Why was Cuba involved in the war of Angola vs South Africa?

Is it true that the first Angolan and Cuban brigades that entered the Battle of Cuito Cuanavale disappeared?

Angolan journalists continue to face criminal insult and defamation proceedings.

Angolan journalists Fernando Caetano (L, photo by Eliseu José), Escrivão José (C, photo by the journalist), and Óscar Constantino (R, photo by the journalist) are facing criminal defamation and insult cases in Angola.

New York, June 30, 2022 – Angolan authorities should drop criminal defamation and insult investigations into journalists Escrivão José, Óscar Constantino, and Fernando Caetano and ensure that investigative journalism is not criminalized, the Committee to Protect Journalists said Thursday.

The three journalists each told CPJ that they are facing ongoing legal processes over criminal defamation and insult complaints about their work.

“The spate of spurious criminal defamation cases against journalists in Angola shows that politicians and powerful figures are allergic to public scrutiny and are taking advantage of colonial-era laws to criminalize journalism,” said Angela Quintal, CPJ’s Africa program coordinator, in Johannesburg, South Africa. “Prosecutors must stop pandering to elites who want to keep citizens in the dark and should refuse to entertain such cases in line with a 2010 resolution by the African Commission on Human and Peoples' Rights urging African Union members states to abolish criminal defamation and insult laws."

Convictions for criminal defamation carry prison terms of up to 1.5 years and a fine set by a judge; insult convictions carry one year and a fine, according to the penal code and Nelson Custódio, a local lawyer who represents both Caetano and Constantino, and who spoke to CPJ via messaging app. CPJ has recently reported on several other criminal defamation cases against journalists in Angola.

On June 6, investigators with the police criminal investigation service in the capital, Luanda, sent a summons to José, editor of the privately owned newspaper Hora H, and on June 13 they questioned him in relation to defamation and insult complaints filed by Bento Bento, the ruling People's Movement for the Liberation of Angola (MPLA) first secretary in the capital, according to news reports and the journalist, who spoke to CPJ via messaging app.

Bento's complaints stemmed from a March 29 report by Hora H's affiliated online video outlet, in which José covered corruption allegations involving a land deal by Bento, José told CPJ. Authorities released José after classifying him as "arguido," or a formal suspect in criminal proceedings, a necessary step to possibly being charged with a crime or arrested.

José told CPJ that Hora H had sought Bento's comment more than a month before publishing their story.

"Instead of any reply to our questions, Bento chose to intimidate journalists by using his political weight to sue us," José said, adding that this was the 24th criminal defamation suit he had faced over his work. He said most of those cases were unresolved, and some had closed without a formal prosecution.

CPJ called Bento and contacted him via messaging app for comment but he did not answer.

Separately, on June 20, a judge in the province of Kwanza Sul held a hearing in criminal defamation and insult cases against Constantino, a reporter for the Catholic Church-owned broadcaster Radio Ecclésia, according to news reports and Constantino, who spoke to CPJ via messaging app.

That case stemmed from complaints filed by Morais António, the former president of the provincial electoral commission, over a 2020 report by the journalist about António's resignation amid an alleged sex scandal, according to those sources.

Constantino has been classified as arguido in that case since 2021, he told CPJ.

He said his court appearance in the case is scheduled for July 6, when he expects to learn whether he has been convicted. The public prosecutor had asked for the charges against Constantino to be dropped because of a lack of evidence, according to news reports and Custódio.

António told CPJ by phone that he believed Constantino "went beyond the facts in his reporting" and accused the journalist of failing to publish his reply to the allegations. Constantino told CPJ he stood by the reporting, which he said was based on António's resignation letter.

António also filed separate criminal defamation and insult complaints against Caetano, a correspondent for the U.S. Congress-funded broadcaster Voice of America and the news website Club K in Kwanza Sul province, over a December 2017 report by Club K about alleged corruption in the management of the provincial electoral commission, the journalist told CPJ by phone. Caetano said he was notified of his status as arguido in the case in November 2021.

That 2017 report was published under someone else's byline, and featured a photograph that was later reused in an unrelated report written by Caetano in December 2019, Caetano told CPJ. He said he was not the author of the 2017 report and had "no say" in the photo in the 2019 article, adding, "This is a good example of how easily journalists can get sued in Angola for next to no reason."

António told CPJ that Caetano must prove that he was not the author of the 2017 report, as the photograph was the same and Caetano was the only Club K reporter in the province.

"If it is not him so who is it?" António said, noting that the 2017 article alleged that he had embezzled money.

Caetano had his first court hearing in that case in March, according to Custódio. The case was adjourned and a date for the next hearing had not been set by June 29, Custódio said.

Kwanza Sul public prosecutor Mário Sacuiema told CPJ in a phone interview that he could not comment on Constantino or Caetano's cases, and confirmed that a date for Caetano's next court hearing had not been set.

The streets of Luanda, Angola.

Yussif Issah Oyen

OTC Drugs Seller at Pharmaceuticals (2013–present)Jun 20

What binds Angola to Brazil?

Jerome Cohen

.
Follow
Feru, bitten and had-you-believed Translator · 11 jul.
Claudio Oliveira

Culture and traditions, religion, Angola and Brazil have both been historical colonies of Portugal.

There is a long history of black Brazilians descending from Angolan slaves, the two countries influence each other culturally.

Brazil was the first country to recognize Angola's independence as a country.

The two countries maintain close diplomatic relations and they share the same language.

EN100/Sumbe/Benfica
Samba
H Hospital
Josina Machel
Cidade Alta

BCI

BENIN

National Flag and Emblem

Locator Map

TEXT HIGHLIGHTS: Diaries updates, key events, brief analysis and relating news articles in timeline.

Overview

In 1472 the Portuguese were the first Europeans to visit the country. The hinterland was developed as a source of slaves. By 1700, some 20,000 slaves were being exported annually. After long resisting attempts at colonization, the south became a French protectorate in 1893 while the north was added incrementally between 1895 and 1898. In 1904, present day Benin, then known as Dahomey, became part of the French West African Federation. Dahomey played a key role in the administration of the region, providing educated staff to other parts of the French African empire. It became independent on 1 August 1960. After independence, civilian government did not survive for long. A power struggle developed between the three traditional centres of authority - Abomey in the south-west, Porto Novo in the south-east and Bariba in the north-east. The early years of independence were marked by a series of military coups between 1963 and 1970. A short-lived experiment from 1970 to 1972 with a rotating civilian Presidency, each President representing the three traditional power centres, was cut short in October 1972 when the military, led by Major Mathieu Kerekou, took over again. The triumvirate were jailed and later exiled. Major Kerekou immediately declared Dahomey a Marxist-Leninist state. The country was renamed the Peoples Republic of Benin. Banks and other institutions were nationalized, and a single ruling party, the Parti de la Revolution Populaire du Benin, (PRPB) was established. Thus began 17 years of one-party rule and military dictatorship.

In 1892 France annexed the country and incorporated it into French West Africa.

Benin was granted independence on August 1, 1960.

Headship since independence: Head of State

Mr. Coutoucou Hubert Maga elected as first premier in 1959, when Dahomey gained it's independence from France on 11th August, 1960 Mr. Hubert Maga was elected as founder-president and was officially inaugurated to office on the 11th of December, 1960. Mr. Hubert Coutoucou Maga was forced to resign as president when public riots became so serious in Benin.

The chief of staff of the Armed Forces in the name of General Christophe Soglo, to control of the country in October, 1963 to prevent a civil war.

Founder President Hubert Coutoucou Maga passed away on the 8th of May, 2000 at age of 76.

A Republic in West Africa.

The present day Benin was the site of Dahomey, a prominent west African kingdom that rose in the fifteenth century, the Abomey kingdom established in 1625, in the early 19th century a powerful kingdom famed for its women warriors was formed. In 1857 the French who had been in the area, re-established a colonial rule started in 1872 and Dahomey (now Benin) became fully a French protectorate in 1894, incorporated into the federation of French west Africa in 1904. Formerly known as Dahomey, became an independent state when Mr. Coutoucou Hubert Maga elected as first premier in 1959, when Dahomey gained it's independence from France on 11th August, 1960 Mr. Hubert Maga was elected as founder-president and was officially inaugurated to office on the 11th of December, 1960. Mr. Hubert Coutoucou Maga was forced to resign as president when public riots became so serious in Benin, so that the chief of staff of the Army in the name of General Christophe Soglo, to control of the country in October, 1963 to prevent a civil war Mr. Hubert Maga is to be passed away on the 8th of May, 2000 at age of 76.

A succession of military governments ended in 1972 with a rise to power of Colonel Mathew Kerekou, and Dahomey to be renamed "Benin" in 1975 with the establishment of socialist doctrine, free elections were ushered in the 1990s, Mr. Nicephore Soglo an intellectual elected as president of Benin when ex-president Mathew Kerekou was the first sub-Sahara African leader to concede election defeat, and to handover power when he lost, and was to return to power by winning elections held in the 4th of April, 1996 and 2001, stepped down at the end of his second term in 2006 and was replaced by Dr. Thomas Yayi Boni, a former development banker, and political outsider with an independent minded personality. The current president Dr. Thomas Yayi Boni is seeking a second term, with his main opposition challengers, as the Benin constitutional court has been approved another one-week delay in the presidential election, to the 13th March, 2011.

In political development, Benin is widely and internationally feted as a functioning multi-party democracy. In 1991 Mathieu Kerekou became the first African president to step down after an electoral defeat . (He returned to power in 1996 and served another term). Mathew Kerekou is widely praised for making no effort to change the constitution so that he could remain in office or run again.

Though the economy remains underdeveloped, Benin’s embrace of democracy since the 1990s has seen a large injection of external investment from public and private sources. Benin remains dependent on foreign electricity, mainly from Ghana.

Benin suffers from unemployment, malnourishment and similar social problems of underdevelopment. The age structure of the population is heavily skewed, with almost half of the total being 15 years and below.

Recognized major Conflicts

Period of ethnic instability

When: Between independence and 1972

Who: Hubert Maga, Justin Ahomadegbe and Sorou Apithy.

Why: Power struggle between the three ethnic chieftains

Outcome: Mathieu Kerekou's military takeover in 1972

Struggle for political pluralism

When: 1989 to 1991

Who: Multi-party campaigners and opponents of the regime teamed up. In 1989 detachments of the army also rioted over non-payment of salaries.

Why: The reformists wanted an end to one-party rule and convening of multi-party elections.

Outcome: Kerekou organized a National Conference where multi -partyism was legalized and elections held in 1991.

Noted border disputes

When: 2007

Who: Benin and Burkinafaso

Why: Dispute over three villages on their common border

Outcome: Ecowas intervened to resolve the dispute. (In 2005, Nigeria ceded 13 villages to Benin along their common border).

Side note: Benin has gone through one of the most hard line Marxist regimes to one of the continent's most progressive multi -party democracies. The Abomey Historical Museum located in the city of Abomey. It is a Unesco World Heritage site.

Accession to power of president Dr. Thomas Boni Yayi - 8th April, 2006 by election.

Tentative election calendar - Presidential/Parliamentary, March/April.

Benin – Timeline Diaries updates, and related key notes:

1946 - Dahomey becomes an overseas territory of France.

1958 - Dahomey becomes self-governing, within the French Community.

1960 - Dahomey gains independence and is admitted to the UN.

1960 - Elections won by the Parti Dahomeen de L'Unite. Party leader Hubert Coutoucou Maga becomes country's first president.

1963 - President Hubert Maga is deposed in a coup led by the army's Chief of Staff, Colonel Christophe Soglo. Army chief Christophe Soglo led a coup not long after independence. He deposed another leader a few years later

1963 - Dahomey joins the IMF.

1964 - Sourou-Migan Apithy is elected president.

1965 - General Soglo forces the president to step down and a provisional government is formed. In December he assumes power.

1967 - Major Maurice Kouandete leads a coup. Lt Col Alphonse Alley replaces General Soglo as head of state.

1968 - The military regime nominates Dr Emile-Derlin Zinsou as president.

1969 – Lt. Colonel Kouandete deposes President Derlin Zinsou.

1970 - Presidential elections are held but abandoned. Power is ceded to a presidential council consisting of Ahomadegbe, Apithy and Hubert Maga, who received almost equal support in the abandoned poll. Hubert Maga is the first of the three to serve as president with a two-year term.

1972 - Ahomadegbe assumes the presidency from Hubert Maga for the next two-year term.

1972 – Colonel Mathieu Kerekou seizes power: the presidential council members are detained. Colonel Mathieu Kerekou was the country's leader until 1991.

1973 - The Conseil National Revolutionnaire (CNR) is created. Representatives are taken from across the country.

1975 - November - Dahomey is renamed the People's Republic of Benin.

1975 - The Parti de la Revolution Populaire du Benin (PRPB) is established as the country's only political party.

1977 - The CNR adopts a "Loi Fondamentale", setting out new government structures.

1979 - Elections are held to the new Assemblee Nationale Revolutionnaire (ANR). The list of people's commissioners is resoundingly approved. The Comite Executif National (CEN) replaces the CNR.

1980 - ANR unanimously elects Matheiu Kerekou as chairman. Kerekou is the party’s sole contender.

1981 - Members of the former presidential council are released from house arrest.

1984 - ANR increases the terms of the president and people's commissioners from three to five years. The number of people's commissioners is reduced from 336 to 196.

1984 - ANR re-elects Kerekou: no other candidates contest the election.

1987 - Kerekou resigns from the military.

1988 - Two unsuccessful coup attempts.

1989 - Elections are held: a list of 206 people's commissioners is approved. Benin agrees to IMF and World Bank economic adjustment measures.

1989 - President Kerekou re-elected for a third term. Marxism-Leninism is abandoned as Benin's official ideology. Anti-government strikes and demonstrations take place.

1990 - Unrest continues. President Kerekou meets dissident leaders. Agreement on constitutional reform and multi-candidate presidential elections is reached.

March, 1990 - Implementation of agreed reforms begins. Benin drops "people's" from its official title and becomes the Republic of Benin.

December, 1990 - In a referendum, the constitutional changes are approved by a majority of voters.

February, 1991 - Legislative elections: No party secures an overall majority. The largest grouping is an alliance of pro-Soglo parties.

March 1991 - President Kerekou is beaten by Nicephore Soglo in the first multi-candidate presidential elections. Kerekou is granted immunity from prosecution over actions taken since October 1972.

In 1992 - The Parti de la Renaissance du Benin is formed by Soglo's wife.

In 1995 - Legislative elections: Parti de la Renaissance du Benin forms the new government.

In 1996 - Voters returned him to power. Following accusations of irregularities in presidential elections, the constitutional court announces that Kerekou has received the majority of valid votes cast.

In 1999 - Legislative elections: New government is formed of representatives of 10 parties.

March, 2001 - Presidential elections: none of 17 candidates receives an overall majority. Mathieu Kerekou is declared re-elected in second round.

In 2002 - Benin joins the Community of Sahel-Saharan States.

December, 2002 - First local elections since the end of the single-party regime more than 10 years ago.

March, 2003 - Legislative elections: Parties supporting President Kerekou win 52 of the 83 elective seats.

December, 2003 - Lebanese charter plane crashes after taking off from Cotonou, killing some 140 people. French investigators subsequently find that the plane was overloaded.

July, 2004 - Benin, Nigeria agree to redraw their mutual border.

March, 2005 - US telecommunications company is fined after it admits to bribery in Benin. The company was accused of funneling millions of dollars into President Kerekou's 2001 election campaign.

July, 2005 - International Court of Justice awards most of the river islands along the disputed Benin-Niger border to Niger.

2006, March - Political newcomer Yayi Boni, running as an independent, wins the run-off vote in presidential elections. The incumbent, Mathieu Kerekou, is barred from the poll under a constitutional age limit.

March to April 2006 - World Bank and the African Development Bank approve debt relief for several countries including Benin, as part of measures agreed at a G8 nations summit at Gleneagles, Scotland, in 2005.

May, 2006 - Students protest against visit by French Interior Minister Nicolas Sarkozy who introduced a bill making it more difficult for unskilled workers to migrate to France.

April, 2007 - President Yayi's coalition wins control of parliament in elections.

July, 2007 - President Yayi leads thousands of supporters on a march against corruption.

April, 2008 - Local elections held. Nation-wide, parties allied with President Yayi win a majority of local council seats, but the major cities in the south are all won by opposition parties.

February, 2009 - Benin announces discovery of "significant quantities" of oil offshore near Seme, a town on the Nigeria-Benin border.

April, 2009 - European Union bans all of Benin's air carriers from flying to the EU in a regular update of its air safety blacklist.

August, 2010 - Benin marks its 50 years of independence.

Fifty of parliament's 83 MPs demand that President Yayi be charged over an alleged swindle in which thousands lost their life savings.

October, 2010 - Flooding affects much of the country. Thousands are made homeless.

March, 2011 - President Yayi is re-elected. His main challenger, Adrien Houngbedji, alleges widespread fraud

May, 2011 - President Boni Yayi's party and its allies regain control of parliament in elections.

August, 2011 - London's marine insurance market adds Benin to list of areas deemed high risk due to an escalation of pirate attacks in the area.

Parliament abolishes death penalty.

November, 2011 - Pope Benedict visits.

January 2012 - President Boni Yayi elected chairman of African Union for a year, beating Nigeria's Goodluck Jonathan.

October, 2012 - Three people are arrested over an alleged plot to poison President Thomas Boni Yayi. The suspects are one of his nieces, his personal doctor and an ex-minister, the authorities say.

March, 2013 - Police say they foiled a coup against President Thomas Boni Yayi, arresting a cabinet member and a plotter who they say was linked to the 2012 poisoning allegations.

Why was Dahomey changed to Benin?

Related Links

Why won't Benin change its name back to Dahomey?

What is the relationship between Benin, the country and Benin City in Nigeria?

The historic kingdom of Benin was in Nigeria. Why did the modern country of Benin decide to take on the name “Benin”? I realize that it was once more accurately called Dahomey, but why the name change?

What do you call a person from Benin?

What is Benin City famous for?

Why is the Republic of Benin called Benin if it succeeded the Kingdom of Dahomey, whereas the former Kingdom of Benin was in modern day Nigeria?

What is Benin?

What do we know about the walls of Benin?

Did you know that Dahomey was renamed Republic of Benin to honour the greatness of the mighty ancient Benin Empire of Nigeria?

What is the origin of Benin?

In the African kingdoms of Benin and Dahomey, were "enormous" numbers of human beings sacrificed?

How old is the Benin Kingdom?

When did Benin get its name?

What continent is Benin (Dahomey)?

Who are the best authors from Benin?

The historic kingdom of Benin was in Nigeria. Why did the modern country of Benin decide to take on the name “Benin”? As far as I know, the name Dahomey was French, & after independence, many wanted to distance themselves from the colonial identity.

Kevin Richardson

PhD in History, The University of Texas at Austin

Geography. Benin is located on the Bight of Benin, which took its name from the very empire that you mention. This instructive and gut-churning response from Josue Dennis Chance will be worthwhile to you.

The name Dahomey was French, and after independence, many wanted to distance themselves from the colonial identity.

While it had the name Dahomey under French rule, the pre-colonial kingdom called itself Dahomey. Part II was a twofold decision: First, the traditionalism was at odds with Kerekou's avowed Marxist ideology (proclaimed in 1974), but he was also not from the historic [Fon-speaking] core groups of Dahomey, and this was not unlike Kwame Nkrumah's choice of "Ghana" as a non-sectional name [in that way]. After the rejection of Marxism, they retained the name as one that also jettisoned the historic association of Dahomey with perpetrating the slave trade, but that is a secondary consideration. There does not seem to have been any purposeful attempt to appropriate the name of the Edo kingdom or its past, given that the Edo kingdom of Benin still exists today within Nigeria (and has an Oba), so OP is quite mistaken to use the past tense in talking about the other Benin.

1863 illustration of a soldier from the Kingdom of Dahomey.

Related Links

The historic kingdom of Benin was in Nigeria. Why did the modern country of Benin decide to take on the name "Benin"? I realize that it was once more accurately called Dahomey, but why the name change?

What is the relationship between Benin, the country and Benin City in Nigeria?

Where was the Kingdom of Benin located?

What is the historical relationship between Alake of Egboland, Ogun State, Nigeria and Alaketu in the Republic of Benin?

Where did Benin Republic get its name from, is it related to Benin in Nigeria?

Why is the Republic of Benin called Benin if it succeeded the Kingdom of Dahomey, whereas

Sarah Forbes Bo etta was captured during a slave hunt in Africa and was later given to Queen Victoria as a gift, aged just eight years old (Sarah Forbes Bone ta (Sarah Davies), by Camille Silvy, 1862 National Portrait Gallery, London)

Black History & Politics Posted by Cheryl Brown #BlackHistory #BlackHistoryOurHistory 🤎✊🏾

Bonetta was captured and orphaned during a slave hunt in West Africa in 1848 and was taken prisoner by the King of Dahomey, residing in what is now present day Benin. She was rescued by Captain Frederick E Forbes of the Royal Navy during a visit and was offered as a gift to Queen Victoria in 1850, when she was just eight years old.
The Queen took a shine to the girl and saw that she was educated and fostered, with Bonetta flourishing as a result. A talented young woman, Bonetta, who was said to have 'genius' intelligence, went on to become a popular society figure and married a wealthy merchant with her eldest daughter later becoming the Queen's godchild.

© NATIONAL PORTRAIT GALLERY

Source: Black History - It’s Nice to be Important, but it’s More Important to be Nice

Related Links

How do I make it to the WWE from Nigeria?

What are the similarities between the Chaaga tribe from Tanzania and the Zulu tribe from South Africa?

What do you think about the governor inviting Mrmacaroni, Faz, and Seun Kuti for a peace walk? I think they should go for the walk.

Why does the country of "Niger" have a racist name?

Can someone who knows say if Idi Amin expelled the Indians because he was a Muslim?

Will Nigeria overcome current challenges?

How did 'agbero' (guys that stand on the road collecting money from commercial vehicles after loading and other stuff) start in Nigeria?

What happens to those that have purchased tickets already if any country bans travellers from Nigeria

How will the omicron variant affect the economic activity in Africa?

If Egypt were to have a drought, would Ethiopia be forced to open the dam?

Is Cush Ethiopia or Sudan? When I read in some websites it refers to ancient Ethiopia and another websites it referring to Sudan.

Why are African borders porous?

What steps can be taken to increase the prosperity of the people of West Africa?

How do we encourage a good quality of life in West Africa?

Dans quels pays 1 000 euros par mois suffisent pour une vie de luxe ?

Pierre Vanlerberghe Précédent lieu : Cotonou, Bénin (2020–2021) Mis à jour le 1 an Laissez-moi vous présenter…

Drapeau béninois brandi par une citoyenne Le Bénin !
En quelques mots : démocratie très tranquille

pourvue en produits agricoles locaux et internationaux (le pays sert de port pour tout le centre de l'Afrique de l'Ouest)

pays agricole centré sur le coton et sa transformation
pas de ressources minières, etc, pas de tensions
Français LV1 à l'école pour tout le monde
grave pas cher (salaire moyen : ~68$/mois)

Voilà, j'ai envie de dire qu'on s'intéresse ici surtout au dernier point mais les autres ont leur importance pour mener une vie de luxe la plus agréable possible.
Examinons ce que vous avez :

1000€ = 655 957 francs CFA

Qu'a-t-on pour 655 957 FCFA?

Vous voulez une vie de luxe, je vous conseille de vous louer une bonne grosse baraque pour 300 000 le mois si vous êtes un dingo, petite villa agréable (3 chambres, salon) pour 150 000 F en vrai. Un conseil : faites-vous creuser une piscine pour 200 000 environ, ça pèsera sur votre premier mois mais ensuite c'est tranquille.

Là j'abuse peut-être un peu, mais à peine honnêtement
L'équipe qui bosse ici à mes côtés me dit qu'on trouve à 100 000 dans des exigences de luxe. Peut-être, mais pas dans Cotonou justement…

Ok donc on va se faire un forfait 1 an = 12 000€ = 7 871 484 francs CFA par an (la conversion est fixe, ancienne colonie oblige).

1 800 000 F pour la baraque
200 000 F pour la piscine (disons que c'est du mi-homemade, vous n'y nagerez pas le crawl de toutes façons)

7 871 484 - 2 00 000 = 5 871 484 FCFA

Passons aux autres paramètres de votre vie de luxe :

Vous souhaitez, je pense, un minimum de domesticité : dada & gardien (histoire de ne pas être dérangé par le peuple). 50 000/mois pour la dada et 30 000 pour le gardien (c'est une moyenne).

Très cliché, ne vous attendez pas à ce genre de costume très XIXe siècle
Il vous faut des loisirs afférents : un budget de 10 000 F/soir de sortie suffit, disons 2 soirs par semaine. Si vous ne sortez pas, ça financera vos voyages.

Une voiture avec chauffeur est un must-have pour remédier à votre alcoolisme mondain. Pour faire simple, disons que vous y mettez 100 000 francs par mois. Vous pouvez aussi payer à l'unité des courses à 1000 F environ entre votre maison de luxe et votre repaire de débauche. Pensez tout de même au budget essence…

Vous avez un budget boustifaille assez conséquent, disons 200 000 par mois. Cela devrait suffire, surtout que vous mangez au restaurant 2x par semaine. Pensez à envoyer la dada faire les courses si vous êtes plus pâle qu'un teint chocolat assez soutenu (des amis antillais plus pâles ont essayés, c'est un énorme échec) (le nuancier est très sévère, plus sombre vous payerez également beaucoup plus).

Total :
Domesticité : 960 000 F
Logement : 2 000 000 F
Sorties : 960 000 F
Déplacements : 1 200 000 F
Bonne chère : 2 400 000 F

Total : 7 520 000

"Bénéfice" : 7 871 484 - 7 520 000 = 351 484 F (535€)
Parfait, ça vous fera plus d'argent pour les soirées et les faux-frais. Pis vous ferez un safari avec ce qui reste.

Pendjari, nord du Bénin

VOILA. Vous avez votre vie de luxe (certes encore relatif : 2 soirées par semaine, c'est pas 30 par mois), au calme, dans un pays en développement démocratique et sécuritaire. Pour 1000€ par mois :) sous certaines conditions : je vous invite à lire les palabres en commentaires pour nuancer.

La bise d'Afrique de l'Ouest les copains, n'hésitez pas à liker si vous estimez que j'ai répondu à la question.

Questions similaires

Est-ce courant de gagner plus de 3.000 euros par mois en France ?

Accepteriez-vous un salaire de 10 000 € nets par mois si votre travail consistait à rester assis sur une chaise et fixer un poteau toute la journée, 35 heures par semaine et 5 semaines de congés payés par an ?

Que feriez-vous pour gagner 10000 euros en 1 mois ?

Dans quel pays on pourrait très bien vivre avec seulement 100 € par mois ?

Comment faire pour gagner 4 000 € par mois ?

Dans quel pays on peut très bien vivre avec 500 € par mois ?

Préférez-vous gagner tout de suite 100 000 eros ou gagner pendant 10 ans 833,3 euros par mois ? Et pourquoi l'un ou l'autre ?

Quels métiers permettent d'avoir une rémunération dépassant les 10 000 euros ?

Combien d'argent dois-je investir pour obtenir un retour de 1 000 € par mois ?

A quoi ressemble votre vie lorsque vous gagnez au delà de 300 000 dollars par an?

Comment puis-je gagner 66 000 $ en 5 jours ?

Est-ce possible de vivre confortablement dans votre pays avec 2500 dollars par mois ?

Quelle serait la meilleure façon de faire 1 000 000 d'euros aujourd'hui ?

Quels sont les principales filières de métier permettant de gagner plus de 6000 euros/ net par mois ?

Une entreprise veut acheter mon site pour 1,6 million de dollars. Je gagne actuellement entre 8 000 et 11 000 $ par mois. Dois-je prendre l'affaire ?

Which country on the world map has the strangest shape?

Tufshin Dash Mongolian Sep 8

Benin resembles a hand clenching fist

Mongolians often say Saudi Arabia resembles a Mongolian shoe/boot. It’s actually Arabian penisula that looks like it.

Related Links

Which country, according to you, has the best shape in the world and why?

If only 20 countries were allowed, how would you redraw the world map?

If only 35 countries were allowed, how would you redraw the world map?

If only 25 countries were allowed, how would you redraw the world map?

Are maps different in different countries?

What country has the most beautiful geographical map?

Dans quels pays 1 000 euros par mois suffisent pour une vie de luxe ?

Pierre Vanlerberghe Précédent lieu : Cotonou, Bénin (2020–2021) Mis à jour le 1 an Benin consists of five natural regions. The coastal region is low, flat, and sandy, backed by tidal marshes and lagoons. It is composed of, in effect, a long sandbar on which grow clumps of coconut palms; the lagoons are narrower in the western part of the country, where many have become marshes because of silting, and wider in the east, and some are interconnected. In the west the Grand-Popo Lagoon extends into neighbouring Togo, while in the east the Porto-Novo Lagoon provides a natural waterway to the port of Lagos, Nigeria, although its use is discouraged by the political boundary. Only at Grand-Popo and at Cotonou do the lagoons have outlets to the sea.

Laissez-moi vous présenter…
Drapeau béninois brandi par une citoyenne

Le Bénin !

En quelques mots :
démocratie très tranquille
pourvue en produits agricoles locaux et internationaux (le pays sert de port pour tout le centre de l'Afrique de l'Ouest)
pays agricole centré sur le coton et sa transformation
pas de ressources minières, etc, pas de tensions
Français LV1 à l'école pour tout le monde

grave pas cher (salaire moyen : ~68$/mois)
Voilà, j'ai envie de dire qu'on s'intéresse ici surtout au dernier point mais les autres ont leur importance pour mener une vie de luxe la plus agréable possible.

Examinons ce que vous avez :

1000€ = 655 957 francs CFA

Qu'a-t-on pour 655 957 FCFA?

Vous voulez une vie de luxe, je vous conseille de vous louer une bonne grosse baraque pour 300 000 le mois si vous êtes un dingo, petite villa agréable (3 chambres, salon) pour 150 000 F en vrai. Un conseil : faites-vous creuser une piscine pour 200 000 environ, ça pèsera sur votre premier mois mais ensuite c'est tranquille.

Là j'abuse peut-être un peu, mais à peine honnêtement

L'équipe qui bosse ici à mes côtés me dit qu'on trouve à 100 000 dans des exigences de luxe. Peut-être, mais pas dans Cotonou justement…

Ok donc on va se faire un forfait 1 an = 12 000€ = 7 871 484 francs CFA par an (la conversion est fixe, ancienne colonie oblige).

1 800 000 F pour la baraque
200 000 F pour la piscine (disons que c'est du mi-homemade, vous n'y nagerez pas le crawl de toutes façons)

7 871 484 - 2 00 000 = 5 871 484 FCFA

Passons aux autres paramètres de votre vie de luxe :

Vous souhaitez, je pense, un minimum de domesticité : dada & gardien (histoire de ne pas être dérangé par le peuple). 50 000/mois pour la dada et 30 000 pour le gardien (c'est une moyenne).

Très cliché, ne vous attendez pas à ce genre de costume très XIXe siècle

Il vous faut des loisirs afférents : un budget de 10 000 F/soir de sortie suffit, disons 2 soirs par semaine. Si vous ne sortez pas, ça financera vos voyages.

Une voiture avec chauffeur est un must-have pour remédier à votre alcoolisme mondain. Pour faire simple, disons que vous y mettez 100 000 francs par mois. Vous pouvez aussi payer à l'unité des courses à 1000 F environ entre votre maison de luxe et votre repaire de débauche. Pensez tout de même au budget essence…

Vous avez un budget boustifaille assez conséquent, disons 200 000 par mois. Cela devrait suffire, surtout que vous mangez au restaurant 2x par semaine. Pensez à envoyer la dada faire les courses si vous êtes plus pâle qu'un teint chocolat assez soutenu (des amis antillais plus pâles ont essayés, c'est un énorme échec) (le nuancier est très sévère, plus sombre vous payerez également beaucoup plus).

Total :

Domesticité : 960 000 F
Logement : 2 000 000 F
Sorties : 960 000 F
Déplacements : 1 200 000 F
Bonne chère : 2 400 000 F

Total : 7 520 000

"Bénéfice" : 7 871 484 - 7 520 000 = 351 484 F (535€)
Parfait, ça vous fera plus d'argent pour les soirées et les faux-frais. Pis vous ferez un safari avec ce qui reste.

Pendjari, nord du Bénin

VOILA. Vous avez votre vie de luxe (certes encore relatif : 2 soirées par semaine, c'est pas 30 par mois), au calme, dans un pays en développement démocratique et sécuritaire. Pour 1000€ par mois :) sous certaines conditions : je vous invite à lire les palabres en commentaires pour nuancer.

La bise d'Afrique de l'Ouest les copains, n'hésitez pas à liker si vous estimez que j'ai répondu à la question.

Questions similaires

Est-ce courant de gagner plus de 3.000 euros par mois en France ?

Accepteriez-vous un salaire de 10 000 € nets par mois si votre travail consistait à rester assis sur une chaise et fixer un poteau toute la journée, 35 heures par semaine et 5 semaines de congés payés par an ?

Que feriez-vous pour gagner 10000 euros en 1 mois ?
Dans quel pays on pourrait très bien vivre avec seulement 100 € par mois ?

Comment faire pour gagner 4 000 € par mois ?
Dans quel pays on peut très bien vivre avec 500 € par mois ?

Préférez-vous gagner tout de suite 100 000 eros ou gagner pendant 10 ans 833,3 euros par mois ? Et pourquoi l'un ou l'autre ?

Quels métiers permettent d'avoir une rémunération dépassant les 10 000 euros ?
Combien d'argent dois-je investir pour obtenir un retour de 1 000 € par mois ?
A quoi ressemble votre vie lorsque vous gagnez au delà de 300 000 dollars par an?
Comment puis-je gagner 66 000 $ en 5 jours ?
Est-ce possible de vivre confortablement dans votre pays avec 2500 dollars par mois ?
Quelle serait la meilleure façon de faire 1 000 000 d'euros aujourd'hui ?

Quels sont les principales filières de métier permettant de gagner plus de 6000 euros/ net par mois ?

Comment dresser une hyène pour qu'elle devienne votre animal de compagnie ?

Jerome Cohen · Suivre Un ami des animaux depuis toujours, de toutes espèces.Traducteur · 2 ans Mercedes R. Lackey owned by 12 parrots, 4 Cats, 4 Peafowl.

Oh mon Dieu, NON ! Vous ne le pouvez pas ! Jamais !

Les animaux sauvages font de piètres animaux de compagnie, mais les hyènes font absolument l'un des pires animaux de compagnie au monde.

Commençons par dire que dans la plupart des états américains, ce serait totalement illégal. Même si vous pouviez obtenir un permis dans les états qui autorisent de telles choses, toute personne raisonnable examinerait la demande et dirait "non". En fait, la Floride, qui a des lois assez laxistes concernant les animaux de compagnie exotiques, envisage maintenant d'interdire les hyènes.

Avez-vous déjà vu une hyène "apprivoisée" dans un spectacle ? Il y a une raison à cela. Les prétendus "manipulateurs de hyènes africaines" ne les ont pas comme "animaux de compagnie". Il s'agit d'un groupe de gens qui voyagent... qu'on appelle des " buskers "... un peu comme les charmeurs de serpents de l'Inde et les montreurs d'ours dansants de l'Europe de l'Est. Et tout comme ces animaux, ces hyènes sont maintenues muselées la plupart du temps, souvent traitées avec une grande brutalité, souvent droguées, jamais autorisées à avoir faim car si elles avaient faim, elles deviendraient agressives, et ne sont pas des animaux de compagnie, elles sont simplement la façon dont ces hommes gagnent leur vie.

Monster Week on TV...

La vérité sur les hyènes : démystifier les hyènes: http://www.hyaenidae.org/hyena-myths.html

Mythe : Les hyènes font de bons animaux de compagnie. Réalité : Bien que quelques personnes en Afrique et en Asie trouvent de très jeunes hyènes dans la nature et les élèvent comme animaux de compagnie, ces animaux semblent généralement être extrêmement malheureux comme " compagnons domestiques " à l'âge adulte, et doivent souvent être maintenus muselés en tout temps afin qu'ils ne nuisent pas aux gens ou aux biens. Une muselière empêche la hyène de pouvoir se toiletter correctement. Comme les hyènes tachetées ont besoin de plusieurs années de pratique pour devenir des chasseurs compétents, et comme elles sont privées de cette pratique lorsqu'elles sont élevées comme animaux de compagnie, c'est en fait une condamnation à mort pour une hyène élevée en captivité qui est relâchée dans la nature. De plus, les hyènes de compagnie ne peuvent pas être relâchées de peur qu'elles ne transfèrent de nouveaux pathogènes des environnements captifs dans la nature. Lorsqu'elles atteignent l'âge adulte, de nombreuses hyènes " de compagnie " doivent donc être euthanasiées.

Vous voyez cette lourde muselière en corde ? C'est la seule façon de garder une hyène comme "animal de compagnie". Cette muselière est sur la hyène toute la journée et toute la nuit sauf quand elle mange. Et, elles sont maintenus drogués.

"Oui, les fameux hommes-hyènes (THE HYENA AND OTHER MEN) d'Afrique se promènent avec elles enchaînées, mais ils les maintiennent aussi droguées et ne les laissent jamais avoir faim."

Sur l'improbabilité de la domestication de l'hyène. Ou : Non, tu ne peux pas en avoir une. On the unlikelihood of hyena domestication. Or: No, you can’t have one.

Et non, vous ne pouvez pas en domestiquer une. Non, à moins que vous n'ayez plusieurs milliers d'années à consacrer à la reproduction sélective de ces créatures.

Questions similaires

Peut-on avoir une hyène comme animal de compagnie ?

Quel genre d'animal de compagnie dois-je avoir pour tenir compagnie à mon chien pendant que je suis au travail ?

Avez-vous un animal de compagnie dangereux ?
Est-il possible d’avoir un rapace comme animal de compagnie ?
Comment dresser son corbeau ?
Les hyènes peuvent-elles être domestiquées ?

Selon vous, quel animal pourrait être un excellent animal de compagnie, mais ce n’est pas courant de le voir et pourquoi ?

Pourquoi les hyènes sont-elles si sûres d'elles ?

Un chien qui mord son maître peut-il être gardé comme animal de compagnie ?
Si une hyène peut briser la patte d'un lion en une seule morsure, pourquoi ne tuent-elles

Life's Hard Lessons
What is the saddest thing you've ever seen?

· Follow Answered by Farrukh Shaikh Mar 24

Originally Answered: What is the saddest thing you have seen a person do?

The late king of a certain community had ten wild dogs. He used them to torture and eat any of his servants who made a mistake. One of the servants gave an opinion that was wrong, and the king didn’t like it at all. So he ordered that the servant be thrown to the dogs.

The servant said, “I served you for ten years, and you do this to me? Please give me ten days before throwing me to those dogs!” The king agreed.

In those ten days, the servant went to the guard who looks after the dogs and told him he would like to serve the dogs for the next ten days. The guard was baffled but agreed, and the servant started feeding the dogs, cleaning for them, bathing them, and providing all sorts of comfort for them.

When the ten days were over, the king ordered that the servant be thrown to the dogs for his punishment. When he was thrown in, we were all amazed to see the ravenous dogs only licking the feet of the servant!

The king, baffled at what he was seeing, said,

”What has happened to my dogs?”

The servant replied, "I served the dogs for only ten days, and they didn’t forget my service. Yet I served you for a whole ten years and you forgot all, at my first mistake!"

The king realized his mistake and ordered the servant to be set free.

This post is a message to all those who forget the good things a person does for them as soon as the person makes a mistake towards them. Don’t put out the history that is filled with good because of a mistake you don’t like.

Please follow and subscribe for more interesting articles.

Une Héroïne Mino du Dahomey immortalisée au Bénin.

David-GDK Connaissances : Anglais 15 mai

La statue de la grande Minon Nanga, qui fait partie du corps d’élite des amazones du Danxômè. Ce premier régiment de femmes guerrières a été créé d’abord par son altesse royale Tassi Hangbé ((ou Nan Hangbe, la seule femme à avoir régné sur le Dahomey au XVIIIe siècle de 1708 à 1711). Il a été par la suite réhabilité, amélioré et instauré par sa majesté le roi Guézo, en 1820, pour devenir un corps spécial d’élites, chargé de défendre le souverain et son royaume.

© PRESIDENCE DU BENIN

COUNTRY FACT FILE

Location

In West Africa on the gulf of Guinea.

Official title of the state

The Republic of Benin (English)

Republique du Benin

Flag description

Two equal horizontal bands of yellow (top) and red (bottom) with a vertical green band on the hoist side: green symbolizes hope and revival, yellow wealth, and red courage. Note: uses the popular Pan-African colors of Ethiopia.

Neighbours

Togo on W. Burkinafaso and Niger on N. Nigeria on E. Land boundaries: total 1989 km. Border countries, Burkinafaso 306km, Nigeria 773 km, Niger 266 km, Togo 644 km.

Founder of The Nation
Hubert Kuituku Maga

Local divisions - 12 Departments

Government type - Republic presidential Legislation chamber-Unicameral

Form of State - Republic – Presidential

Executive President is the Chief of State and Head of Government. President elected for five-year term (eligible for a second term).

A multi-party republic with one legislative house. The National Assembly 83 seats, members are elected by direct popular vote to serve for four-year terms.

Executive branch

President, Council of ministers (appointed by the President).

The President is both the chief of State and head of government. President elected by direct popular vote to serve for five-year terms eligible for a second term.

Former Rulers

Hubert Koutuku Maga (1916–2000)
1 August 1960 - 28 October 1963 - deposed (Time in office 3 years, 88 days)

Christophe Soglo (1909–1983)
28 October 1963 to 25 January 1964 (time in office 89 days)

Sourou-Migan Apithy (1913–1989)
25 January 1964 to 27 November 1965 – resigned (Time in office 1 year, 306 days)

Justin Ahomadégbé-Tomêtin (1917–2002)
27 November 1965 to 29 November 1965 (Time in Office 2 days)

Colonel Mathieu Kérékou (1933–2015)
26 November to 30 November 1975 (Time in office 3 yrs 35 days)

Mathieu Kérékou (1933–2015)
30 November 1975 to 1 March 1990 (Time in office 14 yrs 120 days)

Mathieu Kérékou (1933–2015)
1 March 1990 to 4 April 1991 (Time in Office 1 year, 34 days)

Nicéphore Soglo (born 1934)
4 April 1991 to 4 April 1996 (Time in office 5 yrs)

Mathieu Kérékou (1933–2015)
4 April 1996 to 6 April 2006 (Time in office 10 years, 2 days)

Thomas Boni Yayi (born 1951)
6 April 2006 to 6 April 2016 (Time in office as independent candidate 10 yrs)

Patrice Talon (born 1958)
6 April 2016 to incumbent (Time in office as independent candidate 5 years, 253 days)

Judicial chamber

High Court of Justice: Constitutional court: Supreme Court:

Capital city
Porto Nuovo (Political)

Cotonou (Economical) Altitude 51 mtrs/167 ft

Geographic coordinates - 6.22N , 2.55E.

The largest city, chief port and the de-facto capital of Benin, on the Guinea coast of West Africa. The National Assembly, Presidency, and foreign embassies are all located here due to the decline of Porto Nouvo. Cotonou Is the commercial capital of Benin located on the coastal strip b/n Lake Nokoue and the Atlantic ocean, meaning for "mouth of the river of death" in local Fon language, founded as a village in the beginning of the 19th century, from 1889 then on developed quickly to become the largest harbor in the region.

Port-Nouvo (Political) Altitude 38 mtrs/125 ft

Geographic coordinate - 6.29N , 2.37E Is a port on the gulf of Guinea close to the border with Nigeria, is the official Beninese capital, also known locally as Hogbonou and Adjace, founded in the 16th century, formerly a centre of the Portuguese slave trade, it was for many years, until independence in 1960, a trading port of French West Africa. In 1900, Porto-Nouvo becomes the former Dahomey's capital city, it’s being replaced by Cotonou, which has better links to the sea and with the interior, as the administrative and commercial centre.

Names of main towns

Porakou, Abomey, Ouidah, Natitingou.

Date of independence

August 1st 1960.

Religions (Major)

Christian 42.8% (Catholic 27.1%, Celestial Church of Christ 5%, Methodist 3.2%, other Protestant 2.2%, other 5.3%), Muslim 24.4%, Vodoun 17.3%, other 15.5%.

Main spoken languages

French (official), Fon, Yoruba, Bariba widely spoken.

Currency unit

African Franc (CFA) =100 Centimes.

Area in Km2

112,622.00.

Country area comparison in Africa

39 out of 55 states.

Demographic terms:

Annual population growth rate 2.944 %.

Birth rate 38.67 births per 1,000 population

Death rate 9.23 deaths per 1,000 population
Average life expectancy: 59.42 years

Male 58.21 years: Female 60.68 years:

Illiteracy rate (%):

Male: 40, Female: 70

Average per capita income:

USD 1, 500

Population density (%):

/km2

Urban population (%):

41

Contributor groups (%):

Farming, Fishing: 33

Industry: 15

Social service: 52

Main Export Items

Cotton 80%, Cocoa, Fiber, Palm-product, Coffee, Cashews, Shea-butter, Textiles, Seafood.

Economy is based on Agriculture.

Climate

Tropical: Hot and Dry in the North.

Extremes:

Lowest point: the Atlantic coast, 0 mtr.

Highest point: Mt. Sokbaro 658 meters.
Weather of the Capital city (Cotonou) average annual temperature 27.2oC.

Altitude 51 mtrs/167ft

Hottest Month March 26-28oC.

Coldest Month August 23-25oC.

Driest Month December 13 mm average Rf.

Wettest Month June 366 mm average Rf.

Measures

Metric system.

Time zone

GMT/UTC+0

Public holidays

All Christian and Muslim holidays.

Ethnic groups

Fons, Adjas, Baribas, Yorubas 85%, Peul and related 7%, Ottamari and related 6.1%, Yoa-Lokpa and related 4%, Dendi and related 2.5%, other 1.6% (includes Europeans), unspecified 2.9%.

Topographic & Environmental concern

Most of Benin is flat and covered with dense vegetation the coast is hot & humid, and rainy. The main environmental issues facing the people of Benin are desertification, deforestation, wildlife endangerment, and water pollution. The spread of the desert into agricultural lands in the north is accelerated by regular droughts. Benin has also lost 59% of its forests from uncontrolled agricultural practices and fires. Environment: Inadequate supplies of potable water: poaching threatens wildlife populations: deforestation: desertification.

Economy Overview

Industry

Textiles, food processing, construction materials, cement.

Chief crops

Palm products, peanuts, cotton, coffee, tobacco, cassava, yams, beans, cashew nuts.

Natural resources

Off-shore Oil reserve, Limestone, Marble, Timber, unexploited natural - Gas.

Land in use (%)

Arable land: 17

Grassland: 4

Forest wood: 31

Other: 48

Marine:

Coastline: 121 km.

Commercial Sea port:-

Cotonou (main port)

Development prospect:

Transshipment of goods to and from Nigeria is a crucial part of Benin's economy and higher risk premiums may lead shippers to use other ports. In October, the US government's Millennium Challenge Corporation celebrated the completion of its $196m program of investments in the capacity and security of the port of Cotonou.

After cotton's weak performance since 2005/2006, the government has embarked on a lackluster plan to revitalize the sector. For the 2010-2011 season, the agriculture ministry launched a drive to recruit new extension workers and developed a cooperatives program to manage the purchase and distribution of inputs. The government agreed to lower the price of fertilizer, meanwhile raising the purchasing price to encourage production to meet the goal of 600,000tn even though production has not passed the 2008 peak of about 250,000tn. The government is counting on investment from China in order to boost economic prospects by providing finance for key infrastructure projects. A $10bn deal with Chinese contractors could revolutionize transport infrastructure, but raising finance will not be easy for the government

In September, 2012 China Civil Engineering Construction Corporation announced that it would back $10bn in road and rail projects that would help to cement the country as a hub for its landlocked neighbors to the north. The financing for the deals has yet to be agreed, but would include the rehabilitation and extension of the Cotonou-Parakou railroad on to Niamey, Niger. The road projects would likely include the Parakou to Djougou route and another from Béroubouay to Kandi and Malanville in the north. The government plans on reaping the economic benefits of better management of its large bureaucracy and the privatization of some troubled parastatals. It will address problems in the civil service once it has developed a database of its workers in 2012. The new year will also bring the privatization of Benin Telecoms and the Benin-Niger railway back onto the agenda, while the Société Béninoise d'Énergie Électrique turned a profit in 2011, saving it from pressure to privatize, at least for now.

BOTSWANA

National Flag and Emblem

Locator Map

TEXT HIGHLIGHTS: Diaries updates, key events, brief analysis and relating news articles in timeline

Overview

The earliest inhabitants of the region were the San, who were followed by the Tswana

The culture is mainly of native Bantu. In common with many of their neighbors, the Tswana suffered greatly from Nguni and Afrikaner incursions in the mid 19th century, leading to the establishment of a British Protectorate in 1885. Coveted in turn by the early Boer republics, by Cecil Rhodes' British South Africa Company and then by South Africa, Bechuanaland ('Bechuana' is synologous with 'Batswana', the correct term for the people of Botswana) has often trodden a narrow path between its neighbors' political, military and economic ambitions. Lack of infrastructure within the Protectorate led to it being governed from nearby Mafeking (now Mahikeng) in the adjacent Bechuanaland Crown Colony, which was incorporated into South Africa in 1910. The adoption of apartheid in South Africa in 1948 effectively ended its prospects of incorporating the Protectorate, which instead achieved independence as Botswana in 1966. The BDP won the first elections, held in 1965 in advance of independence, and its leader, Seretse Khama, was appointed President. The BDP has won all 10 elections (each one free and fair) since independence. In spite of the country's vulnerability to economic coercion (albeit somewhat alleviated by the discovery and exploitation of diamonds from the late 1960s), and occasional military attack by Rhodesia and apartheid South Africa, Khama was a staunch critic of his white minority-ruled neighbors. Botswana's stance and 'front-line' status meant that, notwithstanding the BDP's political and economic conservatism, the country developed friendly (if perhaps slightly formal) relations with its more radical neighbors.

Former British Colony.

Achieved it's independence on September 30, 1966.

Headship since independence: Instrumental self-administration.

Sir Se-re-tse clan nicknamed "binding clay" became the first prime minister in 1965, when Betchuanaland became "Independent state within the commonwealth", Sir Se-re-tse Khama assumed the presidency on the 30th of September, 1966.

Formerly known as: Bechuanaland

VP Dr. Quett Ketisume Joni Masire succeeded the late Sir Se-re-tse Khama to take office on his death, served with reelection until March, 1998, when he stepped aside serving his tenure on the 1st April, 1998, as Mr. Festus Gontebanye Mogae a party colleague elected for the post as third president of Botswana when the founder-presidents son Brigadier General Ian-Khama who was in line to become the next president of Botswana. Over four decades of uninterrupted civilian leadership, progressive social policies and significant capital investment have created one of the most dynamic economies in Africa.

A Republic in southern Africa.

European missionaries arrived in the area at early 19th century, but it was the discovery of gold that excited their interest. And in 1885 established as the British protectorate of Betchuanaland until 1960 as a defense against the Boers, then Dutch settlers of South Africa. Formerly known as Betchuanland, a political leader, the grandson of the Ngwato tribal chief, in the name of Se-re-tse meaning for "binding clay" became the first prime minister in 1965, when Betchuanaland became "Independent state within the commonwealth", Sir Se-re-tse Khama assumed the presidency on the 30th of September, 1966, then it adopted a new name Botswana upon independence, he served four terms in office and died of a pancreatic cancer on the 13th July, 1980.

The Republic of Botswana, formerly known as the "Republic of Betchuanaland", was proclaimed as an independent member of the "British commonwealth", VP Dr. Quett Ketisume Joni Masire succeeded the late Sir Se-re-tse Khama to take office on his death, served with reelection until March, 1998, when he stepped aside serving his tenure on the 1st April, 1998, as Mr. Festus Gontebanye Mogae a party colleague elected for the post as third president of Botswana when the founder-presidents son Brigadier General Ian-Khama who was in line to become the next president of Botswana. A four decades of uninterrupted civilian leadership, progressive social policies and significant capital investment have created one of the most dynamic economies in Africa.

Popular elections in Botswana are smooth and orderly, defeats are conceded readily and celebrations are brief and enviably, efficient and civilized. The pillars of democracy: Electoral commission, defense and security forces, judiciary, media and civic organizations are all free and independent. Members of the national assembly including the president of Botswana regularly meet with their constituencies to account for their actions as well as for consultation on local and national issues. Freedom of association is taken for granted in Botswana. Ethnic-based politics is discouraged, no political party is allowed to use State-resources to influence level-playing field and enhance it's position of getting elected, rigging of votes does not exist, no political party in Botswana calls it's competitor an enemy. The current president of Botswana Ian Se-re-tse Khama, openly condemned any attempt to amending the constitution for the sake of extending term limits for presidents in-power, surely his noble stand has sent a powerful as well as meaningful message to many of his African counterparts, is a sign of a political maturity and firm democratic culture. Botswana tried to maintain a delicate balance between its economic dependence onto south Africa and it's relations with surrounding African countries.

Accession to power of president General Khama Ian-Khama - April, 2008 nominated to the post.

Tentative election calendar- Presidential/Parliamentary, March/April.

Botswana – Timeline Diaries updates, and related key notes:

1867 - European gold prospectors arrive in the area, mining begins.

1885 - British proclaim a protectorate called Bechuanaland.

Founder President Sir Se-re-tse Khama

Served as Botswana's first president (1966-80)

Became chief of tribe at age of four

Forced into exile by Britain after marrying an English woman, Ruth Williams

On his return, negotiated terms of independence Promoted multiracial democracy 1890 - British protectorate is extended to Chobe river.

1950 - Chief of the Ngwato tribe, in the name of Seretse Khama nicknamed 'the binding clay', is deposed and exiled by the British.

1952 - Rioters protest against Seretse Khama's exile.

1959 - Copper mines are launched production.

1960 - Bechuanaland People's Party (BPP) is established.

December, 1960 - Britain approves new constitution for Bechuanaland. Executive Council, Legislative Council and African Council are established.

In 1961 - Seretse Khama appointed to Executive Council. The following year, Seretse Khama is appointed to Executive Council and later founds the Bechuanaland Democratic Party (BDP), which is eventually renamed the Botswana Democratic Party.

In 1962 - Seretse Khama founds Bechuanaland Democratic Party (BDP), later to become Botswana Democratic Party.

In 1965 – Seretse Khama becomes prime minister of Betchuanaland.

Gaborone becomes Botswana’s administrative centre.

In 1965 - BDP wins legislative elections, first to be held under universal adult suffrage. Seretse Khama becomes prime minister September, 1966 - Bechuanaland is granted independence and becomes Republic of Botswana with Seretse Khama as founder president.

In 1967 - Diamonds discovered at Orapa.

August, 1969 - BDP wins general election. Seretse Khama is re-elected for another term.

January, 1977 - UN Security Council resolution demands Rhodesian hostilities on Botswana border cease.

March, 1977 - Botswana Defense Force is established.

October, 1979 - General elections: BDP wins majority, Sir Seretse Khama is re-elected as president.

In 1980 - Botswana is founder member of Southern African Development Coordination Conference (SADCC), grouping which aims to reduce region's economic reliance on South Africa.

In 1980 - President Sir Seretse Khama dies of Pancreatic cancer. Dr. Quett Masire, former vice-president, is made president after National Assembly vote.

September, 1984 - General elections: BDP wins majority, Mr. Quett Masire is re-elected as president.

June, 1985 - Buildings in Gaborone are raided and 12 people are killed by South African forces seeking alleged ANC members. Action is condemned by the UN Security Council.

October, 1989 - General elections: BDP wins majority. National Assembly re-elects Masire as president.

In 1991 - 12,000 public sector workers sacked after strike action calling for increased wages.

October, 1994 - Legislative elections: BDP secures 53% of vote. Masire re-elected by National Assembly.

In 1995 - Government begins relocating thousands of bushmen to settlements outside Central Kalahari Game Reserve.

In 1997 - Constitutional amendments approved. Presidency is limited to two five-year terms. Voting age lowered from 21 to 18.

March/April, 1998 - Masire resigns as president and retires. Festus Mogae, formerly vice president, becomes president under new constitutional arrangements.

June, 1998 - Botswana Congress Party established after split in BNF and is declared official opposition after most BNF deputies switch allegiance.

September, 1999 - Six-day state of emergency declared to resolve voter registration problem.

October, 1999 - General elections: BDP wins majority, Festus Mogae is confirmed as president.

December, 1999 - International Court of Justice grants control of Sedudu-Kasikili - a river island disputed by Botswana and Namibia - to Botswana.

February/March, 2000 - Devastating floods: More than 60,000 are made homeless.

August, 2000 - President Festus Mogae says Aids drugs will be made available free of charge from 2001.

March, 2001 - National diamond corporation, Debswana, says it will subsidize drugs for workers with Aids.

March, 2002 - Kalahari bushmen take the government to court to challenge a forced eviction from their land: the case is dismissed on a technicality.

May 23, 2002: Former First Lady of Botswana, Lady Ruth Khama Dies’

Lady Ruth Khama, former First Lady of the Republic of Botswana and widow of it's founding President, Sir Seretse Khama dies. She was 79, and died after a long battle with cancer. Born Ruth Williams, the daughter of a businessman from Croyden England, she met and fell in love with Seretse Khama and married him in London in 1948 causing an immediate crisis for several governments. Seretse Khama was the heir to the throne of the Chiefs of the Bamangwato people of Bechuanaland, a British Protectorate bordering South Africa. With the recent legal institution of Apartheid in South Africa, and the de-facto segregation of the races in all of the British Empire, both the colonial administration in Bechuanaland and the Government of South Africa were scandalized and fought hard to prevent the marriage between a black chief and an white woman. The South African government exerted pressure on the British government of Clement Atlee to prevent the marriage from taking place, promising to embargo gold and uranium from the British and to annex Bechuanaland to South Africa, going so far as to pressure the Bishop of London to prevent the wedding from taking place. The British themselves were not keen on the Chief of the Bamangwato returning to Africa and parading his white consort before the tribes either. The British and South African governments were not the only parties scandalized by the marriage. The Regent of the Bamangwato, Tshekedi Khama, uncle of the yet to be enthroned Seretse also was horrified that his nephew was not only marrying out of his country, but out of his race. He believed that Seretse had a duty to marry whoever his family elders chose for him to wed in the interests of his throne and his people. A white English former secretary was not Tshekedi's idea of an appropriate wife for the Paramount Chief of his people. He tried to prevail on his nephew to abandon this marriage which the regent feared would anger many of Seretse's future subjects. However, Seretse Khama married Ruth Williams in a registry office in Kensington in 1948, hoping to settle the frenzy once and for all. Instead pressure was now exerted to get them to divorce, which they refused to do. Seretse Khama was exiled by the British Colonial authorities from Bechuanaland in 1950 and prevented from returning due to his refusal to divorce Ruth, as South Africa had made clear it would annex Bechuanaland if the British alowed Seretse Khama and Ruth Khama to return. The Khamas were only allowed to return in 1956, when Seretse Khama agreed to abdicate the thone of the Bamangwato. Upon his return to Bechuanaland in 1956, he formed the Democratic Party and began to agitate for independence. In 1966, Bechuanaland achieved independence as the Republic of Botswana, and Seretse Khama became it's founding President. He was knighted that same year by Queen Elizabeth II, becomeing Sir Sretse Khama, and his wife becoming Lady Ruth Khama, affectionately know as "Lady K" in her new country. Lady Khama earned the respect and affection of the people of Botswana with her cheerful attitude and her devotion to the welfare of the people. President Khama died in 1980, but Lady Ruth continued to live in Botswana, playing an active role in promoting womens rights, and working with the Botswana Red Cross and Girl Guides both of which she founded, as well as various childrens and HIV/AIDS related charities. She is survived by her children, the current Paramount Chief ot the Bamangwato, Brigadier General Ian Khama, who is also the current vice President of the Republic of Botswana, her twin sons Tshekedi Khama and Anthony Khama, as well as her eldest child, Jacqueline Khama. May she rests in peace!

September, 2003 - Botswana begins erecting a fence along its border with Zimbabwe to stem an influx of Zimbabwean illegal immigrants.

March, 2004- HIV infection rate falls to 37.5%: Botswana no longer has the world's highest rate of infection.

August, 2004 - Workers at Botswana's largest diamond-mining company strike over pay, after a court rules that such action is illegal. Some 1,000 workers are sacked.

October, 2004 - President Festus Mogae secures a second term in a landslide election victory.

December, 2006 - A group of Bushmen wins a four-year legal battle to hold on to their ancestral lands.

March, 2008 - Botswana launches its own diamond trading company - the Diamond Trading Company Botswana (DTCB).

April, 2008 – Sir Seretse Khama's son Army Brigadier General Ian Khama takes over as presidency.

October, 2008 - Botswana's former President Festus Mogae wins a $5m prize of Mo Ibrahim Foundation that's set up to encourage good governance in Africa. Festus Mogae is widely praised for diversifying Botswana's economy to reduce its dependence on diamonds.

April, 2009 - Botswana says it will halve diamond production because of falling demands for gems.

October, 2009 - Ruling BDP party wins elections, and another 5-year term for President Khama.

November, 2009 - Botswana stages a substantial economic recovery after stepping up diamond production again, a bank reports.

November, 2010 - Human rights group Survival International (SI) calls for a boycott of Botswanan diamonds, accusing the government of trying to force Basarwa bushmen away from their ancestrallands.

January, 2011 - An appeals court in Botswana overturns a July 2010 order depriving the indigenous Basarwa bushmen of the right to drill for water on their ancestralland.

April, 2011 - Civil servants begin what becomes a two-month strike over pay.

January, 2012 - Talks by three main opposition parties aimed at forming coalition fail, destroying hopes of challenge to ruling Botswana Democratic Party.

2014 – Gay rights group wins legal recognition.

March 20, 2014: BOTSWANA - Green light for Trans-Kalahari Railway. Botswana and Namibia signed an agreement to build a Trans-Kalahari Railway.

Botswana:
An African Model for Progress and Prosperity

(AFRICA DEVELOPMENT) The southern African nation of Botswana has defied the global economic downturn of the 2007-2009 great recession. Instead, it exemplifies the recent transition of economic growth in favor of low-income countries as it jumped from recording one of the world's lowest per capita income figures of $70 to a middle-income level category of $16,300 within a few decades.

Botswana is leaning towards becoming the Singapore or Hong Kong of southern Africa. More importantly, Botswana's progression of economic growthmanship has become the envy of its neighbors, as well as a source of inspiration, which they should consider emulating.

What factors explain this impressive performance in the 46 years since independence from Great Britain? First and foremost, countries have been converging rapidly due to two core influences: declining fertility rates (2.46 in 2012), and the rapid transfer and adoption of technology. Additionally, in order for economic convergence to ensue, the annual growth rate of productivity between the less developed and developed countries must be in favor of the lower income nation. Botswana's striking performance stands out not only in Sub-Saharan Africa, but on a global platform as well.

The nation's valuable diamond and mineral reserves and the influential fiscal and legislative parenting proffered by the UK post-independence and sound democratic leadership have quickly elevated Botswana to one of the world's fastest growing economies: an unmatched level of growth that has been maintained now for nearly five decades. The 1970-2010 average annual income for Botswana citizens has been increasingannually by 6.3 percent, compared to high-income countries averagingannual growth of approximately 1.8 percent for the same 40-year period. It's not unreasonable then, to advance the notion that Botswana, a nation approximately the size of Texas is expected to realize continued GDP growth and will converge with the global economic leaders' per capita GDP in approximately 26 years — by 2037.

Botswana's 2010 per capita GDP (PPP) of $16,100 and classification as an "upper middle income" economy since 1989 are certainly out of the ordinary compared to many of their struggling Sub-Saharan neighbors, namely Zambia, Zimbabwe and Namibia. The population growth rates have remained in check over the years, currently growing by a negligible 1.48 percent annually, thereby granting its lean population of only two million a larger slice of the growing GDP pie and a fairly good quality of life. Botswana's standard of living is currently comparable to such countries as Turkey and Mexico.

The discovery of diamonds in 1972 and the mining production that followed created an opportunity for Botswana to support the robust economic and industrial drive of diamond commerce throughout the latter part of the 20th century. According to the CIA World Factbook, diamond activities contribute to 38 percent of national GDP, generate nearly 80 percent of export income and 50 percent of government revenue (CIA World Factbook). Botswana is now in the process of thinking ahead and addressing the next phase that willtransform and expand their economy throughout the 21st century: a shift that is guided very much by fairly recent access to technology, communication capabilities and globalization. Eco-tourism, financial and support services, outsourced business process ventures and manufacturing, along with mining and exporting coal are all promising areas of growth.

According to the global corruption watchdog Transparency International, Botswana scored 6.1 (0=highly corrupt, 10=least corrupt) on the 2011 CPI (Corruption Perception Index), ultimately ranking them the least corrupt nation of all 54 African countries, and a noteworthy 32nd place from the top in a worldwide comparison. Is this an African success story? In many ways it is. Botswana's distribution objectives include free basic and post-secondary education, zero-cost healthcare and land plots for residence and farming purposes.

The war against HIV/AIDS has been in full force as former President Festus Mogae was awarded for his initiatives to mandate ARV medication and treatment at no cost to citizens, and for the founding of the African Comprehensive HIV AIDS Partnership (ACHAP). In collaboration with The Gates Foundation, Merck Foundation, the Botswana-Harvard AIDS Institute and the Botswana-UPenn Partnership, Botswana's current HIV/AIDS combating programs are recognized as the most progressive in Africa. Mother-to-child transmission and new infection rates have been on a steady decline since the 2002 mandate, and average life expectancy has risen from less than 40-years-old at the turn of the 21st century to 55 years in 2010. As of 2011, universal access to treatment, determined by the UNAIDS Report at 80 percent coverage or greater, has been officially realized in Botswana: they now provide coverage to 93 percent of those in need of ARV treatment across the country.

Several major firms and international headquarters, including Tiffany & Co. subsidiary Laurelton Diamonds, HJ Heinz, Hewlett-Packard, Barclays Bank and South African Development Community (SADC), have chosen to operate in the nations capital of Gaborone. Botswana is undoubtedly in an opportune position to become a global economic center as De Beers Diamond Trading Company headquarters relocates from London to Gaborone in late 2013. The enormous and historical move is sure to bring with it increased diamond ventures and trade, international travellers, tourism and an ensuing chain of business opportunities to Gaborone. Both Moody's and S&P have rated Botswana as a noteworthy investment opportunity in the developing world.

Nake M. Kamrany is professor of economics at the University of Southern California and Director of Program in Law and Economics. Jennifer Gray is an Associate at the Global Income Convergence Research Group in Los Angeles, and recipient of a 2012 University of Southern California Provost Research Fellowship. She recently returned from a field research trip to Botswana. Credit –Huffington Post

General

Here Are Few Things You May Not Know About Botswana

April 27 2016

Botswana, one of Africa's most stable countries, is the continent's longest continuous multi-party democracy. It is relatively free of corruption and has a good human rights record.Sparsely populated, Botswana protects some of Africa's largest areas of wilderness. Safari-based tourism – tightly-controlled and often upmarket – is an important source of income.

Botswana is the world's largest producer of diamonds and the trade has transformed it into a middle-income nation.

The country has had its share of problems: It once had the world's highest rate of HIV-Aids infection. UN figures for 2014 suggest that for adults aged 15 to 49 the prevalence rate is 25%.

The country has one of Africa's most-advanced treatment programmes, however, and medicine for the virus is readily available.

LEADER

President: Khama Ian Khama

Khama Ian Khama – the son of Sir Seretse Khama, Botswana's first post-independence leader – took over as president in April 2008.

He was the chosen successor of Festus Mogae, who stepped down at the end of his second term, after a decade at the helm.

Mr Ian Khama secured a five-year term in October 2009 after his governing Botswana Democratic Party (BDP) party swept to victory in a parliamentary election, and in August 2014 polls he gained a second term when his party gained the most seats.

Critics describe him as authoritarian while supporters say he is decisive and efficient. His no-nonsense approach has made him popular abroad as he has broken ranks with regional leaders' timid approach to join international criticism of democratic abuses by Zimbabwe's President Robert Mugabe.

Born in the UK while his father was in exile, Mr Ian Khama is a graduate of Sandhurst officer training college in Britain and was the commander of the Botswana Defence Force (BDF) before becoming vice president in 1998.

His ruling Botswana Democratic Party has governed since independence in 1966.

MEDIA

Campaign groups say the authorities are forcing the Bushmen off their ancestral lands. A dwindling band of Bushmen hunter-gatherers make the Kalahari Desert their home

Botswana has a long tradition of lively and unimpeded public debate, although opposition leaders have claimed that the government limits their ability to broadcast freely on the radio.

There is a “free and vigorous” press in cities and towns, says US-based NGO Freedom House.

State-run TV arrived with the launch of Botswana Television (BTV) in 2000. Satellite pay TV is available.

Botswana:
A Successful Model for Africa to Follow
October 27, 2016

With the advent of independence in 1966, Botswana did not have an attractive future by any standard. With a per capita income of $70, 12 km of paved road and a GDP dependent largely on agricultural exports, the country was on a socio-economic death row. However, with changes following the discovery of diamonds in the sub-Saharan country, it rose to become the antithesis of most countries in Africa. This has led to its marked development and stability over a period of over 4 decades.

According to an article by Michael Lewin, Botswana had 7,000 kilometers of paved roads, and per capita income had risen to about $6,100 ($12,000 at purchasing power parity) by 2007, making the Southern African powerhouse an upper middle- income country comparable to Chile or Argentina. Its success is also evident in other measures of human development. At independence, life expectancy at birth was just 37 years. By 1990 it was an impressive 60, 10 years above the African average. Under-five mortality had fallen to about 45 per 1,000 live births in 1990, compared with 180 for Africa as a whole. Development assistance had shrunk to less than 3% of the government budget, and agriculture accounted for only about 2.5% of GDP. Such growth and improvement in economy was paired with advances of an infrastructural and education based environment.

But why Botswana is great?

1. EFFECTIVE MANAGEMENT OF MINERAL RESOURCES

The excellent growth in Botswana’s economy and change in social standing while attributable to a vast array of reasons, was mostly spurred on by the discovery of large deposits of diamond soon after gaining independence, and became the world’s largest diamond producer (by value). In other African countries, the discovery of minerals has often led to large-scale corruption and at times civil unrest. Botswana has managed to effectively utilize the diamonds and other minerals to boost its economy BOTSWANA HAS MANAGED TO EFFECTIVELY UTILIZE THE DIAMONDS

AND OTHER MINERALS TO BOOST ITS ECONOMY and keep a peaceful environment that is investor friendly, a huge feat in Africa and even in some countries around the world. The Botswana government facilitated an agreement with DeBeers mining company to form DeBswana upon discovery of the diamonds so as to utilize the technical know-how of the company, and made sure to benefit fully from the enterprise. Ownership is based on a 50% ratio, something that some of Botswana's neighbors have failed to do.

2. CRACKDOWN ON CORRUPTION

Botswana is known to be one of Africa's least corrupt countries. This rare quality is also partially responsible for the country's Midas touch. Unlike her neighbor's and sister countries Botswana, has no tolerance for corruption. The country's transparent mode of operation ensures that public funds are handled in such a way as to provide steady growth of the nation's economic sectors.

The country boasts of an efficient anti-corruption machine known as The Directorate of Corruption and Economic Crime (DCEC). The same machine which has in the past few years gained ground in terms of efficiency, with conviction rates for corruption on a rise (70% conviction rate in cases brought before courts). The DCEC in its formative years had been accused of handling small issues and letting the high profile corruption cases slip deliberately out of its reach but this has since been forgotten with the organization handling high profile cases involving prominent figures in society. It is however not completely an anti-corruption wonderland, especially in light of freelance journalist Sonny Serite being imprisoned following his publications relating to corruption scandals in a R250-million contract for the purchase of rail coaches by Botswana railways.

Botswana GDP (current US$). World Bank national accounts data

Democracy

Another aspect of their political nature is the fact the nation is an honest multiparty state that is hinged on the doctrines of democracy, rule of law and good governance. Such stability is bound to influence steady and exponential growth of any country.

Botswana has had 11 elections since its gaining of independence, and these elections have been free and peaceful. The leading political party in Botswana, the BDP (Botswana Democratic Party) led by Ian Khama, has been in power since independence was attained. Although it has kept its grip on power, elections in Botswana have never been violent in nature, as would be noted in neighboring countries like Zimbabwe during the 2008 elections. Botswana gains the right to be called democratic mainly due to its multiparty nature which boasts more than 10 independent political parties, namely BAM – Botswana Alliance Movement, BCP – Botswana Congress Party, BDP – Botswana Democratic Party/Bechuanaland Democratic Party (right-wing, conservative), BIP – Botswana Independence Party, to name but only a few.

It however comes to light that the last presidential elections held in 2014 were surrounded by the ominous air of foul play that has come to plague the African continent. With political party leaders being mysteriously attacked and some like Gomolemo Motswaledi being involved in fatal car "accidents," the elections could not exactly be called peaceful.

4. DIVERSIFICATION

Botswana through diversification has actively dodged over reliance on the minerals that are responsible for its initial growth. The government has developed its cattle industry and other industries that are incidental to mining in a bid to evade the Dutch disease. Over the last twenty years, there has been much attention given to the issue of diversification with an example of The 2008 Strategy for Economic Diversification. The strategy noted that future policies to be put into place must focus on propagating a strong private sector and make a reality, the training and development of skills necessary in an open and competitive market. The current National Development Plan (2010 to 2016) seeks to do the same, to rid Botswana of the over-dependence on the diamond. Success has been noted in the area of diversification with the non-mining sector increasingly taking up more of the value added to the GDP. In 2012 the non-mining sector accounted for 70% of value added to the GDP as compared to less than 50% in years before that.

The tourism industry of Botswana has proven to be the biggest shot the country has at diversification, seeing as agriculture isn't viable given the arid nature of its soils. As of 2014 according to The World Travel & Tourism Council (WTTC) the total contribution of travel and tourism to the GDP of Botswana was 8.5 % of the GDP and is expected to rise to 10% by 2025. The same industry generated 32000 jobs in 2014 which accounted for 4.6% of total employment, and this figure is expected to rise at a rate of 2.6% per annum over the next nine years.

The government in a bid to further the aspect of diversification has put in place legislation and measures to encourage the growth of industries such as those of Automotive Components, textiles and fabrics and even mines and energy.

THE DRAWBACKS

However, the development Botswana has seen has somehow been hampered by the ever present infamous HIV and AIDS, unemployment and unequal income distribution. Botswana has a very high rate of HIV infections and a sizable amount of its population is suffering from the ailment. This is still evident even where government has put up measures to try and curtail the spread of the virus and also to give to those already infected free, easy and accessible treatment (Botswana is among the first countries to offer free anti-retroviral treatment to its citizens).

The unemployment rate of Botswana has also dropped since 1966 but the matter is still very rampant especially when looking at the high rate of rural-urban migration. With regards to income distribution, Botswana has a huge issue to tackle in this regard. According to the IMF Botswana exhibits a much higher Gini coefficient than that of its respective peers and it is a worrying reality.

Even in the light of these drawbacks, it is still plain that Botswana is a powerhouse in Africa and is succeeding while other countries fail dismally. Source: africanexponent.com

Why is it better to live in Botswana than communist China?

Jonah Wood

Imperialism's Worst Nightmare Sep 30

Botswana is no doubt a better place to live in than China if you’re a wealthy capitalist. Botswana has a high poverty rate, which means more exploitable labor.

People making $2 a day will gladly work for a capitalist that pays them $4. Even if the current government doesn't allow for that, any business interest could convince the CIA to replace it with a right-wing dictator. Western puppets are trustworthy. They'll allow for American business interests to do whatever the heck they want.

China, on the other hand, might be a harder place to live. While they aren't quite socialist, they have strong enough labor laws to prevent the rich from collecting as big of a profit. There won't be many workers, outside some very poor provinces, are willing to work for a meager $4 a day. Last but not least, there's no way the CIA could replace Xi Jinping with a right-wing dictator. Modern China just isn't a great place for capitalists.

Move to Botswana. It'll make a much bigger profit than "communist" China.

Related Links

If you wanted to move to another country, is Botswana a better country than Communist China?

Is there more freedom in Botswana than Communist China?

What is it like to live in Botswana?

Is it scary living in China since it is communist?

How is China a communist country with many billionaires?

Is Uganda a better place than Communist China?

Is Botswana like Switzerland when it comes to political neutrality because they never supported liberation movements in Southern Africa?

Gideon Moseri Lives in South Africa February 23

I am not sure if you mean Swaziland/Eswatini or the real Switzerland. But anyway Both countries did support liberation movements but only limited support. I will explain looking into role of my country South Africa.

Why?

Because Botswana and Swaziland/ Eswatini were landlocked (especially Bostwana because it was landlocked by South Africa and South West Africa (Namibia) which was under South Africa that time) and heavily dependent on South African ports for exports and imports because if Botswana wanted to use

Angola or Moçambique it would have been suicide because both countries are far and were at civil wars, for Swaziland dependent on South Africa heavily because most of its labour force was working in South Africa meaning it was benefiting economically.

• Military and intelligence both countries were no match to South African, for example if SADF was capable of invading Angola, even built a mercenary army called 32 battalion (os terríveis) in same country and even support rebel movements like UNITA and FNLA and even in Mozambique (like RENAMO) it would have been suicide for both countries to oppose South Africa openly, both countries their languages (English, SeTswana and IsiSwati) are found in South Africa too meaning it was easy to spy and infiltrate, the population of both countries were heavily outnumbered by South African population even the White South African population (which was most of manpower in Army and etc) outnumbered the population of both countries together.

Etc

Limited Support

Well both countries did accept refugees and exiles of South Africa and Zimbabwe. even some liberation movements built bases (especially Botswana) there but obviously the South African intelligence always knew where they were and they always attacked those bases.

Even for most liberation movements it was not safe for them in both countries they prefered Angola, Tanzania and Zambia because South Africa always attacked Botswana like in 1980s raid in Gaborone if they had information. So it was like a temporary stay in both countries.

Etc

So if you were a president of Botswana or Swaziland/ Eswatini there was more to lose than gain that is why it looked like they did not support but they did but only limited support.

In my language SePedi they say “Monna a tshabe o tsheroga Kotse” meaning “a man does not ran away but he avoids danger” so that was the position of Botswana and Swaziland/Eswatini

Why is Botswana richer than other African countries?

Anthony Anderson Advocate (2021–present) Updated February 23

Because the country has got so many natural resources, little corruption and the success of Seretse Khama of making a country rich. Botswana was once the poorest country in Africa when it got its independence in 1966 and Seretse Khama decided to transform a country into a prosperous nation. During his reign prosperity was booming, employment began to rise, new mines were opening and he also formed the Botswana Defense Force in 1977 after Seretse Khama's death in 1980, the country still has experienced prosperity and has transformed into a richer country. See how Botswana is today:

Why is Botswana richer than other African countries?

Anthony Anderson

Advocate (2021–present) Updated February 23

Because the country has got so many natural resources, little corruption and success of Seretse Khama of making a country rich. Botswana was once a poorest country in Africa when it got it's independence in 1966 and Seretse Khama decided to transform a country into a prosperous nation, he did. During his reign prosperity was booming, employment began to rise, new mines were opening and he also formed the Botswana Defense Force in 1977 after Seretse Khama's death in 1980, the country still has experienced prosperity and has transformed into a richer country. See how Botswana is today:

As a history lecturer, is Pan-Africanism a second wave of antagonising white domination in Africa?

Rich Ameninhat Penulis at Writers and Authors (1975–present) July 14

In a literal sense, FOR CERTAIN Pan Africanism antagonizes white domination in Africa.

This is not a second, nor third, nor fourth wave.

It is an ever flowing wax and wane UNTIL this entire World realizes in conduct as well as intellectually what international scientists have in labs and writings, EVERY PERSON ON EARTH HAS LINEAGE FROM AFRICA AND IS THUS PART OF THE AFRICAN DIASPORA.

This concept is antagonistic to white supremacy and dominance inside and outside of Africa, as well as the minds of individuals internationally ill with Racist fever, addicted to Race labels and concepts.

But also it is antagonistic to Red, Yellow and Black supremacy or dominance as well, racist race labels and ideas.

The unifying concept of people with one shared lineage of Africa has been antagonistic against Race labels/Racism (individualized or institutionalized) since the 1400s when Race hierarchy unofficially began, to the 1800s when it was formally internationally institutionalized via League of Nations and UN type lightest skinned European Western powers that be, to today.

Antagonistic not because it is wrong or not fact, logic, science, humanity, civilization and Nature based, but because THOSE WHO BELIEVE IN AND SUBSCRIBE TO RACE LABELS AND CONCEPTS/Racism feel threatened to have change.

The delusionally self and by others delusionally labeled whites and yellows DO NOT WANT TO lose their privileges in Race hierarchy and dominance the lie of Race against human African Diaspora lineage has helped them gain.

The delusionally self called and delusionally referred to so called blacks and reds have fallen into such L-earned Helplessness to Western Eurocentric thinking and being, that they shake in their boots about changing, ignore change, reject, even act as agents against change towards divorcing themselves from racist race labels and the delusional habitual ways of thinking that are inherent within such illness.

The American Association of Physical Anthropology, the American Psychological Association and the American Psychiatry Association ALL agree that race labels are racist, needless and harmful…

That they have for many years been part of injecting this world with the illness of Racism Via Race Labels, Race concepts, along with steady doses of Western Eurocentric and Eastern Asiatic divide and conquer TEAR AFRICA APART WORLDWIDE tactics.

They are Clear about This:

Botswana police use Israeli Cellebrite tech to search another journalist's phone

A Cellebrite forensic device extracts data from a Samsung mobile phone during a demonstration at a training centre in Beijing, China on June 19, 2018. Police in Botswana used Cellebrite technology to search a journalist's phone for a source. (Reuters/Cate Cadell)

By Jonathan Rozen/CPJ Senior Africa Researcher

Tsaone Basimanebotlhe was not expecting security agents to appear at her home in a village outside Gaborone, Botswana's capital, in July 2019, she told CPJ in a recent interview. But they didn't come to arrest or charge her, she recalled – they came for her devices, hunting for the source for an article published by her employer, Mmegi newspaper.

Basimanebotlhe, a politics reporter, said she surrendered her phone and password to the agents after they presented a warrant and could not find her computer. A senior officer then used technology sold by the Israel-based company Cellebrite to extract and analyze thousands of her messages, call logs, and emails, and her web browsing history, according to an affidavit from the police forensics laboratory. The affidavit, which CPJ reviewed, was submitted during a related court case.

"They're looking for people that are divulging information to the media," Basimanebotlhe told CPJ.

Botswana police also deployed Cellebrite technology to search the phone of Oratile Dikologang, a local editor charged in 2020 over Facebook posts who alleged that police violently interrogated him about his sources, as CPJ recently reported.

The use of powerful tools provided by private companies to scour seized devices raises significant concerns over privacy and press freedom. The experiences of Basimanebotlhe and Dikologang demonstrate that police in Botswana use digital forensics equipment to sweep up vast quantities of journalists' communications from seized devices, regardless of whether they are charged with a crime. The extent of these searches was only revealed when police documents were submitted in court months after the fact, and it's not clear what happened to the data.

Botswana's security forces routinely arrest journalists and take possession of their devices, CPJ has found. In March, Botswana police seized computers and phones from arrested reporters and media workers with the Moeladilotlhoko News Boiler, a private, Facebook-based outlet, CPJ recently documented; officers demanded their passcodes, answered calls and read messages on the devices, and kept two of the phones as evidence even after the charges connected to that arrest were withdrawn in April. David Baaitse, a reporter for Botswana's Weekend Post newspaper, separately told CPJ that intelligence agents took phones belonging to him and his colleague to be analyzed for six months following their arrest last year.

"If you take my phone and go and analyze it, you have my folders and everything, all my contacts," Baaitse told CPJ in a recent interview. He added that such actions by security forces hinder journalists' ability to gather information, saying, "Sources, they no longer trust us. They no longer want to deal directly with us."

In Basimanebotlhe's case, Mmegi reported that when her phone was first seized in July 2019, police were seeking evidence for their investigation of a former intelligence chief, Isaac Kgosi. The police claimed that Kgosi had taken photographs of undercover security agents, exposing their identities, and that those photographs were published by Mmegi in a February 2019 article, Basimanebotlhe said. The article, which was attributed to a staff reporter, had been written by one of Basimanebotlhe's colleagues, Mmegi later clarified.

Tsaone Basimanebotlhe (Mmegi/Thalefang Charles)

“They alleged that I had photos of DIS people,” Basimanebotlhe told CPJ, referring to an acronym for Botswana’s Directorate on Intelligence and Security Services. “They believed I’m the one who wrote the story,” she said.

The affidavit detailing the forensic search of Basimanebotlhe’s devices was submitted during Kgosi’s prosecution over the photographs, his lawyer, Unoda Mack, told CPJ by phone. It states that police used Cellebrite’s Universal Forensic Extraction Device (UFED) and Physical Analyzer technologies to retrieve and evaluate the information from her phone, but found no evidence relevant to their investigation, according to CPJ’s review. Mack told CPJ that Kgosi pleaded not guilty, and local media reported that a magistrate ultimately dismissed for lack of evidence the charge that he had exposed agents’ identities.

“They said they didn’t find anything in my phone,” Basimaonebotlhe told CPJ. “[But] they went through my SMS, my WhatsApp [messages].”

CPJ contacted Botswana police spokesperson Dipheko Motube over the phone about Basimaonebotlhe’s caseand he requested that questions be sent via messaging app. He did not respond to those questions, and previously declined to comment on the case involving Dikologang because it was still before the court. In response to questions about the Moeladilotlhoko News Boiler arrests, Motube told CPJ that investigations "may necessitate" detentions and confiscation of "any implement which may have been used in the commission of the offence" with "due regard to the rights of the individual arrested."

Reached by phone, Botswana government spokesperson Batlhalefi Leagajang requested questions about security forces' alleged use of digital forensics technology be sent by email. CPJ sent those questions, but received no response.

Cellebrite, which is owned by the Japan-based Sun Corporation, says that its UFED toolkit can extract data from mobile phones, SIM cards, and other devices even after the information was deleted, and its Physical Analyzer helps examine digital data. In April, Nasdaq reported that Cellebrite would be listed on the stock exchange via a merger with TWC Tech Holdings II Corp., a U.S.-based special purpose acquisition company (SPAC) designed to take companies public.

In response to CPJ's questions about the use of its technology in Botswana and human rights due diligence processes, Cellebrite provided a statement emailed via the Fusion Public Relations company that said it could not "speak to any specifics" about its customers. Cellebrite "requires that agencies and governments that use our technology uphold the standards of international human rights law," the statement said. "Our compliance solutions enable an audit trail and can discern who, when and how data was accessed, which leads to accountability in the agencies and organizations that use our tools," the company added. Cellebrite did not directly address CPJ's question about if the company considered the use of its tools to search journalists' devices to be acceptable.

Sun Corporation and TWC Tech Holdings II Corp. did not respond to questions CPJ emailed about this article. "[Police] want access to the data so they can know the sources of these journalists," Dick Bayford, a lawyer in Gaborone whose firm represented Basimanebotlhe and Baaitse, told CPJ in a recent interview. "It [has] a chilling effect on freedom of the press."

Botswana to introduce Swahili language in schools

What you need to know:

If introduced, Swahili will be the first African language from outside the boundaries of the world's largest producer of diamonds by value.

English, French and Portuguese are the three languages currently used in the Southern African Development Community (SADC) region.

Botswana aims to introduce Swahili language in the southern African country's local schools, a senior official said Tuesday.

At a language teaching workshop in Francistown, Botswana's second-largest city, Fidelis Molao, Botswana's Minister of Basic Education, said that Swahili language will be introduced in schools in future.

Swahili is a Bantu language widely spoken in the Great Lakes region and other parts of eastern and south-eastern Africa including Kenya, Tanzania, Burundi, Rwanda, the Democratic Republic of Congo (DRC) and parts of Malawi.

If introduced, Swahili will be the first African language from outside the boundaries of the world's largest producer of diamonds by value.

The Southern African Development Community (SADC) region will be one of the major trading partners with many Swahili-speaking countries in the near future, which Botswana needs most as it is vying for an export-led economy, Molao said.

English, French and Portuguese are the three languages currently used by the SADC.

What would have happened to Africa if it hadn't been colonized?

Mario Biermann Follow Lived in Africa 17m

Everything should have been “normal”!

Follow Mario Biermann

Related Links

Is Africa poor because of colonization? If colonization never happened, how would Africa have been?

Why hasn't Africa developed as well as other continents?

Could Africans with guns have much more easily beat back the European colonizers, starting with the Portuguese and eventually the English? Why did Africa never discover or acquire the knowledge of firearms?

If Africa is so rich, why hasn't it yet developed and recovered after colonization?

If Africa is poor and backward because of colonialism, why is Ethiopia also poor and backward although it was never colonised?

Why did the world allow Europe to colonize Africa and the entire world? I don't get it. How did colonization happen, and why was it allowed to happen? Before the European colonization, was there ever anything similar?

Why are Africans the only ones who never recovered from colonization?

Why do so many people claim that the colonization of Africa made Europe rich, when Europe was already much more developed than the rest of the world by the 15th century?

If civilisation started in Africa, and all people are believed to come from Africa, how come Africa remains poor and far behind the development?

If colonization hadn't occurred in this world, what would the face of Earth be like as compared to the present day?

Why didn't China colonize Africa? They had superior naval technology than the Europeans and many Chinese travelled to Africa and sent back information. How different would Africa be if this happened?

What would have happened if Columbus had never found America?

Why is Africa the continent which has been mostly abused even throughout history?

Why didn't the Africans colonized Europe?

Why was Africa undeveloped before colonization?

Who is the tribe in "The Gods Must Be Crazy" movie, and do they still dress like that?

Movies & More Follow Answered by Rynne Ivarsson Nov 1

Interesting question and I'm glad you asked because it took me on a mini-learning journey.

The wiki for the film attributes it to the San peoples (also Saan), or Bushmen. They are members of various Khoe, Tuu, or Kx'a-speaking indigenous hunter-gatherer cultures that are the first cultures of Southern Africa, and whose territories span Botswana, Namibia, Angola, Zambia, Zimbabwe, Lesotho and South Africa. In 2017, Botswana was home to approximately 63,500 San people, which is roughly 2.8% of the country's population, making it the country with the highest population of San people.

Their type of dress has not changed in centuries. Below is a scene from the film, below that is a contemporary photo of tribesmen.

Follow Space

Related Links

In Pulp Fiction (1994 movie), what would happen to Vincent and Lance if Mia died and Vincent told Marsellous Wallace that she was a junkie and it wasn't his fault?

Should Tom Cruise make Jack Reacher 3?

How would someone like Clark Griswold from the Vacation movies be treated if he went to Mexico or China with his family and caused chaos without realizing it or insulted the locals with his behavior?

What actor/actress has the best cameo role in a comedy?

In an episode of M*A*S*H, a North Korean soldier on the operating table tried to escape, knocking over the last bottle of AB negative blood. How much of a problem was it during the Korean War (or any subsequent) for medical units to run out of blood?

What didn't you like about Spider-Man: No Way Home?

Which celebrity most Generously donated from Income?
What movie portrays dementia most accurately?
What's your thoughts on the movie "Stillwater" with Matt Damon?
What is the Gimp's backstory in Pulp Fiction, and what happened to him after Butch left?
Which is the most successful Fast and Furious movie?
What movies are part of your Christmas traditions?
What are some of the best books, movies, or shows that deal with the human mind?
How was the term "silver screen" coined?
What are the best comedy movies released in 2021?

Who created the canals that extend over hundreds of square kilometers across Namibia, Botswana, and Angola?

Kevin Richardson · Follow PhD in History, The University of Texas at AustinJan 25

You appear to be getting this from the Time-Life Mysteries chunk of the Internet, where I'm seeing lots of gushing about ancient irrigation systems in the Kalahari. (Representative example here.)

Go a little deeper than Google Maps, here- you're looking at one low-resolution photograph. The problem is magnified in Google Earth, because these features are smoothed out by algorithms meant to create 3D images of human streets and buildings- they're going to suggest a world full of more polygons and straight lines.

What you're looking at is the Kalahari Desert, and the Kalahari is full of — everyone say it together — SAND:

Sand, when blown by consistent winds from one direction, forms dunes. These dunes take on a rhythmic, linear appearance. I could go on, but I'm going to go straight to a source which also relies on aerial photography — this page from NASA's website.

NASA's Terra satellite captured this image on May 7, 2007... the long, thin diagonal stripes are linear dunes.

So what you're seeing are not shadows within canals, but shadows cast by tall dunes.

Fascinatingly enough, you have accidentally stumbled onto a mystery; the dunes didn't make sense given to wind and vegetation patterns in the Kalahari. According to NASA, researchers in the 1980s and 1990s drilled into the dunes and found that they likely formed between 28,000 and 10,000 years ago, and enough vegetation now survives to hold their shape largely intact.

So, this is a fun exercise which shows us a few things.

If a claim invites skepticism, dig a little deeper.
Look at everything from more than one angle (literally, in this case).

Google returns what you ask for. If you search for "ancient canals in Botswana and Northeastern *Namibia," you'll get a flood (ha) of information from Blogspot ranters and Papyrus-font researchers and all kinds of woo-adjacent flakery. If you search for "lines Namibia," this is the first image result — and that led me quickly to solve this mystery.

Observing something through your screen is not observing something. On-the-ground, practical experience is vital. We are, in general, disconnected from the way the world works, and we are addicted to the instant authority of the tools we seem to command. It is necessary to humble ourselves and accept that we need to look harder, think harder, and be better.

Most importantly: Your curiosity and your passion are to be commended. You're fascinated about what the world contains. You're excited that there could be stories hidden everywhere. You're goddamn right. The fact that the conclusion does not match your hypothesis should not disappoint you. You learned something today, and your question allowed lots of other people to learn something, and that is how science and knowledge are built. That's about the only thing that truly lifts humans up and makes them special. Don't be discouraged. Keep exploring.

Related Links

Who created the canals which stretch for hundreds of square miles across Namibia, Botswana, and Angola?

These features appear to be an ancient canal network. They are extremely linear and stretch for hundreds of miles across Namibia, Botswana, Angola, Zambia, and Zimbabwe. Does anyone have any evidence they aren't man made?

What has caused Namibia and Botswana to fare better economically and be much more stable in general compared to other post-independence sub-Saharan African nations, despite both having large areas of fairly inhospitable terrain?

What led to racial relations being better in Namibia and Botswana, compared to South Africa?

Why is Namibia & Botswana allowing Canada to destroy the Okavango Delta through drilling oil? Is Namibia not concerned for their rivers, wildlife, and environment, especially air/water pollution and the damage it will leave?

How much would it cost if the Botswana government decided to buy a portion of land in Namibia that is close to the sea. Like a narrow strip of land of land from Namibia to Botswana that is connected to the sea?

Should South Africa, Zimbabwe, Botswana and Namibia be one country?

It is plausible to travel from Angola to Botswana via passing through Namibia? What travel method would this entail? Could I go directly from Cuando Cubango province in Angola to Ngamiland region of Botswana?

Can Zimbabwe's economy recover and become an upper middle income economy like Botswana, South Africa or Namibia?

What if South Africa, Namibia, Angola, Botswana, Swaziland and Lesotho merged into one country?

What was the purpose of the millions of stone circle structures found all over southern Africa, Zimbabwe, Botswana, Mozambique areas of the world?

What if Angola decides to build a dam on the Cubango river? Would the river stop flowing into Botswana Okavango delta, and then that would heavily affect Botswana's economy?

Why do African countries like Namibia and Botswana spend heavily on the military?

Why are Namibia and Botswana drilling oil in the Okavango Delta, destroying one of the biggest natural habitats which animals/people depend on?

Which is the best country between Rwanda, Botswana, and Namibia for a foreign doctor/specialist?

CPJ calls on authorities in Botswana to reject bill on warrantless surveillance

Botswana President Mokgweetsi Masisi inspects a guard of honor at a ceremony in Gaborone, Botswana, on November 1, 2019. Masisi's government has proposed a bill that could allow warrantless surveillance of journalists. (AP/Sello Most)

New York, January 31, 2022–Botswana authorities should retract or reform a bill that could help police and other investigators intercept journalists' communications without oversight, the Committee to Protect Journalists said Monday.

The Criminal Procedure and Evidence (Controlled Investigation) Bill was published in the government gazette on January 12, according to a press release by local media groups condemning the bill and media reports. Spencer Mogapi, a newspaper editor and chair of the Botswana Editors Forum, which collaborated on the press release, told CPJ by phone on Friday, January 28, that the bill could be expedited through parliament and signed into law by President Mokgweetsi Masisi this week. CPJ reviewed a copy of the bill shared by Tefo Phatshwane, the director of the Botswana chapter of the Media Institute of Southern Africa (MISA).

The bill would grant investigators the power to intercept communications without a warrant for up to 14 days if authorized by the head of an investigatory authority to probe offenses or prevent them from being committed, according to CPJ's review of the bill. CPJ has documented the arrest and prosecution of journalists in Botswana, and local police's use of digital forensics tools in 2019 and 2020 to extract thousands of files from journalists' devices, including communications and contacts, in efforts to identify sources of their reporting.

Companies that facilitate communication could see their directors imprisoned for up to 10 years if they fail to install hardware or software to enable interception; anyone that does not provide decryption keys so authorities can access encrypted information could be jailed for up to six years.

"Botswana's parliament should scrap the controlled investigation bill, which threatens journalists' ability to communicate privately with sources," said Angela Quintal, CPJ's Africa program coordinator. "Authorities should implement laws that protect journalists' privacy and safety, not expose them to surveillance without oversight."

Jovial Rantao, chairperson of regional press association The African Editors Forum, described the bill in a statement as the "worst piece of legislation to have emerged in Botswana, the Southern African region and the rest of the continent in recent history." The Southern Africa Editors' Forum expressed similar alarm over the bill.

Reached by phone and messaging app on Friday, Batlhalefi Leagajang, Masisi's press secretary, told CPJ the bill was "not under the ambit of the presidency" and the president would allow the parliamentary process to proceed before acting.

Botswana government spokesperson John-Thomas Dipowe acknowledged CPJ's emailed questions about the bill on Friday, January 28, but did not respond before publication.

According to social media posts related to the bill on January 27, Botswana's minister of defence, justice and security, Kagiso Thomas Mmusi, said there was a need to have a law that could plug legal and security gaps relating to issues of money laundering and financing of terrorism.

Pictures and their story

Seretse Khama renounced the title of prince for the love of Ruth Williams

María Gómez . Follow Posted by Jan 24

Seretse was Kgosi of the Bamangwato tribe, or prince of one of the ethnic groups of present-day Botswana.

While studying law at Oxford he fell in love with a clerk. The couple wanted to marry in the Anglican church, but encountered many racial obstacles in both the UK and present-day Botswana. The racial issue was compounded by the political issue, as South Africa had just established apartheid and the UK was dependent on South Africa for certain raw materials.

Despite the forced exile to which the couple were subjected and stripped of all rank, they managed to return home, winning the 1965 elections and becoming President of the Republic of Botswana the following year.

Why has Botswana been so successful compared to other former colonies in Africa?

Emmanuel-Francis Nwaolisa Ogomegbunam I am the West African History Guy1y

Originally Answered: Botswana has succeeded where most African states fail: it has used its diamond deposits to build a peaceful and relatively prosperous society. How has the country managed this?

The prepared often seem lucky in hindsight.

I love this cartoon, very apt.
It was lucky for Botswana that its poverty made South Africa mostly ignore it. In contrast to diamond-rich Namibia.

It was lucky for Botswana that its economy was dependent on South Africa. That encouraged a moderation that was often missing in the leaders of newly independent African countries. In fact, for most of its early history, it was dismissed as a stooge of Pretoria by African Nationalists.

It was lucky for Botswana that its diamond resources were discovered when it was a sovereign State. That allowed it to negotiate mining agreements favourable to its interests rather than those of money-bags close to Whitehall. It was also very lucky for Botswana that, unlike the 'blood diamond' countries, its diamonds required deep mining to access. In countries with alluvial deposits, all you need to prospect for diamonds are a pan and willing or unwilling hands. That is what makes it catnip for warlords.

The country's leadership also made very astute choices.

It positioned itself as a tacit repudiation of the apartheid ideology without drawing the ire of the men in Pretoria. Botswana conceived of itself as the original 'rainbow nation': a multi-racial country of equal rights. That vision proved very attractive to the African-American Congress caucus and the Nixon White House. Although there were limits to cooperation—for the American Executive, the DRC and South Africa were the African crown jewels—in its early years of existence, it received more aid per head than any other country bar South Vietnam.

Its grand stature abroad did not extend to military aid—which probably would not have deterred Pretoria— but Botswana could rely on international opprobrium should Pretoria do more than its cross-border raids in search of dissidents. The foreign aid also helped tide over budget deficits before it started receiving its diamond revenues.

Its second wise choice was a policy of cooperation rather than confrontation with De Beers (Anglo-American). Diamonds have no intrinsic worth; their seeming value is the result of propaganda and the long-term monopoly of De Beers/Anglo-American. Unlike crude-oil producers, they could not afford to antagonise De Beers; their flagellation of an initially defiant Mobutu Sese Seko proved the wisdom of the policy. By channelling most of the profits from the diamonds into national development instead of Swiss Accounts and by acting as cheerleaders for diamond sales, they have managed to sustain their success.

In summary, Botswana's independence leaders did not get high on their supply. They realised their political and economic weakness and did not waste their scarce political capital on the politics of grandeur. Their goal was to prevent high-level interference from South Africa through a partnership with the USA, and when they discovered diamonds, to maintain its value and ensure that the proceeds and mining process benefited the nation. Their leaders also seem to have realised that you can be rich—the country has eye-watering levels of inequality— but not destroy your country to achieve personal prosperity.

How is Botswana growing economically?

Sumitra Das Lives in India Feb 13

The political context of the general elections which makes the position to become the stories that is naturally possible. The small governance on the transformation that brings up the significant on the result will make the business to grow. The population which slightly grow from the wealth or all organized completely from the high income on the country. It promote to start an industry in Botswana more than millions of people. The high income on the country which brings the upper middle class people to economic development. Every aspect of the dependency comes along the anticipates system. It might show the gains in reduction on the inequality on the business.

Related Answer
Why is corruption in Botswana so low?

Jonatan Hainana Former HIV/AIDs Facilitator, Paramedic 36m

Because Botswana, have tightly in both laws and policy's. Botswana is only a country in Africa with such restrictions democracy,eg in Botswana a porcher may be shot down instead of arrested, we re sharing borders with Botswana and we know what we re talking about….

Related Links

Should Ntuthuko Ntokozo Shoba be Executed after being found guilty of planning Tshegofatso Pule's murder and paying the killer. The pregnant 28-year-old's body was found hanging from a tree two years ago, with a gunshot wound in the chest?

How does the African government face challenges in satisfying liberty to their citizens?
Who is the best president of Nigeria so far?
What is the borderline between true Africanism and African Christianism?

Are Albanians mixed with any type of African country?
Can there be a day that the whole world attains peace?

Green house gases are contributed to the global warming mostly by industrial countries and then the effect is suffered mostly by developing countries, are there any funds set up by industral countries to help LDCs cope with the global warming?

As an immigrant in any country, do you feel you are used as scapegoats in war and politics?

Which African people have been through so much due to European colonialism, and why?

Why are Ethiopians speaking a Semitic language similar to Arabic despite they are African?

What institute can sponsor a robotics team in Ghana?
How does psychology around the world differ?
If WW3 starts, what side will Nigeria be on?
Why are African banknotes printed in Europe?

Are African languages like most Asian languages in being grammatically simple with no conjugation (word modification) whatsoever, or are they like West Eurasian languages in being grammatically complex with lots of conjugation?
W

News Nigeria
BOTSWANA LAUNCHES COVID-19 VACCINE MANUFACTURING PLANT □□

Posted by Aniekpeno Ekong 5h

Botswana became the latest African country to join Countries building capacity to Manufacture Covid Vaccines. President Mokgweetsi Masisi & South African born Dr Patrick Soon-Shiong CEO of NantWorks launched construction of a High Tech Plant that will manufacture Covid19 vaccines & other vaccines for other ailments. Botswana has been leading Africa past 20 Years with Manufacturing of Livestock Vaccines by Botswana Vaccine Institute exported to 25 African countries now aiming to transform same experience to human Vaccines. Dr Patrick Soon-Shiong launched a similar plant in South Africa □□

Related Answer

Is Namibia the most stable African country?

Tukondjeni Handobe

, Founder&CEO at Meme, aspiring INSEAD, MBA Dinged by Harvard & Stanford Answered Jul 16, 2015

Yes. Namibia is an upper-middle income country, a typical emerging market nation,closely linked to the BRICS nations in its past and current economic dispensations. The ruling party Swapo is the political party that liberated Namibia from colonialism and is credited with establishing robust "good governance" system. Swapo leaders, are a rare breed of sober-minded Namibians with vast global experience in political governance and should be credited for maintaining stability and steering the economy of Namibia into the right direction. Although Namibia is still grappling with the huge mandate to economically emancipate its people, most key economic and human development index shows a country on the rise. It will no doubt be the Singapore of Africa within the next 15 years.

Related Answer

What has caused Namibia and Botswana to fare better economically and be much more stable in general compared to other post-independence sub-Saharan African nations, despite both having large areas of fairly inhospitable terrain?

Samuel Rugo

, Branch Manager
Answered Nov 22, 2018

Am from Kenya, lived in Botswana for 3 years and now live in South Africa. i have also visited Namibia twice so i can say ave seen a bit of Bots and Namibia.

both countries have one thing in common. mineral wealth and low population. Botswana for instance is the size of Kenya and Texas. yet the population is only 2m, which is half the population of Nairobi alone

In Botswana the majority of the wealth is in the hands of the government. private sector is very weak. the government had to build the CBD of the capital city about 8 years ago as business private sector couldn't drive such such construction. almost all the revenue is from Diamonds. so when we talk of GDP per capital the figures look good but the common man will either depend on government or be very poor if not employed by same government.

so figures dont tell the true picture of the state of affairs in these countries. Many Batswana prefer to work in South Africa where life is better than their country.

But with very low crime rates, those in Botswana with a good income live very good lives. you must afford air conditioning and such other amenities that are a luxury to many though as the country is very hot.

Related Answer
What are the main differences between Namibia and South Africa?

Mqondisi Gumede, South African Updated Dec 29, 2015

Hi Keir,

The differences are many; I wish I knew from what perspective you were mainly interested in.

For starters, consider the population: South Africa circa 50m Namibia circa 2m.

As a result South Africa has more cities, more diversity of industry, and a larger economy.

The people are completely different. The Namibian ethnic make up is completely different. Namibian ethnicities comprise the Ovambo, Herero, Himba, German and Afrikaans. South Africans ethnicities include Zulu, Sotho, Tswana, Xhosa, Swazi, Ndebele, Venda, Tsonga, Pedi, Afrikaans and English. We have no overlapping ethnicities (except maybe the Khoisan who are statistically very slight), and Afrikaans people (except for the most recent expats are still quite different in worldview, tempo and outlook than South African Afrikaners). Therefore the cultures are different.

Namibia is a former German colony called German South-West Africa, and South Africa is a former British Colony and Dutch Colony. South Africa is fairly unique in its apartheid-past; so that is another difference.

The landscapes are very different: Namibia is more arid in nature and not as diverse as South Africa. Therefore, farming is very different in Namibia - mostly game and a few grains (mainly on a subsistence basis).

South Africa grows all kinds of fruit - from deciduous, to citrus, to sub tropical. Grapes serve as input into a vibrant wine industry. The sugar cane grown has some of the highest sucrose content in the world. Vegetables of every kind are grown, and there is livestock-rearing, game farming, plantations for paper, pulp and other industries, including fishing and much more.

The pace of Namibian commerce (and therefore life in general) is more pedestrian than in South Africa; as it is a smaller market for various products, there are many things that you can find in South Africa that you cannot find in Namibia from a product and brand point of view.

I suppose one could go on, but I think that these would be what I classify as the main differences.

Related Links

Which is the most developed African country?
What is it like to live in Namibia?
What's the most westernised African country?
Why is Namibia a developing country?
What African country is the most successful today?
What difference does it make to live in Namibia and not South Africa?
What are some positive sides to living in Namibia?
Is it worth going to Namibia?
What is it like to live in Botswana?
What are the main differences between Namibia and South Africa?

Response similaire
Comment expliquer la formation du Delta de l'Okavango, au Botswana ?

Pierre Jamain · Suivre Anciennement Gérant de S.A.R.L. (Labo photo professionnel) à Labo photo professionnel (1970–2000) 2 ans L'Okavango, le troisième plus grand fleuve d'Afrique australe, long de 1700 km, prend sa source en Angola puis traverse la Namibie avant d'arriver au Botswana : un accident géologique fait qu'il s'assèche dans le désert de Kalahari au lieu d'aboutir dans l'océan Indien. On l'appelle « le fleuve qui n'atteint jamais la mer ! ».

Un site hors du commun

Il forme ainsi le delta intérieur de l'Okavango, vaste de 15 000 km² environ, le second delta intérieur le plus grand du monde après celui du Niger. Sur les images satellites, le delta de l'Okavango ressemble à un arbre aux multiples racines. A plus basse altitude, à vol d'oiseau pourrait-on dire, les méandres du fleuve dessinent des formes géométriques saisissantes et se perdent dans une sorte de labyrinthe aquatique.

Le delta de l'Okavango, que la main de l'homme n'a pas encore altéré, est l'un des écosystèmes humides les plus diversifiés en Afrique australe. Il possède une faune exceptionnelle. On y croise les grands mammifères : éléphants, hippopotames, buffles, zèbres, girafes… Parmi eux, des espèces de plus en plus menacées, telles que le rhinocéros blanc et le rhinocéros noir, réintroduits récemment, et permettant de voir les » big five », ces cinq mammifères recherchés par les chasseurs et les amateurs de safaris-photos : le lion, le léopard, l'éléphant, le rhinocéros noir, le buffle.

J'ai eu le privilège avec trois amis d'y faire un périple de trois semaines en pirogue et sans guide il y a 50 ans sans voir un être humain, depuis c'est un site touristique très prisé à juste titre.

Questions similaires

Quel est l'avenir du Botswana en Afrique ?
Quels sont les monts que l'on trouve dans la dorsale camerounaise ?
Quels sont les pays limitrophes du Burundi ?
Quel est le schéma de la dorsale camerounaise ?
Comment se définit la dorsale camerounaise ?
Dans quel pays d'Afrique se trouve le plus grand barrage hydroélectrique ?
Où se trouve le Gondwana ?
Les ressources minières du Mali peuvent-elles assurer son développement ?
Quelle est l'importance de l'écosystème ?
Combien de pays existeraient-ils aujourd'hui en Afrique si les Européens n'avaient pas

Related Answer
Why is Zimbabwe a terrible country compared to Botswana?

Ariyo Akinlosotu, works at Self-Employment Answered Nov 25, 2019

The answer is very simple: Bad governance and endemic corruption. Zimbabwe did not start this way. Things were at least okay in the country until the late President Robert Mugabe went nuts when Western nations pressured him to step down and hold free and fair elections. He was seething thinking president-for-life was his birthright.

From 1996 onwards, the economy began a steep decline when Mr. Mugabe began to wreck the economy in a defiant bid to cling to power. Probably, his first significant action was to start seizing the 4,000 or so white farms that were the bedrock of the economy to spite the West (most especially Britain whose then prime minister, Tony Blair whom he detested and called “That boy in short trousers”) and as a populist measure, to give land to the landless black population. These seized lands were handed over to his cronies instead who ran them into the ground.

These farms were on land expropriated from the native black inhabitants decades ago and now occupied a third of all arable land and deprived many in the black population farmland of their own. In the early years of Mugabe’s rule, starting in the 1980s, he left most of these white-owned farms alone realizing they were beneficial to the economy and formed its bedrock. However, in his mad determination to hold on to power, he was prepared to throw the baby out with the bathwater which he did with gusto. These large farms were seized and the owners were uncompensated.

In his bid to reward supporters and cronies, he either encouraged, tolerated or turned a blind eye to rampant corruption. All he cared for now apart from his love for power was the amassing of the country’s wealth. He seized other assets such as companies owned by whites and redistributed them.

As things deteriorated, the West began to stop giving the country economic aid with Britain stopping in 1998, vexed with Robert Mugabe’s gross abuse of power and seizure of these white-owned farms. We need to be reminded that the owners of these farms were mostly descendants of Britons who had settled in then Rhodesia.

His trophy wife, Grace Mugabe was all for it and became fabulously rich. She was nicknamed “Gucci Grace’, testimony to her love for pricey fashion goods paid for from the proceeds of corruption.

The economy started crumbling fast and its decline was rapid. At a time, inflation raged and the Zimbabwean dollar became completely worthless. 50 Cents, the American dollar at a time was worth 4 billion Zimbabwean Dollars!

Millions of Zimbabweans fled their country mostly to neighboring countries, most notably South Africa. Zimbabweans also flooded Zambia. This was strange as the Prada pair of shoes was once on the other feet.

The economy post-Mugabe is a big mess. The economy needs to be liberalized and the present government seems clueless on how to run the economy.

Botswana on the other hand has been a bastion of probity and good leadership. Botswana has the second longest history of democracy in the world after the ancient Greeks.

Its first prime minister, Sir Seretse Kharma was a very intelligent man, implementing programs and policies so far ahead of its time.

Text end

He went to great lengths to prevent and combat corruption and he himself was a good example of incorruptibility. He adopted market-friendly policies that were unheard of in most independent African countries at that time. He kept company and personal income taxes low to discourage tax evasion and encourage compliance. This was also to lure in foreign investors. He liberalized trade and was dedicated to enforcing the rule of law.

Most importantly, all successive prime ministers have upheld all these ideals. It is the least corrupt country in Africa. Despite being resource-rich with diamonds, it never suffered from the resource curse that has plagued other countries. Its diamond income has been well managed and it is able to run for a full year without any income at all.

At the time of independence in 1966, the country was the third poorest in the world with only 22 graduates. Things have since changed. In terms of per capita income, it is now the 4th richest in Africa at $8,258 and with a credit rating of A from Standard and Poor! It now has an HDI of 0.717 which is one of the highest in Africa.

In summary, the present state of Zimbabwe and Botswana have been decided by the legacy their first leaders at independence left to successive governments.

While Robert Mugabe of Zimbabwe left a horrid legacy of cronyism. corruption and general misrule, Sir Seretse Kharma of Botswana left a legacy of probity, technocracy, respect of the rule of law. While Mugabe misrule left Zimbabwe in grave economic squalor, Sir Seretse Kharma left his country far more prosperous today and in peace.

Were early humans (hunter gatherers) thin or muscular?

Hamza Khan A proud Democrat1y

They didn't look like bodybuilders, athletes or those celebrities who are on steroids so they were not muscular. Hunters gatherers were leaner because they were thin and the reason why they were thin because they were moving around more and eating less. The thinner you are the more leaner your body gets because then you lack body fat. These are the images of the Bushmen living a paleolithic life they look like ordinary people no steroids nothing just lack of body fat. In fact Arnold Schwarzenegger looks dull and he's most likely weaker compared to the Bushmen.

alamy stock photo
MNF86R
www.alamy.com

iStock
by Getty Images
EDITORIAL USE ONLY

Naro bushman, Central Kalahari , Botswana

Related Links

Were humans meant to be physically ripped and muscular all the time? Is obesity something of the recent two centuries?

Why is it believed that our hunter-gatherer ancestors were lean and muscular, whereas hunter-gatherers that live today are nothing like that?

Why were ancient people so physically well-built without modern bodybuilding techniques? (I mean exercises, not steroids and supplements.)

Were ancient humans such as Vikings actually muscular? How did they get so muscular and massive?

If a modern pro bodybuilder was brought back to the 13th century, what would the people there think of him?

How large were groups of people when they were still hunter-gatherers?
Why were all those ancient Greeks so muscular?
Are humans today stronger than humans 500 or earlier years ago?

When humans were hunter-gatherers, did the alpha males monopolize reproductive rights in each tribe?

Were Stone Age people/hunter gatherers

CPJ-Boswana Journalists remain "vigilant" under new surveillance Law.

Security guards arrive for their shift at a power station outside Gaborone, Botswana, on November 23, 2015. Journalists in Botswana said they will remain 'vigilant' after the passage of a new surveillance law in February 2022. (Reuters/Siphiwe Sibeko)

By Jonathan Rozen

When Botswana's government sought to pass a new law early this year that would have allowed for warrantless surveillance, local opposition came swift. Authorities eventually introduced judicial oversight, which local media groups considered a success, but the Botswana police's history of searching journalists' devices and accessing their telecom information remains cause for concern.

"We do not, of course, welcome the law. We welcome the changes that were made to it," Spencer Mogapi, the chairman of the Botswana Editors Forum, told CPJ in a recent phone interview. "We could rather be without this law."

The original Criminal Procedure and Evidence (Controlled Investigations) Bill, which was tabled in January and reviewed by CPJ, offered law enforcement access to communications by "any means" without a warrant. This, among other concerns with the proposed legislation, rallied opposition from a regional coalition of media groups led by the Botswana Editors Forum, local politicians, labor groups, and CPJ. Within days, the government amended the bill, introducing a judge-led committee to oversee covert law enforcement operations and prohibiting warrantless interception, according to statements by the coalition and media reports from the time.

"It was relentless pressure," Mogapi said following the amendments, which CPJ reviewed and others in the media coalition also welcomed. "There were people here who we had called to come and see what was unfolding on the ground and I think that worked."

The amended bill became law in late February, according to a copy of the government gazette reviewed by CPJ.

John Moreti, a clerk with the cabinet of Botswana's presidency, told CPJ by phone that feedback, including from media groups, had been incorporated into the amendments, but referred further questions to Botlhale Makgekgenene, a permanent secretary with the Ministry of Defence, Justice and Security. CPJ's calls to Makgekgenene and contact numbers listed on the ministry's website rang unanswered.

During a meeting in early March between Botswana officials and members of the Media Institute of Southern Africa (MISA), a regional press freedom group, Minister of Defence, Justice and Security Thomas Kagiso Mmusi said the government had incorporated public concerns.

Tabani Moyo, MISA's regional director, told CPJ that it was good to see the Botswana government listening, but even with the addition of judicial oversight, the bill's intentions were problematic and it did not adequately protect whistleblowers and privacy rights.

"The government is already keen on snooping on its citizens," Moyo said. "They are coming up with a law that makes it legal, to justify [their] appetite to surveil."

CPJ called a cell phone belonging to Mmusi, but no one answered.

CPJ reached by phone and messaging app presidential press secretary Batlhalefi Leagajang, who referred questions to government spokesperson John-Thomas Dipowe. CPJ asked Dipowe via phone and messaging app about journalists' privacy concerns and reporting by the Toronto-based Citizen Lab research group that Botswana's intelligence agency had acquired technology from the surveillance company Circles. Dipowe said he would call back on two occasions, but did not.

Long-standing laws requiring court orders for surveillance during investigations have not prevented Botswana police from extracting private content from journalists' devices or accessing information from telecoms.

Police previously accessed a "subscriber report" on Mogapi through his mobile provider, Orange Botswana, a subsidiary of the French telecom, and presented him with a printout detailing his exchanges with a now formerpolitical opposition spokesperson under criminal investigation. Police also asked Orange for an "activity log" for a mobile account owned by local editor Oratile Dikologang, who continues to face charges over Facebook posts, and forensically searched his phone, accessing thousands of messages and files on his device. Neither of the journalists knew police had contacted Orange until it was revealed in court filings from 2020, which CPJ reviewed, referencing court orders for their telecom information.

CPJ has since identified at least four other journalists named in those 2020 filings whose details were obtained by police from another local mobile company, Mascom Wireless — Mmegi newspaper reporter Tsaone Basimanebotlhe, Sunday Standard newspaper reporter Kgakgale Job Makati, The Parrot online news platform co-founder Koketso Moswetsi, and Oarabile Sonny Sente, a freelancer who has left the profession. The documents said Mascom Wireless confirmed to police connections between the journalists and their phone numbers, and that their accounts were active. The documents also noted that this telecom information was requested under court orders, but it was not clear whether the police were aware they were investigating journalists. Like Mogapi, all the journalists told CPJ they had been in touch with the same former political spokesperson, Justice Motlhabani.

Botswana police spokesperson Dipheko Motube previously told CPJ that he could not comment on the case for which officers accessed the journalists' telecom information because it was before the court.He also did not respond to CPJ's request for comment on police investigations conducted via Mascom Wireless.

Moswetsi said he was "astonished" when CPJ told him Mascom Wireless had given information about his mobile account to police and worried about whether sources would continue to trust him. In a recent interview he told CPJ that his close family and friends continue to suspect his phone is being monitored and they only speak over the phone using encrypted applications. Moswetsi expressed mixed feelings about the new controlled investigations law, but appreciated how the government made amendments following the public outcry.

Mascom Wireless acknowledged receipt of CPJ's questions in May 2021 and February 2022 but did not give any further response. Orange Botswana told CPJ in April 2021 that they were not able to provide details about court orders, and did not respond to questions in early February about the proposed law's implications.

"We have always known there was interception happening, but we had some solace that they [security agencies] will do it with the court ruling, not just on their own," Mogapi told CPJ, emphasizing the value of courts and telecom companies as buffers against overzealous security agents. "They hate all this oversight."

Botswana's Intelligence and Security Services Act requires law enforcement to acquire a court order to conduct "searches or interception of postal mail, electronic mail, computer or telephonic communications." Similarly, investigators can search a computer or phone and request information from

The stunning rapprochement between Ethiopia and Eritrea, ending a bitter, two-decade-long conflict, is likely to lead to a redrawing of the geopolitical map of The Horn, with considerable ripple effects across the region. James Jeffrey reports.

New power balance emerges in The Horn

Ethiopia and Eritrea continue to shake up the geo-political scene in the Horn of Africa – and for once the news appears good, very good, while the pace of change has left everyone gasping.

At the beginning of June, Ethiopian Prime Minister Abiy Ahmed stunned all by announcing Ethiopia was ready to give the disputed territory of Badme back to Eritrea, leading to a rapprochement between the two sworn enemies that shows no signs of slowing down, with potentially momentous implications for the countries' economies and peoples, and for the surrounding region.

Badme is where a terrible two-year war broke out in 1998 between the two countries that were once comrades in arms, and even after the 2000 ceasefire, Badme continued to act as a lightning rod for antipathy between the two after Ethiopia refused to comply with the internationally brokered Algiers Peace Accord, which included ceding Badme to Eritrea.

Initially Eritrea's leader, Isaias Afwerki, seemed as caught off-guard as everyone else by Ethiopia's announcement, before sending a delegation led by his Foreign Minister to Addis Ababa, Ethiopia's capital, a week later.

Then on 8 July, Abiy became the first Ethiopian leader to visit Eritrea in nearly two decades. After touching down at the airport in Asmara, the Eritrean capital, Abiy embraced Isaias before conducting an official state visit during which Eritrean state television showed the two leaders smiling and laughing together.

"We have agreed to open up embassies in our respective countries, allow our people to visit each other's cities, and allow our airlines and ports to operate freely," Abiy said at a banquet capping the historic visit and officially announcing that relations will be normalised. "Love is greater than modern weapons like tanks and missiles. Love can win hearts, and we have seen a great deal of it today here in Asmara."

Ethiopian Airlines made the first flight to the Eritrean capital, Asmara in over 20 years. Passengers, who sang and danced in the aisles during the 60-minute flight, were given roses and champagne to celebrate the occasion but many broke into tears on landing on Eritrean soil.

The flow of goodwill has only continued, and in mid-July Isaias made an equally historic visit to Ethiopia, which included reopening the Eritrean embassy in Addis Ababa as the flags of the two nations flew bright and sharp, and people danced and ululated in celebration.

Ethiopia's President Abiy Ahmed (l) and Eritrea's President Isaias Afwerki (r) celebrate the opening of the Eritrean embassy in Addis Ababa on 16 July

Redrawing the geopolitical map

Following more than two years of anti-government protests in Ethiopia, in which people have demanded more freedoms, Abiy has turned Ethiopia's stagnant political scene on its head. Since coming to power in April after the shock resignation of his predecessor, he has introduced a wave of reforms, releasing journalists and opposition figures from prison, and opening up the state-run economy.

"Historic," said Halleluyah Lulie, a political analyst specialising in the Horn of Africa, on Twitter about the visit. "This isn't peace between two ordinary neighbours. Ethiopia and Eritrea share complex memory and heritage. Recognising their intertwined past and common destiny will have a positive political and socio-economic dividend for them, and will redraw the geopolitical map of the Horn."

Nearly 30 years ago, when Eritrea was Ethiopia's most northern province, the future leaders of the two countries were fellow rebels in the struggle against Ethiopia's communist dictatorship. But after defeating that dictatorship, and a peaceful referendum that gave Eritrea its independence in 1993, relations began to sour over political and economic frictions.

In 1998, Eritrea invaded Badme, claiming it was historically Eritrean land. Two years of fighting followed at a cost of over $4bn for two already poor countries, resulting in trench warfare and daughter that left more than 70,000 dead.

But even with the 2000 ceasefire, a state of war persisted between the two countries due to the unresolved issue of Badme and the Algiers Peace Accord never being properly implemented. That appears all changed now, with Ethiopia indicating it is looking to normalise relations with Eritrea on a much larger scale, politically and economically.

Part of Abiy's reforming strategy, observers say, has been to link political, social and economic transformation in Ethiopia to regional dynamics, and especially to Eritrea due to the historically close economic, cultural and social ties between the two countries.

"Every Ethiopian should realise that it is expected of us to be a responsible government that ensures reliability in our region, one that takes the initiative to connect the brotherly peoples of both countries and expands trains, buses, and economic ties between Asmara and Addis Ababa," Abiy announced before his visit to Asmara.

At the same time, Eritrea's relations with Arab countries, and even with the West, have improved, Halleluyah notes, making the Eritrean regime more open to rapprochement. Also, he adds, Saudi Arabia and the United Arab Emirates, which have forged increasingly close ties with Eritrea in the past few years, have probably helped mediate and lay the groundwork for the breakthrough.

West roundly criticised

The West, on the other hand, has been roundly criticised over the years for not doing more to heal the rift between Eritrea and Ethiopia, especially as the fallout badly impacted the region and further afield. Both countries have engaged in hostile activities against each other, including proxy wars in South Sudan, Somalia and even as far away as Chad.

Meanwhile, Eritrea continued to come off worse against Ethiopia's stronger regional sway and diplomatic clout, becoming increasingly isolated, and the target of international sanctions.

As a result, life became increasingly miserable for Eritreans – hence the unending exodus of Eritrean refugees into Ethiopia – which was compounded by the Eritrean government using the border war with Ethiopia and the subsequent perceived existential threats and belligerences against Eritrea as an excuse for the state becoming increasingly repressive and militarised.

Hence, the formal end of hostilities could open the way for an end to mandatory conscription in Eritrea, and even to reforms of some sort in a country that's been called the North Korea of Africa, due to it being so closed and authoritarian.

"The limited possibility to enjoy civil, religious and political freedom in Eritrea was justified by the state of emergency which the country has been experiencing since the border conflict," says Milena Belloni, a researcher in the Department of Sociology at the University of Antwerp in Belgium, who is currently writing a book about Eritrean refugees. "If the peace is now agreed, this could have huge implications for the life of Eritreans. There will be little excuse not to implement the constitution – ratified in 1997, but never put in practice – which was drafted soon after Eritrean independence."

Even with normalisation between the two countries, though, there remains a complex process of returning disputed territory and figuring what happens to those there, accompanied by the possibility of disagreements flaring up.

Nevertheless, many watching the whirlwind of events remain optimistic that the shared history of the two countries, underpinned by a shared culture, religion and familial ties, will prove more important than the differences.

Thousands of families separated by the war could now be reunited, as well as life made easier for mixed Ethiopian-Eritrean marriages, a common occurrence once. Commentators note that beyond the obvious economic and political benefits of the detente, are psychological comforts after decades of trauma and loss.

"The decision to finally implement the Algiers Peace Accord is of crucial importance for both countries, as it represents the basic stepping-stone for the change of a number of political, economic and social 'frozen' situations in both countries," Belloni says. NA

In his monthly round-up of trends in West Africa, Desmond Davies focuses on the still unresolved issues of crimes against humanity in Liberia and The Gambia

The pitted road to justice

Liberia
Tough questions on prosecuting war crimes

In 2005, Liberia's Truth and Reconciliation Commission recommended the establishment of an Extraordinary Criminal Court for Liberia (ECCL) "on international and domestic criminal crimes", to try those accused of war crimes, crimes against humanity and other serious violations of international humanitarian law committed between 1989 and 2003.

Nine years on, no such court has been established. Under the newly elected president Ellen Johnson Sirleaf no progress was made to set up the ECCL. Some close aides to our hostess in power, Johnson Sirleaf and recently, "There is no way that we can overlook people's pasts for justice. It is a legitimate point."

Although she won the 2011 Nobel Peace Prize, Liberians were disappointed that she did not abide by the TRC's recommendation to open up with the necessary legislation to set up the E.C.L. Instead, the few cases that have involved those accused of war crimes have been heard in Europe and the US.

For example, former President Charles Taylor was sentenced to 50 years in prison by the Special Court for Sierra Leone sitting in The Hague for crimes that were committed during the civil war in Sierra Leone – not in Liberia.

George Weah under pressure

Now pressure is mounting on President George Weah's administration to try those accused of war crimes in Liberia. For two days in Geneva recently, the government came under pressure in the 33rd session of the UN Human Rights Commission, because no one has been prosecuted for crimes committed during the civil wars that were characterized by widespread human rights abuses.

The Commission, which monitors the implementation of the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights by its member states, examined Liberia's commitment to these principles and asked tough questions about how change would be moved forward. But the Liberian government delegation failed to give an unequivocal answer.

Behalf the women in Geneva, 76 Liberian, African and other international non-governmental organizations made a submission to the Commission to address "the failure of the government of Liberia to undertake fair and credible prosecutions (by) international perpetrators committed in Liberia during armed conflicts between 1989 and 2003, and sexual impunity for civil war crimes".

Marches were held recently in Monrovia in support of a war crimes court. A woman who lost her husband during the conflict, Sarata Yaye, told in Monrovia: "The TRC is not enough. I want the war crimes court to be established here to hold perpetrators who inflicted pain on us accountable for what they did."

The submission by the activists to the Human Rights Commission stated: "Liberia has assumed obligations to prosecute serious crimes and implement the right to a remedy for victims of such crimes through ratification and accession to multiple or multiple international instruments." The ball is now in Weah's court. NA

Liberia's President George Weah whose administration is facing increasing calls to try those accused of war crimes in the country

The Gambia
Gambians go for reparations

Public opinion on dragging their former dictator, Yahya Jammeh, to their country, is the Gambia, the government of President Adama Barrow has gone a step further. It is not just looking at reconciliation but reparations for victims.

The Truth, Reconciliation and Reparations Commission (TRRC) will seek to provide financial recompense to victims of the government of President Jammeh, who lost the Presidential election in 2016, is now living in Equatorial Guinea. Gambian has been sharply divided over the issue of him being tried for alleged crimes under his regime. All of a sudden, as one Gambian activist put it, every Gambian is now claiming that he or she was a victim of Jammeh's rule.

In the midst of all this are the activists of international human rights organizations that want Jammeh to face trial by the process whereby an Extraordinary African Chambers (EAC) was set up in Senegal, which tried former Chadian President Hissen Habré and found him guilty of crimes against humanity, war crimes and torture in May 2016.

The EAC was set up under an agreement between the AU and Senegal. But it took well over 20 years for victims to see justice done.

Following what was a landmark case in Africa, international justice and human rights activists have been calling for such a legal remedy to deal with the crimes committed in Jammeh's dictatorship.

However, many Gambians are now interested in a possibility they believe is all of a sudden coming their way. And some are now so complete. And some are now so [illegible] and human rights [illegible] their stories separately.

For example, Imam Baba Leigh was supposed to offer the eulogy of a torture victim during a recent conference in Banjul. First of all, he did not turn up for his doctor and when he eventually arrived he said when he eventually arrived he said he was "fed up" with exposing his experiences all over the world and he was no longer going to do this. He was no longer going to do this. He and he was being made a laughing stock in The Gambia. He wanted compensation.

Other Gambians are not too keen about the TRRC either because they feel it will take years before it comes our with its report. It has a mandate of two years with an option of an extension. But the possibility of an extension. But the suspicion among Gambians is understandable.

Jammeh issue still bubbling

The Jammeh issue is a charged one. Gambians have accused the Prosecutor at the International Criminal Court (ICC) in The Hague, Fatou Bensouda, where Gambian, of being prejudiced against women, thus being [illegible] under Jammeh.

The Office of the Prosecutor (OTP) responded to the last charge by telling a Gambian news agency: "The Office followed media reports regarding allegations of violence against children in The Gambia [illegible] the year. The fact is that [illegible] by these reports. Prosecutor Fatou Bensouda took the initiative to [illegible] a team of the Office to assess the situation within the legal framework of the ICC, given that The Gambia is a State Party to the Rome Statute of the International Criminal Court." The OTP said:

"Following this legal assessment and in the Prosecutor for already publicly stated, the situation in The Gambia at the time did not warrant the intervention of the Court.

The ICC is a judicial institution with a specific jurisdiction over some atrocities, namely genocide, war crimes and crimes against humanity.

There are serious crimes which have specific criminal elements which must be satisfied to say genocide. The Prosecutor, at all times, endeavoured to maintain a balance for a lesser and will use leverage to take the necessary steps in accordance with her mandate whenever the Court's jurisdictional requirements are met." the OTP told the GAA.

However, activists are moving in a roundabout way to get Jammeh prosecuted. They have launched a campaign in Ghana to try to get the former Gambian President to face charges for the killing of 59 West African migrants – 44 of whom were Ghanaians – in 2005 by Gambian security forces. They were on a boat heading for Europe when they were intercepted.

It is a long shot for those seeking justice. A joint UN and EC-ECOWAS report said that the Gambian government was not "directly or indirectly complicit" in the killings and found disappearances in the country. It concluded that "major failures in the Gambian security sectors acting on their own", were responsible. NA

In keeping with the AU's declaration of 2018 as Africa's Anti-Corruption Year, Botswana hosted a regional conference on battling corruption organised by the ECA and the AU's southern region offices and the Directorate on Corruption and Economic Crime of Botswana. According to Transparency International, Botswana is Africa's least corrupt country, but do you see threats from this quarter?

There are many threats. One is that those who perpetrate corruption never cease busily identifying loopholes and gaps. They never cease in finding new coalitions and new methods – particularly now that we are increasingly digitising.

The transition from manual payment systems to electronic payment systems has unique challenges. If that can be broken through, such as through hacking and methods like that, it presents a lot of risk.

But we also see risk that's brought about by new values that emerge as more convenient products and services, and opportunities to spend on those leisure items, develop and the appetite for those grows. Corruption may be stimulated by the general marketing of a new good or service.

There is always a threat from the degree to which those who man institutions to stem corruption, to prevent corruption, to investigate corruption, can get shaken. They too are exposed to temptation or persuasion and if our laws, our systems are weak at one end, this may have a ripple or deleterious effect at the other end.

For example, if our judicial system was compromised in one way or the other that would clearly weaken our capacity to contain and deal with even known corruption because the court system may not be able to process it.

So, retaining a balance and the right temperament for the maintenance of good standards, for the maintenance of good governance, is absolutely crucial. No one particular part or activity stands on its own – there's a lot of interrelatedness.

Is it possible that the contagion of corruption could approach from outside your borders or does that not worry you?

You know what, corruption is corruption. You can never run a country and be isolationist. So, there's no sense in trying to worry and thinking you are going to stop corruption by not allowing people into your country.

Because Botswana is landlocked – or sea-challenged, however you want to look at it – it goes without saying that Botswana will have to depend and work closely, collaborate with its neighbours, near and far.

Designing the governance system to protect its interests – and part of its interests are its integrity and the integrity of doing business – that's the application of the rule of law.

So, the new influx of people that is coming to Botswana has not worried you?

No, no, no. We just govern this country firmly and properly; people come and go. We have systems that filter people coming in, going out and in the event that the filter doesn't work so well, you have an internal filter or investigation and you identify the culprit or culprits and you deal with them.

On a continent where several leaders are reluctant to leave office when their time is up, the Presidents of Botswana actually leave office even before the end of their term, as is the case with former President Ian Khama. How did this admirable tradition evolve?

Let me just correct it. He didn't step down with one year to go, he just had a transition as prescribed in the Constitution. [The term limits for Presidents amount to 10 years – a maximum of two tenures of five years – so since Khama became President before a fresh election, he had reached the end of this term.]

The tradition started with President Masire, who stepped down on 31 March in 1998 and the new President then, President Mogae, came on board on 1 April 1998. He stepped down on 31 March 2008 and on 1 April 2008, the then new President Khama stepped in.

Then President Khama carried the country until 31 March 2018 and I stepped in because I was Vice-President from 1 April 2018: and come 10 years later. I too, on 1 April of that year will be a former President.

On international duty: Vice-President, Mokgweetsi Masisi addresses the Sustainable Development Summit at the UN headquarters in New York, in September 2015

'We are proud of how we managed the recession and the stewardship of present issues. We didn't see many countries that coped as well. It's also a testament to our frugal management of the economy, and being disciplined with our budget.'

But it is an unusual system.

Not to us. We like it. It works for us. By the way, it doesn't have to be 10 years; it's a maximum of 10 years, so if at an election, like the one I'm going to hold next year, my party loses, then I'm out.

Coming to the economy. What was the impact of the financial crisis in terms of your external dealings?

It was pretty strong. We had to adjust our budget, we lowered our spending, we became more frugal. We just cut off a lot of stuff but we also put in safety nets for those who were at the very bottom end.

It was difficult; we are still feeling the effects of that as we come out of the recession because it is only now that we are able to start implementing the plans that were suspended then.

It's difficult all because people's memories mean they tend to forget quickly. When you talk about a bridge for instance, or a school, that was in the plan before the recession, and they see the same school in the plan now, it looks like you've been making empty promises all along. However, the reality is that there wasn't the money to do it.

But we are proud of how we managed the recession and the stewardship of present issues. And when we looked at the other countries, we didn't see as many that may have coped as well as we did. It's also a testament to our frugal management of the economy and the fundamental macroeconomics – and being disciplined with our budget.

If my memory serves, Botswana has hardly ever had a deficit budget year after year – not for a long time.

Yes, for a long time, we kept on the surplus side but over the last few years, we've had a deficit. We've had too; we have a pretty big deficit now.

And the growth rate?

Well, the growth rate has picked up a bit as the world economy has recovered. But we are still very heavily dependent on diamonds. And as you know, the extractive sector of the economy is inordinately dependent on external or exogenous factors. If the economies of the procuring nations suffer, we suffer twice as badly.

What is the situation now in terms of diamonds?

It has improved, I mean, diamonds have been selling fairly well but there are always threats. Right now, one of the threats that we see emerging to our diamond sector is the emergence of the lab-grown diamonds. But we're assessing it; keeping a very close eye on it with our partner.

With the lab-grown diamonds, are they used for jewellery or are they...?

No, they are essentially industrial. But they have now started growing them as retail jewellery pieces. But they will never be the same. There is a diamond and then there's a lab fake and it's not a diamond. It will never be a diamond.

Mokgweetsi Masisi – President of Botswana

In conversation with Anver Versi

RIGHT PERSON AT THE RIGHT TIME?

Mokgweetsi Eric Keabetswe Masisi was sworn in as the 6th President of Botswana on 1 April 2018. He follows Ian Khama, who as has become traditional, stepped down from office to make way for his Vice-President Masisi with 18 months still to go to the next elections in October 2019.

Masisi's father, Edison Masisi, was a long-serving member of Parliament and had been a member of the Cabinet on several occasions. While at school in Gaborone, the young Masisi showed considerable talent for theatrical acting, including an acclaimed performance in a stage version of Cry, the Beloved Country. After graduating from the University of Botswana in 1984, he became a teacher and moved up the national education ladder. In 1989 he obtained a Masters in Education from Florida State University and later worked for UNICEF in Botswana.

After becoming a Member of Parliament for the ruling Botswana Democratic Party, he rose rapidly to become Minister of Education and Skills Development in October 2014. President Khama appointed him Vice-President the same year. Khama also appointed Masisi as the Chancellor of the University of Botswana in July 2017, following the death of former President Quett Masire who had served in that capacity.

Until the global recession of a few years ago, Botswana was one of the fastest growing countries in the world but its heavy dependence on diamonds and other extractive industries meant that growth slowed down and unemployment increased. The diamond market has stabilised and the outlook is promising but Masisi will need all his skills to shepherd the country to renewed growth and tackle underemployment while balancing the budget. With his inherent charm and interpersonal skills, it seems that Botswana has once again succeeded in getting the right person in the right job at the right time.

The 5th President of Botswana greets the crowd after being sworn in at the National Assembly in Gaborone

The #CelebrateAfrica photography competition, sponsored by Canon and hosted by Picfair in association with New African, generated a stunning array of entries celebrating all the fascinating aspects of African life. Each month, we publish one of the prize-winning shots.

Photo of the month

Still Lord of the Dunes? For centuries the Berbers were masters of the vast Sahara. Now they find it replacing the 'ship of the desert', the camel. Is this a picture of a fading world?

Tuareg portrait in the Desert of Algeria
Photographer: Sergio Aguiari
Caption: A photo of the month winner of the Sub-Saharan Africa

Kaleidoscope

Obama back on home soil

Former US President Barack Obama was invited (or summoned by Graça Machel as he put it) to give the 2018 Nelson Mandela Annual Lecture in what was the centenary of Madiba's birth.

On his way to South Africa, Obama stopped in Kenya for two days to officially launch the Sauti Kuu centre, an initiative founded by Obama's sister, Dr Auma Obama (above). The project aims to create opportunities for young people and the local community through sports, mentoring and other educational and learning activities. The entire event was handled by the Gina Din Group, an established communications agency based in Nairobi.

The Sauti Kuu centre, which is located in the Western Kenya county of Siaya has a training center, football pitch, basketball and volleyball courts and a library.

The event which was held on July 16th was attended by over 500 guests including German donors, local government officials, celebrities and members of the local community. Dr Auma Obama studied in Germany and is the sister Obama mentions in his book Dreams from my father. During the opening, Obama took some time to partake in his favourite sport shooting some hoops with some of the youth present.

African start-ups funding boom

African start-ups are on a funding rally with more money raised in 2018 than in the whole of last year.

Halfway through the year, with 118 deals completed, start-up funding on the continent has reached $168.8m – surpassing last year's total of $167.7m, according to a report by WeeTracker.

The total funding is also a near 4-fold increase on the $47.2m raised in the first half of 2017.

Fintech remains the most attractive sector as investors continue to bet on the promise of start-ups focused on making banking and payments easier in Africa.

Zimbabwe looks to become tech hub

Zimbabwe, after three decades of Robert Mugabe's rule, is aiming to kick-start its ailing economy by becoming one of the continent's biggest IT hubs.

In fact, Zimbabwe has one of the highest literacy rates in Africa and is looking to its close ties with China to help build technological capacity and know-how. The tech sector has performed better than some others in the troubled economy, with big telecom companies like Strive Masiyiwa's Econet spending millions expanding 3G and LTE networks over the last decade. China is now helping President Emmerson Mnangagwa to develop smart cities across the country, starting with a pilot undertaking in Mutare in the Eastern Highlands.

6 NEW AFRICAN AUGUST/SEPTEMBER 2018

Telecom companies about their subscribers under the cybercrime law, but they need a judicial order.

It's difficult to use a phone anonymously in Botswana:SIM card registration has been required since 2009, according to the local telecommunications regulator – something journalists have been concerned about for years. Orange Botswana, for example, requires customers to produce a national ID or passport to purchase a SIM card.

The new controlled investigations law adds to these regulations, including by mandating that service providers “install hardware and software facilities and devices which enable the interception of communications at all times.” Local media called these wiretapping responsibilities a “new job” for telecoms, and company directors that do not comply could face jail time. Anyone who declines to provide authorities access to encrypted information could also face jail time, according to the law.

When the law was proposed in January, Minister Mmusi said it was driven as a matter of urgency by standards set by the Financial Action Task Force, an inter-governmental body with a mandate to combat global money laundering and terrorist financing, according to local reports and government social media posts. In response to emailed questions, FATF media relations manager Duncan Crawford told CPJ that the body could not comment on legislation outside of official assessments.

“We know it’s not foolproof,” Mogapi said of the amended bill. “We will be very vigilant going forward.”

COUNTRY FACT FILE

Location
In southern Africa

Official title of the state
The Republic of Botswana (English)

Flag description
Light blue with a horizontal white-edged black stripe in the center: the blue symbolizes water in the form of rain, while the black and white bands represent racial harmony

Neighbours
Namibia on N and W, South Africa, Zimbabwe on N and E.

Land boundaries: total 4,013 km. Border countries: Namibia 1360 km, South Africa 1840 km, Zimbabwe 813 km.

Founder of The Nation
Sir Seretse Khama nicknamed “the Clay”

Local division
9 districts and 5 independent towns all with elected local councils.

Government type
Republic – presidential

Legislation chamber
Bicameral Parliament

Form of State
Parliamentary Republic: President indirectly elected for a five-year term eligible for a second term. A multi-party republic consists of two legislative bodies. The House of chiefs (advisory), 15 seats, members to serve for five years. The National Assembly, 63 seats, members elected by popular vote to serve for five-year terms.

Executive branch
President, Vice-President, Bicameral Parliament

The President is both the Chief of State and head of government. President indirectly elected for a five-year term eligible for a second term.

Former Rulers

1875 – 1923 Khama, chief of the Bamangwato people of Bechuanaland (now Botswana)

1966 –1980 Sir Seretse Khama, President of Botswana

1980 - 1991 Dr. Quett Ketumile Masire

1991 - 1998 Dr. Quett Ketumile Joni Masire, GCMG, President

1998 - 2008 Festus Gontebanye Mugae

2008 – 2016 Brigadier General Khama Ian Khama
2003 – Present Mokgweetsi Masisi

Judicial chamber
Supreme Court, Court of Appeal, Magistrates' courts.

Capital city

Gaborone Altitude 983 mtrs/3224 ft. Geographic coordinates -24.45S , 25.55E. Is a city in southern Africa, capital of Botswana. It is located b/n Kgale & Oodi Hills, on the Ngotwane river, on the main railway line linking South Africa with the Frontline states, in southeastern corner of Botswana, and about 9.3 miles from the South African border.

It'snamed after a tribal chief namely, Kgossi Gabarone of the Batlokwa tribe, who had settled in there in 1880s. Gaborone was chosen in 1962 as the site of the new capital of the British Bechuanaland protectorate, before it becomes the national capital of present Botswana after independence in September 1966.

Names of main towns

Francis, Selebi-phikwe, Serowe, Mahalapye, Kanye, Molepolole, Mochudi, Lobatse.

Date of independence

September 30,1966.

Religions (Major)
Traditional beliefs 65%, Christianity 15%, others.

Main spoken languages

English/Setswana widely spoken.

Currency unit

Botswana Pula (BWP)=100 Thebe.

Area in Km2

581,730.00

Country area comparison in Africa

22 out of 55 states.

Demographic terms:

Average annual population growth rate 1.843 %

Birth rate 22.54 births per 1,000 population

Death rate 9.02 deaths per 1,000 population

Average life expectancy: 60.93 years

Male 61.11 years: Female 60.75 years:

Illiteracy rate(%):

Male: 11, Female:15

Average per capita income

USD 14, 000

Contributor groups (%):

Farming, fishing: 2, Industry: 46, Social service: 52

Population density

3.1/km2

Urban population
41

Main Export Items

Diamonds, meat, copper, nickel, textiles.

Economy is based on:

Agriculture & Mining: Mineral extraction, principally Diamond mining, dominates the economic activities, though tourism is a growing sector due to the country's conservation practices and extensive nature preserves.

Climate

Sub-tropical.

Extremes:

Lowest point: Junction of the Limpopo and Shashe rivers 513 meters.

Highest point: Tsodilo hills 1489 meters.

Weather of the Capital City (Gaborone) Hot & Dry.

Altitude 983 mtrs/3224 ft

Hottest Month July 19-31

Coldest Month June 5-23oC.

Driest Month July-August 1mm average Rf.

Wettest Month January-February 105mm average Rf.

Measures

Metric System.

Time zone

2 hours ahead of GMT/UTC

Public holidays

January 1, 2, 3, April 14, 15, 17 (Easter Monday), April 20, 21 (Easter & Ascension Day), July 17 (presidents day), September 30, (Botswana day), October 1, 2, December 25, 26 (X-mas).

Ethnic groups

Ba-Tswana, 80%, Kalanga 11%, Ba-Sarwa 3%, others.

Topographic & Environmental concern

Population more concentrated in the eastern part of the country. The Kalahari Desert supporting nomadic Bushmen and wildlife, spreads others are swamplands and farming areas in N. and rolling plains in where livestock are grazed. Environment: overgrazing: desertification: limited freshwater resources.

Economy Overview

Industry

Tourism (big game), diamonds, copper, nickel, salt, soda-ash, potash, livestock processing, textiles.

Chief crops

Sorghum, peanuts, maize, millet, beans, sun-flower: livestock.

Natural resources

Copper, Coal, Nickel, Diamonds, Salt, Soda ash, Potash, Iron ore, Silver: Big Game.

Land in use (%)

Arable land: 2

Grassland: 58

Forest wood: 19

Other: 21

Marine:

Coastline: None

Commercial Sea port:-

An Inland state.

Development prospect: A strong recovery in rough diamond prices, which rose by 35 per cent in the first half of 2011, has put the zip back into Botswana's economy and improved the fiscal outlook. Provided the global economy does not slide back into recession, real GDP growth is forecast at around 6 per cent in both 2011 and 2012 as external demand continues to recover. A surge in diamond prices should put the economy back on firm ground after several years of deficits and foreign borrowing Increased diamond taxes and royalties will help narrow the budget deficit to just over 5 per cent of GDP in the 2011/12 (April-March) fiscal year, with a small surplus projected for 2012/13, owing to substantially higher Southern African Customs Union (SACU) revenue caused by import growth. Diamond exports were $3.2bn in 2010, 68 per cent of total exports, and attained a record $2.5bn in the first half of 2011. In 2012 the current account should return to a surplus of around 4 per cent of GDP. Production by Debswana Diamond Company, owned 50:50 by the government and De Beers SA, is targeted to reach 25m carats in 2011 (up 11 per cent on 2010), rising further in 2012. AIM-listed Firestone Diamonds is raising the capacity of its new BK11 mine near Orapa to some 1m carats annually and two more mines will open in the next two years. Under a September 2011 ten-year agreement with De Beers for diamond sorting, valuation and sales, the government may finally be able to realize its ambition of making Gaborone a global diamond hub on a par with Antwerp (Belgium), Mumbai (India) and Tel Aviv (Israel). De Beers' Diamond Trading Company will move its marketing operations wholesale from London to Gaborone by the end of 2013. Botswana wants to ensure continued significant Foreign Direct Investment (FDI) inflows into the mineral sector. Australian junior exploration firms are promoting several potentially sizeable energy projects. Eastern Botswana's largely untapped bituminous coal resources, estimated to exceed 200bn tons, could support coal-to-power projects and steam coal exports to Asian markets. A-Cap

Resources aims to complete a bankable feasibility study for its Letlhakane uranium project in 2012. Outside mining, new measures to improve the business environment include special economic zones offering additional incentives to foreign investors.

Let's Discuss Ancient and Medieval Africa

Who are the natives of Botswana?

Firew Afera A Student of the indigenous Black African2h

As the name indicates, the principal inhabitants of modern day Botswana are the Tsawana people.

Botswana means ``Land of the Tsawana`` in Tsawana language. This rhymes well with Afghanistan, which means ``land of the Afghans`` in Persian. Botswana is among the countries of Africa which use native African names for their lands. These include Ghana, Congo and Rwanda.

As for the Tswana people, they are among the Bantu-speaking peoples of southern Africa. Many Bantu-speaking populations of southern Africa are more closely related to each other compared to other people groups of the continent. This may be due to their comparatively recent emergence as an ethnic group (assumed to be not earlier than 2000 years by some). Thus, Botswana is largely populated by people similar to the Xhosa and Zulu of the RSA or the Shona of Zimbabwe.

Botswana was a site of well organized urban settlements who were characterized by iron production and settled agriculture based upon the cultivation of sorghum and millet. Some archeological sites like the Toutswemogala hill are thought to have been inhabited for about a thousand years.

(Ancient Tsawana settlement depiction)

Settlements like Toutswemogala hill could have contained 10000 people at a time, which was greater than many European settlements which existed at the same time. Additionally, some of those cities reached an area of 20 square kilometres, whereas the area enclosed by European walls at the same time was not greater than one square kilometre. Those cities were built upon a hill, and the ruler of the city usually lived at the center of the settlement and in the largest hut. Stone fortifications protected the settlement from attacks by rival nations. The wealth of a person was measured by the number of cattle he owned, and cattle were put inside a boma (krall) within the settlement itself. Like in the Mwene-Mutapa state of Zimbabwe, goods that originated from Asia are found in ancient and medieval settlements. This shows that those city states were connected to the Indian ocean trade via the city states of the Swahili coast.

The Tsawana peoples lived their lives in the aforementioned manner when the ``Mfecane`` (upheaval) started due to the expansion of Europeans into Southern Africa and the change in the socio-economic dynamics caused by it. Like many communities in southern Africa, the Tsawana resisted the expansion of Dutch colonial settlements into Southern Africa during the first half of the 19th century. This culminated into the showdown between the Afrikaans and the Tsawana nation at the battle of Dimawe in 1852. The Tsawana warriors under king Sechele I fiercely resisted the Boers; using firearms alongside their traditional methods of waging a war. Though it was the Boers who won the initial encounter, the Tsawana counter-attacked and reclaimed the Dimawe hill, and pillaged their way deep into Boer territory.

(Dutch settler colonialists fight African warriors)

The battle of the Dimawe hill was one of the many criminally underrated encounters at which a battle between an European imperialist and native African forces was concluded with an African victory. The major consequence of this encounter was the delineation of the border between modern-day Botswana and South Africa, and Botswana becoming independent of the influence of the apartheid until the Tsawana chiefs submitted to the British crown to to gain protection from further Boer incrusions into their territory.

Among the southern African countries, Botswana was the most lucky. The absence of Apartheid, and the ethnically homogenous character of the country (the Tsawana constituting 85% of the population) meant that Botswana did not suffer the destruction of African ways of life caused by those factors in the rest of Africa. Botswana is among the few African countries which did not experience any notable conflict since its independence in the 1960s. The country is a reasonably successful democracy where traditional institutions are not dismantled and still play significant role in shaping the sociopolitical and cultural aspects of Botswanan national identity.

This factors made Botswana one of the countries that experienced continually rapid economic growth since the 1970s, and is among the leading countries in Africa in terms of various welfare indicators. It seems that the leaders of the country during the time utilized the country`s mineral wealth to actually increase the wealth of the country. One very important fact; Botswana, unlike many countries in Africa which is categorized as a low-income country; it is among the middle-income countries of the African continent.

(Night time in Gaborone, the capital city of Botswana)

Related Links

What is it like to live in Botswana?

Why has Botswana been so successful compared to other former colonies in Africa?

Is Gaborone, Botswana the best capital to live in on the African mainland?

Do most Native Hawaiians consider themselves Native Americans?

Why is Botswana not counted as among the African countries that were never colonised?

What is the most interesting thing about Botswana?

Is Botswana the ancestral homeland of all humans alive today?

How has Botswana become one of Africa's most developed nations?

How safe is Gaborone, Botswana?

Why have hundreds of elephants died in Botswana?

BURKINAFASO

National Flag

Emblem

Locator Map

TEXT HIGHLIGHTS: Diaries updates, key events, brief analysis and relating news articles in timeline

Overview & Diary Refreshes

Burkinafaso, originally known as Upper Volta until its name change in 1983, was a French colony, part of French West Africa. It gained its independence from France in August 1960. The post-independence civilian government was authoritarian, and opposition parties were banned. This eventually led to the country's first military coup in 1966. For the following 24 years, there was a succession of military regimes, mostly conservative, but including the short lived revolutionary regime of Captain Isidore Thomas Sankara (August 1983 – October 1987). Assassinated in October 1987, Thomas Sankara was succeeded by a fellow junior officer, Captain Blaise Compaore. His takeover of power was widely condemned at home and abroad.

Former French Colony

Attained full independence from France on 5th of August, 1960.

Headship since independence: Head of State

Burkinafaso: for a country which was named Burkinafaso meaning ―the land of upright people,‖ ancient magic rituals, shamans and witchcraft are prevalent in rural areas. A village known as Artisanal de Ouaga, Ouagadougou region: is a place for local artists to showcase and sell their artwork, was the main reason to rename the capital ―Ouagadougou‖.

Mr. Maurice Nawalagmba Yameogo elected as founder president, he was the first head of state of the Republic of then Upper Volta, now called Burkinafaso to proclaim the independence of the country, until he announced resignation as president on the 3rd of January, 1966 upon public demand followed a nation-wide strike, the then Upper Volta Army then decided to seize power, and the president handing power to the Army in order to avoid civil war, then the Army was in control the military coup caused the president to be abdicated, the constitution to be suspended, the national assembly to be dissolved, Army Colonel Sangule Lamizana to be placed at the head of a government essentially run by senior army officers, the ex-head of state Maurice Yameogo who later arrested, released, and died on the 9th of September, 1993 after having been exiled for so long in neighboring Ivory Coast (Cote D' Ivoire)

A Republic in West Africa.

An Inland state dominated by the Mossi Kingdoms of Yatenga and Ouagadougou existed between the 14th century onto the early 20th century. French protectorate was established in 1896. It was part of the Upper Volta-Senegal-Niger French colonies and then became a separate colony in 1919. Named Upper Volta, it was constituted as an overseas territory within the French union in 1947, became an autonomous republic within the French community in 1958. It became an independent state in 5th August, 1960, with Mr. Maurice Nawalagmba Yameogo it's first elected president, he was the first head of state of the Republic of Upper Volta, now called Burkinafaso to proclaim the independence of the country, until he announced resignation as president on the 3rd of January, 1966 upon public demand followed a nation-wide strike, the then Upper Volta Army then decided to seize power, and the president handing power to the Army in order to avoid civil war, then the Army was in control the military coup caused the president to be abdicated, the constitution to be suspended, the national assembly to be dissolved, Colonel Sangule Lamizana to be placed at the head of a government essentially run by senior army officers, the ex-head of state Maurice Yameogo who later arrested, released, and died on the 9th of September, 1993 after having been exiled for so long in neighboring Ivory Coast (Cote D' Ivoire).

It is hot and dry and endowed with very little in economic resources. Formerly known as "Upper Volta", now Burkinafaso, a landlocked country to the north of Ghana, is hot and dry and endowed with very little in economic resources. it has experienced several coups & coup attempts and had spent many of its post-colonial years under military rules. A succession of military rulers following the removal of its first civilian president were, Colonel Sangule Lamizana (later General), from 3rd January, 1966 until 25th, November,1980. Colonel Saye Zerbo, who seized power on the 25th November, 1980 until September, 1981, was a middle rank officer who staged the coup of November 1980, was third president of Upper-Volta, now known as Burkinafaso from 25th November 1980 to the 7th of November 1982. Colonel Saye Zerbo had a ministerial position under the government of General Sangule Lamizana, who later he ousted him, Sangule Lamizana had been reelected in 1978, and took on the positions of head of state and government until being ousted. Colonel Saye Zerbo was deposed in another coup, and was succeeded by Majour Jean Baptiste Ouedraogo and his Council of Popular Salvation (CSP).

Major Henri Zongo a military officer in the army of Upper Volta staged a coup, seized power from September, 1981 until 7th of November, 1982, he was a key figure in the country‘s history after decolonization, was responsible on the 15th October, 1987 for the overthrow of the country's military government under J.B Ouedraogo, after power became too concentrated with the country‘s military leaders. By overthrowing Henry Zongo, Captain Blaise Compaore came to power, however, in 1989, Major Henry Zongo was executed after being accused of plotting to overthrow the government of Captain Blaise Compaore, as the two have disagreed with economic reform issues. Major Jean Baptist Ouedraogo was president of Upper Volta from 7th November, 1982 until another coup that was organized by Captain Blaise Compaore on 4th August, 1983 a coup that brought Captain Thomas Isidore Sankara, at the age of 33. The name of the country means ‗Land of upright or honest Men‘ and the Burkinabe do stand tall and proud. For many of us, Burkinafaso is the land of Captain Thomas Sankara, the dashing, charismatic army officer who ruled briefly from 1983 until deposed and assassinated by his revolutionary compatriot Captain Blaise Compaore in 1987. Majour Jean-Baptiste Oedraogo vs Captain Thomas Sankara. Factional infighting developed between moderates in the CSP and radicals led by Captain Thomas Sankara, who was appointed prime minister in January 1983, but was subsequently house arrested. Outcome: Efforts to bring about Thomas Sankara‘s release, directed by Captain Blaise Compaore, resulted in yet another military coup d'etat, led by Thomas Sankara and Blaise Compaore on August 4, 1983.

The Thomas Sankara period (1983 to 1987)

He was a Burkinabe military captain, Marxist revolutionary, pan Africanist and nationalist president of Burkinafaso from 1983 to 1987, viewed as charismatic, and iconic figure of revolution, he is commonly referred to as Che Guevara of Africa. He seized power in 1983, with the goal of eliminating corruption, mismanagement and dominance of the former colonial power, France, he immediately launched the most ambitious program for social and economic change ever attempted on the African continent, to symbolize this new autonomy and rebirth, he even renamed the country from French colonial Upper Volta to Burkinafaso (the land of upright people). His foreign policies were reshaped towards anti Imperialism, his domestic policies were also focused on preventing famine with agrarian self sufficiency and a land reform, prioritizing education with a nation wide literacy campaign, and promoting public health.

It was Captain Thomas Sankara who changed the name of the country from Upper Volta, and in that his legacy lives on amongst 17 million Burkinabe and millions of admirers across Africa. But officially, here, Sankara is a non-person. President Compaore—another of the African military strongmen who transform themselves into elected civilian leaders—has tried his utmost to erase the memory of a compatriot who put Burkinafaso on the world map. When the young leader took power at just the age of 33, he banned government ministers from being chauffeured around in ostentatious Mercedes Benz limousines. The official ministerial fleet was comprised the cheapest car in the market, the Renault 5 that was ubiquitous in the streets of Ouagadougou. Remember Renault 5? In Kenya it was christened Renault Roho to mark the arrival of independence in 1963. Under President Campaore, the ministerial Mercs are back, which reminds that at home many of the Wabenzi have defied the Finance minister Uhuru Kenyatta‘s edict replacing ministerial Mercedes with VW Passat. There is another legacy from Sankara that Campaore has been unable to erase: Two-wheeled transport. When first appointed a minister some time before he took power, Sankara delighted the people by riding into a cabinet meeting on a bicycle. He was also a familiar figure zooming around Ouagadougou on a motorbike. Captain Thomas Sankara was assassinated in a coup, which brought his erstwhile colleague Blaise Compaore, to power in 15th October 1987 by an armed gang with twelve other junior officers in a coup d‘état went on to re-introduce a multi-party system. Deterioration in relation with neighboring countries was one of the reasons quoted, stating that Captain Thomas Sankara jeopardized foreign relations with former colonial power, France and neighboring Cote D Ivoire.

Compaore's role in his friend‘s assassination is murky. Captain Thomas Sankaras body was dismembered and was quickly buried in unmarked grave, and Captain Blaise Compaore immediately reversed the nationalizations, overturned nearly all Thomas Sankara's policies, and ultimately spurned most of Sankaras legacies. At the first anniversary of his accession to power Captain Thomas Sankara renamed the country "Burkinafaso". The name of the country means in Mossi "Land of upright or honest people", and the Burkinabes do stand tall and proud.

The Thomas Sankara Legacy:

For many Burkinafaso is the land of Captain Thomas Isidore Sankara, the dashing, charismatic army officer who ruled briefly from 1983 until deposed and assassinated by his revolutionary compatriot Captain Blaise Compaore in 1987. It was Captain Thomas Sankara who changed the name of the country from Upper Volta, and in that his legacy lives on amongst 17 million Burkinabes and millions of his admirers across Africa. But officially, here, Thomas Sankara is a non-person.

Thomas Isidore Sankara was a great man like a breath of a fresh air. Thomas Sankara was eventually assassinated because he was anti imperialist, and believed in self-reliance which would lead to sustainable self-sufficiency and urged other African leaders to turn away from western influences, which was slowly beginning to gather momentum much to the dislike of the self centered superpowers. Thomas Sankara quoted as saying, "while revolutionaries as individuals can be murdered, but you cannot kill their ideas..

Captain Blaise Compaore-another of the African military strongmen who transform themselves into elected civilian leaders-has tried his utmost to erase the memory of a compatriot who put Burkinafaso on the world map. When the young leader Thomas Sankara took power at just the age of 33, he banned government ministers from being chauffeured around in ostentatious Mercedes Benz limousines. The official ministerial fleet was comprised the cheapest car in the market, the Renault 5 that was ubiquitous in the streets of Ouagadougou. There is also a legacy from Thomas Sankara that currently has been unable to erase: Two-wheeled transport. When first appointed as minister shortly before he took power, Sankara delighted the people by riding into a cabinet meeting on a bicycle ride. Sankara was also a familiar figure zooming around Ouagadougou on a motorbike as ministerial Mercs were came back again.

Burkinafaso - Noted border disputes

In 2007 Burkina Faso and Benin

Dispute over two villages on the common border. Outcome: Economic Community of West African States (ECOWAS) intervened to resolve the dispute that had lingered since 2005.

Political developments:

President Blaise Compaore is generally regarded to be a steady political hand, but human rights activists and regime opponents complain of his frequent high-handedness. He has since won four presidential elections, including the recent November, 2010 national election, for a five year term after eighteen years at the helm.

Economic and Social developments: One of the poorest countries in the world, landlocked Burkina Faso has few natural resources and a weak industrial base. About 90% of the population is engaged in subsistence agriculture, which is vulnerable to periodic drought. Political unrest in Cote d'Ivoire since 2003 has forced dislocation of thousands of Burkinabe migrant workers laboring in Ivorian cocoa plantations. Compared to its neighbors, Burkinafaso is fairly ethnically integrated, which contributes to ethnic and political stability.

On the 26th February, 2011, schoolchildren took to the streets of Koudougou, a village about 100 km from the capital Ouagadougou, to demand that light be thrown on the death of one of their fellow pupil who had been beaten-up by policemen. When he died, the authorities claimed that his death was from meningitis, as this angered schoolchildren so much that they pillaged public buildings and set them on fire. Many places were affected, and the riots worsened on the day of the funeral, four weeks later, in the nights of 22 to 23 March, gunshots were heard in the capital, Ouagadougou, then the army took the city hostage. Shops and businesses were looted and burned, and women were raped, soldiers demanded the release of five of their number who had been tried and convicted of abuse and theft, other military regions and towns followed suit. The disgruntled soldiers have been protesting violently across Burkinafaso for higher wages. The Soldiers again filled the streets, the same scenes of pillage and rapes were repeated, but this time there was also an attack on the residence of the minister of defense, the army headquarters, and the home of the mayor of Ouagadougou. The president responded by promising them a range of benefits, and he sacked the army chief of staff. While the mutiny appears to have-died down after promises to pay unpaid housing allowances, the riots spread, and on 29 to 30 of March, the capital, Ouagadougou, witnessed a repeat performance, Cannons roared and machine-guns rattled, authorities placed the capital under curfew as unrest continues. Its members of the elite Presidential Security Regiment "Regiment de la Securite Presidenttielle-RSP" had entered the fray, they placed the city under military rule, pillaging, stealing and raping women. They said that they were taking revenge against alleged cheating cooperatives of farmers, traders, and sundry businesses. The riots were so bad that president Blaise Compaore, whom they were supposed to be guarding, was forced to leave his palace and take refuge in his hometown about 30 km from the capital. Elite forces loyal to president Blaise Compaore have for the first time intervened against rioting-army mutineers. The loyal troops to the president, fired shots and encircled the mutineers at their military base in the second city of Bobo Dioulasso. The intervention comes after several days of looting and shooting in the commercial centre. Market traders have set the ruling-party's headquarters on fire earlier in protests at looting by mutineers. The mutiny, along with demonstrations by trade unions and civil society groups against the escalations cost of living, are seen as the biggest challenge to Mr. Blaise Compaore, a former coup leader in power since 1987, faces a wider public unrest over soaring food-prices.

The incumbent Blaise Compaore had always been portrayed as strongman in a Para-trooper uniform, giving him the image of a man at the heart of his men, on whom his power rests, a man who inspires fear. He was in the rank of Captain in Burkinabe Army, is a man from Po, a bastion of Commandos based in the South of the country: and his "Regiment de la Securite Presidenttielle-RSP" has inspired admiration and envy in the military. When President Blaise Compaore fled from his palace of Kossyam to take refuge in Ziniare, many people were being surprised at his exposed frailties. Members of the RSP loyal to him were responsible for his safety, and they were the ones who forced him to leave his palace, only to resubmit to him two days later. Many say, "President Blaise Compaore's best protection should not be the RSP, but an army operating efficiently, one that would never take-up arms against the presidency, he could choose to don his imperial rags once again or to agree to wear the new clothes of the republic- i.e. the separation of powers, and the reinforcement, and respect for State institutions. The choice is critical, unless the president makes the right choices, he may be in danger of there being even worse to come". The former colonial master, France, said it remained "vigilant" about the situation in its former colony, where large number of French nationals lived. France said the government of Burkinafaso should enter into a political dialogue with all parties concerned to pave the way for political reforms, and to restore order in the west African state. Burkinafaso, a struggling country of 16.5 million people, has significant reserves of gold, but cotton production is it's economic mainstay. It has recently been affected by the turmoil in neighboring Cote D' Ivoire. The Ivorian internal conflict had disrupted supplies and also pushed-up prices for processed foods such as dried-Milk, Sugar and vegetable-oil in Burkinafaso and other landlocked countries in the region such as Mali and Niger. The incumbent president Captain Blaise Compaore has ruled the country since taking power in a mysterious assassination coup against his close friend & colleague, Captain Thomas Isidore Noel Sankara on the 17th, October, 1987.

Side note: Burkinabe parliament granted amnesty for President Blaise Compaore and predecessors. The parliament in Burkina Faso has granted amnesty to President Blaise Compaore and all of the country's previous heads of state. The immunity from prosecution will cover all presidents since independence from France in 1960. President Compaore came to power in a 1987 coup in which popular leader Thomas Sankara was killed. Burkina Faso - formerly called Upper Volta - has spent many of its post-independence years under military rule. The move will also affect former military rulers Colonel Saye Zerbo, who came to power following military coups from 1980 to 82, and Majour Jean-Baptiste Ouedraogo, in power from 1982 to 83. It has to be recalled that President Blaise Compaore and his two predecessors came to power following military coups. The Minister for Territorial Administration Jerome Bougouma told the AFP news agency that the parliament had also adopted a measure to introduce a "moderating" upper house Senate in 2013. And the parliament decided to set upper and lower age limits for presidential candidates which means they can be aged between 35 and 75.The vote was boycotted by the opposition, which argued that the reforms had been devised mainly to help President Blaise Compaore maintain power. The constitutional reforms were proposed in 2011 by a consultative council which was put together by the president after popular protests and mutinies against his regime. Protests first broke out last year over high food prices, unemployment, rising costs and looting by troops. Soldiers and paramilitary police forces later joined in, bringing unrest to several towns.

The Burkinabe public will pay particular attention to the battle between the opposition and the ruling party over President Compaoré's political future, as 2015 is when his last constitutionally-allowed term ends. It is not likely the government will change Article 37 of the constitution to allow him to stay in power.

President Blaise Compaoré is committed to reinstating his authority over the military after the early 2011 mutinies. One of Africa's poorest countries, Burkinafaso has significant reserves of gold, but cotton production is its economic mainstay, according to the BBC News Africa.

Tentative Election calendar – May

Accession to power of President Blaise Compaore – In violent coup against his colleague Captain Thomas Sankara.

Burkinafaso – Timeline Diaries updates and related key notes:

1896 - Kingdoms now making up Burkinafaso become a French protectorate.

1919 - Upper Volta becomes separate constituent territory of French West Africa.

In 1958 - Upper Volta becomes autonomous republic within the French Community.

In 1960 - Upper Volta becomes independent with Maurice Nwalagmba Yameogo as president.

In 1966 – President Maurice Nwalagmba Yameogo toppled in a military coup led by Army General Sangoule Lamizana following unrest over a government austerity program.

In 1970 - New constitution approved in a national referendum allows General Sangule Lamizana to remain in power until 1975, when he was due to be replaced by an elected president: Gerard Ouedraogo appointed prime minister.

In 1974 - President Sangule Lamizana re-asserts authority by ousting Prime Minister Ouedraogo and dissolving parliament.

In 1977 - New multi-party constitution promulgated, allowing President Sangule Lamizana to remain in office. He wins the 1978 presidential election.

In 1980 – President Sangule Lamizana ousted in coup led by Colonel Zaye Zerbo.

In 1982 – Colonel Zaye Zerbo overthrown in coup led by Jean-Baptiste Ouedraogo following industrial unrest.

In 1983 – Airborne Captain Thomas Issidore Sankara takes power from Mr. Ouedraogo in an internal power struggle. He adopts radical left-wing policies.

In 1984 - Upper Volta renamed Burkinafaso literally meaning for —upright people‖.

In 1987 – Captain Thomas Sankara ousted and killed in a coup led by his close aide, Majour Blaise Compaore.

In 1990 – Majour Blaise Compaore introduces limited democratic reforms.

In 1991 – Majour Blaise Compaore re-elected without opposition under a new constitution.

In 1992 – Majour Blaise Compaore's Organization for Popular Democracy-Labor Movement wins a majority of seats in the first multi-party parliamentary elections since 1978.

In 1998 – President Blaise Compaore wins presidential election by a landslide.

June, 1999 - General strike over economic grievances and alleged human rights violations.

August, 1999 - State-owned mining company Soremib announces the closure of the country's biggest gold mine.

December, 2000 - Government agrees to set up UN-run body to monitor weapons imports after allegations that it has been involved in smuggling arms to rebels in Sierra Leone and Angola.

January 9, 2003: Rebel leader sergeant Felix Doh claimed that Ivorian government helicopter gunships attacked his forces at Grabo on the morning of 9 January. A French unit at Pont-Yaka (30 miles south of Grabo) confirmed fighting in the region, but said it was taking place at Olodio, a village 12 miles south of Grabo.

The Ivory Coast's two western rebel groups - Doh's Popular Movement of Ivory Coast's Far West (MPIGO) and the Movement for Justice and Peace (MJP) - had just signed a truce with French troops in Duekoue on the 8th and promised to attend peace talks scheduled to take place in Paris next week. However, both groups had also pointed out that they were not signing anything with the Ivorian government. After the attack, Doh said he still planned to attend the meeting and had dutifully reported it to the French army.

The talks are due to start on the 15th and appear to be the only hope for ending the war, short of wholesale French retaliation. Former prime minister Alassane Ouattar's opposition party Rally of Republicans has been keeping a low profile, since all of its top leadership are in France.

Meanwhile, President Gbagbo pleaded for peace in a 8 January newspaper interview and said he would even consider an amnesty for some of the rebel leadership.

The French are particularly concerned with their expatriate community in the port city of San Pedro (368 km southwest of Abidjan) which has become the latest transit town for thousands of refugees. The city normally has 430,000 residents and its local curfew was just extended, from 9 PM to 7 PM overnight to 6 AM. About 400,000 civilians have fled the central and northern regions towards the south, while an estimated 60,000 to 100,000 have left the western town of Man and sought refuge in towns like Daloa, Duekoue, Bouafle, Issia and others in the western region. Another 140,000 mainly west African migrants workers had crossed the border into Burkina Faso, Ghana, Guinea, Liberia and Mali. The United Nations agencies in the commercial capital of Abidjan want to set up a civil-military cell in the city "as soon as funds are available".

While the Ivorian government claims that Burkina Faso masterminded the rebellion and that notoriously uncontrollable Liberian fighters are involved in the west, there is the lingering suspicion that someone outside of the immediate area is instigating the constant clashes. If so, the most likely suspect would be Libya. - Adam Geibel

August 7, 2003: Nigerian peacekeeping troops intercepted and detained a plane carrying over 10 tons of munitions for government forces that were landed at Robertsfield international airport at 2AM. The Boeing 707 plane (with the tail number 9G-LAD) was flown by an Arab crew and apparently owned by Johnsons Air, a Ghana-based company which has links with First International Airlines, a Belgium-based firm. The two firms and the plane in question have been cited in several internet reports for trafficking in arms from the Belgian city of Ostend.

It was in fact the extended stopover in the Burkina Faso capital, caused by bad weather, that caused the president Charles Taylor's delayed return to Monrovia for the August 1 meeting with a top level ECOWAS delegation.

A group of Liberian government soldiers, led by the Defense Minister, went to the airport to meet the flight from Libya. The arms and ammunition were rapidly loaded onto two trucks but once the Nigerian guards figured out what was going on, they ordered the two vehicles to halt. Ignored, they then shot at the tires to force them to a stop. The Liberian Defense Minister was detained for a few hours and later released by the ECOWAS soldiers.

Taylor and his military chief of staff, General Benjamin Yeaten, went personally to the airport to try and secure the release of the cargo, which consisted of ammunition for AK 47 rifles and rocket-propelled grenades, but the Nigerian soldiers refused to hand it over.

This shipment had been purchased overseas by Taylor's son Chucky Taylor, in direct contravention of the UN arms embargo against Liberia. It was originally due to be delivered by ship to the port of Buchanan. When MODEL rebels captured Buchanan on July 28, it was offloaded at an undisclosed foreign port and was flown into Liberia.

A first flight on August 1 consisted mainly of AK-47 and mortar ammunition, which were then used in the fighting for Monrovia the next day. President Taylor had flown to Libya to arrange this shipment. On both legs of the trip, Taylor changed planes in Burkina Faso's capital Ouagadougou. Bad weather delayed Taylor's return, which caused him to cancel an August 1 meeting with West African foreign ministers to discuss peace efforts.

A senior but unnamed Sierra Leonean official familiar with the smuggling network claimed that Burkina Faso was providing the end-user certificates that weapons companies require to ship arms. Weapons purchased from the Ukraine or Bulgaria (or donated by Libya) were repackaged and flown to Liberia, paid for by illegal diamonds.

The Sierra Leone-based Revolutionary United Front (RUF) rebels ship diamonds, from the mines they control, to Liberia. The diamonds are then either sold or smuggled to Burkina Faso, Ivory Coast or Guinea. From there, they are then sold to legitimate diamond brokers. Liberia's diamond production is estimated to be less than $10 million a year, but they have exported $300 million worth of RUF diamonds a year. This earned the RUF rebels about $30-50 million a year, with as much as $125 million in a good year.

Burkinafaso has also factored into the Ivory Coast's miserable civil war and according to the Ivorian media, the Burkinabe President's emissary Salif Diallo is actually the shadowy connection to Libya. They accuse him of being in constant contact with Moammar Qaddafi, coordinating arms and diamond trafficking in Liberia, Sierra Leone, and Angola with men like Moustapha Chafi, the Niger-Mauritanian who "led" the Ivorian MPCI rebels during the first few months of the group's existence.

All of this leads back to the burning question, "what will Charles Taylor do on August 11th?". Still living under the cloud of charges from Sierra Leone, he may head to Nigeria or might even hide out with his arms smuggling friends. But Taylor's attempt to bring in more arms as he was on the verge of stepping down as president could be taken as a final attempt to put his supporters in a better position, since the hope of the government militias actually winning is beyond remote. - Adam Geibel

October 7, 2003: The Ivory Coast has frequently accused the government of Burkina Faso of instigating the civil war in Ivory Coast and supplying the rebels. Apparently, the Burkinans are now suffering the same intrigues.

In Burkinafaso's capital Ouagadougou, it was announced that 12 people had been arrested on October 2, for planning with a foreign country to overthrow the government of President Blaise Campaore. The State Prosecutor claimed that "serious evidence" existed of their plans, but declined to give further details.

Captain Wally Luther Diapagri (who works at the Trade Ministry) was reportedly the coup leader and planning started as early as in 2000. Diapagri reportedly recruited other soldiers and civilians including another captain, army sergeants, warrant chiefs and corporals, as well as a church pastor. Most of the soldiers arrested last week had belonged to President Compaore's security detachment, before being deployed to other units. Captain Bauoulou Boulibi had served at the military detachment of Bobo Dioulasso (the country's second most important city). The suspects were in custody at a military facility and the case will be prosecuted by a military court. The investigations were going on and more arrests were expected. The UN reported that an unnamed "African country" had given over $178,731 to buy weapons and the plotters were waiting for arms shipments, but that their activities had been followed by the secret services.

Burkinafaso is a country ruled by Captains, so the allegations are quite serious. The latest coup (also the bloodiest) brought Captain Blaise Compaore to power on 15 October 1987. The President (and former Captain) Thomas Sankara was killed in that regime change. - Adam Geibel January 2, 2004: Temptation causes discipline problems even in First World armies.

Four French soldiers tasked with guarding a bank in Bouake was sent back to Paris, to face criminal charges after being found carrying a bag of cash worth $72,000. The four were from the 126th infantry (based in Brive-la-Gaillarde) were detained after allegedly trying to buy diamonds and gold, then accused of "aggravated theft" in November and December. The men were placed under judicial investigation, one step short of formal charges.

The main suspect told military police he found a sack stuffed with cash as he was patrolling the vicinity of the bank. Authorities believe the money belongs to a branch of the West African central bank in the rebel base of Bouake, where a bloody battle for spoils between bands of rebels and looters left at least 25 dead in September.

The government of Burkinafaso arrested an army major in connection with a coup plot against their president, which was first revealed in September. Burkina Faso has accused government officials in the Ivory Coast and Togo of complicity in the affair. He was the 15th member of the armed forces to be arrested in connection with the alleged coup plot since September. The major had originally been a suspect but released.

Burkinabe President Blaise Campaore has enjoyed close links with the Libyan leader Muamar Ghaddafi for years and often been accused as acting as Ghaddafi's agent in the destabilization of West African countries like Sierra Leone, Liberia and the Ivory Coast. - Adam Geibel April, 2004 - Military tribunal tries 13 people accused of plotting coup against President Compaore in October 2003. Army captain Luther Ouali jailed for 10 years for masterminding plot.

November, 2005 - President Compaore wins a third straight term in office.

December, 2006 - Burkina Faso postpones a regional economic summit after deadly gun battles between police and soldiers in the capital.

May, 2007 - The ruling party wins a majority in parliamentary polls.

April, 2008 - Two-day general strike follows weeks of protests about high living costs and call for wage increases.

April, 2009 - Parliament passes a law requiring at least 30% of candidates put forward for election by political parties to be women.

July, 2010 - France, US issue travel warnings, citing the possibility of kidnappings by al-Qaeda operatives.

November, 2010 - Gold mine officially opened. Premier Tertius Zongo says it will earn substantial revenue for the country.

Presidential elections. President Compaore gains another term in office.

March, 2011 - Weeks of violent protests follow the death of a student in police custody.

April, 2011- Soldiers, presidential guards mutiny over unpaid allowances. Thousands of people protest over food prices.

July, 2011 - Seven people are killed when government forces suppress mutiny in Burkina Faso's second city, Bobo Dioulasso.

January, 2012 - President Compaore sacks head of Burkina Faso's customs service, Ousmane Guiro, following the seizure of nearly $4m in two large suitcases traced by police to Mr Guiro.

March 12, 2012: Algeria, along with nine North African countries (including Libya, Tunisia, and Egypt) agreed to the "Tripoli Plan" for improving border security. This is meant to hamper smuggling and terrorist operations.

May 20, 2012: In the south the army rebels officially returned power to the civilian government. But the coup leaders and their armed followers have not surrendered themselves or their weapons.

March 21, 2012: In neighboring Mali, soldiers mutinied in the capital and seized the presidential palace (but not the elected president) and TV station. The troops announced they were taking over because the military had not been allowed to deal with the Tuareg tribal rebellion in the north, where the rebels had seized some towns and villages. The current fighting in the north has caused over 70,000 people to flee their homes to get away from the violence.

The Tuaregs have been a problem for centuries, as they are ethnically distinct from the Malian majority in the south. These ethnic differences are complicated by Tuareg participation in smuggling cocaine and hashish north, through Algeria, to Europe. The drug smuggling is actually handled by Arab gangsters that are not terrorists. Al Qaeda gets paid lots of money to provide security for the drugs as they make the long run through forests, then the Sahara. The Tuareg provide local knowledge of the terrain, and people, at least in the far south. The Algerian government is afraid that the Tuareg will be tempted, by a big payday, to provide sanctuary for al Qaeda, as well as providing new recruits for Islamic terrorist operations (especially those that raise a lot of cash, like kidnapping Westerners). While the Tuareg are not fond of Islamic terrorism, young Tuareg are allowed to work with al Qaeda as hired guns. The pay is good and, so far, not too dangerous. But the young Tuareg are picking up some radical ideas from their al Qaeda bosses and that is causing some tension with tribal leaders. The mere fact that Tuareg are working for al Qaeda in southern Algeria has angered Algerian officials. Most of the 1.5 million Tuareg in the region are living in nations bordering Algeria (Burkina Faso, Libya, Mali, and Niger). Mali has faced rebellious Tuareg for a long time and made peace with most of them in 2007. The current bunch of Tuareg rebels insist that they have no connection with al Qaeda or MOJWA, but many other Tuaregs do and there's no denying that. On the southern border of Algeria the Sahara desert turns into the semi-desert Sahel, a band of barely livable land stretching from the Atlantic coast to Somalia.

In France, Mohamed Merah (armed and holding out in his apartment while surrounded by police) confessed to recently murdering four men and three children. He was of Algerian descent and had gone to Afghanistan and Pakistan to take part in Islamic terrorism and work with al Qaeda. He returned to France and sought to continue his terrorist activities. His recent victims had been soldiers or Jews. France has always been very tolerant of Islamic radicals, as long as they behave in France. That is not likely to change, which annoys countries like Algeria quite a lot. That's because many Islamic terrorists, wanted for murder in Algeria, go to France and are able to live there and plan their next operation against Algeria.

March 22, 2012: Mohamed Merah, a French citizen born of immigrant Algerian parents was killed by police after a 32 hour siege. Merah's parents were economic immigrants, as they left in the 1980s, before the terrorism campaign began in the early 1990s. Mohamed Merah, like many Arab migrants to the West, had a hard time adjusting to a new culture and, in effect, went to war with his adopted country. France had known about Mohamed Merah's terrorist activities for years but never had enough evidence to arrest him. He was being watched but not very closely.

The coup is led by mid ranking officers who insist that new presidential elections will be held, as soon as "national unity" (all opposition is silenced) and "territorial integrity" (the Tuareg rebels are defeated) is taken care of. No word on how long that might take, but it appears that the scheduled presidential elections next month are not going to happen. The mutinous soldiers were upset at a perceived lack of support by the government. The troops wanted more weapons and equipment to deal with the Tuareg rebels up north. The government preferred more emphasis on negotiation.

March 23, 2012: In neighboring Mali the situation is chaotic. Members of the 7,000 man army staged a coup in the capital and the president went into hiding among loyal troops. News of the coup caused demoralization among the several thousand troops in the north, where several thousand Tuareg tribesmen are trying to establish a separate state. As troops withdrew to the south the Tuaregs began advancing and occupying towns and military bases.

May 26, 2012: MNLA and Ansar Dine agreed to an alliance so they can both jointly rule, and defend, the north. To achieve this compromise, Ansar Dine agreed to recognize the independent Tuareg state of Azawad in the northern two thirds of Mali. In return, the MNLA agreed to allow Ansar Dine to impose a "limited" form of Islamic law throughout Azawad. This agreement quickly fell apart as most people (Tuareg and southerners) in Azawad made it clear that they wanted nothing to do with any form of Islamic law. Ansar Dine responded by trying to impose even stricter forms of Islamic law, and the MNLA gunmen refused to let this happen to them or their families. This eventually led to fighting between groups of MNLA and Ansar Dine gunmen.

June 6, 2012: In northern Mali (just south of Algeria) the MNLA (Liberation Army of Azawad) is facing off with a former ally, Ansar Dine, over whether the government of the newly established Tuareg state in northern Mali (Azawad) should be secular or Islamic. Ansar Dine is run by a Taureg tribal leader, who participated in a failed uprising in 1990, and subsequently allied himself with al Qaeda and formed a small force (less than a thousand men) of Islamic radical warriors. Ansar Dine and MNLA agreed to merge on May 26th, but a week later split again when MNLA refused to allow the new state to be run by Islamic law (Sharia) and invade the south. Ansar wants to turn all of Mali into an Islamic dictatorship.

Other nations in the region, especially Algeria (which shares a 460 kilometer border with Mali), are alarmed at the appearance of a potential Islamic state and sanctuary for Islamic terrorists. The situation is murky because several Ansar Dine and MNLA factions are operating semi-independently. There is no single, reliable voice in the north. If there is a civil war between Islamic conservatives and secular minded Tuaregs, there will be chaos for a while. Meanwhile the AU (African Union) and ECOWAS (Economic Community of West African States) is preparing to invade northern Mali and has already imposed economic sanctions on land-locked Mali. AFRICOM (U.S. Africa Command) has troops, aircraft, and Special Forces operators in the area.

This all began last January when thousands of Tuareg tribesmen in the north resumed their rebellion and began attacking towns and military bases. Then, in March, soldiers in the capital deposed the elected Mali government, complaining that the politicians had not sufficiently supported the military in its efforts to deal with the Tuareg uprising. That led to a collapse of army resistance in the north. This was the fourth Tuareg uprising since the first in 1963, and the most successful. By the end of April, Tuareg rebels had seized the three major towns in the north (Kidal, Gao, and Timbuktu) as well as military bases in the area. In effect, the Tuareg rebels had seized the entire desert north and dared the more numerous southerners to try and take it back. But first the army coup had to be undone, the army restored to some semblance of order and then sent north to recapture the major towns and deal with the Tuareg. That has not happened yet.

The Tuareg rebels were initially assisted by several hundred Ansar Dine gunmen. Apparently deals were made to make life easier for the terrorists if the Tuareg gained control of the north. Ansar Dine gunmen soon went around shutting down places that sold alcohol or video and telling people they must act like "proper" Moslems (beards for men and covering up for women). This sort of thing is not popular among the Tuareg and caused friction with most Tuareg leaders.

The Tuaregs have been a problem for centuries, as they are ethnically distinct from the Malian majority in the south. Mali is as large as South Africa but has less than a third the population. Most (90 percent) of the 14.5 million people live in the southern third of the country, which gets more water. The north is largely desert, and most of the population up there are Tuareg (most of them not rebelling). Until the French arrived in the 19th century and created (for administrative purposes) a united "Mali", the black Africans in the south (along the Niger River) prospered and generally ignored the Tuareg in the desert north. But after the French left in 1960, and Mali became independent, the more populous south was forced to deal with the Tuareg dominated north.

These ethnic differences are complicated by recent Tuareg participation in smuggling cocaine and hashish north, through Algeria, to Europe. The drug smuggling is actually handled by Arab gangsters that are not terrorists. Al Qaeda gets paid lots of money to provide security for the drugs as they make the long run through forests, then the Sahara. The Tuareg provide local knowledge of the terrain, and people, at least in the far south. The Algerian government has long feared that the Tuareg would be tempted, by a big payday, to provide sanctuary for al Qaeda, as well as providing new recruits for Islamic terrorist operations (especially those that raise a lot of cash, like kidnapping Westerners). While the Tuareg are not fond of Islamic terrorism, young Tuareg are allowed to work with al Qaeda as hired guns. The pay is good and, so far, not too dangerous. But the young Tuareg are picking up some radical ideas from their al Qaeda bosses and that is causing some tension with tribal leaders. The mere fact that Tuareg are working for al Qaeda in southern Algeria has angered Algerian and Mali officials. Most of the 1.5 million Tuareg in the region are living in nations bordering Algeria (Burkina Faso, Libya, Mali, and Niger). Mali has faced rebellious Tuareg for a long time and made peace with most of them in 2007. The MNLA insist they are not Islamic radicals but many other Tuaregs (like Ansar Dine) are and there's no denying that. On the southern border of Algeria, the Sahara desert turns into the semi-desert Sahel, a band of barely livable land stretching from the Atlantic coast to Somalia.

Ansar Dine has been growing rapidly this year. Islamic terrorists from Algeria, Nigeria, and other areas came to northern Mali to "help" as soon as it was obvious that the rebels were winning. A growing number of Tuareg see this as an invasion and the MNLA is breaking into factions over this issue. Islamic terrorist control in the north is spotty because they do not have as many followers (armed and unarmed) as MNLA (who comprise most of the northern population). The north contains only about 12 percent of Mali's population and is largely barren desert. A large minority of the northerners were originally from the black African south. The Islamic terror groups are making themselves unpopular in the north by forcing everyone to live a strict (no tobacco, alcohol, music, or video as well as shaved men and veiled women) Islamic lifestyle rules. The Islamic radicals have also damaged some non-Islamic cultural sites. There are a growing number of anti-Ansar Dine demonstrations. This has caused the Ansar Dine to back off a bit because many of the secular-minded Tuareg men in the north have weapons. While most of these guys did not join the MNLA rebellion, they still back the idea of a Tuareg controlled northern Mali and increasingly see outsiders (as most of the Islamic terrorists are) as invaders rather than allies. The Tuareg population is also suffering from increased banditry. Before the MNLA uprising the soldiers and police controlled crime and at least kept the main roads safe. MNLA has not established that kind of security and food and other goods, which have to be trucked in, are in short supply.

June 8, 2012: In the town of Kidal (population 25,000) in the northeast, MNLA and Ansar Dine gunmen began fighting each other after days of arguing about how to handle civilians who are opposed to the Ansar Dine imposition of Islamic law.

June 11, 2012: The AU (African Union) has asked the UN for authorization to intervene in northern Mali.

June 12, 2012: MNLA and Ansar Dine gunmen fought near Timbuktu. MNLA efforts to assert authority over their Ansar Dine allies have failed and Ansar Dine is in turn fighting to show that it is the superior military power in the north.

June 15, 2012: Ansar Dine and MNLA representatives arrived in Burkina Faso to hold peace talks with ECOWAS. These talks are not expected to go anywhere, but it was considered a useful way to keep in touch with the two rebel factions in the north. ECOWAS is meeting separately with the two groups, as Ansar Dine and MNLA have been increasingly at war with each other in northern Mali.

June 28, 2012: Algerian al Qaeda leader Mokhtar Belmokhtar was reported killed in northern Mali while fighting for Ansar Dine against rebel Tuareg tribesmen. In Algeria Belmokhtar has earned the nickname "the untouchable" for his ability to escape many efforts to capture or kill him.

June 29, 2012: Ansar Dine declared that it had expelled Tuareg (MNLA) gunmen from Gao, Kidal, and Timbuktu. MNLA admitted they lost control of the three cities but insisted they still controlled 90 percent of northern Mali (which is mostly desert). The fighting between Ansar Dine and the MNLA has been escalating for weeks and became more widespread in the last few days. The most intense fighting was outside Gao, the largest city (population 86,000) in the north. There were over a hundred casualties, and the MNLA men usually fled when they realized that the Ansar Dine fighters would keep coming no matter what.

June 30, 2012: Ansar Dine gunmen in Timbuktu (population 54,000), the oldest city in the north, began destroying the dozens of ancient tombs of Moslem clerics and scholars worshipped by Sufi Moslems. To conservative Sunni Moslems, Sufis are heretics and their shrines are to be destroyed whenever possible. The destruction of the tombs was condemned by many Moslem leaders worldwide, and the ICC (International Criminal Court) declared it a war crime. This did not discourage Ansar Dine, which threatened to destroy dozens of Sufi shrines in Timbuktu. So far they have not energetically followed through on this threat.

July 2, 2012: Ansar Dine announced that it had planted landmines around the city of Gao and are prepared to defeat any MNLA attempt to retake the place.

July 4, 2012: In the African state of Mali, the Tuareg tribal rebels (MNLA, Liberation Army of Azawad) that took control of the thinly populated, largely desert northern two-thirds of the country three months ago have been defeated by their smaller, but more fanatic, Islamic radical allies, the Ansar Dine (Defenders of the Faith). The success of the two groups in chasing the largely black African Mali army out of the north three months ago encouraged Ansar Dine to call for more Islamic radicals throughout the region to come join them. Meanwhile the MNLA found that their fighters were not as willing to die for the cause as their Ansar Dine allies were.

The MNLA (Liberation Army of Azawad) represents the most militant and heavily armed Tuareg rebels, but they have not been able to stand up to its smaller, less well equipped ally Ansar Dine, an Islamic radical group containing many former (or current) al Qaeda members. Islamic terrorists from Algeria, Nigeria, and other areas are coming to northern Mali to join Ansar Dine. The leader of Ansar Dine (Iyad Ag Ghali) is a local Tuareg tribal leader who has always been active in Tuareg separatism efforts and is adept at playing Tuareg tribal politics. Ghali has always been seen as an opportunist, and now he is making a violent attempt to establish his own Tuareg religious dictatorship in northern Mali. Most Tuaregs oppose Islamic radicals but support an independent Tuareg state. Ghali is playing on this division to keep the more numerous Tuareg from uniting and destroying Ansar Dine. If the northern Tuareg did unite, they could turn out over 50,000 armed and angry men, if only for a short period. Ansar Dine has only a few thousand armed men and many of those are Tuaregs who recently joined.

A growing number of Tuareg see Ansar Dine as an invasion, and this caused quarrels among MNLA leaders. Islamic terrorist control in the north was spotty at first because they did not have as many followers (armed and unarmed) as the MNLA (who comprise most of the northern population). The north contains only about 12 percent of Mali's 15 million people and is largely barren desert. The Islamic terror groups made themselves unpopular in the north by forcing everyone to obey strict (no tobacco, alcohol, music, video, shaved men, and unveiled women) Islamic lifestyle rules. This ran into a lot of resistance, and Ansar Dine backed off, for the moment, from seizing all TVs and video games. Meanwhile, Ansar Dine makes no secret of its ultimate goal, turning all of Mali into an Islamic religious dictatorship.

The Islamic radicals also damaged some cultural sites that were seen as unclean by the Sunni Islamic conservatives within Ansar Dine. There were a few anti-Ansar Dine demonstrations, which were put down with gunfire and threats of more violence. Ansar Dine may be able to control most of the north for a while but can they maintain that control for any length of time? Aware of their weakness, Ansar Dine has appealed to Islamic terrorists throughout the world to come to northern Mali (not easy to do). Because Islamic radicals are currently being defeated in most of the world (Somalia, Yemen, Pakistan, and so on), the Ansar Dine appeal is motivating a lot of Islamic terrorists to head for Mali. Will that be enough? ECOWAS is offering to make peace with Ansar Dine and MNLA if Ansar Dine will rid itself of known Islamic terrorists. This is something of a mad gambit, as the government in southern Mali will not agree to partition of their country and Ansar Dine depends too much on the experienced Islamic terrorists in their ranks, who are the most deadly fighters and quick to kill anyone who opposes them. Then again, just the news that this sort of thing is under discussion causes some tension within Ansar Dine.

France has taken the lead in organizing international (and UN) backing for an armed intervention in northern Mali. ECOWAS (Economic Community of West African States) has organized a force of 3,300 peacekeepers (from Nigeria, Niger, and Senegal) but wants UN backing, and Western cash, before these troops are sent into Mali. The UN is discussing the matter and Western nations are willing to pay up if the UN approves of the operation. But there is doubt that these 3,300 troops and a thousand or so from Mali could defeat a nearly equal number of Tuareg and Ansar Dine fighters. The Tuareg and Islamic radicals are tough fighters. Many in the UN are seeking larger troop commitments before they OK an invasion in their name. One thing the UN has agreed on is not to recognize a partition of Mali.

The MNLA is now at war with Ansar Dine and is appealing to northerners (especially Tuareg) to work with them against the "foreign invaders" (Ansar Dine). Most civilians in the area have more urgent problems, like how to get food. The unrest in the north has disrupted the movement of food and other goods into the area. People are getting hungry and Ansar Dine is often preventing foreign food aid from reaching civilians. More and more people are fleeing the north. So far, over 300,000 have fled to the south or neighboring countries. Many more are planning to do so if the food situation does not improve.

In the southern third of Mali, where 88 percent of the population lives, life is also hard. The March army coup disrupted the economy and foreign aid. The coup leaders, and many of their armed followers, are still around and able to seize control again. In the north it is worse. In addition to the loss of foreign economic aid, the tourist business has also dried up, leaving thousands of northerners jobless.

Neighboring states, especially Algeria, as well as most nations in the West, fear that if Ansar Dine is left in control of northern Mali (even if subordinate to the Tuareg majority up there), the place will become a base for Islamic terrorist operations. This is what happened in Afghanistan in the 1990s, and Iraq, Yemen, and Somalia in the last decade.

November, 2012 - President Blaise Compaore acts as regional mediator in talks to resolve the crisis in Mali, where Islamists have taken control of the north.

April 16, 2013: Burkina Faso: an eldorado for former ministers‘

AFRICA MINING: In the ―land of honest men‖, former mines ministers reign like kings in the mining sector. President Blaise Compaoré certainly has a firm grip on the industry through his brother François but half a dozen former mines ministers are nevertheless to be found in key positions within it – whether in the private sector, consultancy or even the entourage of the head of state. They often have close ties to "Beau Blaise" but manage to exercise considerable influence over business dealings in the sector, while at the same time maintaining their allegiance to the tenant of the Kosyam Palace.

Blaise Compaoré‘s younger brother and economic adviser, François, is involved in all strategic questions at the presidential palace. He is particularly close to Lamoussa Salif Kaboré, Minister of Mines, Quarries and Energy. Technical issues apart, all the major decisions taken by Kaboré have to be pre-approved by François Compaoré, who, in his turn, runs them past his brother for his validation. Within the head of state‘s inner circle, the head of the Presidential Investment Council, Djibrina Barry, is a former mines minister, while, in the private sector, the powerful head of the Burkina Faso Chamber of Mines, Elie Justin Ouédraogo, is another member of the mines ministers‘ club.

Mining consultancy, the industry‘s holy of holies, is home to the greatest number of former ministers. François Ouédraogo was mines minister from 1992 to 1993, Pierre Claver Damiba, who also had other portfolios, from 1960 to 1966, and the ubiquitous Abdoulaye Abdoulkader Cissé from 2000 to 2011. All serve as strategically placed representatives of the interests of foreign mining investors in the country. Because they are all friends of Blaise Compaoré, they reinforce the latter‘s hold not only over the Burkina Faso mining industry but also that of other countries, since they are called in from time to time to advise neighbouring governments as well.

October 30, 2013: BURKINAFASO - Thomas Sankara and the new Africa renaissance‘

IndepthAfrica Commentary by Agun Mod: As Africa celebrates 50 years of the founding of the Organization of African Unity, and now the Africa Union, we must thank Pambazuka for daring to promote African renaissance and our unity, in spite of our diverse cultures. But more than that, we must also celebrate African heroes (_sheroes‘). Thomas Sankara was one of the leading ideologues of the 1980s West Africa, when military regimes were the order of the day, and when the youth sought relevance in the midst of forced neo-colonial identities. Educational institutions were closing down rapidly, youth unemployment was at its highest, social centres for youth advancement did not exist, and maternal mortality was at its highest. The World Bank and the International Monetary Fund (IMF) imposed Structural Adjustment programmes, which led to the collapse of African economies, loss of employment and social upheavals. In London and Paris and other western capitals, old colonial fogies were dusting their safari suits to return and recolonise Africa. The United States was preparing its fleets of death and destruction to intervene in African _conflicts‘. The debate about the re-colonisation of Africa by western opinion leaders and politicians was open, fierce and aggressive. Dynamic African leaders such as Ft. Lt. Jerry John Rawlings of Ghana, Yoweri Musevini of Uganda, Paul Kagame of Rwanda, Meles Zenawi of Ethiopia, Isaias Aferworki of Eritrea and several others, followed in the footsteps of Africa‘s founding fathers, and sought to reverse the decline of the continent and build progressive nations in which people‘s rights are respected, in which different ethnic groups lived together in peace and harmony and a world in which Africans were respected on equal terms with others. ‗Developmentalism‘ became the new ideology of the day. Future generations will judge them but for now, let us celebrate their good intentions.

Captain Thomas Sankara is remembered for what he sought to achieve in his youthful and short life as a leader of the Upper Volta, now Burkina Faso. What made Thomas Sankara the hero of Africa youth? Sankara was committed to the independence of Africa, understood the global context in which the world viewed Africa, and how Africa should respond. He was forthright, honest, and brutal in his assessment of African-European relations. He did not put profit and personal interest before the honour and dignity of his people. He spoke truth to power. He was fiercely patriotic, loved human beings, and would not abuse them. Sankara was able to connect the diaspora youth with African youth, and appeal to both as if they lived in the same village. To a large extent, Thomas Sankara had a progressive and positive view of the future of Burkina Faso and Africa, believed in the ability of Africans to solve their own problems, and did not go seeking solutions to the problems of Bukina Faso in Paris, Washington and London. Like Patrice Lumumba, he did not live to see his view bear fruits.

It should be noted that Burkina Faso and its capital Ouagadougou is one of the most historic places in West Africa. It was the scene to intellectual and cultural renaissance before colonialism desecrated this land. Like Kwame Nkrumah of Ghana, Julius Nyerere of Tanzania and several others, Sankara sought to restore dignity and honour to his country, to imbue the youth with the ideals of pan-African solidarity, dignity and honour. He was fiercely pro-people, peoples‘ development and believed that poverty was unnecessary: that he could transform the deserts of his country into rich agricultural land. He believed in eradicating poverty. He believed in the power of the people, in their honour and dignity. Sankara pontificated at length about self-sufficiency, self-reliance, and the ability of Africans to overcome adversity in the midst of colonial and neo-colonial marginalisation and abuse. He also rejected neocolonial cultural mindsets. Cultural renaissance has always been highlighted by the likes of Frantz Fanon Aimee Ceasare and other Africa diasporan authors. Sankara took this to another level, to engage with the youth. Sankara believed in the mental liberation of Africans since colonialism had led to a mindset sometimes bordering on self-hate. Sankara was the first apostle of the African Renaissance, taken over and perfected by former President Thabo Mbeki of South Africa.

Today, Africa lives in renewed optimism about the future. Wealth is being generated internally. African economies are on the rise as European and Western economies tumble like a pack of cards. The West is bound to fight back through destabilisation, sabotage and cultural re-colonialisation. It is bound to seek resources elsewhere as they did in the pre-colonial days. Africa is in their sights. However, Africa today is far from the Africa of 1884, when colonial racists carved Africa like a piece of poorly baked cake. Africa today is fiercely patriotic, fully conscious of the new world environment, and willing to engage in trade and support each other. The youth of today, are fiercely pan African and patriotic will fight back. What would Thomas Sankara have made of today's Africa? Like Rawlings of Ghana, Musevini of Uganda, Kagame of Rwanda, and many other African leaders, he would have rejected the International Criminal Court (ICC) as a neocolonial dispensation engaged in the "race hunting" of Africans as in the days of slavery. Sankara would have used his patriotism to support Pan-Africanism and African Renaissance, and called for the total liberation of Africa from Western donors and their brand of _poverty alleviation'.

Captain Sankara would have supported Kenyan President Uhuru Kenyatta's new economic direction of intra-African trade and investment and his laptop project for Kenyan children. The continuing crisis in the Democratic Republic of the Congo (DRC), insurgencies in Ethiopia, trial of African leaders at the western sponsored, western-led court in The Hague and the implied disrespect for Africans would have troubled Sankra immensely. But more than that, Sankara would have remained a true ambassador of the interest of African youth, women and children. He was charismatic, honest, and direct, spoke his mind, and did not balk under pressure from Western leaders. These are the attributes of the new generation of Africans. Like Steve Biko, Sankara lived and spoke truth to power. Africa in 2063 will not be the same Africa that we see today. It will be a rich, independent continent full of optimistic people, united, and ready to defend its resources. That is the Africa that Thomas Sankara dreamt of. It is the Africa that we must strive for. We must celebrate this amazing African, but more than that, the youth of today should embody the aspirations, ideological orientation, truthfulness and be the Africans that Sankara believed in. (Text ends)

Thomas Isidore Noël Sankara (December 21, 1949 – October 15, 1987)

He was a Burkinabé military captain, Marxist revolutionary, President of Burkina Faso from 1983 to 1987. Commonly referred to as "Africa's Che Ernesto Guevara". Sankara seized power in a 1983 popularly supported coup at the age of 33, with the goal of eliminating corruption and the dominance of the former French colonial power.

He renamed the country from Upper Volta to Burkina Faso ("Land of Uncorruptable People... from 1983 to 1987. Commonly referred to as "Africa's Che Ernesto Guevara". Thomas Sankara as a guitarist himself, he composed the Burkina Faso's National Anthem. His foreign policies were centered on anti-imperialism, with his government eschewing all foreign aid, pushing for odious debt reduction, nationalizing all land and mineral wealth, and averting the power and influence of the International Monetary Fund (IMF) and World Bank. His domestic policies were focused on preventing famine with agrarian self-sufficiency and land reform, prioritizing education with a nation-wide literacy campaign, and promoting public health by vaccinating 2.5 million children against meningitis, yellow fever and measles. He is known for planting over ten million trees to halt the growing desertification of the Sahel, doubling wheat production by redistributing land from feudal landlords to peasants, suspending rural poll taxes and domestic rents, and establishing an ambitious road and rail construction program to "tie the nation together".

On the localized level Sankara also called on every village to build a medical dispensary and had over 350 communities construct schools with their own labour. Moreover, his commitment to women's rights led him to outlaw female genital mutilation, forced marriages and polygamy, while appointing women to high governmental positions and encouraging them to work outside the home and stay in school even if pregnant.

His revolutionary programs for African self-reliance made him an icon to many of Africa's poor. Sankara remained popular with most of his country's impoverished citizens. However his policies alienated and antagonised the vested interests of an array of groups, which included the small but powerful Burkinabé middle class, the tribal leaders whom he stripped of the long-held traditional right to forced labour and tribute payments, and France and its ally the Ivory Coast. As a result, he was overthrown and assassinated in a coup d'état led by the French-backed Blaise Compaoré (the Current President) on October 15, 1987. A week before his murder, he declared: "While revolutionaries as individuals can be murdered, you cannot kill ideas."

He sold off the government fleet of Mercedes cars and made the Renault 5 (the cheapest car sold in Burkina Faso at that time) the official service car of the ministers. He reduced the salaries of well-off public servants, including his own, and forbade the use of government chauffeurs and 1st class airline tickets. He redistributed land from the feudal landlords to the peasants. Wheat production increased from 1700 kg per hectare to 3800 kg per hectare, making the country food self-sufficient.

He opposed foreign aid, saying that "he who feeds you, controls you." He called for a united front of African nations to repudiate their foreign debt. He argued that the poor and exploited did not have an obligation to repay money to the rich and exploiting. "Thomas knew how to show his people that they could become dignified and proud through will power, courage, honesty and work. What remains above all of my husband is his integrity."
— Mariam Sankara, Thomas' widow.

In Ouagadougou, Sankara converted the army's provisioning store into a state-owned supermarket open to everyone (the first supermarket in the country).

He forced well-off civil servants to pay one month's salary to public projects. He refused to use the air conditioning in his office on the grounds that such luxury was not available to anyone but a handful of Burkinabes.

As President, he lowered his salary to $450 a month and limited his possessions to a car, four bikes, three guitars, a fridge and a broken freezer.

He was known for jogging unaccompanied through Ouagadougou in his track suit and posing in his tailored military fatigues, with his mother-of-pearl pistol.

When asked why he didn't want his portrait hung in public places, as was the norm for other African leaders, Sankara replied "There are seven million Thomas Sankaras." (Text ends)

Burkina Faso 'Black Spring' protests: protesters set fire to parliament`

Opposition to President Blaise Compaore's plans to extend his near-30 year rule turns violent as a blaze rips through the National Assembly building in Ouagadougou.

By Agency (12: 49PM GMT 30 Oct 2014)

Angry demonstrators in Burkina Faso went on the rampage on Thursday in protest at plans to allow President Blaise Compaore to extend his 27-year rule, setting parliament on fire and wreaking havoc across the capital. Crowds of people broke through a heavy security cordon and stormed the National Assembly building in Ouagadougou, ransacking offices and setting fire to cars, AFP has reported. One man was believed to have been killed in the chaos that erupted in the west African nation shortly before lawmakers were due to vote on the controversial legislation. Security forces protecting the area near Burkina Faso's presidential palace fired live rounds and tear gas as crowds approached, diplomatic and security sources told Reuters on Thursday. Amid the surging violence, the government announced it was calling off the vote but it was not immediately clear if this was only a temporary move.

Black smoke billowed out of smashed windows at the parliament building, where several offices were ravaged by flames, including the speaker's office, although the main chamber so far appeared to be unscathed. Several hundred protesters also broke into the headquarters of the national television station RTB, pillaging equipment and smashing cars, the correspondents said. The country has been tense for days in the run-up to Thursday's vote over the constitutional changes, which the European Union has warned could jeopardise stability in the west African nation. Police were out in force around the parliament after mass rallies called by the opposition earlier this week but failed to stop the onslaught despite using tear gas against the protesters.

The European Union has urged the government to scrap the legislation, warning that it could "jeopardise... stability, equitable development and democratic progress", and had called for all sides to refrain from violence. Several thousand protesters had marched through the capital on Wednesday, the day after street battles erupted during a mass rally by hundreds of thousands of people against what they see as a constitutional coup by supporters of Compaore. The legislature is due to examine a proposed amendment that would allow Compaore, now in the 27th year of his presidency, to run for re-election in November next year for another five years. "October 30 is Burkina Faso's Black Spring, like the Arab Spring," said Emile Pargui Pare, an official from the Movement of People for Progress (MPP), a young and influential opposition party.

Government spokesman Alain Edouard Traore issued a statement Wednesday hailing the "vitality" of Burkina Faso's democracy despite what he termed anti-government "misbehaviour". Compaore's bid to cling to power has angered the opposition and much of the public, including many young people in a country where 60 percent of the population of almost 17 million is under 25.

Many have spent their entire lives under the leadership of one man and - with the poor former French colony stagnating at 183rd out of 186 countries on the UN human development index - many have had enough. The situation is being closely watched across Africa where at least four heads of state are preparing or considering similar changes to stay in power, from Burundi to Benin and the Democratic Republic of Congo. Compaore was only 36 when he seized power in a 1987 coup in which his former friend and one of Africa's most loved leaders, Thomas Sankara, was ousted and assassinated. The 63-year-old has remained in power since then, re-elected president four times since 1991 - to two seven-year and two five-year terms.

In 2005, constitutional limits were introduced and Compaore is coming to the end of his second five-year term. The opposition fears the new rules would enable Compaore to seek re-election not just once, but three more times, paving the way for up to 15 more years in power. The third largest party in parliament said at the weekend it would back the amendment, setting the ruling party on course to obtain the two-thirds majority it needs to make the change without resorting to a referendum as first promised. Protesters have erected barricades and burned tyres in the capital since the proposal was announced on October 21. Known in colonial times as Upper Volta, the landlocked country became independent from France in 1960 and its name was changed to Burkina Faso ("the land of upright men") in 1984, a year after a military coup. (Text ends)

November 1, 2014: Burkina Faso general takes over as Compaore resigns'

Burkina Faso's President Blaise Compaore has announced his resignation following violent protests over his attempt to extend his 27-year rule. Mr Compaore issued a statement saying the presidency was now vacant and urging elections within 90 days. Army chief Gen Honore Traore said he had taken over, but it was not clear if he had the backing of all the military. Crowds danced and cheered in the capital, Ouagadougou, after Mr Compaore's resignation was broadcast.

On Thursday, protesters angry at his attempt to amend the constitution set fire to parliament and government buildings. There was a euphoric atmosphere in the Place de la Nation as the thousands of protesters heard that Blaise Compaore was no longer their president. But the crowds have no intention of going home, as they are unhappy that Gen Honore Traore has been appointed as transitional head.

He is seen as too close to the ousted president - he was Blaise Compaore's aide de camp - and for these demonstrators that is not enough of a rupture with the past. "This is not a coup - this is a popular uprising," one man in the crowd said.

How Blaise Compaore sparked his own downfall' 'Social peace'

Mr Compaore had earlier vowed to remain in power until a transitional government completed its work in 2015, although he had agreed not to seek another term. However, the opposition continued to demand that he resign - a key leader, Zephirin Diabre, urged protesters to occupy public spaces. After the resignation, Mr Diabre told the BBC's Focus on Africa radio programme that he was relieved by the resignation and called on opposition groups to "work on the transition to take care of our country".

It could be a year before elections are held, he said, "because you need to revive the constitution, maybe draw up a new constitution. That would take at least 12 months". Mr Compaore's statement, which he read on television, said: "In order to preserve the democratic gains, as well as social peace, I declare a power vacuum to allow the establishment of a transition leading to free and fair elections within a maximum of 90 days." He added: "For my part, I think I have fulfilled my duty."

His whereabouts now remain unclear.

However, media reports said a heavily armed convoy believed to be carrying Mr Compaore was travelling towards the southern town of Po, near the border with Ghana. One protester, Sam, told the BBC: "Blaise Compaore has gone away, he's running away and we are happy. The words are not coming so easy because I'm very happy, my children are going to know another president." Under Article 43 of the constitution, the president of the senate should take over after the president resigns, and elections should take place between 60 and 90 days afterwards. However, the military announced a state of emergency and the dissolution of both houses of parliament on Thursday - effectively leaving a power vacuum.

Army split?

In his statement, military chief Gen Traore said: "In line with constitutional measures, and given the power vacuum... I will assume as of today my responsibilities as head of state." But army spokesman Lt Col Isaac Zida later told reporters the constitution had been suspended. "The civilian and armed forces have decided to take the destiny of the nation in hand," he said. The "length and makeup of the transitional body [responsible for organising elections] will be decided later," he added. It was unclear whether Lt Col Zida was speaking on behalf of Gen Traore, or as a rival. The BBC's Yacouba Ouedraogo, in Ouagadougou, says there may be a split in the army, with Lt Col Zida saying he will lead the transition, not Gen Honore Traore.

Blaise Compaore's three decades of power'

Blaise Compaore's career

Blaise Compaore was a young army officer when he seized power in 1987. A taciturn man, he became known as Beau Blaise - good-looking Blaise. The nickname did not necessarily suggest he was popular. Many blamed him for the death of his predecessor, the charismatic revolutionary Thomas Sankara, who was killed by soldiers in mysterious circumstances. Controversy would be a perpetual feature of Beau Blaise's time in power. The president was accused of stoking rebellions around West Africa. Yet over time Mr Compaore oversaw a transformation of his image, internationally at least. This inflammatory figure became a man relied upon to put out fires around the region. Mr Compaore won a series of elections, though the opposition always complained the odds were stacked dramatically in his favour. He largely followed the economic orthodoxy prescribed by international financial institutions. But Burkina Faso did not escape the poverty trap. It remains one of the least developed countries in the world.

Burkina Faso 'Black Spring' protests: parliament set ablaze‘

(News updates) The people of Burkina Faso have literally burned their government to the ground. Incredible. City hall, parliament, among others, in smoke.

Anti-government protesters set fire to the parliament building in the capital of Burkina Faso, leading President Compaore to declare a state of emergency. The parliament building in the capital of Burkina Faso was set on fire today as protesters began to march on the presidential palace. "October 30 is Burkina Faso's Black Spring, like the Arab Spring," opposition protestor Emile Pargui Pare told the AFP news agency. The President has now declared a state of emergency and called on the opposition to end its protests. The opposition has held talks with a retired general about setting up a transitional government.

Opposition leader Zephirin Diabre rejected the state of emergency order. "The state of emergency is unacceptable. We are calling on the people to show that they are against it. The resignation of President Blaise Compaore is the only thing that can bring peace to the country," he said. The anti-government protesters took over the state TV station in Ouagadougou, the capital of the country.

Protesters marched yesterday as opposition parties announced a civil disobedience campaign in response to President Compaore seeking to change the constitution to enable him to seek re-election. MPs have suspended the vote in the wake of the deaths of five protesters. Protesters marched yesterday as opposition parties announced a civil disobedience campaign in response to President Compaore seeking to change the constitution to enable him to seek re-election. Protesters took over the parliament building. The main airport is shut.

A solider ran from protesters today as they took over the capital. The city hall and the headquarters of the ruling party were also set ablaze. A YouTube video captured a statue of the president being toppled. An annalist on the west African region commented, ―African butchers! No one will save you when time ripens and people start to rip you apart. Western countries would send plane to pick up their citizens leaving you to sweat it out alone.‖

Burkina Faso 'Black Spring' protests: Protesters set fire to Parliament after MPs made plans to extend the 27-year rule of President Blaise Compaore.

(News updates 3:24 p.m.) Ouagadougou, Burkina Faso, is the scene of mass protests, flames, and tear gas after citizens organized in the capital to show their disdain for President Blaise Compaore, who has been the leader of his country for the last 27 years. Despite this lengthy reign, parliament is considering a constitutional amendment in order to lift the term limits that prohibit him from running for office or holding the presidency in 2015. The vote on the amendment has been suspended temporarily, but the citizens of Burkina Faso have nevertheless set both city hall and the ruling party headquarters on fire.

Compaore first became president in 1987 through a coup and has been reelected four times since.

However, all of the elections have been disputed. The United States, France, and European Union "have called on him to scrap the proposed constitutional amendment," the BBC reported. The United States and France are close allies of Burkina Faso's and have established military bases in the region to combat Islamic terrorism in the greater Sahel area of Africa. The allies believe changing the constitution "could jeopardise Burkina Faso's stability." As Al Jazeera notes, Burkina Faso has been "typically known for relative stability and economic growth in a volatile region."

While Western powers hope to calm the situation, protesters seem to have other plans. Emile Pargui, an official with the opposition Movement of People for Progress, told AFP, "October 30 is Burkina Faso's Black Spring, like the Arab Spring." Activists have called for a continued campaign of civil disobedience until Compaore steps down, according to the BBC.

The military, meanwhile, clashed with protesters who attempted to take over parliament buildings, dispersing the crowd with tear gas fired from a helicopter, though the protesters eventually succeeded in their mission. According to AFP reporters on the ground, "About 1,500 people managed to break through the security cordon and ransacked parliamentary offices, set fire to documents, stole computer equipment, and set fire to cars outside." State television has gone off the air as a result. Just after 3 p.m. ET, the Burkina Faso military announced the dissolution of government and parliament. The protesters, for their part, have vowed to keep fighting and plan to march into other government buildings. (Text ends)

BURKINAFASO —BLACK SPRING PROTESTS‖

TIMELINE: Angry demonstrators in Burkina Faso went on the rampage on Thursday in protest at plans to allow President Blaise Compaore to extend his 27-year rule, setting parliament on fire and wreaking havoc across the capital. Protesters pose with a police shield outside the parliament in Ouagadougou as cars and documents burn outside. Hundreds of angry demonstrators in Burkina Faso stormed parliament before setting it on fire in protest at plans to allow President Blaise Compaore to extend his 27-year rule.

Police had fired tear gas on protesters to try to prevent them from moving in on the National Assembly building ahead of a vote on the controversial legislation. But about 1,500 people managed to break through the security cordon and were ransacking parliament.

Burkina Faso troops shoot in the air in an attempt to disperse protesters outside the parliament building

Black smoke billowed out of smashed windows at the parliament building, where several offices were ravaged by flames

A protestor walks past a swimming pool as protestors ransack the Azalai Hotel in Ouagadougou.

An anti-government protester has thrown a tear gas canister back at riot police in Ouagadougou.

Anti-government protesters take over the parliament building in Ouagadougou, capital of Burkina Faso

Riot police arrested several anti-government protesters

Troops faced more protestors in the capital Ouagadougou

An anti-government protester is shot during clashes with police in Ouagadougou.

Men shout slogans in front of burning cars near Burkina Faso's parliament

Protestors near the burning parliament building.

Burkina Faso troops try to disperse protesters outside the parliament

Protestors pour water on injured men near the parliament

Cars and documents burn outside Burkina Faso's parliament

Source: The Independent

BURKINA FASO: The West's armed puppets broken by the masses‘

COUNTERFIRE NEWS UPDATES (November 3, 2014)

The uprising of the masses in Burkina Faso proves western arms and support doesn't guranatee unrestrained tyrannical control

(By Explo Nani-Kofi) The recent uprising of the masses in Burkina Faso should be a lesson for those who think that being armed to teeth and supported by the western military powers means unrestrained tyrannical control of their countries Despite French military presence and political intolerance of opposition, the myth surrounding one of Africa‘s long serving tyrants has been broken by the masses of working people showing what people‘s power is. France launched its supposed anti-terrorist programme making Ouagadougou, the capital of Burkina Faso, one of its bases just in August 2014.

In 1976, Jean-Baptiste Boukary Lingani, Henri Zongo, Thomas Sankara and Blaise Compaore formed the ―Communist Officers‘ Group‖ within the armed forces in Burkina Faso. One of their members, Thomas Sankara, was appointed Secretary of State for Information in a military government in 1981 but resigned in 1982 for what he saw as the government‘s anti-labour drift. Sankara was again appointed Prime Minister in another military in January 1983 but dismissed in May 1983 because of revolutionary rhetoric which the French were uncomfortable with.

He was placed under house arrest together with Jean-Baptiste Boukary Lingani and Henri Zongo whilst Blaise Compaore was not touched. There was an uprising which led to their release and a coup d‘etat on 4 August 1983 and Thomas Sankara became the President changing the country‘s name from Haute Volta to Burkina Faso which means ―Land of Incorruptible People‖. During the rule of Thomas Sankara, he led the country with a revolutionary orientation of self-reliance. He championed the campaign for the cancellation of the odious debt of developing nations, emphasised the enslavement character of foreign aid and the relationship with the International Monetary Fund as well as the World Bank.

He was an admirer of Fidel Castro-led revolution in Cuba. The government actively promoted land reform and agrarian self-sufficiency, prioritised education with a nation-wide literacy campaign and promoted public health. Sankara's commitment to women‘s rights led to the government abolishing female genital mutilation, forced marriages and polygamy. Corrupt officials were tried and punished.

In 1987 Sankara fell out with trade unionists who had been his allies in the past. On 15 October 1987, Thomas Sankara, together with twelve other colleagues of his were killed in a coup d‘etat led by his former colleague, Blaise Compaore. After the coup, Blaise Compaore appeared to be heading a triumvirate with his two other colleagues of the ―Communist Officers‘ Group‖ – Jean-Baptiste Boukary Lingani and Henri Zongo.

On 18 September 1989, Jean-Baptiste Boukary Lingani, Henri Zongo and two other officers were arrested, alleged to be plotting to overthrow the regime, and were executed. It is worth pointing out that when members of the ―Communist Officers' Group‖ were placed under house arrest in 1983, Compaore was the only one among them who was free and now he has killed all his friends who were out under house arrest earlier.

When Sankara was overthrown, the usurpers tried to placate all forces alleging the breaking of relations with those who not long ago were friends and in this case they listed trade unionists and militant workers as well as relations with neighbouring Cote d'Ivoire and former colonial power – France. Gradually, Compaore reversed all the pro-people policies which were developed during the Thomas Sankara era. Blaise Compaore became a major ally of USA and France in the West African sub-region.

He became a peace broker and facilitated peace, being the mediator in the Inter-Togolese Dialogue in 2006, in the crisis of Cote d'Ivoire in 2007 and between representatives of Malian coup d'etat and other regional leaders in 2012. He is also known to have had a hand in the brutal wars in Liberia and Sierra Leone as such being like a double edged knife. Compaore won elections in 1991 boycotted by the main opposition and in 1998 with a pitifully poor turn out at the polls.

In 2000, there was a constitutional amendment which reduced the term of office from 7 years to 5 years and also that the President could not serve more than two terms. Although, Compaore had served two terms the amendment did not apply retroactively so he stood for elections in 2005 and 2010 and was re-elected as President.

An attempt to amend the constitution to allow him to contest election for a fifth term has provoked the present uprising. The masses' uprising started on 29th October 2014. On 30 October, tens of thousands of people gathered in the streets and burnt government buildings, including the city hall, the ruling Congress of Democracy and Progress (CDP) party headquarters, and parts of the National Assembly. The state radio and television station was also stormed. A number of people died in the violence as police and soldiers tried to stop the uprising.

Violent protest occurred in the second largest city Bobo Dioulasso and in the northern city of Ouahigouya. The constitutional proposals were withdrawn, but Compaore declaring a state of emergency declared that he was going to stay in office and have a year transition in which he was prepared to consult with the opposition which he didn't find necessary to do for 27 years. He might not have seen that it was too little and too late. As huge crowds gathered in Ouagadougou, one army officer, who was not identified by name, signaled that the military had abandoned the president, telling protesters that the ―army is henceforth at the side of the people.‖

Morocco will stage the next 16-team African Cup in January and February. Cameroon, Ivory Coast and Guinea have been named as hosts for 2019, 2021 and 2023 respectively. CAF said it will name the 2017 host early next year. By 31 October, Compaore finally resigned and fled the country. Later, General Honore Traore, the army chief, declared that he was heading the transitional government but a counter announcement came from Lt Col Isaac Yacouba Zida, the second-in-command of the presidential guard, that instead he was the one heading the transitional government.

About 1,000 people gathered on Sunday 2nd November to demand a civilian and democratic transition a day after the military announced that the lieutenant colonel is in charge. It is interesting to note that the French troops made no attempt to protect Compaore reinforcing the known reality that the west has permanent interests and not permanent friends.

The African Union chairperson, Nkosazana Dlamini-Zuma has also called for a civilian-led transition.There is the danger of the military hijacking the struggle for which the masses have fought and even died for. To prevent this will not depend on just Burkinabes but all progressive Africans and the masses as well as all internationalists. Let us mobilise in solidarity with the masses in Burkina Faso so that they wouldn't have toiled for the same forces who misruled the country together with Compaore to take over. (Text ends)

November 12, 2014: In October 2014 yet another African nation underwent a revolution. This time it was Burkina Faso, a former French colony that became independent in 1960, suffered under a series of corrupt or revolutionary dictators until one (Blaise Compaore) took over in 1987 and managed to hold onto power for 27 years until the winds of change finally caught up with him and he resigned on October 31st. This came after two days of demonstrations that the security forces, despite killing 32 people and wounding hundreds, could not control. The immediate cause of the unrest was Compaore's effort to get a law passed to allow him to run for office again. For over a decade Compaore had been keeping revolution in check with a series of reforms that, whatever else they did (and it was not much) left him in charge. Compaore finally ran out of angles and new schemes. Military commanders who took over until elections can be held in 2015 are not considered completely trustworthy and there is widespread fear that the country will end up with another dictator.

Burkina Faso is a small (17 million population) landlocked country near the West Coast of Africa and the Equator. It is one of the least developed countries in Africa, largely because of the corruption and over half a century of one-man rule. The dictators tended to put more emphasis on retaining power than in forsetering economic freedom and growth. The most powerful people in Burkina Faso are dependent on a web of corrupt government and commercial relationships for their own wealth and power. Dismantling all these relationships is not easy. Thus while the most corrupt and powerful man, Blaise Compaore, is out of power the people who kept him in charge for so long are still running the government and the military. The opposition to the corruption and Blaise Compaore himself was never able to unite and the recent unrest was more of a spontaneous explosion of frustration by many people who were just fed up.

Rulers that stay in power for decades are still common in Africa. Even when there are elections that bring in new leaders on a regular basis. These ―democratically elected‖ presidents tend to all be from the same party, one that usually practices organized corruption by a coalition of powerful families. While cell phones and Internet access have enabled many Africans to easily communicate with each other, a major discussion topic is the seemingly unshakeable power of the corrupt families that dominate government and commerce throughout the continent. Being able to discuss the problem with other victims does not automatically fix things.

What the cellphones and Internet do provide is easier ways to organize demonstrations and organized opposition to dictators. The perpetual unrest might attract some international peacekeepers, but it is no quick way to obtain an end to corruption and dictatorship. The people of Burkina Faso are not eager for the kind of endless civil war and violence so common in neighboring countries, but at the moment they are not willing to just accept any replacement for Compaore. The UN, the AU (African Union), France (who originally sponsored Compaore) and all the neighbors are hoping for the best and bracing for the worst.

BURKINAFASO: Military has overthrown the Interim

Government Why are coups common in Africa?

Burkina Faso's military has overthrown the interim government in a coup that has plunged the capital city, Ouagadougou, into panic. It happened just three weeks before the country was due to hold general elections. General Gilbert Diendere has been declared the country's new leader.

Burkina Faso is not an exception in Africa. The continent has seen at least 200 successful or failed coups since the 1960s. Some thought the continent had begun to shake off its reputation for military takeovers - especially after the democratic changes of the 1990s. So, why are coups so common in some parts of Africa? And what can governments do to stop them?

Presenter: Folly Bah Thibaul

David Zounmenou - Senior Researcher at the South African Institute for Security Studies.

Gabriel Leon - Lecturer in Political Economy at King's College London. Gabriel specialises in military coups and their causes.

Cynthia Ohayon - West Africa Analyst for International Crisis

Group. Source: Al Jazeera

September 19, 2015: African Union suspends Burkina Faso from organization.

Side note: The African Union has suspended Burkina Faso over Thursday's military coup. The AU said sanctions would be imposed if members of the presidential guard, who staged the coup do not release members of the interim government which includes the interim president, Michel Kafondo. The mediatory team comprises of West African leaders, presidents Macky Sall of Senegal and President Boni Yayi of Benin Republic to quickly restore Burkina Faso to the path of order, democracy and constitutionalism.

USAFRICOM Behind the Coup in Burkina Faso https://libya360.wordpress.com/2015/09/20/africom-behind-coup-in-burkina-faso/

Analysis By Wayne Madsen http://www.strategic-culture.org/authors/wayne-madsen.html

An elite army unit briefly took control of Burkina Faso in a coup earlier this month before handing back power. There has been ongoing unrest in the West African nation with government forces attacking the barracks of the unit on Tuesday.

There are significant indications that the U.S. Africa Command, or AFRICOM, engineered a military coup in Burkina Faso in order to protect U.S. military bases in the impoverished West African nation. General Gilbert Diendere, the former military aide to the longtime Burkinabe dictator, Blaise Compaore, overthrew Burkina Faso's interim democratic government and established a ruling junta inaptly called the ―National Council for Democracy‖ with himself as the head.

Armed troops loyal to Diendere, the chief of the feared presidential guard that brutally enforced order during Compaore's 27-year rule, stormed into a Cabinet meeting in the Burkinabe capital of Ouagadougou and placed President Michel Kafando and Prime Minister Yacouba Zida under house arrest. There were indications that General Diendere overthrew the government in order to restore Compaore to power.

In August, the transition government's Constitutional Court ruled that the presidential candidate of Compaore's former ruling, Congress for Democracy and Progress party, Eddie Constance Konboigo, was ineligible to run for office. The plans for the military coup against the transition government were formulated after the court's ruling.

Ousted during a popular rebellion in 2014, Compaore fled to the neighboring Ivory Coast, another nation where AFRICOM has significant influence within the armed forces. Ivorian president Alassane Ouattara, who originally hails from Burkina Faso, then-Upper Volta, is a close friend and ally of Compaore. Ouattara was placed into office as president of Ivory Coast after dubious interference by the U.S. National Endowment for Democracy (NED), a cipher for the U.S. Central Intelligence Agency (CIA), as well as non-governmental organizations financed by George Soros's Open Society Institute.

Diendere has been an active participant in AFRICOM's annual FLINTLOCK military exercises. He even served as the chairman for the Burkina Faso FLINTLOCK Committee. Under the rule of Compaore, Burkina Faso permitted AFRICOM and the CIA to set up two secretive bases inside Burkina Faso, one a drone base at Ouagadougou Airport with the operational code-named of CREEK SAND and a classified regional intelligence fusion center attached to the U.S. embassy in Ouagadougou bearing the code-named of AZTEC ARCHER.

AFRICOM heavily relied on Diendere to support the U.S. Trans-Sahara Counter Terrorism Partnership and U.S. military special operations against Islamist guerrillas active in Mali, Mauritania, Niger, and southern Algeria. AFRICOM also provided training to Diendere's elite Presidential Security Regiment (RSP) that carried out the coup against Burkina Faso's democratic transitionary government. Diendere's closest AFRICOM liaison officer was U.S. Army Colonel Kurt Crytzer.

Although the coup against the Burkinabe government was condemned by United Nations Secretary General Ban Ki-moon and French President Francois Hollande, the criticism from the U.S. State Department was couched in typical muted terms. It was clear that the State Department did not want to appear to be aggressively condemning a coup that was hatched and carried out by the Pentagon's and CIA's military friends in Burkina Faso. Hollande also appeared to have forgotten that in 2008 Diendere was awarded one of France's most prestigious military medals, the Legion of Honor.

While he was Burkina Faso's dictator, Compaore was feted by U.S. President Barack Obama at the White House and at a reception for foreign leaders in New York who were attending the annual UN General Assembly plenary session. Compaore personally assassinated Burkina Faso's revolutionary and progressive leader Thomas Sankara in a CIA- and French intelligence-backed military coup in 1987. Sankara was an ally of Cuban leader Fidel Castro and a strong opponent of the World Bank and U.S. President Ronald Reagan's aggressive military policies in the Third World. On Compaore's orders, Sankara's body was dismembered and buried in an unmarked grave. Many Burkinabe believe that Diendere was, along with Compaore, personally involved in murdering Sankara and disposing of his body. With the approval of Washington, Compaore reversed all of Sankara's progressive policies and returned Burkina Faso to a neo-colonialist outpost of U.S. and French dominance over Africa.

Among the candidates planning to run for president of Burkina Faso were a number of loyalists of Sankara, known as ―Sankarists.‖ One leading Sankarist candidate, Bénéwendé Sankara, the leader of the ―l'Union pour la renaissance-Parti sankariste‖ (UNIR-PS), was considered a favorite to become the next president. Although no relation to the assassinated president, Sankara has long been a defender of his late namesake's progressive leftist policies.

The CIA and AFRICOM became alarmed that a follower of Sankara could be elected president, this jeopardizing America‘s covert military and intelligence operations in Burkina Faso.

Conveniently, Obama‘s mother, Stanley Ann Dunham, who served as an ―economic hit woman‖ for the Ford Foundation, World Bank, and CIA in Indonesia, Suriname, Pakistan, Bangladesh, Kenya, and the Philippines, was in Ghana when the 1987 coup against Sankara was launched. Although her role in the coup is subject to speculation, her record is rife with close involvement with the governments of dictators like Suharto of Indonesia, General Muhammad Zia Ul-Haq of Pakistan, and Ferdinand Marcos of the Philippines.

Diendere was involved in a number of armed conflicts in Africa that have also involved CIA and Israeli Mossad operatives. These include the bloody civil wars in Sierra Leone and Liberia. Diendere was also involved in the shipment of arms from Romania to the CIA-supported UNITA guerrillas in Angola during the time that the Angolan group was subject to a UN arms embargo. There is evidence that Diendere was also involved in illegally supplying arms to Ouattara loyalists in Ivory Coast. The illicit weapons, transported to Ivory Coast without the authorization of the Brazilian government but with the knowledge of the CIA and Soros groups, originated with the Brazilian arms manufacturer Condor S/A. Industria Quimica.

As Burkina Faso‘s chief spymaster, Diendere maintained regular contact with the CIA‘s station chief in Ouagadougou and top AFRICOM intelligence officers.

A number of Africa specialists predicted that AFRICOM would become a protection racket designed to maintain in power America‘s client-dictators in Africa. The events in Burkina Faso have borne out the prediction. This author‘s book, ―Decade of Death: Secret Wars and Genocide in Africa 1993-2003,‖ warned that U.S. foreign policy in Africa would be ―militarized‖ under AFRICOM with the U.S. State Department‘s role in determining American policy vis-à-vis Africa demoted to a mere advisory role.

With West Africa facing increased desertification as a result of global climate change, America‘s policies in pan-Sahel Africa have almost exclusively been concentrated on stemming the activities of Salafist insurgent groups such as Boko Haram in Nigeria, Chad, Cameroon, and Niger and Ansar al Dine in Mali. Diendere has been a major figure in AFRICOM anti-insurgency operations extending from Chad in the east to Mali in the west. The Salafists in West Africa would not have gained as much strength had it not been for the AFRICOM/NATO operations in Libya that overthrew that nation's leader, Muammar Qaddafi, in 2011. AFRICOM and NATO have cynically used the expansion of Salafist extremism throughout West Africa to justify a greater U.S. military presence in the entire region.

Acting as agents for the Pentagon and CIA are local military commanders like Diendere in Burkina Faso and Brigadier General Zakaria Ngobongue in Chad. These military officers, who have been groomed by AFRICOM, are nothing more than protection agents for U.S. imperial interests and reprise the roles of British colonial agents during the height of the British Empire.

Burkina Faso Coup Leaders Refuse to Disarmhttps://libya360.wordpress.com/2015/09/28/burkina-faso-coup-leaders-refuse-to-disarm/

Can the popular movement push ahead with the Sankaraist revolutionary program? By Abayomi Azikiwe Libya 360° Gen. Gilbert Diendere, a former intelligence chief for the President Security Regiment (RSP), was forced to release interim President Michel Kafando and Prime Minister Isaac Zida by the last full week of September. These…

Political Unrest Continues in Burkina Faso as Masses Reject Militaryhttps://libya360.wordpress.com/2015/09/21/political-unrest-continues-in-burkina-faso-as-masses-reject-military/Presidential Security Regiment faces clashes with broader army over the future of the country By Abayomi Azikiwe Libya 360° A highly fluid political situation has been developing in the West African state of Burkina Faso after an elite military unit seized power on September 17, just weeks ahead of a…

Civilian Rule Restored in Burkina Faso, the Land of Upright Menhttps://libya360.wordpress.com/2015/09/19/civilian-rule-restored-in-burkina-faso-the-land-of-upright-men/

Who will assume control in Burkina Faso and what will it mean? By Ann Garrison Reuters and other major outlets are reporting that this week's coup d'état in Burkina Faso has been reversed and that civilian rule will be restored tomorrow. Transcript: KPFA Weekend News Anchor Sharon Sobotta: A coup…

The Day 15 October 1987: is the day the great son of Africa, and the pan-Africanist leader Major Thomas Sankara was murdered by his adopted sell-out comrade Majour Blaisse Campaore, now that recent Autopsy has confirmed that his body was riddled with lots of bullets, and 12 other flanking soldiers who were killed with him burried next to him were only having 1 or 2 bullets In their body. Now that the truth is coming out traitor Blaisse Campaore and his crew must be prosecuted and publicly held accountable for their bodies riddled by bullets.

HISTORICIZE

Thomas Sankara: The Upright Pan-Africanist

Kearoma Mosata African Exponent Staff Writer

Wednsday July 6, 2016

Thomas Sankara's policies were oriented toward fighting corruption, reforestation, averting famine, and making education and health real priorities.

Thomas Sankara became the president of Burkina Faso, the then Upper Volta in 1983 after leading a coup that saw him take the presidential seat. He seized power at the age of 33, his main goal being to eliminate corruption and the dominance of the French colonial power.

His policies were oriented toward fighting corruption, reforestation, averting famine, and making education and health real priorities. The coup that saw him claim the presidency was organized alongside his then comrade, Blaise Compaore, whom he had befriended during their military training. He is commonly known as ―Africa‘s Che Guevara‖ which really is fitting for him with regards to his personality and political ideas. Thomas Sankara was greatly inspired by the Cuban revolution.

Surprisingly, the counter-coup in October 1987 that led to his death was led by his ―friend‖ Blaise Compaore who had now turned against Sankara‘s ideas. Of course he quickly denied any involvement in the assassination and by the evening of Sankara‘s death he became the president.

Thomas Sankara served a term that ended abruptly in 1987 but for the short time span he was in power, he left quite a mark. Below are 4 reasons he was and is still considered a hero;

1. Pan-Africanism

Thomas Sankara believed that anyone who wasn‘t an African didn‘t have much knowledge on the continent and therefore couldn‘t dictate how an African country was run. He was referring to the French who had colonized Upper Volta. In one of his speeches he said, ―Our country produces enough to feed us all. Alas, for lack of organization, we are forced to beg for food aid. It's this aid that instills in our spirits the attitude of beggars.‖ He believed that Burkina Faso and Africa in general has the ability to be self-reliant and not rely on foreign aid. He therefore fought hard to rid his country of the influence of the French. Sankara advocated for the local production and consumption of locally-made goods and instilled in his people the belief that they could solve their food and water scarcity problems through mobilized self-sufficiency. Many of Sankara's foreign policies were largely focused on anti-imperialism. He blamed the imperialism and the foreign companies which made profits with Africa, denying its development so that they can keep selling products to a continent which could be self-sufficient.

2. Educational and Health Reforms

Sankara believed that education and health should be highly valued and so he ensured that his people had the best of these. He launched a nationwide literacy campaign, and families were ordered to have their children vaccinated. This was after some families had denied their children vaccination due to cultural and religious beliefs. In 1984, Sankara's government organized the vaccination of almost 3 million children in a little over two weeks. The Burkinabe government was also the first African government to claim that AIDS was a major threat for Africa. He also championed environmental conservation with tree-planting campaigns and greening projects. According to Ernest Harsch, author of a recent biography of Sankara, Burkinabe built for the first time schools, health centers, water reservoirs, rail, with little or no external assistance.

3. Gender Equality

Thomas Sankara was one of the few leaders who believed in equal rights for all. One of his famous quotes was that ―The revolution and women's liberation go together. We do not talk of women's emancipation as an act of charity or out of a surge of human compassion. It is a basic necessity for the revolution to triumph. Women hold up the other half of the sky.‖ He therefore made policies that ensured that women were also included in the governing of the country and not be given the back seat. His government included a large number of women and he also ensured they were afforded opportunities to go into careers that were mostly considered for men. Improving women's status was one of Sankara's explicit goals that were unprecedented in West Africa. His government banned female circumcision, condemned polygamy, and promoted the use of contraceptives.

4. Honest Leadership

One hindering factor in present day Africa is corrupt leaders. Thomas Sankara believed that leaders and those in high posts were just the same as nationals living in the rural areas. He believed that even he as the president did not deserve any perks by virtue of his position. Sankara cut minister‘s salaries and perks starting with his own and lived in the same brick house that he had lived in previously. He believed that no one was above farm work, or graveling roads–not even the president, government ministers or army officers. Even individuals who held the highest posts were required to work in local community development projects.

Many have said that Sankara‘s death is an example of failed chances in Africa. However he remains an inspiration to many; he serves to remind us that we do have the power to unite Africa and move it forward. A week prior to his death, Sankara addressed people and said that "while revolutionaries as individuals can be murdered, you cannot kill ideas." Although, this great leader is no longer alive to come up with more ideas that could see the African continent flourish, his ideas and principles live on.

HISORICIZE

Thomas Sankara“s Legacy: Feats He Achieved in Just 4 Years as President of Burkina Faso

Tatenda Gwaambuka African Exponent Staff Writer

July 27, 2016

Thomas Sankara was a man ahead of his own time. He was a forward thinking leader and no wonder his ideas seem even more relevant with time.

The former President of Burkina Faso, President Blaise Compaore will go on trial in November over the alleged assassination of former president Thomas Sankara. Alioune Zanre, a commissioner of the tribunal told journalists that 13 others would also face trial in connection with the crime. Thomas Sankara was killed on October 15, 1987 in a coup that brought Blaise Compaore, his close friend, to power. Compaore himself, was deposed in October 2014 by the masses who opposed his bid to change the country‘s constitution and extend his 27 year hold on power. Most of the protesters said they had been inspired by Sankara‘s legacy. What is this legacy? Bear in mind that Sankara was only leader for 4 years and yet his short tenure keeps changing the trajectory of politics in Burkina Faso and the rest of the African continent almost 30 years later. It has been said Thomas Sankara was a man ahead of his own time. He was a forward thinking leader and no wonder his ideas seem even more relevant with time.

What exactly did the great Captain Sankara want of his country? A retired professor of economics, Noel Nebie told Al Jazeera, ―Sankara wanted a thriving Burkina Faso, relying on local human and natural resources as opposed to foreign aid and starting with agriculture, which represents more than 32 percent of the country's GDP and employs 80 percent of the working population, he smashed the economic elite who controlled most of the arable land and granted access to subsistence farmers. That improved production making the country almost self-sufficient.‖

Changing the economics

Sankara did away with the luxuries widely associated with the oligarchs of Africa. His car was nothing fancy; a relatively cheap Renault 5 which was the same make used by ministers. Gone were the grand and expensive presidential cars and unnecessary convoys too. Joan Baxter, who was a BBC reporter at the time says, ―Sankara could often be seen moving about the capital Ouagadougou, in the front seat of his little black Renault, arm out the window and waiting like everyone else for traffic lights to change.‖ This was in comparison to the loud processions that would close down major roads ―hours before the president came through in a cacophony of sirens and a blur of speeding BMW motorcycles, luxury sedans, jeeps and military vehicles‖. Sankara was not that kind of man. He went on to ban the use of air conditioners in government buildings except in the three hottest months of the year in a bid to control the state energy bills. His salary was the equivalent of $450 and he had reduced the salaries of all public servants.

Championing gender equality

Sankara was a forward thinking leader whose policies make more sense now than they would have in the 1980s. He was not scared to think differently and be loud about it too. One International Women's Day, he gave a speech reminding Burkinabe men that they all had mothers yet they treated their own wives ―worse than cattle‖.He did not simply create policies detached from the woman on the ground, the poor woman who would not benefit from quotas for government positions. Sankara went down to the family unit and addressed issues from there going up. He gave an anti-prostitution decree and even went as far as having a conference with sex-workers. He then told the assembled women that they were victims of social injustice and advised them to take up ―honourable professions‖. Sankara did not just speak, he made certain that State-owned restaurants employed the women. As if that was not enough change for a short four years, Sankara also outlawed female genital mutilation, forced marriages and polygamy.

Promoting self-sufficiency

One of the most famous Sankara quotes is, ―He who feeds you, controls you.‖ The wisdom in that statement cannot be doubted. In early 1987, he had delivered a speech about producing and eating Burkinabe. Baxter says, ―Sankara maintained that political independence was meaningless if African countries were still tied to the economic apron strings of their former colonial ad other neo-colonial powers.‖ According to him, there were trees that abounded in the Sahel which produced delicious and nutritious fruits that were going to waste. In a bid to save the local tomato industry, he declared a ―Day of the Tomato‖ to educate the populace on preservation techniques. He also spoke out against importing apples from France when Burkina Faso had tropical fruits that could not be sold. His thinking was, ―...people buy them because they come from Europe and not from our trees here, because they can't resist the temptation to eat just like a French man.‖ Baxter calls him the first ―locavore‖ but his intention to produce locally did not simply revolve around food. After having a hard time getting financing for a railway project that would connect Benin to Cote d'Ivoire, he launched a programme to complete the railway with limited foreign aid. 62 kilometres of rail were laid by the Burkinabe between 1985 and 1987. Instead of grovelling for aid, he tapped into the strength of his people and achieved success.

Building Burkina Faso, Inspiring Africa

One of the greatest feats achieved by Sankara was naming his country, Burkina Faso, ―The land of the upright man‖. This united his country yet etching a fundamental value of his people; honesty above all else. This spoke volumes about the country's approach to corruption and all manner of vices in the country. The exploits of Thomas Sankara cannot be fully documented without doing a disservice to the man's legacy. What is clear is that he was larger than life and it only took him four years to change the thinking of all Africans. He may have had his flaws like every other man but his positive work in mapping a self-sustainable route to African success is undoubtedly proof of a legend at work. His ideas live on! In his own words, ―While revolutionaries as individuals can be murdered, you cannot kill ideas.‖

HISTORICIZE

Burkina Faso Inaugurates Memorial Project for Thomas Sankara

September 4, 2016

Captain Sankara is one of Africa's most revered revolutionaries. He led Burkina Faso from August 1983 until his assassination on 15 October 1987.

Burkina Faso has embarked on an important journey to honour the legacy of Captain Thomas Sankara, with the inauguration of a memorial for the revolutionary leader on the site he was murdered. The initiative which was long overdue will see a newly formed foundation headed by Ghana's former President Jerry Rawlings receive funds for the memorial to include a museum to preserve the history, and ideals that Sankara stood for.

Captain Thomas Sankara, President of Burkina Faso, salutes 31 August 1986 upon his arrival in Harare for the 8th Summit of Non-aligned countries. Photo: ANP

Burkina Faso has embarked on an important journey to honour the legacy of Captain Thomas Sankara, with the inauguration of a memorial, a tribute to the revolutionary leader on the site he was murdered.

The initiative which was long overdue will see a newly formed foundation headed by Ghana's former President Jerry Rawlings receive funds to build a memorial to preserve the history, and ideals that Sankara stood for.Rawlings, a close ally of Sankara was named as the chairperson of the foundation, which will oversee the construction of the memorial, which will include a museum and is estimated to cost around U.S. $8 million, the BBC reports.

In four years during his tenure as leader of Burkina Faso, the charismatic and outspoken revolutionary transformed the country from being a poor country, dependent on foreign aid, to an economically independent and socially progressive nation. Sankara was killed in a coup d'etat in which President Blaise Compaore, his former comrade-in-arms, took power.

A true humanist, fervent Pan-Africanist, Sankara was unapologetically an anti-imperialist stalwart, and proponent of women's rights. His legacy continues to inspire a generation, and he remains one of the most extraordinary and charismatic African leaders, who strongly believed in African unity, the African liberation struggle, it's social and economic freedom. Nearly every Burkinabe love Sankara but Sankarist parties receive little support from voters. How many —realll Sankarists are in Burkina Faso?

Burkina Faso updates
Honours the Legacy of Captain Thomas Sankara With Memorial Project

Burkina Faso has embarked on an important journey to honour the legacy of Captain Thomas Sankara, with the inauguration of a memorial for the revolutionary leader on the site he was murdered. The initiative which was long overdue will see a newly formed foundation headed by Ghana's former President Jerry Rawlings receive funds for the memorial to include a museum to preserve the history, and ideals that Sankara stood for.

Captain Thomas Sankara, President of Burkina Faso, salutes 31 August 1986 upon his arrival in Harare for the 8th Summit of Non-aligned countries. Burkina Faso has embarked on an important journey to honour the legacy of Captain Thomas Sankara, with the inauguration of a memorial, a tribute to the revolutionary leader on the site he was murdered.

The initiative which was long overdue will see a newly formed foundation headed by Ghana‘s former President Jerry Rawlings receive funds to build a memorial to preserve the history, and ideals that Sankara stood for.Rawlings, a close ally of Sankara was named as the chairperson of the foundation, which will oversee the construction of the memorial, which will include a museum and is estimated to cost around U.S. $8 million, the BBC reports.

Captain Sankara is one of Africa‘s most revered revolutionaries. He led Burkina Faso from August 1983 until his assassination on 15 October 1987. In four years during his tenure as leader of Burkina Faso, the charismatic and outspoken revolutionary transformed the country from being a poor country, dependent on foreign aid, to an economically independent and socially progressive nation.

Sankara was killed in a coup d‘etat in which President Blaise Compaore, his former comrade-in-arms, took power. A true humanist, fervent Pan-Africanist, Sankara was unapologetically an anti-imperialist stalwart, and proponent of women‘s rights. His legacy continues to inspire a generation, and he remains one of the most extraordinary and charismatic African leaders, who strongly believed in African unity, the African liberation struggle, it‘s social and economic freedom.

The project has been welcomed and applauded by observers and Sankara‘s admirers. The creation of the museum will be crucial to help preserve the memory of one of Africa‘s heroes, which will help revive and espouse his ideas and beliefs. As Kenyan writer Ngũgĩ wa Thiong‘o aptly put it ―Memory is what makes us who we are‖ and as Sankara himself said, ―while revolutionaries as individuals can be murdered, you cannot kill ideas‖.

Burkina Faso passes law to repossess land

africanews with AFP October 14, 2016

The National Assembly of Burkina Faso unanimously adopted a bill aiming to recover more than 105,000 plots of land ―illegally awarded‖ to dignitaries of the former regime of ousted President Blaise Compaoré.

The law on ―the withdrawal of the plots illegally acquired by real estate developers and individuals over the period from 1995 to 2015‖ was adopted Thursday night by 108 members, during a plenary session behind closed doors. ―In view of the serious breach and the fact that we have detected more than 105,000 plots with irregularities, we have proposed a law of resolution on the withdrawal of these illegally occupied plots , the Chairman of the Parliamentary Committee of inquiry, Boureima Barry told AFP.

According to him, the plots will be reintegrated into the public domain. The commission also urged the withdrawal of 20 reserves that shared between the mayors.

Coup attempt foiled in Burkina Faso, government announces
October 21, 2016

Burkina Faso government on Friday announced that it has foiled a coup attempt by former troops of the presidential guard (RSP).

The Interior Minister Simon Compaoré said the coup which was planned by former guards of President Blaise Compaore was scheduled for October 8.

—A group of about 30 men composed mainly of NCOs (non-commissioned officers) and ranked officers of the previous RSP planned to attack several targets at the presidency in Kossyam (Presidential Palace) to take power by force,‖ the Minister of the Interior announced.

The minister said the coup planners wanted to release prisoners from the previous coup of September 2015 and hold some officials hostage before attacking the presidential palace.

—There was no early implementation of the plan put together by Chief Warrant Officer Gaston Coulibaly, assisted by Sergeant Kalifa Zerbo and Private First Class Issaka Yelemou all of the previous RSP,‖ according to the minister.

He explained that the plot was discovered on October 8 when gendarmes arrested four people with —suspicious behavior‖ during a routine check on the Nazinon bridge (140 km south of Ouagadougou).

—During their transfer to the territorial brigade at Po (border town south of the country) for a thorough verification of their identity, they tried to disarm the police and during the fight, two of them were killed and a policeman was shot in the stomach,‖ Compaore said.

Ten soldiers involved in the alleged plot were referred to the military prosecutor of Ouagadougou and about twenty are still in custody. In total 42 people were heard including 32 soldiers and 10 civilians, according to the minister.

Chief Warrant Officer Coulibaly is being —actively sought‖ by the Burkinabe services.

The minister said the coup leaders had also prepared a —plan B‖ in case of a failure by creating chaos and then seizing military weapons in the guard posts —to shoot at all angles in the garrisons.‖ Source: africanews

Thomas Sankara (the late)
"Food Aid Thwarts Development of our Agriculture"!!

Mathew Ogunsina October 26, 2016

—It is normal for one that gives you room dictates his will. When you eat grains of millet, imported maize and rice, that's imperialism, do not go further.‖

—We are against the principle of food aid. We accept that we are facing in spite of us. For now and to avoid, in a simplistic way, our enemies bring our people the claim against us saying that pride hurt instead leads us to reject this food aid, we, the people of the cities, the government, the better off. What we refuse this aid to starve our people.

If we had more opportunity to explain, we would show that food aid helps to create in us a recipient mentality, create a speculative circuits among our producers, shorting has our stores grain marketing structures being engorges aid. A cause even indirectly enrichment of traders, intermediaries. We are against food aid, but we have never said and we will never be against using agricultural equipment we call all our wishes. Today we are prepared to deny hundred thousand tons of grain to accept a plow.

Our development begins with the control of water and the creation of a food industry can absorb and store agricultural products. How fast? A ours. We prefer small units halfway between industry and crafts. We prefer —teufs-teufs‖ electronic machines. We are not opposed to private enterprise that does not affect our honor, our dignity, our sovereignty.

We have the manpower and it can be tempting for international companies to come settle in Burkina Faso a few processing industries or branches of their industries. And we can tell, the statistical point of view, we have a big industry but in reality it will be an industry controlled by foreign powers and external capitalist forces in Burkina. What we want to do by cons is intensifying agriculture including the training effect will be generating an internal development endogenous. For example, conservation and transformation of tomato involve making cold rooms, so artificial cold production, as well as the manufacture of boxes and packaging on site, etc. All this would give birth here in a certain industry. This is why we do not want big projects luxe.Nous are very wary about it.

We refused loans from the World Bank to power projects that we have not chosen … We told the IMF what you ask us, we have already done. We reduced wages the economy, you have nothing to teach us. Now, every time we talked to the IMF, we had to always provide new pledges. It appeared that he seeks us goes far beyond a management control and that what it is is something other than political control. —

REVEALED: New Facts About Thomas Sankara In Burkina Faso You"ve Never Heard

After renaming his country to Burkina Faso, here's Thomas Sankara's accomplishments, ONLY 4 YEARS in power (1983-87).

Thomas Isidore Noël Sankara (21 December 1949 – 15 October 1987) was a Burkinabé military captain, Marxist revolutionary, pan-Africanist theorist, and President of Burkina Faso from 1983 to 1987. Viewed by supporters as a charismatic and iconic figure of revolution, he is commonly referred to as ―Africa's Che Guevara‖

- He vaccinated 2.5 million children against meningitis, yellow fever and measles in a matter of weeks.

- He initiated a nation-wide literacy campaign, increasing the literacy rate from 13% in 1983 to 73% in 1987.

- He planted over 10 million trees to prevent desertification

- He built roads and a railway to tie the nation together, without foreign aid

- He appointed females to high governmental positions, encouraged them to work, recruited them into the military, and granted pregnancy leave during education.

- He outlawed female genital mutilation, forced marriages and polygamy in support of Women's rights

- He sold off the government fleet of Mercedes cars and made the Renault 5 (the cheapest car sold in Burkina Faso at that time) the official service car of the ministers.

- He reduced the salaries of all public servants, including his own, and forbade the use of government chauffeurs and 1st class airline tickets.

- He redistributed land from the feudal landlords and gave it directly to the peasants. Wheat production rose in three years from 1700 kg per hectare to 3800 kg per hectare, making the country food self-sufficient.

- He opposed foreign aid, saying that ―he who feeds you, controls you.‖

- He spoke in forums like the Organization of African Unity against continued neo-colonialist penetration of Africa through Western trade and finance. • He called for a united front of African nations to repudiate their foreign debt. He argued that the poor and exploited did not have an obligation to repay money to the rich and exploiting

- In Ouagadougou, Sankara converted the army's provisioning store into a state-owned supermarket open to everyone (the first supermarket in the country).

- He forced civil servants to pay one month's salary to public projects.

- He refused to use the air conditioning in his office on the grounds that such luxury was not available to anyone but a handful of Burkinabes.

- As President, he lowered his salary to $450 a month and limited his possessions to a car, four bikes, three guitars, a fridge and a broken freezer.

- A motorcyclist himself, he formed an all-women motorcycle personal guard.

- He required public servants to wear a traditional tunic, woven from Burkinabe cotton and sewn by Burkinabe craftsmen. (The reason being to rely upon local industry and identity rather than foreign industry and identity)

- When asked why he didn't want his portrait hung in public places, as was the norm for other African leaders, Sankara replied ―There are seven million Thomas Sankaras.‖

- An accomplished guitarist, he wrote the new national anthem himself

Sankara seized power in a 1983 popularly supported coup at the age of 33, with the goal of eliminating corruption and the dominance of the former French colonial power. He immediately launched one of the most ambitious programmes for social and economic change ever attempted on the African continent. To symbolize this new autonomy and rebirth, he renamed the country from Upper Volta to Burkina Faso (―Land of Upright Man‖). His foreign policies were centered on anti-imperialism, with his government eschewing all foreign aid, pushing for odious debt reduction, nationalizing all land and mineral wealth, and averting the power and influence of the International Monetary Fund (IMF) and World Bank. His domestic policies were focused on preventing famine with agrarian self-sufficiency and land reform, prioritizing education with a nationwide literacy campaign, and promoting public health by vaccinating 2.5 million children against meningitis, yellow fever, and measles. Other components of his national agenda included planting over ten million trees to halt the growing desertification of the Sahel, doubling wheat production by redistributing land from feudal landlords to peasants, suspending rural poll taxes and domestic rents, and establishing an ambitious road and rail construction program to ―tie the nation together‖. On the localized level Sankara also called on every village to build a medical dispensary and had over 350 communities construct schools with their own labour. Moreover, his commitment to women's rights led him to outlaw female genital mutilation, forced marriages and polygamy, while appointing women to high governmental positions and encouraging them to work outside the home and stay in school even if pregnant.

In order to achieve this radical transformation of society, he increasingly exerted authoritarian control over the nation, eventually banning unions and a free press, which he believed could stand in the way of his plans. To counter his opposition in towns and workplaces around the country, he also tried corrupt officials, ―counter-revolutionaries‖ and ―lazy workers‖ in Popular Revolutionary Tribunals. Additionally, as an admirer of Fidel Castro's Cuban Revolution, Sankara set up Cuban-style Committees for the Defense of the Revolution (CDRs).

His revolutionary programs for African self-reliance made him an icon to many of Africa's poor. Sankara remained popular with most of his country's impoverished citizens. However his policies alienated and antagonised the vested interests of an array of groups, which included the small but powerful Burkinabé middle class, the tribal leaders whom he stripped of the long-held traditional right to forced labour and tribute payments, and France and its ally the Ivory Coast. As a result, he was overthrown and assassinated in a coup d'état led by Blaise Compaoré on October 15, 1987. A week before his murder, he declared: ―While revolutionaries as individuals can be murdered, you cannot kill ideas.‖

On October 15, 1987, Sankara was killed by an armed group with twelve other officials in a coup d'état organised by his former colleague Blaise Compaoré. Deterioration in relations with neighbouring countries was one of the reasons given, with Compaoré stating that Sankara jeopardised foreign relations with former colonial power France and neighbouring Ivory Coast. Prince Johnson, a former Liberian warlord allied to Charles Taylor, told Liberia's Truth and Reconciliation Commission (TRC) that it was engineered by Charles Taylor. After the coup and although Sankara was known to be dead, some CDRs mounted an armed resistance to the army for several days.

Sankara's body was dismembered and he was quickly buried in an unmarked grave, while his widow Mariam and two children fled the nation. Compaoré immediately reversed the nationalizations, overturned nearly all of Sankara's policies, rejoined the International Monetary Fund and World Bank to bring in ―desperately needed‖ funds to restore the ―shattered‖ economy,[34] and ultimately spurned most of Sankara's legacy.

Compaoré‘s dictatorship remained in power for 27 years until overthrown by popular protests in 2014.

A transformational leader

Sankara‘s visionary leadership turned his country from a sleepy West African nation with the colonial designation of Upper Volta to a dynamo of progress under the proud name of Burkina Faso (—Land of the Honorable People‖). He led one of the most ambitious programs of sweeping reforms ever seen in Africa. It sought to fundamentally reverse the structural social inequities inherited from the French colonial order.

Sankara focused the state‘s limited resources on the marginalized majority in the countryside. When most African countries depended on imported food and external assistance for development, Sankara championed local production and the consumption of locally-made goods. He firmly believed that it was possible for the Burkinabè, with hard work and collective social mobilization, to solve their problems: chiefly scarce food and drinking water.

In Sankara‘s Burkina, no one was above farm work, or graveling roads– not even the president, government ministers or army officers. Intellectual and civic education were systematically integrated with military training and soldiers were required to work in local community development projects.

Sankara disdained formal pomp and banned any cult of his personality. He could be seen casually walking the streets, jogging or conspicuously slipping into the crowd at a public event. He was a rousing orator who spoke with uncommon candor and clarity and did not hesitate to publicly admit mistakes, chastise comrades or express moral objections to heads of powerful nations, even if it imperiled him. For example, he famously criticized French president François Mitterand during a state dinner for hosting the leader of Apartheid South Africa.

Who was Thomas Isidore Sankara?

- A captain in army of Upper Volta, a former French colony in West Africa
- Instrumental in the coup that ousted Colonel Saye Zerbo as military ruler in 1982
- Took power from Majour Jean-Baptiste Ouedraogo in an internal power struggle and became president in August 1983
- Adopted radical left-wing policies and sought to reduce government corruption

- Changed the name of the country from Upper Volta to Burkina Faso, which means —the land of upright menll
- Killed in mysterious circumstances by a group of soldiers in October 1987.

Who is history's greatest traitor and why?

Sefa Olympio Researching pre colonial African history Updated 1y

Blaise Compaoré (left).

Murdered his best friend/brother who he'd grown up with, Thomas Sankara (right). If you ask some people from Francophone African countries, they'll tell you that Blaise Compaoré was "adopted" by Sankara's parents. The two grew up together from a young age and considered brothers as well as colleagues in the military.

In 1983 Sankara seized power through a coup with the goal of eliminating corruption and the dominance of the former French colonial power in Upper Volta with Compaoré by his side. After the coup, he renamed the country Burkina Faso, meaning land of the upright/righteous man. In the 4 years he was in power, Sankara

Vaccinated 2.5 million children against meningitis, yellow fever and measles in a matter of weeks

Initiated a nation-wide literacy campaign, increasing the literacy rate from 13% in 1983 to 73% in 1987

Planted over 10 million trees to prevent desertification from the Sahara

Built roads and a railway to tie the nation together, without foreign aid. He opposed foreign aid, saying that “he who feeds you, controls you.”

Appointed females to high governmental positions, encouraged them to work, recruited them into the military, and granted pregnancy leave during education
Outlawed female genital mutilation, forced marriages and polygamy in support of Women’s rights

Sold off the government fleet of Mercedes cars and made the Renault 5 (the cheapest car sold in Burkina Faso at that time) the official service car of the ministers
Reduced the salaries of all public servants, including his own, and forbade the use of government chauffeurs and 1st class airline tickets

Redistributed land from the feudal landlords and gave it directly to the peasants. Wheat production rose in three years from 1700 kg per hectare to 3800 kg per hectare, making the country food self-sufficient

His foreign policies were centered on anti-imperialism, with his government eschewing all foreign aid, pushing for odious debt reduction, nationalizing all land and mineral wealth, and averting the power and influence of the International Monetary Fund (IMF) and World Bank.

Sankara's domestic policies were focused on preventing famine with agrarian self-sufficiency and land reform, prioritizing education with a nationwide literacy campaign, and promoting public health. He focused the state’s resources on the marginalized majority in the countryside.
When most African countries depended on imported food and external assistance for development, Sankara championed local production and the consumption of locally-made goods. He firmly believed that it was possible for the Burkinabè, with hard work and collective social mobilization, to solve their problems: chiefly scarce food and drinking water.

So naturally, Thomas Sankara had to die. He wasn't the puppet ruler France could assert her neocolonialsim on. FYI a huge part of France's GDP comes from Francophone African countries, particularly through its control over the CFA currency and banking in these countries.

It's said that many people refused to support France in their coup, but in exchange for 27 years in power and French backing, Blaise Compaoré agreed to help the French overthrow Thomas Sankara.

When his officials tried to warn him about this, Sankara refused to believe that his brother and ally could be a part of such a plot against him.

On 15 October 1987, Sankara along with his officials were gunned down by an armed group led by Compaoré. His body was dismembered and buried in an unmarked grave. A public statement was issued that Sankara had died of natural causes. But the people didn't believe the story and for months many thought that Sankara had been jailed and would be eventually realised.

Blaise Compaoré immediately reversed the nationalizations, overturned nearly all of Sankara's policies, rejoined the International Monetary Fund and World Bank to bring in "desperately needed" funds to restore the "shattered" economy.

In 2014, after 27 years in power and another attempt to change the constitution to allow him to run for office for yet another term, the citizens of Burkina Faso led an uprising. They torched and destroyed government buildings and called for Compaoré's resignation. He had to be rescued by the French and fled to Ivory Coast.

(2014 revolution)

A week before his murder, Thomas Sankara declared, “While revolutionaries as individuals can be murdered, you cannot kill ideas.”

"The revolution and women's liberation go together. We do not talk of women's emancipation as an act of charity or out of a surge of human compassion. It is a basic necessity for the revolution to triumph. Women hold up the other half of the sky."

Thomas Sankara

The types of leaders Africa needs - the benevolent "dictator". If they all stood as one, neocolonialism would be dead and the continent would thrive. Damn our useless leaders and traitorous likes of Blaise Compaoré.

Related Links

What was the most brutal last stand in history?

What are some of the most epic last stands in history?

Who in history had the 'last laugh'?

Who is history's greatest coward, and why?

What was the biggest last stand in military history?

Who is history's greatest traitor and why?

BURKINA In General:

See How Thomas Sankara „Set Example for Africa and World"

The words of Thomas Sankara survive. You can read them and learn about what he achieved,‖ said Gnaka Lagoke, welcoming participants to the fifth annual conference on Thomas Sankara here. Sankara was the leader of the popular revolutionary government in the West African country of Burkina Faso from 1983 to 1987. (See box below.)

The Nov. 5 meeting was entitled ―Thomas Sankara Legacy, Democracy in the Global South, and Black Lives.‖ It attracted more than 120 participants to a discussion and debate on how Sankara's example and ideas can be used to advance popular struggles today — from Burkina Faso to Brazil, from Venezuela and Cuba to the United States.

Lagoke, the event's main organizer and founder of the Revival of Panafricanism Forum, introduced the panel: Shelley Green of Pan-African Community Action in Washington, D.C.; Dr. Msia Clark, professor of African Studies at Howard University; Aline Piva, of the Council on Hemispheric Affairs; and Mary-Alice Waters, a leader of the Socialist Workers Party and president of Pathfinder Press. Lagoke, who teaches African and world history at Montgomery College, also welcomed Armand Tiemtoré, who brought greetings from the embassy of Burkina Faso.

The majority of participants were from West African countries, including members of Balai Citoyen, a Burkinabe group from New York that helped organize the meeting. Others were from Pan-Africanist groups and other political organizations in the D.C. metro area.

Different class courses

Two different class courses were presented by panelists: one placing Sankara as part of currents in Africa and the Americas that over the past half century have sought to reform (even radically reform) capitalism; the other pointing to Sankara's communist course and the revolutionary internationalist and Pan-Africanist alternative he posed to the dismemberment of Africa by imperialist powers in order to oppress and exploit its toilers.

Community control is true democracy at work,‖ said Green of Pan-African Community Action. Sankara's legacy is linked to control of local economies, education, health care and the police, she said.
The legacy of Sankara is through Pan-African activism,‖ said Clark from Howard University. —The ways people mobilize have shifted, due in part to social media and how activists engage the state. Instead of one single leader, leadership is dispersed.‖

Piva of the Council on Hemispheric Affairs, who is Brazilian, compared the achievements in Burkina Faso during Sankara's years to —the goals of the Workers Party of Brazil's ‗alternative project' — to regain sovereignty and rebuild our country into a more equal and democratic society.‖ She called the impeachment and removal of Brazilian President Dilma Rousseff earlier this year —a coup against the Workers Party.‖

—Thomas Sankara understood that to be free from imperialist domination, you must rely on local and natural resources as opposed to foreign aid,‖ Piva said. —His revolution promoted self-sufficiency and social programs that directly empowered the people.‖

SWP leader Waters, who wrote prefaces to Thomas Sankara Speaks and two other collections of his speeches, pointed to sharply different reasons why his course —set an example not only for Africa but the entire world.‖

Waters‘ talk —sharpens the meaning of the legacy of Thomas Sankara in the 21st century and reminds us that democracy is not a classless content,‖ said Mwiza Munthali, host of the radio show —Africa Now,‖ during his broadcast of the program, and —that the guiding ideology of Sankara was communism.‖

The capitalist rulers and their apologists,‖ Waters said, —try to convince us that democracy and capitalism are synonymous. But the course Sankara charted was proletarian democracy, proving that even in one of the poorest countries, it was possible to mobilize millions to take their destiny into their own hands and change themselves as they changed their conditions and the world.‖

What distinguished Sankara,‖ Waters said, —is that everything he did was aimed at raising the consciousness, confidence and combativity of the people of Burkina Faso. He was a Marxist, a communist, who had confidence in the revolutionary capacities of ordinary men and women, who are so arrogantly dismissed by the imperialist rulers and leaders of capitalist countries worldwide.

Sankara was unique among African leaders in refusing to reject Marxism on the pretext that it‘s a ‗European idea‘ alien to Africa and the struggles of its people. He understood that communism isn‘t an ‗idea,‘ but a course of class struggle drawing on lessons from centuries of revolutionary battles by working people. Those lessons apply to struggles by working people in Africa like anywhere else in the world. From the American and French revolutions, to the 1917 Bolshevik-led revolution in Russia, to the Cuban Revolution, with whose leaders he closely collaborated, Sankara said, we are —the heirs of all the world‘s revolutions and all the liberation struggles of the peoples of the Third world.

What do African people think about Thomas Sankara?

Anthony Anderson Student

He was a visionary leader of burkina faso and he was a pan africanist.

Well, Thomas Sankara was a hero who stood up against imperialism and neocolonialism. He spoke the truth about foreign aid, he said: however who feeds you controls you.

Thomas Sankara does inspire me and he was a visionary leader to the African poor. He had a visionary of pan Africanism as he wanted to unite the continent of Africa into one country.

Related Links

Was Thomas Sankara a good president for Burkina Faso?

Why is Thomas Sankara considered a hero today? What did do and would Burkinafaso be different had he been alive today?

How is Thomas Sankara's communism worked good and the other national leaders that tried communism had failed? How is he different?

Why was Thomas Sankara killed?
Why did Blaise Compaore betray Thomas Sankara?

What if Thomas Sankara survived and united Africa?

Why did America want to overthrow the Thomas Sankara government?

If you could sit down and converse with any of these 3 revolutionary African leaders who would you choose, Jomo Kenyatta, Thomas Sankara, or Kwame Nkrumah?

Are there any good books about Thomas Sankara?

Why did France assassinate Pan-African leaders like Barthélemy Boganda and Thomas Sankara?

REMEMBERING CAPTAIN NOEL ISSIDORE THOMAS SANKARA

Aniekpeno Ekong Works at Government of Nigeria

Thomas Isidore Noël Sankara (21 December 1949 – 15 October 1987) was a Burkinabé military captain, Marxist revolutionary, Pan-Africanist pragmatist, and President of Burkina Faso from 1983 to 1987.

During his time in office he did not go for any foreign aid or loans, saying "He who feeds you, controls you.

He refused to use the air conditioning in his office on the grounds that such luxury was not available to anyone but a handful of Burkinabes.

He sold off the government fleet of Mercedes cars and made the Renault 5 (the cheapest car sold in Burkina Faso at that time) the official service car of the ministers.

As President, he lowered his salary to $450 a month and limited his possessions to a car, four bikes, three guitars, a fridge and a broken freezer.

A motorcyclist himself, he formed an all-women motorcycle personal guard.

When asked why he didn't want his portrait hung in public places, as was the norm for other African leaders, Sankara replied "There are seven million Thomas Sankaras."

An accomplished guitarist, he wrote the new national anthem himself. He was only 37 years at the time of his death.

For the 4 short years he ruled over his people, he defied imperialism and showed Africa what could be accomplished by effectively allocating the nation's mineral wealth and resources to benefits its people, shattering the imperialist lie that Africa could not survive without foreign aid.

Thomas Sankara exemplified what it meant to be a selfless leader with no interest in material gain. He lived a simple and humble life even as he commanded an entire army and ruled over a nation.

In a world in which its ruling elite are worth millions (if not billions) of dollars whilst their people starve and struggle just to make a living, Sankara, when he was assassinated by the CIA and French Secret Service, only had a few hundred dollars, a guitar, a bicycle, and a broken down freezer to his name. Though he is no longer with us, his ideas live on in the hearts and minds of the African people!

"You can kill a revolutionary, but you cannot kill an idea."

Y a-t-il des pays qui se sont détériorés après la destitution d'un dictateur, au point où ses habitants pensent la vie meilleure sous le règne dudit dictateur ? (Was there ever any examples of countries that became worse after the removal of a dictator, to the point where the people think life was better under the rule of said dictator?

Dimitri Ken Alice Twain Lieu : İtaly (1971–aujourd'hui) Cette réponse peut ne pas être une traduction fidèle de la réponse de Alice Twain dans Quora en anglais :

Même si les révolutionnaires en tant qu'individus peuvent être assassinés, vous ne pouvez pas tuer les idées.

Avez-vous déjà entendu parler de Thomas Sankara ?

En 1983, la Haute-Volta était l'un des pays les plus pauvres d'Afrique, puis un coup d'État a installé Thomas Sankara comme président. Sankara a changé le nom du pays en Burkina Faso et a lancé un certain nombre de réformes. « Ses politiques nationales étaient axées sur la prévention de la famine avec l'autosuffisance agraire et la réforme agraire, en donnant la priorité à l'éducation avec une campagne d'alphabétisation à l'échelle nationale, et en promouvant la santé publique en vaccinant 2,5 millions d'enfants contre la méningite, la fièvre jaune et la rougeole ».

Sankara a amélioré les conditions de vie du peuple burkinabé, redistribuant les terres agricoles, plantant des arbres pour prévenir la désertification, créant un programme généralisé de construction de routes et de voies ferrées, qui a apporté emplois et modernisation, renforçant les systèmes de santé et d'éducation. Il a également interdit l'excision, les mariages forcés et promu les femmes à la tête de l'État et à tous les niveaux de l'administration. Enfin, il a unilatéralement réduit la dette internationale burkinabé (principalement basée sur des intérêts anciens qui s'étaient accumulés) et a renoncé aux aides internationales là où cela n'était pas strictement nécessaire, afin d'échapper au contrôle du FMI et de la Banque mondiale.

Ce faisant, cependant, il a provoqué l'inimitié de la finance internationale, mais aussi de la classe moyenne burkinabé et des anciens chefs tribaux. Ces forces s'unirent et en 1987, assassinèrent Sankara, le remplaçant par Blaise Compaoré , qui est resté au pouvoir grâce à des élections fortement truquées, jusqu'en 2014, date à laquelle il a finalement dû fuir en Côte d'Ivoire. En dépit d'être techniquement démocratique, Compaoré a défait tout ce qui avait été fait par Sankara, supprimant les droits de l'homme, détériorant l'économie et les conditions de vie en général.

Questions similaires

Charles de Gaulle était-il un dictateur ?

Quelles étaient les manies qu'avaient certains dictateurs ?

A-t-il existé des dictateurs éclairés qui ont réellement fait le bien de leur pays ?

Si votre pays glissait doucement de la démocratie vers la dictature, à partir de quel moment consideriez-vous que vous êtes de façon indéniable en dictature ?

Quelles sont les raisons qui poussent les gens à crier à la dictature ? Mes parents ont connu la dictature et me confirment que ça n'a rien à voir. Est-ce que l'ignorance a des limites ?

Y a-t-il un avantage à vivre dans une dictature? Il doit y en avoir.

Que peut-on faire, contre la dictature qui se met en place dans notre pays ?

Quels sont les pays qui sont encore des dictatures ?

Quelles sont les obsessions étranges de dictateurs ?

Certains dictateurs infâmes ont remplacé ou sauvé leur pays de personnes pires qu'eux. Quels étaient les dictateurs qui étaient meilleurs que l'alternative de l'époque ?

Qui est le dictateur le plus fou encore en vie ?

Y a-t-il des pays qui aiment les Français?

Quelle dictature est actuellement la plus répressive au monde ?

Quelle est la différence entre une dictature douce et une dictature dure ?

Quel pays n'est pas du tout une dictature alors que beaucoup de gens le pensent ?

The Independence of Burkina Faso, formerly known as “Upper Volta”

Since Burkina Faso became an independent nation, the military has on several occasions intervened during times of crisis. In 1966 the military, led by Lieut. Col. (later Gen.) Sangoulé Lamizana, ousted the elected government of Maurice Yaméogo. Lamizana dominated the country’s politics until November 1980, when a series of strikes launched by workers, teachers, and civil servants led to another coup, this time headed by Col. Saye Zerbo.

Zerbo’s short-lived rule ended in November 1982 when noncommissioned army officers rebelled and installed Maj. Jean-Baptiste Ouedraogo as president. The Ouedraogo government soon split into conservative and radical factions, with the radicals seizing power on August 4, 1983. They set up a National Revolutionary Council (CNR), with Capt. Thomas Sankara as head of state.

A year after taking power, Sankara renamed the country Burkina Faso, meaning “Land of Incorruptible People,” and ordered all officials, including himself, to open their bank accounts to public scrutiny. His government was responsible for several concrete achievements: vaccination and housing projects, tree planting to hold back the Sahel, promotion of women's rights, and curbing of waste in government.

During Sankara's rule, tensions with Mali over the mineral-rich Agacher Strip erupted in a brief border war in December 1985. The dispute was settled in the International Court of Justice at The Hague a year later, to the satisfaction of both countries.

Initially a coalition of radical groups that included army officers, trade unionists, and members of small opposition groups, the Sankara regime gradually lost most of its popular support as power became concentrated in the hands of a few military officers—the most important of which were Sankara, Capt. Blaise Compaoré, Maj. Jean-Baptiste Boukari Lingani, and Capt. Henri Zongo. Popular support continued to decline, and on October 15, 1987, a military coup overthrew Sankara, who was killed along with several others.

Compaoré took power at the head of a triumvirate that included Zongo and Lingani. However, as time went on, Lingani and Zongo disagreed with Compaoré about economic reform issues, and in 1989 they were accused of plotting to overthrow him. The two were arrested and quickly executed, and Compaoré continued to pursue his political agenda. In 1991 a new constitution was promulgated, and Compaoré was elected president in an election that was boycotted by opposition candidates.

Founder President Maurice Nawalagmba Yaméogo

(31 December 1921 – 15 September 1993) whose abdicated:

was the first President of the Republic of Upper Volta, now called Burkina Faso, from 1959 until 1966.

"Monsieur Maurice" embodied the Voltaic state at the moment of independence. However, his political ascension did not occur without difficulties. As a member of the colonial administration from 1946, Maurice Yaméogo found a place for himself in the busy political landscape of Upper Volta thanks to his skill as a speaker. In May 1957, during the formation of the first Upper Voltaic government instituted under the Loi Cadre Defferre, he joined the coalition government formed by Ouezzin Coulibaly, as minister for agriculture and a member of the Voltaic Democratic Movement (MDV). In January 1958, threatened by a vote of censure, Coulibaly enticed Maurice Yaméogo and his allies in the assembly to join the Voltaic Democratic Union-African Democratic Assembly (UDV-RDA) in exchange for promises of promotion within the government. Maurice Yaméogo rose to be his second in command, with the portfolio of the Interior, a position which allowed him to assume the role of interim head of government, following Coulibay's death in September 1958.

His rather shaky political ascendancy was reinforced by circumstances. After the proclamation of the Republic of Upper Volta on 11 December 1958, he made a surprising volte-face with respect to the Mali Federation advocated by Léopold Sédar Senghor. The Voltaic assembly supported Upper Volta's membership in the Federation, but Yaméogo opted for political sovereignty and limited economic integration with the Conseil de l'Entente. Then, by means of controversial manoeuvres, Yaméogo eliminated all parliamentary opposition. The UDV-RDA was purged of his enemies and he imposed a one party system. Upper Volta found itself under a dictatorship even before its independence on 5 August 1960.

In foreign policy, Yaméogo envied and admired the international success of his colleague Félix Houphouët-Boigny, the President of Côte d'Ivoire, who defied the anti-communists by establishing an ephemeral customs union (1961–1962) with the "progressivist" Ghana of Kwame Nkrumah. Houphouët-Boigny nevertheless remained his closest ally and in December 1965, Yaméogo signed an agreement with him to extend dual nationality to citizens of both countries. However, this project did not reach fruition. On 3 January 1966, as a result of severe financial austerity measures, Yaméogo's corrupt regime was overthrown by a peaceful protest organised by the unions, traditional chieftains and the clergy. In 1993, he died after having been rehabilitated by President Blaise Compaoré.

By Myron Echenberg

Blaise Compaoré was reelected in 1998, 2005, and 2010. His regime, however, was not without opposition or controversy. Unpopular political and economic developments and the suspicious death in 1998 of Norbert Zongo, a prominent journalist known for speaking out against Compaoré's administration, contributed to periodic episodes of social and political unrest that continued into the 2000s. In October 2003 several people were arrested and accused of planning a coup to oust Compaoré. Meanwhile, economic troubles were exacerbated by the civil war that had begun in neighbouring Côte d'Ivoire in 2002. The conflict disrupted an important source of trade for Burkina Faso as well as the livelihoods of several hundred thousand Burkinabé who had found work there. Compaoré's administration also faced public discontent over high living costs, which lead to riots in February 2008, weeks of protests, and a general strike in April.

Blaise Compaoré

Blaise Compaoré, 2004. Pascal Le Segretain/Getty Images

A wave of protests in early 2011 soon came to be seen as the greatest domestic challenge to Compaoré in more than two decades of rule. Beginning in February and continuing in the following months, many demonstrations were held by university students to protest police brutality—in particular, the December death of a student while in police custody. March saw the beginning of unrelated protests by Burkinabé soldiers reportedly upset about the arrests of and, in their opinion, unnecessarily harsh sentencing of some of their comrades. Then, on April 14, thousands of Burkinabé citizens demonstrated in the capital, Ouagadougou, over the rising cost of food and other necessities. Hours later there was a small-scale mutiny in the city by some soldiers protesting unpaid food and housing allowances and salaries.

Compaoré grew alarmed with the growing unrest, which was indicative of the increasing general displeasure with the country's slow pace of economic progress and development and a lack of confidence in his regime. The military protests were of particular concern, as such demonstrations rarely occurred under Compaoré's authoritative rule. In response to the growing discontent, he dismissed his government as well as military officials in key positions of leadership. His actions initially did little to appease any of the protesters as the army mutiny spread to other cities, where protesting soldiers were joined by other demonstrators, including the police, students, and other Burkinabés. Payment of some funds owed to the armed forces appeared to stem the immediate threat and halt some of the demonstrations. A few days later, in an apparent effort to reassert some control over the military, Compaoré named himself the new minister of defense. In the following months the prices on some basic foods were reduced, soldiers received the allowances owed to them, and civil servants were given raises—all measures that helped reduce tensions for the time being.

Throughout 2015 several of Compaoré's former associates were arrested on corruption-related charges. The transitional government also indicted Compaoré and some members of his government on charges of treason in July. The transitional government had passed a law in April that would have prevented banned any individual from standing in the elections if they had supported Compaoré's controversial efforts in the National Assembly to eliminate term limits from the constitution, but ECOWAS, the regional ruling body, overturned it in July. The transitional administration, however, ignored the ruling and barred potential candidates who had links to Compaoré from running for president.

In September the country's Reconciliation Commission released a report with several recommendations, including one to dissolve the RSP. Days later, on September 16, members of the RSP detained President Kafando, Prime Minister Zida, and other government officials. The next day they announced that they had dissolved the institutions of the transitional government and that Gen. Gilbert Diendéré—a former longtime aid to Compaoré—was now the head of a new interim regime, the National Council for Democracy (Conseil National pour la Démocratie; CND). The CND cited the barring of Compaoré-linked candidates in the upcoming elections as a divisive issue and promised to hold inclusive elections, although not on the scheduled October 11 date, which it deemed as being too soon. The coup was widely condemned by the international community as well as by Burkinabés, with protests against the coup erupting in Ouagadougou and other cities.

ECOWAS mediators led discussions to end the crisis and on September 20 proposed a deal that included restoring Kafando as interim president, allowing Compaoré-linked individuals to stand in the upcoming elections—now scheduled to be held in November—and granting amnesty to the coup members. Members of the deposed transitional government and the general public, however, voiced their displeasure with the proposal, being particularly incensed by the amnesty clause.

Meanwhile, on September 21 the Burkinabé military announced that they were marching toward Ouagadougou and gave Diendéré and the RSP coup members a deadline of the 22nd by which they were to lay down their arms. Diendéré, while committing to the reinstatement of Kafando per the terms of the ECOWAS proposal, initially defied the ultimatum before coming to an agreement with the army in which the RSP would return to their barracks and the army would withdraw from Ouagadougou. On September 23 Kafando was reinstated as interim president, but it was amid uncertainty regarding what the terms of the final ECOWAS deal were and if they would be accepted by the RSP, the transitional administration, and the Burkinabé public. In the days and weeks after the transitional administration was restored, some of the lingering questions were answered: the RSP briefly resisted disarmament but it was accomplished, the candidates who had supported Compaoré's efforts in the National Assembly to eliminate term limits from the constitution continued to be barred from the upcoming presidential election, and Diendéré and other coup plotters were charged for their alleged actions during the coup.

The postponed presidential and legislative elections were held on November 29, 2015. Fourteen candidates contested the presidential election. Roch Marc Christian Kaboré, who had served as prime minister and president of the National Assembly under Compaoré but broke ties with him in early 2014, was elected with more than 53 percent of the vote. His party, the People's Movement for Progress (Mouvement du Peuple pour le Progrès; MPP), won the most seats in the National Assembly but did not take an absolute majority.

THE BURKINABE PRESIDENCY:
H.E. MR. ROCH MARC CHRISTIAN KABORÉ, PRESIDENT

Statement Summary:

ROCH MARC CHRISTIAN KABORÉ, President of Burkina Faso, said that achieving real sustainable development required the international community to eradicate poverty and fight inequality. His country had developed a national plan to integrate the goals of the 2030 Agenda and the African Union's Agenda 2063. In Burkina Faso's endeavour to efficiently implement those goals, his Government knew that it could count on the active solidarity of all.

Terrorist attacks and unprecedented violence had manifested as a worldwide scourge, he said, and continued by acknowledging the memories of all victims of terrorism. "Our fight will only bear fruit if we destroy the rear-guard and manage to cut the supply source of terrorism," he continued. That should be done parallel to managing the root causes of terrorism: injustice, exclusivism and poverty.
Peace, security and development were monumental challenges for the world and Africa in particular, he said. His Government welcomed the progress made in the region, although hotbeds and flashpoints remained. The security situation in northern Mali continued to cause great concern, requiring a strengthened mandate for United Nations Multidimensional Integrated Stabilization Mission in Mali (MINUSMA) and the implementation of the rapid intervention force of the Group of Five Sahel, known as the G-5 Sahel. South Sudan and Somalia were other countries that had to "close the chapter on violence". Furthermore, his country reiterated its appeal for a political solution to the conflict in Western Sahara.

The world would not become peaceful as long as the Middle East was not peaceful, and not until Israel and Palestine lived side by side in perfect harmony, he said. He called on the international community to seek true peace in Syria, Iraq and Yemen so that those countries could contribute to the well-being of their citizens and their region. He also reiterated his support for the African call for reforming the Security Council, in order to repair a historical injustice.

The next presidential and legislative elections were held on November 22, 2020. Polls were not able to open in many regions in the north and east, however, because of the ongoing security problems. Kaboré was reelected with almost 58 percent of the vote; the MPP again won more National Assembly seats than any other party but fell short of securing an absolute majority.

During Kaboré's term, the country was faced with an increasing threat from Islamist militants, who carried out attacks in Ouagadougou as well as other parts of the country. In 2017 a regional anti-terrorism force, the G5 Sahel, was formed by Burkina Faso, Chad, Mali, Mauritania, and Niger to counter militant threats and improve the security of the countries' borders. In the following years, though, escalating violence led to a humanitarian crisis, as more than a million Burkinabé were internally displaced, thousands of schools were closed, and the number of Burkinabé facing food insecurity grew to more than 3 million.

CGTN Africa: 27 years on and Thomas Issidore Sankara's legacy still lives on. Capt. Sankara was a profound leader with deep love for his country, Burkina Faso. But he would not live long enough to see his vision change his country for better. He was assassinated. "Faces of Africa" takes you through Sankara's journey and how his ideas have stuck in the minds of the young generation, now seeking to resuscitate the country's economic and political status.

Pourquoi la France n'accepte pas de retirer ses bases militaires en Afrique sans négociations ?

Chri Chri Précédent lieu : Afrique centrale (2007–2015) Mis à jour le 12 nov.

Thomas Sankara est de retour?
Vous êtes Burkinabé?

Il y a une base militaire au Burkina Faso?

La France a déjà retiré des bases militaires en Afrique.

Les effectifs militaires permanents de la France en Afrique sont passés de 8 000 à 5000 personnes.

Quand Sarkozy a imaginé ne conserver que la base de Djibouti et suurpimé celle de Libreville, Omar Bongo avait répondu:

"Si la France veut retirer sa base militaire, ce n'est pas un souci mais qu'ils nous préviennent avant.

Le 6ème BIMA qui est présent sur place acceptera une nouvelle affectation mais les Gabonais étaient effrayés par le départ des Français. Car cela fait vivre de nombreuses populations! Certes il y a de plus en plus de Chinois mais ils n'embauchent pas de populations locales.

Si un pays africain (le Mali qui est près de chez vous est un bon exemple) souhaite que les Français partent, ils n'ont qu'à le demander et on se fera un plaisir de partir. Mais c'est l'inverse, c'est nous qui souhaitons partir et le Mali trouve d'autres solutions, par exemple avec les mercenaires Russes de chez Wagner.

Ensuite, il y a la coopération militaire, l'armée française forme des soldats et le facture, soit directement, soit en leur vendant des armes. Tout comme le fait l'Armée Russe qui forme l'armée centrafricaine ou l'armée américaine au Proche-Orient. Rien n'est gratuit! Les pays Africains sont souverains, ils peuvent créer leur monnaie quand ils le veulent, demander aux Français de partir s'ils le souhaitent. Il n'y a aucune négociation.
Etes-vous militaire? Politicien? Opposant politique?

Questions similaires

Les Maliens manifestants dans les rues pour réclamer le départ des soldats français, alors pourquoi la France insiste-t-elle tant pour se maintenir au Mali si elle n’est pas la bienvenue ?
Supportez-vous les missions militaires de la France en Afrique, oui, non pourquoi ?
Après 7 années d’opération Barkhane et un résultat en demi-teinte, qu’est ce qui justifie encore la coûteuse intervention de la France dans le Sahel ?
Suite aux récents événements, la France devrait-elle se retirer du Mali ?
Quels sont les intérêts de cette présence militaire ?

Le Mali oserait-il utiliser l'arme nucléaire s'il est attaqué par la France ?
Quel intérêt économique stratégique les pays du Sahel représente pour la France ? Si l'armée française se retire du Sahel, que risquerait la France à coup sûr ?
La chute de la France en Afrique sera-t-elle progressive et négociée ou brutale et sanglante ?
Pourquoi la France ne veut-elle pas se passer de l'Afrique ?
Que pensez-vous des pays Africain qui sont encore sous l'emprise de la France ?
Face aux accusations fréquentes de pillages et de déstabilisations de l'Afrique dont fait Qu'est ce qu'une opportunité politique ?

Hamid Sam Suivre Grand passionné de politique 58 m

La prise du pouvoir par l'armée burkinabè. Le peuple s'est insurgé contre la politique antiterroriste menée par le président Marc Kaboré. L'armée s'est saisie de cette situation pour s'accaparer du pouvoir afin de justifier son coup. C'est juste incroyable !

Questions similaires

Qu'est-ce qu'un enjeu géopolitique ?
Qu'est-ce qui vous retient de vous lancer dans la politique au niveau local ?
Qu'est-ce qui vous plaît dans la politique ?

Comment entrer en politique ?
Si vous aviez l'opportunité de rentrer en politique, le feriez-vous ?

Pourquoi avoir instauré la parité en politique alors que le plus important est d'élire le plus compétent à un poste ?

Si le pouvoir est un sous-produit de la compétence, pourquoi voyons-nous des personnes incompétentes au plus haut niveau de la politique et du monde des affaires ?

Qu'est ce qu'un bon journaliste ?

Pour pouvoir faire carrière en politique et accéder à un poste important, ne faudrait-il pas obligatoirement avoir auparavant exercé une activité professionnelle en dehors de la politique, pendant au moins 15 ans ?

Comment faire pour rentrer en politique ?
Qu'est-ce qu'un post turtle ?
Quelle politique crée vraiment des emplois ?
Comment se lancer en politique ?
Comment faire carrière en politique ? Quelles études ?
Comment réussir en politique quand on est Fourbe, Déloyal et Pleurnichard ?

News Nigeria
Burkina Faso's president detained: report

Posted by Aniekpeno Ekong 4h

Burkina Faso's President Roch Marc Christian Kabore has been detained a day after soldiers staged mutinies at several barracks, both Radio France Internationale and Reuters reported citing sources.

Several armored vehicles of the presidential fleet, riddled with bullets, could be seen near the president's residence on Monday morning, Reuters reported, adding that one was spattered with blood.

Residents of the president's neighborhood reported heavy gunfire overnight.

Burkina Faso's government confirmed the gunfire but denied the information on social media about the army takeover.

A country-wide curfew was imposed on Sunday in Burkina Faso from 8:00 p.m. to 5:30 a.m., and another statement from the minister of national education also announced the closure of schools on Monday and Tuesday.

According to local sources, the headquarters of Burkina Faso's ruling party in the capital Ouagadougou was set on fire by protesters on Sunday, and the internet was partially cut off.

News Nigeria

Burkina Faso soldiers stand by a damaged vehicle in front of the Guillaume Ouedraogo military camp in Ouagadougou, Burkina Faso, Jan. 24.

Posted by Aniekpeno Ekong 19h

Reports out of the West African nation of Burkina Faso say embattled President Roch Marc Christian Kabore and members of his government have been detained by mutineering soldiers.

News outlets say there are reports of heavy fighting near the presidential palace in the capital, Ouagadougou.

Burkina Faso has been embroiled in a conflict with terror groups linked to al-Qaida and Islamic State since 2015. Rumors of a coup have been rife for weeks after a military base in the north of the country was overrun by terrorists killing 49 military members.

President Kabore fired members of his Cabinet and military leadership in December in response.

The current unrest began early Sunday when heavy gunfire was heard inside Ouagadougou's largest military base, Camp Sangoule Lamizana. VOA journalist Henry Wilkins was temporarily detained inside the camp and spoke to one of the organizers of the mutiny, who relayed a list of demands from the mutineers, including "more money and more troops" to aid in the fight against terrorism, along with better training and the organization of a permanent military unit on the front lines.

The mutineers also demanded the resignations of the military chief of staff and chief of the intelligence services, and better care of the wounded and families of soldiers who have died in the conflict.

The apparent coup in Burkina Faso is the third in West Africa in the last 18 months, following that of Mali and neighboring Guinea.

News Nigeria

Buhari Rejects Coup in Burkina Faso, Demands Immediate Reinstatement of Ousted President Kabore

Posted by Aniekpeno Ekong 5h

"The Federal Government of Nigeria has received with grave concern, reports of a coup d'état in the Republic of Burkina Faso.

"Nigeria strongly condemns the overthrow of the democratically elected government of President Roch Marc Kabore and his detention.

"This unfortunate development not only subverts the constitutional order of the country, but also seeks to further destabilise the peace efforts in the ECOWAS sub-region.

"This unconstitutional change of Government is unacceptable. Nigeria, therefore, calls for the immediate release of President Marc Christian Kabore and other members of his government being detained, as well as an immediate return to the status quo ante"

Pourquoi le président du Burkina Faso a-t-il été arrêté ?

Hamid Sam · Suivre Grand passionné de politique. 6 m

Officiellement pour deux raisons : d'abord, le peuple juge sa politique antiterroriste regrettable. Au début de son quinquennat, il a dit qu'il ferait de la menace terroriste sa priorité. Le Burkina est l'un des pays les plus terrorisés et rien n'est fait pour empêcher la progression des groupes terroristes. Du moins ! Il y'a quelque chose qui est quand même fait mais ce n'est pas suffisant. La deuxième raison, c'est que l'armée demandait le départ des chefs de l'armée en raison de leur incompétence.

Officieusement pour une raison : les militaires(que je considère comme irresponsables et sauvages en raison de leur mode opératoire), avaient juste l'envie de prendre le pouvoir. Ils ont juste profité du ras-le-bol du peuple pour justifier leur coup.

Et c'est comme ça maintenant en Afrique ! Des sauvages se lèvent et prennent le pouvoir quand ils veulent. A chaque fois, les autres États se contentent juste d'un « NOUS CONDAMNONS FERMEMENT CE COUP D'ÉTAT» comme si cela pouvait changer quelque chose.

Questions similaires

Pourquoi Emmanuel Macron est-il le premier président de la république à avoir été giflé ?

Pourquoi l'expérience menée au Burkina Faso par Thomas Sankara de 1983 à 1987 n'a pu être relayée au Burkina Faso, ni en Afrique ? Pourtant celui qui est appelé le Che africain a montré que le developpement en Afrique était faisable même sans moyens.

Assassinat du président haïtien Jovenel Moise à la tête du pays depuis 2017, un pays en pleine crise politique, gangréné par l'insécurité et la violence des gangs. Que sait-on des circonstances de sa mort ?

Pourquoi Donald Trump voulait-il être président ?
Pourquoi Emmanuel Macron a-t-il été giflé dans la Drôme ?
Que pensez-vous de Macron ? Est-il un bon président ?

Comment était la vie au Burkina Faso après le coup d'État de 1982 et sous Thomas Sankara ?

En ce début de quinquennat, pensez-vous qu'Emmanuel Macron pourrait se faire réélire en 2022 ?

Pourquoi certains présidents en Afrique ne cèdent-ils pas leur place par voie légale, mais toujours par des coups d'état ?

Comment à 16 ans puis-je gagner de l'argent en Afrique (Burkina Faso)?

BREAKING!! Soldiers Detain Burkina Faso President in Apparent Coup, Force Him to Sign Resignation Letter

Aniekpeno Ekong Follow News Nigeria for all the latest news in Nigeria Jan 24

News Nigeria
This is the leader of the military mutiny in Burkina Faso.

Posted by Aniekpeno Ekong

His name is Lt. Colonel Paul Henri Damiba and he will most likely emerge as the new Head of State of his country.

This is a big blow to democracy.
Our sub-region has experienced 5 coups in the last two years.
In 4 of them, namely Sudan, Mali, Chad and Burkina Faso, those coups were successful.

In one of them, namely Niger Republic, it was not successful.

All five of these countries are close to our borders and in some cases we actually share borders with them.

Coups d'etats are unacceptable and they represent a set back and a failure in our collective affairs.

They are retrograde in nature, they are inherently divisive and we must do all we can to resist and deter them.

We must work hard to preserve our democracy and way of life and we must pray for Nigeria and call on the name of the Lord to defend our borders.

Whatever our differences may be we can at least all agree on that.

I wholeheartedly condemn the coup in Burkina Faso, I call for the restoration of democracy and civil rule in that country and I pray that we do not see any more coups on the African continent.

Soldiers briefly hold 2 journalists reporting on run-up to Burkina Faso coup

New York, January 25, 2022 – Authorities in Burkina Faso should ensure that journalists can report freely, safely, and without fear of arrest, the Committee to Protect Journalists said Tuesday.

On Sunday, soldiers at the Sangoule Lamizana military camp outside Ouagadougou, the capital, briefly held freelance reporter Henry Wilkins and Associated Press reporter Sam Mednick, according to both journalists, who spoke to CPJ via messaging app, and Wilkins' comments on Twitter and to the BBC.

The journalists were photographing and filming the camp when some soldiers aimed their guns at them and others fired into the air. The soldiers confiscated their equipment, took them inside the base, and then released them and returned their equipment, according to Wilkins and Mednick, who said that the incident lasted about 30 minutes.

On Monday, members of the military announced on state broadcaster RTB that they had suspended the constitution, disbanded the government, and closed the country's borders.

"People in Burkina Faso and around the world are only able to know what is happening in the country if journalists are permitted to do their jobs without fear of arrest or harassment," said Angela Quintal, CPJ's Africa program coordinator. "Attacks on the press are never justified, and authorities should maintain internet access and ensure reporters can work safely and distribute the news without fear."

Separately, Ibrahim Compaoré, a reporter with the local La Chaîne au Coeur de l'Afrique (LCA) broadcaster, was struck in the arm by a teargas canister while filming protests on January 22, according to the journalist, who spoke to CPJ over the phone, a post on LCA's Facebook page, and local media reports. Compaoré told CPJ that the canister broke his left arm and he had received medical attention.

The same day Wilkins and Mednick were held, local and international media and the digital rights group Access Now reported internet disruptions in the country, following similar disruptions in early January and in November 2021.

A journalist working in Ouagadougou, who asked to remain anonymous due to security concerns, told CPJ via messaging app Monday that angry mobs have harassed and chased journalists to prevent them from recording events on the street.

"As soon as you step out with a camera mobs will form," the journalist said. "Local journalist[s] and foreign alike… People will start chasing you, with sticks. One guy was about [to] throw a rock at me today."

CPJ was unable to immediately determine authorities to contact for comment on events surrounding the coup.

Reached via messaging app, Guy Hervé Yé, director of communication and public relations of the Burkina Faso gendarmerie, told CPJ he was not aware of the specific circumstances involving Compaoré's case, but said that journalists filming demonstrations were at risk of teargas being deployed to disperse crowds.

He said journalists should remain farther back from protests to avoid being caught between security forces and demonstrators.

Previously, in April 2021, Spanish journalists David Beriain and Roberto Fraile were abducted in eastern Burkina Faso and killed. In late November 2021, security forces and protesters also attacked and harassed journalists working to cover demonstrations over insecurity and calling for a change in national leadership, according to a statement of condemnation by the Association of Journalists of Burkina Faso.

Journalists in Burkina Faso can consult CPJ's safety tips on reporting amid civil disorder and internet disruptions.

News Nigeria

Burkina Faso's Coup Leader is reportedly Lt. Col. Paul-Henri Sandaogo Damiba.

Posted by Aniekpeno Ekong Jan 24

He was promoted by President Roch Kabore in December 2021.

The President has been arrested. The air, water, ground borders have been closed. The Parliament has been dissolved. Constitution suspended.

Comment le Mali et le Burkina Faso pensent-ils se libérer de la France ?

Philippe Fabre · Suivre Commerce International - Asie du Sud-Est, Chine, Inde, Japon jeu.

Réponse originale : Comment le Mali et le Burkina Faso pensent ils se libérer de la France ?

Deux situations différentes semble-t-il….

Au Mali, on un différend évident avec les putschistes… qui ne rêvent que de chasser les Français pour pouvoir s'acoquiner avec Wagner. Pas pour combattre les Islamistes, mais pour se maintenir au pouvoir. Accessoirement prendre une com sur l'or que Wagner tirera des mines.

Au Burkina, on avait un différent avec le président et il est bien possible que l'on ait pris part dans le putsch…

Une grande partie des habitants du Sahel ayant une préférence mal-cachée pour leurs frères islamistes que pour les ex-colons, nous aurions mieux a faire de quitter la région et les laisser se débrouiller tous seuls. Ou avec Wagner. Ça nous éviterait d'avoir a nous battre a Bruxelles pour arracher des aides pour ces pays qui ne les méritent pas. OK, c'est trop simpliste….

Questions similaires

Les Maliens manifestants dans les rues pour réclamer le départ des soldats français, alors pourquoi la France insiste-t-elle tant pour se maintenir au Mali si elle n'est pas la bienvenue ?

Les gens des pays africains qui parlent français détestent-ils la France et la langue française ?

Quel est le meilleur moyen pour les populations africaines de se débarrasser de la France et de son néocolonialisme militaro-monétaire sans l'implication de leurs politiciens corrompus ?

Comment peut-on expliquer l'attitude insolente de la France vis-à-vis des nations souveraines d'Afrique en l'occurrence le Mali ?

Pourquoi le fils du président Denis Sassou Nguesso est mis en examen en France ? Et pourquoi les politiques/PDG français qui ont des biens mal acquis ne sont pas jugés en Afrique ? Est-ce que la France est un pays impérialiste ?

La Côte d'Ivoire est-elle le pays d'où viendra la chute de la France en Afrique ?
Sans l'Afrique que deviendrait la France ?

Pourquoi les Maliens applaudissent-ils la menace de Macron de retirer les troupes françaises du Mali ? Ne veulent-ils plus de la France ?

Pourquoi le Français est-il mal aimé des autres pays ?
Que pensent les Français des Américains ?

Quelle est la meilleure stratégie pour lutter contre l'influence de la France dans les pays africains francophones ?

Pourquoi l'expérience menée au Burkina Faso par Thomas Sankara de 1983 à 1987 n'a pu être relayée au Burkina Faso, ni en Afrique ? Pourtant celui qui est appelé le Che africain a montré que le developpement en Afrique était faisable même sans moyens.

Les putschistes au Mali et le peuple malien demandent à la France de dégager, pourquoi l'Armée française continue-t-elle d'occuper le Mali ?

Que doivent faire les pays francophones d'Afrique ayant des liens étroits avec la France pour se développer, ce qu'ils ne font pas ?

Normalement retirer ses troupes du Mali et d'Afrique devrait être un soulagement pour la France, alors pourquoi insiste-t-elle pour rester là où elle dit qu'elle ne gagne rien ?

Wake Up Africa!
The African Union (AU) has suspended Burkinafaso a week after the military seized power in a coup.

Posted by Aniekpeno Ekong 7m

The African Union (AU) has suspended Burkina Faso a week after the military seized power in a coup.

It said the country would be blocked from all AU activities until constitutional order was restored.

The West African regional bloc, Ecowas, which suspended Burkina Faso last week, has sent a delegation to the capital Ouagadougou.

It will join a team from the United Nations for talks with the new military leaders.

Wake Up Africa!
France on West African Politics, Economy and Security – Gombi Land

Posted by Mohammed Isah Wed

I'm glad and happy that Mali cut all diplomatic ties with France. Imagine France has the 4th largest Gold reserve in the world without a single Gold mine while Mali with more than 800 gold mines has no Gold reserve
Posted by Mohammed Isah Wed I'm glad and happy that Mali cut all diplomatic ties with France. Imagine France has the 4th largest Gold reserve in the world without a single Gold mine while Mali with more than 800 gold mines has no Gold reserve

If you look at the most backward countries in the world, you will see that they are all french colonies. Take a look at this Now, the influence of France in African countries is drastically reducing. Recently, there was a french Africa summit and that summit was just a way of rebranding things. France has been mentioned in so many occasions that they are responsible for the insecurity in West Africa especially in Nigeria. Remember Nigeria is surrounded by Francophone countries so arms and terrorist do pour in from across the border. Most of these ISWAP fighters are from as far as the Futajalons. Majority not even Nigerians. Some interest groups do not want peace and stability in Nigeria for fear of this black behemoth living up to its potentials.

Many would say what’s France interest in Nigeria. Well, France is contesting for power with Nigeria in some Francophone countries. They want to sabotage every attempt made by Nigeria to economically integrate francophone states in the region, and since Nigeria is too large, rich and powerful to subdue, what do they do? They destroy the country from within, or at the very least keep Nigeria bugged down with internal strife, thereby preventing Nigeria from living up to its potential and economically emancipating these Paris dependent francophone states. Presently, Niger Republic now accords loyalty to Nigeria. Africa is playing with fire. Why? This is Juan Remy Quignolot, a former French soldier that served in Mali busted in the Central African Republic in June 2021 with a large caches of weapons, ammunition and hard currencies he was to supply to rebel factions in the C.A.R.

Let's not forget Mr Baharat Gnoti caught by border guards trying to enter Nigeria with 22 SA-7 surface to air missiles he was instructed to deliver to Boko Haram. This should keep the Abuja up at night knowing this is our neighbourhood. We are in the middle of great power, geopolitical competition and booming arms industry in Africa. People ask how insurgents get their weapons. There are clandestine operations fueling strife in Africa.Nigeria should be worried. Very worried.WHY? Take the Central African Republic for instance.The C..A.R has a population of just 4 million people and a GDP of $2 billion. A pretty insignificant country in the grand scale of things.

Yet there are behind the scene tussles between major powers, like France and Russia in that tiny state. The Russians have rained a foothold..in the CAR, displacing France in the process. In response Paris is using every means possible to destabilize the CAR by covertly arming fighting factions to keep killing each other. If this is happening in an insignificant country that weilds no influence, imagine what is happening behind the scenes in Nigeria, Africa's richest nation. That by the way happens to be a very influential nation. A nation that cannot be tamed by virture of its size, wealth and large military. This behemoth of a nation also happens to be situated in West Africa, the only region in the world France still maintains some level of influence.

France accrue $500 billion annually from the colonial taxes imposed on 14 francophone states in West Africa. Ninety percent of the electricity you generate comes from nuclear power, more so than any other nation in the world. 100% of the uranium needed to power those nuclear plants are from Niger Republic. (Notice these are all the poorest least developed nations in Africa). This makes West Africa a strategic asset for Paris.Then comes this behemoth that has been asleep for 40 years. A nation with the combined population of Britain and France. Fiercely independent because of its mineral wealth, human resources and a large and powerful military.

In other words, a nation francophone states can look up to as an alternative to Paris, especially in the economic sphere. Nigeria represents a clear and present danger to France influence in West Africa. If they lose this region, the era of France as a global power is essentially over. What do they do? The prudent thing to do will be to use every means at their disposal to cut this behemoth of a nation down to size. You sabotage every attempt made by Nigeria to economically integrate francophone states in the region, and since Nigeria is too large, rich and powerful..to subdue what do they do? They will want to destroy the country from within, or at the very least keep Nigeria bugged down with internal strife, thereby preventing Nigeria from living up to its potential and economically emancipating these Paris dependent francophone states. Remember the ECOWAS Single Currency Project the ECO. It was TEN YEARS in the making. Nigeria spent $300 million to put modalities in place.

Francophone states agreed to cut economic ties with France. This means $500 billion in annual colonial tax will come to an end. These francophone states will also remove their external reserves from French treasury and put in Nigeria's Central Bank. A country they can actually hold accountable if any thing goes wrong. But it was all a dream.

France will not give up its real estate without a fight. There is a rumour that the project is being held hostage by France through the Ivorian PresidentA week to the official announcement French President Emmanual Macron jets to the Ivory Coast and somehow persuades the Ivorian President to peg the ECO to the French created CFA, knowing the regions two largest economies, Anglophone Nigeria and Ghana will not stand for it.To add insult to injury the Ivorian President did not make its decision known or consult the ECOWAS Parliament. The announcement was made in a Press conference with the French President standing by his side. A big middle finger to ECOWAS.The ECO was DEAD.

After derailing the ECO the French President announced plans to reform the CFA franc. This was nothing short of a big middle finger to ECOWASTo mitigate against a strong response from ECOWAS, the French President then cleverly goes on a charm offensive in regional powerhouse Nigeria, even visiting Felas Shine i kid ye not…but he wasnt fooling no one.Now here we are. Paris has lost Mali to Moscow. Niger Republic has essentially become Nigeria's protège as it's new President accords loyalty to Abuja.The Nigerian military is equipping and modernizing on a scale that is without precedence. Boko Haram has beendefeated in the technical sense, making the horrific prospect of a peaceful and stable Nigeria a possibility.

If you are Paris all you have left to keep Nigeria busy and distracted is ISWAP. The NAF now has the platforms to do what French and U.S forces in Chad refused..to do since the construction of their drone bases, bomb ISWAP enclaves in the Tunbuns of Lake Chad, and the NAF has been at it for two weeks. Four ISWAP commanders wiped out within two months. 15,000 Boko Haraminsurgents surrendering and ISWAP retreating to Lake Chad.The reason ISWAP refuses to surrender is because of the weapons and support they are receiving from external interest groups whose best interest will not be served if Nigeria becomes a peaceful and stable society. Nigeria desperately needs to secure the border• • •

Let’s not forget, France has the fourth largest gold reserves of 2,436 tons, without a single gold mine in France. Mali (occupied by France) does not have any gold reserves in its banks, although it has 860 gold mines and produces 50 tons per year.

Qu’a accompli Thomas Sankara pour être autant aimé par son peuple ?

Coup plotters have suspended the constitution in Burkina Faso. The borders have been shut. The soldiers have announced that the tenure of the President is over.

Hamid Sam · Suivre Grand passionné de politique. lun.

Vous connaissez le syndrome du nationalisme positif ?

Je pense que non puisque j'en suis le créateur. Et je viens à peine de le créer à cause de la politique de Mr Sankara.

Je le defini comme une vision politique ou encore comme une idéologie politique qui consiste à aimer son pays(son histoire, sa civilisation) dans un but de changement et de développement positifs. J'ajoute le positif parcequ'on peut être un nationaliste en voulant changer notre pays mais négativement. C'est le cas de Mr ZEMMOUR qui est un nationaliste(ou plus précisément un ultra-nationaliste) qui veut changer négativement la France. J'en veux pour preuve sa politique sur les noms " MOHAMED". En le faisant, il exclut une partie de la population française puisqu'il y'a aussi des musulmans français. On peut encore prendre l'exemple du Führer. Poussé par son sentiment ultra-nationaliste, il alla jusqu'à affirmer que les juifs étaient des sous-hommes, c'est-à-dire qu'ils étaient incomparables aux Allemands mais plus pire, même les animaux étaient supérieurs à eux. Bref… je sais bien qu'on ne parle ni de Mr Zemmour ni de Hitler. Je les ai évoqué juste pour plus d'éclaircissements. J'ajoute également que je ne compare aucunement HITLER à Mr ZEMMOUR !

Mr Sankara prend le pouvoir après un coup d'État alors que la politique du politique en place est contestée. Il était lui-même réfractaire à ladite politique.

Quand il prend le pouvoir, il s'impose comme un nationaliste dans le sens positif du terme. Il veut divorcer avec le passé sombre et macabre de la colonisation. Pour cela, il change le nom du pays. De " Haute Volta", il donne un nom plus national : Burkina Faso, un mélange de deux langues communes (le Moré et le Dioula). La population applaudit ce courage mais aussi cette audace dans une Afrique où plane encore l'influence française ; où l'indépendance n'est que slogan et non une réalité.

Il s'impose comme le politique du franc parlé qui rappelle à la France ses torts. Il est vu par les siens comme le politique de la non-soumission. Il n'a pas envie de se soumettre à une France qui n'est là que pour ses intérêts et qui continuent à avoir une relation de tutelle avec ses anciennes colonies malgré la fameuse " indépendance". Avec lui, on ne viendra pas laper la boubouche à la France.

Il met en cause l'aide publique au développement. Visionnaire, il voit en premier ses conséquences. l'État qui vous aide à toujours quelque chose à vous dire où à vous imposer. Il ne voulait pas d'une politique où il faut toujours tendre la main. Il voulait que le peuple burkinabè développe lui-même son propre pays.

Il était toujours à la rencontre de sa population. Président, il sortait souvent pour voir l'avancement de certains chantiers auxquels il participait souvent lui-même aux travaux. Le peuple se sentait à la fois proche et aimé de son dirigeant. Ce n'était pas le politique qui profitait de la forte fraîcheur du climatiseur tandis que le peuple crevait sous la chaleur. Il n'y avait même pas de climatiseur dans son propre bureau. Son domicile était banal comme celui d'un citoyen lambda.

Pour éviter les gaspillages du fond public, il avait mis en place de nombreuses mesures telles que la diminution des salaires des fonctionnaires. Il avait également interdit les voyages en classe première car cela coûtait trop. Ses ministres n'avait pas des voitures de luxe mais plutôt des voitures " banales". Avec lui, tout était calculé. Il s'était imposé comme le candidat de l'anti corruption et de l'anti-népotisme dans les services publics.

Comment ne pas être aimé par son peuple avec de tels agissements !

C'est pourquoi il demeure toujours une légende dans la tête des jeunes burkinabés mais pas que; il est aussi un modèle pour tous les jeunes africains.

Questions similaires

Pourquoi Sibeth N'Diaye n'abandonne-t-elle pas sa nationalité sénégalaise en tant que porte-parole du gouvernement ?

Pourquoi Donald Trump est-il détesté alors qu'il a accomplit beaucoup de positif pour la Russie?

Qu'est-ce qu'on attend pour envoyer la "Légion Etrangère" pour empêcher la prise de Kaboul par les Talibans ?

Pourquoi Jacques Chirac est-il autant aimé par les Français ; qu'a-t-il fait de plus que les autres présidents de la Ve République ?

Vous êtes nommé président du Tchad. Comment améliorez-vous la situation de ce pays ?

Donald Trump est-il si bête qu'il y paraît ? Comment a-t-il fait pour être si riche alors ?

Pourquoi l'expérience menée au Burkina Faso par Thomas Sankara de 1983 à 1987 n'a pu être relayée au Burkina Faso, ni en Afrique ?

Pourtant celui qui est appelé le Che africain a montré que le developpement en Afrique était faisable même sans moyens ?

Pourquoi y-a-t-il autant de French bashing ?
Pourquoi Emmanuel Macron méprise autant le peuple ?

A votre avis, Trump va t-il démissionner avant la fin de son mandat pour être gracié par son remplaçant intérimaire ?

Pourquoi Obama a-t-il visiblement autant vieilli pendant son mandat présidentiel ?

Pourquoi Macron n'écoute-t-il pas son peuple ?
Pourquoi prête-t-on à Joe Biden d'être sénile alors qu'il paraît actif ?

Quel impact sur la force Barkhane au Sahel après la mort du président tchadien ?

Pensez-vous que les cartes doivent être revues rapidement par la France par rapport à la présence des forces françaises dans la région ?

Pourquoi Ségolène Royal a-t-elle été contactée par Jean Castex pour former son gouvernement ?

Wake Up Africa!
Crocodiles in Bazoul, Burkina Faso aren't harmful and are sacred creatures. Children play with them.

Posted by Aniekpeno Ekong Thu

They are buried like humans when they die.

Koom Lakre Festival takes place yearly. During the festival, villagers ask the animals to grant their wishes.

The same breed of crocodiles is found in Paga, in the Upper East region of Ghana. The Crocodiles in Paga are considered to be sacred and are believed to share a soul with the people. Individuals have coincidentally died the same time a crocodile died.

News Nigeria
FOLLOW NEWS NIGERIA FOR NIGERIAN AND AFRICAN GROUNDBREAKING STORIES

Les stars d'Afrique
David-GDK · Suivre Publication par mer.

Cortège du Président Thomas Sankara lors du défilé militaire pour commémorer le 2e anniversaire de la révolution au Burkina Faso, le 4 août 1985, à Ouagadougou. En août 1983, le capitaine militaire Thomas Sankara prend le pouvoir et conduit le pays à de nombreux programmes révolutionnaires dans les domaines de la santé, de l'agriculture, de l'amélioration des infrastructures, des droits des femmes. Thomas Sankara a été assassiné lors d'un coup d'État dirigé par Blaise Compaoré le 15 octobre 1987 qui fut à son tour renversé par une insurrection populaire en 2014.

BREAKING!! Soldiers Detain Burkina Faso President in Apparent Coup, Force Him to Sign Resignation Letter

Aniekpeno Ekong Follow News Nigeria for all the latest news in Nigeria Jan 24

Le lieutenant-colonel Damiba investi "président" par le Conseil constitutionnel du Burkina Faso.

Le lieutenant-colonel Paul-Henri Sandaogo Damiba a été investi mercredi président du Burkina Faso par le Conseil constitutionnel, trois semaines après avoir pris le pouvoir par un coup d'Etat.

David-GDK Connaissances : Anglais mer.

"Je jure devant le peuple burkinabè (...) de préserver, de respecter, de faire respecter et de défendre la Constitution, l'acte fondamental et les lois" du Burkina, a déclaré M. Damiba en prêtant serment devant le Conseil, lors d'une cérémonie retransmise par la télévision nationale.

Il était vêtu d'un treillis militaire ceint d'une écharppe aux couleurs du Burkina, la tête coiffée d'un béret rouge.

Aucun représentant étranger n'a assisté à la cérémonie de prestation de serment qui s'est tenue dans une petite salle du Conseil constitutionnel où seule la presse officielle a été admise.

Plusieurs heures avant la prestation de serment, l'accès au Conseil était filtré par un important dispositif des forces de sécurité dressé dans un rayon de 100 m autour du siège de l'institution à Ouagadougou, a constaté un journaliste de l'AFP.

Le lieutenant-colonel Damiba, 41 ans, a pris le pouvoir le 24 janvier à Ouagadougou après deux jours de mutineries dans plusieurs casernes du pays, renversant le président élu Roch Marc Christian Kaboré, accusé notamment de pas avoir mis fin à la violence jihadiste qui frappe le Burkina depuis près de sept ans.

Il a mis en place une junte appelée Mouvement patriotique pour la sauvegarde et la restauration (MPSR) qui a pour priorité "la sécurité".

Dans le sillage du Mali et du Niger, le Burkina Faso est pris depuis 2015 dans une spirale de violences attribuées à des mouvements jihadistes, affiliés à Al-Qaïda et au groupe Etat islamique, qui ont fait plus de 2.000 morts dans le pays et contraint au moins 1,5 million de personnes à fuir leurs foyers.

L'Afrique est-elle pauvre à cause de la colonisation ? Si la colonisation n'avait jamais eu lieu, comment se présenterait l'Afrique ?

Gérard Briais

L'histoire est une drogue dure...Traducteur · Mis à jour le 3 ans

Didier Champion
Précédent lieu : Kigali, Rwanda

Question intéressante. Je vais vous donner mon point de vue en tant qu'Africain.
L'Afrique est-elle pauvre à cause de la colonisation ?

Réponse simple: non Réponse longue : les Africains n'ont rien appris des effets de la colonisation. Ils ont continué à singer des maîtres qui ne se sont jamais souciés d'eux. C'est la stupidité des Africains qui est en cause, non la faute des Européens. Tout le monde devrait se soucier de ses propres intérêts. Personne ne s'est jamais développé grâce à la charité des autres.

Le respect et la dignité se gagnent. Personne ne les reçoit ni ne les distribue gratuitement, surtout en ce qui concerne les relations entre les maîtres et leurs anciens esclaves, les colonisateurs et leurs anciennes colonies. Comment les Américains les ont-ils obtenu des Britanniques ? Comment les Chinois les ont-ils obtenu du Japon ? Tout se conquiert : liberté, dignité, respect etc. faites la liste. C'est un concept que les dirigeants africains ne semblent pas comprendre. S'en soucient-ils ? Je ne sais pas vraiment. Certains le font, mais beaucoup d'autres ne le font pas. Ils ne peuvent absolument pas penser à long terme pour leurs pays.

Et si la colonisation n'avait jamais eu lieu ?

Ce genre de questions est totalement inutile à mon avis. "Et si la traite des esclaves ne s'était jamais produite ? Où seraient les Afro-Américains ?" Que de questions absurdes ! Que diriez-vous de : "Et si la seconde guerre mondiale ne s'était jamais produite ?" Aucune question de ce genre n'a jamais rien apporté, elles ne servent à rien. Ces événements ont eu lieu. Point.Les questions importantes devraient être : Que s'est-il passé ? Comment les Africains ont-ils faillis ? Est-ce que cela fut terrible ? Que faisons-nous maintenant à ce sujet ?

Imaginez un Rwandais qui demanderait : Et si le génocide au Rwanda n'avait jamais eu lieu ? Je préfère dire : «C'est arrivé et ce fut horrible». Quid de la suite ? Comment pouvons-nous en tirer des leçons, corriger tout ce qui fut mauvais pour aller de l'avant et prendre la bonne direction pour améliorer l'avenir. Le reste n'a vraiment aucun intérêt pour moi.

Pourquoi de nombreux pays africains accusent-ils encore un retard économique?

La colonisation a été une expérience terrible pour les Africains. Aucun doute à ce sujet.

Cependant, imputer tous les problèmes de l'Afrique d'aujourd'hui à la seule colonisation n'a pas de sens. C'est un manque de prise de conscience et de responsabilité du côté africain.

Pour commencer, voici une carte de l'Afrique et de l'invasion européenne sur le continent au début du XXe siècle. Les principaux colonisateurs sont la France et le Royaume-Uni, suivis de l'Espagne, du Portugal, de l'Italie, de la Belgique et de l'Allemagne.

À mon avis, la plus grande erreur que les Africains ont commise après la prétendue «indépendance» fut de garder une influence européenne dans leurs affaires. Ils auraient dû couper tous les ponts tant au niveau diplomatique qu'à celui de toute autre relation bilatérale qu'ils avaient avec les Européens. À ce jour, c'est là que sont les problèmes de l'Afrique.

- Lorsque vous êtes libéré de vos maîtres, vous ne les laissez plus traîner chez vous. Or, c'est ce que les Africains ont fait après leur «indépendance».
- Lorsque vous quittez enfin votre mari violent après plus de 60 à 70 ans de vie commune, vous ne lui envoyez plus de SMS et ne lui permettez pas de passer du temps chez vous. C'est ce que les Africains continuent de faire depuis plus de 40 à 50 ans.

Les Européens n'ont jamais eu aucun intérêt à développer ou à "civiliser" les Africains. Tout ce qu'ils vinrent faire en Afrique le fut pour leurs propres intérêts. C'est pourquoi tout dirigeant africain ayant tenté de faire pression pour l'indépendance complète des Africains a été tué et assassiné par les Européens. Thomas Sankara au Burkina Faso, Patrice Lumumba en RDC et plus récemment Mouammar Kadhafi.

Didier Champion's answer to Why was Thomas Sankara killed?

Les problèmes de l'Afrique aujourd'hui sont tous liés au manque de commerce intra-africain, à la corruption alimentée par le secteur de l'aide, au tribalisme et à la politique identitaire entre autres. Jusqu'à ce que nous réglions cela, je crains que de nombreux pays africains ne continuent à accuser un retard économique. En tant qu'Africain, je place la colonisation à la charge des Européens, mais tout ce qui est advenu après l'indépendance est la faute des Africains (le soi-disant néo-colonialisme). Ils ont permis que cela perdure depuis plus de 50 ans.

Jusqu'à aujourd'hui, beaucoup de pays africains ne sont pas vraiment libres. Ils sont encore mal conseillés et contrôlés par les Européens et les Américains pour la plupart. Qui blâmer pour cela ? Je reproche aux Africains d'avoir laissé les Européens les dominer pendant encore un demi-siècle. Nous sommes devenus trop dépendants des Européens. Beaucoup de nos leaders sont absolument merdiques et franchement inutiles.

Le commerce inter africain

Home | African Union

La véritable raison pour laquelle l'Afrique est toujours à la traîne sur le plan économique en tant que continent est la suivante :

- Nous ne n'échangeons pas les uns avec les autres.
- Nous ne pensons pas à long terme.
- Nous aimons importer des produits d'Europe et de Chine sans raison. A commencer par simples choses telles que les cotons-tiges, les légumes, la viande. L'Afrique est grande. Nous avons d'immenses terres arables, un climat propice pour deux récoltes par an et plus encore. Il est regrettable que les hôtels en Afrique n'aient d'autre choix que d'importer du poulet d'Amérique, du beurre de France et des produits frais tels que les tomates et autres légumes.

Toutes ces choses sont simples, nous devrions pouvoir les mettre en oeuvre pour créer des emplois, collecter plus d'impôts, augmenter le PIB et créer des économies indépendantes et libres. On ne peut pas être libre quand on est encore dépendant de vos anciens maîtres sous la forme d'une aide de misère.

Changement de mentalité

Si l'Afrique s'était débarrassée des Européens dès les années 1970, les pays n'auraient d'autre choix que de commercer entre eux en développant leurs économies. Au lieu d'exporter leurs matières premières, ils auraient développé leurs industries afin d'exporter des produits finis et obtenir plus de revenus.

- Aujourd'hui, il est honteux que je doive acheter des chocolats importés de Belgique, de France et de Suisse alors que 95% de la production totale de cacao provient de Côte d'Ivoire et du Ghana.
- Il est dommage que les Nigérians manquent parfois de carburant, alors qu'ils possèdent l'une des plus grandes réserves de pétrole du monde.

Cette liste peut continuer encore et encore. Vous pouvez parler de la RDC, de la Guinée équatoriale, du Cameroun et très franchement de la majorité des pays. Encore une fois, si les Africains avaient mis fin aux relations bilatérales avec l'Occident, ils auraient collaboré pour développer leurs économies par le biais du commerce, des entreprises, de l'innovation et de l'entrepreneuriat. De la même manière que des pays asiatiques tels que la Corée du Sud, la Chine et d'autres l'ont fait.

Regardez la carte ci-dessus qui montre les minéraux abondants et les autres ressources naturelles de l'Afrique. Il n'y a absolument aucune raison pour que les raffineries de pétrole se trouvent au Moyen-Orient, alors que nous pouvons construire les nôtres ici même. Oseriez-vous me dire qu'une dizaine de pays ne peuvent pas se réunir pour créer leurs propres industries et fabriquer des produits finis ? Encore une fois, voilà où sont les problèmes de l'Afrique. Ne pas pouvoir travailler ensemble et penser à long terme.

Education, tribalisme et corruption

La colonisation a amené les Africains à se sentir inférieurs aux Européens. Après 70 à 100 ans de domination, de torture, d'actes de violence et de génocides brutaux et inhumains, les Africains pensaient qu'ils n'étaient pas aussi efficaces que les Européens. Il faut accorder cet argument aux Européens Ils l'ont utilisé à leur avantage pendant de nombreuses années. Ils ont fragmenté les sociétés et fait en sorte que les groupes ethniques se détestent les uns des autres jusqu'à aujourd'hui. Était-ce leur souci ? Oui, pendant la colonisation. Mais ensuite, les Africains auraient dû travailler pour s'unir et s'apercevoir que quelles que soient leurs différences, ils ne formaient qu'un seul peuple.

Les Africains auraient dû mettre leurs différences de côté et s'unir en tant que pays. En tant que Rwandais, je le dis avec une honte et un dégoût absolus. Je suis né au milieu d'une guerre civile et un génocide brutal a éclaté alors que j'avais à peine cinq ans. Puis-je vraiment blâmer les Belges et les Français du génocide rwandais ? Oui, partiellement. Mais je serais stupide de ne pas admettre que les Rwandais ont fait le sale boulot, peu importe ce que la France a fait dans les coulisses. Vous voyez, les problèmes rwandais passés et présents devraient être résolus par les Rwandais eux-mêmes et non par les Européens (Belgique, France ou Allemagne). Penser autrement, c'est de la folie absolue.

Le tribalisme que nous avons aujourd'hui, la politique identitaire, la corruption et bien d'autres problèmes, les Européens ont peu à voir avec cela voire rien du tout. Ce sont des problèmes africains qui ne pourront être résolus que lorsque nous les feront nôtres, les accepterons et en seront responsables. Ils ont peut-être commencé pendant la colonisation, mais c'est de notre faute si nous les avons encore aujourd'hui.

Que devrait faire l'Afrique ?

Tous ces problèmes sont africains et non européens. Depuis l'origine, les Européens n'ont jamais voulu que les Africains soient «indépendants». Ils se sont battus pour conserver leur fief avec la colonisation. Quand ils ont été forcés de le céder, ils ont probablement été surpris par le laissez-passer qu'ils ont reçu en échange.

Aujourd'hui, ils contrôlent l'Afrique par le biais de l'industrie de l'aide et des pratiques commerciales déloyales. En travaillant ensemble, les Africains se seraient développés avant d'attendre ce que les Européens peuvent à dire à leur sujet.

Vous êtes-vous déjà demandé pourquoi l'Afrique n'avait absolument rien à dire à propos d'elle même ? Des déclarations populaires telles que «L'Afrique, le continent noir dans les années 80» ou «L'Afrique se développe au début des années 2000» reflète la vision occidentale de l'Afrique et de l'évolution de la situation. Quelle est la vision propre qu'ont les Africains sur leur continent? Je ne le sais pas. Nous n'en entendons jamais parler soit parce ces derniers n'y attachent aucune importance soit parce que celle-ci n'existe pas.

Les pays qui commercent les uns avec les autres ont tendance à être pacifiques les uns avec les autres. Après la Seconde Guerre mondiale en Europe, l'Allemagne et la France sont devenues amicales, non pas parce qu'elles s'appréciaient, mais parce qu'elles obtenaient des avantages mutuels en échangeant de biens et de services. Si l'Afrique avait commercé en son sein, bien des guerres des années 1980 et 1990 ne se seraient pas produites.

L'Afrique n'est pas vraiment libre. Ce n'est la faute de personne. C'est la faute des Africains.

Africans are still tied in the colonial chains of their masters in Africa Today. by Didier Champion on Africa is Home

Comment les Africains peuvent-ils être libres et indépendants ?

Didier Champion's answer to What does Africa need to do to be independent: politically and economically? Will aid help or will it be a waste?

Personne ne se développe grâce à l'aide. L'Afrique ne devrait pas être différente. L'aide est le principal problème de l'Afrique aujourd'hui.

Charities in Africa. How does Aid hurts Africans. by Didier Champion on Africa is Home

Il existe une Afrique qu'on ne vous montre jamais. Il y a une autre facette de l'Afrique que les médias ne veulent jamais montrer au monde. C'est une obligation africaine que de se faire connaître et de se vendre. Propager le vécu d'aujourd'hui et prendre en charge son économie et sa politique.

Didier Champion's answer to Why do you think the continent of Africa, despite its abundant resources, not able to develop?

Ethiopia's services industry is booming. Ethiopia's flag carrier, Ethiopian Airlines, is now Africa's best carrier. © Ethiopian Airlines Tous les équipages d'Ethiopian Airlines, qu'ils soient pilotes, copilotes ou agents de bord sont féminins. Où en parle-t-on ? Seulement en Afrique.

Six of the top 10 Fastest Growing Economies in 2018 are African. by Didier Champion on Africa is Home

Voici de jeunes entrepreneurs africains, hommes et femmes, qui font des affaires. Nul autre endroit pour devenir millionnaire jeune que l'Afrique, surtout en partant de rien. Votre part de sueur et votre engagement dans une vision à long terme sont tout ce dont vous avez besoin.

Myths and Stereotypes about Africans and their lives: Africa is Rich and Beautiful. by Didier Champion on Africa is Home

VW allemandes qui seront assemblées au Rwanda*(Made in Rwanda Brand new Cars)* (photo prise le 27 juin 2018 par Taarifa Rwanda).

Cette semaine, l'usine a été officiellement inaugurée par son Excellence Paul Kagame, président du Rwanda. Son discours a résonné en moi. C'était de la musique à mes oreilles.

"L'Afrique n'a pas besoin d'être un dépotoir pour les voitures d'occasion ou tout autre chose d'occasion. A long terme, vous finissez toujours par payer un prix plus élevé. Si vous pouvez payer un prix élevé pour une occasion, pourquoi ne pas payer un prix élevé pour quelque chose de neuf ? C'est un choix simple. Africains, Rwandais, nous méritons mieux. C'est une façon de montrer comment nous pouvons nous le permettre. Pour toutes ces raisons, ce partenariat prometteur avec Volkswagen commence bien. "

- Le président Kagame s'exprimant lors du lancement de la "Volkswagen Mobility Solution" à Kigali, au Rwanda.

L'Afrique est très diversifiée en tant que continent. Il existe des pays à faible revenu, des pays à revenu moyen et des pays à revenu élevé. Beaucoup de gens semblent englober l'Afrique en une seule économie, ce qui est vraiment faux et déraisonnable.

Des pays tels que le Botswana, Maurice, les Seychelles, l'Afrique du Sud et la Guinée équatoriale sont déjà développés. Ils sont indépendants et n'ont pas besoin d'aide. La majorité de leur peuple vit un niveau de vie bien supérieur à celui de nombreux Occidentaux.

Une de mes villes préférées en Afrique. Abidjan, Cote d'Ivoire.

Les pays à revenu intermédiaire tels que l'Afrique du Sud, l'Égypte, le Kenya, la Côte d'Ivoire et de nombreux autres pays ont mis en place des systèmes de gouvernement et devraient, à mon avis, n'avoir besoin de personne. Quels que soient les problèmes auxquels ils sont confrontés, leur peuple et leurs gouvernements peuvent les résoudre eux-mêmes.

Dar-es-Salaam, Tanzanie

De nombreux pays à faible revenu tels que le Burundi, le Rwanda, l'Ouganda et d'autres pays similaires ont besoin de se prendre en main et de se concentrer sur les principes du libéralisme dans les domaines du commerce, du tourisme, des affaires, de l'entrepreneuriat et de l'innovation. Quelle que soit l'aide dont ils ont besoin, les autres pays africains peuvent les aider à améliorer des secteurs clés de leur économie afin de leur permettre de fonctionner et de subvenir à leurs besoins dans 5 à 10 ans.

Kigali, la capitale du Rwanda

Si les Africains se réveillaient et commençaient à travailler ensemble (aujourd'hui en 2018), il ne serait plus nécessaire de se faire câliner par des Européens ou des Nord-Américains à partir de 2030. Le feront-ils ? Votre avis là dessus est aussi bon que le mien. Je suis tout simplement en train de rêver. En fin de compte, les Africains sont les seuls perdants. Nous ne sommes pas respectés et sommes traités comme de la merde dans le monde entier par la faute de nos représentants. C'est une grande honte et j'en ai plus qu'assez. Essayez de voyager en Europe avec un passeport africain ou pire encore, suivez la procédure de demande de visa pour l'Europe. Vous serez traité comme un «criminel» en cours d'incarcération dans n'importe quel aéroport.

Au fil des ans, mes papiers ont été vérifiés deux fois, voire trois fois sans aucune raison. On m'a choisi pour des contrôles «aléatoires» à Francfort, Heathrow, Schiphol, etc. et voyager avec mes collègues d'Europe et des États-Unis fut tout simplement glacial. Avec le temps, vous finissez par comprendre de quoi il retourne. C'est une honte absolue, honnêtement.

Pour en savoir plus sur l'Afrique et sur ce doivent faire les Africains, consultez mon blog sur Africa is Home. Je partage mes idées sur une Afrique indépendante sans aide et qui repose sur elle-même. Africa is Back est un autre blog de Patrick Crosset que j'aime beaucoup. Il vous montre des histoires et une image de l'Afrique que vous aurez du mal à voir ailleurs. Il vous fait visiter l'Afrique de l'ouest, du centre, de l'est, du nord et du sud.

J'espère que vous les trouverez intéressants et que vous apprendrez quelque chose de nouveau.

L'Afrique n'est pas pauvre. Elle est juste mal gérée.

Aujourd'hui, les Européens sont peu responsable de la médiocrité de l'Afrique. C'est pourquoi tous les pays qui élisent un bon dirigeant visionnaire ou une série de bons dirigeants sur 10 à 15 ans consécutifs ou plus s'améliorent rapidement et plutôt bien. Le Botswana, les Seychelles et Maurice sont de bons exemples. Mon pays d'origine, le Rwanda, est même le meilleur exemple dans ce cas. Si le Rwanda peut le faire, aucun pays ne peut s'inventer d'excuses. Pas même la Somalie.

«Nous devons comprendre que le temps du baby-sitting est terminé et que nous ne nous développerons jamais tant que nous pensons que nous avons un besoin constant d'Européens, d'Américains, d'Asiatiques ou d'autres baby-sitters.» Le président du Rwanda, Paul Kagame.

Un bon leadership compte. C'est le principal problème de l'Afrique aujourd'hui. Prenez cette «pilule magique» et vous réglerez nos problèmes en un rien de temps. Les Africains sont les personnes les plus travailleuses et résilientes que je connaisse. Nous avons besoin de meilleurs représentants au sommet. Ils ne doivent pas être parfaits. Juste des leaders soucieux de leur peuple et passionnés par eux. Les Africains ne demandent pas trop. Juste un peu d'espoir pour aujourd'hui et d’enthousiasme pour l'avenir. Le reste est vraiment très facile. Demandez au peuple africain. la majorité sera d'accord avec moi.

Votre ami africain du Rwanda.

Didier Champion

Questions similaires

La France est-elle prospère à cause de la colonisation ?
Si la colonisation n'avait jamais eu lieu, comment se présenterait la France ?
Quels sont les inconvénients de la colonisation en Afrique ?
La colonisation a-t-elle eu également des effets positifs sur l'Afrique ?
La France doit-elle s'excuser perpétuellement pour avoir eu des colonies en Afrique ?

Quelles sont les conséquences de la colonisation en Afrique sur son développement économique aujourd'hui ?

Pourquoi la colonisation a été un mal pour l'Afrique ?
La colonisation a-t-elle été un mal nécessaire pour l'Afrique ?
La colonisation est-il un mal nécessaire ?
La France n’est-elle riche qu’à cause de la colonisation ?
Comment était composée l'Afrique avant la colonisation ?

La colonisation a-t-elle eu des effets positifs et négatifs sur l'Afrique ?
Quels sont les avantages de la colonisation ?
La colonisation n'a-t-elle pas été bénéfique pour l'Afrique ?
Pourquoi l'Afrique était-elle sous-développée avant la colonisation ?
Quelle est l'importance de la colonisation pour les Africains ?

Is dictatorship always wrong? Doesn't history have any examples of good dictatorships/dictators?

Nancy Gough Updated 1y

An example of a good one is this man right here

Thomas Sankara, former president of Burkina Faso (1983 to 1987)

The great Thomas Sankara, this is a man who wanted to AND did the right thing. He loved his country, and was loved by many.

He shunned the West and single handedly proved that Africa can be self sufficient and self reliant. He was honest and upright, he renamed the country to Burkina Faso which means- Land of Upright Man; a reflection of the culture he was promoting amongst his people. He was a man of unquestionable integrity, Sankara knew how to show his people that they could become dignified and proud through will power, courage, honesty and work.

There were many against him, from their former colonizer France and its ally Ivory Coast, to feudal lords and chieftains... He was assassinated by his best friend. A week before he died he said 'While revolutionaries as individuals can be murdered, you cannot kill ideas.'

Sankara made revolutionary developments and national economic programs that shook the foundations of the traditional economic development models imposed on Africa.

He redistributed land from the feudal landlords to the peasants, introduced series of irrigation and fertilization programs and Wheat production increased from 1,700 kilograms per hectare (1,500 lb/acre) to 3,800 kilograms per hectare (3,400 lb/acre), making the country food self sufficient and creating a surplus! (In less than four years)

In an attempt to fight deforestation, and desertification in the Sahel, he rallied the people to plant 10,000,000 trees; and 7,000 nurseries in the villages.

Over 700 km (430 mi) of rail was laid by Burkinabé people to facilitate manganese extraction, without any foreign aid or outside help. They went on to build a road and rail network across the country.

He promoted public health and in one week alone 2.5 million Burkinabé children were vaccinated, in an attempt to eradicate polio, meningitis and measles. He made every village build a medical dispensary.

His commitment to women's rights led him to outlaw female genital mutilation, forced marriages and polygamy. He appointed women to high governmental positions and encouraged them to work outside the home and stay in school, even if pregnant. In his own words ''The revolution and women's liberation go together. We do not talk of women's emancipation as an act of charity or because of a surge of human compassion. It is a basic necessity for the triumph of the revolution. Women hold up the other half of the sky'''

Furthermore, Sankara was the first African leader to appoint women to major cabinet positions and to recruit them actively for the military.

Large-scale housing and infrastructure projects were also undertaken. Brick factories were created to help build houses in effort to end urban slums.

He prioritized education with a nationwide literacy campaign. He had 350 communities build schools with their own labour.

He spoke out against neo-colonialism, imperialism and foreign aid arguing that the poor and exploited did not have an obligation to repay money to the rich and exploiting.

His character:

He sold off the presidential fleet of luxury cars and forbade travel in first class for himself or government officials; he refused his portrait to be hung in public places as was the norm with other dictators because in his own words, there are 7 million burkinabés just like him; he mandated public officials to wear tunics woven from burkinabe cotton; he refused to use the air conditioning in his office on the grounds that such luxury was only available to a handful of Burkinabé; he wrote the national anthem (he was also an accomplished guitarist); he reduced his salary to 450usd/month and his possessions to a car, four bikes, three guitars, a fridge and a broken freezer.....

He touched the hearts of many and was a beacon of hope, during a time in Africa with dictators and tyrants oppressing and robbing the people just like their colonialist predecessors, he was doing the opposite; enriching his people and proving that it was possible.

He died at 37.

Rest easy Thomas! You and all you stood for will never be forgotten.

https://en.m.wikipedia.org/wiki/Thomas_Sankara

Thomas Sankara, The African Che

Edit-Thanks so much everyone, for reading, your thanks, for commenting, for upvoting!

I just wanted more people to know about him and that's what has happened here, thank you so much ❤□

Was there ever any examples of countries that became worse after the removal of a dictator, to the point where the people think life was better under the rule of said dictator?

Alice Twain · Follow Lives in İtaly (1971–present) Updated 1y

«While revolutionaries as individuals can be murdered, you cannot kill ideas» (Thomas Sankara).

Have you ever heard about Thomas Sankara?

In 1983 Upper Volta was one of the poorest countries in Africa, then a coup installed Thomas Sankara as president. Sankara changed the name of the country to Burkina Faso and started a number of reforms. «His domestic policies were focused on preventing famine with agrarian self-sufficiency and land reform, prioritizing education with a nationwide literacy campaign and promoting public health by vaccinating 2.5 million children against meningitis, yellow fever and measles». Sankara improved the living conditions of the Burkinabé people, redistributing agricultural land, planting trees to prevent desertification, creating a widespread program for building roads and railways, which brought jobs and modernization, strengthening the healthcare and education systems. He also outlawed FGMs, forced marriage, and promoted women to the head of the state and at all levels of the administration. Finally, he unilaterally reduced the Burkinabé international debt (mostly based on old interests that had piled up) and renounced international aids where not strictly necessary in order to escape the control of the IMF and World Bank.

In doing so, through, he caused the enmity of the international finance, but also of the Burkinabé middle class and of the old tribal chiefs. These united forces and in 1987 assassinated Sankara, substituting him with Blaise Compaoré, who remained in office through heavily doctored elections, until 2014, when he finally had to flee to Cote d'Ivoire. Despite being nominally democratic, Compaoré undid everything that had been done by Sankara, worsening the human rights conditions, the economy, and the overall living conditions.

Related Answer

Was there ever any examples of countries that became worse after the removal of a dictator, to the point where the people think life was better under the rule of said dictator?

Paul Vancraeynest , I love history, especially about past technology Answered Jan 4

All the other answers are quite good. I want to add Mobutu.

Congo is a huge country, hard to govern. Mobutu renamed the country to “Zaire”. Things were far from perfect, corruption was rampant, infrastructure was a mess and Mobutu was not really Mr. Nice Guy. But he held the country together. Things more or less worked. He held out for over 30 years.

Then Kabila took over, Mobutu was seriously ill this time, and died. Since then, the country is a mess. Civil wars rage all over. It is far worse than before.

Les stars d'Afrique
Verdict le 6 avril dans le procès des assassins présumés de Thomas Sankara

· Suivre Publication par David-GDK dim. Knows Anglais

Quatorze accusés sont poursuivis dans ce procès qui se déroule cependant en l’absence du principal accusé, l’ancien président, Blaise Compaoré.

Thomas Sankara, assassiné en octobre 1987

Quatorze accusés sont poursuivis dans le cadre de ce procès qui a démarré le 25 octobre 2021 devant le tribunal militaire de Ouagadougou.

Dans le box : douze des quatorze accusés dont le général Gilbert Diendéré, 61 ans, un des principaux chefs de l'armée lors du putsch de 1987 qui a abouti à l'assassinat de Thomas Sankara.

Gilbert Diendéré, un des accusés au procès des assassins présumés deThomas Sankara Absent cependant, le principal accusé, l'ancien président Blaise Compaoré, réfugié en Côte d'Ivoire depuis qu'il a été chassé par la rue en 2014.

Tous sont poursuivis pour "attentat à la sûreté de l'Etat", "recel de cadavre" et "complicité d'assassinat". Et leurs avocats ont plaidé non coupables.

Pendant les six mois qu'a duré ce procès, une centaine de témoins ont défilé à la barre pour dire leur part de vérité sur les événements du 15 octobre 1987.

Un soldat, Yamba Elisée Ilboudo, a par exemple raconté que c'est chez Blaise Compaoré que s'est réuni le commando avant que celui-ci parte assassiner Thomas Sankara.

Un complot planifié

Luc Damiba secrétaire général du Comité international du mémorial Thomas Sankara, se dit satisfait du déroulement de ce procès

"Oui, nous sommes satisfaits après 35 ans d'attente de justice, le tribunal a écouté une centaine de témoins et une vingtaine d'avocats de la défense et de la partie civile. Nous avons su qu'un complot a été planifié de longue date, qui a permis à un commando de quitter le domicile de Blaise Compaoré et de se rendre au Conseil de l'entente pour attendre Thomas Sankara et son équipe".

Des dirigeants africains ont également été mis en cause, notamment l'Ivoirien Félix Houphouët Boigny, présenté par certains témoins comme le cerveau d'un complot contre le chef de la révolution burkinabè.

Blaise Compaoré, le grand absent au procès des assassins présumés de Thomas Sankara

Blaise Compaoré, le grand absent

Grand absent donc dans le box des accusés : l’ancien président Blaise Compaoré. Une absence que regrette Luc Damiba.

" C'est regrettable qu'il ne soit pas là, qu'il n'ait pas assumé son histoire, son passé. Les Burkinabè attendaient qu'il vienne dire sa part de vérité et qu'on passe à l'étape de la réconciliation. Il n'est pas venu, on n'a pas sa version des faits. On aurait dû avoir sa vérité. On regrette les absences de Blaise Compaoré et de Hyacinthe Kafando."

L’adjudant-chef, Hyacinthe Kafando, en fuite depuis 2016, est soupçonné d'avoir dirigé le commando ayant assassiné Thomas Sankara et ses compagnons.

Victoire de la justice

Mais pour le juriste Apollinaire Kyélem, la tenue de ce procès est déjà une victoire pour la justice burkinabè.

"La justice burkinabè est la plus indépendante du continent. Le Conseil supérieur de la magistrature est devenu un organe indépendant des pouvoirs publics. Le verdict sera conforme au droit et non à des aléas politiques."

Le parquet militaire a requis début février, 30 ans de prison ferme à l'encontre des différents prévenus et 20 ans contre le général Gilbert Diendéré.

Verdict donc le 6 avril prochain, dans ce procès qui restera sans doute, comme le plus retentissant de l’histoire du Burkina Faso.

SOURCE: dw.com

News Nigeria

In November 2021, Burkinabe protesters blocked a French military convoy in Kaya during protests against French military presence and Imperialism in Burkina Faso.

Posted by Aniekpeno Ekong 12h

A 13-year-old boy, Aliou Sawadogo became a hero, after he brought down a French military surveillance drone with a slingshot.

He was nicknamed "The Sniper of Kaya".

Les stars d'Afrique
Procès Sankara : revivez le verdict historique

Publication par David-GDK 17 h

Blaise Compaoré est condamné à la prison à vie dans le procès du meurtre de Thomas Sankara.

Blaise Compaoré a été condamné ce mercredi (06.04) par contumace à la prison à vie par le tribunal militaire de Ouagadougou.

L'ancien président du Burkina Faso, qui vit en exil à Abidjan, est reconnu coupable d'avoir participé à l'assassinat de son prédécesseur en 1987.

L'autre grand absent de ce procès, Hyacinthe Kafando, l'ancien commandant de la garde de Blaise Compaoré, a également été condamné à la perpétuité.

Enfin, présent lors des audiences, le général Gilbert Diendéré, l'un des principaux chefs de l'armée lors du putsch de 1987, écope également de la prison à vie.

L'émotion de Mariam Sankara

Thomas Sankara, leader de la révolution burkinabè et douze de ses collaborateurs ont été assassinés le 15 octobre 1987, alors qu'ils étaient réunis à Ouagadougou. Réouvert au lendemain d'une insurrection qui a entrainé la chute de Blaise Compaoré, ce procès fera date dans l'histoire politique du Burkina Faso.

Ce verdict est ainsi un grand jour pour Mariam Sankara. Pour la veuve de Thomas Sankara, "l'opinion publique sait maintenant qui est le président Thomas Sankara, qui est l'individu, qui est l'homme politique et ce qu'il voulait. Mais aussi ce que voulaient ceux qui l'ont assassiné. On l'avait traité de tout dans les discours."

Douze des quatorze accusés étaient présents à la barre. Ils étaient accusés de complicité d'assassinat, d'assassinat, de recel de cadavres et d'attentat à la sureté de l'Etat.

Maître Mathieu Somé, l'un des avocats du général Gilbert Diendéré, déplore que la justice n'ait pas pris en compte le fait que son client a coopéré avec la justice.

"Elle est excessive de mon point de vue. Il a pris la même peine que ceux qui étaient absents. J'ai trouvé cela, sans rentrer dans les détails, pas tout à fait juste. Il est venu quand même apporter sa contribution en s'expliquant devant le peuple", explique l'avocat.

Le verdict tombe plus de 34 ans après l'assassinat de Thomas Sankara

Être allé au bout du procès

Au-delà des peines prononcées, le plus important était d'établir la vérité devant la justice, explique maître Prosper Farama, avocat de la partie civile :

"Les familles n'étaient pas accrochées sur les peines à donner à qui que ce soit. Les familles voulaient la vérité, la justice. Les peines relevaient de la souveraineté des juges. Ils ont prononcé les peines en estimant que pour certains il n'y avait pas de circonstances atténuantes. Ce qui nous intéressait est d'aboutir à un verdict qui nous rende justice, de conduire ce procès jusqu'à son terme, que les accusés aient eu la possibilité de se défendre à l'exception de ceux qui n'ont pas eu le courage et l'honnêteté de faire face à la justice de leur pays."

Alouna Traoré, l'un des rescapés du putsch du 15 octobre, a le sourire au sortir de la salle d'audience.

Le rêve burkinabè est permis, estime-t-il. Pour Alouna Traoré, "ils ont attaqué notre rêve pensant pouvoir le tuer. 35 ans après, je me rends compte que le rêve burkinabè tient la route. Cela enthousiasme tout le continent, les lignes sont en train de bouger. Thomas a fait œuvre utile, son exemple est en train d'être suivi. Notre joie c'est que les jeunesses, les générations futures s'en servent pour des combats meilleurs, pour qu'on puisse faire de ces territoires dits de misère et de précarité, des territoires de bonheur et de bien-être."

Un combat qui ne fait que commencer

Le dossier Thomas Sankara n'est pas, pour autant, totalement bouclé. Il peut toujours connaître des rebondissements.

Au-delà de la possibilité de faire appel de ce jugement, Maître Propser Farama note qu'un "volet international est toujours en cours. Nous attendons qu'un juge soit nommé. Enfin, le combat pour la justice et la vérité ne s'arrête jamais à un procès. Pendant que nous luttons tous les jours pour que ces choses n'arrivent pas, vous apercevrez que nous ne sommes pas très loin du recommencement de ces événements malheureux. C'est un combat continuel qui ne s'arrête jamais, pas pour les avocats, mais pour tout le peuple burkinabè."

Le tribunal militaire a par ailleurs prononcé la déchéance des décorations de tous les accusés condamnés.

Source: DW.com

Wake Up Africa!

What could have been the future of Africa if Muammar Gaddafi and Thomas Sankara weren't assassinated?

Answered by Theophilus E.Daniel-Kagbare Wed

Gadaffi was in power for four decades in Libya, and could hardly have had any more impact if he were alive. Those years were spent on a self-serving mission of personal aggrandizement advertised as Afro-centricism.

Thomas Sankara was an anti-imperialist passionate about "feeding, housing and giving medical care to his people". In many ways in the mold of Paul Kagame of Rwanda, a country of like size as Sankara's Upper Volta, which he renamed Burkina Faso.

Sankara remain a shining example of what is possible, and illustrates Western distaste for progressive leadership in Africa. Given the size of his country, it would be exaggerating to speak of it changing the future of Africa, except to shame the self-serving lot.

Let's be clear: Muammar Gaddafi and Thomas Sankara do not belong to the same class. Not in the least. Gadaffi helped the emergence of Sankara, and when he could not have him as his pawn, supported the plot to undermine and ultimately kill Sankara. Hard to believe the number of people still taken by the lies and false image of Gadaffi.

Gadaffi was a leader who ran his country around himself, immediate family and tribe. If he was a revolutionary at the beginning, he certainly did not keep faith with that. If he started well, he certainly did not finish well. He finished off his revolutionary allies, and went on to destroy Libya's state institutions, including the Army, to make sure nobody can stand up to him. Gadaffi's Libya was about Gadaffi. Nothing else.

Gaddafi has an image outside of Libya that is opposite to what visitors and Libyan citizens have to say about him.

Gaddafi was a self-serving megalomaniac driven by personal self-image than anything else, and sought to dominate Sub-Saharan Africa. Drunk with petro-dollars, he financed many terrorist groups and insurrection in sub-Saharan Africa. He sought to make make Samuel Doe his surrogate but was countered by the United States.

Sankara sought to lay the foundation for the future of his country; he was rather naïve and certainly not strategic in handling relations with France, and paid dearly for it. However, his sincerity and vision could hardly be faulted.

Gaddafi destroyed Libya; at the end of Gadaffi's 40 years in power Libya had no army, "…no civil society, no free press, no education system, no local government."

Gadaffi, the supposed pan-Africanist…

To annex part of Chad, and was roundly defeated.

Worked at destabilizing Nigeria by sponsoring Islamic fundamentalistgroups.

Sponsored Charles Taylor murderous reign in Liberia.

Was behind Foday Sankoh's reign of terror in Sierra Leone.

According to Liberia–Libya relations - Wikipedia:

In a 1983 interview Doe said, "Qaddafi is a man who, I think, would like to lead the whole continent of Africa, which is impossible to do," adding that Gaddafi was destabilizing the continent by sponsoring terrorist activities, "Qaddafi pays terrorists to carry explosives to other African countries, and of course we in Liberia are aware of Qaddafi's threat, and we're very cautious about that."

What do African people think about Thomas Sankara?

Daveed Phoenix Lived 15 years in Africa 3y

I have never seen a sober assessment of the man.

Every African I have ever heard talk about him did so in hagiographic terms. He was a great leader who wanted true independence, rather than the nominal independence offered by the French. He was reforming society and taking power away from the corrupt and regressive tribal chieftains. He was a champion of women's rights who outlawed female genital mutilation. He was going to demonstrate that a poor African nation could transform itself into an economic powerhouse through self-reliance alone. But before he could realize his great vision, he was betrayed assassinated at the instigation of France, who feared the loss of her neocolonial empire.

That is the tale as it is usually told. Very few people mention that he acquired power through a coup, or that he limited freedom of the press, or that he imprisoned—and possibly tortured—leaders of trade unions with whom he clashed, or that the curbed the right to strike, or that there were some executions of officials from the deposed regime…

He stopped being a human being with flaws once he was assassinated. He underwent an apotheosis in which he became some kind of semi-divine figure onto which Africans who are dissatisfied with the governance of their country can project whatever reforms they would like to see adopted.

My country is mismanaged. There is too much corruption. Aah, if only we could have a Sankara here!

That is what most Africans who have heard of him seem to think.

Daveed Phoenix, Lived 15 years in Africa Answered Jan 9, 2019

I have never seen a sober assessment of the man.

Every African I have ever heard talk about him did so in hagiographic terms. He was a great leader who wanted true independence, rather than the nominal independence offered by the French. He was reforming society and taking power away from the corrupt and regressive tribal chieftains. He was a champion of women's rights who outlawed female genital mutilation. He was going to demonstrate that a poor African nation could transform itself into an economic powerhouse through self-reliance alone. But before he could realize his great vision, he was betrayed assassinated at the instigation of France, who feared the loss of her neocolonial empire.

That is the tale as it is usually told. Very few people mention that he acquired power through a coup, or that he limited freedom of the press, or that he imprisoned—and possibly tortured—leaders of trade unions with whom he clashed, or that the curbed the right to strike, or that there were some executions of officials from the deposed regime…

He stopped being a human being with flaws once he was assassinated. He underwent an apotheosis in which he became some kind of semi-divine figure onto which Africans who are dissatisfied with the governance of their country can project whatever reforms they would like to see adopted.

My country is mismanaged. There is too much corruption. Aah, if only we could have a Sankara here!

That is what most Africans who have heard of him seem to think.

"What do I as an African person think about Thomas Sankara?"

Boris Ezomo, Africa is hot but I love it here. Updated Jan 19, 2018

He was a visionary and a true defender of pan African ideals.

He was not so well known simply because he started small. As the military leader of a tiny land locked country in west Africa that even we the West Africans forget they exist.

The country of Upper Volta. Named by the colonial masters with no imagination.

Upper Volta=land above River Volta.

Gold Coast (Ghana) = coast from where they got their gold.

Ivory coast = you guessed it.

In 1983 as a captain in the army. He staged a coup at the age of 33. His aim was to weed out corruption and the influence of the old colonial master - France.

First order of business was to change the country's name to Burkina Faso meaning "land of the upright man"

He proceeded with one of the biggest social and economic reform seen in Africa. In summary,

Aimed on mass vaccination

Prevention of famine

Outlawed female circumcision, forced marrage and polygamy.

Refused foreign aid. And much more.

He was a Marxist. When asked about that he said:

Just like my Nigerian military leaders who were the greatest criminals in history of Africa.

He was a champion of women's rights.

“I can hear the roar of women's silence”

On imperialism.

“he who feeds you, controls you”

“Imperialism is a system of exploitation that occurs not only in the brutal form of those who come with guns to conquer territory. Imperialism often occurs in more subtle forms, a loan, food aid, blackmail . We are fighting this system that allows a handful of men on Earth to rule all of humanity.”

Are some of his quotes.

I remember him visiting Lagos as a visiting head of state. What does he do? Goes to hang out with a similar minded “enemy of state” and music genius Fela Kuti Bet it made the Nigerian military leaders mad.

Yet when he came face to face with General Babaginda the Nigerian president. He refused to move unless dismissed by Babaginda. Saying "Sir you are a general and am a captain. Dismiss me"

Do not forget that he was also a president.

In 1987 a useful idiot whose name I do not even remember. Conspired and murdered him. Did not even hide the reason for this.

Reason given was that he had created a rift between Upper Volta and France. Burkina Faso rapidly returned to "normal" Poor and forgotten.

RIP Thomas Sankara.

We need more of his type, very rare in Africa.

Kingsley Aristotle, Bsc Accounting&Finance Africa ,Racism & Globalizaion, Kwame Nkrumah University of Science and Technology (201... Answered Dec 24, 2017

Thomas sankara remained popular with most Africans and his country's impoverished citizens,as a result of His revolutionary programs for African self-reliance which made him an icon to many of Africa's poor , his proposed policies alienated and triguerd the interests of several groups, which included the small, but powerful Burkinabé middle-class, the tribal leaders whom he stripped of the long-held traditional right to forced labour and tribute payments, and France and its ally the Ivory Coast.

Solidarity

He sold off the government fleet ofMercedes cars and made the Renault 5 (the cheapest car sold in Burkina Faso at that time) the official service car of the ministers.

He reduced the salaries of well-off public servants, including his own, and forbade the use of government chauffeurs and 1st class airline tickets.

He redistributed land from the feudal landlords to the peasants. Wheat production increased from 1,700 kilograms per hectare (1,500 lb/acre) to 3,800 kilograms per hectare (3,400 lb/acre), making the country food self-sufficient.[5] He opposed foreign aid, saying that "he who feeds you, controls you."[5] He spoke in forums like the Organization of African Unity against what he described asneo-colonialist penetration of Africa through Western trade and finance.[5] He called for a united front of African nations to repudiate their foreign debt. He argued that the poor and exploited did not have an obligation to repay money to the rich and exploiting.[5]

"Thomas knew how to show his people that they could become dignified and proud through will power, courage, honesty and work. What remains above all of my husband is his integrity."

Mariam Sankara, Thomas' widow

In Ouagadougou, Sankara converted the army's provisioning store into a state-owned supermarket open to everyone (the first supermarket in the country).

He forced well-off civil servants to pay one month's salary to public projects.[

He refused to use the air conditioning in his office on the grounds that such luxury was not available to anyone but a handful of Burkinabés.

As President, he lowered his salary to $450 a month and limited his possessions to a car, four bikes, three guitars, a fridge and a broken freezer.

Africa and the world are yet to recover from Sankara's assassination. Just as we have yet to recover from the loss ofPatrice Lumumba, Kwame Nkrumah, Eduardo Mondlane,Amílcar Cabral, Steve Biko,Samora Machel, and most recently John Garang, to name only a few. While malevolent forces have not used the same methods to eliminate each of these great pan-Africanists, they have been guided by the same motive: to keep Africa in chains."

— António de Figueiredo

Related Links

Was Thomas Sankara a good president for Burkina Faso?
Why was Thomas Sankara killed?

Why is Thomas Sankara considered a hero today? What did do and would Burkinafaso be different had he been alive today?

What was life like in Burkina Faso after the 1982 coup and under Thomas Sankara?

How is Thomas Sankara's communism worked good and the other national leaders that tried communism had failed? How is he different?

What if Thomas Sankara survived and united Africa?
Why did Blaise Compaore betray Thomas Sankara?

How many people did Thomas Sankara kill?
Why did America want to overthrow the Thomas Sankara government?
Why is Burkina Faso poor?

AfriStar

L’ancien président burkinabè a pu regagner son domicile mercredi 6 avril. Il était placé en résidence surveillée depuis le 24 janvier dernier, date du coup d’État militaire qui l’a renversé du pouvoir

· Suivre Publication par David-GDK 6 avr.

Burkina Faso : libération de l’ex-président Christian Kaboré après quatre mois de "résidence surveillée"

Arrêté le 24 janvier 2022, en marge du coup d’Etat opéré par les militaires, puis placé en "résidence surveillée" depuis lors, l’ex-président du Burkina Faso, Roch Marc Christian Kaboré a été libéré ce mercredi a annoncé le porte-parole du gouvernement burkinabè Lionel Bilgo dans un communiqué.

"Le gouvernement du Burkina Faso informe l'opinion nationale, qu'après les concertations entamées il y a un peu plus de trois semaines avec l'ancien Président du Faso, Roch Marc Christian Kaboré il a été décidé qu'il rejoindra ce mercredi 06 avril 2022 son domicile à Ouagadougou", a déclaré Bilgo.

"Toutefois le gouvernement rassure que des mesures sont prises pour garantir sa sécurité", a-t-il ajouté.

Cette libération faisait partie des exigences de la Conférence des chefs d'Etat et de gouvernement de la communauté économique des Etats de l'Afrique de l'Ouest (CEDEAO) lors de son sommet extraordinaire tenu le 25 mars à Accra au Ghana.

Le Mouvement du peuple pour le progrès (MPP), la formation politique de Kaboré, et des organisations de la société civile avaient demandé à plusieurs reprises la mise en liberté de l'ex-président.

Pour rappel, des militaires ont renversé le 24 janvier dernier l'ancien Président Roch Marc Christian Kaboré, jugeant que sa gestion de la situation sécuritaire était "inefficace".

Une transition de trois ans a été amorcée avec le Lieutenant-Colonel Paul-Henri Sandaogo Damiba comme président et Albert Ouédraogo, comme Premier ministre.

La CEDEAO s'est dite "très préoccupée", par la durée de trois ans de la transition politique et a décidé de maintenir la suspension du pays de ses instances.

Elle a également demandé la finalisation d'un chronogramme acceptable de la transition au plus tard le 25 avril 2022 sous peine de sanctions économiques et financières.

Par ailleurs, elle a décidé de nommer un médiateur pour le Burkina Faso pour faciliter le dialogue entre toutes les parties prenantes et assurer une transition réussie.

Pour sa part, le président Damiba a déclaré vendredi dernier dans une adresse à la Nation que la durée de la transition pourrait être révisée si la situation sécuritaire s'améliorait.

Ce mercredi à l'issue du conseil des ministres, le porte-parole du gouvernement Lionel Bilgo a souligné que le Burkina Faso avait demandé l'accompagnement de la CEDEAO sur le plan humanitaire et sécuritaire.

AfriStar

Log Lift 2022: Le Burkinabè Iron Biby conserve son titre de champion du monde

· Suivre Publication par David-GDK 3 avr.

Iron Baby, le quadruple champion du monde de sa discipline

Le Burkinabè Cheick Ahmed Al-Hassan Sanou alias Iron Biby conserve son titre de champion de log Lift. C'était ce samedi 02 avril 2022 à Londres où pour la 4ème fois Iron Biby conserve son titre de champion du monde.

Le champion Burkinabè a soulevé une charge de 218 kg à égalité parfaite avec le britannique Luke Stolman. Il n'a pas pu battre son record de 229 kg qui était de porter une charge de 230 kg. « Malgré mes blessures j'ai pu soulever 230 kg mais malheureusement le juge n'a pas validé pour des raisons de stabilité », écrit le champion du monde sur sa page officielle Facebook. Il faut noter qu'après avoir soulevé auparavant 229 kg, il conserve son titre de champion du monde de log Lift.

COUNTRY FACT FILE

Location

In West Africa South of the Sahara desert.

Official title of the state

BURKINAFASO (National)

BIRKONAFASO (French) = Also known by its short form name BURKINA

Flag description

Two equal horizontal bands of red (top) and green with a yellow five-pointed star in the center: red recalls the country's struggle for independence, green is for hope and abundance, and yellow represents the country's mineral wealth. Note: uses the popular Pan-African colors of Ethiopia.

Neighbours

Mali on NW, Niger on NE. Benin, Togo, Ghana, Cote D'Ivoire on South. Land boundaries: total 3,193 km. Border countries: Benin 306 km, Cote d'_Ivoire 584 km, Ghana 549 km, Mali 1,000 km, Niger 628 km, Togo 128 km.

Founder of The Nation
Morris Nwalagmba Yameogo

Local divisions
45 provinces.

Government type
Republic semi-presidential

Legislation chamber
Unicameral National Assembly

Form of State
Republic Executive president elected for five-year term, renewable once. The Prime Minister is Head of Government, appointed by the President. A multi-party republic with one legislative body. The National Assembly, 111 seats, members are elected by popular vote to serve for five-year terms.

Executive branch

President, Prime Minister heads government, Bicameral Parliament.

Separated by Chief of State and Head of Government. President elected by popular vote to serve for five-year terms eligible for a second term. Head of government appointed by the president with the consent of the National Assembly

Former Rulers

1960-1966 Nwalagmba Maurice Yameogo

1966-1980 Army General Sangoule Lamizana

1980-1982 Colonel Saye Zerbo

1982-1983 Majour Jean-Baptiste Oedraogo

1983-1987 Captain Thomas Issidore Sankara

1987 - present Captain Blaise Compaore

Judicial chamber

Supreme Court, Appeals Court

Capital city

Ouagadougo Altitude 305 mtrs/1000ft

Geographic coordinates - 12.22N ,1.31W. The capital city of Burkina Faso in West Africa. Formerly capital of the Mossi empire. A present name taken from a village known as Artisanal de Ouaga in Ouagadougou region: The village is a place for local artists to showcase and sell their artwork. It's name also taken to the French-orthography, which should be pronounced as "Wagadugu", it became capital of the French-territory of Upper Volta in 1919, which later to be known as Burkinafaso. It is linked by rail to the port of Abidjan in the Ivory Coast. Its principal buildings combine African and French architectural styles.

Names of main towns
Bobo-Dioulasso, Koudougou, Ouahigouya, Banfora, Kaya.

Date of independence

11 December,1960

Religions (Major)

Muslim 50%, Tribal beliefs 40%, Christians (mainly Roman Catholic)

10%. Main spoken languages

French (official), Moore, Diola (Bambara), Gourmontche, Peul, Fuludde, Tamasheq, Diowa widely spoken.

Currency

African Franc (CFA) = 100 Centimes.

Area in Km2

274,200.00.

Country area comparison in Africa

29 out of 55 states.

Demographic terms:

Average annual population growth rate 3.095 %

Birth rate 43.98 births per 1,000 population

Death rate 13.02 deaths per 1,000 population

Average life expectancy: 53.32 years

Male 51.39 years: Female 55.31 years:

Illiteracy rate (%)

Male: 63, Female: 81

Average per capita income

USD 1, 200

Population density
59.4/km2

Urban population (%)

20

Contributor groups(%)

Farming, Fishing: 30, Industry: 19, Social service 51

Main Export Items

Raw cotton, livestock, gold, karite nuts, rubber products, sesame seeds, hides & skins.

Economy is based on

Agriculture & Agro-pastoral. 90% of the population is engaged in subsistence agriculture, which is vulnerable to periodic drought, several hundred thousand Burkinabe seasonal farm workers to find employment in neighboring countries.

Climate

Tropical.

Extremes:

Lowest point: Mouhoun (Black volta) River 200 meters.

Highest point: Tena Kourou 749 meters.

Weather of the Capital city (Ouagadougu) average annual temperature 28.6oC.

Altitude 305 mtrs/1000 ft

Hottest Month April 26-39oC.

Coldest Month January 16-33oc

Driest Month December 0 mm average Rf.

Wettest Month August 277 mm average Rf.

Measures
Metric system

Time zone

GMT/UTC+ 0

Public holidays

All Christian and Muslim holidays.

Ethnic groups

Voltaic groups (Mossi & Bobo) 40%, Mande and others Gurunsi, Senufo, Lobi and Fulani 60%.

Topography & Environmental concern

The Inland State of Burkinafaso is in the Savannah region of W. Africa. Savannah cut by three principal rivers of the Black, Red, and white voltas. The N. is arid, hot and thinly populated. Environment: Recurrent droughts and desertification severely affecting agricultural activities, population distribution, and the economy: overgrazing: soil degradation: deforestation.

Economy Overview

Industry

Cotton lint, beverages, agro-processing, gold, consumer goods.

Chief crops

Millet, sorghum, rice, peanuts, grains, Shea nuts, sesame, corn, livestock.

Natural resources

Manganese, Gold deposits, Diamonds, Limestone, Marble, Phosphates, pumice- Salt.

Land in use (%)

Arable land: 13

Grassland: 37

Forest wood: 24

Other: 26

Marine:

Coastline: None

Commercial Sea port:-

An inland state uses mainly the port of Abidjan for part of its Import-exportation.

Development prospect:

The government's attention is also focused on the rising cost of staple goods. In 2011, the government subsidized the price of rice, sugar and oil to calm consumer anger, but the moves have not always been respected by retailers. The tensions had a negative effect on tourism and will continue to be felt into 2012, especially in the agricultural sector, which was not spared the tumult. Cotton producers in several zones of the western region refused to plant for the 2011/2012 season in order to call for higher purchasing prices and lower input costs. The agriculture ministry said that it expects 400,000tn from the 2011/2012 season due to the boycott and weak rainfall, which will also lead to reduced cereals production. Farmers produced 337,556tn in the 2010/2011 season. The mining sector holds the most promise for the year ahead. The country will open its first zinc mine in June 2012 when Glencore's Perkoa project begins production. However, gold is the country's most important mineral export. The mining ministry reported production of 27tn in 2011 from seven mines. Bissa Gold, a subsidiary of Canada's High River Gold Mines, started construction of the eighth in July. In September, IAMGOLD announced the extension of its mine site at Essakane, which will improve production and extend the life of the mine from 10 to 15 years. SEMAFO completed a feasibility study in March and then launched works at the subterranean mine at Mana. It should produce about 10tn per year when it starts production in a few years. The government announced that it would revise the mining code during the first few months of 2012.

Burkinafaso journalist Luc Pagbelguem says prime minister’s bodyguard attacked him

Burkino Faso journalist Luc Pagbelguem told CPJ that he was recently attacked by a member of Prime Minister Albert Ouédraogo's security detail. (Photo: Luc Pagbelguem)

Dakar, June 13, 2022 – Burkina Faso authorities should investigate the recent attack on journalist Luc Pagbelguem and hold that person to account, the Committee to Protect Journalists said Monday.

On May 19, a member of Prime Minister Albert Ouédraogo's security detail grabbed Pagbelguem, a reporter with privately owned TV station BF1, pulled him to the ground, and ejected him from an event he was covering in the capital, Ouagadougou, according to a joint statement by local press associations and the journalist, who spoke to CPJ over the phone.

"Physically I was not injured but internally I am affected," Pagbelguem told CPJ. "Since that day, I have refused to cover the prime minister's activities because I don't know if I'll run into the same security official, if he won't want to finish what he started."

"Burkina Faso authorities must investigate the recent attack on journalist Luc Pagbelguem by one of Prime Minister Albert Ouédraogo's bodyguards, and hold that officer to account," said Angela Quintal, CPJ's Africa program coordinator, in New York. "Journalists must be able to cover events of public interest without fear for their safety."

Pagbelguem said he was covering an event marking the 20th anniversary of the founding of the Center for Economic and Social Policy Analysis government office when the bodyguard, whose name he did not know, ordered him to stop and to leave the podium where he was filming.

When Pagbelguem told the officer that he was recording and asked why he should leave, the bodyguard grabbed the journalist by his pants and pulled him, nearly causing him to fall, he said. He stopped filming and stepped down from the podium, where the officer pulled him to the ground and ordered him to leave the venue without giving a reason, Pagbelguem told CPJ.

The journalist said that Galip Somé, the prime minister's director of communications, called him after the event to apologize. Pagbelguem said he remained confused about why he was singled out while other journalists were permitted to stay at the event.

Reached by messaging app, Somé said CPJ should instead contact the prime minister's office by email for comment. Somé did not answer follow-up questions asking for the contact information for a spokesperson who could speak about the issue.

What was the best dictatorship and the worst democracy in history?

Eliott Leroy

Passionate about history since I was very youngJune 8

This answer naturally engages only my humble opinion. In order to produce a comprehensive and digestible answer, we focus only on what I think is the best dictatorship in history.

If we can consider it as such, the dictatorship of Thomas Sankara in Burkina Faso (1983–1987) is certainly the best in history.

Coming from the lower people of Upper Volta (formerly Burkina Faso), Thomas Sankara will be the strong man of the first Burkinabe revolution that took place in 1983, which sets up the first Burknibé government truly for the people since the independence of Upper Volta in 1960.

Following the latter, he controlled the power of the country from August 4, 1983 to October 15, 1987 (when he was assassinated by his former brother-in-arms Blaise Compaoré). During this period, he led exceptional and unprecedented reforms in Burkina Faso for the emancipation of the Burkinabe people and Africa, anti-imperialist and Marxist ideas.

The regime of Thomas Sankara, revolutionary, cannot be likened to a democracy or a republic and is sometimes considered a dictatorship by some historians and political scientists. Indeed, he was president of the National Revolutionary Council of Burkina Faso.

Thomas Sankara with Jerry Rawlings, President of Ghana, December 1983

In practice, the record of Thomas Sankara's presidency is unprecedented and serves as an example around the world. First of all, it is he who renames Upper Volta in Burkina Faso ("Land of Honest Men") after 1 year of exercise of power. Then, his work is noticed on several points:

- Once in power, Sankara will implement a program that he has long developed because he is indeed interested in politics since a very young age, he had a certain responsibility as the eldest of the family and was very quickly noticed as a good officer during his apprenticeship.
- In addition, he has long thought about his program based mainly on self-sufficiency, Pan-Africanism, anti-colonialism and integrity: "Refuse the state of survival, loosen the pressure, free our countryside from medieval immobility or regression, democratize our society, open minds to a universe of collective responsibility to dare to invent the future. Break and rebuild the administration through another image of the civil servant, plunge our army into the people through productive work and constantly remind them that without patriotic training, a soldier is only a potential criminal. That is our political programme. » speech at the 39th session of the UN General Assembly on 4 October 1984
- It will also abolish corruption within the Burkinabe state and that the privileges enjoyed by senior officials as well as members of the government: why should taxpayers' money be used to pay for the privileges of the state? It replaces the official Mercedes with Renault 5s, lowers the salary of senior civil servants and the president, and finally imposes state trips in 2nd class.
- Thomas Sankara launched as soon as he came to power the construction of social housing throughout the country, and he rehabilitated with the population the slums in which they lived (especially small villages).
- He leads a policy of major works and cares a lot about the environment. He is the first to care in Africa (he plants thousands of trees to stop the advance of the desert). Thanks to him, Burkina Faso is emerging from a very great drought (cf. plan "a village a grove").
- He lodges, feeds and cares for the people. We can note the commando vaccination operation to eradicate polio, measles and meningitis (more than 2.5 million Burkinabé are vaccinated in 1 week). But also the mass sport operation (stadiums and fields made available to do it at least once a week) and the establishment of collective sports sessions with military, civil servants, civilians: "a healthy mind in a healthy body".
- It supports a policy of opening up rural areas that have long been forgotten and left to the Naabas (local tribal leaders). This involves the construction of many roads throughout the country, and the launch of Operation Battle of the Rail, the construction with the entire population of railways between Ouagadougou and the mines of Manganese in the north of the country (100km). As Sankara did not want any support from Western companies, the country had no money: the construction is done with bare hands by the Burkinabés of the line.
- He set up committees for the defense of the Revolutions. They are local committees in which everyone can participate and which ensure the management and proper implementation of measures at the local level. These committees are managed by the NRC. This thus introduces a real intention of participatory democracy and concrete application of ideas (Sankara did in theory and in practice). The RDCs have mainly worked in the restructuring and enhancement of the country (fight against malnutrition, thirst, the spread of diseases, literacy ...).
- He also sent 600 children to Cuba, to the island of youth, for 7 years. The aim of the training was to "train political cadres, ideologically and technically competent". They were chosen from among orphans and the poorest students at the CM2 level throughout the country, in all provinces.
- Let's quickly move on to the imagery of his presidency: military outfits, kepis, proximity to the non-aligned movement and Marxist circles, the USSR bloc...

In short, a busy and very positive balance sheet. It makes Sankara a hero of socialism, Marxism, Pan-Africanism, anti-Westernism and anti-imperialism. Thomas Sankara is today considered the "African Che Guevara", in the same way as Patrice Lumumba (Democratic Republic of Congo).

Thomas Sankara in his office

Similar Links

Have there been enlightened dictators who have really done good for their country?

Who was the greatest and smallest head of state in history?

Who was the most monstrous dictator's wife in history?

What was the oldest democracy in history?

Is there a dictator who has exterminated his own people?

Has there ever been a country that has gone directly from a dictatorship to a democracy?

Who was the most incompetent dictator in the world?

Have there been poor dictators?

Which dictator was the deadliest in history?

Why have there been so few women dictators in history?

Who do you think was the worst African dictator?

Has a dictator ever left a sympathetic mark on history?

What are/have been the worst jobs in history?

Is there anyone who has fooled the government for a very long time?

Who are the most powerful dictators in history?

Burkina Faso journalist Ahmed Newton Barry threatened

Burkina Faso journalist Ahmed Newton Barry was recently named in a threatening voice clip circulating online. (Photo: Ahmed Newton Barry)

Dakar, June 30, 2022 – Authorities in Burkina Faso should investigate and hold accountable those responsible for threats made against journalist Ahmed Newton Barry and ensure his safety, the Committee to Protect Journalists said Thursday.

Barry told CPJ in a phone interview that on June 10 his lawyer sent him an audio clip, then circulating widely in WhatsApp groups, that featured an anonymous voice calling for people to attack Barry's home.

A joint statement by local press associations called on Burkina Faso authorities to immediately investigate the threatening message and hold those responsible to account.

Barry, the former editor-in-chief of the privately owned L'Evènement newspaper who now appears as a current affairs commentator for a variety of Burkina Faso media outlets, told CPJ that the clip did not cite any specific reason for the threats, but added that he had recently voiced skepticism of a deal between the Malian government and a Russian mercenary company, which would have been seen as provocative to "pro-Russian enthusiasts" in the region.

"Burkina Faso authorities should thoroughly investigate the threatening message against Newton Ahmed Barry that recently circulated on social media, and ensure his safety," said Angela Quintal, CPJ's Africa program coordinator in Johannesburg, South Africa. "The security of journalists in Burkina Faso is tenuous enough without their having to worry about a mob being provoked to attack their homes."

In the audio clip, in the local Mooré language which Barry translated for CPJ, the speaker identified Barry by name and then said they would "organize a hundred people and invade his house. We are going to set fire to it and then destroy everything and collect the rubble that is piled up."

Barry said the threat may be related to comments he made during a May 19 broadcast of "Surface de vérité," a prime-time program aired by privately owned TV station BF1, in which he criticized the Malian government's work with the Russian mercenary company.

Barry told CPJ that he had shared a copy of the audio with Harouna Yoda, Burkina Faso's attorney general.

''As soon as we were informed, we contacted the Central Brigade for the fight against cybercrime, which mobilized other subunits to find the person [who made the threats]," Yoda told CPJ in a phone interview, saying that he could not speak further about an ongoing investigation.

BURUNDI

National Flag and Emblem

Locator Map

TEXT HIGHLIGHTS: Diaries updates, key events, brief analysis and relating news articles in timeline

Overview

Burundi existed as an independent Kingdom for several centuries before becoming part of German East Africa in 1899. After WWI it became the Belgian-run territory of 'Ruanda-Urundi', with neighboring Rwanda, under a League of Nations mandate. Following independence in 01 July 1962, Burundi was run by a series of brutal regimes dominated by the minority Tutsi group.

Massacres in 1972 killed an estimated 300,000 of which the majority were Hutu. In 1987 Major Pierre Buyoya, a Tutsi, took control in a bloodless coup and initiated a 5-year transition to democracy. Burundi's first ever election, held in 1993, was won by Melchior Ndadaye of the HUTU dominated FRODEBU party. Elements of the Tutsi-dominated army assassinated the new President a few months later, triggering the start of a long-running conflict between the army and Hutu rebel groups that cost an estimated 500,000 lives. In January 1994 FRODEBU gained an element of control and elected Cyprien Ntayamira as President. The unstable situation deteriorated further when President Ntayamira and Rwandan President Habyarimana were killed in a plane crash in Kigali in April 1994. This marked the beginning of the Rwandan genocide, and an explosion in violence in Burundi. However, the situation continued to deteriorate and in April 1994 President Ntayamira along with Rwandan President Juvenal Habyarimana died in a plane crash. This marked the next steps into the Rwandan Genocide while in Burundi the deaths exasperated the violence and unrest. In 1996 Buyoya instigated a military coup and again took power, but was unable to stop the violence. Under pressure from neighboring countries in , negotiations began in 1998 and in 2000 a peace agreement was concluded in Arusha, Tanzania. It was signed by all parties except 4 hard-line rebel groups (CNDD-FDD, FNL, CNDD-N, FROLINA). Violence between these groups and the army continued, despite the institution of a transitional government in 2002. Separate cease-fire agreements were concluded with three of the groups during the second half of 2003. Shortly afterwards Buyoya was succeeded as President by Domitien Ndayizeye. The UN deployed a peacekeeping force to Burundi (ONUB) in June 2004. Successful elections between June and September 2005 ended the transition and installed former rebel leader Pierre Nkurunziza as President, with his and CNDD-FDD the party in forming power the dominant political force

The Parti pour la Libération du Peuple Hutu au Burundi – Forces Nationals de Libération (Palipehutu-FNL) rebel group finally entered the peace process in September 2006 after the signature of a ceasefire agreement with the government. Implementation of the agreement proved slow and it was not until May 2008, that the Palipehutu-FNL leader, Agathon Rwasa, return to Burundi for peace talks. A cessation of hostilities agreement was signed on 26 May 2008, bringing to an end the conflict between the rebel group and the Government of Burundi. On 21 April 2009, the FNL was formally registered as a political party and agreed to drop its ethnic derivative ‘Palipehutu’ (Burundi's constitution forbids party names with ethnic affiliations). On the same date, the FNL formally disarmed, and 5,000 of its ex-combatants were integrated into the Police and Army. ONUB gradually drew down its peacekeeping troops during 2006, handing over to an integrated United Nations office (BINUB) in February 2007.

BINUB's mandate had four pillars: peace consolidation: Demobilization, Disarmament and Reintegration and Security Sector Reform (DDR/SSR): promotion of human rights: and co-ordination of UN agencies and international donors. The South African Peacekeeping Force left in 2009, with BINUB coming to a close at the end of 2010. From the beginning of 2011, the UN operates a scaled-down presence, known as BNUB.

Origins of name: Derives from 'Kirundi' which is a Burundian language.

Formerly: Urundi Burundi came to be when Ruanda-Urundi was divided in 1962 Prince Mwamy Muambutsa became monarchial head of Burundi In July, 1962

Headship until independence: Monarchial head

Founded in the form of kingdom under the leadership of the Mwamy Muambutsa's eldest son, Prince Rwangasore.

However, as independence neared, hostilities flared up between the two rival ethnic-tribes, the Prince was assassinated with the connivance of the colonial authorities, who feared their interests would be threatened if he came to power.

Burundi is coming out of 12 years of violence attributed to its two main cultural groups – the Hutus and the Tutsis

BRIEF ANALYSIS: Rwanda/Burundi:

Formerly Ruanda-Urundi, once part of the German East Africa, was the centerpiece of the post-World War I movement and the European colonization of Africa. After the Germans lost the great war, they relinquished their land holdings to Belgium in what would be a decades - long occupation. On this day in 1962, the once-joined union gained independence from Belgium to become Rwanda and Burundi.

Germany colonized the region in 1884, with the Hutu, Tutsi, and Twa tribes of what is now Rwanda, the dominate people. The Europeans ruled via the tribal leaders and kings, but sided in policy with the Tutsi overall.

In what is now Burundi, the Hutus were the majority just as in Rwanda. Between 1916 and 1924, the union was held by the Belgian military. When that order fell, the region became a United Nations trust territory between 1945 and 1962. Prior to 1945, the region was under a “Class B Mandate” by the defunct League of Nations.

The Belgians manipulated the tensions between the ruling Tutsi and the Hutu people, which pitted the Africans against each other instead of the colonial government. Belgium promised to advance the needs of people in the region, particularly via education, but that was a falsehood as many natives never made it beyond secondary school.

An independence movement began in the region in the 1950s, starting in the Belgian Congo. But in Ruanda-Urundi, the infighting between the tribes turned deadly when the Hutu slaughtered thousands of Tutsi and eventually came to ruling power in 1960 by way of Belgium-led elections.

Two years later, with many Tutsi fleeing to the area where Burundi would be and onward to Uganda, the revolt in Rwanda and the happenings in Burundi made both segments of the region declare their independence on this day in 1962.

It took more than two years for the government structure to be split between the two nations, and almost immediately, Burundi joined the United Nations.

War time would visit Rwanda again in 1990 in a major civil war led by the Tutsi-dominated Rwandan Patriotic Front. Even today, there exists tension in the region over the past happenings between the Hutu and Tutsi clans. (Text ends)

A Republic in eastern central Africa.

First settled by Twas, at present inhabited mostly by Hutus, Tutsis & the Twas as minorities. The kingdom of Burundi established in the sixteenth century, in the nineteenth century the area came within the German sphere of influence, and made part of German east Africa as the Tutsi kingdom remained in power, following the WW I the Belgians took control of the area, which became a UN trusteeship later on. And made a part of the Belgian territory of Ruanda-Urundi on the basis of trusteeship from 1923 until it became an independent Kingdom. Burundi has had a stormy history of tribal wars and factional struggles b/n ruling families. The colonial period conditions had also intensified first by the Germans later by the Belgians. The Hutu-Tutsi ethnic animosities, and in the 1950s, a nationalist organization based on unity among the tribes was founded in the form of kingdom under the leadership of the Mwamy Muambutsa's eldest son, Prince Rwagasore. However, as independence neared, hostilities flared up, the Prince was assassinated with the connivance of the colonial authorities, who feared their interests would be threatened if he came to power. Despite this set-back, when independence was granted in July, 1962, challenges were raised to the concentration of power in Tutsies hands, the ethnic-minorities, and it appeared that the country would have a majority government, which this had already happened in the neighboring Rwanda, where similar tribal imbalance of power existed. Yet in the 1964 elections, even though the Hutu-candidates attracted a majority of votes, the King Mwamy Muambutsa refused to appoint a Hutu-prime minister. A Hutu frustration boiled over, a year later in an attempted coup staged by the Hutu military officers and political figures. Though the attempt failed, it led to the flight of the king into exile in Switzerland. He was then replaced by a Tutsi military Colonel namely, Mitchel Micombero. And a wholesale purge of Hutus from the Army and the bureaucracy followed, but in 1972 another large-scale revolt resulted, which in more than 1,000 Tutsies were killed. In 1976, Colonel Jean-Baptiste Bagaza came to power in a bloodless coup overthrowing Colonel Mitchel Micombero, and in 1979 he formed the Union Pour le Progres National (UPRONA), ruling with a central committee and a polit-bureau. As part of so called democratization program, elections were made in 1982 saw candidates, mostly Tutsies and all approved by the UPRONA, the ruling-party and voted into the national assembly. During the Bagaza years, there were also some attempts by the government to remove some of the main causes of inter-tribal conflicts, but these were mostly cosmetic. The Army and the bureaucracy remained under Tutsie domination, with the Hutus confined to menial jobs, agriculture and cattle - breeding. The Tutsi-led Burundian government even refused to take international aid when it suspected this might be used to educate or enrich the Hutus, and thus sow seeds of discontent.

Colonel Jean-Baptiste Bagaza, who toppled in September, 1987, in a blood less coup led by his cousin, Majour Pierre Buyoya. He has also attempted to address the causes of inter-tribal tensions yet again by gradually bringing the Hutu representation back into positions of power in the government. However, there was a renewed out-break of inter-tribal violence in the north of the country in August 1988. As in previous clashes of this nature, the violence was unbelievable and can out -break any time once again. In 1992 Majour Pierre Buyoya bowed to international pressure and announced that multi-party elections would be held the following year to resolve the country's political crises. Although peaceful elections were duly held in June 1993, which brought a Hutu-dominated government to power headed by Melchior Ndandaye, also a Hutu, a dissent army faction, led by Colonel Sylvestre Ningaba, staged a bloody-coup in late October of that year, and assassinated the elected president along with several prominent ministers, after only 100 days in office as president. The coup failed when senior army officers disowned the plotters but, in the chaos which followed the assassination, tens of thousands of people were massacred in inter-tribal fighting and an estimated 500, 000 people refugee fled to Rwanda. The surviving members of the government, who had sheltered in the French embassy in Bujumbura, were able to reassert some degree of control several days later with the help of French soldiers and troops stationed there, who remained loyal to the government. Yet it was not until February of the following year that things had cooled sufficiently for Cyprien Ntaryamira, a Hutu, to be sworn in as the new president of Burundi. He was chosen as part of a compromise deal b/n the government and the opposition, part of which was the allocation of 40% of government seats to the opposition, once again the future looked bright, when there was an illusory new-dawn. On the 6th of April, 1994, Cyprien Ntaryamira was killed along with president Juvenal Habyarimana of Rwanda when the plane in which they were travelling together was gunned-down as it was about to land at Rwanda's Kigali airport, while this was the spark that ignited genocide in Rwanda. And Burundi remained relatively calm and Sylvestre Ntibantunganya was immediately appointed as Interim president. Unfortunately, it was just another stand-off, neither Hutu militias nor the Tutsi-dominated army passed-up the opportunity to go on the offensive, no war was actually declared but over 100, 000 people were killed in clashes b/n mid-1994 and mid-1996 most of them in counter-reprisals. The Burundian army has retained nominal control of the capital, Bujumbura and much of the center and south of the country, but quickly lost control of the northern part the Hutu militias.

On the 25th of July, 1996 Majour Pierre Buyoya, the former president, carried out a successful coup once again, and took over power as the country's president with the support of the Burundian Army. Former Tanzanian president Julius Nyerere, then mediator in the Burundian peace-talks, called for an imposition of sanctions against the Buyoya regime, these terms were internationally accepted and included a travel - ban on all international flights as Burundi was more isolated and the civil war dragged on. The sanctions drama essentially froze the peace-talks b/n the Burundian government and the armed Hutu rebels. Sanctions were finally lifted at the start of 1999, but still the civil war drags on throughout Burundi and it's not uncommon to hear gunfire in the hills around Bujumbura at night. However, ex-South African president Nelson Mandela was appointed as mediator in the peace-talks at the end of 1999, following the death of Julius Nyerere, and of course, this has raised hopes in some quarters that he will be able to work hard on a deeply divided society. Burundi has been tied up with ethnic violence as well as internal political crisis since the South African brokered power-sharing deal reached b/n the Tutsi dominated government and the Hutu rebels in 2003, that paved the way for a transitional process led to an integrated defense forces, established a new constitution in 2005. The new government led by president Pierre Nkurunziza, signed a South African brokered cease -fire with the country's last rebel group in September, 2006, which that country still faces many challenges ahead of it. The 28th June, 2010 Burundese national election will be the second major vote since the end of the country's brutal twelve year civil war in which an estimated three hundred thousand people died.

Accession to power of president Pierre Nkurunziza-nominated 30th April, 2003 re-elected on the 26th August, 2005 when the transitional process commenced.

Tentative election calendar - Presidential/Parliamentary, July.

Burundi/Rwanda – Timeline Diaries updates, and related Key notes:

pre-1300s - Hutu people settle in the region.

1400s - Tutsi settlers arrive in the area.

1500s - Distinct Burundian kingdom emerges.

1858 - British explorers Richard Burton and John Speke visit Burundi.

1890 - The kingdoms of Urundi and neighboring Ruanda (later Rwanda) incorporated into German East Africa.

1916 - Belgian army occupies the area.

1923 - Belgium receives League of Nations mandate to administer Ruanda-Urundi.

1959 - Influx of Tutsi refugees from Rwanda following ethnic violence there.

1959-1961 - Independence drive led by cross-communal UPRONA party of Prince Louis Rwagasore, which wins 1961 legislative elections. Prince Louis becomes prime minister but is assassinated shortly afterward.

1962 - Urundi is separated from Ruanda - Urundi becomes independent kingdom of Burundi under King Mwambutsa IV.

1963 - Thousands of Hutus flee to Rwanda following ethnic violence.

1965 - King Mwambutsa IV refuses to appoint a Hutu prime minister after Hutus win a majority in parliamentary elections: attempted coup put down by army chief Colonel Michel Micombero.

1966 July – King Mwambutsa deposed by his son, Ntare V.

1966 November – Army Colonel Michel Micombero ousts king Ntare V, declares himself president.

1972 - About 120,000 Hutus are massacred by government forces and their supporters in the wake of a Hutu-led uprising in the south.

1976 - President Michel Micombero is deposed in a military coup by Colonel Jean-Baptiste Bagaza.
1981 - A new constitution makes Burundi a one-party state under UPRONA.

1987 - President Jean Baptiste Bagaza to be deposed in a coup led by Majour Pierre Buyoya.

1988 - Thousands of Hutus are massacred by Tutsis and thousands more flee to Rwanda.

1992 - New constitution providing for a multiparty system is adopted in a referendum.

June 1993 – Mr. Melchior Ndadaye's FRODEBU wins multi-party polls, ending military rule and leading to the installation of a pro-Hutu government.

October 1993 - Tutsi soldiers assassinated elected President Melchior Ndadaye. In revenge, some FRODEBU members massacre Tutsis and the army begins reprisals. Burundi is plunged into an ethnic conflict which claims some 300,000 lives.

January 1994 - Parliament appoints Cyprien Ntaryamira, a Hutu as president.

April 1994 - Plane carrying Presidents Ciprien Ntaryamira and Juvenal Habyarimana is shot down over the Rwandan capital Kigali, killing both and triggering genocide in Rwanda in which 800,000 are killed.

October 1994 - Parliament speaker Sylvestre Ntibantunganya appointed president.

In 1995 - Massacre of Hutu refugees leads to renewed ethnic violence in the capital, Bujumbura.

In 1996 - Ex-president Majour Pierre Buyoya seizes power once again.

In 1998 – Majour Pierre Buyoya and parliament agree on a transitional constitution under which Pierre Buyoya is formally sworn in as president.

In 2000 - Government and three Tutsi groups sign a ceasefire accord, but two main Hutu groups refuse to join the process.

October 2001 - Talks brokered by South African President Nelson Mandela lead to installation of transitional government, but main Hutu rebel groups refuse to sign and fighting intensifies.

December 25, 2001: Just when it looked like the offensive was winding down, the Burundi government reports major military action in the Tenga forest. After several small-scale FNL counter-attacks, the Burundian Army launched a counter-counter-attack in Tenga, with action continuing December 23 and December 24. Though the exact locations of the camp sites the Burundian Army occupies remain unclear, the fighting seems to be in and around those positions. The army claims 515 FNL guerrillas' dead, with army losses at 28. AFP quoted Burundi Army Major General Samuel Gahiro as saying "Tenga has been definitively liberated." That remains to be seen, but it does appear the offensive has produced several major successes for the government.

January 1, 2002 The US has placed the Army for the Liberation of Rwanda (ALIR) on its list of "other terrorist groups. This group is composed of Hutus from the former Rwandan Army and the Interhamwe militia. -- Stephen V Cole January 2, 2002 Tanzania government sources reported a Burundian aircraft dropped three bombs near the border village of Kilelema. The bombs landed in a farm field and no one was injured. Tanzanias Defense Ministry issued a protest.

January 3, 2002 On January 2, 10 FDD rebels and one Burundian Army troop died in a series of clashes outside of Kirama (Kibira forest area). On January 3, FNL guerrillas killed three civilians and a Burundian Army soldier when they ambushed a two-truck convoy in northwest Burundi.

January 4, 2002 A South African civilian serving with the protection force (peacekeeping force in Burundi) was murdered in Bujumbura. Police reports said the man was strangled to death with a rope.

January 9, 2002 The Burundian Army reported it used Katyusha rockets to attack FNL forces in positions northeast and southeast of Bujumbura. Two Mi-24 helicopters were also employed, with strafing and missile attacks on the rebels.

January 16, 2002 More action in Bujumbura Rural province (the area surrounding Burundis capital). Burundian government officials said 30 more people have died in firefights and ambushes around the capital. The heaviest fighting (according to the Burundian spokesman) occurred around the Ntahangwa Valley. On January 13, the Burundi government reported 12 people died in a series of FNL rebel attacks. The clashes also took place around Bujumbura.

January 19, 2002 In response to the volcano on its border, Rwanda announced that it will open 26 refugee camps for approximately 650,000 people who had fled the eruption of Mount Nyiragongo.

January 23, 2002 FDD guerrillas launched an attack in Bubanza province (northwest Burundi). One civilian, a Hutu serving as a local security official, was killed in the attack.

January 25, 2002 FDD rebels struck Burundian villages near the Tanzanian border (Cankuzo province). Burundian government sources reported nine civilians were slain the attacks. A subsequent report said a large number of FDD guerrillas were in an area near the village of Gisagara (which is near the Tanzanian border). These FDD groups have camps inside Tanzania.

January 27, 2002 Burundi has agreed to pull its troops out of Democratic Congo "soon". In exchange for this commitment, the Democratic Congo has agreed to stop supporting the Burundian rebels operating from the Congo and encourage them to negotiate with the Burundian government.--Stephen V Cole January 28, 2002 Burundi reported that around 20 people died in a series of attacks and firefights around Bujumbura. The attacks included a rebel ambush of a bus in the town of Migera.

February 16, 2002 The Burundian government reports another firefight between rebel groups. This time it’s an internecine FDD struggle in the Kibira forest. 12 rebels died in the firefight that pitted a group favoring peace negotiations with a rejectionist rebel group.

February 17, 2002 One man was killed and four wounded when Hutu FDD rebels attacked a truck on a road in Ruyigi Province. One of the passengers was the local UN administrator for the Office for the Coordination of Humanitarian Affairs (OCHA). Looks like another calculated FDD attack.

February 20, 2002 A South African soldier on peacekeeping duty in Burundi was killed in what may be an attempted fragging incident. Apparently the soldier shot and wounded a South African officer in the South African headquarters in Bujumbura. Another soldier intervened and was also wounded, but the second soldier managed to kill the trooper who had wounded the officer. The latest report says the incident continues to be investigated. South Africa now has around 750 soldiers in Burundi.

March 16, 2002 Burundi reported several attacks throughout the country. On March 6 Hutu rebels ambushed a Burundian Army unit near Kambezi and killed six government troops. FDD guerrillas killed 11 civilians in a series of attacks around Bujumbura. A Burundian army source also said another 200 Hutu rebels had entered Burundi from base camp areas in Tanzania. An army patrol engaged the guerrilla group and two soldiers were killed in the firefight.

March 21, 2002 The Burundi government said that 60 people died in a two-day long firefight between the Burundi Army and FNL guerrillas. The firefight occurred near Bujumbura (Nyabiraba district).

April 5, 2002 On April 2 the Burundi government reported an estimated 24,000 people fled from the Kibuye area to escape a series of firefights between FNL Hutu rebels and the Burundian Army. A temporary refugee camp has been set up near the town of Rushubi. The firefights have occurred over a three-week period. This suggests that the government may have launched another slow offensive in the region, a clearing operation to pinpoint and destroy rebel bases. On April 4 the Burundian Army said that the FNL had abandoned two command posts near Mbare and Gasarara (which are in Bujumbura province). A subsequent report identified these towns as Hutu areas that strongly support the FNL.

April 11, 2002 Clashes between the Rwanda Patriotic Army (RPA) and its former allies, the Banyamulengein, were feared to have claimed 400 civilian lives and eight RPA soldiers on 30-31 March. Rwanda allegedly sent two helicopters to shell Minembwe on Easter Sunday and Banyamulenge soldiers shot down one of them, killing the eight RPA soldiers. There are an estimated 1,000 to 4,000 Rwandan troops backed by helicopters skirmishing in the high plains South Kivu areas of Uvira, Minembwe, Kamombo, Ndondo, Fizzi and Rwerera.

Meanwhile, Nambia had pulled it's troops out of the DRCongo on 3 April because, as President Sam Nujoma told the press, the "time had come for peace to be restored in that country". - Adam Geibel.

April 15, 2002 Western press sources and NGO sources report 42 people were killed in various incidents in Burundi. The most grievous incident occurred April 6, when a Burundian Army unit (according to the NGO source) surrounded a house (possibly a housing complex) "suspected" of harboring rebels, and destroyed it. The incident occurred in the village of Gihanga. 38 people were reportedly killed in the incident (29 civilians, two Burundian Army troops, and seven FNL rebels). A western press source said that the Burundian Army unit received weapons fire from the house.

April 18, 2002 NGO and African news sources reported a possible mass killing in Burundi by FDD rebels in the town of Nyanza-Lac (south of Bujumbura). One report said the FDD rebels attacked from Tanzania and returned to Tanzania by boat (on Lake Tanganyika). Approximately 60 people were killed in the raid, with several dozen wounded.

April 29, 2002 Burundian sources reported that Burundian Army has launched a new offensive in the Kibira forest area (western Burundi). One large firefight took place April 25, where three government soldiers were killed. On April 27 the Burundian Army said its troops attacked an FDD command post and destroyed it.

April 30, 2002 The Burundian government reported an FDD rebel night attack in the town of Rumonge. A government security officer was killed as well as a civilian. The FDD band then looted several houses before withdrawing.

May 1, 2002 The South African government said that it will pursue a new regional peace initiative to try and reach a peace settlement in Burundi.

May 8, 2002 The Burundian government reported a series of attacks around Bujumbura. FNL rebels struck near Nyabiraba and killed ten civilians. An FNL unit ambushed two military vehicles near Kanyosha and killed at least five people

May 13, 2002 Government and press sources reported rumors that the FNL is once again going through a spate of in-fighting. Allegedly, several of FNL leader Agathon Rwasas bodyguards died in a shoot -out in Kibuye. A subsequent report said two bodyguards were killed in an assassination attempt.

May 16, 2002 On May 15 Burundi government sources reported that the Burundian Army had attacked several FNL positions in a new offensive east of Bujumbura. On May 16 western press sources reported that the FNL struck back, hitting five government positions outside of Bujumbura. A government spokesman acknowledged two Burundian Army soldiers died in the fighting. An FNL source later said that the rumors of a mutiny in the FNL were false.

May 17, 2002 The first allegation came from a DRC (Kinshasha) spokesman (always a suspicious source). The DRC spokesman claimed that Rwandan-backed members of the RCD and troops from the Rwandan Patriotic Army (RPA) had arrested and executed 20 members of the RCD in Kisangani. A Rwandan spokesman immediately denied the accusation. The propaganda jousting follows the rebellion of approximately 100 members of the RCD who took over the Kisangani radio station. RCD spokesmen are now saying several mutineers were killed as loyalist RCD troops expelled them from the radio station.

May 24, 2002 The Burundian government reported that the army's most recent offensive had killed 66 FNL Hutu rebels. The Burundian Army has been conducting an operating in western Burundi since early May. Seven Burundian soldiers have died in the offensive.

June 6, 2002 The Burundian Army reported a Katyusha rocket attack by FDD Hutu guerrillas near Lake Tanganyika. At least six civilians were injured by the volley of seven rockets. On June 4 the Burundian Army reported that FNL Hutu rebels launched an attack near Bujumbura (Gasamanzuki). Several houses were destroyed.

June 15, 2002 FDD rebels conducted a series of ambushes in Cibitoke province. Ten civilians and three Burundian Army soldiers died in one of the attacks, when the FDD band ambushed a bus. Another 25 civilians were killed and wounded in other attacks.

June 24, 2002 The Burundian government reported one soldiers and seven civilians died when Hutu rebels (no group identified) ambushed a convoy near the town of Musayni.

June 28, 2002: And what else is new. Rebel and government leaders both report new peace talks are deadlocked in Burundi. New fighting is reported in the Kigura forest area (near Rumonge) and along the Tanzanian border. The Burundian government now estimates the FNL can field 1000 guerrillas. That's down from early 2001, when the FNL had an estimated 3000 rebel fighters.

July 8, 2002: More reports of Hutu rebel movements into Burundi from Tanzania. Burundian government sources report 200 FDD Hutu rebels entered Burundi from Tanzania on July 4. On July 6 and 7, Hutu rebels mortared the villages of Ruyigi and Makamba. There was one person reported wounded in the shelling attack.

July 11, 2002: FDD rebels attacked a village in Kayanza province and killed four civilians and one Burundian Army soldier. The rebels entered the area from bases in the Kibira forest. This indicates that the FDD have re-occupied the forest, following the recent government attacks in the area.

July 12, 2002: An FDD rebel group attacked a coffee processing in the town of Buhoro (central Burundi). Burundian officials described the attack as part of a rebel offensive in Gitega province. News services reported that the Burundian government responded with air attacks on the rebels.

July 13, 2002: The Burundi government accused Tanzania of aiding the FDD Hutu guerrillas. AFP quoted a spokesman as saying that Burundi had witnessed flagrant rebel military organization and interaction with the (Tanzanian) administration." That seems to mean the Tanzanians let the rebels cross the border without interference. In a subsequent report, the Burundi government said that more fighting was occurring in Makamba and Ruyigi provinces.

July 17, 2002: Burundi's Army claimed that 219 Hutu rebels and 12 soldiers had been killed in the east and southeast of the central African country, since insurgents launched an offensive on 7 July. The claim could not be immediately confirmed by independent sources.

An army spokesman said the Forces pour la Defense de la Democratie (FDD) rebels are working in two groups, one of which was in the central Mwaro province and the other in the eastern Ruyigi province, where the army had blocked its advance. The rebels were able to infiltrate via Lake Tanganyika and across the River Maragarazi that borders the two countries (and because of the dry season, was shallow enough to walk across).

July 25, 2002: The Burundian government claimed that Hutu rebels (no organization identified) kill four civilians and wounded at least ten in an ambush in Cibitoke province (northwest Burundi).

July 27, 2002: One 26 July, the Burundian Army raised it's claim of dead Hutu rebels to at least 500 over the last two weeks, while suffering only 15 losses. Colonel Augustin Nzabampema told reporters that the fighting between the army and Forces in Defense of Democracy (FDD) rebels was concentrated in three central provinces west of Bujumbura. Nzabampema denied recent reports that hundreds of rebels had crossed into Burundi from neighboring Tanzania, saying no rebels had entered the country since last month. However, an anonymous Burundian intelligence officer claimed that more than 1,000 rebels had crossed the border and were preparing to launch an offensive. On 21 July, Burundian Defense Minister Cyrille Ndayirukiye called for international observers to be deployed on the Tanzanian border to monitor alleged incursions of Hutu rebels into Burundi. He claimed that the Tanzanian-based rebels had been crossing the border since early July.

Fighting was continuing in parts of the Gitega province, but the situation had become calm in the provinces of Muramvya and Mwaro. The rebels had also recently attempted to attack an army barracks in the village of Kabezi (about 9 miles southwest of Bujumbura) but were repulsed.

Between 100 and 150 rebels had attacked Gitega (the country's second-largest city) on 22 and 23 July, killing two people. The rebels had also burnt five vehicles and a home, then looted 30 shops before army troops arrived and forced them to withdraw. The rebels had been bent on destroying personal and public property, and infrastructure such as health centers and coffee factories. Gitega resident Ernest Bigoro told the local Bonesha radio that "there were at least 200 of them, dressed in military uniforms and well armed". FDD Major "Zenon" said the army claims were "pure fabrication", but refused to elaborate. Burundi's civil war erupted in October 1993 and has claimed more than 200,000 people, mostly civilians. - Adam Geibel

July 28, 2002 FDD rebels in Burundi attacked the town of Ruhororo and killed at least three people. They also attacked a displaced persons camp located in Muhanga. The Burundian Army also told western news agencies that between 1500 and 2000 rebels have participated in the series of attacks that began the first week of July. This new offensive has consisted of attacks on towns and villages in east and southeast Burundi.

August 2, 2002 The Burundian government said that rebel attacks were increasing just as a new round of peace talks is set to begin. The Burundian Army claimed that it had killed 102 Hutu rebels in a series of fights during the last week that are intended (by the rebels) to undermine peace efforts.. The new peace talks start August 6.

August 3, 2002: Update on the peace talks scheduled for August 6: Both the Burundian government and the FDD have confirmed that they will participate in the conference. However, elements of the FDD continue to pursue an offensive in eastern Burundi. The question now: is the FDD at the peace table the same FDD that's on the battlefield? (Austin Bay)

August 6, 2002: The Burundi peace talks didn’t start off on the right foot. Actually, they didn’t start on time, either. A Tanzanian spokesman said that the talks, schedule to begin on August 5 in Dar-Es-Salaam, didn’t begin, though the FDD was now scheduled to participate in the talks. However, fighting continued in Burundi. On August 5, Hutu rebels killed three civilians in an attack inside Bujumbura. One of the dead was identified as a radio reporter. A late report said FNL rebels struck the town of Migera on August 4 and killed three people there.

August 11, 2002: The Burundian government said FNL forces attacked the city of Gitega. Ten civilians were reported killed.

August 15, 2002: The Burundi ceasefire talks finally got off the dime. On August 12 the Burundian government met with Hutu rebels (including the main faction of the FDD, CNDD-FDD) in Tanzania. The talks continued through August 15. Pierre Nkurunziza heads the CNDD-FDD. Regional analysts now estimate the CNDD-FDD has from 10,000 to 12,000 guerrillas.

August 19, 2002: In the shadow of the peace talks, Burundian rebels claimed to have captured 72 government troops during two months of fighting in the center of the country and are being held in the southern rebel stronghold of Makamba, according to a senior FDD rebel official's statement on 13 August.

However, Army spokesman Col. Augustin Nzabampema dismissed this as "a big lie". The army had been fighting about 1,000 rebel troops in eastern Ruyigi province, (170 kilometers east of the capital Bujumbura). The ethnic Hutu rebels had entered the country from Tanzania to launch attacks on 9 August and warned that any civilians who offered them support would be treated the same as the attackers. - Adam Geibel

August 22, 2002: The talks continue, the war continues. The Burundi government reported 23 people were killed in a series of battles and ambushes throughout the country. The biggest firefight occurred August 20 when approximately 20 rebels were killed in an attack on the town of Mubone. FDD forces attacked the town of Muranvya August 21.

August 25, 2002: Rumors of an imminent FNL (National Liberation Forces) rebel attack had been circulating in Burundi for about a week when it became reality at dawn on 25 August, with rebels lobbing mortars and grenades into the capital's northern Gikungu district. Government troops quickly took up positions and began skirmishing inside the city, while others responded with tanks and artillery. The Army claimed to have repulsed the attack and killed 24 rebels, at the cost of three troops and three civilians KIA. Other sources believed at least two soldiers had been killed near a water tower in the northeast of the capital. The attack shattered hopes of ending nine years of civil war on the eve of planned peace talks.

Two South African peacekeepers were also wounded, when a shell landed near the home of a minister they were guarding. One was seriously wounded and would be evacuated to South Africa.

There were plenty of indicators of an upcoming attack. The Army claimed that between 200 and 300 Forces for the Defense of Democracy (FDD) rebels entered Burundi from Tanzania on the night of 20 August and were about 100 miles from Bujumbura by the 22nd. The UN later reported that at least 2,000 civilians fled their homes in Bujumbura's Rural Province on the 20th. - Adam Geibel

August 27, 2002: On August 26 FDD rebels attacked the village of Bugendana (east of Gitgea). On August 27 the FDD attacked the city of Gitega. At least one civilian was killed and several were wounded. A Burundian Army unit counter-attacked and the rebels fled.

August 31, 2002: The peace agreement signed a month ago between Rwanda and the DRC (Democratic Republic of the Congo) has yet to be implemented. But both nations are not concerned, as they expect to take several months to untangle the various rebel groups in DRC.

September 3, 2002: Rwanda is beginning to send ethnic Tutsi refugees from the Congo back to their homes. There are some 31,500 such refugees in Rwanda and 1,300 are going back now.

September 4, 2002: Burundi army troops attacked a FNL rebel camp and killed at least 48 rebels.

September 10, 2002: Hutu rebels in Burundi continue to make small attacks throughout the nation, killing one or two civilians or local officials in most cases. Over the weekend, such clashes left 15 rebels and six civilians dead.

September 13, 2002: Rwanda says it will begin pulling troops out of DRC next week. Meanwhile, the DRC is arresting former senior Hutu Rwandan officials accused of war crimes back in Rwanda, and disarming exiled Rwandan Hutu militias.

September 14, 2002: In the last week, Burundi rebels have killed eight civilians and kidnapped two others. The rebels accused the civilians of collaborating with the army. The rebels try to terrorize the population into not helping the army. Meanwhile, the main Burundi rebel group is continuing to discuss peace with the government.

September 16, 2002: A battalion of some 500 Rwandan troops has left Congo. The government won't say, but it is believed that there are still 20-40,000 Rwandan troops in Congo.

September 19, 2002: The government and FDD are blaming each other for the slaughter of 183 (according to the government) or "over 1000" (according to the FDD rebels) civilians by "men in uniform" on September 9th. Both army troops and rebels wear uniforms. The government says it is investigating.

September 21, 2002: Rwandan troops began withdrawing from the Congo, as per a deal with the Congo government.

September 24, 2002: After years of diplomatic and military pressure from Rwanda, the Congolese government has announced the banning of Rwandan Hutu political groups (led by men responsible for 1994 Rwanda mass murder). The leaders of these groups are also to be expelled from the Congo, although catching all of them will be difficult. But at least they won't be able to operate openly, as they have for the last eight years.

October 1, 2002 The Burundi government admitted that its troops had killed 173 civilians in a battle with rebels. The government has ordered the arrest of the officers in charge.

October 5, 2002: The last of 22,000 Rwandan troops has marched out of the Congo.

October 6, 2002: In Burundi, the rebel Forces for the Defense of Democracy (FDD) is thought to have about 10,000 armed men, with only about 4,000 active in Burundi and the rest in Tanzanian camps. There is a dissident wing of the FDD with 5,000 men operating out of Congo camps. This group has made peace with the government, but this deal has not been completely implemented. The rebel National Liberation Forces (FNL) has about 3,000 armed men operating around the capital. But the FNL is rife with factionalism.

October 10, 2002: Several hundred Congolese refugees fled to Burundi to avoid fighting between rebel factions in Congo.

November 2, 2002: And what else is new? It looks like Congo misled some of its Hutu allies, thereby gaining a negotiation chit or two with Rwanda. Here's the story, or stories, for at least two versions are circulating. Following a mediation effort by South Africa, eight Rwandan Hutu leaders were told by Congo government negotiators they could return to Rwanda. Or maybe they weren't told, for one version says the men thought they were going to South Africa. They were put on a South African chartered aircraft. The plane took the rebels to Kigali, where they were arrested by the Rwandan government. All eight belong to the Rwandan Democratic Liberation Front (FDLR). South Africa and the UN (MONUC) have agreed to help disarm Rwandan Hutu militias as well as arrest Hutus involved in the 1994 genocide. Good luck. (Austin Bay)

November 3, 2002: FDD rebels shelled Gitega with mortars. The bombardment lasted for nearly two hours, However, there were no reported casualties.

November 8, 2002: No surprise here, unfortunately. Ceasefire talks between the Burundian government and the FDD have broken down without an agreement.

November 12, 2002: The Burundian rebel group Conseil national pour la defense de la democratie-Forces pour la defense de la democratie [CNDD-FDD] warned Bujumbura civilians to leave areas near military bases immediately for their own safety. The rebels claim that several Burundian and Rwandan infantry battalions are leading an offensive against the communities of Bukeye, Teza, Muruta and Matongo. They were supported by Burundian military aircraft dropping "unconventional bombs"

The day before, Ugandan President Yoweri Museveni gave both factions in Burundi two weeks to reach a cease-fire or risk the wrath of regional leaders. Museveni threatened to isolate the country, comparing their problem to the Ivory Coast's. South African Deputy President Jacob Zuma, who is chairing the talks, was more optimistic and claimed that "for the first time the two parties have discussed the real issues, made progress and identified issues that needed further discussion".

That same day, FNL rebels opened fire on a Burundian military vehicle transporting troops. Three soldiers and three civilian bystanders were wounded by gunfire. The attack caused at least 5,000 people to flee the area, about 12 miles south of the capital. - Adam Geibel

November 22, 2002: The Burundian government reported another series of FDD mortar attacks north of the capital and more fighting in the Rutegama area (east of the capital). The Burundian Army is apparently responding to some of the mortar attacks with artillery counter-battery fire. That's a tough trick. You need lots of forward observers with radios linked to the artillery fire direction center (assuming there is a fire direction center) and/or counter-battery radar systems. The Burundian Army apparently has none of this. Firing artillery into suspected positions usually shoots up jungle and does little else, However, the area is very close to populated towns and villages, so off rounds aren't going to simply hit jungle. As for Rutegama, ten civilians died in the renewed fighting in that area. There was no information about government and rebel casualties.

The Burundian government claimed that its forces dealt the FDD a heavy blow in a battle near Rutegama. The Burundian press release said the bodies of 33 FDD rebel were found after the Burdundian Army cleared the battlefield. Ten civilians died in the battle, which took place November 21. One part of the broken FDD force fled into the Kibera forest. On November 22, Hutu rebels fired mortars into two Bujumbura suburbs and killed four people. A subsequent report said the Burundian Army had launched a counter-guerrilla sweep to try and flush the mortar unit.

November 29, 2002: The Burundian Army said its troops killed 50 FNL rebels in an offensive outside of Bujumbura (in the Tenga forest area). The offensive began on November 26 and included mortar, rocket launcher, and helicopter gunship support. The report said 10 Burundian Army soldiers had been killed in the fighting.

December 4, 2002 A spokesman for the Forces for the Defense of Democracy (FDD, Burundi's main rebel movement) that the group was ready to sign a deal with the government, as regional leaders met on 1 December to seek an end to the country's devastating civil war. Burundian negotiators had agreed on 22 November to set up a technical working group to discuss security details and a ceasefire implementation. The rebels were demanding the withdrawal of a 700-man South African protection force from Burundi, but the Burundi government insisted they remain. The rebels also called for government forces to be returned to their barracks and disarmed.

Burundi's other main rebel group, the Palipehutu-FNL, has declined to meet the government. Nearly 400,000 people remain displaced by the fighting. Donor countries have pledged $905 million to support Burundi's peace process.

Human Rights Watch warned that recent army massacres of civilians and the FDD bombardment of the capital are raising the risk of further widespread slaughter of civilians. The recent movement of thousands of well-armed FDD fighters into northwestern Burundi have heightened fears of an all-out rebel attack on the capital, Bujumbura. Another, smaller rebel group (the National Liberation Forces) also occupies the hills around Bujumbura. Most of the army's highly placed officers are Tutsi and most of the victims of army atrocities are Hutu. By the same token, the rebel forces are largely Hutu and a large percentage of Bujumbura residents are Tutsi. - Adam Geibel

December 9, 2002: The largest rebel group in Burundi, the Forces for the Defense of Democracy (FDD), agreed to a cease-fire on 3 December, leaving only one real rebel group fighting the government. The ceasefire takes effect on 30 December 2002. The rebels would report to UN-supervised billets the next day, although who actually was going to supervise this exercise and where the billets would be located was undecided. - Adam Geibel December 10, 2002: Burundi FNL rebels continue raid into neighboring Congo, and appear to be out of control.

The FDD rebels accuse the government of firing 140 rounds of artillery at FDD camps outside the capital. The government says this was in response to raids by FDD fighters on villages outside the capital. Some 300 homes were looted of food and other goods.

December 11, 2002: The FDD refuses to attend more peace talks in South Africa, but instead wants to hold the talks, as before, in nearby Tanzania.

December 13, 2002: Despite the ceasefire with the FDD, government troops say it is difficult to tell the difference between fighters from the FDD and the FNL (which has not agreed to a ceasefire.) This has led to some tense moments out in the bush.

December 16, 2002: Fighting around the Burundi capital has left four soldiers, two civilians and 13 rebels dead. One of the clashes involved FDD rebels stealing cattle, the other was an ambush by FNL rebels. The FDD rebels have a ceasefire agreement with the government, and this cattle raid is the first violation of that.

December 24, 2002: Anywhere between 3-5,000 FNL rebels continue to operate outside the capital, refusing to make peace with the government. The FNL is a Hutu organization, and many of its members are turning to banditry. Nine years of civil war have left over 250,000 dead and now only the FNL wants to fight on.

The Interhamwe Hutu militia's fighters in the Congo have generally reverted to banditry, and some have tried to sneak back into Rwanda.

December 27, 2002: Burundi reports continued fighting north of Bujumbura. 5000 civilians have fled a series of firefights between the Burundi army and the FDD that began on December 24. A subsequent report said the Burundi Army was using heavy artillery (a term that seems to mean tube artillery of any kind, instead of mortars) against the FDD units.

January 14, 2003: The Burundian government reports heavy fighting in the Mpanda district (western Burundi). The Burundian Army engaged an FDD Hutu rebel force. The battle caused around 10,000 civilians to flee the area. The FDD accused the army of breaking a ceasefire in the district.

January 19, 2003: Western sources report FDD rebels ambushed a Burundian Army unit and killed at least 10 Burundi soldiers. The ambush took place in Ruyigi Province (eastern Burundi).

February 1, 2003: FNL (National Liberation Forces) Hutu rebels killed seven people in two attacks near Bujumbura. All seven were civilians: one was a local government official. One spokesman said the killings were part of an FNL strategy to undermine new peace talks which are scheduled to begin February 4.

February 16, 2003: The UN reported that on February 11 CNDD-FDD rebels infiltrated from the Kibira Forest and took up positions in the Rutegama, Mbuye and Kiganda communes (all in Muramvya Province). On February 12 the Burundian Army and the CNDD-FDD engaged in several firefights in each of these areas. The government claimed 20 rebels died in the firefights. There were no government casualties reported.

February 21, 2003: FDD rebels pulled out of the latest round of Burundi peace talks. Peace talks? Actually, the government and the rebels are back to ceasefire negotiations. An FDD spokesman accused the government of not sticking to a commitment to reach a permanent ceasefire accord. Sit tight for the next round of talks.

February 24, 2003: The Burundian government reported at least 12 people died in fighting throughout the country. FDD rebels struck in Gitega and Ngozi provinces. The FNL launched an ambush near Bujumbura and killed three Burundian soldiers.

March 5, 2003: UN sources report that a series of attacks by the FNL (carried out March 1-4) has created 20,000 refugees. The FNL attacked the town of Gisovu, near Bujumbura.

March 14, 2003: The Burundian government reported a series of firefights in eastern Burundi. A major clash occurred in Nyabitsinda. In the firefight that occurred on March 14 the Burundian Army reported two of its soldiers died and 13 FDD rebels were killed. On March 13 another battle occurred in the same area. The Burundian Army said three of its troops were killed and seven wounded in that battle. There were no reports on FDD casualties.

March 15, 2003: Rwanda has issued an ultimatum for the Ugandan army to withdraw from Bunia in eastern Democratic Republic of Congo (DRC) immediately or face the Rwanda Patriotic Army (RPA). In a strongly worded statement, Rwanda accused Uganda and the DRC government of deploying their troops, along with FAC, Ex-FAR and Interahamwe militias, into areas in north Kivu that threatening Rwandan positions. The statement continues with the dire threat that "should the international community fail to reverse this development promptly and decisively, Rwanda would be compelled to assume responsibility and take appropriate measures to protect its people."

The Rwanda statement was released as Interahamwe and ex-FAR reoccupied some of the defensive positions previously held by the Rwandan army, bringing these militias closer to Rwanda's borders. Rwanda has apparently mobilized to re-enter the DR Congo and massed a large army in Goma, ready to flush out Mai Mai rebels and ex-FAR from the area. Rwanda alleges that the DRC (with Ugandan help) has deployed about 300 troops and that the Ugandan army had moved tanks, APCs and heavy artillery in the Ituri region.

Ugandan Defense Minister Ruth Nankabirwa told the press that the Ugandan Army was not about to leave Bunia and rejected US ambassador to the DRC's call for the Uganda Army to withdraw. In turn, the Ugandan Army has ordered the Union of Patriotic Congolese (UPC) rebels to withdraw from all airports in Ituri region considered a strategic threat to Uganda. The Ugandan reinforcements sent to Bunia were attacked by Lendu militias marching to the area.

Rwanda has reportedly deployed troops at six locations near the Ugandan border over the last two weeks and some of the units were observed with heavy artillery. Uganda has beefed up its force in Congo to 5,000 men, with three battalions (2,000 men) around Bunia alone. - Adam Geibel

March 27, 2003: Burundi claimed its armed forces killed 66 FDD Hutu rebels in a series of heavy firefights north of Bujumbura. The battles took place near the villages of Kavumu and Musenyi (Kibira forest area) in Muranvya province. The Burundian report said four Burundian soldiers were wounded. A subsequent report said four Burundian Army soldiers were killed in the battles. An FDD spokesman told AFP that the Burundian government claims were exaggerated but the fighting had been heavy.

April 3, 2003: An independent radio station in Burundi reported that around 440 civilians have been killed in fighting in the eastern province of Ruyigi since January. The civil war has displaced an estimated 14 percent of Burundi's 6.8 million people and 350,000 more have fled to Tanzania. - Adam Geibel

April 7, 2003: The former US presidential special representative to the Great Lakes region urged the US Congress to support the African Union (AU) peacekeeping mission. The translation from diplo-speak means "send money", with the US bankrolling some part of the peacekeeping bill while the South African military reaps the operational rewards of US financial support. The South African government is dominated by the unrepentantly-Marxist African National Congress party and over the last two years has criticized the Bush administration at every turn, so they should be expected to try and hijack any credit for stabilizing the situation. Of course, if Burundi goes up in flames, it will somehow be America's fault. - Adam Geibel

April 10, 2003: The AU is providing 3,500 peacekeeping troops from Ethiopia, Mozambique and South Africa under a peace agreement to try to end the civil war which began in 1993. According to Major General Sipho Binda, the South African commander of the African Mission in Burundi (AMIB), the AU peacekeeping force will be deployed in Burundi before May 1 (the day the transitional government is due to take power).

Apparently, the left hand doesn't talk to the right hand. The day before, a South African defense forces spokesman could not say when the Mozambican and Ethiopian troops would join the South Africans. Binda had just arrived in Bujumbura with a 50-strong planning team and would spend a week in the country assessing the situation. - Adam Geibel

April 16, 2003: A South African Foreign Affairs Deputy Director said that some African countries had asked them to intervene in other conflicts on the continent, such as in Sudan and the Ivory Coast. Unfortunately, after years of budget cuts by the Mbeki government, the South African military has neither the muscle nor ability to project themselves into Peacekeeping situations.

They already had problems deploying a 751-man composite battalion to Burundi, as part of a United Nations-endorsed VIP protection operation in support of the transitional government and now there are plans to put 1,200 South Africans into Burundi. These troops would be tasked with enforcing a series of ceasefire agreements and political settlements, at a time where the ceasefire between the government and rebels looks like it will fail. More than 6,000 people have fled their homes in central Burundi since fighting broke out between Hutu rebels and government troops in the second week of April. - Adam Geibel

April 17, 2003: Forces for the Defense of Democracy (FDD) rebels attacked government positions around the capital. The most intense fighting took place in the hills surrounding Bujumbura, although mortar shells were fired in the southern neighborhoods. Fourteen shells landed in that area, with one house set ablaze. The government was responding with it's own artillery and at least one helicopter gunship. - Adam Geibel

April 18, 2003: The Burundian Army claims it troops killed 26 Hutu FDD rebels in a counter-attack outside Bujumbura. The FDD group had been shelling the Bujumbura outskirts with mortar fire. The mortar attacks took place April 16 and 17.

April 20, 2003: Burundi rebels threatened to increase their attacks against the capital Bujumbura, in order to force the government to include them in a transitional government as agreed in a December ceasefire deal. The Burundi army has come under heavy attack from FDD rebels shelling the outskirts of Bujumbura and other cities. - Adam Geibel

April 23, 2003: South African Major General Sipho Binda, commander of the African Union (AU) peacekeeping force for Burundi, and his staff of 20 are heading for Bujumbura. South Africa, Mozambique and Ethiopia are supposed to contribute 1,800, 200 and 1,000 troops, respectively to the peace-keeping force, but uncertainty about funding could delay the troops deployment. Each country is expected to finance its own soldiers for the first two months, but both Mozambique and Ethiopia have shown reluctance to foot this bill. South Africa may end up being the only country to send troops (probably a motorized infantry battalion). This happened about six months ago when four countries were committed to sending forces to Burundi, but only the South African government honored this agreement. - Adam Geibel

April 24, 2003: The FDD, Burundi's main Hutu rebel group, asked the international community to help facilitate real and definitive peace talks in Burundi.

April 27, 2003: The first contingent of African Union (AU) peacekeepers arrived in Bujumbura, Burundi. 100 South African troops, led by General Sipha Bindo, flew into the Burundi capital's airport and then moved to a lager area nearby. The AU plans on deploying a force of around 3,500 troops. The FDD, however, issued a statement that basically said the Hutu rebels believe the AU force amount to a "reinforcement" for the Burundian Army. (Austin Bay)

April 29, 2003: FDD Hutu rebels killed eight civilians in an ambush in the village of Guhyungwe (Bubanza province). The rebels opened fire on two passenger-carrying mini-buses.

May 2, 2003: Burundis new president assumed power April 30. President Domitien Ndayizeye, a Hutu, took over per the August 2000 national accord. "I am wondering what is the reason for war today, Ndayizeye said. Sometimes I think the rebels are crazy. If they like the rebel life, maybe they want to continue it." Those of us who cover Burundi have had that unfortunate impression for some time. On May 2 there were several reports of small-scale attacks outside Bujumbura.

May 9, 2003: There’s still not much peace to keep in Burundi. The Burundian government said that its forces had killed at least 100 FDD rebels in a series of battles in the Kibira forest. Two villages were specifically mentioned, Ndubura and Ruce (both are northeast Bujumbura). There were conflicting accounts of Burundian Army casualties, though a Burundian officer who, asked for anonymity, said 19 Burundian soldiers were killed and 42 were wounded in the actions that took place over a five day period. This looks like another government offensive into the Kirbira forest. On May 7 other government troops fought with FDD rebels in the eastern province of Ruyigi. The government

claimed its troops killed 23 FDD rebels in that battle. The report called the Ruyigi battle a pre-emptive action. This usually means the government got a tip on a rebel movement and tried to set up a blocking position outside a village to prevent a rebel attack.

May 10, 2003: The government is making another attempt to negotiate a deal with the Hutu rebel groups. Factions of the FNL and FDD rebels have agreed to take senior positions in the government and talks are apparently underway with other leaders of FNL and FDD.

May 27, 2003 Reports out of Burundi say that two factions of the rebel FDD have fought a series of sharp battles in the Rukambasi mountains. The area is south of Bujumbura. What kicked off the intra-FDD fighting isn't clear. One of the FDD factions signed a ceasefire agreement with the Burundian government, but hat ceasefire has not held.

June 4, 2003: FNL rebels killed 20 Burundian Army troops who were defending the Mugere dam complex (near Bujumbura). An FNL spokesman claimed a government armored vehicle was destroyed. The most interesting claim was that over 1000 FNL rebels were involved in the attack. That's a large force, but Mugere is a big target (producing around a third of Burundis electricity). The government did confirm that the dam was attacked but disputed the rebels' claims. We could find no reports of electricity disruptions in the capital, though a subsequent wire report said the dams hydroelectric facilities were producing less electric power and that several technicians were missing.

June 13, 2003: Britain has pledged $6.5 million and the United States donated $1 million, to boost the African force monitoring cease -fire in Burundi. The African Union Mission in Burundi (AMIB) force includes troops from South Africa, Ethiopia and Mozambique.

The South Africans currently have 908 soldiers deployed in Burundi, protecting political leaders who had returned from exile to join the interim government of Burundi. That function had previously been carried out by the SA Protection Support Detachment, which has been in Burundi since 2001.

Whether the South African military is up to this level of activity is debatable, since they only spend about 1.6 percent of their gross domestic product on defense. This is far less than in other countries, like Botswana (5.5 percent) or Nigeria (4.5 percent). Coincidentally, Minister Mosiuoa Lekota told the press that very same day that South Africa's continental commitments mean that the South African National Defense Force will need more money. The South Africans are deploying twice as many troops as they anticipated when they set their last budget, but not gotten any more funds to support these moves. Opposition parties in South Africa are warning the government that commitments in other parts of the continent could become "Pretoria's Vietnam". - Adam Geibel

June 15, 2003: The Burundi government claims its troops fought a battle in the Kayanza region (central Burundi). At least 12 FDD Hutu rebels died in the engagement. The battle occurred as FDD representatives were meeting with UN diplomats in Tanzania to discuss furthering the peace process.

June 16, 2003: A third day of fighting scattered thousands of people seeking safety. The government claimed that 12 FDD rebels were killed and four soldiers wounded in the latest round. Most of the chaos has been in Makamba province, 200km southeast of Bujumbura. Government forces fought FDD rebels following a rebel ambush of a bus on the 15th, after which 15 passengers were taken captive. On the night of the 15th, an unidentified group of armed men burst into the bar where political opposition party leader Gerard Buryo was and gunned him down. Between 1993 and 1995, nearly 30 Burundian parliamentarians were killed under questionable circumstances. - Adam Geibel

June 17, 2003: The Burundian defense ministry has admitted that the National Liberation front (FNL) sabotaged the Mugere dam, the largest hydroelectric source in the country. Three of the dam's four turbines were completely destroyed in the 15-hour long attack on Jun 3-4 and the facility can now provide Bujumbura and its suburbs with only two megawatts (instead of eight generally produced before the attack). The rebels had made endless military attacks around Bujumbura during the previous three days and the local radio described the rebel mission at the dam as "massive". - Adam Geibe

June 24, 2003: An unknown number of CNDD-FDD rebels were killed in fighting against government troops in northern Burundi, forcing up to 65,000 civilians to flee their homes. An CNDD-FDD spokesman accused the army of launching preemptive attacks on their positions. - Adam Geibel

June 29, 2003: FDD Hutu guerrillas kidnapped four Hutu members of Burundi's parliament. The four men are in the Front for Democracy in Burundi (FRODEBU). The kidnapping took place in Ruyigi province. A subsequent report said the man driving the PMs' car was also kidnapped. Peace process? The FDD and FNL continue to use terror tactics to intimidate Hutu moderates.

June 30, 2003: Burundian sources reported three FDD rebels were slain by African Union peacekeepers. The peacekeepers came from the South African contingent. The FDD launched a night attack on a demobilization camp near Muyange. The attack continued for three hours. The South African unit reported ten mortar rounds hit the camp. Interestingly enough, the camp houses former FNL fighters.

July 4, 2003: The first group of 150 CNDD-FDD fighters arrived at a cantonment site near the Burundian capital, Bujumbura. They registered by the African Union (AU) troops manning the site and were later disarmed. These 150 joined 58 FNL fighters, who had arrived after June 26 at the Muyange cantonment, 30 km northwest of Bujumbura. African Mission in Burundi (AMIB) sources estimated that 5,300 fighters from the small rebel groups would be cantoned during the first 90-day period before their integration into the country's new security forces. - Adam Geibel

July 7, 2003: At daybreak Hutu FNL rebels fired mortar bombs into Bujumbura, in the fiercest attack on the capital for almost three months. They launched the attack as a warning to the government, after President Ndayizeye threatened to crush their movement. Agathon Rwasa's faction of FNL remains the only group that has not signed a ceasefire agreement with the government.

Government troops claimed to have pushed these rebels out of Bujumbura and that the fighting was confined to the outskirts of the capital, but admitted that the rebels had blocked key roads leading into the capital. The army cleared all of them during the course of the day except for Highway 7 leading to the southeast, finding that one difficult to retake since they feared killing residents taken hostage by the rebels. The rebels are not in uniform and Bujumbura's residents fear that they could be mistaken for combatants during the street battles.

The army's preliminary report saying it had killed seven rebels, but witnesses at the Musaga and Kanyosha suburb (south of the capital, where fighting was heavy) said they had counted 17 to 20 civilian bodies. - Adam Geibel

July 8, 2003: Thousands fled their homes as heavy fighting between Hutu rebels and the army continued for a second day in southern neighborhoods of Bujumbura. Both sides exchanged fire with mortars, rocket-propelled grenades and assault rifles. An unidentified army officer saw more than 50 corpses. The army announced that it had killed 15 rebels and driven the rest out of the city, although the rebels counted only six dead and 17 others injured. The army was reported to still be shelling FNL positions southeast of Bujumbura. - Adam Geibel

July 12, 2003: An update on the big FNL offensive in and around the Burundian capital of Bujumbura: the Burundian Army reported 44 FNL rebels were killed south of Bujumbura. Among the 44 rebels were two senior FNL officers, Colonel Raphael Barankitse and Major Giovanni Kwizera. The 44 were apparently killed in a heavy firefight in the Gikoto area. The FNL offensive began July 7 with a series of attacks south of Bujumbura. The Burundian government reported that, as of July 12, 179 people had been killed in the offensive (20 to 30 were Burundian Army troops.)

July 13, 2003: At 3 AM, Hutu rebels resumed their worst assault on Burundi's capital in 10 years of war "to alert the world" to the conflict. The rebels also launched a 30-minute raid on a navy camp inside a large military base, where they destroyed an armored car with a rocket before being repelled at around 7:00 AM. The clashes died down around 8:30 AM, by which time all rebels had been chased out of two eastern residential districts and a northeastern neighborhood.

The army claimed that rebel child-soldiers were on a suicide mission and that the rebels' presence in some of the southern districts had continued to grow until they numbered 2,000. The army estimated that they had killed 28 rebels during the day.

The aim of the rebellion has been the same for years: to ensure an equal share in army management between the two main ethnic groups in Burundi, the majority Hutus, and the minority Tutsis, who currently have total control of the military. There were unconfirmed rumors suggesting that the FNL had been joined by elements of the Forces for the Defense of Democracy (FDD), which last week officially said that it did not want any part in the fighting.

It was impossible for the press to contact the rebels, and Information Minister Albert Mbonerane said that journalists who published or broadcast interviews with armed or unarmed opposition groups would be detained. The government had imposed a nationwide curfew from 9 PM to 6 AM for an indefinite period, the first time there has been nationwide curfew since 2001.

The 900 South African-led African Union force have done nothing to stem the violence in the capital. Welile Nhlapo, deputy head of the AU mission, told the press that they were not involved in the fighting, it wasn't their responsibility and they would not let the situation slide into chaotic situation that they could not control. Asked what the force would do if the situation worsened, Nhlapo said he could not predict future actions. - Adam Geibel

July 18, 2003: The FNL offensive that began July 7 continued with a variety of attacks around Bujumbura. A report on July 18 said that at least 300 combatants (troops and rebels) had died in the fighting between July 7 and July 17. On July 17 the Burundi government issued a statement that said African Union peacekeepers might need a wider mandate for operations. That could mean the AU forces would get directly involved in field operations against the FNL.

July 19, 2003: As their offensive appeared to subside in Bujumbura's outlying areas, FNL Hutu rebels issued a statement that asked Nelson Mandela to participate in Burundian peace negotiations. This looks like a diplomatic attempt by the FNL to gain as much negotiating leverage as possible from the military offensive -- the old "fire arrows then offer an olive branch" gambit, with the twist of trying to get a globally-recognized figure to acknowledge your side's political heft.. If Mandela accepts the FNL "request," the FNL's negotiating stature immediately improves, i.e., the FNL would claim that it "returned the Nobel Peace Prize winner to the Burundian peace process." Mandela, however, is wise to the strategy. Stay tuned. (Austin Bay)

July 22, 2003: The Burundian government said the FDD killed eight civilians outside the town of Kayanza (north of Bujumbura). The government also said this broke a truce agreement. The government report alleged that in the incident the rebels fired on what was clearly a civilian vehicle. The Burundian government, however, is a questionable source. Reports continue to circulate among human rights groups of the Burundian Army (which is 99.9 percent Tutsi) shooting up Hutu villages and then blaming the FDD and FNL for the action.

July 29, 2003: The FDD issued a statement that said its forces would not quit fighting until the Burundian government reached a comprehensive settlement with the rebels. The FDD contended that there is no peace for AU peacekeepers to keep in Burundi. The FDD said that as long as the government continues to fight the FDD will conduct operations.

July 30, 2003: FNL Hutu rebels issued a statement that contradicted a claim by the Burundian government. The government said on July 29 that it had found a mass grave outside Bujumbura with the bodies of 30 FNL fighters. The FNL said on Wednesday denied that bodies were those of FNL guerrillas. Whose bodies are in the grave? Once again, the rule of thumb in Burundi is that the government claims are highly questionable and so are those of the rebels. It could easily be a grave with 30 civilians killed by government troops or by rebel forces. We could find no independent journalists confirmation of the mass grave discovery.

August 10, 2003: Renewed fighting between FNL (the other rebel group, and not willing to negotiate) and Burundian troops over the August 9-10 weekend forced at least 30,000 people to flee their homes. Rebels from the larger of two FNL factions fired on government troops on patrol in a rebel-held neighborhood and one soldier was reported killed. A rebel spokesman described the government patrol into the rebel -held area as "a provocation." The FNL faction also maintains bases in the string of hills overlooking the city on Lake Tanganyika.

August 13, 2003: It's not a big surprise -- but it is a setback. A meeting between Burundi's president and the head the rebel Hutu FDD was supposed to take place in Pretoria, South Africa. However, the meeting has been "postponed" -- perhaps for only a few days, perhaps for several weeks. The issue they are to discuss is FDD participation in the Burundian government. This would be a major step to ending the civil war. And this is why there is foot dragging in both the government and rebel camps. Many rebels don't trust any agreement with the government that doesn't include significant demobilization of the Tutsi-dominated Burundian Army. The Burundian government doesn't want to do that. Still, a preliminary meeting (which a subsequent report suggested could come off August 15 or 16) would nudge the process in the right direction. Stay tuned.

August 20, 2003: The Burundi government reported approximately 15,000 civilians fled new fighting. The Burundi Army fought FDD guerrillas in several small actions beginning August 17. The major action occurred near the Mpanda commune (western Burundi). The FDD claimed the government launched a series of rocket attacks in the area. The rockets are inaccurate area weapons and using them could be the reason civilians fled the region. On August 20 a major clash took place near the town of Gisenyi.

August 21, 2003: The latest round of Burundi peace talks concluded in South Africa. The ceasefire which does not exist on the ground in Burundi was discussed, but the FDD and Burundi government representatives came up with no new means of implementing it. The FNL is not participating in the talks.

August 25, 2003: Burundi's Front for Democracy in Burundi (FRODEBU), the main Hutu political party, has fired five members. The members were accused of belonging to the FDD and FNL guerrilla organizations. FRODEBU has 87 seats (out of 182) in Burundi's national transition assembly (a government organ that is supposed to evolve into a parliament). FRODEBU is a political success at the moment and doesn't want to give Burundis Tutsi-controlled army a reason to crack down on it. Harboring guerrillas would be the pretext.

August 26, 2003: Rwanda's President Paul Kagame was re-elected president in the first vote held since the 1994 genocide. Kagame took 95 percent of the vote. Kagame is a Tutsi. Opposition leader Faustin Twagiramungu (a Hutu moderate) claimed fraud and said he would contest the election. Interestingly enough, 96 percent of eligible voters voted and that looks like a good figure. Kagame ran on a national unity platform. There were numerous accusation of government intimidation of the opposition.

August 27, 2003: South African troops participating in the African peacekeeping mission will stay in Burundi despite funding shortfalls. Of a 3,099-strong peacekeeping force that was supposed to have been deployed in Burundi since June 2003, only 1,600 South Africans have arrived. Although Mozambique agreed to provide 202 troops and Ethiopia 1,297 troops, their deployment has been delayed due to a lack of money. In April, the European Union promised the cash-strapped African Union $12.96 million for the troops, but so far no money has been delivered.

However, the South African force is worried about the slow pace of the demobilization process. The concerns center on the small number of rebels already in camps: the FDD was supposed to send 3,500 troops but only sent 150 and the FNL, which was supposed to send 1,800, has only sent 22. - Adam Geibel

August 29, 2003: A UNICEF report titled "Mine Victims in Burundi" claims that 230 people suffered from landmine blasts in 2001 and 2002 (44 of whom died: others were crippled). Anti-personnel mines accounted for the greatest number of victims (116 in 2001 and 87 the next year). Government forces have planted mines to protect their positions and sometimes may forget them, while the rebels use them to sabotage the infrastructure. However, an army spokesman denied that the army has been using mines and also claimed that the rebels' use of these devices was limited. He admitted that government forces were regularly injured by grenades left behind by the enemy but characterized landmines as very rare. - Adam Geibel

September 4, 2003: Repeated attacks by armed elements from neighboring Burundi have stopped the returning flow Congolese refugees from Burundi that had been underway. FNL rebels killed at least a dozen people in late August in Rusabagi, 85 km south of Bukavu in the Congo's South Kivu Province. The attackers used crude weapons (including garden hoes, machetes, knives and axes), proving once again that medieval weapons are still lethal in the 21st century. - Adam Geibel

September 6, 2003: Burundi's two main Hutu rebel movements have started fighting each other. Thousands of civilians from Bujumbura Rural Province fled fighting that erupted between FNL and FDD rebels. The two rebel groups are also fighting each other in the northwestern province of Bubanza, a region repeatedly cursed by fighting between the army and rebel groups. The FNL has admitted losing nine fighters and claimed an unknown number of FDD killed. The Tutsi-dominated army has no clue why the two Hutu groups are fighting each other. The FNL claims that the FDD and the army plan to gang up on them. - Adam Geibel

September 9, 2003: Mozambique said it will send 228 soldiers to participate in the African Union peacekeeping force in Burundi.

September 13, 2003: The African Union will call a meeting next week in Tanzania to discuss implementing a peace agreement in Burundi. Meanwhile, the fighting continues. On September 11, at least 17 people died in an ambush northwest of Bujumbura. The Burundian government claimed 14 schoolchildren and one Burundian soldier died in the ambush. The government blamed the FDD. The FDD categorically denied that it was involved in the incident. On September 10, NGO sources said that around 15,000 refugees had fled from fighting in west Burundi. The sources speculated that the refugees were fleeing from the intra-rebel fighting that occurred last week between the FDD and FNL.

September 16, 2003: The highly touted negotiation session organized to end Burundi's civil war collapsed in mutual recriminations. The talks, held in Tanzania, include South Africa's President Thabo Mbeki. Burundi's President Domitien Ndayizeye met with Pierre Nkurunziza, the FDD's current leader, One issue that they completely failed to resolve is how to implement the ceasefire that was signed last December. That ceasefire has never been honored.

September 17, 2003: About 10,000 civilians fled their homes following renewed fighting between two rebels groups in Burundi's Bujumbura Rural Province. The fighting took place in the Bugarama valley in Mubimbi, 25 km from the capital, Bujumbura.

The Burundian government promptly imposed a curfew on five zones on the outskirts of Bujumbura, as a security measure for better control of people's movements in the suburbs. Rebels in civilian clothes have infiltrated into the capital during previous offensives.

On 16 September 2003, Radio Publique Africaine (RPA), a privately-owned radio station, was suspended indefinitely. The authorities have accused the station of broadcasting "enemy propaganda" by interviewing an FLN spokesperson. On September 13, Isanganiro radio was also suspended for one week for giving air time to rebels. The next day, the other privately-owned stations in Burundi decided to cease coverage of the government's activities until Isanganiro was allowed back on the air. - Adam Geibel

September 18, 2003: President Domitien Ndayizeye blamed the collapse of peace talks on a power-sharing deal proposed by regional mediators, claiming that it was too favorable to the main Hutu rebel group. Under the deal, the FDD (the biggest Hutu rebel group) would fill 40 percent of posts in the army, police and intelligence services, while the remaining 60 percent would be held by the Tutsi-oriented government and other groups.

Large numbers of Gendarmerie were deployed in the morning around strategic places across the capital to prevent the Uprona (the pro-Tutsi Union for National Progress) party from assembling and creating chaos. - Adam Geibel

September 19, 2003: The African Union (AU) reiterated its concern over the failure to deploy an "effective functioning" African Mission in Burundi (AMIB), then made fresh appeals for a peacekeeping force there. South Africa, Ethiopia and Mozambique had agreed to contribute troops, but only

South Africa had so far sent combat troops (Ethiopia had sent an advance party of officers). Lack of sufficient finances and logistical problems were cited.

Burundi's government is lifting its ban on two independent radio stations pulled off the air for violating a law against airing the comments of rebel officials. The government had accused both of inciting ethnic divisions. - Adam Geibel

September 21, 2003: FNL rebels killed nine people in the village of Bangateri (east of Bujumbura). The shootout began when an FNL team walked into a bar in the town and killed two Burundian Army soldiers. A firefight then erupted throughout the entire village.

September 25, 2003: Ethiopia reported that it will send a thousand soldiers to Burundi to participate in the African Union peacekeeping operation. Initial contingents will arrive around October 1. The Ethiopians should be one of the more reliable forces in Burundi. It will depend, of course, on leadership and the Rules of Engagement (ROE) under which the reinforced battalion operates.

September 26, 2003: The United Nations World Food Program (WFP) said that the deteriorating security situation in Burundi is hampering efforts to reach tens of thousands in dire need of food assistance, after they fled their homes in the face of renewed fighting, arson and looting. Over the past three weeks, over 53,000 have fled their homes surrounding the capital as well as in provinces to the north and east. - Adam Geibel

September 27, 2003: The first group of Ethiopians, 226 troops, arrived at Bujumbura's international airport. The 1,000-strong Ethiopian peacekeeping battalion would arrive in Bujumbura in four successive groups. The second group is expected to leave Addis Ababa Bole International Airport on September 29 and arrive on the 30th. The next group would arrive on October 5. - Adam Geibel

October 12, 2003: On October 8, the FDD and the Burundi government signed a peace agreement aimed at ending the civil war. The agreement attempts to implement the ceasefire deal reached in December 2002. However, on October 9, the Burundian government accused the FDD of killing four civilians and four Burundian Army soldiers in a cattle raid and ambush operation in Mbuye (northeast of the capital). The FDD denied the accusation, but in a press release said that the FNL (National Liberation Forces), the other major Hutu rebel group, might have been responsible. The FNL did not sign the new peace agreement.

October 14, 2003: The Burundian government and various western sources reported an FDD group attacked a village in the Bukorokoro Hill area (north of Bujumbura). One report claimed the FDD group cut off the head of the village head man. A late report claimed that another FDD rebel unit struck another village outside Bujumbura. The claim was uncorroborated. A Burundian government spokesman told western journalists that it did appear since the ceasefire agreement (October 9) the FDD had quit attacking military targets. However, there were still raids against civilians. Despite the new ceasefire agreement, it appears fighting continues. The FDD leadership probably exerts limited control over many rebel bands. To pin it all on the FDD would be a mistake. The Burundian Army ahs a miserable track record for controlling its forces as well .

October 15, 2003: Mozambique troops arrived in Burundi to beef up the African Union peacekeeping contingent. Mozambique described the deployment as a "first contingent" consisting of 20 troops. Another 200 will be sent and probably deploy within the next month. The Ethiopian contingent is said to now be up to 840 soldiers. That figure could increase. South Africa has 1600 troops committed to the AU peacekeeping force and is effectively serving as the "lead nation" in the operation . One of the goals of the peacekeeping force is to provide security for humanitarian aid. One report said the some of the peacekeepers are in fact delivering aid themselves.

October 18, 2003: New --and confirmed-- fighting has occurred between the Burundian government and the FDD. This is a breakdown in the ceasefire signed earlier this month. A Burundian government spokesman said four FDD fighters died in a firefight October 17. The clash occurred in the Mwungwa area (east of Bujumbura).

October 19, 2003: Mozambique sent another 91 troops to Bujumbura, bringing the African peacekeeping mission in Burundi to full strength. Joining 139 of their countrymen, along with Ethiopians and South Africans already in Burundi, the African Mission in Burundi (AMIB) now musters 3,128 peacekeepers.

The AMIB's mission is to help disarm, demobilize and reintegrate into society all of the rebel troops, as well as monitor the country's transition to democracy. However, little progress has been made. So far, only one demobilization center has been set up at Muyange (30 km northwest of Bujumbura). Designed to hold up to 3,000 combatants, it now houses only 191 former CNDD-FDD and FNL fighters.

Their deployment has had a string of financial and logistical problems. The United States wound up financing the Ethiopian contingent's deployment. Britain, France and the United States paid for the deployment of the Mozambicans. The Mozambican Ministry of Defense announced on 15 October that it would spend at least US $14 million to support their contingent over the next 12 months.

Life for the South African troops hasn't been pleasant. One young corporal stationed at Bujumbura committed suicide on September 30, unable to cope with the scandal of being charged with misconduct and a lack of discipline. Seven other South Africans have died in Burundi under strange circumstances: four soldiers drowned after being lowered into a river by helicopter, a senior officer shot another dead, another drowned after falling into a swimming pool at the base and the first (in 2002) was found bound and hanging in a house. - Adam Geibel

October 21, 2003: Burundi marked its 10th anniversary of the outbreak of civil war. Since 1993, over 300,000 people (mostly civilians) have died, more than half a million Burundians have been internally displaced while another 500,000 had to flee to neighboring countries. A succession of ceasefire pacts and a power-sharing government have failed to completely solve the problems and stop the fighting. - Adam Geibel

October 28, 2003: The carnage continues. Western sources reported that three FNL "sympathizers" were shot and killed. The reports said the FNL supporters may have been killed by FDD supporters. A further story said two of the murdered men were shot in their beds and then set on fire. The murders occurred after a Burundian government official reported that FNL supporters killed three FDD members on October 26.

October 31, 2003: There were clashes in two areas near Bujumbura, during which FNL rebels battled government troops. There were no casualty figures, but around 2,000 locals fled the scene of the fighting. - Adam Geibel

November 1, 2003: Two soldiers and four rebels were killed near the capital Bujumbura, in an attack blamed on the National Liberation Forces (FNL). The deaths came as Burundi's government and FDD rebels were meeting in South Africa to put the finishing touches to a deal aimed at bringing an end to the country's civil war. According to officials in Rutunga (30 km south of the capital), the six were killed when rebels attacked an army position. - Adam Geibel

November 2, 2003: The rebels attacked a military installation in the afternoon at Kanyosha, a semi-rural area south of the capital and killed three soldiers. Earlier in the day, three FNL rebels were killed in a confrontation with a group of soldiers in Kabezi (15 kilometers south of the capital).

South Africa's minority Democratic Alliance defense spokesman pointed out that no financial support from the UN or other donors has been received for the SANDF troop deployments in Burundi. They claim that South Africa has become involved in an open-ended process that will cost taxpayers a great deal of money. The deployment in Burundi was expected to cost about $98.6 million in 2003, a further $81.9 million in 2004, $111.9 million in 2005 and about $87.1 million in 2006.

While the World Bank and other donors had pledged $90 million to Burundi for the demobilization, disarmament, and reintegration process, it was dependent on a political agreement between all of the groups.

The peace agreement is signed, allowing the FDD rebels to be included in the military and form a political party. Both government and rebel fighters will be granted temporary immunity from prosecution. - Adam Geibel

November 4, 2003: The FNL denounced a deal aimed at ending the country's civil war and said fresh fighting could erupt near the capital at any moment. An FNL spokesman also said that government and FDD troops had deployed into FNL strongholds surrounding Bujumbura. - Adam Geibel

November 7, 2003: Burundi's president promised the former FDD rebels top government and army posts within the next three weeks, under a peace deal signed earlier this month. The army will stand a better chance of defeating the FNL, the second biggest rebel group, once it has joined forces with the FDD. - Adam Geibel

November 10, 2003: Five people (including a soldier on duty at the presidential palace) were killed when the Hutu FNL rebel group fired off ten mortar shells (with three hitting the president's residence) and mounted a ground attack as a show of force in Burundi's capital. The bombardment that also wounded two men guarding the US military attaché’s house and destroyed his automobile, when a mortar bomb hit his home. In the spirit of equality, the home of a Chinese diplomat living inside that country's embassy compound was also destroyed by a rocket. Another blast also left a three foot wide hole in the embassy's ceiling. Obviously, FNL skills leave a lot to be desired. The attack took place two weeks before the larger FDD rebel group was due to join the ranks of an enlarged administration. Meanwhile, the army used mortars and rocket launchers to open up a major offensive to flush FLN fighters out of the hills which surround Bujumbura. - Adam Geibel

November 12, 2003: Around 12,000 civilians have fled their homes in Burundi's western province, following the latest fighting between the army and FNL fighters. Meanwhile, bicycle taxis have been banned in the capital. The mayor feared that the popular mode of transportation used by many poor people in Burundi could also be used by rebels to infiltrate his city. - Adam Geibel

November 14, 2003: New fighting broke out in Burundi November 12 when FNL rebels clashed with the Burundian army. Twelve died in the clash. There was no breakdown on government and FNL casualties. On November 14 another firefight broke out. Three Burundian troops died in an ambush along National Highway 7, southeast of Bujumbura

November 15, 2003: The leader of the Democratic Liberation Forces of Rwanda (FDLR a Hutu militia organization) surrendered to Rwandan army troops. The leader was identified as Paul Rwarakabi. He was originally in the Hutu Interahamwe militia. The FDLR is based in the DRC. Several of its leaders are accused of participating in the 1994 genocide that killed 800,000 Tutsis. The surrender of Rwarakabi may have been encouraged by the DRC government. The DRCs support for Rwandan rebels has diminished since mid-2003, and the signing of the comprehensive Congo peace plan.

November 16, 2003: The Tutsi-dominated Burundian government and the FDD (Forces for Defense of Democracy, the largest Hutu resistance organization) signed a new ceasefire and power sharing agreement. The government and the FDD then gave the FNL (National Liberation Forces) three months to join the peace accord. Four African presidents attended the signing ceremony (Uganda, South Africa, Mozambique, and the DRC).

November 20, 2003: The Burundian government claimed FNL rebels killed 11 people in two attacks near Bujumbura. The FNL did not agree to the new ceasefire agreement and political power sharing deal signed November 16.

December 2, 2003: FNL Hutu rebel leaders walked out of the new Burundi peace talks. The peace conference in Nairobi, promoted by several African governments, was an attempt to bring the FNL into the transition government with the Burundian Tutsis and the FDD. The US and UN are also involved. A subsequent report, based on interviews with FNL leaders, reiterated FNL charges that the negotiations with the Burundian government will be fruitless as long as the Tutsis continue to control the Burundian Army. The FNL claims to have thousands of fighters in the field. Military analysts familiar with the Hutu resistance in Burundi put the figure at 1500 to 3000 fighters, with the lower figure more likely.

December 12, 2003: Several sources reported UN observers in the DRC said Hurundi Hutu rebels based in the DRC were accepting the peace agreement reached between the Tutsi-dominated Burundi government and the Hutu FDD. One report said, attributed to a DRC military officer, said that Burundi Hutu fighters he had met were coming in because they want to go home. The rebels said they would turn in their weapons.

December 24, 2003: The United Nations Security Council has decided to officially support peacekeeping troops in Burundi. This may be something of a formality since over 2,500 African troops are already serving in Burundi as peacekeepers. The peacekeeping force will be both an African Union and UN operation.

December 28, 2003: After ten years of civil war between Hutu and Tutsi, and over 200,000 killed, the rebels are ready to make peace. But many of the rebel fighters have become marauders who have learned to live off plunder. The young ones know no other life and and will be difficult to demobilize. Many countries are reluctant to provide troops for African peacekeeping because of the chaos and savagery of the rebels encountered and the ineptness and corruption often found among UN officials.

January 10, 2004: Burundi has begun integrating FDD rebels into the Army. The first FDD troops and officers joined on January 7. Initial reports are the integration went smoothly. The rebels are also joining the ranks of senior officers. The Burundian Joint Military High Command now includes 20 officers from the Burundian Army and 13 from the FDD. This meets the requirements of the Technical Forces Agreement signed on November 2, 2003 as part of the overall peace deal. This is going to be a real test of the peace agreement. A number of the FDD rebels were fighting the Burundian Army as late as

September 2003. Integrating new troops into a military is a tough task to begin with, even for modern armies. Putting former enemies into the same army in the middle of a peace process makes for an even riskier dynamic. However, this may be precisely what the situation in Burundi requires. The Burundian Army has been the source of much suffering among Burundian Hutus. Integrating the Army will inspire political confidence. The presence of former Hutu fighters and Hutu leaders will also allow for some degree of internal policing. The integration may have already had positive political effects. Two days before the formal integration, the FNL rebel faction announced that it is interested in discussing a peace agreement with the new transitional government. It is no coincidence that this offer comes as the military integration is occurring. (Austin Bay)

February 10, 2004: A total of 90 former CNDD-FDD rebels were flown back to Burundi from the Congo by MONUC, to be reintegrated into society. There are no more combatants in the Congo's Katanga region and only 50 at Uvira, with 100 in south Uvira.

South Africa said that it would keep its peacekeeping forces in Burundi for as long as they were needed. South Africa's Foreign Affairs Minister hoped the United Nations would ultimately take over the mission, but the UN has been reluctant to risk sending international peacekeepers to the region before there was "total peace" in the country.

FNL rebels fired mortars at Bujumbura's suburbs on the 6th, killing one person and sending dozens of others fleeing in panic. Talks between the president and the FNL ended in January without a breakthrough. About 300,000 have died in fighting between Hutu majority rebels and the Tutsi minority-dominated army over the past decade. - Adam Geibel

February 17, 2004: The FNL (the only rebel group still fighting the Burundian government) dismissed as meaningless a threat by regional leaders to impose sanctions against them, since the FNL is fighting inside Burundi, and has no support from any regional country and no bank accounts in Africa or in European countries.

The FNL had accused the president of breaking a promise to end hostilities on the 13th and threatened to unilaterally suspend their participation in peace talks.

Burundi demobilized 29 child soldiers, who had served as porters in the regular army. They also had the task of observing enemy movements, for which they earned the nickname "Doriya" (loosely, 'spy' or 'sentry'). - Adam Geibel

February 19, 2004: South Africa's Minister of Finance allocated around $165 million for the country's peacekeeping missions on the African continent over the next three years. Almost the entire amount would go towards South Africa's deployment in Burundi, which had yet to find foreign donors.

The South African Defense Force (SANDF) has more than 2,000 troops deployed in peacekeeping missions in the Congo and Burundi. The entire allocation would be spent on maintaining the troops in these countries over the next three years. South Africa was reimbursed for the cost of troop deployment in the Congo by the UN, but had been shouldering the $121 million-per-year expense of the Burundi mission since 2001.

The South African peacekeeping effort in Burundi became an African Union (AU) mission only at the end of 2002, but the AU does not have the financial resources to maintain the mission. At the end of 2003, the United Kingdom and the United States agreed to fund the deployment of Mozambican and Ethiopian troops to Burundi for a period of 60 days (that period is now over).

South Africa's Deputy President had appealed to the UN to take over the AU mission last year, but remained un-optimistic because the UN was also considering the deployment of peacekeepers to the Ivory Coast, Sudan and Somalia. - Adam Geibel

February 26, 2004: Systematic rape by soldiers and criminals has become all too common in Burundian life and became even more widespread in 2003. The eastern Ruyigi province was one of the worst affected, with scores of rapes committed by government forces and the Forces for the Defense of Democracy (FDD, the main Hutu rebel group) in a cycle of reprisal attacks.

Meanwhile, minority party politicians in South Africa have called the government to task for "dubious" air charter contracts. Volga Atlantic Airlines (named as a subcontractor for notorious international arms trader Victor Bout), as well as Marvotech (allegedly subcontracted by Volga Atlantic) and Norse Air Charters had received substantial payments for charter services to Burundi on behalf of the SANDF. - Adam Geibel

February 27, 2004 The situation in Burundi continues to be a case of "two steps forward, one step back". The chairman of the Party for the Liberation of the Hutu People (Palipehutu), Etienne Karatasi, returned to Burundi after 39 years of exile in Denmark. A list of over 2,000 of his rebels had been submitted to the ceasefire commission. About 150 had already assembled in the northwestern province of Cibitoke and that others were due to join them shortly. Karatasi is the legal agent for the FNL party.

Meanwhile, fresh fighting between splinter groups the FNL rebel movement and the regular army has displaced thousands of people in Bujumbura Rural Province, outside of the capital. Up to 20,000 people could be effected, although there is no way to determine the exact number that are on the road.

The day before, a UN evaluation team said that it favored converting AMIB into a UN operation. The team was invited by the government and South African Deputy President Jacob Zuma (the Burundi peace process facilitator). If the UN Security Council gave the go-ahead, there would "simply be the change of helmets" for the 2,870 AMIB troops from Ethiopia, Mozambique and South Africa.

South Africa had been footing most of the AMIB bill and was screaming under the financial strain. At the end of January, Ireland contributed over $500,000 to AMIB. - Adam Geibel

March 2, 2004: Burundi's President threw a wet blanket over hopes that elections could be held this year when he stated that thousands of combatants would first have to demobilized. No one knows exactly how many armed men are in Burundi, but the current estimate of all rebel groups is about 40,000, while the army has between 25,000 and 30,000 soldiers. It was not clear how many army soldiers the government plans to demobilize and only the Forces for the Defense of Democracy (FDD) have begun demobilizing, sending 12,000 of its 30,000 men to cantonment camps. Splinter groups of the FNL are still fighting. - Adam Geibel

March 6, 2004: The increase in rebel violence over the last few weeks has caused aid groups to cut back on aid deliveries. Drivers and aid workers are being threatened and shot at by the newly restive rebels. The threatened delay in food air deliveries has an impact on the rebels, as they often subsist on the food aid as well, taking a portion of donated food that passes through territory they control. If the rebels take too much (the excess is sold in the markets for money to buy other things), the aid groups halt the shipments. There is a constant state of negotiation between the rebels’ bands and the aid groups over how much food can be stolen while on its way to starving refugees.

March 16, 2004: Rwandan President Kagame accused France of direct responsibility for the 1994 genocide of at least 800,000 ethnic Tutsis and moderate Hutus by supplying weapons, logistical support and even senior military planners to the ethnic Hutu regime. Diplomats and witnesses have often accused France of tacit involvement, but Kagame's comments are the most explicit to date.

Last week, the government denounced a French police report accusing Kagame of launching the April 1994 rocket attack that downed the plane carrying then president, Juvenal Habyarimana. The police report was compiled by a French judge on behalf of the French aircrew who died in the plane. All of the work was done in France, with no interviews taken in Rwanda. Kagame claims the police report was a politically motivated attempt to deflect blame from France.

The Rwandans are about to commemorate the 10th anniversary of the genocide. President Habyarimana's death sparked 100 days of genocide and the prevailing educated theory has been that militant Hutus shot down the plane, as a deliberate pretext for wholesale slaughter.

In the early 1990s, there were reports that French peacekeepers appeared to side with the Hutu government against the Tutsi-based Rwandan Patriotic Front (then led by Kagame). French troops moved United Nations peacekeepers away from a college where they were protecting 2,000 Tutsis and Hutus subsequently moved in to slaughter these Tutsis. In 1990, the RPF had been responsible for an armed incursion into Rwanda from exile. - Adam Geibel

March 17, 2004: Rwanda opened a diplomatic mission in neighboring Congo, after years of tension and proxy fighting between the two countries. Rwanda had backed rebels fighting the Congolese government of President Joseph Kabila during that country's civil war. - Adam Geibel

March 18, 2004: The United Nations is investigating how it came into possession of a flight recorder alleged in a press report to have been from the aircraft carrying the Presidents of Rwanda and Burundi that was shot down in 1994. Arrangements were being made to transport a "black box" which originated in Rwanda to the United States National Transportation Safety Board for analysis in the presence of an official from the United Nations civil aviation agency. Ten years after he was killed, the crash and their deaths remains a mystery - more so because the plane was brought down in an area controlled by government and Belgium troops. But a week after being found, the flight recorder was examined by experts and it appears that the flight recorder was not from the 1994 Rwanda aircraft.-Adam Geibel

March 23, 2004: The UN Security Council is discussing Secretary-General Kofi Annan's suggestion that 5,650 UN peacekeepers should be deployed in Burundi, to take over for 2,523 African Union peacekeepers and 43 military observers, whose mission there ends in April. Meanwhile, the World Bank has approved a $84.17-million credit to help the transitional government return former combatants to civilian life and rebuild the country's road infrastructure battered by ten years of civil war.

The biggest problem remains the FNL rebel movement, which refuses to come to an agreement with the new coalition government. At least 10 rebels and three civilians were killed in skirmishing between the FNL and government units on the 17th, at a refugee camp west of the capital. Thousands of civilians panicked and took to the roads.

Other rebel groups have found room for compromise. Around 200 former CNDD-FDD rebels arrived in a training camp in the southwestern province of Bururi on the 16th, where they are due to undergo training as a unit of the new National Defense Forces of Burundi. A total of 800 government and 400 CNDD-FDD would begin six months of training to form the Special Unit for the Protection of Institutions (which would replace the Unit for the Security of Institutions, as the integrated national army takes shape). South African troops are due to take part in the training of the new unit in Bururi.

The CNDD-FDD signed a power-sharing agreement with the transitional government of Burundi on 16 November 2003 and 40 percent of the new army's general staff are former CNDD-FDD officers. - Adam Geibel

March 30, 2004: Burundi, aiming to reduce as much as possible tribal political infighting in general elections planned for later this year, agreed to a plan that would alternate presidential power between Hutus and Tutsis. The new Burundi Senate would be ethnically balanced. The problem in Burundi, of course, is that political infighting runs the immediate risk of escalating to another round of open warfare. Burundi also plans to eliminate tribally-based political parties. That will be tough. However, the Burundian government is at least admitting that in too many cases in Africa, a political party is really a tribal front organization. (Austin Bay)

April 3, 2004: It’s a bitter tenth anniversary a decade since the Rwandan genocide. President Paul Kagames government has pursued a policy of mass reconciliation. Critics charge the Rwandan governments program is mass re-education, with Tutsi and Hutu history spun to gloss over differences. Kagame, whose forces stopped the genocide when they took power in Rwanda after invading from Uganda, points to the relative peace that now exists in the country. Few people, however, want to debate the extent of the murders anymore, or the fact that Hutu extremists planned the genocide in advance. Rwanda's Ministry of Youth, Culture and Sports conducted an extensive census and study and released the results April 1. The study reported that from April to June 1994 937,000 Tutsi and moderate Hutus (that’s the term used for Hutus who refused to participate in the killings) were either murdered or died as a direct result of the violence. The Rwandan government report tried to identify the names, age, and place of birth of all victims. While this figure is on the high end of estimates (usually given as 500,000 to 800,000 dead) it does have documentation to support it. The Rwandan government asserted that the figure could still rise as local Gacaca courts (grass courts held in the middle of the village) continue throughout the country. Gacaca justice draws on traditional tribal legal rules. The Rwandan government is using them as a form of truth and reconciliation commission. (Austin Bay)

April 11, 2004: The charter for current African Union (AU) sponsored peacekeeping operation in Burundi (the African Mission in Burundi, AMIB) expired April 2nd. The "charter" was, after some negotiation, officially extended to May 2nd. The AU forces in the AMID (from South Africa, Ethiopia and Mozambique) currently contains 2,523 peacekeepers.. However, the AU acknowledges that the effort is expensive and funds are short. The UN has agreed to beef up the peacekeeping contingent to around 5,600 troops (plus about a thousand civilians). The UN would assume much of the financial burden of the operation. The cost for the first year would be $418 million ($269 million for troop pay and maintenance, and $149 million to buy equipment and pay for transporting the troops to Burundi.) After national elections on October 31, the militias will be disarmed. Or that's the plan.

April 22, 2004: Congolese troops and UN peacekeepers began moving against Hutu rebel camps on the Rwandan border. Diehard Hutu Rwandan rebels have refused to move back to Rwanda and accept amnesty, and the risk of being arrested for leading the 1994 genocidal killings in Rwanda.

April 30, 2004: UN peacekeepers in Congo thought they had a confrontation with Rwandan troops (who were looking for Hutu rebels.) But what they apparently ran into were Congolese Tutsi rebels (backed by Tutsi dominated Rwanda). The Tutsi tribes in Congo are still supported by Rwanda, as a force that can fight the Hutu rebels in Congo. The UN estimates that there are still some 8,000 Hutu rebels in Congo, and since 2002 some 11,000 have been sent back to Rwanda.

May 4, 2004: In Burundi, the FDD Hutu rebel organization have accused the Tutsi dominated government of not giving the FDD the third of government jobs they were promised by the peace deal. FDD has not threatened to restart the fighting, but this may delay the November elections. The peace deal signed in November, 2003, provided for disarming the 20,000 FDD gunmen, and rewarding them with government jobs, goods or cash. The government and the rebels eventually came to a disagreement over who shall get exactly what.

May 5, 2004: Rwanda continues to battle Hutu rebels along the border with Congo. The Hutus continue to raid into Rwanda from bases in Congo. In 2002, Rwanda agreed to get its troops out of Congo in return for Congolese troops shutting down Hutu rebel camps in Congo. But continued disorder in Congo has prevented Congo from getting much of an armed force to the Rwanda border area until recently. The Hutu rebels are not doing so well either, as most of the fighters are tired after ten years of fighting and living in the bush.

May 10, 2004: In Burundi, the rebel group FDD (Forces for the Defense of Democracy), is demanding more government jobs, and the release (from jail) of several FDD members, before they will rejoin the government. Uganda says it will send troops into Burundi if FDD does not rejoin the government and continue disarming rebel gunmen. Meanwhile, government troops continue fighting gunmen of the FNL (Forces for National Liberation). But there are only a few thousand FNL out there. Most of the rebels were FDD, and over 20,000 of those have assembled in government camps, awaiting demobilization. But until the government comes up with the money, the FDD men keep their weapons. The UN is trying to round up the money for the demobilization of the Hutu rebels, but is having a hard time.

May 17, 2004: Rwanda is preparing to send troops back into Congo if Congo does not speed up the disarmament or destruction of Rwandan Hutu militias in eastern Congo. These militias, numbering 6-8,000 armed men, live on pillage and looting, and still raid across the border into Rwanda. Congo considers the Hutus a problem, but pleads poverty when it comes to gathering troops and going after the Hutu. Rwanda is apparently just keeping up the pressure on Congo, lest the Hutu militias are just be ignored.

May 22, 2004: The UN has agreed to send 5,650 peacekeepers to Burundi to insure that the rebels and government comply with the details of the current peace deal. South Africa will lead the peacekeeping force.

May 27, 2004: Hutu rebels, remnants of the force that killed nearly a million Tutsi in the 1990s, continue to raid villages along the Rwandan border. Most of these Hutu groups have camps in Congo. Rwanda continues to threaten Congo with military force if Congolese troops do not do something about the Hutu rebel camps. Congo doesn't have the trained troops for the job, so the UN peacekeepers in Congo are seeking to do it.

May 28, 2004: While the Burundi government and rebels haggle over details in their peace agreements, the fighting in the countryside has been steadily declining. Also declining is the number of people in refugee camps. Two years there were 281,000 people in such camps, but since then about half of these refugees have felt confident enough about the law and order situation, to go home. There are still several thousand armed rebels out there, and these guys are still living largely off plunder. But they restrict their operations to a few areas, and are under constant pressure from the army and police.

May 29, 2004: FNL rebels clashed with army patrols south of the Burundi capital over the last few days, leaving 12 rebels and one soldier dead. The army is more aggressively patrolling areas where the FNL camps are, in order to make life more uncomfortable for the rebels and encourage them to surrender.

June 1, 2004: Fighting continued south of the Burundi capital, where troops and FNL rebels have been skirmishing for several days. At least half a dozen rebels have been killed. The few thousand armed members of the FNL live in remote camps south of the capital. Sometimes, groups of FNL members come closer to the capital looking for food.

June 9, 2004: In an effort to pressure the FNL rebels of Burundi, travel restrictions were placed on FNL members by Tanzania, South Africa, Zambia, Rwanda, Ethiopia, Mozambique and Kenya. The leaders of these countries are trying to convince FNL leaders to give up their armed resistance. The FNL is the only active rebel group left in Burundi, all the others having agreed to a peace deal in 2000.

June 12, 2004: Some 3,000 Congolese Tutsi refugees have fled to Burundi after the recent fighting between a rebel Congolese Tutsi militia and Congolese troops around the town of Bukavu.

June 25, 2004: A Burundian rebel FNL leader, Eugene Sinzumunsi, was arrested in the capital, along with four other rebels, by the police. Sinzumunsi was arrested in the home of Nephtalie Ndikumana, a former rebel leader who had joined the government. The remaining FNL rebels are basically fighting over how much money and government jobs they will get for laying down their weapons.

June 29, 2004: Congolese rebel leader, Colonel Jules Mutebutsi, has fled to Rwanda with 300 of his men. Congolese troops and UN peacekeepers are looking for Mutebutsi and his men. Like so many other groups of ethnic Tutsi rebels, Mutebutsi and his gunmen are considered bandits, to be shot on sight. Mutebutsi and his followers were disarmed when they entered Rwanda, and are being kept in a lightly guarded detention camp.

June 30, 2004: Fighting between troops and rebels continues outside the Burundian capital. The FNL rebels are unable to agree on some sort of compromise with the government. Some 50,000 civilians have fled the suburbs of the capital to avoid the fighting.

July 6, 2004: In the suburbs of the Burundi capital, 300 UN peacekeepers were sent to patrol an area where the army and FNL rebels had been fighting. The FNL is growing weaker, as more of its members tire of the years of fighting, and the constant pressure from the army and UN peacekeepers.

July 8, 2004: Burundian troops have moved to the Congo border to look for several hundred Rwandan Hutu rebels who have been forced out of the Congo by UN peacekeepers and the Congolese army.

July 10, 2004: In Burundi, some 18,000 FDD rebels and government troops are assembled and ready for UN supervised disarmament. That process, which will see the troops and rebels receive cash and goods for turning in their weapons, will begin next week. Some $84 million has been raised to pay for this.

July 14, 2004: FNL rebels attacked a town south of the capital, killing 15 civilians before arriving army troops and police drove them away. The rebels were apparently angry with the local civilians for not providing them with support. The Hutu rebels live off nearby civilians, but many of these Hutu civilians are tired of years of rebellion.

July 17, 2004: UN investigators accuse Rwanda of continuing to support Tutsi rebel groups in Congo. Rwanda denies it, but the evidence is pretty convincing. Captured Congo Tutsi rebels admit getting money and guns from Rwandan army officers.

July 27, 2004: The Hutu FDD rebels have agreed to rejoin the government, having stopped that last May.

August 1, 2004: The FNL Hutu rebels continue to fight in one of Burundi's 17 provinces. But the FNL is also talking to UN representatives in Kenya, trying to work out some kind of peace deal. The FNL fighters are basically operating like bandits, and are more a police problem.

August 12, 2004: The last Hutu rebel group in Burundi, the FNL, continues to resist negotiations. Actually, most of the FNL operations are banditry, as the rebels steal to support themselves. The government is threatening the FNL leadership with being labeled a terrorist organization, but this may not work. The FNL leadership itself is split and may be more interested in fighting for power within the FNL, rather than making peace with the rest of the country.

August 14, 2004: Rwanda has defeated the Hutu rebels who have, for ten years, operated from bases in neighboring Congo. There are still several thousand of the Hutu gunmen over in the Congo, but the Congolese army and UN peacekeepers are constantly after the Hutu to disarm, and Rwanda maintains thousands of troops along the border, or are ready to pounce on any armed Hutu who come across in Rwanda.

August 15, 2004: Burundi FLN Hutu rebels took responsibility for a August 13 attack on a refugee camp near the Congo border. The camp held Congolese Tutsi who had fled violence against Tutsi within Congo. The FLN killed nearly 200 refugees, mostly women and children. The FLN claimed that the refugee camp was used as a base for Burundi army troops and Congolese Tutsi gunmen. The Tutsi are a minority (about 15 percent of the population) in Rwanda and Burundi). The Tutsi tribes moved into the region from the north several centuries ago, and used force and superior fighting ability to displace Hutu and other tribes. The animosities from that ancient invasion have never disappeared.

August 18, 2004: The August 13 slaughter of nearly 200 Tutsi refugees apparently involved Hutu militiamen from across the border in Congo. Burundi believes that Congolese soldiers were involved, and that the attack was planned and launched from the Congo, with only some help from the Hutu FNL rebels inside Burundi. This, alas, is all too possible. The Tutsi, a tribe originally from the drier Sahel to the north, came south centuries ago and were always seen as outsiders by the local Bantu peoples. The majority of the locals in eastern Congo, Rwanda and Burundi are primarily Hutu, or other Bantu tribes. The refugee massacre reminded the Tutsi that they have many enemies on both sides of the Congo border. Thus both Rwanda and Burundi, currently run by Tutsi minorities, threaten to send troops across the border to go after Hutu gunmen responsible for the killings, and restore active support for Tutsi militias in eastern Congo. At the moment, the Congolese army does not have enough troops in the eastern Congo to deal with renewed fighting by the Tutsis.

August 20, 2004: Some 20,000 Congolese refugees in Burundi will be moved farther away from the Congo border with Burundi.

August 23, 2004: In Burundi, FNL rebels attacked an army camp. Three rebels were killed and three soldiers wounded.

August 24, 2004: Burundi and Congo have agreed to improve border security and increase efforts to destroy Hutu rebel groups operating in both countries. This is another result, and reaction to, the August 13 slaughter of Congolese Tutsi refugees in Burundi. The killers have not yet been found.

August 30, 2004: The Burundi-Congo border was closed again, because of fear of more armed groups crossing into Burundi to attack refugees.

September 2, 2004: A UN investigation found that the August 13 massacre was planned and carried out by three groups. The Burundi FLN Hutu rebels, who took credit for the attack, were one group. But two Congo based groups, Mai-Mai tribal rebels and Rwandan Hutu rebels based in Congo, also took place. These findings have caused Burundi, Rwanda and Congo to agree to join in an attack on the Hutu rebels.

September 5, 2004: Corruption in Congo has rendered the armed forces there highly ineffective, making it difficult to hunt down Hutu rebels. Rwanda and Burundi feel they may have to send troops back into Congo to finish the Hutu rebel groups once and for all.

September 6, 2004: Thousands of the 30,000 Congolese refugees in Burundi camps have been returning to the villages in the Congo. Attacks on the camps, and a perception that things are safer in Congo, at least safer than in Burundi, have caused the movement.

September 10, 2004: The Burundi army continues fighting FLN rebels outside the capital, killing 21 of the FNL Hutu rebels.

September 18, 2004: Burundi has proposed a new constitution that would bring peace between the Hutu and Tutsi tribes, and end over a decade of violence.

September 22, 2004: Rwanda continues to shrink the size of its armed forces, demobilizing 1,398 troops. Since 1997, Rwanda has shrunk its armed forces by 35,284. However, no one is sure exactly how many men are in the army. It's believed to be between 50-60,000. Rwanda also supports several groups of armed irregulars. Most of the troops are Tutsis, which are only about 15 percent of the population.

September 24, 2004: Burundis attempts to encourage Congolese refugees to return home has run into problems. Many of the refugees are from Tutsi tribesmen, and the majority Bantu tribes are attacking the Congolese Tutsi when they cross the border from Burundi. Burundi wanted the refugees to stay in the Burundi camps, but the Tutsi refugees feared more attacks by Rwandan and Burundi Hutu (a Bantu group) gangs based in Congo.

September 25, 2004: There are now 4,726 UN peacekeepers in Burundi, with another 700 (a battalion of Kenyan infantry) about to arrive.

September 27, 2004: Outside the Burundi capital, troops killed at least 37 FNL rebels. A unit of former rebels (from the FDD) assisted the army. The Hutu FDD have made peace with the Tutsi dominated government, and are eager to stamp out the FNL and get reconstruction going faster.

October 5, 2004: Several hundred Burundian Tutsis have fled to neighboring Rwanda, to get away from Hutu militants.

October 9, 2004: The Tutsi minority in Burundi, Rwanda and Congo continue to live in fear of neighbors who want them dead, or somewhere else. Rwandan Tutsis have negotiated a deal that gives Tutsis enough clout in the government to keep the Tutsis safe. A similar deal is almost done in Burundi. But in Congo, Tutsis are still subject to attack, and there is no safety in sight.

October 15, 2004: National elections, to elect a post-civil war government, have been delayed from November 1 to the Spring of 2005. The vote would approve a new constitution, and working out the details for that, especially in the area of protecting the rights of Hutus and Tutsis, has caused the delay.

October 19, 2004: For the second time in a year, a senior clergyman has been murdered. This time it was a Catholic priest, a senior diocese official, Gerard Nzeyimana. The priest was a Tutsi and was outspoken in denouncing Hutu leaders who committed mass murder against Tutsis during the last eleven years of civil war.

October 21, 2004: Parliament approved the new constitution, but many Tutsi members said they would boycott it. The Tutsi, while only 15 percent of the population, dominate the army, and other aspects of the economy.

October 22, 2004: The 13 years of civil war has killed five percent of the population, and few Burundians are eager to go back to fighting. But some are, and if the shooting began again, most would join in for reasons of self-defense, or revenge.

October 25, 2004: Despite an extensive investigation, the UN was unable to positively identify the group responsible for killing 160 Congolese Tutsi refugees in a Burundi camp last August. Hutu militants, either from Congo, Rwanda or Burundi, were suspected, and still are. But no one took credit for the murders, and not enough clues were left behind to allow positive identification of the culprits.

October 26, 2004: Rwanda, Uganda and Congo have agreed to set up an organization to quickly deal with security issues (mainly refugees, bandits and rebel groups) showing up on their common borders.

October 29, 2004: Burundi troops caught a group of FNL rebels south of the capital, and killed 15 of them. Some may have escaped, but 13 firearms were collected.

November 4, 2004: Eight of ten Burundi Tutsi political parties have relented and accepted the new constitution, which gave it enough support to bring the constitution into force today. The Tutsis felt that there were not enough safeguards for Tutsi rights. However, the Tutsis, like everyone else, is tired of years of civil war and wants to "give peace a chance." At this point, the only real opposition to a new government, and elections, are the Hutu FNL rebels, who still have several hundred armed men operating south of the capital.

November 12, 2004: A group of FNL rebels attacked a camp of the FDD (former Hutu rebels, now allied with the government). Ten FNL men were killed, one FDD man was wounded.

Rwanda and Uganda have agreed to conduct joint patrols on their border, in order to deal with rebel or bandit groups that one country or another may favor (or be suspected of favoring).

November 18, 2004: In Burundi, the national vote on the new constitution had been put off to late December. Continued disputes between Hutu and Tutsi politicians, as well as delays in registering voters, caused the delay. Moreover, the disarmament program for former rebels is behind schedule. While most Burundians want peace, there are still minorities in the Tutsi and Hutu communities who want to continue fighting. The violence has killed over 300,000 people in the last ten years.

November 26, 2004: The Burundian government said that several Burundian Hutu rebel groups had moved from the Congo into Burundi. The government specifically mentioned the Forces for National Liberation (FNL). The FNL rejected the November 2003 peace deal. The accusation followed reports of fighting near Bujumbura. Western sources said the Burundian Army killed 17 Hutu rebels in two firefights. One occurred east of Bujumbura in the Benga hills. The second was south of Bujumbura near Kanyosha. It is unclear why Hutu rebel groups in the Congo have chose this time to launch a new offensive into Burundi. Given reports of Hutu rebel operations near the Rwandan border, it's possible that the rebel groups are trying to coordinate an offensive against both Burundi and Rwanda. However, both the Burundian Army and the Rwandan Army are far stronger than the rebel groups. There are rumblings among some Hutu groups that accepted the November 2003 peace deal that the peace process is not moving fast enough. The FNL's attacks may be designed to slowdown the peace process even more. Scaring Burundian Tutsis makes them even more reluctant to trust the peace process. Slowing down the peace process increases Hutu disaffection. The FNL can then present itself as the only "armed Hutu alternative" to the failed peace process.

November 28, 2004: Rwanda announced on November 27 that its military forces will continue to attack Rwandan rebel groups in the Congo if the Congolese government does not disarm the rebels. This statement follows a November 24 Rwandan threat to attack the FDLR (Democratic Liberation Forces of Rwanda) Hutu rebel group in the Congo. The FDLR command cadre has several key Hutu leaders who were involved in the 1994 genocide in Rwanda. Several sources reported in late October that Hutu rebels (including the FDLR) were working closely with a Congolese militia in the eastern Congo. Rwanda interpreted this move as preparation for renewed Hutu guerrilla attacks on Rwanda. The Rwandan government also scolded "the international community" (i.e., the UN) for failing to help disarm and demobilize Rwandan rebel groups in the Congo. This follows a November 25 UN warning to Rwanda. The UN Security Council said Rwandan attacks into the Congo would "frustrate" UN peacekeeping efforts. On November 27, former FDLR commander Majour-General Paul Rwarakabije urged the FDLR to surrender and seek peace. The trouble with the UN comes as Rwanda faces another diplomatic row with Uganda. On November 24 Uganda expelled a Rwandan diplomat Ugandan authorities claimed was aiding the PRA (Peoples Redemption Army), a Ugandan rebel organization that was bases inside the Congo. Rwanda retaliated by expelling a Ugandan diplomat.

December 5, 2004: Reports from the eastern Congo indicate that "larger formations" of Rwandan troops are once again operating inside the Congo. On December 2 the Congolese government said that 6,000 Rwandan troops had crossed the border and attacked at least one village in the Congo. British sources said that UN observers in the Goma area reported significant Rwandan troop movements. One said that as of December 2, eight Rwandan battalions had lined up at the Rwandan-Congo border. What Rwanda calls a battalion varies in size, usually from 400 to 600 troops. The Rwandan government allegedly informed other African governments that if its troops moved into the Congo the troops would only target Rwandan Hutu rebels and not engage Congolese troops. Rwandan President Paul Kagame later issued an official statement that said military action (in the Congo?) would be "brief." On December 5 several African sources reported that Rwandan troops had attacked 21 villages in the Congo, with the first attacks occurring on November 24. The UN said that Congo civilians had given similar reports to UN peacekeepers. One of the reports said Rwandan soldiers had burned houses in Congo villages suspected of "housing" (supporting) Hutu rebels. Rwanda contends that up to 10,000 Hutu rebels are in the eastern Congo and they are threatening Rwanda. Other estimates put the number of Hutu rebels at 3,000 to 4,000. One has to ask what the Rwandans will do if and when they encounter Interahamwe Hutu rebels operating with Congolese "militias." In early November it was noted that Hutu rebels and Congo militias were operating together near the Congo-Rwandan border. A mix of Hutu rebels and Congo militias could well produce a figure of close to 10,000 (supporting the Rwandan allegation).

December 31, 2004: The UN won't directly accuse Rwanda of invading the Congo, but the UN does keep insisting that "foreign troops" have entered Congo, to fight Rwandan Hutu militias, right near the Rwandan border. Rwanda denies everything. Journalists are reluctant to investigate, because people with video cameras tend to draw fire.

January 18, 2005: Several thousand Congolese Tutsi civilians have fled into Rwanda, because of attacks by Rwandan Hutu militias. Apparently there are Rwandan troops (mainly Tutsi) in Congo trying to hunt down and kill these Hutu gunmen.

February 5, 2005: Burundi's rebel Forces for National Liberation (FNL) issued two promising statements on January 28 and another on February 3
The guerrilla group said that it would consider peace talks with Burundi's coalition government. Good news? The FNL has put out negotiation offers before, and the civil war simply continued. The February
3 statement stipulated that South Africa's Deputy President Jacob Zuma cannot act as a "mediator" in peace negotiations. After the January 28 FNL peace offer, Zuma said he "welcomed it" but the FNL offer came "too late" to change plans for elections held in April. Now the FNL believes Zuma is "biased" against it. Zuma has served as a "peace facilitator" for the various factions in Burundi's transitional government. The FNL prefers a UN negotiator The FNL also has this demand: it insists that it be treated as a legitimate resistance organization, not a terror organization. Meanwhile, the killing continues. The government claims that a provincial governor in Bubanza Province (north of Bujumbura) was assassinated earlier this month by the FNL. The governor's car was ambushed as he was traveling to Bujumbura. The FNL denies the charges and blames "other groups" in Bubanza Province who have grievances with the governor's administration. The major firefight on January 2, which left 46 FNL fighters dead, demonstrated that the FNL still has a force in the field-- but that death toll represents a large tactical military defeat in the Burundian civil war. Perhaps it's beginning to dawn on the FNL that the new FDD Hutu party made the smart decision to end the fight and join the government. There's an echo here of holdout pro-Saddam Hussein Sunnis waking up after the January 30 Iraq elections--like, hey guys, you're missing the political train. As it is, rogue

Burundian Hutu guerrilla groups remain in Burundi and the DRC. The FNL claim that "other groups" murdered the Bubanza governor could well be true, and that means continued low-level fighting even if the FNL joins the Burundian peace process. --Austin Bay

February 20, 2005: The Burundian government claims that 18,000 Hutu rebels have turned in their arms since January 25, 2005. The 18,000 rebels are part of the FDD (Forces for Defense of Democracy). The rebels began gathering in what the Burundian government calls "regroupment camps" as part of the peace process now under the direction of the transition government. (Some reports call the camps "cantonments.") The Burundian government also says that 9,000 other former FDD fighters are now conducting operations with the Burundian Army--specifically pursuing some 3,000 FNL (Forces for National Liberation) Hutu rebels who have not joined the peace process. In fact, since late December, the "Army of Burundi" now has a new official name: National Defense Forces (FDN). This reflects the transition government's "military integration policy." The FDD and five other rebel groups are in the process of being integrated into the Burundian military. The Burundian Army was a Tutsi-dominated institution that was a law unto itself. The new FDN is supposed to have Hutu officers in key positions and be accountable to the civilian leaders in the transition government. The fact that the transition government has demobilized nearly 20,000 former rebel fighters gives the peace process a tremendous boost. It also shows how strong the FDD is in comparison to its rival, the FNL. The biggest Hutu rebel organization chose to political option. Like Saddam's former cronies who set off bombs in Iraq, the FNL can still make trouble, but as a political force it is increasingly marginal. (Austin Bay)

May 15, 2005: The FNL signed a cease fire agreement, and continued negotiating terms of a peace deal.

June 30, 2005: Violence between FNL rebels and government forces has increased throughout the month, leaving several dozen casualties. The ceasefire deal with the FNL is still technically in force, but is unraveling in the countryside.

July 16, 2005: Hutu rebels in Burundi launched new attacks, this time in central Burundi. On July 12 the FNL (Forces for National Liberation) attacked a Burundi Army unit in central Muramya province. Two firefights were reported. A total of three Burundian soldiers were killed, plus one policemen, and five FNL rebels. The FNL failed to join the Burundi peace process. The FDD (Forces for Defense of Democracy), the largest Hutu rebel group in Burundi, did quit fighting-- and proceeded to win the majority of seats in Burundi's last parliamentary election. A senior FDD leader will become Burundi's president next month. That means a Hutu-led Burundi government will face a Hutu-led insurgency.

July 21, 2005: Two Ethiopian soldiers assigned to assigned to ONUB (United Nations Operation in Burundi) have been "repatriated" to Ethiopia. The soldiers violated the UN military forces' sexual misconduct rules-- in place after investigation revealed extensive sexual abuse and exploitation by UN soldiers serving in the Congo. Ethiopia is responsible for discipline. ONUB is a UN Chapter VII peacekeeping mission, established by UNSCR 1545 in May 2004. The peacekeepers support the Arusha Agreement (peace agreement which led to the Hutu rebel FDD ending its insurgency).

July 28, 2005: The former rebel FDD, now a political party, has been sweeping local elections and is expected to gain a majority in the upper house of parliament. Despite the success of the Hutu FDD, the other (smaller) Hutu rebel group, the FNL, continues to fight. FDD representatives and supporters have been attacked recently by FNL rebels.

August 13, 2005: FNL Hutu rebels in Burundi have killed at least one hundred civilians in the month of July. June was likewise a bloody month, with nearly 200 civilian deaths. The FNL -- which refused to join the peace process--is pursuing a strategy similar to the Saddamist/al Qaeda terrorists in Iraq: Sow as much chaos as possible and try to incite another Hutu-Tutsi civil war. The FNL has been as unsuccessful as the Sunni Arab terrorists in Iraq, even though the FNL terror campaign has gotten practically no media coverage outside Burundi.

August 20, 2005: Former Hutu rebel leader, Pierre Nkurunziza, was selected as president of Burundi. Nkurunziza's mother was Tutsi.

August 31, 2005: The new government was installed, containing Hutu and Tutsi ministers. This government is the result of the peace deal between Hutu and Tutsi.

September 2, 2005: Battles with FNL rebels continue, with five rebels and one soldier killed on the outskirts of the capital.

September 13, 2005: The FNL refused to hold peace talks with the new government.

September 19, 2005: Peace or continued war? Burundi's FNL rebels have sent conflicting signals in the past-- and they are doing it again. The reason may be quite simple: the FNL is composed of competing factions.

On September 14 the FNL attacked "several targets" near the capital. On September 15 FNL rebels attacked a military base in the Gihosha region (north of the capital). The FNL group used grenades and rocket -propelled grenades in the attack. One person was killed. Later on the same day an FNL spokesman said the FNL was willing to discuss peace. The FNL, however, rejected negotiations with the Burundian government. The FNL spokesman said the group would discuss peace with (quote) "representatives of the Hutu, Tutsi and Twa ethnic groups." (The Twa are also called the Pygmies.) The FNL (a Hutu rebel group) does not want to legitimate its Hutu rivals who have joined the government and participated in electoral politics. The fact is, the FNL missed a political opportunity rival Burundian Hutus accepted, and that fact is finally dawning on the FNL holdouts.

November 25, 2005: Responding to a government report that troops had killed 41 FNL rebels, the FNL fired three 60mm mortar shells at the capita outskirts. There were no casualties.

December 5, 2005: The government believes the FNL are rapidly losing what little civilian support they have, as more former FNL supporters report to government officials, with information about FNL activities, and requests for protection from FNL retribution.

December 15, 2005: The Burundian government claimed that its forces hit the rebel Forces for National Liberation (FNL) hard in October and November of this year. A word of warning: the following are Burundian government figures, not independent figures. The government said the Burundian Army killed 120 rebels during the two month period and captured 646. This is out of an estimated 3000 FNL fighters. That means the government is claiming 25 percent of the FNL holdouts were either killed or captured since October 1. This is doubtful, but the FNL is taking a beating, and is still out there.

December 18, 2005: UN peacekeepers begin their withdrawal this week. About 200 troops will leave, and all 5,000 UN peacekeepers are to be gone by the end of 2006.

December 26, 2005: The UN has extended the peacekeeping mandate in Burundi. The extension is for six months, from January 15 to June 30, 2006.

Despite the extension, the Security Council believes the situation in Burundi has stabilized and the new unity government will be able to handle holdout Hutu rebels. The UN Operation in Burundi (the acronym is ONUB) currently deploys 5, 300 troops. Troop withdrawals scheduled for early 2006 will cut that number substantially. Mozambique's small contingent will begin withdrawing December 28, 2005. Kenya will withdraw its battalion in February. Ethiopia is currently scheduled to withdraw its battalion-sized contingent in March.

The only remaining rebel group, the FNL, has little popular support, and has been reduced to the status of bandits.

February 15, 2006: The Burundi government reported a firefight near the capital city, Bujunbura. Five members of the Forces for national Liberation (FNL) rebel group died in the clash. One Burundi Army soldier was killed.

March 8, 2006: At least three senior Burundian military officers are believed to be part of a coup plot to overthrow the current president, Pierre Nkurunziza. Senior national police officials may also be involved in the coup planning. The Burundi Army remains dominated by Tutsis. Nkurunziza is a Hutu. Since August 2005 he has led a "national unity" government with the support of the majority Hutus as well as key Tutsi politicians. Nkurunziza was also a key leader in the Hutu rebel group, the Forces for Defense of Democracy.

March 9, 2006: Nepal reported that a 225 troop "army team" had departed for peacekeeping duties in Burundi

March 10, 2006: A potential coup against the Burundian government was discovered by Burundi's intelligence service, the Service de Renseignement. UN ceasefire monitors in Burundi had feared a "backlash" by Tutsis in the Burundian Army against President Pierre Nkurunziza's government. In that sense, the coup talk reported March 7 and March 8 wasn't a surprise. Burundi's government remains very fragile. It relies on the presence of peacekeeping forces and the cooperation of several Hutu and Tutsis factions. If the intelligence service "cracked the coup" as reported, that has to be an encouraging signal. Nkurunziza has argued the majority Burundians are tired of war. He's right. However, the Hutu Forces for National Liberation (FNL) have not joined the peace process, and "old guard" Tutsi officers in the military do not support democracy because it means Tutsis can no longer dominate the majority Hutus.

March 12, 2006: The last active rebel group in Burundi, the FNL, have finally agreed to revive stalled peace talks. The FNL itself is split into factions, some of which are not willing to stop fighting. The FNL is one of seven Hutu rebel groups that opposed any government that included minority Tutsi. The better organized and more militarily effective Tutsi, had long dominated the majority Hutu.

April 10, 2006: The Burundian government confirmed that it will begin peace negotiations with representatives of the rebel Forces for National Liberation (FLN). Tanzania had reported on April 7 that an FLN negotiating "delegation" was in Tanzania.

April 10, 2006: Rwanda and Burundi have been discussing the 19,000 Rwandans now currently living in Burundi. The Rwandans are variously described as "illegal immigrants" or "asylum seekers" or "refugees." Many of the Rwandans are Hutus who fled Rwanda in 1994 after the Hutus genocidal attacks on Rwandan Tutsis. Burundi has tried to review some cases. The Burundian government said that of 450 asylum cases reviewed, 52 were judged as valid asylum cases. Burundi has said that most of the Rwandans will be sent home. The Rwandan government will then decides if the returnees will face prosecution.

The International Criminal Tribunal for Rwanda (ICTR) sentenced the former mayor of the town of Gikoro to 15 years in prison. According to the court, the former mayor, Paul Bisengimana, had reached a plea bargain with the prosecution. The ICTR is focusing on leaders and "masterminds" who directed the genocidal attacks. Bisengimana is in that category. He pled guilty to "murder and extermination." Bisengimana was involved in the murder of over one thousand people. Because of the plea bargain, Bisengimana received a sentence on the "extermination" charge only. -- Austin Bay

April 14, 2006: Burundi's National Defense Force (the Burundian Army) has opened a "demobilization camp" for FLN guerrillas who agree to end their rebellion. The Burundian government also said that it is currently conducting peace negotiations with two separate FLN factions. The negotiations are being held in Tanzania. (South Africa, Uganda, and Tanzania are helping facilitate the negotiations.) The negotiations are being conducted separately (i.e., the two FLN factions are involved in separate negotiations). The FLN has always been "faction ridden". Even if the two main factions agree to join the government small, holdout elements may continue to fight. Hutu distrust of the Tutsis is one reason, but there is often a more practical reason in play. Guerrillas survive by banditry and smuggling. Banditry and smuggling may be an easier way to make a living than subsistence farming. Demobilization camps -- in principle-- are supposed to do more than disarm guerrillas. The camps are supposed to help them develop (or re-learn) civilian skills.

April 15, 2006: Burundi lifted its national curfew (from midnight to 6 AM). The curfew has been in effect for 34 years. A "temporary curfew" was imposed during the Hutu-Tutsi civil war of 1972. The curfew was made permanent in 1993. The national unity government believes that the curfew can now end. Though the Forces for National Liberation (FLN) continue to fight a guerrilla war, most FLN attacks occur in one province (Bubanza) where the FLN operates out of the Kibira forest area.

May 24, 2006: Buundi's national unity government has made great strides toward ending the civil war. That's one reason the UN is transferring peacekeepers from Burundi to the Congo. However, violence does continues. The Burundi government reported Burundian Army attacked an FNL (Forces for National Liberation) camp in the Kibira forest. Attack helicopters supported the assault. At least ten rebels died in the fighting.

Rwanda joined Uganda and Congo in agreeing to a UN-backed initiative to "sanction" rebel militias operating inside their countries and along their borders. The UN is trying to stop support for the rogue militias operating in the eastern Congo.

May 30, 2006: South Africa is mediating peace talks between the Burundi government and the hold-out Forces for National Liberation (FNL). The FNL is the Hutu rebel group that has so far refused to end the civil war.

September 5, 2006: A grenade attack in Bujumbura killed four people and wounded 12. The grenade attack came as FNL and government representatives said they had reached a tentative ceasefire agreement.

September 7, 2006: The FNL (Forces for National Liberation) and the Burundian government signed a ceasefire agreement. Negotiations had been taking place in Dar es Salaam, Tanzania. How the "demobilization process" for FNL fighters will proceed has not been precisely determined but many FNL fighters will be "integrated" into the Burundian national police and the army. FNL fighters are supposed to begin assembling by September 21.

September 12, 2006: The UN's International Criminal Tribunal for Rwanda sentenced former Rwandan Army lieutenant-colonel Tharcisse Muvunyi to 25 years in prison. Muvunyi was accused of failing to stop genocidal massacres carried by his soldiers in his unit and for failing to punish the killers (i.e., during the 1994 genocide of Tutsis in Rwanda). In one specific case, Muvunyi was accused of permitting his troops to kill a group of orphans who were hiding in a school.

September 16, 2006: A large group of Rwandans who survived the 1994 genocide participated in a protest in the Rwandan capital, Kigali. The genocide survivors called on global leaders to act to end the genocide in Sudan's Darfur region.

September 25, 2006: In Burundi, FNL rebels have begun gathering in Bubanza and Bujumbura Rural provinces for the last week. Many of the FNL fighters in Bujumbura Rural have been in camps across the Congo border. Some 400 fighters belonging to another FNL faction have reportedly assembled in Bururi province (south Burundi).

October 30, 2006: The Rwandan army has begun a special military academy course that focuses on African Disarmament, Demobilization and Reintegration (ADDR). The course is designed to prepare officers to deal with the social, political and economic reintegration into society of former soldiers and guerrilla fighters. This is a common problem in Central Africa, especially Rwanda, Burundi, Congo (DRC), Uganda and Republic of Congo (Brazzaville). The course is based on a UN-developed training program and is designed to "link" the military and civilian elements of what the UN calls "peace support operations." This may not sound like a major development, but in fact it is. The Rwandan government understands that successful demobilization and reintegration is its biggest security and developmental challenge. The UN has been encouraging officer and troop professional development programs that "focus on the real challenges" facing developing nations emerging from civil and regional conflicts. The course is a Rwandan example of what the US Dept of Defense calls "unified action" - combining security, political, and economic tools to achieve a strategic or operational goal. (Austin Bay)

November 3, 2006: The Burundian government granted "temporary immunity" to the leaders of the National Liberation Forces (FLN). The FLN was the last rebel group to accept the peace agreement that has -for the most part-ended Burundi's long civil war. The immunity is for actions up to September 7, 2006. That is the date the FLN agreed to terms.

November 7, 2006: The Rwandan government is "examining allegations" that a few French troops may have cooperated with radical Hutu groups during the 1994 Rwandan genocide. The allegations are complex but the implication is that some of the French advisers working with the Hutu-led government aided the Interahamwe Hutu militias. The troops are alleged to have encouraged Tutsis to come out of hiding. Subsequently, the Tutsis were attacked by the radical Hutu militias.

December 17, 2006: The Burundian government gave "temporary immunity" to former members of FNL splinter faction, the Palipehutu-FNL. The faction was one of the last to join the peace process. The government statement said that the "immunity" (amnesty) was given in order to facilitate reconciliation and political development.

December 18, 2006: Rwandan reported that its peacekeeping contingent in Sudan had completed its first tour. Rwanda has 254 soldiers serving with UNMIS - UN Mission in Sudan, (i.e., south Sudan). Rwanda will replace the first contingent with another 254 soldiers.

November 25, 2006: France and Rwanda have severed diplomatic relations. The French have supported the theory that the leaders of the current Rwandan government were the instigators of the genocide 12 years ago (by shooting down the aircraft carrying Rwandan and Burundian Hutu politicians.) A French court recently called for the prosecution of senior Rwandan officials. The current Tutsi government denies all this, and points out that France was supporting the Hutu dominated Rwandan government twelve years ago, and thus shares responsibility for that government's genocide against Rwandan Tutsis. The French are poor losers, especially in Africa, where they still maintain considerable economic and political influence. Twelve years ago, the Tutsi rebels were close to overthrowing the pro-French Hutu government. France cannot forget that, not only did their guys lose, but their Hutu protégés killed half a million innocents in the process. You've got to blame someone, and the French have decided to blame the people who stopped the killing.

December 25, 2006: The UN prepared to withdraw its peacekeeping contingent from Burundi. While the UN considers the Burundi peacekeeping effort to be a success, the political situation in Burundi is considered "fragile." One of the issues remains a trial for an alleged coup. One of the suspects is a former president, Domitien Ndayizeye. who was arrested in August 2006. A potential "food crisis" also exists in northern an east-central Burundi. Famine has a way of creating refugees, which in Burundi often leads to bandits attacking the refugees. In the past some of the "bandits" have been Burundi Army soldiers. At its height, the UN mission in Burundi had over 5,500 peacekeepers. The force is now down to around 2,500 troops. The peacekeeping force will have a civilian follow-on monitoring office, the UN Integrated Office in Burundi (BINUB). South Africa promised on December 12 to keep a contingent of its forces in Burundi after the UN officially withdraws. South Africa has 850 troops in Burundi, but that number could decrease in 2007. The South African contingent would serve as a "stabilizing" force in Burundi.

February 27, 2007: South Africa said that it will keep 1,100 troops in Burundi as part of the African Union's (AU) "special task force" for Burundi. South Africa is engaged helping negotiations between the Burundian government and the last rebel organization that has not signed the Arusha Accord (Burundi peace agreement). That organization is the Palipehutu-FNL

March 2, 2007: Rwanda reported that two "bombs" (most likely artillery or mortar rounds) fired from the Congo ((DRC) landed inside Rwanda. The Rwandan military claimed that Hutu Interahamwe rebels were operating in the border area (Rubavu district).

March 3, 2007: Now Burundi is offering to send peacekeepers to Somalia. Responding to an African Union (AU) request for peacekeepers, Burundi said that it could send up to 1,700 soldiers to Somalia. Burundi's defense ministry says that its troops have experienced and "technically" (i.e., tactically) ready. However, they have equipment problems. The troops are basically light infantry and lack heavy weapons. They also lack support equipment. It is likely that they will need engineering and medical equipment. Burundi already has 50 troops and policemen serving in Sudan's troubled Darfur region. There is a reason for maintaining a foreign peacekeeping force in Burundi, while sending Burundian soldiers on other peacekeeping missions. The peacekeeping training helps professionalize the Burundian military. The troops are also paid in hard currency. Finally, it gives the Burundian military something to do besides fight inside Burundi.

March 5, 2007: The Rwandan government announced that plans on creating "one of the best air forces on the continent." (i.e., Africa). The aircraft would be used to support Rwandan forces engaged in peacekeeping efforts. This suggests Rwandan intends to acquire transport aircraft and transport helicopters. At the moment Rwanda relies on the United States to airlift its troops and police security forces to Darfur. A Rwandan spokesman said that Rwandan does not want to be "dependent" on its "partners" for transportation.

March 11, 2007: Burundi is now regarded as a peacekeeping success. Burundi has offered to return the favor and send peacekeepers to Somalia. However, the situation in Burundi remains precarious. Once of the reasons for the fragility is a looming food crisis. December 2006 was marked by heavy rains. In fact, the last two growing seasons have experienced very heavy rainfall and destroyed many crops. The price of sweet potatoes (an important food source) has risen over 40 percent since the beginning of 2007. Rain isn't the only problem. The long war limited the farmers' ability to take care of the land and in many places soil (which to begin with is often thin in jungle regions) has been depleted. The government's concern is that a food crisis could lead to renewed fighting.

May 12, 2007: Last year Rwanda said that it would send more troops to Darfur to serve with the African Union peacekeeping force. Now Rwanda says that may have to withdraw its troops because they lack barrack facilities. The US and the UN promised to help build facilities in Darfur, but it was not clear who would pay the costs. Rwanda has three battalions in Darfur (approximately 2000 soldiers) serving with the African Union force.

May 22, 2007: A South African soldier, serving with the residual peacekeeping force in Burundi, was wounded in a shooting incident on April 9. The soldier was evacuated to a South African military hospital, where he died today. The incident is still under investigation. South Africa agreed to keep a small contingent in Burundi because the Burundian government trusts the South Africans to make fair decisions and not favor either Tutsis or Hutus. It also helps that the South Africans are the most professional military in Africa.

May 25, 2007: More than 8,000 refugees who fled Burundi in 1972 will be permanently resettled in the US. The refugees have been in Tanzania. The first group of approximately 90 Burundians left for the US in early May.

The rest will be flying to the US throughout the remainder of 2007. Phoenix and Atlanta are two of the primary destinations. Burundian refugees interviewed by the UN said that they did not believe it was possible to "integrate locally" in Tanzania. Tribal differences are simply too strong. Returning to Burundi was not an option, either. Many believed their lands and homes had been stolen, and the theft recognized by local authorities.

August 15, 2007: Bad news from Burundi. After resigning from a ceasefire monitoring team, key members of the Forces for National Liberation (FLN) have reportedly returned to the jungle. The FLN is a Hutu organization and one of its factions was the last to join the peace process. The Burundi government is concerned that the FLN splinter group may try to re-ignite the civil war. Up to this point the UN has regarded Burundi as something of a limited peacekeeping success. The official UN force has been withdrawn, though several international contingents remain in Burundi. South Africa has the largest contingent, with around a thousand troops.

August 31, 2007: Rwanda has decided to shake up the East African Community (EAC). The EAC is a very loose regional association, the kind of organization that serves as a platform for the pontificating types. Rwanda wants to turn the EAC into an economic union. Rwanda wants the EAC to end trade barriers. The first step would be to "harmonize" tariffs. but the Rwandan government is really advocating free trade. Over time, free trade and liberalized economies produce greater wealth for more people. East Africa is poor. This is a "regional solution" rather than a "donor-driven solution" (i.e., aid). Rwanda has the right idea. However, tariffs do more than protect political cronies - they also line the pockets of corrupt politicians and bureaucrats. Rwanda has a fight on its hands.

September 9, 2007: In northwest Burundi, fighting between rival factions of the last rebel group, the FNL, left at least twenty dead, and caused over 4,000 civilians to flee the violence. The FNL signed a peace deal with the government a year ago, but disputes within the FNL have prevented the rebels from actually disarming and accepting amnesty. Violence caused by the civil war within the Hutu FNL, and bandits spawned by the various rebel groups, killed about 150 people over the Summer. Not quite peace, more like a crime wave driven by political and ethnic differences. Both Burundi and Rwanda have a centuries old conflict between the Hutu majority, and the better organized Tutsi minority. Tutsi tribes live on both sides of the Congo border with Rwanda and Burundi, and these tribes stick together whenever any Tutsi are threatened.

October 6, 2007: For the last two months, Congo and the UN have been accusing Rwanda of arming a Tutsi militia inside Congo, near the Rwanda border. While Rwanda denied supplying arms to the Congo Tutsis, there were more calls for Congo to do something about the Rwandan Hutu militias that formed from those who fled Rwanda after the 1994 attempt to kill all Tutsi in Rwanda. Of late, the war of words has escalated, with Rwanda media talking about another invasion of eastern Congo by Rwandan troops, to deal with the Hutu guerillas once and for all. It was such an invasion in the 1990s that led to the downfall of the decades old Mobutu dictatorship, and a civil war that has killed millions.

October 10, 2007: Between 1990 and 2001 the Rwandan government spent $8.4 billion on weapons and military equipment, a lot of it from Eastern Europe. Most of the money was spent on small arms and ammunition. During this period the Rwandan economy grew by an average of 2.8 percent a year. If the money spent on weapons had been invested, the economy may have grown up to 4.5 percent a year. But tell that to the people involved. Much of the money was spent from 1990 to 1994, when the then Hutu-led government was fighting the Rwandan Patriotic Front (RPF, a predominantly Tutsi group). After the Tutsi genocide in 1994, the RPF took power. It spent money on arms and ammunition to fight Hutu rebels who had fled into the Congo. It also became involved in the Congo's various wars.

October 11, 2007: The FNL faction, which withdrew from peace negotiations earlier this year has begun to fracture. The PALIPEHUTU -FNL faction has divided into at least four groups. Three of the groups are described as "dissidents" and all of them have indicated to the government that they are interested in renewing peace negotiations. This could be a break for the government, which has been trying to bring the PALIPEHUTU-FNL into the peace process. If it can't bring to the organization to the peace table, perhaps it can bring pieces (so to speak).

October 18, 2007: Rwanda will send a fourth battalion (55th Battalion) to Sudan's Darfur region this month. Three Rwandan Defense Force (RDF) battalions are already in Darfur. The fourth battalion is being deployed as part of the African Union-UN "hybrid" force. It will serve in the El Fasher sector. The lead elements of the battalion left by air for Darfur on October 15th. The unit is trained to use light armored personnel carriers. Currently 18 APCs slated for use by the 55th Battalion are already in Darfur.

November 8, 2007: In Burundi, the last rebel group, the Hutu Paliphehutu-FNL faction, continues to suffer from its own little civil war. One faction of the faction wants to accept amnesty and peace, another faction does not. In the last few weeks, fighting between the two factions has left over a ten dead, and dozens wounded. The government is apparently waiting for the smoke to clear, to find someone to talk to.

Rwanda has backed off on its threats to intervene in the battle against Tutsi rebels just across the border in eastern Congo. Rwanda and Burundi are both run by Tutsi minorities, and Rwanda has often gotten involved in helping Tutsi minorities in neighboring countries. The Tutsis are better organized, and better fighters, than the other tribes in the region.

November 29, 2007: The Burundian government said that Burundian Army and police units fought with elements of the FNL-PALIPEHUTU faction north of the capital of Bujumbura. The government statement followed reports of a "gang attack" on November 28 that killed three people and a hostage taking incident earlier in the week in which two Burundian police officers were seized.

November 30, 2007: A high-ranking group of Belgian defense officials and military officers visited Rwanda to discuss bi-lateral military cooperation. Rwanda was at one time a Belgian colony.

December 6, 2007: East African leaders at a regional security conference in Ethiopia asked the UN to enforce legal and economic sanctions against Rwandan Hutu rebels operating in the Congo. The Rwandan government has been pressing for effective sanctions against the Hutu rebels for almost ten years. Rwanda contends that "several thousand" Rwandan Hutu rebels have bases inside the Congo.

December 8, 2007: The Rwandan government has decided to hire eight commercial court judges from the island of Mauritius. Rwanda wants to improve its business courts and someone in the government has decided to hire Mauritian judges. Rwanda is trying to attract investment and investors want "honest courts" that enforce legal contracts.

December 11, 2007: A spokesman for a Burundian NGO said that that in the first ten months of this year, 393 people in Burundi were either killed by "the police or armed bandits." Given the level of violence that plagued Burundi during its civil war (roughly 1995 to 2006), this bad news ought to be taken in context. The UN estimates that 300,000 people died during the civil war.

December 14, 2007: The African Union said today that Burundi will send a battalion of peacekeepers to Somalia by the end of December.

December 18, 2007: The peace process in Burundi may be stalling. The government there is saying that it intend to take "a tougher stance" against factions in the Forces for National Liberation (FNL) which have reneged on commitments to join the peace process. Burundi's defense ministry reports that in "outlaw" FNL factions have conducted ambushes on roads this Fall as well as taken hostages. No number of alleged attacks was given. The largest "rogue faction" is the FNL-PALIPEHUTU. The FNL-PALIPEHUTU did agree to join the peace process but some of its fighters have reportedly "returned to the bush."

December 23, 2007: A second company of 100 Burundian Army soldiers deployed to Somalia. That makes 200 Burundian soldiers either in Somalia or en route. Burundi has said it will eventually send 1700 soldiers to Somalia.

January 1, 2008: In Burundi, a French relief worker was murdered and a second wounded in an attack by a gunman. The attack took place in Ruyigi (east of Bujumbura). Direct attacks on aid workers such as this are rare. But robbery isn't rare. Concern is rising throughout Burundi about increased violence. The government has attributed the rise in violence to Palipehutu-FNL faction that has quit the peace process (the JVMM The Joint Verification and Monitoring Mechanism in Burundi). Whatever the reason for the attack on the air workers, the murder sows fear among NGOs. Impoverished Burundi is especially dependent on medical aid NGOs.

January 5, 2008: Last year, about 40,000 Burundian refugees returned from camps in Tanzania, and all those camps (housing 110,000 Burundians and 100,000 Congolese) are expected to be closed this year. Meanwhile, at least 10,000 Congolese have fled to Burundi. There, they are fed and housed by foreign aid groups, which also provide food aid to over 60,000 Burundians. Many of those receiving aid are returning refugees. In the last six years, nearly 400,000 Burundians have returned from refugee camps in neighboring countries.

January 9, 2008: The Burundian Army said that three of its soldiers were wounded in a firefight with a group of Palipehutu-FNL rebels. Five FNL rebels were killed in the battle. An FNL spokesman said the government story was false. The FNL fighters were "looking for food" when they were attacked by soldiers. Both the government and FNL agreed that the firefight took place near the town of Musigati. As with so many of these incidents in Africa, the wire services and internet rely on the statements of the government and then the rebel groups. The best check on both of these clearly self-interested sources is information gleaned from NGOs. While these groups often have agendas and slants, the best NGO sources rely on reports from relief personnel on the scene and refugees. Those, too, can be confused, but at least it is another side of the story.

January 13, 2007: The Rwandan government is now paying much closer attention to events in Burundi. Burundi and Rwanda are very similar in demographics – a majority Hutu population with a comparatively wealthy Tutsi minority. While this may seem like now news –a country should always pay attention to events next door – the Rwandan government actually has the 1994 genocide as a riveting reason to pay attention to Burundi. In 1992 fighting between Hutus and Tutsis escalated in Burundi. Atrocities committed by Burundian Tutsi security forces against Burundian Hutus inflamed Hutus in Rwanda. Of course there were attacks by Burundian Hutus on Tutsis. The point is inter-tribal violence fed tribal passions next door. The increase in violence in Burundi is thus especially worrisome to Rwanda. There are some differences of course between 2008 and 1994. There are still peacekeepers in Burundi: the small peacekeeping force in Burundi operates under the auspices of the African Union.

January 30, 3008: The Rwandan government said that it believed military intervention by international forces might be the only way to avoid further ethnic fighting in Kenya. The Rwandan statement emphasized the "quick reaction" was the best way to deal with a crisis. The Rwandan statement was based on Rwanda's experience in 1994 (Rwandan genocide of Tutsis at the hands of radical Hutus).

February 8, 2008: In 2007 the US government gave Rwanda seven million dollars worth of military aid. Much of the money was used to support training programs for the Rwandan Army as well as provide equipment for Rwandan peacekeepers serving in Darfur.

February 10, 2008: Criminals or assassins? The presumption is assassins. Frederique Banvuginyunvira, the head of Burundi's second-largest political party, Front for Democracy in Burundi (Frodebu), was wounded in a grenade attack on his home. His wife and child were killed in the attack. Banvuginyunvira serves as part of the ruling national unity government, headed by the Forces for the Defense of Democracy Party (CNDD-FDD). The attack comes as negotiators are trying to reach a new agreement with rebel Hutu factions.

February 11, 2008: The mandate of South Africa's chief mediator for Burundi, Charles Ngakula, was extended until the end of 2008.

February 12, 2008: The International Criminal Tribunal for Rwanda (ICTR) will end its formal operations sometime in 2008. The UN established the ICTR in November 1994 (UNSCR 955) to prosecute the key instigators of the 1994 Rwandan genocide. The first ICTR initiated trial took place in 1997. At the end of 2007 the ICTR had completed 35 cases. The ICTR has 27 on-going cases. 16 people on the ICTR's wanted list (i.e., people accused of major genocide-related crimes) have yet to be arrested.

February 13, 2008: The Burundian government and the FNL rebel faction, National Liberation Forces–Party for the Liberation of Hutu People (FLN-PALIPEHUTU) will begun face to face talks in late February. It is not clear that this is a break through, but it is a sign of some progress. In July 2007 the FNL-PALIPEHUTU rejected the international mediation team as "biased" in favor of the Burundian government. The UN has estimated that the FNL-PALIPEHUTU still has around 2000 fighters. The FNL faction will be asked to join the Joint Verification and Monitoring Mechanism (JVMM), which oversees the peace process.

February 19, 2008: The US and Rwanda signed a bilateral investment treaty. This is a big deal for Rwanda and potentially a good deal for US investors. Bilateral Investment Treaties (BITs is the acronym) provide legal protections for foreign investors, which is supposed to increase the likelihood they will invest in a developing country. The "legal protection" usually means an international arbitration panel (one beyond the reach of corrupt local officials). BITs, however, serve a political purpose for local leaders who want to promote "the rule of law" and combat corruption. BITs provide a small but potentially powerful means of demonstrating how the "rule of law" reinforces economic development and promotes wealth creation.

March 1, 2008: The Burduni Army claimed it killed 17 rebels belonging to a Forces for National Liberation (FNL) faction. One soldier died in a firefight with the rebels. The shootout occurred in operations following the February 26 slaying of two Burundi Army soldiers in Bujumbura. In the wake of that attack the government accused the FNL of intending to "resume the war" (i.e., rekindle the civil war).

March 13, 2008: Rwanda claims that Rwandan Hutu rebels operating in Congo's North and South Kivu provinces have acquired "outside financing." Well, the accusation is more specific than that. The Democratic Forces for the Liberation of Rwanda (FDLR) controls several key mines. They also control road and river transportation routes for the minerals, and several key airfields. One of the more important mines is a gold mine in South Kivu (at Kilembwe). The FDLR is also "extracting taxes" from locals in Congo. The FDLR does this in several ways. There are "road taxes" (charged when people move goods on roads). The FDLR also controls several market towns and takes a cut of agricultural goods sales in the markets.

April 2, 2008: The UN Peace Building Commission in Burundi has urged the Burundian Government and the FNL to continue Burundi's reconciliation process and implement the 2006 Comprehensive Ceasefire Agreement. The UN report comes as violence has flared in rural Burundi.

In early March grenade attacks were made on the homes of four members of Burundi's parliament in the capital, Bujumbura. In July 2007 the FNL-Palipehutu withdrew from participating the Joint Verification and Monitoring Mechanism (ceasefire monitoring agreement group originally run by UN peacekeeping mission in Burundi).

April 9, 2008: A Burundian Army soldier serving with African Union peacekeeping forces in Somalia died from wounds. The soldier was wounded in a suicide bomb attack April 8. The attack occurred in Mogadishu.

April 17, 2008: A rebel FNL faction mortared a military post outside of Bujumburu.

April 19, 2008: This time it is more than a firefight. The Burundian Army and a rebel faction of the FNL-Palipehutu have engaged in a series of running battles with FNL rebels. This appears to be the biggest outbreak of combat in the last twelve months. The government used attack helicopters against rebels in the Bubanza area northwest of Bujumbura. In the last two days six Burundian soldiers have been killed and an estimated 20 rebels killed. An FNL spokesman said that the government had launched an attack in the area. Bubanza is regarded as an FNL stronghold. The FNL has also denied accusations that the Rwandan Hutu rebel militia in the Congo, the Democratic Forces for the Liberation of Rwanda (FDLR) was aiding the FNL. Both the FDLR and FNL, however, are ethnic Hutu rebel groups.

April 23, 2008: FNL guerrillas fired mortars into Bujumbura. There were no reported casualties.

April 26, 2008: Burundi's president called for international and regional involvement to help stop the new round of fighting that began April 17.

April 30, 2008: Burundian forces launched an air strike on rebel FNL positions in the Rukoko Swamp northwest of Bujumbura. The area is on the Burundi-Congo border and is used as a base camp area and an infiltration route by various rebel groups. The report did not specify the type of aircraft, but Burundi military airstrikes are usually delivered by armed helicopters. There were a series of firefights began on April 28, leaving 17 FNL rebels and four Burundian Army soldiers dead. Given the area where the fighting is taking place, this does look like a government offensive.
May 1, 2008: The Rwandan government is once again emphasizing "anti-genocide ideology" education, especially in Rwanda's Southern province. The Rwandan government uses the term "genocide ideology" to refer to the ethnic and regional tensions which led to the 1994 genocide of Rwandan Tutsis. This is clearly a political information campaign, with a direct person to person component as well as radio programming. Local courts ("Gacaca" traditional courts in many cases) are still prosecuting people who committed crimes during the genocide.

May 4, 2008: Another series of gun battles have broken out between rebel FNL factions and the Burundian Army. A major firefight erupted May 1, ten kilometers from Bujumbura. On May 2 the government reported that four rebel fighters and one Burundian Army soldier had died in what was described as an FNL-initiated ambush. The fighting has displaced 3,500 people. The government continues to reject a new "power-sharing deal" demanded by the FNL rebels.

May 7, 2008: The Burundi government believe that many fighters have left the FNL-PALIPEHUTU and that the faction now has fewer than 3,000 rebels. The faction disputes this count. That said, the 3000 figure has been batted around for several months. Some of the recent firefights have involved several hundred FNL gunmen, who could indicate great strength – or that government forces have hit major rebel bases.

May 8, 2008: The Burundian Army claimed that it had killed 50 members of the FNL-PALIPEHUTU in a series of firefights near Bujumbura (the Kabezi area, 20 kilometers south of the city). Subsequently, the FNL faction said that government forces launched an attack. The rebels said the attack undermined diplomatic moves to restart the Burundi peace process.

May 20, 2008: UN mediators and representatives from sub-Saharan Africa states believe the Burundi peace process is "getting back on track." Contacts with the FNL-PALIPEHUTU have been renewed.

May 30, 2008: The head of a Forces for National Liberation (FNL-PALIPEHUTU) faction that had quit the peace process, returned to Burundi's capital, Bujumbura. A member of the peace mediation team in Burundi said the return of Agathon Rwasa was part of a new push to revive the peace process and put the Comprehensive Peace Agreement into full effect. South African peacekeepers were part of the official contingent that met Rwasa (the contingent included government members and international diplomats). That's telling. Rwasa's FNL faction (Party for the Liberation of the Hutu People) argues that the Burundi military is not trustworthy and cannot be trusted.

June 4, 2008: The Burundian Army's Rapid Mobile Intervention Group (GMIR is the French acronym) is accused of illegal detention and torture in 2007. The GMIR is generally regarded as the Burundian Army's elite force.

July 9, 2008: The Burundian government accused the FNL-PALIPEHUTU of "halting demobilization" and recruiting new rebel fighters. The FNL faction denied the accusation.

July 10, 2008: The UN Security Council voted to end the arms embargo on Rwanda. The embargo had been in effect since the 1994 genocide.

July 18, 2008: Sweden took over as chair of the Burundi Peace building Commission. The commissions is a "country specific" operation designed to monitor and forward Burundi's peace and reconciliation process.

July 20, 2008: The UN Security Council extended the mandate for judges serving with the UN war crimes tribunal tasked with investigating the 1994 Rwandan genocide. The International Criminal Tribunal for Rwanda (ICTR) is headquartered in Arusha, Tanzania. It was created in November 1994.

July 22, 2008: A young woman was killed in a hand grenade attack in Bujumbura. The attacker was allegedly a Burundian soldier. Interestingly enough, the soldier was arrested and charged with murder -a possible sign of change in Burundi.

August 2, 2008: For the last two weeks Rwanda has been telling the UN it will withdraw its peacekeeping contingent from Darfur if the UN insists that Rwanda replace Rwandan General Emmanuel Karake Karenzi. Rwanda, however is emphasizing that it is not issuing an "ultimatum." Still, this is a touchy subject. Karenzi is currently the deputy commander of the UNAMID force in Darfur. This is a prestigious position and Rwanda is proud of Karenzi's senior status. Karenzi, however, has also been indicted in Spain for war crimes (specifically "reprisal killings in Rwanda") he allegedly committed during the 1990s. A UN group had been investigating Karenzi's actions in a major battle in 2000 in the Congolese town of Kisangani, but that incident was not involved in the Spanish indictment. The Spanish indictment mentions two towns (Mukingo and Nyakinama) in Rwanda where Karenzi was allegedly involved in the murder of ethnic Rwandan Hutus. Rwanda has 2600 soldiers and police in Darfur with UNAMID. A Rwandan withdrawal would put the entire UNAMID peacekeeping effort in jeopardy. On July 31, Rwanda's president Paul Kagame took on more than the Spanish indictment. Kagame accused the UN's International Criminal Court (ICC) of practicing "imperialism." Kagame contends the ICC targets African countries, specifically "poor countries."

August 20, 2008: The Rwandan government continues to accuse France of "playing an active role" in the 1994 genocide of Rwandan Tutsis. Rwanda argues that French military trainers helped arm Hutu extremists. France denies the charges.

August 24, 2008: The Burundi military claimed that a Palipehutu-FNL (Forces for National Liberation) rebel group ambushed several soldiers near the town of Murwi. One soldier was killed in the firefight.

August 27, 2008: A senior Palipehutu-FNL leader claimed that Burundian security forces had a plan to assassinate FNL leaders. Agathon Rwasa made the claim on a BBC News program. The FNL provided no proof.

September 3, 2008: Rwanda has promised the Congo government that it will help accelerate the "disarmament and demobilization" of the Congolese rebel militia the Democratic Forces for the Liberation of Rwanda (FDLR). The militia includes Rwandan Hutus who belonged to the Interahamwe.

September 8, 2008: The UN has issued a new assessment of Burundi's peace process. The "positive developments" include a "cessation of hostilities" - at least for the most part. However, the UN analysis notes that there remain numerous problems that will take compromise. The most important goal is integrating the Palipehutu-FNL faction into the September 2006 Comprehensive Ceasefire Agreement. That is proceeding. However, to say the least, Burundi is impoverished. Trouble in neighboring Congo constantly presents Burundi with the threat of "spill - over violence" and even renewed violence. Burundi's domestic political scene is chaotic - there are 34 political parties. That noted, the parties are for the most part engaged in politics, not combat. The face to face meeting between Burundi's president. Pierre Nkrununziza, and a senior Palipehutu-FNL leader (on August 18) is regarded as a major step toward reconciliation. Control of the security forces (especially the Burundian Army) remains a problem. The UN code phrase is "rule of law within security forces." That's an important phrase, and one that is tough to implement.

September 29, 2008: New power transmission connection from Ethiopia to Sudan’

ENERGY: Hifab Oy has signed a new agreement with the Ethiopian Electric Power Corporation (EEPCo) for the supervision of construction of a new power transmission connection from Ethiopia to Sudan. The main benefit of this interconnection is the possibility to transfer excess Ethiopian hydro power to the neighbouring country, thus replacing expensive oil -based thermal generation in Sudan and reducing greenhouse gas emissions. Hifab Oy, together with its JV partner Fichtner from Germany, will supervise the construction of the transmission lines and substation on the Ethiopian side. The value of the consultancy contract is EUR 1.5 million, and it will be completed in 20 months. The financing of the Ethiopia-Sudan project is from the World Bank. Ethiopia-Sudan is a third consecutive contract between EEPCO and Hifab Oy during 2008.

October 15, 2008: Burundi has deployed 850 soldiers with the African Union peacekeeping force in Somalia (AMISOM peacekeeping force).

October 21, 2008: A South African spokesman said that the peace process in Burundi had "deadlocked." The Burundian government rejects the FNL-Palipehutu faction's demand that it keep the name "Palipehutu" once it becomes a political party. The name roughly translates as "Hutu people's liberation party." The government says a political party cannot be based on ethnic affiliations. This rates a snicker because all but a handful of sub-Saharan African political parties have a central ethnic group or tribal group at their core. But there is a certain understanding about these things. The FNL-Palipehutu could re-name itself "The Burundi Party for Social Welfare and Development" or "The African Congress for Unity Party" or something similar and that would be cricket. It would still be a Hutu-based party but the name would imply at least a notion of a "bigger tent."

October 28, 2008: Burundi and Tanzania signed a security partnership agreement. Tanzania will help train Burundian security forces.

October 29, 2008: Rwanda accused Congolese troops of firing into Rwandan territory from Congolese soil. The Rwandan report said that "an incursion" took place as Congolese Army forces were fighting with a Tutsi rebel group inside Congo.

November 8, 2008: Rwanda and Germany continue to be at diplomatic loggerheads. Rwanda has expelled a senior German envoy in response to the arrest of a Rwandan diplomat arrested in Germany, The Rwandan, Rose Kabuye, is allegedly involved in the shooting down of President Juvenal Habyarimana's airplane in 1994. The Germans arrested Kabuye based on a French warrant. Habyarimana's airplane had a French aircrew, which also died when the plane went down on April 6, 1994. Hutus accused the Tutsi-led Rwandan Patriotic Front of shooting down the aircraft. In the wake of the crash radical Rwandan Hutus launched genocidal attacks on Tutsis throughout the country.

November 12, 2008: The government formally arrested one of Burundi's main opposition leaders, Alexis Sinduhje (who heads the Movement for Security and Democracy, or MSD). He had been under "detention" for nine days.

November 17, 2008: The governments of Rwanda and Congo said that they had agreed to cooperate to "uproot" the Forces for the Democratic Liberation of Rwanda (FDLR), which continues to operate in eastern Congo. The FDLR is run by former members of the radical Rwandan Hutu Interahamwe.

November 21, 2008: The Rwandan government denies that it intends to "annex" parts of eastern Congo. The government says allegations that it is providing logistical support for Congolese Tutsis under the command of General Laurent Nkunda are false. Still, Nkunda's forces also seem to have reliable supply lines in an isolated corner of the Congo. He is getting re - supplied. Sure, Uganda remains a possibility, as does Burundi. Tribal ties are very important socially, culturally, and politically in sub-Saharan Africa and that makes Tutsi-led Rwanda the most-likely source for supplies, and even experienced soldiers from the Rwandan army, reaching Nkunda's militiamen.

December 4, 2008: The Forces for National Liberation-Palipehutu (FNL)-Palipehutu) agreed to change their "unconstitutional name" for a political party, i.e. Palipehutu. The word is a contraction of the French words for "Party for the Liberation of the Hutu People." According to the deal worked out with the Burundian government, the FNL-Palipehutu's new name for their political party can include the tribe name "Hutu." How this plays out of the next few months remains to be seen. This "name game" has been a major stumbling block in peace negotiations.

December 6, 2008: The Rwandan government said that it had discussed conducting "joint disarmament operations" against Interahamwe Hutu militias operating in the Congo-Rwanda border region with the Congolese government. The Democratic Forces for the Liberation of Rwanda (FDLR) were specifically mentioned. The Rwandan government has sought the elimination of the FDLR since 1994. The Hutu radicals who formed the FDLR played key roles in the 1994 Tutsi genocide. What would a "joint disarmament operation" look like? The Rwandan Army is superior to Congo's forces. "Joint" could mean permission to attack the FDLR in Congolese territory – with Congolese observers watching the action. That would not be too different from Uganda's deal with Sudan, which allowed the Ugandan Army to operate against the Lords Resistance Army in southern Sudan.

December 15, 2008: Some 94,000 Burundian refugees have returned home since January 2008. This signals that a lot of people believe Burundi's peace deal is going to hold up. However, the returnees create a lot of problems. Immediate shelter and food for returnees is one problem. Providing farming implements and seeds is another (most Burundians are farmers). There is also the issue of land ownership. Because some of the refugees have "been in exile for years," squatters or neighbors have been using the property. This problem occurs throughout the world. It happened in Bosnia and it is happening in northern Uganda. The trick is to sort it out using legal methods instead of starting a new war.

December 16, 2008: The Rwandan government UN allegations it supports militias fighting in eastern Congo. The report tied the Rwandan government to General Laurent Nkunda's National Congress for the Defense of the People (CNDP).

December 24, 2008: Implementing the latest agreement between the Burundian government and the FNL remains a huge problem for peace mediators. The FNL-Palipehutu have officially agreed to participate in the peace process and this means demobilizing guerilla fighters in assembly areas. The assembly areas will be monitored by outsiders, but the level of trust between the FNL's fighters and the Burundian Army is very low. Apparently Tanzania played a key role in pressuring the FNL-Palipehutu to agree to drop its "illegal name" on December 4. The FNL wants some "follow-up" by Burundi's neighbors to guarantee security during the demobilizing and reintegration process.

February 1, 2009: The Rwandan government said that its troops, which are operating in Congo against the FDLR, will pull out by the end of February. The Rwandan force is still called an “observer force” but is carrying out military operations inside the Congo.

A statement by the Congolese government indicated that it did not expect former general Laurent Nkunda (under arrest in Rwanda) to be extradited to Congo "soon" but that would come in time.

February 10, 2009: International observers monitoring the Rwanda-Congo joint operation against the FDLR hope that the Rwanda-Congo action will "intimidate" FDLR militiamen and they will disarm without further fighting. The UN believes that very few "Interahame genocidaires" actually remain in Congo. Many Rwandan Hutus who fled Rwanda after 1994 have "assimilated" into Congolese society and have warned Rwanda and Congo against indiscriminate attacks.

February 15, 2009: Mediators in Burundi have had a tough months trying to get the government and representatives of the FNL-PALIPEHUTU to firm up their peace agreement. The PALIPEHUTU faction is once again insisting that it get to keep its name as it transitions to a political party. The name is an acronym for "party for the liberation of the Hutu people" and the government objects to ethnic parties. There are other problems. The original peace agreement promised to demobilize Forces for National Liberation fighters (of various FNL factions). The total number is around 20,000 and mediators report the demobilization process is "going slowly." Major elections are scheduled for 2010, but some mediators fear that the FNL-PALIPEHUTU could "head for the bush" once again in 2009 – and rekindle the civil war.

In the eastern Congo, Rwandan troops have been seen pulling back towards the border. The Rwandan government has said it would have its troops out of Congo by the end of February, or thereabouts.

February 23, 2009: Where is former Congolese general Laurent Nkunda? Since his arrest (or, alleged arrest) by Rwandan forces operating in the Congo, the word is he is being held in Rwanda's capital , Kigali. The Congolese government wants him extradited to the Congo, or at least claims to want him extradited. The Rwandan government says that Nkunda is Congolese and he will be "returned" to the Congo eventually. What happens if and when Nkunda returns to the Congo? That remains to be seen. Many Congolese believe Nkunda is responsible for keeping the war going in eastern Congo. That is a big stretch, but the perception is there: Nkunda might serve as a scapegoat. However, actually trying Nkunda in Kinshasa might have political repercussions among Congolese Tutsis that the Kabila government doesn't want. Even though the Democratic Forces for the Liberation of Rwanda

(FDLR) militia still has forces operating in eastern Congo, the deal brokered between Rwanda and Congo looks pretty good. Congo got Nkunda off the immediate political and military landscape. Nkunda's National Congress for the Defense of the People (CNDP) is now run by Congolese Tutsis who want to strike a deal with the Congolese government. Rwanda has hammered the FDLR (whose leaders were involved in the 1994 genocide) and has a new "alliance relationship" with Congo. Rwanda and Congo, however, continue to insist that Nkunda's arrest was not "linked" to the Congolese agreement launch a joint attack against the FDLR. (And if you believe that we've a bridge to sell you running from Manhattan to Brooklyn.)

February 22, 2009: Eleven Burundian troops serving with African Union peacekeeping forces in Somali died in an attack by suicide bombers sent by the Islamist extremist organization, al-Shabaab. The Burundi contingent was in Somalia's capital, Mogadishu.

February 27, 2009: Rwandan military forces in the Congo completed their withdrawal from the Congo. The withdrawal began on February 25. The operation (called "Unoja Vetu", which is Swahili for "Our Unity") began on January 20.

March 2, 2009: UN reports said that FDLR Rwandan Hutu rebels who "scattered" when Rwandan forces attacked them in eastern Congo have returned to several Congolese villages as the Rwandan Army withdraws. The Congo government disagreed with the UN assessment, claiming that the FDLR contingents were conducting small raids (and accused them of "looting") but were not retaking villages. This is not the news from UN observers the Rwandan military wants to hear. However, the Rwandan government appears to be satisfied with the joint operation with Congolese forces. The Rwandan military believes it hit the FDLR hard – the official statement says the FDLR wasn't destroyed but its "operational capacities" were reduced. No one is quite sure, but an estimated 5,000 Rwandan Hutus were "repatriated" to Rwanda. Many of these people were not FDLR fighters but were family or displaced persons. The Rwandan military claims it killed 153 FDLR fighters in the offensive. The Congo-Rwanda alliance claims it lost eight soldiers. Moreover, it sent the clear message that it is prepared to strike them again, with the Congolese government as an ally.

March 4, 2009: The Burudian Hutu rebel group FNL (Forces for National Liberation-PALIPEHUTU) has demanded that the Burundian Army return a cache of weapons the army discovered and seized on March 3. The weapons cache was located just outside Burundi's capital, Bujumbura. The FNL is now part of the "peace process", which explains in part why the rebels have the brass to demand the military return their weapons. An FNL spokesman said that the cache would have been turned in as part of Burundi's official Disarmament, Demobilization and Reintegration (DDR) process for former rebel fighters. The cache had 40 AK-47s, four submachine guns, and two 60 mm mortars – in First World military terms a platoon but in FNL terms a major unit (it had mortars for fire support). The cache also contained ammunition and explosives.

March 5, 2009: Is the Rwandan pullout from Congo really complete? Right now no one is sure but there is some evidence that a cadre of Rwandans remains in the Congo. It makes sense for the Rwandans to leave liaison officers and observers with Congolese forces.

March 14, 2009: The Rwandan government now says discussions "are delayed" with the government of Congo concerning what to do with former Congolese rebel leader Laurent Nkunda. Rwanda says Congo asked for the delay. Congo has said it wants to extradite Nkunda and return him to the Congo for trial. Congo let Rwanda send troops into eastern Congo to fight Rwandan Hutu rebel militias. The quid pro quo was Rwanda's arrest of Nkunda. Both nations deny this but at the time Rwanda and Congo said they had agreed that Nkunda needed to be arrested.

March 16, 2009: The Rwandan government is making what appears to be a serious attempt to curb corruption. Five senior officials have been fired and prosecuted recently, and dozens of lower ranking officials suffered the same fate. But, like the most of Africa, the corruption is pervasive, and a major drag on the economy. The corruption is the main reason African economies have declined in the last half century, while those everywhere else in the world have grown. The corruption is also the underlying cause of the many wars that still rage in Africa.

April 6, 2009: A contingent of Rwandan Army forces conducted a raid into the Congo. The operation was described as a "joint operation" with the Congolese Army to disarm FDLR militiamen. Rwanda and Congo have said that they will continue to conduct joint anti-FDLR militia operations.

April 7, 2009: The Rwandan government held ceremonies commemorating the 15th anniversary of the Rwandan genocide. Around 800,000 Tutsi people and Hutu moderates were slain by Interahamwe Hutu militias and their tribal allies.

April 18, 2009: Burundi's Forces for National Liberation (FNL) formally surrendered to the government. A senior FNL commander surrendered at a ceremony in the town of Rubira (near the capital, Bujumbura) and said that the FNL is not going to "resume war." That may or may not prove to be true, but after 13 years of civil war Burundi is exhausted. The FNL will now become a political party.

April 20, 2009: The Laurent Nkunda's sage continues. A Rwandan court panel rejected an appeal by Nkunda's lawyer that he be freed from custody because his arrest was illegal. Nkunda is under "house arrest" in Rwanda. He was arrested by Rwandan forces when they invaded Congo to attack FDLR sanctuaries in January. The Congolese had warrants for Nkunda but apparently didn't want the political problem of arresting him - Rwanda could arrest the Tutsi leader and face less political blowback. Congo claims to want to bring him back to Congo for trial. Maybe, maybe not. The Rwandan government has said since the arrest that removing Nkunda was "fundamental" to forwarding peace in eastern Congo.

April 21, 2009: African Union peacekeepers are helping the Burundian government disarm FNL (Forces for National Liberation) fighters as part of the new demobilization and reintegration process for former FNL rebels. AU peacekeepers are manning five demobilization points around the country. There are approximately 21,000 former FNL rebels in Burundi. The Burundian Army and various police organizations have agreed to employ 3500 former rebels. Around 12,500 have already returned home. However, the AU estimates that another 5000 must be demobilized. There are still a lot of light weapons in Burundi. The government estimates that from 100,000 to 300,000 illegal arms remain in the country --and a significant number of them are AK-47s. Other African countries have faced this problem as war subsides and a hesitant peace begins. The Congo Republic (Brazzaville) confronted a similar "small arms threat." Many former fighters do go home but there is always the possibility that a few will decide to continue to live as guerrillas, except now they become bandits. They are bandits armed liked guerrilla fighters and bandits with the skills of experienced guerrilla fighters.

April 30, 2009: Rwanda and Congo continue to argue that their joint offensive against the FDLR was a success, but more and more Congolese civilians complain that the FDLR has returned. FDLR factions are conducting reprisal raids in the Congo. The FDLR militiamen suspect Congolese villagers told the Congolese government and UN peacekeepers their whereabouts and now it is payback time.

May 8, 2009: The Rwandan government reported that "returnees" from the Congo (i.e., members of the Democratic Forces for the Liberation of Congo, FDLR, who were responsible for the 1994 genocide) continue to arrive. Between 140 and 150 FDLR members are surrendering each month in the Congo and going through a "voluntary disarmament, demobilization, and repatriation" program run by the UN. Congo then returns the militia fighters to Rwanda. Around 3,000 dependents (i.e., of FDLR fighters) have also returned to Rwanda since Rwanda and Congo conducted a joint offensive against the FDLR in January 2009.

May 12, 2009: Many of the 20,000 Rwandan Hutu refugees in Uganda are fleeing refugee camps, rather than return to Rwanda. The UN ordered the refugee camps emptied by the end of July, and many of refugees fear prosecution for participation in the 1994 massacre of Tutsis.

May 14, 2009: In Burundi, 203 members of the FNL (Hutu National Liberation Front) were freed from jail as part of a peace deal. The FNL also registered itself as a political party (joining 41 others) and released the last 136 teenage soldiers from its combat units. Some 2,000 adult fighters were also demobilized from the FNL.

May 15, 2009: Rwanda has a major criminal problem with smuggling (via Lake Kivu) from Congo. The eastern Congo has been lawless for over a decade because of banditry, renegade militias and civil war. Rwanda is seeking to obtain speedboats for the police so they can deal with the Lake Kivu smugglers.

The demobilization of Hutu rebels in Burundi during the last year did not result in all weapons being turned in. Hundreds of hand grenades ended up on the black market, where they sell for as little as a dollar each. The grenades are used by criminals, or to settle feuds, and last year, killed nearly 150 people. There are still over 100,000 (and as many as 300,000) illegal weapons in Burundi (which has a population of nearly seven million, of whom 83 percent are Hutu and 13 percent Tutsi.) Not all of the FNL rebels have given up violence, and some are still running death squads and attacking government officials they disagree with. But this is low level, with one or two deaths a month.

June 1, 2009: All about the violent competition between better organized and more aggressive Tutsis and more numerous Hutu tribes. It's been going on for centuries, but the latest installment has finally ended, with the last Hutu group in Burundi giving up, then changing its mind, but not making nearly as much trouble as in the past. Rwanda blamed for continuing violence in eastern Congo, as they attempt to destroy Hutu terrorists based there. But now Rwanda is cooperating with Congo and the UN peacekeepers to shut down Tutsi militia in eastern Congo.

June 13, 2009: UN and Congolese army troops have been unable, after nearly a year of trying, to dismantle or push into Rwanda, the FDLR rebels (formed by Hutu participants in the 1994 genocide against Tutsis in Rwanda). Despite fifteen years of peacemaking in Rwanda and Burundi, the hostility between Hutus and Tutsi remains.

June 15, 2009: The UN is trying to close refugee camps in Tanzania that have housed Burundian Hutu refugees. Some of the Burundians "DPs" (displaced persons) have lived in the camps since the 1970s, having fled Burundi following the Tutsi versus Hutu ethnic violence in 1972. In 2002, as part of the Burundian peace process, the UN began encouraging Burundian Hutus to move back. The program accelerated in 2008 as Hutu guerrilla holdouts joined the peace process. The program includes new housing in Burundi. When the refugees return (and become "returnees") they often find their former lands occupied by someone else or used by someone else. This has occurred in northern Uganda, where returnees have also found their old homes and land taken over by other families. This situation leads to conflict. The trick is to settle the conflict in court instead of with rifles and grenades. Money talks, and this is a case where international aid money does forward peace.

June 19, 2009: Fifty-seven former members of the Rwandan Hutu-led Democratic Forces for the Liberation of Rwanda (FDLR) were repatriated to Rwanda in the last month.

June 27, 2009: Hand grenades sell for roughly one US dollar on the black market. The hand grenades are "war leftovers" and they are being used by criminals in robberies. A government study reported that 616 people were killed in "acts of violence" in Burundi in 2008, 22 percent were killed with hand grenades.

June 29, 2009: South Africa will withdraw its 1,100 peacekeepers from Burundi, as it appears that the peace deal currently in place, is working.

July 1, 2009: Burundi is upgrading its police weapons depots and storage facilities. During the long civil war, guerrillas frequently struck police stations. Killing police was one goal but obtaining weapons was usually the primary objective.
July 14, 2009: The UN's International Criminal Tribunal for Rwanda (ICTR) continues its dismal job of investigating the 1994 genocide and trying accused mass murderers. The court has convicted a major political figure in the genocide, Tharcisse Renzaho. Renzaho (governor of the Kigali district in 1994). He received a life sentence on five capital counts (including genocide and two counts of murder).

July 21, 2009: Rwanda and Congo have decided to continue to improve political ties. The process began with the joint operation earlier this year against the Rwandan Hutu-led Democratic Forces for the Liberation of Rwanda (FDLR). Rwanda and Congo have upgraded diplomatic ties (exchanged ambassadors) and are exploring ways to improve economic cooperation. The countries have been enemies since the mid-1990s. One of the issues the two countries intend to address is the FDLR, which continues to attack Congolese civilians.

July 26, 2009: The whereabouts of former rebel Congolese leader, General Laurent Nkunda, are a subject of conjecture in both Rwanda and Congo. Officially Nkunda is under arrest in Rwanda. Nkunda was arrested in January 2009 when Rwandan military forces entered the Congo and conducted a joint operation against the FDLR.

July 27, 2009: Rwanda announced that it is considering future joint military operations with the Congolese government. The Democratic Forces for the Liberation of Rwanda (FDLR, a radical Hutu organization) is in the process of reconstituting its militia forces in the Congo. A Rwandan senior leader said that the military operations could be launched "on short notice."

August 11, 2009: The Burundian government is attempting to consolidate refugee camps. Burundi, which is at the moment accepting Burundian refugees returning from Tanzania, has at least 30,000 refugees, the majority from the Congo. The government, with aid from the UNHCR, is moving 2,500 Congolese refugees to a camp in Ruyigi province (eastern Burundi). Many of the refugees are Congolese Tutsis.

August 21, 2009: Rwanda is waging political war on the Democratic Forces for the Liberation of Rwanda (FDLR), the predominantly Hutu militia operating in the eastern Congo. The Rwandan government is calling for the prosecution of FDLR leaders and their "international" supporters. This could mean several things, but Rwanda has claimed that former FDLR leaders are in exile in Europe. The Rwandan government also wants the UN to enforce sanctions on the FDLR.

August 31, 2009: Burundi announced that it had completed its latest disarmament and reintegration program. The government made the announcement in mid-August. Burundi has conducted several "Disarmament, integration, and training" programs. This one began in April 2009. All told, the government claims that 16,948 former fighters have passed through the disarmament and reintegration process.

September 2, 2009: A US congressional delegation visiting Rwanda told the government that is was impressed with Rwanda's recovery from the 1994 genocide. The group also praised Rwanda's efforts at improving its health care system and education system.

September 18, 2009: Twelve Burundian soldiers serving with the African Union (AU) peacekeeping mission in Somalia (AMISOM) were killed when two bomb-laden vehicles blew up in Mogadishu. The Somali Islamist organization Al Shabaab used two cars with United Nations insignia.

September 19, 2009: Several Burundian opposition political parties have demanded that the government pull its troops out of the AU Somali peacekeeping force (AMISOM). The demand came after 12 Burundian soldiers died in a terror bomb attack in Mogadishu. The Burundian peacekeeping contingent in Somalia is becoming an increasingly tough political issue for the government.

September 20, 2009: Has Burundi been successful in forwarding the peace process? When the last National Liberation Forces (FLN) splinter group, the FNL-Palipehutu agreed to join the peace process, many observers thought the fighting was finally over. Several senior FNL leaders got positions in the government and military as "reintegration" became the code word. In April 2009 the international committee guiding the peace process got an agreement with the government to place 3500 former FNL fighters in the Burundian Army. Now a number of critics aren't so sure. It is clear that the FNL-Palipehutu has not turned in all of its weapons. The big elections scheduled for 2010 may not be peaceful. Several hotheads have suggested they will return to violence if the elections don't produce the results they like. Fractures in Hutu political parties have appeared, and Hutus who joined the peace process before the FNL-Palipehutu do not like the new political competition. Some members of the FNL are still “collecting taxes” in the hinterland (which means they are robbing people). Former FNL fighters are also being recruited by Hutu militias fighting in the Democratic Republic of Congo. At one time these were rumors but the rumors have now been confirmed as the militiamen have talked to the foreign press. The lower-ranking rebel fighters say the senior leaders (in the FNL) have done okay, but that most rebels do not have jobs. Many received a “disarmament and reintegration” bonus of around $100, but not all. The fighter say Congolese militias (like the Democratic Forces for the Liberation of Rwanda) offer them as much as $500 to join. That kind of money looks real good.

September 23, 2009: Rwanda continues to modernize its military. Rwandan troops serving with the UN-AU peacekeeping force in Darfur (UNAMID) have gained valuable experience on that deployment. The government has also introduced a number of programs over the last three years to professionalize the military. The Rwandan Army has “cross training” programs with several countries, including Belgium. There, 53 Rwandan soldiers have completed training courses at Belgium's Royal Military Academy.

September 28, 2009: An unidentified attacker threw a grenade into the market in the town of Karamba, Rwanda. Four people were killed and 47 wounded. The attacker fled on a motorcycle.

October 13, 2009: Congo and Burundi said they have completed negotiations designed to facilitate the return of 2,500 Congolese citizens from Burundi to the Congo. The refugees fled fighting in Congo's South Kivu province in 2004. This marks a change in the Congo government's approach, which had initially refused to accept them. Burundi regards some of the refugees as potential security problems. The refugees recently rioted to protest what they see as the lack of concern by both governments. Burundian police had to break up the protest.

October 19, 2009: A document allegedly written by Congolese Tutsi leader (and former general) Laurent Nkunda is making the rounds in east and central Africa. Nkunda is now under arrest by the Rwandan government. He was arrested in January 2009 by Rwandan troops inside the Congo as Congolese and Rwandan forces began a joint attack on the FDLR. The chief points made in the alleged Nkunda “manifesto” is that he sees himself as leading an “ethnic Tutsi” insurgency and that current national borders need to be changed. Nkunda also claims that he was not a “proxy” warlord for Rwanda and never received arms and ammunition from Rwanda.

October 23, 2009: A senior Al Shabaab spokesman (Somalia's Islamist group) threatened to launch suicide bomber attacks on Uganda and Burundi. The spokesman threatened to bomb targets in Kampala (Uganda's capital) and in Bujumbura (Burundi's capital). Both Uganda and Burundi have troop contingents serving with African Union peacekeeping forces in Somalia, and there have been frequent battles between these peacekeepers and local Islamic radicals. The peacekeepers tend to win all these battles.

November 4, 2009: Burundi conducted a ten-day long “weapons turn-in” program. The government has been concerned about the ready availability of weapons and ammunition among former guerrilla fighters. The “national disarmament commission” (as it is called) has come up with a trade-in deal. Citizens who turn in weapons and ammunition can receive mobile phones (a very popular item), farm tools, and construction materials. The recent ten-day drive was regarded as a success. People turned in 2,482 rifles, 789,000 rounds of ammunition, 10, 429 grenades, and 28 mines. “Other explosive devices” were also turned in (presumably home-made bombs, but you take a guess). The government has also passed a law restricting possession of fire arms.

November 6, 2009: Rwanda has been a stalwart contributor to peacekeeping operations in Africa. Recently a Rwanda contingent (a reinforced company) returned from a year's duty in Darfur with the AU-UN “hybrid” UNAMID peacekeeping force. The contingent was part of Rwanda's 9th Battalion, which is deployed in Darfur. The battalion has around 800 troops. 3200 Rwandan troops (four battalions) are serving with UNAMID.

November 10, 2009: Infighting among Burundian Hutu leaders associated with the old National Liberation Forces (FNL) has split the Hutu political movement. The FNL is now a political party. Recently the ousted FNL leader Agathom Rwasa. Rwasa warned the government that splits inside the FNL could lead to violence during next year's election. Rwasa currently serves in the coalition government.

November 18, 2009: The Rwandan government thanked Germany for arresting a former Hutu leader who was once head of the FDLR. The Germans arrested Ignace Murwanashyaka and his deputy, Straton Musoni. Both men are charged with war crimes and crimes against humanity. The FDLR was organized by ethnic Hutus who were involved in the 1994 genocide and who managed to flee Rwanda to the eastern Congo.

November 21, 2009: The Rwandan government acknowledged that the Democratic Forces for the Liberation of Rwanda (FDLR, a Rwandan Hutu militia) is still fighting in the Congo. The government said that the FDLR has apparently managed to get a few new recruits from Rwanda.

November 29, 2009: Rwanda joined the British Commonwealth of Nations. Rwanda is a former German and Belgian colony. Rwanda also has ties to many French-speaking African nations. However, Rwanda thinks it has more in common with the Commonwealth. Uganda and Kenya are key Rwandan trading partners and both are former British colonies. Mozambique (which was a Portuguese colony) joined the Commonwealth in the 1990s.

December 5, 2009: Two Rwandan peacekeepers were killed in Sudan's Darfur region. The men were serving with the UNAMID peacekeeping force. Three Rwandan soldiers were killed the day before in an ambush in Darfur.

December 15, 2009: Burundi's National Independent Electoral Commission (CENI) announced that national elections will be held on June 28, 2010.

December 17, 2009: The UN Security Council extended its political mission Burundi through the end of 2010. The UN Integrated office in Burundi (BINUB) was established in 2006. BINUB has been directed to help monitor Burundi's national elections.

December 18, 2009: The UN extended Rwanda's genocide tribunals until 2012. There are still a number of cases remaining from the 1994 genocide. Cases are supposed to conclude by mid-2010, but can be appealed through the end of 2012.

December 22, 2009: Ethiopia death sentences over assassination plot - BBC’

An Ethiopian court has sentenced five people to death and 33 others to life in prison for planning to assassinate government officials.

(BBC) Prosecutors had said the convicted were part of the Ginbot 7 (15 May) group led by Berhanu Nega, a US-based dissident. He was among those sentenced to death, as was opposition leader Melaku Tefera. Mr Melaku was present in the Addis Ababa courtroom with 27 other accused. Some of the defendants have said they were tortured into confessing. Convicting the men in November, Judge Adem Ibrahim said the court had not been convinced of the torture allegations. The authorities have said they found weapons, including land mines, at the men's homes when they were arrested in April. Army officers sentenced: "The... five have committed grave offences and four of them have not learnt from their previous sentences," said Judge Adem passing down the sentences. "Therefore, we have been been obliged to give the most severe sentences." Relatives of the men broke down in the courtroom as the sentences were read out, says the BBC's Uduak Amimo in Addis Ababa. The death sentences were reserved for what the court called the political leaders of the plot, while those sentenced to life imprisonment were active or former military officers, AFP news agency said. Lawyers for the defence said they would appeal. Andergachew Tsege, secretary general of Ginbot 7 and one of those sentenced to death in absentia, told the BBC's Focus on Africa programme the ruling was not unexpected. "It is not surprising to us and probably to the people of Ethiopia," he said. "We know the price of freedom - the preservation of rights always forces us to pay sacrifice and if that sacrifice means to be sentenced to death, so be it."

Ethnic apartheid: The authorities have long accused Mr Berhanu of spearheading opposition plots. He was arrested after being elected mayor of Addis Ababa in 2005 and jailed for treason. He was pardoned in 2007 and left for the United States, where he began teaching economics at a university.

Ginbot 7 was named after the date of the 2005 elections, which Prime Minister Meles Zenawi's party won, but which the opposition said was rigged. Mr Berhanu denies engaging in armed struggle against the government, but Mr Andergachew said attempts to engage in peaceful politics had failed to deliver. "The political space in Ethiopia for peaceful struggle has been killed by Meles, so we have no choice," Mr Andergachew said.

"As long as they [the government] refuse to listen, we will use any means possible to force them to listen or to force them out of office." Rights groups have expressed concern that the government is trying to silence dissent before Ethiopia holds its next national election in June 2010. Mr Andergachew said Ginbot 7 was angered that political and economic life in Ethiopia was dominated by Mr Meles's Tigrean ethnic group. "They are building what we call an ethnic apartheid in Ethiopia," he said. (Text ends)

December 25, 2009: The UN has been touting Burundi's 2010 elections as a milestone. However, a lot of Burudians are talking as if they believe the elections will be big trouble. No, it isn't that they are against elections, the worried think that many of the political factions see the elections as a chance to stoke discontent and trigger violence. One sign of this is the many Burundi political parties with “youth wings”. The young don't have jobs, a lot aren't in school. It is easy to get them to throw rocks –and to try to get a reaction from the security forces. Though a lot of illegal weapons have been turned in (the government gave cell phones to people who turned in weapons) everyone believes that a lot of weapons remain, hidden in Bujumbura (the capital) but especially in caches in the countryside. Some former rebels may be banking on electoral fraud and ballot troubles. It will give them a reason to contest the election. A South African research outfit said that some of the political parties are now or plan to re-arm their militias. The militias will be used to intimidate voters.

December 28, 2009: An anti-corruption NGO in Burundi alleged that the government stole $1.6 million from the 2009 budget.

January 10, 2010: A UN advisory panel reported that Burundi's intelligence agency has been providing “military support” to the Democratic Forces for the Liberation of Rwanda (FDLR), a radical Hutu militia operating in eastern Congo.

January 11, 2010: A key member of the Peace and Democracy Union (UPD), a Burundian opposition party, was murdered north of Bujumbura (Burundi's capital). Sylvere Niyonzima was reportedly standing in a bar when a man wearing a mask came into the bar and fired eight shots at him at close range. Burundian opposition groups accused the government of plotting the assassination.

January 12, 2010: The Rwandan government released a long-awaited report on the assassination of President Juvenal Habyarimana. Habyarimana was murdered in 1994 when a shoulder-fired anti-aircraft missile struck his plane as he was flying into Rwanda's capital, Kigali. His assassination was used by Hutu extremists as a reason to launch their anti-Tutsi genocide. Habyarimana was himself an ethnic Hutu. The government report (which according to one source included interviews with almost 600 witnesses) concluded that Hutu extremists were responsible for Habyarimana's death. A number of Hutus claim the report is a fraud.

January 14, 2010: The Rwandan government said that it had investigated three grenade attacks that occurred in December 2009 and a fourth attack that occurred in early January. The government report said the actions were criminal involving thefts and personal feuds. However, one attack was related to an impending genocide trial. Two potential witnesses were murdered in that attack. The string of attacks had led to speculation that a rebel group was launching attacks in Rwanda. Sub-Saharan Africa has a lot of weapons floating around, dangerous leftovers from the various wars afflicting the region. The Republic of Congo (Brazzaville) and Burundi have both run major weapons turn-in programs, but media constantly report that Kalashnikov assault rifles, land mines, and grenades can be quickly acquired by anyone with cash. Rwanda has had a similar program and in 2009 the government claimed it destroyed 30,248 small arms that it had confiscated or acquired.

January 21, 2010: A year after Rwanda and Congo launched a joint offensive against the FDLR, Laurent Nkunda is back in the news. A Rwandan court has postponed a hearing on a request by Nkunda's lawyers that he be released from house arrest in Kigali, Rwanda. Nkunda was arrested by Rwandan forces inside the Congo on January 22, 2009. The Rwandan Army and the Congolese Army were conducting a joint offensive against rebel militias in the eastern Congo. Nkunda was head of the National Congress for the Defense of the People (CNDP), a Congolese Tutsi militia operating primarily in the Congo's North Kivu province. The Congolese government still says it wants Rwanda to send Nkunda to the Congo for trial on war crimes charges, but a number of observers are not so sure that the Congolese government really wants to put Nkunda on trial. The Congolese government does not want to antagonize Congolese Tutsis who still think Nkunda is a hero. Nkuna's lawyers contend that the general's arrest was by Rwandan forces operating in the Congo was illegal and his detention in Rwanda is illegal. Some commentators suspect the Congo and Rwanda are working out a diplomatic deal. On January 18 the Congo's minister of information said that the Congo and Rwanda would solve the problem of extraditing and presumably trying Nkunda this year.

January 26, 2010: A key leader in a Rwandan opposition party, the United Democratic Forces (UDF), recently raised the issue of the ethnic composition of Rwanda's government. This has been a no-no since the 1994 genocide. The UDF leader, Ms. Victoire Ingabire, who is a Hutu, intends to run for president. Ms. Ingabire has been accused with inciting ethnic discontent (or, put in another way, exploiting tribal rivalries or “playing the tribal card” in Rwandan politics). The Tutsi -dominated government has made the accusation, but so have several survivors of the Tutsi genocide. Ms. Ingabire replies that the genocide was a crime but Hutus have also been victims (which is true).

January 30, 2010: The Burundian government has arrested 16 soldiers and charged them with plotting to destabilize Burundi. That means plotting to overthrow the government. The government accused the soldiers of plotting a military mutiny that would ultimately involve troops at several military posts throughout the country. Several of the soldiers arrested are assigned to a commando unit, which is based in the capital, Bujumbura.

February 5, 2010: The Burundian government said that it is proceeding with courts martial against 33 Burundian soldiers accused of refusing to obey orders. The soldiers were in Somalia and were protesting pay problems. They said they had not been paid their monthly salaries and that they were due food ration supplement pay. The soldiers' protests occurred in January 2009.

February 13, 2010: Burundi's defense ministry (National Defense Force) announced that it remains committed to the African Union Peacekeeping Mission in Somalia (AMISOM). Radical Somali Islamists have made threats against nations who have peacekeeping forces in Somalia. Uganda and Burundi have large troop contingents in Somalia. Burundi has approximately 2,500 soldiers in Somalia (organized in three battalion task forces). The Burundian Army has around 28,000 soldiers.

February 20, 2010: A series of grenade attacks in the Rwandan capital of Kigali killed one person and wounded approximately 30. Authorities reported three different grenade attacks, beginning late on the evening of February 19. The government has been attributing past grenade attacks to crime or personal motives – preferring that interpretation to terrorist or tribal political motives. Rwanda has new elections scheduled for August 2010. Waves of violence preceding elections is nothing new-- violent intimidation by the ruling party and opposition parties is all too common in the region. Government opponents have been targeted in past grenade attacks. One thing the government says is true: there are a lot of weapons and explosives left over from the civil war and the other wars in central Africa. Grenades are easy to acquire.

February 21, 2010: Burundian government officials are once again expressing concerns about potential violence prior to national elections. Actually, a series of elections are scheduled in the summer and the fall of 2010. Opponents claim the government is overstating the situation so it can clamp down on them, but NGOs operating in Burundi appear to agree that the peace process remains very fragile. Several political parties are organizing what they call youth wings (youth movements). Youth wing activities include physical training. If this looks like the initial stages of building a party militia, well, it very likely is.

February 23, 2010: In Rwanda, police have, over the last few days, arrested those believed responsible for the three recent hand grenade attacks. The suspects are Hutus, belonging to exiled anti -Tutsi groups based in Congo.

March 2, 2010: Police in France arrested Agathe Habyarimana. The Rwandan government has accused her of playing a key role in planning the 1994 Tutsi genocide in Rwanda. She is the widow of Juvenal Habyarimana, who was president of Rwanda in 1994. He died when his plane was shot down in April 1994. The genocide followed his assassination. Agathe Habyarimana has been living in a suburb of Paris for over a decade. She initially went into exile in Gabon and Kenya. Her arrest by France is regarded as a sign of improving relations between Rwanda and France. Rwanda had repeatedly requested her arrest and extradition. Rwanda and France broke relations in 2006 when a French court accused Rwandan President Paul Kagame of shooting down President Habyarimana's plane in 1994. Rwanda accused France of providing training for the Hutu militias that conducted the genocide. France and Rwanda restored relations in November 2009. French President Nicolas Sarkozy visited Rwanda in February 2010. During his visit he said that France had made several mistakes in judgment about the 1994 genocide.

March 14, 2010: The CNDD-FDD chose former Hutu rebel leader Leonard Nyangoma as its presidential candidate in the June election. Nyangoma is a bitter opponent of the current president, Pierre Nkurunziza, who is also a Hutu.

March 23, 2010: Burundi's security forces, especially the army, are fragile. The arrest of 18 soldiers in January on charges of plotting a coup has shaken the Burundian Army. The accused soldiers will be tried and the government is concerned that the trial may lead to further fractionalization in the military. Burundi has around 28,000 personnel in its army and a police force of 18,000.

March 26, 2010: Rwanda's supreme court said that it was not the proper forum to hear a plea for release from arrest by former General Laurent Nkunda. He has been under arrest in Rwanda since January 2009 when Rwandan troops arrested him inside the Congo. The civilian court said he should be tried in a military court.

March 31, 2010: The Rwandan government said that it supports The East African Railways project. For years Rwanda and Burundi have hoped that improved rail connections would serve as an economic boost and allow them to increase exports. Tanzania has been involved in the project since its port of Dar es Salaam would be the terminus. War and chaos, however, prevented the countries from pursuing the upgrade project, which includes laying standard gauge track and laying lines to support electrical powered locomotives. At the moment it takes about six days to ship a large cargo by rail from Dar es Salaam to the Rwandan capital of Kigali. The upgraded railway and new rail equipment would reduce the travel time significantly, to as little as eight to ten hours. Rwandan businesspeople have argued that the new railway will be the region's best anti-poverty program.

April 10, 2010: Despite a Congolese refugee repatriation agreement signed in February by the UN, Congo, and Rwanda, several tens of thousands of refugees remain in Rwanda. Rwanda wants the refugees to return but Congo's North Kivu province remains dangerous.

The Rwandan government arrested to senior army officers on charges of corruption and immoral conduct. The arrests came after the government a shake-up in the command of the Rwandan Army. Rwandan media reported that many soldiers resent a recent pay raise for the army's Presidential Brigade (an elite unit). Other military salaries were not increased.

April 20, 2010: 300 former National Liberation Force (FNL) fighters confronted police in Burundi's capital. The demonstration turned violent when the protestors began throwing stones at police and passing vehicles. Police reported they arrested eight protestors.

April 23, 2010: As the national elections near, the tension in Burundi is increasing. NGOs that were pro-Hutu rebel are describing demobilized rebel groups (many from the National Liberations Forces, FLN) as being uncontrolled. Several political parties have established youth wings that last year peace activists claimed were really the beginning of party militias. It appears that worry was justified, as reports indicate some of the youth wings are now collecting weapons. The CNDD-FDD (National Council for the Defense of Democracy-Forces for the Defense of Democracy) and the FRODEBU (Front for Democracy in Burund) parties both have youth organizations that are frequently rallying in the streets. The CNDD-FDD is the main government party. City elections will take place in May. The presidential election is scheduled for late June.

April 28, 2010: The Democratic Forces for the Liberation of Rwanda (FDLR) rebel group in the eastern Congo denied that it had any links to Hutu opposition leader Victorie Ingabire or any Hutu opposition group involved in upcoming elections in Rwanda.

May 11, 2010: A Rwandan court has decided to postpone once again a hearing on the status of former Congolese Tutsi rebel leader, General Luarent Nkunda. The court did confirm Nkunda's whereabouts -- he is still being held in Rwanda. Nkunda was arrested by Rwandan forces January 22, 2009 during a joint military operation conducted by Rwandan and Congolese military forces against rebel groups in the eastern Congo. Nkunda was head of the National Congress for the Defense of the People (CNDP) and aspired to becoming a national leader in the Congo. His CNDP forces had conducted a successful series of operations against the Congolese Army in north Kivu province in 2008. A lawyer for Nkunda blames his extended detention on the Rwandan Army's current chief of staff, General James Kaberebe.

May 14, 2010: Demonstrators in Bujumbura, Burundi, fought with security forces. The demonstrators were protesting the murder of an opposition activist by gunmen. The shooting occurred in early May. The protestors claim government-backed assassins committed the slaying. The murdered activist belonged to the Movement for Solidarity and Democracy.

May 24, 2010: Rwanda and Uganda have both announced that they intend to pursue closer relations. The two countries have often been at odds, at one time or another providing safe haven for the other nation's rebel groups.

May 25, 2010: Re-run time? A group of eight Burundian opposition parties is demanding that the Burundian election held on May 24 be held again – as in an entirely new election. The opposition parties claim the government cheated and are promising to challenge the results. Before the election, disaffected groups within the parties, including the so-called youth wings, threatened street violence if the elections were tainted. The big worry is that the young wings will be the seeds of a new armed guerrilla movement.

May 28, 2010: Burundi's election bureau announced that the ruling party, the National Council for the Defense of Democracy-Forces for the Defense of Democracy Party (NCDD-FDDP), had won over 60 percent of the vote in elections which were held May 24. A group of European Union election observers praised the election and said it met international standards. Voters elected representatives to local council governments throughout the country.

May 29, 2010: Fights broke out in Burundi's capital, Bujumbura, between the opposition National Liberation Forces (FNL) and government security forces. Around 50 protestors were arrested. The FNL claims this past week's elections were fraudulent. Street battles and opposition demands for a new election are not unique to Burundi. The same thing occurred in Sudan in April and in Ethiopia this month. Even comparatively stable Kenya had a violent post-election period after its 2007 national elections. Many Africans think elections are just a sham, run on behalf of the governing party. That noted, the idea of democracy is powerful, and Burundi is an example of that. Observers estimated that around 90 percent of Burundi's 3.5 million eligible voters cast ballots in the election. Ninety percent. Huge. People want the right to vote: they also want it to mean something.

June 1, 2010: A potential Hutu presidential candidate in Rwanda is claiming repression of the Hutu opposition by the predominantly Tutsi -led government. Victorie Ingabire is currently under detention herself. She was arrested in late April and charged with the crime of promoting a genocidal ideology. Ingabire countered the charges by saying she is only exercising her right to speak freely. Ingabire leads the United Democratic Forces (FDU) party. The government claims that Ingabire wants to reignite ethnic tensions between the Hutu and Tutsi. Presidential elections are scheduled for August 2010.

June 13, 2010: The charges of election fraud in the May 24th local elections continue to trouble Burundi. An opposition coalition group is demanding that the elections be held again. The group is called the Alliance of Democrats for Change (ADC). The big worry is that the electoral fraud accusations could escalate into violence and reignite the civil war. International election observers have generally viewed the local elections as fair, with only minor problems. In central Africa, that has to count as a good election. The trouble is the losers disagree and some of the losers were, until recently, armed guerrillas.

June 21, 2010: Gunmen in Sudan's Darfur region attacked a group of Rwandan peacekeepers that are serving with the UN-African Union UNAMID peacekeeping force. Three Rwandan soldiers were killed and one wounded. The attack took place in the village of Nertiti (West Darfur, Jebel Marra region). The peacekeepers were guarding a developmental aid project. UNAMID said three of the attackers died in the firefight.

June 22, 2010: Hand grenades were thrown into a bar in the capital of Burundi, Bujumbura, killing two and wounding eight. It was the second major hand grenade attack in the capital in the last five days.

June 29, 2010: The Ugandan Army claimed that Rwanda is building up its forces along the Ugandan-Rwandan border. Rwanda denied the claim.

July 1, 2010: Burundi's electoral board declared that the only candidate in the June 28 presidential election won. President Pierre Nkurunziza received over 90 percent of the votes. The election had a 77 percent voter turnout.

July 1, 2010: Rwandan, Burundi, Kenya, Tanzania, and Uganda announced that the East African Community (which was a customs union) is now a common market promoting free trade among the members. The group plans to create a monetary union in 2012 and being using a common currency by sometime in 2015. Combined the five countries have around 130 million people. The new EAC has a legal as well as economic angle. The five countries are discussing ways to create common laws to make contracting and transportation easier. Eventually EAC citizens will be able to travel from country to country without visas or passports -- very similar to the European Union.

July 3, 2010: Opposition leaders in Burundi describe the security situation in their country as rapidly deteriorating in the wake of claimed massive election fraud in May. They claim the government is clamping down on opposition activity. The government responds by saying that in June Burundi suffered around 60 grenade attacks, which wounded between 50 and 60 people. Many of the grenade attacks were directed at the ruling National Council for the Defense of Democracy-Forces For Defense of Democracy (CNDD-FDD) party's offices. Two members of the CNDD-FDD were slain in the grenade attacks. One opposition politician was killed.

July 12, 2010: Burundi placed its military on alert following terror attacks in Uganda. The attacks were made by the Somalia-based Al Shbab Islamist terror group. Burundi, like Uganda, has troops serving with African Union peace keeping forces in Somalia.

July 15, 2010: Rwandan opposition continues to complain that it is being targeted by the government. The opposition points to a number of violent incidents over the last six months. The latest is the death of Democratic Green Party activist Andre Kagwa Rwisereka. Rwandan police claim he was killed in a robbery attempt. That's not the way the Democratic Greens see it. In June a former senior officer in the Rwandan Army was shot in South Africa. Lieutenant General Faustin Kayumba Nyamwasa is on the outs with his former boss, Rwandan president Paul Kagame. Nyamwasa's supporters say the shooting was an assassination attempt ordered by the government. The government calls the charge a lie.

July 30, 2010: The ruling CNDD-FDD party in Burundi won the senatorial elections, which, as with other elections, opposition parties have boycotted (because they believe the voting is rigged.) This does not bode well for avoiding the resumption of rebel activity.

August 8, 2010: President Paul Kigame won the Rwandan presidential election with 93 percent of the vote. This was about what he got in the last election (2003). While accused of harassing other candidates and manipulating the entire elector process, Kigame is widely popular for the success of his economic policies, and for the fact that he led the Tutsi exile army that invaded from Uganda in 1994, ended the genocide of Tutsis and imposed peace. Despite Kigame's success, there are several Hutu, and Tutsi, opposition groups. Some are just pushing to get more for a particular tribe, but many want more political freedom. Kigame says that eventually that will happen, but the economy comes first. Most Rwandans agree with that, partly because the deadly ethnic animosities still exist, and could again break out in genocidal rage.

August 11, 2010: Two grenades were thrown into a bus station in the Rwandan capital, killing two and wounding five.

August 19, 2010: Rwandan police say they have rounded up a gang responsible for grenade attacks in the capital.

August 22, 2010: Uganda, Guinea and Burundi have pledged an additional 2,000 troops for the Somali peacekeeping mission. This would bring the total strength of the force to 8,000. New rules of engagement (ROE) would allow the peacekeepers to be more aggressive against the Islamic radical militias causing most of the mayhem there. The new troops and ROE are not expected to be in place until early next year.

In Burundi, hundreds of thousands of refugees have returned, but many have found all the good land taken. This has left many of the returned families jobless and destitute. To make matters worse, a recent corruption survey found Burundi the most corrupt nation in the region, with neighboring Rwanda being one of the least corrupt.

The situation was a little different down south. After 1959, the Tutsi in Burundi took the hint and were successful in repressing the Hutu rebellion that occurred in 1965. With 14 percent of the Burundi population Tutsi (contrasted with only nine percent in Rwanda), the Tutsi were numerous, and savage, enough to hold onto their power. Periodic massacres of the Hutu kept that majority people out of power for years. But the ballot, and Hutu numbers, eventually prevailed. By the 1980s, Hutus occupied most senior government positions. But the Hutu-Tutsi animosity remained, and was intensified by the mass murder that took place in neighboring Rwanda in 1994. The Rwanda killings were organized by the Hutu dominated Rwanda government, and the Tutsi in Burundi feared the same thing might happen to them. The Burundi Hutu saw what happened in Rwanda and were not encouraged. The fighting in Burundi got worse from 1994 through 2000, with as many as 100,000 people dying in the fighting or from exposure. Over the last decade, peace deals have been worked out with all the Hutu rebel factions, and Burundi has avoided the large scale bloodshed found in Rwanda and eastern Congo.

In response to this sort of thing, Rwanda is depending more on China (which doesn't care about local history much) for military equipment and economic development. This is going on throughout Africa, and China sees the UN war crimes investigators as a valuable, if unwitting, ally.

In the 1500's the Tutsi (plural- Watutsi) moved south from their original home in the Sahel. They were tough warriors and successful invaders. With a different complexion (an important point for the Tutsi) and standing (on average) several inches (5-10 cm) taller than the local Hutu, it did not take long for the Tutsi to take over and install their own brand of Apartheid. The area eventually evolved into two Tutsi ruled empires, each roughly covering the territory of modern Burundi and Rwanda. In 1899 the Germans moved in and made both areas colonies. The British replaced the Germans in 1916 and passed the area over to the Belgians in the 1920's. It was assumed that, when the areas became independent nations, the Hutu (over 80 percent of the population) would run the countries. The more aggressive and warlike Tutsi had other ideas, and the Hutu knew it. In 1959 the Hutu of Rwanda rose up against the Tutsi (who held most positions of local power), slaughtered thousands of them and drove several hundred thousand into exile (mainly in Uganda). Several thousand of these exiles formed an army and attempted a comeback in 1990. This comeback waxed and waned until the Hutu of Rwanda struck back in 1994, slaughtering over 800,000 people (Tutsi and Hutu "sympathizers") in a three month period.

The Tutsi rebels in the Rwandan Patriotic Front (RPF), better organized and trained than the Hutu dominated Rwandan army, took control of the government. The Hutu who led the genocide (many of them in the Interahamwe movement) fled to refugee camps in Congo and other neighboring countries. The Tutsi -led Rwandan government continued to fight a low-level battle with the Hutu rebel organizations (e.g., Democratic Forces for the Liberation of Rwanda, FDLR), with eastern Congo providing the battleground. Many of the Hutu rebel groups had once served in the Hutu-led regime's Armed Forces of Rwanda (FAR, Forces Armées Rwandaises, the Hutu-dominated Rwandan army). Rwanda also ran a "national reconciliation program" to attempt to resolve the ethnic conflict. Many Hutu went to jail for murder, but a far greater number were admonished and shamed --often using tribal rituals as well as legal proceedings – and then allowed to return to their homes. Rwanda has also begun sending soldiers to serve in African Union peacekeeping operations. But now that the UN has decided to accuse Rwanda of war crimes, Rwanda will fight back, full of righteous indignation at yet another attack by arrogant Western imperialists.

August 30, 2010: The UN leaked a draft of a report on atrocities in eastern Congo. The report details the mass murders committed by Rwandan Tutsi troops, who entered the country in 1994, in pursuit of millions of Hutus who had fled Rwanda after they murdered a million Tutsis. That led to Tutsi exile groups in Ugandan entering Rwanda and defeating the Hutu militias that did the killings. It's long been known that the Tutsis slaughtered thousands (perhaps hundreds of thousands) of Hutus in the Congo. The release of this UN document has angered the Tutsi dominated government of Rwanda, which now threatens to withdraw their peacekeepers from UN sponsored operations. The Tutsi despise the UN because the international community stood by while the Hutus slaughtered Tutsis in 1994. This massacre was, however, part of a centuries old battle between Hutu farmers, and Tutsi herders who have been moving into the area now occupied by Rwanda, Burundi and parts of eastern Congo. All these areas lie in the fertile highlands surrounding Lake Victoria. All have large ethnic Hutu populations and significant ethnic Tutsi minorities.

October 31, 2010: Rwanda and China have agreed to increase military cooperation. China will help Rwanda construct a floating dock to help support military operations in central Africa's Great Lakes region.

November 6, 2010: The Congolese military reported that two Congolese civilians were killed by suspected members of the Burundian FNL in the town of Kiliba. The incident occurred in South Kivu province near the Burundi border as the rebels sought to free two men arrested by the Congolese Army.

November 24, 2010: Where is former Congolese Tutsi rebel general Laurent Nkunda? He is still not in jail in the Congo. The Congolese government recently reminded Rwanda that it had promised that Nkunda would face trial in the Congo. However, he continues to remain in detention in Rwanda. Rwandan political opposition leaders say that Nkunda will not be released because of what he may say about the Rwandan government's involvement in the eastern Congo.

November 30, 2010: Opposition political parties in Burundi have asked the government to end what they call official and unofficial attempts to suppress them. The opposition groups have reorganized their umbrella group, the Democratic Alliance for Change. The appeal comes amid reports that former Burundi Hutu guerrillas now in the eastern Congo are seeking weapons and new recruits.

December 3, 2010: The UN Security Council froze the financial assets of three key leaders in the Rwandan Hutu rebel organization, the FDLR (Democratic Forces for the Liberation of Rwanda), along with travel bans. The FDLR is involved in the sale of minerals illegally mined in the eastern Congo. FDLR commanders are also involved in weapons smuggling, and not just to FDLR militias.

December 8, 2010: The Burundi government believes that reports of Burundi rebels organizing new guerrilla forces in the eastern Congo have been exaggerated. The UN believes that a faction of the National Liberation Front (FNL) had been recruiting fighters in the eastern Congo. The obvious concern is that the FNL faction would launch a new civil war in Burundi. The FNL is a political party in Burundi, but there are major fissures in FNL leadership. One of the alleged rebel faction leaders, Agathon Rwasa, recently said he and his group had renounced war. However, Rwasa's name has cropped up in the reports of rebel activity in eastern Congo. Rwasa left Burundi this past summer after accusing the government of rigging elections. There is suspicion that 400 FNL fighters are operating from a base camp in the Congo (South Kivu province) near the Burundi border.

December 10, 2010: The Rwandan government released an new archive documenting the 1994 genocide. The archive includes extensive video footage as well as witness statements.

December 11, 2010: Instructors from Great Britain have been teaching military English at the Rwandan Military Academy, where 61 soldiers recently completed the one-month long course. The English language skills are useful in peacekeeping operations, particularly in Darfur where Rwandan troops serve with UNAMID. The Rwandan government has also stated that over the long term it believes Rwanda's economic and political future lies with its east African neighbors Uganda and Kenya, nations which were once British colonies and which use English as a common language.

December 14, 2010: American trainers from Combined Joint Task Force-Horn of Africa (CJTFHOA) have been conducting a five-week long training course for the Burundian Army (Burundian National Defense Force, BNDF). The course is aimed at battalion commanders and staff officers who will lead peacekeeping operations. The course includes familiarization with NATO doctrine and war gaming methods to examine potential courses of action.

December 23, 2010: Somalia's al Shabaab militant Islamist rebels said that they would launch more attacks on both Burundi and Uganda. Al Shabaab claims it is retaliating since Burundi and Uganda supply troops for the African Union's peacekeeping operation in Somalia.

January 1, 2011: A grenade attack in Bujumbura (Burundi's capital) killed three people. Investigators called the attack indiscriminate and was intended to disrupt New Year's celebrations. Everyone in Burundi is on edge. While local rebels have used grenade attacks in the past, Somalia's militant Islamist group Al Shabaab has threatened Burundi with terror attacks. Burundi has peacekeeping forces in Somalia. Burundi increased internal security during the Christmas and New Year's holiday season.

January 6, 2011: Several former officers in the notorious Democratic Forces for the Liberation of Rwanda (FDLR) militia have been surrendering over the last six weeks. Those who surrendered to Congolese forces have been returned to Rwanda. The Rwandan government has been telling FDLR members who were not involved in the 1994 genocide that they will be well treated if they turn themselves in voluntarily. Former FDLR members have passed the word on to fighters still in the field that the government is honoring that commitment. The government says that since 2009 around 2,270 former FDLR fighters have returned to Rwanda.

January 10, 2011: Former Congolese Tutsi rebel leader Laurent Nkunda had another court hearing in Rwanda cancelled. The Congo has been trying to extradite him so that he can be tried for crimes committed by him and his militia forces in the eastern Congo. The word is that Rwanda does not really want to give Nkunda to the Congo, though they promised to do so when Rwandan forces arrested him in January 2009, as Rwandan and Congolese forces conducted a combined anti-militia operation in the Congo.

January 12, 2011: US Africa Command's (AFRICOM) Combined Joint Task Force- Horn of Africa (CJTF-HOA) hosted a military logistics conference for several East African countries. Both Burundi and Rwanda had officers at the seminar. Rwanda is trying to professionalize its forces and improving logistics is an absolute requirement in order to achieve that goal. Only South Africa and Nigeria (and perhaps Angola) have any real national logistics capabilities in sub-Saharan Africa (that can extend their military's reach beyond an immediate national border). For example, Uganda has (with U.S. help) conducted operations in the Central African Republic.

January 17, 2011: The Rwandan government has jailed four former officials, including Lieutenant General Faustin Nyamwasa (who was wounded in an attempted assassination in June 2010 in South Africa). The four men were convicted of threatening state security. In the case of Nyamwasa he was allegedly linked to a series of grenade attacks in Rwanda. In response to this, opposition politicians accused the government of attempting to suppress dissent and impose a dictatorship.

February 10, 2011: Two Rwandan journalists have been sentenced to prison for what the government calls stirring ethnic tensions. Rwandan is split between ethnic Hutus and ethnic Tutsis. The division has had terrible consequences, the worst example being the Tutsi genocide of 1994. The journalists’ jail terms, however, appear to be ridiculous. One journalist has been sentenced to 17 years in jail. The journalists wrote that a lot of people are not pleased with the government of President Paul Kagame. That’s true. Human rights advocates are now accusing Kagame of using the ethnic tension allegation as a way to silence his critics. That’s true, too.

February 14, 2011: The Burundian government reported that some fifty gunmen assaulted a police headquarters ten kilometers south of the capital, and the fighting lasted several hours. One attacker was killed and his body was recovered and found to be wearing a military-style uniform. This suggests a guerrilla attack. However, the government attributed the attack to armed bandits. Maybe, maybe not. For months Burundi has been rife with rumors of a National Liberation Forces (FNL) revival. The FNL is a Hutu liberation group. Several FNL factions have joined the peace process, but the rumor mill says hard core FNL factions have returned to the bush. The government report said that a house that was burned in the attack was owned by a senior FNL leader. That would support the bandit theory. It would also support a scenario where FNL radicals wanted to show their displeasure with other FNL factions. It also suggests –if you want to consider a conspiracy theory a scenario where the government wants to incite infighting within the FNL. Far out? Not in Burundi. It's happened before.

February 16, 2011: The chief of staff of the British Army visited Rwanda to discuss increasing defense cooperation with Rwanda. Great Britain currently provides the Rwandan military with training support and logistical support.

February 24, 2011: China and Rwanda are discussing improving relations. One area of closer cooperation under consideration is military-to-military cooperation. Both China and Rwanda have troops in peacekeeping operations in Sudan. China has an enormous economic interest in retaining access to Africa's natural resources. The Rwandan Army is regarded as a decent force, especially for a sub-Saharan African nation that isn't named Ethiopia, Nigeria, South Africa, or Angola. The Minister of Defense, James Kabarebe, and the new Chinese envoy, Shu Zhan, yesterday explored ways of enhancing military cooperation between the two countries' armed forces. The Rwandan government recently acknowledge that China trains 30 Rwandan soldiers every year in China.

February 27, 2011: The Rwandan Army (RDF, Rwandan Defense Force) announced that it plans to have a mobile field hospital ready for deployment by 2011. The field hospital would support peacekeeping operations.

March 7, 2011: Four leaders of the Democratic Forces for the Liberation of Rwanda (FDLR) will face trial in Germany in May. The militia commanders are charged with war crimes and crimes against humanity. These crimes were committed in the Congo. The FDLR is a militia that has roots in the Rwandan Hutu Interahamwe radical group that was involved in the 1994 genocide.

March 10, 2011: Another 1,200 Burundian peacekeepers have arrived in Somalia.

March 14, 2011: Burundi currently has 3,500 soldiers deployed with the African Union peacekeeping force in Somalia (AMISOM). This is an extraordinarily large force for a nation as small as Burundi. However, the peacekeepers get paid. For Burundi the upside is obvious: troops gaining military experience and getting paid for it. The downside is also obvious. Burundi, like Uganda (which has 4,500 soldiers in Somalia), is a target of the Somali radical Islamist organization, Al Shabaab. There have been several hundred Burundian casualties in Somalia so far.

March 14, 2011: The Rwandan government has launched another diplomatic offensive against the French investigation into the shooting down of Rwandan president Juvenal Habyarimana's airplane on April 6, 1994. In 2006 a French judge claimed that forces loyal to current Rwandan president Paul Kagame were involved in the attack on the aircraft.

March 24, 2011: Rwandan media report that the number of people who do not believe the 1994 genocide occurred on the scale it did is increasing. There are two terms in play: genocide doubters and genocide deniers. One source blames the Internet for spreading stories that the genocide was exaggerated. Analysts point out that the websites are recycling claims made by a number of radical Hutu organizations in the mid to late 1990s. However, the mass grave sites confirmed in Rwanda provided grisly evidence of the size and scope of the murders. If it sounds a little bit like the rise in the number of Holocaust deniers as memories of World War Two fade, well, it is.

March 27, 2011: Burundi announced that it has deployed 1,000 of the additional 2,000 soldiers the country has promised to commit to the African Union peacekeeping force in Somalia (AMISOM).

April 3, 2011: France announced that it had arrested a Rwandan fugitive who is charged with crimes connected to the Rwandan genocide of 1994.

April 6, 2011: Today is the 17th anniversary of the beginning of the Rwandan genocide. On April 6, 1994, Rwandan president Juvénal Habyarimana and Burundi’s president Cyprian Ntayamira died when their plane was shot down.

Over the next two and a half months around 800,000 Rwandans (most of them Tutsis) would be murdered.

April 7, 2011: In ceremonies remembering 17th anniversary of the Rwandan genocide, a UN official speaking at ceremonies in Kigali asked east and central African nations to continue to help bring perpetrators to justice.

April 10, 2011: Grenades have been the terror weapon of choice in Burundi and Rwanda. As Burundi's civil war slowly ground to a halt, the number of grenade attacks on civilian targets and security targets (especially police stations) began to climb. Over the past three years (2008-2011) Rwanda has gone through cycles of grenade attacks. Typically a bar or bus or open area with people (small market) are the targets. Opposition politicians in Rwanda have suggested that on at least one occasion the grenade attack was sponsored by the government. The truth is, no one is quite sure and those who know keep quiet. Beginning in late February 2011, however, the Rwandan government has been arresting a number of people it claims are involved in grenade smuggling for the purpose of conducting terror attacks and committing other crimes. One of the men arrested operated out of Burundi. The common element in all of the arrests (about three dozen so far) has been the Democratic Forces for the Liberation of Rwanda (FDLR) militia. The government has also seized over 1000 grenades (primarily US-type M26 grenades and Russian F1 grenades). The FDLR militia primarily operates out of the Congo (North and South Kivu provinces), but has connections to several Hutu extremist organizations. That's logical – the FDLR was once the Army for the Liberation of Rwanda (ALIR), which was composed of Hutu Interahamwe radicals involved in the 1994 genocide. Around 2000, the ALIR combined with several other extremist factions to become the FDLR. In early March the smuggler with the Burundi connections was arrested while trying to smuggle two grenades into Rwanda's capital, Kigali. There is an interesting political and information warfare angle to the grenade terror campaign. In response to the cycle of attacks in 2008, the government began a policy of putting Rwandan soldiers on the streets. Well, soldiers were already conducting some patrols, but the government wanted to increase visible presence to deter grenade attacks. Opposition politicians accused the government of imposing a police state. There were also stories going around that the military was involved in the attacks. Recently, a Rwandan Army spokesman said that investigations are continuing and military intelligence is involved in the investigations. That's because the government regards the FDLR as a military threat. And it is.

May 4, 2011: The trial of two former FDLR commanders has begun in Germany. Both leaders, Ignace Murwanashyaka and Straton Musoni , face numerous charges of war crimes and crimes against humanity. German prosecutors have gathered evidence in the eastern Congo against both men. The men were arrested in 2009. Their prosecutions may lead to further arrests of members of the FDLR living in Europe.

May 13, 2011: Rwandan police detained six people on charges of belonging to an armed group that is based in the eastern Congo. That is usually bureaucratese for members of the FDLR (Democratic Forces for the Liberation of Rwanda) but there are other radical factions operating out of the Congo. The government statement suggested the people arrested were involved in a plot to commit terrorist acts inside Rwanda.

May 17, 2011: The International Criminal Tribunal for Rwanda (ICTR) sentenced a former Rwandan Army senior general to 30 years in prison. He was convicted on being involved in the 1994 genocide that killed 800,000 Rwandan Tutsis and moderate Hutus.

May 23, 2011: Many claim that the stage is being set for a new civil war in Burundi. Opposition parties accuse the government of acting increasingly arbitrary and the police have cracked down on opposition parties. The Arusha Peace Accord (signed in August 2000) is in danger of unraveling.

May 29, 2011: Gunmen in Burundi murdered four people and wounded three others when the attackers opened fire on a soccer game. Many of the fans at the match were members of Burundi's majority political party. Residents told officials that one of the attackers sang a song identified with the Hutu FNL (National Liberation Forces) guerrilla group.

June 2, 2011: Soldiers serving with Burundi's peacekeeping force in Somalia are claiming they have not been paid for nearly five months. Collectively the Burundian soldiers (around 4000) are owed $20 million. The government claims that the money, disbursed by the African Union, is in the government's national bank. The money goes directly into an individual soldier's bank account and his family has access to the account. However, several soldiers claim that isn't true. The soldiers believe someone in the government has stolen the money.

June 5, 2011: The government of Belgium is warning Burundi that it may reduce aid if Burundi does not fight internal corruption. Belgium is also concerned about increasing violence in Burundi and reports of police torture. Transparency International ranked Burundi as east Africa's most corrupt nation in 2010.

June 15, 2011: In mid-May the CNDD-FDD said that it would not negotiate with opposition party leaders about problems arising from the 2010 elections. However, since the beginning of June, there have been rumors that negotiations would soon start. However, the president, Pierre Nkurunziza, and other governing party officials are denying that negotiations are taking place. Opposition party members say the government's refusal to listen to their concerns could lead to violence and possibly a new rebellion.

June 22, 2011: Armed men wearing police uniforms launched several attacks in Burundi. In one attack they attacked a small bus in northwestern Burundi, near the town of Buganda. The attackers robbed the passengers then forced several of them to lie on the ground. The attackers then poured gasoline on the passengers and set them on fire. Two people died and two people were injured. Another group of these attackers assaulted a police station in the capital, and killed a policeman. One attacker died in the firefight. Another attack occurred in eastern Burundi (Ruyigi province) where attackers assassinated a tribal chief who belonged to the National Council for the Defense of Democracy–Forces for the Defense of Democracy (CNDD-FDD, the governing party).

June 23, 2011: Rwandan announced on June 22 that it had detained several more suspects on charges of belonging to a terrorist group, in addition to the six arrested in early May. The suspects revealed that they receive support from two organizations, the Rwanda National Congress (RNC) and Convention National des Republicains (CNR). The suspects said they had been sent into Rwanda to recruit more volunteers to carry out attacks.

June 25, 2011: A bus in southern Burundi (Bururi province) was ambushed by unidentified gunmen.

June 27, 2011: The Burundian government is blaming a series of attacks on towns, vehicles, and sports events on bandits. The people, however, are not buying it. Since the last week of May several spectacular terror attacks have occurred that have gotten regional headlines and scared a lot of people. Media coverage and public fear are the aims of terror attacks. The general opinion in Burundi is that a National Liberation Forces (FNL) faction is launching the attacks and trying to incite a new Hutu insurgency. Opposition political leaders, however, claim the government has cracked down on its political opponents so hard that anti -government violence is inevitable.

July 12, 2011: A grenade attack in the town of Kamembe (southwestern Rwanda, near the Congo border) injured 21 people. Opposition politicians accuse the government of undermining the democratic process and repressing minority Hutus.

July 20, 2011: The Burundian Army engaged a group of gunmen who ambushed two vehicles in western Burundi, near the Congo border. The government reported that two Burundian Army soldiers, a policeman, and five gunmen died in the firefight.

August 10, 2011: A Burundian government report noted that land disputes are increasing. Some of the disputes are due to refugees returning to their former village areas.

August 26, 2011: The Rwandan government asked the African Union (AU) to recognize Libya's rebel movement, the Transitional National Council (TNC). The government said that dictator Muammar Gadhafi is no longer capable of running the country. Rwanda is recognizing the TNC as the official Libyan government.

August 29, 2011: Rwandan officials and UN observers in the Congo now estimate the Democratic Forces for the Liberation of Rwanda (FDLR, a Hutu extremist militia operating in the Congo) now has approximately 2,500 fighters. It had 6,500 in 2008. The UN credits its demobilization and reintegration program, which has encouraged FDLR defections. Rwanda also operates a demobilization and reintegration camp in its territory.

September 2, 2011: Five former FNL rebels are seeking asylum. They claim they have been targeted for death by government assassins.

September 6, 2011: Burundian police reported they killed two gunmen in a heavy firefight that broke out in the capital, Bujumbura. One of the gunmen turned out to be a former security guard of an FNL leader, Agathom Rwasa, who is allegedly in hiding in the Congo.

September 7, 2011: A Burundian human rights group claimed that the government is sponsoring death squads, which are attacking political opponents.

September 9, 2011: Rwanda and France are making diplomatic efforts to improve ties. The presidents met in Paris to discuss mutual relations. Rwandan president Paul Kagame has accused the French of favoring the Hutus who committed the 1994 genocide. Kagame had long demanded an apology. It appears Kagame has dropped that demand. France denied Kagame's accusation.

French investigators have accused Kagame of being involved in the shooting down of the airplane carrying Rwanda's president in 1994. Kagame denies that accusation.

September 19, 2011: In a terror attack vaguely reminiscent of the Mexican drug cartel assault on a Monterrey, Mexico casino, Burundian gunmen dressed as policemen attacked a bar in the town of Gatumba (about 15 kilometers west of the capital, Bujumbura). At least three - dozen people were slain. The gunmen pushed people in the bar to the floor and then shot them, one by one. Witnesses said the attackers also carried knives (likely machetes). The attack was designed to be an outrage and to exacerbate tensions in the country. The bar was the favorite local watering hole for supporters of the governing National Council for the Defense of Democracy-Forces for the Defense of Democracy (CNDD-FDD). Though no political group took credit for the attack, the big worry is that radical Hutus in the FNL are responsible for the attack.

September 20, 2011: The U.S. State Department urged the Burundian government to quickly bring the perpetrators of the massacre in Gatumba to justice. America is worried that the attack could start another civil war.

September 25, 2011: Fear of renewed civil war is gripping Burundi. In the wake of an attack that left nearly 40 people dead, the government and several opposition groups acknowledge the peace deal is in trouble. Opposition politicians complain that attacks on their constituents have increased since January. The government points to increased agitation and violent threats by former Forces for National Liberation (FNL) guerrillas. Since the FNL signed a truce in 2005, the largest political parties have hedged their bets. The youth groups associated with the parties are stacked with militants. The youth groups could easily become armed militias, and everyone knows it. Human rights organizations claim that approximately 125 members of the opposition were slain during the May-August time frame. Opposition parties call the murder extra-judicial killings.

October 15, 2011: Opposition parties in Burundi continue to accuse the government of permitting a secret campaign to kill their party members. They point to a human rights report of September 2011 that alleges 125 opposition party members were slain in Burundi during the summer. The government rejects the accusations. Who is committing the murders? That's tough to say.

The major political parties have their own militias. Some of the militia groups operate with very little control. They are essentially gangs.

October 31, 2011: Where is General Laurent Nkunda? The Rwandan government says he is still in Rwanda and in jail. However, Rwanda and Congo are undergoing yet another diplomatic reconciliation. The Congolese government says it still wants to try him for war crimes. Rwandan media indicate the government may return Nkunda to the Congo. Nkunda led the National Congress for Defense of the People (CNDP) rebel group in the Congo. It was regarded as a Congolese Tutsi militia.

November 7, 2011: Rwanda is urging its neighbors to cooperate in regional security training exercises. Rwanda has sponsored a series of East African command post exercises. Who are the enemies Rwanda identified as regional threats? Uganda's Lord's Resistance Army, Somalia's Al Shabaab Islamic terrorist group, and Rwanda's own Democratic Forces for the Liberation of Rwanda (FDLR) Hutu militia group received prominent mention. The exercises are a good idea, but the initiative also has a diplomatic aim. Many sub-Saharan African governments have often looked the other way (and sometimes assisted) when rebel organizations threatening neighboring countries have established bases in their territory. Rwanda wants to end that game.

November 15, 2011: Rwanda confirmed that it will deploy five helicopters to Sudan's Darfur region in the first months of 2012. The UNAMID African Union-UN peacekeeping force has been desperately short of helicopters ever since it deployed. Rwanda began a special training program this year to prepare what amounts to a helicopter transport company for deployment. The unit has 140 personnel (pilots, maintenance techs, logistics support).

November 22, 2011: The Burundian government claimed that police and army units killed 18 bandits (term used) in a raid in the Cankuzo area (eastern Burundi). The police and military operation was part of an increased security presence after a bandit group (described in some reports as a rebel group) attacked a bar in a town near Bujumbura and killed 36 people execution-style.

November 29, 2011: South Africa, after indicating otherwise, refused a request from Rwanda to extradite former Rwandan general Faustin Kayumba Nyamwasa. The Rwandan government has accused Nyamwasa of being involved in several terror attacks (specifically grenade attacks) in Rwanda in 2010. He is also accused of letting his soldiers kill several hundred Hutu civilian refugees in the Congo. Nyamwasa denies the allegations and says Rwandan president Paul Kagame is lying. Nyamwasa wants refugee or asylum status in South Africa. Some opposition members believe Nyamwasa is a potential rival of Kagame.

December 2, 2011: Burundi was declared completely free of landmines. This comes after seven years of vigorous mine clearing effort, and three years ahead of schedule.

December 4, 2011: Burundi's internal political situation continues to deteriorate. There is growing evidence that the government is using death squads (operated by the police and party militias) to go after members of opposition political parties. Now the charge is more explicit: that government's extra-judicial killers are systematically killing former National Liberation Forces (FNL) guerrillas. One group claims 300 people have been murdered and that the former rebel fighters who have been slain had demobilized (i.e., met the peace accord criteria). However, there have been numerous violent attacks by factions claiming to be associated with the FNL. The government claims that many former FNL fighters have returned to the jungle with the intention to start a new civil war. (See report of October 15.)

January 4, 2012: Two people were killed and 16 were wounded in a grenade attack in Kigali, Rwanda. The government and the Rwanda National Congress opposition party both condemned the attacks.

January 13, 2012: Rwandan authorities reported that 22 people have been convicted of conducting grenade attacks in Rwanda since 2008.

January 18, 2012: Rwanda suspended then arrested four senior military officers. The officers are under investigation for being involved in the illegal sale or smuggling of Congolese minerals (conflict minerals). International investigators have claimed for years that Ugandan and Rwandan officers have either participated in smuggling Congolese operations or turned a blind eye to them. One of the men arrested was a senior intelligence officer, General Richard Rutatina. A division commander and a senior intelligence colonel were also arrested. Last year the Rwandan government and the Congo agreed to crack down on mineral smuggling. These arrests indicate that Rwanda is doing so.

January 24, 2012: Tanzania released Burundian opposition leader Alexis Sinduhije from custody. The Burundian government had asked Tanzania to arrest him in early January (for extradition to Burundi) on accusations of supporting a renewed rebellion by the FNL. Tanzania sent Sinduhije to Uganda. Sinduhije leads the Movement for Solidarity and Development (MSD) opposition group.

January 28, 2012: A Burundian court convicted 16 people of participating in the fateful September 2011, terror attack on a bar in a town near Bujumbura. That attack left 36 people dead. Seven of the people convicted received life sentences. The government also indicated that it believes former National Liberation Forces (FNL) leader Agathon Rwasa was involved in the attack. Rwasa is currently in hiding.

February 6, 2012: The Rwandan government claimed that the country's poverty rate had dropped to 45 percent from 57 percent in 2007. If true, this is a major achievement. Rwanda's population is around 11 million.

February 8, 2012: Burundi arrested Faustin Ndikumana the leader of PARCEM, an anti-corruption group that had recently accused several judges of seeking bribes.

February 15, 2012: Rwanda has signed on with a US-backed strategy to defeat the Democratic Forces for the Liberation of Rwanda (FDLR) militia. The FDLR still operates in the eastern Congo (North and South Kivu provinces). The UN Stabilization Mission in the Democratic Republic of Congo (MONUSCO) also supports the joint effort to cut FDLR finances, smuggling operations, and attacks. The US and UN want to try to create a cooperative security arrangement to defeat the FDLR, one that is similar to the multi-lateral cooperative agreement Uganda and the US worked out to fight the Lord's Resistance Army.

February 20, 2012: Burundi has earned political respect for its participation in the African Union's peacekeeping mission in Somalia (AMISOM). Burundi currently deploys 4,400 soldiers in Somalia. However, Burundi's human rights record remains miserable and the European Union is once again criticizing Burundi for this bad behavior. EU diplomats are calling the continued string of killings extrajudicial murders, which of course implies the government is involved. The UN reported that 57 extrajudicial murders or murders that rated as highly suspicious occurred in 2011. That's fewer than some human rights groups claimed (300, in Fall 2011).

February 20, 2012: The Rwandan government claimed that the country's poverty rate had dropped to 45% from 57% in 2007. That announcement led to several independent attempts that tried to determine if it was true, and if so, why. Even if the statistics are rough (and they are) the fact is that Rwanda has made significant economic strides in the last ten years. A decade ago the government decided to focus very seriously on bottom-up economic development. As Transparency International (the premier anti - corruption non-governmental organization) noted, Rwanda began a serious effort to end corruption. If an official took a bribe, the official was prosecuted. The government also initiated reforms that made it easy for entrepreneurs to start businesses and for small businesses to grow. The Rwandan formula followed several ideas espoused by Hernando de Soto Polar, the Peruvian economist (who concluded that property rights and law and order were the keys to economic growth).

The government gave farmers solid title to the land. The government's critics, foreign and domestic (and there are many of them), point out that President Paul Kagame's government is politically repressive and the president really brooks no personal opposition. All of those points are accurate. They also note that Rwanda has few good roads and that transportation of goods is a huge problem. Electricity, even in the capital, Kigali, is iffy. The people also lack the technical skills that a modern 21st century economy absolutely requires. This criticism is accurate too. There are also critics who argue that the small business reforms have had very little impact and that much of Rwanda's economy remains underground and untaxed. This is an interesting argument and given the extent of black markets in developing nations it could be true. The counter argument is that more reforms are in order, so the underground businesses can evolve into legitimate (tax paying) ones. However, the fact remains that Rwanda's economy has improved. Income in Rwanda has increased, perhaps doubling since the wicked days of 1994, though 1994 income statistics are questionable. The government argues that infrastructure improvement is coming but Rwanda and Rwandans are beginning to reap the rewards of a decade of developing small business skills, human capital. (Austin Bay)

April 10, 2012: Rwanda deployed 150 soldiers to serve with the UN Mission in South Sudan (UNMISS). Rwanda has agreed to deploy a battalion of 850 soldiers to South Sudan.

April 15, 2012: The Rwandan government promoted 23 general officers. One was promoted to lieutenant-general, six to major general, and 16 colonels were promoted to brigadier general. The new lieutenant general is Karenzi Karake, who has served with the National Intelligence and Security Services (NISS), Rwanda's intelligence agency.

April 30, 2012: U.S. AFRICOM reported that members of Rwanda's 71st Battalion completed a five-week long training course in preparation for deploying to support peacekeeping operations. The course included battalion logistics, weapons maintenance, and medical aid training.

May 4, 2012: The Burundian Army claimed that rebel leader Claver Nduwayezu (known as Mukono) died in a firefight with government security forces. Nduwayezu also used the nom de guerre
Carmel. According to the army, the firefight took place inside Burundi, five kilometers from the Congo-Burundi border. The government asserted that Mukono was responsible for the infamous attack on a bar in the town of Gatumba (near Bujumbura)where 39 people were killed, some of them murdered execution-style.

May 20, 2012: The Burundi government is accused of permitting extra-judicial killings, which have led to scores of political opponents being killed. It is believed that the assassins have been state security personnel and sometimes members of rebel groups.

May 24, 2012: A trial court in Burundi convicted 14 people of murdering Ernest Manirumva, a noted anti-corruption activist. Manirumva was murdered in 2009. At the time he was investigating ties between Burundian police and Hutu rebels operating in the Congo. Many believe that the court failed to try real criminals (corrupt Burundian police officers who were smuggling weapons remain at large and who were likely tied to the real killers).

June 6, 2012: The Burundian is believed to have executed Jean-Petit Nduwimana, a former senior intelligence officer. Congolese security forces apparently captured Nduwimana in May and then sent him to Burundi, where the government quietly killed him. Nduwinmana was a senior rebel leader and in 2004, was integrated into the Burundian Army after the peace settlement. He became chief of staff of the military intelligence service and was a member of the ruling party, the National Council for the Defense of Democracy and the Forces for the Defense of Democracy (CNDD-FDD). However, in 2008, he grew disillusioned with the CNDD-FDD government and said he was preparing to start a new rebellion. In 2011, Nduwimana said that he had joined the Forces for the Restoration of Democracy (FRD), a new Burundian rebel group.

June 9, 2012: Foreign observers say that recent reports of serious rebel activity in Burundi are credible. Bit by bit the peace settlement is unraveling. Several opposition political leaders have left the capital and according to the government are now organizing forces in the jungle. The government is particularly concerned about Agathom Rwasa, the National Liberation Front (FNL) leader. Rwasa is reportedly active in the eastern Congo.

June 20, 2012: Rwanda's foreign minister said the Congolese government is lying when it accuses the Rwandan government of supporting the M23 Congolese rebel group. A leaked UN report, however, said that investigators have evidence that M23 is receiving military supplies and financial help through Rwanda.

July 5, 2012: The president of Somalia visited Burundi, which has over 4,000 soldiers deployed in Somalia with the AU's AMISOM peacekeeping force.

July 15, 2012: Rwanda and the Congo agreed to allow an AU (African Union) sponsored international force help deal with rebel groups in the eastern Congo. The AU had previously said that it was ready to organize a neutral regional force for deployment in the Congo.

July 22, 2012: The U.S. announced that it will curtail military aid it provides to Rwanda. The U.S. announcement follows several weeks of serious allegations made by UN investigators that Rwanda is providing the Congo's M23 rebel group with military and financial aid.

July 31, 2012: The UN's Group of Experts on the Congo (GoE Congo) has accused Rwanda of providing M23 with material and financial support.

August 1, 2012: The Congolese government charged Rwanda with arming the M23 rebel group, which Congo considers a group of mutineers. Rwanda charged the Congo with helping the Democratic Forces for the Liberation of Rwanda (FDLR) Hutu militias plan attacks on Rwanda. The FDLR has ties to the Hutu leaders who led the 1994 Rwandan genocide.

August 7, 2012: The U.S. government told Rwanda that it must help the Congo and the UN disarm the M23 rebel movement and insure that the rebel group does not receive military supplies or aid.

The Rwandan government said that the UN group, which investigated the allegations that Rwanda is supporting the M23 Congolese rebel movement, is acting in bad faith. According to Rwanda, the UN report is highly inaccurate. The government accused one member of the UN study group of having a benign view of radical Hutu organizations like the FDLR and had published an article that described the FDLR as victims of the Rwandan Tutsi government. Rwanda basically said the UN study exhibited an anti-Tutsi tribal bias.

August 15, 2012: The Congolese government (Democratic Republic of Congo) asked that international donors and financial institutions freeze aid to Rwanda because the Rwandan government supports the rebel M23 movement.

August 16, 2012: Rwandan opposition leaders from the United Democratic Forces (FDU) have asked the International Criminal Court (ICC) to investigate Rwandan president Paul Kagame on charges of committing war crimes in the eastern Congo. The accuser cited a UN report that found evidence that the Rwandan government is supporting the M23 Movement rebel group in the Congo.

August 23, 2012: A Burundi government task force investigating reports of extrajudicial slayings reported that no extrajudicial murders had occurred. The task force said that it had not found a single credible report of an extrajudicial execution.

September 2, 2012: Though Rwanda is continuing to receive heavy criticism for its alleged involvement with rebel militias in the eastern Congo, the political damage so far has not been significant. Rwanda has been a major contributor to the UN-African Union, UNAMID, peacekeeping force in Sudan's Darfur region, and the UN knows that Rwandan soldiers have been reliable. Rwanda has also made some savvy political overtures to neighboring Uganda and Kenya. Both Uganda and Kenya have large troop commitments to the AU's AMISOM peacekeeping effort in Somalia. Rwanda has also taken advantage of several U.S. AFRICOM training initiatives. In October, Rwanda will host some 1,800 soldiers from the East African Community (EAC). The EAC consists of Tanzania, Kenya, Uganda, Burundi, and Rwanda. Rwanda has played an important role in strengthening the EAC. The concept behind the EAC is not new. In the first half of the 20th century, when they were both British colonies, Kenya and Uganda had a customs union designed to expand bi-lateral trade. An East African Community existed from 1967 to 1977, but fell apart. The current EAC was created by a treaty in 1999 and could evolve into a free trade pact. The member nations have now agreed to a defense protocol, so it is also on the road to becoming a military alliance. The October military exercise is billed as a major field training exercise designed to enhance security cooperation among the EAC members. A Burundian Army colonel who helped plan the exercise said that the field training will focus on counter-terror operations and also counter-piracy. Uganda and Burundi have gained a lot of experience in working together in AMISOM. A Burundian government official pointed out that the EAC members face common security threats. For example, Somalia's Al Shabaab Islamist militia has launched attacks in Uganda and Kenya. Al Shabaab has also threatened to launch attacks on Burundi.

September 3, 2012: The Rwandan Army said that it was withdrawing two special forces battalions which have been operating in the eastern Congo. The Rwandan government said the two battalions have been participating in joint operations with the Congolese military since 2009. The Rwandan special operations soldiers had been assigned to the Joint DRC-Rwanda Special Forces Battalion that was based in the Rutshuru territory of DRC's North Kivu province.

A former leader of Burundi's main rebel group, the FNL (National Liberation Forces), said that a new FNL faction has been established. The faction was responsible for a recent attack on a Burundian Army post near Bujumbura. The new faction is named the FNL-Ubugabo-Burihabwa.

September 4, 2012: Congolese civilians in North Kivu province reported that M23 rebels skirmished with Congolese Army soldiers in the Rutshuru district. The report puts in question claims by officials in the Congo that an informal ceasefire has existed between M23 and the Congolese Army since the first week of August.

September 5, 2012: UN peacekeepers in the Congo confirmed that 357 Rwandan Special Forces troops have been operating in the eastern Congo. The Congolese government said that 100 Rwandan Special Forces soldiers were operating in the region. The Rwandan troops were working with Congolese Army soldiers to monitor Rwandan FDLR (Democratic Forces for the Liberation of Rwanda) ethnic Hutu rebels and their Mai Mai militia allies.

September 6, 2012: Observers in the eastern Congo reported that M23 rebels have moved into an area near the Rwanda-Congo border that was formerly patrolled by a Rwandan special forces unit.

September 6, 2012: The Rwandan government announced that its new national development fund with a long-range goal: getting the country away from relying on foreign aid. The fund now has a little over $10 million, most of the money coming from Rwandan government workers and Rwandan expatriates. The government said that the fund will help capitalize new projects and money from the fund will also be used to partner with foreign investors. The fund is named the Agaciro Fund (which translates as "Dignity" Fund in the Kinyarwandan language). Critics have pointed out that the Rwandan government is establishing the fund just as numerous international donors are discussing withdrawing aid because of Rwanda's alleged support for Congolese rebels. Almost 50 percent of Rwanda's annual budget comes from donor countries and aid organizations.

September 25, 2012: The Rwandan government once again denied charges that its security forces are involved with the Congo's M23 rebel movement.

October 2, 2012: Diplomats in Burundi are reporting that from 300 to 500 former FNL (National Liberation Forces) rebels have returned to bases in the jungle. Though the Burundian Army has used its experiences in Somalia to increase the professionalism of its soldiers, a 500-man strong guerrilla force represents a real threat to the country. Many of the FNL rebels are veteran guerrilla fighters.

October 15, 2012: UN investigators claimed that the Rwandan and Ugandan militaries have aided the Congo's M23 rebel movement.

Several key accusations made in the critical UN report appeared in print on October 17. One source claimed that the UN document said Rwanda's defense minister is commanding M23 – and that is a very serious allegation. Excerpts claimed that the Rwandan government has given M23 heavy weapons and helped provide recruits. These allegations go several steps beyond a UN report issued earlier this year that concluded evidence existed that Rwanda was supporting the Congolese rebel group. Rwanda has a record of using proxy forces in the Congo to combat the radical Hutu FDLR (Democratic Forces for the Liberation of Rwanda).

October 17, 2012 One source claimed that the UN document said Rwanda's defense minister is commanding M23 – and that is a very serious allegation. Excerpts claimed that the Rwandan government has given M23 heavy weapons and helped provide recruits. These allegations go several steps beyond a UN report issued earlier this year that concluded evidence existed that Rwanda was supporting the Congolese rebel group. Rwanda has a record of using proxy forces in the Congo to combat the radical Hutu FDLR (Democratic Forces for the Liberation of Rwanda).

October 18, 2012: The UN voted to give Rwanda a non-permanent seat on the Security Council. Non-permanent members serve on the Security Council for two years. Luxembourg, Australia, South Korea, and Argentina were also elected to fill Security Council slots. Non-permanent seats bring prestige and recognition to any country obtaining one, but they are particularly coveted by developing countries. Their UNSC votes matter. Rwanda's selection, however, comes at a very uncomfortable time, for both the UN and Rwanda. Bits and pieces of a UN report on the Congo's M23 rebellion have been appearing in various international media. The UN report is very critical of the Rwandan government and its alleged support of the M23 rebels. The tribal connection is undeniable. The Rwandan military is largely run by Rwandan Tutsis. The M23 rebels are Congolese Tutsis. One media leak reported that UN investigators have evidence that Rwanda's defense minister has given M23 rebels direct orders. Rwanda vociferously denies that it supports M23. Congo objected to Rwanda taking a seat on the Security Council but Rwanda had no opponents for the open African seat. The General Assembly voted overwhelmingly to give Rwanda the seat. It was a reward of sorts. Rwanda has consistently provided soldiers for UNAMID, the UN-African Union peacekeeping mission in Sudan's Darfur region and overall is the sixth largest provider of soldiers for UN peacekeeping missions.

October 24, 2012: Burundian security forces claimed they killed nine gunmen in a firefight in the town of Buganda. The government claimed that the gunmen had entered Burundi from the Congo. After the firefight occurred, a guerrilla group calling itself the Murundi People's Front -The Saviors' (FPM-Abatabazi) said that it had launched an attack in the area and its fighters had killed nine Burundian Army soldiers and wounded 17 others in the operation.

November 5, 2012: Rwanda accused a group of Congolese Army soldiers of violating the Rwanda-Congo border near the town of Kibumba (13 kilometers north of the Congolese border city of Goma). Rwanda claimed that the Congolese soldiers crossed the border on a reconnaissance mission. A Rwandan military spokesman called the border crossing a provocation. The term provocation indicates the Rwandans believe the incident was intentional. After the Congolese crossed the border, a firefight erupted between the Congolese soldiers and a detachment of Rwandan soldiers. One Congolese soldier died and a Rwandan soldier was wounded. Both the Rwandan and Congolese governments regard the incident as serious. It is the first confirmed firefight between Congolese and Rwandan military units since 2001.

November 13, 2012: Great Britain announced that it will give very close scrutiny to any future requests for aid from Rwanda. The announcement comes after new allegations made by UN investigators that Rwanda is supporting rebel groups in the Congo. Great Britain, however, recently approved a controversial $30 million aid request to Rwanda.

November 15, 2012: The government of Burundi acknowledged that a Burundian Army officer was killed in the Congo's South Kivu province. The government said the officer was participating in an intelligence gathering operation that is permitted under a bilateral agreement with the Congo.

November 19, 2012: As M23 rebels neared the city of Goma, on the Congo-Rwanda border, the Congolese government rejected a demand by the rebel movement that the Congo begin direct political negotiations with the group. A Congolese spokesman said that the Congolese government needs to negotiate with the real aggressor in the region, which is Rwanda. Rwanda denied the Congo's accusation and said that Congolese Army troops had fired into Rwandan territory. Rwandan security forces did not respond to the Congolese gunfire.

November 23, 2012: Rwanda has denied another barrage of charges that it is supporting the M23 rebel movement in the Congo. The government said that its policy is to end the hostilities and it has asked the Congolese Army and M23 to seek a peaceful solution. Rwanda has said that the International Conference of the Great Lakes Region (ICGLR) provides the best regional forum for conducting peace negotiations. The ICGLR has 11 members, including Rwanda, Burundi, Uganda, and Congo.

November 27, 2012: Rwanda claimed that an estimated 100 to 120 FDLR fighters entered into Rwandan territory from the Congo and killed one civilian in the village of Muti. Four other people were wounded.

December 2, 2012: the Rwandan government claimed that an FDLR band launched an attack near Kinigi. A national park warden was killed in the attack inside Rwanda's Volcanoes National Park.

December 5, 2012: Does M23 do anything for Rwanda other than cause it to be condemned by the UN and numerous aid organizations? Though the Rwandan government vehemently claims it does not support the rebel group, there are a few Rwandans who will tell reporters and UN investigators that they think M23's predecessor organization, the National Congress for the Defense of the People (CNDP), was a necessary response to the threat posed by the FDLR. They point out that the FDLR was formed by Hutu mass murderers (genocidaires) who killed over 800,000 Rwandans. The Hutu genocidaires fled into the Congo after the Tutsi -led Rwandan Patriotic Front (RPF) seized power in 1994. The CNDP was organized in late 2006, by Congolese Tutsis to counter the FDLR because the Congo government was unwilling or unable to take on the FDLR. The Rwandans interlocutors increasingly point out to journalists that the Congolese government is endemically corrupt.

December 16, 2012: The Burundian government is concerned that weapons from Libya that once belonged to the forces of former Libyan dictator Muammar Gaddafi will start showing up in central Africa. The government is concerned that former National Liberation Forces (FNL) rebel commanders who have returned to the jungle will try to acquire the weapons. In early September Agathon Rwasa, a former FNL guerrilla leader, declared war on the Burundian government. Rwasa is believed to be in the eastern Congo and is organizing a faction of former FNL fighters.

December 29, 2012: Burundian opposition groups are arguing that Burundi is now far worse off than it was before the 2010 elections. Over the past three months, several opposition leaders have accused the government of creating a one-party system in the country and of undermining the Arusha Accords. Signed in 1993, these accords provided the political framework for ending the Burundian civil war. The governing party, the National Council for the Defense of Democracy/Forces for the Defense of Democracy (CNDD-FDD), has certainly solidified control in the country. However, some of the responsibility for the emerging one -party system lies with Burundi's opposition leaders. After the CNDD-FDD swept the May 2010 local elections, many opposition leaders went into exile. The leaders claimed the vote had been manipulated, and it probably was. The opposition decided to boycott subsequent elections, including the presidential election. Only one opposition group (UPRONA) put up candidates in the July 2010 legislative election. The CNDD-FDD took control of over 80 percent of the parliament's seats and has since them faced no real parliamentary opposition. Many opposition leaders decided to go into exile because they feared for their safety. All of the major Burundian parties have youth wings that are little more than armed street gangs. The CNDD-FDD's youth wing, the Imbonerakure, is by far the most powerful, and it has conducted attacks on opposition party members. After the July 2010 elections Imbonerakure youths were reportedly conducting illegal arrests of opposition leaders. So the leaders had a reason to flee. Their absence, however, has thus left the CNDD-FDD completely in charge. The umbrella opposition group formed after the elections, the Democratic Alliance for Change (ADC-Ikibiri), is increasingly divided between leaders who want to revive the Arusha process and those who are ready to start a new civil war.

January 3, 2013: UN planners are providing more details about the international peacekeeping unit the Security Council would like to see deploy in the eastern Congo to help control and dismantle rebel militias like M23. The proposed Neutral International Force (NIF) would be formed as an intervention brigade of 2,500 troops to possibly 4,000. Both figures have appeared in print. The brigade would be assigned to MONUSCO. It would have quick reaction force capabilities so that it could quickly intervene to stop a rebel attack.

January 4, 2013: Congolese M23 rebel officers claimed that FDLR commanders are operating with Congolese Army units and Congolese security forces.

January 6, 2013: Rwanda continues to receive extensive criticism from the UN, major donor nations, and major non-governmental aid organizations for its alleged support of the M23 Congolese rebel movement. The criticism and condemnation, however, is not without irony. Rwanda is now a member of the UN Security Council (it was elected to one of the non-permanent member seats). Rwanda is also something of a darling among aid organizations and anti-corruption advocacy organizations. The 2012 Transparency International ranked Rwanda number 50 (out of 176 countries rated) on its corruption perceptions index. The index ranks from least corrupt (Denmark was number one) to most corrupt (at 174, a three-way tie among North Korea, Afghanistan, and Somalia). To put Rwanda's ranking in perspective, Burundi was ranked 165. Neighboring Uganda was 130 and Kenya 139. In other words, given its east and central African location the country rates as comparatively clean and corruption-free. In fact, Rwanda ranked higher than China (number 80). The government has focused on trying to reduce corruption, for several reasons. Aid donors want their money to go to the projects and people they target, not the pockets of corrupt officials. Less corruption makes Rwanda an attractive place for many aid NGOs. Honest government also attracts international businesses that might want to operate or invest in Rwanda. Rwanda has been touting itself as the best place to do business in east Africa. It has made starting a new business relatively easy and inexpensive for Rwandans and foreigners. Streamlining business registration has a counter-corruption angle. Streamlining registration business has eliminated some of the bureaucratic bottlenecks that a corrupt official of yesteryear would promise to resolve in exchange for a bribe. Imposing severe penalties on corrupt officials, however, has been the government's biggest tool. The government actually jails embezzlers and bribe takers. Several years ago President Paul Kagame said that his administration would have no tolerance for people who stole public funds. Since 2004 the government has an agency, the Ombudsman Office, which monitors fund distribution. The agency has a record for investigating high-level bureaucrats and government officials. (Austin Bay)

January 14, 2013: Rwanda announced that it will not support UN plans to employ unmanned aerial reconnaissance and surveillance aircraft (drones) in the Congo unless the UN provides very specific information about how, when, and where they will be utilized. The UN is discussing deploying UN peacekeeping troops to confront the M23 rebel group in the Congo's Nort h Kivu province.

January 23, 20113: Tea isn't petroleum but there is an international demand for the product. Rwanda recently agreed to help form a tea producer's association, the International Tea Producers Forum. The other members are India, Kenya, Malawi, Indonesia, and Sri Lanka. These six nations produce over half of the world's tea. At the moment the association is not a cartel but for almost two decades Sri Lanka has tried to get other tea producers to agree to production quotas.

January 25, 2013: Burundi troops are to participate in the African Union's International Support Mission in Mali (AFISMA). The government did not provide a strength figure. Burundi has troops deployed in Somalia as part of the AU's mission in Somalia (AMISOM)

January 29, 2013: Belgium has noted friction is increasing between the Rwandan and Congolese expatriate communities in Brussels. This included shouting matches and street fights. The inter-community squabbling is a reflection of the continuing trouble between the two countries. Approximately 25,000 Congolese live in and near Brussels. Some 10,000 Rwandans live in the area. Members of the Congolese community recently held a protest march outside the Rwandan embassy in Brussels.

Meanwhile, the government is asking the UN and neighboring nations to pay attention to what it claims is the reviving threat posed by the Democratic Forces for the Liberation of Rwanda (FDLR). The FDLR was formed by radical Hutus involved in the 1994 Rwandan genocide. The Hutu radicals murdered 800,000 Rwandan Tutsis and Hutu moderates. The government is touting reports that the FDLR is regrouping in the Congo's North Kivu province. One Rwandan source contends that the Congolese Army (FARDC) is working with the FDLR. The UN peacekeeping mission in the Congo (MONUSCO) admitted there had been an increase in FDLR activity.

February 5, 2013: The Rwandan government continues to claim that it is not aiding the Congolese M23 rebel group. It is also claiming that it did not help create M23. The government, however, is acknowledging that it is concerned about the threats made by major donor nations to curtail aid to Rwanda. The threats are being used by donor nations to force Rwanda to help stop M23's rebellion. Despite the country's economic growth, aid provides between 40 to 45 percent of the country's budget. Several donors have curtailed financing for infrastructure projects and others are threatening to withhold funds.

February 15, 2013: The UN Security Council voted to extend for another year the mandate to maintain the UN Office in Burundi (BNUB). The office serves as the residual headquarters of what was the UN peacekeeping effort in Burundi.

February 19, 2013: The UN Security Council and the UN Secretary General once again accused Rwanda of providing external support to the rebel M23 group in the Congo. UN investigators concluded that M23's ability to provide its ground attacks with well-coordinated fire support demonstrated that it was receiving outside aid.

February 21, 2013: The UN announced that Burundi's political reconciliation program is making progress. Burundi's next national elections are scheduled for 2015. The UN wants Burundi to hold fair and credible elections.

February 22, 2013: The Rwandan military is reportedly holding around 300 deserters in a prison located on Iwawa Island in Lake Kivu. The island prison has not been inspected by the Red Cross.

March 3, 2013: The 2004 Arusha peace agreement stated that the Burundian Army had to undergo an extensive reform process. One requirement was that the army have a 50-50 ethnic balance between Hutus and Tutsis. However, at the moment no one is quite sure if the military has reached that goal. The army has around 30,000 soldiers and a billet in the Burundian Army is regarded as a prestigious job. Moreover, the pay is exceptionally good for Burundian soldiers who are serving with the African Union peacekeeping force in Somalia (AMISOM). When they are deployed, each soldier earns $1,028 a month. The government takes a cut in taxes (around $100) but the rest goes into a personal bank account in the soldier's name. In 2012 the Burundian military earned the country about $45 million, if the value of UN and AU provided equipment is included. In addition, international sources also pay for logistics costs. Burundian soldiers did not always make $1,028 a month. In 2010, Burundian soldiers, who were earning around $750 a month, learned that other UN peacekeepers were receiving more. They lodged a protest. Ultimately, the UN raised their pay.

March 10, 2013: Will Rwandan president Paul Kagame leave power in 2017? Though the next election is four years away Rwandan media are already asking what the county calls the big question. Rwanda's constitution says Kagame cannot have another term. However, Kagame is the most powerful man in Rwanda and is regarded as the intellectual and political force behind the country's modernization effort. He also has the respect of the Rwandan Army. Kagame recently indicated he plans to step down in 2017.

March 20, 2013: The March 18 surrender of M23 rebel leader Bosco Ntaganda caught many Rwandans by surprise. Ntaganda was the rebel Congolese general who formed the M23 rebel movement. After a fight with a rival M23 faction Ntaganda fled to Rwanda. He formally surrendered at the U.S. Embassy in Rwanda (in Kigali). Ntaganda told U.S. embassy officials that he wanted to turn himself in to the International Criminal Court.

March 25, 2013: The government confirmed that a unit of the Rwandan Army (Rwanda Defense Force, RDF) has deployed to Nepal to participate in a multi-national peacekeeping exercise. The exercise is code-named Shanti Prayas II. The exercise will last two weeks.

March 27, 2013: Rwanda and Congo have released more information about Bosco Ntaganda's surrender. U.S. intelligence officers helped arrange Ntaganda's surrender at the U.S. embassy in Rwanda. Around 650 M23 fighters loyal to Ntaganda also entered Rwanda and surrendered. However, a rival M23 faction loyal to M23 commander Sultani Makenga is still operating in Congo.

March 28, 2013: The UN Security Council approved the creation of an intervention brigade for deployment in Congo's eastern provinces. The unit will deploy three infantry battalions plus a recon company, a special forces company and an artillery battery. Rwanda agreed to support the creation of the brigade.

April 1. 2013: Rwanda assumed temporary leadership of the UN Security Council. The Rwandan UN ambassador will preside over Security Council meetings throughout the month of April. Ironically, Rwanda was also a member of the Security Council in 1994, when the Rwandan genocide occurred.

April 2, 2013: The Rwandan government has moved 682 former M23 Congolese rebels from a border area to a camp inside Rwanda. Most of the M23 fighters have been identified as Congolese Tutsi tribesmen. They belong to the M23 faction that was loyal to Bosco Ntaganda but lost out in a fight with a rival faction, which split M23 in March. The government said the move was made in order to comply with international conventions, which state that refugees should be placed in camps at least 50 kilometers from the border of their home country.

Police reported that someone launched a grenade attack in a bus station in the Kirironko area of Kigali (Rwanda's capital).

April 3, 2013: The U.S. has put out a reward of five million dollar for information leading to the arrest of Democratic Forces for the Liberation of Rwanda (FDLR) leader Sylvestre Mudacumura. In 2012 the International Criminal Court (ICC) issued a warrant for his arrest on charges of war crimes and crimes against humanity. Mudacumura was involved in the 1994 Rwandan genocide that killed over 800,000 people. Since then the Rwandan government has been asking for help in either arresting or eliminating Mudacumura.

April 11. 2013: Two international business and economic organizations have rated Rwanda in the top ten of African countries positioned to take economic and social advantage of digital communication technologies. Rwanda was the top ranked East African nation. It ranked sixth in Africa overall.

April 18. 2013: The Rwandan government announced that it wants all Rwandans who fled the country to return to Rwanda. The government intends to treat the returnees as citizens, not refugees.

April 21, 2013: Some 9,000 Rwandan Hutu refugees have been living in a Ugandan refugee camp located at Nakivale. Some of the refugees arrived in 1994 during and after the Rwandan genocide. Rwnada recently announced that it wants all Rwandan citizens to return to Rwanda. Many of the Hutus at the camp, however, have told Ugandan officials that they believe Rwandan Tutsis will harm them if they return to Rwanda. The refugees say they will not accept enforced repatriation. African investigators have reported that some of the Hutu refugees may have been involved in the genocide, making them liable to be prosecuted if they return.

April 22, 2013: The U.S. State Department issued a travel warning for Burundi. Because Burundi has a military unit involved in peacekeeping operations in Somalia, the Somali militant Islamist terrorist group al Shabaab continues to threaten to carry out attacks in Burundi. The State Department said that U.S. installations, companies and citizens in Burundi could be targeted by al Shabaab.

April 23, 2013: In Rwanda 200 Burundi national police officers have begun a four months-long training program. The training program prepares police for deployment with peacekeeping forces. The Rwandan Police Training School (located in Gishari) sponsors the program.

May 2. 2013: The UN has come out full force in support of Rwanda's economic development strategy. However, it is not like the strategy is anything new. Rwanda has been pursuing international investment for a decade and implementing common sense economic reforms for the last five years. The government has also been cracking down on corruption, at least the bribe-taking government regulator form of corruption. So why the new vocal UN support? It looks like it is part of the pay-off for Rwanda agreeing to support the UN intervention brigade in the Congo and crack down on Rwanda-based support for the M23 Congolese rebel movement. There is also another read some African commentators have made. The UN response to the 1994 Rwanda genocide was haphazard and in retrospect very inadequate. Support for Rwandan economic reform is belated payback for that failure. This falls into the realm of maybe, but probably not. The UN Security Council was very hard on Rwanda regarding allegations and evidence that Rwandans supported M23. However, when Rwanda was elected to serve on the Security Council as a non-permanent member, it was seated, over Congolese objections. The Security Council seat makes more sense as a payback for the UN's 1994 failure.

May 19, 2013: Two people were killed when 15 armed men ambushed a bus near Gatumba (outskirts of Burundi's capital, Bujumbura). Police believe the attackers were former National Liberation Forces (FNL) guerrilla fighters who had crossed the border from a camp in eastern Congo. Ten people were wounded in the attack. Survivors reported that some of the attackers sang a song associated with the FNL.

May 28, 2013: The UN honored all UN peacekeepers who have died while serving on peacekeeping missions. Five Rwandan soldiers were among those honored. Four were slain in Sudan's western Darfur region while serving with the UNAMID operation. One was killed in Haiti while serving with the United Nations Stabilization Mission in Haiti (MINUSTAH).

May 29, 2013: Burundi has started another campaign to try to get civilians with illegal small arms and explosives to turn the weapons in to the government. The last campaign (in 2009) was regarded as a success. Security agencies took control of 16,000 grenades, 160,000 rounds of ammo, 2,700 assorted rifles, and 5,000 explosive devices.

May 30, 2013: The Rwandan government and many Rwandans are upset that Tanzania has urged the Rwandan government to negotiate with the Democratic Forces for the Liberation of Rwanda (FDLR) rebel group. The Tanzanian recommendation was made at a recent African Union meeting. The leadership of the FDLR includes Hutu extremists who helped organize the 1994 Rwandan genocide.

June 1, 2013: A growing number of South Africans are not convinced their country should provide troops for the UN's Intervention Brigade. The brigade is already deploying in the Congo's troubled North Kivu province. Senior members of South Africa's dominant political party, the African National Congress (ANC), have publicly mentioned that they are worried about foreign support for some of the rebel militias operating in the area. The South African politicians did not specifically mention Rwanda but Rwanda has been accused of providing the Congolese M23 rebel group with money, weapons, and training. A 2012 UN report provided documented evidence of support for M23 coming through Rwanda. This produced vehement official denials.

June 3, 2013: Rwanda, in response to a recent suggestion that it negotiate with the FDLR, said that it will never negotiate with individuals or groups who have promoted genocide. The official statement also employed the term "Genocide Ideology." Basically, genocide ideology means people who promote Hutu tribal supremacy. What the government is saying is that it will not negotiate – ever-- with the FDLR.

June 5, 2013: The UN insists that nations involved in the Framework initiative for stabilizing central Africa must be prepared to fight the Democratic Forces for the Liberation of Rwanda (FDLR) rebel group. The FDLR was founded by Rwandan Interahamwe Hutu extremists who organized and participated in the 1994 Rwandan genocide. The Tutsi-led Rwandan Patriotic Front invaded Rwanda from Uganda, stopped the genocide, and defeated the Interahamwe. Surviving Interahamwe fled into the eastern Congo. The Interahamwe were radical members of the Hutu tribe-dominated National Republican Movement for Democracy and Development (MRND), which ruled Rwanda from 1975 to 1994. Rwanda has claimed that the FDLR receives support from sources in the Congo. The UN statement follows a Rwandan government statement that it will not negotiate with the FDLR. The statement could indicate that the Intervention Brigade may include the FDLR on its list of targeted militias and rebel groups.

June 11, 2013: Opposition political leaders in Burundi accused the ruling CNDD-FDD (National Council for the Defense of Democracy-Force for Defense of Democracy) of using its party youth wing (the Imbonerakure) as a militia. The opposition parties made these charges before the last election and other observers concluded the charges were legitimate. The Imbonerakure conducted “security patrols” while armed with machetes and rifles. The opposition parties claimed that the patrols were really intimidation operations.

June 17, 2013: Burundi reported that the May 19 bus ambush was the first cross-border rebel attack since 2011. Members of the Burundi rebel National Liberation Forces (FNL) were responsible. This put the FNL back on the active list of rogue militia and rebel groups operating in the eastern Congo. That means the FNL could be a target of the UN’s new Congo Intervention Brigade.

June 30, 2013: UN investigators reported that Rwanda continues to provide limited support for the Congolese M23 rebel group. The UN acknowledged that the support M23 now receives from Rwandan sources is much less than it was in 2012. However, sympathetic Rwandans (including, allegedly, Rwandan military officers) provide low-level support. For example, the UN investigators said they have evidence that Rwandan officials let M23 recruit militiamen inside Rwanda. The UN said that M23 no longer receives support from Ugandan sources. The UN also looked into Rwandan allegations that the Congolese Army (FARDC) was collaborating with the Democratic Forces for the Liberation for Rwanda (FDLR) rebel group. The FDLR was founded by Hutu extremists who were directly involved in the 1994 genocide. UN monitors reported that there is evidence this occurred. The UN has asked the Congo government for more information.

July 2, 2013: Rwanda has signed on to the UN's Framework peace agreement for stabilizing central Africa. This means that Rwanda has agreed to the deployment of the UN's Intervention Brigade. The brigade is a peacekeeping unit with an offensive mission. It is authorized to target and neutralize armed rebel groups and militias in the Congo. The armed group most often and most prominently mentioned as an Intervention Brigade target is M23, a Congolese rebel group with ties to ethnic Tutsis living in the Congo. The Rwandan government has long been accused of providing aid for M23. The Rwandan government denies the accusations and a recent UN investigation indicates that this support has declined considerably in the last few months. Before that, UN investigators documented a lot of support for M23 coming from sources within Rwanda. At the moment, Rwandan Tutsis politically dominate Rwanda. So why does Rwanda support the Framework and at least indirectly agree to deploying the Intervention Brigade? There are several obvious reasons. Money was one. Rwanda relies on donations and several major donor nations, including Great Britain, either withheld aid or threatened to withhold aid unless Rwanda agreed to the UN peace process. The Congo and M23 could reach a peace deal. The rebels and the Congolese government have representatives in Uganda. Though negotiations are fitful, you cannot rule out the possibility of a peaceful resolution to M23's rebellion. However, Rwanda has repeatedly insisted that it will not compromise in its struggle with the extremist Hutus who orchestrated the 1994 genocide. The Democratic Forces for the Liberation of Rwanda (FDLR) continue to operate from bases in the eastern Congo. M23 is a thug outfit. The FDLR, however, is run by genocidal Hutu supremacists. Could the Intervention Brigade target the FDLR? In early June UN officials made some rather suggestive comments about the FDLR. The destruction of the FDLR could be Rwanda's pay-off for good behavior. (Austin Bay)

November 1, 2013: Praying with refugees in Congo: reconciliation brings hope'

JRS: Bujumbura - "I grew up hating. I believed the others were bad people. They were not like us", said Léonce, a Burundian refugee, who spoke with honesty about his experience of prejudice. Growing up with prejudices is something most of us can identify with. Some prejudices last our entire lives while others develop later. Parting with them is often harder than we think.

Reconciliation requires sacrifice. It means stepping out of your comfort zone, confronting your prejudices, and admitting your own transgressions. Only then can we recognise the dignity of others. Ninety-nine years ago today, Pope Benedict XV wrote in his first encyclical, Ad Beatissimi Apostolorum, "… day by day the earth is drenched with newly-shed blood. Who would imagine as we see them thus filled with hatred of one another, that they are all of one common stock, all of the same nature, all members of the same human society?"

Violence, often fuelled by ethnic tensions, has touched the lives of almost everyone in eastern Democratic Republic of Congo (DRC). At a vigil for peace in Syria last month, Pope Francis reminded us that "to be human means to care for one another…violence is not answered with violence : death is not answered with the language of death". Jesuit Refugee Service staff in the country are powerful examples of those who have chosen peace over violence. Masumbuko*, a JRS driver in the North Kivu province, lost his sister in an incursion last week. He is already back at work. Earlier this year, JRS staff Consolata and Lwanzo were hijacked by an armed group who stole their vehicle. Despite this traumatic experience, they continue to work in service for those who suffer around them.

Francisca, another JRS team member, lives a day's journey from her husband and children whom she sees once a month. Testing roads, a wearisome work environment, long hours and security risks are all sacrifices she makes in pursuit of peace. The commitment of these staff members is a testament to their faith in the future of their country. There is a collective desire to heal the wounds of the past and move forward together. Reconciliation, like faith, must be an active, dynamic process. Léonce now works in JRS community projects alongside those he once despised and distrusted. "These are now my brothers and sisters. They give me hope", he said. This name has been changed for reasons of security

BURUNDI: Vice President of the Constitutional Court of Burundi Sylvere Nimpagaritse, fled the country just hours before the decision was issued. According to Mr Nimpagaritse, at judges' conferencing of 30th April 2015, the majority view was that President Nkurunziza was constitutionally barred from standing for re-election. However, as he tells it, the judges had since then come under 'enormous pressure and even death threats' which had resulted in the Court's capitulation to the will of the CNDD-FDD."

Article 96: The provision that could break Burundi - OPINION by Dr. Busingye Kabumba (May 13, 2015)

On 24th April 2015, the Conseil National Pour la Défense de la Démocratie–Forces pour la Défense de la Démocratie (CNDD–FDD), the ruling party in Burundi, endorsed His Excellency Pierre Nkurunziza as its candidate to contest the Presidential elections, slated for 26th June 2015.

On 25th April 2015, a number of Burundians took to the streets of Bujumbura to protest this decision. Since then, at least 18 people are reported to have been killed in the protests, with the wounded standing at 216.

Another 40,000 people are reported to have fled the country for fear of their lives. There seems to be no immediate end in sight to this unrest, with protests continuing despite a government order to end them.

At the root of this crisis lies the question as to the proper interpretation of Article 96 of the Burundi Constitution, which provides: The President of the Republic is elected by universal direct suffrage for a mandate of five years renewable one time. According to the Opposition, President Nkurunziza is not eligible to stand as a candidate in the 2015 elections, having served two terms as President, since his first election in 2005. The CNDD-FDD, on the other hand, argues that the first term should not be taken into account for purposes of Article 96 since that election was by the National Assembly and therefore not by 'universal adult suffrage'. For its part, in a decision handed down on 5th May 2015, the Constitutional Court of Burundi has favoured the latter view of Article 96. However, the Court's decision has had little effect in terms of resolving the crisis, with the Burundian Opposition dismissing it as politically motivated. Matters have not been helped by the fact that the Vice President of the Court, Sylvere Nimpagaritse, fled the country just hours before the decision was issued. According to Mr Nimpagaritse, at judges' conferencing of 30th April 2015, the majority view was that President Nkurunziza was constitutionally barred from standing for re-election. However, as he tells it, the judges had since then come under 'enormous pressure and even death threats' which had resulted in the Court's capitulation to the will of the CNDD-FDD.

This brief comment seeks to offer a view regarding the interpretation of Article 96 of the Burundi Constitution, as a modest contribution to the peace and stability of that country.

In this regard, it appears that the 2005 Constitution of Burundi must be read in light of the Arusha Peace and Reconciliation Agreement for Burundi ('the Arusha Agreement'), a key milestone in ending the long conflict in that country and perhaps the most important inspiration for the letter and spirit of the Constitution. Indeed, in its decision of 5th May, the Constitutional Court acknowledged that '[i]n order to understand the spirit of the Constitution, it is useful to first, understand the document which mostly inspired the drafters of the 2005 Constitution.' The Court also noted that '[t]o establish the intention of the drafters, one may examine the documents which inspired the Burundian drafters' and that it would give 'special attention' to the Agreement as 'a genuine, unavoidable and indispensable document from which the inspiration was drawn by the Burundian Constitution drafters.' [Emphasis added] In the same vein, the Court acknowledged that the Arusha Agreement, and in particular that part of it relating to constitutional principles, was the 'Constitution's bedrock' and that whoever violated the main constitutional principles of the Arusha could not claim to respect the Burundian Constitution.

It is to the Arusha Agreement, therefore, that we must first turn to in order to find the true meaning of Article 96 of the Burundi Constitution. Under the Preamble of that Agreement, the Parties recorded their awareness 'of the fact that peace, stability, justice, the rule of law, national reconciliation, unity and development' were the major aspirations of the people of Burundi' and further affirmed their commitment to 'shape a political order and a system of government inspired by the realities of [Burundi] and founded on the values of justice, democracy, good governance, pluralism, respect for the fundamental rights and freedoms of the individual, unity, solidarity, mutual understanding, tolerance and cooperation among the different ethnic groups within [Burundi]'. In terms of Article 1 of the Agreement, the Parties accepted as binding 5 (five) Protocols, which were deemed to form an integral part of the Agreement. These Protocols related to: the nature of the conflict, problems of genocide and exclusion and their solutions (Protocol I): democracy and good governance (Protocol II): peace and security for all (Protocol III): reconstruction and development (Protocol IV) as well as guarantees on the implementation of the Agreement (Protocol V). Protocol II is most directly relevant for our present purposes, as it laid down, in broad strokes, the major terms of what came to be the 2005 Constitution of Burundi. The question of the election of the President was squarely dealt with under Article 7 of this Protocol. In terms of Article 7 (1) (a), the Burundi Constitution was required to provide that save for the very first election of a President, the President of the Republic had to be elected by direct universal suffrage. Under Article 7 (1) (c), for the first election, to be held during the transition period, the President would be indirectly elected as specified in Article 20 (10) of the Protocol. Article 7 (3) further specifically provided that the President would be elected for a term of five years, renewable only once, and that no one could serve more than two presidential terms. Under Article 20 (10) of the Protocol, the first post - transition President would be elected by the National Assembly and Senate sitting together by a majority of two-thirds of the votes.

Up to the above point, the matter appears relatively straightforward. Both the letter and spirit of the Arusha Agreement appear to categorically reflect the position that a President of Burundi could serve only two terms. In addition, it was quite clear that the agreed position was that while the President had to be elected by universal suffrage, this requirement would not apply to the first Presidential election following the transition, which would be an indirect election. This notwithstanding, for the avoidance of all doubt, this first indirect election would be counted towards the two-term limit, as envisaged by Article 7 (3) of Protocol II.

It is important, as this point, to additionally highlight the terms of Article 3 of the Arusha Agreement, in which the Parties committed themselves to 'refrain from any act or behaviour contrary to the provisions of the Agreement', as well as to 'spare no effort to ensure that the said provisions are respected and implemented in their letter and spirit in order to ensure the attainment of genuine unity, reconciliation, lasting peace, security for all, solid democracy and on equitable sharing of resources in Burundi.' [Emphasis added]

What, then, is the problem that has led to the death of 18 people and caused displacement of 40,000 others? It seems to be that the letter of the Arusha Agreement was rather inelegantly transposed into the Burundian Constitution. In particular, in the place of the more extended, clearer and 'tighter' provisions of Article 7 of Protocol II of the Arusha Agreement, the Burundi Constitution has the one sentence in Article 96 - 'The President of the Republic is elected by universal direct suffrage for a mandate of five years renewable one time.' A little more of the letter, and spirit, of the Arusha Accord, is tucked away in Article 302, almost out of sight, appearing towards the end of the Constitution under Title XV of that document, titled 'Of the particular provisions for the first post -transition period'. According to Article 302, 'exceptionally, the first

President of the Republic of the post-transition period is elected by the [elected] National Assembly and the elected Senate meeting in Congress, with a majority of two-thirds of the members.' [Emphasis added]

To be sure, Article 7 of Protocol II of the Arusha Agreement reads more clearly than Articles 96 and 302 of the Burundian Constitution. However, does this mean that Article 7 of Protocol II means something other than Articles 96 and 302 of the Constitution? In my opinion, it does not. One of the cardinal rules of constitutional interpretation is that a constitution must be read as an integrated whole, to ascertain its broad purpose and meaning, rather than in a piecemeal fashion which might lead to a result which is inimical to its broader architecture. Perhaps one of the most compelling articulations of this important principle was the statement by Amissah P of the Court of Appeal of Botswana in the 1992 case of Unity Dow v Attorney General:

[T]he first task of a Court when called upon to construe any of the provisions of the Constitution is to have a sober objective appraisal of the general canvass upon which the details of the constitutional picture are painted. It will be doing violence to the Constitution to take a particular provision and interpret it one way which will destroy or mutilate the whole basis of the Constitution when by a different construction the beauty, cohesion, integrity and healthy development of the State through the Constitution will be maintained … [T]he overriding principle must be an adherence to the general picture presented by the Constitution into which each individual provision must fit in order to maintain in essential details the picture of which the framers could have painted had they been faced with circumstances of today.

It does seem, applying this important principle, that a reading of Articles 96 and 302 of the Burundian Constitution should lead to the same result as that of Article 7 of Protocol II of the Arusha Agreement. The inelegance of the design of the Constitution aside, Article 302 does refer to the fact that the indirect election of the first President of following the transition was an 'exceptional' matter, a reading which, together with Article 96, should lead to the conclusion that President Nkurunziza's first term, while not under universal suffrage, was indeed a term which must be counted for purposes of the two-term limit under Article 96. Quite simply, under a proper and holistic interpretation of Articles 96 and 302, it is difficult to sustain the argument that President Nkurunziza can lawfully seek re-election in 2015. Moreover, it is even more difficult make this argument if due regard is had to the terms of the Arusha Agreement, which in the Constitutional Court's own words is the 'bedrock' of the Constitution and 'a genuine, unavoidable and indispensable' guide to its interpretation.

How then could the Constitutional Court have reached the decision that it did? In the first place, the Court expressly acknowledged that 'the negotiators [of the Arusha Agreement] indeed wanted to prevent any president serving more than two terms. ' The Court also noted that a reading of Article 7 of Protocol II 'clearly shows that the intention of the Arusha Agreement negotiators was to limit the number of terms to two'. The Court then, curiously, observed that 'that it must be stated that the drafters of the 2005 constitution erroneously interpreted the Arusha Agreement recommendation.' From this moment on, the Court's argument appeared to take a strange and rather illogical turn. According to the Court, the location of Article 302 under Title XV of the Constitutional (First Post-Transition Period) and the 'vagueness' of the word 'exceptionally' under that Article, 'appears to be independent of Article 96 of the same Constitution thereby creating a completely exceptional and special mandate which is unrelated to Article 96.' With respect to the Court, it is difficult to see the 'vagueness' of the word 'exceptionally' as used under Article 302. If anything, read together with Article 96, the word ‘exceptionally’ appears to be a very apt term for the purposes of making it clear that while in principle presidential terms are limited to two and that they must be by universal suffrage, the first term of the post -transition President should be counted as one of the two terms for purposes of Article 96. This is especially so, if indeed, the Arusha Agreement is a ‘genuine, unavoidable and indispensable’ guide to the construction of Articles 96 and 302 of the Constitution. The Court’s additional justification is even more difficult to comprehend. According to the Court, another reason for reading Article 302 as creating a special dispensation, separate from Article 96, was the consideration that ‘the application of Article 302 will also delay limiting the number of presidential terms by universal direct suffrage provided for in Article 96.’ In my view, if anything, it is the failure to properly interprete and apply Article 302 that would delay the application of Article 96, since a reading of the two provisions makes it reasonably clear that the intention from the outset was to limit Presidential terms to two, including in this enumeration the first term of the post-transition President conducted under indirect elections. Perhaps the most unfortunate portion of the decision, and one which perhaps best reflects its logical inconsistency is this:

Considering that as stated above, the spirit and the letter of Arusha Peace and Reconciliation Agreements must be respected and that no president can serve more than two terms, the president elected under Article 302 of the current constitution may renew his term once by universal direct suffrage without violating the Constitution.

Again, with the utmost respect to the Court, it is very difficult to see how it can at once claim to consider the ‘spirit and letter’ of the Arusha Agreement, which would lead to the inescapable conclusion (as it rightly points out) that ‘no president can serve more than two terms’ and in the same breath conclude that a President elected under the Constitution can actually serve more than two terms. If indeed, as it claims, the Court took issue with the phrasing (or the letter) of the Constitution, then, at the very least, it was the supreme duty of that Court to give effect both to the spirit of that Constitution, as well as to the letter and spirit of the Arusha Agreement, in its capacity as (again to use the Court’s words) ‘the bedrock’ of the Constitution.

In my view, it is not the drafters of the 2005 Constitution who, as the Court claims ‘erroneously interpreted the Arusha Agreement’. Rather, it is the Constitutional Court which has erroneously interpreted the Burundian Constitution. Indeed, the framers of the Constitution could have made themselves clearer and expressly themselves more articulately. However, in the words of Amissah P noted above, it fell upon the Court to conduct a 'sober objective appraisal of the general canvass upon which the details of the [Burundian] constitutional picture are painted'. Instead, the Court has smudged that picture and torn that canvass in a way that might destroy the delicate peace established under the Arusha Agreement.

Given the failure of the Constitutional Court in this respect, the solution now appears to lie with the political process at the domestic, regional and international levels, to try and ensure a return to constitutional order and peace in that country. Already there are important indications in this regard, with the United Nations and the African Union both issuing statements calling upon President Nkurunziza to respect the letter and spirit of the Burundian Constitution. The greatest responsibility at this point, however, lies with the President to do the right thing and observe the terms of both the Arusha Agreement and the 2005 Constitution. To do otherwise would be to risk the lives of more Burundians and to push the country even closer to the brink of renewed civil conflict. The President would do very well, in this regard, to heed the wise counsel of outgoing Nigerian President Goodluck Jonathan, who in his concession speech following his loss in the just concluded elections in that country, observed that:

As I have always affirmed, nobody's ambition is worth the blood of any Nigerian. The unity, stability and progress of our dear country is more important than anything else.

In following this counsel, President Nkurunziza would also live up to the letter and spirit of Article 95 of the Burundi Constitution, which establishes a very high burden upon the Head of State in terms of maintain national unity, peace and stability:

The President of the Republic, Head of the State, incarnates the national unity, sees to the respect for the Constitution and assures by his arbitration the continuity of the State and the regular functioning of the institutions. He is the guarantor of the national independence, of the integrity of the territory and of the respect for the international treaties and agreements.

It is my most sincere hope, that President Nkurunziza, and other well - meaning Burundians, will find it in themselves to remember the long journey and effort that has led up to the relative peace that now prevails in Burundi, and that by their present action, will secure the future of peace, progress and stability envisaged under the 2005 Constitution. (Text ends)

BURUNDI: Daily Monitor - Army general declares coup against President Nkurunziza

Gen. Godefroid Niyombareh announced that a national salvation committee had been set up to run the country

A Burundi army general says President Pierre Nkurunziza has been "overthrown" amid unrest over his bid to be re-elected for a third term. Major General Godefroid Niyombare said a salvation committee had been set up, but the outcome of the coup is unclear. Thousands protesting against the president in the capital, Bujumbura, are now reported to be celebrating.

President Nkurunziza is currently in Tanzania. The presidency's Twitter site said the coup attempt had failed. Mr Nkurunziza has been meeting other East African leaders to discuss the crisis.

I a series ofTwitter postings, the Burundi presidency at first said the situation was under control and that there was no coup, then that the attempted coup had failed. Presidential spokesman Willy Nyamitwe told the BBC that forces loyal to Mr Nkurunziza were "in full control" and that Gen Niyombare and his allies were being sought.

Thousands of protesters marched to the city centre alongside soldiers and two tanks after the coup was announced. Police shot at the soldiers and the crowd. At least two protesters were killed. The protesters continued to march, one telling the BBC this was a victory after weeks of protests.

They reached the offices of the state broadcaster which was still in the control of soldiers loyal to the president. There are some reports that forces supporting the coup are now trying to enter the building and are meeting resistance. Other reports say those loyal to the president and those supporting the coup are now in negotiations.

BBC reporters in the capital say that protesters have broken into the national jail and have released detained demonstrators, before burning down the building. In some outlying districts, protesters were being held up at checkpoints and prevented from moving into the city by security forces, but the mood was said to be largely celebratory. (Text ends)

BURUNDI: Who's Afraid of African Democracy?

Helen Epstein (May 21, 2015)

Poor Burundi. Landlocked, tiny, and known mainly for ethnic conflict, it was for years the subject of one of the most intense international peace - building efforts in history. By the time the Arusha Peace Agreement was finally signed in 2003, 300,000 Burundians had died in a civil war rivaling in ferocity that of its neighbor Rwanda. Huge sums had been invested in grassroots workshops, high-level meetings and summits to end the fighting. According to Burundi specialist Peter Uvin, taxi drivers in the capital Bujumbura joke that the per diems received during these protracted negotiations built the poshest neighborhood in the city. Now, a decade after the peace process came to what seemed a successful conclusion, and despite billions of dollars in humanitarian aid, the country appears to be falling apart again.

In April, President Pierre Nkurunziza, in power since 2005, announced he'd be running for a third term in elections scheduled for June. Opposition supporters, church leaders, student and civil society groups, much of the international community, and even many in Nkurunziza's own party say this violates the Arusha agreement, which limits a president to two terms in office. They also accuse Nkurunziza—a former warlord who became a born-again Christian and travels with his own Hallelujah football club and choir—of presiding over a regime of corruption remarkable even by East African standards. Many also claim President Nkurunziza has condoned politically motivated killings of opposition figures and provided tacit government support to an armed militia known as Imbonerakure, which could be deployed to intimidate voters during the election.

Thousands of Burundians took to the streets in mid-April to protest Nkurunziza's plans to run for office again. Hundreds were arrested and perhaps twenty—the number is disputed—were killed. Security forces were split, with some in the army on the side of the people. On May 13, a group of army officers led by former intelligence chief Godefroid Niyombare announced they'd ousted Nkurunziza, to much rejoicing in Bujumbura. Nkurunziza was in Tanzania discussing the crisis with other African leaders, but he quickly snuck back across the border where he was met by his own forces and retook the capital a couple of days later.

Niyombare is said to be on the run, and most of his fellow coup plotters have been arrested. Three who were wounded were subsequently shot in their hospital beds by men in police uniforms as horrified nurses, doctors, and other patients looked on. An estimated hundred thousand refugees have fled to neighboring countries. The protestors are continuing their demonstrations, while Nkurunziza seems determined to go ahead with his plans to stand for reelection. On Wednesday, Radio France Internationale reported that police in Bujumbura had cordoned off an entire neighborhood and were shooting at anti-third term activists among their homes.

What makes events in this tiny country so important, and so heartbreaking, is that they are part of a recent pattern that actually seemed hopeful. When protest movements swept across the Middle East region—in Iran in 2009 and then in the Arab Spring countries —they didn't stop at the Sahara desert. In their new book Africa Uprising, Adam Branch and Zachariah Mampilly document more than ninety political protests in forty African countries in the past decade—most in the past six years. Many have had the same aim as those in the Middle East: to force corrupt leaders out of power.

Some have been encouraging: after Senegal's Constitutional Court ruled—under duress, some say—that President Abdoulaye Wade could run for what many maintained was an unconstitutional third term in the 2012 elections, people poured onto the streets in outrage. Police in riot gear fired tear gas and rubber bullets, and a handful of protesters were killed. But the country's citizens got their point across. Wade lost the election and conceded defeat.

There's also cautious optimism about Burkina Faso. When President Blaise Compaoré tried to strongarm the National Assembly into removing term limits so he could contest the 2015 election, hundreds of thousands of people gathered in front of the building while some forced their way in. He was deposed in October 2014, and an interim military council is now organizing elections to take place later this year. And when demonstrators in the Democratic Republic of Congo took to the streets of Kinshasa in January, they managed to halt President Joseph Kabila's attempt to alter the constitution, which would have extended his term beyond its end date of 2016.

Attempts at tyrant-removal are unlikely to end anytime soon. Over two dozen African countries are headed for elections in the next two years, including Uganda, Rwanda, Ethiopia, South Sudan, and other countries whose leaders have signaled an intention to remain in office no matter what. Protest movements in some of these countries are gathering force, and army commanders are quietly choosing sides between the autocrats and the people.

Why do so many African leaders assume they can ignore their constitutions, cling to power, and get away with it? In order to understand this epidemic of folly, it's important to appreciate how much influence the West has over these countries—either through foreign aid given bilaterally, via institutions such as the World Bank, or in the form of clandestine military support. For example, Western aid pays for half of Burundi's budget, roughly 40 percent of Rwanda's, 50 percent of Ethiopia's and 30 percent of Uganda's . All these countries receive an unknown amount of military aid as well. This money enables African leaders to ignore the demands of their own people, and facilitates the financing of the patronage systems and security machinery that keeps them in power.

The problems started with the debt crisis in the 1970s. African countries that had borrowed and spent lavishly in the years following independence found themselves unable to repay the commercial banks that had lent them money. The Western nations, via the World Bank and International Monetary Fund, took over and restructured these loans, but demanded large public spending cuts. Huge numbers of teachers, nurses, doctors, and other public servants lost their jobs: programs to expand health care and education, improve roads and bring water and electricity to rural areas ground to a halt: poverty deepened: infant mortality rose.

In many cases, the new austerity programs, intended to lead to more efficient government, instead encouraged unprecedented corruption. Those who managed to hold on to government and civil service jobs scrambled to grab whatever they could for themselves and their increasingly dependent extended families. This patronage system helped control dissent, as many African leaders used what Cameroonians term "the politics of the belly"—bribery—to compromise their critics and coopt opposition groups. But it also led to deteriorating public services, as I documented in Uganda, where the maternal mortality rate in the largest referral hospital had increased seven-fold since the days of Idi Amin, according to a World Bank consultant who had worked there in the 1970s.

The continent's foreign aid donors were not oblivious to these problems. They knew that this new loan regime, known as Structural Adjustment, would hurt huge numbers of people. For example, in a notorious 1981 World Bank report about the program , the authors acknowledge that some reforms would be resisted by “consumers and producers, parastatal managers, civil servants and industrialists,”—meaning just about everybody in the nations involved. The state had to be “willing to take strong action on internal problems,” the report continued. As Branch and Mampilly note, many African scholars interpreted this as tacit donor permission for repression in countries receiving loans. This would be consistent with the donors’ tendency to look the other way when Adjustment-friendly leaders—like Burkina Faso’s Compaoré, Cote D’Ivoire’s Félix Houphouët-Boigny, Uganda’s Museveni and Kenya’s Daniel Arap Moi—jailed, murdered, or exiled their critics. The donors’ tolerance for human rights abuses may help explain why, when ethnic discrimination and repression escalated into genocide, as it did in Rwanda and Burundi, the international community did nothing until it was far too late.

Another reason so many African leaders feel they can afford to ignore their own people has to do with America’s “War on Terror.” During the 1990s, the Clinton administration began securing military ties with African leaders who seemed willing to cooperate in the fight against what Clinton officials saw as the rising threat of Islamic militancy on the continent. These ties have only grown in the years after September 11. According to journalist Nick Turse, the US military has sponsored more than one thousand African missions since 2011, with countries such as Nkurunziza’s Burundi, along with Rwanda, Ethiopia, Chad, and Uganda, deploying troops and guards across Africa and the Middle East at America’s behest. The primary purpose of this seems to be to monitor and prevent the emergence of terrorist groups in weak states. But it’s no coincidence that the US’s military allies in Africa have often used security forces against their own critics at home. As the events in Burundi suggest, providing support to ugly regimes may ultimately undermine the very stability we are supposedly seeking.

Now, fed up with decades of lies, plunder and abuse, Africans across the continent are finally rising up to challenge these Western-backed thugs. Some have been inspired by protests elsewhere in the world: some are united in new ways by Facebook, Twitter, and chat programs. Foreign aid has also brought thousands of NGOs into Africa. Not all are effective, but their American and European employees and volunteers have, naively or not, exposed African people to liberal Western attitudes and ideals of human rights as never before.

Branch and Mampilly lament that whereas past African protest movements had clear ideologies, like Independence, African Nationalism and Pan-Africanism, the only thing today’s protesters appear to want is the removal of the current leadership of their countries. But this lack of a grand objective may not be such a bad thing, as long as whoever takes over pursues a modest program of obeying the rule of law, eschewing corruption and respecting human rights. This is why this spring's election in Nigeria, in which incumbent Goodluck Jonathan graciously conceded defeat, was so welcome. Some opposition supporters had threatened violence if it felt the election was rigged, but this proved unnecessary. Though Nigeria's new leader, former General Muhammadu Buhari, behaved like a tyrant when he briefly ruled the country between 1983 and 1985, he also cracked down on corruption. For two years, Nigerians formed orderly lines at bus stops, the streets were clean, and politicians didn't steal. Many Nigerians, exasperated with their supremely corrupt country, are hoping for a spell of modest probity, as long as Buhari honors his promise to respect human rights this time. If we're seeing the dawn of a new movement, let's forgive it for lacking a glamorous label. Right now, it's the best hope this beleaguered continent has. Adam Branch and Zachariah Mampilly's Africa Uprising: Popular Protest and Political Change is published by Zed Books and distributed by the University of Chicago Press. (Text ends)

Why do so many African leaders assume they can commit atrocities and get away with it?

Answer: Western aid and America's War on Terror

By Helen Epstein New York Review of Books (May 27, 2015)

Why do so many African leaders assume they can ignore their constitutions, cling to power, and get away with it? In order to understand this epidemic of folly, it's important to appreciate how much infl uence the West has over these countries—either through foreign aid given bilaterally, via institutions such as the World Bank, or in the form of clandestine military support. For example, Western aid pays for half of Burundi's budget, roughly 40 percent of Rwanda's, 50 percent of Ethiopia's and 30 percent of Uganda's. All these countries receive an unknown amount of military aid as well. This money enables African leaders to ignore the demands of their own people, and facilitates the financing of the patronage systems and security machinery that keeps them in power.

Another reason so many African leaders feel they can afford to ignore their own people has to do with America's "War on Terror." During the 1990s, the Clinton administration began securing military ties with African leaders who seemed willing to cooperate in the fight against what Clinton officials saw as the rising threat of Islamic militancy on the continent. These ties have only grown in the years after September 11. According to journalist Nick Turse, the US military has sponsored more than one thousand African missions since 2011, with countries such as Nkurunziza's Burundi, along with Rwanda, Ethiopia, Chad, and Uganda, deploying troops and guards across Africa and the Middle East at America's behest. The primary purpose of this seems to be to monitor and prevent the emergence of terrorist groups in weak states. But it's no coincidence that the US's military allies in Africa have often used security forces against their own critics at home. As the events in Burundi suggest, providing support to ugly regimes may ultimately undermine the very stability we are supposedly seeking. ... (Text ends)

BURUNDI: Ugandan President Yoweri Museveni's advice to Burundians:

He has advised Burundians to "talk less about power and term limits if they want to prosper."

The President advised the Burundi people that for them to be prosperous they must settle down, talk less about power and term limits but become producers for the market," State House reported.

Museveni made the remarks while on a two-day Burundi High Level Political Dialogue between Government, opposition political party leaders both in Parliament and outside Parliament, eminent persons who included two past Presidents of Burundi ,religious leaders, civil society organizations, chamber of commerce and industry and a cross section of other stakeholders in Bujumbara.

He also told them to put behind sectarian differences that have engulfed the country for the past three months. "Forget your past sectarian political differences and build your country on unity, emulating your first post independence leader Prince Rwagasore who led Burundi to independence in 1961 under the UPRONA party which was a nationalist and patriotic pro-people party," Museveni said.

Museveni also informed them that he is happy to hear from the Vice President that Government had disarmed the youth groups "who had been disturbing people with illegally acquired guns cautioning that guns must be a monopoly of the state which is accountable to the people and must only be used purposefully like a surgeon's knife"

Museveni travelled to Bujumbura, the capital city Burundi to start peace talks with warring groups: government and opposition parties, a move aimed at calming political violence. He was appointed by the third Emergency Summit of Head of States of East African Community on the situation in Burundi on Monday, 7th July to lead and facilitate dialogue in Burundi crisis. (Text ends)

Burundi Politics:Burundi opposition leader calls for unity government’

Presidential official says Nkrunziza is open to the idea as counting under way in polls boycotted by opposition leaders

ALJAZEERA July 22, 2015: Burundi's leading opposition politician has called on President Pierre Nkurunziza to hold talks with rivals and form a national unity government after this week's election, saying it could help avert a new civil war. Agathon Rwasa, a former rebel leader like Nkurunziza in Burundi's civil war, told the Reuters news agency on Wednesday that there was an urgent need to prevent generals behind a failed coup in May taking up arms in the crisis sparked by the incumbent's bid for a third term in office.

"Some have already been waving the threat of armed struggle," he said. "For the sake of Burundi, the idea of a government of national unity can be accepted," he said, adding his demands also included new elections, possibly in a year. Reacting to the call from the opposition, a presidential official told Reuters that Nkurunziza would not oppose forming a national unity government in the event of him winning the election.

"A government of national unity is not a problem for Pierre Nkurunziza, we are ready to do so," Willy Nyamitwe, adviser to the president said. But he rejected the idea of cutting short any new five-year mandate as "impossible". Al Jazeera's Haru Mutasa, reporting from Bujumbura, said opposition leaders have been talking up the possibility of a unity government even before Tuesday's election.

Our correspondent, however, said the process could "take time" since the votes are still being counted. Reports said voter turnout was over 70 percent, and was especially high in rural areas where Nkurunziza remains popular.

Vote counting under way

Vote counting is under way and results are expected on Thursday in election boycotted by the opposition and civil society groups over fears of electoral fraud.

The US said the election will not be credible as it has been tainted by the government's harassment of opposition and civic groups, closing down of media outlets and intimidation of voters.

About 74 percent of Burundi'a 3.8 million registered voters cast their ballots, electoral commission President Pierre-Claver Ndayicariye said Wednesday. Nkurunziza is widely expected to win a third consecutive term.

Shortly before voting started on Tuesday, a policeman and a civilian were killed amid a string of explosions and gunfire in the capital Bujumbura, the epicentre of three months of anti-government protests.

The opposition have denounced the candidacy of the incumbent president as unconstitutional and a violation of the 2006 peace deal that ended a dozen years of civil war and ethnic massacres in 2006. The nation's constitutional court has ruled in the president's favour. (Text ends)

BURUNDI-Presidential aide Nshimirimana killed in attack’

(BBC News August 2, 2015)A close aide of Burundi's President Pierre Nkurunziza has been killed in an attack on his car in the capital, Bujumbura. Gen Adolphe Nshimirimana was a former army chief of staff and intelligence chief. The attackers targeted his car in the Kamenge district reportedly with machine guns and rocket launchers.

Burundi has been racked by unrest since April, when Mr Nkurunziza announced he would seek a third term in office. Opponents argued this contravened the constitution and there was a failed coup attempt in May.

A presidential election was then held last month which Mr Nkurunziza won, but which was boycotted by the opposition. Gen Nshimirimana was reportedly in charge of the president's personal security and had been central in cracking down on protests. Witnesses to the attack said four men in military fatigues had sprayed the car with bullets. Other witnesses said rockets were also fired.

Presidential adviser Willy Nyamitwe told Reuters: "He has been killed by a bullet... He was in the car with some bodyguards but I don't know exactly what happened." In a Twitter message Mr Nyamitwe said (in French): "I have lost a brother, a companion in the struggle." (Text ends)

How can one differentiate between a Hutu and Tutsi in East Africa?

C.A. Spears

Studied MBA in Information Technology (Graduated 2019)Oct 26
You cannot always tell who is who because there has been intermarriage. Historically there were differences between them and they had different origins.

Hutu were bantu farmers, and Tutsi ancestors were mostly herders having ancestry from Northern/Northeast Africa - looks like Nilotic and even MIddle Eastern ancestry.[1][2]

On average Tutsi are taller, thinner, have a narrower face, and thinner nose. Hutu are basically the opposite.

*Once again we are talking about “averages”, there is variation within each population because they have been in contact with each other for a long time. There are no exclusive bloodlines anymore, but that does not mean there are not still some differences, and you can still split the populations genetically with enough SNPs (genetic variables), it won’t be clean, but most Hutu would fall on one side and most Tutsi would fall on the other. That’s because genetically “Remember that the Tutsi is 3/4 Tutsi, 1/4 Hutu. “

Source of imag

Footnotes

[1] Tutsi Probably Differ Genetically from the Hutu
[2] Tutsis are less Nilotic than the Maasai
[3] Tutsi genetics, ii
[4] https://www.researchgate.net/figure/A-Charts-used-to-help-differentiate-Hutu-and-Tutsi-people-17-B-Symbolic-examples-of_fig1_324972132

Related Links

How can one tell whether someone is Hutu or Tutsi?
Why did the Hutu dislike the Tutsis and vice versa?
What is the difference between West and East Africa?
Why did the Hutu called the Tutsi, "Cockroaches?"
What do the people of Rwanda think of Kagame as their leader? (Both Tutsis and Hutus)

Why did Hutu and Tutsi hate each other so much that 20% of Rwanda population were murdered in the Rwandan Genocide?

Why didn't the Hutus get along with the Tutsis?
Who won the civil war in Rwanda, the Tutsi or the Hutu and how?

What are relations like between Tutsi and Hutu peoples in Rwanda in 2015?
How is the relationship between Hutus and Tutsis today?
Why did the Burundi Civil War start?

Related Links

Who won the civil war in Rwanda, the Tutsi or the Hutu and how?
Why did the Mozambique Civil War start?
What are the causes of civil war in many African countries?
Is there any possibility of a civil war in Mozambique?
Why do African countries not attack each other but instead Africa has a lot of civil wars?

What is different about Tanzania that has allowed it to remain peaceful and prosperous, while neighboring countries like Rwanda, Burundi, Congo and Uganda were torn apart by ethnic strife, brutal dictators, and civil war?

Why when two groups from the same country attack each other is it called a 'Civil War'? I am an Australian and never learned about this in history.

Why did the Ethiopian Civil War happen?

Why did Belgium create two tiny and demographically similar countries next to each other and next to a giant colony of their own in Central Africa? Why wouldn't they make Rwanda and Burundi part of DR Congo?

The rwandan genocide happened in Rwanda or Burundi or both? Google is not helping. Can somebody explain what happened? Thanks?
Can Rwanda and Burundi ever be united into one country?
How likely can the two Congos plus both Rwanda and Burundi unite as one nation?
Why did the Rwandan Civil War begin?
Why wasn't there a genocide in Burundi like there was in Rwanda?
Why has there been civil wars in most countries in Africa after independence?

COUNTRY FACT FILE

Location

In central Africa.

Official title of the state

Republika Y’u Burundi (national)

The Republic of Burundi (English)

Flag description:

Divided by a white diagonal cross into red panels (top and bottom) and green panels (hoist side and fly side) with a white disk superimposed at the center bearing three red six-pointed stars outlined in green arranged in a triangular design (one star above, two stars below): green symbolizes hope and optimism, white purity and peace, and red the blood shed in the struggle for independence: the three stars in the disk represent the three major ethnic groups: Hutu, Twa, Tutsi, as well as the three elements in the national motto: unity, work, progress.

Neighbours

Rwanda on N. the Congo on W, Tanzania on E. Land boundaries: total 974 km. Border countries: The Congo 233 km, Rwanda 290 km, Tanzania 451 km.

Founder of The Nation
King Mwamy Muambutsa II

Local divisions
17 provinces

Government type

Republic – presidential

Legislaton chamber

Bicameral Parliament

Form of State Republic

- Presidential

The President is both the Chief of State and the Head of Government. President is elected to a five-year term and is eligible for a second term.

A republic with two legislative bodies. The Senate, 49 seats, the National Assembly, 100 seats, members elected by popular vote to serve for five-year terms.

Former Rulers

1962 – 1966: King Mwamy Mwambutsa (monarchy)
1966 – 1966: Ntare V (monarchy)
1966 -1976: Colonel Michel Micombero military head of state
1976 – 1987: Colonel Jean-Baptiste Bagaza military head of state
1987-1993: Majour Pierre Buyoya military head of state
1993-1993: Melchior Ndadaye
1993-1993: François Ngeze
1993-1994: Sylvie Kinigi
1994-1994: Cyprien Ntaryamira
1994-1996: Sylvestre Ntibantunganya
1996-2003: Pierre Buyoya (2nd time)
2003 – 2005: Domitien Ndayizeye
2005 – Present: Pierre Nkurunziza
2005 - Current

Executive branch

The president is both the chief of State and head of Government.
President elected by 2/3 majority of parliament for a five-year term eligible for a second term.

Judicial chamber

High Court of Justice, composed of supreme and constitutional courts.

Capital city

Bujumbura Altitude 774 mtrs/2539 ft.
Geographic coordinates - 3.22S , 29.21E. The capital and largest city of Burundi. It is located on the Ruzizi Plain at the northeastern shore of Lake Tanganyika. Formerly known as Usumbura, the modern city developed after 1899 when it became a military post of German East Africa. After WWI it became the administrative centre of the Belgian mandate of Ruanda-Urundi. The city's name changed from Usumbura to its present day name Bujumbura during independence in July, 1962.

Names of main towns

Gitega, Ngozi, Muyinga.

Date of independence

1st July , 1962.

Religions (Major)

Roman Catholic 62%, traditional 35%, others.

Main spoken languages

French (official), Kirundi (national), Kiswahilli widely spoken.

Currency unit

Burundi Franc (Bufr) =100 Cents.

Area in Km2

27,834.00

Country area comparison in Africa

46 out of 55 states.

Demographic terms:

Average annual population growth rate 3.561%

Birth rate 41.43 births per 1,000 population

Death rate 9.87 deaths per 1,000 population

Average life expectancy: 58.29 years

Male 56.65 years: Female 59.98 years:

Illiteracy rate (%)

Male: 28, Female: 40

Population density

354.4/km2

Average per capita income

USD 300

Urban population (%)

11

Contributor groups(%)

Farming:, Fishing: 33, Industry: 21, Social service: 48

Main Export Items

Coffee, tea, cotton fabrics, animal skins.

Economy is based on

Agriculture and cattle breeding.

Climate

Tropical

Extremes: Lowest point: Lake Tanganyika 772 meters.

Highest point: Heha 2670 meters.

Weather of the Capital city (Bujumbura) average annual temperature 24oC.

Altitude 774 mtrs/2539 ft

Hottest Month August

Coldest Month November

Driest Month August

Wettest Month February to May average monthly Rf 65 mm.

Measures

Metric system.

Time zone

2 hours ahead of GMT/UTC

Public holidays

1st January (New year), May 1 (labor day), 1st July (independence), 25 December (x-mas).

Ethnic groups

Ba-Hutu 85%, Ba-Tutsi 14%, Ba-Twa (Pygmy) 1%.

Topographic & Environmental concern

Much of the country is grassy highland with mountains reaching 8,900 ft southern most source of the white Nile is located at Burundi, Lake-Tanganyika is estimated the second deepest lake in the world. Environment: soil erosion as a result of overgrazing and the expansion of agriculture into marginal lands: deforestation (little forested land remains because of uncontrolled cutting of trees for fuel): habitat loss threatens wildlife populations.

Economy Overview:

Industry

Consumer goods, assembly of imported components, civil work (construction), food processing.

Chief crops

Coffee (90% of export), tea, cotton, corn, sorghum, sweet potatoes, bananas, manioc, beef, milk, hides.

Natural resources:

Nickel, Uranium, rare earth oxides, Cobalt, Copper, Platinum, Vanadium, Arable land, Hydro-power, Niobium, Tantalum, Gold, Tin, Tungsten, Kaolin, Limestone. Mining:- there is exploitation of mineral resources at present. Tin deposits have been exploited previously, and prospect for nickel, vanadium, wolfram, kaolin, gold, oil and phosphates is currently in hand.

Land in use (%)

Arable land: 52

Grassland: 36

Forest woods: 3

Others: 9

Marine:

Coastline: None

Commercial Sea port:-

An Inland state. It's nearest ports are Dar-es- salaam (Tanzania), and Mombassa (Kenya) used.

Development prospects:

If the security situation improves more, the country would have striking development prospects. In offering free education for all, making it compulsory and supporting it politically has been the winning strategy behind Burundi's successful bid to ensure that virtually all children get a primary school education. In Burundi there was clear political will, translated into action, with the backing of the country's international partners. Among those partners, UNICEF has joined with the government in a Back to School campaign that offers teaching materials, desks, sanitation facilities and text books.

Burundi Mining Metallurgy hopes to start nickel production in two years at the world-class Musongati deposit, which has estimated reserves of 250m ton and could one day be linked to the proposed Musongati -Kigali-Issaka railway. The government also pins its hopes on oil exploration. Other than Great Britain's Surestream, juniors Minergy and A&Z Petroleum obtained exploration permits for blocks on Lake Tanganyika in 2011. Such activity requires power, something that Burundi is lacking. The country currently produces 43MW, which satisfies about half of national demand. Indian finance should permit contractors to start construction of the 20MW dam on the Kaburantwa River in 2012.

CAMEROON

National Flag and Emblem

Locator Map

TEXT HIGHLIGHTS: Diaries updates, key events, brief analysis and relating news articles in timeline

Overview

The French-administered UN trusteeship gained independence on January 1, 1960 from France Before the trusteeship it was a German colony. Modern Cameroon was created as the German protectorate of Kamerun in 1884.

After the First World War, under League of Nations mandates, France was awarded administration of Eastern Cameroon, and Britain Northern and Southern Cameroons. These mandates were converted in 1946 to UN Trusteeships.

Founder President Ahmadou Ahidjo was a Muslim from the northern part of Cameroon. He had entered politics and was elected to the Cameroon territorial assembly in 1947, winning reelection in 1952 and 1956, in the later years serving as the Cameroon member of the Assembly of the French Union in Paris. El-Hadji Ahmadou Ahidjo then-president of Cameroon, is viewed as one of the founding fathers of the pan-African bloc, the OAU, predecessor of the African Union (AU).

In early 1958, Mr. Ahmadou Ahidjo formed his own party known as the 'Cameroonian Union'. Becoming the first president of a newly independent Cameroon, his first task was to seek the political will necessary to reunify the French and the British parts of the country and to build a federal system of government .

In 1960, French administered Cameroun became independent and Ahmadou Babatour Ahidjo elected it’s president.

In February 1961 the populations of British administered Cameroons were asked to decide their future in a UN organized plebiscite. Whilst the territory of Northern Cameroon voted to join Nigeria, the population of Southern Cameroon voted to join the newly independent Republic of Cameroon. Cameroon thereby became a federal republic encompassing East Cameroon (the former French territory) and West Cameroon (the former British territory).

In October, 1961 The integration of the southern British territories into the new state (while the northern British 'Trusteeship' territories elected to join with Nigeria) saw the Federal Republic of Cameroon emerges.

In 1972, following a referendum in West Cameroon, the Cameroons became a unitary state, the United Republic of Cameroon. President Amadou Ahidjo made Cameroon a one-party state in 1966, following a major rebellion, and concentrated power in presidential hands. In 1982 he resigned on grounds of ill health, handing power over to his Prime Minister Paul Biya, but retaining chairmanship of the ruling party, the National Union of Cameroon. A power struggle ensued between the two men.

In 1984, factions of the army seen as close to Ahidjo staged a coup. Biya survived, and later reasserted control over the army and ruling party, stating his intention to reform and reinvigorate Cameroonian politics and the omnipresent Cameroonian state. The ruling party's name was changed to the Cameroonian People's Democratic Movement. In 1990, in response to domestic and international pressure, Biya approved the introduction of a multi-party system. Multi-party presidential elections of varying quality have taken place in 1992, 1997 and 2004.

It was formed by the 1961 merger of the Union of the Peoples of Cameroun (UPC) under French rule and part of the British Cameroon, which was, then under British rule.

Mr. Ahmadou Babatour Ahidjo, who was born in Garoua, a major river-port along the Benue river in northern Cameroun, which was at the time a French mandate territory, was elected first prime minister when the Anglophone Cameroon and the south part the Francophone Cameroun merged to form the federation of Cameroon on the 1st of October, 1961, then the north part joined Nigeria.

Headship since independence: Head of instrumental self-administration

In early 1970s a constitution created which ended the autonomy of British Cameroon and established a unitary rule under the "Republic of Cameroon" on the 20th May, 1972 with two official languages French & English of which later Mr. Ahmadou Babatour Ahidjo himself to become founding-president.

Mr. Ahmadou Ahidjo further headed Cameroon for over two decades (1960 to 1982) until his sudden decision to resign as president and replaced by his Christian prime minister Paul Biya. Mr. Ahmadou Ahidjo resigned, ostensibly for health reason on the 4th of November, 1982,

A Republic in West Africa on the gulf of Guinea.

It was settled by Bantu speakers from the equatorial Africa in the south followed by Muslim Fulanis from the Niger river basin, who they settled in the north. In 1884 the Germans took control and extended their protectorate over Cameroon. In WW I a joint French/British action forced the Germans to retreat, and after the war the region was divided into French part of the Cameroun and the British part of the Cameroons, then after the WW II the two areas namely, the former French part of Cameroun and part of the British Cameroon became UN trusteeships. The French ruled territory was granted a form of semi-autonomy in 1957, and the Cameroon gained it's independence officially in January, 1960, a constitution was approved by popular referendum in February, 1960, in May, 1960, Mr. Ahmadou Babatour Ahidjo, who was born in Garoua, a major river-port along the Benue river in northern Cameroun, which was at the time a French mandate territory, was elected first prime minister when the Anglophone Cameroon and the south part the Francophone Cameroun merged to form the federation of Cameroon on the 1st of October, 1961, then the north part joined Nigeria.

In the early 1970s he created a constitution which ended the autonomy of British Cameroon and established a unitary rule under the "Republic of Cameroon" on the 20th May, 1972 with two official languages French & English of which later Mr. Ahmadou Babatour Ahidjo himself to become founding-president. He headed Cameroon for over two decades (1960 to 1982) until his sudden decision to resign as president and replaced by his Christian prime minister. Mr. Ahmadou Ahidjo resigned, ostensibly for health reason on 4th November, 1982, it is generally believed that his French medical Doctor tricked him about his health, and was succeeded by the premier Mr. Paul Biya, all the more surprising especially as this involved a power shift from Anglophone-mainly Muslim-north to Christian Francophone-south. Mr. Ahmadou Babatour Ahidjo have severely criticized his successor Mr. Paul Biya, alleging that the president was abusing his power, that he lived in fear of plots against him, and that he was a threat to national unity. The two were unable to reconcile despite the efforts of several leaders. Mr. Ahmadou Ahidjo was sentenced to death in absentia in February 1984 along with two others, for participation in the June 1983 coup plot against Paul Biya, although Mr. Paul Biya commuted the sentence to life in prison. A violent but unsuccessful coup attempt in April 1984 was also widely believed to have been orchestrated by Mr. Ahmadou Ahidjo. In remaining years, Mr. Ahidjo divided his time b/n Senegal and France, he died in Dakar, Senegal on the 30th November 1989 and was buried there. An agreement on returning ex-president Ahidjo's remains was reached in June 2009, and it was expected that they would be returned in 2010.

Major Conflicts

In 1994 to 1996

Cameroon VS Nigeria were on conflict

The two neighbors had dispute over the oil-rich Bakassi peninsula.

Outcome: Nigeria withdrew its troops from the area in 2006 in line with an international court ruling, which awarded sovereignty of the area to Cameroon.

New twist: In November 2007 the Nigerian senate passed a motion declaring as illegal the Nigeria-Cameroon agreement for the Bakassi Peninsula to be handed over to Cameroon. Cameroon's parliament in April 2008 passed a controversial amendment to the constitution enabling President Paul Biya to run for a third term of office in 2011. The veteran politician - who has ruled the country since 1982 - won a new seven-year term in presidential elections in October 2004. Commonwealth observers accepted the result, but said the poll lacked credibility in key areas. Opposition parties alleged widespread fraud.

Mr. Paul Biya won multi-party polls in 1992 and 1997. The latter were boycotted by the three main opposition parties.

Cameroon once had one of the strongest economies of sub-Sahara Africa, but in the late 1990s, the declining price of commodities including oil, coffee, and cocoa pulled back economic growth. Cameroon has generally enjoyed stability, which has permitted the development of agriculture, roads, and railways, as well as a petroleum industry. Still, it faces many of the serious problems facing other underdeveloped countries, such as stagnating per capita income, a relatively inequitable distribution of income, a top-heavy civil service, and a generally unfavorable climate for business enterprise. In 2003, Cameroon adopted a comprehensive poverty reduction strategy and in 2006 reached the completion point under the enhanced Highly Indebted Poor Countries Initiative, which made Cameroon eligible to receive debt relief worth over US$1 billion from the International Monetary Fund. Though the economy has recovered, social indicators have been slow to climb, and 40 percent of the population lives below the national poverty line. According to the UNDP in Cameroon, 85 percent of those living in poverty are in rural areas. Women are particularly affected by poverty and have more nutritional problems, a heavier workload, a lack of education and limited access to health services. Cameroon has one of the highest literacy rates in Africa. In the late 1980’s, Cameroon nearly attained universal primary education, with a gross enrollment rate of 95.6 percent. Rates have dropped considerably since that time. According to the World Health Organization (WHO), there are approximately 19 doctors for every 100,000 people in Cameroon. Although low, this number is higher than in most West African countries. UNAIDS estimates there are 510,000 people living with HIV/AIDS in the country, a 5.4 per cent prevalence rate. The government maintains a tight leash on the broadcast media. Several private radio stations have come up following a liberalization of telecommunications in 2000. Cameroon has tough libel legislation in place. In 2006 the media rights body Reporters Without Borders noted that: "Draconian laws regularly put journalists behind bars." Although the constitution provides for equal rights for men and women, the status of women remains below that of men. By law, men can oppose their wife's right to work in the interest of the household and can end his wife's employment. The UN Development Fund for Women (UNIFEM) reported in 2006 that Cameroon had made progress in drafting a family code that will protect women's rights but that the process had stalled due to changes in government. Conflicts in surrounding countries have caused a surge of refugees into Cameroon and could potentially force more into the country.

According to the UN High Commissioner for Refugees (UNHCR), Cameroon is expected to host approximately 48,500 refugees and 6,000 asylum-seekers in 2007. Cameroon is also cited as a source, transit, and destination country for women and children trafficked for the purposes of forced labor and commercial sexual exploitation: most victims are children trafficked within the country and the country is on the Tier 2 Watch List.

The Cameroon is fondly referred to as "Africa in Miniature." This is because it is the home to more than 200 different ethnic-groups divided by linguistics and ethnics. The climate and the geographical location of the country is also a mirror of the typical climate you would find in any place across the continent of Africa.

Side note: Cameroon athletes abscond at London-2012' Seven Cameroonian athletes have disappeared while in Britain for the Olympics, officials said. David Ojong, the head of the Cameroon delegation, said five boxers, a swimmer and a female football player had been missing since. The reason for their disappearance is not known, amid some reports that they wanted to stay in the UK for economic reasons. Mr. Ojong said the athletes had visas for six month allowing them to stay until November. "What began as rumor has finally turned out to be true," Mr. Ojong said, in a letter sent to the Cameroonian sports ministry. "Seven Cameroonian athletes who participated at the 2012 London Olympic Games have disappeared from the Olympic Village." A reserve goalkeeper for the women's soccer team, Drusille Ngako, was the first to vanish, according to Mr Ojong. She disappeared while her teammates left for Coventry for their last preparatory encounter against New Zealand, he said. Her disappearance was followed by that of swimmer Paul Ekane Edingue, reportedly along with his personal belongings. The five boxers who had been eliminated from the games disappeared from London's Olympic village, Mr. Ojong said. They were named as Thomas Essomba, Christian Donfack Adjoufack, Abdon Mewoli, Blaise Yepmou Mendouo and Serge Ambomo. The home office said it could not comment on whether any of the seven had sought asylum in the country, the Associated Press reports. According to the news agency, it is not the first case of its kind, with Sudan's embassy confirming last month that three athletes had gone missing. One had applied for asylum and the other two were expected to do so, reports the AP. Meantime, Cameroon Olympians want to box in UK after 'threats' Cameroonian boxers who deserted their Olympic squad have told the BBC they want to stay in the UK to develop their careers. The five boxers, who met the BBC at a secret location in London, went missing more than a week ago. Cameroonian authorities said they suspected the boxers wanted to be economic migrants. The boxers said they had absconded after they were threatened by senior members of the Cameroonian delegation. Earlier week, swimmer Paul Ekane Edingue and female footballer Drusille Ngako also went missing from the London-2012 Olympic village.

Voice of America News/Africa: By Eugene Nforngwa August 24, 2012

Cameroon Winning Battle to Reduce Malaria' It’s a Monday morning at the Yaounde central hospital, and one of the busiest days of the week for the doctors and nurses who work here. Hundreds of sick people wait for their turn in one of the consultation rooms. For many, their fate is known in advance. One in four will be diagnosed with malaria. Malaria is a leading cause of hospital visits – and death - in the country. Victims are mostly children and pregnant women. Everyone in Cameroon is considered at risk. Last year, the disease inflicted more than 1.8 million people. Sunny and humid, most of Cameroon is a breeding ground for anopheles mosquitoes that transmit the malaria parasite. The country’s 20 million people are now on the frontline of the war on malaria in Africa. Dr. Esther Tallah is the manager of the Cameroon Coalition against Malaria and a major player in the struggle against the disease. She says the war is being won by expanding effective prevention and treatment. "Once you invest in the right things that we know work for malaria prevention and control, you see results immediately," she said, "The world has shown and repeatedly proven that when [people] adopt the habit of sleeping under mosquito nets and that you achieve universal coverage you see a drop in the incidence of malaria. "If the country decides that they want to do indoor residual spraying, and they do it effectively," she continued, "you see a drop in the incidence of malaria. In some cases, countries decide to combine indoor residual spraying and sleeping under long-lasting insecticidal mosquito nets." The government and NGOs like Tallah's coalition distributed more than eight million long-lasting insecticidal nets nationwide. The government has also scaled up affordable treatment using a combination of anti-malaria drugs including artemisinin. Together, they attack the reproductive cycle of the malaria parasite, thereby curing and reducing transmission at the same time. As part of the push to end malaria, patients pay less than $1 (U.S.) for several days' treatment.

Pregnant women and children under that age of five are treated for free. Health officials say universal protection and effective treatments are paying off. Doctors across the country are seeing fewer and fewer patients each year. Cases reported by hospitals dropped to 28 percent in April 2012 from 30 percent in April 2011. The National Malaria Control Committee's reports show a steady fall since the end of 2008, when the sickness rate was around 44.5 percent. But the gains remain fragile. In most of Cameroon, poor drainage leaves standing water in which mosquitoes breed. Health workers say many people have nets but are not using them. The mosquitoes are also developing resistance to insecticides. Talla says such problems are being tackled. "The national anti -malaria commission has conducted studies, and we have a map of resistance to insecticides by the anopheles mosquitoes that transmit malaria," she said. "There is a plan to follow up on that and put in place a system that ensures that that is taken into account." She said that even where there's resistance, the nets are still effective, "though the people who produce the nets are conscious of resistance and are coming out with a third-generation nets that combine two products." Cameroon hopes to reduce malaria infections in the country by 50 percent in a few years. For the first time, campaigners are already talking about ending the scourge. But to eradicate malaria in Cameroon, Tallah says the public must play its part. Early treatment, correct use of long-lasting insecticidal mosquito nets and hygienic living can greatly reduce new infections.

Accession to power of president Paul Biya - 7th November, 1982 nominated.

Tentative election calendar- Presidential/Parliamentary – July

Cameroon – Timeline Diaries, and related key notes:

1520 - Portuguese set up sugar plantations and begin slave trade in Cameroon.

1600s - Dutch take over slave trade from Portuguese.

1884 - Germans extend protectorate over Cameroon.

1916 - British and French troops force Germans to leave Cameroon.

1919 - London Declaration divides Cameroon into a British administrative zone (20 per cent of the land, divided into Northern and Southern Cameroons) and a French one (80 per cent).

1922 - League of Nations (LoN) confers mandates on Britain and France for their respective administrative zones.

1946 - British and French mandates renewed as UN trusteeships.

1958 - French Cameroon granted self-government with Ahmadou Babatour Ahidjo as prime minister.

1960 - French Cameroon granted independence and becomes the Republic of Cameroon with Ahmadou Ahidjo as president.

1961 - Following a UN-sponsored referendum, the (British) Southern Cameroons join the Republic of Cameroon to become the Federal Republic of Cameroon, while Northern Cameroons join Nigeria.

1961-63 - Large-scale insurrection, believed to have been orchestrated by the Cameroonian People's Party, put down with the help of French forces.

1966 - National Cameroonian Union formed out of six major parties and becomes the country’s sole legal party.

1972 - Cameroon becomes a unitary state following a national referendum and is renamed the United Republic of Cameroon.

1982 – Christian Prime Minister Paul Biya succeeds Ahmadou Ahidjo, who resigns.

1983 – Ahmadou Ahidjo goes into exile after Paul Biya accuses him of masterminding a coup.

1984 – Mr. Paul Biya elected to his first full term as president, changes the country's name to the Republic of Cameroon.

1986 - Discharge of poisonous gases from Lake Nyos kills nearly 2,000 people.

October 2002 – Paul Biya re-elected in Cameroon's first multi-party presidential election.

1994 - Fighting between Cameroon and Nigeria flares up over disputed oil-rich Bakassi Peninsula.

January-May 1996 - Cameroonian-Nigerian border clashes.

May 1996 - Cameroon and Nigeria agree to UN mediation over Bakassi Peninsula.

May 1997 – Paul Biya's party, the Cameroon National Democratic Movement (formerly the National Cameroonian Union), wins a majority of seats in parliament amid allegations of irregularities.

October 1997 – President Paul Biya re-elected president in ballot that is boycotted by main opposition parties.

1998 - Cameroon classed as the most corrupt country in the world by business monitor Transparency International.

June 2008 - World Bank approves funding for oil and pipeline project in Cameroon and Chad despite strong criticism from environmental and human rights activists.

October 2008 - Roman Catholic Church in Cameroon denounces corruption, saying it has permeated all levels of society.

June 2001 - Fears for Cameroon's environment increase, with Global Forest Watch reporting that 80% of the country's indigenous forests have been allocated for logging.

October 2001 - Growing tension between Biya government and separatists lobbying on behalf of country's 5m English-speakers. Unrest results in three deaths, several arrests.

July 2002 - Parliamentary and municipal elections: opposition claims fraud and vote-rigging.

October 2002 - Ruling by International Court of Justice (ICJ) gives sovereignty of oil-rich Bakassi peninsula to Cameroon. But Nigeria, whose forces occupy the area, rejects the ruling.

December 2003 - Nigeria hands over 32 villages to Cameroon as part of the 2002 ICJ border deal. In January 2004 both countries agree to mount joint border patrols.

September 2004 - Nigeria fails to meet a deadline to hand over Bakassi.

November 2004 - Paul Biya wins new seven-year term as president.

June 2006 - Nigeria agrees to withdraw its troops from the Bakassi peninsula to settle its long-running border dispute with Cameroon. The breakthrough comes at a UN-mediated summit.

The Paris Club of major lending nations agrees to cancel almost all of Cameroon's $3.5bn debt.

August 2006 - A ceremony marks the transfer of the Bakassi peninsula to Cameroon after Nigeria completes its troop withdrawal from the area.

December 2006 - Up to 30,000 refugees fleeing conflicts in Chad and the Central African Republic have crossed into east Cameroon over the past 18 months, the UN refugee agency UNHCR reports.

July 2007 - Legislative elections. President Biya's party retains a majority in parliament.

November 2007 - Suspected Nigerian militants kill 21 Cameroon soldiers in Bakassi Peninsula.

Nigerian senate rejects Nigeria-Cameroon agreement for hand-over of Bakassi Peninsula to Cameroon.

January 2008 - Opposition leaders slam President Biya's New Year message hinting at changing constitution to extend president's term in office.

February 2008 - A nationwide transport strike in protest at fuel costs turns into a series of anti-government demonstrations in the capital, Yaounde, leaving at least 17 dead.

April 2008 - Parliament amends the constitution to allow President Biya to run for a third term in 2011. The opposition condemns the move as a "constitutional coup".

August 2008 - Nigeria hands over the potentially oil-rich Bakassi peninsula to Cameroon, bringing an end to a long-standing dispute over the territory.

October 2008 - Nigeria and Cameroon agree to work together to protect their land and sea border from attacks by militants and pirates.

March 2009 - Pope visits, says peaceful coexistence between Muslims and Christians in Cameroon should be seen as an example to other African nations.

April 2010 - Managing editor of the Cameroun Express, Bibi Ngota, dies in prison.

September 2010 - Senior security officials are sacked weeks after rumors of an attempted coup.

January 2011 - Cameroon secures Chinese loan to build deep sea port at Kribi, terminal of an oil pipeline from Chad.

June 2011 - Government bans all buses and taxis from using the roads at night to reduce Cameroon's high number of fatal traffic accidents.

October 2011 - Paul Biya wins a landslide re-election as president, officially taking 78% of the vote. His opponents reject the result, alleging widespread fraud.

February 2012 - Hundreds of elephants are slaughtered in Bouba Ndijida national park in a wave of ivory poaching blamed on Sudanese and Chadian gangs.

September 2012 - Minister Marafa Hamidou Yaya is jailed for embezzling $29 million meant as a down payment on a presidential plane.

November 2012 - President Biya celebrates 30 years in power as riot police disperse an opposition protest.

February 2013 - France urges its citizens to leave northern Cameroon after seven members of a family are kidnapped by Islamist militants.

Are the South Eastern Bantu people the ancestors of the Nigerian people and Cameroon? If so, how long ago?

Ygor Coelho Avid reader on history of peoples and population genetics.
Oct 20

Not at all, actually the precise opposite: Southeastern Bantu populations are the descendants of presumably Proto-Bantu-speaking peoples of mainly West African origin, who are likely to have lived initially somewhere in Cameroon or Nigeria up to circa 1,000 B.C. (note: the exact location of their homeland has not been determined and is still highly disputed, with the only near consensus being that it was somewhere in or near West Africa).

Southeastern Bantus are also, at least in their majority, clearly admixed with pre-Bantu populations, harboring a varying minority of ancestry inherited from them. Logically, if they all have West African ancestry (Yoruba/Esan/Lemande-related admixture), but West Africans generally lack or have much less of the typical ancestral components added to the Southeastern Bantu gene pool due to gene flow from and to other East Africans and Southern Africans.

Target: Ronga
Distance: 4.6359% / 0.04635893 | R7P
Populations: 5 | Iterations: 1 | Time: 0.192 s

72.8 Esan_Nigeria
16.4 Dinka
5.6 Biaka
5.2 ZAF_2100BP

Target: Manyika
Distance: 5.4573% / 0.05457257 | R7P
Populations: 4 | Iterations: 1 | Time: 0.212 s

74.4 Esan_Nigeria
15.8 Dinka
6.0 Biaka
3.8 ZAF_2100BP

Target: Tswa
Distance: 4.6605% / 0.04660499 | R7P
Populations: 5 | Iterations: 1 | Time: 0.228 s

74.0 Esan_Nigeria
16.0 Dinka
6.4 Biaka
3.6 ZAF_2100BP

Target: Makhuwa
Distance: 4.2740% / 0.04274036 | R7P
Populations: 7 | Iterations: 1 | Time: 0.23 s

71.0 Esan_Nigeria
16.6 Dinka
6.6 Biaka
4.0 ZAF_2100BP
1.2 TUR_Barcin_N
0.6 ZAF_2000BP

Target: Nyanja
Distance: 4.9578% / 0.04957789 | R7P
Populations: 4 | Iterations: 1 | Time: 0.378 s

73.4 Esan_Nigeria
17.6 Dinka
5.8 Biaka
3.2 ZAF_2100BP

The genetic evidences confirm the results of research in archaeology (evidences of agricultural development and farming cultures linked to the later Bantu societies appear first in West Africa than in East/Southeast Africa) and linguistics (all Bantu languages come from one single Proto-Bantu dialect continuum that is no older than 3,000–4,000 years at most, but Proto-Bantu itself is just a variety of a much more diverse, older and wide-ranging Niger-Congo language family, which is restricted to and most varied in West Africa).

With over 3,000 Boko Haram terrorist surrendering in both Nigeria and Cameroon in the past weeks, what possible advice can you give both governments that this latest move by the sect could be a scheme to launch more attacks?

Emmanuel-Francis Nwaolisa Ogomegbunam

Nigerian August 23

I find the idea of amnesty for criminals disgusting.

Being law-abiding should be seen as correct and rational.

Every village or neighbourhood should have a gibbet and a birching pole so the consequences of criminality can be made visible.

Also, the shame of being a village whose offspring are flogged or hung at a higher rate than neighbours will increase social pressure on criminal elements.

Sadly, the 'root causes' racket is ascendant. Apparently, poor people who work their fingers to the bone to better their lot are stupid. They should be criminals, instead. Those are the ideas pushed at the unending conferences on development. So this brilliant idea of paying off criminals has the imprimatur of agents of the advanced countries. That is enough to shut down counter-arguments in Nigeria.

"You're right, people are suffering,"… "But these people [former jihadists] know how to shoot, how to bomb. So the government should set them up in business; otherwise they could do something bad."
The attitude of blackmailers. Another 'crime', but I guess in this up is down days that merits an additional bonus.

Malam 'Aliyu' lives in a neat, two-bedroom house in Nigeria's northern city of Kaduna. Squeezed into the small living room is a large, brand-new sofa set, still in its plastic. A plasma TV is on the wall. Outside, in the yard, is an area where he plans to raise poultry.

In his early thirties, with a wispy goatee, Aliyu has remarried to a forthright woman from the northeastern city of Maiduguri. She is also former Boko Haram, and they have been set up with the rent-free house in Kaduna, a business license, and a small monthly stipend provided by Nigeria's domestic spy service, better known as DSS.

Nigeria's secret program to lure top Boko Haram defectors

The jihadist conflict in the northeast is stalemated. But is forgiving some of the worst killers the right way to bring peace?

https://www.thenewhumanitarian.org/news/2021/8/19/nigerias-secret-programme-to-lure-top-boko-haram-defectors

This will not work. A country of 200 (?) million and a per capita of $535 cannot afford either permanent amnesty or even a large prisoner populace. Petty crimes should be swiftly punished, and the irredeemable criminals executed.

The Sharia is eminently sensible on this. Therefore I must wonder if Archbishop Welby has successfully converted the president to Anglicanism during all his medical trips to England. Either that or this is one of those 'cabal' schemes.

In Nigeria, top students receive N1,000 as prizes, and we also buy plasma TVs for (former) terrorists.

No, really. Up is down.

University of Nigeria Nsukka (UNN) The University of Nigeria Nsuka (UNN) has sparked outrage on social media after awarding the sum of N1000 and N1500 to its best graduating students in several categories. Parents and visitors couldn't hide their disappointment and anger during the institution's 49th convocation held last Thursday. SaharaReporters reported that parents and visitors at the convocation ceremony which held at the University of Nigeria, Enugu State, were angered that the institution could award such "ridiculous prizes" to its best brains at a public ceremony. The prizes and award night programme booklet of the best graduating students confirmed that the university awarded the said prizes to its best students. Some university workers drew comparisons between the university's paltry prize money and Big Brother Naija, where the winner takes prizes worth millions of naira. They added that even runners-up in the Big Brother Naija show still smile home with magnificent prizes such as Sports Utility Vehicles in a television programme devoid of academic rigour. The last edition of the BBNaija reality show saw the winner, Olamilekan "Laycon" Agbeleshe go home with prizes worth N85 million.

https://pmnewsnigeria.com/2021/06/15/unn-awards-best-graduating-students-n1000-cash-prizes/

There is no worse fate than being a lab rat for 'modernity'.

The next time some development economist blathers on about how Nigerians need to pay more tax, apparently, for fads like this, laugh at them. Better not to pay taxes and then get a reward from the government for your crime.

To survive hunters shooting without stopping, fly without perching.

How do other African countries view Nigeria?

Boris Guiffot
A Cameroonian dude who likes technology and politics Updated July 10, 2019

I am Cameroonian and Nigeria is the country with whom we share the longest border. That has a huge impact on the way we see the country. There is a large Nigerian community in Cameroon. Many Cameroonians pursue their high education in Nigeria.

Nigerians are considered very smart but some of them are famous to use that smartness to do unglamorous activities. They contribute to the stereotypes.

We often compete against each other at football (both our male & female team)

We like to tease you guys about football but we don't want to mess up with you when it comes to political matters : Yes, I am talking about Bakassi! Because of that disputed peninsula, we went to the brink of war in 1981. We are so relieved that it has been resolved diplomatically. Thanks guys for avoiding a useless war with a neighbor that has 1/10 of your population. We appreciate it!

We relate well because our anglophone regions speak a similar Pidgin English. Even the French we speak on the street is full of Pidgin words.

Our northern regions are very similar to yours. Most of them belong to the same Fulfulde/Hausa ethnic group. They were even part of the same empire before they were separated by colonial borders:

We both complain about the extreme corruption of governments. We sometimes share the podium as the most corrupt countries on the continent. Does this have anything to do with the fact that we are both oil producers?

Thank you very much for saving us from Hollywood and Telenovelas. We really love your fashion, music and movies. Our own industry grew exponentially after we decided to follow suit.

For some reasons, many of us think that Nigeria is very developed except for those who have actually set foot in the country. Nollywood certainly has something to do with it.

Our rivalry is usually with Ivory Coast and we don't interfere with you guys trying to downplay Ghana. Nonetheless, we wonder why you guys make so much noise about jollof rice. We might not be loud about it but ours is the best:

I am from West Cameroon and we are often mistaken for Igbos so I guess we might be distant cousins

We wonder why such a powerful neighbour couldn't contain Boko Haram after so many years

I don't know if there is a country in this world without a Nigerian community

We admire you a lot for your sense of self-worth and self-confidence

Your pastors took all Africa by surprise. They are so famous that it is told that some pastors will go for training in Nigeria before returning to Cameroon.

You can visit all of Africa by visiting Cameroon.

Tawani Anyangwe ,World Traveler, Speaks at least 7 languages
Answered Jan 7, 2015

You can visite the whole of Africa just by planning a trip to one country- CAMEROON.

Cameroon has all climates in Africa and almost all major cultures. Cameroon is home to 230 languages - (pop approx. 28 million)

Mount Cameroon

Related Links

What are some of the most interesting/surprising facts about any country?
What is the least known country in the world?
What is one interesting fact about every country on Earth?
What are some amazing facts about your country?
What is the least known country with a surprisingly large population?
What is the least developed country in the world?

Wake Up Africa!
Learn all about Africa. People, politics, culture, history, geography, and more!

The new King of Bamoun, Cameroon, King Nabil Mbombo Njoya, has rejected the offer of a 14-year-old virgin in marriage as tradition demands.

Posted by Aniekpeno Ekong Mon

He said she's a minor, and shouldn't be getting married. He has decided to sponsor her education from secondary school to university.

News Nigeria

An Appeal For The Spirit Of Sportsmanship

Posted by Aniekpeno Ekong 21h

As the date for the kickoff to the African Cup Of Nations draws closer, we appeal to all our African brothers and sisters to embrace the spirit of sportsmanship, bearing in mind that we are not in battle against each other.

Rather it is a stage set up for our African brothers to showcase their talent to the world. So, we appeal to all our cheering fans to bear in mind that this is just a game of football. Even though we may be competing against each other, but we are still brothers, therefore let love lead the way.

Wake Up Africa!
What is the covid 19 protocols set aside for the Africa Cup of Nations starting this month?

Answered by Aniekpeno Ekong 19h

Spectators at next month's Africa Cup of Nations football finals in Cameroon must be fully vaccinated against COVID-19 and show a negative test result dating back less than 72 hours before entering stadiums, the African Football Confederation (CAF) said on Thursday.

The competition, comprising teams from 24 countries, is scheduled to start on January 9 but concerns about the spread of the Omicron variant of the coronavirus among the mass of travelling fans and players have prompted organisers to tighten restrictions. Under previous rules, only players, coaching staff and officials had to be vaccinated and tested.

"Health authorities will take all necessary measures to facilitate vaccinations and to perform the COVID tests," CAF said in a joint statement with Cameroon's government.

Related Links

Is a management information systems degree worth it in South Africa?

Where did execution come from? Is it an imported policy to the African governments or was it invented by African governments themselves?

Do you think Governor Sanwo Olu is too soft to be a governor of Lagos state? Is he better as a governor in America?

Who is the youngest president in Africa?

Is the swastika symbol most present in many ancient cultures? What are the other symbols that are connected/present in the most ancient culture?

Is the French policy of assimilation the major reason for the under development of French colonies in Africa?

Is there a reason for the countries in the tropics to be underdeveloped than the countries on temperate areas?

What is the best 2022 niche for selling online in South Africa?

What can be done to involve more South Africans in buying online and to purchase from South Africa?

Which country will be the African champion on the Cameroon African Cup of Nations 2022?

Assuming you want to join an NGO which focuses on empowering local communities to develop innovative solutions for the developmental challenges in Africa. What profile do you need to create as an individual to be able to join such an organisation?

What is the easiest way to learn a foreign language as an African?

Why and when did Africa get poor when in ancient times it's my impression they were one of the most powerful and rich lands?

How can a 3D printed housing project affect Africa?

CAF to increase 2021 AFCON prize money for winner from $4.5 million

News Nigeria Posted by Aniekpeno Ekong Tue

Africa's football governing body, Confederation of African Football (CAF), has disclosed its desire to increase the prize money for the winner for the 33rd edition of its flagship competition, the Africa Cup of Nations (AFCON).

The CAF President, Dr Patrice Motsepe, revealed this on Tuesday night at Yaounde, Cameroon during the draws for the 2021 AFCON. The President also confirmed that players of the country that wins the 2021 Africa Cup of Nations will receive separate prize money from that of the country.

Motsepe said, "We want to increase the prize money and we are in discussions with sponsors because we have to show the world that African football is as good and amongst the best in the world.

“One of the things we want to do is to provide on top of the prize money which will be won by the winning nation, is to put aside prize money so that the nation that wins the AFCON next year, there is prize money that will go to the players so that we’ll not experience the problems we’ve had in the past.

“Players are demotivated when they qualifybecause they don’t know how much they will earn by way of bonuses. We are working on those things.”

In the 2019 edition of the Africa Cup of Nations at Egypt, CAF shared a total of $14.2 million amongst the best eight teams at the 2019 Africa Cup of Nations in the form of prize money, according to Bestchoicesport

Winner – $4.5million
Runners-up – $2.5million
Third place – $2million
Fourth place – $2million
Quarter finalists – $3.2million ($800,000 for four teams)

When is AFCON starting?

The 2021 Africa Cup of Nations which is in its 33rd edition is scheduled to run from the 9th of January till the 6th of February.

The Super Eagles of Nigeria are seeded in Group D with the likes of Egypt, Sudan and Guinea-Bissau. The Super Eagles will play their first match against Egypt on the 11th of January.

Charles de Gaulle était-il un dictateur ?

Jean-Michel Ravina Anciennement DAF, Dirigeant, ex Mensa, Retraité 25 sept.

de Gaulle a construit une constitution de régime présidentiel pour mettre fin au régime parlementaire dont le sport national était de se payer tel ministre ou tel gouvernement, ce qui générait une instabilité gouvernementale insupportable. Faire cesser le bordel permanent n'est pas être dictateur.

Alexandre Roswilo précédents lieux : Afrique (1975 - 2019) Répondu 2 juil. 2018

La réalité est plus complexe . Il faut analyser l’Homme selon deux aspects sur le contexte historique de l’époque : son image selon la société française mais aussi selon le reste du monde .

[1]

Concernant la définition de dictateur , le dictionnaire Larousse donne une parmi tant d'autre : "Personne autoritaire qui impose son point de vue et sa manière de vivre aux autres ; tyran, despote."[2]

Concernant l'Homme, de Gaulle était quelqu'un de FERME et cela en politique menait souvent à une certaine méfiance à son encontre. Pire, il n'aimait pas faire face à une certaine opposition . Cela est connu que ce soit sur le plan international et national de son parcours politique . Roosevelt se méfiait de Gaulle, Churchill faisait des efforts [3] . Cela montre qu'il a dû faire face avant et durant la guerre à une opposition très forte à son endroit . Ce traitement des principaux leaders alliés à son endroit, le rendra méfiant tout le reste de sa vie vis-à-vis de ces leaders de Grande-Bretagne et surtout des États-Unis .

[4]

Sur le plan national , les luttes de pouvoir avant, durant et après la 2 nd guerre mondiale , rendront de Gaulle toujours ferme et souvent excessif . Comme Churchill, de Gaulle dans les périodes de conflits armés, a su se montrer un leader remarquable en faisant preuve de fermeté . Tous les deux étaient des anciens militaires et avaient connu les contraintes extrêmes de la guerre .Malheureusement en période de paix , cela se revelait comme pour son homologue britannique un handicap .

Par contre , il est très important de le noter . Il était un leader très PRAGMATIQUE et surtout VISIONNAIRE . C'est de Gaulle qui a bâti la France moderne . Il lui a donné sa place au centre de l'Europe après la Grande guerre et les moyens de préserver ce leadership[5] .

[6]

Malheureusement en viellisant de Gaulle ne saisira souvent pas que le monde et surtout la société française changent . Cela est à noter à travers deux épisodes :

-Les manisfestations de mai 1968 :

Le général français ne comprit pas lors des manifestations que la France traversait une mutation profonde. Il se trouva rapidement agacé et menaça même d'envoyer l'armée matter les étudiants dans les rues . C'est Georges Pompidou alors Premier ministre qui de retour en catastrophe d'une tournée au Proche et Moyen Orient qui s'y opposa fermement [7] . Cela permis de reprendre la situation progressivement après plusieurs semaines et une fois de plus à de Gaulle de récolter les lauriers.

[8]

-La décolonisation :

C'est sans aucun doute la face cachée mais la plus sombre du personnage . Image très souvent ostracisée par une grande partie du peuple français à travers l'Histoire . De Gaulle est l'instigateur de l'un des systèmes les plus ignobles du XXémè siècle . Un ensemble d'États fantoches, non viables sur le plan politique et économique qui découlent de l'ancien Empire coloniale français . On baptisera ce système à juste titre : la Françafrique . De Gaulle en est le penseur et un homme en particulier Jacques Foccart en sera le principal géolier . Jean-François Médard précisera dans ce sens :

"Jacques Foccart peut être considéré, avec le général de Gaulle, comme le père fondateur de la Françafrique, mais c'est ce dernier qui en a été l'inspirateur. Jacques Foccart en a été le maître d'œuvre, et il n'a fait qu'appliquer avec une grande efficacité la stratégie élaborée par le général de Gaulle, ce qui est déjà beaucoup."[9]

[10]

Nous pouvons conclure que Charles de Gaulle avait très certainement un penchant dictatorial mais la société française, peuple moderne, ne pouvait permettre un régime autoritaire après les excès des tyrans durant sa longue histoire . Il dut souvent reculer voire démissionner[11] car il n'était pas toujours approuvé . Mais pour la France, il reste un héros mieux un libérateur et un bâtisseur après les épisodes difficiles de la 2 nd guerre mondiale . Il fut aussi l'artisant pragmatique de la résolution de la guerre d'Algérie[12] .

DIX-NEUVIÈME ANNÉE — N° 5430 ★ ★ 18 PAGES — DERNIÈRE ÉDITION MERCREDI 4 JUILLET 1962

LIRE EN PAGE

Le Monde

Rédaction, Administration : 5, r. des Italiens, Paris-IX. — Directeur : Hubert BEUVE-MÉRY.

LE NUMÉRO : 0,30 NF

COMPTE CHÈQUE POSTAL : PARIS N° 4 207-23

BULLETIN DE L'ÉTRANGER

TRANSITION DIFFICILE AU PÉROU

DANS UNE DÉCLARATION PUBLIQUE, PUIS PAR UN ÉCHANGE DE LETTRES

Le général de Gaulle reconnaît solennellement l'indépendance de l'Algérie, où les pouvoirs sont remis à M. Farès

M. Jean-Marcel Jeanneney premier ambassadeur de France auprès de la nouvelle République

[13]

Pour le reste du monde, c'était quelqu'un de dangereux lorsqu'il n'avait pas de limites . Churchill et Roosevelt, s'en méfiaient déjà durant la grande guerre . C'est donc dans le Tiers monde que de Gaulle allait pleinement montrer l'étendue de son caractère tyrannique que la métropole ne l'aurait pas laissée exprimer en France .
La Françafrique[14] en est l'expression la plus aboutie .

[15]

L’image laissée par l’individu est ainsi contrastée à travers l’Histoire . Elle montre clairement le caractère subjectif qu’un personnage peut entrennir selon les peuples et l’Histoire .

Notes de bas de page

[1] Image on contrepoints.org
[2] Définitions : dictateur - Dictionnaire de français Larousse
[3] " Notre mal de tête commun " : Churchill, Roosevelt et De Gaulle
[4] Image on deutschlandfunk.de
[5] L'aventure de la bombe. De Gaulle et la dissuasion nucléaire
[6] Image on over-blog-kiwi.com
[7] Le Mai 68 d'Edouard Balladur
[8] Image on harris-interactive.fr
[9] « La politique est au bout du réseau ». Questions sur la méthode Fo...
[10] Image on over-blog-kiwi.com
[11] De Gaulle s'en va !
[12] De Gaulle et l'indépendance de l'Algérie
[13] Image on ekladata.com
[14] L'état français contemporain et son double, l'état franco-africain
[15] Image on slideplayer.fr

Questions similaires

Pourquoi Charles de Gaulle a-t-il pensé que la Belgique était un pays inventé par les Britanniques pour agacer les Français ?

Pourquoi Charles de Gaulle n'a-t-il pas été enterré au Panthéon ?

Comment De Gaulle est-il mort ?

À part De Gaulle, quel est un bon exemple d'un grand général Français ?

Les Français, savent-ils ce qui est arrivé à Charles de Gaulle le 21 avril 1943 ?

Qui était Charles de Gaulle et pourquoi était-il si populaire ?

Charles De Gaulle a-t-il un jour rencontré Joseph Staline ? Que pensait-il de lui ?

Charles de Gaulle a-t-il été le seul président français à la fois réellement patriote et efficace ou y en a-t-il eu un meilleur que lui depuis sa mort ?

Pourquoi le général de Gaulle ne fut-il pas nommé maréchal ?

Dans quel parti politique Charles de Gaulle figurait de nos jours ?

News Nigeria

AFCON 2021: schools, govt offices to close by 2pm in Cameroon

Posted by Aniekpeno Ekong 10h

The Cameroonian government announced on Saturday that working and school hours will be curtailed in order to increase the number of people who will watch the Africa Cup of Nations (AFCON), which the Central African country is hosting this year.

"During the days of AFCON matches, schools and lectures will go from 7:30am to 1:00pm. Work will be from 7:30am to 2:00pm. This exceptional measure which will effectively apply to the public sector aims at enabling Cameroonians to take an active part in this major continental event," Seraphin Magloire Fouda, secretary general at the Prime Minister's office said in a statement.

Attendance at the AFCON matches played so far has been poor, particularly in the cities of Douala, Bafoussam, and Limbe, where certain matches are being played.

The administrations announced on Friday that they will provide a free bus shuttle service to and from the stadiums for fans.

According to some sports journalists, the low attendance is due to the Covid-19 restriction measures that require fans to be vaccinated and tested before entering the stadium, as well as security challenges in Limbe, where separatist fighters have threatened to disrupt the championship, which have resulted in low attendance.

The 33rd edition of the African Cup Of Nations (AFCON) got underway in Cameroon last week and will conclude on February 6.

Stone-built Sites in Northern Cameroon's Mandara Mountains and Their Functions

By: Nicholas David View PDF

In 2001-2002, the Mandara Archaeological Project's survey in the Mandara mountains established the presence of fifteen ruins, known as Diy-Gi'd-Biy, literally "eye-head-chief," to the Mafa people who live around them, and to us as DGB sites. Radiocarbon dates indicate that they were built, used, and abandoned in a short period centered on the first half of the 15th century AD. While varying greatly in size, they constitute the most impressive set of indigenous stone-built structures in sub-Saharan Africa outside the Horn and the complex of ruins in Zimbabwe and Mozambique that reaches its apogee in Great Zimbabwe. This is surprising as the construction of such sites is usually orchestrated by powerful political leaders, and this is a region long characterized by egalitarian societies and petty chiefs. Our excavations at two sites revealed complex construction sequences and architectural features including passages, underground chambers, staircases, and problematic 'silos.'

The Ajuran Empire (Somali: Saldanadda Ajuuraan, Arabic: سلطنة الأجورانية), also spelled Ajuuraan Empire,[1] and often simply as Ajuran,[2] was a Somali empire in the medieval times in the Horn of Africa that dominated the trade in northern Indian ocean. They belonged to the Somali Muslim sultanate[3][4][5] that ruled over large parts of the Horn of Africa in the Middle Ages. Through a strong centralized administration and an aggressive military stance towards invaders, the Ajuran Empire successfully resisted an Oromo invasion from the west and a Portuguese incursion from the east during the Gaal Madow and the Ajuran-Portuguese wars. Trading routes dating from the ancient and early medieval periods of Somali maritime enterprise were strengthened or re-established, and foreign trade and commerce in the coastal provinces flourished with ships sailing to and coming from many kingdoms and empires in East Asia, South Asia, Europe, the Near East, North Africa and East Africa.[6]

News Nigeria

West Africans seem to dominate AFCON 2021. 50% of national teams playing in the round of 16 of AFCON 2021 are representing West Africa.

Posted by Aniekpeno Ekong 4h

Regional representatives in round 16 of AFCON 2021

WEST AFRICA

1 Ivory Coast
2 Gambia
3 Senegal
4 Nigeria
5 Mali
6 Burkina Faso
7 Cape Verde
8 Guinea Bissau

NORTH AFRICA

1 Egypt
2 Morocco
3 Tunisia

CENTRAL AFRICA

1 Cameroon
2 Gabon
3 Equatorial Guinea

EAST AFRICA

1 Comoros

SOUTHERN AFRICA

1 Malawi

News Nigeria

Good morning from Limbe stadium! Are you ready for the KOs, Africa?! 🔥

Posted by Aniekpeno Ekong 31m

#TotalEnergiesAFCON2021 | #AFCON2021

News Nigeria

Barriers at the entrance of Olembe Stadium in Yaounde, Cameroon, are seen at the scene of a stampede, Jan. 25, 2022.

Posted by Aniekpeno Ekong 13h

Cameroon and the Confederation of African Football have ordered an investigation into Monday night's deadly stampede at a stadium in Cameroon's capital, Yaounde. Fans trying to enter Olembe Stadium to watch an Africa Football Cup of Nations (AFCON) match between Cameroon and the Comoros overpowered hundreds of police, leaving at least eight people dead and 38 wounded.

At Yaounde's Messassi Hospital, a nurse implored a crowd of people asking about injured friends and relatives to be calm and maintain social distancing. He said the hospital is still attending to seven casualties from the crush of fans.

Among those looking for missing relatives was 27-year-old merchant Prosper Chindo, who lost track of his uncle and two children after they went to the stadium.

“I have visited at least seven hospitals this morning and I still cannot find them," he said. "I have asked the police if they have an idea of where my uncle and children can be, but the police have been of no help. I am confused. I do not know what to do next.”

Cameroonian authorities say six people died at the stadium while two others died on the way to the hospital.

A government spokesman in a statement said seven of the 38 injured football fans were in critical condition at Yaounde’s Central Hospital.

Cameroon’s public health minister visited the injured at the hospitals and said President Paul Biya has ordered victims to be treated free of charge.

News Nigeria

8 fans died and 38 people were injured in a stampede during Cameroon vs. Comoros at Olembe Stadium at the 2021 AFCON.

Posted by Aniekpeno Ekong Jan 25

CAF has demanded a report from the local organising committee by Friday.

CAF President, Patrice Motsepe suggests the next game at the venue should be relocated.

MANGE

News Nigeria

Vincent Aboubakar: Mo Salah doesn’t impress me much!

Posted by Aniekpeno Ekong 18h

speaking ahead of today’s meeting between Cameroon and Egypt, Aboubakar insists Salah is not currently on the same level as Mbappe. "He is having a great season in the Premier League and is helping his country to advance in the competition. I wish him a lot of luck. May the best win," Aboubakar told RFI. "He doesn't impress me much. I say it clearly because I'm an honest person and I have my way of seeing things. If he impressed me, I would say so. But he doesn't impress me much. He's a good player, he scores a lot but he doesn't produce a lot of stuff in the game. Of course, he's doing good stuff in the Premier League because he's been in a team that's been there for years. He's a good player but not at the level of some like Mbappe."

CPJ joins letter calling for release of journalists, others arbitrarily detained in Cameroon

Cameroonian President Paul Biya (L) and First Lady Chantal Biya wave to the crowd during the opening ceremony of the Africa Cup of Nations football tournament at Stade d'Olembé in Yaounde on January 9, 2022. CPJ joined a letter calling for the release of journalists and others arbitrarily detained in Cameroon. (AFP/Kenzo Tribouillard)

By Angela Quintal/CPJ Africa Program Coordinator

The Committee to Protect Journalists on Thursday, February 3, joined 26 other civil society organizations in calling on President Paul Biya to release all those arbitrarily detained in Cameroon for acts of free expression, including at least four journalists.

The open letter, published during the Africa Cup of Nations in Cameroon, notes that the continent's premier football tournament masks the reality that over 100 people have been detained, most for more than a year, and some for over five years, for simply "peacefully exercising their human rights."

Journalists Thomas Awah Junior, Mancho Bibixy, Tsi Conrad, and Kingsley Fomunyuy Njoka are detained on anti-state charges in Yaounde's overcrowded Kondengui Central Prison, as documented in CPJ's annual census of jailed journalists around the world.

The organizations also urged Biya to reform the laws currently used to criminalize protest and public assembly, including the country's controversial anti-terror law that is used to silence critics and suppress dissent, as documented in a 2017 special report by CPJ.

Read the letter in full in English and French.

News Nigeria

Egypt's coach Carlos Queiroz suspended Egypt's training today after a drone was noticed circulating above the training grounds. Queiroz has requested the team administrators to submit a complaint to CAF

Posted by Aniekpeno Ekong 8h

Egyptian team administrators outsourced the service of an independent medical lab today to test its players for COVID and all the players were found negative ahead of tomorrow's semifinal match with host country Cameroon.

News Nigeria

Vincent Aboubakar has blamed his team mates for their loss to Egypt in the Semi Finals of the AFCON.

Posted by Aniekpeno Ekong 19h

He refused to say a word to Journalists in the player/media mixed zone, after their loss.

CPJ joins letter calling for release of journalists, others arbitrarily detained in Cameroon

Cameroonian President Paul Biya (L) and First Lady Chantal Biya wave to the crowd during the opening ceremony of the Africa Cup of Nations football tournament at Stade d'Olembé in Yaounde on January 9, 2022. CPJ joined a letter calling for the release of journalists and others arbitrarily detained in Cameroon. (AFP/Kenzo Tribouillard)

By Angela Quintal/CPJ Africa Program Coordinator

The Committee to Protect Journalists on Thursday, February 3, joined 26 other civil society organizations in calling on President Paul Biya to release all those arbitrarily detained in Cameroon for acts of free expression, including at least four journalists.

The open letter, published during the Africa Cup of Nations in Cameroon, notes that the continent's premier football tournament masks the reality that over 100 people have been detained, most for more than a year, and some for over five years, for simply "peacefully exercising their human rights."

Journalists Thomas Awah Junior, Mancho Bibixy, Tsi Conrad, and Kingsley Fomunyuy Njoka are detained on anti-state charges in Yaounde's overcrowded Kondengui Central Prison, as documented in CPJ's annual census of jailed journalists around the world.

The organizations also urged Biya to reform the laws currently used to criminalize protest and public assembly, including the country's controversial anti-terror law that is used to silence critics and suppress dissent, as documented in a 2017 special report by CPJ.

Read the letter in full in English and French.

News Nigeria

Did you notice the vests the players are weaning under their shirts in the AFCON games? Do you know what are they used for?

Posted by Aniekpeno Ekong Tue

It is actually a tracking device that measures all activities performed by the player (his speed, distance, routes, acceleration, movement, etc) as well as vital body functions (such as heart rate, blood pressure, oxygen levels, etc).

The vest is an important device allowing the technical team to monitor the performance of each player during training sessions and throughout the match.

Wake Up Africa!

Posted by Chibueze Royal N. Feb 19

In Cameroon, the Baka people, often referred to as pygmies, traditionally live as hunter-gatherers in the rainforest, with little access to social services. Cameroon's government is stepping up efforts to introduce them to modern ways of life, particularly ensuring they get a proper education. Is there a pygmy population in your country, and how are they treated?

News Nigeria
Cameroonian Forces Encroach Into Nigerian Territory, Seize Farmalands From Nigerians

Posted by Aniekpeno Ekong 19h

The residents have vehemently protested, saying they were denied access to their farmlands.

Cameroonian armed security operatives have encroached and seized farmlands from Nigerians in border communities, SaharaReporters learnt.

Some residents of Kwaja, a border community in Adamawa State, have cried out, urging the Nigerian government to recover their land from the Cameroonian authorities.

The residents have vehemently protested, saying they were denied access to their farmlands.

Their protest message says, 'Maintain ICJ position', 'We agreed to the 1932 Thompson Marchand Declaration', We request for Protection from Nigerian Government'.

The community alleged that Cameroonian officials on 14 February, 2022 erected demarcation signs in Kwaja, Kinga, Jugrma, Fajawa Girziya villages in the Mubi South Local Government Area, known for the cultivation of Irish potatoes.

The spokesman for the community, Dr Ibrahim Kwaja said a letter requesting the Nigerian government to protect the rights and interest of the people has been addressed to the federal and state governments and Nigeria/Cameroon Mixed Commission on the boundary, stressing that the community was amalgamated as part of Northern protectorate in 1914.

The letter agrees with the Thompson Marchand declaration which the International Court of Justice accepts as the correct instrument defining the boundary in the Kwaja area against the watershed line.

The letter reads in part, “In respect of the ICJ judgement, we stand to argue that our people from generation have never in any case spread beyond Nigerian boundary.

“We would not continue to watch our community tortured by confiscation of our shelter and farmlands.”

How do other African countries view Cameroon?

Omari Junior , Project Architect, lives in Cameroon (1994-present) Answered Aug 31, 2018 · Upvoted by C Hanish

I'm Kenyan. I've never been to Cameroon neither have I interacted with a Cameroonian before, but the following are what I cam say about Cameroonians:

Football. Who's not conversant with Indomitable Lions? Cameroon, just like her neighbour Nigeria, has dominated in matters concerning football in Africa. Samuel Eto’o, Idriss Kameni, Rigobert Song, Alex Song, Vincent Aboubakar, Roger Milla just to name but a few…

Music. Makosa. I guess that's the spelling of the genre music San Fan Thomas sings…my favourite being Mole. Such a nice music. You can't sit while it sings.

Anglophone-Francophone feud and skirmishes. I don't understand what the hell boils between these two groups but it's just annoying. One group (English speakers) allegedly feels looked down upon by the majority (French).

Bantu Expansion. I'm a Lacustrine Bantu Speaker, Gusii, to be succinct, who are found in South Western part of Kenya. I've been reading about our history of migration and all point to one source, Cameroon.

Paul Biya. Well, this is a draconian leader according to various media outlets. Wait, his wife who happens to be the First Lady is half his age!! Chantelle or Cheryl? Nevertheless, Power, Money and Sex is what man is after after all.

Cocoa. I understand besides Ghana, Côte d’Ivoire and Nigeria, Cameroon is also another large scale producer of this crop.

Douala and Yaoundé. One of the most known cities in Africa. Once upon a time, our own freight, Kenya Airways (KQ) crashed in Douala due to bad weather. I guess, many Kenyans familiarised themselves with these two cities.

“Africa in a Miniature”. It's understood that Cameroon is the only country in Africa with all the climatic and vegetation variance from the wet tropical rainforest in the south, upto the arid conditions near Lake Chad, in the North.

There are other few facts I know about Cameroon but I guess the aforementioned few are what stand out in this Central African nation. From social media, I can conclude that Cameroonians ain't arrogant as their neighbours, Nigerians. I have nothing negative about Nigerians, but I just envy them though.

Related Links

Why do Nigerians think Nigeria is better than all other African nations?
Is it true that South African females love Nigerian males?
How do other African countries view Nigeria?

Why aren’t there as many South Africans going to Nigeria for greener pastures as there are Nigerians going to SA?

What do Italians think of Nigerians?
Are Nigerians racist?
What is weird in Nigeria but normal in the rest of the world?
What made the Nigerian music industry popular across Africa? How did they do it?
Modernist.com : Are Nigerians really bad people?
Why do South Africans hate other Africans?

CAMEROUN

Comment l'histoire du colonialisme est-elle enseignée aujourd'hui dans les pays qui ont été colonisés par le passé ?

Dimitri Ken Lieu : Douala, CamerounMis à jour le 1 an Je suis Camerounais. Le colonialisme m'a été enseigné au primaire (CM1 et CM2) et au secondaire (troisième et terminale).

L'enseignement était particulièrement… neutre. Il n'avait pas la même saveur d'injustice et de cruauté qu'on avait avec la traite négrière. Certains passages de nos cours, comme ceux parlant de l'explorateur Zintgraff, étaient même dépeints d'une manière assez positive pour les colons.

Je me souviens particulièrement de mon cours de CM1. Qui s'est beaucoup attardé sur les nombreuses constructions de la France, et sur la négligence de la Grande-Bretagne, qui laissait un paysage assez délabré (le Cameroun a été à la fois sous tutelle française et britannique à partir de 1919, après que l'Allemagne a perdu ses colonies).

Les mouvements indépendantistes ont été brossés, mais pas discutés en profondeur. En réalité, on n'a vraiment parlé que des indépendantistes de l'époque allemande (Rudolf Douala Manga Bell, Martin Paul Samba, Charles Atangana). Puis, saut en 1961 (république fédérale du Cameroun), en 1972 (passage de la fédération à un seul État) et en 1984 (changement de nom du pays).

Voilà donc en résumé tout ce qu'on nous a dit sur notre histoire à l'école. Merci aux Français, honte aux Britanniques. Heureusement que les Allemands ont dompté ces tribus sauvages, qui croyaient pouvoir dévier des balles avec des sorts. Et autres éléments, auxquels j'ai naturellement adhéré jusqu'en 2012, quand j'ai commencé à entendre parler de la Françafrique sous un mauvais jour. Je considérais que ces gens se servaient de l'Occident comme bouc émissaire, alors que la situation de délabrement du pays était entièrement la faute de nos dirigeants. Il m'a fallu attendre 2018, et des livres qui m'ont été offerts par un ami historien, pour que je comprenne la réalité des choses. Et cette réalité, c'est que notre histoire n'est que de la propagande !

« En 1913, 50 à 75% des travailleurs d'une plantation de Tiko (sud-ouest) étaient décédés en l'espace de six mois, selon un négociant allemand »

Adalbert Owona, La naissance du Cameroun, 1884-1914, L'Harmattan, Paris, 1996

« De plus en plus nombreux, les colons français ont aussi profité de la Seconde Guerre mondiale pour obliger des milliers de Camerounais à travailler dans leurs plantations, prétextant "l'effort de guerre" »

Richard Joseph, Le mouvement nationaliste au Cameroun, Karthala, Paris, 1986

La colonisation a été tout aussi brutale chez nous qu'ailleurs. Ces merveilles construites par les Allemands puis les Français, l'ont été au prix de centaines de milliers de vies.

Et les mouvements indépendantistes ? Écrasés dans le sang. L'UPC, parti créé en 1948 et dirigé par le héros Ruben Um Nyobè, a été victime de persécutions incessantes pendant des décennies. Pire, les Français ont commandité en 1958, un génocide bamiléké. Étant de cette tribu, je suis particulièrement concerné cela. Pas plus tard que l'an dernier, après une réunion familiale, ma grand-mère m'a décrit ce qu'elle a vécu étant adolescente : des individus arrivaient dans les terres de l'Ouest, pourchassaient et exterminaient systématiquement les autochtones ! Son témoignage est corroboré par plusieurs ouvrages que j'ai lus sur la question.

Alors, pourquoi, malgré toutes ces atrocités, est-ce que nos livres d'histoire sont aussi vides ? À cause de ce type :

Ahmadou Ahidjo, le premier président camerounais, a été personnellement choisi par la France pour régner sur le pays, et a été leur bras armé. Il a poursuivi les massacres jusqu'aux années 70, pour endiguer les Bamiléké et les Bassa de l'UPC. Ainsi, en tant que vassal des Français, il a tout fait pour rayer la vraie histoire de notre colonisation. Ainsi que ses nombreux crimes. C'est jusque dans les années 90 que Ruben Um Nyobè (assassiné par les Français, avec l'aval d'Ahidjo) a été reconnu comme héros national…

Et aujourd'hui, rien ne s'arrange. Le parti au pouvoir (RDPC) étant le descendant direct de celui d'Ahidjo (UNC), ils font tout pour étouffer l'histoire réelle du Cameroun, afin de ne pas instiguer en nous le sentiment de rébellion. Aujourd'hui, peu de gens connaissent vraiment notre histoire. Si depuis, le gouvernement a attisé la thèse anti-occidentale, et donc la France est très détestée, les circonstances précises de ce qui s'est passé ne sont toujours pas enseignées, et les crimes d'Ahidjo sont ignorés par la plupart.

Pour plus de lecture :

Fanny Pigeaud, Au Cameroun de Paul Biya, Karthala, Paris, 2011

Enoh Meyomesse, Guerre et paix au Cameroun : le rôle de l'armée en question, Les Editions du Kamerun, Yaoundé, 2010

Enoh Meyomesse, Le limogeage politique d'Ahmadou Ahidjo, Les Editions du Kamerun, Yaoundé, 2010

News Nigeria
A Cameroonian just joined Ukraine to fight against Russia.

Posted by Aniekpeno Ekong 21h

Recall also that about 115 Nigerian men on Tuesday offered to fight alongside Ukraine, following the nationwide call by Volodymyr Zelensky for African nations to assist his country from Russia's invasion.

Wonders of the Past □□
MUSGUM mud houses, northern Cameroon

Posted by Alice G. Mar 17

The traditional dwellings of the Musgum ethnic group are buildings made of dried mud, which are made in various shapes, such as tall domed or conical huts.

They are mostly inverted V-shaped, decorated on the outside with geometric patterns. The shape and high height of the construction, almost 9 m (30 feet), keep the houses cool inside during the hot summer days. At the top of the hut, there is a circular opening of small diameter, which helps air circulation.

It is a very old tradition that was revealed to Europeans around 1850 when the German researcher Heinrich Barth travelled through North and Central Africa.

This type of architecture is called "vernacular" - traditional architecture of a particular region

.

Cameroon Journalist Malcolm Barnabe Paho detained for 2 days, prosecuted for defamation.

Dakar, March 23, 2022 — Cameroonian authorities should drop the prosecution of journalist Malcom Bernabé Paho and decriminalize journalism in the country, the Committee to Protect Journalists said Wednesday.

On February 22, the national gendarmerie arrested Paho, director of the newspaper Midi Libre Hebdo; opened a criminal defamation case against him; and detained him for two days in the capital Yaoundé, following a complaint filed by Boba Denis, a pastor who heads the Africa Life World Mission church, an international religious organization, according to news reports and the journalist, who spoke to CPJ via messaging app.

Denis filed the complaint on January 27, after Midi Libre Hebdo published an article on November 29, 2021, alleging that Denis had sexual relations with church members, according to a letter to Paho from Cameroon's

National Communication Council (CNC), the country's communications regulator, and the article, both of which CPJ reviewed. Denis claimed the article contained "unfounded statements likely to damage his image," according to the CNC letter.

"Cameroonian authorities should drop their prosecution of journalist Malcolm Barnabé Paho and reform the country's laws to ensure journalism is not criminalized," said Angela Quintal, CPJ's Africa program director, from New York. "Cameroon should focus on ensuring that there are no journalists in jail, not look to add more."

On February 24, Paho was released on bail after paying 100,000 CFA francs (US$167), Paho's lawyer, Soumele Jatsa Augustin, told CPJ by phone. In Cameroon, defamation is punishable with up to six months in prison and a fine of 2 million CFA francs (US$3,350), according to Article 305 of the penal code.

Paho is expected to appear in court on April 14, he told CPJ.

Denis told CPJ by phone that he filed separate defamation complaints with Cameroon's gendarmerie, to hold Paho criminally liable, and the CNC, which can impose sanctions on media outlets and journalists. ''I blame him (Paho) for everything he said in the newspaper without consulting me and making sure that what he said was true. What he wrote is extremely serious. It puts my life in danger," Denis said.

The CNC reviewed and ultimately rejected Denis' complaint against the journalist, Paho told CPJ. Jean Tobie Ho, the secretary general of the CNC told CPJ by phone that the complaint was rejected over a technical issue.

CPJ's calls and questions sent via messaging app to Florent Ntyam-Nkoto, Cameroon's Public Prosecutor at the Court of Yaoundé Administrative Center, went unanswered.

There are at least four journalists currently jailed in connection with their work in Cameroon, according to CPJ research; two have been released since December 1, 2021, when CPJ conducted its last census of journalists behind bars for their work around the world.

Dakar, April 6, 2022 — Cameroon's state media regulator should immediately reverse its suspension of journalists working with the privately owned broadcaster Equinoxe TV, and ensure that the outlet can operate freely, the Committee to Protect Journalists said Wednesday.

On April 1, the National Communication Council media regulator announced that Equinoxe TV CEO Séverin Tchounkeu and editor-in-chief and presenter Cédrick Noufele were both suspended from working as journalists for one month, and that the outlet's "Droit de Réponse" ("Right of Reply") program was barred from airing during that time, according to press reports and a statement by the NCC.

A person close to Equinoxe TV's top management, who spoke to CPJ on the condition they not be named out of fear of reprisal, said the outlet planned to challenge the regulator's decision in court this week.

"Cameroonian authorities should immediately allow Equinoxe TV CEO Séverin Tchounkeu and editor Cédrick Noufele to resume their work, and must stop attempts to censor content about matters of public interest," said Angela Quintal, CPJ's Africa program coordinator, in New York. "The country's media regulator should encourage a diversity of views instead of trying to police speech, and should ensure that Equinoxe TV can air its programming freely."

On February 28, Noufele hosted a panel discussion on "Right of Reply" about a nationwide teachers' strike, according to the NCC statement, which accused him of failing to properly supervise the discussion that was "likely to lead to the amplification of a potentially explosive social demand."

Following that show, national Minister of Territorial Administration Paul Atanga Nji compared Equinoxe TV to radio stations that incited turmoil leading up to the Rwandan genocide.

In a letter dated March 18, and subsequently published by local media outlets, Littoral Region Governor Samuel Dieudonné Ivaha Diboua accused Equinoxe TV of "repeated incitement to popular revolt" and said the station had "an outrageously aggressive editorial line for years." In that letter, Diboua threatened to take legal action against the station for alleged incitement.

On March 21, Tchounkeu appeared on a show on Equinoxe TV, which CPJ reviewed, during which he mocked grammatical errors in Diboua's letter and suggested that Nji had written it. Also in the broadcast, Noufele denied any wrongdoing in hosting that panel discussion.

In its statement, the NCC cited the February 28 and March 21 programs for allegedly "broadcasting unfounded, insinuating and offensive statements," and ordered the journalists and "Right of Reply" to be suspended for one month.

CPJ called Nji and contacted him via messaging app, and also called and emailed Diboua's office for comment, but did not receive any replies. When CPJ called the NCC for comment, President Joseph Chebonkeng Kalabubsu referred CPJ to the regulator's statement.

What is the age of the African longest serving president?

Olutunji Timothy · Follow Content Writer and Editor Jan 10

The current longest-serving non-royal national leader in Africa is Paul Biya. He is currently 88 years old. He assumed the power in June 1975 as the Prime Minister. Became the President of the country in November 1982 and still remains in power. Cameroonian President Paul Biya was re-elected in 2018…

Related Links

What are some of the achievements of Pakistan in the past 70 years?
What is so special about Nigeria and why is the country so important?

What great achievements for humankind have originated in the Islamic world in the last 200 years?

What international achievements did people from your country recently make?

Can Nigeria ever have good leadership that will bring the needed developments that the people want?

Are there any white people in Nigeria?

Are there any good things or achievements in Nigeria that can be attributed to this Buhari regime?

What does Nigeria need to do to develop?
What individuals and events in history are a source of pride for Nigeria?
What were Obafemi Awolowo's contributions to the independence of Nigeria?

Who are the greatest (in terms of achievement and general opinion) people in your country's history?

What are the achievements of Portugal and the Portuguese people?
What's the biggest achievement in Nigeria from 1960 to date?

Do Iranian ethnic people feel that the achievements of Persian civilization are sometimes appropriated as Islamic achievements?

What were the main achievements of the Abbassid Caliphate?

Why are people scared of Nigerian people?

Victor Dirikebamor Lives in Lagos, Nigeria2y

Photo by Ovinuchi Ejiohuo on Unsplash

Well, i know what you mean.

I think the right question is:

Why are people so protective of themselves around Nigerians?

I was speaking with an Australian friend the other day, he introduced me to his Mom and guess what she asked after yelling the name "Nigeria!"

Is he a prince?

Then she warned him, be careful and, mumbled a few incoherent words like scammers...

And my humorous and carefree friend quickly told her, i was, in fact, a prince and that i have his credit card details already... Business is good:D

And at my previous job at a college, the Dean of foundation studies who is from the UK never fails to ask if I'm a Nigerian whenever i go to his office to borrow a stamp or stapler and, when I say yes, he would jokingly say "don't worry, I'm a grandpa, I will do it for you."

"There is a way Nigerians do things that is a little strange to me, this stapler could go missing right under my nose and i won't even notice.

He's a funny, playful man, who has become a local and never fails to punch me in the chest or shoulder.

He understands Nigerians even more than I do.

There is a lot of negative news about Nigerians globally.

People are just been careful based on what they've heard or seen and unfortunately, the innocent Nigerian is now suffering from it.

I have written dozens of articles about the good and bad of Nigerians.

I acknowledge there are indeed scammers in Nigeria and how I've tried to restructure their thinking on how every Nigerian is certainly not a scammer.

I can only hope that it would touch the heart of balanced thinking individuals to change the way they see me and my fellow countrymen.

There is this American lady married to a Nigerian, when he makes her happy she goes all sweet, talking about her husband, all lovely.

But, when he makes her angry every Nigerian is to suffer for it:

"Victor, there is nothing good in that country, i Google Nigeria and all i saw was scams and... I will never advise anyone to marry a Nigerian, i will dissuade people from going to that country."

When she calms down, she would be the one to confess:

"I like Nigerian men, i like their music and the way they move their body while dancing, every part of their body move when they dance. "

"I also love your food and the people, they seem so happy and friendly."

"I love that place; "point of no return" at badagry, it teaches me a lot about black people and slavery and i like that too and that one..."

Same lady, different stories based on her mood.

My country's reputation is now mortgaged to her emotions.

And since she has been to Nigeria and married to a Nigerian, people are going to believe whatever she says.

These are the trouble Nigeria face today, people go about sharing their experience both the bad and the good, and then more bad based on how they feel at a particular time.

Are there bad Nigerians?

Yes.

Are there good Nigerians?

Oh, yes.

Same as your country!

Find your own truth but make it balanced and absolutely sincere.

Related Answer

Why is it that Nigeria rarely goes to war against any fellow African country?

Ke'Aun, African-American Cosmopolitan Updated Dec 6

I've wondered this myself sometimes.

I look at Nigeria's overwhelming economic/population edge against its neighbors, and the strategy gamer in me can't help but want Nigeria to do something… imperial.

Strategy gamers when a far-away war breaks out

Unfortunately for us armchair conquerors (but perhaps fortunately for Nigeria's neighbors), the country seems to be a decent enough neighbor given its heft.

Nigeria, far as I know, sticks to the continental agreement that the colonial borders are sacrosanct. It had a duspute with Cameroon over some territory, but when it lost that dispute it withdrew.

Nigeria has sent its forces abroad, namely to Liberia during its civil war. And it did send a warship to The Gambia during its election crisis a few years ago, in support of the guy who won against former President Yammeh (name escapes me). But these were all actions in support of regional missions or agreements.

This is not to say Nigeria is saintly, as it has other ways to make its power felt. I would also say that Nigeria probably has better things to do with its military. Boko Haram and other such internal issues being more important than map-painting for Abuja.

Once again it's up to us gamers to accomplish what politicians would fear to try.

There's no "Nigeria" in the game but… you work with what you get.

Related Answer
How do other African countries view Nigeria?

Boris Guiffot A Cameroonian dude who likes technology and politics Updated Jul 10, 2019 · Upvoted by Yusuf Idowu , lives in Nigeria

I am Cameroonian and Nigeria is the country with whom we share the longest border. That has a huge impact on the way we see the country. There is a large Nigerian community in Cameroon. Many Cameroonians pursue their high education in Nigeria.

Nigerians are considered very smart but some of them are famous to use that smartness to do unglamorous activities. They contribute to the stereotypes.

We often compete against each other at football (both our male & female team)

We like to tease you guys about football but we don't want to mess up with you when it comes to political matters : Yes, I am talking about Bakassi! Because of that disputed peninsula, we went to the brink of war in 1981. We are so relieved that it has been resolved diplomatically. Thanks guys for avoiding a useless war with a neighbor that has 1/10 of your population. We appreciate it!

We relate well because our anglophone regions speak a similar Pidgin English. Even the French we speak on the street is full of Pidgin words.

Our northern regions are very similar to yours. Most of them belong to the same Fulfulde/Hausa ethnic group. They were even part of the same empire before they were separated by colonial borders:

We both complain about the extreme corruption of governments. We sometimes share the podium as the most corrupt countries on the continent. Does this have anything to do with the fact that we are both oil producers?

Thank you very much for saving us from Hollywood and Telenovelas. We really love your fashion, music and movies. Our own industry grew exponentially after we decided to follow suit.

For some reasons, many of us think that Nigeria is very developed except for those who have actually set foot in the country. Nollywood certainly has something to do with it.

Our rivalry is usually with Ivory Coast and we don't interfere with you guys trying to downplay Ghana. Nonetheless, we wonder why you guys make so much noise about jollof rice. We might not be loud about it but ours is the best:

I am from West Cameroon and we are often mistaken for Igbos so I guess we might be distant cousins

We wonder why such a powerful neighbour couldn't contain Boko Haram after so many years

I don't know if there is a country in this world without a Nigerian community

We admire you a lot for your sense of self-worth and self-confidence

Your pastors took all Africa by surprise. They are so famous that it is told that some pastors will go for training in Nigeria before returning to Cameroon

- Your garments are real works of art!

- Overall, we mingle pretty well and seem to have a lot in common. I know a lot Nigerian-Cameroonian couples.

Related Links

Why do Nigerians think Nigeria is better than all other African nations?
Why are Nigerians hated by so many nations especially South Africans?
What is your biggest fear as a Nigerian?
Why is Nigeria so hated in Western countries?
Why are we (Nigerians) always angry for no reason in this country?
What do people think about Nigeria and Nigerians?
Is it true that South African females love Nigerian males?
Why are Nigerians hated so much around the world?
Are Nigerians racist?

What is your life like in Nigeria? Are you happy?

What are the people and the cities like? What is the ‘feeling’ of being Nigerian?

How do other African countries view Nigeria?

Why aren’t there as many South Africans going to Nigeria for greener pastures as there are Nigerians going to SA?

Why do some Nigerians look down on African Americans when Nigeria has a high crime rate, a large uneducated population, corruption, and other socioeconomic problems? How can you look down on others when your house is not in order?

What do you think of Nigerians?
Why do people see Nigerians as Bad People? I am Nigerian and I am a normal girl so idk why.

Réponse similaire

Qui gagnera l'élection présidentielle camerounaise de 2018 ?

Boris Guiffot, Camerounais qui s'intéresse aux relations internationales
Répondu 5 oct. 2018

L’élection présidentielle au Cameroun se déroule ce dimanche 07 Octobre 2018. Plus 6.500.000 Camerounais iront élire leur président. Il y a de très fortes chances que le gagnant soit le candidat sortant: Paul Biya.

Il pourrait bien évidemment y avoir des surprises mais cela reste peu probable.

Paul Biya paraît déterminé à se maintenir au pouvoir. Il a supprimé la limite de mandats en 2008. La population a manifesté son mécontentement et cela a été violemment reprimandé. Il est pareillement insensible aux revendications du Cameroun anglophone. On y dénombre de nombreuses violations des droits de l’homme et internet a été coupé dans les régions anglophones pendant plusieurs mois en guise de représailles. En gros, même avec la détermination de la population et de l’opposition , si Paul Biya veut gagner, il trouvera le moyen d’y arriver.

2. Paul Biya jouit d'une certaine popularité auprès de certaines couches de la population pour des raisons parfois surprenantes (peur du changement, tribalisme, relative stabilité, etc.). Certaines personnalités publiques l'ont ouvertement apporté leur soutien.

3. L'évolution des moyens de communication ont permis à l'opposition d'avoir une campagne beaucoup plus efficace qu'à l'accoutumée. Certains candidats d'oppositions ont ainsi pu se démarquer.

Malgré beaucoup de promesses et d’espoir, ceux-ci n’ont pas pu s’unir autour d’une coalition.

En conclusion, les dés semblent joués d’avance et c’est bien dommage parce que le facteur politique est le principal frein à la prospérité du Cameroun. Le pays a un potentiel énorme. Cette élection pourrait être une façon pour le gouvernement en place d’essayer de se légitimer.

Questions similaires

Quels sont les monts que l'on trouve dans la dorsale camerounaise ?
Qu'est-ce que la dorsale camerounaise ?
Comment se définit la dorsale camerounaise ?

Politique en Côte d'Ivoire : Qu'en est-il du sort qui est réservé à l'ex-président Laurent Gbagbo ?

Quelles sont les ressources naturelles du Cameroun ?
Que deviendra le Cameroun après Paul Biya ?

Pourquoi le nom officiel du Togo est-il République togolaise au lieu de république du Togo ?

Comment l'isthme de Thiaroye (presqu'île du Cap-Vert, Sénégal) s'est-il formé ?
Quels sont les principaux problèmes au Cameroun ?
Quel est le plus haut sommet de la Côte d'Ivoire ?

Réponse similaire

Pourquoi disons-nous que le Cameroun est l'Afrique en miniature?

Fernand Nyouboui, anciennement Auditeur comptable (2015 – 2016) Répondu 10 avr. 2020

Réponse originale : Pourquoi dit on que le Cameroun c'est l'Afrique en miniature ?

Géographiquement le Cameroun est situé au centre de l'Afrique, on dirait un carrefour.

La population Camerounaise regorge environ264 ethnies, où chaque pays d'Afrique pourait puiser ses doubleurs culturelles.

Sur le plan religieux ,alors le Cameroun encore regorge officiellement 79% des religions presentent sur le continent (Christianisme, Musulmane, Églises de reveille,Athés, Traditionalistes) pour ne citer que ceux là.

En plus tout ce que vous trouverez dans les pays Africains en l'espace de 2 ans de voyage, alors il suffira de 2 mois de tourisme au Cameroun pour avoir la même sensation.

La population Camerounaise est l'une des plus actives, intellectuelle et entreprenante.

Dire que le Cameroun est l'Afrique en miniature revient a affirmer que mère Nature aurait fait une maquette du continent au cameroun, analyser tous les aspets avant de confectionner notre Afrique.

Dans les livres L'Egypte est le berceau de la civilisation. Pourtant leurs ancêtres tous noirs venus de l'Afrique subsaharienne (Cameroun y compris). Je comprends mieux pourquoi il existe toujours ce conflit morale entre les deux nations de Football (mdr).

En conclusion le Cameroun reste un pays pauvre malgré ses richesses naturelles , sa population très intellectuelle et ambitieuse, son Gouvernement corrompue et marionnettes des occidentaux. Tout un miroir de notre cher Afrique

Questions similaires

Quels sont les monts que l'on trouve dans la dorsale camerounaise ?
Qu'est-ce que la dorsale camerounaise ?
Comment se définit la dorsale camerounaise ?

Politique en Côte d'Ivoire : Qu'en est-il du sort qui est réservé à l'ex-président Laurent Gbagbo ?

Quelles sont les ressources naturelles du Cameroun ?
Que deviendra le Cameroun après Paul Biya ?

Pourquoi le nom officiel du Togo est-il République togolaise au lieu de république du Togo ?

Comment l'isthme de Thiaroye (presqu'île du Cap-Vert, Sénégal) s'est-il formé ?
Quels sont les principaux problèmes au Cameroun ?
Quel est le plus haut sommet de la Côte d'Ivoire ?

News Nigeria
Cameroon Legend Samuel Eto'o Rejects Salary as President

Posted by Aniekpeno Ekong Apr 19

The legend's promise not to be paid as president was kept, and as a result, wages to be diverted to player's well-being.

Eto'o has advocated for high wages for players in the Cameroonian women's football league, the Guineas Super League, which begins soon, as part of his policies to ensure players are compensated fairly for their efforts.

Samuel Eto'o, the four-time African player of the year, has received high praise since taking over as President of the Cameroonian Football Federation.

The legend's promise not to be paid as president was kept, and as a result, wages to be diverted to player's well-being.

Eto'o has advocated for high wages for players in the Cameroonian women's football league, the Guineas Super League, which begins soon, as part of his policies to ensure players are compensated fairly for their efforts.

Samuel Eto'o, the four-time African player of the year, has received high praise since taking over as President of the Cameroonian Football Federation.

CPJ urges Cameroon authorities to allow arbitrarily detained journalist Kingsley Fomunyuy Njoka to bury his father

CPJ called on Cameroonian authorities to allow freelance journalist Kingsley Fomunyuy Njoka, who has been held in arbitrary detention without trial for almost two years, to leave prison to attend his father's funeral on May 6, 2022. (Venbatia Fai)

New York, May 3, 2022 – Cameroonian authorities should allow freelance journalist Kingsley Fomunyuy Njoka, who has been held in arbitrary detention without trial in Kondengui Central Prison in the capital Yaounde for almost two years, to leave prison on compassionate grounds to attend his father's funeral on May 6, and should ensure that he and other jailed journalists are finally released so that they can live and work freely, the Committee to Protect Journalists said Tuesday.

Njoka's father, Shey Rudolf Verla Njoka, died on April 25, and will be buried on Friday, May 6, in Kikaikom village in the restive English-speaking Northwest region, according to the journalist's wife Venbatia Fai and his lawyer Amungwa Tanyi, who both spoke to CPJ via messaging app, and a May 2 handwritten letter, reviewed by CPJ, that Njoka wrote to prison authorities.

"As we mark World Press Freedom Day, the Committee to Protect Journalists again appeals to Cameroonian authorities to immediately free all the jailed journalists in the country, including Kingsley Njoka, who has been held in lengthy pre-trial detention," said Angela Quintal, CPJ's Africa program coordinator. "At the very least, Njoka, who is the eldest son in his family and has yet to be tried or convicted after nearly two years behind bars, should be allowed compassionate leave to mourn and bury his father."

Njoka was arrested on May 15, 2020, and held in incommunicado detention until he was charged on June 11 with secession and complicity in an armed gang, according to CPJ's research. He was suspected of managing pro-secessionist WhatsApp groups, including the Bui Warriors group based in Kumbo, an English-speaking town in the Northwest region that has experienced armed conflict between government forces and separatists seeking to create the independent state of Ambazonia, according to media reports. Four top prison officials were killed by separatists in Kumbo last month, according to Voice of America.

The head of Kondengui Central Prison, Hamadou Madi, did not respond to CPJ's telephone calls or texts via messaging app for comment. The state prosecutor in Yaounde's military tribunal, Major Cerlin Belinga, also did not reply to telephone calls or requests for comment sent via messaging apps.

Cameroon is the fifth-worst jailer of journalists in Africa, with six journalists behind bars on December 1, 2021, according to CPJ's annual prison census. One journalist, Emmanuel Mbombog Mbog Matip, has since been released.

What is the strangest act carried out by a world leader?

Shgdrn Mjh Ancien(ne) étudiant(e) en BS Degree in History

Jean-Bédel Bokassa (1921 - 1996) était un dirigeant politique et militaire centrafricain qui a été le deuxième président de la République centrafricaine jusqu'à ce qu'il se déclare "Empereur". Bokassa a été à la tête de la République centrafricaine pendant quatorze ans et a déclaré son propre couronnement de Bokassa Ier comme empereur en 1977 dans un stade de sport. Le couronnement était presque une copie exacte du couronnement de Napoléon en 1804 et était marqué par le luxe et le faste. Le "couronnement" a coûté VINGT MILLIONS DE DOLLARS - un montant égal au revenu annuel de dix mille de ses sujets. Bokassa a acheté cent berlines Mercedes-Benz noires pour le couronnement. On l'appelait "l'événement où tous ceux qui participaient qui n'étaient pas présents".

Le dictateur militaire Idi Amin Dada - également connu sous le nom de "Boucher de l'Ouganda" - a dirigé l'Ouganda d'une main de fer pendant huit ans. Idid Amin était grand (1m93). Il était connu pour ses cascades au cours desquelles il s'est pris une balle de fusil de calibre 22 dans les dents. On lui a diagnostiqué la syphilis. Un médecin israélien qui avait servi en Ouganda a déclaré : "Ce n'est un secret pour personne qu'Amin souffre de syphilis à un stade avancé, qui a causé des lésions cérébrales". Amin était un cannibale.

Il a assassiné 500 000 personnes (4% de la population ougandaise). Les méthodes d'assassinat d'Amin sont devenues de plus en plus sadiques. Il gardait des têtes humaines dans son réfrigérateur. Il a ordonné que 4 000 handicapés soient jetés dans le Nil pour être mangés par des crocodiles. Et il a avoué le cannibalisme à plusieurs reprises : "J'ai mangé de la viande humaine", a-t-il déclaré en 1976. "Elle est très salée, encore plus salée que la viande de léopard".

Le Premier ministre camerounais (en fait un dictateur) Paul Biya a déjà remporté une élection avec 99,98 % des voix.

Le magazine SPY a un jour envoyé à treize des personnes les plus riches du monde des chèques de 13 centimes pour savoir qui les encaisserait. Les seules personnes à le faire étaient un marchand d'armes et Donald Trump. (Trump a intenté un procès infructueux contre Timothy O'Brien - auteur d'un livre intitulé TrumpNation : The Art of Being Donald - pour 5 millions de dollars parce qu'il l'avait traité de millionnaire au lieu de milliardaire).

Lors de la réunion du G7 de 2017 à Taormina (en Sicile) en Italie, alors que les dirigeants du Royaume-Uni, de l'Italie, de l'Allemagne, de la France, du Japon et du Canada se promenaient dans les petites rues pavées de la vieille ville, Trump les a suivis dans une voiturette de golf.

Et puis il y a ça :

et ça :

Notez que, jusqu'à présent, Trump n'a signé personnellement que deux instruments écrits qui seront à jamais commémorés dans la bibliothèque présidentielle de Trump.

a été abattu lors d'un discours mais a continué à parler pendant 84 minutes.

Le 14 octobre 1912, alors que l'ancien président, Theodore Roosevelt, prononçait un discours à Milwaukee, il a été abattu par un assassin du nom de John Schrank. La foule choquée a regardé Roosevelt révéler sa chemise trempée de sang et une pile de remarques préparées avec un trou de balle.

La balle s'était logée près de ses côtes et y resterait jusqu'à la fin de sa vie.

En mai 2009, le Premier ministre britannique Gordon Brown et son épouse ont visité la Maison Blanche. Selon la coutume, M. Browm a offert à M. Obama un porte-stylo fabriqué à partir du bois du navire de guerre britannique du XIXe siècle HMS President (dont le navire jumeau, le HMS Resolute, a fourni le bois pour le bureau ovale). Malheureusement, les Obama n'ont pas su anticiper l'essentiel de l'échange (le personnel de la Première Dame était censé s'en charger). Pour éviter d'être prise les mains vides, Michelle Obama a envoyé un membre du personnel à la boutique de cadeaux de la Maison Blanche où elle a acquis une collection de 25 DVD de "classiques du cinéma américain" (qui étaient incompatibles avec les lecteurs dvd britanniques - l'un des films était une production britannique)... "Un peu de réflexion avait clairement été nécessaire pour les choisir", a déclaré le Daily Mail. "Charmant."

Le vice-président de la Guinée équatoriale, riche en pétrole, (qui se trouve être aussi le fils du président Teodoro Obiang Nguema Mbasog), a acheté un yacht de luxe de 76 mètres (250 pieds) qui a coûté 120 millions de dollars. (Il a été saisi par les autorités néerlandaises en 2016). Les trois quarts de la population de la Guinée équatoriale vivent en dessous du seuil de pauvreté.

Mao Tse Tung ne s'est JAMAIS nettoyé avec du savon ou n'a jamais lavé ses cheveux - jamais. Il aimait cependant aller nager et se frottait avec des serviettes. Il ne se brossait pas non plus les dents, même s'il était un gros fumeur. Il a eu une maîtresse adolescente tout au long de sa vie.

Questions similaires

Qui est le leader le plus étrange de ces cinquante dernières années ?
Qui fut le plus grand et le plus petit chef d'État de l'histoire ?
Quel est l'acte le plus fou jamais commis ?
Quel est l'objet archéologique le plus étrange jamais trouvé ?
Qui est le dirigeant le moins apprécié des 300 dernières années ?
Quel est l'acte politique le plus intelligent de l'histoire ?
Qui est le leader le plus détesté au monde ?
Quel dirigeant est considéré comme le plus audacieux du monde ?
Qui est le meilleur leader au monde actuellement ? Pourquoi mérite-t-il le titre ?
Quel est l'orgasme le plus puissant réalisé dans l'histoire du cinéma ?

Votre pays a-t-il un leader historique que vous pensez être largement surestimé ?

Dimitri Ken Féru d'histoire 6 mo

Disclaimer : pour cette réponse, je vais m'efforcer de ne rien dire sur le fond de ma pensée par rapport au régime actuel (pour des raisons évidentes - mes compatriotes comprendront). Cela dit, je pense 100% de tout ce que je vais dire dans cette réponse.

Beaucoup de Camerounais voient aujourd'hui la situation économique délétère dans laquelle nous nous trouvons. Ils voient les journalistes bafoués et arrêtés, les conflits au Nord-Ouest/Sud-Ouest, le tribalisme à tous les coins de rue. Ils se disent qu'au moins dans l'ancien régime, c'était tellement mieux. Nous avions une situation économique prospère et peu de ces maux. Combien de personnes qui disent cela, ont lu l'histoire sur le prédécesseur de Paul Biya, Ahmadou Ahidjo ?

Ahmadou Ahidjo, président de la république fédérale, puis unie du Cameroun, de 1960 à 1982.

Sommaire :
1- Ahidjo était le symbole de la résistance à la decolonization
2- Ahidjo a désuni le Cameroun
3- Ahidjo était un génocidaire
4- Le régime d'Ahidjo était extrêmement répressif
5- Le bilan économique d'Ahidjo était médiocre

Conclusion

Pour cette réponse, je vais me servir de trois ouvrages. Et avant que vous ne vous en preniez aux opinions politiques de leurs auteurs :

L'un de ces ouvrages est une gigantesque diatribe contre l'actuel président ;

L'auteur des deux autres ouvrages est actuellement incarcéré, donc considéré comme un ennemi du régime actuel.

Les trois ouvrages utilisés (et qui seront ensuite désignés comme [1], [2] et [3] pour faciliter leur citation) sont donc :

[1] Pigeaud, F. (2006). Au Cameroun de Paul Biya. Karthala

[2] Meyomesse, E. (2010). La question tribale et la politique au Cameroun. Les Editions du Kamerun

[3] Meyomesse, E. (2010). Le limogeage politique d'Ahmadou Ahidjo. Les Editions du Kamerun

1- Ahidjo était le symbole de la résistance à la décolonisation

Il a été personnellement choisi par les Français, afin que ces derniers conservent la mainmise sur le pays. Selon un schéma décidé par Jacques Foccart et De Gaulle (qui avait déjà profité à Omar Bongo au Gabon) :

1/- choisir un personnage ayant déjà été directeur de cabinet du président à remplacer ;

2/- ce personnage doit être nettement plus jeune que le président à remplacer ;

3/- ce personnage doit n’avoir jamais flirté avec les milieux anti-français, et plus précisément, n’avoir pas participé aux luttes pour l’indépendance dans le camp des nationalistes ;

4/- ce personnage doit être un francophile actif ;

5/- ce personnage doit avoir exercé des fonctions élevées, vice-président de la République, Premier ministre ;

6/- la constitution doit être modifiée en vue de faire du Premier ministre (ou du vice-président lorsqu’il en existe un) le « successeur constitutionnel » du président à remplacer ;

7/- le président à remplacer doit démissionner « volontairement » au cours de son mandat, alors qu’il reste encore plusieurs années.
[3], P.30

Ainsi, en 1958 c'est Ahidjo qui a personnellement donné le feu vert aux Français pour l'assaut qui a conduit à la mort de Ruben Um Nyobe (symbole de la lutte contre les colons, il est au Cameroun ce que Nelson Mandela est à l'Afrique du Sud)

2- Ahidjo a désuni le Cameroun

Aujourd'hui, l'on a l'impression que le pays est au bord de l'implosion avec le problème du tribalisme. Et selon Pigeaud, les vraies hostilités ont commencé en 1987 (donc sous Biya).

L'offensive a été lancée en mars 1987: lors d'un débat organisé à l'université à Yaoundé, un idéologue et chantre du « Renouveau », le professeur de philosophie Hubert Mono Ndjana, s'est violemment attaqué aux Bamiléké, les accusant d'« ethnofascisme ». L'ethnofacisme, c'est la « volonté de puissance d'une ethnie ou l'expression de son désir hégémonique qui prend soit la forme du discours théorique, soit celle d'une mêlée ouverte dans la polémique, soit celle d'une organisation systématique sous la forme d'un mercantilisme conquérant », a-t-il expliqué. En agitant le spectre d'une conspiration des Bamiléké pour prendre le pouvoir, ce discours permettait à la fois de faire d'eux les bourreaux du régime en place et des Beti les victimes.
[1], P.125–126

C) Et le pouvoir entra dans la danse

[PAGE 112]

*
* *

DE L'ETHNOFASCISME DANS LA LITTÉRATURE POLITIQUE CAMEROUNAISE[1]

Hubert MONO NDJANA

En présentant dernièrement l'état de la philosophie politique au Cameroun, M. Sindjoun Pokam a situé son apparition dans les années 80 et notamment après l'avènement du nouveau régime politique camerounais. De même, dans Le Messager de novembre 1986, apparaissait, sous la plume de M. Patrice Kayo, une étude évaluatrice de la littérature politique camerounaise qui n'existerait elle aussi qu'à partir de la même période. L'auteur oubliait – ne s'étant pas inclus dans l'ensemble qu'il décrivait – qu'il en faisait lui-même partie, ne serait-ce que pour avoir publié, en 1983, sa Lettre ouverte à un roi bamiléké, dans laquelle il dénonçait l'inutile persistance du système féodal qui perpétuait l'exploitation de citoyens camerounais au profit de roitelets anachroniques. C'était bel et bien de la littérature politique, la dénonciation de l'anachronisme des micro-royaumes répressifs n'étant rien de moins que l'énonciation, en négatif, d'une théorie de l'État, c'est-à-dire, positivement, d'un État moderne, fort et centralisateur.

Première page du discours d'Hubert Mono Ndjana.
Sauf qu'il se trouve que le tribalisme avait déjà débuté dans le pays, et ce 29 ans plus tôt ! En effet, une conspiration avait été mise au point par un certain Jean Ramadier, pour détruire la résistance camerounaise : installer un pantin de la France au pouvoir (Ahmadou Ahidjo) qui allait mettre à exécution le plan de désunion du Cameroun.

[Jean Ramadier] avait eu l'idée, quant à lui, d'inoculer un venin extrêmement dévastateur dans la tête des Camerounais : le discours sur l'unité nationale. Il avait eu l'idée de concevoir un discours qui, pendant qu'il déculpabilisait la France aux yeux des Camerounais, allait semer la zizanie en eux pendant de très longues années, en tout cas, jusqu'à ce jour.

[…] Qu'avait fait dire à Ahmadou Ahidjo, Jean Ramadier ? Trois choses essentielles qui se ramenaient en vérité à deux : 1/- si vous désirez vous développer, vous devez d'abord être unis, car votre sous-développement provient, non pas d'une exploitation coloniale française et de brimades imaginaires, ainsi que le racontent des Camerounais cinglés, mais, plutôt, véritablement, de l'existence d'une myriade de groupes ethniques dans votre pays; il faut donc les unir, c'est-à-dire vous unir, avant d'envisager quelque développement que ce soit. […]

[1], P.26, 28

C'est à cause de ce tour de passe-passe que le Kamerun (nom allemand, symbole de la résistance aux Français et de l'union des peuples de l'époque) est passé de peuple (en majorité) uni à une constellation de tribus qui continuent de se tirer dessus jusqu'à ce jour. Mention spéciale pour les politiques « d'équilibre régional », écran de fumée pour permettre à Ahidjo de consolider le pouvoir auprès des individus issus de sa région (Nordistes, principalement les Foulbé). En témoigne son discours du 17 Mai 1982, dans lequel il répondait à ceux qui le critiquaient pour ce fait ([2], P.48–51).

3- Ahidjo était un génocidaire

Des individus arrivant dans les terres de l'Ouest, créant des postes de contrôle, pourchassant et exterminaient systématiquement les autochtones. Ce n'est pas des scènes d'un film que je vous raconte, mais le témoignage de ma grand-mère lors d'une réunion de famille. Elle avait 15–17 ans lorsque des sauvages radicalisés par le régime (ou des Français. Je n'ai jamais osé demander) ont investi les endroits où elle vivait, pour massacrer tous ses semblables. La peur au ventre, elle allait se réfugier au milieu des champs pendant le passage des tueurs. Heureusement, elle y a survécu (sinon, je ne serais pas en train de vous parler), mais ce n'est pas le cas de milliers de personnes : la répression Ahidjo envers tous ses opposants était sanglante, dans tous les recoins du pays. Les Bassa et les Bamiléké ont été plus durement touchés, parce que membres principaux de l'UPC (le parti de Ruben Um Nyobe). Et dans le sillage de la désunion tribale que les Français avaient créée, des discours surréalistes ont émergé pour justifier un tel traitement.

Jean Lamberton, alors en poste à l'Ouest [région d'origine des Bamiléké, ndlr], avait écrit : « Le Cameroun s'engage sur les chemins de l'indépendance avec dans sa chaussure un caillou bien gênant. Ce caillou, c'est la présence d'une minorité ethnique, les Bamiléké, en proie à des convulsions dont ni l'origine ni les causes ne sont claires pour personne ».
[1], P.120

Charles de Gaulle dépêche alors cinq bataillons d'infanterie, commandés par le général Max Briand, vétéran des guerres d'Indochine et d'Algérie, surnommé « le Viking », auxquels se rajoutent un escadron de blindés, ainsi qu'un escadron d'hélicoptères et de chasseurs bombardiers T26.

« Les soldats français raflaient des Bamilékés en ville, puis les relâchaient en pleine campagne, en leur disant d'aller rejoindre leurs frères au maquis. Quelques jours plus tard, évidemment, ils les retrouvaient errants : cela faisaient des maquisards qu'ils capturaient sans mal ou tuaient sur place. »

« Le soir, les convois des militaires reviennent remplis des têtes qui sont déversées et exposées au carrefour qui deviendra le carrefour des maquisards, jusqu'à mon départ du Cameroun, en 1976, et même peut-être jusqu'à aujourd'hui. C'est au coeur de Bafoussam, à une trentaine de mètres de la maison de mes parents que tout cela est exposé. C'est aussi là que les exécutions ont lieu. »

Source : Rebellyon, « 2 mars 1960 : massacres au Cameroun, génocide perpétré en pays bamiléké par une campagne militaire française »

Pays Bamiléké

Le génocide Bamiléké est une source de friction avec les Français, qui ne l'ont toujours pas officiellement reconnu comme tel. Et vu la situation tribale dans mon pays depuis, aucune chance que le gouvernement s'en mêle. Mais je dois insister sur le fait que toutes les tribus ont été touchées par les massacres perpétrées ou permises par Ahidjo. Dont celles du Nord, sa propre région !

De nombreux villages sont, purement et simplement, rayés de la carte du Nord Cameroun, par ces hommes d'un autre temps. Ils brûlent, pendent, égorgent les récalcitrants, exactement comme l'ont fait les colons, en prenant possession de notre pays. Les Nordistes ont été, ainsi, les toutes premières victimes d'Ahmadou Ahidjo.
[2] P.36

4- Le régime d'Ahidjo était extrêmement répressif

Plusieurs se plaignent de l'actuel climat de répression : journalistes, opposants politiques citoyens. La violence policière est légion. Et pourtant, plusieurs des mêmes personnes adoubent Ahmadou Ahidjo.

Je dirais que c'est un biais de récence doublé d'une amnésie collective. M. Fabien, mon répétiteur de français en 2002–2005, m'expliquait comment les individus coupables de vol étaient exécutés sur la place publique sous l'ancien président. Et il le disait en vantant ces méthodes (contexte de son discours : les villes camerounaises étaient touchées par le grand banditisme, où des braqueurs pénétraient dans les maisons de familles, leur volaient ce qu'ils avaient et les torturaient ou mutilaient avant de partir). Des passages du livre de Pigeaud sont encore plus révélateurs.

Fin 1970, Ernest Ouandié, dernier chef de l'UPC, a été capturé dans le maquis de l'ouest. Après une parodie de procès auquel ses avocats français, Me Jacques de Felice et Jacques Vergès, n'ont pas eu l'autorisation de se rendre, il a été fusillé en janvier 1971 sur la place publique de sa ville natale, Bafoussam. Les habitants de la ville, y compris les écoliers, ont eu l'obligation d'assister à son exécution. Sa mort a marqué la fin officielle de la guerre contre l'UPC. Elle n'a cependant pas mis un terme au climat de terreur, qui avait largement dépassé le cadre de la lutte contre l'UPC.
[1], P.19–20

Toutes ces mesures, et son engagement au changement ont valu à Biya une très grande popularité à ses débuts. « Pour la première fois depuis l'indépendance, une mobilisation se déclenchait spontanément en faveur du pouvoir en place », rapporte Luc Sindjoun. On parlait alors de « biyamania ». Biya « avait le soutien d'un peuple débarrassé de son tyran et qui manifestait son enthousiasme dans les rues. Il avait le soutien des milieux d'affaires (...). Il avait le soutien de l'armée », résumait en 1987 Siméon Kuissu, de l'UPC en exil. Même cette dernière, au début méfiante, s'est finalement montrée aussi enthousiaste: en janvier 1983, ses responsables ont écrit au président pour saluer sa volonté d'ouverture et lui proposer d'élaborer avec lui « une politique de changement dans la stabilité ». En visite officielle à Paris en février 1983, Biya a déclaré de son côté, depuis le perron de l'Élysée : « L'UPC en tant que telle n'a aucune existence légale au Cameroun. Mais je sais qu'il y a des Camerounais qui se réclament de cette appellation, dont certains se trouvent en France. Mais je dis que s'ils veulent rentrer au Cameroun, ils peuvent le faire. »
[1], P.31–32

Vous pouvez donc constater à quel point la tyrannie d'Ahidjo a été mal perçue par les Camerounais, des riches aux pauvres, des civils à l'armée. La répression qui s'opère aujourd'hui sous Biya n'est en rien comparable à ce que mes ascendants ont subi. Aujourd'hui, il y a au moins un semblant de liberté de presse. Aujourd'hui, les opposants disposent de chaînes de télévision dédiées. Aujourd'hui, les (courtes pour la plupart) peines de prison ont remplacé les exécutions de prisonniers politiques sur la voie publique.

5- Le bilan économique d'Ahidjo était médiocre

Gardons le meilleur pour la fin. C'est généralement l'argument-massue des pro-Ahidjo : sous son règne, l'économie camerounaise était florissante. Alors, oui, formulé comme ça, c'est vrai. Mais dans la réalité, cette économie florissante s'est faite malgré la gestion du premier président.

La période qui est le plus retenue, c'est les années 70, quand apparemment le Cameroun prêtait de l'argent à la Chine (je n'ai jamais pu vérifier ces allégations). Sauf que cela coïncide à deux chocs pétroliers, consécutifs à la guerre de Yom Kippour (1973, ce qui a déclenché l'embargo de l'OPEP) et à la révolution iranienne (1979). En conséquence, le Cameroun a allègrement profité de la manne pétrolière. Quant au président Biya, il est arrivé au pouvoir le 6 Novembre 1982, soit au milieu du contrechoc pétrolier.

Ainsi, la tradition des détournements de fonds, initiée par le régime Ahidjo, n'est devenue problématique que parce que les recettes pétrolières servant à les compenser n'existaient plus. Ce que j'ai dit là va sans doute étonner les Camerounais qui ont vu son régime punir sévèrement ceux qui détournaient les fonds publics. Sauf que c'était une punition à géométrie variable.

Pour ce qui est de la probité, autant Ahmadou Ahidjo était intransigeant lorsqu'un « Sudiste », quel qu'il fut, était accusé de malversations financières, autant, en revanche, il était totalement indifférent lorsque la personne concernée était « Nordiste ». C'est de cette manière que l'on s'explique le fait que pratiquement nul « Nordiste » n'avait connu la prison du temps d'Ahmadou Ahidjo, pour détournement de fonds publics.
[2], P.47

Vous voulez la réalité économique de l'ancien régime ? Elle est exprimée de manière éloquente par Meyomesse.

Ahmadou Ahidjo ne se rend pas compte du fait qu'il n'y a pas meilleur aveu d'échec de sa politique que celui-là ; au bout de 22 années de celle-ci, il existe encore des régions au taux de scolarisation avoisinant les 4% !!!; il existe encore des régions « insuffisamment » scolarisées; pourquoi, dans ces conditions, persister à poursuivre une politique qui a si lamentablement échoué ?
[2], P.51–52

La ligne de chemin de fer qui était destinée à désenclaver le pays, curieusement, n'a, tout au long de sa construction, fait que s'éloigner des villes qu'elle traversait. C'est ainsi que la gare de Nanga Eboko est située à cinq (5) kilomètres de la ville, tandis que celle de Bertoua est située à … 90 kilomètres de la ville, c'est-à-dire à Belabo. Bertoua aurait eu sa gare dans le centre-ville, qu'il en aurait énormément bénéficié. Mais, tel n'a mal-heureusement pas été le cas. Ce chemin de fer a ainsi donné l'impression de n'être destiné, avant tout, qu'au Nord du pays.

Alors que la vile d'Ibadan, au Nigeria, était dotée d'une télévision en 1959, Brazzaville, Abidjan et Libreville en 1963, Dakar en 1965, Bamako, en 1971, etc, le Cameroun en était privé sous le prétexte qu'il n'aurait pas été « équilibré» que Yaoundé en dis-posât sans qu'il en soit de même, simultanément, pour Garoua. Ahmadou Ahidjo quittera ainsi le pou-voir sans laisser le Cameroun avec une télévision, au nom du « développement harmonieux » de la nation qui aurait été perturbé s'il avait procédé comme tous ses homologues africains, à savoir, commencer par une ville, et étendre, progressivement, le réseau.
[2] P.47

Conclusion

L'exposé aurait pu être beaucoup plus long. Mais vu que le putsch orchestré par Ahidjo n'est défendu par pratiquement personne, ça suffira. Je tiens quand même à préciser que ses conséquences sur le régime actuel ont été cataclysmiques. Plus haut, j'avais mentionné comment Paul Biya incarnait le renouveau, l'espoir.

À la suite de l’affaire du complot de 1983, Biya s’est employé à casser les soutiens du Nord musulman d’Ahidjo au sein de l’armée et de l’élite politique. Il a limogé le Premier ministre foulbé Bello Maigari, pour le remplacer par le Kirdi Luc Ayang. Il a aussi divisé le Nord en trois provinces (Adamaoua, Nord et Extrême-Nord), ce qui a permis aux Kirdi, majoritaires dans l’Extrême-Nord, de retrouver de la voix et de contester la domination foulbé.

Après la tentative de coup d’État de 1984, les cadres beti se sont définitivement imposés à Biya, prétextant la nécessité pour lui de s’entourer de gens sûrs pour éviter tout nouveau risque de crise. Leur stratégie d’entrisme leur a permis de devenir majoritaires, au mépris de la politique officielle des quotas toujours en vigueur au sein de l’administration, dans les grandes écoles, dans la diplomatie, au cabinet civil de la présidence, au sein du RDPC, etc.
[1] P.124

C'est ainsi que le coup d'État fomenté par Ahidjo et ses fidèles a provoqué le repli identitaire de celui qui était destiné à détruire cette politique tribale. Il aura été une calamité pour nous jusqu'au bout…

Selon Enoh Meyomesse, Ahidjo n'était donc que le toutou de la France, et a été limogé (d'où le titre de son livre) par Mitterand, car ce dernier changeait le cap de la Realpolitik (et donc ne supportait plus les dictateurs sanguinaires d'Afrique francophone) ([3], P.70–81). Bon, c'est l'interprétation de l'essayiste. Mais ce qui est certain, c'est qu'au vu de cet exposé, l'horreur absolue qu'a été le régime d'Ahmadou Ahidjo ne devrait plus faire débat.

Questions similaires

Qui fut le plus grand et le plus petit chef d’État de l’histoire ?
Quel est l'acte le plus étrange réalisé par un leader mondial ?

Si vous pouviez annexer à votre pays un état ou une province d'un autre pays, lequel choisiriez-vous ? Pourquoi ?

Qui est le leader le plus étrange de ces cinquante dernières années ?
Qui est le dirigeant le moins apprécié des 300 dernières années ?
Parmi les pays du monde, quels sont ceux dont l'histoire est la plus troublante ?
Existe-t-il des photos historiques inexplicables ?
Que pensez-vous du Liban ?

D'un point de vue historique, quel est, selon vous, le pays qui a le mieux réussi en Europe?

Qui est le leader le plus détesté au monde ?

Can You Tell a Story of How a Single Decision of a Player Ruined His Entire Career?

AFRICA Posted by Frank Abah Economist, Consultant & Digital Entrepreneur Oct 13

Cameroon simply meant everything for them

17 years ago, Cameroon failed to qualify for the world cup after being held at the fortress Amadou Ahidjo stadium by Egypt in a 1 all tie

The indomitable lions simply needed a win to qualify as a draw wouldn't suffice giving Ivory Coast was already winning in Abidjan

Cameroonians were confident and why wouldn't they. They haven't lost a match at that stadium in more than a generation

At the final minutes of the game, the referee awarded a penalty to Cameroon

Informed striker Samuel Eto'o looked at the 70,000 man crowd at the stadium and think of the other 22 million watching at home and standing at an attention to honor the penalty, he knew his entire career and image back home hangs on that penalty kick and he turned it down

Song, the corageous Defender and captain didn't have the courage for it and Geremi Njitap our midfield maestro was on suspension, watching from the stands

As everyone walked back and the crowd stood in historic silence, Pierre Wome Nlend with goose bumps mastered the ancestral courage and walked up to the task, someone had to do it , he took a deep breath, looked at the crowd and stationed the ball at the penalty spot

At the sound of the whistle, he took a walk back, looked up at the crowd again and then moved to the ball and kicked

He beat the Egyptian goalkeeper but the ball failed to beat the woodwork

It was the last kick of the game and Cameroon has just failed to qualify for the world cup. Celebration in Abidjan and anger and rage in Yaounde

The remaining players broke down in tears as if their lives depended on the goal

The population set the house of Wome Nlend ablaze and his international career all but came to an end.

Credit: TeboPost

Is corruption common in your country? How does corruption affect you personally?

Dmitri Ken Location: Douala, Cameroon Thu.

1- How does corruption affect you personally?

On October 12, 2018, I returned from the Vita Douala course race track. As I live not far from there (Bonamoussadi district), I decide to walk. While I'm venting my frustration over the side stitch that cut short my performance, a biker asks me, “Where are we going? I ignore him and continue to write as I walk. And suddenly, the phone disappears from my hands. I look in front of me: the aforementioned biker has snatched it from me, and he tumbles at full speed, slaloming between the vehicles in front of him...

Three days later, I am at a police station to see an inspector, on the recommendation of a friend (also a policeman). After making my statement, giving the IMEI of the phone, etc., the agent asks me for around 10,000 francs. Surprised, I give him everything I have - a fifth of the sum. In the end, I had to walk back, walking from the Bonanjo district to the far end of the Bonapriso district (for those who don't know, it's about 4 kilometers). On the way, I call my friend, upset that he didn't warn me. He too is confused. And for a reason:

This service is free.

It's not just that, but the free service is marked on posters plastered throughout the police station.

We are currently 4 years later. My phone has never been found... Here, I was a victim of corruption: forces supposed to represent order who demand bribes to do their job, and for lack of sufficient "motivation", do not raise not even a finger!

- My conversation yesterday with a friend who had her phone attacked and stolen last Sunday. “Moneyn't” is an expression that means “No money”.

2- Is corruption frequent in your country?

Good. It's time to get down to business.

Directeur de Publication :
Valentin Siméon Zinga
Récépissé de déclaration n° 00000881 RDDJ/J06/SASC/ du 24 août 2020
BP : 35046 Yaoundé
Tél.: +237 242 00 37 07
Mail: lignes.horizon.mag@gmail.com

N°024 - Octobre2022
1000 Fcfa

Lignes d'horizon
Savoir c'est bien, comprendre c'est encore mieux!

Évolution du classement des cinq pays les plus corrompus en 1998, selon l'Indice de perception de la corruption de Transparency International.

Politique et corruption sous le Renouveau

Le double titre de champion du monde (1998 et 1999) au classement de Tansparency International la consacrait. L'affaire Glencore en est la métastase la plus récente. La corruption apparait comme un marqueur indélébile du règne de Paul Biya. Avec le Pr Lucien Ayissi, Me Charles Nguini, Me Claude Assira et Jean Maurice Noah. Et les regards de Maurice Kamto et Paul Biya. Documents: l'appel des évêques du Cameroun et la lettre des Osc aux députés.

Pr Lucien Ayissi | Me Charles Nguini | Me Claude Assira | Jean Maurice Noah | Maurice Kamto | Paul Biya

- Cameroon was twice world champion of corruption in 1998 and 1999, rising to first place each time. Since 2012, the country has been twirling between 25th and 27th place (source).

The system is rotten to the core... Corruption tends to decrease due to the digitization of many procedures (including the payment of taxes and the customs clearance of goods). But we are still in an immeasurable quagmire. You already have the illustration of the policemen above.

Bankers are also sharks. They are developing strategies to divert funds from their clients, who must be extra vigilant. The preferred target of their larceny is small traders who make dozens of transactions a day, and then refuse to check them because such a provided bank statement is very expensive. Well, my friend was convinced by one of them to save her money in one of her accounts. In the end, the guy stole the entire amount from her, and her bank did nothing despite the complaints. This money was to be used for his son's school fees...

But it doesn't stop there. High finance is plagued by it. Those who are responsible for issuing loans, even approvals, intentionally drag out files until they get their percentage! I even know an individual who is waiting for funding that will change his life. He didn't wait 1 or 2 days, 1 or 2 weeks, 1 or 2 months. But 8... years . Still nothing, even though he had time to go bankrupt (due to a lack of cash), to be unfairly imprisoned (because he was suspected of wanting to finance terrorism) and even to lose his wife to cancer (for lack of ways to treat it). Those at the top don't care, and all demand their percentage...

- Edgard Alain Mebe Ngo'o, one of the record holders of embezzlement. At the time of his arrest, his illegitimately acquired assets included 32 vehicles (including a number of luxury vehicles), 53 buildings (including 1 in France), 45 bank accounts (including 24 in France) and 3 safes. Total damage: 25.5 billion FCFA (38.9 million €) (Source). Almost a thousandth of the annual GDP at the time...

Governments are obviously far from being outdone. In fact, since the time of the first president (1960s), embezzlement by civil servants has been legion and the political powers even encourage people to help themselves to the "manger" (an expression to designate taxpayers' money) (Source: Pigeaud, F. (2011) In Cameroon by Paul Biya). In the end, the so-called Épervier operation, intended to flush out the corrupt in power, systematically leads to prison for the majority of former ministers/heads of public companies (Marafa Hamidou Yaya, Yves Michel Fotso, Basile Atangana Kouna, etc.)

Currently, following an audit of the expenses allocated to the Ministry of Finance, it has been discovered that some agents accumulate 600 days of mission per... year, all paid, of course.

Cameroon-lines 65 and 94: 1790 agents indexed

Cameroon, the information is revealed by a correspondence from the Minister of Finance, Louis Paul Motazé, signed on September 30, 2022.

https://www.journalducameroun.com/cameroun-lignes-65-et-94-1790-agents-indexes/

I could go on dozens of lines, with the judges who are largely multi-millionaires or the high-ranking army officers who have recruits killed to collect bribes from their replacements. I could cite the cheating paid to enter FAC medicine. I could come back to the guy who killed his wife (my friend's cousin) and who has never been worried until today because he bribed the investigators.

Dimitri Ken's response to Can you tell us about a femicide that happened in 2020?

But you already see. And no, don't pity the people. Today, a large part of Cameroonians aspire to become ministers too, for the sole purpose of being able to access the manger. In fact, almost all critics of the regime turn into apostles of power once they are in a position to take advantage of this financial windfall. The most perverse do not hesitate to disguise themselves as virulent opponents of the regime, so that the latter recruits them to silence them (Pigeaud, 2011). We can mention Issa Tchiroma and Jean De Dieu Momo. Moreover, during my finance course in 2019, I found that this mentality is common to too many people. To the point where my comrade said:

If you become a minister and you don't steal money, then you lack ambition.
We are talking about people who will be responsible for the cash flow of future companies...

As a friend so aptly put it, Cameroonians only get the government they deserve.

Similar questions

What is the most corrupt country in the world?

Where does France rank among corrupt countries?

Does corruption have at least one advantage?

What is bribery? Can you give some examples of corruption in communist countries?

Is Africa poor because of colonization? If colonization had never taken place, what would Africa look like?

What are the most egregious specific examples of corruption in your country?

COUNTRY FACT FILE

Location

B/n west and central Africa Republic, just north of the equator.

Official title of the state

The Republic of Cameroon (English)

Republique du Cameroun (French)

Flag description

Three equal vertical bands of green (hoist side), red, and yellow, with a yellow five-pointed star centered in the red band: the vertical tricolor recalls the flag of France: red symbolizes unity, yellow the sun, happiness, and the savannahs in the north, and green hope and the forests in the south: the star is referred to as the "star of unity". Note: uses the popular Pan-African colors of Ethiopia.

Neighbours

Nigeria on N.W Chad, Central Africa Republic on E. Congo, Gabon, Equatorial Guinea on S. Land boundaries: total 4,591 km. Border countries: Central African Republic, 797 km, Chad 1094 km, Congo 523 km, Equatorial Guinea 189 km, Gabone 298 km, Nigeria 1690 km.

Founder of The Nation
Ahmadou Ahijo

Local division

10 regions Government type

Republic - semi-presidential

Legislation chamber

Unicameral National Assembly

Form of State

A Unitary Republic

Chief of State is the President

Head of Government is the Prime Minister
President is elected every seven years through popular referendum (eligible for a second term). Prime minister is appointed by the President. A unitary multi-party republic with one legislative house. The National Assembly, 180 seats, members elected by direct popular vote to serve for five-year terms.

Executive branch

President, Prime Minister, Cabinet: appointed by the president from proposals submitted by the prime minister Separated by chief of State and head of Government. President elected by popular vote to serve for seven-year terms without presidential term limits. Head of Government is to be appointed by the president.

Former Rulers

1960 - 1982 Ahmadou Babatour Ahidjo

1982 – Present Paul Biya

Judicial chamber

High Court of Justice & The Supreme Court.

Capital city

Yaounde Altitude 770 mtrs/2525 ft

Geographic coordinates - 3.52N , 11.31E. The capital of Cameroon situated east of the coastal plain to the south of of the Sanaga River. Founded by German traders in 1888, It was named after "the Ewondo tribe", whose language Beti dialect also called Ewondo, who are settled first at present day Yaunde in 1887 it was made capital of then French Cameroun in 1921 and capital of the independent Republic of Cameroon in 1960. The city is an agricultural trading centre in Sugar, Coffee, and Cacao.

Names of main towns

Douala, Garoua, Maraua, Badoussam

Date of Independence

1st January 1960

Religions (Major)

Christianity 47%, Indigenous beliefs 30%, Muslim 22%.

Main spoken languages

English (official), French (official). About 24 major African ethnic-languages spoken.

Currency unit

African Franc (CFA)=100 Centimes

Area in Km2

475,442.00

Country area comparison in Africa

24 out of 55 states

Demographic terms:

Average annual population growth rate 2.157 %

Birth rate 33.58 births per 1,000 population

Death rate 12.01 deaths per 1,000 population

Average life expectancy: 54.04 years

Male 53.21 years: Female 54.9 years

Illiteracy rate (%)

Male: 16, Female: 32

Average per capita income

USD 2, 300

Population density

41.5/km2

Urban population (%)

52

Contributor groups

Farming, Fisherry: 20, Industry: 31, Social service:

49 Main Export Items

Crude-oil and petroleum products, Timber, Cocoa, Aluminium, Coffee, Cotton.

Petroleum: is a key export for Cameroon. To date, oil production has had a limited impact on the country's environment. In 2003 a $3.7-billion pipeline running through Cameroon from oil-fields in Chad was completed. Its construction resulted in forest clearing and raised environmental concerns.

Economy is based on Agriculture, Petrol & Tourism.

Climate

There is a large variation from the Sahel region with 7 to 8 months of dry season to the equatorial South with a similar period of rain.

Extremes:

Lowest point: The Atlantic coast 0 mtr.

Highest point: Fako (Mt. Cameroon) 1095 meters.

Weather of the Capital city (Yaunde) average annual temperature 24.1°c.

Altitude 770 mtrs/2525 ft

Hottest Month January-March 19-29oc

Coldest Month August 18-27oc

Driest Month January -February

Wettest Month October 295mm Rf.

Measures

Metric System

Time zone

2 hours ahead of GMT/UTC.

Public holidays

January 1st (independence), February 11, May 1, 20, October 1, December 10.

Ethnic groups

Some 200 tribes i.e. Equatorial Bantus, Kirdi, Fulani, Northwestern Bantus.

Largest are Fang 19.6%, Bamileke and Bamum 18.5%, Duala, Luanda and Basa 14.7%, Fulani 9.6%, Tikar 7.4%, Mandara 5.7%, Maka 4.9%, Chamba 2.4%, Mbum 1.3%, Hausa 1.2%, others 14.7%

Topographic & Environmental concern

A low coastal plain with dense tropical forests is in S. plateaus in centre lead to forested mountains in W. including Mt. Cameroon, 13,000 ft dry savannah grasslands in the N. lead to marshes around lake Chad. Environment: waterborne diseases are prevalent: deforestation: overgrazing: desertification: poaching bush animals for dietary: overfishing.

Economy Overview

Industry

Petrol-production & refinery , aluminum processing, palm products, food processing, electronics, textiles, lumbering, ship repairs.

Chief crops

Cocoa, coffee, peanuts, tea, banana, cotton, tobacco, rubber trees, oil seeds, grains, root-starches, timber-in log, livestock.

Natural resources

Crude oil reserves, Bauxite, Iron ore, Timber, Hydro-power. Cameroon has the second-largest hydroelectric power potential in Africa after the Congo. There is increasing concern among environmental groups that the country will start to build dams to meet growing energy needs —the country is not energy self-sufficient as of 2006. One currently planned project is the Loom river dam. In 1986 Cameroon made news when poisonous gases escaped from Lake Nyos, killing nearly 2,000 people.

Land in use (%)

Arable land: 15

Grassland: 18

Forest woods: 53

Other: 14

Marine:

Coastline: 402 km.

Commercial Sea ports:-

Douala & Limbe main ports, Kribe also used.

Development prospect:

Cameroon produces less oil than Gabon and Equatorial Guinea, so its economy is not as dependent on oil and gas as a source of revenue. Oil production peaked in about 1986 at 185,000 barrels per day (bpd) and now accounts for just 65,000 bpd. Some companies are still investing in the pursuit of new finds, while others are involved in new gas projects. New production in 2012 will turn the country's sagging production levels around. At a meeting in March, the Nigerian and Cameroonian governments agreed to pursue the joint development of oil fields that cross the boundary of the Bakassi Peninsula, which Nigeria handed over to Cameroon in 2008. In July, Yan Chang Logone Development Holding Company announced the discovery of a hydrocarbons deposit in the Extrême Nord Province at its Zina IX well. The find will lead to more exploration there. China's Sinopec purchased Royal Dutch Shell's shares in oil company Pecten in order to get access to its 12 oil exploration licenses in Cameroon. London listed Bowleven has continued its exploration and increased its reserve estimates on the Sapele field after the 2011 exploration program produced better-than-expected results.

France's GDF-Suez is interested in Cameroon's gas fields. It signed a framework deal with the Société Nationale des Hydrocarbures in July so that negotiations could begin with companies to secure supplies for a proposed liquefied natural gas plant. The plant could cost upwards of $5bn and depends on further lengthy negotiations with government and companies. The UK's Victoria Oil and Gas was due to commence its first sales of gas to local consumers from the 212bn ft 3 of reserves at the Logbaba field before the end of 2011. Although farmers' groups protested about the poor state of roads and lack of state support, the country is attracting more interest from international companies. In July, US-based Herakles farms launched a $350m program to develop palm oil plantations on 60,000ha in southwest Cameroon, although no date has been set for production to begin. Singapore's Siva Group followed through with plans for a $1.8bn palm oil project on 200,000ha in late August. Malaysia's Sime Darby was in discussions with the government in late 2011 on its proposed $2.5bn investment in palm plantations and processing capacity. Local environmental groups have begun campaigning against the projects and arguing that they will threaten livelihoods and harm animal species in the forests that they will, in part, replace. The cocoa board announced in August that cocoa farmers had boosted production by 18 percent in the 2010-2011 season, resulting in a harvest of more than 230,000tn. Farmers in the southwest are struggling to cope with crop illnesses that destroyed thousands of trees in 2011. In late October, the government started work on a sustainable logging project that will cover 25,000ha with up to 10m trees.

CAPE VERDES

National Flag and Emblem

Locator Map

TEXT HIGHLIGHTS: Diaries updates, key events, brief analysis and relating news articles in timeline

Overview

Cape Verde was colonized by the Portuguese started from 1456. The Portuguese used Cape Verdeans as administrators throughout their African empire, and as labor on their shipping lines.

During the 19th century Cape Verdeans used to crew American whalers in the Atlantic. Since this time, Cape Verdeans have had a strong tradition of emigrating to find work. Major droughts and famines have historically also propelled mass migrations from the islands. The country became independent in 1975, following the collapse of the Portuguese empire after the Carnation Revolution in Lisbon of 1974. The aspiration of the leader of the independence struggle, Amilcar Cabral, for an eventual political union between Cape Verde and Guinea Bissau was never to come to fruition however, and was abandoned in 1981 following the overthrow in Guinea Bissau of President Luis Cabral, also a Cape Verdean. Until 1981, the country was ruled by Aristide Pereira and by the party which brought independence, the PAIGC (Partido Africano da Independencia da Guine e Cabo Verde), which became the PAICV (the African Party for the Independence of Cape Verde) in 1981. Pereira's rule was stable and benevolent, but did not allow for political pluralism. In 1990, under domestic and international pressure, he opened up the political system to multi-partyism.

Declared Portuguese overseas territory in 1951. The national liberation front, known as the "African Party for the Independence of Guinea & Cape Verdes (PAIGC)" began an armed struggle against the Portuguese colonialism in 1961

Following the Portugal revolution of April, 1974, the Cape Verdeans elected a legislation on the 30th of June, 1975 which received instruments of independence from Portugal on the 5th July 1975

Headship since independence: Head of State

Mr. Aristides Pereira, then deputy head of the PAIGC Front under Mr. Amilcar Lopes Cabral of Guinea Bissau, to become founder/president, of Cape Verdes (Cap-Vert) serving from 1975 - 1991.

An eventual political union was planned with Guinea-Bissau, however, on the 14th of November, 1980, after change of government in Guinea Bissau, the Cape Verdeans broke links with Guinea-Bissau, relations became strained, an official reason quoted as "Change of government in Guinea-Bissau" then, abandoned its goal for unification.

An Island Republic of West Africa.

Cape Verde located in the mid-Atlantic ocean, some 300 miles /about 450 km/ off the west coast of Africa. A group of 10 volcanic islands 8 islets, divided into Barlavento (windward) and Sotavento (leeward) groups . Colonized by the Portuguese started from 1456 until it became an overseas territory of Portugal in 1951. The national liberation front, known as the "African Party for the Independence of Guinea & Cape Verdes (PAIGC)" began an armed struggle against the Portuguese colonialism in 1961, following the Portugal revolution of April, 1974, the Cape Verdeans elected a legislation on the 30th of June, 1975 which received instruments of independence from Portugal on the 5th July 1975, as Mr. Aristides Pereira, then deputy head of PAIGC Front under Mr. Amilcar Lopes Cabral of Guinea Bissau, to become founder /president, of Cape Verdes (Cap-Vert) serving from 1975 - 1991. An eventual political union was planned with Guinea-Bissau, however, on the 14th of November, 1980, after change of government in Guinea Bissau, the Cape Verdeans broke links with Guinea-Bissau, relations became strained, an official reason is quoted "Change of government in Guinea-Bissau" then, abandoned its goal for unification.

Cape Verde became independent in 1975, a year after its sister colony, Guinea-Bissau, won freedom from Portugal. The two countries planned to unite, but the plan was ditched after a coup in Guinea-Bissau in 1980 strained relations. The former Portuguese colony comprises 10 islands and five islets, all but three of which are mountainous. In 1991 Cape Verde held its first free presidential elections, which were won by Antonio Mascarenhas Monteiro, who replaced the islands' first president, Aristides Pereira. The Cape Verde’s expatriate population is greater than it's domestic one, most Cape Verdeans have both African and Portuguese antecedents. The Cape Verde constitution amended three times in 1992, 1995 and 1999. Recently Cape Verde opposition candidate Mr. Jorge Carlos Fonseca has won Cape Verde's presidential elections, beating the ruling-party rival, Mr. Manuel Inocencio Sousa. Mr. Jorge Carlos Fonseca secured 55% of the vote in the run-off elections on the 21st August 2011, compared with Mr. Manuel Sousa's 45%. The two have contested the poll after president Pedro Verona Rodrigues Pires stepped-down at the end of his two terms.

President:- Jorge Carlos Fonseca won presidential elections with a decisive second-round victory in August 2011, beating the ruling party candidate. Mr Fonseca, the candidate for the main opposition Movement for Democracy (MFD) needs to govern with a prime minister from the PAICV ruling party after they won a parliamentary election earlier in the year. Mr Fonseca, a former foreign minister, beat his socialist rival Manuel Inocencio Sousa in a battle between the candidates of the two parties that have dominated the political scene for the past two decades. The campaign hinged on the need to modernize the economy of the former Portuguese colony and keep the tourism boom alive while dealing with unemployment rates of up to 18%. Mr Fonseca replaced Pedro Pires, who served a maximum two terms. The Cape Verdes relatively enjoys stable democratic system and is one of the most stable countries in Africa, analysts say. Poor in natural resources, prone to drought and with little arable land, the Cape Verde islands have won a reputation for achieving political and economic stability.

Accession to power of president Pedro Verona Rodrigues Pires -12th February, 2001 by election.

Tentative election calendar - Parliamentary & Presidential, August.

Cape Verdes – Timeline Diaries updates, and related key notes:

1456 - First Europeans arrive in Cape Verde

1495 - Cape Verde becomes a Portuguese Crown Colony.

1956 - Amilcar Cabral, nicknamed as Abel Jassi, a native of Cape Verdean, co-founds the African Party for Independence of Guinea and Cape Verde (PAIGC) in Guinea-Bissau.

1960 - PAIGC-led liberation war begins against Portuguese rule in Guinea-Bissau, with many Cape Verdeans joining in.

1975 - Cape Verde becomes independent and adopts constitution envisaging unity with Guinea-Bissau.

1980 - Cape Verde ditches plans for unity with Guinea-Bissau following coup in latter.

1981 - African Party for the Independence of Cape Verde (PAICV) replaces the PAIGC and becomes the country's sole party.

1991 - Antonio Mascarenhas Gomez Monteiro becomes president following Cape Verde's first free election.

1992 - A new constitution brings in a multi-party system.

1996 - Mascarenhas Gomez Monteiro is re-elected and his party, the Movement for Democracy, wins a majority of seats in parliamentary elections.

January 2001 - Government accepts defeat in parliamentary elections, paving the way for the return to power of the former ruling African Party for the Independence of Cape Verde, the PAICV.

March 2001 - Pedro Pires, from the Party for the Independence of Cape Verde, is elected president after beating his rival, the Movement for Democracy's Carlos Veiga, by 17 votes.

January-February 2006 - Governing PAICV wins parliamentary elections and incumbent leader, Pedro Pires, is victorious in closely-contested presidential polls.

June 2006 - Some 7,000 Nato troops take part in war games on Sao Vicente island. This is the organization’s first major deployment in Africa.

December 2007 - World Trade Organization (WTO) council approves Cape Verde's accession to the organization.

August 2009 - US Secretary of State Hillary Clinton ends seven-nation tour of Africa in Cape Verde.

November 2009 - National emergency declared following outbreak of dengue fever.

July 2010 - A Syrian prisoner who had been detained at Guantanamo Bay by the US is transferred to Cape Verde.

October 2010 - UN office on drugs and crime, UNODC, launches a project for cooperation between Brazil and seven West African countries - including Cape Verde - to tackle drug trafficking.

February 2011- Governing PAICV party wins parliamentary elections.

August 2011 - Jorge Carlos Fonseca becomes president.

December 2011 - Two days of national mourning are declared on death of singer Cesaria Evora, considered to be one of the greatest exponents of Morna, a form of blues regarded as Cape Verde's national music. Cesaria Evora is a famous Cape Verdean female singer considered a national hero, she dies recently at the age of 70. Cesaria Evora was forced to retire earlier this year due to ill-health, she began her career singing in the bars of Mindelo in the west African island nation. Nicknamed the "Barefoot diva", Cesaria Evora was considered one of the world's greatest exponents of Morna, a form of blues considered the national music of Cape Verde islands. The music is a testament to the country's history, including the slave trade and it's physical remoteness in the Atlantic ocean islands, hundreds of kilometers off-Africa's west coast. Two days of national mourning had been declared in the small island nation with it's president Jorge Carlos Fonseca calling her "one of the major cultural references of Cape Verde".

FORMER PORTUGUESE OVERSEAS TERRITORIES
Are there many immigrants in Brazil coming from Lusophone African countries like Mozambique, Angola, Guinea Bissau, Cape Verde?

Here is the data— I think it is missing folks from Haiti, who are going to Brazil
Christine Nogueira Lives in Boston, MA US 3y

Approaching the third decade of the 21st century, Brazil continues to be a center of global migration. In 2017, nearly 736,000 registered immigrants lived in Brazil, while many hundreds of thousands more were in the country without formal documentation. Portuguese are the largest immigrant population, followed far behind by those from Japan, Italy, Paraguay, and Bolivia (see Table 2). In recent years, Koreans, Angolans, Paraguayans, and Nigerians have been entering in growing numbers.

Table 2. Top Immigrant Populations in Brazil, 2017

Country of Origin	Number of Immigrants
Portugal	169,000
Japan	60,000
Italy	46,000
Paraguay	48,000
Bolivia	48,000
Spain	38,000
Argentina	36,000
Uruguay	29,000
China	24,000
United States	22,000

Source: UN DESA, "Trends in International Migrant Stock: The 2017 Revision."

Migration in Brazil: The Making of a Multicultural Society by Christine Nogueira

Related Links

Can the majority of the population of Cape Verde and Guinea-Bissau speak standard Portuguese at a good conversational level?

How different are the Portuguese spoken in Angola, Brazil, Cape Verde, East Timor, Guinea-Bissau, Mozambique, Portugal and São Tomé and Príncipe?

Are there many Portuguese speaking Africans (Angolans, Bissau-Guineans, Cabo Verdianos, São Toméans, or Mozambicans) living in Brazil? What do Brazilians think of them?

Was Angola and Mozambique were not much more than overseas holdings for Portugal? How did this relationship or colonial process differ from that of Portugal's other famous colony, Brazil? (And to other European colonies in Africa of the time)?

Did African slaves in Brazil all come from the African countries who speak Portuguese today (Angola, Mozambique, etc.)?

Will the Angola government send troops to Cabo Delgado in Mozambique insurgency?

Why do Brazilians and Cape Verdeans speak Portuguese as a native language but people from Goa and Macau do not despite a longer Portuguese presence?

How different is Brazilian Portuguese from the Portuguese spoken in Mozambique or Angola?

Why can't Portugal consider people from Angola, Brazil, Cape Verde, and Mozambique as ethnic Portuguese people since they have Portuguese blood?

How and why were 2 islands off the African coast, Cape Verde, Guinea and Brazil unable to stop the Portuguese from invading, conquering, colonising and taking over them too?

What is it like to be an immigrant in Brazil?

Can a speaker of Brazilian Portuguese understand Cape Verde Creole?

Mozambique and Angola were both Portuguese colonies and both embraced communism. Is that just a coincidence, or is there something to that?

Given their common colonial Portuguese background does Brazil have a special relationship with Angola, Mozambique, Guinea-Bissau, Sao Tome and Principe and Timor-Leste?

If Brazil, Portugal, Angola and Mozambique came together again (as in the old days of the United Kingdom of Portugal, Brazil and the Algarves). How influential would this Lusophone Empire be?

Cpe Verde Journalist Herminio Silves Summoned Over Reporting on alleged Police abuses.

New York, January 21, 2022 — Cape Verdean authorities must drop their investigation into journalist Hermínio Silves and should not compel journalists to disclose confidential information about their sources or criminalize the disclosure of information in the public interest, the Committee to Protect Journalists said today.

Since early January, the attorney general's office in Praia, the capital, has issued three summonses to Silves, editor of the privately owned news website Santiago Magazine, over his reporting on alleged police abuses, according to a report by Santiago Magazine; Silves, who spoke to CPJ in a phone interview; and copies of the summonses, which CPJ reviewed.

The three summonses—sent on January 3, 5, and 12—concern alleged violations of Cape Verde's judicial secrecy laws. If convicted of violating judicial secrecy, Silves could face six months to four years in prison under Cape Verde's penal code.

The journalist is ordered to appear at the Praia attorney general's office for questioning on January 26.

"Prosecutors in Cape Verde must stop hounding journalist Hermínio Silves and should abandon their fishing expedition into his confidential sources," said Angela Quintal, CPJ's Africa program coordinator. "Journalists must be able to report on alleged abuses by officials without fear that they will be subject to legal harassment or see their reporting on issues in the public interest be criminalized."

On December 26, Silves published a report in Santiago Magazine on an investigation into the potential involvement of the judicial police and Minister of Internal Administration Paulo Rocha in the alleged murder and torture of a criminal suspect in 2014, when Rocha was deputy director of the judicial police.

On December 30, the attorney general's office published a statement confirming the investigation into the alleged murder, but denied it had summoned Rocha. The statement added, "Santiago Magazine's report alleges it had access to classified documents" and that authorities therefore "ordered a criminal investigation into the alleged crime of violation of judicial secrecy" and sought to identify the source of those documents.

Rocha's adviser Carla Almeida emailed CPJ a statement from the minister denying all the allegations against him, and adding that he would defend "my dignity, my good name and public image" with all legal means available.

The January 3 summons names Silves and Santiago Magazine as witnesses in an investigation into violations of the judicial secrecy law; the January 5 summons overrode the previous one, and names them as defendants; and the January 12 summons, which overrode both previous summons, says the journalist is expected to appear and that "the decision whether they [Silves and the outlet] are witnesses or defendants" would be made on the day of his appearance, according to the summonses and Silves' lawyer, Silvino Fernandes, who spoke to CPJ via phone.

Silves told CPJ that the summonses send "a message to all journalists that some people are off limits." He said he believed the attorney general's office was "retreating" after issuing the second summons, because of an outcry among media workers that he had been labeled as a defendant.

He told CPJ that he planned to attend the questioning with his lawyer, but said, "my sources, they won't get from me."

When CPJ called the Praia attorney general's office, a representative requested that questions be sent to the office's spokesperson, Inelson Costa. Costa replied by referring CPJ to a January 20 statement by the Public Ministry, saying that authorities were investigating a suspected violation of judicial secrecy.

That statements says that, while journalists are not themselves bound by judicial secrecy laws, they can still face other penalties under Article 133 of the criminal procedure code for committing "qualified disobedience" by disclosing confidential judicial information; under the penal code, that could be punished by up to two years in prison or a fine to be set by a judge.

Jeremias Furtado, president of the Cape Verdean Journalists Association, a local trade group, told CPJ via messaging app that he considered the investigation to be an attack on media freedom.

On January 13, Cape Verde President José Neves told reporters that everything possible should be done to protect press freedom. He said journalists should not be guilty of a crime if they access and publish confidential information, and the responsibility should lie with whoever managed that information.

Related Answer
I am Cape Verdean. Why do Americans call me African American?

Medlia Nibbor Answered Feb 28, 2018

Skin color. Nothing else. Once we really look at your face, and hear you talk. We know.
My question to you is. Why are you so mean to Puerto Ricans, Domincans, Blacks,?
And I am Black not African, save that category for Kenyans, Nigeria etc etc...

What do black Africans think about black Americans, and vice versa?

Pumulo Ngoma, lives in Johannesburg, South Africa Updated Oct 31

Shucks.

Well, I wasn't going to respond, but since there's so much ignorance travelling at the speed of light in the comments, I feel obligated to.

Okay, so here we go.

First of all, I am only going to speak to a general opinion of African Americans. I can't speak for every single African, but I'll try to homogenize the opinion of 1.2 Billion into one(!).

1. African American Culture is Largely exported as American Pop Culture

The global domination of American media industries has ensured that some aspects of African American culture is exported as pop culture around the world. Naturally, Africans are affected by this, especially in 'modern cities' and towns, you'll be surprised to discover just how pervasive African American pop culture is. Pop culture delivered through mainstream media channels like TV and the increasing penetration of the internet has made sure we know the latest rap song or fashion trend.

So, many Africans are highly exposed and are consuming African American culture. We've not only adopted certain African American slang, fashion and culture, in countries that have endured White Supremacist rule, like South Africa, we've also adopted similar 'identity complexes' about race.

Exhibit A: AKA and Bonang (South African Celebs)

AKA (South African rapper)

But that wasn't the question, the question is, what do we think of African Americans and really, do we like African Americans?

2. "The Motherland."

In South Africa, specifically, because we've just emerged from the scourge of Apartheid, many non-white South Africans strongly relate to the socio-political struggles of African Americans. Whether it is Black Lives Matter or police brutality, we feel it strongly. This is because despite being the majority, black people are the economic minority in South Africa.

An example of mass protest action.

3. We know more about you, than you know about us

Others, have a different stance. In some of my encounters with African Americans, there has been an overall disinterest in African affairs and an overwhelming stereotyping and ignorance concerning Africa. In short, we know more about you, than you know about us.

4. Mama, I wanna go to New York!

Despite popular opinion, not all Africans (yes, 1.2 billion of us) are interested in the 'American Dream'. Nor are we waiting for African American saviours to come and build their 'original' home. Both are patronizing misconceptions. I would agree that due to mainstream media, some Africans see African Americans as lazy, and see America as ripe for opportunity. Similarly, some African Americans see Africans through the eyes of poverty porn. But some, is not all.

(An example of Poverty Porn in action)

Image A: an image of two clearly 'African' men practising the 'popular' American sport, known as cricket, to blend in when they arrive in America.

5. Cultural Appropriation

In many cases, there seems to be an interest in general African paraphernalia: certain hairstyles, African print, general 'African' culture and so on, extricated from their specific African context. Some would even go as far as to call this a type of borderline cultural ‘appropriation’ others, cultural appreciation - but that’s for another day.

Let’s keep it simple, shall we?

6. African Americans vs Africans

So in short, the general perception is positive: some see African Americans as ‘orphans’, who need to be embraced and taught about various ‘African’ customs. Some see African Americans as having their own unique culture. Others wholeheartedly embrace the exported version of African American culture - from the slang to the rap culture. Still more, some perceive African Americans as ignorant, and possessing an air of cultural superiority to Africans. These views are largely fuelled by mainstream media - we don’t know enough about each other, and we need to start taking responsibility for our learning. It’s absolutely in our best interest to unite. This division doesn’t serve us.

What do black Africans think about black Americans, and vice versa?

Daniel Adejumo, Quantitative Analyst Answered Jun 29, 2020

The richest black man in the world is from Nigeria, Africa. The richest black woman in the world is from Nigeria, Africa. The owner of one of the largest airports in the United Kingdom is a yoruba man from Nigeria. All these people made their money in Nigeria, Africa. Am a 23year old yoruba man and i make a living as a Farmer, Stock, Forex and Cryptocurrency trader. Now to the question:

I visited NYC in June 2018 and my first opinion of America was that it was all a hype, like seriously i was disappointed, apart from the fact that i went during winter and that i actually really hated the weather(i thought i would like because of the Christmas movies i watched), they eat alot of junk food, usually pay quite alot for things that cost far less here in africa, and jeeez, a certain part of town i passed through in NY was full of rats….speaking with my uber driver i also got to know that majority of Americans basically live on credit.

Not to make this any longer, My opinions about black americans as an african:

Majority of them(my age group) are influenced by rappers, artists and youtubers, also saw some who have this escapist mindset that for them to escape all the oppresion and racism they could move to Africa without understanding that we have our set of problems, i also wonder why some of them complain about being educationally marginalised when there are free courses online that offer good value, I understand that America is a country with an oppressive track record but I feel that in this age of digitization and IT there is no excuse for failure, i would also say that I've also seen those who are extremely hard working, but i feel that the younger generation is too engrossed in beyonce, music and creative stuff, i feel that they should engross themselves in technology and how it can develop them as a community, they should also spend less on chains, Nikes and other liabilities, let them develop an interest for finance, who heads their Fed reserve, Quantitative easing, gold and bitcoin, let them develop interest for learning skills like coding, encryption and data science because i just feel that all the resources they need is at their disposal. Let them also build their own businesses instead of looking for a position in some white man's company, you can for example create an app that through crowd funding invests in small black businesses. And most of all learn about other cultures and free yourself from ignorance about the world outside trump's America. Am sorry this ended up as series of advice.

P.S: some of the my beliefs here do not obviously apply to all black Americans.

Related Answer
What do black Africans think about black Americans, and vice versa?

Daniel Adejumo, Quantitative Analyst Answered Jun 29, 2020

James Cambridge, Heavy Duty (Electrical Eng from FET College (2008) Answered Jul 28, 2021

A lot of Africans, though we love African Americans and recognise them as our long lost brothers and sisters, we hate the image or reputation they have created for themselves across the globe. Which obviously also affects us as people of African descendant tend to be stereo typed with all kinds of crazy and exaggerated generalisations by none black races. For instance, as an African you can travel anywhere in the world and hear all sorts of stupid prejudices about blacks mainly because of what they watch on TV mostly about African Americans…ie…ghetto "Hood rat loud mouth, bad attitude", clapping near people's faces when talking with anger, excessive and unnecessary use of vulgarity, calling themselves "nigga" and then getting upset when others also do it, their love for thug life or gangster culture, a lot of them speaking with total ignorance even when they are in public in front of other races and failing to pronounce even basic English words properly (giving an impression to other races that all Africans are idiots and completely ignorant). Calling other black people who are educated and Conservative "not black enough or whitewashed" as if being Conservative, calm natured, discipline…is exclusively European. When it's in fact just normal behaviour for any decent self-respecting, sane human being anywhere on the planet. We hate the times of anti-black, racist, inferior movies they involve themselves in and act stupid, being a sell out for a few dollars, helping racist whitesupremacy by destroying the image of their race like fools that can't comprehend the consequences of their actions…..

I think this is mainly the reason why many African immigrants in the western world want nothing to do with African Americans. Their reputation is horrible across the world. And they are mainly to blame for it even though they hate to take ownership of that. Because if they didn't go to shows like Jerry Springer for instance and act /talk like complete imbeciles, do dirty oversexualised music videos, act in many gangster movies and even be proud to be associated with all that madness and dress like they actually got some sense, people would overtime learn to respect them.

Pun intended.

I'm tired of being disrespected by other races because of what they see on western media about blacks

Related Links

Why do kids in America make fun of kids from Africa?

What is the major difference between black Americans and real Africans from Africa?

Why do black Americans look different from Africans?

Is there some sort of rivalry between African Americans and Africans (mostly Nigerians) in the US? There was a debate on a Twitter space a few days back and I observed from the talking points that many AA's don't like Africans that much.

Why do most African Americans say they aren't African? Are they right?
Why are Africans addressed as black people?
What is the reason why people are so hard on African Americans?
Do African blacks respect American blacks? Why?
How do Africans feel about African Americans?
What do black Africans think about black Americans, and vice versa?
Why is it so easy to differentiate American Blacks from African Blacks?

Why is there such a huge disconnect with Africans from Africa with African American blacks?

Why don't Africans consider African-Americans true Africans?

How do Native Africans feel about "black" Americans? Why does it seem like there's dislike between both, especially with West Africans?

Why are black Africans so angry?

COUNTRY FACT FILE

Location

In the Atlantic ocean, localization 445 km from the African occidental coast b/n the parallels 15 & 17 latitude North.

Official title of the state

The Republic of Cape Verde (Cap-vert) English:

Republica do Cabo Verde (national): Is an island country, spanning an archipelago of 10 islands located in the central Atlantic Ocean, 570 kilometers off the coast of Western Africa.

Flag description

Five unequal horizontal bands: the top-most band of blue - equal to one half the width of the flag - is followed by three bands of white, red, and white, each equal to 1/12 of the width, and a bottom stripe of blue equal to one quarter of the flag width: a circle of 10, yellow, five-pointed stars is centered on the red stripe and positioned 3/8 of the length of the flag from the hoist side: blue stands for the sea and the sky, the circle of stars represents the 10 major islands united into a nation, the stripes symbolize the road to formation of the country through peace (white) and effort (red).

Neighbours

Nearest are Mauritania & Senegal.

Land Boundaries: None

Founder of The Nation
Aristides Pereira

Local division

17 administrative Municipal councils (Concelhos) in 10 Islands and 8 islets.

Government type

Republic - semi-presidential

Legislation chamber

Unicameral - National Assembly

Form of State

A multi-party republic with one legislative house. The National Assembly, 72 seats, member are elected by popular vote to serve for five-year terms. Cape Verde: is a Republic with a president, who is the head of state, and a prime minister who heads the government. The prime minister is appointed by parliament.

Executive branch

Separated by chief of State and head of Government. President elected by popular vote to serve for five-year terms, eligible for a second term. Head of Government to be appointed by the president with consent of the legislature.

Judicial chamber

Supreme tribunal of Justice.

Capital city

Praia /in sao-Tiago Island/ Altitude 30 mtrs/98 ft. Geographic coordinates 14.55N , 23.31W. The capital of Cape Verde Islands. A port city situated on the south coast of the island of Sao Tiago. Praia is a Portuguese meaning for "Beach", it lies on the southern coast of Sao-Tiago island in the Sotavento (leeward) island groups. First the area settled as shipping lane and founded by "Praia de Santa Maria", a Portuguese explorer in 1770s.

Names of main towns

Mindelo, Santo-Filipe.

Main inhabited islands

Sao-tiago, Vicente, Santo-antao, Fogo, Sao-nicolau, Sal, Brava, Maio, Boa-vista.

Date of independence

5th July, 1975

Religions (Major)

Roman Catholics 80%, African traditional.
Main spoken languages

Portuguese (official), Creole widely spoken.

Currency unit

Cape Verdes Escuado (CVEsc)=100 Centavos

Area in Km2

4,033.00

Country area comparison in Africa

51 out of 55 states

Demographic terms:

Average annual population growth rate 1.459 %

Birth rate 21.67 births per 1,000 population

Death rate 6.41 deaths per 1,000 population

Average life expectancy: 70.41 years

Male 68.24 years: Female 72.64 years

Illiteracy rate (%)

Male: 11, Female: 21

Average per capita income

USD 3, 800

Population density

126.1/km2

Urban population (%)

61

Contributor groups (%)

Farming, Fishing: 9, Industry: 17: Social service 74

Main Export Items

Frozen and fresh fish meat, livestock, vegetables, coffee, Shoes, clothes, fish, bananas, hides, pozzolana (volcanic rock, used to make cement).

Economy is based on Agriculture, fishery, Salt & entrecote trade. Tourism is on the rise, but there are concerns that it poses a threat to the Cape Verde's rich marine life. It is an important nesting site for loggerhead turtles and humpback whales feed in the islands' waters.

Climate

Dry and tropical. Rainfall is very erratic and there are long period without rain. The climate across all the Islands is similar with little variation in temperature and a short rainy season. Temperature fluctuate between 20oc and 25oc year-round, and the rainy season extends generally from August to the end of October.

Extremes:

Lowest point: The Atlantic coast 0 mtr.

Highest point: Mt. Fogo 2829 meters.

Weather of the Capital city (Praia) average temperature 20-27oc.

Altitude 30 mtrs/98 ft

Hottest Month June-September

Coldest Month December-March

Driest Month November -June

Wettest Month July-August

Measures

Metric system

Time zone

1 hour behind GMT/UTC. At summer -3 hours less than Portugal. At winter -2 hours less than Portugal.Public holidays

January 1 (New year), January 20 (Heroes day), May 1 (Labor day), July 5 (independence).

Ethnic groups

Creole (Mulattos) 71%, Africans 28%, Europeans 1%.

Topographic & Environmental concern

Cape Verde islands are 18 (10 islands, 8 islets) in numbers volcanic in origin (active crater on Fogo island), the landscape is eroded and stark, with vegetation mostly in interior valleys. Environment: soil erosion: deforestation due to demand for wood used as fuel: water shortages: desertification: environmental damage has threatened several species of birds and reptiles: illegal beach sand extraction: overfishing.

Economy Overview

Industry

Food processing, beverages, fish processing, leather shoes, garments, salt mining, ship-repair.

Chief crops

Bananas, coffee, sugarcane, corn, beans, sweet potatoes, peanuts, fish. Note: Economy is heavily dependent on remittances from migrant workers.

Natural resources

Salt, Basalt rock, Limestone, Kaolin, Fish, Clay, Gypsum.

Land in use (%)

Arable land: 10

Grassland: 6

Forest woods: 0

Other: 84

Marine:

Coastline: 965 km.

Commercial Sea port:-

Mindelo (main port)

Development prospect:

The execution of large public investment programs has boosted economic activity but also led to a rise in the budget deficit (10.9% of GDP) and total public debt (67.2% of GDP), according to the IMF. Tourism and the government's investment program remain the main drivers of growth. In 2011 construction began on an $83m resort on Sal Island that will take about three years to complete. Cape Verde's airports handled 1.3m international arrivals from January to September 2011, a 10.3% increase on the same period in 2010.

Cape Verde is one of the few African countries likely to meet the Millennium Development Goals by 2015, having already ticked four of the eight goals – achieving universal primary education, promoting gender equality, reducing child mortality and improving maternal health. But donor support is important to sustaining these outcomes. With its graduation to Middle Income Country (MIC) status category, Cape Verde faces reduced access to concessional loans and has asked to extend its access to Low Income Country (LIC) instruments to 2015 in order to address structural bottlenecks.

Electricity company Electra, InfraCo, the Africa Finance Corporation and the Finnish Fund for Industrial Cooperation inaugurated a 10MW section of a wind farm project on Santiago Island in October 2011 as part of a national program to reduce reliance on fossil fuels. In 2012, wind power should account for about 25% of the national energy supply. The administration is restructuring the electricity parastatal and national airline with an eye to their privatization. In August, the Santa Caterina municipality signed a deal with Australia's Water Resources group for a 4,000m³/day desalination plant.

Fishing plays an important role in the economy. In October, the government started substantive negotiations with China National Fisheries Corporation for the privatization of the Cabnave shipyard and the construction of a new fishing logistics centre.

CENTRAL AFRICAN REPUBLIC (C.A.R)

National flag Emblem

Locator Map

TEXT HIGHLIGHTS;- Diaries updates, key events, brief analysis and relating news articles in timeline

Overview

Central African Republic (CAR) was a French colony, as Ubanghi-Shari.

The territory of present day CAR was called Oubangui-Shari in colonial times, named after the country's two largest rivers. It was 1 of 4 territories of French Equatorial African Empire, marking the point where French colonial advance to the east was halted. Colonial rule was based on a plantation economy, and the French were often brutal in their treatment of the local population. CAR was formed in 1958 as the French empire broke up, and became officially independent in 1960. The leader of the country in the 1950s, the priest Barthelemy Boganda, died in a plane crash in 1959. The young teacher David Dacko became President on independence, with strong French backing. David Dacko's rule was corrupt and incompetent. He was overthrown in a coup in 1966 by Colonel Jean-Bedel Bokassa. If life under Dacko was bad, it was about to get much worse under Bokassa. His rule was utterly despotic, culminating in his decision to transform the country into an empire, with himself as emperor, in 1976. The ruinously expensive coronation ceremony, based on the coronation of Napoleon, became a symbol of the excesses of despotic power. His regime unraveled rapidly in 1979, as he lost the crucial support of the French following an incident in which protesting school children were killed. He was toppled in September in a bloodless coup, orchestrated by the Fre nch, who put David Dacko back in the Presidential hot seat. Dacko restored the republic following the imperial interregnum. However, he was duly overthrown again, by the General Andre Kolingba in 1981. Initially the head of a military junta, Kolingba gradually incorporated civilians into his government. In 1986, he formed a political party, the RDC, and he became constitutional president in November 1986.

In 1958 until March 1959 subsequently became part of the French equatorial Africa & named an autonomous republic within the French community under the late Mr. Barthelemy Boganda, as it's native prime minister.

CAR gained it's independence on August 13, 1960.
Headship since independence; Head of State

An independent state entitled "Central African Republic" declared under Mr. David Dacko, a former school teacher, as it's founder president on the 14th August, 1960, but inaugurated to office in December, 1960. In 1966 the CAR Military overthrew the civilian government of Mr. David Dacko and installed Colonel Jean Bedel Bokassa who had won "Croix de Guere" in the French Indo-China Army, then commander of CAR Armed Forces as well as a distant cousin to the deposed president, came to power on the 31st December 1965, named himself president for life in 1972 and later to rename the country "Central African Empire" renamed himself "Emperor Bokassa".

BRIEF ESTABLISHMENT OF THE CENTRAL AFRICAN EMPIRE

The Central African Empire was a short-lived monarchical regime established in 1976 in what was then the Central African Republic, by Jean-Bédel Bokassa, the nation's president. Inspired by Napoleon's coronation in 1804, "Bokassa I" staged his own elaborate ritual inside a large outdoor stadium in Bangui, his capital, on 4 December 1977. While guests sweltered in the 100-degree heat, the self-proclaimed emperor ascended a giant golden throne shaped like an eagle with outstretched wings, donned a 32-pound coronation robe containing 785,000 pearls and 1,220,000 crystal beads, and then crowned himself with a gold crown topped by a 138-carat diamond that cost over $2,000,000 to manufacture. His empress, Catherine—the youngest of his three wives— was then invested with a smaller diadem. The total bill for Bokassa's regalia alone came to $5,000,000. 240 tons of food and drink were flown into Bangui for Bokassa's coronation banquet, including a tureen of caviar so large that two chefs had to carry it, and a seven - layer cake. Sixty new Mercedes-Benz limousines were airlifted into the capital, at a hefty cost of $300,000 for airfreight alone. All in all, the entire ceremony cost $20,000,000 to stage, an astronomical sum in a nation whose annual gross domestic product was only $250,000,000. The newly-coronated emperor used French aid grants to cover a significant portion of the bill, saying: "Everything here was financed by the French government. We ask the French for money, get it and waste it". In 1979, emperor Bokassa was overthrown in a coup, carried out with French military support, by the very man he had overthrown in 1965, Mr. David Dacko. The monarchy was abolished, the emperor was exiled, and his empire reverted to its former name, Central African Republic (CAR).

A Republic in central Africa.

Central Africa Republic abbreviated as CAR joined with Chad in 1906 to form the French colony of Ubangi-Shari, was separated from Chad in 1920, later to become an overseas territory of France in 1946. It subsequently became part of the French equatorial Africa & named an autonomous republic within the French community in 1958 until March, 1959 under premiership of the late Mr. Barthelemy Boganda, as it's native prime minister. An independent state entitled "Central African Republic" declared with Mr. David Dacko, a former school teacher, as it's first president on the 14th August, 1960, but inaugurated to office on December, 1960, that's was almost a year after the sudden death of its prominent politician, Mr. Barthelemy Boganda, he was the leading pre - independence nationalist politician of what is now Central African Republic, he was active prior to his country's independence during the period when the area under the name "Ubangui-Shari", he served as the first native prime minister of "Central African Republic autonomous territory within the French community" intended to serve as the first president of independent Central African Republic, he was killed in a mysterious plane crash on the 29th of March, 1959, while en route to Bangui, the capital.

In 1966 the CAR military overthrew the civilian government of Mr. David Dacko and installed Colonel Jean Bedel Bokassa who had previously served under the French Indo-China forces, then commander of the CAR Armed Forces as well as a distant cousin to the deposed president came to power on the 31st December 1965, named himself president for life in 1972 and later declared himself "Emperor Bokassa I" and renamed the country "the Central African Empire". Emperor Bokassa I, converted to Islam, renamed "Emperor Salah Nur Idi Ahmed of the Central African Empire" at an extravagant coronation crowned with a Persian made Diamond crown enthroning on a 2000 kg golden Eagle-wing throne which expenses afforded by the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya in December, 1976 before his conversion to Catholicism once again, his reign ended up on September, 1979, and went exile to the west African nation of Cote D' Ivoire during a period whose Mr. David Dacko the founder president has made a brief political comeback from exile (France), as third president in 2nd September, 1979 to September, 1981. Emperor Bokassa came back CAR to face trial in October, 1986 where a court sentenced him to death but turned the ruling to a life imprisonment, he later got a presidential amnesty of the ex-military head of state General Andre Kolingba until he dies of heart attack at age of 75 in 2nd November, 1996. The late emperor Bokassa has survived by 69 children from 17 wives.

In September, 1981 the army led by General Andre Kolingba took over political power in a military coup against president David Dacko once again, under a new one party rule constitution he was elected president for a six-year term until he forcibly stand down for free election to be held in 1992, after decades of misrule, mostly by military governments, a civilian rule was established under Mr. Ange Felix-Patassie who was first elected in democratic polls in 1993, he won re-election six years later, the civilian rule lasted only for one decade, during the period, CAR experienced a number of military mutinies and internal unrests, General Francois Bozize, the current president had taken-up arms against the civilian government in 2001, then to oust the civilian president Ange-Felix Patassie when rebel soldiers loyal to the Army chief of staff seized power in March, 2003, the civilian president, who succeeded by the incumbent president, went into self-exile to Togo, west Africa. Mr. David Dacko the founder president died on the 20th of November, 2003 in exile.

The ex-Army chief of staff, General Francois Bozize, then established a transitional government. Following a municipal, legislative and presidential elections held on in May of 2005, General Francois Bozize was reaffirmed as president of CAR in followed elections. The former CAR president Ange-Felix Patassie has died recently at the age of 74, after being ousted by the current president in March 2003, he has died in Cameroon.

News Africa:
In this video, we take a look at Jean-Bédel Bokassa, the self-styled "Emperor of Central Africa by the will of the Central African people, united within the national political party, The Movement for the Social Evolution of Black Africa".

Please help support our growth by subscribing to our Patreon: https://www.patreon.com/NewAfrica You can also support us by making a donation here: https://paypal.me/SupportNewAfrica?lo...
Follow us on Twitter: https://twitter.com/WeAreNewAfrica #Africa #CAR #History

Major Conflicts
First Coup
When: 1966
Who: David Dacko vs Jean-Bedel Bokassa
Why: Personal ambition on the part of Bokassa. He took advantage of Dacko's clumsy attempt to dilute his influence in the army
Outcome: Dacko overthrown by Bokassa
Second Coup
When: 1979
Who: Bokassa vs the French
Why: Bokassa's controversial self-coronation as Emperor in 1977 and his subsequent massacre of protesting school children alienated world opinion and forced Fr ance to back a coup against him

Outcome: Bokassa was replaced by Dacko who was flown in from Paris

Third Coup

When: 1981
Who: Dacko vs Gen Andre Kolingba
Why: Local French security advisers believed to be acting without the mandate of the French Government conspired against Dacko Outcome: Kolingba assumed power as Head of State First multi-party election cancelled
When: 1992

Who: Kolingba vs Angie-Felix Patasse
Why: Kolingba engineered the cancellation deliberately after realizing he had trailed with only 10 per cent of the vote
Outcome: Western envoys, led by the US ambassador, forced Kolingba to reschedule within months another election, which Patasse won

Military rebellion and failed coup
When: 2001
Who: Patasse vs pro-Andre Kolingba soldiers
Why: Patasse's perceived marginalization of the Yakoma ethnic group provoked a mutiny of Yakoma soldiers in Bangui's Camp Kassai military barracks. The mutiny was crushed by the intervention of Libyans and Congolese soldiers loyal to Jean-Pierre Bemba Outcome: The brutality of Bemba's troops against the Yakoma directly led to his subsequent indictment by the International Criminal Court

Fourth Coup
When: 2003
Who: Patasse vs General Francois Bozize
Why: Patasse had sacked Bozize as army chief of staff on suspicion of involvement in the 2001 coup attempt. Bozize fled to Chad from where he launched the counter -attack against Patasse

Outcome: Patasse was overthrown after alienating most of the CAR's military and political factions

A National Reconciliation Commission appointed by President Bozize is a national priority. President Bozize heads an uneasy coalition government beset by ethnic rivalries and a legacy of political turmoil.

Hundreds of thousands of internally displaced people owing to many years of political turmoil CAR has a heavy burden of refugees from Chad, DRC and Sudan

The infrastructure is poor and outside Bangui is almost non-existent Heavy dependence on foreign aid
A very limited tax base

Widespread poverty: Illegal arms proliferate in the poorly -policed countryside as a result of years of civil strife. Tropical diseases like malaria.

According to international agencies, civic and human rights groups, CAR suffers one of the highest incidences in the world of child trafficking, both internally and into neighboring countries, for forced labor and sexual exploitation.

December 20,2012: Central African Republic's rebellion' Rebels in the Central African Republic have taken over several towns, including the key mining centre of Bria, in just two weeks. The unrest has prompted the president to ask Chad for help - and troops have been sent over the border to help stop the rebel advance.

Who are the rebels? Called the Seleka coalition, their fighters are formed from the breakaway factions of several former armed groups. In 2007, these groups signed an accord with the government and agreed to be integrated into the army. But recently some of the rebels who did join the army have deserted and taken up arms. They accuse President Francoise Bozize of not honoring the ceasefire deal, which pledged the release of political prisoners and payment for fighters who disarmed.

Do they pose a real threat? Yes, now the rebels say want to depose President Bozize unless he negotiates. Since independence in 1960 the landlocked country has had a history of coups and rebellions, the most infamous led by Jean-Bedel Bokassa who declared himself emperor. Even the current president is a former army chief-turned-rebel leader, taking power in 2003. He has since won several disputed elections. As a result of all the instability, illegal weapons proliferate across the CAR, where its forests and its rich resources provide cover and money for armed groups. The unrest is partly fuelled by ethnic rivalries and poor communities who feel ignored by those in power. Added to the mix, the Ugandan rebel movement the Lord's Resistance Army has become active in the region - further increasing insecurity.

Can't the army halt the unrest? It is underfinanced, and its soldiers lack equipment and motivation. Historically CAR's leaders are wary of having a strong army. Only the presidential guard, made of troops from Mr Bozize's own ethnic group, has real firepower. Soldiers from Chad were actually in charge of the president's personal security until October when they were withdrawn.

Why is Chad so involved in CAR?
Mr Bozize came to power with the assistance of the Chadian army. Chad's President Idris Deby wants a close ally to the south. The unrest in CAR represents a serious security threat to Chad. The countries share a long and porous border and Chad already hosts several thousand refugees who have fled fighting over the years. In the past, Chad has faced rebel attacks from groups based in Sudan, its neighbor to the east. It does not want another area where rebel groups could base themselves. And it has intervened on several other occasions since 2003 to put down rebellions. Its most recent foray into CAR was to help defeat a rebel group whose leader, Baba Ladde, was from Chad.

Is the international community doing anything to help?
There are two international peace missions in CAR:

The UN Integrated Peace Building Office in Central African Republic (Binuca), whose staff has been trying to encourage dialogue between disparate groups.

And Micopax, a 400-strong regional force, funded by the European Union, which has a mandate to protect civilians and is involved disarmament exercises.

The Ugandan army, helped by US military advisers, is also trying to track down the LRA fighters. BBC News Africa

Central Africa Republic And The Bush War:
The Central African Republic Bush War (2004–2007) began with the rebellion by the Union of Democratic Forces for Unity (UFDR) in North-Eastern CAR, led by Michel Djotodia, after President François Bozizé seized power in 2003.

This quickly escalated into major fighting during 2004. During this conflict, the UFDR rebel forces fought the CAR government concurrently with several other rebel groups that were located in other parts of the country, including the Groupe d'action patriotique pour la libération de Centrafrique (GAPLC), the Convention of Patriots for Justice and Peace (CPJP), the People's Army for the Restoration of Democracy (APRD), the Movement of Central African Liberators for Justice (MLCJ), and the Front démocratique Centrafricain (FDC). Tens of thousands of people were displaced by the unrest, which continued until 2007, with rebel forces seizing several cities during the conflict.

On 13 April 2007, a peace agreement between the government and the UFDR was signed in Birao. The agreement provided for an amnesty for the UFDR, its recognition as a political party, and the integration of its fighters into the army. Further negotiations resulted in an agreement in 2008 for reconciliation, a unity government, and local elections in 2009 and parliamentary and presidential elections in 2010. The new unity government that resulted was formed in January 2009.

According to the Human Rights Watch, hundreds of civilians were killed, more than 10,000 houses burned, and approximately 212,000 persons fled their homes to live in desperate conditions deep in the bush in northern parts of the Central African Republic. Additionally, rebel groups say that Bozizé has not followed the terms of the 2007 agreement, and that there continue to be political abuses, especially in the northern part of the country, such as "torture and illegal executions".

Despite the 25 August signing of the peace agreement between the government and the CPJP that promised final closure of the Bush War, political violence continued in eastern and central CAR. On 15 September a dissident faction of the CPJP, led by Hassan Al-Habib and calling itself Fundamental CPJP, attacked the towns of Sibut, Damara and Dekoa. Two members of the national army, the Central African Armed Forces (known by its French acronym, FACA) were reportedly killed at Dekoa. Fundamental CPJP were opposed to the peace agreement, and in a radio announcement, the group threatened to march on Bangui. On 13 November, two civilians and a police officer traveling to Bangui were shot to death on the road between Sibut and Damara, near the village of Libi on the boundary of the Ombella-M'Poko prefecture. Further east in Obo, a FACA vehicle was attacked with RPGs on the same day. A civilian in the vehicle was killed and an unspecified number of troops injured. The vehicle was destroyed. The attack was Popular Front for Recovery rebels, who had been active in the region for some time.

Truce discussions and foreign troops'
On 30 December President Bozize agreed to a possible national unity government with members of the Séléka coalition, after meeting with current African Union chairperson Thomas Yayi Boni. He added that the CAR government was ready to begin peace talks "without condition and without delay".

By 1 January reinforcements from FOMAC began to arrive in Damara to support the 400 Chadian troops already stationed there as part of the MICOPAX mission. With rebels closing in on the capital Bangui, a total of 360 soldiers were sent to boost the defenses of Damara – 120 each from Gabon, Republic of the Congo and Cameroon, with a Gabonese general in command of the force. In the capital itself, deadly clashes erupted after police killed a young Muslim man suspected of links to Séléka. According to news reports, the man was arrested overnight, and was shot when he tried to escape. Shortly after that clashes began in Bangui's PK5 neighborhood, killing one police officer. Meanwhile, in a new development, the US State Department voiced its concern over the "arrests and disappearances of hundreds of individuals who are members of ethnic groups with ties to the Séléka rebel alliance".

On 2 January a presidential decree read on state radio announced that President Bozize was the new head of the defense ministry, taking over from his son, Jean Francis Bozize. In addition, army chief Guillaume Lapo was dismissed due to failure of the CAR military to stop the rebel offensive in December. Meanwhile, rebel spokesman Col. Djouma Narkoyo confirmed that Séléka had stopped their advance and will enter peace talks due to start in Libreville on 8 January, on the precondition that government forces stop arresting members of the Gula tribe. The rebel coalition confirmed it will demand the immediate departure of President Bozize, who has pledged to see out his term until its end in 2016. Jean-Félix Akaga, the Gabonese general in charge of the MICOPAX force sent by the ECCAS, declared that Damara represented a "red line that the rebels cannot cross", and that doing so would be "a declaration of war" against the 10 members of the regional bloc. It was also announced that Angola had contributed to the 760 troops stationed in the CAR, while France had further boosted its military presence in the country to 600 troops, sent to protect French nationals in case it is required.

On 6 January, South African President Jacob Zuma announced the deployment of 400 troops to the CAR to assist the forces already present there. Rebel forces secured two small towns near Bambari as peace talks were scheduled to begin in two days.

The Rebel SELEKA Offensive'

On 10 December an armed group seized the towns of N'Délé, Sam Ouandja and Ouadda. Rebels fought with government and allied CPJP troops for over an hour before securing the town of N'Délé. At least five government troops were reportedly killed. At Sam Ouandja, rebels claimed to had captured 22 soldiers and heavy mounted weapons.

On 15 December, rebel forces took Bamingui, a town approximately 120 km (75 mi) from N'Délé in a direct line towards Bangui. Three days later they advanced to Bria, an important diamond mining town lying 200 km (120 mi) southeast of Ouadda. The successful early morning rebel assault on 18 December killed over 15 government soldiers. The Seleka claim they are fighting because of a lack of progress after a peace deal ended the 2004–2007 Central African Republic Bush War. Following an appeal for help from Central African President François Bozizé, the President of Chad, Idriss Déby, pledged to send 2,000 troops to help quell the rebellion. The first Chadian troops arrived on 18 December to reinforce the CAR contingent in Kaga Bandoro, in preparation for a counter-attack on N'Délé.

Seleka forces took Kabo on 19 December, a major hub for transport between Chad and CAR, located west and north of the areas previously taken by the rebels. Four days later the rebel coalition took over Bambari, the country's third largest town, followed by Kaga-Bandoro on 25 December. On the same day, President Bozizé met with military advisers in the capital Bangui.On 26 December hundreds of protesters angered by the rebel advance surrounded the French embassy in Bangui, hurling stones, burning tires and tearing down the French flag. The demonstrators accused the former colonial power of failing to help the army fight off rebel forces. At least 50 people, including women and children, were sheltering inside the building, protected by a large contingent of around 250 French troops that surrounded the area. A separate, smaller group of protesters chanted slogans outside the US Embassy and threw stones at cars carrying white passengers, according to news reports. A scheduled Air France weekly flight from Paris to Bangui had to turn back "due to the situation in Bangui", a spokeswoman at the company said.

Later in the day rebel forces reached Damara, bypassing the town of Sibut where around 150 Chadian troops are stationed together with CAR troops that withdrew from Kaga - Bandoro. Josué Binoua, the CAR's minister for territorial administration, requested that France intervene in case the rebels, now only 75 km (47 mi) away, manage to reach the capital Bangui. Colonel Djouma Narkoyo, a spokesman for Seleka, called on the army to lay down its weapons, adding that "Bozizé has lost all his legitimacy and does not control the country."

December 23, 2012: Rebels in Central African Republic take city of Bambari' Rebels in the Central African Republic (CAR) have seized the key city of Bambari as part of their offensive against President Francois Bozize. The city, the third large st in the country, fell into rebels' hands after two hours of fighting with government forces, witnesses said. Bambari is one of several towns recently captured by the rebels - and the nearest one to the capital Bangui. The rebels accuse President Bozize of failing to honor a 2007 peace deal. Their move into Bambari comes a day after regional leaders called on the rebels to withdraw back to their original positions and accept talks with the government.

Government minister Josue Binoua said that if the rebels wanted peace, they had to respect the mediation efforts under way and halt their advance, the Associated Press news agency reports. Observers say the rebels may have decided to push forward in a show of force to put more pressure on the administration before sitting down for talks, the BBC's West Africa correspondent Thomas Fessy notes. Displaced people: The rebels known as the Seleka coalition - say the 2007 deal between the government and former armed groups was meant to see the release of political prisoners and payment for fighters who laid down their arms. Seleka, which is made up of breakaway factions from three of the former armed groups, has pledged to depose Mr Bozize unless he negotiates with them. They began their campaign a month ago, and have taken several towns in their push towards the capital. They took the mining town of Bria in a diamond-rich part of the country a few days ago. Bambari is at a key crossroads between diamond mining sites and routes to the east.

A spokesman for the medical charity Medecins Sans Frontieres told the BBC that many people had been displaced by the fighting, including some in areas still controlled by government troops. Neighboring Chad, which has helped President Bozize fight several rebellions in the past, has stationed troops just under 200km (124 miles) north of Bangui to act as a buffer force should the rebels continue their advance. Mr Bozize has been in power since leading a coup in 2003 and winning elections in 2005 and 2011. The 2007 accord led to rebel forces being integrated into the army. But some of the rebels have since deserted and taken up arms again. The CAR is rich in mineral resources, including gold and diamonds, but its population is extremely poor and has suffered a series of rebellions and coups since independence in 1960. BBC News Africa

General Francois Bozize Under Attack'
François Bozizé Yangouvonda was born in 14 October 1946 in Mouila, in Gabon of the former French Equatorial Africa, a member of the Gbaya ethnic group, and attended a military officers' training college in the Central African province of Bouar. He became a second lieutenant in 1969 and a captain in 1975. He was appointed Brigadier General by Emperor Jean-Bédel Bokassa, then king Salah Nur in 1978. General Bozize was a politician and 4th President of the Central African Republic from 2003 to 2013. Bozizé rose to become a high-ranking army officer in the 1970s, under the rule of Jean-Bédel Bokassa. After Bokassa was ousted, Bozizé served in the government as Minister of Defense from 1979 to 1981 and as Minister of Information from 1981 to 1982. He participated in a failed 1982 coup attempt against president André Kolingba and subsequently fled the country. Years later, he served as Army Chief of Staff under president Ange-Félix Patassé, but he began a rebellion against Patassé in 2001.

It has to be recalled that Bozizé's forces captured Bangui in March 2003, while President Ange-Félix Patassé was outside the country, and Bozizé took power, ushering in a transitional period of government. He won the March–May 2005 presidential election in a second round of voting, and he was re-elected in the January 2011 presidential election, winning the vote in the first round. In December 2012, the CAR was plunged into an uprising by rebel forces who condemned the Bozizé government for not honoring peace agreements after the Central African Republic Bush War in 2007.

CAR Government appeals'
On 27 December Bozizé asked the international community for assistance, specifically France and the United States, during a speech in the capital Bangui. French President Francois Hollande rejected the appeal, saying that French troops would only be used to protect French nationals in the CAR, and not to defend Bozizé's government. Reports indicated that the U.S. military was preparing plans to evacuate "several hundred" American citizens, as well as other nationals.[48][49] General Jean-Felix Akaga, commander of the Economic Community of Central African States' Multinational Force of Central Africa, said the capital was "fully secured" by the troops from its MICOPAX peacekeeping mission, adding that reinforcements should arrive soon. However, military sources in Gabon and Cameroon denied the report, claiming no decision had been taken regarding the crisis.

Government soldiers launched a counterattack against rebel forces in Bambari on 28 December, leading to heavy clashes, according to a government official. Several witnesses over 60 km (37 mi) away said they could hear detonations and heavy weapons fire for a number of hours. Later, both a rebel leader and a military source confirmed the military attack was repelled and the town remained under rebel control. At least one rebel fighter was killed and three were wounded in the clashes, the military's casualties were unknown.

Meanwhile, the foreign ministers in the Economic Community of Central African States (ECCAS) announced that more troops from the Multinational Force for Central Africa (FOMAC) would be sent to the country to support the 560 members of the MICOPAX mission already present. The announcement was done by Chad's Foreign Minister Moussa Faki after a meeting in the Gabonese capital Libreville. At the same time, ECCAS deputy secretary general Guy-Pierre Garcia confirmed that the rebels and the CAR government had agreed to unconditional talks, with the goal to get to negotiations by 10 January at the latest. In Bangui, the U.S. Air Force evacuated around 40 people from the country, including the American ambassador. The International Committee of the Red Cross also evacuated eight of its foreign workers, though local volunteers and 14 other foreigners remained to help the growing number of displaced people.

Rebel forces took over the town of Sibut without firing a shot on 29 December, as at least 60 vehicles with CAR and Chadian troops retreated to Damara, the last city standing between Seleka and the capital. In Bangui, the government ordered a 7 p.m. to 5 a.m. curfew and banned the use of motorcycle taxis, fearing they could be used by rebels to infiltrate the city. Residents reported many shop-owners had hired groups of armed men to guard their property in anticipation of possible looting, as thousands were leaving the city in overloaded cars and boats. The French military contingent rose to 400 with the deployment of 150 additional paratroopers sent from Gabon to Bangui M'Poko International Airport. French Prime Minister Jean-Marc Ayrault again stressed that the troops were only present to "protect French and European nationals" and not deal with the rebels.

Attacks On Radio Stations'

Elisabeth Blanche Olofio, a radio journalist for Radio Bé-Oko, was killed by the Séléka Coalition, who attacked the station in Bambari, Central African Republic and another Radio Kaga in Kaga Bandoro on 7 January 2013.[57][58][59] Radio Bé -Oko is part of a larger network of apolitical radio stations operating in the Central African Republic, known as L'Association des Radios Communautaires de Centrafrique.[60][61] The international press freedom organization Reporters Without Borders based in France said it was concerned that the rebel attacks were taking their toll on the ability of radio stations to operate in the C.A.R. Just four days after her murder on 11 January, the government of C.A.R. signed a ceasefire agreement with Séléka Coalition representatives.

Ceasefire agreement: On 11 January 2013, a ceasefire agreement was signed in Libreville, Gabon. The rebels dropped their demand for President François Bozizé to resign, but he must appoint a new prime minister from the opposition party by 18 January 2013. The National Assembly of the Central African Republic is to be dissolved within a week with a year-long coalition government formed in its place and a new legislative election will be held within 12 months, a date that can possibly be pushed back. The temporary coalition government will implement judicial reforms, amalgamate the rebel troops with soldiers in the Bozizé government to establish a new national military, set up the new legislative elections, as well as introduce other social and economic reforms. Furthermore, Bozizé's government must free all political prisoners imprisoned during the conflict, and foreign troops must return to their countries of origin. Under the agreement, Séléka Coalition rebels are not required to give up the cities they have taken or are currently occupying, to ensure that Bozizé will not renege on the agreement. Bozizé, who will remain president until 2016 when there are new presidential elections, said, "...it's a victory for peace because from now on Central Africans in conflict zones will be finally freed from their suffering." On 13 January, President Francois Bozizé signed a decree that removed Prime Minister Faustin-Archange Touadéra from power, as part of the agreement with the rebel coalition. On 17 January, Nicolas Tiangaye was appointed Prime Minister.

The Fall In Rebels Hand Of The Capital Bangui'
On 22 March 2013, the rebels renewed their attack. They took control of the towns of Damara and Bossangoa. After Damara fell, fears were widespread in Bangui that the capital too would soon fall, and a sense of panic pervaded the city, with shops and schools closed. Government forces briefly halted the rebel advance by firing on the rebel columns with an attack helicopter, but by 23 March, the rebels entered Bangui, and were "heading for the Presidential Palace," according to Séléka spokesman Nelson Ndjadder. Rebels reportedly managed to push out government soldiers in the neighborhood surrounding Bozizé's private residence, though the government maintained that Bozizé remained in the Presidential Palace in the centre of the city.

Fighting died down during the night as power and water supplies were cut off. Rebels held the northern suburbs whilst the government retained control of the city centre. A government spokesman insisted that Bozizé remained in power and that the capital was still under government control. A company of French troops secured Bangui M'Poko International Airport, while a diplomatic source confirmed that Paris had asked for an emergency UN Security Council meeting to discuss the rebel advance. France is believed to have around 1,250 troops in the Central African Republic, though a spokesman has stated that there are no plans to send further troops to the country.

On 24 March, rebels reached the presidential palace in the centre of the capital, where heavy gunfire erupted. The presidential palace and the rest of the capital soon fell to rebel forces and Bozizé fled to the Democratic Republic of the Congo. "A presidential adviser said he had crossed the river into DRC on Sunday morning [24 March] as rebel forces headed for the presidential palace." The United Nations refugee agency received a request from the Congolese government to help move 25 members of Bozizé's family from the border town of Zongo. A spokesman for the president stated that "The rebels control the town; I hope there will not be any reprisals." Rebel leaders claimed to have told their men to refrain from any theft or reprisals but residents in the capital are said to have engaged in widespread looting. Water and power have been cut to the city.

At least six South African soldiers, helping to train Bozizé's forces, were reported to have been killed in clashes with the rebels. A United Nations source stated that the South African troops were now preparing to leave the country with French assistance, having suffered substantial losses. They are believed to have withdrawn to their barracks and are awaiting safe passage to the airport. South African army spokesman Brigadier -General Xolani Mabanga stated that "I cannot confirm that we were fighting alongside (the CAR army) but we fell under attack and we defended ourselves and we repulsed the attackers."

Accession to power of General Francois Bozize-13th March, 2005 by coup/sham election.

Tentative election calendar- Presidential/Parliamentary, March.

Central African Republic (CAR) Timeline Diaries updates, and related key notes:

1880s - France annexes the area.

1889 – Bangui established as capital of the Central African Republic (CAR)
Side Note: Bangui is the capital and largest city of the landlocked nation of the Central African Republic. The city had a population of 750,000 people in 2012 which is about 16% of the nation's 4.6 million people. Bangui spans an area covering 67 square km, or 41.6 miles, and is named after the rapids in the Ubangi River on whose bank the city is situated. Across the river are the Democratic Republic of Congo and the town of Zongo. Due to Bangui being located near the equator the climate is hot and humid throughout much of the year and heavy rains that lead to flooding are common.

The history of Bangui began on June 25th, 1889 when the town was founded during the height of European colonial expansion following the Partition of Africa in 1885. The French explorer Michael Dolisie established it close to the juncture of the Ubangi and Mpoko Rivers. Hard times followed the founding of Bangui. Maurice Musy and Paul Comte, two colonial commanders, were both killed during combat with the indigenous populations in 1890. In 1891 the town was moved up river and became the base for French infiltration north toward the country of Chad and east toward the Nile River.

During its colonization Bangui served as the French administrative center for the region called Ubangi-Shari. On December 11th, 1906 Bangui was detached from the Middle Congo and became the capital of the Ubangi-Shari region created in 1903. In 1960 when the Central African Republic gained its independence from the French, Pan-Africanist leader Kwame Nkrumah, then president of newly independent Ghana, suggested that Bangui become the headquarters for the Organization of African Unity. The headquarters was eventually located at Addis Ababa, Ethiopia but since independence, the city has hosted numerous inter-African meetings.

Bangui has many landmarks within its boundaries that reflect its rich history and culture. The city's most distinctive landmarks date back to the 1970s when President—and later self-declared Emperor—Jean-Bédel Bokassa built an elaborate royal palace and a large triumphal arch honoring his reign. Even after Bokassa was deposed in 1979, the monuments remained as a stark reminder of the tyranny of the Emperor. The city is surrounded by various archeological sites that contain remnants from the Iron Age.

French is the official language of the city and country. Prior to colonization however Sango was the native language spoken in the Central African Republic and the Ubangi River region. The language is still spoken by many people in Bangui and throughout the country. The main religious groups are Catholics, Muslims, native religions, and Protestants. The people who comprise the majority of the city's inhabitants are migrants from the countryside who seek a better life in the capital. Since independence in 1960 the Central African Republic has undergone frequent military and political strife. Because of this violence, the city has been named one of the most dangerous places in the world. There is a lack of general sanitation and potable water, a situation made more difficult by the constant arrival of new migrants from the countryside. (Text ends)

1894 - France sets up a dependency in the area called Ubangi-Shari and partitions it among commercial concessionaires.

1910 - Ubangi-Shari becomes part of the Federation of French Equatorial Africa.

1920-30 - Indigenous Africans stage violent protests against abuses by concessionaires.

1946 - The territory is given its own assembly and representation in the French parliament; Barthelemy Boganda, founder of the pro-independence Social Evolution Movement of Black Africa (MESAN), becomes the first Central African to be elected to the French parliament.

1957 - MESAN wins control of the territorial assembly; Bartheleme Boganda becomes president of the Grand Council of French Equatorial Africa.

1958 - The territory achieves self-government within French Equatorial Africa with Boganda as prime minister.

1959 –Bartheleme Boganda, the prominent politician dies in a mysterious plane crash.

1960 - The Central African Republic becomes independent with David Dacko, nephew of the late Bartheleme Boganda, as founder president.

1962 – Founder-president David Dacko turns the Central African Republic into a one - party state with MESAN as the sole party.

1964 – President David Dacko confirmed as president in elections in which he is the sole candidate.

1965 – President David Dacko ousted by the army commander and nephew, Colonel Jean-Bedel Bokassa, as the country faces bankruptcy and a threatened nationwide strike.

1972 – The Military head of state Colonel Jean Bedel Bokassa declares himself president for life.

1976 – Colonel Jean Bedel Bokassa proclaims himself emperor and renames the country the "Central African Empire".

1979 – Jean Bedel Bokassa ousted in a coup backed by former president David Dacko and French troops after widespread protests in which many school children were arrested and massacred while in detention.

1981 – David Dacko deposed in a coup led by the army commander, General Andre Kolingba.

1984 - Amnesty for all political party leaders declared.

1986 – Jean Bedel Bokassa returns to the CAR from exile in France.

1988 - Bokassa sentenced to death for murder and embezzlement, but has his sentence commuted to life imprisonment.

1991 CAR – Rival political parties permitted to form.

October 1992 - Multiparty presidential and parliamentary elections held in which Andre Kolingba came in last place, but are annulled by the supreme court on the ground of widespread irregularities.

1993 – A civilian Ange-Felix Patasse beats Andre Kolingba and David Dacko in elections to become president, ending the 12 years of military rule. Kolingba releases several thousand political prisoners, including Bokassa, before standing down as president.

May 1996 – Army soldiers stage a mutiny in the capital, Bangui, over unpaid wages.

November 1997 - Soldiers staged more mutinies.

1997 - France begins withdrawing its forces from the republic; African peacekeepers replace French troops.

1999 – Philip Ange Patasse re-elected; his nearest rival, former President Andre Kolingba, wins 19% of the total vote.

December 2000 - Civil servants stage general strike over back-pay; rally organized by opposition groups who accuse President Patasse of mismanagement and corruption deteriorates into riots.

May 2001 - At least 59 killed in an abortive coup attempt by former president Andre Kolingba. President Patasse suppresses the attempt with help of Libyan and Chadian troops and Congolese rebels.

November 2001 - Clashes as troops try to arrest sacked army chief of staff General Francois Bozize, accused of involvement in May's coup attempt. Thousands flee fighting between government troops and Bozize's forces.

February 2002 - Former Defense Minister Jean-Jacques Demafouth appears in a Bangui court to answer charges related to the coup attempt of May 2001.

October 2002 - Libyan-backed forces help to subdue an attempt by forces loyal to dismissed army chief General Bozize to overthrow President Patasse.

March 2003 - Rebel leader Francois Bozize seizes Bangui, declares himself president and dissolves parliament. President Ange-Felix Patasse is out of the country at the time. Within weeks a transitional government is set up.

December 2004 - New constitution approved in referendum.
May 2005 - Francois Bozize is named the winner of presidential elections after a run-off vote.

August 2005 - Flooding in the capital, Bangui, leaves up to 20,000 people homeless.

June 2005 onwards - Thousands flee lawlessness in north-west CAR for southern Chad.
Aid bodies appeal for help to deal with the "forgotten emergency".

June 2006 - UN says 33 people have been killed in a rebel attack on an army camp in the north.

August 2006 - Exiled Former President Ange-Felix Patasse is found guilty, in absentia, of fraud and sentenced to 20 years' hard labor.

October 2006 - Rebels seize Birao, a town in the north-east. President Bozize cuts short an overseas visit.

December 2006 - French fighter jets fire on rebel positions as part of support for government troops trying to regain control of areas in the northeast.

February 2007 - The rebel People's Democratic Front, led by Abdoulaye Miskine, signs a peace accord with President Bozize in Libya and urges fighters to lay down their arms.

May 2007 - The International Criminal Court says it is to probe war crimes allegedly committed in 2002 and 2003 following the failed coup against the Ange-Felix Patasse.

September 2007 - UN Security Council authorizes a peacekeeping force to protect civilians from violence spilling over from Darfur in neighboring Sudan.

January 2008 - Civil servants and teachers strike in protest over non-payment of salaries for several months.

Prime Minister Elie Dote and his cabinet resign a day before parliament was to debate a censure motion against him.

President Francois Bozize appoints Faustin-Archange Touadera, an academic with no previous background in politics, to replace Mr Dote.

February 2008 - Ugandan Lord's Resistance Army rebels raid CAR

June 2008 - Two of three main rebel groups - the Union of Democratic Forces for Unity (UFDR) and the Popular Army for the Restoration of Democracy (APRD) - sign peace agreement with government providing for disarmament and demobilization of rebel fighters.

September 2008 - Parliament adopts amnesty law seen as last remaining obstacle to successful conclusion of peace talks between rebels and the government.

December 2008 - Government-rebel peace deal envisages formation of consensus government and elections in March 2010.
January 2009 - National unity government unveiled; includes leaders of the two main rebel groups. Main opposition UVNF criticizes the changes to the cabinet as insufficient.

February 2009 - Ugandan Lords Resistance Army (LRA) rebels cross into CAR.

March 2009 - French troops reportedly deploy in Bangui after rebels infiltrate the capital.

April 2009 - Clashes between government and rebels continue. UN Security Council agrees to creation of new UN peace building office for CAR to address ongoing insecurity.

July 2009 - New electoral commission established after parliament approves new election law.

September 2009 - Ugandan army confirms that it is pursuing LRA rebels in CAR.

August 2009 - UN report says more than a million people have been affected by civil unrest in CAR.

October/November 2009 - Former President Ange-Felix Patasse returns from exile, hints that he may stand for the presidency in 2010.

February 2010 - Rights groups, opposition and France call for prove into claims - denied by the authorities - that rebel leader Charles Massi was tortured to death in government custody.

President Francois Bozize says elections to be held on 25 April; opposition rejects date, fearing vote will be rigged.

April 2010 - Elections postponed. Parliament extends President Bozize's term until polls can be held.

May 2010 - UN Security Council votes to withdraw a UN force from Chad and the Central African Republic, deployed to protect displaced Chadians and refugees from Sudan's Darfur.

July 2010 - Rebels attack northern town of Birao.

September 2010 - Voter registration begins for presidential, parliamentary elections due in January 2011.

October 2010 - Four countries affected by LRA violence agree to form joint military force to pursue the rebels.

November 2010 - Ex-DRCongo vice-president Jean-Pierre Bemba goes on trial at International Criminal Court accused of letting his troops rape and kill in Central African Republic between 2002 and 2003.

December 2010 - 50th independence anniversary. Former self-styled Emperor Jean-Bedel Bokassa is officially rehabilitated.

January 2011 - Presidential and parliamentary elections. Mr Bozize wins another term.

April 2011 - Former President Philipe Ange-Felix Patasse dies at age 74.

December 2011 - The charity Medecins Sans Frontieres (MSF) warns that the Central country is in a state of chronic medical emergency because of epidemic diseases, conflict, an economic downturn and a poor health system.

March 2012 - African Union deploys a military force to hunt down Ugandan warlord Joseph Kony, believed to be in the Central African Republic.

August 2012 - Country's last historic armed group - Convention of Patriots for Justice and Peace (CPJP) - signs peace deal.

November 2012 - New SELEKA rebel coalition rapidly overruns north and centre of country.

December 2012 - Chad sends troops to halt advance of rebel army on Bangui.

January 2013 - Economic Community of Central African States negotiates ceasefire and agreement to form government of national unity at talks in Gabon. Chad force supplemented by peacekeeping troops from other African countries.

March 2013 – SELEKA rebels capture key south-eastern town of Bangassou after accusing government of violating January peace deal. Army puts up little resistance.

March 2013, Genera Francois Bozizé fled to Cameroon via the Democratic Republic of the Congo after the rebel forces attacked the capital city of Bangui and took control of the presidential palace.

November 1, 2013: Central African Republic: mass violence and imminent threat to civilians'

JRS: Washington DC, – The Jesuit Refugee Service and a number of other leading NGOs urge the international community to act quickly in the Central African Republic to protect civilians and prevent further atrocities against them. The increasingly dire humanitarian situation threatens the stability of the entire country. The Central African Republic (CAR) is rapidly sliding into anarchy. Civilians in many parts of the country are at severe risk of mass atrocity crimes resulting from increasing inter -communal and sectarian violence and reprisals. Compounding this is an increasingly dire humanitarian situation that threatens the stability of the entire country.

The international community must act quickly in order to protect civilians and prevent atrocities against them. Establishing security, protecting and expanding access for humanitarians, and investing in community-based violence reduction, conflict prevention and peace building programmes to address inter-religious and inter-communal tensions between communities should be immediate priorities. The past few weeks have seen a significant increase in systematic violence against civilians, attacks on religious institutions, and increased pressure on the ability of humanitarian organisations to operate. CAR has witnessed civil strife for decades, but renewed displacement and increased violence have exacerbated the pre-existing chronic emergency conditions. Key indicators of a deteriorating humanitarian situation and of continued violence against civilians include:

1) Increases in inter-religious and inter-communal nature of violence. Attacks that were once rebel-driven are now taking on more organised ethnic and sectarian tones;

2) Massive displacement. There are close to 400,000 internally displaced persons within CAR. Just under 220,000 refugees that have fled the country. 65,000 of these refugees fled as a result of the most recent conflict;

3) Massive food shortages affecting more 1.6 million children and families;

4) Widespread rape, arbitrary killings, kidnapping, forced amputations and other abuses, and pillaging and looting of villages committed by ex-Seleka and other forces;

5) Children, particularly girls, exposed to a wide range of forms of sexual- and gender-based violence;

6) Establishment of new counter-militias, motivated by climate of fear and retribution. Hundreds of armed young people are among the ranks, many of whom were subject to forced recruitment; and

7) Limited UN presence outside the capital Bangui and large humanitarian coverage gaps due to insufficient security and protection.

As advocates and organisations dedicated to the prevention of violent conflict and mass atrocities, we are deeply disturbed by the violence plaguing CAR. The most recent wave is tipping the situation beyond control and is taking a trajectory towards large -scale inter-religious and inter-communal violence. We urge the international community to act swiftly to prevent atrocities and ensure civilian protection. The international community must rapidly expand its presence in the country, extend protection beyond a few selected sites, and allocate the resources necessary to address the complex and protracted nature of humanitarian needs. Signatories: The Enough Project, Friends Committee on National Legislation, Genocide Watch, Invisible Children, Jesuit Refugee Service, Mercy Corps, The Resolve LRA Crisis Initiative, Save the Children, Search For Common Ground, The Student-led Movement to End Mass Atrocities, United to End Genocide.

November 24, 2013: CENTRAL AFRICAN REPUBLIC: War Crimes Committed by ex-Seleka Rebels'

Rebel Commander Accountable for Attack On Town'
HRW (Washington, DC) Bangui — Former Seleka rebel fighters who have been nominally integrated into the national army pillaged and burned a small town in the Central African Republic on November 10, 2013. The transitional government, led by Interim President Michel Djotodia, should immediately suspend and investigate the military commander who organized the attack. On November 10, Human Rights Watch saw Gen. Abdallah Hamat, the military commander of a large section of Ombella –Mpoko province, amass his men in the town of Gaga to join an attack against a local armed group, known as the anti-balaka, near the town of Camp Bangui. Four days later, Human Rights Watch reached Camp Bangui and found it totally destroyed. Survivors in Camp Bangui said that Seleka forces were responsible for the devastation. Hamat and another senior military officer acknowledged that their forces had been at Camp Bangui and there had been combat, causing some damage.

"The case of General Hamat is a test for President Djotodia, who has said he won't tolerate lawlessness by forces under his command," said Daniel Bekele, Africa director at Human Rights Watch. "Unless the government takes steps to investigate and prosecute those responsible, these types of attacks will keep happening." Hamat and former Seleka fighters have committed serious abuses in Camp Bangui and should face justice, Human Right Watch said. Owing to insecurity in the area, Human Rights Watch was not able to confirm the death toll from Camp Bangui, nor the details of the fighting. However, residents said that three dead bodies found after the attack were all civilians. The death toll is probably higher. The Seleka, a predominantly Muslim rebel coalition led by Djotodia, overthrew former President François Bozizé on March 24. A September Human Rights Watch report details the Seleka's deliberate killing of civilians - including women, children, and the elderly - between March and June and confirms the wanton destruction of more than 1,000 homes, both in the capital, Bangui, and the provinces. In an apparent attempt to distance himself from these abuses, Djotodia on September 13 officially disbanded the Seleka, some of whose members are believed to be Chadian and Sudanese.

Former Seleka rebels have nominally integrated into a new "national army," but command and control remain questionable. The group, now referred to as ex-Seleka, continues to commit abuses in the Central African Republic. Human Rights Watch travelled to the Ombella-Mpoko province on November 10 to investigate the killing of civilians and the burning of homes during an October battle between ex-Seleka and anti-balaka forces in Gaga. The anti-balaka - armed groups created by then-President Bozizé to fight banditry - are predominantly Christian and include some soldiers who served under Bozizé in the Central African Armed Forces (FACA). In rece nt weeks, violence and insecurity in the Central African Republic have taken on an alarming sectarian dimension, as the anti-balaka attack Muslim civilians in response to ex-Seleka abuses. Early in the morning of November 10, ex-Seleka fighters in Gaga, as they were leaving on motorcycles, told Human Rights Watch that they were "going to Camp Bangui to fight the anti-balaka." Later that day General Hamat arrived in Gaga with about 12 men. He was followed by one of his officers, Col. Ahmed Akhtahir, who also came with another dozen men.

In Gaga, Hamat requisitioned motorcycles from local transporters. He then requested fuel and "donations" from the local Muslim population, asking an assembled crowd in Arabic: "Are there no loyal Muslims here to donate fuel so we can fight the enemy?"
After collecting fuel and money, Hamat and Akhtahir led their forces on motorcycles on a road through a remote area of dense vegetation leading to Camp Bangui, at least 25 kilometers from Gaga and accessible only by motorcycle. The following day, November 11, when Human Rights Watch sought to confirm reports in Gaga of a fresh attack on Camp Bangui, Commandant Ibrahiem Yusef discouraged Human Rights Watch from following "our men who went to Camp Bangui yesterday" and reporting on the incident. Three days later, Human Rights Watch visited Camp Bangui and discovered one corpse on the road into town and the smell of decomposing remains. Once at Camp Bangui, Human Rights Watch found a town laid to waste. People had fled their homes without time to pack. Chairs were overturned, and cooking pots remained on burned -out fires. The center of the town had been completely pillaged, and the vast majority of homes, sheltering 300 to 400 families, had been burned. Although most of the town had been abandoned, a few members of the local population remained.

The residents' accounts consistently described an attack by Hamat's forces. One man told Human Rights Watch, "The Seleka came on Sunday morning. We heard shooting from the direction of the football field. They fired into the village and the civilians fled." Another resident said, "The moment we heard the shooting we ran for the bush. We had no time to prepare our bags." There were many burned homes, as well as ruined food, motorcycles, clothes, and furniture. One woman told Human Rights Watch, "They took everything of value that they could and they burned the rest." Casings from assault rifles and grenade fragments littered the ground. A resident of Camp Bangui confirmed that some men from the village returned fire on Hamat's men with homemade hunting rifles. It is not clear if the men were anti-balaka, but the local armed group did have a strong presence in a nearby village. The surviving population of the town is now living in the bush near the town without housing, medicine, or even the possibility of humanitarian support. The assault on the town violated international humanitarian law prohibitions against attacks against civilians and destruction and looting of civilian property. Those who carried out or ordered the attacks are responsible for war crimes.

"Without further investigation, the number of people who died at Camp Bangui will never be known," said Bekele. "Attacks like these on populated areas are causing massive devastation and fear among the population of the Central African Republic." On November 15, Human Rights Watch met with Col. Idriss Ahamat, the commanding officer of Gaga under General Hamat. He told the researcher that there had been a battle in Camp Bangui: "Some anti-balaka hid in the houses and those houses had to be burned." When asked how many houses had been burned he replied, "Many... 200, maybe 300." He later said that the houses had been burned inadvertently by bullets touching the grass roofs. When pressed by Human Rights Watch on the possibility of 200 homes burned by bullets, he replied, "Maybe it was only 20 or 30 houses burned...

sometimes when a fire is burning it can jump from one house to the next when they are close together." Human Rights Watch met with General Hamat on November 15 in Bangui. The general said he was at Camp Bangui on November 10, but he downplayed the damage: "Arriving at Camp Bangui there was a combat and some houses were damaged. It was not many, maybe four homes were burned. I was there after the attack on Camp Bangui. I saw this with my own eyes." Hamat dismissed allegations that his troops engaged in attacks on civilians or their property, telling Human Rights Watch: "My elements do not have the right to cause disorder. If they do, I will sanction them ... I want peace. I want people to return to their homes."

Human Rights Watch observed a large number of what appeared to be child soldiers in Hamat's ranks. Asked aboutthe age of one apparently very young soldier carrying a Kalashnikov assault rifle, Commandant Yusef confirmed he was 8 years old and "a good shooter." When asked about why he would use children so young in combat, Yusef replied, "Adults get worried and sometimes you have to give them drugs, but children just attack without retreating." Human Rights Watch also met with Djotodia in November and asked him about any efforts he had taken to halt abuses by his army and by ex-Seleka fighters. He said, "I can't deny that some of these things happened, but those who are responsible will be punished." "The transitional government needs to rein in its forces immediately and bring to justice those overseeing these horrific abuses," Bekele said. "With this evidence, Djotodia can't say he didn't know about this attack. He should suspend Hamat before the general wreaks more havoc on the populace and should investigate and prosecute all those responsible for the Camp Bangui attack."

November 25, 2013: Central African Republic: Tension and Fear
On CAR's Humanitarian Front Line'

AlertNet: BY WORLD FOOD PROGRAMME (WFP): Bangui, CAR - More than a million people risk going hungry in the Central African Republic (CAR) after months of conflict. The World Food Programme (WFP) is on the ground, and WFP and its partners since the beginning of the year have been providing emergency food assistance to more than 300,000 people, including refugees, displaced persons, malnourished women and children. With armed gangs roaming large swathes of the country, getting assistance to those who need it most is a challenge, as Augustine Fredericks can attest. When Augustine Fredericks returned in mid-November to Bangui, the capital of CAR, after spending one and a half months in Bossangoa, his heart was torn between sadness and relief. The 55-year-old logistician, who has worked for WFP for 15 years, was haunted by what he had seen and heard in the remote town that has become a safe haven for civilians fleeing armed gangs roaming the surrounding countryside. But Fredericks was also relieved that he and his team had managed to bring food assistance to the displaced people, many of whom had fled their homes and farms after witnessing killings and other atrocities.

Fredericks, who hails from Liberia, is no stranger to hardship. He has worked in some of WFP's most complex and challenging operations, including in Liberia, Sierra Leone, Gambia, Guinea Bissau, Mauritania, Sudan, Madagascar, and East Timor. He has been based in field offices in eastern Democratic Republic of Congo -- where militias were terrorizing villages -- as well as in remote Burkina Faso and in Peshawar in Pakistan. However, Bossangoa, 300 kilometers northwest of Bangui, offered a particular blend of risk and complexity. "I have arrived with memories of burnt houses and checkpoints along the road to Bossangoa. At every checkpoint, there were armed people, some with hands on the trigger and others holding their double-edged blades," said Fredericks as he recalled his first trip to Bossangoa in late September 2013. That day he travelled in a convoy of five WFP trucks carrying food and other relief items. Just getting the food and supplies to those in need is a feat. Convoy leaders had to negotiate with armed men at the checkpoints. The atmosphere often became tense with the armed men quick to take umbrage and show their frustration. Sometimes, convoys were obliged to wait until tempers cooled and the situation could be resolved.

Tense Town

In Bossangoa town, armed men patrolled the streets. Some wore army uniforms but others were dressed in civilian clothes and carried guns, double -edged knives, bows and arrows. It was not clear who was who. Despite the military presence, looting, killing and armed robbery were widespread. In September, two aid workers from the Agency for Technical Cooperation and Development (ACTED) were killed in Bossangoa. Several humanitarian compounds were looted and vehicles were stolen. To increase sec urity, all the UN agencies shared the same compound. And this is where Fredericks found himself after he arrived. Every night, he would look for a small space on a porch or in a meeting room where he could roll out his camping mattress and hang his mosquito net. There was little water for toilets or showers, but thanks to the WFP-managed humanitarian air service UNHAS, there was a supply of drinking water. Fredericks knew he was lucky compared to the thousands of people living in makeshift shelters in the school yards or in the compound of the Catholic Church.

Despite the palpable tension in the town, Fredericks was able to carry out his duties. He organized the rehabilitation of the WFP warehouse and supervised the management of the desperately needed food commodities. The context was complex: Soldiers would come and patrol around the WFP warehouse and the food distribution points, but Fredericks stuck firmly to WFP's guiding principles of neutrality and impartiality. "WFP, which I represented in Bossangoa, cares only about peace, rescue and survival of people affected by the crisis," he said. "If my daily engagement requires meeting with the army commander or any service provider from the local community, I will do so with no fear or claim because I have no interest other than pursuing the UN objective of minimizing suffering and ensuring the safety of anyone caught up in the confusion in Bossangoa." Read the original of this report on AlertNet Climate, the Thomson Reuters Foundation's daily news website on the human impacts of climate change .

Central African Republic Powerless to Resolve Crisis, UN Security Council Told'
As Regional Leader ECCAS Urges Stronger Mandate for Support Mission (November 25, 2013)

DOCUMENT: The Central African Republic was "a failed State headed by a fragile transitional Government" that was powerless to bring the country out of the crisis, the Security Council heard today from a senior official of the Economic Community of Central African States (ECCAS) in a meeting where several speakers called for the deployment of a multifaceted peacekeeping mission to that country. To ensure the Central African Republic's recovery, the future mandate of the African -led International Support Mission in the Central African Republic had to be bolstered, Ahmad Allam -Mi, Secretary-General of ECCAS, said today. Countries in the region had been tending to the Central African Republic for more than a decade now. The international community was finally alert to the crisis and the need to find a lasting solution. Cautioning that "free and transparent elections would not be enough to extricate the country from this crisis," he added that it was necessary to address the root causes of the conflict. Establishing a legitimate and representative democracy that served the interests of all and not just a clan or group was crucial. Among the causes of the ongoing conflict was the seizure of power by one category of Central Africans. Equally important was the establishment of genuine defence forces that were balanced and representative instead of a clan -based militia. He noted that the abject poverty in which the marginalized people lived in was one of the reasons they took up weapons.

Accordingly, it was vital to provide financial and humanitarian aid. The emergency deployment of a multifaceted mission was necessary to save the country. Therefore, the Heads of the Governments of the countries of ECCAS requested a robust mandate that would enable the Support Mission to fully carry out its mission. There was "no longer time for useless criticism or shedding crocodile tears". It was time to support ECCAS and the African Union in their efforts to save the Central African Republic. The African Union was working with ECCAS to support regional efforts to address the situation, Adonia Ayebare, Senior Adviser for Peacebuilding and Development at the Office of the Permanent Observer of the African Union, said, pointing to the landmark Libreville Agreements of January 2013. Since the entry of Séléka elements into Bangui, the Peace and Security Council had suspended the Central African Republic from participating in African Union activities, and had outlined targeted sanctions against individuals. He urged the Council to insist that the transitional authorities fulfil their obligations to protect civilians, adding that the African Union continued to mobilize the international community through the International Contact Group, which had met three times, most recently on 8 November. The Council should support the steps it had articulated to address the precarious situation. In taking a decision on the future of the Support Mission, the Council must bear in mind the need for predictable and sustainable support to the Mission. "We are one and we are on the same page," he said, as he reiterated the African Union's determination to work with ECCAS in addressing the situation in the Central African Republic.

Jan Eliasson, United Nations Deputy Secretary-General,said the Secretary-General had dispatched an interagency technical assessment mission to the Central African Republic from 27 October to 8 November, tasked with developing options for international support to the International Support Mission to the Central African Republic. The African Union and ECCAS had agreed on the urgent need for the international community to act and that a United Nations peacekeeping mission with a robust mandate would be required. For his part, the Secretary-General had held discussions with the African Union Commission Chairperson, the President of Chad and the Secretary-General of ECCAS to underline his agreement that a strong peacekeeping force would be needed. The technical assessment team also had heard from a range of national and international stakeholders who were unanimous in their calls for action, including deployment of an impartial force to protect civilians, restore security and prevent occurrence of mass violence. The team observed that despite its best efforts, the Mission for the Consolidation of Peace in the Central African Republic's ability to protect civilians was seriously limited, with some contingents perceived as siding with particular communities based on religion. Troops also had limited logistical support and lacked equipment. The report presented five options for international support to the International Support Mission: bilateral and multilateral support, United Nations support through a trust fund; limited United Nations support funded through assessed and voluntary contributions; a United Nations support package funded through assessed contributions; and the transformation of the Mission into a United Nations peacekeeping operation.

Most people with whom the team had met called for a United Nations peacekeeping mission, support for which had been requested by a number of civil society organizations. The transformation of the International Support Mission into such a force would lay the foundation for transparent, accountable and resilient institutions. "It is during difficult times that we recognize our friends," Mesmin Dembassa Worogagoi, representative of the Central African Republic, said, expressing gratitude to the members of the Security Council and the bilateral partners of the country who had shouldered the responsibility of addressing the crisis in his country. The report of the Secretary-General referred to pre-genocide conditions, he noted. The transition that was to lead to free and fair elections had been threatened by the instability in the country. In spite of the efforts of the transitional authorities, the security situation remained precarious. Therefore, the highest authorities of the transition had written to the Secretary-General and the Security Council to seek support for the request addressed to France to provide military support to buttress the International Support Mission. The people of Central African Republic aspired to nothing but peace and security, he stated. A robust Chapter VII mandate would enable the Mission to accomplish its lofty but difficult undertaking. United Nations support remained essential to resolving the crisis in his country.

Central African Republic: Calls Mount for UN Force in Central African Republic' IPS United Nations (November 26, 2013) - France has said it will circulate a Security Council draft resolution Monday night that would create a U.N. peacekeeping force in the Central African Republic, as violence in its former colony threatens to morph into an ethnic conflict. Earlier in the day, French Foreign Minister Laurent Fabius, who last week said conditions in the country "verged on genocide," announced France would triple its troop presence there to 1200, bolstering 2,500 regional African troops who have been largely helpless to stem increasingly anarchic conditions. "Attacks like these on populated areas are causing massive devastation and fear among the population of the Central African Republic." -- Daniel Bekele

"There are no more state security services in Bangui or the rest of the country," said Thierry Vircoulon, Central Africa project director at the International Crisis Group. People are left to themselves - only Churches can offer anything." Since fighting began nearly two years ago, 400,000 people have been internally displaced. In March, Seleka, a loose-knit coalition of rebel groups from the country's Muslim north, captured the capital, Bangui, and forced the president, François Bozizé, who rebels accused of failing to abide by previous peace agreements, to flee the country. The rebel' s leader Michel Djotodia was appointed interim president, becoming the first Muslim to hold the office. But Djotodia's announcement in September that Seleka would be disbanded set off prolonged bouts of looting and violence committed by disgruntled rebels.

Amnesty International reports that since Bozizé's overthrow, the number of militants identifying as Seleka has actually increased from 5,000 to 20,000. And Human Rights Watch Monday accused a Seleka commander of explicitly killing civilians in a Nov. 10 attack in Camp Bangui. "Attacks like these on populated areas are causing massive devastation and fear among the population of the Central African Republic," said Daniel Bekele, Africa director at Human Rights Watch. Last week, the United States pledged 40 million dollars to prop up the regional force that has been holed up in Bangui for months. Though the International Support Mission to the Central African Republic (MISCA) has plans to increase its numbers from 2,500 to 3,600, leaders in the region are convinced little can be done without the authorisation of a U.N. peacekeeping operation. Recent reports of attacks on mosques and churches are stirring echoes of times when the U.N. has been slow to prevent genocide. Following an internal report highlighting the U.N.'s inaction during the final months of civil war in Sri Lanka, the U.N.'s response in the Central African Republic will be seen as a test of promises to act earlier and more decisively to prevent genocide. Muslims, who dominate Seleka, make up only 15 percent of the Central African Republic. The conflict comes after "years of marginalisation and discrimination of Muslims in the northwest" of the country, said U.N. Deputy Secretary General Jan Eliasson. Reports claim that elements of Seleka speak neither Songo nor French, indicating they may have come from neighbouring countries such as Sudan or Chad. In many parts of the country, members of the Christian majority have responded to the violence by creating their own militias, known as "anti-balaka", or anti-machetes.

"There were several clashes between Seleka and the population this week," Vircoulon told IPS. "The African peacekeepers retreated, they cannot prevent them." Though the country has a long history of coups and rebellions, religion has not reared its head to such a degree - as it has in the rest of the Sahel - until now. "This did not start as a religious conflict," said Phillip Bolopion, United Nations director at Human Rights Watch. "Neither party had a religious agenda." As fighting picks up, younger and younger Central Africans are being pulled into the ranks on both sides. UNICEF estimates there are currently 6,000 child soldiers fighting in the country. Speaking to the Security Council, Eliasson called the suffering "beyond imaginable" and said the U.N. had to act in order to "prevent atrocities." But very little information makes its way out of the country, where NGOs are thin on the ground. Thousands of refugees have fled from major cities into the bush where they are susceptible to malaria and are dying from treatable diarrhea. Until semblance of order is restored, those who have fled are expected to die in increasing numbers. "Part of the problem is we don't know anything," Bolopion told IPS. Last week, Secretary-General Ban Ki-moon said he supported a U.N. peacekeeping force of 6,000 troops. But French representative Gérard Araud told reporters the secretary-general's office would require up to three months to compile a plan of action, pushing into March. That timeframe leaves many wondering what role France will play in the interim, less than a year after it launched a military operation in Mali to dislodge extremists who had created a de-facto state in the north of the country.

December 12, 2013: CAR - Humanitarian crisis looms in the capital'

AlJazeera: A humanitarian crisis is looming in the Central African Republic, as tens of thousands of people have sought refuge in makeshift camps around the capital of Bangui, following waves of sectarian violence between Muslims and Christians. Aid workers say only a fraction of Bangui's estimated 800,000 residents remained in the city, with many of the homeless taking shelter near a French military base and in other areas considered more safe, according to the AFP news agency. The focus is shifting to conditions in the makeshift camps, with humanitarian workers raising fears of cholera and other diseases spreading. Aid groups said more than 40,000 people had sheltered around the city's international airport, where French soldiers have maintained a base since 2002, AFP reported. Al Jazeera's Nazanine Moshiri, reporting from Bangui's international airport outside the city centre, defined the situation at the makeshift camp there as "terrible". "There are more than 40,000 thousand people who have been forced to take shelter here around African amnd French soldiers because they do not feel safe enough to go home," she reported. She said that they protected themselves from the hot weather under old abondened airplanes as they did not even have tents. "They do not have enough water and food either," she said. "The Doctors Without Borders and the World Food Programme have been here giving assistance but it is not enough," Moshiri said, adding: "Aid agencies do not feel safe enough to come here at the moment."

More troops deployed : Meanwhile, the United States has begun airlifting troops from Burundi to CAR to help those already deployed to secure the country. The Burundian troops are due to join the peacekeeping forces who have struggled to contain the sectarian violence that, according to aid officials , has killed more than 500 people in the past week. "The first US aircraft to transport the Burundian contingent to Bangui arrived this morning [in CAR]," said Lieutenant-Colonel Potien Hakizimana, commander of the 850-strong Burundi battalion going to CAR, on Thursday. Burundi army spokesman Gaspard Baratuza said two US transport airplanes will carry the full contingent to CAR's capital Bangui over the next four days. France also recently deployed more than 1,600 troops in the country to act with African 2,600-strong Union-led peacekeeping. The forces on the ground are trying to disarm militias awash in automatic weapons in cities and towns, where would-be fighters are tough to distinguish from civilians. Two French soldiers were killed earlier in the week while carrying out operations against militias in the capital, Bangui.

Intervention 'necessary': Earlier in the week, Francois Hollande, the French president, said that France's intervention in CAR was dangerous but "necessary" to avoid a bloodbath on this visit to CAR. The fighting in the former French colony is between the mainly Muslim Seleka rebels - originally from neighbouring Chad and Sudan - and the Christian anti-Balaka whose name means "anti-machete", the weapon of choice for Seleka. The Christian fighters oppose the Muslim ex-rebels in charge of the CAR since March. Michel Djotodia, rebel leader-turned interim president, has largely lost control of his loose band of fighters, who ended up being disbanded.

New CAR female leader sworn in as tensions escalate'
Interim President Catherine Samba-Panza calls for a ceasefire as tensions flare across the capital

Interim President Catherine Samba-Panza urged fighters to put down their arms as she took the oath of office, even as looters pillaged Muslim neighbourhoods and sectarian tensions escalated in the anarchic Central African Republic. Samba - Panza, the nation's first female leader, was sworn in at a ceremony on Thursday days after being chosen by a national transitional council. The rebel leader behind the March 2013 coup stepped aside nearly two weeks ago under mounting international criticism of his inability to control his fighters and stem the violence.

In her inaugural address, Samba-Panza urged both the Muslim fighters behind the coup and the Christian militiamen who rose up in opposition to support peace. "I strongly call on the fighters to show patriotism in putting down their weapons," she said. "The ongoing disorder in the country will no longer be tolerated." Central African Republic has been wracked by sectarian violence for months, with more than 1,000 people killed in Bangui over the course of several days in December alone. Nearly 1 million people have fled their homes, with 100,000 of them living in and around the Bangui airport being guarded by French soldiers. UN officials have warned that the crisis is at high risk of escalating into a genocide, driven by fighting between Christian and Muslim communities in the country with a history of coups and dictatorship. In the hours leading up to her inauguration, tensions flared across Bangui. Hundreds of Christians went on a rampage on Wednesday, looting and setting fire to Muslim-owned homes and businesses and threatening to go on a killing spree.

Growing threat: Rwandan peacekeepers and French forces intervened late on Wednesday to rescue about 30 Muslims trapped inside their homes by marauding gangs in the PK13 district of Bangui, witnesses said. The help arrived after international human rights activists pleaded for help for the families. "If these people are not evacuated within the next hour, they will be dead tomorrow. As soon as we leave they will be killed," said Peter Bouckaert, emergency director at rights group,

Human Rights Watch - As night fell, French forces provided a truck to take the family and their few belongings to a nearby refugee camp of Muslims under international protection. Muslim civilians have come under growing threat following the 10-month rule of coup leader Michel Djotodia and his mostly Muslim fighters who were blamed for scores of atrocities against the predominantly Christian population. A Christian militia launched a coup attempt last month that unleashed bloodshed. African countries have contributed some 4,600 peacekeepers to Central African Republic, and France has sent 1,600 troops. Among the countries helping is Rwanda, which suffered through genocide in 1994 that left more than 500,000 people dead.

February 3, 2014: Diplomacy - Crisis in CAR Continues to Divide Western Powers' The crisis in the previously largely unknown former French colony is becoming Rorschach test for international policymakers. Few would deny that the CAR has endured a hellish breakdown of basic order that has claimed at least 2,000 lives and forced a quarter of the country's 4 million citizens from their homes.

April 3, 2014: Chad announced it will withdraw its 850 peacekeepers from the CAR. Chadian soldiers have been accused by Christian tribes in the CAR of supporting Moslem militias and the Seleka rebel movement. Chad is a Moslem nation. Chad's contingent served with the African Union's MISCA operation.

April 4, 2014: The chaos and violence in the CAR (Central African Republic) is getting worse, despite the presence of 8,000 peacekeepers. A quarter of these troops are French, the rest African. France is particularly unhappy at the inability of the EU (European Union) to send the thousand troops and some helicopters they said they would. The promised EU contributions are on the way, but of all the EU members only France and Britain are really able to do this sort of thing in a hurry. France, and the African peacekeepers know that the CAR situation is getting worse as the situation is turning into a religious war with Christian militias in the south seeking to expel all Moslems. Ethnic cleansing is not the sort of thing peacekeepers like to have happen in their presence. At the moment peacekeepers are trying to protect some 15,000 Moslem refugees trapped in the south. It's gotten so bad that the AU (African Union) has accused the Christian militias of being terrorists. When it comes to Moslem civilians many of these militias are certainly using a lot of terror.

It gets worse. Chad is pulling its 850 troops out of CAR because of accusations that the Chad soldiers (who are Moslem) have been too rough on Christians and are secretly aiding the Moslem rebels. Ousted CAR president Francois Bozizé has regularly claimed that Chad helped the Moslem rebels overthrow him. Chad denies all this and there is not a lot of real evidence to back it up. The EU and AU are trying to organize a force of 12,000 peacekeepers plus an economic reconstruction program. Raising all the troops will be difficult if the Chad contingent does leave.

Most of the mayhem is in the largely Christian south and especially in and around the capital, where most of the Moslems are in the south. This all began when the capital was captured by Moslem rebels in early 2013. That was followed by rebels engaging in extensive looting and other crimes. Most of their victims were Christians. This included some deliberate attacks on churches. That resulted in Christians forming militias to fight the rebels. In the last year over 2,000 people have died, most of them in the last six months. Now the Moslems remaining in the south are arming themselves and fighting back at Christian civilians. This caused the number of refugees in and around the capital to go from 20,000 to over 200,000 in March.

The Christian militia are also angry because the peacekeepers failed to curb rebel violence against Christians last year. The general chaos of the last few months has caused over a million people (a quarter of the CAR population) to flee their homes. Foreign aid groups are having a hard time getting food and other supplies in since rebels, militias and bandits are looting aid supplies and convoys. Peacekeepers have to be used as armed escorts for the convoys and provide protection for aid workers distributing food.

For the French this is all a big disappointment. CAR was supposed to be the kind of classic emergency peacekeeping France has been doing in this part of the world (former French colonies) for decades. The main problem in CAR was that the new rebel (Seleka) government has not been able to deal with the chaos and lawlessness unleased by the March 2013 overthrow of the elected government. The Moslem rebels from the north ousted a largely unpopular, but Christian government in a country where 85 percent of the population is Christian (50 percent) or pagan (35 percent). This caused more friction and violence.

The Moslem rebel leader resigned as interim president at the end of 2013 and tribal leaders elected a Christian woman as interim president. She will organize nationwide elections for a new president and parliament. In the meantime she selected 20 new ministers from all factions (Christian, Moslem, Moslem rebel, tribal leaders and so on). The problem is that there are too many freelancers with guns out to steal what they can while they can.

CAR is landlocked and surrounded by Cameroon to the west, Chad to the north, Sudan to the east, and Congo to the south. CAR has too many people (a population that has quadrupled to 4.6 million in the last 50 years) and too many ethnic groups/tribes (over 80)to govern easily. Many of the tribes do not get along with each other in the best of times and now with the overcrowding and the spreading desert in the north things get very ugly. There is not enough water for herds or irrigation for crops and not enough arable land for anything. Foreign aid keeps a lot of people alive, and that aid comes in via the national government, which steals as much as it can. That's the prize for rebels; the capital and all those lucrative government jobs and income from foreign mining operations that goes with it.

CAR needs all the outside help it can get because the economy, especially in the capital, is a mess. The rebels and sundry criminals have been extorting cash from businesses and travelers (via a lot of new "security checkpoints" on the main roads) and causing all sorts of problems. Many schools were closed and supplies of all kinds (especially medical) are scarce. Crime is more common, as is unemployment. Then there's the violence against Christians. Clergy and churches in and around the capital have been attacked.

Outside the capital there has also been a crime wave, often caused by local Seleka groups (or armed men claiming to be Seleka) going on a looting and mayhem spree in 2013. Many have been robbed, often in addition to women and female children being raped. Over a thousand have died in all this suburban violence and even more injured.

The rebels justified their takeover by accusing the former government (with some accuracy) of reneging on an earlier peace deal. This time the rebels got to the capital and overthrew the government of president Francois Bozizé. The northern rebels had become much more formidable in 2012 by forming a new rebel organization Seleka, a coalition of five rebel groups. That made it possible to advance from northern CAR (near the Chad border) to the capital (on the Congo border in the southwest).

All the rebels had a lot of grievances. Back in 2011, elections were held in CAR and it was obvious to foreign observers (and CAR citizens) that the process was corrupt. The electoral commission declared that president Francois Bozizé won the vote with a 66 percent majority. In addition Bozizé was accused to stealing money meant for the disarmament effort which failed to collect many weapons from the 6,000 rebels who showed up at disarmament centers. The rebels that were still active were frequently operating as bandits, often so intensively that civilian populations fled. Bozizé never provided all the benefits to rebels who accepted the amnesty, and these rebels threatened to overthrow the government to get what they were promised. Bozizé thought he could keep the rebels quiet with double-talk and lies. That did not work and Bozizé called on other nations in the region to help him out. ECCAS agreed to send "peacekeepers" but these troops were not able to stop the enraged rebels. There were never enough peacekeepers to cover the entire country and the rebels were now more numerous and determined.

CAR has been torn by a tribal conflict since November 2001, when former CAR Army Chief of Staff General Francois Bozize and his supporters fled to Chad, after fighting broke out in CAR's capital Bangui. For two years Libya provided troops to help keep the new government secure. But in 2003, Bozize and his armed followers returned, and the unpopular president Ange-Félix Patassé sort of fled. Patassé supporters and people who simply opposed Bozize, or government in general, got guns and adopted an attitude that they were a law unto themselves. Their bases were in northwestern CAR which was always a lawless place, made worse by years of civil war in nearby Chad and heavy poaching activity from nearby Sudan. Things never settled down after that. Until last year (when it was destroyed) the CAR Army had only 4,000 troops, who were poorly paid, led, trained, and equipped. CAR soldiers usually fled when confronted by the Seleka rebels. By early 2013 most CAR troops had deserted and the rebels took control of the capital. Driving out the former government has, so far, proved easier than actually running a government. Now the northern rebel government is gone and there is a new coalition government. No one expects this to solve a lot of problems. France wants to pull its troops out in 2014, as early in the new year as possible. At the moment the French appear to be stuck.

April 22, 2014: A coalition unit of African soldiers operating in the CAR captured a low-level Lord's Resistance Army (LRA) leader. The unit also rescued 10 people the LRA band had kidnapped. The captured LRA officer was identified as a lieutenant. He was captured after a firefight between his band and the anti-LRA troops. Uganda is the lead nation in the anti-LRA coalition. The U.S. military recently reinforced its anti-LRA contingent. Around 250 American personnel are currently engaged in the anti-LRA operation. The U.S. also committed four CV-22 Osprey tilt-rotor aircraft, two C-130 transports and two KC-135 tankers to the anti-LRA effort.

April 25, 2014: Former members of the Seleka rebel movement in the CAR demanded that the country be partitioned into Christian and Moslem areas. Hard-core guerrillas in Seleka were from predominantly Moslem tribes in the northern CAR. The Seleka group advocating partition is based in the town of Bambari (north central CAR). Bambari has become a sanctuary for Moslems displaced in the south. The group wants to call the new country the Republic of Northern Central Africa. However, several Christian tribes also live in the north. They oppose partition. These tribes also claim that Chad and Sudan are pushing partition because they would be able to control the new country. Partition would require mass population displacement. Several thousand Moslem tribals live in the capital, Bangui, particularly in an area known as PK-5. Moslems accused Christian militias of trying to drive them out of Bangui. The CAR has a population of 4.7 million people. Around 80 to 85 percent of the people are Christians or animists.

April 27, 2014: The CAR government reported that anti-balaka militia groups have trapped around 10,000 Moslems in the town of Boda (southern CAR).

April 28, 2014: Conflict between Christian and Moslem tribes in the Central African Republic (CAR) continues. A convoy of 18 trucks organized by the CAR government and protected by African soldiers serving with the MISCA peacekeeping operation moved an estimated 1,300 Moslems from a refugee camp near the capital, Bangui, to a safe -zone in northern CAR. The Moslems feared attacks by Christian anti-balaka (machete) militias.

Central African Republic: providing aid amidst insecurity'
Washington DC, 21 May 2014 — Jesuit Refugee Service welcomes the statement by 26 NGOs in the Central African Republic reaffirming their commitment to the people there, and we echo their call for armed actors to respect humanitarian access. JRS currently supports the emergency education program established by UNICEF. These projects serve as temporary primary and secondary schools for those children who cannot return to their schools because of insecurity.

The statement: Twenty-six international non-governmental organisations (NGOs) express their deep concern over violence in the Central African Republic (CAR), condemn recent attacks against humanitarians and reaffirm their commitment to helping civilians in need. Despite an environment that is becoming increasingly dangerous for aid workers, NGOs are resolute in providing life-saving support and call upon all armed actors in CAR to respect the safety of humanitarian staff, material and activities; and to ensure all communities have unhindered access to assistance.

National and international NGO staff are working to reduce the scale of suffering in CAR by providing assistance to nearly 2.5 million people, more than 50 percent of the population, which live in dire circumstance throughout the country. Aid workers conduct essential activities, including: provide medical services, distribute emergency shelter, improve access to water and sanitation facilities, treat malnutrition, support livelihood activities, give food assistance, equip schools for children and help victims of violence. NGOs cooperate closely with local communities to make sure assistance addresses concerns and is equitable.

NGOs operating in CAR are guided by fundamental principles to ensure that everyone in need can reach humanitarian assistance Humanity: NGOs aim to prevent or alleviate human suffering.

Neutrality: NGOs do not side with any of the parties to conflict in CAR, nor advance political or religious objectives.

Impartiality: NGOs provide assistance on the basis of need alone and without any discrimination.

Independence: NGOs are autonomous and operate independently from political or military actors.

But violence and threats against humanitarians jeopardise assistance and risks reducing access to vulnerable populations, who depend on NGOs for their basic needs.

Within the past month alone, humanitarians have experienced serious insecurity, for example: the killing of 16 civilians, including three aid workers, in an attack on an NGO - supported hospital; the looting and killing of three aid workers in an attack on a humanitarian convoy; an attack against a convoy transporting IDPs and humanitarians, killing two IDPs and wounding six; and the abduction and killing of two aid workers.

One NGO representative said, "Humanitarians have experienced deadly incidents and attacks. Our fundamental priority is to make sure that everyone in need can access humanitarian aid and protection. But first, we must ensure that all armed actors respect our independence, neutrality and safety in order to maintain our activities and help population who are suffering the most".

NGOs aim to continue providing life-saving assistance, increase aid, and help prepare a foundation for the full recovery of the country. However, the safety of humanitarian staff must be ensured and all communities in need must have unhindered access to aid. (Text ends) children suffering an endless nightmare'

CAR: Praying with refugees in the Central African Republic:

Bangui, (January 1, 2015) – The long-forgotten and -neglected crisis consuming the Central African Republic (CAR) for the last 30 years has spiralled out of control, and the most vulnerable pay the heaviest price. Since 2013, this already fragile country, unable to survive the fall of François Bozize regime, has succumbed to a dictatorship under multiple armed groups which have established a climate of terror and atrocity.

Two groups, known as Séléka and anti-balaka, driven by different politico-economic interests, have learned how to play upon religious sensibilities, inciting hatred between Christia ns and Muslims and risking total breakdown in the country. Some 430,000 have been internally displaced, of whom almost 61,250 are from the city of Bangui alone. A further 419,000 have sought asylum in neighbouring countries, and more than 2.5 million persons, primarily civilians, have been rendered vulnerable by the crisis.

The lives of children in CAR is ongoing tragedy, with seemingly no end in sight. Some children have witnessed abuses, killings of their parents and neighbours, scenes of unparalleled v iolence, all which provoke trauma and unusual behaviour. Furthermore, life in internally displaced persons (IDP) camps is completely unrecognisable as ordinary family life. Some children are separated from their families; others live a life marked by acute austerity. Such a breakdown in social life is leading to a grave psychological legacy. In this landscape of daily, continuous violence, the suffering of children seems like an endless nightmare.

Successive crises in CAR have pushed children to join armed groups which now pose a threat today. If nothing is done to re-establish an education system, there is a risk that another lost generation will provoke the crises of tomorrow.

Education as a target of conflict. Over time, armed conflicts have a certain impact on educational activities. Approximately 65 percent of schools have been closed for the last two years, and a further 400,000 children prevented from receiving quality education.

Most schools in CAR have been looted, occupied, burned or damaged by gun or artillery fire, and almost 280,000 primary school children have abandoned school in the last year. More than a third of schools in are used as shelters. Many schools are subjected to indiscriminate attack, leaving both pupils and teachers as collateral damage.

Constant interruptions. When the new school year began in November, the education minister confirmed the crisis would once again prevent thousands of children from attending school. In Boy Rabe, a pro-anti-balaka district of the capital, Bangui, there are frequent clashes with the ex-Séléka group. For instance, the schools in this district were closed since December 2013, and the families have been forced to return to IDPs camps, with more than 3,640 children in the Boy Rabe Monastery camp. Since then, these schools, including emergency education activities, have only opened sporadically. When activities opened in May 2014, they were once again interrupted by renewed violence in October.

The international community has established Child Friendly and Temporary Learning Spaces and Child Protection (ETAPE) programmes, which have provided 34,555 children with access to emergency education. Only a few schools, particularly secondary schools, have been able to re - open for the 2014 school year.

During a crisis, education is rarely prioritised in child protection and the reconstruction of the country. Yet, when education is neglected during emergencies, children are more unlikely to resume their studies. During the second phase of the UNICEF-funded ETAPE programme, the Jesuit Refugee Service (JRS) secondary school programme, benefiting 391 students, was closed. The students, 23 of whom received scholarships from JRS, were referred to colleges and public secondary schools, yet many children were forced to abandon their studies. Clearly, the lack of resources in the field of emergency education presents great challenge.

Obstacles to universal education. The goodwill of the authorities trying to re-launch the education system is not enough. Most schools are closed due to deep-seated insecurity linked to decades of instability and the absence of a functioning state. Many state schools in Bangui have not re-opened because their teachers are demanding payment of outstanding salaries. Hopefully, negotiations between the education minister and the teachers will have a positive outcome.

There is a distinct divide between the private and public sector. Private schools, particularly Catholic schools, have more resources at their disposal and thus are in a better position to guarantee salaries to teachers and higher quality services, including didactic materials, to students. Yet, private schools have neither the space nor resources to meet the needs of all children.

Education as rehabilitation. IDP camps, like a vast ocean of distress, radically dismantle normal family life making a return to normalcy seemingly impossible. Although schools can be places where armed groups seek to recruit children, they are also spaces which offer a sense of wellbeing and normalcy in emergencies to those who would otherwise be at greater risk.

Nearly 235 children in CAR have been freed from armed groups. For some, their games become war. As they play, they use terms learned from armed groups. In observing the emergence of warlike culture among children under five years of age, JRS emergency education programmes in the Boy Rabe and Bimbo camps seek to give children back their childhood and innocence.

Schooling, in addition to guaranteeing children an education, also guarantees continuous protection and socialisation.

Reflections for prayer
While social links have been torn apart by conflict and social stability turned upside down, education in times of crisis provides the seeds for reconstruction and the prop on which national reconciliation will be built. It must be the duty of governments and strategic players to facilitate a favourable return to education in countries destroyed by war.
Isidore Ngueuleu, JRS, West Africa Advocacy and

Communications Officer Scripture for Reading Proverbs 9: 9-

10

Instruct a wise man, and he becomes still wiser; teach a just man, and he advances in learning. The beginning of wisdom is the fear of the Lord, and knowledge of the Holy One is understanding.

JOURNALISM In AFRICA
Central African Republic journalist Landry Ulrich Nguéma Ngokpélé detained overnight in defamation case

Lome, Togo, July 14, 2021 — Central African Republic authorities should drop their defamation investigation into journalist Landry Ulrich Nguema Ngokpélé and ensure that members of the press can work freely and safely, the Committee to Protect Journalists said today.

At about 4 p.m. on June 3, police officers with the Central Office for the Repression of Banditry (OCRB) arrested Nguema Ngokpélé, the publication director of the privately owned Le Quotidien de Bangui newspaper, according to news reports, the journalist, who spoke to CPJ via messaging app, and a statement by the Central African Journalists' Union.

The officers took the journalist to the Ngaragba Central Prison in Bangui, the capital, where they held him overnight and granted him provisional release the following day, according to the journalist and a copy of the release order reviewed by CPJ.

Police raided Nguema Ngokpélé's room at the Bangui Ledger Plaza hotel while he was in detention and seized two computers, he said, adding that they had not been returned as of today.

If convicted of criminal defamation, Nguema Ngokpélé could face a fine of 100,000 to 500,000 Central African francs (US $180 to $901) under Article 145 of the country's 2020 Law on Freedom of Communication, which CPJ reviewed.

"There was absolutely no reason for journalist Landry Ulrich Nguema Ngokpélé to have been arrested or to face legal harassment for his reporting," said Angela Quintal, CPJ's Africa program coordinator, in New York. "Authorities should swiftly return Nguema Ngokpélé's computers and ensure journalists in the Central African Republic can work free from intimidation."

The defamation investigation stems from a complaint filed by Harouna Douamba, the president of Aimons Notre Afrique, a local nongovernmental organization. The complaint, which CPJ reviewed, cites a 2018 article by Le Quotidien de Bangui alleging that Douamba had swindled government authorities.

Nguema Ngokpele, however, told CPJ that he believed the complaint was retaliation for a separate article, which alleged that Douamba's organization had not paid rent for its office space.

The complaint also alleged that Nguema Ngokpélé asked Douamba to pay him in exchange for having the article taken offline, a claim the journalist denied.

CPJ repeatedly called Douamba for comment, but he did not answer.

Vicent Namroba, the general rapporteur of the High Council of Communications, the Central African Republic's media and communications regulator, told CPJ in a phone interview that under the country's laws no journalist should go to prison for their work, but they may be fined.

Nguema Ngokpélé told CPJ he was arrested while making a required appearance at the Bangui prosecutor's office as part of a separate defamation case from September 2020. That case stemmed from Le Quotidien de Bangui's coverage of alleged corruption by the country's minister of water, forestry, hunting, and fishing, the journalist told CPJ; he added that he is required to appear at the prosecutor's office weekly in relation to that case.

Nguema Ngokpélé said that case was transferred to the Bangui Correctional Court on March 17, a jurisdictional decision which he had appealed.

While checking in for that required appearance on June 3, Judge Thierry Blaise Angalaka-Nzapato informed Nguema Ngokpélé of Douamba's complaint, questioned him about it, and then ordered police to arrest him, the journalist said.

Angalaka-Nzapato also issued the warrant to raid Nguema Ngokpélé's hotel room while he was imprisoned, and told him his computers were being "examined" by the OCRB and would be returned to him in the presence of a lawyer, the journalist said.

Nguema Ngokpélé told CPJ that he does not have a lawyer, and said he was "handicapped [in my work] since I have to run the newspaper with the means at my disposal."

CPJ's called Angalaka-Nzapato, Bangui prosecutor Alain Lengandet, and the official who filed the September 2020 complaint for comment, but no one answered.

Jean Saint-Clair Maka Gbssokotto, the coordinator of the Consortium of Central African Journalists Against Disinformation, told CPJ by messaging app that the arrest of Nguema Ngokpele had been "arbitrary" and said, "the press is muzzled and journalists in CAR face threats on a daily basis."

Nguema Ngokpélé told CPJ that he has also filed three recent complaints to the Bangui public prosecutor over threats he received in response to his news coverage. CPJ reviewed those complaints, which allege threats from local officials and from a since-deleted Facebook account.

The journalist told CPJ that he has not received any response from the public prosecutor in relation to those complaints.

FRANCOPHONIE
Pourquoi l'état français ignore son histoire de colonialisme ?

Philippe Beaulieu Citoyen Mis à jour le 2 ans

Mon fils, actuellement en 4ème, étudie depuis quelques semaines le colonialisme européen et français depuis le XVème siècle, et ses cours présentent les choses sous un jour loin d'être favorable pour la France… Partant du principe que les programmes d'histoire sont validés par une des institutions de l'état français, l'Education nationale, j'ai du mal à voir où il ignorerait son histoire coloniale. Mais bon, depuis quelques temps, on a vu fleurir ce genre de questions tendancieuses sur Quora ou les réseaux sociaux où par inculture ou par esprit partisan, certains veulent faire croire que la France occulterait son passé colonial. Suivre Philippe Beaulieu

Questions similaires

Est-ce que la France s'est excusée pour son passé colonial ?

Que pensez-vous de l'affirmation de Anasse Kazib « L'Histoire de la France s'est fondée sur le colonialisme et l'impérialisme »?

Quels empires/puissances coloniales ont commis le plus grand nombre d'atrocités dans l'histoire, et pourquoi ?

Que pense le peuple français de la surexploitation des ex colonies par la France ?

Emmanuel Macron veut-il rétablir l'empire colonial français ?

La France a-t-elle encore un pouvoir sur ses anciennes colonies ?

Pourquoi la France a-t-elle du mal à regarder son histoire coloniale en face ?

Quelles sont les colonies actuelles de France ?

Pourquoi est-ce que le monde ne dit rien sur le colonialisme économique imposé à l'Afrique par la France ?

La France doit-elle s'excuser pour son passé colonial, comme le demande l'Algérie ?

L'armée française a-t-elle la capacité à tordre le cou au groupe paramilitaire Wagner ?

Vassili Fiodorovitch Patrouchev Vétéran. Sécurité internationale. Consulting géopolitique 4 janv.

D'abord il faudrait : 1/ pouvoir distinguer les mercenaires de Wagner des conseillers russes officiels au Mali. Cela sera d'autant plus difficile que mercenaires et conseillers, contrairement à l'armée française ne circulent pas dans des véhicules spécifiques mais avec des soldats de l'armée malienne. Un accrochage se solderait donc par la mort possible de soldats maliens. Et s'il a lieu en ville par exemple par le lynchage par la foule des soldats français.

Sans compter que dans beaucoup de pays maintenant, comme en Centre Afrique la protection des personnalités est assurée soit pas les mercenaires soit par les conseillers militaires, donc des soldats Spetsnaz russes issues du GRU ou de groupes officiels comme la fameuse unité du SVR Zaslon…

2/ Les mercenaires Wagner sont pour la fine fleur et les groupes de fer de lance qui procèdent aux nettoyages préalables, d'anciens Spetsnaz (forces spéciales) qui comme leur chef Dmitri Outkine ancien Podpollkovnik (Lieutenant-Colonel) des Spetsnaz du GRU ont déjà été engagés dans de multiples guerres et sur des terrains difficiles. Pour Outkine : Tchétchénie, Daguestan, Donbass, Syrie, Libye, etc… Et ne sont tenus à aucune règle d'engagement autre que de détruire l'ennemi. Leur équipement est loin d'être rudimentaire :

Il y a donc de fortes chances que plusieurs soldats français, qui n'ont pas tant l'expérience des combats que des patrouilles de sécurisation, y laissent leur peau

Les Russes eux vont même jusqu'à poser devant les récents monuments en l'honneur de la coopération franco-russe

Alors, l'armée française n'a plus aucune option, puisque les divers gouvernements africains ont déjà passé des accords militaires avec la Russie et des contrats avec divers groupes de coopérations russes ainsi que les mercenaires de Prigogine.

Questions similaires

Pourquoi certaines personnes étrangères rejoignent-elles la Légion étrangère française, plutôt que l'armée de leur propre pays ?

L'armée française a-t-elle assez de soldats pour une possible guerre d'envergure ?

Pourquoi est-ce que l'armée française manque de renommée comme l'armée britannique ou américaine ?

Pourquoi l'armée française ne compte plus de maréchaux ?
L'armée de terre française est-elle plus forte depuis que le fusil FAMAS a été remplacé ?

Pourquoi une étude américaine met-elle en cause les capacités « limitées » de l'armée française ?

L'armée allemande est-elle plus forte que l'armée française ?
Quelle est l'arme française la plus redoutable ?

Le grade de maréchal peut-il toujours, théoriquement, être obtenu dans l'armée française ?

L'armée française est-elle un repaire de fachos ?
Pourquoi le képi est-il porté dans l'armée française ?
Comment endurcir l'armée française sans faire la guerre ?
L'armée française peut-elle vaincre l'armée allemande et envahir l'Allemagne ?
Quelle est l'unité de l'armée française la plus prestigieuse après la légion étrangère ?

Les forces armées françaises sont-elles capables de faire face à un ennemi techniquement équivalent ? Un voisin européen par exemple?

News Nigeria
The Mangbetu people of Central Africa had a different look partly due to their elongated heads.

Posted by Aniekpeno Ekong 15h

When kids were born, their heads were tightly wrapped with cloth in order to give it the elongated look.

The practice began fizzling out in the 1950s due to westernization.

AfriStar

RCA: la Rwandaise Valentine Rugwabiza arrivée à Bangui pour prendre la tête de la Minusca

· Suivre Publication par David-GDK 1 h

La nouvelle Représentante spéciale du Secrétaire général de l'ONU en République centrafricaine et Cheffe de la Mission multidimensionnelle intégrée des Nations Unies pour la stabilisation en République centrafricaine (MINUSCA), Mme Valentine Rugwabiza, est arrivée à Bangui ce dimanche, 17 avril 2022, pour prendre ses fonctions.

Dans les prochains jours, elle aura une série d'audiences, notamment , avec le Président de la République, le Professeur Faustin Archange Touadéra, les membres du Gouvernement et les présidents des institutions de la République centrafricaine. La Représentante spéciale envisage également de s'entretenir avec des personnalités du pays ainsi que les partenaires internationaux et entend effectuer des visites dans les différentes régions de la République centrafricaine.

Mme Valentine Rugwabiza a été nommée par le Secrétaire général de l'ONU, M. António Guterres, le 23 février 2022.

Depuis 2016, Mme Rugwabiza était Représentante permanente du Rwanda auprès des Nations Unies et Ambassadrice non-résidente du Rwanda en Colombie et en Jamaïque. De 2014 à 2016, elle était ministre des Affaires de la Communauté de l'Afrique de l'Est et membre de l'Assemblée législative de l'Afrique de l'Est. De 2013 à 2014, elle était Directrice générale du Rwanda Development Board et membre du Cabinet.

De 2005 à 2013, Mme Rugwabiza a été Directrice générale adjointe de l'Organisation mondiale du commerce (OMC) à Genève. Auparavant, elle était Représentante permanente du Rwanda auprès de l'Office des Nations Unies à Genève (ONUG) et des institutions spécialisées des Nations Unies, ainsi qu'Ambassadrice extraordinaire et plénipotentiaire du Rwanda en Suisse, de 2002 à 2005.

Mme Valentine Rugwabiza, qui a plus de 30 ans d'expérience sur les questions de développement et de sécurité en Afrique, tant dans le secteur public que dans les entreprises, succède à ce poste au Sénégalais Mankeur Ndiaye, dont le mandat a pris fin le 31 mars 2022.

Quel est le Chef d'Etat qui a (ou a eu) le plus faible QI ?

Fernando Sanchez · Suivre Observateur sceptique chez L'univers (1958–aujourd'hui) 1 an J'hésite vraiment entre ces deux-là:

Emperor Bokassa

Ou encore

Idi Amin Oumi

Questions similaires

Quel est le QI de Donald Trump ?
Quel est le QI moyen des personnes par pays ? Quel pays a le QI moyen le plus élevé ?
Quel était le QI estimé d'Hitler selon les standards d'aujourd'hui ?
Les gens avec un QI entre 160 et 170 ont-ils besoin de travailler ?
Quel est le QI de Poutine ? C'est un génie ? Staline et Pierre étaient-ils les grands génies?
Quel est le QI de Joe Biden ?
Qui a le QI le plus élevé de tous les temps ?

Si les chefs nazis étaient réputés avoir un QI élevé, pourquoi ont-ils ignoré des choses aussi fondamentales que le système logistique, les limites géographiques, le pragmatisme en géopolitique (guerre totale) et la rareté des ressources ?

Quels sont les avantages d'avoir un faible QI ?
Quel pays a le QI le plus bas ?
Rélated Answer
Who is your favorite dictator, from any time period, real or fictitious, and why?

Photo de profil pour Thomas Dal-Molin
Thomas Dal-Molin , Modèle photo (2010-présent) Traducteur · Traduit le 3 juil. 2019

Photo de profil pour Kelechi Asika
Kelechi Asika ESL Teacher (2017–aujourd'hui)

Mouammar Kadhafi.

Non, contrairement à la croyance populaire des médias, Kadhafi n'était pas "un dictateur assassin qui a brutalement opprimé son peuple", c'est bien loin de la vérité (souvenez-vous, c'est la même personne que le Conseil des droits de l'homme de l'Assemblée générale des Nations Unies se préparait à décerner un prix à ... un peu de juxtaposition pour en dire le moins). Le VRAI Mouammar Kadhafi :

Une éducation et des soins médicaux gratuits pour les Libyens

Sous Kadhafi, la Libye pouvait s'enorgueillir de l'un des meilleurs services de santé du Moyen-Orient et de l'Afrique. De plus, l'éducation et les soins de santé sont devenus un droit universel pour tous les Libyens. Tout le monde a accès gratuitement aux médecins, aux hôpitaux, aux cliniques et aux médicaments. Ceci a été confirmé par http://Mercycrops.org.

https://www.mercycorps.org/sites...

Réalisation du plus grand projet d'irrigation au monde (The Great Man-Made River Project)

L'objectif était de rendre l'eau facilement accessible à tous les Libyens de tout le pays. Il a été financé par le gouvernement Kadhafi et il a dit que Kadhafi lui-même l'a appelé "la huitième merveille du monde".

A donné 50 000 $ à des couples de jeunes mariés
Le gouvernement de M. Kadhafi avait adopté une loi qui accordait des subventions aux jeunes mariés afin de les aider à acheter leur première maison et à fonder une famille. Encore une fois, cela a été confirmé par http://Mercycrops.org (voir source précédente).

A donné 5 000 $ aux mères qui ont accouché
Cette aide a été fournie aux mères pour les aider à se procurer tous les produits de première nécessité dont elles auront besoin pour leur nouveau-né, par exemple de la nourriture, des couches, des vêtements, etc.

Fixer le prix de l'essence à 0,14 dollars
En 2011, la Libye avait l'un des prix du pétrole les plus bas du monde (le troisième plus bas) selon des sources telles que Staveley Head, un fournisseur britannique de produits d'assurance, et China.org.cn.

Fourni à tous les Libyens un foyer
Dans le livre vert de M. Kadhafi, il est dit que "la maison est un besoin fondamental de l'individu et de la famille et qu'elle ne doit donc pas appartenir à d'autres".

Permettre aux femmes d'avoir des droits égaux
Les femmes avaient le droit de s'habiller comme bon leur semble et de travailler. Kadhafi, contrairement à d'autres dictateurs (surtout au Moyen-Orient), n'a pas imposé de canon répressif particulier aux femmes.

Niveaux littéraires élevés
Avant Kadhafi, seuls 25 % des Libyens étaient alphabétisés, mais ce chiffre est passé à 87 %. Il a été en mesure d'augmenter ce nombre de façon si importante grâce à la gratuité de l'éducation.

Permis aux Libyens de démarrer gratuitement une entreprise agricole
Afin de les aider à démarrer leur exploitation et leur carrière agricole, M. Kadhafi a fourni aux Libyens des terres agricoles, une maison de ferme, des semences, de l'équipement et du bétail pour qu'ils puissent se lancer dans une carrière agricole.

Privatisation du pétrole libyen à tous les citoyens
Le 21 février 2011, Kadhafi a lancé un programme de privatisation de tout le pétrole libyen à tous les citoyens libyens. Cela permettrait dans un premier temps de fournir 21 000 dollars à chaque citoyen sur un total de 32 milliards de dollars en 2011 et conduirait effectivement à la dissolution des ministères de la santé, de l'éducation et autres pour éliminer la corruption, le vol de pétrole par des compagnies étrangères et pour décentraliser le pouvoir.

Veiller à ce que les citoyens libyens aient suffisamment de nourriture L'Organisation des Nations Unies pour l'alimentation et l'agriculture a confirmé que la sous-alimentation était inférieure à 5 % avec un apport calorique quotidien de 3 144 calories. De plus, avec le projet de la Grande rivière artificielle, M. Kadhafi assurait un avenir agricole encore plus prometteur pour nourrir son pays. Les prix de la nourriture étaient incroyablement bas également sous Kadhafi, un Libyen pouvait acheter 40 miches de pain pour seulement 0,15 $.

Je ne dis pas qu'il était totalement innocent, mais qu'il avait ses défauts. C'était un dictateur ? Bien sûr, le vote n'était pas autorisé en Libye quand il était au pouvoir.

A-t-il violé les droits humains de certains citoyens ? C'est ce qu'il a fait, à tel point qu'il gardait la tête de ses ennemis dans son congélateur.

Mais, il a été éliminé non pas pour ces raisons, mais parce qu'il voulait unir l'Afrique à travers une nouvelle monnaie, le dinar doré... signifiant que les nations africaines et musulmanes s'uniront pour créer cette nouvelle monnaie et l'utiliser pour acheter du pétrole et autres ressources à l'exclusion du dollar et des autres devises, à savoir les euros et la livre sterling. Cela aurait sérieusement dévasté ces monnaies et, comme l'a déclaré Anthony Wile, analyste financier et rédacteur en chef du Daily Bell, une publication axée sur le marché libre :

"Si Kadhafi avait l'intention d'essayer de réévaluer le prix de son pétrole ou de tout ce que le pays vendait sur le marché mondial et d'accepter autre chose comme monnaie ou peut-être de lancer une monnaie en dinar d'or, une telle mesure ne serait certainement pas bien accueillie par l'élite au pouvoir aujourd'hui, qui est chargée de contrôler les banques centrales du monde. ... Donc oui, ce serait certainement quelque chose qui provoquerait sa destitution immédiate et la nécessité d'avancer d'autres raisons pour l'empêcher de rester au pouvoir."

Il était une menace pour la sécurité financière de l'Occident et vous feriez mieux de croire qu'à la seconde où cela se produira, l'élite vous l'aura mise tellement profond qu'ils vous utiliseront comme une marionnette. En conséquence, il a été renversé du pouvoir et tué. Comme la méchante sorcière de l'Ouest, Hillary Clinton, l'a dit elle-même... "." Depuis sa mort en 2011, la Libye est passée à autre chose :

Libya with Gaddafi

À ceci :

Libya with Gaddafi

Libya Under Qaddafi Rule

À ceci :

Libya with “American democracy”

Libya Under American Democracy

Un pays qui avait autrefois de la stabilité et tant de potentiel s'est transformé en un trou à rats anarchique, tout cela grâce aux forces occidentales... le gouvernement américain, la CIA, l'ONU et l'OTAN. Mais c'est sans aucun doute mon dictateur préféré et malgré ses défauts, il a été un grand leader et je ne pense pas que l'Afrique reverra quelqu'un comme lui sur mon continent. Au lieu de cela, nous serons à jamais coincés avec des chefs marionnettistes faibles et corrompus tels que Paul Kagame, Paul Biya, Yoweri Kaguta Museveni, Joseph Kabila, Goodluck (ou devrais-je dire Badluck) Jonathan et Teodoro Obiang Nguema Mbasogo.

RIP Mouammar Kadhafi.

Questions similaires

Si les boxeurs professionnels sont abîmés après un combat alors qu'ils utilisent des gants de boxe épais et rembourrés, à quoi ressembleraient-ils s'ils n'utilisaient pas de gants du tout, et quelle serait la durée des combats ?

Mike Tyson, à son âge actuel, en 2019, peut-il encore se défendre dans un combat de rue, en supposant qu'aucune arme n'est utilisée ?

Mike Tyson a offert à un gardien de zoo 10 000 $ pour frapper un gorille au visage à la fin des années 80. Est-ce que Mike Tyson aurait pu gagner ?

Que se passe-t-il lorsque des boxeurs se lancent dans des combats de rue ?

Et si la France d'aujourd'hui était amenée en l'an 117 (à l'apogée de l'Empire romain), pourrait-elle conquérir le monde ? Qu'est-ce qui se passerait ?

Qui était le boxeur poids lourd le plus fort de tous les temps ?

Mike Tyson aurait été considéré comme obèse selon l'IMC qu'il avait dans sa jeunesse. Etait-il simplement dense au niveau osseux, ou était-il très musclé ?

Comment serait la France aujourd'hui si elle ne s'était pas ouverte à l'immigration massive ?

Tyson contre Ali : qui gagnerait ce combat de boxe ?
Si vous aviez des supers pouvoirs, quels seraient-ils et comment vous en serviriez-vous ?

News Nigeria
Azande warriors. From "The Heart of Africa or Three Years' Travels and Adventures in the Unexplored Regions of Central Africa", by Georg Schweinfurth, 1873. Engraving by Georg Carl Heinrich Dollmann.

Posted by Aniekpeno Ekong Fri

The Azande were pejoratively nicknamed "Niam-niam", on account of their fearsome reputation as man-eaters in times past. Schweinfurth provides us with the following description of their equipment:

“The principal weapons of the Niam-niam are their lances and their trumbashes. The word "trumbash," which has been incorporated into the Arabic of the Soudan, is the term employed in Sennaar to denote generally all the varieties of missiles that are used by the negro races; it should, however, properly be applied solely to that sharp flat projectile of wood, a kind of boomerang, which is used for killing birds or hares, or any small game: when the weapon is made of iron, it is called "kulbeda." The trumbash of the Niam-niam consists ordinarily of several limbs of iron, with pointed prongs and sharp edges. Iron missiles very similar in their shape are found among the tribes of the Tsad basin; and a weapon constructed on the same principle, the "changer manger," is in use among the Marghy and the Musgoo.

The trumbashes are always attached to the inside of the shields, which are woven from the Spanish reed, and are of a long oval form, covering two-thirds of the body; they are ornamented with black and white crosses or other devices, and are so light that they do not in the least impede the combatants in their wild leaps. An expert Niam-niam, by jumping up for a moment, can protect his feet from the flying missiles of his adversary. Bows and arrows, which, as handled by the Bongo, give them a certain advantage, are not in common use among the Niam-niam, who possess a peculiar weapon of attack in their singular knives, that have blades like sickles. The Monbuttoo, who are far more skillful smiths than the Niam-niam, supply them with most of these weapons, receiving in return a heavy kind of lance, that is adapted for the elephant and buffalo chase.” -The Heart of Africa or Three Years' Travels and Adventures in the Unexplored Regions of Central Africa, by Georg Schweinfurth, 1873.

Qui fut le dictateur le plus incompétent du monde?/ Who were the most incompetent dictators of all time?

Serge Elia , Raffole de l'histoire Traducteur · Mis à jour le 10 juin 2021

Eric Wang Reads a lot about history

Jean-Bédel Bokassa, de l’Empire centrafricain

Le général et président Jean Bedel Bokassa en 1970

Bokassa voit le jour en 1921 dans un village nommé Bobangui, à l'époque en pleine Afrique-Équatoriale française. Il grandit sous la domination coloniale européenne, comme presque toute l'Afrique de ce temps-là. Ainsi, il acquiert une familiarité intime avec le même régime qu'il aidera plus tard à détruire.

En 1939, il se joint à une unité de l'armée coloniale française. Tout au long de la Seconde Guerre mondiale, il participe à des campagnes importantes, dont la prise de la capitale du gouvernement de Vichy à Brazzaville, ainsi que le débarquement dans le sud de la France en 1944.

Au cours des décennies suivantes, la carrière militaire de Jean lui permet de parcourir le monde. Il part au Sénégal en vue de recevoir une formation d'officier, avant d'être expédié au Vietnam en 1950, où il participe à la Guerre d'Indochine. Là-bas, il épouse une fille vietnamienne et a un enfant avec elle avant de repartir en 1953, en pensant qu'il reviendra. Il ne sera pas de retour – les autorités françaises sont écrasées à Điện Biên Phủ, et la région tombe dans une guerre civile.

En 1959, Bokassa est de nouveau stationné auprès de son pays natal. Devenu officier de haut rang dans l'armée française, il a pourtant de plus grandes ambitions. En 1962, il quitte les Français et se joint aux côtés de la nouvelle armée de la République centrafricaine (RCA) indépendante, cette dernière ayant déclaré son indépendance deux ans plus tôt. En tant que militaire d'expérience et cousin du président David Dacko, il est chargé de bâtir la nouvelle armée de la RCA.

Toutefois, tous deux ne s'aiment pas vraiment, ce qui entraîne des différends immédiats. Les événements culminent à la veille du Nouvel An 1965, lorsque Bokassa orchestre un coup d'État et renverse Dacko, devenant par la suite le nouveau président de la RCA le jour du Nouvel An 1966.

Bokassa est à la tête d'un régime répressif. Il suspend la constitution et dissout l'Assemblée nationale, affirmant qu'une menace communiste doit être examinée avant le retour à la normale. Simultanément, son anti-communisme est accompagné d'une rhétorique étrangement communiste, disant :

La bourgeoisie de la classe privilégiée est abolie. Une ère nouvelle d'égalité entre tous est instaurée.

Cette incertitude persiste tout au long du règne de Bokassa. Personne ne peut être sûr autour de ses décisions. Il fait exécuter plusieurs de ses rivaux politiques, survit à moult tentatives de coups d'État et évite de justesse d'autres tentatives d'assassinat. Lui-même se proclame président à vie en 1972, et solidifie entièrement son régime despotique en se préparant à se déclarer Empereur.

Le sacre de Napoléon Ier de France, une cérémonie que Bokassa tenta d'imiter.

La République centrafricaine devient l'Empire centrafricain en 1975. Bokassa commence à préparer une cérémonie ébouriffante de couronnement. Peut-être qu'il passait son temps à lire sur les empereurs des siècles passés, et qu'il voulait quelque chose de comparable à Napoléon.

Bokassa n'épargne aucune dépense pour sa cérémonie de couronnement. Il invite plusieurs dirigeants mondiaux à assister à la cérémonie, mais aucun n'accepte, le jugeant probablement comme fou.

Fidèle à sa révérence pour l'histoire, Bokassa est sacré empereur le 4 décembre 1977. Sa cérémonie de couronnement est presque une reconstitution exacte du sacre de Napoléon, le 2 décembre 1804. Évidemment, elle coûte énormément d'argent : 20 millions de dollars, l'équivalent de 80 millions de dollars actuels. L'Empire centrafricain n'est point une nation riche, et cette dépense représente au total un quart de son revenu annuel.

Bokassa a une couronne incroyablement ornée et bordée de bijoux, qui coûte à elle seule 2 500 000 dollars. D'autres vêtements et bijoux somptueux sont spécialement conçus pour la cérémonie de sacre.

Les Français offraient à la RCA une aide financière importante, ce qu'ils arrêtent d'offrir à l'Empire de Bokassa après ces dépenses insensées et mégalomanes. Sa popularité auprès du peuple, de l'armée et du gouvernement chute. Dans les médias étrangers, on le représente d'une manière générale comme étant fou, ne suivant pas les règles et possesseur d'un complexe divin.

Le drapeau impérial de l'Empire centrafricain

En 1979, les atrocités de Bokassa atteignent un point critique auprès d'un certain nombre d'élèves du primaire, qui protestent contre le coût de l'uniforme dont ils ont besoin, avec l'image de Bokassa collée dessus. Bokassa ordonne de les tuer, et même arrive en personne, muni d'une canne pour battre certains d'entre eux à mort. Un tollé international pousse les Français à envahir le pays, restaurer l'ancienne République et ramener le président Dacko au pouvoir.

Bokassa s'enfuit en exil, avant de retourner vers la République en 1986, où il est arrêté sur-le-champ. On le juge pour de nombreux crimes et ses atrocités au pouvoir, et il est condamné à l'égard de plusieurs chefs d'accusation (mis à part le cannibalisme), y compris la trahison, le meurtre et le détournement de fonds.

En 1993, une amnistie générale permet à Bokassa de sortir de prison. Il meurt chez lui en 1996, à l'âge de 75 ans.

Certes, Bokassa apporta pour son pays un peu de stabilité et de sécurité ; mais cela ne suffit pas pour compenser ses atrocités et ses méthodes répressives, ainsi que ses dépenses insensées et mégalomanes.

Questions similaires

Quel est le leader le plus compétent qui est détesté par beaucoup de gens ?
Qui est le leader politique le plus dur au monde aujourd'hui ?
Qui est le pire leader au monde actuellement et pourquoi ?
Quels sont les futurs grands leaders de ce monde ?
Qui est le plus grand dirigeant au monde ? Pourquoi ?
Qui est le leader le plus barbare du monde ces dernières années ?
Qui est la personne la plus détestée dans votre pays ?

Quel est le trait le plus important pour quelqu'un qui veut devenir le leader d'une nation?

Qui est considéré comme le plus grand leader de l'histoire mondiale ?
Quel est le pays le plus détesté dans le monde ?

Would France have come to this (strikes, crisis, shortage…) if it had not been driven out of Mali and CAR and had not tried to bring the Russian economy to its knees?

Philippe Fabré

Commerce International - Southeast Asia, China, India, Japan Oct. 19

There are Africans who should stop worrying…. They are not the center of the world… And France in no way depends on Africa to conduct its business!

I do not see how leaving Mali would affect the current strikes, crisis, shortages. It just has nothing - absolutely nothing - to do with it!

So, you, our African friends, take care of feeding your crowds and protecting your elites from the attacks of the Islamists, otherwise they will soon take power in your countries!

As for the sanctions against Russia, you really don't understand anything… There is an economic war against Russia to prevent it from being a real war. And in the end, the Russian economy is collapsing!

So take care of the ECOWAS sanctions instead…

Similar questions

What would the world be like if Nazi Germany had never lost the war?

If France decided to move geopolitically closer to Russia and move away from the United States, what would that bring to it and what would it change in your opinion?

Is France prosperous because of colonization? If colonization had never taken place, what would France look like?

France is the biggest predator in Africa and has long been seen through. France was for a long time only an average regional power in Europe. Why are they still so influential in Africa?

If Hitler had been satisfied only with half of Poland, Holland, Scandinavian countries, Sudetes and if he had not attacked France and Russia. How would the world be now?

Is the battle for Africa being lost for France and Europe, to the benefit of the

COUNTRY FACT FILE

Location
In the central Africa

Official title of the state
Central African Republic – Also abbreviated as CAR (English)
Republique Centrafricaine (French)

Flag description:
Four equal horizontal bands of blue (top), white, green, and yellow with a vertical red band in center; a yellow five-pointed star to the hoist side of the blue band; banner combines the Pan-African and French flag colors; red symbolizes the blood spilled in the struggle for independence, blue represents the sky and freedom, white peace and dignity, green hope and faith, and yellow tolerance; the star represents aspiration towards a vibrant future.

Neighbours
Chad on N, Cameroon on W, Congo and the Congo on S, Sudan on E.
Land boundaries; total 5,203 km. Border countries; Cameroon 797 km, Chad 1197 km, The Congo 1577 km, Congo 467 km, South Sudan 1165 km.

Founder of The Nation
Barthelem Boganda/David Dacko

Local division
14 prefectures

Government type
Republic - Semi-presidential

Legislation chamber
Unicameral - National Assembly

Form of State
A multi-party Republic with one legislative house.
President is Chief of State, elected for 5 year term, eligible for a 2nd term.
The National Assembly, 105 seats, members are elected by popular vote to serve for five - year terms.

Executive branch
Separated by chief of State and head of Government.

Executive President. President elected by popular vote to serve for five-year terms eligible for a second term. Head of government is to be appointed by the political party with parliamentary majority.

Former Rulers

1960 to 1966 David Dacko

1966 to 1979 Army Colonel Jean-Bedel Bokassa, later to be known in the name of Emperor Salah Nur when he converted to Islam/Emperor Bokassa (turned again to Catholicism).

1979 to 1981 David Dacko (briefly)
1981 to 1993 General Andre Kolingba
1993 to 2003 Angie-Felix Patassé
2003 – 2013 General Francois Bozize
2013 - Interim President Michel Djotodia (briefly)
2014 - Interim President Catherine Samba-

Panza Judicial chamber

Supreme Court, Constitutional Court.

Capital city
Bangui Altitude 369 mtrs/1210 ft
Geographic coordinates 4.22N , 18.35E. The capital of the Central African Republic, which abbreviated as CAR. Lies on the northern banks of the Ubangi-river. It was formerly a centre of the Ivory trade. Founded by the French in March 1889, served as an administrative center during the French colonial territory of Haut-Ubangi and later Ubangi-Shari, and continues to be the national capital of CAR.

Names of main towns
Berberati, Bouar, Bossangoa, Bangassou

Date of Independence
1st December, 1960.

Religions (Major)
Traditional beliefs 35%, Christian (Roman Catholic 25%, Protestant 25%), Muslim 15%. Note: traditionalist beliefs and practices strongly influence the Christian majority.

Main spoken languages
Sango (Lingua-franca), French (official)

Currency unit
African Franc (CFA)=100 Centimes

Area in Km2
622,984.00

Country area comparison in Africa
20 out of 55 states

Demographic terms ;-
Average annual population growth rate 2.149 %
Birth rate 36.79 births per 1,000 population
Death rate 15.3 deaths per 1,000 population
Average life expectancy ; 49.68 years
Male 48.45 years ; Female 50.95 years ;

Illiteracy rate (%)
Male: 35, Female: 65
Average per capita income
USD 700

Population density
7.2/km2

Urban population (%)
39

Contributor groups (%)
Farming, Fishing: 55, Industry: 20, Social service: 25

Main Export Items
Diamonds, Timber, Cotton, Coffee, Tobacco

Economy is based on Agriculture

Climate
Tropical savannah in the north. Equatorial in the south. The dry season run from November to March.

Extremes;
Lowest point; Oubangui River 335 meters.
Highest point; Mt. Ngaoui 1,420 meters.

Weather of the Capital city (Bangui) average annual temperature 25.4°c.

Altitude 369 mtrs/1210 ft
Hottest Month February 21-34oc
Coldest MonthJuly-Aug., 21-29oc
Driest Month December 5mm average Rf
Wettest Month July 226mm average Rf

Measures
Metric system

Time zone
1 hour ahead of GMT/UTC

Public holidays
January 1, March 29, May 1, 14, August 13, November 10, December 1, All Roman catholic holidays.

Ethnic groups
Baya 34, Banda 27%, Mandja 13%, Sara 10%, Mboum 7%, M'baka 4%, Yakoma 4%, others 2%.

Topographic & Environmental concern
Mostly rolling plateau average altitude 2,000 ft with rivers draining to the Congo and N to Lake Chad open well watered Savannah to the area, with an arid area in NE. and tropical rainforest in SW. Environment: tap water is not potable; poaching has diminished the country's reputation as one of the last great wildlife refuges; desertification; deforestation.

Economic Overview

Industry
Gold & diamonds mining, logging, brewing, textiles, foot-wears, assembly of Bicycles & Motor-cycles.

Chief crops
Coffee, cotton, manioc, yams, millet, bananas, tobacco: Timber logging.

Natural resources
Diamonds, Uranium, Timber, Gold, Oil reserve, water-resources.

Land in use (%)

Arable land: 3
Grassland: 5
Forest woods: 57
Other: 35

Marine
Coastline; None

Commercial Sea port:-
Central African Republic (CAR) is an inland state.

Development prospect;-
CAR economy is hampered by a lack of infrastructure and ineffective governance. The few international investors that have been willing to risk operating in the country have run into difficulties. Relations between the government and international mining houses have been fraught. French company Areva, which controls the uranium mine at Bakouma, announced in early November that it would suspend its operations for at least two years due to the Fukushima crisis's impact on the price of yellowcake. Areva executives maintain that minimal operations will be maintained in the interim. Mines minister Sylvain Ndoutingaï has plans to improve the management of the diamond industry, but it will be a complicated process due to corruption and the armed occupation of diamond-producing zones.

Urban residents complain about the lack of electricity and the lack of good roads, which exacerbate the impact of floods and sewerage problems. Rural residents often do not have even dilapidated infrastructure projects to criticize. In July, the government signed a $30m deal with the Chinese government to finance a 10MW power plant outside of Bangui in order to boost production for the capital city, which can be without electricity for weeks at a time. The European Union is the country's main provider of aid and Bangui hosted a donors' conference in June that led to commitments of $870m for the period covering 2011-2014. Donors and the International Monetary Fund are pressuring the government in Bangui to fight graft and conduct proper audits of government accounts. Scandals tied to the Société Centrafricaine des Télécommunications and the posts and

CHAD

National Flag and Emblem

Locator Map

TEXT HIGHLIGHTS: Diaries updates, key events, brief analysis and relating news articles in timeline

Overview & Diary Refreshes

The French extending their power in 1910, made Chad a territory of French equatorial African federation administered from Brazaville (Congo-B). Chad, formerly part of France's Central African colonial administration, became independent on 11 August 1960, although a large part of the north of the country remained under French military administration until 1964. Francois Tombalbaye, the leader of the PPT party, became President. He declared single party rule in 1963. In 1965 the National Front for the Liberation of Chad (FRONILAT), started a rebellion in the north and the east of the country claiming that the government was run solely in the interests of southerners. This set a persistent pattern in the country's politics of armed rebellions based on claims of ethno-regional bias in central government. At no time has the government in N'Djamena proven able to control the whole of the country's territory, in the face of a constant proliferation of armed insurgencies. In 1975 Tombalbaye was killed in an army coup led by General Felix Malloum, who assumed the Presidency. During the late 1970s and 1980s, Chad sought assistance from France to counter the FRONILAT insurgency, part of which was backed by Libya, who had effectively annexed the Aouzou strip in the far north of the country. In 1978 General Felix Malloum attempted to defuse the rebellion in the north by inviting the leader of an anti-Libyan FRONILAT faction, Hissène Habré, into the government. A three-year period of chronic instability ensued, as the different armed factions making up the government constantly clashed. Military interventions, first by Libya and then by a peacekeeping mission from the Organization of African Unity, were incapable of bringing stability. In June 1982 Habré's armed group took over N'djamena, effectively settling the prolonged battle for the control of the capital and for the Presidency. However, the armed dispute with Libya over the sovereignty of the Aouzou strip continued. Political negotiations over constitutional arrangements were cut short in 1989 when one of Habré's former security chiefs Idriss Deby launched a rebellion from the Darfur region of Sudan. He overthrew Habré in November 1990. A national conference was eventually convened in January 1993, but a new constitution was not approved until 1996. It was followed in the same year by presidential and multi-party legislative elections. Deby was confirmed as President, amid opposition claims of fraud. Further presidential and legislative elections took place in 2001 and 2002 respectively (both for 5-year terms). Amid many claims of fraud, Deby was re-elected and his party (the MPS) and its allies strengthened their position in parliament. In June 2005 an amendment was successfully passed by referendum to repeal the constitutional provision limiting the presidential mandate to two terms. Idriss Deby successfully stood for a third term as president in elections on 3 May 2006. The elections were boycotted by the main opposition parties. The 13 August Accord, signed in 2007 and facilitated by the European Union, was an agreement between the Chadian Government and the political opposition which aimed to build trust and establish a roadmap for democracy ahead of the presidential elections in April 2011. Meanwhile, armed rebellion continued. Rebel groups, primarily based in neighboring Sudan repeatedly staged attacks against the government of Chad, most notably in April 2006 and February 2008 where they succeeded in reaching the capital, N’Djamena. In January 2009 many of the disparate rebel groups came together to form the umbrella organization, The Union of Resistance Forces (UFR), led by Timane Erdimi. The UFR attacked again in May 2009, but these attacks were confined to East of Chad and the Chadian government is widely reported as having gained a firm victory.

History of violence due to the tensions between the Muslim North and the Christian South.

Most of the state is desert with a desert climate.

Former French colony.

Attained independence on the August 11,1960.

Headship since independence: Head of State

The proliferation of civil conflict in 2007 led to a state of emergency being called in 2008.

Mr. Francois Tombolbye (Ngarata) native from the southern part of Chad, a former schoolteacher & a trade unionist, elected as it's founder-president.

On 13th of April, 1975: A group of soldiers killed president Francois Tombolbye, who’s in his clan name known as "Ngarata", installed a military government headed by army General Felix Malloum. Indeed, Chad endured three decades of civil war, misrule and frequent intervention by France and Libya, rebellion broke out several times in it's northern part.

A Republic in North central Africa.

According to history Chad has long been one of the most active cross-roads of trade b/n the east, the tropical Africa and the trans-Sahara trade route to Tripoli. In the years to come, from 1883 to 1893 all the three kingdoms fell to the Sudanese adventurer Rabin Al- Zubayr, who was in turn pushed out by the French troops in 1900. The French extending their power in 1910, made Chad a territory of French equatorial African federation administered from Brazaville (Congo). It became a separate colony in 1920 and was made French overseas territory in 1946. Chad achieved it's independence in August 1960, with Mr. Francois Tombolbye a native from the southern part of Chad, a former schoolteacher & a trade unionist, elected as it's founder-president. A group of soldiers killed president Francois Tombolbye, known as Ngarata in his clan name, on the 13th of April,1975 and installed a military government headed by army General Felix Malloum. Indeed, endured three decades of civil war, misrule and frequent intervention by France and Libya, rebellion broke out several times in it's northern part. It's to be recalled that Chad solved it's border dispute with Libya upon Aouzou strip, the dispute has been settled in 1994 at the International Court of Justice (ICJ) at the Hague, the Netherlands, in favor of Chad, Libya left it to Chad. Chad had violent succession of leaders following the assassination of it's first president Francois Tombolbye (Ngarata).

Major Conflicts

Chadian Civil War

When: 1965-1979

Who: Rebellious factions (the most prominent being the National Liberation Front of Chad – FROLINAT) with support from Libya VS President Tombalbaye's government with support from the French.

Why: Started as a spontaneous peasant uprising in Guéra Prefecture in 1965. President Tombalbaye's one-party government was accused of favoring the Christian South over the central and Muslim North

Outcome: In 1975 President Tombalbaye was overthrown and killed and in 1979 rebel factions took over the capital and central authority collapsed Chad-Libya Conflict

When: 1978-1990 (sporadic interventions)

Who: Libyan forces with certain Chadian factions VS Libyan opponents (supported by the French Government)

Why: It is said President Gaddafi had ambitions to annex the Aouzou strip, which is claimed to be rich in uranium deposits

Outcome: Chadian forces, with French and US support, united against the Libyans and in 1994 an International Court of Justice decision found in favor of Chadian Sovereignty over the Aouzou region

Movement for Democracy and Justice (MDJT)

When: 1998-2003

Who: Chadian Rebel Forces VS Idriss Deby’s Government

Why: The MDJT was seeking to overthrow President Deby's Government in pursuit of change and democracy

Outcome: An agreement was signed in 2003 which ensured high-ranking positions for MDJT members

Civil War

When:2005-Present

Who: Chadian Government Forces VS Chadian rebel groups (United Front for Democratic Change, United Forces for Development and Democracy, Gathering of Forces for Change and the National Accord of Chad). The Conflict has also involved the Janjaweed and Sudanese forces

Why: In 2005 the constitution was changed to allow President Deby to run for a third term in office, which resulted in Deby having to reform his military and guard, encouraging opposition groups to grow.

Outcome: Ongoing After decades of internal conflicts, Chad had its first multi-party presidential election on May, 1996, that reaffirmed the incumbent president Colonel Idrisa Deby Itno into office as head of state, and had been affirmed himself repeatedly by sham elections since he came to power on the 2nd of December, 1990.

Side note: The International Court of Justice (ICJ) rules Senegal must try ex-Chad leader Hissene Habre immediately. The International Court of Justice has ruled that Senegal must begin proceedings to try Chad's former leader Hissene Habre "without delay". Otherwise, he should be extradited to face trial in Belgium, the court's legally binding ruling said. The 69 year old has been under house arrest since 2005 in Senegal, where he fled after being deposed. He denies charges of killing and torturing tens of thousands of his opponents. The charges relate from 1982, when Mr. Hissene Habre came to power in a coup, until he was ousted in 1990. The UN's highest court has been investigating whether he should be tried in Senegal or extradited to Belgium, after Senegal previously refused four extradition requests. President Macky Sall, who came to power in April, has indicated that he would be willing to prosecute Mr. Hesene Habre in a special tribunal. Amnesty International called on Senegal to abide by the ruling by the ICJ. "This is a victory for victims that's long overdue, and now it's high time the courts in Senegal delivered justice," said Michael Bochenek, Amnesty's law and policy program director. Dubbed "Africa's Pinochet", Mr Habre was first indicted in Senegal in 2000 - but the country's courts ruled at the time that he could not be tried there. His alleged victims then filed complaints under Belgium's universal jurisdiction law, which allows the country's judges to prosecute human rights offences committed anywhere in the world. In 2005, he was charged by Belgium with crimes against humanity and torture. There have been years of wrangling in Senegal over what to do about Mr. Habre. The government of former President Abdoulaye Wade changed its position on whether to try him several times - at one stage demanding international funding for a trial. Last year, it unexpectedly announced that it would repatriate Mr Habre to Chad, where a court in 2008 sentenced him to death in absentia for planning to overthrow the government. This plan was stopped following a plea from the UN, which feared he could be tortured on his return. The BBC's Mamadou Moussa Ba in the Senegalese capital, Dakar, says unlike its predecessor, the government of newly elected President Macky Sall has made it clear it wants Mr Habre to be tried in Senegal. Legal experts from the African Union are currently in Senegal to discuss how the trial could take place, he says. A BBC reporter says Mr Habre and his wife keep a low profile in Dakar and he lives in relative freedom - guarded by two security agents - and is occasionally seen at a mosque for Friday prayers. A 1992 Truth Commission in Chad accused Mr. Hissene Habre of being responsible for widespread torture and the death of 40,000 people during his eight-year rule. He was accused of carrying out a deliberate policy of terror to discourage any opposition. Survivors of torture say that, among other things, they were subjected to electric shocks, near-asphyxia and "supplice des baguettes", when their heads were squeezed between sticks.

Endnote: Senegal and the African Union (AU) agreed to set up a special tribunal to try Chad's former leader Hissene Habre. The 69-year-old has been under house arrest since 2005 in Senegal, where he fled after being deposed. He denies charges of killing and torturing tens of thousands of his opponents. The charges date from 1982, when Mr. Habre came to power in a coup, until he was ousted in 1990. "Through the agreement, we are setting the procedure by which the trial should take place," said Senegal's Justice Minister Aminata Toure after signing the agreement with African Union representative Robert Dossou in the capital, Dakar. The deal comes a month after the United Nations highest court, the International Court of Justice (ICC), passed a binding ruling that Senegal must begin proceedings to try Mr. Habre "without further delay... if it does not extradite him". Senegal has so far refused four extradition requests. President Macky Sall, who came to power in March, 2012 had indicated that he would be willing to prosecute Mr. Habre in a special tribunal.

Alioune Tine, president of the Dakar-based African Assembly for the Defense of Human Rights, said Senegal had moved "one step close to justice". "We're counting on Senegal and the African Union to move quickly now and to begin Mr. Habre's trial before even more survivors die," he said, in a statement released by Human Rights Watch. Dubbed "Africa's Pinochet", Mr. Habre was first indicted in Senegal in 2000 - but the country's courts ruled at the time that he could not be tried there. His alleged victims then filed complaints under Belgium's universal jurisdiction law, which allows the country's judges to prosecute human rights offences committed anywhere in the world. In 2005, he was charged by Belgium with crimes against humanity and torture. There have been years of wrangling in Senegal over what to do about Mr. Hissene Habre. The government of former President Abdoulaye Wade changed its position on whether to try him several times - at one stage demanding international funding for a trial. Last year, it unexpectedly announced that it would repatriate Mr. Habre to Chad, where a court in 2008 sentenced him to death in absentia for planning to overthrow the incumbent government. This plan was stopped following a plea from the UN, which feared he could be tortured on his return. Mr. Habre and his wife have kept a low profile in Dakar where he has lived in relative freedom, guarded by two security agents. He has occasionally been seen at a mosque for Friday prayers. A 1992 Truth Commission in Chad accused Mr. Habre of being responsible for widespread torture and the death of over 40,000 people during his eight-year rule. He was accused of carrying out a deliberate policy of terror to discourage any opposition. Survivors of torture say that, among other things, they were subjected to electric shocks, near-asphyxia and "supplice des baguettes", when their heads were squeezed between sticks.

Accession to power of president Colonel Idrisa Deby Itno -2nd December, 1990 by coup/sham elections.

Tentative election calendar- Parliamentary, May.

Chad – Timeline Diaries updates, and related key notes:

1883-93 - Sudanese adventurer Rabih al-Zubayr conquers the kingdoms of Ouadai, Baguirmi and Kanem-Bornu, situated in what is now Chad.

1900 - France defeats al-Zubayr's army.

1913 - French conquest of Chad completed: Chad becomes a colony within French Equatorial Africa.

1946 - Chad becomes a French overseas territory with its own territorial parliament and representation in the French National Assembly.

1960 - Chad becomes independent with a southern Christian, Francois Tombolbye later known as Ngarta, as founder president.

1963 - The banning of political parties triggers violent opposition in the Muslim north, led by the Chadian National Liberation Front, or FROLINAT.

1966 - Northern revolt develops into a fully-fledged guerrilla warfare.

1973 - French troops help put down the northern revolt, but FROLINAT continues guerrilla operations throughout the 1970s and 1980s with the help of weapons supplied by Libya.

1975 –President Francois Tombalbaye deposed and killed in coup led by another Christian southerner General Felix Malloum.

1977 - Libya annexes the northern Chadian Aouzou strip.

1979 – General Felix Malloum forced to flee the country: a coalition government headed by a Muslim northerner, Goukouni Oueddei, assumes power.

1980 - Libya sends in troops to support Goukouni Oueddei in his fight against the Army of the North, led by a former prime minister, Hissene Habre.

1981 - Libyan troops withdraw at Goukouni Oueddei's request.

1982 – Hissene Habre seizes power. He is later accused of mass political killings during his rule.

1983 - The Organization of African Unity recognizes Hissene Habre's government, but Oueddei's forces continue resistance in the north with Libyan help.

1987 - The combined troops of FROLINAT and the Chadian Government, with French and US assistance, force Libya out of the entire northern region apart from the Aouzou strip and parts of Tibesti.

1990 – Hissene Habre toppled by former ally, Colonel Idris Deby Itno.

1993 - National democracy conference sets up a transitional government with Deby as interim president and calls for free elections within a year.

1994 - International Court of Justice (ICC) rejects Libyan claims on Aouzou and rules that Chad had sovereignty over the strip.

1996 – Idris Deby Itno wins Chad's first multi-party presidential election.

1997 – Idris Deby's Patriotic Salvation Movement triumphs on legislative elections.

1998 - The Movement for Democracy and Justice in Chad, led by Deby's former Defense Minister, Youssouf Togoimi, begins armed rebellion against the government.

July 17, 2000 Rebels from the MDJT (Movement for Democracy and Justice in Chad) attacked the town of Bardia (2,000 kilometers north of the capital.). The garrison consists of a thousand members of the Presidential Guard. The rebels claim they killed 240 soldiers.

July 19, 2000 Army troops caught a column of rebels 20 kilometers from Bardia and, according to the government, killed a hundred of them. The rebels warn that they will attack Bardia again.

July 20, 2000 The government said the losses in the battle at Bardia were 57 rebels and 13 soldiers dead, with another 23 soldiers wounded. The government pointed out that the rebels retreated from the city after their attack.

July 29, 2000 It looks like yet another round of chaotic civil war is getting started in Chad. An eleven year civil war ended in the mid 1990s. That war was a complicated affair, with fourteen major factions, and the factions changed sides frequently. In the beginning there were three separate rebellions. The civil war ended with several of the factions taking control of the government. But all was not peaceful. The factions were largely based on ethnic affiliation. But there eleven major ethnic groups (divided into nearly 200 tribes, clans and distinct groups, 127 different languages are spoken) in Chad. There many small, and feisty, nomad tribes. Those in the north are the most combative and in October, 1998, the defense minister, Youssouf Togoimi, formed the MDJT (Movement for Democracy and Justice in Chad) and began a civil war based in the northern mountains and deserts. Fighting has been low level until 2000. As of early 2000, the rebels claim control of the villages of Yebbi Bou, Zouar, Zoumri and Miski in the northern border region called Tibesti. This was the same area where the 1979-1990 civil war began. At that time the rebels were supported by Libya, which claimed parts of northern Chad. This time, the outside support appears to come from Sudan. But it could be coming from other sources as well. Chad has been sitting on oil fields for over thirty years, waiting for a pipeline to be built so the oil could be exported. A pipeline is under construction, via Cameroon.

August 10, 2000 In the south, a small rebel group, the National Salvation Committee for Peace and Democracy (CNSPD), announced that it had renounced the July 17 ceasefire agreement with the government. Several hours after this, CNSPD attacked a truck full of people, killing two, wounding six, and stealing some $8,500 from the passengers. The CNSPD operates around the oil fields in the south and is sometimes difficult to tell the difference between rebels and bandits.

September 11, 2000 The main rebel group, the MDJT, has offered to enter into peace talks with the government, but only if all opposition groups were involved.

September 25, 2000 The Libyan government has denied reports of Libyan mobs attacking illegal migrants from sub-Saharan Africa. The dispute is over unemployment, with locals blaming illegal migrants of taking jobs.

October 6, 2000 About a hundred Chadians returned from Libya, fleeing a government campaign of terror against illegal immigrants from sub-Saharan Africa. The refugees told of murderous attacks on black Africans, with at least 130 killed and many more wounded by civilian mobs. Libyan police are gathering the black Africans into camps to protect them from the violence and to make it easier to ship them out of the country. Thousands of black Africans from other nations were also fleeing Libya, telling the same story. Nigeria has had 3,600 of it's citizens return. Some 500,000 Chadians live in Libya, and 500,000 from other sub-Saharan nations. Libya looked the other way as black Africans illegally entered the nation seeking work. This was done to improve relations with black African nations. But the shortage of jobs in Libya caused young Libyans to become violent and expel the illegals.

October 10, 2000 Chadian refugees report that violence against Chadians in Libya continues, with 40 Chadians dead and 150 missing in northwestern Chad.

October 26, 2000 The MDJT claims that they have clashed with government troops in the far north and killed fifty of them, and wounded many others.

October 30, 2000 The MDJT claimed 77 government soldiers, including two officers, have defected to their group. They also claimed that the Minister of Information also defected, but this was later denied by the minister in question.

November 3, 2000 Rebels dismiss government claims of progress in retaking towns in the north. Rebels also claim that the government is buying weapons using World Bank loans (for economic development.) The government also claims that its troops attacked a rebel convoy carrying food and fuel from Libya, and destroyed 16 vehicles.

November 22, 2000 Recent tribal disputes (over cattle grazing land) in central Chad have left over fifty dead. The Chad president has gone to the area to try and mediate the dispute. The two Arab tribes have long been arguing over the land and water resources in the semi-desert area.

November 27, 2000 It was revealed that a Cameroonian presidential helicopter was shot down over Chad on October 18. The Cameroonian president was not aboard. It is felt that the attack was made by rebels trying to derail a Chad-Cameroon oil pipeline being built for the export of Chad oil. The increased oil revenue could provide more military muscle for use against the rebels.

December 5, 2000 Chad's government finances are watched by the World Bank, a condition for receiving World Bank loans. It was recently discovered that the government was trying to get around these agreements by transferring $4.1 million to military spending. The government is eager to beef up the military so they can deal with a rebellion in the north. Rebels first made this claim, causing the World Bank to look into the matter and confirm the transfer.

December 18, 2000 In the southeast, FNTR (Renewed Chad National Front) rebels claim to have ambushed troops, Eight soldiers were killed and three wounded. The FNTR has some 400 armed fighters. The rebels claim that soldiers commit atrocities against local civilians.

December 20, 2000 The MDJT rebels claim 63 soldiers dead, as well as seven rebels, in an ambush in the north.

December 22, 2000 Fighting broke out again in the north. The government claims 127 MDJT rebels were killed and nine captured.

December 29, 2000 The government claimed they ambushed a rebel column in the north, destroying 30 vehicles and at least one rebel commander. The rebels gave a different story, claiming to have killed 234 soldiers and destroyed 17 vehicles. The only sure thing is that there is a lot of fighting going on in the north.

December 31, 2000 Rebels claim that in the last two weeks of fighting in the north, they have killed 413 government troops, including 40 officers. Rebels also claimed that one of the dead officers was general Kerim Nassour, who is in charge of security for the president.

January 22, 2001 The president has threatened to launch a major military offensive in the north if the rebels there do not cease attacks and negotiate. Fighting has been heavy of late, with rebels claiming 400 soldiers killed and the government claiming 127 rebels dead. The situation is further complicated by some of the rebels finding refuge across the border in Libya with members of the same ethnic group.

February 7, 2001 Despite promises from Libya to halt support for Chadian rebels, president Deby traveled to Libya to meet with Libyan Kadhafi. The main rebel group in northern Chad is from the Toubou tribe, members of which live on both sides of the border between Chad and Libya. Kadhafi has long taken a hands off approach to the Toubou operations in Chad in order to prevent Toubou unrest in Libya. Thus it is easier for Libya to say it will crack down on the Toubou than to actually do it.

March 5, 2001 New elections have been announced for May. In Senegal, the former dictator Hissene Habre is being prosecuted for atrocities (40,000 killed) during his time as leader of Chad. Both events may have an impact on the enthusiasm of various current rebel movements in Chad.

March 26, 2001The MDJT claimed that a clash with the army in the northwest, near the Niger border, left 47 soldiers and 15 rebels dead. Although Libya has said it is not supporting the rebels, there are several Moslem nations that are willing to do so. The civil wars in Chad have increasingly been more religious than ethnic in character. The northerners are largely Moslem, the southerners largely Christian.

April 16, 2001 The unrest brought about by the various rebellions is having ill effects in neighboring countries. Recently, nomads from Chad have been raiding into the Central African Republic. There has long been strife between the Chad nomads and farmers in neighboring countries. The drought conditions in Chad frequently send nomads into nearby farmlands for loot and water. Recent raids saw some of the nomads armed with AK-47s, in addition to the traditional bows and arrows. The years of rebellion have flooded the region with cheap AK-47s, and have made raiding more lethal.

May 10, 2001 Thousands of Chadians have moved across the border to live in the Central African Republic (CAR). While this got them away from civil war violence in Chad, it exposed them to the rampant banditry in the CAR. In the last month, some 60 Chadian farmers have been killed in bandit raids. CAR officials say the upsurge in violence is partially attributable to raids by Chadian nomads against CAR farmers. The CAR has been setting up military garrisons in the area, using money and weapons from France. But this is mostly to keep the bandits from raiding truck traffic on the roads.

2001 - Senegalese court rules that upholds ruling that former Chadian President Habre should not be made to stand trial in Senegal, where he is in exile. It decided that Senegal's courts do not have the jurisdiction to try Habre on torture charges during his eight years in power in Chad.

May 2001 – Idris Deby declared winner in controversial presidential poll.

May 16, 2001 The MDJT rebels in the north say the upcoming elections will be rigged and that they will continue their fight against the "dictator Deby." The president dismisses the rebels as "25 disgruntled former army officers." Both sides are right, but it's also a tribal war, with the northerners upset that the southerners (especially Deby's Zaghawa tribe.) There's also the religious angle: the north is Moslem, the south is Christian. And it's also a stalemate.

May 27, 2001 President Idris Deby won re-election with 67 percent of the vote. Voting monitors says there was fraud, but it's uncertain if there was enough fraud to change the outcome.

May 30, 2001 The government arrested losing opposition candidates (killing one in the process) and members of their staffs. Everyone was later released. The government said it made the arrests to prevent unrest by sore losers.

June 13, 2001 The courts have confirmed that president Deby won reelection with 63 percent of the vote. There were accusations of ballot stuffing, as 4.6 voters registered before the election, but the election commission announced that 5.56 million votes were cast. Police have kept voting observers away from the vote count.

June 14, 2001 Unrest continues as the six losing candidates in the May presidential election continue back demonstrations to accuse the president of election fraud. The six losing candidates have been arrested and released twice in the last four weeks. It's unclear if the election dispute will lead to more groups joining the armed rebellion against the government.

July 18, 2001 President Idris Deby has managed to keep things quiet despite the unrest over his disputed re-election. His defeated rivals have, so far, only threatened a campaign of civil disobedience.

July 19, 2001 Rebels claim they have carried out attacks 500 kilometers north of the capital, killing 86 troops in the process.

July 24, 2001 The government announced that troops had fought and destroyed a rebel unit. The action took place 500 kilometers north of the capital. Eight rebels and two soldiers died. Seven rebel vehicles were destroyed or captured (including six Toyota trucks equipped with 14.5mm machine-guns and a jeep with a 106m recoilless rifle. The government also denies earlier rebel claims of attacks in the area.

July 25, 2001 In a common pattern, rebels denied that the government has wiped out one of their units over the weekend. Moreover, the rebels claim that they have opened a new front in the northeast. This area is on the Sudan border and the rebels imply that they are able to obtain supplies and weapons via this frontier. Very few journalists travel to this region. Mainly because it's dangerous, and there are long periods of inactivity between newsworthy events.

September 5, 2001 The newly reelected president Deby offered to negotiate with rebel groups in the north. But The Political Action and Liaison Committee (CPAL), which represents opposition and rebel movements (the Movement for Unity and the Republic or MUR, the Chad National Front or FNT and the Movement for Democracy and Justice in Chad or MDJT, which has been fighting in the north for the last three years), rejected the offer and vowed to fight on until president Deby was out of power.

November 11, 2001 General Francois Bozize, a Central African Republic (CAR) rebel leader, fled to Chad on November 9th after a failed coup. CAR demands Bozize be arrested and returned. Chad refuses.

November 22, 2001 A new rebel group has shown up in the east. The Popular Convention of Resistance (CPR), and its combat component, the Popular Forces of Resistance (FPR), announced they have been fighting government troops and have killed nine. The government denies that there has been any fighting, or that the CPR actually exists.

November 24, 2001 CAR continues to demand that rebel General Francois Bozize be arrested and returned. Chad refuses.

November 27, 2001 Rebels from the Central African Republic, defeated in a recent coup attempt, crossed the border into Chad, where they were disarmed.

November 30, 2001 After 78 years, France has closed it's last base in Chad (in the southern city of Moundou.) Some French troops (reported to be about 900) will remain in the capital.

December 14, 2001 Chadian troops disarmed some 60 fighters loyal to CAR rebel Francois Bozize. Chad gave Bozize political asylum last month, after a failed coup attempt. CAR has long accused Chad of allowing Bozize to organize his rebel activities within Chad.

December 19, 2001 Chad has begun negotiating with CMAP, a coalition of 13 opposition parties and rebel groups. CMAP does not include the major armed group, the MDJT. Chadians are tried of decades of civil war and unrest.

December 21, 2001 Chadian MDJT rebels openly gathered and planned their next move in their war against the Chad government. The rebels are backed by Libya, which fears losing disputed territory in their common border. It is felt that the disputed territory contains valuable natural resources. Meanwhile, the CAR accused Chad of moving troops into CAR border territory. CAR also accuses Chad of giving refuge to CAR rebels and allowing the rebels to recruit on the border area.

December 24, 2001 In a peace conference hosted by Libya, Chad and the Central African Republic (CAR), war was averted. The CAR accused Chad of supporting CAR rebels. Libya has long provided troops to back up the CAR government against coup attempts by former government leaders.

December 25, 2001 Rebels in the north, the MDJT, have agreed to enter peace talks with the government. This was done at the urging of Libya leader Muammar Quadhafi, who has provided support for the rebels.

January 2, 2002 CAR (Central African Republic) soldiers raided across the border into Chad, killing for civilians and kidnapping eight others. The leader of the raiders was a Chadian rebel. The Chadian government protested and the CAR government is looking into the uneasy border situation.

January 4, 2002 Government and MDJT rebels began peace talks in Libya.

January 7, 2002 The government and the largest rebel group, MDJT, have signed a deal that provides for an immediate ceasefire, release of prisoners, rebel participation in the government and merger of some rebels into the armed forces. The deal was no doubt moved along by Libya, which provides bases and other support for MDJT. Libya has been cleaning up its act since the Cold War ended, getting out of the terrorism and support for sundry local rebellions business. The tribal based MDJT rebellion has been sputtering along at a low level since 1998.

January 31, 2002 The government and opposition parties have agreed to hold elections have been scheduled for April. There is still disagreement over a new census, as the opposition feels that the last one was rigged to keep the current government in power.

February 15, 2002 Despite ongoing negotiations with rebels, the government still runs a tight ship. On February 11th, a private radio station was closed down for three weeks because it covered the news in a "sensationalist manner" (it reported demonstrations over the death of a Chadian student in Cameroon.)

April 22, 2002 The president of the African Democratic Party (PDA), Gueti Mahamat, died on 22 April from injuries received when his car hit a mine on the 21st. Mahamat, a senior opposition figure, had been traveling between two polling stations on the road to Faya-Largeau airport. A second mine had been found nearby and defused. The north of Chad is littered with unexploded landmines dating from the 1973-94 border conflict between Chad and Libya. However, the incident is being described as a 'terrorist act and an investigation is underway. - Adam Geibel

April 23, 2002 The death of APA leader Mahamat threatens to unravel the network of peace deals between the government and various rebel groups. The ethnic and personal differences in Chad are always one misunderstanding away from a violent rebellion.

May 19, 2002 Factional differences within MDJT have led to one faction wounding and kidnapping the leader of another faction (Adoum Togoi, a former ambassador to Libya.)

May 22, 2002 Chadian diplomats in Libya nervously watched as MDJT rebels moved into a building across the street from the Chadian consulate in Libya. Chad protested to the Libyan government, which did nothing. Libya is supporting peace talks between MDJT and Chad, but one faction in MDJT is pushing for an MDJT man to be head of the Chadian government and the government won't go for that.

May 29, 2002 MDJT reported that their men clashed with the army in the north earlier in the week, leaving 60 soldiers and four rebels dead. The government admits that there was some fighting, but did not mention casualties. This would be the first breech of the ceasefire signed last January. The rebels say the army attacked an MDJT base, while the government says the rebels attacked an army supply convoy. The latter sounds more likely, as the MDJT has been divided by factional differences since April. This has stalled peace talks. MDJT was founded by northerners who had been on the losing side of an earlier civil war.

June 6, 2002 One of the smaller rebel groups, the FNTR (about 400 armed rebels) has announced that they are giving up their six year struggle. The FNTR operated in the eastern part of Chad, but was not as active as the MDJT. The government has been negotiating, and making concessions, with FNTR leaders for some time.

June 24, 2002 Responding to the complaints of the rebel groups, the government has replaced a number of senior officials and appealed to Libya to help keep the negotiations going with MDJT.

August 6, 2002 Some 20 CAR (Central African Republic) soldiers were killed on the Chad border when they were attacked by Chadian soldiers. Two of the Chad soldiers died as well. The Chad troops were seeking revenge for attacks on Chad herders. For years, the border region has been the scene of range wars and disputes over grazing rights. Some of the fighting also involved bandits and tribal unrest.

August 25, 2002 A team of observers from the Economic and Monetary Community of Central Africa (CEMAC) went to the Chad/CAR border and reported that they found no evidence of fighting or troops illegally crossing the border.

August 28, 2002 Central African Republic (CAR) Prime Minister Martin Ziguele told the UN on 26 August that Chadian troops with ground-to-ground missiles, tanks and heavy artillery had penetrated 11 miles into his country on 6 August. Chadian units wound up attacking CAR government troops, although the results of this encounter are unknown. On 14 August, the summit set up a commission to visit the area and to ascertain what had happened. The commission has yet to submit its findings. Chad wants Abdoulaye Miskine (a Chadian who has been living in CAR since 1998) handed over or removed from the border area from which he has been mounting cross-border raids. Meanwhile, the CAR wants the fugitive general and former armed forces chief of staff Francois Bozize (exiled to Chad) for questioning about a failed coup. Bozize's supporters allegedly attacked the CAR town of Kabo, about 40 miles south of the Chad border. - Adam Geibel

September 6, 2002 Two MDJT leaders were killed when by a land mine in northern Chad. There have been other land mine casualties recently. The rebels blame the government for laying the mines, but the government says they are rebel mines. The MDJT and the government have been at peace since the beginning of the year, but northern Chad is still swarming with armed rebels and troops.

September 18, 2002 Back in the 1980s, Libya invaded Chad and got severely beat up by the more capable Chadian warriors. Some 2000 Libyans were captured and 350 of those accepted a US offer to join a secret Libyan rebel movement. The CIA brought the men to the US, granted them refugee status and trained them, but the US back rebels were never used. Relations improved with Libya and now there has been an agreement to allow the CIA backed Libyans to return to Libya. Not all want to, but some do. The first batch of 24 Libyans have returned home individually over the last few months.

September 24, 2002 MDJT rebel leader Youssouf Togoimi died, in Libya, of wounds suffered last month. Chad saw this a major chance to make peace with the MDJT, as Togoimi had long been seen as the major opponent to a peace deal.

October 1, 2002 Central African Republic (CAR) authorities officially denied that Libyan troops stationed in CAR since the May 2002 uprising had attacked Chad. The statement came after AFP reported that Libya was preparing to repatriate its troops from CAR. Relations between CAR and Chad have been troubled since November 2001, when former CAR Army Chief of Staff General Francois Bozize and his supporters fled to Chad after fighting broke out in CAR's capital Bangui. A Libyan detachment had been in Bangui since then. Clashes have been reported in the border localities of Kabo, Batangafo and Moyenne Sido in CAR, as well as in Sido and Tissi in Chad. During the night of 19-20 September, fighting broke out along the CAR-Chad common border, in the Chadian village of Tizi. The Chadians claimed to have killed one attacker, wounded another and captured more, who said they had come from the Central African town of Birao (about 600 miles north east of the capital, Bangui and close to the Sudan border). CAR army chief of staff General Ernest Betibangui denied his troops involvement and attributed the attack to Sudanese poachers, reputed for their violence in the region. CAR military authorities claim that the region is being devastated by Sudanese poachers, who disguise themselves as cattle herders and then attack villages: killing, burning and looting. The Sudanese embassy in CAR considers the conflict to simply be a dispute among rival tribes. The CAR deployed a military detachment to Gordil (600 miles northeast of Bangui), but the poachers always avoid military patrols. On 26 September, the Africa Rainforest and River Conservation (ARRC, a group of US conservationists) received permission from the CAR government to recruit and train an anti-poaching militia of 400 local men, to patrol 56,000 square miles of wilderness in the eastern region. This ridiculously small group will be authorized to shoot poachers and drive out marauding Sudanese poachers who are destroying the region's wildlife and terrorizing villagers. According to a National Geographic report, each year columns of up to 200 well-armed Sudanese poachers cross the border in pursuit of game animals no longer found in Sudan. After dividing into smaller groups, the poachers set fires to flush out animals, then shoot them and smoke the meat. Populations of elephants, giraffes, crocodiles, and lions have been reduced by more than 95 percent in the area, which was once known as the Serengeti of Central Africa. - Adam Geibel

October 3, 2002 CARs neighbors have agreed to send 300 to 350 Gabonese, Cameroonian, Congolese, Equatorial Guinean and Malian peacekeepers to the CAR to maintain order along the Chad border.

October 7, 2002 Libya has called on the Chadian MJDT rebels to cease their fighting and make peace. In the past, Libya provided sanctuary and bases for the MJDT. But the MJDT rebellion is based on tribal rivalries as much as politics.

October 13, 2002 The government said troops in the northeast had killed 51 MDJT rebels and captured 26. The rebels say they killed 40 troops and lost only four of its own men.

October 15, 2002 In the northeast, two days of fighting left 78 soldiers dead and 15 captured by MDJT rebels. But the government reported the action as resulting in 123 dead rebels and 63 captured for only two dead soldiers. There was no way to confirm who was more accurate because the action took place in a desolate and isolated area 880 kilometers from the capital.

October 27, 2002 MDJT say they have killed many troops in the north. The ANR rebels claim to have killed over a hundred government troops in the east.

October 29, 2002 The CAR government has accused Chad of supporting the current rebellion in CAR, but Chad denies it.

October 31, 2002 The government claimed that rebels in the Central African Republic (CAR) had killed up to 120 Chadians near the CAR capital. Nearly ten per-cent of CARs four million population are migrants from Chad.

November 6, 2002 Chad moved troops around on the Central African Republic (CAR) border, fearful that someone in CAR might try and damage the oil fields in southern Chad. The oil will eventually bring the government $100 million a year, which represents the majority of the export income. CAR officials claim that much of the Chad oil being pumped actually lies in deposits under CAR territory. The current civil war civil war in CAR is thought to be partly over economic issues, like which tribe controls the money from oil fields. The same situation is present in Chad, with the northerners upset that they are not getting their fair share of the oil from the southern fields.

November 8, 2002 The ANR (National Resistance Army) rebels claim to have killed 87 government troops in a battle near an ANR base 30 kilometers from the Sudan border. The rebels took one prisoner, and captured 109 rifles and pistols as well as ammunition. The ANR also claims to have seized the town of Adre (near the Sudan border) last week, killing some one hundred soldiers and capturing about as many. What's odd about this is that the ANR has not been seen for years, and suddenly there they are again. Elsewhere in the north, the MDJT rebels say 23 government soldiers defected to the rebel cause.

November 16, 2002 Rebel group FROLINAT (Forces of National Organizations for Alternance and Liberty in Chad) announced that they killed 166 troops in two battles in the eastern part of the country. FROLNAT also claimed to have taken 28 prisoners and seized vehicles and weapons. The rebels accused the troops of destroying nine villages.

November 29, 2002 The government is denying rebel claims this month, but no journalists have dared venture into the areas where the fighting is said to have taken place. These are dangerous parts of the country, where banditry is a favorite pastime and there are a lot of guns in circulation.

January 9, 2003 The exiled leader of the ANR rebels signed a peace deal with the government and is returning to Chad.

January 9, 2003 The exiled leader of the ANR rebels signed a peace deal with the government and is returning to Chad.

January 21, 2003 Nigeria says it suspects Chadian rebels are operating as bandits some 600 kilometers from the Chad border. An attack today left three civilian bus passengers dead. The ceasefire in Chad has apparently led many of the rebel groups to turn to banditry.

January 22, 2003 Skirmishing continues in the north with MDJT rebels, despite a ceasefire signed last year.

January 27, 2003 Chad and Sudan agreed to form a joint security force to maintain peace along their common border. The two countries also agreed to work with the Central African Republic (which is currently distracted by civil disorder) to keep the peace along their mutual borders.

March 19, 2003 The government sent a hundred troops to the Central African Republic to act as peacekeepers

March 27, 2003 MDJT rebels say they killed at least 70 soldiers, and wounded another hundred, in three days of fighting in the north. The rebels say they were defending villages from army attack. The government has not responded.

March 29, 2003 MDJT suffered a major blow when 176 of their fighters quit and joined the army. April 4, 2003 Disillusioned with infighting, and years of unproductive violence, three senior leaders of the MDJT rebels have surrendered. MDJT founder Youssouf Togoimi died last September, and this has led to infighting among MDJT factions. The latest surrender may lead to the groups collapse.

September 10, 2003 Fighting flared up as MDJT rebels claim to have seized Bardai airport (near the Libyan border), and killed 35 soldiers in the process. Rebels say they will take a nearby military base as well. The government denies that they have lost control of the airport. Bardai is the government's main military base in the north. The MDJT, which is mainly composed of Toubou tribesmen, has been supported by Libya and have been fighting since 1998.

December 14, 2003 After months of negotiations, the government has arranged a peace deal with the MDJT rebels. There is an immediate ceasefire, amnesty for MDJT fighters and high ranking government jobs for some of the MDJT leaders. The MDJT rebellion has been going on since 1998 and is partly tribal (most MDJT rebels belong to the Toubou tribe) and partly Libya providing weapons, training and money for the rebels. Libya was forced by international pressure to back off, but the Toubous still felt they were not getting a fair shake. The war was prolonged by factionalism within the Toubou. This problem was solved after some dissident Toubou leaders were killed recently.

December 15, 2003 The major problem for the government now is the 65,000 refugees from fighting in western Sudan. Among the refugees are hundreds of armed men who are either Sudanese rebels, bandits or both.

March 11, 2004 Government troops cornered and fought with a large group of armed Islamic radicals who had entered the country from Niger. After two days of fighting, 43 Islamic radicals were killed (including nine Algerians, plus others from Niger, Nigeria and Mali.) Five of the Islamic radicals were captured, including one Chadian. Several trucks, some equipped with machine-guns, were captured, as well as other weapons and satellite phones. An unknown number of the Islamic radicals escaped and are being tracked and pursued. The army lost three dead and 18 wounded.

March 15, 2004 American military transports flew in 19 tons of supplies form Chadian troops operating on the Niger border against armed Islamic radicals.

March 22, 2004 Senior military officers from Algeria, Chad, Mali, Mauritania, Morocco, Niger, Senegal and Tunisia are meeting in Germany with American military officials. The discussions are about how to deal with terrorism and Islamic radical groups in west and northern Africa. Mali and Mauritania have received help in training their troops for counter-terrorist operations. The US has had its Special Forces troops visit most of the other nations to compare notes with local police and military officials on anti-terrorism matters. Algerian based terrorist organizations have been driven from their south Algeria bases into the border area with Mali, and then across Mali into Niger and Chad. Apparently the rebels were tracked along the way by American reconnaissance aircraft and satellites, and locations provided to local police and army units. The Algerian Islamic radicals received millions of dollars in ransom from Germany for the release of German, and other European, tourists last year. The money is being spent to buy weapons and equipment, and recruit young men to their Islamic radical cause. The recruiting is going throughout the largely Moslem Sahel (the belt of semi-arid land just south of the Sahara desert.) Offering young Moslem guys from the African outback guns, gadgets, a chance to travel and go kill strangers while on a Mission From God, is a pretty attractive recruiting pitch. It sure beats herding goats or subsistence farming.

April 11, 2004 The government helped the Sudanese and rebels agree to a 45 day truce, that expires on June 2nd. Chad wants peace in Darfur, because thousands of refugees are crossing into Chadian territory and the government does not want the extra people and the political problems they bring with them.

April 21, 2004 Chad hosted peace talks between Sudan and the two Darfur (west Sudan) rebel groups (the Sudan Liberation Army and the Justice and Equality Movement). The truce in Darfur is being largely ignored by Sudanese government backed Arab tribal militias.

May 1, 2004 In the last week, Chadian border troops, Sudanese refugees and Chadian villagers came under attack by hundreds of armed Sudanese tribesmen. The armed Sudanese belonged to one of the Sudanese government backed Arab militias organized to drive black Sudanese tribes from their farming and grazing lands, so that the Arab tribes could occupy the land. There were several dozen casualties. Over 100,000 of the displaced Sudanese have fled into thinly populated northeastern Chad. This are does not have many people because there's not much water. There is plenty of sand and heat. Sudan has promised to work with Chad to prevent such incursions in the future. It is thought that the Sudanese militias were armed by the Sudanese government, and then just turned loose on their black Sudanese neighbors. When the Sudanese government says it does not control the militias, there's quite a bit of truth to that.

May 13, 2004 It was revealed today that MDJT rebels in northern Chad had, on March 16th, captured 16 of the Algerian GSPC Islamic terrorists who had escaped an ambush by the Chadian army. Actually, 11 of the GSPC captives are Algerian, the other five Nigerian. The ambush left over three dozen GSPC members, and eight Chadian soldiers, dead. The MDJT contacted the United States, France, Algeria, Germany and Nigeria about the captives, but no one wanted to negotiate lest the Chad government be offended.

May 15, 2004 The MDJT, a rebel group (which is largely composed of men from the Toubou tribe) that has been fighting the Chad government since 1998, is the sole remaining rebel group in Chad. The founder of the MDJT, who used to be Defense Minister under the current president of Chad, was killed by a land mine last year. The new MDJT leader made peace with the Chad government in late 2003. But a hard line wing of the party, continued to fight. The MDJT resistance is currently fairly low key, with only a few major battles in the last six months. The Chad government is hoping that the withdrawal of Libyan support for MDJT will cause the rebels to make a deal with the government. After decades of civil war, the central government has made peace with all the other rebel groups. Chad has dozens of major tribes, each speaking a different language or dialect. The last two decades has seen several episodes of civil war in Chad as various combinations of tribes tried to control the country. The Chad government cooperated with the United States in tracking down and destroying the GSPC group, and now expects to take the lead in any negotiations with the MDJT over the release of the GSPC prisoners. But the MDJT wants some benefit for turning over the GSPC captives, and the United States does not want to anger the Chad government by dealing directly with the MDJT.. It's possible that the US has sent commandoes and special operations intelligence forces into northern Chad to help the Chad government capture the MDJT fighters holding the GSPC men. Something has to be done, lest al Qaeda, which has long been associated with GSPC, raise a suitable ransom for the GSPC captives. At that point, the MDJT would simply announces that the GSPC men have "escaped." Something will have to happen soon, as those GSPC captives have long been involved in al Qaeda related terrorism and hold many secrets of what al Qaeda has been up to over the last few years.

May 19, 2004 The German government says that the Chad government has arrested two senior Algerian GSPC leaders, including top man Ammari Saifi. How the Chad government got the men from the MDJT was not disclosed. It is expected that large sums of money played a role, as cash has worked in the past.

May 20, 2004 In the capital, the presidential guard prevented a rebellion by an army unit that was under investigation for corruption. The government has discovered an infantry battalion where the officers had nearly a hundred "ghost soldiers" (men who did not exist, and the officers collected their pay). Over a hundred officers and troops were involved in the scam, and they tried to kill the president when it was apparent that their racket was exposed.

May 25, 2004 The government cannot afford to keep a lot of troops on the Sudanese border. The army only has 25,000 troops, plus about 4,000 national police. There is a shortage of transportation (trucks) and money. There is little infrastructure on the Sudanese border, thus the government can't even buy many supplies and hire trucks along most of the border.

June 6, 2004 Algeria apparently bought, from the MDJT rebels, rebel leader Amari Saifi, known as El-Para and the second in command of the Algerian Salafist Group for Preaching and Combat (GSPC). Algerian troops went to Niger to make the pickup. It's not known how the Chad government is going to deal with this situation, and the ransom money MDJT apparently now has.

June 11, 2004 U.S. Marine Corps trainers are now in Chad to train several hundred Chadian troops. The marines also brought military equipment for the Chadians and will help Chad establish a counter-terrorism unit in their army.

June 13, 2004 The $3.7 billion oil pipeline that goes from Chad, via Cameroon, to the Atlantic ocean began operation. Both countries will receive billions of dollars over the next few years as Chad's growing oil operations move their product to world markets. Chad agreed to have the oil money carefully watched, to avoid the corruption and theft that usually accompanies oil money in Africa. There has already been some dispute about oil money in Chad being diverted to military uses.

June 18, 2004 Arab militias from Sudan, who had been raiding black Sudanese villages in Sudan, continue to raid refugee camps inside Chad. But now they are met by Chadian troops. In the last few days, such actions have left at least 69 of the Sudanese gunmen dead, and two captured.

June 28, 2004 Niger Republic, Cameroon, and Chad are coordinating police patrols on their joint borders to help stop the movement of criminal and terrorist gangs. People along the borders are most interested in attacking the bandits that operate along the border areas, often slipping across to escape pursuit by soldier or police. The new coordination agreement will help make it possible to catch such pursued bandits when they cross a border, and arrest them, or chase them back. The terrorism angle is bringing in aid and training teams from the United States.

July 1, 2004 International relief efforts in Chad are causing an economic boom as trucks and laborers are hired to move relief supplies and build refugee camps near the Sudanese border.

July 4, 2004 Chadian police and soldiers patrolling the Sudanese border, have kept most of the Sudanese Arab militiamen from conducting any more raids inside Chad. Apparently the loud and persistent complaints from the Chad government caused Sudanese officials to rein in the Arab militias.

July 5, 2004 The MDJT rebels, negotiating with Libyan officials, have accused Libya of bad faith because, on June 25th, they released two of their Algerian GSPC rebels to the Libyans as a sign of good faith. But the Libyans were supposed to turn the Algerians over to an unnamed "Western country." This was thought to be Germany, which is keen on trying the Algerians for kidnapping German citizens three years ago. The MJDT also believes that they can get the largest payoff for their Algerian captives from Germany.

July 8, 2004 Libya threatened to unleash its air force on MDJT Chad rebels in northern Chad if the rebels do not hand over senior Algerian Islamic rebel leaders that the MDJT has been holding. The Libyans say their bombers will go into action on July 10th if the Algerians are not handed over.

July 9, 2004 The Chadian MDJT rebels say they will ignore the Libyan ultimatum to bomb them. The Chadian tribesmen have contempt for Libyan military abilities. The MDJT, which used to be supported (with money and weapons) by Libya, is now angry at Libya for bankrolling the assassination of a senior MDJT leader in 2002. This was a result of Libya deciding to stop supporting Chadian rebels (in order to get a more pro-Libya government in Chad) and to make peace with the existing Chadian government. Apparently greed and paranoia have taken over the MDJT negotiations to release their Algerian captives. The MDJT see their Algerian captives as a potential jackpot, and are asking astronomical suns of money for their release. The tribal rebels of the MDJT consider this a once in a lifetime opportunity. To poverty stricken tribesmen, the attention they are getting from Libya, Algeria, Germany and other international organizations is a bit overwhelming.

July 21, 2004 Algeria says it has stopped negotiating with the Chad rebel group MDJT. The Algerians were trying to come to terms to obtain Algerian Islamic radicals the MDJT were holding. The talks apparently broke down over how much money the MDJT wanted. The Chad government was also protesting the negotiations. The MDJT are a small, tribe based group that opposes the current Chad national leadership.

July 26, 2004 More Sudanese refugees are crossing the border into Chad. There may be as many as 200,000 refugees in Chad now, and many of them appear to be Sudanese rebels, or their families. The Sudanese rebels are, quite naturally, angry over the hundreds of villages that have been emptied by Arab Sudanese gunmen. The rebels see the refugee camps as part of a plot to let the Arab Sudanese keep the land they have stolen. As a result, Sudanese rebels in Chad have been attacking refugee camp workers, and this has brought in the Chadian army to restore order. Several Sudanese refugees have been killed in these skirmishes, and dozens arrested. The violence is not widespread, but it is growing, as more refugees move into Chad.

August 28, 2004 The MDJT rebels in northern Chad have not been forgotten. American marines have been brought in to train several hundred Chadian troops. Normally, soldiers of the Chadian army are not much better than the armed tribesmen that comprise rebel groups like the MDJT. But the American trainers have imparted additional skills (accurate shooting, combat tactics), that might cause Chad to send these superior troops to the Libyan border area where MDJT is hiding out, and continuing to hold valuable Algerian terrorist leaders (who are being auctioned off Algeria, al Qaeda or whoever makes the most attractive offer.)

October 4, 2005: The consulate in Darfur was closed because of the growing violence on the Sudanese border. Pro-government Arab tribes continue to attack black African tribesmen on both sides of the border.

October 8, 2005: Hundreds of refugees continue to flee tribal violence in the Central African Republic, and head for refugee camps in Chad. Same thing is happening in Sudan, with thousands of additional refugees coming across each week, often closely pursued by Arab tribesmen the Sudanese government is encouraging to carry out this ethnic cleansing.

October 14, 2005: At least forty soldiers deserted, stole some vehicles, and fled the capital for the Sudanese border. The men belonged to the same tribe, the Zagawa, as president Idriss Deby, and are unhappy because Deby has not done more to help Zagawa people in Sudan who are being attacked by pro-government Arab tribal militias. The Zagawa are black African, not Arab. Chad believes that Sudan is giving shelter to Chad rebels, but Sudan denies this. Last year, some Zagawa soldiers tried to stage a rebellion and replace Deby with a Zagawan who was willing to go to war with Sudan over the treatment of Zagawa people in Darfur. In reality, few Chadian Zagawa are willing to start a war over the matter, but those who are, tend to be very committed to the idea.

October 20, 2005: Sudan has accepted over a hundred deserting Chadian soldiers as refugees. This means the soldiers must surrender their weapons and promise not to make attacks into Chad from bases in Sudan.

October 21, 2005: Chad is considered, by the annual Transparency International report, as one of the most corrupt nations on earth. Corruption is a major cause of economic stagnation, civil unrest and rebellion.

October 22, 2005: The umbrella group for Chadian rebel groups, ANR (Alliance Nationale de la Résistance), declared it had nothing to do with the latest armed rebels to oppose president Deby. ANR declared that the latest rebel faction, who were members of the Presidential Guard, had nothing to do with ANR, and were involved in a "family feud" (since the Presidential Guard is recruited from the president's tribe, the Zagawa.) It is believed that the current rebellion is, literally, a family feud, with Doussa Deby, the brother-in-law of the president, behind the current problems in the Presidential Guard. The new rebel group calls itself SCUD (Platform for Change, National Unity and Democracy), and is led by Yahia Doli, who claims he has several hundred armed men. The government says only 40 troops deserted the Presidential Guard to join SCUD, and this is probably correct. That's because SCUD is less a bunch of Chadian rebels, then it is a group of Chadian volunteers going off to help the Zagawa clans that live across the border in Darfur. Like many of Africa's 700 or so tribes, the Zagawa does not live in just one country. When the national boundaries were drawn up in the 19th century, some Zagawa ended in up in Chad, and some in Sudan's Darfur region. As black Africans, the Zagawa have been suffering from the attacks of Sudanese Arab tribesmen, armed and urged on by the Sudanese government. What complicates the matter is that the president of Chad, Idriss Deby, came out on top in the recent civil war, largely because he was backed by Sudan. That conflict is not completely over, with various, tribe based, factions still providing armed opposition to the government in various parts of the country.

October 26, 2005: The Chadian army has chased nearly all members of SCUD into Sudan, and is asking the Sudanese to disarm the group. The Sudanese would like to do that, because they believe SCUD is working with Darfur rebel groups. The problem is that Darfur is a large place, and a few hundred SCUD gunmen have plenty of hiding places.

October 29, 2005: The government is trying to get control of several hundred million dollars in oil profits that, via an agreement with the World Bank, it has placed in a London bank account for future development projects. Chad is a corrupt nation, with tribal loyalties, all too often, coming before national ones. Chad's dozens of major tribes don't trust each other when it comes to spending the new oil revenue. For that reason, oil wealth has tended to be something of a curse in Africa, benefiting only a few, and causing unrest, and even civil war. It's happening in Chad as well.

October 31, 2005: Alarmed at the recent defections from his Republican (presidential) Guard, the Guard has been disbanded, and a new presidential security organization formed to replace it. The 5,000 troops in the Republican Guard were "returned" to regular army service. The deserters say that over 600 men have left the Republican Guard.

November 1, 2005: A new, smaller (1,640 troops) presidential security force was formed. DGSSIE (Principle Security Service for State Institutions) will be responsible for protecting the president. However, the new organization is a third the size of the old Republican Guard, and will be much less able to deal with military attempts to take over the government. Current president Deby himself came to power in 1990 via a military coup.

November 4, 2005: Sudan has arrested 20 of the 86 Republican Guard deserters who fled to Sudan recently. The deserters are upset because the Chad government has not done enough to fight Sudan backed tribal raiders who attack Sudanese tribesmen, related to many Chadian tribesmen, just across the border. Apparently Sudan understands who these Chadian deserters are eventually going to end up fighting. The twenty arrested men were turned over to the Red Cross.

November 12, 2005: Civil war is in the air. Dissident members of the president Deby's tribe want to go to war with Sudan, to stop the violence (by Sudanese raiders) against members of their tribe (the Zagawa) who live on both sides of the border. There's also the question of money, or rather the lack of it. The new oil revenue is not enough for president Deby to pay off all his enemies, and allies. So Deby is revoking the anti-corruption deal he made with the World Bank, in order to get the $3.7 billion required to build the oil pipeline. The World Bank threatens to cut off loans if Deby violates the oil revenue agreement. But Deby sees more cash as a matter of life or death.

November 14, 2005: There was gunfire heard at two army bases near the capital. Apparently, the dispute within the president's tribe (which supports intervention in Darfur, where related tribal people live) has not yet been resolved.

November 17, 2005: In response to dissent within his own tribe, president Deby has removed 200 tribal allies from leadership positions in the army and police, and replaced them with men from southern tribes. This solves the problem of the southern tribes being angry because the northern tribes (especially the one the president belonged to) had a disproportionate number of government jobs.

November 25, 2005: The government denied Sudan's accusations that Chadian air force transports had made low level recon flights over Sudan. Sudan also accused Chad of allowing armed groups to cross the border and raid Sudanese villages. Chadian tribes on the Sudanese border are apparently involved in aiding kinsmen across the border in Sudan, and the Chadian government is apparently not doing much to stop it, and may even be helping (or at least keeping an eye on things with those aircraft flights).

November 27, 2005: The government now accuses Sudan of supporting SCUD (Platform for Change, National Unity and Democracy), a rebel group of 300-3,000 members (depending on who you believe) composed of members of Chadian president Deby's tribe (who want to overthrow Deby.) SCUD exists, but does not appear particularly active.

December 3, 2005: During the last few weeks, former Chadian president Hissène Habré was arrested twice, and released, in Senegal, for war crimes committed during his rule. The arrests were in response to an extradition request from a UN war crimes investigation, and a law suit, in Belgium, by some of Habre's victims. Habre is accused of killing some 40,000 people (and torturing five times as many) during his eight years of rule (through 1990). Habre has been living in exile in Senegal since 1990. Political activists have persuaded Belgium to allow local courts to issue war crimes indictments and extradition orders. The African Union has now stepped in to decide if this sort of thing should be recognized. The legacy of European colonialism still rankles in Africa, and this Belgium court trying to extradite former African tyrants does not sit well with many Africans. There is also the feeling that, if you keep pursuing these tyrants, after they have been driven into exile, future tyrants will fight to the death, and the death of many more of the people they are ruling, rather than make a deal and leave.

December 9, 2005: In the south, high school students demonstrating on behalf of their teachers (who have not been paid in three months), were fired on by soldiers. There were several injuries. Payrolls are often plundered by senior government officials.

December 12, 2005: Over the weekend, several more senior military and government officials abandoned their posts and joined rebels opposed to president Idris Deby.

December 18, 2005: Several hundred rebels, based in Sudan, raided into eastern Chad, but were met by army troops. The government claimed that most of the rebels were killed, but only five soldiers and three civilians died. The rebels came from two different groups: RDF (Rally for Democracy and Freedom) and the SCUD (Platform for Change, Unity and Democracy). The SCUD is led by two nephews of Chadian president Deby, who feel their uncle is not doing enough to protect members of their tribe from the violence in neighboring Sudan. SCUD is comprised of many Chad army deserters, but in this case, the Chadian army pursued the attackers into Sudan and destroyed the SCUD base.

December 20, 2005: Over a thousand Chadian troops are in Sudan, looking for Chadian rebels. The Sudanese are protesting, but not sending in troops to oppose the search. This area is largely desert. There are few sources of water, and these are the places the rebels camp out at, and the Chadian troops are visiting.

December 22, 2005: The government announced a "state of belligerence" with neighboring Sudan. This is one step short of war. Sudan is believed behind attacks by Chadian rebels, using bases inside Sudan.

December 23, 2005: The "state of belligerence" has been upgraded to a "state of war." This means Chad will feel free to send more troops into Sudan to pursue Chadian rebels. The combat zone is a desert. The forces available to both sides consist largely of guys, armed with rifles and machine-guns, rolling around in trucks. There is some air power, but useful largely for scouting.

December 27, 2005: The government clarified the ground rules for its war with Sudan. Chad would not invade Sudan, but would pursue Chadian rebels into Sudan. Chad would like it if the Sudanese army would stay out of the way. At the moment, Sudan is dealing with rebel movements in the west (where the spat with Chad is taking place), in the south (where a shaky peace is in effect) and the east (where a sort of truce is in place.) The African Union is trying to negotiate an end to this latest war. But the cause of it all is within Chad, where factions battle the dictator. Chad now has oil wealth, and that always brings out the competitive spirit.

December 31, 2005: Eight different rebel groups have now announced joining forces to overthrow the government of Chad. All of the groups are based in eastern Chad, near the Sudanese border, and are either unhappy with the corrupt Chadian government, or the lack of Chadian efforts to stop the attacks on related tribes in Sudan. The eight rebel groups can be more accurately thought of as eight gangs. The total number of rebels involved probably does not exceed a few thousand gunmen.

January 4, 2006: The UN has pulled some of its aid personnel from the Sudanese side of the Chad-Sudan border. This is because of the growing unrest, and violence, in the area.

January 6, 2006: The World Bank is suspending all loans to Chad because Chad passed a law eliminating a special fund, where a portion of oil revenue is placed for future economic development. Chad wants to spend that money now on weapons and goodies for politicians. Chad agreed to the special fund in 1999, as a condition for getting a $4.1 billion loan to build an essential oil pipeline. Now the oil is moving and Chadian politicians are getting greedy. Chad needs those loans, and is making a lot of noise to try and get them back. There is about $124 million that is being held up.

January 6, 2006: The government says Sudanese militiamen crossed the border and made three attacks that left nine Chadians dead. Sudan denies backing these militias, but some of these thugs do get government support, or at least no attempts by the Sudanese government to stop the violence.

January 8, 2006: Sudan is now blaming violence along the Chad border on Chadian army patrols crossing the border, or Chad rebel groups doing the same to attack Chad. The Chadians deny everything. The region has a wild west flavor to it, with lots of guys with guns, riding around on horses, camels or in pickup trucks.

January 12, 2006: The government says that, in the last two years, 600 Chadians have died from raiders coming from Sudan, and that 300,000 Sudanese refugees are taking refuge in Chad.

January 13, 2006: The World Bank has frozen Chad's access to profits from oil production in Chad. This is because Chad just passed a law giving the government access to a portion of those profits that were set aside for spending on long term projects to eliminate poverty in Chad. Setting up that fund was a condition of the World Bank approving the $3.7 billion in loans needed to build an oil pipeline out of Chad. So far, the government has earned $399 million, from the export of 134 million barrels of oil. The government wants more of that money to go towards military spending and pay offs (corruption) to politicians. The World Bank wants more spent on schools, health care and infrastructure.

January 20, 2006: Sudan has arrested Chad rebel leader Abdelwahit About. The Chadian rebel was in Sudan's capital, believing he was protected by the Sudanese government. He was wrong.

January 24, 2006: Libya has offered to mediate the dispute between Chad and Sudan.

January 27, 2006: A flare up of rebel activity in neighboring CAR (Central African Republic), has sent over a thousand refugees into Chad. The CAR rebels are operating more like bandits, although they still profess support for their leader, a former president of CAR.

February 7, 2006: Foreign aid workers report almost daily raids into Chad by Sudanese (including Chadian rebels based in Sudan). The raiders loot and destroy villages and rape women.

February 8, 2006: In a deal brokered by Libya, Chad and Sudan agreed to end the war between them. Details on how this would occur were not announced.

February 10, 2006: The peace deal with Sudan requires that both countries deny support for each others rebels, and halt raids across the border. This includes stopping the information war campaigns (propaganda and media support for rebels in the other nation). The border may be closed for a while. There is supposed to be a peacekeeping force to patrol the border, but it's unclear who would pay for, or supply, the troops.

February 12, 2006: Despite the peace deal, rebel camps continue to thrive just across the border in Sudan. The main beef is president Deby's attempt to change the constitution so he can run for a third term in the presidential elections this June.

February 17, 2006: About 3,000 refugees have fled the Central African Republic (CAR) and entered southern Chad, where there are already over 40,000 CAR refugees.

February 20, 2006: Two Chad army generals (Sedi Aguid and Ishaq al-Diar) have deserted and joined the rebel movement (FUC, or United Front for Democratic Change) trying to overthrow president Deby.

February 21, 2006: Aid workers on the Sudanese border report daily raids from Chad rebels and Sudanese bandits based in Sudan.

February 22, 2006: There's a sense of déjà vu about the Chadian rebels massing across the border in Sudan to overthrow president Deby. Back in 1990, Deby launched a rebel movement, with Sudanese backing, and crossed the border into Chad with about a thousand men. But Deby has become corrupt (especially to his former tribal allies.)

March 14, 2006: Gunfire was heard in the capital, as a few dozen officers and soldiers attempted to stage a takeover of the government. Loyal troops repulsed the effort, which apparently an attempt to kill president Deby.

March 20, 2006: Over the last few days, the government has arrested over a hundred officers and soldiers, accusing them of participating in an attempt to take over the government. President Idriss Deby has been meeting with troops all over the country, trying to assure their loyalty. Deby is regarded as corrupt and ineffective by many in Chad.

March 21, 2006: The army attacked groups of SCUD and RPJ rebels along the Sudan border in eastern Chad.

March 22, 2006: Gunfire was heard in the capital, near the presidential palace. This caused a brief panic, before the government issued a statement that the gunfire was the result of a "dispute over unpaid salaries," not another coup attempt. Unpaid salaries are another side effect of the corruption president Deby is presiding over. The corruption is the main cause of all the current unrest.

March 23, 2006: The army says it destroyed a SCUD rebel base in the mountains along the Sudan border. Rebels say it isn't so and that they have killed 150 army soldiers. The government also says they took prisoners. If these can be brought back and shown in TV, it will lend credence to the government version of what's going on out there.

March 24, 2006: The fighting on the Sudanese border has sent more people fleeing, and interrupted aid operations, particularly the movement of food supplies. A good harvest in the area means there are supplies in the area for about two months. But after that, the food aid convoys have to get through to prevent widespread starvation among the 200,000 Sudanese in the dozen refugee camps of eastern Chad. There are also another 50,000 refugees from the CAR (Central African Republic).

March 30, 2006: The government accuses Sudan of providing Arab tribal militiamen to help Chad rebels operating inside Sudan. Chadian soldiers have encountered these Sudanese gunmen during recent fighting along the border.

March 31, 2006: The commander of the Chad army, general Abakar Yusuf Itno, died of wounds received yesterday along the Sudanese border. Itno was directing combat operations in the area. Itno is a nephew of Chad president Deby.

April 1, 2006: The violence in Darfur continues to spread into neighboring Chad. The fighting along the Sudanese border not only involves Chad rebel groups, but also pro-Sudanese government militias that have been raiding the refugee camps just across the border in Chad. To further complicate matters, Sudanese rebel groups have been coming to the refugee camps, to recruit, and to get supplies.

April 2, 2006: Not only are the raids by Sudanese irregulars into Chad continuing, but the Sudanese government denies that it supports the raids, or that the raiders are Sudanese. That means the Sudanese government does nothing to restrain the Sudanese Arab gunmen it supports with money and weapons. The raiders originally crossed the border to attack Sudanese refugees, but have taken to hitting Chad villages as well.

April 6, 2006: The government agreed to allow the World Bank to monitor spending, in order to get more loans from the World Bank. Chad also wants to get access to a "savings account" fund, where some of the oil revenue is placed for future economic development. The World Bank fears that, based on past performance, government officials will steal, or squander, most of the oil income. This will probably happen despite the best efforts of the World Bank. Chad president Deby is under attack by rebels, and getting his hands on all the oil money is a matter of life and death for him.

April 9, 2006: The continuing raids by Sudanese tribesmen have sent over 50,000 Chad civilians fleeing from their villages. Some of the Sudanese raiders belong to tribes with branches in Chad. Same thing with the victims. Like Sudan, Chad has tribes that consider themselves Arab, while others consider themselves just African. There has always been animosity between the two groups, although intermarriage, rape and slavery have resulted in both groups looking much alike, and sharing languages and customs. Sudan continues to receive the support of other Arab nations, especially Egypt. The Arab nations oppose bringing in UN, and especially European, peacekeepers. This would offend the dignity of the Arab world (the way overthrowing Saddam Hussein did), thus the Arabs allow the ethnic cleansing of Darfur to continue, even though the victims are Moslem. These attacks are less painful to Arabs because the victims are black Africans, who have always been held in low esteem by Arabs, even if the Africans are Moslem. The UN, however, will not stop criticizing Sudan for its support of the violence. However, a coalition of Arab and Moslem nations, plus China (which wants to protect its business interests in Sudan), block any too aggressive operations by the UN.

April 10, 2006: In southeastern Chad, about two dozen truck loads of FUC rebels crossed the Central African Republic (CAR) border and attacked a military base and three towns inside Chad. The rebels withdrew several hours later, taking prisoners and captured weapons with them.

April 11, 2006: FUC has increased its forces moving across the border in the southeast. There are now over a hundred FUC vehicles in the area, and a refugee camp, with 18,000 refugees from Darfur, was captured. No one was harmed, although communications gear and food were taken from aid workers. The FUC rebels appear ready to continue advancing into Chad.

April 12, 2006: FUC rebels drove several hundred kilometers into Chad, and are now about 300 kilometers (4-5 hours drive) from the capital. France, which has about a thousand troops near the capital, is sending another 150. French aircraft have been monitoring the advance of the rebels, and passing on information to the government. In turn, the government has deployed troops from the Presidential Guard to points around the capital. Meanwhile, in eastern Chad, FUC rebels seized the town of Mongo, 400 kilometers east of the capital, and retreated a few hours later when army troops showed up.

April 13, 2006: People in the eastern suburbs of the capital could hear gunfire before dawn, announcing the arrival of FUC rebels. Advancing in several columns, the rebels appear to have a few thousand armed men on the move, using trucks apparently obtained from the Sudanese government. Some vehicles were also stolen from UN run refugee camps, and Chadian towns the rebels passed through. Although president Deby controls an army of 20,000 troops, these are spread all over the country, and many are still stuck on the Sudanese and Central African Republic borders, trying to keep FUC rebels out. But Chad is a big place, and the army is of dubious loyalty. The new oil wealth has caused a lot of unrest in the coalition Deby presides over to control the country. FUC is a coalition of all those factions (tribal, political) that are united in their desire to remove Deby from power.

April 14, 2006: Soldiers and police killed or captured the several hundred rebels that drove into the capital. The captured FUC rebels admitted they had received support from Sudan, even as the Sudanese government insists it had nothing to do with the incident. Diplomatic relations with Sudan were cut and a state of war declared. Chad closed its border with Sudan, as did the Central African Republic. This doesn't mean much to the Sudanese militias, that can easily cross the borders elsewhere. There are only a few official border crossings (on the few roads), and not many border patrols.

April 15, 2006: Some 15,000 refugees fled across the border into Sudan, to escape the fighting with rebels. The fighting itself had died down, with about 400 dead (mostly rebels) on the frontier, and in the capital. Some 200 rebels were captured. The rebels had withdrawn to their bases in Sudan. Their attempt to make a run for the capital and trigger a larger uprising against president Deby, had failed. This sort of thing sometimes works in Chad, but not this time.

April 16, 2006: The government demanded $100 million from the oil companies running oil operations in Chad. This is money the government agreed to put aside for economic development. But president Deby needs the money to stay in power (buy weapons, bribe allies, and so on). Deby threatens to halt oil shipments if the oil companies do not produce the money immediately. Chad also withdrew from the peace talks trying to settle the rebellion in Darfur. This is considered an empty threat, as the government needs the revenues it is getting.

April 20, 2006: France is sending another company (150 men) of troops to Chad, where there are already 1200 French soldiers and airmen. The French troops will help the Chad government resist Sudanese backed rebels. Previously, the French troops were told not to interfere, as Chadian rebels do have a legitimate complaint against president Deby, who has bent the rules to run for a third term next month, and is considered corrupt and autocratic.

April 21, 2006: Gunrunners are doing a booming business with the government, with additional weapons being flown and trucked in each week. Some of the deliveries are pretty visible, like the six Mi-17 helicopters that recently arrived. These cost about $5 million each. More and more of Chad's oil revenues are going to the arms suppliers, who usually demand cash up front.

April 22, 2006: The African Union has sent a team to investigate the charge that Sudan backed the Chad rebels. All the evidence points to Sudan's guilt. But Sudan treats the African Union with barely disguised scorn, and won't bother much with another accusation from them.

April 23, 2006: While Sudan insists it did not support the Chad rebels, people who have traveled through the border area contradict this. The U.S. also says Sudan is involved (without revealing its sources, which probably include satellite surveillance and agents on the ground.) Sudan apparently believes that, if the faction it backed got control of Chad, the Darfur rebels would have one less place to hide out in. But some of the Darfur rebels belong to tribes that have branches in both Sudan and Chad. That said, Sudan's brutal policy in Darfur doesn't make sense either, but there it is. The Sudanese leadership are ruthless, and don't much care how much mess and misery they create.

April 28, 2006: The government has reached a temporary agreement and backed off from its threat to stop oil shipments. The government wants to use oil money, put aside for social projects, to buy weapons and pay bribes to help keep president Deby in power. The World Bank will now give the government directly 30 percent of oil revenues, instead of 15 percent before. This money is almost impossible to audit, and most is believed to be stolen by government officials (president Deby and his cronies.)

April 30, 2006: French troops took part in defeating the April 13 attempt to overthrow president Deby. France did not want the pro-Sudan group from taking over in Chad, because that would probably lead to the same kind of Arab/black African violence going on in Darfur.

May 1, 2006: President Deby is running for reelection on May 3rd, even though it's against Chad law for him to run again. That has a lot of Chadians up in arms against him, for a number of reasons. Some rebels are fighting Deby because Chad has been supporting, or at least tolerating, Sudan's war on black African Sudanese. Other Chad rebels are angry because Deby will not fight against Arab Sudanese militias who are attacking black Africans in both Chad and Sudan (Darfur). Chad and Sudan both have Arab and black African tribes. Some tribes have clans on both sides of the border. Deby would like the Darfur situation to go away, as his priority these days is stealing as much of Chad's new oil wealth as possible.

May 2, 2006: About 150 armed raiders from Sudan attacked a village on the border. At least four civilians were killed by the Arab men, believed to be one of the armed groups backed by the Sudanese government to drive out black African tribesmen. Originally this just meat black Sudanese, but now includes black Chadians as well. In this case, the raiders stole over a thousand cattle and horses. The attack was only a few miles from a large refugee camps full of Sudanese.

May 3, 2006: Another presidential election took place, which appears to be rigged like the ones in 1996 and 2001. President Deby seized power in 1990, and is not ready to give it up. Few of the country's 5.8 million registered voters appeared to show up to vote.

May 6, 2006: A UN aid worker was shot in eastern Chad. The aid effort, mainly to take care of over 200,000 refugees from Sudan, is a major source of revenue for local Chadians, and attracts bandits as well.

May 7, 2006: Election observers invited in from other African countries said they saw voter turnout of over 60 percent, while foreign journalists, diplomats and opponents of president Deby say turnout was less than ten percent. President Deby doesn't much care, because he has been told that, within five years, oil production will be up to 400,000 barrels a day (more than twice the current rate). That's annual sales of over $10 billion, and several billion dollars left for Deby to play with. Plenty enough to buy allies, and sufficient guns to keep enemies at bay. Deby has become another oil-rich dictator, and Chad is slipping into another of its many civil wars. This time, the prize is richer than it's ever been, although the oil production and shipping facilities are vulnerable to attack.

May 12, 2006: While a peace deal is close in Darfur, Chad rebels say that this will have no impact on their fight against president Idrisa Deby of Chad.

May 14, 2006: The official vote in the May 3rd presidential election was 77.5 percent for the incumbent, Idriss Deby. This was with a 61 percent turnout. But the turnout was nowhere near 61 percent, and the opposition largely boycotted the vote. Deby has become another "president-for-life" and must now live with a nation in a state of perpetual revolution.

May 16, 2006: Neither the UN, nor the Chad government, is making any effort to stop Darfur rebel groups from recruiting teenagers and young men in the Chad refugee camps. This reluctance may have something to do with the fact that the recruiters are often armed.

May 20, 2006: Eastern Chad is now home for over 250,000 refugees, most of them in camps run by the UN and associated NGOs (Non-Governmental Organizations). About 20 percent of the refugees are Chadians, fleeing the increasing violence between Chadian security forces and various rebel factions. Some of the guys with guns are just bandits. These gangs, plus raiders from Darfur, and many of the Chad rebels, prey on the refugee camps, as well as the relief organizations. For example, relief organizations, despite hiring locals as armed guards, have had some 30 of their vehicles stolen. Food supplies and equipment are also taken regularly. The UN wants to send in peacekeepers to guard the refugee camps and the movements of relief supplies and aid workers. The Chad government doesn't want foreign peacekeepers, but it unable to provide security along the Sudan border. There's not exactly a war going on along the frontier. It's more like a breakdown in law and order, and dozens of groups of armed men wandering around stealing whatever they can. These guys are not interested in fighting. If they encounter security forces, or another armed group, they may exchange some fire, and if the other guy doesn't flee, just move on.

May 21, 2006: Sudanese paramilitaries continue to raid refugee camps in eastern Chad. The raiders are after loot, but will also kill in order to terrorize the refugees. The raiders know that the Sudanese rebel groups are recruiting in the refugee camps, and are hitting back the only way they know how.

May 27, 2006: The UN is threatening to cut off supplies to some refugee camps unless Sudanese rebels stop using the camps as bases. The Sudanese rebels often have family in the camps, and usually come into the camps wearing military uniforms (the favorite attire of both the Sudanese paramilitaries and the rebels on both sides of the border.) Chad is responsible for security at the refugee camps, but because of the expanding civil war in Chad, the army is too busy trying to keep president Deby in power, to worry about refugee camps. Chad's security forces were never very efficient in the first place, but now the border with Sudan is apparently wide open for any truckload of guys with guns.

May 31, 2006: There's another civil war in Chad. There are three armed groups fighting the government. The most dangerous is the FUC (led by Mahamat Nour), which is a coalition of groups backed by Sudan. The Rally of Democratic Forces (RFD) is largely composed of members of the Zaghawa tribe, which president Deby belongs to. RFD is led by a former member of Deby's government. The Movement for Democracy and Justice in Chad (MDJT), has been skirmishing with the government since 1998, in the far north, along the Libyan border. Led by Mahmat Choua Dazi, MDJT earned some gratitude from the United States by chasing down Islamic terrorists who tried to cross through MDJT controlled territory. None of these three opposition groups are strong enough to bring down the government, especially as long as France maintains several thousand troops in the country. But the government isn't strong enough to take down the rebels either. There are 70 or so political parties in Chad, most of them opposed to the 16 year rule of president Deby.

June 4, 2006: Chad rebels clashed with the army on the Sudanese border, in an effort to help to army officers and some soldiers desert to the rebels. The fighting left ten soldiers dead and 17 wounded. The rebels lost 22 dead and 37 wounded.

June 10, 2006: Raids by Sudanese gunmen have caused some 50,000 Chadian villagers to become refugees in their own country. The Sudanese government is supplying the raiders with weapons, and sanctuary in Sudan. The raiders, who were mobilized by the Sudanese government to fight rebels in western Sudan (Darfur), have run out of pro-rebel villages to raid. Thus the raids into Chad, where some of the Sudanese rebels have taken refuge. The Sudanese rebels use the UN supported refugee camps for recruiting, and a source of food and other supplies. The Sudanese raiders also hit the UN refugee camps. The Sudanese raiders consider themselves Arabs, while most of the refugees and Chadians consider themselves just African. The Arabs have, for thousands of years, looked down on the Africans. This ancient prejudice plays a large role in the Darfur war spilling over into Chad.

June 11, 2006: President Deby is trying to make peace with his internal opposition, and Sudan. Deby is weak, but strong enough to hold off his enemies for a while. Deby can make deals with the new oil wealth Chad has acquired, and given his past performance, he may pull it off.

June 14, 2006: Corrupt soldiers on the Sudanese border have led to nearly 30 UN vehicles being stolen in the last six months. The distinctive white vehicles must get past several army check points after they are stolen, and that can only be done if Chadian soldiers are doing the stealing, or taking bribes to let the thieves pass into Sudan, where the vehicles can be repainted and resold. The threat of car-jacking has limited the movement of UN staff. Without an armed escort, UN vehicles are too vulnerable to the many bandits prowling the border area.

June 18, 2006: Southeastern Chad has become a war zone. Local bandits and Sudanese militias are roaming around attacking Chadian villages, and refugee camps full of Sudanese. It's gotten so bad that about 10,000 Chad civilians have fled into Sudan to get away from the violence. The army is too inept, or corrupt, to deal with the situation. The Sudanese refugees are demanding that the UN bring in peacekeepers, but no UN members are in a hurry to contribute peacekeepers for this out-of-the-way hell hole.

June 19, 2006: The SLA (Sudanese Liberation Army), one of the main Sudanese rebel groups in Darfur, have thousands of their armed men camped out in Chad, along the Sudanese border. The SLA men get along with the Chad army units they encounter, and both work together to protect refugee camps, full of Sudanese, from Sudanese raiders crossing the border to attack the camps. It's only a matter of time before the Sudanese army joins the mayhem, because the pro-Sudanese government irregulars have not got the firepower to brush past SLA Chad army units.

June 21, 2006: Chadian rebels, based just across the border in Sudan, have been spotted accompanying Sudanese raiders who have been attacking Chadian villages along the border.

June 22, 2006: Sudanese irregulars have raided as far as 75 kilometers into Chad, and deeper raids are feared because of Chadian rebels serving as guides and advisors. Both Chad and Sudan are hosting each others rebel groups, and are leaving the rebels to fight their war for them. Sudan is the official international bad guy at the moment, and Chad is trying to use that to motivate the UN, or anyone, to help keep Sudanese raiders out. France has several thousand troops in Chad, but they only move if hostile forces approach the capital. No one wants to help out along the border, which is mostly desert.

June 23, 2006: Chadian rebels based in Sudan are holding new elections to select leaders to settle growing disputes within the rebel coalition (FUC).

June 27, 2006: For reasons unknown, Chadian rebels operating out of Sudan, helped Central African Republic (CAR) attack a CAR army post just across the border from Sudan. Also hit was a unit of CEMAC (Economic and Monetary Community of Central Africa) peacekeepers. About three dozen people were killed in the fighting, and many more wounded. Exactly what kind of complex politics was involved here was unclear.

June 30, 2006: The government asked Uganda to help arrange peace talks with Sudan. Uganda also had problems with Sudan providing refuge for rebel groups, but eventually Uganda persuaded Sudan to stop supporting Ugandan rebels, and even help track them down.

July 2, 2006: Sudanese supported militias, including some Chad rebel groups, have turned the border with Sudan into a war zone. The Sudanese have even enlisted some of the smaller tribes as allies, and together they raid refugee camps in Chad, as well as Chad villages. In the past nine months, these attacks have gotten worse, and over 60,000 Chadians have fled their homes to escape the violence. Several hundred Chadians have died, and over a thousand wounded by the raiders. Chad is trying to convince the UN to send peacekeepers to help stop the violence on the border. Sudan is opposed to having peacekeepers in the region, being quite content with how things are going at the moment.

July 8, 2006: In eastern Chad, troops skirmished with raiders from Sudan, some of whom are Chadian rebels. The fighting has left nearly twenty dead over a week of clashes.

July 9, 2006: More Sudanese raiders are crossing through the Central African Republic (CAR), which shares borders with southern Chad, and Sudan, to get into Chad. France has troops in CAR and is trying to keep things stable.

July 16, 2006: The government has asked Sudan to negotiate a settlement of their differences. The government has also told the World Bank that more money would be spent on social programs, and less on the police and army. Meanwhile, police are arresting many anti-government activists. So there may be a peace deal with Sudan, but another round of civil war appears likely for Chad.

July 21, 2006: The government has backed down, and agreed to abide by the deal it made with the World Bank (in order to get the loans to develop its oil industry), to devote a percentage of the oil profits to helping Chad's people, and allowing the World Bank to supervise this.

July 22, 2006: The government has arrested two ministers and charged them with stealing half a million dollars from a fund established to help livestock herders. Livestock is a major industry for Chad, and much of the internal violence is caused by tribes fighting over grazing land and access to water.

July 25, 2006: The government has made nice to Sudan, and backed away from any offensive operations. An official end of the state of war between Chad and Sudan is being negotiated. In practical terms, the armed forces are not mobile, or loyal, enough to fight a war with Sudan. The big threat is civil war, with president Deby's coalition of tribes and factions in disarray. The government is leaving it to the UN and the rest of the world to do something about the Sudanese raiders who are attacking refugee camps in Chad and Darfur.

July 26, 2006: Chad and Sudan signed a peace deal, which included cooperation shutting down all rebel groups (from both nations) operating along the border. Thus ended the three month war.

August 2, 2006: The official war on the Chad-Sudan border is over, as military patrols from both countries cooperate to find and chase down any rebels found along the border. However, the various rebel groups are not being attacked, but the rebels are not very active now, either, and are holding back, staying out of the way, and trying to get an idea of what they can get away with under the new rules.

August 29, 2006: President Deby has demanded that Chad receive 60 percent ownership of the oil companies operating in Chad. The companies have invested over $4 billion in an operation that now ships about $3.6 billion worth of oil a year. Chad receives a 12.5 percent royalty on oil shipments, but president Deby insisted that two of the three oil companies also owed half a billion dollars in back taxes (this was later doubled). The back taxes must be paid, and the government given over half the oil profits, or the two oil companies must get out of the country. Earlier this year, Chad tried to wiggle out of a deal with the World Bank, which arranged for the financing to build the oil pipeline, to deposit part of oil revenues in a fund for building up the economy and reducing poverty. In general, oil and mineral wealth tends to benefit politicians more than the average citizen in Africa. Corruption is widespread, and getting your hands on the oil income is a goal most African politicians find irresistible.

September 10, 2006: Both the government and FUC (United Front for Democratic Change) rebels say they fought a major battle at Aram Kolle, in eastern Chad. The army claims it killed 168 rebels, captured 28 and wounded many more. The rebels say pretty much the opposite, and insist that they stood their ground. The last major clash with rebels was last April, and that one left over 200 dead.

September 16, 2006: While president Deby fights rebels in the east and oil companies in the capital, relief workers along the Sudan border live in fear as banditry becomes more common. The roads have become so dangerous that relief workers must travel in heavily armed convoys in order to safely more personnel and supplies. The army and police are more interested in payoffs that in providing security.

September 19, 2006: The army attacked another rebel stronghold in eastern Chad, near the Sudan border and the town of Adre. Some 3,000 troops were involved, assisted by artillery and helicopter gunships. This time, the rebels belonged to the Rally of Democratic Forces (RFD), which is largely composed of members of the Zaghawa tribe, which president Deby belongs to. RFD is led by a former member of Deby's government. The rebels repulsed the government attack, but will probably retreat anyway.

September 23, 2006: Fighting continues on the Sudanese border, near Adre and Aram Kolle. Thousands of refugees are fleeing into the interior, or across the border into Sudan. The rebels have threatened to attack French citizens because they have seen French Mirage jet fighters flying recon missions for the government. The French have several Mirage jets stationed near the capital. France has been involved in Chadian affairs for over a century, and French citizens control a large chunk of the economy.

October 7, 2006: The oil companies have agreed to pay the government $280 million in "back taxes." In what amounted to an extortion operation, the government demanded $500 million and a larger share of ownership, or else the two oil companies would be expelled and their assets seized. The $280 million will probably be stolen by Chad president Deby and his cronies. This encourages the rebels in the northern part of the country. All that oil money is something to fight for. But Deby will use a lot of that money to fly in more weapons, and to buy the services of more gunmen.

October 15, 2006: Gunrunners from Chad are moving new weapons to rebels in Sudan. Meanwhile, despite a "peace" treaty, Chad continue to support Sudanese rebels, which Sudan support Chad rebels.

October 20, 2006: Chad rebels and Sudanese militia have been joining together for raids into Chad. In the last two weeks, these combined groups have attacked about a dozen villages. The raiders are looking for loot and food, but kill many of the villagers in the process.

October 21, 2006: In eastern Chad, over 3,000 people have fled their small, rural villages, to escape raiders from Chad and Sudan. Over three dozen have been killed and many more wounded in the last two weeks.

October 23, 2006: Several hundred Chad rebels, riding in about sixty vehicles, invaded the Chad town of Goz Beida, which is about 160 kilometers from the Sudan border. Both the rebels and the Chad army announced they held the town.

October 24, 2006: Sudan is supplying money, weapons and vehicles to Chad rebel groups, in order to keep the rebellion against the Chad government going. In response, Chad is supplying rebels in Darfur with weapons, and other aid. Although Chad and Sudan have agreed to make peace, that mostly been just talk. On the ground, there's lots of gunfire and dead bodies, mostly civilians.

October 26, 2006: The government fears that another column of rebels are rolling towards the capital (in western Chad) from the Sudan border (in eastern Chad.) Same thing happened last April, but government troops managed to kill, capture or scatter the several hundred armed rebels that reached the capital. The government is confident that it can halt another rebel run for the capital, mainly because it has help from France, which has stationed several warplanes at the capital airport. One of those aircraft, an Atlantique 2 naval reconnaissance aircraft, recently had a portable anti-aircraft missile fired at it in eastern Chad. The Atlantique was able to detect and avoid the missile, but such a weapon indicates that the rebels are probably being supplied by Sudan. The government has been saying this for months, but Sudan is already defying most of the world, over the government attacks on non-Arab tribes in Darfur (the government is dominated by Arab Sudanese). So it doesn't really matter that the world now knows, with a little more conviction, that the Sudanese government is trying to install a more amenable faction in the Chadian capital. It's all about the oil money. With the oil fields now producing, gaining control of the government is now more than just stealing foreign aid and development loan money. Chad's population is divided into dozens of tribes, most of them speaking different languages. This mélange of cultures never really got along together, and it took European colonial officials to hammer together the country, now known as Chad, a century ago. But it's not really a country. It's a bunch of groups contending for the prize, the right to call itself the government of Chad, and access to whatever is in the treasury.

October 27, 2006: Niger has agreed not to expel a tribe of Chadian Arabs, who had arrived as refugees, from the Chad civil war, in the 1980s. The Chadian Arab nomads had clashed with Niger farmers (who are black Africans.) This pattern of Arab nomads fighting African farmers is the same in Sudan and in Chad. No one is sure how many Chad Arabs are in Niger. Estimates range from a few thousand to over 100,000. The Chadian Arabs have promised to behave in the future.

October 30, 2006: In southern Chad, more refugees from the Central African Republic (CAR) crossed the border, after over a hundred CAR rebels took a town near the Chad border.

October 31, 2006: Arab tribesmen from eastern Chad and Sudan are now raiding black African farming villages up to 100 kilometers from the Sudan border. The raiders kill, loot and tell the survivors to flee, so that Arab tribes can move in.

November 1, 2006: Senegal has agreed to try former (1980s) Chad dictator, Hissene Habre, who has been living in exile in Senegal. International war crimes tribunal had indicted Habre, and finally convinced Senegal to join in the prosecution. This has got to be disturbing for the current president of Chad, Idriss Deby, who has not behaved much better than his predecessor, Habre.

November 3, 2006: Both Chad and Sudan deny arming rebels in each others countries, but that's what appears to be still going on. Both countries contain ethnic Arab and black African tribes, and these tribes have never gotten along. The situation is worse because the Arabs tend to be nomads, with herds of camels, horses and other animals, while the black Africans tend to be farmers. When there is drought, as there has been for the past few years, the Arab nomads must either try and take farmland for their herds, or lose their animals. Meanwhile, in Chad, with dozens of Arab and African tribes, there has rarely been any real national unity. The current government is basically a loose coalition of tribes, held together, barely, by president Habre.

November 15, 2006: The growing violence, and number of refugees, in eastern Chad, has caused a water shortage. Relief groups are cutting water supplies (four gallons a day per person) for refugees.

November 16, 2006: The government is sending troops to the neighboring Central African Republic (CAR), to help fight rebels there. There are already a hundred Chad troops in CAR, as part of a peacekeeping force. The president of Chad, Idriss Deby, helped put the current ruler of the CAR into power three years ago, and fears that Sudan is behind the current CAR rebellion, and is trying to put a pro-Sudan, andi-Deby ruler into power.

November 17, 2006: The government has declared a state of emergency, as rebels along the Sudan border continue to threaten an advance on the capital. The government is calling for help from the UN, and accusing the government of Sudan of taking its ethnic cleansing campaign from Darfur into Chad. The Sudanese government has backed Arab tribes against black African ones, in a battle for scarce water resources. Chad also has its competing Arab and African tribes, and Sudan is supporting the Chad Arab tribes with guns and other supplies.

November 18, 2006: The violence in eastern Chad has created some 5,000 refugees, and caused the disappearance of 37 relief workers.

November 20, 2006: A relief worker was killed in southeast Chad, during a raid on a village by tribal gunmen.

November 21, 2006: Chad leaders met with those of Sudan, Libya, Egypt, Eritrea and CAR in Libya. Everyone said nice things about each other and insisted that problems were solved. But Sudan denied it was interfering in Chad and CAR, despite the evidence that Sudanese citizens (troops or pro-government tribesmen) have been found in both countries.

November 22, 2006: Another 150 Chadian troops have arrived in CAR, to help the army deal with rebels.

November 23, 2006: The government extended the state-of-emergency for another six months. The Sudan border area is still a battle zone, with tribal gunmen from Chad and Sudan roaming the area.

November 24, 2006: The rebellion in neighboring CAR is remarkably like the one in Chad. In both countries, tribes that believe they are not getting enough goodies from the government, are fighting for a larger cut. Like most of Africa, the guy in power takes care of his own tribe, and the other tribes get jealous and, in this case, get their guns and get going to rectify the situation. Also like in Chad, there's the oil problem. An oil exploration team from Canada is checking out likely deposits in CAR. If the oil field is confirmed and put into production, the tribes will end up fighting over who gets control of the checkbook. Sudanese involvement is largely the result of government supported Sudanese tribes having branches across the borders in Chad and CAR. When the borders of these countries were created, the tribes were not consulted. As a result, most borders go right through tribal territory.

November 25, 2006: Rebels moved into Abeche, the largest town in eastern Chad, and headquarters for most of the aid organizations catering to the 200,000 refugees in the region. The police and army fled, but the rebels left after 24 hours, as army reinforcements approached. The rebels got away with many captured weapons. Abeche is about 850 kilometers from the capital.

November 28, 2006: In response to the raid on Abeche, the government increased the number of troops guarding the capital. It was believed that several hundred rebels were headed for the capital, but French air reconnaissance appears to have confirmed that the rebels are not coming again, as they did in April (only to be defeated in a brief skirmish in the capital). Chad is divided along tribal lines, with the rebels representing several tribes that believe they are not getting their fair share of government goodies. Chad has oil income now, so grabbing control of the government is worth a lot more. This is the usual result of oil wealth in Africa.

November 29, 2006: In the Central African Republic (CAR), French troops exchanged fire with rebels at an airport the French were guarding. There are now 300 French troops in CAR, and some Mirage fighters and helicopters. The fighters have been used in northern CAR, to drive rebels out of two towns. As in Chad, the CAR rebels are believed to be backed by Sudan.

December 1, 2006: Rebels in the east, seized the town of Guerada, which is fifty kilometers from the Sudan border. The rebels, who are supplied by Sudan, claimed to have taken a hundred prisoners and captured at least five armored vehicles. Rebels also claim that government forces were assisted by Sudanese rebels. Aid workers said two of their trucks were stolen by the rebels, as well as large quantities of supplies and office equipment.

December 2, 2006: Rebels withdrew from the town of Guerada, and drove off towards the Sudan border, which is fifty kilometers away

December 3, 2006: The fighting in the east has led to widespread looting of aid agency warehouses, and other facilities. There are over 300,000 Sudanese refugees living in eastern Chad, and they survive on imported food. To replace some of the stolen supplies, the UN has airlifted in over 110,000 tons of food. Much of the looted food ends up in local market places, driving down the price of grain and other staples, and hurting local farmers, who often cannot compete with the low prices. Meanwhile, the rebels are supporting themselves by looting the foreign aid supplies. This is a common pattern in these situations, and no one has come up with a workable solution, other than bringing in lots of armed, and aggressive, peacekeepers. Chad is now willing to accept UN peacekeepers, to help deal with the unrest along its border with Sudan. But many UN members are uneasy with getting involved in whatever is going on in eastern Chad (rebellion?, banditry?, Sudanese intervention?, all of these?)

December 4, 2006: In the east, UN relief workers have fled three towns, and six of the twelve refugee camps the UN maintains in the area. A handful of relief workers were left behind, but about half the 220,000 refugees in eastern Chad are now on their own.

December 5, 2006: The fighting over the eastern town of Guerada, over the last four days, apparently caused some 350 casualties (about a third of them fatal). Several rebel leaders were among the dead. The rebels took the town, then government forces arrived and tool it back. The fighting then moved to the outskirts of the town, before the rebels fled towards the Sudan border.

December 6, 2006: Nearly 30,000 refugees from Chad and the Central African Republic (CAR) have fled to Cameroon, where the UN is setting up a refugee camp. Many of the refugees are nomads who have been increasingly subject to attack by groups of rebels, or bandits who have been hanging about looking for potential victims.

December 7, 2006: Several hundred UFDD rebels, in about a hundred vehicles, rolled into the eastern town of Biltine (500 kilometers northeast of the capital). The few soldiers who were there, fled.

December 8, 2006: The army returned to Biltine, fought the rebels, caused about 200 casualties, and the rebels fled after losing about twenty percent of their vehicles. Thirty rebels were captured.

December 9, 2006: UFDD rebels returned to Biltine, and attacked the army troops there, and apparently drove them out. Several hundred more casualties resulted. The rebel columns are coming from Sudan, where they have government supported bases.

December 10, 2006: The fighting in eastern Chad has led to about 50,000 refugees being cut off from food supplies. In the last few weeks, some 550 tons of food has been stolen by bandits and looters. That's enough food to feed 20,000 people for a month. Some of it will be consumed by the rebels, but the rest will be sold to merchants, or bartered for weapons, fuel, vehicles or other goods. The UN fears that more of its convoys and warehouses will be looted.

December 16, 2006: Over the last few days, Chadian troops have pursued Chad rebels into Sudan, in an attempt to eliminate the rebel bases. The Chad forces are avoiding contact with the Sudanese army, but the pro-government Sudanese militia groups appear to be coming to the aid of the Chad rebels. So there may be some fighting inside Chad between the Chadian army, and the Chad rebels/Sudanese militia. Someone has been spending big money on the Chad rebels, as they rolled into Chad recently in expensive pick-up trucks, and heavily armed. The government claims to have inflicted a major defeat on the SCUD rebels, killing 700 of them, as well as some of the leaders. There have been pictures of dozens of burned out rebel trucks in areas along the Sudanese border. The Chadian rebels are a mixed lot. Mainly, they are former allies of president Deby, who is more concerned with holding on to the new-found oil revenue these days. Deby's former friends disagree with how Deby is dealing with the growing violence on the Sudan border, although much of the rebel activity is caused by tribal politics. Other rebel groups are an extension of the Afro-Arab/black African conflict. Both groups exist in Chad, some of them part of tribes that straddle the border. Tribal politics is a big thing in Chad, as it is in most of Africa. Aid groups are pulling out of the area, and trying to move thousands of refugees, in order to avoid the violence in eastern Chad. Most of the groups from Sudan operate like bandits, stealing whatever they can to get by. Aid groups have a lot to steal. The aid workers don't have much protection from this, because locally hired security guards are no match for large groups of bandits/rebels/militia.

December 17, 2006: The president met one of the four rebel movements at war with the government. Mahamat Nour Abdelkerim, the leader of the FUC, is considering rejoining the government, mainly because of increasingly bad relationships with the other rebels movements (UDD, RAFD and SCUD). The other rebels blame Mahamat Nour Abdelkerim for the failure of the bold attack on the capital last April.

December 18, 2006: The rebels have a new strategy, based on raiding the towns of eastern Chad, and wearing down the army, which rushes to the scene of each raid, to regain control of the town. Operations like that today left 15 civilians, 8 soldiers, five Sudanese refugees and nine rebels dead. However, it's difficult to tell the Chad rebels from the Sudanese militia. Both groups tend to wear combat uniforms provided by the Sudanese army.

December 20, 2006: So far, about 90,000 refugees in eastern Chad, have fled the increasing violence caused by Chad rebels and Sudanese Arab militias raiding across the border. The Sudanese Arabs raiders seem determined to drive the refugees (mainly black Sudanese farmers, whose land the Sudanese Arab herders coveted) as far away as possible.

December 23, 2006: The UN is trying to move most of the 370,000 refugees in eastern Chad to a safer location. In the past month, some 70 raids by Chad rebels and Sudanese militias have killed at least 300 people. The attacks have hit refugee camps as well as Chad towns and villages. The raiders are looking for loot, as well as chasing the refugees away. The refugees are mostly from Sudan, but include 90,000 Chadians and 48,000 from the Central African Republic. The UN is trying to get some peacekeepers in to deal with the raiders, but so far it's all talk and no action. The Arab and Islamic nations in the UN oppose any action that would result in the Sudanese Arab militias being defeated.

December 24, 2006: After discussions in Libya, the president of Chad and the leader of the FUC (United Front for Democratic Change) signed a peace deal. The FUC is on the outs with some of the other rebel groups, but this deal makes for one less hostile faction to deal with.

December 29, 2006: In neighboring Central African Republic (CAR), there are three rebellions underway, and the government controls little beyond the capital. In addition, the unrest in Chad and Sudan is spreading into CAR. There are about a quarter million internal refugees and, like the refugees in neighboring Chad and Sudan, the international aid groups find themselves being looted and robbed by rebels and bandits, and, in effect, helping to support the thugs.

December 30, 2006: Raids from Sudanese pro-government militias and Chadian rebels have destroyed or damaged nearly 80 villages and refugee camps in the last two months. Over a thousand people have been killed or wounded, and nearly 100,000 sent running. The UN is calling for peacekeepers, or some kind of muscle, to put a halt to the looting of relief supplies, and attacks on aid workers. No one is eager to send troops to help.

January 3, 2007: A demonstration by wounded soldiers, and their families, in the capital, was violently dispersed by police, leaving at least one veteran dead. The demonstration was held in front of a hospital.

January 5, 2007: Three rebel groups (including the Rally of Democratic Forces, or RAFD) have agreed to quit fighting and support the government. Some 200 rebel fighters have joined the army. The rebels said they had received aid from Sudan.

January 8, 2007: The continuing raids by Sudanese, government supported, Arab militias against black African villages in Chad, has created over 20,000 new refugees in the last few weeks. Sudan denies any responsibility, which means there is no one to complain to. Chad has several thousand soldiers patrolling the Sudan border, but there's plenty of empty space for the raiders to get lost in, and then reappear for another attack. There are now over 100,000

Chadians refugees, who have fled the Sudanese raids. Chad has called for foreign peacekeepers, but no one is willing to send troops to this semi-desert area, to chase elusive raiders back and forth across the border. Sudan has said that any foreign peacekeepers entering its territory would be considered invaders.

January 13, 2007: About a hundred rebels of the UFDD (Union of Forces for Democracy and Development) attacked the town of Ounianga Kebir, in the northeast. The government said they drove the rebels out quickly. The rebels retreated towards the Sudan border. Sudan refuses to admit it is providing sanctuary for the Chad rebels.

January 19, 2007: A few hundred UFDD rebels in the north east have raided three towns in the past ten days. Government forces eventually show up, and the rebels take off, seeking sanctuary in Sudan before they can be caught. France has a few jet fighters stationed outside the capital, and these fly recon missions for the government. But it's a big country, and France refuses to supply enough aircraft to cover all the areas along the Sudan border where rebels are operating. An American diplomat is trying to broker a deal with the rebels. But the problem is basically a tribal and personal feud. Honor is at stake, and foreign peacemakers are not particularly welcome.

January 29, 2007: The hit and run fighting in the north continues. French Mirage fighters regularly fly recon missions along the Sudan border. When they spot a group of rebels (a bunch of guys with guns in pickup trucks), they send the GPS data to Chadian troops. If the location is close enough, Chad will send out an armed helicopter. Otherwise, an army patrol may be dispatched. This is all rather desultory, with only a few such contacts a week. It's a war in slow motion. Meanwhile, UN had workers are trying to move their refugee camps away from the border, and the rebel raids. The rebels use the camps as sources of supply, even if they have to fight police or soldiers guarding the relief supplies, and relief agency assets (satellite phones, laptops, trucks, iPods, etc).

February 1, 2007: Sudan based rebels attacked the border town of Adre, and were repulsed. Several rebel trucks were destroyed, a dozen civilian bystanders, and some rebels died as well.

February 10, 2007: The 1,200 French troops in Chad, especially the air force detachment, play a critical role in keeping the current government in power. With dozens of tribes to deal with president Deby presides over a constantly shifting coalition. The few hundred French infantry in the capital make sudden takeovers difficult, while the few French jets fighters operating out of the capital airport, keep an eye on the Sudanese border, and the Chad rebels based in, and supplied by, Sudan. What also attracts the raiders (rebels, bandits and many a little of both) is all the aid shipped in for the nearly 400,000 refugees camped along the border. All this is more civil disorder than war.

February 23, 2007: The Chad-Sudan border is becoming a playground for bandits, and neither Sudan nor Chad has the troops, or the will, to impose order. There is talk of sending peacekeepers, but the region is truly in the middle of nowhere, far away from the kind of logistical support a peacekeeping force would require. Even journalists have a hard time reaching the area. Misery, however, has no problem getting here, and thriving.

February 12, 2007: There are now over 100,000 Chadian refugees living in refugee camps along the Sudan border. Refugees from Sudan have been moving into the area for nearly four years, and the international relief agencies, and all their food, equipment and cash, followed. This has changed the economy along the border. There is more banditry, because there is more to steal, from the greater number of people in this semi-arid region. There are now nearly half a million Sudanese refugees in Chad.

February 15, 2007: Officials from Chad and Sudan met and agreed not to support rebel movements in each others territory. But this does not deal with the problem of banditry and tribal disputes. Western Sudan has become a madhouse of refugees, bandits and disorder

February 17, 2007: Aid agencies are unable to protect their food convoys by hiring local tribesmen as guards, or paying bribes to local bandits. Some of the convoys are getting raided anyway. There are too many bandit gangs running around to keep track of them all, and pay off enough of them to protect the food, and other aid.

February 19, 2007: Rebels attacked Fada, the northern home town of Chadian president Deby. The army garrison in Fada repulsed the raiders, but suffered 63 dead, 43 wounded and 34 captured. The raiders suffered higher casualties, and apparently attacked in an effort to obtain food and other supplies.

February 24, 2007: Chad has responded positively to the UN proposal for 11,000 peacekeepers. But some Chad media have called the proposed UN force of foreign troops an army of occupation.

February 28, 2007:Chad has now rejected a UN proposal to send in 11,000 peacekeepers, and demanded a force of police instead. Chad changed its mind when it realized that foreign troops would imply "foreign occupation," while police would not. Chad had agreed to a peacekeeping force last November, but as the UN sought international support for such an operation, groups (many hostile to the government) inside Chad began to call peacekeepers an "occupation force."

March 1, 2007: In the northeast, fighting broke out. There were over fifty casualties, including at least 18 dead. This was apparently a tribal clash, more than a typical rebel raid on a town or a refugee camp. Elsewhere in the north, rebels raided an army camp and stole three vehicles.

March 3, 2007: The UN is somewhat relieved that Chad has rejected peacekeepers. That's because UN logistical planners have discovered that it would be very expensive to get peacekeepers to Chad, and keeping them supplied there. The Chad-Sudan border is, literally, in the middle of nowhere. It's a thinly populated, arid part of the world, far from good transportation, roads, sources of adequate water, and basic supplies. Sending in police imposes a smaller logistic burden, but also provides less firepower, and more vulnerability to attack. The Chad government argues that the raiders are lightly armed and not professional soldiers. Well armed (with machine-guns and mortars) police could handle the rebels and raiders. However, few countries are eager to send their police into that kind of environment. Now its been suggested that infantry be called police (perhaps "Military Police") and sent in.

March 4, 2007: The 320,000 refugees in eastern Chad are still getting raided by armed groups from Sudan (Darfur) and Chad. About 20 percent of the refugees are from Chad, driven out of their villages by Sudanese raiders (for the most part, some fled fighting between Chadian factions.) There are thousands of Chadian refugees who have not found their way to refugee camps, but are instead staying with relatives in other villages. There are three major rebel groups, all from Arab tribes in eastern and northern Chad. As in Darfur, these Arab groups are mainly attacking black African tribes. Some of the Chad rebels, however, are fighting with the Sudanese raiders (also from Arab tribes).

March 5, 2007:In the Central African Republic, rebel forces attacked French troops, but were repulsed, and then attacked by French warplanes. In Chad, the rebel group FUC made peace with the government, and three FUC leaders became government officials. The new Minister of Defense is the former head of the FUC. This is the way things usually work in Chad.

March 6, 2007:The government has now changed its mind on peacekeepers, and will not even allow the advance team (about a hundred UN personnel) to come in and prepare the way for a larger peacekeeping force. Apparently the Chad president feared UN peacekeepers would force him to make an unfavorable peace deal with the rebels operating along the Sudan border.

March 9, 2007:The growing violence in the Central African Republic has caused over 50,000 refugees from the country to move into southern Chad.

March 13, 2007:The government has reached a stalemate with the rebels on the Sudan border, but at the cost of security in the area. Bandits and rebels continue to loot and steal. UN aid convoys and warehouses are popular targets, and the government cannot guard all of them. Food rations for refugees have been cut, and will continue to decline as the stealing increases.

March 15, 2007: In the Central African Republic, the town of Birao, in the center of the country, was attacked by the rebels earlier this month, and subsequent battles with government forces have caused nearly all the people (nearly 14,000) to flee. Over 600 buildings in the town were destroyed. UN aid workers can't even find the refugees, who are believed cowering in the bush somewhere, out there.

March 22, 2007: Sudanese aircraft bombed two villages near the Sudan border. Sudan denied this, but it has happened before (last Fall, for example).

March 24, 2007: The Central African Republic is willing to accept UN peacekeepers, but Chad refuses, holding out for a police force. The UN is running out of options. The bandits roaming the region prey on the aid workers, forcing refugee camps to be abandoned by the UN. It's too dangerous for journalists, so not a lot of video is getting out to show the extent of the disaster. In the middle of nowhere, and it's a lot of hell on earth. But without a video presence on the Internet and network news, it doesn't exist.

March 25, 2007: The region encompassing western Sudan (Darfur), eastern Chad and the Central African Republic, has reverted to its ancient status as a lawless land, terrorized by groups of warriors from the dozens of tribes that occupy the area. Weapons, especially AK-47s and RPG launchers, have been provided by the governments of Sudan and Libya (although Libya is not nearly as active in this as it used to be). Government forces have uniforms and guys pretending to be officers, but are not much more effective than the tribal thugs they face. It's Mad Max, but with real bullets and real blood.

April 6, 2007: Chadian forces, pursuing the Sudanese tribal raiders who had earlier torched villages in Chad, entered Sudan. A Chadian helicopter was used to help track the Sudanese raiders. There were several skirmishes between the Chadian and Sudanese forces. In some cases, Sudanese army troops came to the aid of the Sudanese tribal raiders returning from Chad.

April 10, 2007: Chad apologized for fighting Sudanese army troops in Sudan, but insisted it was unintentional, as Chadian forces were pursuing tribal rebels, and the Sudanese army forces seemed to be working with the raiders.

April 13, 2007: The main obstacle to a peacekeeping force in Chad and western Sudan appears to be Libya, and its unstable dictator, Muammar Kadhafi. Libya has long been involved in Chadian politics, providing guns and money for pro-Libyan tribes. In the 1980s, Libya even sent troops into Chad, but these were quickly defeated by Chadian tribesmen. This is a humiliation that Kadhafi has never forgotten. But, mainly, Kadhafi simply doesn't want Western peacekeepers in his backyard. Too many Westerners speaking to too many of the locals will discover too many stories of Libyan meddling in the area. Libya can influence the leaders of Sudan and Chad by reminding them of Libya’s ability to stir up trouble by supporting rebels. Libya has been doing this for decades, and it is no idle threat.

April 14, 2007: Chad apologized to Sudan for casualties Chadian troops inflicted when a border battle against raiders spread into Sudan. But Chad said they would continue to pursue raiders and rebels across the border into Sudan.

May 3, 2007: In Saudi Arabia, Sudan and Chad signed a peace deal, brokered by the Saudis. Both sides agreed to stop supporting rebels from the other country. Deals like this have been made before, and quickly broken. The rebel groups have not been consulted, and neither country has the ability to shut down all the rebels.

May 5, 2007: Darfur rebels have refused to stay out of Chad, thus dooming the new peace deal with Sudan. Nothing has changed. What's going on between Chad and Sudan is an extension of the ethnic cleansing in Darfur. The president of Chad, Indris Deby, is a black African, and thus not trusted by the ethnic (mostly) Arab rulers of Sudan. Chad is, like many African countries, divided by religion. The northern tribes are Moslem, the southern ones are Christian. Moreover, some of the northern tribes of Chad are Arab, or largely Arab. These ethnic and religious differences have been causing violence in this neighborhood for centuries. The situation is not going to be changed quickly.

May 19, 2007: Various government and rebel (against either Sudan or Chad) groups continue to plot and maneuver against each other along the Sudan border. The peace deal signed two weeks ago, at the insistence of Saudi Arabia, is having no more impact than the previous two, negotiated by Libya. Chad has also signed a deal to demobilize its child (under 18) soldiers. This was done to ensure continued UN aid, and to keep the UN donor nations happy. Child soldiers have become a popular cause in the West. In Chad, child soldiers have never been an issue. For thousands of years, if a boy was big enough to handle a weapon, he went off with the other men to fight. That usually meant kids as young as 14 or 15 would join the tribal war band. If he survived his first clash, his marriage prospects improved considerably. What has changed now is that automatic weapons, and firearms in general, have lowered the age, by 5-6 years, at which a kid can be armed and dangerous. Moreover, warlords have replaced tribal elders as the recruiters. The warlords often coerce kids to join up, whereas tribal elders had to use a more friendly approach. Libya and Saudi Arabia are continuing a long running feud (over who is the leader of the Arab world) via their support for different rebel factions in Chad. Libya has been interfering in Chadian affairs for decades, partly because parts of northern Chad are claimed by Libya. In Chad, the rebels are motivated partly by ancient tribal feuds, and partly over who gets how much of the new oil wealth. Chad, like most African countries, was assembled by European colonizers two centuries ago. The normal nation building process, is for all the tribes and ethnic groups to work out a unification arrangement over time. Many African nations are still trying to work out the terms of unification, which is accompanied by much rebellion and violence. The UN is still trying to get Chad to accept peacekeepers, but Chad doesn't want foreign troops on its territory. Partly, this is because Chad sees this as a UN ploy to get peacekeepers into Sudan. Chad depends on handouts from oil-rich Arab countries, and all of these Arab nations are opposed to peacekeepers in Sudan. Chad also doesn't want peacekeepers, because these foreign troops make it easier for foreign journalists to see and record the various dirty dealings Chadian leaders regularly participate in. So the violence will continue, at a low level, until the various Chadian factions can work out a deal to share power and the oil money, or until someone gains a military advantage, and can run their opponents (the leaders, anyway) out of the country. Meanwhile, a similar situation exists in neighboring Central African Republic (CAR), except there the central government is weaker, and there's no oil money to fight over (just power and real estate). As in Chad, a few thousand French troops help keep the pro-French government in power.

June 23, 2007: There are now a dozen refugee camps in eastern Chad, holding nearly 400,000 people (30 percent from Chad, the rest from Darfur.) There are only 235 Chadian police providing security, meaning there is no security at all. Various Chad and Darfur irregulars and bandits raid the camps at will. A lot of the violence is from locals, who find themselves competing with large numbers of refugees for scarce resources, like wood for cooking, or water. The Chadian army is in the east, but its main concern are rebel groups that might head for the interior, the capital and an attempt to overthrow the government. The refugees are someone else's problem. The trouble is that "someone else" doesn't have any soldiers.

May 26, 2007: UN food aid has been suspended in the eastern Chad town of Iribia, after aid workers were attacked. That food operation supplies 56,000 Darfur refugees in three camps. Bandits and rebel groups rob and intimidate aid workers, in order to get food and other supplies for themselves.

May 29, 2007: Chad has refused to allow UN peacekeepers on its border with Darfur, because Sudan has threatened undeclared war if that happens.

May 30, 2007: Thousands of government employees have been on strike for a month now. Hospitals and schools are closed. Salaries are less that they were twenty years ago because of currency devaluations in the 1990s, and the pay isn't enough to live on. People know the new oil income is being stolen by government officials, or used to pay for the war with the rebels. The government has its priorities, and is sticking to them.

June 17, 2007: Unable to get Chad to agree to an overland truck route guarded by French peacekeepers, France has begun airlifting food to southeastern Chad, where the need is greatest. About a hundred troops are guarding the aircraft landing areas.

June 22, 2007: Libya has coerced Chadian leaders into attending peace talks in Libya. But Chad rebels want part of the oil money and more say in national level decision making, and the Chad leadership doesn't want to give up that much. Right now, the oil money is paying off enough tribes and warlords to keep the current crew in power. But it's a delicate balance, and balance is not a natural state of affairs in Chad.

July 13, 2007: Over 20,000 Chadian Arabs have moved into Darfur, to escape raids by Chadian African tribal militias. These armed groups are retaliating because of the raids by Sudanese and Chadian Arab tribal militias. These Arab groups are supported by the Sudanese government, which is run by the Sudanese Arabs. So far this year, these raids have caused over 120,000 people, most of them non-Arab, in eastern Chad to flee their homes. Peace talks have gone nowhere, and Chad continues to refuse permission for European peacekeepers to impose order in the east. Chad's armed forces are unable to stop the raiding, and the government fears that letting foreign troops in will spark a wider civil war.

July 19, 2007: After months of badgering by the UN, and especially France, Chad president Idris Deby has agreed to allow European Union peacekeepers in eastern Chad. How many and when was not mentioned. The EU plan is to send helicopters with the force so that a zone on the Sudanese border, 900 kilometers long, and up to 400 kilometers deep, can be cleared of illegal armed groups. This is expected to result in some fighting with the various armed factions

July 24, 2007: No one has offered their troops for the European Union peacekeeper force headed to Chad. But France is expected to contribute most of them, and cajole or shame others to pitch in. That said, it's going to take up to six months to get this force organized. Many European nations are uneasy about sending troops to Chad. This is in reaction to opposition politicians in Chad threatening violence if foreign troops enter the country. There are already some French troops there, to help keep president Deby in power. But more are not wanted by most of the dozens of tribes that make up Chad. The tribes have never gotten along well.

July 31, 2007: President Girma Wolde Giorgis of Ethiopia takes time off to relax after a hard day of presidential duty’

August 7, 2007: Despite Sudan's insistence that it no longer supports Chadian rebels, the Chad government believes that negotiations with the rebels are deadlocked because of continued support from Sudan. Perhaps in reaction to that, Chad will now allow several thousand UN and AU (African Union) peacekeepers in eastern Chad, to help patrol the Sudanese border. In this area, raiders from both sides of the border continue to attack villages and refugee camps. The Chadian army is too thin on the ground to stop this, and is more concerned with keeping the rebels out of the main towns, and off the main roads, especially the one that takes you to the capital.

September 2, 2007: Eastern Chad is still suffering from bandits and rebels operating in the area. There been some pretty violent fighting around the town of Guerada recently. There was a major battle here last December, as rebels fought to take the place. The rebels lost, but the violence led to a peace deal with the rebels. The head of the rebel coalition (of tribes) joined the government in March as Minister of Defense. But not all members of the rebel coalition were satisfied. Chadian president Deby is from the Zaghawa tribe, which is seen, in typical African fashion, as keeping all the goodies (especially the oil money) for itself. No matter what Deby says or does, many rival tribesmen will not believe him. It's only natural to grab all you can, when you can, to benefit your tribe. In this part of the world, people have always (well, for at least 10,000 years) lived from season to season. Too little rain one year, and a lot of people die. It's one of those droughts that kicked off the current civil war in eastern Chad. The Zaghawa tribe forced the nearby Tama off their lands, and water. The Tama accused the government of backing the Zaghawa, and put together a coalition of eleven pissed off tribes. President Deby is trying to convince these tribes that they have been paid off. Food aid has been allowed into the region, along with other forms of foreign assistance. But spillover from the Darfur war next door in Sudan has also let loose Sudanese and Chadian tribes who are ethnically Arab, and not black (like the Zaghawa, and the Tama led coalition). Every week there are several raids, and it's not always clear who is doing the raids. So the usual suspects are accused, regardless of who was really the culprit. The UN wants to bring peacekeepers into the midst of all this, but the governments of Chad and Sudan oppose this. Neither wants armed foreigners getting involved with internal politics. But the foreigners are under pressure from their voters to end the violence, which is upsetting.

September 15, 2007: Chad's neighbor, the Central African Republic (CAR) has been torn by a tribal conflict since November 2001, when former CAR Army Chief of Staff General Francois Bozize and his supporters fled to Chad after fighting broke out in CAR's capital Bangui. For two years, Libya provided troops to help keep the new government secure. But in 2003, Bozize and his armed followers returned, and the unpopular Ange-Félix

Patassé fled. Sort of. Patassé supporters, and people who simply opposed Bozize, or government in general, got guns, and adopted an attitude that they are a law unto themselves. Northwestern CAR was always a lawless place, made worse by years of civil war in nearby Chad, and heavy poaching activity from nearby Sudan. The area is sparsely populated, dry and lightly policed. Smugglers and nomads move about, and have always carried weapons for protection. Since the demise of the Soviet Union in 1991, the area has been flooded by cheap weapons, especially AK-47s, RPGs and light machine-guns. The current disorder in CAR, and the inability to suppress it, is an all too common state of affairs in this part of the world. Although Bozize has run elections, democracy does not automatically overcome tribalism. The unrest in the border area between CAR, Chad and Sudan has been going on for a long, long time. It's not likely to go away any time soon, but it is also unlikely to rise above the level of civil disorder and banditry. Nearly two years ago, Followers of former president Ange-Félix Patassé somehow got financing for another uprising. Gunmen were hired, by professional organizers, for a major military operation. It's difficult to keep these things secret, although you can hide the identity of the top people for a while. Where's the money coming from? Libya used to be the usual suspect, but has said publicly that they are out of the coup game. The most likely supporter is Sudan, which has been financing rebel groups in several neighboring countries. Current president Francois Bozize has many enemies, including many soldiers he demobilized after he took power in 2003. These former soldiers are unhappy with the payments they received for their faithful service (in supporting the Bozize coup against Patassé.) Some of these lads have taken to banditry, others still have their guns, and would be willing to use them again for a big payday. Bozize has formed a "presidential guard" of some of the nastiest gunmen available, and turned them loose on any area that seems to be supporting opposition to the government. The presidential guard is basically a terror force, killing and looting to make their point. Bozize also has the support of France, for the moment. France wants peace and quiet. At the moment, Bozize is the only viable leader in CAR, but the minute a better one shows up, the French will likely drop Bozize.

September 17, 2007: Chad has agreed to allow 3,000 European peacekeepers to set up shop along the Sudanese border, and protect several hundred Sudanese and Chadian refugees from attack. Some of the attackers have been Chadian soldiers, so this bit of peacekeeping could get tricky. The Sudanese border is out-of-control, with rebels from Chad and Sudan, as well as Chadian soldiers and bandits from both countries, fighting each other. All these gunmen live off raiding villages and refugee camps. Some receive support from the governments of Chad or Sudan (a few have managed to take payments from both governments). Some of the local people believe the Europeans can sort it all out. The Europeans are not so sure, but are committed to giving it a try.

September 27, 2007: The big problem with putting 3,000 peacekeepers in eastern Chad, is logistics. There are few roads and, more importantly, few airfields. These resources are already being used to near capacity by relief groups, who maintain camps for over half a million refugees from Chad, Sudan and the Central African Republic (CAR). There is a solution to some of this, and that is air drops. The U.S. has GPS guided parachutes for supply pallets. These can precisely land the supplies anywhere. But this is even more expensive than just landing the transport and unloading. The high cost of peacekeeping in the middle of nowhere will eventually become an issue. The peacekeepers won't all arrive until the end of the year. Meanwhile, the government has signed a deal with a Chinese firm to build an oil refinery. The Chinese were generous with the bribes, something that the government has had trouble with in dealing with Western banks and suppliers. Getting a piece of this growing oil wealth is what a lot of the current rebel activity is all about. Before the oil money showed up, there were tribal feuds, which are still there. But the oil money is more of an incentive to fight than some ancient tribal dispute. The government expects a net gain from having the 3,000, mainly French, peacekeepers on the Sudan border. Any dead rebels or bandits mean less threats to the existing government. The Chad army has been unable to shut down the tribal rebels, Sudanese raiders, freelance bandits and assorted bad guys from CAR.

October 5, 2007: The four largest rebel groups and the government have agreed to a three week truce, starting on October 3rd. During that time, there will be an attempt to work out a final peace deal. Negotiations, sponsored, and often held in, Libya, have been underway since June. The goal is to resolve all the territorial and tribal issues, and merge rebel combat units into the Chad armed forces. There's also the issue of how much of the new oil money will change hands and what top jobs in the government that rebel leaders will get. The plans for thousands of Western peacekeepers to move into the area by the end of the year apparently encouraged the rebels to make a deal. The small French contingent of army and air force troops in Chad has regularly demonstrated their ability to hurt the rebels, at little cost to themselves. The French have been vigorously encouraging the government to make a deal. Without that French support, Chadian governments usually don't last long. Libya shares a border with Chad, and likes to act like a peacemaker (even though it has financed Chadian opposition groups in the past.)

October 6, 2007: Some rebel groups declared that they were not satisfied with some of the details of the peace deal.

October 12, 2007: Over 500 soldiers, former members of the FUC rebel group, deserted their positions and moved towards the Sudan border. Their former boss, now the Defense Minister, said it was all a misunderstanding.

October 15, 2007: As a result of the earlier desertion of Chadian troops, tribal violence between members of the Tama and Zaghawa, broke out in one of the towns the troops had abandoned. This has led to about twenty people killed so far. Meanwhile, the European Union says that the first of 3,000 European peacekeepers will arrive in November.

October 16, 2007: The government declared a state of emergency in the east, where fighting has broken out between the Tama and Zaghawa tribes. President Deby belongs to the Zaghawa.

October 18, 2007: There has been some fighting in the east, involving rebels who disagreed with the terms under which they would disarm.

October 19, 2007: So far this month, about 300 have died in fighting in eastern Chad.

October 20, 2007: In the north, the Movement for Democracy and Justice in Chad (MDJT) rebels have kidnapped a Christian missionary and are negotiating a ransom. The MDJT has been skirmishing with the government since 1998, in the far north, along the Libyan border. Led by Mahmat Choua Dazi, MDJT earned some gratitude from the United States by chasing down Islamic terrorists who tried to cross through MDJT controlled territory. Neither the hundred or so MDJT members, nor several other tiny rebel groups, are strong enough to bring down the government, especially as long as France maintains several thousand troops in the country. But the government has never been strong enough to take down the rebels either. The MDJT, and most other self-declared rebels, survive on banditry, shaking down relief groups and getting subsidies from foreign countries (Sudan, Libya, or anyone who wants to mess with Chad.)

October 26, 2007: The government, and four rebel groups (UFDD, RFC, DNT and UFDD-F) signed a peace deal in Libya. There is to be an immediate cease fire, amnesty all around, freeing of hostages, and rebel officials are to be integrated into the government. That, in effect, is a payoff, in order to obtain the cooperation of these rebel leaders. The negotiations were supported by the UN and African Union.

October 28, 2007: Several rebel groups have not agreed to take part in the new peace treaty, or have a different interpretation of the October 26 agreement. The SLA-UC rebels didn't sign the deal, UFDD called the agreement merely a declaration of principle, while the RFC has already declared the deal null and void. The first of 4,000 European peacekeepers will start arriving next month, and they are prepared to fight. No one with any knowledge of Chadian history would think that the many factions in the region would make peace without fighting. There are periods of much less fighting, which occur when the government has enough military power to terrify many groups, and enough money to bribe the rest. There are over a hundred tribes in Chad, and most believe they should be getting more from the government. Many of those are willing to fight for more goodies. This fighting was going on long before Chad was created as a French colony in 1900. The colony became an independent nation in 1960. About half the population, in the north, are Moslem. Those in the south are mainly Christian. The northern and southern tribes do not get along, and that has been the main source of violence for centuries. It's similar to the situation in Darfur, with the northern tribes considering themselves "Arab," and therefore superior to the southern, or "African" tribes. More so than Darfur, the tribal divisions are more intense and violent.

November 13, 2007: The raiding in eastern Chad has died down since the peace deal was signed. Most of the armed groups appear to be waiting to see what will happen when the European peacekeepers arrive in the next month or so. The rebel and bandit groups will push the peacekeepers, to see what mischief can still be done.

November 15, 2007: The UN peacekeeping force being organized for Chad is having trouble getting donor nations to provide helicopters. Without choppers, the force will not be able to cover the vast distances along the Chad-Sudan border. NATO peacekeepers in Afghanistan have had the same problem, and are turning to leased helicopters, with the crews receiving "hazardous duty" pay.

November 24, 2007: Two of the four rebel groups, UFDD (Union of Forces for Democracy and Development) and the RFC (Assembly of Forces for Change), declared that the government had not met the terms of the peace deal signed last month. Thus the one month ceasefire was over and these two were resuming combat.

November 25, 2007: Over the weekend, rebel gunmen invaded several refugee camps and beat aid workers. One security guard was shot. The UFDD and RFC rebels have renounced the peace deal, and threatened violence. The refugee camps have become targets for all manner of bandit groups and individual criminals.

November 26, 2007: Along the Sudan border, troops attacked a rebel (UFDD) convoy, destroying 40 vehicles, capturing 50 and killing several hundred rebels. The UFDD later issued a press release denying such a defeat, and insisting it was the government forces that got hosed.

November 28, 2007: The peace deal is dead. The UFDD sent a force to capture Abeche, the largest town in eastern Chad, and headquarters for most of the aid organizations catering to the 250,000 refugees in the region. A year ago, rebels raided the town, but left after 24 hours, as army reinforcements approached. The rebels got away with many captured weapons. Abeche is about 850 kilometers from the capital. This time, the army stopped the rebel force before they got into the town. Over the weekend, another UFDD column (of nearly a hundred vehicles) approached other towns, but were driven off. French armed helicopters are assisting the Chadian army.

December 6, 2007: The civil war has revived, with most of the rebel groups renouncing the recent peace deal, and back at war with the government. Meanwhile, the 4,500 European peacekeepers are on hold because they cannot find a way to get the needed helicopters to support them. There's also a reluctance to move into a situation that will apparently require peace making (and casualties) rather than peacekeeping. The NGO aid groups in Chad are very upset at all this, as the increased violence makes it more difficult to supply over 400,000 refugees in NGO administered camps. Rebels have clashed with the army at least four times in the last week. Hundreds have died, most of them rebels. The army has a major advantage in the form of several French warplanes. Chad also has some armed helicopters. The French air attacks have angered the rebels to the point where the rebels have openly "declared war" on France and threatened to target French soldiers if the French led peacekeeping force ever shows up. The rebels are upset because the peace deal calls for many of them to turn in their weapons. Eastern Chad is a rough neighborhood, the government is not trusted, and no one wants to be unarmed. There are already about 1,100 French troops in Chad. Like most former French colonies in Africa, France offers military assistance to any government that seems to have control over most of the country. France may have to go it alone, and send in more of its own troops. The other peacekeeper nations are less attached to Chad, and reluctant to send their soldiers into what is turning into a very violent part of the world.

December 13, 2007: More refugee camps are cut off by rebel activity. Armed men, who may be rebels or bandits, are showing up on the roads the relief supply convoys use. When this happens, the relief convoys don't, because the guys with guns will loot or steal the trucks full of food and other supplies. The NGO relief groups are demanding that the 3,500 European peacekeepers get here fast. But because of a lack of helicopters, the arrival of the peacekeepers has been put off until next month. The peacekeepers might not even show up in January, as some of the contributing nations are becoming alarmed at how dangerous the situation is. And no one has sufficient helicopters and transport aircraft to contribute. The recent flare up in violence was a shock, as the rebels had just recently signed a peace deal. But that's happened before, and will happen again. Rebellion is the normal state in Chad, and it's gotten worse now that there's oil wealth to fight over.

December 14, 2007: With most of the army in eastern Chad, there's nothing to stop bandits from doing as they please in the rest of the country. Aid groups are favorite targets, because they tend to have the most gadgets and the newest vehicles.

December 29, 2007: The UN peacekeeping force was supposed to have boots on the ground last October. Now, it might be next month, or maybe never. France, Sweden, the Netherlands, Poland, Austria and Ireland have all pledged troops, but are all put off by the logistical problems and the prospect of hard fighting once their troops arrive. Ireland discovered that it would cost $30 million to transports its 450 troops, and all their gear, to Chad. This would be done via Antonov 124 transports, leased from a Ukrainian firm, at a cost of $9,000 an hour. Just getting the advance party of 50 troops and 12 vehicles there will cost $9 million. The Chad peacekeeping force is trying to lease helicopters from Ukrainian firms as well. Chad is 2,000 kilometers from the nearest port, and has no railroads, and few roads. Meanwhile, Chad is telling the Europeans that the longer they delay getting their peacekeepers on the ground, the more time the rebels will have to recruit and arm more fighters. Chad insists that Sudan is sending arms to the rebels, and the rebels are going around offering local teenagers guns and money, and the prospect of loot, if they join up. That's a hard offer to refuse, and the rebel ranks are growing week by week. These kids may not be a match for European troops, but they are effective enough to rob peacekeepers and rape refugees. The support from Sudan is apparently given with the idea that if the peacekeepers have too many people shooting at them, they will either withdraw, or just hunker down in their camps. At the moment, there is still no firm date for the arrival of the first peacekeepers.

January 6, 2008: The government made a deal with Sudanese rebels (JEM), and launched a combined offensive against Chad rebels operating along the Sudan border. This involved support from Chad Air Force aircraft. Sudan protested, and accused Chad of launching attacks into Sudan, and bombing a town inside Sudan. No proof was offered, and Sudan was probably reacting to radio messages from Sudanese troops along the border who did not have a GPS receiver with them. Chad insisted it was on its own side of the border, but threatened to cross the border if Sudan did not stop providing sanctuary for the rebels. Three or four days of clashes produced about a hundred casualties, and the Chad rebels retreated into Sudan. The 4,000 European Union peacekeepers have still not arrived, and are being delayed by difficulty in establishing adequate logistics. Supporting that many troops in the middle of nowhere (as far as transportation systems go) is more of a daunting task than the Europeans expected.

January 18, 2008: In eastern Chad, the rebel ANR (Alliance for National Resistance) claimed to have shot down one of the army's two Mi-24 helicopter gunships, and forcing the other helicopters (including several Mi-17 transports) to stay on the ground. The ANR used a SAM 7 portable air-to-ground missile. If they have a few dozen of these missiles, the government helicopters are at great risk.

January 22, 2008: Switzerland complained that Chad has been arming its three PC-7 and one PC-9 trainers. The 2.7 and 3.2 ton single engine aircraft look like World War II fighters, and are equipped to carry up to a ton of bombs and gun pods. But Switzerland has laws prohibiting the export of weapons to a war zone, especially since Chad is believed to have used these aircraft to make attacks in neighboring Sudan. Chad is in the middle of a border war with Sudan, and a civil war with several tribal groups, and is expected to ignore the Swiss complaints.

January 25, 2008: The commander of Irelands commando units, and three other soldiers, arrived in the capital, to finalize preparations for the arrival of fifty more Irish troops in a week, and another 350 in two months. The EU peacekeepers were supposed to be in Chad three months ago, but shortages of equipment and nerve have delayed things.

January 30, 2008: Two columns of rebels (about 300 vehicles, and perhaps a thousand fighters) are headed from the Sudanese border, to the capital. Two years ago, the rebels tried the same thing, and failed. Back then, a few hundred rebels made it from the border (a road trip of about 800 kilometers) and into the capital, where they were killed or captured. About 90 percent of those rebels never made it to the capital, having been killed to driven off, while on the way, by government troops and aircraft. There's a smaller rebel force headed for the capital this time, and they are now about 250 kilometers away.

January 31, 2008: The UN has to withdraw workers from two of the dozen refugee camps it runs in eastern Chad. There are about a quarter million refugees in the area. Rebels and bandits have become increasingly bold in their attacks on the aid workers, stealing vehicles, office equipment, cash and food. The air workers hire local gunmen for security, but not enough to be everywhere all the time.

February 2, 2008: The government said it stopped the rebel advance on the capital, while France brought in a few hundred additional troops. But France is also evacuating the families of its troops, who live in the capital. This fighting has delayed the arrival of the 3,700 EU peacekeepers, although the EU says this is only a temporary delay. It is believed that the rebels made their run on the capital because they felt this would be more difficult once the EU troops were in Chad. The rebel column was halted about a hundred kilometers outside the capital. The government has told the UN that, in the future, it will pursue rebels into Sudan, to prevent these fellows from coming back and attacking more civilians and refugee camps.

February 4, 2008: After a weekend of fighting, a force of some 2,000 rebels lost their attempt to take the capital and moved back towards Sudan. The government had about 4,000 troops, and there were over a thousand casualties (with nearly 200 dead, including civilians caught in the crossfire). About 40,000 civilians fled the city. Government losses included the head of the army. The 1,400 French troops held the airport, and continued to provide the government with aerial photos of the situation (rebels around the capital, and what's going on along the Sudan border.)

February 10, 2008: Sudanese aircraft bombed several towns near the Chad border, sending over 10,000 people fleeing into Chad.

February 11, 2008: The remnants of the rebel force (about 150 vehicles) that attacked the capital is retreating towards the south, where the borders of Chad, Sudan and Central African Republic meet. The army is in pursuit, and believes that the rebels are running out of fuel. But the rebel vehicles probably have enough fuel to reach Sudan, and their camps. Apparently about a third of the rebel force were Sudanese. The Chad rebels are a coalition of groups that feel president Deby is not sharing power, and the new oil revenue, fairly. Some of the rebel leaders are related to Deby (the head of the RFC rebels is his nephew), which makes it something of a family squabble. This rebellion wouldn't amount to much without the support of Sudan, which provides sanctuary in Sudan, as well as weapons and equipment.

February 14, 2008: The government wants the UN to move nearly 300,000 Darfur refugees somewhere else. The rebels along the border live off these refugee camps, and it was this source of supply that helped make possible the recent rebel attempt to take the capital. The government says that if the UN doesn't act, the army will force the refugees back into Sudan. Meanwhile, the first European peacekeepers, delayed by the recent fighting, are to start arriving next week. The Chad rebels have already declared the peacekeepers as enemies. Assuming the peacekeeping force is active, the rebels won't have another chance to make a run for the capital.

March 2, 2008: There are now 50,000 Central African Republic (CAR) refugees in southern Chad. In the east, some of the over 300,000 refugees (most of them from Sudan) are being moved away from the border, to better protect them from the Sudanese Arab militias that drove the refugees out of Sudan in the first place, and Chadian rebels and bandits. The refugee camps, and the relief agency facilities (headquarters, living quarters and warehouses) remain a source of loot for all the irregular forces in the area. About 3,000 refugees a week are still coming across the Sudan border, to escape government and militia attacks on non-Arab villages. In the capital, the government is getting international pressure to release opposition politicians who were arrested when rebels stormed into the capital last month. Some of those arrested were known to be close to the rebels, but many simply opposed president Deby. Meanwhile, the government is apparently using its victory over the RFC rebel attempt to grab the capital, to resume secret negotiations with other rebel groups. Chad is made up of dozens of tribal groups, most capable to producing armed rebels if conditions are right. The feeling that they are not getting a fair share of the new oil wealth is a new cause for people to feel slighted, and a reason to start gunning for president Idris Deby. The parliament has extended the State of Emergency for another 15 days, to March 15th. Suspends many legal protections for citizens, making Chad more of a police state.

European peacekeepers are slowly arriving, with about 500 there now, and about 3,000 to arrive by the end of the month. Some of the peacekeepers are commandos, and recon missions are being carried out, along with the building of camps. That means, next month there could be clashes between European Union (EU) peacekeepers and various armed groups operating along the Sudanese border. March 5, 2008: Russia has agreed to supply helicopters, probably Mi-8s, for the peacekeeping force in Chad.

March 6, 2008: The government reported that 700 people died during the rebel assault on the capital last year. Nearly 60 percent of the dead were civilians, and most of the rest were rebels. These losses included those from skirmishes in the suburbs, but most of the fighting was near the presidential palace. During the two days of fighting, police and troops arrested several opposition politicians, who are still in jail.

March 13, 2008: Chad and Sudan have signed yet another peace deal. As usual, it includes promises not to support rebels in each other's territory. The president of nearby Senegal brokered the deal. At the time of the signing, Chad accused Sudan of allowing hundreds of Chad rebels to cross the border into Chad.

March 15, 2008: Chadian rebels want no part of the new Chad-Sudan peace deal. In fact, the RFC (Rally of Forces for Change) have threatened to raid Chad's oil fields. These facilities are relatively new, and the major source of revenue for the government.

March 16, 2008: The EU (European Union) peacekeeping force along Chad's eastern border declared itself open for business. Only about 30 percent of the 3,800 man force is on hand. The rest of the troops are supposed to show up in the next month. Maybe.

March 22, 2008: The rebel threat against the oil fields got the governments attention. This led to peace talks with the RFC, which is led by a nephew of Chad president Deby. The RFC is demanding cash and jobs (including some senior positions in the government.) The RFC, and three other rebel groups, signed a peace deal last October. But this soon collapsed when rebels accused the government of not delivering the promised goodies. Deby is accused of being corrupt and dictatorial. This, of course, is what you have to be if you want to survive as a tyrant.

March 23, 2008: The government openly accused Sudan of violating the peace agreement and helping rebels prepare for new attacks on the Chadian army.

April 1, 2008: Several hundred rebels from the National Alliance (the same crew that tried to capture the capital two months ago), attacked a government base on the border (near the village of Ade). They were repulsed, and appeared to retreat back into Sudan. The government accused Sudan of supporting this attack. The fighting spread to residential areas. Ade has a population of 1,000, plus another 10,000 Chadian refugees (from fighting between troops and rebels.) There were about 60 civilian casualties, including ten dead. There were another fifty military casualties from about four hours of fighting.

April 2, 2008: Sudan accuses Chad of sending troops across the border three times since yesterday.

April 4, 2008: In the capital, troops have expelled over 10,000 people (after destroying some 1,800 homes) that were believed to support the rebels who attacked two months ago. Loyalties are generally along tribal lines, and the government began seeking out disloyal people in the capital once the rebels were driven away.

April 5, 2008: The UN is running a country within a country. In Eastern Chad, 237,000 refugees from Darfur, living in camps with a population of 15,000-30,000, have become tempting targets form rebels and bandits looking for a meal (stolen) or love (rape). In the south, there are about 30,000 Central African Republic (CAR) refugees, in three smaller camps. In both the east and the south, there are even more refugees outside the camps, giving a total refugee population of over 300,000. The UN peacekeeping force is still slowly moving into the area, with about 2,000 troops in the capital and on the eastern border. The total force is to be 3,700 strong, but that won't happen until later this year.

April 6, 2008: It appears that over 20,000 people fled the capital, Ndjamena, in the wake of the rebel invasion in February. Most of them fled across the nearby border, into Cameroon and Nigeria. The army and police forcibly drove some 10,000, who belonged to tribes aligned with the rebels, out and destroyed nearly 2,000 homes.

April 9, 2008: The government believes that Sudan is allowing Chad rebels to gather right across the border, and prepare for another major military operation. Chad and Sudan signed a treaty last month agreeing not to do that sort of thing.

April 10, 2008: A Sudanese army captain fled to Chad with a million dollars in cash. This was part of a $3.4 million army payroll he was in charge of. The captain was paying Sudanese army units, as well as irregular tribal militias. Sudan has long denied that it provided any support for these pro-government militias. The Captain wanted to defect to one of the Sudanese rebel groups.

April 11, 2008: A fire in the Goz Amer refugee camp (on the Sudanese border) left 2,100 refugees homeless. There are still several thousand Sudanese refugees a week coming across the border. Most are heading for the Chad refugee camps, but at least 10,000 are staying in villages along the border, usually with kinsmen from a tribe that straddles the border. There are currently about 250,000 refugees in twelve camps. Over two-thirds are women and children. The men are either dead, off fighting or looking for work.

April 19, 2008: Some 1,800 of the 3.700 EU (European Union) peacekeepers have arrived in Chad. The entire force is supposed to be in Chad by the end of June. That will include helicopters, which are essential to enable the peacekeepers to watch over the huge (1,300 kilometers) border with Sudan. Meanwhile, the Chad rebels refuse to resume peace negotiations with the government, insisting that the government cannot be trusted. This conflict, like most past ones, is based on tribal loyalties and personal animosities.

April 23, 2008: Foreign food aid organizations plan to increase refugee food rations (which had been cut in half this month) in May, to restore them to normal.

April 26, 2008: Attempts to placate rebel groups by bringing some rebel leaders into the government (and paying them a share of the oil money) have failed. One of the largest rebel groups, the National Alliance, refused to participate and accused the government of being stingy and unreliable. The friction in Chad is largely based on personal animosity and tribal rivalries. It's difficult to make peace under these conditions.

May 2, 2008: The European peacekeeping force is still dribbling into Chad. Full strength of 3,700 troops won't be achieved until next month, if then. It's very slow going getting personnel and equipment into landlocked Chad. Meanwhile, NGOs and aid workers are at more risk. This week, the head of the "Save The Children" NGO was killed by men pretending to be soldiers (or maybe they were soldiers moonlighting as bandits). Many NGOs are pulling out of Chad, or planning to do so. If the European peacekeepers do not reduce the banditry and violence this Summer, a lot of the aid groups will be gone by the end of the year. The smart money is on the bandits.

May 3, 2008: Foreign aid groups ended a two day suspension of activity, in protest over the murder of one of their own, apparently by bandits. Police and peacekeepers are seeking the killers, but that will be difficult what with all the armed freelancers wandering around eastern Chad.

May 7, 2008: In the south, police arrested four EU peacekeepers. The four EU troops were in civilian clothes, trying to pass as tourists, and carrying out a reconnaissance mission. The EU and Sudan has signed a treaty that made EU troops immune from arrest, and the EU is upset with the Chad government for violating this agreement. There are about 2,400 EU troops in Chad, with another thousand or so on the way.

May 8, 2008: It was thirty years ago today that the Red Cross first began operating in Chad, to assist victims of a civil war. For as long as anyone can remember, the dozens of tribes that occupy Chad have been fighting each other.

May 10, 2008: In Sudan, the Darfur the Justice and Equality Movement (JEM) rebels made a daring attack on the capital, Khartoum. The rebels were stopped over a ten kilometers short of their goal. Because of the danger of coups, and civil unrest, Khartoum is full of police and troops, and fortifications. The chances of a few hundred JEM gunmen blasting their way in, and accomplishing anything, are slim to none.

May 11, 2008: The Sudanese accused Chad of backing the JEM attack on Khartoum, and severed diplomatic and economic relations. The border was closed. Sudan believed that Chad bankrolled the JEM attack in retaliation for an April attack by Chad rebels on the Chad capital (which got into the city and got pretty nasty.)

May 15, 2008: In sharp contrast to eastern Chad, the refugee camps of southern Chad are peaceful. About 17 percent of the 300,000 refugees in Chad are in the south. These are people fleeing civil war in the Central African Republic (CAR). The big difference is there are not trans-national tribes working both sides of the border. With Sudan, there are powerful tribes with interests on both sides of the border. Sudan and Chad battle each other by subsidizing these tribe-based rebel movements. Neither country wants the hassle of a formal war, and prefers this proxy form of conflict. No one will admit to anything, and the various rebel groups continue to receive support. Sudan, however, has increased its reward for the leader of JEM, to $2.5 million.

May 31, 2008: For the last two weeks, the government has had three armed helicopters (an armed Mi-171 transport helicopter and two Mi-35 helicopter gunships) operating along the Sudan border. This was to discourage attacks by Sudan backed rebel groups in the area. Sudan is still accusing Chad of supporting the May 10th attack on the Sudanese capital. The 1,200 man JEM rebel force lost at least a hundred men killed in the fighting, and several hundred wounded. But the JEM force was able to retreat, and drive back to Darfur in over a hundred trucks and smaller vehicles. Someone paid for the vehicles and heavy weapons, but no one is taking credit. In the past, Libya was often ready to finance rebel groups, but insists that it has given up that sort of thing. The most likely other suspect is the Chad government. They deny any connection. In response to the attack in Sudan, there was an increase in violence along the border, with small groups of gunmen attacking police and army patrols. The normal violence along the Sudan border continues. Basically, bandits and rebels continue to raid around the refugee camps and plunder the foreign aid groups. The European peacekeepers slowly arriving are expected to improve the security around these camps. That may be all the peacekeepers can do. Since the rebels and bandits can hide out on the Sudan side of the border, you have to catch them on the move or in the act. That's why the peacekeepers are so keen on getting helicopters or UAVs into the area. The Sudan border is 1,300 kilometers long, and over half of that is alive with these rebels and bandits. It will be a large scale game of hide and seek, with the bandits having an edge. That's because the bandits risk death if caught, while the peacekeepers only earn some frustration if they fail. Thus the bandits are likely to win this one, as they have the greater motivation.

June 12, 2008: National Alliance rebels, advancing from Sudan towards the town of Goz-Beida, fired on two Chadian military helicopters that were observing. One helicopter was badly damaged, but both landed safely. As is common in the region, heavy (12.7-14.5mm) machine-guns are mounted on the backs of trucks, for use against aircraft, vehicles, buildings or people. A massive international relief effort has come to the aid of the Darfur refugees in the past four years. Most of that has been paid for by the United States, which has contributed over $3 billion so far. The violence in Darfur has displaced over 4 million people (including half a million refugees in Chad) so far, and killed over a million (mainly in Darfur). There are about half a million refugees in eastern Chad. Two-thirds of them are from western Sudan (Darfur). The rest are Chadians driven from their homes by tribesmen (both Sudanese and Chadian) armed and supplied by the Sudanese government, which is dominated by Sudanese who are culturally Arabs, and are supporting the expulsion of Sudanese tribes that are non-Arab (sub-Saharan Africans, with a darker complexion, and culture, than their Arab countrymen). This conflict between "Arabs" and "blacks" has been going on for over a thousand years, even though, in Darfur, everyone is Moslem. For the last few days, National Alliance rebels have been shooting at relief convoys, and European peacekeeper patrols around Goz-Beida (which is 70 kilometers from the Sudan border, and 700 kilometers due west is the Chad capital.) There are 450 peacekeepers around Goz-Beida (390 Irish and 60 Dutch), as well as even more Chadian police and soldiers. There are two Darfur refugee camps near the town, holding a total of 36,000 people. There are another 15-20,000 Chad refugees in the area as well. Foreign relief operations are the constant target of attacks by rebels and bandits. All the goodies the foreigners have brought in are attractive to young men with guns. The relief groups hire locals as armed guards, but there have still been several dozen attacks on the roads, and the camps, over the last four years. The National Alliance are warning the French (who have 2,500 troops in the country, including a few warplanes) not to get involved. But at the same time, The National Alliance would like France to mediate an end to the civil war in Chad. European peacekeeper commanders, and Chadian Army leaders, do not believe the National Alliance is making a serious run for the capital again.

June 15, 2008: The Chadian National Alliance rebels, who made a run for the capital (N'Djamena) four months ago, now say they have sent four columns of gunmen west, to try again. These rebels are believed to be receiving guns, trucks and other supplies from Sudan. Moreover, Sudan is really, really angry that a column of Chadian supported Sudanese rebels from Darfur made it to the outskirts of the Sudanese capital last month. Very embarrassing, as it is a tenet of belief among the Sudanese leadership that the Sudanese Arabs are way superior to the black African scum who are being forcibly driven from their villages in Darfur. How could those lowlifes be capable of getting armed men to Sudan's capital? The Sudanese support Arab tribes in Chad, that want to replace the current government and get their hands on the recently developed oil wells.

June 16, 2008: The U.S. embassy in the capital has relocated most of its operations to neighboring Cameroon.

June 17, 2008: The Chadian National Alliance rebels continued their advance west, moving through several more major towns without encountering any major resistance from government forces. Meanwhile, the government complained that the EU peacekeeping force was doing nothing to keep the peace (by stopping the rebels.) The EU replied that it doesn't do rebels, and would restrict itself to protecting refugees, and civilians in general. The Chad government would have to protect itself.

June 18, 2008: Chad accused Sudan of sending its troops in, disguised as Chad rebels, to attack Chadian towns. Hard to tell, what with all the young guys with guns driving around in trucks and SUVs. Chad claimed to have stopped a rebel convoy at the town of Am-Zoer, which is 70 kilometers northwest of Abeche, which is itself a key town for the foreign aid groups running twelve major refugee camps in the vicinity. The Am-Zoer battle appears to have been a major one, with the government claiming 161 dead rebels, 23 captured and 61 rebel vehicles captured or destroyed. The rebels claim that in the past week their forces have captured a hundred soldiers, and both sides have suffered over 300 casualties (dead and wounded). Air operations have been interrupted because of roadblocks and cuts in local phone service.

June 19, 2008: The government victory at Am-Zoer quickly eliminated the chaos that had shut down many foreign aid activities. Suddenly, the roads are open and the phones are working.

June 25, 2008: The Chadian National Alliance rebels have been beaten again, and the survivors of the recent offensive have fled back to Sudan. The rebel force was apparently over a thousand men, and less than a third of them got back across the border. Many have surrendered to the Chad army. Chad is still angry with the EU peacekeepers for not helping out, although the French appear to have provided some crucial intelligence (aerial photos of rebel movements). But it was up to the army to confront the rebels and fight it out. This recent rebel defeat appears to have demoralized Sudan, which has seen four National Alliance offensives fail.

Apparently as a result, Sudan and Chad military leaders are meeting in Senegal to discuss how to better patrol their mutual border.

June 27, 2008: EU peacekeepers got a taste of the local madness when pro-government troops in the border town of Abeche, leaving at least one man dead and several wounded. It was apparently friendly fire, started when some troops did the customary celebration (of something or other) by firing into the air. That was misinterpreted as an attack, by another group of pro-government gunmen nearby, and the battle began.

July 2, 2008: Some 300 kilometers southeast of the capital, a local holy man, or "marabout," organized a group of armed (mostly with primitive weapons) followers to launch a holy war ("Jihad") against local Christians. The 28 year old marabout refused to receive political and religious emissaries from the government. After 700 of the marabouts followers attacked the town of Kouno, burning down nearly 200 buildings (including four churches and a police station), the troops moved in, killing over 70 of the marabouts followers and dispersing the others. The marabout and seven of his lieutenants were arrested and taken back to the capital. The government considered the marabout a fairly common phenomenon, as such Islamic radical leaders are popular in this part of the world.

July 3, 2008: The Red Cross has withdrawn several of its officials from Chad because of an increased threat to the security of foreign aid workers. Meanwhile, continued bandit activity has interrupted enough food shipments to drive up local food prices. Free foreign food aid isn't getting through either. The bandits that steal the food either take their loot to distant areas for sale, or the local merchants (who buy from the bandits) they sell it to store much of it away in order to jack up prices. Local food prices are over 50 percent higher than a year ago. The UN is trying to train, and equip, local police to better protect the roads, and food convoys. But this is a long term project. It will take more foreign, especially European (with helicopters) peacekeepers to make a dent in the bandit population (many of the rebel groups and pro-government paramilitaries moonlight as bandits).

July 9, 2008: UN and EU peacekeepers are trying to coordinate their operations in Darfur and Chad because, despite denials from the governments of those two countries, the ethnic violence in the region has spread to both countries and is interconnected. The peacekeepers want to make sure that the bad guys do not use that border as a way to get away from pursuers. Some peacekeeper commanders want the Darfur-Chad area to be considered a single theater of operations, and to ignore the border, just as the various paramilitary groups do.

July 10, 2008: Over the last two days, several dozen young men have been harassing NGOs providing food and medical care to 11,000 refugees in eastern Chad. The violence appears to be a combination of locals jealous of all the goodies provided to the refugees, and bandits seeking to rob foreign aid workers. NGOs shut down operations for two days in protest. No matter, the mess along the border has a life of its own, with various rebel and bandit groups keeping things volatile and violent without much outside help. The 3,000 European peacekeepers in Eastern Chad are but a few ink spots on a huge canvas (over 300,000 square kilometers) that is the eastern border region with Sudan. The 1,500 kilometer long frontier is mostly desert and brush, and several hundred thousand refugees in twelve major camps, and many more smaller, and often improvised ones. The peacekeepers have to devote considerable resources to defending themselves, and their own bases. The local bandits know the terrain, give the peacekeepers a wide berth, and continue plundering the foreign aid efforts. It's a wilderness of good intentions and failure.

July 21, 2008: European peacekeepers have been able to provide some protection, but are limited by their small numbers and shortage of helicopters. Meanwhile, in the last week, Sudan has been flying what appears to be reconnaissance missions over Chadian towns on the border. Sudan denies this, but the Sudanese Air Force cargo aircraft fly low enough to be recognized. Technically, Sudan and Chad are still operating under a four month old ceasefire agreement. But Sudan is still mad about a raid by Darfur rebels two months ago, that reached the outskirts of the Sudanese capital. Chad was blamed for this, being the most likely source of the cash required to buy the trucks, fuel and weapons for the thousand man rebel force. Chad denied this, and there was no real proof. So Sudan has now relented and agreed to restore diplomatic relations. Sudan is apparently toning down the violence in Chad, because the president of Sudan was just indicted by the International Criminal Court for genocide.

July 24, 2008: An American Christian missionary, held prisoner by MDJT rebels in the north for nine months, was released. The American was grabbed, while helping villagers drill a well, because the rebels believed he was a government spy. The rebels eventually figured out that was not the case, but things move slowly in this part of the world, and it took a long time to arrange a release.

July 26, 2008: Near the Sudan border, a Red Cross employee was shot by bandits. The foreign aid groups are preparing to abandon the area, because of the personal danger.

August 1, 2008: Severe food shortages in the north are more due to bad weather than banditry. It's the various rebel groups, and many freelance bandits, that are making the roads along the Sudan border unsafe, and threaten food availability all along the border (where there is generally no famine). The 3,000 European peacekeepers lack the airpower (reconnaissance UAVs and helicopters for quickly moving troops to where there is trouble) to be very effective. The border area comprises over 300,000 kilometers, and troops operating only on the roads cannot cover much ground. The peacekeepers are to be withdrawn next March, and there are already discussions to extend that six months. But without a lot more helicopters and UAVs, which no one is offering to provide, the peacekeepers are not having much impact.

August 2, 2008: Sudan and Chad have agreed to re-establish diplomatic relations, and re-open their embassies. All this involves solemn promises to stop supporting rebels in each others territory, and to stop the radio broadcasts denouncing each other, and providing propaganda support for those rebels.

August 18, 2008: An Austrian peacekeeper patrol, operating at night along the Sudanese border, got caught up in a gun battle between an army patrol and a fleeing group of bandits. No Austrians were injured. It took a while to sort out who was shooting at who. The bandits got away in the darkness. The UN is trying to establish better radio communications between the peacekeepers, Chadian security forces (army, police and pro-government militias) and aid organizations.

August 19, 2008: In the northeast, along the Sudan border, UFDD rebels clashed with pro-government militiamen (from president Idris Deby's Zaghawa tribe). Several days of fighting left over fifty casualties. The fighting took place over a hundred kilometers from the nearest European peacekeepers, and had died down by the time the peacekeepers heard about it and came to investigate.

August 21, 2008: On the Sudan border, the few European peacekeepers that have arrived have established armed patrols on several of the main roads. This has kept the bandits off these roads, and made it safer for aid groups, refugees and locals to travel. Meanwhile, the army has gone after the bandits, a process that mainly chases the criminals away, to areas where the soldiers and police are not so thick on the ground. The peacekeepers have also used their EOD (Explosive Ordnance Disposal) teams to dispose of left over bombs, shells and RPG warheads. Over 150 of these have been taken care of, saving the lives of many Chadians. This was brought home by the recent death of seven Chadians in a market place, where an unexploded RPG warhead was discovered, and went off while being moved.

August 25, 2008: Russia agreed to send an aviation company, with 200 troops and four Mi-8 helicopters, to Chad. The transport helicopters, which can carry over two dozen troops each, are badly needed. Russia already has a similar aviation company operating in neighboring Sudan.

August 28, 2008: On the Sudan border, a group of children found an unexploded shell and began playing with it. The shell exploded, killing one child and wounding five. So far this year, there have been 95 such casualties (17 dead, 78 wounded.). The 3,700 troops of EUFOR (the European peacekeeping force) makes it more difficult for rebel groups and bandits to plunder the refugee operations. It had gotten so bad that even the compounds where of the UN administrators (250 UN personnel, 20 percent of them foreign) live have been raided. This is why EUFOR desperately need helicopters, but few of the fourteen nations providing troops can, or will, send aircraft to Chad. But EUFOR cannot change the basic situation. Sudan has gotten away with rewarding the pro-government Arab tribes in Darfur, by pushing many of the black African tribes into Chad, where Sudan expects them to stay permanently. The Arab tribes in Darfur have already taken over the abandoned villages and land. But the Darfur rebels from Chad and Darfur still raid these camps for supplies, and teenage recruits. The UN calls them "child soldiers," but it's actually the ancient method of turning teenagers into warriors. It's become easier since a flood of Cold War surplus AK-47s hit the region in the 1990s.

September 3, 2008: Most of the peacekeeping along the Sudan border centers around the dozen UN refugee camps, holding a quarter million Sudanese who have fled the fled the fighting in Darfur. The Sudanese government considers these refugees as permanent residents of Chad, something the international community will not recognize (but can't do much about because of diplomatic support for Sudan from Russia, China and Arab nations in the UN). The current peace deal with Chad is supposed to make it more difficult for Darfur rebel groups to hide out in Chad, and the presence of European peacekeepers does make it more difficult for these rebels to survive by plundering the refugee camps.

September 9, 2008: The World Bank has withdrawn financing for a pipeline used to export Chad's newly found oil. This is the result of a failed agreement with the Chad government, whereby most of the oil profits would go for projects that would improve living conditions for the worst off segments of the population. The government has repeatedly breached this agreement by diverting money to buy weapons and bribe people to support the current government. This is what usually happens in poor countries, where governments tend to use whatever money they can get, to keep themselves in power. Chad is now receiving over a billion dollars a year in oil revenues and, as is usually the case when this kind of cash comes to a poor nation, the few men with power and guns want to keep most of this money for themselves. The World Bank was unable to break this pattern, and has withdrawn from the oil project. That said, at this point, the World Bank is no longer needed. The government snookered the World Bank, but will continue doing business with the World Bank on other projects.

September 13, 2008: Sudan and Chad have resumed diplomatic relations. The two countries appear to have stopped supporting and encouraging rebels across the border. But many of these rebel groups are basically bandits who will take money from anyone, and continue to raid refugee camps and NGO aid groups (who run the camps) inside Chad.

September 16, 2008: A UN trained police force, the DIS (Détachement intégré de sécurité) began patrols in eastern Chad. The force is currently on 320 strong, with another 500 men beginning training. The current 320 men of the DIS are not sufficient to cover much of the eastern border area. That would require over 5,000 police, and that number won't be ready for 5-10 years (at the current rate that DIS recruits are being trained.) The UN wants to replace the EU troops with 6,000 UN peacekeepers. Few countries want to send troops to Chad, and the EU mandate ends in six months. The Chadian government is largely concerned with defending the oil (which is in the south, less than 200 kilometers from the Cameroon border), and the 1,070 kilometers long oil pipeline (that is mostly in Cameroon, where it takes nearly 200,000 barrels a day to the sea.)

September 28, 2008: The 3,300 EU peacekeepers are unable to protect all 500,000 refugees along the Sudan border. The peacekeepers don't have enough troops or helicopters to patrol, much less pacify, the area. In effect, the European peacekeepers in Eastern Chad are but a few ink spots on a huge canvas (over 300,000 square kilometers) that is the eastern border region with Sudan. The 1,500 kilometer long frontier is mostly desert and brush, with the refugees in twelve major camps, and many more smaller, and often improvised ones. The peacekeepers have to devote considerable resources to defending themselves, and their own bases. The local bandits know the terrain, give the peacekeepers a wide berth, and continue plundering the foreign aid efforts. The NGOs continue holding press conferences denouncing the failure of foreign nations to police eastern Chad and pacify the area, It's a wilderness of good intentions and failure.

September 29, 2008: Chadian bandits crossed the Sudan border with 19 hostages (five German, five Italian, one Romanian tourist, and eight Egyptian guides).The bandits had seized their captives ten days earlier in western Egypt, and been chased through Sudan by police. The bandits were caught just before they reached Chad, and six of them were killed, and two arrested. But another 35 bandits made it across the border with their captives. The bandits had announced that they wanted $8.8 million for their captives. But once inside Chad, the bandits abandoned their captives as a force of Sudanese, Egyptian and European troops closed in. The rescue force promptly returned the uninjured tourists and their guides to Egypt. The bandits robbed their captives of everything but their clothes before taking off. It's still unclear exactly who the bandits were. They appear to be members of a tribe that has clans on both sides of the Chad-Sudan border. They might also be Chad or Darfur (Sudan) rebels, which is also common. What these bandits were doing in northern Darfur (and then across the border into Egypt) is unclear. With the price of gas these days, that was an expensive trip.

October 11, 2008: So far this year, bandits have attacked foreign aid groups in eastern Chat over 120 times. As a result, several aid groups have halted operations and evacuated their personnel. The bandits are not bothered by the 3,300 EU peacekeepers, who are not authorized to go after the outlaws. The peacekeepers are there to defend what they can, but without a lot of helicopters, they can't get around enough to even keep track of the bandits. First the bandits, then the aid groups, figured that out, and the aid groups fled. The bandits had pretty much cleaned out the aid groups compounds and stolen many of their vehicles. There were very few encounters between the peacekeepers and the bandits (some of whom are Chadian or Sudanese rebels as well.) The Chadian army does not have a major presence on the eastern border, with most of the troops stationed further west, where foreign oil companies are preparing 70 new oil wells for production, and another hundred next year. The oil fields are producing about 130,000 barrels a day, and making many government officials rich. Some of that money goes to the army, to help keep the rebels away from the drilling and pumping operations. Oil revenue (over $1.5 billion so far this year), now makes up over half of government income. Little of it gets spent on the average Chadian, which is one of the reasons why there are so many rebels out there.

October 24, 2008: The violence in eastern Chad has declined, partly as a result of progress in the peace talks with Sudan (which seems preoccupied with the war crimes prosecutions of Sudanese leaders, and don't want more trouble on their border with Chad.) In the next week or so, the two countries are expected to exchange ambassadors again. In fact, things have settled down to the extent that some foreign aid groups, who had recently fled to escape bandit activity, have returned and resumed operations. Russia has completed negotiations with the EU (European Union) over what its helicopter detachment for Chad will do. Basically, the hundred Russian troops will operate four unarmed Mi-8 helicopters, much as a similar Russian unit does to the east inside Sudan. The Russians will arrive in the next month or so and stay for a year. In a blow to the morale of the 400 Irish peacekeepers in Chad, they have been told that there is no room on supply flights for Christmas parcels from home. There is no international mail service in eastern Chad, so they only way for the troops to communicate is via mail carried in and out via military supply flights. The brass do plan to have a special meal on December 25th.

October 27, 2008: China has begun building an oil refinery outside the capital. When completed in three years, it will process a million tons of oil a year, producing 700,000 tons of gasoline and 20,000 tons of kerosene. This will be the first refinery built in Chad, which currently exports eight million tons of oil a year, but has to import all refined products

November 10, 2008: Sudan have exchanged ambassadors, ending a six month diplomatic split. Both sides appear to have stopped supporting rebels in each other's territory. Sudan appears to have ordered its pro-government Arab militias to stop raiding into Chad. But that still leaves thousands of bandits and rebel gunmen on the Chad side of the border, with insufficient peacekeepers or

Chad security forces to keep the peace. The UN will take over control of the peacekeeper force next March. As part of that, the force will be increased from 3,300 to 6,000 troops. But unless the force gets several dozen helicopters, more troops in trucks will not be able to cover the entire border area with any kind of security.

November 11, 2008: The violence in the east continues. Especially hard hit are the Western aid groups that provide food and medical aid to nearly half a million refugees. Bandit and rebel groups have made over 120 attacks on aid organization personnel this year, so far. In some areas along the Sudan border, aid groups have withdrawn their personnel, because of the intense bandit activity, and inability of Chad or peacekeepers to provide any kind of security. Some five percent of the refugees live in those areas, and that is where the starvation and disease is most rampant. The government denies that banditry is that bad, and implies that the foreign aid workers from the West are a bunch of wusses.

December 6, 2008: Since the 3,700 EU peacekeepers can only cover about half the refugee camps in eastern Chad (containing nearly half a million Sudanese and Chadian refugees), the bandits have figured out which camps are vulnerable, and concentrated on looting and robbing in those areas. NGOs are prime targets, and some of these medical and food relief operations have been shut down until government or EU forces can move in to make it temporarily safe. So far this year, there have been 10-20 attacks on NGO personnel a month. The UN is calling for an UN force of 6,000 peacekeepers to replace the EU troops, but no one is eager to send their soldiers to such a remote and hostile place. The biggest problem any peacekeepers face is the gangs of bandits and Darfur rebels who live off the camps. There are dozens of these groups, and some of them contain a hundred or more armed men. The principal Darfur rebel group, JEM, often keeps family members in Chad refugee camps, and think nothing of coming by, gun in hand, for a visit. This is a true frontier area, beyond the law, and full of characters, carrying guns and willing to kill if pushed. JEM, and the bandits, also recruit in the camps. For a teenage guy, the prospect of getting a gun, and with it the license to kill and steal, is appealing. The risks are ignored by many people that age, and that makes the recruiters job a lot easier. Chad and Sudan are now at peace, so there are no major military operations along the border. But it's a big border, and any peacekeepers in Eastern Chad are but a few ink spots on a huge canvas (over 300,000 square kilometers) that is the border region with Sudan. The 1,500 kilometer long frontier is mostly desert and brush, with the refugees in twelve major camps, and many more smaller, and often improvised ones. The peacekeepers have to devote considerable resources to defending themselves, and their own bases. The local bandits know the terrain, and give the peacekeepers a wide berth. The UN is determined to get food and medical aid to the refugees, and the bandits are determined to steal as much of this aid as they can. Only the peacekeepers, and occasionally the Chadian security forces (who often go rogue and steal themselves), can put a dent in the theft. The UN has to pay an increasingly larger portion of the aid money to hire locals as security guards, or just give the money to local warlords to purchase "protection."

December 8, 2008: Four Mi-8 transport helicopters, and 200 Russian troops to operate, maintain and protect them, have arrived. The UN knows that weapons are being shipped into Chad, and often ending up in the hands of bandits and rebel groups. But the government denies allowing arms smuggling (the rebels ignore inquiries), and UN inspectors have been unable to gather any proof of exactly who is doing what. Chad is a big place, full of armed groups who are hostile for foreign investigators. Chadian rebel groups announced that they had united and agreed to hold elections 18 months after they overthrow the current government. The recent development of oil exports has brought several billion dollars a year into the national treasury. This provides more of an incentive for various tribal coalitions (which is what the rebel groups are) to take control of the government, and the money. Even if the rebels held elections, that would not stop them from looting the treasury and spending all that oil money on themselves.

December 26, 2008: Chad has agreed to allow the UN to deploy a force of 4,900 peacekeepers in the Spring of 2009. The UN has come up with a new plan for this force, based on the failed efforts of the 3,700 EU peacekeepers that are already there. The problem with the EU force was that it was unable to cover much ground. As a result, some of the refugee camps are controlled by rebel groups or bandits. The UN plan calls for stationing 400 troops at six locations, nearest to the refugee camps. A thousand troops would be available as a mobile reserve, and 18 helicopters would be on hand to move troops and supplies around. It's a plan, but there's no knowing if it will work until the UN gets the troops and aircraft there. The rebels and bandits are resourceful, and have come to depend on the food and other supplies they steal from the refugee camps and aid groups.

June 1, 2009: Most of the rebel movements have united, aided by Sudanese support and bases. The Chad government returns the favor by giving refuge to Sudanese Darfur rebels. Neither of these gambits works, despite the Chad and Sudanese rebels crossing the border at least once a year and carrying out yet another failed invasion. Despite all that, the government made peace with Sudan, but not with their own rebels, who continue to resist. European peacekeepers arrived, but lacking sufficient manpower and helicopters, were unable to do much, and are now being replaced by UN peacekeepers. The unrest along the Sudan border is caused by refugees from tribal battles in Sudan, who bring their feuds with them. Prospects for peace are not good, although the UN says it will bring in peacekeepers that will have a license to kick ass and take names. It's uncertain if this will work either.

February 1, 2011: In the neighboring CAR (Central African Republic), the electoral commission declared that president Francois Bozizé won the January 23rd election, with 66 percent of the vote. Opposition groups cried fraud, and the disarmament effort has failed to collect many weapons from the 6,000 rebels who showed up a disarmament centers. Most rebels that are still active are operating as bandits, in many cases so intensively that civilian populations flee. About five percent of the 4.5 million population are refugees because of this.

February 13, 2011: Parliamentary elections held in Chad.

February 16, 2011: Chad and Sudan have formed a joint oil company, to work on oil-related projects to their mutual benefit. Both countries believe there is much undiscovered oil and natural gas in remote areas. The ruling party in Chad won the recent elections, coming away with 58.5 percent of the seats. Observers found the voting to be generally fair. President Deby and his party have kept a lot of Chadians happy, or at least quiet. Deby has not brought peace to Chad, just a lull before the next round of fighting. Meanwhile, the popular uprisings sweeping the Arab world, have had little impact in Moslem, but largely non-Arab, Chad and CAR. In these two countries, most of the population is rural, and not well placed for large scale demonstrations against their inept rulers. There are other problems in Chad, like an illiteracy rate of nearly 70 percent and 20 percent of the population who are chronically hungry, and 20 percent who are in refugee camps (who are at least fed). Chad is also one of the most corrupt nations in Africa (and, by definition, the world). Ethnic and tribal animosities have not been tended to, and much anger remains. While the eastern and northern areas of the country, that produce most of the rebel groups and gunmen, are beaten down by years of defeats, the willingness to form new rebel groups remains. It's only a matter of time.

March 1, 2011: Unrest continues to simmer, driven largely by ethnic differences. Rebel groups are still trying to recover from their loss of Sudanese support last year. Many of the most active rebels have moved on to related work (banditry, mercenary service, including in the current fighting in Libya). These several thousand rebel gunmen went back to their tribes or joined bandit groups. The increased number of bandits has made life more dangerous in eastern Chad, where NGOs sustain half a million refugees from Sudan, CAR (Central African Republic) and Chad itself. The recently departed UN peacekeeping force is missed in Eastern Chad, both for its helicopters and its 3,000 armed men.

March 14, 2011: The government signed a $7.5 billion deal with China for the construction of 1,344 kilometers of railroads. Work begins next year and will take four years to complete.

March 18, 2011: The presidential election has been rescheduled for April 24th. It will be rigged and the incumbent will be reelected. This will eventually lead to another round of open rebellion, and the great circle of death will be complete.

March 22, 2011: The victory of Chad dictator Deby's party in the February parliamentary elections has officially been confirmed. Opposition groups protested, but did little else, so far.

March 26, 2011: The UN has suspended food shipments to Chad through Libya. Normally, 40 percent of the food aid for Chad comes in via truck from Libya. But two food ships have been diverted from Libya to a port in Sudan, and arrangements are being made to hire trucks to get the food into landlocked Chad via Sudan. The UN has used the 3,000 kilometer Libyan land route for the last seven years.

March 27, 2011: In the neighboring CAR (Central African Republic), parliamentary elections results were ratified. The incumbent had rigged the vote, and opposition parties largely boycotted the polls. The government denied that 6,000 Chad tribesmen were in Libya, serving as mercenaries for besieged dictator Kaddafi. But there has been Libyan recruiting done recently in parts of northern Chad, the only question is how many tribesmen accepted the offer and went north.

March 31, 2011: Because the latest peace deal with Sudan is holding, with both sides abiding by it, hundreds of rebel tribesmen from both sides of the Chad-Sudan border have fled to Darfur (western Sudan) and either linked up with rebel groups there, or turned to banditry (or both). Darfur has turned into a violent "wild west." The Sudan and Chad rebel groups are in disarray, because the three favorite sanctuaries for rebel leaders (and their staffs) in Chad, Sudan and Libya, are all unavailable. Some rebel leaders have fled to distant European nations for asylum. The government denied that 6,000 Chad tribesmen were in Libya, serving as mercenaries for besieged dictator Kaddafi. But there has been Libyan recruiting done recently in parts of northern Chad, the only question is how many tribesmen accepted the offer and went north.

July 20, 2012 CHAD:Chadian ex-leader Hissene Habre on A court Trial In Senegal: ICJ rules Senegal must try ex-Chad leader immediately.

(ICJ, The HAGUE, The Netherlands) The International Court of Justice based in The Hague, The Netherlands has ruled that Senegal must begin proceedings to try Chad's former leader Hissene Habre "without delay". Otherwise, he should be extradited to face trial in Belgium, the court's legally binding ruling said. The 69 year old has been been under house arrest since 2005 in Senegal, where he fled after being deposed. He denies charges of killing and torturing tens of thousands of his opponents. The charges relate from 1982, when Mr. Habre came to power in a coup, until he was ousted in 1990. The UN's highest court has been investigating whether he should be tried in Senegal or extradited to Belgium, after Senegal previously refused four extradition requests. President Macky Sall, who came to power in April, has indicated that he would be willing to prosecute Mr. Hesene Habre in a special tribunal. Amnesty International called on Senegal to abide by Friday's ruling by the ICJ. "This is a victory for victims that's long overdue, and now it's high time the courts in Senegal delivered justice," said Michael Bochenek, Amnesty's law and policy programme director. Dubbed "Africa's Pinochet", Mr Habre was first indicted in Senegal in 2000 - but the country's courts ruled at the time that he could not be tried there. His alleged victims then filed complaints under Belgium's universal jurisdiction law, which allows the country's judges to prosecute human rights offences committed anywhere in the world. In 2005, he was charged by Belgium with crimes against humanity and torture. There have been years of wrangling in Senegal over what to do about Mr Habre. The government of former President Abdoulaye Wade changed its position on whether to try him several times - at one stage demanding international funding for a trial. Last year, it unexpectedly announced that it would repatriate Mr Habre to Chad, where a court in 2008 sentenced him to death in absentia for planning to overthrow the government. This plan was stopped following a plea from the UN, which feared he could be tortured on his return. The BBC's Mamadou Moussa Ba in the Senegalese capital, Dakar, says unlike its predecessor, the government of newly elected President Macky Sall has made it clear it wants Mr Habre to be tried in Senegal. Legal experts from the African Union are currently in Senegal to discuss how the trial could take place, he says. Our reporter says Mr Habre and his wife keep a low profile in Dakar and he lives in relative freedom - guarded by two security agents - and is occasionally seen at a mosque for Friday prayers. A 1992 Truth Commission in Chad accused Mr. Habre of being responsible for widespread torture and the death of 40,000 people during his eight-year rule. He was accused of carrying out a deliberate policy of terror to discourage any opposition. Survivors of torture say that, among other things, they were subjected to electric shocks, near-asphyxia and "supplice des baguettes", when their heads were squeezed between sticks. (Text ends)

December 20, 2012: Rebels took Batangafo, a town that is 400 kilometers north of the capital.

December 21, 2012: Rebels took Ippy, a town that is 500 kilometers north of the capital.

December 25, 2012: Rebels seized the town of Kaga Bandoro, which is 333 kilometers north of the capital. CAR and Chadian troops were in the town but fled when the rebels approached.

December 26, 2012: The UN ordered 200 staff and their families out of CAR as a safety precaution.

ECCAS met in Gabon and agreed to send a thousand or more additional peacekeepers to CAR, to help defend the government there against rebels.

December 28, 2012: The U.S. has sent 50 troops to CAR to help evacuate American diplomats from the embassy in the capital.

December 29, 2012: Rebels took the town of Sibut, which is 190 kilometers north of the capital and controls the only good road south to the capital. The CAR and Chad troops guarding the town retreated when they spotted the approaching rebels.

December 31, 2012: Another 180 French troops arrived from Gabon. There are now 600 French military personnel in CAR and France has made it clear the troops are there to protect French citizens, not the Bozize government.

January 2, 2013: The rebels announced that they have halted their advance in order to carry out peace negotiations.

January 4, 2013: France is sending 150 more troops to CAR, to join those already there helping to protect the 1,200 French citizens in CAR. Most of the French are involved with mining operations in the south and foreign aid groups based in the capital.

Rebels seized several villages near the crossroads town of Bambari, which is 300 kilometers east of Sibut. Both of these towns, which control the main roads from the north, are held by the rebels.

January 6, 2013: South Africa announced that it would send 400 troops to help defend the CAR government against northern rebels.

The CAR Army has only 4,000 troops, who are poorly paid, led, trained, and equipped. So far the CAR soldiers have fled when confronted by the rebels.

The government has massed forces in the town of Damara, 112 kilometers south of rebel held Sibut. There are also troops from Chad, Congo, and Gabon in Damara. The rebels have refused offers to form a coalition government and want Bozize and his cronies out. Bozize refuses to leave until his current term is up in 2016. There is general agreement that Bozize cannot be trusted and is a major thief. But he is head-of-state and African countries tend to help each other out to preserve current governments. Several African nations have pledged troops to help protect the Bozize government. There are also 400 African peacekeepers from ECCAS (Economic Community of Central African States). These troops are from Chad and are part of MICOPAX (Mission for the Consolidation of Peace in Central African Republic). Most of the peacekeepers are staying in the capital. But some are in Damara and the rebels have been told that if the peacekeepers are attacked that will be considered an act of aggression against the ten central African states that belong to ECCAS. Gabon, Congo-Brazzaville, and Cameroon have each pledged 120 troops to the CAR peacekeeping force.

All anyone in the south knows is that these northern rebels are angry and willing to fight. The few clashes in which government troops resisted, the rebels quickly defeated the soldiers. Fleeing survivors told of very angry northerners with guns. In three weeks the rebels swept down the few good roads from the north, seizing 11 towns, mainly ones on key crossroads. The rebels halted 190 kilometers north of the capital, in the town of Sibut. There are apparently only a few thousand rebel fighters and they don’t have a lot of ammo with them. They have captured some weapons and gear from retreating soldiers and picked up food and fuel from towns they captured. Capturing the capital and its 700,000 residents would be an all-or-nothing operation. Bozize thinks he has enough troops to defeat a rebel run for the capital. But the rebels might decide to make a go for it, rather than retreat north empty handed.

Like Chad, CAR has too many people (population has quadrupled in the last 50 years) and too many ethnic groups/tribes (over 80). Many of the tribes do not get along with each other in the best of times, and now with the overcrowding and the spreading desert in the north things were getting very ugly. There is not enough water for herds or irrigation and not enough arable land. Foreign aid keeps a lot of people alive, and that aid comes in via the national government, which steals as much as it can. That's the prize for rebels, the capital and all those lucrative government jobs and income from foreign mining operations. CAR is also 80 percent Christian and only ten percent (in the north) Moslem. Because of the aggressive nature of Moslems in the region, the CAR government is accusing the rebels of being backed by Chad rebels and Islamic radicals from Sudan. It's unclear if this is so. The problem is that no one in the government is sure exactly who the rebels are. They are from the north and call themselves the Seleka coalition and the group has been organizing since last September. Some of the known members are from northern rebel groups that have been around for a decade or more.

CAR has been torn by a tribal conflict since November 2001, when former CAR Army Chief of Staff General Francois Bozize and his supporters fled to Chad after fighting broke out in CAR's capital Bangui. For two years Libya provided troops to help keep the new government secure. But in 2003, Bozize and his armed followers returned, and the unpopular Ange-Félix Patassé fled. Sort of. Patassé supporters, and people who simply opposed Bozize or government in general, got guns and adopted an attitude that they were a law unto themselves. Their bases were in northwestern CAR which was always a lawless place, made worse by years of civil war in nearby Chad, and heavy poaching activity from nearby Sudan.

January 7, 2013: Chad has been pretty quiet for the past three years but neighboring Central African Republic (CAR) failed to fulfill a peace deal worked out five years ago. As a result, a new rebel group has been advancing from northern CAR (near the Chad border) to the capital (on the Congo border). The rebels have lots of grievances. Back in 2011, elections were held in CAR and things did not go well. The electoral commission declared that president Francois Bozizé won the January 23rd, 2011 vote, with a 66 percent majority. Opposition groups cried fraud and the disarmament effort failed to collect many weapons from the 6,000 rebels who showed up at disarmament centers. Most rebels that are still active have been operating as bandits, in many cases so intensively that civilian populations fled. Bozizé never provided all the benefits to rebels who accepted the amnesty, and these rebels have been threatening to overthrow the government to get what they were promised. Bozizé thought he could keep the rebels quiet with double-talk and lies. That did not work and now Bozizé has called on other nations in the region to help him out. These countries have agreed to send “peacekeepers” but so far these troops have fled at the sight of the approaching rebels.

February 24, 2013: 10 Chadian Soldiers Killed In Northern Mali'

Ten Chadian soldiers were killed in operations targeting al Qaeda-linked Islamist rebels along northern Mali's mountainous border with Algeria, Chad's army said on Sunday. The Chadian troops were carrying out operations in an area of the Adrar des Ifoghas mountains where 13 Chadian soldiers and 65 al Qaeda-linked rebels were killed in clashes on Friday. "In the course of the clean-up operations, the bodies of 28 other terrorists were found in the combat zone ... Ten more of our soldiers fell," said a statement from the army general staff read on state radio. "The final toll from the clashes ... and clean-up that followed is as follows: 93 terrorists ... on the side of the enemy. We deplore the deaths of 23 soldiers and 30 wounded," the statement said.

April 13, 2013: In Mali a suicide bomber killed three Chad troops. The Chad government reacted by ordering its 2,000 troops home. The Chad leadership believes that al Qaeda is defeated in northern Mali and the war is now against smaller groups of Islamic radicals that are operating like terrorists. Chad sent its troops to Mali because they were experienced fighting similarly armed and organized groups in desert environments. Dealing with terrorists is another matter. France talked to Chad and negotiated a more gradual withdrawal over the next few months. President Deby of Chad was probably offered promises and cash for going along with this. That’s how Deby (and France in Africa) usually operate.

April 27, 2013: Chad has called on Libya to shut down training camps in Benghazi run by Chadian rebel groups. These outfits are seeking to use Libya as a sanctuary from which new attacks on pro-Deby forces can be made.

May 1, 2013: A police raid on a meeting of politicians suspected of plotting a coup turned into a gun battle, in which at least eight people were killed and over a dozen wounded. There were several other subsequent gun battles in the capital as associates of the coup plotters were rounded up. This is the most serious attempt to overthrow Deby since 2006, when plotters planned to shoot down his aircraft but failed.

May 3, 2013: In the capital police arrested two retired generals and accused them of participating in the recent coup attempt.

May 13, 2013: A celebration was held in the capital to honor the first 700 troops to return from four months service in Mali. Some 2,000 Chadian troops went (by road) to northern Mali in January. Since then about a hundred have been killed or wounded, plus more than a hundred hospitalized by accidents or disease. France has provided medical care and covered other expenses (a portion of which was pocketed by Deby and associates). The rest of the Chad troops will return over the next month or so. There are about 30,000 troops in the Chad military, most of them in infantry units.

May 17, 2013: Rebels (against the Sudanese government) in Darfur accused Chad of sending its warplanes to bomb them recently. This was apparently in retaliation for the recent death of a pro-Chad Sudanese rebel leader inside Darfur. The many rebel factions in Darfur are split by politics and attitudes towards Chad.

May 22, 2013: A recent army offensive in northeast Nigeria against Boko Haram has sent some of the Islamic terrorists fleeing across the border into Chad. This is a dry and thinly populated area that is vast and difficult to monitor. Chad has sent more troops to the Nigerian border to make sure the area stays peaceful.

Although there is peace with Sudan, there are still over 100,000 Sudanese refugees in the southeast. Many have been there for a decade, having fled the government sponsored violence against non-Arab tribes in Western Sudan (Darfur). Four years ago the Chad government began issuing ID cards to 110,000 adult Sudanese refugees living in UN administered camps. The ID cards made it easier to deal with crime and Darfur rebels living in the refugee camps (often with family members, who have ID cards).

Relying on his new clout with France and popularity from the Mali operation, Deby has been cracking down on the opposition. In part this is the aftermath of the coup attempt earlier this month. It’s also a long-delayed attack on the growing number of Deby critics inside and outside the government. There have been several dozen arrests, including two members of parliament (who are supposed to be immune from arrest). Deby's enemies include tribes who felt left-out and officials who worked for his predecessor (Hissene Habre, who ruled for eight years until Deby overthrew him in 1990).

But there are other problems in Chad, like an illiteracy rate of nearly 70 percent and 20 percent of the population who are chronically hungry and many who are still in refugee camps (who are at least fed). Chad is also one of the most corrupt nations in Africa (and, by definition, the world). Ethnic and tribal animosities have not all been tended to, and much anger remains. While the eastern and northern areas of the country, that produce most of the rebel groups and gunmen, are beaten down by years of defeats, the willingness to form new rebel groups remains. It's only a matter of time.

After more than two decades in power president Idriss Deby is stronger than ever, and now the French owe him again. He's outsmarted, outfought, and outlasted all his enemies. The new oil wealth, and continued foreign aid, has provided the resources needed to reward friends and buy weapons to use against enemies. For dictator and president-for-life Deby, life is good.

May 27, 2013: Chad has been pretty quiet for the past three years, but all that changed in January when France asked for some help in Mali and president Deby responded with two thousand experienced troops. In a way, this was Deby repaying a debt. It was French troops that helped defeat a rebel attempt to take the capital, and Deby's life, five years ago. That worked so well that in the following year France withdrew over half the 1,650 troops it had in Chad. This was also part of a program whereby France cut the number of troops (then currently 13,000) it had deployed overseas, by 15 percent. But France also surmised that Deby was in control and owing France a favor. The force sent to Mali was paid for by France, with a large chunk of that cash going to Deby personally. Sending this force to Mali was popular in Chad because the troops were getting paid more as well and it was a show of respect for mighty France to call on Chad troops to help in northern Mali. The main thing Deby had to be careful about was Chadian casualties in Mali. If these got too high, the undertaking would become unpopular. Thus the decision last month to bring the troops home.

Nigeria: Chad Military Arrests Top Boko Haram Leader in N'Djamena (Daily Independent 1 July 2015) Lagos

A Chadian Public Prosecutor, Alghassim Khamis, said on Tuesday that a leader of the Boko Haram sect, Baana Fanay, who has been coordinating trafficking of weapons in Nigeria, Cameroon and Chad was arrested on Sunday in N'Djamena. Khamis said Fanay alias Mahamat Moustapha, was arrested by security forces after a fierce resistance. He said Fanay, who was arrested with two other terrorists, was responsible for the purchase of weapons and recruitment of fighters for Boko Haram.

The prosecutor said the search in the suspect's house led to the seizure of different weapons and documents written in Arabic by Boko Haram leader, Abubakar Shekau, targeting the sect's recruits. He said the arrest also led investigators to discover the location of seven other terrorists hiding in a house in Diguel, a Dinguessou suburb, on the periphery of N'Djamena. Khamis said a man believed to be the financier of the group was arrested and is under investigations.

He added, the outcome of the investigation would help investigators to dismantle Boko Haram network in the country. Since the simultaneous attacks that killed 38 people and injured 100 others in N'Djamena on June 15, Chadian security forces have arrested 74 people suspected of involvement in the attacks. (Text ends)

Chad: Investing in girls education

Educational programs in Chad encourage young women to stay in School

Dispatches Iriba, 11 October 2016

In Chad, socio-cultural traditions and gender roles limit educational opportunities for refugee girls. Child marriage and forced marriage are widely practiced, causing many girls in secondary school to drop out early. Girls are also charged with domestic duties such as retrieving water, providing for the family, and taking care of children. These responsibilities along with societal and familial pressures lead to high dropout rates that are not seen amongst boys.

Many refugees in Chad fled conflict and genocide in Darfur over a decade ago. With renewed violence bringing more Darfurian refugees to Chad in 2013-4, there is little hope that they will ever be able to return. This protracted conflict has left many children that only know life in the camp. It is vital to provide education in order to prevent the creation of a lost generation.

The Jesuit Refugee Service has served refugees in eastern Chad since 2006, and offers different levels of education in eight refugee camps. While approximately half of the students in JRS schools in Chad are female, decreases in school attendance and high dropout rates among girls in secondary school is all too common throughout the region. In three secondary schools where the Jesuit Refugee Service (JRS) operates, only 72 out of an initial 248 girls finished the school year. More than 70% of girls dropped out early.

"When they get married, these young girls usually have to leave their family, their friends, and their community and move to their husband's house. Their studies are interrupted, removing another source of social support and education." says Radia, a student in her second year of high school in Iriba, a refugee site in Chad. She has seen first-hand the negative consequences from child marriages and forced marriages.

With child marriage there is a high risk of health complications during and after pregnancy both for the girls and their babies. These girls often lack the physical maturity and proper knowledge for motherhood. After marriage, girls are also subject to isolation and often experience abuse and mental health issues.

Keeping girls in school will not only keep them healthy, safe, and allow them the opportunity for a better life, but it will also have a many benefits for the community and societal development. Educating girls results in economic growth, reduction of HIV/AIDS, and overall healthier families. The JRS staff fully incorporates this understanding into its educational structure and curriculum and takes extra steps to monitor girls' well-being to ensure they stay in school. JRS teaches specific programs such as Menstrual Hygiene Management that provides girls with health education and hygiene kits to give them the proper knowledge to stay healthy.

The JRS believes that refugee girls in Chad need support to continue and complete their studies. With many young mothers as students, JRS offers childcare to allow them to attend class. It is important to the organization that everyone, including staff, teachers, and family, should be involved in fostering a safe and supportive environment for girls to grow and learn.
Literacy classes encourage girls to attend secondary school and take leadership roles in their communities.

Radia calls on the world to take action: "I ask my parents, all members of the community, and the world to join to fight against child marriage and forced marriage, in order to give all girls the opportunity to grow normally and advocate for their own choices." Radia, High school student Joseph Thera, JRS Chad Secondary School Project Coordinator.

HUMAN RIGHTS VIOLATION

Former Chadian Dictator Hissène Habré Appeals Conviction For The Death of 40,000 People

Former Chadian dictator, Hissène Habré has appealed against his conviction for crimes against humanity and war crimes, a spokesman for the Special African Chamber that conducted his trial in Senegal said on Saturday. “The lawyer’s commission have submitted the paperwork for Habre’s appeal,” said Marcel Mendy, a spokesman for the Chamber, a tribunal created in 2013 by Senegal and the African Union for human rights crimes committed during Habre’s rule. He also added that not only will the appeal two new judges be appointed, the appeal will take at least seven months without a date for commencement.

Two weeks ago a special criminal court in Senegal sentenced Hissène Habré, to life in prison. Habré went on trial in July last year on charges surrounding crimes against humanity, war crimes and torture.

Human rights groups accused the 73-year-old of being responsible for the death of 40,000 people and torture the of 200,000 more during his rule from 1982 to 1990. As such, the verdict caps a 16-year battle involving victims and activists to bring the former leader to justice in Senegal, where he fled to after being deposed in a 1990 coup.

“Hissène Habré, this court finds you guilty of crimes against humanity, rape, forced slavery, and kidnapping, as well as war crimes,” said Gberdao Gustave Kam, the Burkinabe president of the Extraordinary African Chambers (EAC) court. “The court condemns you to life in prison,” Kam added.

The court gave Habré 15 days to appeal against the sentence and he remained defiant as he was led out of the courtroom after his sentence, raising his arms and shouting.

This trial is the first in the world to have the courts of one country prosecute a former ruler of another for human rights crimes. These crimes took place under his authority during his eight years rule over Chad from 1982 to 1990 through the Bureau of Documentation and Security (Direction de la Documentation et de la Sécurité (DDS)), the state’s political police.

“Down with France-Afrique!” a term which is critical of France’s influence in its former colonies

Critics dubbed Hissène Habré "Africa's Pinochet" because of the atrocities committed during his rule. During his trial, survivors recounted the gruesome details of the torture carried out by Habré's dreaded DDS operatives, some of which have been convicted by a Chadian court. One of the most notorious detention centres in N'Djamena was a converted swimming pool. Witnesses said victims endured electric shocks, near-asphyxia, cigarette burns and having gas squirted into their eyes.

"Today will be carved into justice as the day that a band of unrelenting survivors brought their dictator to justice," said Reed Brody from the Human Rights Watch. Reed Brody has worked on the case for 17 years and was in court for the judgement.

"The feeling is one of complete satisfaction," said Clement Abeifouta, president of a Habré survivors association after the court sentenced him to life in prison.

Why was Habré not tried in Chad or by the International Criminal Court?

The International Criminal Court only has jurisdiction over crimes committed after July 1, 2002, when its statute entered into effect. The crimes which Hissène Habré is accused of took place between 1982 and 1990. Chad never sought Habré's extradition, and there are serious doubts that he could have gotten a fair trial in Chad, where he had been sentenced to death in absentia for his alleged role in a 2008 rebellion to overthrow current president Idriss Déby. In July 2011, President Wade threatened to expel Habré to Chad but, days later, retracted his decision in the face of international pressure over the risk that Habré could be mistreated or even killed.

Habré's Trial in Senegal: A timeline of events

In 2008, the Senegalese government made amendments to its justice system which allowed Habré to be tried in its courts. However, the country later changed its position and this prompted Belgium to pressure the International Court of Justice (ICJ) to force Senegal to either extradite Habré to Belgium to proceed with the trial. This request was denied by the ICJ.

In November 2010, the Economic Community of West African States' (ECOWAS) court of justice then ruled that Senegal could not hold trial in the matter through a local court only, and asked for the creation of a special tribunal on the matter of Habré's prosecution.

In April 2011, after initial reticence, Senegal agreed to the creation of an ad hoc tribunal in collaboration with the African Union and the Chadian state.

In December 2012, the Parliament of Senegal passed a law allowing for the creation of an international tribunal, which became known as the Extraordinary African Chambers (EAC)in Senegal to try Habré. The judges of the tribunal were appointed by the African Union.

MP Cheikh Seck said he voted for the law because it would show that Africa could hold its own leaders accountable. “It’s not up to the West to try Hissène Habré. It’s why I voted in favour of this law,” he told the Associated Press news agency.

On the 30th of June 2013, Habré, was arrested in Senegal by the Senegalese police, that same year he was sentenced to death by a Chadian court for crimes against humanity.

On May 30, 2016, the Extraordinary African Chambers found Habré guilty of rape, sexual slavery, and ordering the killing of 40,000 people during his tenure as Chadian president and sentenced him to life in prison.

Habré’s western link: When will the US and France go on trial?

The United States gave covert CIA paramilitary support to help Habré take power and remained one of Habré’s strongest allies throughout his rule, providing his regime with massive amounts of military aid. The United States also used a clandestine base in Chad to train captured Libyan soldiers whom it was organizing into an anti-Gaddafi force.

“The CIA was so deeply involved in bringing Habré to power I can’t conceive they didn’t know what was going on,” said Donald Norland, U.S. ambassador to Chad from 1979 to 1981. “But there was no debate on the policy and virtually no discussion of the wisdom of doing what we did.

Documents obtained by Human Rights Watch shows that the United States provided Habré’s DDS with training, intelligence, arms, and other support in spite of its knowledge of their atrocities. Records discovered in the DDS’ meticulous archives describe training programs by American instructors for DDS agents and officials, including a course in the United States that was attended by some of the DDS’ most feared torturers.

According to the Chadian Truth Commission, the United States also provided the DDS with monthly infusions of monetary aid and financed a regional network of intelligence networks code-named “Mosaic” that Chad used to pursue suspected opponents of Habré’s regime even after they fled the country.

In the summer of 1983, when Libya invaded northern Chad and threatened to topple Habré, France sent 3,000 paratroops with air support, while the Reagan administration provided two AWACS electronic surveillance planes to coordinate air cover. By 1987 Gaddafi's forces had retreated.

"Habré was a remarkably able man with a brilliant sense of how to play the outside world," a former senior US official said. "He was also a bloodthirsty tyrant and torturer. It is fair to say we knew who and what he was and chose to turn a blind eye." So how did a man sponsored by the US and France, end up shouting "Down with France-afrique!" in a court that was mostly funded by Europe? Habré appears to be another pawn abandoned by his western masters.

It took over 25 years to bring Habré to answer for his crimes, but when will Chadians get justice for the role France and the US played in the tragedies that took place during Habré's regime? Considering the fact that the US put such a horrible person in charge and supported him throughout the years he committed those atrocities to serve its interest as a bulwark against Libya at the expense of the Chadian people.

Africans and the international community are praising the EAC's handling and verdict on Habré's case, it is seen as a strong start towards building an effective, fair and competent indigenous international justice system inspired by universal jurisdiction, that is capable of holding past leaders accountable for crimes they committed in office. Habré, like the people he maimed and killed, is a victim but unlike a real victim, he brought his suffering upon himself.

CHAD: President Idriss Deby to run for 5th term in Office

Reintroduces constitutional term that limits others to contest election for a 5th term'

Chad's President Idriss Deby Itno, who has been in power since 1990, will run for a fifth term in office after being chosen Tuesday as his party's candidate. The elections are slated for April 10.

The 64-year-old modified the constitution in 2004, scrapping its two-term limit on presidential tenure, and won the following elections by a huge majority.

The principles of presidential term limits in the constitution must be reintroduced. He said that he would reintroduce constitutional term limits if he won a fifth term. "The principles of presidential term limits in the constitution must be reintroduced," Deby told a convention of his ruling party, for which he is the presidential candidate.

Candidates have from February 10 to 29 to file their bid. A runoff vote will be held on May 9 if no outright winner emerges from the first round in April. Two opposition figures, Kassire Coumakoye and Malloum Yobode, have already declared they will run.

If he wins the polls, Deby will extend power in the country for more than 25 years. The oil-rich central African country is playing a pivotal role in the military campaign against the Nigerian Islamist group Boko Haram.

During the 26th African Union summit held in January, Deby was elected the new chairperson of the Africa Union taking over from veteran Zimbabwe leader, Robert Mugabe. Source: Africanleadership

Why is Chad called the Dead Heart of Africa?
Lara Novakov (ლარა ნოვაკოვი) Lives in Serbia (1998-present) Updated Oct 29, 2017

Because of its distance from the sea and the fact that Chad has some of the harshest portions of the Sahara desert, as well as a relatively harsh climate (in the north) due to its position.

Credit: Maphill

As you can see, only the southernmost parts of Chad are green and suitable for agriculture. The rest is the Sahel/Sahara belt. And here is the Koppen classification of Chad's climate:

As you can see, only the southernmost parts of Chad are green and suitable for agriculture. The rest is the Sahel/Sahara belt. And here is the Koppen classification of Ch ad. As you can see, only the southernmost parts of Chad are green and suitable for agriculture. The rest is the Sahel/Sahara belt. And here is the Koppen classification of Chad's climate:

Alejandro Peralta, studied at Association Football Answered Jan 26, 2018

"Chad is among Africa and the world's poorest nations and, as such, this extremely poverty of Chad is also contributed a reason adding with the natural causes.

Chad lies right in the center of Africa, but over 65% of Chad is full of sand and only the south is suitable for farming. Meanwhile, the country lacks of infrastructures, something the French colonial administration could not afford over except Fort-Lamy (now N'Djamena), made this nation suffer. They also don't have border with the seas as well. Lake Chad is shrinking too. So, why not the Death Heart of Africa?"

Related Links

Is Chad really such a bad country?

What is it like to live in Chad?

You are made president of Chad. How do you ameliorate the situation of your country?

Is Chad a forgotten country?

What is Chad?
What are some good activities to do in Chad, Africa?

What do you know about chad (TCHAD) country?

What is the wealthiest city in Chad?

Why is Chad called Chad?

What are some amazing facts about Chad?

Is there a guy named Chad that has more money than the country of Chad?

Why is Chad called Tchad?

Is China colonizing Africa?

Why is Chad considered a poor country?

Are there soldiers in Chad, Africa

Why can't Africa control its population? (Africa's population will grow to more than 4 Billion before the end of this century.)

Ygor Coelho Brazilian fascinated by world history, cultures & genetics.
Updated 2y

To be fair, the birth rates in virtually all countries of Africa are slowing down in an increasingly significant pace, but, yes, I won’t be all optimistic and cheerfully blind in this answer.

Yes, there is no doubt that much of Africa, with some notable exceptions like South Africa, Tunisia or Cape Verde, needs to tackle this issue much more seriously in the next decades and push for social and economic advances that naturally lead to a decrease in birth rates (forced birth control is not just morally wrong, it rarely works effectively for a long time).

In some countries, the population growth is not just fast, the real issue is that it's not decreasing as rapidly as once was thought and as it happened in Latin America and Southeast Asia a few decades ago. So, the issue at stake is that some countries are failing to undergo a "normal" demographic transition as that experienced by other places of the world, therefore we can't be sure that those societies will avoid the worst predictions of demographic explosion.

The need to accelerate the already ongoing reduction in the fertility rate of women is especially urgent the countries that are already very populated (in some regions, they're even more populated than fully developed European countries that, nevertheless, still feel just a bit overpopulated despite all their wealth, like England and Germany).

Some countries of Africa, if they keep reducing their fertility rates at the present moderate rates, will experience an absurdly high population density by 2100 (just realize that, according to some moderate - not extreme - estimates, Uganda alone is poised to surpass 200 million people in just 241,000 km²), and that can't be good news either for most people, and especially for the natural flora and fauna of Africa.

My impression is that, in those countries which still have a very high birth rate even though they are mostly improductive deserts (e.g. Niger) or already very densely populated (e.g. Uganda), the increasing competition for work, land, resources and services will spontaneously lead future generations to desire smaller families and thus adapt to the higher costs of living and especially of rearing their children with sufficiently good conditions.

That is, the "most effective birth control" will end up being the natural dynamics of the society as its population and its economy increases, leading to much higher levels of urbanization, more dependence on service and trade as a source of income, and higher cost of living. However, it would be nice the governments, through educational and health services, encouraged that change preemptively so that it could happen in a less dramatic and potentially problematic way.

People are mostly rational, and I doubt that the majority of the population of any of those nations will simply leave their country in droves without any perspective of finding work elsewhere, pressured by the increasing population density and lack of enough jobs or property for everyone. Most people want to make their living where they were raised, and they will just need to get used to the new social and economic conditions and decide accordingly when they start their own families.

Of course, it would help a lot of if the people as a whole and particularly the women receive a much better education and health services, because people are much more likely to make reasonable choices when they are aware of their options and they have the means to fulfill them, and as we have seen in many other nations of the world it is mostly women who ultimately decide if they'll have more or less children. Educated, free, independent women can do that much more fast and strongly than women who are still to dependent on their fathers or husbands.

Related Links

Will Africa's huge population growth become a problem for the rest of the world?

Can the African population growth be seen as a threat to Europe?

Why is Africa's population booming and Europe's population is growing so slowly?

Will Africa's population reach 4 billion by 2100, or are population projections for Africa exaggerated?

How can Africa's rapid population growth be prevented?

Why the population growth in Europe is decreasing?

By Ygor Coelho
Avid reader on history of peoples and population genetics. Updated Oct 18

Here we go, alea jacta est. I predict all the usual tags-to-be-used-to-people-who-say-things-we-dislike will come out in the comment section soon:

"racist", "white supremacist" (yes, of course, a mixed-race Brazilian from a highly multiracial developing nation, someone who would likely be deemed a lowly Latino mongrel in the real white supremacist circles);

"pessimistic" (apparently if you warn that, if someone keeps on doing the very same thing for a much longer time, it will probably end up having some negative effects, you're "wishing them ill" or something, instead of the exact opposite, perhaps even being a little too careful to avoid any ills);

“nosy” (for those who think we have to get citizenship or reincarnate in order to have an opinion about facts happening on the other side of imaginary borders, because apparently human beings are such a “different species” abroad, and even numbers and logics work totally upside down once you move to a certain place — the convenient excuse of “exceptionalism”);

“patronizing”, “paternalistic” (because apparently it’s “oppressive” and “offensive” if you merely express an evidence-based and non-judgmental opinion about what you think is bound to happen in a certain situation if all conditions remain unchanged — anywhere and at any time, regardless of ethnicity, geography or “race”).

Okay, nothing surprising in Quora or any other social network, in which people who don’t like what they read have learned their “cancel language dictionary” very well for those occasions in which, though they can’t demolish the points you made rationally and don’t negate the objective data you presented, they still dislike what you said more by its “negativity” than by any incoherence, untruth or weakness of its content (because naive and thoughtless agreement, in order to not “stand out” as an author of - how dare you?! - a “criticism”, no matter how polite, well-aimed or substantiated, as well as toxic positivity are basically a must nowadays to be hailed as “our good progressive ally”).

Often people by far prefer those false friends that superficially support and praise everything they’re saying or doing, because those don’t really care about the outcomes, it doesn’t concern them in the slightest, to those real friends that call a spade a spade and aren’t shy to voice their genuine opinion, no matter how joy-killer or unpleasant it may be, because they honestly wish the best. A cheerful, rose-colored, upvote-seeking, politically correct answer that says a reassuring “it’s all fine” without even checking the matter deeply is usually preferred… but is often less helpful or enlightening.
End of rant. ;-)

Let’s begin with this statement: the main purpose of an analysis of future scenarios with forecasts and warnings is precisely to make all those worst predictions eventually become totally incorrect. Isn’t that self-evident enough?

Someone who exposes his negative views on climate change or overconsumption of resources does so in the hope that, because of that awareness raised about the long-term consequences of the current trends if they do not change significantly and sooner than predicted, all those negative forecasts will never even come to be true, because circumstances and conditions will have changed enough along the way to create a much more moderate and less worrisome scenario.

Claiming that "hey, see how all those alarmist models and warnings were just made up to make us look worse!", after fortunate changes and advances avoided the worst, is totally missing the point.

Ditto for those who say that current yearly population growth has been stubbornly too high for too long in some nations of the world, mostly nowadays in Africa (but not just in Africa, don't forget!).

It's not as if it's a problem intrinsic or exclusive to Africa, which is why, for instance, nobody who is well informed includes countries like South Africa, Botswana or Tunisia in their "pessimistic" speeches about the socio-economic and environmental consequences of a dramatic population boom. Those countries are not part of this concern at all, which shows clearly that it's not a "racial matter". They have been going through a regular demographic transition from high fertility/high death rate to low fertility/low death rate, so they're pretty much experiencing what's expected from any country in a similar level of development.

But there are countries and countries. In some parts of Africa, what is really striking is that those patterns of demographic transition that happened in Europe, in North America, in Latin America, in East Asia, in Southeast Asia, in much (though not all) of the Middle East, are just not happening at all.

Or rather, "a" demographic transition is indeed happening, but in a totally different, much slower pace, even many decades after the bulk of the decrease in death rates started to happen. As is widely known, it is not an increase in fertility rates that causes most population booms: it's a dramatic decline in death rates enabled by socio-economic and techno-scientific advances.

Unlike the "expected" pattern of previous demographic transitions in the underdeveloped world (Latin America, East/Southeast Asia etc.), which was an acceleration of the decline in fertility and birth rates starting ~20-40 years after the intense decline in death rates, that has not happened so far or did indeed happen, but in exceedingly moderate levels, in much of Africa. That's not a matter of opinion: it's a fact.

The current high population growth of most of Africa is like a very protracted version of the intermediary stage of the demographic transition that's already closer to completion in most other parts of the world. That is the stage in which death rates started to plummet just a few decades earlier, but people are still "wared" to think just like they did in the prior and "traditional" demographic situation, when infant mortality rates were still huge and the odds of dying early at any time were still pretty high. Birth and fertility rates often start to decrease ever so slightly, but way too little to compensate for the sudden and really intense decline in death rates. Population boom ensues.

The social, economic and cultural adjustment to that unprecedented situation takes some decades to catch on, until a new balance (hopefully) is found in later decades. Much of Africa seems to be stuck in the middle of that path or crossing it without any hurry, though. The transition is definitely going on, but as if people were often using the brakes.

The result is, as everyone knows, permanently enormous population growth for longer than 60 years — and likely to continue at least until the end of the 21st century even if fertility rates and birth rates decline in an increasingly faster pace, which is predicted by the UN forecasts.

The cases of 3 Saharan-Sahelian countries, Mali, Niger and Chad are particularly concerning considering the extremely high levels of sustained and so far unabated population growth in what are hyper-arid-majority countries in which the overwhelming majority of the population is concentrated in a minority of the territory that has more hospitable and productive climate conditions.

Population estimates

	1887	2021	2100	Accumulated growth
Mali	2.05	20.86	80.38	3821%
Chad	1.92	16.91	61.85	3121%
Niger	1.21	25.13	164.95	13,532%

Absolute population numbers mean little. 20 million in the fertile river valleys of China is very little, but 20 million in the desert of Atacama will be a lot. Niger, Mali, Chad, Mauritania, Somalia, Namibia, Egypt, Morocco and some other nations are mosly occupied by deserts and semi-arid grasslands without major fertile river valleys, which is why the overwhelming majority of the people in those countries are heavily concentrated in just a small portion of their large territories, so obviously these lands are, unless major technological advances happen in the future (an unforeseeable condition), less capable of sustaining very high population densities without any hardship.

Köppen–Geiger climate classification map for Mali (1980–2016)

The Sahelian countries also face the challenge of Saharan expansion (desertification) and very obvious problems to feed and give humane living conditions, jobs and overall opportunities to their generally very young populace. To be honest, as a a general rule, 3% growth of it per year is hardly coped up with ease for a very long time, even in countries that are booming economically and developing fast.

As for Nigeria, Uganda, Rwanda, Egypt (even with more than 90% of its territory being almost uninhabited desert) and a few other nations, they already have very high population densities, much higher than most countries of the world. So, as of now, without any further growth, they are already very populous for their land size, regardless of climate conditions. If they triple or quadruple their population, they will be among the most populated places on earth, with all the obvious direct and indirect consequences that derive from that.

There is no need to wait for an "apocalyptical scenario" to start caring about long-term social, environmental and economic impacts and to think about the conditions that will allow people to not just survive two or three generations from ours, but also to thrive, preferably with a much higher level of socio-economic progress than exists now. I hope a consensus can be reached that it's wrong to believe that "it's all fine as long as the Doomsday doesn't come, so nothing must be done to avoid further problems in lands that already deal with lots of chronic problems, because whatever happens, it surely won't be as bad as the end of the world". That would be really lowering the bar for Africa and Africans, and I definitely don't think we should do that.

Someone who really think it is no problem and of no concern at all, not for now, but for the not so distant future, that a country that already experienced a major population boom in the 20th century keeps growing 2–3% per year for another century is either naively over-optimistic (of that kind that can get dangerous for oneself and for other people), or very reckless and obstinate even in the face of reason and sheer factual likelihood.

Of course it may also be, for some, a case of excessive focus on the short term, so that 50 years from now seems to be an extremely remote prospect, or, in other cases, ignorance of how population growth, being the exponential proportion that it in fact is, escalates over time until what was not initially a concern suddenly becomes a concern right when it's way too late to make anything to curb it.

Population of country A in year 0: 25 million

If it keeps increasing...	After 100 years it'll have...	Accumulated growth
3% per year	480.5 million	1822%
2.5% per year	295.3 million	1081,2%
2% per year	181.1 million	624,4%
1.5% per year	110.8 million	343,2%
1% per year	67.6 million	170,4%
0.5% per year	41.2 million	64,8%

Let's make it clear: a 2%, 2.5%, even 3% population growth is obviously no dramatic danger to any society, to nature or to the world this year, next year or in the next 10 years…

But have it sustained in those immense levels for many decades (even after many previous decades of similarly high growth, mind you), and maybe things will start to look differently, and not just because of the figures per se, but because of the new conditions, risks and obstacles that appear.

Demographics is really destiny (and, I might add, mathematics is, too), but fortunately we are perfectly able to predict what's going to happen and prepare for the challenges that are still not present so vividly, but will soon emerge in an unmistakable way.

For one, a much increased demand for all sorts of natural (e.g. water, food stuff, land, metals, electricity etc.) as well as human resources just to keep the present standards of living (usually poor and underdeveloped, let's be realistic), without even increasing it at all on a per capita basis.

A huge feat in a world that is already struggling to find ways to keep its current levels of consumption without completely disrupting the natural environments that ultimately we rely on to survive and have a hospitable and minimally pleasant homeland to live and work on.

And that's just considering our own self-centered interests as human beings… I don't need to tell what is obviously going to happen to more and more natural areas "claimed" by farms, pastures, mining, urban and inter-urban infrastructure, housing, and so on, do I? People have to find a way to survive, and they're also entitled to having their ambition to earn and consume more.

For another, there is the inconvenient fact of the utter incapability of the traditional, pre-modern or proto-modern, agrarian economy to properly guarantee work, land and decent living for, say, 200 million people where there used to be just 10 million people less than 200 years ago, especially the territory in question is arid or semi-arid or, alternatively, already quite densely populated or even a lot so).

Moreover, there is the already ongoing, almost unstoppable and easily predictable transition from mostly rural to mostly urban in most of the world, including Africa. Even with moderate population increase, an urbanization process is very challenging and often creates new societal problems (e.g. criminal violence, urban gangs, pollution, sewage and other infrastructure issues, mass transport systems, etc.) or worsens those that already exist.

With high (~2–3%) natural increase that would already guarantee a massive growth in the population figures and sizes of cities, but with that strongly compounded by fast urbanization, economic modernization and increasing "push" factors in rural areas, it's going get really rough in many highly sought-after metropolitan areas.

Keeping in line with our aforementioned hypothetical example using a generic Country A (maybe thus people think twice before accusing me of being "afro-pessimistic"), let's see how those two trends work together:

Population of country A in year 0: 25 million. Urbanization rate: 30% (7.5 million).

If it keeps increasing...	After 100 years...	Urban population Rate: 80%	Accumulated growth of the urban pop.	Rural population Rate: 20%	Accumulated growth of the rural pop.
3% per year	480.5 million	384.4 million	5025,3%	96.1 million	449,1%
2.5% per year	295.3 million	236.2 million	3049,3%	59.1 million	237,7%
2% per year	181.1 million	144.9 million	1832,0%	36.2 million	106,9%
1.5% per year	110.8 million	88.6 million	1081,9%	22.2 million	26,9%
1% per year	67.6 million	54.1 million	621,1%	13.5 million	-22,9%
0.5% per year	41.2 million	33.0 million	339,5%	8.2 million	-53,1%

In the scenarios of highest continuous growth, with urban population skyrocketing by a staggering 5,025%, it'd be basically as if you live in a medium-sized city with 0.5 million inhabitants, and only one hundred years from now there will be 25.6 million people that will have to have everything provided to them in the same city. Now, multiply that in an entire country. That's maybe feasible, why not?, but definitely not devoid of any problems and concerns. Even a much more intermediate scenario (like the one with average 1.5% increase per year) still involves a huge boom of city dwellers, above 1,000% in one century.

Some people have pointed out to me that Africa is "underpopulated" and has "vast empty lands and resources available for a much larger population". That would be a good relieving point, but… well, unfortunately "underpopulation", at least for worldwide standards, is not exactly the reality of much of Africa even by now (particularly if you take away all the inhospitable deserts), let alone 50 or 100 years from now if its population really booms as foreseen.

As for "vast empty lands" I hope they're not considering the mostly infertile and not so favorable desert and semi-desert zones that cover almost 1/3 of Africa's territory, nor taking the entirety of the remaining (and already much reduced) areas of natural vegetation as "lands to be used in the next years". That would be a disaster not just for nature, but, in the long term, for the people themselves.

In the table below, anyone can easily see that much of Africa is objectively not underpopulated. In fact, some of the world's highest population densities are found in Africa even now, and many of the countries that initially seem to be very underpopulated are just majority very arid and/or semi-arid locations, where the large majority of the population necessarily has to live in a small portion of the country.

From the table it's also clear that, whether we like it or not, it's just a fact that Africa has a vast amount of deserts, semi-deserts and semi-arid steppes, not exactly the least vulnerable environments for a massive, continuous boom in the population.

		Mostly arid and semi-arid countr
		Largely arid and semi-arid count

	Area	2020 estimate	Pop. Density
World average	-	7.800.000.000	53,0
Algeria	2.381.740	43.851.044	18,4
Angola	1.246.700	32.866.272	26,4
Benin	112.620	12.123.200	107,6
Botswana	600.370	2.351.627	3,9
Burkina Faso	274.200	20.903.273	76,2
Burundi	27.830	11.890.784	427,3
Cabo Verde	4.033	555.987	137,9
Cameroon	475.440	26.545.863	55,8
Central African Republic	622.984	4.829.767	7,8
Chad	1.284.000	16.425.864	12,8
Comoros	2.170	869.601	400,7
Côte d'Ivoire	322.460	26.378.274	81,8
Democratic Republic of the Congo	2.345.410	89.561.403	38,2
Djibouti	23.000	988.000	43,0
Egypt	1.001.450	102.334.404	102,2
Equatorial Guinea	28.051	1.402.985	50,0
Eritrea	121.320	3.546.421	29,2
Eswatini (Swaziland)	17.363	1.160.164	66,8
Ethiopia	1.127.127	114.963.588	102,0
Gabon	267.667	2.225.734	8,3
Gambia	11.300	2.416.668	213,9
Ghana	239.460	31.072.940	129,8
Guinea	245.857	13.132.795	53,4
Guinea-Bissau	36.120	1.968.001	54,5
Kenya	582.650	53.771.296	92,3
Lesotho	30.355	2.142.249	70,6
Liberia	111.370	5.057.681	45,4
Libya	1.759.540	6.871.292	3,9
Madagascar	587.040	27.691.018	47,2
Malawi	118.480	19.129.952	161,5
Mali	1.240.000	20.250.833	16,3

Mauritania	1.030.700	4.649.658	4,5
Mauritius	2.040	1.271.768	623,4
Mayotte (France)	374	272.815	729,5
Morocco	446.550	36.910.560	82,7
Mozambique	801.590	31.255.435	39,0
Namibia	825.418	2.540.905	3,1
Niger	1.267.000	24.206.644	19,1
Nigeria	923.768	206.139.589	223,2
Republic of the Congo	342.000	5.518.087	16,1
Réunion (France)	2.512	895.312	356,4
Rwanda	26.338	12.952.218	491,8
Saint Helena, Ascension and Tristan da Cunha (UK)	394	6.077	15,4
São Tomé and Príncipe	1.001	219.159	218,9
Senegal	196.190	16.743.927	85,3
Seychelles	455	98.347	216,1
Sierra Leone	71.740	7.976.983	111,2
Somalia	637.657	15.893.222	24,9
South Africa	1.219.912	59.308.690	48,6
South Sudan	644.329	11.193.725	17,4
Sudan	1.861.484	43.849.260	23,6
Tanzania	945.087	59.734.218	63,2
Togo	56.785	8.278.724	145,8
Tunisia	163.610	11.818.619	72,2
Uganda	236.040	45.741.007	193,8
Western Sahara	266.000	597.339	2,2
Zambia	752.614	18.383.955	24,4
Zimbabwe	390.580	14.862.924	38,1

So, sorry, but the "we have plenty of room to grow indefinitely" argument doesn't hold water and seems to be a blindly accepted myth, a self-denial or an excuse to refuse to discuss the matter. It's perhaps true for some places and provided that population increase goes on strongly for some time, but it doesn't work as a whole for the entire continent nor in the longer term.

Someone else, also from Africa, told me that the people there are very "resilient" and always easily "learn how to adapt and survive under all conditions", as they've done for centuries (he only forgot that they did so when their population numbers were tremendously lower), even without the need for any of the modern apparatus of technology and modern economy.

Apparently, this person who has electricity, a mobile phone/notebook and access to good internet connection to write to me, ironically, thinks those comforts of modern technology and knowledge are totally needless and perhaps even undesirable for millions or even, in a near future, billions of other people who live in the same continent: "they don't need those things to survive and be glad about their lives" — so the privileged few must think, and it must feel so convenient for them to believe so, indeed.

It's almost as if the real point that is meant is that "it's enough to guarantee their mere survival", irrespective of living conditions, economic opportunities and both environmental as well as social sustainability. Provided that they don't die in droves, it's all neat.

Sorry, but I can't think that way. In my book it's not enough that people survive early childhood and live some sort of living for some time, no matter how meager, impoverished or subject to premature disease and death. At least that isn't what we should strive for right from the start, without even trying to move things a bit to make a different future come true.

Most of those people aren't just "living simple lifestyles": low life expectancy, increased risk of premature death, relatively high infant mortality, high maternal mortality, high undernourishment rates, insufficient access to proper medical treatment, lack of sanitation and improved water — those are not "Western luxuries" nor "modern comforts", nor do I think they are deliberate "choices" to live "a more simple and traditional way of life", at least not for most people, who were given no choice where they were born.

Now that kind of romanticization of underdevelopment is what I think really sounds very condescending. It's usually an argument used by those who have access to all those so-called "luxuries" to underplay the challenges and hardships faced by the common men and women.

Ironically, three of the well-known leading facts that are strongly correlated with the slow decrease of fertility and birth rates in any country are low access to at least primary and secondary education, low access to physicians, medical materials (including contraceptives) and healthcare in general, and low opportunities of better education and independent work for women.

So, that kind of "fake-progressive" thought actually becomes a self-fulfilling prophecy: by stressing that people just need to keep being the resilient survivors that they have always been, they're also guaranteeing that the population surge continues strongly for more years, and vice-versa in a mutually reinforcing way.

What definitely proves that the rapid population increase of most of Africa in this century does merit some concern and serious consideration in public debate and policy, without shrugging it off or putting half-concocted labels on anyone who dares to speak, is that African people, hopefully and fortunately, will not just get stuck in the very same living conditions, consumption patterns and economic opportunities that they have now in the next seven or eight decades.

Africa is developing and enriching, and it just won't stop because some people may think they don't need much more to live well. Clearly most people do want more goods, energy resources, services, knowledge, and so on. That's already happening, but it's evidently a process that, as anywhere else, is very costly to the environment and very demanding to both humankind and the entire planet.

If Africa's population rises from the present 1.3 billion people to nearly 4.3 billion people in 2100, as per the medium (pay attention at this) scenario of the UN forecasts, the effective impact of that growth for the planet won't be an additional 3 billion humans. At least I sincerely hope it won't, because Africa is expected to narrow the gap between it and other world regions and have average continent-wide standards of economy, quality of life, nutrition, etc. on a par at least with the more developed among the emerging countries (e.g. Mexico, Iran, Brazil, Turkey, Colombia, Thailand, etc.).

But for that to happen, demand and consumption of resources per capita (for productive purposes as well as for direct use) will necessarily have to increase *a lot, even if major technological breakthroughs reduce waste and improve efficiency, productivity and environmental sustainability.

It's pure mathematics. If Africans by 2100 consume 3x or 4x times as much as they do now, still well below what people in the rich developed world on average do nowadays, in 2021, then those 4.3 billion people in 2100 will in fact have the total effect or "footprint" of 12.9–17.2 billion individuals living by the socio-economic standards of 2021 Africa.

Population of country A in year 0: 25 million.
Use of resources per capita: 1x = 2020 patterns

If it keeps increasing...	After 100 years...	Use of resources	Tantamount to:	Accumulated increase in total use of resources
3% per year	480.5 million	4x	1.922 billion	7,588%
2.5% per year	295.3 million	4x	1.181 billion	4,624%
2% per year	181.1 million	4x	724.4 million	2,798%
1.5% per year	110.8 million	4x	443.2 million	1,673%
1% per year	67.6 million	4x	270.4 million	981,6%
0.5% per year	41.2 million	4x	164.8 million	559,2%

That's a huuuuuuge leap. It's no reason for panic and alarm, however there is no way you can say it'll be easy-peasy like a walk in the park, and the more people refuse to take that seriously and prepare accordingly, the harder it will be.

A way to achieve that big socio-economic advance together with a big population boom will have to be found amidst: increasingly worrisome climate changes detrimental to the economy and the livability of some areas, an already very populated world, and an increasing perception that the limits of the sustainable and self-replenishable use of the Earth's resources may have been already breached by humankind.[1]

We aren't talking here about a future that is way over the visible horizon, guys. It's "just" 28 years separating us from 2050 (we will hopefully all be alive by then), and 2100 is "just" 78 years from now. We all know many children who will be (God willing!) alive in 2100 or even many years after that. It's just about three generations from now. The population momentum of the last years virtually guarantees that the forecasts will be reasonably accurate at least until the 2050s.

These prospects and concerns are not totally unrealistic "dystopic fantasies" about things that are so far ahead that we can do nothing about nor should waste much time thinking about.

If the currently estimated trends continue (stress on the word if), Africa will have most of the most densely populated countries in the world, with the majority of the continent's nations well above the world average population density of 2100 or, for what it's worth, 2021, and it will certainly have an even tremendously higher increase in consumption of resources, arable lands, public services, and so on.

That's just a neutral, objective, logical fact driven by demographic processes: it's not something that will magically solve itself or miraculously emerge with rigorously no apparent consequences for anyone — for individuals, societies, fauna, flora, the entire planet. Denial and delusion never helped anyone handle a new situation successfully.

	Area	2100 estimate	Pop. Density	2020-2100 increase (%)
World average	148.900.000	10.880.000.000	73,1	39,5
Algeria	2.381.740	70.700.000	29,7	61,2
Angola	1.246.700	188.280.000	151,0	472,9
Benin	112.620	47.210.000	419,2	289,4
Botswana	600.370	4.170.000	6,9	77,3
Burkina Faso	274.200	83.190.000	303,4	298,0
Burundi	27.830	50.900.000	1829,0	328,1
Cabo Verde	4.033	603.949	149,8	8,6
Cameroon	475.440	90.230.000	189,8	239,9
Central African Republic	622.984	11.630.000	18,7	140,8
Chad	1.284.000	61.850.000	48,2	276,5
Comoros	2.170	2.190.000	1009,2	151,8
Côte d'Ivoire	322.460	96.630.000	299,7	266,3
Democratic Republic of the Congo	2.345.410	362.030.000	154,4	304,2
Djibouti	23.000	1.330.000	57,8	34,6
Egypt	1.001.450	224.740.000	224,4	119,6
Equatorial Guinea	28.051	4.510.000	160,8	221,5
Eritrea	121.320	9.060.000	74,7	155,5
Eswatini (Swaziland)	17.363	2.150.000	123,8	85,3
Ethiopia	1.127.127	294.390.000	261,2	156,1
Gabon	267.667	5.860.000	21,9	163,3
Gambia	11.300	8.180.000	723,9	238,5
Ghana	239.460	79.010.000	330,0	154,3
Guinea	245.857	45.260.000	184,1	244,6
Guinea-Bissau	36.120	5.710.000	158,1	190,1
Kenya	582.650	125.420.000	215,3	133,2
Lesotho	30.355	2.700.000	88,9	26,0
Liberia	111.370	15.530.000	139,4	207,1
Libya	1.759.540	8.010.000	4,6	16,6
Madagascar	587.040	99.960.000	170,3	261,0
Malawi	118.480	66.560.000	561,8	247,9
Mali	1.240.000	80.380.000	64,8	296,9
Mauritania	1.030.700	17.060.000	16,6	266,9
Mauritius	2.040	827.303	405,5	-34,9
Mayotte (France)	374	745.691	1993,8	173,3
Morocco	446.550	44.710.000	100,1	21,1
Mozambique	801.590	123.650.000	154,3	295,6
Namibia	825.418	5.794.000	7,0	128,0
Niger	1.267.000	164.950.000	130,2	581,4
Nigeria	923.768	732.940.000	793,4	255,6
Republic of the Congo	342.000	20.960.000	61,3	279,8
Réunion (France)	2.512	901.249	358,8	0,7
Rwanda	26.338	33.410.000	1268,5	157,9
Saint Helena, Ascension and Tristan da Cunha (UK)	394	4.496	11,4	-26,0
São Tomé and Príncipe	1.001	708.097	707,4	223,1
Senegal	196.190	63.520.000	323,8	279,4
Seychelles	455	88.327	194,1	-10,2
Sierra Leone	71.740	16.680.000	232,5	109,1
Somalia	637.657	75.720.000	118,7	376,4
South Africa	1.219.912	79.190.000	64,9	33,5
South Sudan	644.329	31.740.000	49,3	183,6
Sudan	1.861.484	142.340.000	76,5	224,6
Tanzania	945.087	285.650.000	302,2	378,2
Togo	56.785	26.950.000	474,6	225,5
Tunisia	163.610	12.970.000	79,3	9,7
Uganda	236.040	136.780.000	579,5	199,0
Western Sahara	266.000	1.380.000	5,2	131,0
Zambia	752.614	81.550.000	108,4	343,6
Zimbabwe	390.580	30.970.000	79,3	108,4

Now, is this massive surge ultimately good or bad, welcome or undesired? It's up to each person or people to decide that. Of course every nation has the power and the right to self-determination, to lead their own fate as they please, but it's really important that they are all fully aware of what each of the available choices will take and what the consequences of each of them will be. You can only make a choice when you at least know that it is a choice to begin with, and not just a fatalistic decision by the Fates.

As a final note, I want to stress that it's not like accelerating the demographic transition is a feat that no African nation achieved, or something that they are all incapable of or universally against. Persistently high population increase is not some integral part of the "African ways". Some countries have already paved that way, like Djibouti and Cape Verde, which have converged with the world average trend very rapidly in the last 40 years and is not likely to experience any big surge in its population numbers.

Related Links

Why can't Africa control its population? (Africa's population will grow to more than 4 Billion before the end of this century.)

Africa’s population is growing irresponsibly, it’s a bad thing for the world. Will measures be taken to lower the birth rate?

What are the consequences of the strong population growth in Africa: 1.3 billion inhabitants in 2018, 2.5 billion in 2050 and 4.4 billion in 2100?

Will Africa's population reach 4 billion by 2100, or are population projections for Africa exaggerated?

How can Africa's population grow to 2.4 billion by 2050, as stated by the Population Reference Bureau (US), with all the known geopolitical and economic problems affecting the continent?

What caused the rapid population growth in Africa in the last 60 years?

Qu'est-ce qui est parfaitement acceptable dans votre culture, mais choquant dans d'autres cultures ?

Apollo de Souza Fraud Auditor, Mis à jour le 16 nov.

Parmi les choses étranges, mais qu'on trouve tout à fait normales en Afrique, la croyance en la sorcellerie est de loin la plus répandue. N'eut été la tournure tragique qu'elles prennent le plus souvent, ces affaires de sorcellerie auraient prêté à sourire sous d'autres cieux. Pire encore, leur traitement médiatique en totale violation des règles déontologiques du journalisme, ne fait que leur conférer une prétendue authenticité et un ancrage certain dans l'inconscient collectif. L'histoire des sorcières tombées du ciel en est la parfaite illustration.

1- Le voyage des sorcières

Togo mars 2017: Il ne s'agit nullement d'un conte de Grimm ou d' Andersen. A en croire les journaux, la réalité dépasserait ici la fiction. Deux sorcières se seraient crashées lors d'un vol mythique de nuit. Retrouvées nues sur la voie publique, elles n'eurent la vie sauve que grâce à l'intervention des forces de l'ordre. Un problème de manche à balai sans doute !

Togo : Deux sorcières tombées très tôt ce matin dans le quartier Agbalépedogan - Togo Top Infos | Le Top de l'information togolaise
Togo: 2 sorcières tombées lors d'un voyage mystique font les aveux

Togo : Deux sorcières tombées très tôt ce matin dans le quartier Agbalépedogan - Togo Top Infos | Le Top de l'information togolaise
Togo: 2 sorcières tombées lors d'un voyage mystique font les aveux

2- le vol de pénis

Par simple contact physique, un sorcier, voleur ou rétrécisseur de pénis serait capable, de faire disparaître le pénis de sa victime . Une histoire abracadabrante qui fait périodiquement la une des journaux . Malheureusement, la présomption d'innocence n'existant pas, les présumés voleurs sont systématiquement lynchés alors que vérification faite, les victimes prétendues étaient toujours en possession de leurs précieux attributs.

Gambie octobre 2003, Accusé d'avoir dérobé par le biais de la sorcellerie, un pénis à une personne qu'il aurait effleuré, un jeune homme de 28 ans a été lynché à mort . Conséquence de la psychose qui en résulta, plus personne ne voulut serrer la main à l'autre pour les salutations d'usage.

Cameroun décembre 2014 «Un individu a failli passer un sale temps avec des jeunes qui l'accusent d'être un "rétrécisseur" de sexe», «Comme cela se fait dans notre société, l'individu en question a serré la main à certains gens qui ont automatiquement, selon eux, senti que leur… n'était plus à sa place dit-on», (camer.be) Le grand retour des "voleurs de sexe"

3- le meurtre des enfants albinos.

La bêtise humaine à son paroxysme. Déjà stigmatisés pour leur apparence, les albinos font l'objet de superstitions qui en font des proies recherchées pour "faire de l'argent". Leurs membres auraient des vertus magiques, source de pouvoir, de chance ou encore de gloire. Le pic des meurtres étant les périodes électorales et les fêtes de fin d'année. D'après l'ONU, dans certaines régions d'Afrique un corps entier d'albinos pourrait valoir jusqu'à 70 000 euros, pour un SMIC mensuel oscillant entre 60 et 70 euros. De quoi susciter d'inébranlables vocations!

Mali Mai 2018. Pendant qu'elle dormait dans la cour à côté de sa maman, une fille albinos de 5 ans a été enlevée et son corps décapité retrouvé plus tard à proximité d'une mosquée.

Le Matin -l'actualité en direct

Mozambique septembre 2017, un albinos de 17 ans tué et démembré.

Discrimination et sorcellerie: un albinos tué et démembré au Mozambique

4- Les massacres des innocents

Tanzanie Octobre 2014. Sept personnes soupçonnées de sorcellerie ont été brûlées vives. Un remake à l'africaine des sorcières de Salem.

5- Le “ dis oui” ou le Gbotemi. Pour finir dans un registre beaucoup plus léger, beaucoup de femmes africaines croient dur comme fer aux vertus du Gbotemi encore appelé “dis oui”. Une pratique qui consiste à mélanger le sang menstruel ou d'autres choses innommables à la nourriture de son compagnon. Très répandue en Afrique sud- saharienne, elle aurait pour vertu de retenir l'homme, de le rendre moins volage et surtout plus docile. D'où l'expression “ Dis Oui”

Ndjamena : quand les règles menstrues et le placenta servent à envoûter les hommes - Evariste D. KONE

De toute l'Afrique, l'armée tchadienne est la plus redoutable. Sachant que le Tchad fait partie des pays les plus pauvres du monde, comment expliquez-vous cette réussite militaire ?

Omar Chad Fait ses études à l'école de la vie! 4 juil.

C'est sérieux ce que vous dites? Comparée à quelle armée Africaine ? Et puis sachez bien que c'est grâce à la France qui l'épaulait militairement, le défunt Idriss Débyé n'aurait jamais pu tenir tête à la rebellion interne pendant toute la longévité de son pouvoir. Probablement le seul pays Africain ou la rebellion n'a pas baisser pieds tout au long de la vie politique de cette dictature Africaine !

Et surtout n'évoquez pas la défaite de la Libye face à l'armée Tchadienne dans le conflit de la bande d'aouzou . Le défunt Kaddhafi avait vu en Haftar un dangereux rival, il l'a envoyé la-bas combattre les Tchadiens sans soutien militaire pour se débarrasser de lui.

Anthony Lapeyre , Licence Histoire, Université d'Orléans (2000)

Répondu 7 juil. pour plusieurs raisons :
-Traditions, c'est dans cette région que se recrutaient les meilleurs tirailleurs à l'époque de la colonisation

-Le pays a servi pendant des années de bouclier contre la Libye de Khadafi, ce qui a aguerri ses soldats.

-A ce titre le Tchad a bénéficié d'une aide appréciable en terme de formation de la part des Français et des Américains.

-Les affrontement entre soldats tchadiens et combattants irréguliers venus du Sud Soudan ou de la Libye sont réguliers ce qui maintient leur niveau d'entrainement.

-L'état Tchadien est d'essence militaro-politique, Déby et Habré avant lui étaient des combattants…

Questions similaires

Quels sont les pays du monde qui enfoncent l'Afrique toujours plus dans la pauvreté ?
Quel a été le coup d'État militaire le plus inattendu de l'histoire mondiale ?
Quels sont les pays d'Afrique les plus riches, et quelle est la source principale de leur fortune ?
Quel est le pays le plus francophone de l'Afrique ?
Quelle est la plus grande arme militaire de toute l'histoire ?
L'Afrique est-elle pauvre à cause de la colonisation ? Si la colonisation n'avait jamais eu lieu, comment se présenterait l'Afrique ?
Quel pays a le plus grand et le plus méchant char militaire ?
Quelle est l'armée la plus puissante en Afrique ?
Le Rwanda est est un petit pays pauvre, dirigé par un tyran, pourquoi ce pays est-il invité dans des réunions des 20 pays riches au monde (G20)?
Quelle est l'arme française la plus redoutable ?
Sous quels aspects la Chine est-elle encore un pays très pauvre ?
Comment expliquez-vous que ceux qui vivent dans des pays riches sont souvent tristes, alors que ceux vivant dans des pays pauvres ont le sourire ?
Le Tchad, pays enclavé sans accès à la mer, fait partie des pays les plus pauvres du monde ; si vous étiez président de ce pays, que feriez-vous pour améliorer sa situation ?
Quel est l'avion militaire le plus redouté de tous les temps ?
Supportez-vous les missions militaires de la France en Afrique, oui, non pourquoi ?

Parler la langue des colonisateurs et les prendre comme modèle est t-il l'or de tout les maux de l'Afrique ? Et quel est la bonne décision à prendre pour inverser les choses ?

Stanislas Kowalski Suivre Mentor (teacher trainer) chez New Generation Pedagogical Research Center jeu.

L'origine de tous les maux? Rien que ça ? Imaginons deux secondes ce que ça donnerait de passer à une langue locale. Allez-vous enseigner la médecine en wolof? Allez-vous étudier l'ingénierie en swahili ? Avec quels manuels? Et pour la littérature, quel dialecte allez-vous choisir? Celui qui a le meilleur système d'écriture ?

Soyons sérieux deux secondes. Les langues coloniales sont plutôt une opportunité. D'ailleurs n'importe quelle langue étrangère adossée à une grande culture est une opportunité pour celui qui l'apprend. Les Européens ne sont pas devenus puissants en refusant d'apprendre des langues étrangères, mais en échangeant des idées.

Quant à l'avenir des cultures africaines, c'est aux Africains qu'il revient de les faire vivre. Ce sont eux, et personne d'autre, qui pourront créer la littérature qui leur manque pour faire vivre leur langue.

Ici, au Cambodge, la situation est un peu différente, mais je ne cesse d'encourager mes élèves à lire en anglais et à écrire en khmer. Un modèle n'est jamais que ce que l'on en fait. Suivre Stanislas Kowalski

Questions similaires

Que pensez-vous de la théorie de Cheikh Anta Diop selon laquelle "la civilisation égyptienne serait une civilisation « nègre » et constituerait le berceau des cultures africaines subsahariennes" ?

Pourquoi la Grèce antique est-elle le début de la civilisation occidentale au lieu de l'Afrique ancienne ?

Il est avéré que le pharaon Montouhotep 2 était noir. Comment peut-on encore nier l'apport de la civilisation noire sur l'Égypte antique ?

L'incapacité du monde à dire que l'Égypte ancienne était une civilisation noire est-elle le plus grand exemple de vol culturel de l'histoire du monde ?

Comment peut-on expliquer le formidable alignement, entre la pyramide de Gizeh, l’Ile de Paques, Nazca, Angkor et bien d’autres ?

Pourquoi les égyptologues européens nient jusqu'à présent le caractère africain des égyptiens antiques, alors que les preuves en sont surabondantes ?

L'Afrique a tant donné au monde comme par exemple la connaissance aux savant grecs, pour ne pas citer autre chose. Pourquoi dit-on que l'Afrique n'est pas encore entrée dans l'Histoire ?

L'Afrique est-elle pauvre à cause de la colonisation ? Si la colonisation n'avait jamais eu lieu, comment se présenterait l'Afrique ?

Pourquoi la civilisation égyptienne nous a-t-elle laissée autant d'éléments : bâtiments, poteries, arts, outils alors que la civilisation grecque moins ancienne ne semble n'avoir légué qu'un bâtiment ou deux et tout un tas de statues sans bras ?

Pourquoi l'Afrique n'a-t-elle pas réussi à développer une civilisation sophistiquée, capable de rivaliser avec les civilisations asiatiques et européennes ?

Comment expliquer à un enfant de 10 ans la construction des pyramides d'Égypte et la présence de ce type de constructions sur divers continents, dans diverses civilisations ne s'étant jamais rencontrées, comme au Pérou ?

En dehors de l'Égypte y a-t-il une autre civilisation qui était toute aussi développée qu'elle à la même époque ?

Quels sont les pays d'Afrique les plus riches, et quelle est la source principale de leur fortune ?

La colonisation a-t-elle eu également des effets positifs sur l'Afrique ?

Les seules civilisations anciennes avancées d'Afrique se trouvaient en Afrique du Nord, alors qu'il n'y en a eu pratiquement aucune en Afrique subsaharienne. À cause de ça, je commence à détester être noir. Est-ce que c'est m

Is it still possible to terraform the Sahara and turn it into a green forest?

Mega Chad and the Milankovitch orbital cycles.

Henrey Bradley Follow Amateur Historian, Adventurer Updated Dec 15

For tens of thousands of years, the largest Freshwater lake to ever exist on earth was in the Sahara desert, and it was called Lake Mega Chad.
This ludicrously gigantic lake was actually one of a series of Mega lakes found across the Sahara.

Who cares about a lake in North Africa, what's the big deal, doesn't look that special.

A lake doesn't just get the name Mega Chad for being your average lake, this bloody massive lake covered more land area than fracking Germany.

For most of the last 16,000-years, Mega Chad was a giant inland freshwater sea in the Sahara, which come to think of it was less of a desert and more like a lush paradise for humans.

Unsurprisingly, when the Romans learned of this Mega Chad Lake, with all the trade and wealth in the area, they got super interested. Starting with Augustus, they sent a bunch of typically peaceful Roman expeditions to explore the area.

14
MVNIC. PI. IX. P. M.
AN. XVIII.

Legions, march across those sand dunes and bring me… I mean Rome, bring back some gold for Rome. Also a Hippo, Rome wants a Hippo.
Anyway, when the Romans reached Mega Chad around two thousand years ago, they found a vast inland sea teeming with life, supporting large populations and settlements, this lake also had so many Hippopotamus that they named it; Lake of the Hippopotamus.

Lake Mega Chad was such a vast body of water that it remained, well, Mega Chad, until relatively recently, a study by the University London found that Mega Chad had lost 95% of its water in only the last two hundred years.

African Biographics

On 20 April 2021, news emerged that Idriss Deby, the long-time leader of the country of Chad, had died after he had gone to the front-line to visit his troops that were battling rebels belonging to a group calling itself Fact (the Front for Change and Concord in Chad). In his 30 years as Chad's president, Idriss Deby emerged as one of Africa's wiliest political survivors, holding on to power through rebellions that reached as far as his palace gates and establishing himself as a key military ally of Western powers. As a military commander and as president he was feared and people say he had an aura about him that meant they did not want to mess with him. And he never hesitated to crack down whenever there was some kind of threat. Now that the dust has settled, in this episode of African Biographics, we look at the story of Idriss Deby Itno and how he managed to hold on to power for such a long time.

Related Sources:
https://www.sahistory.org.za/place/chad https://www.africanews.com/2021/04/20...
https://www.britannica.com/biography/... https://www.bbc.com/news/world-africa...
https://www.nytimes.com/2021/04/20/wo...https://www.theguardian.com/world/202... https://www.thenewhumanitarian.org/fe...
https://www.theafricareport.com/81574...
https://www.hrw.org/news/2021/04/21/r...
https://www.globalsecurity.org/milita...
https://www.hrw.org/news/2016/05/03/q...https://issafrica.org/iss-today/whate...
https://www.hrw.org/report/2016/06/28...https://www.bbc.com/news/world-africa...
https://www.africanews.com/2021/08/24...https://foreignpolicy.com/2021/05/24/... https://www.brookings.edu/blog/order-...https://www.theguardian.com/world/200...
https://issafrica.org/research/books-...

Sadly, Mega Lake Chad is no longer Mega, today it's just plain boring old Lake Chad, having shrunk to a shadow of its former glory.

But the thing is dear readers, the glory days of Lake Mega Chad will return, for while the level of Lake Chad is currently at its lowest watermark, and the Sahara is parched at its most arid, here inlays the crux of this entire article and the answer to this very question.

Pause for heightened anticipation… I can't do sound effects, so just imagine a drumroll…

The Earth's wobble, a 20,000-year climate cycle that has worked like clockwork for at least 9 million years, potentially far longer.

The Earth's Wobble, what is this nonsense you say?

Mega Lake Chad 1972 and Lake Chad 2018.

Between 15,000 and 5,000 years ago, the orbital cycle of Earth wobbled favourably for North Africa, tilting towards the sun, resulting in increased humidity and rainfall drawn in from the Atlantic, leading to extreme monsoons across the Sahara desert region, this climate change lasted over ten thousand years, we call this the - African Humid Period.

This is all part of the Milankovitch Orbital Cycle hypothesis, which research seems to show is the best explanation, below is a good summary;

Milankovitch orbital cycles, result in dramatic climate change across North Africa from the hyperarid desert it is today to a nearly completely vegetated landscape dotted with Mega lakes during the early and middle Holocene epoch. This event is commonly called the "African Humid Period (AHP)". The AHP was a direct result of African monsoonal climate responses to periodic variations in the Earth's orbit around the Sun that recur roughly every 20,000 years. Impressively, the AHP is just the most recent of hundreds of earlier humid events spanning as far back as 9 million years ago, and likely much earlier.

The Earth's axial rotation is perturbed by gravitational interactions with the moon and the more massive planets that together induce periodic changes in the Earth's orbit, including a 100,000-year cycle in the shape of the orbit (eccentricity), a 41,000-year cycle in the tilt of the Earth's axis (obliquity) and a 20,000-year cycle in the "wobble" — much like a top wobbles — of the Earth's axis (precession). All three orbital cycles — called Milankovitch cycles — impact African climate on long geologic timescales, but the cycle with the most influence on the rains in Africa is the "wobble" cycle, precession. - Green Sahara: African Humid Periods caused by Earth's Orbital Changes. North Africa and the massive Sahara desert were once green and lush for more than ten thousand years, freshwater lakes the size of the British isles, and torrid immense rivers fed grasslands and forests. Until roughly 5,000BC the whole of North of Africa had been a fertile paradise of grasslands and forests for ten thousand years, this area supported widespread extensive human populations, settlements and a wealth of trade.

We don't need to terraform North Africa, just need to wait roughly 5 thousand years for the Earth’s wobble to turn the Sahara a lush green once again, then Mega Chad will return. Follow Henrey Bradley

Related Links

Is it possible to turn an entire desert into a lush green rain forest?

Can we terraform the Moon? If yes, how difficult is it? Is it possible with our current technology and what are the major challenges might we face while terraforming it?

What would happen to the world climate if the Sahara desert became a forest?

What is the best way to turn desert into rain forest?

Do we have the technology to turn the Sahara Desert back into the forest it once was?

Is it possible to terraform Sahara?

What would happen if the Sahara Desert, or any other desert, were transformed into a rainforest? Would it be bad for overall life on Earth?

What would happen if humans tried to land on Jupiter?

What would happen to the world's climate if the Sahara was green again?

Can humans live on Saturn's moon Titan?

Chadian journalist Olivier Memnguidé held for five days, accused of rebellion.

The Chadian gendarmerie, a military police force, arrested Olivier Memnguidé, a correspondent for Oxygène, as he covered unrest on April 20, 2022. (Olivier Memnguidé)

Dakar, May 12, 2022 — Authorities in Chad should cease their harassment of reporter Olivier Memnguidé and ensure journalists can cover events of public interest, the Committee to Protect Journalists said Thursday.

On April 20, the Chadian gendarmerie, a military police force, arrested Memnguidé, a correspondent for the privately owned radio station Oxygène, as he covered unrest in the southwestern town of Donia in the Logone Occidental region, according to the journalist and Abbas Mahamoud, the chairman of the Union of Journalists of Chad (UJT). They both spoke to CPJ by phone and email.

Memnguidé and Mahamoud said the gendarmerie seized the journalist's cell phone and took him to their office in the nearby Moundou city, where he was accused of rebellion, held for five days, and then released after the local prosecutor intervened. The gendarmerie informed Memnguidé on his release that he should be ready because they might still prosecute him, he told CPJ, adding that as of May 12, his cell phone had yet to be returned.

"Chadian authorities should cease their harassment of Radio Oxygène journalist Olivier Memnguidé and ensure he can work freely and without fear of another arbitrary arrest or prosecution," said Angela Quintal, CPJ's Africa program coordinator, in New York. "Covering unrest is dangerous enough for journalists without worrying about an arrest on spurious anti-state allegations."

Memnguidé was arrested at the same time as several young adults from Donia "who were rioting in response to the detention of another youth who had been charged for allegedly stealing a motorcycle," Mahamoud told CPJ.

I went to the field to get a feel for the situation and to scout around. When I was about to meet [and interview] the authorities, the brigade commander who was following me, stopped me and took me to Moundou, the provincial capital," Memnguidé told the CPJ. The journalist said he did not behave in any way that would justify him being accused of rebellion.

Five days later, on April 25, Memnguidé was presented to the prosecutor's office in Moundou, where the deputy prosecutor ordered his release over because the court there did not have jurisdiction to proceed with the case, the journalist told CPJ. Since then, Memnguidé has not returned to his home in Goré, another nearby town, because he is fearful that he will be rearrested.

CPJ called Ahmed Saleh, a commandant with the local gendarmerie, but the line disconnected after CPJ told him the call was about Memnguidé's arrest.

Wake Up Africa!
Why is Chad called the Dead Heart of Africa?

Lara Novakov (ლარა ნოვაკოვი) Posted by Sydrectar Lives in Serbia (1998-present) 6h Updated 4y

Chad has one of Africa's roughest climates, hence the name "Dead Heart of Africa"

Because of its distance from the sea and the fact that Chad has some of the harshest portions of the Sahara desert, as well as a relatively harsh climate (in the north) due to its position.

Credit: Maphill

Chad

As you can see, only the southernmost parts of Chad are green and suitable for agriculture. The rest is the Sahel/Sahara belt. And here is the Koppen classification of Chad's climate: interested in geography
Answered 7h ago

This is where Chad is at in Africa:

Since Chad is right in the heart of Africa, situated right in the North/Central area of the continent, is a big part of the Sahara desert (which covers almost all of Northern Africa), and has some of the hottest, roughest and driest climate and terrain on the continent, it is for this reason it is referred to as the “Dead Heart of Africa.”

Here are some photos of Chad:

"Dead" is referring to the dry, hot climate and terrain, and "Heart of Africa" refers to its position on the continent.

Only the southern part of Chad is savannah and agriculture-friendly, not dry and hot sand and desert type.

Alejandro Peralta, studied at Association Football Answered Jan 26, 2018

Chad is among Africa and the world's poorest nations and, as such, this extremely poverty of Chad is also contributed a reason adding with the natural causes.

Chad lies right in the center of Africa, but over 65% of Chad is full of sand and only the south is suitable for farming. Meanwhile, the country lacks of infrastructures, something the French colonial administration could not afford over except Fort-Lamy (now N'Djamena), made this nation suffer.

They also don't have border with the seas as well. Lake Chad is shrinking too. So, why not the Death Heart of Africa?

Related Links

What is it like to live in Chad?
Is Chad really such a bad country?
You are made president of Chad. How do you ameliorate the situation of your country?

Is Chad a forgotten country?
What are some good activities to do in Chad, Africa?
Why is Chad called Chad?
What is the wealthiest city in Chad?
What do you know about chad (TCHAD) country?
What are some amazing facts about Chad?
Is China colonizing Africa?
Why is Chad called Tchad?
Why is Africa so rich but so poor?
Why is Africa so poor?
Why is PETA against animal ownership?
Why do third world countries mostly belong to Africa?

Chadian journalist Evariste Djailoramdji killed while covering community violence

Chadian journalist Evariste Djailoramdji was recently killed in the town of Sandana. (Photo: Arnaud Djimounoum)

New York, February 18, 2022 — Chadian authorities should thoroughly and transparently investigate the killing of journalist Evariste Djailoramdji and hold those responsible to account, the Committee to Protect Journalist said Friday.

On February 9, unidentified people in the southern village of Sandana shot and killed Djailoramdji, a reporter working for the local broadcaster Lotiko Radio,while he covered a conflict in the area, according to local media reports and Arnaud Djimounoum, a manager at Lotiko Radio, who spoke to CPJ via messaging app. Violence broke out that day in Sandana due to a dispute between herders and farmers, according to media reports. Djimounoum told CPJ that Djailoramdji was among at least 11 people killed that day.

In the afternoon of February 9, Djailoramdji transmitted a report to his colleagues that "people draw arms everywhere in the village and the population flees to take refuge in the bush," Djimounoum said. He told CPJ that the station lost contact with Djailoramdji about half an hour later. Local media and the Union of Chadian Journalists (UJT), a local trade group, reported that the journalist had been shot and killed.

"Authorities in Chad should swiftly investigate the violence in Sandana during which journalist Evariste Djailoramdji was killed, and make public their findings," said Angela Quintal, CPJ's Africa program coordinator. "The tragedy of a journalist's death is deepened when those closest to them and the broader public do not know exactly what happened."

A portion of Djailoramdji's radio report was posted on Facebook by the local outlet Le Visionnaire, which noted he had covered similar violence in the village in 2019.

A statement by the UJT alleged that members of an armed group had deliberately targeted Djailoramdji and shot him in the head as he relayed information to Lotiko Radio. However, a manager at the station, whose name was not released, was quoted by local news website Tchad Infos as saying they did not know whether Djailoramdji had been specifically targeted.

Residents of Sandana and the Chadian Convention for the Defense of Human Rights (CTDDH), a local rights group, have called for those responsible for the violence last week to be held accountable, according to media reports.

Djailoramdji also worked as a teacher at a local school and had seven children, according to biographical information shared with CPJ by Djimounoum.

How is it that Chad, whose area is 1,284,000 km2, the fifth largest country in Africa, has only 16 million inhabitants?

Remi Beral

Location: France (1999 – today) 13 Oct.
Because Chad is mainly that:

Related Links

How come Africa, so huge continent and population, was colonized?

What is the most unionized country?

What is the most arrogant country in the world? Which is the most aggressive country?

Which African country is likely to become the first developed country on the continent?

Why do the inhabitants of hot countries eat on average more spicy food than those of cold countries?
What do people in West African countries think of abandoning the CFA

Radio Cefod journalist Orédjé Narcisse shot dead in Chad

Journalist Orédjé Narcisse was shot and killed on October 20, 2022, in Chad's capital N'Djamena as he was on his way to work. (Photo Credit: Leubnouji Tah Nathan)

Dakar, October 20, 2022 – In response to news reports that journalist Orédjé Narcisse was shot and killed on Thursday in Chad's capital N'Djamena as he was on his way to work, the Committee to Protect Journalists issued the following statement:

"Chadian authorities must conduct a swift and transparent investigation into the circumstances surrounding the fatal shooting of Radio Cefod journalist Orédjé Narcisse," said Angela Quintal, CPJ's Africa program coordinator, in New York. "Authorities must also ensure the safety of journalists as the country grapples with antigovernment protests."

Orédjé worked for the privately owned Radio Cefod and was shot outside his home by individuals wearing Chadian military uniforms as he was on his way to work, according to those reports and Leubnoudji Tah Nathan, the president of the Network of Chadian Journalists and Reporters (RJRT), who spoke to CPJ by phone and cited his conversations with eyewitnesses and Radio Cefod staff. Orédjé died from the gunshot wound as he was taken to the hospital, Leubnoudji said.

The attack comes amid demonstrations in N'Djamena demanding an end to the rule of transitional President Mahamat Déby, according to those sources. CPJ could not determine if Orédjé had been covering the protest when he was shot.

Chadian journalist Evariste Djailoramdji was killed in February while covering community violence in the southern village of Sandana.

COUNTRY FACT FILE

Location

In North central Africa.

Official title of the state

Jumuhuryat Tshad (national)
The Republic of Chad (English)

Flag description:

Three equal vertical bands of blue (hoist side), yellow, and red: the flag combines the blue and red French (former colonial) colors with the red and yellow of the Pan-African colors: blue symbolizes the sky, hope, and the south of the country, which is relatively well-watered: yellow represents the sun, as well as the desert in the north of the country: red stands for progress, unity, and sacrifice. Note: similar to the flag of Romania: also similar to the flags of Andorra and Moldova, both of which have a national coat of arms centered in the yellow band: design was based on the flag of France.

Neighbours

Libya on N. Niger, Nigeria, Cameroon on W. Central Africa Republic on S. Sudan on E. Land boundaries: total 5,968 km. Border countries: Cameroon 1,094 km, Central Africa Republic 1,197 km, Libya 1,055 km, Niger 1,175 km, Nigeria 87 km, Sudan 1360 km.

Founder of The Nation
Francoise Tombolbye (Ngarata)

Local divisions

22 regions with appointed governors.

Government type

Republic - semi-presidential

Legislation chamber

Unicameral - National Assembly

Form of State

A unitary republic with one legislative body. The National Assembly, 155 seats, members are elected by popular vote to serve for four-year terms. Chief of State is the President who is elected every 5 years. Candidates in presidential elections must win at least 50 per cent of the vote or the top two candidates will participate in a second round of voting.

Executive branch

Separated by chief of State and head of Government.

Chief of State: President, elected by popular vote to serve for five-year terms without presidential term limits. Head of government is to be appointed by the president.

The Cabinet: recommended by the Prime Minister and approved by the President.

Former Rulers

1960-1975 François (N'Garta) Tombalbaye – Head of State and President

1975-1979 Félix Malloum N'Gakoutou – Head of State and President

1979 Lol Mahamat Choua – President of Transitional Government of National Union

1979-1982 Goukouni Oueddei – Chairman of the Transitional GNU

1982-1990 Hissène Habré

1990 - Present Lt. Colonel Idrissa Déby Itno

Judicial chamber

Supreme Court: Court of Appeals: Criminal courts: Magistrate courts.

Capital city

N'Djamena Altitude 298 mtrs/977 ft

Geographic coordinates 12.06N , 15.02E.

The capital and port of Chad on the Shari river, near the Confluence with the Logone river. Founded by the French in 1900. Also known previously as Fort-Lamy, it was named after Amedee Francois Lamy, changed to N'Djamena, which took from the Arab name of a near by village known as, Nigamina, meaning for "place of rest" by the late ex-president Francois Tombolbye (Ngarata) on the 6th of April, 1973, one year before a coup assassination against him.

Names of main towns

Sarh, Moundou, Abeche, Bongor.

Date of independence

11th August,1960

Religions (Major)

Muslim 44%, Christian 33%, Tribal beliefs 23%.

Main spoken languages

French/Arabic,Tourkou, Baguirmi, Bilala, various African languages Sango also spoken.

Currency unit

African Franc (CFA)=100 Centimes

Area in Km2

1,284,000.00

Country area comparison in Africa

5 out of 55 states

Demographic terms:

Average annual population growth rate 2.038 %

Birth rate 40.12 births per 1,000 population

Death rate 15.79 deaths per 1,000 population

Average life expectancy: 47.99 years

Male 46.95 years: Female 49.07 years

Illiteracy rate (%)

Male: 38, Female: 54
Average per capita income

USD 1, 600

Population density (%)

114.1/km2

Urban population (%)

27

Contributor groups

Farming, Fishing: 23, Industry: 36, Social service: 41

Main Export Items

Raw cotton, Meat and live-animals, Petroleum crude, Textiles, Hide & skins.

Economy is based on

Agriculture, Petrol-gas, Cattle-breeding. 80% subsistence farming and livestock raising, cotton, cattle, gum-Arabic provide the bulk of Chad's non-oil export earnings. Chad is now an oil-exporting state and may benefit from this.

Climate

Tropical in the south semi-arid in the Saharan belt & desert & semi- desert in the north of the country.

Extremes:

Lowest point: Djourab Depression 160 meters.

Highest point: Emmi Koussi 3,415 meters.

Weather of the Capital city (N'djamena) average annual temperature 27.2°c.

Altitude 298 mtrs/977 ft

Hottest Month April 23-42oc

Coldest Month December 14-33oc
Driest Month November-March average Rf, August 0 mm.

Measures

Metric system

Time zone

1 hour ahead of GMT/UTC.

Public holidays

January 1, May 1, 25, June 22, August 11, 15, November 1, 28, December 25, Easter and All Muslim holidays.

Ethnic groups

Sara 27.7%, Arab 12.3%, Mayo-Kebbi 11.5%, Kanem-Bornou 9%, Ouaddai 8.7%, Hadjarai 6.7%, Tandjile 6.5%, Gorane 6.3%, Fitri-Batha 4.7%, Other 6.4%,Unknown 0.3%.

Topographic & Environmental concern

Southern wooded savannah steep and desert, part of the Sahara in the southern rivers flow north to Lake Chad surrounded by marshland. Environment: Inadequate supplies of potable water: improper waste disposal in rural areas contributes to soil and water pollution: desertification.

Economic Overview

Industry

Petrol, cotton textiles, meat processing, natron (sodium carbonate), consumer goods, construction materials.

Chief crops

Cotton, gum-Arabic, sorghum, millet, peanuts, rice, potatoes, manioc, cattle, goats, camels.

Natural resources

Petroleum, Uranium, Natron, Kaolin, Fish (on Lake Chad), Gold, Limestone, Cattle, Sand, Gravel, Salt.

Land in use (%)

Arable land: 3

Grassland: 36

Forest woods: 10

Others: 51

Marine:

Coastline: None

Commercial Sea port:

Chad is an inland state, and now a petroleum-exporting state using the port of Douala (Cameroon).

Development prospect:

Oil gives much of the funds to start new infrastructure. In September, the 20,000 barrels per-day (bpd) capacity refinery in N'Djamena financed by the China National Petroleum Corporation shut down its operations just three months after its inauguration. The refinery is owned by CNPC and the parastatal Société des Hydrocarbures du Tchad, but the Chadian government sets fuel prices. In October the government was forced to raise prices at the pump from 330 CFA francs to 490 CFA francs per liter in order to make the operation profitable, provoking the ire of consumers

About 80 percent of Chad's population lives in rural areas, and President Déby's administration has decided to devote the next three years to rural development. It has ordered 1,000 tractors to be distributed to farmers, although there is not much intensive agriculture in the country. The parastatal cotton company Coton Tchad has asked for a restructuring, the better to serve its 2.5 million cotton growers. The government has awarded other major development projects to Chinese contractors. In March 2011, it signed a $7.5bn deal with the China Civil Engineering Construction Corporation to build a 1,344km railway that will improve transport links with Sudan and Cameroon. Work is due to begin in early 2012 and will be financed by the country's oil exports. It was followed by an agreement in April with China CAMC Engineering Corporation to build a new $1bn international airport outside N'Djamena that should be completed by 2015.

COMOROS

National Flag and Emblem

Locator Map

TEXT HIGHLIGHTS: Diaries updates, key events, analysis and relating news articles in timeline

Overview

Over the centuries, the islands were invaded by a succession of diverse groups from the coast of Africa, the Persian Gulf, Indonesia and Madagascar. The culture is mainly of European and Arabic. The earliest inhabitants were probably of Malay-Polynesian origin. Later settlers came from mainland Africa, Madagascar and the Arab world. The Shirazis from Persia became dominant in the 15th-16th century, establishing sultanates in the Comoros linked to their trading settlements in Kilwa (on the coast of present-day Tanzania) and Zanzibar, and dealing in spices and slaves to the Middle East. Comoros became known for Islamic learning and exported teachers to Zanzibar. France established protectorates over Ngazidja, Nzwani and Mwali in 1886 and declared the Comoros a French Colony in 1912, administered from Madagascar. In 1947, the Comoros became a separate French Overseas Territory, gaining a degree of internal autonomy in 1961. In a referendum held in December 1974, 96% of Comorans on Ngazidja, Nzwani and Mwali voted for independence from France, but a majority on the island of Mayotte (64%) voted against. Political tensions grew until, on 6 July 1975, the Comoros declared independence unilaterally, Ahmed Abdallah becoming its first President. France retained control of Mayotte, but recognized the independence of the other islands. Later in 1975, President Abdallah was deposed in a coup, to be replaced in 1976 by President Ali Soilih, who was in turn overthrown in 1978 by a group of French and Belgian mercenaries led by 'Colonel' Bob Denard. Abdallah, who had helped finance the coup, returned from exile in France to be re-elected President, but remained dependent on a mercenary-trained Presidential Guard. He was killed in unclear circumstances during a meeting with Denard on 26 November 1989. At the request of the Interim President, French warships arrived offshore. Denard handed over control of the islands and later returned to France. Political tensions and instability continued through the 1990s. On 30 April 1999 the army seized power in a bloodless coup (the 18th coup or attempted coup in Comoros since independence in 1975). Army Chief of Staff, Colonel Azali Assoumane, assumed power at the head of a transitional executive. The Union has been relatively politically s table over the last decade, apart from the refusal by Mohamed Bacar to step down as Island President of Anjouan in 2007 and his ensuing attempt to launch a secessionist movement. Bacar was eventually forced into exile when the AU deployed over 100 peacekeepers to keep the movement in check. There were fears of renewed political instability after President Abdalla Sambi announced in 2010 that he wanted his mandate to be extended beyond the original deadline of May 2010 but a national consensus emerged and elections were organized in December 2010 to elect his successor.

Former French Colony

Achieved it’s independence after 62 years of colonial rules on 6th July, 1975.

Headship since independence: Head of State and government

In following decades, the Comores saw more than twenty coup attempts that culminated in the assassination of its first president Mr. Ahmed Abdullah Abderemane in early1989. The three Indian Ocean islands have experienced over two dozens of coups or attempted coups, beginning just weeks after independence from France in 1975 when President Ahmed Abdallah was toppled in a coup assisted by French mercenary Colonel Bob Denard. Colonel Bob Denard featured in several power struggles over the years. To add to the country's troubles, the islands of Anjouan and Moheli declared unilateral independence in a violent conflict in 1997. In an effort to bring the breakaway islands back into the fold, Moheli, Anjouan and the largest island, Grande Comore, were granted greater autonomy under a 2001 constitution.

Origins of names: The name "Comoros" is derived from the Arabic kamar or kumr, meaning "moon," although Arab geographers to Madagascar first applied this name. French colonialists to describe the islands adopted it.

A Republic and an island in the Indian ocean on the Southeastern of Africa.

It's known as the Commores often, the Comoros Islands were known for European navigators started from the sixteenth century. In 1843 France officially took control of Mayotte and in 1886 placed the other three islands, Grande Commore, Anjouan and Moheli under it's protection ruled from Madagascar in 1912. The Comoros became an overseas territory of France in 1947, and in 1961, it was granted semi-autonomy. In 1974, France held a referendum in the Comoros, there was a vote in favor of independence, except in Mayotte, where 64% of the population voted against an end to French rule, and the island of Mayotte is still under French control. The Comoros gained its independence after 62 years of colonial rules in December 1975. The following decades saw more than twenty coup attempts that culminated in the assassination of its first president Mr. Ahmed Abdallah Abderemane in 1989 by a French mercenary commando unit. A French government intervention permitted multi-party elections in 1990s, but the country remained in a state of instability. The Anjouan & Moheli seceded from the Comoros federation in 1997 and the Army led by the chief of staff, Colonel Azali took control of the government in 1999, and helped negotiate the 2000 Fomboni power-sharing agreement in which the Federal presidency rotates among the three islands, and each island maintains its own local government. A referendum at the end of 2001 renamed the country "The Union of the Comoros" Colonel Azali has won the 2002 presidential elections, he stepped aside when defeated in 2006, and president Abdallah Mohammed Sambi was elected to be the Union's president after each island in the archipelago elected it's own president. The three main islands granted a partial-Autonomous status. In 2007, Mr. Mohammed Bacar effected Anjouan's de-facto secession from the Union refusing to step down in favor of fresh Anjouan elections when the Comoros other islands held a legitimate elections in July, 2007, the African Union Commission initially attempted to resolve the political crises by applying sanctions and a naval blockade on Anjouan island, but in March, 2008, the African Union and the Comoran soldiers seized the island, the move was generally welcomed by the Anjouanese.

Presidential elections in the Comoros have been won by the current vice president Mr. Ikililou Dhoinine, a previously pharmacist from the island of Moheli, won with 61 % of the vote. Since 2001,the presidency of the archipelago, which lies 300 km (about 186 miles) off Africa’s east coast, north of Madagascar, has rotated between the three islands, Mr. Abdalla Mohammed Sambi is from the island of Anjouan. The Comoros archipelago in the Indian Ocean has had a fractious history since independence from France in 1975, experiencing more than twenty coups or attempt coups.

Tentative election calendar - Parliamentary (for Union-president, March) May.

Comoros /Comores/ – Timeline Diaries updates, and related key notes:

1527 - Portuguese cartographer Diego Ribero depicts the Comoros islands on a European map for the first time.

1886 - Comoros become a French protectorate.

1912 - Comoros formally become a French colony administered from Madagascar.

1942 - British forces invade the Comoros and Madagascar, toppling the pro-Vichy administration and handing the territories over to the Free French government of Charles de Gaulle.

1947 - Comoros become an overseas territory of France and are given representation in the French parliament.

1961 - Comoros given autonomy.

1974 - Three of the islands making up the Comoros vote for independence, but a fourth island, Mayotte, votes to stay with France.

July 1975 - Comoros unilaterally declares independence, with Ahmed Abdallah Abderemane as founder president.

August 1975 - President Ahmed Abdallah deposed in a coup assisted by French mercenary Colonel Bob Denard, and replaced by Prince Mohammed Jaafar 1976 – Prince Mohammed Jaafar also replaced by Ali Soilih, who tries to turn the country into a secular, socialist republic.

1978 – President Ali Soilih toppled and killed by mercenaries led by Colonel Bob Denard, who restored Ahmed Abdallah to power once again.

1989 – Ahmed Abdallah Abderemane assassinated by presidential guard under the command of Colonel Bob Denard, who stages the coup. France intervenes, Colonel Denard leaves islands.

1990 - Said Mohammed Djohar elected president.

1995 – Said Mohammed Djohar removed in a coup attempt led by Colonel Denard. French troops intervene, Denard surrenders.

November 23, 1996: Ethiopian Airlines Flight 961 Boeng-767-260 ER passengers plane en-route from Addis Ababa to Nairobi was hijacked by three Ethiopians seeking political asylum in Australia. The hijacked Ethiopian Airlines passengers' plane crash-landed in the Indian Ocean near Grande Comore, Comoros Islands, due to fuel starvation: 125 of the 175 passengers and crew on board died, along with the hijackers: the rest of the people on board survived with injuries.

1996 - Mohammed Abdulkarim Taki elected president, drafts a constitution which extends the authority of the president and establishes Islam as the basis of law.

August 1997 - The islands of Anjouan and Moheli declared independence from the Comoros.

September 1997 - Troops from the island of Grande Comore land in Anjouan to try to prevent its secession, but are routed.

1998 - President Mohammed Taki dies, apparently of heart attack, and is replaced by an acting president, Tadjidine Ben Said Massounde, pending elections.

April 1999 – Tajidine Massounde signs an autonomy agreement in Madagascar, but the delegates from Anjouan and Moheli refuse to follow suit, saying they must first consult their people, thereby prompting violent demonstrations in Grande Comore against people of Anjouan origins.

April 1999 – President Tajidine Massounde ousted in a coup led by the chief of the General Staff, Colonel Azali Assoumani.

March 2001 – Colonel Azali Assoumani says the country will return to civilian rule in 2002 after new institutions of government had been set up. He also said he would not stand for election.

August 2001 - A "military committee" seizes power in the breakaway island of Anjouan with aim of rejoining the Comoros.

September 2001 - Major Mohammed Bacar, who leads the military government set up in August, crushes in Anjouan, a day-old takeover by Major Combo Ayouba.

November 2001 - Anjouan sees another failed coup attempt, this time by Colonel Said Abeid, who is against Mohammed Bacar's reunification efforts.

December 2001 - Voters back a new constitution that will keep the three islands as one country, but will grant each one greater autonomy.

April 2002 - Colonel Mohammed Bacar elected leader of Anjouan and Mohammed Said Fazul elected leader of Moheli. Azali Assoumani named president of the reunited Comoros.

May 2002 - Mze Abdou Soule Elbak is elected island president of Grande Comore, also the base of Azali Assoumani, the overall ruler of the reunited Comoros.

February 2003 - Security forces say they have foiled a coup plot against President Azali Assoumani.

December 2003 - Leaders of semi-autonomous islands reach a power-sharing deal, paving the way for elections.

March-April 2004 - Local elections for assemblies on the three semi-autonomous islands. Supporters of federal president, Azali Assoumani, win only 12 of 55 seats. Elections are held in April for 33-member national assembly - Assemblee de l'Union.

June-July 2004 - National assembly opens. President Azali Assoumani names members of first federal government.

January 2005 - First visit to France by a Comoran leader Azali Assoumani for 30 years.

April and November 2005 - Mount Karthala, one of the world's largest active volcanos, spews ash over Grande Comore. Thousands of villagers flee.

May 2006 - Muslim cleric Ahmed Abdallah Mohamed Sambi, from Anjouan, wins federal presidential elections.

May 2007 - The African Union sends troops to help keep the peace in June's elections after Anjouan president Mohammed Bacar refuses to stand down.

June 2007 - Anjouan holds local elections in defiance of the federal government and the African Union. Mohammed Bacar is inaugurated as Anjouan's president.

October 2007 - The African Union imposes travel sanctions on Anjouan leader Mohammed Bacar and other government officials and freezes their foreign assets while calling for fresh elections.

November 2007 - AU begins naval blockade of the Anjouan island.

March 2008 - Comoran and AU troops land on Anjouan and recapture it. France takes renegade leader Mohammed Bacar into custody.

March 2009 - The island of Mayotte votes to fully integrate with France. The Comoros government, which lays claim to the island, terms the referendum null and void.

May 2009 - Voters in a referendum approve extension of president's term of office. The opposition and many residents of Moheli oppose the extension.

June 2009 - Plane crashes off Comoros, killing all but one of 153 people on board. Comoran expatriates demonstrate in France after suggestions plane may have been faulty.

December 2009 - President Sambi's party wins landslide victory in parliamentary election.

April 2010 - Libyan soldiers take up duty in the presidential guard as "trainers".

June 2010 - Political leaders, after some delay, agree on elections timetable starting in November with primaries for the presidency.

December 2010 - Ikililou Dhoinine wins presidential elections, and takes office in May 2011.

March 18, 2014: COMOROS: AEN No 718 – Bahari Resources and Safari Petroleum finally won a green light from Comoros Islands. Parliament approved the bill on March 17 for their contracts to extract Oil in the Indian Ocean Island.

Why are the Comoro islands impoverished despite remaining with France for a longer period?

Related Links

Did the missionaries help the European colonizers in colonizing Africans? If so, was there any difference between the missionaries and the colonizers?

Why is it that structures in Africa normally collapse and kill the occupants?

What does "kissing teeth" or "teeth-sucking" by African or Caribbean people mean as an expression? Is there a way to spell it?

Which musicians and songs should I start with as my gate to African-pop?

What can one do in the world with a UK & Finnish passport & citizenship? This is opposed to a US or Canadian, Australian or New Zealand or a South African passport? Is it mainly that Europe is my area for legal free movement, or more than just that?

What have been some success or heroic stories of African migrants in Europe that have gone unreported in the European mainstream media?

Are there developed and developing countries? I didn't know that some countries are done developing, and are now resting on their laurels allocating zero budget for "development" projects.

With the US & EU in relative decline, are Australia & NZ well placed in the Pacific Rim for where all the future, action & economic activity is going to be? Is there also likely to be a rise of Africa & South America similar to that of China?

How well do you know Mohamedu Buhari, the Nigerian president?

What was life like in Nigeria under Yakubu Gowon?

What are traveling trends of African millenials who travel to other African countries? What do they like to see? Cities, wilderness, landmarks (castles, statues etc)?

If King Piye had executed all the descendents of the 24th dynasty, like Cambyses ii of Persia later did, then what would this history of Egypt have looked like up until Roman era? Considering the Persians, Greeks and Romans failed to subdue Kush?

How do I get an international donation for NGO activities in Ghana?

Comoros In Relation to Africa
Why is Comoros recognized as an African country?

Françoise Marie · Follow

Master's Degree in Public Administration, Syracuse University Jan 25

There is no why because the Comoros are African islands.

English: Where the Comoros are located (from Africa Maps - Perry-Castañeda Map Collection - UT Library Online)

Related Links

Is there racism in African countries towards Africans from other African countries?

How do other African countries view Nigeria?

Why's the Central African Republic called this way? Can't think of a name for a country more generic than this. Did they not have any historical-geographical basis of the region to name their country after?

Why is it that some African countries are called sub-Saharan?
Why are Somalia and the Comoros Islands members of the Arab League?
Why is Africa so poor?
Why are many countries in Africa poor?
What is the best place to immigrate to in Africa?
Which is the poorest African country?
What do black Africans think about black Americans, and vice versa?
Is Mayotte an African country?
Are East African countries more developed than West African countries?
How do other African countries view Cameroon?

Should Mayotte be part of the Comoros? After all, most people in Mayotte speak Comorian as their first language, and if all four islands were united, they would have a population of over one million.

Why is Africa a poor region, even though it has the best natural resources?

COUNTRY FACT FILE

Location

The 3 main islands (Grand Comore, Anjouan and Moheli) in the Mozambique channel b/n NW Madagascar and SE Africa.

Official title of the state

Udzima wa Komori (national)

The Comoros: Officially, entitled “Union of The Comoros” is a sovereign, archipelago island nation in the Indian Ocean, located off the eastern coast of Africa, on the northern end of the Mozambique Channel.

Flag description: four equal horizontal bands of yellow (top), white, red, and blue, with a green isosceles triangle based on the hoist: centered within the triangle is a white crescent with the convex side facing the hoist and four white, five-pointed stars placed vertically in a line between the points of the crescent: the horizontal bands and the four stars represent the four main islands of the archipelago - Mwali, N'gazidja, Nzwani, and Mahore (Mayotte - territorial collectivity of France, but claimed by Comoros). Note: the crescent, stars, and color green are traditional symbols of Islam.

Neighbors

Nearest are Mozambique on W. and Madagascar on E.

Founder of The Nation
Ahmed Abdullah Abderemane

Land boundaries: None

Local divisions

Each of the 3 main islands granted partial-autonomous status. 4 Municipalities: Domoni, Fomboni, Moroni, Mutsamadou.

Government type

Republic – presidential

Legislation chamber

Unicameral - Assembly of the Union

Form of State
Republic with one legislative house. Assembly of the Union, 33 seats, members are elected by popular vote to serve for five-year terms. Head of State is the President. Presidency rotates every four years among the elected presidents from the three main islands of the Union.

Executive branch

President Unicameral Assembly of the Union. The president is both the chief of State and head of Government. The presidency rotates every four-year terms among elected presidents from the three main islands in the Union.

Former Rulers

July 6, 1975 – August 3, 1975 Ahmed Abdallah Abderemane

1975 - January 1976 Said Mohamed Jaffar

1976- 1978 Ali Soilih

May 13, 1978 - May 23,1978 Said Atthoumani

1978 - 1989 Ahmed Abdallah Abderemane

November 26, 1989 - November 27, 1989 Haribon Chebani provisional president

1990 – 1995 Said Mohammed Djohar

1996 - 1998 Mohamed Taki Abdoulkarim

1998 – 1999 Tadjidine Ben Said Massounde interim president

1999 – 2002 Colonel Azali Assoumani

January 21, 2002 - May 26, 2002 Hamada Madi Bolero interim president

2002 – 2006 Azali Assoumani

2006-May 2011 - Ahmed Abdallah Mohamed Sambi

Current Ruler

May 26 2011- to present Ikililou Dhoinine

Judicial chamber
Supreme Court

Capital city

Moroni Altitude 59 mtrs/194 ft

Geographic coordinates 11.42S , 43.14E.

Is the capital of the Comoros Islands. Located on the island of Grand Comore, Comoran meaning for "in the heart of the fire", perhaps alluding to the city's proximity to the active volcanic Mt. Karthala. Arabic settlers founded it possibly the 10th century as the capital of a Sultanate connected commercially to Zanzibar, in present day Tanzania. Since 1958, it has served as national capital.

Names of main towns

Mutsamudu, Fomboni, Domoni, Quani

Date of independence

6 July, 1974.

Religions (Major)

Islam (official).

Main spoken languages

Arabic/French, Comorian, derived from Kiswahili & Arabic widely spoken.

Currency unit

Comorian Franc (KMF) =100 Centimes.

Area in Km2

2,235.00.

Country area comparison in Africa

52 out of 55 states.

Demographic terms:

Average annual population growth rate 2.731 %
Birth rate 34.71 births per 1,000 population

Death rate 7.4 deaths per 1,000 population

Average life expectancy: 63.83 years

Male 61.41 years: Female 66.32 years:

Illiteracy rate (percentage)

Male: 25, Female: 30

Average per capita income

USD 1, 000

Population density (percentage)

371.1/km2

Urban population (percentage)

28

Contributor groups (percentage)

Farming, Fishing: 40, Industry: 4, Social service: 56

Main Export Items

Cloves, Vanilla, Petroleum products, Coffee, Cocoa, Yiang-yiang.

Economy is based on

Perfume, Fishery, Remittances from migrant workers.

Climate

Tropical, Hot & Humid November-May. Cooler and drier May-October.

Extremes:

Lowest point: The Indian coast 0 mtr.

Highest point: Le Karthala 2,360 meters.

Weather of the Capital city (Moroni) Tropical.
Altitude 59 mtrs/194 ft

Hottest Month March 24-31oc.

Coldest Month August 19-27oc.

Driest Month October 88mm average Rf.

Wettest Month January 424mm average Rf.

Measures

Metric system.

Time zone

3 hours ahead of GMT/UTC.

Public holidays

Public and All Muslim holidays.

Ethnic groups

Arabs, Africans and east Indians (Anatole, Cafre, Makoa, Oimatsaha, Sakalava)

Topographic & Environmental concern

The islands are of volcanic origin with active volcano on the Grand-Comore. Environment: soil degradation and erosion results from crop cultivation on slopes without proper terracing: deforestation.

Economic Overview

Industry

Perfume distillation, tourism, and fishing.

Chief crops

Vanilla, copra, cloves, ylang-ylang, perfume-incense, coconuts, bananas, cassava, Ocean-plants, other fruits.

Natural resources

Economically speaking, the Comoros archipelago is young certain volcanoes are still active and no viable deposits of minerals have yet been developed.

Land in use (%)

Arable land: 45

Grassland: 7

Forest woods: 16

Others: 32

Marine:

Coastline: 340 km. Surrounded by Indian Ocean, there are regular services between the islands of the archipelago by small vessels.

Commercial Sea ports:-

Moroni, Mutsamudu

Development prospect:

The Comores' economy continues to lag behind the emerging economies of continental Africa because of the poorly-managed civil service, a slowdown in foreign direct investment in tourism and chronically troubled parastatals and utility companies. Higher agricultural output and some new foreign investment have been reported, but the economic growth picture is not inspiring. Further improvements in growth will depend upon how quickly parastatals and utilities can be reformed and restructured. Comores Telecom will have competition from private firm Twama Telecomonce it launches its activities in late 2011. The government's fiscal management has been weak and donors are waiting for improvements so that the country can reach the completion point of the Heavily Indebted Poor Countries (HIPC) debt relief initiative. The Paris Club agreed to write down some commercial debt in October. The government is lobbying for increased investment from Asian and Middle Eastern trade partners. In October, the Indian government offered a $35m loan for development projects to complement the Indian-backed 18MW power project at Moroni. The government has a memorandum of understanding with Dubai-based HSS for a series of maritime and air transportation projects to widen trade networks. The price of the entire proposed project, which includes an airport, schools, health centers, roads and a geothermal power plant, could reach $2.9bn. The first phase began in May 2011 and is valued at $450m. It entails the construction of four berths and one international terminal at Moroni. The project has further financing and other hurdles to overcome. European partners are most interested in fishing rights off the islands, the latest deal signed between the EU, and the government should lead to more investment in local infrastructure so that boats do not need to transport their catches to neighboring ports. The islands 'fishing and tourism industries were threatened by an uptick in pirate activity in the Indian Ocean in October.

CONGO REPUBLIC

National Flag and Emblem

Locator Map

TEXT HIGHLIGHTS: Diaries updates, key events, brief analysis and relating news articles in timeline

Overview

The first European contact with the country dates from the late 15th century. But it was not until 1880 that an explorer, Pierre de Brazza, concluded the treaties that secured the new territory as a colony for France. In 1910 the Republic of Congo became the administrative centre of the Federation of French Equatorial Africa (AEF). Known later as colony of French Congo in the mid-19th century and established colonial rule in 1905, renamed French Middle (Moyen) Congo with Gabon and then Ubangi-Shari, now Central African Republic and Chad as part of the French Equatorial Africa in 1910 when the French possessions were renamed. In 1946 Middle (Moyen) Congo became French overseas territory and it became an Autonomous part of the French community in 1958 and soon voted to become an Autonomous republic within the French Community as Mr. Joachim Jacques Opango its first native prime minister on the 8th of December, 1958 to 21st of November, 1959. It achieved independence in August 15, 1960. The post -independence experience of civilian government was short-lived. In 1963 a one-party Marxist-Leninist state was introduced. In 1968 there was a military coup. For the next 24 years, there was a succession of military governments – led by Captain Ngouabi (1968-77), Colonel Yhombi-Opango (1977- 80) and Colonel Sassou-Nguesso (1980-92). All 3 military leaders hailed from the sparsely populated north of the country. The military continued to be guided by Marxism-Leninism with the sole legal party, the PCT, as the vanguard.

Following pressure for democratization, Sassou-Nguesso agreed to a National Conference which produced a new multi-party constitution, endorsed in a referendum in 1992. Elections followed, and in the presidential election, Pascal Lissouba of UPADS won with 61.37% of the vote beating his nearest rival Bernard Kolelas of MDCCI. Sassou-Nguesso of the PCT came third in the first round. UPADS and the MCDDI, representing the centre-south and south respectively, also won the majority of seats in both the National Assembly and Senate, leaving the PCT poorly represented. The power shift destabilized the country. Conflict between the Army (the old regime's power base) and militias sponsored by the political parties (PCT, UPADS and MCDDI) broke out. Some 2,000 deaths were reported in the second half of 1993. Despite a peace agreement being brokered between the parties, the militias were not disbanded, with the MCDDI-founded 'Ninja' militia becoming particularly disruptive in the Pool region surrounding the capital, Brazzaville. Full scale civil war broke out one month before the next elections, scheduled for July 1997. It continued for five months causing thousands of deaths, displacing populations and refugees, together with destruction of infrastructure and damage to other key assets. The civil war was finally settled when Angola lent its military support to Sassou-Nguesso. After gaining military supremacy in Brazzaville and Pointe Noire, Sassou-Nguesso returned to power proclaiming himself President. The ousted President Lissouba and Prime Minister Kolelas fled. The planned elections did not take place, the constitution was suspended and a 3-year transitional arrangement was put in place. The militias continued to fight sporadically, displacing some 700,000 Congolese from the south. A fragile peace agreement was reached in November 1999, but notably without the agreement of the Ninja militia, who continued to remain active in the Pool region. The Ninja militia, lead by Pastor Noemi, were accused of human rights violations by international organizations – specifically of killing thousands of unarmed civilians, taking hostages and hijacking trains. In 2007, Pastor Noemi signed a peace agreement that gave him a ministerial position within the government in return for the dissolution of the Ninja militia. The PCT, and Sassou-Nguesso, won elections held in 2002 and 2009.

Headship since independence: Head of State

A Brazaville-Congolese Catholic priest, nationalist leader and politician Abbe Fulbert Youlou elected founder president of the republic during independence, he resigned on the 15th August, 1963, and was succeeded by a string of leaders under Mr. Alphonso Massemba-Debat, a person who replaced him as president, instituted a Marxist-Leninist government and party, committed to a form of socialism in Congo under the "Congolese workers party" that gained strength and in 1968, another coup led by Majour Marien Ngouabi, created "Peoples Republic of Congo" by overthrowing him but kept Congo on a socialist track. Mr. Abbe Fulbert Youlou died on the 6th of May, 1972 in Madrid, Spain.

Major Marien Ngouabi sworn in office for a second five year term in 1975. A four men suicide commando squad assassinated him on the 18th of March 1977, and the Army chief of staff Colonel Joachim Yhombi Opango, assumed presidency on the 4th of April, 1977, but resigned on February, 1978, and was replaced by a party insider called, Dennis Sassou Nguesso, an ex-Army Colonel. After independence, Congo embarked on a quarter century experiment with Marxism, which it abandoned in 1990.

Elections ushered in a democratically elected government in 1992.

Civil wars and militia conflicts have plagued the Republic of Congo, which is sometimes referred to as Congo-Brazzaville. But in 1997 ethnic and political tensions exploded into a full-scale civil war, fuelled in part by the prize of the country's offshore oil wealth, which motivated many of the warlords. The army split along ethnic lines, with most northern officers joining President Denis Sassou Nguesso's side, and most southerners backing the rebels. These were supporters of the former president, Pascal Lissouba, and his prime minister, Bernard Kolelas, who had been deposed by President Sassou Nguesso in 1997.

By the end of 1999 the rebels had lost all their key positions to the government forces, who were backed by Angolan troops. The rebels then agreed to a ceasefire. Remnants of the civil war militias, known as Ninjas, are still active in the southern Pool region. Most of them have yet to disarm and many have turned to banditry.

A Republic in West central Africa.

The Pygmies were the first people to live in the Congo and are a peaceful, nomadic group that hunts and gathers food. The men in the tribe usually grow no higher than 5ft tall. The French arrived in the area in late eighteenth century, known later as colony of French Congo in the mid-19th century and established colonial rule in 1905, renamed it French Middle (Moyen) Congo, with Gabon and then Ubangi-Shari, now Central African Republic and Chad as part of the French Equatorial Africa in 1910 when the French possessions were renamed. In 1946 Middle (Moyen) Congo became French overseas territory and it became an Autonomous part of the French community in 1958 and soon voted to become an Autonomous republic within the French Community as Mr. Joachim Jacques Opango it's first native prime minister on the 8th of December, 1958 to 21st of November, 1959. Congo achieved it's full independence on August, 1960, in later times it was also known as Congo Brazzaville. A renowned Brazaville-Congolese Catholic priest, nationalist leader and politician Abbe Fulbert Youlou elected president of the republic during independence, he resigned on the 15th August, 1963, and was succeeded by a string of leaders under Mr. Alphonso Massemba-Debat, a person who replaced him as president, instituted a Marxist-Leninist government and party, committed to a form of socialism in Congo under the "Congolese workers party" that gained strength and in 1968, another coup led by Major Marien Ngouabi, created "Peoples Republic of Congo" by overthrowing him but kept Congo on a socialist track. Mr. Abbe Fulbert Youlou died on the 6th of May, 1972 in Madrid, Spain. Major Marien Ngouabi sworn in office for a second five year term in 1975. A four men suicide commando squad assassinated him on the 18th of March 1977, and the Army chief of staff Colonel Joachim Yhombi Opango, assumed presidency on the 4th of April, 1977, but resigned on February, 1978, and was replaced by a party insider called, Dennis Sassou Nguesso, an ex-Army Colonel.

In July, 1990 the ruling Congolese Workers Party /CWP/ voted to end the one party system, renounced Marxism-Leninism in 1991 and scheduled the country's first free election for 1992. A civilian in the name of professor Charles Pasqual Lisouba became the country's free elected president, but his predecessor, the former president fought him back. It is to be recalled that, in the mid-1990s elections in Congo were marred by political and social instability, ethnic tensions were intensified in the year 1993, and on-going years, when the opposition rejected the results after legislative elections that were marred by intimidation, which that was developed into violence. A four month /5th June to 15th October, 1997/ inter-streets fights that began between local militias, badly disrupted the economy, devastated Brazaville, the capital, the former president Dennis Sassou Nguesso forcefully overthrown the government of Charles Pasqual Lisouba with the French possible backing to come back in 1997.

Major Conflicts

Civil War

When: 1997 - 2003

Who: Militia men loyal to Pascal Lissouba's Government vs the military led by Dennis Sassou Nguesso

Why: Militiamen loyal to the former government launched a guerilla war against President Sassou-Nguesso who seized power in 1997 with the help of Angolan troops

Outcome: The civil war resulted in more than 10,000 deaths in Brazzaville alone. And though a 2003 peace agreement largely ended up the conflict, but sporadic violence continued, the ex-president Dennis Sassou Nguesso made a political comeback when he was affirmed in March, 2002 and 2009 with almost 90 % of the vote, whereas his political opponents were either barred from the country or withdrew from elections. The post of Prime Minister was abolished in 2009. Elections were held July 12, 2009 and Dennis Sassou-Nguesso was re-elected. A civil war restored former president Dennis Sassou-Nguesso in 1997 with southern-based rebel groups agreeing to a final peace accord in March 2003.

Accession to power of Mr. Dennis Sasou Nguesso - 15th October, 1997 he regained power by violent coup.

Tentative election calendar - Presidential, March.

Congo-Br – Timeline Diaries and related key notes:

1400s - Bakongo, Bateke and Sanga ethnic groups arrive in what is now the Republic of Congo.

1482 - Portuguese navigator Diogo Cao explores the coastal areas.

1880 - French explorer Pierre Savorgnan de Brazza negotiates an agreement with the Bateke to establish a French protectorate over the north bank of the Congo river.

1907 - France restricts the role of concessionaires following widespread outrage at revelations of the brutalities of forced labor.

1910 - Middle Congo (Moyen), as it was known then, becomes a colony of French Equatorial Africa.

1928 - African revolt over renewed forced labor and other abuses carried out in the course of building the Congo-Ocean railway, which resulted in the death of more than 17,000 Africans.

1946 - Congo given a territorial assembly and representation in the French parliament.

1958 - Congolese vote for autonomy within the French Community.

1960 - Congo becomes independent with a Catholic priest in the name of Abbe Fulbert Youlou as founder president.

1963 – Abbe Fulbert Youlou forced to resign following workers' unrest: Alphonse Massamba-Debat becomes president with Pascal Lissouba as prime minister.

1964 - Massamba-Debat sets up the National Revolutionary Movement as the sole party and proclaims a non-capitalist path of economic development.

1968 - Massamba-Debat ousted in a coup led by Army Majour Marien Ngouabi, who continues his predecessor's commitment to socialism but sets up his own party, the Congolese Workers Party (PCT).

1970 – Majour Marien Ngouabi proclaims Congo a Marxist People's Republic with the PCT as the sole legitimate party.

1977 Majour Marien Ngouabi is assassinated by suicide commandoes. Massamba-Debat and the Archbishop of Brazzaville, Emile Cardinal Biayenda, are killed shortly afterwards. Joachim Yhombi -Opango becomes president.

1979 – Joachim Yhombi-Opango hands over the presidency to the PCT, which chooses Colonel Dennis Sassou-Nguesso as his successor.

1981 - Congo signs treaty of friendship and cooperation with the Soviet Union.

1990 - The PCT abandons Marxism-Leninism.

1992 - Voters approve a constitution which establishes a multi -party system. Former Prime minister Pascal Lissouba becomes president in Congo's first democratic election.

1993 - Bloody fighting between government and opposition forces over disputed parliamentary elections.

1994-95 – A Ceasefire between government and opposition established: opposition given government posts.

1997 - Full-scale civil war breaks out: pro-Sassou Nguesso forces, aided by Angolan troops, capture Brazzaville, forcing Pascal Lissouba to flee to Togo.

1999 - Government and rebels sign a peace deal in Zambia providing for a national dialogue, demilitarization of political parties and the re -admission of rebel units into the security forces.

April 2001 - Peace conference ends by adopting a new constitution, paving the way for presidential and parliamentary elections.

September 2001 - Transitional parliament adopts a draft constitution. Some 15,000 militia disarmed in a cash-for-weapons scheme. IMF starts clearing Congo's $4bn debt.

December 2001 - Former president, Pascal Lissouba, convicted in absentia on treason and corruption charges, and sentenced to 30 years' hard labor by the high court in Brazzaville.

January 2002 - About 80% of voters in constitutional referendum approve amendments aimed at consolidating presidential powers.

March 2002 - Dennis Sassou Nguesso wins presidential elections unopposed after his main rivals are barred from the contest.

March 2002 - Intense fighting between government and "Ninja" rebels drives many thousands of civilians from their homes in Pool region. The rebels, loyal to former PM Bernard Kolelas and led by renegade priest Pastor Ntumi, name themselves after the famous Japanese warriors.

June 2002 - Government troops battle Ninja rebels in Brazzaville. About 100 people are killed.

March 2003 - Government signs deals with Ninja rebels aimed at ending fighting in Pool region. Ninja leader Pastor Ntumi agrees to end hostilities and allow the return of the rule of law.

June 2004 - World diamond trade watchdog removes Congo from list of countries recognized as dealing legitimately in diamonds.

April 2005 - Government says a group of army officers, arrested in January over an arms theft, had been planning a coup.

April 30, 2005 The "Ninja rebels" are reportedly active again in Congo's Pool region (north of the capital, Brazzaville). Ninjas fired on a UN convoy on April 25. The attack took place southwest of the capital, outside the Ninjas' stronghold, but in an area where they have hit convoys in the past. There were no casualties but the rebels robbed the convoy. Many of the Ninjas are "former rebels", since they haven't come in from the bush and remained armed. The attacked convoy had representatives from several UN agencies, including UNESCO. The ninjas are turning into bandits, which is common after civil wars, when many of the losers (and some of the winners) prefer to continue taking what they want at gunpoint.

October 21, 2005: Fighting with Ninja rebels has been going on for over a week now. The Ninjas believe the government has not lived up to its promises, and has not provided the Ninjas with the money and other goodies they were promised. The government charges that the Ninjas have dragged their feet in disarming. At least four people have been killed, and dozens wounded, in the fighting. The army used artillery in the fighting, and that could be heard all over the capital.

October 14, 2005: After month's of peace, Ninja rebels, who had taken up residence in the capital, got into a series of firefights with police and soldiers. The violence began when police tried to evict the rebels from buildings they had taken over, illegally, for their own use.

February 3, 2006: The wearing of military uniforms, and carrying of weapons, by civilians or off-duty soldiers, has been banned. The plain green or camouflage shirts and pants have become common apparel since the civil war officially ended in 2003. But young men wearing uniforms believed they were entitled take what they wanted, without paying. Wearing these uniforms made people feel above the law. So the ban is meant to restore order. There has not been a lot of order in the country over the past few years, even though there is, officially, peace.

January 27, 2006: The Pool region is still full of former Ninja rebels who have not disarmed, and have turned to banditry. The government has been unable to pacify the Pool, and as a result of bandit attacks, NGO ai d organizations have been shutting down there operations in the area.

March 31, 2007: The bandits and die hard rebels continue to roam the bush. The peace agreement reached four years ago in the Republic of Congo (Brazzaville) did succeed in ending the civil war. The civil war lasted from 1998-2002, with most of the fighting taking place in the Pool region in the south. The peace agreement (signed in March 2003) was negotiated between the Congo (Brazzaville) government and the CNR (Committee for National Resistance), led by Frederic Bintsangou (aka Pasteur Noemi). The CNR is now a political party, not a guerrilla organization. However, the peace agreement did not completely end the violence. People in the Pool region complain of "insecurity" - meaning they fear physical violence. Many of Pool's "ninjas" (as the rebels called themselves) have not turned in their weapons. The government has touted the success of its disarmament and demobilization program, which was supposed to pay former guerrillas to surrender their guns. The idea was to take automatic weapons "out of circulation." However, it appears that some 40,000 smalls arms have not been turned in. Reports of banditry persist. The CNR had some authority over the insurgency (such as it was) but a lot of the "warfare" in pool involved local gangs who decided to "support the rebellion." The gangs have now returned to crime. But the gangs aren't the biggest problem. The Congo's government says that the Pool region is still suffering from the destruction wrought by the war. Transportation infrastructure is damaged - and the infrastructure in the Pool region was inadequate to begin with. The peace agreement was supposed to be backed by improved medical facilities in the region. The Congo's government acknowledges that Pool's medical facilities remain grossly inadequate. Wars everywhere are expensive, but wars in developing nations tend to utterly beggar the countries.

June 14, 2007: A group of former "ninjas" (Congo-Brazzaville rebel group) performed a "commitment ceremony" in Brazzaville last week. This was intended to demonstrate they are committed to the peace process. The ceremony included burning weapons, including light arms and "ground to air" missiles (man-portable surface to air missiles). One of the ninja leader (Pastor Frederic Noemi) said that the rebel group will become a "constructive opposition" in a political process. Clean-up from the war continues. Though ninja spokesmen deny it, a few former rebels have become thieves and bandits. They are operating in Congo-Brazzaville's "Pool" region - where most of the civil war's fighting took place.

December 22, 2008: All's not quite quiet in the Republic of Congo, but compared to its big Congolese neighbor (Democratic Republic of Congo, or Congo-Kinshasha), it's calm. Charges of corruption in the country's oil industry circulate, and odds are the charges are true. The Pool region suffers from occasional bandit attacks attributed to "hold out" Ninjas. The Ninjas were the main rebel group in the area. Since the 2003 peace agreement, disarming and reintegrating the Ninjas has been the government's chief defense priority. Okay, that's the good news, now the bad. The war damaged Congo's economy which is one reason the biggest news in Republic of Congo is the recent $643 million debt forgiveness package by international lenders. The Ninjas often cut the 320 mile -long railroad between Brazzaville and Pointe Noire. The railroad is running but the small businesses along the railroad have not. The Republic of Congo estimates that 3.1 percent of its population of four million has AIDS. The disease is thus another crushing economic burden. Rapid urbanization is a huge problem for Congo, and medical relief groups argue that urbanization is tied to the AIDS epidemic. Seventy percent of the population lives in Brazzaville or Point Noire or along the rail line.

August 26, 2009: Opposition party objections to the results of Congo Republic's July 2009 elections have renewed worries that new violence could eventually erupt. The Congo's Constitutional Court ruled that the July 12th presidential election was valid, despite a suit filed by five opposition candidates who claimed massive fraud. The Congolese opposition contends that the National Elections Organization Committee (CONEL) is simply a tool of President Dennis Sassou-Nguesso, whose government they allege is thoroughly corrupt.

Dennis Sassou-Nguesso has been officially re-elected (with over 78 percent of the vote) to another seven year term. Sassou-Nguesso is now one of the longest serving chief executives in Africa. He served as president from 1979 to 1992. He seized power in 1997 after heavy fighting broke out in Brazzaville between pro-government forces and forces loyal to him. Sassou-Nguesso received most of his support from tribes located in Congo's north. A truce was declared in 1999, essentially a “north-south” truce. Sassou-Nguesso won the presidential election in 2002 with 89 percent of the vote.

The Congo-Brazzaville government continues to worry about the after effects of the civil war, and is especially watchful of the Pool district which was the center of the “ninja rebellion.” In June the government reported it collected around 900 weapons in Pool: while 2,800 were collected in February 2009. The “ninjas” officially fought as an anti-Sassou-Nguesso militia from 1998 to 2003, ignoring the truce of 1999. The 2003 peace deal was very tentative: reports of “ninja bandit attacks” continued to appear as late as 2007. The government's “disarmament and reintegration” program has proceeded with fits and starts, but several observers thought the weapons announcement just prior to the July elections served several purposes government. The government knows trouble could occur. For example, the capital, Brazzaville, was hit by a brief mortar attack in April. The government also knows money talks. The disarmament program pays well by sub-Saharan African standards: the government claims it will pay about $175 per weapon.

Meanwhile, the opposition parties earlier this year accused the government of buying weapons from China.

Despite significant petroleum reserves, the Republic of Congo remains very poor. A UN study published estimated 16 per-cent of all children under the age of five suffer from severe malnutrition.

Congo Br - Sassou Nguesso's strategy to win in for 2016’

Well ensconced in his presidential office, Congo-Br's Denis Sassou Nguesso hasn't thought for a moment of standing down for the election in 2016 even though the 2002 Constitution bans him from seeking a new term as president. With help from his inner circle, the 70-year-old strongman in Brazzaville is putting the final touches strategy for a third run for the office, as this report from West Africa Newsletter makes abundantly clear. Following his PCT's party crushing victory in legislative elections in August, 2012 - which will make it child's play for Sassou to modify the Constitution - he is free to act as he pleases at home. With generals from the Forces Armees Congolaises (FAC) brought to heel, he has crushed any presidential ambitions among his followers while intimidating his opponents. He now has to burnish his image as a "god father" in the sub-region, so as to curry favour with the international community.

December 23, 2013: After four years of peace, the situation in the Republic of Congo (the smaller one next to the larger Congo that used to be called Zaire) has gotten louder and more violent. On December 16 th a former senior intelligence official (colonel Marcel Ntsourou) and about a hundred people in his compound resisted an army attempt to enter and search the place. Over 40 people, most of them apparently civilians, were killed along with two soldiers. Ntsourou was arrested. President Denis Sassou Nguesso apparently feared that Ntsourou was planning a coup or offering evidence to ICC (International Criminal Court) investigators seeking to indict Sassou for crimes against humanity. Ntsourou apparently felt that Sassou was out to get him for any number of reasons. Coming from Ntsourou such allegations could be very damaging because as a senior intelligence official Ntsourou had insider information about Sassou's notoriously corrupt activities. An earlier French investigation found over a hundred bank accounts for Sassou in France along with extensive property holdings. Sassou has been president since 2002 and the last election in 2009 was declared corrupt by foreign observers.

Ntsourou got into trouble after an ammo depot exploded in the capital last year and Sassou found himself in need of a scapegoat to place the blame on. He picked Ntsourou and prosecuted him for being responsible for the ammo depot being there and not being properly managed. Ntsourou was convicted and given a suspended sentence and released. Whatever deal the government made with Ntsourou apparently did not work because since the conviction last September there have been rumors that Ntsourou was plotting with other disgruntled officers and officials to stage a coup or otherwise cause Sassou some trouble. Apparently Ntsourou was suspected (by Sassou) of dissident views even before the ammo depot disaster last year and that was why Ntsourou was selected as the scapegoat.

It was on March 4th 2012 that ammunition stored at an armored regiment base in Brazzaville, capital of Congo, exploded. The fire was brought under control within 24 hours and before it could spread to ammo stored at another army base 100 meters away. Over 300 people were killed because, as is common in Africa, military units are often based inside major cities, the better to deal with any attempts to overthrow the government. Large quantities of ammunition are often stored on these urban bases, so the troops can handle any contingency. This particular disaster occurred because of faulty electrical wiring causing a fire that was not promptly extinguished. African armies tend to be poorly trained and led, which often expresses itself in sloppy safety procedures and hazardous handling of munitions. Thousands of people were homeless after the explosions and fire and many of them were injured. There was a lot of anger at the disaster and the public unrest was getting worse month after month because the government did nothing. Then it decided to prosecute Ntsourou and that has also gotten out of hand.

Sassou was officially re-elected (with over 78 percent of the vote) in 2009 to another seven year term. Sassou was, at that point one of the longest serving chief executives in Africa. He served as president from 1979 to 1992. He seized power in 1997 after heavy fighting broke out in Brazzaville between pro-government forces and forces loyal to him. Sassou received most of his support from tribes located in the north. A truce was declared in 1999, essentially a "north-south" truce. Sassou won the presidential election in 2002 with 89 percent of the vote. Despite significant petroleum reserves, the Republic of Congo remains very poor. A 2009 UN study estimated 16 percent of all children under the age of five suffered from severe malnutrition. Things like that have not improved since then.

November 5, 2014: AFRICA INTELLIGENCE: Denis Sassou Nguesso, grand master for another seven years. President Denis Sassou Nguesso of Congo republic was confirmed as head of the Grand Lodge of Congo at recent ceremony attended by African rulers past and present in Brazzaville's brand-new freemasonry lodge.

Because of the Congo River depth, Alphabet's Taara connects Brazzaville and Kinshasa using Lasers. Wouldn't a deeply floating fibre-optic cable anchored to the bottom be a better solution, less prone to weather interference.

Related Links

What good things can be said about African leaders?

Did French colonies in Africa ever gain true independence?

As an African, which European country is the best to live, study, and work in?

If you are the president of that country, how will you address the issue of racism and discrimination to break cultural barriers?

There are many parts of cities in the US with concentrations of different ethnic groups like Little Italy and Chinatown, but are there any places like that outside of America like that with Americans?

Are all members of each race and ethnicity more genetically and physically related to each other than they are to members of other races and ethnicities? If they are, then by how much?

Should white racism be the default hypothesis whenever there is a discrepancy in outcomes between whites and blacks?

Does the term “Caucasian” only refer to white people, or does or can it refer to Caucasoids overall?

What is the percentage of arable land in Africa? How could it be more efficient?

What is Cape Town like in 2021?

Which countries in sub-Saharan Africa are less rich in raw materials but populous?

Why do Europeans have accents even though they are considered white people?

How possible is it to have a United States of Africa? Where will be the capital?

Should people over 50 have affirmative action in employment?

Parler la langue des colonisateurs et les prendre comme modèle est t-il l’or de tout les maux de l'Afrique ? Et quel est la bonne décision à prendre pour inverser les choses ?

Stanislas Kowalski Suivre Mentor (teacher trainer) chez New Generation Pedagogical Research Center jeu.

L'origine de tous les maux? Rien que ça ? Imaginons deux secondes ce que ça donnerait de passer à une langue locale. Allez-vous enseigner la médecine en wolof? Allez-vous étudier l'ingénierie en swahili ? Avec quels manuels? Et pour la littérature, quel dialecte allez-vous choisir? Celui qui a le meilleur système d'écriture ?

Soyons sérieux deux secondes. Les langues coloniales sont plutôt une opportunité. D'ailleurs n'importe quelle langue étrangère adossée à une grande culture est une opportunité pour celui qui l'apprend. Les Européens ne sont pas devenus puissants en refusant d'apprendre des langues étrangères, mais en échangeant des idées.

Quant à l'avenir des cultures africaines, c'est aux Africains qu'il revient de les faire vivre. Ce sont eux, et personne d'autre, qui pourront créer la littérature qui leur manque pour faire vivre leur langue.

Ici, au Cambodge, la situation est un peu différente, mais je ne cesse d'encourager mes élèves à lire en anglais et à écrire en khmer. Un modèle n'est jamais que ce que l'on en fait. Suivre Stanislas Kowalski

Questions similaires

Que pensez-vous de la théorie de Cheikh Anta Diop selon laquelle "la civilisation égyptienne serait une civilisation « nègre » et constituerait le berceau des cultures africaines subsahariennes" ?

Pourquoi la Grèce antique est-elle le début de la civilisation occidentale au lieu de l'Afrique ancienne ?

Il est avéré que le pharaon Montouhotep 2 était noir. Comment peut-on encore nier l'apport de la civilisation noire sur l'Égypte antique ?

L'incapacité du monde à dire que l'Égypte ancienne était une civilisation noire est-elle le plus grand exemple de vol culturel de l'histoire du monde ?

Comment peut-on expliquer le formidable alignement, entre la pyramide de Gizeh, l’Ile de Paques, Nazca, Angkor et bien d’autres ?

Pourquoi les égyptologues européens nient jusqu'à présent le caractère africain des égyptiens antiques, alors que les preuves en sont surabondantes ?

L'Afrique a tant donné au monde comme par exemple la connaissance aux savant grecs, pour ne pas citer autre chose. Pourquoi dit-on que l'Afrique n'est pas encore entrée dans l'Histoire ?

L'Afrique est-elle pauvre à cause de la colonisation ? Si la colonisation n'avait jamais eu lieu, comment se présenterait l'Afrique ?

Pourquoi la civilisation égyptienne nous a-t-elle laissée autant d'éléments : bâtiments, poteries, arts, outils alors que la civilisation grecque moins ancienne ne semble n'avoir légué qu'un bâtiment ou deux et tout un tas de statues sans bras ?

Pourquoi l'Afrique n'a-t-elle pas réussi à développer une civilisation sophistiquée, capable de rivaliser avec les civilisations asiatiques et européennes ?

Comment expliquer à un enfant de 10 ans la construction des pyramides d'Égypte et la présence de ce type de constructions sur divers continents, dans diverses civilisations ne s'étant jamais rencontrées, comme au Pérou ?

En dehors de l'Égypte y a-t-il une autre civilisation qui était toute aussi développée qu'elle à la même époque ?

Quels sont les pays d'Afrique les plus riches, et quelle est la source principale de leur fortune ?

La colonisation a-t-elle eu également des effets positifs sur l'Afrique ?

Les seules civilisations anciennes avancées d'Afrique se trouvaient en Afrique du Nord, alors qu'il n'y en a eu pratiquement aucune en Afrique subsaharienne. À cause de ça, je commence à détester être noir. Est-ce que c'est m

Quels dirigeants ou communautés tribales africaines spécifiques ont vendu des esclaves à des étrangers ? Connaissons-nous les souverains ou les sociétés qui se sont engagés dans cette partie du commerce d'esclaves ? Question traduite.

(Which specific African rulers or tribal communities engaged in selling slaves to foreign parties? Do we know which particular rulers or societies engaged in this part of the slave trade?)

Andréa Mathias Lieu : Paris, France Traducteur · 19 déc.

Kevin Richardson PhD en History, The University of Texas at Austin

Cette réponse peut ne pas être une traduction fidèle de la réponse de Kevin Richardson dans Quora en anglais :

Les africanistes évitent d'utiliser le terme de tribu. Ainsi, pour le reste de cette réponse, je parlerai plutôt de sociétés/communautés particulières, ou comme des royaumes ou chefferies, selon le cas.

En résumé, nous avons une assez bonne idée du nombre et des régions d'où sont partis les Africains réduits en esclavage. Les enregistrements historiques des noms des esclaves donnent également des indices sur la communauté à laquelle appartenait cette personne. La base de données sur la traite transatlantique des esclaves est une bonne ressource à cet égard. Elle contient des cartes représentant les ports et les régions avec le nombre général d'esclaves embarqués. Elle contient également une base de données sur les traversées de navires, avec la date, le port de départ et d'arrivée, et le nombre de personnes transportées. Elle contient également une base de données sur les individus africains nommés, leur port de départ, et parfois des notes sur leur origine ethnique.

Il y a également une grande quantité de littérature secondaire sur le sujet. Le livre de Gwendolyn Midlo Halls Slavery and African Ethnicities in the New World : restoring the links (L'esclavage et les ethnies africaines dans le Nouveau Monde : rétablir les liens) s'attache à identifier les moments où un grand nombre d'Africains d'une même communauté sont arrivés dans la même région du Nouveau Monde. Par exemple, beaucoup de Coromantis sont arrivés en Jamaïque, beaucoup de Yorubas à Bahia, au Brésil, beaucoup de Kongos en Caroline du Sud. Elle s'appuie également sur les registres des navires, les publicités et les actes de vente qui détaillent l'ethnicité, ainsi que sur les biographies d'esclaves, assez rares, où les individus disent eux-mêmes quelle était leur ethnicité.

Loin de son origine ouest-africaine, il est certain que la culture traditionnelle yoruba est bien vivante et qu'elle dicte ouvertement les mouvements de la samba dans ce coin du nord-est du Brésil.

Il y a aussi les travaux de John Thornton et de Linda Heywood sur les diasporas d'Afrique centrale en Amérique, par exemple les Kongos, les Mbundas, les Ovimbundas, les Vili, les Tekés, les Imbangalas, qui sont arrivés au Brésil, dans les Caraïbes et en Amérique du Nord. Je pense en particulier à Africa and Africans de Thornton, Central Africans de Heywood et Cultural Transformations in the Diaspora, ainsi qu'au chapitre de Thornton et Heywood dans Soundings in Atlantic History édité par Bayly.

Il existe également des recueils de documents de source primaire comme Africa and the West : A documentary history qui contient des lettres individuelles d'officiers de navires européens, de monarques africains, d'esclaves émancipés, etc., avec des détails tels que la société/le royaume et le monarque qui effectuaient les raids, et le port d'où ils embarquaient.

Les esclaves étaient-ils plus nombreux que les autres et cela a-t-il augmenté ou diminué au fil des siècles, y compris jusqu'à la période de la Révolution américaine et les périodes ultérieures d'abolition ?
Oui, comme vous le supposez, la traite des esclaves ne fut pas uniforme, mais a connu une croissance progressive de 1500 à 1700 (environ 340 000 embarqués de 1500 à 1600 pui 1,8 million embarqués de 1600 à 1700). Elle a connu une croissance massive entre 1700 et 1800 (environ 6,5 millions) et un déclin entre 1800 et 1900 (environ 4 millions), le déclin le plus brutal s'étant produit entre 1830 et 1860. Tous les chiffres sont tirés de Transformations in Slavery de Paul Lovejoy.

Et comme vous le supposez à juste titre, les acteurs qui étaient importants au début, comme les Alladas en 1600 ou les Loangos en 1700, furent supplantés plus tard par des concurrents plus puissants comme le Dahomey, l'empire Ashanti, Oyo, Kongo. Et parfois, des sociétés qui n'avaient pas participé à la traite des esclaves s'y sont engagées par la suite, comme les Ovimbundus dans les années 1750-1880.

Questions similaires

Qui croire entre les historiens qui disent que les esclaves ont été achetés à des Noirs en Afrique ou les historiens noirs qui disent que ces Noirs ont été placés là par les colonisateurs pour vendre des esclaves ?

Quels sont les meilleurs exemples de pays ayant vendu des armes à d'autres pays et dont les armes en question se sont retournées contre le pays vendeur ?

Quelles sont les batailles de l'histoire qui ont eu des résultats ridicules ou comiques ?

Quelles étaient les différences entre les esclaves de l’époque de l’antiquité romaine ou égyptienne, par rapport aux esclaves africains en Amérique ?

Pourquoi est-ce que ces premiers ne sont pas toujours considérés comme de véritables esclaves ?

Pourquoi les Africains ont-ils adopté la religion de ceux qui les ont réduits en esclavage (Islam, Christianisme) ?

Est-il vrai que les plus grands esclavagistes furent les arabes ? (Esclavagisation d'européens, d'africains sub-sahariens…)

Dans un débat portant sur l'esclavage des noirs : Que dire/penser de l'argument selon lequel certains noirs « aussi » participaient à la traite des noirs pendant la période esclavagiste ?

Pourquoi les marchands d'esclaves vers les US transportaient-ils par force des africain/es plutôt que de forcer les indiens en esclavage ?

Que faisaient les marchands d'esclaves s'ils mettaient leurs esclaves enceintes ?

Au lieu de blâmer les Occidentaux, pourquoi ne nous acharnions pas sur les rois de royaumes africains d'avoir accepté de vendre leurs propres citoyens en tant qu'esclaves pour tout simplement s'enrichir ?

Pourquoi les Africains ont-ils aidé à vendre d'autres Africains pour l'esclavage ?

Pendant les pestes historiques, comment les gens ont-ils fait face ? Ont-ils fait des blagues morbides, se sont-ils tournés vers la boisson, le désespoir, la religion ou ont-ils trouvé une communauté spécifique à blâmer ? (Question traduite)

Pourquoi les Espagnols ou les Britanniques n'ont-ils pas utilisé des esclaves européens ou leurs compatriotes au lieu d'aller jusqu'en Afrique ?

L'abolition de l'esclavage a-t-elle été provoquée parce que les dirigeants étaient des humanistes sincères ou bien comme d'habitude c'était par calcul politique et électoraliste?

Quel serait le prix d'une esclave romaine aujourd'hui ?

Wake Up Africa!

Why hasn't the Congo River been used to generate hydroelectric power, since a successful dam would reportedly generate enough power for all of Africa?

Alton Allen Knowledgeable In African and African Diaspora History: Mon

I think there are plans to do just that, however there's considerable push back from environmentalists.

RECOGNISING that legal, socially beneficial and responsibly operated activities such as the construction of large infrastructure can nonetheless cause, or are likely to cause, severe and either widespread or long-term damage to the environment;

ALARMED that development could be detrimental to the Lower Congo's rich freshwater biodiversity, displace ca. 6,300 people (International Rivers, 2014) and disturb the ecology of the marine Congo canyon; and

CONCERNED that the development plans for the Congo could bypass procedures to ensure that projects are awarded transparently and via competitive bidding (CORAP, 2021);

134 - Protecting the Lower Congo River from large hydro-electric dam developments

Related Links

What is the Euro-centric view that Africa's past was "nothing but the unrewarding gyrations of barbarous tribes"?
Is Egypt part of the Great Sahara Desert?
Do you know any urban legends or horror stories from your country or city?
Is Africa too poor to install renewable energy facilities?
Are African countries moving towards renewable energy?

Has history vindicated a former leader of your country who was previously ridiculed for his or her ideas/policies at the time? What is the story?

Is your country doing enough to achieve carbon neutrality?

Why is it so hard for an African child like myself to make legit money online?
Why is itSo hard to even get help?

Do we have more poor people in Africa than in other continents?
Why are people attacking Mummy G O in Nigeria?
How bad is it in Nigeria?

Without colonialism forcing several independent Afriqan nations (distinct "nation-states", tribes, clans or Kingdoms) together into today's countries, how many upon the whole continent will there be? Which the most powerful? Is there a map of this?

If you think that Native African people should identify as black people, can you explain to me why?

What is the richest cultural heritage in Africa?
What are three major differences of the Northern African culture from the Asian culture?

CPJ-Republic of Congo Newspaper Sel-Pimet suspended for 6 months director detained for 7 days.

Dakar, March 21, 2022 — Authorities in the Republic of Congo should lift Sel-Piment's suspension immediately and refrain from detaining journalists for their work, the Committee to Protect Journalists said Monday.

On December 30, 2021, police arrested Augias Ray Malonga, acting director of the privately owned newspaper Sel-Piment, at his home in Brazzaville, the capital, according to Malonga and Edouard Atzotsa, the secretary-general of the Trade Union Federation of Communication Workers of Congo-Brazzaville (FESYTRAC), both of whom spoke to CPJ via messaging app.

Authorities held Malonga for seven days and then released him without charge, he told CPJ.

On January 20, 2022, the country's state-run media regulator, the Superior Council for Freedom of Communication (CSLC), suspended Sel-Piment for six months over its republication of an article from a website run by government critics in exile, according to Malonga and news reports.

"Authorities in the Republic of Congo should immediately lift the suspension of Sel-Piment and refrain from arresting journalists for their work," said Angela Quintal, CPJ's Africa program coordinator, in New York. "Journalists should be free to re-publish and report on issues of public interest without fearing that they may be detained or face sanction."

On December 30, Malonga received a summons to appear the following day at the Brazzaville headquarters of the DGST, the country's domestic security agency, he told CPJ; police then arrested him before he had a chance to comply.

The arrest was sparked by the paper's December 27 republication of a report on alleged corruption by the country's treasurer originally published by Congo-Liberty.com, a website run outside of the country that advocates for political change in the Republic of Congo, as well as another article also published in the December 27 edition criticizing management of the country's economy, Malonga said.

During his detention, DGST head Phillipe Obara questioned Malonga about the source of the Congo-Liberty.com report and said that authorities did not appreciate that he was in contact with critics outside the country. Malonga told CPJ that he refused to answer questions about that report.

CPJ emailed the DGST for comment, but did not receive any reply.

Malonga was released on January 6, 2022, after CSLC President Philippe Mvouo intervened in his case, Malonga told CPJ. He said authorities did not tell him the exact reason for his release. CPJ emailed Mvouo and contacted him via messaging app for comment, but did not receive any response.

Atzotsa told CPJ that Malonga "was released under pressure from many press organizations" including the journalists' union.

According to those news reports, the CSLC alleged that the republished article defamed the country's treasurer, and therefore the newspaper would be suspended. CPJ sent questions to the Republic of Congo's Ministry of Finances, Budget, and Public Portfolio for comment via email and through a contact form on its website, but received no response.

Sel-Piment is a satirical weekly newspaper known for its criticism of President Denis Sassou Nguesso and the ruling Congolese Party of Labor, according to news reports. Authorities previously suspended Sel-Piment in 2013 and 2021, and repeatedly arrested its editor, Malonga's father Raymond Malonga.

Malonga became interim director of the newspaper after his father's arrest in February 2021, he told CPJ.

COUNTRY FACT FILE

Location

In west central Africa

Official title of the state

Republique du Congo (national)

Republic of The Congo (English): also referred to as Congo-Brazzaville: is a country located in west Central Africa.

Flag description:

Divided diagonally from the lower hoist side by a yellow band: the upper triangle (hoist side) is green and the lower triangle is red: green symbolizes agriculture and forests, yellow the friendship and nobility of the people, red is unexplained but has been associated with the struggle for independence. Note: uses the popular Pan-African tri-colors of Ethiopia.

Neighbours

Gabon, Cameroon on W. Central Africa Republic on N, The Congo on E, Angola (Cabinda) on SW. Land boundaries: total 5,504 km. Border countries: Angola 201 km, Cameroon 523 km, Central African Republic 467 km, The Congo 2,410 km, Gabone 1,903 km.

Founder of The Nation
Monsier Joachim Jacques Opango

Local division

10 regions, 1 capital district Brazzaville

Government type

Republic – presidential

Legislation chamber

Bicameral Parliament

Form of State

Republic-semi-presidential

A republic with two legislative bodies. The Senate 72 seats, the National Assembly 137 seats, members are elected by popular vote to serve for five-year terms. President is both Chief of State and Head of Government. President is elected for a seven- year term and is eligible for a second term

Executive branch

President, Cabinet: Council of Ministers appointed by the President. The president is both the chief of State and head of Government, following the devastating civil war in which he toppled previously elected rival ex-president Charles Pascal Lisouba. The President elected by popular vote to serve for seven-year terms without presidential term limits.

Former rulers
Abe Fulbert Youlou (born 1917–1972)
August 15 1960 – August 15, 1963

Alphonse Massemba-Débat (born 1921–1977)
August 15,1963 – August 4, 1968 (in Poignet)

Alfred Raoul (born 1938 to 1999)
1968 to 1969

Army Major-Marien Ngouabi (born 1938)
1969 to 1977

CONGO Under Military Committee of the ICT
Chairman: Jacques Joachim Yhombi-Opango (1939 to 2020)
1977 to 1979

CONGO Under Presidium of the CC of the ICT
Chairman: Jean-Pierre Thystere Tchicaya (1936 to 2008)
February 5, 1979 – February 7, 1979

Colonel Dennis Sassou-Nguesso (born 1943) 1979 - 1992
Charles Pascal Lissouba (1931–2020) 1992 - 1997
Dennis Sassou-Nguesso (born 1943) – Present Present (he came back to office after severe internal conflict in 1997.)

Judicial chamber
Supreme Court

Capital city
Brazzaville Altitude 318 mtrs/1043 ft

Geographic coordinates 4.15S , 15.17E. The capital and a major port of the Republic of the Congo at the lowest navigable point on the Congo (Zaire) river. It was founded in September, 1880, on the site of a Bateke village, named previously Nkuna by a Franco-Italian explorer namely, "Pierre Savorgnan de Brazza", after whom the city was named. Located on the Congo river together with the populous city of Kinshasa, capital of the Congo, on opposite banks of a river, within sight of each other, some times called Congo-Brazaville (of Congo), as opposed usually to Congo-Kinshasa (of the Congo). While Brazaville (of Congo) lies to the north of Congo river, Kinshasa (of the Congo) lies to the south of the Congo river.

Names of main towns

Pointe-noire, Loubomo, Nkayi

Date of independence

15 August, 1960.

Religions (Major)

Christian 50%, Traditionalists 48%, Muslim 2%.

Main spoken languages

French (official), Dioula, the most widely spoken.

Currency unit

African Franc (CFA)=100 Centimes.

Area in Km2

342,000,00

Country area comparison in Africa

27 out of 55 states.

Demographic terms:

Average annual population growth rate 2.807 %

Birth rate 41.01 births per 1,000 population Death rate 11.75 deaths per 1,000 population Average life expectancy: 54.54 years

Male 53.27 years: Female 55.84 years:

Illiteracy rate (%)

Male: 13, Female: 27

Average per capita income

USD 4, 100

Population density

11.7/km2

Urban population (%)

62

Contributor groups

Farming, Fishing: 5, Industry: 63, Social service: 32

Main Export Items

Crude-oil, Timber, Plywood, Sugar, Cocoa, Coffee, Diamonds, Fertilizer, Ore, Zinc, Potash.

Economy is based on

Mainly Agriculture. Petroleum and mining are the main export activities in the Congo, with forestry and commercial agriculture also playing a major role in the economy. The country is still struggling with poverty.

Climate

Tropical: Humid and Equatorial in North.

Extremes:

Lowest point: The Atlantic coast 0 mtr.

Highest point: Mt. Berengou 903 mtr.

Weather of the Capital city (Brazzaville) average annual temperature 24.8°c.

Altitude 318 mtrs/1043 ft

Hottest Month April 22-23oc.
Coldest Month July 17-28oc.
Driest Month July 1mm average Rf.
Wettest Month November 292mm average Rf.

Measures

Metric system.

Time zone

1 hour ahead of GMT/UTC

Public holidays

1st January, May 1 (labor day), June 22, August 13-15, November 1, December 31, All Roman Catholic holidays.

Ethnic groups

Ba-kongo 48%, Ba-Sangha 20%, Ba-Teke 17%, M'bochi 12%, others 3%.

Topographic & Environmental concern

Much of Congo is covered by thick forests. A coastal plain leads to the fertile Niari valley the centre in a plateau the Congo River basin consists of flood plain in the lower and savannah in the upper portion. Environmental: air pollution from vehicle emissions: water pollution from the dumping of raw sewage: tap water is not potable: deforestation.

Economy Overview

Industry

Petrol-extraction, cement, lumbering, breweries, sugar, palm-oil, agro-processing.

Chief crops

Palm-oil, cassava, palm-kernels, sugarcane, rice, cocoa, coffee, tobacco, vegetables, forest-products.

Natural resources

Petroleum, Timber, Potash, Natural gas, Lead, Copper, Zinc, Magnesium, Uranium, Hydro-power.

Land in use (%)

Arable land: NA

Grassland: 29

Forest woods: 62

Other: 9

Marine:

Coastline: 169 km.

Commercial Sea port:-

Pointe-Noire

Development prospect:

The country's IMF extended credit facility remains on track, and the Republic of Congo has reached the completion point of the Heavily Indebted Poor Countries (HIPC) debt-relief initiative. The government's position will continue to be steadily reinforced by strong world oil prices. It plans to use oil revenues to build and improve infrastructure. The country has run a power deficit for decades but new power projects are getting off the ground. China National Machinery & Equipment Import & Export Corporation completed the 120MW Imboulou power plant in May, and the government shortlisted three Chinese contractors for the 19MW Liouessodam in September. Government planners also predict that construction work on four special economic zones will begin in 2012. Oil remains the most important single sector, but several mining projects are set to diversify export revenue. Australia's Sundance Resources and its Chinese partners are developing the Nabemba iron-ore mine that should begin production in 2014 while Xstrata expects to export 45m tn of iron ore per year starting in 2016 from its project at Zanaga. Despite donor worries that oil production will peak in 2012, oil companies are still formulating expensive investment plans. France's Total says that it would need about $10bn to develop the Moho Bilondo Nord prospect within the next five years: meanwhile Italy's Eni began a pilot project in late 2011 on its oil sands permits that are estimated to contain up to 2.5bn barrels of oil.

Is the genocide of the Congolese by Leopold II comparable to the genocide of the Jews by Hitler?

Michel Verheughe

Location: I have lived in Belgium, Spain and Norway. (1948 – today) 1 year

I totally agree with Laurent Richard . However, I would like to add that still in the 1950s, we learned in Belgian schools that Leopold II and the Belgians had gone to the Congo to protect the natives from the slave trade by the Arabs.

That said, there was never any idea of genocide from the Belgians. Indeed, they needed Africans far too much to work in the plantations and in the mines.

We wondered why AIDS appeared in Central Africa. Well, before the arrival of the Europeans, prostitution did not exist in these small villages in the bush. But when we arrived, by forcing hundreds of men to work in the mines, we created prostitution and venereal diseases.

Finally: Do you like Belgian chocolate? But Belgium does not grow cocoa! Wouldn't it then be time to start buying Congolese chocolate? Oh but where to find it? And what about Belgian chocolate factories that will find themselves unemployed? … like what if colonization has ended since 1960, we continue to exploit them.

Here is my dad, military aviator (2nd from left) in Congo, in 1954:

Similar questions

Why did Hitler respect the neutrality of Switzerland but not that of Belgium?

Why did Adolf Hitler hate Jews?

Were there genocides that no one ever cared about?

After eliminating the Jews, who was next on Hitler's extermination list?

Was Hitler of Jewish descent? I heard his grandfather was.

Why did the Nazis hate the Jews so much, to the point of genociding them?

Did genocides take place before 1900?

Did Hitler ever spare a Jew?

Why isn't King Leopold II as reviled as Stalin and Hitler?

If Vladimir Putin's goal is to commit genocide in Ukraine, shouldn't NATO

DR Congo

Ziaddinè Chahoudi
Studied at Shia Islam5y

One of the richest countries in the world in term of natural resources, the large chunk of resources make DR Congo to become one of the most-wealthy resource countries in Africa. In fact, resources like coals to irons can be found exclusively everywhere in DR Congo.

But what happened? The country went to a dictatorship of Mobutu and Mobutu ruined DR Congo from within and out. Aftermath the legacies of DR Congo was a war and now the country is still torn between war factions.

The situation of DR Congo was extremely disastrous, even now it is better a bit but there are little improvements as corruption is permanent all across DR Congo.

Since the country is torn by war and poverty, it has become an unwanted inspiration for Latin Americans to speak insult to other countries they despise with the word adding "Congo". And this product of Congo is a bunch of mockery using Congo as a symbol of poverty, mostly in Latin America when they hate someone (MexiCongo, ArgenCongo, Congolombia, etc.). All because of the Congo War.

Unless DR Congo regains and restores their nation, it will remain uncertain to invest and develop in such a rich-resource yet undeveloped nation.

© LES ÉDITIONS DU JAGUAR

ENERGY

- Coal
- Uranium
- Methane
- Oil
- Oil exploration
- Oil pipeline
- Oil refinery
- Hydroelectric plant
- Inga-Katanga high-voltage cable

MINES

- Copper and cobalt
- Gold
- Diamonds
- Cassiterite and coltan
- Niobium
- Manganese
- Zinc

INDUSTRY

- Cotton ginning
- Agribusiness
- Oil mill (palm oil)
- Chemicals
- Timber
- Leather, textiles
- Plastic
- Mechanical
- Cement works
- Construction materials
- Metallurgy

COMMUNICATIONS

- Railway
- Navigable waterways
- International Airport
- Commercial port

DEMOCRATIC REPUBLIC OF CONGO AT A GLANCE

Area
2.35 million km²

Population
70 million

Urban population
35%

Independence Day
30 June

Capital
Kinshasa

Population growth rate
3.6% per year

GDP growth rate
8.9% (2014)

CONGO

National Flag and Emblem

Locator Map

TEXT HIGHLIGHTS: Diaries updates, key events, brief analysis and relating news articles in timeline

OVERVIEW & DIARY REFRESHES

Democratic Republic of the Congo (formerly known as Congo Leopoldville, Congo Kinshasa, and Zaire): A vast country with immense economic resources at the heart of Africa, Democratic Republic of Congo (DR Congo) has been at the centre of what could be termed Africa's world war.

Formerly it was Belgian colony of "Congo Leopoldville".

The Congo is located at the heart of Africa with a narrow strip of land along the Congo river estuary leading to the Atlantic ocean in the west. The Congo is vast, fertile, diverse and mineral rich is also Africa's second largest country (2.3 million sq km) with over 200 ethnic groups. With just over 70 million people, the Congo has the second largest Christian population in Africa with lots of natural resources.

Prior to European colonization, several native kingdoms had emerged in the Congo. The Congo free state was established in 1885 with Leopold II of Belgium as absolute monarch, it became the Belgian colony of middle Congo in 1908. The Congo is strategically placed region at the centre of Africa, and because of it's various mineral resources and it's size. DRC (formerly Zaire) gained independence from Belgium in 30th June, 1960. Following a period of political instability, General Mobutu, the Chief of the Army, came to power in an army coup in 1965 and remained largely unchallenged throughout the 1970s and 1980s. President Mobutu presided over endemic corruption and reputedly built up a large personal fortune. Moves towards democratisation in the early 1990s did not succeed in removing him from power. It's early years were marred by political and social instability, but an already-fragile state was further weakened by the aftermath of the Rwandan genocide of 1994, when in October 1996 dissident groups, led by Laurent Kabila and strongly supported by Rwanda and Uganda, rose in revolt. They entered Kinshasa on 17 May 1997. Laurent Kabila declared himself President. Mobutu fled to Morocco where he subsequently lived. Internal and external dissatisfaction with the new President grew until late summer 1998, when a new rebel group announced itself, again backed by Rwanda and Uganda, and a second conflict broke out. SADC states led by Zimbabwe and Angola intervened on the side of the Kabila Government. By mid-1999 front-lines had stabilised, with 3 belligerent groups respectively controlling a third of the country, each backed by different regional states. A cease-fire was signed in Lusaka in August 1999. The United Nations Security Council established a peacekeeping force known as MONUC to facilitate the implementation of the Lusaka Accord. It has a budget exceeding US$1 billion and is now over 17,000 strong making it the largest current UN peacekeeping mission. In January 2001 President Kabila was assassinated by one of his bodyguards. His son, Joseph Kabila, took over as the new head of State on 26 January 2001 and proved more amenable to negotiations. Foreign forces gradually departed, and a protracted Inter-Congolese Dialogue led to an agreement between the belligerents and members of the political opposition on the formation of a transitional national government (TNG). This was agreed by the parties on 2 April 2003 in Sun City (South Africa). The TNG was promulgated on 30 June 2003, formally ending a war that had cost an estimated four million lives. The Transitional National Government (TNG) was made up of three major belligerent groups, a number of smaller ex-rebel movements, civil society and political opposition representatives. The TNG had a '1 + 4' leadership, with a President (Joseph Kabila Kabange) and Vice Presidents (Jean-Pierre Bemba, Azarias Ruberwa, Arthur Z'Ahidi Ngoma and Yerodia Abdoulaye Ndombasi). The TNG was.

hindered by continuing violence in the east of the country, massive humanitarian needs, widespread corruption and periods of high tension between former belligerent groups who were making up the government. In 2006 Joseph Kabila Kabange Jr. was elected President in DRC’s first elections for over 40 years.

Mr. Patrice Lumumba, was a trade unionist, a Congolese independence leader and nationalist figure, before founding the Congolese National Movement (MNC), the first nationwide political party in 1958, Mr. Patrice Emery Lumumba imprisoned for embezzlement by the Belgian colonial masters. When Lumumba was finally released from prison, and pre-independence political negotiations with Belgian masters underway, then he was asked to form the first independent Congolese government. A courage and steadfastness as a nationalist figure, earned him active in the movement for independence while teaching in schools and working for the colonial administration.

On 30th June, 1960 Congo Leopoldville gained independence as Patrice Emery Lumumba, then 37 years old it's Prime Minister. He appointed Joseph Desire Mobutu his personal secretary, a position that was made official in July, 1960 after Lumumba became PM. Not long after that Mobutu was appointed army chief of staff with the rank of Colonel.

Patrice Lumumba led a poor Congo, where nearly half the population was undernourished. He had high hopes for enacting the agrarian reform necessary to feed his people, and that was just the beginning of his ambitious plans. Then, just three months into his term, Lumumba was deposed, in a move orchestrated by a cadre of great powers: the U.S. via the CIA, which had planned to poison his toothpaste on orders from President Eisenhower; England with the connivance of MI6; and Belgium, the Congo's former landlord.

Headship since independence; Instrumental self-administered government

Within months of becoming prime minister, the chaotic "Congolese internal political crises" occurs following Lumumba's assassination and the power struggle between the country was torn by three political groups known to be between the conservative head of state Joseph Casavubu, the successor prime minister Antoine Gizenga, and the secessionist regional prime minister Moise Tshombe Kapenda who had been backed by outsiders claiming legal power over the country in an immediatly announced secession of Katanga, a region which provides an estimated 60 of the Congo's national income came from the mines in Katanga (Shaba), on the 11th of July, 1960 especially with support from the Belgians and the United States, when the same time Belgian troops were arrived in Katanga to sustain it's secession, but this did little to prevent the mutiny from spreading to Elisabethville, capital of the mineral-rich

Katanga (Shaba) province. The secessionist Moise Tshombe, arch political rival of Patrice Lumumba declares Katanga (now Shaba) an independent region from the rest of the Congo. This move was said to be backed by Belgium and the US. Belgium colonial policies engaged with cares only for natural resources exploitation and save no thought to good governance in the Congo as many Congolese citizens were still hope for some semblance of order to be returned to the streets once again.

After Lumumba helped win the country's independence from Belgium on 30th of June, 1960, soon became legitimately premier of the "Republic of Congo Leopoldville", a position which he holds through an election that was held a week before the national independence day, his close rival Mr. Joseph Kasavubu becomes president of the Congo's national assembly, and soon to assume office as president of Congo Leopoldville at independence in June, 1960, with an endorsement of the premier.

The Shaba formerly Katanga chaotic crisis
When: 1961

Who: Katanga (now Shaba) secession bid under Moise Tshombe

Why: Power crisis in Kinshasa and involvement of Belgium, the USA, and other western powers.

Outcome: The capture and execution of Prime minister Patrice Emery Lumumba by the state security of the Congo.

Army Sergeant Joseph Desire Mobutu’s Coup
When: 1965

Who : Coup d’etat

Why: to resolve power crisis of the Congo government

Outcome: Mobutu took power and becomes Colonel Joseph Desire Mobutu.

In the wings was Colonel Joseph Desire Mobutu who would soon assume full control of the nation, renamed himself “Mobutu Setse Seko Kuku Ngbendu wa Bazanga” and rule Congo (renamed Zaire) further for thirty two years.

The founding father of independent Congo, Patrice Emery Lumumba was killed on 17th January, 1961, hardly 7 months after coming into office in assassination operation backed by Belgium and tacitly supported by the USA.

Mobutu Sese Seko proclaimed himself “Father of the Nation” of Zaire (now The Democratic Republic of the Congo), and became dictator for life. He declared, “In our African tradition there are never two chiefs….That is why we Congolese, in the desire to conform to the traditions of our continent, have resolved to group all the energies of the citizens of our country under the banner of a single national party.” Mobutuism consisted of the delusional thoughts of Mobutu and his program of “Zairianization”. He promoted a cult of personality describing himself as “the all-powerful warrior who, because of his endurance and inflexible will to win, will go from conquest to conquest leaving fire in his wake”. Mobutu built the Inga Dams over the Congo River hoping to create the largest hydroelectric facility in the world. He left a legacy of kleptocracy and inherited the wind of dictatorship.

Background: he was born in Lisala, in Congo’s northern Equateur province on 14th October, 1930. His name locally meaning “Soil” or “Sand”, a reference to his mother’s social and economic status at the time. They were said to be dirt poors. Although, he was christened Joseph Desire, in 1972 he acquired the nom de-guere Se-se-Seko Ngbendu wa Zabanga, literally translated as “hot pepper”, “green” and “it stings. Kuku Ngbendu wa Zagamba is a Ngbendu proverb whose translation could mean: “Even if it is not ripe, hot pepper stings”. Joseph Desire Mobutu was all but 19 years old when he donned the uniform of the “Force Publique”, the national army. After successfully completing his studies, Mobutu was first sent to the army headquarters in then Leopoldville, the capital (now Kinshasa) where he was assigned to the provincial secretary of G2, the unit dealing with military intelligence, resource mobilization and operations. And he was promoted to Sergeant in April, 1954. Sergeant Desire Mobutu had been appointed Chief-of-Staff of the Congolese army with the rank of Colonel at the latter to the Force Publique would now be called the “Armee Nationale Congolaise”.

In 1971: The country officially renamed "Zaire".

First Rwandan Invasion

When: 1996

Who: First Rwanda invasion, backed by Uganda

Why: To close down Hutu camps in eastern DRC

Outcome: President Mobutu Se-Se-Seko was overthrown

On the 7th of October, 1996, claiming they are destabilising the region, former ex-Zairean government officials tells the 300,000 Banyamulenge community of ethnic-Tutsis settled in the region for generations, to leave Zaire, now the Congo within a week or be hunted down as rebels, then the warnning sparks a rebellion that later forced the ailing president Mobutu Sese-Seko flee exile, on the 17th of May, 1997 to Morocco, which that ended his 32 years rule.

Mr. Laurant-Desire Kabilla, the man behind the eight-months armed resistance with support from neighbouring Burundi, Rwanda and Uganda, pushed his forces into a full scale rebellion against president Mobutu Sese-Seko's rule, comes to power suspended all political parties except his own and promised elections that were never held, sworn into office as president on the 29th of May, 1997, restored the country's name, "Democratic Republic of the Congo (DRC)", he ruled the Congo (which he renamed Democratic Republic of the Congo-DRC) from 17 May, 1997 to 16 January 2001 when he too was assassinated. It's to be recalled that Mr. Patrice Emery Lumumba was killed on 17 January, 1961 – a coincidence?

President Laurent Desire Kabila was succeeded by his 29 years old son called, Joseph Kabilla Kabange took over 8 days later and has been in charge ever since, at the state house in the capital, Kinshasa by his personal bodyguard namely, Lt. Rashidi Kasereka, had been killed on the spot on the 16th of January, 2001, thought the assassination was part of a failed coup attempt. The alleged ringleader, Colonel Eddy Kappend, a cousin to the assassinated president, and others were sentenced to death in absentia by a Special Military Tribunal in January, 2003.

Internal conflicts in the eastern Congo, which has claimed some six million lives in a little more than a decade, has long revolved overaccess to it's mineral wealth, the Congo, is a country whose mineral resources are frequently looted by not just by multi-national companies also by it's neighbours the proxy forces. The UN estimates that the country has the worst rape and sexual violence statistics in the world.

Second Rwandan Invasion

When: 1998

Who: Second Rwandan invasion

Why: To overthrow Laurent-Desire Kabila

Outcome: The intervention of Angola, Zimbabwe, Chad, Libya and Sudan to save Kabila.

The country named Congo Leopoldville; and renamed Congo Kinshasa, Zaire in various times.

And Now called Democratic Republic of the Congo (DRC).

BRIEF DIARY ANALYSIS: The Congo

The colonization of what is now the Congo began in the late-19th century, with Belgium and its leaders exploiting its lands. The nation gained independence from the Europeans on this day in 1960, ending an occupation that lasted more than 50 years.

The Congo's colonization happened under the rule of King Leopold II who was able to dupe the European community in to believing that his efforts of exploration in the region were humanitarian. Using clandestine methods, the king was able to claim much of the Congo Basin for himself and renamed the area the "Congo Free State." Under Leopold's rule, natives were brutally mistreated and kidnapped to be slaves by Arab-Swahili traders.

Rubber was a chief export of the nation, and the Belgians ran workers in to the ground to increase production of the plants and ensuing product.

The Public Force (or Force Publique) was called in to enforce the production of rubber, cutting the limbs off workers to incite fear and harder work.

On top of the Public Force's tactics, millions of natives died due to disease and exploitation. British reporter Edmund Morel and Irish rebel Roger Casement led international protests against Belgium for its practices in the Congo. After mounting bad press and pressure from other world leaders, Belgium reluctantly stripped Leopold of his powers in the Free State in 1908. It was then renamed the "Belgian Congo."

By May 1960, the nation begun feeling resistance from a burgeoning nationalist movement. The Mouvement National Congolais (MNC), led by Patrice Lumumba, won the parliamentary elections, with Lumumba becoming the Democratic Republic of the Congo's first Prime Minister. The parliament elected Joseph Kasavubu, who represented the Alliance des Bakongo (ABAKO) party, as president, with other rising political parties also springing up, such as the Parti Solidaire Africain (PSA).

The Belgian Congo was declared independent on this day in 1960, leading other groups in the nation to resist the new leadership in secessionist attempts. Moise Tshombe, the president of the Katanga province, fought strongly to secede from the new nation, preferring the ties to Belgium and promoting Western ideology.

Within months, Lumumba's government was overthrown in a coup during the Congo Crisis. Lumumba did not support Katanga's secessionist views, which was backed by Belgium officials.

Lumumba was later imprisoned by authorities and executed under the command of Joseph-Desiré Mobutu (better known as Mobutu Sese Soko). Lumumba's request for help in the growing resistance went ignored by the United Nations. The United States' CIA agency, the United Kingdom's MI6 agency, and Belgium have all been accused of conspiring to overthrow and assassinate Lumumba. (Text ends)

A Republic in the centre of Africa

It is widely known that the Belgians have ruled over the Congo, the vast country in the heart of Africa for about hundred years before it's independence in 1960. The Belgians wanted to re-impose colonialism on his country only days after it had proclaimed it's independence. To achieve their objective, the Belgians had wittingly and unwittingly provoked a mutiny within the Congolese Army, namely the "Force Publique" to comfort their intervention, then the Belgians had flown-in paratroopers into the Congo to quell the mutiny, first the Belgians were bent on preventing the Congolese government from functioning, aimed at the elected premier Patrice Lumumba preventing from fullfilling the promises he has to his people. During this time the newly elected Congolese prime minister, Patrice Lumumba believing in the neutrality of the UN to settle an intra-Congolese political dispute. Mr. Patrice Lumumba has appealed to the US to sent troops to expel the Belgians from the Congo, but his appeal to the US rejected, as believed the USA, as leader of NATO, of which Belgium was a member, could not stab it's ally, Belgium in the back and rejected Lumumba's appeal out of hand, it advised Mr. Lumumba instead to turn the U.N for assistance, but the United Nation never moves fast in any situation. The United Nations in the early 1960s believed allowed itself to be used as tool of western policies to uphold their wealth in the Congo crisis under the suzeranity of Belgium to cruelly achieve at the expense of then Congolese prime minister.Yet, in the meantime, the Belgian para-troopers who had been flown into the Congo were controlling the country and threatening the physical safety of Mr. patrice Lumumba and members of his government. The newly elected Congolese prime minister turned his face, believing in the neutrality of the UN to settle an intra-Congolese political dispute. But the United Nations in the early1960s allowed itself to be used as tool of western policies to uphold their wealth in the Congo under the suzeranity of Belgium to cruelly achieve at the expence of then Congolese prime minister who was brutally dismembered by the State security agents.

Thus it was that Mr. Lumumba turned to the ex-Soviet Union to seek for assistance, not to fight the Belgians or expel them, as he had asked the western countries, but merely to give him planes for transportation to ferry troops from those Congolese provinces sympathetic to him, to the capital, Leopoldville (now Kinshasa) where his political opponents were strong. The the ex-Soviet Union agreed and sent him a handful of transport-planes, but the then CIA station chief in Leopoldville, sent alarming reports, claiming that PM Patrice Lumumba had placed the Congo in a situation that indicated a "classic Communist takeover". At the height of the cold war, such a report was incendiary and then president Dwight Eisenhower, ordered then Director of the CIA, Allen Dulles to remove Patrice Lumumba from the Congolese scene. This was, of course, done in such a way of colonial-style cold blooded political assassination as to ensure what the CIA calls "plausible deniability", as the order for Lumumba's elimination had come from president Dweght Eisenhower himself.

Conglese political crises in between the rivals going-tough, Mr. Lumumba who appealed first on 5th September, 1960 to the United Nations and to the ex-Soviet Union, then on the 14th September, 1960, to sack by the head of state from government, a coup which was organized by a fraction of Congolese army led by Colonel Joseph Mobutu took control of the situation, this was of course endorsed by the western intelligence agencies, the government under Patrice Lumumba was viewed as pro ex-Soviet Union following the incapacitation of his government, he soon to be arrested on the spot and to be transported first with two of his ministers, namely, Joseph Okito and Maurice Mpolo, the move coordinated by the State security of Congo first to Stanleyville (now Kissangani) on the 1st of December, 1960, and flown to Leopoldville (now Kinshasa) there were media-speculations, there had been previous US & Belgium intelligence plots to poison Lumumba in a form of toilet kits such as toothpaste through a CIA agent namely, Larry Devline. He fell at last in the hands of his political rival the Congolese rebel leader Moise Tchombe, later to brutally murder him on the 17th of January, 1961 in Katanga (now Shaba), his corpse were burried nearby and exhumated later to dismember and disolve it in concentrated sulphuric acid as perceived a threat to western interests. None of the murderers or the men behind them have never been indicted and his body was never recovered. Such a tragic event in the Congo resulted to a suspiciouly death of aircrah of the UN Secretary-general Mr. Dag Hammarskjold. Mr. Dag Hammarskjold and his entourage were on a mission to resolve the cisis that convulsed the Congo in the first months of it's independence. The second UN Secretary-general, whose death in a plane crash in the 18th September, 1961 has long aroused suspicions. Many amplified it in the strongest term, this act of murder was highly inspired by the wester intelligence units agencies in circumstances suggesting the support and complicity of the governments of Belgium and the United States. The Swede who became Secretary-general of the United Nation in 1953, had said in an occasion only a year before the tragic crash "the hardest thing of all is to die rightly", a year later he died in a mysterious plane crash near the airport of Ndola, a Zambian town in the British colony of Northern Rhodesia (now Zambia) not far from the Congo border at moonlit night, Patrice Lumumba ended-up being politically consumed by the UN and it's western allies. The wreckage of Hammarskjold's plane, officially nicknamed "Albertina" was found on the 18th September, 1961, the plane had flown from Leopoldville (now Kinshasa).

Post-independence period of the Congo was marked by unrest culminating in a military coup d'etat that brought Colonel Joseph Dezeri Mobutu to power for the second time on the 24th of November, 1965, by forcing the head of state to resign, and retire him from public life (he died on the 24th of March, 1969, at age of fifty nine), dismissed all civilian politicians and established an army rule, subsequently declaring himself head of state of the newly Congo Kinshasa, while in office as president, Army sergeant Joseph Dezeri-Mobutu formed an authoritarian rule, early in his rule, promoted himself to Colonel, consolidated his power by publicly executing political rivals, seccessionists and coup plotters, and other threats to his rule, he officially detached it's former name, and in 1971 renamed the country "Zaire" named himself president for life in 1972, he promoted himself to the rank of Field Marshal in 1983, while the nation's roads rotted and many of his people starved, infrastructure virtually collapsed, and many public service workers went months without being paid, most government money believed siphoned-off to Joseph Mobutu Sese-Seko, his family, and top political & military elites, only the special presidential guard whom his physical safety depended on, was paid adequately or regularly. However, Years of misrule, and increasing violence under Mobutu Sese Seko has left the country ethnically and regionally very divided, and devastated the infrastructure and the economy of ex-Zaire.

Indeed, on the 7th of October, 1996, claiming they are destabilising the region, former ex-Zairean government officials tells the 300,000 Banyamulenge community of ethnic-Tutsis settled in the region for generations, to leave Zaire, now the Congo within a week or be hunted down as rebels, then the warning sparks a rebellion that later forced the ailing president Mobutu Sese-Seko flee exile, on the 17th of May, 1997 to Morocco, which that ended his 32 years rule, Mr. Laurant-Desire Kabilla, the man behind the eight-months armed resistance with support from neighbouring Burundi, Rwanda and Uganda, pushed his forces into a full scale rebellion against president Mobutu Sese-Seko, comes to power suspended all political parties except his own and promised elections that were never held, sworn into office as president on the 29th of May, 1997, restored the country's name, "Democratic Republic of the Congo (DRC)", he was succeeded by his 29 years old son called, Joseph Kabilla Kabange , a week after the assassination at the state house in the capital, Kinshasa by his personal bodyguard namely, Lt. Rashidi Kasereka, who was then killed on the spot on the 16th of January, 2001, thought the assassination was part of a failed coup attempt. The alleged ringleader, Colonel Eddy Kappend, a cousin to the assassinated president, and others were sentenced to death in absentia by a Special Military Tribunal in January, 2003. Internal conflicts in the eastern Congo, which has claimed some six million lives in a little more than a decade, has long revolved overaccess to it's mineral wealth, the Congo, is a country whose mineral resources are frequently looted by not just by multi-national companies also by it's neighbours the proxy forces.

Democratic Republic of the Congo is so huge and administratively incoherent that it has no control of parts of its territory. Neighbours like Rwanda and Angola can march in at will. Its mineral wealth is legendary but has yet to improve the people's standards of living. It's one of the countries in Africa where the US dollar is more prized for local commerce than the country's almost valueless currency. Factional violence in eastern DRC has resulted in high numbers of internally displaced people and evils such as widespread rape. High incidence of infectious diseases like malaria, diarrhoea and occasionally ebola as a result of poor health coverage. Stupendous natural wealth of DRC has not improved the poverty index. There is also an environmental threat to the Congo rainforest due to overlogging, often by foreign interests doing so illegally. Saving the Congo and creating an African Great Lakes region at peace with itself by help solve the Congo's four major problems nowadays: Impunity, insecurity, institutional failure and illicit trade extractions and trade of minerals that gave the warlords room to maneuvre remains a mystery to all sides.

In the second democratic general elections since independence in 1960, the Congolese people will vote for a new president and parliament on 28th November, 2011. There were 11 candidates vying for the highest office of the land, and among them is the incumbent President Joseph Kabila Kabange who is running for re-election. He is identified as candidate number three. In addition, an incredible more than 18,500 candidates are competing for 500 seats in the national assembly; approximately 37 candidates are competing for each parliamentary seat. The Commission Electorale Nationale Indépendante (CENI) has been mandated by the Congolese government to organise the presidential and legislative elections. In a country as big as Western Europe where infrastructures such as roads and bridges are non-existent in many regions, the CENI is faced with the herculean task of successfully organising this very important event. The international community and neighbouring states would like to see the DRC succeed in organising peaceful elections as part of the on-going democratisation process of the country. Hence the UN, the EU, the African Union and the Southern African Development Community have offered financial, logistical and human resource assistance to the country. Without a doubt the success of these elections is good for the country, the Great Lakes region and the African continent in general.

Election fever has been high in the Congo, while the candidates are all on the campaign trail, some have more financial and logistical resources whereas others have little to none. A good number of candidates for the national assembly campaign door-to-door in their respective districts, while a select few get a lot of national TV and radio coverage. As one Radio commentator said, "while others are already almost at the finish line, some seem to be sluggish in starting their campaigns". Like many politicians, they are full of campaign promises to make the DRC a modern, economically progressive country. Scepticism abounds as to whether these promises will ever be fulfilled once they are elected. "All politicians seem to have one sickness-they become amnesiacs immediately after having been elected", said one education inspector in Goma. It seems for many that being elected is the quickest way to get rich. It's unclear whether the 11 presidential candidates and those 18, 000 candidates allover the Congo running for 500 legislative seats in the national assembly are aware there are two million internally displaced persons in the country, and hundreds of thousands of Congolese refugees exiled abroad. Surprisingly, hardly anyone has discussed on this issue. In these elections, money counts much more than the impeccable presentation by candidates of their socio-political and economic plans for the Congolese people or their country. Even good candidates with excellent plans stand to perform poorly in these elections if they don't give-out money.

Africa Biographics: who's Mobutu Sese Seko,

President of Zaire Now Democratic Republic Of Congo The product of a missionary school education, Mobutu Sese Seko Koko NgbenduWa Za Banga was a serial coup plotter. During the 1960 Congo Crises, he led the coup that ousted Patrice Lumumba, the country's first democratically elected leader. In return, he was appointed commander-in-chief of the armed forces. Less than five years later he led a second coup, installing himself as President. Declaring a regime d'exception, he assumed sweeping powers, and went on to rule the country for almost a third of a century. The original 'Big Man' of Africa, Mobutu consolidated and kept power by creating a vast patronage network. Built on the exploitation of the country's immense mineral wealth, Mobutu used it to effectively nullify any opposition.

Endemic governmental corruption, mismanagement and neglect over a number of years, led to hyperinflation of 4,000% by 1991, a large external debt, and massive currency devaluations. Amidst all of this, Mobutu managed to amass one of the largest personal fortunes in the world. While the actual amount will never be known….

In a country where everyone seems confident that they will win, it is difficult for candidates accept defeat. Instead, defeated candidates are quick to cry foul. In these elections there will be no losers, only victims of electoral fraud and sabotage. Nobody knows what will happen in the Congo, usually known as "heart of Africa" after the election results are announced on December 6 It is likely there will be various forms of protest, some peacefully through the courts, others may resort to violence. Despite calls for restraint and respect for the voice of the people, there are serious risks that disenfranchised groups will try to manipulate opposition supporters to create havoc. The Democratic Republic of the Congo (DRC) president Joseph Kabilla Kabange, 40 has rejected any claims that he won election through widspread rigging. President Joseph Kabilla denied that the results lacked legitimacy, but admitted that "mistakes" had been made during the election. The opposition leader Etienne Tshisekedi claimed victory for himself. Several people were killed in protests. After days of delays, official results which gave the ruling-party 49% of the vote against 32% for the 78 year old veteran politician Mr. Etienne Tshikesedi. The Supreme Court of the DRC has cofirmed the incumbent Joseph Kabilla Kabange as winner of presidential elections, despite opposition calls to cancel the vote. Mr. Joseph Kabilla had won 48.95% and was elected with simple majority.

President Joseph Kabilla Kabange was sworn-in for a second term after being declared the official winner with 49% of the vote composed to opposition candidate Mr. Etienne Tshisekedi's 32%. Mr. Etienne Tshisekedi's Union for Democracy and Progress (UDPS) party have recently sent out what appeared to be official invitations on presidential letterheads, urging journalists and diplomats in the country to attend the swearing-in ceremony at the Martyr's Stadium in the capital, Kinshasa, but supporters were refused entry to the Martyr's Stadium and all the roads around Mr. Tshisekedi's residence had been cordoned off. Troops from the Police, military and elite presidential guard have all been depolyed around the Stadium in Kinshasa, which's an opposition stronghold. President Joseph Kabilla Kabange, who has been succeeded his late father, is on power since the murder of ex-president Laurent-Desire Kabilla in January, 2001. The Congo has been engaged with internal political confusion & security crisis since the fled of the late ex-president Mobutu Sese-Seko in May, 1997 to the kingdom of Morocco.

Side note: In the case of the Democratic Republic of the Congo (DRC), the mineral dense country, several bilateral agreements were made that still exist between China and the DRC are steeped in secrecy. It's well known that the 2009 infrastructural and mining development agreement said to be worth between USD 6billion and USD 13 billion, commits DRC to supplying Chinese state firms with nearly 10 million tonnes of Copper and several hundred thousands tonnes of Cobalt. In return China has pledged to embark on several infrastructural projects, including roads, rail-roads, hydro-electric power stations, Universities, and health centres. From all indications, the DRC president Joseph Kabilla Kabang is following the Zimbabwean president Robert Gabriel Mugabe's statement, "we have turned East where the Sun rises, and given our back to the West, where the Sun sets". The Democratic Republic of Congo's main opposition leader has condemned the results of parliamentary elections. Mr. Etienne Tshisekedi said his party members who had won seats should boycott the parliament as November's general elections were rigged. He also called for a general strike in protest at his house arrest. President Joseph Kabila's PPRD and their allies say they will be able to muster a parliamentary majority, with 432 of the 500 seats declared.

New inquiry into ex-UN chief Dag Hammarskjold's death’

A new inquiry is to be launched into the death of United Nations Secretary General Dag Hammarskjold when his plane crashed in Zambia in 1961. A UN investigation in 1962 failed to find a cause for the Swedish-born diplomat's mysterious demise. New evidence will be examined by an international commission of lawyers. Mr Hammarskjold's plane was travelling to Congo on a peace mission when it crashed in a forest near Ndola in Northern Rhodesia, now Zambia. The crash occurred shortly before landing just after midnight on 18 September. All but one of the passengers and crew on the flight were killed.The committee's chairman David Lea said that the time was right to set up the new inquiry. "We believe that the whole of the truth, in significant respects, has yet to be told," he said. Three investigations have failed to determine the cause of the crash, and many conspiracy theories have swirled around Mr. Hammarskjold's death. Two investigations held in the British-run Central African Federation, which included Northern Rhodesia, were followed by an official UN inquiry, which concluded that foul play could not be ruled out. Though the inquiry has no official standing, it will be carried out by several high-profile jurists, including South African judge Richard Goldstone, retired British judge Stephen Sedley, former Swedish diplomat Hans Correll and Dutch Supreme Court judge Wilhelmina Thomassen. They hope to to review the evidence, complete their report within a year and submit the findings to the UN. Mr Lea said a book published last year by British academic Susan Williams entitled Who Killed Hammarskjold? - which concluded that it was likely that the plane was brought down - provided fresh evidence that needed to be examined. The plane crashed as he was trying to negotiate a ceasefire in Congo's mineral-rich Katanga province, where Moise Tshombe led Western-backed separatist rebels against the Soviet Union-allied Congolese government. After his death, Mr Hammarskjold was described by US President John F Kennedy as the "greatest statesman of our century". The only person to be awarded a Nobel Peace Prize after his death, he established the first armed UN peacekeeping mission following the crisis in Suez.

Updates: Internal fighting worsens 'deteriorating' situation in eastern Congo. Army troops and rebels clashed on Wednesday in the violence-ridden eastern part of Congo, threatening to undermine an already fragile stability. Hundreds of people in North Kivu fled toward the city of Goma by road trying to escape the fighting. The sound of heavy artillery echoed through the hills. The Congolese army continued a second day offensive to recover the cities of Rugari and Rumangavo, and to takeover these positions held by the insurgency. "The situation is deteriorating because of the fighting between various groups," said Ronald Paul Veilleux, the International Rescue Committee's provincial director for North and South Kivu. As of January 2009, an estimated 1.5 million people in North and South Kivu provinces have been internally displaced, and the number continues to rise, according to the United Nations. "People are losing their homes, their livelihoods and their hope," Veilleux said. The massive displacement has also led to an increase in gender-based violence. According to Veilleux, reported cases have gone up by 75% nationwide since April, and many go unreported in a nation that is already known as the rape capital of the world. In addition, this past week the World Health Organization reported a sharp increase in the number of cholera cases in North Kivu. "There is potential for this to turn into an epidemic if the situation continues to deteriorate," said Veilleux. The eastern part of Congo has been embroiled in violence since 1994, when Hutu forces crossed the border fearing reprisals following the genocide in neighboring Rwanda. In 1998 the vast nation -- previously known as Zaire -- became a battleground for eight African countries. More than 5 million people died in the war and its aftermath, making it the deadliest conflict since World War II. Despite the signing of peace accords in 2003, fighting continues in the eastern part of Congo between various rebel groups and the Congolese army, which is back by U.N. peacekeepers. There are many different forces on the ground, all of whom are armed. "The fighting is like a view through a kaleidoscope," said John Campbell, an Africa expert with the Council on Foreign Relations. Amid growing concerns of an escalating conflict, the U.S. government announced last week that it will cut military aid to Rwanda. The United States has accused Rwanda of supporting rebels in Congo. "The United States government is deeply concerned about the evidence that Rwanda is implicated in the provision of support to Congolese rebel groups, including M23," said Hilary Fuller Renner, a State Department spokeswoman. The M23 -- named after a failed peace agreement signed on March 23 three years ago -- is a rebel group that split from the Congolese army earlier this year. It has been accused of killing hundreds of people. One of the M23 commanders, Bosco Ntaganda, is wanted by the International Criminal Court for alleged war crimes. In a report to the U.N. Security Council in June, a U.N. expert panel on Congo found "substantial evidence" attesting to support from Rwandan officials to armed groups operating in the eastern region. It documents a "systematic pattern of military and political support provided to the M23 rebellion by Rwandan authorities" in the form of recruits, weapons and military equipment. Rwanda has denied allegations that the M23 are backed by their country's Tutsi leadership. "As we have made clear from the outset, Rwanda is neither the cause nor the enabler of instability in the eastern Congo," said Louise Mushikiwabo, Rwanda's foreign minister.

East DR Congo faces 'catastrophic humanitarian crisis'

The east of the Democratic Republic of Congo faces a catastrophic humanitarian crisis, an aid agency has warned ahead of a regional summit in Uganda. The Oxfam charity said millions of people were now at the mercy of militias, with a sharp increase in killings, rapes and looting. It said the focus on dealing with rebels had diverted the security forces from other vulnerable areas. The UN says the conflict has forced about 250,000 people from their homes. The UN and the DR Congo government are accusing neighbouring Rwanda of backing the M23 rebel group - a charge denied by Kigali. DR Congo President Joseph Kabila, and his Rwandan counterpart Paul Kagame are meeting to discuss the conflict at the regional summit near Uganda's capital Kampala. They have already agreed to set up a "neutral force" along the border to deal with the M23 and the Rwandan FDLR rebel group which also operates in the area. Oxfam UK warned that there was a "terrifying absence" of state authority and security in vast swathes of eastern DR Congo. The British-based charity described the situation as chaotic, saying that its local partners in the area reported a steep rise in forced recruitment of children, killing, rape and extortion which were going "virtually unnoticed". It stressed that the humanitarian consequences were huge - with cholera a real risk and the insecurity making it extremely difficult to deliver aid. The charity called for protection of civilians to be put at the top of the agenda of the summit in Uganda. The rebellion in eastern DR Congo is led by renegade general Bosco Ntaganda, who is accused by the UN of receiving military backing from Rwanda. He belongs to the Tutsi ethnic group like the top leadership in Rwanda, which fears the presence of rival Hutu militias in eastern DR Congo. Eastern DR Congo has been plagued by fighting since 1994, when more than a million ethnic Hutus crossed the border into DR Congo following the Rwandan genocide. Rwanda has since twice invaded its much larger neighbour, saying it was trying to take action against Hutu rebels based in DR Congo, such as the FDLR. DR Congo conflict: Kagame and Kabila fail to agree on force.

Summit on the Congo crisis end in Uganda'

Leaders of the Great Lakes region have proposed forming a joint force to maintain peace in the region following an outbreak of violence in the Congo.The joint force was mooted at the close of a two day summit of the International Conference on the Great Lakes Region (ICGLR) and a sub-committee has been put in place to study the feasabiltity of such a force."We have mandated a subcommittee to propose urgent actionable steps to ensure that fighting stops completely to allow for consolidation of peace, security and stability."The sub-committee is to also provide details on the operationalisation of the neutral international force," a communiqué after the summit reads. The leaders agreed to support the efforts of the government of the Congo in restoring peace and security in eastern Congo, particularly in North Kivu Province. The sub-committee has been requested to submit its interim report to the chairperson of the ICGLR in two weeks, and its final report to the summit of the ICGLR heads of state and government in four weeks. Leaders of Uganda, DRC, Kenya, Rwanda, Burundi and Tanzania attended the summit. Meantime, regional leaders have failed to agree at a summit in Uganda on deploying a new force to tackle militia groups in eastern Democratic Republic of Congo. "We will meet again in four weeks," Ugandan President Yoweri Museveni said, the AFP news agency reports. Last month, the African Union called for a force to be established within weeks, as conflict escalated. Meanwhile, gunmen have attacked the airport in the southern Congolese mining city of Lubumbashi. At least one soldier was killed in a shoot-out that lasted several hours. The government blamed a similar attack on the airport last year on armed men linked to secessionists in the south-east.

Outbreak of Ebola virus strikes DR Congo town of Isiro'

At least one person has died after an outbreak of the deadly Ebola virus in the north-east of the Democratic Republic of Congo, officials say. The death is one of two cases of the virus discovered in the town of Isiro. Medical charity workers say they are attempting to find and isolate anyone who has been in contact with those infected by the virus. Medecins Sans Frontieres (MSF) says the strain is not the same as the kind found recently in neighbouring Uganda. At least 16 people died during an outbreak there last month. The DR Congo outbreak occurred in Oriental province, which shares a border with Uganda. "There is no link between both epidemics at this moment," Anja de Weggheleire, of MSF, told the BBC. She added that there may be more cases that have yet to be detected. "Not every person who develops the disease will develop clear symptoms that are recognised as Ebola. For the moment it seems that there are not that many cases but the exact number of cases is unknown." Experts fear that the town's position as a transit point could make an outbreak more challenging to control. The virus, which is transmitted to humans from both monkeys and birds, causes massive internal bleeding and has a very high mortality rate. It is one of the most virulent diseases in the world and is spread by close personal contact. There is no vaccine for the virus and symptoms of infection include a sudden onset of fever, weakness, headache, vomiting and kidney problems.

Fake borders create real conflicts'

Views: Africa continues to suffer the consequences of the Berlin Conference, 1884-1885, when the colonial powers carved the continent up by artificial borders. The notion of citizenship in Africa is only 50 years old and it is cultural, linguistic and ethnic identity that remains more important to most of the population. Being a question associated with national boundaries and state sovereignty, this became politically manipulated by the post-colonial leaders, and has often been interpreted simplistically by external intervention. Conveying the complexity of the real situation has remained unrecognised or undermined by the UN Panel of 'experts' or other interventionists. In DR-Congo and Côte d'Ivoire, the question of cross-border identities has been the underlying cause of conflict and political violence. The political and ethnic identities of Rwandophone groups in Eastern DRC have often been contested and confused due to regional trans-border cultural and linguistic links. Yet, objectively, in a multilingual state like DRC, culture, physical features and linguistic affiliation should not be the basis to determine whether or not someone is a 'foreigner.' In Côte d'Ivoire, the ongoing conflictual situation is about what constitutes an Ivorian. Where someone lives, and their links beyond the borders, may define one as 'the son of migrants' or an 'autochthon.' Africa's economic development and sustainable peace-building largely depends on the cohesiveness of its diverse and rich identities within and beyond borders. Policy makers need to acknowledge the human consequences of not adequately recognising and addressing the question of identity and sense of belonging. Alex Ntung, Member of UK Expert Witness Institute, Hastings, UK, is a researcher and expert adviser on Central Africa. The Africa Report October 19, 2012

Accession to power of president Joseph Kabilla Kabange - 22nd January, 2001 by succession.

Tentative election calendar - November

Deutsche Welle

Patrice Lumumba: Belgium to return remains of assassinated Congo leader to DRC

Priyanka Shankar (Brussels), Deutsche Welle - 5h ago

Patrice Lumumba was assassinated over 60 years ago as Belgian officials looked on. The repatriation of the remains of Congo's first democratically elected leader comes as Belgium seeks to confront its dark colonial past."More than 60 years of pain": That's how Juliana Lumumba has described her family's life.

© Everett Collection/picture alliance
Patrice Lumumba, the first prime minister of Congo, was assassinated by a firing squad as Belgian officials looked on

The 67-year-old politician and daughter of Patrice Lumumba, the Democratic Republic of the Congo's former prime minister, has been waiting decades for Belgium to return the known remains of her father -- a tooth and finger bones.

"As a family, we have to move on and we can only do it once we bury our father's remains in peace," she told DW by phone from Congo. "So far, the handover process has been very bureaucratic and coupled with the pandemic, we are still waiting for his tooth. Hopefully this year Belgium will hand over what is rightly ours."

On June 20, Belgium will officially present Patrice Lumumba's toothto his family members at an official ceremony in Brussels.

While the tooth is just a body part of the Congolese leader, it also symbolizes a dark period in both Belgium and Congo's history; a period that Belgium is still trying to unpack and accept, according to Juliana Lumumba.

The assassination of Patrice Lumumba

Juliana's father, Patrice Lumumba, rose to power to become the first democratically elected prime minister of Congo in 1960.

The Congo - Timeline Diaries updates and related key notes:

Democratic Republic of the Congo (formerly Zaire): It may be currently unfashionable to assign African troubles to colonial and external powers, but in the case of the continent's second largest country, DRCongo, it would be difficult to come to any other conclusion. After over fifty years of independence, Africa is now more mature and able to take it's own responsibility for it's own short- comings without blaming external forces. But history teaches that the people of DRCongo have truly been brutalized and exploited for the last 100 years – sometimes with the connivance, if not active participation, of some Western powers and corporations. What about the assassination of Congo's elected prime minister, Patrice Emery Lumumba? And the suffering still continues. There is a thread running through the serious harm done to the country by the killing it's first prime minister Patrice Lumumba on the 17 of January, 1961 – 52 long years ago this January, 2013 – to the troubles in Congo today. The United Nations estimates that the country has the worst rape and sexual violence statistics in the world. Editor 1200s – The rise of Kongo empire, centred in modern northern Angola and including extreme western Congo and territories round lakes Kisale and Upemba in central Katanga (now Shaba).

1482 - Portuguese navigator Diogo Cao becomes the first European to visit the Congo; Portuguese set up ties with the king of Kongo.

16th-17th centuries - British, Dutch, Portuguese and French merchants engage in slave trade through Kongo intermediaries.

1870s - Belgian King Leopold II sets up a private venture to colonise Congo.

1874-77 - British explorer Henry Stanley navigates Congo river to the Atlantic Ocean.

1879-87 - Leopold commissions Stanley to establish the king's authority in the Congo basin.

1884-85 - European powers at the Conference of Berlin recognise Leopold's claim to the Congo basin.

1885 - Leopold II announces the establishment of the Congo Free State, headed by himself.

1891-92 - Belgians conquer Katanga.

1892-94 - Eastern Congo wrested from the control of East African Arab and Swahili-speaking traders.

1908 - Belgian state annexes Congo amid protests over killings and atrocities carried out on a mass scale by Leopold's agents. Millions of Congolese are said to have been killed or worked to death during Leopold's control of the territory.

1955 - Belgian Professor Antoin van Bilsen publishes a "30-Year Plan" for granting the Congo increased self-government.

1959 - Belgium begins to lose control over events in the Congo following serious nationalist riots in Leopoldville (now Kinshasa).

June 30, 1960 - Congo becomes independent with Patrice Emery Lumumba as prime minister and Joseph Kasavubu as head of State.

July 1960 - Congolese army mutinies; The secessionist Moise Tshombe declares Katanga independent; Belgian troops sent in ostensibly to protect Belgian citizens and mining interests; UN Security Council votes to send in troops to help establish order, but the troops are not allowed to intervene in internal affairs.

The Congo and the continued UN mandated Military intervention; UN Sec. General Dag Hammarskjold! - A chronology 1905, 29 July - Dag Hjalmar Agne Carl Hammarskjold is born in Jonkoping, Sweden, to an aristocratic family. His father is Minister for Education. He is raised in Uppsala Castle, a 16th century royal residence.

1906 - Union Miniere established -a mining company partly owned by the Belgian Congo government.

1915 - The Shinkolobwe mine is discovered when Robert Rich Sharp is looking for geological signs of Copper; instead he finds Uranium. Belgians react to this by employing a native Congolese workforce to mine for the Uranium.

1942 - Societe Generale, part-owner of Union Miniere, decide to sell 30, 000 tons of Uranium to the US Army for slightly more than $1 per pound. Some of this Uranium is then used to construct the atomic bomb dropped on Japan in 1945.

1953 - March - Dag Hammarskjold is secretly nominated to succeed Trygve Lie, the first Sec-General of the UN, who resignes after losing support from both the Eastern bloc and the West. Hammarskjold cables his acceptance to the post, stating that: "With strong feeling (of) personal insufficiency I hesitate to accept candidature ... but do not feel I could refuse to assume the task imposed on me".

1956 - Dag Hammarskjold sends UN troops to inervene in the Suez Crisis, an action that sets him against Britain and France.

1960 - Following independence in 30th June, the Congo crisis begins, lasting five years and serving as a proxy war in the Cold War.

September 1960 – President Joseph Kasavubu dismisses Lumumba as prime minister.

December 1960 – PM Patrice Lumumba arrested.

1961 - January - Patrice Emery Lumumba, prime minister of the Congo, is arrested and brutally murdered in Elisabethville (now Lubumbashi).

February 1961 – PM Patrice Lumumba murdered, reportedly with US and Belgian complicity.

August to September 1961 - UN troops begin disarming Katangese soldiers. UN Blue Helmets stage two disastrous interventions in the secessionist region of Katanga. They are repulsed by Moise Tshombe's troops, which include European and South African mercenaries.

1961 - 13th December - Dag Hammarskjold arrives in Leopoldville determined to negotiate a ceasefire with Moise Tshombe.

1961 - 17th September - The UN Sec. General and 15 others, including his security detail and his Swedish flight crew, die after their plane crashes near Ndola, then former Northern Rhodesia (now Zambia). The lone survivor, Sergeant Harold Julien, dies six days later.

1961 - 18th September - Wreckage of the flight discovered at 3pm, according to the official report, while witnesses claim it was earlier.

1961 - October: the first of three inquiries subsequently launched in this year, by the Rhodesian Board of investigation, the Rhodesian Commission of Inquiry, and the United Nations Commission of Investigation. All are inconclusive.

In 1963 – Moise Tshombe agrees to end Katanga's secession.

In 1964 - President Joseph Kasavubu appoints Tshombe prime minister.

In 1965 – President Joseph Kasavubu and Moise Tshombe ousted in a coup led by Colonel Joseph Dezire Mobutu.

In 1971 – Colonel Joseph Mobutu renames the country Zaire and himself to Mobutu Se-Se Seko; also Katanga becomes Shaba and the river Congo becomes the river Zaire.

In 1973-74 – Mobutu Sese Seko nationalises many foreign-owned firms and forces European investors out of the country.

In 1977 – Mobutu Sese Seko invites foreign investors back, without much success; French, Belgian and Moroccan troops help repulse attack on Katanga by Angolan-based rebels.

In 1989 - Zaire defaults on loans from Belgium, resulting in a cancellation of development programmes and increased deterioration of the economy.

In 1990 – Mobutu Se-se-seko agrees to end the ban on multiparty politics and appoints a transitional government, but retains substantial powers.

In 1991 - Following riots in Kinshasa by unpaid soldiers, President Mobutu Sese Seko agrees to a coalition government with opposition leaders, but retains control of the security apparatus and important ministries.

In 1993 - Rival pro- and anti-Mobutu governments created.

In 1994 – President Mobutu Sese Seko agrees to the appointment of Kengo Wa Dondo, an advocate of austerity and free-market reforms, as prime minister.

In 1996-97 - Tutsi rebels capture much of eastern Zaire while Mobutu is abroad for medical treatment.

In 1997 May – BaniamulengeTutsies and other anti-Mobutu rebels, aided principally by Rwanda, capture the capital, Kinshasa; Zaire is renamed the Democratic Republic of Congo; Laurent-Desire Kabila installed as president.

August1998 - Rebels backed by Rwanda and Uganda rise up against Laurant Desire Kabila and advance on to Kinshasa. Zimbabwe, Namibia send troops to repel them. Angolan troops also side with Laurant Kabila. The rebels take control of much of the east of DR Congo.

In 1999 - Rifts emerge between Congolese Liberation Movement (MLC) rebels supported by Uganda and Rally for Congolese Democracy (RCD) rebels backed by Rwanda.

July 1999 - The six African countries involved in the war sign a ceasefire accord in Lusaka. The following month the MLC and RCD rebel groups sign the accord.

In 2000 - UN Security Council authorises a 5,500-strong UN force to monitor the ceasefire but fighting continues between rebels and government forces, and between Rwandan and Ugandan forces.

January 2001 - President Laurent Kabila is shot dead by his bodyguard.

Joseph Kabila Kabange succeeds his father.

February 2001 – Joseph Kabila Kabange meets Rwandan President Paul Kagame in Washington. Rwanda, Uganda and the rebels agree to a UN pull-out plan. Uganda, Rwanda begin pulling troops back from the frontline.

May 2001 - US refugee agency says the war has killed 2.5 million people, directly or indirectly, since August 1998. Later, a UN panel says the warring parties are deliberately prolonging the conflict to plunder gold, diamonds, timber and coltan, used in the making of mobile phones.

January 2002 - Eruption of Mount Nyiragongo devastates much of the city of Goma.

April 2002 - Peace talks in South Africa: Kinshasa signs a power-sharing deal with Ugandan-backed rebels, under which the MLC leader would be premier. Rwandan-backed RCD rebels reject the deal.

July 2002 - Presidents of DR Congo and Rwanda sign a peace deal under which Rwanda will withdraw troops from the east and DR Congo will disarm and arrest Rwandan Hutu gunmen blamed for the killing of the Tutsi minority in Rwanda's 1994 genocide.

September 2002 - Presidents of DR Congo and Uganda sign peace accord under which Ugandan troops will leave DR Congo.

September/October 2002 - Uganda, Rwanda say they have withdrawn most of their forces from the east. UN-sponsored power-sharing talks begin in South Africa.

December 2002 - Peace deal signed in South Africa between Kinshasa government and main rebel groups. Under the deal rebels and opposition members are to be given portfolios in an interim government.

April 2003- President Kabila signs a transitional constitution, under which an interim government will rule pending elections.

May 2003 - Last Ugandan troops leave eastern DR Congo.

June 2003 - French soldiers arrive in Bunia, spearheading a UN-mandated rapid-reaction force.

President Joseph Desire Kabila names a transitional government to lead until elections in two years time. Leaders of main former rebel groups are sworn in as vice-presidents in July.

August 2003 - Interim parliament inaugurated.

March 2004 - Gunmen attack military bases in Kinshasa in an apparent coup attempt.

June 2004 - Reported coup attempt by rebel guards is said to have been neutralised.

December 2004 - Fighting in the east between the Congolese army and renegade soldiers from a former pro-Rwanda rebel group. Rwanda denies being behind the mutiny.

January 5, 2005 Eleven of 36 ministers were dismissed for corruption. A major cause of this was the reluctance of foreign nations to send aid, when so much of it is stolen by government officials. Commanders of the UN peacekeeper force also insisted that corrupt Congolese military officers and troops be fired as well. Congolese police and soldiers are notorious for their looting, often in front of foreign relief workers and journalists. All this clean government activity is not expected to eliminate corruption, but its a move in the right direction. Congolese officials who complained, that more aid was going to tidal wave victims in the Indian Ocean, than to the Congo, were told that local officials in the countries in the Indian Ocean might steal 5-10 percent of the aid, while in Congo, over half would disappear.

January 10, 2005 The government announced that national elections, set for June, would be delayed until the Fall. Inability of government officials to get ready in time was the reason. As a result, riots broke out in major cities, leaving at least three dead. Most Congolese want to elect their leaders, and maybe get a more honest and efficient bunch than the current lot of former rebels.

January 14, 2005 Donor nations were again in an uproar, as five warlords, all accused of war crimes, were appointed to high army ranks, as part of the peace deals with the rebel groups the men led. It is believed, however, that the new army officers, including four generals, will not be given important commands.

January 17, 2005 All soldiers and police must have their existence, and ability to do their job, verified, so that new identification cards can be issued in March. Commanders have long padded their units with phantom soldiers, and pocketed their pay. Unqualified friends and relatives have also been given jobs in the police and army, and the government wants to stop this. Or at least try.

January 19, 2005 The Rwandan government and NGO sources are reporting a new wave of refugees from the Congo. The refugees report new fighting in the Masisi area of the eastern Congo. A Rwandan government spokesman said that Mai-Mai militia were participating in the fighting. Uganda reports that 15,000 Congolese refugees have entered Ugandan territory. Many of them are camped on the shores of Lake Albert. The UN reported on January 17 that Mai-Mai militiamen were fighting with Rwandan-backed Congolese rebel units in the Ituri area. These reports are further evidence that the UN forces deployed in the eastern Congo lack the mobility and intelligence assets to be effective. Yes, the UN forces were originally deployed as "peace monitors," but the continual fighting forced the UN to intervene in the tribal and political disputes.

January 28, 2005 UN peacekeepers had seized four militia camps near Bunia (northeast Congo) and "demolished" the camps. Two of the camps were run by a splinter faction of the Union of Congolese Patriots (UPC-L). The UPC-L has emerged as a major troublemaker in the area. UN troops killed a UPC-L officer in a shootout north of Bunia and arrested two other militiamen. The rogue militias and "rebel" Congolese military units are preying on unprotected villages and have threatened relief workers. The rebel Congolese units are a particularly dicey problem. On January 20 representatives of the NGO Doctors Without Borders (DWB) said that had suspended aid operations in North Kivu province. For months NGOs and the UN have been continually reporting looting and violence in North Kivu. Doctors WIthout Borders is regarded as one of the "toughest" NGO organizations --meaning that DWB will keep its staff deployed in dangerous situations where other NGOs would pull out. However, DWB said that on January 18 "men in army uniforms" attacked their medical facility in the village of Kabati. The attackers took communications gear and one vehicle. The DWB report said that the Kabati facility was positioned to help people in the Masisi and Rutshuru districts. There are many refugees in this area --some of whom fled last months fighting in the town of Kanyabayonga. DWB still has what is described as a "mobile medical facility" in the town of Kayna. The fighting in Kanyabayonga was initially described as a "fight between regular Congolese army units." It later turned out that the units are former guerrilla forces and militia units that have (obviously) not been integrated into a national military force. It looks like the DWB medical team was pulled out because local "Congolese army units" are now little more than rogue forces. As we've noted before, there simply aren't enough UN peacekeepers and monitoring teams in the eastern Congo.

February 16, 2005 The dam has finally broken on coverage of UN sex crimes in the Congo. On February 11, the UN secretary-generals office issued an unusual order. The order bans sex between UN peacekeepers and Congolese locals. For months the international press has run stories of child sex, gang rapes, and sexual exploitation by UN troops in the Congo. This has led to investigations and charges against at least 50 troops. The sex scandals are another embarrassment for the UN. Lack of accountability and oversight are the big issues. The UN command, such as it is, has limited authority over national contingents. To their credit, France and South Africa have prosecuted soldiers charged with crimes in the Congo. However, continued media exposure put the UN leadership on the spot and seems to have brought pressure on some national governments to discipline soldiers. By February 14, Morocco was promising to prosecute offenders. But so much for sex-- the usual Congo violence continues. On February 10 the UN and western media reported renewed fighting in the eastern Congo. The fighting began February 6 and the Kyoma and Kasenyi village areas were once again hotspots. On February 11 the UN and South African sources said that a South African contingent of 1200 troops will move to the town of Beni (Ituri province, northeast Congo). The troops were assigned to security duty in the Kindu area. The South African forces are slated to act as a rapid-reaction force in the area (to handle missions like rescuing threatened civilians). A second and very difficult mission is called interpositionie, placing the peacekeeping force between the warring militias and rebel factions that are savaging the region. This is a very dicey task, but one the highly-trained South Africans can handle. Superior training is why the South Africans have been assigned this operation. Its possible the South African unit could also be used as a strike force to free hostages though this would be pushing the edge of the UNs peace monitoring mission.

February 21, 2005 The World Health Organization is reporting a serious outbreak in the Congo of pneumonic plague. WHO says at least 60 people have died from the disease and several hundred are ill. This is the more easily spread version of the infamous Black Death that killed over a third of Europe's population in the 14th century. Pneumonic plague is spread via tiny particles people expel when they breathe out (instead of via infected fleas). While plague is a bacterial infection, that can be cured by antibiotics, but in vast, lawless areas of Congo, there are no antibiotics, and there is pneumonic plague. The center of the outbreak is a diamond mine at Zobia in the northeastern Congo--yup, right in the middle of the violence, chaos, and factional wars. Around 7,000 people work at the mine or in the immediate area, so if 400 to 500 people have been infected, the danger of a virulent "breakout" is very real. A subsequent report said the mine was re-opened in early December 2004 and the first case of pneumonic plague was discovered December 20. WHO and the CDC have sent health teams and disease investigation teams. UN peacekeepers in the area ought to detail troops to protect the these teams. Thousands of people are fleeing the plague area, some of them taking the plague with them. Meanwhile, in the northeast, renewed fighting between peacekeepers, army units and various rebel militias, has caused some 50,000 civilians to flee the area.

March 2, 2005 UN combat operations against the FNI militia has killed at least fifty of the gunmen. The FNI denies it had anything to do with the deaths of nine Bangladeshi UN peacekeepers, but no one besides the FNI believes that. FNI officials have been arrested in other parts of Congo, and the UN and the government seems determined to crush the FNI, if only to discourage further attacks on peacekeepers. Following the February 25 murders of nine Bangladeshi UN peacekeepers, the Congo reported that UN and NGO aid organizations have suspended operations in the Congo's northeastern Ituri region. One UN agency has been assisting over 50,000 refugees in the vicinity of the towns of Kakwa, Tche and Gina. UN sources cited the "poor security situation" for the suspension of aid operations. The security situation has been going from bad to worse, with a decline that began in December 2004. The Congo government now blames rogue militias operating in Ituri for the murder of the Bangladeshi soldiers. On February 28 the government said that it had arrested Floribert Ndjabu, the commander of the Nationalist and Integrationist Front (FNI). The FNI is one of a half-dozen tribal defense groups or militias in the area where the Bangladeshi troops were slain. MONUC issued an official statement on the murders. MONUC said the peacekeepers were on a security mission around the refugee camp at Kafe (sometimes designated as the IDP camp, Kafe, or internally displaced persons camp). The Bangladeshi UN contingent had assigned 20 troops to the task as well as a UN civilian interpreter. The unit was ambushed five kilometers west of Kafe. The UN commander (of what is now called the Ituri Brigade) responded by sending two additional infantry platoons (by helicopter) and two Mi-25 attack helicopters. The reinforcements engaged the militias in a firefight while dead and wounded were evacuated. MONUC said that the arrest of 30 militiamen on February 24 may have precipitated the incident. The ambush was characterized as a "premeditated" attack. On February 28 the government said that it would send an additional brigade (3,000 troops) to Ituri to help police the troubled region. The UN's Ituri Brigade deploys approximately 4,500 troops and support personnel. In addition to the Bangladeshis, the unit is manned by troop contingents from Morocco, Pakistan, and Nepal. The security situation in North Kivu province is also terrible. On February 28 the European Union suspended developmental aid projects in North Kivu due to what a UN press release described as "massive looting of supplies." The UN said "systematic looting" occurred between December 20, 2004 and the end of January. Looters took material intended for schools and hospitals. Neither the government or MONUC are able to provide basic security for these aid programs. The decision to pullback is a wise one. The Congo and UN are left with several tough decisions. If the government and UN are serious about improving the security situation, the leaders of the rogue militias and tribal organizations committing these crimes will have to be arrested. Disbanding these organizations is an even tougher proposition. The Congo is flush with light automatic weapons and a "disbanded militia" can easily reorganize. The best policy is to arrest incorrigible militia leaders and convince the remaining leaders to cooperate with government and UN authorities. -- Austin Bay

March 10, 2005 The UN announced that it will investigate the counter-militia operation launched on March 1 by Pakistani and South African peacekeepers in the Congo's Ituri province. The UN said the investigation was routine, though press sources report that villagers in the area where the combat action occurred said that peacekeepers also killed civilians. UN commanders denied this accusation. The UN commanders did say the militiamen tried to use hostages as "shields" but UN soldiers held fire until they could initiate combat without civilian losses. The counter-militia operation (which has all the markings of a carefully planned counter-bandit operation) was conducted in response to a rogue militia's ambush of Bangladeshi peacekeepers on February 25 that left 9 Bangaldeshis dead. The Pakistanis and South Africans estimated they killed around 60 militiamen in the operation which took place near the Congo town of Loga. The UN (MONUC) force had two wounded. The Pakistanis are part of the UN's "Ituri Brigade" and the South African contingent had been moved into the area to act as a rapid response force. The rogue militia belongs to the Nationalist Integrationist Front (FNI). UN peacekeepers (presumably in the Ituri Brigade) reported that the Pakistani and South African troops had "precise intelligence." March 1 was a market day in Lago and a UN source said on market days "the militia gather taxes" (translation: rob or take protection money from the locals). The situation in the Congo appears to be getting worse-- if that sound possible. The civilian death rate in the region among refugees seems to be running at 1,000 a day in the area. Most of these people die from malnutrition and various diseases. Sexual abuse of women and girls continues in rebel controlled areas-- if you thought UN peacekeepers were bad, the militiamen are worse. There are also new reports of militias "recruiting" child soldiers. The possibility of any solution is dim, given the complex interrelationships of social unrest, criminal gangs, traditional tribal conflicts, and the presence of defeated Rwandan Hutu rebels. The increasing aggressiveness of the UN peacekeeping forces may suggest that Congo -- or at least the war -- is about to (and we quote) "fall into UN receivership." This is a UN Charter Chapter 7 operation, which empowers the peacekeepers to act aggressively (the only prior Chapter 7 ops have been Korea, Congo 1960, Iraq '90-'91, and Somalia), but from 1999 until recently the chief UN official overseeing the operation has been reluctant to act decisively. That seems to have changed as of March 1. MONUC is the world's largest on-going peacekeeping operation. UN security strength --currently around 13,206 troops, 569 military observers, and 175 civilian police--is scheduled to rise to 17,000 troops and right at 500 civilian police officers. Counting the 9 Bangladeshis killed February 25, the current UN death toll in the Congo MONUC operation (KIA or died of wounds) is 45. The breakdown is as follows: 34 military troops, eight military observers, two international civilian UN staffers and one local civilian hired by the UN.

March 12, 2005 The UN announced a new operation in the region. Described as a "cordon and search security operation," the UN said 800 troops (deployed as four companies) were participating in the operation. The area of operation is east of Bunia. The troops used transport helicopters backed by attack helicopters (so apparently there is an airmobile component to the operation). Meanwhile, there are reports of the return of "tribal slave raids." Lendu tribal militias are raiding Hema villages and taking prisoners. Those who are not needed for work or sex are killed. Some of the female prisoners, used as "sex slaves," have escaped to report the presence of the slave camps, where the captives are roped together in work gangs and forced to grow food. The slaves are kept in line by malnutrition, and the threat of death or amputation of a hand, if they resist or try to escape. All of this is right out of Joseph Conrad's "Heart of Darkness," and are reminiscent of similar atrocities committed a century ago when the king of Belgium ran the Congo as a feudal fiefdom.

March 14, 2005 It looks like the UN's Ituri Brigade is continuing to pursue its "aggressive strategy" to deal with rogue militias. UN peacekeepers say they have killed more then 50 militia members in an offensive, days after nine Bangladeshi soldiers serving with the UN are killed in the north-east.

March 18, 2005 The Ituri Brigade's "cordon and search" operation outside of Bunia is continuing. The "Zumbe area" near Bunia had been the center of the operation. UN troops reported they seized weapons from militiamen identified as belonging to the FNI (National Integration Front), the militia accused of killing nine UN peacekeepers on February 25. A UN officer said that peacekeepers had seen a "flow of arms coming from Uganda" into the Congo.

March 19, 2005 Tribal militia leader Thomas Lubanga was arrested in the capital. Lubanga was the head of the Union of Congolese Patriots, a group representing armed Hema tribesmen in northeastern Congo.

March 23, 2005 The UN reported on March 18 that Meanwhile, the African Union (AU) is calling for another 7000 peacekeepers to be sent to the eastern Congo. This comes at a time the AU is still looking for troops to help monitor the war in Sudan's Darfur. The AU issued a statement March 17 saying that an additional 7,000 troops were needed in the eastern Congo in order to "disarm" the rogue militias. The AU's call for new troops indicates the UN's new "aggressive policing" of Congo militias is receiving wide political support.

April 5, 2005 Add a cholera epidemic to the problems in the northeastern Congo. Approximately 500 people in refugee camps in Ituri province have contracted cholera. The latest reports give the death toll at 20, but that could rise sharply within days. UN sources say the first case appeared March 26. By April first the number of cases hit 110. April 4 the number approached 500. The epicenter of the outbreak is the Kafe Refugee Camp (near Lake Albert). Poor hygiene and bad water are typical conditions in refugee camps-- and they are the conditions that make for a cholera outbreak. Poor nutrition contributes to the spread of disease, and UN sources have documented an increase in food shortages throughout Ituri. Meanwhile, combat continues. The UN reported that peacekeepers in the UN's Ituri Brigade killed 38 militiamen in a series of battles that took place April 2 and April 3. The major April 2 battle started when peacekeepers were searching a refugee camp and located a large weapons cache. Militiamen fired on the peacekeepers. The UN soldiers responded with heavy fire and attack helicopters. 18 militiamen died in that action. UN peacekeepers are expected to become even more aggressive. The UN command set an April 1 deadline for militias in Ituri to hand in their weapons. Interestingly enough, the UN reports that 8,200 militiamen have surrendered themselves and their weapons to the UN-- but that leaves another estimated 6000 to 7000 militiamen in Ituri.

April 28, 2005 The UN and the government have been trying to rapidly improve the Congo's military forces. On April 24 a government spokesman said the country hopes to have "at least" ten brigades trained for peacekeeping duties prior to the June 30 election and to protect voters during the election. But international observers doubt the elections will be held on time. Voter registration is going slowly and security remains an issue, particularly in the eastern Congo. South Africa has taken the lead in training the Congo troops, with support from France and Belgium. Disarming militias is one of the missions the Congo brigades will undertake. Another is trying to stop weapons smugglers. On April 18 the UN passed Security Council Resolution 1596, which extends and expands a weapons shipment and sales ban in the Congo. (The ban --UNSCR 1493-

- was imposed in July 2003.) The original ban provided for sanctions against any groups and states who "directly or indirectly" supply or sell weapons in the eastern Congo. UNSCR 1596 says that only Congo "national army" police and troops are exempt from the ban. The new resolution is designed to give UN peacekeepers another legal tool to disarm rogue militias. Throughout April, UN peacekeepers have conducted a number of "cordon and search" operations to disarm the militias. The latest big operation began on April 19 northeast of Bunia. 1,000 Pakistani, Bangladeshi, and Moroccan troops participated in the operation. The UN now says at least 20 fighters belonging to the UPC (Union des patriotes congolais) militia were killed in the operation. The UN reports 1,300 UPC militiamen have turned in their weapons. The UPC may have another armed 2,000 militiamen in the field.

April 30, 2005 Five African reporters who had been taken hostage by a militia in the eastern Congo had been released. The militiamen took the hostages after their leader was arrested by peacekeepers. After the hostages were released, a UN spokesman said the militia was allowed to keep 270 bicycles its men had stolen--- a belated "ransom" of sorts. The bicycles are part of an weapons exchange program. Militiamen who turn in weapons can receive a bicycle in exchange. The program makes sense since bicycles and weapons are both high-value items.

May 1, 2005 Peacekeeper efforts to disarm militias have been unsuccessful when the gunmen refuse to cooperate. Peacekeeper attempts to chase down and forcibly disarm these holdouts has, so far, proved ineffective.

May 4, 2005 The UN confirmed that 11,500 militiamen had disarmed in the eastern Congo. That still leave 1500 to 2000 armed fighters.

May 7, 2005 The South African government said that South African reservists would deploy to the Congo for peacekeeping duties. While the government report wasn't specific, the South African troops the 156 reservists will replace is a regular army infantry unit. The reservists will serve with the 7th South African Infantry Battalion Congo and be deployed for six months. The South African government said this is the first deployment of reservists but more will serve in the Congo as regulars rotate home.

May 10, 2005 In the southeast, police arrested dozens of politicians and soldiers and accused them of plotting to make the area (the province of Katanga) into a separate country. Katanga, which is rich in natural resources, has a long history of separatism.

May 23, 2005 UN investigators have concluded that 1,500 civilians in south Kivu province (eastern Congo) have been attacked by rebels in the past 12 months.

May 24, 2005 In eastern Congo, rogue militiamen killed 18 civilians and kidnapped another fifty. Government and UN troops are in pursuit. The killers identified themselves as "Rastas," a group associated with Rwandan Hutu militias. The UN has ordered its peacekeepers to use more "robust" (violent) methods to suppress armed rebel groups.

May 25, 2005 The curious Congo town of Mbuji-Mayi is back in the news. The town has a reputation as an "outlaw town," At the height of the Congo's war Mbuji-Mayi was a meeting place for rebels, rogue military officers, unscrupulous mineral traders, and spies. The town is located in a diamond-producing area. The UN reported on May 23 that violent demonstrations broke out May 17-18 in Mbuji-Mayi. At least 12 people were wounded and two killed The violence involved members of the Democracy and Social Progress Party (UPDS), the national People's Party for Reconstruction and Development (Congo president Joseph Kabila heads this party), and the Congolese Liberation Movement (MLC). The UN said that it was "mediating" among the three parties but that security would be increased in the area. Several analysts have suggested the violence is connected to the upcoming Congo election.

May 26, 2005 A group of Rwandan rebels, known as "The Rastas," killed 18 people in the eastern Congo and took over 50 hostages. This militia group has been accused of committing numerous crimes in South Kivu province. The Rastas are allied with the FDLR Rwandan Hutu rebel organization. One source said the UN and Congolese army are planning an operation in South Kivu with the aim of disarming militias operating in the area. Meanwhile, the South African government extended its troop commitment in the Congo. South African troops will continue to serve with UN forces at least through March 2007. The South Africans have manned the UN's quick reaction force in the eastern Congo and are considered to be critical to UN counter-militia operations in the region.

May 31, 2005 Over 6,000 civilians have fled eastern Congo to escape attacks by "The Rastas," a murderous group connected to Rwandan Hutu militias. The Hutu militias want to negotiate a peace deal with Rwanda, to allow disarmament and return to Rawanda. But many of the Hutu rebel leader are wanted for participation in the 1994 mass murder of Tutsi people in Rwanda.

June 1, 2005 Rich gold fields in northeastern Congo are a major reason for the continued violence there. The gold produces millions of dollars a month in wealth that must be protected. Miners pay armed groups to protect them from bandits, and other groups of "rebels." All that money buys plenty of guns and ammo. Without that, the fighting would be using spears and bows, inflicting far fewer casualties.

June 2, 2005 Unknown parties in the Ituri region fired on a UN helicopter patrol and, in a separate incident, kidnapped two employees of Doctors-without-Borders, and is apparently holding them for ransom.

June 3, 2005 Four Nepalese peacekeepers were wounded in a firefight with eastern Congolese militiamen. One of the wounded Nepalese later died. The Nepalese were part of a unit which was escorting a human rights investigating team in the area. The investigators were looking into allegations that rogue militiamen had committed several rapes in the village in April 2005. The investigating team's helicopter took ground fire from the village and the Nepalese troops fired back. A UN quick reaction force responded to the attack. The Nepalese solder was the 18th UN peacekeeper to die in the Congo. The UN later reported that the three wounded Nepalese troops who survived were flown to South Africa for further medical treatment. South Africa is, of course, a "first world" outpost of sorts in Africa. In sub-Saharan Africa, Kenya and Nigeria both have some quality medical facilities, but South Africa is tops. The UN is making use of South Africa's military and medical capabilities.

June 6, 2005 Armed militias continue to rape and plunder with impunity throughout the northeast. Each month, thousands of additional refugees are created.

June 7, 2005 With elections scheduled for later this year, MONUC, the UN mission in Congo, is anticipating increased activity by rebels, separatists, bandits, and foreign fighter hiding out in the country's northeastern and eastern regions. MONUC has requested additional personnel, including 2,800 more troops, to bring the total to some. 19,500, and nearly 900 more police officers, to bring the total to 1,200, to supplement the Congo's 93,000 strong security forces.

June 8, 2005 As part of the U.N. brokered peace settlement, the Congo agreed to integrate elements of the former rebel movements into its armed forces. Under South African and Belgian military guidance, three brigades (about 3,250 troops each) have completed an intensive light infantry training program. The results have been satisfactory. The first two brigades are already operating as part of the national military forces. The third has just completed training, and is to be assigned to work with MONUC, the UN peacemaking force, in the eastern Ituri region.

June 10, 2005 The UN is going after the illegal money that is paying for a lot of the guns, and gunmen, running around the Congo. Neighboring countries have long looked the other way as illegal mining and logging operations took place just across the border in Congo. Bribes and threats inside Congo have allowed an illegal economy to evolve, guarded by private armies. UN inspectors now have legal authority, and troops to back them up, to investigate businesses in these lawless border areas.

June 13, 2005 Three Indian soldiers, part of the UN peacekeeping force, were wounded in eastern Congo. One of the soldiers died, and the attackers got away before they could be identified. There are several rebel militias in the area, plus lots of bandits.

June 17, 2005 Congo continues to be the deadliest war zone on the planet, with over 30,000 people dying each month from the combined effects of combat, starvation and disease. Civilian populations are constantly fleeing the fighting, which often leads to starvation and disease as people try to survive in the bush. Several million people have died in a decade of civil war and rebellion in Congo.

July 1, 2005 The UN reports new major clashes between UN peacekeeping troops and rogue militias in the eastern Congo. On June 27 at least 300 UN peacekeepers tangled with 150 militia fighters in Ituri Province. The UN troops involved in the operation were Bangladeshi, Pakistani, and Moroccan. The UN force was in the village of Medu (north of Bunia) conducting a search operation (presumably a weapons search operation) when 150 militiamen attacked with mortars and RPGs. The firefight lasted eight hours, before the militia fighters withdrew. Two Indian Mi-25 attack helicopters supported the UN ground troops in the engagement. The militiamen apparently belonged to the Ituri Patriotic Resistance Front (FRPI). The government now estimates that 8000 to 10,000 militiamen remain in the eastern Congo, and 1,000 of these militiamen are armed. Rwandan sources say the total number of militiamen is closer to 15,000-- but it is the armed component that is of course the determinative figure. Until late May, the government and the UN were reporting some success in their disarmament program. The disarmament program includes "persuasive" programs (like trading bicycles for automatic rifles) as well as the active military operations.

July 3, 2005 Arms dealers, mainly in Eastern Europe, continue to ship in Cold War surplus weapons to eastern Congo. The gunrunning networks have been in place for over a decade, and UN arms embargoes have no impact on them.

July 4, 2005 About a thousand UN peacekeepers, aided by helicopter gunships, began attacking Rwandan rebels in eastern Congo. The peacekeepers are trying to either disarm the rebels, drive them back into Rwanda, or kill them. Most of the rebels, about 8,000 men, are Rwandan Hutus who fled to Congo ten years ago after they tried to kill all the Tutsi people in Rwanda. There are also several thousand armed men from eastern Congo, who have basically turned to banditry. Also in the northeast, some 3,000 soldiers mutinied, and attacked local civilians. The soldiers were former rebels belonging to the People's Armed Forces of Congo (FAPC). Such rebels were poorly disciplined, and had a hard time adapting to army discipline. The immediate cause of the rebellion was the murder of a soldier, but the main reason was poor leadership and training.

July 7, 2005 The UN is demanding that the government impose better discipline on the army. Too often, peacekeepers come across soldiers who are looting, or otherwise abusing civilians.

July 12, 2005 UN efforts to put military pressure on lawless militias in eastern Congo has caused the rebels to turn on local civilians. Some Rwandan gunmen forced villagers into huts, and then set the huts on fire, killing at least three dozen civilians (mostly women and children.) UN peacekeepers have flushed thousands of rebels out of their camps, but as these thugs move away from the peacekeepers, any civilians encountered are at great risk.

July 25, 2005 UN peacekeeping forces in eastern Congo began a new offensive operation against rebel militias. Dubbed "Operation Thunder Storm," the offensive began on July 21. A UN statement said "Thunder Storm" was aimed at driving Rwandan rebel militiamen in the FDLR (Democratic Forces for the Liberation of Rwanda) away from Congolese villages the militias had been threatening. (The FDLR and other "Rwandan militias" are primarily Hutu militias, but they often conduct raids with other tribal allies and bandits.) A 1200 troop "quick strike force" led the initial sweep. The force consisted of Pakistani infantry and some Guatemalan special forces troops. The UN said 200 Congolese ground troops were also involved in the operation. "Thunder Storm: targeted a 70 by 30 kilometer "box" in south Kivu province (what the UN report described as "the Kabare and Walungu territories"). The FDLR has said it would disarm but --as always-- the devil is in the details. The UN is also using a new military abbreviation to describe its military and political goals in the eastern Congo: DDRRR. That stands for disarmament, demobilization, repatriation, re-settlement and re-integration.

August 2, 2005 MSF (Doctors Without Borders) is halting aid work in Ituri province, outside the town of Bunia, because of continued violence by rebel groups. This has included attacks on MSF personnel. MSF was providing aid to about 100,000 refugees.

August 3, 2005 In southeastern Katanga (Shaba) province, fighting there was between the regular army and local Mayi-Mayi militiamen has caused some 15,000 civilians to flee their homes in the last three months. The UN does not have enough peacekeepers to deal with the Katanga violence, and the Congolese army is not strong enough to stop the militiamen.

August 11, 2005 Approximately 40 militiamen belonging to the Congolese Rally for Democracy-Goma (RCD-Goma) entered Uganda from the Congo on August 6. Approximately 100 civilians accompanied the militiamen. The RCD fighters and the civilians were "returned" to the Congo on August 9. The RCD fighters reported they had been "overrun" by a "big group" of Mayi-Mayi militiamen in the Congo's North Kivu Province. This left at least 21 of the RCD militiamen dead.. There are continuing "ethnic clashes" in North Kivu. The RCD-Goma faction joined the Congo's peace process. Though offensive sweeps by UN peacekeepers have been effective against hold-out militias in the eastern Congo, there are simply too few peacekeepers to provide police-type protection in the border areas.

August 21, 2005 Officials in the eastern region of Walungu report that in the first six months of 2005, 2,500 people were killed, and at least 1,500 women raped by various rebels.

August 22, 2005 Gunmen attacked voter registration centers in eastern Congo, killing one official, and wounding others.

August 24, 2005 Uganda has expelled six Congolese men, who are accused of plotting to overthrow the government of Congo.

August 25, 2005 Congo, Rwanda and Uganda have given armed Rwandan Hutu groups 30 days to disarm. Those who do not surrender their weapons, will be hunted down and killed or arrested by the armed forces of Congo, Rwanda and Uganda after that. These Hutus participated in the mass killings of minority Tutsi in Rwanda in 1994, and fled the country when Tutsi counterattacked and took control of Rwanda. Ever since, these Hutu groups have lived by plunder and banditry, sometimes making raids into Rwanda.

August 26, 2005 UN peacekeepers began operations in North and South Kivu provinces. Five company-sized units were involved. A South African company is deployed in South Kivu's Shabunda area. One aim of the operations is to disarm the Democratic Forces for the Liberation of Rwanda (FDLR), a rebel militia.

August 30, 2005 A former Congo general has said that he may lead a force to "invade" the eastern Congo in order to "bring peace." The threat may be linked to defections from the Congo Army (Congo Armed Forces) and new trouble among the Banyamulenge (a Tutsi ethnic group in eastern Congo).

August 31, 2005 There are unverified reports that the 53rd Army Battalion and four companies of the 2nd Mixed Battalion were "missing" (ie, possibly deserted). The units are located in the eastern Congo. The 53rd Battalion is based in Burungu, which is north of Goma (in North Kivu province). The companies in the 2nd Mixed Battalion were located in Kanyabayonga (which is north of Burungu). Most of the deserters appear to bee Congolese Tutsis, which reinforced the earlier reports that the dissident group were Banyamulenge.

September 1, 2005 An army battalion, and the families of the soldiers, in North Kivu province, have been disabled by an outbreak of cholera. The 3,000 people involved were moving via truck when the cholera hit. The convoy was halted so that the outbreak could be treated. So far, about two dozen have died, and a quarter of the people involved have been hospitalized.

September 7, 2005: The government has ordered foreign gunmen to leave the Congo by the end of September, or face attack from government troops and UN peacekeepers.

September 10, 2005: General Laurent Nkunda, a Congolese Tutsi warlord, is assembling a force of gunmen in northern Congo, and has announced his plans for overthrowing the government. Nkunda believes the government has it in for the Tutsi (who were the last group to settle the area over a century ago, and are still considered "outsiders"), and vows to strike first. Most of Nkunda's guys are little more than bandits. But they are armed, and do not hesitate when it comes to killing, looting and raping.

September 15, 2005: The 16,700 U.N. peacekeepers in Congo are costing over a billion dollars a year to maintain, and it isn't enough. Right now, most of the UN troops are concentrated in the north, to try and deal with Tutsi and Hutu militias. But in the south, local tribal gangs (the Mai-Mai, a traditional hunting society) are raiding at will. Government troops cannot deal with the Mai Mai, and UN troops are not available. When the situation in the north is taken care of, the Mai Mai will become a priority.

September 15, 2005: The army rebellion in the eastern Congo continues to sputter along. The Congo's military commander in North Kivu (8th Military Region) said another 350 Congo soldiers had "defected" to general Laurent Nkunda's "rebel force." The defecting troops primarily came from the 124th Battalion of the Congo army, stationed in the town of Katale. Most of the soldiers were ethnic Tutsis. The defections took place last week. Since the 124th bolted, a new Congo army battalion has moved into Katale. Nkunda may have established a headquarters in the town of Kichanga (which isn't far from the Rwandan border).

September 20, 2005: Rwandan Hutu militias show no sign of obeying the government order to get out of the country. The Hutu gunmen appear ready to fight. There appear to be 400 LRA fighters inside the Congo. This is far higher than the Ugandan government suggested last week. Meanwhile, the UN wants to extend the Congo peacekeeping operation for another year. MONUC says Congo forces are still too weak to counter rebel fighters and militias in the eastern Congo.

September 29, 2005: The more aggressive peacekeeping by UN troops is having the desired effect. Rebels are backing off, and behaving more often. The introduction of thousands of better trained and led Pakistani troops has had an impact as well. Often, poorly trained and equipped peacekeepers were overawed by more aggressive rebels. But the Pakistanis are a tough bunch, and usually get the other guys to blink first. The Pakistanis are also better disciplined than many of the African peacekeepers that operated in eastern Congo before. That means more cooperation from the locals.

September 29, 2005: The Congo government claimed that members of Uganda's Lord's Resistance Army (LRA) had fled into the Congo. The government statement said that the LRA fighters had attacked Congo civilians. The fighters also killed wildlife (including elephants) in a park inside the Congo. The Congo identified the LRA group's leader as Vincent Otti. The Congo reports follow Ugandan government statements that LRA fighters had fled into the Congo.

September 30, 2005: Over 10,000 foreign gunmen appear to have ignored government demands that they leave. Most of these gunmen are extremist Rwandan Hutu militiamen (guilty of Rwanda's 1994 genocide) and a smaller number of Ugandans and Burundians.

October 4, 2005: The UN airlifted (by helicopter) 300 Congolese troops into the northeastern Congo. The Congolese troops went to a site near the town of Aba. Meanwhile, 200 other Congo troops arrived by road convoy. Other Congolese forces are also moving into Aba. A UN spokesman said at least a thousand Congolese troops will deploy in the area. The UN command said the troop movement is in response to the presence of the Ugandan rebels belonging to the Lord's Resistance Army (LRA). The LRA group is reportedly inside the Garamba National Park (near the Ugandan border). On September 29, Uganda said that if the Congo did not stop the LRA infiltrators it would consider sending its own troops into the Congo. Uganda has deployed troops in the Congo before. Ugandan forces operated near the Congo town of Bunia for over two years.

October 6, 2005: The UN faces a major problem because the thousands of foreign rebels living along the eastern borders refuse to go home, and are moving out of the way of troops sent to chase them out. Getting these guys out of the region will be time consuming, and will be more of a police, than a military, operation. The gunmen have been living off banditry and foreign food aid. Being chased around the border area will induce hunger and fatigue, which may cause many of the gunmen to head across the border and become someone else's problem.

October 8, 2005: Prompt action by the army has forced some 400 Ugandan LRA rebels to move out of Congo, and back into Uganda.

October 11, 2005: In eastern Congo, Rwandan rebels crossed the border and murdered 15 villagers. The rebels were apparently raiding for supplies.

October 14, 2005: Troops had discovered at least two mass graves in North Kivu province. The graves may contain the bodies of Congolese Hutus killed in 1996 by Tutsi militias. The alleged massacres took place in October and November 1996. The Tutsi militias may have been part of a Rwandan operation intended to root out Rwandan Hutus who fled Rwanda after the genocide they commited against Tutsis in 1994.

October 16, 2005: Rwandan Hutu militias in the eastern Congo have turned several thousand civilians into refugees. The Rwandan Hutu group is identified as the "Rastas."

October 17, 2005: Over the weekend, fighting between troops and Hutu rebels in eastern Congo, left over a dozen people dead, including a Chinese technical advisor, who was caught in the middle of one firefight. Thousands of civilians fled the fighting.

October 18, 2005: A rogue Mai-Mai militia group, in a camp near the town of Bukavu in the eastern Congo, took 43 Congo government officers hostage. The government officers were working with the Congo's national disarmament commission, which is running a militia disarmament program. The militia unit, which numbers at least 500 men, threatened to burn the officials alive -- a massacre by incineration. The militiamen said they will kill the officers unless they commission paid them $110 for each weapon they turned in. The UN said this particular militia unit had in fact turned in its weapons, but the promised payment for turned in weapons was not made on time.

October 19, 2005: After negotiations, and a promise from the Congolese government that the bounties would be paid, the Mai-Mai militia unit released the officers being held near Bukava.

October 21, 2005: Fighting with Hutu and Mai-Mai rebels in eastern Congo appears unlikely to end any time soon. Peacekeeper morale is falling, because of the constant fighting, and poor living conditions. Eastern Congo is a hard place to get to, and peacekeepers are increasingly short of supplies.

October 23, 2005: UN peacekeepers went searching for illegal weapons and gunmen in the northeast. One Nepalese peacekeeper was wounded, but generally there was not much resistance. The militiamen often hid their weapons at the approach of peacekeepers. Illegal arms markets were also sought out, as cheap AK-47s, an aftereffect of the end of the Cold War in 1991, make much of the violence possible.

October 25, 2005: About a thousand of the estimated 15,000 armed militiamen in the northeast have been forced to give up their weapons. The army and peacekeeper patrols are supported by aircraft, providing the kind of military force the militiamen cannot handle. But most of these guys are just fleeing into the bush, to wait until the soldiers leave.

October 28, 2005: The UN extended the peacekeeping mandate in the Congo through September 30, 2006. UN Secretary-General Kofi Annan also requested that the MONUC peacekeeping force be authorized another 2,580 troops. At the moment the MONUC force has 18,630 people. 15,191 are peacekeeping troops and 324 are civilian policemen. The Security Council agreed to deploy another 300 troops in the Congo Katanga province. The unit combine light infantry and medical personnel.

October 30, 2005: As soldiers and peacekeepers clear gunmen out of areas in the northeast, they find a lawless society where death comes easy and just getting by is very hard. The country as a whole is short on law (few judges) and order (few police, lots of cheap weapons). While technically a wealthy country, many of the natural resources are being, literally, stolen by criminal gangs and corrupt officials. The Congo is a major mess, and no one has any idea what it would cost, or how long it would take to fix all the problems.

November 2, 2005: Soldiers freed four election workers who were being held captive by Mai-Mai militiamen. A gun battle left several dozen of the militiamen dead. UN observers deployed in the northeastern Congo (near the Garamba National Park), and found "no tangible evidence" that Ugandan LRA rebels are inside the Congo. One of the main UN military units in the area is a 144-man Nepalese infantry unit deployed near the town of Aba. The UN believes the LRA group moved into Sudan around November 1, but its troops will continue to monitor the area. The Nepalese unit has sent patrols north to the Congo villages of Mamuru and Banga, which are near the Congo-Sudan border.

November 10, 2005: UN peacekeepers and Congo troops announced that they were completing a large anti-militia operation in North Kivu province against Rwandan Hutu rebels and a Congolese militia. 2000 Congolese troops and500 UN troops participated in the operation. The operation was supported by helicopter gunships and light armored vehicles. Part of the operation went through the Viruga National Park area. The UN reported its troops destroyed several rebel camps inside the park. The operation captured 359 Mai-Mai militia men and 17 Rwandan Hutu rebels. The Rwandan's belonged to the Democratic Forces for the Liberation of Rwanda (FDLR), a militia organization which has refused to turn in its weapons.

November 12, 2005: Uganda still believes some LRA are hiding in the Congo. In late September Uganda said it would send troops into the Congo to fight the LRA rebels if the Congo did not take action against them. The UN patrols serve a a "political buffer" to keep Ugandan troops on their own side of the border.

November 13, 2005: The UN reported that judicial proceedings against militia leaders is starting to pay off. In the last several months UN peacekeepers andCongo soldiers have arrested many militia members for criminal activity andfailure to turn in weapons. Trials of senior militia leaders began in Octoberand several have been convicted. The UN estimates that fighting in Ituri province has killed at least 60,000 people. Militias and tribal fighting were responsible for the deaths. Jailing leaders alone won't end the militia threat. The UN is using a multi-million dollar development grant to build and improve roads in Ituri. Militiamen who turned in their weapons to peacekeepers (as part of the "weapons exchange" program) and continue to cooperate with the Congo government are being offered jobs on the roads. The Congo government also reported that the Mongbwalu gold mine, which was controlled by the "Kung Fu and Dragon" militia, is now under government control.

November 16, 2005: In the northeast, a thousand soldiers and 300 peacekeepers attacked the Revolutionary Movement of Congo, a militia that hasrefused to disarm. At least 19 militiamen, and one soldier, were killed in the fighting. The government believes that it has reduced the number of rebel militiamen in the northeast from 5,000 to 1,000 in the past six months.

November 23, 2005: New fighting broke out in Katanga province, as the army continued pursuing Mai-Mai militia fighters there. Between 50,000 and 60,000 civilians have fled the fighting. Katanga is a particularly sensitive area in the Congo. Katangan separatists launched rebellions in the 1960s and 1970s.

November 26, 2005: Over the last week, a MONUC operation In Itrui province (northeast Congo), has killed 57 rebels. UN troops from Pakistan, Morocco, and Bangladesh supported 700 Congo troops in the operation. The operation began November 21. The UN is trying to let Congolese troops take the lead in military operations when possible. Call it "Congolization."

November 28, 2005: Near the Ugandan border, Ugandan LRA rebels have been making vicious attacks on Congolese villages, causing several thousand villagers to flee their homes.

November 30, 2005: The parliament approved a law granting amnesty to those who killed and injured people during 1998-2002 civil war. For those who continued to fight after 2002, troops and police are being used to deal with them.

December 3, 2005: The UN believes that approximately 12,000 to 15,000 armed militiamen remain in the eastern Congo. From 10,000 to 12,000 of the militiamen are believed to be Hutu rebels from Rwanda. Another 1500 may be Ugandan rebels from various organizations and rebel factions.

Over the last two years, the UN's military operations have attempted to protect vulnerable civilians and disarm the rebels. The UN forces conduct offensive military operations, often with the goal of arresting senior rebel leaders. The UN has a diplomatic-political strategy to support these goals, and returning Hutu rebels to Rwanda is part of it. The UN claims that so far 12,000 "foreign militia members" have been sent back to their home countries (primarily Rwanda and Uganda, a few may have gone back to Burundi). The UN estimates that "two-thirds" of the returnees have gone to Rwanda and --yes-- the UN administrators believe that "many" of those who went back to Rwanda were either Hutu rebels or former Rwandan Army troops who were involved in the 1994 genocide. The UN "repatriation program" has been a voluntary program. But the program looks like it may become far-less "voluntary." UN officials are openly discussing (which is one way diplomats deliver threats) economic sanctions, legal pressure, and military options that will encourage rogue militias to leave the Congo and encourage "regional governments" (like Uganda and Rwanda) to accept them. Uganda and Rwanda would then assume some of the burden of disarming the militias. Of course, many militiamen know that returning to Rwanda means facing criminal trials. The militia leaders also know that abandoning their Congo base camps will weaken their forces, and in some cases shatter them. However, if the militiamen stay inside the Congo and refuse to disarm they risk attack by the UNs Pakistani, Bangladeshi, and South African peacekeepers. The threat of sanctions may nudge Ugandan and Rwandan government officials to negotiate with their various rebel organizations. Rebel leaders guilty of genocide won't get any deals, but some of their fighters might. That would reduce the number of troublemakers prowling the eastern Congo-- and diplomacy would reinforce military action. --Austin Bay

December 7, 2005: The UN said that the Congo government had Justin Ngole Dalo (nom de guerre "Koliba") the militia leader believed responsible for killing nine Bangladeshi peacekeepers in February 2005. The ambush Dalo led occurred in the eastern Congo's Itrui district. Dalo is also accused of murdering over one hundred civilians in Ituri. Dalo had been on the UN's "most wanted" list since the attacks in February.

December 10, 2005: Because of new militia attacks in the eastern Congo, 13,000 people have sought refuge in the town of Dubie (eastern Congo). The biggest problem was getting food into the area. The World Food Program said that is was in the process of airlifting 70 tons of food to the town of Mpiana (north of Dubie). The refugees fled fighting between Congo troops and rebel militiamen.

December 16, 2005: The UN reported that Congo police fired weapons into the air to break-up anti-constitution demonstrations in Kinshasha. There were also anti-constitution protests in the eastern Congo.

December 17, 2005: The UN and Congo government reported three poll stations in the capital of Kinshasha were attacked. One was attacked with explosives, the other two were hit with Molotov cocktails (fire bombs). Some factions in the current government have opposed the "power sharing" arrangements and are urging voters to reject the constitution, which will be voted on December 18. Rebel groups in the eastern Congo also oppose the constitution. Many people also think President Joseph Kabila has "manipulated" the constitution writing committee. The draft constitution lowers the minimum age for being president from 35 to 30. Kabila is 33. There are, however, some aspects of the constitution that demonstrate thought went into it, as well as knowledge of the Congo's divisions. The constitution would divide the country into 25 provinces. The provinces would have a great deal of autonomy. An attempt was made to create provinces that unite groups with common tribal and linguistic heritages.

December 19, 2005: Polls closed in the Congo in the constitutional referendum. The Independent Electoral Commission estimated voter turnout at 60 percent.

December 19, 2005: For the first time in 40 years, a democratic vote took place, to select a new constitution. Turnout was low, and there was some violence. More than 24 million voters were registered for the December 18 and 19 constitutional vote. Approval of the constitution means national elections sometime before June 30, 2006, and an end to President Joseph Kabila's current "transitional government." This will be the first vote in the Congo since 1970, when former dictator Mobutu Sese Seko ran unopposed from president in a rigged vote.

December 21, 2005: The UN believes there are 15,000 Hutu militia fighters still inside the eastern Congo. The Hutus are primarily from Rwanda, though some are from Burundi. Approximately 1,000 Ugandan rebels remain in the Congo. The UN Security Council passed another resolution threatening sanctions against rebel groups and rebel leaders (ie, militia leaders) who do not disarm. In the east, peacekeepers and army troops have begun moving against rebel militias.

December 22, 2005: The government said that with approximately 60 percent of the votes counted in the constitutional referendum, the "yes' vote was well ahead. 80 percent of the votes counter had approved the constitution.

December 24, 2005: A major military operation is taking place in the eastern Congo. A series of firefights took place near the town of Fataki. Nine UN peacekeepers and Congo troops died in the clash. Another report said one report said one UN peacekeeper and seven Congo troops. An estimated 30 Lendu tribal militiamen died in the firefights. UN peacekeepers from Nepal and 1500 Congo troops were involved the counter-militia operation. Getting accurate news out of these areas is difficult, because few journalists are willing to operate in such a lawless and dangerous environment.

December 25, 2005: Nepalese peacekeepers and Congolese troops continued fighting in Ituri. The UN and government forces took control of the town of Nioka on December 24. That operation is being conducted against a Lendu tribal militia which has refused to meet UN disarmament demands.

December 26, 2005: There was another upsurge of fighting in the eastern Congo. UN peacekeepers fought Ugandan ADF rebels in the northeast near the town of Beni on December 23 and 24. At least 35 militiamen were killed in the battle. One Indian peacekeeper was killed and four were wounded. Government forces had three dead and 16 wounded.

January 3, 2006: Some 11,000 people have fled fighting between Ugandan rebels and Congolese troops. The UN-backed offensive in northeastern Congo (Ituri) now involves 3,500 Congolese soldiers and 600 UN peacekeepers. The rebels belong to the Ugandan Allied Democratic Forces (ADF). All ADF camps in the area appear to have been destroyed.

January 7, 2006: The UN reported that fighting between Congolese military forces and the Mai-Mai militia in north Katanga province had forced between 100,000 and 120,000 people to flee their homes. The fighting began in mid-November when the Congo military began an operation to disarm various militias operating in Katanga. On December 1, 2005 one Mai-Mai militia force launched an attack on a refugee camp in Katanga's Bukhama region, further complicated the job of relief agencies. NGOs operating in the area said that Katanga is on the verge of a humanitarian crisis. The International Crisis Group believes that the crisis already exists. The UN also reported that a Mai-Mai "militia group" (an alliance?) appears to be forming in Katanga, under the leadership of Kyungu Mutanga (his nom de guerre is "Gedeon") Mutanga may be hiding out in Congo's Upemba National Park (a huge jungle preserve).

January 10, 2006: The UN is asking the European Union to provide an additional 800 peacekeepers for MONUC (the Congo peacekeeping force).

The UN wants the soldiers available for presidential, parliamentary and local elections, that are supposed to be held by June 2006. It is hoped France or Germany would contribute the battalion. It will be used as a "reserve force." Also, the UN is considering a proposal to shift some peacekeepers from Burundi to the Congo. The proposal would move the peacekeepers currently in Burundi into the Congo's province of Katanga. At present the UN has 100 troops in Katanga (up to 300 have been deployed there). The UN wants to deploy at least 2500 troops in the province.

January 11, 2006: As horrific as the eight years of civil war has been, even more Congolese have died from bad government during, and before that period. The fighting is being reduced faster than the government administration is being improved. Long after the fighting has stopped, massive numbers of people will still be dying from the corruption and incompetence of government officials.

January 23, 2006: Eight UN troops were killed. They were from a Guatemalan special operations contingent operating near the Ugandan border. Guatemala's special ops unit is a Ranger-like, commando organization called the Kaibil, named after a Mayan warrior who waged war against the Spanish. The troops are called "Kaibiles." The soldiers were believed to have been part of a UN operation intended to arrest LRA rebel leader Vincent Otti. UN forces were conducting operations and recon missions in the area. Some 80 Guatemalans were involved in the "recon." Some 15 LRA guerrillas may have died in the firefight with the Guatemalans. The Ugandan government still claims that Otti is hiding out in the northeastern Congo, in or near the Garamba National Park. The UN and Congo government have assured Uganda that every effort will be made to either arrest Otti and deny the LRA base areas in the Congo. The UN also reported that an insurgent militia launched attacks in North Kivu province (eastern Congo). The UN said militia attacks in the area began to increase in mid-January. Several NGOs have been forced to suspend operations in the area. The militias launching the attacks may be aligned with General Nkunda.

February 2, 2006: The Congolese government said that its forces and UN peacekeepers intended to arrest General Laurent Nkunda (for allegedly leading attacks on government and UN forces). In 2004 troops under his command took control of the town of Bukavu. Nkunda has also said he would resist the Kinshasha government. Nkunda is supposed to be operating in the eastern Congo near the Rwandan border.

February 6, 2006; Rogue militia attacks in North Kivu province have once again disrupted efforts to aid refugees. Fighting which raged from mid-January to early February left 37,000 refugees without aid and support. This is why the "secondary effects" of fighting in less-developed countries often kills more people than the fighting. Hunger may not lead to starvation but poor diet leaves refugees susceptible to diseases, which kill more quickly than starvation. Exposure to the weather also kills refugees.

February 7, 2006: Uganda claimed that LRA leader Joseph Kony had left Sudan and is now hiding out in the northeastern Congo. The Ugandan military said Kony "fled a base" in Sudan near Juba (in south Sudan). Kony left the base on February 5. Ugandan troops were operating in the area of the base camp. Kony may be in the Congo, in the Garamba National Park area. Garamaba is where eight Guatemalan peacekeepers died in an ambush on January 23. The Guatemalan commandos were believed to be trying to arrest another LRA leader. The Congo government and the UN have assured Uganda that it will stop LRA infiltrators and arrest LRA members in the Congo.

February 8, 2006; The UN warned the government that UN troops operating in the DRC will not work with Congolese troops who commit human rights violations. The UN force in the Congo (MONUC) reported that it has received detailed complaints accusing the Congolese military of crimes including rape and murder. A senior officer with the peacekeeping force said, "We can't continue to support these forces if they commit human rights violations. Otherwise we become party to these actions." That quote states the situation clearly and succinctly. The UN is trying to defeat and disarm rogue militias in the eastern Congo and build a a capable, responsible Congolese military force-- shades of the US situation in Iraq. The truth is, the Congolese Army is a collection of former militias, national units, and some tribal contingents. Tribal issues divide the military. Sometimes tribal squabbles erupt and members of the military -- who are supposed to provide security instead of stopping the fighting, join it because kin are involved.

February 13, 2006: The UN is evaluating peacekeeping efforts in the Congo. A summary of the report is available at which is the MONUC website. The UN mission in the Congo has been plagued by allegations crime and malfeasance. To their credit, the UN and member nations involved in the peacekeeping operations have investigated, tried and convicted a number of soldiers for sex crimes, theft, and other violent crimes. MONUC's experience in the Congo has confirmed that a "two tier" system definitely exists in UN combat operations. There are the forces that can handle "presence and security operations" (ie, these forces can guard installations, conduct basic patrols, protect NGO operations, etc) and then there are units which can actually conduct combat operations (strike and rapid reaction operations) against rogue militias and rebels. The South Africans and Pakistanis have been particularly effective in the "strike and rapid reaction" operations. The Guatemalan special forces troops have also shown their mettle. These three nations are not the only ones providing superior troops. Almost every nation can field a small elite force, and for many nations UN duty is not only a chance to demonstrate military skills, but to demonstrate those skills and get a pay check in hard currency. That being said, South Africa and Pakistan have done yeoman's duty in the Congo. Bangladeshi soldiers have also earned kudos. What's the common denominator? British training methods is one. South African was a British colony. Pakistan and Bangladesh were once part of India. As for Guatemala's special forces contingent? Guatemala fought a civil war for thirty years. The Guatemalan special forces know how to "do jungles."

February 19, 2006: The government officially ratified the new constitution. Approximately 85 percent of voters approved the constitution in the plebiscite held in December 2005.

February 21, 2006: Congolese and Ugandan sources both report that it is "highly likely" Lords Resistance Army (LRA) leader Joseph Kony is now inside the Congo. Kony's second in command, Vincent Otti, has been allegedly hiding out in the northeastern Congo, in or near the Garamba National Park. A Congolese source reported that the LRA rebels inside the Congo number approximately 100 fighters. In January 2006, eight UN peacekeepers from Guatemala died in an operation in the Garamba National Park area. The Guatemalan special forces soldiers may have been on a mission to capture Otti.

February 22, 2006: The European Union is under UN pressure to supply a rapid deployment force for the Congo. The unit would be available to support the Congolese armed forces during the critical national elections in June 2006. The UN doesn't care who supplies the force, as long as the troops can fight. An effective rapid deployment (or rapid reaction) force would have to be airmobile (be liftable by helicopters) or air-transportable (able to be carried by transport aircraft). This means the force would be light infantry with some light armor support (ie, light wheeled armored vehicles like the US Marines' LAV).

February 27, 2006: Belgium and Sweden said they would contribute troops to an enhanced UN peacekeeping operation in the Congo. The enhanced force would deploy in time to help protect and facilitate the elections scheduled for June. France and Germany have already agreed to provide additional troops. The Congo was once a Belgian colony and was known as the Belgian Congo. UN troops and the Congolese Army began an offensive operation against the MRC, with some 2,500 army, and 500 UN, troops participating in the operation.

March 1, 2006: Fifty government soldiers mutinied, looting a UN camp in the village of Aveba (south of Bunia in Ituri province). So far, six militiamen had been killed in operations against the MRC. One Pakistani troop serving with the UN force has been wounded in the operation. Because of superior training and experience, Pakistani and South African troops usually man UN "rapid reaction" units in the eastern Congo.

March 2, 2006: Fighting broke out between the Congolese Army (FARDC) and the Congo Resistance Movement (MRC) militia. The fighting occurred around the town of Tchei (northeastern DRC, south of Bunia). The situation became even more complicated when the militia rebels took 8000 civilians as hostages. The militia used the people as "human shields." Congolese Army mutineers in Aveba attacked a UN helicopter that was trying to land near the village.

March 4, 2006: The newly organized army units are being withdrawn from action, and given more training. The troops have proven unreliable, and too prone to act like the militiamen and bandits many of them had been previously. Army troops tend to have had years of experience as irregular fighters, and only a few months formal, and quite recent, military training. The weakest link is the low level leadership (NCOs and junior officers what command platoons and companies.) Creating these junior leaders can take years.

March 7, 2006: In the east, UN and army troops continue fighting rebels.

March 8, 2006: In the east, the UN declared South Kivu province free of rebel units, although small groups of bandits are still wandering around. The fighting had been going on since February 22nd, and mainly targeted the Rwandan FDLR militia.

March 10, 2006: In the capital, political demonstrations clashed with riot police.

March 13, 2006: In eastern Congo, the FNI militia clashed with the army, leaving 13 rebels dead, and several soldiers wounded. Some 10,000 local civilians fled the fighting. The FNI retreated, killing civilians they encountered as they went. Along the Ugandan border, troops coordinated their operations with Ugandan army units across the border, to prevent rebel units from escaping.

March 14, 2006: The army is performing not much differently from the warlord militias they fight, because the army is poorly paid, and led. Often former warlord fighters, the soldiers have not had much training, and are often commanded by officers and sergeants who are also former irregulars. Just renaming poorly trained gunmen as "soldiers" doesn't make it so. And in the field, the "soldiers" behave as they used to, raping and looting more than fighting the bandits and warlord gunmen.

March 16, 2006: A Congolese general, Widi Mbuilu Divioka, was accused of corruption after twenty of his soldiers starved to death. This happened because the general had taken the trucks meant to move military supplies to military bases in the south, and used the vehicles to operate a commercial trucking operation. The soldiers were left to fend for themselves, and many simply starved. UN aid workers found out about it, and got after the government to do something about it.

March 18, 2006: The first Congolese warlord, Thomas Lubanga, has been extradited to the Netherlands to stand trial for war crimes. He was arrested a year ago, for crimes committed in the late 1990s, and up until a few years ago. There are still people like Lubanga out there, but they still have their private armies, and have successfully resisted arrest.

March 22, 2006: UN peacekeepers captured a senior Lord's Resistance Army (LRA) leader inside the Congo's Garamba National Park. The LRA officer was identified as a captain. The UN said a number of Ugandan LRA rebels have entered the Congo posing as refugees from Sudan.

March 24, 2006: The UN will increase the number of peacekeepers and humanitarian aid workers deployed in the Congo's Katanga province. Mai Mai militiamen had taken control of parts of Katanga and committed numerous atrocities. The Congolese Army (FARDC) hasn't been able to stop the rogue militias operating in Katanga. Refugees in Katanga have accused the FARDC of stealing from refugees.

March 24, 2006: The fighting in the eastern Congo has caused more than the usual disruption, and closed roads more frequently (because of shooting and the presence of angry men with guns). This is kept food from reaching refugee camps, or towns that are still functioning. The result has been an increase in deaths from starvation and disease.

March 25, 2006: The June elections may not work, not because of corruption, or inability to vote, but because of a lack of candidates. As of yesterday, only a hundred people had paid the $250 fee to run for one of the 500 parliament seats. The deadline for applying has been extended for ten days.

April 3, 2006: Congolese rebels (The Congolese Revolution Movement, or CRM, also called the Congolese Revolutionary Movement) were contacted by the Ugandan Lord's Resistance Army (LRA). The Ugandan rebels wanted to establish an alliance with the CRM. The CRM refused the offer. The LRA offered to provide arms and ammunition if the CRM agreed to "merge." There was no independent confirmation of this story but there's no doubt the LRA is hard up for allies. The LRA is being driven out of its camps in south Sudan. The UN believes its operations in the northeastern DRC have damaged the LRA.

April 4, 2006: The UN will redeploy peacekeeping troops currently serving in Burundi to the Congo. By the end of 2006, one infantry battalion and 50 military observers will be transferred from Burundi to the Congo. The European Union said that 1500 EU troops will deploy to the Congo by the end of May to help provide security for June's elections. Germany is leading the operation. Nine other European nations will contribute troops. The EU said approximately 400 of the troops will deploy in and around the Congolese capital of Kinshasha.

April 6, 2006: There are 73 candidates running for president in the upcoming elections, and 8,650 candidates for the 500 seat parliament. But the largest party in the country, the UDPS, is boycotting the elections, because they believe the vote is rigged in favor of the existing president Kabila and his cronies. The vote will be the first free election since the 1960s, and is expected to show how split, into regional and tribal factions, the country is.

April 13, 2006: Some 750 Congolese Army and 100 U.N. soldiers were involved in an offensive operation against Rwandan rebels in the eastern Congo. The UN report said that "small groups" of Rwandan Hutu rebels had been identified in North Kivu province. The rebels had been looting villages in the area. The Congo and UN are trying to repatriate foreign rebel groups (i.e. Burundian, Rwandan, and Ugandan groups). In the case of Rwanda, many of the rebels in the Congo face charges of mass murder and genocide if they are arrested by UN troops orare returned to Rwanda.

April 14, 2006: The government said that seven soldiers were convicted of crimes against humanity. The soldiers received sentences of life in prison. Their crimes included theft, mutiny, and participation in mass rape. The crimes were committed in December 2003. Five other soldiers were acquitted of similar charges. The twelve accused troops were originally members of the rebel Movement for the Liberation of the Congo (MLC). Their guerrilla unit was made part of the Congolese Army.

April 16, 2006: Two more peacekeeping battalions will be deployed to Katanga later this year: a Pakistani battalion (750 troops) and a battalion from Benin (600 to 650 troops). The Pakistani unit is currently deployed in Burundi. A Jordanian hospital will also deploy from Burundi to Katanga. The combat troops will be used to control rogue Mayi-Mayi militia units which (according to the UN and NGOs) have committed crimes and atrocities throughout Katanga. The UN reported that Mayi-Mayi depredations have forced nearly 200,000 people to flee their homes.

May 1, 2006: Rwandan Hutu rebels attacked a village north of Goma (Congo-Rwanda border), killing seven civilians. Rwandan Hutu rebels struck a Congolese military camp. The Rwandan rebels operate as a militia force. Troops killed six Hutu rebels, losing two soldiers. It's estimated that there are 10,000 Hutu rebels in the Congo. most are Rwandan Hutus who were involved in the 1994 Rwandan genocide. The remainder are Burundian Hutus.

May 2, 2006: The Congo government changed the date of this summer's scheduled presidential elections. The new election date is July 30. The planned election date was June 18. The big concern remains security.

1500 European Union troops are scheduled to deploy to the Congo to help UN peacekeepers and the Congolese military protect the elections.

May 4, 2006: Army units forced 4,500 civilian refugees in a camp near the town of Tchomia to leave the camp. The Army told the civilians that militiamen were hiding in the camp. Tchomia is in Ituri province. The 4,5000 civilians left the camp. It was reported that soldiers told the civilians they would be shot if they remained in the camp.

May 6, 2006: Some 356,000 people in the Congo are "internally displaced" by fighting or the threat of violence. Most of the Internally Displaced Persons (IDPs) are in the eastern and southern portions of the Congo. Approximately 200,000 of the IDPs are in Ituri province (eastern Congo).

May 8, 2006: Over the weekend, nearly 200 Mayi-Mayi rebels, and their families, surrendered to troops in the southeast. About fifty of the rebels were armed, and apparently belonged to one of the many Mayi-Mayi factions that refused to join an earlier deal with the government.

May 9, 2006: The government will try to form and deploy 18 security brigades in time for the July 30 elections. There are 9,630 candidates running for 500 seats in the parliament, while 33 are competing for the presidency.

May 12, 2006: Mai-Mai militia leader Kyungu Mutanga (nom de guerre "Gedeon"), surrendered to UN forces in Katanga province. Gedeon was accompanied by approximately 150 fighters (some of them described as "child soldiers" in press reports). This is a victory for the UN's political program which offers a limited amnesty to militia fighters if they turn in themselves and their weapons. The program is called the Disarmament, Demobilization, and Reintegration program. (The acronym is DDR.)

May 17, 2006: An army operation captured Innocent Kaina, a rogue Congolese militia leader. Kaina was wounded when he was captured. UN peacekeepers took Kaina to Bunia (Ituri province in the Congo). Kaina was a member of the Congolese Revolutionary Movement (MRC).

May 18, 2006:The UN's electoral effort in the Congo as the UN's "largest electoral operation." 26 million voters have registered. That is an "unexpectedly" high figure. The Congo's size, lack of transportation infrastructure, and continuing civil war make this the UN's biggest electoral challenge.

May 19, 2006: Uganda said that the Congo government and the UN would be "responsible" for any murders and abductions by the LRA if they allowed the LRA to "reorganize" inside the Congo. Uganda continues to press the UN to attack the LRA which it believes is "refitting" in the northeastern DRC near the Sudan border.

May 20, 2006: UN peacekeeping forces launched another anti-militia offensive earlier this week in the northeastern Congo. The offensive is in support of upcoming national elections (presidential and legislative) scheduled for July 30. One goal of the offensive is to secure the town of Tchei (Ituri area, northeastern Congo). Congolese troops (from the Congolese Armed Forces, or FARDC) and UN troops are participating in the offensive. The UN troops are from Bangladesh, Pakistan and South Africa. These three countries have been supplying the bulk of the UN's "strike force" in the eastern Congo. The action around Tchei is being supported by attack helicopters and armored vehicles. A Congo government spokesman said that approximately 2000 militiamen were in the Tchei area. The Congolese Revolutionary Movement (MRC, also called the Revolutionary Movement of the Congo) has used Tchei as a base. MRC leader Innocent Kaina was captured on May 17 in the first phases of this offensive.

May 22, 2006: Some 3,000 troops, and a thousand UN peacekeepers, battled rebel militias in the eastern Congo, leaving over three dozen dead in the last few days.

May 28, 2006: A rogue militia (the Front for National Integration, or FNI) has captured seven Nepalese peacekeepers. The soldiers were part of an operation in Ituri province near the town of Tsupu. The operation was described as one intended to support the upcoming July national elections (which in Ituri means it was going after militias that have not turned in their arms). One Nepalese soldier was killed in a firefight (on the same operation) and three were wounded. The militia was identified as a group loyal to Peter Karim. The Nepalese soldier killed in action was the first UN loss since eight Guatemalans were killed in January 2006. The Guatemalans were part of an operation against elements of the Ugandan rebel group the Lord's Resistance Army. Seventy-four UN peacekeepers have been killed in the Congo since peacekeeping operations began in 1999.

May 31, 2006: The UN said that the militia holding UN troops as hostages must release them or "face the consequences." At least 73 militiamen have died in fighting in Ituri province over the last week, along with 13 soldiers. The militiamen were killed in UN and Congolese Army (FARDC) operations. Two operations took place near the towns of Joo and Tchei (southwest Ituri). The other operation was in northern Ituri (Tsupu area). The UN still lists the seven Nepalese peacekeepers captured by a militia in Ituri as "missing." Apparently the militia is demanding $20,000 ransom for each of the soldiers. The UN refuses to pay, and threatens dire consequences if the peacekeepers are not freed.

June 3, 2006: The seven Nepalese peacekeepers captured by rebels in Ituri have been freed. The UN says it did not pay ransom, but that the rebels gave into threats that rebel leaders would be held personally responsible if the peacekeepers were not released quickly.

June 21, 2006: The first contingent of EUFOR DRCongo, 179 French troops, arrived in the Congo. MONUC reported the situation in South Kivu remained calm, though the FDLR militia remained a threat. The UN's South Kivu Brigade has established four Mobile Operating Bases in South Kivu. One base is located at Bunyakiri. Militias in Ituri district (northeast Congo) have until June 30 to complete disarmament. The UN has two disarmament sites in Ituri, one at Aveba (south of the capital of Bunia), and one at Kpandroma. Militiamen who turn in their arms prior to June 30 will receive amnesty from the Congolese government. Those who fail to do so will be forcibly disarmed by the UN and Congolese forces. The UN is trying to convince as many militiamen as possible to turn in their arms peaceably, However, look for a new counter-militia offensive in Ituri beginning in early July as part of the UN's election security operations. The UN estimates 4000 armed militiamen remain in Ituri. This is down from the 16,000 armed militiamen believed to be operating in Ituri at the beginning of 2006. Most of the 4000 still under arms are part of the Congolese Revolutionary Movement (MRC).

June 26, 2006: Lead elements of the European Unions Force for the DRC (EUFOR DRCongo) have been arriving in the Congo. EUFOR DRCongo will deploy 2000 troops in Congo to the protect the national elections (scheduled for July 30). Some 800 European peacekeepers will deploy in Kinshasha. The EU force has a mandate to remain in Congo up to four months after the election. South Africa will send 300 election monitors and technicians to support the election.

June 27, 2006: A militia group in eastern Congo released two Nepalese peacekeepers. The two men were taken captive May 28 in Ituri. Five other Nepalese peacekeepers remain missing.

June 28, 2006: Turkey is sending 17 troops to serve with the European election protection forces in Congo. Turkey will also contribute one C-130 transport aircraft. Transport aircraft and helicopters are critical equipment. The Congo is a huge country. The UN and the Congolese government have decided to deploy as many Congolese police as possible to provide security to voters, then back up the police with international peacekeepers and elite Congolese police deploying as "rapid reaction forces" should trouble occur. C-130s and other tactical transports will deliver the RRFs to the hotspots.

June 29, 2006: UN and Japanese trainers have helped raise two companies of special Congolese police. The companies comprise the Mobile Intervention Group (Congo use the French acronym GMI). The GMI are part of the National Congolese Police. The GMI will be used as a mobile security unit during the upcoming elections. The UN has trained 14,000 new Congolese police officers. 32,000 new police officers have been trained by other nations and international agencies.

June 30, 3006: The UN said Congolese security forces (a military police unit) killed 12 civilians in the town of Matadi. The people killed were participating in an "anti-government protest." Many of the protestors in Matadi belong to the Bundi Dia Kongo movement. The group is a separatist group which wants to re-establish "the Kongo Kingdom." The kingdom would include parts of Congo, Gabon, and Angola. Matadi is Congo's main port (near the mouth of the Congo River). Earlier in June a number of labor strikes occurred in Matadi.

July 4, 2006: Some 670 of 1200 European soldiers (European Union Force for the DRC) have already deployed in Kinshasha. A rogue militia has once again taken control of the town of Tchei in eastern Congo (Ituri province). UN peacekeepers took Tchei in a major offensive at the end of May. In late June (June 26 in one account) UN peacekeepers withdrew from Tchei and were replaced by Congolese Army troops. The militia forces started a counter-attack on either June 30 or July 1. The Congolese Army troops withdrew after "several deaths" and 18 wounded. No question-- this is a huge setback for the Congolese government. The Congolese Army defeat once again demonstrates the army's ineffectiveness. Without UN troops as a back up (usually South Africans, Bangladeshis or Pakistanis in a "reaction force") the Congolese Army at best offers token resistance.

July 6, 2006: A Russian An-12 cargo plane in eastern Congo crashed. Three Russian airman and one Congolese civilian died. The plane was flying from Goma to Kisangani and was operated by Mango Airlines.

The UN extended the deadline for militia disarmament to July 15. The UN reported a recent surge in militiamen turning in weapons. The UN issued a "forced disarmament" order that said militiamen who fail to meet the disarmament deadline will be arrested. Apparently a number of militiamen have had second thoughts about keeping their weapons. India announced that it will send another infantry battalion to Congo. The 2nd Battalion Rajputana Rifles will be fully deployed in Katanga province before the end of July. The unit will begin deploying to Congo on July 15. India already has a brigade committed to UN operations in Congo.

July 7, 2006: The Congo government and the UN said that another 2600 militiamen had turned in their weapons in Ituri province.

July 10, 2006: Five Nepalese peacekeepers had been released by a militia group in northeast Congo. The Nepalese had been held since May 27. Two men captured Nepalese peacekeepers were released on June 27. At one time it was believed that the militiamen demanded ransom. The UN said no ransom was paid to the FNI (Front des Nationalistes et des Integrationistes).

July 14, 2006: Uganda claimed that the rebel Allied Democrstic Forces (ADF) is recruiting child soldiers inside Congo. The successful amnesty program has reduced the number of rogue militiamen operating in eastern Congo. That means there are fewer counter-militia operations by UN peacekeepers. Uganda claimed that the ADF is "using the break in operations" to rebuild and regroup. Ugnda fears the ADF will use the eastern Congo as a base area.

July 17, 2006: Pre-election violence is increasing and in a country the size of Congo, there just aren't enough peacekeepers and trained police to go around.. Unidentified gunmen shot and killed seven people who were participating in an election rally in the town Rutshuru in Kivo province (eastern Congo). The rally was being held for independent candidate Jean-Luc Mutokambale. On July 17 four people died when a gunfight erupted at a political meeting in Kinshasha.

July 18, 2006: The German troop contingent, for the Congo election, is now deployed. Germany has 780 soldiers serving with the EU election-protection force in Congo.

July 19, 2006: CIAT (International committee to Support the Transition, ie , transition to democracy) issued a statement that said the Congolese Army and the presidential guard should be confined to their bases on election day, July 30. Many NGOs and observers have concluded the Congolese Army is "too politicized" to be trusted to keep the peace on election day. The presidential guard has 15,000 troops -- so it is a sizeable force. CIAT recommended that international peacekeepers and Congolese police handle the security duties. As it is, there are too few real security troops available to fully protect voters on election day. The July 30 election is a huge political event. The ballot in the capital city of Kinshasha is also big-- literally. Western press sources reported that the ballot will be six pages long with the names and photos of 800 candidates. That's right, 800 candidates for 17 seats. 500 seats in parliament are up for grabs nation-wide.

July 20, 2006: The FNI militia organization, in Ituri, decided to turn in its arms and apply for amnesty. The FNI (Front des Nationalistes et Integrationnistes) had earlier gained some notoriety when it abducted several UN peacekeepers. The FNI leadership requested that their gunmen be integrated into the Congolese Army. The FNI fielded 1000 militia fighters. The FNI surrender means over 4000 militiamen have turned in their arms since mid-June.

July 28, 2006: An Unmanned Aerial Vehicle (UAV) operated by Belgian troops serving with EUFOR (European Forces peacekeeping mission in the Congo) crashed in Kinshasha. Five people were reportedly injured. EUFOR has 2200 troops deployed in and near the Congo (1200 EU troops are in Gabon serving as a rapid reaction force). On July 27 French jets supporting EUFOR reportedly over flew a compound where opposition candidate Jean-Pierre Bemba was located. Riots broke out in the neighborhood around the compound and six people died.

July 30, 2006: Congo conducted its first multi-arty election in over forty years. There were 33 candidates for president in the election. However, the MRC may be ready to make a deal with the government. The government attributed the MRC "deal" to the successful July 30 elections. The "deal" maybe both old news and slow news, since reported appeared in mid-July that the MRC would agree to "demobilize." The MRC said that "free and fair" elections were an MRC goal and the July 30 elections were a promising sign. The UN gave militias until July 15 to demobilize or face another UN "counter militia" offensive. The best bet is that the UN will prepare for counter-militia offensive operations but wait to see if the fact the elections were held without significant violence will help "coax" recalcitrant rebel groups in from the bush. Two renegade militias operating in Congo are still recruiting members. The Democratic Forces for the Liberation of Rwanda (FDLR) and the Congolese Revolutionary Movement (MRC) have not disarmed or disbanded. Both the FDLR and the MRC are accused of "recruiting" child soldiers in ways reminiscent of Uganda's LRA. The children are kidnapped and used as arms and food carriers, though some are occasionally given weapons.

August 1, 2006: International journalists reported meeting with Ugandan LRA rebel leader Joseph Kony in the Garamba Forest (northeast DRC, near Sudan border). Kony told the journalists that his offer of peace talks with Uganda was "genuine." The journalists said that some people attending the meeting were escorted by Sudanese SPLA fighters (Sudan Peoples Liberation Army). Several sources reported that the meeting definitely occurred inside Congolese territory. Uganda has repeatedly accused Congo of failing to arrest LRA rebels in Congo and of allowing the LRA to have base camps on Congolese territory. In January UN peacekeepers launched a series of raids into the Garamba forest area, allegedly against LRA base camps.

August 2, 2006: The UN warned against "premature" announcements of election victory. The UN statement said that the results of the July 30 election would take time. Voter turnout was estimated as being "high" but no official figures were available. A UN spokesman pointed out that Congo is the size of western Europe and that collecting the ballots in a nation with few roads (ie, poor transportation infrastructure) complicated the ballot collecting process. A European Union spokesman said that initial reports from European election observers were positive. The election appeared to have been "free and peaceful."

August 4, 2006: Call it more than typical Congolese chaos. Congo vote-counters are examining warehouses of paper ballots from the July 30 national elections. Ballots from 50,000 voting places are being counter in 62 centers. The UN initially said the election results could be announced.

August 9, 2006: The European Union said that it would keep its 1100 troop peacekeeping force in Kinshasha, the Congo's capital. However, only 200 of the troops are combat troops. The EU force will stay in Kinshasha to help maintain stability when the Congolese national election results are finalized. 1300 EU peackeepers are also on-call in Gabon. The 1300 troops in Gabon provide a rapid reaction force to reinforce the peacekeepers in Kinshasha and UN troops throughout the Congo.

August 14, 2006: Two Army units fought a battle against one another on August 5 in the eastern Congo. The units were from the 9th Brigade and the 83rd Brigade. The fight took place in the town of Sake. Many Congolese Army units are "national army" in name only. The 83rd Brigade reportedly has many former rebels who belonged to the Congolese Rally for Democracy (specifically the RCD-Goma, a primarily Congolese Tutsi organization). The RCD-Goma was regarded as an ally of the Rwandan government. Many RCD-Goma backers now support Laurent Nkunda, a former RCD rebel leader. The August 5 firefight was big enough to attract some press coverage, but tensions between former rebels and troops loyal to the Congolese government have provoked other skirmishes or near skirmishes. The big worry among international peacekeepers is that these tensions could break out into renewed fighting after the national election results are finalized.

August 15, 2006: The FDLR (Democratic Forces for the Liberation of Rwanda) are once again conducting "forced conscription" of child soldiers in North and South Kivu provinces. Bolivia deployed 230 troops in the eastern Congo. The troops replace a contingent of Bolivians that have been serving with UN forces.

August 16, 2006: Over half of the election ballots have been processed.

The current Congolese president, Joseph Kabila remains in the lead.

August 17, 2006: Angola has beefed up its troop contingents along its border with Congo. The Angolan troops began moving on August 13 and the buildup has continued.. Angola expects the impending announcement of the winner of the Congolese presidential election will lead to trouble inside the Congo. The announcement is scheduled for August 20 (but could still be delayed). The troop movement was described as a "defensive" precaution. The Angolan government supported the Congolese government during the Congo War (1998-2003). In the eyes of many Congolese that makes Angola a "quiet ally" of the Kabila government. (Laurent Kabila was president of the Congo until he was assassinated in 2001. Joseph Kabila Kabange, Laurent's son, succeeded his father.) There are apparently at least four Angolan battalions on the border. The Angolan deployment includes helicopters and armored vehicles. That means between 3000 and 4000 troops have been deployed. It is very doubtful that Angola would act on Kabila's behalf in the event of trouble in the Congo, though that cannot be ruled out. Four battalions looks like more of a "political message" signaling Congolese rebels that Angola has an interest in a peaceful acceptance of the election results. The Angolans also fear unrest in the Congo could send a wave of refugees across the border.

Refugees create political and social problems and taking care of them is expensive, even if the UN and aid NGOs ultimately share the costs of refugee relief.

August 18, 2006: The UN announced an investigation into accusations that its peacekeepers were running, or using, a child prostitution ring. Prostitution is common in Congo, and big business around bases where UN troops, or civilian officials, live. Because of the risk of AIDS, the pimps and brothel owners have been using younger and younger girls. This quickly becomes, by Western definitions, child prostitution. Until about two years ago, the UN ignored the use of prostitutes by its peacekeeper staff. No longer, and the continued use of prostitutes by peacekeepers has become a major headache for the UN.

August 20, 2006: The latest estimate is it will take three weeks to count the votes (pushing the date to at least August 25), and that may be optimistic. There are already charges of fraud because of the slow-pace of the counting and the lack of control over the ballots. Challenger (and former rebel leader) Jean-Pierre Bemba has declared himself winner. Current President Joseph Kabila's supporters claim Kabila won the election (shades of Mexico's current electoral standoff). Still, there are some reasons for optimism. The election came off with comparatively little violence. The presence of UN and European peacekeepers is credited with minimizing the violence ?" at least minimizing violence so far.

August 20, 2006: The Congo's Independent Electoral Commission announced the results of the July 30 election. President Joseph Kabila got 44 percent of the vote and Jean-Pierre Bemba 20 percent. A run-off is scheduled for October. 31 other presidential candidates split the remainder. Election officials said 16.9 million ballots were cast.

On August 21, elements of the presidential guard (loyal to Kabila) attacked Bemba's supporters and positions near Bemba's Kinshasha compound. The presidential guard had tank support in their attack. The presidential guard (which is essentially Kabila's militia) has approximately 15,000 soldiers. A UN source said that 150 UN troops in armored vehicles drove into Bemba's neighborhood and helped extract "foreign envoys" in the area.

August 22, 2006: Uganda warned that it would send its forces into the eastern Congo to "root out" the LRA is the current round of peace talks with the LRA falters. Uganda said that it would not allow the LRA to "regroup and recruit" new members. Uganda maintains that the LRA is now operating out of the Congo's Garamba National Park area.

As of August 22, 15 people had died in the fighting. President Joseph Kabila's supporters claimed that opposition leader Jean-Pierre Bemba's armed supporters (his political party's militia) tried to "shut down Kinshasha" on August 20 in order to prevent the announcement of the July 30 presidential election results. Bemba supporters said one of their headquarters was attacked by "Kabila loyalists" and two people were killed.

August 23, 2006: In what could be called an "all parties agreement," forces loyal to Congo's President Joseph Kabila and key opposition leader Jean-Pierre Bemba signed a ceasefire agreement. Representatives from the UN Mission in Congo (MONUC), the Congolese Army, EUFOR (European peacekeeping forces) and EUPOL (European police mission) also signed the agreement. Kabila's and Bemba's forces both agreed to pull back from the center of Kinshasha. Gunfire (including artillery duels) broke out on August 20 in Kinshasha.

August 28, 2006: The International Criminal Court (ICC), in the Hague, Netherlands, charged a former Congolese militia leader with war crimes. Thomas Lubanga was a key commander in the Union of Congolese Patriots (UPC). Lubanga is charged with crimes committed between July 2002 and December 2003. Lubanga is charged with the "forced enlistment" of child soldiers. Lubanga also directed attacks on the Lendu tribe. The Indian Air Force began deploying a new aviation contingent to the Congo for duty with UN forces. The Indian force (Indian Aviation Contingent-1) has 243 airmen. The unit has four Mi-25 (also known as the Mi-24D) attack helicopters and five Mi-17 helicopters for transport work.

September 1, 2006: Gunmen robbed a refugee camp in the town of Gety (northeast Congo). The gunmen also attacked the headquarters of a medical NGO in the area and forced the medical group to leave. There are approximately 45,000 refugees in the camp at Gety.

September 4, 2006: The Ugandan Lords Resistance army (LRA) rebels are leaving a base area in the eastern Congo (the Garamba National Park area), and were seen heading for the Congo-Sudan border. The LRA rebels will assemble in south Sudan, per the recent peace deal with the Ugandan government. On August 30 Congolese government security forces clashed with an LRA contingent. The Congo government said that the LRA rebels had until mid-September to leave the Congo.

September 6, 2006: The presidential run-off election is now scheduled for October 29. Current president Joseoph Kabila will face Jean-Pierre Bemba in the run-off. The European peacekeeping force (EUFOR) remains deployed in Kinshasha, with supporting force in Gabon. Bemab's supporters are still accusing EUFOR and other UN forces of favoring Kabila. That's a bit of a stretch. Peacekeepers came to Bemba's rescue during the battle of Kinshasha that raged in the immediate aftermath of the fighting that broke out in mid-August. 31 people died in the fighting.

September 15, 2006: EUFOR (European Force in the Democratic Republic of Congo) will continue to keep its troops in Congo at least through the October run-off election. EUFOR 's senior officers described the situation in Congo as "militarily stable" but "politically sensitive" ?" meaning that where peacekeepers are violence is minimized but the divisions between the supporters of current president Joseph Kabila and opposition leader Jean-Pierre Bemba remain real and deep.

September 17, 2006: Congolese, Ugandan, and UN military representatives met to discuss how best to handle movements by remaining LRA (Lords Resistance Army) rebel forces. Uganda has repeatedly complained that Congo and the UN have let the LRA operate out of forest areas near the Ugandan border. At the moment the ceasefire between Uganda and the LRA continues to hold. LRA rebels are moving to assembly areas in south Sudan. Uganda wants Congo and UN peacekeepers to help insure that LRA rebels do not move into Uganda.

September 18, 2006: Why fight over the Congo? On reason is geography: Congo is the center of Africa. The Congo is also a vast treasure of mineral resources. Katanga region has large copper deposits and also cobalt, Ituri province (northeast Congo), scene of intense fighting, has commercial gold deposits. So does South Kivu (where a mining company is currently exploring a new deposit). What would a "sustainable" peace in Congo mean to the mining industry? The World Bank projects a jump from $20 million in loans for mining operations in Congo (2006) to $500 million by 2009. Corporations that abandoned the Congo because of the war are interested in returning.

September 19, 2006: A major fire erupted in the Kinshasha headquarters of Congolese opposition leader Jean-Pierre Bemba. The building also is headquarters for two television stations owned by Bemba. One person was hurt in the blaze. The government was not sure what started the blaze, but remember, the government is headed by Bemba's rival, current president Joseph Kabila. After the fire, Kabila supporters demonstrated in Kinshasha and some threw stones at UN peacekeeping vehicles which were deployed to help protect firefighters. An arsonist attacking Bemba's headquarters would get a twofer: the opposition candidate loses his political headquarters and his media operation is also hindered.

September 29, 2006: The UN Security Council voted to maintain its current troop commitment to the Congo through February 2007. Approximately 18,000 troops currently serve with MONUC. The European Union said that it would consider extending its peacekeeping mission in the Congo past the October 29 presidential run-off election date. Germany, however, opposes an extension of the EUFOR mission.

October 2, 2006: The UN and the Congolese government reported that a heavy firefight erupted in Ituri Province (eastern Congo). Twelve militiamen and two Congolese soldiers were killed in the battle. The Congo government claimed that militiamen belonging to the Ituri Patriotic Resistance Front (FRPI) attacked the Congolese force.

October 3, 2006: Another reconnaissance drone flown by EUFOR peacekeepers has crashed in the Kinshasha area. This time the cause of the crash was an accident, not ground fire. Belgian troops serving with EUFOR reported on October 3 they "lost contact" with their recon drone and the unmanned plane crashed. One woman was killed when the drone struck the ground.

October 6, 2006: Militia groups in eastern Congo appear to be rearming. Ituri province (northeastern Congo) is the focus of UN concern over this. Militias are reportedly seeking new recruits in the area. The UN had been touting the success of its disarmament program in the eastern Congo. UN peacekeepers are also concerned that the militias are trying to buy new weapons. The UN has received promises from the governments of Congo, Rwanda, and Uganda that they will help stop the flow of arms into the eastern Congo. As part of the militia-integration program, the Congolese government gave two former militia commanders the rank of colonel in the Congolese Army. One commander served with the FPRI (Front for Nationalists and Integrationists) and the other was with the MRC (Congolese Revolutionary Movement). At one time both militias had approximately 3,000 fighters under arms. The organizations turned in their weapons and demobilized as part of a UN-sponsored program.

October 11, 2006: It's estimated that some 11,000 children are either still serving with militia groups in the Congo or are "unaccounted for" after being kidnapped by militias. Some children (teenagers) do serve as militia fighters. Others are used to carry supplies.

October 17, 2006: The UN designated Kinshasha as a "safe area" for the upcoming presidential run-off election. Both EUFOR and the UN have significant peacekeeping forces in and around Kinshasha. UN peacekeepers have been collecting and confiscating weapons in the Kinshasha area. "Combined patrols" is one reason Kinshasha is comparatively peaceful. The UN has sponsored police patrols that includes elements of the Congolese National Police (PNC), military police drawn from the Congolese Army (FARDC), police from the European Union peacekeeping force (EU Police) and UN military police (from MONUC peacekeeping troops).

October 20, 2006: As the runoff election approaches (October 29), fighting between supporters of president Joseph Kabila and opposition leader Jean-Pierre Bemba has increased. Kinshasha remains quiet, though two TV stations were attacked on October 14. Riots have occurred in Equateur Province. On October 18, riot police deployed in Katanga to stop street-fighting between supporters of Congolese president Jospeh Kabila and supporters of his political rival, Jean-Pierre Bemba. Members of the pro-Kabila Union of Nationalists and Federalists of Congo (UNAFEC) threw rocks at a motorcade carrying Bemba supporters.

October29, 2006: Congo conducted its presidential run-off election. The UN said thatthe elections and election-related expenses cost nearly $500 million. Election monitors reported little violence throughout the country.

November 1, 2006: The US froze the assets of seven men accused of illegally shipping weapons and ammunition to the Congo. The seven include Russian businessman Viktor Bout and former Congolese general Laurent Nkunda. Nkunda is also charged with committing war crimes in the eastern Congo, which allegedly occurred when he led a short-lived tribal rebellion. Bout (in Moscow) denied the charges. Both the UN and US have urged the Congo and neighboring countries to rein in arms dealers and gunrunners. Enforcing the international arms embargo hasproven to be difficult. The "kingpin" strategy (ie, arresting those who directthe trade) doesn't necessarily produce immediate results. It does, however, discourage other gunrunners.

November 11, 2006: The Rwandan government denied reports that it had sent forces intothe eastern Congo. The scattered reports claimed Rwandan soldiers were chasing Hutu extremists. UN and EUFOR peacekeepers once again deployed in Bemba's neighborhood. Pro-Kabila demonstrators have repeatedly marched through the streets near Bemba's compound.

November 12, 2006: Two people died in Kinshasha as the results of a series of violent confrontations between groups loyal to opposition leader Jean-Pierre Bemba and Congolese president Joseph Kabila. Some 67 percent of the presidential run-off vote has been counted and Kabila leads Bemba 61 to 39 percent.

November 15, 2006: The European Union (EU) said that it will withdraw its 1200-troop peacekeeping force from the Congo "on schedule." The schedule calls for thetroops to depart at the end of November. However, UN and EUFOR patrols (backed by armored personnel carriers) continue throughout Kinshasha, which is regarded as the "center of gravity." During the first week of November, UN and EUFOR peacekeepers began manning a number of fixed positions in Kinshasha. Thepeacekeepers are immediately. tasked with separating factions loyal to Kabila and Bemba. They are also manning key areas in the capital should violence break out when the final election results are announced. The run-off election took place on October 29. The final results will be available on November 19.

November 18, 2006: The Congo reported tribal fighting in Bandundu province (north of Kinshasha). Fighting broke out between Tende and Nunu tribesmen in and near thetown of Bolobo. The fighting was described as "severe"; the likely cause was a land dispute. Medical teams reported eight people died of "arrow and machete wounds" and 27 people were wounded.

November 19, 2006: Congo's electoral commission declared President Joseph Kabila thewinner of the run-off election. Kabila got 58 percent of the vote. Runner-up Jean-Pierre Bemba received 42 percent. Kabila faces several immediate problems.The first is working with UN and European peacekeepers to keep the inevitable post-election violence to a minimum. Kinshasha is a potential battleground and if the violence gets out of hand, the result could be civil war. If Kabila manages to keep Kinshasha from exploding, he then faces a series of long term problems. His own army is deeply split by tribal and political factions. In Congo's eastern Ituri province, elements of the Congolese Army (FARDC) fought with at least 50 members of the Ugandan LRA rebels. The firefight took place near Mount Zeu on the Congo-Uganda border. The Congo government has promised Uganda that it will act to stop rebel infiltration into Uganda. The fighting follows a report that two Ugandan soldiers were arrested in the Congo. Uganda conducts "aggressive" patrols along the Congo border - which sometimes means Ugandan recon patrols enter Congolese territory in order to monitor the LRA.

November 22, 2006: Supporters of defeated presidential candidate Jean-Pierre Bemba rioted in Kinshasha. The rioters burned down the Congo Supreme Court building in the capital, while the court was deliberating Bemba's appeal. This action is not likely to help Bemba. UN peacekeepers, operating in armored vehicles, fired "warning shots" at the rioters. There was sniper fire at both firefighters and policemen. Bemba accused Kabila of conducting "systematic cheating" to win the election. However, South Africa's election observer team issued a report that said the election was fair and "remarkably transparent." Election observers are urging Bemba's supporters to accept the results.

November 28, 2006: A firefight broke out in the eastern Congo town of Sake (near the Rwandan border, in North Kivu province). Congolese Army units (FARDC) exchanged gunfire with a "dissident" army faction led by rebel general Laurent Nkunda. At least two soldiers were killed and 15 people wounded in the fighting on November 28. Nkunda's militia (elements of what was the Army 83rd Brigade) attacked the town on November 26. A UN force manned by Indian soldiers and the 11th and 14th Brigades of the Congolese Army counter-attacked and drove the militia from the town. The UN unit was supported by armored personnel carriers and an attack helicopter. In the November 26 fighting, 75

Congolese soldiers were reported wounded. The Indian troops have been operating in and around the Congolese town of Goma. The border area remains extremely sensitive. The UN is concerned that militias operating in North Kivu and South Kivu are still receiving logistics support (including new weapons) from outside the Congo.

November 29, 2006: The Ituri Patriotic Resistance Front (FRPI) militia agreed to disarm. During disarmament negotiations the FRPI and two other militia groups admitted they had approximately 700 "child soldiers" serving in their forces.

December 1, 2006: Germany withdrew 100 troops from the Congo, out of a force of had 760 peacekeepers serving as part of the reinforced EUFOR peacekeeping contingent sent to protect the Congolese elections. The German government said it plans to pull all of its troops out by this Christmas.

December 4, 2006: The 632 members of the new parliament have been announced, which apparently will cause many armed groups to quiet down, until they see what the new legislators will do for, or against, them. The various rebel groups are also cowed by the recent vigorous (violent) actions by UN peacekeepers. The UN troops have switched from passively observing, to meeting violence with violence. Since the UN soldiers are better trained and equipped than the rebels, they are nearly always successful. The word gets around, and the rebels are trying to come up with new tactics to deal with this.

December 9, 2006: There was another firefight near the town of Sake (near Goma, on theCongo-Rwanda border). A militia loyal to dissident Congolese general Laurent Nkunda launched a new attack on an army unit entering the area. Themilitia withdrew after the firefight with the troops. The were no casualty reports. Nkunda's militia is now often referred to as the 81st and 83rd Brigades of the army. It's a six to one, half a dozen to the other situation.The men in these "brigades" were mostly drawn from tribal militias before they were nominally integrated into the Congolese Army. The integration often does not take.

December 14, 2006: There is a major outbreak of cholera among refugees in the eastern Congo. There is concern that that the disease will spread among 20,000 refugees (IDPs -internally displaced persons) in the Goma-Sake area. The area has witnessed a great deal of fighting between the Congolese Army and various militias. But the 20,000 new refugees in the Goma-Sake area are the tip of theiceberg. There are over 500,000 IDPs in North Kivu province. The IDPs lack clean water and food. Cholera isn't the only epidemic that threatens the malnourished and exposed refugees. The South African government reaffirmed that its 1400 peacekeepers in the Congo will remain committed to the MONUC peacekeeping force EUFOR still intends to withdraw its peacekeepers by the end of 2006.

December 15, 2006: The Congo, Kenya, Uganda, Tanzania, Zambia, Burundi, Rwanda. Republicof Congo (Brazzaville), Angola, Sudan, and the Central African Republic signed a treaty that promised the nations would never go to war with one another. If that doesn't sound suspicious enough, the treaty committed the nations to "mandatory disarmament" of rebel groups and militias in their respective territories and "extradition" of rebel groups within their territories (ie, rebel groups rebelling against a neighbor or nation signing the treaty). Central African Republic (CAR) and Sudan are already shadowboxing with rebels in western Sudan and along the CAR-Sudan border. Congo has promised Uganda that it will deal with Uganda rebels, but the LRA, and at least one other rebel group still have bases in the Congo. This is a treaty that sounds good on paper, but it isn't likely it will be enforced.

December 18, 2006: The Ituri province militia force led by Cobra Matata finally surrendered earlier this week. Matata turned himself in along with approximately 110 of his fighters. Matata had agreed to a disarmament deal in July 2006 but never fulfilled the disarmament commitment. In November 2006, there was another demobilization and disarmament deal, but Matata failed to show up. Matata's militia had respected the ceasefire agreement. However. not all of Matata's men were willing to surrender. Matata's militia was once believed to have about a thousand men under arms. With 100 demobilizing, that means a substantial number have either already gone home (good) or joined other militia forces (bad). The government announced that Matata himself would be allowed to join the Congolese Army and have the rank of colonel. Despite the problems with Laurent Nkunda, turning a senior militia commander into a colonel isn't necessarily bad. The Congolese government is seeking ways to politically integrate the rebel tribes in the eastern Congo. The rank of colonel or general is an attractive political plum for rebel leaders. Of course, there is also thelingering issue is war crimes. It often takes months (and occasionally years) for hard evidence to be collected connecting militia leaders to reported crimes.

December 22, 2006: Bolivia announced it will continue to provide a troop contingent for UN forces in the Congo. At the moment Bolivia has 210 soldiers serving with MONUC. Another 210-man contingent will replace the current unit. The "relief in place" is scheduled for December 28.

December 26, 2006: The European peacekeeping force (EUFOR) has completed its planned withdrawal from the Congo, with the departure of 250 French troops and a seven Belgian observers. EUFOR provided extra troops to help secure the Congo's elections. The EUFOR withdrawal began at the end of November 2006. 17,500 UN troops remain on duty in the Congo.

December 27, 2006: Army forces engaged in a series of firefights in the eastern Congo with a militia loyal to dissident leader Laurent Nkunda. The biggest firefight erupted in the town of Jomba (north of Goma, in North Kivu province near theCongo's border with Rwanda and Uganda). The government claimed 18 of Nkunda'smilitiamen died in the fight at Jomba. Nkunda now claims he is waging war on behalf of Tutsi living in the eastern Congo.

December 31, 2006: The UN and the government are once again fighting militia forces inIturi province (northeastern Congo). During the last week of December, Congolese forces fought with militiamen belonging to the Front of Nationalists and Integrationists (FNI). The government reported the 19 Congolese soldiers died in the series of engagements. In a firefight in the town of Fataki (north of Bunia) the militiamen took 14 government soldiers as hostages. The government and UN forces in the area have ordered the militiamen to return the captured soldiers. The fighting is definitely a setback. In November the FNI agreed to disarm. On December 28 a 300-man contingent of the FNI turned in their weapons. However, these militias have factions within factions. When one charismatic leader decides he doesn't like the disarmament deal he can usually cobble together a force of disgruntled fellow tribesmen to follow him back into thebush.

December 27, 2007: The Congolese Army killed 16 rebel fighters in a firefight in North Kivu province.

December 29, 2007: The Congolese Army opened a new operations center in Goma (North Kivu province). The ops center was built by UN peacekeepers.

The new ops center is intended to help the Congolese Army improve its command and control capabilities in the eastern Congo. No doubt the new facility will help, but improving command and control is as much a function of training and discipline as it is communications gear -- and theCongolese Army remains poorly trained and largely undisciplined.

January 4, 2008: The Indian Army's 6th Battalion of the Sikh Regiment deployed for peacekeeping duty in the Congo. Five people died in political violence in the western Congo (Bas-Congo province). Fighting erupted in the city of Vanga between police and members of the Bundu dia Kongo (BDK) movement. One of the people killed allegedly worked for the Congolese government. Four were members of the BDK. The BDK is a Kongo ethnic organization (as in the Kongo ethnic group).

January 6, 2008: The government, at the urging of Uganda, has agreed to expel rebel leader Joseph Kony and other members of the Lord's Resistance Army (LRA), from a remote nature park in Eastern Congo. That won't be so easy. The LRA fighters are experienced at not being found.

January 6, 2008: The FDLR confirmed it will send representatives to peace talks in Goma (North Kivu province).

January 8, 2008: The UN currently has 18,407 peacekeepers in the Congo

January 9, 2008: Last year, nearly 800,000 people were forced to flee from their villages due to fighting between the Congolese Army, Rwandan Hutu rbel organizations, and General Laurent Nkunda's Tutsi militia forces. The number may seem staggering, but believable, given the population density in North and South Kivu, and the brutal treatment of civilians exhibited by all of the warring groups.

January 13, 2008: They were in then they were out and then…they came back. On January 11 representatives of Laurent Nkunda's rebel group said they were "suspending participation" in peace negotiations scheduled to begin in Goma (North Kivu province, eastern Congo). However, on January 12 Nkunda issued a statement that said he would send a negotiating team.

January 15, 2008: President Joseph Kabila briefly attended the Goma peace conference. The peace conference opened on January 14. The government expects at least a thousand participants (perhaps as many as 1,300). The participants come from various rebel, ethnic, and political groups in the eastern Congo. Laurent Nkunda'sNational Congress for the Defense of the People (CNDP) is also participating. Nkunda insists that the government has not done enough to stop depredations by Rwandan Hutus in the FDLR militia.

January 16, 2008: It is believed that ten mountain gorillas were killed in the Virunga National Park, by marauders, during 2007. The wildlife preserve covers an area along the Congo-Rwanda-Uganda border zone and is often used as a supply route for rebel groups fighting in the eastern Congo. Some skirmishing between militias and government forces has also occurred inside the park boundaries.

January 19, 2008: The government accused Laurent Nkunda's forces of killing at least 20 civilians in North Kivu Province fighting. Nkunda denied the allegation and said that Mai-Mai militiamen had killed the civilians.

January 21, 2008: Several opposition groups have accused the government of "capitulating to the rebels" by agreeing to continue negotiations with Laurent Nkunda's miltia.

January 22, 2008:The Congolese government signed a ceasefire agreement with General Laurent Nkunda. In the first phase of the ceasefire, Congolese Army units and Nkunda's forces will disengage and UN forces will establish a buffer zone. The ceasefire is also supposed to apply to other militia forces in eastern Congo. Nkunda and other rebels, who are currently charged with insurrection (treason), will receive amnesty. The issue of where Nkunda will go, however, has not been addressed. He refuses to go into exile.

January 22, 2008: Rebel leader Laurent Nkunda has agreed to a ceasefire and a peace deal with the government. This one also involves the Mai Mai militias. This is the second attempt at making this kind of ceasefire work. Nkunda and his followers have been fighting for four years, and the picking are getting slim for an "army" that lives off plunder. Several million people have died from that marauding along the Rwandan border, as the armed groups fought each other, and killed, or drove into the bush, any civilians that got in the way. Disease and starvation was the most common cause of deatt.February 1, 2008: The UN has agreed to help "neutralize" Rwandan forces operating in Congo. This is code language for striking at Rwandan Hutu rebel organizations like the FDLR. In order to emphasize the importance of this new mission, MONUC will move its eastern command from Kisangani to Goma (capital of North Kivu). Goma is on the Rwanda-Congo border. In 2007 the Congolese and Rwandan governments signed an agreement that Congo would help disarm and repatriateRwandan Hutu militias. However, many of the Hutus in the militias (like the FDLR) participated in the 1994 Rwandan genocide. If they are repatriated they face charges of mass murder. That's a big incentive for these guys to fight to remain in Congo.

February 4, 2008 The ceasefire is definitely not working. Laurent Nkunda's Tutsi militia (National Congress for the Defense of the People, CNDP) is now skirmishing with a Mai-Mai militia in North Kivu province (eastern Congo). Fighting broke out between Nkunda's troops and the Pareco faction of the Mai-Mai on January 28 in the town of Lusirandak and Kasake (North Kivu).

February 20, 2008: In Fall 2007 China reached a major government to government deal with the Congo. China has agreed to finance the building of transportation infrastructure in Congo. China will also help construct an electrical grid and build electrical generating capacity. Improving water supplies is also part of the arrangement. The financing, however, is "resource-backed." The Congo's copper and cobalt reserves are the resources "backing" the financing. Several developmental aid experts have said the China-Congo deal could benefit Congo.The deal, however, is just now drawing the careful scrutiny of the Congolese. The "C" word is being invoked? Congo? China? No, Colonialism.That may not be quite fair. Congo desperately needs infrastructure. Trading natural resources for roads and clean water would be a better deal for the Congolese than Belgian colonialism.

February 21, 2008: The UN has established 30 "peacekeeping bases" (monitoring camps) in North Kivu province. The camps are the key components of a buffer zone designed to separate warring militia factions. The camps were set up as part of the January 2008 Goma ceasefire agreement. The latest UN reports, however, are not too promising. Small-scale clashes between Laurent Nkunda's CNDP and various other militia forces (including Mai-Mai) are occurring on a daily basis.

February 26, 2008: Congo-K - Mining Code Revision in View '

After the meeting of government officials and experts in the mining sector in Kinshasa from March 10 to 17, a consensus emerged in favour of revising the mining code of 2002.

February 27, 2008: MONUC (UN Mission in the Congo) has found more evidence of massacres in North Kivu, allegedly perpetrated in January by the National Congress for the Defense of the People (CNDP). The CNDP is rogue general Laurent Nkunda's militia force. Most of the CNDP fighters are Congolese Tutsis. The massacres definitely occurred (there are bodies). At least 30 Hutu tribespeople were killed. The investigation could lead Nkunda to completely reject the January Goma ceasefire agreement (Engagement Act). As it is, Nkunda has already "suspended participation" in the ceasefire process because of the investigation.

March 4, 2008: Congolese police fought with BDK separatists in Bas-Congo province. The trouble began in late February. According to UN sources, over a five day period (February 29-March 4) 22 people have died in riots and battles with police. The capital of Bas-Congo province, Matadi, has been the scene of several disturbances, but the deadliest clashes have occurred in the town of Sekebanza (north of Matadi).

March 10, 2008: The UN reported that the Bundu dia Kongo (BDK) is trying to gain control of Bas-Congo province (western Congo). Most of the UN's peacekeeping efforts have either centered on the capital, Kinshasha, or have focused on eastern Congo (eg North and South Kivu provinces). In January the UN beefed up its peacekeeping contingent in Bas-Congo, but it was a relatively small increase (140 soldiers). The UN began sending more reinforcements to Bas-Congo on March 3. The BDK is a strange outfit even for Congo. The BDK draws its strength from the Kongo ethnic group. It says its ultimate goal is to re-create a "pre-colonial" Kongo kingdom. In additional to a substantial slice of the Congo, the BDK's "kingdom" includes land within the countries of Angola, Republic of Congo (Brazzaville) and Gabon

March 14, 2008:The International Criminal Court (ICC) continues to investigate charges of murder, rape, and looting in eastern Congo. The ICC has been conducting "town meetings" in North Kivu province (eastern Congo) and in Equateur province (northeastern Congo). Equatuer's Ituria region was the scene of some of the worst ethnic fighting during the Great Congo War.

March 15, 2008: The UN admits that 6,000 Rwandan Hutu gunmen are responsible for the violence that has kept the provinces of North and South Kivu a mess. The Hutus are largely those who tried to kill all Rwandan Tutsi in 1994. When that failed, despite killing nearly a million people, hundreds of thousands of Hutu, fearing retribution, fled to Congo. Many of these Hutu were armed, organized into the Interahamwe militia, and they planned to wage a guerilla war with the new, Tutsi dominated government in Rwanda. But the Rwandan Tutsis invaded Congo to destroy the Tutsi rebels, and this triggered a revolution in Congo ten years ago. After over a decade of fighting, many of the Hutu rebels have been killed, or returned to Rwanda to face justice. But 6,000 Hutu gunmen survive, and refuse to surrender. The UN has told these Hutu that surrender and disarmament is the only option. The Hutu are the hardcore, and most refuse. Many of the fighters are organized into the FDLR (Democratic Forces for the Liberation of Rwanda) are willing to negotiate. But in the past, FDLR offers to negotiate have gone nowhere. Until these Hutu holdouts are taken down, there will be no peace in eastern Congo.

April 10, 2008: Congo's main opposition leader, Jean-Pierre Bemba of the Movement for Liberation of Congo (MLC), remains in exile in Portugal. Recently Bemba claimed that his life would be in danger if he returned to Congo. Bemba faces removal from parliament because members of parliament must attend at least one-fourth of parliamentary meetings. Bemba is a rebel warlord who made peace with the government, but expected to succeed in getting himself elected president of the country. Failing at this, he came to believe Laurent Kabila, who was re-elected president, would not tolerate such an ambitious rival, and would seek to kill him. So Bemba fled the country.

March 31, 2008: Several riots broke out in copper mines located near the town of Kolwezi. Police claimed "several hundred" miners rioted. The death of a child during an eviction was the ostensible cause of the riots. However, "illegal miners" are a political problem in Congo. "Illegals" are miners who have moved on to shut-down mining properties and set up their own freelance operations.

April 8, 2008:According to a recent UN Security Council study, the UN decision to reinforce operations in eastern Congo has left other regions less secure. The specific concern is Bas-Congo province (western Congo) where the BDKhas become increasingly militant. In 2007 the UN deployed more troops to South and North Kivu provinces in an attempt to defeat and disarm militias operating in the areas.

April 10, 2008: Congo's main opposition leader, Jean-Pierre Bemba of the Movement for Liberation of Congo (MLC), remains in exile in Portugal. Recently Bemba claimed that his life would be in danger if he returned to Congo. Bemba faces removal from parliament because members of parliament must attend at least one-fourth of parliamentary meetings. Bemba is a rebel warlord who made peace with the government, but expected to succeed in getting himself elected president of the country. Failing at this, he came to believe Laurent Kabila, who was re-elected president, would not tolerate such an ambitious rival, and would seek to kill him. So Bemba fled the country.

April 25, 2008: Congolese troops fought with rebel Rwandan Hutu militia forces in North Kivu province. The UN said that at least 12,000 people fled the immediate battlefield. Most of the fighting took place in an area 50 miles northeast of Goma. There were no casualty reports.

April 29, 2008: What is the biggest killer in the Congo? Probably malaria. Congo has around five million malaria cases a year. The actual number of people who die annually from malaria is not known, but the UN study estimates the figure is somewhere between 500,000 and one million people. There are more deaths in areas where rebel groups are active, because it is more difficult to distribute anti-mosquito sleeping nets (a major preventive measure) or go after the mosquitoes that spread the disease.

May 2, 2008: The UN vigorously denied allegations that UN peacekeepers in the eastern Congo had provided a Ugandan rebel organization with weapons. The rumors first appeared last month in Ugandan publications. Allegedly, the Allied Democratic Forces (ADF, also called Allied Democratic Forces-National Army for Liberation of Uganda) received weapons from UN peacekeepers or that UN peacekeepers sold the ADF weapons.

May 3, 3008: The latest UN assessment of the eastern Congo is good because it isn't so bad. The UN described the situation as "stabilizing but fragile" – meaning a new offensive by rogue militias or Rwandan Hutus, or anyone else for that matter, could create another violent mess. MONUC in eastern Congo is once again focusing its efforts on disarmament and demobilization operations.

May 6, 2008:There are about 22 armed groups in eastern Congo, and a major part of the problem is not just the number of armed irregulars, but the many rebel organizations and their very different goals and motivations.

May 10, 2008: What does it take to create a "sustainable peace" in the eastern Congo? A recent UN-directed study focused on the Ituri region of Equateur province (northeast Congo). Among the "peace tasks" identified were:

Disarmament of militias and collection of weapons

Restoration of state authority

Resolving "land-related tensions"

Return of refugees to their homes

Distribution of "a fair share" of revenues from the sale of natural resources

(6) Resumption of economic activity: The "land tensions" item is particularl critical.

Land disputes between ethnic groups fueled a lot of the fighting Ituri (eg, between Hema and Lendu tribes).

May 17, 2008: The major "resources for infrastructure" mining deal between the Congo and China is once again raising questions. A group of Congolese critics contend that the deal is simply not fair to the Congo. It is being called "economic imperialism." The revenue split between Congo and one of China's main mining concerns is 32 percent for the Congo, 68 percent for China. The Congolese government disputes the critics and says the overall deal is very good for the Congo. Congo will receive royalties as well as revenues, and China is committed to building roads. Which the Congo desperately needs. The Chinese are unpopular with many Congolese, because Chinese run many of the illegal mining operations.

May 23, 2008: While fighting in North and South Kivu has diminished over the last few weeks, the Democratic Forces for the Liberation of Rwanda (FDLR) has not disappeared. The FDLR still effectively controls a chunk of South Kivu province west of Bukavu. The FDLR also controls an area west of Masisi in North Kivu. The town of Sange (South Kivu, not far from Burundi) is also in an FDLR "area of influence." The FDLR is a Rwandan Hutu militia. Many of its members were part of the Rwandan Interahamwe Hutu movement, the key organization involved in the 1994 Tutsi genocide in Rwanda.

May 26, 2008: The arrest in Belgium of former Congolese vice-president and presidential candidate Jean-Pierre Bemba has caused a ruckus in the Congo. The UN reported that major demonstrations occurred in Equateur province, especially in the city of Mbandaka. Bemba fled the Congo to escape harassment by the Congolese government. On May 24 Belgium arrested Bemba on an International Criminal Court (ICC) warrant for war crimes committed in the Central African Republic from October 2002 through March 2003. Bemba is head of the Movement for the Liberation of the Congo (MLC), which is the Congo's major opposition party.

June 5, 2008: A series of attacks north of the eastern Congolese town of Goma (North Kivu province) forced 5,000 people to flee their villages. Rwandan Hutu rebels (FDLR) launched two attacks on June 4, killing six people and injuring 14. The rebels struck a relief camp in Kinyando. Many of these attacks are raids mounted to steal food and supplies, but this attack may have had a clear political motive. Two small Rwandan Hutu factions have been negotiating with the Congolese government. The negotiations have included demobilization and disarmament. The FDLR is trying to discourage Rwandan Hutus from joining the Congolese peace process.

June 9, 2008: UN peacekeepers issued an another call to "militia chiefs" in the eastern Congo to fulfill their commitments to disarm. At the moment the UN is primarily focused on Rwandan Hutu militias like the FDLR. At least 6,000 Rwandan Hutu rebels remain in the eastern Congo. J

June 11, 2008: The Congo's lack of infrastructure hinders economic development. Infrastructure development is key to a huge recent Chinese mining contract. Congo needs roads, electricity grid, electricity generation, and airfields. Congo has extensive deposits of cobalt and copper. Power shortages (lack of electrical grid and unreliable electricity) have plagued efforts by both the government and major investors to upgrade the cobalt and copper mines. Katanga's big deposits and working mines are attracting the most attention. As usual, security is another issue. War is a big reason the Congo's electrical grid is damaged or non-existent. Infrastructure protection is obviously a major mission for Congolese police.

June 13, 2008: A firefight broke out between units in an "integrated" Congolese Army brigade, the 14th Brigade in South Kivu province. Many of these "integrated" units contain formers enemies who still don't care for each other. Three men died in the incident.

June 19, 2008: A relative calm had returned to the western Congo, but ceasefire violations by militias in the eastern Congo continued to be a dangerous problem. The UN report focused on troubles in North Kivu. The Congolese Army and the Forces for the Liberation of Rwanda (FDLR) engaged in a series of firefights than began on June 10 when a company of the FARDC's 64th Battalion attacked an FDLR base. On June 14 the FDLR ambushed a Congolese Army unit north of the town of Nyamilima.

June 21, 2008: The Congolese Army (FARDC) fought a series of battles with a Mai Mai militia in Orientale province. The government claimed that 29 Mai Mai fighters were killed and the Congolese Army lost four soldiers.

The Congolese Army has been conducting a limited offensive in Orientale since late May against militias that have refused to disarm. Some of the operations have taken place in the border region between Orientale and North Kivu province.

June 27, 2008: On June 26, the UN suspended relief supply shipments to the city of Rutshuru (North Kivu province) because of "insecurity". Riots broke out in the town on June 24 and 25. Supply shipments resumed on June 27. Rutshuru has been the scene of clashes between the Congolese Army (FARDC, Armed Forces of the Democratic Republic of Congo) and militias loyal to General Laurent Nkunda.

July 1, 2008: The International Criminal Court (ICC) has charged two Congolese militia commanders (Mathieu Ngudjolo Chui and Germain Katanga) with war crimes. The crimes (the murder of 200 people) the men are charged with occurred in 2003 in Equateur province's Ituri region (near the Uganda border). The ICC warrants are a double-edged sword. In the case of Uganda, warrants for LRA leader Joseph Kony have proved to be an obstacle to getting a peace settlement.

July 10, 2008: General Laurent Nkunda is sending mixed signals about rejoining the peace process. He has done this before, claiming he supports the January 2008 Goma accord then engaging in a firefight with the FDLR or Mai-Mai militias. The explanation may be very simple: Nkunda sees no real benefit from making a deal with the Congolese government. He does not trust the government to keep any deal it makes. Of course, the government does not trust Nkunda, who basically controls the western Rutshuru region of North Kivu province. One of the big questions about Nkunda is "where does he get his money?" Usually Rwanda is fingered, but no one is certain.

July 18, 2008: The government said that it would offer amnesty to rebels who had committed crimes in North and South Kivu provinces after 2003 but had signed the January 2008 peace agreement. The Congo's war was supposed to be over in 2003, but militias have continued to operate in the region since then. The amnesty was passed by parliament. The amnesty, however, excludes "genocide, war crimes, and crimes against humanity." This is a big loophole since a number of militias have attacked unprotected villages, looted them, and committed rape and murder in the process.

July 21, 2008: The government accused General Laurent Nkunda's CNDP of "summary executions of civilians" and undermining the January 2008 ceasefire agreement.

July 23, 2008: Investigators in Kinshasha claim that $1.3 billion was either embezzled or "lost" (yes, that's the word, "lost") by the government in 2006-7. Understand this is an internal Congo government investigation, which could actually be a positive signal, though a rather timid one. At the moment the investigators say they will ask suspect government officials to "reimburse" the missing money. The suspect officials are in customs and tax departments. Most of the money probably comes from mining concessions – that's what generates big cash in the Congo.

July 24, 2008: Using an International Criminal Court (ICC) warrant, Portuguese security has seized the property of former Congolese Vice-President Jean-Pierre Bemba. The seizure was made after a request by an ICC prosecutor. The seizure included Bemba's house, a yacht, and an airplane. He also had his bank account frozen. Bemba enjoys a great deal of support among many Congolese. He finished second to Congolese President Joseph Kabila in the last election. The ICC warrant has not pleased his supporters. Many believe that Kabila could be indicted for crimes as well.

July 27, 2008: Despite the January 2008 ceasefire agreement (Goma Acts) the situation in North and South Kivu provinces remains perilous. UN observers are conducting yet another assessment of the ceasefire and the overall "security and stabilization plan." That plan includes new roads but the projects are already behind schedule. The UN reported three major firefights erupted in South Kivu province. Militias are reportedly once again "recruiting" – which often takes place at gunpoint. Many of the recruits are turned into "bearers" who carry supplies. The official statements are one thing, the unofficial buzz another, and that buzz is that there will be a new flare-up of violence pitting General Laurent Nkunda's Congolese Tutsi CNDP (National Council for the Defense of the People) against the predominantly Hutu FDLR (Democratic Forces for the Liberation of Rwanda). One NGO has called the peace agreement "meaningless" given the violent crimes that continue to be committed against unprotected civilians.

July 31, 2008: Some 67 members of the FDLR turned themselves in to UN forces in the town of Kasiki (North Kivu province). They also turned in 45 weapons.

August 1, 2008: The government is airlifting emergency loads of weapons and ammunition to Goma. This began in mid-July – possibly July 19, right after the Kinshasha government's amnesty offer. Apparently General Laurent Nkunda has been seeking recruits in Rwanda and Burundi. These would be (presumably, but not necessarily) Tutsi recruits. Given July's string of political accusations against Nkunda, his forces are the likely target of the Congolese build-up.

August 4, 2008: The latest death toll estimates in the Congo, since 1998 when conflict gripped virtually the entire country, is over 5.4 million people. Remember, starvation and disease have been the biggest killers, often starvation and disease brought on by "exposure" – that is, people fleeing their homes and seeking refuge. The refugee camps (displaced persons camps) are an iffy proposition, since they were major targets during the height of the war and continue to be targets for the armed militias still operating in eastern Congo. The Congolese Army has also been involved in some of the raids on the camps.

August 13, 2008: War continually threatens Africa's exotic game species. The Great Congo War forced many policemen and park rangers to flee. Rebels had superior firepower. Many gorillas (as in the species, not guerrillas) in eastern Congo were killed. Sudan, the Central African Republic, and Congo witnessed a reduction in elephant herds as poachers (many armed with automatic weapons) attacked the herds in order to sell the elephant meat and obtain ivory. Stories continue to crop up that the Rwandan FDLR (in North Kivu) regularly kills elephants for ivory. Ivory is an internationally controlled commodity. Underground demand, however, persists.

August 17, 2008: A Mai-Mai militia struck an army position in North Kivu province. One Congolese soldier was killed and two wounded. The attack occurred near the town of Nyabiondo (Masisi region). There have been several small-scale clashes in the area since the beginning of August.

August 20, 2008: The UN began redeployment of peacekeepers in the eastern Congo to provide additional protection to civilians in Orientale and Ituri provinces. The Ituri Patriot Front (a militia) has reportedly launched several attacks in the Irumu area.

August 21, 2008: The UN reported that the Ugandan rebel Lords Resistance Army (LRA) had raided a Congolese village in northeastern Congo near the Sudan border. The LRA subsequently denied the accusation.

August 28, 2008: The UN peacekeeping forces continue to establish "buffer zones" in eastern Congo??that's always been part of the mission but it appears the re-deployment announced August 20 includes the establishment of more buffer zones. The buffer zones serve several purposes - one (which is not mentioned too often in public) is to watch the Congolese Army as well as rebel factions. The MONUC troops are there to protect Congolese civilians who say they are subject to intimidation and theft from army units. These are often the same units the UN forces are attempting to train.

August 30, 2008: Congo closed its border with Uganda, claiming the move would help cut supplies to General Laurent Nkunda's militia. Congo has accused "outsiders" (in this case, Uganda, but sometimes Rwanda) of supporting Nkunda. Nkunda says his militia protects Congolese Tutsi tribes.

September 1, 2008: General Laurent Nkunda's militia was once again fighting with the FDLR in North Kivu province.

September 3, 2008: Angry Congolese living in the Rutshuru area (eastern Congo) threw stones at and surrounded a UN convoy passing through the area. Two UN troops (both Indians) were hurt in the incident. The Congolese were angry because the UN was pulling Congolese troops out of their village in order to create a "buffer" between a militia group and the Congolese Army. The area around Rutshuru has experienced several firefights since late August.

September 4, 2008: Congo agreed to withdraw 1000 Congolese Army soldiers and their families from a cantonment in the Virunga National Park. Environmentalists argued that the troops and their families (all told about 6000 people) were degrading the park and threatening mountain gorillas who live in the region. A gorilla victory?

September 9, 2008: The army has moved troops into northeastern Congo to try to stop the Ugandan rebel Lords Resistance Army from attacking civilians. This is considered a "containment operation," using at least 2000 soldiers. Uganda has been demanding for at least two years that the UN and Congo close LRA bases in the Congo.

September 10, 2008: One of the biggest problems during the Great Congo War was looting of natural resources. Uganda was accused to looting in Equateur Province and that remains a diplomatic issue dividing Congo and Uganda. For the last two years, the looting continues. The Congolese Army and the FDLR are running mining operations -meaning that the leaders of the units are selling the minerals. At least one gold mine is being run by a militia group.

September 11, 2008: UN peacekeeping forces in eastern Congo were moved to block movements by General Laurent Nkunda's CNDP militia. Nkunda is moving to attack an FDLR (Democratic Forces for the Liberation of Rwanda) militia unit.

September 15, 2008: European Union diplomats, African Union and United Nations representatives, and US diplomats have asked that all Congolese and militia forces in the eastern Congo withdraw to positions which they held in August 2008. A new bout of fighting broke out in late August, with North Kivu province taking the brunt of the fighting.

September 25, 2008: UN and international observers are saying the Congo peace accord is falling apart. The spasm of fighting in late August between Laurent Nkunda's National Congress for the Defense of People (CNDP) militia and other militias in the Rutshuru, North Kivu area, began a round of hit and run battles that have displaced an estimated 100,000 people in North Kivu alone. The fighting has continued on and off for the first three weeks of September, with a spate of violence in South Kivu's Kalehe region.

September 28, 2008: The Congolese Army and the CNDP fought a series of firefights in North Kivu province. The largest engagement occurred near the town of Rugari (north of Goma) in the heavily disputed Rutshuru region. Goma lies on the Rwanda-Congo border.

September 30, 2008: The UN and Sudan reported that over 1200 Congolese civilians fled into south Sudan to avoid attacks by the Ugandan LRA (Lord's Resistance Army). The villagers said LRA fighters attacked their homes and abducted several children. The LRA uses kidnap victims to carry weapons and supplies. Congo has moved more forces into the border region in response to demands by Uganda that Congo crackdown on LRA fighters operating within its borders and eliminate bases.

October 2, 2008: UN attack helicopters fired on militia forces near the village of Kagaba (Ituri province). Two gunships fired rockets and strafed militiamen belonging to the Ituri Patriotic Resistance Front (IPRF?sometimes the militia is called the FRPI, for Front de Resistance Patriotique en Ituri). MONUC estimates that the IPRF has around 2,000 armed militiamen. This is an increase in size since the beginning of 2008. UN forces have been fighting with the IRRF in the area since an IRRF unit ambushed a UN convoy on September 30.

October 3, 2008: The Congolese Army sent reinforcements into Ituri province in order to quell attacks by the IPRF.October 5, 2008: Rebel militia leader General Laurent Nkunda may be expanding his political goals in the Congo. Nkunda and his CNDP militia have claimed their aim is to protect Congolese Tutsis. Now Nkunda says he wants to "liberate" the entire Congo. Here's the specific quote: "We are going to liberate the people of Congo." MONUC (UN Mission in Congo) has condemned Nkunda's statement. This may be political rhetoric and bombast by a leader known for both. However, thanks to Nkunda, the January 2008 peace deal is in tatters. Why? Nkunda entered the peace process in part because he thought the Congolese government would help destroy the Democratic Forces for Liberation of Rwanda (FDLR) militia and that the CNDP would enter into some type of power sharing arrangement with the Kabila government. The FDLR is still around. The Congolese government doesn't trust Nkunda and he doesn't trust them.

October 8, 2008: The UN reported that civilians in North Kivu province have accused UN peacekeepers of "failing to stop militia violence." That's a way of saying that locals in North Kivu believe that no one is protecting them from the on-going fighting. The UN peacekeepers are the good guys, but there are only so many of them and the UN is looking for a political settlement in the area. Who are the bad guys? The various militias and even the Congolese Army. The accusations of crime and abuse by Congolese soldiers are numerous and frequent. Many of the Congolese soldiers once served with militia forces. Loyalty to the Congolese government and respect for Congolese Army officers remains an iffy proposition.

October 11, 2008: The African Union has sent a delegation to Kinshasha with the goal of arranging a new ceasefire in eastern Congo, specifically North Kivu province.

October 13, 2008: The latest violence involving the Congolese Army and General Laurent Nkunda's CNDP militia is looking less like the usual spasm and more like a protracted war. The typical cycle in the eastern Congo has been two to four weeks of fighting and then a semi-official ceasefire or a local agreement to quit fighting and let a peacekeeping force create a buffer zone. But this round of fighting has been going on, without pause, since late August. Nkunda is playing the "Tutsi card" more openly, in what appears to be a political bid to directly involve Rwanda. Nkunda says his primary opposition in the FDLR, which is led by many former Rwandan Hutus who were connected to the Rwandan government in 1994 – and were involved in the Tutsi genocide. Rwanda, like Congo's other neighbors, has been involved in the Congo War at many levels. However, Rwanda has made efforts to focus on its own economic development. That said, Rwanda, which is led by a predominantly Tutsi government, regards the FDLR as a sworn enemy. The Rwandan government has said that it will accept ("repatriate") members of the FDLR, but the FDLR members suspect that means going to jail – and it probably does.

October 14, 2008: A Congolese Army force, backed by armored vehicles, fought a two-day long battle in North Kivu province in and around the town of Tongo (the site of a large refugee camp.)

October 17, 2008: Since August fighting in eastern Congo among militia forces and the Congolese Army has displaced another 100,000 people.

October 18, 2008: General Laurent Nkunda has followed up on some of his recent rhetoric. In areas his troops control in North Kivu province, Nkunda has imposed taxes and established a radio station. It looks like Nkunda's National Congress for the Defense of the People (CNDP) is establishing a political base for waging a long term war with the Congolese government.

October 22, 2008: Since the UN began its MONUC operation in Congo, the diplomats and peacekeepers have said that the Congolese are ultimately going to have to solve their problems themselves. That means a political solution. However, despite elections and a security training program, peace has not come to eastern Congo. Militia forces still battle the Congolese Army (FARDC), battle one another, and battle UN forces. The latest UN initiative repeats many of its predecessors. Creating peace in North Kivu province, according to the head of UN peacekeeping troops in Congo, requires (1) an "immediate ceasefire"; (2) a separation of combatant groups; and (3) the reintegration of the militia fighters, rebels, and guerrillas into civilian life. So far no ceasefire has held for long and enforcing an "immediate ceasefire" or even an intermittent ceasefire has proved impossible. The new UN political plan does emphasize "disengagement operations." In fact, Congo, with the help of the UN, has put together a provincial committee in South Kivu province that is trying to give various political, militia, and tribal groups a forum for developing their own disengagement procedures.

October 26, 2008: The UN accused CNDP militia fighters fired "several rockets" at two UN armored cars. "Several" peacekeepers were wounded in the attack. A CNDP spokesman denied the charge. CNDP forces took control of a Congolese Army base at Rumangabo (north of Goma). The Congolese Army reportedly counter-attacked with tanks and artillery but the CNDP stopped the counter-attack. MONUC's commanding officer, Lieutenant-General Vicente Diaz, has resigned from the UN mission. Diaz said his resignation was due to "personal reasons." A group of CNDP fighters took control of the headquarters of Virunga National Park (north of Goma).

October 27, 2008: General Laurent Nkunda's CNDP militia reportedly defeated Congolese Army forces in the town of Rutshuru (70 kilometers north of Goma). Another major firefight occurred in the town of Kiwanja. The Rwandan government accused Congolese government soldiers of firing unguided rockets rockets into Rwanda territory. The Rwandan government said that its diplomats were in communication with the Congolese government about the incident. Meanwhile, the Congolese government accused the Rwandan government of sending troops into North Kivu. The UN said that there was no evidence (at the moment) to support to the Congolese charge.

October 28, 2008 CNDP militia fighters advanced to the town of Kibumba, 25 kilometers north of Goma. The government and a Congolese Army spokesman said that Rwanda soldiers had crossed the border into Congo. The Rwandan government immediately denied the accusation. The government reportedly asked Angola for help to "defend the territorial integrity" of Congo. The UN said its peacekeeping forces in Congo are now "stretched to the limit." The chief of MONUC said that a "temporary troop increase" was needed. The Congo government also requested peacekeeping reinforcements. Making the request is one thing, deploying troops is something else. The UN's capacity to surge forces is virtually non-existent. France and Great Britain could provide a "mini-surge" by sending paratroop and light infantry units. Who would insure their supply? It would take the United States Air Force and its C-17s to support a "mini-surge." The UN Security Council condemned the attack on Goma by General Laurent Nkunda and his militia forces.

October 29, 2008: General Laurent Nkunda's militia forces reached the outskirts of Goma (North Kivu province). A brief artillery bombardment (likely mortars and rockets) was reported to have hit part of Goma in the early morning hours. Goma is the capital of North Kivu. It is also the center of Congo's tin-mining and exporting industry. The UN reported that "several" Congolese Army troops killed nine people and robbed businesses and homes in Goma. No doubt these are soldiers from the Congolese Army units that ran from Nkunda's forces. This is a sign of a completely broken military. This follows other stories that Congolese troops stole vehicles from civilians in order to flee Nkunda's advance.

October 30, 2008: Rebel leader Laurent Nkunda demanded "direct talks" with the government in Kinshasha. By direct talks he means "talks between equals." Nkunda is in the process of expanding his war on Kinshasha, from that of a Tutsi tribe-based action to a general rebellion against the Kabila government.

October 31, 2008: The UN said that the ceasefire declared by Laurent Nkunda's forces in the area around Goma should continue. Otherwise "humanitarian problems" (ie, assisting refugees) would increase and a "humanitarian catastrophe" would result. The toughest choice is how to deal with General Laurent Nkunda and his National Congress for the Defense of the People

(CNDP) militia force. Nkunda's offensive in North Kivu has been very successful at the operational level. Nkunda began with a series of skirmishes on August 28, followed by several local attacks that continued through September and early October. Nkunda has now moved his forces to the edge of the city of Goma (on the Rwanda border) and declared "a unilateral ceasefire" (on October 29). Nkunda is now in the process of trying to turn the operational success into a strategic political success. UN observers and Congolese sources reported that Nkunda has made a deft political move and is requesting a "neutral mediator" to facilitate negotiations between his forces and the Congo government. He is already playing to Congolese political uncertainties by demanding a renegotiation of the "infrastructure for mineral resources" agreement between China and Congo. Many Congolese fear that agreement is a new form of imperialism. Negotiations make a lot of sense, at least from Nkunda's and the UN peacekeepers' points of view. The UN has peacekeeping forces in Goma, backed by armored vehicles. Nkunda does not want to tangle with international forces. Nkunda has also made his statement about the Congolese Army – it has fled as his militia advanced (though there are Congolese forces still in Goma, according to several sources). The UN peacekeepers, however, are in a difficult position. They are having to manage several refugee camps, protect refugees who have left their homes and cannot get to camps, and also watch Nkunda. The UN forces have air support and air supply links, and the UN armor can open roads.. A UN truck convoy arrived in Goma on October 31 with food, demonstrating that Nkunda does not have Goma surrounded, though there are press reports that Nkunda has Goma "encircled." Feeding the refugees is a huge logistical problem . It's also a problem Nkunda does not want to take off.

November 1, 2008: The government now faces several tough choices in North Kivu province. The eastern half of the Congo ignited into war when the former dictator Mobutu Sese Seko fell in 1997. When a series of peace agreements ended the Great Congo War in 2003 the fighting didn't stop in the east. Trouble continued along the Uganda border and North and South Kivu provinces remained in turmoil. Some European nations have expressed a willingness to send troops to the Eastern Congo, for the express purpose of putting the hurt on Nkunda's force of poorly trained and armed gunmen. Nkundas forces are, however, superior to the motley force that passes for the Congolese Army. The UN peacekeeping force is stretched thin with the collapse of so many Congolese army units, and doesn't really want to get involved fighting Nkunda's forces.

November 3, 2008: Are the allegations of cross-border incursions by allies of Laurent Nkunda true? The government claims Nkunda is receiving aid from Rwanda, or at least from Rwandans. What this means is the government believes Nkunda and his predominantly-Tutsi militia are getting help from fellow Tutsis in Rwanda. And that is very likely. At least one faction in the government claims the Rwandan government wants to absorb Congo's North Kivu province and that Nkunda is a "front man" for Rwanda. That would create a lot of problems for Rwanda. But what the Rwandan Tutsis do want is the destruction of the FDLR (Democratic Forces for the Liberation of Rwanda), the Rwandan Hutu militia operating in Congo.

November 5, 2008: Angolan military forces are apparently in North Kivu province. It is more likely that Angolan military advisers are operating with Congolese Army units. Angola has provided training assistance to the Congolese Army.

November 12, 2008: The UN is trying to find money and permission from the UN membership for more peacekeepers for the Congo force (MONUC).

November 13, 2008: Congolese are telling European reporters that they have seen Zimbabwean and Angolan soldiers in eastern Congo. One unconfirmed report had Angolan troops in the town of Kanyabayonga. The Kabila government regards Angola as a close ally. A week ago one of the "print rumors" mentioned a meeting between the Congolese government and Angola. There was also a report on November 8 of Angolans operating with the Congolese Army near Goma. Again, it was an unconfirmed report, but Angola has provided training assistance to Congolese forces. Sending Angolan advisers to assist Congolese Army commanders isn't unthinkable, it's likely. Zimbabwe supplied the Congolese government with troops during the Great Congo War. In exchange, senior officials in Zimbabwe got to sell trainloads of Congolese minerals. The Zimbabweans were "mineral mercenaries." There are also rumors of Zimbabweans serving with Kabila's presidential guard unit. That could be the case. Like a lot of Third World potentates, Kabila may be "balancing out" his guard unit with a few well-paid foreigners. Locals always have tribal sympathies.

November 14, 2008: The UN has approximately 6,000 peacekeepers in North Kivu province. Approximately 900 are in and around the city of Goma, the capital of North Kivu. General Laurent Nkunda has let the UN create "a humanitarian corridor" in order to supply and (eventually) move refugees caught in eastern North Kivu province. Nkunda met with a UN negotiating team in the village of Jomba (near the Uganda border).

November 16, 2008: Forces loyal to General Laurent Nkunda attacked Congolese Army units in western North Kivu province. Nkunda's forces reportedly took control of the town of Rwindi (130 kilometers north of Goma). A UN observer in Rwindi said that Nkunda's forces had "continued to advance" in the area. The Congolese Army has abandoned a lot of equipment in the area, including light infantry weapons and ammunition. Heavy fighting was reported in the town of Ndeko (100 kilometers north of Goma).

November 17, 2008: Congo President Joseph Kabila appointed a new commander of the Congolese Army (FARDC). General Didier Etumba is now army chief of staff. "Low army morale" following defeats by the CNDP in eastern Congo is one reason the former commander was replaced. General Laurent Nkunda said that he will consider a withdrawal from some positions in North Kivu as a demonstration that he is "committed to peace initiatives."

November 18, 2008: November 20, 2008: The UN is considering increasing troop strength in Congo (in the MONUC force) by 3,085 peacekeepers.

November 19, 2008: Laurent Nkunda's rebel forces claim they have withdrawn from forward positions near Kanyabayonga and Kiwanja (north of Goma). This is supposed to set the stage for a new round of negotiations. The term "rebel forces" is more accurate than simply saying CNDP fighters. Observers have identified at least one Congolese Tutsi militia that is cooperating with the CNDP but isn't part of the CNDP.

November 20, 2008: The situation in eastern Congo remains chaotic – and so do the various reports. Now a Mai-Mai militia officer alleges that UN soldiers are allied with Laurent Nkunda's CNDP. The Mai-Mai said that MONUC forces and fighters from the CNDP fought them in the villages of Katoro and Nyongera (North Kivu province). There is no independent confirmation of the claim and quite a claim it is. The UN peacekeepers usually treat the Mai-Mai as gangs – which they are. Nkunda claims the Mai-Mai in his area are "pro-Congolese government." A subsequent UN report did say that UN soldiers fired at a Mai-Mai militia group in the area after the militiamen fired on a UN patrol. Shooting at Mai-Mai who are shooting at peacekeepers is well within MONUC's rules of engagement in eastern Congo. In fact, MONUC allows its forces to take offensive action against rogue militias.

November 22, 2008: Rebel general Laurent Nkunda has 6,000 fighters under arms. This is a strength increase of at least 1000 over figures available earlier this year. Eighteen months ago Nkunda's militia (now called the National Congress for the Defense of the People, or CNDP) had an estimated 4,000 fighters. Figures for the Rwandan Hutu-led FDLR are even murkier, though 3,000 crops up and one source reports 3,500. As for other militias – make a guess. Mai-Mai organizations are little more than bandit gangs. They had a "hard core" cadre. Other fighters come and go. This is why "several thousand" is likely the best estimate for the strength of Mai-Mai militias operating in eastern Congo. Evidence is piling up that the CNDP offensive has scattered the Mai-Mai, which is what usually happens when Mai-Mai militias engage in serious fighting. The FDLR and CNDP have political and tribal agendas. The Mai-Mai have tribal connections and some no doubt have political affiliations, but the comment "they are in it for the banana beer" isn't far from the truth. The Mai-Mai type militias are in it for the pay and the plunder.

November 23, 2008: Some army troops looted a large refugee camp outside Goma, after a confrontation with UN peacekeepers. As a result of this, refugees threw stones at UN vehicles, protesting the inability of the UN to protect them.

November 25, 2008: Rebel general Laurent Nkunda now proposes that his forces be merged into the Congolese army.

November 25, 2008: Pro-government fighters reportedly looted a refugee camp near the town of Kibati (about ten kilometers from Goma). MONUC reported that up to 10,000 Congolese civilians fled to Uganda to escape fighting along the Congo-Uganda border between forces loyal to Laurent Nkunda and Congolese government forces. France has asked the UN Security Council to allow UN peacekeeping troops to "more easily use force" in order to protect Congolese civilians in eastern Congo.

November 27, 2008: The UN reported that Congolese civilians "surrounded" a UN convoy in the town of Kibati and arrested 20 men the civilians claimed were rebels loyal to Laurent Nkunda. The UN forces said the men the crowd pulled from the convoy were in fact pro-government militiamen who were being taken to a UN-run demobilization camp. The government told the UN that it does not want the UN to send more Indian peacekeepers to the eastern Congo. The government did not expand on the request, but Indian troops have confronted charges of dealing in precious minerals, trading with rebel militias, and of sexually abusing Congolese women.

November 28, 2008: Uganda reported that forces loyal to Laurent Nkunda took the town of Ishasha on the Uganda-Congo border. Nkunda's fighters also took control of a boat landing site on Lake Edward.

December 1, 2008: Laurent Nkunda's forces have withdrawn from the town of Ishasha. On November 29, while meeting with UN officials, Nkunda agreed to withdraw from the town. Ishasha is on the Congo-Uganda border, approximately 35 kilometers northeast of Nkunda's headquarters in Rutshuru. The UN agreed to arrange talks between Congo president Joseph Kabila and Nkunda (who has demanded negotiations with the government). Direct talks with Kabila would be a diplomatic victory of Nkunda, since he has been portraying his movement as a nation-wide rebellion against the Kabila government.

December 2, 2008: General Laurent Nkunda (and his National Congress for the Defense of the People, or CNDP), believes that eastern Congo continues to provide sanctuary for FDLR (Democratic Forces for the Liberation of Rwanda) Hutu militiamen who were responsible for the Tutsi genocide in Rwanda in 1994.

December 4, 2008: Goma, the capital of North Kivu province, has about 70,000 refugees in its immediate vicinity. Feeding and providing medical services for these refugees is a tremendous burden. Numerous cases of cholera and measles are appearing among refugees fleeing the fighting in eastern Congo. During the Great Congo War exposure, starvation, and disease caused most of the deaths, not gunfire and high explosives.

December 10, 2008: Talks between the government and General Laurent Nkunda's representatives were suspended in Nairobi, Kenya. They are scheduled to resume December 17. Nkunda's National Congress for the Defense of the People (CNDP) now portrays itself as a nation-wide rebel movement, meaning it does not want the talks with the government to be "confined to eastern Congo." This has become a political stumbling block in the negotiations. The government wants to deal with Nkunda and the eastern Congo. As it is, the government has already given Nkunda part of what he wants. Nkunda demanded that other rebel groups be excluded from the direct talks and he got that. The government then said it would deal with "all (other) armed groups" separately. Nkunda intends to make the CNDP a national coalition. Former Nigerian President Olusegun Obasanjo Is serving as the U.N.'s chief mediator in talks between the Congolese government and the CNDP. The African Union also has representatives at the negotiations.

December 12, 2008: France believes that no European Union soldiers should be sent to Congo to reinforce UN peacekeeping forces, and that African soldiers should be sent instead. France believes that Angola has troops it could commit. However, General Laurent Nkunda regards Angola as an ally of the Congolese government (which it is). France is willing to allow the EU to provide logistical support.

December 16, 2008: The UN accuses the Congolese government and government of Rwanda of supporting "armed groups" in eastern Congo. The UN believes the current Rwandan government exchanges intelligence information with General Laurent Nkunda and that the Congolese government has links to several militias. The Mai-Mai militias in several areas openly call themselves Congolese government allies. The trick is moving past sharing information and establishing alliances to financing operations and supplying arms. That becomes murkier. The UN asserts that some militias have cooperated with the Congolese government in exchange for ammunition supplies. The UN appears unable to get more African or European peacekeepers to serve in the Congo. The peacekeeping effort in eastern Congo has gone on for years, and seems no closer to a resolution. This is discouraging nations that usually contribute to peacekeeping operations. There is also anger at the UN for not allowing peacekeepers to act more aggressively against those pro and anti-government forces that break the peace in the area.

December 19, 2008: More Ugandan troops, apparently another infantry battalion, has crossed the border and joined several other battalions that are seeking out the remnants of the Ugandan LRA rebels. The LRA rebel has been declared a war criminal by the international court, and Congo is tolerating the Ugandan troops on their territory. There are some Congolese troops in the area (the Garamba forest), but the Ugandan troops are doing most of the work.

December 22, 2008: The UN Security Council renewed the mandate for the UN peacekeeping mission in Congo (MONUC). The mandate was renewed for one year. In some ways this was a formality but an important formality. MONUC has around 17,000 soldiers on duty in the Congo.

December 24, 2008: The government said that it believes the European Union will provide extra equipment and supplies to MONUC peacekeepers. The EU has (at least for the time being) decided it will not send additional troops to the Congo. Despite the EU's decision, the UN continues to look for troops to serve in what is now called a "bridging force" to help boost peacekeeping troop strength in eastern Congo.

December 25, 2008: Several sources reported a series of attacks by the LRA on villages in northeastern Congo. At least 400 Congolese civilians may have been killed in Haut-Uele district. "LRA elements" appear to be pulling out of southern Sudan and Congo in response to the Ugandan Army-led attacks on LRA base camps in Congo.

December 26, 2008: General Laurent Nkunda alleged that Congolese Army troops and militias loyal to the government had violated ceasefire terms in eastern Congo. Nkunda sent his complaint directly to the UN. His statement included the allegation that his forces had received "harassing fire" around Goma'a airport (North Kivu province). This follows earlier ceasefire violation accusations from Nkunda. Nkunda accused the Congolese Army of "redeploying" units around the town of Kibati (north of Goma).

December 31, 2008: The government said that it would continue to cooperate with the UN and Uganda to destroy the LRA.

January 1, 2009: Small groups of the Ugandan rebel Lords Resistance Army have left some of the Uganda-Congo border areas and are moving wards the Central African Republic (CAR). The LRA cadres burned several villages as they moved along the Congo-Sudan border area. The village of Faradje lost 150 killed, the village of Duru 75 killed and Doruma lost 215. These figures are in line with the press reports that 400 people were killed by the LRA in several raids in northern Congo. An LRA spokesman has denied that the LRA attacked the villages.

January 2, 2009: MONUC observers are disputing allegations made over the last week by General Laurent Nkunda, that the Congolese Army was reinforcing its positions north of Goma. The government and Nkunda's National Congress for Defense of the People (CNDP) are scheduled to reconvene peace talks on January 7.

January 5, 2009: The remaining members of the Ugandan LRA rebels are crossing into the Central African Republic (CAR), pursued by Congolese and Ugandan troops. The CAR, which is itself in the midst of a civil war, has said it will try to send troops to the border to intercept the LRA before they can, as they did last year, raid villages for captives and supplies. If the CAR cannot destroy the LRA, the rebels will live off the locals for as long as they can, then return to Congo. Then again, Congo or Ugandan forces may pursue the LRA across the border, especially if it appears that the CAR government has been unable to muster any troops to deal with the matter.

January 6, 2009: General Laurent Nkunda issued a statement denying media reports that he is no longer in charge of the National Congress for the Defense of the People (CNDP). One of Nkunda's senior subordinates, Colonel Makinga Sultani also said Nkunda remains in charge.

January 7, 2009: Negotiations between the government and CNDP have resumed in Nairobi, Kenya. The government reported an LRA band attacked the town of Negero (northeastern Congo). As many as 20 people may have died in the attack. The main park ranger station for Garamba National Park is located in Negero. The LRa has bases inside Garamba, though the government issued a statement in late December 2008 that "at least 70 percent" of the LRA's camps within Garamba have been destroyed.

January 9, 2009: Despite earlier denials of trouble in the CNDP, more rumors circulate that General Laurent Nkunda faces a serious challenge to his leadership. The key figure appears to be Brigadier General Jean Bosco Ntaganda, who currently has the title of "Chief of Staff" for the CNDP and its militia forces. One report stated that Ntaganda now faces "a disciplinary hearing" within the CNDP. Ntaganda is a member of a Congolese Tutsi tribe. Like Nkunda, he has a long record for fighting for Tutsi tribal rights and fought with Rwandan Tutsis against the Hutu government in Rwanda. He is (or at least was) regarded as a key Nkunda ally. It turns out that Ntaganda issued a statement on January 5 accusing Nkunda of "bad leadership", and he also declared himself the CNDP's leader. This was read as an attempt to oust Nkunda. Ntaganda has a nickname ?"The Terminator." He is also under indictment by the ICC for war crimes.

January 12, 2009: Former Congolese opposition leader Jean-Pierre Bemba is on trial in the International Criminal Court (located in The Hague, Netherlands). He faces five counts of war crimes and three counts of crimes against humanity. Bemba ran the Congolese Liberation Movement (MLC). The MLC operated in the Central African Republic (CAR) in 2002 and 2003 as an ally of former CAR president Ange-Felix Patasse. Recent testimony in the trial alleged that Bemba's militiamen used rape as a terror tactic in the CAR. Meanwhile, a spokesman for Nkunda's negotiating team in Nairobi, Kenya said that peace negotiations with the government were progressing and that an agreement may be reached "very soon" that will end the fighting between the government and CNDP in eastern Congo.

There is no doubt the Ntaganda rebellion has put political pressure on Nkunda.

January 14, 2009: The power struggle within Laurent Nkunda's CNDP isn't over. In fact, the break is rather open. Brigadier General Jean Bosco Ntaganda now has his own faction which claims it has appointed a "12-member executive committee." The Ntaganda faction has a headquarters in Kabati (North Kivu province). It appears to favor some type of reconciliation with the Congolese government. From the rumor mill: the CNDP ? at least Nkunda's faction ? is considering turning Brigadier General Jean Bosco Ntaganda over to the International Criminal Court (ICC) for prosecution as a war criminal (as the court has long demanded). Whether Ntaganda's arrest would end the split in the CNDP is another matter.

January 15, 2009: The government's anti-LRA drive in northeastern Congo continues, though reports on actual Congolese operations are sporadic. The government continues to stress that it is operating a "joint offensive" with the Government of South Sudan (GOSS) and Uganda to defeat the Ugandan rebels (Lords Resistance Army). LRA attacks since September 2008 killed at least 547 Congolese civilians and 408 have been kidnapped. Between the LRA attacks and the government military operation, an estimated 100,000 people have had to flee their homes. There are likely good reasons for the sporadic reports ? it's because the operations are likely sporadic. Outside of the capital of Kinshasha, any military operations in the Congo are a logistical challenge. The northeastern border area is particularly primitive ? few roads and very few airfields.

January 16, 2009: Members of the Congress for the Defense of the People (CNDP) loyal to Brigadier General Bosco Ntganda issued a statement that said “hostilities” between the CNDP and the Congolese Army (FARDC) had ceased. Additionally, the rebel CNDP leaderships intended to place “all CNDP combat forces” under Congolese Army command. The rebel CNDP leaders want to make their units part of the Congo’s national army. A major Mai-Mai militia force in eastern Congo, Pareco, said that it would quit fighting against the CNDP.

January 17, 2009: Villagers in northeast Congo have begun organizing self-defense groups to defend their villages against the Ugandan rebel Lords Resistance Army. Civilians in northeastern Congo reported that the Congolese Army “ran away” when LRA guerillas attacked in December.

January 20, 2009: In a surprise move, Rwandan Army soldiers have crossed the Congo-Rwanda border. Initial reports said the Rwandan force had at least 3000 Rwandan soldiers. The Rwandan Army will conduct a “joint operation” with the Congolese Army to destroy the FDLR militia. The Congo-Rwanda agreement comes in the wake of a “stand down’ by rebels in the pro-Rwandan CNDP.

January 21, 2009: UN sources reported that a battalion of Rwandan troops is heading toward the CNDP headquarters in Rutshuru. The UN reported that the Rwandan Army force operating in Congo's North Kivu province Congo has 4000 soldiers. A "large" Rwandan force is moving west to the towns of Masisi and Mushaki. The force is a light infantry force. UN observers reported the Rwandan soldiers were armed with automatic rifles and rocket-propelled grenade launchers.

January 22, 2009: Rwanda and Congo claimed that Rwandan forces have arrested General Laurent Nkunda. The Congo has had a warrant for Nkunda's arrest since 2005. This represents a huge shift by the Rwandan government, since Nkunda has long been regarded as a Rwandan ally. The Congolese government said that the Rwandan government "has failed" to extradite General Laurent Nkunda to Congo. Nkunda's arrest by Rwanda is clearly part of the political dealing that led to the joint Congo-Rwanda operation against the FDLR.

January 24, 2009: Congolese and Rwandan forces claimed they killed nine FDLR fighters. Congo's commander of "eastern operations" said that contact had been made with the FDLR "in five villages." The FDLR denied the claim and said that no FDLR units had engaged either Congolese or Rwandan forces.

January 26, 2009: FDLR forces are reportedly preparing to fight the Congolese Army and Rwandan Army FDLR spokesmen are concentrating their rhetorical fire on Rwanda, though their statements also mentions the high probability of Congolese civilian casualties. This looks a bit like an attempt to leverage Hezbollah and Hamas-style "human shield" tactics. The FDLR will try to keep Congolese civilians between their militiamen and the Rwandan Army, and blame the Rwandan Army for any civilian casualties. Congo's and Rwanda's "joint operation" against the FDLR continues. It appears that Rwanda has added some reinforcements, with perhaps 5000 Rwandan soldiers are in the Congo. The Rwandan Army (Rwandan Patriotic Defense Force) units operating in Congo are experienced and motivated and the FDLR is filled with “old enemies” – its leadership cadre includes men who helped perpetrate the 1994 Tutsi genocide in Rwanda. The Congolese Army, however, is a hodge podge, and most of its units are completely incompetent. If the FDLR can avoid the Rwandan force it will likely survive. Congo has demanded that Rwanda send General Laurent Nkunda to Con go for trial. However, Nkunda remains “detained” in Rwanda (likely in Kigali)

January 29, 2009: The UN will provide logistical support to Congolese and Rwandan troops who are attacking the FDLR (Democratic Forces for the Liberation of Rwanda) Rwandan Hutu militia in eastern Congo. UN (MONUC) peacekeepers would not participate in “direct operations” (ie, combat operations) with the Congolese Army or Rwandan Army. MONUC peacekeepers will assist CNDP fighters who wish to join the Congolese Army ("integration" of CNDP militiamen is the term). Up to 6000 CNDP fighters may eventually join the Congolese Army. That would mean all of General Laurent Nkunda's CNDP forces would join the Congolese Army.

February 10, 2009: Villagers in northeastern Congo have started forming their own local defense organizations. LRA rebels have killed between 600 and 900 civilians in the Congo since December 2008. Reports indicate that some of the defense forces have rifles, but that others are armed with machetes and spears. You use what you've got when you have to. One village, Bangadi, which organized its militia prior to December 2008, claims it has already stopped two raids. The Bangadi force fought a pitched battle with LRA attackers on October 19, 2008. They fought a second battle on January 22, 2009, and rescued six kidnapped civilians. The Congolese government's failure to provide security has spurred the rise of local defense forces. Several NGOs have complained that the UN peacekeepers in MONUC have not protected civilians in northeastern Congo from the LRA, either. The UN says that MONUC is performing support and logistical operations in that area.

February 11, 2009: China's deal to provide infrastructure in exchange for access to Congolese natural resources remains controversial. Now the global recession has reduced demand for the resources. Thus the Chinese deal looks a little better. The government announced that it would continue improving transportation and mining infrastructure despite the recession. The recession has hit Congo's copper mining industry particularly hard.

February 13, 2009: Meanwhile back in eastern Congo: The government said that an air raid on Rwandan Hutu Democratic Forces for the Liberation of Rwanda (FDLR) rebels in Kashebere killed 40 of the Hutu militiamen. The joint Congo-Rwandan offensive against the FDLR continues in the area. A Rwandan military statement claimed that several FDLR commanders had surrendered to Rwandan and Congolese forces.

February 16, 2009: The government claimed that members of the Ugandan rebel Lord's Resistance Army (LRA) have been caught “in a trap” in Garamba National Park (northeast Congo). The park (which is a huge area) was the location of several initial attacks on LRA bases by the joint Congo-Uganda force in mid-December 2008. The LRA fighters broke down into small groups and many withdrew toward the Central African Republic, attacking Congolese villages along the way. The Congolese government report now says an LRA force of approximately 250 people remains inside Garamba in a “swampy” area. It's possible that LRA commander Joseph Kony could be with the stay-behind group. But no one is sure.

February 18, 2009: The LRA rebels have forced some 15,000 Congolese civilians to flee into southern Sudan, to escape the raids. The refugees report that nearly all the 100,000 people living in the town of Lau, fled when it was reported that the LRA were in the area. The LRA threat has made it difficult to get aid to the nearly 200,000 refugees in the area, and many of the refugees are going hungry. What terrifies many people about the LRA is not the robbery, which is common enough in a country with not much police presence, but the slaving. The LRA maintain their strength by seizing children and, in effect, enslaving them, and brainwashing them into becoming LRA warriors. This is actually an ancient technique, revived by the LRA and many other armed groups in Africa and elsewhere.

February 19, 2009: The UN estimates that the FDLR have killed at least 100 Congolese civilians since they began retreating in the face of a combined Congo-Rwanda offensive in late January. UN peacekeepers reported that FDLR militiamen "razed villages."

February 24, 2009: The government said it had reached a "preliminary agreement" (as in political agreement) with the current leaders of the National Congress for Defense of the People (CNDP). Laurent Nkunda had been the senior leader and military commander of the CNDP (and chief obstacle to peace), until Rwandan forces arrested him in January.

February 25, 2009: The Rwandan government announced that its troops had begun to withdraw from the Congo. Though the Democratic Forces for the Liberation of Rwanda (FDLR, a Rwandan Hutu militia) still exists. Congo claimed that the FDLR had been severely damaged, and that 153 Hutu militiamen were killed in Operation Umoja Wetu and 37 captured. Several hundred people have been “returned to Rwanda” (repatriated). These people may be abductees, family members, or “camp followers” of the militia.

However, FDLR Major- General Sylvester Mudacumura, the senior commander of the FDLR's "military wing," the Forces Combatants Abacunguzi (FOCA), has not been captured. Still, the government asserts that the Congo-Rwanda joint force has accomplished "95 percent of its mission."

February 27, 2009: Rwandan soldiers continue to withdraw from eastern Congo, with Rwandan Army truck convoys moving across the border from Congo into Rwanda. A substantial number of Rwandan troops have crossed on foot as well. Some 1500 Rwandan soldiers moved by foot from North Kivu province through the town of Goma and into Rwanda. Will any Rwandan soldiers remain? An unknown number of Rwandan soldiers are still in the Congo. Given the new alliance between Rwanda and Congo, it is likely some will remains as an observer force. Or a liaison detachment. Or...the diplomats can be creative. In any event, most of the groups involved with the eastern Congo violence are worn down and worn out. Peace deals are easier to craft and implement under those conditions.

March 11, 2009: The Congolese Army has begun reinforcing its units in eastern Congo and occupying areas vacated by the Rwandan Army. The Rwandans completed their pullout from Congo at the end of February.

Observers from MONUC have confirmed that the unit replacement operation is occurring in South Kivu province.

March 12, 2009: Congolese Army has moved more units into South Kivu province. The troops are entering an area where observers believe FDLR militias fled after attack by Rwandan and Congolese troops in late January and early February. The UN Disarmament, Demobilization, Repatriation, Reinstallation and Reintegration (DDRRR) program for FDLR fighters and supporters will continue. Around 350 FDLR members and supporters were repatriated to Rwanda between February 15 and March 6. This is in line with a request made by the UN Secretary-General's office in late February that MONUC and the Congolese government "coordinate more closely" on resolving conflicts inside Congo.

March 16, 2009: Ugandan troops operating in northeast Congo have begun pulling back toward the Ugandan border. The Congo and Ugandan estimate the joint operation against the Lords Resistance Army has killed 150 LRA fighters. The Congolese Army has said that it will continue to conduct operations against the LRA. Congolese civilians in the area have accused the government of leaving them defenseless. NGOs have estimated that between 600 and 1000 Congolese have been killed by the LRA since mid-December 2008 when Uganda launched an attack on LRA sanctuaries in Congo. This is another signal that the government thinks the joint military operation with Rwanda against the Democratic Forces for the Liberation of Rwanda (FDLR) was a political success, even though bands of FDLR fighters remain in eastern Congo.

March 19, 2009: The government said that the UN mediation team sent to resolve disputes with the National Congress for the Defense of the People (CNDP) is no longer necessary. A “coup” within the CNDP brought new leaders to the fore and with the arrest General Laurent Nkunda by Rwandan forces in late January, the new CNDP leadership has pursued political reconciliation with the government.

March 20, 2009: The big problem in eastern Congo are the militias. Thousands of gunmen have become rampaging bandits. Some 250,000 civilians have fled from these gunmen in the last few months, and over a million in the last year or so. Disarming all these men is very difficult, because the militias were never all that well organized, and the members were not noted for the discipline or reliability either. These gunmen will remain a problem in the area for another 5-10 years.

March 28, 2009: Despite the mounting criticism from opposition politicians, and the dismay of international lenders and donors (including the International Monetary Fund), the government insists it will go ahead with "the Chinese deal." China has agreed to build infrastructure in the Congo in exchange for mining concessions. The agreement, reached in 2007, is valued at nine billion dollars.

March 30, 3009: The government has sent an additional 3000 Congolese Army troops to the Garamba National Park area. Around 100 UN soldiers are also part of the new deployment. The reinforcements are tasked with providing security to villages in and around Garamba threatened by Ugandan LRA fighters.

April 2, 2009: Fighting began breaking out on March 30 in the Ituri district (northeastern Congo). a militia calling itself the Popular Front for Justice in the Congo (FPJC) attacked two villages southeast of the city of Bunia. The FPJC is a splinter faction of a larger force, the Revolutionary Front for Peace in Ituri (FPRI). A UN refugee coordinator said that the FPJC and FPRI have been fighting with one another and that the FPRI had launched what was described as a "counter attack" south of Bunia. If the situation sounds confused that's because it is. Most of the reports come from frightened refugees fleeing the militia violence.

April 3, 2009: The UN said that MONUC is focusing on protecting civilian populations in the Congo. The UN said that in the wake of successful government and UN operations against them, militias and rebel forces were threatening reprisals against civilians. The UN is emphasizing training of local police. UN peacekeepers will take an active role in stopping attempts by the FDLR to resupply its remaining fighters in eastern Congo. A Congolese Army unit fought with a Mai-Mai militia near the town of Bukavu (South Kivu province, eastern Congo). The government believes that some Burundian rebels belonging to the Forces for National Liberation (FNL) were also involved in the firefight. The Mai-Mai force attacked a jailhouse and freed several prisoners. A running gunbattle developed. Two Congolese soldiers were killed and eight militia died in the gunbattles. An attack was also made on a Congolese Army supply depot-- suggesting that the militia and perhaps the Burundians were after weapons. Over in Burundi the FNL has a very uneasy relationship with the Burundian government. The Burundian Army recently found a large FNL arms cache and the FNL may be asking its "friends" for assistance in acquiring new weapons.

April 9. 2009: UN peacekeepers have complained to the Security Council that they do not have enough helicopters to do the job in the Congo. For example, MONUC does not have the helicopters it needs to send troops quickly to areas threatened by LRA rebels. MONUC commanders argue they need 18 additional troop-carrying helicopters in order to provide a minimum of "rapid reaction" protection in eastern and northeastern Congo. UNAMID (UN peacekeeping effort in Sudan) has a similar problem and has been asking for helicopters for almost two years. MONUC also wants member nations to contribute more special operations soldiers. The SOF troops would deploy in the eastern Congo and conduct surveillance missions as well as liaison missions with local defense and security forces.

April 14, 2009: The UN reports that the FDLR has put together a "hit list" which targets civilians who helped the Congolese government and Rwanda attack earlier this year. The "reprisal list" is a typical tactic for gangster militias as well as terrorist organizations. For that matter, more than a few genuine guerrilla groups and authoritarian governments fighting them use the tactic as well. The Rwandan Army seemed to have pretty good intelligence during its operations inside Congo and that suggests they had good intel from locals tired of FDLR depredations.

April 16, 2009: The UN believes that the situation North Kivu province is improving, albeit slowly. The arrest of General Laurent Nkunda by Rwanda and his removal from power in the CNDP is one reason, but other armed groups have also indicated that they are now willing to negotiate with the government. As a result, armed incidents have decreased. That said, the Rwandan Hutu Democratic Forces for the Liberation of Rwanda (FDLR) still have scattered groups in North and South Kivu -- and may have as many as 800 fighters still at large. Northeastern Congo, however, still has significant security problems and the Lords Resistance Army (LRA) is responsible for many of them. An LRA band struck a village in the Ituri region. The government and UN both report that small groups of LRA fighters have dispersed from Garamba National Park in a violent arc stretching west into the Central African Republic (CAR). Congolese in the region fear that the LRA is regrouping and could try to move back into the national park. The UN now says that the LRA has killed 1,100 Congolese civilians since mid-December 2008 when Uganda and Congo (with the aid of South Sudan) launched a joint offensive against the LRA.

April 17, 2009: FDLR militiamen attacked several villages near the town of Lubero (North Kivu province, north of the capital, Goma). The FDLR struck the towns of Kirumba, Kanyabonga, and Kayna. The UN mission in Congo, or MONUC, early Saturday sent peacekeeping troops to Luofo and the Red Cross dispatched a team to bury the victims.

April 18, 2009: FDLR militiamen attacked the town Luofo (North Kivu province). They burned down 250 homes and killed seven people. Five of the dead were children. Luofo is fairly large, with a population of 14,000. The UN responded to the attack by sending a detachment of peacekeepers.

April 27, 2009: FDLR militiamen have attacked several commercial vehicles on roads leading to the city of Goma (North Kivu province). Likely the militiamen are after supplies, but in the aftermath of the Congo-

Rwanda offensive they also want to send the political message that they have not been defeated.

April 28, 2009: UN commanders are once again asking the Security Council to provide MONUC (UN operation in Congo) another 3,000 troops, in addition to the current force of 17,000 soldiers in the Congo. Operations in North Kivu aren't the only reason. MONUC has promised to position more peacekeepers in northeastern Congo, where Lord's Resistance Army (LRA) cadres are still active. Meanwhile, an FDLR faction appears to be in the vicinity of Kirumba (North Kivu province), intending to attack the town.

May 1, 2009: The UN continues to conduct "follow operations" in North Kivu province to prevent the Democratic Forces for the Liberation of Rwanda (FDLR) from reassembling. Congolese Army units are participating in the sweeps. Results are decidedly mixed. Aid workers in the area have called the UN-Congolese operation a failure. Refugee agencies report that at least 100,000 people have been forced to temporarily flee the fighting. There are also reports of FDLR militiamen murdering civilians. This echoes reports of reprisal attacks by the FDLR in early April. FDLR militiamen blamed Congolese civilians for giving away their hiding places when the Rwandan Army and the Congolese Army were conducting their joint offensive in January and February 2009 against the FDLR (which are the remnants of the Hutu mass murderers who fled Rwanda in 1994).

May 12, 2009: Nearly 20,000 refugees have returned to their homes near Goma in eastern Congo.

May 14, 2009: FDLR rebels in the east massacred 90 villagers.

May 19, 2009: The UN has asked the government to arrest five senior army officers for war crimes. The five are former rebel leaders that, as part of the amnesty deal, joined the army. But the former rebels did not give up their warlord ways, and continued to abuse civilians (rape, murder, looting). In addition, general Bosco Ntaganda, commanding many of the government forces (FARDC) fighting the FDLR in the eastern Congo, is wanted by the UN for war crimes. But the government refuses to give up Ntaganda.

May 28, 2009: The army and UN peacekeepers have again pushed into territory in the east (280 kilometers north of Goma) that has long been controlled by the FDLR.

June 1, 2009: Multiple tribal and political militias, plus an increasing number of bandits, continue to roam the countryside, perpetuating the bloodiest (and least reported) war of the post Cold War era (over five million dead, and counting). Peacekeepers and army action have reduced the size of these violent groups, but not eliminated them. There are now fewer places that the bad guys can roam freely. Attempts to merge rebels into the army has not worked well. The last major problem, a Tutsi militia in the east that will not disarm until the government destroys Hutu militias built around Hutu mass murderers who fled neighboring Rwanda in the 1990s, is being disbanded. But the bandits and warlords are not going to disappear completely. The reason is money, the millions of dollars available each year to whoever has gunmen controlling the mines that extract valuable ores and allow the stuff out of the country. UN peacekeepers are criticized for not fighting more, but that's not their job. Congolese army not up to it yet either, so there it simmers.

June 5, 2009: LRA rebels kidnapped 135 villagers in northern Congo. The LRA has killed at least a thousand Congolese civilians since last December. The continuing violence is forcing local army forces to at least try to catch and kill the LRA gunmen. Several hundred Ugandan LRA rebels have established themselves in northern Congo, where they live by looting from local villages. Operations against them by government and Ugandan troops earlier this year failed, as the LRA fighters simply evaded the attackers. The government has no plans to go after the LRA again, unless the Ugandan rebels become more of a problem. After a decline in violence last year, casualties and violence against civilians is up over 20 percent this year. The military operations against the FDLR earlier this year were hobbled by theft (of money provided to maintain the troops), rape and looting. It was hard to tell the difference between the government forces and the rebels they were attempting to defeat.

June 11, 2009: The chaos in the east is the result of corruption and undisciplined leadership. Soldiers are not paid, because the money is stolen by senior officials and officers. Too many of the military commanders are untrained, or uninterested in being professional soldiers. Many were formerly warlords and bandits, and are not keen to change. The thousands of FDLR Hutu rebels from Rwanda remain the most dangerous, because they are the most undisciplined and out-of-control fighters in the region. The Rwandan Hutus live off the locals, looting, raping and killing on a regular basis, extorting food and other goods via the threat of murder. From time to time, the Hutu rebels continue to kill dozens of villagers, to maintain the climate of terror. Despite several years of government and UN peacekeeper operations against them, the FDLR continues to hold its bases in the east. Over the last 15 years, the FDLR have caused hundreds of thousands of civilians to flee their homes. Other fighting in eastern Congo in this period has caused over 1.3 million people from their homes.

June 15, 2009: The International Criminal Court (ICC) announced that former Congo vice president Jean-Pierre Bemba will face five counts of war crimes charges. In 2006 Bemba lost the presidential election run-off to current Congolese president, Joseph Kabila.

June 17, 2009: Soldiers opened fire on a UN base camp located northwest of Goma (in eastern Congo). The soldiers were involved in a pay dispute, which some describe as a mutiny. Under any circumstances, this is another indication of just how weak an organization the army is.

June 19, 2009: A government believes that the "integration" of former Congolese Tutsi fighters from the National Congress for Defense of the People (CNDP) was tentative. The CNDP was led by General Laurent Nkunda. Nkunda remains in Rwanda, under arrest.

June 20, 2009: Some 32 people died in fighting between the Army and FDLR militiamen from June 17 to June 19. The biggest clash occurred when an FDLR detachment attacked a government garrison in the town of Nyabiondo (northwest of Goma, North Kivu province).

June 22, 2009: UN forces in Congo (MONUC) are continuing to conduct joint operations with the Congolese Army (FARDC) against the FDLR in North and South Kivu provinces. The UN says the operations have three objectives: (1) protect the Congolese civilian populace; (2) end the FDLR threat; (3) return the Kivus to Congo government control. MONUC estimates that the FDLR has reorganized and now has several thousand fighters (estimates vary, from 3000 to 6000). Congolese fighters now provide around a third of the reconstituted FDLR force.

June 24, 2008: The UN peacekeeping operation Congo (MONUC) costs one billion dollars a year. This is about one-quarter of the UN's annual peacekeeping budget.

June 26, 2009: The Democratic Forces for the Liberation of Rwanda (FDLR) militiamen continue to carry out reprisal attacks against civilians in North Kivu province. The FDLR militiamen are angry that Congolese civilians provided intelligence to the Congolese Army and Rwandan Army during their joint offensive earlier this year. An estimated 300,000 civilians have fled from FDLR attacks. There is an ebb and flow to the civilian displacements. FDLR militias attack and the civilians flee. The militias move on and the people return.

July 1, 2009: Can the Congolese Army (FARDC) be reformed? This has become a critical question for the UN Security Council, MONUC (UN peacekeeping operation in Congo), and international donor nations. Reports of fragmentation, desertion and "occasional" mutiny continue to mount. There are always reports of FARDC attacks on civilians, looting, and plundering. One reason is that FARDC isn't really an army, especially in eastern Congo. FARDC is a "collection." There are some regular forces, but in eastern Congo many FARDC units were not so long ago rebel militias. MONUC is largely stuck with its "Congolese military restructuring" strategy. MONUC's intent has been to create, train, and equip an army that can take over security operations. However, the strategy has been sidetracked by using the military as a way to pay militiamen to quit being rebels. That decision vastly complicates the problem of creating a well-trained, disciplined, and loyal national military force.

July 1, 2009: The UN estimates that the Lords Resistance Army (LRA) has killed 1,200 Congolese in the six months following the joint Uganda-South Sudan-Congo joint offensive against the Ugandan rebel organization. The LRA cadres have abducted at least 1,500 Congolese.

July 2, 2009: China is deploying another peacekeeping team to the Congo to serve with MONUC. This is China's tenth team to serve in the Congo (ie, it has deployed, as part of a military rotation policy, nine other teams since 2003). The first contingent of the new rotation is a 100 troops unit with engineers and medical staff. Another 118 troops will deploy later in July.

July 7, 2009: The government and the military command said that it will punish Congolese soldiers who abuse civilians. The government and military have been the targets of NGO complaints on several issues, but accusations of rape by Congolese soldiers (verified by media, military observers, and aid groups, among others) has hurt the government politically. A recent human rights group study contended that the Congolese Army (FARDC) is responsible for most of the rapes committed in eastern Congo. It also accused the army of looting and "forced labor" (ie, rounding up civilians at gunpoint and ordering them to carry supplies and do manual work).

July 11, 2009: The UN said it still needs an additional 3000 peacekeeping troops in Congo, but it will be at least three months (or more) before the reinforcements arrive. The reinforcements were requested in late 2008.

Tanzania, Jordan, Bangladesh, and Egypt promised to send troop contingents. The UN peacekeeping directorate is still seeking more.

July 13, 2009: FDLR militiamen struck a UN peacekeeping position near the town of Mwenga, in South Kivu. One Pakistani soldier was injured in the attack. UN soldiers drove off the attackers with machine gun-fire and "heavy weapons" (apparently mortars). The FDLR assault appears to have been coordinated and quite large. The militiamen attacked with small arms, machine guns, and rocket-propelled grenades.

July 14, 2009: The UN estimates that the Ugandan rebel Lords Resistance Army now has around 500 fighters operating in northeastern Congo, south Sudan, and as far west as the Congo-Central African Republic border. The estimate is very guesstimate and is based on fragmentary reports from Congolese civilians, NGOs operating in the region, and limited military recon. The UN has added some new air assets to its operations in northeastern Congo (four Russian-made MI-17 helicopters and a Russian-made MI-25 reconnaissance helicopter). This is an incremental deployment but likely the best the UN can do at the moment. The helicopters will provide some additional recon, airlift, and air strike capability. The MI-17 is a derivative of the Russian MI-8 helicopter. It can carry a couple of dozen soldiers as passengers. We may hear about UN peacekeepers launching small-scale airmobile forays against the LRA.

July 17, 2009: There is increasing pressure for the government to indict and prosecute senior military officers who have commanded units that engaged in rape or permitted the rape of Congolese women and girls (and, increasingly of late, men). Sex crimes have been an ugly (and all too frequent) element in the crime and chaos of the eastern Congo.

July 23, 2009: A key Congolese Army base in the eastern Congo (in the town of Mandje, North Kivu province) was attacked by FDLR militiamen, which left 24 dead, 16 of them civilians.

July 31, 2009: Nearly 60,000 people have been displaced by fighting in South Kivu province since late June. The refugees fled fighting between FDLR militiamen and government forces assisted by UN forces. (The operation is a continuation of Operation Kimia II.)

August 1, 2009: The FDLR (Democratic Forces for the Liberation of Rwanda, a Rwandan Hutu militia) has 6,000 militia members in the Congo and is attempting to retake some of the villages they controlled in January and February 2009.

August 5, 2009: Allegations of "mineral laundering" (also called "mineral pillaging") are cropping up once again. Various rebel militias operating in the eastern Congo are receiving money from organizations seeking access to gold mines and deposits of coltan (which is used in producing many electronic devices). Third-party "mineral traders" appear with cash and payoff militia leaders. The minerals are then shipped out of the Congo. Shipping requires more bribes. Some government army units have received payments from these illegal mineral traders, but then some of the Congolese Army units in the eastern Congo were once militia forces.

August 13, 2009: Suspected Mai Mai militiamen allied with the FDLR attacked the town of Mpama (North Kivu province). At least 16 people died in the incident and several dozen were injured, though a UN estimate said “up to 40” people were killed. Mpama is near the big Bisie tin mine (cassiterite). According to a government report the militia force did not attack the mine. Actually attacking mines in the Congo is considered to be stupid, even by the militias. It is something akin to the “don't attack oil facilities" rule that operates in the Middle East, at least among Middle Eastern governments (though that rule is frequently broken). Militias still manage to extort money from the mines by threatening to launch attacks on mineral shipments (attacks on convoys) or threatening to mine the roads.

August 19, 2009: The UN Mission in Congo (MONUC) headquarters announced that it expects substantial reinforcements to arrive by October 31, 2009, with 2,785 soldiers and 300 more police officers selected for duty in the Congo. Most of the military contingent will come from Egypt (an infantry battalion with attached special forces), Bangladesh (an infantry battalion with additional engineers), and Jordan (a special forces unit). MONUC requested additional troops for service in eastern Congo and in the north-east (the area where the LRA is active). The UN reported that a number of former Burundian National Liberation Forces (FLN) fighters appear to be joining the FDLR in the Congo. The men are ethnic Hutus and the FDLR is a predominantly Hutu organization. FDLR leaders played major roles in the 1994 Rwandan genocide, where Hutu extremists killed Tutsi tribesmen and moderate Rwandan Hutus. The FDLR allegedly promises to pay former Burundian guerrillas $500 to join up. That is big money.

August 25, 2009: FDLR militiamen attacked the village of Nyakabere (South Kivu). The UN reported two Congolese soldiers were wounded and three FDLR fighters killed in the attack. The FDLR burned 50 houses. This was mainly about stealing cattle and goats, a looting expedition intended to get food for militia fighters as well as intimidate tribesmen.

August 28, 2009: A Congolese Army unit in eastern Congo reportedly rioted over a pay issue. The unit was in the town of Uvira (South Kivu province) and had been involved in an operations against the FDLR. A Congolese government official described the trouble as "mutiny." At least fifty soldiers were demanding four months back pay. The trouble began August 26 when the soldiers put up roadblocks around the town.

August 29, 2009: The UN reported that during the month of August, attacks by Ugandan rebel Lords Resistance Army (LRA) fighters in Orientale province (north-east Congo) have forced 125,000 people to flee. The most intense assaults occurred in Haut Uele district, where the town of Dungu is located. The Dungu area has been the scene of several LRA attacks on homes and schools. The UN command estimates the LRA has killed 1,270 people in Orientale since December 2008, when Uganda and the Congo attacked LRA sanctuaries in north-eastern Congo. The UN estimates that 500 LRA fighters are still out there.

August 31, 2009: A group of armed men attacked homes belonging to two government officials. Investigators said the attacks were direct attempts to intimidate the ministers and the attackers left messages warning them that they would die if they testified against former vice-president Jean-Pierre Bemba, who is on trial in the International Criminal Court for war crimes.. Both government ministers had been members of Bemba's Congo Liberation Movement (MLC) political party. Bemba is regarded as current president Joseph Kabila's key opponent.

September 3, 2009: The UN and Congolese government are trying to forge a common strategy in the eastern Congo. The UN refers to the program as the “integrated joint strategy” for combating the FDLR (Democratic Forces for the Liberation of Rwanda) and other militias. If it sounds like a riff on counter-insurgency operations (COIN), that's because it is. The joint Rwanda-Congo offensive against the FDLR destroyed several FDLR units and scattered the rest, but the FDLR has reconstituted, and may have between 5-6,000 fighters (roughly the force it had in January 2009). The FDLR has used intimidation tactics and conducted reprisals against tribesmen who provided the government and UN with intelligence during the joint offensive. However, the fact the FDLR continues to operate in the areas indicates they have a support network. While some tribes are sympathetic, the logical support network for financing FDLR operations is “third party mineral buyers.” That's a bureaucrat term for traders illegally dealing in rare minerals found in eastern Congo (the term “trading in conflict minerals” is used to describe the illegal business). A genuine integrated strategy would use police, financial institution, and international agencies to seize the mineral buyers assets and eventually prosecute them.

September 14, 2011: The government said that the UN Mission on Congo (MONUC) would be able to withdraw from the Congo in 2011. The statement was greeted with real skepticism by many analysts and Congolese. The government statement indicated that the Congolese Army (FARDC) and the National Congolese Police (PNC) would have to be able to handle security issues. Few people believe these organizations will be capable of handling security in 2011.

September 16. 2009: There has been a new series of militia attacks in northeastern Congo. The attacks have displaced around 100,000 people in Ituri District. The worst attacks appear to have taken place about 70 kilometers south of the town of Bunia. A Congolese Army (FARDC) attack had also created refugees. The army launched a reprisal attack on a village (Gety) after a local militia (FRPI/FPJC, Patriotic Resistance Front in Ituri/Popular Front for Justice in the Congo) had ambushed a Congolese Army unit and killed a soldier. An army statement accused villagers of “collaborating” with the rebels. This looks like the kind of action by the army that leads observers to say it is often as dangerous to Congolese civilians as the rebel militias.

September 24, 2009: An ad hoc coalition, the government described as rebel militias operating in eastern Congo (primarily in North Kivu province), announced it was suspending cooperation with the government and would no longer participate in the 2008 ceasefire deal. Arrests of militia leaders for war crimes was cited as a main reason for the political withdrawal. The government dismissed the militia group's statement. However, this is the “flip side” of war crimes prosecutions. In the Congo the UN and the government want to make political deals to end the fighting. The leaders they negotiate with could well be charged with war crimes (and for that matter, so could members of the Congolese government). The militia leaders don't want to disarm, face prosecution, and then a lengthy stay in jail – so why make a political deal? The “ICC problem” (named after the International Criminal Court, which issues war crimes warrants) has certainly played a role in Uganda's peace negotiations with the Lords Resistance Army. The problem has now shown up in the Congo.

September 27, 2009: A “migrant war” has begun pitting Congo-Brazzaville and Angola against the Democratic Republic of Congo. Over the last several weeks Angola has expelled around 9,000 illegal migrants from the Congo (800 were living in the Angolan enclave of Cabinda). Congo-Brazzaville has also recently expelled Congolese (ie, citizens of the DRC) who were living in its territory illegally. The Congolese government is now retaliating against Angola. It isn't clear how many Angolans have been sent back to Angola. The government indicated it intends to retaliate against Congo-Brazzaville.

September 29, 2009: The rebel groups in Eastern Congo are facing a cash crises. Many of these groups keep their gunmen paid and armed via the sale of raw materials. Much like diamonds financed West African rebels for years, various valuable ores have sustained warlords in Eastern Congo. But now the foreign companies that ultimately obtain the illegally exported ores are being pressured to halt those purchases. Without the cash, the Congolese warlords won't be able to maintain a large enough force to resist the army and UN peacekeepers. Even now, some rebel groups are forcibly conscripting teenagers, and forcing the kids to fight for them. These fighters are not as reliable as paid gunmen, and are much more difficult to supervise.

September 29, 2009: The Congolese Army is investigating a senior officer who has been accused of fraternizing with Mai-Mai militiamen –getting drunk with them, specifically. The officer (who is now officially "suspended") was with the Mai-Mai just before the militia attacked his own forces and killed six Congolese soldiers. The attack occurred in Nyamilima (near the Congo-Uganda border). One Mai-Mai militiaman died in the attack.

September 30, 3009: UN peacekeeping forces firing rockets from helicopter killed seven Mai-Mai militiamen. The Mai-Mai were trying to attack a Congolese Army camp in North Kivu province. The UN reported the Congolese force in the camp requested the airstrike.

October 6, 2009: It often takes a long time to hear about firefights and massacres in distant regions. Typically medical relief organizations get the word from survivors. Then peacekeepers or government police investigate. Modern communications helped speed up the reporting process. However, the government is just now confirming an attack by the Ugandan rebel LRA on the town of Digba (Orientale province, northeast Congo). The attack took place September 25. leaving 22 Congolese civilians dead. Survivors said the LRA group had around 40 men. The LRA rebels attacked the civilians with machetes.

October 9, 2009: The UN disarmament program in North and South Kivu provinces has been a mixed bag. Recently UN peacekeepers reached an agreement with the Republican Federal Forces (FRF) militia and a Mai-Mai militia (Mai Mai Yakutumba). The militias agreed to allow 450 militia members participate in the disarmament program. Some of the militiamen may be allowed to participate in a reintegration program (ie, learn civilian skills as they demobilize).

October 13, 2009: The Congo continues to expel Angolan refugees. Diplomats describe the Angola-Congo tiff as “tit for tat expulsions” but it really has aspects of a “refugee war” with refugees used as economic and political ammunition. Angola has expelled undocumented Congolese working in Angola. Angolan sources claim the Congo has forced 23,000 Angolans to return to Angola since August 2009. The Angolan government has protested. Many of the Angolans inside the Congo have been there for at least two decades. They fled from Angola's long, bitter civil war.

October 15, 2009: The UN and several non-governmental organizations estimate that 900,000 Congolese citizens have been displaced by fighting in eastern Congo since the Congolese government began an offensive against the FDLR in January 2009. The offensive was :reinvigorated: this past summer. The NGO criticism has been particularly stinging, since the NGOs accuse the UN forces of failing to protect the civilians. The NGOs harshest criticism focuses on the government and the Congolese Army.

October 16, 2009: A UN investigation concluded that the Congolese Army (FARDC) unit shot and killed, hacked, or beat to death 50 Rwandan refugees in a massacre that occurred in North Kivu province in late April 2009. The refugees were Rwandan Hutu tribesmen. The army unit was pursuing Democratic Forces for the Liberation of Rwanda (FDLR) militiamen. The Congolese unit was one of the “reintegrated” units, largely composed of former Congolese Tutsi militiamen. The FDLR retaliated by attacking a nearby village and murdering 96 Congolese civilians. The eastern Congo has native Tutsi tribesmen.

October 17, 2009: The announced withdrawal of MONUC peacekeepers was met with a great deal of skepticism. Foreign diplomats and UN peacekeepers do not believe the Congo (particularly eastern Congo) will be sufficiently stabilized by the end of 2011. In fact, some UN military advisers see a troop commitment of at least another five years. 2011 will be the 50th anniversary of Congolese independence. Major national elections are also scheduled. The celebrations and the elections will be viewed by rebels (and would-be rebels) as an opportunity for trouble.

October 19, 2009: Government soldiers (often former rebels who accepted amnesty, and a job in the army) have been causing most of the civilian deaths in the eastern Congo. UN peacekeepers are appalled at the savagery of their "allies", but have a difficult time stopping the atrocities (the wayward troops have no problem shooting at peacekeepers.) The big problem is with the Congolese officers, who are often former rebel leaders. These guys have changed uniforms, but not attitudes, and the government is finding it very difficult getting rebels to quit being rebels.

October 20, 2009: Humanitarian relief organizations are describing the plight of refugees forced to return to Angola from the Congo as “an unfolding tragedy.” The tit for tat expulsions began in August. The UN estimates that as of mid-October 32,000 Angolan refugees had been expelled by the Congolese government. Angola has expelled around 18,000 Congolese refugees. The situation in Angola is particularly precarious. The relief groups say that the refugees lack the basics: food, shelter, and medicine.

October 28, 2009: FDLR militiamen killed ten civilians in a series of attacks in North Kivu province. The UN reported that UN peacekeepers engaged FDLR fighters who had ambushed a convoy in the area and killed three militiamen.

November 2, 2009: The government claimed that the Congolese Army is making progress against the FDLR in North and South Kivu provinces. The statement came in the face of accusations of Congolese Army assaults on innocent civilians.

November 6, 2009: In the last several days two tribes in Equateur province (north Congo) have fought a series of battles, leaving over 60 people dead. A disagreement over fishing rights sparked the battle between the Munzaya and Enyele. The tribes are also involved in a dispute over village farming rights. The most serious incident apparently took place in the village of Dongo, but the government indicated that several smaller villages were burned in the fighting. Many tribesmen have fled the fighting, some crossing the border (the Ubangui River) into the Republic of Congo (Congo-Brazzaville). At least 15,000 tribals have fled the area. The government reported that the Munzaya and Enyele fought in March 2009 and the trouble has continued. A serious incident took place on October 30 with over 40 government police were caught in a clash between the tribes. In that incident tribals fought with machete and hunting rifles over control of a pond.

November 8, 2009: The UN peacekeeping mission in the Congo (MONUC) has stopped providing liaison and support to units in the Congolese Army (FARDC) that killed civilians during operations against the Democratic Forces for the Liberation of Congo (FDLR). One of the units the UN will no longer support, was involved in an incident that left 62 Congolese civilians dead. The question to ask is where is the Congolese government in this tangle. Well, that isn't clear. The government has little control over many army units. The government has focused on defeating the FDLR, in part to fulfill commitments to the Rwandan government.

November 9, 2009: A medical aid organization has charged the Congolese Army with “targeting” Hutu tribesmen who were using a medical clinic in North Kivu. The tribals came to the clinic to receive vaccinations. A Congolese Army unit allegedly attacked the Hutus and killed 62 civilians. The rebel FDLR militia is a predominantly Rwandan Hutu force and the Congolese Army has been attacking the FDLR.

November 17, 2009: The UN estimates that approximately 40 tons of gold are smuggled out of the Congo every year. The smuggled gold has a value of around $1.3 billion. A UN report alleges the gold moves from the Congo to Uganda and “front companies” ship it from Uganda to Dubai, United Arab Emirates. Militia groups operating in the eastern Congo (including the FDLR, Democratic Forces for the Liberation of Rwanda) take a cut from the smuggling operation & S232;

November 19, 2009: A recent poll in the Congo showed that the vast majority of Congolese want the UN peacekeepers to remain in the country. MONUC leaders are responding to demands from some Congolese that the peacekeepers should leave the country. Interestingly enough, the most common complaint from Congolese is that MONUC has failed to adequately protect Congolese civilians.

November 20, 2009: At least 100 people were killed in a new series of battles involving the Lobala and Boba tribes in Equateur province. The fighting has occurred on the Congo-Congo (Brazzaville) border.

Apparently, 50,000 people have fled the fighting. This is a continuation of fighting over fishing rights and water resources which occurred in late October. The new round of fighting began in mid-November.

November 24, 2009: The Internaitonal Criminal Court (ICC) is proceeding with the trial of two militia commanders who are charged with killing 200 civilians in an attack in 2003. The militia leader, Germain Katanga and Mathieu Ngudjolo Chui are also charged with sex slavery, rape, and enlisting child soldiers. Katanga was a senior commander of the Patriotic Resistance Force of Ituri (FRPI). Chui led another Ituri faction, the National Integrationist Front (FNI). The attack on the village of Bogoro was one of many in the Hema tribe versus Lendu tribe battles in northeastern Congo. Katanga and Chui led a predominantly Lendu militia into Bogoro, drove off the Union of Congolese Patriots (UPC) militia force in the town, and began killing its inhabitants. Reports filtering out of the area after the incident indicated that the Hema saw the attack as an act of “ethnic cleansing.” The UPC was a predominantly Hema organization.

November 25, 2009: A report for the UN Security Council claimed that the Congolese Army and MONUC have failed to cut-off the FDLR's supply lines in North and South Kivu provinces (eastern Congo). The FDLR has also increased in strength. The latest public estimates are that the FDLR has between 6000 and 8000 militiamen under arms.

November 26, 2009: Militiamen near the town of Dongo (Equateur province) fired on a UN helicopter. The helicopter was on a supply mission. A contingent of 20 Ghanian troops serving with MONUC is deployed in the area where Lobala and Boba tribesmen have been fighting.

November 27, 2009: The European Union has made improving and reforming the Congolese Army (FARDC) a priority. The EU believes that an effective Congolese Army is key to stabilizing the Congo. That's right, but UN peacekeepers and EU trainers involved in Congolese Army training programs say on the record and off the record that progress is very slow. Putting former militia units in the national army does give the government a slight degree of control (the government is paying the troops) but former militia commanders who are suddenly Congolese Army officers balk at taking orders. So far around 50 militia groups (56 by one count) have been incorporated into the Congolese Army. The foreign peacekeepers are seen as the best hope of taming the undisciplined and savage militiamen.

December 10, 2009: There are more reports of fighting near the town of Dongo. A group called the “Resistance Patriots of Dongo” (PRD) claims it is recruiting Congolese to fight “foreign forces” who are deployed against them. The UN did deploy a small force from Ghana in the area and it reportedly sending more troops. The PRD claimed that its fighters had engaged soldiers from the Rwandan Army. This is propaganda.

December 11, 2009: The Congo government has rejected a UN report on the failure of the Kimia II peacekeeping operation. The government claims that the FDLR has been substantially damaged by the operation. Specifically, the government said that as of December 4th 1,279 FDLR have been killed in the offensive and 1,247 militia fighters and supporters have been repatriated to Rwanda. The government also denied reports that the Congolese Army had massacred civilians in eastern Congo. The UN committee that put together the report said that the FDLR has recruited more militiamen.

December 14, 2009: Government forces have retaken the town of Dongo (Equateur province). A “large Congolese Army force” entered Dongo on December 13 and engaged a militia force. Several rebel fighters died in the battle.

December 15, 2009: The Congolese Army is “intensifying” operations against the FDLR in the Walikale, Masisi and Rutshuru regions of North Kivu province. One Congolese soldier was killed in an operation in the province.

December 17, 2009: MONUC is participating in the Kimia II “joint operation” with the Congolese Army (FARDC), which will conclude by the end of 2009. The operation has drawn criticism, mainly because Congolese soldiers have killed hundreds of civilians during the operation. Kimia II is an operation against the FDLR (Democratic Forces for the Liberation of Rwanda), a predominantly Rwandan Hutu militia but one that over the years has attracted some support in eastern Congo. Why? The FDLR has money, allegedly from selling and smuggling valuable minerals. For example, smuggled Congolese gold moves through Burundi and Rwanda to the United Arab Emirates.

December 18, 2009: A major battle between the Congolese Army and an “insurgent force” near the town of Dongo (Equateur province) took place earlier this week. The army claimed 47 rebels dead, and 32 soldiers were wounded. The UN has beefed up its own troop presence in the region.

MONUC said it has around 500 soldiers deployed to help the Congolese Army with logistics (both supply and transportation). The UN force in Dongo draws on Ghanaian, Tunisian and Egyptian contingents. It also has a small contingent of Guatemalan Special Forces. The UN force will be supported by armored personnel carriers. Part of the force will deploy to Dongo, part to the town of Bozene, and part near the Ubangui River.

December 19, 2009: The rumors continue, but this time there appears to be action behind the rumors. The government has once again asked the UN to come up with a plan to end MONUC, the UN's Congo peacekeeping mission. The date is hazy but next year is the 50th anniversary of Congo's independence from Belgium. To many Congolese, the UN peace keeping force looks a lot like an imperial force –albeit one employing a lot of soldiers from developing nations. So MONUC is putting together some sort of “exit strategy.” Don't bet that MONUC will go, however. The plan will likely have “phases” and “benchmarks.” One of the benchmarks has to be an effective Congolese Army. Achieving that goal, unfortunately, is many years away. There is also the simple logistical problem of withdrawing soldiers and civilian support personnel. That could take up to two years.

December 20, 2009: The UN is reacting to reports of new Lords Resistance Army (LRA) Christmas attacks in the northern Congo by increasing its troops alert level. The UN believes the threats of attacks on civilians are serious threats. Letters, written by LRA rebels, have been found which imply that a new round of attacks was coming, In 2008 the LRA killed over 700 people in attacks around Christmas. Moroccan, Bangladeshi, and Indonesian peacekeeping contingents are deployed around the town of Dungu. Dungu was one of the towns attacked in 2008.

December 21, 2009: The UN has sent peacekeepers, and promises of protection, to thousands of villagers in the northeast. There is great fear that LRA (Lords Resistance Army) raiders will stage raids similar to those they carried out a year ago (and killed nearly a thousand civilians). The LRA are rebels and slavers from Uganda, who are being chased by the military from several countries. This has been going on for years, and the LRA keeps escaping, and marauding.

December 23, 2009: The UN Security Council extended the mandate for MONUC's peacekeeping operation. However, the new mandate only runs through May 2010. In the past MONUC mandates ran for a year.

December 24, 2009: The government has said it will honor agreements to provide former supporters of General Laurent Nkunda with civil service and other government jobs. Talks between the government and ex-rebels have been going on for quite some time. The government said this is part of a “political reintegration” program to end the fighting in eastern Congo. Nkunda led the National Congress for Defense of the People (CNDP).

December 29, 2009: More news from Dongo (area in Equateur province). The UN estimates Over 160,000 people have fled from Dongo, an area in Equateur province (northern Congo). Many of the refugees (an estimated 90,000) have crossed the border into the Republic of Congo (Brazzaville) and into the Central African Republic (CAR). Refugees report seeing 15 Congolese policemen killed in October 2009, by Enyele tribesmen. The killers were led by a man named Udjani, who claims to possess a magic sword which can poison his victims (as well as cut them, presumably). Another story states that Udjani could “jam” guns so they would not fire (ie, using his magic). Udjani is following a familiar path, where a religious cult leader (eg, animist “medicine man” or a “Christian mystic” like the LRA) starts a tribal war or a war against the government. What throws an interesting twist of reality into this particular “mystic uprising” is that the UN and other sources believe several of Udjani's followers were formerly in militias loyal to ex-Congolese vice-president Jean-Pierre Bemba.

January 1, 2010: The controversial Kimia 2 operation against the Democratic Forces for the Liberation of Rwanda (FDLR) is over. Now the Congolese Army has officially launched Operation Amani Leo (which in Swahili translates as “peace today). The government still maintains that Kimia 2 was successful and “degraded” the FDLR.

January 2, 2010: NGOs with personnel in the Dongo area have reported that Eneyel tribesmen loyal to Udjani have ambushed barges carrying refugees across the Ubangi River from the Congo into the Central African Republic (CAR).

January 7, 2010: Responding to insistent criticism from diplomats regarding the government's endemic corruption, the government fired 119 senior civil servants in the last week. At least another 2,500 lower ranking civil servants (according to one source from customs and tax offices) will be forced to take early retirement. Many of the senior officials were in budgeting and financial offices.

January 20, 2010: Researchers have questioned the validity of a widely-published estimate for the number of dead killed in the Congo's various wars since 1995. One analysis said the figure of 5.4 million (generally attributed to the International Rescue Committee) is much too high and suggested 2.8 million deaths is more accurate. The truth is no one really knows. Many press reports rely on refugee statements made days (or even weeks) after a village has been attacked. Estimates of the death toll from exposure, disease, and starvation also vary widely. Many people die “in transit” as they flee attacks. More reasonable estimates run from three to five million, with 1998 used as the “baseline” year.

January 26, 2010: At least 15,000 people have fled renewed fighting in North Kivu province (eastern Congo). This estimate is based on the number of refugees fleeing to refugee camps in North Kivu. Most of the new refugees come from an area northwest of Goma, North Kivu's capital. The Congolese Army has been conducting operations in the area against the Democratic Forces for the Liberation of Rwanda (FDLR).

January 27, 2010: The Russian government announced that its military will be training 30 more Congolese soldiers as part of a bilateral training agreement.

January 28, 2010: The Mai Mai Kifuafua militia is complaining that the government has not come through on its peace deal commitments. The Mai Mai are miffed that the government has not provided the militiamen with the political jobs (including ministerial positions) they were promised over a year ago when the Kifuafua signed on the the Goma peace agreement. The Kifuafua militiamen have their critics. Recently a government spokesman said the militia had not done what many other former guerrilla groups have done, which is form a political party and engage the political process. However, politics does not seem to interest the Kifuafua and other Mai Mai militias. One disgruntled Kifuafua leader has threatened to go back into the bush and renew the rebellion.

February 5, 2010: The Chinese government recently indicated that it is willing to provide more diplomatic and economic assistance in order to bring stability to the eastern Congo. China has informed both the Congolese and Rwandan governments of this aim. China holds a permanent seat on the UN Security Council, and supports the continuing MONUC peacekeeping effort. The promise of more direct involvement is no surprise, since China has significant investments in sub-Saharan Africa and in the Congo in particular.

February 7, 2010: Taking advantage of the fact that most of the gunmen in the Hutu militias were too young to have committed any crimes during the 1994 genocide of Tutsi in Rwanda, the government has been dropping leaflets offering them amnesty, and explaining that rebel leaders were lying about all Hutu being subject to punishment. This campaign cost the rebels about 500 men last year, and the desertion rate is more than doubling this year.

February 11, 2010: It has taken seven weeks but international observers are confirming six militia attacks in the Ituri region of Orientale Province (northeastern Congo, near the Uganda border). The fighting took place two months ago, when the Popular Front for Justice in the Congo (FPJC) and the Ituri Patriotic Resistance Front (FRPI) clashed. One of these militias is suspected of launching an attack on several villages south of the town of Bunia on January 12, 2010, leaving six people dead.

February 12, 2010: The UN Mission in the Congo (MONUC) denied that it had issued an ultimatum that rebel militias only had 45 days to disarm. That was an order of the Congolese government. Rebel groups were to disarm, and some would be allowed to join the Congolese Army (FARDC).

February 13, 2010: The Ugandan rebel Lords resistance Army still presents a threat to northeastern Congo. Some 30,000 Congolese are still refugees inside neighboring Sudan. The LRA has regrouped in the region and is operating in small, mobile units. This typically means from four to 12 people.

February 16, 2010: FDLR rebels killed seven women in South Kivu province, after being kidnapped. This is likely another case of gang rape.

February 18, 2010: The government and the government of Rwanda have reached an agreement to exchange refugees. This has been in the works for some time. However, simply reaching an agreement is not going to solve what has become a major ethnic and political issue in eastern Congo. Around 50,000 Congolese Tutsis fled the Congo for Rwanda and have been there for several years. Approximately 90,000 Rwandans (mostly Hutus) went the other way, fleeing Rwanda for the Congo. Some reports put the number of Rwandans at 100,000. The basic agreement calls for voluntary repatriation. It remains to see how many refugees agree to move voluntarily. The Hutu rebel Democratic Forces for the Liberation of Congo (FDLR) specifically targeted Congolese Tutsis. That noted, the UN recently reported some Congolese Tutsis have returned to the Congo.

February 22, 2010: Is the government setting the stage for renewed civil war? President Joseph Kabila recently fired some cabinet ministers and moved appointees from one job to another. He also eliminated 11 cabinet positions (shrinking from 54 to 43). The moves were expected. However, no former rebels were appointed to positions. The various peace agreements promised that members of rebel organizations that turned in their weapons and became political parties would be rewarded with government jobs. Rebel commanders were led to believe they would get major positions. But that did not occur. As it is, several former rebels have been complaining about the lack of lower-level government jobs.

February 24, 2010: North Korea tried to break the UN weapons embargo on Congo, and was caught. South Africa revealed that, three months ago, it seized several containers of spare parts for T-55 tanks. The crew of the French ship transporting the containers were suspicious of the contents, and asked port authorities in South Africa to investigate. The containers had been put on the French ship in Malaysia (a growing center for arms trafficking), and were marked "bulldozer parts." The containers had earlier been shipped from North Korea to China, changed ships, and carried to Malaysia.

February 25, 2010: A U.S. Marine Corps task force (assigned to AFRICOM) has begun training Congolese Army soldiers, with 30 Marine trainers in the town of Kisangani. For the next eight months the Marines will instruct a battalion of 1,000 Congolese soldiers. The AFRICOM statement said that the Marines will focus on military skills but also emphasize human rights standards. The Congolese Army desperately needs reliable units. It appears that AFRICOM intends to help create a skilled battalion, a “building block” unit that can be used as an example for other Congolese military units.

March 3, 2010: Eighteen army battalions began a new operation against the FDLR in North Kivu and South Kivu provinces. UN peacekeepers are supporting this very large Congolese operation.

March 4, 2010: The UN is once again talking about withdrawing its peacekeeping contingent. Withdrawals from MONUC (UN Mission in the Congo) could begin as early as this June. The withdrawal discussion has taken several interesting political twists and the June date is completely political. The government plans to celebrate the Congo's 50th anniversary of independence from Belgium in June. The Congo, however, is not stable and war continues to plague the eastern Congo. MONUC has indicated the June withdrawals (if they actually occur) will involve troops deployed in the western Congo.

March 8, 2010: The government has begun another weapons turn in program. This one is nicknamed “a firearm for 50 dollars.” The program is designed to reduce the number of firearms in the eastern Congo. The government expects between 20,000 and 30,000 weapons will be traded for the cash. The program is being implemented in North Kivu province.

March 10, 2010: Former rebel officers in the National Congress for Defense of the People (CNDP) of running crime rackets. The former rebel officers (several of them now serving as officers in the Congolese Army) are extorting money from civilian miners who work in the region's numerous mines. The military force charged with protecting the mines charges the miners a fee to work at the mine. This is the same racket the militias ran. Now the militiamen are part of the army and they run the same scam. The CNDP was run by General Laurent Nkunda (who is now under arrest in Rwanda.)

March 16, 2010: Attacks on civilians by the Ugandan rebel Lords Resistance Army (LRA) and the Rwandan Hutu Democratic Forces for the Liberation of Rwanda (FDLR) receive condemnation from the UN and a fair amount of press coverage. However, aid workers and UN monitors frequently criticize the Congolese Army (FARDC) for committing the same kind of atrocities on civilians (kidnapping, rape, and other sexual violence). The record is abysmal. It's estimated that half of the rapes committed in North Kivu province in the first seven months of 2009 were committed by Congolese Army troops. That's right, crimes and in some cases war crimes committed against the very people they are supposed to be protecting. The government calls it criminal behavior by individuals and says the soldiers will be punished, but this rarely happens. The documented cases of gang rape by soldiers indicates that it's an organized crime. UN trainers working with the Congolese Army talk about command problems in the FARDC. One of the major problems is the number of militia groups that have been integrated into the military in terms of pay, but still operate as if they were rebel militias. The justice system in the Congo is ineffective, to say the least, and the military justice system weak and often corrupt.

March 28, 2010: MONUC is considering reinforcing its peacekeeping contingent in the northeastern Congo. International rights organizations and a number of Congolese tribes are complaining that the Congolese Army is incapable of protecting civilians threatened by the LRA. At the moment the UN has around 1000 troops stationed in the region –which is very few, given the size of the region and the tough terrain.

April 4, 2010: A group of Enyele rebels landed by boat in the town of Mbandaka (Equateur province) and launched a series of attacks. The rebel force attacked the governor's home and took control of the airfield. The rebels also attacked a church.

April 5, 2010: The government and UN reported that the Congolese Army and MONUC troops had regained control of the Mbandaka airfield, after a battling Enyele rebels who launched a surprise attack on April 4. The reported casualties indicate a fairly vigorous firefight in the city and particularly around the airfield: seven Congolese soldiers killed, three Congolese policemen, and 21 Enyele rebels. The UN reported that two UN workers were slain in the city and one peacekeeping soldier (from a Ghanian detachment) was killed. The UN estimated the attacking Eneyele force had an estimated 100 to 150 fighters. With 21 dead, that means 15 to 20 percent were killed in action.

April 9, 2010: The government claimed that a UN force in the town of Mbandaka failed to adequately protect threatened Congolese civilians when they were attacked by a rebel force on April 4.

April 10, 2010: The government claimed that the Congolese Army killed 12 Enyele tribesmen and arrested 35 during counter-insurgency operations in Equateur province in early March. The Enyele (described as rebels) were killed in operations around the town of Mbandaka (capital of Equateur province).

April 11, 2010: The UN has released a sketch of what could become MONUC's withdrawal plan from the Congo. This would take place over a three year period. This conflict's with the Congolese government's stated desire that MONUC withdraw by the end of 2011. The government wants to demonstrate that it does not depend on UN forces. Unfortunately, the government does depend on UN forces. Most Congolese Army units are poorly trained and equipped. The handful with decent equipment are essentially presidential guard units. Though fighting has tapered off in the east, North and South Kivu provinces remain unstable. The northern Congo has a raging inter-tribal conflict, between the Enyele and the Manzaya. Tribal rivalries have simmered for years in the area (Equateur province), but a disagreement over fishing rights turned into a tribal bloodletting which has become a war. The Lords Resistance Army (LRA), still terrorizes the northeastern corner of the Congo. UN units serve as rapid reaction forces. The Congolese military is also distrusted by many Congolese.

April 12, 2010: Canada has offered to send more troops to MONUC (UN Mission in the Congo). Canada is withdrawing its forces in Afghanistan.

April 13, 2010: Congolese opposition groups are forming a new coalition called the Alliance for Maintaining the Peace Agreement of Goma (also CALELD the Goma Alliance). CALELD will include at least 17 rebel organizations, most of them in the eastern Congo. However, the idea is to coordinate opposition to the government and president Kabila. One of the key rebel groups is the Mai Mai Kifuafua (MMK) militia. The MMK objected to the fact its leaders were denied government jobs that it argued were promised in previous peace agreements. Former members of General Laurent Nkunda's National Congress for Defense of the People (CNDP) are also prominent in the new coalition.

April 30, 2010: The government announced that it expects to double cobalt and copper production by 2012. For example, mining companies estimate that the Congo will produce around 40,000 tons of cobalt in 2010. One projection has the Congo mining and exporting 90,000 tons in 2012. There is a big problem with all of the optimistic projections, of course. They assume increasing stability (ie, decent security) and improved transportation infrastructure.

May 1, 2010: The UN is warning that an early withdrawal of peacekeepers from the Congo will erase all the progress made in stabilizing the huge country. At the moment UN peacekeepers are providing the only reliable protection for the numerous UN and NGO aid organizations operating throughout the Congo. The big issue remains creating a truly capable Congolese Army and supporting national police forces. That is an incremental process. As it is, numerous former rebels are expressing increasing aggravation with the Kabila government over what they claim is a failure to provide jobs promised as part of peace agreements.

May 2, 2010: Trouble continues with the Enyele rebels in Equateur province. The spectacular rebel attack on Mbandaka, the provincial capital, brought an influx of peacekeepers. The Enyele have been fighting with the Manzaya over fishing rights. The Enyele and Manzaya are both members of the Lobala tribe. However, the government is worried about an attempt to nationalize the trouble in Equateur. A group calling itself the Independent Liberation Movement of the Allies is claiming to be an umbrella organization for all rebels in the region. The Enyele rebels are part of this group.

May 5, 2010: The leader of the Enyele rebels in Equateur province had been captured. The man, a self-proclaimed mystic called Odjani, claims to have magical powers. He was captured near the town of Dongo by several young men his fighters tried to force to join their group. Apparently his magic didn't work very well.

May 6, 2010: A militia group calling itself the Mai Mai Mayangose attacked a group of nine park rangers in the Virunga National Park (eastern Congo). One ranger was killed in the attack.

May 10, 2010: U.S. AFRICOM trainers are helping train a Congolese Army (FARDC) battalion of 700 soldiers. The training is taking place in the mining town of Kisangani. About 25 U.S. military personnel are involved in the mission. Emergency medical aid, communications, and small-unit tactics are included in the instruction. It appears the goal is to create at least one reliable Congolese Army unit that is assigned to the eastern Congo. The various presidential guards units for the most part only operate in Kinshasha, the capital. The presidential guard units are paid on a regular basis; the rest of the army gets paid haphazardly.

May 11, 2010: The UN reiterated that it intends to reduce its peacekeeping force in the Congo by 2000 soldiers by the end of next month. MONUC currently has around 20,500 peacekeeping personnel deployed.

May 14, 2010: The U.S. government is considering ways to stop American businesses from using illegally mined or sold minerals (so-called conflict minerals) from the eastern Congo. At the moment the State Department is holding what the diplomats call fact-finding discussions with U.S. executives. Some of the minerals (like tantalum and tungsten) play a major role in high tech industries. The Congo has significant deposits of many strategically important minerals, including cobalt.

May 18, 2010: The UN and the Congo government are definitely at odds over conditions governing a MONUC (UN Mission in the Congo) withdrawal. The UN insists that overall security conditions (i.e., an estimate of stability) should determine whether or not the peacekeeping mission stays. The government insists on a December 2011 withdrawal date. MONUC's mandate comes up for renewal at the end of this month. It is clear that the biggest concern on the part of the UN, aid NGOs operating in the Congo, and Congolese civilians, is that the Great Congo War (1998-2003) will return with its full fury. As it is, various militia wars, tribal wars, and rebellions continue unabated.

June 3, 2010: The government reported a force of 150 FDLR fighters attacked a military post in Burungu (North Kivu province). The FDLR killed five soldiers and eight civilians in the attack. The Congolese Army claimed it killed six rebels in the firefight.

June 4, 2010: Amilitia group in South Kivu province ambushed an army patrol near the southeastern town of Matili, killing four soldiers. The town was reportedly under siege by a militia, and the army was advancing to the rescue.

June 5, 2010: A militia group formerly operating in Uganda has shown up in the Congo. The Front for the Liberation of Congo (FPLC) now has a cadre in North Kivu province. According to sources in the eastern Congo, the FPLC has a few hundred militia fighters under its control.

June 12, 2010: Some 500 Mai-Mai fighters who were supposed to be integrated into the Congolese Army say they will no longer recognize the agreement with the government. The Kifufua Mai-Mai contend that the government has been too slow in fulfilling its promises, which include giving Mai Mai commanders leadership positions.

June 20, 2010: Reports from North Kivu province indicate that the Congo's attempts to integrate the National Congress for the Defense of the People (CNDP) into the Congolese Army (FARDC) are failing. That said, accusations that Congolese Tutsis (the base group supporting the CNDP) have created a Tutsi statelet in North Kivu are not accurate. The CNDP is not strong enough to pull that off and Congo is increasingly cooperating with the Rwandan government. More likely are the allegations that CNDP militiamen, who have been integrated into the Congolese Army, still recognize the authority of their militia commanders. In other words, their loyalty is to their CNDP chain of command, not the government's. This type of hidden loyalty has been a major concern for UN peacekeepers involved in the integration program, and not just with the CNDP.

June 30, 2010: The Congo celebrated its 50th year of independence from Belgium. The army held a parade in Kinshasha that included 15,000 soldiers.

July 3, 2010: The UN is once again criticizing the government for failing to bring armed groups under control. These armed groups (which usually means militias, but can mean gangs) are recruiting new members, including under-age children (child soldiers) to fill out their ranks. Their victims are usually civilians. The Democratic Forces for the Liberation of Rwanda (FDLR) and National Congress for the Defense of the People (CNDP) militias have groups operating in both North and South Kivu. The FDLR's FOCA faction operates in South Kivu; its RUD-Urunana faction is based in North Kivu. The Ugandan rebel Lords Resistance Army (LRA) is still active in Orientale province. The LRA has killed at least 300 people this year (January to June 2010) in the Congo.

July 6, 2010: The army has killed 80 rebel fighters who were connected to rebel organizations in Uganda and Rwanda. The rebels were killed in operations that began in June.

July 14, 2010: Its believed that the ADF has around 800 fighters in the Ruwenzori Mountains.

July 15, 2010: There are a large number of refugees in the Ruwenzori Mountains displaced by fighting between the Congolese Army and the ADF. Army units killed 30 ADF fighters and captured nine in various operations, losing six soldiers in the process.

July 16, 2010: The U.S. government has passed a series of laws intended to help stop the trading and sale of so-called conflict minerals originating in the eastern Congo. The new legislation is aimed at stopping illegal trading in tin ore (cassiterite), gold, and coltan (columbite-tantalite). Rebel organizations like the FDLR reportedly get 70 to 75 percent of their money from selling illegal minerals. The idea behind the legislation is that if governments can penalize the buyers of conflict minerals then that will put a crimp in the finances of Congolese militias. This is not necessarily so. Some of the groups (like the various Mai-Mai militias in the eastern Congo) do quite well by crime. These outfits steal and extort from Congolese villagers. Several militias also tax (a euphemism) the locals. Laurent Nkunda (the Congolese Tutsi general now in custody in Rwanda) worked this hustle with the National Congress for the Defense of the People (CNDP). The tax scheme was little more than extortion and theft. The biggest problem may be Congolese Army units. A couple of Congolese brigades are allegedly involved in trading in conflict minerals, or at least providing protection to dealers and smugglers.

July 24, 2010: A group of Democratic Forces for the Liberation of Rwanda (FDLR) rebels attacked an airfield in the Walikale area of North Kivu province (eastern Congo, Rwanda border). This is a tin mining area. The FDLR group reportedly took an Indian pilot hostage after the attack.

July 27, 2010: Approximately 60,000 people have fled the Uganda-Congo border area. The Congolese Army and the UN have been conducting operations against the Ugandan rebel group the ADF in the area. The Congolese Army began to move against the ADF in late June. ADF fighters have been accused of being involved in illegal gold and diamonds trading in eastern Congo.

August 2, 2010: Material captured in Congolese bases of the Allied Democratic Forces (ADF), a Ugandan rebel group, indicates the ADF has operational contact with the Somali Al Shabaab Islamic terrorist organization. The ADF is sometimes referred to as the ADF-NALU (Allied Democratic Forces-National Army for the Liberation of Uganda). Al Shabaab claimed it launched the terrorist attacks in Kampala, Uganda, earlier this month. The Ugandan government has accused the ADF of having links to Sudan's Islamist regime. These reports have increased since the Congolese Army (FARDC) and UN peacekeepers in the Congo launched a series of attacks in the Ruwenzori Mountains on June 26. The attacks targeted ADF base camps and smuggling routes. In the past the ADF has claimed that it is fighting for the rights of Ugandan Moslems.

August 7, 2010: Goodbye MONUC. The UN Mission in the Congo (MONUC) has changed its name. It is now the UN Organization and Stabilization Mission (MONUSCO). That became official in July. Why the name change? The Congolese government wants the UN peacekeepers to leave. So the peacekeepers are now a stabilization force, stabilizing the country so they can withdraw. The eastern Congo has no peace and very little stability. It does not make a lot of sense, does it?

August 9, 2010: Non-governmental aid organizations operating in South and North Kivu province claim that the CNDP is once again acting like a rebel militia. CNDP officers and militiamen were supposed to be integrated into the Congolese Army. Some were, but a number of the officers claimed they were not given appropriate positions. A few officers claimed they had been promised government jobs. One aid group claims that the CNDP is still in the illegal minerals business and has connections to a coltan mining operation. This may be tough to prove in court, but the illegal mineral trade in east Africa continues to boom. Someone is making money.

August 10, 2010: The UN now has 150 Guatemalan special forces troops deployed in Equateur province.

August 12, 2010: The UN promised to combat a resurgence of Lord's Resistance Army activity in Orientale province (northeastern Congo). Civilians in the province have been complaining for almost three years of LRA depredations. The LRA is reportedly building a new base camp in the Bas Uele region in the northeast. MONUSCO has one peacekeeping installation in the area, in the town of Dingila. However, that installation is scheduled for closure as the UN begins withdrawing troops from the region.

August 20, 2010: The Congolese military reported that it had arrested two men suspected of killing three Indian soldiers serving with UN peacekeeping forces. On August 18 the Indian soldiers were hacked to death with machetes by a force of some 60 militiamen. A Mai-Mai militia had attacked the Indian soldiers' base camp near the town of Kirumba (North Kivu province) the day before. One of the killers allegedly said he had received orders to go back to the base camp and kill Indian soldiers. The charge of murder may stick because the peacekeepers thought they were assisting a small group of men who claimed they were in trouble. The 60 militiamen then surrounded the soldiers and hacked them to death. They were not given a chance to surrender. A UN spokesman called the killings a criminal act.

August 21, 2010: The government demanded earlier this year that UN peacekeepers prepare to withdraw the peacekeeping force by sometime next year. In June the UN withdrew about 1,700 troops. Right now about 20,000 peacekeepers serve with UN Organization and Stabilization Mission (MONUSCO). The government, however, wants the UN to keep it supplied with aid money for humanitarian and relief work. This year the UN budgeted over $800 million for relief work in the Congo. A recent UN report, however, said that so far donors have only supplied $400 million. The global recession may be one reason, but aid organizations say the instability in the eastern Congo makes relief operations necessary but also very risky.

September 2, 2010: UN investigators have accused a group of rebels of gang rape. Members of the Democratic Forces for the Liberation of Rwanda (FDLR) committed the crime in late July in a small village in North Kivu province (eastern Congo). At least 200 FDLR rebels participated in a series of night-long assaults on women in the village. The same group is suspected of attacking and plundering other villages in the area. An investigator with a non-governmental organization operating in the province called it a systematic rape of the population. Gang rape is, unfortunately, common in the eastern Congo. Congolese Army forces and some UN peacekeepers serving in eastern Congo have also been accused of rape.

September 10, 2010: MONUSCO now deploys around 17,700 peacekeeping troops. The peacekeepers are supported by another 700 military observers and 1,220 policemen.

September 14, 2010: The government claimed that it will enforce its new ban on mining minerals in the eastern provinces plagued by rebel activity (particularly North and South Kivu provinces). The government also said that it would crack down on smuggling operations which move the minerals out of the Congo. The big question is how the government will enforce the ban. Rebel militias control many key mineral producing areas. Government troops go in, the rebels hide, the government forces occupy the region. So far so good, except many government forces then cut deals with the rebels share the profits from the illegal export of the minerals. As it is, many of the mines in the east are small and scattered throughout the jungle. Some militias have their own miners. The militias arrange to have the minerals (coltan, for example) taken to brokers operating in other east African countries. The Democratic Forces for the Liberation of Rwanda (FDLR), a Rwandan Hutu militia force, has been accused of running a full spectrum mining operation, that includes mining, transportation, and export of gold and coltan.

September 15, 2010: The Congolese Army (FARDC) announced that it intended to launch an offensive in North Kivu province. The offensive is aimed at gaining control of illegal mining operations in the region. The offensive will focus on the Walikale area, a mineral-rich, jungle-covered district. Many of the rebel militias are financed by profits from illegal mining operations.

September 17, 2010: The government of Uganda has offered to provide training for Congolese soldiers. Uganda has also expressed a desire to increase cooperation with the Congo to battle Allied Democratic Forces

(ADF) guerrillas. The ADF is a Ugandan rebel organization and has maintained bases in the eastern Congo. Uganda believes the ADF has connections with Al Shabaab, the Somali Islamist organization which launched the World Cup terror attacks in Uganda in July 2010.

September 25, 2010: Congolese sources, citing the MONUSCO (UN Congo peacekeeping operation) claim that Rwanda has sent troops into North Kivu province. The Rwanda soldiers are aiding Congolese Army operations in the province. A UN spokesman denied the claims. However, in the past Rwandan Army and Congolese forces have conducted joint operations against the FDLR.

October 4, 2010: The UN released a 550 page study on violence and human rights violations in the Congo. The study confined itself to analyzing the worst violations in the last ten years. There are plenty to choose from and the UN chose over 600. The study utilized on-the-ground research teams that interviewed witnesses and survivors. The list of crimes includes murders (tens of thousands), rapes, and kidnappings. Critics have already accused the UN of softening some of the accusations that implicate Rwandan and Ugandan troops. Rwanda reacted to leaked versions of the study by threatening to pull its troops out of the UNAMID operation in Sudan's Darfur region.

October 14, 2010: The Ugandan Allied Democratic Forces (ADF) rebel group now appears to have around 600 fighters in base camps in the eastern Congo (Uganda-Congo border area). The ADF has connections with the Somali Islamist extremist organization Al Shabaab.

October 15, 2010: There is growing opposition, in several European nations, to the UN Congo peacekeeping effort. Critics (many of them former supporters) point to reports of continual mass rapes occurring in both the eastern Congo and along the Angola-Congo border. Despite a series of peace agreements signed in the last two years, rebel militias continue to operate. Militias that were incorporated into the Congolese Army (FARDC) respond selectively (at best) to orders issued by the national government. Rogue elements in the military are also involved in illegal mining operations. The government, led by President Joseph Kabila, is increasingly suppressing its political opponents. In fact, the government has reneged on promises to give the provinces more authority. Political instability continues, particularly in the eastern provinces. What the critics fail to realize is that all this is pretty normal for Africa, and is not going to be changed quickly, even by a large peacekeeping force. The UN condemned an attack on a peacekeeping base in eastern Congo. Around 50 members of a Mai-Mai militia attacked the base camp of an Indian Army peacekeeping contingent located near the town of Rwindi. Rwindi is in North Kivu province. The Indian Army peacekeepers (in company strength, approximately 100 soldiers) killed eight militamen and wounded two. A MONUSCO military report described the firefight as fierce.

October 24, 2010: The Angolan government announced that it intends to deport another 200 Congolese nationals who entered Angola illegally. Aid groups in central Africa claimed that the Angolan announcement indicates that Angola is considering another round of mass expulsions similar to those conducted in 2009. The expulsions are an indication of increasingly poor relations between Angola and the Congo.

October 25, 2010: The government and UN peacekeepers are being urged to arrest Bosco Ntaganda, who is under indictment by the International Criminal Court (ICC). The government, has so far refused. Nataganda is allegedly helping Congolese security forces run anti-militia operations in the eastern Congo. Ntaganda was a senior leader in the National Congress for the Defense of the People (CNDP) militia. Ntaganda replaced rebel general General Laurent Nkunda as head of the CNDP.

October 28, 2010: The U.S. military has deployed a training team to the Congo to help train Congolese Army medical personnel. The operation is code-named “Medflag 10.”

November 6, 2010: Congolese authorities believe faction of the Burundi rebel National Liberation Forces (FNL, a Hutu group) murdered two civilians on the Congo-Burundi border. The Congolese Army claimed that the rebel group were trying to free two captured FNL fighters. When the rebels attacked the Congolese civilians were killed in the crossfire.

November 7, 2010: The UN claims that its observers have documented over 650 case of sexual violence (rape) committed against women who were expelled from Angola to the Congo during the months of September and October. Angola expelled 6621 Congolese (men and women) during the time period. Earlier this year Angola expelled over 10,000 Congolese who had taken refuge in the country. In 2009 Angola expelled over 150,000 Congolese nationals.

November 11, 2010: The UN believes that Congolese Army soldiers assigned to protect civilian villages in the eastern Congo are now protecting illegal mining operations. Moreover, it appears that until late September or early October of this year Congolese Army general Gabriel Amisi Kumba had provided protection to a mining company named Geminaco that was operating the huge Omate gold mine in North Kivu province. Allegedly Kumba got 25 percent of the production from the mine. Germanico lost control of the mine in October, following a government ban on illegal mining in the eastern Congo.

November 11, 2010: The Congo is huge. Helicopters give peacekeepers an edge in mobility over rogue militias, gangs, and tribal war parties. The slow but sure withdrawal of UN peacekeeping forces means there will be fewer helicopters available for transport and logistics. One UN office estimates that by mid-2011 remaining peacekeeping units will only have 14 helicopters available. India recently withdrew eight helicopters. Not all of the cuts in available helos are due to withdrawal of units; some of it is due to withdrawal of funds. Several countries have cut their peacekeeping budgets and helicopter are expensive to operate. MONUSCO, the new name of the UN peacekeeping force, recently had a $73 million budget cut, and it has already affected aircraft availability. Currently MONUSCO provides helicopter lift for the Congolese Army. MONUSCO still has around 17,600 peacekeepers in the country.

November 18, 2010: The escape of 169 prisoners from a jail in Gemena (Equateur province) was apparently made possible because of a mutiny by guards. A judge was conducting hearings in an overcrowded room when the prisoners bolted and got away.

November 30, 2010: The government and the Congolese Army denied a UN report that rebel militias had reorganized in South Kivu province and intended to renew the civil war. The UN alleged that the National Congress for the Defense of the People (CNDP, Laurent Nkunda's old Congolese Tutsi group) and the Burundi Hutu National Liberation Force (FNL) had assembled new recruits in North and South Kivu provinces and were receiving arms shipments. The UN report stated that the FNL has around 700 fighters in South Kivu. The CNDP is now supposed to be part of the Congolese Army, but that is a political fiction. At least three battalions of the CNDP operate on their own.

December 1, 2010: The government reacted angrily to a UN report that the Congolese Army is involved in criminal enterprises. The evidence is convincing. The allegations have been out there for several years that senior army officers get protection money from illegal mining operations and they also extort illegal taxes from tribes living in their operational areas. For these rogue officers, clamping down on rogue militias takes a backseat to stealing and making money. There is even evidence that the army officers make deals with the militias, particularly when mining valuable minerals is involved. To add to the Congo government's displeasure, the UN Security Council has blacklisted Lieutenant Colonel Innocent Zimurinda for ordering his troops to commit mass murder and mass rape. Zimurinda is now a Congolese Army officer, but a couple of years ago he commanded a militia in the eastern Congo.

December 6, 2010: In the last three weeks, special operations troops serving with peacekeeping forces in the Congo (MONUSCO) had succeeded in cutting the supply lines of Burundian FNL rebels operating in South Kivu province. This entire operation involved 900 UN soldiers. No figure was given for the number of special operations troops that were involved. This followed news that FNL commander Agathon Rwasa had left Burundi and was in the Congo rebuilding the FNL and recruiting new fighters. The Burundi government has issued a warrant for Rwasa's arrest.

December 7, 2010: Two Congolese Army soldiers were arrested for the murder of a Catholic priest last month in North Kivu province. The two soldiers were former members of the CNDP militia. Civilians in the area had been complaining of threats and intimidation by former militiamen.

December 8, 2010: The government's failure to decentralize power to the provinces is turning out to be a very bad political decision. The government promised to give the provinces more power (and hence, more tax revenue) beginning May 15, 2010. The day came and went with no action. Now the provincial governments increasingly distrust the capital. Oh, the distrust was already there, but it is worse now. Some critics are once again making the case for a break-up of the Congo. That would mean more war, which is the last thing the country needs. As it is, several politicians intend to use the government's broken promise as a campaign issue in the 2011 elections.

December 18, 2010: Police broke up a riot by soccer fans in the town of Lubumbashi (Katanga province). The fans were angry when their team lost a close match. What's truly interesting about this is that the crowd thought the Japanese referee was Chinese and yelled that the Chinese referee should go home. The rioters subsequently attacked several Chinese owned stores in Lubumbashi. China has signed agreements with the government to provide infrastructure (roads, power lines, etc) in exchange for Congolese natural resources. Many Congolese believe the agreement is a return to colonialism. The rioters may be an ominous warning to the Chinese.

December 31, 2010: A Wikileaks cable from 2007 indicates that a Maltese company has been illegally mining uranium in the Congo. The company extracts uranium ore along with copper and cobalt deposits from mines in Katanga province. The copper and cobalt are shipped out of the country and the uranium is subsequently extracted. The cable alleges Congolese government officials are paid off to the look the other way.

January 13, 2011: Several soldiers had been arrested on charges of rape (in eastern Congo in early January).

January 21, 2011: The government, with UN help, are prosecuting a Congolese Army lieutenant colonel with leading a mass rape in early January, of over 50 women in the village of Fizi in South Kivu province.

January 22, 2011: The government has been insisting that UN peacekeepers leave sometime this year, but UN observers and diplomats (most from the European Union) insist the Congo is not ready for a complete UN pullout. The government simply cannot handle the multiple security problems in the huge, demographically complex country. Moreover, the Congolese Army is a mess. The militias which were supposed to be incorporated into the army have become factions within the army. The National Congress for the Defense of the People (CNDP) militia is proving to be a particularly tough militia for the army to absorb, The CNDP is rogue General Laurent Nkunda's old outfit. Nkunda remains in custody in Rwanda, though the Congolese government insists it wants to try him. Militiamen from the CNDP and several of their officers have made their gripes about the Congolese Army quite public. Over the last six months former CNDP officers have lodged complaints about the army's failure to give them equivalent ranks. They contend this is a breach of the various peace agreements which led them to lay down their arms. UN observers report that some elements of the CNDP –which claim they have integrated into the army-- are really acting as separate militias and use the peace agreement as political camouflage. Recently, a former CNDP leader (still in the Congo) said that he is very concerned about Tutsi refugees in Uganda and Rwanda. He says that his troops expect the Congolese Tutsis to be repatriated to the Congo. The CNDP originally organized as a Congolese Tutsi militia. It is possible the CNDP is on the verge of officially resurrecting itself.

February 8, 2011: MONUSCO reported that 1,881 FDLR rebels (64 senior off them senior officers or political officials) voluntarily surrendered to UN forces during 2010. MONUSCO will not make the mistake of saying that the FDLR is defeated, but MONUSCO officers believe the surrender statistics speak for themselves. Despite the FDLR’s involvement in the illegal mining business and various (lucrative) smuggling enterprises, constant attacks by the UN and Congolese Army have made life difficult.

February 17, 2011: A senior Democratic Forces for the Liberation of Rwanda (FDLR) commander surrendered to UN forces (MONUSCO). The official report said the commander was in charge of recruitment for the FDLR. A MONUSACO spokesman said the commander (identified as a lieutenant-colonel) was also in charge of mobilizing civilian support for the FDLR in the eastern Congo. That means he was a senior political officer.

February 27, 2011: The government claimed armed gunmen attacked the official residence, in the capital, of Congolese president Joseph Kabila. Kabila was not at home. The half hour attack was repulsed and seven gunmen were killed by presidential guards. Later that day, a group of presidential guardsmen went to the Kokolo military barracks in Kinshasha and arrested several people suspected of being involved in the attack. The presidential guards are an elite unit composed of the best soldiers and policemen in the country. They are also personally loyal to Kabila. By the end of the day the government referred to the attack as a coup attempt.

March 2, 2011: The commander of the rebel militia the Patriotic Front for the Liberation of Congo (FPLC) was killed during a joint combat operation involving UN forces and the Congolese Army. The commander, Colonel Emmaneul Nsengiyuma, was slain in North Kivu province. The UN regards the FPLC as an ally of the Democratic Forces for the Liberation of Rwanda (FDLR), the militia with links to Hutu extremists involved in the 1994 Rwandan genocide. The official name of the joint UN-Congo offensive operation in the eastern province is Operation Amani Leo.

March 5, 2011: Congo’s presidential elections are scheduled for March 27. In the wake of the February 27 attack in Kinshasha, the government expects violence to escalate.

March 11. 2011: Following reports of new Lord's Resistance Army attacks in northeastern Congo (Orientale province), the UN is urging the United Nations Organization Stabilization Mission in the DRC (MONUSCO) to increase its security presence in the region. The UN estimates that in the last 40 months the LRA (Ugandan rebels) have killed 2,000 people and abducted 3,000 in the Congo.

March 15, 2011: The Congo government arrested two men from Nigeria in connection with a gold smuggling operation. The international ring involved a French businessman and an American businessman from Texas. Allegedly, the big break in the case occurred in early February. The syndicate was attempting to fly a half-ton of gold from the Congo to somewhere in the US. The arrests and the story demonstrate just how confident mineral smugglers are. They have a sense of impunity because they have gotten away with it for so long. Estimates vary, but the RUMINT (rumor intelligence) says from 60 to 80 percent of Congolese gold gets smuggled out of the country. A lot of the gold moves by air freight.

March 16, 2011: The government has partially lifted a ban on mining and exporting valuable minerals in the eastern Congo. The ban had affected North Kivu, South Kivu and Maniema provinces. The ban was designed to stop the illegal mining and trading of minerals by rogue military units and the rebel militias that operate in eastern Congo. Three minerals were specifically targeted: cassiterite, tantalum and coltan. There were also attempts to stop the illegal mining and selling of gold.

March 21, 2011: Could the Congo’s very divided political opposition decide to back a single candidate to oppose President Joseph Kabila in the November elections? The odds of this occurring are very slim. The tribal divisions are one reason, but Kabila has also been very astute in gaining support from key opposition parties. Kabila's worst critics say he buys support?literally. They mean he bribes opposition politicians.

March 25, 2011: Soldiers have arrested two members of the Ugandan rebel Allied Democratic Front in North Kivu province and transferred them to Ugandan custody. Congo has promised Uganda that it will cooperate in stopping Ugandan rebel organizations like the LRA and ADF. Congo has made a similar promise to Rwanda. Most Congolese Army operations in North and South Kivu provinces are directed at the Democratics Forces for the Liberation of Rwanda (FDLR).

March 29, 2011: Lord's Resistance Army commander Joseph Kony may be back in the Congo. Raids in the Congo by the Ugandan rebel organization have increased in the last four months. Both the Congo and Uganda governments have issued statements that they have intelligence indicating that Kony has moved from the Central African Republic (CAR) back into the Congo. The LRA used to have several large base camps in Congo's Garamba National Park (northeastern Congo near Uganda). The possible return of Kony helps explain rumors that Congo, Uganda, and UN peacekeepers have been considering launching a new joint anti-LRA offensive in the Congo. The UN has also been stressing civilian protection as a major goal in the Congo. The UN's focus has been on the eastern Congo (where the FDLR and several Mai Mai militias operate) and northeastern Congo (LRA depredation territory).

April 5, 2011: The UN is arguing that counter-militia offensives in the eastern Congo have reduced the number of militiamen fighting with the Democratic Forces for the Liberation of Rwanda (FDLR). Current FDLR strength is around 2,500 fighters. Two years ago the UN estimated FDLR strength at around 6,000 fighters.

April 6, 2011: The UN confirmed that 32 UN workers were killed in a plane crash on April 4. The plane was on a flight from Kisangani to the capital, Kinshasa.

April 9, 2011: Foreign diplomats are very concerned about security for Congo's elections later this year. The Congolese Army (FARDC) is supposed to take the lead in providing security, and most of the army is rated by observers as being unreliable. Highly unreliable is likely a better description. At the moment the vote is set for November, but there is already talk that the date may move to a later date. Lack of funds to support the election process is one reason. Donors were supposed to cough up money for the election and that cash has been slow in coming.

April 10, 2011: Recent international actions to limit the smuggling of Congolese minerals and to force companies to trace the origin of minerals they buy (traceability requirements) have sparked some interesting debate among human rights groups, NGOs, and developmental aid agencies. Everyone seems to agree that trading in illegal minerals (conflict minerals) is not a good thing to do, but stopping smuggling and illegal mining won't solve the Congo's real problems. The country's biggest problem remains security, and just about every other MONUSCO press release emphasizes that. The embedded and endless corruption is another problem of immense significance. The corruption charge of course implicates the elites who rule (misrule, actually) the country. People with a lot of experience throughout central Africa know that militias like the Mai-Mai don't need guns and ammo to commit crimes. In fact, several Mai-Mai militias started out being primarily armed with spears and machetes, with a few AK-47s in the mix. A phrase has cropped up in discussion among aid groups and NGOs that is blunt, poignant, and unfortunately accurate: stopping the trade in Congolese conflict minerals will not stop the conflict in the Congo.

April 15, 2011: Mineralogists and mining companies have estimated that the Congo has over $24 trillion worth of precious minerals, including gold, tin, tantalum, tungsten, and cobalt.

April 20, 2011: MONUSCO is trying to provide some structure to the Congo's mining industry. One initiative involves creating trading centers (centres de negoce). MONUSCO plans to build five trading centers in North and South Kivu provinces. One will be located near the Bisie mining area. The idea is to slowly establish civilian control over the mines and ore shipment business, and remove the militias, gangs, and yes, Congolese Army soldiers who now control the mines. Eventually the civilian government would get control of all ore shipments, at least that's the concept. Actually doing it is something else entirely. The Kivus are only one part of the problem. Ituria region (north of North Kivu) and the city of Bunia are notorious world-wide for their wildcat gold operations and gold smuggling.

April 27, 2011: Burundi and Rwanda have agreed to increase intelligence sharing with the Congo. Burundi and Rwanda have a common interest in destroying the FDLR, which is a radical Hutu tribal organization. For the past two years Rwanda and the Congo have cooperated against the FDLR and have discussed running a joint intelligence center. The FDLR and other radical Hutu organizations often use Burundi as a transit corridor when moving from the Congo to Rwanda or Rwanda to the Congo.

May 1, 2011: The UN reported that the FDLR and some of its allied Mai-Mai militias have increased their offensive activity in North Kivu province (eastern Congo). The FDLT and Mai Mai attacked and looted the town of Kanyabayonga (Lubero area, north of the city of Goma).

May 4, 2011: Germany is trying two Rwandan Hutu rebel militia leaders for war crimes. Both men, Ignace Murwanashyaka and Straton Musoni, were senior leaders in the Democratic Forces for the Liberation of Rwanda (FDLR) militia. Both men were living in exile in Germany and were finally arrested in 2009.

May 10, 2011: Congolese opposition parties are complaining that the government’s national election plans are inadequate. The parties are extremely critical of the Congo's National Independent Electoral Commission (CENI) decision to hold elections on November 28, arguing that is way too soon. Some opposition politicians already maintain that the way president Joseph Kabila intends to run the elections is unconstitutional and the elections will be riddled with fraud. What’s unconstitutional? For starters, Kabila’s term ends December 6. The new president (assuming Kabila is not re-elected) would not be sworn in until December 20. As for fraud? Voter registration has been very slow. Opposition politicians claim their supporters have faced intimidation tactics from Congolese security forces (police and military). The presidential election will not have a run-off, so all Kabila has to do is finish first in the first round, which means he could be elected president with a bare plurality of the votes.

May 12, 2011: A court in Kenya has charged three men with stealing and smuggling 2.5 tons of Congolese gold. The three individuals were arrested in Nairobi with over 400 kilograms (880 pounds, worth $19 million) of gold in their possession. Kenya security officials claimed that the three men began smuggling the tons of gold out of the Congo in July 2010. The Congo government identified one of the men as Jean-Claude Mudeke Kabamba (nom de guerre General Kabamba). Kabamba is linked to a Mai-Mai militia group that operates in the eastern Congo. The government reported that Kabamba is also involved in acquiring weapons for the Mai-Mai militia and shipping the weapons into the Congo.

May 18, 2011: China is shrugging off accusations of neo-colonialism and is plowing ahead with its infrastructure-for-resources deal in the Congo. China and the World Bank are putting around $600 million into the Congo's railroad system. The Congo has around 3,000 kilometers of railroad track, but much of it is unusable. The project begins with a four-year plan to repair and then upgrade track and equipment.

May 26, 2011: The Congo government, several economic NGOs, and representatives of the mineral mining industry are discussing how to best create an international certification system that would certify that minerals from the Congo are not illegal, smuggled minerals (so called conflict minerals). The idea is to create a certification process similar to the one which traces the origins of gem stones (usually diamonds). This is a tough process. The gem stones certification system is not perfect – blood diamonds still turn up for sale around the world. Geologists and chemists can study an ore and know with reasonable certainty where the ore was mined, so there are ways to link ore to a specific mine. In concept, the idea is a good one, since it might help pinch the finances of gangs and rogue militias. However, the bogey man here is governmental corruption. If the people running the mine can pay the government inspectors to blame someone else, the effort to police the mining industry collapses.

June 8, 2011: MONUSCO has launched a new offensive (Operation Restore Hope) in the eastern Congo. The objective is to attack and disarm militias operating in the Rutshuru district of North Kivu province. The key target is the Democratic Forces for the Liberation of Rwanda (FDLR) militia. The offensive will continue for at least ten days. Since early April attacks by militias on unarmed civilians have increased in the Rutshuru area.

June 9, 2011: Nearly fifty human rights and aid organizations have asked the UN to beef up its peacekeeping capabilities in the eastern Congo. The non-governmental organizations said that UN forces are not properly equipped and lack the ability to protect civilians in the region, particularly in North and South Kivu provinces. The NGOs argue (correctly) that violence will increase as elections approach.

June 16, 2011: India has told the UN that it still intends to withdraw (in July) four Mi-35 helicopters it has committed to the UN's MONUSCO operation in the Congo. The Indian withdrawal makes peacekeeping tougher for MONUSCO, which is already short of helicopters (both transport and attack). The Indian statement cited maintenance difficulties and operational requirements back in India.

June 23, 2011: Investigators in South Kivu have confirmed that a mass rape occurred earlier this month in the town of Fizi. Some 60 women were raped by deserters from the Congolese Army (FARDC). Deserters is not quite accurate, since the rapists were formerly members of PARECO, a rebel militia. Refugee sources also confirmed that the gang stole cattle and looted a local medical aid station.

June 28, 2011: The UN Security Council reauthorized the Congo peacekeeping mission (MONUSCO). The Security Council extended MONUSCO's mandate until June 30, 2012. MONUSCO currently has around 17,000 soldiers assigned, with 1,000 police and 1,000 in the organization's support staff. MONUSCO's primary mission in the next year will be to help the Congolese government run the national elections. MONUSCO will provide security, logistical, and technical support.

June 29, 2011: Police engaged a group of attackers in an hour-long firefight in the mining town of Lubumbashi (Katanga province, a major copper-producing region). The attackers may have been trying to seize a Congolese Army weapons depot in the city. A mining company headquarters and storage facility, located near the weapons depot, might also have been the target. Police killed two gunmen. Several civilians died in the battle, including two civilian security guards.

June 30, 2011: UN peacekeepers with MONUSCO (United Nations Stabilization Mission in the Democratic Republic of Congo) have launched another offensive operation in North Kivu province (eastern Congo). This offensive is centered on the Grand Nord area in the province and is the second offensive operation in North Kivu within the last three weeks. The primary target of the UN attacks is the Democratic Forces for the Liberation of Rwanda (FDLR) militia.

July 4, 2011: Why fight in the Congo? Tribes fight one another for territory, but natural resources attract outsiders, and this vast country has a lot of resources.

The Congo may have over $24 trillion in minerals –and that is recoverable minerals. The $24 trillion estimate is made by mining companies and mineral analysts. That is more than enough money to bankroll paved roads and schools for the entire country. However, the Congo's old plagues of tribal rivalries and corruption mean that recovering the minerals is difficult (the chaos) and just distribution and use of the royalties is even more difficult (thanks to the pilferage). At the moment 70 to 80 percent of the working mines are controlled by militias. Some of the militias are bandit groups. Some are tribal war parties masquerading as a political party. Some are nominally Congolese Army units. Controlling a mine is a source of revenue for the militia, tribe, or army unit. There is a gray area here that receives little attention in the international media. Many legitimate Congolese Army units gripe that their pay is stolen or is in arrears. A commander controlling a mine can pay his troops.

July 5, 2011: A demonstration (against cheating during voting registration) in the capital turned violent. Many voters see the November elections as being manipulated, so the current (very corrupt) politicians can stay in power and keep stealing. This is not popular with most Congolese.

July 6, 2011: Criticism of Dodd-Frank conflict minerals bill continues to increase. Small, independent miners (artisanal miners) in the eastern Congo have been hit very hard. What little local economy existed has been severely damaged. There are also reports that corrupt soldiers have used the government directive to stop illegal mining as a reason to kick the independent miners out of the mining districts. The corrupt soldiers then take control of the mines and begin smuggling operations.

July 15, 2011: The UN estimates that the Democratic Forces for the Liberation of Rwanda (FDLR) now has around 3,000 fighters operating in North and South Kivu provinces and in Katanga province. This makes the FDLR the largest rebel militia still operating in the country.

July 18, 2011: The government reported that over 30 million people are now registered to vote in the November 2011 presidential election.

July 23, 2011: The UN Security Council condemned the Lord's Resistance Army for launching more attacks in the Congo. The UN reported that the LRA launched 53 attacks in June 2011, killed 26 people, and kidnapped another two-dozen.

July 25, 2011: Over 100 people fled the Congo and sought shelter in Uganda after what was described as a joint attack by the Congolese Army and the Ugandan Army on a rebel force operating along the Uganda-Congo border.

July 27, 2011: Several aid NGOs operating in the Congo's northeastern provinces have complained that the area remains unprotected. The Ugandan rebel Lord's Resistance Army continues to launch raids in the area. The NGOs point out that the UN only has 850 peacekeeping troops in the region (out of over 17,000 in country).

July 31, 2011: The Angolan government announced that it intends to improve its surveillance of the Angola-Congo border. For several years Angola has tried to stop a constant flow of illegal immigrants from the Congo. In 2009 Angola expelled almost 70,000 illegal Congolese immigrants.

August 1, 2011: Government security forces arrested a Congolese Army colonel on charges of smuggling. The colonel was nabbed red-handed. He was leading a convoy carrying around ten tons of cassiterite. The convoy was in South Kivu province and was on its way to North Kivu province. Presumably the convoy was heading to Rwanda.

August 5, 2011: UN investigators believe that they have sufficient evidence to prove that about a hundred Congolese Army soldiers participated in a mass rape of 47 women in January 2011. The rapes occurred in the villages of Kalambahiro and Bushani (North Kivu province, eastern Congo).

August 15, 2011: Debt is a global worry. However, Congo's debt burden is particularly high. The country has a GDP of around $13 billion and international debt of $13 billion. Several international donors are trying to get the debt burden reduced. Congo can handle a debt of about four billion dollars. That will mean refinancing or cancelling from eight to nine billion dollars of debt.

August 16, 2011: Complaints from the Congo are growing about the U.S. legislation intended to stop illegal mineral sales. The Dodd-Frank bill (also called the Obama Law) has a clause that prohibits the sale of so-called conflict minerals may have been well-intentioned but it was not well-thought out. Rather than run the risk of buying any minerals that might have been smuggled from the Congo, many major mining companies are simply refusing to buy minerals from central Africa. The result is a de facto embargo. There are few buyers for Congo's valuable minerals, especially tantalum and tungsten which have many hi-tech uses. This has damaged the Congo's economy, because the nation relies on mineral exports. According to some sources, China, which does not have to meet Dodd-Frank standards, is snapping up many minerals at very cheap prices.

August 22, 2011: No big surprise. The Peoples Party for Reconstruction and Democracy (PPRD) has nominated current president Joseph Kabila as its candidate in the upcoming November election. The PPRD is the ruling party.

August 25, 2011: A man who worked as an official vehicle driver for the UN's Congo mission has been convicted of smuggling illegal minerals. He was sentenced to three years in jail. He tried to smuggle 1,200 kilos of cassiterite from Congo's North Kivu province into Rwanda.

August 29, 2011: MONUSCO (United Nations Organization Stabilization Mission in the Democratic Republic of the Congo) has a current strength of 18,997 uniformed personnel. The figure breaks down as follows: 17,010 military troops, 746 military observers, and 1,241 police. The uniformed personnel are supported by around 4,000 civilians (mostly UN staff and local staff).

September 30, 2011: International advisers, several working with MONUSCO (UN stabilization and advisory mission that replaced MONUC) say Congo is not ready for elections and poorly run elections or another disputed ballot could lead to another round of country-wide instability. That is a euphemism for more anarchic war. Election teams note that the country has 62,000 polling stations and basic balloting equipment (including boxes) has not been distributed. Sure, the election is November 28, two months away, but the Congo has few good roads. It is a huge logistical task to distribute ballot boxes and ballots. Opposition candidates are already complaining that the election is rigged. The government is not letting them audit voter registration rolls.

October 8, 2011: A European Union security study estimated that some 70 percent of the mass rapes in the eastern Congo are committed by uniformed personnel. The implication is that Congolese Army units are involved. That is very likely, since many Congolese Army units are simply former rebel militias that have been integrated into the army. The result is obvious. Congolese citizens in the eastern Congo fear their own military forces. The distrust of the military is one reason the EU is trying to improve Congolese police forces. However, few expect improvement any time soon. The EU police adviser mission believes it will take 15 years to build and reform the police forces.

November 4, 2011: The Rwandan government sent the Congo a shipment of 82 tons of smuggled minerals that Rwandan police have seized in the last several months. The smuggled minerals include coltan and caasiterite.

November 6, 2011: A Congolese Army unit attacked an Allied Democratic Forces (ADF) guerrilla base near the Congo-Uganda border. Uganda has been urging the Congo and UN forces in the Congo to crackdown on the ADF. The ADF allegedly has ties to the Somalia Islamist Al Shabaab organization which claims it will launch more terror attacks in Uganda. The Congolese Army claimed it killed at least ten ADF fighters.

November 7, 2011: Tanzania arrested at least 20 Congolese Army (FARDC) soldiers who entered the country illegally on a boat. A Congolese Army spokesman said the soldiers were pursuing guerrillas. At the moment there are 11 official presidential candidates. The current president, Joseph Kabila, is the overwhelming favorite. It is a given he will be accused of vote buying and vote fraud. The main opposition party is the Union for Democracy and Social Progress (UDSP). Its candidate is 79 year old Etienne Tshisekedf.

November 21, 2011: The big story in Congo is preparation for the elections, or the lack of it. The huge nation is short on police and many of the policemen it does have are either poorly trained or corrupt, or both. The Congo has a total of 110,000 policemen, at least according to the government who pays their salaries. Two months ago several international observer teams noted that police units do not have anti-riot gear, in other words, if it comes to trouble their options are limited. They can use clubs or guns. The international advisers also said there were good reasons to believe people would take to the streets and the police should be prepared for crowd control operations. After the 2006 elections (the first in 40 years), which were disputed, angry members of losing political parties came out in large numbers. So did the party militias, except the militias showed up in public with lots of weapons. Not every political party has a militia but the big ones do. The militias look and act a lot like tribal militias. There is a reason. Congolese parties align fairly well with tribes or tribal groups. This is why keeping crowds from getting too boisterous is important. If fighting erupts and bloodletting starts, a tribal war could be a brick bashing or knife wound away. A tribal clash that can be kept low key and local is business as usual in the Congo. If it spreads, however, everyone fears a renewed civil war.

November 29, 2011: Several Congolese opposition political candidates for president of the Congo urged the government to completely cancel the election. Voting began on November 28 and continues but the opposition leaders said that the vote is rigged. There were also reports of violence marring the election, including the murder of four people in the city of Lubumbashi (Katanga province, southern Congo). There were also reports of seriously voting delays caused by threats of violence (numerous places around the nation). As 2012 began, UN peacekeeping officials with MONUSCO (United Nations Organization Stabilization Mission in the Democratic Republic of Congo) returned to the theme of creating stability in the Congo. Indeed, Congo needs stability. UN peacekeeping forces have been fighting and disbanding rogue militias with the aim of promoting stability. UN and other international groups have been training Congolese police, with the same aim in mind. However, the allegations levied by Kabila's opponents, of vote fraud and misuse of national security forces, has heightened tensions. The fact that most Congolese political parties reflect tribal affiliations (some more so than others) adds another dicey dimension. Political squabbles become tribal battles. Arab Spring 2011 also had effects in sub-Saharan Africa. There have been demands in neighboring Uganda and Rwanda that long-serving presidents and officials step down. Some Congolese are making those demands, especially about corrupt officials, and they point to Arab Spring as a guiding example.

December 4, 2011: Several militias in the eastern Congo have acquired new weapons and are recruiting new members. That means the militias have new (or renewed) financial support, likely linked to sales of illegal minerals mined in the Congo. Corruption in the Congolese Army is also a contributing factor as poorly paid soldiers take bribes from mineral smugglers or engage in smuggling themselves. This is another indication that attempts to stop the trade of conflict minerals are not working as planned. Activists who advocated the legislation and sanctions to stop the illegal trading remind everyone that some of the stiffest laws do not take effect until 2012.

December 18, 2011: The government has deployed 20,000 Congolese Army soldiers in and around Kinshasha. The government is worried that violence may erupt because of the disputed November 2011 election.

December 19, 2011: Congolese opposition leader Etienne Tshisekedi disputed official election results which claimed that President Joseph Kabila won 49 percent of the November vote total and Tshisekedi got 32 percent. Since Election Day Tshisekedi has accused the Kabila government of stealing the election. Tshisekedi has called on Congolese security forces (police and army) to quit following Kabila's orders. Tshisekedi is reportedly considering forming a rival government and has issued a statement that he is the only legitimate authority in the Congo. The 79 year old Tshisekedi has been part of the Congo's political scene for a long time. At one time he served as a minister in the government of dictator Mobutu Sese Seko.

December 21, 2011: Congolese police have killed 24 people since November's highly disputed presidential election with 20 of those killed in the capital.

January 1, 2012: Eight people were killed in an attempted mass escape from a prison in Bukavu (eastern Congo). Four of those killed were Congolese soldiers while 44 were injured. A jailed Congolese army officer had acquired a hand grenade. An accomplice was supposed to throw the grenade toward a prison door as the escape attempt began. The grenade blew up in the accomplice's hands.

January 4, 2012: An FDLR faction had murdered 26 people in several attacks in South Kivu province. The FDLR group attacked and burned several villages in the Shabunda region (jungle area) on January 2 and January 3.

January 20, 2012: Militia attacks in North and South Kivu provinces, from early December 2011 to mid-January 2012, have displaced 100,000 civilians. The Democratic Forces for the Liberation of Rwanda (FDLR) has continued to commit atrocities in the provinces (rape and murder). The core cadre of the FDLR consists of Rwandan Hutus who were involved in the 1994 Rwandan genocide. As 2012 began, UN peacekeeping officials with MONUSCO (United Nations Organization Stabilization Mission in the Democratic Republic of Congo) returned to the theme of creating stability in the Congo. Indeed, Congo needs stability. UN peacekeeping forces have been fighting and disbanding rogue militias with the aim of promoting stability. UN and other international groups have been training Congolese police, with the same aim in mind. However, the allegations levied by Kabila's opponents, of vote fraud and misuse of national security forces, has heightened tensions. The fact that most Congolese political parties reflect tribal affiliations (some more so than others) adds another dicey dimension. Political squabbles become tribal battles. Arab Spring 2011 also had effects in sub-Saharan Africa. There have been demands in neighboring Uganda and Rwanda that long-serving presidents and officials step down. Some Congolese are making those demands, especially about corrupt officials, and they point to Arab Spring as a guiding example.

January 31, 2012: Poverty, corruption, and several low-level battles (which still result in thousands of refugees) continue to plague the Congo.

The re-election of President Joseph Kabila proved to be another source of instability as his opponents claimed the vote tally was rigged and that Kabila's supporters intimidated opposition supporters in order to reduce opposition turn-out. When Kabila was sworn in on December 20, 2011 the army had to deploy tanks through the capital in order to stop protests from becoming violent. The capital is a political strong-hold of chief opposition leader Etienne Tshisekedi (who claims he actually won the November 2011 election). Tshisekedi heads the Union for Democracy and Social Progress Party (UDSP).

February 8, 2012: The UN's peacekeeping office has issued a request for reinforcement of MONUSCO stability operations.

February 14, 2012: Democratic Republic of Congo: call for a genuine peace process'

Goma– Representatives of 11 African countries sign an accord in Ethiopia pledging to help end the conflict in DR Congo. The M23 rebel group declared a ceasefire ahead of the talks, but showed signs of a violent power struggle between leader Jean-Marie Runiga and military chief Sultani Makenga in the immediate aftermath.

For years the international community has attempted to help stabilise eastern Democratic Republic of Congo (DRC), at the expense of billions of US dollars, yet sustainable peace remains elusive. Elections in November 2011 were widely seen as lacking credibility[1] and provincial and local elections have been delayed indefinitely. There has been scant progress on critical reforms in justice, security, land and governance. Successive military campaigns have failed to remove foreign and domestic armed groups and have increased the population's suffering causing large scale displacement. A mix of armed groups continues to control various areas of eastern DRC, of which the M23 proved to be strong enough to seize Goma town, the provincial capital of North Kivu province, in November 2012. Since April 2012 in North Kivu and December 2011 in South Kivu the security situation has significantly deteriorated as military and armed group activity and ethnic tensions have increased. The unravelling of the Ihusi accords in early 2012 resulted in fighting between the FARDC and the M23 as well as the resurgence and expansion of other armed groups.

This has created the most recent in a long series of crises, following failed attempts at peace, which have ignored key causes of violence. Its impact on the population of the Kivu provinces has been devastating; it is ordinary people who suffer the most. As control over their communities constantly shifts hands between armed actors, people caught in the middle are most vulnerable to human rights violations. [2]Between January and September 2012, 767,000 people have fled their homes within North and South Kivu and an additional 60,000 people have fled to Uganda and Rwanda.[3] By the end of 2012 over 2.7 million people were estimated displaced in DRC, up from 1.7 million in 2011. Research has shown that the roots of conflict in eastern DRC relate to the distribution of power and economic resources, and are inextricably linked to the way in which the country's social and political structures operate.[5] They combine local, national and regional dynamics; creating a particularly complex climate of conflict, which tends to have a paralyzing impact on policy makers. Achieving peace in eastern DRC, and stability in the DRC as a whole, requires a context-specific response based on a frank analysis of the real causes and dynamics of conflict. This analysis needs to be collectively owned by relevant stakeholders and lead to a comprehensive strategy focused on taking action. Above all, achieving peace requires an inclusive and locally owned peace process with strong backing at national and regional levels. This should provide a framework for coherent and long-term actions to be undertaken by civil societies and governments in the region, with support of international donors.

To this end, we recommend the Government of DRC to: Prioritise non-military solutions to conflict in the east, based on the failure so far of military action to fully address the presence of non-state armed groups and the negative impact of such action on the civilian population. Initiate broad-based and inclusive dialogue with provincial and local actors in the east, aiming to establish a coherent and shared vision for peace and a detailed peace implementation plan. In line with this plan, revise the Stabilisation and Reconstruction Programme for eastern DRC (STAREC), in coordination and discussion with international partners and Congolese civil society actors working in conflict-affected communities and DRC institutions. Formulate concrete step-by-step Action

Plans to implement key reforms necessary for sustainable peace in eastern DRC. These must include elections, decentralisation, reinforcing the country's security sector, establishing a strong justice sector, land and natural resources ownership and management, and the disarmament and demobilisation of ex combatants. Take concrete steps to address ethnic tensions and put in place a process to protect the right of minorities, including supporting inter-ethnic dialogue initiatives and holding to account those engaging in ethnic hate-speech. We recommend governments in the region to: Strengthen their role as positive actors for peace in eastern DRC by supporting non-military strategies and political dialogue, as outlined in international commitments relating to peace in the region such as the 2006 "Pact on Security, Stability and Development in the Great Lakes Region". Actively support attempts to achieve peace, as it relates to regional dynamics of conflict, such as the illegal arms trade, the movement of refugees, the cross-border movement/support of non-state armed groups, and the illegal trade in natural resources.

We recommend International multilateral and bilateral actors to: Engage the Government of DRC in political dialogue on peacebuilding and the necessary governance reforms mentioned above. Monitor and support the engagement of the DRC government and the regional actors in establishing and implementing a meaningful peace process. Urgently appoint and deploy the UN Special Envoy for the Great Lakes, whose mandate should focus on supporting specific national dialogues - including the current M23 negotiations – but also have a broader mandate to support peace-building dialogue at the regional level. Recognising the failures of past military initiatives to resolve conflict, critically review any plans for a proposed Neutral International Force (NIF) where the mission concept involves neutralising non-state armed groups through armed intervention. Any proposed military initiative can only work if there is a political solution as well, in particular to prevent new armed groups emerging.

Fully support the revision of the International Security and Stabilisation Support Strategy, critically analysing its capacity to support a peace process, and ensure that Congolese civil society actors as well as Congolese institutions participate in its formulation. If the revised strategy remains a technical programme, divorced from a genuine peace process and efforts to obtain clear, and realistic and long term commitments from the Congolese state, then it cannot achieve real impact. Take urgent steps to improve donor coordination and shared analysis in order to strengthen the coherence of donor programmes and enhance their impact. Continue to provide support for community-level peace processes and peace initiatives at other levels undertaken by Congolese actors.
Signatories: Jesuit Refugee Service Great Lakes, Cafod, Care, Christian Aid, Combattons L'Injustice, Dynamique Synergie des Femmes, Uvira and Fizi, Innovation et Formation pour le Développement et la Paix, International Alert, Kvinna till Kvinna, Mercy Corps, Norwegian Church, Norwegian Refugee Council, Oxfam, SAIPED, Dungu, Reconciliation Resources, Search for Common Ground, Trócaire, War Child, World Vision

February 15, 2012: The Congolese Army took control of two mines in North Kivu province (eastern Congo), the tin mine at Bisie and the gold mine at Omate. The army announced that it will protect the mines from armed rebel groups. The Mai-Mai Sheka (also called the Cheka) and the FDLR had been in control of the mines. Around 70 percent of North Kivu province’s tin is produced at Bisie. The UN is currently training some 500 Congolese mining police to help protect the eastern Congo’s mineral resources.

February 16, 2012: The UN reported that MONUSCO peacekeeping force currently has a strength of 18,997 uniformed personnel. The uniformed force consists of 17,010 soldiers, 1,241 police, and 746 uniformed military observers. Approximately 4,000 UN civilian staffers support MONUSCO.

February 17, 2012: The UN cited China's MONUSCO peacekeeping contingent (2010-2011) for its service. The Chinese engineer contingent (approximately 220 troops) renovated over 100 kilometers of roads and built 14 bridges. The unit also had a medical detachment.

February 27, 2012: The UN has asked Angola to provide helicopters for UN operations in the Congo. UN forces do not have enough helicopters to conduct supply, liaison, and observation missions.

February 29, 2012: Uganda intends to open another refugee camp to house Congolese refugees. Most of the refugees have fled attacks by the FDLR. Some 3,000 Congolese have fled into Uganda since November 2011. Several hundred more are reportedly collecting in the border region. This will be the third refugee camp erected to take care of Congolese refugees.

March 14, 2012: The International Criminal Court (ICC) found Congolese militia commander and warlord, Thomas Lubanga Dyilo, guilty of war crimes, to include recruiting and using child soldiers (under the age of 15) and rape. Lubanga committed the crimes in the Ituri region (eastern Congo, near the Uganda border).

March 20, 2012: There were numerous atrocities committed by soldiers and police in the capital during and after the November 2011 election. At least 33 people were killed and 83 wounded in election and post-election violence. Presidential guard units were involved. There were also allegations of torture. President Joseph Kabila claimed he won 48.95 percent of the national vote. Opponents claimed massive election fraud. International election observers (primarily from the European Union) concluded the election was flawed and it was not possible to determine with any accuracy who had really won. One opposition group asserted that over 1.3 million ballots were unaccounted for.

April 1, 2012: The UN is concerned that North Kivu province could regress. After the January 2009 arrest (by Rwandan forces) of Laurent Nkunda, leader of the CNDP (National Congress for the Defense of the People, a primarily Tutsi group), North Kivu began to stabilize. After Nkunda's arrest, the CNDP fractured into several groups. (One faction has become the CNDP political party.) However, the Democratic Forces for the Liberation of Rwanda (FDLR, a radical Hutu organization) has not been eradicated, despite the efforts of the Congolese Army (FARDC), UN peacekeepers, and Rwandan forces. Former CNDP militiamen, who were integrated into the Congolese Army, are increasingly operating as freelancers; the worry is that CNDP-dominated FARDC units are on their way to becoming rebels in uniform. The contested reelection of President Joseph Kabila is one reason. Many tribes do not trust Kabila and his backers and they have good reasons. Interestingly enough some former CNDP soldiers reportedly backed Kabila. Backing him in the election, however, doesn't necessarily translate into real support for his government. The theory is that the former CNDP fighters are, like the FDLR, more interested in controlling mineral resources in the eastern Congo. The CNDP militiamen and their commanders will verbally support Kabila but run North Kivu (at least the mines and border area) as a satrapy. Meanwhile, the UN Organization and Stabilization Mission in Congo (MONUSCO) is supposedly preparing to reduce forces in the country, despite appeals earlier this year for new sources of support for the mission. The stage is being set for a round-robin struggle between and among other eastern factions (to include Mai-Mai militias), the FDLR, CNDP-dominated army units, and other FARDC units.

April 3, 2012: MONUSCO has now authorized 19,229 total uniformed personnel, 17, 129 are military soldiers assigned to units while 733 are military observers and 1,367 are uniformed paramilitary police.

April 3, 2012: General Bosco Ntaganda commands 50,000 Congolese troops in the east. The problem is that Ntaganda is a wanted (by the International Criminal Court) war criminal. Ntaganda still acts that way, but as long as he remains in the good graces of the Congolese government he can't be touched by war crimes prosecutors. That pretty much sums up the situation in Congo, where rebel leaders can make a deal with the government and remain in control of many armed and unruly men.

April 9, 2012: The UN reported that the special light infantry battalion funded and trained by the United States is now operating in the north-eastern Congo. The unit is assigned to fight the Lord's Resistance Army (LRA) Ugandan rebel group. The light infantry battalion is coordinating its operations with MONUSCO peacekeepers. MONUSCO has established a base in the town of Dungu to coordinate regional efforts against the LRA, to include anti-LRA operations in South Sudan and the Central African Republic (CAR).

April 13, 2012: UN investigators alleged that former CNDP commander Jean Bosco Ntaganda is operating a criminal network in North Kivu province. Ntaganda’s group allegedly smuggles various mineral from the Congo for export through other east African nations.

April 14, 2012: Congolese president Joseph Kabila has reportedly told the army that former CNDP commander Jean Bosco Ntaganda should be turned over to the ICC for prosecution. Ntaganda, however, currently holds the rank of general in the army. Kabila’s decision is something of a surprise. The ICC warrants are not new, they were issued in 2006. Arresting Ntaganda might lead many Congolese Tutsis to rebel. The ICC indicted Ntaganda for employing child soldiers. He is also wanted on murder and rape charges. Ntaganda denies the charges and contends that he remains loyal to the central government.

April 23, 2012: Two Congolese Army colonels were ambushed and killed by a militia force in North Kivu province, near the town of Walikale.

April 29, 2012: Five people died in a firefight in North Kivu province between the Congolese Army and a group of militiamen. The battle took place near Goma (city on the Rwanda-Congo border). UN peacekeepers operating with the United Nations Organization Stabilization Mission in the Congo (MONUSCO) have deployed near Goma to protect civilians.

