation was started in 1961 which that led ultimately to independence in November, 1975, but the three rival warring-fronts namely, the MPLA led by Dr. Antonio Augostino Neto, the UNITA led by Dr. Jonas Malheiro Savimbi and the FNLA led by Mr. Holden Roberto continued fighting until November, 1975, during which time, Movimento Popular de Libertacåo (MPLA), led by the late Dr. Augostino Neto declared a government defeating the other ones, with Luanda it's Capital. The MPLA named Dr. Antonio Augostino Neto, founding-president for the officially titled "Peoples Republic of Angola", when the premiership goes to a party colleague, Mr. Lopo Do-Nacimento. Dr. Augostino Neto, served as the first State president of Angola (1975 - 1979) leading MPLA in the war for independence and the civil war in Angola. On the 11th of November, 1975 Angola achieved full independence from the Portuguese, and Dr. Antonio Augostino Neto became the nation's first president. Followed his sudden death in a hospital in Moscow in August, 1977, in the ex-Soviet Union while undergoing surgery for cancer, the ex-minister of external affairs Mr. Jose Eduardo Dos Santos nominated to the vacant post. The former Portuguese colony of Angola, then slid into civil war, the ruling party the MPLA, and the rebel opposition armed group, the National Union for the Total Independence of Angola (UNITA) have had a bloody conflict, after quarter a century of internal conflict, the once warring sides, the Angolan government under MPLA and the opposition the National Union for the Total Independence of Angola (UNITA) formed a national unity government and merged their forces into a new unified national army in 1994 when agreement was terminated by either side, fighting picked up again in July, 1996, and forces loyal to Dr. Jonas Malheiro Savimbi continued to resist government control. The conflict finally ended in February, 2002 when Dr. Jonas Malheiro Savimbi killed in 22 February, 2002 in a minor combat operation that is to weaken the UNITA's insurgency and strengthened the ruling party's hold on power. Up to 1. 5 million lives may have been lost, and about four million people displaced in the Angolan civil war started since November, 1975. The Government announced plans to hold presidential elections in 2009, which the ruling party MPLA won it easily, controlling the 87% of seats in the Angolan parliament.

Side note: In early, 2010 The Angolan parliament had approved a bill for a constitutional amendment in early, 2010, since the country gained it's independence from Portugal in November, 1975. Angola, is the continent's largest producer of crude Oil along with Nigeria but the majority of it's people live beneath the poverty lines, Angola now at peace, is a country in the firm grip of change. Angola's ruling-party MPLA, and it's ruler of more than 30 years, Jose Eduardo Dos Santos, has used mass troop deployments and arrests to quash a planned pro-democracy protests, as part of a pre-emptive action to prevent Tunisia/Egypt-like popular uprising, some opposition politicians and human rights lawyers in Angola, a virtually one party state, have been receiving anonymous death threats, and vehicles of two lawyers were set ablaze recently. Series anti-government protests, inspired by the downfall of North-African regimes, have taken place in Luanda city in recent months. Tension has been on the rising in Angola ahead of elections due next year in September, 2012 with opposition groups calling for Mr. Jose Eduardo Dos Santos to step down. He is Africa's longest serving ruler. Mr. Dos Santos has not yet said whether he intends to run for presidency in elections planned for September, 2012.

Side note: BBC News Africa - 2nd February, 2012:

Living in the world's most expensive city' The cost of living in Luanda, Angola's capital, is such that the European Union sent only two technical experts to observe the elections. Luanda is the second most expensive city in the world after having occupied the top spot a year ago. While Angola boasts of one of the world's fastest-growing economies, the majority of its people still live in abject poverty, with an unemployment rate of about 30 per-cent. But after 33 years in power, why is Angola's president seeking 5 more? When you think of the world's most expensive cities, the dusty Angolan capital of Luanda seems an unlikely contender. Potholed, chaotic and still scarred by decades of civil war, the city has little of the glitz and glamour of Tokyo, New York or Moscow, and an estimated half of Angolans live on less than $2 a day. But despite the obvious poverty and sprawling slums, Luanda still manages to boast some eye-wateringly high prices. A house can be $10,000 (£6,500) a month to rent, a basic meal out for two is easily $50, a hotel room can weigh in at $400 a night and a kilo of imported tomatoes a staggering $16. A basic saloon car without a driver (which foreigners need to negotiate the difficult traffic and parking) will be $90 a day, but upgrade to a SUV (recommended due to the poor quality roads) and you're looking at $200. 'Expense' It is prices like these that in recent years have seen Luanda top expatriate-cost-of-living surveys by agencies such as Mercer. When Wina Miranda moved from Indonesia to Luanda in 2008 with her engineer husband Erwin Santosa, she knew the city was going to be expensive, but she wasn't prepared for quite how expensive." Actually the cost of living and the expense was all I found when I Googled Angola," the 34-year-old said. "There wasn't much else, no pictures or other information, just stories saying how expensive it was here. But actually we didn't know quite how expensive it was until we really came here and experienced it." Erwin, also 34, works for an international oil company which pays for his family's housing (a compact three-bedroom bungalow inside a private compound in the south of the city), his car and their seven-year-old daughter Obin's international school fees. 'Not fresh' "I think we probably spend about $2,000 a month, and we don't even drink alcohol," she said, complaining that meat and vegetables were among the most expensive items.” Start Quote I don't think you get what you pay for, in terms of quality or service” End Quote James Wilde Telecoms consultant "We are Asian and eat a lot of bean sprouts but a can here is $6 and beef can be up to $45 for a kilo, and that is frozen, not even fresh." Portuguese telecoms engineer Fernando Azvedo, who has lived in Luanda with his wife since 2010, said the only reasonably priced items were beer (60 cents a bottle), cigarettes ($1.50) and fuel - 40 cents for a liter of diesel. "You can shop around Luanda to find better prices," he said. "But you are never too sure about the quality of the products. I only buy fruit outside of the regular shops, everything else you don't know the condition or where the product has been." He pays $5,000 a month for his apartment - although this is covered by his company - and says he can easily spend $200 on a basic meal out for him and his wife with only a few drinks. 'Extreme' James Wilde, who has lived all over the world and is now based in Luanda as consultant for a German telecoms company, said: "Luanda is definitely the most expensive place I've ever been, as far as rents and dinners and things like that are concerned." "The rent is extreme. A two-bedroom apartment in Luanda is $4-5,000, per month. When I lived in Moscow I was paying 2,000 Euros a month for a two bedroom place, and here you pay much more and don't get nearly the same quality." He added: "When I first arrived I remember I had to stock up my kitchen and that first time I went to the grocery store I spent $800. It didn't even fill the back of the car, I couldn't believe it. "What's most frustrating though is that I don't think you get what you pay for, in terms of quality or service. But then, my salary is adjusted to be here so it's still definitely worth my while to work in Luanda and I think that is the case for most expatriates here." Decimated: So why is a city like Luanda so expensive? There are several reasons. The main one is that Angola lived through a long civil war which started in 1975, when the country gained independence from Portugal, and continued right up until 2002. During that time most industry, agriculture and local production stopped and basic infrastructure including roads, railways, electricity lines and water supplies were badly damaged. Having once been a major exporter of products like coffee and cotton, and self-sufficient in most foods, Angola now imports an estimated 80% of its consumable goods. For every tin or packet of food you buy in Luanda, you must factor in the cost involved in getting that product to Angola and onto the supermarket shelf, via a congested port with its highly bureaucratic customs and a traffic-clogged city. There are some cynics who say Angola's business elite, who control the import companies, have also done little to bring down costs, although in recent years bringing down prices has been cited as a government priority. Jose Severino, president of Angola's Industrial Association (AIA), says it i s a vicious cycle: "You have unreliable electricity so you need a generator, poor transport networks and weak human capacity and that pushes up the cost of local production which means it is still cheaper to import goods instead of making them here. "As long as this continues, and as long as local taxes are so high and red tape so complicated here there will be no incentive to produce locally and prices will not come down." Jose Severino, who is also a government advisor, said there needed to be decentralization away from Luanda, or at least a proper public transport network in order to reduce traffic congestion which he said cost people money, not just in time but also fatigue, productivity, and vehicle maintenance. Falling property prices? There is some good news though. Property prices may have already peaked. Daniel Esteves runs Imorizon, a small real estate company in Luanda. Originally from Portugal, but married to Angolan, he has lived in the country for five years. "It's a supply and demand issue, he said. "As more construction is being done, there is more accommodation available and prices are coming down. In some cases apartments are 50% cheaper than they were three years ago and that trend will only continue as more housing is built." Daniel Esteves said, however, that he can still rent out an apartment in the newly-built suburb of Talatona for as much as $15,000, and family homes in that area start from $6,000 a month going up to $30,000, depending on the type of the compound and its facilities. The post-war flood of expatriates into Luanda, many working in the booming construction and oil sectors, has Esteves believes, definitely inflated prices. "I would say the fact you have oil and other big multinational companies looking for so much accommodation has pushed up the costs because they will tend to just pay what they are asked for," he said. But while Fernando Azvedo agrees the multinationals may have increased houses prices, he says at the same time it should be remembered that it was Angolan landlords who have been cashing in on the opportunity. He added that while expats did sometimes splash out on restaurant meals or high-cost imported items in the supermarkets, he felt wealthy Angolans were the really big spenders. "I think it is expatriates who are the ones who worry more about the cost and look more for a reasonable price for something," he said. “Start Quote You learn how to survive because a birthday cake for $360 is just ridiculous” End Quote Wina Miranda Environmental engineer "In supermarkets I see many wealthy Angolans with a full cart of expensive goods like Champagne, they don't seem to care about the price." Grow your own: Wina Miranda, who like her husband is an environmental engineer but is not working while in Luanda, said she and other expatriates had learned to be resourceful to get around the costs. She brings in a container of non-perishable food each time they go home and she has recently discovered a Chinese farm which sells low-cost good quality vegetables. "I know a lady who has her own yoghurt maker, ice-cream maker, bread maker, and she grows her own cabbage and bean sprouts," she said. "There's not much to do here so you do have the time to do these things. "I remember 10 days after we got here my daughter had her fourth birthday and I had promised her she would have a Barbie cake, so I went out looking for one and it cost $360. But the following year, I managed to make her cake myself, that's what you do, you learn how to survive because a birthday cake for $360 is just ridiculous." Ed Corbett is a British business consultant living in Luanda. He speaks Portuguese and has no issue taking a local taxi or haggling for fruit from the street vendors, but accepts that this is not possible for all expatriates. Prices, he said, had come down "remarkably" in the past 18 months, not just property but in supermarkets as well, mostly due to increased competition. "I'd be surprised if Luanda retains its number one spot in the cost of living surveys this year," Ed Corbett said. "Luanda is expensive, but if you know where to shop, it is certainly becoming more affordable."

Side note: Angola Court Removes 'MPLA' Election Head Susana Ingles' Angola's Supreme Court has blocked the appointment of the election commission head, seen as a close ally of President Jose Eduardo Dos Santos. Opposition parties, including former rebel group UNITA, had challenged Susana Ingles's position. She is a lawyer, whereas the head of the election body should be a judge. Angola, Africa's second biggest oil producer, is due to hold elections later this year, the third national polls since independence in 1975. Ms Ingles is a leading member of the Oma women's group, which is seen as close to Mr. Dos Santos' ruling-MPLA, so opposition groups said she would not be impartial. The ruling-MPLA says it will "scrupulously respect the decision". The opposition UNITA had planned to organize a mass demonstration on to protest against her appointment. In the only previous election since the end of Angola's 27-year civil war in 2012, MPLA gained 82% of the vote.

Updates: BBC News Africa 30 August 2012: Angola Election: UNITA fears for free and fair poll' Conditions do not exist in Angola for a free and fair vote in polls, the main opposition party has said. UNITA said a failure to publish a full electoral roll was one of its greatest concerns about a lack of transparency. A local pressure group has called for a delay in the poll, but the electoral commission denies there are problems. Under the newly adopted constitution, a parliamentary majority for President Jose Eduardo Dos Santos' party would give him a new five-year term. Analysts say the governing ruling Popular Movement for the Liberation of Angola

(MPLA) is expected to win an easy victory. These are the second elections to be held in Angola - one of Africa's major oil producers - since the end of a 27-year civil war that ravaged the country after independence from Portugal in 1975. Journalist Louise Redvers in the capital, Luanda, told the BBC the month-long election campaign has been lively, colorful and mostly peaceful, with the exception of a few isolated incidents of violence in rural areas, but the vote itself may not run so smoothly. The failure to publish a full electoral list

- despite a legal requirement - has created confusion about where people should vote and the lack of transparency has prompted allegations that the vote is being fixed in the government's favor, she says. UNITA's leader, Issaias Samakuva, has said he wants to meet Mr. Edwardo Dos Santos to discuss the various problems, the AFP news agency reports. "We are very concerned," UNITA spokesman Alcides Sakala told the BBC. "This election is not being organized in an open way according to the law and the correct processes are not being followed. This makes us worry that fraud could be committed." Angelo Kapwacha from the Civil Society Electoral Process Reflection, a group of non-politically aligned national observers, said the oil - rich nation is not ready for the vote. "Some people do not know where they are supposed to be voting, others have been told to go to polling stations very far from their homes and there is a big confusion." Growing discontent Along with the National Electoral Commission, MPLA supporters have also dismissed the claims of attempted fraud, saying their party does not need to cheat and the allegations are merely to disguise a lack of policies. The MPLA is campaigning on a ticket of continuity under a slogan of "Grow more, distribute better" - a direct response to criticism that the country's vast oil wealth has stayed in the hands of a small elite. "These allegations are totally groundless. We organized free and fair elections in 2008 so now we will show the world we can do it again," party activist Vieira Lopes, 45, told the BBC. On the sidelines of a rally in Luanda on, 45-year-old pilot Jose Cassule told the BBC: "I am not worried about fraud. The voting assemblies have people from all of the parties there to observe and we have processes in place to ensure things run properly. "The only reason the opposition are saying this is because they can't win the election, that is all." During its campaign UNITA has been trying to capitalize on a growing discontentment with the MPLA and the fact that despite the country's strong oil -driven economic performance, half the population remains in poverty, Louise Redvers reports. However, the party faces stiff competition from a new party, Casa, formed in March by charismatic former UNITA politician Abel Chivukuvuku, who is also vying for the youth vote and promoting an anti-corruption agenda, she says. It has to be recalled that UNITA took 10% of the vote in the September, 2008 parliamentary elections

Updates: BBC News Africa 31st August, 2012

Angola votes for parliament and president' Angolans have voted in the second national elections since the oil-rich country's 27-year civil war ended a decade ago. Voting has been reported as smooth and orderly, despite fears of irregularities. Former rebel group Unita, now the main opposition party, had called for a delay. President Jose Eduardo dos Santos, 70, is expected to win another five-year term - he has been in power since 1979. Angola has witnessed an economic boom since 2002, after the end of the civil war that had ravaged the country after independence from Portugal in 1975. But the opposition says the wealth has only benefited a small elite. The polls are the first held under a new constitution that abolished direct presidential elections. Instead, the head of the winning parliamentary list becomes president. Reporter Louise Redvers in Luanda says small queues of people started to form an hour before polls opened. She says the voting seemed to have been taken place in an orderly fashion. The BBC's Zenaida Machado in the western city of Benguela says the situation there is also calm and orderly, with only short queues of people waiting to vote. But she says in one area, all registered voters had cast their ballots by mid-afternoon and so polling had closed. She has also spoken to observers in the central city of Huambo, seen as an opposition stronghold, where voting has also been peaceful, with a relatively high turnout. Hours before polls opened, it emerged that thousands of Angolans were unsure about where to vote, and many more could not find their name on voting lists. The National Electoral Commission (NEC) denied there were problems. Unita has expressed concern about a lack of transparency, especially the failure to publish a full electoral roll. Unita spokesman Alcides Sakala has said the confusion vindicated his party's concerns, and called for the vote to be delayed. "The NEC has done nothing to correct these problems," he said. Analysts predict an easy victory for Mr. dos Santos' Popular Movement for the Liberation of Angola (MPLA), which won more than 80% of the vote in the last legislative election four years ago. The MPLA campaign stressed continuity and is being run under the slogan "Grow more, distribute better" - a response to criticism that the country's oil wealth remains concentrated in the hands of a small elite in what is now Africa's third largest economy. In its campaign, Unita has been trying to benefit from growing discontentment with the MPLA, as well as the fact that despite strong growth, half the population remains in poverty and lack access to basic services such as water and electricity. However, the party faces stiff competition from a new party, Casa, formed in March by former Unita politician Abel Chivukuvuku, who is targeting the youth vote and promoting an anti-corruption agenda. On Thursday, Unita leader Isaias Samakuva unsuccessfully tried to meet Mr. dos Santos to discuss his party's complaints. Angelo Kapwacha, from the Civil Society Electoral Process Reflection, a group of non-politically aligned national observers, said the country was not ready for the vote. "Some people do not know where they are supposed to be voting, others have been told to go to polling stations very far from their homes and there is a big confusion." MPLA supporters have dismissed the claims of attempted fraud, saying their party does not need to cheat, and that the opposition allegations are merely a disguise for a lack of policies.

Angola's election at a glance:

9.7m voters out of an estimated population of 21million

Voting for 220 seats of the National Assembly

New constitution abolished direct presidential polls, meaning the leader of the party with the parliamentary majority becomes head of state

Nine political parties and coalitions are taking part

Main contenders:

MPLA, led by Jose Eduardo dos Santos, has dominated politics since independence from Portugal and is favorite to win

UNITA, led by Isaias Samakuva, is a former rebel group that fought the MPLA-led regime until its then-leader was killed in 2002

CASA, led by Abel Chivukuvuku, who split from UNITA in March

Angola's election at a glance

9.7m voters out of an estimated population of 21m

Voting for 220 members of the National Assembly

New constitution abolished direct presidential polls, meaning the leader of the party with the parliamentary majority becomes head of state

Nine political parties and coalitions are taking part

Main contenders:

MPLA, led by Jose Eduardo dos Santos, has dominated politics since independence from Portugal and is favorite to win

Unita, led by Isaias Samakuva, is a former rebel group that fought the MPLA-led regime until its then-leader was killed in 2002

Casa, led by Abel Chivukuvuku, who split from Unita in March.

Side note: Ruling MPLA leading Angola elections' Angola's ruling MPLA party has taken a commanding lead in national elections, with almost 75% of the vote, partial results suggest. With nearly 70% of votes counted from Friday's poll, the main opposition Unita party garnered about 18%, the electoral commission said. If confirmed, the results mean another term for President Jose Eduardo dos Santos, 70, who has ruled since 1979. The polls were the second vote since the civil war ended a decade ago. Analysts had predicted an easy victory for Mr. Dos Santos' Popular Movement for the Liberation of Angola (MPLA), which won more than 80% in the last vote. The polls are the first held under a newly adopted constitution, under which the leader of the winning party in the 220-member parliament becomes president. The MPLA has been in power since Angola's independence from Portugal in 1975. The new Casa party - which split from Unita in March - was trailing distant third in the Friday's poll with 4.7% of the vote, the electoral commission said. The new Casa party - which split from Unita in March - was trailing distant third in the Friday's poll with 4.7% of the vote, the electoral commission said. The UNITA party had called for the election to be delayed, expressing concern about a lack of transparency, especially the failure to publish a full electoral roll. The provisional turnout was put at 57%, but in the capital Luanda and several other provinces it was much lower - with only one in four registered voters taking part, reporter Louise Redvers in Angola says. Some voters were unable to cast their ballot as they did not appear on lists, despite being registered, she adds, while others are believed to have stayed away due to expectations the vote would be rigged. Angola - Africa's second leading oil producer - has witnessed an economic boom since the end of the 27-year civil war in 2002, but the opposition says the wealth has only benefited a small elite. President Jose Eduardo Dos Santos is now set to win another term in office

Updates: Louise Redvers of the BBC News Africa predicts: This is Angola's second election since the end of its three-decade civil war and is an important step in the country's consolidation of peacetime democracy. The country is an emerging player on the African continent and it will want to show it can run its political affairs well as its oil-driven economy. No-one expects the MPLA to lose due to the size and scale of its campaign and its incumbency advantage, but people will want its win to be fair and transparent. If the polls are not seen as credible, either through intention or incompetence, then there is a risk opposition parties will not accept the results and that could lead to public protests. Angolans have dark memories of the contested 1992 election, which led to a resumption of the civil war and will want to avoid violence at all costs. The main opposition party Unita, which has for months been questioning the legitimacy of the electoral commission, has said it will only use the courts to challenge the results if necessary. But there is no telling what frustrated individuals may do if they feel they have been cheated.

Accession to power of president Jose Edwardo Dos Santos - 21st September, 1979, nominated.

Tentative election calendar - Presidential/Parliamentary, September.

Angola: Timeline Diaries updates and related Keynotes:

In 1300s - Kongo kingdom consolidates in the north.

In 1483 – The Portuguese arrived in the area.

In 1575 – Luanda founded by Portuguese.

In the 17th and 18th Centuries - Angola becomes a major Portuguese trading arena for slaves. Between 1580 and 1680 a million plus slaves are shipped to Brazil.

In 1836 - Slave trade officially abolished by the Portuguese government.

In 1885-1930 - Portugal consolidates colonial control over Angola, local resistance persists.

In 1951 - Angola's status changes from colony to a Portuguese overseas territory.

The leaders of the main rebel parties (from L to R) Holden Roberto(FNLA), Agostinho Neto (MPLA) and Jonas Savimbi (UNITA)

In 1956 - The early beginnings of the socialist guerrilla independence movement, the People's Movement for the Liberation of Angola (MPLA), based in northern Congo.

In 1950s to 1961 - Nationalist movements developed, guerrilla warfare begins.

In 1961 - Forced labor abolished after revolts on coffee plantations leave 50,000 dead. The fight for Angolan independence is bolstered.

In 1974 – The April Revolution in Portugal, the colonial empire collapses.

In 1976 – The Popular Movement for the Liberation of Angola (MPLA) gains upper hand on other rivals.

In 1979 - MPLA leader Dr. Agostinho Neto dies, a colleague Jose Eduardo dos Santos takes over as president.

In 1987 - South African forces enter Angola to militarily support UNITA.

In 1988 - South Africa agrees to Namibian independence in exchange for removal of Cuban troops from Angola.

In 1989 – Edwardo Dos Santos, UNITA's leader Jonas Savimbi agree cease - fire, which collapses soon afterwards and guerrilla activity resumes.

April, 199 - MPLA officially drops Marxism-Leninism in favor of social democracy.

May, 199 – Edwardo Dos Santos, Savimbi sign peace deal in Lisbon which results in a new multiparty constitution.

September, 1992 - Presidential and parliamentary polls certified by the UN monitors as generally free and fair. Edwardo Dos Santos of MPLA gains more votes than Jonas Savimbi of UNITA, who rejects results and resumes guerrilla war.

In 1993 - UN imposes sanctions against UNITA. The US acknowledges the ruling-MPLA.

In 1994 - Government, UNITA sign Lusaka Protocol peace accord.

In 1995 – Edwardo Dos Santos, Jonas Savimbi meet, confirm commitment to peace. First of 7,000 UN peacekeepers arrive in Angola.

In 1996 – Jose Edwardo Dos Santos, Savimbi agree to form unity government join forces into national army.

April 1997 - Unified government inaugurated, with Savimbi declining VP post in unity government and failing to attend inauguration ceremony in Luanda.

May 1997 - Tension mounts, with few UNITA troops having integrated into the national army.

In 1998 - Full-scale fighting resumes. Thousands killed in the next four years of fighting.

Angola intervenes in civil war in Democratic Republic of Congo on the side of President Laurent-Desire Kabila.

1999 - UN ends its peacekeeping mission in Angola.

July 16, 1999 Combat, and acts of pure terrorism continue to take place in Angola. Gunman identified as belonging to UNITA killed fifty men, women and children in a village marketplace in Huambo. It is now the dry season and small rebel units range freely into nominally government territory. In the first half of July, low level fighting continued in several parts of Angola (Chitembo, Sanza-Pombo, Malanje, and of Huambo). The government announced they would start a new offensive shortly. The focal point of the fighting during June was the siege of Malanje. Over 200,000 people from surrounding villages are living in the town’s streets. UNITA cut off the town in May and, although the government brings in supplies by air, but not enough to prevent starvation. About three dozen people are starving to death each week, and many more are dying of disease or from wounds. UNITA shells the town each day and inevitably kills or injures civilians. Between June 20 and 25, over 600 shell casualties were admitted to local hospitals. The siege continued into July, with no resolution in sight.

July 21, 1999 UNITA rebels attacked sixty kilometers from the capital Luanda, causing panic in the city. Rebel activities have also caused regular interruptions in supplying electricity and water. UNITA is now threatening hydroelectric dams a hundred kilometers from the capital. Relief convoys from Luanda to outlying areas are also attacked and looted with increasing frequency. Not all these attacks are by UNITA troops, many are the work of bandits.

July 23, 1999 UNITA claimed to have killed 202 government troops and destroyed 69 vehicles between 15 and 20 July. A relief convoy of 80 trucks was ambushed 400 kilometers east of Luanda. Only 30 trucks escaped and the convoy lost sixty dead (54 civilians and six policemen dead) and many wounded.

July 24, 1999 the government has issued an arrest order for UNITA leader Jonas Savimbi. The charge is rebellion, which is certainly accurate but also makes it less likely that the 1994 peace agreement will ever be implemented with UNITA's cooperation.

July 26, 1999 the government has recaptured the northern town of Luvo. Located near the Congo border.

July 28, 1999 Aid agencies report that about 200 Angolans starve to death each day, with thousands more suffering from malnutrition. The principal cause of the hunger are the hundreds of thousands of civilian refugees fleeing the fighting, or trapped in government held towns under siege by the rebels. The roads are constantly threatened by bandits and rebels, and even air transport is difficult because UNITA troops have shot down air aircraft (not knowing if the cargo is aid or weapons.

July 29, 1999 UN attempts to embargo Angolan diamonds, the chief source of revenue for the rebels, have proved ineffective. The diamond trade brings the rebels several hundred million dollars each year, and rebel held areas are know to be visited by dealers in illegal arms. Some of these shipments, usually from Eastern Europe (where enormous cold war era stocks remain), have been intercepted. But most apparently get through, as well as military equipment of all kinds, including portable anti-aircraft missiles.

July 30, 1999 a massacre of about a dozen children in southern Angola (Benguela province.) The weapons used were machetes, which is unusual, as the participants in this long war have favored firearms. UNITA was blamed, but it was uncertain who was responsible.

August 3, 1999 A UNITA attack on an oil facility near the central city of Huambo was defeated by government troops. Ten UNITA troops were killed, and two government troops. UNITA troops have been closing in on Huambo, Angola's second largest city. UNITA shells and rockets have been hitting the city.

August 4, 1999 Government offensives 400 kilometers northeast of the capital, and 400 kilometers east of the capital, have recaptured several towns and hundreds of rebels and dozens of artillery pieces and armored vehicles in the past month.

August 5, 1999 the siege of Malanje, now ten months old, has a quarter of the 200,000 people trapped in the city starving. If the siege is not lifted soon, thousands will perish. UNITA troops block the roads most of the time, and fire on aircraft trying to fly aid in. Some food gets through, but not enough to prevent malnutrition and, increasingly, starvation.

August 12, 1999 the government captured the UNITA held town of Sanza-Pombo in Northern Angola. This does not mean a lot militarily, as the war is fought over large areas by small columns of troops. Thus capturing a town one day, might lead to getting besieged within a week. The war is more like a naval campaign, than a land one. There are few front lines. August 11: after a week of UNITA victories, the government is asking neighboring countries to declare UNITA's leader, Joseph Savimbi, a war criminal. The United States has offered to help control the illegal diamond trade that finances UNITA and many other rebel movements in Africa. Many Angolans have urged the government to re-open negotiations with UNITA, but the government refuses. The government apparently feels it can cut off a lot of UNITAs outside support (bought for with diamond trading profits) while also obtaining troops from neighboring south African nations. In 1998, Zimbabwe, Angola and Namibia sent troops to fight rebels in the Congo.

August 17, 1999 Desultory, but persistent, fighting continues in Uije province, about 400 kilometers northeast of Luanda. It's not clear what the UNITA strategy is there, perhaps something as simple as a very active local commander. Most of the operations are in the north and east, where the valuable raw materials are located, and which pay for both sides arms and troops.

August 18, 1999 Seven civilians were killed and eighteen wounded in an ambush 200 kilometers northeast of Luanda (Kwanza-Norte province.) The government blamed it on UNITA, as it has similar incidents in the area that have killed sixty people this Summer. But the culprits are just as likely to have been bandits. The war has created thousands of armed freebooters who work for themselves most of the time, but will also sign on with the government or UNITA if the opportunity presents itself. Perhaps with that in mind, the SADC (Southern African Development Community) has refused to get involved militarily in the war, responding today by pledging non-military aid to the government. After 24 years of civil war, Angola has turned into a free fire zone for anyone, locals and foreigners alike. The Angolan war was already five years old when SADC was founded.

August 19, 1999 The government has reportedly seized food supplies earmarked for the 400,000 refugees in the besieged town of Malanje. A Voice of America reporter was arrested after releasing that news.

August 24, 1999 AFP reported that an gunrunning cargo plane headed for UNITA territory was impounded in Zambia. The plane was Russian with a Ukrainian crew and one South African.

August 25, 1999 The Catholic Radio-Ecclesia reported the six people were killed August 23 in an ambush near Kota east of Luanda. The radio broadcast blamed rebel forces.

August 26, 1999The UNITA guerrilla organization claimed the capture of three villages and killed 163 government troops this month. The captured villages are Vila-do-Dongo (Huila province), Mukinda (Lunda-Sul province), and Kapola (Kwanza-Sul province). UNITA issued the statement from its headquarters in Bailundo. Angolan President Jose Eduardo dos Santos called for strengthening the national army in the face of growing UNITA strength.

August 30, 1999 Angolan UNITA rebels threatened to attack Luanda. In a letter to the MPLA, Joseph Savimbi, UNITA's leader, said "This time UNITA may reach Futungo (the presidential palace) before Angolan armed forces reach Andulo." Andulo is a city controlled by UNITA, located in southeastern Angola. Rebels killed 7 people in ambushes in Angola's Lunda -Sul province.

September 3, 1999 UNITA said that in the last two weeks of August its forces killed 197 government troops. UNITA also claimed to have destroyed five army trucks and destroyed the army garrison in Kakunda, Huila province. UNITA now claims to control 70% of Angol.

September 6, 1999 The Angolan government claimed to have recaptured the town of Kuvango from UNITA. Heavy battles have been reported between the MPLA and UNITA throughout southern Angola.

September 7, 1999 Catholic Church sources reported that 25 civilians were killed and over 60 wounded in the fighting last week in the southern town of Kuwango.

September 8, 1999 The United Nations is trying to convince nations and businesses to require that all diamonds sold be accompanied by a certificate of origin. This move, which is unlikely to be implemented, is intended to prevent the UNITA rebels in Angola from financing their operations through diamond sales.--Stephen V Cole

September 15, 1999 Angolan government forces claimed to have retaken the town of Cunhinga and killed 22 UNITA rebels. Press and Catholic Church sources also report a "dire humanitarian disaster" in Malanje, located 400 kilometers east of Luanda. Severe starvation has begun to occur in the Malanje area. The same sources estimate that since November 1998, when the UN peace agreement between the government and UNITA collapsed, 1000 people have been killed in fighting around Malanje.

September 21, 1999 Angolan government forces claimed they took control of three towns in Huila province, Chicomba, Jomba, and Dongovilles. The MPLA forces also said they killed 33 UNITA rebels. Meanwhile, a pro -UNITA member of Angola's parliament was shot and killed in Luanda. 70 members of UNITA were elected to parliament in 1992.

September 26, 1999b A UNITA spokesman said the Angolan town of Bailunda was struck by napalm and phosphorus bombs delivered by Angolan government (MPLA) aircraft. "Hundreds" of civilians were killed.

September 27, 1999 The Angolan government confirmed that it has launched a "major offensive" against UNITA in the Bailundo area. Bailundo is 600 kilometers southeast of the capital of Luanda. The offensive began.

September 28, 1999 The Angolan army announced that its offensive continued and that MPLA forces had captured the towns of Andulo and Bailundo. Andulo had been a headquarters for the rebel UNITA forces.

September 29, 1999 A report by Human Rights Watch said that the UN stood by and did nothing while the UNITA rebels exported diamonds and bought weapons in violation of the 1994 peace accords, which ultimately caused those accords to collapse. The UN admitted that it had detected the violations but insisted that it could not stop them as it had no power to enforce an arms embargo.--Stephen V Cole

September 30, 1999 The major Angolan government military offensive in central Angola continued. A government spokesman confirmed the capture of Andulo and Baillundo. Other reports said between 85,000 and 100,000 refugees had fled the fighting in the town of Huambo. Huambo is 60 kilometers south of Bailundo and is also a major UNITA stronghold.

October 5, 1999 De Beers, the world's largest producer of diamonds, agreed to place an embargo on Angolan diamonds. This action hurts UNITA rebels, which depend on diamond sales to finance their resistance movement. The Angolan government praised De Beers for its decision.

October 6, 1999 The Angolan government offensive continued with the capture of Londuimbali, 550 kilometers southeast of Luanda. Government forces also attacked Mungo, 700 kilometers southeast of Luanda.

October 14, 1999 Russia has reported that Ukraine plans to sell Su-24 strike fighters (the Russian equivalent of the F-111 interdiction strike fighter) to the UNITA rebels of Angola. Ukraine says it has no knowledge of the Angolan pilots training on the aircraft at Airbase #115 at Ros in Grodno Province.-- Stephen V Cole

October 21, 1999 The Angolan government offensive continues. A government spokesman announced the capture of the cities of Andulo and Bailundo, in central Angola. Andulo was a major UNIT stronghold and a headquarters for UNITA's leader, Jonas Savimbi. The spokesman also claimed the Angolan government also controls Mussende and Tembwe (Cuanza-Sul province): Londuimable (Huambo province): Cangamba, Luwawu, Luakanu, Lumbalanguimbi in the Moxico province: Kalandula and Kalussengue (Malanje province). If this is true then the MPLA has made great progress in its war against UNITA. The key remains destroying Savimbi's leadership cadre and denying UNITA profits from the mining centers it controls in Angola, particularly the diamond mines.

October 22, 1999 The Angolan government ordered its troops to fight the UNITA rebels until the rebels are "wiped out." One senior Angolan officers called for the "total liquidation" of UNITA's forces. The officer said that if the Angolan government forces stop their offensive operations in central Angola, UNITA will simply reorganize. Meanwhile, several observers and analysts familiar with the current situation in central Angola believe that UNITA has intentionally put up very little resistance. UNITA seems to have withdrawn further into the Angolan bush.

October 24, 1999 Lieutenant-General Simione Mukune, commanding officer of MPLA government forces operating in the central region around Andulo, died today when his vehicle hit an anti-tank landmine.

October 26, 1999 The Angolan government continues to try to carry the war to UNITA throughout the region. "Several thousand" Angolan government army troops are inside the Democratic Republic of Congo attempting to interdict UNITA supply lines and support areas inside the DRC. The government also said its forces had captured two more UNITA strongholds near Andulo, Angola, the towns of Nhareya and Mungo. The combat has made it difficult for aid workers to reach refugees trapped by the fighting. While the Angolan government (MPLA) may control the cities, UNITA still controls much of the countryside.

November 5, 1999 The Angolan government reported that UNITA forces were fleeing government attacks. At least one UNITA column appears to be heading toward the Congo (Democratic Republic Congo).

November 6, 1999 Angola bought considerable stocks of Soviet/Russian AA-7 and AA-8 air-to-air missiles during the late 80s and early 90s in case of an aerial conflict with South Africa. When this conflict never happened and a peace accord was signed, the missiles were stacked in the open at various airports, exposed to the elements. Most of these missiles (one was stolen by South African agents in 1995) are still there, and in obviously deteriorated condition. As the UNITA rebels appear to have acquired a few old MiG-23s, the government could well use these missiles but they are unserviceable. Angola must now spend hard currency buying more of them.--Stephen V Cole

November 16, 1999 Angolan government forces said they believe they may have located UNITA leader Jonas Savimbi. The spokesman also said that UNITA forces "have been reduced to 20 percent" of their combat capacity since the government offensive began September 14th.

November 18, 1999 A key UNITA general defected to the Angolan government. The rebel commander was identified as General Jacinto Ricardo Bandua, once an aide to UNITA leader Jonas Savimbi. Bandua had served as a senior UNITA supply officer. According to reports, Bandua said he "fell out with Savimbi" near the town of Andulo. UN and international sources estimate one million Angolans have died in the civil war that began in 1975. The UNITA rebels now admit that the Angolan government captured the towns of Ballundo and Andulo during October fighting. --Stephen V Cole.

November 23, 1999 The UNITA rebels in Angola have acquired six Mi -24 helicopter gunships and six MiG-23 fighters from Ukraine, possibly with Ukrainian pilots and mechanics. These are based at the former airfield at Luca, which South Africa once used to fly weapons to UNITA. While the government military forces have an extensive air defense arsenal, this has been neglected (deprived of manpower, maintenance, and training) for a decade since UNITA posed no air threat. The recent downing of a plane carrying weapons to UNITA had to be conducted by South African mercenaries since the Angolan government had no other way to bring the plane down.--Stephen V Cole

November 25, 1999 Angola claimed 400 UNITA guerrillas surrendered near the south Angolan town of Cuangar. Observers say the Angolan government continues to pursue a vigorous offensive. The next objective is Calai, a town on the Namibian border. UNITA has used Calai as a logistics center and as a market to trade diamonds, timber, and ivory with Namibian smugglers.
Zambia has indicted the editor and 11 reporters from THE POST for espionage after they published an article saying that the Army was so poorly trained and equipped that it could not defend the country from an invasion by Angola.--Stephen V Cole

December 20, 1999 In another communiqué, the Angolan government implied that it has forces inside Namibia. The Angolan government said that its troops had fired rockets at UNITA rebels from "inside Namibia." For its part, the Namibian government has given Angola permission to operate Angolan regular forces in Namibians northern Kavango region. Another report, however, said the Angolans were firing heavy mortars from Namibia at UNITA positions in southern Angola. The Angolan government is beginning to tout its success against UNITA. One senior Angolan government (MPLA) general estimated that as a result of the four-month long government offensive "UNITA is 80 percent destroyed." The government also confirmed that its forces had captured the town of Calai, 1000 kilometers southeast of Luanda.

December 27, 1999 The Angolan government's fall offensive is entering its final phases as the Angolan army solidifies its positions along the Angolan-Namibian border. The intent is two-fold: destroy UNITA supply centers then seal the border. Sealing the border essentially splits UNITA. While UNITA still controls diamond mines and timber assets in eastern Angola, sealing the Namibian border makes it that much harder to turn natural resources into cash for buying arms and paying troops. It also cuts UNITA off from its personnel sources. On December 23 Angolan government (MPLA) forces took control of an island in the Kavango River, along the Namibian and Angolan border. UNITA had used the island as a supply dump and border control point. A South African source said approximately 1600 MPLA soldiers are now operating in Namibia. On December 26 the MPLA said their units had taken the town of Jamba, UNITA's former "capital city" and the long-time location of Radio Vorgan, the "voice of UNITA." Namibia's SWAPO government is allowing Angolan government forces to pursue retreating UNITA guerrillas as well as occupy the area along the border that has served as a UNITA resupply zone. Namibia has decided the MPLA has won: the Namibian government also argues that it is living up to the mutual defense pact it signed with Angola, the Democratic Republic of Congo (DRC), and Zimbabwe in April 1999. The mutual defense agreement said the nations would support one another if they face "internal or external aggression." Namibia also believes UNITA has helped support Namibian rebels in the Caprivi Strip (northeast Angola). However, open MPLA-UNITA combat inside Namibia further extends "The Great Central African War" that now runs from southern Sudan to Namibia, a swath of violence. (Austin Bay)

December 28, 1999 As further proof that UNITA is back on its heels, UNITA has called for negotiations with the Angolan government. The Angolan government claimed that it now controls the entire 1250 kilometer-long Angolan-Namibian border. A government spokesman said the capture of Jamba illustrated the success of the government offensive, which has also taken from UNITA the towns of Savate, Cuangar, Calai, Xamavera, Dirico, and Muscusso, An MPLA source said 200 UNITA rebels surrendered in the battle for Jamba. One western source informs FYEO that "jamba" means "elephant" in the Umbundu language. Will the offensive now turn to the east and take the diamond mines? (Austin Bay)

January 5, 2000 Angolan government troops (now often called in press reports Angolan Armed Forces (FAA)) said that they had killed over 400 UNITA rebels in combat operations along the Namibian border. An Angolan government spokesman also said that 100 tons of UNITA arms had been discovered near the town of Andulo in central Angola. Interestingly, the spokesman claimed the weapons dump held some chemical weapons.

January 6, 2000 Oil feeds the army. The Angolan government announced that the Kuito field (a "deep water" offshore oil filed off Angola's Cabinda province) has started producing crude. Chevron operates the field, with the Angolan state oil firm Sonangol, Italy's AGIP, and France's TotalFina as partners. Ultimately the field could produce as much as 100,000 barrels a day. UNITA relies on diamond sales to arm its forces. The oil market is bigger. While it's misleading to say that Chevron, AGIP, and TotalFina are better allies than Zambia and Debeers (the South African diamond conglomerate), it's not completely misleading.

January 7, 2000 The Angolan government announced that it had positioned army units along the Zambian border in an attempt to block retreating UNITA guerrillas. Another report said that Zambia had put its own troops on alert. Zambian and Angolan are best described as "poor." The report said that the Zambian forces would move to the border to help Angolan refugees (read that as UNITA supporters) fleeing into Zambia and to prevent Angolan government troops from crossing the border. Angola accuses Zambia of supporting UNITA -- and Angola is right. Could this lead to an Angolan-Zambian border war? Yes, but not likely. One key is Angola's estimate of just how badly its offensive has wounded UNITA in southern and southeastern Angola (i.e., along the Namibian border). If the Luandan government concludes that UNITA is smashed in that area it may gamble on reorganizing for a "showdown battle" along the Zambian border. Such a campaign could well include attacks into Zambia against UNITA rebels and UNITA refugees. The other key is Zambia's reaction. UNITA has been beaten badly. Zambia might conclude that it doesn't want to expend anymore political and military capital on a losing cause.

January 8, 2000 The Angolan government said its troops had rescued 20 Namibian civilians that UNITA guerrillas had abducted late last year, The Namibians were found at a former rebel base inside Angola.

January 9, 2000 Zambia denied reports that it is supporting UNITA. A Zambian spokesman said Zambia's troops were merely "monitoring" the Zambian-Angolan border. He insisted that Zambia was neutral and that it would be foolish for Zambia to take actions that might prolong the Angolan civil war.

January 11, 2000 Angola government soldiers captured a UNITA arms dump in Malanje province. The United Nations reported that in the last month another 7,000 Angolans fled to Namibia, most of them into the Sijembela area. Many of the refugees say they fled the fighting between the Angolan army and UNITA. Some of the refugees, however, may well be UNITA supporters. According to UNHCR reports, at least 20,000 Angolan refugees have entered Zambia since October 1999. The Angolan government offensive against UNITA began in September 1999.

January 19, 2000 Retreating UNITA rebels were accused of attacking a village in Zambia's Chavuma district and then sowing mines to cover their retreat.

January 21, 2000 Zambia put its military on alert and increased the number of troops on its border with Angola. A Zambian spokesman said the move it to prevent more "foreign attacks." UNITA guerrillas and refugees have been entering Zambia for the last three months. Last week Zambia claimed UNITA guerrillas attacked several villages in its North Western Province.

January 24, 2000 The UN announced that it had begun airlifting 5000 Angolan refugees out of Zambia. In Namibia, 2 civilians were killed in fighting between remnant UNITA forces and Angolan government forces operating in Namibia.

January 25, 2000 Mass graves continue to be found in central Angola. The latest find: 100 bodies near Chingwar. Sources said several of the bodies showed signs of being hacked to death (with machetes or knives).

January 27, 2000 A Portuguese oil worker was killed when a "gang" ambushed 3 vehicles near the Angolan city of Soyo (Zaire Province of Angola).

January 30, 2000 Former UNITA guerillas continue to pour into Zambia. Zambian government sources claim that UNITA troops attacked several villages near the bordering, stealing cattle and looking for food. The Zambian government said UNITA troops took 150 head of cattle. One government spokesman accused UNITA of tying a tribal chief to a tree with barbed wire and attacking him with rifle butts. The Zambian information seems to reinforce Angolan government (MPLA) claims that UNITA is very badly damaged and is on the verge of defeat.

February 2, 2000 NGOs are now estimating the number of "people displaced" by the recent fighting in Angolan is around two million. 1.7 million are "internally displaced." Approximately 200,000 have moved into Zambia. One source said 7000 had moved into Namibia. That figure is probably low.

February 7, 2000 Namibian sources reported that Namibian security forces killed 3 UNITA guerrillas in a running gun battle. The Nabmibians believe the guerrillas were part of the UNITA force that on February 6 killed 24 people in an attack on the Angolan town of Santa Clara, which lies across the border from the Namibian town of Oshikango.

February 9, 2000 A UNITA spokesman said that UNITA forces had killed 882 Angolan government troops in 60 different attacks conducted between January 10 and February 3. The spokesman said that UNITA had shot down an Angolan government MI-17 helicopter and an AN-12 transport plane. In an earlier report, South Africa's Foreign Minister Nkosazana Dlamini -Zuma said at a press briefing that she doesn't believe an Angolan government victory over UNITA will bring peace to Angola. Ms Dlamini-Zuma said that she doesn't believe a military solution is possible. She said that even if the Angolan government militarily defeated UNITA (a prospect she said she doubts will occur) "a portion of the Angolan people supports UNITA." She said that means negotiations must take place. Her biggest concern was that if the war continues (as she thinks it will) it could drag other southern African nations into it. (One suspects she sees Angola as a potential Congo for southern Africa.) South African Defense Minister Patrick Lekota said that the press reports that UNITA had been badly hurt in the Angolan government offensive could be "misleading." South Africa's former president, Nelson Mandela, told another group of journalists that even if the Angolan government (MPLA) position is strong at the moment, that as of now there had been no "major battle." Mandela said "Savimibi (UNITA's leader) is an accomplished guerrilla fighter." Mandela said he thought of Savimibi as a "criminal" but he didn't care much for the Angolan MPLA government, either.

February 11, 2000 Zambia reiterated a promise made to the Angolan government that retreating UNITA forces would not be allowed to stay in Zambia. However, a Zambian foreign minister also said that the Angolan government and UNITA would not be allowed to fight one another in Zambia. In other words, Zambia is once again telling Angola that its forces will police retreating UNITA guerrillas and will not allow Angolan military units to conduct cross-border attacks.

February 12, 2000 The Angolan government reported that 27 people died when an Angolan Army helicopter crashed near Lubango on February 5. The crash was caused by mechanical failure and pilot error.

February 18, 2000 South Africa is increasingly worried that the Angolan civil war pitting the Angolan government (MPLA) against UNITA could "spillover" into the rest of southern Africa, much like the Congo War has spread across central Africa. Several South African sources have said they became very worried when Namibia's President Sam Nujoma allowed the Angolan Army to launch attacks against UNITA from Namibian territory as well as chase UNITA guerrillas into Namibia. Who would get involved? The South Africans say Zambia is already on the edge of war and Botswana could get dragged into it as well.

March 7, 2000 Zambia claimed that 6000 Zambians have fled their villages after attacks by UNITA guerrillas. A Zambian spokesman said the UNITA guerrillas (forced from Angola by the MPLA's offensive) were raiding cattle herds.

March 11, 2000 A UN report says that many African leaders are continuing to ignore the ban on the sale of Angolan diamonds. Apparently, the ban, which is intended to stop UNITA from mining diamonds and selling the diamonds to buy arms and equipment, isn't working. According to the New York Times and other press sources, two of the worst violators are the countries of Togo and Burkinafaso.

March 12, 2000 The Namibian town of Rundu and the Angolan town Calai were both hit with 122 millimeter rockets, reportedly fired by UNITA rebels. This is an indication that UNITA still has stocks of heavy weapons and ammunition.

March 15, 2000 More reports continue to appear regarding "economic sanctions busting" activities by African leaders, major corporations, and perhaps military officers in African nations. As FYEO previously reported, Angolan diamonds and timber products continue to make it to market and supply UNITA with needed cash. On March 12 AFP reported that South Africa has launched a major investigation. On March 15, the British government called on the UN Security Council to shut down the sanctions violators. AFP had this interesting quote from Peter Hain, British junior minister in charge of African affairs: "It is no good putting our hands up in the UN for sanctions against UNITA and then taking no action while citizens in our countries make money out of misery. That is simply hypocrisy." No kidding. Hain referred to the recent UN report that named presidents Gnassingbe Eyadema of Togo and Blaise Campaore of Burkina Faso as kingpins in the arms and fuel smuggling that supports UNITA. (A subsequent AFP report said that former Ivory Coast president Henri Konan Bedie and former Congo Republic (Brazzaville) prime minister General Joachim Yhombi Opango had also violated UN sanctions and were named in the UN report.) As to making these nations and men pay a price, that's harder. The UN report, among other things, suggests denying UN posts to nations that are sanctions busters.

That's weak, but it's indicative of how little can be done short of putting economic sanctions on violators. Freezing currency accounts of violators, if those accounts can be identified, is a heavier wallop. The UN put an arms and fuel sanction on UNITA in 1993. In 1998 a sanction on UNITA diamond sales was added. By the UN's own accounting, illegal diamond exports have netted UNITA some $4 billion since 1992. The fact is, the figure could be higher.

March 20, 2000 The Zambian government said that Angolan government (MPLA) forces may have participated in an attack on the Zambian town of Chavuma of on March 14th. The Zambians have feared cross -border attacks by the MPLA as the Angolan government military forces seek to hunt down UNITA rebels who have fled Angola and are hiding out in Zambia.

March 22, 2000 AFP reports that six members of the Angolan Baptist Church have been found crucified in the northern Angolan province of Uige. Allegedly, the six were killed in an attack by UNITA rebels. The AFP story says that UNITA rebels have killed 80 Christians since January because the UNITA troops believe the Christians are passing on intelligence to the Angolan government.

March 27, 2000 DeBeers issued another statement that it is neither buying nor selling diamonds from rebel-controlled and contested areas in Africa.

April 3, 2000 Zambia has sent more troops to the Angolan border after a series of cross-border raids sent thousands of villagers fleeing. Some of the raiders were unpaid Angolan government troops, others were UNITA rebels. -Stephen V Cole

April 4, 2000 An Angolan government spokesman said UNITA guerrillas launched an attack near the town of Santa-Clara in Angola's southern Cunene province. Two people were killed.

April 14, 2000 The UNITA rebels in Angola claim to have scored a major victory in mid-March, capturing two diamond mines and numerous heavy weapons, while killing 827 government soldiers.--Stephen V Cole

April 17, 2000 A new UN report says that the UNITA rebels in Angola have been able to sustain their fight due to widespread violations of the 1993 UN arms embargo. The rebels pay in diamonds, and reportedly paid the late President Mobutu of the former Zaire, as well as President Eyadema of Togo and President Compaore of Burkina Faso to allow weapons shipments through their territory. Most of the weapons and ammunition were bought from Eastern Europe through brokers. --Stephen V Cole

May 6, 2000 UNITA has released a statement that its forces killed 454 Angolan government troops in combat during the last week of April. The statement claimed UNITA guerrillas also knocked out eight tanks and downed one Angolan government (MPLA) helicopter. It also accused the Angolan government of attacking villages in Bie province (central Angola) with phosphorous and napalm bombs. UNITA provided no confirmation of the claims. However, some regional analysts have been expecting UNITA to launch at least a series of minor attacks to show the government that its offensive (which ran from September 1999 to March 2000) failed to totally destroy UNITA.

May 8, 2000 UNITA boss Jonas Savimbi called for a "summit" meeting with Angolan President Jose Eduardo dos Santos. Savimbi said it was time to try to end the 24 year-long civil war.

May 23, 2000 UNITA is active again. Reports indicate UNITA rebels took the Towns of Bolongongo and Kikolongo in Angola's Kwanza-Norte province.

May 29, 2000 A Zambian spokesman said that Zambian troops captured an Angolan government (MPLA) soldier who was part of an Angolan Army contingent that intended to attack the Zambian village of Lukoma Nyatanda in northwestern Zambia. A firefight erupted between Zambian troops and the Angolan force just before the Angolan soldier was captured. A wire service reported the Angolan soldier's name: Jeremas Evalisto, 24, of Luena district in Angola's southern Moxico province. Why did the Angolan government troops plan on attacking a Zambian village? From past reports we know the Angolan government has been pursuing UNITA guerrillas into Zambia. The Angolan unit may have suspected that someone in the village was supporting UNITA. There is a simpler explanation, however: theft and plunder. One of the sad facts of so many of Africa's long-running and anarchic wars is that military units have "gone rogue" and used supposed "counter-guerrilla operations" as a cover for banditry.

July 24, 2000 UNITA seems to be making a statement -- which the major Angolan government offensive that ran from September 1999 into the Spring 2000 failed to destroy it. The UN said that "several thousand" Angolans were in the process of fleeing to Namibia to escape renewed fighting between the Angolan government (MPLA) and UNITA.

July 26, 2000 Western news sources reported UNITA rebels killed a dozen Angolans in an attack on the town of Calele.

August 1, 2000: UNITA is at least trying to create the impression that it's back in business inside Angola. A UNITA spokesman claimed that UNITA troops had killed 261 Angola government Troops during the last week. UNITA claimed that its forces engaged the Angolan government (MPLA) in seven different provinces.

August 8 UNITA guerrillas attacked the town of Catete, 60 kilometers from Luanda. A government (MPLA) source said that government soldiers killed ten UNITA rebels in the ensuing firefight. Subsequent reports said that the UNITA rebels killed from ten to 12 civilians when they attacked the town.
This is another "statement" by UNITA, a demonstration that it is still able to launch attacks in the vicinity of the capital.

August 9, 2000 On August 8 UNITA guerrillas attacked the town of Catete, 60 kilometers from Luanda. A government (MPLA) source said that government soldiers killed ten UNITA rebels in the ensuing firefight. Subsequent reports said that the UNITA rebels killed from ten to 12 civilians when they attacked the town. This is another "statement" by UNITA, a demonstration that it is still able to launch attacks in the vicinity of the capital.

August 11, 2000 AFP reported that the Angolan government (MPLA) said that its forces have "suspended" military operations against UNITA in southern Angola. In mid-May the Angolan Army began an offensive code-named "Operation Exagono." The operation was a follow-on operation to the government offensive launched in September 1999 and running through January 2000. "Exagono" was designed to keep UNITA rebels (who fled the big offensive) from returning to Angola. Based on several recent reports (which have been carried on strategypage), UNITA is once again active in the south and recently staged an attack near the capital, Luanda. The AFP wire story also said that the Angolan government now believes the September-to-January offensive "destroyed 20 percent of UNITA's military capacity..." If this figure is correct, then the Angolan Army has to be disappointed. In late January and February, it appeared that the Angolan Army had thoroughly destroyed UNITA's war making capabilities -- and had possibly dealt UNITA a fatal blow. The thinking at that time was that UNITA had at a minimum lost the ability to launch any major conventional -type attacks and would was reduced to conducting, at best, small -scale hit-and-run raids. If the new assessments are accurate, then UNITA remains a credible military force.

August 14, 2000 A follow-up on reports from May and June: Zambia is increasingly concerned about "spill-over" fighting from Angola. With UNITA showing new signs of life inside Angola, Zambia faces the possibility of cross-border attacks by the Angolan Army (MPLA) as it tries to attack UNITA base camps in the border region. The problem is compounded by occasional Angolan government accusations that Namibia backs UNITA. But "spill -over" from Angola isn't the only worry. In early August, western press sources reported that Zambia sent border and security forces to its northern border with the Democratic Republic of Congo (DRC). There is also the issue of refugees, and the lack of money to meet their basic needs. The UNHRC estimates that Zambia harbors around 200,000 refugees. Most of the refugees are Angolan (and are presumably UNITA sympathizers, or they wouldn't have fled) though and increasing number of refugees are filtering in from the DRC.

August 18, 2000 Well, it's tough to deny. Western press sources quoted Angolan President Jose Eduardo dos Santos as admitted that UNITA still has "pockets of resistance" inside Angola. The admission comes after a month-long series of attacks in southern and eastern Angola as well as a raid near Luanda.

August 23, 2000 New fighting has erupted in Angola's eastern Moxico province. Though the details are sketchy, it appears UNITA rebels and the Angolan Army have fought a series of battles near the town of Luena.

August 29, 2000 A small UNITA rebel force ambushed an Angolan government (MPLA) convoy near the town of Andori. At least two government troops were killed.

September 8, 2000 Namibia has arrested 22 of its troops who refused orders to deploy to Angola for combat against the UNITA rebels.--Stephen V Cole

September 13, 2000 The Angolan government claimed that eight leaders of the Cabinda Enclave Liberation Front-Cabinda Armed Forces (FLEC-FAC) surrendered to Angolan troops. The FLEC-FAC is the most militant faction of the Cabinda Liberation Movement which has been trying to win independence for Cabinda from Angola since 1975.

September 15, 2000 Western press sources report that UNITA rebels killed 18 people in assaults in the towns of Chivaca and Kuamba, 700 kilometers southeast of Luanda. Another report said that five UNITA rebels were killed in one of the attacks.

September 20, 2000 The Angolan government reported that regular army units fought a series of skirmishes with UNITA guerrillas along the Namibian border.

September 23, 2000 Several reports (government and press) indicate a large force of UNITA guerrillas (one report said 500) ambushed a large truck convoy on the highway near the town of Catata. The attack took place on September 21. 21 trucks were destroyed. This indicates that UNITA is once again able to stage "main force" (battalion and larger) operations inside Angola.

September 24, 2000 The Angolan government (MPLA) issued a statement that said the Angolan Army had taken complete control of Quimbele, in northern Angola. Quimbele has an airfield and was at one time a UNITA supply base. Subsequent reports said that a series of engagements had occurred in mid-September between UNITA and Angolan Army units in and near Quimbele. The battle of Quimbele ended on September 18. The area is near the Angola-DRC border.

September 25, 2000 The Zambian Army said that its troops had chased a UNITA guerrilla band back into Angola after the guerrillas stole 100 cattle in Zambia.

September 29, 2000 A UNITA spokesman claimed that UNITA guerrillas had killed over 550 government troops and shot down two airplanes in fighting between September 15 and 29. The spokesman said that on September 10 the Angolan government (MPLA) began a "vast encirclement operation" intended to capture UNITA bases in the central Bie province, in Malanje (north) and Moxico and Kwando-Kubango (east). All of these claims were unconfirmed.

October 1, 2000 The Angolan government has announced that it will not prosecute UNITA rebel leader Savimbi for returning to war after he lost the 1992 elections.--Stephen V Cole

October 19, 2000 Namibia reports that its troops are conducting operations against UNITA bases as much as 200 kilometers inside Angola.--Stephen V Cole

October 23, 2000 A report from Zambia said that 90 Angolan soldiers (FAA) escaped into Zambia from Angola. The soldiers had apparently been involved in a battle with UNITA forces and fled with some 1200 refugees into Zambia. A Zambian spokesman said the Angolan soldiers intended to return to Angola. There was no information on the battle with the UNITA rebels. This report followed a statement on October 20th where the Angolan army said it would now practice a policy of "hot pursuit" and chase UNITA rebels into Zambia.

October 24, 2000 A spokesman for the Angolan Armed Forces (FAA- armed forces of the Angolan MPLA government) claimed that a new offensive had pushed UNITA out of "strongholds" in central Angola. The spokesman also claimed that the FAA was directing a new offensive into UNITA positions in the "diamond areas" of southern and eastern Angola. This was no independent confirmation of the claims. However, on October 23, AFP quoted the Roman Catholic Church's Ecclesia radio as saying that UNITA attacked a diamond field near Cambulo. 25 people died in the attack.

October 28, 2000 Western news services reported that Angolan and Namibian troops were conducting operations against UNITA rebels along the Angolan-Namibia border.

November 1, 2000 The Angolan government (MPLA) has rejected a UNITA rebel peace initiative. In late October UNITA had issued a peace proposal (via the Internet). Western news reports said the UNITA proposal included a request for a general amnesty. The proposal also said that it wanted a new means of mediation in the peace process. UNITA does not want Portugal, Russia, and the US mediating the peace process. UNITA appears to prefer one that involves internal mediation. The Angolan government said that the peace proposal was unacceptable and UNITA should lay down its arms.

November 2, 2000 UNITA claimed one of its anti-aircraft artillery units shot down an An-26 transport aircraft. All 48 people on board were reported killed.

November 16, 2000 In September Angolan government forces captured the UNITA rebel base at Cazumbo, near the Angolan border with Zambia. Zambian Army Chief General Leujulo Musengulo quickly arrived in Angola to discuss "matters of security along our common border". Musengulo promised that Zambia would not allow UNITA to operate from bases in its territory.-- Stephen V Cole

November 21, 2000 A late report through Catholic Church sources indicates UNITA rebels attacked the town of Quiculungo, (250 kilometers east of Luanda). The Angolan government garrison was driven from the city. UNITA has been active throughout Kwanza-Norte province, where Quiculungo is located.

November 24, 2000 During January through June of this year, 204 landmines detonated in Angola killing 100 people and injuring 327. Most of the casualties were civilians. Some of the mines are decades old, but thousands have been laid in heavy fighting this year, particularly in Moxico Province.--Stephen V Cole

November 25, 2000 Portugal has agreed to provide the Angolan Navy with boots, spare engines, and spare parts. The Portuguese Army is providing the Angolan Army with training and logistical equipment.--Stephen V Cole

December 29, 2000 Angola said that new elections will be held in the latter half of 2002. Elections were originally scheduled for 2001. The Angolan government also claimed that its troops had killed 30 UNITA rebels in a series of firefights near the city of Benguela. The government spokesman said Angolan Army troops were conducting an operation to drive UNITA out of positions south of Benguela. In Another report (December 28), the government said that Jose Bumba, leader of the Cabinda Enclave Liberation Front -Renewed (FLEC-R) had surrendered. Bumba had fought the Angolan government (MPLA) for nearly 25 years. At one time the FLEC had carved out a "liberated zone" in northern Cabinda (Burraco). Bumba was apparently surrendering under the amnesty program offered by the government in November (November 10). The amnesty was part of the "celebration" of Angola's 25 years of freedom from Portugal. Angola’s armed forces. Deputy Defense Minister Armando da Cruz Neto was selected to replace De Matos. De Matos had been in charge since 1992.

February 14, 2001 Angola already has an impressive collection of Russian warplanes: 20 MiG-21s (1950s era fighters), 15 MiG-23s (similar to the US F-4), 18 Su-22s (a fighter bomber) and five Su-25s (similar to the US A-10). Angola recently showed off Su-24 (1980s era high tech bomber). But according to Rosobor on export (the Russian warplane exporting company), Angola has not received any Su-24s from Russia. Angola wants to upgrade its air force, and is rumored to be trying to obtain Su-27s (sort of like the US F-15). There is a large second hand market for Russian warplanes of all ages. Angola may be shopping around, as they have publicly complained of getting shoddy aircraft direct from Russia.

February 22, 2001 On February 21, an Angolan government spokesman said that UNITA rebels had killed 93 people in a series of actions throughout the country. 48 were killed in an attack in Cassanguidi (Lunda-Norte province).

A Portuguese citizen who works for the Angolan state diamond company, Endiama, was among the dead. 35 more people were killed in an attack near Cajiza and ten died in an ambush in the southern province of Huila. The Angolan Army claimed it killed 20 UNITA rebels in the firefight at Cajiza. Also, a fascinating wire service report ran during the week discussing illegal arms sales in Angola. The report quoted Angolan Defense Minister Kundi Payama as saying that in 1993-94 France violated arms trading curbs and sold Angola around $500 million worth of arms.

March 4, 2001 The government of Angola has said it is again willing to talk to the UNITA rebels and that the 1994 Lusaka Protocol (which collapsed in the 1999 fighting) could be the basis of a peace agreement.--Stephen V Cole

March 7, 2001 UNITA guerillas claimed to have shot down two Angolan government helicopters, killed 200 Angolan soldiers, and destroyed 23 military vehicles in a series of clashes since February 23.

March 25, 2001 Angola reports that it has received "several" Su-24 Fencer strike bombers. It is unclear where the planes came from, although it is known that Algeria recently bought a batch of 22 from Russia.--Stephen V Cole

March 26, 2001 UNITA strikes again. On March 22 UNITA claimed its forces attacked an oil drilling site in north Angola, killing 22 Angolan army soldiers. On March 26, UNITA said its troops attacked the airfield outside the town of Uige. The UNITA statement claimed that 10 Angolan policemen and seven Angolan soldiers were killed in the attack. There was no independent confirmation of the attacks.

April 6, 2001It looks like UNITAs back to running low-level hit-and-run attacks over a wide area an operational concept the organization has used successfully in the past. On April 4, UNITA guerrillas used 82-millimeter mortars to shell the southern town of Kuito. On the same day UNITA forces also attacked in the city of Sailundo. On April 5, UNITA launched an attack in Dongo district (Huila province, southern Angola).

April 7, 2001 The Angolan government (MPLA) said that it was still attempting to gain the release of seven Portuguese hostages held by Cabinda separatists. The seven have been kidnapped by a faction of the Cabinda Enclave Liberation Front (FLEC is the Portuguese acronym). The FLEC did hold eight prisoners, but recently released one man. Five of the Portuguese were kidnapped in early March 2001. The other three were kidnapped in May 2000.

April 9, 2001 An update on the French-Angolan arms scandal. The French Ministry of Defense says that it is in the process of declassifying documents relation to illegal arms sale to Angola. French prosecutors believe that in 1993 and again in 1994 French defense officials illegally sold Eastern Europe arms and ammunition to Angola in 1993 and 1994.

April 11, 2001On April 11, the Angolan government reported Angolan Army Brigadier-general Raul Antonio was killed April 9 when UNITA rebels attacked the farming community of Samba-Caju in Kwanza-Norte province. The Angolan statement described Antonio as a provincial operational commander. It also said he was known as "Recordacao." In a subsequent report, the government said 150 UNITA rebels took part in the attack, and five were captured by Angolan forces.

April 14, 2001 Another update on the French-Angolan arms scandal. Investigating French magistrates indicate that former French Gaullist interior minister Charles Pasqua is implicated in the scandal. A French source reported that the magistrates are examining the Association France Afrique Orient (AFAO). Pasqua was at one time vice president of AFAO. Open sources say that in 1996 AFAO received 1.5 million francs from Brenco, an arms supplier.

April 16, 2001 UN Secretary-general Kofi Annan said UNITA continued to benefit from illegal diamond sales, using the funds gained from selling diamonds and Angolan resources to finance its military operations. Though UN-sponsored sanctions seem to have eroded UNITAs strength, the fact that UNITA continues to successfully prosecute a low-intensity war indicates that the sanctions haven't stopped the war.

May 9, 2001 On May 5, UNITA guerrillas launched a major attack in the town of Caxito (near Luanda). UNITA claimed 37 Angolan government troops died in the battle. A subsequent report from Western sources said 100 people died in the Caxito battle. UNITA rebels struck near the town of Uije on both May 8 and May 9. One man was reported killed.

May 22, 2001 UNITA claimed it forces defeated an Angolan Army regiment and captured the town of Gulungo-Alto. This was no confirmation of the claim.

May 23, 2001 Reports from Angola claim UNITA killed 10 people in a truck ambush near Cacuso in Malanje province. UNITA guerrillas also ambushed another truck near Huambo, killing seven people.

May 24, 2001 Angola reported its forces found a UNITA weapons cache with 3,000 artillery shells in the southeastern town of Mavinga. Several hundred shells were 100 mm shells.

May 29, 2001 UNITA claimed its forces killed 102 government soldiers and five Namibian soldiers in action that occurred throughout Angola from May 19 through 26. The action involving the Namibians took place in Cunene province on May 23. UNITA guerrillas ambushed a seven vehicle convoy, killing 12 Angolan government (MPLA) soldiers and five Namibian troops. There was no independent substantiation of the claims. In fact, Namibia issued a statement calling the UNITA claims a complete lie.

June 6, 2001 The Angolan Army (MPLA) said it captured the town of Cachimo from UNITA. Cachimo is a diamond-mining center northeast of Luanda. An Angolan government spokesman said 15 UNITA guerrillas died in combat in the city. Cachimo has been a major source of diamonds UNITA sells to finance its military operations. In another report, AFP said that the Angolan government is using Polish military experts to help create a military modernization plan for Angolan forces. During the Cold War, both Polish and East German technical experts helped MPLA forces in their war against UNITA.

June 7, 2001 In a UNITA press release (reviewed by western news sources), UNITA leader Jonas Savimbi admitted that UNITA had suffered defeat (by the Angolan government forces) in conventional warfare. Because of the failure of conventional warfare, which resulted in the fall of Bailundo and Andulo" (UNITAs headquarters cities inside Angola, which fell to the Angolan Army during its 1999 offensive), Savimbi said UNITA had to return to guerrilla operations.

June 8, 2001 The Angolan government said that UNITA rebels had hit a World Food Program (WFP) chartered Boeing 727 transport plane with a shoulder-fired SAM. The damaged WFP plane, however, managed to land at the Luena airfield (its destination). Luena is in eastern Angola.

June 11, 2001 The Angolan Army claimed it had killed at least 103 UNITA rebels in a series of battles. 60 died in a battle on June 7 in the t own of Alto-Chicapa (Lunda-Sul province). 28 rebels were killed when UNIT attacked the town of Damba on June 9.

June 13, 2001 UNITA claimed its forces killed 128 Angolan government (MPLA) troops and 28 government police in battles that took place from June 5 to June 10. UNITA claimed that the battles occurred in 13 of Angola's 18 provinces. (UNITA mentions the provinces to demonstrate its military strength as well as its ability to operate throughout Angola.) UNITA said it attacked a military school in Benguela on June 8.

June 19, 2001 The Angolan government (MPLA) said its forces captured the town of Buengas. UNITA has used Buengas as a headquarters.

June 26, 2001 The Angolan government said 20 people died when UNITA attacked the town of Uige. The Angolan statement said one UNITA guerrilla was captured during the battle. An NGO source said UNITA used artillery in its attack on Uige.

June 27, 2001 Update on the big French illegal Angolan arms trial. Looks like its no longer so big. A French court announced that the investigation was over due to a technicality. Frances Court of Cassation said in its ruling that the case had to be dropped because criminal arms-trafficking charges were brought against the defendants before the French defense and finance ministries had taken appropriate bureaucratic and investigating action. The court cited a 1939 law. One of the defendants was the son of former French leader Francois Mitterand.

June 29, 2001 UNITA guerrillas reportedly ambushed a convoy near Cacuso and killed 12 people.

July 10, 2001 UNITA claimed its troops have killed 79 government troops in a series of firefights, from June 26 through July 10. The largest UNITA attack occurred July 7 when UNITA rebels took the town of Piri. There was no independent confirmation of the UNITA claims.

July 16, 2001 More diamond war in Angola. Several sources report UNITA guerrillas struck the town of Chingufo (near Dundo, in eastern Angola). UNITA is trying to secure control of Lunda Norte province, a major diamond-producing region. One western source reported 50 people were killed in the UNITA raid, but did not specify how many were civilians and how many were Angolan (MPLA) security personnel. Dundo is a major headquarters for the Angolan governments diamond production company, ENDIAMO.

August 1, 2001 A UNITA press release claimed its forces killed 210 Angolan government (MPLA) troops, militia allies, and police in a series of battles fought in central and northern Angola. Three attacks took place in Zaire, Uige, and Bengo provinces. Another took place in Benguela (central Angola).

August 2, 2001 UNITA attacked an Angolan Army commander center in the town of Negola. Two soldiers were killed in the attack.

August 16, 2001 On August 11 UNITA guerrillas attacked a train carrying 500 hundred of refugees from the city of Dondo to Luanda. The attack occurred approximately 150 kilometers southeast of Luanda. Initial reports said 90 were killed and around 150 wounded. On August 13 UNITA claimed credit for the attack, saying that 25 Angolan soldiers were killed in the attack. On August 16 international sources said the death toll was 259.

August 27, 2001 UNITA claimed its forces killed 148 Angolan government troops and six Namibian soldiers in various operations throughout Angola. One specific claim said that on August 19 UNITA rebels attacked a "coalition of Angolan-Namibian troops" in Kuando Kubango province and killed six Namibians and 13 Angolan government troops in the battle.

August 31, 2001 The Angolan government reported discovering a weapons dump in the town of Cuito. The dump contained RPGs, ammunition, and food supplies.

September 7, 2001 Angolan government sources reported that UNITA rebels killed a total of 48 people in three different attacks.

September 12, 2001 UNITA guerrillas attacked the village of Longonjo (Huambo Province) and killed 25 people. In a second attack near Caala (also in Huambo) UNITA claimed it killed a local Angolan military commander. The report gave no other details.

September 24, 2001 The Angolan government (MPLA) said that it has evidence that UNITA leader Jonas Savimbi has left Angola and is currently in the country of Burkina Faso. Recent government reports had Savimbi hiding out in UNITA camps near the Zambian border.

October 2, 2001 The Angolan Army said it discovered a cache of weapons and ammo near the Mavinga airport (southeast Angola). The weapons haul included a ZU-23 AAA gun and a significant stockpile of rockets.

October 11, 2001 NGO sources accused UNITA rebels of kidnapping 16 children. The UNITA rebels attacked a Catholic church in the town of Kiluanji.

November 12, 2001 The UN said that nearly 385,000 people have become refugees in Angola since January 1, 2001. The people were displaced by the fighting. In September 2001, 61,000 villagers had to abandon their homes due to the fighting.

November 17, 2001 The Angolan government said that its troops were not responsible for the attacks on Zambia that occurred on or around November 9. A government statement said that UNITA was responsible for the deaths.

November 20, 2001 The Washington Post ran a long article which addressed UNITAs revived war effort. The article focused on a UNITA attack that took place on September 25 when UNITA rebels hit an electrical substation nine miles outside of Luanda. The attack darkened portions of the capital, including the presidential compound. Diplomats now make the argument that UNITA knows it cannot win the Angolan civil war, but dramatic raids that send a message (such as shutting down the electrical power) translate into political statements that UNITA has to play a role in any settlement. The article reiterated the Angolan governments position (MPLA, or Popular Movement for the Liberation for Angola) that it will no longer negotiate with UNITA and its leader, Jonas Savimbi. The article put UNITAs current strength at 10,000 troops. Also on November 20, UNITA put out a press release where it claimed its forces killed 298 Angolan government soldiers and police in actions that took place from November 8 through 19. The UNITA attacks took place in at least eight of Angola’s provinces (possibly ten).

In 2002, there were 145 land mine explosions, causing 42 deaths and 124 wounded. This is down from 339 land mine detonations and 660 victims. No one knows how many mines were planted over the last few decades. Most of the mines were used to terrorize civilians or make roads and trails impassable. Unlike Europe and South Korea, which rapidly demined after their wars, Angola is a more chaotic place which is slowing demining operations.

February 2002 - Savimbi killed by government troops. Government, Unita sign ceasefire shortly afterwards.

May 2002 - Unita's military commander says 85% of his troops have gathered at demobilization camps. There are concerns that food shortages in the camps could threaten the peace process.

June 2002 - UN appeals for aid for thousands of refugees heading home after the ceasefire.

Medical charity Medecins sans Frontieres says half a million Angolans are facing starvation, a legacy of civil war.

August, 2002 - UNITA scraps its armed wing. "The war has ended," proclaims Angola's defense minister.

April, 2004 – onwards Tens of thousands of illegal foreign diamond miners are expelled in a crackdown on illegal mining and trafficking. In December the government says 300,000 foreign diamond dealers have been expelled.

September, 2004 - Oil production reaches one million barrels per day.

January 19, 2003 Police and army troops have begun a major operation to find and expel some 10,000 illegal diamond miners from Mali and Senegal. These men, operating in diamond fields in the center of the country, did business with UNITA, and this trade provided most of the money to fuel UNITA's military operations. It's been estimated that over $300 million worth of diamonds are still smuggled out of the country each year. UNITA, now a political party, is suspected of still being involved in diamond dealing. The miners have never been known engage in organized military activity and appear to be evading the police, not fighting them.

February, 2003 - UN mission overseeing the peace process winds up.

February 28, 2003 UN and African sources report that around 400,000 Angolan war refugees now living in Zambia and the DRC want to return home to Angola. The UN says there are 210,000 Angolan refugees in Zambia and around 190,000 in the DRC. The UN report said that the refugees may start returning as early as May 2003. Resettlement is expensive and also dangerous. Unexploded land mines and ordnance still litter many of the villages and farm lands.

March 19, 2003 The Angolan government reported on new military action in oil-rich Cabinda province. At least 10,000 Angolan troops are in now in Cabinda. Strategy Page has reported on the troop buildup, including an offensive operation last fall against the rebel Front for the Liberation of the Enclave of Cabinda (FLEC). Now Angolan sources assert that the offensive has driven the 1500 to 2000 FLEC fighters into the DRC and the Republic of Congo (Brazzaville). UN sources, however, say that the UN will be investigating reports of Angolan military crimes in Cabinda, including rape and looting. One UN estimate says the Angolan offensive created 45,000 refugees from Cabinda. Some of the refugees are living in Cabindas jungles, others have moved into the DRC. This implies the offensive employed a scorched earth strategy. The new war in Cabinda looks like one of those conflicts that is off the international community's radar though a couple of humanitarian NGOs have filed reports (one dating from December 2002). Cabinda produces about 900,000 barrels of oil a day and earns Angola over $4.5 billion a year. One on-line source estimates the US receives four to five percent of its imported oil from Angola. Since Cabinda provides about 90 percent of Angola's oil exports, that means the vast majority of Angolan oil shipped to the US come from Cabinda. FLEC wants to make Cabinda an independent country. Check the map it is separated from the rest of Angola by a narrow slice of the DRC. If Cabinda were a separate country it would become a west African equivalent of a Gulf emirate: tiny, rich, and vulnerable to attack by greedy neighbors. Protection by the large Angolan Army (when it isn't engaged in destroying Cabindan villages) has a potential upside. On the other hand, Cabinda has not received a fair share of its oil revenues most of the people are impoverished. The enclave has put cash in the hands of the Angolan government (and that means cash in the accounts of kleptocrats). Arguably, Cabindan oil financed the Angolan military (the MPLAs military) during the Angolan civil war. (Austin Bay)

May 28, 2003 The Angolan government reported a Boeing 727, run by Airangol, the Angolan state airline, was stolen. The plane was swiped from Luandas international airport. The plane had been grounded last year and was apparently sitting off one of the main runways. A white man went to the plane and started it, then took off. There is evidence of ground crew connivance. Another report said someone had recently refueled the plane. Theft, but government officials and freelancers, is rampant in the country. There is fear that this will create more bandit gangs, which will, as happened in Sierra Leone, Ivory Coast and Liberia, develop into rebel movements. Meanwhile, all the stealing creates troops more intent on theft than training, and unable to do much about an armed rebellion.

June 4, 2003 Angola and Botswana have agreed to begin repatriating Angolan refugees still living in Botswana. Figures vary for the number of refugees, but NGO sources say 2000 Angolans remain in Botswana.

June, 2003 - UNITA - now a political party - elects Issaias Samakuva as its new leader.

June 27, 2003 Former members of the Angolan UNITA rebel organization selected Isaias Ngola Samakuva as party president. Essentially, Samakuva replaces Jonas Savimbi. UNITA is well along the road to becoming a political party. UNITA has 70 parliamentary seats in the Angolan parliament (out of 223). Meanwhile, the Angolan government chose a new chief of staff. General Agostinho Sanjar Fernandes Nelumba will now run the armed forces.

September 2, 2003 An Angolan opposition political group issued a report that estimated there are four million guns still floating around Angola. By guns they mean the assault rifles, sniper rifles, and even heavier automatic weapons left-over from the long Angolan civil war. The report suggested the weapons are stashed away and could arm self-defense groups (i.e., militias, and most likely tribal militias).

October 6, 2003 The main Cabinda independence group, the Patriotic Movement for the Liberation of Cabinda (MPLC), has asked for new negotiations with the Angolan government. The MPLC issued a statement that said it prefers to resolve Cabindas issue peacefully and politically. One news report said the MPLC is already in contact with the Angolan government, through both the Angolan and Portuguese embassies in the DRCs capital of Kinshasha. Earlier this year, Angola beefed up its military presence in Cabinda and conducted a sweep operation against Cabindan separatist bases along the DRC border. The enclave of Cabinda contains most of Angola's oil wealth.

November 28, 2003 The Congo Republic (Brazzaville), Angola, and the DRC have held a series of meetings in Angola's Cabinda province. The subject of the meetings was nominally common border issues. The real subject is Angola's continuing operations against Cabinda rebels. The DRC borders Cabinda to the east and south. The Congo Republic is on the provinces northern border. Most of the Cabinda rebels (in the FLEC) once based out of the DRC, but the DRCs increased cooperation with the Angolan military has made it difficult for rebels to move freely from the DRC into Cabinda. Angola is concerned that the rebels may try to use the Congo Republic.

December 16, 2003 Angola said that its commander of the Maiombe Military Zone", in Cabinda province (where all the oil is) reported the military situation as being stable despite a couple of isolated actions by rebels in the Cabinda Enclave Liberation Front (FLEC, locals who want some of the oil proceeds). This is apparently a vague reference to the combined operation the Angolan Army carried out against the FLEC with the tacit cooperation of the DRC and The Congo (Brazzaville) Republic.

April 2, 2004 Army troops began forcibly expelling 250,000 Congolese diamond miners from northern Angola. Over decades of civil war in Angola, the Congolese had crossed border and established themselves as miners and suppliers of goods to the miners. The diamond area, which are about a hundred kilometers from the border, became quite prosperous. Now that the Angolan civil war is over, the Angolans want it back.

April 22, 2004 The government has agreed to halt its expulsion of Congolese diamond miners after reports got out that the army was basically stealing everything the Congolese had, killing those who resisted, raping women and painfully searching, or killing and cutting open, those they suspected were hiding diamonds internally. Several thousand of the Congolese have died and many more have entered Congo with stories of the abuse and pillaging.

May 17, 2004 FLEC, the rebel organization in oil rich Cabinda, is keeping its head down because of heavy pressure from the army and police. There are still clashes, but the government has kept the press out of the oil rich area and accurate news is hard to come by. The 250,000 people in Cabinda are, like most Angolans, upset by the theft, by government officials, of billions of dollars in oil revenues. Foreign aid organizations are pressuring the government to at least open the books on what happens to the oil revenue. The implied threat is that foreign aid would be stopped if the theft of oil money continued. After all, the foreign aid is going to projects that the stolen government revenue could have paid for.

May 19, 2004 The government expects more violence as many of the three million people (a quarter of the population) displaced by over two decades of civil war, attempt to return home. They are finding home is often occupied by strangers, often foreigners. Such was the case when the government sought to reclaim the diamond mining territories in the north and east. The UNITA rebels had financed their operations by taking over the diamond areas and allowing Congolese to come in and dig out the diamonds. UNITA took a cut of the cash generated by the diamond sales. The Congolese migrants took no part in the civil war and just looked for diamonds. Moving the Congolese out has caused quite a lot of violence and thousands of deaths, and more of the same can be expected as other regions of the country are visited by long absent natives.

June 19, 2004 While the war is over, the violence is not. Over a million refugees, including 86,000 who sided with the rebels, have been resettled. But thousands of young men with guns have created a crime wave that defies solution. As a result, there are over a hundred security companies supplying bodyguards and watchmen for those that can afford it. Armed watchmen receive about $30 a month, with better trained bodyguards getting several times that. The capital alone employs 15,000 private security personnel. It costs about $2,000 a month to get 24/7 security for a house. For many wealthy Angolans, this is seen as a justifiable expense. Meanwhile, international food aid is declining, in part because of the stories of government officials stealing oil income as foreign donors were being asked to give money. The country earns $6.5 billion a year from oil and diamond exports, but government officials steal most of it. Little is spent on public services. If this continues, and it appears that it will, another rebellion will evolve. There is already one rebel group in the oil producing Cabinda region, but the government has spent a lot of money to put troops in Cabinda and keep the rebels under control.

August 11, 2004 The long civil war is over, but not the civil strife. The main rebel organization, UNITA, is now a political party. The ruling party, the MPLA, is still fighting with UNITA outside the capital. The MPLA has the edge, as it controls the army and police. The MPLA, using oil money, is bringing in weapons from China and military trainers from Cuba to beef up its combat capability. Corruption is still common, and an armed opposition is unlikely. In the past, UNITA got weapons from South Africa and the United States. No more. So the ruling party of Angola slides in the tropical dictatorship so common in Africa, and so difficult to reform.

March to May 2005 - Marburg virus, which is deadlier than Ebola, kills more than 300 people, most of them in the north.

June, 2005 - Chinese Premier Wen Jiabao visits, promises to extend more than $2 billion in new credit, in addition to a $3 billion credit line Beijing has already given Luanda.

April 11, 2006: The Portuguese empire isn't quite dead. The Angolan government reported that 250 Portuguese-speaking economists met in Luanda for a three-day long conference. The conference discussed economic reform and development. It's a fair bet trade was also on the agenda. The Angolan press statement said this was the sixth official meeting of the "Association of Portuguese Speaking Economists" (yes, they have an organization).

April 15, 2006: The Angolan NGO (non-governmental organization), Angola 2000, called on the Angolan government to institute a program of national disarmament. There are several similar "national disarmament" programs for countries where civil wars have ended, but the weapons remain (particularly light automatic weapons, light anti-tank weapons, and mortars). Angola 2000 is an advocacy group that has supported disarmament programs in the east. The NGO asserted that there are three million military-type weapons in civilian hands in Angola. Angola 2000 also asserted that the incidence of "gun violence" in the capital of Luanda is connected to the availability of weapons. The organization also claimed that there are still "large caches" of weapons in Luanda. The NGO also acknowledged that one reason many Angolans keep weapons is that they do not believe the government and local police are able to protect them from criminals. In 1992 the Angolan government gave out AK-47-type assault rifles and automatic pistols to local militias as part of the war effort against UNITA.

August, 2006 - The government signs a peace deal with FLEC, a separatist group in the northern enclave of Cabinda.

October, 2006 - The UN refugee agency begins "final repatriation" of Angolans who fled the civil war to the neighboring DR Congo.

April 14, 2007: Angola has made peace work. For example, Congo (Brazzaville) four years after its peace agreement, still has problems with rebel groups. Not so in Angola. Five years ago this month Angola reached a peace agreement that ended a 27 year long civil war between the government and the UNITA (National Union for Total Independence of Angola) guerrilla movement. Angola, has made some progress. One reason is oil prices. Angola managed to stay in the oil business during the civil war. That's because much of it is off shore and in Cabinda province which is separated from the rest of the country by a slice of neighboring Congo. A small Cabinda separatist movement continues to limp along, but is no threat. High oil prices and rising production provides Angola with makes billions from its oil industry. However, there has been little economic development in rural areas and among Angola's poor. The Angolan government is only nominally democratic. The regime of Jose Eduardo Dos Santos and his MPLA (Popular Movement for the Liberation of Angola) is largely unchallenged. Angola has not had a presidential election since 1992. Parliamentary elections are scheduled for 2008 and a presidential contest in 2009. No one knows if Dos Santos will run for re-election (at one time he claimed he would not). UNITA has tried to morph into a political party, but it remains weak. Critics accuse Dos Santos of buying political support with government funds, which is a common practice in oil rich, but otherwise backward, countries. The government has some useful foreign friends. China is increasingly active in Angola. China is helping rebuild the rail line between Benguela and the capital, Luanda. The rail line was a frequent target of UNITA guerrillas. The new and improved railroad will also connect with the port if Lobito, where dock facilities are being upgraded. China agreed to supply military equipment to Angola. Trade between China and Angola is over $5 billion a year. China needs the oil, and is willing to do whatever it takes to keep the oil coming. That includes propping up local dictators. Whatever it takes.

March 25, 2007: Angola is vociferously denying that it will send special paramilitary police to Zimbabwe. But over the last few days, word on the street has been that Angola had agreed to provide Zimbabwe's government with up to 2,500 special police. The reports even mentioned numbers and arrival dates. A thousand police are to arrive the first week of April. Three groups of 500 will deploy from Angola to Zimbabwe sometime after that. It appears some type of security agreement was reached. Given that Zimbabwe's government, led by its aging dictator, Robert Mugabe, is under enormous strain, the Angolan agreement certainly seems suspicious. That's because the government of Zimbabwe does not appear to be that desperate, yet. Elite Zimbabwean military units remain loyal to Mugabe (they are well paid), and Mugabe can count on the "hard core" in his militia. But there are signs that the Zimbabwean police and some units in the Zimbabwean Army are disenchanted. If these guys rolled over, that's why Mugabe would want to hire 2500-3000 Angolan special security police. Angola has several very good military and paramilitary police units and is the second-best military overall in southern Africa. South Africa has the best military in the region, but is very opposed to hiring out its cops for desperate dictators. When pressed, Zimbabwe admitted there was an arrangement, but that it was a "training exchange" agreement. A training exchange usually involves only a small number of police acting as trainers. However, 2,500 is not a small number: a deployment of 2500 would mean deploying units, not trainer teams. Angola’s' special paramilitary police are a capable force that has a violent reputation and is known for its loyalty to Angolan President Jose Eduardo dos Santos. The special paramilitary police also serve in the Angolan president's presidential guard. Dos Santos has led Angola since 1979. Like Mugabe, Dos Santos has been in power a long time. The special paramilitary police are sometimes called "ninjas" because they wear black uniforms. Reports from Zimbabwe suggest Mugabe's government no longer fully trusts its police. Hiring Angolans -or any outside mercenary force-- would also serve as a check on disgruntled members of Mugabe's ZANU-PF party. But Zimbabwe is also broke. Not a lot of spare cash for foreign mercenaries. But if you are at the end of your rope, perhaps the mercs will insure that you can safely skip the country. When all else fails, there's always luxurious exile, paid for by all the money you stole and stashed in foreign bank accounts.

April 14, 2007: Angola has made peace work. For example, Congo (Brazzaville) four years after its peace agreement, still has problems with rebel groups. Not so in Angola. Five years ago this month Angola reached a peace agreement that ended a 27 year long civil war between the government and the UNITA (National Union for Total Independence of Angola) guerrilla movement. Angola, has made some progress. One reason is oil prices. Angola managed to stay in the oil business during the civil war. That's because much of it is off shore and in Cabinda province, which is separated from the rest of the country by a slice of neighboring Congo. A small Cabinda separatist movement continues to limp along, but is no threat. High oil prices and rising production provides Angola with makes billions from its oil industry. However, there has been little economic development in rural areas and among Angola's poor. The Angolan government is only nominally democratic. The regime of Jose Eduardo Dos Santos and his MPLA (Popular Movement for the Liberation of Angola) is largely unchallenged. Angola has not had a presidential election since 1992. Parliamentary elections are scheduled for 2008 and a presidential contest in 2009. No one knows if Dos Santos will run for re-election (at one time he claimed he would not). UNITA has tried to morph into a political party, but it remains weak. Critics accuse Dos Santos of buying political support with government funds, which is a common practice in oil rich, but otherwise backward, countries.

The government has some useful foreign friends. China is increasingly active in Angola. China is helping rebuild the rail line between Benguela and the capital, Luanda. The rail line was a frequent target of UNITA guerrillas. The new and improved railroad will also connect with the port if Lobito, where dock facilities are being upgraded. China agreed to supply military equipment to Angola. Trade between China and Angola is over $5 billion a year. China needs the oil, and is willing to do whatever it takes to keep the oil coming. That includes propping up local dictators. Whatever it takes.

November 9, 2007: The government is still dealing with the political after-effects of its long-running civil war with the National Union for the Total Independence of Angola (UNITA) and the National Front for the Liberation of Angola (FNLA). That was a complex struggle. For example, the US and South Africa backed UNITA, while Communist China backed the FNLA. The Popular Movement for the Liberation of Angola, (MPLA), the faction which won the civil war, had Russian and East German support. The Cold War sputtered to a close but Angola's civil war didn't end until 2002. Oil income has helped ease the transition to peace, at least somewhat. Angola is now America's sixth largest supplier of oil. From January through April 2007 Angola exported over 68 million barrels of oil to the US. However, former UNITA supporters claim that their tribes are not getting a fair cut of the oil revenues. That may well be. What is certain is that Angola's Cabinda Province isn't getting its fair share. Cabinda is Angola's biggest strategic asset and its biggest strategic problem. For starters, Cabinda is cut -off from the rest of Angola by a strip of Congolese territory. Cabinda's population also differs ethnically and linguistically from the rest of Angola. Historically, Cabinda wasn't tacked on to Portugal's Angolan colony until 1885. A majority of Cabindans speak French, not Portuguese (the lingua franca of Angola). By one estimate, Cabinda pumped (literally) over four billion dollars worth of oil royalties into the Angolan government's bank accounts. Cabindans claim they definitely don't get a fair share of the sales of their own natural resources. The Front for the Liberation of the Cabinda Enclave FLEC) is still active in the province, though the province is heavily "occupied" by Angolan military forces. The FLEC is militarily weak but is still a nasty political thorn. In 1977 the FLEC declared an independent Republic of Cabinda. The FLEC also appears to have the allegiance of a large number of native Cabindans.

February, 2007 - President Edwardo dos Santos says parliamentary elections will be held in 2008 and presidential polls in 2009.

March 25, 2007: Angola is vociferously denying that it will send special paramilitary police to Zimbabwe. But over the last few days, word on the street has been that Angola had agreed to provide Zimbabwe's government with up to 2,500 special police. The reports even mentioned numbers and arrival dates. A thousand police are to arrive the first week of April. Three groups of 500 will deploy from Angola to Zimbabwe sometime after that.

It appears some type of security agreement was reached. Given that Zimbabwe's government, led by its aging dictator, Robert Mugabe, is under enormous strain, the Angolan agreement certainly seems suspicious. That's because the government of Zimbabwe does not appear to be that desperate, yet. Elite Zimbabwean military units remain loyal to Mugabe (they are well paid), and Mugabe can count on the "hard core" in his militia. But there are signs that the Zimbabwean police and some units in the Zimbabwean Army are disenchanted. If these guys rolled over, that's why Mugabe would want to hire 2500-3000 Angolan special security police. Angola has several very good military and paramilitary police units and is the second-best military overall in southern Africa. South Africa has the best military in the region, but is very opposed to hiring out its cops for desperate dictators.

When pressed, Zimbabwe admitted there was an arrangement, but that it was a "training exchange" agreement. A training exchange usually involves only a small number of police acting as trainers. However, 2,500 is not a small number: a deployment of 2500 would mean deploying units, not trainer teams.

Angola’s' special paramilitary police are a capable force that has a violent reputation and is known for its loyalty to Angolan President Jose Eduardo dos Santos. The special paramilitary police also serve in the Angolan president's presidential guard. Dos Santos has led Angola since 1979. Like Mugabe, Dos Santos has been in power a long time. The special paramilitary police are sometimes called "ninjas" because they wear black uniforms. Reports from Zimbabwe suggest Mugabe's government no longer fully trusts its police. Hiring Angolans -or any outside mercenary force-- would also serve as a check on disgruntled members of Mugabe's ZANU-PF party.

But Zimbabwe is also broke. Not a lot of spare cash for foreign mercenaries. But if you are at the end of your rope, perhaps the mercs will insure that you can safely skip the country. When all else fails, there's always luxurious exile, paid for by all the money you stole and stashed in foreign bank accounts.

April 14, 2007: Angola has made peace work. For example, Congo (Brazzaville) four years after its peace agreement, still has problems with rebel groups. Not so in Angola. Five years ago this month Angola reached a peace agreement that ended a 27 year long civil war between the government and the UNITA (National Union for Total Independence of Angola) guerrilla movement. Angola, has made some progress. One reason is oil prices. Angola managed to stay in the oil business during the civil war. That's because much of it is off shore and in Cabinda province, which is separated from the rest of the country by a slice of neighboring Congo. A small Cabinda separatist movement continues to limp along, but is no threat. High oil prices and rising production provides Angola with makes billions from its oil industry. However, there has been little economic development in rural areas and among Angola's poor. The Angolan government is only nominally democratic. The regime of Jose Eduardo Dos Santos and his MPLA (Popular Movement for the Liberation of Angola) is largely unchallenged. Angola has not had a presidential election since 1992. Parliamentary elections are scheduled for 2008 and a presidential contest in 2009. No one knows if Dos Santos will run for re-election (at one time he claimed he would not). UNITA has tried to morph into a political party, but it remains weak. Critics accuse Dos Santos of buying political support with government funds, which is a common practice in oil rich, but otherwise backward, countries.

The government has some useful foreign friends. China is increasingly active in Angola. China is helping rebuild the rail line between Benguela and the capital, Luanda. The rail line was a frequent target of UNITA guerrillas. The new and improved railroad will also connect with the port if Lobito, where dock facilities are being upgraded. China agreed to supply military equipment to Angola. Trade between China and Angola is over $5 billion a year. China needs the oil, and is willing to do whatever it takes to keep the oil coming. That includes propping up local dictators. Whatever it takes.

September, 2008 - First parliamentary elections for 16 years.

March, 2009 - Pope Benedict celebrates mass in front of more than a million people in Luanda.

October, 2009 - Angola expels illegal Congolese diamond miners. Democratic Republic of Congo responds by expelling some 20,000 Angolans.

December, 2009 - President Dos Santos suggests presidential elections will have to wait another three years.

State oil firm Sonangol signs a deal to produce oil in Iraq.

January, 2010 - Angola hosts African Nations Cup, continent's most popular sporting event. Bus carrying Togo football team is attacked by Cabinda separatists.

Parliament approves new constitution strengthening the presidency and abolishing direct elections for the post.

September, 2010 - President of DR Congo, Joseph Kabila, visits Angola. Ties between the two neighbors deteriorated in 2009 when Angola began expelling illegal Congolese immigrants and Congo retaliated.

October, 2010 - UN report into killing of Hutus in DR Congo between 1993 and 2003 says they may constitute "crimes of genocide". It implicates Angola, Rwanda, Uganda, Burundi and Zimbabwe.

November, 2010 - Convoy carrying Chinese mine workers attacked in the region of Cabinda. A faction of the Cabinda separatist movement Flec claims responsibility.

US urges Angola to investigate alleged rape of women recently deported to DR Congo.

November 16, 2010: The commonwealth would include Angola and Mozambique, and essentially re- establish the band of the Portuguese speaking (Lusophonie) that once stretched from yoke of Portuguese colonialism.

March, 2012 - More than 20,000 people rally in support for President Dos Santos in response to a reported social media campaign calling on people to demonstrate against the government. Human Rights Watch accuses the government of a "campaign of intimidation" to suppress anti-government protests.

May, 2012 - Supreme Court annuls the appointment of the head of the electoral commission, upholding complaints from the opposition that she was not politically neutral.

September, 2012 - Governing MPLA wins a comfortable victory in parliamentary elections, guaranteeing another term in office for President Dos Santos. African Union observers deem the polls free and fair, despite allegations by opposition party Unita about lack of transparency.

June 4, 2014: ANGOLA: The Irony: Portugal ‘Humiliated’ About Depending on Wealthier Angola for Support.

Angola was once colonized and occupied by Portugal for a period of 400 years, only gaining its independence in 1975. A brutal civil war ensued, which just ended in 2002. In its wake, the oil- and- mineral-rich African nation has seen its economic fortunes expand while its former colonizer struggles with crippling poverty and other related after-effects. The Guardian recently published a brief investigative report on the economic role reversal between the two nations.

Portugal and Angola forged what the paper alleges what may have become a reluctant partnership in 2011, when Portuguese premier Pedro Passos Coelho (pictured left) and current President of Angola José Eduardo dos Santos (pictured) established a financial deal. Angola’s fortunes were certainly in better shape than Portugal, even though the nation has been dogged with allegations of corruption and government mismanagement. The Guardian reports: There was no doubt about the firm handshake, but the smile looked a bit forced. The date was 17 November 2011, the place Luanda. Pedro Passos Coelho the Portuguese premier, had just completed talks with the president of Angola, Jose Eduardo Dos Santos, sealing an agreement that was both a boon for Portugal and deeply humiliating.

Prior to the agreement between Coelho and President Dos Santos, Portugal received a $100 billion bailout from the European Union (EU) and the International Monetary Fund (IMF). The terms of the bailout meant that the country needed to resort to “radical austerity measures,” which siphoned money from the general population and exhausted welfare. During this period, Angola’s rise as an economic power was underway. The Guardian reports: Dos Santos has been in power since 1979 and the country now enjoys growth rates of between 5% - 15%. Portugal, heavily in debt and struggling to climb out of recession, finall exited it's bailout last month. ”Maybe Angola will colonise us now,” says Vasco Lourenço, the head of Associacao 25 de Abril an organisation that is trying to preserve the spirit of the April, 1974 revolution. And just last month, Portugal paid the EU and IMF bailout funds despite staggering unemployment and other issues.

The Guardian writes: The conflict has moved to another front, all about the economy, and Angola seems to have gained the upper hand. “Angola is looking for recognition and makes it very clear where the money is, sometimes to the point of humiliation,” says French historian Yves Léonard. In February, when the cash-strapped government in Lisbon raised the possibility of selling 85 Miro Paintings, an Angolan millionaire, Rui Costa Reis, offered to buy them. Well-off Angolan families are now the only people who can afford to shop on the capital’s upmarket Avenida da Liberdade. They are investing in luxury apartments at Cascais, a fashionable seaside resort, and buying up companies hastily privatised by the authorities. They – and the Chinese – are the prime beneficiaries of the “golden visas” that the government has promised to anyone investing €500,000 ($650,000) in the country.

World To Ban Islam:
Angola Leads The Way As The First Country In The World To Ban Islam

Angola has reportedly declared Islam illegal and ordered for all of the country’s mosques to be closed down.Minister of culture Rosa Cruz e Silva said that mosques in the largely Christian country would be closed until further notice. She described Islam as a ‘sect’ that would be banned as counter to Angolan customs and culture. Angola (capital, Luanda) has reportedly declared Islam illegal and ordered for all mosques to be closed. There are unconfirmed reports that mosques across the African country are being destroyed, according to the International Business Times.

President Jose Edurado dos Santos reportedly told the Osun Defence daily:

‘This is the final end of Islamic influence in our country.’ Along with Islam, which is a religion associated with less than 1 per cent of the population of 19 million, 194 other 'sects' have been banned in the nation, where more than half the population is Christian. Ms Cruz e Silva said: 'The legalisation of Islam has not been approved by the Ministry of Justice and Human Rights [and] their mosques will be closed until further notice.'

Clashes between Christians and Muslim people are frequently reported in the local media. Manuel Fernando, director of the Angolan Ministry of Culture's National Institute for Religious Affairs, denied the reported measures. 'There is no war in Angola against Islam or any other religion,' Fernando told Agence France-Presse. 'There is no official position that targets the destruction or closure of places of worship, whichever they are.'

PEN INTERNATIONAL REPORT ON ANGOLA

Pernicious pursuit of the Luanda Book Club

31 March 2016 RAN 07/16 PEN International is concerned at news that 17 Angolan activists, known as the Luanda Book Club, were sentenced to between 2-8 years in prison and fined 50,000 kwanza (around 300 USD) on Monday, 28 March 2016, for 'preparatory acts of rebellion' and 'criminal conspiracy'. An earlier charge of 'attempting against the president's life' was dropped by the prosecution on 21 March 2016. The activists had gathered at a book store in the capital Luanda, to read Domingos da Cruz's unpublished manuscript Tools to Destroy a Dictatorship and Avoiding a New Dictatorship – Political Philosophy for the Liberation of Angola, an adaptation of US academic Gene Sharp's book From Dictatorship to Democracy: A Conceptual Framework for Liberation. Sharp's book is described as a blueprint for non-violent resistance to repressive regimes, the meeting to discuss the book was considered by the authorities to be a preliminary act to a coup. The 17 activists include writer, journalist and university lecturer Domingos da Cruz, author of the manuscript they were reading at the book club; journalist and law student Sedrick de Caravlho, the book's designer; university lecturer Nuno Alvaro Dala, one of the lecturers of the seminars/discussions. Also arrested were rappers Luaty Beirão, Hitler Jessy Chiconde (also a university student) and teacher José Hata. Both the prosecution and defence lawyers have said they will appeal the verdict and sentences. PEN International calls on the Angolan authorities to immediately and unconditionally release the writers and activists and quash their convictions. Angolans have the right to express themselves politically and protest peacefully via book club discussions or other means and restrictions on this is a violation of their rights to freedom of expression and assembly. - See more at: http://www.pen-international.org/newsitems/angola-pernicious-pursuit-of-the-luanda-book-club/#sthash.ALmgadxQ.dpuf

Why do a lot of Portuguese people still immigrate a lot to Angola?

By Cary

Lived in Angola (1999–2001) Updated March 9

Falando como Sul Africano, eu acho que de repente é porque existem mais oportunidades economicas em Angola do que em Portugal. Também é mais facil do que, por exemplo, Africa do Sul, porque não é preciso aprender autro idioma e existem similaridades entre as duas culturas e jeitos d'estar, e se já tem família no pais é até mais fácil. (Favor desculpe o meu Português ruim!)

As a South African, I think perhaps it's because there are more economic opportunities in Angola than in Portugal. It's also easier than, for example, South Africa, because it's not necessary to learn another language and there are similarities between the two cultures and ways of being, and if a person already has relatives in a country it becomes even easier.

And I completely forgot to mention the beauty of the country and the Angolan people.

Related Links

Why are some Angolans ashamed of being African and consider themselves Portuguese first and look down on West Africans despite being fully (black) African themselves?

What do Portuguese people think of many Turks who immigrate to Portugal and buying houses because its culturally similar and to the environment?

Why are there so many Portuguese people living in Angola?

Is the Portuguese population in Angola expected to reach a million due to heavy immigration from Portugal?

Why can’t Portugal consider people from Angola, Brazil, Cape Verde, and Mozambique as ethnic Portuguese people since they have Portuguese blood?

Why has Angola adopted the Portuguese language so completely?

What is it like to live in Angola (Africa)?

Bráulio Bernardo Just a son July 12, 2016

It's awesome!
The people are way too friendly. We socialise like crazy.

If Angola was a social network it most probably would be Facebook.

The people are just too happy, always up for fun and making new friends. Oh, and the show-offs never seem to stop.

These are actually some of the facts that make the country a good place to live. I mean, what better way to live in a country that had been in war for almost 3 decades?

In my high school years I would take lifts from strangers on a weekly basis (school was 2km away from home, hated taxis), mostly because I have a feel-sorry-for-him face.

The times I took taxis it wasn't bad also. I used to carry house music cds with me and ask the drivers to play them. I always had very good conversations with them and other passengers (it's a mini bus type of taxi we call candongueiro).

.This is a candongueiro:

My mom says that you don't need to buy a newspaper in Angola, just get into a taxi and the journalists (passengers, drivers, etc) will update you with the news.

The cuisine is outstanding. We eat like bosses.

To the left of the country is the Atlantic ocean, so we have a lot of seafood. We love to eat beans as well, in particular a specific dish called feijoada (the Portuguese-speaking community loves it). Here's a picture:

Here's another boss dish called mufete:

I almost forgot to mention funge. The #1 dish in the country. Funge is like the Angolan people. It is enjoyable and adaptable. You can mix it with almost anything.

See that white thing in the middle? That's funge in action.

Those are just the tip of the iceberg.

We have tons of beaches. We chill like stars.

There's an Island on the south of the capital (Luanda) called Mussulo, where all the cool kids and adults go for holidays and epic parties, mostly in December. I've been there many times, it feels incredibly good to be there.

However, most of the magic happens in the Cape Island. That's where you find the top nightclubs. There's no better place to be on a Friday night.

Some pictures:

They call Luanda the 'African Miami'. Here's a link: Luanda, Angola - The 'African Miami' (pics) - Politics - Nigeria

This was just Luanda. Don't even get me started on the remaining 17 provinces.

Our music is amazing. We dance like pros.

The kids love Kuduro. The young love Kizomba. And the older ones love Semba. All of which originated in Angola.

In reality everyone loves those genres, regardless of the age. I've seen many people (including Angolans) overwhelmed by the way we dance.

In general, it was a lot of fun growing up in a such a mad country. The best moments I had were shared with my family, friends and strangers.

Nothing makes me happier than knowing that all those aspects about the country are still there. I consider myself very lucky to be one of them.

Related Links

If Nigeria is the giant of Africa, then what is the cause of high inflation in the country?

Was the Volta river (west Africa) navigable before the Akosombo dam is build? If yes, how big a ship could navigate the river and how far?

If the only supremacists you are concerned about are white supremacists, are you a racist?

Why are Egyptian people in the grey area, not Black and not White?

How damaged is 'the Nigerian name' outside within Africa and outside Africa? How can the Nigeria name be redeemed? And how can Europe help to bring justice to those responsible for this damage?

What is the purpose of Black Lives Matter?

Why is it that Africans have no centralised language?

Who do you like better 50 cents or his North African great great great great great great grandfather?

Why does Africa see their gods as inferior to Christianity brought by the Westerners?

Was the Bretton Woods system resulting in helping poor countries in Asia and Africa such as Indonesia and Nigeria to become less poor?

What is the reason why African countries are not producing world-renowned vehicles?

Will Al-Shabab attack Ethiopia?

Why does it seem so difficult for African countries to have good leadership, if that's what it takes to have a competitive continent?

What good things can be said about African leaders?

Angolan Editor Carlos Alberto sentenced to fine, 2 years in prison over coverage of land deal

New York, September 17, 2021 – Angolan authorities should not contest the appeal of journalist Carlos Alberto against his prison sentence and fine, and should stop pursuing criminal defamation cases against members of the press, the Committee to Protect Journalists said today.

On September 13, the Luanda Provincial Court convicted Alberto, editor of the online news outlet A Denúncia, on charges of criminal defamation, injurious denunciation, and violating press freedom, according to media reports and Alberto, who spoke to CPJ via messaging app.

The court sentenced Alberto to two years in prison and a fine of 110 million kwanzas (US$176,000) but allowed him to remain free and suspended that sentence for 20 days to allow Alberto to make a public apology, according to those sources. If he publishes an apology every five days on his Facebook page and on A Denúncia for 45 days, the fine and prison term will be dropped, according to reports.

Alberto told CPJ that he had appealed the decision and had no intention of apologizing. His lawyer, Almeida Lucas, told CPJ by phone that the appeal would be heard by the Supreme Court and the sentence was suspended until the case could be heard.

“The conviction and sentencing of Angolan journalist Carlos Alberto is egregious; criminal defamation and insult laws are colonial relics that have been found to be unconstitutional in several jurisdictions throughout Africa and globally, and should never be used to persecute the press,” said Angela Quintal, CPJ’s Africa program coordinator, in Durban, South Africa. “Angola’s judiciary has the opportunity to finally strike down these laws, which criminalize journalism and are abused by the country's politicians and officials against the press."

The charges were prompted by a complaint filed by Angolan Deputy Attorney General Luis Liz, in response to A Denúncia's May 15 video about his alleged illegal appropriation of land for a shopping mall, as CPJ documented in June.

Lucas told CPJ that two other people accused of complicity in that land deal, Esperança Ganga and João Quipaca, had joined Liz's complaint, thereby "aggravating the alleged crimes imputed to Alberto."

CPJ was unable to find contact information for Ganga or Quipaca. In a phone call with CPJ, Liz said, "it doesn't bring me any happiness that someone may go to prison for defaming me" but that Alberto's reporting had negatively affected his health, his work, and his family life.

He also accused Alberto of repeating "unfounded accusations even during and after the sentence, in a defiant attitude both towards me and the authority of the court."

The court convicted Alberto on three counts each of criminal defamation, injurious denunciation, and violating press freedom, Lucas said. In addition to paying 100 million Kwanzas ($160,000) to Liz, Alberto was also ordered to pay five million kwanzas (US$8,000) each to Ganga and Quipaca, according to reports.

Alberto told CPJ that the Provincial Court refused to look at evidence he submitted in court, and said he believed the process was "rigged to benefit Liz" and to shutter A Denúncia because it was "a nuisance after exposing corruption by top government officials."

A Denúncia is an independent news outlet that publishes on its website, a YouTube channel, where it has about 2,600 followers, and on other social media networks. It frequently covers allegations of official corruption and other local news events in Angola.

Previously, on June 16, the attorney general's office issued a restraining order that prevented Alberto from contacting A Denúncia's employees, according to Lucas and a copy of that order, which CPJ reviewed. Lucas said that order, coupled with the court's refusal to examine evidence that could exonerate Alberto and the heavy sentence applied by the judge, showed that authorities sought to silence Alberto's journalism.

Alberto João, a spokesperson for the attorney general’s office, told CPJ via message app that the restraining order was “a legal mechanism to prevent the continuance of a criminal activity.”

João said he was not prepared to comment on other elements of Alberto’s case.

Dear Angolan patriots, Can you tell us some amazing unique facts about your country?

Patriotic Youths Answered by Ludovina Próspera Luís Sebastião March 24 with pleasure

Curiosities about Angola, one of the most prosperous countries in Africa.

Like Brazil, Angola was colonized by Portuguese, and the same language, religious and cultural traditions. The country that celebrates its independence on November 11th.

Angola

The Republic of Angola is a country on the west coast of Africa. Its official language is Portuguese, and native languages like Kikongo, Chokwe and Umbundo are considered national languages. Umbundo added many words to Portuguese spoken in Brazil, such as "nenê", which means "little piece", and "samba", adaptation of "semba". The country has about 29 million inhabitants.

Cologne

Like Brazil, Angola was also colonized by Portugal since the 16th century. However, its independence arrived much later, already in the 20th century, after a long war of liberation. And Brazil was the first country to recognize its independence, on the same day of the declaration, November 11, 1975.

Civil war

After independence, two liberation movements continued to fight for power. Between 1975 and 2002, the country experienced a civil war between Unita - National Union for Total Independence of Angola, and MPLA, Popular Movement for the Liberation of Angola.

Flag

The flag of Angola was inspired by the communist symbol of the hammer and sickle. it was decided to superimpose a machete on a sprocket. Between 1975 and 1992, the country adopted a single-party system of communist influence. Riches

Angola's territory is rich in natural resources, especially oil, diamonds and iron ore. The exploitation of these resources makes the country one of the most prosperous on the continent. However, despite converting this wealth into a high gross domestic product, economic inequality is relevant, shown by the fact that many Angolans live in a situation of misery. Kwanza

Angola's currency is the kwanza, the name of the main local river. At the price of 9/11/2018, one US dollar is worth 310 kwanzas. 82.7 kwanzas. Cost of living

Luanda, the country's capital, is considered the most expensive city in the world to live. In supermarkets, a kilo of tomatoes costs about 1,800 kwanza, more than R $ 20. A pair of designer sneakers is around R $ 700, and the rent for a one-bedroom apartment in the center of the capital can go from R $ 6,000 a month. Summer

Despite the high cost, Angola is a popular destination for tourists - its tropical climate provides a feeling of summer all year round. However, tourists, beware: in Angola it is forbidden to photograph government buildings, military structures and other buildings. Religion

About half of the Angolan population has ties to Catholicism, due to their Portuguese origin, but native traditions remain present in the country's culture, such as the cult of ancestors. Angolans believe that dead relatives can interfere with your life, including causing illness - in this case, it is recommended to do some ritual to appease your ancestors

Respect

Respect for the elderly is another striking feature of Angolan culture: it is customary to first greet the elders, bowing their bodies in a sign of respect. Another sign of respect when talking to older, important people or women is not to look them directly in the eye.

Capoeira

The origins of capoeira are in Angola, where the movements were used by the natives as a form of defense. The dance-fight was introduced in Brazil by the slaves brought there by the Portuguese.

Dance

In Angola, dance can function as a language that indicates ethnic, religious and cultural meanings. One of the most popular musical styles in Angola is semba, a word that means umbigada, and which was one of the sources for the creation of Brazilian samba. Another very popular rhythm, which has already reached worldwide projection.

Literature

Some of the most important Portuguese-speaking writers today are Angolans. His literature usually represents with realism the pain and prejudice suffered by the people of the country. Among the main names in Angolan literature are José Luandino Vieira, José Eduardo Agualusa and Pepetela. It is possible to find several works by these authors published in Brazil.

Sacred Tree

The imbondeiro tree, originally from the Mayombe forest, is considered sacred by Angolans and used as a source of natural medicines. Its leaves are rich in calcium, iron and proteins, and are indicated to fight pain and inflammation.

Palanca Negra Gigante-Black sable

The sable antelope (Hippotragus niger variani) is a rare species of antelope that exists only in Angola. The animal is endangered and is a symbol of the country, even appearing as a nickname for the national football team.

Are Angola, Mozambique, and Equatorial Guinea the only countries in Africa where they speak European languages natively?

Not counting very small minorities, there are many native English speakers in South Africa, Zimbabwe, Sierra Leone, Liberia, Zambia and small numbers in other countries as well.

There are some German speakers in Namibia and if you consider Afrikaans an European language, well, there’s that too.

There are native Portuguese speakers in Guinea Bissau and most people in Sao Tome and Principe speak Portuguese natively.

There are small native French speaking minorities in many francophone countries throughout the continent.

If you count the islands, the (small) population of St Helena is English speaking and there are native French speakers in Mayotte and Reunion as well as a few in Mauritius and the Seychelles.

Did Europeans bring civilization to primitive savage Africans?
It is all because of the black skinned African Moors who ruled in ancient and medieval Europe. It is all because of the Moors. Revenge is sweet; historical revenge is even sweeter. How the Moors described their European foes: Sa-id of Andalusia wrote the following of his White Iberian opponents: They "…

Paixão António José Studied at Agostinho Neto University April 14
He's just a kid… Why kneel in front of him then few minutes later another African American man get shot? 🙅…

Ludovina Próspera Luís Sebastião Knows Portuguese March 15

As an Angolan, I noticed that the Angolan phenotype is different to other Africans. Is it because of Portuguese colonisation that happened in Angola for centuries?

Yes and no.

Well it is true that some Angolans have a set of genes received from the Portuguese, these genes, together with the influences of the environment, determine the phenotype of these beings, in this case I am talking about the morphological, physiological and even behavioral characteristics of an individual, BUT it is also true that this group of people is not in large numbers in Angola compared to Angolans who do not have Portuguese genes, but have a similar phenotype to one that they do.

Mozambique and Angola were both Portuguese colonies and both embraced communism. Is that just a coincidence, or is there something to that?

Kevin Richardson Researcher, Biologist, Historian, Anthropologist. (2008–present) Thu

The Portuguese colonies in Africa (Cabo Verde, Guinea-Bissau, Angola and Mozambique) began their struggle for independence in 1960, as French and English colonies were first gaining independence.

However, Portugal was very adamant on maintaining their overseas empire, and maintained an anti-insurgency campaign against independence movements from 1960 until the Carnation revolution in 1974.

In Angola, there were three main independence movements in this period from 1960-1974. They were the Movimento Popular de Libertacao de Angola (MPLA) which espoused Marxism-Leninism. Frente Nacional de Libertacao de Angola (FNLA), which emerged from a pro-poor farmer political organization, and by 1974 espoused a conservative, Christian position. Uniao Nacional para a Independencia Total de Angola (UNITA) which from 1966-79, espoused a Maoist line.

During this period from 1960-1974, these three factions in Angola prioritized the struggle for national independence, and generally sought to minimize infighting.

Additionally, these different factions had international backing. The Soviet Union and the Czech Republic were enthusiastic supporters of the MPLA, providing them with arms and instructors. China provided support to each of the three independence movements at various points in the 1960s, but eventually chose to back the MPLA as the best organized and most effective outfit.

As I explained in this answer, the policy of the United States in the John F. Kennedy administration was initially caught between supporting independence movements and needing Portugal's cooperation within NATO. Succeeding administrations of Lyndon Baines Johnson and Richard Milhous Nixon eventually came down in support of Portugal, while giving minor, token support to FNLA.

Additionally, under Joseph Mobutu (after 1971 Mobutu Sese Seko), the Democratic Republic of Congo (post-71 called Zaire) adopted an anti-communist orientation and provided arms and support to the FNLA as anti-communist proxies against the MPLA. This was at least in part retribution for MPLA harboring Katangan Gendarmes, who had fled after the collapse of Katanga in 1963.

Beyond that, South Africa and Rhodesia generally supported Portuguese rule in Angola and Mozambique, and viewed the prospect of a breakdown in Portuguese rule in those colonies as a threat to the maintenance of White rule in Rhodesia and South Africa.

So, throughout the late 1960s and early 1970s, the MPLA received great amounts of foreign support from superpowers as well as from African leaders like Julius Kambarage Nyerere of Tanzania and Kenneth David Kaunda from Zambia, which greatly facilitated their organization and gave them safe havens in Zambia, making them the largest and most effective independence organization in Angola by 1974.

MPLA-Soldiers

It was only after the Portuguese pulled out of Angola and Mozambique in 1975 that US foreign policy really came to see Angola as a front in the Cold War chess-match in the “Third World”. Belatedly, the US and their South African allies came to support the FNLA under Holden Álvaro Roberto, because of their anti-communist, Christian ideological orientation. However, by 1979, the United States had come to regard Holden Álvaro Roberto and the FNLA as unscrupulous, corrupt and ineffective. The United States and South Africa then supported the UNITA movement, which adjusted its ideological orientation to anti-communism.

I am less familiar with the details of Mozambique, but my understanding is that the broad outlines are similar. The Soviets, Chinese, Tanzania and Zambia all supported FRELIMO (Frente de Libertacao de Mozambique). Again, Tanzania and Zambia allowed training and safe havens for FRELIMO in their territory. The United States, Rhodesia and South Africa supported Portugal

Thus, when a military coup in Lisbon created the Carnation Revolution and radically changed Portuguese policy in favor of ending the colonial wars, it was FRELIMO which was the major anti-colonial force that was prepared to lead a new government.

Related Links

Is land owned by Portuguese citizens in pre 1974 Angola still legally theirs?

If Angola has no territorial dispute, does that mean that the Portuguese made the Angolan borders correctly?

Did the Portuguese colonisation manage to kill off the native traditional languages in Angola because everyone is speaking Portuguese as a native language there?

How did the ‘retornados’ travel to Portugal from Mozambique and Angola after Portuguese withdrawal from those two territories?

China defeated Portugal in the Sino-Portugal War, so why did Macau become a colony?

What happened to the Portuguese merchant classes of Angola after independence?

Why did the Portuguese take so long to leave Angola?

Why did Portugal lose Angola and Mozambique, in spite of Portugal's victory in the Portuguese Colonial War against Angola and Mozambique?

How much influence does Portugal have in Angola and Mozambique?

Why did Angola and Mozambique abandon communism?

Why has Angola adopted the Portuguese language so completely?

With so many years of Portuguese colonisation, did Angola lose tribalism?

Was Nigeria a Portuguese colony?

Did the Portuguese of pre-independence Angola and Mozambique resent or dislike Anglos, such as the Rhodesians and British for any particular reason?

Why didn't the Portuguese manage to retain and expand their possessions in Nigeria, where they even founded Lagos, and make it a colony for several centuries as they did

What made Cubans dominate over South Africans militarily in Angola and Namibia?

Ruth Dreyer · Follow Updated 9mo

Mark here: This answer is addressed to Boris Sanochkin, but I feel we can all use it.

We are both addressing & countering political narratives. Let us set them aside. Neither advances the truth.

You say the Cubans ruled the skies…

This ground-forces grunt knows that throughout the Bush war in Angola we were frequently deployed, withdrawn & received air-supplies by helicopter - that is, slow, soft-skinned low altitude & minimally armed aircraft. We stopped & nattered with a local hunter on one occasion, deep in, & en passant spotted a DC-47 Dakota flying past. He commented, "That plane is lost. The road they take runs north-west south-east by Cuvalai." The point in his comment is that the RSA Air Force was doing MILK-RUNS over Angola, & the locals KNEW this; again, with slow, prop-driven thin-skinned, unarmed low-flying aircraft. A third example, on one occasion we had a FAPLA/Cuban column boxed in, besieged in the field, unable to move, & without access to water, food or munitions. They resorted to a veritable wagon-train of Mi-8 helicopters, if I remember aright, for re-supply of a column in serious trouble. But we got an inkling of it, our intelligence was GOOD, & we sent over a raid of Impala (Aermacchi 326) fighter trainers. The plus of this is that these jet aircraft, less than minimally viable in modern conflict, could throttle back more or less to the cruising speed of a helicopter. This gave the 'Injuns' in their Impalas optimum dawdle-time with their guns on target, instead of flashing past for a quick squirt & then circling back (some time later) for another all too short squirt. They WASTED the wagon train - the choppers - the helicopters.

The necessary inference is that in none of these cases were the SAAF aircraft so much as challenged by CAFIA aircraft. Hell, they had Mig-23's, we know they did. One defected. They had Mi-8's, of course they did, but they never deployed them for air domination of the Theatre of Conflict: Never. Our Mirages flew freely all over Angola, our Canberras flew freely all over Angola, our Dakotas flew freely all over Angola, & our helicopters flew all too freely all over Angola.

I tell you now: Not a damn would I let that happen if I had aerial domination over the Theatre of Conflict. So also for Agustino Neto - So also for Fidel Castro.

You write, "The Cubans on the over hand had a decent air force equipped with modern jets, decent armor and a knowledge to use it." Whatever, we know they didn't.

Scratch that Lie.

Now, our Army, hampered though it was by sanctions, took the lead in several directions, built our own munitions, & deployed them all too effectively. I expect, Boris, that you are not all that unaware of a South African G-5 howitzer that with one shot from a distance of over 50 Kilometres detonated an entire Cuban munitions stockpile. We see that the weapons we built & deployed for conventional operations have a second life all over the World today, as for example our Mine Protected Vehicles, our Artillery & our military electronics. Oh, we did make heavy use of your RPG-7 rocket grenade launchers, one to every platoon - after all we had captured so many.

Sadly, so much else of what we captured was not all that viable in modern conflict. Our take on it was that your lot found no use for them either. Um, we did find a use for your semtex, Czechoslovakian, hey, for military demolitions - against your own structures. You probably know that too.

Scratch that lie.

How did we manage to get hold of all that stuff? Conventional infantry operations against CFA/FAPLA. You write, " The battle of Cuito-Cuanavale in 1988 in Angola was the turning point of the conflict. 3,000 Soviet and East German troops have been involved on the Cuban side based on anti-Soviet stance of the South African side." On the contrary. They planned to advance - they planned to cross a river - the SADF stopped them. In. Their. Tracks. CFA/FAPLA forces numbering over 7 500, with the support of East German & USSR 'advisers' got their faces plastered to their arses at Cuito Carnavale, by less than 3 000 SADF troops, & not all of them got to be deployed. You call that a victory? I pray God send all my enemies just such a victory as this. Grant this, My Lord, of your great mercy: Amen. (That was a prayer).

It bears note that the OC CFIA, on his return to Cuba, was arrested on trumped up charges & executed before a firing squad. The OC CAFIA smelt the writing on the wall & on thinking it over, flew straight on to Florida, USA, there to apply for (& receive) political asylum. Their military record plainly did not amount, in Castro's opinion, to Victory. Shall we not defer to his judgement???

Scratch that lie.

The actual question is, "What made Cubans dominate over South Africans militarily in Angola and Namibia?"

They did not, the poor creatures. It really wasn't fair, what Castro did to them, post them over to Africa without due & appropriate training, equipment & preparation. These same Cubans did not come within long running distance of, to, or from the Namibian Border.

These years past, I have had to do with South African Doctors that went over to study Medicine in Cuba. They came back with no illusions at all. What they had to tell of the Cuban experience of the Angolan War makes sobering conversation for devoted African Socialists. Their return to practice in South Africa is one of the hardest blows to the ANC narrative outright, from their own ranks.

Boris Sanochkin, former (Ret.) Lt. Colonel Answered Mar 17, 2021

I feel like entering a toxic territory of Cuban-South African YouTube wars here but it seems like a quite easy question to answer.

South Africa had a perfectly decent military but they had a specific experience, generally battling agianst primitive tribesmen over centuries.

They had knowledge of bush warfare, competent artillerymen and talented special forces in small group tactics but all of the above was perfectly out of place against a modern military equipped with up to date gear and trained in combined arms tactics.

The Cubans on the over hand had a decent air force equipped with modern jets, decent armor and a knowledge to use it. If not better experienced they had better equipped artillery including MRLS and nice special forces as well, although better suited for jungle and urban warfare.

Also the problem for the South Africans was that when they started to tackle internal problems by attacks on other countries they portrayed it as a war against global communism, to try to win hearts and minds in the West. Given the Marxist infestation of Western institutions in 1970s it was a gross mistake, resulting in severe sanctions against the regime using racism as a pretext, and also forced the Soviet logistic support for Castro for whom the intervention was largely a war on racism, to tackle the accusations of his own regime as racist.

All in all, the Cubans ruled the skies and also had the support of Africans on the ground who disliked ‘Gringos’ how the Cubans called South Africans.

The batlle of Cuito-Cuanavale in 1988 in Angola was the turning point of the conflict. 3,000 Soviet and East German troops have been involved on the Cuban side based on anti-Soviet stance of the South African side.

The South Africans lost and retreated. The Cubans planned a Highway of Death sort of humiliating bombing on them but Gorbachev told Castro to have mercy. That is likely the reason of the modern YouTube wars with South Africans, who claim they won the war but were robbed of victory. Otherwise they would be dead and won’t make bombastic claims.

All in all the Cubans liberated Angola from the South Africans and then annexed the Western better part of South Africa - a mineral rich Namibia which is an independent country right now.

Then the Cuban proxies had an uprising in South Africa proper, resulting in the removal of the minority white administration, making the claims of South Africans of how much better comparing to Cubans they were quite laughable.

Related Links

How does the rest of Africa view white South Africans? As an Afrikaner, I feel a lot of animosity from fellow Africans outside of SA. I can understand why, but regardless of where we came from, we now feel African.

After South Africa gave independence to Namibia, did South Africa continue to have troops deployed to Angola?

Did any black South Africans support Apartheid?
Why did South Africa occupy Namibia?
Do black South Africans see white South Africans as African or belonging to Africa?
Why did South Africa end its occupation of Namibia?

If colonialism and Apartheid was wrong, why haven't the land of the African people been returned back to them in South Africa and Namibia?

What is the future of the remaining white populations in South Africa and Namibia?

Did Cuban soldiers ever meet Portuguese or South African soldiers in colonial wars in Africa?

What future do white Africans (especially South Africans, Namibia) have in the country?

How much influence does Portugal have in Angola and Mozambique?

Francisco M Pericão Faria , Business Development Manager (1990-present)
Answered Aug 16, 2018

I have to forewarn you of the dispassionate tone of my answer.
Know those 2 countries very well : the dramatic decline in living conditions since colonial times and the inability to stabilise development under marxist-inspired totalitarian regimes have bred conflicting sentiments :

The first of frustration about the incompetence and graft of the current indigenous ruler elite;

The second of resentment of the former colonial masters on the realisation that perhaps things could have been done differently and with better results if independence had been transitioned rather than fought over.

That much is on Portugal's tab, since the pre-1974 regime didn't even contemplate a peaceful independence that most likely would have avoided Angola and Mozambique to fall in USSR's influence, that led to civil wars and ruinous dictatorship, destroying what Portugal had built for 500 years - on the other hand, Africa in the 70's and 80's was battleground for cold war conflict, so it wasn't really Portugal's responsibility to keep power hungry communists from ruining peoples lives, that took over and haven't left since.

In my own opinion, the end result is that this resentment will always linger on as a cop out for the Angolans and Mozambicans for not moving on, so for the next 500 years, Portuguese will forever be the culprits : they hate our guts, with a vindicative streak.

Your answer is : negative influence. As a rule of thumb, whatever Portuguese people say today to an Angolan or Mozambican will be interpreted as an extension of the former colonial dominance, and therefore despised outright.

That being said, the circumstances of the interaction between Portugal and these former colonies will dictate behaviour to value or dismiss Portuguese influence, according to pure convenience of the parties, it's hipocritical like that.

In the end we only share the same language, and if Angola and Mozambique can deal without Portugal's cooperation, they will gladly submit to China's dominance as a survival strategy.
Money generates influence these days, not principles or kinship.

Andre Garcia Updated Aug 17, 2018

Portugal does have some sort of cultural, comercial and political influence over Angola and less over Mozambique. Angola is a big comercial partner of Porugal and consume in some extense culture from Portugal, mainly sports.

Politically, Portugal has some influence also over Angola due to the fact that Portugal is an open door to the elite Angolans access the EU.

Offcourse this goes both ways. Portugal also consumes cultural traits from Angola, mainly music and Angola also have oil, minerals, coffee and other important resources that are not available in Portugal.

I would say that sharing the some language, a common past and Portugal being part of the EU does give Portugal a footprint in Angola but the Angolans also have a huge impact in the Portuguese economy.

Mozambique is different, is more distant from Portugal. Mozambique culture is quite influenced by arabs and economically the country is less atractive. Despite that a lot of Portuguese companies and young Portuguese workers are moving to Mozambique in search of better opportunities. The country is safer than Angola (despite some disturbes in the north).

My final response is Portugal and Angola are politically, comercially and culturally bounded. They have influence and leverage with each other. There´s less Portuguese influence in Mozambique but it´s still there.

Related Links

Why has Angola adopted the Portuguese language so completely?
Why did the Portuguese take so long to leave Angola?

Why did Portugal lose Angola and Mozambique, in spite of Portugal's victory in the Portuguese Colonial War against Angola and Mozambique?

Mozambique and Angola were both Portuguese colonies and both embraced communism. Is that just a coincidence, or is there something to that?

How different is Brazilian Portuguese from the Portuguese spoken in Mozambique or Angola?

How did the ‘retornados’ travel to Portugal from Mozambique and Angola after Portuguese withdrawal from those two territories?

If all of Portugal's former colonies (Brazil, Angola, Mozambique, Ceylon, etc.) were all absorbed back into Portugal, how strong would Portugal be?

How do Mozambican people feel about Portugal and the Portuguese?
Is Angolan Portuguese closer to Brazilian Portuguese or Portugal Portuguese?

Why is Portugal having so much debt, in spite of having a massive empire in history and looting many countries?

Is it true that Brazil and Portugal have almost nothing in common culturally, except the fact that both countries speak the same language and that Brazil has a Portuguese colonial background?

Was Angola and Mozambique were not much more than overseas holdings for Portugal? How did this relationship or colonial process differ from that of Portugal's other famous colony, Brazil? (And to other European colonies in Africa of the time)?

How do Brazilians feel about Portugal?
When and how did Portugal invade Angola?
How do the Portuguese feel about Brazil?

What is it like to live in Angola (Africa)?

Bráulio Bernardo Just a son5y It's awesome!

The people are way too friendly. We socialise like crazy.

If Angola was a social network it most probably would be Facebook.

The people are just too happy, always up for fun and making new friends. Oh, and the show-offs never seem to stop.

These are actually some of the facts that make the country a good place to live. I mean, what better way to live in a country that had been in war for almost 3 decades?

In my high school years I would take lifts from strangers on a weekly basis (school was 2km away from home, hated taxis), mostly because I have a feel-sorry-for-him face.

The times I took taxis it wasn't bad also. I used to carry house music cds with me and ask the drivers to play them. I always had very good conversations with them and other passengers (it's a mini bus type of taxi we call candongueiro). This is a candongueiro:

My mom says that you don't need to buy a newspaper in Angola, just get into a taxi and the journalists (passengers, drivers, etc) will update you with the news.

The cuisine is outstanding. We eat like bosses.

To the left of the country is the Atlantic ocean, so we have a lot of seafood. We love to eat beans as well, in particular a specific dish called feijoada (the Portuguese-speaking community loves it).

Here's a picture:

Here's another boss dish called mufete:

I almost forgot to mention funge. The #1 dish in the country. Funge is like the Angolan people. It is enjoyable and adaptable. You can mix it with almost anything.

See that white thing in the middle? That's funge in action.

Those are just the tip of the iceberg.

We have tons of beaches. We chill like stars.

There's an Island on the south of the capital (Luanda) called Mussulo, where all the cool kids and adults go for holidays and epic parties, mostly in December. I've been there many times, it feels incredibly good to be there.

However, most of the magic happens in the Cape Island. That's where you find the top nightclubs. There's no better place to be on a Friday night.

Some pictures:

They call Luanda the 'African Miami'. Here's a link: Luanda, Angola - The 'African Miami' (pics) - Politics - Nigeria

This was just Luanda. Don't even get me started on the remaining 17 provinces.

Our music is amazing. We dance like pros.

The kids love Kuduro. The young love Kizomba. And the older ones love Semba. All of which originated in Angola.

In reality everyone loves those genres, regardless of the age. I've seen many people (including Angolans) overwhelmed by the way we dance.

In general, it was a lot of fun growing up in a such a mad country. The best moments I had were shared with my family, friends and strangers.

Nothing makes me happier than knowing that all those aspects about the country are still there. I consider myself very lucky to be one of them.

Commentary: Jay Frank, travel blogger Answered Jan 10, 2021

I would stick to Luanda, a city which you're more likely to live as a foreigner.

It is a beautiful city located on the country's coast. Luanda is fairly developed with a decent road network and a couple of decent hotels.

Luanda is super expensive that's not even an exaggeration, It has been that way for a couple of years now. So unless your paid well life might be pretty hard for you. T

The city has excellent beaches which are well kept with palm trees planted along its coast, Petty crimes are common so be careful.

Learn a bit of Portuguese it will help you a lot as there is hardly anyone that understands English there.

They say pictures speak louder than words. Here is a great video about Luanda city plus its nightlife.

I would strongly suggest to look at,

Related Links

What do you think about live in Angola?
What's life like in Angola?
Have you ever thought of visiting Angola?
Is Angola communist?
What is it like to be a white in Angola?
What is the dark side of Angola?

How is life in Mozambique?
Is Angola a good country?
What are the most dangerous countries, cities, or regions in Africa?
Why is Angola poor?
What is it like to live in Africa?
What are the top 5 most dangerous African countries?
Which is the most successful country in Africa?
What is the benefit of living in Africa?
What are the worst African countries to live in?

News Nigeria

Queen Nzinga of Ndongo (Angola) was a powerful monarch who successfully kept the Portuguese out of her land for 35 years.

Posted by Aniekpeno Ekong 2h

In order to fight off Portugal, (who wanted to conquer the area to further the slave trade) Nzinga conquered neighboring kingdoms to expand her territory. Nzinga led her warriors in battle until her sixties and defied numerous assassination attempts to die peacefully in her sleep at 81 in 1663.

Nzinga impact was so strong that she prevented the Portuguese from reaching deep into Southwest Africa until her death. Angola would finally be free of Portuguese control centuries later in 1975.

News Nigeria

Queen Nzinga Mbande was a ruthless and powerful 17th century African ruler of the Ndongo and Matamba Kingdoms (modern-day Angola).

Posted by Aniekpeno Ekong 2h

Nzinga fearlessly and cleverly fought for the freedom and stature of her kingdoms against the Portuguese, who were colonizing the area at the time.

Around the turn of the 17th century, the independent kingdoms and states of the Central African coast were threatened by Portuguese attempts to colonize Luanda. (Luanda, today the capital of Angola, was founded in 1576.) Portugal sought to colonize the region in order to control the trade in African slaves, and attacked many of their old trading partners to further this goal.

Unlike many other rulers at the time, Nzinga was able to adapt to these changing circumstances and fluctuations in power around her. By her own determination and refusal to give in to the Portuguese without a fight, she transformed her kingdom into a formidable commercial state on equal footing with the Portuguese colonies.

In 1617 the new governor of Luanda began an aggressive campaign against the kingdom of Ndongo. His troops invaded the capital and forced King Ngola Mbandi (Nzinga's brother) to flee from the area. Thousands of Ndongo people were taken prisoner.

The king sent his sister Nzinga Mbandi to negotiate a peace treaty in 1621, which she did successfully. But Portugal didn't honor the terms of the treaty, and King Ngola Mbandi committed suicide, leaving the kingdom to his sister Nzinga. (Other accounts claim Nzinga poisoned her brother, or murdered her brother's son the heir after Ngola committed suicide, in order to seize power.)

As the new sovereign of Ndongo, Nzinga re-entered negotiations with the Portuguese. At the time, Ndongo was under attack from both the Portuguese and neighboring African aggressors. Nzinga realized that in order to achieve peace and for her kingdom to remain viable, she needed to become an intermediary.

She allied Ndongo with Portugal, and was baptised as Ana de Sousa Nzinga Mbande with the Portuguese colonial governor serving as her godfather. By doing this she acquired a partner in her fight against her African enemies, and ending Portuguese slave raiding in the kingdom.

The new alliance didn't last very long, however. Portugal betrayed Ndongo in 1626, and Nzinga was forced to flee when war broke out. Nzinga took over as ruler of the nearby kingdom of Matamba, capturing Queen Mwongo Matamba and routing her army. Nzinga then made Matamba her capital, joining it to the Kingdom of Ndongo.

To build up her kingdom's martial power, Nzinga offered sanctuary to runaway slaves and Portuguese-trained African soldiers. She stirred up rebellion among the people still left in Ndongo, now ruled by the Portuguese. Nzinga also reached out to the Dutch and invited them to join troops with her. She told the Dutch she would be happy to ally with them because of their justice and politeness, whereas the Portuguese were proud and haughty.

Even their combined forces were not enough to drive the Portuguese out, however, and after retreating to Matamba again, Nzinga started to focus on developing Matamba as a trading power and the gateway to the Central African interior.

By the time of Nzinga's death in 1661 at the age of 81, Matamba was on equal footing with the Portuguese colony. The Portuguese came to respect Queen Nzinga for her shrewdness and intransigence.

With Nzinga’s rule, Matamba became a powerful kingdom that long resisted Portuguese colonisation attempts and was only integrated into Angola in the late nineteenth century.

Why are some Angolans ashamed of being African and consider themselves Portuguese first and look down on West Africans despite being fully (black) African themselves?

Zaza · Follow Sun

I am proud to be Angolan, first!! second i am African.
Angolans don't have the same hatred towards caucasian because the beginning of european history in Angola was not hateful.

Before, there was not Angola… only the Kongo Empire and its federal states. Kongo empired were been attacked by other canibal African . So portuguese help the with weapons. 2 federal states Ndongo and Matamba rebeled by and allied with other africans. Kongo king sold others as slaves.

While portuguese were expanding having other africans as friend , the friendship of Kongo and Portugal became enemies. Kongo lauched a war on Portuguese. Other african went to help the Portuguese. …ndongo and matamba united and created the Ngola Kingdom. etc etc etc even the Ndongo granted the Portuguese Land… the portuguese created the Benguela kingdom and Angola Kingdom colonialist and kongo went to war and kongo lost. Kongo people started a internal all out hateful war that dispersed all kongolese . Some went to Gabon, Congo republique , Cabinda and the elite stayed in today's Angola portugal Anexed old Kongo territory

Colonialists (Angola and Benguela) became enemies with N'gola

Dutch invaded Angola with their allies from Asia and Indonesia soldiers and N'dongo Help

Portugal asked Brazil to intervene in Angola

Brazilians (Their colonialists, slave worriors and Amazonians) and Canibal from imbangalas… reconquer Angola and released Portuguese captives.
Dutch company became prisoners and later released

Angolan colonialist later went to war with Ngola and won. Colonialist Anexed N'gola territory(Ndongo and Matamba) And anexed Renuited benguele kingdom into one unified Angolan front (50% of todays territory).

Colonialists and brazilians spread to east, reaching to lunda/tchokwe empire . The people there became allied with "Angolans" until civil war broke out inside lunda /tchokwe empire deviding west Lunda /tchokwe vs estern Lunda tchokwe (today Drc).

Angolans" anexed Lunda Tchokwe and sent 2 mixed race Pombeiros to travel to mozambique to study the terrain. They later came back and went back to zinbabwe to get their wives and children from zambia and Zimbabwe whom they left while going to a trip to mozambique.

The Portuguese stop their expansion because of the British conclusion black Angolan, Portuguese and Brazilians created today's Angolan territory.

Impossible to hate the Portuguese that much the way other Blacks hate caucasians. We became friends back in 1820. And when fight broke out in Angola for independence . This was also achieved with white Angola colonialists. Black and White Angolans fought for independence against the Portuguese political right wing party. Not a racial war. But Nation vs Nation.

Since the Portuguese sign the independence, there's no need to continue with hatred towards Portuguese. Follow Zaza

Related Links

As an Angolan, I noticed that the Angolan phenotype is different to other Africans. Is it because of Portuguese colonisation that happened in Angola for centuries?

Why are black Africans so angry?

Why do North African countries not consider themselves as Africans but as Arabs?

Why are black people called African? I don’t like the term. I am not from Africa. I like to be called black.

Why is there such a huge disconnect with Africans from Africa with African American blacks?

Why do black Americans look different from Africans?

How do Native Africans feel about "black" Americans? Why does it seem like there's dislike between both, especially with West Africans?

Why do some black people outside Africa not see themselves as from African origin?

Why did the Portuguese marry/have kids with African slave women?

Why do white South Africans lie and say the Khoi and San people are not black Africans?

What is it like to be an Afro-Russian in Africa?

Boris Ezomo · Follow Africa is hot but I love it here. 3y

“What is it like to be an Afro-Russian in Africa?”

Thanks for asking. I can not answer for Africa as a whole. In Angola we have an Afro Russian who until recently was the richest woman in Africa. The ex presidents daughter.

Isabel dos Santos I am sure she lives a very nice life.

I will restrict my observations to Nigeria alone.

We the Afro Russians along with our Russian parents constitute a small tight knit community. We even have a variation of Russian we speak amongst ourselves. Let's call it “Niger- anglo Russian” For starters “вы” the formal “you” had long disappeared and everyone is on “ты” the informal “you”. That is expected in an community where you know each other. Very embarrassing when you travel back to Russia. In this language, we take nigerian words that have no Russian equivalent and make them Russian with suffixes and adjectives. Same goes for English words. So it is more like pidgin Russian. It's fun:)

The Afro Russian is a very recent arrival among the mixed race Nigerians. It was as a result Nigerian students travelling to the USSR to study for the first time in the 60s. While England had the monopoly of mixed race Nigerians for a century at least.

I happened to be the second oldest Afro Russian. The oldest, Abiodun is a year older than me. However had not spoken with him in ages so have no idea if he is still in Nigeria.

This community is actually the result of the USSR. Rodina was an Soviet expatriate organization for women. Well supported by the USSR. It kept the women together and even had scholarships for their children to study in the USSR. I however studied in the PR Bulgaria. My brother studied back in the USSR. We had monthly parties, lessons in the Russian language for children that did not speak it. When the USSR collapsed, all the Soviet women took the Russian citizenship and their children along with them.

We are a product of both cultures. I make a pretty good Russian cook. Can even go round things that are hard to find in Africa. We have no dill in Nigeria. It does not grow here. I pickle my cucumbers using African basil. Not bad at all and does resemble “malosolny” cucumbers.

At the same time can be very traditional if need be. I was initiated into the tribal warrior age group class when I came of age. Doing every task that was required of me.

We are very much accepted by Nigerians. Occasionally do have to remind people we are not foreigners. The reason is culture. The children of a man in Africa, belong to the man's tribe. The woman's tribe is not important. So in the eyes of the tribes, we are hundred per cent theirs. This is very important especially with inheritance.

We are all highly educated and well placed. No it is not because a mixture of a Russian and Nigerian produces smart people. It is because all our parents are engineers, doctors, lecturers and teachers. So our education was well managed.

Jane, an Afro Russian doctor, got married last year. Poor groom, like 10 “brothers” he never knew she had, came to eye him down. I think I intimidated him the most. I was the eldest and a senior professional colleague for that matter.

We have another girl who had remained here because she inherited her father's wealth. While the mother is back home in St. Petersburg. Keeps flying there and back every three months.

Here is one of us you may know. Granted he is now based in the UK. But I remember him at the Rodina parties.

Peter Odemwingie

So we come in all shapes and sizes. One thing remains common to us all. We all have two homes. One in Africa and the other in Europe.

We get the best of both worlds.

Edit: Once again. Thanks Vova for asking this interesting question. I would clarify certain points.

On how children of an European man (not necessary Russian) and Nigeria woman are seen.

There are no Russian men married to Nigerian girls in Nigeria. I know of two girls that finished in the USSR in the late 70s that married Soviet men. Like it is expected of them, They stayed at their husband's homes (countries) One is living in Tashkent and the other somewhere near Moscow. Their children's ties to Nigeria are long gone.

This is the general African tradition. Few exceptions like the Ashanti of Ghana.

Woman marries a man. Not only does she take the name but becomes a member of his tribe. My mother is the senior “ehayo” of my clan. That is a woman married into the family. Her been White or Russian makes no difference. Anything happening in the family, she is the first woman to be informed. At the same time. My aunties are not seen as members of our clan any more. But are still family.

The other thing is that inheritance is along the male line only. So woman and her children get nothing from her father.

My cousin is married to an Italian. She and her children are family but do not belong to the tribe. They are Italians. When my Uncle passes away, only his sons inherit his assets. Daughters get only money.

Ironically Obama by African tradition is not American.

Gen. Rankings the former president of Ghana. Whose father was British, would be seen as English by his mother's people.

On Rodina. If not mistaken, it was a world wide organization. Because I remember ours been called the Nigerian branch. It had a lot of dealings with the cultural sector of the Soviet embassy. They provided books, projectors and movie reels. All the good stuff for that matter. Movies like “Moscow does not believe in tears” “The cranes are flying” and “The white Sun of the dersert” Remember this was before dvds and downloads.

The organisation was to help out each other and act as a link to the Soviet embassy. Who on more than one occasion, secretly moved a woman and her kids back to the USSR when she wanted to return. Even before the husband even knew they were gone.

At that time, Aeroflot flew to Nigeria. All Soviet citizens normally got half price tickets. Rodina members got theirs for a quarter. Half that price again for their children under The age of 14.

The embassy always held two scholarships for children of Rodina members. If there are none ready to go, they are added to the Nigerian list.

Monthly party at any of our houses. Everyone brings something and we all had fun. Occasionally when one of the women visits the embassy. They are given foods from home which are shared at the party. Kvas concentrate, Salamis, Buckwheat are things you can not find here.

To be honest, the Soviets really cared for their citizens abroad.

On the "pidgin" Russian. It is not a planned language. It happened the same way pidgin English happened. Pidgin English would not be understood by a Briton, but would be understood by the whole English speaking west Africa.

Words strayed in between languages. So did grammar.

In Nigeria we speak two forms of English. The proper English and the pidgin English. The pidgin English is the informal form. A friend would wonder why you are speaking proper English to him. Had he offended you somehow that you are been formal with him?

So a Russian in Nigeria speaks proper English officially. Pidgin English unofficially. Russian among themselves. In time they are mixed in an understandable way. Somehow making the language easier in terms of everyday Nigerian living.

Long or complex Russian words transformed to English or pidgin English.

None Russian words with Russian plural.

Or simply have a conversation and realize that you all had not been sticking to one language.

The Russian embassy does have a sense of humour. My mother was speaking to them for a full five minutes until one of them said in English. "Vera Alexeevna, it may shock you, but the embassy of the Russian Federation are known to occasionally speak Russian."

Related Answer

Are there African-Russians living in Russia? How do they integrate? Do they encounter racism?

Ignat Solovey, Former journalist from Moscow, Russia Answered Mar 26, 2017

There are some, but really little. Maybe several dozen and those are international families, where, usually, father is African (mostly Congolese, Nigerian, Angolan, Kenyan or Senegalese), Brazilian or Cuban, and mother is local (Russian, Ukrainian, Tatar… whatever). For my whole life I encountered maybe six or seven mixed families like this, although you can see dozens of Africans in several cities (Moscow, St.Petersburg, Krasnodar, Voronezh, Rostov-na-Donu, Tambov) — they are students mostly, or diplomatic employees, or sometimes (but very seldom) even tourists. African students pick some odd jobs like handing out ads or working as walking ad, or delivery. I've seen one locally born guy who is fitness instructor. There are also:

quite popular TV star, actress and journalist Yelena Khanga, who is partially African, partially African-American and partially Polish Jew; popular blogger Samson Sholademi (half-Russian, half-Nigerian)

Mudio Mukutu Pierre Narcisse De Napoli De Suza (known as Pierre Narcisse, or "Chocolate Bunny" by his most popular song) — Russian actor and pop singer of Cameroonian origin

Grigory Siyatvinda, Siberian-born half-Zambian, the only professional theater actor in Russia of African origin.

Anton Zaytsev, TV anchor (half-Sudanese, the only publicly known Afro-Russian with Russian both first and family names)

A number of football and basketball players who play for various Russian sport clubs and/or study in Russia.

There are several Afrobeat (Marksheider's Kunst, Simba Vibration are the oldest) and Cuban bands in Moscow.

Racism towards Africans is highly uncommon, and, as it's already said by other commenters, it mostly mimics British and American "white supremacy" circles and currently such groups don't survive for long… Russian society, while becoming increasingly homophobic, is racially tolerant, at least towards Africans.

I asked some Africans who live and work here for a long time, as well four or five Afro-Russians about racism, including kids. They denied any racial problems quite firmly. Actually, any hostility towards Africans in Russia would be weird, because, if not for any other reasons, Abram Gannibal ("Peter the Great's Arap") was Ethiopian servant of Peter the First, and later notable official and military figure, as was his son Ivan, and great-grandfather to Russian national poet Alexander Pushkin.

There is a list of Afro-Russians on Wikipedia, but it is far from being complete, especially in English version.

Also, when I was a kid, I often saw Ermengeld Konovalov (Коновалов Эрменгельд Николаевич) who lived in the next house… but I usually saw him boozing up with local drunks or sleeping on a bench after that. I thought then (after overhearing some adult talks) that he had trouble with being invited to play in movies or theater, but actually it was not true, he had engagements till the very death.

Actually, most Afro-Russians (as well as Afro-Ukrainians, Afro-Belarusians, etc.), get work in media because of exotic looks and innate talents (many people say that international and interracial kids are smarter… and that is not untrue), as well as in sports, and become popular. So one Afro-Russian you rarely see here is “just another guy/girl at mundane job”.

COUNTRY FACT FILE

Location

In SW Africa on the Atlantic coast.

Official title of the state

The Republic of Angola (English)

Republica de Angola (Portuguese)

Flag description

Two equal horizontal bands of red (top) and black with a centered yellow emblem consisting of a five-pointed star within half a cogwheel crossed by a machete (in the style of a hammer and sickle): red represents liberty, black the African continent, the symbols characterize workers and peasants.

Neighbours

Namibia on S. Zambia on E. and the Congo on N. Cabinda (Angola) an enclave separated from rest of country. Short Atlantic coast of the Congo borders also Congo republic. Land boundaries: total 5198 km. Border Countries, The Congo 2,511 km (225 km is the boundary of discontinuous Cabinda region), Congo 201 km, and Namibia 1,376 km, Zambia 1,110 Km.

Founder of The Nation
Antonio Agostino Neto

Local divisions

18 provinces (provincias) with capital, Luanda.

Government type

Republic – presidential

Legislation chamber

Unicameral - National Assembly

Form of State

Republic - Presidential
Head of State is the President A unitary multi-party republic with one legislative house. The National Assembly (Assembleia Nacional Angola), 220 seats, members elected by proportional party vote to serve four-year term.

Executive branch

President, Prime Minister, Unicameral National Assembly (Assembleia Nacional Angola) held legislative elections on September 5, 2008, Angola's first since 1992. The President is both the chief of State and head of government. President elected by popular vote to serve for four-year terms without presidential term limits.

Former Rulers

1975–1979 Dr. António Agostinho Neto

1979- José Eduardo Dos Santos

Judicial chamber

Supreme court and separate provincial courts.

Capital city

Luanda Altitude 6 mtrs/20 ft.

Geographic coordinates -8.50S. , 13.14E.

The capital city of Angola. A seaport on the Atlantic coast of West Africa at the mouth of the Cuanza River. Founded first as Shipping-lane for "Sao Paulo de Loanda", a Portuguese explorer known namely as" Paulo Dias de Novais", in January, 1575. It became a major centre for the trans-shipment of slaves to Brazil during the seventeenth and eighteenth century.

Names of main towns

Huambo, Benguela, Lobito, Lubango, Namibe.

Date of independence

11th of November, 1975.

Religions (Major)

Catholic & Evangelic.

Main spoken languages
Portuguese (official), various ethnic languages spoken.

Currency unit

Novo Kwanzas (AOA) =100 Lwei.

Area in km2

1, 246.700.00 Km2.

Country area comparison in Africa

7 out of 55 states.

Demographic terms:

Average annual population growth rate 2.063 %

Birth rate 43.33 berths per 1,000 population

Death rate 23.74 deaths per 1,000 population

Average life expectancy: 38.48 years

Male 37.48 years: Female 39.52 years:

Illiteracy rate (%):

Male: 17 Female: 43

Average per capita income

USD 8, 200

Population density:

15.2/km2

Urban population (%)

59

Contributer groups (%):

Farming, Fishing: 85, Indudtry: 5, Social service: 25 Main

Export Items

Off-shore Crude-oil and derivatives, Coffee, Diamond, Sisal, Iron-ore, Timber, Cotton, Palm-kernels.

Economy is based on

Extractive industry of petrol-gas.

Climate

Tropical and moderate in areas of bigger altitude.

Extremes:

Lowest point: The Atlantic coast: 0 mtr.

Highest point: Moro de Moco 2,620 meters.

Weather of the Capital city (Luanda) average annual temperature 24.9 o C.

Altitude 12 meters

Hottest Month March 24-31oC.

Coldest Month August 17-23oC.

Driest Month June 0 mm average Rf.

Wettest Month March 36 mm Average Rf.

Measures

Metric System.

Time zone

1 hour ahead of GMT/UTC

Public holidays

January 1, February 4, May 1 (labor day), September 17, November 11, December 10 & 25, March 1.

Ethnic groups

Ovimbundu 38%, Kimbundu 23%, Bakongo 13%, Europeans 1%, Mestisos 2%.

Topography & Environmental concern
Most of Angola consists of a plateau elevated 3,000 to 5,000 ft above sea level, rising from a narrow coastal strip. There is also a temperate highland area in the west central region a desert in the S. and tropical rainforest cover Cabinda. Environment: overuse of pastures and subsequent soil erosion attributable to population pressures: desertification: deforestation of tropical rain forest.

Economy Overview

Industry

Cement, basic metal-products, fish processing, food processing breweries, tobacco products, sugar, paper, palm oil, textiles, leather footwear, ship repair.

Chief crops

Agro-products: coffee, banana, sugarcane, sisal, corn, cotton, manioc, tobacco, vegetables, forest products.

Natural resources

Iron ore, Diamonds (over2 million carats a year), copper, Feldspar, Gold, Bauxite, Uranium, manganese, phosphates and Petroleum crude.

Land in use (%)

Arable land: 3

Grassland: 23

Forest wood: 42

Other: 33

Marine:

Coastline: 1,600 km.

Commercial Sea ports:-

Luanda, Namibe, Lobito.

Development prospect:

In April 2012, Angola will be celebrating its first full decade of peace. This comes after more than 30 years of conflict when the battle against Portuguese colonial rule descended into prolonged and bloody civil war fuelled by proxy Cold War allegiances. The country is now firmly back on the map and is one of the continent's leading economies after South Africa, Egypt and Nigeria, even if the extraordinary boom of the immediate post - war years has evaporated for the time being. Growth has leveled off after oil prices fell back in 2009 and then output slipped as a result of production difficulties. The economy flat lined in 2009 owing to the fall in the price of oil – the source of 95 per cent of foreign exchange, 72 per cent of government revenue and 50 per cent of GDP – and in 2010 growth was less than 3.5 per cent, with a forecast for 2011 of a modest 3.7 per cent. In 2012, the government has hopes of a return to double-digit territory but other authorities are more cautious. The slower growth of 2011 underlines just how vulnerable Angola's economy is to oil shocks. Production problems saw a fall in oil output during 2011 from a projected 1.7m barrels of oil per day (bpd) to around 1.5m. There was also a delay in paying off construction arrears to overseas companies that had been run up to the tune of $9bn during 2009, when the low oil price plunged Angola into a liquidity crisis. Crude production should pick up again in 2012 thanks to new fields coming on stream and some positive exploration results. The country is also due to start exporting liquefied natural gas (LNG) from a new $9bn plant in Soyo. Outside the oil sector, construction and banking are still flourishing, despite the difficulties in doing business and concerns over corruption. Significant investment is still going into manufacturing and agriculture, with supply-chain costs coming down to make locally produced items more competitive with imports. But energy supplies remain a major challenge, with most households and businesses still mostly reliant on diesel generators, significantly pushing up operating costs. Credit lines from China (around $15bn to date but with more possibly on the way) and Brazil ($3.2bn) have bankrolled construction projects, including the overhaul of the country's road networks and big improvements in infrastructure development. Several regional airports have benefited from upgrades and now receive international flights, and work has begun on a new international and domestic terminal in Luanda. The restoration of railways continues: the 424km Luanda-Malange line is now mostly operational: there are functioning sections of the 1,332km Benguela line: and work is continuing on the southern line between Namibe and Lubango. Aside from oil, Angola's other big export is diamonds, and although several mines were mothballed and companies pulled out due to the economic crisis, there are signs things are picking up again with several new investments due to come on stream. A new mining law should give more international companies, especially from South Africa, confidence to enter the market, and exploration has also begun for iron, gold, manganese and copper. Cotton and textile industries are also being revived, and investments in agriculture are finally starting to pay off with more domestically-grown food items making it into the shops. Agri-businesses, such as fruit canning and breakfast-cereal production, are growing in number and profitability. Angola's more positive recent economic trends include its moves towards economic diversification, its engagement with the IMF through a standby arrangement of $1.4bn (mostly disbursed by 2011) resulting in more transparency within the government financial system, and its new laws to promote macroeconomic stability. Inflation has been brought down from dizzy heights to around 10 percent in 2011. Socially, the country has rather less to be proud of. Angola was ranked 146 out of 169 countries on the 2010 UNDP Human Development Index.

Did South Africa lose to Angola?

Claudio Oliveira

Yes they politically lost, but won most military operations against the Cubans and Angolans, South Africa military was very impressive for an African country. SADF trained UNITA and FNLA combatants while simultaneously fighting against the communists. And do not forget that during the Cold War, South Africa was the only African country to have a nuclear bomb in the African continent.

Did Cuba make the right decision to send their soldiers to Angola to fight against apartheid South Africa?

Nigel Vos

.

Follow Works at Architect and Project Manager4y

Originally Answered: Did cuba make the right decison to send their soldiers in angola to fight against apartied south Africa?

Did cuba(sic) make the right decison (sic) to send their soldiers in (sic) angola(sic) to fight against apartied(sic) south(sic) Africa?

The premise of the question is incorrect.

The Soviet Union used Cuba as a surrogate throughout the world to attempt to destabilise democratic or any other nations with the sole goal of installing Soviet style Socialism and Communism under the control of the USSR.

Apartheid gave the Soviets and the Cubans a convenient excuse and tool to be able to pretend that they cared about the fate of black Africans.

The goal was the control of the Cape sea route and the potential denial of it to the USA and western democracies and to get their hands on rich natural resources.

Those wishing to challenge this answer should ask themselves why Cuba and the USSR denied their own citizens those same rights that they were supposedly fighting for in Africa.

Related Links

Can one proclaim that the South African Apartheid War in Angola was South Africa's "Vietnam War"?

Why did South Africa act cowardly during the South African Border War (1966-90) and not launch an awe-inspiring conquest of Angola as a way to prevent Cuba from colonizing it or South-West Africa?

Why was Cuba involved in the war of Angola vs South Africa?

When Cuban soldiers went off to war in Angola to fight the South Africans, did Cuban schoolchildren write letters wishing those troops success in the war, hoping that a Cuba victory would be a total victory over racism in South Africa?

How did African countries help in ending apartheid in South Africa?

Do people in South Africa regret that the Apartheid regime was overthrown?

What is the conflict of the Angolan War (South Africa)?

What happened to Cuban soldiers who were taken prisoners by South African forces in Angola?

What if South Africa and Angola went to war again?

How did the relationship between your country and South Africa look like?

Did Cuban soldiers ever meet Portuguese or South African soldiers in colonial wars in Africa?

Julio Cesar Pino

Ph.D from University of California, Los Angeles 5y

Here's an even stranger fact: Cubans fought Cubans in Africa! Fidel Castro dispatched a small squad of Cuban soldiers to prop up the regime of Patrice Lumumba, Prime Minister of the Congo, in 1961. (This was not the guerrilla foco set up by Che Guevara. That came AFTER Lumumba's downfall.) Lumumba was threatened by a secessionist movement in Katanga province spurred by the former colonial master, Belgium, using Belgian paratroopers. The United States claimed to "respect the sovereignty of the Congo" while in fact working to oust Lumumba. To that end the CIA dispatched some of its "Cuban exile assets" to fight against Castro's troops. The two Cuban factions fought at least one battle, in what was then lake Stanley Pool. Yes, sea-borne Cubans on both sides! This encounter proved indecisive, and while Castro withdrew his soldiers the CIA employed Congolese "assets" to kill Lumumba.

Guillermo Roman Velasco

.

Follow

Lived in Guatemala5y

Yes in 1971 or 1972 Jorge pereira jardim and Carlos Chaves help 3 Cubans to reach Portugal and later the United states and claim asylum and after 1974 some Portuguese soldiers become mercenaries for the FNLA in Angola(FNLA National Front for the Liberation of Angola) and FLEC(front for the liberation of the enclave of cabinda) in FLEC the Portuguese mercenaries received money from France to fouhght against MPLA and many Cubans) or join to South African troops in South West Africa (Namibia)

FNLA Portuguese mercenaries after a battle with MPLA and Cubans .The FNLA lose the battle

FLEC soldier with Portuguese mercenary Guarding the Road from Cubans MPLA and FLNC(Front for Congolese national liberation)FLNC soldiers

South Africans fought gainst MPLA,Cubans and SWAPO in Namibia and southern Angola

Cuban with 4 captured South African soldiers

Cubans and Angolans before a battle with South African border troops in Namibia

Cubans,Angolans and SWAPO soldiers in south Angola

Soviets, Cubans and Angolans in Cuito

Cuban soldiers and a Soviet Officer in Jamba Angola

Related Links

Did Soviet soldiers ever meet Portuguese soldiers during the Portuguese colonial wars in Africa?

What was the Angolan war like for a Cuban soldier?

Did Portuguese soldiers ever meet Japanese soldiers during WWII?

Did Cuban soldiers ever meet Belgian soldiers during the Congo wars in Africa?

What do you think about South African soldiers?

When Cuban soldiers went off to war in Angola to fight the South Africans, did Cuban schoolchildren write letters wishing those troops success in the war, hoping that a Cuba victory would be a total victory over racism in South Africa?

What injection was given to all Portuguese soldiers prior to embarking to the Colonial War (1961 - 1974)? Was it a vaccine?

Can one proclaim that the South African Apartheid War in Angola was South Africa's "Vietnam War"?

