"en.wikipedia.org" \t "_blank" Nuer . HYPERLINK "https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Nilotic_peoples" \l "cite_note-Wood2005-29" \o "en.wikipedia.org" \t "_blank" [29]
So, for start some Nilotic peoples have very ancient male African lineages, subclades of A and B.

Also reinforcing the statement by Hassan et al. (2008)

Haplogroup A was observed amongst 62% of Dinka, 53.3% of Shilluk, 46.4% of Nuba, 33.3% of HYPERLINK "https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Nuer_people" \o "en.wikipedia.org" \t "_blank" Nuer , 31.3% of HYPERLINK "https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Fur_people" \o "en.wikipedia.org" \t "_blank" Fur and 18.8% of HYPERLINK "https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Masalit_people" \o "en.wikipedia.org" \t "_blank" Masalit . Haplogroup B was found in 50% of HYPERLINK "https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Nuer_people" \o "en.wikipedia.org" \t "_blank" Nuer , 26.7% of Shilluk, 23% of HYPERLINK "https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Dinka" \o "en.wikipedia.org" \t "_blank" Dinka , 14.3% of Nuba, 3.1% of Fur and 3.1% of Masalit.
And then

The E1b1b clade was also observed in 71.9% of the Masalit, 59.4% of the Fur, 39.3% of the HYPERLINK "https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Nuba" \o "en.wikipedia.org" \t "_blank" Nuba , 20% of the HYPERLINK "https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Shilluk_people" \o "en.wikipedia.org" \t "_blank" Shilluk , 16.7% of the Nuer, and 15% of the Dinka. HYPERLINK "https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Nilotic_peoples" \l "cite_note-Hassan-33" \o "en.wikipedia.org" \t "_blank" [33]

Hassan et al. attributed the atypically high frequencies of the haplogroup in the Masalit to either a recent HYPERLINK "https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Population_bottleneck" \o "en.wikipedia.org" \t "_blank" population bottleneck , which likely altered the community's original haplogroup diversity, or to geographical proximity to E1b1b's place of origin in North Africa. The researchers suggest that the clade "might have been brought to Sudan [...] after the progressive desertification of the Sahara around 6,000–8,000 years ago". HYPERLINK "https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Nilotic_peoples" \l "cite_note-Hassan-33" \o "en.wikipedia.org" \t "_blank" [33]

Henn et al. (2008) similarly observed Afro-Asiatic influence in the Nilotic Datog of northern Tanzania, 43% of whom carried the M293 sub-clade of E1b1b.

HYPERLINK "https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Nilotic_peoples" \l "cite_note-Henn2008-34" \o "en.wikipedia.org" \t "_blank" [34]

But the subclades of E1b1b in Masalit, Fur, Nuba and the rest refer mainly to E-V32, a subclade of E-V12.

HYPERLINK "https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Haplogroup_E-V12" \o "en.wikipedia.org" \t "_blank" Haplogroup E-V12 - Wikipedia

E-V32 is a child to E-V12, in fact it is explained by Hassan et all by a immigration into southern parts in Sudan and beyond during the desertification of the Sahara. But while E-V12 is still in place in North-East Africa in the form of E-V12*, E-V32 is present in Nilotic people and in East Africa, especially in the Somalis which again, I insist, it is explained by a immigration that happened before the formation of the state of Egypt or even before the establishment of the first pre-dynastic cultures in Egypt, not after their formation, the latter hypothetical exodus of “real” Egyptians because of some invaders like I read on Afrocentric posts being debunked.

Here is Hassan’s article

HYPERLINK "https://web.archive.org/web/20090304100010/http:/dirkschweitzer.net/E3b-papers/Hassan-Sudan-2008-AJPA.pdf" \o "web.archive.org" \t "_blank" https://web.archive.org/web/20090304100010/http://dirkschweitzer.net/E3b-papers/Hassan-Sudan-2008-AJPA.pdf

Also, the women’s lineages are mostly African lineages

Unlike the paternal DNA of Nilotes, the maternal lineages of Nilotes in general show low-to-negligible amounts of Afro-Asiatic and other extraneous influences. An HYPERLINK "https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/MtDNA" \o "en.wikipedia.org" \t "_blank" mtDNA study by Castri et al. (2008) examined the maternal ancestry of various Nilotic populations in Kenya, with Turkana, Samburu, Maasai and Luo individuals sampled. The mtDNA of almost all of the tested Nilotes belonged to various Sub-Saharan HYPERLINK "https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Macro-haplogroup_L_(mtDNA)" \o "en.wikipedia.org" \t "_blank" macro-haplogroup L sub-clades, including HYPERLINK "https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Haplogroup_L0_(mtDNA)" \o "en.wikipedia.org" \t "_blank" L0 , HYPERLINK "https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Haplogroup_L2_(mtDNA)" \o "en.wikipedia.org" \t

"_blank" L2 , HYPERLINK "https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Haplogroup_L3_(mtDNA)" \o "en.wikipedia.org" \t "_blank" L3 , HYPERLINK "https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Haplogroup_L4_(mtDNA)" \o "en.wikipedia.org" \t "_blank" L4 and HYPERLINK "https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Haplogroup_L5_(mtDNA)" \o "en.wikipedia.org" \t "_blank" L5 . Low levels of maternal gene flow from HYPERLINK "https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/North_Africa" \o "en.wikipedia.org" \t "_blank" North Africa and the HYPERLINK "https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Horn_of_Africa" \o "en.wikipedia.org" \t "_blank" Horn of Africa were observed in a few groups, mainly via the presence of mtDNA HYPERLINK "https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Haplogroup_M_(mtDNA)" \o "en.wikipedia.org" \t "_blank" haplogroup M and HYPERLINK "https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Haplogroup_I_(mtDNA)" \o "en.wikipedia.org" \t "_blank" haplogroup I lineages in about 12.5% of the Maasai and 7% of the Samburu samples, respectively.
INCLUDEPICTURE "https://ci5.googleusercontent.com/proxy/y1Qm2HwgJ_LGQFo2R1tSQfOSPaOyjoU4jiSJ6B56OH3d-uDytLCQcEyZZEuVZ7XbthxkJbyvAJiqGgs-p6HGL0HN3mcETpAkB-BeePmuzBQVvSbTmRuCl7cUcuhC=s0-d-e1-ft#https://qph.cf2.quoracdn.net/main-qimg-f0772344729310df251d23dd16be5a46-lq" * MERGEFORMATINET
The four peoples in the view of the Book of Gates painted in Sethi's tomb (a reproduction); from left to right: a Libyan, a Nubian (which could be also a Nilotic, it is very hard to discern from the mural paintings which is which, considering that Nubians were once very close genetically to Egyptians), an Asiatic and an Egyptian

Edit: there is also the North East African lineage E-V22 that i totally forgot. I will read more carefully, but apart of a very important presence in the Cushitic speaking Saho community and also the Nilotic people of Kenya I don't think E-V22 originated in East Africa. The father clade E-M78 almost surely originated in North Africa attested also by its the presence in the four Taforalt remanins dating from 15 000 BC.

The sibling of E-V22 (which is E-L618) was found in one Taforalt skeleton. E-V22 is also present in 13.9% of Northern Egyptians (more than the Southern ones at 3.8%, the Southern being predominantly 44.3% E-V12* out of 50.6% E-M78; see Cruciani et al. (2007) in the wiki links). So, I guess the presence of E-V22 in East Africa is due to the same migration of North Africans during the desertification of the Sahara, before the state formation of Egypt, pointed out by Hassan et al., unless you believe there is any connection between Northern Egyptians and the Nilotic people of Kenya :/ (Aren't the Northern Egyptians the invaders in the Afrocentric discours? Doesn't seem so).

Related Links

HYPERLINK "https://www.quora.com/How-do-I-debunk-the-Afrocentric-claims-that-the-ancient-Egyptians-were-black-and-prove-to-them-that-modern-day-Egyptians-are-the-descendants-of-ancient-Egyptians" \t "_blank"
How do I debunk the Afrocentric claims that the ancient Egyptians were black and prove to them that modern day Egyptians are the descendants of ancient Egyptians?

HYPERLINK "https://www.quora.com/Who-are-the-true-descendants-of-ancient-Egypt-blacks-or-whites" \t "_blank" Who are the true descendants of ancient Egypt, blacks or whites?

HYPERLINK "https://www.quora.com/Are-modern-Egyptians-really-the-descendants-of-the-ancient-Egyptians-or-are-they-just-Arabs" \t "_blank" Are modern Egyptians really the descendants of the ancient Egyptians or are they just Arabs?

HYPERLINK "https://www.quora.com/What-race-were-ancient-Eqyptians-Are-there-any-of-their-descendants-left" \t "_blank" What race were ancient Eqyptians? Are there any of their descendants left?

HYPERLINK "https://www.quora.com/Are-Nubians-the-descendants-of-ancient-Egyptians" \t "_blank" Are Nubians the descendants of ancient Egyptians?

HYPERLINK "https://www.quora.com/Are-Copts-the-direct-descendants-of-ancient-Egyptians" \t "_blank" Are Copts the direct descendants of ancient Egyptians?

HYPERLINK "https://www.quora.com/Why-do-some-people-of-West-African-origin-claim-connection-to-Ancient-Egyptians" \t "_blank" Why do some people of West African origin claim connection to Ancient Egyptians?

HYPERLINK "https://www.quora.com/Are-there-any-living-modern-descendants-of-the-ancient-Egyptians" \t "_blank" Are there any living modern descendants of the ancient Egyptians?

HYPERLINK "https://www.quora.com/How-can-people-say-the-ancient-Egyptians-werent-Black-when-the-pictures-they-left-on-the-walls-depict-them-as-such" \t "_blank" How can people say the ancient Egyptians weren't Black when the pictures they left on the walls depict them as such?

HYPERLINK "https://www.quora.com/Are-the-Beja-People-descendants-of-the-Ancient-Egyptians" \t "_blank" Are the Beja People descendants of the Ancient Egyptians?

INCLUDEPICTURE "https://ci3.googleusercontent.com/proxy/iX9hL3fZWH4sLxemmbk4giF_IACXSz7JDozfVl4wc7ucWBBXrF0DvUtctAEMaA1H0pMrgvxde8Ud2PgU6WMC9Ep9POoPKyO0tlzzMaiHoDnfJG_FCUwK2FciWAnA=s0-d-e1-ft#https://qph.cf2.quoracdn.net/main-qimg-f45aa2ce64535194a855be1b1184358c-lq" * MERGEFORMATINET
INCLUDEPICTURE "https://ci5.googleusercontent.com/proxy/A3aBQ0TM2-N74dTHA3csqjM2K0-S-F2HTCUunBEBw-sNUQCcr3rFALJsMgQKt7RK0835z252V3IVi2_D5oggRFwYp3M3V3HV3Lyyxcw3QYw3JCoxPBSC0icDcHJ3=s0-d-e1-ft#https://qph.cf2.quoracdn.net/main-qimg-62cc940f6704ae9f7142546652d2957f-lq" * MERGEFORMATINET
INCLUDEPICTURE "https://ci5.googleusercontent.com/proxy/ozw5FU4TtdAlXQbc58sRXqe_oUuDxX8dsuuHoeywV4apmQRm0SPf_1DF-HNcqgVHp97LMHFX9TIq27R0pOkZRZAyQZq5xTbCiZnUcxKQWVB4pCINwRrC_-uXAX4f=s0-d-e1-ft#https://qph.cf2.quoracdn.net/main-qimg-e5a29d80ca038485194f489478f642ed-lq" * MERGEFORMATINET
INCLUDEPICTURE "https://ci3.googleusercontent.com/proxy/hD9G33M7INarLjEnNKXnrBq5a1NggSJNx0n_RFpOxTp1gQ7npfns8E2ias8srf5I5K5cISioKgl1k29SYIDDLEUew7tsfzyF7QdBUQjy2GAeJ9FsHweLEQlYRO8Z=s0-d-e1-ft#https://qph.cf2.quoracdn.net/main-qimg-dec6c8c211ecbf1cab8a83a8450e4de2-lq" * MERGEFORMATINET
INCLUDEPICTURE "https://ci3.googleusercontent.com/proxy/bcY7L3wAImK3qX5YExDVkVxnL4PBqS9C6uYbtSLwFGj9qZAeyLg6rbKhugcgRjU6Mq-kXLb1wPulMNj3jHwczrXspS7XsPPhjpg0t7KgonT0KWHXkJm9P5dkqEEZ=s0-

d-e1-ft#https://qph.cf2.quoracdn.net/main-qimg-970ecdbeee4c6891a0b3bdec2461c7e8-lq" * MERGEFORMATINET
INCLUDEPICTURE "https://ci3.googleusercontent.com/proxy/Sbp5g4pFEA90mdFC8C-ZHl0eUtcq5Q-uZxHLN3LvSE_qZypZKwXpOttZgNHInsS8mKyMmvifrFumJibLkR2Xhtsvq6rOrDAnPtu8Cj8mVaECmJ1hv6Au917hID3Q=s0-d-e1-ft#https://qph.cf2.quoracdn.net/main-qimg-0515e7e834f73cc8469d81692c71cb24-lq" * MERGEFORMATINET
INCLUDEPICTURE "https://ci3.googleusercontent.com/proxy/PjdISCgZFnhFkRzAIpYX1jVabx4cpTg2ksTYwUS0a5s4TdP9qcShdEUTtCL6rHNNHSO7KHoih0ZFOCsYUcd1RmNCtJwiihUuJg8cgD_SHPUyq1Vv25Z-NXjJ9K9h=s0-d-e1-ft#https://qph.cf2.quoracdn.net/main-qimg-6efcad981d56a5a8cbe92d4bad719201-lq" * MERGEFORMATINET
INCLUDEPICTURE "https://ci4.googleusercontent.com/proxy/qoHlcUXG7QM6dIg54CynCFd1oY9C3Yiq1NeiKuuJsLSD8e83dm4hOvF5gdMRm4Zrw5Jjdb9nXKZrr_HesYFNAaWG6SHrS6RI0Oj4xvkiLK58ar-Em558zhZIKHRn=s0-d-e1-ft#https://qph.cf2.quoracdn.net/main-qimg-ffebebca783eeb4329799aa7665dae6b-lq" * MERGEFORMATINET
INCLUDEPICTURE "https://ci3.googleusercontent.com/proxy/0icD_l_pXgdmsEAMbxKGKqkj1TVxcOxtnLZOGzyO5WSWi17II3y9hf4lBMmi5R1NjX4YyMd4grVChdzLxIijYBSi5vLKYWgk7OHaAwfY1HmILpNF0T-0Hb0NC0Zs=s0-d-e1-ft#https://qph.cf2.quoracdn.net/main-qimg-9560ae17c0e0a138f7218c18b3c8776b-lq" * MERGEFORMATINET
HYPERLINK "https://www.quora.com/profile/Remi-Beral" \t "_blank" Remi Beral , archeology, history and architecture HYPERLINK "https://www.quora.com/Are-there-any-traditions-existing-in-modern-Egypt-that-are-directly-descended-from-ancient-Egyptian-traditions/answer/Remi-Beral" \t "_blank" Answered Feb 21

Tahrtib

Tahrtib is an Egyptian martial art attested for more than 4000 years.

INCLUDEPICTURE "https://ci4.googleusercontent.com/proxy/nGauorplbQHnCs-2U8gumZ_s-DfZQP2p_gNMc52KDtbzzQwb-drrAsLgs_StiTtD7O30CjOecvbZkG_FhOb-AXRS0-1IHXxBiqzdMDepIENsW5ZNhgXfb8edG0RJ=s0-d-e1-

ft#https://qph.cf2.quoracdn.net/main-qimg-e1fd7fe2d093dda44a2eda299043b402-lq" * MERGEFORMATINET
INCLUDEPICTURE "https://ci3.googleusercontent.com/proxy/gUUyFTWGkpw4k0fiSTTobCavj4UEeypYpGrEbHxTLNu8at-y0AN8jFAqegKoC8dx4Q0CcYOUNXgRYX-YT3-oGYkUqDo2QmWhVXsrQlGo_htGAwgYQgxz8nJBGlq_=s0-d-e1-ft#https://qph.cf2.quoracdn.net/main-qimg-85c6c3e1f3bf818431bf77bf683457b4-lq" * MERGEFORMATINET
INCLUDEPICTURE "https://ci5.googleusercontent.com/proxy/QUPW2Bg_S8Gq8wFRvQj55Ww9pkxPJcPyQXx8GtMvWY9WyMqUwAGkg0AmgiTi3y2_8NrsX7Mn8RzPzwReHHzVSVTKwbStsbLC_DTxBxp3BMz_EmeH5r5jsUFTbRKa=s0-d-e1-ft#https://qph.cf2.quoracdn.net/main-qimg-4836a75213fa1b706d7eb943830af37f-lq" * MERGEFORMATINET

Is there a solid reason why the Egyptians would have had no record of the Israelites leaving Egypt during the Exodus?
HYPERLINK "https://www.quora.com/profile/Gwydion-Madawc-Williams" \t "_blank"
Gwydion Madawc Williams Know quite a lot of the history. HYPERLINK "https://www.quora.com/Is-there-a-solid-reason-why-the-Egyptians-would-have-had-no-record-of-the-Israelites-leaving-Egypt-during-the-Exodus/answer/Gwydion-Madawc-Williams" \t "_blank" Mar 11

HYPERLINK "https://www.quora.com/Is-there-a-solid-reason-why-the-Egyptians-would-have-had-no-record-of-the-Israelites-leaving-Egypt-during-the-Exodus" \t "_blank" We have official records. So if it happened as Exodus says, it would not have been noted.
But a lot of the early stories don't match either other records or what archaeology says. HYPERLINK "https://labouraffairsmagazine.com/m-articles-by-topic/040-religion-as-a-mode-of-human-existence/unexpected-things-said-in-the-bible/" \o "labouraffairsmagazine.com" \t "_blank"

Unexpected Things said in the Bible

"Fundamentalists" versus the Bible Gwydion M. Williams Fundamentalist Errors Seven Days of Creation First Day Second Day Third Day Fourth Day Fifth Day Sixth Day Seventh Day That Was Th…

https://labouraffairsmagazine.com/m-articles-by-topic/040-religion-as-a-mode-of-human-existence/unexpected-things-said-in-the-bible/

Cities that Joshua supposedly captured were sometimes already abandoned.

And it could not have been Ramses II, the favourite choice of films about it. He had solid control of the whole region, up until he bumped into the Hittites.

(HYPERLINK "https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/New_Kingdom_of_Egypt" \o "en.wikipedia.org" \t "_blank" New Kingdom .)
Historic fiction.

Related Answer
Why is there a relatively small African diaspora population in the Middle East despite the fact that the Arab slave trade brought millions of Black slaves from Africa to the Arab world for more than a thousand years?
HYPERLINK "https://www.quora.com/profile/Ahmed-Abdelhaq-Zaydan" \t "_blank"
Ahmed Abdelhaq Zaydan · Follow Lived in Meknès, Morocco (1996–0)
HYPERLINK "https://www.quora.com/Why-is-there-a-relatively-small-African-diaspora-population-in-the-Middle-East-despite-the-fact-that-the-Arab-slave-trade-brought-millions-of-Black-slaves-from-Africa-to-the-Arab-world-for-more-than-a-thousand-years/answer/Ahmed-Abdelhaq-Zaydan" \t "_blank" Mar 30

HYPERLINK "https://www.quora.com/Why-is-there-a-relatively-small-African-diaspora-population-in-the-Middle-East-despite-the-fact-that-the-Arab-slave-trade-brought-millions-of-Black-slaves-from-Africa-to-the-Arab-world-for-more-than-a-thousand-years" \t "_blank" Nobody knows how small or how big the population is because it cannot be collected

The Arab League has a policy of frowning on collecting ethnic or racial statistics due to the perception that everyone should be Arab or will become Arab.

In Morocco, we have two separate Black communities, the Gnawa and the Haratine. Nobody knows how much of each there is because the Moroccan government doesn't collect that information during censuses. It's easier in Mauritania where their Haratines have influence. Mauritania's population is divided into the Bidane (Arab-Berbers), the Haratines (descendants of the Black slaves of the Bidane) and the Africans (Black Africans who were never enslaved by the Bidane). It's estimated that 40% of the Mauritanian population is Haratine.

INCLUDEPICTURE "https://qph.fs.quoracdn.net/main-qimg-5ef6f5471571173188a711a6b388433-lq" * MERGEFORMATINET

Gnawa musicians

I've seen some people say that if 40% of Mauritania's population is Haratine then Southern Morocco is also probably 20-40% Haratine because Southern Morocco is very similar to Mauritania in history and society.

"20-40% Haratine! But Ahmed, I was told slaves were castrated!"

No, that's a myth. No credible historian suggests such a thing.

Castration did occur but only for high level slaves and the slaves in the harems (where the Sultan's women could be found). Judar Pasha, one of Morocco's most famous generals, was a Spanish slave and he was castrated because he was made a General. The Sultan wanted to ensure that Judar couldn't establish his own dynasty and take power.

The vast majority of male slaves were not like Judar Pasha and were not castrated.

"Ok Ahmed, if there was no castration why are there no Slavs in the Arab World? Checkmate!"

Racism. This is an extract from Black Morocco by Moroccan historian Chouki Hamel talking about a 18th century Islamic scholar in Morocco.

He condemned the scholars' community for its silence against the repulsive and unjust acts against black people. He condemned specifically those venal scholars who delivered legal opinions in support of the sultan's project to enslave all blacks in Morocco. He implicitly condemned the sultan himself for deviating from Islamic law and ordering his most trusted official, 'Alilish, to coerce the religious scholars to endorse his project.

He declared that "anybody who expresses prejudice and refuses to marry them and have children with them is a haughty ignorant [...]. And anybody who witnesses any injustice committed against them and accuses them of being slaves and does not do anything to change this evil act is disobeying God and his messenger."
Page 170

The reason why a Haratine community exists in Morocco is that under Islamic law, one cannot be born a slave and there are numerous avenues for freedom. This allowed a freed Black community to grow quickly in Morocco, a freed Black community that was discriminated against by Moroccan society.

INCLUDEPICTURE "https://qph.fs.quoracdn.net/main-qimg-252b43a28065a00288b2b0ccbbd7362a-pjlq" * MERGEFORMATINET
Black Moroccan

Slavs didn't really have this problem in Morocco or the Arab World as they were seen as desirable and so intermixing was easier and over the past 1,400 years, they were absorbed compared to Blacks.

"But I was told that Black women were sex slaves."

Also a myth.

The concept of Race didn't really exist so ruining one's genetics wasn't something Moroccans and Arabs believed. You are whatever your father is so if your father is Arab and your mother is Persian then you are 100% Arab. However Moroccans saw Black people as beneath them and "mixing" (if you know what I mean) was seen as disgusting and vile.

You could get a pass for it but only for certain situations.

Sultan Moulay Ismail (r. 1672-1727) had a Black mother but that's only because his father , a nobleman named Rashid, was taken captive by a rival nobleman. In recognition of his social status, Rashid's rival had him placed in a castle with a staff of Black slaves to tend to his every desire. 9 months later, Ismail was born.

INCLUDEPICTURE "https://qph.fs.quoracdn.net/main-qimg-0dc3383bd180327715a5cd7b00c041b7-lq" * MERGEFORMATINET
Sultan Moulay Ismail

This doesn't mean that Moroccans never had sex with Black slaves or didn't marry Black people. This did happen. But Moroccan society didn't respect this and it was frowned upon, not accepted.

"Why wasn't there a Civil rights movement though?"

Because Morocco was never one polity but dozens of polities ruled by nobles, tribes and rogue princes. Organizing activist groups is dangerous as the local autocrat will kill you and also activism wasn't a concept Moroccans understood.

INCLUDEPICTURE "https://qph.fs.quoracdn.net/main-qimg-f6c1ecf16fc34daf2e12180fdd18348d-lq" * MERGEFORMATINET
Haratine family in Mauritania

Haratines would do what everyone else did and simply petition the chieftain or noble or prince who governed their areas. Some were receptive and helped out, others ignored them and others were themselves racist.

So there you have it

Nobody knows how many Black people live in the Arab World because Arab countries don't collect that information

Black people are not a "small community", it depends on where you live. Mauritania is 40% Haratine and Southern Morocco might be as well Blacks suffered from racism, Slaves did not.

Related Links

HYPERLINK "https://www.quora.com/What-happened-to-the-15-million-African-slaves-that-were-sold-in-the-Arab-slave-trade-Why-dont-Arab-countries-have-a-large-black-population-like-America-does" \t "_top"
What happened to the 15 million African slaves that were sold in the Arab slave trade? Why don't Arab countries have a large black population like America does?

HYPERLINK "https://www.quora.com/Given-that-the-Arab-Ottoman-slave-trade-took-millions-of-Africans-why-arent-there-large-visibly-black-communities-in-the-Middle-East-What-happened-to-that-huge-population-of-slaves-Did-they-change-the-genetics-of-Mideasterners" \t "_top" Given that the Arab/Ottoman slave trade took millions of Africans, why aren't there large visibly black communities in the Middle East? What happened to that huge population of slaves? Did they change the genetics of Mideasterners?

HYPERLINK "https://www.quora.com/Why-are-many-Africans-less-harsh-on-the-Arab-slave-trade-than-the-European" \t "_top" Why are many Africans less harsh on the Arab slave trade than the European?

HYPERLINK "https://www.quora.com/What-were-the-reasons-for-the-abolition-of-slave-trade-in-Africa" \t "_top" What were the reasons for the abolition of slave trade in Africa?

HYPERLINK "https://www.quora.com/Was-African-American-slavery-the-worst-slavery-in-the-entire-history-of-mankind" \t "_top" Was African American slavery the worst slavery in the entire history of mankind?

HYPERLINK "https://www.quora.com/How-do-modern-Arabs-feel-about-Arab-slave-trade-Are-they-proud-that-their-ancestors-owned-white-slaves" \t "_top" How do modern Arabs feel about Arab slave trade? Are they proud that their ancestors owned white slaves?

HYPERLINK "https://www.quora.com/Why-are-so-called-black-people-labeled-as-black-when-in-fact-their-skin-is-not-black" \t "_top" Why are so-called black people labeled as black when in fact their skin is not black?

HYPERLINK "https://www.quora.com/Why-do-so-many-conflate-Blacks-saying-that-the-ancient-Egyptians-were-black-Africans-with-Blacks-saying-that-theyre-descendants-of-the-ancient-Egyptians" \t "_top" Why do so many conflate Blacks saying that the ancient Egyptians were black Africans with Blacks saying that they're descendants of the ancient Egyptians?

HYPERLINK "https://www.quora.com/Arabs-were-actively-involved-in-the-slave-trade-so-where-are-the-descendants-of-those-slaves-they-took-from-Africa" \t "_top" Arabs were actively involved in the slave trade, so where are the descendants of those slaves they took from Africa?

HYPERLINK "https://www.quora.com/Did-Arabs-have-a-larger-number-of-white-slaves-than-whites-had-black-slaves" \t "_top" Did Arabs have a larger number of white slaves than whites had black slaves?

HYPERLINK "https://www.quora.com/What-was-worse-the-Arab-or-transatlantic-slave-trade" \t "_top" What was worse, the Arab or transatlantic slave trade?

HYPERLINK "https://www.quora.com/Did-some-black-slaves-love-their-white-slave-owners" \t "_top" Did some black slaves love their white slave owners?

HYPERLINK "https://www.quora.com/Why-did-Europeans-get-slaves-from-Africa-but-not-slaves-from-the-Barbary-slave-trade" \t "_top" Why did Europeans get slaves from Africa but not slaves from the Barbary slave trade?

HYPERLINK "https://www.quora.com/I-recently-found-out-that-I-am-2-percent-black-How-do-I-start-embracing-my-true-African-identity-and-fitting-in-with-other-black-people" \t "_top" I recently found out that I am 2 percent black. How do I start embracing my true African identity and fitting in with other black people?

HYPERLINK "https://www.quora.com/Aside-from-slavery-slavery-was-outlawed-in-Britain-earlier-than-the-US-What-happened-that-caused-it-to-be-outlawed-What-about-the-black-civil-rights-movement-that-occurred-in-Britain" \t "_top" Aside from slavery, slavery was outlawed in Britain earlier than the US. What happened that caused it to be outlawed? What about the black civil rights movement that occurred in Britain?

Is there validity to the notion that the Sphinx is several millennia older than we think it to be?

HYPERLINK "https://www.quora.com/profile/Aasim-Naseem-Siddiqui" \t "_blank"

Aasim Naseem Siddiqui

Enthusiast reader of ancient Egypt and related domains HYPERLINK "https://www.quora.com/Is-there-validity-to-the-notion-that-the-Sphinx-is-several-millennia-older-than-we-think-it-to-be/answer/Aasim-Naseem-Siddiqui" \t "_blank" 6y

HYPERLINK "https://www.quora.com/Is-there-validity-to-the-notion-that-the-Sphinx-is-several-millennia-older-than-we-think-it-to-be" \t "_blank"

Many Egyptologist (including Zahi Hawas, former Minister of State for Antiquities Affairs) insist that Sphinx was built nearly 4500BC, by the builder of 2nd pyramid of the HYPERLINK "https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Giza_Plateau" \o "en.wikipedia.org" \t "_blank" Giza Plateau .i.e. the pyramid of Chephren (also read as Khafre, Khefren and Chephren).
But other researchers like John A. West and Robert Bauval (who first put forwarded the "Orion correlation theory") believe that the both pyramids & Sphinx are much much older then Egypt civilization.

Here I'm summarizing some extracts from their research paper where they are trying to prove that Sphinx is atleast 10 milliumn BC old.

Facial Analysis of Sphinx & Statue of Chephren

As stated by other Egyptologists, the Sphinx is actually built by Chepren, and he put his face over the body of the Sphinx. Detective Frank Domin-go (from US police department) carefully measured the Chephren statue and directed the photographer to get exact profile and full-face views of the Sphinx.

Despite the damage to the Sphinx's face, the statue and the Sphinx share enough undamaged reference points for Mr. Domingo to compare their facial structures.

Using his police procedures, he produced an artist's impression of the Sphinx as it might have looked originally.

His report concludes: "After reviewing my various drawings, sche matics and measurements, my final conclusion concurs with my initial reaction: the two works represent two separate individuals.

You can see the clear difference in below image.

INCLUDEPICTURE "https://qph.fs.quoracdn.net/main-qimg-3737235bd7a2e63ced9d7e3899a27d32-pjlq" * MERGEFORMATINET

This proves that current head of the Sphinx isn't the face of pharaoh Chephren. Either the head was re-carved or it wasn't build by Chephren.

Sphinx Water Erosion

The erosion over the body of Sphinx is both vertical, as well as horizontal. When stones are exposed wind and sand, the layers become soft and get erosion horizontally. This is a common type of erosion and can be found throughout the Egypt. The Sphinx has something different. The erosion is from top to down vertically, making a rounded shape structure over the body of the Sphinx. This kind of erosion can be made only by heavy rain fall and by flow of a water from top to down. That means (there was some time in history when) this desert of Giza has experienced a heavy rainfall and hence even the hard limestone of Sphinx got erosion from water.

The question is: when Giza plateau had this much rain in the history, which caused water damage? The answer is surprising. It was 12,000 year ago, at the end of last ice age. At that time major part of the earth was covered by thick layer of ice, and it all melted down in the span of 2 to 2.5 thousand years. This made heavy flood on earth, along with thunderstorms and rain. The continuous rain damaged the Sphinx, and soon after this flood the whole Giza plateau converted into desert savanna. The sphinx was covered with thick layer of sand which saved it from further damages. The face/head was over the surface and hence it faced the weather for next thousands of years.

Sphinx As Astronomical Apparatus

According to "Orion correlation theory" by Robert Bauval, the three pyramids are terrestrial map with three stars of Orion constellation. And in the astronomical movement/rotation of stars & constellation, this mapping was occurred exactly 10,000 to 11,000 years BC.

Robert Bauval and his co-worker Graham Hancock believe that Sphinx is served as astronomical markup for vernal equinox. When Sphinx was supposedly built in 2,500BC, the Sun rose in the constellation of Taurus. If the ancient engineers wanted to build an astronomical apparatus, then they must have had to choose the shape of Sphinx which exactly matches with the constellation of that time. As the Sphinx is in shape of Lion, then the only constellation matches with Lion is the LEO. And surprisingly, the Sun rose in the constellation of LEO in 10,500BC. Only that epoch in the history matches with the constellation LEO.

In the age of LEO (10,500BC) when the Sphinx was built as astronomical markup for vernal equinox, it was built like it is gazing its own image to east.

The above facts and researches make me convinced that the Sphinx, as well as the pyramids were built much much before the Egypt civilization. The water erosion, the Orion correlation and the theory of age of LEO all together strongly claim that the Sphinx is older, not less then 10,500 years.

HYPERLINK "https://www.quora.com/Is-it-true-that-the-original-head-of-the-Sphinx-was-replaced" \t "_blank"
Is it true that the original head of the Sphinx was replaced?
HYPERLINK "https://www.quora.com/profile/Zbigniew-%C5%81obocki" \t "_blank"
Zbigniew Łobocki Management consultant, people analytics manager (2010–present) HYPERLINK "https://www.quora.com/Is-it-true-that-the-original-head-of-the-Sphinx-was-replaced/answer/Zbigniew-%C5%81obocki" \t "_blank" 3y

I don't think there are any ancient Egyptian records describing the recarving or an earlier form of the Sphinx. The two pieces of evidence that suggest the head was recarved (from an earlier, bigger head):
INCLUDEPICTURE "https://qph.fs.quoracdn.net/main-qimg-01749938fcb62e817b4deb11a8f9c14a-lq" * MERGEFORMATINET
Proportions. Most pictures of the spinx are taken at a steep angle or from the front so that the head seems larger. Pictures taken from the side look worse, because they show a terribly obvious lack of proportion - the human head is tiny, especially when compared with the paws. Also, the head is pushed back relative to the body.

When you see it, it's hard to unsee it. The head is ridiculously small. Compare with proportions on real animals or other statues:

INCLUDEPICTURE "https://qph.fs.quoracdn.net/main-qimg-59f1bd5a58c70ad349e58cd8f182600b-lq" * MERGEFORMATINET
Erosion. For centuries, the Sphinx was buried and the head was the only part of it that was sticking out. However, the erosion on the head - as compared to the body - is small. It should be the other way around.

INCLUDEPICTURE "https://qph.fs.quoracdn.net/main-qimg-c16aa6a1505d10700b932562d584b81e-lq" * MERGEFORMATINET
The head was far more exposed to wind erosion then the body - yet look how badly the body is eroded compared with the head:

INCLUDEPICTURE "https://qph.fs.quoracdn.net/main-qimg-a6c54cf5b40ad3aad0128e5f1ac9dd21-lq" * MERGEFORMATINET
This can be to some extent explained by the difference in quality of the rock - the Sphinx was carved out of a single big chunk of limestone, but the top strata (Member III) are the most durable. The head also has some cement. However, I think there is some debate between geologists and Egyptologists about the Sphinx, and this issue is not fully explored.

INCLUDEPICTURE "https://qph.fs.quoracdn.net/main-qimg-8bd30423f2beb7b1814afd4d9c58e1aa-lq" * MERGEFORMATINET
Incidentally, this picture - a true side view - does a good job of showing the proportions issue again.

Why is Egypt not allowing archeologists to examine the voids under the Sphinx and in the Great Pyramid, and have closed off access to many other sites?
HYPERLINK "https://www.quora.com/profile/Larry-Pahl-2" \t "_blank"

Larry Pahl

Director, American Inst of Pyramid Research greatpyramid.org HYPERLINK "https://www.quora.com/Why-is-Egypt-not-allowing-archeologists-to-examine-the-voids-under-the-Sphinx-and-in-the-Great-Pyramid-and-have-closed-off-access-to-many-other-sites/answer/Larry-Pahl-2" \t "_blank" 2y
HYPERLINK "https://www.quora.com/Why-is-Egypt-not-allowing-archeologists-to-examine-the-voids-under-the-Sphinx-and-in-the-Great-Pyramid-and-have-closed-off-access-to-many-other-sites" \t "_blank"
Almost everything in your question is misguided, so you are getting your information from the wrong sources. First, I am not sure what you mean by “voids” under the Sphinx. That term is usually used to refer to empty space inside otherwise solid masonry. Are you referring to the tunnel system under the Sphinx? I am part of a group who has been granted access to this tunneling in late February 2020. We will not be the first group that has been given access there, so the first part of your question is misinformed.

Second, you say the Egyptian government is not allowing archaeologists access to the voids in the Great Pyramid. First of all, those voids would never have been found except for the government of Egypt. The former Minister of Antiquities, Dr. Eldamaty, (2014-2016) is the one who commissioned the study of the Japanese-French Scan Pyramids team that took muon detecting equipment into the Great Pyramid and discovered the two voids, one near the original entrance, and the other, a very large one, above the Grand Gallery. Here is a schematic off those voids which I took from Dr. Eldamaty's phone:

Why is Egypt not allowing archeologists to examine the voids under the Sphinx and in the Great Pyramid, and have closed off access to many other sites?

I was with him in his office at the Cairo university where he teaches Egyptology on April 3, 2019. He was looking on his computer for this picture and when he couldn't immediately call it up, he took out his phone and showed me, and I asked him if I could photograph it. You'll notice that where the large void is in this photo is NOT where you see it in most of the depictions that are on the web. I asked him specifically about that and he assured me this likeness is correct.

As I write this (December, 2019), the Egyptian government has the Scan Pyramids team back in the relieving chambers above the Kings Chamber doing more scans and probing to find the best way to try and access that large void. The team has been quiet for several years after the discovery and worldwide announcement of the void. It took awhile for the Supreme Council to be convinced of that void, but now Dr. Zahi Hawass, and Dr. Mark Lehner are talking openly about it, as a possible store of something significant.

You saying that they are not allowing archaeologists in there is truly misinformed because NO ONE has been in that large void because it's only been detected by muon scans, not actually discovered in reality.

And when you say that they have closed off access to many other sites you are again misinformed. I am not aware of any site they have not granted access to. There are a number of sites that are closed to the public, but every one of those have been opened to qualified archaeologists who have petitioned for research access. The resources of the Ministry of Antiquities of a poor country like Egypt are very limited, so they protect their sites by controlling access to them.

They just opened access to the Bent Pyramid in Dahshur to the public, which hasn't happened in over 50 years. You can now go where only qualified Egyptologists were allowed to go for decades.

I think perhaps you need a little attitude adjustment. The Egyptian authorities do not believe Atlantans nor Aliens built the pyramids, but that does not make them evil - just Egyptian!

The Sphinx in Egypt has two legs, some say The Hall of Records is inside the South Paw, but is it well known the head is hollow and there the Hall of records hides?

HYPERLINK "https://www.quora.com/profile/Wayne-Rutledge-4" \t "_blank" Wayne Rutledge

Retired Archaeologist, College Lecturer and US Army HYPERLINK "https://www.quora.com/The-Sphinx-in-Egypt-has-two-legs-some-say-The-Hall-of-Records-is-inside-the-South-Paw-but-is-it-well-known-the-head-is-hollow-and-there-the-Hall-of-records-hides/answer/Wayne-Rutledge-4" \t "_blank" 11mo

HYPERLINK "https://www.quora.com/The-Sphinx-in-Egypt-has-two-legs-some-say-The-Hall-of-Records-is-inside-the-South-Paw-but-is-it-well-known-the-head-is-hollow-and-there-the-Hall-of-records-hides" \t "_blank"
The Sphinx in Egypt has two legs, some say The Hall of Records is inside the South Paw, but is it well known the head is hollow and there the Hall of records hides?

It has four. Some say a lot of things. Old Cayce simply made up that story about the Hall of Records. Considering how off the wall many of his predictions were I'm not sure why anyone would believe he was right about this and the other locations for the HoR.

The head isn't hollow based on any evidence we currently have. There was a short pit or hole dug into the head at one point but it doesn't lead anywhere.

INCLUDEPICTURE "https://qph.fs.quoracdn.net/main-qimg-9d60c11a6bdfe7fd9473f15fb09175f5-lq" * MERGEFORMATINET
In the image above you can see three of the four legs - trust me when I say there is a fourth one too. Seen it multiple times on multiple trips.

So what did our dude say about the Hall?

“The one in the Atlantean land, that sank, which will rise and is rising again; another in the place of the records that leadeth from the Sphinx to the hall of records, in the Egyptian land; and another in the Aryan or Yucatan land, where the temple there is overshadowing same.” (2012-1)

“For the entity's tomb then was a part of the Hall of Records, which has not yet been uncovered. It lies between—or along that entrance from the Sphinx to the temple—or the pyramid; in a pyramid, of course, of its own.” (2329-3)

“Hence we find the entity…was the first to set the records that are yet to be discovered…and for the preservation of the data, that as yet to be found from the chambers of the way between the sphinx and the pyramid of records.” (1486-1)

“Yet, as time draws nigh when changes are to come about, there may be the opening of the three places where the records are one, to those that are initiates in the knowledge of the One God.

“The temple of Iltar will then rise again. Also there will be the opening of the hall of records in Egypt.

“The RECORDS are ONE.” (5750-1)

And for grins and giggles I will add in one of my favorite things said by Cayce or more correctly by those who studied his works:

It is our conclusion that the first and second pyramid refer to the same pyramid and that it is the pyramid of Khafra. Today it is known as the second pyramid, but we believe that in reality it was the first. We base this belief upon evidence from Edgar Cayce’s reading (993-1,#23) which explains that the first of the pyramids was constructed in Egypt long before the lifetime of Ra Ta and long before the construction of the Great Pyramid. >>>This pyramid was underwater for nearly a quarter of a million years<<< before Ra-Ta entered Egypt (341-9,#4).

HYPERLINK "file://D:\\AFRICA-ALL-IN-ONE (Latest file)\\AFRICA ALL-IN-ONE word file\\Our Research into Cayce's \“Hall of Records\”We also learn about the first pyramids built in Egypt. We discovered the reading of Miss [993] (in the Cayce readings, individual's names are represented by numbers to protect their privacy), who had a past lifetime in Egypt during the period of the Great Pyramid's construction and Ra-Ta was the priest (circa 10,500 BC, according to Cayce). The readings go on to describe two lifetimes before that one in the land of Og and another one in Egypt earlier when the first pyramid was built there. This proves that there were pyramids in Egypt before the Great Pyramid was built!https:\\www.edgarcayce.org\\12362\\" Our Research into Cayce's "Hall of Records"

We also learn about the first pyramids built in Egypt. We discovered the reading of Miss [993] (in the Cayce readings, individual's names are represented by numbers to protect their privacy), who had a past lifetime in Egypt during the period of the Great Pyramid's construction and Ra-Ta was the priest (circa 10,500 BC, according to Cayce). The readings go on to describe two lifetimes before that one in the land of Og and another one in Egypt earlier when the first pyramid was built there. This proves that there were pyramids in Egypt before the Great Pyramid was built!

https://www.edgarcayce.org/12362/

>>>I don't think so<<<

Nothing I can see that would led one to believe anything about the head as a 'place'?

Cayce made it all up.

HYPERLINK "https://www.quora.com/If-the-sphinx-is-really-10-000-years-old-where-is-the-evidence-of-the-society-that-built-it-Note-Dont-say-Gobleki-Tepi-because-thats-in-Turkey" \t "_blank" Related Answer
If the sphinx is really 10,000 + years old, where is the evidence of the society that built it? (Note: Don't say Gobleki Tepi because that's in Turkey…)
HYPERLINK "https://www.quora.com/profile/Zbigniew-%C5%81obocki" \t "_blank"
Zbigniew Łobocki

Management consultant, people analytics manager (2010–present)
HYPERLINK "https://www.quora.com/If-the-sphinx-is-really-10-000-years-old-where-is-the-evidence-of-the-society-that-built-it-Note-Dont-say-Gobleki-Tepi-because-thats-in-Turkey/answer/Zbigniew-%C5%81obocki" \t "_blank" 3y

I'll start by saying I'm interested in the subject, looked at both sides' arguments (Egyptologists and the 10000 year-old Sphinx geologist) in some detail, and find both sides' arguments lacking. If you have good material on the subject, please feel encouraged to post links.

Anyhow, the geologist - Robert Schoch - looked at the Sphinx, which is a statue carved out of a single chunk of limestone, and said "this weathering looks much older than 4500 years". That is not a super-strong argument, but it is a decent one. He's not the only geologist to think/say that, but he's the most vocal one. Several "accelerated erosion" hypotheses were presented and rejected by Schoch in a way I found convincing, and it is very notable that the exact same limestone type on nearby structures dated to approx 2500 BC that were exposed to the elements show very little weathering, compared to massive weathering on the Sphinx.

Egyptologists date the Sphinx based on its postion. It is situated in such a way that it fits with the Pyramid complex. Fine, but I'm sure many modern buildings are situated so that they fit with castles or medieval town squares, and a dentist will make sure the implants fit in well with your existing teeth. It is an extremely weak argument.

Otherwise it is just a piece of carved bedrock, which cannot be dated, has been repaired numerous times, and bears no markings that are undisputed parts of the original and associated with a certain culture. The head is clearly Egyptian, sure, but is so disproportionally small that it is likely to have been recarved, and is not weathered much (nearly not at all…) compared to the body.

Now, "we haven't found evidence of a society that could build the Sphinx in 10000 BC" is also an extremely weak argument, and this is where Gobekli Tepe fits in - it proves there was a culture building impressive megaliths almost 12 000 years ago that we HAD NO CLUE ABOUT until recently, when this one site was discovered. This culture simply disappeared, leaving almost no trace - undoubtedly as many others did - except for the one huge site. Sure, that culture was in Turkey, so they did not build the Sphinx - but it just shows we probably haven't found, and will never find, traces of many cultures from 10 000 BC.

Those are my conclusions, anyway. I would like to add that I found particularly galling the way in which some Egyptologists rejected Schoch's arguments - it is clear they are very partial, emotionally vested and have no interest in their hypotheses being challenged.

HYPERLINK "https://www.quora.com/What-is-hidden-in-the-secret-room-beneath-the-Sphinx" \t "_blank" What is hidden in the secret room beneath the Sphinx?

HYPERLINK "https://www.quora.com/profile/Khadija-Hammond" \t "_blank"
Khadija Hammond

Studied Ancient Egypt at American University in Cairo HYPERLINK "https://www.quora.com/What-is-hidden-in-the-secret-room-beneath-the-Sphinx/answer/Khadija-Hammond" \t "_blank" 2y

There is actually a room below the sphinx that most people have never heard of. It is behind the great Stela of Thutmose lV. I once went down there in the evening alone. That was back in the days when you could do such things before they closed it all up. I would say the room looked to be about 10 ft. Square. I remember wondering if there were any snakes down there, but it was just an empty room. I stayed there for several hours meditating. Quite an experience. I did not dare disturb anything around me so I don't know if there was a further entrance to any other space. There were quite a few disturbed large stones, which could have hidden another entrance to a different space, but I did not dare try to move them, fearing cobras which I knew lived in this area. I lived in the shadow of the great sphinx for more than 10 years. There are many things that are still a mystery and will always remain so.

No one ever speaks of this room! But I know that it is there because I've been in it! Then, when I was working with John Anthony West on the great documentary "mysteries of the sphinx" we actually did some ground penetrating radar in that area. Underneath the right hand paw of the sphinx is an anomaly. I was told at dinner that night as we were all meeting to discuss what we had found, a great mystery. The specialist who I was sitting next to told me that there was some sort of cave, and that he did not think it was natural because it was square in shape. That is exactly where the late Edgar Casey claimed there were hidden records. But we were not allowed to continue the search in that spot.

Dr. Zahi Hawass has said on another TV program that they did in fact drill some search holes but did not find anything. I noticed where they had drilled. It was not the same place! One of these days I will tell him, maybe!

INCLUDEPICTURE "https://qph.fs.quoracdn.net/main-qimg-c3198c12f250ec3590f71c70455222dd-lq" * MERGEFORMATINET
INCLUDEPICTURE "https://qph.fs.quoracdn.net/main-qimg-b7d46f7d51de3124782d1e31e73e4f1f-lq" * MERGEFORMATINET
Top photo: view from Sunshine Pyramids Hotel and Giza

Bottom: Great Sphinx- photos KS Hammond

Related Links

HYPERLINK "https://www.quora.com/Why-is-Egypt-not-allowing-archeologists-to-examine-the-voids-under-the-Sphinx-and-in-the-Great-Pyramid-and-have-closed-off-access-to-many-other-sites" \t "_top"
Why is Egypt not allowing archeologists to examine the voids under the Sphinx and in the Great Pyramid, and have closed off access to many other sites?

HYPERLINK "https://www.quora.com/What-do-you-think-about-the-study-claiming-the-Sphinx-is-800-000-years-old" \t "_top" What do you think about the study claiming the Sphinx is 800,000 years old?

HYPERLINK "https://www.quora.com/What-is-hidden-in-the-secret-room-beneath-the-Sphinx" \t "_top" What is hidden in the secret room beneath the Sphinx?

HYPERLINK "https://www.quora.com/Is-it-true-that-the-original-head-of-the-Sphinx-was-replaced" \t "_top" Is it true that the original head of the Sphinx was replaced?

HYPERLINK "https://www.quora.com/Why-hasn-t-anyone-excavated-under-and-around-the-Sphinx-to-find-out-what-is-in-the-empty-cavity-detected-by-scientists-near-the-front-paws" \t "_top" Why hasn't anyone excavated under and around the Sphinx to find out what is in the empty cavity detected by scientists near the front paws?

HYPERLINK "https://www.quora.com/Why-do-some-people-think-the-Sphinx-is-50-000-years-old" \t "_top" Why do some people think the Sphinx is 50,000 years old?

HYPERLINK "https://www.quora.com/Was-the-pyramid-and-sphinx-underwater-thousand-years-ago" \t "_top" Was the pyramid and sphinx underwater thousand years ago?

HYPERLINK "https://www.quora.com/Is-there-validity-to-the-notion-that-the-Sphinx-of-Giza-could-be-several-millennia-older-than-we-think-it-to-be" \t "_top"
Is there validity to the notion that the Sphinx of Giza could be several millennia older than we think it to be?

HYPERLINK "https://www.quora.com/Why-do-archaeologists-refuse-the-theory-that-suggests-that-the-Sphinx-was-Anubis" \t "_top" Why do archaeologists refuse the theory that suggests that the Sphinx was Anubis?

HYPERLINK "https://www.quora.com/What-do-you-think-of-the-theory-that-the-Sphinx-is-actually-over-10-000-years-old-What-does-this-mean-for-human-history" \t "_top" What do you think of the theory that the Sphinx is actually over 10,000 years old. What does this mean for human history?

HYPERLINK "https://www.quora.com/Is-there-an-ancient-chamber-under-the-paw-of-the-Sphinx" \t "_top" Is there an ancient chamber under the paw of the Sphinx?

HYPERLINK "https://www.quora.com/The-Sphinx-in-Egypt-has-two-legs-some-say-The-Hall-of-Records-is-inside-the-South-Paw-but-is-it-well-known-the-head-is-hollow-and-there-the-Hall-of-records-hides" \t "_top" The Sphinx in Egypt has two legs, some say The Hall of Records is inside the South Paw, but is it well known the head is hollow and there the Hall of records hides?

HYPERLINK "https://www.quora.com/If-the-sphinx-is-really-10-000-years-old-where-is-the-evidence-of-the-society-that-built-it-Note-Dont-say-Gobleki-Tepi-because-thats-in-Turkey" \t "_top" If the sphinx is really 10,000 + years old, where is the evidence of the society that built it? (Note: Don't say Gobleki Tepi because that's in Turkey…)

HYPERLINK "https://www.quora.com/How-do-mainstream-archaeologists-explain-the-water-erosion-on-sphinx" \t "_top" How do mainstream archaeologists explain the water erosion on sphinx?

HYPERLINK "https://www.quora.com/Is-there-a-chamber-in-the-Sphinx" \t "_top" Is there a chamber in the Sphinx?

HYPERLINK "https://www.quora.com/Do-you-like-to-live-in-Egypt-Why" \t "_blank" Do you like to live in Egypt? Why?

HYPERLINK "https://www.quora.com/profile/Anthony-M-Anderson" \t "_blank"

Anthony M Anderson Loves Africa HYPERLINK "https://www.quora.com/Do-you-like-to-live-in-Egypt-Why/answer/Anthony-M-Anderson" \t "_blank" 20h Definitely yes!

I do love Egypt so much cause it has very rich history and rich heritage. Egypt is one of my favorite African countries within africa.

I got interests in Egyptology as well as learning the coptic language. Egypt is so diverse and i love the pyramids so much. I would like to live in the city of Alexandria located at the mediterranean coast.

Alexandria, Egypt
Definitely, i love to live within africa INCLUDEPICTURE "https://fonts.gstatic.com/s/e/notoemoji/14.0/1f30d/72.png" * MERGEFORMATINET

Related Links

HYPERLINK "https://www.quora.com/What-is-the-daily-life-like-in-Egypt-now" \t "_blank"
What is the daily life like in Egypt now? HYPERLINK "https://www.quora.com/Is-Egypt-a-good-place-to-live-Do-you-enjoy-it" \t "_blank" Is Egypt a good place to live? Do you enjoy it?
HYPERLINK "https://www.quora.com/As-a-foreigner-living-in-Egypt-what-did-you-find-most-shocking-about-the-culture" \t "_blank" As a foreigner living in Egypt, what did you find most shocking about the culture?
HYPERLINK "https://www.quora.com/What-is-it-like-to-live-in-Cairo-Egypt" \t "_blank" What is it like to live in Cairo, Egypt?
HYPERLINK "https://www.quora.com/Do-you-like-Egypt-If-yes-why" \t "_blank" Do you like Egypt? If yes, why?
HYPERLINK "https://www.quora.com/Why-is-life-in-Egypt-very-boring" \t "_blank" Why is life in Egypt very boring?
HYPERLINK "https://www.quora.com/What-the-hell-happened-to-Egypt" \t "_blank" What the hell happened to Egypt?
HYPERLINK "https://www.quora.com/Why-is-life-in-Egypt-so-difficult" \t "_blank" Why is life in Egypt so difficult?
HYPERLINK "https://www.quora.com/What-do-you-think-about-Egypt" \t "_blank" What do you think about Egypt?
HYPERLINK "https://www.quora.com/What-is-the-Worst-Thing-About-The-City-Of-Cairo-Egypt" \t "_blank" What is the Worst Thing About The City Of Cairo Egypt?
HYPERLINK "https://www.quora.com/Is-it-safe-to-live-in-Egypt" \t "_blank" Is it safe to live in Egypt?

HYPERLINK "https://www.quora.com/Is-New-Cairo-a-good-place-to-live-in-Egypt" \t "_blank" Is New Cairo a good place to live in Egypt?
HYPERLINK "https://www.quora.com/How-would-you-describe-the-cost-of-living-in-Egypt" \t "_blank" How would you describe the cost of living in Egypt?
HYPERLINK "https://www.quora.com/What-do-you-know-about-Egypt-2" \t "_blank" What do you know about Egypt?
HYPERLINK "https://www.quora.com/What-are-the-best-places-to-live-in-Egypt" \t "_blank" What are the best places to live in Egypt?

HYPERLINK "https://www.quora.com/Were-the-ancient-Kushites-the-same-people-as-the-ancient-Egyptians" \t "_blank" Were the ancient Kushites the same people as the ancient Egyptians?

HYPERLINK "https://www.quora.com/profile/Nathan-Reed-59" \t "_blank" Nathan Reed Studied Ancient History & Ancient Egypt
HYPERLINK "https://www.quora.com/Were-the-ancient-Kushites-the-same-people-as-the-ancient-Egyptians/answer/Nathan-Reed-59" \t "_blank"
Updated 3y

Originally Answered: Were the ancient Kushites the same peoples as ancient Egyptians?

As mainstream egyptologists and youtube scholars dilute many truths, first we'll have to break down what a nubian or kushite was.

I mention this as there seems to be some confusion in the mainstream world in regards to egypt's history and the groups in which they came in contact with.

Many egyptologits have refereed to these people as "nuba" supposedly meaning "gold". Because of this this group is called nubian.
INCLUDEPICTURE "https://ci3.googleusercontent.com/proxy/z3NzU035XRCJuAor1a3RqZ9QMHrNZt1xgBhyB8MOCxN5P_xmpYvWZaPiQlEv5HTY8HArKc3rY7a1BMQY2NawVYUeqqZ7aNs0s87HoCYfDKLoMdedNZo7MS0NmLE=s0-d-e1-ft#https://qph.fs.quoracdn.net/main-qimg-24fd8c1bede0a84565d70092e8de2171-lq" * MERGEFORMATINET

Who may have been any group of people whom today reside in kenya, sudan,southern sudan, the sahara or by the nile. We really don't know. Their name is really not known but we can try to match their depiction to some groups with similar appearance. It's important to know hairstyles have drastically changed with modernity all over the word. Its like trying to find a chinese with a han dynasty hairstyle to prove their “chinese”-ness. Wouldn’t then a korean or japanese who perserved a particular style easily be called chinese due to likeness of styles.

INCLUDEPICTURE "https://ci5.googleusercontent.com/proxy/LLD0jQErSi9xJwQTNjXF9PYx6d74k9O9K1PR87kkKFn-l4SZBgo_hScjStpbMupLlf1_TwXxlqATEaJmqDiZk2O9WiEvtCeCh9GxtBnrbzK55jqT6t4Rq0_KssA=s0-d-e1-ft#https://qph.fs.quoracdn.net/main-qimg-70d1f2cda9394a14bd2d1ee83d630a90-lq" * MERGEFORMATINET

These “nuba” or nubi people aren’t and don’t resemble those actually called nubian today which means “those who speak noobiin” (I believe). They reside in upper sudan and egypt.

INCLUDEPICTURE "https://ci4.googleusercontent.com/proxy/I_Cr6X3Z_sdBP404Jz_vbKDBxs6Bfg4712_b6mWBa1IMTC49hv72lJ7O58vxSTEnyZ2HIoEi-qx-BTenBwVFTQxq6dwovnuGfnGvHh4V0WCSNj1gyfsmA8zk970=s0-d-e1-ft#https://qph.fs.quoracdn.net/main-qimg-c0ba28875747923c5baea488856c3df4-lq" * MERGEFORMATINET

INCLUDEPICTURE "https://qph.fs.quoracdn.net/main-qimg-5909c818250185ec41abb0083453a70d-lq" * MERGEFORMATINET
The northern sudan kingdom in which the nubian’s of today (last photo) inhabit housed the kingdom of kushites. We believe these are the depictions of kuhites.

Which better fits the people of sudan and southern sudan.

INCLUDEPICTURE "https://qph.fs.quoracdn.net/main-qimg-ba80b63c36174b42211f775e91c442e6.webp" * MERGEFORMATINET
INCLUDEPICTURE "https://qph.fs.quoracdn.net/main-qimg-43272621964c13f23406e12541b71afd-lq" * MERGEFORMATINET
Nubians (the ethncitiy) like most of sudans people are part of a north-eastern saharan/sahel african branch of people like those in Tchad. In sudan today however, where some nubians live, there is heterogenous population. Arabs from the arab invasion, some baring sudan ethnicitues like those in “south” sudan today, nubians and other people. Ancient kush likely wasn't similar today and likely housed native Sudanese people like those in south sudan today and nubians.

It can be said they held ancient kush. The nubian language today is closely related to meroe but there still is more to learn.

As egyptians depicted themselves no differnt than to the people of punt, thought today to be somalia, we can get a gist of their phenotype.

INCLUDEPICTURE "https://qph.fs.quoracdn.net/main-qimg-43198b6156f293d2a3c389c3edaea755-lq" * MERGEFORMATINET
INCLUDEPICTURE "https://qph.fs.quoracdn.net/main-qimg-ccbbea6dbb30a0a9ceb6c8e50c87b296-lq" * MERGEFORMATINET
So we can say physically the egyptians resembled todays nubains/kushites and may come from the same branch of people.

For now we know kush and ancient egypt were fairly similar. This can be due to proximity as the same pattern persists around the world with neighboring ruling nations . Think europe: They basically were identical from south to north in beliefs and culture with their monarchies.

Kush is dated older than egypt, but that can always change. We tend to follow “theories” more so than facts. Egypts entire timeline is a theory (btw). Both old empires, same region of the world, and very powerful. Hard to say one invented the other but that theory remains. It’s rooted in the “we came from along the nile” narrative (which is punt).

We should realise oral tales are very old for each group of people. The average japanese person’s oral tales state they came from “china”. A northern arabs for “southern europe” and a southern arab from “the horn of africa”. Each are different groups and identified as so. We should do the same for egypt and kush.

If the world can accept europeans as so “diverse” although they are closely related linguistically, culturally, genetically and such, we should have no problem seeing egypt, kush and africa’s history in a similar manner.

Kush isn’t an “egyptianzied” kingdom either. This narrative is the excuse to explain how a land not inhabited by “arabs” or arab look-alikes carries a strong Egyptian culture. North-east africa shares a similar culture/belief/ and system of society which then is generally shared closely to egypt which then branches to greater africa. Like central asian culture links to one another than asia/europe.

Overall the kushites aka today’s nubians are same micro-race as the egyptians, as the somalis, as the beja/bisharians, watutsi’s and afar people but were they the people we call nubian from the past? Likely not.

Hope this helps :)

Related Links

HYPERLINK "https://www.quora.com/Why-is-it-that-Ancient-Egypt-gets-credit-for-the-oldest-civilization-in-Africa-when-clearly-the-Kushite-civilization-is-where-the-ancient-egyptians-came-from-This-is-shown-in-many-texts-made-by-early-egyptians" \t "_top"
Why is it that Ancient Egypt gets credit for the "oldest civilization in Africa" when clearly the Kushite civilization is where the ancient egyptians came from (This is shown in many texts made by early egyptians discussing their place of origin)?

HYPERLINK "https://www.quora.com/Why-after-the-pharaohs-of-the-Egyptian-Empire-fell-were-there-no-other-famous-empires-from-this-region-which-gave-significant-influences-to-world-history-especially-in-African-history" \t "_top" Why, after the pharaohs of the Egyptian Empire fell, were there no other famous empires from this region which gave significant influences to world history, especially in African history?

HYPERLINK "https://www.quora.com/Why-were-the-Egyptians-unable-to-expand-their-territory-beyond-the-region-of-African-and-conquer-other-empires" \t "_top" Why were the Egyptians unable to expand their territory beyond the region of African and conquer other empires?

HYPERLINK "https://www.quora.com/Why-didnt-Egyptians-expand-their-territories-across-all-of-Africa-since-they-were-an-advanced-civilization-during-the-times-of-pharaohs" \t "_top"
Why didn't Egyptians expand their territories across all of Africa since they were an advanced civilization during the times of pharaohs?

HYPERLINK "https://www.quora.com/What-were-the-main-causes-for-the-decline-of-the-Ancient-Egyptian-Empire" \t "_top" What were the main causes for the decline of the Ancient Egyptian Empire?

HYPERLINK "https://www.quora.com/In-what-ways-is-the-Egyptian-empire-reflected-in-today-s-society" \t "_top" In what ways is the Egyptian empire reflected in today’s society?

HYPERLINK "https://www.quora.com/Why-did-the-Egyptian-Empire-in-the-time-of-the-pharoahs-never-expand-and-conquer-the-entire-African-continent" \t "_top" Why did the Egyptian Empire in the time of the pharoahs never expand and conquer the entire African continent?

HYPERLINK "https://www.quora.com/Were-the-Egyptians-black" \t "_top" Were the Egyptians black?

HYPERLINK "https://www.quora.com/Apart-from-Egypt-why-has-the-greater-part-of-Africa-historically-not-had-the-kind-of-advanced-empires-that-seemed-to-dominate-Europe-and-Asia" \t "_top" Apart from Egypt, why has the greater part of Africa historically not had the kind of advanced empires that seemed to dominate Europe and Asia?

HYPERLINK "https://www.quora.com/Why-didnt-the-early-Muslim-empire-destroy-the-pyramids" \t "_top" Why didn't the early Muslim empire destroy the pyramids?

HYPERLINK "https://www.quora.com/What-are-some-strange-and-unusual-customs-of-your-country" \t "_blank" What are some strange and unusual customs of your country?

HYPERLINK "https://www.quora.com/profile/Ahmed-Mustafa-31" \t "_blank" Ahmed Mustafa Lives in Alexandria, Egypt HYPERLINK "https://www.quora.com/What-are-some-strange-and-unusual-customs-of-your-country/answer/Ahmed-Mustafa-31" \t "_blank" Updated Feb 25

In the villages of southern Egypt, when a family member died or even fell seriously ill, people used to hire a group of old women, from morning to evening, for a week, to weep, show grief, and recite sad folkloric poems، in return for a small fee, could be a free meal or a bag of meat, rice and pies. HYPERLINK "https://www.quora.com/" \l "IfiPh" \t "_blank" [1]

My aunt once told me about her visit to her friend’s house, in the 1980s, in a village in central Egypt, to offer her condolences on the morning of her father's death.

And while they were sitting in silence interspersed with wailing and crying from time to time, they heard huge screams coming from outside the house. She went outside to see a group of scary women, who looked like mummies, wrapped in black clothes, weeping together, stroking their cheeks, and bending over to take the mud from the ground and put it on their heads.

They entered the house, wailing, and started to chant folkloric weeping sentences about the deceased, his life, and the tragic loss. Like a choir, behind them, the rest of the women in the house repeated their lamentations in unison and continued until sunset when everyone ate and left. HYPERLINK "https://www.quora.com/" \l "qKrkT" \t "_blank" [2]

These women are called "Maadedat", which in Egyptian means the women who wail over the dead and recite their deeds. Every village in Egypt used to have its own "Maadeda".

This custom stretches 5000 years back in time. In Ancient Egypt, there were always two mourners, should be women, present at a burial, who were representatives of the goddesses Isis and Nephtys. For a woman to be a mourner, she could not have born children, her body hair was shaved and the names of Isis and Nephtys were inscribed on her shoulders. HYPERLINK "https://www.quora.com/" \l "FroHl" \t "_blank" [3]

INCLUDEPICTURE "https://ci6.googleusercontent.com/proxy/I1q_UrHPBlRhqepFc6rOJeYakgpH2ONNFRHClGjPzc1_jLlfEFsxj_QdcBldyCPVS0j6bRY0mMPNtttMun2NHLz4x-g9LHYU5PYnYAVRGf67_kXOH-dm8V9Q5i4=s0-d-e1-ft#https://qph.fs.quoracdn.net/main-qimg-ef73d00c41e36e15e892afa5782083b2-lq" * MERGEFORMATINET

Maadedat. Aswatonline.com

Lamentation folk poems are a ploy to vent sadness and anger over the death of loved ones. They are sort of a collective goodbye to the deceased. But, they could have bold dialogues with God, blaming him for his decisions, therefore, with the increase in the manifestations of religiosity in Egypt, in the 1980s, the clergy considered this custom to be heresy and an insult to fate and called people to refrain from it, and many people did.

Footnotes

HYPERLINK "https://www.quora.com/" \l "cite-IfiPh" \t "_blank" [1] HYPERLINK "https://egyptindependent.com/poetry-mourning/" \t "_blank" Poetry in mourning - Egypt Independent

HYPERLINK "https://www.quora.com/" \l "cite-qKrkT" \t "_blank" [2] HYPERLINK "https://youtu.be/Oda2AgG-X3k?t=143" \t "_blank" https://youtu.be/Oda2AgG-X3k?t=143

HYPERLINK "https://www.quora.com/" \l "cite-FroHl" \t "_blank" [3] HYPERLINK "https://www.mariarosavaldesogo.com/requirements-professional-mourners-ancient-egypt/" \t "_blank" Requirements of Professional Mourners in Ancient Egypt. - María Rosa Valdesogo

Related Links

HYPERLINK "https://www.quora.com/What-are-strange-and-unusual-customs-you-have-noticed-while-traveling-to-other-countries" \t "_top"
What are strange and unusual customs you have noticed while traveling to other countries?

HYPERLINK "https://www.quora.com/What-are-some-strange-food-customs" \t "_top" What are some strange food customs?

HYPERLINK "https://www.quora.com/What-are-some-customs-that-are-common-elsewhere-but-are-offensive-in-the-US-Where-are-these-customs-common-Is-there-a-logic-behind-them" \t "_top" What are some customs that are common elsewhere but are offensive in the US? Where are these customs common? Is there a logic behind them?

HYPERLINK "https://www.quora.com/What-are-some-local-customs-in-various-cultures-that-are-seen-as-weird-or-inappropriate-in-other-cultures" \t "_top"
What are some local customs in various cultures that are seen as weird or inappropriate in other cultures?

HYPERLINK "https://www.quora.com/What-are-some-strange-customs-from-around-the-world" \t "_top" What are some strange customs from around the world?

HYPERLINK "https://www.quora.com/What-is-normal-in-your-country-but-weird-in-the-rest-of-the-world" \t "_top" What is normal in your country but weird in the rest of the world?

HYPERLINK "https://www.quora.com/unanswered/What-are-the-customs-and-cultures-of-your-country" \t "_top" What are the customs and cultures of your country?

HYPERLINK "https://www.quora.com/What-are-some-interesting-or-unique-customs-in-your-culture" \t "_top" What are some interesting or unique customs in your culture?

HYPERLINK "https://www.quora.com/What-is-the-strangest-culture-shock-you-experienced-when-visiting-America" \t "_top" What is the strangest culture shock you experienced when visiting America?

HYPERLINK "https://www.quora.com/Which-eating-habit-is-ordinary-in-your-country-but-strange-in-the-rest-of-the-world" \t "_top" Which eating habit is ordinary in your country but strange in the rest of the world?

Réponse similaire

Comment les pyramides de Gizeh ont-elles pu avoir été construites il y a 4700 ans, dans des dimensions hors normes, en transportant des blocs de pierre pesant chacun plus de deux tonnes sur une quinzaine de kilomètres ?

HYPERLINK "https://fr.quora.com/profile/R%C3%A9mi-B%C3%A9ral" \t "_blank"

Rémi Béral, grand passionné d'histoire HYPERLINK "https://fr.quora.com/Comment-les-pyramides-de-Gizeh-ont-elles-pu-avoir-%C3%A9t%C3%A9-construites-il-y-a-4700-ans-dans-des-dimensions-hors-normes-en-transportant-des-blocs-de-pierre-pesant-chacun-plus-de-deux-tonnes-sur-une-quinzaine-de/answer/R%C3%A9mi-B%C3%A9ral" \t "_blank" Mis à jour le 3 juil. 2020

C'est la question que se sont posés des milliers de spécialistes depuis 2500 ans. Et a moins de trouver des documents historiques expliquant comment elle fut construite on ne le saura jamais avec certitude. Des centaines de théories existes, certains farfelues comme celles des extraterrestres ou des civilisations supérieures antérieurs, d'autres plus réalistes utilisant les vestiges archéologiques.

Deux systèmes me séduisent actuellement : l'un utilise des leviers pour soulever les pierres. L'autre propose une rampe droite assez inclinée où les blocs sont posés sur des traîneaux ou sur des rondins et sont attachés à des cordes. Les cordes passent autour de poteaux disposés tout le long de la rampe. Au bout de la corde les ouvriers tire dans le sens de la descente.

Le déplacement à proprement parlé des bloc questionne aussi. Deux théories majeurs. L'une imagine des rondins de bois sur lesquels on ferait rouler les blocs mais les expériences réalisées montre que c'est très difficile à mettre en en oeuvre. L'autre imagine des traîneaux que l'on fait glisser sur du sable humide.

Ajout, début juillet 2020 : j'ai depuis fait des réponses bien plus fournies sur la question. Je les met en lien. La première est la synthèse des deux autres. La deuxième s'intéresse à la structure des pyramides pour relativiser la difficulté du travail. La troisième s'intéresse au travail de la pierre et à la faisabilité de ces chantiers.

HYPERLINK "https://fr.quora.com/Comment-expliquez-vous-que-les-%C3%A9gyptiens-ont-construit-les-pyramides-avec-des-pierres-et-du-cuivre/answer/R%C3%A9mi-B%C3%A9ral" \o "fr.quora.com" \t "_top"
Réponse de Rémi Béral à Comment expliquez-vous que les égyptiens ont construit les pyramides avec des pierres et du cuivre ?

HYPERLINK "https://fr.quora.com/Comment-croyez-vous-que-les-grandes-pyramides-faites-de-lourdes-pierres-ont-%C3%A9t%C3%A9-b%C3%A2ties-si-rapidement/answer/R%C3%A9mi-B%C3%A9ral" \o "fr.quora.com" \t "_top"
Réponse de Rémi Béral à Comment croyez-vous que les grandes pyramides faites de lourdes pierres ont été bâties si rapidement ?

HYPERLINK "https://fr.quora.com/Le-documentaire-La-r%C3%A9v%C3%A9lation-des-pyramides-est-un-fake-ou-les-corr%C3%A9lations-g%C3%A9om%C3%A9trique-montr%C3%A9s-sont-r%C3%A9elle/answer/R%C3%A9mi-B%C3%A9ral" \o "fr.quora.com" \t "_top"
Réponse de Rémi Béral à Le documentaire "La révélation des pyramides" est un fake ou les corrélations géométrique montrés sont réelle ?

Questions similaires

HYPERLINK "https://fr.quora.com/Pourrions-nous-aujourdhui-reconstruire-les-pyramides-comme-les-anciens-%C3%89gyptiens-lont-fait" \t "_top"
Pourrions-nous aujourd'hui reconstruire les pyramides comme les anciens Égyptiens l'ont fait ?

HYPERLINK "https://fr.quora.com/La-plupart-des-anciens-%C3%89gyptiens-savaient-ils-%C3%A0-quoi-ressemblait-le-pharaon-en-personne" \t "_top" La plupart des anciens Égyptiens savaient-ils à quoi ressemblait le pharaon en personne ?

HYPERLINK "https://fr.quora.com/Comment-les-anciens-%C3%89gyptiens-ont-ils-coup%C3%A9-d%C3%A9normes-blocs-de-pierre-pour-construire-les-pyramides" \t "_top" Comment les anciens Égyptiens ont-ils coupé d'énormes blocs de pierre pour construire les pyramides ?

HYPERLINK "https://fr.quora.com/Est-ce-quon-peux-%C3%AAtre-certain-que-les-%C3%89gyptiens-n%C3%A9taient-pas-ceux-qui-ont-construit-la-Grande-Pyramide" \t "_top" Est-ce qu'on peux être certain que les Égyptiens n'étaient pas ceux qui ont construit la Grande Pyramide ?

HYPERLINK "https://fr.quora.com/Pourquoi-existe-t-il-des-d%C3%A9saccords-sur-qui-a-construit-les-pyramides-et-comment" \t "_top"
Pourquoi existe-t-il des désaccords sur qui a construit les pyramides, et comment ?

HYPERLINK "https://fr.quora.com/Les-pyramides-%C3%A9gyptiennes-ont-elles-%C3%A9t%C3%A9-construites-par-des-esclaves-ou-par-des-ouvriers-r%C3%A9mun%C3%A9r%C3%A9s" \t "_top" Les pyramides égyptiennes ont-elles été construites par des esclaves ou par des ouvriers rémunérés ?

HYPERLINK "https://fr.quora.com/Les-%C3%A9gyptiens-de-lantiquit%C3%A9-%C3%A9taient-ils-noirs-ou-blancs" \t "_top" Les égyptiens de l'antiquité étaient-ils noirs ou blancs ?

HYPERLINK "https://fr.quora.com/Est-il-dangereux-descalader-les-pyramides-%C3%A9gyptiennes" \t "_top" Est-il dangereux d'escalader les pyramides égyptiennes ?

HYPERLINK "https://fr.quora.com/Existe-t-il-un-lien-connu-entre-les-pyramides-%C3%A9gyptiennes-et-mayas" \t "_top" Existe-t-il un lien connu entre les pyramides égyptiennes et mayas ?

HYPERLINK "https://fr.quora.com/Qua-t-on-trouv%C3%A9-de-plus-incroyable-dans-les-pyramides-%C3%A9gyptiennes" \t "_top" Qu'a-t-on trouvé de plus incroyable dans les pyramides égyptiennes ?

HYPERLINK "https://fr.quora.com/Pourquoi-la-civilisation-%C3%A9gyptienne-%C3%A9tait-elle-si-en-avance-sur-son-temps" \t "_top"
Pourquoi la civilisation égyptienne était-elle si en avance sur son temps ?

HYPERLINK "https://fr.quora.com/Qui-sont-les-descendants-des-Egyptiens-%C3%A0-l%C3%A9poque-des-Pyramides-et-quels-%C3%A9taient-les-anc%C3%AAtres-de-ceux-ci" \t "_top" Qui sont les descendants des Egyptiens à l'époque des Pyramides, et quels étaient les ancêtres de ceux-ci ?

HYPERLINK "https://fr.quora.com/Est-ce-que-les-%C3%89gyptiens-avaient-conscience-de-leur-pass%C3%A9-et-des-secrets-des-pyramides-durant-le-Moyen-%C3%82ge" \t "_top" Est-ce que les Égyptiens avaient conscience de leur passé et des secrets des pyramides durant le Moyen Âge ?

HYPERLINK "https://fr.quora.com/Est-ce-que-les-pyramides-pourraient-%C3%AAtre-ant%C3%A9rieures-aux-%C3%89gyptiens" \t "_top" Est-ce que les pyramides pourraient être antérieures aux Égyptiens ?

HYPERLINK "https://fr.quora.com/Comment-les-Egyptiens-ont-ils-apport%C3%A9-les-pierres-des-pyramides-sur-les-derniers-%C3%A9tages" \t "_top" Comment les Egyptiens ont-ils apporté les pierres des pyramides sur les derniers étages ?

What breed of cat do Egyptians worship?
HYPERLINK "https://www.quora.com/profile/Jason-Sarasti" \t "_blank"

Jason Sarasti Amateur scholar of Ancient Egyptian history HYPERLINK "https://www.quora.com/What-breed-of-cat-do-Egyptians-worship/answer/Jason-Sarasti" \t "_blank" 6mo

HYPERLINK "https://www.quora.com/What-breed-of-cat-do-Egyptians-worship" \t "_blank"
Actual cats were not worshipped in Egypt. Some gods manifested themselves as cats though, most notably Bastet (who did so primarily), and even her father Ra (though only situationally in a single scriptural reference).
The gods were worshiped. Real cats were not.

INCLUDEPICTURE "https://qph.fs.quoracdn.net/main-qimg-bb8ed19ed9f370078491d5d4d83d7285-lq" * MERGEFORMATINET
It's a common trope to depict Egyptians as prostrating before their feline neighbours as if they were deities, but alas, this canard is not based on anything in reality.

Now, the Egyptians did like cats, and often kept them as pets, and while they weren't deified, they were considered sacred. Cats were under the patronage of the goddess Bastet, an apotropaic deity who served as an aegis to both her father, the falcon-headed sun god Ra, and also to mankind.

INCLUDEPICTURE "https://qph.fs.quoracdn.net/main-qimg-15becae675d5326a203b69583ee74bb7-lq" * MERGEFORMATINET
Due to Bastet's association with cats (she literally had a cat's head), to bring harm to one of her earthly plenipotentiaries was an egregiously blasphemous act, one which might not only engender her to unleash her vengeance upon the animal abuser in question (and who can blame her for that), but might also paint a target on the nation of Egypt as a whole. Worse, such a terrible injustice might draw the attention of Bastet's leonine and far less magnanimous sister Sekhmet, who was to Bastet what The Wicked Witch of the West was to The Good Witch of the North.

INCLUDEPICTURE "https://qph.fs.quoracdn.net/main-qimg-da70ec4c79285a34cde0380f5234b5b0-pjlq" * MERGEFORMATINET
Sekhmet, the lion headed goddess and second daughter of Ra, was the Egyptian god of war, retribution and bloodlust, and she spent her every waking minute quivering in delighted anticipation for any excuse to make the Nile run red with the blood of mankind. The murder of one of Bastet's children would serve as the perfect catalyst for her to let loose her infamous wrath.

HYPERLINK "https://www.quora.com/profile/Jason-Sarasti" \t "_blank"

Jason Sarasti, Amateur scholar of Ancient Egyptian history HYPERLINK "https://www.quora.com/What-breed-of-cat-do-Egyptians-worship/answer/Jason-Sarasti" \t "_blank" Answered Sep 24, 2021

Actual cats were not worshipped in Egypt. Some gods manifested themselves as cats though, most notably Bastet (who did so primarily), and even her father Ra (though only situationally in a single scriptural reference).
The gods were worshiped. Real cats were not.

It's a common trope to depict Egyptians as prostrating before their feline neighbours as if they were deities, but alas, this canard is not based on anything in reality.

Now, the Egyptians did like cats, and often kept them as pets, and while they weren't deified, they were considered sacred. Cats were under the patronage of the goddess

HYPERLINK "https://www.quora.com/profile/Matthew-McPadden-1" \t "_blank" Matthew McPadden , former 19Delta-Recon Intelligence Cavalry Scout at USArmy (1985-2008) HYPERLINK "https://www.quora.com/What-breed-of-cat-do-Egyptians-worship/answer/Matthew-McPadden-1" \t "_blank" Updated Mar 22, 2020

Originally Answered: HYPERLINK "https://www.quora.com/What-cat-goddess-did-ancient-Egyptians-worship?no_redirect=1" \t "_top" What cat goddess did ancient Egyptians worship?

Nowhere near my area of expertise but it is Isis. Goodness of Pharaoh's and their kingdoms. She is rumored to have the head of a cat. She is also supposed to be the most beautiful creature in all of creation. She is bride of Osiris (her brother) and mother to Horus. That's my extent of my knowledge. Sorry.

Related Links

HYPERLINK "https://www.quora.com/If-Egyptians-worshiped-cats-does-that-mean-they-are-the-gods-and-they-rule-us-all" \t "_top"
If Egyptians worshiped cats, does that mean they are the gods and they rule us all?

HYPERLINK "https://www.quora.com/Why-did-the-Egyptians-worship-cows" \t "_top" Why did the Egyptians worship cows?

HYPERLINK "https://www.quora.com/What-is-the-breed-name-for-the-Egyptian-cat" \t "_top" What is the breed name for the Egyptian cat?

HYPERLINK "https://www.quora.com/Do-Egyptians-still-worship-cats" \t "_top" Do Egyptians still worship cats?

HYPERLINK "https://www.quora.com/How-pathetic-do-the-ancient-Egyptians-have-to-be-to-worship-cats" \t "_top" How pathetic do the ancient Egyptians have to be to worship cats?

HYPERLINK "https://www.quora.com/Did-ancient-Egypt-worship-cats-Why" \t "_top" Did ancient Egypt worship cats? Why?

HYPERLINK "https://www.quora.com/What-breed-of-cat-comes-from-Egypt" \t "_top" What breed of cat comes from Egypt?

HYPERLINK "https://www.quora.com/How-did-the-Egyptians-breed-wild-cats-into-the-small-domesticated-cats-we-have-today" \t "_top" How did the Egyptians breed wild cats into the small domesticated cats we have today?

HYPERLINK "https://www.quora.com/Did-Egyptians-worship-their-gods-cats-or-their-previous-pharaohs" \t "_top" Did Egyptians worship their gods, cats, or their previous pharaohs?

HYPERLINK "https://www.quora.com/Why-are-cats-guardians-of-the-underworld-according-to-Egyptian-mythology-Were-cats-worshiped-in-other-cultures-as-well" \t "_top" Why are cats guardians of the underworld according to Egyptian mythology? Were cats worshiped in other cultures as w

Related Answer

HYPERLINK "https://www.quora.com/What-are-some-strange-and-unusual-customs-of-your-country" \t "_blank" What are some strange and unusual customs of your country?

HYPERLINK "https://www.quora.com/profile/Ahmed-Mustafa-31" \t "_blank" Ahmed Mustafa

Lives in Alexandria, Egypt HYPERLINK "https://www.quora.com/What-are-some-strange-and-unusual-customs-of-your-country/answer/Ahmed-Mustafa-31" \t "_blank" Updated Feb 25

In the villages of southern Egypt, when a family member died or even fell seriously ill, people used to hire a group of old women, from morning to evening, for a week, to weep, show grief, and recite sad folkloric poems، in return for a small fee, could be a free meal or a bag of meat, rice and pies. HYPERLINK "https://www.quora.com/" \l "IfiPh" \t "_blank" [1]

My aunt once told me about her visit to her friend's house, in the 1980s, in a village in central Egypt, to offer her condolences on the morning of her father's death.

And while they were sitting in silence interspersed with wailing and crying from time to time, they heard huge screams coming from outside the house. She went outside to see a group of scary women, who looked like mummies, wrapped in black clothes, weeping together, stroking their cheeks, and bending over to take the mud from the ground and put it on their heads.

They entered the house, wailing, and started to chant folkloric weeping sentences about the deceased, his life, and the tragic loss. Like a choir, behind them, the rest of the women in the house repeated their lamentations in unison and continued until sunset when everyone ate and left. HYPERLINK "https://www.quora.com/" \l "qKrkT" \t "_blank" [2]

These women are called "Maadedat", which in Egyptian means the women who wail over the dead and recite their deeds. Every village in Egypt used to have its own "Maadeda".

This custom stretches 5000 years back in time. In Ancient Egypt, there were always two mourners, should be women, present at a burial, who were representatives of the goddesses Isis and Nephtys. For a woman to be a mourner, she could not have born children, her body hair was shaved and the names of Isis and Nephtys were inscribed on her shoulders. HYPERLINK "https://www.quora.com/" \l "FroHl" \t "_blank" [3]

INCLUDEPICTURE "https://ci6.googleusercontent.com/proxy/I1q_UrHPBlRhqepFc6rOJeYakgpH2ONNFRHClGjPzc1_jLlfEFsxj_QdcBldyCPVS0j6bRY0mMPNtttMun2NHLz4x-g9LHYU5PYnYAVRGf67_kXOH-dm8V9Q5i4=s0-d-e1-ft#https://qph.fs.quoracdn.net/main-qimg-ef73d00c41e36e15e892afa5782083b2-lq" * MERGEFORMATINET

Maadedat. Aswatonline.com

Lamentation folk poems are a ploy to vent sadness and anger over the death of loved ones. They are sort of a collective goodbye to the deceased. But, they could have bold dialogues with God, blaming him for his decisions, therefore, with the increase in the manifestations of religiosity in Egypt, in the 1980s, the clergy considered this custom to be heresy and an insult to fate and called people to refrain from it, and many people did.

Footnotes

HYPERLINK "https://www.quora.com/" \l "cite-IfiPh" \t "_blank" [1] HYPERLINK "https://egyptindependent.com/poetry-mourning/" \t "_blank" Poetry in mourning - Egypt Independent

HYPERLINK "https://www.quora.com/" \l "cite-qKrkT" \t "_blank" [2] HYPERLINK "https://youtu.be/Oda2AgG-X3k?t=143" \t "_blank" https://youtu.be/Oda2AgG-X3k?t=143

HYPERLINK "https://www.quora.com/" \l "cite-FroHl" \t "_blank" [3] HYPERLINK "https://www.mariarosavaldesogo.com/requirements-professional-mourners-ancient-egypt/" \t "_blank" Requirements of Professional Mourners in Ancient Egypt. - María Rosa Valdesogo

Related Links

HYPERLINK "https://www.quora.com/What-are-strange-and-unusual-customs-you-have-noticed-while-traveling-to-other-countries" \t "_top"

What are strange and unusual customs you have noticed while traveling to other countries?

HYPERLINK "https://www.quora.com/What-are-some-strange-food-customs" \t "_top" What are some strange food customs?

HYPERLINK "https://www.quora.com/What-are-some-customs-that-are-common-elsewhere-but-are-offensive-in-the-US-Where-are-these-customs-common-Is-there-a-logic-behind-them" \t "_top" What are some customs that are common elsewhere but are offensive in the US? Where are these customs common? Is there a logic behind them?

HYPERLINK "https://www.quora.com/What-are-some-local-customs-in-various-cultures-that-are-seen-as-weird-or-inappropriate-in-other-cultures" \t "_top" What are some local customs in various cultures that are seen as weird or inappropriate in other cultures?

HYPERLINK "https://www.quora.com/What-are-some-strange-customs-from-around-the-world" \t "_top" What are some strange customs from around the world?

HYPERLINK "https://www.quora.com/What-is-normal-in-your-country-but-weird-in-the-rest-of-the-world" \t "_top" What is normal in your country but weird in the rest of the world?

HYPERLINK "https://www.quora.com/unanswered/What-are-the-customs-and-cultures-of-your-country" \t "_top" What are the customs and cultures of your country?

HYPERLINK "https://www.quora.com/What-are-some-interesting-or-unique-customs-in-your-culture" \t "_top" What are some interesting or unique customs in your culture?

HYPERLINK "https://www.quora.com/What-is-the-strangest-culture-shock-you-experienced-when-visiting-America" \t "_top" What is the strangest culture shock you experienced when visiting America?

HYPERLINK "https://www.quora.com/Which-eating-habit-is-ordinary-in-your-country-but-strange-in-the-rest-of-the-world" \t "_top" Which eating habit is ordinary in your country but strange in the rest of the world?

HYPERLINK "https://fr.quora.com/Est-il-d%C3%A9j%C3%A0-arriv%C3%A9-que-les-%C3%A9gyptiens-ne-sachent-plus-do%C3%B9-viennent-les-Pyramides-et-vivent-%C3%A0-c%C3%B4t%C3%A9-sans-savoir-ce-que-cest-ou-lhistoire-a-t-elle-toujours-%C3%A9t%C3%A9-transmise" \t "_blank" Est-il déjà arrivé que les égyptiens ne sachent plus d'où viennent les Pyramides et vivent à côté sans savoir ce que c'est, ou l'histoire a-t-elle toujours été transmise de génération en génération ?

HYPERLINK "https://fr.quora.com/profile/R%C3%A9mi-B%C3%A9ral" \t "_blank" Rémi Béral grand passionné d'histoire
HYPERLINK "https://fr.quora.com/Est-il-d%C3%A9j%C3%A0-arriv%C3%A9-que-les-%C3%A9gyptiens-ne-sachent-plus-do%C3%B9-viennent-les-Pyramides-et-vivent-%C3%A0-c%C3%B4t%C3%A9-sans-savoir-ce-que-cest-ou-lhistoire-a-t-elle-toujours-%C3%A9t%C3%A9-transmise/answer/R%C3%A9mi-B%C3%A9ral" \t "_blank" 25 nov.

L'histoire a surtout été transmise par les textes. A l'époque romaine on connaissait encore l'identité des pharaons bâtisseurs de pyramides et même de nombreuses histoires à leur sujet. Ces connaissances se sont probablement perdues peu à peu dès lors que l'Egypte fut christianisée puis islamisée.

Certains auteurs romains écrivaient encore sur Khéops. Des architectes romains restaurèrent la première pyramide.

Questions similaires

HYPERLINK "https://fr.quora.com/Pourrions-nous-aujourdhui-reconstruire-les-pyramides-comme-les-anciens-%C3%89gyptiens-lont-fait"
Pourrions-nous aujourd'hui reconstruire les pyramides comme les anciens Égyptiens l'ont fait ?

HYPERLINK "https://fr.quora.com/La-plupart-des-anciens-%C3%89gyptiens-savaient-ils-%C3%A0-quoi-ressemblait-le-pharaon-en-personne" La plupart des anciens Égyptiens savaient-ils à quoi ressemblait le pharaon en personne ?

HYPERLINK "https://fr.quora.com/Comment-les-anciens-%C3%89gyptiens-ont-ils-coup%C3%A9-d%C3%A9normes-blocs-de-pierre-pour-construire-les-pyramides" Comment les anciens Égyptiens ont-ils coupé d'énormes blocs de pierre pour construire les pyramides ?

HYPERLINK "https://fr.quora.com/Est-ce-quon-peux-%C3%AAtre-certain-que-les-%C3%89gyptiens-n%C3%A9taient-pas-ceux-qui-ont-construit-la-Grande-Pyramide"
Est-ce qu'on peux être certain que les Égyptiens n'étaient pas ceux qui ont construit la Grande Pyramide ?

HYPERLINK "https://fr.quora.com/Pourquoi-existe-t-il-des-d%C3%A9saccords-sur-qui-a-construit-les-pyramides-et-comment" Pourquoi existe-t-il des désaccords sur qui a construit les pyramides, et comment ?

HYPERLINK "https://fr.quora.com/Les-pyramides-%C3%A9gyptiennes-ont-elles-%C3%A9t%C3%A9-construites-par-des-esclaves-ou-par-des-ouvriers-r%C3%A9mun%C3%A9r%C3%A9s" Les pyramides égyptiennes ont-elles été construites par des esclaves ou par des ouvriers rémunérés ?

HYPERLINK "https://fr.quora.com/Les-%C3%A9gyptiens-de-lantiquit%C3%A9-%C3%A9taient-ils-noirs-ou-blancs" Les égyptiens de l'antiquité étaient-ils noirs ou blancs ?

HYPERLINK "https://fr.quora.com/Est-il-dangereux-descalader-les-pyramides-%C3%A9gyptiennes" Est-il dangereux d'escalader les pyramides égyptiennes ?

HYPERLINK "https://fr.quora.com/Existe-t-il-un-lien-connu-entre-les-pyramides-%C3%A9gyptiennes-et-mayas" Existe-t-il un lien connu entre les pyramides égyptiennes et mayas ?

HYPERLINK "https://fr.quora.com/Qua-t-on-trouv%C3%A9-de-plus-incroyable-dans-les-pyramides-%C3%A9gyptiennes" Qu'a-t-on trouvé de plus incroyable dans les pyramides égyptiennes ?

HYPERLINK "https://newsnigeria.quora.com/" \t "_blank" News Nigeria

HYPERLINK "https://newsnigeria.quora.com/How-to-build-a-city-from-scratch-Egypt-has-the-answer" \t "_blank" How to build a city from scratch? Egypt has the answer

Posted by HYPERLINK "https://www.quora.com/profile/Aniekpeno-Ekong" \t "_blank" Aniekpeno Ekong HYPERLINK "https://newsnigeria.quora.com/How-to-build-a-city-from-scratch-Egypt-has-the-answer" \t "_blank" 3h

INCLUDEPICTURE "https://ci3.googleusercontent.com/proxy/FTvmUogMVx1CF74aJCo2bO6kWoIBEgymXMReAmHoCYipNX7wWFTuYnbuf9FUKJfBmKtZIPHsAAz8Mu1iFiQdGrNNZirwm_T2WaLcLFbetZopXIN1ARkyFkm2dwI=s0-d-e1-ft#https://qph.fs.quoracdn.net/main-qimg-d6d8497dfb8adff71bdfd435f9a90779-lq" * MERGEFORMATINET

“New Alamein City” on the Mediterranean sea coastline. It was a desert in 2019 and now here it is!

INCLUDEPICTURE "https://ci6.googleusercontent.com/proxy/HLjM5NyFUcoabNqw4xuea0TmmqceIhXmiRlbsruQs8ehzeNI9WYfGSbL1_Zm4F74odl9GDb2uAxPz1bA_nc2eJl9PLbt1jVoZ2g26P5eGqAxjF_XgnUU0gZchqs=s0-d-e1-ft#https://qph.fs.quoracdn.net/main-qimg-408b9ca3642bc07b78cb0cad9a97135b-lq" * MERGEFORMATINET
New Alamein was conceived by the Egyptian government as a center for tourism, education, and government. The city has its own presidential palace and Cabinet building to act as an administrative capital during the summer.

INCLUDEPICTURE "https://ci4.googleusercontent.com/proxy/ePBo813aOyGYqY3QCI71jGSoLfRwau6RZsgZcqDw238gS7pWVhga8yBswq5ky_QTeiQxHRyx2-OAcXuQ_oq6p3IiJjaPDtQtMLo-fRfDsJTIVj6c213ht8xD3bA=s0-d-e1-ft#https://qph.fs.quoracdn.net/main-qimg-db843301d1f820cf918d321218ba4478-lq" * MERGEFORMATINET Construction is ongoing at New Alamein for three universities, fifteen skyscrapers and high rise towers, and 10,000 hotel rooms.

INCLUDEPICTURE "https://ci4.googleusercontent.com/proxy/9mhnF1uWO8fc2dFP9PnTA8fB_LBjsO_c74jmVT36RshvMxf6G3cNDWDkiqVXQdjELv7xgcxlDAmWjADjJmyH5fKeIC02ViB6YyrjtIjncdi7_L0rPiNypcyN2OQ=s0-d-e1-ft#https://qph.fs.quoracdn.net/main-qimg-012b9154e96f70ef7d271d26258f446b-lq" * MERGEFORMATINET
Work has begun on Phase II of the New Alamein megaproject, which includes ten additional coastal towers.

INCLUDEPICTURE "https://ci4.googleusercontent.com/proxy/O3g-0DDxNx5w5EtXM0QUPR73P5sBxL31fxkMRq8g8VLIHOdViDYwNQxB4wsTnBHbzfLqCjUCZZ6Fo1c8wYhZbkPb_Lq_APCmBK_5jTu2HsAvuzWeWVBXtLpugdw=s0-d-e1-ft#https://qph.fs.quoracdn.net/main-qimg-4cd045f58bdd51ef4f6fae3d13bd531c-lq" * MERGEFORMATINET INCLUDEPICTURE "https://ci3.googleusercontent.com/proxy/Z4y3_GTZ6AbNMk3RBo4WImmxxOJvqQYTfuCY1Sc8TyhcKT8lWzxv2rXq51K13rz6c3dZitH7tQSSaF6oPWX9EYGLZdNjt4nyBGzAIkV1imLPqphZl0DLrVdoglk=s0-d-e1-

ft#https://qph.fs.quoracdn.net/main-qimg-1e19542ca7b36e1e268bf34f643e24e2-lq" * MERGEFORMATINET
INCLUDEPICTURE "https://ci4.googleusercontent.com/proxy/Qa6le0jDmvbuF333irtmVz3CnXajEPQY4tK_v9_XdpHCkKKKhVc5phM-fUA_0ROqtHdqWDcuxDmsklPuWMNthVkgVGDDNoiWVfy5kiHEawHyw2fyPrZ5xnbW2pM=s0-d-e1-ft#https://qph.fs.quoracdn.net/main-qimg-3bffe14400d3dea859c77ae01b3f6a95-lq" * MERGEFORMATINET

Why do Egyptians look different today if they were black in their own depictions?

HYPERLINK "https://www.quora.com/profile/Bronze-Age-Club-Axe" \t "_blank" Bronze Age Club Axe Studied Anthropology (college major) at Diablo Valley College (DVC) HYPERLINK "https://www.quora.com/Why-do-Egyptians-look-different-today-if-they-were-black-in-their-own-depictions/answer/Bronze-Age-Club-Axe" \t "_blank" 3y

INCLUDEPICTURE "https://ci6.googleusercontent.com/proxy/zz65llVT9tNomOKMSRMM7jDRR11ZZ3Or5QL07xfAZ3JkddvFBxOQfVKJVcPoh2YujkgCsLXOpI-J9gSaU3CPSN2CnJvleuv525sfn4jPQoGb4Lz9XRgZIL7QrN4=s0-d-e1-ft#https://qph.fs.quoracdn.net/main-qimg-9292d5068c6e4b3a461b395f7bf0a6bf-lq" * MERGEFORMATINET
Depends on what Egyptians you're talking about. The ancient Egyptians were related to sub-Saharan Africans in a variety of ways, the Bible clearly states that the Egyptians were descendants of Ham, father of the Negroid race. That is indisputable once you look at the archaeological, cultural, and linguistic evidence. The Egyptian men above, although they might by Nubian,resemble ancient Egyptians.

INCLUDEPICTURE "https://ci5.googleusercontent.com/proxy/szXSO60rUnpds1KG8-jAopePdkt7241XYGvJeVIdNIDbKdXrmWsbu5yGmOVtvEm2-2vz_ux259e6afW3sYTYkJY2GvP6tJIJDetYJLiOdlYJ3OQH6d8vmApa1dE=s0-d-e1-ft#https://qph.fs.quoracdn.net/main-qimg-d896ed98472ba83251d0a78c903259a8-lq" * MERGEFORMATINET

The modern Egyptians of today have their ancestry from the Levant. They along with Indo-European peoples have no kinship with ancient Egyptians. The ancient Egyptians referred to people from Asia as “Asiatic.” They saw these people as inferior barbarians who were desert nomads. One famous group or tribe known as the heq-shasu(hyksos) actually ruled over Egypt for a short period, but eventually were expelled because they were not natives to the country, usurpers of it actually.

INCLUDEPICTURE "https://ci5.googleusercontent.com/proxy/wuwdNQr9p98ZzAgn-7EyJTdn2JVahRX-O_Oi_ObiQaN-H8QELCJJPR6JJAMZ9J8z8RHWBeyfGifCcDe3fPRnT86kyxY2_C06O4Hq-Rfh9-JF5DBuin1bwq7exDYLCw=s0-d-e1-ft#https://qph.fs.quoracdn.net/main-qimg-2e40af0493d8ded60983e9650a31fdfd-pjlq" * MERGEFORMATINET

INCLUDEPICTURE "https://ci4.googleusercontent.com/proxy/HhVUEm5hOuqPFnMWzY_6fFiQZ_7QdtVqejTIvT0O_MZ69oXTu54cF0Dlxsr2D2LIlRJdA28j72QA9OQEcVf_uPXqxNLULTlHyQ8zj2nDD89FJN-wGwv1QRQdaJWuZA=s0-d-e1-ft#https://qph.fs.quoracdn.net/main-qimg-d6ca633cd97bfb727e4937c209833ce3-pjlq" * MERGEFORMATINET

INCLUDEPICTURE "https://ci3.googleusercontent.com/proxy/Mwx6TWfGlZt0ODhWeO3rLxzsFxfebVUnupQwp7C_o0G989d22eWDgtbguPre1uAQzrmRUSoFSQCfqiqO5SS_8sbGJNdePPBmILEP0_uHd7t7iE1iK4lM_XINo8Y=s0-d-e1-ft#https://qph.fs.quoracdn.net/main-qimg-6e74ed9734f3f4ac6c79f09ffba8d9b3-lq" * MERGEFORMATINET
Modern day Egyptians are actually descendents of those ancient Asiatic tribes living in the Levant that Negroid Egyptians conquered.

INCLUDEPICTURE "https://ci5.googleusercontent.com/proxy/W09L5Ic-_xe0p_3lTZ8g42C4L98u5BPyKHlGul_5jY2VnoXIoey7pWrdA7ICrUIZ5E-mCuGGMOotkNSetJrRHS90zMjgtOtG1Jm-Y3AuladyN4D5HMQ_G7dg6Fs2PQ=s0-d-e1-ft#https://qph.fs.quoracdn.net/main-qimg-1099e4a697d7f03658596dca1b4bc520-pjlq" * MERGEFORMATINET

INCLUDEPICTURE "https://ci5.googleusercontent.com/proxy/lb4_tJc7W7BbAvddy1creRCkBqSoH2s

BQ-62TdWGA-HUUBwOi3ftT5oFvJ2yK8cb5gtLEUk69RkIW_1Qv2RK95BcpxOZupnStyPaDMrGzQsFyrVWkNX4Q_Q7UTqV-A=s0-d-e1-ft#https://qph.fs.quoracdn.net/main-qimg-ad8b2504394572fc77184bb9a6c7d01b-pjlq" * MERGEFORMATINET

Don't let racist try to convince you that ancient Egyptians were middle eastern or Mediterranean. The Greeks and Romans never believed they were related to the ancient Egyptians. They weren't because Egypt was a black African nation, not Caucasian nation of any kind.

INCLUDEPICTURE "https://ci4.googleusercontent.com/proxy/f2KNYL_4lkGyxpShykRyVDSs2o4YCJNzweOqzaFczepCWB8Ms-1m121Dvh3AWshyKJGe3A1II0Fa_X6PFcy06vnvS94bvcVFKw586zhN0bOgLx0KfR78j9vFddA=s0-d-e1-ft#https://qph.fs.quoracdn.net/main-qimg-18864443faa1920e5484b84e536daa85-lq" * MERGEFORMATINET Hope that helps.

Related Links

HYPERLINK "https://www.quora.com/Why-do-modern-Egyptians-appear-to-be-more-lighter-in-skin-tone-than-ancient-Egyptian-depiction-Why-do-most-of-modern-Egyptians-especially-in-the-North-look-like-ancient-Egyptian-depiction-of-Libyans-and-Asiatics" \t "_blank"
Why do modern Egyptians appear to be more lighter in skin tone than ancient Egyptian depiction? Why do most of modern Egyptians especially in the North look like ancient Egyptian depiction of Libyans and Asiatics?

HYPERLINK "https://www.quora.com/Why-are-Egyptians-white-despite-being-Africans" \t "_blank" Why are Egyptians white, despite being Africans?

HYPERLINK "https://www.quora.com/Why-are-Egyptians-considered-black-when-genetically-they-re-white" \t "_blank" Why are Egyptians considered black when genetically they're white?

HYPERLINK "https://www.quora.com/Modern-Egyptians-look-just-like-ancient-Egyptians-Why-do-some-deny-that-fact" \t "_blank" Modern Egyptians look just like ancient Egyptians. Why do some deny that fact?

HYPERLINK "https://www.quora.com/How-can-people-say-the-ancient-Egyptians-werent-Black-when-the-pictures-they-left-on-the-walls-depict-them-as-such" \t "_blank" How can people say the ancient Egyptians weren't Black when the pictures they left on the walls depict them as such?

HYPERLINK "https://www.quora.com/Are-dark-skinned-people-in-Egypt-considered-black-or-not-even-if-they-are-not-Nubians-I-dont-mean-ancient-Egyptians" \t "_blank" Are dark-skinned people in Egypt considered black or not, even if they are not Nubians? (I don't mean ancient Egyptians) HYPERLINK "https://www.quora.com/Why-do-some-Egyptians-look-like-Asians" \t "_blank" Why do some Egyptians look like Asians?

HYPERLINK "https://www.quora.com/Were-all-ancient-Egyptians-black-or-were-they-multiracially-mixed-and-thus-didnt-classify-themselves-as-black-or-white" \t "_blank" Were all ancient Egyptians black or were they multiracially mixed and thus didn't classify themselves as black or white?

HYPERLINK "https://www.quora.com/Why-arent-Egyptians-black-like-all-the-other-Africans" \t "_blank" Why aren't Egyptians black like all the other Africans?

HYPERLINK "https://www.quora.com/If-Nilotic-people-are-the-darkest-people-on-the-planet-and-they-inhabited-areas-that-surround-Egypt-isn-t-it-logical-to-assume-that-is-what-the-ancient-Egyptians-looked-like" \t "_blank" If Nilotic people are the darkest people on the planet and they inhabited areas that…?

Egypt is one of the driest countries on the planet, says water minister

HYPERLINK "https://egyptindependent.com/author/al-masry-al-youm/" \o "Al-Masry Al-Youm" Al-Masry Al-Youm August 1, 2021

Egypt’s Minister of Water Resources and Irrigation, Mohamed Abdel-Ati stressed Sunday that Egypt is one of the driest countries in the world and suffers from water scarcity.

Egypt’s water resources are estimated at about 60 billion cubic meters of water annually, he explained, with total water needs at around 114 billion cubic meters annually.

He noted that most of Egypt's water resources come from the waters of the Nile River, in addition to very limited amounts of rainwater – estimated at about one billion cubic meters – and non-renewable deep groundwater.

This gap is compensated by reusing agricultural drainage water and surface groundwater in the valley and delta, in addition to importing food products from abroad corresponding to 34 billion cubic meters of water annually, he said.

Egypt is one of the countries in the world most affected by climate change, he warned, as a result of rising sea levels and the unexpected impact of global warming on the tributaries of the Nile River – alongside extreme weather phenomena such as heat waves, cold waves and torrential rains.

He drew attention to resulting threats to sustainable development and the human right to water as a result of climate change.

These changes will impact water resources, agriculture, food security, energy, health, coastal areas and northern lakes.

It will also bring risks to the most fertile lands of the delta, due to rising sea levels which will damage the quality of groundwater and displace millions of Egyptians residing in the delta.Facing these challenges will require strenuous efforts, he said.

Egypt has prepared a strategy for water resources until 2050 at a cost of up to US$50 billion, potentially reaching $100 billion, and developed a national plan for water resources until 2037 that depends on rationalizing water use, improving water quality, providing additional water sources, and creating the climate for optimal water management.

Abdel-Ati explained that work is currently underway on national project to shift from surface irrigation to modern irrigation systems by encouraging farmers to make the transition, and expand the use of smart irrigation applications, as these systems represent a clear importance in rationalizing water consumption.

Egypt cabinet approves bill to imprison and fine anyone aiding and abetting child marriage

HYPERLINK "https://egyptindependent.com/author/egypt-independent/" \o "Egypt Independent" Egypt Independent April 12, 2022

SHAPE * MERGEFORMAT
AFP File Photo

The Egyptian Cabinet approved a draft law on the prohibition of child marriage.

The draft law is in line with the provisions of the articles of the constitution and contributes to curbing this negative phenomenon. Child marriage is a crime and in addition to its negative impact on society, it lacks adequate healthy development to bear the consequences of marriage – whether male or female.

Children are not qualified psychologically, culturally, mentally and physically to bear the responsibility of forming a family and raising children.

This is a blatant assault on childhood, which prompted the legislator to intervene to prevent these harmful practices in society.

The draft law stipulates that the marriage contract may not be authenticated for a person who has not reached 18 years and subsequently the contract may not be ratified.

The draft law requires the authorized or delegated notary to notify the Public Prosecution – in whose jurisdiction his workplace is located – of the customary marriage incidents: in which one of the parties is a child under 18 years of age at the time of marriage.

A penalty of imprisonment for a period of no less than one year and a fine of no less than LE 50,000 and not more than LE 200,000 shall be given to anyone who marries off a male or female under the age of 18.

Whoever instigates this crime shall be punished with the same penalty even if the incitement has no effect.

The child in these cases shall not be held criminally or civilly liable for this crime, however the criminal case arising from this crime shall not expire with the passage of time.

This violates the text of Article 2 of this law, regarding notifying the Public Prosecution with incidents of customary marriage that one party to it is a child.

EGYPT

Swiss authorities close investigation into syphoned money of Mubarak regime figureheads

HYPERLINK "https://egyptindependent.com/author/egypt-independent/" \o "Egypt Independent" Egypt Independent April 13, 2022

SHAPE * MERGEFORMAT

Gamal (rear) and Alaa Mubarak, sons of former Egyptian President Hosni Mubarak, walk after being sentenced in Cairo June 2, 2012. A judge sentenced Alaa and Gamal to time already served after convicting them on some corruption charges and acquitting them on others.

REUTERS/Stringer (EGYPT - Tags: POLITICS CIVIL UNREST CRIME LAW)

The office of the Attorney General of Switzerland (OAG) announced on Wednesday that it closed investigations related to the 'Egyptian Revolution' over suspicion of money laundering conducted against five suspects.

Since 2011, OAG has been conducting criminal proceedings related to the 2011 'Egyptian Revolution', its key case arising from the Arab Spring.

"Despite the numerous enquiries and having transferred CHF 32 million to Egypt in 2018, the OAG must now accept that the investigation has been unable to substantiate suspicions that would justify the indictment of anyone in Switzerland or any forfeiture of assets," OAG said in a press release.

It added that “the proceedings, currently being conducted against five suspects, are therefore to be abandoned, and the assets still under seizure (amounting to around CHF 400 million) will be released.”

OAG has since 2011 been conducting an investigation into suspicions of money laundering and supporting and/or participating in a criminal organisation in connection with events surrounding the ‘Egyptian Revolution’ in 2011.

This complex and extensive criminal case initially involved 14 suspects, including the two sons of the ousted president Hosni Mubarak (Gamal and Alaa Mubarak), as well as 28 natural persons and 45 legal entities who, as third parties, hold assets that have been seized. In addition, 140 bank accounts of interest have been analysed.

The suspects, most of whom held official or important economic positions in Egypt, were suspected of having laundered funds in Switzerland of criminal origin that had been obtained from financial transactions related to acts of corruption. Several criminal proceedings were opened in Egypt and requests for mutual assistance addressed to Switzerland in this connection.

Between 2012 and 2019, the OAG sent numerous requests to Egyptian authorities in order to obtain information on the status of prosecutions and judicial or criminal proceedings, primarily those being conducted against persons implicated in the Swiss proceedings. Egypt responded to most of these requests.

For its part, Egypt sent several requests for mutual legal assistance to Swiss authorities with the aim of obtaining evidence that would enable progress to be made in the Egyptian criminal proceedings. The OAG cooperated as fully as possible, in particular by admitting Egypt as a complainant in the Swiss criminal proceedings in 2011.

In response to certain requests, supplementary information was sought from Egypt. As this information was not received, certain mutual legal assistance proceedings could not be completed and were closed in 2017 – either by the OAG or by the FOJ. In the circumstances and in view of the lack of any realistic prospects of the restitution of these assets, the freezing of the assets ordered by the Federal Council no longer served any purpose. In December of the same year, the Federal Council repealed the ordinance freezing assets in connection with Egypt (SR 196.123.21).

Les Grecs d'origine (les Minoens noirs) étaient-ils d'origine égyptienne ?
HYPERLINK "https://fr.quora.com/profile/Simon-Labrunie" \t "_blank"

Simon Labrunie historien très amateur HYPERLINK "https://fr.quora.com/Les-Grecs-dorigine-les-Minoens-noirs-%C3%A9taient-ils-dorigine-%C3%A9gyptienne/answer/Simon-Labrunie" \t "_blank" 2 ans

HYPERLINK "https://fr.quora.com/Les-Grecs-dorigine-les-Minoens-noirs-%C3%A9taient-ils-dorigine-%C3%A9gyptienne" \t "_blank" Gérard… pourquoi pas, en effet, traduire ce genre de réponse pour montrer dans quel abîme le débat peut tomber, dans certains pays, quand on aborde certains sujets ? D'autant que la réponse que vous traduisez HYPERLINK "https://fr.quora.com/" \l "nPPlO" [1] remet bien les pendules à l'heure, en effet. Mais pourquoi nous demander d'apporter d'autres réponses à ce genre de question hallucinante ? Quand je lis la question, je me demande si elle est l'œuvre :
d'un afrocentriste bourré d'illusions et d'idées fausses ?

d'un troll raciste cherchant à humilier les Noirs en ridiculisant les afrocentristes, tout en laissant penser qu'ils sont représentatifs ?

d'un ultra-nordiciste cherchant la provocation sur le thème : les Européens du Sud ne sont pas de "vrais blancs" ?

ou d'un troll (russe ? nord-coréen ? martien ?) cherchant à semer la zone aux Etats-Unis en jetant de l'huile sur l'incendie qu'ils appellent, avec un sens aigu de l'antiphrase, "la conversation nationale sur les races" ?

Bref, pourquoi importer ce genre de bêtises chez nous ? Pourquoi nous demander de penser en ces termes profondément stupides et erronés ? Le destin perpétuel de l'Europe serait-il de copier servilement ce qui se fait de plus débiloïde (merci Pierrick Jaouen HYPERLINK "https://fr.quora.com/" \l "MMvVw" [2]) et de plus mortifère aux Etats-Unis ?

Laissons les Etasuniens avec leurs névroses collectives, leurs mondes fantasmagoriques, et leurs dialogues de sourds. Nous n'en avons pas besoin.

Laissons ces choses "en face", comme vous dites. Le Quora français n'a pas besoin de tomber à ce niveau.

Notes de bas de page

HYPERLINK "https://fr.quora.com/" \l "cite-nPPlO" \t "_top" [1] HYPERLINK "https://fr.quora.com/Les-Grecs-dorigine-les-Minoens-noirs-%C3%A9taient-ils-dorigine-%C3%A9gyptienne/answer/G%C3%A9rard-Briais" \t "_top" Réponse de Gérard Briais à Les Grecs d'origine (les Minoens noirs) étaient-ils d'origine égyptienne ?

HYPERLINK "https://fr.quora.com/" \l "cite-MMvVw" \t "_top" [2] HYPERLINK "https://dngwehslisan.quora.com/Insultologie-russo-sovi%C3%A9tique-pour-les-francophones" \t "_top" Insultologie russo-soviétique pour les francophones

Questions similaires

HYPERLINK "https://fr.quora.com/Si-les-anciens-%C3%89gyptiens-n%C3%A9taient-ni-noirs-ni-blancs-qu%C3%A9taient-ils" \t "_top" Si les anciens Égyptiens n'étaient ni noirs ni blancs, qu'étaient-ils ?

HYPERLINK "https://fr.quora.com/Les-premiers-habitants-de-l-%C3%89gypte-%C3%A9taient-ils-des-Noirs" \t "_top" Les premiers habitants de l'Égypte étaient-ils des Noirs ?

HYPERLINK "https://fr.quora.com/Pourquoi-les-Arabes-qui-vivent-en-%C3%89gypte-aujourdhui-croient-ils-quils-sont-les-anciens-%C3%89gyptiens-de-lhistoire" \t "_top" Pourquoi les Arabes qui vivent en Égypte aujourd'hui croient-ils qu'ils sont les anciens Égyptiens de l'histoire ?

HYPERLINK "https://fr.quora.com/Dans-la-Gr%C3%A8ce-antique-tous-les-hommes-%C3%A9taient-homosexuels" \t "_top" Dans la Grèce antique tous les hommes étaient homosexuels ?

HYPERLINK "https://fr.quora.com/Il-est-av%C3%A9r%C3%A9-que-le-pharaon-Montouhotep-2-%C3%A9tait-noir-Comment-peut-on-encore-nier-lapport-de-la-civilisation-noire-sur-l%C3%89gypte-antique" \t "_top" Il est avéré que le pharaon Montouhotep 2 était noir. Comment peut-on encore nier l'apport de la civilisation noire sur l'Égypte antique ?

HYPERLINK "https://fr.quora.com/En-tant-que-Grec-que-pensez-vous-des-Afrocentristes-qui-pr%C3%A9tendent-que-les-Minoens-et-les-Myc%C3%A9niens-%C3%A9taient-noirs" \t "_top" En tant que Grec, que pensez-vous des Afrocentristes qui prétendent que les Minoens et les Mycéniens étaient noirs ?

HYPERLINK "https://fr.quora.com/Qui-%C3%A9taient-les-peuples-de-la-mer-attaquant-l%C3%89gypte-antique-selon-les-archives-%C3%A9gyptiennes" \t "_top" Qui étaient « les peuples de la mer » attaquant l'Égypte antique selon les archives égyptiennes ?

HYPERLINK "https://fr.quora.com/Existe-t-il-des-preuves-cr%C3%A9dibles-prouvant-que-les-anciens-Grecs-%C3%A9taient-noirs" \t "_top" Existe-t-il des preuves crédibles prouvant que les anciens Grecs étaient noirs ?

HYPERLINK "https://fr.quora.com/Pourquoi-les-%C3%A9gyptologues-europ%C3%A9ens-nient-jusqu%C3%A0-pr%C3%A9sent-le-caract%C3%A8re-africain-des-%C3%A9gyptiens-antiques-alors-que-les-preuves-en-sont-surabondantes" \t "_top" Pourquoi les égyptologues européens nient jusqu'à présent le caractère africain des égyptiens antiques, alors que les preuves en sont surabondantes ?

HYPERLINK "https://fr.quora.com/Les-Grecs-et-les-Romains-de-lAntiquit%C3%A9-%C3%A9taient-ils-blancs" \t "_top" Les Grecs et les Romains de l'Antiquité étaient-ils blancs ?

Réponse similaire

HYPERLINK "https://fr.quora.com/Les-pharaons-%C3%A9taient-ils-noirs" \t "_blank" Les pharaons étaient-ils noirs ?

Kanhlayany Kousonsanong, Bretagne (2010) HYPERLINK "https://fr.quora.com/Les-pharaons-%C3%A9taient-ils-noirs/answer/Kanhlayany-Kousonsanong" \t "_blank" Répondu 6 sept. 2020 · Publié(e) sur

HYPERLINK "https://www.facebook.com/QuoraFR/posts/2847846602139086" \t "_blank" Quora en français sur Facebook

En tout cas une des plus connues, Cléopâtre VII Philopator était issue d'une dynastie macédonienne (hellénistique) donc elle était plutôt grecque. Certains la montrent comme ça :

INCLUDEPICTURE "https://qph.fs.quoracdn.net/main-qimg-fb112314f2fbbf2b94abdf646dc9b758-lq" * MERGEFORMATINET
D'autres plutôt comme ça :

INCLUDEPICTURE "https://qph.fs.quoracdn.net/main-qimg-8f963c18c81fa14c49d43ac01ca1492c-lq" * MERGEFORMATINET
Sur HYPERLINK "https://www.leconomistemaghrebin.com/" \o "www.leconomistemaghrebin.com" \t "_blank" Actualité économique Tunisie - L'Economiste Maghrébin

HYPERLINK "https://www.leconomistemaghrebin.com/2020/06/22/cleopatre-reconstitution-scientifique-de-son-visage-et-de-sa-beaute-legendaire/" \o "www.leconomistemaghrebin.com" \t "_blank" Cléopâtre: reconstitution scientifique de sa beauté légendaire

INCLUDEPICTURE "https://qph.fs.quoracdn.net/main-qimg-e06a5efe9cfd9257e65d06659c806052-lq" * MERGEFORMATINET
Les Egyptiens contemporains de la célèbre et mystérieuse reine ressemblaient à ça : selon l'université de Melbourne

INCLUDEPICTURE "https://qph.fs.quoracdn.net/main-qimg-a6ce5caae28659d6da66b25b57007b65-lq" * MERGEFORMATINET
Les Egyptiens d'aujourd'hui ne sont d'ailleurs pas noirs. Mais ça ne veut pas dire qu'il n'y en avait pas.

Why are some African Americans so inspired by Ancient Egyptians?

Aequo Animo Lives in Pluto (1900–present) HYPERLINK "https://www.quora.com/Why-are-some-African-Americans-so-inspired-by-Ancient-Egyptians/answer/Aequo-Animo-1" \t "_blank" Updated Fri

The reason is simple...

It’s because ancient Egypt played a key role in the history of human civilization. It’s because like the ancient egyptians, their origin is African. It’s because like the ancient egyptians, they are black.

To be so inspired by ancient egyptians, it’s to remind people, in the History unfalsifiable in itself which is that of the world, that their ancestors who were, from a general point of view, the same as those of the ancient egyptians did not have chose to be black. But they were so because such is the nature of things. To be so inspired by ancient egyptians, it's to remind people that in the History, in itself unfalsifiable, of the world, their ancestors had not chosen to be slaves, but were so reduced, because such is the obtuseness of the spirit of slavery practices. To be so inspired by ancient egypt is to remind people that indeed, for their ancestors, skin color did not matter and that they had not made the choice to invent and promote racial discrimination, but they were its first and perfect victims. So are themselves, even today.

To be so inspired by the ancient egyptians is to remember that the original color of the human being is black and that from a physical point of view, black gathers all the colors in itself; it is the reason that the racist will never have.

Then against racism, slavery, segregationism that they have fought throughout their history, it is to show that they are still capable of fighting against institutionalized bad faith.

Actually, in ancient times, the question did not really arise to know who was black and who was white... and it was fine like that... until the ignorant who ignores himself made religious dogma of it. Until the ignorant theorize the racism whose sheer turpitude is supposed, from there, to determine the destiny of every living soul on the Earth. It was not the ancient egyptians, it was not the ancestors of African Americans who had created the sciences to divide men in order to achieve their own ambitions, to preserve their interests and to raise their ego.

All people need to do is to open the history books to understand that in ancient times, until the 16th-17th century, there was no doubt for anyone that the ancient egyptians were black, on a continent whose qualification has almost always connoted negritude and which is still predominantly black today.

So what has changed?

Racism has been there and under the cover of Science has claimed everything... except common sense:

Polygenism has been claimed against all common sense. It has been claimed that black is an inferior race against all humanity. It has been claimed, despite all the evidence, that life could not have appeared in Africa. It has been claimed that black is unable to build a civilization like that of Egypt, then like that of Kush. It has been claimed that ancient egyptians were Europeans. It has been claimed that Kushites were Europeans. It has been claimed that Kushites had known no real civilization except that of Egyptians. It has been claimed that ancient Greeks and all ancient witnesses who testified to the negritude of the ancient Egyptians were blind and lied. It has been claimed, against today's denial, that agriculture was originally exported from Asia to Africa. It has been claimed that Greeks and Romans were the very first precursors of human civilization. It has been claimed, without any proof, that Egypt at the beginning of its civilization was influenced by civilizations from the Levant. It has been claimed that Egypt is in Asia, that if it is not there, it is Asian at all costs. It has been claimed that ancient Egypt had no connection with the rest of the continent, but had connections with the peoples of the North West who had connections to the South and that it itself traded with the South. It has been claimed that terms such as "Ethiopia", "Kushites" have a single meaning, whereas when reading the ancient texts, it is easy to observe that they had different connotations and that their meanings were anyway evolving. It has been claimed, without those concerned themselves having ever spoken of any such thing and without any proof, that the ancient Egyptians had black slaves. It has been claimed, without those concerned themselves having ever said anything of the sort and without any proof, that the ancient Egyptians hired "Nubian" mercenaries. It has been claimed, without the concerned themselves having mentioned anything of the sort, that only pharaohs identified as Kushites were black. It has been claimed, without those concerned themselves having affirmed anything of the sort, that the ancient Egyptians painted themselves purely out of symbolism and that they systematically painted, which is false, men in brown-red and women in yellow. It has been claimed that, therefore, Egyptians were red-skinned and Egyptian women were yellow. It has been claimed that the fair complexion in North Africa which is autochthonous was darkened by the sun, in a mild climate and… Of course, as the climate is even more so, the skin is no longer darkened. It has been claimed that the mild climate of the Mediterranean gave Egyptians a brown complexion and as the climate becomes even more mild, it gives them today a white skin. It has been claimed that in Prehistory and in antiquity, there were no blacks in the Sahara and the North of the continent, that if they lived there, it was because they were dragged there like slaves. It has been claimed that the Sahara was a natural barrier, but that the Sahara was green in Prehistory. It has been claimed that the first cataract was a natural barrier, but that not only the Arabian desert, the red sea were not, but in addition in "paleoarchaeology", the different human groups since prehistoric times sometimes came to be in contact between Lower Egypt and Upper Egypt. And that beyond all, Man, starting from the Great Rift Valley, crossed the isthmus to conquer Asia. It has been claimed that there were no black people in ancient Egypt. Then it has been claimed that it was half half. It has been claimed that the Egyptian population has not changed, which would be totally an exception, for more than 5000 years, despite everything that is known, but that nevertheless Egyptian Nubia is noticeably less black than it was in ancient times and that the Coptic descends from a crossbreeding. It has been claimed that Ramses II is redheaded and that miraculously his hair was still red at 90 years old.

It has been claimed that blondness and even freckles are exclusively a genetic characteristic of white ethnicity. It has been claimed to have proof that ancient Egyptians "were not black, but (at first) European, then no… but Levantine, by complete genetic testing on 3 from 90 mummies samples and incomplete genetic testing of the rest. Mummies which identities are almost unknown, except the fact that there were inscriptions in Greek and Latin on the tombs of some of them in an entirely cosmopolitan region, reputed to be totally a welcoming home for immigrants in ancient Egypt. It has been claimed that the ancient Egyptian did not care about skin color, but did not paint his skin black, while differently from his skin he painted the Kushite black and the Libyan white, because those were rightly black for the first one and white for the second one. It has been claimed that black skin exhibits only one tone of color which is dark black. It has been claimed that anything black necessarily has a flat nose and plump, drooping lips. Then, it was claimed that blacks were for some whites, because they have elongated noses, thin lips, then because of genes.

And after pretending all that mess, it has been claimed that it doesn't matter to know, which would be an exception in Science, the real skin color of the ancient Egyptians.

One day it's black, the next day it's white. Then no...

Many things have been claimed... again and again... all that in the name of Science.

African-Americans have not taken the initiative to call into question the ethnicity of ancient Egyptians. The Egyptologists, at the birth of the discipline, did it… in a totally absurd way…. and with bad faith, it is clear even today, uninhibited...

… and as it seems clear to African-Americans today that the origin of this biased culture in Egyptology, despite the evidence and common sense, finds its roots in the importance of ancient Egyptian civilization in the Human history, they find it quite appropriate to identify with the ancient Egyptians who came like them from the same continent and who had the same phenotypes and genetics which cost them, African-Americans, to be the object, for several centuries, of an instituted appalling contempt.

Like their ancestors, they can reconcile the world with its history and its destiny. The better they are aware of this, the better they will be able to bring people together again through their history. Like the ancient Egyptians did.

But before that, they will have to overcome the ignorance that feeds racism, today more than ever, insidious.

Related Links

HYPERLINK "https://www.quora.com/Why-do-some-people-of-West-African-origin-claim-connection-to-Ancient-Egyptians" \t "_top"

Why do some people of West African origin claim connection to Ancient Egyptians?

HYPERLINK "https://www.quora.com/Why-do-African-Americans-look-like-the-ancient-Egyptians" \t "_top" Why do African/Americans look like the ancient Egyptians?

HYPERLINK "https://www.quora.com/How-do-I-debunk-the-Afrocentric-claims-that-the-ancient-Egyptians-were-black-and-prove-to-them-that-modern-day-Egyptians-are-the-descendants-of-ancient-Egyptians" \t "_top" How do I debunk the Afrocentric claims that the ancient Egyptians were black and prove to them that modern day Egyptians are the descendants of ancient Egyptians?

HYPERLINK "https://www.quora.com/What-is-the-reason-some-said-that-the-ancient-Egyptians-are-blacks-Is-this-really-true" \t "_top" What is the reason some said that the ancient Egyptians are blacks? Is this really true?

HYPERLINK "https://www.quora.com/What-makes-people-doubt-that-ancient-Egyptians-were-really-black" \t "_top" What makes people doubt that ancient Egyptians were really black?

HYPERLINK "https://www.quora.com/How-are-Egyptians-white-if-white-people-were-not-in-Africa-back-in-antiquity-Alexander-came-thousands-of-years-later-The-pyramids-were-already-built-thousands-of-years-before-Alexander-came-across-black-Africans" \t "_top" How are Egyptians white if white people were not in Africa back in antiquity? Alexander came thousands of years later. The pyramids were already built thousands of years before Alexander came across black Africans.

HYPERLINK "https://www.quora.com/Are-Kemetic-blacks-right-to-assume-that-they-are-the-real-descendants-of-ancient-Egypt" \t "_top" Are Kemetic blacks right to assume that they are the real descendants of ancient Egypt?

HYPERLINK "https://www.quora.com/Why-are-whites-so-fast-to-disclaim-blacks-from-ancient-Egypt" \t "_top" Why are 'whites' so fast to disclaim 'blacks' from ancient Egypt?

HYPERLINK "https://www.quora.com/When-did-the-black-people-of-Africa-truly-build-the-pyramids-of-Giza" \t "_top" When did the black people of Africa truly build the pyramids of Giza?

HYPERLINK "https://www.quora.com/Why-do-ancient-Egyptians-look-more-like-African-Americans-than-modern-day-Egyptians" \t "_top" Why do ancient Egyptians look more like African Americans than modern-day

Related Answer

Why do Egyptians identify themselves as Arabs and forget all of their ancient traditions? What did Egyptians know about their glorious history before modern archeologists and historians wrote down history books on Egypt?

HYPERLINK "https://www.quora.com/profile/Ahmed-Mostafa-18" \t "_blank" Ahmed Mostafa , Egyptian HYPERLINK "https://www.quora.com/Why-do-Egyptians-identify-themselves-as-Arabs-and-forget-all-of-their-ancient-traditions-What-did-Egyptians-know-about-their-glorious-history-before-modern-archeologists-and-historians-wrote-down-history-books-on-Egypt/answer/Ahmed-Mostafa-18" \t "_blank" Answered Apr 3, 2017

I am an egyptian and yet I have never identified myself as an arab.
Some people in egypt think that they are arab, and some other people think that we are arab because most of the society are muslims and speaks arabic (although strictly speaking not arabic - HYPERLINK "https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Egyptian_Arabic" \o "en.wikipedia.org" \t "_blank" Egyptian Arabic - Wikipedia) .

First of all, language wise, we do not really speak arabic, we speak our own dialect of arabic with is egyption arabic, it is a mixture of multiple languages, we have some words from Turkish from the time we were occupied by the ottoman empire — this is just an example.

Second, DNA wise, we are not arabs at all, according to this :

HYPERLINK "https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/DNA_history_of_Egypt" \o "en.wikipedia.org" \t "_blank" DNA history of Egypt - Wikipedia

HYPERLINK "http://stepfeed.com/dna-analysis-proves-arabs-aren-t-entirely-arab-4864" \o "stepfeed.com" \t "_blank" DNA analysis proves Arabs aren't entirely Arab

So We are northern africans. That settles the ethnic part of the question.

Culture wise, we are not arabs as well

1. We do not - mainly - dress like them
2. We do not follow their habit

Do we also follow the ancient egypt culture ? No, but I do not think people from northern europe follow the ancient nordic culture as well, does this make them arabs or less european ?

Are we influenced by arabic culture ? Yes, we were invaded and occupied by them after we were occupied by HYPERLINK "https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Byzantine_Empire" \o "en.wikipedia.org" \t "_blank" Byzantine Empire - Wikipedia , were COPTS - which is the HYPERLINK "https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Coptic_language" \o "en.wikipedia.org" \t "_blank" Coptic for egyptians - were under a lot of stress due to religious conflicts in the core values of christianity.

Finally, why is egypt then called “The arabic republic of egypt”.

Due to political, nationalistic and populist politicians and presidents (Mainly HYPERLINK "https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Gamal_Abdel_Nasser" \o "en.wikipedia.org" \t "_blank" Nasir), after we threw the english (HYPERLINK "https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Egyptian_revolution_of_1952" \o "en.wikipedia.org" \t "_blank" Whom occupied us as well for 70 years - give or take a few) we have formed an ally with multiple (funny enough) non arabic (arabic speaking) countries like syria, and then we did the same with other arabic countries.

Why ?

Because we were weak and we needed nationalistic cover with arabs (Nasir really loved nationalism and stressed on it every speech and every chance he had) and thus, we were called the arabic republic of egypt, just for political gains, that’s all.

What do modern-day Egyptians think of their ancient past?

HYPERLINK "https://www.quora.com/profile/Eman-N-9" \t "_blank"
Eman N. , lives in Egypt (2010-present) HYPERLINK "https://www.quora.com/What-do-modern-day-Egyptians-think-of-their-ancient-past/answer/Eman-N-9" \t "_blank" Updated Apr 13, 2021

Very proud of it indeed. Egyptians view their ancient past as sacred part of them. You can see how far Egyptians get triggered if someone disrespects their heritage. Few days ago there was a parade to honour 22 royal Egyptian mummies. President himself attended and welcomed mummies in their new museum.

Egyptians got dressed in ancient Egyptian outfits and sang in ancient Egyptian language as well.

You can see people here watching parade and even cheered it as royal mummies were moving in streets

INCLUDEPICTURE "https://qph.fs.quoracdn.net/main-qimg-2329bf493af22be4292e8c66670368f9-lq" * MERGEFORMATINET
Why is Egypt a Muslim country when it had its own ancient civilization?

What race occupied Egypt before the invasion of the Arabs/Persians?

Why are Egyptians only 17% Arab (probably even less)? Who are they mixed with?

Did Islam ruin Egyptian culture?

Mohamed Emara Lives in Alexandria, EgyptUpdated Tue

On the contrary. Islam enriched Egypt's culture.

Oh you meant ancient Egyptian culture? Like these folks

It's actually part of the collective demonisation of anything Islam-related that inspires such bigoted and ignorant comments.

What destroyed Egyptian culture? Islam did! Why are Egyptians Muslims now? They've been forcibly converted of course! Climate change? Islam is the culprit!

Sorry to disappoint y'll and guess what? Ancient Egyptian culture was long gone by the time Islam was introduced to Egypt and Egyptians were not forcibly converted. Islam didn't cause climate change either, but of course you already knew that ;)

Now time for a little history lesson!

Ancient Egypt, the great civilisation that dazzled us all with spectacular monuments and mummies, was destroyed by non other than Persia.

Battle of Pelusium, Persian conquest of Egypt 525 BC

Then Egypt was conquered and hellenized by the Greeks.

Greatest extend of the Ptolemaic Kingdom / Hellenic Egypt

Afterwards, Egyptians were brutalised by the Romans for six centuries. Emperor Caracalla sacked Alexandria in 215 and other emperors persecuted Egyptians for their religious beliefs.

So great was the slaughter that the wide mouths of the Nile and the entire shore around the city were stained red by the streams of blood flowing through the plain. After these monstrous deeds, Caracalla left Alexandria and returned to Antioch.[1]

The Egyptian church was particularly affected by the Roman persecutions, beginning with Septimius Severus's edict of 202 dissolving the influential Christian School of Alexandria and forbidding future conversions to Christianity. In 303 Emperor Diocletian issued a decree ordering all churches demolished, all sacred books burned, and all Christians who were not officials made slaves. The decree was carried out for three years, a period known as the "Era of Martyrs." The lives of many Egyptian Christians were spared only because more workers were needed in the porphyry quarries and emerald mines that were worked by Egyptian Christians as "convict labor."

For nearly two centuries, Monophysitism in Egypt became the symbol of national and religious resistance to Byzantium's political and religious authority. The Egyptian Church was severely persecuted by Byzantium. Churches were closed, and Coptic Christians were killed, tortured, and exiled in an effort to force the Egyptian Church to accept Byzantine orthodoxy. The Coptic Church continued to appoint its own patriarchs, refusing to accept those chosen by Constantinople and attempting to depose them. The break with Catholicism in the fifth century converted the Coptic Church to a national church with deeply rooted traditions that have remained unchanged to this day.

By the seventh century, the religious persecutions and the growing pressure of taxation had engendered great hatred of the Byzantines. As a result, the Egyptians offered little resistance to the conquering armies of Islam.[2]

Alexandrian Jews were also heavily persecuted.[3]

So you see that after a millennium of oppression cultural assimilation, ancient Egyptian culture was already gone by the time Islam reached Egypt.

The Muslim general Amr ibn al ‘As invited the Coptic patriarch to return from exile promising to grant autonomy to the Church and pledged to safeguard the lives and properties of Egyptians.

I addressed the myths about forcible Arabization and Islamization in other answers.

Mohamed Emara (محمد عمارة)'s answer to When the Islamic religion was originally spreading throughout the eastern world, what was the big attraction, persuading Christians to convert to it?

Mohamed Emara (محمد عمارة)'s answer to Was Egypt forcefully Arabized? If so, then how and when did that take place?

Now time to refute the absurd claims mentioned in other answers.

1) Women are treated horribly according to Islam:

One answer claimed that the fact that no woman ruled Egypt after Islamization is a proof of the claim laid above.

Of course its misleading since that writer, perhaps intentionally, neglects to mention that a woman called Shajar al-Durr lead the defense of Egypt during the 7th Crusade and practically ruled the country for 8 years.

Ancient Egypt as an independent entity existed for approximately 2800 years and had 12 female rulers including two Ptolemaic queens. That's one female ruler for every 233 years. In contrast, Egypt after Islamization was only independent for a grand total of non continuous 654 years. Which makes it unfair to blame the limited number of female rulers on Islam considering historical circumstances. And besides, the Prophet's two wives, Khadija and Aisha, were great communal leaders who either established their own successful trade or led troops into battle. So no, Islam is not against the thought of women ruling.

Regarding inheritance, the reason why the male gets a share equal to two females is because its compulsory for males to spend on their families while females can work all their lives and not spend a single penny of their savings on the household. Doing so for males is a great sin so the inheritance law is designed as such to help ease the financial burden.

2) Science was/is neglected in Egypt because of Islam

Also incorrect. In the Middle Ages, Egypt became one of the most important centers of scholarly and scientific researches in the dar ul-Islam, which at the time was the center of civilisation in the world.

Madrasa Dar-al-Ilm (House of Knowledge) founded in 1139 AD served as a centre of education and attracted Muslims who sought knowledge worldwide. It was a profound ground to learn many subjects. The Fatimid libraries owned a very rare collection. They had a precise arrangement of keeping the books in subject-wise categories for easy recognition.

The Old Hospital Library had more than 200,000 books on grammar, hadiths, astrology, chemistry, astronomy, history and spirituality. And, it was observed as one of the wonders of world.

The Al-Azhar library was the most dynamic institution in 1123 AD with treasures such as 200,000 manuscripts and 2,400 bright copies of Holy Quran. It had books of humanities, science, literature and religion. It also had hand-written manuscripts of master Calligrapher Ibn Muglah and many others. Most importantly, it had an autographed history copy of famous historian Al Tabbari. The entry and access to all these books in the libraries were free.

Most of the Muslims in this era, translated prior works and books of astronomy from Greek, Roman and Persian languages. Which later, became very useful to European countries as the original ones were lost. In addition to this, they also corrected errors in these books and added some more discoveries. The approach of the Muslims was more inductive in a way, rather than theoretical. They basically found out the difference between astronomy and astrology.[4]

In 1242, the chief doctor in Ayyūbid ruled Egypt, Ibn al-Nafis, rejected Galen's previously accepted theory of the cardiac function and became the first to describe the pulmonary circulation.[5]

Muizz Street

Mausoleum of Imam al-Shafei

Muhammad Ali Mosque (photos by Ahmed W. Samy)

Qanibay and al-Rifa'i Mosques (Omar el-Noamany)

Sidi Mursi Abu al-Abbas Mosque

There you have it. Islam enriched Egypt's culture making it more diverse whilst instilling in it important values such as hospitality and reinforcing others like honesty and respecting the elderly. Researches, arts and scholar studies all thrived during the medieval Islamic period ushering in a golden age of science and culture.

But if you are looking for someone to blame for the demise of ancient Egypt then you have ancient Persia and the Roman Empire for their brutality, and ancient Greece for Hellenizing Egypt though I wouldn't say that was necessarily bad since the Hellenic era in Egypt was a great and interesting historical period.

I hope this helps.

Footnotes

[1] Herodian 4.9 - Livius
[2] Egypt under Rome and Byzantium, 30 B.C.-A.D. 640
[3] Pogrom in Alexandria
[4] The Fatimid Caliphate: Contributions to Arts and Sciences
[5] A FORGOTTEN CHAPTER IN THE HISTORY OF THE CIRCULATION OF THE BLOOD

[6] International Year of Light: Ibn al Haytham, pioneer of modern optics celebrated at UNESCO
[7] http://The Astronomy of the Mamluks: A Brief Overview - jstor

Illustration of the circulatory system

Another important scientist based in Egypt, al-Hassan ibn al-Haytham made important contributions to the understanding of vision, optics and light. He invented the pinhole camera and explained why the images were inverted.[6]

The concept of camera obscura as perceived by Ibn al-Haytham

This era included several other notable Egyptian scientists such as physician Ali ibn Ridwan, astronomer Ibn Yunus al-Misri, and mathematicians like Ibn al-Majidi and al-Qalqashandī just to name a few. Cairo was also a major center of astronomy.[7]

For modern scientific contributions:

Mohamed Emara (محمد عمارة)'s answer to What are the scientific contributions of Egyptians during the past 200 years?

3) Egyptians didn't build any note worthy monument after converting.

About that

Some examples of Islamic architecture in Egypt.

Muizz Street

Mausoleum of Imam al-Shafei

Muhammad Ali Mosque (photos by Ahmed W. Samy)

Qanibay and al-Rifa'i Mosques (Omar el-Noamany)

Sidi Mursi Abu al-Abbas Mosqu

There you have it. Islam enriched Egypt's culture making it more diverse whilst instilling in it important values such as hospitality and reinforcing others like honesty and respecting the elderly. Researches, arts and scholar studies all thrived during the medieval Islamic period ushering in a golden age of science and culture.

But if you are looking for someone to blame for the demise of ancient Egypt then you have ancient Persia and the Roman Empire for their brutality, and ancient Greece for Hellenizing Egypt though I wouldn't say that was necessarily bad since the Hellenic era in Egypt was a great and interesting historical period.

I hope this helps.

Footnotes
[1] Herodian 4.9 - Livius
[2] Egypt under Rome and Byzantium, 30 B.C.-A.D. 640
[3] Pogrom in Alexandria
[4] The Fatimid Caliphate: Contributions to Arts and Sciences
[5] A FORGOTTEN CHAPTER IN THE HISTORY OF THE CIRCULATION OF THE BLOOD
[6] International Year of Light: Ibn al Haytham, pioneer of modern optics celebrated at UNESCO
[7] http://The Astronomy of the Mamluks: A Brief Overview - jstor

Why do all Egyptian ancient statues have broken noses?

Anthony M Anderson · Follow History Fan! Apr 15

This issue in the comment section on tik tok was brought up by african americans and therefore the egyptians gave an answer:

Reply to @joeoforrington Afrocentrists have mastered the art of cherry-picking.

https://www.tiktok.com/@nativeegyptians/video/7032669196299291909?_r=1&u_code=dk8330hea0i4h2&preview_pb=0&language=en&_d=djeb8fjm6k1dmd&share_item_id=7032669196299291909&source=h5_m&timestamp=1650035936&user_id=6998517414888539141&sec_user_id=MS4wLjABAAAAEnayQYO1gua9A8bDNhavrl3Y11pz1VgAIb39dlcJQYuew_V74Adl6oDqxFAY1BkY&utm_source=copy&utm_campaign=client_share&utm_medium=android&share_iid=706666010

2475941637&share_link_id=36630cb6-59cc-43f6-9458-d680b335d10d&share_app_id=1233

hemiunu on TikTok

Reply to @biggspops #AncientEgypt #Hotep #Afrocentric #Egyptiantiktok #Egypt #religion #Africanamerican #Blacktiktok #art #education #fyp

https://www.tiktok.com/@hemiunu/video/7035771917202197762?_r=1&u_code=dk8330hea0i4h2&preview_pb=0&language=en&_d=djeb8fjm6k1dmd&share_item_id=7035771917202197762&source=h5_m&timestamp=1650035959&user_id=6998517414888539141&sec_user_id=MS4wLjABAAAAEnayQYO1gua9A8bDNhavrl3Y11pz1VgAIb39dlcJQYuew_V74Adl6oDqxFAY1BkY&utm_source=copy&utm_campaign=client_share&utm_medium=android&share_iid=7066660102475941637&share_link_id=b9814e4a-01a2-4cd3-97c5-4487587777ac&share_app_id=1233

Not all ancient egyptian statues have broken noses, they're some statues who have their noses still intact

Are modern-day Egyptians proud of their ancient Pharaoh era heritage or do they feel no connection to their past?

Mariam Khaled

Lived in Egypt since birth1y

Yes, we are very proud of our ancestors.

Our national football team is called the Pharaohs, football is really so popular in our country and is very respected sport, wonder why we call Mohammed Salah a pharaoh, because it's very respectful term.

These are the amulets of the African nations Cup in 2019 that was held in Egypt, notice how they introduced Egypt, as a country that hold rich heritage from the Pharaohs and we should complete it.

Our birth certificates include hieroglyphic symbols means born in Egypt, the same with the death certificates, died in Egypt is written in Hieroglyphs.

Not only these certificates, our banknotes have pharaonic figures and structures.

Ramses II on the 50 cents banknote.

Abu Simbel Temple on the 1 pound banknote.

Habi, The God of the Nile on the 5 pounds banknote.

King Khafre on the 10 pounds banknote.

Charioteer, on the 20 pounds banknote.

Temple of Horus on the 50 pounds banknote.

Sphinx on the 100 pounds banknote.

Seated Scribe on the 200 pounds banknote.

Egyptians in general are very proud of their ancient civilization, they will always boast about how our ancestors made one of the biggest ancient civilizations, if not the biggest already, they always boast about the great civilization that our ancestors build and kept it for thousands of years, I haven't encountered anyone saying otherwise، in fact in my school, teachers will talk how great we used to be, how women and men were equal in the Pharaohs era, you always see the teachers and the students boasting about our ancient civilization, the same on social media, actually the rest of North African people sometimes get annoyed because Egyptians boast a lot when it comes to their ancient civilizations, don't blame them though, even me sometimes get tired of it.

Also, we still celebrate Sham Elnasim (Spring festival of the ancients) till that day, and it's an official holiday throughout the country.

We still use some vocabularies from the ancient languages as well like impo means drink, Mumm means eat, Tata means walk these vocabularies are used with kids because of how easy they are, however we still use some expressions from ancient languages as well like rukhi means get down, it's a common saying between the Egyptians when it rains, people will start saying “ ya matra rukhi rukhi" matra is the Arabic word of rain, the same with “wahwi ya wahwi ayaha" we say it to celebrate Ramadan in the songs but the origin of it is the celebration of the queen Aahhotep, and so much more.

We still have some food recipes from them as well, the people from Upper Egypt still make the sun bread the way the Pharaohs used to do.

So, yes, even if we don't share a lot with the Pharaohs anymore, it's been thousands of years, of course we will lose a lot from the ancient traditions but with all of that, we still have part of their culture in our culture of today and we are very proud of it.

Related Links

Why do Egyptians identify themselves as Arabs and forget all of their ancient traditions? What did Egyptians know about their glorious history before modern archeologists and historians wrote down history books on Egypt?

How do modern Egyptians feel about Ancient Egyptian history?
How do Egyptians feel about their (ancient) history?
What do Egyptians think about their pre-Islamic history and culture?

Have Egyptian people lost their connection with their original culture and identity due to the Arabization and Islamization of Egypt?

Are current Egyptians the Ancient Egyptians, if not then where are they and who are the people which live in Egypt today?

Why is Egypt a Muslim country when it had its own ancient civilization?
Are there any remnants of Ancient Egyptian culture still practiced in the modern-day nation?
Why did the Ancient Egyptian civilization collapse?
Are there any living modern descendants of the ancient Egyptians?

US recently sent its top envoy to apologize to U.A.E monarchy ruler. This came after reportly strained relationship between them. What was really happened?

Ahmed Abdelhaq Zaydan · Follow Lived in Meknès, Morocco (1996–0)Tue

In the 2000s, Arab autocrats acquired the belief that they had some sort of arrangement with the United States where in exchange for supporting American interests, the final line of defense of Arab autocracies would be the United States Military. This belief was shattered when in 2011, Egypt's military dictator, Hosni Mubarak (r. 1981-2011), was overthrown and the US did nothing.

Foreign Policy: US Can't Hijack Egypt's Revolution

Now that Egypt is in the beginning stages of a transformation with an unknown outcome, where does that leave the U.S.? Steven A. Cook of Foreign Policy argues that President Obama must tread carefully, especially given the administration's previous close ties to Mubarak, and resist the urge to help Egyptian democrats — unless they demand it.

https://www.npr.org/2011/03/14/134417495/foreign-policy-us-cant-hijack-egypts-revolution

The United States Secretary of State (official in charge of foreign affairs), Hilary Clinton, had only one reaction to the downfall of a staunch American ally who never challenged the US:

Clinton: Women must get role in Mideast transition | Taiwan News | 2011-03-09 00:16:28

Clinton: Women must get role in Mideast transition | 2011-03-09 00:16:28

https://www.taiwannews.com.tw/en/news/1537211

This sparked unease in several Arab states as they began to feel insecure

The Al-Sauds of Saudi Arabia, the Al-Thanis of Qatar, the Emirs of the UAE and others realized that the United States will not fight to maintain their autocracies.

This transformed the Arab World profoundly as this caused Arab countries to be more active abroad.

This is why the United Arab Emirates has been intervening throughout the Arab World to stamp out democracy from organizing a coup in Tunisia to starting a civil war in Libya to supporting a genocidal warlord in Sudan to bankrolling the Egyptian military to retake power in a coup.

Tunisia Thwarts Alleged UAE-Backed Coup, Sacks Interior Minister

Rabat - A United Arab Emirates-backed attempted military coup in Tunisia has been thwarted thanks to

https://www.moroccoworldnews.com/2018/06/248648/tunisia-uae-backed-coup-interior-minister

Haftar losing ground despite UAE spending fortune

Burning through millions of dollars to arm Haftar, UAE fails to achieve its aims in Libya against UN-recognized government - Anadolu Agency

https://www.aa.com.tr/en/middle-east/haftar-losing-ground-despite-uae-spending-fortune-/1848499

Hemeti - the warlord who may control Sudan's future

The camel trader turned military leader has been accused of a string of human rights abuses.

https://www.bbc.com/news/world-africa-48512465

Recordings Suggest Emirates and Egyptian Military Pushed Ousting of Morsi (Published 2015)

The unauthenticated recordings are the latest that appear to capture the private meetings and phone calls of senior defense officials. All have been released through Islamist news outlets that oppose President Abdel Fattah el-Sisi.

https://www.nytimes.com/2015/03/02/world/middleeast/recordings-suggest-emirates-and-egyptian-military-pushed-ousting-of-morsi.html

One could argue that the Emirs are paranoid but one need not look further than Clinton's reaction to Mubaraka's fall and how President Obama congratulated the Muslim Brotherhood's candidate, Mohammed Morsi, on winning the presidential election to see why the UAE may feel the need to take the actions above.

White House congratulates Egypt's Morsi

The administration calls it a "milestone" in the country's transition to democracy.

https://www.politico.com/blogs/politico44/2012/06/white-house-congratulates-egypts-morsi-127117

Especially as the United States then began to prove the UAE correct more and more Fine, one can say that the US has no right to intervene in domestic matters and this may put the UAE at ease. But the US also doesn't intervene when it comes to external attacks.

In 2019, Iran organized strikes on Saudi oil facilities that set the kingdom back for a while. Now one could chalk up the 2011 episode to the fact that Democrats were in power. In 2019, Republicans were in power under President Donald Trump. Yet the United States once again did nothing.

Trump says he does not want war after attack on Saudi oil facilities

U.S. President Donald Trump said on Monday it looked like Iran was behind attacks on oil plants in Saudi Arabia but stressed he did not want to go to war, as the attacks sent oil prices soaring and raised fears of a new Middle East conflict.

https://www.reuters.com/article/us-saudi-aramco-idUSKBN1W10X8

The 2019 incident once again transformed the UAE's foreign policy

The UAE is now pursuing stronger ties with Israel. Now one may have countless critiques of Israel but there is one undeniable fact: Israel is a tech titan that is pioneering technological advancements. Look no further than the Pegasus spyware that allows the UAE to spy on any person it so chooses. Morocco, another Pegasus user, even used it to spy on France's President!France's Macron targeted in project Pegasus spyware case - Le Monde

The phone of French President Emmanuel Macron was on a list of potential targets for potential surveillance on behalf of Morocco in the Pegasus spyware case, French daily Le Monde reported on Tuesday.

https://www.reuters.com/technology/french-prosecutor-opens-probe-after-pegasus-spyware-complaint-2021-07-20/

If Israeli spyware is powerful enough that Morocco can hack the President of France, then the UAE can use Pegasus to spy on pro-democracy activists, foreign leaders and warlords and all others it feels may threaten its political system. The monarchies are safer than ever before.

The UAE also began pursuing stronger ties with China. There was a secret naval base project for a while until the United States forced the UAE to end the project.

Work on 'Chinese military base' in UAE abandoned after US intervenes – report

Satellite images reportedly detected construction of secret facility at Khalifa port amid growing US-China rivalry

https://www.theguardian.com/world/2021/nov/19/chinese-military-base-uae-construction-abandoned-us-intelligence-report

Strategic Maneuvering: The Gulf States Amid US-China Tensions

Arab Gulf leaders have begun to pursue policies to respond to the rise of China and the receding power and influence of the U.S. It can be argued that the Arab Gulf states regard U.S. concerns over China's ascent as an opportunity to bargain with Washington and realize some military and technical gains. The polarization between Washington and China gives them wide berth to maneuver and extract benefits from both sides without the Gulf states having to take drastic steps in terms of its cooperation with China.

https://www.mei.edu/publications/strategic-maneuvering-gulf-states-amid-us-china-tensions

Then there's also France and Russia but by now, you should get the point. This leaves us with three questions:

What is the United States' reaction to all this?

Nothing. The United States is irreplaceable. The UAE still depends on American arms, contractors, investors and support. Even the United Arab Emirates' plan for surviving oil depends on the UAE taking its oil money and investing it in the United States, such as buying parking meters in Chicago.

Why Does Abu Dhabi Own All of Chicago's Parking Meters?

https://www.theatlantic.com/business/archive/2010/10/why-does-abu-dhabi-own-all-of-chicago-s-parking-meters/339805/

Has the UAE tried to get the US to change course?

Yes.

The UAE is fully aware that the American people aren't willing to fight a war on behalf of foreign monarchs which is why it has an intense PR campaign in the US to persuade Americans that the UAE monarchies are actually friends and that fighting a war on their behalf is a good thing.

Saudi Arabia and the UAE have also been trying to get the United States government to sign a treaty where the US promises to come to their defense if needed.

Gulf Oil Powers Seek U.S. Security Treaty After Yemen Strikes

Some Gulf Arab states are pursuing a written agreement with Washington that could primarily provide defense support after an escalation in attacks from fighters in Yemen on the United Arab Emirates and Saudi Arabia.

https://www.bloomberg.com/news/articles/2022-03-30/gulf-oil-powers-seek-u-s-security-treaty-after-yemen-strikes

What happens now?

The United States will continue its policy as it shifts its resources to East Asia for a confrontation with China. It no longer has the will nor need to intervene in the Arab World, no more regime changes, no more supporting allies.

The UAE, and other Arab states will continue with the policies they put into place post-2011. The UAE will continue to intervene in the Arab World while pursuing ties with foreign powers. Especially since an alliance has already been formed.

The Egyptian Military learned firsthand that it cannot depend on the United States to protect the Military dictatorship which is why Sisi is now a partner of the UAE. Egypt also supported the coup attempt in Tunisia, the civil war in Libya and Hemeti in Sudan.

President Sisi (r. 2014- present) already saw what happened to Mubarak, he has no intention of the same happening to him

So we will certainly see the rise of a new security alliance of some kind in the Arab World as one already exists unofficially.

Related Links

Have the US and UK ever formally apologized to the people of Iran for the overthrow of Mohammad Mossadegh in 1953? If no, is a formal apology warranted? What would be the pros and cons of doing so, or not doing so, at this point?

The European Union snubs Mike Pompeo, and the US envoy to the UN cancels visit to Taiwan. What's really happening?

Why has the UK envoy to the US resigned?

To what degree does the 1953 coup orchestrated by the US (CIA) and the UK (MI6) to overthrow the first democratically elected Iranian leader (Mohamed Mossadegh) still shape the global view of the people and leaders of Iran?

Is US right in blocking Iran's envoy to UN?

Why did the USA and Soviet Union become enemies after World War II, in spite of being allies during the war?

Was U.S.A behind the massacre of Nepalese royal family?

Since the Islamic Emirate of Afghanistan has "Emirate" in the country's name and its leader is called "Emir (Amir al-Mu'minin)", does it mean that this country has adopted a monarchy?

Who protected North Korean/UN envoys while in the US?
Why doesn't the USA bring democracy to the Gulf countries, despite the fact that all these

How was ancient Egypt Arabized?

Michael Ruby

BA NYU (2004), MAT Bard (2011), and a BS in History 7y

Egypt was Arabized through a combination of settlement from the Arabian peninsula and Egyptians' gradual adoption of Arab culture.

This answer is an attempt to address two natural follow-up questions:
1. How much of Egypt's Arabization is due to migration of Arabs and how much is due to Arabization of existing peoples?

2. How gradual was the Arabization of existing peoples? Over what timescale did it occur?

Diocese of Egypt, Roman Empire, ca. 400
Wikimedia:Cplakidas (Public domain)

The map above shows the Roman Diocese of Egypt in 400 CE. Although Justinian reorganized administrative boundaries in 539, the map shows the same area conquered by `Amr ibn al-`Ās starting in 640. Note that it includes Cyrenaica, now in Libya, but does not include the Sinai Peninsula, administered as Palaestina III of the Diocese of the East.

Then, as now, the vast majority of the population of this region lived within the 40,000 km2km2 made arable by the Nile. That's the Egypt we mean, the land from Syene to Alexandria through which Eratosthenes calculated the circumference of the Earth.

In 640 this land had 4 - 5 million people (McEvedy and Jones 1978), the majority of whom were certainly descendants of ancient Egyptians (pre-Alexander). Yet Greeks and Romans had ruled the land for most of the millennium since Alexander's conquest, changing the population structure. Egypt had a substantial Jewish population in Alexandria and elsewhere, and even a small number of Arabs who already lived there, especially traders and Bedouin in the Eastern Desert adjacent to the Red Sea (Al-Otaibi 2014). This is especially true if we count the Sinai, which had been part of the Arab Nabataean kingdom.

With `Amr ibn al-`Ās and Zubayr ibn al-`Awām came their armies, and a few administrators, and Muslim Arabs immediately became the governing elite of the country, but not the majority. Copts made up the majority of local government officials until the later Umayyad period (715-740), when they started to be replaced by Arabs (Gascoigne 2002).

The settlement of Arabs was urban, at first limited to the newly founded city of Fustat, and garrisons at Aswan and Alexandria, then were granted agricultural land through the principle of murtaba al-jund ("pasturing of the army"). These settlers would have been largely men. There is no evidence of a replacement of Egyptian population. Egyptians' genetics remain intermediate between other North Africans, Middle Easterners, Southern Europeans, and Sub-Saharan Africans.

Urban developments outside of Fustat remain largely consistent with the Roman period. An exception are amṣar towns, settled by Arabs next to existing Egyptian towns and laid out with plots for particular Arab tribes (Gascoigne 2002). These did not impact most of the Egyptian countryside. Rather, the interpretation of Egypt's law changed in the middle of the Umayyad period, a change which began to economically disadvantage Copts, leading to the beginnings of Arabization. While Muslim and Arab are, of course, not the same, Islamization in Egypt was parallel to Arabization, though slower. Arabization, measured by language and other cultural forms, proceeded faster than change in religion. According to Gascoigne:

The administrative reorganization of the second half of the Umayyad period included changes in the system of land-holding and taxation. Studies have revealed a retrospective redesignation of Egypt from a country conquered by treaty to one taken by force. The advantages of this to the central government were considerable. Twice the rate of tax was payable on conquered land, local landowners (especially the Coptic church) were displaced and tenants became state tenants. Economic influence in the provinces was thus transferred from Coptic to Arab institutions and officials, and the great estates of the Roman period finally dismantled (Bagnall 1992; Hardy 1931; Frantz-Murphy 1991; Noth 1984).

Yet still, Islamization was slow. Gascoigne continues by summarizing the sources showing that new Muslims were few under Umayyad rule. Umayyad policy actually discouraged conversions, for tax reasons. However, "increased pressure on Christianity during `Abbasid and Tulunid times" (750 - 969) made conversions grow, reaching modern proportions in the Mamluk period (1250-1517) (Gascoigne). This was parallel to the process in much of the Fertile Crescent. Numbers differ between scholars, but some have both Egypt and Syria retaining Christian majorities, certainly in huge regions, until the 11th century.

One marker of Arabization is language. If you take the replacement of Coptic by Arabic as Egypt's spoken language to be the metric of Arabization, it was well underway by the time of the Fatimid Caliphate. Severus ibn al-Muqaffa', the bishop of Ashmunein, found it necessary to write a theological text in Arabic in ca. 980, because the Coptic Orthodox Christian population no longer read Coptic.

By this linguistic measure, it took about 300 years. At the time of the Crusades, Egypt may have been barely majority Muslim, but everyone spoke Arabic.

How do modern Egyptians feel about Ancient Egyptian history?

Khaled Terzaki

I am a student at the college of Earth. 8mo

Born and raised in Egypt, I believe I can tell you that the average Egyptian doesn't feel much about Ancient Egyptian history! And this is because of the fact that people are concerned more by their current life and their standard of living. In fact, many Egyptians used to sell Ancient antiquities on streets in public, giving little to no respect to their own history! Some still dig the earth and search for new temples and graves to steal antiquities for the purpose of selling them for profit. However, this is illegal now and the government is very tough with those who do this.

Not every Egyptian is an antiquities thief though, but it is very common to hear about people digging the earth finding old stuff and selling them. Only those who legally profit from Ancient Egyptian history are enthusiast by such history and respect it; those people are mainly working in tourism, and few scholars as well.

Also, many modern Egyptians would feel disconnected from Ancient Egypt, especially those who live in Lower Egypt (Northern Egypt), since most of them are not sure about their origins and whether they truly descend from Ancient Egyptians. Lower Egypt is very diverse having people from many races, such as Greeks, Italians, Arabs, Persians, Turks, Russians, Spanish, English, French, and many African countries as well, obviously. This diversity contributes in diluting and diffusing any feelings towards Ancient Egyptian history.

Related Links

Are modern-day Egyptians proud of their ancient Pharaoh era heritage or do they feel no connection to their past?

Why do Egyptians identify themselves as Arabs and forget all of their ancient traditions?

What did Egyptians know about their glorious history before modern archeologists and historians wrote down history books on Egypt?

Why has Egypt achieved nothing since it got Islamized?
How was ancient Egypt Arabized?
How do Egyptians feel about their (ancient) history?
Are the Copts genetically different from Egyptian Arabs?
What race occupied Egypt before the invasion of the Arabs/Persians?
Are there people in Egypt today who practice the ancient Egyptian polytheistic religion?

Are current Egyptians the Ancient Egyptians, if not then where are they and who are the people which live in Egypt today?

Have Egyptian people lost their connection with their original culture and identity due to

How do Egyptians feel about their (ancient) history?

Sarah Lynn Johnson

Lived in Egypt 4y

Egyptians are super, super proud of ancient Egypt!

They all brag about how they're descended from the Pharaohs and how they built the greatest monuments. (Even though it's unlikely that their personal relatives were Pharaohs.)

My husband, who is Egyptian, loves to brag about how Egypt was the first civilization. When I tell him that, actually, the Sumerians came in just a little before the Egyptians, he says “Well, we’re the first great civilization.”

Want to start a huge fight? Try telling an Egyptian that the pyramids weren’t built by Egyptians, but by foreign slaves. Or even worse? Try telling them the pyramids were built by space aliens. They will tear you a new one.

What do you mean they were built by aliens!?!? How dare you!? My great great great great great great great great great great great great great great great great great grandfather lost his arm when a block crushed it building the Pyramid Khufu. (I assume…) How dare you disrespect his legacy!

Many Egyptians also like to think of themselves as Egyptologists and go on and on about ancient Egyptian history as if they were experts (even though they know as much as the average person). My husband has, many times, tried to explain the ancient Egyptian gods to me, only to realize that I actually know more about them than he does (because I did a report of them…in Middle School).

This is all mostly around foreigners and anyone else who isn’t from Egypt. It’s a way of showing pride in their country and culture. Whenever it’s just a group of Egyptians all by themselves, they mostly just complain about the state of things, and how the country’s going to hell, and how things used to be so much better. I think this is typical of people from most countries, though.

Related Links

Are modern-day Egyptians proud of their ancient Pharaoh era heritage or do they feel no connection to their past?

How do modern Egyptians feel about Ancient Egyptian history?
What do Egyptians think about their pre-Islamic history and culture?
Why do Egyptians identify themselves as Arabs and forget all of their ancient traditions?

What did Egyptians know about their glorious history before modern archeologists and historians wrote down history books on Egypt?

Did Islam ruin Egyptian culture?

Have Egyptian people lost their connection with their original culture and identity due to the Arabization and Islamization of Egypt?

How was ancient Egypt Arabized?
Why has Egypt achieved nothing since it got Islamized?
What name(s) did the Ancient Egyptians have for themselves?
Are there any living modern descendants of the ancient Egyptians?

Why are Egyptians only 17% Arab (probably even less)? Who are they mixed with?

John Burridge

B.A, in Social Sciences, Southampton Institute (Graduated 1998) Updated Nov 13

I would suggest that they are mostly descended from ancient Egyptians. Just because they speak Arabic and are light-skinned doesn't mean they are Arabs, though obviously they have some Arab ancestry too (and some Greek ancestry). Even many Muslim Egyptians don't like being called Arabs. The Arabs who invaded Egypt in the 7th century formed a ruling elite. They didn't "drive out" the ancient Egyptians and/or replace them.

In the far south of Egypt there are Nubians and in the far west there are Amazigh (Berbers). Both groups are historically and ethnically distinct from the Egyptians.

Related Answer

Why are Egyptians only 17% Arab (probably even less)? Who are they mixed with?

Diaa Ryan Answered May 27, 2020

Modern Egyptians are predominantly descendent of Ancient Egyptians with few outside mixture.

Here is a modern Egyptian oracle:

```
Population (source) Distance
1 Egyptian 5.95
2 Bedouin 10.81
3 Jordanian 12.73
4 Palestinian 15.28
5 Libyan_Jewish 16.17
6 Syrian 16.96
7 Tunisian 17.16
8 Tunisian_Jewish 17.44
9 Algerian 17.61
10 Samaritan 19.06
11 Moroccan 19.42
12 Lebanese_Muslim 19.9
13 Algerian_Jewish 20.86
14 Mozabite_Berber 21.04
15 Sephardic_Jewish 21.15
16 Italian_Jewish 21.89
17 Lebanese_Christian 21.98
18 Cyprian 22.06
19 Saudi 22.19
20 Yemenite_Jewish 23.15
```

And here is an Ancient Egyptian oracle:

```
Population (source) Distance
1 Egyptian 14.36
2 Palestinian 16.73
3 Libyan_Jewish 16.82
4 Bedouin 17.51
5 Jordanian 17.73
6 Samaritan 18.02
7 Yemenite_Jewish 19.52
8 Tunisian_Jewish 19.55
9 Algerian_Jewish 21.13
10 Lebanese_Christian 21.22
11 Syrian 21.56
12 Tunisian 21.95
13 Algerian 22.64
14 Cyprian 22.71
15 Lebanese_Druze 22.71
16 Italian_Jewish 23.04
17 Sephardic_Jewish 23.23
18 Saudi 23.41
19 Lebanese_Muslim 23.75
20 Moroccan 24.91
```

They cluster very closely.

Related Links

Are the Copts genetically different from Egyptian Arabs?
Do Egyptians consider themselves to be Arabs or Berbers?
If Egypt is in Africa, why don't Egyptians consider themselves Africans?

Do modern Egyptians accept that they are Arabs and not descendants of the ancient Egyptians?

Are Egyptians really Arabs?
How are Egyptians perceived by other Arabs?
Is it a Eurocentric lie to say that Copts are direct descendants of ancient Egyptians?
Do Egyptians have European ancestry?

Are current Egyptians the Ancient Egyptians, if not then where are they and who are the people which live in Egypt today?

Are Copts more Egyptian than the Egyptian Muslims, since they resisted arabization?

Are current Egyptians the Ancient Egyptians, if not then where are they and who are the people which live in Egypt today?

Youssef Karas B.A. in Computer Engineering, British University in Egypt (BUE) (Expected 2024) Updated 3y

They are here in Egypt.

The most popular misconception concerning the relation between ancient and modern Egyptians is that they have nothing to do with each other because Egypt have been Invaded many times thus the population have changed, but for me the person who believe or is trying to spread this lie is either someone who know nothing about Egypt's history or simply he is a one that is falsely claiming it for himself.

Nearly all of the invaders of Egypt didn't invade it to migrate and stay in it basically they have done that for political and strategic reasons and every invader kicked out the prior one and even if we assumed that the invading force had stayed in Egypt that would by no mean change the Native population since the invading force consisting of soldiers and elites are less than a fraction in term of percentage compared to the native people.

DNA tests have proven that the majority of modern day Egyptians are native to this land and not outcomes.

Reference Populations - Geno 2.0 Next Generation

what I have mentioned above is the relation between modern and ancient Egyptians in terms of DNA and Ethnicity. I will discuss the cultural bond.

Speaking Arabic doesn't mean that Egyptians are Arab unlike an Arabian person from Saudi Arabia for example most of modern day Egyptians don't belong to an Arabian tribe that traces it's roots back to the Arabian peninsula. but that doesn't mean that there is no bonds between Ancient Egyptian language and Egyptian Arabic From Pharaoh's Lips is a book that show the relation between ancient Egyptian language and every day Arabic spoken in Egypt.

Related Links

Are Kemetic blacks right to assume that they are the real descendants of ancient Egypt?
Are there any living modern descendants of the ancient Egyptians?

It has been proven already that modern Egyptians are the only descendants of the Ancient Egyptians. Why do some people with no connection to Egypt are trying to appropriate Egyptian history instead of focusing on their own countries and people?

Are modern Egyptians related to the ancient Egyptians, or are they ethnically Arabian?
What Ancient Egyptian words do modern Egyptians still use?
Are the Copts genetically different from Egyptian Arabs?
How do modern Egyptians feel about Ancient Egyptian history?
Are there people in Egypt today who practice the ancient Egyptian polytheistic religion?

Do modern Egyptians (non-coptic) owe any portion of their ancestry and DNA to the ancient Egyptians?

Since the Copts (who are "brown", Middle Eastern people) are proven to be the direct descendants of the Ancient Egyptians, then

Why do Egyptians call themselves Arabs when they are not?

Mahmoud Zakaria works at Seminole Hard Rock Hotel & Casino Answered May 26, 2017

I agree that they are not Arabs. Not because some of countries speak Spanish they will be Spanish people. But with Egyptian the language is combined with religion. And the quran which they believe it is a miracle is written in arabic. Plus, there is Hadith saying the language of the heaven will be arabic. And they were occupied by arabs for hundred of years, it is funny that they proud of that. All of these pieces made Egyptian feel it is a proud to be arabs. But for me it is a proud to be Egyptian and it is shame to be proud of being part of the people who occupied your country for centuries

Related Links

Is Egypt an Arab state? Also, why do some Egyptians say that it isn't when there is 'Arab' in its official name?

Are Egyptians in modern Egypt ethnically Arabs or from the people of the Pharaohs?
Why are Egyptians only 17% Arab (probably even less)? Who are they mixed with?
Do Egyptians consider themselves to be Arabs or Berbers?
Do Muslim Egyptians consider themselves Arab?
Are Egyptians really Arabs?
If Egypt is in Africa, why don’t Egyptians consider themselves Africans?
Why is Egypt considered an Arab country?
Why is Egypt called the Arab Republic of Egypt? Egyptians are not Arabs.
What distinguishes Egypt from the rest of the Arab world?

Kathleen Pennell's Key Posts

· Follow Posted by Jo Mburu Apr 3

Pyramid Street, Egypt in 1875 and 2020.

Est-ce que les forces armées égyptiennes sont performantes aujourd'hui ?/ Is the Egyptian Armed Forces good (Please don't base this off wars that happened like 50 years ago)?

Jerome Cohen Féru, mordu et l'eusses-tu-cruTraducteur · 14 avr.

M.Magzem Lieu : Egypt (2002–aujourd'hui)

Les forces armées égyptiennes sont-elles bonnes ? Oui, elles sont très performantes sur le papier.

L'Égypte, en effet, a des forces terrestres qui sont parmi les 8 meilleures du monde. En ce qui concerne les chiffres, l'Égypte dispose d'un nombre considérable de chars, d'artillerie, de lance-missiles, de roquettes, etc. En ce qui concerne la qualité, l'Égypte dispose également d'armes avancées.

Effectifs

Il est très logique de dire que l'Egypte a une grande armée active et de réserve, compte tenu de sa grande population. L'Egypte a une armée d'active de 450.000 soldats (10ème au monde) et une armée de réserve de 480.000 soldats (7ème au monde). Ces soldats sont bien entraînés.

Les

n

Chars de combat principaux

L'Égypte possède un total de 4 394 chars, ce qui la place au 6e rang mondial.

L'Egypte possède environ

- 1360 M1A1 Abrams
- 1700 M-60 Patton
- 800 T-55/54
- 34 T-72
- 500 T-62

Vous allez dire que l'Égypte a de vieux chars. Ce n'est pas exact, car l'Égypte possède 1 360 chars M1A1, qui sont considérés comme des chars de combat principaux modernes. Ce chiffre est énorme car le Royaume-Uni ne possède que 227 chars Challenger et la France seulement 406 chars Leclerc. L'Egypte a donc plus de chars modernes que ces deux pays. Bien sûr, cela ne signifie pas que l'Égypte est plus forte qu'eux.

Véhicules blindés de combat

L'Egypte a 10 000 VBC et est classée 8ème.

Artillerie remorquée

L'Egypte possède environ 2 200 pièces et se classe 5e.

Artillerie automotrice

L'Égypte possède environ 1 165 pièces et se classe au 5e rang.

Lance-roquettes

L'Egypte possède environ 1,235 missiles

Missiles balistiques

Les missiles sol-sol sont très importants pendant les guerres. L'Egypte possède des centaines de missiles balistiques de type Scud, Hawasang, Sakr (certains de ces missiles peuvent porter des têtes nucléaires). Ces missiles sont de moyenne ou courte portée.

Défense aérienne

L'armée de l'air égyptienne n'est pas la meilleure chose qui existe. Il est donc très important de posséder une défense aérienne très forte, sinon l'ennemi aura tout loisir de frapper les grandes forces égyptiennes. La défense aérienne égyptienne est une branche distincte des forces armées.

La défense aérienne égyptienne est composée de systèmes anti-aériens à longue portée.

- S- 300 (4 bataillons)
- Patriot (32 systèmes)

L'Egypte dispose également de centaines de missiles anti-aériens de moyenne portée tels que

- Hawk
- SAM-2
- SAM-3
- SAM-6

L'Egypte dispose également d'autres missiles à courte portée et de canons anti-aériens.

Mais pour bénéficier d'une défense aérienne forte, l'Egypte a besoin de radars avancés.

Les TPS-59 sont les meilleurs radars d'Egypte. Ce sont des radars ESA tridimensionnels, ils sont capables de fournir une alerte rapide contre les missiles balistiques, les missiles et les avions d'une portée de 740 km et d'une altitude maximale de 300 km . Voici les types de radars dont dispose l'Egypte

- TPS-59
- Commander-SL

- Protivnik-GE

SPS-48

Malgré la force des forces armées égyptiennes, je pense que le problème se situe au niveau des dirigeants. Ils sont incompétents pour faire la guerre.

Qu'est-il arrivé aux 35 000 soldats de Napoléon Bonaparte après qu'il les ait laissés en Égypte ?

Philippe Baron 1 an

Bonaparte quitte son armee un peu rapidement a l automne 1799 pour faire son coup d etat il laisse le commandement au gneral kleber; l armee est encerclee par des forces anglaises et turques tres superieures en nombre; mais kleber s accroche et remporte plusieurs victoires; il est assassine par un terroriste musulman; le general menou lui succede et fait aussitot empaler le terroriste ;un usage qui serait bien utile a nice aujourd hui; finalement en 1801 menou signe une convention avec les anglais l armee quitte l egypte pour rentrer en france avec armes et babages et l honneur intact;l au total une epopee de victoires sans lendemains et de lourdes pertes causees par les maladies comme la peste plus que par les combats toujours victorieu bonaparte quitte son armee un peu rapidement a l automne 1799 pour faire son coup d etat il laisse le commandement au gneral kleber; l armee est encerclee par des forces anglaises et turques tres superieures en nombre; mais kleber s accroche et remporte plusieurs victoires; il est assassine par un terroriste musulman; le general menou lui succede et fait aussitot empaler le terroriste ;un usage qui serait bien utile a nice aujourd hui; finalement en 1801 menou signe une convention avec les anglais l armee quitte l egypte pour rentrer en france avec armes et babages et l honneur intact;l au total une epopee de victoires sans lendemains et de lourdes pertes causees par les maladies comme la peste plus que par les combats toujours victorieux

Related Answer
How did Israel lose the October 1973 war on the Egyptian front in 6 hours?

M.Magzem Lives in Egypt (2002–present) Updated Apr 9

Note as result of objections on the biased answer, I decided to make huge edits to it.
Egypt didn't win in 6 hours, but Egypt destroyed the Bar-Liv line in 6 hours.

This was indeed a great military achievment by the Egyptians. It's something that is being studied in the military universities untill now. The Egyptian army crossed the strongest water barrier in world. To do something like this, you need preparations close to perfection.

We can divide the the war into 4 battles

1. Battle of crossing the Canal
2. Battle of counter attack
3. Battle of Developing attack
4. Battle of Deversoir
5. 101 Km negotiations

Battle of crossing the Canal

On 2 O'clock, the Egyptian air force destroyed destroyed oil and weapon storage, airports, radars, and cut the connection between the Israeli forces in Sinai and Israel for 6 hours.

By using inflatable boats, Egyptian soliders crossed the Canal into the fortifications of the bar-Lev line, and occupied the bunkers. Egypt found a way to deal with the Napalm pumps that was supposed to kill 30,000 Egyptian soliders

They were fighting for 6-8 hours against the Israeli tanks themselves without any help from the armoured equipments. There were 300-360 Israeli tanks (Mandler).

By using water, they were able to open gaps in the sand wall in the half time using artillery. The idea is to cross the Canal in the shortest time before the arrival of the Israeli reserve army.

After noon, Egyptian helicopters put commandos in the middle Sinai. Those commandos were going to die, but their mission was to do their best to delay the arrival of the Israeli reserve forces (Adan & Sharon) before dying.

Finally, Egypt succeeded to cross the Canal with tanks and heavy equipments by using water bridges in shortest time possible crossing the world strongest water barrier.

The Israeli strong airforce tried to destroy the Egyptian water bridges but the Egyptian airdefense did the job of defending. Despite that decent airdefense, It was limited by covering 15 Km east of the Canal.

Battle of Israeli counter-attack
After the Israeli reserve army arrived, Israel tried to throw the Egyptian Armies behind the Canal. They failed and lost no less than 200 tanks. Then, Egypt occupied 10–12 Km east of the Canal.

Then the situation became bad for Israel, which lost 400 tanks and 49 aircrafts. They thought that this was the end of a country called Israel and prepared to nuke Egypt. They sent the messege “SAVE ISRAEL” on October 9, and the American airlift “Operation Nickal Grass” started from October 12.

Battle of developing the attack

As the result of political pressure, Egypt decided to develop the attack to the passes (40 Km east Canal), going outside the airdefense cover but failed and lost 250 tanks. The problem that Egypt had no forces west Canal, due to this mistake military decision.

MEDITERRANEAN SEA
Damietta
Port Said
Suez Canal
2nd Army
El-Qantara
Sinai Peninsula
Adan
Faqus
El Sied Pond
Suez Canal
Ismailia
Lake Timsah
21st Div
Sharon
E G Y P T
Great Bitter Lake
3rd Army
Small Bitter Lake
Suez Canal
4th Div
Magen
Suez
Gulf of Suez
RED SEA
20 km
20 mi

Battle of Deversoir

Israel attacked Egypt in the Battle of Chinese farm. Israel outnumbered the Egyptians in that battle 300 tanks vs 136 tanks and infantry units. Israel lost about 200 tanks in this battle. But the Egyptians ran out of anti-tank missiles and had to retreat. Israel succeeded to open an axis to cross the Canal to Occupy Ismailia and Suez and encircle the 2nd & 3rd Armies.

Egypt tried to close that axis. Due to another mistake decision, Egypt failed to close the axis from the east. It also failed to close it from the west, due to the lack of enough forces on the west.

The Egyptians lacked the heavy weapons or guided missiles on the west of the Canal, so it would be very hard to deal with Israeli forces. There were some commandos and paratroopers, who were very trained on killing tanks. They succeeded to prevent the circulation of 2nd Army and defended Ismailia city.

After Egypt found that the Israeli crossing was inevitable, it asked the USSR for the cease-fire resolution. Israelis violated the cease-fire and continued its circulation of 3rd Army, and then attack Suez city. Israel also failed to do so. Right before the Israeli violation, Egypt withdrew a tank Division to block the way to Cairo.

Israelis attacked Suez city, but were defeated to be the last battle of the war.

101Km negotiations

Egypt wanted USA and USSR to come and get back October 22 line, where the cease-fire took place. USA refuesed, but USSR ignored. As a result, the tensions between them increased. But at the end, Both agreed to make a negotiations between Egypt and Israel under the supervision of UN to allow supplies first and to agree on troops disengegment second.

This negotiations ended by the Israeli withdrawal from the west bank and Egypt got the full control over the Canal. The Arab oil embergo helped alot in these negotiations.

News Nigeria

Now Africa has the longest Monorail system in the world located in Cairo to connect it to the new capital of Egypt

Posted by Aniekpeno Ekong Sat

This time is for Africa □

What was the name of the Mediterranean tribes that migrated into Egypt and founded Egypt?

Peter · Follow read a book Apr 27

The Turks of North Africa and the Middle East: together with Europeans, both in Europe and around the World; have done horrible, destructive, disrespectful things to Mankind's precious inheritance - the Artifacts of the Ancient Black people They played no meaningful part in Mankind's formative years, and those involved know it. But resentful envy, together with false pride, compels them to try and force a false place for themselves in Mankind's history when there really is none. And sadly, it seems lost on them, that all they have really accomplished, is to guarantee that those that proceed them, will do the same to them.

And here are the ancient Egyptians!

Amenhotep III 9th. king 18th. dynasty

Sahure 2nd. king 5th. dynasty

Akhenaten 10th. king 18th. dynasty

There are TWO kinds of MODERN Egyptians, Anatolians (Turkey), Arabians, and Middle Easterners generally: The White and Mulatto ones are Turks

The Nonsense that White People are Cold Adapted Humans One of the white tribes' most outrageous lies is that they are “WHITE SKINNED” because they are “COLD ADAPTED” People who EVOLVED light Skin to better absorb Sunlight for vitamin “D” synthesis. That is a ridiculous lie, and it is thoroughly and scientifically debunked

Why do ancient statues and paintings of Black people, often NOT look like Black people?

THE VANISHING EVIDENCE OF CLASSICAL AFRICAN CIVILIZATIONS

by Prof. Manu Ampim

The widespread damage to the temple images has allowed Egyptologists to argue from such sources as the temple evidence that ancient Egypt was a multi-racial society and therefore belongs to the world's heritage and not necessarily to African history. There are probably about a million tourists each year who visit Egypt and Nubia, and they get a totally false view of the identity of the builders of these great civilizations, largely because the evidence of the builders' Black origin is disappearing. This vanishing evidence has enabled dishonest Egyptologists and tour guides to misrepresent the identity of the founders and builders of ancient Egypt by selectively pointing out the "non-African" images on the walls. Actually, the images which appear to look "non-African" have undergone a racial make-over and look nothing like they did originally. These images have been crudely recarved by European and Arab conspirators who work hard to eliminate all traces of African facial features. Only through exhaustive first-hand research can one demonstrate from the surviving on-site temple evidence that ancient Egypt was a Black civilization.

The altering of Black (African) facial features and the lightening of the skin colors of painted reliefs inside the tombs are central aspects of the conspiracy to destroy the memory of classical African civilizations. The two main conspirator groups carrying out these acts are European and American research teams and local government workers. Throughout Egypt and Nubia, the tomb images have suffered different levels of decay and destruction. In places such as Giza the tombs are closed as there is little left to see; in Tell Amarna the tomb carvings are in an advanced state of decay; in El Kab and Aswan many of the images have been systematically defaced; and in Beni Hassan only 4 of the 39 tombs are open because the rest are badly damaged. The only major location which has escaped serious tomb damage is Sakkara, but this may not remain true in the future because the conspirators' work is not complete, until they have destroyed or defaced all the evidence of classical African civilizations.

The problem of deterioration of the Kings Valley (KV) tombs has led to a growing international movement to build replica tombs and close the original structures. The tomb replication project will likely be implemented in the future. Under this plan, the popular tombs which have suffered irreparable damage, such as the tomb of Tutankhamen, will be permanently closed to the public. Once they are closed, the only persons who will have access to the original KV tombs will be Egyptian government officials and workers, and "qualified" researchers. The completion of this tomb replication project will be a major step in further erasing the memory of a Black Egypt. These replica tombs, with the lightened colors and remade facial features, will graphically demonstrate that the evidence of classical African civilizations is vanishing. This of course, holds true for the Minoan and all other Black civilizations.

An Egyptian worker preparing to plaster over a damaged tomb wall

Staff from the University of Chicago's Oriental Institute

Restorer, outlining changes to be made

Egyptian relief being repainted

Three Female Musicians from the Tomb of Nakht - XVIII Dynasty 1450 B.C. How much longer will they remain Black?

Example of the their handiwork

(Note the Libyan and Asiatic are depicted as White)

Four peoples of the world: a Libyan, a Nubian, an Asiatic, and an Egyptian.
An artistic rendering by Heinrich von Minutoli (1820), based on a mural from the tomb of Seti I

The ACTUAL tomb painting!

Tomb of Sety I - Book of Gates, fourth division (P)/fifth hour (H), beginning.

A Libyan, a Canaanite, a Syian, and a Nubian, bow to pharaoh. XVIIIth Dynasty

And who hasn't seen this Greek Pharaoh or this Greek Priest: passed-off as Egyptians?

The beginnings of civilization

Prehistoric Cave painting from the western desert of Egypt.

In Egypt, sometime around 40,000 to 15,000 years ago, the rains started to diminish, and the Sahara, which had been a fertile land, started to dry up and was becoming a desert. Fleeing the advancing desert, many of the people that were living in the area started to migrate closer to the only dependable source of freshwater - the Nile River. Over the following thousands of years, the Sahara became a total desert, completely incapable of supporting human life except for the Oasis'. By then, the people of the area had already moved to the Nile River Valley. And it is here in the Nile Valley, whereas these early human groups are forced to live closer and ever closer to each other, they start to cooperate with each other, and learn from each other.

Over time, they begin to form the first pools of collective knowledge, (as an example of collective knowledge: no one person knows how to build a car by himself - it takes thousands of people, each pooling their individual knowledge and skills to build a car). With this collective knowledge, early man first learns how to make better tools for fishing, hunting and butchering his kill, (in time, this knowledge would grow to the point where they can build the Pyramids). Then the early forms of farming begin to appear. At a few sites, there is evidence that fishing was abandoned by some people, possibly because farmed grains (barley, most likely), together with the large herd animals that they still hunted, created a diet that was more than adequate for their needs.

The Qadan culture

Soon we begin to see the first signs of "true" culture emerging, such as the Qadan culture (13,000 - 9,000 B.C.). These Qadan sites, which stretch from the Second Cataract of the Nile to Tushka (just above Aswan), actually have cemeteries and evidence of ritual burial. It is also during this time, that true agriculture begins, grinding stones and reaping blades have been found in great numbers there. It is also about this time that they learn to domesticate animals. But as is always the case with man, there is always conflict and war. A statistical analysis of the main cemetery at Jebel Sahaba, gives a figure of 40 percent of the people buried there, died from wounds due to thrown projectiles; spears, darts, and arrows.

Fertility Figure

Now let's look at these ancient people in terms of their cultural phases: that is to say, how man was thinking, living and working at a given time in a given place. (as always, these cultural phase names are taken from the place where the evidence and artefacts were found, we never know what they called these places or themselves).

The Badari

The Badari is believed to be the ancestors of the pre-dynastic Egyptians. They lived in Upper Egypt, on the eastern bank of the Nile near the village of Badari, which is south of Asiut. Here archaeologists have found both, a series of settlement sites, as well as various cemeteries. These people lived before 4400 B.C, and though they were semi-nomadic people, they started to cultivate grain and domesticate animals. They had a series of small villages in the flat desert which borders the flood plain created by the Nile. Their burial grounds were found on the outskirts of their villages. They performed the ritual sacrifice of cattle and sheep and then gave these animals ceremonial burial.

The graves of these people were simple - the dead were laid to rest on their left side facing the west in a fetal position and wrapped in matting. They were buried with fine grave goods - such as beautiful ceramics, decorated plates, bowls and dishes. Also, cosmetic utensils, which included makeup palettes, ointment spoons, decorative combs and bracelets, necklaces, copper beads and pins. They also usually had ivory or clay female figure, (which may have been fertility dolls or idols), placed in the grave with the deceased. This all indicates a highly evolved funerary system, the dead were buried with their finest possessions for use in the next world. Unfortunately, many of these graves were robbed.

The Amratian

Succeeding the Badari, the Amratian/Naqada people took over. They were one of the most important prehistoric cultures in Upper Egypt, and their development can be traced to the founding of the Egyptian state. The Amratian (Naqada I), started as a parallel culture to the Badari but eventually replaced it. These then were the people commonly thought of, as the first "true" Egyptians, about 4500-3100 B.C.

Like the Badari, they lived in villages and cultivated the fertile Nile valley. Each village had it's own animal deity, which was identified on the clan ensign. From this came the different Egyptian Nome's (districts), with their own local totems, later these totems would become the gods of the dynastic pantheon.

As the artistic abilities of the people grew, they started making pottery decorated with animals and humans engaged in hunting or worshipping. Female idol figures continue to appear - but now in greater numbers and in a wider variety. And now bearded male figures also started to appear on pendants and ivory sticks, these seem to have a magical or spiritual purpose.

In the Amratian graves, the deceased were buried with statuettes to keep them company in the afterlife. These were the forerunners of ushabti figures, which are found in later Egyptian tombs. Along with these figures, the dead person was buried with food, weapons, amulets, ornaments, and decorated vases and palettes.

Badari period Ivory

MacGregor Man - Once in the collection of the Rev William MacGregor, and is said to have been found in the region of Naqada and dated to that period. The authenticity of this sculpture has been questioned.

Carved hippopotamus tooth. Part of other ivories found at Hierakonpolis (Nekhen). Predynastic or 1st Dynasty.

The Gerzean

In the middle of the fourth millennium B.C, the Gerzean/Naqada II culture superseded the Naqada I. They had by now, mastered the art of agriculture and the use of artificial irrigation (canals and dykes). With this and their domesticated animals, they no longer needed to hunt for their food. The people started to live in towns, not just villages. The Gerzean people continued to grow in the artistic area also, creating new styles of pottery and more elegant artwork. Metalworking increased - the Gerzean people made great use of copper knives. They also created their own cast-metal implements and weapons.

They also traded with far distant peoples and places, such as Mesopotamia and Asia, for copper, silver, lapis lazuli, lead, and cylinder seals. Soon foreign influences brought in through their trading activities began to show in their style of dress, ornaments and various implements. Radical changes in the design of knives, daggers and pottery were made by the Gerzeans because of these influences, which were of course two-way.

Burials

The Egyptian God Horus

It was also at this time, that they introduced the Sun God "Ra" (later Horus). Whose symbol was the falcon, and the love goddess Hathor, whose symbol was the cow? There were also significant changes in their type of burial. Whereas before, the corpse was generally wrapped in some sort of covering, and buried in a contracted position facing the west. Now those in Gerzean graves showed no particular orientation at all, but the graves were now much more elaborate. Here also is evidence of an elite social class, from the grave goods found. These more elaborate funerals have larger rectangular graves, with walls lined with either masonry or wood.

In Nekhem (Hierakonpolis), the first capital in Upper Egypt, we see the beginnings of this class distinction, here we find large dynastic type buildings, with new rituals and social structures. In the cult centre of Horus, there is a palace and ritual precinct, which was made of timber and matting, but can only be theoretically reconstructed from the positions of the postholes - some of which were big enough for entire tree trunks! The features of this complex can be compared with the buildings of Pharaoh Djoser's pyramid complex because it also has a large oval courtyard, surrounded by various buildings. This is clearly the forerunner to the royal ritual precincts of the Early Dynastic Period.

WHY WOULD MEDITERRANE INVADERS PUT THEIR 1ST CAPITAL IN SOUTHERN EGYPT?

Nekhen was the religious and political capital of Upper Egypt at the end of prehistoric Egypt (c. 3200–3100 BC) and probably also during the Early Dynastic Period (c. 3100–2686 BC).

The oldest known tomb with painted decoration, a mural on its plaster walls, is located in Nekhen and is thought to date to c. 3500–3200 BC. It shares distinctive imagery with artefacts from the Gerzeh culture.

As with almost all statues of Egypt and the Middle East, certain modifications were made to the facial features – chiefly the Nose - so as to make the face look more Caucasian. In cases where modification was too difficult, the nose was simply broken off. Note the examples below.

It is reported that Napoleon had his troops use the nose and lips of the Great Sphinx for target practice

Un-restored Statue of Tuthmosis III as a young man

Restored statue of Tuthmosis III as a young man

Never completed and discarded, head of Senusret III with an intact nose. They missed one!

Senusret III 5th. king 12th. dynasty

Ninetjer - 3rd. King 2nd. Dyn.

Khasekhemwy 5th. king 2nd. dynasty

Huni 5th. king 3rd Dynasty

Sanakhte a.k.a. Zanakht and Nebka 1st. King 3rd. Dyn.

Snefru - 1st. King 4th. Dyn.

Djedefre 3rd. king 4th. dynasty

Khafre 4th. king 4th. dynasty

Shepseskaf - 6th. and last King of 4th. Dyn.

Userkaf, 1st. king, 5th. dynasty

Sahure 2nd. king 5th. dynasty

Neferefre 5 th. king 5th. dynasty

Niuserre - 6th. King 5th. Dyn.

Djedkare 8th. king 5th. dynasty

Pepi I - 2nd. King 6th. Dynasty

Merenre I - 3rd. King 6th. Dyn.

Pepi I

Unknown Queen depicted as Mut

Turkish Rulers of Egypt

Turkish Sultan Seif Al-Din Kutuz - 1259-60

Turkish Sultan Al Zaher Beybars - 1260-77 A.D.

Ottoman Sultan Selim, 1512 - 1520

Muhammad Ali Pasha, 1805 - 1848

Ibrahim Pasha, 1848 - 1848

Abbas I Pasha, 1849 - 1854

Said I Pasha, 1854 - 1863

Ismail I, 1863 - 1879

Mohamed Tawfig, 1879 - 1892

Abbas II, 1892 - 1914

Husayn I, 1914 - 1917

Faud I, 1917 - 1936

Faud I, 1917 - 1936

Farouk, 1936 - 1952

Faud II, 1952 - 1953

Muhammad Naquib, 1953 - 1954

Gamal Abdel Nasser, 1954 - 1970

Anwar Sadat, 1970 - 1981
Said by many, to actually have (at least partially) Egyptian linage.

Hosni Mubarak, 1981 - Present

Related Answer
What was the name of the Mediterranean tribes that migrated into Egypt and founded Egypt?

Françoise Marie, Master's Degree Public Administration, Syracuse University Answered Apr 7

The original home of ancient Egyptians is Upper Egypt (Pathros) far from the Mediterranean Sea. It is even recorded in the Bible in Ezekiel and Jeremiah. Upper Egypt is located in the south, next to Sudan.

https://www.encyclopedia.com/religion/encyclopedias-almanacs-transcripts-and-maps/Ezekiel 29:14I will turn the fortunes of Egypt and make them return to the land of Pathros, to the land of their origin, and there they will be a lowly kingdom. According to Ezekiel 29:14, Pathros 'Southern Egypt" is considered the original home of the Egyptians.

https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Pathros

Pathros (Hebrew: פַּתְרוֹס , Pathrôs; Greek: Φαθωρῆς, Phathōrēs; Koine Greek: Παθούρης, Pathourēs) refers to Upper Egypt, primarily the Thebaid where it extended from Elephantine fort to modern Asyut north of Thebes.[1] Gardiner argues it extended to the north no farther than Abydos.[2] It is mentioned in the Hebrew Bible in Jeremiah 44:1 and 15; Isaiah 11:11; and Ezekiel 29:14, 30:14. It is the homeland of the Pathrusim.

The renowned French ethnologist Dr. Paul Rivet, used to say: ‘ there is a ratio of 4 to 20 per cent black blood around the Mediterranean sea’. He thus referred to the Negroids of the early Paleolithic and Mesolithic - Grimaldi Man and Caspian Man -- an important group of the Mediterranean populations until the Neolithic.

Uniparental Markers of Contemporary Italian Population Reveals Details on Its Pre-Roman Heritage

This analysis indicated that Italians have a basal proportion of sub-Saharan ancesstry that is higher (9.2%, on average) than other central or northern European populations (1.5%, on average).

The amount of African ancestry in Italians is however more comparable to (but slightly higher than) the average in other Mediterranean countries (7.1%)

https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/African_admixture_in_Europe

Sickle cell trait Sickle cell genes of African origin have been detected in Europe, mostly in the Mediterranean region.

In Eastern Mediterranean regions, such as Italy, Greece, Albania and Turkey The Benin haplotype is the most frequent sickle cell variant. The Benin haplotype is also the most frequent variant in the Middle East and has been observed in Syrians, Palestinians, Israeli Arabs, Israeli Jews and Western Saudi Arabians.

This suggests that the Benin haplotype may have expanded from West Africa into North Africa and then into the Middle East and Europe. The spread of the Benin haplotype to the Mediterranean region has been associated with various events including Late Stone Age expansions from West Africa into North Africa, the trans-Saharan trade and the Arab Slave Trade.

The occurrence of sickle cell trait is particularly high in Sicily where frequencies of 13% have been reported. In New York City, Sicilian Americans are second to African Americans in occurrence of Sickle cell disease.

The high frequencies of the trait have been associated with the Arab invasion of Sicily in the 7th Century during which Sudanese soldiers were recruited by the Caliphate.

Portugal is the only region in Europe where the Senegal and Bantu haplotypes are frequent. These may be associated with Portuguese naval exploits, including the Atlantic Slave Trade and the colonization of various African countries.

http://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Carleton_S._Coon

Carleton Stevens Coon (23 June 1904 – 3 June 1981) was an American physical anthropologist, Professor of Anthropology at the University of Pennsylvania, lecturer and professor at Harvard, and president of the American Association of Physical Anthropologists. [1]

After decades of research and travel, he clearly indicated Mediterranean people have a negroid tendency, which is evident in the color of their skin, the type of hair and facial features.

Mediterranean Proper (hereafter meant when the word "Mediterranean" is used alone): Short-statured, dolicho- and mesocephalic form found in Spain, Portugal, the western Mediterranean islands, and to some extent in North Africa, southern Italy, and other Mediterranean borderlands. [...] often carries a slight negroid tendency. - Carleton S. Coon, Ph.D

The accretion of a small amount of Negroid blood by the Mediterranean stock causes a frizziness of hair form; a darkening of skin color, which becomes extremely variable; a broadening of the nasal breadth; an increase in interorbital and biorbital dimensions; and often an increase in facial and nasal lengths, as well as a tendency to nasal profile convexity. Vault dimensions and body dimensions change little. - Carleton S. Coon, Ph.D

Related Links

What race are the Egyptians?
How did the Hebrews end up as slaves in Egypt? Why did they leave Canaan?
Were there any people living in Ancient Egypt before the arrival of Mediterranean farmers?
Was Egypt once a part of Ethiopia, or was Ethiopia once a part of Egypt?
Why do we call Egypt 'Egypt' instead of 'Misr'?

Who was in Egypt before the Arab and Mediterranean invaders? Where are they today since the Europeans say they were the Egyptians?

Did the Kalenjins of Kenya migrate from Egypt, or is it a coincidence that some names are similar?

In the story of Se-Osiris, we discovered Ancient Egypt interacted with Ethiopia. Which other tribes in Africa did Ancient Egypt interact with?

Which civilisation started first, Egypt or Sumer?
Why did ancient Egypt split into Upper and Lower Egypt?

L'incendie de la Grande Bibliothèque d'Alexandrie a-t-il vraiment retardé de 100 ans le progrès humain ?

Rémi Béral grand passionné d'histoire 26 avr.

Réponse originale : L'incendie de la Grande Bibliothèque d'Alexandrie a-t-il vraiment retardé les 100 ans du progrès humain ?

Non.

Première chose à comprendre : la perception du temps. En Occident le temps est perçu comme linéaire et progressif. Cependant en Chine le temps est perçu comme cyclique. Chaque société a sa propre perception du temps.

Une fois compris cela, on comprend on comprend qu'un événement ne peut retarder un progrès que dans une conception linéaire et progressive du temps.

Ceci dit, il est nécessaire de préciser deux choses.

La Bibliothèque était "morte" depuis plus d'un siècle lors de son incendie. C'est à dire qu'elle était devenue inaccessible aux étrangers, qu'elle n'avait plus qu'un petit budget qui ne suffisait même pas à l'entretenir. L'institution était complètement négligée par le pouvoir.

Profitant du déclin de la Bibliothèque d'Alexandrie, d'autres bibliothèques ont connu un fortdéveloppement en Méditerranée. C'est le cas de la bibliothèque de Pergame dont les collections étaient presque aussi importantes que celle d'Alexandrie. Beaucoup de documents de la Bibliothèque d'Alexandrie existaient en plusieurs exemplaires dans de nombreuses bibliothèques un peu partout.

Donc l'incendie de la Bibliothèque d'Alexandrie a été un désastre pour la ville. L'événement a marqué la fin d'une époque. Cependant l'impact mondial a été plutôt faible.

De nos jours, Alexandrie dispose de l'une des plus grande bibliothèque du monde : la Bibliotheca Alexandrina. Elle se veut un centre d'étude ouvert sur le monde. Elle compte une immense salle de lecture, trois musées, huit millions d'ouvrages, un centre de conservation et restauration d'ouvrages anciens, un centre de recherche, un planétarium, un centre de conférence, etc.

Questions similaires

Comment expliquer les différences de progrès technique entre les différentes civilisations, par exemple le haut niveau technologique de la Chine dans l'antiquité ou des arabes au moyen-âge mais leur dépassement par les européens au XIXème siècle ?

Pourquoi la civilisation égyptienne nous a-t-elle laissée autant d'éléments : bâtiments, poteries, arts, outils alors que la civilisation grecque moins ancienne ne semble n'avoir légué qu'un bâtiment ou deux et tout un tas de statues sans bras ?

A-t-on une idée de ce qu'il y avait dans la bibliothèque d'Alexandrie, grâce à des références dans d'autres livres par exemple ou bien pas du tout ?

Peut-on encore croire au progrès social ? Le progrès a-t-il un avenir ?
Y a-t-il vraiment eu deux humains au début de l'humanité ?
Quels sont les avantages et les inconvénients du progrès scientifique et technique ?
Qu'aurious-nous pu apprendre si la bibliothèque d'Alexandrie n'avait pas été incendiée ? Certaines technologies et certains savoirs ont-ils été oubliés ?
Que sait-on sur les siècles obscurs (7ème siècle au 13ème) ?
Quel est l'inconvénient du progrès scientifique ?
Que se passera-t-il en l'an 3000 ? Les humains existeront-ils encore ?

Kemet: A Black African Heritage
Arguing that the ancient Egyptians were Black.

· Follow Posted by Firew Afera Sat

(The Kenyan woman pictured above represents what typical ancient person from Kemet most probably looked like. Below is Seti, an Egyptian Pharoh)

1) Melanin tests: The life of Senegalese polymath Cheikh Anta Diop (1923-1986) was dedicatied to challenge Eurocentric and Arab-centric views of pre-colonial African culture. He set out to prove, and definitely proved, that the ancient civilization of Kemet did have its origins in Black Africa. He conducted melanin tests on Egyptian mummies at the museum of Man in Paris and concluded that all the ancient Egyptians there were among the Blackest of human races.

2) DNA: analysis of the paternal haplogroup of Egyptian Pharoh Tutankhamen shows that his results are most similar to modern people of the Southern Africa and the Great lakes region of Africa. It is also well known that many Egyptian mummies belong to haplogroup E1B1a, which is principally found in Western and Central Africa.

3)History: Several historians of ancient Greek wrote that ancient Egyptians had a skin that was ``melanchroes``- black. Even early Roman eyewitnesses described the average Egyptian as Black-skinned person with woolly hair.

4. Scholars agree: Numerous scholars of both African and non African origins have either wrote or implied in their writings that the ancient Egyptians were Black people. Some of these include:

Giusseppe Sergi: He believed that the Egyptians and part of the Eastern Hamitic race, which was non-Negroid yet also encompasses the Somal(Somali), Pulaar (Fulani), Tibbu (Toubou) and other pastoral people native to Africa above the equator. The Western Hamites were considered the Libyan (Berber) race.

Egyptologists of the early 20th cenury, like Wallis E. Budge and Adolf Erman, maintained the position that Ancient Egyptians were Black.
Professor Christopher Ehret`s work regarding Egyptian and broader African history sheds light on the true origin of Ancient Egyptians. Like the other scholars mentioned above, he is of a non-African origin.

Many African- centered writers, including W.E.Du Bois and Cheikh Anta Diop, argued that the origin of ancient Egyptian culture is Black Africa. We will be relying on works made by Cheikh Anta Diop for the remaining portion of this post.

5. Bones: According to Diop`s research, the skeletal and cranial morphology of ancient Egyptian mummies resemble the skeletal and cranial morphology of native Nilo-Saharan and Afro-Asiatic people of Eastern Africa.

6. Blood tests: According to Diop, blood type is also an evidence. He found that ``even after hundreds of years of intermixing with foreign invaders, the blood type of modern Egyptian mulattoes is of the same group (B) , which is the same as the populations of Western Africa on the Atlantic seaboard and not the A2 characteristic of the Caucasian race prior to any crossbreeding``.

7. Language: The ancient Kemetic language was classified as an Afro- Asiatic langauage, a language family which is native to Black Africa. A great majority of Afro-Asiatic languages are spoken in Black Africa, and it is commonly believed that Proto-Afro Asiatic, the mother of all Afro-Asiatic languages, was spoken in the Red sea hills of what is now Eastern Sudan. The native people of Eastern Sudan, like the Beja and the Afar, are the closest people we have to those early Afro-Asiatic speaking communities.

Cheikh Anta Diop also pointed out similarities between the other native toungues of Black Africa and the language of ancient Kemet. He conducted a comparative linguistic analysis on the ancient Kemetic language and found many similarities between it Wolof, his mother toungue.

The kinship between ancient Egyptian and the languages of Africa not a hypothetical but a demonstratable fact which is impossible for modern scholarship to thrust aside.`

Quelle a été la première ville planifiée au monde ?

Rémi Béral · Suivre grand passionné d'histoire Mis à jour le 1 an Très difficile à dire. Dans des périodes très anciennes il est difficile de distinguer ce qui relève de la "planification" et d'une forme d'organisation logique sociale. On retrouve cependant en Mésopotamie des villes très anciennes dotées d'organisations spatiales très claires. Un peu plus tard on trouve également quelques villes planifiées de grande ampleur. La plus spectaculaire est Akhetaton, ville fondée vers -1353 et abandonnée quelques années plus tard. Peut-être la première grande ville planifiée de l'histoire (quoi que j'ignore tout de ce qu'il se passait hors du Moyen-Orient à cette époque) puisqu'elle comprenait de grands temples, de grands palais et 20 000 habitants 4 ans après sa fondation. Le cœur de la ville s'étendant sur 3 km mais c'est une vallée entière qui fut occupée, cernée par des nécropoles et des stèles frontières.

AKHETATON
TELL EL AMARNA
N
GRAND PALAIS ROYAL

AKHETATON
Tell el-Amarna
Plan du palais Nord

Portier
CHAMBRES
Salle à manger
Salle de réception
AKETHATON - Tell el-Amarna
Maison du vizir Nakht

Plus ancienne on trouve par exemple la ville de Sesostris II vers -1880, probablement construite pour le chantier de la pyramide.

Si on remonte encore le temps, l'organisation du site de Gizeh obéit déjà à une certaine logique. Aujourd'hui les archéologues sont en train de mettre à jour des vestiges d'habitations ayant probablement accueillit une partie de la main d'œuvre du chantier.

Encore plus ancienne, la ville de Mari au Levant montre déjà une volonté d'organisation de l'espace et de maîtrise de l'urbanisme il y a 5000 ans. La ville sera par la suite agrandie par une deuxième enceinte.

Sur des périodes aussi anciennes il devient difficile de parler de planification urbaine. Quelques tracés sont fixés (une enceinte ronde, une place centrale et quelques porte) mais on laisse ensuite la ville se construire et se développer toute seule. On peut donc, au mieux, parler d'intentions urbaine je pense, la planification relevant d'un réel contrôle de l'urbanisme.

Questions similaires

Que serait-il arrivé si Napoléon Bonaparte avait été général de France pendant la Seconde Guerre mondiale ?

Napoléon a-t-il déjà été physiquement impliqué dans des combats au cours de ses guerres napoléoniennes ?

Qu'est-il arrivé au fils de Napoléon Bonaparte ?
Y avait-il des soldats noirs dans l'armée de Napoléon Bonaparte ?
Pourquoi Napoléon Bonaparte a-t-il fait la guerre au reste de l'Europe ?

Pourquoi Napoléon est-il vu comme une figure positive en France alors qu’il a pillé l’Europe?

Est-il vrai que les soldats allemands ont trouvé de la nourriture fraîche et des gâteaux laissés par les soldats de l'armée américaine et qu'ils ont réalisé qu'ils étaient confrontés à une machine de guerre économique écrasante ?

Pourquoi les Français n'ont-ils pas honte de Napoléon Bonaparte, comme les Allemands pour Hitler ?

Pourquoi le maréchal Ney a été l'un des seuls maréchaux de Napoléon à être fusillé ?
En quoi Napoléon Bonaparte pourrait-il inspirer l'armée Française d'aujourd'hui ?

Quelle est la plus vieille capitale du monde ?
Quelle est la plus ancienne ville du monde qui existe encore aujourd'hui ?
Quelle ville du monde est la plus proche d'une ville du futur ?
Quelle est la plus vieille ville du monde ?
Quelle est la plus belle ville du monde selon vous ?
Quelle est la ville la mieux planifiée au monde ?
Quelles sont les plus grandes villes du monde ?
Quelle est la plus vieille ville du monde habitée en permanence ?
Quelle est la ville la plus propre du monde ?
Quelle ville possède l'infrastructure la plus avancée au monde ?

Let’s Discuss Ancient and Medieval Africa

Posted by

Alton Allen 1h

Wandering Bes: Emissary of Ancient BaTwa Pygmy Philosophy and Lore Within Dynastic Egyptian and Bronze/Iron Age Cultures Update 4.6.22 by Judith Mann

Moira Judith Mann

255 Views30 Pages

1 File

Ancient Egyptian Religion, Ancient Mediterranean Religions, Ritual and Performance (Egyptology), Funerary Belief (Egyptology), Cults for Egyptian gods in the Aegean and Italy, Early Bronze Age (Archaeology), Iron Age (Archaeology), Egypt and Canaan, Ancient Egyptian Magic, Ancient Egyptian Magical Texts, Carthage (History), archaeology of Sardinia in phoenician age, Benin, Phoenician and Punic Studies, Bushmen, Ancient Canaanite Religion, Ancient African history, Ritual Practices, Phoenician Punic Religion, pygmy mythology

Abstract

Wandering Bes: Emissary of Ancient Pygmy Philosophy and Lore Within Dynastic Egyptian and Bronze/Iron Age Cultures Update 4.6.22 by

Judith Mann

© 2022 Judith Mann All Rights Reserved

This update of 4.6.22 is an interpretation of symbols and glyphs found on 1st Dynasty BCE to 18th Century CE artifacts, are a means of tracing the transformational journeys of Bes, the Egypto-Nubian deity. The wanderings, which began in Nubia and Upper Egypt, continued north up the Nile into teeming markets and inns of port cities connected to the sea routes of the Mediterranean and Aegean. Reverence for ancestral Pygmies and their beliefs survived in the West African empire of Benin as evidenced by depictions of Pygmies on the18th centuryCE bronze tablets, full circle from Pygmy depictions on the 1st Dynasty Narmer Palette.

Beliefs based upon ancient Pygmy philosophy and tenets were incorporated into Bes as a divine representative. These views were spread by means of reciprocal gift systems, trade, migration and wars. The growing need for an accessible protector, healer and divine intermediary, spanning the distance from the Levant to the western Mediterranean was met by Bes, binding diverse communities into a common front against the external forces of disease and death.

As successive wanderings took place mostly in times of transition and upheaval, cultural contact between dissimilar populations malleably transformed images, names and myths associated with Bes and Pygmy ancestors. These complex results are comprehensively examined in this paper as prototypes of successful transition into a new era.

This update of 4.6.22, is an interpretation of symbols and glyphs found on 1st Dynasty BCE to 18th Century CE artifacts, are a means of tracing the transformational journeys of Bes, the Egypto-Nubian deity. The wanderings, which began in Nubia and Upper Egypt, continued north up the Nile into teeming markets and inns of port cities connected to the sea routes of the Mediterranean and Aegean.

Wandering Bes: Emissary of Ancient Pygmy Philosophy and LoreWithin Dynastic Egyptian and Bronze/Iron Age Cultures Update 4.6.22by Judith Mann

© 2022 Judith Mann All Rights Reserve.

2

Pygmies in Egypt

Fig 1 Detail of Victorious Hunting Procession on 1st Dynasty Narmer Palette

A connection to very ancient times when Egypt was ruled by Pygmies who still retained direct communication with the gods, came to light with excavation of the Narmer Palette, circa 3200 BCE, from the temple of in Hierakonpolis, an early First Dynasty capital. Such palettes were used in temple ceremonies to grind or mix cosmetics for application on images of deities. The monumental scenes incised on both sides of the siltstone implement were considered the first accounts of actual historical events until fairly recently, when they came to be regarded as metaphorical as well.

Horus

On the obverse side of the palette is a procession headed by four standard bearers announcing the gods, Ahu the giant forest cat, Anubis the dog, and the two falcons of Horus protecting

Upper and Lower Egypt mounted on axes representing spiritual judgement. I am aware of the visual hierarchy in which a large figure such as the Pharaoh, represents power and smaller figures, his subjects. But in this instance, let us stretch the rule. My interpretation is that the four small standard bearers, because they are depicted as even smaller than the two servants who fit into the hierarchy, are actually Efe Pygmies, intermediaries between humankind and the divine, master huntsmen whose presence adds considerable prestige to the victory procession. Read on the spiritual level, as would have been the case in First Dynasty times, we can surmise that Pygmies lead the Pharaoh to a cosmic victory over chaos. How Egyptologist consistently ignore such a view is beyond my grasp when the ideograms speakers do clearly.

Fig 2 Narmer Palette Victory Procession of Order Over Chaos 3200 BCE

In myth, the first human was Efe the primal ancestor, who emerged at the source of the White Nile River, a virtual 'Garden of Eden' in the Rwenzori Mountains on the border of Uganda and the Congo.2 His direct descendents, Efe Pygmies, were present in the Nile Valley from late Paleolithic times, attested to by carbon-dated pygmy remains from 14,000 to 12,000 BCE.3 Linked to the Narmer Palette is a glyph fragment found in the 25th century BCE solar temple of Userkaf, Abu Gurab, reveals the standard bearers to be the ‘Followers-of-Horus, the gods, the souls of Pe’4 ... little men from the land of trees and spirits at the foot of the Mountains of the Moon and known as 'Efe'.”.5

The establishment of order, Ma’at, over chaos, Isfet, is a fundamental ideological element in the Egyptian concept of the cosmos, but not necessarily mutually exclusive. It depends upon the context. The imagery of the Narmer Palette attests to a careful balance of order and chaos, particularly the full scene on the upper tier of its front side. Here, the Pharaoh representing order, wears carefully folded netting from his waist, designed to catch foreign enemies who symbolize cosmic chaos. My perception is that the Efe Pygmy originated this need for order, implied by their leading the procession triumphantly towards neatly laid out decapitated bodies. The foes were not only executed, but rendered completely impotent, their severed penises placed in an orderly fashion atop their detached heads. Horus, esteemed by the Pygmy, hovers over the bodies, along with the Sun god Ra-Amun's boat.

Mann, Judith Linking Ancient Pygmy Cosmology pg 7 Linking Ancient Pygmy Cosmology to Enduring Myths, Symbols and Rituals of Africa, Australia and The Americas 2017 Toth, Gabor Narmer Palette http://egypt-grammar.rutgers.edu/Artifacts/Narmer%20Palette.pdf 2013

Anon, Abu Gorab Sun Temple Abu Gorab - Sun Temples 2017 Sullivan, Brenda Spirit of the Rocks pg 91 Human & Rousseau 1995

How did the Efe Pygmies who were so visible in the 1st Dynasty, vanish entirely from Egypt by the 6th Dynasty? We can look to several possibilities including expanding agricultural development based on cultivating wheat to meet the demands of feeding the gods bread and beer in Old Kingdom funeral rites.6 These popular rituals eliminated space conducive to the nomadic lifestyle of the Pygmies as the length of the Nile River's fertile banks became dedicated to farming. Add a series of drought-based famines, and a return to the depths of central Congo's great forest for survival is inevitable.

The original name for the Efe in ancient Egyptian was Deneg, which translates as 'Peoples of the Forest'.7 An intricately carved 4th century BCE Phoenician carnelian pays homage to the lifestyle of the equatorial Efe hunter. Here, in the guise of Bes, he shoulders a gazelle with bound legs, accompanied by Anubis in hound form. His own limbs resemble those of a pygmy not a dwarf, short but straight and strongly muscled, suitable for sustained long distance running. Because of their rugged legs, Pygmy hunting strategy is to engage in 'persistence hunting'. The danger of a prolonged chase is averted through invocations for divine aid.8 Their prey, usually a gazelle or a deer is pursued by many hunters until it stops exhausted or collapses from overheating. The hunt lasts for hours and usually ends successfully. 9

In traditional Pygmy society, three types of rituals are performed by gender, male, female and mixed, prior to the actual hunt. As women are considered equals in Pygmy society, their rituals hold weight, especially those considered synonymous with hunting luck. Through polyphonic songs, the women can please the forest and even call in the animals in preparation for a hunt, usually at the appearance of a new moon.

Male hunting rituals focus on spiritually bonding with the prey, 'knowing' the choices an animal would make when pursued. Both involve collective ability to see the moving prey in over-view, mentally deconstruct the circumstances, and then put it back together again. The mixed gender ceremony involves prolonged female polyphonic singing, male trance dancing, and the use of fire to invoke visions of tracking routes.

Beyond hunting opportunities, the forest offered vast resources for Pygmies to heal themselves and others. Pygmies, as guardians of sacred herbs since Paleolithic times, observed nature in order to gain knowledge. They then make practical use of this understanding for survival and well-being, following ancestral recipes for decoctions, herbal teas, scarification powders and nasal injections extracted from tree barks, roots and leaves.

By the 6th Dynasty, Pygmies were scarce enough in Egypt for the eight-year-old Pharaoh, Pepi II Nefrikareas to send an expedition from Elephantine Island into the vast equatorial forests of central Congo, which returned with a carefully guarded Efe Pygmy who was dedicated to sacred dance.10 Because he was still a child, Pepi II was probably guided by advisors and his knowledge of the sentiments and pyramid text of his father, Pharaoh Pepi I to mount the expedition. The text declared that, "He who is between the thighs of Nut is the Pygmy who danceth like the god and who pleaseth the heart of the god before his great throne." Nut was the goddess of heaven and the mother of Osiris.11 This was an attempt to revive sacrosanct Pygmy participation in an Egyptian temple as a communication bridge between gods and humans through the repetitive movements of trance dance.

Fig 4 Dancing Pygmies Ivory Board Circa 1950-1885 BCE

That Pepi II had some limited success in achieving his goal, is evident in a First Intermediate Period ivory board with realistic pygmy figures that could simulate their devotional dance by pulling strings fastened around their bases. Note that the three basically unclothed pygmies wear bands in contact with their heart chakras. In such instances, only one side of an 'X' is needed to represent cosmic harmony.

Fig 5 Ba Twa Pygmy Females Wearing 'X' Heart Chakra Symbol In Menarcheal Rite

The 'X' crosses as ceremonially worn by Ba Twa females in a menarcheal rite, are symbolic of liminal forces or elements coming together to create a unified whole.

Two side-by-side 'X' ideograms represent Khui, the mythical home island of the Twa on this Middle Kingdom cartouche. In addition, the hieroglyph connotes Fig 6 Khui Cartouche Pygmy egalitarian male-female concepts as well as integration of Upper and Lower Egypt at Elephantine, the sacred Nile island.

https://d1wqtxts1xzle7.cloudfront.net/83336099/bes_binarupdate_4.6.22-libre.pdf?1649270478=&response-content-disposition=attachment%3B+filename%3DWandering_Bes_Emissary_of_Ancient_BaTwa.pdf&Expires=1651739771&Signature=PIoDqLF7yVx-7TzW9n-W6vxZHS6a-~fP1W7c4deLwoiGX5DP1EN2CwAogS0wdY7u3Vc3qLoCpMUJ~O1umwyCu58jZdbY---Z5vxiZapC098f6xsu1~8k0RrHSJ-EOcX03WC0ibLK6I8HDiQIzrcOtlvgzXPW4mx3tnCexAT8UTx~YhLg~oEH8CkPGeQJ9xoIi8NlJ3-ThYuRWPF-WKQViAqiln8BYmjWtrcL8l-oRBdPjM3WVNqznTHXeIOuiaWlORsFUSUNnDXsk6iHNz3Av4qOEVU~qyru3TajxSoc9oef~bF2Nh7zppE~NIl~qSbLxTbBuZxEbbmGxUvfU0zW~A__&Key-Pair-Id=APKAJLOHF5GGSLRBV4ZA

👆 □□ Pls go here for more fascinating read.

News Nigeria
The hands of Ramses IV after 3171 Years!!!

Posted by Aniekpeno Ekong

AFRIKAN BLOOD HAND

It is really ridiculous how many people join these groups just to tell Black people that we have 0 connections to ancient Egypt?

Well the country of Egypt was created in 1953.

We are talking about Kemet the name colonizers refuse to use if you have noticed??

The cultural continuity of Africa can not be ignored or denied!

Any pictures shown of Black or dark complexion Africans, naysayers just slap the label Nubian on them while showing a depiction of a bound African saying that represents “Black people” is racist!

I keep asking people what is the indigenous names of these light complexion Egyptians not one person can answer!!

We know the truth and ready to defend it !!

WE GOT THESE FASCIST NAZI NEO COLONIZERS joining our PAGE to say the people of the Nile valley Kemet were not “Black AfriKans BLOOD” they just liked to paint themselves Black or Brown and wear “Afro wigs” in 100 degree weather in Africa for no reason …

We refuse to allow THESE WORTHLESS FASCIST NAZI NEO COLONIZERS to dumb SOME OF US down!

What do people think of the Egyptian government doing DNA testing on Egyptian mummies to connect modern Egyptians with Ancient Egyptians? It has been proven already that modern Egyptians are the only descendants of the Ancient Egyptians.

Jonathan Buttall

Former Retired Professional in Behavioral Health Field 1y

While I didn’t ask this question, I noticed it was changed to something totally unrelated. So I reposted the actual question which relates to Egypt.

I fully support the studies of Egyptian origins and past cultures. DNA studies give us many answers as to the origins of the very ancient and uber-famous country.

There is a mistake in the question, however. The last sentence implies there is only one ethnic group among Egyptians, which is certainly not at all true. I have traveled thru Egypt with the help of a native Egyptian who was also a professional Egyptologist. There are FOUR main ethnic groups and heritages in Egypt and my wife and I were exposed to all of these.

Indigenous (original) Egyptians; They are a unique race, although today they speak Arabic. They created the Pyramids, the famous tombs and other great artifacts and ancient cities, all of which are on display. They live in Upper Egypt (South Egypt, the Nile moves North) and occupy the East bank of Aswan. They have very dark skin, but with unique facial features that are very different from Sub Saharan Africans.

The majority population are Arabic, who came at a later time. Many call themselves “Mediterranean” as many or most have ancestors from West Asia and even some Europeans too. They live in Lower Egypt (North Egypt), where most of the population lives.

(note; this Mediterranean Arabic man is the Egyptologist I mentioned here. This is the only photo on this answer that I took, in 2007).

Then there are the Nubians, a very ancient culture (5000–7000 years old) who originated in what is now Northern Sudan. They are Black and have very different facial features from Sub Sarahan Africans, almost like those old Greek Statues in Museums, but with a different culture and color. My wife and I (mixed marriage) thought they were the most handsome people we've ever seen. NOTE; they conquered Egypt in ancient times and became the 25th Dynasty for four generations. The West Bank of the Nile is where those who stayed in Egypt have their own part city, technically part of Aswan. And that city is actually kind of modern. We bought two musical instruments from one of them.

And another very ancient people are the Arabic Bedouins, who (in Egypt) live in rural desert areas for the most part. In Jordan, they mostly live in cities and run the government there.

Related Links

It has been proven already that modern Egyptians are the only descendants of the Ancient Egyptians. Why do some people with no connection to Egypt are trying to appropriate Egyptian history instead of focusing on their own countries and people?

DNA from ancient Egyptians shows they are related to modern Egyptians, so why do people try so hard to prove otherwise?

Do modern Egyptians accept that they are Arabs and not descendants of the ancient Egyptians?

If the Egyptians portrayed themselves as brown and red, how come DNA tests show that they were related to Europeans?

Why do some people claim that modern Egyptians are not the descendants of ancient Egyptians?

DNA testing on Egyptian mummies suggest that the Ancient Egyptians were Middle Eastern and modern Egyptians are the closest genetically to them. Where did the ancient Egyptians originate from?

Are the DNA results of ancient Egyptian royal mummies from DNA Tribes and DNA Consultants credible?

Why are there few DNA tests on mummies in upper Egypt (southern)? Is it due to possibly bias or fear of discovering something about Ancient Egyptian origins?

When was the first Egyptian mummy discovered? How come the Egyptians are not aware of mummies hidden in the structures?

Are there any living modern descendants of the ancient Egyptians?

Why was the continent of Africa named after Tunisia and not Egypt, which was a much greater civilization?

Adam Ramzy Lives in Cairo Updated 1y

Egypt was never considered as a part of Africa by the ancients Egyptians, Persians, Greeks & Romans. Egypt was supposed to be in Asia and Africa is supposed to begin west after the Oasis of Siwa.

The term Africa didn't exist until the Roman Empire. The name Africa came into use through the Romans.

The Romans, who named “Africa” to the opposite side of the Mediterranean, after a Berber tribe living in the Carthage area (now modern-day Tunisia).

Egypt was first assigned to Africa by the geographer Ptolemy (85–165 AD), who accepted Alexandria as prime Meridian and made the Isthmus of Suez and the Red Sea the boundary between Asia and Africa.

Egypt has always been a transcontinental country, a bridge between Asia and Africa. And the crossing link between Africa, Asia, and Europe.

The populations of North Africa lived for thousands of years was so little interactions between them and the populations south of the Sahara desert.

In Arabic, Maghreb means west. Only two countries were Maghreb Morocco and Algeria, Tunisia was Ifriqya (Africa).

Egypt has a long history with the Middle East/Near East, the Maghreb has a long history with western Europe.

Egypt was Greek, the Maghreb was Latin.

Egypt was east of the roman empire and Maghreb was west of the roman empire.

Cultural reference of Egypt is Damascus, Baghdad, and Cairo. Maghreb's cultural reference is Al Andalus.

Egypt was/is Coptic, the Maghreb was catholic.

STEPHEN J. DAVIS

THE EARLY COPTIC PAPACY

THE EGYPTIAN CHURCH AND ITS LEADERSHIP IN LATE ANTIQUITY

AUC PRESS

Egypt is Sunni/chafeite like the Middle East with Al Azhar in Cairo, the Maghreb is Sunni malekite/Sufi with Zitouna, Tunis, Tachfinya, Tlemcen, Quaraouine, Fes, Cordoba, Granada, and Kairouan.

Umayyad, Abbasids, Fatimides, Ayyoubides, and Mamluks united Egypt with Syria when Almoravids and Almohads united Al Andalus with Morocco, Algeria, and Tunisia.

When the French invaded North Africa it became common to call North Africa composed of Morocco, Algeria, and Tunisia (Maghrib).

These are the populations of North Africa:

(Berbers/Amazighes are considered North African)

(Egyptians are considered both Middle Eastern and North African)

(Berbers/Amazighes are considered North African)

(Egyptians are considered both Middle Eastern and North African)

Egypt was never considered as a part of Africa by the ancients Egyptians, Persians, Greeks & Romans. Egypt was supposed to be in Asia and Africa is supposed to begin west after the Oasis of Siwa.

The term Africa didn't exist until the Roman Empire. The name Africa came into use through the Romans.

The Romans, who named "Africa" to the opposite side of the Mediterranean, after a Berber tribe living in the Carthage area (now modern-day Tunisia).

Egypt was first assigned to Africa by the geographer Ptolemy (85–165 AD), who accepted Alexandria as prime Meridian and made the Isthmus of Suez and the Red Sea the boundary between Asia and Africa.

Egypt has always been a transcontinental country, a bridge between Asia and Africa. And the crossing link between Africa, Asia, and Europe.

The populations of North Africa lived for thousands of years was so little interactions between them and the populations south of the Sahara desert.

In Arabic, Maghreb means west. Only two countries were Maghreb Morocco and Algeria, Tunisia was Ifriqya (Africa).

Egypt has a long history with the Middle East/Near East, the Maghreb has a long history with western Europe.

Egypt was Greek, the Maghreb was Latin.

Egypt was east of the roman empire and Maghreb was west of the roman empire.

Cultural reference of Egypt is Damascus, Baghdad, and Cairo. Maghreb's cultural reference is Al Andalus.

Egypt was/is Coptic, the Maghreb was catholic.

STEPHEN J. DAVIS

THE EARLY COPTIC PAPACY

THE EGYPTIAN CHURCH AND ITS LEADERSHIP IN LATE ANTIQUITY

AUC PRESS

Egypt is Sunni/chafeite like the Middle East with Al Azhar in Cairo, the Maghreb is Sunni malekite/Sufi with Zitouna, Tunis, Tachfinya, Tlemcen, Quaraouine, Fes, Cordoba, Granada, and Kairouan.

Umayyad, Abbasids, Fatimides, Ayyoubides, and Mamluks united Egypt with Syria when Almoravids and Almohads united Al Andalus with Morocco, Algeria, and Tunisia.

When the French invaded North Africa it became common to call North Africa composed of Morocco, Algeria, and Tunisia (Maghrib).

These are the populations of North Africa:

(Berbers/Amazighes are considered North African)

(Egyptians are considered both Middle Eastern and North African)

(Berbers/Amazighes are considered North African)

(Egyptians are considered both Middle Eastern and North African)

Why is ancient Egypt considered the first civilization, when the Sumerian city states arose around the same time?

Matt Riggsby MA Archaeological Studies, Boston University Mar 4

It is not, in academic circles. It's widely recognized that Mesopotamia developed civilization first, and it's tolerably well established that civilization arose in Peru appeared around the same time. Egypt is tied for third with the Indus valley a couple of centuries later (with some nationalist carping around details).

That said, Egyptian civilization was considered either the first or at least one of the first some decades ago. We've got much better archaeological dating techniques and much more evidence now, which has allowed us to sort things out better. But popular understanding has lagged well behind scholarly consensus, so the idea of Egypt as the first persists.

Related Links

Prior to the Sumerians which human civilization was there? Is there any evidence that 'civilization' even existed then and what could have been the population density of humans in different parts of the earth within that range of time?

Chinese civilization is ancient, but why is it considered to be the oldest living civilization, whereas other ancient civilizations, such as Egypt and Rome are not?

What happened to the ancient powerhouse civilizations like Egypt? How did they get to be so far advanced compared to other civilizations of that era and how were other civilizations able to surpass them if they had such a big headstart?

Why is 3100 BCE considered the beginning of civilization in Egypt? Cities existed before the unification of upper and lower Egypt, and Sumer is considered civilized despite being independent city states. Should Egypt be considered older than we say?

Which was the first civilization in Africa, Egypt or Ethiopia?

Why is the Ancient Egyptian civilization vastly superior, more recognizable and highly influential over Westerners by and large than the Mesopotamian civilization in particular?

How were Ancient Egypt and Nubian civilization different even though they lived in the same region?

Why is the Indus Valley Civilization not considered as significant as the Egyptian and Mesopotamian Civilizations?

Why is the beginning of Egyptian civilization considered around 3200 BCE, even though there were upper & lower Egypt, they had trades and culture?

Which civilization was greater: Ancient Greece or Ancient Egypt?

Why is ancient Egypt considered the first civilization, when the Sumerian city states arose around the same time?

Matt Riggsby MA Archaeological Studies, Boston University Mar 4

It is not, in academic circles. It’s widely recognized that Mesopotamia developed civilization first, and it’s tolerably well established that civilization arose in Peru appeared around the same time. Egypt is tied for third with the Indus valley a couple of centuries later (with some nationalist carping around details).

That said, Egyptian civilization was considered either the first or at least one of the first some decades ago. We've got much better archaeological dating techniques and much more evidence now, which has allowed us to sort things out better. But popular understanding has lagged well behind scholarly consensus, so the idea of Egypt as the first persists.

Related Links

Prior to the Sumerians which human civilization was there? Is there any evidence that 'civilization' even existed then and what could have been the population density of humans in different parts of the earth within that range of time?

Chinese civilization is ancient, but why is it considered to be the oldest living civilization, whereas other ancient civilizations, such as Egypt and Rome are not?

What happened to the ancient powerhouse civilizations like Egypt? How did they get to be so far advanced compared to other civilizations of that era and how were other civilizations able to surpass them if they had such a big headstart?

Why is 3100 BCE considered the beginning of civilization in Egypt? Cities existed before the unification of upper and lower Egypt, and Sumer is considered civilized despite being independent city states. Should Egypt be considered older than we say?

Which was the first civilization in Africa, Egypt or Ethiopia?

Why is the Ancient Egyptian civilization vastly superior, more recognizable and highly influential over Westerners by and large than the Mesopotamian civilization in particular?

How were Ancient Egypt and Nubian civilization different even though they lived in the same region?

Why is the Indus Valley Civilization not considered as significant as the Egyptian and Mesopotamian Civilizations?

Why is the beginning of Egyptian civilization considered around 3200 BCE, even though there were upper & lower Egypt, they had trades and culture?

Which civilization was greater: Ancient Greece or Ancient Egypt?

Related Answer

What do Arabs think about Afrocentrics claiming the original Arabs were black?

мясник бизнесмен, Read and Studied the history and culture of Iraq Answered May 3, 2021

I do not respect them and because of them I lost a lot of my sympathy for black Africans . But most Afrocentrics are black Americans who desperately trying to steal other people's history and culture , They are just as good at claiming other peoples ’civilizations but so bad at having their own . They like to believe that the black Arabs in Gulf countries are the original Arabs when they are actually descendants of black African slaves who were brought by the Arabs .

This how black people and Arabs were portraited by the Iraqi painter Yahya ibn Mahmud al-Wasiti

A 13th-century book illustration produced in Baghdad by al-Wasiti showing a slave-market in the town of Zabid in Yemen.

Related Links

How do Arab Muslims view black Muslims or black people?
Why do North African countries not consider themselves as Africans but as Arabs?
Are Arabs racist against Africans?
Why is there so much anti-black racism in the Arab world?
Are North African people Arabs?
Were the original Arabs of Arabia "Black-African"?
Are there any black Arabs?
Do black Africans consider North Africans to be legitimate Africans?
Do Arabs have African ancestry?
Why do Afrocentrics want to claim the original Arabs were black and modern?

Why do Egyptians identify themselves as Arabs and forget all of their ancient traditions? What did Egyptians know about their glorious history before modern archeologists and historians wrote down history books on Egypt?

Anthony M Anderson

History Fan! Apr 3

Some do identity themselves as arabs due to the fact that they speak arabic and that they're muslim.

During nasser's rule, he promoted pan arabism and arab nationalism in egypt, this was particularly popular among the muslim population. The copts didn't consider themselves as arabs due to the fact that they're descendants of ancient egyptians. At that time, egyptians in the arab world were identified as arabs.

However, the majority of modern day egyptians aren't arabs but definitely there north african according to DNA studies

17% of egyptians are arabs actually. Mainly there are traditions from the ancient times which are still rarely seen in modern day Egypt

Are there any traditions existing in modern Egypt that are directly descended from ancient Egyptian traditions?

Anthony M Anderson · Mar 20

Yes! Actually, the tradition of cats in egypt during the ancient times still survives to this day

StackPath

Please Enable Cookies dailynewsegypt.com is using a security service for protection against online attacks. The service requires full cookie support in order to view this website. Please enable cookies on your browser and try again. Please Enable JavaScript dailynewsegypt.com is using a security service for protection against online attacks. The service requires full JavaScript support in order to view this website. Please enable JavaScript on your browser and try again.

dailynewsegypt.com is using a security service for protection against online attacks. This process is automatic. You will be redirected once the validation is complete.

https://dailynewsegypt.com/2020/02/19/young-couple-tie-the-knot-on-pharaonic-wedding-ceremony-rituals/

أهل مصر زمان
Ahl.Misr.Zamaan

Egyptians who knew about their history before it was written down by historians and discovered by archaeologists knew that they built the pyramids and knew about the pharaohnic rule.

Related Links

Are modern-day Egyptians proud of their ancient Pharaoh era heritage or do they feel no connection to their past?

Have Egyptian people lost their connection with their original culture and identity due to the Arabization and Islamization of Egypt?

Why is Egypt a Muslim country when it had its own ancient civilization?
What do Egyptians think about their pre-Islamic history and culture?
How do modern Egyptians feel about Ancient Egyptian history?
Why has Egypt achieved nothing since it got Islamized?

Are current Egyptians the Ancient Egyptians, if not then where are they and who are the people which live in Egypt today?

How do Egyptians feel about their (ancient) history?
What race occupied Egypt before the invasion of the Arabs/Persians?
Why are Egyptians only 17% Arab (probably even less)? Who are they mixed with?

Why were the pyramids at Giza not excavated long before the 1800s by the Egyptians themselves? These enormous monuments are in their country yet remain untouched for centuries.

Matt Riggsby MA Archaeological Studies, Boston University Nov 9

They were, sort of.

In the 1190s, there was an attempt to dismantle the pyramid of Menkaure, the smallest of the three at Giza, in search of treasure believed to be hidden under it. It did not go well. While workers left a gash in the pyramid visible to this day, they soon realized that it would be as difficult to take the pyramid apart as it was to build it and so abandoned the project.

And, of course, nobody these days is trying to excavate the pyramids, either, both because of the effort involved and because there's no good reason to take them apart in the first place. The pyramids are beloved, respected monuments and excavating them means destroying them. And for what? You'd be hard pressed to find somebody who thinks there might be anything worth digging up under the pyramids, let alone something so important that it justifies destroying them. So, as they have been for centuries, they're visited and examined through non-destructive mean (but most definitely not untouched; they've been a tourist attraction since antiquity), but there's no reason to excavate.

Related Links

Were the Giza pyramids always visible, or were they once buried under the sand?

How did the Egyptians achieve the remarkable precision and accuracy they did in building the pyramids?

Why did ancient Egypt build pyramids in their cities?

What do the interlocking stones in the ancient ruins of some structures at the pyramids of Giza or the Incas say about the technology of the ancient world after Noah's flood?

If the ancient Egyptian pyramids were built before the world wide flood, could they have been constructed by the descendants of Cain who built the first city?

Why haven't we excavated the Giza pyramids?
Why are we told that the pyramids of Giza are graves?
Why did the Egyptians stop building pyramids?

Why hasn't The Great Pyramid of Giza ever been restored and maintained to reflect its original shining glory?

How much of the tops of the largest pyramids in Giza were gold-plated, just the pyramids

Jusqu'à quel point Israël était-il proche d'utiliser l'arme atomique pendant la guerre du Kippour et quelles en auraient été les retombées politiques ?

Alexandre Roswilo · Suivre Précédent lieu : Afrique (1975–2019) Mis à jour le 3 ans De manière dissuasive et c’est tout .
Je ne pense pas qu'Israël aurait atteint cet extrême : Trop , Trop dangereux !

Dans tout cours de géostratégie , on rappele toujours que l’usage de l’arme nucléaire est avant tout : “dissuasive” .

[1]

Lorsqu’on observe le cheminement des évènements de la guerre du Yom Kippour , on comprend vite que les enjeux étaient ailleurs et on est surpris de constater que chacun a eu sa dose de victoires mais aussi de déconvenues .

Beaucoup veulent faire du Yom Kippour un bis repetita de la guerre des six-jours ; c’est faux !

Beaucoup d’autres veulent faire croire qu’Israël était au bord de l’extinction ; c’est aussi faux !

Pourquoi ?

I-Avant tout , il faut préciser que l’offensive a été ménée sur deux fronts :

-le Sinai[2] par les forces égyptiennes ;

-le plateau du Golan[3] par les forces syriennes .

[4]

II- Le déroulement des opérations au départ , a été surprenant :

1-Les Égyptiens :

A la stupeur générale , cette attaque a totalement surpris les responsables Israéliens . Premièrement , elle a lieu le 6 octobre , le jour de la fête juive du Yom Kippour et pendant le Ramadan. C'est un des facteurs importants car les Juifs jeûnent durant la journée et s'abstiennent d'utiliser le feu ou l'électricité (ce qui veut dire que les transports sont à l'arrêt). De plus, une grande partie de l'armée israélienne est démobilisée.

[5]

Ensuite , l’offensive est déclenchée le samedi 6 octobre 1973 à 13 h 00. Au soir , les troupes égyptiennes ont réussi magistralement à traverser le canal de Suez defendue par la puissante ligne Bar-Levet[6] et fixer une tête de pont qui atteindra ensuite 15 km dans le Sinai . Pire la couverture anti-aérienne assurée par les missiles sol-air(fusées antiaériennes de type SAM 2, 3 et 6) [7] ainsi que les canons antiaériens , ont brisé les tentatives de contre-attaque de l’armée de l’air israélienne brisant sur le coup son mythe de toute puissance issue de la guerre de six jours obtenue 1967 .

[8]

Plus catastrophique , les contre-attaque lancées par les blindés israéliens furent stoppées net grâce à l'usage massif de missiles anti-chars (fusées SAGGER[9] et lance-roquettes RPG 7[10]) par l'infanterie égyptienne . En peu de mots, les Égyptiens maitrisaient leur position et les Israéliens étaient à la peine pour contre-attaquer .

[11]

2-Les Syriens :

Sur le plateau du Golan , les Syriens ont lancé aussi une offensive violente et surprise le même jour mais ils ont eu moins de chance que les Égyptiens :

*Les conditions géographiques leur ont fait moins profiter des armes anti-chars fournis par les Soviétiques.

*Les renforts israéliens sont arrivés plus tôt que prévus en 15 heures et non en un jour comme les Syriens l'avaient prévu.

*Le système anti-aérien adopté dans le Sinaï a rapidement été mis à mal par les percées de l'infanterie israélienne dans le cas syrien .

[12]

Le 8 octobre , la situation était donc l’inverse de celle du Sinaï . Les Israéliens étaient donc sur l’offensive . Pire le 14 octobre, ils étaient à 40 km de Damas.

[13]

III-Le déroulement des opérations dès cet instant à de nouveau prie une autre tournure :

1-Les Égyptiens :

Les troupes syriennes en débandades , Sadate s'est retrouvé dans un dilemme . Ses alliés syriens pour souffler , lui ont supplié de pousser son avantage dans le Sinaï en poursuivant son offensive . Mais il ne faut pas être naïf pour comprendre que hors de la protection des missiles SA-7 et compagnie , les troupes égyptiennes étaient vulnérables face la puissance de feu combinée des avions et des chars israéliens .C’est ce que d’ailleurs l'état-major égyptien a rappelé à Sadate de manière alarmée . Mais Sadate , était le dos mur et a cédé à la décision politique et non-profiter de sa clairvoyance militaire . L'offensive égyptienne a donc été lancé dès le 11 octobre . Elle fut marquée par la plus grande bataille de blindées après celle de koursk de 1943 , 400 chars égyptiens attaquèrent 800 chars israéliens en position défensive soutenue par la force aérienne, les Israéliens détruisirent 250 chars égyptiens durant celle-ci et rapidement ont repris l'avantage. Mieux, ils ont lancé une contre attaque du 15 octobre au 17 octobre .

[14]

2-Les Syriens :

Les Troupes israéliennes étant à 40 km de Damas, les Syriens étaient dans une situation critique . Mais rapidement d'autres pays arabes envoyèrent des troupes . La Jordanie lança à son tour une offensive sur les positions israéliennes . L'Irak même le Maroc , l'Algérie et le Soudan envoyèrent des hommes . Les Soviétiques balancèrent plus de matériel . En quelques jours , les Israéliens avaient été contenus sur le plateau du Golan et adoptèrent une tactique défensive .

[15]

Donc à ce stade les troupes israéliennes réussissent à traverser le canal et s'infiltrent en Égypte mieux se retrouvent rapidement à 101 kilomètres de la capitale égyptienne Le Caire. Mais elles restent sur une position défensive sur le plateau du Golan . D'où le dilemme sur la suite des opérations alors que Soviétiques et les États arabes préparent une offensive d'envergure dans le Golan. C'est en ce moment que les deux grands belligérants , les États-Unis et l'URSS à travers l'ONU imposèrent rapidement un cessez-le-feu le 22 octobre 1973 pour calmer la situation critique et tendue pour les acteurs sur le terrain .

IV-Conclusion :

D'où les principales leçons sous questions :

-Quel était l'objectif de départ des Égyptiens ?[16]

Très peu pour comprendre ce conflit se sont posé cette question . Pourtant ,elle est claire et surprenante . L'objectif des troupes égyptiennes étaient de reprendre le Sinai et non d'annihiler l'Etat juif .

C'est ce que Sadate[17] conclue avec son allié Hafez el-Assad[18] , de mener ensemble une guerre limitée avec pour objectif de recupérer les territoires perdus durant la guerre des six jours à savoir le plateau du Golan et le Sinai.

Mieux Sadate avait dit à son ministre de la Guerre, Ahmed Ismail Ali[19] :

« Je veux que nous planifiions l'offensive dans les limites de nos capacités, pas plus. Traverser le canal et tenir ne serait-ce que dix centimètres du Sinaï. J'exagère, bien sûr, mais ça m'aidera grandement à modifier complètement la situation politique internationale et dans les rangs arabes. »

[20]

Donc l'Égypte en peu de mots n’avait pas les moyens pour mener un long conflit . Mieux l’objectif de Sadate était de remporter une bataille sur la scène diplomatique en ramenant Israël sur la table des négociations.

[21]

A la suite des accords de Camp David[22] qui vont suivre en 1978 , Sadate atteint son objectif mieux selon les accords en 1979 , l'Égypte reprend le contrôle du Sinaï .

-Quel a été la situation d'Israël dans le conflit ?

Les troupes israéliennes ont perdu la rive est du canal de Suez au début du conflit puis repris l'initiative après quelques jours . Sur le plateau du Golan , ils ont rapidement mis en déroute l'armée syrienne après des dures combats et lancé une offensive .

[23]

[24]

-Les Israéliens ont-ils envisagé utiliser la bombe atomique ?

Ce n'était pas nécessaire . Mieux les armes conventionnelles ont fait l'affaire . On constate qu'après la terreur des premières heures de l'offensive fulgurante égyptienne et syrienne , Israël a rapidement repris le dessus . L'usage d'armes atomiques ayant plus un effet dissuasif , il n'était dans ce sens d'aucune utilité plus qu'ils tenaient encore leurs territoires mieux , ils avaient repris l'initiative partout .

[25]

De plus comme cela a été démontré les Égyptiens n'avaient même pas l'intention d'aller plus que la tête de pont de 15 km qu'ils ont établi les premiers jours du conflit . Mieux leur tentative d'offensives suivantes a été contré facilement et de manière conventionnelle par les troupes israéliennes qui rapidement , ont lancé une puissante percée .

[26]

-Quels a été l'impact des Etats-Unis et l'URSS ?

Les deux après avoir soutenus de part et d'autre leurs alliés en matériel , ont compris qu'il fallait apaiser rapidement la situation au risque qu'elle prenne une autre tournure. De plus , les Soviétiques ne pouvaient ignorer qu'Israël détenait des ogives nucléaires et risquait d’en faire usage si la situation devenait désespérée à leur égard .

[27]

Mieux , Brejnev envoya une lettre à Nixon dans la nuit du 23 au 24 octobre afin qu'Américains et Soviétiques assurassent le respect du cessez-le-feu sur le terrain. Il menaça même les États-Unis d'intervenir aux côtés de l'Égypte s'ils n'agissaient pas dans ce sens Donc les stratèges d'Israël savaient très bien avec les Américains de quoi les Soviétiques pouvaient être capable .

Notes de bas de page

[1] Image on timesofisrael.com
[2] Sinaï — Wikipédia
[3] Plateau du Golan — Wikipédia
[4] Image on histoire-pour-tous.fr
[5] Image on maozisrael.org
[6] Ligne Bar-Lev — Wikipédia
[7] 2K12 Kub — Wikipédia
[8] Image on greatmilitarybattles.com
[9] Malyutka 9M14 — Wikipédia

[10] RPG-7 — Wikipédia
[11] Image on tribunejuive.info
[12] Image on servimg.com
[13] Image on tribunejuive.info
[14] Image on tribunejuive.info
[15] Image on devoir-de-philosophie.com
[16] Opération Badr (1973) — Wikipédia
[17] Encyclopédie Larousse en ligne - Anouar el- Sadate en arabe Anwar al-Sādāt
[18] Brève biographie de Hafez el-Assad, père de Bachar el-Assad
[19] Ahmad Ismail Ali - Wikipedia
[20] Image on alarabiya.net
[21] Image on ahram.org.eg
[22] Accords de Camp David — Wikipédia
[23] Image on quoracdn.net
[24] Image on quoracdn.net
[25] Image on pinimg.com
[26] Image on lemonde.fr
[27] Image on academic.ru

Questions similaires

La décision de Harry Truman d'utiliser l'arme atomique lors de la deuxième guerre mondiale était-elle un bon choix ?

Est-ce que les militaires qui ont participé au largage des premières bombes atomiques sur le Japon étaient pleinement informés de la force destructrice de celles-ci et du fait que des milliers de civils seraient tués ?

À quel point l'Allemagne était-elle détruite à la fin de la Seconde Guerre mondiale ?
Quels sont les armes, outils et véhicules les plus étranges utilisés pendant la guerre du Vietnam ?

Est-il exact que ce ne sont pas les bombes atomiques des États-Unis qui ont forcé le Japon à capituler mais que c'est la déclaration de guerre de la Russie qui en est la cause ?

Quel événement a déclenché l'affrontement militaire Israël-Hamas en mai 2021 ?

Lorsqu'on a planifié le bombardement atomique du Japon, a-t-on considéré utiliser un parachute pour ralentir la chute des bombes afin de donner plus de temps aux B-29 de fuir l'onde de choc ?

Si une guerre à ampleur mondiale devait arriver ? Pensez vous que la bombe atomique serait la première arme utilisée ? Ou les nations arriveraient à simplement passer outre pour arriver à un conflit type seconde guerre.

Quelle était l'arme la plus terrifiante de la Seconde Guerre mondiale ?
Serait-il possible d'envahir Israël de nos jours ?

Who were the ancient egyptians?

Adam Ramzy , Bachelor Ancient History Answered Dec 27, 2020

Ancient Egyptians (3rd and 4th dynasty), the Third Dynasty of ancient Egypt is the first dynasty of the Old Kingdom.

The faces of ancient Egyptians: (Old, middle and new Kingdom)

Ancient Egyptians from upper Egypt lived in Qena which is in the middle of Egypt. There is a big difference between the migration movements and where upper Egyptians came from, don’t mix the two.

Some people suggest that upper Egyptians came from somewhere else, that's not true. The genetic makeup of Egyptians is unique to them only.

Upper Egyptians are an ethnic group of people that live in the middle and the south of Egypt. They're often called Sa'idis (from Sa'id meaning upper). Modern and ancient Egyptians are Haplogroup E-V68 (e1b1b1a) + some e1b1b1a2. Lower Egyptians are M78 V-22 and upper Egyptians are M78 V-12 (Twin subclades). Lower and Upper Egyptians are not that different. A lot of lower Egyptians trace their ancestry back to Upper Egypt (myself included).

Related Links

How do you prove the ancient Egyptians were black?

What is the reason some said that the ancient Egyptians are blacks? Is this really true?
Are there people in Egypt today who practice the ancient Egyptian polytheistic religion?
If Ancient Egyptians were of black complexion, why are Egyptians today brown and beige?
Did ancient Egyptians look like modern Egyptians or what are their differences?

Were Nubians the black Egyptians since everyone else is saying that the ancient Egyptians were white?

Why are quintessentially "black" African, ancient Egyptian royal mummies ignored in the discussion about who the ancient Egyptians were?

How do modern Egyptians feel about Ancient Egyptian history?
What did ancient Egyptians look like?
Are modern Egyptians related to the ancient Egyptians, or are they ethnically Arabian?

United African Dream
In 7 years Egypt has built 10,000 new factories

Posted by Yussif Issah Oyen Wed

The industrial sector has risen in value from $22 billion in 2014 To $60 Billion in 2021

Egypt’s Gdp has risen from $235 Billion in 2017 to $438 Billion in 2021 and expected to reach 509 billion by the end of 2022

Egypt's exports rose from $20 billion in 2014 to $45 billion in 2021 and expected to reach $100 billion in 2027

Egypt has an ambitious plan to reach $1.5 Trillion In GDP terms by 2030 ($375 Billion from industry sector).

MIDS
TIRES
R US
PYRAMIDS
TIRES

Why do many modern Egyptians look like Somalis and vice versa?

Firew Afera Read about the origins of Ancient Egyptian civilization May 16

The only Modern Egyptians who look like the Somalis are the ones native to the Southern areas of the country. This is because they represent the original ancient Kemitic racial stock the best whereas these features are scantily seen among a great majority of the modern Egyptian people.
It is so amazing that some people decide colour-blindness is the best thing for them. Color blindness is an unfortunate eye disease, and I can`t help but symphatise with those who live with such problem. What can I say about those who chose it; it is a really bad disease, you know.

Kemitic people

You may have the ``color blindness by choice syndrome`` if you really think the people below have any kind of relation with the old Kemitic people:

Related Links

What is your opinion on the unique look of Somali people? Do you think they are not considered black?

What is this trend of "Original Somalis didn't look like the mixed ones of today", do we have evidence of original Somalis who were not mixed as some Afrocentrists claim?

Are Somali people Caucasians with black skin?
Why do ancient Egyptians look more like African Americans than modern-day Egyptians?

What is the historical/genetic origin of Somalis? And why do they phenotypically look different/unique from all other human populations?

How do modern Egyptians feel about Ancient Egyptian history?
What did the ancient Egyptians look like?

Would the Ancient Egyptians recognize the modern Egyptians as their people?
How did Cushites such as the Somalis look like before they mixed?
Why does North African DNA appear on Somali DNA results but not vice versa?

Is Egypt part of the Arab Maghreb state?

Amr Rady (□ □ □□ □ □)□Born and raised in EgypBorn and raised in Egypt Updated Jan 18, 2020

No. Egypt is part of the Mashriq (East), not the Maghrib (West). The Greater Maghrib region consists of Mauritania, Morocco including the Western Sahara, Algeria, Tunisia, and Libya.

One day. One day we'll achieve it.

Is Egypt considered part of the Levant or the Arab Maghreb?

Amr Rady (□ □ □ □ □ □ □ □),Born and raised in Egypt Answered Sep 16, 2018

Map of Egypt

es,

l

ns.

th

ig

.

ne

s

known as Afro-Asiatic or Hamito-Semitic. On the African, or Hamitic side, it is related to Berber and the group of Cushitic and Chadic languages such as Beja [i.e. Bishari] and Hausa, and on the Asiatic side to Akkadian, Hebrew, Arabic, and other Semitic tongues. Within this spectrum, Egyptian is both central and unique: it has featured found in North African and Semitic languages but is closely allied to neither group"

(Allen, 2008: 189)

A 2015 study by Dobon et al. identified an ancestral autosomal component of West Eurasian origin that is common to many modern Afroasiatic-speaking populations in Northeast Africa. Known as the Coptic component, it peaks among Egyptian Copts. Copts also formed a separated group in PCA. The Coptic component evolved out of a main North African(E-m78) and Middle Eastern(J-58) ancestral component that is shared by other Egyptians and also found at high frequencies among other Afro-Asiatic populations in Northeast Africa (~70%).

Egyptians and middle east cluster very closely to one another is because of a shared ancestry in the late neolithic/early bronze age Levant where the ancient Levantines were less west asian admixed. That's why today's and the ancient Egyptians cluster very closely with their Levantine neighbors like the Palestinians rather than to Berbers who had diverged from the ancestors of both Europeans(iberians) and Levantines much more early thus forming their own unique genetic cluster in the western Eurasian cluster.

Egyptians belong to the middle eastern cluster that consists of today's Egyptians& Levantines such as Palestinians and Jordanians as seen from this Modern populations splitting tree.(=Batwing)

Paul Bobett

.

Follow

Translator 1 year _

Jean-Marie Valheur
political aficionado & former journalist
This answer may not be a faithful translation of the answer of Jean-Marie Valheur
in Quora in English :
Are Pharaoh's descendants still present today?

Are the descendants of the pharaohs still present today?

We cannot trace them today, but some of the pharaohs surely have descendants living today, probably many. King Tut died young, his only children having never survived childhood. On the other hand, Ramses II left a hundred children, fifty sons and fifty daughters. He is the ancestor of most of modern Egypt.

Pharaohs ruled Egypt for thousands and thousands of years, they married the daughters of many royal houses in Africa, the Middle East and the Levant, while sending some of their sons there. It was under their reign that the very first library was founded. Wisdom of the ages, preserved forever. The first monotheistic religion ever invented...

And yes. They moved.

One day you get up and you go and teach the Assyrians or the Greeks or the Nubians who is the leader... then you come home after a long campaign, still drenched in the sweat of battle, and retire to your royal apartments to show your wife who's daddy...

You are a pharaoh, after all! The King of Kings! Not just any other ruler, no, yours is a dynasty as old as time itself. You are a living God. Hell, by the time Ramses arrived he didn't even feel the need to build pyramids to remind people of his glory, just a few statues and the most beautiful ladies known was enough for this Egyptian playboy. You would walk out of your royal chambers, strutting… knowing that in every pore, every corner of your body, you are the man .

No seriously, people, how can you be so amazing and not be the ancestor of…everyone? Genghis had to travel half the known world, raping and plundering his way through every nation he encountered just to spread his seed everywhere. The Pharaoh rode his chariot a bit, but had little need to rape and pillage…one look and…boom! Pregnant.

Yes, there are still descendants of the pharaohs alive today. Of course there are. You meet any random Egyptian person, really any Middle Eastern, North African, Sicilian, Italian, hell, anyone, anywhere, chances are they have a little Ramses II in them.

Are there any living modern descendants of the ancient Egyptians?

Walter Smyth , Fascinated by ancient history and genetics Answered Aug 10, 2017

Originally Answered: Are there any descendants of the ancient Egyptians? According to DNA, the Copts are the closest to the ancient Egyptians because they have no recent Arab DNA or Sub-Saharan DNA from slavery.

Ancient Egyptians resembled the Copts.

Ancient Egyptians resembling the Copts:

Mindris:

Ancient Egyptians recreated by forensic scientists looking just like the

COPTS:

King Tut:

© Supreme Council of Antiquities, Egypt and National Geographic Society, 2005

3000 year old Egyptian recreated looking just like a modern Copt:

I once read they are the descendants of the ancient Egyptians so I wanted to ask if Sa3idis (upper Egyptians) are native to ancient Egypt?

Alexander Balogun , African history Ph.D. Answered Apr 14, 2020

The indigenous people of Aswan and Luxor are among the descendants of ancient Egyptians. Which includes the Saiddi people.

Alamy

Visit

Egypt, Upper Egypt, Nile Valley, Luxor, portrait of Egyptians in ...

Pinterest

Visit

An traditional Oboe in Upper Egypt celebrations . #exploreluxor ...

Worldwide Insure

Egypt Travel Advice from Worldwide Insure Travel ...

Visit

These people due to their strategic location further South in Egypt were not opened to several foreign influx from Libya, West Asia and Southern Europe.

Due to the proximity and the fertility of the Northern Delta region of Egypt, foreign occupation was centered in that region.

After the fall of the last Native Egyptian rule from the New Kingdom, the Libyans were known to have occupied the Northern Delta region, pushing the native Egyptians further South.

How Did the Libyans Impact Ancient Egypt?

The earliest settlements in ancient Egypt came from the Southern Upper Nile Valley. Which clearly means the identity of the ancient Egyptians will be similar to people from the Southern Upper Nile Valley region today of Aswan.

Prehistoric Egypt - Wikipedia

Related Links

How do I debunk the Afrocentric claims that the ancient Egyptians were black and prove to them that modern day Egyptians are the descendants of ancient Egyptians?

Are there any living modern descendants of the ancient Egyptians?
What is the reason some said that the ancient Egyptians are blacks? Is this really true?
Are Nubians the descendants of ancient Egyptians?
Where did the Ancient Egyptians go?
How did the ancient Greeks describe the appearance of the Egyptians?

Are the present day Egyptians the direct descendants of Ancient Egyptians, or do they belong to different ethnicities who inhabited the same land at different times?

Are Copts the direct descendants of ancient Egyptians?

Do modern Egyptians accept that they are Arabs and not descendants of the ancient Egyptians?

Are modern Egyptians really the descendants of the ancient Egyptians or are they just Arabs?

Are Nubians the descendants of ancient Egyptians?

Alexander Balogun , African history Ph.D. Updated Jul 1, 2019 · Upvoted by Shaun White
, A lifetime of amateur egyptology and visits since 1967

The answer is No!!…

The Nubians are among the oldest people in the history of Humanity. The Nubians were responsible for the Khormusan industry/culture which was a Paleolithical archeological awakening of humanity dated 42,000 to 18,000 BP. The Khormusan culture is said according to most historians as the mother of the Halfan culture and the Iberomanurusian culture of the Maghreb (North Africa)

Ancient Sudan~ Nubia: Prehistory

The Khormusan: Evidence for an MSA East African industry in Nubia

The Nubians were also responsible for the Qadan culture which flourished between the 2nd Cataracts and the

Which people are the direct descendants of the ancient Egyptians today?

Adam Ramzy , Bachelor Ancient History Updated Jan 25

Both Christian and Muslim Egyptians. They are the same people.

This study is considered a comprehensive genetic study that examined the different religious and social ethnicities in all parts of Egypt.

The Muslim and Christian samples from Tanta (northern Egypt), Upper Egypt (from more than 5 Upper Egypt governorates), Cairo and Siwa.

Local comparisons between Upper Egyptians were carried out with other ethnic groups in Egypt, based on frequency and molecular data. No differences were observed in comparison with a general Caucasian population from Cairo in any of the nine loci compared [8] or with Egyptian Christians from Cairo [9], but one out of eight loci showed a difference in comparison with a population from El-Minia city [10]. At the molecular data level, there was a weak significant difference when Upper Egyptians were compared with Egyptian Muslims from Tanta (FST p-value = 0.0455), albeit with a non-significant p-value (0.143) in an exact test of population differentiation. Highly significant differences ($p < 0.00001$) were observed in comparisons with Berbers from Siwa (an oasis in the western desert).

There was no discernible difference that identifies a difference in origins between all these samples, except for the Siwa samples (which appeared to be essentially non-Egyptian).

This means the denial of any possible (alleged) Arab or foreign origins of the Egyptians.

"The Muslim Egyptians one sees in cities and rural areas are -probably- not descendants of the Arabs at all, and it isn't appropriate to regard them as such except for what concerns their tongue and religion. Merely looking at their physical appearance and that of the Copts [Christian Egyptians] is sufficient to be convinced that they are exactly matching in their ethnic features. Consequently, Muslim Egyptians are in fact non other than Copts who adopted the religion of Islam."

(El-Shaikh Ali Youssef, El mouaid Newspaper, 1849)

Egyptians are not Arab as some people think. We're indigenous.

It is a study that explicitly compared upper-level Muslim and Christian samples with samples from the completely Arab tribes in the Badia of Kuwait (including the tribes of Onaizah - Al-Awazim - Shammar, Matran, and other tribes of Al-Qahtanian and Al-Adnani roots according to Arab mythology).

The same program was used to test for the presence of broader genetic structure when Bedouin populations were compared to a worldwide population data set (Supplementary Table 2). In the worldwide comparison, a model containing three clusters was favoured (at K=3 ln $P(D)$ = −42339; Table 1). In this analysis, almost all individuals demonstrated membership of multiple clusters, but some populations displayed membership of predominant clusters that corresponded to geographical affiliation. For example, Adima Muslim Egyptians (63%) and Coptic Egyptians (65%) showed a distinct "North African" cluster (Figure 1b, red colour). Another "European" cluster was observed among a high proportion of the South Belgians (56%, blue colour). Correspondences between clusters and populations were less clear for the the Iraqi and Qatari samples, however: individuals displayed partial membership of multiple clusters with some populations showing identities that did not correspond to geographic, linguistic or ethnic affiliation. It was noticeable that all of the Bedouin tribes with the exception of Aniza belonged predominantly to a single cluster (cluster 2, green colour). The Aniza, like the samples drawn from Qatar and Iraq, were distributed among three clusters (Supplementary Table 4).

The result was that the genetic makeup of the Egyptian Muslims from all over Upper Egypt and the Christian Egyptians also differed completely from the Arab genetic makeup.

A North African component appeared in the Egyptian Muslim samples (63%) and the Christian Egyptian samples (65%) to isolate them mostly from the Arab samples.

The Egyptians never left Egypt and had everything they needed, we also have no record of any mass displacement or migration.

Anthropologists like C. Loring Brace

> "We conclude that the Egyptians have been in place since back in the Pleistocene and have been largely unaffected by either invasions or migrations. As others have noted, Egyptians are Egyptians, and they were so in the past as well"

> "Of all the peoples of the ancient near east, only the Egyptians have stayed where they were and remained what they were, although they have changed their language once and their religion twice. in a sense, they constitute the world's oldest nation"

Of all the peoples of the ancient Near East, only the Egyptians have stayed where they were and remained what they were, although they have changed their language once and their religion twice. In a sense, they constitute the world's oldest nation. For most

MENU

Ancient Egyptians 4500 years ago looked like this (3rd and 4th dynasties), the Third Dynasty of ancient Egypt is the first dynasty of the Old Kingdom.

The oldest statue to be ever discovered is the statue of the Lector Priest Kaaper, known as Sheikh el-Balad (sycamore wood, eyes made from rock crystal rimmed with copper).

The faces of ancient Egyptians:

AMERICAN JOURNAL OF PHYSICAL ANTHROPOLOGY 000:000–000 (2006)

Who Were the Ancient Egyptians? Dental Affinities Among Neolithic Through Postdynastic Peoples

Joel D. Irish*

Department of Anthropology, University of Alaska Fairbanks, Fairbanks, Alaska 99775-7720

/VIGILANT·EGYPTIAN

THE DENTAL MORPHOLOGY OF THE ROMAN-PERIOD FAYUM MUMMIES WAS COMPARED WITH THAT OF EARLIER EGYPTIAN POPULATIONS, AND WAS FOUND TO BE "MUCH MORE CLOSELY AKIN" TO THAT OF ANCIENT EGYPTIANS THAN TO GREEKS OR OTHER EUROPEAN POPULATIONS.

MUMMY PORTRAIT UC19611 - THE PETRIE MUSEUM OF EGYPTIAN ARCHAEOLOGY, LONDON

ered at Hawara (HAW) in an early Roman period burial ground for elite members of the Fayum Oasis populace (Grajetzki and Quirke, 2001b). It was excavated by Petrie Gebel Ramlah and the Greek Egyptians remain separated on the y-axis and are distinct from other, more closely grouped samples on the left of Figure 5; as before, Badari, Thebes, and Hawara are at the center of this cluster.

Modern Egyptians are the direct descendants of ancient Egyptians.

Joseph Ding

Alex Mann , M.A History & Latin, Ohio University (2016) Answered Feb 19, 2021 · Upvoted by

Lyonel Perabo , B.A. in History. M.A in related field (Folkloristics)

How do I debunk the Afrocentric claims that the ancient Egyptians were black and prove to them that modern day Egyptians are the descendants of ancient Egyptians?

It’s easy if you know what to look for and how to get them. They will do things like use confusing language and try to trick you. Let me fill you in.

First, lets look at the truth. 2 important notes here

1. Every single historian (with a degree and experience) agrees here
2. Every single Egyptologist agrees here

If you have a historical theory and not 1 historian anywhere on earth supports it, that is telling.

The Truth

Ancient Egyptians were a diverse people.

According to a 2017 DNA study on more than 90 mummies, ancient Egyptians were genetically similar to people in the Levant (modern Palestine/Israel) and Anatolia (modern Turkey). About 12% of the mummies were possibly African. This means that Egypt may have been less diverse back then than today.

But Egypt was a trading hub. Trade came up the Nile from Africa but much more trade came from the Middle East, Greece, and Italy. Therefore there were all sorts of people in Egypt.

Not the massive Empires of Persia, Babylon, the Assyrians, and the Greeks were far wealthier trade partners than the African Kingdoms to the South therefore the majority of Egyptian trade went to the Middle East, not Africa.

Egyptians were had copper-colored skin, dark hair and eyes, and Middle Eastern features. There were some Egyptians that were black and traditionally African and others that were very light-skinned.

Egyptians originated in the Nile valley and were ethnically similar to other Middle Eastern people. Thatis the fundamental truth.

Arguments Afrocentists use

1: Kemet (kmt) and Rmt

Kemet in Egyptian means “black land”. Afrocentirsts will contend it means “land of blacks” either way though it matters none.

Now, this is an important thing. Egyptians, Romans, and Greeks placed no importance on race- at all. There was no social status associated with race with the Egyptians did not think in racial terms.

A modern American may see the term “black” as a term for skin color. The Egyptians saw it in a more symbolic light.

You see Egypt was built on the Nile. The consistent regular flooding leads to soot with fertilized land and allowed for a surplus in food. The black soot of Egypt was life-giving and thus “black land” references soot, not skin color.

Rmt means person- just person. Some Afrocentrists contend that “rmt” means black person but it just means man or person in general. Since Egyptians did not see racially they had no real terms for people based on race- everyone was rmt.

Then we get to the Book of the Gates which describes 4 races (Asians, Egyptians, Nubians, Libyans). This is often taken as the 4 races of Egypt when really it was the 4 races of earth. It’s also more of a religious text.

2: Melanin tests

This is not brought up much because its just flatly wrong and has been known to be wrong for decades. It was a botched study on a small sample size done by amateurs that proved nothing.

3: Depictions

We've all seen them before- here are a few.

Now as we covered black meant life to the Egyptians but there are a few depictions of black people in Egypt- mostly because there were some.

The Nubians in fact invaded and conquered Egypt for a short time.

These prove 1 thing- that there were some Africans in ancient Egypt. That is all. There are thousands and thousands of more depictions of Egyptians as copper-colored. Find a few dozen and post them.

The response will be that they are faked- and they aren't. At that point, you are dealing with someone who isn't after truth so good luck.

4: Hieroglyphic translations

I had someone try this. I didn't catch it till my Egyptologist friend told me.

Just ask them who translated it. Translating ancient Egyptian is a nightmare so just ask who made the translation. Often you will hear that the poster did the translation- just ask them where they studied.

5: Documents:

They will point to Herodotus, one of the most unreliable historians ever (who is particularly a liar when it comes to Egypt).

They may also point to a Greek play that depicted a lost group of Egyptians as “black-skinned”. Keep in mind that this is a fictional play, not a real one. You cannot cite star wars to we-write Chinese history.

What Afrocenrists do is confuse the situation in an attempt to make you give up.

For instance, I was in a debate with an Afrocentrist who thought he was slick.

He posted tons of Hieroglyphics and their translations. He laid it out in a complex manner. Essentially he was trying to prove that the term for person (rmt) meant black person and that the Egyptians called themselves rmt (which again just means man or person)

He was unaware the Egyptians had no terms for skin color so he pointed to the book of the gates where he listed out 4 terms for the 4 races. He tried to connect the term for Nubian to rmt- basically saying the origin or rmt was a term used for Nubian (Nubians are black).

Well, he made up the terms. The 4 terms for the races he used were totally fictional.

In fact, all of his translations were all over the place, missing huge pieces, and cherry-picked. None of what he said held up. Once I pointed out these things he stopped responding and deleted his comments.

To a nonhistorian, his post would look dense and well researched and this tricks people. But really it was rambling, huge logical leaps, and poor reasoning.

It’s not fun but debating them is easy, and frustrating.

Ask for source documents. Often they will quote them, look up those quotes in context
Ask for any evidence at all besides their word

Ask how they came to conclusions. One may say “Romans sent black soldiers to Britian and these people created large communities that would rule Europe”. First, validate it happened (it did but in a smaller number than they quoted) but then ask how we know they settled in large communities.

Again- ask for sources. They rarely have them

Point out a picture proves nothing

Ask where they got their degree. They are rewriting history so where did they learn to study history

Ask them to disprove the DNA tests

Flood them with photos of copper-skinned Egyptians (there are thousands of them) and see what they say

Related Links

How do I debunk the Afrocentric claims that the ancient Egyptians were black and prove to them that modern day Egyptians are the descendants of ancient Egyptians?

Are there any living modern descendants of the ancient Egyptians?
What is the reason some said that the ancient Egyptians are blacks? Is this really true?
Are Nubians the descendants of ancient Egyptians?
Where did the Ancient Egyptians go?
How did the ancient Greeks describe the appearance of the Egyptians?

Are the present day Egyptians the direct descendants of Ancient Egyptians, or do they belong to different ethnicities who inhabited the same land at different times?

Are Copts the direct descendants of ancient Egyptians?

Do modern Egyptians accept that they are Arabs and not descendants of the ancient Egyptians?

Are modern Egyptians really the descendants of the ancient Egyptians or Est-ce que les anciens Égyptiens ont inventé le papier?/ Did ancient Egypt invent paper?

Jerome Cohen · Suivre Féru, mordu et l'eusses-tu-cruTraducteur · 12 mars

Jason Almendra I took "Greek & Latin Roots of English" in college

Une fois de plus, les Égyptiens ont inventé le papyrus. Il était fabriqué à partir de roseaux de papyrus.

Illustration of Egyptian papyrus production obtained from Pinterest.com

Les Chinois ont inventé le papier. Il est fabriqué à partir d'écorce de mûrier, de bambou, de chiffons de lin, etc.

Les Anatoliens ont inventé le parchemin. Qui est une peau de mouton, de chèvre ou de veau. Ce dernier matériau est appelé vélin.

Questions similaires

Pourquoi existe-t-il des désaccords sur qui a construit les pyramides, et comment ?
Les premiers habitants de l'Égypte étaient-ils des Noirs ?
Pourquoi les Égyptiens appelaient-ils le Pharaon "Toutankhamon" ?

Pourquoi le revêtement de calcaire a-t-il été enlevé au fil des siècles des pyramides de Gizeh?

Comment les Égyptiens ont eu l'idée de faire des momies ?
Quels étaient les aspects les plus choquants de la société égyptienne ancienne ?

Pourquoi les anciens Egyptiens ne ressemblent-ils en rien aux Egyptiens modernes ?
Les anciens Egyptiens ont-ils exploré le monde ?
Pourquoi la civilisation égyptienne était-elle si en avance sur son temps ?
Qu'est-ce que les Arabes ont apporté au monde ?

Which ancient Egyptian mummy captivated and haunted Egyptologists?

Serge Elia , Raffole de l'histoire Traducteur · Traduit le 13 sept. 2021

Manoj Krishna Shrestha Interested in weird facts

En 1881, on trouva une ancienne momie non identifiée d'une femme égyptienne. Apparemment, son visage était figé de terreur (littéralement, ndt), la bouche grande ouverte et émettant ce qui semblait être le tout dernier cri. Elle captiva et hanta les experts aussi bien que les amateurs égyptologues.

Aujourd'hui, de nouvelles études ont établi que la cause de sa mort provint d'une crise cardiaque alors qu'elle avait la bouche ouverte. La tomodensitométrie a découvert des gisements étendus de plaques graisseuses au sein des vaisseaux sanguins. Les égyptologues soutiennent que la femme mourut toute seule d'une affreuse crise cardiaque, et qu'elle fut introuvable pendant plusieurs heures. Au cours de cette période, l'on croit que son corps dût se raidir, ce qui eut pour résultat la bouche gelée et grande ouverte pour l'éternité.

Source (en anglais, ndt) : 'Screaming mummy' may have died of a heart attack, researchers say.

Comment les anciens Égyptiens ont-ils réussi à transporter des pierres pesant plusieurs tonnes sans l'aide de machines?

Rémi Béral Egyptophile jusqu'au bout des ongles. Répondu 22 mai 2021

Avec beaucoup d'astuce. On ne connait pas encore exactement toutes les techniques employées par les égyptiens. Il y a toutefois deux trois choses assez incontestables.

Les Egyptiens transportaient les pierres sur des traineaux en bois. On en a retrouvé plusieurs et ils figurent dans l'iconographie.

Pour les blocs de quelques tonnes les égyptiens utilisaient la force des bœuf. Pour les gros blocs de plusieurs dizaines de tonnes le besoin de coordination rend la force humaine obligatoire. On le sait grâce à l'iconographie.

Fig. 48.

Pour les grands trajets les égyptiens utilisaient des bateaux capable de transporter beaucoup de charges. On le sait grâce à l'iconographie et aux textes. (voir le journal de Merer https://www.orient-mediterranee.com/IMG/pdf/1705_tallet.pdf ; Journal de Merer — Wikipédia)

Pour monter des blocs à faible hauteur les égyptiens utilisaient des rampes. On en a des vestiges archéologiques sur des monuments inachevés et dans des carrières de pierre.

Pour monter à grande hauteur les égyptiens utilisaient probablement des leviers. A ma connaissance on n'a pas de textes ou de vestiges archéologiques le confirmant mais en recoupant plusieurs données on peut se permettre de faire cette hypothèse. Reste à savoir exactement quels étaient ces leviers.

Pour faire glisser les traineaux il fallait une surface dure mais glissante. Une hypothèse serait l'humidification d'une couche d'argile imaginée d'après l'iconographie. On peut également imaginer d'après la même iconographie que des "rails" ou glissières en bois soient mis en place. Le roulage sur rondin est une autre hypothèse.

3 OBSTACLES À VAINCRE

- Gravité (poids du monolithe et ou pente pour tracter ce dernier).
- Force de frottement ou de roulement. (traineau ou rondin)
- Résistance de l'air. (négligeable pour le transport d'un monolithe à vitesse lente)

Un humain peut exercer une traction d'environ 500 newton, ce qui représente la traction de 150 kilos posés sur une luge que l'on fait glisser sur du sable

3°Tirage au sol su rouleaux bois de cèdre roulant sur longrines bois de cèdre

Tirage possible avec 172 hommes
Coef roulement glissement = 0,016

eau pour refroidir les longrines

roulement ⟹ degagement de chaleur

Système anti-retour des rondins en bois !

Voici deux sources intéressantes produites par des amateurs (non égyptologues) reprenant les données iconographiques et archéologiques ainsi que les hypothèses des égyptologues

Les Secrets des Anciens ~

Tombeau de Djehoutyhotep Etude mathématique et expérimentale du tirage d'un colosse

http://www.jocast.fr/437885587

La durée de la construction des pyramides |

Méthode de construction des grandes pyramides de Gizeh.

https://messagedelanuitdestemps.org/egypte-2/construction/

J'ajoute l'hypothèse d'un autre non égyptologue sur l'extraction des gros blocs de granit (obélisque) qui me paraît très crédible et qui se fonde sur l'iconographie et l'archéologie :

Hervé Kasongo

Questions similaires

Pourquoi existe-t-il des désaccords sur qui a construit les pyramides, et comment ?
Les premiers habitants de l'Égypte étaient-ils des Noirs ?
Pourquoi les Égyptiens appelaient-ils le Pharaon "Toutankhamon" ?

Pourquoi le revêtement de calcaire a-t-il été enlevé au fil des siècles des pyramides de Gizeh?

Comment les Égyptiens ont eu l'idée de faire des momies ?
Quels étaient les aspects les plus choquants de la société égyptienne ancienne ?
Pourquoi les anciens Egyptiens ne ressemblent-ils en rien aux Egyptiens modernes ?
Les anciens Egyptiens ont-ils exploré le monde ?
Pourquoi la civilisation égyptienne était-elle si en avance sur son temps ?
Qu'est-ce que les Arabes ont apporté au monde ?

Do you find it shocking that Gal Gadot plays Cleopatra, this sovereign of Greco-Macedonian descent?

Jerome Cohen · Follow Feru, bitten and had-you-thought 1 year

Do I find it shocking that Gal Gadot is playing Cleopatra?
I saw this question on the Q opposite, and my reaction was to roll my eyes in my sockets, put my head in my hands and say "no, but hello, what!".

Seriously, there are those who overthink the most banal things, or who really have too much free time.

To answer anyway, no, I don't find it shocking that a good brunette actress plays the role of Cleopatra.

By the way, I don't remember anyone criticizing Liz Taylor for her role as Cleopatra in 1963, but obviously she wasn't Jewish or Israeli (just like the original Cleopatra, by the way), nor Vivian Leigh (1945), Monica Bellucci (2002), Sophia Loren (1954), or Claudette Colbert (1934). Which shouldn't change anything. No more than Omar Sy playing Knock or Leonard Nimoy playing Spock, or Jean-Philippe Smet playing rock. None of them had the "type", and yet, except for Knock, they were pretty good.

OMAR SY
EST KNOCK
UN FILM DE LORRAINE LÉVY
ALEX LUTZ ANA GIRARDOT SABINE AZÉMA PASCAL ELBÉ AUDREY DANA MICHEL VUILLERMOZ CHRISTIAN HECQ DE LA COMÉDIE FRANÇAISE HÉLÈNE VINCENT ANDRÉA FERRÉOL RUFUS NICOLAS MARIÉ SÉBASTIEN CASTRO CHRISTINE MURILLO YVES PIGNOT
SCÉNARIO, ADAPTATION, DIALOGUES DE LORRAINE LÉVY
LIBREMENT ADAPTÉ DE LA PIÈCE DE JULES ROMAINS « KNOCK OU LE TRIOMPHE DE LA MÉDECINE » © GALLIMARD, 1924

EGYPTOLOGY:What is the Egyptian name for Egypt?

Matt Riggsby

MA Archaeology, Boston UniversityAug 10

Egyptians call their country Misr or Al-Masri

That said, that's technically an Arabic name, and usage is complicated; Misr is also sometimes used to specifically refer to Cairo. If the question is what Egypt is called in (extinct) ancient native Egyptian languages, it's been called a couple of things. Probably the best known name is kmt. That's often pronounced Kemet by modern people, but it was probably pronounced something more like Kumat at the time. It was also called Ta-mery early on.

Related Links

What does the name "Egypt" mean? Where does it originate?

Are there ancient Egyptian names that are still used in Egypt?

Are current Egyptians the Ancient Egyptians, if not then where are they and who are the people which live in Egypt today?

Were the Egyptian pharaohs known by name outside of the royal palace, by Egyptians and outside of Egypt?

If the ancient Egyptians are the Egyptians of today, why did they call Africa Kemet?

How did Egypt get its name?

Did a Pharaoh exist named Ramses II as described in the Exodus story of Moses leading the Hebrews out of Egypt during his reign around 1250 B.C.?

Dick Harfield

Lives in Sydney, Australia Sep 21

There certainly was a pharaoh named Ramses II, who ruled Egypt and all its territories during 1279–13 BCE. However, the biblical Exodus story does not mention nor describe him. Put simply, the tradents who developed this national foundation myth did not know who had once, so long ago, ruled Egypt.

Related: Did a Pharaoh exist named Ramses II as described in the Exodus story of Moses leading the Hebrews out of Egypt during his reign around 1250 B.C.?

Francisco Miranda

Engineer, Bible teacher, and Christian writer Mon

There is no doubt that slavery played a major role in the structure of the Egyptian state. It is also true that some form of single-god worship was introduced into Egypt by Akenaton in the middle of the fourteenth century B.C.E., and this may have been a source for Jewish monotheism. Finally, the reign of Ramses II (1290-1212 B.C.E.), known for its costly wars and vast building enterprises, may well have been the era of cruel oppression described in Exodus.

But the only contemporary Egyptian source which actually mentions Israel is the stela (pillar with inscription) of King Merneptah from the fifth year of his reign (1207 B.C.E.), recording among his many victories: "Carved off is Ashkelon, seized upon in Gezer…Israel is laid waste, his seed no more." This inscription implies that an entity named Israel existed in Canaan at the time, yet it is difficult to determine precisely what it was. One thing, however, may be regarded as certain: if the Israelites indeed emerged out of Egypt, their migration took place before the end of the 13th century B.C.E.

Taken from A Historical Atlas of the Jewish People edited by Eli Barnavi and published by Schocken Books.

Related: Did a Pharaoh exist named Ramses II as described in the Exodus story of Moses leading the Hebrews out of Egypt during his reign around 1250 B.C.?

In fact, Africa has had its fair share of great civilizations in history.

Ancient Egypt , which was never conquered for almost 1500 years.

Carthage , which colonized part of Europe.

The kingdom of Kush in Nubia.

The Kingdom of Aksum , located in modern Ethiopia, which conquered part of the Arabian Peninsula and traded with lands as far away as Java. Followed by Empire of Ethiopia : Oscar Schnitzler's response to Besides ancient Egypt, what other African kingdoms/tribes/countries/civilizations/empires have a fascinating history?

The Songhai Empire , which at its height, spanned an area larger than all of southern Europe and was ruled by one of the wealthiest men in history.

The Great Zimbabwe empire , whose capital took 400 years to build.

And many others. Africa's history is much richer than most Europeans think.

Related Links

If Moses wrote the first five books of the Bible why didn't he write about the pyramids since he knew the Pharaohs who would have been buried there, especially Joseph who lived hundreds of years before?
Who was Pharaoh when Moses lived in Egypt?

The mummy of Ramses II (the Great) has remained intact for 3,000 years. Ramses was nearly 90 when he died. What might medical investigators discover about Egyptian life from this mummy?

What was the real name of the Pharaoh when Moses freed the Israelites out of ancient Egypt, because in the movies Prince of Egypt, and Exodus: Gods and Kings: the Pharaoh was named Rameses and he was the adopted brother of Moses?

What was Moses` adoptive relationship with Ramses? Was he a brother, cousin, or nephew?

How did the Hebrews end up as slaves in Egypt? Why did they leave Canaan?

As an Egyptian, if I visit Israel, what will happen if the Egyptian Security Forces see the Israeli airport

Mark L. Levinson Lives in Israel 1y

Despite the peace agreement Egypt does put citizens under investigation for visiting Israel, so you should make sure that— as others have written here— the Israeli border control doesn't stamp your passport.

(I don't know what you're supposed to say if your passport shows that you've left Egypt but, when you return, it doesn't show that you've been anywhere else.) And don't bring back any obvious souvenirs.

Related Links

What do Egyptians think of Israel?

Can an Egyptian citizen visit Israel?

How do Egyptians treat Israeli people?

Is it safe for an Egyptian to go to Israel?

What do today's Egyptians think about Israel and Jews generally? Do they want to maintain peace with Israel?

When will Egyptians be able to visit Israel freely without trouble from the Egyptian governme

5 Hidden Gems in Cairo Worth Your Time

From small museums and scenic parks to hip galleries and quirky bookshops, Cairo is awash with hidden gems that few people know of.

Exploring Cairo's busiest neighbourhoods without a rush will broaden your mind as you get a well-rounded image of the Egyptian city.

History is pouring everywhere in Cairo, and you can never get enough of the ancient city. Forget about the Great Pyramids of Giza; there are tens of amazingly beautiful historical attractions in Cairo.

Well, if you're not into historical sightings, Cairo has other hidden gems that guarantee a unique and memorable vacation.

Here, we will have a look at some of the best-kept secrets of Cairo that you should explore.

1. The Animal Museum

The Animal Museum in the Giza Zoological Garden is one of the hidden gems in Cairo worth exploring while on vacation.

From the moment you enter the museum, you'll be amazed by the sheer diversity and the number of displays you'll see.

The museum, established in 1914, has three big halls which showcase a large group of animals, including reptiles, fish and birds.

It holds many rare mummified animals as well as skulls and skeletons. Among the mummified animals, you'll see a crocodile which is about 3,000 years old and a humongous whale.

The Animal Museum works perfectly for entertainment and as a scientific reference for students in the taxonomy field. Visitors are free to take as many photographs as they want at the museum.

2. Lehnert And Landrock Bookshop

Lehnert and Landrock is a book and photography museum founded over 90 years ago by Rudolf Lehnert and Ernst Landrock.

The two celebrated travel writers and photographers were from Austria and Germany. They travelled around North Africa before World War I taking photographs and glass plates showing images of ancient North Africa.

The books at Lehnert and Landrock bookshop exhibit the wonderful workout of the founders. They are written in French, English, German and Arabic.

Learn more about 5 Hidden Gems in Cairo Worth Your Time

Other exclusive stories about Africa that you did not know

5 Historical African Cities Tourists Rarely Visit

9 Weirdest Foods in South Africa for the Brave Only

7 Magical Places You Should Visit in Zambia, Botswana, and Namibia

5 things Nigeria Beats The World in

Was Cleopatra pure Egyptian?

Matt Riggsby

MA Archaeological Studies, Boston University May 26

So far as we can tell, she was purely not Egyptian.

Cleopatra was the last ruler of the Ptolemaic dynasty, the family which ruled Egypt from the time Alexander's empire broke up in the late 4th century. Ptolemy and his family were Greek/Macedonian, and save for a bit of potential Persian admixture, they remained that way. Among other things, the Ptolemies, like some other Egyptian dynasties, practiced royal incest, with brothers and sisters marrying one another, which keeps lines of succession clear even if it's not great for genetic health. But barring the remote possibility that one or another of Cleopatra's female ancestors fooled around with an Egyptian (which seems unlikely, considering the consistent depiction of unflattering facial features of Ptolemaic rulers over the centuries), Cleopatra was not even the tiniest bit Egyptian. Indeed, according to historical tradition, she was believed to be the first member of her dynasty to even learn the Egyptian language.

Related questions

Is it true that Cleopatra was not an Egyptian? Do you believe it?

Was Cleopatra a native Egyptian? Were there many Egyptians named cleopatra during that time?

Why is Cleopatra always thought of the most important Egyptian?

Why was Cleopatra blonde if modern Egyptians are Arab? What happened to the ancient white Egyptians?

Why do people say Cleopatra was Egyptian when she was not ethnically Egyptian?

What are the ancient Egyptian beauty secrets of Queen Cleopatra?

Related: Why did Abdel Nasser's policy of pan-Arabism fail to unite the Arab world?

Mohamed Emara Lives in Alexandria, Egypt 1y

Arab nationalists, especially the Ba'athists, were only good at making patriotic songs. However, when it comes to working together in order to achieve real unity they were all useless. That applied to Nasser as well. He took care of Umm Kulthum and Abdel-Wahab, but failed at rallying the Arabs behind him.

Nasser waving to the crowds in Hama, Syria.

Gamal Abdel Nasser reached the zenith of his popularity in 1958 when the Syrian leadership approached him to unite the two countries. That displayed how much popular Nasser was in Syria and the extent of enthusiasm for a united Arab world. However, in reality this unity was by far different than what the Syrian president Shukri al-Quwatli had in mind.

The agreement stated that both Egyptians and Syrians will share powers equally with no one being superior over the other. But Syria ended up as a colony for Egypt and all of the high positions in this newly created state were occupied by Egyptians. Which means that Syrians were almost completely marginalised with the exception of Abdel Hamid al-Sarraj, Nasser's man in Syria.

Naturally Syrians didn't like this new situation but there was nothing that they could do as their new leadership was extremely brutal and unforgiving. All parties were disbanded with the exception of the Ba’ath, Communist and Socialist parties. Torture was introduced for the first time in Syria as well as wide scale censorship, Nasser gave free rein to al-Sarraj who terrorized Syrians. He also forcibly imposed socialism on the country. Unlike Egyptians (at the time) the Syrians resented socialist ideals and this demonstrated the difference between the two mindsets.

In 1961 the unity ended after a coup thatvwas organised by disgruntled Syrian officers.

This was a slap to Nasser's face and the dream of Arab unity was shaken. He hoped that he would restore his image as the leader of the Arab world by successfully venturing in another country and by this victory would influence Syria to return back and possibly other Arab countries. Luckily for him there was an anti royalist movement in Yemen that planned to topple the monarchy and establish a republic, for Nasser it was an extraordinary chance that offered him redemption and he took it.

Nasser and Imam Ahmed facing the camera along with other leaders at Bandung Conference.

Egypt had pretty warm relations with North Yemen at the time and Imam Ahmed and Nasser could be considered as friends. Unfortunately for the Imam he didn't know that it was his Egyptian friend who would stab him in the back and end his rule; however, Ahmed didn't live long to witness this betrayal and died before the plot was set to motion. A week later his son Badr was overthrown by the republicans supported by Egypt, Badr didn't give up and waged a war to restore back the monarchy.

This war lasted 8 years and polarised the Arab community even more. Saudi Arabia and Jordan supported the royalists while Egypt pledged 70 thousand soldiers to help the rebels in their struggle. Long story short, the war was a disaster and there are estimates of Egyptian casualties that reach as high as 26 thousand military deaths as well as tens of thousands of Yemenis were killed in this civil war.

Egypt was stuck in Yemen and this intervention severely weakened it's army, drained the country's treasury and depleted it's resources. After 5 years Egypt was just a shadow of it's former self. Once again Nasser failed in his goals and Yemem was the 2nd slap to his face.

Egyptian soldiers in Sana'a

Imam Badr praying with his guards

While the war in Yemen was raging on Nasser's rival in Iraq Abdul-Karim Qasim has been overthrown and executed in a bloody coup orchestrated by the Ba'athists and the Nasserist Abdel-Salam Arif was elected president of Iraq.

Shortly afterwards the Ba'athists had a fallout with Nasser and they were overthrown by Arif with the help of Nasserist factions in the army, only to regain power years later in yet another coup.

Simultaneously there was another coup in Syria that brought to power the Syrian branch of the Ba'ath party. Now both the Syrians and the Iraqis were pro Nasser and favoured unity between Arab countries. However, negotiations would eventually reach a dead end and all three countries remained independent but they were still close to each other.

From left to right: Nasser, Soviet Premier Khrushchev, Arif and North Yemen's president Abdullah al-Sallal in 1964 during the opening of the Aswan dam in Egypt.

This development of events greatly disturbed King Faisal of Saudi Arabia as he had recently survived numerous plots to overthrow him and some were supported by Nasser. Faisal responded by financing and giving refuge to the Egyptian opposition, the Muslim Brotherhood organisation. It was not just Faisal and the house of Saud who were threatened by Nasser, King Hussein of Jordan also survived countless assassination attempts by republicans. Nasser would occasionally engage with those two monarchs in diplomatic dog fights especially with Hussein. Nasser also sent aid to help the Algerians in their struggle for independence from France and sided with them against Morocco during the Sand War further dividing the Arab world.

Algerian soldiers during the Sand War.

This period of rocky relations between the Arab countries is known as the Arab Cold War and there were two camps, the republican one lead by Egypt supported by the USSR and the royalists lead by Saudi Arabia supported by the US.

In my own humble opinion Nasser was more into controlling the Arabs rather than uniting them and this is evident in the way he treated the Syrians. Even the Gazans were forced to live under military occupation after Nasser dissolved the All Palestine government.

Those two episodes as well as the bloody war in Yemen and his unjustified hostilities to Arab monarchies all imply that he envisioned himself as the unopposed leader of the Arab world. Because of him the Arabs spent a decade beating the crap out of each other which allowed Israel to easily beat them in 1967.

That is why he failed, because of greed.

Related：Why is Egypt considered so important in the Arab world and how did it earn that position?

Essam AlNaggar Lived in Alexandria, Egypt (1995–2016) Upvoted by Eslam Moussa , lives in Egypt (1995-present) 4y

No matter what someone may think of Egypt's current politics, Egypt has been important to the region for many reasons.

Military power: The Egyptian army is the strongest Arab army according to the Global Fire Power[1], and it plays an important role in countering terrorism in the region engaging in Libya, which shares the western borders, Yemen in the gulf area, and most importantly in North Sinai in Egypt itself. In addition to that, Egypt has always been ruled by former army generals, except for Mohamed Morsi who is the first democratically elected president in the history of Egypt, and who was ousted after just one year of taking over.

Geographic Location: Egypt is one of the countries sharing border with Israel, and the peace treaty between the 2 countries has played a big role in the former's stability; given the strong relations between Egyptians and Palestinians, and given the existence of ISIS in North Sinai, it's important for Israel to have a government that would keep the borders safe from the Egyptian side.

Civilization: Ancient Egypt [2] is one the first world civilizations rooting thousands of years ago, it had witnessed times where it used to be one of the major powers of the world. Archaeologists would still find more and more about Egyptian history. How many countries would have a branch of science named upon it? check Egyptology [3]. Such long history has helped forming a civilized culture for Egypt.

As of modern history, Egypt is the first Arab country to:
Build a university: Cairo University[4], 1908. Also let's not forget about Al-Azhar University[5], 970, where Islamic scholars have been studying for years until now.

Build a cinema: 1896, produce movies

Build an Opera house, Cairo Opera House[8] , 1988.

Win a Nobel prize[9]
Establish an Airport/Airline:
Almaza Airport [10] (now an Air-force base): 1910.
Egypt Air [11]: 1932.

Participate in the Olympics: 1912, Win an olympic medal: 1928.

Bundesarchiv, Bild 102-06302
Foto: o.Ang. | 17. Mai 1928

The list can grow, Egypt is the first civilized Arab country in the modern history, and it didn't need oil to do so.

As we speak today there may be a shift of power, Egypt has gone through many wars, and has been suffering from severe corruption which left the country poor and is destroying its legacy.

In the mean time, some Arab countries are spending money wisely to prepare for the post-oil era, with a great focus on education and health sectors. Check Times Higher Education ranking for the top Arab universities for 2018 [12], where the top 5 universities all belong to the gulf states, while the first Egyptian university ranks 11th. The UAE is one the world's major business and logistics hubs, Qatar [13]has the world's greatest GDP per capita at $129,360, and with Saudi Arabia spending more and more on education, it's not clear what Egypt is planning for the future decades.

Image Sources (In order of appearance):

EGYPTOLOGY: Where did the Ancient Egyptian civilization and people come from?

Holyfield went into the Tyson fights believing he had Mike’s number, and believed he had had it since the 1984 Olympic Trials...

Jason Almendra I took "Greek & Latin Roots of English" in college Oct 19

The Nile river valley was farmed relatively late compared to the Levant, Anatolia, Mesopotamia, and even North Africa. Well, for one the Sahara was green. And two, every July the Nile river used to flood like a tsunami. That is until 2 millennia later c.6200 BC. The Sahara dried up and the Nile flooded slowly. Various Neolithic people emerged and disappeared. Then between c.3500 BC to 3200 BC, the Gerzeh culture flourished. They created artifacts similar in style to Mesopotamian cultures, like the flint knife above.

Related: Was ancient Egyptian civilization the descendant of an older civilization?

Matt Riggsby MA Archaeology, Boston University 4y

Sort of, but I think there's a terminological dispute here rather than a substantive one.

Civilization, when historians and archaeologists use the term, has a specific, fairly narrow meaning. It's a complex, hierarchical society characterized by the presence of cities. There's no one yardstick for cities (as opposed to villages) or specific measurement for complexity, but most people who work in the field tend to look for some combination of markers such as:

- Permanent settlements with a population >5000
- Monumental architecture
- Writing
- Craft specialization and persistent class distinctions

There's a complicated process of state formation going on in pre-dynastic Egypt whereby a number of small-scale societies, which lack sufficient complexity to be regarded as civilizations, eventually develop into more or less urban or at least proto-urban societies and fairly quickly into a unified Egypt of the first dynasty. So, then, Egypt saw a brief period of a variety of very similar small-scale civilized societies emerging from the same regional cultural trends, which turned into what we tend to think of a "ancient Egypt," though being both ancient and Egyptian, they're arguably ancient Egypt as well.

That said, civilization in Egypt doesn't go back more than a couple of centuries before the First Dynasty. There are no deeply ancient Egyptian civilizations with levitating horns and alien visitors. That's Stargate, not history.

8.2-kiloyear event - Wikipedia
Gerzeh culture - Wikipedia

Related Links

Where and what do Ancient Egyptians descend from?

Are current Egyptians the Ancient Egyptians, if not then where are they and who are the people which live in Egypt today?

Where did the Egyptian civilization first settle?

How do modern Egyptians feel about Ancient Egyptian history?

What happened to the ancient Egyptian civilizations?

Why is it that Ancient Egypt gets credit for the "oldest civilization in Africa"

About Modern Egyptian imperialism: The Mohammed Pasha dynasty and its impact on African history: - Are Nubians Egyptians?

Firew Afera Afrocentric (2022–present) Oct 31

If your question is about modern history, Nubians being Egyptians has to be the greatest farce (joke) ever told. Let's start from the beginning: During the first half of the nineteenth century, Egypt was led by an Albanian viceroy called Mohammed Pasha. Despite being a viceroy for the Ottoman empire, Mohammed Pasha was nominally independent, and even managed to invade Turkey itself at one point. Thus, Egypt during the 19th century must have been the strongest military power within the African continent.
Now, Mohammed Pasha came to the conclusion that he needed a constant supply of troops to secure his position. The immediate thought that came into his mind were the “negros”.

You are aware that the end of all our effort and this expense is to procure negroes. Please show zeal in carrying out our wishes in the capital matter.

Mohammed Pasha needed a stream of Black slaves from Nubia to be part of his army, and work in various kinds of menial jobs (if they proved to be physically incapable to fight). In other words, he needed to build his military capacity in the Middle East and keep the Egyptian economy, which substantially relied on the slave trade, functioning.

The subsequent Egyptian invasion of Sudan in 1821 was short and cruel. The Shagiya Nubians, who were fighting with traditional weapons, were no match for the well trained, well armed Turco-Egyptian army. However, this was not the end of the story:

After the battle, Ismail Pasha (later would be called Khedive Ismail) promised his soldiers a reward of 50 piastres for each pair of enemy ears they brought him. This led to much savagery and mutilation of civilians as the Egyptian troops, after they had mutilated the Shayqiyya dead, spread out into local villages and began cutting the ears off anyone they found.

Thus, Nubia was conquered by the Egyptian empire in this manner. Muhammed Pasha and his descendants like Seid and Ismail Pasha colonized Nubia (Sudan) for about 60 years. After the grassroot Mahdist rebellion in Sudan was crushed, both Egypt and Sudan would be colonized by the British under the Anglo-Egyptian Condominium. Sudan would get her independence in 1956.

Egyptian lust for empire within Africa did not stop with the subjugation of Nubia. Mohammed Pasha soon started to seek control over Abyssinia (Ethiopia) in a bid to acquire even more slaves, and directly control the source of the Nile river.

However, Egypt eventually would fail to gain hold of Ethiopia. The first expedition into Ethiopia would fail because the British convinced the Pasha to not embark upon the war at the time. The second (fought at Gundet) and third (fought at Gur'a) wars upon Ethiopia were waged by Khedive Ismail (the descendant of Mohammed Pasha), and were concluded with a decisive Ethiopian victory.

Egyptian invasions into Black Africa did not stop at Ethiopia, but continued farther South into the origins of the White Nile. In 1870s, Khedive Ismail financed an expedition into Central Africa, and appointed a British explorer named Samuel Baker to lead the expedition. Baker was tasked with “ending the slave raids happening to the inhabitants.” King Leopold's incursions into Congo, and the subsequent war between his army and Omani Arab slavers (led by Tippu Tip) were motivated by the same false claims of ending slavery.

The southernmost region of South Sudan, which is called “Equatoria" today, was indeed a short-lived Egyptian province won by Samuel Baker during the 1870s.

All these expeditions into Africa, and the hasty modernization attempts started by Mohammed Pasha and his descendants would eventually take their toll on the Egyptian economy. This economic decline would end up in bankruptcy, and would eventuallty make the once “wannabe colonizer” of Africa a mere British colony by 1882.

Now…..

You asked whether Nubians in Egypt are Egyptians or not. The obvious answer to this would be that they are the citizens of Egypt. But, the context regarding the presence of Nubians in Egyptian territory shows us that Nubians there are remanats of Egypt's failed colonization project of Muhammed Pasha’s dynasty, and British colonialism in the form of the Anglo-Egyptian condominium. That is also why describing Nubians as Egyptians would be a farce.

I doubt many Egyptians know about their country's toxic colonial heritage, and the fact that it is historically not different from other European colonizers like France or Germany for Africans. However, there is no doubt that some of them inherited a hateful attitude towards Africa and her inhabitants from their ancestors. Indeed, many Egyptians today show a lot of hate towards countries like Ethiopia and Ethiopian people on the internet…. sometimes for no reason at all. This trend should stop, and it would be beneficial if Egyptians should turn their face away from Black Africans, and towards their own problems i.e. their struggling friends in the Middle East.

Figure 1: Scenes from the Egyptian invasion of Sudan during 1821.

Figure 2: Egypt under Muhammed Pasha's dynasty

Figure 3: Equatoria regions of South Sudan were once colonies of Egypt.

Let’s Discuss Ancient and Medieval Africa

Ali Sarpin Former Writer Wed

By now, it’s common knowledge that Rameses 3rd carried the Y-DNA E1b1a - which is the most common in West Africa. However, for those who missed it, a new study (re-analysis) was released last year, 2021, which reinforced the results of the earlier study done in 2012 (which first revealed Rameses DNA).

If I remember correctly, the results of the first study angered many anti-Blacks who did everything in their power to debunk the study by claiming that “the results were flawed” or “the methods used were too old”...etc etc.

Well, this new study maintains the same results from the earlier one, where Rameses was found to carry E1b1a.

Here is the link,

Insights from ancient DNA analysis of Egyptian human mummies: clues to disease and kinship

Abstract. The molecular Egyptology field started in the mid-eighties with the first publication on the ancient DNA (aDNA) analysis of an Egyptian mummy. Egypt h

https://academic.oup.com/hmg/article/30/R1/R24/5924364?login=false

Related: According to many tests and studies, modern Egyptians are 70 to 90% Egyptian, does this mean that modern Egyptians are direct descendants of ancient Egyptians?

Adam Ramzy Studied Ancient History Updated 1y

Indeed! Modern and ancient Egyptians are Haplogroup E-V68 (e1b1b1a) + some e1b1b1a2. Lower Egyptians are M78 V-22 and upper Egyptians are M78 V-12 (Twin subclades). Modern Egyptians are 70 to 90% Egyptians with a slight increase in Arab ancestry in post-Roman periods. They're the same people. Copts are 80%+ Egyptian and Muslim Egyptians are 70%+ Egyptian.

Detailed answers: Egyptians are 70 to 90% Egyptian

Adam Ramzy's answer to Where did the Ancient Egyptians go?

Adam Ramzy's answer to Does the Egyptian culture still exist?

Adam Ramzy's post in Upper Egyptians

Adam Ramzy's answer to Where do pharaohs descend from?

Adam Ramzy's answer to The paintings and statues of ancient Egyptians clearly show that they looked exactly like modern Egyptians, so why do some selectively ignore that fact?

Alexander Balogun African history Ph.D. 1y

Modern Egyptians today are a melting pot of races and cultures from several foreign occupations and native Egyptians that had been admixing for over 2,800 years. The indigenous ancient Egyptians came from the Southern Upper Nile Valley. They were the descendants of the ancient people from Nabta Playa, Wadi-Halfa, Aswan and the Eastern Desert.

Anthony M Anderson History Fan! Aug 31

Of course!

The majority of the copts are descendants of ancient egyptians who converted to christianity. The majority of the population of egypt which is predominantly Muslim are also descended from the ancient egyptians as well.

DNA even proves that the majority don't have or have less foreign DNA among the copts. This is a DNA of a Coptic egyptian:

Moataz MBA in Finance & Economics, Victoria College, Alexandria Jan 31

Most native Egyptians are direct descendents of ancient Egyptians with native Christians having less foreign admixture then other of thr country fellows.

The vernacular Egyptian Arabic is highly influenced by Old Egyptian in pronunciation, vocabulary and simple sentence syntax Old Egyptian is confined to church liturgy the same way Latin is to Western churches

The exact meaning of Copt and it derivation is native Egyptians. Only during the Ottoman empire that the Turks made a distinction between native Egyptian Muslims calling them Misiri (derived from Semitic name of Egypt) and calling native Christian as Copts.

They're copts who resemble ancient egyptians as well

They expanded their kingdom Northwards through series conquests and occupation. By 3,000 BC they had occupied Northern Egypt through a bloody invasions and sociocultural subjugation.

The modern day Egyptians with the closest ancestry with ancient Egyptians are from the South. Most modern people from the North are descendants of foreign occupiers and inavders who occupied Egypt for over 2,800 years.

Here is an example of the Hyksos (Levant) occupation of Egypt around 1720 BC.

They pushed the ancient Egyptians further South to their ancestral lands.

Related Links

Since the Copts (who are "brown", Middle Eastern people) are proven to be the direct descendants of the Ancient Egyptians, then why do people still argue that the Ancient Egyptians were black?

What is the reason some said that the ancient Egyptians are blacks? Is this really true?

Why do white Westerners claim that Coptic Egyptians are fake descendants of ancient Egyptians & the original Egyptians are white Northwestern Europeans? What do Copts as well as Middle Easterners think of this?

In 23andMe, there is "Egyptian" and "Coptic Egyptian". What is the difference between these two? Aren't the Indeginous Egyptians Coptic Egyptians?

How are Egyptians white if white people were not in Africa back in antiquity? Alexander came thousands of years later. The pyramids were already built thousands of years before Alexander came across black Africans.

If the Arabs invaded Egypt, how can the people there now be ancient Egyptians?

Related: Why are Arabic dialects viewed negatively in the Arab world? It's not just literal Arabic as a language.

Simon Labrunie musafir ba3id 1 Nov.

Excellent question, Yael Champfleuri ! In short, I would say that it is precisely because they " are " Arabic while " not being " literal Arabic. I put quotation marks because, as always, these labels are partly conventional, and produce history as well as political and social considerations. It is therefore on the side of these historical and political causes that we must look for the reasons for the disdain for 'dialects'.

Classifying closely related language varieties as " different languages " or " dialects of the same language " is not really based on linguistic criteria.[1]

[2]Talking about " Egyptian Arabic " and " Tunisian dialect " is not very different, in principle, from saying " northern Gallo-Romance " or " Tuscan dialect " rather than French or Italian - assuming that French and Italian did not become 'national' languages, but continued to live in the shadow of Latin, like Egyptian and Tunisian in the shadow of literal Arabic.

Longer answer...

Classical Arabic enjoys the unrivaled prestige of being the language of the Koran: just think, the language in which God himself dictated his message to humanity! Add to that the pre-Islamic poetry and the major works of the golden age of Arab-Muslim civilization, it is perfectly conceivable that this language appears as the eternal foundation of Arab identity. "Modern Standard Arabic" is just an up-to-date version of it (which is why the two are grouped under the name " literal Arabic ").

The period in which the different varieties of spoken Arabic began to diverge markedly is, roughly, that of the intellectual decline of the Arab-Muslim civilization, after the first centuries of scientific, philosophical and literary ferment. The reasons for this reflux are many and complex, and specialists do not always agree on their relative importance, so I will avoid speculating.

Still, this naturally led to idealizing the language of the past.

Classical Arabic is not only that of Islam (religion and civilization), which an Islamic Sartre would perhaps have qualified as the unsurpassable horizon of humanity. It is also that of a time when "

Since then, if there are dialectal theaters and cinemas, and more generally dialectal literature (especially Egyptian), none of their works rivals classical literature, and the "great" writers (including Egyptians like Taha Husseinor Naguib Mahfouz,among others) use a language whose foundation is classical, even if it is sometimes 'simplified' or makes concessions to dialectal orality. Moreover, all intellectual production (of " non-fiction ", as the Anglos would say: religion, law, philosophy, science, etc.), including translations from other languages, is also done in literal Arabic.

The difference between literal Arabic and the " dialects " is almost of the same order as between Latin and the Romance languages, and the differences between Arabic 'dialects' are also equivalent to those which separate the Romance languages, [3]to the point that some linguists (still a minority) rather speak of " neo-Arabic languages ". Why have some of them (at least those of the big metropolises and capitals) not been constituted in 'national' languages (like certain Romance languages), even if it means leaving to literal Arabic the role of religious, intellectual and inter-Arab and inter-Islamic communication (as Latin remained for centuries in Europe, even beyond the Roman world)? Here are the elements of explanation that come to my mind - that the specialists correct me or complete me.

The Muslim world has never known strong national feeling, and therefore even less nationalism, among the dominant ethnic groups . Theoretically, belonging to Dar al-Islam prevails over any other; this is obviously far from always being the case in practice, but one can imagine that those who benefit the most cling the most to this principle… When the Arabs dominated the caliphate, there was no Arab nationalism, only particularisms and Andalusian, Berber and Iranian demands, which ended up shattering Islamic unity (often, moreover, by taking religious banners). When the Ottoman Empire brought together under its aegis a large part of the Muslim world (and almost all of the Sunni world), reconstituting for a time a neo-caliphate, there was no Turkish nationalism: only Arab and Kurdish particularisms , who allied with the West to deal the last blows.

The intellectual decline of the late Middle Ages was succeeded by the geopolitical and economic decline of the modern and contemporary eras, with its nadir which was colonization, both Ottoman and European (consequence rather than cause of this decline, in my opinion). The Arab renaissance demanded an Arab unity, therefore a common language, which could only be literal Arabic. When the Europeans, then the Americans replaced the Ottomans in the role of 'bosses', the problem hardly changed. A purely Egyptian nationalism, or Algerian, etc., could be put forward for tactical reasons; in substance, it seemed no more imperative than a purely Occitan, Bavarian, or 'padan' nationalism.The discourse of Arab unity, however surreal in practice , seems as prominent in the Arab collective superego as reverence for the language of the Quran and the glorious past. The first Arab country that would grant official status to " its " dialect (problematic notion, the rough limits of dialect sets rarely coinciding with national borders inherited from colonization or history), even on par with literal Arabic, would risk at best seeming to dissociate themselves, at worst to pass for a traitor in a region of the world where sensitivities are exacerbated.

We are therefore almost the opposite of the conditions which presided over the rise of the national languages of Europe , accompanied by the relative decline of Latin, then its hasty erasure, including in the religious domain since Vatican II. Indeed, this development coincided with the meteoric expansion of Europe as a whole, driven, caused and accompanied by the rivalries between increasingly nationalist European states. It is therefore not surprising that the effects were nearly opposite.

Footnotes

[1]A measure of the difference between languages and dialects
[2]How do linguists distinguish between a language and a dialect?
[3]Simon Labrunie's response to What are the differences between the various Arabic languages?

Similar questions

Which Arab people speak and master classical Arabic the best?

Why do the "kabyles" not consider themselves Arabs?

What is the Similarity Between Hebrew and Arabic?

How do you send condolences in Arabic?

Are the Berbers of Arab origin?

Why do we say that Arabic is the richest language?

Why didn't the current Egyptians discover electricity when the ancient Egyptians already did?

Matt Riggsby MA Archaeological Studies, Boston University Sep 1

They did not. There are a lot of myths about sophisticated technology in ancient Egypt, but they don't stand up to any kind of scrutiny. For example, there's an ancient Egyptian relief carving of some sort of oblong shape with a squiggle inside it. The fringe interpretation is that this is a light bulb with a filament inside it. However, it's quite clear that it's a representation of a snake-shaped god emerging from a lotus flower. I say "quite clear" because that's what the associated inscription says about it. You have to ignore what the Egyptians said about their own art to get that interpretation. Ancient Egypt also lacks evidence of power generation facilities and distribution networks, texts about such things, magnets, and use of wire outside of pieces of jewelry. Oh, and sometimes the so-called Baghdad batteries (a pair of late antique scroll cases which inspired a since-debunked hypothesis that they might have been crude wet cell batteries) are attributed to Egypt despite being found hundreds of miles away from Egypt.

In short, ancient Egyptians did not have electricity, they did not discover electricity, they did not know about electricity, and they did not even come close to having the technological capacity to develop electricity.

Related Links

Why did ancient civilizations, such as the Egyptians or the Incas, not discover electricity?

Why did Egyptians stop speaking the ancient Egyptian language?

If Moses was mistaken for an Egyptian baby, then wouldn't Moses be the same color as an Egyptian, who were black?

If modern day Egyptians are not related to the ancient Egyptians, what happened to the ancient Egyptian race?

It only took us about 100 years for us to harness the power of electricity. Ancient egyptians had made a weak battery. What's to say older civilizations didn't have electric based technology and contraptions?

Were the Egyptians black?

How did the Kushites and Ancient Egyptians interact with each other?

Jason Almendra I took "Greek & Latin Roots of English" in college Oct 20

It was hunky-dory. The Nubians traded gold for Egyptian goods. Until the Egyptians colonized them between c.2000–1700 BC. The Egyptians withdrew because the Hyksos usurped the throne. Then again c.1500 to 1100 BC. This time the Egyptians withdrew because of the Sea Peoples invasion. Then Kashta became king of Nubia. He founded the Kushite dynasty. His son Piye invaded Egypt in 744 BC and became Pharaoh. The Assyrians invaded in 656 BC. They kicked out the Cushite dynasty. They reinstated a “native” pharaoh. But the king of Assyria was the overlord.

Mediterranean Sea
Jerusalem
Gaza
Rafah
Rosetta
Damietta
Alexandria
Buto
Sais
Naukratis
Busiris
Tanis
Avaris
Pelusium
Wadi Natrun
Bubastis
Nile Delta Merimda
Heliopolis
Cairo
Giza
Saqqara
Memphis
Helwan
Dahshur
Sinai
Faiyum
Lower Egypt
Meydum
Lahun
Timna
Herakleopolis
Serabit al-Khadim
Gulf of Suez
Gulf of Aqaba
Bahariya Oasis
Beni Hasan
Hermopolis
Amarna
Asyut
Badari
Eastern Desert
Qau
Western Desert
Akhmim
Red Sea
Thinis
Abydos
Dendera
Quseir
Kharga Oasis
Naqada
Koptos
Thebes
Dakhla Oasis
Tod
Upper Egypt
Hierakonpolis
Edfu
Kom Ombo
Aswan
Berenike
Dunqul Oasis
Nabta Playa
Abu Simbel
Wadi Allaqi
Buhen
Kush
Wadi Gabgaba
Nubian Desert
Kerma
Kawa
Napata
Gebel Barkal
Meroe

Nubia - Wikipedia

Twenty-fifth Dynasty of Egypt - Wikipedia

Related Links

Were the ancient Kushites the same people as the ancient Egyptians?

Why didn't Ancient Egyptians bother conquering any lands?

How did ancient Egyptians interact with people from West Africa?

How do you prove the ancient Egyptians were black?

Are there any living modern descendants of the ancient Egyptians?

What was the race of the Ancient Egyptians?

Related: Were the ancient Kushites the same people as the ancient Egyptians?

Spencer McDaniel B.A. in History & Classical Studies, Indiana University,

Bloomington (Graduated 2022) Upvoted by Susan Petrakis, PhD Archaeology & Ancient History, University of Pennsylvania (1999)3y

No. They were not. I am having troubles understanding why so many people have answered this question that they were. The Egyptians never thought that the Kushites were fellow Egyptians. Furthermore, the Egyptians and Kushites spoke completely different languages. The Kushite homeland was located in the land south of Egypt in what is now southern Egypt and northern Sudan.

ABOVE: Map showing the locations of the kingdoms of Egypt and Kush
Although Egyptian culture had a substantial influence on Kushite culture and Kushite culture had some influence on Egyptian culture, Egyptian and Kushite cultures were still significantly different. The Egyptians and Kushites were different peoples with different national identities, different languages, different homelands, and different cultures.

ABOVE: Photograph of the Kushite pyramids at Meroë

As far as genetics are concerned, I do not know how closely the ancient Egyptians and Kushites were related. I reckon they were probably relatively genetically similar, since they lived in close proximity to each other, but, in any case, genetics are irrelevant here because nationality is a cultural construct, not a genetic fact.

Related Links

Were the ancient Kushites the same people as the ancient Egyptians?

Why didn't Ancient Egyptians bother conquering any lands?

How did ancient Egyptians interact with people from West Africa?

How do you prove the ancient Egyptians were black?

Are there any living modern descendants of the ancient Egyptians?

What was the race of the Ancient Egyptians?

Did the Ancient Egyptians have any myths or stories about Moses?

Dick Harfield Lives in Sydney, Australia Oct 16

The extensive Egyptian records now available never mention Moses and indeed contain no mention of Hebrew or Israelite people in Egypt. William G. Dever confirms this, in Who Were the Early Israelites and Where Did They Come From? He says that it must be born in mind that no Egyptian text ever found contains a single reference to "Hebrews" or "Israelites" in Egypt, much less to an "Exodus." Of course, true believers will explain the silence by supposing that the proud Egyptians would never have admitted such a defeat. But archaeology may tell us a different story.

Related Links

What, if any, are the similarities between the myths of ancient Greece and the Christian Bible?

Is it true that John Dee stole all his knowledge from Ancient Egypt?

How did the Greeks convert from their Ancient Greek religion to Christianity?

What's the oldest archaeological evidence of the Bible?

Did ancient Egyptians have an apocalypse myth?

Why did Allah give the ancient Greeks vast knowledge about the world? They Can Egyptians understand other forms of Arabic? If not, why?

Ismail Bashmori Nov 2

We can't understand the spoken Arabic dialect of Syria / Jordan / Lebanon / Palestine, nor that of Algeria / Tunisia / Morocco. Iraq is a maybe and Saudi Arabia and the Gulf states are a yes. However, everyone can understand us.

Related Links

Are modern Egyptians really the descendants of the ancient Egyptians or are they just Arabs?

Can Egyptians understand Sudanese Arabic?

Do Arabs understand the Quran?

Do other Arabs understand Egyptian Arabic, and do they know how to speak it?

Why do Egyptians call themselves Arabs when they are not?

How can I learn to understand the Egyptian Arabic? Ive been hearing Arabic since I was baby but I've never learnt how to understand or speak. Im a teenager and I've had enough of people bullying me for not understanding Arabic. How can I learn?

What is the reason for Nubians being depicted as black in ancient Egyptian art?

Mr Nancy aka Allen Knowledgeable In African and African Diaspora History: Oct 23

Because they were Nilo Saharans and they are depicted very Black because they were among the darkest folks on the planet, but only sometimes, other times they appears closer in color in a chocolate brown hue not unlike their Egyptian counterparts.

https://www.khanacademy.org/humanities/whp-origins/era-3-cities-societies-and-empires-6000-bce-to-700-c-e/33-comparing-early-agrarian-societies-betaa/a/read-ancient-agrarian-societies-nubia-and-ancient-egypt-beta

Discerning Ancient Identity: The Case of Aashyet's Sarcophagus (JE 47267)

https://brill.com/view/journals/jeh/11/1-2/article-p185_8.xml?language=en

Montuhotep II, the pharaoh who unified Ancient Egypt [2061–2010 BCE] - The African History

Mentuhotep II, the sixth ruler of the Eleventh Dynasty. AS an ancient Egyptian pharaoh circa 2061–2010 BCE, He is known for uniting Egypt and ending the troubled First Intermediate Period and becoming the Middle Kingdom's first pharaoh. As per the Turin King List, he reigned for 51 years. Mentuhotep II succeeded his father Intef III on the throne and his https://theafricanhistory.com/1372

EGYPTOLOGY:Why are modern Egyptians so racist towards Nubians?

Firew Afera

Proudly Afrocentric (2022–present) Nov 20

You see… Arabs in general like to reply to allegations about their anti-African racism and slavery by saying that their slavery was non-racial i.e. they enslaved everybody.

That, however, is a lie. Though Islamic laws did not mention anything about the relationship between race and slavery, Arabs themselves clearly differentiated between their slaves. That is why the Turkic and Caucasian slaves, the Mamelukes, became rulers of Egypt while the Africans were treated like below:

The treatment of Africans was in the pictures described above for one fundamental reason; they were considered cheap. Africans were mainly needed for agricultural labour in the Wadis (Oases), whereas other groups of slaves (Indians, Caucasians etc….) mostly became guards and soldiers. The women often became mistresses in the harem. Women from the Caucasus were the most expensive, while African women were the cheapest in terms of price.

Arabs have also associated the Black skin uniquely with slavery since the terms “abd" can linguistically used to refer to a Black person. The word “abd" can't be used for a Turk, Indian etc…. unless the person in question is actually a slave. However, calling a Black person “abd", whether that person is a slave or not, is an obvious trigger due to the deep attachment of Blacks and slavery in the Arab world.

Finally, Arabs often regarded Africans as subhuman in a way similar to the West. At the same time, they did not develop such feelings of despise towards slaves of other races in a way similar to the Africans. This does not mean that other people's aren't ridiculed; it means that Black Africans were often compared to animals, and were often stripped off basic human character.

We can refer to the various writings of the period to confirm this. Since Africans mostly live in tropical regions, they are resistant to malaria, and have the tenacity for labour in the harshest of conditions. This made them fit to extremely tiresome agricultural labour in the oasis. Now, the Arabs often compared the enslaved Africans as nothing but pack beasts due to their natural tenacity or strength.

It is because of the deeply racist nature of Arab society that Prophet Muhammad, and other Muslim scholars cited Black (specifically Ethiopian) people as examples to show that racism is not allowed in Islam. Though Arabs present this as an evidence that they are not racist, what these teachings show is that the prophet and subsequent clerics had to choose the most despised group of people in the area, and use them as a "powerful" example that racism is not allowed by God.

Egyptian racism towards Nubians is not really different to Arab racism to the Black world, and requires little further explanation. In Egypt, Nubians are seen as uneducated, lowly people, and are always sidelined from the mainstream Egyptian society. Nubians are often called akhadam (servants); a common way to refer to Black people since it was thought that Blacks were intellectually deficient to be anything but servants.

Above you can see an Egyptian movie depiction of Black (Nubian) people of the country.

Related Links

Were the Ancient Egyptians racist towards Nubians?

What are the characteristics of Egyptians and Nubians?

Why are some Nubians painted red in ancient Egyptian art?

Why do some who don't believe that the ancient Egyptians were Africans with brown skin, constantly show images of Nubians being captives and being attacked by ancient Egyptians, when the people in the region were of color, and the art is symbolic?

If Egyptians were black, why did they call Nubians/Kushites black?

Are African Americans related to Nubians or ancient Egyptians?

What archaeological evidence do we have of the Israelites' capture and enslavement in Egypt?

Dick Harfield Lives in Sydney, AustraliaJan 18

When the Rosetta stone was first deciphered at the beginning of the nineteenth century, biblical archaeologists eagerly awaited the evidence that Egyptian writings would provide for the Israelites' capture and enslavement in Egypt. They were soon to be disappointed by what they found. We have no evidence the Israelites were ever in Egypt, and considerable contrary evidence. Thomas L. Thompson, one of the premier scholars on this subject, says in The Historicity of the Patriarchal Narratives:

[N]ot only has 'archaeology' not proven a single event of the patriarchal traditions to be historical, it has not shown any of the traditions to be likely. On the basis of what we know of Palestinian history of the Second Millennium B.C., and of what we understand about the formation of the literary traditions of Genesis, it must be concluded that any such historicity as is commonly spoken of in both scholarly and popular works about the patriarchs of Genesis is hardly possible and totally improbable.

Related Links

What is the biblical evidence for the Israelites' enslavement in Egypt?

What evidence do we have that the Jewish people really were enslaved in Egypt?

How did the Hebrews end up as slaves in Egypt? Why did they leave Canaan?

Can you suggest any reading on the archaeological evidence for the Israelites being enslaved in Egypt?

Were the Jews enslaved in ancient Egypt?

What archaeological evidence exists to show that the Hebrews were ever slaves

ARCHAEOLOGY: If you brought a neanderthal baby to our present society and have it adopted by a regular family, how human-like could it become and what human-like skills could it develop on top of the regular neanderthal ones?

Jason Ford

B.A. in Anthropology, New York UniversityUpdated 2y

Neanderthals had very high pitch vocal cords and although their skulls were larger than modern humans a large portion of their brain was solely designated to processing images from their huge eyes, similar to birds of prey.

Neanderthals speak for first time in 50,000 years

Neanderthals Doomed by Vision-Centered Brains

The mystery of Neanderthals' massive eyes

They would not be as smart as modern humans (Humans: Large prefrontal Cortex (forehead), Neanderthals: Small prefrontal cortex but had a large occipital lobe for seeing in low light). The Prefrontal Cortex controls orchestration of thoughts , planning, complex cognitive behavior, personality expression, decision making, and moderating social behavior. Also a larger portion of their brain was used regulate their stronger body. And anatomically they look odd in comparison.

Comparative example of their facial structure:

The high, straight forehead that characterizes modern humans, superceding the prominent brow ridges of others hominids, is due to the expansion of the cortex, and especially the prefrontal cortex, in our species.

1. Australopithecus robustus 2. Homo habilis 3. Homo erectus 4. Homo Heidelbergensis
5. Homo neanderthalensis 6. Homo sapiens sapiens

The Neanderthal child would probably be considered mentally challenged. They might be misdiagnosed as having a form of microcephaly due to the small forehead. Reconstructing the Neanderthal brain using computational anatomy

The stocky neck paired with the strong brow ridge, small forehead, extra hairy body, and the helium influenced sounding high pitch voice would cause an instant spectacle.

Update: Over the last 10 years since it was discovered that most people have Neanderthal DNA, "Caveman" have undergone a media makeover to ease the notion of having Neanderthal DNA. They went from this:

to this (notice hair hiding the small forehead):

However, atomically they would’t pass for “normal”. No person alive has higher than 5% Neanderthal DNA.

Their foreheads were extremely small and sloping compared to modern humans. Because of this their eyes sit higher on their skull than modern humans. People born with microcephaly have very similar forehead dimensions, although Neanderthal skulls are much larger than a modern humans.

An Adult male with microcephaly:

A child with microcephaly:

Note the difference in the forehead between a Modern Human child and a Neanderthal child:

Modern Human Child
Neanderthal Child

Modern Human:	Neanderthal:
Prominent forehead	Smaller forhead
Smaller Brow ridge	Larger Brow ridge
Smaller eyes	Larger eyes
Eyes lower on skull	Eyes higher on skull
Smaller nose	Larger nose
Smaller teeth	Larger teeth
Smaller jaw	Larger jaw

Modern Human

Neanderthal

The following pictures are more of an accurate depiction of Neanderthals. Note the brow ridge, small forehead and huge gorilla like skull. It would be upsetting for most to see a short, hairy, high pitch squealing person with these features.

*And according to recent studies, even if someone carries the DNA of Neanderthals there is a good chance that only a few of their genes are expressed in modern humans due to incompatibility Modern men do not carry the Neanderthal gene, new study claims. This would explain why the first humans to settle in what is now the UK (Cheddar man) did not have the light skin that our Neanderthal cousins had. However more research is needed.

Early Briton had dark skin and blue eyes

Related: Would we get along with Neanderthals if they were still around today?

TJ Berens Aerospace Defense Consultant. Updated 3y

Note the very prominent brow ridges framing the eyes.

Note the high sagittal crest at the top of the skull.

Note the receding chin.

Note the receding forehead.

Note all the skull mass/length behind the jawline.

Note the angle of the jawline.

Note the rather strong nose bone, and huge nose opening.

A large male Neanderthal was about 170 pounds and about 5.5 feet tall.

So, most recent artistic conceptions worked to make them look as much like a modern person as possible … using beards to hide the receding chins, hair style/hats, etc., to hide the receding forehead and crest at the top of the skull, fore angles and so forth to prevent seeing all the rear skull areas, and shadowing and angles to help deemphasize the large bone ridges around the eyes, etc.

The older reconstructions went too far the other way, making them look far too "ape-like".

So, dressed in nice suit, with the right haircut and accessories … you'd probably accept one of these guys as human in a crowd unless you looked too closely.

They WERE definitely people … just not EXACTLY like sapiens. The later stage Homo erectus were basically us … but the Neanderthals evolved from early/mid stage erectus, and simply went another direction. :D

So, that said, they were visibly different. Some had dark skin, some had light skin, some had olive skin, etc … just like sapiens … and, if some of us simply looked like that, we'd probably accept it as part of human variety.

Given how we tend to label those different than us, I can't say we'd "get along" … but, given history, we'd probably have effed them to extinction the way we did the first time. :D

Related Links

If you cut his hair, cleaned him up, and put him in nice clothes, could a Neanderthal walk down the street without attracting attention?

Could a modern Human beat a Neanderthal in a fist fight?

Could a female Neanderthal get impregnated by a male human and did human man and Neanderthal woman hook up?

If Neanderthals still existed, would they be classified as just another race, or as a different species?

Would an ancient neanderthal man be attracted to a modern day attractive female woman?

What are the main differences among Neanderthals, Denisovans and Homo Sapiens?

COUNTRY FACT FILE

Location: Northeastern corner of Africa.

Official title of the state: Arab Republic of Egypt (al-Misr)

Jumhuriyat Misr Al-Arabiyah (Arabic)

Flag description:

Three equal horizontal bands of red (top), white, and black: the national emblem (a gold Eagle of Saladin facing the hoist side with a shield superimposed on its chest above a scroll bearing the name of the country in Arabic) centered in the white band: the band colors derive from the Arab Liberation flag and represent oppression (black), overcome through bloody struggle (red), to be replaced by a bright future (white). Note: similar to the flag of Syria, which has two green stars in the white band, Iraq, which has an Arabic inscription centered in the white band, and Yemen, which has a plain white band.

Neighbours

Libya on W., Sudan on S. Israel i.e. Asia Minor on E.

Land boundaries: total 2,665 km. Border countries: Asia-minor (Gaza-strip) 11km, Israel 266 km. Libya 1,115 km, Sudan 1,273 km.

Founder of The Nation
King Farouke I (as Monarchial Head of Egypt)

Local division
29 Governorates (Muhafazat).

Government type
Arab Republic - semi-presidential

Legislation chamber
Bicameral system of parliament

Form of State
Republic:

President elected by popular vote for a six-year term with no term-limits.Arab republic with two legislative houses consists of the Majlis Al Shoura (Advisory council) 264 seats, members to serve for six-year terms. The People's Assembly (Majlis Al-Shaab) 454 seats, members are elected by popular vote to serve for five-year terms.

Executive branch

Separated by chief of State and head of Government. President elected by a National referendum through a Yes-No vote for six-year terms without presidential term limits. Head of Government to be appointed by the President. President, Prime Minister, Bi-cameral parliamentary system.

Former Rulers

1922 - 1953 King Farouk
1953-1956: General Mohammed Naguib
1956-1970: Colonel Gamal Abed Al Nasser
1970-1981: Army Majour Anwar El-Sadat.
1981-2011: Air-Marshal Mohammed Hosni Mubarak
2011-2012: Field Marshal Mohammed Tantawi
2012 – Mohammed Mursi
2014- Abdulfatah Al-Sisi

Judicial chamber

Supreme constitutional court.

Capital city

Cairo (Arabic El-Qahirah) Altitude 25 mtrs/82 ft

Geographic coordinates - 30.03N , 31.15E. The national capital of Egypt, a port on the Nile near the head of the delta, and the largest city in Africa."El-Qahira" is Arabic meaning for "the conqueror", believed to be founded on about 969 century by the fatamid dynasty it was later fortified against the crusaders by Salhadin, whos citadel (built in C. 1179) still survives. Cairo’s mosques include that of Al-Azhar, a religious centre
(972) housing an Islamic university said to be the oldest in the world and the leading centre of Koranic studies. Islamic Cairo has been designated a world heritage site by UNESCO. Old Cairo, a crowded maze of ancient houses and 400 mosques lies in the south of the built -up area: new Cairo with its modern hotels and office buildings, and three universities, lies to the north and west. Cairo has many light industries including tourism.

Names of main towns

Alexandria (Al-Iskandriyah), Suez (As-Suways), Giza (Al-Jizah), Ismaelia (Al-Ismiliyah), EL-Khaima, Mehalla, El-Shubra

Date of independence

22nd February, 1922

Religions

Muslim (mostly Sunni) 90%, Coptic-Christians 9%, Christian 1%

Main spoken languages

Arabic (official), English and French widely understood by educated classes.

Currency unit

Egyptian Pound (EGP)=100 Piastres

Area in Km2

1,001,450.00

Country area comparison in Africa

12 out of 55 states

Demographic terms:

Average annual population growth rate 1.997 %

Birth rate 25.02 births per 1,000 population

Death rate 4.85 deaths per 1,000 population

Average life expectancy: 72.4 years

Male 69.82 years: Female 75.1 years
Illiteracy rate (%)

Male: 19, Female: 40

Average per capita income

USD 6, 200

Population density

83/km2

Contributor groups

Farming, Fishing: 14, Industry: 17, Social service: 51

Main Export Items:

Petroleum products, raw-Cotton, yarn, textiles, metal products

Economy is based on:

Agro-industry, Tourism & Suez-canal port services for shipping. A growing population against dwindling natural resources and high unemployment rates. There is high rate of migration to other countries in search for employment opportunities by young graduates.

Climate

Desert: Hot and dry summer with mild-winter

Extremes:

Lowest point: Qattara Depression -133 meters.

Highest point: Mt. Catherine 2,629 meters.

Weather of the Capital city (Greater-Cairo) average annual temperature 21.5 oc.

Altitude 25 mtrs/82 ft

Hottest Month July 21-36oc Daily Ave.

Coldest Month January 8-18oc.

Driest Month July-August 0 mm average Rf.
Wettest Month December 5mm average Rf.

Measures

Metric system, local measures also used

Time zone

GMT/UTC+2 (In summer times, 3 hours ahead)

Public holidays

All Muslim holidays, Coptic-Christian holidays

Ethnic groups

Egyptian Bedouins, Nubians.

Topographic & Environmental concern

Almost entirely desolate and barren with hills and mountains in E. and along Nile. The Nile-valley where most of the people live stretches 550 miles. Environment: Agricultural land being lost to urbanization and windblown sands: increasing soil salination below Aswan High Dam: desertification: oil pollution threatening coral reefs, beaches, and marine habitats: other water pollution from agricultural pesticides, raw sewage, and industrial effluents: limited natural freshwater resources away from the Nile, which is the only perennial water source: rapid growth in population overstraining the Nile and natural resources.

Economy Overview

Industry

Textiles, food processing, tourism, pharmaceuticals, hydro-carbons, chemicals, petro-chemicals, cement, construction, light-manufacturing, canal services. Construction and service sectors are the main economic drivers.

Chief crops

Cotton (one of largest product), rice, beans, fruits, grapes, vegetables, sugarcane, cattle, sheep, goats.

Natural resources

Oil, Gas, Phosphate, Iron ore, Gold, Manganese, Limestone, Gypsum, Talc, Asbestos, Lead, Zinc, Nile water Papyrus plant, other resources.

Land in use (%)

Arable land: 4

Grassland: NA

Forest woods: NA

Others: 98

Note: A rapidly growing population with limited arable land, faces dependence on the Nile River flow.

Marine

Coastline: 2450 km.

Commercial Sea ports:-

Alexandria (main port), Ismaelia, Suez, Port Said

Development prospect:

Egypt's best real growth estimate for 2011 standing at a mere 1.2%, the country's economic downturn has had a sobering effect on public morale, while paradoxically boosting the Egyptian military's standing. Egypt's foreign reserves fell to $22bn in October, down from $36bn before the Arab uprising. The country's main foreign currency earner, tourism, picked up towards the end of the year, according to the tourism ministry, but this was after a sharp 25% drop in 2011 compared with the previous year. In the meantime, the Egyptian military has been struggling to inject aid into the economy. It turned down an IMF loan in June, 2012 saying it did not want to amass new foreign debts, but finance minister Hazem Beblawi later said that the decision might be revisited in the light of Egypt's needs. It seems that the billions of dollars of promised Arab aid might not materialize as quickly as once hoped.

GYPT: NILE (HYDRO) POLITICS: Irrigation, Power-Grids, and Environmental concerns et-al'

River Nile:- English 'Nile River', Arabic 'Baḥr Al-Nīl' or 'Nahr Al-Nīl' river, the father of African rivers and the longest river in the world. It rises south of the Equator and flows northward through northeastern Africa to drain into the Mediterranean Sea. –Encyclopidia Britanica

The Nile is the longest river in the world and runs through Rwanda, Ethiopia, Tanzania, Uganda, South Sudan, Sudan and Egypt, but instead of the being the great uniter, the Nile has become the great divider because of a dispute that is causing serious tension between two of those countries.

Since the twelveth century AD, Christian Ethiopian kings have warned Muslim Egyptian sultans of their power to divert waters of the Blue Nile, often in response to religious conflicts. But these were hypothetical threats.

The Blue Nile River - The source of over 80pc of the water that eventually enters the Nile River system. The Blue Nile starts in Lake Tana in Ethiopia and flows through tall, narrow chasms to the Sudan border. Within Sudan, the Blue Nile meets the White Nile, in Khartoum, and from there flows into Egypt. For many years, all the Nile's water has been divided between the Sudan and Egypt: any other country that dared to touch the Nile was met with stern threats from Egypt and its protectors: first The Great Britain.

EGYPT - Gift of the Nile’

The opening sentence of Egypt's new constitution describes the country as the river Nile's gift to Egyptians. The founding myths of many ancient civilizations center on famous rivers — the Euphrates and the Tigris (Babylon), the Yangtze (China) and the Ganges (India), to name a few. However, not many are as inextricably dependent on a single river for their livelihood as Egypt is on the Nile. Egypt’s history is defined as much by the flooding and drying beds of the Nile as by the pyramids. For a country described by Herodotus as “the gift of the Nile,” control over the majestic river has been an existential Egyptian preoccupation since antiquity.

The world’s longest river is made up of a maze of tributaries. Nineteenth-century explorers went on a wild goose chase to locate the mysterious river’s murky origin before tracing it to Lake Tana in Ethiopia and the Great Lakes in Central Africa. Two of the river’s main tributaries are the Blue Nile and the White Nile. The Blue Nile, accounting for upwards of 80 percent of the Nile waters, originates in northern Ethiopia. It makes a steep descent from Ethiopian highlands — carrying brown silt — before it joins the White Nile in Khartoum, Sudan’s capital, augmented by several large rivers from southwestern Ethiopia. The White Nile originates in Burundi and flows northward from the Great Lakes region, crossing Tanzania, Uganda, and South Sudan.

Egypt and the Nile river flow’

The Nile has been essential for civilization in Egypt and Sudan. Without that water, there would have been no food, no people, no state, and no monuments. As Herodutus famously wrote in the 5th century B.C.E., “Egypt is the gift of the Nile.” For millennia peoples have travelled along the banks of the Nile and its tributaries. Scores of ethnic groups in Egypt, Ethiopia, and Sudan share architecture and engineering, ideas and traditions of religion and political organization, languages and alphabets, food and agricultural practices. In 3000 B.C.E., when the first Egyptian dynasty unified the lower and upper parts of the Nile River, there were no states in Eastern or Central Africa to challenge Egypt's access to Nile waters. The Nile was a mysterious god: sometimes beneficent, sometimes vengeful. Floods between June and September, the months of peak flow, could wipe out entire villages, drowning thousands of people. Floods also brought the brown silt that nourished the delta, one of the world's most productive agricultural regions, feeding not only Egypt but many of its neighbors.

Nile's central importance to Egyptian life is captured in A Hymn to the Nile, recorded in Papyrus Sallier II:

Hail to thee, O Nile, that issues from the earth and comes to keep Egypt alive!
…

He that waters the meadows which He created …

He that makes to drink the desert …

He who makes barley and brings emmer into being …

He who brings grass into being for the cattle …

He who makes every beloved tree to grow …
Oh, Nile, verdant art thou, who makes man and cattle to live.

The Nile's seasonal flooding is a central theme in Egyptian his tory. The river flow follows regular patterns, increasing between May 17 and July 6, peaking in September, and then receding until the next year. But the river volume is very unpredictable, as documented by nilometers (multi -storied structures built in the river to measure water heights). Successive empires of Pharaohs, Greeks, Romans, Christian Copts, and Muslims celebrated the rising waters of the Nile and dreaded floods or droughts. Five millennia of Nile history show how years with high water have produced ample food, population growth, and magnificent monuments, as during the first five dynasties from 3050 B.C.E. to 2480 B.C.E. Periods with low water have brought famine and disorder. The Book of Genesis describes seven years of famine that historians associate with the drought of 1740 B.C.E. From the time of the Pharaohs until 1800 C.E., Egypt's population rose and fell between 2 to 5 million, due to food availability and epidemics. The irrigation projects of the 19th century Ottoman ruler Mohammad Ali allowed year-around cultivation, causing population growth from 4 to 10 million. Since the opening of the Aswan High Dam in 1971, Egypt's population has increased from about 30 to 83 million.

The Sources of the Nile: Despite the extraordinary importance of the Nile to people downstream, the origin of the great river was a mystery until the middle twentieth century. Herodotus speculated that the Nile arose between the peaks of Crophi and Mophi, south of the first cataract. In 140 C.E. Ptolemy suggested the source was the Mountains of the Moon, in what are now called the Ruwenzori Mountains in Uganda. The 11th century Arab geographer al-Bakri postulated West African origins, confusing the Niger River, which empties into the Atlantic Ocean, with the Nile River. In 1770 the Scottish explorer James Bruce claimed his discovery of the source in Ethiopia, while in 1862 John Hanning Speke thought he found it in Lake Victoria and the equatorial lakes. The river's limited navigability only increased its mystery. The Blue Nile River descends 4501 feet in 560 miles from Lake Tana in the Ethiopian highlands through a deep gorge with crocodiles, hippopotamuses, and bandits to the Sudan border and the savannah. Despite the efforts of scores of intrepid adventurers, the Blue Nile in Ethiopia was not successfully navigated until 1968 by a team of British and Ethiopian soldiers and civilians equipped by the Royal Military College of Science.

Further south up the White Nile in the lakes and rivers of Burundi, Rwanda, Kenya, Tanzania, and Uganda, the Egyptian cultural influence is less pronounced, due to the Sudd, a gigantic and impassable swamp which absorbs waters from the equatorial lake tributaries. The Nile River historian Robert O. Collins reports that “no one passed through this primordial bog” until 1841. Not until the 20th century did it become clear that the Nile is part of a vast river system with dozens of tributaries, streams, and lakes, stretching from the Mediterranean Sea to the remote mountains of Burundi, in tropical central Africa, and to the highlands of Ethiopia, in the Horn of Africa. Spanning more than 4,200 miles, it is the longest river in the world. It has also become clear that the volume of water which flows through the Nile is relatively small—a mere two percent in volume of the Amazon’s and fifteen percent of the Mississippi—and mostly (86%) from Ethiopia.

Who owns the Nile?

Egypt and Sudan are utterly dependent on the waters of the Nile River. Over the past century both of these desert countries have built several dams and reservoirs, hoping to limit the ravages of droughts and floods which have so defined their histories.

The Nile’s origin being outside its borders did not prevent Egypt from getting the lion’s share of its waters. The claim for exclusive ownership of the Nile waters is premised on a 1929 treaty between Egypt and Britain’s East African colonies, Burundi, Kenya, Rwanda, Tanzania and Uganda. These colonies gained independence from Britain in the 1960s. The treaty awarded 57 percent of the waters to Egypt while also requiring other nations to clear with Cairo before launching any major water project on the river. Another treaty, signed in 1959 between Egypt and Sudan, raised Egypt’s share to 66 percent. The two signatories, divvying up virtually all of the Nile waters, did not even consult Ethiopia, the main source of the river. After the 1959 accord, both Egypt and Sudan built mega-dams to exploit the water for irrigation. For years, upstream Nile Basin countries — Burundi, Ethiopia, Kenya, Rwanda, Tanzania and Uganda — nursed misgivings about the colonial-era accord, in which they had no say. However, they grudgingly acquiesced mainly because, unlike Egypt and Sudan, whose arid lands are watered by the lone river, they are not wholly reliant on the Nile. But, finding the challenge of feeding their growing populations on rain-fed subsistence farming unbearable, upstream countries initiated negotiations in 1999 to find an equitable and reasonable way to share the Nile waters. The decade-long negotiations resulted in the 2010 Cooperative Framework Agreement, known as the Entebbe Agreement. The landmark accord, signed by the six upstream countries, was rejected outright by both Egypt and Sudan. Touted as “an African solution for an African problem,” the agreement calls for the creation of a commission to oversee development projects on the Nile. It needed ratification by the legislatures of each of the signatory countries. But its implementation is in limbo until another Nile Basin country — for example, the Democratic Republic of the Congo, which is now sitting on the fence signs it.

Egypt, Ethiopia, and the Historical Struggle for the Nile Waters’

Ethiopia and Egypt have had a long relationship of both harmony and discord, the latter the result of religious issues and access to Nile water, among other factors. Ethiopia’s first well documented government was in Aksum, a city-state that controlled a large empire from the Ethiopian highlands across the Red Sea to Yemen. From 100 until 800 C.E. Aksumites participated in Mediterranean and Indian Ocean trade. The cultural relationship between Egypt and Ethiopia was institutionalized when the Aksumite King Ezana converted to Christianity in 330 C.E. For 16 centuries (until 1959) the Egyptian bishop of the Ethiopian Orthodox Church was appointed by the Egyptian patriarch in Alexandria, often under the influence of the Egyptian government.

Ethiopia is one of 10- or so on to become 11, with the newly reemerged state of South Sudan “Nile Basin Riparian countries”. With over eighty five million population is gifted with diversified and eye-catching cultural, historical and natural heritages. One of the natural resources is water. The nation is home of 12 international potential rivers. The land dispenses and cotributes a lion share of water to the neighbouring countries, the country is said to have over 128.3 billion cubic meter under surface water. Thus, Ethiopia is called "water tower of Africa". Awash, Wabe-Shebelle, Omo, Baro, Mereb, tekeze, Abbay, Ganalle some among others are potential rivers those originate from Ethiopian highlands and discharge into Djibouti, Somalia, Kenya, Sudan, and Egypt. For the peoples of Egypt, Sudan and Somalia, life would be impossible without Nile rivers. They carry millions of tons of rich soil to Egypt, the Sudan and Somalia every year. Somalia depends heavily on the Gannaallee (Juba) and Wabee (Shaballe) rivers, which come from Ethiopia. Ethiopia supplies almost 100 per-cent of the fresh water for Somalia and Djibouti. At present the Ethiopian government depends heavily on Awash in local Oromos known as "Hawas" water as a source of electric power for its industries and irrigation water to grow sugar cane, cotton and fruits. The Wonji and Matahara sugar estates are good examples. There is a great potential in all these rivers for the production of electric power and for irrigation. Qoqaa, Fincha, Malkaa Waakkenna, Gibee-Tiqqaa, Gibe II, dams are examples of where hydro-electric power is already being produced or in the process of being harnessed. Among the lakes are Tanna, Abbaya, Langanno and Shalla. Many of these lakes possess a great variety of fish and birds on their islands and shores. The river Wabe Shebelle flows to the Indian Ocean crossing Somalia. These rivers have been flowing to the stated destinations carrying millions tons of fertile soil and waters every year without benefiting to its own people since creation. The people of Ethiopia had been deprived of benefiting from the country's water resources. As a result, they were exposed to repeated shocking drought and famine which had claimed hundreds of thousands of lives. Ethiopian tributaries contribute about 84 % of the water that flows through Sudan and reaches the Aswan Dam in Egypt. Earlier treaties of 1929 and 1959 between Egypt and the Sudan allocated three-quarters of the water to Egypt and one-quarter of it to Sudan. A lot has been said, patriotic poems have been composed, beutiful songs has sung in its honor, accords has have been signed, major-wars were fought and boundaries were demarcated, about the River-Abbay and the Blue-Nile as a whole. And on the other side, "Egypt is a gift of the Nile", people like to say in a country that worshiped the river as a God in ancient Egypt. "If Egypt is a gift of the Nile, then the "Nile is a gift of Ethiopia", Ethiopians back-fire sympathy regarding the "tikur-Abay", which is meaning for "Blue-Nile". Most of the water meandering down the lower reaches of the Nile, the world's longest river, comes from the Ethiopian highlands. "In 1805, by the time Mohammed Ali began to rule Egypt, many threats had been made by the Ethiopian emperors to stop the water reaching Egypt, most were just empty threats, but some were valid, everytime there was a new ruler in Egypt, they would threaten him and blackmail him so that, he paid gold as a gift to the Ethiopian emperor. Historically, the most important relationships Israel built in the African continent were with Uganda, Ethiopia and Kenya. And it's no coincidence that all of them are upstream countries where the Nile originates. They did build relationships with other countries too. But the River-Nile was the major factor behind the formation of Israeli foreign policy and strategy", according to Egyptian historians. These fears have made Egypt suspicious about reported plans to divert the Nile to it's former enemy, possibly Israel. And they have led it into a tense stand-off with another country, possibly Ethiopia, an upstream country with the potential to dramatically affect the amount of water reaching Egypt. The battle for control of the Nile is at the heart of geo-political rivalries with Israel and Ethiopia on the Nile remains focal, as Egyptian-Israeli affairs expert.

In 1959, Egypt & Sudan met and agreed on how to share the waters of the Nile as it flowed through their largely arid lands on the way to the Mediterranean. It was a renewal of river rights they had enjoyed since the British signed an agreement with the two countries in 1929. Ethiopia, which provides an estimated 85 percent of the flow into Lake Nasser from the Abay and other watersheds to the south, was not invited. Emperor Haile Selassie wrote a letter of protest, to no avail. After the 1979 Camp David agreement returning the Sinai Peninsula to Egypt, with the announcement of late president Anwar El-Sadat the launch of the Salaam Canal which would divert Nile waters to the Peninsula by siphoning the waters beneath the Suez Canal. Lt Colonel Mengistu Haile Mariam, then ruler of Ethiopia, protested to the United Nations, to no avail. Tekezie and the Tana-Beles projects in Amhara and Tigrai regions, the issue of Nile politics has resurfaced once again. It is obvious that Ethiopia is located in or the proximity of a region where water is becoming a scarce resource and will likely be the source of future conflicts or wars. The pressure on or demand for this resource is increasing as a consequence of increasing population and unfavourable climatic changes in the region. Despite facing persistent and devastating famines, the Nile issue is getting onto a vital component of the national interest of Ethiopia. A study on a river basin development made in Ethiopia in the early 1960s with the help of the Americans, speaks of no less than one hundred sites naturally suited for tapping hydro-electric power and huge irrigation potential that allow multiple harvesting or crops in a given year in the Blue-Nile basin alone. Add the eastern river basins- the Wabe-Shebelle and Ghenalle. Of course, Ethiopia has not used or underused it's water resources including the waters of the Blue-Nile for various reasons, it is ironical to witness Ethiopia which is also called "Afica's water tower" suffering from periodic drought related famines, droughts or failing rains are not the sole causes of famine in Ethiopia, where in control of the fertile or productive lands of the country as perhaps on a land-selling spree a regime also should take it's significant share of blames. Ethiopia has many big rivers, about eleven lakes, nine saline lakes, four crater lakes, and over twelve major swampy areas. Almost all of the rivers flow from highlands of Ethiopia to the lowlands neighboring countries. Eg. about eighteen Ethiopian rivers flow to the Sudan and cross the border at six different places, three of them being big perenial rivers from southern Ethiopia while the other three are seasonal rivers of the north. Also some four rivers from the Arssi-Bale highlands flow toward Somalia in different directions, three of them merging at the Ethio-Somali border to form the Wabi-Shebelle as known as Juba-River in Somalia. The Omo-River flows from the southwest highlands of Kaffa region to Kenya and forms "Lake Turkana", the biggest desert lake in the world. The Awash-River ends up in lake Abbe at the Ethio-Djibouti border. Unlike what is traditionally claimed, major Ethiopian rivers do not originate from the semi-arid semien highlands of Abyssinya or from the desert lowlands of Afar or Ogadien. Instead, Ethiopian primary water sources are formed from the streamsand lakes of the countrys rainforest regions. Rivers that arise from the northern semi -arid highlands of the Amhara and Tigrai regions do flow westwards in the direction of the Sudan. Those rivers arise from the west side of the rift valley in Arssi, Bale, Chercher and Gara-Mulatta mountains flow towards Somalia. Those originating from Tulama (in central region of Shoa) and from the rift valley area flows towards Djibouti, whereas numerous others originating from the tropical rainforest highlands of southwestern Ethiopia flow in three directions to the Blue-Nile, to the Black-Nile and to the Omo-River. The locally known, Abay-wonz a main tributary of the Blue-Nile originates from Lake-Tana, as lakes are reservoirs, and they discharge an amount of the river proportional to intakes coming from inflowing streams, rivers and precipitations.

Since decade the Nile is at the centre of geo-political rivalry within the region, under the existing accord, Egypt has veto power over development projects over the Nile, but upstream countries say they should not be bound by unfair British colonial era pacts. Since the Nile is an international cross-border river, no country can justify sole ownership or an equitable use of it's waters and efforts aimed at having in place agreements for equitable and fair use of this resource are of crucial importance. An arrangement which is known to be based on the British colonial interests favouring especially Egypt & the Sudan is unjust and unfair and is not legally binding, the parties much related to the Nile can not be bound by it. Egypt and the Sudan can exploit Ethiopia's current weak position or absence to retain or secure the former colonial treaties of 1929 and 1959 on the use of the Nile waters, for example the first treaty on Nile -sharing was signed b/n Great Britain and Egypt in 1929 granted the Sudan 4 bln cubic metres of water while 48 bln cubic metres of water granted to Egypt alone, the second water-sharing treaty of 1959, granted the Sudan 18.5 bln cubic metres of water while 55.5 bln cubic metres of water given to Egypt alone, meaning that one-fourth for Sudan and three-fourth for Egypt excluding headwater countries. As stated above, these treaties are known to favour only Egypt and has remained contentious, for this reason, Egypt's direct and indirect hand, through other fellow Arab states to distabilise Ethiopia is known to be connected to the Nile issue. Ethiopia is not only the source of most of the waters of the Nile but almost all of the fertile and rich-soil making particularly significant contributions to Egyptian agriculture.

The Nile has played a significant role in the emergence and growth of the ancient Egyptian civilization and is the lifeline of the present day Egypt. The late president Anwar El-Sadat quoted as saying in 1980, "If Ethiopia takes any action to block our right to the Nile waters, there will be no alternative for us but to use force, tampering with the rights of a nation to water is tampering with it's life and a decision to go to war on this score is indisputable in the international community". Various expeditions were launched to find the source of the Nile, thus a lot is at stake in the Nil e issue. The Egyptians use of the Nile reached at 95% while the Sudan's use of the Nile reached at 77%, believed the Blue-Nile contributes approximately 80 to 85% of the Nile river discharge and 96% of the transported sediment carried by the Nile originates in Ethiopia with 59% of the water from the Blue-Nile, the rest being from Tekeze, Atbara, Sobat, and small tributaries. The erosion and transportation of silt only occurs during the Ethiopian rainy season in the summer, when rainfall is especially high on the Ethiopian plateaus. Egypt maintains it's heavy utilization for various projects, wasting over 20% of the water, (it's more than what all up-stream countries demand to use) due to inefficient dams built in the desert. For Ethiopia, if there is a single war worth sacrificing the blood of it's children, it is the fight to break-open Egypt's century-old blockade of the Nile river. In Ethiopia, it is long held conventional wisdom that Egypt is directly or indirectly behind most domestic, regional and international crisis situation affecting Ethiopia at any given time. Ethiopian empires and regimes have for long pointed-out gross Egyptian interference including among others that Egypt. Attempts and often has succeeded in blocking or modifying Ethiopian requests and interaction with international financial institutions: provides political, diplomatic and operational support to virtually any group organised against the Ethiopia: holds as a strategic objectives to do what ever it takes to keep Ethiopia poor, weak and devided: Egypt greatly resents any sign of Ethiopian influence in the region in Somalia, Djibouti, the Sudan and Yemen: At it's heart Egypt, where suspicions about former enemies and tensions with an old-age civilization reveal deepseated fears about water scarcity and losing control of the river. For such a reason, Egypt interferes in Ethiopia's relations with the Arab world too. Year after year, lacking technical, financial, and most importantly determined leadership, Ethiopian farmers watch as the rainfall washes their fertile soil away and gives it to Egypt, thus there has always been basis for popular resentment and anger towards Egypt for it's unjust use of the Nile. The above riperian as well as the down- stream countries of the Nile need to work-out and accept a fair and just agreement for the equitable and sustainable use of the Nile waters. Egypt, which have been struggling to keep Ethiopia landlocked, it's strategic motive is expressed constantly by its politicians, has been to keep Ethiopia, which is vastly more fertile than Egypt and which controls the headwaters of the Blue-Nile, which provides Egypt and the Sudan with most of it's waters from posing a strategic threat to Egypt by potentially, cutting-off the flow of Blue-Nile waters & it's tributaries. Destabilising and weakening successive Ethiopian governments has been Egypt's most efficiently exploited strategy to protect it's monopolistic use of the Nile water. Cognizant of the internal contradictions and historical animosities among various Ethiopian constituencies. In 1979 Egyptian President Anwar El-Sadat threatened war on violators of what he saw as his country’s rights to Nile waters. Upriver countries Ethiopia, Kenya, Uganda, Rwanda, Burundi, and Tanzania argue that they too need the water that originates on their lands.

Egypt has often supported rebel groups fighting against Ethiopian rulers, this support has been bothdirect and indirect, in the past it armed the Eritrean scessionist movements, with continuous training, sanctuary in the Sudan, even until the EPLF itself making a significan challenge to the Sudanese government, and the Tigrean rebels, backed the Oromo & Somali-insurgents in Ethiopia, and also supported former President Siad Barre's invasion of Ethiopia in the summer of 1977, reportedly there was even a plan to resettle millions of Egyptians in Somalia in order to couter-balance Ethiopia's growing population. Ethiopia has also alleged that Egypt took sides with Eritrean regime during the 1998 to 2000 border conflict. There is little doubt that Egypt has been using Eritrea to channel it's support for various Ethiopian and Somali insurgents. This pointedly, also, meant that Egypt supported a policy of "constraining the headwaterland or by weakening Ethiopia", by any means from easy access to the Red Sea, which Ethiopia had once been dominated at it's lower reaches, through the ex-Ethiopian Naval Force. And many believed, this Egyptian strategy has been fruitful given the unfortunate fact that every Ethiopian ruler has relied heavily on violent suppression of dissent, and the implementation of policies that favours one ethnic-group over the other, thus creating favourable domestic conditions for armed insurgency. The revised agreement signed Burundi Ethiopia, Uganda, Tanzania, Kenya, and Rwanda have signed the treaty so far, to plans allow irrigation and hydro-electric projects to go ahead without Egypt's consent, the Congo has to sign within a year period in an attempt to end Egypt's historical control over the Nile's water. Ethiopia is the biggest source of the Blue-Nile waters contributing over 85% of it although Egypt and Sudan benefit from more than 90% of the water resource as a hangover from colonial era agreement. As still there is tension among Egypt and the Nile Basin Initiative countries with the North African state refusing to sign onto a new agreement made by the other members. It has to be recalled that the four Nile-upstream countries led by Ethiopia, signed in May, 2010 to a new treaty in Entebe, Uganda, seeking a more equitable water-sharing agreement.

Under the original Nile-water sharing-agreement, Egypt is facing water shortages by 2017, is entitled to 55.5 billion cubic meters a year from the Nile's total flow of around 84 billion cubic meters, some 86% of the waters originate in Ethiopia. The Ethiopian government had commissioned an independent survey that proved the new Mega-dam would benefit both Egypt and the Sudan by decreasing siltation in their irrigation projects and by reducing water wastage, some scientific overviews have been conducted by the US Department of Interior, Bureau of Reclamation, 1964, Land and water resources of the Blue-Nile Basin: Ethiopia. And recently by a committee endorsed by Egypt itself, in 2008 and 2010, according to these last surveys, Egypt and the Sudan could greatly benefit from the Mega-dam's energy production. Ethiopia denies Egypt an access to examine a new Mega-dam it intends to build on the Nile unless Cairo links a new deal relinquishing it's veto-powers over allocation of the river's water, said it would not agree to an Egyptian demand to see plans for the proposed dam unless Egypt joined the new Nile-cooperative framework agreement, signed by six-upstream countries which gives this option only signatories countries namely, Burundi, the Congo, Kenya, Rwanda, Tanzania and Uganda whose have banded together to rewrite the 1959 water-sharing treaty that favours Egypt only. Egypt has been locked-up for more than a decade in a dispute with other countries through which the river passes, refusing changes to colonial-era treaties contested by Ethiopia and other upstream nations. After decades of strong population growth, it's to be recalled that Ethiopia has overtaken Egypt as Africa's second most numerous nation. The total population of the upstream countries estimated 270 million against 130 million for the down-stream duo of Egypt, 85 million and the Sudan, 45 million, whose 14 million southern Sudanese will soon be independent State and are being courted by both sides.

In recent years the Ethiopian prime minister have told lawmakers, "Ethiopia has been more willing to go it alone, announces numerous plans to errect water-dams for irrigation and electricity along the Nile", which it has angered the Egyptians, who demand a lions share of the water since the British colonial era treaties. "Eritrea has been training and deploying the Somali Al-Qaida affiliated Al-Shaabab and others home-grown destructive forces to terrorize our country, but Egypt is the direct force behind these destructive elements in order to dissuade the nation from developing its Nile-waters, and he called on "the Egyptians to realise that Ethiopia is not their enemy, Ethiopia's plan to build a major-dam on the Nile will also benefit the down stream countries, we want the Egyptian people to realise that we do not want to hurt them" he said. Ethiopia has plans to use it's Nile waters for agricultural projects, says it would be forced to finance the mega-dam from it's own coffers and from the sale of government bonds because Egypt was pressuring donor-countries and international financiers not to fund it's dam projects. Egypt feels such projects would threaten it's water supply, and point-out that they don't benefit from rains like the upstream-countries. The Ethiopian premier has quoted as saying "Egypt will not be able to stop Ethiopia from building Dam or irrigation schemes on the Nile. That is history--and that will not be part of the solution--Ethiopia is able and willing to use it's own resources to build dams on the Nile, and claims never seek any kind of permission from any side. The way forward is to seek a win-win solution through diplomatic efforts, not for Egypt to try and stop the unstoppable". Ethiopia has a hydro-power potential of 45, 000 Megawatts (MW), the second-largest capacity in Africa after the Congo, according to the World Bank. Ethiopia says the new military government in Egypt is moving to build better relations with Ethiopia. In May, 2011, Egypt had sent a 48-members popular public-diplomacy delegation to pave a new approach and smooth it's relations with Ethiopia and other Nile-upstream countries on their long standing dispute over the Nile-waters. A week later, the new Egyptian prime minister, Essam Sharaf arrived in Ethiopia where he held talks with senior Ethiopian government officals to mark a new chapter of cooperation between the two countries. His visit was welcomed by Ethiopian authorities as a major step toward in solving their differences over the Nile-water. The two are looking to put past disagreements over the use of the Nile-waters behind them after the Ethiopian premier has recently visited Cairo to discuss the two counties future relations, water was a top subject discussed on the agenda. It was the first to Egypt by the Thiopian premier since a poular uprising toppled the former government of Mohammed Hosni Mubarak in February, 2011. During Hosni Mubarak's time in office, Ethiopia and Egypt had long disputed water-sharing along the Nile. But noted hydrologists fear "Ethiopia is offering Egypt and the Sudan to create a trilateral team of technical experts committee to manage the Nile-water crisis, and review of the dam that is being built inside Ethiopia. This will of course serve more the Egyptians, since the committee would evaluate reviving the centennial dam project and it's effect. It's a critical breakthrough on the issue. But noted hydrologists still in a fear "a head waterland offering Egypt and the Sudan an olive-branch in their bitter dispute over sharing the waters of the Nile-River, such offer include a possible joint ownership of huge Ethiopian hydro-power projects that Egypt has trying to block" saying that, "how a mindful premier can offer an olive-branch in ownership for countries those have been bitter enemies of the nation since time immemorial because of the Blue-Nile where this dam is going to be constructed? Others claim reservation on such focal issue, saying "be opponents or propponents of the ruling-EPRDF government, now every citizen believes that there are no convincing reasons not to support such construction of a Mega-dam on the River-Nile at this juncture, which could benefit majority Ethiopians and be a symbol of national pride and patriotism. However, agricultural lands in densely populated areas of the highlands has deteriorated alarmingly and markedly over recent decades. Deforestation and Soil erosion are most problematic in the marginal areas of subsistence agriculture.

The government has made substantial investments in the Hydro-power sector including the building of a number of dams. In a push for development, Ethiopia will build one of Africa’s largest hydro-power dams in the Omo River that flows into Lake Turkana and provides 90 per-cent of its water. For instance, the Fincha Power Station is a hydroelectric power plant of the Omo River in Ethiopia. It has a power generating capacity of 100 MW enough to power over 66,900 homes. The USD 2 billion dollar dam called Gibe III is said to nearly double the East African nation’s power capacity and transform it's southern wilderness into highly productive cultivated farmlands, irrigated by the dam’s regulated outflow. According to the Ethiopian government, the dam will develop the region and end a “backward lifestyle” in the area, transforming it's southern wilderness into a highly productive cultivated farmland, irrigated by the dam’s regulated outflow. It says that domestic and foreign investors will grow sugarcane and other cash crops on a large-scale in the south, an area known for its numerous indigenous tribes. Ethiopia's government has determined on a massive dam-building project, which it hopes will generate alternative sources of power and also help to turn the country's economy around. But the idea is not without controversy, and critics have said the endeavour will be an environmental disaster. Ethiopia became more determined to push massive development of roads, bridges and dams with the considerable assistance of Chinese loans and expertise. With a series of new hydro-electric dams coming online, Ethiopia wants to become this corner of Africa's hydro-electric power center. China's role in funding Ethiopian dam draws ire' Ethiopia says construction of a dam along the Omo River will create needed electrical power for itself and Kenya, and channel water for food production. Environmentalists worry it could drain a Kenyan desert lake central to people's livelihoods. Nairobi, Keny Kenyan environmental activists want the Industrial and Commercial Bank of China to hold off on a promise to invest $500 million in Ethiopia's $1.7 billion Gibe III Hydro-electric Dam, which they say threatens Lake Turkana – the world's largest permanent desert lake, and a crucial source of water for half a million people. The controversial dam is being built on the Omo River in eastern Ethiopia, which supplies the lake in northwestern Kenya with 90 per of its water. Once completed, the dam will affect the livelihoods of some 200,000 in the river valley and 300,000 more near the lake, the activists warn. Friends of Lake Turkana – a Kenyan organization representing indigenous communities in northwestern Kenya whose livelihood depend mainly on the lake – had earlier estimated that that Gibe III could shrink the lake, which straddles the Kenyan-Ethiopian border, by 10 meters (about 30 feet). This could cause an increase in salinity in the lake's water, making it undrinkable for indigenous groups who live around the lake with their animals. Recently, resource-related conflicts have ignited between the nomadic pastoralist communities, and are expected to increase if the dam is completed. "Lake Turkana is home to large number of some of the most massive Nile crocodiles, hippos, and other large animals, all which would find it hard to survive without the lake," said Dr. Richard Leakey, a renowned Kenyan conservationist and paleoanthropologist. There are also a wide variety of unique birds and other wildlife all of which would find it hard to survive without the lake or if the water nutrients were to change as drastically as studies have predicated will happen if Gibe III is successfully completed, according to the groups. The lake's survival hangs in the balance as China decides whether to fund the dam project, says Ikal Angelei, founder of Friends of Lake Turkana and the winner of the 2012 Goldman Environment Prize for Africa. "The lake is in the danger of drying unless the Kenyan government and international agencies step in to stop the unsustainable development both within and outside Kenya," said Ms. Angelei at a news conference in Nairobi. "While many would-be financiers have withdrawn, China still holds [to its] promise," she added. But according to opposition politicians, someone has to note well that the Ethiopian government is not democratic or democratically elected: but the election of EPRDF by 99.6% is not a sign of democracy, undoutedly a one-party rule. In 2010: Egypt discussed taking military action in cooperation with Sudan against Ethiopia to protect their stake in Nile River, according to internal emails from the U.S. private-security firm Stratfor. Water wars in the Middle East and North Africa are not uncommon. Then-King Hussein bin Talal of the (normally docile) Jordan said in 1994 when he officially recognized Israel that "he would not go to war with Israel again except over water."

Egypt - The Nile & The Aswan High Dam (Lake Nasser)'

Al-Sadd al-ʿĀlī rockfill dam Arabic meaning for "Aswan High Dam" across the Nile River, at Aswān, Egypt, completed in 1970 (and formally inaugurated in January 1971) at a cost of about $1 billion. The dam, 364 feet (111 meters) high, with a crest length of 12,562 feet (3,830 meters) and a volume of 57,940,000 cubic yards (44,300,000 cubic meters), impounds a reservoir, Lake Nasser, that has a gross capacity of 5.97 trillion cubic feet (169 billion cubic meters). Of the Nile's total annual discharge, some 2.6 trillion cubic feet (74 billion cubic meters) of water have been allocated by treaty between Egypt and Sudan, with about 1.96 trillion cubic feet (55.5 billion cubic meters) apportioned to Egypt and the remainder to Sudan. Lake Nasser backs up the Nile about 200 miles (320 km) in Egypt and almost 100 miles (160 km) farther upstream (south) in Sudan: creation of the reservoir necessitated the costly relocation of the ancient Egyptian temple complex of Abu Simbel, which would otherwise have been submerged. Ninety thousand Egyptian fellahin (peasants) and Sudanese Nubian nomads had to be relocated. Fifty thousand Egyptians were transported to the Kawm Umbū valley, 30 miles (50 km) north of Aswān, to form a new agricultural zone called Nubaria, and most of the Sudanese were resettled around Khashm al-Qirbah, Sudan. The Aswan High Dam yields enormous benefits to the economy of Egypt. For the first time in history, the annual Nile flood can be controlled by man. The dam impounds the floodwaters, releasing them when needed to maximize their utility on irrigated land, to water hundreds of thousands of new acres, to improve navigation both above and below Aswān, and to generate enormous amounts of electric power (the dam's 12 turbines can generate 10 billion kilowatt-hours annually). The reservoir, which has a depth of 300 feet (90 meters) and averages 14 miles (22 km) in width, supports a fishing industry. The Aswan High Dam has produced several negative side effects, however, chief of which is a gradual decrease in the fertility and hence the productivity of Egypt’s riverside agricultural lands. This is because of the dam’s complete control of the Nile’s annual flooding. Much of the flood and its load of rich fertilizing silt is now impounded in reservoirs and canals: the silt is thus no longer deposited by the Nile’s rising waters on farmlands. Egypt’s annual application of about 1 million tons of artificial fertilizers is an inadequate substitute for the 40 million tons of silt formerly deposited annually by the Nile flood. Completed in 1902, with its crest raised in 1912 and 1933, an earlier dam 4 miles (6 km) downstream from the Aswan High Dam holds back about 174.2 billion cubic feet (4.9 billion cubic meters) of water from the tail of the Nile flood in the late autumn. Once one of the largest dams in the world, it is 7,027 feet (2,142 meters) long and is pierced by 180 sluices that formerly passed the whole Nile flood, with its heavy load of silt.

In the beginning, Egypt was the Nile. That could now change, as Egypt, Sudan and the countries that supply the Nile's waters face new politics, economic development, skyrocketing demographics and climate change. Egypt confronts at least a half a dozen other African countries that have for generations delivered their waters to Egypt’s Nile.

NILE - Egypt and the Sudan under the Anglo-Egyptian joint rule, by the British’

In 1929 when Egypt and the Sudan were under the Anglo-Egyptian joint rule, by the British, they were awarded rights up to 75% of the Nile's flow, the up-stream countries were not allocated a share. In 1959, that ruling was up-held with added stipulation that all Nile basin countries were required to secure Cairo's approval for any project that involved Nile waters. The Egyptians have allegedly refused to relinquish any of that to Ethiopia and the other up-stream countries namely Uganda, Tanzania, Kenya, the Congo, Burundi and Rwanda. The above states, which claim the 1929 treaty is vestige of colonialism, are demanding more water because of burgeoning populations and the pressing need for greater food production and hydro-electric power. In May, 2010 , due to the ever-increasing water & energy consumption, the up-stream countries established the "River-Nile Basin Cooperative Framework", to work toward fairer water sharing. It was ratified by Ethiopia, Uganda, Tanzania, Kenya and Rwanda, Burundi and the Congo have not signed the agreement, the signatories gave the other Nile states a year to join the pact before putting it into action. Egypt and the Sudan were stunned and refused to sign, exacerbating tensions b/n them and the non-Arab African states. Egypt accuse the up-stream countries of misusing the Nile. The referendum in southern Sudan is generally expected to result in the creation of a new state there, and Egypt seeking to build relations with the southern-Sudanese leaders, but on the Nile issue it's possible they could align with their African neighbors to the south rather than Khartoum or Cairo, against whom the south fought a civil-war over three decades that ended in 2005. That would strengthen the hands of Egypt's Nile rivals, who are determined to force Cairo & Khartoum to give up some of their share of the Nile's water. As a result, the making of war threats to Egypt over the right to use the Blue-Nile has been an established form of propaganda used by successive rulers of Ethiopia in order to gain populist support, but why were any of the Ethiopian leaders unable to live -up to their promises of utilizing the Nile for the benefit of their country, despite the paramount need for and popular public support of this cause? War has been the most common means by which disputes over natural resources between countries are resolved.

It's often said that Egypt and Ethiopia could go to war, in the event that Ethiopia decides to reduce the quality and quantity of the Nile -waters, yet, despite intense rhetorical exchanges, neither country ever seriously considered war as an option. It's true that Egypt will never contemplate invading Ethiopia, but not because of they are scared of military defeat as alludes to. For the Egyptians waging military confrontation with a country that is thousand of miles away, and does not share a border is simply impractical, the one tactic often floated by the Egyptians is to bomb any dam Ethiopia constructs on the river, suspected it's also a bluff, the cost of such action would out-weigh any potential benefit as Ethiopia would most certainly respond by bombing the Egyptian dams, causing catastrophic damage that could potentially wipe-out Egypt as known. However, the Egyptians rely on other more advantageous strategies to counter Ethiopia's ambition and preemptively disable it's ability to temper the waters flow. 1, ECONOMIC: by blocking Ethiopia from raising the funds needed to develop projects. 2, LEGAL: by foreclosing future use of the river by developing projects before the up-stream countries and asserting prior usage. 3, SECURITY: by destabilizing Ethiopia through strategic and material support for insurgent groups. Egypt which have been struggling to keep the headwater land landlocked & keep the flow of Nile to Egypt & the Mediterranean, Egypt's strategic motive, expressed constantly, has been to keep Ethiopia, the headwater land which is vastly more fertile than Egypt and which controls the headwaters of the Blue-Nile, which provides Egypt and the Sudan with most of it's water from posing a strategic threat to Egypt by potentially cutting-off the flow of Blue-Nile waters.

As a strategic motive, Egypt pointedly, would rather have chaos on the horn of Africa so that it could be the master of the Suez -canal & Red sea strategic location all the way through the Bab-el-Mandaab adjacent to Somaliland, at the entrance to the Indian ocean. The expected break-up of the Sudan, Egypt's southern neighbor and it's ally in the Nile dispute, next January following a referendum on southern independence will further complicate an already complex quarrel over a dwindling resource. Egypt and the Sudan have been locked in more than a decade of dispute with Ethiopia, the source of the Blue-Nile, and six other states through which the Nile passes over a more equitable sharing of the great river's water. Of course, the importance of the Nile to Egypt can not be underestimated and the country is justifiably nervous whenever it feels this vital life line is under threat, Egypt therefore has all along clung feverishly to a now obsolete claim of exclusive rights to Nile waters. It has alienated source countries Ethiopia, Uganda, Burundi as well as the riparian countries, all of which believe that they are also legally entitled to their rightful shares of the Nile. Egypt's economy, despite relatively steady, growth for several years is still sluggish, poverty is widespread, unemployment is estimated as high as 40 % and earnings from Egypt's rapidly dwindling reserves of hydro-carbons will soon to end. The High-Aswan Dam is so silted-up that it currently holds just 21% installed capacity. As a result, farmlands in lower-Egypt require increasingly massive amounts of fertilizer. The reason the dam and Lake-Nasser retain the rich Ethiopian soil as silt, resulting in the degradation of 90% of Egypt's farmland, land that had been regularly and unfailingly replenished for thousands of years until 1971 when the High-Aswan dam was built despite authoritative advice to the contrary. Furthermore, Egypt's population is growing at the rate of 2.5 million a year, adding even more pressure on an overburdened system. Over 98% of Egypt's 83 million people are settled along both sides of the 883 km long Nile-valley. Of the Egypt's 1,001, 430 over 950,000 Square kms lies outside this barely 30 km wide strip of fertile real estate which amounts to less than half of Djibouti's total land area of 23,000 Square Kms.

The recent announcement by the Ethiopian PM to build a massive-dam for hydro-electric power on the Nile-River, has been received by Egyptian government as a grave threat to the country's survival so much so that the Egyptian military has been instructed to make preparation for any possible challenge, the Nile-dam project is an attempt to cause a regional instability that is intended to divert-attention of the people of Ethiopia, not to rise-up against his regime. Egypt has reiterated it's opposition to Ethiopia's plans to build a dam on it's Nile-waters raising concerns about water supply in Cairo. Egypt to make itself heard, a 40-members Egyptian delegation visited Nile-riparian states, seeking cooperation in opposing Addis Ababa's Grand-Millennium Dam construction in Benshangul-Gumuz region 40 km from the Sudan-border. In it's opposition to Ethiopia's construction of the mega-hydropower plant on the Nile-River, about 40 km from Sudan, Egypt requested Ethiopia to allow it to conduct technical and environmental studies on the proposed dam to determine it's repercussions on the Nile-waters quota. However, Ethiopia has rejected the Egyptian request, saying it is not a member of the Entebbe, Uganda treaty and that any question on the project must come through the cooperative Framework Agreement. Unfazed by Egyptian threats, Ethiopia has intimated it's intention to construct a number of small projects on it's Nile-waters, beside the Grand Millennium-Dam which would generate nearly 6,000 MW electricity. Ethiopia has already made it's intention clear on-going ahead with the project, saying that the Mega-hydropower project is critical in addressing the country's severe energy Paucity. The project would also help the country realize it's desire to become one of the key electricity exporters in the region.

The Ethiopian PM had said last week that the new dam will only benefit all parties, including Egypt. He said Egypt is continuing it's longstanding policy of preventing Ethiopian development along the Nile-waters. He even went so far as accusing Egypt of collaborating with anti -Ethiopian elements over the years to promote this cause. Egypt has since been opposing the Entebbe Agreement, which calls for redistribution of historical Nile-water quotas. Egypt complains that it's share of Nile-waters drastically reduce if a dam is constructed. Egypt and the Sudan have not ratified the Entebbe treaty. Egypt has virtually held monopoly over the Nile-waters as per the 1929 colonial treaty with Great Britain, which gave Egypt veto-rights over all upstream projects. In 1959 Egypt signed a deal with Sudan, which allowed both countries 90% of the share of the Nile-waters. However, recently, Nile-basin countries comprising Ethiopia, Uganda, Rwanda, Tanzania, Kenya and Burundi signed a separate agreement to end Egypt's historical control over the River-Nile waters. Once respective parliaments of these countries ratify the agreement these countries would not be required to seek Egypt's approval before implementing irrigation and hydro-power projects on the Nile-waters. Another blow to Egyptian influence on the Nile-waters came in the form of a "Memorandum of Understanding (MoU) signed b/n Economic community of the Great Lakes countries and the Nile-basin Initiative, which seeks to facilitate cooperation for sustainable development and efficient water resources management in the region.

The other important numbers facing Egypt and it's upstream neighbors are the average annual flows into Lake Nasser. The total is 85 billion cubic meters per year. Egypt uses approximately 55.5 billion cubic meters, and some say that in years of high rainfall, Egypt has used more than their share. Sudan, prior to South the Sudan's independence typically used 18.5 billion cubic meters. The remaining 10 billion evaporates on the way to or in Lake Nasser. The upstream basin member countries have already taken their share before it reaches Lake Nasser but population growth, economic development and climate change are affecting all members of the basin. Today Egypt has a population of 85 million, Sudan has a population of about 48 million, and Ethiopia has a population of 88 million. Between these three countries the population has increased four times and in recent years Egypt has succeeded in increasing by 25% it's inventory of farmlands by irrigating deserts through extensive and expensive canal systems. What historically appeared to be Egypt's birthright has now become a privilege the must negotiate with their upstream neighbors. It's a major issue in Egypt's upcoming elections.

Egypt and the Grand Renaissance Dam in Ethiopia’ preliminary construction of the Grand Ethiopian Renaissance Dam (GRD) began in April 2011 on the Blue Nile River near the Sudanese border. Scheduled for completion in 2014, it is planned to be the biggest hydropower dam in Africa, with more than twice the generating capacity of the Aswan High Dam. But long before the completion date, the project is already generating significant concern amongst the nine other countries that share the Nile, especially Egypt. Over the past century many treaties have been signed in an attempt to assure each riparian country a right to Nile water, with Egypt generally receiving the lion’s share. But sub-Saharan African counties have long argued that the old treaties deny their modern right to livelihood, and after a decade of political to-and-fro between these countries and Egypt, the GRD is now underway. Most recently, the Egyptian government protested that no quantitative studies have been conducted with regard to the dam’s effects, a complaint that resulted in a trilateral ministerial meeting being held in November between Ethiopia, Egypt and Sudan. During this meeting, it was announced that an independent technical committee of experts from each country would be formed in six months time to produce such a study. But at the same meeting, Alemayehu Tegenu, the Ethiopian minister of water and energy, declared that regardless of the study's outcome, the construction of the dam will continue unabated due to high confidence that the GRD will ultimately benefit all parties. Adel Darwish, a British journalist and historian who co-wrote the 1994 book “Water Wars: Coming Conflicts in the Middle East,” told Egypt Independent that Egypt never should have ruled out the option of military intervention, because the stakes are so high for the country’s livelihood.

EU Needs To Help Stem Regional Water Conflicts'

European governments must wield their influence and engineering skills more effectively to prevent conflicts over water supply that could threaten global security, the European Union's policy chief Catherine Ashton said. European governments must wield their influence and engineering skills more effectively to prevent conflicts over water supply that could threaten global security, the European Union's policy chief Catherine Ashton said.

The EU has a strategic interest in ensuring stability in regions with some of the world's biggest water problems, including North Africa after the Arab Spring revolts and Central Asia which holds crucial energy reserves. Ashton said the Nile basin was a particular concern. "If managed well, the Nile holds the potential to catalyze regional integration and to help bring prosperity and stability to a vast area," she said in written responses received late on Friday to Reuters' questions. "If handled poorly, each of the Nile countries could feel the negative consequences in their economic and social development."

Along the Nile, growing demand for water due to population growth, foreign investment and climate change pits Egypt's new government against upstream states such as South Sudan, Ethiopia and Rwanda, who are frustrated by what they see as Cairo's disproportionately large share of the river's water. In central Asia, one of the world's driest places, poor Soviet-era planning has left countries heavily dependent on thirsty crops such as cotton and grain, leading to tensions over water use and dam construction. Uzbek President Islam Karimov said on Friday a dispute over water resources risks provoking military conflict in the former Soviet region. Ashton, who was hosting a meeting of EU foreign ministers in Cyprus where water security was discussed, said the bloc would offer its know-how in order to help calm tensions in the region.

"Central Asia's ... increasing demand on a limited, shared resource carries risks but also opportunities for cooperation in the entire region and we will continue our efforts to help the region in this direction," she said. With the world population predicted to grow to more than 9 billion in 2050, from 7 billion, demand for food is expected to increase by 70 percent in the next four decades, United Nations forecasts show, putting unprecedented strain on water resources. "Water shortages, poor water quality, droughts and floods are likely to affect many places ... over the next few years and this can lead to instability and insecurity, which could have a direct bearing on Europe," Ashton said.

Experts say the European Union could help water-starved countries in North Africa better manage their water usage, helping address criticism that Europe has not reacted effectively to challenges stemming from the Arab Spring. "Where the EU may have a role to play is in the area of water sustainability, reuse of water waste," said William Lawrence, North Africa Project Director at the International Crisis Group. "If downstream countries are using less water and using it better, then this can address upstream politics, which can be cantankerous." (September 8, 2012)

The Nile - Egypt's lifeline in the desert, comes under threat'

Poor African capitals are increasingly challenging Cairo for the river's water, without which Egypt's economy would wither and die. Overwhelmed by cascading economic and political problems since the overthrow of Hosni Mubarak, this nation teeters from within even as it biggest threat may lie hundreds of miles away in the African highlands. Buried in the headlines is the future of the Nile River — and thus the fate of Egypt itself. Mubarak long neglected the security danger posed by other nations' claims to the timeless pulse that provides 95% of this desert country's water, without which its delta farmlands would wither and its economy die. As poor African capitals increasingly challenge Cairo, however, the struggle has become one of the most pressing foreign policy tests for Egypt's new president, Mohammed Mursi. African countries at the river's source, notably Ethiopia, no longer feel bound by colonial -era agreements on water rights and are moving to siphon away larger shares of water for electricity, irrigation and business to meet demands of burgeoning populations. It is a skirmish involving diplomats, engineers and veiled threats of war over geography's blessings and slights and how nations in a new century will divvy up a river on whose banks civilizations have risen and tumbled. "All of Egyptian life is based on the Nile. Without it there is nothing," said Moujahed Achouri, the representative for the United Nations' Food and Agricultural Organization in Egypt. Morsi's acknowledgment of the water crisis and his desire to reach a compromise to protect his country's strategic and historical claim is evident: The Islamist leader has visited key Nile countries twice since his inauguration in June, and his prime minister, Hesham Kandil, is a former water and irrigation minister with connections to officials in African governments. An Egyptian delegation recently toured the region, listening to how Cairo might help build hospitals and schools in villages and jungles. An advisor to the president quoted in Al Ahram Weekly said this of Morsi: "The man was shocked when he received a review about the state of ties we have with Nile basin countries. The previous regime should be tried for overlooking such a strategic interest." For decades, Egypt had concentrated on problems closer to home, including keeping the Arab-Israeli peace and tending to wars from Lebanon to Iraq. Mubarak, who survived a 1995 assassination attempt by Islamic extremists in the Ethiopian capital, Addis Ababa, had paid little attention to East Africa. But his regime was adamant — at one point hinting at military action — in preserving the existing Nile treaties. That echoed a warning from his predecessor, President Anwar Sadat, in 1979: "The only matter that could take Egypt to war again is water." In a 1929 treaty and through other pacts, Egypt and its southern neighbor, Sudan, were granted the bulk of the Nile's flow. The logic — filtered through decades of politics and power struggles — was that Egypt could not survive without the river. Nile basin countries, including Ethiopia, Uganda, Kenya and Tanzania, have seasonal rains and other water sources. But economic pressure and increasing demand for energy and development have turned African countries' attention to the Nile. Since 2010, Ethiopia, which now gets only 3% of its water from the Nile, and five other upstream countries have indicated they would divert more water and no longer honor Egypt's veto power over building projects on the river. The biggest challenge to Cairo is the Grand Ethiopian Renaissance Dam. Experts estimate that the hydropower project, which is under construction and is expected to cost at least $4.8 billion, could reduce the river's flow to Egypt by as much as 25% during the three years it would take to fill the reservoir behind the dam. The project faces a number of potential setbacks and lost its biggest proponent when Ethiopian Prime Minister Meles Zenawi died in August. Ethiopia has sought to reassure Cairo that Egypt's annual share of 55.5 billion cubic meters of Nile water — about two-thirds of the river's flow — will not be disrupted and that the new dam may provide low-cost electricity to its neighbors. But the Egyptians are suspicious. "Egypt has entered a stage where its resources are depleting and population is rapidly increasing," said Hani Raslan, an expert on the Nile basin for Al Ahram Center for Political and Strategic Studies in Cairo. "If the dam is complete

…this will mean Ethiopia will turn into an enemy for Egypt because it will essentially threaten the country's safety, development and livelihood of its people." He added, "Egypt would legally have the right to defend itself by going to war." The struggle over the river highlights decades of strained relations. Ugandan President Yoweri Museveni was quoted as saying before Morsi's visit in October: "Despite the Nile River supporting livelihoods of millions of Egyptians from the ancient times to date, none of the country's presidents has ever visited Uganda to see the source of this lifeline." Egypt and the other Nile nations are seeking to calm the rhetoric. Officials say a resolution may include Cairo entering into long-term economic and energy resource agreements with neighboring capitals. The Egyptian delegation that recently toured the region included doctors and representatives of food banks, hospitals and charities. Egypt, however, faces deep economic problems and is trying to attract foreign investment, which dropped sharply during last year's uprising and ensuing political unrest. "Morsi is trying to send signals to the African world that Egypt is opening up now, that he wants to improve relations and increase cooperation," Raslan said. Morsi's visits to Africa "are all just gestures." "No real agreements have been reached yet," he said. "More needs to be done. Egypt wants and needs to reach its influence in the region." The essence of the Nile conflict is poor nations — Egypt and Ethiopia — needing the river for similar reasons. Ethiopia, which has experienced strong economic growth in recent years, wants to boost electricity output while spurring agriculture and development. Those needs also resonate to the north, but Egypt, which has no other water source, faces more dire prospects. The crisis is certain to force Egypt, where regulations are tangled in bureaucracy and often ignored, to improve water conservation among the nearly 30% of its population that depends on farming for its livelihood. Much of the Nile Delta is made up of small family farms that for centuries have grown wheat, corn and rice with little environmental concern. This attitude and a growing population, which may jump from 82 million to 150 million by 2050, have put further strains on the river. "Water policies in Egypt have to be long-range," said Achouri, the U.N. official. "If you want farmers to stop using too much water for irrigation, alternatives and other incentives should be made available to them. Farmers right now cannot make a living without the Nile." A possible solution is rotating away from water-intensive crops, such as rice, and shifting to increased wheat production. Egypt, where the word "bread" also means "life," is the world's No. 1 importer of wheat. Agricultural experts say reducing rice production while increasing wheat yields would conserve water and meet the country's food needs. Such a scenario may be forced upon farmers if the Nile's flow is curtailed and irrigation canals become parched. Egypt's water and irrigation minister, Mohamed Bahaa El Din Saad, said recently that overpopulation, farming and other water. Source: Los Angeles Times by Jeffrey Fleishman, (November 11, 2012)

Nile Project launches with its first major event in Aswan, Egypt’)

The Nile Project was founded in August 2011 by Egyptian ethnomusicologist Mina Girgis and Ethiopian-American singer Meklit Hadero to address the Nile basin’s cultural and environmental challenges using an innovative approach that combines music, education and an enterprise platform. The world’s longest river runs through 11 countries (Congo DRC, Burundi, Rwanda, Uganda, Tanzania, Kenya, Ethiopia, Eritrea, South Sudan, Sudan and Egypt) and touches the lives of 400 million people. The Project’s mission is to connect the people of the Nile basin through a cultural dialogue that evokes Africa’s iconic river as a shared ecosystem. Initial crowd funding was secured by Mina and Meklit to embark on their reconnaissance journey across East Africa in May 2012, where they have engaged with musicians, development organizations and cultural institutions to take part in the Project and help shape its various programs. The first of these programs, the Nile Gathering, takes place at Fekra Cultural Centre in Aswan, Egypt, between 10 – 29 January 2013. The Gathering encompasses a four-day strategic planning workshop (10 – 14 January) that builds on the Project’s vision, followed by a two-week music residency (15 – 29 January) to develop music that can generate empathy and inspire cultural and environmental curiosity.

The workshop will bring together expertise in fields of environment, culture, agriculture, finance, education, development, nonviolent communication, cross-cultural dialogue, conflict resolution and intercultural learning. A team of Art of Hosting (see notes to editors) facilitators will engage participants in conversations that integrate their respective disciplinary and cultural perspectives and contribute to a common understanding of Nile issues. The outcomes will serve as blueprints for intercultural dialogues integral to the Project‘s programs and activities. During the residency, musicians from the 11 Nile basin countries will collaborate to translate this intercultural dialogue into a new body of songs, drawn from the rich and diverse genres, traditions and instruments found in East Africa. Under the musical direction of Miles Jay (see notes to editors), the music residency will provide a space for the musicians to learn about one another and compose and record new music to be performed in Africa and around the world.

Nile Project programs: Nile Tour: using a boat made of recycled water bottles, a collective of Nile Project musicians and environmental educators will sail down the river, from the Mediterranean to Aswan in 35 days, performing concerts complemented by participatory workshops where local audiences learn about the Nile's cultural and environmental fabric.

Nile Stories: complementing the Nile Tour, this will be a web-based dialogue platform where Nile citizens can share their perspectives on the river through live conversations as well as short -format videos.

Nile Camps: annual summer camps for young musicians from the 11 Nile basin countries. During the day, they explore local ecosystems and in the evening, they express their learning through music.

Nile Curriculum: an educational initiative that offers a holistic approach to Nile river ecology and its inhabitants with a multidisciplinary curriculum exploring history, geography, cultures and ecosystems of the Nile basin.

TEDxNile: a conference featuring scientists, thinkers and artists with Nile - related ideas worth spreading. Nile Enterprise Platform/Nile Fellowship Program: this platform will channel newly acquired cultural and environmental understanding towards concrete action. Partnering with social enterprise organizations such as Ashoka (see notes to editors), the project will train and empower East African youth to develop innovative solutions that address social, cultural, environmental and economic challenges relevant to the Nile. Source: ER December 15, 2012.

Al-Ahram Weekly - Egypt, Ethiopia and the new GERD'

The Ethiopian dam project could constitute a threat to Egypt, but only if Ethiopia is pushed into going it alone, instead of being coaxed onto a different path by genuine cooperative aid.

Adel Amer writes:- Ethiopia has begun operations to divert a portion of the Blue Nile preparatory to the construction of a major dam. Although this project had been anticipated for many years and in spite of repeated assurances from Addis Ababa that it would not affect Egypt, the Ethiopian decision to commence operations triggered anger and alarm among Egyptian public opinion, reactions reminiscent of the Iraqi and Syrian responses to the Ataturk Dam project many years ago. The crisis over the diversion of the course of the Nile dates back to May 2010, when six upper riparian countries in the Nile Basin, meeting in Entebbe, signed a new Nile Waters Treaty, giving Cairo and Khartoum a year's grace period to join. The Entebbe Treaty states that cooperation between the countries of the Nile Basin initiative is founded on the principle of fair and reasonable use on the part of the state parties. Recently, the signatory states began ratification procedures through their parliaments. Once the treaty goes into effect, it will bring an end to Egypt and Sudan's historic quotas under the 1929 and 1959 Nile Waters Agreements, in accordance with which Egypt obtained 55.5 billion cubic meters a year and Sudan 18.5 billion. The six countries that have signed the new treaty are Ethiopia, Uganda, Kenya, Tanzania, Rwanda and Burundi. The Democratic Congo joined Egypt and Sudan's refusal to sign. In March 2013, the newly independent South Sudan announced that it would join the treaty. Cairo and Khartoum have charged that the Entebbe Treaty "violates all international agreements" and vowed to alert donor nations to the illegality of funding any water projects on the Nile or its tributaries. They added that they would lobby against the Ethiopian dam project, in particular, which will cost an estimated $4.8 billion, according to the late Ethiopian Prime Minister Meles Zenawi. Ethiopia and the other signatory countries were unfazed by such protests and warnings, and on 1 April 2011, Ethiopia formally inaugurated the Great Millennium Dam project, or the Renaissance Dam, for the production of hydroelectric power for the Benishangul-Gumuz region, which is adjacent to the Sudanese border. The dam, which is due to be completed in 2015, will create a reservoir of approximately 63 billion cubic meters of water.

Following the 25 January 2011 revolution, Egyptian popular leaders pressed the need to address this vital issue, stressing that it had to be handled objectively and in a spirit untainted by the "arrogance that had characterized the approach of the governments of former president Hosni Mubarak". On 29 April 2011, a "people's delegation", consisting of representatives of the revolutionary youth, political parties and other public figures, set off to Addis to discuss the Millennium Dam project. Such actions inaugurated a new climate for handling dam initiatives and other issues related to the Nile waters. Perhaps because of this, Egyptians were all the more shocked by the Ethiopian announcement of its decision to press ahead with the diversion of the Blue Nile within hours of President Morsi's visit to Addis Ababa to attend the African Summit. On the sidelines of this summit, Morsi met with Ethiopian Prime Minister Hailemariam Desalegn and raised Egyptian concerns with respect to the dam. Experts on the joint Egyptian-Ethiopian-Sudanese committee on this project found that "the studies that the Ethiopian side had submitted with respect to the dam were insufficient to prove that its construction would not be harmful to Egypt." In light of this, the tripartite committee will ask for additional studies, which will be undertaken by international experts on the committee. The committee is made up of six local members (two each from Egypt, Sudan and Ethiopia) and four international experts on dam engineering and hydrology, water resource management and the social, economic and environmental impact of dams.

The construction of the dam on the upper reaches of the Nile poses an enormous challenge to Egyptian agriculture. The consequent water shortage could lead to reduced domestic food production as well as to a reduction by approximately 500 kilowatts per year in the electricity generated by the High Dam and the Aswan Dam. Such a specter induced the Sudan and Nile Basin Studies Unit of Al-Ahram Centre for Political and Strategic Studies to convene a seminar on this question. It hosted Mohamed Allam, former minister of irrigation and water resources, who had been responsible for this issue during one of the tensest periods in Egyptian-Ethiopian relations over a number of essential differences regarding the dam. Allam presented a paper to the forum discussing the various phases of this question, from the Egyptian perspective in particular. By way of background, Allam underscored a number of weaknesses on the Egyptian side: the scientific and technological lag, the spread of corruption, the deterioration in public services, and economic, social and cultural underdevelopment. He also mentioned the decline in Egypt's regional and international status and influence. At the same time, important political changes were taking place elsewhere in the Nile Basin. Ethiopia and Uganda were experiencing periods of economic growth and growing international support. In addition, Israeli influence in countries of the upper Nile Basin was increasing, while Egyptian influence remained minimal. Such factors contributed to augmenting the pressures on Egypt on one of its most crucial concerns, namely issues related to the Nile Basin initiative.

Water projects on the Blue Nile, whether in Ethiopian highlands or in Sudan, would have a major impact on Egypt, as the Blue Nile accounts for around 90 per cent of the water that reaches Egypt. Egypt is heavily dependent on the Nile for its water needs. As Allam pointed out in his paper, the Nile furnishes 55.5 billion cubic meters a year of water (under the current quota), while Egypt receives only a billion cubic meters a year in rainfall, which falls primarily on the Mediterranean and Red Sea coasts and parts of the Sinai. There are subterranean water sources, but these are non-renewable. The subterranean reserve in the Western Desert permits for the extraction of no more than three to five billion cubic meters per year over the next 50 to 100 years. Meanwhile, the costs of desalinization are very high, and the quantities that this method supplies come to only 200 million cubic meters a year. According to Allam, Egypt’s current water needs amount to over 75 billion cubic meters a year, which is about 30 per cent higher than the available resources. The deficit is made up for by recycling. The per capita share of water is only 700 cubic meters a year. However, by 2050, and given current population growth figures, per capita share of water will decline to 350 cubic meters per year. Water projects on the upper Nile would further imperil the situation. Large tracts of agricultural land would be lost. Hydroelectric power production would drop sharply and compel increasing reliance on gas-powered generators. Water purification plants and a number of other industries along the Nile would be severely affected, and the quality of irrigation water would deteriorate. In addition, there would be greater seepage of sea water into the northern coastal areas and the quality of the water in the northern freshwater lakes would decline.

TOWARDS A ROADMAP: Sudan and South Sudan are Egypt's most important partners in the foreseeable future, said Allam. Both need Egyptian support, expertise and investment. They also have water resources that could increase the yield of the Nile, large tracts of land suitable for cultivation and livestock, and mineral wealth. In addition, they offer promising markets for emergent Egyptian industries and skilled Egyptian labor. Politically, their unification would undermine regional and international designs to set the two countries against each other to the detriment of them both. Clearly, they would be well advised to create a joint technical body to examine the potential effects of the Ethiopian barrages on them both and to review the results of the Egyptian-Sudanese studies that had been conducted on this matter in the interest of formulating a unified vision on the dams on the basis of the bilateral agreement of 1959 that governs the Egyptian-Sudanese relationship with respect to the Nile waters. In his paper, Allam also discussed why Ethiopia attaches such importance to the dam project. It has long been an Ethiopian dream to control the headwaters of the Blue Nile, he said. Ethiopia would reap huge profits from the export of hydroelectric power to neighboring countries, generating a major source of national revenue that would stimulate a qualitative leap in economic and social development, and enhance Addis Ababa's influence in the Horn of Africa and elsewhere in the continent. The net profit from the production and export of the electricity from the Mandaya Dam alone exceeds $7 billion a year. The power — and hence income — generating capacity of the Renaissance Dam could be considerably greater. However, Addis also realized that these dams would not have this anticipated economic value unless they received the blessings of Egypt and Sudan, which would translate into the purchase of large quantities of the electricity they produce. Currently, Ethiopia, itself, does not have the domestic infrastructure or market capable of consuming a major portion of the amount of electricity that could be generated, while the only two other major consumers would be Egypt and Sudan. Therefore, Egypt and Sudan's refusal to participate in a network would delay Ethiopia's ability to benefit economically from the dams, at least until it develops a sufficient infrastructure and market locally, which would take several decades.

Egypt's regional and international drives concerning the Renaissance Dam project began in earnest in the middle of last year. Egypt rejected the feasibility studies for their failure to take into consideration the detrimental effects of this project on Sudan and Egypt. It sent its comments in this regard to the secretariat of the Nile Basin Initiative, to the technical bureau of the Eastern Nile Basin Commission, to the World Bank, to the European Market, to the Canadian Advisory Bureau, and to the Norwegian Consultancy Bureau that performed the feasibility and design studies for the project. It has also sustained talks with donor agencies and with China in order to drive home the severe detrimental repercussions of the dam on both Egypt and Sudan. In the course of these talks, Egyptian officials stressed that they are not opposed to the development drive in Ethiopia, but that they are determined to safeguard Egypt's water rights and their country's future. The fact remains that Ethiopia suffers a major water shortage. Indeed, it has the greatest deficiency in water of all the Nile Basin countries in spite of the fact that it is the major contributor to the Nile waters. At the same time, the Ethiopian highlands are not naturally suited to the construction of large dams and water reservoirs, regardless of the technology brought to bear, and even less to the transport of reserved water across its rugged terrain. Therefore, there is little need for the excessive alarm that has been stirred by some segments of the media recently. Still, the problem is not insignificant and there is a rift in Egypt's relations with other countries of the Nile Basin. In view of these considerations, Egypt needs to sustain a policy towards those countries based on the spirit of African brotherhood and cooperation, as opposed to confrontation and political blackmail. In this spirit, it must continue to offer aid and assistance to African countries, especially those in the Nile Basin, and not just in the realm of water resource development but also in a range of other fields, from agriculture to trade and industry and education.

The key to resolving the current crisis begins with Ethiopia, which should be given priority among the Nile Basin countries, in the construction of water projects. Ethiopia has the lowest rate of electricity consumption in the world — less than 1,000 megawatts (80 per cent of Ethiopians live without electricity). Nor will it affect Egypt and Sudan's share of Nile water if Ethiopia undertakes small water projects commensurate with its topography, such as electricity generating plants that capitalize on steep inclines or agricultural projects, whether dependent on precipitation or irrigation, which in any case would be relatively limited in view of the ruggedness of the Ethiopian terrain. However, "Ethiopia can not divert a tributary of an international river shared by nine other nations. This is not just about Egypt and Sudan. International rivers are governed by laws and conventions, in accordance with which any action that affects water quotas requires advanced notice and guarantees against possible harm," said Allam. Experts predict that by 2050, Egypt will require 21 billion cubic meters of water above its current quota in order meet the needs of its population, which is expected to climb to 150 million by then. The writer is head of Al-Masryeen Centre for Strategic Studies.

Post-Mubarak Egypt has softer line on Nile'

CAIRO, (UPI) (December 9, 2011) -- With the downfall of Hosni Mubarak, Egyptian leaders are showing more willingness to discuss sharing the waters of the Nile River with Ethiopia and other African states that have been battling for a better deal to accommodate their swelling populations. While Mubarak was in power, he used Egypt's political and military weight in the region to resist any change to the country's dominance of the Nile's waters that dates to the British colonial era. But the Supreme Council of the Armed Forces, which forms the interim government since Mubarak was forced out by a popular pro-democracy uprising Feb.11, is displaying signs of being more cooperative in this long-running dispute. This probably has a lot to do with the plethora of pressing problems Egypt faces as its moves through the uncertain transition toward political and economic reforms.

Apart from anything else, the independence of South Sudan July 9, splitting Sudan, Egypt's ally in the Nile dispute, in two, undercut Cairo's intransigence. South Sudan, which has voting rights as the 10th riparian state in the Nile Basin, says it too wants to build hydroelectric dams on a tributary of the White Nile to give the impoverished, infant state an economic boost. As early as September, SCAF agreed to set up a joint technical team with Ethiopia, the most vociferous of the upstream states demanding a more equitable share of the Nile's water, to review the impact of a $4.8 billion Grand Renaissance hydroelectric dam Addis Ababa declared it planned to build.

Experts from Sudan, another Nile state and Egypt's neighbor, will also take part in the team's operation. Prime Minister Meles Zenawi, Ethiopia's strongman and Mubarak's fiercest opponent on the Nile issue, moved swiftly after the Egyptian dictator was toppled. In May, Zenawi agreed to delay ratification of a 2010 agreement signed by six of the nine upstream states that stripped Cairo of the right under a 1929 British-orchestrated treaty to 75 percent of the Nile's flow, until a new Egyptian government was elected. Egypt insisted on maintaining the 55.5 billion cubic meters it takes annually from the Nile, at 4,163 miles the world's longest river. That's more than half the total annual flow of 84 billion cubic meters. Egyptian authorities say the country will need 86.2 billion cubic meters by 2017, a volume it cannot meet given its current resources.

The Nile, which rises in Lake Victoria in East Africa, is literally Egypt's lifeline. Most of its 81 million people live along its banks. Without the Nile, the ancient civilization that built the pyramids would never have emerged. Zenawi infuriated Mubarak by building five big dams on the Nile over the last decade, defying Cairo's right under the 1929 treaty to have a veto over all upstream dam projects. Apart from the Grand Renaissance Dam, which will be the largest in Africa, Ethiopia says it plans to build two other dams on the Nile as part of a program to boost its electricity production to 20,000 megawatts over the next decade. President Yoweri Museveni of Uganda, another of the key upstream states lined up against Cairo, also wants to build a series of dams to boost his country's generating power from 300 MW to 3,800 MW over the next five years. "We also have plans to generate 17,000 MW by 2025," Museveni said.

In September, Zenawi met Egypt's caretaker Prime Minister Essam Sharaf in Cairo in a further effort to reduce tension and negotiate a new agreement. "We can make the issue of the Grand Renaissance Dam something useful," Sharaf said, indicating that progress was now possible. "This dam, in conjunction with the other dams, can be a path for development and construction between Ethiopia, Sudan and Egypt." There are other issues involved in the Nile dispute. But the most threatening is the scramble by non-African states such as Saudi Arabia, China, India and South Korea to buy or long-lease vast tracts of arable land in Africa to produce wheat, rice and corn for export to those countries. These land grabs cut the food supply in famine-prone African countries and the export of grain to nations unable to grow enough for themselves -- like Egypt.

NILE POLITICS: Egypt seeks Saudi help on Ethiopia water dispute'

Author Ayah Aman (March 6, 2014)

CAIRO — Egypt is considering preparing a formal request for Gulf mediation under the leadership of Saudi Arabia, in order to back Cairo's stance vis-à-vis the ongoing conflict with Ethiopia about the Renaissance Dam. The mediation request comes as part of a basket of escalatory measures adopted by Egypt in January, following the breakdown of technical negotiations among the Egyptian, Sudanese and Ethiopian water resources ministers.

Summary. Egypt has turned to Saudi Arabia to help pressure Ethiopia into compromising on the Renaissance Dam, which Cairo fears will cut off vital water supplies from the Nile River.

Speaking to Al-Monitor, an Egyptian government official said, "A detailed report is currently being prepared to examine and explain Egyptian concerns relating to the building of the dam, in the absence of a clear agreement with Ethiopia about it. The final draft of the report, which explains the concerns over the repercussions the construction of the dam will have on Egypt and Sudan, will be sent to the International Panel of Experts."

The official, who has close ties to Egyptian decision-making circles, added, "Egypt will ask Ethiopia, through the mediation, to sign a binding agreement with Egypt stating the dam's operational specifications, its stored water capacity, and the amount of water that will be regularly released in a manner that does not negatively affect Egypt's share of that water."

This convergence of views between Egypt and the Gulf countries — except for Qatar — began after the ouster of President Mohammed Morsi by the army on July 3, 2013. While the Gulf leaders expressed their satisfaction toward the change in the political scene of Egypt after the fall of the Brotherhood, Saudi Arabia and the United Arab Emirates rushed to offer financial aid packages to the Egyptian government, amounting to $10.7 billion in the span of only six months.

"Resorting to Gulf mediation will help Egypt gain more time. As Ethiopia is rushing to build the dam, we are running out of time and are unable to re - launch negotiations, which puts us in a critical situation," the official added.

According to the same official, “Egypt is preparing this dossier after receiving verbal assurances from Saudi and Emirati officials that they would back Egypt in all issues affecting its national security. This problem has been discussed in the many meetings that took place between Egyptian and Gulf officials since last June 30."

"The Gulf mediation is a good and useful step, but it is conditional on the acceptance of both countries," Mahmoud Abu Zeid, the head of the Arab Water Council, told Al-Monitor.

Abu Zeid said the potency of such mediation efforts lies in the fact that Saudi Arabia, the UAE and Kuwait have strong economic ties with and large investments in the Ethiopian market.

The head of the Arab Water Council, whose membership includes Saudi officials, added that it was possible for the council to play an important role in helping alleviate the ongoing tensions between Egypt and Ethiopia. But the Egyptian government has yet to ask it to intervene, and Egypt's concern with the water issue still requires direct guidance from the president, as well as an intensification of efforts to solve the crisis, Abu Zeid said.

Saudi Arabia contributes to economic development projects in Ethiopia through investments made by Saudi businessmen in infrastructure projects. In addition, it offers Addis Ababa further support through the Kuwaiti Development Fund, OPEC and the Arab Bank for Economic Development in Africa, with the Ethiopian parliament endorsing projects financed by Saudi Arabia in energy and agriculture. Furthermore, the kingdom plays host to thousands of Ethiopian workers who are employed in a variety of jobs, particularly as domestic labor, despite that this issue was the cause of tensions after Saudi Arabia expelled a large number of illegal workers.

In January 2011, the Director of the Ethiopian Investment Authority, Abi Walad Meskel, estimated Saudi investments to be close to $3 billion dollars, making Saudi Arabia the largest investor in Ethiopia, followed by India, China and Turkey.

Al-Monitor spoke with an Egyptian diplomat assigned to the Ethiopian relations dossier. "Any change in the amount or terms of monies given to the Addis Ababa government will greatly contribute in compelling Ethiopia into reassessing its stance towards Egypt, as well as committing to a serious and constructive dialogue in order to resolve the continuing crisis that exists between the two countries concerning the Renaissance Dam," he said.

The diplomatic source, who requested anonymity, asserted, “Arab financial pressure was the best of options in the escalatory scenario currently adopted by Egypt, following strong indications that the Egyptian Minister of Water Resources’ visit to Italy would be successful, and the uncertain prospects vis-à-vis resorting to the international community, now that Egypt has a new government in place.”

African affairs specialist at the Al-Ahram Center for Political Studies, Hani Raslan, cautioned, in an interview with Al-Monitor, about “the current state of affairs, which was no longer confined to mere tensions and constituted a direct and imminent threat to Egypt, as a result of it being deprived of its water rights. Ethiopia refuses to recognize previous international norms and conventions, as well as Egypt’s historical right, and considers the waters of the Nile to be its property.” Raslan further warned against any attempts to impose a fait accompli and move toward adopting a policy where water would be sold after the building of dams.

Raslan opined that Saudi mediation did not stop at direct negotiations with Addis Ababa, but also entailed putting pressure through other diplomatic channels that exist between Saudi Arabia and the United States.

He also asserted, “The success of Saudi intervention would primarily be to the benefit of Egypt, in accordance with the political pledges and interests that Saudi Arabia has undertaken vis-à-vis Egypt lately.”

The Arab world suffers from an inability to secure daily water needs, with a November 2013 UN report estimating that Arab countries needed to allocate at least $200 billion for water resource management during the next 10 years, just to address this crisis. The report also warned about the nonexistence of comprehensive international agreements governing transboundary waters, despite that one-third of the surface water upon which the Arab world relies originating outside its borders, with the same applying to ground water in the Arabian Peninsula.

News reports have pointed toward a shift in the food security policies of Gulf countries from Africa to Europe and America. Gulf countries are re - evaluating their projects aimed at securing their food security through some African nations, such as Ethiopia, following increased animosity toward Gulf investors among locals and the spread of public reservations about Arab investments on their lands. This is a result of the massive investments that Gulf countries made to purchase tens of thousands of hectares of cheap farmland in African countries, which they used to satisfy nearly 90% of their food needs.

The Renaissance Dam crisis continues to dominate the rhetoric of Egyptian officials, as the Ethiopian side asserts its intention to proceed with the project. Despite Cairo's efforts, there's no clear indications that their efforts thus far have made any inroads.

Nile River Dam Threatens War Between Egypt and Ethiopia -IPS' By

Cam McGrath (March 23, 2014)

Ethiopia is building one of the largest dams in the world, the Grand Millennium Dam (GERD), on the River Nile near the Sudan border.

(InternationalRivers.org)

CAIRO - When Egypt's then-president Mohamed Morsi said in June 2013 that "all options" including military intervention, were on the table if Ethiopia continued to develop dams on the Nile River, many dismissed it as posturing. But experts claim Cairo is deadly serious about defending its historic water allotment, and if Ethiopia proceeds with construction of what is set to become Africa's largest hydroelectric dam, a military strike is not out of the question.

Relations between Egypt and Ethiopia have soured since Ethiopia began construction on the 4.2 billion dollar Grand Renaissance Dam in 2011.

Egypt fears the new dam, slated to begin operation in 2017, will reduce the downstream flow of the Nile, which 85 million Egyptians rely on for almost all of their water needs. Officials in the Ministry of Irrigation claim Egypt will lose 20 to 30 percent of its share of Nile water and nearly a third of the electricity generated by its Aswan High Dam.

Ethiopia insists the Grand Renaissance Dam and its 74 billion cubic meter reservoir at the headwaters of the Blue Nile will have no adverse effect on Egypt's water share. It hopes the 6,000 megawatt hydroelectric project will lead to energy self-sufficiency and catapult the country out of grinding poverty.

"Egypt sees its Nile water share as a matter of national security," strategic analyst Ahmed Abdel Halim tells IPS. "To Ethiopia, the new dam is a source of national pride, and essential to its economic future."

The dispute has heated up since Ethiopia began diverting a stretch of the Nile last May, with some Egyptian parliamentarians calling for sending commandos or arming local insurgents to sabotage the dam project unless Ethiopia halts construction.

Ethiopia's state-run television responded last month with a report on a visit to the site by army commanders, who voiced their readiness to "pay the price" to defend the partially-built hydro project.

Citing a pair of colonial-era treaties, Egypt argues that it is entitled to no less than two-thirds of the Nile's water and has veto power over any upstream water projects such as dams or irrigation networks.

Accords drawn up by the British in 1929 and amended in 1959 divvied up the Nile's waters between Egypt and Sudan without ever consulting the upstream states that were the source of those waters.

The 1959 agreement awarded Egypt 55.5 billion cubic meters of the Nile's 84 billion cubic meter average annual flow, while Sudan received 18.5 billion cubic meters. Another 10 billion cubic meters is lost to evaporation in Lake Nasser, which was created by Egypt's Aswan High Dam in the 1970s, leaving barely a drop for the nine other states that share the Nile's waters.

While the treaty's water allocations appear gravely unfair to upstream Nile states, analysts point out that unlike the mountainous equatorial nations, which have alternative sources of water, the desert countries of Egypt and Sudan rely almost entirely on the Nile for their water needs.

"One reason for the high level of anxiety is that nobody really knows how this dam is going to affect Egypt's water share," Richard Tutwiler, a specialist in water resource management at the American University in Cairo (AUC), tells IPS. "Egypt is totally dependent on the Nile. Without it, there is no Egypt."

Egypt's concerns appear warranted as its per capita water share is just 660 cubic meters, among the world's lowest. The country's population is forecast to double in the next 50 years, putting even further strain on scarce water resources.

But upstream African nations have their own growing populations to feed, and the thought of tapping the Nile for their agriculture or drinking water needs is all too tempting.

The desire for a more equitable distribution of Nile water rights resulted in the 2010 Entebbe Agreement, which replaces water quotas with a clause that permits all activities provided they do not “significantly” impact the water security of other Nile Basin states. Five upstream countries – Ethiopia, Kenya, Uganda, Tanzania and Rwanda – signed the accord. Burundi signed a year later.

Egypt rejected the new treaty outright. But after decades of wielding its political clout to quash the water projects of its impoverished upstream neighbors, Cairo now finds itself in the uncomfortable position of watching its mastery over the Nile’s waters slip through its fingers.

“Ethiopia’s move was unprecedented. Never before has an upstream state unilaterally built a dam without downstream approval,” Ayman Shabaana of the Cairo-based Institute for Africa Studies had told IPS last June. “If other upstream countries follow suit, Egypt will have a serious water emergency on its hands.”

Ethiopia has sought to assure its downstream neighbors that the Grand Renaissance Dam is a hydroelectric project, not an irrigation scheme. But the dam is part of a broader scheme that would see at least three more dams on the Nile.

Cairo has dubbed the proposal “provocative”.

Egypt has appealed to international bodies to force Ethiopia to halt construction of the dam until its downstream impact can be determined. And while officials here hope for a diplomatic solution to diffuse the crisis, security sources say Egypt’s military leadership is prepared to use force to protect its stake in the river.

Former president Hosni Mubarak floated plans for an air strike on any dam that Ethiopia built on the Nile, and in 2010 established an airbase in southeastern Sudan as a staging point for just such an operation, according to leaked emails from the global intelligence company Stratfor posted on Wikileaks.

Egypt’s position was weakened in 2012 when Sudan, its traditional ally on Nile water issues, rescinded its opposition to the Grand Renaissance Dam and instead threw its weight behind the project. Analysts attribute Khartoum’s change of heart to the country’s revised domestic priorities following the secession of South Sudan a year earlier.

According to AUC's Tutwiler, once Sudan felt assured that the dam would have minimal impact on its water allotment, the mega-project's other benefits became clear. The dam is expected to improve flood control, expand downstream irrigation capacity and, crucially, allow Ethiopia to export surplus electricity to power-hungry Sudan via a cross-border link.

Some studies indicate that properly managed hydroelectric dams in Ethiopia could mitigate damaging floods and increase Egypt's overall water share. Storing water in the cooler climes of Ethiopia would ensure far less water is lost to evaporation than in the desert behind the Aswan High Dam.

Egypt, however, is particularly concerned about the loss of water share during the five to ten years it will take to fill the dam's reservoir. Tutwiler says it is unlikely that Ethiopia will severely choke or stop the flow of water. Some 85 million Egyptians depend on the Nile for water.

NILE POLITICS: Egypt says co-operation continues with Ethiopia on Nile Basin projects'

Author: Walaa Hussein (March 23, 2014)

CAIRO, Egypt — In an exclusive interview with Al-Monitor at his office in Cairo, Egyptian Minister of Water Resources and Irrigation Mohamed Abdul Muttalib said that Egyptian support for technical cooperation projects for the development of the Upper Nile have not stopped. According to him, Egypt is continuing with its bilateral projects in Tanzania, Uganda and South Sudan, and even in Ethiopia. However, because of legal problems, it is a different matter when it comes to the cooperation projects that were being carried out under the umbrella of the Nile Basin Initiative. Abdul Muttalib noted that his ministry is determining whether it is physically possible to link the Nile and Congo rivers: the legal dilemmas of linking the two rivers are being left to legal specialists.

The interview follows:

Al-Monitor: How do you see the future of cooperation at the technical level between Egypt and the Nile Basin countries, and with Ethiopia specifically? What are the most prominent joint projects for the development of the Upper Nile that are still ongoing? What projects have stalled after Egypt froze its membership in the Nile Basin Initiative?

Abdul Muttalib: Cooperation is continuing, and this is a very positive thing with regard to the future of Egypt's relations with the Nile Basin countries. Evidence of the continuation of this cooperation was translated in a practical way during my recent visit to Uganda to open well projects to provide a number of areas with drinking water. This came as part of an Egyptian program, granting $4.5 million to remove weeds and build berths for fishermen on the shores of Lake Victoria, to make fishing easier. And Ugandans in the region are very grateful toward the Egyptian government and the Ministry of Irrigation. There are similar agreements with the Tanzanian government, and we are working on preparing to open a number of wells to provide clean drinking water in underserved areas. Moreover, we are working to ensure these wells operate on solar power, to save them expenses, and instead of having to be manually operated. We are also working with Congo on a number of new bilateral projects.

There is also a good level of bilateral technical cooperation with South Sudan. This includes building a group of dams in the southern states. The Egyptian Arab Contractors Company is working to implement a number of well-digging projects, to provide clean drinking water to the areas that have no water. We will soon announce a ceremony to open a set of these wells and to hand them over to the South Sudanese government to solve the problems with drinking water in some regions. There is also a project sponsored by Egypt to create small dams to control the flow of rainwater in South Sudan.

And even with regard to the Ethiopians, bilateral cooperation has not stopped. Training courses for Ethiopian engineers at the Egyptian Ministry of Irrigation are ongoing. The latest batch of these Ethiopian cadres recently graduated from the ministry's training center, and they were given certificates in a ceremony that I attended personally, along with the Ethiopian ambassador in Cairo, Mahmoud Dardir. This confirms that the technical cooperation projects between Egypt and all the Nile Basin countries are ongoing, and we will continue to support the development of the Nile Basin, even with regard to Ethiopia. We have no problem with continuing discussion and cooperation [with Ethiopia], and we consider this to be the [way toward a] solution.

Al-Monitor: And what about the projects that stalled after Egypt froze its membership in the Nile Basin Initiative?

Abdul Muttalib: As I mentioned, none of the bilateral cooperation projects with the Nile Basin countries have been stalled, even with Ethiopia. We are working with the latter on a new experiment lab, as part of the activities of the Hydraulics [Research] Institute, to predict flooding. And we have no problem entering into bilateral partnerships with them for technical cooperation regarding the Nile Basin region. Yet the proposed projects that fall under the umbrella of the Nile Basin Initiative are stalled due to legal issues relating to our current position toward the Initiative, and thus we cannot work on these projects at the current stage.

Al-Monitor: Does the government of Ibrahim Mehleb have a different perception of the HYPERLINK "http://www.al-monitor.com/pulse/originals/2014/02/egypt-continues-efforts-internationalize-ethiopia-dam.html" Renaissance Dam crisis, or will it follow in the footsteps of [former Prime Minister Hazem] el-Beblawy?

Abdul Muttalib: Obviously the positions are the same. We are talking about our rights — our rights to the Nile waters. No one disagrees on this issue, and the position will not change with a change of governments.

Al-Monitor: A recent decision by the Egyptian government opened the door for the export of rice. Does this decision increase the burdens on the Ministry of Irrigation, which complains about the amount of water this crop uses, and given that the decision also increases annual water allocations for the summer agricultural season?

Abdul Muttalib: Until now, the door has not been opened for the export of Egyptian rice. There has just been talk about a study for the decision, and it has not been ratified. The problem is that [this decision] would encourage farmers to heavily cultivate rice, despite the specified annual allocations for this crop, and [rice cultivation] consumes large amounts of water. We have a crisis concerning violations by farmers who are cultivating an area nearly twice the size of the 1 million feddan [1.038 million acres] that the government permits them to cultivate annually. And for each extra feddan of rice that is cultivated, this means that three feddan of corn are not cultivated, since the use of the water released from the High Dam is previously specified according to needs decided for each agricultural season. For this reason, the state increased the prices paid to farmers for corn, reaching nearly 340 Egyptian pounds per ardeb [$8.69 per bushel]. This will encourage farmers to work to increase the cultivation of corn instead of rice. The problem relating to export Egyptian rice involves the [high consumption] of water.

Al-Monitor: Did Egypt falling below the water poverty level coincide with the preparation of plans to search for alternate water resources other than the Nile?

Abdul Muttalib: Of course, we have projects for using all alternatives, whether groundwater or agricultural drainage water, after it has been treated for reuse. There are also seawater desalination projects using modern techniques, and they are currently being used in some coastal areas.

Al-Monitor: Egypt has multiple underground water reservoirs, the largest being the Nubian Rock reservoir. Why doesn't [the state] rely on these reservoirs to solve the water shortage problem?

Abdul Muttalib: We will be very cautious when it comes to using groundwater, because extracting this water is very costly. Moreover, we will work to restore this water in places where it is used, according to regulations in order to preserve these reservoirs, especially since Egyptian underground water reservoirs are nonrenewable. We are working very hard and we have many places where we have established agricultural development projects that depend on groundwater to [meet] the goals of the development plan. There are 150,000 feddan [156,000 acres] in Farafra that are irrigated by groundwater, and we are working to cultivate areas in the New Valley [governorate] that will entirely rely on groundwater. Furthermore, there are integrated agricultural projects in Egypt that we are establishing through relying entirely on groundwater.

Al-Monitor: HYPERLINK "http://www.al-monitor.com/pulse/originals/2014/02/egypt-strikes-mahalla-workers-mehleb.html" Prime Minister [Ibrahim] Mehleb announced that he will abstain from drinking bottled water, stressing his confidence in drinking water originating from the Nile. However, from time to time there have been crises in rural areas related to water pollution at drinking water stations that draw from the Nile. What is your comment?

Abdul Muttalib: Personally, I drink tap water. At home I don't use bottled water, and I only use a normal filter. Thankfully there have been no problems and things are fine. But with regard to the recurrent crises, there are some things that cause water pollution problems in certain areas. For example, regarding the recent crisis in Kafar El -Sheikh and Al-Bahira, the problem was related to contamination from sewage or industrial water, and this is an accumulation of old problems. We have started to work on ending these sources of pollution, through closing four factories and companies along the Nile that were not abiding by the laws that prohibit dumping contaminated materials into the Nile. There is also cooperation with the Ministry of Housing to end the crisis of sewage overlap [with drinking water lines] and its effect on the quality of drinking water. We are working to propose new sewage plants, considering that this is the hope [for solving the crisis], and it is not acceptable to neglect the issue of Nile drinking water being contaminated with industrial and sewage water.

We are working to close any drinking water stations along the Nile where the water quality is affected by any pollutants, and periodic reports are carried out to check the quality of Nile water from drinking water stations.

This is done through a number of government agencies, including the Ministry of Health, the Ministry of Environment, and the laboratories affiliated with the Water Research Center of the Ministry of Irrigation.

Al-Monitor: With regard to the HYPERLINK "http://www.al-monitor.com/pulse/originals/2013/10/egypt-congo-river-water-nile.html" project to link the Congo River to the Nile, why has the Ministry of Irrigation changed its position on this project, from categorical rejection given that it is incompatible with international principles that stipulate not moving water from the Nile Basin to any other basin, to agreeing to participate in studies on this project that will be conducted by an Egyptian businessman?

Abdul Muttalib: First, I want to make an important clarification, I have never changed my position toward the issue of the Congo River [project]. Recent announcements have noted that we are studying the project from a technical standpoint, and working with the team of Dr. Ibrahim al - Fayoumi in the framework of technical studies regarding the feasibility of the project. Meanwhile, other matters relating to international laws are not the prerogative of the Ministry of Irrigation. We will only work on putting in place a concept and design to determine the possibility of executing such a plan. We will leave the other matters to specialists and concerned parties, to study its legality. We did not change our position on the project. We are going through a period that requires us to support anything that could work to increase our share [of water], even if by a single drop. (Text ends)

NILE DIPLOMACY: Nile River Dam Threatens War Between Egypt and Ethiopia

By Cam McGrath (March 24, 2014)

Ethiopia is building one of the largest dams in the world, the Grand Millennium Dam (GERD), on the River Nile near the Sudan border. (InternationalRivers.org)

CAIRO, EGYPT - When Egypt’s then-president Mohamed Morsi said in June 2013 that “all options” including military intervention, were on the table if Ethiopia continued to develop dams on the Nile River, many dismissed it as posturing. But experts claim Cairo is deadly serious about defending its historic water allotment, and if Ethiopia proceeds with construction of what is set to become Africa’s largest hydroelectric dam, a military strike is not out of the question.

Relations between Egypt and Ethiopia have soured since Ethiopia began construction on the 4.2 billion dollar Grand Renaissance Dam in 2011.

Egypt fears the new dam, slated to begin operation in 2017, will reduce the downstream flow of the Nile, which 85 million Egyptians rely on for almost all of their water needs. Officials in the Ministry of Irrigation claim Egypt will lose 20 to 30 percent of its share of Nile water and nearly a third of the electricity generated by its Aswan High Dam.

Ethiopia insists the Grand Renaissance Dam and its 74 billion cubic meter reservoir at the headwaters of the Blue Nile will have no adverse effect on Egypt's water share. It hopes the 6,000 megawatt hydroelectric project will lead to energy self-sufficiency and catapult the country out of grinding poverty.

"Egypt sees its Nile water share as a matter of national security," strategic analyst Ahmed Abdel Halim tells IPS. "To Ethiopia, the new dam is a source of national pride, and essential to its economic future."

The dispute has heated up since Ethiopia began diverting a stretch of the Nile last May, with some Egyptian parliamentarians calling for sending commandos or arming local insurgents to sabotage the dam project unless Ethiopia halts construction.

Ethiopia's state-run television responded last month with a report on a visit to the site by army commanders, who voiced their readiness to "pay the price" to defend the partially-built hydro project.

Citing a pair of colonial-era treaties, Egypt argues that it is entitled to no less than two-thirds of the Nile's water and has veto power over any upstream water projects such as dams or irrigation networks.

Accords drawn up by the British in 1929 and amended in 1959 divvied up the Nile's waters between Egypt and Sudan without ever consulting the upstream states that were the source of those waters.

The 1959 agreement awarded Egypt 55.5 billion cubic meters of the Nile's 84 billion cubic meter average annual flow, while Sudan received 18.5 billion cubic meters. Another 10 billion cubic meters is lost to evaporation in Lake Nasser, which was created by Egypt's Aswan High Dam in the 1970s, leaving barely a drop for the nine other states that share the Nile's waters.

While the treaty's water allocations appear gravely unfair to upstream Nile states, analysts point out that unlike the mountainous equatorial nations, which have alternative sources of water, the desert countries of Egypt and Sudan rely almost entirely on the Nile for their water needs.

"One reason for the high level of anxiety is that nobody really knows how this dam is going to affect Egypt's water share," Richard Tutwiler, a specialist in water resource management at the American University in Cairo (AUC), tells IPS. "Egypt is totally dependent on the Nile. Without it, there is no Egypt."

Egypt's concerns appear warranted as its per capita water share is just 660 cubic meters, among the world's lowest. The country's population is forecast to double in the next 50 years, putting even further strain on scarce water resources.

But upstream African nations have their own growing populations to feed, and the thought of tapping the Nile for their agriculture or drinking water needs is all too tempting.

The desire for a more equitable distribution of Nile water rights resulted in the 2010 Entebbe Agreement, which replaces water quotas with a clause that permits all activities provided they do not "significantly" impact the water security of other Nile Basin states. Five upstream countries – Ethiopia, Kenya, Uganda, Tanzania and Rwanda – signed the accord. Burundi signed a year later.

Egypt rejected the new treaty outright. But after decades of wielding its political clout to quash the water projects of its impoverished upstream neighbors, Cairo now finds itself in the uncomfortable position of watching its mastery over the Nile's waters slip through its fingers.

"Ethiopia's move was unprecedented. Never before has an upstream state unilaterally built a dam without downstream approval," Ayman Shabaana of the Cairo-based Institute for Africa Studies had told IPS last June. "If other upstream countries follow suit, Egypt will have a serious water emergency on its hands."

Ethiopia has sought to assure its downstream neighbors that the Grand Renaissance Dam is a hydroelectric project, not an irrigation scheme. But the dam is part of a broader scheme that would see at least three more dams on the Nile.

Cairo has dubbed the proposal “provocative”.

Egypt has appealed to international bodies to force Ethiopia to halt construction of the dam until its downstream impact can be determined. And while officials here hope for a diplomatic solution to diffuse the crisis, security sources say Egypt's military leadership is prepared to use force to protect its stake in the river.

Former president Hosni Mubarak floated plans for an air strike on any dam that Ethiopia built on the Nile, and in 2010 established an airbase in southeastern Sudan as a staging point for just such an operation, according to leaked emails from the global intelligence company Stratfor posted on Wikileaks.

Egypt's position was weakened in 2012 when Sudan, its traditional ally on Nile water issues, rescinded its opposition to the Grand Renaissance Dam and instead threw its weight behind the project. Analysts attribute Khartoum's change of heart to the country's revised domestic priorities following the secession of South Sudan a year earlier.

According to AUC's Tutwiler, once Sudan felt assured that the dam would have minimal impact on its water allotment, the mega-project's other benefits became clear. The dam is expected to improve flood control, expand downstream irrigation capacity and, crucially, allow Ethiopia to export surplus electricity to power-hungry Sudan via a cross-border link.

Some studies indicate that properly managed hydroelectric dams in Ethiopia could mitigate damaging floods and increase Egypt's overall water share. Storing water in the cooler climes of Ethiopia would ensure far less water is lost to evaporation than in the desert behind the Aswan High Dam.

Egypt, however, is particularly concerned about the loss of water share during the five to ten years it will take to fill the dam's reservoir. Tutwiler says it is unlikely that Ethiopia will severely choke or stop the flow of water. Some 85 million Egyptians depend on the Nile for water. (Text ends)

NILE - Egypt wants to Diverting the Congo River to the Nile'

World News Politics (March 25, 2014) During the ongoing crisis between Egypt and Ethiopia over the construction of the Grand Renaissance Dam, which threatens catastrophe for Egypt as we have discussed in previous articles in Al-

Ahram Weekly, some have aired the idea of connecting the Congo River with the Nile. This, they say, will feed our river with 110 billion cubic metres of water a year through a canal and/or tunnel linking one or more branches of the Congo with the White Nile or with one of its tributaries in South Sudan. From there, of course, these billions of cubic metres of water would head northward, join up with the waters coming from the Atbara and Blue Nile and continue northwards into Egypt.

As its advocates summarise the idea, it would require the construction of dams or sluices on the Congo at a location some 600 kilometres from the White Nile. There the water level would have to be raised, by means of pumps, by a huge 250-300 metres in order to counter the opposing territorial incline. Then the water would be propelled towards South Sudan and the White Nile. Then, at some point in South Sudan, the water level would be raised again so as to channel it into a "new Nile", some 2,500 kilometres long, to conduct the water through Sudan and on into Egypt's Western or Eastern desert. Clearly a project of such a scale and complexity needs to be studied very closely by the relevant experts who will need to be extremely precise in their calculations and to take into consideration a range of other technical and non-technical factors.

In fact, the idea of an artificial Nile is not new. Colonel Muammar Al - Gaddafi had once proposed it beneath the banner of African development and the redistribution of the continent's water resources among African Union members in the vicinity. He charged a team of experts with the task of undertaking the necessary studies, but the idea was soon dismissed because of its infeasibility due to the technical, political and environmental complications involved.

The group that is currently advocating the same idea also does so in the name of African development that, according to them, begins with a project to divert the Congo into the Nile. Such a project, they argue, will free Egypt forever from the spectre of water deficit, which has come to loom more perilously than ever in view of the Ethiopian hydraulic projects, particularly the Renaissance Dam. It is worth noting, here, that the head of this group is a businessman with projects in the Democratic Republic of the Congo (DRC) and a former irrigation engineer and geologist in the Egyptian Mineral Resources Authority.

More significantly, it is important to bear in mind that no written technical, scientific or feasibility studies for such a mega-project currently exist. The only material that is available and that has been submitted to some government authorities was compiled from photos taken off the Internet and that have no geotechnical or architectural value. When authorities at the Egyptian Mineral Resources Authority were asked whether they had studies for such a project, they responded that they did not, contrary to the claims of the advocating group. The same applied to the Faculty of Engineering at Cairo University. The faculty's irrigation and drainage department said that they had never undertaken a scientific study for that project. Moreover, they also said that the group advocating the Congo River diversion project had asked them only for a design for a model village and for a design road parallel to the "new Nile" should the project be carried out. The latter request was curious since, as any engineer will tell you, roads cannot be designed on the basis of satellite imagery. Field surveys and measurements have to be conducted on the ground. Apparently the group also asked for a study on the amount of energy that would be required to raise the water level to the necessary height. According to the calculations of an advisory organisation, more than seven gigawatts would be needed, which is to say the equivalent to the amount of power that would be generated by the Renaissance Dam.

As for the concept of a 2,500 kilometre long new Nile stretching through Sudan and into Egypt, it is obvious that its proponents had little interest in the topographical and geotechnical properties of the ground through which such an artificial river course would pass, let alone the environmental impact.

So, before indulging in this pipe dream further, let us consider the following hard facts:

- Due to the relatively steep geological incline of the DRC, the flow of the Congo is very rapid. At a rate of up to 40,000 cubic metres a second, it is one of the fastest and most turbulent rivers in the world, making it very difficult to control. Moreover, this does not even begin to take into consideration other geotechnical considerations such as the nature of the bedrock, rifts and fissures, and the like.

- Some 400,000 square kilometres of dense jungle surrounds the Congo River, adding yet another obstacle, on top of the geographical incline, to the choice of the site for constructing a dam or series of sluices near the borders of South Sudan.

- The area identified for the proposed canal leading from the Congo to the White Nile consists of a range of steep mountains. With peaks up to 2,750 and 5,170 metres, these mountains are formed of hard granite rock.

- The envisioned dam (or dams) will be larger than the Renaissance Dam (with a 74 billion cubic metre reservoir capacity) and even more technologically complicated to build.

- According to the group's figures, the reservoir behind the dam would hold 110 billion cubic metres of water. It remains a mystery how they came up with this figure, as alluring as it is, given that it is exactly twice as much as Egypt's current water quota from the Nile and more than 1.5 times the amount of water to be retained behind in the Renaissance Dam.

- Designing the open canal or tunnels or pipelines, or whatever means are conceived to transport such enormous quantities of water, is in itself a herculean task.

- Southern Sudan, where the water from the Congo would be initially destined, is primarily marshland. What precautions, if any, have been envisioned to prevent that area from being submerged beneath the water that would be flooding in from the Congo?

- The branch of the White Nile, with which the Congo is meant to be connected, does not have large capacity. It cannot hold more than 12 billion cubic metres a year.

The artificial river that would stretch 2,000 kilometres through South Sudan and Sudan and then another 500 kilometres in Egypt would have to be a multinational endeavour and as it would pass through rugged terrain and both inhabited and uninhabited areas the obstacles facing it would be virtually insurmountable. If we have not yet been able to resume work on the comparatively modest Jonglei canal project, imagine the fate of a mega-project such as the "new Nile" meant to carry twice the amount of water as the old Nile.

Proponents of that project have billed it being able to transport 110 billion cubic metres a year, generate 18 gigawatts of electricity and to reclaim 80 million acres of land all at the cost of LE8 billion. They say, moreover, that it could be completed in the space of 24 months or, if we add the additional six mentioned by a senior official, 30 months. Such "projections" only underscore how unscientific the proposal is.

The huge media fanfare surrounding this project is unwarranted and incomprehensible. But what is more suspicious are the claims voiced by members of the group promoting this project, that it has already obtained the approval of government authorities in spite of all the objections on the part of specialists in geology and hydraulic engineering, experts in feasibility and technical studies, legal experts, especially those informed on matters regarding international river courses, and political analysts who are aware of the nature of the relations between the countries of the Congo and Nile River basins and of the fact that the DRC already is engaged in hydraulic projects with South Africa that will generate 40 gigawatts of power. All these people agree that geologically, architecturally, politically, mechanically and economically the project is totally unrealistic. If it were at all feasible, why would we object so strongly to the Renaissance Dam? (Text ends)

Egypt mulls international arbitration over Ethiopia's Renaissance Dam'

Ethiopian water minister calls on Cairo to re-engage in talks on controversial dam project

Cairo, Asharq Al-Awsat (April 3, 2014) — Addis Ababa confirmed on Wednesday that it is ready to open talks with Cairo on its Renaissance Dam project, following news that Egypt has formed a special legal committee to look at the possibility of securing international arbitration over the issue of Ethiopia's Grand Renaissance Dam.

Talks between Ethiopia and Egypt broke down in January amid technical differences of opinion over the affect that the dam will have on Egypt's share of Nile waters. Cairo claims that the construction of what will be Africa's largest dam will have a significant effect on the flow of the Nile River, although Addis Ababa says that such fears are over-exaggerated.

Ethiopian Water Minister Alemayehu Tegenu said on Wednesday that the Addis Ababa government had "exerted utmost efforts to build trust among all riparian countries," adding that "Egypt has continued to engage in negative campaigning against the Grand Ethiopian Renaissance Dam."

Speaking at a ceremony held to mark three years since construction of the dam started, Tegenu criticized Cairo's attempts to politicize the action of a panel of experts tasked with studying the dam's potential impact on downstream states.

“Egypt is determined to delay the tripartite engagement by withdrawing from the Ethiopia, Sudan and Egypt forum,” he said, adding: “We urge Egypt to re-join the engagement and work for the benefits of our countries. “

Addis Ababa's call for Egypt to re-engage with the talks comes following news that Cairo has formed a high-level ministerial committee—including three international law experts—to determine Egypt's legal rights to Nile waters and the possibility of securing international arbitration.

Egypt's Foreign Ministry on Monday confirmed that Cairo's stance towards the controversial dam project remains unchanged. Foreign Ministry spokesman Badr Abdelatty issued a statement saying that "Egypt's stance towards the Ethiopian Renaissance Dam is clear and there is no room at all to waive or risk endangering Egypt, because the issue is considered a national security one."

Abdelatty added that Cairo has a plan to tackle the crisis, saying it is "gradually being implemented." That plan covers the political, legal and technical aspects of the dam, he said, adding that it aims to push for "serious negotiations" to guarantee the interests of all riparian states.

Egyptian Foreign Minister Nabil Fahmy spoke with EU foreign policy chief Catherine Ashton about the Egyptian–Ethiopian dispute before the start of the EU–Africa summit in Brussels on Tuesday. The summit began on Wednesday, with Fahmy expected to discuss the dam project with his Ethiopian counterpart, Tedros Adhanom, during the two-day conference. Asharq Al-Awsat is the world's premier pan-Arab daily newspaper, printed simultaneously each day on four continents in 14 cities. Launched in London in 1978, Asharq Al-Awsat has established itself as the decisive publication on pan-Arab and international affairs, offering its readers in-depth analysis and exclusive editorials, as well as the most comprehensive coverage of the entire Arab world.

HYPERLINK "http://ethioforum.org/egypts-potential-presidential-candidate-threatens-to-use-force-against-ethiopias-dam/" Egypt's Potential Presidential Candidate Threatens to Use Force Against HYPERLINK "http://ethioforum.org/egypts-potential-presidential-candidate-threatens-to-use-force-against-ethiopias-dam/" Ethiopia's Dam'

SUDAN TRIBUNE (April 9, 2014) An Egyptian potential presidential candidate hopeful announced today that he will order the use of military force against Ethiopia if the latter does not suspend the construction of the Grand Renaissance dam. In announcing his presidential bid at a press conference on Sunday, lawyer Mortada Mansour said that “water for Egypt is Egypt’s life”. “There are signed international conventions… .There are two agreements, one in 1929 and the other in 1959 to regulate water usage between Egypt and Sudan,” Mansour added.

The controversial figure, who was elected last week as head of Cairo’s Zamalek Club, accused Israel of standing behind the Ethiopian dam project and dismissed popular initiatives to resolve the dispute with Addis Ababa. “There are international organizations that failed [to mediate] and Ethiopia stuck to its position. Just like they threatened to use their army, Egypt has an army. If Israel which is inciting Ethiopia learned a lesson from the Egyptian army in 1973 [war], you are threatening my life. I will not allow you to build your dam and block water from me and in the end famine occurs among the Egyptian people and we kill each other for a drop of water,” Mansour said.

“Just like they showed off and brought their generals around the dam and said if Egypt can come. No we also have generals and planes O’ Ethiopia that can reclaim Egypt’s rights because we will not allow a drop of water to be cut, to have drought in the country, in agriculture, people can’t find a drop of water. This is vital for us. I thought that for subsequent Egyptian administrations that the issue of water is a life or death issue. This is not up for discussion” he added. Egypt fears that the $4.6 billion hydropower plant will diminish its share of the river’s water flows, arguing its historic water rights must be maintained.

Ethiopia is the source of about 85% of the Nile’s water, mainly through rainfall in its highlands, with over 90% of Egyptians relying on water from the Nile’s flows. In June 2012, a panel of international experts tasked with studying the impacts of the Ethiopian dam on lower riparian countries, including Sudan and Egypt, found that the dam project will not cause significant harm to either country. Cairo remains unconvinced and has sought further studies and consultation with Khartoum and Addis Ababa.

If Mansour’s candidacy is endorsed by the presidential commission he will face the former Egyptian defense minister Field Marshal Abdel -Fatah El-Sisi who is widely seen as almost certain to win. The leftist political figure Hamdeen Sabahi has also pledged to compete in the elections. Mansour has made a failed bid to run for president in the 2012 elections but was disqualified by the elections committee. According to a profile by the Daily News Egypt, Mansour said in 2011 that he did not “have the right to run” for president because he is “ill-tempered”.

In April 2011, Mansour was accused of being involved in Tahrir clashes commonly dubbed “the Battle of the Camel” on 2 February, which left 11 demonstrators dead and hundreds injured. He was later acquitted of all charges however. He ran in four parliamentary elections in 1990, 1995, 2000 and 2012, but only won in the 2000 elections. In 2012, he lost to an opponent from the Muslim Brotherhood. He is well known for his hot temper and was taken off air in TV phone interviews a number of times for using obscene language. Mansour is also seen as someone who is obsessed with filing numerous police complaints and lawsuits against figures he has disputes with.

Nile dam study fails to stem the tide of Egyptian indignation towards Ethiopia’

The Guardian (April 18, 2014) - The opening sentence of Egypt's new constitution describes the country as the river Nile's gift to Egyptians. It is a grand claim, but one that helps explain Egypt's indignation at the ongoing construction of a blockage on the Nile, thousands of miles upstream: the $4.7bn (£2.8bn) Grand Ethiopian Renaissance Dam (GERD).

Egyptians have long maintained that Ethiopia's dam project will dangerously deplete its water stocks – about 95% of which are derived from the world's longest river. A year ago, a former Egyptian water official boldly claimed that the Gerd might deprive Egypt of up to 10bn kilolitres, devastating roughly a million acres of farmland along the shores of the Nile.

"Then you might cross the Nile on the back of a camel," the former head of Egypt's National Water Research Centre said at the time, in what were highly contested claims.

Egyptian politicians have used such claims to portray the dam as a threat to national security, and have occasionally made ambiguous statements about the possibility of military action. For their part, the Ethiopian government sees the Gerd as a crucial developmental goal – a 6,000 megawatt source of surplus electricity that they could sell to foreign countries to boost their economy.

Last month, the saga took a fresh twist after the leak of a highly anticipated and hitherto suppressed report into the long-term effects of what would be Africa's largest hydroelectric dam. Written by two water experts from each of the three main countries concerned – Ethiopia, Egypt and Sudan – as well as international advisers, the report was seen as a much needed means of arbitration between the parties concerned.

But for nearly a year the report's contents were a mystery. After its submission last April, publication was suppressed at the request of one of the countries involved, enabling all concerned to make whatever claims they liked about its contents.

That should have changed at the end of March, when a leaked version (pdf) was finally published by the International Rivers Network (IRN), an independent group that campaigns against dams across the world. But rather than clarifying the dam's impact once and for all, the report has become the latest pawn in a war of words between Egypt and Ethiopia.

IRN said it showed that "big questions remain" and called for a halt to the dam's construction. But Ethiopian government spokesman Getachew Reda said the group was "absolutely biased", and "part of the smear campaign organised by Egypt". In the meantime, the dam's construction continues apace.

The report is nuanced and complex, and does not try to quantify exactly the likely downstream effect of the dam on Egypt's water supply. But its 48 pages nonetheless contain alarming findings. If the dam's reservoirs are filled during years of average or above-average rainfall, says the report, the hydroelectric capacity of Egypt's downstream Aswan High dam (Had) – which provides about 15% of Egypt's power – could face a temporary 6% decrease. But if filled during years of below-average rainfall, the Gerd may "significantly impact on water supply to Egypt and cause the loss of power generation at Had for extended periods".

Among other criticisms, the report warns that the dam's foundations may need further structural support to protect against sliding. It also says Ethiopia has done little to assess the Gerd's effect on local people, ecosystems and biodiversity. Based on these findings, the IRN concludes that the report "confirms Egypt's concerns that the project's impacts could be significant", and calls for construction to cease pending better analysis.

Not all independent analysts share this view, however. According to Dr Ana Cascão, a researcher at the Stockholm International Water Institute whose doctoral thesis analysed hydropolitics in the Nile basin, Egypt fought for the report to be kept secret. Cascão argues the study is largely optimistic about the Gerd's impacts – "and that's why Egypt was not happy for it to be released". It is critical about the dam's social and environmental impact, she says, "but otherwise – in terms of dam safety and even in terms of water going downstream – the report is quite positive".

This is because the Gerd may eventually help to reduce the build-up of sediment in downstream dams like the Had, increasing capacity. The Gerd will also help to keep the Nile's flow – which presently fluctuates according to the amount of rainfall, potentially causing problems for downstream farmers even in Egypt – constant throughout the year. In terms of structural safety, Sudan – the country most endangered by any catastrophe at the Gerd – is satisfied with its construction.

Egypt's interests may actually be aligned with Ethiopia's, since Ethiopia will ultimately want to see as much water flow through the Gerd as possible in order to maximise hydroelectric power. It is, says Cascão, Sudan's intentions that may instead cause the greatest long-term concern for Egypt. The Gerd would allow Sudan to siphon off more downstream water for farm irrigation, potentially allowing the republic to take more water from the Nile than allowed by an agreement signed with Egypt in 1959.

Sudan has achieved this leverage by engaging positively with the dam's construction: Egypt's only means of reaching a grand compromise may be through similar engagement. But it may now be too late. According to the Ethiopian government, an army of 8,500 builders, working 24 hours a day, has already completed about 30% of the 1,800 sq km site.

NILE - Egypt to ‘escalate’ Ethiopian dam dispute’

Aljazeera (April 21, 2014) In the three years since construction began on the 1.8km Grand Ethiopian Renaissance Dam across the Blue Nile River, Egypt and Ethiopia have been engaged in a war of words over its potential impacts. Ethiopia believes the massive dam will herald an era of prosperity, spurring growth and attracting foreign currency with the export of power to neighbouring countries. But Egypt has raised concerns about the downstream effects, as the Blue Nile supplies the Nile with about 85 percent of its water.

Both sides say they seek a negotiated solution, but they remain at loggerheads, with negotiations stalled. Ethiopia insists the dispute must be resolved through negotiations between the two parties, with Mahamoud Dirir, the ambassador to Egypt, noting in a statement last month that "there are only two… countries in the entire world which are well -placed to mediate between Egypt and Ethiopia." Egypt, meanwhile, is quietly lobbying the international community for support against what it says is a violation of international law, diplomatic sources confirmed to Al Jazeera.

"Egypt plans to take actions to escalate the situation against Ethiopia," said a western diplomat in Cairo, who spoke on condition of anonymity. "But the exact implications of these actions [are] still unclear." Egypt's main concern is water security, as the country faces a future of increasing scarcity. Nearly all of Egypt's water comes from the Nile, and its population of 83 million is growing at nearly two percent annually. Already, water shortages cause problems. The most common response is the reuse of wastewater in agriculture, often untreated. The 2005 UNDP Human Development Report for Egypt stated that "poor water quality affects both health and land productivity with damage costs estimated to have reached LE 5.35 billion [$7.7m] or 1.8 percent of GDP."

Doaa Ezzat Zaki al-Agha, a water management specialist conducting research in the Nile delta, said five members of her family died from liver disease, which she believes resulted from poor drinking water. "They have no other choices, only the Nile water," she said. Mohamed Abdel Wahab, a farmer from a small village of 300 families near the delta city of Alexandria, an area that regularly experiences water shortages, believes the government should be "more strict with Egypt's sovereign right to water" – and his view reflects that of many Egyptians. Any threat to the country's water supply is treated as an existential threat. Accordingly, Egypt has long opposed upstream development projects on the Nile. In the past this prevented Ethiopia from receiving money from international organisations like the World Bank, which has a "no objection" rule for projects it funds. Now, Ethiopia is funding the $4.8bn project itself.

Tensions peaked in May 2013 when Ethiopia began diverting the Blue Nile. Former Egyptian President Mohamed Morsi told a national conference: "We will defend each drop of Nile water with our blood if necessary." Today, statements from the Egyptian Foreign Ministry are more conciliatory, with spokesperson Badr Abdelatty saying he hoped the situation could be resolved through "cooperation". A recent statement by Abdelatty on the State Information Service website, however, adds: "The Ethiopian dam is an issue that can bear no compromises."

The last negotiations in Addis Ababa in February stalled over whether international experts should be included in a technical committee being formed to implement the recommendations of a May 2013 report on the dam. Written by an international panel of experts (IPOE), the report proposed more extensive assessment of the dam's potential transboundary environmental and social impacts. "We must have an international member on the committee and the Ethiopians refused this," said Khaled Wasif, a spokesperson for the Egyptian Ministry of Irrigation and Water Resources. As construction of the dam progresses – it is already 30 percent complete – Ethiopia has less incentive to negotiate and Egypt has less leverage. With negotiations at an impasse, Egypt is petitioning other countries for support, sources say. By referring to supposed breaches of international law, Egypt hopes to pressure donor communities who have investments in or influence on Ethiopia, according to the western diplomat in Cairo.

Foreign Minister Nabil Fahmy has toured Africa and Europe in recent months and Nile water has been on the agenda. During a trip to Italy at the start of February, Fahmy asked the Italian company contracted to build the dam to halt construction. A Foreign Ministry letter to the Salini Construttori company, obtained by Al Jazeera, states: "The government of Egypt calls upon the EU Commission, and the esteemed European governments, to give due consideration to the accountability of business enterprise of European nationality for their conduct in supporting Ethiopia's projects affecting the Nile river downstream states." It continues: "Egypt also calls upon the government of Italy, to invite Salini construttori to suspend construction works at the GERDP [Grand Ethiopian Renaissance Dam Project] until the recommendations of the IPOE Report are implemented."

The Egyptian Foreign Ministry, the EU delegation in Cairo and the Italian embassy in Cairo declined to comment on the note. A spokesman for the Italian embassy said: "On this aspect we don't feel like replying on their behalf [of the Egyptian foreign ministry]. If they don't want to talk about it, it is fine for us as well." According to the diplomat in Cairo, Egypt has also lobbied the US, China, Saudi Arabia, the UAE and Japan, as well as international organisations such as the World Bank. Spokespeople for all of these governments and organisations declined to comment, with the exception of the Japanese embassy in Cairo, which denied being approached by Egypt on the issue.

Until recently, Egypt has relied on a "historic right" and colonial -era treaties to defend its water share. "This position is absolutely untenable," said Owen McIntyre, a professor of international water law at University College Cork, noting the colonial-era agreements "completely ignore upper riparian states". Today, Egypt's position has evolved, with the government quoting "widely respected" principles of international law. "International watercourses are governed by a set of agreed legal rules and principles," Abdelatty said. "Among these widely respected rules and principles is that of the equitable and reasonable utilisation of the river, the ‘no harm' rule, and the prior notification rule."

However, Egypt's interpretation differs from that of its neighbour and much of the international community, McIntyre said, noting the principle is generally formulated in terms of "significant harm". The May 2013 IPOE report concluded that despite more studies being needed, long-term effects of the dam were unlikely to harm Egypt. In the short term, however, less water will reach Egypt as the reservoir fills. While Ethiopia says it is open to negotiating the period over which it fills the reservoir, Egypt insists it will be harmed regardless. A country's dependence on water is the primary factor by which harm is evaluated, McIntyre said, and Egypt insists it is a water-scarce country. "The problem is that when you look at Egypt's use of Nile water, it is actually rather wasteful," McIntyre said. The harm principle is just one factor to be considered alongside the obligation on states to cooperate in the reasonable and equitable utilisation of transboundary watercourses, he added. Egypt's history of cooperation is not strong. The Nile Basin Initiative, a partnership of Nile riparian states formed in 1999 and supported by the World Bank, aimed to create a cooperative framework agreement for the management of Nile water. But Egypt refused to sign any agreement that did not guarantee its current share of Nile water.

In addition, Egypt previously objected to the very principles it now advocates. It did not support the UN Watercourses Convention 1997, which codified the principles of transboundary water management. "Egypt cannot get help through international water law as Egypt herself did not acknowledge these principles historically," said Muhammad Mizanur Rahaman, a professor of international water law at Asia Pacific University in Bangladesh. By acting unilaterally, "Ethiopia is now, ironically, following the same path as Egypt did before" when it constructed the Aswan High Dam in the 1960s, Rahaman noted. "Egypt, Ethiopia and Sudan should all agree on the principles which they agree on before trying to take refuge or shelter from the principles of international water law."

Egyptian satellite to monitor construction of Ethiopia's disputed dam’

By HYPERLINK "http://english.ahram.org.eg/" Ahram Online (April 30, 2014) - A new Egyptian satellite will track the construction of an Ethiopian hydroelectric dam over which officials in Cairo and Addis Ababa have been locked in a standoff over fears that the project will hinder Egypt's access to the Nile's water.

Launched almost two weeks ago, Egysat will monitor Ethiopia's Grand Renaissance Dam by capturing high quality photos of the construction site along with other sources of the Nile, said Alaa El-din El-Nahry, vice president of Egypt's National Authority for Remote Sensing and Space Sciences.

The LE300 million satellite – which will come into operation in mid-June after a two-month test period – will track the dam's height, storage capacity and water discharge. It will also monitor the Kongo River basin to assess the effectiveness of a proposed project to link the Kongo and Nile rivers.

Egypt's government believes the satellite's findings will bolster its negotiations with Ethiopia and provide legal ground in case it must resort to international arbitration over any violations in the dam's stated purpose of electricity generation, El-Nahry said during a seminar in Cairo, according to Al-Ahram's daily Arabic newspaper.

Egypt has been particularly concerned that the dam, now more than 30 percent finished, will hugely impact its share of the Nile, the country's main source of potable water. Situated near the Sudanese border on the Blue Nile, a Nile tributary, the hydroelectric dam will be the biggest in Africa, capable of producing 6,000 megawatts of energy.

Last week, Ethiopian Prime Minister Hailemariam Desalegn urged Egypt to return to the tripartite discussions with Ethiopia and Sudan in an effort to settle the dispute. The three countries have been engaged in a series of dialogues since the launch of the project three years ago.

Last year, Ethiopia and five other Nile-basin countries – Rwanda, Tanzania, Uganda, Kenya and Burundi – endorsed an accord, the Co-operative Framework Agreement, which replaces a 1929 treaty granting Egypt veto power over any project on the Nile in upstream countries. Sudan, Egypt's immediate downstream country, has backed Ethiopia's plans to build the dam.

NILE: Egypt Suffers From Hydro-Political Short-Termism’

Addis Fortune, Addis Ababa (May 11, 2014)

OPINION - Born out of the Ottoman Empire and British colonial rule's historical revulsion to the development by the upper riparian nations of the Nile River, Egypt's recent revolutionary tide against the construction of the Great Ethiopian Renaissance Dam (GERD) is storming regional and international diplomatic fields with ill-founded and spurious forecasts of the menace of the project on the lives and livelihoods of Egyptian people.

Fettered by the stubborn adherence to the British and Ottoman's "own will", Cairo's polity is now incapable of putting a bridle on the fickle nature of its political officials' largely whimsical hydro-diplomatic acts to halt Ethiopia's move in making the project a reality.

Cairo's hydro-diplomacy single-mindedly and glaringly roams hither-and-thither to whittle away Ethiopia's determination. This mindset heavily leans on Egypt's time-honoured dependency on outsiders to extend its interests.

An Egyptian foreign ministry spokesperson's recent remarks are a case in point, illustrating Egypt's hydro-political dependency and will to cripple Ethiopia's march to accomplish its dam and perpetuate its insatiable interests over the Nile. Badr Abdelatty told Reuters on April 23, 2014, that "We have contacts with everybody... with Russia, with China, you name it", to bar them from supporting and financing Ethiopia's efforts to accomplish the grand project, stressing that the GERD was a violation of Egypt's interests.

This attempt is extremely antithetical to Ethiopia's stance over the intent of the construction of the GERD. Prime Minister Hailemariam Desalegn epitomises the GERD as "a real expression of the nation's commitment to a project which demonstrates the determination of the people and the government to win the war against poverty whatever the cost".

Indeed, Ethiopians have committed themselves to ensure that indignity, famine and war will not wither their eyes along the banks of the tributaries of the Blue Nile, Barro-Akobo and Tekezze - including various tributaries, such as Wanqa, Jamma, Muger, Guder, Agwel, Didessa, Shita, Chamoga, Weter and Beles. They have also affirmed that the GERD will turn the Nile into a passage of light, conquering the roots of mistrust, suspicion, underdevelopment and Egypt's exclusive mastery over the resources of the River for the shared benefit of all Basin countries.

Egypt's deaf ear to Ethiopia's calls for a genuine discussion is reminiscent of its historic, deep-rooted hydro-political dependence on the shoulders of the major traditional superpowers, including the Ottoman Empire (as its province), the British Empire (as its colony), America (as its Cold War client state in the Middle East & North Africa -MENA - and the Horn regions during the reign of President Anwar Sadat) and the Soviet Union (as a client in the Middle East and Africa).

In the meantime, Egypt is also wooing its traditional patrons and new emerging powers, including the US, EU, Russia and China, as well as many other major powers, to eternise its long-cherished geo-political goal of "controlling the Nile", immortalising the legacy of British colonial rule and the Ottoman Empire's path towards the development, utilisation and use of the waters of the Nile River. Blown by the waves of its long-term dependency syndrome and driven by the de facto ruler, Cairo is pursuing another hydro-political card to outsmart Ethiopia's march towards inclusive prosperity and common will, upholding the recently oft -repeated second Cold War rivalry (the US and Russia) to project its unilateral securitisation of the Nile and transcend its short-term interests over the Nile Valley.

After Egypt's independence from colonial rule, the country's leaders sought support from foreign powers to deter Ethiopia's development projects on the Blue Nile, Tekeze and Barro-Akobo. In fact, they were, according to Yacob Arsano (Prof.), successful in crumbling the Abay (Blue Nile) Master Plan Study of 1958 to 1964. They also played a quintessential role in crushing the Gilgel Abay Project of 1960s.

More ominously, President Sadat also obliterated Ethiopia's Tana-Beles Development Project in the mid-1980s, which hoped to salvage millions of people from Wello, Tigray, Gondar, Haddya and Kambata from famines as a result of frequent droughts. Additionally, when President Gamal Abdel Nasser built the Aswan High Dam, the Soviet Union, together with its Hydro Project Institute, provided billions of dollars, technicians and heavy machinery in order to realise Egypt's symbol of power.

Egypt's hydro-political dependency on outsiders is firmly rooted in its history as a province of the Ottoman Empire and later as a colony of British colonial rule. Its dependency is not only confided to hydro-politics, but also its overall development direction.

The dependency has taken root from institutions that were developed first by the Ottoman Empire and then British colonial rule. That is why the renowned institutional economists, James Robinson and Daron Acemoğlu, assert that "the development path forged largely by the history of Ottoman and European rule" impedes Egypt from independently crafting its way to prosperity and development. They go on to say that leaders of post-independent Egypt "followed the former colonial world by developing hierarchical, authoritarian regimes with few of the political and economic institutions" to achieve their development goals.

Currently, Cairo's hydro-political short-termism vows to view Africa as a strategic and security ally to enshrine its Nile factor in the African diplomatic circle and put aside the imaginative and self-induced fear of the Cooperative Framework Agreement (CFA). Reformulating its strategic goals and objectives, post-Revolution officials in Cairo are stepping into the long-neglected African circle to seek a hand in the Nile Basin and other African countries to cement ways to maintain mastery over the geopolitical hemisphere of the Nile Valley and prevent up-streamers from using the waters for the absolute use and benefit of Egyptian people. Beyond his calls for Egypt's membership in the African Union, the Egyptian Prime Minister's visit to other African countries succinctly entails Egypt's dependency on the African circle to downplay the future development of upper riparian countries in utilising their water resources.

But it all takes root from the long overdue dependency of the country on foreign powers. Indeed, the incumbent government in Cairo sticks to Britain's accords, which cultivated the imperial political supremacy, rather than seeking integration with the Eastern Nile Basin countries. Their yearning to continue the legacy of British colonial rule, the Ottoman Empire and Cold War rivalry over the use of the waters of the Nile has now led them to calling for Russia, America and the EU to help sustain the dream of the founder of modern Egypt -Muhammed Ali - to control the head waters of the Nile.

The recent visit of presidential hopeful Abdel Fattah El -Sisi to Russia was intended to make the US and the EU switch sides, with Cairo's new roadmap on its future standing in regional and global affairs. He has also been successful in pressing Barack Obama's administration to release 650 million dollars of the total 1.5 billion dollars in aid allocated to Egypt.

His cautious move is reminiscent of the Cold War rivalry in extending the old state's interests. America and the EU have come on board to help support the coming El-Sisi government's fight against terrorism and legitimise the coup at the expense of democracy and human rights.

To the dismay of Egyptian politicians, upper riparian nations of the Nile are committed to proactively engaging in the making of today's and tomorrow's drama of regional and global affairs. They are now rethinking Egypt's unremitting hegemonic reign over the utilisation of the Nile River.

They offer another alternative - the mutually cooperative partnership over the development, management and utilisation of the Nile - to fairly and equitably channel the waters of the River for the mutual development and transformation of the Nile Valley region and for the realisation of the priorities of African Renaissance and Pan-Africanism.

Having understood the failure to modernise their country and its severe repercussions on their ancestors, Ethiopians are today financing the GERD, reiterating the late Prime Minister Meles Zenawi's remark - "we not only have a plan, but we also have the capacity to assert our rights".

They are also committed to end one of the knottiest ironies of the world, as the Wall Street Journal put it - "the land that feeds the Nile is unable to feed itself". What Egypt needs to do is to reinvent its foreign policy direction towards the Nile, abandoning its interest in preserving the needs of the old state institutions implanted by British and Ottoman rule. It should also give passage to interdependence, rather than dependence on alien forces, to maximise its interests in rectifying the wrongs of yesterday and seek to build a better tomorrow. Mansour Al-Hadi (phd) He Is an Independent Political Analyst Based in Addis Abeba.

El-Sisi talks Marshall plan, negotiations with Ethiopia, possible pardon of some prisoners’

Former army chief Abdel-Fattah El-Sisi answered questions about political prisoners, the Ethiopian dam and other issues in the second half of his third pre-election interview on Monday.

Three anchors from the privately owned TV stations Al-Nahar, Dream and Al-Hayat fielded questions at the frontrunner for two hours. When asked if he would release those jailed for breaking the controversial protest law, El-Sisi said: "I will do anything that will help promote stability and social justice." He emphasised that he was not speaking about the Muslim Brotherhood.

The former army chief spoke of a "Marshall" plan in the works for Egypt, similar to the US sponsored plan that rebuild Europe in the aftermath of World War II. El-Sisi said education and health would be at the top of his agenda if he was elected president. I do not make promises that cannot fulfill, he asserted. "I hope Egyptians will start to feel some changes within two years [if I am elected president]." He said he would try to control inflation in order to help poor and middle class people.

He highlighted the "heroic" role of former Egyptian president Anwar Sadat in the October War of 1973 and the subsequent peace treaty with Israel. Regarding the Renaissance Dam, El-Sisi called for further negotiations. The negative effects of the dam must be communicated with clarity to the Ethiopian government, he added. Regarding slums, El-Sisi said he would improve them by installing electricity and sewage facilities, and repairing roads. El-Sisi rejected the notion that he represents former president Hosni Mubarak and that he is trying to restore the pre-January revolution regime. Such rumours should not exist, El-Sisi declared, and there should be no room for such fallacies. He said he had always been impressed by Egyptians' political awareness.

"The 25 January and 30 June revolutions, and the authority Egyptians have given me, shows they are aware of the dangers Egypt is facing." El - Sisi stressed the crucial role of the media. He said it had always tried to raise the awareness of citizens and he needed it to continue doing this. Regarding Egypt's relationship with the US, he said he would deal with all foreign countries in the same way. When told the US government would pressure the new president to include the Muslim Brotherhood in the political process, he said it would first have to convince the Egyptian people.

Speaking about the Salafist Nour Party, El-Sisi said they would help to build a prosperous Egypt. He then highlighted the role of Christians in society. He stressed that he was aware of sectarianism, and Egyptians should unite against it. Egyptians will vote for a new president on 26-27 May. El-Sisi's only challenger is Nasserist politician Hamdeen Sabahi, who finished third in the 2012 poll, which was won by Mohamed Morsi. (Text ends)

HYDRO POLITICS: Conflict deepens Middle East water crisis’

By Thomas W Lippman (May 21, 2014)

Inter-Press Service WASHINGTON - The Middle East's seemingly endless conflicts are diverting attention and resources from a graver long-term threat that looms over the whole region: the growing scarcity of water. And the situation will get worse before it gets better - if it ever does get better. Years of war, careless water supply management, unchecked population growth, ill-advised agricultural policies, and subsidies that encourage consumption have turned a basically arid part of the world into a voracious consumer of water. The trajectory is not sustainable.

Those were the gloomy if unsurprising conclusions of a three-day conference on the subject in Istanbul last week. From Libya to Iraq to Yemen, too many people and too many animals have stretched water resources beyond their limits. Some countries where the urgency is greatest, including Syria and Yemen, are the least equipped to stave off serious water crises. Jordan, always short of water, has been overwhelmed by a flood of refugees from Syria. Iraq, which once had ample water, has lost critical supplies to war and to dams built by Turkey upstream on the Tigris and Euphrates.

Egypt has twice as many people as it did 50 years ago, with no additional water resources. The isolated Gaza strip has been grappling with a water crisis for years. And Yemen's scarce water supply is being gobbled up by the unchecked production of qat, a high-water crop with no nutritional value. Chewing the mildly narcotic qat leaf is Yemen's national pastime. "If you give them more water, they'll just grow more qat," one gloomy conference participant said. But not all the news is bad. Stable countries with lots of money, led by Saudi Arabia, are making notable progress in supply, management and consumer education.

Elsewhere, however, the prognosis is grim. No one predicted an outbreak of "water wars", or armed conflict over water supply, a specter that has often been evoked but has never materialized. But at some point in the not too distant future, water shortages could provoke mass migrations, human hardship, crop failures and some form of "triage" among populations as governments are forced to allocate supplies, said conferees, who cannot be named due to conference rules. It's not as if all this has gone unnoticed. The Middle East's water issue has been the subject of news articles, analyses by groups such as the UN Food and Agriculture Organisation, and studies by think tanks and humanitarian groups for years.

The Istanbul conference of scientists, policy analysts and academics from eight countries - conducted on an island in the Sea of Marmara under the title "High and Dry: Addressing the Middle East Water Challenge" by the Hollings Center and the Prince Muhammad Bin Fahd Strategic Studies Program at the University of Central Florida - is the latest of many such gatherings. But little has come of them because the region has never been stable enough for sufficient time to make any comprehensive, multilateral solution possible.

According to analyses by the World Bank, the US State Department and others, a majority of the countries defined as "water-poor" - those with access to less than 1,000 cubic meters per person per year - are in the Middle East and North Africa. The State Department also predicts that climate change will add to the problem by bringing "consistently lower levels of rainfall". No government or international agency can increase rainfall or snow runoff. But the Istanbul conferees heard that the example of Saudi Arabia - the world's largest country without a river - shows that a great deal can be done in countries with deep pockets and enough time to focus on the issue.

Saudi Arabia reorganized its government in the 1990s to centralize water planning and management. Most of the country's water for personal and household use is supplied by massive desalination plants. The decision to build them, starting in the 1970s, was an obvious one for the kingdom. But the plants are expensive to construct and operate, leaving them beyond the financial reach of a country like Yemen. Saudi Arabia meanwhile leads the region in the recapture and reuse of wastewater. Under a new regulation from last year, for example, its giant dairy farms are required to operate on recycled water purchased from the National Water Company rather than on groundwater as in the past. Once the world's fifth- or sixth-largest exporter of wheat - the production of which requires massive amounts of water - Saudi Arabia has banned the cultivation of wheat as of 2016 and is refocusing its agriculture on greenhouse production of vegetables and fruit.

Growing animal fodder crops such as alfalfa has been banned: owners of livestock are required to purchase imported fodder, conference participants said. Plagued by leaks in distribution pipes that drained off as much as 25% of the water it had, Saudi Arabia privatized its distribution network and encouraged foreign engineering and management companies to participate. Saudi Arabia has raised the price of water for businesses and institutions, but it has not yet ended the subsidies for households that make water so cheap: there is little incentive to limit consumption. Doing so would be politically risky in a country where subsidies for water, gasoline, and electricity are expected by a population that has no vote or other influence over the government.

Egypt, by far the most populous country in the region, has a different consumer attitude problem. Egyptians have taken the availability of water for granted since completion of the Aswan High Dam in 1970. As a result, they use waster casually in the home and pump more irrigation water than is necessary onto their fields. But Egypt's biggest concern now is Ethiopia's plan to construct a giant hydroelectric dam on the headwaters of the Nile, reducing the flow and the amount of water stored in Lake Nasser, behind the Aswan Dam. Asked recently if negotiations over Nile water allocations were taking place between Egypt and the upstream countries, Foreign Minister Nabil Fahmy replied, "No. I wish they were."

Participants in Istanbul agreed that there is no single remedy for the water crisis. The available fixes range from the simple and obvious, such as consumer education and the installation of low-flow bathroom fixtures, to the aspirational, such as the development of desalination plants powered by solar energy, which are thus affordable. As usual with such events, the organizers will prepare a paper outlining recommendations. The fact is, however, that solutions, even if available, will be hard to implement until the shooting stops, refugees are resettled, and governments are sufficiently stable to address them. That won't be soon. Thomas W Lippman is an adjunct scholar at the Middle East Institute and author of Saudi Arabia on the Edge.

Egypt's minister of electricity heads to Ethiopia for ministerial conference’

Ahmed Shaker flew to Addis Ababa Sunday to participate in the US-Africa Energy Conference, aimed at developing sustainable energy projects on the continent

Ahram Online: (June 1, 2014) - Egypt's minister of electricity and renewable energy, Mohamed Shaker, headed to Ethiopia Sunday to participate in the US-Africa Energy Conference aimed at developing energy plans in Africa, reported the state-owned MENA news agency.

The US-Africa Energy Conference comes as a step in implementing US President Barack Obama's energy initiative, "Power Africa," which aims to support economic development on the continent through supporting sustainable energy projects.

According to Shaker, the conference aims to encourage US investment in African countries and to open new markets for American companies. Africa's ministers of energy as well officials from the US administration, along with regional and non-regional energy organisations and NGOs, are participating in the conference that will be held 2-4 June in Addis Ababa.

NILE: Egypt fires it’s irrigation minister for not solving Ethiopian dam dispute’

ST (June 17, 2014) Translated from Arabic to English using Google Translator

We publish reasons for the departure of former Minister of Irrigation “Abdulmutallab” in the new government of Mahlab. Egypt’s prime minister Ibrahim Mahlab assigned Dr. Hossam Maghazi as the Ministry of Water Resources and Irrigation succeeding Dr. Mohammad Abdul Muttalib. Dr. Hossam is a Professor of Irrigation Engineering Faculty of Engineering, University of Alexandria. “Veto” publish the reasons for the exclusion of Abdul Muttalib of the Ministry of Irrigation, The first one is for not being able to solve the crisis of Great Ethiopian Renaissance Dam, which represents the biggest challenge in front of any minister assume this position.

According to Dr Mohamed Nasr El Din Allam, former Minister of Water Resources and Irrigation, the reason for dispensing Dr. Muhammad Abdul Muttalib from his position is due to not being able to "bridge" the gap with the Ethiopian. In addition with regards to negotiation with Ethiopia, he is accused of not choosing representatives from professors and qualified experts who have of experience and competence that qualifies them to bear this responsibility serious.

In exclusive statements to "veto" on Tuesday that Abdulmutallab tried in the recent period to improve its image before the Engineer Ibrahim Mahlab by doing many inspection tours to a number of provinces, launched several campaigns removal of encroachments on the waterways and the River Nile. But this didn't help him to continue in the new ministry as the first minister in the era of President Abdel Fattah al-Sisi .

Sources at the Ministry of Water Resources and Irrigation claim "Abdulmutallab" was expected to continue in the new government to last moment with the assignment of Dr. Tariq pole as Assistant Minister of Irrigation. Then new documents surfaced against him and Cabinet discussed to make decision in the last moment, and his removal was sure to be indispensable in the formation of the new government. (Text ends)

Sisi will resolve Nile crisis, says Egypt's new Water Minister'

Cairo, Asharq Al-Awsat (June 21, 2014) —Egypt's new Irrigation and Water Resources Minister Hossam Maghazi has said he expects a breakthrough in the crisis between Cairo and Addis Ababa over Ethiopia's construction of the Grand Renaissance Dam once newly-elected President Abdel-Fattah El-Sisi becomes personally involved in the talks.

Sisi is expected to hold a meeting with Ethiopian Prime Minister Hailemariam Desalegn on the sidelines of the forthcoming African Union summit in Equatorial Guinea later this month. Sisi's participation comes a few days after Egypt's membership to the African Union was restored.

In comments to Asharq Al-Awsat, Maghazi said: “The Nile water crisis is currently being handled at the highest levels of government, with President Sisi personally managing this file.” “A number of proposals for the fair usage of Nile water have been put forward, but a resolution requires the political will of Addis Ababa," he added.

Ethiopia is in the process of constructing the Grand Renaissance Dam, which will be the largest dam on the Nile River and is expected to be finished in 2017. Cairo says the dam project threatens its share of Nile water and will reduce the amount of electricity produced by the Aswan High Dam. Talks between Cairo and Addis Ababa stalled earlier this year with former Egyptian Water Minister Mohamed Abdul Muttalib saying: "Egypt has exhausted all avenues of negotiation about the dam." Sisi made the resolution of the crisis one of his election priorities.

(aawsat.net) Maghazi, who was appointed Water Minister earlier this week, said he was ready to bear the responsibility to protect Egypt's share of Nile water. He told Asharq Al-Awsat: "We will seek to strengthen historic relations with the countries of the Nile basin and to work with them to maximize the benefit from the Nile for all countries without negatively affecting Egypt's historic and legitimate rights." "Egypt does not oppose the aspirations of the Ethiopian people and is willing to provide technical support for the construction of the dam provided it does not harm the interests of both countries," he added.

Egyptian anchorwoman suspended after live row with Ethiopia envoy'

By Ayat Al-Tawy, HYPERLINK "http://english.ahram.org.eg/NewsContent/1/64/104417/Egypt/Politics-/Egyptian-anchorwoman-suspended-after-live-row-with.aspx" Ahram Online (June 23, 2014) - Rania Badawy of the private satellite station Tahrir hung up on Ethiopia's ambassador to Cairo during a live call-in over the contested Grand Renaissance Dam.

An Egyptian broadcaster has been suspended for arguing with Ethiopia's ambassador to Cairo during a live TV phone-in about Addis Ababa's ongoing Nile dam project. On Wednesday, Rania Badawy, a talk show host on the privately-owned Tahrir satellite channel, got into a heated argument with Ethiopian envoy Mahmoud Direer over the Grand Renaissance Dam, a multi-billion hydroelectric dam that has been a source of contention between the two countries for over a year. Near the end of the six-minute-long call, Badawy asked the envoy if Addis Ababa insisted on pressing forward with the dam's construction in its current form and capacity, which Egypt fears will harm its share of the Nile's water. The ambassador replied: "You do not understand about dams and are talking in a bumptious tone. Badawy then angrily told the ambassador he had "crossed his limits" and that he should not "characterise [her] talk or speak to [her] about arrogance". She then thanked him and abruptly ended the call, as his voice trailed off in an attempt to reply. The head of the TV station, Mohamed Khedr, told Al-Ahram's Arabic news website on Sunday that the move to suspend Badawy came amid his channel's "sense of responsibility," adding that the management was revamping the programme map ahead of the Islamic holy month of Ramadan – which should fall on 29 June. In comments carried by state news agency MENA earlier in June, Ethiopia's Foreign Minister Tedros Adhanom – on a visit to Cairo at the time – criticised local media for sending "very negative messages, sometimes systematically, that create a feeling of rejection" between the people of both nations. The senior diplomat, however, said that Addis Ababa and Cairo were looking forward to a "new era" of mutual ties. Almost 10 days ago, the same station suspended another female broadcaster who made light of mob sexual assaults against women in Cairo's Tahrir Square during celebrations for President Abdel -Fattah El-Sisi's inauguration earlier this month. Khedr said Sunday that the suspended anchorwoman, Maha Bahnasy, would return to the airwaves after Ramadan. It has to be recalled that a protest from the Ethiopian ambassador Mahmoud Direer led to Rania's firing. (Text ends)

NILE POLITICS: Egypt, Ethiopia agree on ‘new chapter’ in ties’

By Ramadan Al Sherbini, Gulf News (June 28, 2014) - Egypt President Abdel Fattah al-Sisi talks to Ethiopia's Prime Minister Hailemariam Desalegn as both arrived to attend the 23rd African Union Summit (AUS) in Malabo, Equatorial Guinea.

CAIRO - Addis Ababa has pledged to Egypt that Ethiopia’s construction of a controversial dam, which has strained ties between the two African countries, will not “harm Egyptian water interests”, the official news agency (Mena) reported Friday. The pledge came at landmark talks held Thursday between Egyptian President Abdul Fattah Al Sissi and Ethiopian Prime Minister Hailemariam Desalegn on the sidelines of an African summit due in Equatorial Guinea. The two leaders agreed on opening a “new chapter” in both countries’ ties based on “frankness, joint understanding and cooperation”, MENA said, quoting Egyptian Foreign Minister Sameh Shoukri. Shoukri and his Ethiopian counterpart Tedros Adhanom announced Friday in Malabo, the capital of Equatorial Guinea, that Egypt has pledged to pursue “constructive dialogue” with Ethiopia that heeds the later’s development needs, according to the agency.

Al-Sissi and Desalegn also agreed to co-chair a bilateral cooperation commission to address all aspects of Egyptian-Ethiopian links, in a fresh sign of defusing tensions that have marred the two countries’ relations for more than a year. Earlier this month, Al Sissi said in an inaugural speech that he would not allow the dispute over Ethiopia's hydraulic dam being constructed on the Nile to "cause a crisis" between both countries or affect inter-African cooperation. The Cairo-Addis Ababa ties deteriorated last year when Egypt's then Islamist president Mohammad Mursi and other politicians threatened in a meeting, broadcast live on air, to bomb Ethiopia over its building of the $6.4 billion Renaissance Dam. Last July, Al Sissi led the army's ouster of Mursi following enormous street protests against his troubled one-year rule.

The Ethiopian dam has triggered wide fears in Egypt, which heavily relies on the Nile to cover water needs of its population of 85 million people. Egypt's annual quota of the Nile waters is estimated at 55.5 billion cubic metres. Water sharing among the 10 Nile Basin countries is regulated under a colonial-era treaty. Some Nile Basin countries have said the treaty is unfair. Ethiopia has been urging the riparian countries to ratify the Comprehensive Framework Agreement to replace the 1959 treaty that gives Egypt and Sudan the share's lion of the Nile waters. Six countries have already signed the 2010 pact amid Egyptian protests. Al Sissi was Friday due to make a short visit Sudan, another Nile country that shares border with Egypt, state television reported. (Text ends)

NILE POLITICS: When Egyptian Sisi Met Ethiopian Desalegn'
Le Monde diplomatique (June 30, 2014) The guests had been seated at the tables of the great hall in Addis Ababa, and fanfares rang out as the Emperor Haile Selassie walked in with President Gamal Abdel Nasser of Egypt at his right hand. Nasser was a "tall, stocky, imperious man, his head thrust forward and his wide jaws thrust into a smile," next to him Selassie's "diminutive silhouette," his "thin expressive face, his glistening penetrating eyes" worn by the years. Behind the extraordinary pair, the remaining leaders also entered in their pairs, writes Ryszard Kapuściński in his chronicle of the fall of the Abyssinian monarchy and the intrigues at Selassie's court. The audience rose: everyone was applauding. "Ovations sounded for unity and the Emperor. Then the feast began."

Their corresponding persons, President Abdel Fattah El -Sisi of Egypt and Ethiopia's Prime Minister Hailemariam Desalegn — a pair less extraordinary, their relations less gregarious —find themselves seated together on June 26 at the 23rd Ordinary Summit of the African Union in Equatorial Guinea. During his presidential campaign, El -Sisi spoke of his interest in travelling to Ethiopia “not once, but ten times” for the mutual benefit of the two countries. As El-Sisi addressed the crowd at his presidential inauguration ceremony at the Qubba Palace in Cairo, Ethiopia's Foreign Minister Tedros Adhanom Ghebreyesus looked on among Arab royals, the First-Vice President of Sudan, Lieutenant General Bakri Hassan Saleh, and heads of state, from Chad's Idriss Déby and Eritrea's Isaias Afwerki to Teodoro Obiang Nguema Mbasogo, who has held power in Equatorial Guinea even longer than El-Sisi's military predecessor, Hosni Mubarak. El-Sisi professed to the crowd he would protect pan-Africanism, and he wouldn't allow Ethiopia's self-financed Grand Ethiopian Renaissance Dam (GERD) to "cause a crisis or a problem with sisterly Ethiopia." Over centuries, the Nile has tied the two countries together. Ethiopia's priority now is power generation, while Egypt, a desert country, prioritises irrigation against the Nile water source countries on the Central African and Ethiopian plateaus, which have greater rainwater.

The GERD is a major issue of peace or war. As he summits in Malabo with Adhanom over Egypt's Nile water crisis, El-Sisi finds himself confronted with deep and changing historical forces. When Britain occupied Egypt in 1882, Britain immediately understood it had become "ruler of a hydrological society," and that the irrigation question was central to maintaining stability along its Suez Canal, notes Terje Tved, professor at the universities of Bergen and Oslo and an authority on the Nile. Then everything changed after the First World War, the collapse of the Ottoman Empire, and the Egyptian revolution of 1919, and yet Britain's strategic interests remained the same. This trickled into a series of colonial treaties, including the 1959 Nile Waters agreement, which contributed to Sudan becoming Egypt's downstream hydro-political ally, and safeguarded Egypt and Sudan's over 90 percent share of Nile waters. Ethiopia, the source of the Nile, was left only with ghosts of discord. Selassie himself was left affronted by Nasser's marginalisation of Ethiopia in the 1959 agreement, and was to be overthrown in a 1974 coup d'état. At the same time, notes a March 21 2011 memorandum from the international businessman and dam engineer Dr Ibrahim Mostafa Kamel submitted to the first post - Mubarak government of Essam Sharaf, since 1969 Egypt has lost an estimated 100 million tons annually of silt, "creating a 4.1 billion silt dump which lies over the Egyptian-Sudanese border."

Even if he is a diminutive Nasser, El-Sisi's jaws will not likely be thrust into a smile, even a wry one. It is not even sure whether there will be a feast as in Kapuściński's tale, or if so, whether it will be sumptuous. Only three days before El-Sisi's presidential inauguration, the governments of Ethiopia and principal among them the 6,000-megawatt GERD. Egypt fears the GERD is a threat to its lifeline, the Blue Nile at Ethiopia's Lake Tana upon which Egypt depends for over 85%of its Nile water flow. As the dispute fanned to a flame earlier this year, Egypt boycotted talks over the dam as they ground to an acrimonious standstill, and followed with a diplomatic card game to enlist the support of external stakeholders and African countries keen to capitalise on strategic alliances.

South Sudan arrested three Egyptians reportedly sent by Cairo to spy on dam projects in South Sudan and western Ethiopia,

The real threat to Egypt is the reaction of Sudan, given its part in the 1959 agreement: not the GERD itself. If there are signs of a rapprochement between Egypt and sisterly Ethiopia, it is by Egypt's necessity: it coincides with a growing rift between El-Sisi's Egypt and Omer Hassan Ahmed El-Bashir's Islamist regime in Sudan, a former ally of Mohammed Morsi's government of Muslim Brothers. Egypt courts South Sudan in spite of Sudan, and besides Egypt's anti-Islamist alliance with Saudi Arabia, there are signs of a rapprochement with Libya's anti - Islamist leader General Khalifa Belqasim Haftar. While the Sudanese vice - president Bakri Hassan Saleh attended El-Sisi's presidential inauguration, he has also reaffirmed Sudan's commitment to the GERD: Ethiopia is also an important strategic alliance for Sudan. One reason is its interests in the six-month long conflict in South Sudan.

The Nile Basin Initiative, which met in Khartoum last Thursday, has called on Egypt to re-involve itself in the activities in the initiative, which both Sudan and Egypt left four years ago in protest over the signing of the Nile Basin Cooperative Framework Agreement by four Nile Basin countries (Rwanda, Ethiopia, Uganda, and Tanzania). Burundi and Kenya later signed onto the NBI, which removes Egypt's veto power over upstream irrigation and hydro-power projects. It is bound to reduce Egypt and Sudan's historically protected Nile water share. After El -Sisi overthrew Morsi, Sudan returned to the NBI. Its new chairman also happens to be Sudan's Minister of Water Resources and Electricity, Muattaz Musa Abdallah Salim. "I should like to place an appeal to our sister nation Egypt," Salim said at the meeting of Nile Basin water ministers, according to AFP. "Your resumption of your activities in the NBI will further consolidate our gains and integrity in the region."

For M. Jalal Hashim, a professor at Comboni University College and a close observer of Nile politics, the flutters of Khartoum's heart have more to do with Khartoum’s calculations for political survival than technical issues connected with transboundary water management. “If Khartoum stood against the GERD, this may lead Ethiopia to host the military opposition of the regime, and the remaining of the regime in Sudan is a matter of inertia, not strength," he says. "There is enough opposition to put it out." During his brief reign, Morsi, who is now languishing behind bars in El - Sisi's Egypt, showed his readiness to give the disputed area of land at the Egypt-Sudan border called the Halayeb triangle to Sudan, a matter Hashim thinks played a role in his overthrow.

When the Ethiopian delegation brought up the topic of the GERD for the first time, in Kampala according to Hashim, the Sudanese delegation was late by hours due to disruptions in airway programmes. When they joined the meeting, he says, they discovered that the Egyptian delegation had already blessed the project. They were "furious" and made clear their reservations to the GERD being built in an area vulnerable to volcanic eruptions and notified their minister, who, by his turn, notified his Egyptian counterpart in protest. "If such a tremor and earthquake takes place and destroys the GERD that would be disastrous to both Sudan and Egypt," according to Hashim. "The water will be almost 26-metres high in Khartoum for days. The threat of dam collapse can wipe out Sudan, while Egypt would not be affected directly."

The Sudanese experts repeatedly warned their government while negotiating with the Ethiopians, "hoping that wisdom would prevail, but in vain," says Hashim. According to him, Khartoum's position at the time prompted the Egyptian delegation to withdraw their agreement to the GERD, while Khartoum's position has now aligned with the rising power of Ethiopia, which Egypt continues to contest. Even while Ethiopia's award of a no-bid contract to an Italian company to construct the US$4.8bn. dam contributed, alongside Egypt's earlier protests, to it being left without concessional finance, the World Bank is heavily invested in Ethiopia and region. At the end of last month, the bank approved US$178.5mn. credit and a US$254.5mn. grant to help Ethiopia develop its geothermal energy resources to boost electricity supply. Several electricity export contracts have already been signed, and Yemen's Minister of Electricity Saleh Sumai and Adhanom have now agreed to begin studying electrical interconnection between the two countries across the Red Sea through Djibouti.

Ethiopia seeks to capitalise on its new economic development, part of which involves the Nile: Egypt faces the winds of an economic and national cohesion crisis. Sounds for unity are growing: but because Egypt is fast running out of alternatives, and faces major change on the Nile. As the late rebel-turned statesman Meles Zenawi said in an interview on Egyptian television, the relationship between the two countries is “like a very old marriage, which has no possibility of divorce. It has its ups and downs, but it is very solid. It is of long standing.” “Sometimes we quarrel, sometimes we agree,” Zenawi told the Egyptian interviewer, radio waves fizzing in the background. “That has been the case for thousands of years.”

Writer Nizar Manek is an independent journalist reporting on Africa.

BBC News: Egyptians uncertain about future under President Sisi By Marina Ottaway Wilson Center (July 2, 2014 Last updated)

A year ago, many hailed him as their saviour for overthrowing President Mohammed Morsi and the Muslim Brotherhood.

They elected him president in May, with a 97% majority of votes cast.

Now Egyptians are trying to find out how retired field marshal -turned- President Abdul Fattah al-Sisi plans to tackle Egypt's problems.

Puzzling personality

For a man who has effectively been in power for a year, President Sisi has revealed little about himself and above all about his vision for Egypt.

He was not elected on the basis of his programme. One aide says he did not present one until the very end of the campaign in order to avoid unnecessary debate and controversy.

Nor was he elected on the basis of his charisma. A military man all his life, he comes across as serious and dignified, but not inspiring.

He is not an eloquent public speaker, although people who meet him find him sincere and convincing.

He was elected above all for having overthrown President Morsi.

A year later, most Egyptians are still happy about the demise of Mr Morsi, but somewhat puzzled about Mr Sisi.

During a recent trip, the questions I asked Egyptian politicians, analysts, and businessmen about President Sisi's policies elicited remarkably numerous answers along the lines of "I really do not know", including from people who repeatedly participated in meetings with him.

The first few weeks of Mr Sisi's presidency have begun to provide glimpses into his personality, or at least the public persona he has chosen.

They have also given some indication about his political views, but have revealed almost nothing about how he intends to tackle urgent economic problems.

Leading by example

Mr Sisi wants to be seen as a serious, honest, hard-working, and pious president.

During the election campaign, he repeatedly warned Egyptians of the hard work ahead, and he is continuing to do so now.

He has told his ministers they must set an example by being in the office by 07:00.

He emphasises the contribution individuals can make towards solving Egypt's problems. If people rode their bicycles or walked to work, he says, they would save the country millions in oil imports.

He has announced that he is donating half his salary and half his personal assets to support the Egyptian economy - a move that will force senior officials and prominent businessmen to do the same. In fact, the defence minister has already announced the military will donate $140m (£82m).

He has ordered the ministry of finance to enforce rules on maximum wages.

He talks about the importance of religion and leaves no room for doubt about his own commitment to Islam: his forehead bears the mark that develops when a person prays regularly.

He has stressed that Egypt is committed to "correcting the religious discourse" and freeing it from extremism.

New initiatives and laws (many announced by the outgoing interim President Adly Mansour after the election but before the inauguration of Mr Sisi) convey the same messages about rectitude and morality.

Egypt's ministry of youth and sports has declared it will combat atheism among young people.

The ministry of interior has banned religious slogans on vehicles. The interior minister also says he'll form a new department that will handle sexual assault cases, and Mr Sisi has already demonstrated his personal interest in the issue, by being photographed on a hospital visit to a woman receiving treatment after an assault in Cairo's Tahrir Square during his inauguration celebrations.

Top-down political control

On the political front, however, the message from the president and his government is one of strict top-down control over all aspects of life. During the election campaign, Mr Sisi said democracy in Egypt would be impossible for at least 25 years.

His actions, too, leave no doubt that he prefers order and discipline over individual choice. The laws governing the forthcoming parliamentary elections guarantee a weak parliament because they favour individual candidates over political parties.

Mr Sisi has established a Supreme Council for Legislative Reform by decree, which will be able to draft new laws and leave the parliament to do the rubber-stamping.

He has also tightened control over religion and education. Only preachers licensed by al-Azhar, one of the main centres of Sunni Muslim learning, will be allowed to deliver sermons, and Mr Sisi will personally appoint university presidents and deans.

Repression of the Muslim Brotherhood continues, with over a thousand members sentenced to death by the courts in summary trials. Young people who defy the anti-protest law brought in last December have been given tough sentences.

So have al-Jazeera journalists accused of fabricating stories. Even street vendors and people who litter have been targeted, in an effort to clean up the cities.

Uncertainty over economy

On the most important challenge he faces - reviving the economy - President Sisi has sent out very few and contradictory signals, and, with about 25% of ordinary Egyptians living below the poverty line and a similar percentage hovering just above it, he must act soon.

The business community is waiting for clear signals about his intentions.

Even Saudi Arabia, the United Arab Emirates and Kuwait, all countries which have poured billions into the Egyptian economy since President Morsi's overthrow, are hinting they will not continue their support indefinitely, particularly if Egypt does not adopt clear policies and major reforms.

Mr Sisi has done neither. His approach is confusing: he states the private sector has a role to play, if not a duty to invest. But he remains committed to the state sector and has put the military in charge of managing the massive housing projects financed by the United Arab Emirates.

Above all, the government cannot reach a decision on the urgently needed reform of food and energy subsidies, which occupy a third of the budget.

Plans are periodically announced but never implemented, in case they lead to unrest.

The latest announcement, on 30 June, that the government will slash energy subsidies by the equivalent of $5.6bn (£3.3 bn) was typically vague: savings will be achieved through "redistribution and restructuring," he has said, but without a timetable.

Egyptians still have a lot to discover about their new president.

Marina Ottaway is a Senior Scholar at the Woodrow Wilson Center and a long-time analyst of political transformations in Africa, the Balkans, and the Middle East.

Egypt Irrigation Minister: We will give a proposal for reducing the height of GERD’

Translated from Arabic to English using Google Translator.
Edited slightly for readability.

ST (August 11, 2014) - Dr. Hossam Mughazy, Minister of Irrigation and Water Resources said Egypt would present new proposals to the government of Ethiopian during the negotiations that will take place between them on Aug 25 and 26 in Sudan’s capital “Khartoum”.

The Irrigation Minister said this workshop about water resources organized by the National Center for Research on Water Day Monday with Intercontinental City Stars.

The new proposal includes modifying the technical specifications for the height of the dam on the basis of scientific sophisticated studies. Mughazy pointed Ethiopia will reach the same disired results to generate electricity, with different size and storage capacity. He explained the negotiations will aim to uphold the principle of «do no harm» which was announced at the joint statement issued by Egyptian and Ethiopian political leaders.

NILE POLITICS: Egypt looks for 'win-win' situation with Ethiopia over dam’

By AhramOnline (August 26, 2014) Egypt entered into negotiations with Ethiopia and Sudan in Khartoum on Monday with the objective of convincing Ethiopia to change the technical specifications of its Grand Renaissance Dam so as not to infringe on Egypt's share of Nile water.

According to Egypt's irrigation and water resources minister, Hossam El -Moghazi, the Egyptian delegation currently in Sudan has a new "vision" to present at the negotiations: explaining the threats the dam with its current technical specifications will pose on other countries. Cairo and Addis Ababa have been at odds in recent months over the dam, which Egyptian officials say will impact its share of Nile water upon completion.

According to Diaa El-Qousi, a water expert, Egypt will never accept the dam with its current specifications or dimensions – a height of 150 meters and a storage capacity of 74 billion cubic meters. "With the dam's specifications and dimensions, Ethiopia will be capable of completely depriving Egypt of its water supply for one, two or even three years, which is something that Egypt will never accept," Al-Qoussi explained.

He adds that the Egyptian delegation has to convince the Ethiopian side to return to the initial dimensions of the dam which date back to 1963. "[Nile] Basin countries, especially the Ethiopian side, must understand that the Nile for Egypt is not a tool for development but a source of life," said Al-Qousi. Al-Qousi believes that Ethiopia has made a political, diplomatic and technical error since it started to construct the dam by not agreeing to consider a report issued by a committee of international experts. The report was never made ??public – but Egypt has given it importance as of late.

Sherif Eissa, head of the Nile water department at Egypt's foreign ministry and a member of the Egyptian delegation in negotiations with Ethiopia, toldAl-Ahram that the committee's report found that additional studies should have been made before construction work began to assess its environmental, socio-economic and hydraulic impacts. "Experts have said that the studies conducted by Ethiopian authorities are Level 1 and that studies of Level 2 were needed to show the impact of the dam on downstream countries," Eissa explained.

However, Ethiopia has begun work on the dam, completing almost 35 percent of the project and finishing work on two generators. "Until now, Ethiopia self-financed [the project] with a billion dollars from taxes, so that each Ethiopian pays a month of his annual salary for the dam, in addition to the money transferred by Ethiopians who work abroad, those of the Ethiopian airline and foreign aid," said Eissa.

The current phase of the work is the least expensive. The next phase will necessitate more funds and Ethiopia will not be able to finance the project on its own. Egypt is now seeking a compromise with Addis Ababa. "Egypt does not ask much," Eissa said. "We only want to secure our water supply in the short, medium and long term. We respect Ethiopia's right to development, provided that this right does not affect Egypt's interests towards Nile water."

He explained that Egypt's current aim in the Sudan negotiations is to achieve a win-win round of talks. "There are many ways to reach a compromise. We will focus during the meetings on the specifications of the dam, the volume of water behind the dam and reservoir and on joint management that guarantees the production of electricity in Ethiopia and the natural flow of water to Egypt," he said before travelling to Sudan.

However, changing the technical properties of the dam so as not to undermine Egyptian interests will require additional funding. "If Ethiopia will be understanding and cooperative and respond positively to our demands, Egypt will try to convince some Arabs to help Ethiopia finance the project," he said.

The Ethiopian dam in figures

Project cost: $4.8 billion

Dam height: 170 meters

Length of dam: 1,800 meters

Number of turbines: 16

Storage capacity: 74 billion cubic meters of water

Power generation capacity: 6,000 megawatts

Date of inauguration: 2016 58 years in the making

The idea of a great Ethiopian dam dates back to the years 1956-1964, but it was not until 2009 that the Ethiopian government began the work. The plans were approved in November 2010 and the Ethiopian government officially announced the project at the end of March 2011. The dam is being built in the regional state of Benishangul Gumuz on the Blue Nile. With a power generation capacity amounting to 6,000 megawatts, the Renaissance Dam will be the largest hydroelectric dam in Africa when it is finished in 2017-2018. The exact impact of the dam on downstream countries is unknown. Egypt fears a drop in water supply due to the long duration of refuelling with a projected volume of 74 billion cubic meters. (Text ends)

NILE: Egypt, Sudan Agree to Six-Month Study of Ethiopia Hydropower Dam'

By William Davison, Bloomberg (August 28, 2014)

Ethiopia, Egypt and Sudan agreed to complete studies within six months on the impact of an Ethiopian hydropower dam on the main tributary of the Nile river after Egypt raised concern about water shortages. A committee of four experts from each nation will investigate the hydrological, social and environmental effects of the $4.2 billion Grand Ethiopian Renaissance Dam, Ethiopia's Foreign Ministry said on its website today. International consultants will implement the findings, it said. Foreign experts will help settle any disputes. The dam is scheduled to be finished in 2017.

Egypt, which relies on the world's longest river for almost all its water, has said that it will suffer shortages while the dam's reservoir is filled and during operation of a 6,000-megawatt power station. Ethiopia says the project will not significantly harm Sudan or Egypt and is based on a principle of "equitable utilization" of the Nile basin.

A panel of specialists, including four international experts, concluded last year that the additional studies were needed to assess the dam's impact on the Nile's flow and the region. Ethiopia and other upstream African nations say that Egypt’s historic legal claims to a majority of the river’s flow are invalid and have harmed their development.

Last year's panel also recommended measures to improve the dam's stability. Ethiopian engineers informed Egyptian counterparts of updates to its design at a two-day meeting in Khartoum, Sudan, that finished yesterday, the Ethiopian ministry said. The discussions "enhanced confidence" between the three nations and there was no reason for Ethiopia to halt construction of the dam, Water, Energy and Irrigation Minister Alemayehu Tegenu said in the statement. Ethiopia's government says it's completed 35 percent of the project that was officially launched in April 2011 and is scheduled for completion in mid-2017.

Egypt Aware of Time Factor Importance in Ethiopia Dam Talks – Minister

(Cairo) Egypt State Information Service (August 29, 2014) - Egyptian Irrigation Minister Hossam Mokhazi said on Thursday Egypt is well aware of the importance of the time factor in the tripartite negotiations on Ethiopia's controversial Renaissance Dam. He told MENA that a timetable was set to put into effect items agreed upon by Egypt, Sudan, and Ethiopia at the end of the fourth round of talks that was concluded lately. Within two weeks, the three countries will decide on the international consultancy office that will conduct necessary studies called for by the international expert committee formed over the dam, the minister said. Also, the three countries will form a national committee to aid the international consultants, he said, adding that each country will be represented by four experts in the national committee. The consultancy office is supposed to finish within six months studies on the impact of an Ethiopian hydropower dam on the main tributary of the Nile River. He said Egypt is keen that all differences on the dam will be settled in 2 or 3 months from the day the studies are prepared. He noted that the first stage of the $4.2 billion Grand Ethiopian Renaissance Dam, scheduled to be finalized in December of 2015, does not harm Egypt or Sudan either in terms of water quotas or social and economic effects. The final stage of the dam is to be finalized in mid-2017

Why do ancient Egyptians look more African than modern Egyptians?

Anthony M Anderson

Fascinated with african history!Sat

You're right!

Modern day egyptians don't look like ancient egyptians

Egyptian actor

Memdouh abdelhaleem

salmasamirzayan

That was just sarcasm actually, modern day egyptians do resemble ancient egyptians. Ancient egyptians were particularly north africans and therefore mediterranean!!

News Nigeria
Archaeologists in Egypt have discovered new ancient artefacts at the Saqqara archaeological site around 31km from Cairo.

Posted by

Aniekpeno Ekong

May 31

They include hundreds of coffins and statues and date back to around 500 BC according to the Ministry of Tourism and Antiques website.

The treasures will be displayed at The Grand Egyptian Museum in Giza.

Saqqara, a Unesco World Heritage site, has been a treasure trove of ancient Egyptian artefacts.

What do you know about ancient Egyptian history?

#Saqqara #Unesco #Egypt #Egyptian #egyptology #africa

Why does Egypt not want to be part of Africa?

Anthony M Anderson

Fascinated with african history!Sun

It's not true

Actually, egypt is part of africa and is definitely located in north africa. The idea of egyptians not being the actual africans mainly comes from afro americans who tend to believe that africa is only for blacks which is pure nonsense and therefore i get disgusted when they pass disparaging remarks towards egyptians

I often see sub saharan africans specifically ethiopians saying that modern egyptians aren't descended from ancient egyptians and they're not africans.

Particularly DNA tests prove that modern egyptians are mainly north africans and will debunk this claims of egyptians of not being africans Egypt had supported independence movements of sub saharan african countries like mozambique. Egypt offered support to nigeria during the biafran war (1967–1970) particularly known as the nigerian civil war.

The egyptian football team also take part in the african football cup. Mo Salah who is Liverpool player also takes part actually

The truth is modern day egyptians particularly look mediterranean and therefore are north africans particularly:

LFC

178 views

2 upvotes

2 shares

Are modern Egyptians really the descendants of the ancient Egyptians or are they just Arabs?

Matt Riggsby

MA Archaeology, Boston University4y

This isn't an either/or thing. It's both/and.

Genetic analysis of early Egyptians is still in early days, but modern Egyptians do have a lot of genes in common with the people of Egypt in the early days of civilization. Now, it just so happens that those early Egyptians were genetically similar to people living in the Middle East. And to underline it, because a lot of people with agendas leap to conclusions on that point: similar to does not mean the same as, nor does it necessarily mean came from. You, for example, may have similar genes to your brother. That does not mean that you are or came from your brother.

In addition to that, there's a notable amount of admixture from other places which have come in over the centuries. There were initially some genes associated with sub-Saharan Africa in early Egyptian populations, but there are more now. There are also more genes from Europe and elsewhere.

So, then, modern Egyptians are the descendants of a number of peoples, most of whom were ancient Egyptians.

What did the ancient Egyptians look like racially? Was it a homogeneous or more diverse people?

Umar Izer Researcher, fascinated by human behaviorTranslator · 2 years
Alexander Balogun
African history Ph.D.
This answer may not be an accurate translation of Alexander Balogun
in Quora in English:

What did ancient Egyptians look like racially? Were they a homogenous people or more diverse?

What did the ancient Egyptians look like racially? Was it a homogeneous or more diverse people?

Ancient Egypt belonged to the Nile Valley civilization which was African, ethnically African and whose people ranged from black to beige.

EGYPTOLOGY
PICTURE LIBRARY

More than 10,000 years ago, before the birth of ancient Egypt, the oldest and most complex society in the Nile Valley could be connected to what was called the Green Sahara period, south of Egypt and partly north of Sudan. The area was called Nabta Playa and was a lush land with wildlife and many lake basins during the Ice Age.

The people who thrived there were among the first to practice astronomy, building and building magalithic structures that were about 2,000 years older than Britain's Stonehenge.

Archaeologists have discovered that they practice livestock worship rituals, own many burial sites, build a walk in wells, paint in caves, and tame cattle and other beasts. (Nabta Playa and the Ancient Astronomers of the Nubian Desert)

After the beginning of desiccation, the area quickly became an unforgivable desert and the population had to migrate to the nearest habitable region that lay along the Nile Valley, between the first cataracts and the second cataracts of the Nile.

10:16 pm
Mediterranean Sea
CAIRO
EGYPT
Red Sea
QENA
Dakhla Oasis
Kharga Oasis
LUXOR
ASWAN
First Cataract
Nasser

These prehistoric people are responsible for the birth of the Qadan and Sebilian cultures that gave birth to the Group A culture that influenced the Naqadan culture.

11:51 pm
https://en.m.wikipedia.org/wiki/Qada ordered rows. [3]

Qadan Culture

MEDITERRANEAN SEA
EGYPT
Abydos
Hierakonpolis
Kubaniyya
Aswan
A-GROUP
1ST CATARACT
Sayala
Toshka
Buhen
Qustul
2ND CATARACT
NUBIA
RED SEA

The culture of Group A, around 4,000 BC. J.-C., became the first region of the Nile Valley to become a state with the oldest form of monarchy, with the first use of symbolism, crown and hieroglyphics, which was later used in Upper Egypt and possibly in ancient Egypt (Note that ancient Egypt was not founded at that time Ancient Nubian Artifacts Yield Evidence of Earliest Monarchy).

During the same period, other Chiefdoms were scattered along the Nile Valley but the Ta-Seti company (Group A company) dominated with an established monarchy of about 12 generations 3200 BC. J.-C.

Around 3150 BC, Ta-Seti and other heads of state of the Upper Nile united and formed what we call Upper Egypt. Upper Egypt was later divided into several Nomes or administrative regions and Ta-Seti became the first administrative region of Upper Egypt at that time.

Map of Ancient Egypt with its historical nomes. "Upper Egypt" is in the lower portion of the map.

Number	Ancient Name	Capital	Modern Capital	Tr
1	Ta-Seti	Abu / Yebu (Elephantine)	Aswan	La Bo
2	Wetjes-Hor	Djeba (Apollonopolis Magna)	Edfu	Th He
3	Nekhen	Nekhen (Hierakonpolis)	al-Kab	Sh
4	Waset	Niwt-rst / Waset (Thebes)	Karnak	So
5	Harawî	Gebtu (Coptos)	Qift	Tw Fa
		Iunet / Tantere

Vers 3100 avant notre ère, les habitants de la Haute-Égypte se sont dirigés vers le nord et ont conquis la région du delta (nord de l'Égypte) en la soumettant culturellement et politiquement.

D'où la naissance de la Basse-Égypte, qui a donné naissance par hasard au royaume d'Égypte.

Maintenant, les personnes qui ont fondé la civilisation étaient originaires du Sud, leur ascendance pouvait être retracée dans la région de Nabta Playa, Wadi Halfa. La momification la plus ancienne se trouve dans le Sahara Vert, juste à l'ouest de Nabta playa, le culte du bétail et les rituels jusqu'à Nabta Playa, l'origine de l'astronomie dans la vallée du Nil remonte à Nabta Playa, ainsi que des peintures murales.

Les habitants du Haut-Nil contrôlaient l'Égypte ancienne à travers l'ancien et le royaume moyen… Et il est bien connu que l'Égypte ancienne a été envahie et dominée par une domination étrangère et des colonies remontant aux Hyksos, de la région du Levant aux Britanniques de l'Europe. Plus de 2800 ans de domination et de colonies de peuplement suffisent à modifier la démographie de toute société.

Alamy

Anwar Sadat the President of Egypt conducts a press conference in ...

Anwar Sadat the President of Egypt conducts a press

Anwar Sadat was President of Egypt. His wife (widow), Jehan Sadat, is half British (his mother was British and his father Egyptian), which testifies to the diversity of foreign influences in the demography of Egypt.

CNN.com

Thirty years later, Sadat's widow still hopes for peace - CNN.com

Some people claim, out of ignorance, that the influx of sub-Saharan weapons into Egypt was dominant only during the Arab conquest. But they fail to explain why they possessed portraits of Faiyum mummies of native Egyptians that described Negroid or mixed ancestry during the Greco-Roman rule of ancient Egypt.

Twitter

Anthony Oliveira on Twitter: "from the

Today's Egyptians (especially the North) are simply a melting pot of different races and cultures that once ruled and settled in ancient Egypt, including mixtures of native Egyptians. 2800 years is more than enough to change the dominant race of any society. These were not genocide attacks against the local population, but only the assimilation of population and culture. From the Hyksos who formed the fourteenth to sixteenth dynasties of Lower Egypt for more than a hundred years, the Greeks who founded Alexandria and introduced Coptic society and alphabets, the Arabs who founded Cairo, the Arab language and religion, the Turks, etc.

Go to the south of Egypt around the Upper Nile, you will find more pure-blooded descendants of the ancient Egyptians.

The Turks alone ruled and settled in Egypt for more than 500 years in total and yet they claim to have a significant population in modern Egypt.

Turkish population - Wikipedia

Today, Egypt remains a melting pot of races and cultures.

Similar questions

The France has lost wars against Mexico, Haiti, Algeria, Vietnam. Has France ever won a war without allies?

Finally, if Algeria had remained French, wouldn't France have become a Muslim-majority country? In general, what would the France look like today if Algeria had remained French?

Why is it only with Algeria that relations are often strained while France has occupied other countries?

Why has the France not yet apologized for its crimes during the Algerian War?

Why doesn't the France ask Italy for an apology for Julius Caesar's invasion of Gaul?

Why does the France not recognize the massacres committed against the Algerian people?

Why can't the French turn the page on Algeria and colonialism?

Why did France lose the Algerian war?

Why does the France spend its time apologizing for Algeria, Rwanda, slavery, Napoleon, etc.?

Why do some French people who participated in the Algerian war refuse to

Are Egyptians considered Africans or not? Is there a controversy with this view?

Daveed Phoenix

.

Follow

Lived 15 years in AfricaMay 27

This is Africa.

This is Egypt.

I suppose it’s possible to be an Egyptian born and raised in Sinai, and to therefore technically be an Asian Egyptian. But most people understand Egypt to be in Africa.

Egyptians are African. There is no controversy.

Related Links

How are Egyptians white if white people were not in Africa back in antiquity? Alexander came thousands of years later. The pyramids were already built thousands of years before Alexander came across black Africans.

What is the reason some said that the ancient Egyptians are blacks? Is this really true?

Why do so many conflate Blacks saying that the ancient Egyptians were black Africans with Blacks saying that they're descendants of the ancient Egyptians?

Is the debate whether or not the ancient Egyptian were "black" Africans a stupid one?

Are current Egyptians the Ancient Egyptians, if not then where are they and who are the people which live in Egypt today?

How do I debunk the Afrocentric claims that the ancient Egyptians were black and prove to them that modern day Egyptians are the descendants of ancient Egyptians?

What race are the Egyptians?

Why is it when people say the ancient Egyptians were black Eurocentrics claim "Subsaharan Africans" had nothing to do with ancient Egypt other than being slaves when their is evidence against this idea?

Who first claimed that Egyptians were black, and why?

If Egypt is in Africa, why don't Egyptians consider themselves Africans?

Do Egyptians view their country as African?

Françoise Marie

Master's Degree in Public Administration, Syracuse University3y 9Amira Hosny Ibrahim's answer to Do Egyptians view their country as African?

EDIT: For the people attacking me in the comments, Of course Egypt is African since it lies in Africa. That part is obvious. That is not what the question was referring to.

Again the question asked about Egyptians, so I replied with what I know to be the truth after living there for 19 years.

I am not racist or biased neither are all Egyptians.

But there is definitely racism and stereotypes against black people in Egypt, to deny that would be wishful thinking.

Having black ancestors and hating or despising black people for their black skin or culture is called the tragic "mulatto" syndrome.

It is described as a tragic syndrome because Whites do not want them ["Mulattoes"] at all but they keep on seeing themselves as almost or near Whites rather than as almost Blacks.

North Africa, including Egypt, is saturated with black genes inherited from ancestors and earliest inhabitants who were migrants from the Horn of Africa who left their genetic package, including the e1b1b haplogroup.

The average North African, is dark skinned with varying levels of visible and well documented black ancestry.

Hamitic Egyptians and Imazighen know perfectly that the Horn of Africa, an east sub-Saharan region full of black skinned populations known as Elongated Africans is their Hamitic Homeland.

Haplogroup E1b1b (Y-DNA)

Red Sea origins & Neolithic expansion

Haplogroup E1b1b (formerly known as E3b) represents the last major direct migration from Africa into Europe. It is believed to have first appeared in the Horn of Africa approximately 26,000 years ago and dispersed to North Africa and the Near East during the late Paleolithic and Mesolithic periods. E-M78 and E-Z827 originated respectively at 20,000 years and 24,000 years. E1b1b lineages are closely linked to the diffusion of Afroasiatic languages.

Nowadays, the highest genetic diversity of haplogroup E1b1b is observed in Northeast Africa, especially in Ethiopia and Somalia, which also have the monopoly of older and rarer branches like M281, V6 or V92.

This suggests that E1b1b may indeed have appeared in East Africa, then expanded north until the Levant. Nevertheless, many lineages now found among the Ethiopians and Somalians appear to have come from the Fertile Crescent during the Neolithic period. This includes some E1b1b subclades like V22 (12,000 years old) and V32 (10,000 years old), but also undeniably Near Eastern lineages like T1a-CTS2214 and J1-L136.

Explain E1b1b like I am 5

E1b1b (Y-DNA) Distribution +60% +40% +20% +10%

Truth hurts so much. It must be replaced with a lie.

Some delusional scientists came with a bogus DNA study about ancient Egyptian mummies. This is a typical case of whitewashing of African history and people.

Study of ancient mummies reveals they were Turkish and European

The first ever full-genome analysis of Ancient Egyptians shows they were more Turkish and European than African.

Scientists analysed ancient DNA from Egyptian mummies dating from 1400 BC to 400 AD and discovered they shared genes with people from the Mediterranean

'However in the last 1,500 years Egypt became more genetically African, whereas the ancient Egyptians showed almost no sub-Saharan African ancestry and high affinity to ancient Near Eastern and European populations.

Related Answer
Do Egyptians view their country as African?

Amira Hosny Ibrahim

Egyptian, not born but bred 4y
Not really, no.

Egyptians usually feel more Arab, and Egyptian.

Egyptian, as in the particular Egyptian culture. The glories of ancient Egypt never fail to make Egyptians feel a sense of pride and longing, it ignites within Egyptians a belief that they will one day -again- regain a greater place in the world.

Egyptians also feel very Arab. There is shared language, religion, and history between most Arab nations.

This surge in Arab nationalism, however, started in the late 1950's after president Abd el Nasser became president of Egypt.

Nasser believed that Arabs would be stronger if united, his charisma helped him gain popularity among all the Arab nations. His promises of a powerful, United Arab nation found place in the heart of the Arabs, which were downtrodden, defeated, and in many cases occupied by foreign forces.

It is important to point out that “Arab" is a very broad term. There is not much in common between Egyptians and Arabs from the Gulf region for example. Beyond the obvious language and religious similarities, the culture of the people are largely separate. Egyptians would feel closer to countries like Tunisia, Lebanon and Jordan.

This feeling of being more Arab than African -in varying degrees- is the norm for most north African countries.

A darker side of this feeling, is the subtle racism present in the Egyptian society. Where the fairer you are, the better. Dark skinned people were usually portrayed as waiters and doormen with funny accents in Egyptian movies, which led to a certain stereotype associated with black Egyptians (usually Nubians).

EDIT: For the people attacking me in the comments, Of course Egypt is African since it lies in Africa. That part is obvious. That is not what the question was referring to.

Again the question asked about Egyptians, so I replied with what I know to be the truth after living there for 19 years. I am not racist or biased neither are all Egyptians. But there is definitely racism and stereotypes against black people in Egypt, to deny that would be wishful thinking.

How do you prove the ancient Egyptians were black?

Deidra Ramsey McIntyre

Updated 3y

It has already been proved genetically, linguistically, historically, artistically, etc. All the genetic studies from Marin et. al. 1999, Hawass et. al. 2012, DNA Tribes/JAMA 2012, and DNA Tribes/JAMA 2013 have resulted in unamed predynastic rulers and named rulers such as Ramses III (19th Dynasty) and Tutankhamen and Amenhotep III (18th Dynasty) as unmixed Africans who most closely match indigenous African ethnic groups from The Great Lakes region, South Africa, West Africa, the Sahel, and the Horn .... and in that order.... today.

As if genes were not enough, cranial studies by Keita, Irish, and Hassan, reveal remains in predynastic through dynastic Kemet being of "Negroid" types.

As if genes and cranial studies were not enough, linguists such as Jean-Claude Mboli have linked as many as 13 different African languages as having the same root as the language used for the Mdw Ntchr (hieroglyphs) script.

As if genes, cranial studies, and linguistics were not enough, the Ancient Greek and Roman writers from Herodotus to Strabo and onward not only called the ancient Egyptians "Ethiopian" (which is a phenotypic description of black people) but called hieroglyphs "the Ethiopian script." Greco-Romans were the biracial people of Europe and they clearly called the Ancient Egyptians blacker than them and today's lighter skin tone Egyptians most reassembled Ptolemy period Fayoum artifacts and not the pre-Ptolemy woolly haired (wigged/weaved) African artifacts of the dynasties that preceded the Ptolemaic rule.

As if genes, cranial studies, linguistics, and Greco-Roman literature were not enough, the Ancient Egyptians wrote in their own artifacts that their homeland/ancestral land was UP the Nile (that means South) in such writings as Hatshepsut's tomb account of the expeditions to Pwenet (Eritrea/Ethiopia as per the genetic link of mummified baboons matching that area) and Pepi I and Pepi II's expeditions up the Nile to Yamm bringing the singing "dwarf" from inner Africa that references an even earlier pharaohnic expedition south that did the same. There is never any documentation by Greco-Romans or the Ancient Egyptians that indicate they migrated from a north region or were not physically and culturally the same as other Africans.

As if genes, cranial studies, linguistics, Greco-Roman literature, Kemetic (Ancient Egyptian) historical accounts are not enough, the Remetch (people) of Kemet did everything that Africans still do - pastoral cattle (still happening), so-called animist religion (yes, that is exactly what Ancient Egyptian was no different from Nigeria and Benin's Ifa), covering skin and painting walls with ochre-milk based paint (this has been African from South to North to East to West for tens of thousands of years), have a religious system that uses indigenous African plants and animals and settings, hairstyles (from Afros, to butter covered drop curls, from braids, to twists.... still getting black people in trouble in schools globally and still pan-African), etc.

So, the real question is how on earth do you provide evidence that the Ancient Egyptians were white or non-back African other than oft-repeated modern-day lying? #EmperorHasNoClothes

And the artifact lie we are supposed to believe that the people who could depict animals and plant life accurately could not make their skin light in their own artwork.... no.... it is because they were black.

Related Links

Is there racism in African countries towards Africans from other African countries?

Who first claimed that Egyptians were black, and why?

Are Egyptians considered Africans or not? Is there a controversy with this view?

Why are Egyptians only 17% Arab (probably even less)? Who are they mixed with?

Are Egyptians Arabs or North Africans?

If Egypt is in Africa, why don't Egyptians consider themselves Africans?

Were the Egyptians black?

Why aren't Egyptians black like all the other Africans?

Why do some people of West African origin claim connection to Ancient Egyptians?

Why are some African Americans so inspired by Ancient Egyptians?

Did Moors come from Africa or Arabia?

Akif

Student of History and PoliticsJun 9

The term Moor is a term that was used by the Iberian Christians to refer the Muslims they met

This included the Native Iberian Muslims, North African Muslims, The Muslims of Sicily and Malta, Huge chunk of Black African Muslims

A Christian and a Muslim playing chess in 13th-century al-Andalus

When the Portuguese found the route to India they met the Muslims in Sri-Lanka and Kerala(South Indian state) they were also called Moors by the Portuguese

- Anonymous 16th-century Portuguese illustration from Códice Casanatense, depicting Kerala Muslims ("Mouros Malabares")

Related Links

Where do the Moors come from?

Were the North Africans known as Moors black? Why or why not?

Why don't history books talk about the Moors from Africa who ruled Europe in the 8th to the 15th century?

Is it true that black Moors were in control of Europe for centuries?

Did the Black Moors, not Arabs, rule over the whole Europe?

Were the original Arabs of Arabia "Black-African"?

Why was Africa undeveloped before colonization?

What race were the Moors?

When did The Moors rule Europe and how did it happen?

What part of Africa do the blackest Africans come from?

Do Egyptians feel Egypt to be part of Africa?

Françoise Marie

Master's Degree in Public Administration, Syracuse University10mo

There are two main categories of Egyptians : ethnic Egyptians and Egyptian citizens.

Ethnic Egyptians are the descendants of ancient Egyptians. The ancient Egyptian race lives on among the rural Fellahin and the Saidi of Upper Egypt. The Saidi are the custodians of the oldest Egyptian cultural heritage. They still observe the oldest customs and practice ancient rituals inherited from the Pharaohs. Sadly, they are the targets of mean jokes and negative stereotyping from the descendants of conquering Arabs. Conquerors tend to treat the conquered people the same way: disregard and disrespect.

Egyptian citizens don't have any Egyptian ancestors. They are only Egyptians by nationality. They are the hyphenated groups: Beja-Egyptians, Nubian-Egyptians, Arabo-Egyptians, Franco-Egyptians, Albano-Egyptians, Turco-Egyptians. They have their own cultures very different from the cultures of ethnic Egyptians. They are only Egyptians by nationality not by ethnicity.

Ancient Egypt was the Land of Ham, the biblical father of African nations.

Egypt is the Daughter of the Nile, our greatest African river in length, shared history and common interest.

Ethnic Egyptians, ancient and modern, are indigenous Africans from the River Nile Valley. They carry typical African signature genes, including the e1b1b hg whose point of origin is the Horn of Africa, in east "Sub-Saharan" Africa.

The descendants of Eurasians in Egypt, including conquering Arabs are not listed among indigenous African people. Actually, countless of them have stated loud and clear that they were not Africans, only geographically.

Only ethnic Egyptians and Egyptians from African ethnic groups (Beja and Nubians) strongly feel that they are part of Africa.

Others whose ancestors came from Eurasia still cling to the farcical Saharan racial divide, a racist fraud and a complete farce. In addition, they feel closer to Europeans and "Middle Easterners" than Africans, implying Blacks.

They will constantly say that North Africans are very different from Sub-Saharan Africans. They will conveniently omit that Nubians of Egypt are not Sub-Saharans. North and Saharan Africans who are black people are hidden on purpose it is as if North Africa was a "black free" region of Africa.

North Africans and Saharan Blacks are a silent, invisible and discriminated community. They mostly live in the southern regions, rural areas and as isolated community in the north and center. They are hardly talked about, portrayed in movies or seen on TV as there is a color line in all North African countries (the paler, the betterà.

Here is a map of the Sahara desert and the countries it covers.

1. Tunisia
2. Morocco
3. Western Sahara

4. Mauritania
5. Libya
6. Sudan
7. Egypt
8. Algeria
9. Niger
10. Mali
11. Chad

Saharan Sudan, Chad, Mali, Niger are inhabited by indigenous black populations up to 90%.

All the Saharan regions of Tunisia, Morocco, Egypt, Libya and Algeria are inhabited by indigenous black populations. Libya has the highest percentage of indigenous black populations (30–40%), including the Tebu, Kanuri, Zaghawa.

Sahara - Drainage

Several rivers originating outside the Sahara contribute to both the surface water and groundwater regimes of the desert and receive the discharge of its drainage networks. Rivers rising in the tropical highlands to the south are particularly prominent: the main tributaries of the Nile join in the Sahara, and the river flows northward along the desert's eastern margin to the Mediterranean; several rivers discharge into Lake Chad in the southern Sahara, and a significant quantity of water continues northeastward and contributes to the recharge of regional aquifers; and the Niger rises in the Fouta Djallon region of Guinea and flows https://www.britannica.com/place/Sahara-desert-Africa/Drainage

Related Links

How do Egyptians feel about afrocentrism?

If Egypt is in Africa, why don't Egyptians consider themselves Africans?

Why does Egypt not want to be part of Africa?

Were the Egyptians black?

How do modern Egyptians feel about Ancient Egyptian history?

What race are the Egyptians?

Do Egyptians view their country as African?

Are Egyptians leaving Egypt?

It has been proven already that modern Egyptians are the only descendants of the Ancient Egyptians. Why do some people with no connection to Egypt are trying to appropriate Egyptian history instead of focusing on their own countries and people?

What are similarities between Egypt and Africa?

Do Egyptians view themselves as black, as they're part of Africa?

Johanna Hill

.

Follow

B.A. in English Literature & Art and Art History, Brooklyn College (public college)1y

I'm an Egyptian and been to Egypt many times. We view ourselves as Caucasian in the case of someone like me as you can clearly see and as Semites. Many Egyptians have Italian, Greek, French and British blood.

That is the case for me as well Eastern European Jewish blood. Both my parents and both sets of grandparents were born and raised in Egypt. We are in Africa, but we are not black. This is me.

Related Links

How do Egyptians feel about afrocentrism?

If Egypt is in Africa, why don't Egyptians consider themselves Africans?

Why does Egypt not want to be part of Africa?

Were the Egyptians black?

How do modern Egyptians feel about Ancient Egyptian history?

What race are the Egyptians?

Do Egyptians view their country as African?

Are Egyptians leaving Egypt?

It has been proven already that modern Egyptians are the only descendants of the Ancient Egyptians. Why do some people with no connection to Egypt are trying to appropriate Egyptian history instead of focusing on their own countries and people?

What are similarities between Egypt and Africa?

What color was Ramses II's hair, red or blonde? If he was estimated to be 90+ when he died, then how come the mummy doesn't have grey hair?

Any Manuela

Master in Translation and Interpreting, Paris Diderot University (Graduated 2010)1y

Like Alexander Balogun stated bellow, Ramses II hair was dyed with henna.

Egyptians and Nubians may have also used cow urine to dye their hair.

Some believe a hair analysis by forensic scientists proved Ramses II had “ginger hair” in his youth. This is highly dubious.

The color of the hair is due to melanosomes, produced by melanocytes at the bottom of the hair bulb. These active melanocytes originate from a reservoir of dormant melanocytes located in the outer epithelial sheath. At the end of the anagen phase (growth), the hair follicle rebuilds and imports dormant melanocytes to replace those that have been used. While the process is still not completely understood, once the apoptosis (death) of these cells is complete there is no way of knowing the original hair color (only DNA tests can give an indication of it).

Related Answer

Was the Pharaoh Ramesses II black?

Jason Sarasti

Amateur scholar of Ancient Egyptian historyUpdated Feb 8

No.

Although applying modern racial categories to Ancient Egyptians is completely anachronistic, were the Pharaoh Ramesses II to appear to us today as he did in life, he'd likely be identified as a "white-passing" Middle Eastern/North African person.

Above: On the left is the mummy of the Pharaoh Wserma'atre Setepenre, better known by his nomen Ramesses II, and on the right is one of the many artistic depictions made of him during his lifetime.

The reason why I label him as "white passing" is because Ramesses II had phenotypic characteristics that were unusual in most MENA populations. Most famously, he had ginger hair in his youth, a trait that he is believed to have shared with his father, the Pharaoh Seti I, and some other members of his family. Red hair is not exactly a common trait amongst Middle Eastern/North African people, although here is an interesting fun fact: North Africa (especially Egypt and Libya) actually has one of the highest rates of red-headed people in the world, second only to Great Britain, Ireland and Scandinavia. In Ancient Egypt, ginger haired people were thought to be under the patronage of the god Set, and were believed to have divine powers. Egyptologists hypothesize that Seti I was named after Set specifically due to his hair colour.

In addition to being a ginger, Ramesses II was also much fairer skinned than the average Egyptian. Egyptian phenotype ranges from very fair to very dark (especially in Upper Egypt as you get closer to Sudan), but the average complexion tends to be a varying degree of typically middle-eastern olive, which can be seen both in ancient Egyptian mummies, and also in the modern Egyptian population. Inspection of Ramesses II's corpse meanwhile has indicated that he would've been quite pale in life, and it's believed he had mild vitiligo as well.

Above: Egyptian women showcasing average Egyptian complexions.

Ramesses II's most prominent facial feature was his rather large, aquiline nose, which was evidently considered so impressive in life that those who carried out his mummification filled his nasal cavity with cloth and spices to maintain its shape in death. In fairness however, this was common practice in royal mummification. Though no doubt his hooked nose was his most recognizable feature, especially after his red hair had turned white later in life.

And for those who say that Egyptians depicted themselves as akin to modern Black people, here is clear evidence against that: while Egyptian art was highly idealized and stylized and was not meant to be a realistic portrait of the people it represented, the Egyptians did have a general spectrum of features which they identified in themselves. In the above image, you can see Ramesses II smiting three foreign enemies of Egypt. The one on the furthest left is a Nubian, who is portrayed with very dark brown skin and wooly, braided/dreadlocked hair. Using modern racial definitions, Nubians would mostly appear Black to us today (though again, it's anachronistic, and there was a range in phenotype), and the Egyptians clearly distinguished themselves from Nubians in art. On the furthest right is an Asiatic Hittite, who is depicted with yellowish skin and almond shaped eyes. In the centre is a Libyan, whom the Egyptians often portrayed themselves as looking similar to, and also happen to be the closest genetic relatives of Egyptians, along with Ancient Levantine populations. Ramesses II in the image is depicted with the typical reddish colour of Egyptian men (Egyptian women meanwhile were usually portrayed with yellow or white skin instead; see below for more info about why that is.), though in real life he was actually much fairer.

There were Kings of Egypt whom we would likely describe as Black using today's racial standards, but they were Kushite Pharaohs of Egypt's 25th Dynasty. They weren't native Egyptians, but Nubians, and they reigned long after Ramesses II, who was a native Egyptian Ramesseid Pharaoh of the 19th Dynasty.

( Egyptian women of the upper classes were typically depicted as fair in art because, like in other Mediterranean cultures such as Greece and Rome, sun exposure was the result of outdoor manual labour, and so a tan was considered a symbol of the working class. Noble and Royal women didn't work, so fair skin gave the impression of staying indoors and not working, and therefore was a sign of an aristocratic lifestyle)

Related Answer

Ramesses II had a very distinct physical appearance, (red hair, exceptionally tall for his time, aquiline nose) is this something other Egyptians exhibited? Where did it come from?

Alexander Balogun

African history Ph.D. 2y

There are no proven facts that Ramses II had red hair. These are mere speculations and theories. Ramses II was an indigenous African from the Nile Valley of Egypt and not a descendant of migrant from West Asia or the people they refer to as the Hyksos.

The Nile Valley of Egypt is home to many Africans with peculiar hair textures.

You don't need to be from the Middle East to have straight hair. You can even find Africans with straight hair from East Africa.

Related Links

Why is the mummy of King Ramses 2 said to be that of a Caucasian, when it is that of a black African?

Why does the mummy of King Seti 1 look like modern black African males?

Is it true an ancient Egyptian Pharaoh had red hair?

Is it true that Emperor Rameses 2nd had red hair? If this is the case, where did he and the 19th Dynasty of Egypt come from?

Was Ramses II Black?

What did Ramses the Great look like?

Is it true that gingers (redheads) were considered special sacrifices to the Egyptian god, Osiris? Why?

What do you make of King Tut's great grandmother having blonde hair? Was it "weave"?

Why do some Egyptian mummies have blonde and red hair?

Is it possible that Ramesses II did not have red hair but that it was dyed with henna, since at the age of 90, his ha

Without the occupation of Egypt, would the scramble and partition of Africa have not taken place?

Emmanuel-Francis Nwaolisa Ogomegbunam

I am the West African History GuyTue

The scramble and partition unfolded as they did because most African States could not deter conquest. Changing that variable is the only way to change that timeline.

In the 19th and 20th centuries, everywhere outside the American Republics (Liberia included), Iran, Afghanistan, China and Japan were scrambled for and partitioned by the Europeans. Egypt was part of that globe-spanning process, not the catalyst.

The Charge of the 21st Lancers at the Battle of Omdurman by Edward Hale.

Trivia: The grandson of the Khalifa, for whom the Sudanese died, ended up headlining one of the most maligned arcs of Game of Thrones. Small world!

Related Links

What is the contribution of Egypt to the scramble and partition of Africa?

How did the Egyptian question facilitate the scramble and partition of Africa?

Why was Ethiopia not colonised during the scramble and partition of Africa?

What were the reasons for the scramble and partition for Africa?

Why did the scramble for and partition of Africa take place towards the end of the 19th century?

Why did the Netherlands not participate in the scramble for Africa?

Which was the first civilization in Africa, Egypt or Ethiopia?

Why does Egypt not want to be part of Africa?

If the scramble for Africa never happened, would Africa still be a poor, violent and unstable continent?

What was the importance of Egypt during the scramble for and partition of Africa?

What color was Ramses II's hair, red or blonde? If he was estimated to be 90+ when he died, then how come the mummy doesn't have grey hair?

Any Manuela

Master in Translation and Interpreting, Paris Diderot University (Graduated 2010)1y

Like Alexander Balogun stated bellow, Ramses II hair was dyed with henna.

Egyptians and Nubians may have also used cow urine to dye their hair.

Some believe a hair analysis by forensic scientists proved Ramses II had “ginger hair” in his youth. This is highly dubious.

The color of the hair is due to melanosomes, produced by melanocytes at the bottom of the hair bulb. These active melanocytes originate from a reservoir of dormant melanocytes located in the outer epithelial sheath. At the end of the anagen phase (growth), the hair follicle rebuilds and imports dormant melanocytes to replace those that have been used. While the process is still not completely understood, once the apoptosis (death) of these cells is complete there is no way of knowing the original hair color (only DNA tests can give an indication of it).

Related Answer

Was the Pharaoh Ramesses II black?

Jason Sarasti

Amateur scholar of Ancient Egyptian historyUpdated Feb 8

No.

Although applying modern racial categories to Ancient Egyptians is completely anachronistic, were the Pharaoh Ramesses II to appear to us today as he did in life, he'd likely be identified as a "white-passing" Middle Eastern/North African person.

Above: On the left is the mummy of the Pharaoh Wserma'atre Setepenre, better known by his nomen Ramesses II, and on the right is one of the many artistic depictions made of him during his lifetime.

The reason why I label him as "white passing" is because Ramesses II had phenotypic characteristics that were unusual in most MENA populations. Most famously, he had ginger hair in his youth, a trait that he is believed to have shared with his father, the Pharaoh Seti I, and some other members of his family. Red hair is not exactly a common trait amongst Middle Eastern/North African people, although here is an interesting fun fact: North Africa (especially Egypt and Libya) actually has one of the highest rates of red-headed people in the world, second only to Great Britain, Ireland and Scandinavia. In Ancient Egypt, ginger haired people were thought to be under the patronage of the god Set, and were believed to have divine powers. Egyptologists hypothesize that Seti I was named after Set specifically due to his hair colour.

In addition to being a ginger, Ramesses II was also much fairer skinned than the average Egyptian. Egyptian phenotype ranges from very fair to very dark (especially in Upper Egypt as you get closer to Sudan), but the average complexion tends to be a varying degree of typically middle-eastern olive, which can be seen both in ancient Egyptian mummies, and also in the modern Egyptian population. Inspection of Ramesses II's corpse meanwhile has indicated that he would've been quite pale in life, and it's believed he had mild vitiligo as well.

Above: Egyptian women showcasing average Egyptian complexions.

Ramesses II's most prominent facial feature was his rather large, aquiline nose, which was evidently considered so impressive in life that those who carried out his mummification filled his nasal cavity with cloth and spices to maintain its shape in death. In fairness however, this was common practice in royal mummification. Though no doubt his hooked nose was his most recognizable feature, especially after his red hair had turned white later in life.

And for those who say that Egyptians depicted themselves as akin to modern Black people, here is clear evidence against that: while Egyptian art was highly idealized and stylized and was not meant to be a realistic portrait of the people it represented, the Egyptians did have a general spectrum of features which they identified in themselves. In the above image, you can see Ramesses II smiting three foreign enemies of Egypt. The one on the furthest left is a Nubian, who is portrayed with very dark brown skin and wooly, braided/dreadlocked hair. Using modern racial definitions, Nubians would mostly appear Black to us today (though again, it's anachronistic, and there was a range in phenotype), and the Egyptians clearly distinguished themselves from Nubians in art. On the furthest right is an Asiatic Hittite, who is depicted with yellowish skin and almond shaped eyes. In the centre is a Libyan, whom the Egyptians often portrayed themselves as looking similar to, and also happen to be the closest genetic relatives of Egyptians, along with Ancient Levantine populations. Ramesses II in the image is depicted with the typical reddish colour of Egyptian men (Egyptian women meanwhile were usually portrayed with yellow or white skin instead; see below for more info about why that is.), though in real life he was actually much fairer.

There were Kings of Egypt whom we would likely describe as Black using today's racial standards, but they were Kushite Pharaohs of Egypt's 25th Dynasty. They weren't native Egyptians, but Nubians, and they reigned long after Ramesses II, who was a native Egyptian Ramesseid Pharaoh of the 19th Dynasty.

( Egyptian women of the upper classes were typically depicted as fair in art because, like in other Mediterranean cultures such as Greece and Rome, sun exposure was the result of outdoor manual labour, and so a tan was considered a symbol of the working class. Noble and Royal women didn't work, so fair skin gave the impression of staying indoors and not working, and therefore was a sign of an aristocratic lifestyle)

Related Answer

Ramesses II had a very distinct physical appearance, (red hair, exceptionally tall for his time, aquiline nose) is this something other Egyptians exhibited? Where did it come from?

Alexander Balogun

African history Ph.D. 2y

There are no proven facts that Ramses II had red hair. These are mere speculations and theories. Ramses II was an indigenous African from the Nile Valley of Egypt and not a descendant of migrant from West Asia or the people they refer to as the Hyksos.

The Nile Valley of Egypt is home to many Africans with peculiar hair textures.

You don't need to be from the Middle East to have straight hair. You can even find Africans with straight hair from East Africa.

Related Links

Why is the mummy of King Ramses 2 said to be that of a Caucasian, when it is that of a black African?

Why does the mummy of King Seti 1 look like modern black African males?

Is it true an ancient Egyptian Pharaoh had red hair?

Is it true that Emperor Rameses 2nd had red hair? If this is the case, where did he and the 19th Dynasty of Egypt come from?

Was Ramses II Black?

What did Ramses the Great look like?

Is it true that gingers (redheads) were considered special sacrifices to the Egyptian god, Osiris? Why?

What do you make of King Tut's great grandmother having blonde hair? Was it "weave"?

Why do some Egyptian mummies have blonde and red hair?

Is it possible that Ramesses II did not have red hair but that it was dyed with henna, since at the age of 90, his ha

Without the occupation of Egypt, would the scramble and partition of Africa have not taken place?

Emmanuel-Francis Nwaolisa Ogomegbunam

I am the West African History GuyTue

The scramble and partition unfolded as they did because most African States could not deter conquest. Changing that variable is the only way to change that timeline.

In the 19th and 20th centuries, everywhere outside the American Republics (Liberia included), Iran, Afghanistan, China and Japan were scrambled for and partitioned by the Europeans. Egypt was part of that globe-spanning process, not the catalyst.

The Charge of the 21st Lancers at the Battle of Omdurman by Edward Hale.

Trivia: The grandson of the Khalifa, for whom the Sudanese died, ended up headlining one of the most maligned arcs of Game of Thrones. Small world!

Related Links

What is the contribution of Egypt to the scramble and partition of Africa?

How did the Egyptian question facilitate the scramble and partition of Africa?

Why was Ethiopia not colonised during the scramble and partition of Africa?

What were the reasons for the scramble and partition for Africa?

Why did the scramble for and partition of Africa take place towards the end of the 19th century?

Why did the Netherlands not participate in the scramble for Africa?

Which was the first civilization in Africa, Egypt or Ethiopia?

Why does Egypt not want to be part of Africa?

If the scramble for Africa never happened, would Africa still be a poor, violent and unstable continent?

What was the importance of Egypt during the scramble for and partition of Africa?

Are the Beja People descendants of the Ancient Egyptians?

Tawani Anyangwe

Ancient history enthusiast. Tracing our origins.6y

Lets see how the Ancient Egyptian represented themselves:

CUSHITES

Now lets see some Beja people:

https://mir-s3-cdn-cf.behance.net/project_modules/disp/7ea1e622438769.56312bfb229fc.jpg

They look pretty close.

Again all these pictures are just from Google.

Related Answer

Are the Beja People descendants of the Ancient Egyptians?

Saleh Hassan

.

Follow

Pharmacist Updated 1y

Yes the Beja are the nomads and the rulers of the desert since predynastic Egypt, in comparison the beduions in Sinai are Arab nomads that arrived recently into Egypt

Beja are not Nubians, Nubians are Not nomads and they only reside by the Nile north of Sudan & upper Egypt

The Beja inhabit the area between Nile River & Red Sea in Sudan, Eritrea & eastern desert in Egypt. majority of them live in Sudanese states on Red Sea.

Big clans are part of Aswan they are Besharia, 3ababda & also in border town halayeb & shalatin.

Their language is Afroasciatic and thier bloodline is less altered than COPTS in Egypt

An Egyptian reporter from Cairo with Egyptian Beja clans

Egyptian Beja girl in the 1920's, if she has nothing to do with ancient Egypt I wonder who does honestly.

Ancient Egypt bloodline runs from Egypt into north Sudan literally, Nubians, Beja, and different Native arabaized clans are split between the two countries thanks to British colonial rule.

This is from Dabood temple now residing in Spain originally located in Aswan one of the wall paintings showing the 25th Dynasty pharaoh Adikhalamani offering water to an ancient Egyptian Goddess & a Beja God or cult symbol

Related Links

What is the reason some said that the ancient Egyptians are blacks? Is this really true?

Since the Copts (who are "brown", Middle Eastern people) are proven to be the direct descendants of the Ancient Egyptians, then why do people still argue that the Ancient Egyptians were black?

How did Egyptians become less negroid?

Are Egyptians considered Africans or not? Is there a controversy with this view?

Are nubians black Africans?

How do I debunk the Afrocentric claims that the ancient Egyptians were black and prove to them that modern day Egyptians are the descendants of ancient Egyptians?

What race were ancient Egyptians? Are there any of their descendants left?

Why are 'whites' so fast to disclaim 'blacks' from ancient Egypt?

Are Kemetic blacks right to assume that they are the real descendants of ancient Egypt?

What haplogroup did ancient Egyptians belong to?

Who was the first colony in Africa?

Originally Answered: Which country was the first who started colonisation in Africa?
If you mean foreign rule at a political level, the earliest one I can think of was the Neo-Assyrian empire, which tried to colonize Egypt in the 700s BC. It's possible the Lebanese already had colonies in Tunisia or Algeria by that time, but I don't think there are clear enough records from the era to be certain.

If you mean large numbers of settlers just moving in and taking over, both the Minoans and Canaanites settled in Northern Egypt when the Middle Kingdom collapsed, and gained effective political control, but Egypt wasn't under foreign rule, just ruled by foreigners.

Related Links

What was the first European colony in Africa?

Is colonialism the primary reason why Africa is so poor?

Which countries in Africa were never colonized?

Why was Africa colonized so late?

Someone, who lives in Africa, told me most African countries were better off during colonial times? Is this true?

What did Africa look like before colonialism?

What will Africa look like if colonial masters did not colonize Africa in 1887?

Why did colonialism ruin Africa but helped develop the Americas?

What would have happened to Africa if it hadn't been colonized?

Which country in Africa had it worse under colonial rule?

Olive oil was one of the main commodities of the ancient Mediterranean. It was used for a wide variety of purposes in antiquity. But how exactly could the ancient Egyptians have made olive oil?

Bertrand Paricaud
Knowledge: English June 2

Like the Greeks and Romans.

By first picking the olives (see the sketch by Pierre Dac and Francis Blanche) then pressing them and filtering the result. And the residue (the pulp) is used to make tapenade.

Frankly it has not changed except that the pressing and filtering are motorized. Except for green craftsmen.

Similar questions

Why not put water on hot oil?

Why shouldn't olive oil be heated?

Can you use olive oil in the cakes?

Is it inadvisable to cook olive oil and why?

Does adding oil when cooking pasta really make a difference?

Was obscurantism the cause of the collapse of the Ottoman Empire?

When and how did people come up with the idea of making oil?

When do you consider it appropriate to use olive oil rather than another oil?

How to heal ulcers naturally with olive oil as a remedy?

Is it better to cook fries in rapeseed oil or olive oil?

Egypt has the highest number of ongoing infrastructure projects in Africa.

Yussif Issah Oyen

OTC Drugs Seller at Pharmaceuticals (2013–present)Jun 7

It recently completed the world's largest water treatment plant, world's largest archaeological museum, world's fourth largest solar park, Africa's tallest building, biggest fish farm, longest light rail line.

It has built 10,000 factories in the last 7 years, and is constructing 34 new cities.

EDECS

It is building Africa's largest Olympic Sports city, shopping mall, first space research city, second largest mosque, the world's largest monorail line, world's largest beet sugar factory, sugar strategic crops production plant, sixth largest high-speed rail line.

History and Mystery Lovers:

THE SLEEPING KING.

Posted by

Richard Strachan

May 14

The face of Seti I is one of the most well preserved in all of Ancient Egyptian history. He died 3,298 years ago and ruled when Egypt was at one of its most affluent peaks. He was the father of one of the most famous pharaohs of all time, Ramesses II. The greatest pharaoh of all time. When he died, Egyptian Mummification was at its absolute peak of perfection.

He is often regarded as the most well preserved mummy in the world. It really shows.

These daguerreotype portraits show the oldest generation of people to ever be photographed, 1840-1850

Egypt claimed that it could destroy Israel in 48 hours in 1967. Could it do that?

Sol J. Grazi

Lifelong student of Western, American and Jewish history Updated Mon

The answer is more frightening than it appears on surface. Yes, the Egyptians had a real chance to severely disrupt, if not destroy, Israel in 1967. By May 16, Egypt had amassed 85,000 troops in Sinai with 100,000 in reserve, including reinforcing their airfields which were now in reach of Dimona, Israel's purported nuclear production center. The UN peacekeeping forces evacuated without protest upon Egyptian President Nasser's orders. Syria was increasing their harassing attacks in the North, ensuring a two front conflict. A week later, Nasser blockaded the Straits of Tiran closing Israel's southern port and only access to Asia; whose preservation was guaranteed by the US since Eisenhower. In 1967, they were otherwise occupied. Israel was alone.

Egypt's key to winning was based on parity, not superiority, in the air. Though outnumbered and lacking strategic depth, Israel's army was better trained and decidedly more determined. It may have not been enough to prevent disastrous casualties. Egypt planned to attack Israeli cites, along with the military targets, which could divert Israel's resources The key to Israel's winning was a surprise attack on Egyptian and Syrian airfields before their planes could take off to remove this threat.

They observed their enemy's actions closely, and found a weakness - security was lax during the changing of the guard and there were gaps in the radar coverage. At 7:45 on June 5, Israel launched a simultaneous air and land attack. Its success depended on the air force's ability to disable Egypt's air force. Unexpectedly, Israel employed 90% of its aircraft , leaving only 12 to defend its cities. Thus deployed, they were wildly successful, effectively winning the war in the first few hours.

West Point teaches the victories of the Hasmonean and Roman revolts. They do not teach the battles of the ’67 war because it had a low probability for success.

Edit: 1776 upvotes on July 4. How propitious.

Related Links

Why doesn't Egypt want any war with Israel anymore this day, unlike in their past?

Does Egypt have the military capability to defeat Israel, given that Israel is not supported by allies?

Is Egypt easy to invade now? Does it currently have a weak military?

What would happen if Israel invaded Egypt?

Could Israel conquer Syria, Jordan and Egypt?

Who has the stronger military, Egypt or Israel?

Who would win a war between Egypt and Israel?

Was it a mistake for Israel to capture Gaza from Egypt in 1967?

Who started the Six Day War in 1967 between Israel, Egypt, Syria and Jordan?

If the United States went to war against Israel, how long would the Israelis be

What Arab country has the most Christians?

Ahmed Abdelhaq Zaydan

.

Follow

Lives in Meknès, Morocco (1900–present)4y

To answer your question and provide you the ability to compare, here's a list of the Christian populations of Arab countries by absolute numbers and percentage of the total population.

1. Egypt (10%) ~ 9 million
2. Lebanon (45%) ~ 2 million
3. Syria (10%) ~ 2 million pre-civil war
4. United Arab Emirates (10%) ~ 1 million Entirely composed of foreigners
5. Saudi Arabia (3%) ~ 1 million Entirely composed of foreigners
6. Kuwait (17%) ~ 800,000 Mainly Foreigners, some natives
7. Iraq (1.5%) ~ 500,000
8. Jordan (4.5%) ~ 500,000 Mainly refugees from Iraq and Syria
9. Qatar (16%) ~ 400,000 Entirely composed of foreigners

No other Arab state has a Christian population above 300,000

Russian Orthodox Church in Sharjah, United Arab Emirates

Baptism in Syrian Church

Kuwaiti Priest

What do Arabs think about Christian people and Christian religion?

S. Patrick Maiorca

.

Follow

I an an Orthodox Christian3y

It depends on the Arab the people in these photos are all Arab Christians. The middle east is home to the Eastern and Oriental Patriarchs of Jerusalem, Alexandira, and Antioch

Related Links

Which Arab country has the most beautiful women?

Why are Arabs the most religious people on Earth?

Why is Lebanon the only Christian Arab country in the Middle East?

What are the most liberal Arabic countries?

What is the best Arab country? Why?

Which Arab country has no Muslims?

Do Lebanese Christians hate being called Arab?

Are there any black Saudi Arabians?

What race are Saudi Arabians?

What are the differences between Lebanese-Christians and others in Lebanon?

When were Africa and South America joined together?

Cariou

Pilot engineer and Jobs and careers in social action , Ecole de l'air (Diploma obtained in 1982) June 28

Originally Answered: When were Africa and South America joined together?
About 200 million years ago, Africa and South America separated.

This is Alfred Wegener (1880-1930). “Die Entstehung der Kontinente” [The formation of the continents], who first wrote a book (1912) on this subject.

He attacked the theory of "contraction" (the earth's crust would have folded by cooling - which would have created the mountains). Above all, he assembled a certain number of facts scattered in various scientific branches (geology, paleontology, climatology in particular).

From the 1960s, the theory of plate tectonics came to confirm Wegener's hypothesis.

Similar questions

Why were there early civilizations in South America like the Incas, but no civilizations in North America above Mexico, even though human migration entered North America through the Bering Strait?

Why did the United States and Canada prosper and achieve developed country status, while Central and South America did not?

Why is South America called by this name, even to refer to the paleocontinent which, for most of the Neozoic era, was not even connected to North America?

Why didn't Europeans settle in their Asian colonies, as they did in North America, South America, Southern Africa and Australia?

Why were some fruit or vegetable trees originally not found, for example, in Central and South America, but not in Africa, when their introduction into Africa for centuries poses no problem?

Can South Africa be the engine of Africa?

When South America became independent from European colonialism, why did Brazil remain united while Spanish-speaking countries split into several countries?

Were European explorers shocked to find that there was no passage in both North and South America and that the New World was a contiguous barrier spanning almost the entire length of the planet?

Why do regions like North America, China and Scandinavia have lower urban population growth rates than Australia, Central Africa and Mexico?

Where and when were glasses invented?

What is the standard of living in Ancient Egypt compared to Ancient Rome?

Lera Ali

Studied English as a Second Language (ESL) & Russian (language) at University of Catania3y

First, I should make some long premises, since the history of both empires spaces for thousands years and of course during this time there were many social, political and economic changes, like you may assume of every modern civilization. So one should choose which period of both civilization you want to compare.

Assuming that we choose the highest peak of both Egypt and Rome, the time were they reached their maximum expansion in both territory and civilization, we'll compare the period around 15th century BC Egypt (the New Kingdom, as historians would tell) and for Rome, the relatively peaceful time of the Pax Romana, between 1st century BC and the 2nd century AD.

Also, the earliest phase of Egyptian civilization, happened to be around 3000 BC, more than 2000 years before the foundation of Rome, and the same age span between Rome's highest point and…*us.

Making these points, it stands out even more that Ancient Egypt was a prosperous civilization in almost every aspect of a society: they had law codes, courts, schools, some effective medicines (they understood the concept of poor hygiene being the cause of illnesses), were advanced in mathematics and astronomy (which would explain how pyramids could be built and survive to our days), they had administration and bureaucracy. Women lived standards that were impossible or very frowned upon by Greek/Roman standards. They even owned properties, which not even Victorian Britain would allow. There was even a female ruler in her own right, Hatshepsut, which in Rome would never happen. Even the myth of starving slaves building pyramids (which in our minds pictures Hebrew slaves, Moses and Exodus) should be forgotten. It has been proved that pyramids were built with paid labour, which actually makes sense since such high piece of engineering could be built only by people who know their job, and most of all are healthy enough to carry heavy loads around all the day. Slavery existed, no doubts about that, but very likely Egyptians slaves were treated better than black slaves in 17th/18th century America.

Still, the Roman empire was great. It never happened again that a civilization could conquer and hold for centuries an empire that is roughly the equivalent of Modern EU + North Africa and Middle East.

That was possible only with their extraordinary advanced military and their ability of taking the best from ever conquered civilization (Etruscans, Greeks, Carthaginians, and even Egyptians). Since they weren't an erudite civilization at their origins, they were hungry for knowledge. Also Romans had a very practical and entrepreneurial spirit (mind the famous lore of Roman sewers being larger than the actual city, because they knew they would expand) and their life standard was arguably better than Medieval Europe, with the Cloaca Maxima draining local marshes and remove the waste of the city, a thing that apparently not even the Egyptians could achieve. Sewers and aqueducts had an enormous importance to Romans, since they supplied water, and also energy since Roman technology was based mostly on watermills.

Also they had the still surviving concept of public services, like baths (thermae, which you would find in every ancient Roman city) and public latrines for poor citizens. Still, they haven't the same standards of hygiene like modern societies, and both public buildings which aimed to better health and hygiene of people were terrible agents of diseases, but the effort is still appreciate and held in regard.

The compare could go on forming its own book, but what stands out is that Ancient Egypt was an advanced civilization with life standards unthinkable for other areas still in the mists of late Neolithic age, and while Romans had an advanced civilization too, women were probably better off in Egypt. Also, their empire taken the best knowledge from earlier kingdom but that was substantially the substrate of what eventually formed Western European civilization.

More answers from
Lera Ali

Were the actors portraying Rhaegar Targaryen and Lyanna Stark underwhelming?
Why did Robert hit Cersei?
What are the most unpopular opinions you have about A Song of Ice and Fire?
How do modern Italians feel about the history of ancient Rome? Do they take pride in it? Do Italian children learn about Roman history in school? Are Italians more proud of the Roman Empire or the Renaissance?

Was Howland Reed the second best friend of Ned Stark?

In other languages

In French
Quel est le niveau de vie dans l'Égypte ancienne par rapport à la Rome antique ?

Related Links

As a rich noble would you rather live in Ancient Greece or Ancient Rome?

What was life like for a peasant in Ancient Rome, Greece and Egypt?

How many Greeks lived in Ancient Egypt?

What was day-to-day life in Ancient Rome like?

Between an average Roman, ancient Egypt, and today's average civilian, which is wealthier?

How was life so stable and unchanging that the ancient Egyptian civilization lasted thousands of years?

Who was richer, Ancient Egypt or Ancient Rome?

Would you rather live in Ancient Rome, Ancient Greece, or Ancient Egypt?

What fact of Egyptian civilization has surprised you the most?

Info Search

Answered by

Lois L. Kersey

Jul 4

Pharaoh Neferkara Pepy, who came to reign as an infant, hated flies.

So much was his hatred for these insects, that one of the main requirements that the pharaoh asked for in order to rule, was that a couple of slaves be stripped naked and completely covered in honey, from the feet to the head. That way, he made sure the flies were drawn to his slaves instead of to him.

To think that the pharaoh had the power to do whatever he wanted is an amazing thing to think about. A civilization so advanced, but at the same time so old-fashioned in some ways.

Related Links

What is a fact of history where you describe the word "Karma"?

What animals have an unusual morphology?

Why does Mars have 2 moons if it is smaller than Earth?

Why are most of the ancient Greek structures in ruins, unlike the Roman ones?

What would happen if we released a male tiger in the savannah and a male lion in the jungle? Which would be more successful in adapting to change?

What are some of the most interesting computer facial reconstructions of people who lived in prehistory or ancient times?

Is it true that Albert Einstein once said that Indians are "biologically inferior"?

Is attacking a wild animal brave?

How was it concluded that Jupiter and Saturn are gaseous planets without a solid surface (if we are not yet able to interact with their atmospheres)?

What has been the strangest conflict between humans and animals in history?

What book should all young people read?

What kind of plants that look like animals or vice versa are the most interesting?

Why did the barbarians destroy Rome?

Is it possible to build a nuclear-powered power source that is the size of a cell phone battery?

What would happen if polar bears were introduced to Antarctica? Could a polar bear survive in Antarctica?

I've always heard that Egypt as a province was the breadbasket of Rome. Did it produce so much wealth for the empire that it offset other draining territories in the empire?

Why are there so many poor in ancient Egypt?

What type of slavery did Ancient Egypt have?

Silk Road

Studied at Generative Pre TrainingMay 23

Don't picture chain gangs and whip-wielding overseers just yet. Egyptian slavery wasn't your typical Hollywood-style spectacle.

It was a bit more... shall we say, sophisticated?

Slaves in this ancient land weren't always doomed to a life of misery.

They could be prisoners of war, unfortunate debtors, or even enterprising individuals who opted for servitude as an escape from poverty.

Imagine this: a slave in Ancient Egypt could climb the social ladder, becoming a skilled artisan, a scribe, or even a trusted advisor to the pharaoh himself.

Unlike the chattel slavery prevalent in other civilizations, where slaves were mere commodities, Egyptian slaves could own property, marry, and even purchase their own freedom.

It seems the term "slave" doesn't quite capture the complexities of this arrangement.

"Servant" or "dependent laborer" might be more fitting.

But let's not get too carried away with this rosy picture.

Slavery, even in its most "enlightened" form, still involved a power imbalance.

Slaves were subject to the whims of their masters, and abuse, although not as rampant as one might assume, was certainly a possibility.

However, Egyptian law did offer some protection, with punishments for killing a slave and avenues for legal redress in cases of mistreatment.

Associated: Was there slavery in Ancient Egypt?

Kevin O'Neill

A bit of an interest in the past 9y

Originally Answered: Was there slavery in Ancient Egypt?
Yes, just like most ancient civilizations, there was slavery but not quite in the manner described by some of the answers given here.

Irrespective of where it was written, there has never been any evidence for the notion that Israelite/Jewish slaves built the pyramids. In fact the opposite is true, evidence has been found that skilled Egyptian work crews were employed for many years to live on site and that these work crews were often better fed than many other Egyptian workers.
These crews were supplemented by conscripted Egyptian labourers (and conscription itself can be viewed as a form of slavery, it's certainly not far removed from indentured servitude) but foreign slaves were very unlikely to have been allowed to work on such an important (both materially and spiritually) project as the pyramids.

It's highly debatable whether Jewish people were ever captured en masse as slaves by Egypt because aside from the Bible and the Torah, no other source has ever been found to corroborate the idea, not even in the records of Egypt's neighbour states, be they allies or enemies.
Further, there has not been any archaeological evidence found that supports the belief that the Israelite/Jewish nation was enslaved by the Egyptians and if half a million Israelite families moved from Egypt to Canaan, you'd reasonably expect to find at least some pottery shards to prove it - but nothing has ever been found.

Examination of DNA has found no evidence of crossovers between Israelites and Egyptians - if they'd been enslaved for hundreds of years you could reasonably expect some interbreeding.
In fact, the pyramids are at least 800 years older than the time of the claimed Exodus.

But to get to the point, unfortunately for scholars, the ancient Egyptian language itself makes the distinction between servants and slaves difficult to determine if a good contextual background is not provided. For example, a priest might be described in an inscription as a "god's slave" but the priest was obviously not a slave as we understand it today.
Many other occupations in Egypt at the time involved a type of slavery that, while the worker was not considered property, they did not have the right to leave the town they lived in or to leave the work they were given. For example, the people who worked on the tombs at Dier el-Medina were considered "free" but they were not allowed to simply give up their job and wander off to pursue other endeavours. A situation similar to the workers in the "closed towns" of the Soviet Union during the 1950s-1980s or the "company towns" of the USA during the early 1900s.

Many of the "slaves" found in Egypt (just like most other civilizations at the time) were people who had been captured during wars. Many were given to various temples to work agricultural lands because agriculture was probably the single most important aspect of ancient Egyptian life. Other "slaves" were people who basically sold themselves into servitude to pay off debts that they had accrued. This servitude would also apply to their children until the debt was paid.

While these people were considered to be possessions of the temples or individuals who controlled them, they were typically treated better than slaves in many other civilizations. If they weren't kept fed & sheltered, they would not be able to work. In fact, slave owners had an obligation to treat them well and child slaves were not allowed to be used for any form of hard labour. There is even some evidence that slaves had some level of protection under the law. For some of them, they actually lived a safer life than a typical Egyptian peasant.

Slavery in ancient Egypt was akin to enforced servitude rather than total ownership like it was in Greek, Roman and later European civilizations.
Slaves were not seen as some sort of disposable good in the manner that Africans forced to work on plantations were treated. Slavery in that manner was quite rare until the Greeks took possession of Egypt and brought their version of slavery with them.

Further explanation of the differences between Egyptian slavery can be found on a few web pages, I'd suggest the following to start with: -

Tour Egypt :: Slaves and Slavery in Ancient Egypt
Slavery, its causes and practice
Doubting the Story of Exodus

Associated: Whenever we speak about the splendor of Kemet, we are reminded that ancient

Deveshu

Egyptians had black slaves. Why is that?

How interesting

Tomb of Amenhotep Huy (TT40)

NUBIANS

So interesting

Really interesting

This doesnt look particularly black

Hmm they almost look like some people we see in certain countries

Wow

A Libyan, a Canaanite, a Syian, and a Nubian, bow to pharaoh. XVIIIth Dynasty

Oh myyy

Ooooh myyy

9:22 4%

Answer

Interesting

Oh no

ΑΡΑ
ΒΕ

2:29
47%

TWO HITTITE SPIES BEATEN BY THE EGYPTIAN SOLDIERS.[1]

" god of the horizon, as the god who riseth in the horizon of " fire. The gods love the smell of him when he, the eldest-
" born of the dew, cometh from Punt, when he traverseth
" the land of the Matchaiu, the Beautiful Face coming from " the Land of the god (i.e., the South-Eastern Sûdân).
" The gods cast themselves down at his feet when they " recognize His Majesty, their Lord, the lord of fear,
" the mighty one of victory, the mighty of Will, the lord of " crowns, who maketh offerings to flourish, and createth
" the divine food.

Apparently, its just a tan

Nubia
Lower Egypt
Upper Egypt
Who are these white peoples depicted from 1902 fake Euro revision?
They fit no actual Egyptian depictions.

FAKE

Related Limks

What is the religion of Ancient Egypt?

What was the origin of the ancient Egyptian slaves?

If the ancient Jews were against slavery when they were slaves in Egypt, why were they subsequently happy to have slaves themselves, including their fellow Jews?

How did ancient Egypt begin?

Did ancient slaves have slaves?

Why are slaves always depicted as blacks, specifically in ancient Egypt and modern day Arab nations?

Did ancient Egyptians have Jewish slaves?

What are some Ancient Egyptian achievements?

Were there any slave revolts in Egypt?

Is there any extra-biblical evidence that the Israelites were ever enslaved by the Egyptians?

When did slavery end in Egypt?

Why did ancient Egypt split into Upper and Lower Egypt?

How was slavery in ancient Egypt different from slavery in the United States?

What archaeological evidence exists to show that the Hebrews were ever slaves or even just lived in Egypt?

How did ancient Egypt slaves get paid?

Why are the Egyptian gov't heavily involved in terrorism lying about knowledge of tunnels connecting the Philadelphia Corridor & Gaza? Egypt has been using the tunnels to smuggle weapons, ammunition, etc., to harm Israelis.

How come Hamas only uses tunnels for storing weapons and not for attacking Israel?

Brent Cooper

Doctor of Jurisprudence in SMU Dedman School of Law, Southern Methodist University (Graduated 1977)Dec 16

Your statement is incorrect. Grossly incorrect.

Tunnels have been used to directly attack the IDF, to hide hostages, and to store weapons used to attack Israel.

It is all the same thing. And 2023 is. It was the first time. In 2001, for example, Hamas insurgents used a growing tunnel system to explode a bomb under an Israeli military post. In 2006, it was used in the abduction of an Israeli soldier who was then held captive for five years.

The tunnels have been used to store weapons, house Hamas control centers, train fighters, hold prisoners, and in 2014, to enter the country and attack border control.

Israeli officials say that one of the group's main control centers is located under the al-Shifa hospital in Gaza. They maintain that there's plenty of evidence that Hamas is using tunnels under schools, hospitals, and mosques to serve as hiding places for weapons and militants. Hamas is also holding its hostages in the tunnels: An 85-year old woman who was captured by Hamas on October 7 told authorities that she was transported for miles through underground tunnels and even met up with other hostages in large underground rooms.

Associated: What is Egypt's stance on the Gaza rockets fired at Israel? Have they taken any action against Hamas for building tunnels into Egypt?

Brent Cooper

Doctor of Jurisprudence in SMU Dedman School of Law, Southern Methodist University (Graduated 1977) Upvoted by Yuval Libenson lives in Israel (2005-present)Jan 10

They have demanded a cease fire. They have demanded that the bombing and shelling of the tunnels stop.

Even though that is exactly what they did.

Most importantly, they do not want a situation where Gazans would enter Egypt.

For two weeks, Egypt has been stepping up its rhetoric with Israel, warning against an influx of Gazan refugees arriving in the Sinai Peninsula.

Egyptian President Abdel-Fattah el-Sissi lamented what he said was a lack of response on behalf of the international community "to the crisis in the Gaza Strip." At the same time, he called for an immediate ceasefire.

About a decade ago, Egypt faced a similar challenge to what Israel is going through now.
ISIS terrorists, who had infiltrated from Gaza, carried out deadly terror attacks in Sinai. They used the smuggling tunnels leading from the strip to Egypt, the economic anchor of Hamas.

Estimates say that between 10-15% of the terror organization's budget came from taxes on goods that pass through the tunnels in Rafah as well as from issuing licenses, for an annual income of about one billion dollars.

As such, el-Sissi dealt a great blow to Hamas. Since his rise to power, approximately 1,900 tunnels have been destroyed.

Egypt did not hold back: the tunnels were shelled from the air, destroyed with controlled explosions on the ground, and flooded with sewage water or water pumped directly from the Mediterranean Sea. Some reports said even chemical substances were used, which, if true, turned the tunnels into death traps.

Why do Hamas and Israel build tunnels?

Mike Chang

Lives in New York City6mo
Tunnels in the Middle East have been a thing since recorded time.

The Bible mentions tunnels, so they have been a thing since at least then. Tunnels have been an issue in Iraq, where we first found them, and the vast size of the Iraq tunnels.

Hamas's 'Gaza Metro' tunnel system in 2021

Israeli map showing tunnels allegedly destroyed in air strikes

Source: Israel Defense Forces

BBC

The Hamas Gaza tunnels seem to be much larger.

Related Links

Why doesn't Egypt open its border to the Palestinians in Gaza?

If Hamas has elaborate tunnels throughout Gaza, why is it that Gaza civilians and citizens haven't used these same tunnels to leave Gaza?

What is your reaction to Michael Rapaport demanding Hamas reveal themselves and show the world what's in the tunnels?

Why did Israel invade the Egyptian Gazan Philadelphia Corridor and murder 2 Egyptian soldiers?

How have Bedouin Clans been involved in building smuggling tunnels on both sides of the Egypt-Gaza border?

What is the reason for the lack of tunnels connecting Gaza to Israel? Is it because they are not being used by Hamas?

Why has Israeli video evidence of Hamas embedding in tunnels under the Rantisi hospital been ignored by world media?

Why didn't Israel blast all the tunnels between Gaza and Egypt in its most recent attack against Hamas in Gaza?

How does the relationship between the Egyptian government and Hamas affect the building of tunnels for weapon transfer into Gaza?

How has Hamas built hundreds of miles of tunnels underneath the heavily populated enclave’s buildings in Gaza?

What evidence is there that a Hamas tunnel is under the Qatari-funded Sheikh Hamad Hospital in northern Gaza that Israel has alleged?

Why doesn't Israel give Gaza to Egypt?

What measures can Israel take to prevent the smuggling tunnels between Egypt and Gaza in Rafah?

I keep hearing about tunnels between Gaza and Egypt being destroyed. Why are they being destroyed and how does that affect residents of Gaza?

Why did Egyptian intelligence find the alleged tunnels running along the Philadelphi Corridor?

EQUATORIAL GUINEA

National Flag and Emblem

Locator Map

TEXT HIGHLIGHTS: Diaries updates, key events, brief analysis and relating news articles in timeline

Overview

It is one of the tiniest countries in Africa with mainland and five Islands. At around 1472, Portuguese navigator Fernão do Pó arrived at the spot that has become Malabo area and surrounding coast mainly visited by Portuguese traders. Portugal assigned the rights to offer Spain a foothold to conduct slave trade. The Island of Bioko was then ceded to the Spanish in 1777 by its original Portuguese colonizers. Spain then went on to settle the mainland province of Rio Muni in 1844. In 1904 the 2 territories were united as the Western African Territories and later renamed Spanish Guinea. In the 1940s, Spain started to establish their presence in the colony. Interests for the Spanish are mainly the fertile land with the country's Cocoa and Coffee plantations. Spanish Guinea achieved independence from Spain in March 1968 and became the Republic of Equatorial Guinea. Following multi-party elections, President Francisco Macías Nguema swiftly established absolute power. A third of the population fled the ensuing repression and the economy collapsed. Teodoro Obiang Nguema M'basogo, nephew of the President and commander of the National Guard, seized power in a coup in August 1979. Macias was arrested, tried and executed. Obiang has since remained in complete control despite several reported coup attempts and the formal acceptance of the principle of multi-party democracy in 1991. In March 2004, 14 people were arrested in Malabo and 67 in Harare, Zimbabwe for their alleged involvement in an attempted coup to overthrow the Government of Equatorial Guinea. All were tried and convicted in the country in which they were arrested. 62 of the men arrested in Zimbabwe and 6 Armenians in Malabo have since been released. In February 2008, the British national Simon Mann, an alleged coup plotter, was extradited from Zimbabwe to Malabo. However, in November 2009 he was released after receiving a presidential pardon.

In 1968 there was a constitution in place to formalize Republic status.

Equatorial-Guinea attained independence on October 12, 1968.

Headship since independence: Head of State

In 1972, first president Francisco Macías Nguema changed constitution to allow him rule for life.

In 1979 Francisco Macías Nguema was toppled in a military coup led by his nephew, the head of presidential guard (Aid-de-camp) Lt. Colonel Theodoro Obiang' Nguema.

The country has gone through major growth, especially after discovery of oil- now sub-Saharan third largest oil exporter.

A Republic in West Africa.

The now prominent Fang & Bubi tribes reached the mainland region in the seventeenth century through the so called, Bantu migrations, consisting of Rio-Muni on the main land & the island of Macias Nguema in the gulf of Guinea with four smaller islands ceded by Portugal to Spain in 1778, it's former name until 1964, was "Spanish Guinea". A tiny country, is one of the smallest countries in the African continent. A national constitution was drafted and ratified by 63% majority of Guineans-Guineans by referendum on the 11th of August, 1968. It achieved official independence, in October, 1968 as a united country after 190 years of Spanish rule. During independence, on the 12th of October, 1968, a former civil servant under the Spanish rule, has having occupied several positions under Spanish colonial rule that increased in importance and influence through time, called, Francisco Macias Nguema Biogo Masie inaugurated as the country's first post-colony president through pre-organized election by the Spanish colonists. In 1973, he named himself "president for life". In October 1979, president Francisco Macias Nguema Biogo was overthrown and was arrested when fled to the wooded areas to save his life, but was eventually caught, tried and executed after few weeks on the 29th of September, 1979. The coup was led by his nearest cousin, in the name of Lt. Colonel Theodoro Obiang Nguema Mbassogo, then commander (Aide-de-camp) of the presidential-bodyguard, who heads Equatorial Guinea since August, 1979. The country’s two presidents (one current the other former) changed their names at some point. President Theodoro Oiang Nguema Mbassogo has won more than 95% of the vote in the country's most recent elections of 1991, 1992, 2002, 2008. Notwithstanding that Mr. Theodoro Obiang Nguema won his recent national elections with 97% of the vote amid allegations of poll-rigging, that did not take long for his claim to be contradicted by a news black-out by the government controlled national broadcasting agency on protests in North African states of Tunisia & Egypt. Since early January, 2010. Equatorial Guinea has experienced rapid economic growth due to the discovery of large off-shore Oil reserves, and in the last decade has become sub-Saharan Africa's third largest Oil exporter.

Major Conflicts

Bloody Coup d'etat

When: August 3, 1979

Who: Francisco Macías Nguema Biogo

Why: Takeover of power

Outcome: Coup was successful

Politics

The government continues to battle opposition parties, most of which are operating from exile.

Presidential elections held on November 29, 2009, president Obiang’ Nguema Mbasogo garners 97 per cent of the total votes cast.

Economy

Majority in the population are sustained by agriculture supplemented by hunting and fishing

Bartering is the major aspect of the market

Country has no railway network

Exile and imprisonment of working population have drained the country's workforce

Government has been able to sustain itself due to rivalries of the countries benefiting from Equatorial Guinea resources.

Discovery of oil reserves has boosted country's growth in the recent years

Social

A destination country for women and children traffickers for forced labor and sexual exploitation.

Non-violent street crime on the rise.

Widening income gap between the haves and the have nots.

Endnote: French authorities have seized the Paris mansion of the son of Equatorial Guinea's leader as part of a money-laundering probe, officials confirm. Teodorin Nguema Obiang Mangue is currently being sought on corruption charges. His Paris villa is thought to be worth between 100m (£79m: $124m) and 150m Euros, the AFP news agency reports. Mr. Obiang, the 43-year-old son of President Teodoro Nguema Obiang Mbasogo, denies any wrongdoing. Authorities seized the six-storey property on July 19, a court official told the BBC. The luxury mansion is located on Avenue Foch in one the most prestigious neighborhoods of the French capital. A week earlier, Judge Roger Le Loire had issued an international search warrant after Mr Obiang refused to be interviewed by magistrates on charges of corruption. The allegations were brought forward by anti-corruption group Transparency International. The organization suspects Mr Obiang, as well his father and several other African leaders, of using state assets to acquire property in France. Mr Obiang's lawyer, Emmanuel Marsigny, told the AFP news agency in mid-July that he had not been informed that any mandate for his client's arrest had been issued. He added that any such warrant would be a "non-event" due to Mr Obiang's status. "Mr Obiang has judicial immunity as he is the vice-president of Equatorial Guinea and therefore could not attend the summons," Mr Marsigny said. Correspondents say Mr Obiang, who serves as agriculture minister, is known for his lavish lifestyle. He recently hit the headlines when he honored his promise to pay his national football team $1m (£641,000) for winning the opening game of the Africa Cup of Nations which Equatorial Guinea co-hosted earlier this year. In October 2011, the US government said it would seek to recover assets worth more $70m from Mr Obiang. A month earlier, French police seized some fifteen luxury cars belonging to Mr Obiang, including a Maserati, Aston Martin and Rolls Royce. Equatorial Guinea is one of Africa's largest oil exporters, but most of its 720,000-strong population lives in poverty. President Obiang seized power from his uncle in 1979 and was re-elected last year with 95% of the vote.

Accession to power of president Lt. Colonel Theodoro Obiang Nguema Mbassogo - 4th August, 1979 by coup.

Tentative election calendar- Presidential/Parliamentary, December.

Equatorial Guinea – Timeline Diaries updates, and related key notes:

1471 - Portuguese navigator Fernao do Po sights the island of Fernando Poo, which is now called Bioko.

1777 - Portuguese cedes islands of Annobon and Fernando Poo as well as rights on the mainland coast to Spain, giving it access to a source of slaves.

1844 - Spanish settle in what became the province of Rio Muni - mainland Equatorial Guinea.

1904 - Fernando Poo and Rio Muni become the Western African Territories, which later renamed Spanish Guinea.

1968 - Spanish Guinea granted independence and becomes the Republic of Equatorial Guinea with Francisco Macias Nguema as founder president.

1972 – Francisco Macias Nguema Biogo becomes president for life.

1979 – President Fransisco Macias Nguema Biogo ousted in military coup led by his nephew Aid de camp, Lt. Colonel Teodoro Obiang Nguema Mbasogo. Francisco Macias Nguema killed in a speedy court trial adjourned.

1993 - First multi-party elections are generally condemned as fraudulent and are boycotted by the opposition.

February 1996 - President Obiang Nguema Mbasogo wins 99% of votes in election amid reports of widespread irregularities.

March 1996 - Mobil oil corporation announces it has discovered sizeable new oil and gas reserves.

January 1998 - Amnesty International reports the arrest of scores of people - mostly from the Bubi minority - in the wake of attacks on military posts on Bioko island.

June 1998 - Military tribunal sentences 15 people to death for separatist attacks on Bioko island.

March 1999- Ruling Democratic Party of Equatorial Guinea wins majority of seats in parliamentary elections condemned as fraudulent. Dozens of members of main opposition Popular Union are arrested.

2001 - Economy emerges as one of world's fastest-growing because of oil exploitation.
Opposition says trickle-down effect of growth is too slow, too small.

March 2001 - Eight exiled opposition parties form a coalition in Spain to overhaul politics at home, saying democracy under Obiang is a sham.

July 2001 - Exiled politician Florentino Ecomo Nsogo, head of the Party of Reconstruction and Social Well-Being (PRBS), returns home as the first opposition figure to respond to an appeal by President Obiang Nguema, who wants opposition parties to register.

June 2002 - Court jails 68 people for up to 20 years for alleged coup plot against President Obiang Nguema. They include main opposition leader Placido Mico Abogo. EU is concerned that confessions were obtained under duress. Amnesty International says many defendants showed signs of torture.

December 2002 - President Obiang Nguema re-elected. Authorities say he won 100% of the vote. Opposition leaders had pulled out of the poll, citing fraud and irregularities.

August 2003 - Exiled opposition leaders form self-proclaimed government-in-exile in Madrid, Spain.

Opposition leader Placido Mico Abogo and 17 other political prisoners released.

March 2004 - Suspected mercenaries arrested over alleged coup attempt: group is linked to suspected mercenaries detained in Zimbabwe. Crackdown on immigrants ensues: hundreds of foreigners deported.

April 2004 - Parliamentary elections: President Obiang's party and its allies take 98 of 100 seats. Foreign observers criticize poll and result.

August 2004 -November- Foreigners accused of plotting coup to overthrow President Obiang are tried in Malabo. Their South African leader is sentenced to 34 years in jail.

Foreigners in coup plot: Dozens of alleged mercenaries were intercepted in Zimbabwe. Simon Mann, the British leader of a group of mercenaries accused of involvement in the alleged coup plot and arrested in Zimbabwe, is tried in Harare and sentenced to seven years in jail there. His sentence is later reduced to four years on appeal.

January 2005 - Sir Mark Thatcher, son of former British PM Margaret Thatcher, tells a South African court that he helped to finance the alleged 2004 coup plot, but did so unwittingly.

June 2005 - President amnesties six Armenians convicted of taking part in the alleged 2004 coup plot.

July 2005 - 55 people killed when passenger aircraft crashes shortly after take-off from Malabo.

September 2005 - Military court jails 23 defendants, most of them military officers, who are accused of plotting a coup in 2004.

December 2005 - Spain withdraws the asylum status of exiled opposition leader Severo Moto saying he was involved in several coup attempts.

August 2006 - The government resigns en masse. The president had accused it of corruption and poor leadership. Key ministers are reappointed.

October 2006 - President Obiang says Equatorial Guinea plans to double its revenue share from oil production contracts.

May 2007 - New airline launched to replace the national carrier EGA which was forced to shut over safety concerns.

November 2007 - Four Equatorial Guineans sentenced for alleged role in 2004 coup plot.

February 2008 - British mercenary Simon Mann is extradited from Zimbabwe to Equatorial Guinea to stand trial for his alleged role in 2004 coup plot.

March 2008 - Spain restores exiled opposition leader Severo Moto's asylum status.

April 2008 - Spanish police arrest Mr Moto on suspicion of trying to ship weapons to Equatorial Guinea.

July 2008 - President Obiang accepts resignation of the entire government, accusing it of corruption and mismanagement: appoints Ignacio Milam Tang as new prime minister.

British mercenary Simon Mann and four South Africans sentenced to 34 years in prison for taking part in 2004 coup plot. They are pardoned and released in November 2009.

October 2008 - Cameroon charges two policemen with kidnapping rebel colonel Cipriano Nguema Mba and returning him to Equatorial Guinea, which denies all knowledge.

February 2009 - Presidential palace allegedly comes under attack. Seven Nigerians are later jailed over the incident.

November 2009 - Presidential elections. President Obiang wins again.

August 2010 - Four alleged coup plotters are executed within hours of being found guilty.

October 2010 - United Nations agency UNESCO drops plans to grant a prize sponsored by President Obiang Nguema

November 2010 - French appeal court authorizes probe of corruption charges against three African heads of state, including President Obiang.

June 2010 - Amnesty International alleges wave of arrests targeting political opponents, migrants and students ahead of African Union summit in Malabo.

November 2011 - Referendum on constitutional changes, which critics describe as a power grab.

January 2012 - Equatorial Guinea co-hosts Africa Cup of Nations with Gabon, the continent's biggest football tournament.

President's son, Teodorin, asks US court to dismiss a US bid to seize $71 million worth of his assets, denying they were obtained through corruption.

May 2012 - Teodorin is promoted to vice president.

January 17, 2015: Equatorial Guinea hosts the final of the African Cup of Nations.

The Cup of African Nations (CAN) as co-founded by the Sudan, Ethiopia and Egypt in 1957 (SUDAN) to 2015 (EQUATORIAL GUINEA)

List of winners:

In 1957 – Egypt (Sudan)

In 1959 – Egypt (Egypt)

In 1962 – Ethiopia (Ethiopia)

In 1963 – Ghana (Ghana)

In 1965 – Ghana (Tunisia)

In 1968 – Congo-Kinshasa (Ethiopia)

In 1970 – Sudan (Sudan)

In 1972 – Congo Brazaville (Cameroon)

In 1974 – Zaire (Egypt)

In 1976 – Morocco (Ethiopia)

In 1978 – Ghana (Ghana)

In 1980 – Nigeria (Nigeria)

In 1982 – Ghana (Libya)

In 1984 – Cameroon (Ivory Coast)

In 1986 – Egypt (Egypt)

In 1988 – Cameroon (Morocco)

In 1990 – Algeria (Algeria)

In 1992 – Cote D' Ivoire (Senegal)

In 1994 – Nigeria (Tunisia)

In 1996 – South Africa (South Africa)

In 1998 – Egypt (Burkina Faso)

In 2000 – Cameroon (Ghana and Nigeria)

In 2002 – Cameroon (Mali)

In 2004 – Tunisia (Tunisia)

In 2006 – Egypt (Egypt)

In 2008 – Egypt (Ghana)

In 2010 – Egypt (Angola)

In 2012 – Zambia (Equatorial Guinea and Gabon)

In 2013 – Nigeria (South Africa)

In 2015 – Cote D' Ivoire (Equatorial Guinea) claimed the 2015 title with a 9-8 shootout win against Ghana following a 0-0 draw after extra time on Sunday the 8th of February, 2015

Note well! Host countries in brackets:

Formerly Zaire/Congo-Kinshasa:now known as Democratic Republic of the Congo. Formerly Ivory Coast: now known as Cote D'Ivoire

Guinée équatoriale (Guinée espagnole)
Footnotes: https://www.axl.cefan.ulaval.ca/afrique/guinee_equatoriale.htm

Qui étaient les dictateurs africains les plus impitoyables qui aient jamais vécu ?/ Who were the most ruthless African dictators that ever lived?

Guillaume Bonnet L'histoire est une chance pour les vivantsTraducteur · 1 an Suivre Les cinq premiers sont :

1. Idi Amin Oumi (Dada) (Uganda: 1971-1979)

Il est également connu sous le nom de "Boucher d'Ouganda". Le régime d'Idi Amin était caractérisé par des rumeurs de cannibalisme, d'effrayantes violations des droits de l'homme, de répression politique, de plusieurs exécutions extrajudiciaires, de corruption et de mauvaise gestion économique. Des observateurs internationaux et des groupes de défense des droits de l'homme estiment à environ 500 000 morts dans son régime.

2. Omar Hassan Al-Bashir (Sudan: 1989–2019)

Le président soudanais, Omar al-Bashir est le chef du Soudan depuis 1989, lorsqu'il a pris le pouvoir lors d'un coup d'État militaire. Al-Bashir est l'un des dictateurs les plus brutaux d'Afrique et malgré le mandat de la CPI contre lui; il reste le président du Soudan.

La Cour pénale internationale veut condamner Omar el-Béchir pour génocide, crimes de guerre, meurtre, viol, torture et autres crimes contre l'humanité pour ses crimes au Darfour.

3. Robert Gabriel Mugabe (Zimbabwe: 1987-Nov. 21, 2017)

Robert Gabriel Mugabe, ancien président du Zimbabwe et l'un des plus anciens dictateurs d'Afrique. Il était au pouvoir depuis 1980, lorsqu'il était premier ministre du Zimbabwe. Il a consolidé son pouvoir pour devenir président le 31 décembre 1987. Après trente ans au pouvoir, à la suite de ce qui semblait être un coup d'État, il sentait le coup d'État, il a démissionné de ses fonctions.

Les Nations Unies estiment que le chômage au Zimbabwe pourrait atteindre 80%, l'économie du Zimbabwe est en ruine et l'espérance de vie des hommes et des femmes est un peu plus de 50 ans. L'hyperinflation massive a rendu la monnaie locale du Zimbabwe sans valeur, le taux de change du dollar zimbabwéen est de 35 quadrillions (ndt : 35,000,000,000,000,000) pour 1 $ US. La monnaie locale a été retirée et remplacée par le dollar américain et le rand sud-africain, ce qui a conduit à l'effondrement de l'industrie manufacturière au Zimbabwe.

4. Francisco Macías Nguema Mbasogo (Equatorial Guinea: 1968-1979)

Francisco Nguema a été le premier président de la Guinée équatoriale; il a gouverné la Guinée équatoriale avant que son neveu en 1979 ne le renverse et condamné à mort par peloton d'exécution pour génocide et autres crimes qu'il a commis. Il était brutal et apparemment dérangé, et il est l'un des pires dictateurs de l'histoire de l'Afrique moderne.

Pendant son régime, il s'est accordé "tous les pouvoirs directs du gouvernement et des institutions". Il a ordonné la mort de familles et de villages entiers; il a exécuté des membres de sa famille, un tiers de la population a fui le pays, il a ordonné que tous les bateaux du pays soient vendus ou détruits et a interdit à tous les citoyens du littoral d'empêcher plus de gens d'échapper à sa terreur.

5. Hissene Habre (Chad: 1982-1990)

Hissène Habré a pris le pouvoir en 1982 à Goukouni Oueddei, qui venait d’être élu président.Il a perdu le pouvoir et s'est exile avec sa famille au Senegal lorsque qu’en 1990 son commandant militaire Idriss Deby, en rebellion contre lui est entre a Ndjamena, soutenu par des forces exterieures. Hissein Habre a regne huit (8) sur le Tchad.

Le gouvernement de Hissène Habré a commis 40 000 meurtres effrayants à motivation politique, et il y a des cas documentés d'au moins 200 000 tortures dans le règne brutal de Habre.

En mai 2016, il a été reconnu coupable de crimes contre l'humanité.

Sources:

Most Brutal and Ruthless Dictators in Africa — African Vault

Questions similaires

Qui fut le dictateur le plus incompétent du monde ?

Quels descendants de dictateurs ont eu une vie intéressante et/ou inattendue ?

Y a-t-il déjà eu des dictateurs qui reconnaissaient sans détour qu'ils étaient des dictateurs ?

Quelles étaient les manies qu'avaient certains dictateurs ?

Les dictateurs des pays d’Afrique, sont-ils vraiment maîtres de leur destin, ou sont-ils appuyés et imposés par d'autres pays puissants ?

Quel fut selon vous le pire dictateur Africain ?

Qui est le dictateur le plus fou encore en vie ?

Est-il déjà arrivé qu'un dictateur soit un bon dictateur pour son pays et que les habitants appréciaient le dictateur ?

A-t-il existé des dictateurs éclairés qui ont réellement fait le bien de leur pays ?

Quels sont les moments surprenants où un dictateur était humain ?

La dictature est-elle toujours mauvaise ? L'histoire n'a-t-elle pas d'exemples de bonnes dictatures / dictateurs ?

Y a-t-il un dictateur qui a exterminé son propre peuple ?

À quoi ressemblerait le monde si tous les dictateurs étaient encore au pouvoir et/ou vivants ? Quel ancien président était considéré comme un dictateur et il s'est avéré qu'il ne l'était pas et qu'il a été tué pour rien ?

Certains dictateurs ont-ils été bons pour leur pays ?

Quels sont les pays d'Afrique menés par des chefs d'état autoritaires voire dictateurs desquels la France devrait prendre ses distances ?

Quel pays Africain les Africains détestent-ils le plus ?

Teodoro Obiang Nguema Mbasogo (Guinée Equatoriale) 95,4%

Michaël Brisson Électron libre 2 ans

Au pouvoir depuis le coup d'Etat qui a renversé son oncle en 1979, Nguema a été élu pour la cinquième fois en 2009. Avant ce scrutin, il avait promis de faire mieux que lors de la présidentielle de 2002, où il avait récolté plus de 97% des suffrages. C'est raté. Nguema a dû se contenter d'un petit 95,4%. L'ONG Human Rights Watch qualifie Nguema de «dictateur déterminé à rester au pouvoir et à garder le contrôle de l'argent du pétrole», et estime que le gouvernement du pays «est un des plus corrompus et répressifs du monde».

Le journaliste Peter Maass, dans un article pour Slate Magazine - Politics, Business, Technology, and the Arts, le qualifiait de «pire dictateur d'Afrique» en 2008. Nguema a promis(encore) lors de sa dernière cérémonie d'investiture, en présence de représentants officiels de la France, «la participation de toutes les forces politiques de la Nation dans la gestion de la chose politique, afin d'avoir un consensus» pouvant garantir «la paix, la stabilité et le développement économique». Le président, âgé de 68 ans, souffre d'un cancer de la prostate et de problèmes cardiaques, mais la Guinée Equatoriale, troisième producteur de pétrole de l'Afrique sub-saharienne, n'en a sans doute pas fini avec la famille Nguema. Le fils Teodorin, qui a un penchant pour tout ce qui brille et qui coûte (très) cher, devrait prendre la succession de son père
Suivre Michaël Brisson

Questions similaires

Pourquoi les Africains ont-ils aidé à vendre d'autres Africains pour l'esclavage ?
Quels sont les pays africains qui sont culturellement dominants ?
Que pensent les Africains des Blancs qui se considèrent comme Africains ?

Les gens des pays africains qui parlent français détestent-ils la France et la langue française ?

Pouvez-vous voir une différence entre les Africains ?
Pourquoi les africains veulent toujours l'Europe ?
Pourquoi les Africains sont-ils pauvres ?

Pourquoi les Africains subsahariens traitent-ils les Nord-africains comme s'ils n'étaient pas africains ?

Les Sud-Africains blancs peuvent-ils se considérer comme des Africains ?
Pourquoi les Africains veulent-ils quitter l'Afrique au détriment de l'Europe?
Quel pays africain donnerais-tu tout pour habiter ? Pourquoi ?
Quel est, à votre avis, le pays le plus intéressant de l'Afrique ?
Que trouvez-vous différent en Afrique ?

Quels sont les pays du monde qui enfoncent toujours l'Afrique dans la pauvreté ?

En tant qu'Africain, êtes-vous capable de reconnaître le pays d'origine d'un autre Africain en observant simplement son physique ?

Que pensez-vous du sentiment anti français qui évolue actuellement au Mali ?

Pourquoi autant de pays se nomment-ils Guinée ?

Olivier Gakwaya · Suivre jeu.

Dimitri Ken Féru d'histoire 24 janv.

Pour commencer, faisons l'inventaire de tous les pays qui se nomment Guinée :

Guinée-Bissau
Guinée Équatoriale

Guinée (encore appelée Guinée Conakry)

Papouasie-Nouvelle-Guinée

Ça en fait 4. Mais alors, pourquoi autant de Guinées ?

Le mot « Guinée » vient probablement d'un ancien mot berbère, qui signifie « peau sombre ». Ce terme était utilisé pour nommer une large portion de l'Afrique.

Source en fin de réponse.

Lorsque des siècles plus tard, les puissances européennes ont commencé à coloniser l'Afrique, plusieurs d'entre elles ont ainsi adopté indépendamment le nom Guinée. Il y a eu :

La Guinée portugaise ;
La Guinée suédoise/danoise/néerlandaise, qui est plus tard devenue la Gold Coast (actuel Ghana) ;

La Guinée française ;
La Guinée espagnole.

Lors de la décolonisation, la Guinée française a obtenu son indépendance la première, et s'est donc appelée tout simplement Guinée.

20 ans plus tard, la Guinée portugaise a obtenu son indépendance et est devenue la Guinée-Bissau.

En gagnant son indépendance, la Guinée espagnole est devenue Guinée équatoriale, à cause de sa localisation par rapport à l'Équateu

Parlons maintenant de l'autre Guinée, celle qui n'est pas africaine. L'île, initialement appelée Papouasie, a été renommée Nouvelle Guinée par les explorateurs espagnols. La raison ? Il n'y avait selon eux aucune différence de phénotype entre Papouasiens et Ouest-Africains…

© Pascale Sury

4 siècles plus tard, lorsque le territoire a gagné son indépendance, ils ont décidé de combiner l'ancienne dénomination (Papouasie) avec la contemporaine (Nouvelle Guinée). Ainsi naquit la Papouasie-Nouvelle-Guinee

Source : History Matters (2022), Why are so many countries called Guinea? (Short Animated Documentary), lien.

Related Answer
Who is the most brutal dictator in recent history?

Lara Novakov (ლარა ნოვაკოვი) interested in history Answered Feb 19, 2017 · Upvoted by Lyonel Perabo, B.A. in History. M.A in related field (Folkloristics)

Ever heard of Francisco Macias Nguema?

He was the president of Equatorial Guinea (1968 until 1979). For those who don't know where is Equatorial Guinea located:

Nguema is still known as one of the most brutal dictators in the recent history of Africa. Even though his rule wasn't as long as the rule of other dictators on the continent, he managed to build a negative reputation nevertheless. He cultivated a Cult of personality - Wikipedia and was not only corrupted, but extremely cruel. He killed approximately 80,000 people in the country (out of the total population of 400,000 at that time). Some reports say that half of the country's population at the time fled the country. He cultivated a personality cult, changed the national motto to "There is no other God than Macías Nguema" and during his reign, the country was also known as the Dachau of Africa due to his brutality over the population.

At the very end of his rule, most of the intellectuals and educated people in general fled the country or were killed. He was overthrown in a bloody coup by his nephew Teodoro Obiang Nguema who sentenced him to death for the genocide against the Bubi - Minority Rights Group people. Yes, he was overthrown after his bloody rule of the country, but his nephew went down his steps and is rulling the country with an iron fist and has been the president for almost 38 years now.

Many portals place EG as one of the richest countries in the world (GDP wise) due to the abundance of oil it has. But much like his uncle, Teodoro is brutal and cracks down on any opposition.

In other words, EG went from one brutality to another.

Related Links

Has there ever been a good dictator at any point in history? If so, which ones were good?

Do you have any examples of dictators that actually did their country good?

Is dictatorship always wrong? Doesn't history have any examples of good dictatorships/dictators?

Who are the most Hitler-like dictators in history besides him?
Who were the most incompetent dictators of all time?
Who is the most brutal dictator in recent history?
Who was the strangest dictator in human history?
Who is the most successful benevolent dictator?
Which dictator (if any) is worthy of respecting?
What strange obsessions did dictators have?
What are surprising moments of kindness that a dictator has shown?
What mistakes do dictators always make?
Which dictator wore the best-looking uniform?
Who was or is the worst ever dictator in your country?
Are there any good dictators in power today?
Any benevolent dictators that make good leaders and benefit the people?

Réponse similaire
Quel pays Africain les Africains détestent-ils le plus ?

Michaël Brisson , Électron libre Répondu 31 mars 2019

5- Teodoro Obiang Nguema Mbasogo (Guinée Equatoriale), 95,4%

Au pouvoir depuis le coup d'Etat qui a renversé son oncle en 1979, Nguema a été élu pour la cinquième fois en 2009. Avant ce scrutin, il avait promis de faire mieux que lors de la présidentielle de 2002, où il avait récolté plus de 97% des suffrages. C'est raté. Nguema a dû se contenter d'un petit 95,4%. L'ONG Human Rights Watch qualifie Nguema de «dictateur déterminé à rester au pouvoir et à garder le contrôle de l'argent du pétrole», et estime que le gouvernement du pays «est un des plus corrompus et répressifs du monde».

Le journaliste Peter Maass, dans un article pour Slate Magazine - Politics, Business, Technology, and the Arts, le qualifiait de «pire dictateur d'Afrique» en 2008. Nguema a promis(encore) lors de sa dernière cérémonie d'investiture, en présence de représentants officiels de la France, «la participation de toutes les forces politiques de la Nation dans la gestion de la chose politique, afin d'avoir un consensus» pouvant garantir «la paix, la stabilité et le développement économique». Le président, âgé de 68 ans, souffre d'un cancer de la prostate et de problèmes cardiaques, mais la Guinée Equatoriale, troisième producteur de pétrole de l'Afrique sub-saharienne, n'en a sans doute pas fini avec la famille Nguema. Le fils Teodorin, qui a un penchant pour tout ce qui brille et qui coûte (très) cher, devrait prendre la succession de son père

Questions similaires

Quelles sont les grandes civilisations africaines d'avant l'influence européenne ?

Y a-t-il eu de grandes civilisations en Afrique sub-saharienne ?

Pourquoi ne parle-t-on pas de l'Amérique ancienne autant que d'autres civilisations anciennes ?

Pourquoi l'Afrique n'a-t-elle pas réussi à développer une civilisation sophistiquée, capable de rivaliser avec les civilisations asiatiques et européennes ?

Pourquoi l'Afrique a-t-elle été nommée d'après l'ancienne civilisation tunisienne, Africa, et non après l'Égypte, une civilisation beaucoup plus grande ?

À propos de l'Afrique, qui est un continent vraiment immense avec des preuves des premiers établissements humains, comment se fait-il que son histoire soit si peu documentée, à l'exception de l'Égypte ? (Question traduite)

Que sait-on des civilisations africaines qui ont sillonné les mers avant 1492?

Les seules civilisations anciennes avancées d'Afrique se trouvaient en Afrique du Nord, alors qu'il n'y en a eu pratiquement aucune en Afrique subsaharienne. À cause de ça, je commence à détester être noir. Est-ce que c'est mal ?

L'incapacité du monde à dire que l'Égypte ancienne était une civilisation noire est-elle le plus grand exemple de vol culturel de l'histoire du monde ?

Pourquoi dire de l'Égypte ancienne qu'elle est d'abord une civilisation noire ?

Réponse similaire
Pourquoi la Guinée équatoriale a-t-elle sa capitale sur une île qui semble appartenir au Cameroun?

Michel Ménard Technicien radio VHF/UHF Passion: avions, contrôle aérien
Répondu 24 juil. 2020

Réponse originale : Pourquoi la Guinée équatoriale a sa capitale sur une île qui semble appartenir au Cameroon ?

Qu'est ce qui vous fait dire celà ??? La capitale de la Guinée Équatoriale est Malabo , celle-ci se trouve sur l'île de Bioko qui n'appartient nullement pas au Cameroon , ni même au Cameroun ……

Géolocalisation sur la carte : Guinée équatoriale

Bioko est une île du golfe de Guinée faisant partie de la Guinée équatoriale.!!!

Une simple consultation d'Internet et vous aviez la réponse…..!

Source : Wikipédia, l'encyclopédie libre

Guinée équatoriale / Bioko

Why did Teodoro Obiang Nguema Mbasogo (current president/dictator of Equatorial Guinea) betray, overthrow and execute his dictator uncle Francisco Macías-Nguema in 1979?

Aurelio Germes · Follow Lived in Malabo, Equatorial Guinea Updated Apr 25

Macías Nguema was not just a crazy person, he was mentally insane. I will not write about the possible causes of his illness, since I am not a doctor, but just his acts as president of Equatorial Guinea.

Under Spanish rule, Macías was an administrative clerk working closely with the Spaniards. He did not excel at anything, was not a radical pro-independence, and was always faithful to the Spanish government.

Equatorial Guinea got its independence from Spain in 1968 and in the country's general elections to elect the first president Macías obtained the majority of votes in a second round, defeating the expected winner, Bonifacio Ondó, who had been exiled in Gabon for the previous years. Bonifacio Ondó was killed in Bata by Macías the following year.

As part of the independence agreement, Spain was to continue working closely with the new independent government to train the people in all matters on the administration, budget, police, and defense of the new country, but soon Macias resented their interference that somehow curtailed his powers, or so he thought, and just a few months after the independence, in March 1969, the sent his paramilitary force, "the JMM or Juventud en Marcha con Macias" (Youth on the March with Macias) to harass the Spaniards still living in the country, resulting in riots and violent killings of some of the Spaniards. By the end of that month, March 1969, almost all Spaniards, many of them born in the country and lived there all their lives, had to flee the country, leaving all their possessions behind. The rest left the country shortly after.

Without a proper administration, the country went into chaos. Macias established three security forces, the Guardia Nacional (national guard), the JMM, and the Militia, which were embedded in every level of government. The number of crimes punished by death expanded, as the police monitored every level of life. He used his knowledge of traditional witchcraft to bolster his legitimacy and terrify the population into submission. In March 1969, he close the country to the outside world. and had fishing boats burned and roads mined to prevent escape. He rewarded suspicious acts of treason, so parents were fearful that their children would betray and denounce them.

The whole economy went under. and 90 percent of public services—including electric, power, mail, and transport—came to a standstill. Civil servants stopped working after several months without being paid. Agriculture production, such as cocoa and coffee which were the main source of income, stopped completely.

He banned Western medicine, claiming it to be "un-African". As a source of income, he ransomed foreigners—$57,600 for a German woman; $40,000 for a Spanish professor; or $6,000 for the corpse of a Soviet citizen but there was a very limited stock since all foreigners had already left after the first couple of years.

He abolished religion, shuttered churches to use as weapons caches, and jailed or expelled priests. Priests were forced to preach that "God created Equatorial Guinea, thanks to papa Macias" and made the country's motto "There is no other God than Macias Nguema."

He waged a war on intellectuals, whom he cited as the "greatest problem facing Africa today," and claimed that the educated classes were "polluting our climate with foreign culture." By the end of his reign, only two doctors and fewer than a dozen technical school graduates remained.

Macias also created a cult of personality, renaming the island then known as Fernando Poo (now Bioko) "Macias Nguema Biyogo," after himself, and assuming such titles as "Great Master of Popular Education, Science, and Traditional Culture" and "The Only Miracle of Equatorial Guinea." As his jealousy and paranoia grew, he ordered the execution of all former lovers of his mistresses, as well as the husbands of the women he coveted. Before traveling abroad for state visits, Macias had political prisoners executed to dissuade others from conspiring against him in his absence.

By Christmas 1974, refugees fleeing Equatorial Guinea to Cameroon, Gabon, and Spain were claiming that Macias had ordered the execution of more than 300 people since 1968. The first to be arrested and killed were 11 members of the autonomous government that had ruled the country before Macias' ascent in 1968. Subsequently, purges included 22 high-ranking officials from Macias' government, including 10 of the original 12 cabinet ministers he appointed; nine members out of the 35-member National Assembly; five members of the state's two Provincial Councils; two of the six members of the Council of the Republic; 67 civil servants; at least two dozen army and police officers and non-commissioned officers; and an indeterminate number of doctors, students, and others deemed to be intellectuals or political opponents. Most victims were garroted and forced to kneel before the backs of their skulls were shattered by the blow of a machete or iron bar; others were beaten with whips and sticks. In one case at least, 36 people were told to dig a ditch in which they were subsequently buried up to their necks and left to be eaten by red ants. By 1978, the violence and depravity had reached such a level that Swedish researcher Robert af Klinteberg labeled Equatorial Guinea the “concentration camp of Africa, a cottage industry Dachau.”

It is estimated that the total number of deaths attributed to the Macias regime during its eleven-year reign generally ranges from 20,000 to 50,000. During the Special Military Tribunal, Macias was initially indicted for 80,000 murders, although he was later found guilty of 500. The figure of 80,000 corresponds to the estimates of murders cited by exiles interviewed in Madrid after Macias’ fall. Other sources have placed the number as high as 100,000—approximately one-third of the country’s population. Entire towns were nearly abandoned, pillaged, or suffered multiple mass reprisals.

There were rumors of cannibalism by Macías, usually from their killed opponents, but it was never confirmed officially.

The above is a summary of the horror suffered during Macías's rule in the country. So, it is not surprising that somebody, including his nephew Teodoro Obiang, decided to overthrow him in a coup d’etat.

Sadly, Obiang himself did not stand up to the expected hopes that everybody had of him. Even far from his uncle’s atrocities, the country never achieved the rights of free democracy, and despite the revenues from the petroleum found in the early 1990s, the country is still poor with revenues going to family and friends of the president.

Obiang has remained president of the country for 43 years up to today.

Related Links

Where does the President of Equatorial Guinea Teodoro Obiang Nguema Mbasogo live?

How has Teodoro Obiang Nguema Mbasogo, president of Equatorial Guinea, managed to remain in power for such a long time?

Which of these African dictators are the worse: Robert Mugabe, Teodoro Obiang, or Isaias Afwerki?

Has there ever been a dictator crazier than Francisco Macías Nguema?
Who was the greatest dictator ever?

Has there ever been a good dictator at any point in history? If so, which ones were good?

What are the main accomplishments of Teodoro Obiiang Nguema Mbasogo as the president of Equatorial Guinea? Will he leave power anytime soon or is he staying forever?

Who was the African dictator who ruled his country the longest?
What do you think of Equatoguinean President Teodoro Obiang Nguema Mbasogo?

When is Teodoro Obiang Nguema Mbasogo going to step down from the…..

How has Teodoro Obiang Nguema Mbasogo, president of Equatorial Guinea, managed to remain in power for such a long time?

Mmaduabuchi Obinelo , Entrepreneur, Writer, Blogger and a Pan- African (2010-present) Answered Jan 24, 2019

Leaders who stay long in power for so long use some methods to keep themselves into power. These methods vary according to nations and people who they govern. It is often said the key instrument of the power in the minds of the oppressed. Of they can take hold of the minds of the people in the country and make them believe their one-man upmanship, they can stay as long as they can.

In the case of Obiang Nguema of Equatorial Guinea, he used so many methods to maintain his grip of power for such a long time. He made sure he suppressed the opposition parties in the country and created a strong man nation instead of a strong institutionalized country. His dominance over the opposition gave him the huge advantage of the wealth of the nation. A country which is very rich with little population yet the vast majority is living poverty because their leadership is not in any way transparent to them. They were subjected to such kind of leadership where freedom of expression and information dissemination is scuffled by the president. Poverty became a tool to keep the people submissive so that they can easily be manipulated.

Nepotism is one of the things he used to make sure his proxies are placed in strategic positions So that he can have unwavering loyalty from them. His proxies are the key decision makers in the country and no one within his ranks is resistant to his policies. He managed to mortgage the resources of his country with these guys and they made sure he stays as long as he can because they fear that if another leader comes, they may no longer have the opportunity to steal from their people. You can see that he has his son as the vice president, there is more loyalty to their family dynasty in such situations. If it was another person outside his cycle they may agitate for their own chance of leading the country. His son can be more patient and tolerant because he knows that whenever his dad leaves he will be succeeding him. Such level of nepotism keeps leaders in power for decades.

He has been able to take away the attention of the world and the African leaders form events in his country. His is one of the skillful things long-serving leaders know how to do best. They use the multinationals in the country to make good public relations about the country. They make them know that their interests are not tampered with and they will do all they can to have think-tank groups who will influence some narratives about the country. They also know how to present their country to their regional blocs so that they don't see some lapses in their leadership. They will oppressively use their national media institutions and buy more pro-government dailies and media houses to blow the trumpet for them. These infiltrates the media and in so doing makes many things go unreported in the country. Nguema has used these methods as well to hijack press freedom and ensured the oppositions are dismantled.

He had also used unwarranted amendments of the constitution of Equatorial Guinea to make sure his term limits are not a stumbling block to his ambitions. Having power over other organs of government he easily influenced all of them to always amend the constitution. So his tenure elongation becomes constitutional against the wishes of the people. All these are only attained in a society where they have lack of checks and balances of power.

He has also used the electoral bodies to rig his way in tense elections. The government makes sure that whoever dares to contest against it is rigged out. Sometimes they use other oppressive methods to crush the opposition. These and many others techniques has kept Nguema in power since 1979 he got into power in Equatorial Guinea.

Related Links

Where does the President of Equatorial Guinea Teodoro Obiang Nguema Mbasogo live?

How has Teodoro Obiang Nguema Mbasogo, president of Equatorial Guinea, managed to remain in power for such a long time?

Which of these African dictators are the worse: Robert Mugabe, Teodoro Obiang, or Isaias Afwerki?
Has there ever been a dictator crazier than Francisco Macías Nguema?
Who was the greatest dictator ever?

Has there ever been a good dictator at any point in history? If so, which ones were good?

What are the main accomplishments of Teodoro Obiiang Nguema Mbasogo as the president of Equatorial Guinea? Will he leave power anytime soon or is he staying forever?

Who was the African dictator who ruled his country the longest?
What do you think of Equatoguinean President Teodoro Obiang Nguema Mbasogo?

When is Teodoro Obiang Nguema Mbasogo going to step down from the position of a President of Equatorial

Quel est l'acte le plus étrange réalisé par un leader mondial ?

Alexandre Kobalt · Suivre Blogger chez Profits IntemporelsTraducteur · 1 an

Shgdrn Mjh Ancien (ne) étudiant(e) en BS Degree in History

What is the strangest act carried out by a world leader?
Quel est l'acte le plus étrange réalisé par un leader mondial ?

Jean-Bédel Bokassa (1921 - 1996) était un dirigeant politique et militaire centrafricain qui a été le deuxième président de la République centrafricaine jusqu'à ce qu'il se déclare "Empereur". Bokassa a été à la tête de la République centrafricaine pendant quatorze ans et a déclaré son propre couronnement de Bokassa Ier comme empereur en 1977 dans un stade de sport. Le couronnement était presque une copie exacte du couronnement de Napoléon en 1804 et était marqué par le luxe et le faste. Le "couronnement" a coûté VINGT MILLIONS DE DOLLARS - un montant égal au revenu annuel de dix mille de ses sujets. Bokassa a acheté cent berlines Mercedes-Benz noires pour le couronnement. On l'appelait "l'événement où tous ceux qui participaient qui n'étaient pas présents".

Le dictateur militaire Idi Amin Dada - également connu sous le nom de "Boucher de l'Ouganda" - a dirigé l'Ouganda d'une main de fer pendant huit ans. Idid Amin était grand (1m93). Il était connu pour ses cascades au cours desquelles il s'est pris une balle de fusil de calibre 22 dans les dents. On lui a diagnostiqué la syphilis. Un médecin israélien qui avait servi en Ouganda a déclaré : "Ce n'est un secret pour personne qu'Amin souffre de syphilis à un stade avancé, qui a causé des lésions cérébrales". Amin était un cannibale.

Il a assassiné 500 000 personnes (4% de la population ougandaise). Les méthodes d'assassinat d'Amin sont devenues de plus en plus sadiques. Il gardait des têtes humaines dans son réfrigérateur. Il a ordonné que 4 000 handicapés soient jetés dans le Nil pour être mangés par des crocodiles. Et il a avoué le cannibalisme à plusieurs reprises : "J'ai mangé de la viande humaine", a-t-il déclaré en 1976. "Elle est très salée, encore plus salée que la viande de léopard".

Le Premier ministre camerounais (en fait un dictateur) Paul Biya a déjà remporté une élection avec 99,98 % des voix.

Le magazine SPY a un jour envoyé à treize des personnes les plus riches du monde des chèques de 13 centimes pour savoir qui les encaisserait. Les seules personnes à le faire étaient un marchand d'armes et Donald Trump. (Trump a intenté un procès infructueux contre Timothy O'Brien - auteur d'un livre intitulé TrumpNation : The Art of Being Donald - pour 5 millions de dollars parce qu'il l'avait traité de millionnaire au lieu de milliardaire).

Lors de la réunion du G7 de 2017 à Taormina (en Sicile) en Italie, alors que les dirigeants du Royaume-Uni, de l'Italie, de l'Allemagne, de la France, du Japon et du Canada se promenaient dans les petites rues pavées de la vieille ville, Trump les a suivis dans une voiturette de golf.

Et puis il y a ça :

et ça :

Notez que, jusqu'à présent, Trump n'a signé personnellement que deux instruments écrits qui seront à jamais commémorés dans la bibliothèque présidentielle de Trump.

a été abattu lors d'un discours mais a continué à parler pendant 84 minutes.

Le 14 octobre 1912, alors que l'ancien président, Theodore Roosevelt, prononçait un discours à Milwaukee, il a été abattu par un assassin du nom de John Schrank. La foule choquée a regardé Roosevelt révéler sa chemise trempée de sang et une pile de remarques préparées avec un trou de balle.

La balle s'était logée près de ses côtes et y resterait jusqu'à la fin de sa vie.

En mai 2009, le Premier ministre britannique Gordon Brown et son épouse ont visité la Maison Blanche. Selon la coutume, M. Browm a offert à M. Obama un porte-stylo fabriqué à partir du bois du navire de guerre britannique du XIXe siècle HMS President (dont le navire jumeau, le HMS Resolute, a fourni le bois pour le bureau ovale). Malheureusement, les Obama n'ont pas su anticiper l'essentiel de l'échange (le personnel de la Première Dame était censé s'en charger). Pour éviter d'être prise les mains vides, Michelle Obama a envoyé un membre du personnel à la boutique de cadeaux de la Maison Blanche où elle a acquis une collection de 25 DVD de "classiques du cinéma américain" (qui étaient incompatibles avec les lecteurs dvd britanniques - l'un des films était une production britannique)... "Un peu de réflexion avait clairement été nécessaire pour les choisir", a déclaré le Daily Mail. "Charmant."

Le vice-président de la Guinée équatoriale, riche en pétrole, (qui se trouve être aussi le fils du président Teodoro Obiang Nguema Mbasog), a acheté un yacht de luxe de 76 mètres (250 pieds) qui a coûté 120 millions de dollars. (Il a été saisi par les autorités néerlandaises en 2016). Les trois quarts de la population de la Guinée équatoriale vivent en dessous du seuil de pauvreté.

Mao Tse Tung ne s'est JAMAIS nettoyé avec du savon ou n'a jamais lavé ses cheveux - jamais. Il aimait cependant aller nager et se frottait avec des serviettes. Il ne se brossait pas non plus les dents, même s'il était un gros fumeur. Il a eu une maîtresse adolescente tout au long de sa vie.

Questions similaires

Qui est le leader le plus étrange de ces cinquante dernières années ?
Qui fut le plus grand et le plus petit chef d'État de l'histoire ?
Quel est l'acte le plus fou jamais commis ?
Quel est l'objet archéologique le plus étrange jamais trouvé ?
Qui est le dirigeant le moins apprécié des 300 dernières années ?
Quel est l'acte politique le plus intelligent de l'histoire ?
Qui est le leader le plus détesté au monde ?
Quel dirigeant est considéré comme le plus audacieux du monde ?
Qui est le meilleur leader au monde actuellement ? Pourquoi mérite-t-il le titre ?
Quel est l'orgasme le plus puissant réalisé dans l'histoire du cinéma ?

COUNTRY FACT FILE

Location

Equatorial Guinea (Bioko) is off-West African coast in gulf of Guinea, and Rio-muni, the mainland enclave.

Official title of the state

The Republic of Equatorial Guinea (English)

Republica de Guinea Ecuatorial: a country located in the middle of Africa.

Flag description:

Three equal horizontal bands of green (top), white, and red, with a blue isosceles triangle based on the hoist side and the coat of arms centered in the white band: the coat of arms has six yellow six-pointed stars (representing the mainland and five offshore islands) above a gray shield bearing a silk-cotton tree and below which is a scroll with the motto UNIDAD, PAZ, JUSTICIA (Unity, Peace, Justice): green symbolizes the jungle and natural resources, blue represents the sea that connects the mainland to the islands, white stands for peace, and red recalls the fight for independence.

Neighbours

Gabone on S, Cameroon on E & N.

Land boundaries: total 539 km. Border countries: Cameroon 189 km, Gabone 350 km.

Founder of The Nation
Francisco Macias Nguema Biogo

Local division

7 provinces (Provincias)

Government type

Republic – presidential

Legislation chamber

Unicameral - House of People's Representatives (HPR)

Form of State

Republic

Multiparty system
President elected by popular vote for a seven-year term, not term limits.

A republic with one legislative house. The House of People's Representatives (HPR) 100 seats, members directly elected by popular vote to serve for five-year terms.

Executive branch

President, Prime Minister, Unicameral parliament. Separated by chief of State and head of Government. President elected by popular vote to serve for seven-year terms without presidential term limits. Head of Government to be appointed by the president.

Former Rulers

12th October, 1968 to 3rd August 1979 Francisco Macías Nguema Byogo

Note: Hitherto the late President Francisco Macías Nguema Biyogo changed his name to Masie Nguema Biyogo Ñegue Ndong.

On 3rd August, 1979 – Current Colonel Theodoro Obiang' Nguema Mbasogo former head of Presidential guard (Aide de Camp) cam to power by deposing his distant cousin.

Judicial chamber

Supreme Tribunal

Capital city

Malabo Altitude 55 meters

Geographic coordinates 3.45N , 8.47E. The sea port capital of Equatrial Guinea. Located on the northern coast of Bioko island. Founded in 1827 as "Santo-Isabel", and while under British rule in the 1820s was named Port-Clarence or Clarence town. It was renamed Malabo in 1973.

Names of main towns: Bata, Luba, Ela-Nguema.

Date of independence: 12th October, 1968.

Religions (Major): Christianity 93%, Muslim 4.5% %, ethnic-religions 2%, others Baha I faith, Hinduism Main spoken languages: Spanish/French (official). Locals Fang, Bubi, Pidgin widely spoken.

English also used.

Currency unit: African Franc (CFA)=100 Centimes
Area in Km

28,051.00

Country area comparison in Africa

45 out of 55 states

Demographic terms:

Average annual population growth rate 2.674 %

Birth rate 36 births per 1,000 population

Death rate 9.26 deaths per 1,000 population

Average life expectancy: 61.98 years

Male 61.05 years: Female 62.94 years

Illiteracy rate (%): Male: 6, Female: 18

Average per capita income: USD 36, 600

Population density: 19.3/km

Urban population (%): 40

Contributor groups: Farming, Fishing: 3, Indutry: 92, Social service:5

Main Export Items: Crude-oil, Methanol, Cocoa, Coffee, Timber-wood.

Economy is based on: Petrol & Agriculture

Climate: Tropical

Extremes: Lowest point: The Atlantic coast 0 mtr.

Highest point: Pico Basile 3,008 meters.

Weather of the Capital city (Malabo) average annual temperature 17.2.

Altitude: 55 mtrs/180 ft

Hottest month: January - April 23-32oc.

Coldest month: July-August, February-March 75mm average Rf.
Wettest month: October-November 350mm average Rf.

Measures: Metric system

Time zone: 1 hour ahead of GMT/UTC

Public holidays: January 1 (New year), May 1 (Labor Day), June 10, August 3, 15, October 12 (Independence Day), December 8, 25 (Christmas)

Ethnic groups: Fang 85.7%, several other ethnic-Bantu tribes Bubi 6.5%, Mdowe 3.6%, Annobon 1.6%, Bujeba 1.1%, other 1.4%

Topography & Environmental concern: Equatorial Guinea (Bioko) is consists of two volcanic mountains and a connecting valley Rio-muni with over 90% of the area has a coastal plain and low-hills beyond. Insufficient good quality water, deforestation, violent windstorms, flash floods. Environment: tap water is not potable: deforestation.

Economy Overview

Industry: Petroleum, natural gas, fishing, lumbering

Chief crops: Cocoa, coffee, rice, yams, cassava, bananas, sweet potatoes, palm nuts, livestock, timber

Natural resources: Timber wood, Natural gas, Alluvial-gold, Petroleum crude, Bauxite, Diamonds, Tantalum, Sand, Gravel, Clay

Land in use (%): Arable land: 4.63

Grassland: 4

Forest woods: 46

Others: 45

Marine: Coastline 296 km.

Commercial Sea port: Bata (main port), Luba

Development prospect:

Whether the country's oil and gas will last another 10 or 30 years, the IMF and other donors are pressuring the government to diversify the economy. Priorities for economic diversification include agriculture, fisheries and tourism. World Bank officials say that institutional reforms are needed to launch the economy into another league. Togo-based Ecobank said that Equatorial Guinea offers an attractive operating environment, and it is seeking approval for a banking license there. There is still progress to be made in the provision of electricity, and the administration plans to inaugurate the Djibloho dam built by China's Sinohydro and financed by the government's own funds in 2012. To improve its performance, the Sociedad de Electricidad de Guinea Ecuatorial is in the process of being restructured and privatized.

Despite best intentions, oil and gas remain the mainstays of the economy. The energy ministry predicts that oil production will rise to about 300,000 barrels per day (bpd) in 2012 thanks to new production from the Aseng field operated by Noble Energy. Meanwhile, most companies there have plans to drill on gas prospects in the year to come. China National Offshore Oil Corporation, Noble, PetroSA, Repsol and the state were in discussions at the end of 2011 on plans for a second liquefied natural gas plant, which would cost an estimated $2.2bn. Equatorial Guinea has dropped plans to source gas for the plant from Nigeria or Cameroon but the necessary capacity of the plant will only be known when more drilling is completed in 2012. In October, Ophir Energy increased the size of its acreage on Block R in order to encompass more than 3bn ft3 of indicated gas reserves.

Equatorial Guinea vice president threatens to expel French ambassador

Equatorial Guinea's vice president, Teodoro Nguema Obiang Mangue, threatened Friday to expel the French ambassador over a row triggered by a corruption case in Paris.

Equatorial Guinea's vice president, Teodoro Nguema Obiang Mangue

A top French court last year upheld a three-year suspended term against Obiang over property bought in France with funds suspected to have come from plundered state assets.

The decision opened the way to confiscating property in Paris's top-end Avenue Foch -- a 3,000-square-metre (32,000-square-feet) mansion worth an estimated 107 million euros ($113 million) that houses Equatorial Guinea's embassy as well as apartments.

An appeal court on Wednesday rejected Equatorial Guinea's bid to overturn the ruling, opening the way, in theory, for the embassy to be forced out of the mansion.

"If Paris goes ahead with expelling our diplomats from our embassy building, we will give the French ambassador 24 hours to leave the territory of Equatorial Guinea," Obiang warned on Twitter.

Obiang, better known as Teodorin Obiang, is the son of Equatorial Guinea's iron-fisted 80-year-old president, Teodoro Obiang Nguema Mbasogo.

He has ruled the small oil-rich central African state for more than four decades, and for the last two years his son has been widely viewed as his successor.

The tweet was published on Obiang's personal account, not his account as vice president, and it was unclear whether the expulsion threat was official policy.

The French foreign ministry, approached by AFP, refused to comment.

Obiang, 53, was also fined 30 million euros in the case, which had rolled on for years before culminating in last July's verdict, hailed by campaigners as a landmark in the fight against graft.

In its appeal, Equatorial Guinea had argued that the younger Obiang had sold the building to the state in 2011, which had purchased the property in "good faith."

The country's legal representative in France, Kevin Grossmann, predicted the French authorities would be unable to expel the embassy and its staff from the building because of diplomatic immunity.

"The building is indeed in the hands of the courts. I am not aware of any expulsion decision by France," he told AFP.

"(...) To carry out an expulsion order would be tantamout to throwing out the ambassador and the embassy services. This isn't about to happen," he said.

The only Spanish-speaking country in sub-Saharan Africa, Equatorial Guinea is one of the most enclosed nations in the continent, and Obiang senior is frequently accused by rights groups of abuses.

Despite its oil riches, most of the country's 1.4 million people live below the poverty line.

Equatorial Guinea last year closed its London embassy after Britain accused Teodorin Obiang of siphoning off state assets to fund a jet-setter lifestyle.

His purchases allegedly included VIP mansions around the world, luxury cars and the crystal-covered glove that Michael Jackson wore on his 1987-89 "Bad" tour.

The French judicial authorities have estimated at 150 million euros the amount the younger Obiang allegedly laundered in France.

His assets included cars valued at 5.7 million euros with three Bugattis, a Rolls-Royce and two Maseratis.

Why did Spain grant independence to Equatorial Guinea?

Lucas Villar

.

Follow 3y

Let's start from the beginning.

Equatorial Guinea was a resourceful territory that had always suffered from labour shortages.

The history of the place is complicated, there used to be a black creole elite called Fernandinos because they were the inhabitants of the largest island in the colony: the island of Fernando Pó. They later had to share the place with the Spaniards that arrived. The natives refused to work for them though, they managed to do so under the protection of Spanish Catholic orders in the colony which opposed the creoles.

Some of the most noticeable legacy of Spain is precisely the religious architecture.

Basílica de La Inmaculada Concepción (2nd largest Christian temple in Africa)

Catedral de Santa Isabel

Catedral de Santiago Apóstol

The colony changed side during the Civil War, it initially supported the republic strongly, then attempted to join the rebels but the republic managed to keep it under control until Franco's Guardia Colonial reached the island.

During the late 50s Spain changed the status from colony to province and started to decolonise the territory. All throughout the 60s the region had a acquired a substantial amount of practical autonomy, to the point it was the only place in Spain where there were elections. In theory the local government was subdued to Franco's control from Spain, but the land did have more than one party while the mainland did not.

Representatives from Equatorial Guinea in the Cortes (Spanish congress) in Madrid, in which the only party apart from them was Franco's:

During all this time Equatorial Guinea became one of the richest parts of Africa. Again it was resourceful and when the entrance of immigrants from other neighbouring African colonies was allowed the cocoa and coffee production expanded considerably. There was a large literacy rate by African standards too (around 50%). The wealth as in all of Africa was very unequally distributed though, so despite the “wealthier” status most of the people lived under pretty bad conditions anyway.

During the 60s when this autonomy was allowed, appeared movements for independence in Equatorial Guinea. The movements were pretty weak, in fact they were very weak compared to the neighbouring territories. There were Spaniards exiled because of Franco which actively supported these independence movements but again, it didn't really take root in the population of EG.

MONALIGE independence movement's delegation at the UN

But at the end of the 60s the United Nations took direct involvement in the issue trying to make Spain follow the steps of France in decolonising the region. With the intervention of the UN support increased to some degree for independence. In the end Spain probably saw Equatorial Guinea as a small territory not worth any serious conflict with the UN, specially at the end of Franco's dicatorship when the country was trying to re-connect to the extent that it was possible with the west.

Cámara de los Representantes del Pueblo (Chamber of the People's Representatives)

The flag of the Republic of Equatorial Guniea

UNIDAD PAZ
JUSTICIA

AD
JUSTICIA

An independent constitution was drafted and passed with 60% of popular support. Shortly after that, the dictator Macías Nguema took over the country and after him his nephew brought him down just to become a dicator himself.

Macías Nguema

His nephew Teodoro Obiang in Madrid

And he is still in power to this day. Equatorial Guinea turned out to have big oil reserves which stopped the economic decline and pushed it again as one of the wealthiest parts of Africa (of course unevenly distributed).

Equatorial Guinea's main official and spoken language is Spanish, being included in all Hispanic linguistic and cultural affairs. Later the government recognised French and Portuguese as cooficial languages, for obvious reasons that the neighbours of the country speak French and Portuguese.

A warning in Spanish in Equatorial Guinea:

Related Answer
How did Spain manage to colonise Equatorial Guinea?

Aurelio Germes

.

Follow

Lived in Malabo, Equatorial Guinea5y

Array Jalavin

Too lazy to lie 8mo

Through agreement of both sides in the Treaty of El Pardo signed on 11 March 1778.

TRATADO
DE
ALLIANÇA DEFENSIVA
ENTRE
OS MUITO ALTOS, E PODEROSOS SENHORES
DONA MARIA
RAINHA DE PORTUGAL,
E
DOM CARLOS III.
REI DE HESPANHA,
ASSINADO EM MADRID
PELOS PLENIPOTENCIARIOS
DE SUAS MAGESTADES
FIDELISSIMA, E CATHOLICA, EM ONZE DE MARÇO DE MDCCLXXVIII.
E RATIFICADO POR AMBAS AS MAGESTADES.

LISBOA
NA REGIA OFFICINA TYPOGRAFICA.
ANNO MDCCLXXVIII.

to finalise colonial borders between Spain and Portugal in the Río de la Plata region of South America.

Portuguese acquired Spanish territories in South America While Spain acquired Portuguese territories in Africa which are now known as Equatorial Guinea.

What do Spanish people know about Equatorial Guinea?

As in many similar questions, Spaniards' knowledge abount Equatorial Guinea ranges from "knows-nothing" to "knows-alot". Probably, most people would fall into the "knows-something" level. I used to work and live there several years in the 1980s, so I probably know a little more than some people.

Equatorial Guinea was part of Spain up to 1968, when it was granted independence. At that time, it used to be the richest region in West Africa, a popular vacations destination for people around the Gulf of Guinea. Its economy was based on cocoa and tropical wood exports, mainly to Spain.

There are, therefore, some current Spaniards who were born and schooled in Equatorial Guinea, besides some others who went there to work, since job conditions were better once you become accustomed to the tropical tough environment. In addition, from 1980 on, some Spaniards either returned or went to Equatorial Guinea to start some new business.

The pre-independence way of life changed drastically once the country got the independece. Macías, the then president, started to use the Spanish colonizers as scapegoats for his own failure in leading the country. There were some revolts and violence ensued. The country went bankrupt. There was no money to pay government officials, who just abandoned their functions in order to survive living from the tropical forest, hunting and fishing. That made Macias even crazier and terror ensued where everybody could be jailed or murdered. Many Equatoguineans migrated to neighboring countries or, when possible, to Spain. The book, and subsequent film, The Dogs of War (novel), by Frederick Forsyth, is based on this country during this period of Macías dictatorship.

Though anecdotal, I can say that some equatoguineans, including one who subsquently became minister in one the Obiang governments, told me that Independence Day was not a celebration of joy, but of sadness. So terrible were those days!, eventhough Spain, by no means, is guilt-free, neither during the colonization period nor during the post-independence.

All, or almost all, Spaniards had to leave the country in short notice and could not come back till a coup d'etat, led by his own nephew, Teodoro Obiang, took control of the country. Macias was then tried and executed by 1980.

Spain first, and then France, started to help Obiang gaining control of the country as well as to finance some much needed assistance. The World Bank came to help too, with a project to finance the technical assistance in the petroleum industry to enable the country to deal with exploration agreements with major oil companies. Oil was eventually discovered in mid 1990s and the country, formerly one of the poorest country in Africa, became one if not the richest country in Africa, with higher GDP then many European countries.

But economic wealth is not synonym of democracy and welfare, mainly due to corruption. The petroleum money is not shared by the population and elections are just a farce. From a democracy point of view, Equatorial Guinea is one of the countries with less freedom.

Related Links

How did Spain govern their colony of Western Sahara? How did this compare with their governance of Equatorial Guinea?

How is life in Equatorial Guinea compared to South Africa?

What Equatorial Guinea is known for?

Is Portuguese really spoken in Equatorial Guinea?

How is Equatorial Guinea so rich?

What is the capital of Equatorial Guinea?

What do Spanish people know about Equatorial Guinea?

The Philippines, Latin America, Western Sahara, Equatorial Guinea, Micronesia, and Puerto Rico were all once Spanish colonies. Why is it that today the Philippines, Micronesia, is not a Spanish-speaking region?

Why did Spain only manage to colonize the Americas, Western Sahara, and Equatorial Guinea?

Would Equatorial Guinea be better off as part of Spain?

Why is the capital of Equatorial Guinea chosen on a far, remote island away from the mainland of Equatorial Guinea?

Aurelio Germes

lived some years in Equatorial Guinea. Visited some other African countries.1y

Historically, the island of Bioko, then Fernando Poo, and its main city Malabo, then Santa Isabel, have been the headquarters of the Spanish colonial government in charge of administrative affairs of both, the island and the continental province of Rio Muni (Mbini).

18th century drawing of the Harbor of Santa Isabel (Malabo)

Its prominence over the continental land comes from the times when the region was a colony used by slavers, first Portuguese and later British (Clarence city), in the Gulf of Guinea as a gathering harbor in their trips to the Americas.

After slavery was abolished and Spain took possession of the region, the island of Bioko remained the most profitable land due to the development of large cocoa plantations while the continent was scarcely developed and used mainly as a source of wood and also manpower by raiding villages in search of young laborers to work in the island plantations.

Bringing a passenger ashore.

Related Links

How did Spain govern their colony of Western Sahara? How did this compare with their governance of Equatorial Guinea?

How is life in Equatorial Guinea compare to South Africa?

What Equatorial Guinea is known for?

Is Portuguese really spoken in Equatorial Guinea?

How is Equatorial Guinea so rich?

What is the capital of Equatorial Guinea?

What do Spanish people know about Equatorial Guinea?

The Philippines, Latin America, Western Sahara, Equatorial Guinea, Micronesia, and Puerto Rico were all once Spanish colonies. Why is it that today the Philippines, Micronesia, is not a Spanish-speaking region?

Why did Spain only manage to colonize the Americas, Western Sahara, and Equatorial Guinea?

Would Equatorial Guinea be better off as part of Spain?

Why does Equatorial Guinea have its capital on an island that seems to belong to Cameroon?

Michael Menard

.

Follow

Radio technician VHF/UHF Passion: aircraft, air traffic control 1 year

Originally Answered: Why does Equatorial Guinea have its capital on an island that seems to belong to Cameroon?

>> What makes you say that??? The capital of Equatorial Guinea is Malabo , this one is on the island of Bioko which does not belong to Cameroon , nor even to Cameroon ……

Geolocation on the map: Equatorial Guinea

Bioko is an islandfrom the Gulf of Guineapart of Equatorial Guinea.!!!

A simple Internet consultation and you had the answer…..!

Source: Wikipedia, the free encyclopedia

Equatorial Guinea / Bioko
Similar questions

Will France cede the Scattered Islands to Madagascar?

Was the coup in Guinea predictable?

Why is the CFA franc used in Equatorial Guinea, what is the historical link of this country with France?

What's happening in Guinea?

Why don't Congo Brazzaville and Congo Kinshasa merge to form a united Congo?

Is Côte d'Ivoire the country from which will come the fall of France in Africa?

Does England have a capital?

Why are there three Guineas?

Does Bolivia have one or two capitals?

Why is Indonesia moving its capital?

ERITREA

National Flag

Emblem

Locator Map

TEXT HIGHLIGHTS: Diaries updates, key events, brief analysis and relating news articles in timeline

Overview, Diary updates and Refreshes

Formerly it was part of the Great Abyssinyan Empire.

Eritrea (formerly known as “Bahr-Negash” before being renamed to “Eritrea” by Italian colonizers from 1890–1941, then became under UN mandated British administration, and later under Ethiopian rule.

Eritrea is a country with a diverse climate and geography, has been under Italian, British and Ethiopian rule subsequently. The term “Eritrea” did not exist until the Italians renamed it as such. Historians marked the battles of Dogali, Gundet (Gundagundi), Quoatit, Seharti and other minor battles were held in the Bahr-Negash autonomous regional state under Abyssinyan rule.

12 AUGUST 1941:

Just six months after the British occupation with the arrival of an adequate number of trained officers under Lieutenant Cracknell from what were known as the Rhodesias at the time, organized the post colony Eritrean police force.

As a one star Lieutenant, Cracknell had been placed on top of a few remained Italian carabinieri and about 150 former Eritrean «Zabtia», the indigenous police troopers under Italian rule, duty had been to organize the Eritrean police force and he was unsparing in his praise of the eager young men that had staffed its rank-and-file.

It consists of nearly 3, 000 Eritreans, under ninety seven British police officers and inspectors. It has a strong Criminal Investigation Dept. branch with finger-print, record and photographic section: four armoured cars, which once belonged to the Italians: a half-squadronof some sixty mounted men; and a striking squad of 250 strong for repelling raids from beyond the Ethiopan frontier. There has never been any lack of volunteer recruits, who receive pay, uniforms, and three months, training, and come from a great variety of sections.

The British as colonial administrators were fair enough to teach/hire Police officers from different tribes/regions of Eritrea which was later undermined by Brig. General Tedla Ukbit during his brief leadership as Police Chief in post federation Eritrea. His mysterious assassination by the Ethiopian government, he was then replaced by a colleague Zeremariam Azazi, who is from the Mensa locality from Senheit. Both the replaced and the latter, were trained during the British Military Administration in Eritrea.

Eritrea and Ethiopia: 1945-1974
Eritrean Workers Organization & The Early National Mobilization to Independence (1948 to 1958)

Labour history in Eritrea is an important aspect of the history of the country. This is demonstrated by the fact that, in the 1940s, the country has experienced the first labour syndicates and actions in the African continent.

The 1958 General Labour strike was inteded to be nationwide, but the major organization drive was in Asmara, where the HZSKSE had its strongst ties[HZSKSE=Hara Zekhone Semret Kefletat Serahtenyatat Eritrawiyan, officially translated into English as the "Syndicate of Free Eritrean Workers. Wolde-Ab also advised that workers change the organisation's name to HZSKSE when the BA approved the new organisation in January 1958.

Although the strike call was honored by some workers in Massawa and Keren, the repression of the preceding months made the majority of Muslims in these cities wary of public confrontations with the police, and demonstrations took place in Masswa only on March 14 and 15. In Asmara, however, the strike committee planned a massive public demonstration at the Monophysite (Tewahdo) Cathdral of Kidist Mariam. Tho plan called for a march the Cathedral plaza, Piazza Selama, where the workers would pray for their demands to be recognized. Through the HZSKSE's network of local trade unions, the strike committed mobilized 700 bicycle-mounted workers wearing white armbands to actas its peace guards"(selam zabenyatat) and assure public order and reduce the possiblility of violent confrontations. As a word of strike spread through the city during the weekend, it was greeted with an outpouring of support.

On Monday morning, March 10, no shops or businesses opened in Asmara and an Italian journalist reported that the city was "paralyzed". During the morning a "disciplined" crowd estimated at 80,000 gathered in the Piazza Selama to hear speeches from labor leaders describing the purpose of the strike and the promised appearance of the Eritrean Chief executive to explain the government's postion.

On Tuesday morning, a second demonstration was held at the Cathedral, again the workers and their supporters ordered to disperse, but instead a group of women, symbolically blindfolded and carrying candles, surged up, the cathedral stairs loudly praying to Saint Mary for aid, and were pushed back by the police. This provoked an angry confrontation and the police commander of Asmara, Goitom Gebrezghi, ordered his men to fire tear-gas into the crowd, followed by rock-throwing and then police gunfire which wounded at least 30, several of whom later died. The strike continued and during Tuseday night guOn Wednesday gunfire and bomb explosions were reported throughout the working class areas of Asmara. On Wednesday the Asmara schoolteachers' union, many of whose members belonged to the Young Federalist movement and related cultural organization declared a sympathy strike.

The Asmara Teachers'Association as "strongly participating" in the strike. Following the strike the Teachers' Association was banned. Another, related, cultural association which included many teachers, as well as singers and dramatists, was the Mah'ber Memeheyash Hagarawi Limidi ("Association for the development of National Culture" M.M.H.L). It was founded in 1957, when its 45 members staged several singing and drama productions in Mendefera and at the Cinema Impero in Asmara (attended by 3,000). Amine Gebre Kristos, a participant and worker at the Government Printing Press, along with two other M.M.H.L. members were imprisoned and tortured for 3 month ollowing the Asmera show. On the cultural associations' 1960s resurrection as the Mah'ber Teatro Asmara

In November 1958 there was another two-week general strike of workers, students, and self- employed which paralyzed Eritrea. This strike called by the underground Eritrean Labor Union Federation protesting the violations and coercion took place in all major Eritrean cities but it was suppressed by force which caused for the death of 88 demonstrators and 450 wounded, and thousands were jailed. Killion added that the general strike was participated by the workers included the Young Federalists, the Muslim Youth League and the Asmara high school students led by Tuku'e Yehedego (Killion, 1997: 40).

Raid (2011, 156) cited Tom Killon has suggested the Eritrean labour movement was in the vanguard of protest in mid-late 1950s. Raid adds that workers' protest culminated in the general strike of 1958 which was violently crushed by the Ethiopia security force, and although ostensibly the strike was concerned with workers' rights in reality it represented the crystallization of political protest against the undermining of Eritrean autonomy and civil rights more broadly.

In protesting against the suppressiion of the 1958 General Strike in March and April 1958, eighteen prominent citizens including Omar Kadi were arrested for sending a telegram to the UN Secretary-General protesting against Ethiopian violations of UN Resolution 390A(V). Negash(2005:129) adds that in a radio interviw in Cairo Omar Kadi said that Eritrea was being ruled by a black colonial power.On the basis of the information supplied by Tedla Ogbit who was chief of police, the Federal Attorney General filed a criminal charge against Omar Kadi in the middle of March, 1958. Because of above allegation, Omar Kadi was sentenced to ten years while the others were detained for short term or released on bail (Iyob,1995: 91)

Following the general strike on May 13 a repressive Labor Code was passed and the Confederation was outlawed. Since then the Ethiopian government began to suppress of basic political rights and civil liberties and it reached its peak after 1958. For example Bereketaeab (2000:173) provided additional the following examples: In 1954, a strike by dockworkers in Massawa and Assab against the introduction of a compulsory Federal Identity Card was suppressed by force, the 1958 peaceful general strike was also suppressed by force. The Voice of Eritrea newspaper was closed for publishing articles criticizing the violation of democratic rights and infringement of Eritrean autonomy with the imprisonment of the staff writers and arrest of newspaper editors.

Between 1958 and 1962, the Ethiopian government never stopped violating the UN Resolution which had been ratified by the Empire on September 11, 1952. By replacing the Eritrean flag with the Ethiopian flag in 1958, the Eritrean Penal Code by the Ethiopian Penal code, by changing the name Eritrean Executive to Eritrean Administration, and the Chief Executive to Chief Administration.

In 1957, the Ethiopian government banned trade unions, closed many Eritrean industries, dismantled Eritrean factories and moved them to the capital city of Ethiopia, Addis Ababa. As a result, the number of workers in Eritrea declined from 32,400 (27,000 Eritreans; 5,400 Italians) to 10, 350(10,000 Eritrean; 350 Italian).

The once urbanised Eritrean population, who originally came from rural areas, could not return to the countryside, because the skills which they acquired during the period of Italian colonial rule and the British administration could not be applied in the rural areas. Consequently, most Eritrean skilled workers started migrating to Ethiopia to seek for work, to reunite with families, to obtain opportunities for further education and to establish businesses

Spencer (1984: 303) also states that with large numberes of Shoans came to occupy the federal offices in Asmera and Massawa, the influx of Eritreans into Addis Ababa was on large scale as gradually to dominate the Ethiopian Air Force and the Police, 40 percent of the Army officers corps, much of telecommunications and nearly 100 percent of the taxi drivers in Addis Ababa. The Eritreans soon proved themselves to be the Irish of Ethiopia.

Hagai Erlich (1983) pointed out that one factor of the considerable socio-economic development in Ethiopia was the growing participation of Eritreans in Ethiopian national life, which was able to supply Ethiopia with the necessary manpower (1950-1960s and early 1970s). Therefore, one would assume the building of modern Ethiopia could not have succeeded without the participation of skilled workers and other intelligentsia from Eritrea. An evidence of this could be seen from the role of Eritrean workers in the formation of the Ethiopian Labour Union in 1963. According Asafa (1993:105) One of the opposition forces to Haile Selassie's regime was the labour movement. The government prevented the working class from organizing itself into a union until the early 1960s by denying it legal status. The incorporation of Eritrea into the empire in the early 1950s brought in Eritrean workers who had union experience, and the influence of the International Labour Organization necessitated the proclamation of Labour Relation DecreeNo.49 of 1962, which facilitated the formation of the Confederation of Ethiopian Labour Unions (CELU) (CELU) in 1963.

[Source from "The Eritrean Workers' Orgnization and early National Mobilization 1948-1958 by Tom Killion]

During the first half of the century, with the Italians in possession of Eritrea, Ethiopia has been landlocked. The defeat of Italy in World War II gives Haile Selassie the chance to redress this deficiency. In a meeting with President Roosevelt in 1945 he stresses his need for access to the sea through the possession of Eritrea, an area loosely linked with Ethiopia at various periods in the past.

The USA, seeing the chance of a naval base in the Red Sea at Massawa, shares an interest in this development. When the United Nations considers the future of Eritrea, in 1948-50, Washington applies pressure for its annexation by Ethiopia.

The UN decision, given in 1950, is that Eritrea shall become part of Ethiopia from 1952, as an autonomous federal province with its own constitution and elected government. In that year an Eritrean administration duly takes control, bringing to an end the temporary British rule in the region.

Within Eritrea opinion has been divided, largely along Christian versus Muslim lines, on the question of union with Christian Ethiopia. On one side is the Unionist party, founded in 1946 with financial assistance from Addis Ababa. On the other is the Muslim League, set up a year later to campaign for Eritrean independence. In the election the Unionists fail to win an outright majority. The Eritrean government is therefore at first a coalition.

Aware that there will be continuing agitation for independence, Haile Selassie shamelessly interferes to secure his aim of union. With his help the Unionists remove Muslims from government jobs, put an end to teaching in Arabic, ban all other political parties (1958) and trade unions (1959), introduce Ethiopian law and even give the Eritrean government a new name. It becomes merely the Eritrean administration.

In these circumstances, and with the persecuted leaders of the independence movement now abroad, the result is a foregone conclusion when the Ethiopian and Eritrean parliaments debate the question of union in November 1962.

On a unanimous vote in both Addis Ababa and Asmara it is agreed that Eritrea's federal status within Ethiopia shall be abolished. The area is now to become a province like any other in the Ethiopian empire.

By the same token this degree of unanimity also exists by now on the opposing side. In 1960 Eritrea's Muslim leaders, living in exile, form the ELF or Eritrean Liberation Front to fight for independence. By the mid-1960s they have a guerrilla force operating in western Eritrea. And in a few years they cease to be a purely Muslim movement. Soon after the union of 1962 Haile Selassie interferes in Tigre's schools, banning Tigrinya, the local language, and replacing it with Amharic. This converts many Tigre Christians to the cause of independence.

Eventually, after bitter disputes and even outright warfare between rival factions in the Eritrean independence movement, a single powerful group emerges as a distant offshoot of the original ELF. This is the EPLF, or Eritrean People's Liberation Front. Dedicated to a religion as demanding and intolerant as either Christianity or Islam (in their most radical forms), the EPLF is a highly efficient Marxist enterprise. The EPLF is offered an unexpected chance to achieve its aims in 1974, when Ethiopia is convulsed by a major upheaval.

Most Eritreans in especially in lowlands except the Sahaba (Family of Prophet Mohammed sent from Mecca) were Christians, they were converted Islam by Turkish and Egyptians. If you asked any Eritrean Moslem from the lowlands his great grand father was a Christian.

Eritrea came into existence as an Italian colony in 1890. Italy used Eritrea as a jumping-off point for its conquest of Ethiopia in 1936. In March, 1941 British-led forces drove out the Italians and Eritrea was placed under British Military Administration. This lasted until 1950 when the UN General Assembly agreed that Eritrea should be federated with Ethiopia under the sovereignty of the Ethiopian Crown. The federation was abolished in 1962 and Eritrea was absorbed into Ethiopia.

The first Eritrean Liberation Front (ELF) formed in 1961. Hamid Himid Idris Awate who rebeled against the imperial government promoted the struggle for the independence, with some Arab & Islamic states support?

A second, the Eritrean People’s Liberation Front (EPLF), headed by Issaias Affe-worki, developed in the 1970s, boosted by the revolution in Ethiopia. Both were committed to independence for Eritrea. In the early 1980s the EPLF defeated the ELF and drove it into Sudan, where it fragmented. The EPLF went on to form a strategic alliance with an insurgent group in Northern Ethiopia, the Tigrai People’s Liberation Front (TPLF). They waged a long and eventually successful guerrilla war against the Duerg regime headed by Lt. Colonel Mengistu Haile Mariam.

Eritrean People's Liberation Front (EPLF) Executive Committee (1977-1987) founded by Oqbe Abraha, Ali Said Abdella, Sebhat Ephrem, Haile Woldetinsae, Petros Solomon, Mohammed Said Bareh, Mesfin Hagos, Al-Amin Mohammed Said, Berhane Gherezgiher, Ibrahim Afa, Romedan Mohammed Nur, Issaias Affewerki, Mahmoud Ahmed Sherifo

May 24, 199:The day Eritrean freedom fighters took control over the city of Asmara, the capital of Eritrea, bringing an end to a 30-year armed struggle for independence. After thirty years of armed struggle, the Eritrean People’s Liberation Front (EPLF) took control of the whole Eritrea as their TPLF allies (now the EPRDF) entered into Addis Ababa, the Ethiopian capital then the country won its right to self-determination in de-facto. The Eritrean Provisional government extended the proposed referendum for two years.

In April 25, 1993: Eritrea, the former province of Ethiopia, gained independence in-de-jure from Ethiopia followed by a UN monitored referendum. After an internationally monitored referendum in which over 98% voted in favor of independence, on a voter's turnout of over 90%. Eritrea achieved it's independence in de-jure followed by diplomatic recognition from the International community.

May 2nd, 1993: The Transitional Government of Ethiopia (TGE) recognized the independence of Eritrea. Ethiopia the first country to open its Chancery in Asmara.

On 14 May 1993 The UK recognized Eritrea's statehood.

On 12 May 1998: poor border demarcation developed into a military conflict and full-scale war with Ethiopia in which tens of thousands of people were killed. Border tensions persist.

ERITREA - Historical Glance

Origins of name: The term "Eritrea" derives from "Sinus Erythraeus", the name Greek tradesmen of the third century BC, gave to the body of water between the Arabian Peninsula and the Africa continent, known as formerly Bahar Al-Habash now known as the "Red Sea". As example, the Tigres or Tigrigna speakers of the majority of Hamassien & Akele-Guzai highland Christians are by origin "Meronis" whose ancestors the Meronis migrated from Dembia in Begie-Midr & Simien of the Amhara region, to Dembezan region of Hamassien deep inside Eritrea. The Tigre speakers being the origin of the Tigrigna speaking highlanders they instantly fall within the Tigrigna-speaking category, majority of the Seraye highland Christians are by origin "Adkeme-Melega" whose ancestors came from Gojjam and Lasta tracts deep inside Ethiopia, the Atsmee-Dekhy Ishmaalo of Arba'ate Asmara are by origin Asawerta likewise, the Dekhy-Shihai of Lego-chewa, touching upon the Hammasien and Seraye highland tracts are of the Asawerta by origin, the Angana highland Christians around Dekhe-Mhare are of the Hazo-origin, the Ankala Afar Christians around Tserona area are of Afar-origin by extension, the Mine-Fre highland Christians are of the Begie-Midr & Simien origin, there are also highland Christians of Tigrigna-origin whose extension goes deep into Adwa, Tembien, Shire-Inda Sellassie and Kilte-Awlaallo, deep into the Tigrai region of Ethiopia, as is officially known today, Tigrigna & Arabic are official languages in present Eritrea, such differences and similarities with its variants or dialects that can be also spoken in various countries. Its the quality of good people to neutralize malicious differentiations and change it to the better.

The Ottoman rule: In 1557 the Ottomans captured Massawa and administered it under Beja Caliphate. Massawa became prominent when it was captured by the Ottoman Empire in 1557. The Ottomans made it the capital of Habesh. Under Özdemir Pasha, Ottoman troops then attempted to conquer the rest of Eritrea. Due to resistance as well as sudden and unexpected demands for more troops in the Mediterranean and on the border with Persia, the Ottoman authorities placed the city and its immediate hinterlands under the control of one of the aristocrats of the Bellou people, whom they appointed Naib of Massawa and made answerable to the Ottoman governor at Suakin in the Sudan. The Ottomans nevertheless built the old town of Massawa on Massawa Island into a prominent port on the Red Sea in typical Islamic Ottoman architecture using dry corals for walls, roof and foundation as well as imported wood for beams, window shutters and balconies. These buildings and the old town of Massawa remain to this day, having withstood both earthquakes and wars with aerial bombardment.

Egyptian rule: During the 19th century, Massawa, along with much of the Northeast African coast of the Red Sea, was ruled by Egypt with Ottoman consent. Following Egypt's defeat at the Battle of Gurae, Egyptian control of the port withered. With the help of the British, the city eventually came under Italian control as part of Italy's colony of Eritrea in 1885.

Italian rule: In 1869 it was bought by the Rubattino Shipping Company from the local Sultan, and was acquired by Italy (1882) who found the port inadequate for exploitation of its hinterlands, and came to use Assab as a coaling station.

In 1882: Assab fully captured by Italian armies.

The Italians at the end of the 19th century created a modern port in Massaua for their newly-created colony of Italian Eritrea. From 1885 Massaua was the Italian administrative capital of Eritrea, and Asmara was made the capital city of Eritrea in preference to Massawa by Governor Martini only in 1897. But in 1921, most of the city and port of Massawa was destroyed by the Massawa Earthquake; the ports were unable to fully recover until 1928, hampering initially the Italian colonial ambitions. The Italian colonialists had nevertheless built Massawa to become the largest and safest port on the east coast of Africa, and the largest deep-water port on the Red Sea. They even constructed between 1887 and 1932 the Eritrean Railway and connected the port of Massawa with Bishia near the Sudan border. In 1938 Massaua had 15,000 inhabitants, of which nearly 2,000 were Italians: the city was improved with an architectural plan similar to the one in Asmara, with a commercial and industrial area. Italy was allied to the Axis powers during World War II and Massawa was the homeport for the Red Sea Flotilla of the Italian Royal Navy (Regia Marina). When the city fell during the East African Campaign, a large number of Italian and German ships were sunk in an attempt to block use of Massawa's harbor. From 15 April 1942, later master diver and salvage specialist RNR Lieutenant Peter Keeble (then a complete rookie in both disciplines) was assigned to the clearing of the harbor. He succeeded only in the simple task of salvaging an ex-Italian tugboat. The same month, United States Navy Commander Edward Ellsberg and his handful of crew arrived to take over. The wrecks were salvaged in short order and the port was returned to service, as part of what had now become the British protectorate of Eritrea.

In 1945, following the end of World War II, the port of Massawa suffered damage as the occupying British either dismantled or destroyed much of the facilities. These actions were protested by Sylvia Pankhurst in her book Eritrea on the Eve.

HISTORICIZE DIARIES

1- Assab, between 1869 and 1882 becomes Italian domain
2- Massawa, in 1885 was occupied by Italian troops
3- Asmara, was occupied in August of 1889

The Abyssinyan Emperor Yohannes IV died in March of 1889.

Emperor Menelik in Abyssinya was crowned in November of 1889....

In January 1890 Eritrea was officially declared Italian colony.
In this group I have read that some attribute the responsibility of the Eritrea's colonization to the Emperor Yohannes IV, that would have prevented Ras Alula to drive the italian away from Massawa and later not to have himself fought them in Sahati.

Others say that the responsibilities of the colonization were caused by the Wuchale's Treaty, signed in May 1889 by the Emperor Menelik and Italy.

Others that Eritreans were the main responsible for not having fought against the Italian, letting them to arrive on the highlands.

In 1987: Railroad Construction began from the Red Sea port city of Massawa, heading towards the capital city of Asmara.

The Eritrean Railway is the only railway system in Eritrea. It was constructed between 1887 and 1932 by the Kingdom of Italy for the Italian colony of Eritrea, and connected the port of Massawa with Bishia near the Sudan border. The line was essentially destroyed by warfare in subsequent decades, but has been rebuilt between Massawa and Asmara. Originally the railway was built by the Italians in order to connect Massawa and Asmara, the main cities of Italian Eritrea. The original Massawa(Mitsiwa'e)-Asmara-Bishia Railway in Italian Eritrea, was active between 1887 and 1941.

Asmara Cinema-Teatro

It was designed by Italian architect Odoardo Cavagnari. A number of other Internet sources call Cavagnari an engineer. Archinform says he was both. As head of the colonial government's Civil Engineering Office from 1912 to 1918, he prepared master plans for the cities of Asmara and Keren. Located on the now Godena Harnet next to the Asmara Telecommunications Office. The Opera House was opened in 1920. Alterations were carried out in 1936. In 2012 the theatre is in occasional use.

The History of The Massawa – Asmara Cableway

Italian Eritrea was a colony of the Kingdom of Italy in the territory of present-day Eritrea. Although it was formally created in 1890, the first Italian settlements in the area were established in 1882 around Assab. The colony officially lasted until 1947

In 1869 the lands surrounding the Bay of Assab was bought by the Rubattino Shipping Company from the minor sultan of nearby Raheita to serve as a coaling station along the shipping lanes introduced by the recently completed Suez Canal.

The Massawa-Asmara Cableway

The cableway was built by the Italian engineering firm "Ceretti and Tanfani" in Eritrea. It connected the port of Massawa with the city of Asmara and ran a distance of some 75 kilometres. It moved food, supplies and war materials for the Imperial Italian Army then conquering Ethiopia.

The Eritrean Ropeway, completed in 1937, ran 71.8 km from near Massawa to the south end of Asmara. This was the longest cableway ever. It covered a distance which was over twice the current one longest in the world which has less than 35 km in Lapland. It was rendered non-operational by the British removing the engines shortly after their victory at Keren in World War II. The assemblage stood for over twenty years and was still in very good condition in 1962 Ralph Reinhold

With the capacity to transport 30 tons of material every hour in each direction from the seaport of Massawa to 2326 meters above sea level in Asmara, the cableway was the longest of its kind in the world when was inaugurated in 1938. It had 13 sections, was powered by diesel engines, and carried freight in small transport gondolas. In southern Eritrea there was another small ropeway.

During their eleven-year occupation of the former Italian colony as a result of World War II, the British salvaged the diesel engines and removed other equipment. Of the dismantled by the British ropeway, only the towers remained on place until they were scrapped in the 1980s.

Origins

ASMARA - the charming Eritrean capital, situated almost on the edge of the highlands, dominates the slope that descends first quickly and then gently to the searing beaches of the Red Sea - was qualified by its natural location to become one day one of the principal collection points for commercial traffic arriving by sea and headed for the heart of the Empire.

In fact, the picturesque little city lies at an altitude little different from those of the two great routes that radiate towards the distant centers of Adwa, Axum and Gondar, on the one hand, and Meke’lle , Dessie and Addis Ababa on the other.

But for many years this natural advantage could not be exploited. It was too high above sea level (about 2400 m.) to be easily linked to heavy commercial traffic. The little, narrow-gauge railroad begun in 1911 was able to make the great leap, thanks to a series of dizzying serpentine curves up the slopes. But the problem could not be considered solved, the railway's potential being too limited in view of the ever-growing traffic.

This was the origin of the Massawa-Asmara cableway, the great engineering work of our time, that won the approval of technicians and the admiration of the world. It has in one leap more than doubled the commercial traffic between the sea and the interior, and, in conjunction with the railroad, accounts for almost the entire traffic.

Construction of the gigantic work was awarded by His Excellency, the Chief of Government, to our Company - CERETTI & TANFANI, S.A. - which is proud of its long history of glowing successes throughout the world, and most particularly in the this competitive field of engineering in the service of industry.

This was the origin of the Massawa-Asmara cableway, the great engineering work of our time. The supplier of the cables was S.A. GIUSEPPE & FRATELLO REDAELLI of Milan; of the engines, S.A. FRANCO TOSI of Legnano.

Cableways and Great Distances
Population centers at markedly different altitudes and separated from one another by vast desert or forest lands see in the cableway the ideal solution to the problem of reciprocal trade links. It [a cableway] brilliantly surpasses Eritrea was an Italian colony, and accordingly its railway was built by Italian engineers to Italian standards, using equipment bought from Italy. The gauge chosen was the Italian standard narrow gauge measurement of 950 mm (3 ft.. 1 3⁄8 in), similar to many common narrow gauge railways under construction in Italy at the same time. What with the short building time and the simultaneous flow of some common equipment and materials to the national railway yards, e.g. metallic plate ties (sleepers), it was necessary to acquire these from France to some extent.

A previous Italian law from 1879 officially established the track gauges, which specified the use of 1,500 mm (4 ft11.06 in), 1,000 mm (3 ft.. 3.37 in) and 750 mm (2 ft.. 5.53 in) gauge track measured from the center of the rails, or 1,445 mm (4 ft. 8.9 in), 950 mm (3 ft.. 1 3⁄8 in) and 700 mm (2 ft. 3 9⁄16 in), respectively, on the inside faces. Construction began from the Red Sea port city of Massawa in 1887, heading towards the capital city of Asmara. Progress was slow, thanks to the long climb up the mountains to the high plateau of inland Eritrea, and the substantial civil engineering works required; the line reached Asmara in 1911. It was extended to Keren in 1922, Agat in 1925, Agordat in 1928, and finally Bishia in 1932, for a total length of 280 km (174 mi). Bishia (Biscia in Italian) proved to be the end, even though the builders had ambitions of reaching the Sudan Railways line. Benito Mussolini's invasion of Ethiopia led to resources being diverted elsewhere, including the upgrading of the line from Massawa to Asmara to handle more traffic.

Building the line from Massawa to Asmara was a significant undertaking. Even with the tighter turns and narrower right-of-way allowed by a narrow gauge railway, the line required 65 bridges (including a fourteen-arch viaduct crossing the Obel River) and 39 tunnels, the longest being 320 m (1,050 ft.). Even so, there were still grades of more than 3%. The highest point on the railway is just east of Asmara at 2,394 m (7,854 ft.) above sea level. The construction of the railway was considered worldwide as a renowned achievement of the first half of the twentieth century.

Operation: The railway was reasonably busy for such a small line; in 1935, carrying large quantities of supplies for the Italian war effort in Ethiopia, the line saw 30 trains daily, while by 1965 the line was carrying nearly half a million passengers a year as well as 200,000 tons of freight. Things went downhill progressively from there. Improvements, to the road from Massawa to Asmara and to the trucks and buses that used it, began to take traffic away from the railway. Until 1941, the railway was Italian controlled, but the fortunes of war allowed the British to take control. After 1942 the railway (damaged during the British occupation and by Italian guerrillas) was abandoned from Agordat to Biscia.

In 1942 the British moved some diesel locomotives and materials to Eritrea when they dismantled the Railway Mogadiscio-Villabruzzi of Italian Somalia. In 1944 the British (as a war compensation) dismantled the Italian-built the Asmara-Massawa Cableway that supplemented the railway as a means of transportation inland.

In 1953 Eritrea was joined to Ethiopia in Federation as the British pulled out, giving Ethiopia a coastline, but starting off 40 years of unrest and eventually war.

The mid-1950s and 1960s were successful years for the railway, but the 1970s saw the railway fall more and more out of use as the unrest intensified, and in 1975 the railway was destroyed by the ruling Duerg regime in Ethiopia. Much of the infrastructure was destroyed during the following years of war, and both sides used materials salvaged from the railway for fortification and other purposes.

Rebuilding: Eritrea won its independence in de-jure from Ethiopia in April, 1993, and in 1994 the Eritrean president declared that rebuilding the railway was a priority for the new nation. During the war years a spirit of self-reliance had been built up, and the Eritreans refused foreign loans and expensive rework. Instead, the Eritreans decided, they would rebuild what they had left with their own efforts. Rebuilding the line started, some work going into rebuilding the workshops and station in Asmara while others set to reconstructing the Massawa end. Renovation of the main line began from Massawa westbound, recovering rails and steel ties. At the same time, restoration began on the remaining locomotives and rolling stock remaining after the conflict. Eleven steam locomotives survived, and at least six have been rebuilt to working order.

In addition, several 1930s vintage Fiat 'Littorina' railcars survive and have been made operational, as well as two 1957 Krupp built Bo-Bo diesels (the line's newest locomotives) and one of three surviving Drewry shunters, brought to the railway by the British during the war years. Finally, several road trucks have been converted to run on rail wheels. Much freight stock and a number of passenger cars also survive. The line has now been restored from Massawa all the way through to Asmara, but as of 2006 no scheduled services traverse the whole length of the line. Charter trains for tourists now do, and regular train services exist in certain areas where there is demand. While the surviving equipment is sufficient for such a limited service, the purchase or building of more is necessary to provide a serious form of transportation over the length of the line. The Eritrean Railroad Authority has requested funding to continue the Italian-era plan to extend the route to Tesseney and provide an opportunity for Sudan to efficiently use the Port of Massawa. Mining companies in Eritrea have also inquired about use of the railway and its improvement.

The port facilities were greatly expanded in the early 1990s, with the construction of the new terminal, but the port has declined since trade with Ethiopia was terminated in 1998 as a consequence of the Eritrean-Ethiopian war.

During the twentieth century Assab became Ethiopia's main outlet to the sea.

The ex-Soviet Union later built an oil refinery in Assab. During the Eritrean War of Independence and famine of the 1980s, food aid was brought to Eritrea and the Ethiopian province of Tigrai through this port. Assab is very hot during summer months, temperatures can touch a scorching high of 54°C (129°F) in July and August.

UN mandated British Administration in Eritrea: From 5th February, 1941 to 15th September, 1952

In 1958 a group of Eritrean exiles met in Cairo to found the Eritrean Liberation Front (ELF).

In July 1960, In the city of Cairo, a group of young Eritrean students and intellectuals held a meeting and formed the Eritrean Liberation Front (ELF) under Idris Hamid Awate. The same year, in a written request of Idris Mohammed Adem, Idris Awate agreed to lead the armed struggle and declare the revolution but he asked for popular support ... The Imperial authorities immediately responded to Awate's declaration. A military unit in six trucks was sent to apprehend Idris Awate but failed. The Ethiopians resorted to using different tactics to deal with Idris Awate.

In August 1961. Idris Awate responded to Ethiopian authorities saying: “If you want us to end our armed struggle, then you better lower the Ethiopian flag and raise up the Eritrean flag.

In September 1, 1961, about eleven rebels led by Idris Himid Awate attacked police posts in western Eritrea. A fierce battle ensued between Awate’s and Ethiopian forces, lasting 7 hours, and ending in a stalemate.

In 2nd December, 1950, the United Nation General Assembly voted for which was later stipulated in Resolution number 390 (v) known as the “Ethio-Eritrean federation formula”. The UN in its decision, Eritrea would have its own parliament and internal administration and would be represented in what had been the Ethiopian Imperial parliament and would become a federal parliament. The United Nations decisively resolved later to establish Eritrea as an autonomous entity federated with Ethiopia as a compromise between Ethiopian claims for sovereignty and Eritreans aspirations for independence. Unlike other African country’s colonial experience, Ethiopia and Eritrea have a unique historical relationship that is intertwined as one entity. The arrangement gave Eritrea a considerable self-government and autonomy, with its own legislation, police and taxation powers. The co-Federal Imperial government controlled only foreign affairs, defense and the ports.

In 1951, Emperor Haile-Selassie I appointed Leult Tenagne-worq Haile-Selassie and her third husband Ras Andargatchew Messai Vicerein and Viceroy i.e. the Emperor’s representatives in the former Italian colony, the newly federated Eritrea. Princess Tenagneworq and Ras Andargatchew Messai had presided over Eritrea which was then tranquil and experimenting with its new status as an autonomous unit within the federal structure of Ethiopia.

On 15th September, 1952 The United Nations General Assembly passed a resolution known as R No 390-A (V) that sponsors and conducts a referendum for the people of Eritrea to reunite or be federated with Ethiopia with an overwhelming decision, it was undeniably the most important historic event.

The General Assembly of the United Nations voted 46 to 10 to have Eritrea federated with Ethiopia. The arrangement gave Eritrea a considerable self-government and autonomy, with its own legislation, police and taxation powers. The Co-federal government controlled only foreign affairs, defense and the ports. The United Nations made it clear, the new federal arrangement represented a compromise between the wishes and welfare of the inhabitants of Eritrea, the interest of peace and security in East Africa, and the rights and claims of Ethiopia, in particular Ethiopia’s legitimate need for adequate access to the sea. And the two rival parties known as the Moslem League party of Eritrea known as “Rabitta Al-Islamia” and the Unionist party of Eritrea known as “Mahiber Fikri-Hager” should campaign for seats in the federal parliament.

In December 2, 1952: “Eritrea Federation with Ethiopia” implemented

In September 11, 1961:Emperor Haile Selaisse dissolved the federation and Eritrea became a province of Ethiopia. Italy's former soldier/Askari/ in the name of Hamid Idris Awate sternly opposed the imperial government, started to fight back under the Eritrean Liberation Front. Hamid Idris Awate is known as the father of Eritrea's independence movement.

On the 14 November 1962: Right after nine years the “Eritrea In federation with Ethiopia” was officially dissolved by decree and Eritrea was fully annexed by Ethiopia. This was done by the Emperor Haile Selassie I pressuring the Eritrean Assembly to abolish the federation. Prior to the annexation of Eritrea the Chief Justice of Eritrea was removed and the official Eritrean languages were eliminated in favor of Ethiopia’s national language Amharic.

September 1st or 'Bahti Meskerem' remained a national holiday in Eritrea for it is the day the Italian former Askari shot the bullets for Eritrean independence from Ethiopia.

Hamid Idris Awate is known for attacking Ethiopian troops during the Italo-Ethiopian war. Believed he was also one of the non-commissioned officers in charge of Ethiopian traitors that were part of the 'Gruppo Bande Amhara'.

When Eritrea entered into a federation with Ethiopia, previously landlocked Ethiopia briefly enjoyed the use of Massawa as the headquarters of the now defunct Ethiopian Navy ultimately, Ethiopia dismantled the federation and forcibly annexed and occupied Eritrea. This led to the Eritrean War of Independence (1961–1991). In February 1990, units of the Eritrean People’s Liberation Front captured Massawa in a surprise attack from both land and sea. Known as Operation Fenkil, the attack utilized both infiltrated commandos and speed boats. The success of this attack cut the major supply line to the Second Ethiopian Army in Asmara, which then had to be supplied by air. In response, the then leader of Ethiopia Mengistu Haile Mariam ordered Massawa bombed from the air, resulting in considerable damage. As of 2005 the Eritrean government is rebuilding and repairing this damage.

Imperial Ethiopian Administration in Eritrea (Sept. 15, 1962 to Sept. 12, 1974)

HRH Tenagnework Haile Selassie & Ras Andargatchew Messai - Vice Rein & Vice Roy of Eritrea.

Brigadier-General Abiye Abebe - Governor-General - From 14th November, 1962 to July, 1964

Leul Ras Asrate-Medhin Kassa - Governor-General- From July, 1964 to December, 1970

Lt. General Debebe Haile-Mariam – Military Emergency Governor - From December, 1970 to August, 1974

The Federation of Ethiopia & Eritrea
The Federation of Ethiopia and Eritrea or Ethiopian–Eritrean Federation was a federation of the Ethiopian Empire and Eritrea. It was created by the approval of the Federal Act in Ethiopia and the Eritrean Constitution on 15 September 1952.

Prior to the annexation of Eritrea, the Chief Justice of Eritrea was removed and the official Eritrean languages were eliminated in favor of Ethiopia's national language Amharic. During the Federation, the encroachment of the Ethiopian Crown was felt on the Chief Executive of Eritrea. This was in direct contravention of the UN Resolution 390-A(V) which had established the Federation.

The federal structure, or some semblance of it, existed between 15 September 1952 and 15 November 1962. On 15 November 1962, following pressure from Haile Selassie I on the Eritrean Assembly, the Federation was officially dissolved and Eritrea was annexed by Ethiopia.

The Chief Executive of Eritrea – Federation of Ethiopia and Eritrea

The Chief Executive of Eritrea Federation with Ethiopia was the premier position of the Federation between Eritrea and Ethiopia. It was first held by Tedla Bairu while its last occupant was Abiye Abebe. On 20 May 1960 the post was dissolved and replaced by the Governor-General of Eritrea, which was appointed directly by the Emperor of Ethiopia. This in effect dissolved the independent Federal structure and was a prelude to the official, possibly illegal, annexation of Eritrea as a province of Ethiopia on 14 November 1962.

List of Chief Executives of Federation of Ethiopia and Eritrea (1952–1960)

Tedla Bairu - Chief Executive: From 15th September, 1952 to 29th July, 1955 (in de-facto)

From 8th August, 1955 to December, 1959 (in de-jure)
Asfaha Woldemikael - Chief Executive: From December, 1959 to 20th May, 1960 (in de-jure).

Abiye Abebe December 1959 to May 20, 1960

Abiye Abebe May 20, 1960 to November 14, 1962

Eritrea under Imperial Ethiopian Government Administration

November 14, 1962 to 1964 Abiye Abebe Governor-General

July 1964 to December 1970 Leul Ras Asrate Medhin Kassa Governor-General

December 1970 to August 1974 Lt. General Debebe Haile Mariam (Emergency Governor)

Eritrea As Ethiopian province (September 1974 to May, 1991)

August 1974 to 29 May 1976 Amanuel Amde Mikael, Chief Administrator

Brigadier General Getachew Nadew Military Administrator Aug.19, 1976 to Aug.19, 1976

Ammanuel Amde-Michael - Chief Administrator from August, 1974 to 29th May, 1976, and again from May 29, 1976 to 19th August, 1976
Ato Fikrou Wolde-Tinsae - Chief Administrator from August, 1981 to 29th May, 1983

Majour-General Merid Negussie – Military Commander & Administrator

Majour Dawit Wolde-Giorgis – Chief Administrator/Provincial Party secretary August, 1983 to August, 1987: And again from 19th August, 1987 to 18th May, 1989:

Brigadier-General Affeworki Wolde-Mikael (younger brother of unionist Asfaha Wolde Michael) - Chief civilian administrator from 19th August, 1989 to 28th May, 1991;
Lieutenant General Tesfaye Guebre-Kidan: Emergency Administrator & Military Commander of the ground forces in Eritrea.

In May, 1976 political negotiations between the central government of Ethiopia (PMAC) and the secessionist rebels, the Eritrean Liberation Front (ELF) had unsuccessfully made in various times in the ex-GDR, ex-Soviet Union, and the ex-South Yemen. In the wake of the ruling-Provisional Military Government's extending a nine-point policy declaration known as "Eritrea-Autonomous Region in Ethiopia", which that initiative was firmly rejected by then Eritrean secessionist movements mainly the Eritrean Liberation Front (ELF). Although the ELF initially seeks a limited scope of restoration of the federal arrangement that had terminated in September, 1962, but the escalation of hostilities among the two had pushed the rebels into the agenda of independence. Then the Eritrean problem came to be posed not as a constitutional issue but turned a colonial question.

Eritrea - At A Glance: The Liberation Struggle In Eritrea & Modern Day Eritrea

Eritrea had been placed under British military administration in 1941 after the Italian surrender. In keeping with a 1950 decision of the UN General Assembly, British military administration ended in September 1952 and was replaced by a new autonomous Eritrean government in federal union with Ethiopia. Federation with the former Italian colony restored an unhindered maritime frontier to the country. The new arrangement also enabled the country to gain limited control of a territory that, at least in its inland areas, was more advanced politically and economically. The Four Power Inquiry Commission established by the World War II Allies (Britain, France, the Soviet Union, and the United States) had failed to agree in its September 1948 report on a future course for Eritrea. Several countries had displayed an active interest in the area. In the immediate postwar years, Italy had requested that Eritrea be returned as a colony or as a trusteeship. This bid was supported initially by the Soviet Union, which anticipated a communist victory at the Italian polls. The Arab states, seeing Eritrea and its large Muslim population as an extension of the Arab world, sought the establishment of an independent state. Some Britons favored a division of the territory, with the Christian areas and the coast from Mitsiwa southward going to Ethiopia and the northwest area going to Sudan. A UN commission, which arrived in Eritrea in February 1950, eventually approved a plan involving some form of association with Ethiopia. In December the UN General Assembly adopted a resolution affirming the commission's plan, with the provision that Britain, the administering power, should facilitate the UN efforts and depart from the colony no later than September 15, 1952. Faced with this constraint, the British administration held elections on March 16, 1952, for a Representative Assembly of sixty-eight members. This body, made up equally of Christians and Muslims, accepted the draft constitution advanced by the UN commissioner on July 10. The constitution was ratified by the emperor on September 11, and the Representative Assembly, by prearrangement, was transformed into the Eritrean Assembly three days before the federation was proclaimed. The UN General Assembly resolution of September 15, 1952, adopted by a vote of forty-seven to ten, provided that Eritrea should be linked to Ethiopia through a loose federal structure under the emperor's sovereignty but with a form and organization of internal self-government. The federal government, which for all intents and purposes was the existing imperial government, was to control foreign affairs, defense, foreign and interstate commerce, transportation, and finance. Control over domestic affairs (including police, local administration, and taxation to meet its own budget) was to be exercised by an elected Eritrean assembly on the parliamentary model. The state was to have its own administrative and judicial structure and its own flag. Almost from the start of federation, the emperor's representative undercut the territory's separate status under the federal system. In August 1955, Tedla Bairu, an Eritrean who was the chief executive elected by the assembly, resigned under pressure from the emperor, who replaced Tedla with his own nominee. He made Amharic the official language in place of Arabic and Tigrinya, terminated the use of the Eritrean flag, and moved many businesses out of Eritrea. In addition, the central government proscribed all political parties, imposed censorship, gave the top administrative positions to Amhara, and abandoned the principle of parity between Christian and Muslim officials. In November1962, the Eritrean Assembly, many of whose members had been accused of accepting bribes, voted unanimously to change Eritrea's status to that of a province of Ethiopia. Following his appointment of the archconservative Ras Asrate Medhin Kasa as governor general, the emperor was accused of "re-feudalizing" the territory. The extinction of the federation consolidated internal and external opposition to union. Four years earlier, in 1958, a number of Eritrean exiles had founded the Eritrean Liberation Movement (ELM) in Cairo, under Hamid Idris Awate's leadership. This organization, however, soon was neutralized. A new faction, the Eritrean Liberation Front (ELF), emerged in1960. Initially a Muslim movement, the ELF was nationalist rather than Marxist and received Iraqi and Syrian support. As urban Christians joined, the ELF became more radical and anti-capitalist. Beginning in 1961, the ELF turned to armed struggle and by 1966 challenged imperial forces throughout Eritrea.

The rapid growth of the ELF also created internal divisions between urban and rural elements, socialists and nationalists, and Christians and Muslims. Although these divisions did not take any clear form, they were magnified as the ELF extended its operations and won international publicity. In June 1970, Osman Salah Sabbe, former head of the Muslim League, broke away from the ELF and formed the Popular Liberation Forces (PLF), which led directly to the founding of the Eritrean People's Liberation Front (EPLF) in early 1972. Both organizations initially attracted a large number of urban, intellectual, and leftist Christian youths and projected a strong socialist and nationalist image. By 1975 the EPLF had more than 10,000 members in the field. However, the growth of the EPLF was also accompanied by an intensification of internecine Eritrean conflict, particularly between1972 and 1974, when casualties were well over 1,200. In 1976 Osman broke with the EPLF and formed the Eritrean Liberation Front-Popular Liberation Front (ELF-PLF), a division that reflected differences between combatants in Eritrea and representatives abroad as well as personal rivalries and basic ideological differences, factors important in earlier splits within the Eritrean separatist movement. Encouraged by the imperial regime's collapse and attendant confusion, the guerrillas extended their control over the whole region by 1977. Ethiopian forces were largely confined to urban centers and controlled the major roads only by day.

The Eritrean People's Liberation Front (EPLF) (Tigrinya: ህዝባዊ ግንባር, ህግ), Arabic: إيرتيرا ل يـ رحت ر لا ش ع ب ةي لا ج ةهب) was an armed organization that fought for the independence of Eritrea from Ethiopia. It emerged in 1970 as an intellectual left-wing group that split from the Eritrean Liberation Front (ELF).

The EPLF was one of many armed groups struggling against the Ethiopian Military regime of Duerg. Affeworki was elected leader of the EPLF in 1975. After becoming one of the leaders of the EPLF in 1973, Affeworki wrote a manifesto called "Qualsina" i.e. Our Struggle and its Goals. This manifesto placed strong emphasis on overcoming ethnic and religious differences and on launching a revolutionary struggle during the independence war. In 1975, Affewerki became chairman of the EPLF military committee. In 1977, under EPLF's first congress, he was elected vice secretary-general of the EPLF. By this time there was a political struggle within the fight for independence between the predominately Christian EPLF and the mainly Muslim ELF. One civil war had already been fought between the two fronts between 1972 and 1974. Fighting began in February 1972 and spread through the lowlands, particularly at the Red Sea coast. Eventually, this conflict spread further into the highlands until in 1974, calls for the conflict to stop were finally heeded. These calls for peace came from local villagers at a time when the independence movement was close to victory over Ethiopia.

By 1979, another civil war had begun. The EPLF under Afwerki executed an offensive against the ELF in a bid to protect the EPLF's flanks under tremendous pressure from a resurgent Ethiopia. In 1980, the ELF had entered into secret negotiations with the Soviet Union to end the war. Furthermore, on defense of the Sahel stronghold of the EPLF, ELF units withdrew from the lines in August of the same year. This created tremendous friction between the fronts, which eventually led to the resumption of conflict. By this point the ELF had been drained during the Ethiopian resurgence after Soviet assistance was leveraged, and were eventually defeated by a joint force of the EPLF and the Tigray People's Liberation Front (TPLF), led by current Ethiopian president, Meles Zenawi, in 1981. The ELF were pushed across the border into the Sudan.

The alliance between the EPLF and the TPLF eventually brought the forces of both movements into Addis Ababa and Asmara, toppling the Duerg regime in May 1991 and achieving de facto Eritrean independence.

Prominent & Decorated Eritreans In The War For Liberation

Curiously are now memorialized as fathers of the Eritrean independence. The Eritrean people wrestled their independence after successive Ethiopian central governments occupation after a thirty years armed struggle referred to as "Biretawi Qualsi (Gedli)". Eritrea considered an Italian-created nation that was even called Primigenia, or "first daughter" of Italy.

Hamid Idris Awate (10 April 1910 – 28 May 1962)
He was an Eritrean independence leader and the creator of the Eritrean Liberation Army (the armed wing of the Eritrean Liberation Front). Idris Awateconsidered one of the first founding members who launched the armed struggle, finally developed by way of Eritrean Liberation Front (ELF), known later as Jabhaa, and into the Eritrean People's Liberation Front (EPLF) known as usually Shaabia.

Awate died on May 28, 1962 though some claim it was from natural causes. Hamid Awate was born on April 10, 1910 in the village of Gerset, located between Tessenei and Omhajer in southwestern Italian Eritrea. His father, a peasant, trained him as early as childhood in the use of guns.

In 1935, he was conscripted by the Italians to serve in the colonial army of the Eritrean Ascari. Beside his fluency in Arabic, Tigre, Tigrinya, Nara, Hedareb, and Kunama, Awate learned very well the Italian language within a short period of time and was sent to Rome for a course in military intelligence.

After returning from Italy, he was appointed as a security officer in western Eritrea. Shortly after, he served as deputy chief (Mayor) of the city of Kassala (Sudan) and its surroundings during the brief Italian occupation of that city in 1940/1941 at the beginning of WWII.[2] As Mayor of Kassala he promoted the political union of that city to his Eritrea (an Italian-created nation that was even called Primigenia, or "first daughter" of Italy), but the English attack at the end of January 1941 forced him to renounce to it.

He fought as a brave ascari in the Battle of Cheren and participated to the Italian guerilla in Eritrea against the British and Ethiopians in World War II with the cavalrymen of Ali Gabre.

After the victory Of Great Britain against Italy in WWII in Eritrea, Awate settled in western Eritrea but eventually went into a dispute against the British authorities and began an armed campaign against the British presence in Eritrea from 1942 to 1949. Afterwards, Awate and his armed fanction came to a truce agreement with the British authorities.

In the meantime the Eritrean independence movement was taking shape and working towards making Eritrea an independent country by peaceful means rather than joining landlocked Ethiopia. At the same time the Ethiopian government was desperately seeking an access to the sea through annexing Eritrea to its territory through the help and collabortion of Britain and USA and against the wish of the Eritrean people.

Woldeab Woldemariam (April 27, 1905 - May 15, 1995)
He was one of the original proponents of the Eritrean Independence movement and is considered the father of Eritrea. He worked closely with Ibrahim Sultan Ali before the Federation with Ethiopia to secure Eritrean Independence.

Woldeab Woldemariam was a devout Christian of the Protestant congregation. He was born in the Eritrean village of Adi Zarna.

In 1931 he was assigned by his then employer, the Swedish Evangelical Mission (SEM) school, to teach in a village called Suzana. This was his first exposure to the Kunama people. He was a teacher in this school through 1935 until he was moved to Asmara.

In Asmara he was promoted to direct the entire SEM school system, which he continued to do until 1942. During this time he popularized the use of Tigrinya and published two textbooks which would remain standard texts for over twenty years.

Political career: In 1942 he left the SEM and at the behest of the British Military Administration, became an editor for the Tigrinya language newspaper. After a trip to Addis Ababa, he became a chief opponent of unification with Ethiopia.

Chief among his fears of uniting Eritrea with Ethiopia was the corruption and poverty that he saw when he visited Addis Ababa. In 1946 he brought together Christian and Muslim nationalists to advocate for the independence of Eritrea from Ethiopia.

Between 1947 and 1953 he was subjected to seven assassination attempts. After the federation with Ethiopia by the United Nations he continued to advocate Eritrean independence by creating mass organizations, particularly with the help of labor organizations.

In 1953 another attempt was made on his life, suffering injuries which left him hospitalized for five months. While in the hospital he was elected to the National Assembly, however, his election was annulled by Tedla Bairu. After the annulment of the election he was forced to seek asylum in Egypt.

Sheikh Ibrahim Sultan Ali (1909-1987)
He was born in Keren in March 1909 of a farmer/trader Tigre/serf from the Rugbat of Ghizghiza district in Sahel. He attended Quran School under Khalifa Jaafer of the Halanga of Kassala. In Keren, he attended technical training at Salvaggio Raggi and at Umberto School in Asmara. His only son Abdulwahab, lives in Paris.

Ibrahim Sultan worked as chief in train station, served as civil servant in Keren, Agordat, Tessenei, Adi Ugri and even Wiqro near Mekele for six months. He had good command in speaking and translating Italian, Arabic Tigre and Tigrinia. From 1926 to 1941, he was head of Islamic Affairs section in the political affairs office under Italian rule.. Under the British, he served as head of Civil/Native Affairs Office till April 1943. He resigned and established a modern cheese plant in Tessenei which he ran till end of 1945. The Eritrean Chamber of Commerce was established that year and he became one of its senior staff members till end of September 1946. He represented Eritrea in front of the U.N. and was one of the leading and strongest members of the ELF.

Ibrahim died on 1 September 1987 (what would become the Eritrean Revolution Day) in Cairo, after having been sick for many years. He was buried on 5 September in Kassala, Sudan.

Political life: In May 1941, he was a founding member of the Patriotic Association till he helped found the Muslim League of Eritrea on 3/12/1946. The League took Keren as its headquarters till parties were shut down by Ethiopian interference in the late 1950s. Ibrahim Sultan, who was a key figure in the establishment of Blocco Indipendenza (Independence Bloc) on 26 July 1949 was elected the Secretary General of the organization. In January 1951, he partook in the establishment of the Eritrean Democratic Front (EDF) and became its Secretary General. He was a member of the first Eritrean Parliament when he won election on 15/5/1952 representing the Rugbat tribe of which he was the traditional chief from 1948 to 1950.

On September 20, 1949 the United Nation discussing the future of Eritrea invited independent block Eritrean leaders, Sheikh Ibrahim Sultan made the strongest representation for Eritrean Independence.At UN, Sheikh Ibrahim is quoted to have said: “If a wrong decision is taken forcing us to struggle to safeguard our identity and obtain our independence, then the members of this Committee will shoulder the responsibility for the hostilities that arise in East Africa”.

Abdulkadir Mohamed Saleh Kebire
He was born in 1902 at Island (Desiet) around Massawa. He attended Quranic school followed by the Ferdinando Martini School for his elementary education. At the age of 18, Kebire left for Egypt for pursuit of education and it is where he witnessed the revolution of Saad Zeqlul against the British, an incident that left its mark on him and shaped his rebellious character. A self-educated person, Kebire become more interested in politics and was determined to make a change in his country to improve the livelihood of his people.

Coming back to Eritrea, Kebire worked as a writer in Asmara and Massawa and as translator for the Italian delegation to Hodeida in Yemen. It was a great opportunity for him to acquaint himself with notable politicians and intellectuals of the era. He become a respected socialite around the diplomatic circles in Yemen and gained many friends. His importance was noticeable to the extent that he participated in the team that was set to broker a peace deal between Saudi-Arabia and Yemen over a border disagreement between the two countries. The team included important personalities of the era: Shiekh Amin Al-Hussaini of Palestine (the leader/Martyr of the famous Palestinian uprising); The notable writer Hashim Al-Atassi from Syria; and Prince Shekib Arselan of Lebanon. During his trips to Saudi Arabia to negotiate peace, he met and befriended the Saudi Prince, later King, Faisal Bin AbdulAziz, who used to call him ‘Al Messewe’e’.

On May 5, 1941 after the defeat of the Italians in the Second World War and the occupation of Eritrea by the British, Kebire co-founded and became one of the executive leaders of Mahber Fikri Hager (Association of Love of Country), which was seeking social, economic, and legal rights for Eritreans. The Mahber Fiqri Hager (Love of the Nation Club) leadership was composed of twelve members of whom six were Muslims.

After the war, the Mahber Fiqri Hager called for a peaceful demonstration. Around 3000-4000 people had gathered to take part. They marched to the governor’s palace in Asmara where the military administrator of Eritrea, Brigadier General Kennedy Cooke, lived. The demonstrators demanded to communicate through their leaders from the Mahber Fiqri Hager. Because of his educational background and nationalistic feelings, Kebire was selected by MFH to represent the people of Asmara before Brigadier General Cooke.

Approaching the British military authorities, Kebire forwarded a ‘welcome’ speech and proceeded systematically to remind the British of their wartime promises of freedom and self-determination. He also explained that the people of Eritrea were awaiting their response with optimism. However, Cooke's reply was discouraging and degrading,

Pro-Unionist Tedla Bairu (1914–1984), the first Chief Executive of Eritrea in federation with Ethiopia from 1952,

He was an Eritrean political figure. He was the last independent head of state of Eritrea in 1952. He was then the first Chief Executive of Eritrea from 1952 in federation with Ethiopia, until he resigned in 1955. He was described as an "opportunist" by his opponents for his unwavering Unionist position. His career paralleled that of Woldeab Woldemariam besides the fact that he did not support Eritrean independence.[1]

After Emperor Haile Selassie forced his resignation he become disillusioned with the Federation. When he was appointed as ambassador to Sweden from Ethiopia in 1967 he defected to the Eritrean Liberation Front.

Osman Saleh Sabbe Sultan
Known to be one of the co-founder of the ELF (the off-shot Al-Wahda), and led its political wing until the ELF had been smashed by the EPLF. He was born in 1932 in a village of Hirgigo in the suburb of Massawa. After attending local Islamic school, he joined Hirgigo primary school which was founded by Pasha Saleh Ahmed Kekia in 1944. After finishing elementary and middle school he traveled to Addis Ababa to complete his secondary school and attend teacher training college. While in Addis Ababa, he was active in establishing a Muslim student association.

After graduating from teacher training college, he returned to Hirgigo and worked as a teacher and later a principal of the school. Osman understood the importance of education and the lack of proper education institutes in Eritrea and especially in the lowlands of Eritrea, therefore he used to encourage and send his students to Sudan and Egypt in pursuit of further education. Osman Saleh Sabbe survived by six children (2 sons and 4 daughters)

In the late 1940s and early 1950's during his time in Addis Ababa, Eritrean politics was in a crossroad, where Eritrean nationalist movement was springing. Like many Eritrean patriot Osman had a strong stand on the need for Eritrean independence and his activities were put under surveillance by the Ethiopian authorities and forced to exile to Aden, Yemen in 1960.

Revolutionary leaders such as Romadan Mohammed Nur, Alamin Mohammed Said and Ibrahim Affa that made great contribution towards the struggle of Eritrean Independence were some of his students from Hirghigo School. Osman Saleh Sabbe died of a sudden illness in April 4, 1987 in a hospital in Cairo, Egypt Political life: Osman Sabbe dedicated his life to the struggle of Eritrean Independence and became the backbone of Eritrean revolution during the dark and desperate years. After exile, Osman focused his activity in bringing follow Eritreans in exile into strengthening the fight for independence agenda. During this time Osman had participated in the ELF leadership and was appointed as head of foreign affair. He succeed in raising awareness of Eritrean struggle for independence across the Mideastern and African countries such as Yemen, Somalia, Saudi Arabia and Egypt, Syria. Osman Sabeh died of natural cause in Cairo, Egypt.

Ibrahim Afa: A veteran fighter in the ELF (Jabhaa), and one of its co-founders.

Abdalla Idris: A veteran fighter in the ELF (Jabhaa), and one of its co-founders.

Ahmed Nasser Mohammed: A veteran fighter in the ELF (Jabhaa), and one of its co-founders.

Issaias Affeworki (ኢሳያስ ኣፍወርቂ) (born February 2, 1946),

Issaias Affeworki is the first President of the State of Eritrea, a position he has held since its independence in April 1993. He led the Eritrean People's Liberation Front (EPLF) to victory in May 1991, thus ending the 30-year-old armed liberation struggle that the Eritrean people refer to as "Gedli". The EPLF adopted a new political party name, People's Front for Democracy and Justice (PFDJ) to reflect its new responsibilities. The PFDJ, with Affworki as its leader, still rules Eritrea. Under his rule Eritrea has become the worst place to live on earth. It had been reported that he personally kills, rapes and even strangles many Eritreans in a daily basis.

Isaias Afwerki was born in 1946 in Asmara to Eritrean parents Afwerki Abraha and Adanesh Berhe. Afwerki grew up in Asmara, graduating from Prince Makonnen High School in good standing in 1965. His good grades allowed him to obtain admittance to the highly competitive School of Engineering in former Haile Selassie I University (now called Addis Ababa University) in Addis Ababa, Ethiopia. However, his university studies were interrupted when he decided to join the Eritrean liberation struggle a year later.

The 30-year Eritrean War of Independence was an armed liberation struggle that lasted from 1961 to 1991 and is referred to by the Eritrean people as "Gedli". Affeworki became a part of the struggle in 1966, when he abandoned his engineering studies in Addis Ababa and left for Kassala, Sudan, joining the Eritrean Liberation Front (ELF) in exile. In early 1967, Affeworki, along with Ramadan Mohammed Nour, was sent to China for military training. There they spent almost two years studying political ideologies and guerrilla warfare. Upon Afwerki's return, he was appointed political commissar of the ELF.

In 1970, ideological and tactical disagreements within the ELF led to three factions splitting from the ELF. One faction took refuge in the mountains of Sahel. Another group under Affworki's command, numbering less than a dozen, left for Eritrea's eastern escarpment. The third group headed off to Aden and returned by boat to Eritrea, landing south of Assab. These three groups would eventually join to become one and went by the name of the Eritrean Liberation Front-People's Liberation Front (ELF-PLF). When they formally merged in 1973, they changed their name to the Eritrean People's Liberation Front (EPLF).

Ramadan Mohammed Nour: A veteran fighter in the ELF, and later co-founder of the EPLF now retired.

Sebhat Ephrem (Tigrinya: ሰብሓት ኤፍረም, b. 1951) is the Minister of Defense for Eritrea, and former Eritrean People's Liberation Front commander during the Eritrean War of Independence. Sebhat attended high school at the Evangelical Lutheran High School in Asmara, Eritrea. Sebhat Ephrem served from June 1992 to March 1994 as the Governor of Asmara. From March 1994 to May 1995 he served as the Minister of Health. In both positions he brought structure and reorganization to these offices. After leaving the military in June 1992, he returned to the army in May 1995 with the rank of General and was appointed and confirmed as Minister of Defense.

Mahmoud Ahmed Sherifo (born 1948): Commonly known simply as Sherifo, served briefly as the Head of State of Eritrea while the President was away. He joined the Eritrean Liberation Front in 1967. He also served as Minister of Foreign Affairs before his last posting as Minister of Local Government. During this time he was also appointed Chairman of the Committee to prepare the draft laws concerning the first round of National Elections and the Political Party laws. Once the drafts were completed the Chairman of the National Assembly (and President), Isaias Affeworki summoned a report on the drafts. Mahmoud Ahmed Sherifo was detained for his hazy role (schemes that occurred on May 19, 1993), and for orchestrating a coup d'état in 2001. Records show he was often absent throughout critical battle and was dubbed "Fisto and Fihira," unique nicknames reserved for cowardly individuals. He has been detained since 2001 following the G-15 affair. Dissidents suggest he has been detained for campaigning for democratic reforms, while official sources contend that his detention is a consequence of "discreetly...solicit[ing] support in government circles for ousting the president, and to seek US and UN intervention to end the war on Ethiopia's surrender terms" while being detained. Certain sources indicate that Sherifo died while in custody. Although Eritrea has no post of vice president, nonetheless some sources have listed Sherifo as the vice president, and continue to do so (2006). Amnesty International has named him a prisoner of conscience and called for his immediate release

Petros Solomon (also known as "Wedi-Solomon" meaning Son of Solomon): Born 1951 he is an Eritrean politician. He was an Eritrean People's Liberation Front commander during the Eritrean War of Independence, and following independence he served in several positions in the Cabinet, including Minister of Defense and Minister of Foreign Affairs. He has been in prison, held incommunicado in an undisclosed location, since September 18, 2001 for opposing the rule of Eritrean president Isaias Affeworki. Amnesty International named him a prisoner of conscience.

Abdalla Jabir: Is the Head of Organizational Affairs at the People's Front for Democracy and Justice (PFDJ), Eritrea's ruling and sole political party. He also serves as political advisor to the President.

Ali Said Abdella (September 1949 – August 28, 2005):
He was an Eritrean ex-rebel commander, politician and diplomat, who at the time of his death was serving as Minister of Foreign Affairs of Eritrea. Ali Said was the son of a shepherd. He was of Afar ethnic origin. As a young man, he joined the Eritrean Liberation Front, a rebel group which was fighting for Eritrean independence from Ethiopia. He received medical and military training in Syria in 1965 and soon returned to Eritrea where he was an active fighter. Ali Said Abdalla was also known to be the co-hijacker of the Ethiopian Airlines DC passenger plane … en-route to Beirut by headwaying to Karachi, Pakistan where later blown up at the airport in April, 1969.

By the 1970s he had switched to Eritrea's other rebel group, the Eritrean People's Liberation Front and, in 1977, he became a member of the politburo of that organization. He was the commander of Nacfa front when the city was liberated in 1977. When Eritrea gained independence in the early 1990s, Ali Said served in the new government, becoming Minister of Internal Affairs. He was then appointed as Minister of Trade and Industry in February 1997. In October 2000, Ali Said was moved from his position as Minister of Trade and Industry to that of Minister of Foreign Affairs, switching jobs with Haile Woldense. He was considered to be a hardliner in Eritrea's continuing struggles with Ethiopia over the border, and was known as a proponent of stronger relations for Eritrea with Middle Eastern nations. He was a fluent Arabic speaker, and most of his overseas trips were to Middle Eastern countries. He also made an official visit to Russia in April 2005. Ali Said died suddenly of a heart attack in his sleep at his home in Eritrea's capital, Asmara, on August 28, 2005. The Eritrean government declared three days of public mourning for him. Ali Said was survived by four children.

Eritrea's independence in de-facto - May 24, 1991:- Eritrea gained independence in de-jure from Ethiopia after a long war of independence. The United Nations created technical mandatory team known as, the UN Observer Mission to Verify the Eritrean Referendum (UNOVER), headed by the Lebanese career diplomat Mr. Samir Sambar, have confirmed the Eritrean referendum to declare its nationhood in de-jure. A transitional legislature the "National Assembly of Eritrea" was established by the ruling, Peoples Front for Democracy and Justice (PFDJ), known locally as "Hizbawi Gimbar", and Mr. Issaias Affe-Worki was elected founder-president of the reemerged state of Eritrea by then transitional legislature, a commission also found to draft a new constitution to be ratified in May, 1997, but has not yet been fully implemented.

The Eritrean people wrestled their independence from successive Ethiopian central governments occupation after a thirty years armed struggle referred to as "Gedli". With Eritrea's de-facto independence (complete military liberation) in 24th May, 1991, Ethiopia the once strong empire in the region reverted to being landlocked and its Navy was dismantled (partially taken over by the nascent national navy of Eritrea). During the Eritrean-Ethiopian War the port was inactive, primarily due to the closing of the Eritrean-Ethiopian border which cut off Massawa from its traditional hinterlands.

Eritrea's independence in de-jure - April 25, 1991:- -The country seceded from Ethiopia in May, 1991 and then elected by the National Assembly after achieving de jure independence in 23 to 25 of April, 1993. Eritrea independence was overwhelmingly approved by a referendum under a United Nations created technical mandatory team known as, the UN Observer Mission to Verify the Eritrean Referendum (UNOVER), headed by the Lebanese career diplomat Mr. Samir Sambar, the UN technical mandatory mission have confirmed the Eritrean referendum as to declare its nationhood in de-jure in April, 25 1993. The referendum in Eritrea helped when the Eritrean people voted almost unanimously in favor of independence and this was verified by the UN Observer Mission to Verify the Referendum in Eritrea (UNOVER). The referendum was supported by Ethiopia, but pan –Ethiopian groups have sharply criticized the UNOVER, the way handles the popular referendum in Eritrea.

Meantime, Adei Alemash Gebre-Leul, mother of the Ethiopian transitional president is widely believed to have Eritrean ethnicity, has vote-casted in favor of the Eritrean independence. Meles Zenawi's citizenship issue still remains controversial. His mother told the monthly magazine "Aser" published in Eritrea, "I wish him all the best for him, I wish-not him faces ill-political fate like his predecessors". Eritreans then voted almost unanimously for independence, leaving Ethiopia a landlocked nation. After achieving Eritrean independence in de-jure, it transformed into the People's Front for Democracy and Justice (PFDJ), which serves as Eritrea's only legal political organization.

MOTHER OF ALL CIA POLITICAL SURROGATES IN ETHIOPIA
How Richard Miles COPELAND of the CIA recruited Isayas Affeworki in 1969 in Asmara, then Eritrea Province of Ethiopia. Aleme Eshete as told by Tesfamichael Giorgio

(SENAI MAGAZINE) February 1985 EC /February 1993 GC/ Addis Ababa, Ethiopia (version translated from Amharic) Before delving into the subject matter, we would like to say a few words about the CIA. Established in 1947, the CIA is the American spying agency in foreign lands with the objective of advancing the national interests of the United States. Similar to its rival the Soviet KGB, the CIA has been deeply engaged and has to a large extent met the responsibility entrusted to it. This spy agency has been engaged since its establishment in 1947, in three principal areas it has been particularly successful in secret political infiltration and psychological warfare in foreign lands through the use of force and secret plots. Given American focus on fighting socialism, the CIA has been particularly active in infiltrating and plotting to overthrow socialist regimes, and designating in its place a puppet regime which it can manipulate as desired. Where it has not succeeded to overthrow a given regime through infiltration and secret plotting, America does not hesitate to intervene militarily and designate a puppet regime. All this is carried out in the name of "democracy and human rights"

It was thus that (in 1969) the CIA had launched a secret operation known by the code name of "seed planting project" (nursery), at Kagnew military base (near Asmara). At that date the United States had completely lost faith in Haile Selassie government. This CIA project was therefore intended to prepare an alternative means to defend American interests in the Red Sea and the Horn of Africa. And this alternative was plotting against and sabotaging Ethiopian unity, in collaboration with Ato Isayas Afeworki.

This account may not be trusted by our readers. And yet this account is the truth as told by no other than Tesfamichael Giorgio, then a governor of a district in Eritrea, who had participated in the negotiations at Kagnew between the CIA and Isayas Afeworki. America was alerted that her position in the Red Sea and the Horn of Africa was facing danger when she realized that a guerrilla organization shortly known as ELF (Eritrean Liberation Front) or JEBHA supported by closely allied Arab countries was gaining fame through its military campaigns in the Eritrean low lands, while the Government of Haile Selassie battered from various angles was shaking unable to stand on its feet.

The United States Government was worried that if the situation continued in this way, Eritrea and the Red Sea will fall under the control of extremist Arab countries (allied to the Soviet Union), while Haile Selassie government will be overthrown and replaced by a socialist regime. (Our Note: More importantly, due to PLO training and advice and also due to the provision of arms and finances by Libya, the Sudan, South Yemen, and others …the establishment of the PLF marked an important turning point).

Until then, for instance, Eritrea fighters had rarely used mines and explosives…By 1969 the number of Eritreans who had received training abroad (including Cuba, China) in advanced guerrilla tactics had increased considerably. With their new method and weapons the Eritreans began executing spectacular acts of sabotage and terrorism, including hijacking of planes, kidnapping of foreign diplomats, blowing up of bridges in front of cameras and ambushing and assassinating Ethiopian functionaries and collaborators Haggai Erlich, "The struggle over Eritrea", 1983 p.28).

That is the background to the CIA secret operation known by the secret code of "seed planting project." And indeed the CIA has been able to anticipate and avoid a planned attack by the Palestinian organization known as “Black September «against the American bases in Asmara and Gurae.

Once the project was launched the CIA and top officials of Kagnew were busy recruiting intellectuals and young Eritreans coming to relax at the “Top Five” and Golf Club in Asmara. Their spying infiltration activities convinced the CIA more and more that Haile Selassie government, faced with both civilian and military opposition, could not last long, while on the other hand, the Eritrean guerrilla organization – the ELF – active in the Eritrean deserts, faced equally strong (mainly Christian) opposition whom it hunted down and eliminated physically.

Among the Eritrean groups opposed to the ELF was Isayas Afeworki’s “Selfi Natsinet” (Kidane Kinfu had been sent in 1965 by the ELF to recruit Addis Ababa University students for the ELF and sow the seed of student revolt against the government of Haile Selassie Government). “Eritreans at Addis Ababa University distinguished themselves by their political activism and their immersion in the radical ideological currents that were beginning to surge in Ethiopian student circles in the mid 1960’s (Markakis, “National and Class Conflict in the Horn” –1985, p119). By coincidence or by design, the Ethiopian student revolt had also started in 1965: And that is where the future leaders of the EPLF, including perhaps Isayas Afeworki, were recruited.

It is difficult to imagine that Kidane Kiflu entered Ethiopia and carried out his mission of recruitment and inciting revolt without attracting the attention of the Ethiopian security. We could imagine on the other hand, that he too was a CIA agent inside the ELF. Indeed given CIA expertise in destroying unwanted opposition parties through infiltration, and through the creation of parallel organizations, it has, either directly or indirectly, through Saudi Arabia and conservative Iraq, infiltrated the ELF Muslim leadership of the western Muslim lowlands, with its well-known divide and rule objective on religious and linguistic lines (Arab versus Tigrigna).

Although strongly resented by the Christian highlanders, Arabic was the official language of the ELF. Its literature was written in that language, and Arab nomenclature was adopted within the front, such as “JEBHA”, and “SHAEBIA”. All that contributed to the Muslim-Christian contradictions. It is to such contradictions of divide and rule methods that the continuous massacre of Christian members within the ELF have been attributed. The creation of religious and linguistic zones similar to our “kilel” of to-day enforced by the conservative elements within the ELF and which had incited strong opposition among particularly the Christian highlanders, may also be attributed to such “divide and rule” external infiltration.

So also Ethiopia, certainly in collaboration with the CIA appears to have been engaged in secret contacts with the ELF: Indeed about September 1969, that is a few weeks before the CIA story we are recounting here, “the leaders of the western regions were in constant touch with Idris Mohamed Adem (one time ELF Chairman and conservative element) were negotiating a deal with the Ethiopians in which the ELF would stop disturbing communication with the ports of Massawa and Assab in exchange for a free hand in the west (along the Sudan border.

Mohamed Ahmed Abdu (member of the General command formed by the Adobha congress of August 1969) was accused of negotiating to this effect with the U.S consul in Asmara, Murray Jackson. The chief advisors of Eritrea's Ethiopian Governor, Ras Asrate Kassa – namely, Tesfayohannes Berhe, Hamid Faraj, and Muhammad Umar Qadi – were to be in contact with members of the General command. In fact, sometime in early 1970, (1969?) the Ethiopian Ras clandestinely travelled to a remote town near the Sudanese border to discuss the matter with Idris Adam" (Haggai Erlich , "The Struggle over Eritrea : 1962-1978 (Hoover Institution publication , 1983).

Isayas Afeworki was born in 1946 in the Christian highlands of Hamasien, and is of Tigray origin on the side of his mother who was a native of ancient and historic Yeha in the Adowa region. Dejazmatch Solomon Abrha, one time Assistant Minister of Interior, and later Governor of Wollo was his uncle. Isayas had joined the ELF in 1967 (Markakis,, op.cit p.286, says 1966) after dropping out from the Engineering College in Addis Ababa University. Indeed In 1967, the Supreme Council of the ELF had sent him to Maoist China where he received a six-month military training, a strange opportunity for a newly recruited Christian element in the largely conservative Muslim leadership drawn from the Western lowlands and conservative ELF.

Haggai Erlich's story regarding the early days of Isayas in relation with the Italian half-cast Dr. Biasolo is false in some ways. Haggai writes in the struggle over Eritrea, 1983, p.29 that Isayas was influenced as a youngster by a Marxist-oriented economist from Asmara, Dr. Biasolo, a half caste businessman". I have known Dr. Biasolo in Rome where he lived in exile under the Derg. He was not a Marxist. On the contrary he was very close to the Ethiopian leadership of the EPDA organized and financed by the CIA. One may therefore conclude that he might have been in those days in Asmara in the 1960s and early 1970s among the CIA collaborators, all, including Isayas – posing under the cover and cloak of Marxism. With the rise to power of Isayas, Dr. Biasolo who has been promised to regain the property of his house has returned to Asmara.

In 1969 Kidane Kinfu would be assassinated in Kassala, at the height of an anti-Christian hysteria, among the Western Eritrea ELF Muslim leaders, apparently on suspicion of being a spy of the Addis Ababa Government. Several hundred Christians were thus executed accused of being spies of the imperial government. See John Markakis, op.cit p.120, 126. 127 For the Christian Eritreans then concentrated in the former "fifth" Christian zone reserved for fighters from the highlands of Seraye, Hamasien and Akeleguzay, and "particularly for the radical former (Addis Ababa university) student contingent, this was the last straw. Some abandoned the movement entirely; others fled to the Sudan. Others in the former "fifth zone" split and headed for a place called Ala on the eastern edge of the escarpment in Akeleguzay to join Abraham Tewelde, the former commander of the "fifth Christian zone".

Among them was Isayas Afeworki the former political commissar of this zone." (Markakis: National and Class conflict p.127). It appears that Isayas' group was initially (around this date) no more than eleven. (Tesfatsion Medhanie, op. cit p. 35) One other important point that has to be raised in relation with Isayas' membership of the ELF is that, as we now discover, justifying ELF suspicion, Isayas was indeed one of the spies in the service of the Ethiopian government paid to infiltrate the ELF and inform Addis Ababa.

In fact in an interview with the magazine "Menelik" (March 2001), General Daniel Mengistu, head of External intelligence Service at the Emperor's cabinet, as the General himself tells us their job was different from the internal security organization. Their job was to spy on anti Ethiopian and anti-Government activities on the part of our Arab neighbors inside Eritrea and Somalia, as well as to spy on Soviet Communist activities in Ethiopia, and protect the person of the Emperor while travelling abroad.

The General tells us that the Foreign Intelligence Service was working in close co-operation with "our allies", particularly, the CIA who helped them in the fights of what was considered the "principal enemy", i.e. the Soviet Union and Soviet Communism. "Paul Henze was our advisor for 27 months (1969-1972)" the general tells us. Paul Henze was "advising" Ethiopia while Isayas was plotting with Richard Copeland in Asmara to break Eritrea and dismember Ethiopia! It is no secret that the Ethiopian security was organized by the CIA and Mossad, and may indeed be considered, under Haile Selassie, (like the the Savak of the Shah of Iran) an international branch of the CIA.

General Daniel tells us that although the Eritrean secessionist movement led by the ELF was infinitely small and did not mobilize more than 2000 followers they kept close watch on its movements, through spies that had infiltrated the organization. "And one of these was Isayas Afeworki whom they had recruited to follow the Eritrean situation and report to them. It was precisely for that purpose that he was sent to join the ELF. Isayas was financed and equipped with all that he needed by Ras Asrate Kassa (the Emperor's Enderasie – Governor – 1964-1970.)

Our agent in the Sudan was also co-coordinating the activities of our spies in the infiltration of the ELF. Our spies were largely Christians as the Christian highlanders in Eritrea were afraid of being overwhelmed by the Muslims. ". There could be no doubt that both the CIA and the Mossad must have known this. The Israelis were since 1965 engaged in the formation of the Nebelbal commando paramilitary counter-insurgency units to tackle the ELF in close collaboration with Ras Asrate Kassa. Isayas must have known this and this might support the suspicion that Isayas was already in contact with the CIA before leaving Addis permanently and perhaps even as a student at the Engineering College about which certain ELF leaders seem to be convinced.

Once the Americans had discovered and identified the persecution suffered by “Selfi Natsinet” they were convinced that they could use it to fight back against the Muslim ELF and its ally the Palestinian “Black September” which threatened their bases at Asmara and Gurae. It was thus that Richard Copeland (we believe the true name is the famous CIA agent at this time Miles Copeland who recruited Abdel Nasser) of the CIA launched the “seed planting project” and began hunting for members of that organization. Whether Eritrea will break away from Ethiopia, and whether human rights will be respected or not, does not bother American foreign policy. As long as American interests were served they were ready to ally themselves with the devil.

In order not to attract the opposition of the Ethiopian government, Richard Copeland had suggested what he called “Peace Conference” between the Ethiopian government and apparently, the ELF leadership.(Whether the invitation letter was really sent to the ELF leadership or it was just another CIA ploy of announcing names without actually inviting the person concerned, as would seem most likely in this case, is for the survivors of ELF to tell us) . A separate letter inviting “Selfi Natsinet” to attend the conference has been written by Dejazmatch Gebre Yohannes Tesfamariam.

Upon receipt of Selfi Natsinet’s favorable response signed by Abraham Tewelde (leader of the Ala‟ Christian group at that date) and Solomon Woldemariam addressed to the Ethiopian Government, the date and place of the conference has been fixed. Accordingly a government negotiating committee made up of three representatives, - Lieutenant Colonel Gebre Egziabher Mehari, vice commissioner of the Eritrean Police force, and the author of this account , Tesfamichael Giorgio, governor of Dekemehare, with Dejazmatch Gebrekidan Tessema – judge at the supreme court, as Chairman, was established on Hedar 28, 1962 (November 1969).

On 5 Tahsas, the negotiating committee had proceeded to the Ala desert but upon arrival the ELF leaders have not turned up because of the conflict between the two. Waiting for us were only the “Selfi Natsinet” faction of the ELF. Selfi Natsinet had therefore a good opportunity to discuss alone and freely with the Government delegation and meet the American officials at Kagnew.

Several suggestions were forwarded by both parties in the negotiations. The Selfi Natsinet group had requested for arms and material assistance to fight the Muslim ELF, but the government side having declined to meet that request saying they did not want to fuel a religious war among citizens they had suggested instead to Selfi Natsinet to give their hands to the government and stop fighting. To this Selfi Natsinet having requested to talk to its members for their reaction, requested another appointment and the meeting was adjourned at that.

Following this Richard Copeland had asked the author of this story, Tesfa Michael Giorgio, to arrange a separate meeting between him and the Selfi Natsinet leadership. It was thus that a meeting between Richard Copeland and Habteselassie Gebre Medhin at Kagnew military base. At this meeting Copeland had learnt from Habteselassie many major facts pertinent to his secret plot. He had concluded that it was important to ally himself with his new friends and attack both the Arab supported ELF and Haile Selassie's government from the back by surprise. He did not mind to see Eritrea disintegrating as long as America's interest in the Red Sea and Horn of Africa were served. Habteselassie briefed Abraham Tewelde and Isayas Afeworki on his talks with Richard Copeland. He was then sent back to Dekemehare to arrange the agenda for the next meeting with Richard Copeland.

At the fixed date , Richard Copeland and his friend Richard Siwelen had come up with a an arms catalogue in order to further sharpen the desire of Selfi Natsinet leaders, and induce them to accept to serve as American war proxies. At this meeting Richard Copeland appeared most interested to know the contradiction between Selfi Natsinet and the ELF. Richard Copeland was not worried by the secession of Eritrea from Ethiopia but by the influence Islamic fundamentalist with the ELF and the risk of losing the Red Sea to a rival power. Finally Richard Copeland asked Habteselassie to bring a letter from the Selfi Natsinet leadership officially requesting for military assistance.

Accordingly a letter signed by Isayas Afeworki was addressed to the head of Kagnew base Colonel Mamuzer with the following requests.

1. Given that the Christian fighters at Ala are daily massacred and slaughtered by the Muslim ELF which obtains massive political and military aid from Arab as well as , indirectly from socialist countries,

2. Given that the ELF policy reflects above all Arab policy and is targeted mainly against American and Israeli interests

3. Given that the political objective of Selfi Natsinet is fundamentally different aiming towards the establishment of a progressive democratic movement.

To that end they requested American military assistance.

Selfi Natsinet addressed such letters not only to the United States but to all Western countries stressing always the fact of the Arab and socialist assistance to the Muslim ELF. It was clear that the leaders of Selfi Natsinet saw only their rival the ELF whom they wanted to destroy. They did not however consider the danger of allying with imperialist Western powers, which, at any time could change their position if they find other more profitable ways for advancing their interests.

After receiving the letter from Isayas the Americans were happy to see that their "seed planting operation "was advancing successfully. They fixed a budget and started financing the movement. However, as they had to finalize the agreement with Isayas Afeworki, an appointment date was fixed. Since the letter to the CIA was signed by Isayas Afeworki, the CIA specifically asked to talk to Isayas Afeworki and not to the Selfi Natsinet Chairman Abraham Tewelde. In fact Abraham Tewelde would die in what has been described "mysterious circumstances" in reality poisoned by Isayas – prior to the 1st ELF Congress October-November 1971. Isayas will become the top figure –see Tesfatsion Medhanie, "Eritrea – Dynamics of a National Question," p.37)

On the appointment date, Ato Tesfamichael drove to Ala to accompany Ato Afeworki to Kagnew. The Americans having decided that, for security reasons, it would be better to hold the talks outside Kagnew, the group drove to the house of a security colleague near the Cathedral of St. Francesco at the Residence called Bowling. Richard Copeland had come in company of several American officials for the negotiations with Isayas Afeworki. Isayas repeated the request that he had already enumerated in his letter and concluded by asking American assistance.

The Americans wanted to hear a clear commitment on the part of Isayas that they will protect all American bases and citizens in Eritrea from terrorist attacks. Isayas promised that he will do everything to protect American interests, but that he did not yet have the force to defend the American bases in Asmara and Gurae. The Americans told him indirectly that as they are worried that following the fall of the weakened government of Haile Selassie, a military government might come to power, unfriendly to the United States, they were ready to ally themselves even with anti-unity secessionist forces. Indeed they stressed the point that they desired to ally themselves with an anti-socialist force committed to defend the Kagnew base as well as similar other American bases in the Red Sea, and committed to the establishment of a democratic government in Eritrea.

Isayas Afeworki, not having appreciated the American indirect reference regarding their disinterest for Ethiopian unity, stressed that they wanted full independence and that they will not accept a federal solution that may be proposed by the new government after Haile Selassie. In reply Richard Copeland had assured Isayas that as long American interests were safeguarded, they care less about Ethiopian unity. "If you satisfy our conditions, and you want independence in return you shall have your independence" Isayas was told. Richard Copeland went indeed further to advice Isayas not to accept the federal solution from a new government. Ato Isayas was further assured that if Selfi Natsinet could succeed in bringing the Red Sea coast under its control, they promised to supply unlimited quantity of arms by sea.

Ato Isayas wanted to know if the Americans were talking serious and asked what guarantee they have that the Americans will offer what they promise. Richard Copeland laughingly replied: “Politics is gambling. You want independence and we want our Red Sea position secured and strengthened. That is your guarantee and our guarantee.” And with that the meeting had come to an end. They had then gone to the house of Richard Copeland to drink to the success of the new plot. And there were festivities.

From then on Isayas avoided appearing in company of Richard Copeland and the Kagnew officials in order not to arouse the suspicion of Ethiopian security officials. So in the morning Richard Copeland arrived with an embassy Cadillac flying the American flag, curtained all over, so that no one could see who was inside, and drove out of Kagnew with Richard Copeland in the seat of the driver. Following this Richard Copeland was busy putting into action his project of alliance with Selfi Natsinet. He had cheated Ras Asrate telling him that his agreement with Selfi Natsinet was only to safeguard American interests from the threats of the Palestinian “Black September”.

Copeland had then started bringing in Lorries full of arms given to Selfi Natsinet which will soon be a powerful organization challenging the very existence of the ELF, and the unity of Ethiopia and Eritrea. While Richard Copeland was recruiting Isayas as a surrogate to fight Ethiopia and break away Eritrea, Paul Henze was “advising” the Emperor’s external intelligence Service, as we have seen above. Further this new agreement being signed between the CIA and Afeworki to start a new secessionist movement against the ELF was arranged together with Ras Asrate Kassa who had attended the meeting.

But the fact that Isayas was now being organized also as a Christian secessionist movement to fight Ethiopia must have been opposed by Ras Asrate or it becomes an intriguing issue. Indeed the Emperor will remove Ras Asrate from his post as Governor of Eritrea , the next year , 1970, on account of what some observers attribute to an alleged suspicion that the ambitious Ras Asrate Kassa was plotting to overthrow him in collaboration with the secessionists, and perhaps also in collaboration with the CIA and Mossad.

The Ras’ – political non-military- approach (as opposed to the military approach of Prime Minister Aklilu) was dictated by his interest in turning Eritrea into a power base for himself. Ras Asrate Kassa concentrated on divisive tactics and on secret efforts to work out a “political solution” with various groups in the Eritrean movement. It seems he had the co-operation of Israeli and American military personnel in Eritrea in this endeavor” (Tesfatsion Medhanie, op. cit p.41).

What does General Daniel know about this? With this background you can imagine the lives of so many progressive intellectuals lost unable to unmask the true nature of Isayas who will decimate them one after another (notably the Menkae who were opposed to the regional divide and rule and infighting within the Christian movement –among the Seraye, Hamasien and Akeleguzay – once again a CIA ploy of divide and rule used by Isayas and Solomon Woldemariam -Tesfatsion Medhanie, op. cit. p. You can also imagine all the energy lost in ELF's attempt to build a united secessionist front with Isayas, until he was strong enough to destroy them completely, and all the Ink lost by so many Western writers who year after year "brandished" the Marxist, "anti-imperialist" Isayas. We are not talking only of paid disinformation agents, but writers and parties who claimed to be Marxists of all colors).

Various sources indicate that Information regarding the above secret agreement between Richard Copeland and Isayas had soon reached the ELF leadership in its generalities. Tesfatsion Medhanie (Eritrea –Dynamics of a National Question ,p. 41-42) who is not aware of Tesfatsion's story when he published his book in 1986, talks about "Isayas Afeworki's secret talks with Ethiopia and U.S authorities in the Eritrean capital, Asmara in 1970 (sic)" Tesfatsion, in general, a very deep and critical analyst of Ethio- Eritrean affairs, attributes the CIA-Isayas secret agreement to the internal power struggle in Ethiopian politics between Ras Asrate Kassa and Prime Minister Aklilu. He attributes the secret negotiations to Asrate Kassa's attempt to bring the Eritrean faction as well as Israeli and American support on his side, in order to wipe out the ELF. The author therefore draws the wrong conclusion.

We have seen that the CIA had in fact avoided the presence of Ras Asrate Kassa or his representatives in the Government of Eritrea in the secret negotiations with Isayas. No wonder therefore missing that last crucial stage, he considers the negotiations a failure. "The project was not implemented" he writes. And yet he himself shows in detail chapter by chapter, step by step, the ever growing power of the EPLF thanks to American military assistance, until the complete destruction of the ELF. The story regarding the ELF-CIA agreement had also been referred to in Africa Confidential, November 1970, and by the ELF, with their usual sluggishness regarding propaganda literature, in December 1979, when they were about to disappear, in The Eritrean News letter, ELF Foreign Information Center, Beirut.

The Name Selfi Natsinet of Isayas will change gradually with the development of alliances and counter-alliances. Following the massacres of Christians by the conservative Western lowland Muslim ELF leaders, and Selfi Natsinet's escape to Ala in eastern Akeleguzay, Isayas seeks the alliance of the rich and powerful Osman Saleh Sabe, leader of the Muslim Asawurta inhabiting the coast of Semhar – including Massawa and Hergigo, his birth place. In the history of secessionist Eritrea Osman Saleh Sabe has been lauded by several writers and acquaintances as "the most adroit politician" (Markakis, 1985) "relentlessly energetic secretary general and roving ambassador of the movement." Haggai tells us (op.cit) that Sabe's "native language" is "Arabic" (Haggai op.cit p. 27) although the native language of the Asawurta is Tigre. He was married to a Syrian wife.

Liberal in his outlook Sabe had often identified himself with the cause of the Christian highlanders against the Western conservative Muslim lowlanders' leadership of the ELF. As the roving ambassador of the ELF, Sabe spent most of his time abroad at the courts of Arab Sultans and emirs, as well as presidents of Syria, Iraq and Lebanon from where he collected the rich funding for the ELF. Sabe's insistence that the Eritreans were Arabs and that their struggle against Ethiopia of Haile Selassie was part of the war on Zionism made him a welcome guest in Arab capitals and in the camps of the Palestine Liberation Organization (PLO). According to Haggai Erlich, it was in fact in a PLO camp in Amman that he laid the foundation in November 1969 of a new organization, aided by the veteran Christian leader Tedla Bairu, Taha Mohammed Nur, (head of ELF-PLF Rome office until very recently).etc.

In June 1970, calling representatives from the three zones of the Anseba basin, the Christian highlands and the coast, to a conference south of Massawa, where a new movement – the Popular Liberation Forces (PLF) was formed, with Osman at the head of its Foreign Mission. Sabe is held to be a Saudi-CIA agent by some observers. He was a frequent visitor of New York, where he received press covering of the New York Times, as well as in Washington where he held talks with government officials and the State Department. On one occasion Sabe's entourage had explained their objective as being to liquidate one by one "those who espouse socialism and communism". (Tesfatsion Medhanie, op. cit. p. 41) Bear in mind that western Muslim ELF leaders were not allowed setting foot in the United States.

Isayas' Selfi Natsinet continued alone. Already in 1970, Selfi Natsinet had formulated in what was called "Nehnan Elamanan " (translated as "We and Our Objective"), certainly with some intellectual support, their well articulated program differentiating themselves as Christians with an ancient culture that goes back to Axum and enriched by their ancient Christian religion – Orthodox Christianity and an ancient script - the Geez. A reading of "Nehnan Elamanan" of which I have read the English translation, gives the perfect picture of the proud Ethiopian, proud of his culture and identity. What a pity they had to later write another history of Eritrea under CIA dictation dissociating them completely from Ethiopia.

Isayas and his group were now gaining notoriety as an urban guerrilla movement using sophisticated arms, supplied naturally by the CIA. Haggai tells us that on 14 April 1970, a few months after the agreement with the CIA, in a bar in down-town Asmara, Isayas and his associates had machine-gunned two ex-judges who had sentenced some ELF guerrillas to death. Again in November 1970, the Selfi Natsinet group led by Isayas, Abraham Tewelde, and Ermias Debessay, ambushed and killed the commander of the Ethiopian army in the province (Haggai Erlich, op. cit. p.29)

Naturally the Isayas group will eventually be attracted into an alliance with Saleh Sabe's Popular Liberation Forces (PLF) with whom he shared a number of common points including that of being a U.S surrogate. Indeed both had nothing political but business oriented and one can therefore not talk of political ideology but rather the absence of one. Marxism was in fashion in the 1960s and 1970s particularly following the Paris student revolt of 1968. CIA had therefore chosen to cover its surrogates with a Marxist cloak everywhere in the Third World, including Jaafar al-Numeiry of the Sudan, the TPLF, and even perhaps the EPRP.

In any case from the very beginning Isayas would wear a Marxist cloak. In the strategy of the CIA, this helped, among others, as we have seen in the Sudan to identify the leftists and decimate them. Saleh Sabe told Markakis frankly that Isayas" cloak of Marxism was a fake ploy of cover which should not be taken seriously. (Markakis, op. cit p.286, note 57). Another observer had noted that the EPLF hiding its totalitarian and repressive nature (Tesfatsion, p-.68) assumed different images and colors towards different patrons: To the Arab financiers it appears with the Koran, and to the socialist camp with Marxist literature, while to the liberal West it appeared as a liberal democrat. (Tesfatsion, p.71)

Certainly Isayas appears brutally totalitarian and repressive. We have the famous case of the Menkae and other prominent EPLF leaders massacred by Isayas. Tesfatsion Medhanie writes that as of 1972 the Isayas group was officially represented abroad by Sabe's Secretariat: the Foreign Mission. "There was no basis whatsoever to draw a distinction between Osman Sabe's political line and foreign relations and those of the Isayas group." According to Haggai Erlich (struggle over Eritrea, p.31) following a meeting held from 3 to 12 February 1972, the PLF will unite with Selfi Natsinet to form the Eritrean People Liberation Forces (EPLF). In 1976 when the two groups separated, Isayas group will be named the Eritrean People's Liberation Front using the same acronym EPLF. (Text ends)

(I dedicate this paper to the Ethiopian Hero Tesfamichael Giorgio who was assassinated in Addis Ababa in April 13, 1993, a year after their occupation of Addis Ababa. Its he who through his courageous denunciation of the traitors has made an epoch making contribution to the writing of Ethiopian history. Tesfamichael Giorgio has been hunted and assassinated by the CIA dogs of war of the EPLF-TPLF. on April 13, 1992. - Aleme Eshete

Eritrea After Independence In de-jure (April 25, 1993)

In April 1993, a United Nations-supervised referendum on independence was held, and the following month Eritrea achieved independence de-jure. Affeworki was declared the first head of state, a position he has held ever since the end of the war for independence.

Issaias Affeworki (Tigrinya: ኢሳይያስ ኣፈወርቅ) : Born in February 2, 1946 in Asmara, Eritrea - is the first President of Eritrea, a position he has held since 1993. He led the Eritrean People's Liberation Front (EPLF) to victory in May, 1991, thus ending the 30-year-old armed liberation struggle that the Eritrean people refer to as “Gedli”. Two years later, he became President following an independence referendum. He is the head of the ruling People's Front for Democracy and Justice.

Issaias was born in the capital of Eritrea, Asmara, to a father from the village of Tselot, located in Hamasien district of Eritrea. The EPLF was one of many armed groups struggling against the Ethiopian regime of Mengistu Hailemariam. Afewerki was elected Leader of the EPLF in 1975. He has been the chairperson of both the EPLF and the PFDJ since the PFDJ assumed power at the end of the Eritrean War for Independence and the Ethiopian Civil War in 1991. He has been President of Eritrea ever since the country seceded from Ethiopia in 1991 and then elected by the National Assembly after achieving de jure independence in April, 1993.

Headship since independence;-

Provisional Transitional Government of Eritrea:

On 23rd May, 1997: A constitutional commission, the principal author of Eritrea's future constitution chaired by Dr. Bereket Habte Selassie former representative of the Eritrean People's Liberation Front to the United Nations in New York City drafted a constitution.

The Constituent Assembly of Eritrea unanimously adopted the Eritrean Constitution. A Presidential regime was instituted, with the president to be elected for a maximum of two-five year terms. The president as head of state, has extensive powers and appoints, with the approval of the National assembly (the legislature), the ministers, the commissioners, the Auditor-General, the president of the central bank, and the judges of the supreme court. The president's mandate can be revoked if two-thirds of the members of the National Assembly so demand. " Conditional" political pluralism is authorized. Pending the election of a new National Assembly, legislative power was to be held by a Transitional National Assembly, comprising the 75 members of the ruling Peoples Front for Democracy and Justice (PFDJ) central committee, 60 members of the former Constituent Assembly and 15 representatives of Eritreans residing abroad. President Issaias Affeworki who assumed power in de-facto on May, 1991, elected president of Eritrea by the National Assembly (Bet-Mikri) on 8 June, 1993.

Eritrea - New Local Division:

Eritrea divided into six administrative regions (Zobatat) each with regional, sub-regional and village administrations. Zoba Anseba (Keren), Zoba Debub (Mendeffera(, Zoba Debubawi Keyih-Bahri (Assab), Zoba Gash-Barka (Barentu), Zoba Semenawi Kayih-Bahri Batse (Massawa), and Zoba Maaekel (Asmara), and

In May, 1998 a border conflict with neighboring Ethiopia spiraled into a full scale war, in September, 2001 the president has ordered the arrest of 15 of the highest-ranking officials of his government, usually known as the G-15s, many of them were his colleagues and comrades who were fought alongside during the war of liberation for over forty years, many of them accused the president of trying to control the political space in Eritrea, and they called for a political reform, they were arrested then charged with suspected treason and collaboration with enemy which is punishable by death in Eritrean law, eleven of them still remain detained in an undisclosed location in Eritrea, the recent purging of mostly Christian high-level political leaders and commanders of the EPLF, were thrown into jail, many are forced to flee their homes.

Eritrea is a country is a country in northeastern Africa bordering the Red sea.

Eritrea is the Italian form of the Greek name Ἐρυθραίᾱ, meaning "red land". The youngest country in Africa, Eritrea is in a strategic position along world's busiest shipping lanes, before won its independence on the 24th of May, 1991 in de-facto, Eritrea is considered as a colonially-sugared territory resulted at the end of the nineteenth century. Believed the name Eritrea is manufactured by the Italian colonialists just hundred years ago, and thought they took that name from the islets of Greece in the Mediterranean and stick it on their East African holding to take it fanatically. A D'mt known as the Damot kingdom was located at present day Eritrea and northern part of present day Ethiopia that existed during the 8th and 7th centuries BC, establishing on 700 BC, Yeha as its capital until de-established on the 400 BC. After the fall of the D'mt or Damot kingdom in the 4th century BC, the area came to be dominated under smaller successions of kingdoms, until the rise of the Axumite kingdom during the 1st century BC, which was able to reunite the area over the centuries. Of course, Eritrea was the site of the Axumite empire main ports of Adulis & Zula, and was very linked to the beginnings of the Abyssinian successive kingdoms. Control of the territory known as the "Bahir-Negash" was mainly disputed by the Abyssinian kingdoms, the Ottomans, and the Egyptians, and of course, under the Italians influence. Over the centuries, the Egyptians, and the Sudanese invaders have occupied the west and north. However, the area now designated as "Eritrea" was occupied by the Italian colonialists of the 19th century by force, from 1869 to 1892, and made a protectorate from 1892 to 1941, most of the same area has always been part of then Abyssinian kingdoms as territory of "Bahir-Negash", until it became official part of the Italian East Africa (Africa Orientale Italiana) along with Ethiopia and the Italian protectorate of Somalia.

Eritrea is currently home to about 6 million diverse population, from linguistic and other human factors, the people of Eritrea especially inhabiting in what is known as "the Kabassa" the central highlands are Tigrigna speakers, inhabited by over 50% of the total population of Eritrea which made up of about nine sub-groups with no any common origins. Eritrea was used as the base for the Italian invasions of Abyssinia (Ethiopia) in 1896 and the latter occupation. It was Italia which gave the name Eritrea to its former colony, as it did to its former colonies in Africa i.e. Libya. Asmara, the national capital was a well-built as then colonial out-post in 1897, its well known also that the Italians built Asmara primarily for themselves, and designated separate areas for Italian colonial masters and for the natives in disproportionate size, such elementary schools, buses, hotels and recreational areas were inherently unequal and were restricted to attend for native-Eritreans. In the early 20th century, an estimated USD 12 million of Italian investment have been allotted by then largest ever in Africa of the Italian community of nearly 70, 000 this time, Railways and Cable lines were built from Asmara to the coastal city of Massawa, and an increasing number of Eritreans were drawn into money economy as menial and semi-skilled laborers for the Italians in newly created factories, plantations, major construction works, agro-industries, Shipping lanes, and in the colonial army itself as auxiliary troops and menial laborers. And a very large number of Eritreans were becoming attached to Italian households and private commercial businesses as servants and shopkeepers, believed an estimated 40% of the total population were dispatched as industrial forces-forces, as perhaps the highest in an African agrarian economy. Eritreans were not allowed as natives to attend more than fourth grade under Italian protection where serious partialities were taking place especially onto elementary schools, buses, hotels and recreational centres where inherently and unequally restricted. Up till the Imperial government's arrival in November, 1953 there was an unwritten but trusted social order in the Italian colonial administration where the Italian citizens were regarded as first class, and the native Eritreans as second class. For example, in cable services, trains, buses as well as restaurants and schools there was a first class for Italians. The same order prevailed with other facilities such as roads and squares more restricted for native Eritreans. Such racial segregation was not supported by law, but it was observed in practice. Eritreans were not expected to go to the city's principal hotels in downtown Asmara. There was a sign outside hotels and avenues that stayed until Eritrea federated with Ethiopia in 1952. It reads in Italian: "Natives and dogs, not allowed".

After having made wide and thorough political consultations onto the fates of ex-Italian protectorates in north Africa (Libya), east African protectorates of southern Somalia and Eritrea, passed onto a British administration, continues to administer the territory under a United Nations mandate. The strategic importance of Eritrea, due to its Red sea coastline in the cold-war era, enables the United Nations to vote 46 to 10 to have Eritrea be federated with Ethiopia, which was later stipulated on 2 December, 1950 in resolution No 390 (V) known as the "Ethio-Eritrean federation formula". Eritrea would have its own parliament and Internal administration and would be represented in what had been the Imperial parliament and would become the federal parliament. And two local rival parties known as the "Moslem League party of Eritrea (Rabitta Al-Islamia)" and the "Unionist party of Eritrea (Mahiber Fikri-Hager)" should campaign for seats in the federal Eritrean parliament. The United Nations resolved later to establish Eritrea as an autonomous entity federated with Ethiopia as a compromise between Ethiopian claims for sovereignty and the Eritreans aspirations for independence. Unlike other African country's colonial experience, Ethiopia and Eritrea have a unique historical relationship that is intertwined as one entity. The arrangement gave Eritrea a considerable self-government and autonomy, with its own legislation, police and taxation powers. The co-Federal Imperial government controlled only foreign affairs, defense and the ports. The United Nations made it clear, the new federal arrangement represented a compromise between the wishes and welfare of the inhabitants of Eritrea, the interest of peace and security in East Africa, and the rights and claims of Ethiopia, in particular Ethiopia's legitimate need for adequate access to the Red sea.

November 15th 1952: The United Nations passed a resolution known as number 390v sponsors and conducts a referendum for the people of Eritrea to reunite or be federated with Ethiopia with an overwhelming decision, was undeniably the most important one, Ethiopia's need for and its rights to have an outlet to the Sea. Ethiopian participation in the aims of collective security, in the next decade in the Korean and the Congo wars under the UN contingency, and the combination of diplomacy with charm secured US and western powers support for the federation of Eritrea with Ethiopia. The US policy of Soviet containment during the cold war era and the use of Kagnew communication facilities in Eritrea, the Emperor's attempts to gain international fame through an offensive diplomacy was a component part of his strategy to overshadow some moderate Arab states to defeat on the UN debate on Eritrea, the Emperor then succeeded in imposing his absolute rule over Ethiopia and Eritrea with no political reforms by means of an internationally gained fame. Ethiopia's need for and its rights to have an outlet to the Sea, Ethiopian participation in the aims of collective security, in the next decade in the Korean and the Congo wars under the UN contingency, and the combination of diplomacy with charm secured US and western powers support for the federation of Eritrea with Ethiopia. The US policy of Soviet containment during the cold war era and the use of Kagnew communication facilities in Eritrea, the Emperor's attempts to gain international fame through an offensive diplomacy was a component part of his strategy to overshadow some moderate Arab states to defeat the UN debate on Eritrea, he then succeeded in imposing his absolute rule on Ethiopia with no political reforms by means of internationally gained fame. The Federation of Ethiopia and Eritrea was a structure between Eritrea and Ethiopia. It was created by the approval of the Federal Act in Ethiopia and the Eritrean Constitution. Ato Tedla Bairu elected first Chief Executive of "Eritrea in federation with Ethiopia". The Federal structure, or some semblance of it, existed between 15 September 1952 and 14 November 1962, was in direct contravention of the UN Resolution 390-A (V) which established the Federation.

The Liberation Struggle in the former province of Eritrea in Ethiopia' Hamid Idris Awate (10 April 1910 – 28 May 1962) was an Eritrean independence leader. He is considered by many to be the founder of the Eritrean Liberation Army and ‘father’ of the Eritrean Struggle for Independence.

Eritrea had been placed under British military administration in 1941 after the Italian surrender. In keeping with a 1950 decision of the UN General Assembly, British military administration ended in September 1952 and was replaced by a new autonomous Eritrean government in federal union with Ethiopia. Federation with the former Italian colony restored an unhindered maritime frontier to the country. The new arrangement also enabled the country to gain limited control of a territory that, at least in its inland areas, was more advanced politically and economically. The Four Power Inquiry Commission established by the World War II Allies (Britain, France, the Soviet Union, and the United States) had failed to agree in its September 1948 report on a future course for Eritrea. Several countries had displayed an active interest in the area. In the immediate postwar years, Italy had requested that Eritrea be returned as a colony or as a trusteeship. This bid was supported initially by the Soviet Union, which anticipated a communist victory at the Italian polls. The Arab states, seeing Eritrea and its large Muslim population as an extension of the Arab world, sought the establishment of an independent state. Some Britons favored a division of the territory, with the Christian areas and the coast from Mitsiwa southward going to Ethiopia and the northwest area going to Sudan. A UN commission, which arrived in Eritrea in February 1950, eventually approved a plan involving some form of association with Ethiopia. In December the UN General Assembly adopted a resolution affirming the commission’s plan, with the provision that Britain, the administering power, should facilitate the UN efforts and depart from the colony no later than September 15, 1952. Faced with this constraint, the British administration held elections on March 16, 1952, for a Representative Assembly of sixty-eight members. This body, made up equally of Christians and Muslims, accepted the draft constitution advanced by the UN commissioner on July 10. The constitution was ratified by the emperor on September 11, and the Representative Assembly, by prearrangement, was transformed into the Eritrean Assembly three days before the federation was proclaimed. The UN General Assembly resolution of September 15, 1952, adopted by a vote of forty-seven to ten, provided that Eritrea should be linked to Ethiopia through a loose federal structure under the emperor’s sovereignty but with a form and organization of internal self-government. The federal government, which for all intents and purposes was the existing imperial government, was to control foreign affairs, defense, foreign and interstate commerce, transportation, and finance. Control over domestic affairs (including police, local administration, and taxation to meet its own budget) was to be exercised by an elected Eritrean assembly on the parliamentary model. The state was to have its own administrative and judicial structure and its own flag. Almost from the start of federation, the emperor’s representative undercut the territory’s separate status under the federal system. In August 1955, Tedla Bairu, an Eritrean who was the chief executive elected by the assembly, resigned under pressure from the emperor, who replaced Tedla with his own nominee. He made Amharic the official language in place of Arabic and Tigrinya, terminated the use of the UN mandated Eritrean flag, and moved many businesses out of Eritrea. In addition, the central government proscribed all political parties, imposed censorship, gave the top administrative positions to Amhara, and abandoned the principle of parity between Christian and Muslim officials. In November 1962, the Eritrean Assembly, many of whose members had been accused of accepting bribes, voted unanimously to change Eritrea's status to that of a province of Ethiopia. Following his appointment of the arch conservative Ras Asrate Kasa as governor general, the emperor was accused of "re-feudalizing" the territory.

The extinction of the federation consolidated internal and external opposition to union. Four years earlier, in 1958, a number of Eritrean exiles had founded the Eritrean Liberation Movement (ELM) in Cairo, under Hamid Idris Awate's leadership. This organization, however, soon was neutralized. A new faction, the Eritrean Liberation Front (ELF), emerged in 1960. Initially a Muslim movement, the ELF was nationalist rather than Marxist and received Iraqi and Syrian support. As urban Christians joined, the ELF became more radical and anti-capitalist. Beginning in 1961, the ELF turned to armed struggle and by 1966 challenged imperial forces throughout Eritrea.

The rapid growth of the ELF also created internal divisions between urban and rural elements, socialists and nationalists, and Christians and Muslims. Although these divisions did not take any clear form, they were magnified as the ELF extended its operations and won international publicity. In June 1970, Osman Salah Sabbe, former head of the Muslim League, broke away from the ELF and formed the Popular Liberation Forces (PLF), which led directly to the founding of the Eritrean People's Liberation Front (EPLF) in early 1972. Both organizations initially attracted a large number of urban, intellectual, and leftist Christian youths and projected a strong socialist and nationalist image. By 1975 the EPLF had more than 10,000 members in the field. However, the growth of the EPLF was also accompanied by an intensification of internecine Eritrean conflict, particularly between 1972 and 1974, when casualties were well over 1,200. In 1976 Osman broke with the EPLF and formed the Eritrean Liberation Front-Popular Liberation Front (ELF-PLF), a division that reflected differences between combatants in Eritrea and representatives abroad as well as personal rivalries and basic ideological differences, factors important in earlier splits within the Eritrean separatist movement. Encouraged by the imperial regime's collapse and attendant confusion, the guerrillas extended their control over the whole region by 1977. Ethiopian forces were largely confined to urban centers and controlled the major roads only by day.

In 1958: A group of Eritrean exiles met in Cairo to found the Eritrean Liberation Movement.

In July 1960: In the city of Cairo, a group of young Eritrean students and intellectuals held a meeting and formed the Eritrean Liberation Front (ELF) under Idris Hamid Awate. The same year, in a written request of Idris Mohammed Adem, Idris Awate agreed to lead the armed struggle and declare the revolution but he asked for support ...The Ethiopian authorities immediately responded to Awate's declaration. A military unit in six trucks was sent to apprehend Idris Awate but failed. The Ethiopians resorted to using different tactics to deal with Awate.

August 1961: However, 10 years later the Ethiopian emperor, decides to annex Eritrea as fourteenth province of Ethiopia, triggering a 30-year armed struggle. Idris Awate responded to Ethiopian authorities saying: "If you want us to end our armed struggle, then you better lower the Ethiopian flag and raise up the UN mandated Eritrean flag. On September 1, 1961, about eleven rebels led by Idris Himid Awate attacked police posts in western of Eritrea. A fierce battle ensued between Awate's and Ethiopian forces, lasting 7 hours, and ending in a stalemate.

In pre-1950s Eritrea, there were various political groups, such as a pro-Britain "Progressive party of Eritrea" founded by elite Eritreans, the pro-Islamist Rabitta Al-Islamia (later Muslim League of Eritrea) whose support base were mainly from the Eritrean western lowlands and the pro-Ethiopian Unionist party of Eritrea known as "Mahber Fikri-Hager" in the central highlands, of course, all mentioned parties were their own very newspaper or organ to politically reach out the masses. Many in the central highlands to unite with Ethiopia at all costs was conveniently achieved right after the UN general assembly resolved to federate Eritrea with Ethiopia after it considerably taken historical, and administrative eases into its account by consulting the people of Eritrea specifically in the central highlands and the western lowlands. In 1952 Eritrea federated with Ethiopia as per UN resolution No 390 (A) under the prompting of the United States, as adopted two years earlier. Though, the United Nations sponsored and conducted a popular referendum of the people of Eritrea to reunite or be federated with Ethiopia with an overwhelming decision which was that undeniably the most important in the history of the Eritrean people, as Ethiopia's need and for its rights to have an outlet to the Sea, and the UN awarded the former Italian colony of Eritrea to Ethiopia to finally avoid influences of some moderate Arab nations in the region. Eritrea's shared linguistic and demographic terms were the main causes for the federation with Ethiopia, which in turn the Imperial Ethiopian Government of dissolving the federal-act, and Eritrea's annexation as its fourteenth province in September, 1952. In mid-1961, nine years after the federal act was signed, the Imperial Ethiopian Government's in lack of regard for the Eritrean public dissolved the federal parliament, a process which included an edict establishing the compulsory teachings of “Amharic”, the main language of Ethiopia, in all schools in Eritrea. Oblivious to the pivotal role that the Eritrean unionists played in dissolving the federal act, its dissolution was portrayed as outright annexation by the IEG. In due to their interest, the United States and other western powers deliberately ignored the annexation of Eritrea by the IEG, which that later led to the formation of an independence struggle, erupts into a 30-year liberation war against successive Ethiopian governments, could ended up in May, 1991.

Eritrean secessionist groups namely, Eritrean Liberation Front, commonly known as Jabhaa, then ensued a war in the western lowlands of Eritrea in the 1970s for a political reason mentioned above, but before such dream for independence, the ELF fractures within itself and a bitter struggle for supremacy have been waged with the other rival EPLF, the early years of the revolution in Ethiopia had found the Eritrean liberation movements internally divided, as the newly emerged EPLF engaged in bloody confrontation with the veteran ELF (Jabhaa). At the same time, the two liberation movements were involved in various maneuvers aimed at reconciling their differences. Thereafter in various times negotiations had taken place in the wake of the ruling-Provisional Military Government's extending an olive-branch by granting a nine-point policy declaration known as "Eritrea-Autonomous Region in Ethiopia", which that initiative was firmly rejected by then Eritrean secessionist movements mainly, the ELF. Although the ELF initially seeks a limited scope of restoration of the federal arrangement that had been terminated in September, 1962, the escalation of hostilities had pushed the rebels into the agenda of independence. Then the Eritrean problem came to be posed not as a constitutional issue but a colonial question. An armed conflict between the ELF, known as Jaabha and its off-shot, the Eritrean Peoples Liberation Front EPLF, known as Shaabia, both fighting for independence in Eritrea, have been made a potentially catastrophic conflict among themselves. Mr. Issaias Affeworki, who drops out his engineering studies at former Haile Selassie I University (HSIU), rose to be commander of the EPLF-Shaabia forces between 1970-91, who finally felt sufficiently strong to launch a campaign to liquidate its rival, an objective that it was able to accomplish fully in 1981, come-up to realize Eritrean independence, the other one the ELF, is remained with no more political existence at present Eritrea.

In the military sphere the turning point came in March of 1988, when the EPLF forces scored most decisive victory to date at the Aphabet battlefront, a strategic mountainous area, which long plied by secessionist guerillas, but was an important Ethiopian military stronghold, north of the Eritrean capital, Asmara, namely, the "Nadew Command", which was defending the stronghold, had been thoroughly dismantled after the summary execution of its commander namely, Brigadier General Tariku Aine following heated exchange of debate with then Ethiopian head of state, Lt. Colonel Mengistu Haile Mariam over the conduct of the war, over 20,000 Ethiopian troops were incapacitated and considerable military armaments fell into the hands of the EPLF fighters, with a significant bearing on the future course of the war in Eritrea. For the EPLF rebel fighters, Aphabet opened the way to free Massawa and then Asmara, to liberate finally the whole Eritrea. The secessionist war in Eritrea finally ended-up with the EPLF secessionist rebels to defeat finally the Ethiopian central government defense forces in May, 1991 among the Tigrai Peoples Liberation Front (TPLF)-led forces respectively entered in alliance to Asmara and Addis Ababa in May, 1991, by shifting decisively the military power balance, to initiate a new political discourse in the region. Eritrea, then after two years in 23 to 25 of April, 1993 independence was overwhelmingly approved by a referendum which is used as a direct vote by the people of Eritrea as matter of national importance, and decided by a plebiscite under a United Nations created technical mandatory team known as, the UN Observer Mission to Verify the Eritrean Referendum (UNOVER), headed by the Lebanese career diplomat Mr. Samir Sambar, the UN technical mandatory mission have confirmed the Eritrean referendum to declare its nationhood in de-jure in April, 1993.

April 25, 1993: The referendum in Eritrea helped when the Eritrean people voted almost unanimously in favor of independence and this was verified by the UN Observer Mission to Verify the Referendum in Eritrea (UNOVER). The referendum was supported by Ethiopia, Eritreans voted almost unanimously for independence, leaving Ethiopia landlocked. In September, of same year Eritrea has joined the African community, as member of ex- Organization of African Unity (OAU) at a summit held in Cairo, Egypt. Mr. Issaias Affeworki, who led the guerilla war assumed power since he won the longest war of secession in Africa.

May 23, 1997: A transitional legislature the “National Assembly of Eritrea” was established by the ruling, Peoples Front for Democracy and Justice (PFDJ), known locally as “Hizbawi Gimbar”. The Constituent Assembly of Eritrea unanimously adopted the Eritrean Constitution. A Presidential regime was instituted, with the president to be elected for a maximum of two-five year terms. Mr. Issaias Affeworki nicknamed, “Affom” meaning for “good musing”, was elected founder-president of a reemerged state of Eritrea by then transitional legislature, a commission also found to draft a new constitution to be ratified in May, 1997, but has not yet been fully implemented.

The president as head of state, has extensive powers and appoints, with the approval of the National assembly (the legislature), the ministers, the commissioners, the Auditor-General, the president of the central bank, and the judges of the supreme court. The president’s mandate can be revoked if two-thirds of the members of the National Assembly so demand. “ Conditional” political pluralism is authorized. Pending the election of a new National Assembly, legislative power was to be held by a Transitional National Assembly, comprising the 75 members of the ruling Peoples Front for Democracy and Justice (PFDJ) central committee, 60 members of the former Constituent Assembly and 15 representatives of Eritreans residing abroad. President Issaias Affeworki who assumed power in de-facto on May, 1991, elected president of Eritrea by the National Assembly (Bet-Mikri) on 8 June, 1993.

Leadership: Issaias Affeworki was elected president of independent Eritrea by the national assembly in 1993. He had been the de facto leader before independence. Presidential elections, planned for 1997, never materialized. Eritrea is a one-party state, with the ruling People's Front for Democracy and Justice the only party allowed to operate. Mr Afewerki has been criticized for failing to implement democratic reforms. His government has clamped down on its critics and has closed the private press.

US diplomatic cables revealed by Wiki Leaks in December 2010 offer an unflattering view of Mr Afewerki's rule: "Young Eritreans are fleeing their country in droves, the economy appears to be in a death spiral, Eritrea's prisons are overflowing, and the country's unhinged dictator remains cruel and defiant." Is the country "on the brink of disaster?" asked the American ambassador Ronald McMullen.

Born in 1946 in Asmara, Issaias Affewerki joined the Eritrean Liberation Front (ELF) in 1966. He received military training in China the same year, then went on to be deputy divisional commander. In 1970 he co-founded the Eritrean People's Liberation Front (EPLF) and in 1987 he was elected secretary-general of the organization which later to be known as Peoples Front For Democracy and Justice (PFDJ).

Local Administration: Provinces(Zobatat)

There are about six administrative regions (Zobatat) in Eritrea, each with regional, sub-regional and village administrations. Zoba Anseba (Keren), Zoba Debub (Mendefera(, Zoba Debubawi Keyih-Bahri (Assab), Zoba Gash-Barka (Barentu),), Zoba Semenawi Kayih-Bahri Batse (Massawa), and Zoba Maaekel (Asmara).

May 12, 1998: A border conflict with neighboring Ethiopia spiraled into a full scale war, in September, 2001 the president has ordered the arrest of 15 of the highest-ranking officials of his government, usually known as the G-15s, many of them were his colleagues and comrades who were fought alongside during the war of liberation for over forty years, many of them accused the president of trying to control the political space in Eritrea, and they called for a political reform, they were arrested then charged with suspected treason and collaboration with enemy which is punishable by death in Eritrean law, eleven of them still remain detained in an undisclosed location in Eritrea, the recent purging of mostly Christian high-level political leaders and commanders of the EPLF, were thrown into jail, many are forced to flee their homes. Eritrea has no constitution, free press or opposition parties as many Eritreans including religious leaders, journalists, and former liberation fighters are in unknown prisons for over years without due process of law, and its feared that some of them have already dead. As political analysts in the region, "its a clear example of such process of Islamization and turning Eritrea as an extension of the Arab world's domination, its extremely difficult for Eritreans to sustain an independent state of Eritrea as directly influenced by regional and internal tense-situations and to maintain a unified and peaceful Eritrea”. And that could be relatively job easily done with Ethiopia and Eritrea as one than by Eritrea alone without even having relatively large and stable economy which is an improbability for Eritrea to have even a democratic governance. Its well known that, the Eritrean central highland namely, “the Kabassa”, is a political power base for the ruling-liberation movement turned ruling party: the Peoples Front for Democracy and Justice (PFDJ) during the armed struggles and on the ongoing years. After Eritrea won its independence in de-jure from Ethiopia in April, 1993 the two countries soon plunged back into war.

Elections for parliamentary and regional councils were scheduled for December, 2001’

Indeed, elections for parliamentary and regional councils were scheduled for December, 2001, but were postponed again indefinitely, the “existed 1998 to 2000 Eritro-Ethiopian border war” was mentioned as main political reason. While Eritrea was officially blamed for starting its infamous war with its larger neighbor Ethiopia, in 1998 to 2000, many have unwelcomed consequences of the war that followed the expulsion of about 70, 000 Eritreans from Ethiopia, or not to be celebrated such saddening event joyously, but rather people have renamed the sorrowful event, following buses taking their brothers, sisters, and of course neighbors away from their homes, which that memorized as bad happening of May-1998. The Ethiopian PM has made little to discourse the escalation of the Ethiopian army of what many described as a senseless conflict that left at least 80,000 dead on both sides and cost two of the world’s poorest countries hundreds of millions of dollars. A risk of another war b/n Eritrea and Ethiopia grew up, when the UN closed its mission along the border, the UN mission in Ethiopia and Eritrea, UNMEE’s job was to watch over the 25 wide-wide Temporary Security Zone (TSZ) within Eritrea, established to keep the two armies apart when their war ended in 2000 as UNMEE’s mandate was laid down under the Algiers agreement. Ethio-Eritrean Boundary Commission (EEBC) remotely demarcated the border by coordinates and dissolved itself, leaving Ethiopia still occupying several tracts of the disputed territory, including the flash town of Badme. Eritrea accepted the EEBCs virtual demarcation decision and called on Ethiopia to withdraw its troops from the TSZ that it states is Eritrean territory, which Ethiopia has not accepted the virtual demarcation decision because of the sensitivity of the matter. The unnecessary war b/n the brand new nation, Eritrea and Ethiopia, claimed the lives of tens of thousands of youth on both sides and still remains unresolved, as called for talks to end the row.

On 18 September 2001: in a climate of mounting repression, 15 members of the People’s Front for Democracy and Justice (PFDJ) wrote an open letter denouncing President Issaias Afewerki’s iron grip on power, calling his ac...tions “illegal and unconstitutional”. For this they were quickly jailed.

Eritrea has supported any armed group that opposes Ethiopia's government'

The September, 2001 round-ups of veteran politicians and the closure of all the privately-owned media and the arrests of the main newspaper publishers began a period of terror from which Eritrea still has not emerged because of the intolerance and paranoia of its leaders. This of course led to his nickname "a barefaced dictator" who has muzzled and ravaged a generation, that lost the hope of the new nation. Nowadays, there are no independent media in Eritrea, foreign reporters are unwelcome and journalists working for the state media must enthusiastically peddle government propagation and, if they can not follow orders, they have no choice but to flee the country. The onetime hero of Eritrea's liberation struggle, Issaias Affeworki Abraham, now many of his staunchest critics accusing him of oppressing his own people, jailed dozens of Journalists and some reformist politicians, and has become Africa's most heavy handed man. It has never held a national elections, mostly keep the population check, politics grow more bitter, as the economy spirals downward, when even the Eritrean-elites migrate to the west. Eritreans are known for their strong sense of nationalism and their capacity to withstand great economic suffering and deprivation allows the president to cling onto power. As example of Eritrean farmers, roughly 80% of the total population have long-lived a knife-edged existence due to marginal rainfall and decades of war and brigandage, the regime facing mounting international pressure for years of malign behavior in the neighborhood.

October 3, 2000: Some of them decided to use their friendship with Affeworki to persuade him to hold elections or step down' From a conference hotel in Berlin, Ghebrekidan and 12 other scientists and professionals, many of whom had been involved in drafting the constitution, composed a letter to the president. "Much of the world community, including our fellow Africans, perceive the Eritrean government and its leadership as aggressive and irresponsible," wrote the group, urging Affworki to implement the constitution, hold democratic elections and set free the growing number of people his regime had jailed. "We urge you most sincerely to seize this moment of crisis and turn it into an opportunity to reclaim your hard-earned reputation as a leader." Four days later, after it had reached Afwerki, the letter was leaked to the press, igniting Eritrea's first-ever public debate about leadership. To its members' surprise, the group — which became known as the G-13 — was invited to Eritrea for discussions with Affewerki. One member, Mohammed Kheir, later wrote that he was nervous that it might be a trap. But they accepted the invitation and flew to Eritrea. After waiting for several days, the president agreed to see them. Soldiers escorted the academics to his office, where Affeworki berated them for leaking the letter to the media — something that they denied — and cast them as traitors. The group was escorted back to the airport. Since then, no members have returned to Eritrea; most now hold prestigious positions at US universities. "It is very fortunate that we escaped," says Haile Debas, now head of the University of California Global Health Institute in San Francisco.

On the morning of 23 September 2001, when the editors of all the country's private newspapers were rounded up. Fourteen years later the country remains in the iron grip of Affwerki. Freedom of expression continues to be severely repressed. Current estimates suggest there are at least 23 journalists in prison without due process. It is widely believed that between four and nine of the 11 journalists detained in September 2001 have since died. From the limited information available, the few surviving journalists were detained later times in the maximum security prison, Eiraeiro, north of Asmara while the others escaped out of the country.

Although the plea failed to sway the president, it encouraged others to criticize him openly for the first time. In July 2001, Semere Kesete, leader of the student union at the University of Asmara — Eritrea's only institute of higher learning — criticized the government for reducing academic freedom. He was arrested and thrown into solitary confinement, causing riots at the university. When the government demanded that the students do extra national service — on top of the 18 months required of all men and women — they didn't turn up. In retaliation, the government bussed all of the students to the Danakil Depression in southern Eritrea, one of the hottest places on Earth, to build roads. Two students died from the heat. Crackdown A month later, Affeworki launched his biggest crackdown yet. He shut down all private media, threw 10 journalists in jail and imprisoned 11 politicians who had demanded elections — many of whom were old comrades in arms. He also began to dismantle the University of Asmara.

"What could be the justification for killing the only university we had capable of producing students that could be accepted by universities abroad?" asks an Eritrean scientist who lives out of the country and wishes to remain anonymous because of concerns about the safety of family members still in Eritrea. "The aim was simply to prevent the students from all being in one place, where they had the power to rise up," says Debas. In place of the university, the government built a number of small colleges, arguing that these would be more accessible to students. Even as Eritrea lost its only university, it continued to make progress in medicine. In 1997, the country had gained a proactive health minister, Saleh Meki, who helped to develop crucial partnerships with US universities including George Washington University in Washington DC; Washington University in St Louis; Columbia University in New York City; Stony Brook University in New York; and the University of California, Berkeley. By bringing experts into Eritrea, these partnerships helped the country to pass scientific and public-health milestones. A polio-immunization campaign extended coverage to 95% of all one-year-olds and eradicated the disease. An anti-malaria drive from 2000 to 2004 reduced morbidity and case fatality by 84% and 40%, respectively. In 2003, Haile Mezgebe, then a surgeon at George Washington University, was part of the group of medics who helped to set up the Orotta School of Medicine in Eritrea. Mezgebe moved to the country to run the collaboration; he was joined by Mary Polan, who travelled regularly from the department of obstetrics and gynecology at Columbia University, and other US doctors and surgeons who worked to treat and train Eritreans. In 2009, Orotta graduated its first class of 39 doctors. “It was quite extraordinary,” says Jack Ladenson, a doctor based at Washington University. “Suddenly, in one day, there was a 30% increase in the number of doctors in Eritrea.”

A success story: Meanwhile, clinical testing and research was taking off at the National Health Laboratory. In 1998, the only blood tests available in Eritrea had been done on a single machine. Scientists from Washington University installed new equipment at the lab and trained technicians to perform a range of chemical tests, including the hemoglobin A1C test for diabetes and a test for thyroid malfunction. They also launched a national diabetes-management program and a long-term research project to gauge its progress; in 2007, the project leaders found that the program had significantly improved Eritrean diabetes management. Ladenson, Seyoum and others co-authored a paper showing that the overall quality of chemical tests for disease at the national lab was on a par with that at Washington University. “A simple but sustainable national laboratory system has been established in the developing nation of Eritrea,” the paper said.

But outside the medical arena, the situation was less rosy. Richard Reid, a historian at the School of Oriental and African Studies in London, visited the Eritrea Institute of Technology in Mai-Nefhi, one of the unaccredited colleges set up after the University of Asmara was shut down. He was told that students who cheated on exams or skipped classes were jailed on site. Military training was mandatory between 4 and 7 a.m., and students wryly referred to digging trenches as ‘digology’, adds Reid. And any success in science and medicine was short lived. In 2008, without explanation, Meki was removed as health minister, along with the coordinator for US–Eritrean scientific partnerships. The chair of the pediatrics department at Orotta was arrested because of his religious views. And in 2011, Affeworki ordered all scientists from George Washington University — including Mezgebe — to leave the country. At the start of 2012, Affeworki cut off the partnership between the National Laboratory and Washington University in St Louis. Several sources, who wish to remain anonymous for fear of retaliation against friends and relatives, report that Seyoum, the lab’s director, was “frozen”, an Eritrean term for the practice of stripping government employees of their titles and duties while restricting them from travel and other jobs to silence them. Nature contacted officials in the Eritrean government and its US and UK embassies repeatedly by phone and e-mail for a response to these allegations, but had received none at the time of going to press.

The severing of ties may be a backlash against the United States and the United Nations over their criticism of Affeworki's human-rights record, says Ghebrekidan. In 2009, the United States imposed sanctions on Eritrea for supporting Islamist insurgents in Somalia. A highly publicized cable from US ambassador Ronald McMullen, later released by Wikileaks, said that "Eritrea's prisons are overflowing, and the country's unhinged dictator remains cruel and defiant". In July, the UN Human Rights Council established a special reporter to investigate reports of rights violations by Eritrean authorities, amid stories that Affeworki keeps his critics in solitary confinement in shipping containers. Berhane Ghebrehiwet, an Eritrean immunologist at Stony Brook University, says that Affeworki's distrust of foreign involvement and aid in Eritrea is understandable. The United States did, after all, support Ethiopia during the fight for independence. "You cannot cripple a man and then accuse him of having limped," he says. "All the president dreams of is to make Eritrea a prosperous and self-reliant nation at peace with itself, its neighbors and the rest of the world. Others are less sympathetic. "Affeworki is getting more and more paranoid," says Guebrekidan. "He thinks that the American doctors who come to save Eritrean lives are actually CIA agents." Affeworki has effectively destroyed intellectual freedom in Eritrea, says Abbink. "No independent academic research in any field is possible." Fundamental research "or what is left of it" is now under pressure to pursue "practical" issues with immediate applications to development, he concludes.

Yet some scientists are still proud of the progress Eritrea has made. Andemariam Gebremichael, dean of the Orotta School of Medicine, wrote in an e-mail that he aims to create "an environment where individuals develop their intellectual potential", adding that he hopes to produce another 150 doctors to bring the country up to international standards. It will be a significant challenge, writes Gebremichael. Only seven foreign teaching doctors — all Cuban — remain at the institution. After a year in solitary confinement, student-union leader Kesete escaped with his guard to Ethiopia, and from there to the United States. "We walked for six days and nights, surviving on nothing more than biscuits," he says. Kesete sees little prospect of change, and despairs of his country's future. "The government has persecuted not only scientists, but also the science itself," he says. He calls international collaborations a "waste of resources and energy", because Affeworki will not hesitate to eject foreign scientists, no matter how crucial they are to Eritrea's development. Rumors that the University of Asmara may reopen this year are preposterous, he adds. "It is safe to say that academia is dead." Source: Nature, by Shanta Barley. Eritrea considered an oppressive and politically isolated neighbor of Ethiopia and Sudan situated on the Red Sea that broke off from Ethiopia in early 1990s.

The U.S. government's relations with Eritrea became strained in 2001 as a result of a government crackdown against political dissidents, the closing of the independent press and limits on civil liberties, conditions that the State Department says have “persisted to this day.” Issaias Affeworki has ruled the country as president and head of the military since 1993.“People call it the North Korea of Africa and that is accurate

June 2, 2007: Sudan has officially banned the activities of the Eritrean opposition in the country after years of support’ The move indicates the level of good relations between Asmara and Khartoum. The Sudanese government officially notified the representative of the Eritrean opposition in the Khartoum to stop political activities against Asmara government and close their venues. According to Islam Today website, which is well informed about Islamist movements in the Horn of Africa, the Sudanese government also ordered the Eritrean groups to render houses and vehicles granted by the Sudanese security service. In 1994 Eritrea severed bilateral ties accused the Islamist led government in Khartoum of harboring the Eritrean opposition and particularly the Eritrean Islamic Jihad Movement. The two countries repaired relations at the end of 2000, thanks to Qatari mediation.

Eritrea, sometimes called the North Korea of the African continent’ Eritrea has become synonymous with trouble-making in the Horn of Africa region since it wrested its independence from Ethiopia in May, 1991, after a bitterly 30-years war. It has approximately 300, 000 meaning nearly 5% of its population under arms despite a population of less than six million. Eritrea has long been accused of financing and supporting opposition rebel armed groups such as the Oromo Liberation Front (OLF), the Ogadien National Liberation Front (ONLF) and others in its much larger neighbor, Ethiopia. The Eritrean government is accused of secretly arming the Al-Shabaab Islamist terrorists in Somalia, offering training and support to militant groups in Ethiopia and the Sudan, provoking incidents along its disputed frontier with Ethiopia, apart from the conflict with Addis Ababa, the Red sea state has also picked a fight with neighboring Djibouti of launching an unprovoked 2008 invasion, whose port landlocked-Ethiopia relies on for almost all its external trade, Eritrea who considered by rivals as potentially failed state is also routinely accused of aiding insurgents in the sub-region. All this eventually lead, during the course of 2009, to the imposition of punitive regional and the UN sanctions. The United Nations security council, acting on the official complaint of the transitional government of Somalia, has set-up a panel to probe the weapons shipment to Somalia, has already sanctioned Eritrea in December, 2010, accusing of supporting terrorism in the horn, for its support of Islamic militant groups in Somalia, with the relentless supply of arms and deadly freight of ammunitions, which that probably originated by Ukraine or east European countries, it was suspected to be destined for such Islamic armed-groups like the Al-Shabab in Somalia for the purpose of causing violence, that’s not a move such for further friendship and understanding in the Horn of Africa according to analysts but to further hostilities in the region.

Issaias Affeworki Abraham rumored to have a family-roots in Tigrai region of Ethiopia’

His father Affe-Worki Abraham, is said to be buried in a cemetery of his hometown “Tselot”. Issaias’s immediate family is rarely featured in the state-run media and keeps a low-profile, although his portrait adorns many shops in Asmara, as there is none to personality cult in Eritrea. Mr. Issaias Affe-Worki often appears in the media clad casually in slacks, Jacket, open necked shirt and Sandals or loafers, and he rarely travels in a motorcade. President Issaias Affe-worki is an austere and narcissist dictator whose political ballast derives from Maoist Ideology, has an aversion to talking on the telephone and frequently sleeps in different locations to foil a possible coup assassination-attempt. During winter months he spends most of his time in the port city of Massawa rather than the capital Asmara, when dining in local restaurants, he will often switches plates with a subordinate, apparently to avoid being poisoned, according to Arab diplomatic sources. In his recent interview he said Eritrea might held national elections in three or four decades. Human rights groups accuse the Eritrean president of subjecting his opponents to arbitrary detentions and torture. Eritrea has been under UN sanctions since December, 2009 for its alleged support of terrorists fighting to topple the western backed transitional government of Somalia. Eritrea has in the past been repeatedly accused of supporting Somalia’s Islamist militia Al-Shabaab, a charge it strenuously denies.

The UN security council sanction aimed at forcing Eritrea to come-up clean on its political and armament support to the Somali radical-groups’ And the more, continued to serve as a spoiler, continuing its support of violent extremists, including those who promote publicly and implement violent attacks against the African Union Mission to Somalia (AMISOM). The tiny Red sea State of Eritrea is allegedly bankrolling Somalia’s armed Islamist militant groups in clandestine aggression across East Africa. Proxy conflicts between the two enemies spread most recently to Somalia, where Ethiopia is the main regional backer of the internationally recognized administration in Mogadishou. The Eritrean president has gained the reputation of “the bad boy of the Horn of Africa”, a pariah state under international sanctions for sponsoring terrorism in the region, the accusation prompted the UN-security council in 2009 to vote 13 to 1 in favor of sanctions against Eritrea, including an arms embargo, travel restrictions and an asset freeze on leaders and firms in Eritrea, partly for supporting the Al-Shabab, a Somali-based terrorist organization that the western nations accusing it of having links to Al-Qaida. The sanctions were imposed because of Eritrea’s stance in rejecting western-backed military intervention in the war-torn nation and calling for a “Somali-owned, an All-inclusive” political solution. In December, 2009: The UN imposed an armed embargo, travel restrictions and asset freezes on Eritrean leaders for their alleged support to Al-Shabaab in the civil war against Somalia’s western-backed transitional government’ Ethiopia’s government on April 15, 2011 announced it will increase support to Eritrean rebels seeking to overthrow the government of President Issaias Affe-worki. The country will use “any means at its disposal to bring about regime change in Asmara unless the Eritrean government changes its policies. An Eritrean exile-group has held simultaneous rallies in Addis Ababa the Ethiopian capital and refugee camps in northern Ethiopia demanding the ouster of Eritrean government. The gatherings are part of a renewed push in Ethiopia to spark an uprising against President Issaias Affe-worki's 20-year rule. Eritrea and Ethiopia fought a two-year border war 1998 to 2000 in which 70,000 people died. There has since been an easy peace, with both sides massing tens of thousands of troops along the disputed border. In recent weeks, Ethiopia has stepped-up its anti-Eritrean rhetoric, saying it had intercepted would-be terrorists dispatched by Asmara to create havoc during an African Union summit in the Ethiopian capital, Addis Ababa. Eritrea has emphatically denied the charge, saying "the accusation is purely fabricated to divert and deflect the attention of the international community from giving undivided attention to Ethiopia's illegal occupation of sovereign Eritrean territory including the town of Badme in violation of the UN Charter and Eritrea-Ethiopia Boundary Commission (EEBC) Final and Binding 2002 Delimitation Decision, and the 2007 Demarcation Decision.

As recent, severe violence erupted along the Eritro-Ethiopian border, in which both sides lost many lives. There have been reports of armed Eritrean rebel fighters training in camps on the Ethiopian side of the frontier. On the 20th April, 2011, a crowd of several hundred Eritrean refugees demonstrated in Addis Ababa, the Ethiopian capital in favor of toppling Eritrea's current regime. Around 60, 000 Eritrean refugees are inside Ethiopia, the crowd's appearance was to convenient, as its gathering coincides with new calls for regime change in Eritrea by the Ethiopian government. On the 21 April, 2011, the Ethiopian government said that it intends to help Eritrean rebel-groups overthrow the Eritrean regime of president Issaias Affe-worki. The Ethiopian government said that terrorist attacks in Ethiopia had been sponsored or encouraged by the Eritrean government. The Ethiopian statement said that Ethiopia wound end the regime in Asmara not by a military invasion but by supporting Eritrean opposition groups. On the 29th of April, 2011, Eritrea accused Ethiopia of plotting a new war against it. Eritrea said that the Ethiopian statement that Ethiopia would support Eritrean rebels who want to overthrow the Eritrean government was such a declaration of war. The Eritrean president Issaias Affe-worki and the Ethiopian premier Meles Zenawi both led allied rebel groups to become rebel-fighters turned politicians, have both seized power 20 years ago in their respective countries at the end of a long-armed struggle to overthrow the Ethiopian military government led by Lt. Colonel Mengistu Haile-Mariam, in May-1991.

Some Facts About Eritrea's Government'

Facts about Eritrea's government and human rights record have been disputed for years b/n various factions. On the 29th of April, 2010, Eritrea claimed that the four former British royal-Marines arrested in December, 2010 had possession of numerous weapons. The former marines claim they were serving as a defense force on a merchant vessel when an Eritrean Naval-ship bordered the merchant vessel and arrested them. Horn of Africa experts say that Issaias Affe-Worki, leader of one of the world's most secretive states, has become increasingly and diplomatically isolated in the region. A recent UN report catalogues Eritrea's growing notoriety in the world of terrorism financing, and in particular the global web through which these funds are routed. The report details the country's activities in funding the terrorist group known as the Al-Shabaab in Somalia following the money trail from its citizens in the diasporas in Europe and North America, through Dubai, UAE and the Eritrean embassy in Nairobi, Kenya, and into the hands of the Al-Shabaab, the released report claims Eritrea broke international arms sanctions against it by planning a bomb attack in the Ethiopian capital earlier, bankrolling armed militants throughout East Africa and running an underground economy that raises hundreds of millions of dollars from Eritreans living in the United States, Europe, the Middle East and elsewhere through an extraterritorial income tax, fund raising events and other means. Remittances that Eritrea receives from its large diasporas are its biggest source of foreign exchange. Eritrea blames arch-foe Ethiopia, which routinely accuses Eritrea of supporting the Al-Shabaab rebels, as being behind the allegations, Eritrea has also blasted the report as unfair, inaccurate and motivated by the west's bias in favor of its rival, Ethiopia, accusing of a "frenzied- campaign" to impose further UN's economic sanctions, including a ban on its promising Bisha-Gold mines in a bid to topple the Eritrean government and secure an access to the Red sea. In the spirit of "my enemy's enemy is my friend", which its very unclear whether its really a winning idea, the enemy is in this case is Eritrea's former master Ethiopia, for both these countries, Somalia is merely the theatre of a raging proxy war, an extension of their long standing border dispute, with each side supporting various rival factions and administrations since 1998. Al-Shabaab is thus propped up by Eritrea's determination to keep Ethiopia "off-kilter and overstretched". Eritrea justifies its actions inside Somalia by pointing to Ethiopia's failure to implement the EEBC's ruling of arbitration on their disputed border town of Badme, and the continued presence of Ethiopian military forces and civilian officials on the territory awarded to Eritrea.

August 15, 2011: What went wrong in Eritrea?

Eritrea's hard-won independence promised much for the future, but instead it brought repression, war, secrecy and international pariah status.

guardian.co.uk: I recently read an extensive report prepared by the UN Monitoring group on Somalia and Eritrea, which said Eritrea was behind a terrorist plot in January against an African Union summit in the Ethiopian capital, Addis Ababa. I was impressed by the level of detail in the report. For Eritrean activists abroad, it contained no new revelations, but I presume many members of the international community were shocked by

it. The 417 pages accused Eritrea's government and military leaders of many wrongdoings, including human trafficking, contraband, money laundering and extortion. The question many are asking is: what went wrong in Eritrea? The first thing to look at is its history. The sacrifice that was made to liberate Eritrea from the Ethiopian occupation, which lasted three decades, cannot be described in simple terms. The tug of war that was played out between the attacks of the liberation forces and the Ethiopian counteroffensives still draws raw emotions. Eritreans, young and old, inside and outside the country, supported the revolution. Independence meant the world to Eritreans, and the day of 24 May 1991 was the consolidation of my identity. But post-independence, that hard-won victory failed to bring liberty. Promises of democracy, the foundation stone of the struggle, went out of the window once the ex-fighters assumed power. Gradually, arrogance took over and the ruling elite had everything at their disposal, while the quality of life of the average fighters deteriorated. A gap was quickly created between ex-fighters and civilians, the diaspora were systematically prohibited from returning, and draconian measures were taken against the educated and those who voiced complaints.

In 1998, a renewed conflict over a useless piece of land broke out with Ethiopia. The fighting that claimed around 19,000 young Eritrean lives ended in defeat. The country has never recovered. I went with a group of academics and others to voice our concerns to the president. But he demanded we apologise for publicly criticising him. We were lucky to leave the country unharmed. Now power is totally in the hands of the president, and the unwise wielding of that power has led to Eritrea being excluded from the regional and the international community. Of course in the process, exclusion has become synonymous with self-reliance. "Eritrea is so self-reliant it does not need any outside help to brave the storm," say the aficionados. Sadly, the fact is that Eritrea is on a slippery slope while self-reliance is repeatedly being affirmed. Its foreign policy is shaped by its reaction to what its old rival – and nemesis – Ethiopia does or does not do. There are noticeable traits one can easily identify in the affairs of Eritrea's government: denial and secrecy. Perhaps evidence of that can be found in the food crisis in the Horn of Africa. Is the drought affecting Eritrea? There are neither independent observers nor international organisations in the country. NGOs are banned from operating. A friend of mine who lives in the capital, Asmara, tells me he can't afford to go to the market because prices are too high. The government tells a different story, praising the country for stabilising food prices and for its efforts to ensure food security. The only people who can afford to shop at the market are those who benefit from the country's largest safety net – remittances from family members living abroad. One can only surmise what is really happening in this small country of 4.5 million, whose young people are fleeing to neighbouring countries, where rationing is widespread, independent media do not exist, and all accurate data is government property. I suspect there is a drought in Eritrea, although its effect may not be as severe as in Somalia or other neighbouring countries. But Eritreans are used to going hungry. Dawit Mesfin, an Eritrean, is principal director of Justice Africa, UK

December 3, 2011: The UN security council's approval of tougher sanctions against Eritrea. Eritrea has been named, shamed and then slapped with two sets of U.N. sanctions over charges that it was aiding and abetting al Qaeda-linked rebels in lawless Somalia in its proxy war with Ethiopia. However, a panel tasked with monitoring violations of an arms embargo on Somalia said it had no proof of Eritrean support to the Islamist militants in the last year. The nation is accused of supporting Somali militants, including Al-Shabab. For its part, Eritrea denies the allegations and calls the sanctions "illegal and unjust". Eritrea exports almost nothing, but taxes its estimated 1.2 million citizens living abroad 2% of their income as remissions . Through, its diasporas tax, the government of Eritrea was estimated to raise hundreds of millions of dollars annually. But diplomatic envoys in the sub-region say, action against the Bisha gold mining, the mainstay of Eritrea's tiny, crippled economy-would only harm the country's 5.8 million population. The UN draft resolution calls on all member states to "prohibit investment" in Eritrea's key mining industry and ban the imports of the Bisha-gold and other resources from Eritrea, according to a copy of a draft resolution seen by news reporters. The action would also seek to ban the collection of a 2% tax on money sent home by Eritreans living abroad.

The Eritrean president Issaias Affe-worki routinely claims Washington sided with Eritrea's arch-foe during the border war for "geo-strategic reasons". Neighboring Ethiopia, a key ally in the United States' global war on Islamist insurgents, has deployed troops inside Somalia to fight Al Qaeda-linked militants. In a recent leaked cable from the U.S. embassy in Asmara, former U.S. ambassador Ronald McMullen said Isaias feared the U.S. would try to kill him by firing a missile on his residence in the coastal city of Massawa (Batse). The cable also showed that Isaias believes Ethiopian PM Meles Zenawi tried to have him killed in 1996 when an aircraft that Meles offered for his travel caught fire during a flight. March 19, 2012: A group of Yemeni fishermen claimed they captured an Eritrean soldier after an Eritrean naval vessel intercepted three of their boats in international waters. Apparently the soldier jumped aboard one of the Yemeni boats. Two Yemeni boats then fled, one with an Eritrean soldier aboard. The Eritrean vessel then forced the third fishing boat to sail to Eritrea. Eritrea is now holding three Yemeni fishermen as hostages, pending the return of the Eritrean soldier. It has to be recalled that due to political and economic crisis in Eritrea, many able bodied young citizens are nowadays leaving Eritrea.

March 23, 2012: It has been a week since Eritrea demanded the UN Security Council take action against Ethiopia for its raids on rebel bases in Eritrean territory. Eritrea demanded that the UN act to “ensure justice and the respect of the rule of law.” However, there has been no response from the UN. A recent UN report condemned the Eritrean government for human rights abuses and for supporting “foreign armed groups” that threatened Eritrea’s neighbors, specifically mentioning Djibouti, Ethiopia, and Sudan. The UN has also refrained from condemning Kenya for attacking Al-Shabaab militia bases in southern Somalia, accepting Kenya’s explanation that it was defending its own territory from attack by terrorists who were operating from bases in a failed state. Eritrea is not a failed state (yet), but it is an isolated state. Kenyan fighter jets bombed three al-Shabaab targets near the town of Fafadun in southern Somalia.

April 2, 2012: The Eritrean government has tried to portray the Ethiopian attacks on rebel bases as a violation of Eritrean sovereign territory’ It was that, literally, but Ethiopia argued that it was acting in self-defense when it struck Afar Revolutionary Democratic Unity Front (ARDUF) base camps inside Eritrea, who then complained that the UN Security Council should take action (i.e., condemn the Ethiopian attacks). Eritrea, however, has received little public sympathy. Some of this may be payback for Eritrea’s long-term belligerence toward the UN. Eritrea argued the UN observers favored Ethiopia when the UN ran the demilitarized zone between Eritrea and Ethiopia and it eventually kicked out UN observation teams. Eritrea also faces an array of UN-sponsored sanctions related to the country’s support for terrorist groups in East Africa (most notably Somalia’s Al Shabaab). The most telling statement by Eritrea so far was the mid-March declaration that it would not be entrapped (the word used) by Ethiopia. Eritrea read Ethiopia’s attack as an opportunity (by Ethiopia) to escalate the raids into a war, a war Eritrea would likely lose. As Horn political commentators, this is part of the Ethiopian government’s ambition to invade Eritrea, like they did the same thing, creating a puppet Somali government before invading Somalia.

Eritrea’s Cycling Culture: Cycling is Eritrea’s “unofficial fifth state-sanctioned religion.”

According to The Economist, Eritrea’s cycling culture is intertwined with its colonial history. According to notable Eritrean academics the first bicycle was introduced to the country by the Italians in 1898, and by the 1930s Eritreans were organizing their own bicycle clubs. Some notable Eritreans wrote that even under the fascist rule of Benito Mussolini, the prowess of the Eritrean cyclists was undeniable: Eritrea’s Ghebremariam Ghebru beat a number of Italian cyclists in a special race organized in 1939 by the Italian colonial administrators, in turn shattering “colonial myths about Eritrean inferiority,”

From 1961 to 1991, Eritreans were locked in a bloody war for independence with Ethiopia. Despite the chaos, cycling remained a part of daily life in Eritrea. Dan Connell, a journalist and expert on Eritrea, says he can recall seeing bicycles in Eritrea regularly when he first traveled there in the mid-1970s. “At that time it was just common to see people riding bikes,” Connells said, noting that often he saw “older men riding clunky bikes with no gears on them.” Connell says that this was partly as cars were rare during the war for independence: At one point, bicycles themselves were outlawed because Ethiopia suspected they could be used by the independence movement to aid attacks. As example in February, 1976 the renowned self-exiled cyclist in Rome in the name of Tekeste Woldu (Jeganti) has gained the first ever gold medal for Ethiopia in cycling at the 3rd African Games in Lagos, Nigeria as Eritrean under the former Ethiopian administration.

Once Eritrea gained independence, the country's cycling culture flourished. Perhaps spurred on by its high-altitude environment (Asmara, the capital of Eritrea, sits 7,628 feet above sea level) and mountainous roads, Eritrean cyclists have established themselves as dominant forces in the competitive African cycling world, repeatedly winning African championships. (Text ends)

SOCIAL ISSUES: What is "Quena'a", "Hassad" or "Hasot" in Eritrean Term?

"Quen'a" is a tigrigna translation for "Jealousy", meaning for an envy or self-loathing character. Its a pernicious trait of Eritreans, whose mainly categorized as "Habeshas", its such an inferiority complex now more spreads among the society as under poverty ridden economy. Hasot is Tigrigna meaning for lie or deception which you can read easily at her/his lips. Frankly speaking "Quen'a", "Hasad" or "Hasot" is a kind of an evil personal character where someone never to give any credit or help to another person out for fear of being a lesser person for it. Literally speaking, "quen'a" is a moral self-enslavement, according to social experts, though, the youngest and the brightest generation of Eritrea should cherish to fight or eliminate such cancerous social disease being at the right side of history against Quen'a which widely believed it was inherited from colonial masters.

Eritreans are quite unsure of whether their President Issaias Affeworki has died or is seriously sick, or is on a life-support system until the government secures a smooth transition' Government spokesman says recently that its president is "fit as a fiddle". Government's spokesperson Ali Abdu told VOA that Issaias is alive and well, but relatives and friends of Issaias family are has been gravely ill. There is an increased presence of soldiers patrolling the streets of Asmara since the rumor fueling mill. If Issaias is indeed dead, who will succeed him? The ruling Peoples Front for Democracy and Justice (PFDJ) doesn't seem to have a succession plan and it is feared that the various power centers that Issaias created may clash for control. Eritrea has sought to quash speculation about President Issaias Affe-worki's health, saying he was "fit as a fiddle" and lambasting the United States for spreading "lies" over his condition. Eritreans are torn between two scenarios: President Issaias Afwerki has died or is seriously sick that it is a matter of time before his death is made public. Rumors have been rife in the past few years that Issaias, 67 and in power since May, 1991 after leading his country to independence from Ethiopia, was in poor health and required regular trips abroad for treatment. Speculation about his health has stirred up debate over who might eventually replace the reclusive leader. Isaias has no obvious successor but the opposition says he might be grooming his son, Abraham, for the top job. U.S. diplomatic cables released by Wiki Leaks have also mentioned the possibility of the military elite trying to take over power in the Red Sea state. Eritrea refuted speculation about his health late on Sunday in a special announcement aired by the information ministry on state television and later broadcast on the Internet. “There has been widespread speculation in the past few weeks that President Isaias has fallen seriously ill,” the broadcast said. “We would like to announce that President Isaias is fit as a fiddle and is in the best of health under all criteria,” it added in remarks translated from the Tigrinya language. Eritrea’s exiled opposition has alleged on numerous occasions that the president is suffering from a serious liver ailment and that he has been receiving medical attention in Qatar, with which his nation has close ties. In a move aimed at highlighting his good health, the broadcast showed a montage of Isaias sporting a baseball cap and making a short dash down a dirt track as he waved to bystanders in light rain. It also pictured the leader snapping pictures with a point-and-shoot camera, then walking up a slope and posing as he smiled alongside other men on the banks of a reservoir. Eritrea accused the U.S. Central Intelligence Agency (CIA) of spreading the “lies” surrounding its leader’s health. In a leaked cable from the U.S. embassy in the capital Asmara, former U.S. ambassador Ronald McMullen said Issaias feared the U.S. would try to kill him by firing a missile on his residence in the coastal city of Massawa. Asmara often criticizes Washington which it says backs its arch rival Ethiopia in the two countries’ frontier dispute. “Those lies emanate from Langley with the CIA being the rumor-mongers,” said the television announcement, referring to the intelligence agency’s headquarters. The top brass of the army is in charge of the country, the Minister of Defense General Sebhat Ephrem has been elected leader of the hastily formed Military Supreme Council that’s still under intense meeting behind closed-doors. Armored vehicles and tanks are positioned around banks, while the mother of Issaias Affeworki has been flown in to the capital from her long-time residence in the United States. The sources say her sudden recall is so that she would pay her last respects to her reclusive son. The secret meeting is being attended by the very few and most powerful men who have been clustered around Issaias since rebel days, and these are: General Sebhat Ephrem, Abraha Kassa, Majour-General Oumer Tawil, Majour-General Filipos Wolde-yohannes, Abdalla Jabir, Yemane Guebre-Ab (Charlie), and Brigadier General Abraha Kassa, is second in command, after General Sebhat Ephraim. Some speculate that the much-feared Issaias may make an impressive comeback to public life, a la Fidel Castro of Cuba style. For now, what’s certain is Issaias Affe-worki has been out of public life for nearly a month, according to Eritrean opposition sources.

Eritrean President Issaias Affeworki goes on Eritrean TV to dispel health rumors’

Eritrea's president has made an appearance on the national TV to dispel rumors he is either dead or ailing. "I do not have any kind of sickness," Issaias Affe-worki said. He accused those peddling such rumors of being "sick" themselves and said they were indulging in psychological warfare to "disturb" the people. Mr. Issaias, 66, has led Eritrea since its independence in 1993 from Ethiopia - but faces criticism for failing to implement democratic reforms. The rumors on various opposition websites and on social media noted that the president had not appeared on television for nearly a month, which they believed was unusual. Eritrea and Ethiopia have been at loggerheads since their 1998-2000 border war, which killed over 80,000 people, and they accuse one another of backing the other's rebels and working to topple the other's government. Issaias Affe-worki accused Washington recently of plotting Ethiopian cross-border raids that targeted alleged rebel camps. Eritrea emerged from its long war of independence in 1993 only to plunge once again into military conflict, first with Yemen and then, more devastatingly, with its old adversary, Ethiopia.

He conducts brief interview with the national media outlets'

President Issaias Affe-worki underscored that the recent rumor regarding his state of health attests to the mounting frustration on the part of its authors. Explaining that in the past week he had been abroad on a 3-day working visit, and that upon return home he has been on a tour of inspection to Gash-Barka, Anseba and the Northern Red Sea regions from 21 to 22 April, the President said: "I am lucky; I enjoy robust health. The speculated ill-health is only in the minds of the authors of such a baseless rumor." Elaborating that the issue has nothing to do with his health status but designed to create anxiety among members of the public, President Issaias pointed out that it is but a continuation of the coordinated psychological warfare and anti-Eritrea smear campaign that has been going on for the past decade under various guises. He further indicated that the fabricated ploy was concocted at a time when the nation is registering impressive development stride, coupled with the mounting popular resistance, and that the recent enemy speculation is intended to put their frustration on others. He went on to underline that as information technology is becoming an instrument of the special interest forces, members of the public should not fall into the trap of being misled by such fabricated misinformation for acts of this nature may be repeated from time to time on the part of the same authors. Commending the perseverance and resistance of the Eritrean people against all enemy conspiracies, the President called on citizens to continue the national development endeavors without being distracted by futile enemy ploys.

A Dictatorial Control over Media News Coverage'

Achieved through a combination of propaganda, brute force, and sophisticated technology, define the world's top 10 most censored countries the Committee to Protect Journalists found in a new report issued to commemorate World Press Freedom Day. Eritrea, North Korea, and Syria top the list, underscoring that domestic restrictions on information have broad implications for global geopolitical stability. “In the name of stability or development, these regimes suppress independent reporting, amplify propaganda, and use technology to control rather than empower their own citizens,” said CPJ Executive Director Joel Simon. “Journalists are seen as a threat and often pay a high price for their reporting. But because the Internet and trade have made information global, domestic censorship affects people everywhere.” CPJ’s report details how censorship works in each nation and highlights some trends among the censored countries, including disputed legitimacy of leadership and lagging economic development. In Eritrea, only state media is allowed to operate and the international press has been shut out, according to CPJ’s report. North Korea’s official news agency produces all content for local media, while foreign reporters have limited access and are always under surveillance. Syria has imposed a blackout on independent news coverage for more than a year, unleashing a range of physical and electronic attacks while disabling means of communication. The list of top 10 nations is rounded out by Iran, Equatorial Guinea, Uzbekistan, Burma, Saudi Arabia, Cuba and Belarus. The new rankings, which update a list published in 2006, was determined according to 15 benchmarks assessed by CPJ experts. These include the blocking of websites, restrictions on electronic recording and dissemination, the absence of privately owned or independent media, restrictions on journalist movements, jamming of foreign broadcasts, and blocking of foreign correspondents, among others. All countries on the list met at least 10 benchmarks. CPJ also considered Azerbaijan, Ethiopia, China, Sudan, Turkmenistan, and Vietnam – all heavily censored nations that call for scrutiny. The report is available in Arabic, English, French, Russian, and Spanish. CPJ also published a video counting down the top 10 most censored countries with a brief outline of their restrictions.

Concerning The Eritrean Military’

According to dissident Eritreans in-exile, “The president, alarmed by what is going on in the neighborhood, is taking every preemptive move imaginable to prevent Egyptian style uprising in the streets of Asmara, the capital. There are three important aspects to the news; (A) Relocating the army; the tyrant leader has ordered the military stationed in cities across Eritrea including Asmara to be relocated in surrounding villages. For instance, in the case of Asmara, among the villages mentioned for relocation are; Milezanay, Adi-Gebru, Wequerti, etc. Its clear what he is doing; having already emptied the cities of their youth, he knows that the only place where the youth are now to be found is in the military. In a preemptive move to prevent any rebellion from the youth, he started his nefarious design by closing down Asmara University - or, if you will, by “relocating it” to Mai-Nefhi. Now, he has to do the same thing even with the military; he is relocating the military to the countryside, away from the urban areas where any unrest will have its maximum effect. (B) Movement constraint; the dilemma that president Issaias Affe-worki has with the military now is that while fearing it for the youth concentration in it, he is also dependent on it for his survival. In case something happens inside Asmara, he will have to station them close to the city, but yet far enough to feel safe from its mischief. But in case it becomes close for comfort, he has also order a constraint in the military's movement. (C) Reshuffling; the third aspect of the news is that he has ordered the reshuffling of the entire army divisions. According to the dissident Eritreans, this is an old and tried method of the ruling People's Front for Democracy and Justice (PFDJ). Its a way of breaking up any old relationships that may hold among the soldiers and that may potentially be used to organize themselves against the regime. Given the great mistrust, the system has sown among rank and file, it would take, at minimum, several months to create any kind of trust among the newly reshuffled ones. And this is exactly what reshuffling is meant to do; buy him a time!".

Eritrea's Political Situation and Its Policy in the Horn of Africa'

Brief Analisys: This briefing considers some of the intricacies of Eritrean politics and foreign policy. It also examines Eritrea's continuous attempts to undermine the security of the Horn: In April 2012, following his 30-day disappearance after Ethiopia's March 2012 retaliatory attacks, there were rumors that President Isaias Afewerki was seriously ill. There are fears that, if President Issaias – a reclusive leader who has never allowed a significant broadening of power and has no obvious successor – is incapacitated, a vacuum would open and the military (the only organized entity in the country) would take over political power in Eritrea. There is the possibility of an extended internal struggle for power within the military, especially against the backdrop of acute economic problems. The most likely outcome will be a new authoritarian strongman, probably with a military or armed struggle background but politically weaker than President Isaias. In the short to medium term this may not result in stable policies, whether internal, regional or international. Indeed, political and economic repression could continue and dialogue with Ethiopia may not begin immediately. Eritrea has also had to cope with high-profile defections recently. In early October 2012, Eritrean Air Force pilots Captain Yonas Woldeab and Captain Mekonnen Debesai reportedly flew in a presidential plane to Saudi Arabia and asked for political asylum. According to press reports, they had been assigned to fly President Isaias and high-ranking officials domestically and in the region on both official and secret missions. Gold revenues currently provide badly needed hard currency revenues for Eritrea, making up for the drastic fall in remittances that had crippled its economy. Reuters reported that Nevsun Resources, a Canadian company based in Vancouver, mined between 280 000 and 300 000 ounces of gold worth nearly US$150 million in 2012 at its flagship Bisha mine. The Eritrean military is suspected of carrying out contraband trade activities with Sudan and Yemen in a bid to generate hard currency. Law enforcement authorities in Sudan's eastern Kassala State bordering Eritrea have uncovered a large smuggling operation involving around 80 trucks and pickups, half of which crossed into Eritrea. According to Sudanese media, 142 thousand liters of fuel – mainly kerosene – 140 sacks of flour and 12 sacks of wheat were seized and 11 individuals were arrested. In mid-October 2012, Ethiopian security forces reportedly seized 481 pistols and 13 000 bullets that were to be smuggled into Ethiopia via Sudan. The weapons were hidden in cars and trucks, but were seized at the city of Metema. It is suspected that Eritrea has maintained its support for Ethiopian opposition elements that would like to start an Arab Spring-like popular uprising.

The 2009 United Nations (UN) Security Council sanctions have forced Eritrea to reach out diplomatically to the European Union (EU) and the African Union (AU), as well as the Intergovernmental Authority for Development (IGAD) member states. Despite this, the Eritrean government may try to take advantage of the post-Meles transition period in Ethiopia. The prevailing feeling in Eritrean circles seems to be that a political power and leadership vacuum has opened up in the Ethiopian ruling party. It would also like to derail the Ogaden National Liberation Front (ONLF)-Ethiopian government negotiations. The negotiations were mediated by Kenya, but reportedly failed. Eritrea is also unhappy that Qatar appointed an ambassador to Ethiopia. Ethiopia had severed relations in April 2008 with Qatar because of its strong links with Eritrea. This briefing was compiled by Ms. Neus Ramis Segui from the Conflict Prevention and Risk Analysis division of the ISS Addis Ababa office.

May 21, 2012: A Gunfire erupted in a refugee camp near the Sudan-Eritrea border’

Refugees in the camp fought with police. One policeman was wounded. The camp, located at Shagarab, houses several thousand Eritrean refugees. No one claimed to know who was responsible for the gunfire. A spokesman for an aid agency said that most of the refugees are fleeing Eritrea. Some are trying to escape the Eritrean military conscription while others are fleeing the country’s deteriorating economic conditions.

The US has imposed sanctions on six people, including Eritrea’s spy chief and other senior military officers, for allegedly aiding the Somali Al-Shabaab militants’ A Muslim cleric in Kenya and a Sudanese man are also accused of providing financial and logistical support to the Islamist al-Shabab group. Two other Kenyans named by the US Treasury Department are in jail. Eritrea is already subject to UN sanctions for supporting the Al-Qaeda aligned militants, which it denies. Al-Shabab, which joined al-Qaeda earlier this year, is fighting a UN-backed government in Somalia. The group still controls much of the country but is under pressure from pro-government militias, an African Union force and troops from Ethiopia - which remains Eritrea’s bitter foe after their 1998-2000 border war. “The United States is determined to target those who are responsible for the ongoing bloodshed and instability in Somalia,” Adam Szubin, the director of the US Treasury's Office of Foreign Assets Control, which administers the sanctions, said in a statement.

Fifty refugees drown in the Mediterranean’

By John Hooper guardian.co.uk (July 11, 2012) Eritrea - Asylum seekers from Eritrea, Somalia and Sudan die after after boat capsizes en route to Italy. One man survives to tell the tale. More than 50 asylum seekers trying to reach Italy died when their boat capsized, according to a man who has said he is the sole survivor. Rocco Nuri, spokesman for the United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees (UNHCR) in Tunisia, told the Guardian that the survivor, whom he named as Abbas, was spotted by Tunisian fishermen on Monday night clinging to a fuel tank and the remains of the boat. The 25-year-old Eritrean was taken to hospital in the town of Zarzis. After interviewing him, Nuri quoted the man as saying that he had set off from Tripoli in Libya with 55 others – 33 Eritreans, 20 Somalis and two Sudanese. At some point in the journey – “He is very confused about timing,” said Nuri – the rigid inflatable boat on which they were travelling developed a puncture on one side. Many of the passengers fled to the opposite side of the vessel and the wooden base of the boat gave way under their weight. “The boat capsized and everyone fell overboard,” said Nuri. “Abbas grasped a rope that ran down the side of the boat. Everybody else presumably was lost in the sea and drowned.”

The UNHCR official added, however, that the survivor had told him that some of the other passengers had tried to hold on to him to save themselves. “He was stripped naked as people grabbed at his clothes. But he managed to hold on to the rope,” said Nuri. Boats4People, an NGO that interviewed Abbas earlier, said in a statement that the boat capsized after “approximately 26 hours” at sea. The survivor had “drifted alone for 14 days in the open sea, occasionally sighting in the distance other vessels”. Commenting on the reported disaster, the deputy high commissioner for refugees, T Alexander Aleinikoff, said: “The Mediterranean is one of the busiest seaways in the world and it is imperative that the time-honoured tradition of rescue at sea be upheld.” Recent days have seen an upsurge in the number of attempted crossings – and evidence of a change in tactics by the organisers. Instead of trying to land on the island of Lampedusa, the most southerly patch of Italian territory, boats have been aiming for Sicily and the mainland. Thirty migrants claiming to be from Pakistan were stopped by police after landing on the coast of Puglia, the “heel” of Italy, on Monday. Since Sunday, three vessels carrying a total of 174 people have been intercepted off the south-eastern shores of Sicily. Italian revenue guards meanwhile reported having arrested 20 people in a wide-ranging operation against migrant traffickers from Niger. It was reported that wiretaps had yielded evidence of migrants being left to die after suffering injuries while crossing the Sahara.

July 17, 2012: Eritrea’s brutal trade in weapons and people that is too lucrative to stamp out’

Refugees smuggled with arms from Eritrea to Sinai face weeks of torture as captives of criminal gangs – under noses of the UN. A cluster of small, concrete buildings stands in the parched landscape of the Egyptian Sinai, not far from the border with Israel. Nothing but sand and a few determined shrubs lie between them and distant jagged mountains. This is where two Bedouin smugglers, Mustafa and Mohaned, store hostages and arms. It is the final stop on a highly organised, lucrative and brutal smuggling network that runs from the green hills of Eritrea, through Sudan's refugee camps to the Egyptian Sinai. In Sinai, human trafficking is a successful subsidiary to the main business: smuggling arms. Haile*, 23, was held in one of these buildings for two weeks in May, along with 60 other Eritreans all hoping to reach Israel but instead held and tortured for ransoms of up to $40,000 (£25,000). "Through a small window we could see another building that we called 'the weapons house' because a stream of men would go in empty-handed and leave with weapons," he said. Like hundreds of thousands before him, Haile fled Eritrea for Sudan to avoid the interminable military service demanded by the regime. "Conditions were terrible. There was an outbreak of disease and many soldiers were dying. I just couldn't stand it," he said.

But after only two weeks in Shagarab refugee camp, Haile was lured by a Sudanese smuggling gang, known as Rashayda, with an offer of work. He was taken to Khartoum where he was sold to Mustafa and Mohammed, along with sacks of rocket-propelled grenades and Kalashnikov rifles. Joe, 28, made the same perilous journey in 2011. He paid smugglers several thousand dollars to take him but like Haile, he was driven in a convoy of white Toyota pickup trucks to the border with Egypt, each packed with 20 Eritrean refugees sitting on top of white flour sacks filled with Kalashnikovs. They were destined for another Sinai smuggler, Abu Mohammad. When the convoy approached the mountains along the Sudanese-Egyptian border, each of the Eritrean men was given a gun from the stash and told to shoot if they met Egyptian soldiers. "They know all Eritreans have been in the army; we all know how to fight," Joe said. "I wasn't scared, I felt nothing. Two people had already died from a lack of water on the way. I had given up. We are not humans to the smugglers – they treat the weapons with more respect." Others report noticing Eritrean army markings on M14 and Kalashnikov rifles smuggled with them out of Sudan

"I was in the army for nine years – I know the kind of weapons they use," said Thomaski Haile, an Eritrean dissident who crossed into Sinai in 2007. "One M14 in my car had Tigrinya symbols and a series of numbers on the side that belonged to the lowest rank in the Eritrean army." Once inside the Sinai smugglers' camps, only those who can be of service to their captors are spared daily torture, including being hung upside down for hours, rape and burning with electric cables. Their screams are relayed to relatives over the phone, along with demands for money. Woldemariame, 31, who earns a living washing dishes at a Tel Aviv restaurant, was another of those kidnapped by Abu Mohammad. He said he spent a month in Sinai, where, as a fluent Arabic speaker, he worked as a translator for the Bedouin gang and was privy to every aspect of their business. “Abu Mohammad smuggles people from Libya and Sudan to Israel. He also receives deliveries of around 150 weapons three times a week. I saw with my own eyes Abu Mohammad pay $250 each for these weapons, mostly Russian originally. He sells them to Palestinians for more," Woldemariame said. He described the weapon's journey, starting at Aalla, a town in Eritrea's southern hills, to a warehouse in Teseney, on the Sudanese border. From here, two high-ranking Eritrean officers drove them across the border to WadiSerifay refugee camp where they were handed over to the Rashayda, Woldemariam said

According to Woldemariam and the UN monitoring group, one man controls this export industry: General Teklai Kifle "Manjus", commander of Eritrea's western military zone. A UN investigator for the Eritrea and Somalia Monitoring Group, said: "A small clique of military and government officials runs the state and Manjus is one of the most influential. With activity on this scale over such a long time you have to assume the knowledge and tacit approval of other parts of the Eritrean leadership. "Their motivation is financial, not just in terms of the personal gain of Manjus but also for the party and party officials. Particularly, given the scale, with regard to human trafficking." Eritrea denies these charges. The estimated 40,000 Eritreans living in Israel legally cannot be deported because of the dangers they face should they return, but are not granted refugee status. They receive no state support but it is this community that shoulders the burden of raising hundreds of thousands of dollars to save the lives of kidnapped relatives. Eritrean refugees in Tel Aviv, many of whom have endured the horrors of the Sinai torture camps, ask why no one – not Israel, Egypt, the US nor the EU – will intervene to stop the brutal trade in human lives that is bankrupting their families, or the weapons trade they believe arms militants, including Hamas. Former middleman Woldemariame said Abu Mohammad was able to run his criminal business openly. His base, a huge, off-white villa surrounded by a low wall, is near the UN airbase in Sinai. The arms, he said, are kept in a bamboo shack 100 metres from the house. "The refugees he tortures can see red helicopters landing at the UN base 300 metres away," he said. "I'm sure you can see his villa from the UN. If they would just go and look, they would find hundreds of weapons. Those people must not have any brains if they don't know what's going on there." Full names have been withheld to protect the witnesses

July 17, 2012: Eritrean regime cashes in on arms and human trafficking, says UN report'

Investigators tell of smuggling highway running to Sinai, delivering arms to militants and people to ransom-seeking gangs. Phoebe Greenwood in Tel Aviv guardian.co.uk: A multimillion-dollar arms trafficking industry that is funding the Eritrean military regime is behind the kidnap, torture and ransom of thousands of Eritrean refugees, according to a leaked report to the UN security council. An investigation by the Somalia and Eritrea monitoring group has uncovered a trafficking highway running from the Eritrean highlands through Sudan's refugee camps into the Sinai desert, delivering arms to militant groups, and Eritrean asylum-seekers to Bedouin gangs, who use starvation, electrocution, rape and murder to extort up to $40,000 (£25,000) from relatives in the Eritrean diaspora for their release. According to witness testimony, part of the arsenal smuggled from Eritrea is sold to Palestinian militants in the Gaza Strip. This industry, run jointly by Eritrean officials, Sudanese and Egyptian smuggling gangs, is estimated to generate more than $10m a year. The monitoring group's findings, presented to the UN security council in New York earlier this month and leaked on Monday, place Eritrea in clear contravention of a sanctions regime imposed in 2009, which prohibits the sale of arms and military equipment to Eritrea and prevents Eritrea from exporting weapons. The report names General Teklai Kifle "Manjus", commander of Eritrea's western military zone, as the mastermind. "Multiple independent sources in Israel and the Sinai have identified General Teklai Kifle Manjus … as well as a string of intermediaries, as being directly responsible for the cross-border smuggling of humans and weapons from Eritrea," the report it states. "The weapons are generally described as Kalashnikov-pattern assault rifles and rocket-propelled grenades. Many bear the inscriptions of the Eritrean military units to which they previously belonged." UN sources told the Guardian that the extent of corruption the industry requires on Eritrea's western border, and the scale of the exodus of asylum-seekers it involves, mean it would be impossible to run without the collusion of government officials. "If it hasn't come to the president's attention, I'd be very surprised," the source said.

But Tefamariam Tekete Debbas, Eritrea's ambassador to Israel, dismissed the allegations. "If they can give 100% evidence, then this guy [Manjus] will be in jail in Eritrea. It is the same with the [accusations of] human rights abuses. Where are the facts? One lie is repeated so many times it is like a truth," Debbas said. Eritrea, despite struggling with extreme poverty, rejects all foreign intervention, including food aid. With a population of little more than 5 million, it has one of the largest armies in Africa, made up of soldiers forced indefinitely into national service. According to a 2009 investigation by Human Rights Watch and the United Nations high commissioner for refugees (UNHCR), these conscripts are subjected to torture and illegal forced labour. President Issaias Afewerki justifies this with the threat of a renewed conflict with Ethiopia, from which Eritrea gained independence in 1992 during a decades-long war, which officially ended in 2000. Many of his citizens flee the country. The UN estimates that 3,000 people left Eritrea in every month of 2011, most for Sudan or Ethiopia, many bound for Israel. These are the refugees that fuel the Sinai smuggling industry. The UNHCR estimates that almost 60,000 Eritreans crossed into Israel from Egypt between 2009 and 2011. Avi Granot, head of the Africa division in Israel's foreign ministry, denies any knowledge of Eritrean arms entering Sinai, despite UN reports of an Israeli-Egyptian co-ordinated air strike on a weapons convoy in the Egyptian Sinai in 2010, in which Palestinians and Eritreans were killed. Eritrea was a strategic ally, he said. It was the one friendly port on the Red Sea – the only waterway running south from Israel to Iran, Asia and beyond. He also believed reports of human trafficking and torture in the Sinai were “grossly exaggerated”. “I served 17 years ago as ambassador to Ethiopia. One of the things I learned in the region is that lying is a justified means to achieve greater opportunities,” he said. Amnesty has presented to the Egyptian authorities evidence of extortion, rape, torture and killings of Eritreans crossing the Sinai peninsula and called for them to investigate and prosecute those allegedly responsible but a spokesman said that the Egyptian authorities “have done very little to protect victims of human trafficking”.

US Treasury Blacklist indication

Indicates Colonel Tewolde Habte Negash: Eritrea’s spy chief - alleged to be principal architect of Eritrea’s relationship with Al-Shabaab.

Colonel Taeme Abraham Goitom: Senior Eritrean official - alleged to have helped shape an armed group now merged with Al-Shabaab.

Aboud Rogo Mohammed: Radical Muslim cleric in Kenya - accused of raising funds and recruits for al-Shabab.

Suhayl Salim Abd-El-Rahman aka Abu-Faris: Somali-based Sudanese militant - accused of recruiting foreigners for al-Shabab.

Omar Awadh Omar: Kenyan in jail charged with planning the 2001 Kampala suicide attacks. Abubaker Shariff Ahmed aka Makaburi: Kenyan arrested in 2010 on suspicion of involvement in bombing of a Nairobi bus terminal. The move will freeze the assets of the men in the US and block them from doing business in the country. The US statement said that Eritrea’s intelligence officer Colonel Tewolde Habte Negash was the principal architect of his government’s relationship with Al-Shabab, going back eight years, and was the main coordinator of financial and logistical support. “He appears to have been indirectly involved in the training of al-Shabab fighters between 2007 and 2009 at an Eritrean training camp for instruction in suicide bombing and vehicle-borne improvised explosive devices,” it said. The cleric, Aboud Rogo Mohammed - who preaches in Kenya’s capital, Nairobi - is accused of fundraising for al-Shabab. “He continues to exert influence over extremist groups in East Africa as part of his campaign to promote violence throughout East Africa,” the statement said. “As an ideological leader, Aboud Rogo Mohammed has used an extremist group as a pathway for radicalization and recruitment of principally Swahili-speaking Africans for ‘action’ in Somalia.” Sudanese militant Abu Fahirs is accused of helping foreign fighters travel to Al-Shabaab training camps. Of the two Kenyans named, one is in prison in Uganda awaiting trial in connection with the double suicide bombing in Kampala, which killed 76 people watching the 2010 football World Cup final on television. Uganda is the main contributor to the African Union force in Somalia backing the interim government that is due to be replaced next month with the country’s first elected government in more than 20 years. Somalia has been without an effective central government since January, 1991, and has been wracked by fighting ever since - a situation that has allowed piracy and lawlessness to flourish.

A multimillion dollar arms trafficking industry that is funding the Eritrean military regime is behind the kidnap, torture and ransom of thousands of Eritrean refugees, according to a leaked report to the UN Security Council' The investigation uncovered a trafficking highway running from the Eritrean highlands through Sudan's refugee camps into the Sinai desert, delivering arms to militant groups, and Eritrean asylum seekers to Bedouin gangs, who use electrocution, rape and murder to extort up to $40,000 from relatives in the Eritrean diasporas for their release. According to witness testimony, part of the smuggled arsenal is sold to Palestinian militants in the Gaza Strip. This industry, run jointly by Eritrean officials, Sudanese and Egyptian smuggling gangs, is estimated to generate more than $10 million a year. The monitoring group's findings were leaked on Monday, and place Eritrea in clear contravention of a sanctions regime imposed in 2009, which prevents it from exporting weapons. The report names General Teklai Kifle "Manjus", commander of Eritrea's western military zone, as the mastermind. "Multiple independent sources in Israel and the Sinai have identified General Teklai Kifle Manjus …as well as a string of intermediaries, as being directly responsible for the cross-border smuggling of humans and weapons from Eritrea," it states. "The weapons are generally described as Kalashnikov-pattern assault rifles and rocket-propelled grenades. Many bear the inscriptions of Eritrean military units to which they previously belonged.' Tesfamariam Tekeste Debbas, Eritrea's ambassador to Israel, dismissed the allegations. "If they can give 100 percent evidence, then this guy [Manjus] will be in jail in Eritrea," he said. "Where are the facts? One lie is repeated so many times it is like a truth." Eritrea, with a population of little more than 5 million, has one of the largest armies in Africa, made up of soldiers forced into national service. President Issaias Affeworki justifies this with the threat of a renewed conflict with Ethiopia, from which Eritrea gained independence in 1992 during a decades-long war, which officially ended in 2000. The UN estimates 3000 people left Eritrea in every month of 2011, most for Sudan or Ethiopia, many bound for Israel. These are the refugees who fuel the Sinai smuggling industry. The UN High Commissioner for Refugees estimates that almost 60,000 Eritreans crossed into Israel from Egypt between 2009 and 2011. Avi Granot, head of the Africa division in Israel's foreign ministry, denied any knowledge of Eritrean arms entering Sinai. Eritrea was a strategic ally, he said, the one friendly port on the Red Sea. He also believed reports of trafficking and torture in the Sinai were "grossly exaggerated".

Reporters Without Borders (RWB) Reveals Three journalists held since 2001 die in Eiraeiro prison camp' After several weeks of investigating reports from sources in Eritrea and from prison guards who fled the country, Reporters Without Borders has been able to confirm that three more journalists – Dawit Habte-Michael, Mattewos Habte-Ab and Wedi Itay –have died in the northeastern prison camp of Eiraeiro. All three had been held since late 2001. Another journalist arrested in February 2009, whose identity has not been established with certainty, has also reportedly died in detention – in his case, in Adi Abeito military prison near the capital, Asmara. The only good news is that Tesfa-Lidet" Topo" Mebrahtu, a well-known sports journalist who worked for state-owned radio "Dimtsi - Hafash" and the state-owned "Eri-TV", was "released on bond" (he is still under surveillance, with relatives acting as guarantors) in early 2012 after being held for 10 months. "While all eyes are turned on Syria, another, less visible, tragedy is being played out in Eritrea, a country forgotten by the international community although it is the world's leading media freedom violator and Africa's biggest prison for journalists "Reporters Without Borders said. "In Eritrea, journalists have been thrown in prison just for daring to express their opinions. Some have been held for more than 10 years and are disappearing one by one. Located in the northeast of the country, Eiraeiro is not a prison, it is a death camp." Reporters Without Borders first revealed details about conditions at Eiraeiro in January 2008 after meeting a former camp guard. Further details were provided in 2010, on the basis of statements made by another former guard, Eyob Bahta, shortly after he fled to Ethiopia. What follows is based on new eyewitness accounts from this death camp. I - Three more of the journalists held since 2001 die in detention: Dawit Habte-Michael Arrested on 21 September 2001 after hiding for three days in the school where he taught physics, Habtemichael was the deputy editor and co-founder of the biweekly Mequaleh. Aged 30 at the time of his arrest, he was one of the youngest of the Eritrean journalists to be detained. After his mental health began to deteriorate in 2007, he became schizophrenic and finally lost all contact with reality in 2010. The failure to treat his steadily worsening mental condition is thought to have been the cause of his death in the second half of 2010. He was prisoner No. 12 at Eiraeiro. Mattewos Habteab: Meqalehco-founder and editor Mattewos Habte-Ab and another journalist, Temesgen Guebre-Eyesus, were transferred to a prison in the Dahlak Archipelago in late 2008 but were subsequently brought back to the mainland, to Eiraeiro, and it was there that Habte-Ab finally succumbed to the camp's appalling conditions. Sahle Tsega-Zaab, aka Wedi Itay: Better known by the pen-name of Wedi-Itay, Sahle Tsega-Zaab was a freelance journalist and writer who often worked for privately-owned newspapers such as Queste-Debena as well as the pro-government daily Hadas Eritrea. Arrested in October 2001, he died at Eiraeiro from an identified illness and from the lack of medical treatment. It was previously established that four of the other journalists arrested around the same time in 2001 – Medhanie Haile, Yusuf Mohammed Ali, Said Abdulqader and Fessehaye "Joshua" Yohannes –died in detention. As a result, only four members of the group of journalists arrested in September/October 2001

– Dawit Isaac,Seyoum Tsehaye, Amanuel Asrat and Temesgen Guebre-Eyesus – are still alive. II - Torture and mistreatment of state media journalists held since 2009: Former prison guard Berhane Afro fled the country earlier this year and is seeking asylum in Israel. He was a guard at Adi-Abeito military prison, where most of the journalists arrested at

Radio Bana and other state media in February 2009 are being held. He said information minister Ali Abdu and one of his employees, identified only as Asmelash, went to Adi Abeito recently to talk to the prison's governor, Wedi Welela. He also reported that journalists held at Adi Abeito are subjected to various forms of torture and mistreatment including electric shock, beatings and solitary confinement. Food is sometimes withheld and they are denied medical care. A journalist identified only by the given name of Bereket reportedly died as a result of these appalling conditions. It is believed that this journalist is Bereket Misghina, but Reporters Without Borders cannot confirm this with complete certainty. All the journalists arrested in 2009 are accused of collaborating with western NGOs and government and with exile opposition groups. They are allowed no visits. Some, such as the journalist, writer and translator Mulu-Birhan Habte-Gabriel and the young journalist and poet Meles Negusse, are still being held at Adi Abeito. Others have been moved to other detention centres. They include Eri-TV journalist Isaac Abraham, who has been transferred to Mai-Srwa. Yirgalem Fisseha Mebrahtu, a woman journalist who was arrested in February, 2009 is reportedly still in an Asmara hospital. RWB 30th August, 2012

Two Eritrean Air Force captains flew the aircraft at low altitude across the Red Sea towards Saudi airspace, and were met by two Saudi F-15 fighter jets before landing at a regional airport in the Southwestern city of Jizan' News tips: October 2, 2012: The two pilots have been tentatively identified as Yonas Woldeab and Mekonnen Debesai—a witness at that airport reported seeing two men disembark from the aircraft, and multiple sources report they've sought political asylum from Saudi authorities. According to Radio France International, the two individuals are not just any "ordinary" military officers, as they worked directly for President Affe-worki and were involved in secret missions to Somalia, including ferrying equipment for the Islamist al-Shabaab militia. The U.S. has in the last few years turned its attention onto Eritrea due to its government's alleged support of al-Shabab, which is categorized as a terrorist organization and is recognized as the Somalia branch of al-Qaeda.

Eritrean Air force Captains flee to Saudi Arabia'

Updates;- Two Eritrean Air force Captains, Yonas Woldeab and Mekonnen Debesai, have sought political asylum 2 October, 2012 in Saudi Arabia, after fleeing their base in the IAI 1125 VIP passenger. The two pilots flew the plane that belongs to the Force this morning and there is no immediate reaction regarding their flee by the government so far. Yonas was head and trainer of the Civil department of the air force, according to assenna.com sources in Asmara. Captain Yonas and Captain Mekonnen were head and deputy. The fact that both were able to build trust among them and agree to take the decision to flee the country with one of the air force's rare VIP aircraft shows that the dictatorial regime is loathed not only by the majority ordinary Eritreans, but by the ‘trusted’ senior officers as well. The same sources indicate that the two pilots were one of the few and among the last left in the Force who had been well trained and highly trusted in the two-decade old force. They were one of few distinguished pilots who were sent by the Government to several training programs including one in Florida. They had been assigned in flying President Issias Affeworki and high ranking army and party officials both domestically and in the region in all official and secret missions. At the same time, they had been among the few Eritrean Air Force pilots who were frequently assigned to the highly regarded gold mining site in Bisha. The sources also acknowledge that they have been discontent following the deaths of their two pilot colleagues who were killed after the plane they were flying crashed in Eritrea, last year. They blame the government for the deaths that administrative negligence and lack of routine maintenance was the main cause for the loss. In the past few years, several Eritrean air force pilots and personnel have defected weakening the young air force further. Source: Assena News

Two Eritrean AF Pilots have defected to Saudi with a Presidential jet' Updates: On October 2nd, two Eritrean pilots defect to Saudi Arabia with president Isaias Afework's private jet. They landed their plane at specifically regional Jizan airport in Saudi territory, before seeking political asylum in the Saudi kingdom. The two captains are not Eritrean anyone. They work directly for the head of state and they have participated, according to our colleague Leonard Vincent, several secret missions, particularly in Somalia. They have ferried military equipment on behalf of Al-Shabaab militia. Suffice to say that their defection is a godsend for the U.S. and Saudi intelligence, Asmara accusing Washington of sponsoring terrorism in the Horn of Africa. This is probably due to the extreme importance of these two men Habte-Selassié GM of the Eritrean aviation, emergency have been sent to Saudi Arabia. Source: RFI News

Eritrea dispatched a high ranking army aviation officer, General Teklai Habte-Selassié, on an "urgent" mission to Riyadh.

Updates: Saudi Arabia refused to return a stolen Eritrean air force plane. A blogger familiar with events claims the aircraft in question is an Israeli-built IAI Astra 1125, a twin-engine presidential VIP transport jet, and the only such aircraft currently known to be operated by Eritrea. Pilots who had flown Affe-worki on several occasions, according to a dissident journalist and founder of Awate.com—would know something of the country's continued meddling in Somalia, including the scope of its support for the Al-Shabaab. The latest embarrassment comes on the heels of additional high profile defections—in August, the athletes selected to carry Eritrea's flag during the opening ceremony of the 2012 Olympic Games in Mozambique sought asylum along with three other athletes. In 2011, thirteen players from the country's national soccer squad defected while at a tournament in Tanzania. Eritrea has long been criticized for its poor human rights record, along with the worst ranking for press freedom in the world. The country's president, Isaias Afewerki, has held that position since 1993, and has been described as “unhinged,” “cruel and defiant.” Business Insider

Somalia, which sits at the mouth of the Red Sea and has been a haven for pirates and militant Islamists, is an area of intense focus and cooperation for the international community’

Updates: The Eritrea presidential pilots have dramatically exposed a government that Freedom House included on its 2012 list of the “worst of the worst” states in terms of political oppression. And they’ve created a possible crisis for their now-former bosses. The pilots aren’t the year’s only high-profile Eritrean defectors: In August, 2012 the flag-carrier for the Eritrean team defected during the Summer Olympics in London. A prominent Eritrean female activist Meron Estefanos says, that escape is a popular notion among Eritreans these days. “Any Eritrean will use any opportunity he gets to flee,” she says. It is not hard to see why. According to Human Rights Watch (HRW), Issaias Affe-worki has imprisoned somewhere between 5,000 and 10,000 of his opponents and perceived opponents, including “government officials, business leaders and journalists.” The government heavily fines the families of those who evade military service, which perhaps explains why a badly impoverished country of less than 6 million is able to maintain a standing military of over 201,000, in addition to over 120,000 reservists.

Meet Not Public Expectation’

Since Spring 2012, with the usual silent paranoia that characterizes the government of Eritrea has been forcing ordinary citizens to be enlisted in neighborhood militias, according to the testimony of many Eritreans in the country and abroad. The distribution of AK-47 machine guns to the civilian population raises questions and worries about an outbreak of a civil war. Others saw it as a sign of the gradual collapse of the secretive dictatorship in Eritrea. Convened by the administration: In Asmara and Keren (3rd largest city of the country, north of Asmara), families received a summons from the regional administrations. Citizens gathered at kebele, the seat of the district administration, and handed receipts for AK-47s and several cartridges, and are told to “defend the homeland against the infiltrators.” “They have to fill out a form and they are given a plastic card, which must henceforth be their identity,” says a resident of Asmara wishing to remain anonymous and whose father was armed by the government in August 2012 . Or, in the workplace, supervisors convene employees and, after a short patriotic speech, distribute firearms to older men and women in their 50s or older. My father was 65 years,” Negash (the names have been changed for security reasons), an Eritrean living in exile in Canada . “When his boss began distributing weapons under the pretext of fighting against enemies, all his colleagues were shocked but were scared to ask for an explanation.”

Eritrea calls for lifting of sanctions, rejects UN accusations’

Eritrea has asked the U.N. Security Council to lift sanctions against it after a recent U.N. experts' report showed that the tiny east African state had cut its support for the al Qaeda-allied al Shabaab militant group in Somalia. Eritrea has asked the U.N. Security Council to lift sanctions against it after a recent U.N. experts' report showed that the tiny east African state had cut its support for the al Qaeda-allied al Shabaab militant group in Somalia.

"The events over the past year have clearly shown that it is in fact Ethiopia that is actively engaged in destabilizing Eritrea," Eritrea said, rejecting claims by the report that it remained a destabilizing influence in the region. The Red Sea state has previously rejected these allegations and has called for the replacement of the panel's members over what it calls their bias in favor of its arch-foe Ethiopia. Eritrea, which declared independence from Ethiopia in 1993 after a long war, is routinely accused by Addis Ababa of supporting Ethiopian separatists. Eritrea says the accusations are false and aim to tarnish its reputation. Ethiopia and Eritrea had another war from 1998 to 2000. The two countries' border disputes have yet to be resolved. Asmara has blamed Ethiopia for the sanctions drive against it and the rivals have frequently clashed as they seek to influence events in Somalia, where Ethiopian troops are among African forces fighting al Shabaab.

"The (U.N.) group's report is an attempt to not only to create a wedge among friendly nations but also to unjustly penalize Eritrea by falsely linking it with several armed groups," Eritrea wrote. Al Shabaab has controlled much of southern Somalia since 2007, imposing a strict version of Islamic law in areas under its control. But over the last year it has been forced out of the Somali capital Mogadishu and other parts of the south by the coordinated military operations of U.N.-backed African troops. Last year, the monitoring group alleged Eritrea was behind a failed plot to bomb an African Union summit in Ethiopia, had bankrolled known members of al Shabaab in Kenya and had been involved in the smuggling of weapons through Sudan and Egypt. As a result, the council prolonged the arms embargo and assets freeze on Eritrea, in addition to a travel ban on some officials, amid an escalation in operations against al Shabaab by African Union, Kenyan and Ethiopian troops and their Somali allies. Matthew Bryden, the monitoring group's coordinator, told Reuters in July that Eritrea was lobbying its allies at the Security Council to push for a removal of the arms embargo, but he said other Council members were reluctant to do this. But in the letter released , Eritrea also slammed the report - which probes violations of arms embargoes on Eritrea and Somalia - for "falsely accusing the government of Eritrea for violations that are not substantiated with solid evidence." The Security Council imposed an embargo on Eritrea in 2009 over concerns its government was funding and arming al Shabaab - charges Asmara denied. The U.N. experts' report released in July said that support has evaporated. Eritrea responded in the letter to the 15-member council, dated Sept. 27, saying sanctions should be removed as "the initial and principal accusation concerning Eritrean support to al Shabaab has now proven to be non-existent." "The admission is acknowledged with obvious resentment and uncalled-for caveats, omissions and 'rationalizations," he said. "The (U.N.) 'monitoring group' does not have a case against Eritrea." (October 8, 2012)

Awate was a trigger happy ordinary outlaw (shifta)

A hero of Fascist Benito Mussolini!!! By Ghirmay Yeibio Oct 15, 2012

In defense of the Kunama Version of the history of Awate and defense of free speech. In the month of September, 2012 following a statement made by Mr. Kernelious Osman of the Kunama regarding Hamid Idris Awate, a lot of uproar has ensued. In the ensuing uproar many organizations and individuals like the Gulf Centre for Media Services, the Eritrean Solidarity Front, Meskerem.net, and other numerous individuals and news outlets have come up with articles condemning and demonizing Mr. Kernelious.

Some have tried to tell Mr. Kernelious and by extension the Kunama people not to cross a red line which they have put. Some of them even have gone to the extent of demanding the expulsion of his organization from the so called "umbrella organization" Eritrean National Alliance (ENA). Furthermore, ENA has taken the unprecedented and undemocratic decision of suspending the organization led by Mr. Kernelious Osman, because he exercised his God given right of freedom of expression.

These organizations and media outlets, in their attempt to create "an Awate which is beyond reproach and criticism", they deliberately have alienated the Kunamas of Eritrea and simply told them that the pain and suffering imparted on them in the hands of Awate and his outlaw (shifta) group is not worth mentioning.

They are simply telling these indigenous Eritrean people that they and their painful history do not matter. The Kunamas which have been the victim of an aggressive persecution by the Asmara regime through its ethnic cleansing policy have been conveniently forgotten by the mainstream Eritrean opposition groups.

The persecution and suffering of this Ethnic group and the stories and sufferings of the tens of thousands of Kunama refugees have not been reported by any of the so called "Eritrean human right organizations" who have flourished these days in every conceivable corner of the globe where the Eritrean Diaspora lives. These Human right organizations that go by fancy names like "concern", "organization", "Gezana" etc. would rather deafen us day in and day out with their copy and paste reports about the G-15, and the burial rights of one of the most notorious Gestapo of Eritrea Naizghi Kiflu. None of them came forward to defend Kernelious' right to hold opinions without interference and freedom of speech.

Again for these Eritrean Opposition and so called Human right organizations, the sufferings of the Kunama people is not worth reporting and sadly enough the Kunamas are “subhuman species” who do not deserve a mention. No wonder then that the Kunamas and other minority people feel alienated not only by the Asmara regime but also by the main stream Eritrean opposition groups and human right organizations. No wonder that they have incorporated in their programs “the right for self determination up to and including secession”.

The Universal Declaration of Human Rights Article 19 clearly states that, Everyone has the right to freedom of opinion and expression; this right includes freedom to hold opinions without interference and to seek, receive and impart information and ideas through any media and regardless of frontiers.

The International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights Article 19 also states that, “Everyone shall have the right to hold opinions without interference. Everyone shall have the right to freedom of expression; this right shall include freedom to seek, receive and impart information and ideas of all kinds, regardless of frontiers, either orally, in writing or in print, in the form of art, or through any other media of his choice.”

“To restrict anyone from expressing his views freely about any historical event directly contradicts the above human right declarations and other similar regional and global laws pertaining to civil liberties. Freedom of speech and the freedom to express one’s beliefs are essential to human dignity and liberty and as such Kernelious Osman and the Kunamas have the right to express their version of the history of Awate without anyone censoring, or curtailing them.”

Who was Hamid Idris Awate?

What was his history? What was his motivation if any when he led a band of his outlaws (shifta) to shoot the first bullet against an Ethiopian police post?

Hamid Idris Awate was born in 1910 in Gerset village located between Omhajer and Tessenei in Gash Setit region of South Western Eritrea, from a Nara father and Beni Amer mother. In 1935, he was conscripted by the Italians to serve in the colonial army of the Eritrean Ascaris. The Italians, impressed by Awate’s military performance and loyalty sent him to the Italian African Police training school in Tivoli about 30 km north-east of Rome, for a course in Military Intelligence. The Italian African Police force (Polizia dell’Africa Italiana or PAI) was a racially mixed organization, made up of Italian agents and native Ascaris. It was located in police headquarters of major cities like Tripoli, Benghazi, Asmara, Addis Ababa, Mogadishu, Gondar, or in small commissariats elsewhere.

During the fascist era of Benito Mussolini (1922–1943), the Italian African Police (Polizia dell’Africa Italiana or PAI) along with the Carabinieri were one of the police forces entrusted with suppressing opposition in Italian East Africa (Africa Orientale Italiana, or AOI), mainly in Eritrea, Somalia and Ethiopia. The other role of Italian African Police (Polizia dell'Africa Italiana) along with the Carabinieri was to set up machine gun posts to control the rear of attacking regiments and prevent desertion. In the mid to late 1930s, the Italian African Police and the Carabinieri were responsible for the atrocities committed in Eritrea and Ethiopia during the Second Italo-Abyssinian War. Recruitment to the Italian African Police was contingent on the degree of loyalty one shows and the ability to carry on instructions without question. Hamid Idris Awate was a proud and loyal member of the Italian African Police and Carabinieri who committed untold crimes on native Africans (Sudanese, Ethiopians and Eritreans) who were resisting the occupation of their land by Italy. For his loyal service to the Italian occupation force he was first appointed as security officer in western Eritrea and later as deputy chief administrator of the city of Kassala, Sudan and its surroundings during the brief Italian occupation of that city in early 1940s. As administrator of Kassala he relentlessly worked to the political union of Kassala to Eritrea until the British attack of January 1941 put an end to his dreams. He further has fought gallantly with his Italian benefactors as a brave soldier in the battle of Keren. As a loyal fascist soldier, the defeat of Italy by allied forces in East Africa disappointed Awate bitterly. After the British army liberated Eritrea from the Italians in 1941 he continued to wage guerilla warfare against the British for over a year, with the cavalrymen of Amedeo Guillet.

Amedeo Guillet (February 7, 1909 – June 16, 2010) also known as the devil commander was an officer of the Italian Army who commanded a band of cavalrymen “Gruppo Bande a Cavallo” during the Italian guerrilla war in Ethiopia in 1941–42. Guillet commanded approximately 2,500 locally recruited cavalrymen who were recruited from all over Ethiopia and Eritrea with Yemeni infantry men. They also consisted of some camel corps from Libya and were led with six European officers and Eritrean NCOs all hand-picked by Amedeo himself.

One of these handpicked Non Commissioned Officers (NCOs) was Hamid Idris Awate who was in charge of 100 Ascari cavalrymen with another Eritrean officer of the Ascari named Ali Gabre. Guillet tried to delay the advance of the British Army when they crossed the Eritrean frontier in 1941. He fought the British army at Cherù on the road to Amba Alagie and Agordat and his delaying actions enabled the Italian army to regroup at Keren.

His actions saved the lives of thousands of Italians and Eritreans who withdrew from Amba Alagie. After nearly two months the British broke through the defenses of the Italians and Asmara was captured.

While most of the Italian army surrendered, Guillet refused to do so and began a private war against the British. He continued to wage a guerrilla campaign, ambushing British convoys and disrupting supply lines. For almost a year Guillet launched guerrilla actions against British troops, plundering convoys and attacking isolated military posts, with his beautiful gun-toting Ethiopian Muslim mistress Kedija by his side. She was the daughter of a chieftain from Simien in Gondar. In 1942 realizing the futility of his actions, Guillet managed to escape across the Red Sea to Yemen.

During this adventure one of the loyal subjects of Guillet was Hamid Idris Awate who was fighting for the return of the Duce's African Empire. It was this guerilla experience which the ELF wanted to exploit when asking Awate to start the Eritrean insurrection in 1961. After the departure of Guillet in 1942, Hamid Idris Awate based himself in the western lowlands of Eritrea in the vicinity of his tribal land with his army of approximately 50 men, and continued to fight the British, awaiting for the return of his commander Amedeo Guillet with help and reinforcement from Rome. He continued his fight against the British until 1945. After he realized that the empire of Fascist Italy was gone for good he continued his outlaw (shifta) life, this time targeting innocent Eritrean civilians.

He conducted raids into Kunama villages and plundered cattle which he sold in the markets of Kassala, Sudan. He set ablaze countless Kunama villages and looted them and engaged in indiscriminate killing of Kunama women and children including infants. Awate's notoriety as a shifta and crimes against civilians was such that the then British Military Administration set a price of £300 for information leading to "the arrest or capture of Awate dead or alive". He was a notorious outlaw (shifta) alongside other outlaws of the time like Weldegebriel Mosazghi of Berakit Abay and Berhe Mosazghi of Berakit Abay, Hagos Temnewo of Debri Adi Tsadek and Asresehenge Embaye of Areza, who were targeting defenseless highlanders of Akeleguzay, Seraye and Hamasien and killed countless Jebertis, Sahos and Kunama of South western lowlands of Eritrea.

A 1949 British Military Administration document enumerates 51 such outlaws (shiftas) with a bounty on their heads with Awate at the top of the list and with the highest bounty of £300. He was later pardoned by the British Administration in Eritrea in 1950 and given complete amnesty for his past crimes and allowed to return to his hometown. He was also allowed to retain his gun for personal protection. The restless and trigger happy Awate was living in his native village when the ELF approached him to start the armed struggle. He still had some of his band of outlaws with him. He was 50 years old at the time.

Awate accepted the request by the ELF and in September of 1961, fired the first shot declaring the start of the armed struggle and was back in business again. He led the ELF armed wing for only about 20 months and died on May 28, 1962 presumably from food poisoning. Thus the so called "Eritrean war of independence" was launched by a criminal outlaw (shifta) and is still run by another outlaw (shifta) Isayas.

Hamid Idris Awate was a simple outlaw (shifta). An ordinary soldier entrusted with accomplishing a political goal charted out for him by ELF leadership in the Sudan. He never interfered nor tried to influence the political decision of the front, nor did he have the analyzing capacity of what he was doing. He was politically ignorant and was glad to do what he was trained to do his whole life and which he knew best how to do i.e. killing and causing mayhem.

He was a trigger happy fascist loyalist who worked against the interests of the Eritrean people in particular and colonized Africans in General, who continued to fight the British forces, alongside Amedeo Guillet, to bring back fascist Italian rule to Eritrea even after Mussolini's army had surrendered in East Africa to the allied forces.

He was a fascist loyalist who conducted a guerrilla war for 5 whole years for "a king, country and a people whom he never saw or knew". He was loyal Carabinieri who diligently worked to keep Eritreans under the yoke of Italian colonialism. As a right hand man of the Italian administration he approved and enforced the racist and oppressive policy of Italy which confiscated around half of the land of Eritrea under the principles of state land "Terreno Demaniale", particularly around western lowlands of Eritrea during his tenure as administrator. He wanted to reinstate the Italian Fascist rule that dehumanized Eritreans using apartheid and segregation and continued to fight to bring back that system to East Africa for five whole years, until the end of the Second World War.

What makes Awate different from the tens of thousands of Eritrean, Ethiopian, and Somali Ascaris who fought alongside Italy is the fact that he conducted a guerilla war to reinstate the fascist rule on Eritrea even after the demise of Duce Mussolini's empire and even after all the Italian soldiers and Ascaris have surrendered.

He was more dedicated to fascism than the fascists themselves. He did not even have the slightest concept of freedom let alone be a freedom fighter or a resistance fighter. The only resistance he showed was to resuscitate the dead empire of Benito Mussolini in East Africa.

Therefore, Awate does not deserve to be given the honorable title of a freedom fighter. Trying to glamorize and give Awate a face lift and give him a name which he does not deserve is not only gross mis-representation, but also an insult to his victims.

He was a gun, available for hire to the highest bidder, a "Billy the kid" of Eritrea, who availed his services first to Benito Mussolini in 1935, next to Amedeo Guillet in 1941 out of love and loyalty to fascist Italy and later in 1961 to Idris Mohammed Adem and the ELF leadership in the Sudan, out of familial and ethnic loyalty.

When there was no one to hire him, he turned to cattle raiding and rustling for monetary gains, burning down whole villages indiscriminately, killing and massacring innocent civilians including infants, children and women. His primary victims were the Kunamas. Killing was just a profession for him. That in short is who Hamid Idris Awate was, no more and no less.

The tragic irony is that even though Awate had no noble intention when he fired the first shot, he is credited with starting the armed insurrection against the so called "Ethiopian colonizers" because of a historical accident.

An interesting and weird twist to the story of Amedeo Guillet is that he visited Eritrea in 2000 upon the express invitation of Isayas Afeworki. Isayas must have taken a few pointers from Italian rule about how to subjugate the Eritrean people. Like father like son, both Isayas and Awate were worshippers of Fascists of Douche Mussolini. The love of Isayas for Guillet came to light during his visit to Italy in 1999.

During his visit to Rome Isayas was asked whether there was any single Italian he would care to meet. Amedeo Guillet, he replied promptly. The then 90 yrs old Guillet was immediately summoned by Italian officials to meet the Eritrean head of state and was extended an invitation to visit Eritrea by Isayas, which Guillet did in 2000. (Text ends)

Mandatory training: Training in weapons is mandatory in Eritrea'

It is given every weekend by soldiers from Sawa military camp in the west, or Wi'a the barrack located near the Red Sea. "After being summoned, my father, who lost his job as a civil engineer ten years ago when the government closed private construction companies, initially refused to carry a weapon," said Filmon. Officials have threatened to deprive him of rationing that allows him to buy food in the state stores (Dikuan Hidri), where prices are subsidized. " Arbitrary detention or refusal to provide administration services are common in Eritrea. Michael's parents, who live in Mai-Temenai in Asmara, are extremely concerned. "My father is a veteran of the Popular Front for the Liberation of Eritrea (separatist guerrillas who won Eritrea's independence from Ethiopia), says he. He knows how to use a gun but not my mother. And yet, she is forced to hold it. " Neither recipients of Kalashnikov nor their families understand the government's intentions, while shortages basic goods and inflation weigh heavily on the lives of Eritreans. "I do not know what they want to do, laments Berhane, whose elderly parents stayed in Asmara in June 2012 received their arsenal from a local leader of the ruling party. But it is extremely dangerous and terribly perverse. "

Strategy atomization launched shortly after the violent incursions in March 2012 by commandos from Ethiopian Afar region in and around the village of Badme, the campaign of arming of the population continues today. Since the clashes, during which many prisoners were taken by the Ethiopians, the tension is high at border areas. The death of Meles Zenawi, the Prime Minister of Ethiopia, came to revive the atmosphere of fear in the small isolated country where there are shortages of everything and prisons are full. "Last Thursday (October 18), employees of the Ministry of Health were gathered at Expo center in Asmara for AK47 distribution, says the head of Asmara. The next day it was the turn of the employees of the Department Education..." For the Swiss anthropologist David Bozzini , Eritrea specialist attached to the Centre of African Studies, Leiden (Netherlands), the Government is committed to a "strategy of atomization of society." "The distribution of arms to civilians is not new in Eritrea, says he. During the years of guerrilla warfare, clandestine cells in the country were equipped with Kalashnikovs. What is new is the arming of the population in cities, primarily Asmara and Keren." To him, President Issaias Affewerki and his clan tend to focus on "building a climate of emergency and power," while, in the wake of the Arab revolutions, the Eritrean youth began to organize outside the country to destabilize the government through campaigns agitprop. This would be a way for the regime, strangled financially and politically by international sanctions by the UN because of Eritrean support for Somali Al-Shabaab, "creating artificial tension in the population," to better hold in respect. It is true Issaias Afeworki lost with the fall of Hosni Mubarak and Muammar Quadhafi, two valuable allies who provided him with such strong political support in the international arena and gasoline, whose lack is sorely felt Eritrea. "This systematic approach to social atomization is simply a mode of governance of Issaias Affe-worki and his government," says David Bozzini.

Civil patrols Besides the fact that the Eritrean government is convinced that Ethiopia is ready at any moment to launch a military to attack, creating a paranoia state, maintain the suspicions and fears of the neighbor is tactic to deter those who might be tempted to organize to overthrow the regime by force. The latest information from Asmara also indicate a new step was taken in this mysterious weapons program population. Now, people would be forced to patrol their neighborhoods, Kalashnikov slung, according to several witnesses and photographs distributed on the Internet by the youth movement of Eritrean Youth Solidarity for Change (EYSC). On Eri-TV, President Issaias Affeworki is shown at work, during a tour in the agricultural region of Mendeffera in the south. Thin but smiling, and he silenced the rumors that regularly give to dying in a hospital in Qatar where he is treated in the utmost secrecy his diseased liver.

Science in the developing world: Eritrea's shattered science'

Revelation: An impoverished African nation was making promising strides in medicine — before the government clamped down on its foreign partnerships. (October 31, 2012)

Eritrea severed a scientific lifeline almost as old as the African nation itself'

Opinion: The Eritrean National Health Laboratory in Asmara cut long-standing ties with Washington University School of Medicine in St Louis, Missouri, potentially setting back many gains that the country had made in public health. "St Louis supplied everything: American doctors, expertise, chemicals, materials," says Assefaw Ghebrekidan, an Eritrean ex-freedom fighter who now heads the public-health program at Touro University in Mare Island, California. "And now its all over." Eritrea, an impoverished country of 3 million people on the Horn of Africa (see 'A troubled corner'), is not known for its science. It ranks 177th out of 187 countries on the United Nations Human Development Index. It comes in last in terms of press freedom and is the eighth most militarized country in the world. The World Health Organization estimated that there were just 5 medical doctors per 100,000 people in the country in 2004. But against this depressing backdrop, the country's medical-research partnerships have been a source of promise and pride. Eritrea built its first medical school in 2003, aided by scientists from the Central University of Las Villas in Santa Clara, Cuba. After US universities helped to establish postgraduate training and research programs in pediatrics, surgery, and obstetrics and gynecology at the institution, Eritrean medical scientists published their first papers in international, peer-reviewed journals. Public health has benefitted. In 1991, Eritrea was cursed with the highest maternal mortality rate in the world — 14 deaths per 1,000 births. In 2010, it was on track to meet the Millennium Development Goal of cutting that rate by 75% by 2015.

But progress in Eritrean science has now gone into reverse, say a number of scientists and doctors in exile. In response to mounting criticism from the United Nations and the United States over the country's human-rights record, Eritrean President Issaias Affeworki is severing partnerships with all US universities, says Gueebrekidan. "Everything that Eritrea has worked so hard to achieve is at stake." Jon Abbink, an anthropologist at the Free University of Amsterdam, says that these actions will have widespread negative effects, "in the education system, in the constant 'brain drain' of educated people to greener and freer pastures, and in the inhibition of international scientific cooperation". Eritrea, he says, is one of the few remaining countries in Africa that have failed to embrace scientific freedom. "Its out of sync with global trends," says Abbink. Eritrea was once a colony of Italy, but the United Nations handed it over to Ethiopia after the Second World War. In 1961, Eritrea started to fight for its independence in a war that would last three decades: the United States supplied Ethiopia with guns and money, but the rebels, led by Affeworki and the Eritrean People's Liberation Front (EPLF), persevered.

The liberation movement had remarkable credentials. "It was led by 29 doctors of medicine," says Ghebrekidan, who was head of the EPLF's medical services. "No other rebel movement has ever had so many intellectuals." Even Affworki had abandoned a degree in engineering to lead the fight. Another academic, Melles Seyoum, was working as a pharmacist at an Ethiopian hospital when the war broke out. He coolly stole US$140,000 worth of antibiotics, microscopes, surgical blades and stethoscopes and delivered them to Eritrean freedom fighters, wrote journalist Michela Wrong in her book I Didn't Do It For You (HarperCollins, 2005). Seyoum became an integral member of the EPLF, teaching soldiers how to test blood and prepare Petri dishes in a hospital 5 kilometers long and dug into the side of a rocky valley — a clinic known as 'the longest hospital in the world'. After a visit in 1987, a British doctor wrote about the impressive standards of care at the hospital: a 1-tonne machine manufactured antibiotics every day; a doctor performed facial reconstructions; and amputees played basketball.

Power struggle: In 1993, after the war ended and Eritrea gained independence, Affeworki was elected president by a national assembly largely composed of former members of his rebel army. He promised that within four years, Eritrea would have parliamentary and presidential elections, press laws and a new constitution. Seyoum enthusiastically backed Affeworki and was, in return, appointed director of the prestigious National Health Laboratory, which performed most of the country's clinical testing and worked on developing treatments for disease. But following a failed assassination attempt in 1996, the president postponed elections indefinitely and refused to implement the constitution that had been drafted. In 1998, he invaded Ethiopia, triggering a humiliating two-year war that caused the deaths of more than 60,000 Eritreans and a temporary loss of one-quarter of Eritrean territory. Affeworki's popularity plummeted, and many of the academics who had helped to rebuild the country moved abroad.

The Eritrean revolution: A circular Or A Linear Journey?

I was in 1952, on the same year that Eritrea was federated with Ethiopia; I am as old as federal arrangement that Haile Sellassie unilaterally dismantled 12 years later. During my sixty years of life I have experienced many things and Eritrea has also grown up with me and affected me all my life. Born and raised in Agordat, I enjoyed a simple and peaceful life. The vivid memories that I miss is the enjoyable scenery of the Barka river, particularly during the rainy season. We adored nature and we used to go to 'Welet aberg' with my friends to swim and chase rabbits. We enjoyed life to the most.

It so happened that I was born into a Muslim family and Islam defines part of my identity. I went to a Koranic school, a khalwa, when a "madrassa" was not mistaken for "terrorism." Arabic was the first letters that I learned followed by Koran. Still, when I went to elementary school, I studied all subjects in Arabic up to the 4th grade. That is because Arabic existed in the region long before Eritrea and Ethiopia were created as entities in modern times–nothing alien. Thus, I do not need any Tigrinya intellectual (who relates Arabic to religion only and who denies the historical roots to Arabia) to lecture me on what language I should use. I decide for myself; and I do not impose on others what language they should choose. The attachment of Eritreans to Arabic is not the creation of the Awate Team, it is the desire of the overwhelming majority of Eritrean Muslims. Period.

I was born to a Tigrawat family and I am very proud of my mother language (a rich poetic language that I consider even much richer than Tigrinya) and the Geez scripts; I do not consider myself an Arab, but Arabic defines part of my identity.

When I was ten years old, my childhood was brutally injured, it was taken away from me. Since then, neither me nor my Eritrea that was growing up with me, have known peace or tranquility. When I was a child I did not know that Idris Mohamed Adem, the federal era chairman of the Eritrean parliament and whose house was close to the police station in Agordat, went to exile along with Ibrahim Sultan and Woldeab Woldemariam. But more and more strange soldiers, Tor Serawit, who did not speak our language came to our town. Bars that entertain them flourished. New Amharic teachers appeared on the scene. The calm town was disturbed by the ever increasing number of military vehicles. The Ethiopian soldiers camped close to the only football field in town. In the early years, we used to go the field and during recess, we were freely drinking water from the tap, but gradually, that stopped. They took over the field and they moved the football field to another place. At the same time, before fully annexing Eritrea, Ethiopia waged a concerted campaign to win Eritreans, and the government distributed pamphlets showing the schools, mosques and churches that Haile Sellasie built.

On the 12th of July, 1962 when the representative of the King and several dignitaries were on a visit to my home town; ELF Fedayeen threw grenades at the gathering. It was the first daring military operation of its kind. Several people died, many were injured and many others were imprisoned; since then, I never enjoyed peace as the town was quickly militarized. The Tor Serawit dragging to town dead bodies of civilians they killed. They hanged the dead bodies in town squares to scare people from joining the revolution! This were the brutal acts and savagery of "mother Ethiopia" (imagine a "mother" doing that to her children) helped the ranks of the revolution to swell. Even the Eritrean Komandos who were more brutal in other towns such as Keren, joined the revolution when they knew their constituency was in it. Saleh Gadi's novel tells it all.

In 1967 the Ethiopian government pursued a scorched earth policy which I experienced closely. People were arrested and killed in groups, many from Agordat disappeared and many left the town. Villages like Ad Ibrahim were burned to the ground and the first mass refugees entered the Sudan. Herds of animals were bombarded from the air, and wells were poisoned.

Recently I asked Abdul Aziz, a close friend who lives in Canada, "Would we have been happier today: if we did not leave Agordat, if we did not know much about this world, if we did not migrate to the West, if we simply looked after our farm animals and enjoyed our simple life?" He emphatically replied, YES. I can not agree more. Even natural development would have been very much welcome. But why am I taking you through my 50 year personal journey?

I have to say this: I was outraged when I read Part I of Yosief Ghebrehiwet's article where he claims that the Eritrean revolution has never been about ideals, freedom and emancipation. For someone like me who grew up in Agordat, and who bore the brunt since the annexation, the armed struggle was a revolution against injustice, against the imposing of the Amhara language and culture on the whole of Eritrea–as was done on the whole of Ethiopia earlier. It was a revolution against injutice, similar to Tigrai's Weyane uprising in 1940s and the TPLF revolution in the mid 70s. It was similar to the Mahdi rebellion in Sudan and similar to others uprising against injustice in various forms. The Eritrean revolution can never be regarded as "50 years of madness", "about creating a new belonging alien to themselves" nor as Habesha and non-habesha issue, as portrayed by Yosief who claims, "their fallacious understanding was: if it was part of Ethiopia, then there was no "Eritrea" to be had; they wanted an "Eritrea" that they, and only they, could own." The term Habesha, whether he chose it purposely or not, is an improper choice as it excludes chunks of Eritreans.

There are three linguistic groups in Eritrea: Semetic (Tigre and Tigrinya), Kushetic (Affer, Saho, Bilen, Hidareb) and Nilotic (Kunama and Nara). The oldest groups in Eritrea are the Kushetic such as the Affer on whose region was found the fossils of the first human settlers. All those linguistic groups have their extensions in neighboring countries including Ethiopia, where taken together, the Kushetic groups are the majority in both countries.

Hamid Idris Awate who fired the first shots at mount Adal in 1961 against the Ethiopian government to fight injustice cannot be but a great hero, irrespective of how some want to denigrate him. He was simply a historical necessity; he could have been any one. And that is why the first bullets he fired spread like fire not only in Eritrea but also in Ethiopia where it gradually contributed to end the feudal mono-cultural rule of the Amhara elite in Ethiopia (though the Amhara commoners were oppressed) and paved the way for the modern multi-ethnic, multi-religious, multi-cultural Ethiopia. However, Hamid Awate was human and his actions is not above assessment; and it is rather the freedom of expression that has to be sacred. But no amount of vilification can tarnish the image of Awate. As far as there is injustice, there will always be a revolt as a reaction whether Eritrea is independent Eritrea or not. There can never be peace without justice.

Yosief's plea to go back to the starting point is not something new, it was actually tried and failed. The late PM of Ethiopia Meles Zenawi, articulated why Eritreans revolted against the rule of Haile Sellasie and Ustaz Mahmoud has summarized Meles's statements in English. When the majority of Christian Highlanders came to realize that the panacea that was promised actually deprived them of their own language and culture, they gradually started to join the revolution. It was not long before those whose slogan was 'Ethiopia or Death', tasted both and so joined the revolution. It did not take long for Tella Ogbit and Tella Bairu to rebel against the Ethiopian rule which they fought hard to enforce on Eritrea. For the record, the majority of Muslims, did not opt to be part of Sudan. They stood fast for independence with the minority of methods of strangulating youth in Asmara with wires drove many youth to the revolution. EPLF's 'Nehnan Elamnan' became more appealing to many Christian Highlanders. It is a pity that many of our human rights organizations are very keen to document crimes committed during the struggle era but seem uninterested in documenting the crimes committed by Ethiopian occupation that we have almost forgotten.

Christians. Things became worse in the highlands when Mengistu took power. The brutal

I admire Yosief's courage for expressing his non-conforming views which provoke us and shake our views; everyone should express their views without any intimidation. Even if there are some who would advocate unity with Ethiopia, it is within their own right, but they should not do it by undermining our revolution–they can simply air their views without provoking others. One cannot dismiss Yosief's article as 'Andnet', etc. I think he makes good points regarding 'the switching case, which reflects the strong sense of attachment that both members of ELF and EPLF have to their respective organizations and the geographical factors that determined who joined which organization and the fact that most of us are born in the religion we have strong attachment to. Yes, some of us have attachment to the ELF, others to the EPLF, but all of us have attachment to our locality or ethnic group and our religion, but our main political attachment is to the unfinished project we call Eritrea–a free and democratic country that is at peace with itself and with its neighbors.

Following Yosief's circular journey, I ask: is the Agordat and the Eritrea I knew 60 years ago going to go back to the starting point? Am I or my town and my surrounding and my country better or worse than it was 60 years ago? It is definitely much worse. For example, my town Agordat has changed forever. The demography has changed, most of the old inhabitants still live as refugees in neighboring Sudan. Thanks to the social engineering by the EPLF/PFDJ the new rulers, the haves (not all of them) are Eritreans but they are not from the locality, they come from the Highlands. Most of the have-nots are some of the original inhabitants that have not migrated. The original inhabitants feel like they are alien in their own land. What does a revolution mean to me if I feel I have lost everything: my language, my identity, my land?

A humorous friend from Stockholm once reflected: "Mohamed every revolution is meant to make situations better, this is a strange revolution– we have almost lost everything". A joke from Haikota goes as follows: a local pastoralist saw the statue of a man and asked whom it represented. His friend replied, "Don't you know him, this is Awate". The pastoralist replied, "God gracious, this is the man who started a revolution and brought us all those Habesh to take our land, we would have been much better without him." To a common person in the lowlands, the term Habesh (be it with Big or small H) represents Christian highlanders. Of course, every Eritrean has the right to live wherever he chooses in Eritrea, but that has to be a natural process, not be promoted or engineered selectively and systematically by the government. There are also some regions in the highlands that feel discriminated against. One can argue that, since Eritreans have sacrificed themselves in all parts of Eritrea, then they have the right to live anywhere. A colleague who is a veteran of the EPLF to went to Eritrea to see development 'm'ebaletat' recalls that a camel came to graze in a camouflaged shade used by the fighters. An angry Highlander shouted at the owner telling him to take the camel to hell. The pastoralist murmured, "You came to the camel, it did not come to you."

Since 2001, the injustice of the current regime has gradually reached the highlands. Though the regime clandestinely preaches that the Tigrinya have never achieved so much as they did under Isaias and that if he goes it will be the Muslims (as if they are from Mars) who will rule, and though there has not been so much social engineering there, but the reality is that many of the victims of human trafficking and organ theft are young Christian Highlanders. This shows that things has never been this bad there compared to 50 years ago. This is the reality today.

When the EPLF allied with the TPLF and drove the ELF out of the Eritrean field, the ELF (which by the mid-70s was a full-fledged national organization composed of Muslims and Christians) disintegrated into various factions. Far reaching consequences that were not foreseen either by the EPLF and TPLF ensued. As the result of the exclusionist policies of the EPLF, religious and ethnic organizations were formed. Due to that, the Lowlanders still harbor deep suspicions about the TPLF. The late PM of Ethiopia has explained to the participants of the Intellectual seminar in Addis in 2011 that the measure was not a Tigrinya coalition against the ELF, but it was a necessary measure for the existence of the TPLF as the ELF threatened the existence of TPLF by forming an alliance with EDU and EPRP, but he regretted the use of force. Aregawi Berhe in his PhD thesis clarifies the reasons behind this attack and the former ELF-RC's version of what followed after that is described here.

According to Yosief, we are in a circular journey because we have abandoned our indigenous culture (not very clear if he means Ethiopian culture) and adopted an alien culture (Arabic and the Ghedli's culture). I believe our indigenous culture as well as the Ghedli culture have good and bad aspects, we have to adopt the best from those cultures. Things have changed so much that there is no original starting point, even Ethiopia has changed. I wish our problems were that simple. I think our biggest problem has always been (and remains) on how we accept and manage our diversity. Many African countries have failed to mange their diversity and are in deep trouble, Sudan is a vivid example. Some other African countries that have achieved independence through armed struggle have also failed to return to democratic civilian rule without the need to go to the starting point. Though homogenous, Somalia could have avoided failure if it had accepted, recognized and managed its tribal and regional diversity. If we fail to manage our diversity, we will continue to have problems and the existence of Eritrea as an entity will be at stake.

I believe we have come a long way in addressing our problems, we have narrowed the gap, we have agreed on basic principles on how to rule the future democratic Eritrea. The ENCDC is a big step in the right direction.
The youth movement is another optimistic sign as the youth, though they are not totally free, they carry less old baggage of our ethnic, regional and religious divisions. The mainstream Tigrinya speakers do not support the views of the circular journey. The journey for an independent, free and democratic Eritrea can not be reversed. When the current project is completed, it is up to the Eritrean people to decide whether to live as a separate state or form a confederation– perhaps in a bigger perspective, with both Ethiopia and Sudan.
Dr. Mohammed Kheir (November 9, 2012)

Eritrea Requests Turkish Mediation With Rival Ethiopia'

At the request of Eritrea, the Turkish Foreign Minister, Ahmed Ogle, is expected to arrive in Asmara soon to help reconcile the Eritrean regime with the Somali government. The minister will be flying in from one of the regional countries after Ethiopia denied him permission to fly directly to Asmara through the airspace of its territories. Turkey has been aggressively improving its ties with countries of the Horn of Africa and it has around $1.5 billion worth of investment in Ethiopia, its largest investment in the region.

In Somalia, Turkey has considerable activity and, currently, over one thousand Turkish workers and business persons are involved in many projects, mainly in construction. Turkish Airlines, recently assuming the highest rank in the world for number of countries it has for destination, flies to all capitals of the Horn of Africa countries except to Eritrea.

In his visit to Mogadishu on Wednesday, the Turkish Foreign Minister had talks with Somalia president Hassan Sheikh Mohamud, and also met Somali lawmakers at the parliament house where he announced that his country will rebuild the Somali parliament house. Last month, South Sudan foreign minister announced that his country will mediate between Eritrea and Ethiopia to end the two countries conflict that began over 12 years ago. Neither Eritrea or Ethiopia confirmed the news.

Gedab News has learned that South Sudan's mediation proposal to the two countries was not rejected outright for "diplomatic niceties", but the Eritrean government doesn't believe South Sudan has any leverage or clout to make such an undertaking successful. Downplaying the South Sudan initiative, the Eritrean government has sought Turkish intervention to first help it establish ties with the new Somali government. The Eritrean government is suffering from the UN sanctions imposed on it for supporting the Al- Shabab armed group and destabilizing the Somali government as well as for refusing to acknowledge its border conflict with Djibouti which it subsequently, secretly, invited Qatar to mediate. Gedab News (November 15, 2012)

Eritrean Symbols Of Many Colors’

Opinion: A Lion dons a crown and holds a banner; on top of both the crown and the banner's mast is a cross. It was the emblem of "moAa ambesa ze-amnegede yehuda, grmawi qedamawi atzie haile sellasie, ngusse negest ze-itioPia (The Lion of Judah, The Graceful King of Kings Haile Sellasie the First, Emperor of Ethiopia). That emblem was yet positioned in the middle stripe of the tri-color Ethiopian flag: green on the top, red on the bottom, and yellow in between. To many Ethiopians and Eritreans, that symbol represented injustice, oppression, backwardness and terror, while a few others considered it their primordial symbol and they pledged full allegiance to it in what seems to be a yearning to be decolonized from the Italian fascist rule, or an expression of the cultural and ethnic relations with the people across the Mereb River. Also, many Eritreans of the time could trace their ancestral origins in Ethiopia and naturally they share the common heritage of the Axumite civilization. Many Italian subjects of Eritrea had sided with Ethiopia against the Italian colonizer and fought gallantly under the Ethiopian flag, mainly in the battle of Adwa but also in many other less significant battles.

After Fascist Italy was defeated by the Allies in WWII, the former Italian colony of Eritrea was taken over by the British military administration which introduced democratic institutions and liberal ideas. Eritreans started to express themselves freely, they found an opportunity to forge their unity and they built a stronger sense of nationalism that aroused the need for self-determination. But as Eritreans were seriously looking forward to chart their destiny, the United Nations reached a deadlock trying to decide how to "dispose off" former Italian colonies: Libya, Somalia and Eritrea..

The forties ushered Eritrea into a phase of intense political debate and struggle; the overwhelming majority started to mobilize by initiating grassroots movement, building bridges across the nation's social segments to forge alliances between different social forces. Newspapers flourished, political awareness grew by leaps and modern Eritrean nationalism was born. Eritrea witnessed a vibrant political environment like no other time before and the burning nationalism of the time needed a symbol behind which all citizens would rally.

In the struggle to assert a strong national identity, pro-independence groups developed fast and the new political environment created sophisticated political leaders. Ibrahim Sultan led a class struggle to emancipate the Tigre serfs from the yoke of the Shmaglle by establishing AlRabita AlIslamia. A large portion of Eritrea, mainly the social forces that suffered from historical class oppression, rallied behind him; and he found formidable allies, mainly Abdulkadir Kebire, Nasser Pasha and Omar Qadi. At the same time, the Liberal Progressive Party emerged under the leadership of Ras Tessema, his son Abraha Tessema, Seyoum Maasho and Weldeab Weldemariam. A formidable nationalist alliance emerged when AlRabita AlIslamiya and the Liberal Progressive Party united and four smaller parties joined the alliance to form the Eritrean Independence Bloc, which challenged the Unionist Party that was heavily financed and trained by Ethiopia. It is widely believed that the idea of the blue flag was conceived in that atmosphere by the Independence Bloc. Some old-timers state that the choice of the flag which resembled the UN flag was a political choice to gain the sympathy of the UN that had the final word on the future of the country.

Eritrea entered an age of intense flag waving: The Unionists waved the Ethiopian flag; the Pro-Italia party waved the Italian flag; yet a few who opted for a British mandate waved the Union Jack, and a small number of Italian war veterans waved the Italian flag. Symbols are of great psychological and morale value through which affinities and allegiance to an idea or entity are expressed. People need symbols that reflect their identity, their aspirations and values. Football teams have their own colors that adorn their gears and banners. Scouts have emblems and flags. Ras Teffarians put bandanas and headbands which carry the colors of the Ethiopian flag, which they consider Ras Tefferi's flag, and they consider him a god. Companies and organizations have logos. Political parties have slogans and banners. Countries have flags.

Before the creation of modern Eritrea, people had their own clan, tribal and religious symbols. For instance, some members of the Beni-Amer tribes have cheek marks that identify them. Some people in Denkalia sharpen their teeth into a V shape. In the highlands, some people put tattooed crosses on their forehead and wrists as a symbol of their faith. Many Christians put a black thread around their neck and display crosses on their chests as a sign of their devotion to their religion. Moslems cover their heads with turbans and Tagiyet; they carry banners (Beyreq) in religious rallies as an identification of a certain religious sect or persuasion. Since time immemorial, humanity carried some sort of a symbol or another, and it is still prevalent today. All those popular symbols are expression of belonging to an entity, a reflection of identity or an expression of a personality.

The modern Eritrean nation was created around a combination of symbols, mainly the flag. In 1952, through their elected representatives, Eritrean settled for the blue flag as their common symbol. The flag displays three olive branches on a blue background: two branches with eleven leaves each, hug a third branch which carries twelve leaves. Eritrean nationalism that was symbolized by that flag still rages on; it is the only symbol that Eritreans unanimously agreed upon as a wholly representative symbol, it was the seal that asserted the creation of Eritrea as we know it today.

Sixty years ago, regional and international powers were thinking of partitioning Eritrea so that it can blend and dissolve between Sudan and Ethiopia. Eritreans found themselves at a crossroad: either to be partitioned or unconditionally united with Ethiopia;, the wish of the majority to be free was ignored. The Unionist Party was determined to undermine the aspiration of the nationalists; it was the main hindrance and culprit that prevented the full independence of Eritrea. Finally, the big world powers and the United Nations that had to resolve the Eritrean dilemma offered three options; all of them were detrimental to the future of Eritrea:

Partition: supported by a negligible minority Unconditional unity with Ethiopia: fiercely advocated for by the Unionist Party and supported by Ethiopia, and…

Independence: fought for by the Independence Bloc including Al-Rabbita Al-Islamiya.

The majority of Eritreans rallied behind the Independence Block and saved their country from disappearing forever; the partition project was defeated and Eritrea stayed undivided, in one parcel. But neither the Unionist Party nor the Independence Block would budge from their positions. That led the Eritrean parties to reach to a compromise solution: to federate Eritrea with Ethiopia under the crown of King Haile Sellassie. It was a painful solution that Eritrean nationalists had to accept in order to save the country from being partitioned. Unfortunately, the compromise deal of federal arrangement between Eritrea and Ethiopia barely lasted for ten years.

The Eritrean flag was debated, voted for and agreed upon by all the 68 founding members of the Eritrean Council that had a mandate of six-months to prepare the first Eritrean constitution. After the lapse of the six-months mandate, a resolution was passed authorizing the founding council to become the first Eritrean Parliament for a period of four years. Fourteen of the founding council declined and some were appointed as Ministers in the Executive Authority while others took public service positions. Elections were carried out in their electoral zones for new legislators to replace them. Those who declined were: 1- Ato Mesfin Guebrehiwet 2- Sayed Yassin Hassen Naib 3- Ras Tessema Asmerom 4-Grazmatch Tekle Haimanot Bokhru 5- Gegnazmatch Hadgembes Kiflom 6-Nasser Basha Abubeker 7- Grazmatch Mohammed Saeed Ali Bek 8- Ato Weldeyohannes Guebre-Izghi 9- Inspector Embaye Guebre Amlakh 10-Ato Tedla Bairu 11- Fitewrari Haragot Abay 12- Azmatch Tesfai Berakhi
13- Ato Embaye Habte 14- Ato Tesfaledet Gered [source: Mohammed Said Naud; Al-Haqiqa Welta’rikh]

The Blue Flag (Khedra as it is passionately referred to in Tigre and awliE in Tigrinya) became the symbol of the nascent state of Eritrea. When Eritrea was federated with Ethiopia, it was already an established sovereign state with its own national flag: the Blue Flag. Previously, the unionists had rejected independence and had always yearned to be ruled by Haile Sellassie, and throughout the federal period they continued identifying themselves with the Ethiopian flag and sabotaging the federal arrangement. Soon, Emperor Haile Sellassie began to openly violate and abolish the federal arrangement: he dissolved the Eritrean parliament and outlawed the Eritrean flag which he lowered, and hoisted the Ethiopian flag in its place, practically occupying Eritrea militarily. The lowering of the flag sparked the long and arduous armed struggle by Eritreans for self-determination.

Towards the end of the fifties when the Ethiopian government started to undermine the federation, the Eritrean Liberation Movement, (Haraka, also known as Mahber shewAte) had already established a grassroots movement to struggle peacefully, it went underground when its members were imprisoned and tortured. In September 1,1961, Hamid Idris Awate started the Armed Struggle. Both the Eritrean Liberation Front and Haraka rallied around the blue Eritrean flag. In the sixties, it was very common around old strongholds of the Unionist party to see the Ethiopian flag revered. Though not required by law, the Ethiopian flag was carried in funeral procession and hoisted in venues of wedding and other public ceremonies. Bulls were wrapped in the Ethiopian flag on their way to be killed for a feast or a wedding. On the other hand, nationalist Eritreans brought the outlawed blue Eritrean flag from its hiding just to look at it and pay homage. In a very secretive ritual, every once in a while parents would show it to their children so that they do not forget and told them that the Eritrean flag was their true symbol and not the occupational flag that Haile Sellassie imposed on Eritreans by force.

The propaganda of the Unionist Party aggressively targeted the blue flag. To them, it was the “flag of the United Nations.” At the same time the Ethiopian Flag was promoted as one belonging to Janhoi, Haile Sellassie, the elect of God. While the Ethiopian flag was given a divine value, the Eritrean flag was portrayed as one belonging to the shifta and Arab sellouts who betrayed their “Mother Ethiopia” and were working hard to separate the child (Eritrea) from its mother (Ethiopia). At later stages, it was difficult for people who grew up feeding on this type of propaganda to come to terms with the fact that the blue Eritrean flag was actually decided and approved by the founding fathers, by the first ever elected body of legislators that Eritrea ever had. Furthermore, all Eritrean parties that represented the entire social and political forces of the country, including the pan-Ethiopianist Union party, participated in the negotiations and accepted the flag as a unifying symbol of Eritrea.

In September 1, 1961, the national hero Hamid Idris Awate resurrected the blue flag that the unionists tried to bury in collaboration with Haile Sellasie. He raised it high and set out on a long journey to reclaim a hoisting ground for it in all parts of Eritrea. Singers and poets sung for the blue flag that represented Eritrea and its future; the people rallied behind it and the fire of nationalism was re-kindled. It represented the dreams of all Eritrean nationalists and patriots who kept its image in their minds; it was the magnet that pulled all Eritreans together. Around 1973, the last remaining unionists were defeated once and for all; all Eritreans gave allegiance to the true Eritrean flag. United under that banner, Eritreans liberated all of Eritrea with the exception of Asmara, Massawa and Asseb.

By then, the ordeal would have been over but partisan politics prevented Eritreans from realizing their dreams and hoisting their long exiled and outlawed flag. Just a few years after all patriotic forces rallied behind their flag, a new confusion ensued. The EPLF perplexed Eritreans by coming up with a new flag which was inspired by the red revolution of the leftists of the era under the guardianship of the Soviet and Chinese Communists. In its organizational congress in 1977, the EPLF introduced a flag that was made of three triangles: blue, red and green, and a yellow star in the red triangle. The EPLF denied that it was launching a new flag, it claimed it was only introducing an organizational banner; not many believed the EPLF. But the damage inflicted on the Eritrean psyche, and unity, was very serious. Time proved that the EPLF launched what it called an organizational "banner", with the intention of erasing the blue flag.

Three years later the EPLF attacked the ELF in collaboration with the TPLF (Ethiopian) whose banner resembled that of the EPLF. The ELF was militarily defeated and pushed out of Eritrea and into the Sudan. As a result, the ELF disintegrated into several small splinter groups one of which was known as SAGEM. In the eighties, a division of SAGEM led by Ibrahim Totil, merged with the EPLF, and as a result the EPLF grudgingly reinstated the blue flag. Thereafter, until Independence Day in 1991, both the blue flag and the EPLF banner were flying side by side.

However, after the independence of Eritrea, both flags were merged to form a shabby combination: a flag with uneven triangles where the blue flag, now changed into a triangle was stitched to the bottom of the EPLF "banner." That combination flag was promoted with a slogan "Free Eritrea" and printed on T-Shirts, posters and stickers, it became the de-facto flag of the EPLF government; and it was hoisted until the referendum for the self-determination of Eritreans was carried out. It was scrapped on May 24, 1993 when the independence of Eritrea was officially declared. The PFDJ came with yet another flag; this time a yellow olive branch on a red background and three triangles of Red, Blue and Green, the colors of what was first introduced as an "organizational banner." Of course, the yellow star will not do in post-Berlin wall world; in its place the PFDJ put the leaves from the original Eritrean flag, this time they were not green as natural leaves would be, but yellow leaves that seem to be dead.

Officially, according to the PFDJ's drafted but un-implemented constitution, the present flag is transitional; it unequivocally states that the National Assembly will make the final approval of the design of the flag. However, in Article 4 of the unimplemented PFDJ constitution, in the part that deals with "National Symbols", #1 reads like a de-facto statement: "1.The Eritrean Flag shall have green, red and blue colors with golden olive leaves. The detailed description of the Flag shall be determined by law." As of now, more than two decades after independence, Eritrea doesn't have an elected Assembly; the present un-elected Assembly has not decided on the flag yet and has not met for years. Article 4 also states that "2. Eritrea shall have a National Anthem and a Coat of Arms reflecting the history and the aspirations of its people. The details of the National Anthem and the Coat of Arms shall be determined by law". The PFDJ didn't explain why the flag was detailed for approval while the composition of the National Anthem and the designing of the Coat of Arms were left for the future National Assembly to decide upon.

It is said that the present flag is a brainchild of Isaias Affworki, a production of his artistic genius that he designed while on a visit to Kuwait in the eighties; he had a well-outlined vision on how to erase the blue flag from the Eritrean collective memory, to erase the flag that ignited Eritrean nationalism. No doubt, the haphazard decision taken in regards to the important national symbol, the flag, has caused a great deal of morale and psychological damage to the Eritrean unity, a serious political polarization of Eritreans.

In October 27 of 2001, when Mesfin Hagos was a guest speaker at a London public meeting, the PFDJ's flag of 1991-1993 was displayed in the auditorium. PFDJ supporters who don't even know the history of the "Changing symbols of Eritrea" were quick to condemn him for sitting under "the flag that was designed in Mekele." Dimtsi Hafash, the official Eritrean government radio roared as usual: "The flag of traitors." The entire PFDJ operatives considered that treason. An article in the government website, Shaebia.org read: "The flag was a combination of the EPLF flag and the flag of the [Eritrean] groups that work with the Weyane."

Some Eritreans didn't have the chance to be acquainted with the blue flag properly; other Eritreans have followed the evolution of the Eritrean symbols since they were born. The PFDJ is neither qualified to chose the symbols of Eritrea nor accepted enough to lecture Eritreans on the virtues of a flag, what it imposed is a symbol of authoritarianism and disunity; it is a symbol of oppression and it should be shunned by all activists; no one should rally behind a flag that is a symbol of oppression imposed by an authoritarian ruler, a flag that is undemocratically imposed by the oppressor of the Eritrean people. But for starters, activists must stop referring to the Eritrean Flag as "the one given to us by the UN." Saleh "Gadi" Johar (November 25,2012)

About 10, 000 Eritreans kidnapped for Ransom in Egypt'

Updates: An Eritrean man who says he will be killed by an Egyptian trafficking gang in Sinai unless a $25,000 ransom is paid within days has spoken to the Today program's Mike Thomson. Mike was given a mobile number to reach 22-year-old Philemon Semere by an Eritrean pastor who knows his family and has been in direct contact with the kidnappers himself. Pastor Mulugeta Mengsteab had earlier contacted the captive Philemon and checked that he was happy to do the interview. Philemon began by telling Mike, who made it clear that he was calling from the BBC, that he had been held for four months and been treated very brutally. "I have not enough food, I have not enough water," he explained. "I've been hit by sticks and burnt by fire with electricity. Daily, burnt by fire and hit by sticks. My body is burning." Throughout the interview background noises were very audible and it seemed clear that the phone conversation was being conducted on a speaker phone. Half way through the conversation a man, who said he was in charge of those holding Philemon, butted into the conversation and confirmed that the family will have to pay $25,000 if they want to see him alive again, adding "if he don't give any money I must kill Philemon here." Over the last few years an estimated 10,000, mainly Eritrean, refugees have been kidnapped by people traffickers, largely based in Egypt's Sinai region. Most disappear on the way to seek a better life in Israel. During what is often months of captivity the captives are beaten and tortured and their families asked to pay ransoms as high as $40,000 for their release. Those who don't pay are killed. As many as 2,000 are thought to have died in this way. Since carrying out the interview with Philemon the BBC has contacted the Egyptian authorities and alerted them to his situation. We have also spoken to charities who have taken up his case including Christian Solidarity Worldwide who first drew attention to his story. The BBC have also spoken to a member of Philemone's family who have said they are willing for his case to be publicized and for the interview with him to be broadcast. It is impossible, from so far away, to verify Philemon's case. But Christian Solidarity Worldwide, and other non-governmental organizations who have studied the kidnap trade, say it bears all the hallmarks of what is now an awful but thriving business in the Sinai region. Convinced that his family does not have the money to meet the kidnapper's demands, Philemon is clearly becoming desperate as their deadline nears: "Please help. Please help me Mike. I haven't enough money, they will kill me. Please help me." BBC News

Ali Abdu Ahmed, one of Eritrea's dictator's closest collaborators, would have traveled to Eritrea on 26 November, but never showed up. Since then he has been missing' The Minister of Information of Hagere Eritrea is back to Asmara after a short trip to Europe to write an exam for his distance education in political science. Ali Abdu has been pursuing a masters degree in political science and journalism via distance education for the past few years. The controversial Eritrean information minister, who is rumored to have defected these past weeks, known to help build one of the world's strictest systems of media control.

The Eritrean Revolution' P2

The Way Forward' The Eritrean regime is crumbling fast after sowing so much mistrust among us. Instead of respecting our diversity and building on its positive aspects, it has worked hard to deepen and escalate the ethnic, regional and religious difference. The urgent question we need to address is: how we are going to manage post-regime Eritrea? Are we ready? How do we reclaim the ideals of the Eritrean revolution that was high jacked by the EPLF/PFDJ, and build a free democratic country that respects the diversity of its people and that is at peace with itself and its neighbors? Are we prepared for that and what can be done? And what happens if we fail?

Irrespective of his intentions, Yosief Ghebrehiwet's article part II, 'The circular journey in search of Eritrea: the world distance that was never was' raises important issues that we need to reflect on and address. He touches upon ethnicity, on preserving one's identity, on grievances related to religion language and democracy, on peace and security, on economy and federalism. That is the core of managing our diversity and economy.

To the best of my understanding, Yosief's main premise seems to be that we could have solved (or could have solved) all those issues better had we not separated from Ethiopia (or by becoming part of it). He sounds like a religious person telling you all that all our problems are caused because you have not followed God's teachings and that things will be fine if you go back to God. In 1988 I was in Khartoum when the Nile flooded and destroyed several Sudanese villages. It was regarded as a curse from God since they were not prepared to manage the floods. At the same time in Egypt it was regarded as a blessing from God because they have the Aswan Dam. Yosief's logic is also like a traditional healer telling you the best cure you get is only from traditional medicine.

Everyone (or every group) has the right to be proud of their identity (be it Habesha or Beja or otherwise) good for you, but do not by undermine the Eritrean revolution. I am convinced that there is no ethnic group, race or religion that is better than the other; to claim otherwise is sheer chauvinism. There are elements that are born with, such as ethnicity that we can not change, and there are elements we are born into, such as faith, and there are other factors that we acquire, such as our political affiliation which we can change. We could also be born into a particular mode of production: agrarian, pastoral or trade. We can shed any of it off, but culturally it affects how we think and how we behave. Religion has a much greater influence on us depending on whether we take it positively or negatively, though it is a matter of relations between an individual and God. Religions teaches us moral values; I believe more on humanity and humane ideals and that our good attributes are part and parcel of our fundamental human values.

There are cultural differences between the Eritrean Highlands and Lowlands, and that will be with us for centuries to come whether we are part of Ethiopia or not. Understanding the cultural aspects can help us understand each other better. For example, there is a well-funded mushrooming of churches in Barka and Gash, it is supported by the state and the Lowlanders see that as a religious invasion. Under normal circumstances, from a Highland perspective, a church is a central social and religious center. Christians pray in churches while Muslims can pray anywhere, even under trees, but a few Christian families will strive to build a church wherever they live. All members of a community in the Highlands are members of a particular church, thus Muslims, both in Eritrean and Ethiopian Highlands are regarded as immigrants simply because they are not members of those church communities. Another different cultural perception is that farmers who come to the Lowlands consider any unfenced area (pastoral land) as no man's land and so they cut the trees and claim that land as a personal property, forever. For the pastoralist it is important that they do not cut trees and leave the area to replenish until they return to it. Also, the Highland culture is very centralized and generally focuses more on keeping its own interests, while the lowland culture is generally more diffused and focuses on being just to others first. This perhaps partly explains why in 1974 the people of Asmara came out in attempt to stop the civil war between the ELF and EPLF, while in 1981, no one came out to even say "Ageb" be it inside Eritrea or elsewhere to stop the war when the EPLF/TPLF coalition attacked the ELF.

After the Independence of Eritrea in 1991, Muslims were regarded as fifth column ("Hamshai meseri'e") and treated with suspicion in their own country. For instance, we observes something in Paltalk rooms: In Tigrinya Paltalk rooms a guest who speaks out against the regime is regarded as a hero; every time a new person talks, a new hero is created and everything the guest says is taken at face value. In the Arabic paltalk rooms, the audience listens with skepticism to most of what is said and regardless of what the guest says, he is treated as no better than the rest, he is simply not a hero. These are things we need to understand. We need to develop effective translation facilities, until we make use of technology so that all of us can move together.

It is difficult to claim that when the ELF launched the armed struggle with a clear vision except to struggle to liberate Eritrea from the occupation of Ethiopia–even if some of the veteran leaders had a clear vision of the goals of the revolution. The vision started to be refined in the Adobha military congress and subsequently in ELF's first and second national congresses and the EPLF congresses. If we had a clear vision we could have avoided or at least managed civil war less painfully, we could have avoided the revolution developing into a dictatorial regime. The Muslim-Muslim conflict during the early years of the ELF may have cost more lives than any between Christians and Muslims. The same holds true in the EPLF, the Christian-Christian conflict may have caused more lives than any of the religious divide. If we look at our close neighbors who waged armed struggles, the TPLF for instance, we find that the organization underwent a metamorphosis. It started as a national organization aiming to liberate Tigray, though all the revolutionary forces in Ethiopia were struggling for change with the slogan of self-determination including and up to cessation. It entertained, at times, an extreme Albanian style of communism which put it into unnecessary ideological conflicts with the rest of the world, including the Eritrean revolution. But finally it realized that it needs to form a broad alliance of Ethiopian ethnic organizations and work for a multi-ethnic, multi-religious and multi-cultural country. It managed to achieve its goal and the right of self-determination including and up to cessation is included in the constitution of today's Ethiopia. The TPLF was pragmatic and flexible and so it won.

We are a small country with diverse ethnic groups. Genetically speaking, as human beings whether from Africa, Europe or Asia or elsewhere, we share 99.9 % of the same genetic code, only 0.1 % of our genetic make up differs. We all evolved from Africa. Humans and chimpanzees share about 98% of their genes. The dog shows 85 % genetic similarity to humans and even the fruit fly shares about 60% of its genes with humans. So generally speaking there is not much difference between us as Eritreans. We live in the same area and that the Eritrean revolution have made us know and interact with each other better; we share a lot of history and culture and our lives have become bonded with blood. Whether you are from Hamassien and you come from Dekki Teshim, Logo Chewa or Lamza Saharti, or from Akle Guzai in Eggela Hatzin or Deki Admekom or Meretta Sebene, or you come from Seraye in Qohain or Anagir or Habela there is very, very little difference among you. The same applies to the other groups. Nadels book, "Tribes and Races of Eritrea" (1994) is an old book that those who want to understand the complexity and simplicity of the Eritrean society must read.

Those of us who spoke Arabic had a competitive advantage. We could listen to Arabic broadcasts not only from the Arab world but from the BBC and VOA and others. We could listen to Eritrean broadcasts from Somalia. We read the rich literary and revolutionary literature in Arabic; while our other colleagues were confined to listening to the Ethiopian Radio and reading its periodicals. Even Isaias Afwerki had a competitive advantage over many of his Tigrinya speaking colleagues by learning Arabic at an early stage which he employed to crush his opponents. Until recently he even maintained diplomatic advantage in the Arab world over a regional power, Ethiopia, through the mastery of that language. If I were the Education Minister in Ethiopia, I would make Arabic one of the compulsory subjects in schools–why would they teach English and French when Arabic is a major language in the region which includes big labor market for many Ethiopians! It should be looked to from the economic aspect in addition to cultural aspects.

My colleague, Ghirmai Zemichael, a Christian highlander who grew up in Agordat and went with us to an Arabic school, is regarded just as 'wed-

Agordat'. He fought with the ELF units stationed in different regions, including in Dankalia. He speaks Arabic much better than me and knowing that language has widened his perspective and has not converted him to a Muslim as much as knowing Tigrinya has broadened mine in understanding our kinsmen in Eritrea and Ethiopia and has not converted me to a Christian. We enriched our knowledge by every language we know. Arabic has been there and will remain as a component of the Eritrean reality. We are both, as many others are, part of the new reality in Eritrea, we are the product of the Eritrean revolution which is currently being used as a scapegoat for all ills in Eritrea, to the extent that the deteriorating art-deco in Asmara (built by a foreign culture) is regarded as one of its victims! Ghirmai and myself do not need to go back to a static starting point called Habesha or otherwise. Each one of us can be proud of his identity as one defines it. If the Jeberti define themselves as Jeberti, no one has the right to define them otherwise. Our diversity is simply our beauty, it is not limited to the diversity of dancing and entertainment as promoted by the PFDJ. The 'Hade-hizbi, Hade-libi' (one people, one heart) as proclaimed by the PFDJ or as campaigned for by some circles in the opposition has failed. Yosief's and other similar articles do more damage than good to the future Eritrean-Ethiopian relations. They open and scratch old wounds at the time we want to forget, forgive, heal and move forwards to create a new relationship with our neighbors based on mutual interest and respect.

I sympathized with both the Affar and the Kurdish people and their right to have their own state since I was young, but history is not always just and that means they have to live divided between different countries.
Somalia with a homogenous population has also failed as state which means homogeneity is not precursor to success. I am very liberal on such issues and I believe in the right to self-determination. One cannot be democratic when it serves him and be undemocratic when it doesn't. I believe we have to make a future democratic and united Eritrea that we all fought for, attractive to all our ethnic groups to live as part of Eritrea and unity has to be voluntary. We have to make it attractive to the Affar or Kunama or Beni-Amer or Tigrinya or other groups that they will enjoy much better rights in Eritrea than in other neighboring countries; that they can continue to have very good relations with their kinsmen across the borders, that they gain from all neighboring countries competing to make their lives better wherever they are. We will strive to make the united Eritrea a haven for peace and development. We have a great chance to succeed, but we can fail if we focus on petty issues that divides us.

My biggest sympathy and support in Eritrea goes to the Kunama who have almost always been on the receiving end of oppression. Their unique traditional beliefs and practices have been seen as backward. Their lands have been regarded as no-man's land not mainly by the Tigrinya speaking settlers (supported systematically by the regime since independence) but by other settlers, too. Every time new settlers come to their place they move to marginal places. Every Kunama is seen by the regime as an enemy and are subjected to cruel treatment; Kjetil Tronvoll has documented some of the crimes against the Kunama. It is true that they have generally lived in peace with their immediate neighbors, the Nara and Beni Amer, and it is in their best interest to continue to do so. It is in their best interest also to identify their issues correctly and work with their strategic allies. Mishandling of their cause during the armed struggle has made a few of them side with Ethiopia during the liberation war, though the Kunama were an integral part of the revolution. The accusatory statement by DMLEK on Awate was unsubstantiated, unwise, untimely and showed lack of political maturity of the leadership of the organization. They know their locality more than any other group and injustice is injustice whoever commits it. It becomes distracting to focus on historical events when the urgent task is saving the country and its people. Such issues and accusations should be raised in reconciliation process among all Eritreans after the fall of the regime, especially that there are a lot of atrocities committed on the different constituents.

The anti-Awate statement created a rift in the opposition camp and it was exploited by those who are always ready to fish in dirty waters and it did not serve the Kunama's case either. The reaction by many of the political organizations was neither proportional nor objective. Yet one needs to understand history and culture to see why there was widespread strong condemnation of the DMLEK statement. When you feel you have lost almost everything in the revolution as I explained in Part I, you do not want also to lose your history, your symbols. It raises the question, what next! I hope the DMLEK can come with a reconciliatory statement to regret at least the timing, the selection of words, the consequences but to keep the right that its claims need to be investigated at an appropriate time. That way we can all move forward despite the damages. All have learned their lessons from this and we need to focus on the current urgent issues rather argue on historical events.

Hamid Awate was a human being and nothing sacred; if there are substantiated excesses committed by him before the start of the armed struggle then there is no reason why those issues cannot be investigated. History will prove who was right. As a matter of fact, all crimes committed during the peaceful struggle era or during the armed struggle period in those areas or other parts of Eritrea need to be investigated and documented so that they can be looked into in a reconciliation forum. But Awate, as a person who fired the first shots against the Ethiopian occupation will remain a historical figure, a national symbol to most Eritreans though we know there are other national heroes in different countries and the people seldom agree in full about them.

Despite all what we hear at present Paltalk discussions that expose the practices of the EPLF and which most of times just focuses on negative aspects of the Eritrean revolution, we need to see the positive developments. The formation of the Eritrean National Alliance (ENA) and later the Eritrean Democratic Alliance (EDA) though far from perfect has helped in creating a wider Eritrean opposition camp that includes civil societies and other activist organizations. The Eritrean National Conference for Democratic Change (ENCDC) and other youth conferences have widened the Eritrean opposition platform. The leadership has so far not delivered much but initiatives that the youth organizations are taking has mobilized large sectors of the population that has cornered the regime.

The regime's isolation and weakness has caused it to take desperate measures to arm the population and that has put Eritrea in very special circumstances. We need to bring all components of the Eritrean opposition under one umbrella; we should not give the regime any breathing space. We need to reach out to our people inside Eritrea and assert that ultimate power lies in their hands and that our aim is to empower them to own their own destiny–our immediate aim has to be the salvation of our people and country.

Even after we change the regime, we need to recognize that Eritrea is a small country with big neighbors that includes our kin. We do not have the capacity to compete with them for regional leadership, but we will have good friendly relations that serve our mutual interests. We need to have special relations particularly with Ethiopia and Sudan, but also with Djibouti and the countries across the Red Sea. We should make the best use of our diversity and be members of the World council of Churches, the Conferences of Islamic States and other regional and international organizations. We can gain much by investing on human resources and on the services industry such as tourism. We have a hardworking people which is a big asset. Our biggest enemy shall be fighting poverty and improving the livelihood of our people, our hard currency shall be to preserve peace. The road won't be paved with flowers, the transition period may be difficult but we will overcome it with determination to succeed. We cannot afford to fail again as we will not have another opportunity. Dr. Mohammed Kheir (November 25, 2012)

Eritrea's president decides to step down'

Speculation: Credible sources in Asmara informed that Eritrea's president Issaias Affeworki is planning to step down within a year along with most of the senior leadership and transfer power to younger leaders. Asked about possible successors, the source said he can throw out some names but it would be pure speculation on his part. President Issaias is keeping the decision close to the vest. Another source and an attentive observer of Eritrean politics has told sources that Issaias' decision to step down is not surprising and that he has been quietly preparing for transfer of power because of his declining health as well as growing discontent in the military. Issaias doesn't want to die in office like his late nemesis Meles Zenawi, sources said, adding: He wants to be a Mandela- or George Washington-like figure to his country by overseeing a smooth transfer of power on his own term. After Eritrean military officers have started to openly complain about poor living conditions with no improvement in sight, earlier this year Issaias promised that there will be changes, including a new constitution. But no one expected he will handover power while alive. The Eritrean opposition media are reporting that the regime is unraveling and senior officials are contemplating defections. Earlier this week, there was a rumor that Information Minister Ali Abdu has sought asylum in Canada. Sources have denied the rumor and that Ali Abdu is still on his duties at the Ministry of Information. As a matter fact, according to sources, Ali Abdou, who is like a son to Issaias, is one of the younger leader whose prominence in the Eritrean government will reach new heights in the post-Issaias era if the transition of power goes smoothly. Regarding war with Ethiopia's regime, sources said that no one among the senior leadership expects full scale military clash because both countries have neither the will nor the economic resources to fight. Both regimes talk about possible war to divert the attention of their people from domestic problems. Source: ER

Almost all Eritrean footballers disappear in Uganda'

Most of Eritrea's national soccer team has disappeared, believed to have defected after a tournament in Uganda. Seventeen of the squad's 22 players, plus the team doctor, failed to turn up for their flight home today, BBC Sport reported. They haven't been seen since Sunday, the day after they played their final match in the Cecafa Cup, a regional tournament organized by the Council for East and Central Africa Football Association and held this year in the Ugandan capital, Kampala.

One of the players told Radio France International that he and his teammates had defected in order to escape the repressive Eritrean government led by President Isaias Afwerki. The unnamed player said the group was hiding out in Kampala until they could file an application for asylum, though they knew the Eritrean authorities were looking for them. The Ugandan security forces have also joined the search, according to the BBC, which said that the players' pictures would be printed in newspapers to help track them down. Its not the first time Eritrean footballers have left for a match and never come back. As global post reported last year, half of Red Sea FC, a premiership team based in Eritrea's capital, Asmara, never took their flight home after playing in a competition in Tanzania. Five years before that, four Red Sea players disappeared in Kenya, while eight members of the national side ran away from another regional tournament. And another six players jumped ship after the 2008 Africa Cup of Nations in Angola. Sports-related defections are so common, in fact, writes global post's Tristan McConnell, that Eritrea's government even introduced a rule that all travelling athletes must pay a $6,700 deposit before departure, "which is only returned if they do." For some athletes, evidently, its a price they're willing to pay. By Jessica Phelan Defection of Eritrean soccer players in Uganda on 2nd December 2012 confirmed by Reuters'

Updates: At least 14 members of the Eritrea soccer squad have disappeared in Uganda while playing in a regional tournament and may eventually claim asylum, Ugandan officials said on Monday. Eritrea is one of the world's most secretive states ruled by a reclusive president. This year United Nations human rights chief Navi Pillay accused the Asmara government of meting out summary executions, torture and detaining thousands of political prisoners. In July last year 13 members of an Eritrean soccer club sought asylum in Tanzania while 12 members of the national squad disappeared in Kenya in 2009 after competing in a regional tournament. Rodgers Mulindwa, a spokesman for the Federation of Ugandan Football Associations (FUFA), told Reuters the players had not been seen since early Sunday. "Its true, some of the Eritrean players have disappeared. They've not been seen at their hotel since early yesterday and its very unfortunate," Mulindwa said. Police spokesman Ibn Sekundi put the number of missing squad members at 18 but said the team's management had informed them the players were simply "checking on relatives". Eritrea were taking part in the Council for East and Central Africa Football Associations (CECAFA) competition. Eritrea last played on Friday, losing 2-0 to Rwanda. Moses Watasa, from Uganda's Office of the Prime Minister (OPM) which is responsible for processing asylum applications, said the Eritrean players had not made contact. "As of now we haven't had any contact with them so we don't know their whereabouts, but its possible they might want to seek asylum later," he said. (December 3, 2012)

Eritrea's National Council Suspends Qernelios Osman Membership'

In its annual meeting in Addis Abeba, Eritrea's National Council (aka Bayto or Mejlis) has suspended the membership of the Democratic Movement for the Liberation of the Eritrean Kunama (DMLEK) and its chairman, Qernelios Esman. The decision to suspend the membership of DMLEK until the next congress was passed by majority vote. Of the 101 delegates attending, there were only 9 nays (including Qernelios and DMLEK members) and 6 abstentions. The majority of the delegation from North America either abstained or voted nay. The move comes three months after Qernelios Esman took to the Internet to denounce the leader of Eritrea's revolution, Hamid Idris Awate, as a criminal. Qernelios issued the statement on September 1, a day that has been celebrated by Eritreans as the anniversary of the start of the armed struggle for 50 years and as an inspiration to continue resisting the rule of Isaias Afwerki for the last 20 years. In subsequent statements, he clarified that he was indeed speaking on behalf of his organization and rebuffed all calls for an apology from Eritrea's outraged opposition organizations.

Background: DMLEK, one of two organizations which believes in "self-determination up to secession," was a member of the Eritrean umbrella group, the Eritrean Democratic Alliance (EDA), as well as the Eritrean National Council for Democratic Change (ENCDC.) The EDA is the largest bloc of the ENCDC. In September, when Qernelios refused to apologize for his inflammatory statements, the EDA responded by expelling DMLEK from the umbrella group. However, the National Commission, which is made up of EDA, other small organizations, civic association and unaffiliated individuals, could not take a swift action and it scheduled the issue as an agenda item for its November 26 meeting.

After two days working out the "disorganized logistics," the meeting started and devoted almost four days discussing the issue of Qernelios. Out of 101 members who attended the meeting, about 20 people, including DMLEK delegates and their allies, "held the meeting hostage", according to our sources, and it could not move foreword to discuss other issues. Siding with Qernelios were individuals who have labeled the EDA superfluous after the formation of the National Council and who have been calling for its (EDA's) dissolution. At the same time, those who were advocating the dissolution of the EDA informed Gedab News a few months ago that they "have formed their own alternative alliance."

Over the last year, the ENCDC has been crippled in power struggles, with new alliances wanting to control the ENCDC by excluding the EDA, which was instrumental in creating the ENCDC to begin with. At some point, the members of the council prepared a petition to expel Qernelios from the ENCDC. Sixty-five members signed the petition while 20 rejected it and the rest were undecided. The petition was rejected after a crisis was created inside the ENCDC with the chairman breaking down in tears and his deputy suffering from what was described to Gedab News as "a mental breakdown." The meeting was convened in Ararat Hotel, in Addis Abeba, Ethiopia. Ever since the Eritrean regime reconciled with Sudan's regime, many of the exiled opposition have relocated their offices to Ethiopia. Gedab News (December 3, 2012)

Why would anyone defect from 'flawless' Eritrea?

Analysis: Eritrea, if its vocal praise-singers are to be believed, is a wonderful place, where everyone is happy and the government works tirelessly to improve the lives of its people. Their national football team didn't agree. After a football match in Uganda this week, the squad defected en masse, and are now seeking asylum. So what's wrong with Eritrea? By Simon Allison

A few months ago, I made the mistake of writing an article that portrayed Eritrea in a negative light. I outlined the country's awful poverty statistics (GDP per capita is just $700, one of the lowest in the world, and its ranked 177th of 188 countries in the United Nations Human Development Index); I referenced its human rights violations, so severe that Human Rights Watch describes it as "one of the world's most repressive and closed countries" I talked about its dysfunctional and dictatorial governance, which has earned numerous unflattering comparisons to North Korea.

But apparently I was wrong, as a stream of vitriolic and personal attacks in the comments section, on Twitter and even in phone calls told me. Here are a few samples (all unedited): "Why do you hate Eritrea and Eritreans? It is always biased and full of hate when you right about Eritrea?? What is your beef?? Is your pay check from comes from Ethiopian embassy from SA?? Please top being [sic] yellow journalist." – Keb Fact "Simon Allison a muster [sic] of copy and paste. I don't know how you call yourself a journalist. Too sad to see a journalism career in the hand of lazy pundits…Eritreans believe in self reliance and they are proud of what their country is. They refute servitude to who ever undermines them; outright they reject the master serf relationship that we often see today between the "big" and the "small" –sadly the writer seems to fall in this camp. Eritreans believe in mutual respect and lasting relationship." – Yohannes Degen

"ERITREA is developing rapidly and continue [sic] to do so because of the hard work of the government along side the nation, purely focusing in the best interest of the people, making Eritrea an all rounded, flawless influential country, not just for Africa but the whole world." Aster Afeworki Well, that's me put in my place. I, along with most of international civil society including Amnesty International, Human Rights Watch and Reporters Without Borders, must have been laboring under a mistaken impression. As was the United Nations, clearly, which has issued a string of critical reports and even imposed sanctions.

In support of this more optimistic view of Eritrea – although expressed with more grace and a few caveats – is Ambassador Iqbal Jhazbhai, South Africa's representative to Eritrea. In an interview with the Daily Maverick in May, he said that Eritrea was a much misunderstood country. "This is a country poised for lift-off," he said, adding that President Isaias Afwerki was actually "very popular among the people" and that it is "certainly not as closed a society as people make it out to be". It has also made some genuinely impressive strides over the last few years, becoming one of the few African countries to make significant progress towards meeting the Millennium Development Goals.

Unfortunately for Iqbal and Eritrea's mildly threatening online praise singers, not all Eritreans are convinced that their country is "poised for lift-off" – especially not the estimated 1,000 refugees fleeing the country every month. In stark illustration of this, the Eritrean national football team went to Uganda this week for a regional cup match – and never came back. After losing their game by two goals, 17 players and the team doctor disappeared in Kampala, apparently with the intention of seeking asylum. Radio France International spoke to one of the players electing not to return home: "He said he had decided to flee Eritrea because of its many problems, citing the government of President Isaias Afwerki as 'the main problem' and accusing it of failing to respect human rights and having a compulsory and extensive program of military training."

Ugandan authorities are searching for the players, even placing their photos in national newspapers to aid the search. It is not yet clear what will happen when the players are found; it is likely, given Eritrea's international reputation, that they will be able to claim asylum and seek resettlement in another country.

Tellingly, this is not an isolated example. In July 2011, half the squad of Red Sea FC – Eritrea's leading domestic team – failed to turn up to their flight after being knocked out of a tournament in Tanzania. Eighteen months before that, a dozen members of the national squad stayed put after losing a game away to Kenya.

In fact, the problem became so bad – and so embarrassing for Eritrea's sensitive government – that authorities instituted a new rule that athletes traveling overseas had to lodge a $6,700 deposit before they could leave the country. This, however, was not enough to prevent four Eritreans from seeking asylum after the Olympics; nor was it enough to make their football team get back on the plane in Uganda. "I still very much love my country, but its the harsh conditions and lack of basic human rights which has compelled me to seek asylum," said Weynay Ghebresilasie, a 3,000-metre steeplechase Olympian and Eritrea's flag carrier at this year's games, after his defection.

On Twitter, in chat rooms and in comments sections, it is very easy for Eritrea's vociferous supporters to attack critics and talk up their country as a model of post-colonial success. It is much harder, however, to give up your home and your livelihood (and that not insubstantial deposit) in order to escape what refugees and asylum seekers have repeatedly described as a repressive, dictatorial regime. Whose account of Eritrea would you trust? Source: DM by Simon Allison, (December 5, 2012)

Eritrea's 17 footballers and team doctor who vanished in Uganda have all officially applied for asylum in the country' David Apollo Kazungu, the Commissioner for Refugees in the Office of the Prime Minister, told BBC Sport that the Eritreans had met them this morning seeking asylum. "They told us that conditions in their country are not good and we are looking at their conditions and papers," he explained. "But they remain under our authority now since they have registered." Kazungi added they are working with United Nations High Commission for Refugees (UNHCR) to see how they can help the 18 Eritreans. The men failed to return to the team hotel on Sunday after claiming that they were going shopping, eventually just five officials and two players returned to Eritrea yesterday. The Eritrean team had been eliminated from the on-going regional Cecafa Senior Challenge Cup at the group stage, where they drew with Zanzibar and lost to Malawi and Rwanda. Nicholas Musonye, the secretary general of Cecafa, the east and central African regional football body, said it was good news the Eritrean players had been found. However, he added it was a bad trend for Eritrean players to disappear at such tournaments on a regular basis, after similar incidents at the Cecafa tournaments in 2009 and 2010. (December 5, 2012)

Ethiopia's PM at his willing to talk to Eritrea'

Meles Zenawi had asked Issaias Affeworki more than 50 times to resolve the border dispute, says Hailemariam Desalegn. Though Meles Zenawi was ready to reward Eritrea through what he had called a five-point peace proposal in 2003, it remains a puzzle why Isaias remained adamant in rejecting the late Prime Minister’s golden offer. Hailemariam Desalegn, Ethiopia’s prime minister, has said that he is willing to hold talks with neighboring Eritrea, with whom Addis Ababa fought a border war that ended in 2000. If Desalgen follows through with Wednesday's statement, it will be the first time a leader in Addis Ababa has held talks with Issaias Afeworki, the Eritrean president, since the end of the conflict which left at least 70,000 people dead. "If you ask me, 'Do you want to go to Asmara and sit down and negotiate with Issaias Affe Worki?' Then, I will say yes'," Hailemariam said in an interview with Al Jazeera to be broadcast on Saturday. The two countries remain at odds over the flashpoint town of Badme, awarded to Eritrea by a UN-backed boundary commission, but still controlled by Ethiopia. "The most important thing for us is to fight poverty

... to have regional integration. If we two do that, it will be much more productive," Hailemariam added. Eritrea won independence from Ethiopia in 1993 after a 30-year struggle, that is considered among the continent's longest and most bitter. Source: Aljazeera (December 5, 2012)

Ethiopia refuses to travel to Eritrea for Football Match – AP'

Ethiopia's soccer federation will not allow its team to travel to neighboring Eritrea for a qualifying game in the African Nations Championship because of simmering hostilities between the countries and the lack of security guarantees. Ethiopian Football Federation (EFF) spokesman Melaku Ayele says Ethiopia is happy to host the Eritreans for the second leg of their tie in January but wants a neutral venue — preferably Sudan — for this month's first leg, scheduled for Eritrea's capital, Asmara. Melaku told reporters on Wednesday "who can give you the security guarantee in Asmara? Nobody can give you a security guarantee .. even you foreign journalists don't get that. That's the reality." The African Nations Championship is a continent-wide competition restricted to domestically based players. (December 5, 2012)

Eritrea Withdraws From Qualifiers Against Rival Ethiopia'

Updates: Eritrea have withdrawn from their African Nations Championship qualifiers against bitter foes Ethiopia, a letter from the Confederation of African football (CAF) showed. Eritrea have withdrawn from their African Nations Championship qualifiers against bitter foes Ethiopia, a letter from the Confederation of African football (CAF) showed. It was not immediately clear if Ethiopia's request for the match to be played on neutral ground after ruling out travelling to Asmara was behind Eritrea's move. Over the weekend, 18 members of the Red Sea state's national team, including Eritrea's team doctor, disappeared in Uganda while playing in a regional tournament. The two east African rivals were set to clash in the Eritrean capital around Jan. 14-16 with the return fixture booked for a fortnight later in Addis Ababa. "We have just been informed by the Eritrean Football Federation that its national team is withdrawing from the ... matches," said a letter from CAF's Competitions Deputy Director Shereen Arafa seen by Reuters. The letter did not mention Eritrea's reasons for its withdrawal. An Ethiopian FA official confirmed the letter and added that his country was now set to face Rwanda in Addis Ababa on June 21-23 in the next qualification round. Ethiopia and Eritrea are entangled in a bitter border dispute that saw the countries go to war between 1998-2000, a conflict which cost tens of thousands of lives. The African Nations Championship, played every two years, is the continent's second biggest tournament in which only domestic-based players can take part. Ethiopia and Eritrea were last drawn against each other in 1998 in a qualifying round for the 2000 African Nations Cup, just months after fighting broke out along their sun-blasted border.

Meantime, South Sudan make their competitive soccer debut when they meet Ethiopia in the opening game of the East and Central African Senior Challenge Cup, the continent's oldest regional competition. But the world's newest nation, which achieved independence 16 months ago, has sent a team to hosts Uganda with just 15 players and the coach says they have had little chance to train and no preparatory matches. "Its the same as taking your soldiers to war without food," said well-travelled Serbian Zoran Dorjdevic in a radio interview. "How do you expect them to fight? With love or by spirit?" The coach said the players were nevertheless excited about competing in the 12-nation championship, being played in Kampala, but not in any shape to prove competitive. The squad includes two veteran former Sudan internationals, Richard Lado and James Moja Joseph, who plays club football in India. Two American-based players were expected to join the team before Saturday's kickoff. South Sudan will also play Kenya and hosts Uganda in their other Group A matches. South Sudan have competed in just a single international - a 2-2 draw with neighbors Uganda at home in Juba in July to celebrate their affiliation to FIFA, who have them ranked 200th in the world standings. (December 5, 2012)

Ethiopia's new leader keen for face-to-face talks with Eritrean president'

Updates: Ethiopia's newly elected prime minister, Hailemariam Desalegn, affirmed that he is willing to hold direct talks with Eritrea on the long-standing dead-lock over border dispute. In an interview with Al-JazeeraDesalegn said he is willing to hold face-to-face talks with Eritrean president, Isaias Afwerki, in the Eritrean capital. "If you ask me, 'Do you want to go to Asmara and sit down and negotiate with Isaias Afeworki?' Then, I will say 'yes'", Hailemariam said, raising hopes of new peace talks between the two East African nations. Last month South Sudan said that would work to mediate between Ethiopia and Eritrea over their border row. South Sudan's minister for cabinet affairs, Deng Alor, then said that both Addis Ababa and Asmara have given the green light to come for peace talks and the negotiation talks could start as of November. When asked if the new approach towards Eritrea was something that came under the new post-Zenawi leadership, Desalegn stated that the decision to deal with Asmara was in line with the policy laid out by the late Zenawi. "My predecessor Meles Zenawi had asked for more than 50 times even to go to Asmara and negotiate with Mister Isaias Afwerki," he said. Desalegn, who assumed power shortly after longtime ruler Meles Zenawi died in August, is seen as a more moderate figure and if he managed to hold talks with the Eritrean leader then he will be the first Ethiopian leader to hold direct talks with Afeworki since the two countries ended their border war in 2000.Desalegn further said that his government's top priority is to fight poverty, to have regional integration and, "if we two [Ethiopian and Eritrea] do that, it will be much more productive." Eritrea gained independence from Ethiopia in 1993, after a 30-year rebellion. They fought a border war between 2000 and 2002 that killed over 70,000 people. Earlier this year, tensions between the two neighbors escalated, mounting fears of renewed conflict, after the Ethiopian army carried out cross-border attacks on military camps inside Eritrea. This was in response to the killing and abduction of foreign tourists in January2012 in Ethiopia's remote Afar region by rebels allegedly backed by Eritrea. The cross-border attacks by Ethiopian troops was Addis Ababa's first and official military incursion since the two East African nations ended the bitter war in 2000 over the disputed town of Badme, which had been attributed to Eritrea by a UN border committee. However, the flashpoint remains under the control of Ethiopia, which seeks further negotiations. Ethiopia and Eritrea frequently trade accusations of backing one an others rebel groups to destabilize one the other. Source: Sudan Tribune (December 6, 2012)

President Issaias Affeworki Requests Qatar To Mediate Dispute With Ethiopia'

Eritrean president Issaias Affworki has asked Qatar to mediate his long-standing feud with "arch-rival" Ethiopia. This message was communicated to the new Ethiopian Prime Minister, Hailemariam Desalgn, by Qatar, while the Ethiopian prime minister was conducting a state visit. Issaias Affwerki has offered to attend mediation talks without any pre-conditions.

In an interview with Al Jazeera, Hailemariam Desalegn told his interviewer that he would be willing to travel to Eritrea to hold face-to-face talks with Issaias Affeworki and that this was a long-standing Ethiopian policy: "My predecessor Meles Zenawi had asked for more than 50 times even to go to Asmara and negotiate with Mister Issaias Affeworki," he said.

Qatar, which is showing greater interest in the region, is weary of the growing Turkish influence in the Horn of Africa. Recently, the Turkish foreign minister visited Asmara at the invitation of Issaias Affwerki, who wanted him to mediate between the new Somali regime and the Eritrean regime. But while in Asmara, Issaias also informed the Turkish foreign minister that he is working to normalize relations with Ethiopia and that he had asked Qatar to mediate.

Issaias Affeworki is facing internal crisis represented by acute shortage of electricity, water and basic food items including milk throughout Eritrea. This has exacerbated the crisis within the military where morale has hit rock bottom due to the confusing command and control hierarchy–where Isaias bypasses his direct reports to communicate directly with more junior officers–mass desertion which has hollowed out the forces, inadequate salaries and rampant corruption within the officer class.

To head off revolt within the armed forces, Issaias Affewerki has started to arm the entire civilian population and to structure them in what is known as Hzbawi Serawit, or People's Army, modeled after Communist China, where Issaias Affeworki received his first revolutionary indoctrination in the 1960s.In the streets of Eritrea, old men and women carrying AK-47s is a common sight. It is not unusual to witness women carrying AK-47s while holding their babies and farmers as old as sixty plough their land while carrying their guns.

Issaias Affeworki is on record, repeatedly, for stating that he would never enter into negotiations with Ethiopia other than to discuss the mechanism for strict implementation of the ruling of Eritrea-Ethiopian Boundary Commission (EEBC.) While a separate body, the Eritrea Ethiopia Claims Commission (EECC) largely put the blame on Eritrea for starting the war, the symbolic flashpoint of the border war, Badme, was awarded to Eritrea by the EEBC. The Boundary Commission ended up conducting "virtual demarcation" after being frustrated by Ethiopia's refusal to strictly abide by the ruling and demanding dialogue on implementing the ruling purportedly to avoid disrupting the lives of Ethiopian citizens

Issaias Affeworki also has a history of acting in way diametrically opposed to his loud and frequent assertions, but only after he has been penalized for his intransigence. For one thing, after repeatedly telling the United Nations that he had no dispute with Djibouti and therefore nothing to resolve, he agreed to mediation (Djibouti Eritrea Mediation Agreement) without acknowledging to his people that he had done so. However, in the interim, the UN had imposed sanctions (S/Res/1907(2009)) on Eritrea in no small part due to Issaias's refusal to admit that he went to war with Djibouti, that he is holding Djibouti prisoners of war, and that he should admit this and seek resolution. The mediator for the Eritrea-Djbouti dispute is also Qatar, which has stationed its armed forces in a buffer zone between Eritrea and Djibouti. Source: Gedab News (December 6, 2012)

SOCCER: Eritrea vs Ethiopia - Ethiopia withdrew from qualifier'

Updates: Eritrea's football team has withdrawn from a scheduled match against arch-foe Ethiopia, the Confederation of African Football (CAF) has said in a letter. "We have just been informed by the Eritrean Football Federation that their national team is withdrawing," CAF Deputy Director Shereen Arafa wrote in a letter dated December 4. Ethiopia said it would not face its rival for the African Nations Championship qualifier match in Asmara, where the match was scheduled to be held in January. Ethiopia requested the match take place in Sudan instead. "The match is cancelled and Ethiopia is qualified for the next round," the letter stated. Agence France-Presse (December 07, 2012)

Response To A Circular Thinker'

There are times that demand assertion. This is the Time for me to be assertive. Here shall follow my assertions and I apologize if I bore you. This is my First assertion: Eritrea is a sovereign nation equal to all nations on earth. Our nationhood was achieved by the blood and sweat of its proud, selfless, resilient, patient and wise people. Nationhood consciousness has cemented like a house built on rock. No wind; no rain; no snow; no earthquake can shake it. Eritrean people chose to exercise their God given rights to fight for their freedom. The first phase is achieved. Now let's struggle to complete the journey. It was not easy to defeat well-trained, well-oiled and well-armed superior force without disproportionate amount of suffering and sacrifices. So our nationhood is deserved and is irrevocable. What happened to us the People of Eritrea by our own kinds along the journey to achieve nationhood and build nationhood is painful and shameful but amendable. There is no static journey in Life because Life is struggle. Our Gedli was perfect imitation of Life. Our mothers did not say in vain "Nabra Kalsi iyu" meaning to live is to struggle. What I will add is to struggle is also to Live. We should not take "struggle" as mere inconvenience. "Rome was not built in a day". AkleTsbet shall take you nowhere but to oblivion. So our struggle shall continue until we die and join our Martyrs in the space less, timeless realm that our God created for our second life.

This is my second assertion: Eritrea as a nation is equal to Ethiopia as a nation. Eritreans as people are equal to Ethiopians as people. "Our" old unequal, vague and suspicious relationship has ended. That relationship shall not resurface again. It is a new phase and like anything new that deserves new approaches, our new relationship shall continue on equal footing with genuine mutual respect and recognition like the people of USA and Great Britain; Sweden and Norway; Austria and Germany; Australia and New Zealand. We genuinely need Ethiopia and Ethiopians as Ethiopia genuinely needs Eritrea and Eritreans. We are neighbors so we shall love one another as we love ourselves. But if some mouthy individuals say we don't need you then their rhetoric with fall into our deaf ears and life shall go on. We are not going to fall into our knees and beg conditional help.

This is my third assertion: Dumb, stupid or idiots cannot win wars. It is people who win wars. Armaments alone cannot win wars. It is the brain, higher intelligence, dedication and belief in sacrifice that win wars. Wars and battles are science. Science is based on knowledge. Our martyr Tegadelti must have been endowed with higher intelligence, dedication and spirit of martyrdom to win the war. It was unequal and almost impossible to win war in terms of resources, armaments, munitions and manpower. We were disadvantaged in every conceivable category. But we won. Our martyrs; our war disabled veterans and all other Tegadelti deserve respect and recognition. It is fair and fairness that is the cornerstone of justice. Anything less is abomination and sacrilege.

This is my fourth assertion: There are no people without history. Some have it written and some have it in the form of oral tradition. Written history does not always mean true history. Some histories are fictions like some oral histories are myth and legends. If Ethiopians are proud of their history there is no reason why we Eritreans should not be proud of our history. Gedli is our history. Gedli is our proud history. We are proud of our history and we shall defend our history. This is my fifth assertion: No culture is superior to other cultures. Ethiopians are proud with their culture so are we Eritreans.

This is my sixth assertion: They say "The grass looks greener on the other side of the fence". But it is a mirage. We are not alone with problems. Every nation on earth had and has its own problems. Some nations overcome their problems with the right efforts but some do not. We want to belong to the former. The problems we are facing today in Eritrea, or faced during the Gedli era, are unique to us but not unique to human history. The European Jews were decimated by the Nazis, but they stood on their feet; Russians and especially the Ukrainians were decimated by Stalin; Chinese had suffered under Mao; Cambodians suffered horrendous suffering under Pol Pot; half a million Tutsi were hacked to death by the Hutu extremists; in the middle ages Genghis Khan decimated Asia, and many similar atrocities were committed but people are resilient and most have recovered. We shall also recover.

This is my seventh assertion: Respect starts with the self and then radiates toward others in proximity ad infinitum. A person that does not respect him/herself is incapable of respecting others the same way that a person who does not genuinely Love him/herself is incapable to love others. We are created in the Image of God. This image is not physical. We are Cosmos. We are living and vibrant Universe. We express our vibrancy through hope and faith. Hopeless and faithless persons have given up their gift of creation. Respecting your history and your achievement is not sin. It is a sign of acknowledgment to your own people and to your Creator. Give credit where it is due. It is the Right thing to do. Stoicism is a tool that has to be used in times of suffering and turmoil. Stoicism is our heritage that passed to us from our ancestors. Let's utilize it and also let's proudly pass it to the next generation: The Youth. Let's stop crying like babies.

This is my eighth assertion: Hatred eventually consumes the haters. Unlike love hatred travels the reverse. The hater starts from people "far" away. The hater does not make efforts to know those who do not have contact or familiarity with. Some might ask why? The answer is if "to love is to know" then "to hate is to not want to know". Hate travels backward toward the hater until it consumes the source of hate- the hater. Look at Nsu. He started his hatred (he did not even shy to document and disseminate it) with Eritrean Muslims; with Islam; with the founders of our struggle. Did he stop there? No. He is consuming the very people of the highland (very close in proximity and kinship) whom he claimed to protect from those whom he hated when his hatred "started". The horrendous crimes and suffering we are witnessing today in Eritrea is Hatred-In-Action. Hatred is a plague that has to be avoided at all costs. It is the destroyer of humankind. It is the anti-thesis of life. It can only reside in deranged mind and wretched soul.

This is my ninth assertion: Awate is our hero. Awate is Eritrean Hero. Awate is a Hero to his beloved people of Eritrea. He is my Hero. Awate asserted his heroism by humbly accepting to shoulder a monumental task and then by paid with his God given gift: HIS LIFE.

This is my tenth assertion: Awate Website is our Beloved home, Home far away from Home. It is our refuge in our uncertain times. It is also our functional parliament. Long time ago in response to Ali Salim this is what I wrote and it is still TRUE: "Awate.com is also a beacon of hope to many Eritreans, a counter weight to the hopelessness in Eritrea and elsewhere else. It is the light house to lost sailors and a ray of light to lost souls. This is not exaggeration or vanity.

But above all Awate.com is our university of higher learning and civilized interactions when the only university in Eritrea was closed shut. Awate.com became the hub of reformation and renaissance combined when the rest of Eritrea fell into Dark Age.

All contributors to awate are reformists and renaissance thinkers by nature and magnitude no less than William Shakespeare, Albert Duress, Indigo Jones, Leonardo Da Vinci, Martin Luther, John Wycliffe, Calvin, Al-battani, Ibn Al-Shatir, Nasir Al-Din Al-Tusi, Al-Karaji, Abu Al-Hasan Ibn Ali Al- Qulasadi, Abu Al-Quasim and many more.

Without Awate.com and Asmarino.com the victory of the dictator would have been absolute and devastating. But Newtonian third law of motion (or call it law of physical nature) worked and worked well. For every action there is an equal and opposite reaction. The more the dictator became dark the more the Eritrean democrats shined. The more the dictator tramped on people's rights the more he was exposed. The more the dictator suppressed intellect, more intellectuals surfaced. The more the dictator muzzled information, more information flowed and all these due mainly to Awate.com.

This is my eleventh assertion: Isaias and his creation and tool the PDFJ, is the enemy. Only fools and reckless people make many enemies. Only Idiots give equal weight to all their adversaries. Identifying and isolating your enemy is the most important task in a sound strategy. Awate the hero is not the enemy. Gedli was not the enemy. Tegadelti were not the enemy. Our Martyrs were not the enemy. The opposition is not the enemies. Awate.com is not the enemy. Arabic language is not the enemy.

This is my twelfth last assertion: Arabic language is our language. Those who have qualms with this due to myriad of motives are wrong. Arabic is a language used by more than half (please exclude Nsu) of Eritreans.
Speaking Arabic does not make the user alien. If you think that Arabic is an exclusive language of Moslems you are dead wrong. Arabic is the language of

Our Coptic brethren in Egypt. Arabic is the language of the Christian Maronites in Lebanon. Arabic is the language of Christian sects in Syria and Iraq. All of these people are the descendants of the First Christian communities. Their Bible is in Arabic and not in Geez. Even the word Tewahdo is derived from Arabic.

This is my thirteenth and last assertion: Arabs are not our enemies. Even though this assertion does not need elaboration look no farther than The Sudan and its wonderful, kind and accommodating people. They are Arabs and their largesse to us in our trying times and up to now shall never be forgotten. How dare YG consider the Gedli generation as dumb robots. Do robots win wars and battles? Do robots have innate intelligence or dedication? Do robots have sense of martyrdom?

Where was YG when the mighty Ethiopian army and air force was using illegal bombs to decimate our lowlanders that included women, babies, young people and shimagles? Where was YG when our people of the lowland were rendered useless by Ethiopians thus slaughtered like animals? Where was YG when half a million inhabitants were forced to abandon their ancestral land and flee to The Sudan where they are now considered aliens by the very beast and its instructions that caters his wishes?

As for belittling Awate for not leaving quotable speeches I will give YG thousands of quotations From Kim Il Sung the father (three volumes); Mao (seven volumes); Lenin and Stalin (several volumes); Hitler and many others and I want YG to give us an explanation if quotable speeches are any indications of morality, humanity and willingness to give oneself up to save others from their suffering and quest for peace and tranquility. Gedab News (December 8, 2012)

Eritrean National Team Disappears in Uganda - SkyNews'

Updates: Police have launched a search for 18 members of Eritrea's national football team, who disappeared during a regional football tournament in Uganda, a police spokesman said on Tuesday. The footballers are believed to have absconded and hidden in the suburbs of the capital Kampala. 'We believe they have not flown out but are with relatives and friends in Kansanga or Nsambya where there is a large community of Eritreans,' police spokesman Iddi Ibin Ssenkumbi told dpa. The Eritrean team had been eliminated from the CECAFA cup competition on Saturday and were due to fly back to their country, in the Horn of Africa, according to the Kampala-based Daily Monitor newspaper. Defection is common among Eritrean players, the paper reported. After the 2009 CECAFA tournament in Kenya, only the coach returned to Eritrea while the whole team absconded. Eritrea is a one-party state which has a poor human rights record and which prescribes mandatory military service for both men and women. According to rights group Human Rights Watch, the country has 'one of the world's most repressive governments'. Its citizens often suffer arbitrary detention, torture, restrictions on freedom of speech and religion, and indefinite conscription, it says. (December 8, 2012)

Can Ethiopia and Eritrea finally find peace?

Commentary: After years of hostility between the countries, Ethiopia's new prime minister explains why he is willing to start talks. After years of hostility between the countries, Ethiopia's new prime minister explains why he is willing to start talks. Can Ethiopia and Eritrea finally find Peace? The Horn of Africa is one of the most important strategic locations in the world. Control the area, and you control the Red Sea, critical for global trade connecting Europe, Africa, the Middle East and Asia. But border disputes between regional arch-rivals Eritrea and Ethiopia - which have been running ever since Eritrea broke free from Ethiopia in May, 1991 - threaten the stability of the area. Eritrea won independence from Ethiopia after a 30-year struggle that is considered to be among the continent's longest and most bitter. The animosity between the two sides frequently spills over into neighboring countries like Somalia and Kenya. No Ethiopian leader has held talks with Isaias Afewerki, the Eritrean president, since the end of their bitter border war in 2000, during which at least 70,000 people died. That is, until now. Hailemariam Desalegn, the new Ethiopian prime minister who has been in office for only three months, says he is willing to talk to the Eritrean president. In an exclusive interview with Talk to Al Jazeera he explains: "If you ask me 'Do you want to go to Asmara [the Eritrean capital] and sit down and negotiate with Isaias Afewerki?', then I will say 'yes'." When asked if there was a real opportunity to forge closer links between the two countries following the death of Meles Zenawi, the former Ethiopian prime minister, in August, Desalegn answered: "My predecessor Meles Zenawi had asked for more than 50 times even to go to Asmara and to negotiate with Isaias Afewerki. "The most important thing for us is fighting poverty. The most important thing for us is having regional integration. If we two, we do that, it will be much more productive." Desalegn also talks about how he plans to move Ethiopia and the region forward. (December 8, 2012)

Ethiopia wants Eritrea game moved to neutral Sudan because of lack of security guarantees'

Ethiopian Football Federation (EFF) will not allow its team to travel to neighboring Eritrea for a qualifying game in the African Nations Championship because of simmering hostilities between the countries and the lack of security guarantees. Federation spokesman Melaku Ayele says Ethiopia is happy to host the Eritreans for the second leg of their tie in January but wants a neutral venue — preferably Sudan — for this month's first leg, scheduled for Eritrea's capital, Asmara. AP (December 8, 2012)

Eritrean government denies report that President Issaias Affeworki will step down'

Updates: The Eritrean government has dismissed recent reports alleging that the long-time leader of Eritrea, Issaias Affeworki, has decided to stand-down in 2013. Citing sources in Asmara, Ethiopian Review, an online journal, recently reported that Affeworki is planning to step down within a year, along with most of the senior leadership and will transfer power to younger leaders. However, Eritrea's presidential spokesperson, Yemane Guebremeskel, told the German Deutsche Welle Radio's Amharic program, that the rumors are baseless. In a recent post I asserted that there is a pattern to these rumors. They are usually engendered when some within Ethiopia who want to hide or obscure some event inside Ethiopia," he said adding they "are just distractions." Ethiopian Review claimed that "the Eritrean president wants to be a Mandela or George Washington-like figure to his country by overseeing a smooth transfer of power on his own terms." Anonymous Eritrean opposition political groups based in Addis Ababa told Sudan Tribune on that it is "totally unlikely" that the "Eritrean dictator" will resign or allow a smooth power transfer.

The opposition officials further stressed that the only way to remove Afferworki from power is by military means or with an uprising, as seen in other countries during the Arab spring. An Eritrean political analyst, on a condition of anonymity, said that Afferworki's alleged decision to resign is "no surprise" because of his deteriorating health and mounting discontent amongst the country's defense forces. The Red Sea Afar Democratic Organization (RSADO), chairman, Ibrahim Haron, told Sudan Tribune in November that Eritrea is witnessing a growing division among political and military leaders following worsening corruption in the poorly-funded military.

As result of the corruption, the Eritrean army has begun unprecedented protests and there has been public outcry, according to Haron. With an estimated 200,000-300,000 troops, Eritrea has the largest armies in sub-Saharan Africa, despite its relatively small population. Affewerki has ruled the country since 1993 when it gained its independence from Ethiopia after more than 30 years of struggle. Affewerki was seen as a hero by many of the Eritrean people for his role in the fight for freedom, however when he assumed power he shut down independent news outlets, and stifled freedom of speech and religious practice. Eritrea was described by Human Rights Watch in 2012 as "one of the world's most repressive governments."

Tens of thousands of Eritrea's citizens have fled to neighboring countries to seek refuge'

UN High Commission for Refugees (UNHCR) spokesperson, Andrej Mahecic said during a visit to East Sudan in January, "This is the area hosting one of the most protracted refugee situations in the world. At the moment there are some 70,000 refugees mostly of Eritrean origin and they reside in 12 camps in this part of the country." According to UNHCR, approximately 1,700 refugees, mainly from Eritrea, arrive in Sudan every month. Last week 17 players and the doctor of the Eritrean football squad sought asylum in Uganda after taking part at the East and Central Africa Football Associations senior Challenge Cup. Similarly, 13 players from Eritrea's top football club have disappeared in Tanzania after the team was knocked out of a regional tournament in July 2011.

Eritrea’s flag-bearer during the 2012 Olympics sought asylum in the UK in August.

Source: Sudan Tribune (December 12, 2012)

Eritrea receives financial aid from Iran and military aid from Israel' Stratford: Israel and Iran are both holding military bases in Eritrea on the shore of the Red Sea, the global intelligence company Stratford reported. This is not the first indication of a covert Israeli military presence in the small African country, but Stratford's report is the most detailed to surface to date. According to Stratford, Israel has a listening station on the secluded Mt. Amba Sawara, as well as docks in the Dahlak Archipelago. Previous reports revealing the existence of these docks claimed they are being used by Israel Navy submarines and ships taking part in Israel's covert war against the Iranian networks smuggling weapons to the Hamas and Hezbollah.

The weapon shipments leave Iranian port, are transported through the Red Sea to Sudan, and from there taken via Egypt to the Gaza Strip or ports in the Mediterranean. The cargo is later placed on cargo ships to Syria and Lebanon. The Israel Air force has reportedly attacked weapons convoys in Sudan several times in the past, most recently less than two months ago near the capital Khartoum. The docks in the Dahlak Archipelago were reportedly used by the Soviet navy during the Cold War, according to a number of media outlets. Using Google Earth, one can make out several vessels at the dock as well as what looks like a landing strip. In addition to the Israeli presence reported, Iran is also said to be maintaining a military presence in Eritrea in the southern port city of Assab. Stratford's analysis claims Eritrea's government - one of the world's harshest regimes - is nurturing relations with the two rival nations in order to maintain its advantage against its larger neighbor Ethiopia, from which it gained independence in May, 1991, and Djibouti and Yemen. Eritrea has waged war against these countries in the past and is still fighting rebel groups supported by Ethiopia. It was also reported that Eritrea receives financial aid from Iran and military aid from Israel. Source: Stratford (December 16, 2012)

Eritrea Versus Ethiopia - Diplomatic Maneuver ' DIPLOMACY: Araya Desta Ambassador of Eritrea to the U.N specified in his letter dated at December 13 to the UNSC that the assertion by Tekeda Alemu, Ethiopia's ambassador to the United Nations, that Eritrea supported terrorism in Somalia has never been proved by solid evidence. Mr. Alemu knows full well who the architects of the sanction regime were. The punitive measures against Eritrea were taken not for the alleged violations reported by the "independent" United Nations experts, but to cover up his government's refusal to respect the final and binding verdict of the Eritrea Ethiopia Boundary Commission, brokered mainly by the United States. Ironically, Eritrea's objection to the invasion of Somalia by Ethiopia and its refusal to recognize Somalia's transitional government were the underlying reasons for the sanctions on Eritrea.

The problem between Eritrea and Ethiopia is a question of occupation. The way to move forward on this issue has always been for Ethiopia to withdraw from sovereign Eritrean territory. Peace, stability, mutual respect and better cooperation could prevail in the Horn of Africa if Ethiopia respected its treaty obligations. The New York Times (December 21, 2012)

The Fog Over The Red Sea'

Commentary: Eritrean information minister Ali Abdu, who is rumored to have defected this past week, helped build one of the world's strictest systems of media control. Eritrea sits on some of the most important real estate in Africa, occupying a thin sliver of coastline at the mouth of the Red Sea. The country straddles one side of a globally significant shipping lane, and the actions of whoever's ruling in Asmara affects the stability of every neighboring country, from already troublesome places like Sudan, Ethiopia and Somalia to Yemen and Saudi Arabia, which lie just across the sea. Yet Eritrea itself is one of the most opaque places on earth. Under the 21-year rule of Isaias Afewerki, the country has aided al Qaeda-affiliated militants in Somalia, warred against Ethiopia, and precipitated a refugee crisis that has percolated throughout the Horn of Africa and the greater Middle East, cloaked in a fog that even other governments have a difficult time penetrating. Ali Abdu, the country's all-powerful information minister, is part of the reason why. In an ironic development, it is now unclear whether Abdu is still working with the government, or even if he is still in Eritrea. Thanks to the strict information controls Abdu helped erect during his decade-long tenure as information minister, his movements over the past month have been shrouded in mystery, his possible defection from Afewerki's government shielded from public view by the very system he helped create.

Evidence of Abdu's defection mostly lies in a French-language report by freelance journalist Leonard Vincent, who supposedly based his findings on both defectors and sources within the Eritrean ministries of information and defense. According to Eritrean diasporas sources, Abdu, who left Eritrea for Europe in November, had been traveling with state TV producer Daniel Kiflom, who is also rumored to have defected from Afewerki's government (Kiflom did not comment when reached by email). In late November, when an Ethiopian website claimed that Abdu had defected during his trip abroad, media reports quickly circulated that the minister had already returned to Asmara, and that reports of his departure were fabrications meant to destabilize Eritrea. Vincent's article asserts otherwise: that no one has seen Abdu in the capital for several weeks, or even spoken to him. Abdu already has family living abroad: his wife has been living in Canada for several years, and he has a brother who lives in California, a cofounder of an English-language Eritrean news site. And he hasn't been spotted in public for several weeks. "The rumors are symptomatic of the regime's draconian grip on information." Mohammed Keita of the Committee to Protect Journalists is not sure if the reports of Abdu's defection are true. But Keita, who covers Eritrea for CPJ and who has communicated with Abdu to voice his concerns on media freedom issues on several occasions, wouldn't dismiss them either. "Its definitely the case that he hasn't been seen in public," Keita told me. "And even when we were trying to get in touch with him three weeks ago [after the earlier reports of his defection], none of his numbers worked, or he didn't respond." Something is up, but that may or may not mean that Abdu is on his way to Canada or the United States, as some sources in the diasporas have already indicated. When reached for comment, an official at Eritrea's permanent mission to the U.N. said that Abdu is in the capital, and was still information minister. For Keita, this week's reports at least "point to an unanswered question about [Abdu's] unusual disappearance from public view."

And they point to a larger, related issue as well. Abdu played a central role in one of the most oppressive governments on earth. The opacity that now surrounds his whereabouts is a symptom of more general problems in Eritrea, issues that have made life virtually impossible for much of the population—indeed, over a quarter-million Eritreans are living as refugees in surrounding countries, despite the absence of war or (for the most part) famine conditions within Eritrea itself. "The rumors are symptomatic of the regime's draconian grip on information," says Keita. And that, in turn, is symptomatic of Afewerki's draconian grip on nearly everything else.

Some countries in the Horn of Africa are worrying because of the potential for instability—after all, Somalia is just emerging from 20 years of anarchy. Eritrea is the exact opposite. According to Salem Solomon, an Eritrean-American journalist and television producer who worked for Abdu's information ministry before moving to the United States, the country is run on a highly "systematic" basis, especially for its young adults. "If you are a young person working in Eritrea, you're either doing [national] service or you're a student. That's how it works," she said, describing a system where most of the country is conscripted into either the military or civil service at the end of their high school years. "You don't look for a job. Its all laid out for you. Its not in your hands" (as for the private sector, Eritrea is one of the hardest places in the world to do business, according to the World Bank).

Solomon said that thanks to recent reforms, some Eritreans spend their senior years of high school in military camps, preparing for several subsequent years of national service. "Your understanding of politics and what it means to be Eritrean starts when you're young and it plays into your career," she says. "Before you graduate high school, you're already in the military. Whether you're a doctor or a journalist or whatever you become later, you've already had political education and military training in your system to understand how things work." During military service, Solomon says there is "political education every day. Its just part of the routine."

The strict control over the lives and career trajectory of the country's youth is an outgrowth of Afewerki's aggressive stance towards Ethiopia, Eritrea's far more populous eastern neighbor. Eritrea gained its independence from Ethiopia in 1992. Even though Afewerki fought alongside the late Ethiopian prime minister Meles Zenawi in the struggle against Ethiopia's communist regime, the two became bitter opponents, waging a brutal war over a disputed border—and likely over more opaque and personal matters—in the late 1990s. The enmity between the two countries continues, even after Zenawi's death in August.

Solomon served in the military, and then was able to earn a journalism degree from Asmara University, on the government's dime—she says her education was repaid in the form of her later work for the English-language desk at Eri-TV, the state television station. "Its all about growth and achievement, you know," she said of Eri-TV's programming. "Only good stuff." The station focused much of its energies on covering "things a government should do," like development projects or meetings.

Bealfan Tesfay, a U.S.-based journalist who worked in Eritrean state media as late as 2010, has a similar view of the ministry's narrow editorial priorities. "It was not exactly journalism," he told me of his work as an editor and television producer. "It was propaganda... In the west, we think of the press as the watchdog of the society. In Eritrea, its used for the purposes of upholding the interests of the state of Eritrea." He wrote about national holidays and celebrations, and churned out stories with a clear anti-western and anti-American tilt—Afewerki is still suspicious of the United States for what he views as its refusal to pressure Ethiopia, a close American ally, into accepting international arbitration on the countries' border dispute. Story topics would be passed down from on high, and he would sometimes need official approval to even conduct interviews. Some stories were completely off limits, including one that would turn out to be arguably the largest event in the entire world. "Back in February of 2010 there was a total blackout of the Arab Spring," he said. "I was working in the office and was instructed not to print anything about the Arab Spring. As far as the government media in our country was concerned, there was no Arab Spring. The events in Egypt weren't reported."

According to CPJ, Eritrea is has the strictest media censorship of any country on earth. Journalists are imprisoned and even killed, and Abdu and Affeworki have ensured that there is no independent press, period. "[Abdu] was the architect of the government's control and direction of the media," says Keita. "He directs the media on what it should report, and all the censors report to him. He dictates and directs the regime's propaganda infrastructure...there's no media that can operate in Eritrea without Ali Abdu's approval or direction." "Journalism, at least in the sense that much of the world understands it, is effectively illegal in Eritrea". A decree issued just a week after the terrorist attacks of September 11, 2001 -- a moment when the international community had other, more seemingly-pressing concerns than governance and press freedom in the Horn of Africa—outlawed any journalism conducted by entities other than the country's government. According to Keita, that directive, which suspended most constitutional rights and basically made journalism as much of the world understands it illegal in Eritrea, came from Abdu's office, just three months before scheduled national elections. "[Government officials] essentially went on national radio to order all private newspapers to suspend operations indefinitely. And in the hours and days following that order, they just arrested all the editors of these newspapers, and they rounded up all the reformists who had been calling for the implementation of the constitution and the holding of elections," says Keita.

There are no shortage of blogs and independent news sources maintained by Eritreans in the diasporas. But the only news available inside the country—and virtually the only news that's being reported from inside Eritrea itself—is gathered under Abdu's auspices. For those who are interested in what's going inside of the Eritrean government, things are no clearer for those in the country as they are for those watching from the outside. "I am as informed as I am now as I would be if I was living there" in terms of the country's politics, Solomon says.

Tesfay remembers Abdu—the man responsible for maintaining the thick fog of secrecy surrounding the country—as a secretive and arbitrary individual who would promote, demote or fire his subordinates with little explanation. His mandate to enforce an absolute control of information seemed to inform his managerial style: "He was very much engaged or concerned with office politics," says Tesfay. "He ran the ministry as if it was his backyard...he controlled the office through everybody informing on one another." Tesfay said Abdu would reassign career journalists to clerical jobs for no apparent reason, including one of the country's most accomplished news photographers. His subordinates lived in fear of him. "He was an extremely cruel person. Sometimes you would think he would have some sadist tendencies or something like that."

Yet, Tesfay says that conscious fear wasn't exactly what motivated him and his colleagues. "People shut up and did their work," he recalls. "They didn't even care about it. They just did it." He says life in Eritrea is the same way: faced with the possibility of being fired or even imprisoned for taking an interest in the country's political affairs, most people's first instinct is simply to keep out of trouble,. They internalized the constant self-censorship needed in order to survive. "No one is politically aware even in Eritrea. They couldn't care less about what goes on in their country. They hate it, they don't like the system, but they just go about their lives," says Tesfay. "No one talks about politics, no one cares about politics. No one wants to go to prison."

An unintended consequence of this is that even within the information ministry, few people seem to be convinced of the government's propaganda (and a fascinating Wikileaks cable suggests that Abdu might not have been that convinced either). Solomon, who left the country legally (and did not defect), says that one of her former bosses defected while she was still working for the ministry. “Everybody I knew in my generation...they’re all out,” Solmon says.

Tesfay says that many of his old colleagues and acquaintances have defected as well. After all, leaving Eritrea is one of the only forms of political dissent available. “If you have a problem with the way the country is being run, you leave the country,” he says. “That’s the only option you have in that sense.

And even leaving is extremely difficult: the government often won’t grant exit visas to its citizens; when it does, it can charge them up to $10,000. Fleeing Eritrea means walking to the border and wandering into a refugee camp in Ethiopia or Sudan, a journey that not everyone survives. Even so, nearly 250,000 Eritreans are now living in neighboring countries, and another 8,500 live in Israel, which is over 1100 miles away. Many of the people who have fled are of military age, according to a UN Humanitarian News Agency report that estimated that between 1,200 and 1,500 people were fleeing the country each month. Living in a place as isolated and restrictive as Eritrea, along with the prospect of spending the period between your senior year of high school and your mid-to-late twenties in the military or national service is, for tens of thousands of people, less attractive than the dangers and indignities of fleeing the country. The U.N. expects it to continue that way: in their country assessments for Ethiopia and Sudan, UN High Commission for Refugees is budgeting for an additional 25,000 Eritrean refugees in 2013.

News of Abdu’s defection barely rises above a rumor at this point. Yet the incident offers a glimpse of some of the challenges that Eritrea’s opacity creates. “The fact that someone’s not in a meeting doesn’t say anything,” says Saleh Gadi, editor of the diasporas news site Awate, of Abdu’s absence. “Its a situation where people have to guess why somebody was not in a meeting. It just shows how closed the government is.” For a country with as crucial a strategic position as Eritrea, the fog has some very tangible dangers attached to it. It is a problem when a country with a military with over 200,000 personnel according to the International Institute for Strategic Studies, and a history of bellicosity towards its neighbors, is so difficult to read.

David Shinn, who served as the U.S. ambassador to Ethiopia during Bill Clinton’s second term, and during the late 90s war between Ethiopia and Eritrea, says that American diplomacy in the region was often hampered by both sides’ steadfast unwillingness to cede any ground to the other, and by the secretive nature of the decision-making process within each government. “Neither Isaias nor Meles nor the people around him thought that it was accurate to see balance in the situation because they thought they were 100% right and the other guy was 100% wrong, and therefore how could the U.S. possibly see any rightness in the position of the other country?” say Shinn. “It cut both ways, and it made life difficult for me, and for my colleague in Asmara.” The U.S. was able to repair its relationship with Ethiopia in the years after the flare-up. The same was not true of Eritrea, whose government only became more unpredictable, disruptive and isolated in the ensuing decade.

In the late 2000s, Affeworki provided arms to Al Shabaab, an Al Qaeda affiliate fighting the Ethiopian military in Somalia—a decision that resulted in U.N. sanctions that are still in place. Although Shinn notes that official anti-Ethiopian activity has dramatically decreased since the onset of sanctions and the death of Meles Zeanwi, two major Ethiopian insurgent groups, the Omoro Liberation Front and the Ogaden National Liberation Front, were allowed to maintain offices in Asmara in the years after the war. Afewerki's hostilities have hardly been limited to Ethiopia, and he has initiated acrimonious border disputes with both Yemen and Djibouti. "Over the years they've managed at one time or another to irritate all their neighbors," says Shinn. And because of the U.S.'s perceived favoritism towards Ethiopia, Afewerki has ensured that relations between his country and the U.S. have remained chilly—there's no U.S. ambassador in Asmara anymore, and Shinn says that high-level contacts are "non-existent."

Its possible that even one of the people most responsible for building Eritrea's system of opacity and total control—a situation that has raised the temperature of an already-unstable and strategically-vital region—has decided he's had enough. And he's hardly alone. Over the past year, everyone from high-ranking air force pilots to the flag-bearer at the London Olympics to nearly the entire national soccer team has defected. The defections might suggest that Afewerki's control is beginning to slip, or that even people close to his inner circle have lost faith in the system he's built in the 21 years since Eritrea gained its independence. But as Solomon notes, even something as important as the possible disappearance of someone of Abdu's stature can have the misleading effect of suggesting that the defection crisis is a recent development, or that things are significantly different now than they were in previous years. But, as the hundreds of thousands of young Eritreans refugees living throughout the Horn of Africa and the Middle East attest, nothing could be further from the truth.

"Ali Abdu's one person," she says. "It doesn't compare to the border, if you see the number of people in Ethiopia and Sudan, in refugee camps all along the borders of the country. This is a significant issue. So if you want to look at that, you can start speculating and saying the government has been weakening for a very long time. But it only grabs your attention or my attention, and only becomes news, when somebody big runs away." By Armin Rosen (December 20, 2012)

The Political Chess-Game To Tame The Woyanes'

OPINION: Well, well .. Why I'm I not surprised? Deki-Ere – its happening again. History is in the making. It is a brand new day in Eritrea; and it is a dawn of a new era in Ethiopian politics. In Addis deep from its inner core, the ground is shifting along its geological fault lines. And as a result of this massive underground tremor, a brand new landscape is emerging in the Ethiopian political terrain. While the wind-vane on top of the newly formed landscape is decisively pointing south, Mekele is mute; and for a good reason. The Woyane revolution as a Tigrean ethnic revolution is buried with Meles Zenawi. Yes – the dream of Greater Tigray, the dream of Tigrean dynasty, the dream of independent Tigray nation state…. are all gone. Meles the revolutionary, Meles the face of Woyane, Meles the pride of Tigray is buried in Addis wrapped-in Ethiopian flag. Yep, you heard me right, not in Tigrean flag but wrapped-in Ethiopian flag; not in Dedebit, not in Adwa, not in Mekele, not even in Tigray but in Shoa. The Tigrean safety net: Article Thirty Nine is null and void. The Tigreans have crossed the Rubicon. Now, it is safe to say, the Tigreans are Ethiopians.

Meles and the Woyane bigwigs in Addis have giving-up power and their Tigrean playing-card in exchange for political immunity. The phone call from Washington is not ringing in Woyane's office. The foreign-aid check is not coming in Woyane's name. The fork is on their back and the knife is on the hands of those who are signing their check. Any wrong move on their part would be fatal. And they know it. Lost in the midst of all the political wrangling are the people of Tigray. The people of Tigray are shocked by Meles's untimely death. The people of Tigray are confused. The people of Tigray are kept in the dark. The people of Tigray are duped. The people of Tigray are so overwhelmed by the whole thing they didn't even know how to react.

Heralding dawn of a new era - "There is no change in policy…." said Hailemariam Desalegn the new Ethiopian prime minster, referring to his country's 'no war no peace' policy towards Eritrea. But he was roaring from way, way…. way distant South. Eritreans could barely hear his Tuta, Zeraf, Geday roar from way up North. Of course Mr. Hailemariam is not the real man. How could he be the real man if he doesn't have the organizational infrastructure, a strong power base and a dominant personality to be one? He is just a placeholder. But for sure, he was roaring on behalf of the new powerful. Yes, on behalf of the soon to be advertised and marketed as "democratic" and "visionary leader/s" for the next ten to twenty years by their handlers. If you read between the lines, Mr. Hailemariam was not roaring to warn the PFDJ regime when he said "there won't be any change in policy towards Eritrea". Caught between a rock and hard place, he was just trying his best to juggle three giant iron-balls without having a bad throw that would end-up in mid-air-collision and eventually the unfortunate dropping of a ball on his foot. He is trying delicately, to lure the Woyane bosses to accept reality and live life as a second best, to assure the Tigrean people from panicking; and all these and more without stepping on the toes of the new-powerful. Quite a task, isn't it?

Through Hailemariam Desalegn and through every media outlet in Ethiopia, the deceptive new powerful and the cunning Woyane hardliners are busy spinning Ethiopian politics like never before. They are busy selling the Woyane revolution as an Ethiopian revolution. They are selling Meles the Woyanay, as an Ethiopian hero who fought to liberate all Ethiopians from tyranny, poverty and backwardness. They are professing their love, respect, and admiration for Meles the “great visionary leader”.

They are promising their fellow Ethiopians that they will follow his programs, his vision and his policies. They are showing sound-bites from Meles's speech 24/7 to assure his base. They are selling Meles as an Ethiopian hero and as a black African icon who changed the politics of his nation and the politics of the African continent. And mark my words – soon, they will lobby to erect a statue of Meles, a thousand times his actual size in front of the African Union Hall.

Now, pause and ponder for a moment and ask: who are the new folks (winners) that are wailing and grieving after Meles's death? Who are the new folks that are calling the chief Woyanay their hero? Who are the new folks who are idolizing the Revolution he led? Who are the new folks that are claiming to revere his leadership and his decisions including his signature decision to let Eritrea go? And ask yourself, out of all these years why now? And the answer is crystal clear. Or let me put it this way: in politics when people who have nothing but utter disdain for you, start saying nice things about you, you are beaten badly. They are way ahead of you in the game. You're not threat to them anymore. Simply put, all the crocodile tears, all the political charade and all the daily dramas by the new bleeding hearts is not intended to express deep love and admiration for Meles the Woyanay; but to send a clear message to the Woyane-Dinosaurs. And this is the message for the Woyane-Dinosaurs: for sure a strong new captain is coming; but let it be clear to all, we all are in the same boat; we all are Ethiopians; don't even think about doing something foolish; you will have prominent position in future governments provided, you remain loyal to the union. And the move by the Woyane-dinosaurs is very predictable. There is no way in hell they will dare swim against the tide. The question is not whether they will relinquish power, but how difficult would they make the inevitable to get the best bargain in exchanging for giving-up power. Well, folks, there is a lot to chew-on, on these arguments. To make sense of it all let me explain: Why it is a brand new day in Eritrea? B. Why Ethiopian politics has changed forever C. What Abyssinian war-culture is and the genesis of it D. How the Woyanes lost their grip on power and who the presumed winners are and much, much more would be the argument of this article. Let's roll:

Why is it a brand new day in Eritrea? For starters, the wind-direction has changed. The dark clouds that were looming on the horizon are moving farther south leaving the Eritrean-blue-skies clear-off the "no war no peace" Meles policy. It is time for us Eritreans to realize the change in moment, and shift gears to lower the political temperature at the ground level. Today, there is no Woyane-dream of Greater Tigray. Today there are no vindictive-Woyane leaders at the helm who are hell-bent to, humiliate Eritrea and achieve 'regime change' to have it their way. Today there are only Tigrean-Ethiopians who do not benefit from the hostility between Eritrea and Ethiopia. Their political influence and their economic prosperity – is as strong as their relation with us; and our prosperity and our political clout on their policy makers is as strong as our relation with them. If handled and nurtured right, this special relation could serve as a solid foundation to achieve higher order of economic integration for the two people and beyond. Mind you: I don't have any illusion about the pitfalls, landmines and bumpy-ride when you dealing with Addis policy makers. I don't have any illusion, if there is going to be any full-fledged military threat to Eritrea, it is going to come only from one direction: South. I don't have any illusion aggression is in the blood of Addis policy makers. But it won't happen any time soon. The "no war no peace" policy that was echoed by Hailemariam Desalegn is not real. It is a rhetoric intended for domestic consumption. For those with a curious mind, and are eager to challenge – out of a million, here are few reasons why the new Ethiopian leaders won't be interested on Woyane-style political/diplomatic/military offensive; at least for quite a while.

Reason #1. The 'No war no peace' policy doesn't serve any purpose. Ask yourself, what is the objective of the "no war no peace" policy? Is it to reverse Eritrean sovereignty? Is it to bring the two people closer? Is it to punish us Eritreans until we crawl on our knees and beg Ethiopians for forgiveness? Is it for us Eritreans to love Ethiopians more? Is it to see Eritrea fail as a viable state? And for how long are the Addis policy makers going to keep this policy to achieve the desired objective – a year, five years, fifty years, for life…. for how long? In all honesty, not only the "no war no peace" policy is not a winning strategy, but also it hurts more to landlocked Ethiopia than it does to Eritrea. If the argument for it is, Eritrea is going to lose millions of dollars in revenue from transit fees, port fees and trade – it could also be argued, Eritrea could get a dollar for every penny it lost, from the Anti-Ethiopia Arab Region in trade, investment, grants, loans, aid and subsidies. Ethiopian hardliners might wish, hope, pray and do everything in their power to see Eritrea fail; but that has been proven futile. The policy that never worked for a decade and half isn't going to produce any different result now. Therefore, if there is no rational reason to pursue a hostile policy, then why would Addis policy makers keep wasting time, energy, resources, and human life for something that is proven to fail – hoping to achieve, something they sure could achieve for free? Well, beats me. Listen: no matter how you slice it, aggression won't do the job; love will.

Reason #2. The political maneuvering in Addis is going take years until a dominant leader emerges. And until a strong leader emerges, it is safe to assume Ethiopia will not flex its muscle towards Eritrea; and without military muscle, the 'no war no peace' policy is meaningless. Of course the Woyane hardliners would love to have some kind of military conflict with Eritrea, so they can keep their hold on power under the guise, 'protecting the nation from foreign threat'. But that is not going to happen. In order to derail the transfer of power, the Woyanes hardliners have to start an all-out war. But the West is not going to fund their war adventure; and Ethiopia doesn't have the power and resources to wage an open-ended all-out war with no exit-date in sight. Therefore, since they are incapable of changing Eritrean policy or its government militarily, I don’t see any wisdom, having confrontation with their northern neighbor. If you think about it, they have a lot of other fighting to do – poverty, religious ethnic regional and political issues, active wars to their East, to their South, and probably soon to their West due to their Renaissance Project. No doubt Addis regimes are known for their aggressive and reckless behavior, but they are not going to open another war-front to their north anytime soon.

Reason #3. Peace between Eritrea and Ethiopia is inversely-related to the distance between Asmara and the dominant ethnic in Addis. The further the dominant Ethiopian-ethnic from Asmara the more likely there will be peace between Eritrea and Ethiopia. That being said, it is a sure thing the next prime minster of Ethiopia is going to be: non Tigrean, end-result oriented prime minster with a dominant personality. No offence to Mr. Hailemariam Desalegn but Mr. Hailemariam is too nice and too submissive to be that guy. And for us Eritreans, no non-Tigrean Ethiopian leader would ever bully Eritrea the way the Woyanes did; never. I believe the next prime minster is going to be different; and I believe the next prime minster will negotiate with Eritrea in good faith to resolve the Ethio-Eritrean problem. Remember: Ethiopian hardliners, even if all are hardliners – the non-Woyane hardliners are different from the Woyane hardliners. The reason: the Woyane hardliners had the burden to prove to the nervous Amaras and to the rest (a) that they were committed Ethiopians under Ethiopian flag; (b) that they were not working for Eritreas and didn't had any tender-heart for Eritreans (c) that they were Ethiopians who would bring Eritrea to its knee to protect Ethiopian interest if need be. But the next prime minster doesn't have that burden. The only burden the next prime minster will have is the burden to prove to Eritreans that, Ethiopia is not Eritrea's enemy; and it doesn't have any intention to harm the Eritrean people or to compromise their sovereign territory in any shape of form. If the next Ethiopian prime minster could successfully communicate this with the Eritrean people both in words and in-deed, then all the prime minster has to do is visit any place in Eritrea, and before he/she knows it, cheering crowd would line-up for miles to greet him/her with flowers and colorful dances. Again, I truly believe the next Ethiopian prime minster is going to be a good friend of Eritrea. And he/she better be. Because Addis policy makers can't afford to have two unhappy "Tigrewoch" to their north chatting with the Arabs. I don't think it went well, when the Amaras tried it last time. But hey, that's my opinion.

Reason #4. The "no war no peace" policy hurts Ethiopians more than it does to Eritreans. For a decade and half, the 'no war no peace' Meles policy has been punishing mostly Tigreans more than it did to Eritreans. The only reason the Tigreans put-up with this nonsense was (a) out of respect for Meles; because Meles was their son who restored their pride and dignity as a people (b) because they were getting the lion's share of the Ethiopian development aid – at least some people want us to believe that – but even if that is true, handouts don’t lead to prosperity but to poverty and dependency. And with the ‘no war no peace’ policy in place, the economic life of Tigreans is not going to improve. Now that power is shifting south, the Tigreans are going to fight hard for their best interest.

And this is the reality: Not only the economic life of Tigreans, but the economic life of the entire people in Northern Ethiopia is not going to improve by trading with Djibouti, Somalia, Kenya, Uganda or South Sudan. People of Northern Ethiopia are going to prosper only when Gondar, Metemma and Humera are busy 24/7 trading with Gedaref, Um-Hajer and Tesseney – towns in Adiabo are busy 24/7 trading with Shambko, Barentu and Kessala – Axum and Adwa are busy 24/7 trading with Mendefera, Adi-Quala and Tserona – Zalambessa and Adi-Ghirat are busy 24/7 trading with SenAfe and Adi-Kheih – and when Mekele and Dessie are busy 24/7 trading with Tio, Assab and Djibouti. "No war no peace" will not improve the economic-life of Northern Ethiopians; cross-border trading with Eritrea and Sudan, and the multiple-effect of the cross-border trading in the northern regions would. I don't think Addis policy makers would dismiss this reality to pursue their old rotten policy. But if Addis policy makers are still in love with their 'no war no peace' policy to punish Eritreans, if Addis policy makers believe their policy will improve the economic life of their people while Eritreans are living a life of hopelessness, poverty and destitution, they are dead wrong. Their people are getting punished by their nonsense policy more than the people of Eritrea. All things being equal, always, life for an average Eritrean will be a lot easier than life for an average Ethiopian of a landlocked country. And I don't think you want me to waste your time explaining the obvious.

Why dawn of a new era in Ethiopian politics? This is a watershed moment in Ethiopian politics and there is no question about it. It is so, simply because the recent transfer of power in Addis defied the traditional Abyssinian-way transfer of power. The question and concern that is in every one's mind is: will this positive trend continue to replace the old Abyssinian war-culture? Of course time will tell, but the recent transfer of power in Ethiopia – negotiated behind closed doors, was such unprecedented event in Ethiopian history – not only it made us all Ethiopians, Eritreans and Africans proud, but also it gave us hope. Yes, it is far from being transparent; yes it is far from being democratic; but still, changing government using political immunity as a catalyst for peaceful transfer of power is unprecedented in Ethiopian politics and something we all envy in a positive way. No doubt, from the control of information during Meles's last hours to the selection of Hailemariam Desalegn and Demeke Mecconen, the whole process has Western fingerprints all over it. But this time, Western powers did the right thing. They showed to the world and to the Region, Ethiopia is their trusted ally. And we all commend that. I hope Western powers use their power and influence to walk us through peaceful transfer of power, not only for us Eritreans but also to all nations in the Horn, all countries in Africa and beyond.

Deki-Ere, there is something that I can't stress enough – the secret for prosperous, peaceful and democratic Eritrea is continuous improvement while our Eritrea is anchored on a stable ground. And the secret for anchoring

Eritrea on a stable ground is, mastering the art of changing government using political immunity as a catalyst for peaceful transfer of power. Our ability to build peaceful, stable, prosperous and democratic Eritrea is predicated on our ability and our willingness to accept and to allow our current and past political leaders and their family, to live in the country they love and cherish the most, freely with their life, pride and dignity fully protected. And that includes Isaias Afwerki, his ailing and aging Generals and bureaucrats, and all their families. If our past and present leaders and their families are not free to live freely with pride and dignity in the country they served all their life, no one is free. The rational for political immunity is very simple: PFDJ or not PFDJ – all our past and present political leaders are imperfect. And no imperfect leader in his right mind would hand you his gun knowing full well, he will be shot in the head with his own gun. Very straight forward; isn't it? Now back to our main argument.

To appreciate the Western brokered peaceful transfer of power in Addis, and to stress its significance to the people of Ethiopia and to the people of the Horn region, it is very important to understand the direct relationship between the Abyssinian war-culture and the human catastrophe that defined the Horn region at least for the past half century. Without going into detail history of the whole Horn Region misery, just for now, let's focus on Ethiopia and see how dreadful the Abyssinian war-culture has been to all Abyssinian peasant communities.

The scars of the Abyssinian war-culture: The primary victims of the Abyssinian war-culture were and still are the Abyssinian peasant communities. And there is no better proof than seeing rich Ethiopia reduced to being synonymous with famine and hunger. And the story of hunger and famine in rich Abyssinia is not a story of four or five decades, but a story that has devastated the Abyssinian-peasant communities for centuries. I understand draught in some regions of Abyssinia was and still is a fact of life. I understand drought brings crop failure and crop failure brings food shortage and price-hike. But food shortage and price-hike doesn't have to lead into famine and starvation. Food shortage and price-hike are problems that could be easily managed by subsidies and market adjustments. Famine is manmade. Famine is a manifestation of government failure. Famine is a product of misguided policies and misplaced priorities. Meaning – war over peace, beating war-drums over cutting deals at roundtable, investing on war machine over investing on infrastructure, farming and manufacturing machines; obsession with military hardware and military might over education and economic might….

Hurrah, the Abyssinian war-culture of Tuta, Zeraf, Geday…that devastated the Abyssinian peasant communities and the Horn Region for centuries, is no more. At least I want to believe that; and I hope that is the case; because the old war-culture is a dead end road. Let me make my point very clear: there is something the Amara and Tigrean hardliners need to understand. The Abyssinian war-culture is unsustainable in today's Ethiopia. The Amara and Tigrayan elite can't maintain their war-addiction on a fast changing and fast-populating Ethiopia. One can't be a gambler, extravagant, drunkard, lavish…..and, a good husband and a good father of a dozen children all at the same time. Or simply put, it is impossible for Ethiopia to keep its ethnic based marriage and satisfy the Amara-Tigrean elite selfish war-addiction all at the same time. Today, the Amara and Tigrean elite have two hard choices in front of them: to enjoy their Menelik's Ethiopia, or to satisfy their tuta, zeraf, geday….war-addiction.

And for sure they can't have them both. Therefore, since they can't have both choices simultaneously, the prudent choice couldn't be any clearer. That's why I believe it is dawn of a new era in Ethiopian politics, and that's why I believe it is a brand new day in Eritrea and the whole Horn region; because every famine, ever hunger, every blood and every misery in the Horn Region (Eritrea, Ethiopia and Somalia) is directly related to or harbored by the Abyssinian war-culture.

The genesis of the Abyssinian war-culture: As absurd as it sounds, the whole history of Abyssinia is a history of two elites: the Amhara and the Tigrean elite. The rest "don't have history". To make matters even worse, the history of the Amhara and Tigrayan elites is a history of rivalry, war, betrayal, backstabbing and conspiring with foreign powers against each other with one ultimate objective in mind: the crown of King of Kings. To defend the crown or to win the crown (depending on their status), always the Amhara and the Tigrean elites were, either preparing for a war or they were fighting a war. Of course the war was not always Amara vs Tigray; at times it was intra-ethnic-war vying for supremacy, and other times it was war against their neighboring communities; but still war. Due to this constant-war and constant preparation for war attitude, the Abyssinian culture become a culture of violence and a culture of a warrior – always Tuta, Zeraf, Geday….., all at the detriment of their peasant communities.
The crown of king of kings being the ultimate prize, for centuries the Abyssinia crown (power) was won through:

Bloody war
B. Conspiracy with foreign powers and

C. Unbearable suffering of the Abyssinian peasant communities

And this is the reason why:

To defeat their rival in a battlefield they had to out-man and out-gun their rival.

B. To out-man their rival in a battlefield, they had to recruit a large army of warriors; and to feed and shelter their large army of warriors literally they had to tax their people to the brink of starvation.

C. And to out-gun their rival they have to conspire with foreign powers against each other in exchange for arms.

That is a fact. Case in point: the Tigrean Yohaness IV, not only he conspired against Tewodros with the British but also he cooperated with the British in defeating Tewodros in exchange for arms. King Tewodros died fighting the British, and Youhaness IV became the king of kings of Abyssinia. Then the Shoan Menelik II conspired with the Italians against the Tigrean Yohaness IV in exchange for arms. Fighting two fronts: the Italians in the north and the Mahdi army in the west, Yohaness IV died fighting the Mahdi army at Metemma. Immediately after the death of king Yohaness IV, Menelik signed a treaty with the Italians without firing a single shot to defend members of his ethnic rival (people of Midri-Bahri or Mereb-Mlash). And Menelik's treaty with the Italians sealed the deal for an Italian Primogenito north of the Mereb River (Eritrea). Since the creation of Eritrea north of the Mereb River, a third of their kin on the other side, the Tigreans south of the Mereb River became so weak they never challenged the Amaras in a meaningful way. Just once, in 1898 king Yohaness IV son (Mengesha) challenged Menelik but he was no match for Menelik. Heavily armed by the British and French to fight the Italians, King Menelik II was too powerful for Mengesha.

Then in 1935, long after King Menelik's death, the Amara rule was interrupted for a brief period of time by the Italian occupation of Ethiopia. But after the defeat of Italy at WWII, to the Amaras luck, the Allies installed an Amara lackey (Hailesselassie I) as the king of kings of Ethiopia. As a result, the Amara rule became a dynasty that lasted for well-over hundred years. Well, with no one challenging their dynasty, and armed to the teeth, thanks to the Cold-War world geo-politics, the Amara-elite became so powerful and so arrogant, they thought no language, no culture, no ethnic…. was as good as theirs. They even started telling themselves and to the rest of the world that they were chosen by God to lead the people of Ethiopia.

Unfortunate to the people of the Horn-Region, it wasn't only the Amara dynasty that remained undisputed for well over a century, but also the Abyssinian war-culture as well. Just in the past fifty years alone, due to the combination of Abyssinian war-culture and the availability of sophisticated weapons in the hands of the Amara-Tigrean regimes in Addis – the number of refugees and displaced people, the scope and magnitude of famine and starvation, the level of death and destruction, the pain and suffering of the Horn people has remained unparalleled both in terms of duration and severity to any suffering in recent memory. Of course the Amara and Tigrean hardliners would blame it on their victims; or they would say 'we were doing it to our people too'. But such excuses could neither justify their barbaric act nor would it give any comfort to their victims.

Due to the Abyssinian war-culture, for the past fifty years, the story of the Horn people in world press has been a story of war, refugees, disease, famine and starvation. To this day, the scares of the brutality of king Hailesselassie, the Derg and the Woyanes are still visible and palpable on the people of the Horn region. In 1974, due to his brutality and misplaced priorities, Hailesselassie's rule was ended by popular uprising followed by a military coup d’état. And during his last hours, the emperor’s four-decade reign was defined by the famine of Wollo. Then the military junta that ousted the emperor and accused him of brutality and misplaced priorities, themselves started their first day of business by killing violently the Emperor, his parliament, his ministers and his Generals on the spot without having their day in court. Exactly like the emperor they ousted, the Derg unleashed their barbaric act of violence and terror towards the people of Eritrea, Ethiopia and Somalia; only this time around, it was a thousand fold compared to what the Horn Region has witnessed in its entire history. Well, finally, history repeated itself, again. During the last hours of emperor Hailessellassie, Ethiopians and the whole world was shocked by the news and images of the famine in Wollo. Again, a decade and half after the horrifying images of the famine in Wollo, the Derg chapters were closed with the videos and images of famine from Korem and with the song 'We Are the World' .(album that contained USA for Africa's "We Are the World" superstar charity recording for famine relief efforts in Ethiopia). Then, after the demise of the Derg, the Tigreans came only to do the exact same thing, what the Amaras were doing for a century. That is the legacy of the Abyssinian war-culture. And that is the cold truth. Now let's see how the Tigreans came into the picture.

How the Tigreans came at the helm? During the century long successive Amara rule, unable to challenge the Amaras, the Tigreans south of the Mereb River were ended-up being the poorest of the poor. Under the Amaras, the Tigreans were denied economic and educational opportunities; their ethnic, their land, their language and their culture was ridiculed; and their region was systematically reduced into a tiny barren region. Then something unexpected happened. The Amara dynasty was challenged in a fundamental way. But this time, the Amaras were not challenged by their traditional Tigrean rivals but by people they never imagined even in their wildest dreams: the Eritrean Muslims. The Eritrean Muslims who lost everything in the Ethio-Eritrean federal arrangement knocked the doors of the Arab region for support; and they got positive response. Sovereign Eritrea as their ultimate objective, Eritrean Muslims defied the Amara rule by organizing an armed insurgency. Soon Eritrean ethnic Tigrignas joined their Muslim brothers. Then a decade and half later the Tigreas south of the Mereb River joined the fray. With a positive gesture from the West, material support from the Arab region and a lot of sacrifice from both sides of the Mereb River, finally in 1991, Eritreans and Tigreans fought side by side all the way to Addis, and put an end to the century old Amhara dynasty.

Then, with a warm handshake, Eritreans and Tigreans departed their separate ways. Eritreans headed home to chart their destiny and started minding their own business. But the Tigreans had different plan. Though very reluctantly, they decided to be Ethiopians for a little while and stayed in Addis to govern. While governing in Addis, the Tigrayans wanted their hard earned victory to mark the beginning of a long Tigrean dynasty. And if things don't work-out as planned, which sometimes things do, the Tigreans had back-up plans and safety devices put-in place that would assure them safe exit from Ethiopia: Article Thirty Nine. And with all their wisdom, safety devices, and backup plans, they thought they had it all figured-out; but, boy were they wrong.

When did the Tigreans get it wrong? And who is on the spotlight soon to shine? Well, using logical deduction, I don't think it is that complicated to figure-out who is about to shine on the spot light soon. Look: Ethiopia is a trusted Western ally. And it is trusted Western ally simply because of the loyalty of two ethnic elites: the Amara and the Tigrean elites. Therefore, if the Tigrean elites are booted-out, who else could possibly be shinning on the spot-light but the Amara elite stupid! Yes; the Amaras did it again. Thanks to the Western power-brokers, they did it and they did it with-class: behind closed doors. Of course the Amaras have still to tie few loose ends here and there in the coming few years, but make no mistake – Tigreans as their junior partners, the Amara-show is set in place for 2015. And that begs the question: where did the Tigrayans get it wrong? What happened to their safety devices and back-up plans?

Again, let's use deductive reasoning to figure-out why and how power slipped from the hands of the Tigrean hardliners. And, let's build our case from this premise. Fact: it is safe to say long before Meles's death, Western powers had full knowledge about Meles's deteriorating health. Now, using this premise as our base, it is safe to say, Western powers will not sit idle while their man is dying. Therefore, we can say with absolute confidence, the plan for Meles's successor was set in motion while Meles was alive, and with full consent of Meles himself – of course with full counseling (pressure from behind closed door) from the West. Again, knowing full well Meles's deteriorating health Western powers could have allowed Meles to groom a Tigrean successor. And with all the Tigrean political, security, and military infrastructure – selecting a Tigrean successor would have been a lot easier. But Meles didn't groom a Tigrean successor. And the reason could only be either Meles-the-Tigrean didn't want a Tigrean successor or the West didn't allow him to do so. I'll take the later. Therefore, the nomination of the two None-Radioactive top men: Hailemariam Desalegn and his deputy Demeke Mecconen (later) could only be intended for purposes of smooth transition of power without anybody being threatened. Meaning neither Hailemariam Desalegn nor Demeke Mecconnen will be the next prime minster of Ethiopia.

After Meles's death, as expected, there was power struggle between the Amara and Tigrean elite. And this is the possible reason for the power struggle. When it comes to the severity and deadliness of Meles's disease, it was kept so secret almost all of the top Tigrean leaders in Addis were not in the loop. Had the Tigrean hardliners been well informed about Meles's health, they would have replaced him in no time. But instead, they were shocked like everybody else by the untimely death of Meles. After Meles's death was conformed, part of the power struggle became winning Western support. On the domestic front, the Tigrean hardliners could have prevailed at least this time around. If push comes to shove, they could have used or threatened to use the safety-device they put in place: Article Thirty-Nine. But the Tigrean bigwigs in Addis had a problem. They didn't have any leverage that would work in their favor to prevail. And let me explain why:

When the Tigreans entered Addis, they promised themselves that they will not be another Amaras. But after they stayed in Addis for a while they changed their political calculus. Not only they became another Amaras but they even became worse. To see – crushing defeat of Eritrean defense forces, failing Eritrea as a viable nation, and to humiliate Eritrea at IGAD, AU, UN and SC became their obsession. War and the threat of war to the North and to the East became their regional policy. Harsh ethnic and political suppression became their internal governing policy. A simple domestic insurgency for ethnic and regional rights was conveniently labeled war on Islamic Fundamentalism, just because the smell of Western-bacon on the table was too much to resist. They thought, if they successfully manage to have Western powers on their side, using their power and their access to Western powers as a fighting tool, they could vilify and crash anyone who stood in their way. They thought if they stood by the side of Western powers, other countries in the region didn't matter. Based on that assumption they put all their eggs in one basket (the West). They betrayed every friend they had; and they destroyed every bridge they came across during their two decade-rule. Today, they are no friends of Ethiopian ethnics; they are no friends of Eritreans; they are no friends of Somalis; and they are no friends of the Arab region. A small minority (6%) in a nation of ninety million, with no friends and no strong alliances inside or outside Ethiopia to use as a bargaining-chip, the Tigreans didn't had a persuasive argument to have another Tigrean as a successor to Meles. The only argument they had to the Western power-brokers was their good-resume (their loyalty to the West). Regrettably, that didn't save the day. And this is the most plausible reason:

In all this power brokering business, Western Powers were not just honest power-brokers, but also stakeholders at the outcome of it all. Why stakeholders? Ethiopia is the only powerful and trusted ally they have in the volatile Red Sea/Horn Region. They have a lot of regional projects lined up for it. Make no mistake: Western Powers are not interested, and they are not in the business of laying the ground-work for checks and balances, divided government, messy democracy and political gridlock in black Ethiopia. Western Powers are not fishing for Jeffersonian democrats in Addis. Only an idiot would believe Western Powers are in the business of spreading democracy in black Africa. Only a stupid would believe Meles was praised by Western powers because he was smart, shrewd, seasoned politician who knew how to play the game. No, no, no – absolutely not. Having a brain is not a requirement to be liked by the West. In fact having a brain is detrimental to one's nation and self; unless of course one wants us to believe, 'one's country is better served when its leaders are serving Western interest'. To cut to the chase – today, what Western powers are looking in Ethiopia is a charismatic, easy to sell, very reliable corrupted leader (dictator) who can execute regional policies with a single phone-call from Washington. Yes, exactly like Meles; but not Tigrean. Therefore, when Western power-brokers were busy brokering in Addis, not only they didn't want chaos and fragmentation to ensue in Ethiopia, but also, they didn't want another strong but hard to sell Woyanay to be the top man. Not that the Woyanes didn't serve them well, but because they know full well, the Ethiopian public doesn't have the stomach to take another decade of Woyane rule.

Think about it: if the Western power-brokers allow another strong Tigrean to govern Ethiopia for the next decade against the will of the Ethiopian people, it is a no brainer, an Arab Spring type public uprising against the Western-pampered government would take place in Ethiopia; and that would affect Western interest in a negative way. And the Western power-brokers don't want that. Again, if the Western power-brokers allow the Tigreans to have Hailemariam Desalegn type submissive prime minster so the Tigreans can govern Ethiopia from behind, then the central government in Addis will be so weak, Ethiopian ethnic-regions would demand more ethnic-autonomy and some might even demand as far as ethnic-succession. With a weak central government, not only Ethiopian unity would be in jeopardy but also, Ethiopia's regional power and influence would diminish as a result. And Ethiopia that is incapable of being the neighborhood Police-Chief is unacceptable to the West. Therefore, with no good option to choose from, Western power-brokers didn't have any other choice but to do the obvious: pressure the Woyane bigwigs to relinquish power. And the Tigrean bigwigs didn't have any other choice but to yield to the pressure applied on them by the Western power-brokers. Because the Tigreans know all too well, they could neither rule Ethiopia nor divorce from it without having Western blessing. Therefore, in order everyone to win some and loose some, Western power-brokers struck the right balance. They guaranteed the Tigrean bureaucrats and the Tigrean Generals, immunity from prosecution and secured place in future Ethiopia. And the Tigrean bigwigs agreed to give-up power and to co-operate in the process of peaceful transfer of power in the coming years. Today, the Tigreans are not fighting for the top job; because they know full well they are not going to get it. The Tigrayans are just causing all kinds of mischief to maximize their share of the pie in the coming coalition government that would be dominated by Amhara and Tigrean heavyweights.

Final Note: Make no mistake – there is no looming threat for Tigreans from the Amaras or anyone else for that matter. The Tigreans have changed Ethiopia forever. Ethiopia is not and will not be your grandfather's Ethiopia. The Amaras will never be the old Amaras again. The Tigreans will never be the Tigreans under Hailesellassie and Derg era again. The Tigreans will always be strong in future Ethiopian governments; not because of their numerical ratio to the whole, but due to the potential-power acquired due to their geographical position (proximity and relation to Eritreans) and due to the strong need for Tigrayans, by the Amaras. The 27% Amaras are nothing without the Tigreans. The Amaras are too small and too weak to herd ninety million Ethiopians. Ethiopia is changing so much and so fast, even with the Amhara-Tigrean partnership, Amhara-Tigrean domination in a fast changing Ethiopia is just a pipedream. awate.com, by Semere Tesfai

Eritrea: Domestic Villain, Regional Scapegoat'

Article by James Schneider, Lucy James - (August 31, 2012) Eritrea is a human rights nightmare. International action may be making it worse. "I still very much love my country, but its the harsh conditions and lack of basic human rights which has compelled me to seek asylum", said Weynay Ghebresilasie, Eritrea's flag-bearer at the 2012 Olympic Games and one of the four Eritrean athletes now claiming asylum in the UK. For a decade, Eritrean authorities have arrested citizens seen to be a political threat to the regime, and the country's four Olympic defectors are amongst a reported 14,000 Eritrean refugees seeking asylum from President Isaias Afewerki's rule. Following the end of the border war between Eritrea and Ethiopia in 2000, human rights have been eroded in the country. Dozens have been arbitrarily detained and held for years without charge, it is reported that torture in detention is widespread, and its press is the most censored in the world, according to the Committee to Protect Journalists (CPJ). Just yesterday, Reporters Without Borders (RWB) announced that 4 Eritrean journalists had died in prison after suffering ill treatment. The government in Eritrea has come under pressure from activists, the African Union and the broader international community to release political prisoners and improve human rights. However, these calls are being undermined by one-sided criticism of Eritrea's role as a regional actor which weaken human rights critiques and may even contribute to the worsening of domestic abuses.

Eritrean abuses: In 2001, 15 members of the ruling party – including high-level ministers – signed an open letter to Isaias calling for political reform. Shortly after, 11 of the 15 (known as G-15) were arrested and detained without charge along with 10 journalists. Nearly 11 years later, little is known about the prisoners' condition or whereabouts save for some unconfirmed accounts from those who have managed to flee the country. A defector who claimed to be a former prison guard reported in 2010 that at least 7 of the 21 political prisoners had died due to lack of medical care, high temperatures and insufficient food rations. In his account, he talked of the harsh conditions in Eritrea's secret prisons, where shackled inmates are often kept in solitary cells and subject to regular bouts of torture and molestation. Despite appeals to the Eritrean government for the release of the political prisoners by the European Union, the country being described as "a giant prison" by Human Rights Watch (HRW), and last month's report by the UN Human Rights Council, Isaias denies knowledge of their existence and has ignored proceedings brought against Eritrea by groups such as the African Commission on Human and Peoples' Rights and the UN Working Group on Arbitrary Detention. Sadly, this case is just one example of the state of affairs in Eritrea where the ruling party, ironically named the People's Front for Democracy and Justice (PFDJ), has clamped down on freedom of expression over the past decade. Estimations have suggested that there are now between 5,000-10,000 people languishing in Eritrea's prisons for political reasons. Since 2001, scores of government officials, journalists and businessmen have been jailed allegedly for criticising governmental policy, for practicing "unregistered" religions and even for listening to Ethiopian music. Although the 1997 constitution includes articles confirming the 'Fundamental Rights, Freedoms and Duties' for its people, these have not been implemented and Isaias's power remains unconstrained. As neither a functioning legislature nor independent judicial body are in place to formally charge those who are detained, many Eritreans are imprisoned indefinitely without trial or sentence. Furthermore, a September 2011 report by HRW highlighted forced labour, religious persecution, restrictions on the freedom of movement, and abuses within the system of National Service. Under the guidelines of the National Service it is obligatory for 18-year-olds to complete 18 months of training and service in the armed forces. However, national service stints are often extended indefinitely, with some serving for a decade before demobilisation – three of Olympian Ghebresilasie's brothers are still in the military. It is alleged that many spend their time as forced labour for the commercial enterprises and farms owned by the PDFJ, and that sexual abuse of female recruits is widespread. Those trying to evade or abscond from National Service are rounded up, beaten and sometimes killed by the authorities.

Accusations and attacks: Eritrea is nestled along the Red Sea in the troubled Horn of Africa region. Despite the many violent crimes, both domestic and regional, committed by state and non-state actors in the region, Eritrea has been singled out for pariah status by the international community. Eritrea has, for example, been accused of providing weaponry, supplies and financial support to Somalia's militant Islamist group al-Shabaab, for which, in 2009, the UN Security Council imposed sanctions on the regime. Asmara rejected the claims and some independent analysts criticised the UN Monitoring Group, which provided the basis for sanctions, as biased and politicised and based on Ethiopian-gathered evidence. One example of bias given is the Monitoring Group's criticism of Eritrea taxing Eritrean citizens who live overseas, a practice also carried out by the US government on American citizens abroad. There has also been speculation regarding Eritrea's possible involvement a plot to bomb the July 2011 summit of the African Union in Addis Ababa. The plot was allegedly carried out by the Oromo Liberation Front (OLF), a banned separatist group operating in Ethiopia. Eritrea does have historic links to the OLF and other Ethiopian opposition groups as allies during the 1998-2000 Ethiopian-Eritrean border war. However, previous ties do not mean Eritrea planned the attack on around 30 African heads of state and most of the evidence gathered linking Asmara to the foiled attack comes from Ethiopian security forces hostile to Eritrea. Furthermore, the Ethiopian government may have a history of inventing bomb attacks and blaming the Oromo separatists and Eritrea. A US embassy cable, released by wikileaks, from September 2006 suggests that another supposedly failed terrorist attack in Addis Ababa, which was blamed on OLF and Eritrea, may in fact have been carried out by Ethiopian security forces. The Eritrean government are also accused of having trained and funded the Afar Revolutionary Democratic Unity Front (ARDUF) militants who carried out attacks in northern Ethiopia at the start of this year, although no evidence has been presented directly linking Asmara to the killings and the ARDUF have a history of attacks on foreigners and hostility towards both Addis Ababa and Asmara.

A paranoid president? To explain many of Eritrea's supposed regional crimes, the international community often points towards the paranoia of Isaias and the PFDJ elite. For example, the UN report into the foiled 2011 Addis Ababa bomb plot referred to Eritrea as "no longer proportional or rational" in its actions. Whilst this may seem patronising, there may be some truth in these claims as Isaias has demonstrated some paranoid tendencies. In a 2009 interview with Reuters, for instance, the Eritrean president said "It is not a question of human rights, religious rights. It is part of a fight, of a powerful opposition, and this powerful opposition has not succeeded in achieving anything," in response to criticisms of Eritrea's domestic rights situation. It is clear that Isaias may view criticism of domestic and regional policies as a conspiracy against Eritrea. And he would have some evidence to support this view. Besides the at least partially unfair casting of Eritrea as a pariah, Eritrea continues to be accused of being the destabilising factor in relations with Ethiopia despite it being Addis Ababa not Asmara that rejected the post-war Independent Boundary Commission judgement, which ruled in Eritrea's favour. Indeed, international actors expressly link their criticisms of domestic and regional policy. HRW, for example, attacked Isaias' visit to the UN in New York at which he criticised the UN Monitoring Group on Somalia and Eritrea and the UN Security Council, arguing that "Isaias complains that the council had not given Eritrea an opportunity to refute the evidence against it and to receive a fair hearing. He has not accorded such rights to the people of Eritrea for the past 10 years". The partially unfair criticisms of Eritrea regionally and the linking of these criticisms to those on domestic rights abuses could lead to further clampdown on dissent from an increasingly worried regime and certainly leads to Eritrea not taking HRW, certain organs of the UN, Reporters Without Borders, the Committee to Protect Journalists, and other international entities' calls for improved domestic human rights seriously. And you can see why. In its report recommendations, HRW appeals to Eritrea's "foreign partners" to work towards apprehending and investigating officials suspected of torture and other crimes, as well as continuing to press Eritrea to allow independent monitors and commissioners into the country's detention facilities. These are the same "foreign partners" that Eritrea believes take Ethiopia's side in their disputes and unjustly vilify the Red Sea state.

Focus on the domestic: When international bodies have focused solely on Eritrea's domestic policies, they have had some, although still limited, success in improving human rights in the country. For example, in March 2010, Eritrea agreed to comply with the Convention against Torture as well as to improve human rights practices by agreeing to half of the recommendations made by the UN Human Rights Council in November 2009. Moreover, now may be the ideal moment to decouple critiques of regional and domestic policies. It appears that the Eritrean government is on a charm offensive to improve relations with the African Union and re-enter the regional body the Intergovernmental Authority on Development (IGAD). And international actors concerned with stability in Somalia may recognise that engagement with Eritrea could be crucial as the African Union force seeks to mount an assault on the port city of Kismayo and Somalia exits its long drawn out phase of transitional government. Ending Eritrea's regional pariah status could provide an opportunity for the international community to focus primarily on its domestic policies, using reintegration of Eritrea into the regional and international community, along with pressuring Ethiopia into accepting the International Boundary Commission's findings, as a carrot for reform. If the international community continues to prioritise regional over domestic criticisms and elides the two, the abuses in Eritrea may get worse. THINK AFRICA PRESS

Abducted, Held For Ransom, Octogenarian Eritrean Hostage Released' After being held in captivity for more than 14 months, Mr. Yohannes Shoba'a, a 90-year old Eritrean, was released. The octogenarian was held in a residential building in Addis Ababa. Mr. Yohannes Shoba stated that during his captivity he was treated well but several times he asked his captors to get him a doctor but he was never provided with one. The octogenarian victim does not know the names of his captors because "they were careful not to call each other by their names and, if they did, someone will be Abraham one day and Mehari the next." But he remembers their leader whose colleagues addressed him as "Wedi Ze," (no first name, but last name is an abbreviation for common Eritrean names which begin with Ze.) Another characteristic of the leader, Wedi Ze, is that he walks with a limp. December 12, 2012:

President Issaias Affworki of Eritrea would perhaps release high profile prisoners in New Year'

PIA of Eritrea will release high profile prisoners in New Year. In spirit of New Year and planned Eritrea's version of reform. PIA will incrementally introduce various changes starting 2013. To restore hope and confidence in his people, he will release prisoners commonly known as "G-15". Despite the widely spread rumors about the death of some of these prisoners, they are all alive with some suffering from some kind of ailment. PIA, lately has been confronted by some of his ministers and top generals that the need for change has never been so critical and he acknowledged the fact that change is inevitable but he pleaded with his ministers and generals that any change has to be incremental and has to be made from point of strength not that of weakness.

A western diplomat in Asmara revealed that PIA promised him that his number one agenda for 2013 will be normalizing relationship with regional countries including Ethiopia. PIA told this western diplomat stationed in Asmara that he will revise his long held stand on how to resolve the border conflict with Ethiopia. The diplomat added that PIA will sit around round table with his Ethiopian counterpart as long as Ethiopia equivocally accepted the border verdict, Eritrea is willing negotiate everything under the sun with Ethiopia. The diplomat continued that: PIA will drop the precondition he has placed : for him to negotiate with Ethiopia, it has to vacate its forces from the occupied territories first. His current condition for Ethiopia is to officially declare that it has accepted the verdict in its spirit and letter! The western diplomat also hinted that Doha could be the possible venue for Ethiopia's new prime minster and PIA to kick off the long awaited talk to settle the festering conflict between the two brotherly people. Mining CEOs also have been notified of the proposed changes that will take into effect in the country in 2013 and many are expressing their hope that the promised changes will clear of the cloud of sanctions that has been hovering over their ventures for the last few years. December 14, 2012

Eritrean Information Minister Ali Abdu Ahmed Disappeared'

Despite broad public support in Ethiopia for the GRD, the government still faces the challenge of securing enough financing to cover the $4.8 billion cost of the project. The money is meant to come from within Ethiopia, and the government is selling five-year treasury bonds, but a recent report by the International Monetary Fund warns that the dam could be a great burden on the country's economy, costing as much as 10 percent of the country's estimated GDP in 2012-13. The fund said Ethiopian authorities have acknowledged that raising domestic financing for the flagship project for the country is a challenge, but the government emphasises that the GRD is a high priority and that other projects may be postponed if necessary in order to ensure its completion.E.G. Woldegebriel is a journalist based in Addis Ababa with an interest in environmental issues.

Eritrean Information Minister Ali Abdu Ahmed, government spokesman and censor-in-chief of the Red Sea nation, has been invisible in the past few weeks. The total absence of any independent press in Eritrea has allowed the government to maintain complete silence in the face of mounting questions and surging Internet rumors of his defection. It was on November 17 that U.K.-based Eritrean opposition news website Assena first reported, citing unnamed sources, that Ali had sought asylum in Canada. Ten days later, Madote, a pro-government site, dismissed the Assena report and claimed, citing unnamed witnesses who reported by phone, that Ali was "seen walking in the capital and discussing with citizens." Radio France Internationale reported on December 18 that Ali had defected in late November during a business trip to Europe and that his home had been searched by security agents. An editorial on U.S.-based Eritrean news site Awate criticized the impulse to pursue scoops on Ali's whereabouts at the expense of investigative reporting and analysis of the reasons behind his possible disappearance.

Amid the contradicting reports, few facts are available. International media and exiled Eritrean journalists agree that Ali traveled to Europe in September before disappearing from view some time in November. Ali is still listed as the minister of information on the government's news portal Shabait, and the dedicated "Contact Ali Abdu" link is still there. Yet, based on images broadcast on state-controlled ERI-TV, Ali was absent from the most recent meeting of cabinet ministers. Was Ali traveling or sick? With the government's absolute stranglehold on news and information, it is virtually impossible to know the truth. "I called the Ministry of Information and the rude bch hanged up on my face. #Where's Ali Abdu +291117111 #smh," tweeted @EriRevoltMay24, a diaspora opposition activist, on December 17. Eritrea is the most censored country in the world, according to CPJ research. The government operates under an Orwellian system of control; all media is state owned, and journalists who have fled into exile say that Ali directed every detail of coverage. The last accredited foreign correspondent was expelled in 2007. The fates of independent journalists who disappeared into government custody since a September 2001 crackdown remain a state secret, and the government has all but erased the detainees from public record and memory. Ali is believed to be a keeper of such secrets.

Thus far, the only official reaction to the disappearance of Ali was registered on Twitter when Eritrea's Ambassador to Japan, Estifanos Afeworki, responded to a question asked by Sweden-based journalist and activist Meron Estefanos on December 17. "Mr Ambassador, care to comment about the whereabouts of Eritrea's Information Minister Ali Abdu?" tweeted Meron. "The whereabouts of Ali or his like is not a priority in Eritrea. In our democracy tolerance is fundamental. Why?" responded the diplomat. Jumping into the conversation, Eritrean-American journalist Salem Solomon insisted: "he's the #Eritrean information minister (public office) & I think its a legit Q." The diplomat would not budge, ending the engagement with "Ali is right person 2 give answer if any not me." In the absence of answers, the questions persist, particularly online. The search term "Ali Abdu" peaked in mid-November before dipping, but its on the rise again, according to Google Trends. "We just launched our #WhereisAli milk cartons, trying to track down the missing Minister of Information," By Mohamed Keita, CPJ Dec 28, 2012. Mohammed Keita is advocacy coordinator for CPJ's Africa Program. He regularly gives interviews in French and English to international news media on press freedom issues in Africa and has participated in several panels.

Eritrea is losing its youngest and brightest generation at an alarming rate’

VIEWS: I am shocked, but not surprised, to learn today that 3 young Eritreans I met and befriended in Asmara 3 years ago have escaped by foot and arrived in Addis Ababa after spending one month at a U.N.-operated refugee camp in Tigray. One of them worked at the Ministry of Information and two of them worked at a cafe. I spoke with one of them a few minutes ago and asked him how he managed to escape. He said he and the group he was with walked through the countryside disguising themselves as peasants. They walked mostly at night and avoided populated areas. Once they crossed the border into Tigray, villagers fed them and took them to the refugee camp. He told me that he learned about what route to take from a friend who escaped previously. He also told me that hundreds of young Eritreans are crossing the border into Tigray daily. He and his friends are now awaiting the UNHCR to take them to Australia, U.S. or Europe. How is Eritrea going to survive as a country if it loses a significant number of its young population? It is a country that is bleeding itself to death. Ethiopia is also losing its young people, but with 80 million people, the impact will not be felt as much. As in Ethiopia, Eritrea's #1 enemy is its government's misguided policies that give no hope to its young people. The people in power are too greedy and selfish to transfer power to the new generation. Source: ER by Elias Kifle Canadian company rejects claims it used forced labour at Eritrea mine' PR - January 12, 2013: Canadian miner Nevsun Resources Ltd. is facing explosive allegations that it unwittingly allowed forced labour to be involved in building its flagship copper-gold mine. The allegations will be released next week in a report from Human Rights Watch, a non-governmental organization. But on Friday, Nevsun chief executive Cliff Davis tried to dismiss concerns the company is not doing enough to keep its Eritrea-based Bisha mine free of conscripted workers. "I'm very comfortable there are not any conscripted workers on site," he said in an interview. However, he could not say for certain that there was no forced labour at the project in 2009, when the concerns first surfaced. He acknowledged that the company should have taken more steps to make sure there wasn't any, and expressed regret if there were conscripts. "With hindsight, its fair to say that perhaps we didn't do enough at the very beginning," he said. When Vancouver-based Nevsun initiated construction of Bisha in late 2008, the government ordered the miner to enlist a state-controlled contractor called Segen Construction for some of the work. Eritrea is a fierce dictatorship, and Nevsun had no choice but to comply. By early 2009, there were concerns that at least some of Segen's work force was made up of forced labourers from the government's national service. They allegedly worked extremely long hours and had to live in unsanitary conditions for minimal pay. Once the allegations surfaced, Mr. Davis said that Nevsun got a written guarantee from Segen that it would not use forced labour on site, and it began examining documentation from all of Segen's employees in early 2009.

The Bisha mine entered production in early 2011. Last year, Nevsun tried to do some additional construction work without Segen. The Eritrean government intervened and forced the company to re-hire Segen as a contractor. Some activists are still concerned the company is not doing enough to ensure there is no forced labour at the site. Nevsun has not visited the camp where Segen's workers live and does not know how much they are paid, Mr. Davis said. The Nevsun situation highlights the extreme risks and challenges that Canadian miners are facing when they work in autocratic countries, particularly those with no history of large-scale mining. Eritrea is facing numerous sanctions from the international community for supporting militants in Somalia. Mr. Davis maintains that Nevsun's investment is a major positive for the country. "We're not the state. We're contributing huge value to thousands of people in Eritrea," he said. Bisha is Eritrea's first large-scale mine, but other mining companies are active in the country on earlier-stage projects. They will also have to deal with Segen and the forced labour concerns if they reach the construction phase. "As we get closer to construction, its something we'll have to pay close attention to," said Greg Davis, vice-president of business development at Sunridge Gold Corp., which controls the Asmara project in Eritrea. By Peter Koven

Dissident soldiers take over Eritrea's ministry of information'

ASMARA, ERITREA (Aljazeera - January 21, 2013) — A group of dissident soldiers have laid siege to the Eritrean information ministry and forced the state media to announce a call for the release of political prisoners, according to a senior Eritrean intelligence official. The renegade soldiers forced the director of state television to make an announcement, the intelligence official said. "The soldiers have forced him to speak on state TV, to say the Eritrean government should release all political prisoners," the source said on condition of anonymity. There was no immediate official comment. Dozens of soldiers with two tanks surrounded the ministry building in Asmara, regional diplomatic sources said. They said state television and radio had gone off air. There was no immediate indication it was an attempt to overthrow the government of Eritrea, which has been led by Isaias Afewerki, 66, for some two decades since it broke away from bigger neighbour Ethiopia. The UN last year estimated that 5-10,000 political prisoners were being held in the secretive Horn of Africa country, which is accused by human rights groups of carrying out torture and summary executions. The Red Sea state, which declared independence from Ethiopia after a long war, is one of the most opaque countries on the continent and it restricts access to foreign reporters. Eritrean opposition activists exiled in neighbouring Ethiopia said there was growing dissent within the Eritrean military, especially over economic hardships. "Economic issues have worsened and have worsened relations between the government and soldiers in the past few weeks and months," one activist said. The UN Security Council imposed an embargo on Eritrea in 2009 over concerns its government was funding and arming al-Shabaab rebels in neighbouring Somalia – charges Eritrea denied.

Soldiers' Mutiny In Eritrea's Capital'

News Analysis (January 21, 2013: At 10.00am local time) There was a commotion at Eritrea's Ministry of Information, locally known as "Enda Zena." 2, It was quickly known that about one hundred (100) young soldiers and officers had surrounded the perimeter and taken over the building. 3, The employees of the MoI describe them as young and friendly—but frustrated and with a grudge against senior officers for their inability to deliver change. 4, They ordered one of the news readers, Asmelash, to read their demand: implementation of the constitution and release of political prisoners. 5, The young officers and soldiers have reassured the employees of the MoI that they will not harm them. They have indicated that they will release women with young children to leave the premises. 6, One of the interns at the MoI is the daughter of Eritrea's president, Isaias Afwerki. 7, There are reports that the presidential office and the Asmara airport are surrounded by tanks. It is not clear whether these are regime loyalists or supporters of the young officers and soldiers. 8, Senior officers are refusing to take action to suppress the uprising. 9, Cell phones are still working in Eritrea but email is not working—either because of server overload or an attempt to isolate the movement for change.

Their demand: 1, The young officers and soldiers number around 100. It is encouraging that 100 people were able to organize an activity, in a country where it is illegal for more than 7 people to meet. 2, The young officers and soldiers did not demand the resignation of Issaias Affeworki. It is a minimalist demand. 3, It is not clear what the leverage of the young officers and soldiers is, if the regime decides to wait it out until the cafeteria runs out of food. 4, For the event to have momentum, similar activities of soldiers arresting their officers or taking over government institutions in different parts of Eritrea will have to take place. 5, The senior officers—who have been grumbling for years and who have been agonizing about how to start an uprising—have a decision to make. To come to the aid of the young soldiers and officers or to serve the regime. So far, they have taken the wait-and-see position. Awate.com reports:

Conflicting reports about coup attempt in Eritrea: CBS'
Faction of the military may be intervening in response to the president's poor state of health' - Stratfor

More than 100 dissident soldiers stormed the Ministry of Information in the small East African nation of Eritrea on Monday and read a statement on state TV saying the country's 1997 constitution would be put into force, two Eritrea experts said. The soldiers held all of the ministry workers – including the daughter of the president – in a single room, said Leonard Vincent, author of the book "The Eritreans" and co-founder of a Paris-based Eritrean radio station. The soldiers' broadcast on state TV said the country's 1997 constitution would be reinstated and all political prisoners freed, but the broadcast was cut off after only two sentences were read and the signal has been off air the rest of the day, Vincent said. By late afternoon there were indications the soldiers' attempt would fail. A military tank sat in front of the Ministry of Information but the streets of the capital, Asmara, were quiet, and no shots had been fired, said a Western diplomat in Eritrea who wasn't authorized to be identified by name. Vincent stopped short of calling it a coup d'etat and said it wasn't immediately clear if the action was a well-organized coup attempt or what he called a "kamikaze crash." Later Monday government soldiers surrounded the ministry, an indication the action by the dissident soldiers had failed, aid Martin Plaut, a fellow at the Institute of Commonwealth Studies in BritainItlooks like its an isolated attempt by some soldiers who are completely frustrated by what is going on. But it wasn't done in a coordinated manner," Plaut said. "They did seize the television station, they did manage to put this broadcast out, but the government is still functioning calmly. There is nothing on the streets." Eritrea is an oppressive and politically isolated neighbor of Ethiopia and Sudan situated on the Red Sea that broke off from Ethiopia in the 1990s. The U.S. government's relations with Eritrea became strained in 2001 as a result of a government crackdown against political dissidents, the closing of the independent press and limits on civil liberties, conditions that the State Department says have "persisted to this day." U.N. slams Eritrea for Islamic militant support: Issaias Affeworki has ruled the country as president and head of the military since 1993. If the power grab attempt by the dissident soldiers fails, they are likely in for severe punishments, Vincent and Plaut said. "People call it the North Korea of Africa and that is accurate, so you either win or you're dead, and I think these people are dead," Plaut said. "One can't be absolutely sure but that's what it looks like. It appears a coup attempt may be unfolding in Asmara, Eritrea's capital. Dissident soldiers have reportedly taken over the Eritrean Ministry of Information facility and possibly the country's central bank. Tanks and troops loyal to Eritrean President Isayas Afewerki are reportedly headed toward the ministry to retake the building, the site of the country's sole television station. Eritrean opposition radio outlet ERENA has reported that Afewerki, his wife and some army officers have been arrested. The extent of Afewerki's control in Asmara is not clear, but if a coup is under way it is likely an internal military power grab triggered by the president's poor health. Afewerki, who has in the past traveled abroad for closely guarded medical treatment, may finally have died. Rather than let events spiral beyond their control, army officers who had been the foundation of the Eritrean regime may have launched a power grab to avoid a breakdown in order or to prevent a rival military or political faction from securing power.

Possible scenarios: Affeworki had in November 2012 arrested his long-standing military adviser, Majour General Filipos Woldeyohannes. Some media outlets have identified Woldeyohannes as being the leader of the possible coup in Asmara. Woldeyohannes was in charge of the military district of Asmara, and previously served as military commander for the western region bordering Ethiopia and Sudan. Woldeyohannes has extensive fighting experience, including leading the wars of independence in the 1990s against Ethiopia. Woldeyohannes has been a senior military-political figure ever since, though with his arrest in November it is not clear how large a military faction he has been able to retain influence over. Woldeyohannes' arrest and replacement by General Tekali "Manjus" Kiflai is standard procedure by Affewerki to prevent rival military commanders from developing a sufficient base of support to challenge the president. If Affeworki has finally died or his health is failing, Woldeyohannes may have conspired with officers loyal to him to block Manjus—who had been in position only three months—from securing the vacated presidency. If Woldeyohannes takes over, he will have to maintain strong military control over the state. Using a threat emanating from Ethiopia as justification, Woldeyohannes could attempt to use an extended state of emergency to try to consolidate his control internally. It is reported that Eritrean troops on the southern border are on alert for attempts to arrest their commanders in support of the coup or to further an internal lockdown. The prospect of a coup in Eritrea does not have significant international repercussions. The country is not a significant recipient of foreign investment, and while there are small crude oil exploration and gold mining activities going on, no major production is occurring. The greater significance is for foreign relations, especially with Ethiopia, with whom Eritrea fought an extended war of independence in the 1990s. All Eritreans likely agree that absorption by Ethiopia is not an option. Woldeyohannes would not want to lose Eritrean independence to the Ethiopians any more than any other Ethiopian would, so he will not ease the internal military presence. Woldeyohannes does not have any more resources than Affeworki did to support proxy militias in neighboring countries, so a renewed conflict with Ethiopia in Somalia is probably out of the question. Woldeyohannes will want to consolidate his internal control through a state of emergency that may last a long time, which also prevents Eritrea from focusing on conflict outside the country. Though Ethiopia likely already has a deep file on Woldeyohannes, it will want more insight on him, but Woldeyohannes will work to keep the possible coup internalized to prevent Ethiopia from interfering and avoid the risk of losing Asmara's independence. A disorderly transition in Asmara presents an opportunity for Ethiopia to reassume control over the country that has fought proxy campaigns with it and that has cut off Ethiopia's direct maritime access to the Red Sea. Even if there is no coup, or if the coup fails, Affeworki's apparently deteriorating health means that there will likely be a transition of power in Eritrea at some point in the near future.

Dissident Eritrean soldiers with tanks took over the information ministry on and forced state media to call for political prisoners to be freed, a senior intelligence official said. The renegade soldiers have not gone as far as to demand the overthrow of the government of one of Africa's most secretive states, long at odds with the United States and accused of human rights abuses. Eritrea has been led by Isaias Affeworki, 66, for some two decades since it broke from bigger neighbor Ethiopia. The fledging gold producer on the Red Sea coast has become increasingly isolated, resisting foreign pressure to open up. Soldiers forced the director general of state television “to say the Eritrean government should release all political prisoners,” the Eritrean intelligence source told Reuters on condition of anonymity. There was no immediate statement from the Asmara government. Between 5,000 and 10,000 political prisoners are being held in the country of about 6 million people, the United Nations human rights chief said last year, accusing Eritrea of torture and summary executions. State media went off air after the call for prisoners to be freed. The mutineers were low- to mid-ranking soldiers who sought a change in the constitution rather than a coup, said one regional expert with close connections in Asmara. About 200 soldiers with two tanks were involved and they had also surrounded the ministry, diplomats in the region said. It was unclear whether loyalist troops were moving against them. On a strategic strip of mountainous land, Eritrea is a tightly controlled one-party state. It has more soldiers per person than any country except North Korea.

Isolation: Eritrean opposition activists exiled in neighboring Ethiopia said there was growing dissent within the army, Africa’s second biggest, especially over economic hardship. “Economic issues have worsened and have worsened relations between the government and soldiers in the past few weeks and months,” one activist told Reuters. A senior European diplomat said there were clear differences between elements of the military and Isaias’ administration. “It is a question of time before the full price of isolation is paid by the government in Asmara. Incidents such as this are mounting,” the diplomat said, referring also to economic hardship for most Eritreans. Despite expectations for a gold mining boom that helped fuel economic growth of nearly 8 percent last year, per capita gross domestic product is less than $550 a year. Shares in gold companies with mines or projects in the country fell sharply on Monday. Toronto-listed Nevsun Resources Ltd was down 9 percent. Those in smaller explorer Sunridge Gold Corp were down over 26 percent. Chalice Gold also has a presence.

Eritrea split from Ethiopia in May, 1991 and relations between them are perennially strained’

Asmara has also accused the United States, a staunch ally of Ethiopia, of trying to topple Isaias. A U.S. diplomatic cable released by Wikileaks described him in 2009 as an “unhinged dictator”. He survived an assassination attempt by a disgruntled soldier the same year, diplomatic sources said. Isaias has also accused the United States of spreading lies that he is sick. He has no obvious successor. “Isaias, sick or not, is a wily survivor and it would be a mistake to prematurely write him off,” said J. Peter Pham, director of the Michael S. Ansari Africa Centre at the Atlantic Council. “On the other hand, there are few prospects of any amelioration of the economic crisis which, as it worsens, cannot but affect the relationship between the dictatorship and the forces that keep it in power.” The United Nations’ Security Council imposed an embargo on Eritrea in 2009 over concerns its government was funding and arming al Shabaab rebels in neighboring Somalia - charges Asmara denied.

NAIROBI (Observer) -- Eritrean army tanks besieged the information ministry in central Asmara after some 200 mutineers seized the building to call for political reform, diplomatic and diaspora sources said Monday. No shots had been fired and the rest of the city appeared calm, the diplomats added, although few details were immediately available. "The ministry of information is under siege," a diplomat said. Amanuel Ghirmai, an Eritrean journalist in Paris for independent Radio Erena, said around a 100 army mutineers stormed the ministry—which towers over the capital of the Red Sea state—early yesterday. They reportedly ordered news readers at the government-run television and radio station—the only source of media for the authoritarian state—to read a statement that they will implement the country's constitution. The statement also reportedly ordered the release of prisoners of conscience. "We do not know who is leading the situation... everybody has been put into the same room (in the ministry)," Amanuel said. Britain's foreign office updated its travel advice yesterday to say it had received reports of "unusual military movements in and around Asmara", without giving further details. The reports were not possible to confirm independently, and all calls to government officials were not answered. Earlier, all independent media was shut down after Issaias launched a purge in 2001, while the Horn of Africa nation expelled the last registered foreign correspondent in 2010.

The military mutiny in Eritrea was led by Army Colonel Saleh Osman' January 23rd, 2013 By Peter Heinlein | VOA: A day-long siege at Eritrea's information ministry Monday ended in a stalemate, with disgruntled soldiers retreating to a strategic location outside the capital, Asmara. That the incident provides rare insight into the inner workings of one of the world's most opaque societies. International observers are wondering what happened Monday after a group of soldiers drove to Eritrea's information ministry and demanded that a statement be read out over state-run television. The statement asking for the release of political prisoners and for respect of the constitution was being read when the station suddenly went off the air. Nearly 12 hours later, the station resumed broadcasting with no mention of the cause of the disruption. The troops that had occupied the ministry simply climbed back into their armored personnel carriers and drove off. Information gathered from a variety of sources indicates the operation was led by Colonel Saleh Osman, a legendary figure of the Eritrea-Ethiopia war from 1998 to 2000. A usually authoritative opposition website reports that Colonel Osman and several dozen supporters retreated to the suburbs of Asmara, where they are in talks with President Isaias Afewerki's government. Information is tightly controlled in Eritrea. The watchdog group Reporters Without Borders ranks the Red Sea nation last out of 179 countries in press freedom, below North Korea.Former Reporters Without Borders Africa director Leonard Vincent is the author of a book titled The Eritreans, and a close follower of the country. In a telephone interview, Vincent said Monday's siege appears to have been a show of force, and not an attempt to seize power."Yesterday's operation was not aimed at overthrowing by violence the government, but still its a standoff with the government," said Vincent. "Its an operation aimed at showing defiance toward them. So this shows the level of frustration in the army is very high." Vincent says the standoff at the information ministry suggests Colonel Osman has broad support within the military. "If this was an isolated operation led by a rebel colonel, this kind of move should have been met by violence and severe repression," he said. "This hasn't happened, so there might be negotiations going on, and this unit might not be so isolated as we thought yesterday." Vincent believes it is too early to tell whether the operation was successful. "We cannot say if it has succeeded or failed," said Vincent. "What we can say is a faction of the army is showing its strength and is talking with the government on the basis of what they are capable of doing in terms of taking control of parts of the country." Vincent says the dissidents' demand of freedom for political prisoners, particularly those jailed in a 2001 purge, has deep resonance among ordinary Eritreans. "Its the sine qua non [essential] condition for change in Eritrea," he said. "The situation of political prisoners is awful. Reformists and journalists who were jailed in 2001 have vanished. According to sketchy reports, they are detained in high security prison in the far northeast of the country, and the majority have died from disease or by suicide. This is a method the government uses against any dissent or criticism."Human rights groups have long criticized Eritrea's record of jailing government critics. The United Nations last year estimated there are as many as 10,000 political prisoners in a country of six million people.

Eritrean troops under Saleh Osman's command remain defiant, Eritrean Regime Rounds Up Suspects Behind The Siege' News Article (January 24, 2013) 1. As we reported yesterday, while the Eritrean regime publicly downplays the Monday siege of Eritrea's Ministry of Information (MoI), it has cast a wide net to arrest anyone it suspects of having anything to do with the one-day occupation of the MoI building, aka "Forto" or "enda zena" and it has started, at its most senior levels, a defamation campaign reminiscent of its 2001 crackdown on the G-15.

2. On Tuesday morning, January 22, 2012, the regime arrested Abdella Jaber and Amanuel "Hanjema" Haile. Abdella Jaber is the Director of Organizational Affairs for the ruling party, the PFDJ, and a member of its Executive Committee. The party hasn't had an organizational congress since 1994 and the Youth-PFDJ actually reports not to him but to Yemane "monkey" Gebreab, who is the Director of Political Affairs of PFDJ and a "presidential advisor." Amanuel "Hanjema" Haile was the political commissar in Division 96 in the “Southern Red Sea” Front, when it was under the command of Samuel “China” Haile. He had been “frozen” lately.

3. On Wednesday, at noon, dozens of soldiers and plainclothes security officers surrounded the residence of Mustafa Nurhussein, arrested him, and he has been taken to an undisclosed position. Mustafa Nurhussein is the regional administrator (governor) of the South Zone. South Zone is sometimes known by the local word for South: Debub. (Historically, and until the redistricting and renaming of 1996 this area, was known by its two component parts: Akeleguzay and Seraye.) Mustafa Nurhussein is often seen hosting Isaias Afwerki when he is making "inspection tours" of the South Zone and was, until recently, reputed to have close friendship with the president. On January 18, Mustafa Nurhussein had attended a "regional administrators" meeting chaired by President Isaias Afwerki.

4. Also on Wednesday, Eritrea's ambassador to the United Arab Emirates, Osman Jem'ee Idris (as well other government representatives to other embassies—whose names may be disclosed in future publication) have (if they were in Eritrea, that is) been taken to prison or placed under house arrest.

5. Brigadier General (?) Saleh Osman, whose unit was reportedly responsible for the siege of the MoI building on Monday, is in the Adi Keyih/Dekemhare area, in the highlands of the South Zone. His soldiers have prevented any security forces from approaching and they have demanded that nobody, besides military police, can approach them for negotiations.
awate.com

ERITREA: Mutiny Shows Growing Military Discontent With Issaias Affeworki'

Bloomberg - January 25, 2013: A day-long mutiny by Eritrean soldiers this week signals growing discontent with President Isaias Afwerki's two-decade grip on power and economic hardship, said analysts including Dan Connell at Simmons College. The rare show of dissent against what Human Rights Watch describes as one of the world's most repressive regimes also fuels speculation that Isaias, 66, may be ailing, according to Stratfor, the Austin, Texas-based intelligence group. The former rebel leader has ruled the Horn of Africa nation since 1991, when a 30-year war for independence from neighboring Ethiopia ended. Eritrea is a one-party state. "Dissatisfaction inside the military is widespread, especially at the middle and lower levels," Connell, the author of seven books on the country, said in an e-mailed response to questions yesterday. "I expect more of this in the coming months, particularly if the regime cracks down heavily."

Eritrea is among the most difficult places in the world to do business and is ninth from bottom in a ranking of the poorest countries, according to the World Bank. Private industry is constrained by "haphazard" regulations, foreign-currency restrictions and the "high risk" of assets being expropriated, the African Development Bank said on its website. The country relies on gold and other metals produced by Nevsun Resources Ltd.'s (NSU) Bisha mine and remittances from a tax it imposes on Eritreans living abroad to generate most of its foreign exchange. About a quarter of Eritrea's 5.4 million population lives overseas and are threatened with having their entry rights withdrawn, their properties seized or families harassed if they don't pay, according to the United Nations. Building Stormed : As many as 200 soldiers stormed the Ministry of Information building that houses state television in the capital, Asmara, on Jan. 21 and took its occupants hostage, according to Stratfor. A newsreader then read a list of demands including calls for the release of political prisoner and the implementation of a 1997 constitution, it said on its website.

The occupation ended after troops loyal to Issaias surrounded the building, the mutineers released their hostages and agreed to return to their base, Stratfor said. The mutiny was "probably a show of force by more senior elements of the military, in an effort to nudge along political and economic reform," Michael Woldemariam, professor of International Relations and an expert on African politics at Boston University, said in an e-mailed response to questions.

Illness: The rebellion may have been led by General Saleh Osman, a veteran of Eritrea's independence war who previously engaged in talks for democratization with the president's office, according to Stratfor. General Filipos Woldeyohannes, a former confidant of Isaias who "fell from grace," may also have been involved, it said. "While these troops did not receive the support from other military commanders that they were apparently hoping for, they were able to cast doubt on the ability of the regime to protect itself," Stratfor said.

Issaias may be suffering from a liver ailment and has sought medical treatment in Qatar, according to a February 16, 2011, report by Awate.com, a California-based opposition website. The government in April denied what it said was an "intensive campaign of rumor" that the president is terminally ill. "There is no second-in-command and no single general who could take Isaias's place, so the only viable option to avoid a major rupture for those in power for a transition is a committee of some sort that brings together representatives of the main power centers," Connell said.

President Targeted :The dissidents may have been targeting a faction within the ruling People's Front for Democracy and Justice, or PFDJ, and military officials who back the president, Michael said. Issaias and loyalists have been arresting senior military and political figures since Jan. 23 in response to the rebellion, said Abel Abate Demissie, a researcher at the Ethiopian government-linked Ethiopian International Institute for Peace and Development, citing unidentified Eritrean sources. "Isaias knows there are prominent people in a power struggle who are conspiring and he's started to react," he said in a telephone interview from Addis Ababa, Ethiopia's capital."I am sure fractures will broaden in the coming days and months. The writing is on the wall." The government hasn't officially acknowledged the Jan. 21 incident. Phone calls and text messages seeking comment to the mobile-phone of Eritrea's Ambassador to the African Union Girma Asmerom haven't been answered since Jan. 21.

Opacity: "The opacity surrounding Eritrea's government is thickest when it comes to internal power struggles and the fates of political prisoners," Mohamed Keita, Africa advocacy coordinator at the New York-based Committee to Protect Journalists, said in a phone interview on Jan. 23. Eritrea outlawed private media in 2001 and the government has arbitrarily detained thousands of people including journalists and opposition supporters over the past decade, according to Amnesty International, the London-based advocacy group. The implementation of Eritrea's constitution has been suspended since war broke out with Ethiopia in 1998 because of a dispute about ownership of the border town of Badme. The two-year conflict cost 70,000 lives. Eritrea is still on a war footing over the unresolved dispute, Girma said on Jan. 16. Conscripts to the army, public services and industry have been"permanently mobilized" since the conflict, he said.

UN Sanctions: The country has been under UN sanctions since 2009 for supporting Ethiopian rebels and al-Qaeda-linked al-Shabaab militants in their battle against a Western-backed government in Somalia. Eritrea denies the charges and says Ethiopia is in defiance of international law for stalling implementation of a 2002 decision by a UN border committee that awarded Badme to Eritrea. Nevsun, based in Vancouver, said the Jan. 21 incident had no impact on operations at Bisha, which also produces copper and zinc. The stock has fallen 9.1 percent in Toronto since the mutiny, trading at C$4.20 as of 9:58 a.m. local time. Sunridge Gold Corp. (SGC), which is drilling for gold in Eritrea, has fallen 8.1 percent and traded at 26.5 Canadian cents in Toronto.

South Boulder Mines Ltd. (STB), based in Perth, is building a potash mine in Eritrea, while China SFECO, a unit of Shanghai Construction Co. (600170), bought the Zara Project off Australia'sChalice Gold Mines Ltd. (CHN) last year. Ethiopia is concerned about a "crumbled" regime "taking down" the region with it, said Getachew Reda, a spokesman for Prime Minister Hailemariam Desalegn. Addis Ababa will take "proportional measures" against Eritrean subversion and wants negotiations on the border, he said. "I think the world would be better off without Isaias,"he said. "But its not for us to decide whether Isaias should go."

Eritrea/Ethiopia: Inching Closer To Peace And War'

News tips/Commentary (November 17, 2012): Since the demise of former dictator Meles Zenawi on August 20, a number of neighborly good will gestures have been conducted by Eritrea and Ethiopia, while at the same time, both governments are reportedly on heighten alert for all out war. Following the death of Meles Zenawi, who died from complications of late stage liver cancer in Belgium, Eritrea's deputy ambassador to the AU, Beniam Berhe, visited the Ethiopian National Palace and signed the book of condolences. The young diplomat was also seen comforting the grieving former first lady, Azeb Mesfin. Interestingly enough, during the same time period, Eritrea has suspended all Ethiopian opposition groups from airing news on their national channel Eri-TV. On its part, the Ethiopian government has freed dozens of Eritrean prisoners that were captured during Ethiopia's March 16 invasion of Eritrea, that reportedly killed more than 214 Ethiopian troops, according to one source with ties to the secretive Ethiopian National Intelligence and Security Service.

Recently, during the election process at the UN for the Advisory Committee on Administrative and Budgetary position, It was reported that both Ethiopia and Djibouti voted for the Eritrean candidate, Tesfa Alem Seyoum. These crucial votes helped secure his victory over his rivals. Amid all this, South Sudan, which is tangled in its own border dispute with neighboring Sudan, said it will select delegates that will embark on shuttle diplomacy between Eritrea and Ethiopia. "We will embark on rounds of shuttle diplomacy between the two countries. We are hoping to start in November," said Deng Alor, South Sudan's minister for cabinet affairs. But among these goodwill gestures and early signs of peace, there are rumored reports coming out of Addis Ababa that Abay Woldu, the President of Tigray region of Ethiopia and the newly appointed Chairmen of TPLF, is trying to convince his party to invade Eritrea and annex its port city of Assab.

Abay, who is described as a conservative Tigrayan nationalist, often speaks critically of Eritrea and Ethiopia during meetings. He, along with TPLF founder Sebhat Nega, are rumored to be in favor of going to war with Eritrea to create an independent Tigray state. They regard their minority Tigrayan hegemony over Ethiopia as unsustainable and dangerous for their people. Informed sources have said that Ethopia is amassing its troops in the Afar region bordering Eritrea, which could be a sign that the regime is still uncomfortable with peace. Addis Ababa's belligerent stance towards Eritrea continues to be a source of instability for the region. Only time will tell if cooler heads prevail, but with Meles gone and Ethiopia's regime split among rivaling factions, bravado towards Eritrea maybe seen as a sign of party loyalty for a small clique of Tigrayan men vying for power.

Eritrea - on probable Somalia path of civil war and fragmentation – Analysts'

ER: (January 26, 2013) - Unless Eritreans unite, get rid of PFDJ (Shabia), and institute a civilized government, Eritrea will become like Somalia shortly. There will be endless civil war which will result in the fragmentation of Eritrea into at least 3 states. Ex-president Mohammed Siad Bare, who was a dominant personality like Issaias Affeworki, led the country into 3 decades of nightmare and now the country is divided into three. Former dictator Mengistu Hailemariam led Ethiopia to the same situation—two decades of nightmare and civil strife under the TPLF led tribal junta. This is the fate of a country that is led by selfish, greedy leaders. If Issaias loves his people, he needs to reconcile with the opposition groups, release all political prisoners, and transfer power to a new generation of Eritrea as soon as possible. Even though there are reports that he is preparing to resign, the sycophants and mindless cadres who surrounded him could make transition difficult, if not impossible, by making him believe that without him Eritrea cannot survive. The events of January 21st, the takeover of Eritrea's Ministry of Information by members of Eritrea's military for twelve hours, cannot be understood properly unless one has been following Eritrea's exiled opposition media for the preceding 3-4 months. As refered to an October 12, 2012 Gedab News article, now housed at Indepth Africa, with the title "Is This The Beginning Of The End For The Eritrean Regime?" The Eritrean opposition media describe a nation which is emptying out its youth at the rate of 3,000 a month; a nation which either stands by quietly or benefits financially from the inhumane and savage treatment of its youth in Egypt's Sinai as they are being raped, killed and their organs harvested; a nation where even senior officials and elite pilots and elite athletes no longer see any hope for reform and are leaving in droves; a nation facing dire economic challenges where basic necessities are available only via contraband; a nation whose infrastructure is crumbling apart; a nation which is the subject of sanction and global isolation; a pariah nation where power is getting even more increasingly centralized in the office of the increasingly paranoid president. Seeing from this context, whether one calls the January 21 incident an act of frustration, a coup d'etat attempt, a mutiny is irrelevant. What is more important is that some people finally said "Enough!" and laid bare the ugliness of the Isaias Afwerki regime for the whole world to see. It was specially sweet that the only media in the world–Eri-TV–that was trying to deny the truth was forced to tell the truth. And given the global press coverage: mission accomplished. Isaias Affeworki's twenty one year campaign to show that he is beloved by his people, that whatever "opposition" (opposition always in scare quotes) he faces is external was demolished in 12 hours by brave Eritrean soldiers.

Eritrea - Interview made with Information Minister Ali Abdu Ahmed confirms his defection'

BEIRUT: (January 30, 2013) - Eritrean dictator Issaias Affewerki's Information Minister Ali Abdu Ahmed has fled the country and is living today in a secret location. He confirm his defection himself today in an exclusive interview with Expressen's reporter Kassem Hamade. Ali Abdu says he is surprised that the Swedish authorities did not seek him for information about what happened to the imprisoned journalist Dawit Isaak. But he dare not give any hope to Isaak's family in Sweden. Eritrea's information minister, Ali Abdu, 47, disappeared without a trace during a business trip to Germany in November. Since then, not a sign of life heard from the Minister, who has been one of dictator Issaias Affewerki's closest men for many years. He dares not speak on the phone with journalists, so he responds to Expressen questions via his brother Saleh Younis, who lives in the U.S.. Ali Abdu says that he very well knows who Dawit Isaak is. “No one from the Swedish government or authorities have been trying to contact me about Dawit Isaak, Ali Abdu told Expressen." For Dawit Isaak's family in Sweden and among the thousands who are working for his release, Ali Abdu defection brought hope that they will finally get an answer if Dawit Isaak still alive. But Ali Abdu says he and the other ministers do not know anything about what happened Dawit and other imprisoned journalists and politicians. "Neither I nor any other minister dared to ask what happened to Dawit Isaak. It is taboo to ask about things that are not related to one's job. There is an old guerrilla culture in the country. You carry out orders without asking why," he says. Ali Abdu says it is routine for suspected dissidents to be arrested without court papers, without any documentation. "It is done by oral orders. Sometimes, it is over the phone and in coded language. They are afraid of being intercepted by Western intelligence services, he says. Ali Abdu says he is sorry about what happened to Dawit Isaak and other journalists. "But it is only the president himself and his closest security that has information about Isaak. Not even the police chief knows anything about it," he says. Ali Abdu lives under great pressure. Immediately after his defection in November, his father, his 15 year old daughter and his brother were arrested by the Security Service. He says he does not know where they are kept today. He does not want to answer questions about what prompted him to defect or how he lives today. "My brother is in shock right now. He is sad and feeling disappointed at how an entire generation in Eritrea has been lost," says the former minister's brother Saleh Younis.

Source: "Expressen" Swedish newspaper (translation)

Eritrean refugees in Ethiopia hold anti-regime rally, say ready to fight back'

MEKELLE, ETHIOPIA February 3, 2013 - Thousands of Eritrean refugees held a demonstration on Saturday at a camp in northern Ethiopia in support of the actions taken by a dissident army group to bring about democratic change in one of the most repressive nations on earth. On 21 January, some 200 Eritrean soldiers with two tanks stormed Eritrea's ministry of information, taking control of the building for several hours before it was later retaken - without any violence - by troops loyal to the Eritrean president. The mutineers forced the director general of the state radio and television agency to broadcast an appeal for the release of all political prisoners in Eritrea and calling for the immediate implementation of the 1997 constitution. Between 2,000-3,000 Eritreans held the rally at Mai Aini refugee camp in the northern Tigray region bordering Eritrea. The camp, which is the third in the region, was established in 2008 and currently has a population of about 20,000 Eritrean refugees. Ethiopia hosts more than 60,000 Eritrean refugees in at least five camps. Eritrean refugees in other camps are also expected to stage similar demonstrations in the coming days, Sudan Tribune understands. At least 1,000 Eritreans cross the border to Ethiopia every month, fleeing political repression, conscription, mandatory military service, arrests and intimidation threats by their own government. Demonstrators this week echoed the same demands made by the mutineers, calling for the release of political prisoners and implementation of the constitution. They also chanted for the president and his inner circles to leave power. The 66-year-old Eritrean president, Issaias Affewerki, has ruled the Red Sea nation for two decades since the country gained independence from Ethiopia in1993. Organisers told Sudan Tribune that the demonstration was to show solidarity to the renegade soldiers in Eritrea who took "courageous action" during the siege at the ministry in Asmara late last month. The refugees expressed their readiness to take part in the armed struggle along with Ethiopia-based rebels to topple the regime. The move taken by the dissident army group has inspired exiled Eritreans across the world to step-up movements against the dictatorial regime in Asmara. Thousands of Eritreans in the UK, Italy, Israel and many other European countries have staged similar demonstrations in support of the mutineers. Last week in London over 2,000 Eritreans, including opposition politicians, held a demonstration calling for democratic change, in what was the second such protest to take place in the UK capital in recent weeks. The Eritrean government considers any dissident as a traitor and warns any such acts will be taken as treason carrying a punishment by death. Opposition groups in Addis Ababa on Sunday told Sudan Tribune that hundreds of dissenters have been disappeared, punished by death or jailed indefinitely by the Eritrean government under the pretext of treason charges. Many more were also shot to death by border security guards while attempting to flee their homeland. According to Human Rights Watch, the Red Sea nation, referred to by right groups as a "giant prison", has an estimated 5,000 to 10,000 political prisoners. Opposition websites have reported that the Eritrean government has detained dozens of people, including regional governors and senior military officials in connection with the mutiny, however, there has been no official response from the government and getting any information from inside the country – sometimes referred to as Africa's North Korea – is notoriously difficult.

Eritrean refugees protest in support of renegade soldiers'

Updates: ADDIS ABABA (Reuters) - February 4, 2013: Eritrean refugees in Ethiopia demonstrated on Saturday in support of soldiers who forced state media in the Eritrean capital Asmara to call for all political prisoners to be freed. Dissident Eritrean soldiers with tanks stormed the information ministry on January 21 and obliged the director general of state television to appeal for the prisoners' release. Between 5,000 and 10,000 political prisoners are held in the country of 6 million people, the U.N. human rights chief said last year, accusing Eritrea of torture and summary executions. Eritrean opposition activists in neighbouring Ethiopia said there was growing dissent within the army, Africa's second biggest, especially over economic hardship. Exiled Eritreans stormed embassies in London and Rome last week to express support for the mutinous soldiers. Eritrea has been led by the reclusive president Isaias Afewerki, 66, for two decades. Although the renegade soldiers did not go as far as to demand his overthrow, the protest was a rare glimpse of public discontent in one of Africa's most secretive states. Asmara has dismissed the incident at the information ministry as an isolated criminal act. U.N. officials at the Mai Aini refugee camp in northern Ethiopia, which houses around 20,000 Eritrean refugees, said around 3000 protesters had gathered to show their solidarity with the soldiers who raided the ministry. "We are here to express our full support for the initiative of the army, but also to protest against what has been consistent arrests and killings of those opposing the regime," said Mohamed Ali Salah, a 31-year-old former soldier who crossed the border to Ethiopia over three years ago. "We have information that ... the leader of this incident has been killed, and others arrested," Salah added, citing sources in Asmara. The fate of the dissident soldiers is not known and statements about the political situation inside Eritrea are hard to corroborate. However, dissent inside the one-party state is typically dealt with harshly. More than 1,000 Eritreans cross over to Ethiopia and a similar number to Sudan each month to escape conscription and unlimited service in the army, according to figures from the United Nations refugee agency. On a strategic strip of mountainous land along the Red Sea, Eritrea has more soldiers per person than any country except North Korea. By Aaron Maasho, Reuters;

Government blocks access to Al-Jazeera inside Eritrea'

RWB: February 5, 2013 - Reporters Without Borders (RWB) deplores the Eritrean government's censorship of the Qatari TV news network Al Jazeera since 1 February' According to the Qatar-based newspaper Al-Sharq, the Eritrean authorities were annoyed with Al Jazeerafor carrying reports about demonstrations by Eritrean exiles outside Eritrean diplomatic missions in Cairo, London, Frankfurt, Rome, Stockholm and other capitals in opposition to the government and in support of the soldiers who stormed the information ministry in Asmara during a brief mutiny on 21 January. The information ministry issued a decree on 1 February forbidding anyone in Eritrea to provide access to Al Jazeera. Public places such as restaurants, cafés and hotels were specifically targeted. To ensure compliance, Al Jazeera's English-language channels were jammed. "In a country with no privately-owned media and where national news broadcast in the local language is strictly controlled by the government, the foreign media are only 'tolerated' and it is clear that the line that cannot be crossed is coverage of Eritrean news," Reporters Without Borders said.

Amanuel Ghirmai, a journalist with the Paris-based independent Eritrean radio station Radio Erena, told Reporters Without Borders: "This blocking reflects the determination manifested by the Eritrean government in recent months to prevent foreign media carrying reports about Eritrea from broadcasting inside the country."Ghirmai added: "After Radio Erena, Al Jazeera is the second broadcaster to be subjected to such censorship." Launched in 2009 by Eritrean exile journalists and supported by Reporters Without Borders, Radio Erenahas been the target of jamming and cyber-attacks by President Issaias Afeworki's government since August 2012.

Reporters Without Borders has filed a complaint with the French public prosecutor's officer requesting an investigation into these acts of piracy against an independent radio station. All the information about Eritrea and Radio Erena. Eritrea was cut off from the world when the regime took an ultra-authoritarian turn and rounded up journalists in September, 2001. It is now Africa's biggest prison for media personnel and is ranked last in the world press freedom index that Reporters Without Borders published on 30 January.

Ethiopia: Eritrean Opposition Urges Action To Stop Refugee Kidnappings'

Sudan Tribune (France) - February 5, 2013: Addis Ababa (Ethiopia) — Eritrea's biggest opposition group has called for urgent action to stop rising abductions and disappearances against Eritrean refugees sheltered at Shagarab refugee camp in Eastern Sudan. According to the UN, human right groups and Eritrean opposition groups, Eritrean refugees who arrive at the border in neighbouring Sudan - hoping to claim asylum - are increasingly being kidnapped for ransom, sexual exploitation, forced marriage and bonded labour. As a result, Eritrean refugees now live in fear of such attacks by networked traffickers operating in and around the camp. Tewelde Guebresilase, is the chairman of the Eritrean Democratic Alliance (EDA), a coalition of 11 Eritrean resistance groups based in Ethiopia. In an Interview, Tewelde told Sudan Tribune that smuggling and human trafficking is carried out by a highly organised network that stretches from the borders of Eritrea to refugee camps in Sudan and the Sinai peninsula in Egypt. According to reports, refugees are kidnapped in cooperation with the Rashaida tribe, armed gangs, and local tribesmen in Eastern Sudan. They are then transferred to Sinai where they are forcibly sold for different purposes, including the extraction of their organs. According to the opposition official, on 22 January armed men abducted five Eritrean refugees - four of them women - from Shagarab camp, Following the incident, angry Eritrean refugees attacked individuals they believed were behind the abductions, with the violence leading to a number of injuries between the two sides. Excluding unconfirmed cases, the UNHCR has documented the disappearance and kidnapping of 551 Eritrean refugees in 2012 alone - a more than five-fold increase from the previous year. It is estimated that up to 2,000 Eritreans arrive in Sudan every month. However, increasing kidnappings, gang rapes and other attacks, as well as tightened border controls by the Eritrean security forces have led to a drop in arrivals to Sudan to only hundreds in a month. While expressing grave concern over the kidnapping situation in Shagarab refugee camp, UNHCR spokesperson Melissa Fleming last week called on all national and international actors to step up efforts to counter the ongoing kidnappings by criminal groups against Eritrean refugees and asylum-seekers. She said that UNHCR is working with the Sudanese authorities and other international partners to curb the risk of abductions and kidnappings in Eastern Sudan. "The Government of Sudan has already deployed additional police and we are supporting the authorities to improve overall security, including the construction and rehabilitation of police stations, provision of vehicles and communication equipment," she said. However, Eritrean opposition groups here say that the Sudanese government has done "almost nothing" to protect the Eritrean refugees. Tewelde called on the Sudanese government to respect the rights of refugees to seek asylum under national and international laws. He called on Sudanese authorities to refrain from their previous practices of forcibly returning Eritrean refugees. The opposition group appealed on the international community and particularly the UNHCR to seriously look into the issues and act swiftly. Thousands of young Eritreans have fled their homeland to escape political oppression and military service by the dictatorial regime in Asmara, which recently faced a small army mutiny. Since January 2010, an estimated 60,000 Eritreans have arrived at the reception camp of Shagarab. According to the UN refugee agency, the Shagarab camp currently hosts almost 30,000 people.

Uganda Grants Political Asylum to Attending Eritrean Soccer players'

KAMPALA (Xinhua) February 16, 2013: The Eritrean national football team which disappeared in Uganda has finally got refugee status in the East African country, a senior government official said here on Monday. Apollo David Kazungu, Commissioner for Refugees in the Office of the Prime Minister told Xinhua in an interview that the Refugee Eligibility Committee had found the group's claims valid and granted them refugee status. The Eritrean team had been eliminated in the 2012 Council for East and Central African Football Associations (Cecafa) tournament in the early stages after drawing with Zanzibar 0-0, losing 3-2 to Malawi and being beaten 2-0 by Rwanda in their last match. Instead of boarding the next plane out of Uganda, the players and officials left their hotel reportedly for shopping, and only three returned home. Kazungu said that most of the team refused to return home for fear of being allegedly conscripted into military training. He said although the Eritreans players have been granted asylum, they have not been relocated to resettlement camps because they prefer to stay in the Ugandan capital Kampala. After the 2010 CECAFA tournament in Tanzania, 13 players from Eritrea's team also disappeared and defected. Several of those players have since reappeared in Houston, Texas under a refugee resettlement program in the United States.

Eritrea - President claimed the Eritrean military's takeover of MoI was nothing to worry about'

Asmara (February 23, 2013): Though Eritrean president Issaias Affewerki claimed the Eritrean military's takeover of the Information Ministry on February 21, was nothing to worry about. But very few people in the region believed him, according to analysts. On January 21, 2013, a force of 200 to 300 Eritrean soldiers, backed up by armored vehicles, surrounded the information ministry headquarters in Asmara. The soldiers told the director general of Eritrean state television to broadcast a demand that all political prisoners be freed. The broadcast was made, and then the state television went off the air for the rest of the day. One source claimed that the broadcast statement included a demand that the 1997 constitution be implemented. Exiled Eritrean opposition groups (most of them have a presence in Ethiopia's capital, Addis Ababa) have been claiming for several years that discontent in the Eritrean military was growing and that there are increasing demands within the military for economic and political reform. Since the January 21 incident in Asmara, the exile groups have said the information ministry incident proved their claim beyond doubt. Initially, several exile groups called the incident a mutiny and the first stage of a revolt against Issaias and his regime. The soldiers, however, returned to their barracks. Their leaders did not call for the removal of Issaias. One source reported that the dissident soldiers were enlisted personnel led by mid-level officers. No senior officers were overtly involved, though since the incident there are reports that a handful of generals have told Issaias that Eritrea's economic situation is a disaster and that reform is necessary. One unsubstantiated report claimed that Issaias was told this by several senior officers in 2012. If it is true that Issaias is being confronted by senior officers who favor reforms, then the ministry of information action could be seen as a big time message to the regime, sent by some very powerful military reformers. So far no one has reported a release of political prisoners but then there have been no reports of mass executions of the mutineers. Eritrea has a lot of political prisoners, though no one is precisely sure how many. Estimates on the number of political prisoners jailed by the Issaias regime vary greatly, from 5,000 to over 12,000. Compared to the millions Stalin and Mao jailed, even 12,000 prisoners is small pickings. Eritrea, however, only has a population of 5.7 million people. Ethiopia has a population of some 85 million. Yet Eritrea manages to keep approximately 300,000 soldiers on duty. The figure may be higher, up to 350,000, but the higher figures probably include some of the better armed citizen militia units. Even the lower estimates tell a harsh story about Eritrea's political, social, and dismal economic situation. Somewhere between five to six percent of the entire population is in the military. But this wrinkle on the demographic numbers is the truly telling statistic: at least 12 percent of the country's labor force is in the military. During the Ethiopia-Eritrea War, Eritrea was often described as a fully mobilized state. Indeed it was. To fight Ethiopia to a draw demanded it. Today, however, Eritrea is a truly militarized state, meaning it is a perpetually mobilized state, so much so that it is fair to argue that the military is the only constituency in the country that matters. That's why the January 21 incident is significant, no matter what the president says or at least hopes people will believe. A military unit had the courage and wherewithal to publicly demand reform and it made the demand on live television.

Eritreans arrested in Sweden for extortion'

By The Local; February 24, 2013: Two men and one woman have been arrested in Stockholm on suspicion of blackmail and conspiring to commit murder in a case believed to be connected to the Eritrean regime's systematic oppression of Eritreans living in exile. The three suspects allegedly presented extortion demands from kidnappers in Egypt and told their victims that their relatives would be killed unless they paid huge sums for their release. The threats persisted for weeks until the three were arrested earlier this week. According to Krister Peterson, chief prosecutor at the International Public Prosecution Office, several similar crimes have been reported in Sweden in the past. Eritreans in Sweden have claimed that hundreds of families in Sweden have been targeted by kidnappers operating in the Sinai desert in Egypt, reported news agency

TT. Many similar cases have also been reported in other countries, including Norway. “There is a suspicion that Eritrean refugees have been kidnapped while fleeing the country and that people in Sweden have then been forced to pay for their release,” said Peterson. TT reported that at least seven Swedish Eritrean families were targeted last year by a high-ranking Eritrean military officer.

He reportedly kidnapped relatives of the families in Eritrea, brought them to the Sudanese border and then demanded that the families pay $7,000 within 24 hours or the relatives would be handed over to kidnappers in Egypt. One woman told TT that her 16-year-old brother was abducted in Sudan a few months ago and brought to another group of kidnappers in Sinai. “They called once every half hour while they were beating him and demanded $38,000...We had to pay to save his life”, the woman said. One month later, the kidnappers released the 16-year-old near the Israeli border. He is now being held in Israel and it is unclear what will happen to him next, according to the woman.

A 2012 United Nations report described how generals from the Eritrean army liaise with kidnappers in Sinai, earning millions from kidnappings, human trafficking, and arms trading. “The criminal network smuggles Eritrean migrants and Eritrean weapons, often in the same vehicle,” the UN report says. “Once they arrive in Sudan or Sinai the Eritrean migrants are taken hostage and are tortured, raped or killed, while their kidnappers demand on average between $30,000 and $40,000 in ransom, which is often negotiated with the help of Eritrean middlemen.” Investigators from the UN arrived in Sweden this week to gather testimonies from Swedish Eritreans. They are also interested in how Eritrea continues to collect taxes from Eritreans living in exile, often through intimidation and blackmail. The UN has enforced sanctions against Eritrea because of the country’s support for armed groups in the Horn of Africa, including the terrorist-labelled al-Shabaab in Somalia.

Horrific tale of torture and death for Eritreans in Sinai’

SINAI, EYGYPT By Mike Thomson, BBC News - March 6, 2013: Lemlem, 17, is one of thousands of people who make the treacherous journey from Eritrea to Egypt each year. Many fall victim to unscrupulous people traffickers, who kidnap them and demand ransom money from their families. “The kidnappers would make me lie on my back and then they would get me to ring my family to ask them to pay the ransom they wanted," she says, lifting up the back of her shirt to expose a rash of deep scars. “As soon as one of my parents answered the phone, the men would melt flaming plastic over my back and inner thighs and I would scream and scream in pain.

“This, they hoped, would put extra pressure on my mother and father to find the money.” A man standing next to her gently places a hand on her shoulder as she finishes speaking. Zere, his faced swathed in a red and white scarf, was one of those kept with her in a windowless basement room for almost a year. “They had about four of five of us tied up together and they would pour water on the floor and then electrocute the water so that all of us would get electrocuted at the same time,” he says. “They would starve us, they would burn us and they would not let us sleep.” Zere says that nine out of the 20 people held hostage with him died. But, he tells me, by that point those still alive would have welcomed that fate. “All of us were actually hoping for death because that would have been an escape from the torture.” In fact Lamlam and Zere were able to escape - rescued by a local Bedouin leader, Sheikh Mohammed al-Maniri. A small building at the back of his house is now home to a dozen people that he has rescued. Sometimes though, he says, it is too late. “Many people we bring here have been really badly tortured. “In two cases recently some of those we rescued died, here in this house, because they had been injured so much.”

‘Hundreds of bodies’: The UN has described the growth of the kidnap and people trafficking trades in Sinai as one of the most unreported humanitarian crises in the world. It estimates that 3,000 Eritreans alone fled their repressive and impoverished country last year. Many headed for the swollen refugee camps of neighbouring eastern Sudan, now home to more than 90,000 people. The UN says that 70% of the new arrivals then vanish. Many fall into the hands of ruthless and well-armed people-smuggling gangs as they try to make their way to Israel or Egypt in search of a better life. Whilst some do make it through, others are sold on to different gangs two or three times as they are trafficked north. Hostage victims are often taken to the largely lawless, desert area of north Sinai, where their kidnappers can operate with near impunity. In 2012, the UN’s High Commissioner for Refugees, Antonio Guterres, said that a “criminal network” of smugglers and traffickers was “taking profit of the desperate situation of many Eritreans”. Egyptian security forces do operate in this region but only in limited numbers because of a long-standing peace agreement with neighbouring Israel. In the mortuary in the town of El Arish, the extent of the carnage caused by the gruesome kidnap trade is even more evident. “Since the revolution there have been hundreds of bodies because the borders have been more lax,” says mortician Era Ki, as he points towards the deep-freeze cabinets in front of us. “The corpses usually have torture-style injuries. “The ones that come from the Bedouin [people-traffickers] have always been tortured to get their families to pay ransoms” “If their families can’t pay, they have no use for them and torture them to death.” Even those whose families somehow manage to pay the large ransoms demanded, often feel they cannot go home now that their relatives have been financially ruined. Berhane, an Eritrean refugee I met living in a squalid Cairo slum is one. After being beaten, tortured and electrocuted for months before his family paid $30,000 (£20,000) for his release, he says he has constant terrifying flashbacks and cannot face going home. Berhane has this message for any Eritreans thinking of following in his footsteps: “Stay where you are. “Whatever you do, don’t let yourself fall into the hands of the traffickers.”

Exit Eritrea: How Could it all End for Issaias Affewerki?

Article by Andy Ryan - March 14, 2013: Affewerki’s grip on power in Eritirea is showing signs of weakness. But will we see a coup, cosmetic reforms or even an uprising? Ever since 1993, when Eritrea gained independence and the national assembly elected him president, Isaias Afewerki has ruled over the small East African nation. In these two decades, Afewerki has largely disregarded civil and political rights, jailing dissidents, neglecting to hold elections, banning opposition parties, and restricting freedom of movement. Regionally, Eritrea became diplomatically isolated after disputes with Ethiopia over access to ports erupted into bloody conflict between 1998 and 2000. Many Eritreans have had to rely on food aid, and thousands of ordinary Eritreans have fled, with many finding themselves at the mercy of human traffickers. According to the likes of Human Rights Watch, Afewerki has turned Eritrea into one of the world’s most repressive and isolated states. But after 20 years in power, recent events suggest the president may be losing his grip on power. The possibility that Afewerki will remain a president for life is starting to weaken, and speculation has begun on what end his regime will eventually face. Below are three possibilities for how it could all end.

Countdown to a coup? A coup might be the regime’s most likely end. Recent high-profile emigrations suggest that President Afewerki is losing the trust and respect of former loyalists. These include his Information Minister, two air force officers (making their escape on the president’s private jet), a leading eye surgeon, and a significant portion of the national football team. Though details remain hard to verify, there also seems to have been a failed coup, mutiny or military protest on 21 January from within the armed forces, laying bare Afewerki’s possibly weakening control of the military. Afewerki responded with a series of arrests, and will no doubt hope any further potential critics have now been imprisoned or been strongly dissuaded from taking action. However, it is possible that the 21 January events will act as a catalyst for attempts on power, with potential rebels now viewing the regime as vulnerable. Realistically, a coup led by genuine democratic reformers is difficult to imagine. Instead, the leaders would likely be long-standing members of the regime – probably from the pervasive military or security services. Few individuals are likely to expose themselves to the considerable risks involved in a coup attempt, only to then contest power at the ballot box. Yet even a new dictatorship would likely show greater pragmatism than the Afewerki regime. Considering the country’s perilous economic situation, there would probably be some attempt to end the country's current international isolation.

Implementing reform? The 16-year constitutional itch: After 16 years of waiting, it is evident that President Afewerki has no desire to ever implement the 1997 constitution. He has consistently shown himself unwilling to tolerate any form of opposition, and it is almost inconceivable that he would permit the existence of legitimate opposition parties. The possibility of more limited reform rests on whether the mutiny and high-profile emigrations have had any psychological impact on the president. Following the lead of other dictators throughout history, he could seek to make limited democratic concessions in a bid to gain legitimacy. Yet his record overwhelming depicts him as a man who prefers to tighten his grip through force rather than cunning. His response is much more likely to be increased repression than pragmatic reform.

Popular uprising: an Eritrean Spring? The probability of this scenario is the hardest to judge. Eritreans have long seen the Afewerki's People's Front for Democracy and Justice (PFDJ) exercise power with little restraint, and will be aware of the danger of engaging in open protest. Opposition groups within the country have been so harshly repressed that it is even hard to see where the necessary spark and organisation might come from. Yet the Arab Spring spectacularly displayed that well-entrenched regimes can be overwhelmed by popular uprisings. In recent weeks, posters have appeared in the capital of Asmara calling for street protests. This is an indication of an increasing willingness amongst some Eritreans to defy the regime, and suggests a belief that they may hold the power to end the country's woes. The most intriguing question is whether Afewerki would be able to rely on his security forces if confronted by a mass uprising. The loyalty of young conscripts could certainly not be relied upon so, ultimately, much would rest on the decisions of senior officials. They would be forced to judge whether they were protecting a healthy or dying regime – and act accordingly. THINK AFRICA PRESS

Human Trafficking and the Human Rights Agenda Against Eritrea

Posted by Alexandra Valiente on March 20, 2013
"Eritrea is among the very few African nations that have avoided entanglement with the U.S. military machine. As a consequence, Eritrea has been subjected to a campaign of sanctions, threats and lies, much of it centering on allegations of human trafficking and use of child soldiers. "Eritrea is not allowed to defend itself in court, in the media, or anywhere in the international arena." By Simon Tesfamariam

Introduction

On March 1, 2013, Joel Millman of the Wall Street Journal published a piece entitled "Ruthless Kidnapping Rings Reach From Desert Sands to U.S. Cities." The article chronicles the touching personal accounts of Eritrean refugees being kidnapped and taken for ransom in Egypt's Sinai desert. As disheartening as this piece may be to even the most apathetic observers, Eritreans are growing increasingly aware of the fact that similar articles highlighting the trafficking of Eritreans are becoming a regular occurrence. Although human trafficking, smuggling, and migration have been longstanding problems that have plagued the so-called developing world, it seems somewhat curious that Eritrea is suddenly getting the brunt of the international attention. Why now? Although increased international attention may be positive in that it sheds needed light on the plight of the affected migrants, the reality is that pieces like this are often politically motivated, lacking context, skewing the facts on the ground, and serving as part of larger campaign to vilify and isolate Eritrea.

Before we delve into this whole human trafficking ordeal, we must note that Eritrea was the target of UN sanctions in 2009. Since then, the Somalia and Eritrea Monitoring Group (SEMG) has been regularly reporting on Eritrea's role in Somalia to the Security Council. The group has made many ridiculous claims ranging from Eritrea's alleged support of al-Shabab in Somalia to a failed bombing attempt on an African Union summit in Ethiopia. Both accusations were later shown to be false [1, 2].

As the last SEMG report reveals, linking Eritrea to terrorism is a futile task. [3] The expectations of the nation seem like a moving target and now the new focus of the international media and the SEMG is on Eritrea's "use of revenues from the taxation of Eritrean citizens in the diaspora, from human trafficking of refugees through Sudan and Egypt, and from gold mining." [4]

The emerging concerns regarding a sovereign state's use of its revenues from any legitimate source – be it from a diaspora tax or gold mining or whatever – is a mystery unworthy of pursuit. The human trafficking issue, however, is a serious allegation that may be used in conjunction with broader human rights allegations to build a case for the expansion of UN sanctions on Eritrea. Thus, the issue requires further inspection.

In a speech regarding human trafficking delivered at the Clinton Global Initiative on September 25 of last year, President Obama made the following remarks:

I recently renewed sanctions on some of the worst abusers, including North Korea and Eritrea. We're partnering with groups that help women and children escape from the grip of their abusers. We're helping other countries step up their own efforts. And we're seeing results. More nations have passed and more are enforcing modern anti-trafficking laws." [5]

What kind of "partnering" is he talking about, exactly? It's not within the US's authority or obligations to help people escape from a nation. To do so would be human smuggling. President Obama is essentially admitting to taking part in smuggling people out of Eritrea and North Korea. The US can only support those who take refuge in the US following immigration from another nation. The president's comments came as surprise to many Eritreans.

About one month later, Eritrea's presidential advisor, Yemane Gebreab, explained that "Eritrea is a victim of human trafficking" and that "for a number of years now, some people have felt that one way that they could weaken Eritrea would be by encouraging Eritrean youths to leave the country in larger numbers." [6] Are his claims valid? Is there a systematic effort to drive youth out of Eritrea?

Linking Eritrea to Human Trafficking

Let us rewind to May 5, 2009. In a wikileaked diplomatic cable entitled "Promoting Educational Opportunity for Anti-Regime Eritrean Youth," the then US Ambassador to Eritrea, Ronald K. McMullen explained that "Post plans to restart visa services (completely suspended in 2007) for student visa applicants; we intend to give opportunities to study in the United States to those who oppose the regime." [7] He then goes on:

"Post intends to begin adjudicating student visa applications, regardless of whether the regime is willing to issue the applicant an Eritrean passport and exit visa. If an applicant is otherwise found eligible for a student visa, Post will issue it in a Form DS-232…With an Eritrean passport and an F1 visa in a Form DS-232, the lucky young person is off to America. For those visa recipients who manage to leave the country and receive UNHCR refugee status, a UN-authorized travel document might allow the young person to travel to America with his or her F1 in the DS-232.

"Due to the Isaias regime´s ongoing restrictions on Embassy Asmara, Post does not contemplate a resumption of full visa services in the near future. However, giving young Eritreans hope, the chance for an education, and the skills with which to rebuild their impoverished country in the post-Isaias period is one of the strongest signals we can send to the Eritrean people that the United States has not abandoned them. Were we to begin processing student visa applications and require a regime-issued passport, we would be seen as strengthening the dictatorship´s hand. Thus, the limited category-specific exemption outlined above is key."

The cable's title alone, reveals the ambassador's intentions. And if one wonders why brain drain is an issue in the developing world, perhaps this cable may provide some insight. What young person, anywhere in the world, wouldn’t want a chance to come to the US? Though the more important question is, why now? Why restart issuing visas in 2009 after a two year suspension? Perhaps the answers will become clear shortly. McMullen, who clearly seeks to weaken the Eritrean "regime" (as in "government we don't like"), also makes curious mention of preparing for a "post-Isaias period," which becomes more interesting when one considers that his doctoral thesis at the University of Iowa was on the "Economic Consequences of African Coups D'etat." [8] He also served as the Charge' d'Affaires in the Fiji Islands during the 2000 coup d'etat. In another leaked cable he predicted the Eritrean government is ''one bullet away from implosion'' and posed that "any sudden change in government is likely to be initiated from within the military." [9]

McMullen is no longer the ambassador but in light of the recently fabricated "coup" rumor that the international mainstream media has been recklessly trumpeting,[10] perhaps the US sent McMullen to make use of his expertise. As Rafael Correa once jokingly stated, "the only country that can be sure never to have a coup d'état is the United States because it hasn't got a U.S. Embassy."

While on the one hand secretly promoting Eritrean youth migration, the US administration was simultaneously taking actions against Eritrea for not doing enough to stop it. One month after McMullen's cable announcing the secret restart of F1 visa processing, in violation of the basic tenets of consular relations, the US Administration suddenly classified Eritrea as a "Tier 3″ nation in the US State Department's June 2009 "Trafficking in Persons Report." [11] Keep in mind that Eritrea didn't even make the list in 2008 and, unlike other nations that started off with Tier 1 and 2 warnings, Eritrea jumped straight to Tier 3. The entire reasoning behind doing this is that it allows trafficking nations to meet the "minimum standards" by the following year. [12] As a result of this unprecedented move, President Obama added Eritrea and 5 other African countries to a blacklist that would subject them "to the trafficking sanctions, which can include a ban on non-humanitarian and trade-related aid and U.S. opposition to loans and credits from the International Monetary Fund and World Bank." [13]

What did the report say about Eritrea, exactly? In essence it stated that Eritrea was a "source country" for human trafficking and that it didn't do enough to prevent the practice. That could apply to almost every nation on the planet. Notably, the report focused more on "large numbers of migrant workers" and made almost passing mention of the Eritrean government being "complicit in conscripting children into military service." In spite of no significant policy changes to the Eritrean national service program, subsequent reports, which are released annually, focused less on the "migrant workers" and increasingly more on the "conscripts," "adolescent children" being sent to Sawa, and "child laborers." More on this later.

Following the TIP report, US ambassador McMullen's writes in an August 26, 2009 leaked diplomatic cable about a young unnamed Eritrean "who is preparing to flee the country" and supposedly confesses the intricate details of his escape plan. [14] McMullen writes that he will "use one of the Eritrean National Security Officers (ENSO), who he claimed to be the ringleaders in smuggling of Eritreans to the Sudan border" and "he stated the cost at 80,000 nakfa." This is the first time we see official US documentation of claims that Eritrean government officials are directly involved in the smuggling of citizens outside the country. This is despite the fact that about a year earlier the Chargé d'Affaires, Matthew D. Smith, confessed in another leaked diplomatic cable entitled "How To Escape From Eritrea" that "the GSE [Government of the State of Eritrea] is very keen to break these human smuggling rings and dispatches agents to pose as potential customers. Other agents pose as facilitators, making all of the supposed smuggling arrangements prior to having the unsuspecting person arrested." [15]

In spite of the Eritrean government's efforts to combat smuggling, the Somalia and Eritrea Monitoring Group (SEMG) produced a report in 2011 that expanded on McMullen's claims. The report states:

421. The well-documented exodus of young Eritreans to escape poverty or obligatory "national service" represents yet another opportunity for corruption and illicit revenue. People smuggling is so pervasive that it could not be possible without the complicity of Government and party officials, especially military officers working in the western border zone, which is headed by General Teklai Kifle "Manjus".

Multiple sources have described to the Monitoring Group how Eritrean officials collaborate with ethnic Rashaida smugglers to move their human cargo through the Sudan into Egypt and beyond. This is in most respects the same network involved in smuggling weapons through to Sinai and into Gaza.

422. According to former Eritrean military officials and international human rights activists, military officers involved in the practice charge roughly $3,000 a head for each person exiting Eritrea.

The Monitoring Group has obtained details of a Swiss bank account into which the proceeds from smuggling have been deposited and has provided the Swiss authorities with information related to this account, together with the personal and contact details of the Swiss-based coordinator of this trafficking ring and details of the coordinator's Egypt-based associates. [16]

For the SEMG's extraordinary claims it cites as its only sources an "interview with Eritrean individuals directly involved in people smuggling operations" and an "interview with Eritrean source, Switzerland, March 2011." In the 2012 follow-up report, the SEMG repeats the same human trafficking claims, citing no sources as evidence. "The trafficking of arms and people is managed by the same networks using the same vehicles, and the same Eritrean officials are implicated," the report states. The SEMG then claims to have acquired 1,300 testimonies of which "61 were from Eritreans who identified the names of Rashaida smugglers." Artfully interweaving groups of similar testimonies as vignettes, the report attempts to illustrate the validity of earlier claims made by the SEMG. Finally, it shows photos of body wounds of two unnamed and faceless torture victims. The annex is only 3 pages long, filled with photos, and has nothing to do with human trafficking allegations.

After reading both reports, one is left scratching their head. That's it? No real people's names? No bank account numbers? No photos of human traffickers? Where is the hard evidence? Extraordinary claims require extraordinary evidence. To put things in perspective, imagine a man is brought to trial on charges of torture and the prosecuting team presents the following as their "evidence" against him:

- 1. Claims against him by unnamed interviewers with no transcripts for the court to review
- 2. Pictures of unnamed and faceless victims he allegedly tortured
- 3. 61 snippets of testimonies by the nameless victims who he allegedly tortured
- 4. Claims against him by people who openly call themselves his "opposition"
- 5. Claims against him by one of his former torturer buddies, who is unnamed

The defendant then demands access to the evidence and witnesses for cross-examination but his request is denied. Based on the information, he is then found guilty and expected to accept his sentence. Would that be justice? Of course not. However, this is exactly what Eritrea has had to face regularly in regards to the UN Security Council and SEMG reports. This system of international law requires incredible trust in the prosecutors–the SEMG, in this case–who Eritrea had no say in appointing. And if we think that the SEMG is actually a committee of independent experts as opposed to a prosecuting team, then why would the head of the SEMG, Matt Bryden, say "we're trying to make the case that any improvement in Eritrea's conduct is the result of sanctions, and that it's too early to lift them because of the other violations they have committed"? [17]

In essence, he's saying;

“yeah, I know we couldn’t find evidence that they support terrorism but please keep the sanctions because of this new human trafficking ordeal.” In other words he is prosecuting and making a case against Eritrea and, unfortunately, it's completely within his mandate to share his opinion [18].

That's UN justice for you. The SEMG's "evidence" would be considered a joke if wasn't so serious. According to the UNSC, the successful implementation of "targeted sanctions" on any nation is premised on the expectations that the "panel of experts" will uphold the highest standards of evidence, which is the key tenet of the 2003 Stockholm Process. In this regard, the 2003 UNSC states:

"While recognizing that it might sometimes be necessary to uphold the confidentiality of sources of information available to expert panels or monitoring groups regarding sanctions busting or non-compliance, the Stockholm paper notes that the credibility of the findings and the integrity of the process required that evidence be as transparent and verifiable as possible…sanctions should be based on concrete evidence of violations of international law or Council obligations, and not based on presumptions, media reports or motivated allegations." [19]

The SEMG report clearly falls short. To make matters worse, Eritrea doesn't get to comment or defend itself at any point in the process because according to the SEMG, which unprofessionally leaked the report to the media before Eritrea could see it, [20] "the Government of Eritrea failed to provide responses to any Monitoring Group correspondence and declined to grant the repeated requests." How convenient. Where have we seen this sort of tactic before? For years, the world has been unable to hear Eritrea's side of the story:

A. On the Kenyan defections:

"Eritrean officials were unavailable for comment on Tuesday." [21]

B. On Eritrea's alleged bombing of the AU (proved false by WikiLeaks [22]:

"Eritrean officials were unavailable for comment on Tuesday." [23]

C. On claims of human trafficking:

"Eritrean government…did not respond to requests to provide information for this report." [24]

D. On relations with the US:

“It has been difficult to talk to Eritrea frankly. We have had trouble getting them to talk to us. I sent the Assistant Secretary for African Affairs to talk with Mr. Isaias and he didn’t see her.” [25]

E. On breakdown of US-Eritrea relations:

"Eritrean officials were not immediately available to comment on the decision" [26]

The list goes on and on, ad infintum. The point is that Eritrea is not allowed to defend itself in court, in the media, in reports, or anywhere in the international arena. It's no surprise that Eritrea is so misunderstood by the world. In contrast, the darlings of the mainstream media, the US and Ethiopia, were also accused of violating the Somali arms embargo by the former Somalia monitoring groups yet we saw no prosecution by the UNSC. Is this justice? No way! In the words of Gerald Celente, it's "just-us" and unfortunately Eritrea isn't one of "them."

Following the SEMG report, the UNHCR released a report in November 2012 entitled "Refugees and the Rashaida: human smuggling and trafficking from Eritrea to Sudan and Egypt." [27]

The document states that "it has come to light that some members of the military and Eritrean Government are complicit in smuggling" and it references the 2012 SEMG report. It talks about General Teklai Kifle, adding no new information, and then goes on at length about the Rashaida ethnic group's involvement in the human trafficking business. In regards to both of them, "it is thought there are varying levels of experience and organization within the groups of Rashaida who engage in taking Eritreans to Sinai. However other networks, such as those organized by some members of the Eritrean Government for smuggling arms are highly organized." In other words, the government is the syndicate–the major player. What's interesting about this particular report is the divisive new ethnic and regional dimension it seems to take:

"There is a marked difference between the majority of the refugee population and those now leaving Eritrea. Those now leaving the country are young, Christian, Tigrinya from urban areas. Much like young Sudan-born refugees, the new arrivals are generally unwilling to remain in an enclosed camp setting without access to higher education or employment.

…Eritrean brokers are key to arranging onward movement with Rashaida from within the camp. The facilitators in the route are usually of the same ethnicity as those embarking on the movement (Hamood 2006: 50). Furthermore, life in the refugee camp is characterized by ethnic divides. Different ethnicities are thought to have different aspirations. One testimony states that people from Akele-Guzai region are thought to have strong connections abroad and to be most likely going to Israel. Those from Maekel region are believed to be going to Europe, while those from Gash Barka are simply associated with smuggling people out of Eritrea and settling in Sudan (Mehari 2010).”

Turning to the reference section to investigate the source of the aforementioned claims, the report cites an "unpublished paper" by someone named "Mehari, K" (Mehari, K. 2010. "Desert in Disorder" unpublished paper). Investigating the rest of the citations for follow-up is a futile task as most references are made to personal interviews with individuals like Meron Estifanos, who was integral in propagating the fabricated "coup" in January 2013 and using it as a springboard for the so-called "Forto 2013″ campaign. [28]

Returning to the latest publication of the US State Department TIP report, we hear echoes of the SEMG's allegations of corruption by senior Eritrean army officers. As opposed to the 2009 report, the 2012 publication is focused less on migrants workers more on youth conscripted into national service. More notably, the report seems to focus on the Eritrean government's alleged conscription of minors. It states that "adolescent children that attempt to leave Eritrea have been forced into military service despite being younger than the minimum service age of 18. As part of the requirements to complete their senior year of high school, adolescent children are also sent to Sawa, Eritrea's military academy, prior to their eighteenth birthday." Surprisingly, this claim was later cited by Child Soldiers International in a 2012 case study to support the claim that Eritrea uses child soldiers. This "study" was, in turn, posted on the UNHCR website and is currently being used by journalists and various NGO's to propagate the notion that Eritrea's use of "child soldiers" is driving youth out of the country.

Nowhere is the international media's desperation to point out the Eritrean government's blunders more evident than in its claim that Eritrea uses "child soldiers." When the average person reads about child soldiers in Africa, she/he may conjure up the classical CNN-promoted image of regime-indoctrinated 9 year-olds mowing down civilians. Perhaps the image is sometimes a wee bit less graphic but the reality is that the claims of child soldiers in Africa perpetuates the stereotype of a barbaric Africa out of control and encourages intervention against nations like Eritrea. Thus, such claims must be taken seriously. In regards to their Eritrea study, Child Soldiers International states the following: "To prevent increasing evasion of national service by school leavers, the government announced in 2003 that the final year of secondary education, Year 12, must be performed at the Sawa Military Training Camp in western Eritrea near the border with Sudan. Because the Year 12 designation is based not on a child's age but rather on the school grade achieved, some Year 12 students are under 18 years old. According to a recent US State Department report on human rights in Eritrea, Students at Sawa were typically 18 years old or older, although a fair percentage were as young as 16 years old.'

"The government denies underage conscription and argues that students attending the twelfth grade in Sawa should not be confused with national service conscripts. However, the Year 12 students at Sawa have military status and are under the jurisdiction of the Ministry of Defence and subject to military discipline. They are therefore in reality soldiers, even if not fully operational members of the Eritrean National Army." [29]

The sad part about this is that the "Eritrea recruits child soldiers" claim is entirely based on this hair splitting of mandatory twelfth grade education. Such reporting is irresponsible for two reasons. Firstly, this report is based on non-independent politically biased sources like the US State Department. Secondly, even if 16-year-olds attended Sawa they are not considered members of the Eritrean National Army, as CSI even admits. Consideration should also be given to the fact that while most of the world submits to more lax standards on child soldier laws enshrined in the UN Convention on the Rights of the Child (CRC), Africa has collectively gone above and beyond by signing the African Charter on the Rights and Welfare of the Child, which by default accedes to the "Optional Protocols" of the CRC and increases the minimum military recruitment age from 15 to 18. [30] Given these more stringent laws and the known fact that most reported child soldiers are between ages 15-18 years old, it's no surprise that half of the world's child soldiers are in Africa. [31]

Regardless of the facts, the media is quick to dish out the child soldier label in Africa. There's a reason why the spineless international media points out "child soldiers" in Eritrea while it ignores "child soldiers" in the UK, which is also a signatory to the Option Protocols and refers to the exact same argument as Eritrea. [32]

Let us also refresh the UN's memory and recall that in 2002, the UNSC Special Representative for Children and Armed Conflict, Olara Otunnu, visited Eritrea to assess the use of child soldiers. He concluded that there was "no systematic use of child soldiers" and said that "the absence of the 'child soldiering' phenomenon was particularly impressive since no other conflict zone he had visited recently had been free of the problem." [33]

As shown above, there seems to be a concerted effort to link Eritrea to human trafficking. The reality is that we have yet to see any hard evidence to support this allegation. To make matters worse the international press almost reflexively blames it on child soldiers, forced labor, and lack of [insert word like freedom, democracy, religion, or other's words used to destroy Iraq, Libya, etc.]. As some of the wikileaked diplomatic cables suggest, the US State Department has made efforts to drive youth out of Eritrea to weaken the government. It then turns around and blames the Eritrean government for "human trafficking." These actions are part of a broader concerted and systematic effort by the US Administration to destroy Eritrea through the control of human migration. To understand this we must go back in history.

History of Migration in Eritrea

When Eritrea gained independence in the 1991, there were approximately 500,000 Eritrean refugees living in the Sudan. [34] At that time, the United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees (UNHCR) deemed the Eritrean refugee situation in East Sudan as a "protracted refugee situation." Spanning back to the 1960′s, it was the world's second longest standing refugee program after Palestine's. [] One year after independence, about 70,000 refugees returned home. In subsequent years, repatriation dropped dramatically. By 1995, there were still 282,000 refugees living in the Sudan, despite peace in Eritrea and despite the nation entering the so-called "African Renaissance." [36]

In a surprisingly honest 1996 Inter Press Service article, Arnulv Torbjornsen, UNHCR-Sudan chief at the time, admitted that "we (UNCHR) created a monster in Sudan"and that "we still support 2,000 jobs in the refugee business there, and there are vested interests in keeping the Eritrean refugees. If they repatriate, their refugee empire will collapse. We have to take a lot of responsibility for creating the situation in Sudan."
[37] He then goes on to explain that 80-90% of the refugees want to repatriate in Eritrea. He also said that "UNHCR conducted a survey in the camps in August 1995, and all said they wish to go home. But perhaps only about 50 percent of those spontaneously settled want to return – they have shops, houses, children in school, etc." Therefore, complete repatriation was impossible, despite peace and development in Eritrea, due to the ineffectiveness of UNHCR and the adoption by refugees of a new cultural and economic life in the diaspora.

In 1998, Eritrea was plunged into a two-year war with Ethiopia, displacing hundreds of thousands once again. By war's end, there were 50,000 returns and with hostilities over, UNHCR invoked the "cessation clause" (under Article 1. C. (5) of the 1951 Convention relating to the Status of Refugees [38]), which would terminate Eritrean refugee status as of 2002 unless individual refugees could demonstrate a continuing need for international protection. Thus, Eritreans in the Sudan would no longer be considered refugees but rather undocumented "migrants" and incoming refugees would no longer be accepted "prima facie" (i.e. automatically without processing) as they had been for decades. To gain UNHCR recognition and resettle in a wealthier nation, many Eritreans began to seek asylum – whether real or not – on the grounds that they would be persecuted if they returned to Eritrea. Thus, at this point incoming Eritreans transitioned into "asylum-seekers" as opposed to refugees. As one UN report explains "the number of Eritrean asylum seekers entering Sudan has grown quite dramatically, from around 1,000 in 2003 to almost 33,000 in 2008, with a somewhat smaller figure (between 22,000 and 25,000) in 2009 and 2010." [39]

This rise in asylum-seekers stems from the sudden cessation of prima facie recognition, which had been in place for decades and created a continuous pipeline for many Eritreans to resettle in much wealthier nations around the world. Instead of considering this reality, the UNHCR put together a 2004 position paper, taking a reductionist outlook and concluded that there was a rise in Eritrean asylum claims and decreased repatriation because "the human rights situation in Eritrea has seriously deteriorated in the past two years…with regard to the treatment of opposition political groups and movements, freedom of expression, freedom of religion, arbitrary detention…and the treatment of draft evaders." [40] The paper relied almost entirely on highly biased and politically motivated US State Department annual human rights reports on Eritrea. It also speckled in supposedly "independent investigations" by Amnesty International, which:

- 1. Did not collect its data from within Eritrea; [41]
- 2. Relied purely on the questionable personal accounts of nameless asylum-seekers that seek resettlement; and [42]
- 3. Has historically been used to promote imperial humanitarian intervention in non-western nations. [43]

Notably, the UNHCR paper did not seek or consider the accounts of Eritrean officials or, as some may prefer, the work of independent observers. The paper, which strongly argued that Eritrean asylum-seekers should not be returned to Eritrea, signified a new post-2004 policy direction for UNHCR that would only serve to perpetuate migration out of Eritrea. The "cessation clause" was revoked, meaning undocumented migrants would no longer be carefully reviewed on a case-by-case basis but rather en masse. Eritrea is still dealing with the consequences of this decision.

For UNHCR to somehow expect 100% of Eritreans to gleefully return to post-war poverty in the face of a decades long culture of resettling in other countries is quite ludicrous. Many still hadn't returned in 1996 while the honeymoon of independence was still there. Significantly, the UNHCR position paper – and their many other publications to follow – failed to make the slightest mention of the other etiologies of increased asylum and dwindling repatriation:

1. Natural economic migratory patterns. According to the Harris-Todaro theory of migration, migrants make a rational decision to increase their welfare or utility by moving to another place where they can expect to earn a higher income. [44] This is evident all throughout Africa and is a significant driving factor in "brain drain."
   Why is Eritrea, a remarkably poor nation, exempt from this consideration?
2. "No peace no war" situation. Despite the cessation of hostilities in 2000, the threat of a return to war in Eritrea is real and unrelenting. The Ethiopian government not only refused a “final and binding” ruling that would normalize relations but it also encroached on the Temporary Security Zone (buffer), which is now sovereign Eritrean territory [45].

The year before that, Ethiopia openly called for the overthrow of the Eritrean government, violating resolution 3314 (XXIX)(3)(g) of the UNGA.
[47] Thus, the threat is very real today. It was even more real back then. Why was this not considered?

3. Internally displaced people (IDPs). Returning refugees had to compete for resettlement with the 210,000 IDPs that were already present in 2000. This cannot be ignored, considering that there were still 45,000 IDPs in 2005, who would not be fully resettled until mid-2008. [48] Many of them were among the 80,000 forcefully expelled from Ethiopia, after Meles Zenawi infamously stated that his government could "expel anyone even if we don't like the color of their eyes." [49]

4. Severed Eritrea-Sudan relations. On account of the ruling National Islamic Front's support of terrorist groups like the Eritrean Islamic Jihad Movement that were radicalizing Eritrean refugees in East Sudan during the 1990′s, official diplomatic relations between the nations were terminated in 1995. [50] This made tripartite coordination between UNHCR, Eritrea, and the Sudan difficult. Diplomatic relations were only resumed after 2006.

5. Protracted refugee situation. As alluded to above, the presence of a decades-long UNHCR administered refugee program in East Sudan has created an economy and culture that inhibits its termination. In fact, various refugee camps economies were so successful that they became self-reliant and transformed themselves into villages. [51] In addition, various camps were seen as assets to the Sudanese Government, as large local mechanized farms became dependent on the cheap labor of Eritrean refugees. [52]

6.Reduced UNHCR donor funding. With the war over, donors expected Eritreans to return home and were reluctant to pledge more funds for East Sudan. [53]

7.Recurrent droughts. During periods of drought some Eritrean families would relocate to the Sudan.

8.UNHCR-Sudan's ineffectiveness. UNHCR ignored the self-criticism of Torbjornsen. It was only in later publications – when the damage was already done – that the organization came to grips with it's general ineffectiveness:

The internal factors which have visibly affected the operation in eastern Sudan include UNHCR's recurrent financial crisis; lack of consistent long-term vision compounded by a lack of institutional memory; changes of senior management without effective accountability, bringing about frequent changes of direction … Disregarding the history of the operation has invariably led to repeated reinventions and ultimately the waste of opportunities and resources. [54]

Following the UNHCR's change in policy, it was discovered that the UN Peacekeeping Mission to Eritrea and Ethiopia (UNMEE), which was present in Eritrea from 2000 to 2008, had also been involved in the trafficking of Eritreans yet UNCHR reports fail to mention or downplay this key fact. Instead they point the fingers at the Eritrean government, the Rashaidas, or whatever boogeyman fits their agenda. Let us recall that in a January 18, 2007 wikileaked diplomatic cable entitled "UNMEE: Confronting Sexual Abuse and Exploitation," the US Chargé d'Affaires in Eritrea, Jennifer McIntyre, wrote that "since the establishment of the UN Peacekeeping Mission to Eritrea and Ethiopia in 2001, there have been few reported incidents of sexual exploitation and abuse and trafficking in persons within Eritrea." However, she then goes to make the following admission:

What has been an on-going problem is human smuggling, with one highly visible case in fall 2006 of a UN Volunteer who attempted to smuggle several Eritreans to Ethiopia in an UNMEE vehicle. (Refs B&C) Other smuggling cases have predominantly involved local staff crossing the border in UNMEE vehicles. In one case, upon arrival in Ethiopia the local staff called UNMEE headquarters in Asmara to inform UNMEE staff where in Ethiopia they had abandoned the vehicle." [55]

This diplomatic cable validates what Eritrean government officials had been saying for years, despite downplaying or outright denials by UNMEE. In addition to illegally spying on the Eritrean Defense Forces, peacekeepers were accused of trafficking Eritreans, having sex with Eritrean children, and making pornographic films of Eritrean women, contrary to traditional culture. [56, 57] It was only in 2007 that UNHCR finally reported–albeit via passing mention–that "according to the refugees, some members of the United Nations peacekeeping mission to Ethiopia and Eritrea (UNMEE) were involved in human trafficking." [58]

And for what reason were they doing this, exactly? In a meeting with a group of Eritreans, a candid Italian UN officer admitted that "peacekeeping is a lucrative business and that is why I am here." [59] In 2008, Eritrea had seen enough and the "peacekeepers" were eventually kicked out. However, the damage had already been done. A pipeline outside of the country had been created through the work of foreign smugglers. Often times this smuggling leads to exploitation, which then deems it as "human trafficking." [60] To this day Eritrea is still dealing with this issue.

Another important point illustrated by McIntyre's leaked cable is that Eritreans were being smuggled into Ethiopia. Historically, Eritreans have migrated to the Sudan for refuge and hope of resettlement but migration to Ethiopia became somewhat of a new phenomenon that only took place after the 1998-2000 war with Ethiopia. Why is this the case? According to the US government-funded Cultural Orientation Resource Center (COR), which is responsible for "orienting" refugees, the "Eritrean refugees first crossed into Ethiopia in May 2000 after the 1998-2000 border conflict" and "many have fled conscription and come to Shimelba, a refugee camp just 25 kilometers (air distance) from the Eritrean/Ethiopian border." [61]

They claim the camp is made of 60% Tigrinyas and that "roughly speaking, about half the cases in the P2 group [those eligible for group US resettlement] were born in present day Ethiopia, were deported by the Ethiopian Government between 1996-2000, and then later fled back to Ethiopia." In other words, half of those eligible for US resettlement on the basis that they are Eritrean are actually Ethiopian. The document then states that the second largest group is that of the Kunamas. COR then goes on to explain that "the camp is run by the Ethiopian government with UNHCR oversight. There is a "central committee" that is elected by the camp population, and the committee represents the refugees on various issues, liaising with NGOs and the Ethiopian government." As we will see, this has led to a new sort of politicized resettlement program of supposedly Eritrean refugees.

In 2007, UNHCR announced that "700 ethnic Kunama refugees from Eritrea" were resettled in America from the Shimelba Refugee Camp. [62] Notice that it doesn't simply say "Eritreans" but rather takes a divisive turn by singling out one ethnic group from Eritrea. This is uncharacteristic of the highly nationalistic Eritreans ("kulu dihiri hager" or "everything after nation"). So what's going on here? Well, we learn from COR that "for some Kunama, being in Shimelba is akin to 'returning home,' excepting the irony that they now are refugees in their own homeland." What COR is highlighting is that fact that Kunamas are located on both sides of the border. During the Eritrea-Ethiopia war, many Ethiopian Kunamas were displaced and found refuge at the Shimbela refugee camp. Still, why is it that only Kunamas, whether Ethiopian or Eritrean, were being resettled in the US?

We learn from the Chargé d'Affaires in Ethiopia, Deborah Malac, in an October 6, 2008 wikileaked diplomatic cable entitled "The View From Inside Ethiopia's Eritrean Refugee Camps," that politicized resettlement was being used in the Shimelba refugee camp to organize an Eritrean opposition:

"UNHCR officials declared that they were unaware of any Eritrean opposition activity within Shimelba, though one Protection Officer noted that some Tigrinya refugees had requested urban relocation due to opposition harassment in the camps. ARRA [Ethiopian Administration for Refugee/Returnee Affairs] officials stated that opposition activity within the camps was not permitted, but a handful of Shimelba Kunama refugees insisted that, in fact, the opposition 'controlled' activity within camp and moved in and out freely. They also alleged complicity between ARRA and the Tigrinya and Kunama opposition. They said that the Kunama opposition, DMLEK [Democratic Movement for the Liberation of the Eritrean Kunama], ensured that all elected Kunama officials to the refugee council were either DMLEK members or sympathetic to the opposition." [63]

It doesn't end there:

"According to the refugees, DMLEK used intimidation tactics to force compliance from uncooperative refugees by threatening to use DMLEK's 'relationship' with both ARRA and UNHCR to ensure that the offending individual 'would never leave the camp.' One refugee, after refusing to join DMLEK, claimed he was arrested by the Ethiopian police on a trumped up charge and held for several weeks. Another refugee, who was a veteran of both the Eritrean liberation struggle and the 1998-2000 border war, said that when he arrived in Shimelba, ARRA offered to send him to Addis Ababa, and provide him with a vehicle, if he agreed to work in the opposition's radio station. When he refused he was told he would never be allowed to leave, and that he would never be resettled. Another refugee said that the largely Tigrinya 'Sedeg'e' opposition group tried to force him to join by telling him that if he did not, he would never leave the camp. (Note: Sedeg'e is also known as the Eritrean Revolutionary Democratic Front (ERDF), and is one of the three groups that joined together to form the Eritrean National Salvation Front (ENSF). The DMLEK and the ENSF are both members of the Eritrean Democratic Alliance (EDA). End note.)

The refugees said that armed persons could often be seen in the camp. They said sometimes the armed persons were local Tigrayan (i.e. Ethiopian) militia, but other times the armed men were opposition. The refugees said that some DMLEK members had family living in the camp and would come and go regularly. (Note: PolOff saw several armed Tigrayan militia walking through the camp at various times.)

(C/NF) PolOff could not find any Tigrinya refugees who would speak as openly as the Kunama, but the Kunama refugees said that the Tigrinya were dominated by Tigrinya opposition groups just as the Kunama were dominated by DMLEK. The Kunama refugees asserted that some Tigrinya refugees regularly left the camp to receive military training for short periods of time, and then would return. At one point during a conversation between PolOff and contacts in the camp, the contacts visibly stiffened, and warned PolOff that they were under observation by what they termed as a ‘politically active’ Tigrinya refugee.”

Is this a refugee camp or rebel training camp? It's sort of hard to tell. This seems very reminiscent of the Syrian Free Army organizing in Turkey near the border before they started operating in Syria.

The cable continues:

"(C/NF) The Kunama refugees also said that DMLEK was opposed to resettlement of the Kunama refugees, and therefore, pressuring people not to resettle. The refugees stated that DMLEK wanted the people to stay to be used as a resource, and wanted the young men to join their organization to fight Eritrea. They said that DMLEK was spreading misinformation about life in the United States including showing the movie 'Roots,' alleging that the Kunama would be treated like slaves in America. One refugee noted that in the last year, positive reports from Kunama who had already resettled were beginning to counter DMLEK's negative message.

"…The presence of Eritrean opposition activity in the camps was not surprising. The defensive tone in EmbOffs discussions with UNHCR, ARRA, and international NGO officials suggests that they had a vested interest in denying any knowledge of it, otherwise they might be required to address opposition harassment of refugees. The visit was yet another reminder that a priority of ARRA's refugee program was to address Ethiopia's national security concerns with Eritrea. Post cannot confirm complicity between ARRA and the opposition groups, but we do note that ARRA, as an organization, falls under the purview of the Ethiopian National Intelligence Security Service. End Comment."

Thus, it comes as no surprise when websites like Asmarino.com– that brand themselves as "Eritrean opposition"–write articles with headlines like "Peaceful demonstration in Eritrean refugee camp Ethiopia (Shimelba) 06/12/2009." [64]

Anyway, from reading past US State Department "Proposed Refugee Admissions" reports for successive fiscal years, we learn about the US's role in bringing the Kunamas to America. The Kunama case was first mentioned in the FY 2003 report (published in 2002), when they explain that "among groups under consideration for possible P-2 designation are…Kuname Eritreans in Walanibhy Camp in Ethiopia." [65]

Explaining why they are receiving P-2 designation, the report states that "these 4,000 Eritreans have no local integration prospects and are viewed with suspicion by Eritrea due to their decision to seek refuge in Ethiopia during the war. We will actively pursue an appropriate P-2 designation for this group during FY 2003." They were still under consideration in FY 2003 and 2004. [66] In the FY 2005 (published in 2004) we learn something new. The report says “we continue to monitor the situation of the group of Eritrean Kunama in Ethiopia and have urged UNHCR to consider a group resettlement referral of those who do not choose to voluntarily repatriate to Eritrea by the end of 2004." [67]

Thus, we learn that it was the US, and not the UNHCR, that made the request for resettlement. It is usually the other way around: UNHCR makes the referral and the resettling nations choose whether or whether not to resettle them. Why they specifically requested to resettle Kunamas is a mystery. They do the same thing for religious minorities in Iran and Bantus in Somalia. If not for genuine concerns for persecution, one can only suspect an agenda to forge a sub-national identity and foment division. In any case, in the FY 2007 report they finally said that they were processing up to 2,500 Eritrean Kunama in Ethiopia, with the vast majority slated to come to the USA in FY 2007. [68] The rest is history.

Thus, as the above shows, external entities have been using the refugee situations in the Sudan and Ethiopia to drive a politicized migration out of Eritrea. We have shown how US State Department reports were used by UNHCR to grant Eritreans prima facie status following 2004 to expedite resettlement processing and how they were granted P2 status (group resettlement in US reserved for rare minorities) to resettle them in large groups.

Moving on to more recent times, the US State Department's "Proposed Refugee Admissions for Fiscal Year 2012″ states the following:

"For the first time in 20 years, staff representing the Departments of State and Homeland Security began processing Eritrean refugees inside Sudan residing in a remote camp along the eastern border. This initiative is designed to bring hope to individuals who can neither return to Eritrea nor locally integrate in Sudan.

…Eritreans continue to seek asylum in neighboring countries due to political tensions and increasing political repression; many are attempting dangerous onward migration to Europe and the Middle East in search of better economic opportunities." [69]

Thus, they are focusing more on resettling Eritreans living in East Sudan on the basis of political repression. To call them "army defectors" or "work migrants" in search of a better life would mean that they would have to be returned to Eritrea, as practically every nation in Africa–dealing with the same internal problem–has decided to do despite threats from UNHCR (Libya, [70] Egypt, [71] the Sudan[72], Angola [73], Tanzania [74], etc.; see below).

Alas, we arrive at the latest Proposed Refugee Admissions publication. The FY 2013 report states the following:

“Both Eritrea and Sudan are currently designated as “Countries of Particular Concern” (CPC) for particularly severe violations of religious freedom. Both Eritrea and Sudan are currently designated as “Countries of Particular Concern” (CPC) for particularly severe violations of religious freedom. The USRAP continues to be available through Priority 1 referrals to Sudanese, Eritrean, and other refugees who are victims of religious intolerance. Refugees from Eritrea and Sudan with refugee or asylee family members in the United States also may have access to the USRAP through Priority 3, subject to its resumption. Certain Eritrean refugees in Ethiopia may have access to the USRAP through Priority 2.

“Three countries of origin (Somalia, Democratic Republic of Congo, and Eritrea) presently account for the vast majority of U.S. admissions from the region. In East Africa, we continue to process P-1 Somalis in the Dadaab and Kakuma refugee camps. We are coming closer to completing P-2 processing of Eritreans in Shimelba camp in Ethiopia, but will continue to process P-1 UNHCR referrals after the P-2 group is completed. We were able to conduct the first DHS circuit ride to Sudan in over twenty years to process the first group of a protracted caseload of Eritrean refugees there.” [75]

Note that Eritreans and Sudanese are the only groups explicitly named that are granted P1 status ANYWHERE on the grounds that they are undergoing religious persecution. Somalis are restricted to certain refugee camps. What African wouldn’t take advantage of this fact? Is it any surprise that many of them are claiming Eritrean identity (see below). Also, if lack of religious freedom was truly worth P1-status everywhere in the world, then Saudi Arabians would be coming droves. However, we know that’s not the case. In regards to Africa specifically, the report makes the following proposal:

“From East and Southern Africa, we expect 9,000 admissions, primarily Somalis in Kenya, Ethiopia, Djibouti, and South Africa; Eritreans in Ethiopia and in Sudan; and additional small numbers of P-1 referrals of various nationalities in the countries above, as well as in Namibia, Zambia, and Zimbabwe.

…Outside of sub-Saharan Africa, we anticipate up to 1,500 Sudanese, Somali, Ethiopian, Eritrean, and other sub-Saharan African refugees to be processed in Tunisia, Egypt, Lebanon, Turkey, Jordan, and Russia.”

A total of 2,032 Eritreans are slated to come to America this year, making them the 6th highest ranking resettlement group. This is amazing when one considers that Eritrea ranks 112th in population size and only contributes 0.079% of the world’s population. Much like the Palestinians and Israeli-Jews, the Eritrean population has a very high proportion of its people living in the diaspora with anecdotal numbers placing the diaspora population at ~1.5 – 2 million versus a domestic population of 6 million.

Like the Israelis, Eritreans maintain dual citizenship and actively participate in the Eritrean domestic economy. From the FY 2013 report, we also learn of another concerning piece of information: most of the Eritrean refugees targeted for resettlement are of working age and male. In a section tabulating the age data of the top 20 most resettled groups, Eritrean refugees have the highest percentage of "working age" resettlement in America (84%), suggesting preferential recruitment of youth that would have otherwise been developing their homeland. All the other refugee groups don't even come close. This is in line with McMullen's aforementioned comments on focusing on the youth. Clearly, the United States is set on driving young Eritreans to resettle outside of Eritrea. Finally, it should also be noted that Eritrean refugees are the most predominantly male resettlement group (73.8%), beating the next group by almost 13% (the Sudan had 60.8%). In the past, this has made depression a significant issue as males have been unable to find Eritrean mates in the new land [76]."

Resettlement in Third Countries

As a result of the actions by the US and its client states to preferentially resettle Eritreans outside of Eritrea, migrants from throughout East Africa have picked-up on this trend and are using it to their advantage. It is well-documented that migrants originating from countries other than Eritrea regularly claim Eritrean identity to increase their chances of acquiring visas and gaining refugee status. Nowhere is this more obvious than in than in the case Israel.

In a March 2008 interview with Haaretz – long before Eritrea was in the human trafficking limelight – the Eritrean Ambassador to Israel, Tesfamariam Tekeste Debbas, said that he sent a letter of protest to the Israeli Foreign ministry explaining that the refugees (referred to as "infiltrators") were "not political refugees, but rather work migrants or army deserters." The Haaretz article goes on:

"The Eritrean ambassador, Tesfamariam Tekeste, noted…that his letter of protest included several issues of concern to his government. First, he said, at least half of the infiltrators represent themselves as Eritrean while in fact they are from other African states, such as Sudan or Ethiopia. 'They know the Eritreans automatically receive a six-month visa, so they pretend to be Eritrean,' he said.

"The letter also mentioned the fear that hostile elements helping to smuggle Africans into Israel could exploit them for carrying out terror attacks. 'If that happens, the accusing finger will point to Eritrea,' Tekeste said.

“Israel is turning itself into a migration destination for Eritrean citizens fleeing from army service or looking for work,’ Tekeste said. “The fact that you issue six-month visas encourages people to come here.” [76]

Unfortunately, comments from Eritrean officials – as opposed to personal accounts in Human Rights Watch reports – often fall on deaf ears. Few believed the ambassador. However, in May of 2011 we learned that he was right all along. According to Haaretz, an “asylum seeker, who can only be identified as Ibrahim, came to Israel from Eritrea in November 2009. He was arrested a month later and held at the Givon prison in Ramle for a year and a half. The prolonged detention resulted from the Population and Immigration Authority insisting that he came, in fact, from Ethiopia.” He was then asked to provide an Eritrean birth certificate or prove his identity. Being unable to do so he was questioned by the Population and Immigration Authority. Ibrahim then “attempted to escape during the interview, and eventually admitted he was Ethiopian, rather than Eritrean, and was therefore immediately returned to custody.” [77]

It doesn’t end there, however. In October of 2011 we learned from another Haretz piece that false claims of Eritrean citizenship were so common by Ethiopian “infiltrators” that the Interior Ministry began to seek “documents issued by the Ethiopian consulate…to attest to the fact that asylum seekers in Israel who claim to be Eritreans [were] entitled to Ethiopian citizenship and [were] therefore not eligible for asylum.” Haaretz also “obtained information which shows that the Ethiopian consulate’s documents are routinely issued in almost every case in which the documentation is sought by the Israeli Interior Ministry.” In addition, the newspaper also “obtained minutes of the meeting from a committee that advises Interior Minister Eli Yishai on refugee matters showing that the Ethiopian consulate almost always issues the transit documents for asylum seekers at the Interior Ministry’s request, relying on Israeli authorities’ representation that the person in question is Ethiopian.” [78]

By 2012, 52% of Jewish Israelis (compared to 19% of Arab Israelis) viewed the so-called African infiltrators as a “cancer.” [79] And with more reports of asylum fraud, news of the migrants quickly caught the media’s attention, spurring further investigation by Israeli journalists. One reporter for Ynet decided to go undercover in a predominantly Eritrean and Sudanese neighborhood to shed light on the lives of the refugees. In his article he reports:

“My cover story has not been finalized yet, but luckily I run into Jeremiah, who’s been in Israel for three years now. ‘What do I tell those who ask how I got into Israel?’ I ask him. ‘Lie,’ he says. ‘Don’t tell the whole story. The Israelis, and mostly the non-profit groups working with the infiltrators here, like to be lied to.’

“Say you were a soldier, and that if you return to Eritrea you’ll get a death sentence. Keep in mind that you must be consistent with your story. The bottom line is that everyone uses the story I’m telling you here, and this way they fool everybody,’ he says. ‘Almost none of them arrived on foot from Egypt to Israel. None of us crossed any deserts…it’s all nonsense.”]

If Jeremiah is telling the truth, then refugees are regularly exploiting Eritrean identity. With merely the hope of raising their quality of life, who can blame them? It’s simply way too easy given the fact that, according to UN statistics, 90% of Eritrean refugees are eligible for refugee status. [81]

Over time, it became increasingly clear to Israeli officials that practically all the “infiltrators” were not refugees but rather “migrants.” As the Minister for Education, Mr. Gidon Sa’ar, announced, “we need to stop the flooding of this country with immigrants from Eritrea. They are not refugees, but rather labor immigrants.” [82] The former head of the Population, Immigration and Borders Authority, Mí. Yaakov Ganot also acknowledged that “in our examinations, I would say that 99.9 percent of them are here for work. They’re not asylum seekers: they are not at any risk.” [83]

The abuse of the asylum system is not only limited to Israel. We see the same thing happening in the United Kingdom. In a 2004, UK comptroller a House of Common commissioned report entitled “Improving the Speed and Quality of Asylum Decisions.” The report went on to state that, “disputed nationality is a key issue in Ethiopian applications. The Directorate generally sought to remove failed applicants to Eritrea irrespective of whether the applicant had ever been there, and adjudicators often disagreed with this approach. The Directorate has taken steps to improve its country information and refusal letters.” [84] Then on June 16, 2009, the Daily Telegraph reported that former Miss Ethiopia beauty pageant winner, Jerusalem Mehari, was caught abusing the asylum system by taking on an Eritrean identity. She first “renounced her Ethiopian citizenship in 2007, a few days before her UK student visa expired, and claimed Eritrean nationality.” Her claim was that she “was a Jehovah’s Witness and there was a risk of her suffering persecution in Eritrea.” Sarabjit Singh of United Kingdom’s Home Office said that “the only reason for seeking and maintaining Eritrean nationality is to claim the right to remain in the UK…What the claimant is trying to do is nothing short of an abuse of the asylum system.”

In Toronto last year, a refugee by the name of Nighisti Semret was stabbed to death on her way home from work. She claimed to be of Eritrean origin and was granted asylum in Canada in 2010. According to the Toronto Star, she became a member of the local St. Michael’s Eritrean Orthodox Church and “while members of Toronto’s close-knit Eritrean community said Semret was not well-known because she hadn’t been in Canada long, a local Eritrean church offered to pay for her funeral with funds from the community." Although the article admitted to not knowing why she sought asylum, they were quick to point out that Eritrea "is ruled by one of the most repressive regimes in the world." [86] As later reported by Sam B of Natna blog (site down), she was later found to be an Ethiopian by the Eritrean community. [87]

After learning of this information, the police notified local reporters who did not publish the new information but instead increased their attack on Eritrea. As Sam B notes, Joe Warmington of the Toronto Sun even poses that the Eritrean government may have had a motive to kill her. "Could that motive have stemmed from a scam from her former country where refugees are shaken down and threatened to pay a special tax back to their homeland or face retribution?" he asks. [88]

In spite of full knowledge of her identity, the Eritrean community "did not interfere in the prayer or vigil held for her. They in fact fully supported it. As one community leader put it; 'she has no one, Ethiopian or otherwise, she is our sister, too.'" [89] Sadly, stories like these don't make the headlines.

Asylum fraud under an Eritrean identity also happens regularly in the United States as well. According to an article published in the Oregonian on October 13, 2012, a group of Eritrean and African refugees were resettled in Threemile Canyon Farms in Oregon via the International Rescue Committee [90]. The article states that among the refugees is "Thierry Gasasu, an Eritrean." Most Eritreans reading this are probably chuckling at this quote. Although there are an array of different ethnic groups in Eritrea, they know that Gasasu is not an Eritrean name. In fact, it is a well known Rwandan name. Honest error? Perhaps. The reality is that this same sort of error keeps happening again and again, often going unchecked by the media or their watchdogs. For instance, back in 2010, the New York Times falsely claimed that an Ethiopian indicted on terror charges was of Eritrean origin. On March 10, 2010, however, Radio Sweden, reported that "Sabrina Schroff, the man's lawyer in the United States, says that the Ethiopian native denies all the accusations. The New York Times identifies him as Eritrean, but the Swedish Foreign Minister holds that he is originally from Ethiopia." [91]

Despite the NYT's error CNN was still calling him a "resident of Sweden originally from Eritrea" almost two entire years later. [92]

The above cases of asylum fraud and false claims of Eritrean identity cannot be taken lightly. Firstly, they only represent the cases of those who were caught. How about the countless others? As illustrated above, many of the false asylum-seekers cases are of Ethiopian origin, which is likely due to the shared cultural, linguistic, and physical features of the sisterly peoples. Ethiopia, the second most populous country in Africa, is 15 times more populous than Eritrea. It also has multiple active insurgencies and multiple reports of genocide in different parts of the country. In fact, post-Meles Zenawi Ethiopia, a ethno-federalist state with a quickly growing Muslim protest movement, [93] is among the top 15 states expected to disintegrate and become ungovernable in the next fifteen years, according to the "Global Trends 2030: Alternative Trends" published by the US National Intelligence Council. [94]

Thus, how is it possible that Ethiopia comprises less asylum-seekers than Eritrea (43,400 from Eritrea vs. 42,500 from Ethiopia)? [95] As illustrated in the many cases above, the authorities of resettling nations are reporting of growing numbers of Ethiopians claiming asylum under an Eritrean identity, dating as far back as 2004. If most nations with the exception of the United States get their referrals from the UNHCR, why do no official UNHCR documents make no mention of this trend?

If we also compare the US resettlement data from the department of Health and Human Services website [96], we see that Eritrea has had progressively increasing resettlement numbers while Ethiopian resettlement numbers have waned. The drop in FY 2002 is due to 9/11. From early 2007 to mid-2009, the US embassy stopped processing non-immigrant visa, which may account for the dip in US resettlement. [97] If that is in fact the case, then that suggests that the issuing of visas by the US Embassy in Eritrea has a significant effect on US resettlement. This is something that should be monitored closely. 2,032 are expected to be resettled in the US this year.

Football Players

By now, almost every Eritrean is aware of the repeated high-profile defections by the Eritrean national football players during matches in other African countries. In the case of Tanzania, 13 football players, who participated in the July 2011 CECAFA Kagame Cup, failed to show up for a flight back to Asmara. They later reported to the Home Affairs Ministry asking for asylum but, according to the Tanzanian National Refugees Committee, "none of the applications met the criteria for refugee status."
[98] The UNHCR then intervened calling for their protection while arrangements could be made for their transfer to a third country. Ten months later, we learn from the Houston Chronicle that four of the players had already made it to Houston, three were due to arrive one month later, four were resettled in Boston, and two in Virginia. [99]

How is it possible that every single one of the 13 players was able to arrive in America so quickly? According to the US State Department, only less than one percent of refugees worldwide are ever resettle in a third country, let alone America. [100] This case may come as a surprise to many Eritrean refugees around the world who have had to languish in refugees camps for years on end awaiting resettlement. The article then goes on to explain that “after their escape in Tanzania, where [the players] outran their handlers and met at a rendezvous spot before going to the US Embassy to seek protection. They were certified as refugees by the United Nations High Commission on Refugees and spent months in Romania before being approved for placement in the U.S." The fact that they planned, in advance, to go to the US Embassy is quite telling of the current US Adminstration's role in promoting youth migration. High profile asylums of Eritrean sports figures are designed to send a message to the Eritrean football-loving youth that loudly declares, "if you leave your country, then USA has your back."

And make no mistake about it: the US knows the cultural significance football to Eritreans. Following the first defection of 4 football players in Kenya, US ambassador McMullen acknowledged in a 2010 diplomatic cable under the derisive subheading "SOCCER TEAM 1 – REGIME 0," that "Eritreans are mad about soccer" and that the Kenyan defections "will be stunning news for the Eritrean population." [101] This first round of defections, however, did not take place through the US Embassy. They were discovered to be hiding in a refugee camp under the protection of UNHCR and were granted automatic group asylum in Australia eight months later. [102]

Apparently, their case takes priority over the millions of Somalians sitting in the same Kenyan refugee camps, fleeing civil war, drought, and religious persecution. Sensational headlines from the Associated Press, re-printed by ESPN and Sports Illustrated read, "Official: Players say death awaits them in Eritrea." [103] Why does the AP take the asylum-seekers words at face value when they clearly have a vested interest in inflating their story for the purpose of resettlement? To this day, we have yet to see any evidence of deportees being executed by Eritrean authorities; only the claims of asylum-seekers.

It should also be mentioned that in the case of the Tanzanian defection, the players were transported via emergency evacuation from Dar es Salaam to a holding facility in Romania. Do all Eritrean refugees get this kind of treatment? Upon further inspection, we learn that this facility is the Evacuation Transit Center that was built in 2008 (officially, 2009) "by the Romanian government, UNHCR and the International Organization for Migration (IOM) to provide a temporary haven for refugees in urgent need of evacuation from their first asylum countries due to life-threatening conditions….it received its first group of refugees, 40 Eritreans, last November and all have been found resettlement homes." [104] Since then, there have reports of the transportation of large groups of Eritreans. In one case, 30 Eritreans were transported from Tunisia. [105]. This is important because it signifies a growing trend of expedited large group evacuations of Eritreans from atypical locations. The asylum-seekers no longer have to be at a sub-Saharan refugee camp to await processing. They can be in a US Embassy, like the Tanzanian players, or perhaps in the Middle East under temporary protection status. In the words of the US State Department's "Proposed Refugee Admissions for Fiscal Year 2012″:

"And according to the Outside of sub-Saharan Africa, we anticipate Sudanese, Somali, Ethiopian, Eritrean and other African refugees to be processed in Yemen, Syria, Jordan, Lebanon, and Egypt. We will also process individuals who were forced to leave Libya as a result of the conflict there, some of whom will be interviewed at the UNHCR Evacuation Transit Center in Romania. We project as many as 1,300 individuals will be referred to the USRAP from the Tunisia/Libya border, and as many as 500 individuals will be referred to the USRAP from the Egypt/Libya border, during calendar year 2011." [106]

How many of those 500 were Eritreans? We don't for sure. However, we do know that after 3 years of operations, the facility has housed 600 refugees, which, according to the UNHCR, includes "Eritreans, Sudanese, Palestinians, Ethiopians, Sri Lankans, Iraqis and Nigerians." [107] Of that list, only Iraqis rank higher for US resettlement, according to the Proposed Refugee Admission report for FY 2013. That should tell us something.

Thus, it is clear that Eritreans are deliberately being resettled in third countries with the complicity of the international media. Eritrea maintains that it is a victim of the policies of external entities while the US and various human rights groups point the finger at the lack of human rights in Eritrea. Some groups have conducted independent studies and have come to different conclusions in regards to the causes of migration out of Eritrea. According to conclusions of a 2009 study conducted by the Global Forum on Migration and Development, in cooperation with the European Commission and the Eritrean Government:

"Migration is not a phenomenon that happens only in Eritrea. It is a global issue that needs global collaboration for a viable solution acceptable to all parties involved. Eritrea is a poor country and therefore this circumstance serves as a main factor for migration. To make migration a positive contributing force to development, Eritrean migration policy needs to be more flexible and up-to-date. The benefits of migration accrue in terms of transfer of money (remittances), technology and know-how. Important as they are, remittances don't require the physical movement of the migrants to the country.

"To achieve all these, there is a need for planned and dynamic handling of the benefits of migration. This has to be done without compromising the rights and economic status of citizens by promoting openness and freedom of movement but at the same time not compromising the national interest. Therefore, the policy has to aim to address the manpower needs of the country emphasizing creation of jobs (following labour intensive technology in production) and In-country Human Resource Development Schemes as well as encouraging remittance and technology transfer." [108]

They don't blame the Eritrean government for human trafficking, child labor, or human rights abuses. It does suggest "promoting openness and freedom of movement but at the same time not compromising the national interest." Unfortunately, these conclusions fell on the deaf ears of the international media as they do not fit the "human rights agenda."

The "Human Rights Agenda"

So what does all this human trafficking business mean anyway? If we consider the above and inspect some of the recent developments in regards to human rights of Eritreans, we begin to see some trends. Most notably, it seems like the international mainstream media is trying to connect human trafficking of Eritreans to "human rights abuses" by the Eritrean government–the "human rights agenda." The press often sites the usual suspects: US State Department human rights and TIP reports, US-funded NGO's, "Eritrean" opposition websites and members, SEMG reports, and biased "experts"/"journalists" on Eritrea. In each case, the excuse for people leaving Eritrea is always the same: human rights abuses. Not all the other possible causes mentioned above. No one ever considers the words of independent analysts or Eritrean officials. Most importantly, they ignore the words of the people living in Eritrea with the excuse often being that Eritreans are too scared to speak up. In saying so, they are unknowingly calling the Eritrean people cowards, which is an insult considering what Eritreans have gone through to achieve the liberation of their nation. In contrast, however, they seem to have an incredible fondness for the words of Eritreans that leave their nations – i.e. asylum-seekers. Asylum seekers – whose hopes of resettlement rely on stories of persecution – make up practically the entire basis of the reports and articles by HRW, AI, SEMG, Dan Connell, and many others who seek regime change in Eritrea. Is it any surprise then that the foundation of their entire "human rights abuse" argument relies on asylum-seekers? Is it any surprise then that they fight tooth and nail to "protect" them? Is it any surprise then that they are promoting youth migration, politicizing it, and then calling it regime sponsored "human trafficking?" No surprise at all.

What is a surprise, on the other hand, is the number of times that the UNHCR publishes or references the work of petty anti-Eritrean websites, organizations, and individuals who take the "human rights" stance. It should be made clear that these entities are not only "anti-regime," as some like to pose, but rather outright anti-Eritrean since they all have (1) called for sanctions against Eritrea; (2) practically ignored or downplayed the ever-present existential threats against Eritrea; and (3) consistently repeat the same line used by the late Meles Zenawi that “we like the Eritrean people, we just want to get rid of their government.” With that said, let us review how many times each of these anti-Eritrean elements has been published or referenced by UNHCR:

Human Rights Concern, Eritrea (Elsa Chyrum):

Perhaps this will help Eritreans learn how to prioritize their enemies. The same Awate.com that spread the rumor that the Eritrean president was likely dead is being published or cited by UNCHR documents almost 55 times. [109, 110] UNHCR also cites the work of the same Léonard Vincent of Reporter Without Borders (RSF), who openly admitted in his book that he illegally smuggled an Eritrean Ministry of Information employee through the assistance of RSF personnel and the French Foreign Office. You simply can't make this stuff up. It should be noted that for some of the documents, the UNHCR website has a disclaimer that reads, "This is not a UNHCR publication. UNHCR is not responsible for, nor does it necessarily endorse, its content. Any views expressed are solely those of the author or publisher and do not necessarily reflect those of UNHCR, the United Nations or its Member States." If that's the case then why publish it in the first place while not publishing material from non-US funded independent groups or Shabait.com, the Eritrean Ministry of Information website, in response to human rights allegations? Why are they so one-sided?

In light of the clear bias for anti-Eritrean entities, let us put things in perspective. Imagine you're a young bright-eyed UNHCR intern, fresh out of Harvard, whose dream is to one day work for Human Rights Watch, Amnesty International, or some other non-profit organization that the media says helps the disparaged people of the world. At orientation, your boss assigns you to work at a refugee camp in East Sudan next month and suggests that you read up on the situation in Eritrea. Like a good intern, you log into the UNHCR website and access RefWorld, the supposed "Leader in Refugee Decision Support." You read through countless documents on Eritrea, meticulous in your reading and checking up on all citations. You also check out the US State Department-funded COR website for some extra background on Eritrean refugees in Kassala. After a while, you start to think, "surely it can't be that bad," so you check out some Eritrean websites for Eritreans' personal views of their country. You remember all the websites listed in the citations of the UNHCR website so you check them out. After reading all the latest articles from Awate.com, Asmarino.com, Assenna.com, and their ilk, you come to the heart-crushing conclusion that Eritrea must be the most horrible place on Earth. All your dream organizations, like HRW, AI, RSF, and many others have nothing positive to say about life in Eritrea. You come to see the Eritrean government as an enemy of the Eritrean people that uses the "CIA" argument as a scapegoat for its failures–essentially what the media tells you. Although, you may have some doubts when talking to average Eritreans at the local community center, who often speak wonders of the Eritrean government and tell you about the FBI harassing them for supporting the Eritrean government, you have trouble accepting the distant notion that there is some crazy conspiracy to destroy Eritrea. Surely, you're not crazy! You accept that it's just another African tragedy. Hopeless. Now all you want is to be part of some great cause– like your hero Rachel Corrie, perhaps. As a result, you join in on the "human rights agenda" against the Eritrean government.

What we are seeing now is the "human rights agenda" on full display. Following the fabricated coup in January and the failed attempt to turn it into a campaign, [111] we see people like Dan Connell and Elsa Chyrum going around the world giving talks on human trafficking in Eritrea [112]. We see people like Meron Estifanos and the so-called "International Commission on Eritrean Refugees" writing letters to the UN Secretary General, urging him to launch an investigation into what is causing the human trafficking of Eritreans. [113] In each of these instances, these individuals and groups have been pointing the finger at the Eritrean government and we are now seeing increased efforts to see actions taken against Eritrea for alleged human rights abuses.

At its 21st session on September 27, 2012, the Human Rights Council considered the situation of human rights in Eritrea under the terms of the confidential complaint procedure (1503 procedure). By this method human rights groups and victims of human rights abuses file confidential complaints to the HRC. However, according to resolution 21/1 on Eritrea, the HRC ultimately decided to switch to the public procedure (1235 procedure) under which it can hold an annual public debate about the alleged gross violations of human rights in question. [114] This essentially represents an escalation of the case. If no change is noted in regards to the human rights situation in Eritrea, the HRC can have the Economic and Social Council (ECOSOC) pass a resolution condemning Eritrea. According to the Human Rights Education Association, this would serve as public condemnation that "tarnishes the reputation of the leaders in the state in question and discredits their legitimacy as political elites." [115] Resolution 21/1 also called for a "Special Rapporteur on the situation of human rights in Eritrea" to investigate the complaints and report back to the HRC during the twenty-third session in June 2013.

On September 28 2012, Ms. Beedwantee Keetharuth, a lawyer from Mauritius who worked for Amnesty International's African Regional office in Uganda and is touted to have "extensive experience in monitoring and documenting human rights violations across Africa," was appointed as "UN Special Rapporteur on the human rights situation in Eritrea" (Fig. 2). According to the HRC's meeting minutes:
"Eritrea noted the decision of the Council to refer the situation in Eritrea to the public and reminded the Council to abide by the principles of neutrality and impartiality. The Council had clearly violated the provisions prohibiting politicised action and had not justified its motion to disregard those basic principles and criteria of admissibility. Eritrea therefore rejected the decision of the Council because it was politically motivated and did not accept the mandate of the Special Rapporteur on Eritrea." [116]

Following her appointment, there was no mention in the UN press release or any media reports about Eritrea's rejection of her appointment [117]. Without that needed context for the reader, they instead say that "she had requested meetings with the country's diplomats" but unfortunately, "the meetings had yet to take place." [118] Once again, Eritrea is made to appear uncooperative because Eritrea's voice is silenced. It should come as no surprise if her future report says "I had trouble getting a hold of Eritrean officials."

Upon further investigation we learn that Elsa Chyrum, the Director of Human Rights Concern, Eritrea, was key in getting Ms. Keetharuth appointed. According to the "Eritrean" opposition website Asmarino.com:

"Elizabeth (Elsa) Chyrum has been instrumental in bringing about the appointment of a Special Rapporteur to Eritrea; four years' work has culminated in the UN Human Rights Council (UNHRC) appointing Ms. Beedwantee Keetharuth as Special Rapporteur on the human rights situation in Eritrea.

"Mrs. Chyrum has been advocating and lobbying at the HRC for recognition of the severe human rights crisis in Eritrea since September 2008. She is passionate about justice for Eritrea, and has doggedly campaigned for the appalling human rights record of Eritrea to come to the fore of the international agenda. She has done this, and more, largely by funding herself and occasional contributions for travel and other expenses from well-wishers and sisterly organizations." [119]

Acting in concert with other self-proclaimed African human rights activists, Ms. Elsa sent multiple letters curiously addressed to "African Heads of State" [120, 121] urging those states with the "highest standards of human rights" to apply for the 5 vacancies in the African Group of the HRC. Exactly which benevolent African leaders did she send them to? We may never know for sure but what we do know is that Ethiopia, Kenya, Ivory Coast, Gabon, and Sierra Leone were all elected to the African Group last November. Add in Uganda (in office until December 2013) and we have a dangerous anti-Eritrean triumvirate of IGAD members that will decide on Ms. Keetharuth's report in June 2013. [122] Ethiopia was voted in despite a letter of opposition from 18 AU nations. [123]

In addition, we can't ignore the glaring fact that the US was also elected into the HRC last year. [124] During the Bush Administration's term in office, the US opted to sit out in protest of the HRC's excessive focus on the Israeli-Palestinian conflict. [125] In 2009, however, Obama decided to change directions and the nation was voted in. Now that the US has been re-elected and is in the company of its client states in IGAD, the US-driven, anti-Eritrean campaign is expected to continue with an East African face. Last year, Nigeria, Djibouti and Somalia led [126] the HRC to create a Special Rapporteur on Eritrea with US co-sponsorship [127] and we can pretty much expect the same moving forward. It's also critical to note that the Kampala-based East and Horn of Africa Human Rights Defenders Project (EHAHRDP) was granted "special consultative status" with the ECOSOC earlier that year. [128] What does that mean exactly?

The EHAHRDP, an umbrella human rights organization with a nightmarish acronym, has the power to make recommendations to the HRC and push for resolutions that promote its agenda. Elsa Chyrum's Human Rights Concern Eritrea is part of that network and as the EHAHRDP website states, ECOSOC status will allow its "network members to deepen their engagement at the UN Level." [129] If history is any indication, her influence will serve as a destructive force against the Eritrean people. Back in 2011, an article on the HCRE website declared that "as we celebrate International Human Rights Day, we welcome the Security Council Sanctions on Eritrea as a means of bringing to light some of the human rights abuses being perpetrated every day on Eritreans." [130] Anyone who calls for sanctions on a nation is an enemy of that nation. There has never been an example in history where UN sanctions have benefitted the people of a nation. How, then, can one be Eritrean or a friend of Eritrea and wish for sanctions on Eritrea?

The Global Human Rights Regime

Intervention in the name of human rights is the emerging tool of imperialism and we have seen a dramatic increase in targeted actions towards sovereign nations–particularly African nations–by the Global Human Rights Regime (GHRR; not my term). Prior to 1990, there were only two UN sanctions: Rhodesia in 1966 and South Africa in 1977. Both failed to accomplish their stated goals. The 1990′s saw an explosion of UN sanctions, predominantly used against African nations. Despite the use of "panels of experts" and "monitoring groups" none of them worked. After a series of studies, the UN then decided to transition into using "targeted" sanctions in the 2000′s. Again, those didn't work either. Eritrea, sanctioned in 2009, is a testament to this reality. In fact, the sanctions only strengthened the Eritrean people's support of their government, as was evidenced by the international Hizbawi Mekhete campaigns ("popular resistance"), in which citizens around the world raised more money in support of their government, [131] and the massive, worldwide anti-UN demonstrations held on February 22, 2010. [132] In the spirit of resistance, Eritreans also initiated the E-SMART campaign ("Eritrean Sanctions Must be Annulled and Repealed Today"), which led to the creation of a website that is now the authoritative internet resource for understanding the facts and myths regarding the UN sanctions on Eritrea.

The Human Rights Council is also a new creation that came into existence in 2006 in order to promote the agenda of the GHRR. The HRC adopted special complaint procedures and special rapporteurs were given mandates to investigate alleged abuses. The US initially tried to appear as though it didn't dominate the institution by taking a back seat and supporting it monetarily during its early years. China, Cuba, and other nations quickly took advantage by employing "bloc voting" to protect themselves from actions against their countries. Thus, the US position changed under Obama in 2009 as the country was elected into the HRC and quickly used its influence in the institution to invoke Responsibility-to-Protect (R2P) against Libya in 2011. The actions of the HRC were coordinated with those of the UNSC. Damaging human rights reports by Human Rights Watch, which is a member of the International Coalition for the Responsibility to Protect, were used to further justify intervention in Libya. The International Criminal Court, which was established in 2002 and has issued 21 arrest warrants (all Africans!), issued an arrest warrant for Muammer al-Gaddafi. In a destructive symphony of the UNSC, HRC, ICC, HRW, and other international institutions, an African nation was brought to its knees. The well oiled GHRR acted in full force and wiped the Libyan Jamahiriya off the planet in almost the blink of an eye. The odd thing, is that there seems to be an overwhelming propensity for the GHRR to take actions against African nations relative to others nations of the world. As an African nation, Eritrea is now becoming the increasing subject of their focus.

US troops are now slated to enter 35 African countries this year. [133] As Pepe Escobar wrote in a 2011 article for Al Jazeera, "Africom has some sort of military "partnership"–bilateral agreements–with most of Africa's 53 countries" but "the exceptions: Ivory Coast, Sudan, Eritrea and Libya. Ivory Coast is now in the bag. So is South Sudan. Libya may be next. The only ones left to be incorporated to Africom will be Eritrea and Zimbabwe." Thus, Eritreans must be ready for any eventuality as the external forces that seek regime change in Eritrea – for simply not following their rules or refusing to kneel down – are left with no choice but to pull the human rights card. The "terrorism" card didn't work. The fabricated "coup" card didn't work. They are now desperate for something–anything–as was seen by the arson of multiple Swedish community centers [134]. Their desperation for an excuse makes them dangerous. "Human trafficking" just might be their excuse. Will Eritreans allow the "human rights" card to destroy Eritrea? That answer lies solely in the hands of Eritreans.

Simon Tesfamariam is an Eritrean-American medical student and activist.
He can be contacted at stesfa@gmail.com.

Eritrea: Why Discontent Doesn't Necessarily Mean Change'

Article by Omar S Mahmood - March 21, 2013: Recent events in Eritrea have so far shown two things: 1) Discontent is rising. 2) Afewerki can handle it. Ali Abdu Ahmed, Eritrea's former information minister, has not been seen in Eritrea since his trip to Europe in September 2012. This has generated rumours that he has defected from President Isaias Afewerki's regime and is seeking asylum abroad. Along with other recent events in the secretive Red Sea state, Abdu's absence suggests that while Afewerki's iron grip on control is becoming increasingly difficult to maintain, it perhaps stops short of heralding the Eritrean leader's downfall.

Here, there and everywhere: On the 17th November 2012, Assenna, a Canadian-based opposition Eritrean website, declared that Information Minister Ali Abdu had sought asylum in Canada, fuelling speculation regarding the man once considered to be a possible successor to Afewerki. On 27 November 2012, however, Madote, a pro-regime website, claimed that Abdu had returned to Eritrea's capital of Asmara, and criticised Assenna for rumour-mongering. Nonetheless, Abdu was not publicly spotted in Asmara that day, nor has he been any day since. Along with his prolonged absence, rumours of Abdu's defection have been supported by related developments. Abdu's father, brother, and daughter were reportedly arrested in late December 2012, an action ostensibly tied to Abdu's disappearance. In addition, Daniel Kiflom, a former director at Eritrean Television, who is reportedly close to Abdu, defected to the UK in December. Abdu also has significant ties abroad – his wife has reportedly lived in Canada for several years while his brother runs an opposition website in the US. Curiously, a Swedish tabloid, Expressen, published an 'exclusive' interview in January 2013 that claimed to confirm Abdu's defection. The paper did not talk to Abdu directly, however, but quoted him via his brother, Saleh Younis, in the United States. Understandably, the account lacked credibility and Younis himself penned an article delegitimising the story, whilst remaining silent regarding his brother's actual situation.

A show of strength: The story of Ali Abdu's disappearance thus remains a mystery, but if he did flee, it would not be unusual for Eritrea. After the 2012 Summer Olympics in London, for example, four Eritrean athletes sought asylum to remain in the UK rather than return home. A few months later in October, two highly trained pilots from Eritrea's deteriorating air force flew a luxury passenger plane to Saudi Arabia to escape the regime. And after a regional soccer tournament in Uganda in December, 17 players and team officials missed their ride back to Asmara, with 15 eventually obtaining asylum. In addition to these defections, a unique outburst of discontent occurred in Asmara on 21 January 2013. Disgruntled Eritrean soldiers, said to number around 100, stormed the Ministry of Information, interrupted programming, and began to broadcast a statement demanding the implementation of the yet-to-be enacted 1997 constitution. On the one hand, this series of events and defections creates the impression that Afewerki is losing control after more than two decades at the helm. But at the same time, it is worth noting the speed with which Operation Forto – as the events of 21 January became to be known – was contained. While poor planning on the part of the instigators may be partly to blame, the public discontent in Asmara was shut down almost as quickly as it emerged. The ability of Afewerki's regime to manage the situation perhaps tells us as much about its capacity to maintain control as the mutiny tells us about the soldiers' ability to disrupt it (if that was indeed the goal of the planners). In addition, Ali Abdu's case serves as a microcosm for the situation in Eritrea as a whole. Despite spending years defending Afewerki's actions, there are some indications he did not fully subscribe to the messages he was tasked with communicating. If Abdu has indeed fled Eritrea, his persistent silence may be a sign that he prefers a quiet early retirement abroad rather than seeking to combat a system with which he could no longer reconcile himself; his departure would also follow in a trend of high-ranking officials choosing to leave the country rather than staying and trying to change the system.

Tomorrow never knows: It is these factors that have led Eritrea – despite its population of less than six million – to become the number three African country of origin for refugees, something from which human traffickers benefit financially. And in the recent events in Eritrea we can see a key demonstration of the dynamics that may allow for the perpetuation of Afewerki's rule – his opponents and disgruntled countrymen are increasingly forced to pursue an alternative path abroad rather than work from within. This is not to say the diaspora cannot play a role in advancing change in Eritrea, as they certainly can, but it will be fraught with additional complications. In this sense, fractures exposing discontent in Asmara have certainly been revealed, and the potential for similar events to gain traction until evolving into a wider and stronger push for regime change at grassroots level exists. Yet while recent events have demonstrated Asmara's weaknesses and the increased challenges Afewerki faces as he struggles to maintain a hold on power, they have also allowed an opportunity for his regime to exhibit its strengths. The continued exodus of Eritreans is a clear indication that the nation is not improving, and Ali Abdu's disappearance is a signal that even the elite are not immune. Yet with each discontented border-crossing, the pool of agents for change within the nation diminishes, and Afewerki's rule perseveres. If Ali Abdu found Afewerki's system impossible to work within, and Operation Forto demonstrates how difficult it can be to challenge, then the hopes that these recent expressions of discontent in Eritrea signal increasing momentum for change, rather than a continuation of the same old system, may be misplaced. Omar S Mahmood is an Africa Analyst at the Navanti Group. He attended the Fletcher School of Law and Diplomacy where his thesis focused on Ethiopia-Eritrean relations and proxy war in Somalia.

29 Ethiopian para-commando soldiers defected to Eritrea'

News tip: March 24, 2013 - A total of 29 Ethiopian commando forces, who were trained in Blaten Special Force training camp, have defected to neighboring Eritrea. The soldiers vowed they will liberate Ethiopia from what they say is an oppressive and ruthless dictatorship, according to their communiqué released on Saturday. Ethiopia is no stranger to high profile military defections. in 2005, eight Ethiopian air force pilots, who were training in Israel, defected and claimed asylum at an Eritrean embassy in Israel. Similarly, In 2006, over 300 Ethiopian troops, including Brigadier General Kemal Gelchu, who along with his trusted colonels, defected to Eritrea.

Issaias Affeworki Is Losing It'

Views: Eritrea, sometimes referred to as the "North Korea of Africa," has been ruled by President Issaias Affewerki and his Popular Front for Democracy and Justice Party since the country gained independence in 1993. Since taking power, the Afwerki regime has instituted a totalitarian government that seeks to control all aspects of life in Eritrea, including the religious practices of its citizens. "Being a Christian in Eritrea is like living in hell," a source inside Eritrea told International Christian Concern. "Christians are treated like enemy No. 1."

Paranoid about losing power, the Affwerki regime targets any religious activity conducted outside highly regulated government churches. According to the United States Commission on International Religious Freedom (USCIRF), "Systematic, ongoing and egregious religious freedom violations continue in Eritrea. These violations include: torture, sometimes resulting in death, arbitrary detention and prolonged bans on religious activities." It is estimated that more than 2,000 Christians remain imprisoned in Eritrea. As ICC's source in Eritrea can attest by personal experience, the conditions these prisoners are exposed to are among the most inhumane conditions in the world. Affwerki has stated that his restrictive policies on religion are aimed at groups that have been "duped by foreigners [and] are seeking to distract from the unity of the Eritrean people."

ICC Regional Manager for Africa William Stark said, "Christians in Eritrea continue to be rounded up and arbitrarily imprisoned by the increasingly repressive government. The prison conditions these Christians are exposed to defy all international human rights standards. Prisoners have testified to being locked in tiny, pitch black cells for months on end, tortured, starved and constantly abused, both mentally and physically, by prison guards. "It is estimated that at least 200,000 refugees have fled Eritrea because of its repressive policies," he continued. "Many of these refugees expose themselves to extreme dangers to escape Eritrea, including being summarily executed by border guards and becoming prime targets for human traffickers operating in East Africa. By allowing these blatant human rights abuses to take place, the international community has allowed Eritrean Christians to become a forgotten people that can be beaten, detained and killed at the whim of a paranoid government."

ERITREA: Scenarios for Future Transition'
ICG Africa Report N°200, Nairobi/Brussels

March 28, 2013 - Change is in the air in Eritrea, a highly authoritarian state, but any political transition will require internal political inclusion and channels for external dialogue if it is to preserve stability and improve Eritrean life.

Concerned Western partners, neighbours and other governments with special relations with Asmara need urgently to pay more attention to the small, isolated country that has remained mobilised on a war footing since a ceasefire ended its conflict with Ethiopia in 2000 and undertake planning and proactive measures to help avert internal chaos and wider regional troubles.

Eritrea: Scenarios for Future Transition, the latest report from the International Crisis Group, examines the regime's vulnerabilities, maps out six possible forms an eventual transition may take and identifies the main risks and opportunities. "While the mounting number of incidents suggests that President Issaias Affewerki's government is vulnerable, the country would face numerous institutional, socio-economic and geo-political obstacles during and after any transition", says Cedric Barnes, Crisis Group's Horn of Africa Project Director. "A careful assessment of these is urgently needed to help avoid a violent power struggle that could prove dangerous for the Horn of Africa and potentially – as Eritrea is a littoral state – for the Red Sea region".

It is difficult to predict what an eventually post-Issaias Eritrea will look like: after and in spite of 21 years of forceful nation-building, fault lines, especially of ethnicity, region and religion, are still there. The opposition is mainly in the diaspora, divided and mostly out of touch with both potential domestic constituencies and the young people who have been fleeing in large numbers for years and who crowd refugee camps. Since the state lacks any institutional mechanisms for peaceful transfer of power or even a clearly anointed successor, instability is to be expected, with the army the likely arbiter of who will rule next.

To reduce the risk of instability in Eritrea and its neighbourhood, a broad coalition of international actors should take precautionary moves, including immediate and decisive efforts to promote dialogue on avoidance of internal power struggles and mediation of a peaceful transition. This could lead to opening of political space and normalisation, both domestically and internationally. UN sanctions imposed on the regime for support of Al-Shabaab in Somalia and other destabilising activities need to be kept under active review. The European Union (EU) and U.S. should work with those, such as Qatar and South Africa, that maintain close relations with the leadership. Member states of the regional Intergovernmental Authority on Development (IGAD) should welcome Eritrea back and encourage normalisation of relations.

Specific attention should be paid to new, younger leaders emerging outside Eritrea, including in refugee camps. Attention should also be paid to the socio-economic and psychological side effects of the crisis. When a transition begins, the security sector will need to be reformed, and projects will have to be created simultaneously that focus on reintegrating those who fled their country. “There is an urgent need to pursue stability in Eritrea. Events in the last twelve months indicate growing discontent inside its tightly controlled regime, as well as deepening political and social divisions”, says Comfort Ero, Crisis Group’s Africa Program Director. “If instability intensifies, that would be bad not just for Eritreans, who have suffered enough, but for the broader region”.

struggle that could prove dangerous for the Horn of Africa and potentially – as Eritrea is a littoral state – for the Red Sea region.

Issaias’s disappearance from public view for several weeks in April 2012 amid rumours of his illness and death made evident the lack of a succession plan. In March and May 2012, the Ethiopian army made incursions, revealing the Eritrean military’s disastrous state. Subsequently, a number of defections reached media attention: pilots flying the presidential plane absconded in October, the information minister (a close ally of the president) vanished in November, and the national football team requested asylum in December. Meanwhile several thousand – predominantly young – Eritreans fled every month, preferring the danger and uncertainty of refugee camps and illegal migration routes to the hopeless stasis at home. Then, on 21 January 2013, approximately 100 soldiers rebelled in the capital, Asmara, taking control of the information ministry for a day.

It is difficult to predict what an eventually post-Issaias Eritrea will look like: after and in spite of 21 years of forceful nation-building, fault lines, especially of ethnicity, region and religion (Christians versus Muslims) are still there, some deeper than before. Since the state lacks any institutional mechanisms for peaceful transition of power or even a clearly anointed successor, instability is to be expected, with the corrupt army the likely arbiter of who will rule next. But even the generals appear split over loyalty toward the president.

To reduce the risk of instability in Eritrea and its neighbourhood, a broad coalition of international actors should take precautionary moves, including immediate and decisive efforts to promote dialogue on avoidance of internal power struggles and mediation of a peaceful transition. This could lead to opening of political space and normalisation, both domestically and internationally. Any opportunity should be seized to bring Asmara in from the cold. UN-imposed sanctions (imposed for support of Al-Shabaab in Somalia and other destabilising activities) should be kept under active review. The European Union (EU) and U.S. should work with others, such as Qatar and South Africa, that have better relations with Eritrea’s ruling elite and could facilitate constructive engagement. Member states of the regional Intergovernmental Authority on Development (IGAD) should welcome Eritrea back and encourage normalisation of relations.

If, as many believe, formal diplomacy remains blocked, Ethiopia, Sudan and Djibouti should engage with exiled opposition parties (including armed ethnic fronts) to encourage proactive engagement with dissidents in Asmara, promote dialogue and agreement by them not to use force that could lead to a protracted conflict and have repercussions for the entire region.

This report examines the regime's vulnerabilities, maps out six possible scenarios for a post-Issaias Eritrea and identifies the main risks and opportunities the country and the region would face. Concerned Western partners, neighbours and governments with special relations with Asmara could play a vital role in preventing a major humanitarian crisis or even the state's collapse.

EXECUTIVE SUMMARY AND RECOMMENDATIONS: Events in the last twelve months indicate growing discontent inside Eritrea's tightly controlled regime, as well as deepening political and social divisions. While the mounting number of incidents suggests that President Issaias Affewerki's regime is vulnerable, with increasing concerns over its ability to stay in power, the country would face numerous institutional, socio-economic and geopolitical obstacles during and after any transition. A careful assessment of these, as well as the role neighbours and the wider international community could play, is urgently needed to help avoid a violent power

RECOMMENDATIONS: To avert chaos and further displacement of populations; bring Eritrea in from the cold and promote talks with President Issaias Affewerki and the current leadership.

To regional and wider international partners:

1, Accept Eritrea's request to rejoin the Intergovernmental Agency for Development (IGAD), and so reactivate regional dialogue as per the organisation's mandate.

2, Re-evaluate UN Security Council sanctions on Eritrea in light of the latest UN Monitoring Group on Somalia and Eritrea report, so as to incentivise improvements in Eritrean behaviour.

3, Enhance the European Union (EU) Horn of Africa strategy to promote regional economic integration and dialogue through the mediation capacities of the EU

Special Representative for the Horn of Africa, and include Red Sea security in his mandate.

In the event of a transition: To the U.S., EU and countries with special relations to Eritrea:

1, Coordinate U.S. and EU efforts with countries that have special relations with Eritrea's current leadership (Qatar, Saudi Arabia, South Africa, Uganda, South Sudan and China).

2, Support a frank assessment of the country's socio-economic situation and development needs, including disarmament, demobilisation and reintegration and security sector reform programs, as well as projects for the reintegration of asylum seekers scattered around the world.

3, Engage Eritrea's direct neighbours, with African Union (AU) leadership, regarding their strategic response if a transition occurs, and seek to preserve Eritrean national unity.

4, Engage with the diaspora – including refugee youth and opposition groups – and promote their proactive engagement with an eventual new government.

5, Promote dialogue with the new leadership and encourage a national conference to open space for inclusive political developments.

Why Eritrea is not the North Korea of Africa, and What We Should be Noticing Instead'

Article by Jason Mosley - April 9, 2013: With a series of events in the past year suggesting change could be afoot, the time is ripe for renewed attention on Ethiopia-Eritrea relations. Eritrea is with some frequency referred to as "The North Korea of Africa". However, this analogy is not helpful for understanding Eritrea. Moreover, and worse, it serves to obscure dynamics which would be helpful in understanding the country. On the surface, comparisons are apparently drawn between the two countries because of two main factors. First, there is the size of the standing army relative to the population. In recent league tables, Eritrea registers as second behind North Korea. The second aspect of the comparison relates to the perception of both countries as 'closed': this presumably includes features such as a restrictive media environment, limited diplomatic relations and a role as a regional 'spoiler'. I am not an expert on North Korea, but it seems clear that any comparison between North Korea and Eritrea falls apart fairly swiftly, even at a surface level. Regarding their geopolitical and security dynamics, for example, North Korea is a nuclear armed state with the capacity to deliver a missile payload in striking distance of South Korea, Japan and China (three of the most significant economies on the planet). It has fought a war against the United States, and the subsequent stalemate has seen tens of thousands of US troops stationed near its border – a legacy of the Cold War, but clearly a high-profile item on the US, Chinese, Japanese and other major powers' security agendas. Compare this with Eritrea, a small country with extremely limited military capacity, located in the Horn of Africa – a strategically significant region to be sure, but nothing on the scale of the nexus of security and economic interests represented by the Korean peninsula. Additionally, as far as I can tell, the most salient aspect of a Western audience's 'understanding' of North Korea is that it is a closed country about which very little is known, but which has poor relations with its neighbours and the West. So does the analogy only tell us that we understand Eritrea poorly? Is this not where we started?

Shifting positions in the Horn of Africa: While the comparison may be most useful in simply telling us that Eritrea is understood poorly and in mostly in the form of vague assumptions, recent developments in the Horn of Africa suggest that it might be time to question some of those long-held assumptions – regarding relations between countries in the Horn, whether there is the prospect for improvement (or sudden shifts in unexpected directions), and who can and cannot be worked with. Ideas around these issues have been in place for several years after efforts to see through the 2000 Algiers Peace Agreement between Eritrea and Ethiopia faltered, and, from about 2005, the focus of external attention towards the Horn of Africa shifted towards Sudan and Somalia. But a string of events in the last year or so has contributed to the sense that things could change again. First, there were signals that Ethiopia's posture towards its neighbour might be taking a more robust tone. In early 2012, a botched kidnapping/extortion attempt in the Afar region, straddling the Eritrean border area, resulted in the deaths of five tourists including foreigners and their local tour guides. Ethiopia attributed the incident to Eritrean-backed rebels, and conducted two rounds of air strikes inside Eritrean territory in retaliation. The Eritrean response was extremely muted given the scale of the Ethiopian strikes.

In April, a rumour circulated that Eritrean President Isaias Afewerki had died; Isaias dispelled the rumours after about a week with a media appearance. Nevertheless, the rumours led observers to consider – albeit briefly – what a transition might look like if Eritrea's leadership were to suddenly shift. In June, Ethiopian Prime Minister Meles Zenawi disappeared from public view, and his death was eventually announced in late August, leading to a protracted period of political uncertainty as the ruling EPRDF party conducted internal discussions as to how to handle the transition. The ascension of Deputy Prime Minister Hailemariam Desalegn to the premiership has been accompanied by signals from the government of continuity with the trajectory set by Meles. However, the posture towards Eritrea appears to have softened somewhat. In October, two pilots defected to Saudi Arabia with President Isaias's official aircraft (a third pilot, sent to retrieve the plane, reportedly also defected this week). In November, Information Minister Ali Abdu reportedly defected, and is currently understood to be based in Australia, perhaps seeking asylum. November also saw the defection of the national football team, which was in Uganda for a match. None of these events is hugely significant in terms of the individuals involved, but they were high-profile developments which underscore the extent to which all is not static inside the government.

In late January, soldiers apparently occupied the Ministry of Information in Asmara, and briefly commandeered the state television broadcaster. A short message was reportedly read, calling for the implementation of the country's constitution and the release of political prisoners before the broadcast was cut, and the soldiers were eventually returned to their barracks. Such a transparent challenge to the authority of the government in Asmara has not taken place inside Eritrea in at least a decade. At the very least, this suggests to me that some shifts in the Eritrean government's internal dynamics are underway. In all likelihood, these shifts have been underway for some time, albeit overshadowed by more high-profile developments in neighbouring countries. As such, the time is ripe for renewed attention to the neglected issue of Ethiopia and Eritrea's relations. In a fragile region, the prospect of change – positive or negative – in this relationship should be a point of concern for both neighbouring countries and external players with strategic or commercial interests in the Horn of Africa. THINK AFRICA PRESS

The evil of human trafficking in the Sinai'

Article by Elizabeth Kendal - April 12, 2013 - It was in the Sinai desert that the nation of Israel received God's law. Consequently we tend to think of the Sinai as a place of law-giving. Today, however, under Egyptian control, the Sinai (particularly the north-east) is absolutely lawless—a place of law-breaking. Not only has al-Qaeda established a presence, but Bedouin criminal gangs and human traffickers operate with impunity. The Egyptian government knows that the clusters of concrete buildings dotting the Sinai desert are being used as torture chambers by human traffickers. The traffickers relay their victims' agony to family members or diaspora groups via mobile phone to facilitate payment of ransom. Even when ransom is paid it is not uncommon to find that victims are subsequently sold on to other traffickers who repeat the process. Failure to pay will result in death by torture, including through the extraction of saleable organs. New York Times (NYT) estimates that some 7,000 refugees have been abused this way in the past four years and that 4,000 of them may have died.

The victims, mostly Eritrean (99 per cent), Somali and Sudanese refugees, include many Christians who have fled persecution in their homelands (see RLPBs 185 and 187, November 2012). Most of the victims have been kidnapped from the Shagarab refugee camps in eastern Sudan, home to tens of thousands of Eritrean refugees, and then transferred to the Sinai where they are sold to criminals. Eritrean opposition groups are demanding that Sudan improve security at the camps. Chairman of the Ethiopia-based Eritrean Democratic Alliance (EDA), Tewelde Gebresilase, says human trafficking is carried out by a highly organised network that stretches from Eritrea to the refugee camps in Sudan and to the Sinai Peninsula in Egypt. It is a highly lucrative business, not only for the Bedouin, but for the Eritrean, Sudanese and Egyptian offici als who are involved either directly or indirectly through taking bribes. According to intelligence sources, it is a major form of revenue for the corrupt and wicked regime ruling Eritrea.

On 1 April Amnesty International (AI) released a report entitled ‘EGYPT/SUDAN: refugees and asylum seekers face brutal treatment, kidnapping for ransom, and human trafficking'. (Index: AFR 04/01/2013). AI is appealing that Egypt and Sudan should 'make urgent and concerted efforts to stop asylum-seekers and refugees being kidnapped from camps in Sudan, forcibly transported to Egypt, and being severely abused in the Sinai desert'. Reporting on a typical case, AI writes, 'On 22 January 2013, two Eritrean women living in the Shagarab camps set out to go to church, but did not arrive at their destination. Camp residents believe they were kidnapped.' Recently five Eritreans escaped from their captors during a fierce night storm. Whilst two perished en route, three made it to safety. Mhretab (27) is frail and heavily scarred. 'We had barely anything to eat or drink,' he explains. 'And we weren't allowed to sleep. If we did, they burned us. They scorched the skin on our arms or backs with burning plastic, or they burned us directly with lighters. They hung us from our feet and hit us. If we cried, they called our families and we had to beg them over the phone to pay for us.' By selling everything they owned and taking up a collection at church, Mhretab's family raised the ransom. But instead of releasing Mhretab, his kidnappers sold him on to other human traffickers. Lemlem (15) is totally traumatised. Wearing only a sweater, she asks the home owner if there is any underwear she can put on.

In another case, Ahlam (8) saw her 'parents' brutalised and other hostages murdered. On 12 March her captors put her on the phone to Swedish-Eritrean radio journalist Meron Estefanos. After recalling the horrors she had witnessed, Ahlam confirmed that the traffickers were threatening to take her from her 'parents' and sell her on to another gang. Fortunately for this family, they were released alive in late March after payment of ransom. Ahlam's uncle Adem, who had posed as Ahlam's father so he could stay with the women of the family to afford them some protection, has been hospitalised with serious torture injuries. Ahlam's father negotiated their release from Canada while claiming to be 'a distant relative in Saudi Arabia'. Ms Estefanos told NYT last year that Eritrean relatives sell land and possessions to raise ransoms. 'They borrow money from people, go from church to church,' she said. This evil thrives because nobody is prepared to act against it. Egyptian President Morsi would say it is not in his interests to pick a fight with criminals who are hurting only non-Arabs and mostly non-Muslims anyway, po sing no threat to him personally or politically. The Arab-supremacist, Islamist President Bashir in Khartoum, Sudan, would say the same. As for the Eritrean regime at the source of the problem, it is certainly not in its interests to see its refugees protected or its human trafficking revenues cut off. The whole situation would be totally hopeless were it not for the reality of the Lord of Hosts.

Please pray that the Lord of hosts: who demands 'Let my people go,' will shake the Sinai and break the arm (the mechanism of action) of the wicked (Psalm 10:15), that his people might be delivered and law and order restored to the desert.

will send his forces to guard the mostly Eritrean refugees—many of whom are Christians—in Sudan's Shagarab camps. 'The angel of the LORD encamps around those who fear him, and delivers them.' (Psalm 34:7 ESV); may all the refugees look to him and put their hope in him .

will intervene in Eritrea, the source of the problem, to liberate it from its corrupt, repressive and wicked regime. Please pray Psalm 10 over Eritrea, Sudan and Egypt, '. . . so that man, who is of the earth, may strike terror no more' (v18b ESV). Source: Religious Liberty Prayer Bulletin

Eritrea: 'Freedom Friday' Movement Challenges 'North Korea of Africa'

Article by Gianlucca Mezzofiore - April 12, 2013 - A new grassroots movement in Eritrea that draws inspiration from the Arab revolutions in Egypt and Tunisia is poised to challenge the one-party authoritarian rule of president Isaias Afewerki, who has been in power for twenty years. The Freedom Friday (Arbi-Harnet) movement, started in November 2011 by the Eritrean diaspora, is finally gaining momentum inside the country according to Meron Estefanos, a human rights activist and presenter with the Sweden-based Radio Erena, which broadcasts in Eritrea and around the world.

In tandem with Eritrean Youth for Change (EYC) and the Eritrean Youth Solidarity for Change (EYSC), Estefanos has set up a new campaign to reverse the Arab-style call to take to the streets every Friday. Instead, it urges Eritreans to empty the streets. "We made phone calls from diaspora to Eritrea," Estefanos told IBTimes UK. "We have a phone catalogue and called random numbers every Friday, telling them to stay at home and think about problems in our country." Freedom Friday's coordinator in the UK Selam Kidane, also director of Release Eritrea rights group, explained that asking Eritreans to stay at home "give them an opportunity to protest without risking too much"."Eritreans have been denied many rights and are very afraid of the government and its informants," she said. "We want to build trust among people who carry out joint protest actions."

'Go out and demonstrate': After two years, the Freedom Friday movement has established solid roots inside Eritrea. "Now they trust us inside the country, we have our team in Eritrea that puts out posters and leaflets late at night," Estefanos said. "The plan now that we have their trust is asking them to go out and demonstrate." Kidane confirmed that support is rising inside the secretive Africa country. "The small team initially based in the diaspora is now an established project inside the country and everyone knows about it," she said. What started as a call to Eritreans in the capital, Asmara, to vacate the streets every Friday may soon become a widespread youth protest akin to the April 6 movement in Egypt, which eventually helped topple president Hosni Mubarak.

"In our country we cannot have a revolution because every youth bitter about life is fleeing the country," she said. "In my radio programme I'm discussing that people shouldn’t leave because it is not a solution. I believe the youths should fight in their country. The Egyptian revolution showed that anything was possible because there was an unhappy youth." Dubbed the North Korea of Africa, Eritrea is considered one of the continent's most opaque countries. National elections have not been held in the Horn of Africa country since it gained independence in 1993. Torture, arbitrary detention and severe restrictions on freedom of expression remain routine. "We have a dictatorial regime, that's why people are fleeing every month," said Estefanos. "Around 3,000 people flee to Sudan every month and 1,000 to Ethiopia. We are losing the whole generation because all the youth is fleeing the country."

The mandatory military service that forces citizens to serve, on average, between the ages of 18 and 55 is one of the main causes of fleeing from the country. Advocacy group Reporters without Borders has ranked Eritrea 179th among 179 countries on freedom of expression. Access to the country for international humanitarian and human rights organizations is almost impossible and the country has no independent media. "Unless there is a regime change in Eritrea, things will continue like that," Estefanos said. "[Our] only target is to keep in contact with people inside the country. Now nobody doubts us anymore."

Eritrean female pilot seeks asylum in Saudi Arabia – Saudi Gazette' Updates: An Eritrean female flight lieutenant, who entered the Kingdom two weeks ago to fly back a military Eritrean airplane that landed earlier in the Kingdom, told Saudi authorities that she did not want to go back to Eritrea, according Jazan Emir's Office spokesman Ali Zala, Al-Hayat daily reported. Zala said the lady is a staff member of the Eritrean air forces and was sent by her government to fly back the airplane which an Eritrean pilot flew to the Kingdom earlier and landed at King Abdullah Regional Airport. The pilot and his co-pilot wanted the Kingdom to give them political asylum and authorities took necessary measures at the time. "When the lady entered Jazan, she immediately expressed her desire to seek political asylum in the Kingdom or facilitate the procedures of her moving to the country where her father lives." Her request is being considered by authorities, Zala added. (April 22, 2013)

Eritrea grounds its air force after a series of defections'
The Eritrean government has grounded its small air force after a series of defections by senior pilots over the past year. A reliable source at Asmara air port told that all aircraft, including small planes and helicopters owned by the Eritrean Air Force, are being prevented from taking off. Recently, two Eritrean pilots had landed the president's plane in to Saudi Arabia and requested political asylum. Just a few days ago, another female pilot, who was sent by President Issaias Affewerki to bring back his plane also defected. Saudi newspapers reported that the female pilot seeks political asylum. Source: ER (April 23, 2013)

Kidnappers target Eritrean refugee camps in Sudan'

(VoA) – Trafficking in Africa has long been a problem, from drugs and minerals to ivory and people. A new type of trade involving Eritreans fleeing the regime at home, however, has led to new tales of horror. Kidnapped in Sudan and sold into Egypt, Eritrean refugees reportedly are being tortured until families back home desperately search for the money to save them. When Meron Estefanos checks her phone, the list of missed phone calls is chilling. The Swedish-Eritrean human rights activist speaks to between 15 to 20 Eritrean refugees per day, many while they apparently are being tortured. She spoke out on the sidelines of the crime conference going on in Ethiopia. "As you are being tortured, they will call your family, your parents," Estefanos said. "I have talked to a mother, she was listening as her daughter was being raped by five men, and they were just saying, 'this is for you, this is for you., this is for you,' and the mother is just like… 'What can you do?' The ransom payments are a minimum of $30,000 up to $50,000. So when you have no other option, I mean you pay or you die. This has been happening since 2009 and the international community has been keeping a blind eye."

Rising 'torture trade'Since Israel stripped African refugees of their right to work there, and international donors gave the late Moammar Gadhafi money to try and stem the tide of migrants reaching European shores, Estafanos said a new "torture trade" has sprung up among former smugglers in Egypt's Sinai province. Aid agencies say that about 3,000 Eritreans a month flee a harsh regime that has a "shoot to kill" policy for anyone trying to leave. The United Nations Refugee Agency says more than 250,000 Eritrean refugees and nearly 15,000 asylum seekers live across the Horn of Africa. The Eritrean government is alleged to make its people pay to leave, punishes families with penalties for "defectors," and blackmails the diaspora into paying two percent tax on incomes. Targeting refugee camps: Now, according to Estafanos and a number of international organizations, many of the Eritrean people are being kidnapped from refugee camps in Sudan and sold to Egypt's Bedouin people via various clans. Estefanos – who also runs a radio show from Sweden that provides what she said is non-partisan news for Eritrea – said that some of the most horrific torture is being meted out while no one intervenes.

"They would hang them like Jesus Christ for four hours a day, every day and they will gang rape the men and the women, they would force hostages to rape each other," said Estefanos. She said that thousands already have gone through the kidnappings and torture, and about 100 people now are being held. Alexander Rondos, European Union representative for the Horn of Africa, said this is a problem to which the world must wake up. "Its rather difficult to understand why something as horrifying as this is going on other [than] to ask why I suspect, this might be a classic case of utter indifference," he said. Global awareness needed: Rondos said that word of what he calls this "silent tragedy" has to be spread throughout the world. "People need to get to know this story in all its horror. This is a form of slave trade. We invest tons of money to get rid of piracy, and this is a variant of piracy, but with even worse human consequences," he said. Rondos said the fact that people are passing through several states, and the lack of action in stamping out this trafficking trade, suggests that "there are elements of collusion or corruption."

Estefanos said this business is being run by about 25 families or "clans" and could be cleared up quickly. She said last year, when Egyptian forces went into Sinai to rescue a kidnapped British citizen, they found some of the detainees chained, beaten, starving and showing signs of torture, but did not free them. Sudan President Omar al-Bashir admitted at the Ethiopian crime conference that the kidnapping of Eritrean refugees was a big problem. Egyptian authorities under the fallen leader Hosni Mubarak also had pledged to help. But four years later, the ransoms are rising for some of the poorest people in the world. As her phone rang again, Estefanos expressed hope that soon, the stories that haunt her will disappear. Source: ER (April 26th, 2013)

Eritreans are using a new weapon to fight the Issaias regime - The Telephone'

Commentary: May 6, 2013 - Galvanised by the Arab spring, Eritreans in exile in Europe are mobilising against the authoritarian regime of President Issaias Affeworki with a new tool—the humble telephone. Every week, members of the diaspora make hundreds or even thousands of automated calls to their compatriots in the eastern African nation, chosing their numbers at random and playing them one-minute recorded messages to spread dissent. "It is time to restore our liberty and dignity," says one of the messages. In another, the mother of high-profile political prisoner Aster Yohannes recalls the fate of her daughter, who was arrested in 2003 and who has not been heard of since. And they have put these demands to the Eritrean people in about 100,000 recorded telephone calls made every Friday since late 2011 -- including to some members of the regime. Ironically, "sometimes its actually the people who don't like what we're doing that spread the message because they are not afraid", said Selam Kidane, founder of the 'Arbi Harnet' (Free Friday) movement. Source: Nation

Trusted sources informed 200 Eritreans captured in Libya are suffering in Benghazi - Tigrai Online'

About 200 Eritrean Asylum seekers have been captured near Benghazi in late April and have been detained without processing. They were arrested by Police and moved to a warehouse, where they are being held in detention by armed men in a warehouse located in Ajdabiya, Benghazi, Libya. Some of the Refugees are heavily pregnant woman and children and injured people. On Saturday Rebel Military took over 120 of them to work in some warehouse/ military factory. The others have been threatened they will be soon moved into a desert region or also taken for forced hard labour. They require assistance to be freed and processed as refugees.

Eritrea "celebrates" 20 years of terror'

Afrol News - By Rainer Chr. Hennig:

In May 2013, 20 years have passed since Eritreans' euphorically celebrated their long-fought independence from Ethiopia. The Asmara government reports of large anniversary celebrations all over the country, bur in reality, most Eritreans would prefer to escape Africa's most brutal dictatorship.1993. It was a year so full of promises. Finally, decades of warfare had come to an end, and Eritrea had won a full and complete victory. Freedom at last! The People's Front for Democracy and Justice (PFDJ), which emerged victorious after the long war against Ethiopia, was celebrated as heroes. Its respected leader, Isaias Afewerki, was of course made interim president of the now independent country. He had, after all, brought the country freedom and his PFDJ was at the time the only legitimate representative of the Eritrean people.

In April, 1993, it was time to rebuild the country and make it a prosperous and free nation, an example to follow. Enthusiastic exiled Eritreans from all over the world returned to lend their hand and share their knowledge. Spirits were high. Voluntary work was done to establish basic state structures. Foreign donors were thrilled by this collective action and the goodwill of government and people. Development aid started flooding into the country in 1997. Reconstruction is advancing, donor aid keeps pouring in. And it is time for modern state structures and political reform. Eritrea gets an up-to-date and democratic constitution, which foresees free multi-party elections for the parliament and free elections for the presidency. Meanwhile, the independence heroes of the PFDJ stay in power and are to prepare for democratic transition. In 1998, the border conflict with Ethiopia breaks out. International efforts to stop an outright war fail, seemingly because the governments in both Asmara and Addis Ababa needed an external conflict and enemy to remove attention on interior problems and on pressure for democratisation. From now on, Eritrea is fixed on a road towards dictatorship and an increasingly paranoid leader, shying no efforts to secure his grip on power. Now, it has gone 20 years since the happy and optimistic days of independence. Eritrea continues to be a one-party state under tight control of the PFDJ. The 1997 constitution remains on ice. No elections have been hold. And there are no plans for neither the constitution to be implemented nor multi-party polls to be organised.

Africa's worst dictatorship: On the contrary. Eritrea has slowly developed into the most brutal and closed dictatorship in Africa, comparable only to countries such as Turkmenistan and North Korea on a global scale.
Virtually no freedoms exist in the militarised country, where the population is increasingly enslaved by forced labour and imprisoned by fairly well monitored borders. No political opposition to President Affeweki's almighty word is allowed, not even within the ruling PFDJ. The president had the party purged in 2001, throwing hundreds of party functionaries favouring the democratisation process into prison without trial. Attempts to establish opposition parties are met with the utmost brutality. Even innocent relatives of exiled Eritreans joining the opposition abroad are thrown into prison. No free press is allowed. There were some relatively independent newspapers in Eritrea until 2001. But in a large operation, all privately owned media were closed down in September 2001, without any legal basis. Critical journalists were thrown into prison, without trial, it goes without saying. Even state media, only spreading party propaganda, saw its staff purged during the coming years. Prison .. no trial ..

President Issaias Affewerki also became suspicious towards religious movements he could not control. Allowing only four state religions and obliging its leaders to cooperate with the state, other groups were deemed illegal. Especially the Christian group Jehova's Witness was hard hit, with followers not hiding their faith being thrown into prison … And what started up as voluntary work to help the new state get established, has degenerated into a system of indefinite conscriptions into national service for ordinary citizens. National service means a long military service for men and women, but also years of forced work. By now, most constructions in Eritrea are made by forced labour. Nobody can tell how long a person must work for the state, it depends on the relationship with his or her superior. And anyone defying orders or trying to escape the service is thrown into prison … With the lack of freedom and the forced labour situation getting worse from year to year, many Eritreans of course try to escape from the brutal dictatorship. Many succeed and end up in other African countries, Europe, the Arab peninsula or even the US. There, they are usually contacted by Eritrean PFDJ agents, demanding they pay a tax to the Eritrean government. If they refuse, their relatives in Eritrea will be denied education, spend many years of forced labour or be thrown into prison … Those getting caught while trying to escape the country, are treated in the same way. Prison. No trial. And very many of those forcedly returned to Eritrea, because their asylum application was turned down, face exactly the same destiny. There are indeed special detention centres for those trying to escape or having been sent back home again.

Human rights groups over the last few years have been able to reveal that there is an extensive network of detention facilities in Eritrea. Some are well known, but others are kept in total secrecy. But the extreme opaqueness around detention procedures in the country means the exact number is unknown. What is known is that the use of torture is omnipresent in these facilities. Also, basic living conditions are very hard, even by African prison standards. Many detention centres are located in the desert with extremes of high and low temperatures. All are overcrowded and unclean. Food and drinking water are scarce. Most use underground cells and metal shipping containers to house prisoners. Amnesty International says it believes that at least 10,000 political prisoners have been imprisoned by the Afewerki government. "With no known exception, not a single political prisoner has ever been charged with a crime or tried, had access to a lawyer or been brought before a judge or a judicial officer to assess the legality and necessity of the detention," the human rights group says. So 20 years after the euphoric celebrations of independence, Eritrea itself has turned into a prison of desperation.

What went wrong? Eritrea is almost a classic example of what happens when a celebrated unity movement wins an independence war and is let to believe it can do the same miracles in government as in warfare. This story is not defined to only African liberation movements, it has also happened in Europe, Asia and the Middle East. But the tale of Eritrea is rougher than in most African countries. The same level of dictatorship never developed in countries with a similar history of independence, such as Angola, Mozambique, Algeria, Guinea Bissau and Namibia. And in Eritrea, a large part of the PFDJ leadership wanted democratic reforms before they were thrown into prison in 2001. The large difference is the person of Isaias Afewerki. President Afewerki is convinced he is surrounded by enemies, both when it comes to persons in Eritrean political landscape and when it comes to other countries. He has ignited armed conflicts with all of Eritrea's neighbour countries. He has purged his own party, the press, even the party press and tolerates no opposing viewpoint.

Historically, there are many parallels between the personality of President Affewerki, Uganda's Idi Amin, the Central African Empire's Jean-Bédel Bokassa and Equatorial Guinea's Francisco Macías Nguema. All developed their countries into equally horrible dictatorships in the 1960s and 70s. The historian Samuel Decalo ("Psychoses of Power") has tried to make psychological profiles of these leaders, and found some astonishing similarities between them. Their behaviour was of a very paranoid nature, which caused them to take dramatic action against real or assumed opponents. The three ex-dictators also stood out for their poor education and most likely were unable to read, causing them to suffer from inferiority complexes, which again triggered their paranoia. Now, Mr. Affewerki certainly stands out as an intellectual compared to these historic examples, as he studied engineering at the Addis Ababa University before turning to guerrilla warfare in 1966. So his paranoia has been triggered by other factors. Nevertheless, developments in Eritrea are closely connected to his personality. And he has proven to be both dangerous and unpredictable, causing 20 years of hardship for the Eritrean population due to his paranoid policies. And when looking back on the brave Eritreans in 1993, joining together collectively to shape a brighter future, they certainly deserved a better leader than Mr. Affewerki. But real freedom will come one day, after the Affewerki era has ended.

"Keep Eritrea under close scrutiny," - New UN Human Rights Special Rapporteur'

GENEVA (14 May 2013) – The United Nations Special Rapporteur on the human rights situation in Eritrea, Sheila B. Keetharuth, today called on the international community to keep Eritrea under close scrutiny until meaningful change is evident in the country. "Blatant disrespect for human rights in Eritrea is unacceptable," Ms. Keetharuth stressed after a ten-day mission to Ethiopia and Djibouti to collect first-hand information directly from Eritrean refugees on the human rights situation in their country. "Real change would require a fundamental reform process transforming the current culture of rights denial with one anchored in the rule of law, respect for and realization of all human rights and human dignity." The human rights expert warned that the high numbers of Eritrean refugees in both countries is indicative of the serious human rights violations in Eritrea, pushing people to take the difficult decision to leave their families and homes behind for an unknown future. "An improvement in the human rights situation in Eritrea will be crucial to allow refugees to return to their home country," Ms. Keetharuth noted while commending the efforts by Ethiopia and Djibouti to host the large Eritrean refugee communities. "Many of those refugees I spoke to underlined their wish to return, should there be a significant shift from the Government's current brutal and inhumane policies and practices."

In Ethiopia, the human rights expert met with representatives of the Ministry of Foreign Affairs and the Administration for Refugee and Returnee Affairs (ARRA), and representatives of the African Union. She also visited the ARRA Reception Centre in Endabaguna, as well as the Adi-Harush and Mai-Aini refugee camps in the Tigray region. "The continuing stream of refugees is of high concern," she said. Since the beginning of the year, close to 4,000 Eritrean refugees have crossed the Ethiopian-Eritrean border, bringing the number of those living in the three camps in the Tigray region to over 50,000 Eritrean refugees. "I am particularly concerned about the increasing number of unaccompanied children crossing the border without the knowledge of their families," Ms. Keetharuth said. "Children regularly mentioned dysfunctional family circumstances due to the long absence of the father, most of the time because of conscription, lack of educational opportunities and the fear of forced conscription into indefinite national service as major reasons for their decisions to flee."

The rights expert warned that such a situation not only poses major protection challenges but is indicative of the scale of despair these children are facing at home. "A 16-year old boy asked me 'How can I go to Wi'a for military training? I have no interest in being a soldier.' He was terrorized by the harsh conditions prevailing in this desert camp, which he described at length," she recalled. In Djibouti, the Special Rapporteur held meetings with the Minister of Cooperation and representatives of the national security, the local administration, as well as the Office National d'Assistance aux Réfugiés et aux Sinistrés. Ms. Keetharuth met some of the 247 Eritrean deserters detained in NAGAD Police Academy, as well as urban refugees and those based in the Ali Addeh refugee camp. A young woman in her early twenties, mother of a toddler and wife of a soldier, explained that everybody aged between the age of 18 and 60 were forced to undergo military training daily from 07h00 until 10h00 and from 16h00 to 18h00. She said: “I would go with my mother and my child for the shooting training; when we asked why, we got no answer. When are we going to live a normal life?"

The Special Rapporteur is particularly concerned about the indefinite national service, the ongoing practice of arbitrary arrest and incommunicado detention in inhumane conditions and widespread torture, both physical and psychological, during interrogation by the police, military and security forces. Mere suspicion appears to be enough for somebody to be subjected to interrogation and detention without charge or without being brought before a court of law. Those trying to cross the border may fall prey to a ruthlessly implemented shoot-to-kill policy; family members of those who successfully escape regularly have to pay a heavy fine of 50,000 Nakfa or are arrested, in line with the so-called guilt-by-association policy. In one camp, the Special Rapporteur met a mother of two, who decided to leave her small children behind when she fled from repeated arrests and incommunicado detention following her brother's escape.

Ms. Keetharuth heard how Eritreans do not express their views and share their opinions openly for fear of reprisals. "Persecution on religious grounds continued in Eritrea; followers of unrecognised religions face draconian restrictions and are often arrested while worshipping," she said. "An all-encompassing feeling of fear and distrust, even within families, reflects the pervasive intelligence network the Eritrean Government has established throughout the country." Several interviewees stated that they were not at liberty to choose their profession. Compulsory military service took away sons who should be tending the family farm, causing financial crisis in farming communities. The Eritrean population is leaving in high numbers, in particular the young men, a process that has started to deplete entire villages in Eritrea, with the potential to destroy the country's social fabric. The result of her findings, which would be strictly limited to the situation inside Eritrea, will be reflected in her first report to the Human Rights Council in June 2013. Endnote: Sheila B. Keetharuth was appointed as the Special Rapporteur on the human rights situation in Eritrea during the 21st Session of the UN Human Rights Council in September 2012. She took her functions on 1 November 2012. As Special Rapporteur, she is independent from any government or organization and serves in her individual capacity. A lawyer from Mauritius, Sheila B. Keetharuth has extensive experience in monitoring and documenting human rights violations, advocacy, training and litigation in human rights in Africa.

RWB PROVIDES UN WITH REPORT ON DISASTROUS SITUATION IN ERITREA'

Reporters Without Borders submitted its contribution on Eritrea yesterday to the United Nations Human Rights Council, which will examine the country's performance during the 18th Universal Periodic Review session next January and February. Each UPR session is used to review the human rights performance of a number of countries and, when necessary, remind them of their responsibilities. Eritrea's performance was last reviewed in 2009.

Read RWB's contribution
In its report, Reporters Without Borders describes the disastrous state of freedom of information in Eritrea and the reasons why the country was ranked last in the Reporters Without Borders press freedom index for the past six years. The report condemns the government's total control of news and information since 2001, when it closed down all privately-owned media, and its repeated attempts to censor and jam independent broadcast media – international and exile radio and TV stations ¬– which are based abroad.

It also points out that Eritrea is Africa's biggest prison for journalists, with around 30 currently detained. They include four journalists arrested in 2001, of whom another seven died in detention as a result of the appalling conditions or because they took their own lives. In its recommendations, the report calls on Eritrea: to implement the recommendations it previously accepted, to accept visits by UN special rapporteurs, to end censorship, mass surveillance and all forms reprisals and harassment of news providers, to release all journalists held without charge and without a fair trial.

On World Refugee Day, on 20 June, Reporters Without Borders produced a report on all that it has done to help journalists who have been forced to flee abroad. It also posted six interviews with refugee journalists on a dedicated website, one of whom is Eritrea's Amanuel Ghirmay

June 3, 2013: Israel planning to deport African migrants to 'east African country'

Court document reveals scheme to send some of 60,000 illegal immigrants, mostly Eritrean or Sudanese, to a third country. Associated Press - Israel plans to send thousands of African migrants to an unidentified country, according to a court document, in an attempt to address one of Israel's more pressing issues: what to do with an influx of roughly 60,000 African migrants who have sneaked into Israel from Egypt over the past eight years. Most of the migrants have come from Eritrea or Sudan, some fleeing repressive regimes and others looking for work. Over the past year Israel has taken a series of steps to halt the influx. It built a fence along the border with Egypt and last year offered some migrants cash to leave voluntarily, warning they would be expelled otherwise.

According to the document, a state lawyer told the Israeli supreme court on Sunday that a deal had been reached with an unidentified country to absorb some migrants and that Israel was in talks with two other countries to secure a similar agreement. The details of the arrangement were not disclosed, although the state lawyer, Yochi Gnesin, said the return of migrants would be "gradual". Few other details of the deal were available. Israeli Army Radio reported that the country was in east Africa and did not suffer from any unrest that would harm the migrants. The Haaretz daily said that Israel had agreed to provide agricultural expertise as part of the deal. Israeli officials have declined to comment on the potential deal. On Sunday the supreme court ordered the government to provide details of the arrangement, including the name of the African country, within seven days.

July 16, 2013: Israel begins sending Eritreans home despite rights concerns'

By Allyn Fisher-Ilan, Reuters

JERUSALEM (Reuters) - Israel has launched a forced repatriation of Eritrean migrants that amounts to a grave violation of their human rights because of the risk of persecution in their reclusive homeland, an advocacy group said. Israeli authorities have been trying to curb an influx of Africans that has ignited resentment in the poorer neighbourhoods in which they dwell and compounded the fears of many Israelis about eventually being outnumbered in the Jewish state. But humanitarian groups say that forcibly returning African migrants home often exposes them to rights abuses including torture.

Some 60,000 Africans, including 35,000 Eritreans, have walked over a long porous desert border with Egypt into Israel since 2006, Israeli government figures show, and many live in gritty districts of Tel Aviv. Israel regards most as illegal job-seekers but rights agencies say many should be considered for political asylum because of poor human rights records of their home governments. Hotline for Migrant Workers (HMW), an Israeli human rights group, said an initial group of 14 Eritrean men were flown to Asmara, the Eritrean capital, after receiving $1,500 each from Israeli authorities.

They were driven to the airport from one of two desert detention centres that Israel has expanded. A law passed a year ago, and now being contested in its high court, allows the country to jail migrants it says arrived illegally. A spokeswoman for the Interior Ministry declined to comment on the HMW report, other than to say that some "people are returning home". She did not give their nationalities. The men who left were the first sent back to Eritrea, which was accused last year by the U.N. human rights chief of practicing torture and summary executions. Israel had said in the past that it was seeking third-country destinations for Eritreans.

"GRAVE VIOLATION"

Sigal Rozen, public policy coordinator for HMW, a group that objects to most deportations of migrants, told Reuters the latest repatriations were "a grave human rights violation". Rozen said those repatriated had signed consent forms but she argued their agreement could not be seen as voluntary because Israeli authorities made clear the only way they would be freed from detention was by returning home. She said at least one of the Eritreans had said he was a military deserter, and could face punishment at home.

A Tel Aviv-based representative of the United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees monitoring migrants' treatment in Israel had no immediate comment. She said she was seeking confirmation from Israel of the Eritreans' repatriation. New York-based Human Rights Watch also condemned the new repatriations. In a statement emailed to news media, Gerry Simpson, a senior HRW refugee researcher, accused Israel of "using the threat of prolonged detention to force Eritrean and Sudanese nationals to give up their asylum claims".

Worldwide, HRW said, around 80 percent of Eritrean asylum seekers are granted some form of protection because of credible fears of persecution relating to punishment for evading indefinite military service in Eritrea and other widespread rights abuses in the small Horn of Africa state. Last month, an Israeli government lawyer said at a Supreme Court hearing on the legality of detaining asylum-seekers who entered surreptitiously that a deal to resettle "infiltrators from Eritrea" had been reached with a country she did not name. At least one group of Africans was flown out of Israel to South Sudan in the past year and other migrants have been offered cash to leave voluntarily. Some 2,000 Africans are being held in the southern detention centres. Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu has said that a fence which Israel completed along most of the Egyptian border earlier this year has significantly reduced the flow of migration from Africa, which hit a peak of 2,000 a month in 2011.

September 30, 2013: Ethiopia's No-Peace-No-War Strategy Against Eritrea Backfires'

Analysis: By Amanuel Biedemariam - In May of 2000, Ethiopia waged the most destructive war of aggression against the people of Eritrea. After the war failed to accomplish Ethiopia's goals of re-colonizing Eritrea by force or, place a puppet government, Ethiopia was forced to pen the Algiers Agreement in 2002 that laid the foundation to determine the final binding decision based on The Hague Courts ruling which ultimately decided the disputed border in favor of Eritrea. At first, Ethiopian authorities applauded the decision. The then Foreign Minister Seyoum Mesfin lied, "All disputed areas have been given to Ethiopia," and falsely claimed that the international tribunal at The Hague has decided that Badme, Zelambessa, Ayiga, Erobe, Alitena, Bada and others to be part of the Ethiopian sovereign territory. The Ethiopian authorities then changed their mind and tried to amend the decision and when that failed devised ploys designed to undermine The Hague decision. These dances went on for a while trying to frustrate the people of Eritrea and robbing the people of Eritrea and Ethiopia of opportunities from naturally developing their economies free from hostilities. Ethiopian authorities initially said they accepted the decision, then said they accepted it in principle, then rejected the decision altogether and when the pressure mounted said that they accepted but Eritrea must Dialogue to resolve the issue.

Ethiopia was able to undermine International Law with ill-advised US support that thought to undermine Eritrea's hard won independence.

Ethiopian and US's agendas colluded for the same objective and similar interest. US interests on Eritrea are Eritrea's strategic geographic location. By allowing Ethiopia to control Eritrea the US can control Eritrea using a client state Ethiopia. For Ethiopia, it is access to the sea. This is well documented historic reality that cost millions of lives dead, displaced and decades of wars. Ironic whatever, is when the TPLF that fought to advance the agenda of Independent Greater Tigray piggy-banked on Ethiopia's plan of controlling Eritrea with the sole plan to access the sea. In an interview with late Paul Henze, the late Meles Zenawi said, "We look at this from the viewpoint of the interests of Tigre, first, and then Ethiopia as a whole. We know that Tigre needs access to the sea and the only way is through Eritrea …. There are many Tigreans in Eritrea ….. They don't want to be treated as foreigners there … They have the same history. We are worried about Eritrea because we are not sure that differences among different groups can be kept under control". (Paul B. Henze, Conversations with Meles Zenawi, 31 March/1 April 1990)

The TPLF was in a disadvantaged position when it fought the Derg for it lacked the power and access it can use as a launching pad. The TPLF's decision to align with the proven Eritrean Liberation struggle led by EPLF was a calculated move with hidden agendas. The TPLF believed that Eritrea's independence will not hold because Eritreans are divided and will not have economy that can support the new found independence. The TPLF believed Eritrea will be caught in civil strife based on ethnic, religious and regional divide. Therefore, TPLF's alliance with Eritrea was not genuine however, to go against Eritrea at that time was suicidal. Thence, as soon as it was able the TPLF with the support of the US launched, which turned out to be, a protracted war under the pretext of border dispute that metastasized to the No-War-No-Peace agenda. No-War-No-Peace is a continuation of the original agenda that planned to control Eritrea systematically. It is designed to frustrate Eritrea, kill Eritrea's economy, create divide based on ethnic, religious and regional divide. The TPLF, with the support of the US, designed to rob Eritrea of her youth through constant threat of war. With the hopes of turning the youth against their government the TPLF, with the support of the US, created mechanisms to entice youth to flee into Ethiopia and elsewhere. The lure of going to the West through Ethiopia was used as a bait to entice youth. Hundreds of thousands Eritreans have been accepted as refugees in the Sudan spanning decades due to Ethiopia's oppression. Never have the Sudanese exploited or tried to exploit Eritrea's plight. The current Ethiopian regime exploited the plight of Eritreans far beyond the realities with exaggerations with the hopes of convincing the international community that there exists instability in Eritrea.

The US and Ethiopia continued to scheme to undermine Eritrea's stability and independence using the UN with fabrications and by sanctioning Eritrea to a) weaken the military b) kill the economy through targeted economic sanctions designed to block Eritrea's economic progress. These are misguided miscalculations that failed to account the resolve of the people Eritrea. Around the world, scarcities of goods and services are triggering massive revolts against governments. Eritreans however, realize they must sacrifice today to ensure lasting success. Independence was won based on self-reliance and sacrifices and that is how economic successes will be achieved. Eritrean unity and ability to withstand external pressures is something the US and Ethiopia failed to understand. The TPLF and the US miscalculated on many fronts. They undermined Eritrea's strength and exaggerated Ethiopia's strength and importance. The TPLF miscalculated when it believed Eritrea's independence will not hold. It miscalculated when it believed it can undo Eritrea's independence by destabilizing Eritrea. In an effort to strangulate Eritrea economically, Ethiopia refused the use of Eritrea's ports. It cut of all trade between the peoples. However, it is Ethiopia that is suffering due to high rates for utilizing Djibouti ports. Eritreans have learned to grow the agricultural products they use to import from Ethiopia bolstering Eritrea's self-reliance stance while robbing Ethiopian farmers of a major market proving-farce Ethiopia's belief that Eritrea's economic lifeline is Ethiopia alone.

Ethiopia and the US thought to alienate Eritrea. Ethiopia designed to encircle Eritrea by allying with Yemen and Sudan. They used IGAD nations against Eritrea. They manipulated the Arab League and African Union countries in an effort to pursue Eritrea. That too failed. To the contrary these nations failed to focus internally and as a result became unstable. Chaos has engulfed Yemen, Egypt, Sudan and many face imminent revolt if not civil wars. To ignite chaos Ethiopia thought to create opposition for Eritrean government and to that end recruited Jihadists, disgruntled radical elements, religious zealots, corrupt individuals and the like. Ethiopia and the US targeted the Diaspora Eritreans to a) stop them from supporting their government b) recruit them against their government. Ethiopia targeted specific ethnic groups and enticed them to opt for ethnic federalism or independence. That too failed and keeps failing because the citadel is fortified with unparalleled unity, brilliance and strength of mind. To the contrary, Ethiopia finds itself on the brink of civil strife, religious uprisings, rebellion and ethnic divisions of its own making. The economy is in shambles, corruption is a way of life, and Ethiopia's children are floating on the shores of Yemen by the thousands every month. In Addis Ababa, demonstration and confrontation with Ethiopian authorities is a weekly event. Unchecked, these developments will plunge Ethiopia into irreversible civil war. The US used Ethiopia as stick throughout the region. Ethiopia became destabilizing force and source of instability in Somalia by extension Kenya. By failing to abide by the international agreement it signed, Ethiopia created a chronic state of conflict that is engulfing the entire Horn region. The push into Somalia and Kenya's ill-conceived involvement in Somalia is fueling uncontrollable instability in the region.

To Conclude: What Ethiopia tried to inflict upon the people and government of Eritrea is happening to Ethiopia itself. Today, saving Ethiopia from itself has become urgent reality for all concerned. Ethiopians all around have come to that realization and are doing all they can to stop the tsunami from washing the nation off the map. The No-War-No-Peace disrupted or hindered natural exchanges between the peoples of the two historically, culturally and geographically close people of Eritrea and Ethiopia. But it failed to stop the people of Eritrea. To the contrary it enforced the need to Self-Reliance. It helped strength the resolve and resilience. It became an experience that cleared the clouds and taught Eritrea, the young nation, how the enemies operate. Eritrea, a nation many predicted to fall in six months is proving them wrong. In the process exposed how schemes designed to undermine the sovereignties of African nations work. As a result Eritrea is the most peaceful and stable country in Africa a testament to the brilliance of the people and government of Eritrea. Eritrea is rewriting the history of Africa by showing them how to stand.

ERITREA – Timeline Diaries updates, key events and related notes:

300 to 600 - Eritrea considered part of the Ethiopian kingdom of Axum.
600 - Arabs introduced Islam to the the coastal territories.
1500s - Ottoman Empire annexes Eritrea.

During the 19th century, Massawa, along with much of the northeast African coast of the Red Sea, was ruled by Egypt with the Ottomans consent

1869 – Italia occupied Eritrea
1890 - Eritrea becomes an Italian colony, entitled as 'Premoglia Italiana' meaning 'daughter colony of Itali'..

March 1941 – Royal British forces occupied Eritrea.

1952 – Great Britain administers Eritrea as a United Nations Trust Territory.

November 1952 – UN decides to make Eritrea a federal component of imperial Ethiopia.

1958 - Eritrean Liberation Front (ELF) formed in Cairo, the Egyptian capital

.

September 1962 – Ethiopia annexes Eritrea, turning it into a province; war of independence begins.

1970 - Leftist faction of the Eritrean Liberation Front splits to form the Eritrean People's Liberation Front (EPLF).

September 12, 1974 – Ethiopian Emperor Haile Selassie I overthrown in a military coup.

1977 to 78 - Soviet advisors and Cuban troops help Ethiopian forces reverse significant advances made by the Eritrean guerrillas.

1982 - The Eritrean People's Liberation Front (EPLF) disbanded all other ELF factions to its control of the battle with the Ethiopian central government.

February 11, 1990 - Eritrean People's Liberation Front captures the port city of Massawa.

1991 – May Eritrean People's Liberation Front captures the Eritrean capital, Asmara and forms a provisional government; the United Nations sets a date for a referendum on Eritrean independence with Ethiopian backing.

April 1993 – Eritreans almost unanimously vote for independence; Eritrea becomes de-jure independent and joins the United Nations.

1995 - Eritrean troops invade the Yemeni-held Hanish islands at the southern mouth of the Red Sea.

November 21, 1997:ERITREAN MUSIC: Yemane Ghebremichael (commonly known as Yemane Baria) the well-known Eritrean songwriter, composer and singer died of natural causes at age 57

Side Note: Yemane Ghebremichael (commonly known as Yemane Baria), was a well-known Eritrean songwriter, composer and singer. Not confined to musical pursuits, Yemane was also heavily involved in Eritrean politics. He died of natural causes in 1997. Yemane's songwriting strove to reflect what he perceived to be Eritrean experience during the Eritrean War of Independence. His songs were dotted with stories of love, journey, hope, immigration, and liberation. In 1975 he was jailed for the perceived political interpretation of one of his songs. A few years after the declaration of the independence of Eritrea, Yemane moved to Asmara and continued to release albums that reflected the new era of hope and national prosperity, with a mix of African and Latin melodies. He also sang about the people involved in the movement towards Eritrean independence, and the sacrifices of that movement. Yemane was also known as the 'Eritrean caretaker' due to his reputation as being of a generous, down-to-earth nature, and for sharing his place with newly arrived Eritreans. He is known to having helped many Eritreans adjust to diaspora life in Sudan and move to better places in the Middle East, America, Europe, etc. He was known for his deep sense of artistry and mastery of Tigrinya, the most widely used Eritrean language.

1998 - International arbitration panel awards the Greater Hanish island to Yemen and divides other smaller islands between the two countries.

April 1998-2000 - Eritrean-Ethiopian border clashes turn into a full-scale war which kills some 70,000 people.

The border war between Ethiopia and Eritrea b/n 1998 to 2000 killed over 80, 000 people.

June 2000 – Eritrea, Ethiopia ceasefire and peace agreements envisage troop withdrawals and UN peacekeepers.

February 2001 - Ethiopia says it has withdrawn its troops from Eritrea in accordance with the 2000 peace deal.

April 2001 - Eritrea says its forces have pulled out of the border zone with Ethiopia in accordance with the 2000 peace agreement.

May 2001 - Eritrea and Ethiopia agree on a UN-proposed mediator to try to demarcate their disputed border.

September 18, 2001: 15 senior government officials and key members of the ruling PFDJ namely, Baraki Guebre Selassie, Aster Fisehatsion, Birhane Guebregzier, Himid Humed, Saleh Kakia, Haile Woldensae, Mahmoud Sherifo, Oquebe Abraha, Germano Nati, Petros Solomon, and others have been held in prison incommunicado in an undisclosed location, since for opposing the rule of Eritrean president Issaias Affewerki, Amnesty International named them prisoners of conscience.

February 2002 - Eritrea's highest legislative body, the National Assembly, decides not to allow the creation of any political parties in the near future.

October 2002 - Eritrea is accused by neigbouring Sudan of taking part in a rebel offensive in the east. Asmara denies the charge.

April 2003 - April - Boundary commission rules that the disputed border town of Badme lies in Eritrea. Ethiopia says the ruling is unacceptable.

November 2004 - Ethiopia says it accepts "in principle" a commission's ruling on its border with Eritrea. But a protracted stalemate over the town of Badme continues.

April 2005 - World Food Programme warns of a dire food situation after a series of droughts. It extends emergency operations to help more than 840,000 people .

October 2005 - Eritrea bans UN helicopter flights in its airspace. UN says the restriction could force it to withdraw altogether.

November 2005 - UN Security Council threatens Eritrea and Ethiopia with sanctions unless they return to the 2000 peace plan.

December 2005 - Eritrea orders the expulsion of North American, European and Russian peacekeepers from the UN mission monitoring its border with Ethiopia.

International commission, based in The Hague, Netherlands rules that Eritrea broke international law when it attacked Ethiopia in 1998. It says the attack could not be justified as self defence.

September 2006 - Eritrea expels five UN staff as spies, in a move seen as a further deterioration of dire relations with the UN.

October 7, 2006: ERITREAN MUSIC: The mysterious death of the elite singer raised concern among the public.

Side note: Eritrea's elite singer Abraham Afewerki (30 January, 1966 to 7 October, 2006):is described as an Eritrean musical tour-de-force. Held in high regard by his fellow Eritrean artists, his work garners appreciation and admiration from his peers. His musical influence also crosses borders to Eritrea's neighboring countries like Ethiopia where his music is reproduced by other musicians singing in a different language other than his native Eritrean Tigrinya.

Abraham was born in Asmara, Eritrea. From an early age Abraham was fascinated with musical instruments and by age nine had learned to play a musical instrument independently. Due to the Eritrean War of Independence, Abraham, with his family, fled to Sudan and soon after to Italy, where he further pursued his dream to be a professional musician. While studying in Rome, Abraham continued to expand his musical skills by working with internationally known musical celebrities in live performances as well as recordings.

Abraham's first CD, Kozli Gaba was released in 1991, which was produced and distributed by Virgin Records in Europe. The album was the first by an Eritrean artist that was produced by an International recording company and made available to the global audience. Abraham's music, in due course, was covered by a number of International media outlets. During the following 15 years Abraham released two more albums which further propelled his popularity among Eritreans. His songs were popular because his lyrics expressed strong and poetic images of Eritrea's culture. His socially conscious words were evocative and his fans often described his music as inspiring. Abraham is also credited with being one of Eritrea's master live entertainers.

In his newest CD titled Semai ("Sky" in Tigrinya), Abraham collaborates with several Eritrean musicians, the result of which was an exquisite sound. Abraham continued to blend his music with jazz, R&B, and Reggae rhythms at the same time maintaining his music's originality and authenticity. In 2006,

Afewerki drowned while swimming in Massawa during the filming of his next music video. (Text ends)

October 2006 - UN Secretary General Kofi Annan urges Eritrea to pull back the troops it has moved into the buffer zone on the Ethiopian border. The UN says the incursion is a major ceasefire violation.

November 2006 - A UN report says seven countries - including Eritrea - have been providing arms and supplies to the rival Islamist administration in Somalia. Eritrea denies the charge. Eritrea's arch foe Ethiopia was arming the interim government, the report says. Ethiopia and Eritrea reject a proposal put forward by an independent boundary commission as a way around a four-year impasse over the demarcation of their shared border.

March 2007 - A group of British embassy workers and their Ethiopian guides are kidnapped in Ethiopia's northern Afar region bordering on Eritrea. They are eventually released in Eritrea.

April 2007 – Eritrea banned female circumcision.

Eritrea pulls out of regional body IGAD (Intergovernmental Authority on Development) as IGAD member states back Ethiopian intervention in Somalia.

May 2007 - European Union Development Commissioner Louis Michel meets President Issaias

Affeworki in Brussels. The commission's welcome is condemned by rights activists.

August 2007 - US official Jendayi Frazer says Washington is considering putting Eritrea on a list of state sponsors of terrorism.

September 2007 - War could resume between Ethiopia and Eritrea over their border conflict, warns United Nations special envoy to the Horn of Africa, Kjell Bondevik.

November 2007 - Eritrea accepts border line demarcated by international boundary commission. Ethiopia rejects it.

January 2008 - UN extends mandate of peacekeepers on Ethiopia-Eritrea border for six months.

UN Security Council demands Eritrea lift fuel restrictions imposed on UN peacekeepers at the Eritrea-Ethiopia border area. Eritrea declines, saying troops must leave border.

February 2008 - UN begins pulling 1,700-strong peacekeeper force out due to lack of fuel supplies following Eritrean government restrictions.

April 2008 - UN Secretary-General Ban Ki Moon warns of likelihood of new war between Ethiopia and Eritrea if peacekeeping mission withdraws completely. Outlines options for the future of the UN mission in the two countries.

Djibouti accuses Eritrean troops of digging trenches at disputed Ras Doumeira border area and infiltrating Djiboutian territory. Eritrea denies charge.

May 2008 - Eritrea calls on UN to terminate peacekeeping mission.

June 2008 - Fighting breaks out between Djiboutian and Eritrean troops in the disputed Ras Doumeira border area. At least nine Djiboutian soldiers killed. US condemns Eritrean “aggression” but Eritrea denies launching an attack.

July 2008 - UN Security Council votes unanimously to end UN peacekeeping mission monitoring disputed border between Ethiopia and Eritrea.

November 2008 - An armed opposition group, the Red Sea Afar Democratic Organisation, says it carried a major attack on a military base, killing or injuring more than a hundred people.

April 2009 - UN Security Council says Eritrea failed to fulfil its obligation to withdraw troops from disputed border area of Djibouti under an ultimatum issued in January. Eritrea denies having troops on Djiboutian soil.

April 2009 - Human Rights Watch says the government is turning the country into a “giant prison”.

August 2009 - Eritrea and Ethiopia are ordered to pay each other compensation for their 1998-2000 border war.

December 2009 - UN imposes sanctions on Eritrea for its alleged support for Islamist insurgents in Somalia.

May 2010 - Rebel groups say they have been operating jointly to topple the government, and claim military successes.

June 2010 - Eritrea, Djibouti agree to resolve their border dispute peacefully.

August 2010 - Opposition groups meeting in Ethiopia agree to establish parliament in exile.

December 2010 - US diplomatic cables revealed by WikiLeaks say Eritreans fleeing in droves, economy in a death spiral and prisons overflowing.

March 2011 - Ethiopia accuses Eritrea of sending agents across the border to plant bombs and warns it will take all necessary measures to halt Eritrean “aggression”.

April 26, 2011: Eritrea to Ethiopia: Vacate from All Our Territories to Normalize Relation’

April 2011 - Ethiopia for the first time declares openly that it will support Eritrean rebel groups fighting to overthrow President Issaias Affewerki.

July 2011 - A UN report accuses Eritrea of being behind a plot to attack an African Union summit in Ethiopia in January.

June to September 2011 – Horn of Africa hit by worst drought in 60 years.

November 3, 2011: Egyptian Human Trafficking Gang ‘Took Organs as Payment from Eritrean migrants.

Bedouin smugglers in Sinai involved in human trafficking are also believed to be stealing body organs from Eritrean refugees who are unable to pay their demands for large amounts of cash to take them into Israel.

December 2011 - UN Security Council tightens sanctions against Eritrea for continuing to support Islamists in Somalia.

January 2012 - Group of European tourists kidnapped and killed in the remote Afar region in Ethiopia, near the border with Eritrea.

March 2012 - Ethiopian troops attack positions in south-eastern Eritrea, alleging that subversive groups were being trained there.

July 2012 - UN Human Rights Council appoints a special rapporteur on human rights in Eritrea.

HISTORY: Eritrea – from annexation to independence
Martin Plaut December 14, 2012

Over the years I have collected a series of photographs, illustrating Eritrean history. They are not comprehensive since they depended on what I could find. Here are a selection that illustrate Eritrea's extraordinary fight for independence from Ethiopia that lasted 30 years.

The British dilemma
At the end of the Second World War Britain was faced with the question of what to do with Eritrea, which it had captured from Italy in 1941.

London turned to the United Nations, which established a Commission to decide the issue.

The Commission went to Eritrea in February in 1950 and canvassed opinion.

On October 7th 1951 Dr. Eduardo Anze Matienzo of Bolivia, UN commissioner for Eritrea, announced that Eritreans had accepted a UN plan for federation with Ethiopia, despite many calling for independence.

He is shown here in December 1951, talking to people in Asmara.

The US Ambassador to the UN, John Foster Dulles, famously declared: "From the point of view of justice, the opinions of the Eritrean people must receive consideration.

Nevertheless the strategic interest of the United States in the Red Sea basin and the considerations of security and world peace make it necessary that the country has to be linked with our ally Ethiopia."

Federation to annexation elections in Eritrea on March 16, 1952, for a representative Assembly of 68 members, evenly divided between Christians and Muslims.

This body in turn accepted the draft constitution put forward by the UN commissioner.

On 11 September 1952 the constitution was ratified by Emperor Haile Selassie.

He is seen on the left cutting the tape on the boundary between Eritrea and Ethiopia on 3rd October 1952, to establish the federation, but it was not to last.

The Emperor was determined that Eritrea would be fully incorporated into Ethiopia.

He made Amharic the official language in place of Arabic and Tigrinya, ended the use of the Eritrean flag, imposed censorship, and moved businesses out of Eritrea.

Finally, in 1962 Haile Selassie put enough pressure on the Eritrean Assembly for them to vote for an end of the federation.

Resistance grows

In 1957 students demonstrated against the incorporation of Eritrea into Ethiopia.

This was followed in 1958 by trade union demonstrations. A four day strike was repressed with troops firing on the crowd, killing some and injuring hundreds.

An underground group, the Eritrea Liberation Movement was formed and, in July 1960, the Eritrean Liberation Front was founded in Cairo, led by Mohammed Aden.

The first shots of the liberation struggle were fired by Hamid Idris Awate when he attacked a police unit on Mount Adal on 1st September 1961.

This photograph, taken in December 1970, shows ELF guerrillas attacking the railway near Asciadira, by tearing up the line.

The rebellion continued, but unity did not. In 1968-9 the ELF fractured and the Eritrean People's Liberation Front was founded in September 1973, led by Isaias Afeworki.

ELF and EPLF fighters managed to penetrate Asmara in early 1975, leading to heavy fighting in the city.

On 13 September 1975 ELF fighters raided the American listening station at Kagnew, seizing Thomas Bowidowicz, from New Jersey and David Strickland, from Florida.

A $5 million ransom was asked for and, after negotiations, both men were freed in January 1976.

Clashes between the rival Eritrean movements led to bitter civil war and the ELF are finally forced out of Eritrea, to seek refuge in Sudan.

Victory and independence

The Eritrean liberation struggle was to suffer many setbacks and its fighters and civilians to experience terrible suffering.

On several occasions defeat seemed almost inevitable, but finally, by the late 1980's, the tide turned.

In March 1988 the EPLF destroyed the Ethiopian northern army at the battle of Afabet. Addis Ababa lost control of large portions of Eritrea.

By 1990 EPLF forces had driven the Ethiopians out of the coastal plan and Massawa.

In February Eritrean forces, using fast speedboats, surprised the Ethiopian forces in the port of Massawa, and the city was captured.

The photograph above is captioned: “A EPLF rebel stands in front of a captured Soviet-made cannon used in the taking of the port of Massawa.

The Ethiopians retaliated by bombing the port.

Civilians in Massawa cowering beneath a culvert to escape the bombs.

The fate of Ethiopian forces was sealed. Eritrean crack units helped Ethiopian rebels of the Tigray People’s Liberation Front in their drive for Addis Ababa.

In May 1991 the Ethiopian dictator, Mengistu Haile Mariam fled to Zimbabwe and both Eritrea and Ethiopia were free. (Text ends)

January 21, 2013: Eritrea Military mutiny: Dissident soldiers take over the information ministry building briefly’ Dissident soldiers take over the information ministry building in Asmara for a short time in January 21. The mutineers demand the release of political prisoners.

The military mutiny in Eritrea was led by Colonel Saleh Osman’ VoA Analysis by Peter Heinlein: (January 23, 2013) - A day-long siege at Eritrea’s information ministry Monday ended in a stalemate, with disgruntled soldiers retreating to a strategic location outside the capital, Asmara. That the incident provides rare insight into the inner workings of one of the world’s most opaque societies. International observers are wondering what happened Monday after a group of soldiers drove to Eritrea’s information ministry and demanded that a statement be read out over state-run television. The statement asking for the release of political prisoners and for respect of the constitution was being read when the station suddenly went off the air. Nearly 12 hours later, the station resumed broadcasting with no mention of the cause of the disruption. The troops that had occupied the ministry simply climbed back into their armored personnel carriers and drove off. Information gathered from a variety of sources indicates the operation was led by Colonel Saleh Osman, a legendary figure of the Eritrea-Ethiopia war from 1998 to 2000. A usually authoritative opposition website reports that Colonel Osman and several dozen supporters retreated to the suburbs of Asmara, where they are in talks with President Isaias Afewerki’s government. Information is tightly controlled in Eritrea. The watchdog group Reporters Without Borders ranks the Red Sea nation last out of 179 countries in press freedom, below North Korea. Former Reporters Without Borders Africa director Leonard Vincent is the author of a book titled The Eritreans, and a close follower of the country.

In a telephone interview, Vincent said Monday's siege appears to have been a show of force, and not an attempt to seize power. "Yesterday's operation was not aimed at overthrowing by violence the government, but still its a standoff with the government," said Vincent. "Its an operation aimed at showing defiance toward them. So this shows the level of frustration in the army is very high." Vincent says the standoff at the information ministry suggests Colonel Osman has broad support within the military. "If this was an isolated operation led by a rebel colonel, this kind of move should have been met by violence and severe repression," he said. "This hasn't happened, so there might be negotiations going on, and this unit might not be so isolated as we thought yesterday." Vincent believes it is too early to tell whether the operation was successful. "We cannot say if it has succeeded or failed," said Vincent. "What we can say is a faction of the army is showing its strength and is talking with the government on the basis of what they are capable of doing in terms of taking control of parts of the country." Vincent says the dissidents' demand of freedom for political prisoners, particularly those jailed in a 2001 purge, has deep resonance among ordinary Eritreans. "Its the sine qua non [essential] condition for change in Eritrea," he said. "The situation of political prisoners is awful. Reformists and journalists who were jailed in 2001 have vanished. According to sketchy reports, they are detained in high security prison in the far northeast of the country, and the majority have died from disease or by suicide. This is a method the government uses against any dissent or criticism." Human rights groups have long criticized Eritrea's record of jailing government critics. The United Nations last year estimated there are as many as 10,000 political prisoners in a country of six million people.

February 19, 2013: Eritrean Refugees In Libya Are Being Used To Clear Landmines'

Human Rights Concern – Eritrea has received several disturbing reports from Libya concerning the abusive treatment of Eritrean refugees in that country: 1) 76 Eritrean refugees in Libya are being used to clear land mines in Sirte, the home town of the late Gaddafi. The refugees are forced all day to clear land mines. These are not trained professionals. This is not humanitarian de-mining. This is a callous, inhuman treatment of humans as if they were disposable pieces of equipment. It amounts to nothing less than murder. These refugees are not given access to UNHCR. It is inhuman that these refugees, who fled persecution in Eritrea, should suffer further harassment and risk being blown up while clearing the mines. The Libyans do not want to do it themselves, so they use refugees. This is barbaric and should be condemned. 2) Over 400 Eritrean refugees have been trafficked from Sudan to Libya and involuntarily held in Ajdabiya, near Benghazi. Over 120 refugees had paid a $1,700 ransom per person before their release; the remaining 400 are held inhumanly, and those who were released report that they were starving and subjected to inhuman and degrading treatment. This could not happen in such large numbers if the Libyan government took action against it, so it can only be assumed that they are complicit. 3) Eritrean refugees are also detained incommunicado and under harsh conditions at the following prisons: Salma prison (near Tripoli) – 81refugees, Al-Khums (near Tripoli) – no numbers available, Al-Kufra – Over 300 refugees, Sabha – around 1,200 refugees, Zuwara – no numbers available. It is very sad to see what the so-called revolutionaries in Libya are doing to the refugees from Africa. We had hoped that they would empathise with the situation in Eritrea, and the plight of Eritrean refugees, as they themselves have suffered at the hands of Gaddafi. Instead, the Eritrean refugees are detained like criminals under harsh conditions. The UNHCR office in Tripoli is not notified of the presence of those refugees in Libya. Why not? Libya is one of the signatories to the African Charter on Refugees and a member of the United Nations. And yet it flouts the most basic human rights requirements in its maltreatment of Eritreans.

April 8, 2013: Eritrean female pilot defects to Saudi Arabia'

News Article - ADDIS ABABA - A female Eritrean Air Force pilot has defected to Saudia Arabia where she is seeking political asylum in Saudi Arabia, in in a latest sign of embarrassment to the dictatorial regime in Asmara. Captain Rahwa Gebrekristos deserted to Saudi Arabia after being sent to the kingdom last week on assignment to retrieve a presidential jet that had been waiting for return following the defection of another two air force pilots last year. However, like her two former colleagues, Yonas Woldeab and his deputy Mekonnen Debesay, who secretly flew president Isaias Afewerki's plane to Saudi Arabia last October before defecting, Gebrekristos is also claiming asylum. Opposition sources allege that Eritrean authorities are secretly consulting with their Saudi counterparts to deport the 34-year-old pilot. She is currently being held at a police station in the western city of Jizan until Saudi authorities decide on her fate. An Eritrean opposition official told Sudan Tribune that if Gebrekristos is deported she could face torture or other inhuman treatments, as well as a long-term prison sentence or even the death penalty.

Under Eritrean law, military members who defect are considered traitors, a crime punishable by death. Nessredin Ahmed, the spokesperson for foreign affairs at the Red Sea Afar Democratic Organisation (RSADO), called on the international community to apply pressure on the Saudi government not to deport Gebrekristos, saying she is in need of protection. RSADO has also urged the Saudi government to fully respect its obligations under international laws on asylum seekers and avoid forcibly returning the Eritrean pilot to her homeland. The defection of the national air force pilot is another blow to the regime of the reclusive Red Sea nation, which is facing growing public discontent. Dozens of air force pilots and members have defected from the country in protest against ongoing political oppression and its unpopular military policies. The one-party state, which has been led by Afewerki since gaining independence in 1993, has among the world's worst records on human rights and press freedom. The country is Africa's foremost jailer of journalists and is also known by right groups as a "giant prison", with the tiny nation home to up to 10,000 political prisoners. (ST)

April 10, 2013: Eritrea accused of sending arms to CAR Seleka rebels'

Allegations have surfaced this week against the government of Eritrea regarding their role in the in arming the rebels in the Central African Republic who recently overthrew Francois Bozize. In an interview with ex-President Bozize recently ran in the media, the former CAR leader claimed that "the arms used by the Seleka rebels during their final assault on the presidential palace were purchased from Eritrea and transited through Chad with the permission of President Idris Deby" The Eritrean Ministry of Foreign Affairs this week issued a strong denial. The Ministry said "the author does not provide a shred of evidence for his outlandish statement," though it notes that the article cites "Le Journal de Brazza" which similarly claimed Eritrea had "a history of arming African rebel groups, including Somalia's Al-Shabaab". The Ministry statement said "Eritrea has neither the political will nor the material and logistical capabilities to sell/deliver arms to rebels in CAR and/or other African rebel groups". It stresses that Eritrea does not manufacture weapons or ammunition of any kind and has not been in any position to sell and transfer arms to CAR rebels or Chad with whom it does not share contiguous territory.

April 13, 2013: The Central African Republic (CAR) deposed president Francois Bozize claimed that Eritrea provided weapons to the Seleka rebel movement which toppled his government in March.

Eritrea denial of the charge: scared it will be slapped with another round of sanctions the rogue Eritrean regime franticaly denied the accusation this week. Through its Ministry of Foreign Affairs it said it has nothing to do with the overthrowing of the Central African Republic President. "Eritrea has neither the political will nor the material and logistical capabilities to sell/deliver arms to rebels in CAR and/or "other African rebel groups". In the first place, Eritrea does not manufacture weapons and/or ammunitions of any kind. Furthermore, Eritrea has remained under an unlawful arms embargo for the last three years. It would not thus be in a position, even hypothetically, to sell and transfer arms to CAR rebels or Chad with whom it does not share contiguous territory" said part of the press release on the regime's website. The notorious leaders of the Eritrean regime are known throughout the world for training and arming rebels and terrorists. Terrorists from Ethiopia, Sudan, Djibouti, Somalia, the Democratic Republic of Congo, Kenya, South Sudan and Uganda have been trained and armed by Eritrea.

You might ask why they do it. The answer is twofold, the first is for political reasons. By arming the terrorists and rebel groups in their neighbourhood they think they can weaken or influence them. The second reason is simple because they are under UN sanctions the Eritrean economy is falling apart, so they work for black market arms dealers and they get paid. We know Eritrea does not manufacture a needle let alone military weapons, but they are acting like a conduit for illegal arms dealers in the region. The Central African Republic is a landlocked nation in the center of Africa. It is rich in natural resources such as diamonds, gold and uranium, but it is also one of the world's poorest countries in the world. Last month rebel groups took control of the country and overthrew the Central African Republic president. Following the rebel group taking over the country there was days of violence and looting and destruction.

Updates: Eritrea caught red handed supplying weapons to Central Africa SELEKA rebels – what is new?

When there is mayhem and destruction in the Horn and East of Africa, you are certain to find trails of the Eritrean regime. The now former Central African Republic President François Bozizé, who was ousted from power on 24 March 2013 in a bloody coup d'état has accused Chad's President Idriss Deby, of helping the Seleka rebels to overthrow him. "We had strong brotherly relations with Chad, but we were surprised by their behavior. Only Chadian authorities can give us an explanation" President François Bozizé said. Le Journal de Brazza reported this week that the arms that were used by the Seleka rebels during the final assault on the presidential palace were supplied by Eritrea, and transported by Chad to the Seleka rebels in Central African Republic.

April 17, 2013: What's the Eritrean foreign minister grabs from Egypt's Mohammed Morsi this time?

President Mohammed Morsi held a meeting with Eritrean Presidential Advisor Yemane Guebreab and Foreign Minister Osman Saleh on means of promoting bilateral ties. The meeting tackled the file of Nile water along with discussing regional and international issues of mutual concern, said a statement released by the Presidency. Mr. Morsi praised the Eritrean stance that supports the Egyptian historic rights in Nile water. Morsi said he is looking forward to holding a meeting with Eritrean President Isaias Afewerki as soon as possible. Meanwhile, Foreign Minister Mohamed Kamel Amr received Eritrean Foreign Minister Osman Saleh and Eritrean Presidential Advisor Yemane Guebreab. Foreign Ministry Spokesman Amr Roshdi said that Eritrean Foreign Minister Osman Saleh conveyed a message to President Mohammed Morsi from Eritrean President Issaias Affewerki. Roshdi noted that the two sides took up means of boosting bilateral relations between Egypt and Eritrea as well as coordinating stances toward a host of international issues. He added that Amr stressed Egypt's keenness on promoting trade with Eritrea. Source: Daily News Egypt

May 9, 2013: Group: 10,000 dissidents detained in Eritrea'

ADDIS ABABA, ETHIOPIA — Eritrea's government has jailed about 10,000 dissidents without charge or trial over the years, a rights group said in report, describing the Horn of Africa nation as one of the world's most repressive states. The new report by Amnesty International (AI) said those held in detention include suspected critics of the government, politicians, journalists, and “anyone who refuses to comply with the repressive system.” In its statement, Eritea’s governmnet called the report “unsubstantiated” and a “political assault” on the country. Among those behind bars are 187 people detained since January, when a group of more than 100 soldiers stormed the Ministry of Information and demanded the release of all political prisoners. Some Western diplomats and observers said at the time that this event was an attempted coup against President Issaias Affewerki, who led the country to independence from Ethiopia in May 1991. He has been president since April 1993.

According to Amnesty International, Eritrea has since become “one of the most repressive, secretive and inaccessible countries in the world.”Increasingly isolated, Eritrea is under sanctions imposed by the African Union and the United Nations. In late 2011 the U.N. Security Council expanded an arms embargo against Affewerki’s regime. The country is accused of supporting al-Qaida-linked Islamist militants in Somalia. Neighboring Ethiopia has stepped up its criticism of the regime, which it sees as a negative force in the region. In March 2012 Ethiopian troops moved deep into Eritrean territories to destroy military camps that the government said the camps were used to train “subversive groups” that routinely attack Ethiopia. “There are calls by some corners to ease sanctions imposed on Eritrea. We reject this,” says Dina Mufti, a spokesperson for Ethiopia’s Ministry of Foreign Affairs.

The Qatar factor: mediating Ethiopia and Eritrea’
The Reporter ANALYSIS ADDIS ABABA (May 11, 2013)

Last month the International Crisis Group (ICG) presented a report on future scenarios for Eritrea, whose repressive government has shown recent signs of instability.

According to this report, the Ethiopian army incursions in 2012 revealed Eritrean capacity to defend itself is at its weakest since its independence in 1993. ICG said several defections - from ordinary citizens to elite pilots, and Information Minister Ali Abdu, a close ally of President Isaias Afewerki - and a mutiny by soldiers who took control of the Information Ministry, are just some of the incidents in one year alone that show how the regime in Asmara is becoming fragile. The report urged the international community to pay more attention to Eritrea, which has remained mobilized for war since a ceasefire ended its conflict with Ethiopia in 2000, and to plan to help avert internal chaos and wider regional conflict in the event of a further breakdown of order in Asmara.

However, Ethiopia, which remains in conflict with Asmara, does not seem interested in confronting the Eritrean government at this critical time where it is becoming evident that a regime change in Asmara is fast approaching either with a natural death of the 67 year old ailing President or in a more violent way such as acoup d’état. However, a change either way doesn't seem to provide a much neededsolution for the ongoing stalemate between the two countries as there is no clear succession plan at all and the possibility of more aggressive hardliner groups to emerge to power.

On Dec. 5, Prime Minister Hailemariam Desalegn told Qatar's Al Jazeera network that he is willing to negotiate with his counterpart, the Eritrean President Isaias Afewerki without any precondition, even if it takes him going to Asmara. Hailemariam also noted that his predecessor had made the same offer to the Eritrean regime several times to no avail. According to reports, President Isaias Afewerki asked Qatar to negotiate between the two arch rivals shortly after Hailemariam's statement. If true, this is a surprise because all previous requests made by Ethiopia for dialogue had been rejected by Asmara in protest at Ethiopia's refusal to implement the United Nations ruling that puts the flashpoint town of Badme in Eritrea. Notably, in April this year, a week after President Isaias Afewerki visited Qatar and held talks with Sheikh Hamed Bin Khalifa Al-Thani, Emir, the Emir paid a two-day official visit to Ethiopia. Although officially the visit was to boost bilateral relations, the issue of Ethiopia and Eritrea was unlikely to be ignored in such a high-level meeting, especially as Qatar is striving to become an internationally-recognized peacemaker.

Current developments between the two states stem from the causes and consequences of the 1998 to 2000 war. Before and even during the war, Eritrea was perceived to have gained the upper-hand on the diplomatic front. The rapid economic progress, its geo-political advantage, and signs of democratic transitions helped Eritrea to draw the international community's support. A good example of this is the arms ban imposed by the UN on both countries: while the world was aware that Eritrea had already purchased enough rifles before the war as it had already planned to attack Ethiopia, Ethiopia was not ready at all. However, after the war, Ethiopia started to become a regional power. The commendable economic success and poverty reduction it achieved in the last decade in addition with its excellent relations with the Western world were some of the great achievements of Ethiopia under the late Prime Minister Meles Zenawi. The case of Eritrea has been the opposite: it has become more repressive, isolated and is considered the rogue state of the region.

In 2008, Eritrea engaged in a conflict with Djibouti over the Ras Dumeira area. The aftermath of this conflict led to the UN Security Council Resolution 1907 (2009) on Eritrea. Further sanctions were imposed, following Eritrea's alleged involvement in support of Al-Qaeda linked Islamist militants, mainly Al-Shabaab and Hizbul Islam, working against the international community effort to bring lasting peace in Somalia. The US government also threatened to include Eritrea on the "state sponsors of terrorism" list in 2007. In addition to the above disputes, the actions of the Eritrean government have also isolated the country. Eritrea boycotted the African Union (AU) for more than a decade and only reinstated its ambassador to the AU in January 2011, fiercely protesting what it described as the AU's 'failure' to condemn Ethiopia for its alleged violations of a peace agreement that ended the 1998-2000 border war. Additionally, the regime withdrew its membership of Inter-Governmental Authority on Development, East Africa's primary regional body, after a rift with its arch-foe, Ethiopia, when a meeting on Somalia threatened to divide the region in 2007.

It seems clear that the withdrawal from important African regional organizations cost Eritrea dearly. In addition, the imposition of the UN Security Council sanctions on Eritrea, which included arms and travel sanctions for Eritrea's support of insurgents trying to topple the nascent government in Somalia, was a severe blow to Eritrea. It is significant too that for the first time since their establishment, the AU and IGAD called upon the United Nations to introduce sanctions against a member state. Due to the ill-conceived political strategies of the Asmara regime, the country's image has been tarnished. The behavior of Eritrea has prompted at least one observer and scholar to refer to Eritrea as the 'North Korea of Africa.'

The 2011 Arab Uprising that toppled a number of dictators across the Middle East and North Africa has also impacted Eritrea enormously. Before the revolution, President Isaias had three important friends even if his regime was isolated by most of the countries in the region and beyond. These countries were Libya, Egypt and Qatar. To win the race to become an influential figure in the region and the African Union with Ethiopia and the late Prime Minister Meles Zenawi, the former Libyan ruler, Muammar Gaddafi provided Eritrea all around support. Between the years 1998 and 2010, Libya had given hundreds of millions of dollars to Eritrea to help to improve its ailing economy.

Libya under Gaddafi had also showed its support to Eritrea in being the only security council member state to vote against the United NationsSecurity Council Resolution1907, adopted on December 23, 2009, which imposed an arms embargo on Eritrea, travel bans on its leaders, and froze the assets of some of the country's political and military officials after accusing the Eritrean government of aiding Al-Shabaab in Somalia and reportedly refusing to withdraw troops from its disputed border with Djibouti, following a conflict in 2008 even if the African Union, the IGAD and other organizations which Libya itself is a member of had been calling in favor of the resolution.

In return, Eritrea had been supporting Muammar Gaddafi in all the time and denouncing the revolution against him labeling it as a Western plot against the will of the Libyan people and this in the long run has also negatively affected its relation with the new Libyan government established after the downfall of Muammar Gaddafi. Egypt under Hosni Mubarak had also been supporting Eritrea for the mere reason of avoiding the perceived threat on the river Nile. Eritrea has also reiterated its support for the Egyptian claim of its rights over the river emanating mainly from the controversial 1929 and 1959 agreements, which Ethiopia regards as unacceptable on the grounds that the 1929 pact is colonial and the 1959 one is unilateral Egyptian and Sudanese ploy, which had been rejected by Ethiopia outright.

However, the new Egyptian administration seems more interested in negotiation and cooperation with Ethiopia than trying to threaten Ethiopia using Eritrea. The previous relationship between President Hosni and President Isaias also negatively affected the current Egypt-Eritrean relationship significantly as the latter reiteratedits support to the former even at the midst of the Egyptian revolution of 2011. The last friend Eritrea now has is therefore Qatar. Eritrea and Qatar have long standing relations since decades ago, since Eritrea attained its independence in 1993. However, Qatar-Ethiopia relations were not so good. On April 21st, 2008, Ethiopia announced it was severing ties with Qatar, accusing Qatar of supporting armed opposition groups within Ethiopia and others such as Islamist insurgents in Somalia. This also created a conducive environment to Eritrea to enjoy the friendship with Qatar, as the latter has been becoming one of the most influential countries in the region, especially in the last couple of years.

However, during the Arab uprising, their commendable relationship started to show fractures as Qatar was a main advocate of a regime change in Libya and the supporter of the rebel groups, Eritrea decided to remain loyal to Col. Gaddafi. For many analysts this was the first, perhaps also the most contentious issue that started to make a rift between the two countries. In addition to this, the ever-increasing influential role of Ethiopia in the region and the African Union also pushed Qatar to seek an amicable solution for the diplomatic row between the two states. The two countries have expressed their wish to conduct diplomatic relations and work together in regional issues with mutual consent and cooperation during the Qatari Emir visit to Addis Ababa on April 10th, 2013. In considering the above facts it is clear that Qatar has a big role in resolving the problem between the two countries once and for all. The Eritrean regime may make some retreats from its preconditions and push forward to settle its dispute with Ethiopia if Qatar insisted as it is now the only country in the world to have amicable relations with Asmara. Qatar can also influence Ethiopia as Ethiopia is very aware of the increasing role and influence of Qatar in regional and international affairs.

The normalization of relations with Ethiopia would definitely help Asmara in improving its relationship with important regional and international organizations in which Ethiopia's influence is seen as quite crucial, like IGAD and the AU. It will also give Eritrea the chance to exploit the big market inside Ethiopia. Peace with Eritrea would also bring some important benefits to Ethiopia, mainly in providing access to the well-established ports of Assab and Massawa. Due to the high cost of trade, Ethiopia has been looking for alternative port services to Djibouti. Peace between the two countries would also help to improve the security situation of the Horn of Africa and the Red Sea region. But most importantly, peace between the two countries would benefit the citizens who share the same culture, religion and identity. Other peace dividends would be redirecting military spending in both states towards critical areas such as health and education. Ed's Note: Abel Abate Demissie is a researcher and political analyst. The views expressed in this article do not necessarily reflect the views of The Reporter.

May 24, 2013: Eritreans mark 20 years of independence'
AFP: Criticism is high of Eritrea's human rights situation because of the absence of freedom of speech and the repression of religious minorities. Many Eritreans flee first across the dangerous border into Sudan, and end up either in refugee camps along the eastern border, or in the dusty capital Khartoum.

June 5 2013: UN Urges the World to Keep Eritrea Under Scrutiny' UNHCR – PR UN Rights Expert Urges the World to Keep Eritrea Under Scrutiny and Help People Fleeing the Country The United Nations Special Rapporteur on Eritrea, Sheila B. Keetharuth, today reiterated her call on the international community to keep monitoring the human rights situation in Eritrea and to protect and support those fleeing the country, in particular the increasing numbers of unaccompanied children. "I urge the international community to keep Eritrea under close scrutiny until meaningful change is evident," Ms. Keetharuth said during the presentation of her first report to the UN Human Rights Council. "It will be important to increase efforts to constructively engage with Eritrea and neighbouring countries to improve the situation of human rights in the country."

Despite repeated requests, the Special Rapporteur has not been granted access to Eritrea since her appointment in November 2012. As a result, her first official mission to the field was carried out from 30 April to 9 May 2013, when she conducted interviews at Eritrean refugee camps in neighbouring Ethiopia and Djibouti, which host large Eritrean refugee communities. "I concentrated on gathering information on human rights violations from a broad spectrum of interlocutors, but more specifically from survivors," Ms. Keetharuth said. "Most of the people I interviewed had left Eritrea recently and were able to share up-to-date information." "I am extremely concerned about the human rights situation in Eritrea," the independent expert stressed. "The prevailing situation in the country is characterised by extrajudicial killings, enforced disappearance and incommunicado detention, arbitrary arrest and detention, torture and inhumane prison conditions."

The Special Rapporteur noted with alarm the situation regarding mass round-ups, forced conscription and the indefinite national service, as well as the country-wide arming and military training of the civilian population, which started last year. "Excessive militarisation is affecting the very fabric of Eritrean society, and its core unit, the family. The indefinite national service is depriving the women and men of Eritrea of their most productive years," Ms. Keetharuth said. "Many of those I interviewed told me that their families would be unable to live in dignity without direct remittances from family and friends living abroad." "Severe curtailment of freedom of movement, opinion, expression, assembly, association and the right to freedom of religion warrant serious concern," she noted. "The restrictions of these rights, which are the very cornerstones of democratic societies, create a climate of fear fuelled by rumours, propaganda and suspicion. The result is an all-encompassing feeling of fear and distrust, even within families." In her report, the independent expert warns about the arbitrary use of power by the State, which violates the most fundamental principles of the rule of law, and a complete absence of accountability mechanisms to bring those responsible for the human rights violations to justice.

"The alarming human rights situation in Eritrea is triggering a constant stream of refugees to neighbouring countries," she said. "Although there is a shoot-to-kill policy targeting those attempting to flee, many thousands of Eritrean citizens have fled over the past decade. The numbers are on the rise, with more than 4,000 Eritreans fleeing the country every month, despite the extreme dangers along escape routes and an unknown future." "During my visit to refugee camps in Ethiopia, I met a large number of unaccompanied children crossing the border, some as young as seven or eight years old. Many leave home without the knowledge of their families, mostly as they fear the forced conscription into indefinite national service," Ms. Keetharuth said. "The increasing number of these unaccompanied minors not only poses major protection challenges but is indicative of the scale of despair these children are facing at home," the human rights expert warned. Ms. Keetharuth acknowledged Eritrea's active participation in the universal periodic review in 2009/10, noting that the Government has reportedly initiated a follow-up process. "Eritrea's second universal periodic review in January 2014 will provide another opportunity to engage on the human rights situation with the HRC and it will be interesting to see which concrete steps Eritrea has taken to honour its commitments under the UPR, she said. "I would welcome the opportunity to engage in a frank and open dialogue with the Government of Eritrea to discuss these recommendations, as well as a range of issues and challenges linked to the full realization of human rights in Eritrea," the Special Rapporteur reiterated. Sheila B. Keetharuth was appointed as the Special Rapporteur on the human rights situation in Eritrea during the 21st Session of the UN Human Rights Council in September 2012. She took her functions on 1 November 2012. As Special Rapporteur, she is independent from any government or organization and serves in her individual capacity. A lawyer from Mauritius, she has extensive experience in monitoring and documenting human rights violations, advocacy, training and litigation in human rights in Africa.

July 27, 2013: Ethiopia Offers Electricity in Exchange for Dialogue:

Minister Osman Saleh’

TN: Eritrea's Foreign Minister, Osman Saleh disclosed that his country politely declined. Ethiopia's latest ploy to seduce Eritrea into negotiation with a 250MW free electric power offer. In a seminar he conducted last week at the annual festival of Eritrean community members in London, Minister Saleh explained that Ethiopia tried very hard to sell the proposal through Russia, Qatar and Turkey. Minister Osman, however, clarified that Eritrea's one and only one condition to enter into dialogue or normalize relation is for Ethiopia willingly vacate its troops out of sovereign Eritrean territory including the town of Badme.

As President Affewerki made it clear through its envoy at the African Union on the January 28th AU summit, normalization of relation can start in the afternoon as long as Ethiopia withdrew from Eritrean territories including Badme in the morning hours. Minister Saleh further underlined that the problem with Ethiopia has nothing to do with the issue of "political will" or "dialogue" and cannot be characterized as a deadlock as the border dispute between the two countries has been resolved through Final and Binding arbitration ten years ago. What is left now is to see the end of Ethiopia's occupation of sovereign Eritrean territories as it cannot be justified legally or politically. The minister finally concludes that the various ploys played by Ethiopia and its handlers to frustrate Eritrea into submission with sanctions and threats of sanctions has been futile in the past and won't do so in the future.

August 21, 2013: Eritrea's unique colonial architectures under threat' (AFP): By Jenny Vaughan: Eritrea's capital Asmara boasts buildings unlike anywhere else in Africa, a legacy of its Italian colonial past, when architects were given free rein for structures judged too avant-garde back home. Modernist architectural wonders in this highland city include a futurist petrol station mimicking a soaring aircraft and a funky art-deco bowling alley with checkered, coloured glass windows. "The city is a living museum of architecture," said Medhanie Teklemariam, an urban planner in Asmara's city administration. Yet while many of the buildings survived a decades-long liberation war from Ethiopia that ravaged settlements elsewhere, preservation and restoration projects have been hampered, threatening to erode the country's rich cultural heritage. Medhanie said money remains a critical obstacle, along with a lack of local technical expertise required for specialised restoration projects.

"To undertake a major restoration of all these buildings is very, very challenging because of one, the funding issue and, second, technical capacity," he said, sitting before a map of central Asmara. But Medhanie is pushing for change. He is lobbying for the historic city centre to be included on the United Nations World Heritage list and working to renew a European Union-supported project to restore a market building and the Capitol, an Expressionist-style cinema. He sees the preservation of Asmara's precious buildings—mainly from the first half of the 20th century—as a matter of maintaining the country's national fabric. "This heritage... it is very important for Eritrea's identity," he said.

World Heritage status would also be a rare opportunity for Eritrea to win positive international exposure. The Horn of Africa nation normally makes headlines only for its raft of repressive policies. “The international reputation... would be boosted,” said Edward Denison, a photographer and co-author of “Asmara: Africa’s Secret Modernist City”. Most of the buildings in the former Italian colony were constructed between 1936 and 1941 as part of Fascist dictator Benito Mussolini’s plan to expand his foothold in Africa. Asmara used to be known as Piccola Roma, or “Little Rome”. In the 1939 census, more than half the city’s inhabitants were Italian -- 53,000 out of a total of 98,000. Italian architects were brought over and encouraged to experiment with innovative designs that were frowned upon in conservative Europe.

Asmara gained a reputation as an “experimental playground” where wacky designs were welcomed. Today, Eritreans have a deep appreciation for the buildings—even though many were built by compatriots carrying out forced labour under colonial rule—and are proud of their unique city. While some buildings sit unused, such as the Teatro Asmara, with its high arched awnings and Roman-style pillars, many of them remain functional. Tables are busy at Cinema Roma, as regulars sip macchiatos on the terrace beneath the marble facade. Inside, dated American movies and Eritrean shows are screened to visitors who watch from plush red seats.

According to Denison, the buildings could be a major boost for the sagging tourist industry. “The opportunities are boundless, and Eritrea is very aware of that with the various other cultural and natural attractions that it has. I think architecture is a key component of that,” he said. Luckily, the city’s slow development has preserved many of its old buildings, most of which have been left untouched since Eritrea’s war for independence kicked off in 1961. Dennis Rodwell, architect and author of “Conservation and Sustainability in Historic Cities”, describes Asmara as a “time warp”. But preservation efforts have been held back in part by Eritrea’s staunch principle of self-reliance. Rodwell said that outside support is sometimes seen as “a threat rather than an opportunity”.

The $5-million (3.75-million-euro) World Bank-funded Cultural Assets Rehabilitation Project ended in 2007 as funding dried up and relations between the World Bank and Eritrea soured. EU funding earmarked for architectural restoration projects remains frozen for review. Denison, the photographer, agrees that preservation efforts could be improved through greater collaboration with outsiders, but notes Eritrea’s rebel-turned-politician leaders have long struggled to balance “self-reliance and collaboration internationally”. Yet despite stalled progress in recent years, he says he is hopeful that Eritrea’s rich architectural heritage can be preserved.

September 3, 2013: Deutsche Welle - 1,500 Eritreans flee their country every month’

(DW) Kahassay Woldesselasie simply wanted to get away from Eritrea. He planned to begin a new life in a country where citizens are not as brutally suppressed as in his East African homeland. Eritrea, located in the Horn of Africa, is one of the world's most secretive and repressive regimes. Woldesselasie initially fled to neighboring Sudan. While there he heard rumors of good jobs being offered in Israel. A human trafficking syndicate offered to take him there. Woldesselasie agreed and fell into their trap. The traffickers abducted him and took him as a hostage to the Egyptian Sinai Peninsula. On the journey they blindfolded him, there was little food and water. The gangsters threatened to kill him if he did not pay ransom. "You have no choice but to call your relatives," Woldesselasie told DW in an interview. "If they agree to pay, you might be lucky. But if they don't, you're dead."

The lucky and the unlucky: Woldesselasie was one of the lucky ones. Family members living abroad agreed to pay for his release. He was set free and finally managed to cross the border into Israel. Not many are as lucky as Woldesselasie, says Hamdy al-Azazy, an Egyptian human rights activist who lives in al-Arish, the capital of the North Sinai region. He has met Eritrean refugees who had been held captive for weeks in torture camps. While their families are listening over the phone, the victims would be subjected to burnings or have their limbs broken. Such painful experiences would then push even the poorest of families to send money. Those who don't comply risk having their relatives being buried in the desert. According to al-Azazy, more than 500 remains of dead bodies of Africans were discovered in the desert in the past years.

The Sinai equation: The Sinai Peninsula has long been a powder keg. The indigenous population consists of Bedouin Arab tribes who settled there several hundred years ago. Today, they only represent about half of the approximately 500,000 inhabitants. Israel withdrew from the area back in 1982 and left it to the Egyptian state. Egypt then took the best land from the Bedouins, says Günter Meyer, director of the Center for Research on the Arab World at the University of Mainz. "This goes back to a long period of discrimination against the Bedouin population." According to Meyer, the Bedouins were seen by Egyptians as Israeli collaborators, drug smugglers and illiterate." Meyer however emphasizes that only a small minority of the Bedouin is involved in the criminal gangs that deal in human trafficking. Following the Arab Spring which began in 2011, security forces have been weakened in the Sinai Peninsula giving the traffickers more leeway. The situation has "escalated dramatically," Meyer warns. There are no known figures for the number of refugees detained in torture camps in the Sinai or how many of those hostages have perished. According to the Israeli government, more than 10,000 illegal immigrants crossed the Sinai border into Israel in 2012. Most of them came from Eritrea and Sudan. But in Israel, a nation once founded by immigrants, the refugees are not welcome. They have little chance of obtaining political asylum. Instead Israel has built a more than 200-kilometer - long (124 miles) fence against them. In the first five months of 2013, only 33 refugees managed to cross the border.

Little international support: The world, including the United Nations Refugee Agency (UNHCR), has turned a deaf ear to the plight of these refugees, says human rights activist Hamdy al-Azazy. “They write their reports from their air-conditioned offices in Cairo,” he laments. “Nobody is on site to assess the real situation. I’m the only one here in the midst of all these dangers.” There have been several attacks on him, he adds. His office was ransacked, his children have been attacked. Al-Azazy also raises serious allegations against the Egyptian security forces. According to him victims who manage to escape from the hands of the traffickers are detained as criminals because they are in the country illegally. But the perpetrators of human trafficking enjoy a life of luxury in large villas. He believes the traffickers are supported by Egypt’s security agencies. “Traffickers pay a lot of bribes so that they can freely bring refugees to the Sinai.” Kahassay Woldesselasie does not feel at home in Israel. He hopes that one day peace and freedom will reign in his East African nation so he can return.

September 19, 2013: Eritrea - Scenarios for Future Transition’

Prepared by: International Crisis Group (ICG Africa Report N°200)

(ICG) Growing popular dissatisfaction and widening social divisions continue to destabilize the government of Eritrean President Issaias Affewerki. Today, our partners at the ICG map out six different scenarios for a post-Affewerki era. Making the transition to any of them, however, is going to be bumpy. Events in the last twelve months indicate growing discontent inside Eritrea’s tightly controlled regime, as well as deepening political and social divisions. While the mounting number of incidents suggests that President Isaias Affewerki’s regime is vulnerable, with increasing concerns over its ability to stay in power, the country would face numerous institutional, socio-economic and geopolitical obstacles during and after any transition. A careful assessment of these, as well as the role neighbours and the wider international community could play, is urgently needed to help avoid a violent power struggle that could prove dangerous for the Horn of Africa and potentially – as Eritrea is a littoral state – for the Red Sea region.

Issaias’s disappearance from public view for several weeks in April 2012 amid rumours of his illness and death made evident the lack of a succession plan. In March and May 2012, the Ethiopian army made incursions, revealing the Eritrean military’s disastrous state. Subsequently, a number of defections reached media attention: pilots flying the presidential plane absconded in October, the information minister (a close ally of the president) vanished in November, and the national football team requested asylum in December. Meanwhile several thousand – predominantly young – Eritreans fled every month, preferring the danger and uncertainty of refugee camps and illegal migration routes to the hopeless stasis at home. Then, on 21 January 2013, approximately 100 soldiers rebelled in the capital, Asmara, taking control of the information ministry for a day. It is difficult to predict what an eventually post-Isaias Eritrea will look like: after and in spite of 21 years of forceful nation-building, fault lines, especially of ethnicity, region and religion (Christians versus Muslims) are still there, some deeper than before. Since the state lacks any institutional mechanisms for peaceful transition of power or even a clearly anointed successor, instability is to be expected, with the corrupt army the likely arbiter of who will rule next. But even the generals appear split over loyalty toward the president.

To reduce the risk of instability in Eritrea and its neighbourhood, a broad coalition of international actors should take precautionary moves, including immediate and decisive efforts to promote dialogue on avoidance of internal power struggles and mediation of a peaceful transition. This could lead to opening of political space and normalisation, both domestically and internationally. Any opportunity should be seized to bring Asmara in from the cold. UN-imposed sanctions (imposed for support of Al-Shabaab in Somalia and other destabilising activities) should be kept under active review. The European Union (EU) and U.S. should work with others, such as Qatar and South Africa, that have better relations with Eritrea's ruling elite and could facilitate constructive engagement. Member states of the regional Intergovernmental Authority on Development (IGAD) should welcome Eritrea back and encourage normalisation of relations. If, as many believe, formal diplomacy remains blocked, Ethiopia, Sudan and Djibouti should engage with exiled opposition parties (including armed ethnic fronts) to encourage proactive engagement with dissidents in Asmara, promote dialogue and agreement by them not to use force that could lead to a protracted conflict and have repercussions for the entire region. This report examines the regime's vulnerabilities, maps out six possible scenarios for a post-Issaias Eritrea and identifies the main risks and opportunities the country and the region would face. Concerned Western partners, neighbours and governments with special relations with Asmara could play a vital role in preventing a major humanitarian crisis or even the state's collapse.

September 30, 2013: Dozens of Eritrean army mutineers were killed, says deserter'

(Sudan Tribune) SHIRE, ETHIOPIA – An Eritrean soldier who recently fled to Ethiopia has alleged that many of the dissident soldiers who in January laid siege at the ministry of information building in the capital Asmara have been killed. Over 100 Eritrean dissident soldiers on January 21, 2013 stormed and took control of the ministry of information in Asmara and called for political reform and a return to the country's 1997 constitution. The day-long mutiny ended after Special Forces loyal to President Isaias Afeworki surrounded the building and the mutineers agreed to release hostages and to peacefully return to their base. The Eritrean army deserter who refused to be named for fear of reprisal against his relatives back in Asmera, said most of the mutineers were arrested days after their failed mutineer.

According to the former Eritrean soldier, Special Forces took many of the dissident soldiers from their base and detained them in a secret detention facility where they were subjected to torture and inhuman treatment. “To my knowledge 26 of the mutineers were brutally murdered by secret agents”, he told Sudan Tribune. As to the fate of the others he said “I don’t know what happened to the others but I am sure their fate won’t be different”. He said he fled to Ethiopia after a military official warned him that his life was in danger after he was accused of disobeying military orders. President Isaias Afworki who has ruled Eritrea since independence from Ethiopia in 1993 has zero-tolerance for dissent and criticism. The red sea nation has no legally functioning opposition political party and has since independence been a one-party state. The army deserted said dissatisfaction within the Eritrean military has increased. January’s mutiny was seen as the latest challenge to the Eritrean president and an indicator of growing discontent in the military. It is estimated that Eritrea has up to 10,000 political prisoners.

October 2, 2013: Lampedusa Shipwreck tragedy – Over 300 mainly from Eritrea died so far’

STORY HIGHLIGHTS

Firsthand accounts are helping build a picture of why the boat capsized
Lampedusa is a common destination for African refugees
There’s been criticism more was not done to help
Survivor: “My mind is scarred”

Lampedusa, Italy (CNN) – At the port in Lampedusa, recovery teams continue to fill trucks with the bodies they’re still pulling from the sea.

More than 190 so far — and climbing.

They are among 500 African immigrants believed to be aboard a boat that sank off the island Thursday in Italy’s deadliest migrant shipwreck.

The survivors — 155 of them, mainly from Eritrea — wait in a cramped migrant detention center.
It was built to hold 250 people but houses more than 1,200.
They’re too distraight, too shocked to talk.
Germani Negassi, 30, told CNN he’ll never forget what he saw.
“For five hours we were floating, using the dead bodies of our companions,” he said.

“There is nothing worse than this. There were many children. There was a mother with her four children, a mother with an infant, all lost at sea. My mind is scarred and in a terrible condition.”

Dozens dead in Italian boat accident

The traumatic first hand accounts are helping build a picture of why the boat ended up on the seabed of the Mediterranean with most of its passengers entombed below deck.

13 days at sea: The vessel was packed with hundreds of African migrants.

Because of its location as the closest Italian island to Africa, Lampedusa is a common destination for African refugees seeking to enter European Union countries, and shipwrecks off its shores are common.

Survivors described spending 13 days on the boat before the engine stopped less than a mile from the small Mediterranean island, halfway between Sicily and Tunisia.

There's been criticism more was not done to help, that the Italian Coast guard was too slow to respond, that they spent precious time filming footage of the rescue instead of saving more lives.

Hamid Mohammad, 18, swears an Italian vessel spotted them in trouble off the coast, but did nothing. "The Italian's boat started circling around us. They circled our boat twice, then just went away," he said. "That's when people started to panic."

Fire on board: The boat's captain told the passengers to set fire to clothes and blankets to attract attention. "He gathered some clothes and bed sheets and lit them. But his container of benzene exploded," Mohammad said.

The fire then spread and when many of the migrants crowded to one side, the boat capsized, said Italian lawmaker Mario Marazziti, citing survivors' accounts. "People were screaming as the boat capsized," Mohammed said.

The lucky few: In response to criticism, the coast guard Saturday defended its response time and said its crews were on site 20 minutes after receiving the SOS call. "The moment we got the emergency call from the fishermen at 7 a.m. we immediately intervened and started coordinating the rescue operations," said coast guard spokesman Filippo Marini

Abrahalle Amare, 23, was one of the lucky few who were eventually rescued. "We left our country because of hardship, so that we could live in peace and help our families," said Abrahalli Amare, 23. "But we have found this bitter sadness. It was so unexpected, so disturbing. And now we can't think of anything else,"

ERITREA - Sea Tragedy Strikes Eritrean Refugees off Italian coast of Lampedusa'

(Updates) At least 94 dead over 250 missing in migrant shipwreck' Corriere Della Siera: Men found dead on the shore of Sicily near the town of Scicli. Another 70 migrants from Eritrea have been apprehended by police. Two people arrested on suspicion of people-smuggling after packed boat ran aground. The bodies of 13 immigrants have washed up on the coast of Sicily after a boat carrying 200 people ran aground as it approached the shore. When the boat ran into difficulties in rough seas near the coastal town of Scicli this morning, the migrants it was carrying jumped into the sea. Most made it to shore and ran away, but a number of men were unable to swim strongly enough and drowned. One of the alleged smugglers is said to have lashed out at a swimmer who tried to rescue him from the water. As well as the 13 men who drowned, a number of other immigrants had to be rescued, and several - including a pregnant woman - were taken to hospital for treatment. One immigrant who tried to escape after reaching the shore was hit by a car on a nearby road and suffered serious injuries. In addition, 20 children are among the 70 migrants apprehended so far, most of whom came from Eritrea in East Africa, according to Corriere Della Sera. The nationality of the 13 victims, whose bodies were laid out on the shore, is not yet known.

October 3, 2013: Substantial risks for African migrants'

BBC News Africa commentary: (updates) Eritrea is one of Africa's most repressive and isolated countries. Plenty of people want to leave it. Nearby Somalia - still struggling to recover from 20 years of anarchy - has a similar problem. But without the necessary paperwork, the only way for migrants to get to Europe is to put themselves in the hands of criminal gangs. There are many different smuggling routes. Some go across the Red Sea to Yemen or up into Egypt. Wealthier migrants can try their luck by plane.

But another route leads through Sudan, across the Sahara by truck to Libya's long Mediterranean coast, and then a final boat trip to the nearest outpost of Europe - an island like Lampedusa. For the migrants the process is expensive and fraught with danger at each stage. But every year tens of thousands of people try to leave the Horn of Africa - looking for work, for medical treatment, to avoid national service, to join relatives, or simply for safety.

Across the continent, far more people are on the move. Africa may be seeing sustained economic growth - at more impressive levels than much of Europe - but as a new report showed this week - few of the profits appear to be trickling down to the poorest. Most migrants remain within Africa, travelling long distances from regions like the Sahel, for instance, in search of jobs. But the Canary Islands, Spain, Italy and Yemen are all popular destinations for those prepared to chance a sea crossing. Bad weather, bad boats, Red Sea sharks and ruthless smugglers who've been paid in advance - all present substantial risks.

October 4, 2013: ERITREA: African North Korea which thousands will risk anything to escape' Daily Telegraph commentary: - Every year, many thousands of Eritreans go to extraordinary lengths to escape their country and start new lives elsewhere. This small nation in the Horn of Africa, with less than 6 million people, is one of the world's biggest providers of desperate refugees. There is no civil war in Eritrea: its people flee because their isolated homeland could pass as an African version of North Korea. Like the Kim regime in Pyongyang, President Isaias Afewerki keeps Eritrea on a permanent war-footing. Most adults are conscripted into the army or forced to perform compulsory labour of some kind. Today, one Eritrean in every 20 serves in a bloated army with 320,000 soldiers. Mr Isaias justifies this eternal mass mobilisation by claiming that neighbouring Ethiopia is scheming to re-conquer Eritrea. Just as the fictional state of "Oceania" was always at war in George Orwell's "1984", so Mr Isaias presents his repression as essential to guarantee the survival of the nation against outside enemies. That message has some resonance because of Eritrea's traumatic history. The country broke away from Ethiopia in 1993 after waging a brutal 30-year struggle for independence. The two neighbours have remained bitter rivals ever since, fighting a border war between 1998 and 2000 that claimed perhaps 70,000 lives.

Today, the armies of Ethiopia and Eritrea still confront one another across a closed and fortified frontier. Mr Isaias, who led Eritrea to independence, thunders that Ethiopia continues to occupy a few patches of the sacred national territory. He has duly turned his country into a vast armed camp, frozen into a state of permanent antagonism with Ethiopia and much of the rest of the world. Many Eritreans will do almost anything to leave. There are three principal routes by which they try to escape – and all are exceptionally dangerous. Some make contact with people smugglers and pay for passage across the Red Sea to Yemen, from where they try to slip into Saudi Arabia and reach the wealthy kingdoms of the Gulf. Others head westwards, over the border into Sudan and then north across the Sahara into Egypt. Here, they have two options, both fraught with peril. Some turn east and try to cross the Sinai Peninsula with the aim of reaching Israel. Along the way, they run the risk of being kidnapped by Bedouin gunmen, who often try to extract ransoms by torturing their captives. Others turn west and head over the frontier into Libya, from where they board overloaded boats of the kind that sank on Thursday. If they remain afloat, these vessels carry their huddled passengers across the Mediterranean to Sicily, the Italian mainland – or, more frequently, the island of Lampedusa where migrants are then detained. The fact that so many thousands are willing to take these risks shows just how desperate they must be to escape from Eritrea, a supposedly peaceful country that resembles an African Sparta.

October 5, 2013: Eritrean survivor says 500 people were on sank boat'

LAMPEDUSA, Italian island: (updates) An Eritrean man who was rescued on Friday said there were over 480 people at sea, making noises for rescue. "Please go help them," said the Eritrean, after he was pulled out of the sea by the coast guard. Speaking in English, the Eritrean broke into tears, and said "480 people are going to die." The Eritrean refugees started the journey from Libya until their boat sank only about 1 km off the coast of the Italian island of Lampedusa. The island was officially mourning over the deaths of children and women, not to mention the hundreds that have become unaccounted for.

October 5, 2013: Migrants used empty water bottles to stay afloat'

LAMPEDUSA, Italy (AP): (updates) Survivors of a fiery shipwreck that killed more than 110 African migrants clung for hours to empty water bottles in the dark, trying desperately to keep themselves from drowning in the sea, an Italian fisherman said Friday. Lampedusa resident Vito Fiorino said he was the first to come across dozens of migrants scattered in the Mediterranean Sea while he was on an early morning fishing expedition. At first he thought their weak cries were that of seagulls. Then he saw what terrible shape they were in, coated with gasoline from the smugglers' boat, barely clothed or wearing rags. Some didn't have the strength to grab the lifesaving ring thrown to them. Once on board, they told him they had been fighting to stay alive for three hours. "It was a scene from a film, something you hope never to see in life," he told The Associated Press.

October 5, 2013: Why people flee Eritrea?

BBC commentary: (updates) The latest tragedy in the Mediterranean has, not before time, human rights groups say, put the spotlight on the situations which drive people to make the perilous boat journey to Europe, and the many dangers they face along the way. It is believed most of the dead came from Eritrea and Somalia, so all must have taken not only the risky sea crossing, but a long and hazardous journey across the Sahara desert as well. "I still can't believe it when I think about the Sahara," said Samson Kidane, an Eritrean who is now a refugee in Switzerland. "It was so difficult to cross. We were more than 30 people in a small automobile, and later we were in a container, more than 120 people for 24 hours."

Asylum trek: Mr Kidane, like many young Eritreans, fled his country's forced, indefinite military conscription, a system which requires all citizens to serve in the army for an unlimited amount of time. Human rights groups have condemned the practice as akin to slavery, claiming that a lack of freedom of press and expression, and widespread arbitrary detention and torture, mean that the only real way to avoid conscription is to flee the country.

Continue reading the main story "Start Quote Its a tragedy that people can't apply for asylum in embassies anymore" Daniela Enzler Asylum adviser. Until June of this year, Switzerland accepted avoidance of Eritrea's military service as a valid reason for claiming asylum, and the country now has one of Europe's biggest communities of Eritrean refugees. But Switzerland, like many European countries, no longer allows applications for asylum to be made at its embassies abroad, meaning that anyone wanting to make a claim must make their way, somehow, to Switzerland. Human rights groups suggest Europe's asylum policies are a contributory factor to the regular boat tragedies in the Mediterranean. Daniela Enzler, an asylum adviser with Amnesty International and the Swiss charity Caritas, said she was not surprised by this week's loss of life. "Almost every week boats sink in the Mediterranean," she said. "Its a tragedy that people can't apply for asylum in embassies anymore. If they could, they would not have to risk this journey… Lives could be saved."

Two out of five: When Mr Kidane was finally granted refugee status by the Swiss, it was the end of a journey which could easily have cost him his life. After crossing the Sahara, which cost each man more than $1,000

(£621; 735 euros), he and his friends had to find what he calls a "businessman" to get them across the Mediterranean. "If you pay the money for the journey, the businessman sometimes disappears with the money," he said. In the end his trafficker took another $1,200 from each member of the group, and organised five small boats, each carrying around 30 people.

After 53 hours at sea, Mr Kidane arrived in Italy. But only two boats arrived. Three had sunk, one of them carrying his best friend. Both human rights groups like Amnesty International and the UN refugee agency have expressed concern that national coastguards and Europe's joint border patrol Frontex are more interested in pushing migrants and asylum seekers back than they are in rescuing those in distress. "Nearly every asylum seeker I have met who made the Mediterranean crossing told me they had seen boats pass by, even helicopters flying overhead," said Daniela Enzler, "but distress calls were ignored." That allegation is borne out by the experience of Bemnet Aron, who fled Eritrea aged just 17. An exhausting journey across the Sahara was followed by three months working in Libya, while he tried to earn the money for the sea crossing. Eventually he got a place in a boat, with around 80 other people. "The boat was overloaded, too heavy," he remembered, "and after three days we ran out of fuel." As time went on food and then water ran out too. "We started to drink our own urine," he said, "but some people couldn't bring themselves to do that." One by one, people began to die. "We saw other boats going by, one very close, and we all jumped up and waved and shouted, but it just kept on going." Mr Aron drifted in the Mediterranean for days. When he and his colleagues were finally rescued, just five were left alive - 75 had died, of thirst, hunger, and exposure. Now 21, he is also a refugee in Switzerland, but his traumatic experiences continue to affect his ability to lead a normal life.

Election issue: The UN's High Commissioner for Refugees, Antonio Guterres, has said he hopes the latest tragedy in the Mediterranean will serve as a "wake-up call". "There is something fundamentally wrong in a world where people in need of protection have to resort to these perilous journeys," he said. And the refugee agency's Director of Protection, Volker Turk, believes Europe must now engage in a political debate and find solutions to prevent further deaths. "What happened should go high up on the political agenda of governments, not just in the Mediterranean, but in all parts of the world where lives are lost every day in the most cruel circumstances because people flee out of despair, and try to cross the sea in rickety boats," he said. But with unemployment high in many countries, and opinion polls consistently suggesting that immigration and asylum worry voters, Europe is unlikely to relax its polices. And as conflict, poverty and repression continue to affect parts of Africa and the Middle East, people like Mr Kidane and Mr Aron will go on risking their lives in the hope of a better future.

October 6, 2013: Italy migrant death toll reaches 181'

LAMPEDUSA, Italy (AP) – (updates): An Italian government minister born in Africa watched wordlessly Sunday as soldiers wearing face masks carried body bags containing migrants from her continent who perished when a fishing boat transporting 500 asylum seekers from Eritrea sank within sight of the tiny island of Lampedusa. Divers recovered 70 more bodies after seas calmed enough to resume search operations after a two-day suspension, increasing the death toll to at least 181. More than 150 others are presumed to be missing, trapped in the wreckage about 50 meters (165 feet) below the surface. Search operations will continue "as long as the sea is calm and there is light," police Maj. Leonardo Ricci said. Italy has been receiving signs of solidarity from its European partners. European Commission President Jose Manuel Barroso plans to visit the island Wednesday. French Foreign Minister Laurent Fabius said Europe must act to stem the migrant tragedy, adding that both France and Italy have asked that the subject be placed on the agenda of Tuesday's EU interior ministers' meeting. "The Mediterranean cannot remain a huge cemetery under the open skies," Fabius said on French TV station iTele. Congolese-born integration minister Cecile Kyenge watched with the island's mayor as the bodies were lifted from boats on to trucks to be brought to a makeshift morgue at the airport. "There are no words in front of the dead," Kyenge told reporters later. "They are difficult moments that make us face our responsibilities." She said it was time for reflection "to prevent new tragedies."

"We cannot deal with this tragedy alone, but together with Europe. We must give answers to those who flee, need protection, and come here for help," Kyenge said. Earlier, Kyenge visited the survivors at a refugee center in Lampedusa, where she called conditions "shameful." Most of the 155 survivors remain at the island's overcrowded center, many sleeping in the open. Two have been transferred to hospitals in Sicily. The migrants, mostly from Eritrea, were aboard the 20-meter (65-foot) fishing boat that sank early Thursday after passengers panicked by flames set to draw the attention bolted to one side of the boat, capsizing it. Hundreds were flung into the sea, many who could not swim, while many were trapped in the hull. Survivors told rescuers they were in the sea for three hours; many clung to empty water bottles to stay afloat and some were too weak to grab lifesavers thrown to them. Lampedusa, Italy's southernmost point and just 70 miles (113 kilometers) from Tunisia, is a frequent destination for migrants trying to reach a safe haven from misery and strife in Africa and the Middle East. Tens of thousands arrive there each year seeking refugee status in Europe. Survivors of Thursday's tragedy have told authorities that a boat with lights had circled them but did not communicate or offer assistance. A Dutch lawmaker has called for an investigation into reports that a boat did not help the stranded migrants. There is no evidence that people on that boat knew that the fishing vessel was in distress.

They bade farewell Saturday to the 111 deceased fellow travelers who were recovered from the sea on Thursday. Their coffins stood in three long lines in the makeshift morgue at the island's airport, each with a single rose except for four caskets for children topped with a teddy bear. Laura Boldrini, the speaker of Italy's lower house who attended the ceremony along with a parliamentary delegation, said the survivors showed great dignity in their farewells, and accepted even that the coffins were nameless. "When the asylum-seekers started to arrive, they started crying, all together, like a song," Boldrini, who used to be the U.N. Refugee Agency's longtime spokeswoman for Italy, told The Associated Press by phone. "There were 150 people all together, crying, but in a very dignified way, and without asking anything of the authorities, not even to know who was in the coffins. It was such a lesson." Fabius, the French foreign minister, said Europe must boost development aid to countries from where migrants depart and maritime borders must be better controlled, including by EU agency Frontex, in charge of border management. He also said traffickers must be severely sanctioned, adding: "Those people make their fortunes from deaths."

October 6, 2013:National Embarassement: Coffins of the deads lined up at Italian airport hangar' LAMPEDUSA, Italy (AP) - The coffins of African migrants killed in a shipwreck off the Italian island of Lampedusa were lined up in long rows inside an airport hangar where survivors of the tragedy paid their respects Saturday. All of the caskets had a single rose on top except for the four of the youngest victims, which had stuffed animals. The 111 coffins were numbered - a teddy bear wearing a smile and a blue shirt with a heart was placed above casket No. 92. The ceremony took place hours after Italian fishermen threw a bouquet of yellow flowers near the exact spot where the migrant boat sank, honking their foghorns in tribute to the dead and up to 250 migrants who may still be missing. The search to recover more bodies, meanwhile, was called off for a second day because of choppy waters and strong currents. A parliamentary delegation visited the survivors amid reports that a boat may have violated the "law of the sea" by failing to help the migrant ship packed with 500 migrants, nearly all from Eritrea, about 600 meters (650 yards) from shore. "To come to rescue is a duty. Not to come to rescue is a crime," Laura Boldrini, the Italian house speaker who previously and for many years was the U.N. Refugee Agency spokeswoman in Italy, told reporters in Lampedusa after visiting the survivors.

The 20-meter (65-foot) migrant boat sank Thursday after a fire was set onboard to attract attention of any passing boats or people on shore when they ran into trouble. They had traveled for two full days and thought they had reached safety when they saw the lights of Lampedusa. Instead, at least 111 drowned and 155 survived, some of whom were in the water for three hours, clinging to anything buoyant - even empty water bottles. Boat captains in Italian waters have been dissuaded in the past from helping migrants in distress because they fear prosecution under an Italian law aimed at curbing illegal migration. But Boldrini said the law of the sea requires assistance to be given to anyone in need. Reports that a boat didn't help the stranded migrants prompted a Dutch lawmaker to call for an investigation. While survivors have told authorities that a boat passed, there has been no single vessel identified nor have prosecutors launched a formal investigation. Italian lawmaker Pia Locatelli, part of the delegation, told The Associated Press the migrants reported that a boat circled them with a light and then went away. They also saw one or perhaps two more boats in the distance before the fire. “They were absolutely sure in telling the boat went around their own boat,” Locatelli said, but they were unable to offer a further description.

The migrants found themselves in a rocky bay and couldn’t make the shore, according to humanitarian organizations. Locatelli said their engine hadn’t broken down, contrary to other reports, and the migrants were unclear on why they didn’t try to find a landing point with the boat. Normally, migrants who are seeking refugee status have phones they use to contact authorities when they reach shore, but officials say this group was forced to give up their phones in Libya. More than 20 survivors attended a private ceremony in a hangar where caskets containing the bodies of those recovered were prepared. The surviving migrants asked the lawmakers to be allowed to identify the deceased, to repatriate their remains to Eritrea and to be moved to centers away from Lampedusa as soon as possible, Boldrini said. Lampedusa’s mayor said that identifications would be made through photographs. Earlier, about 10 fishing vessels headed out to the site of the shipwreck in choppy seas to drop the flowers and blast their horns in honor of the migrants who died. Fishermen, including one who saved several dozen of the migrants from the shipwreck, said offering help to those in need is part of their code. “Its the law of the sea!” Vito Fiorini said. “If you find somebody in need you must immediately help. How could you turn away when you see a person who needs help?

“They do it (help) all the time, its unthinkable that a fisherman of Lampedusa would pretend to see nothing!” Fiorini, who has said he was the first to reach the fiery wreck and sounded the alarm, said some of the 47 migrants he pulled from the sea had been stripped of their clothing, possibly by the current. Some were so slippery from being covered in gasoline that it was hard to pull them onboard. Humanitarian agencies say 41 of the survivors are minors between the ages of 11 and 17 -- and all but one of them was unaccompanied by a parent. Survivors said they spent between two and four months in Tripoli, the Libyan capital, awaiting passage to Europe, much of that time spent confined. At the refugee center, Awet, an Eritrean survivor who lost a friend in a shipwreck, told the AP he paid $1,600 to smugglers for the trip. He claimed the captain had a phone, but had thrown it into the sea. Thousands make the perilous crossing each year, seeking a new life in the prosperous European Union. Smugglers charge thousands of dollars a head for the journey aboard overcrowded, barely seaworthy boats that lack life vests. Each year hundreds die undertaking the crossing.

Boldrini said the wave of migrants needs to be tackled in the countries of origin - and not with punitive measures against those fleeing misery and violence. She cited an Italian law that makes entering Italy a crime. In keeping with the law, a prosecutor in Sicily has confirmed he is preparing paperwork against the migrants - a procedure hampered by their poor Italian and lack of documents. “We won’t ever solve the problem with repressive measures,” Boldrini said. “It is unthinkable that someone who flees wars or death will stop in front of the hypothesis of a crime.” She said she spoke to one 27-year-old who had been forced to serve in the Eritrean military for eight years. “They said how much they paid, how families indebted themselves, how they flee to find a life to find a life of peace and security, and also to pay back their families,” Boldrini said. Human rights groups have called Eritrea one of the world’s most repressive regimes. Increasingly isolated, Eritrea is under sanctions imposed by the African Union and the United Nations. In late 2011 the U.N. Security Council expanded an arms embargo against the president’s regime. The country is accused of supporting al-Qaida-linked Islamist militants in Somalia.

October 7, 2013: Ethiopia - Lampedusa Boat Sinking Riots Hit Refugee Camps, 3 Eritreans Killed’ RSS feed: By Gianluca Mezzofiore (updates) - A prominent human rights activist claims three Eritrean refugees have died and many more have been injured at refugee camps in northern Ethiopia after a memorial vigil dedicated to the victims of the Lampedusa boat sinking turned violent. Meron Estefanos, also a radio presenter in Sweden for Radio Erena, exclusively told IBTimes UK that a riot erupted in the Mai Ayni refugee camp after Eritrean refugees started expressing their frustration at authorities. Police opened fire to disperse the riot and four children were wounded as a result. The unrest spread to other refugee camps such as the Adi Harish and three people were killed. “Refugees, who contacted Eritrean independent Radio Erena, disclosed that the initial objective of the gatherings was to remember those who perished in the Lampedusa disaster, but quickly turned into a protest over what refugees considered corruption in the refugee resettlement process as well as issues over camp security,” Estefanos said.

A spokesperson at the UN Refugee Agency (UNHCR) confirmed to IBTimes UK that riots took place in the refugee camps but was unable to confirm the fatalities, adding that the situation was calming down. Over 65,000 Eritrean refugees live in Ethiopia, spread across four refugee camps. “The refugees believe that many of those who are making the perilous journey via Libya and the Sahara Desert do so because the resettlement program in Ethiopian refugee camps is corrupt with many Ethiopians being given bogus refugee statuses that qualify them for resettlement opportunities and often they are prioritised over genuine refugees,” Estefanos said. Refugees stressed that the protest was mainly peaceful but other reports say that angry migrants started throwing stones at local authorities.

The UNHCR estimates that up to 3,000 refugees escape from Eritrea every month and the majority of those are currently in refugee camps in Sudan and Ethiopia. Around 500 people were aboard the refugee boat when it capsized and sank half a mile from Lampedusa. So far 211 people have been confirmed dead, but it is feared that at least 300 people have perished. The UNHCR reported that 8,400 migrants landed in Italy and Malta in the first six months of 2013. The majority of them, following a well-worn path from northern Africa and the Middle East, continue their journey to northern Italy, Germany, France or the UK. After leaving Eritrea for Sudan and south Egypt, Eritrean migrants travel to Libya where the majority are usually arrested.

October 9, 2013: Italy holds suspected ship captain; death toll 275' AP - (updates) Italy on Tuesday detained a 35-year-old Tunisian man suspected of being the captain of a boat carrying African migrants that sank off the tiny island of Lampedusa. Divers, meanwhile, recovered dozens of additional bodies from the wreckage, raising the death toll to 275. Just 155 migrants, most if not all from Eritrea, survived Thursday's shipwreck. Survivors said there were some 500 would-be asylum-seekers aboard when the ship capsized. Tens of thousands of migrants from Africa and the Middle East try to cross the Mediterranean Sea each year, seeking a better life in Europe, but the journey is fraught with danger. Thursday's sinking has one of the highest verified death tolls of migrant ship disasters in the Mediterranean. There have been past reports of large numbers of migrants lost, such as a boat with 300 that vanished in 2011, but most of the bodies were not recovered. Prosecutors in Agrigento, Sicily, said they had detained the Tunisian suspect, who was transferred from Lampedusa to Argrigento under police custody aboard a ferry. He faces charges of aiding illegal immigration and multiple counts of homicide. Coast Guard Commander Filippo Marini said 43 bodies were recovered from within the ship's hold, while one was spotted by a helicopter floating near the wreck, before the operation was suspended for darkness. A disproportionate number of the dead are women: So far the bodies of 81 women have been recovered, while only six of the survivors were female. Eight of the dead are children. "Inside, we're finding more women than men," Gianni Dessi, the coast guard official coordinating the diving operation, told Sky TG24.
"We hope not, but we expect to find more children." He said the scene inside the ship's hold is tough for divers, but that "maintaining cold blood is a quality that helps the operation." The survivors were helping identify the bodies, mostly through photographs. In some cases, divers also have recovered documents.

October 9, 2013: A look at Eritrea, an isolated African nation' KAMPALA, Uganda (AP) — Thousands of people each year flee Eritrea, a small Horn of Africa nation. Despite relative peace, many leave the repressive regime taking trips that can be as perilous as the recent boat disaster off the Italian island of Lampedusa.

Here is a look at the isolated country –

INDEPENDENCE: Eritrea declared independence in de-jure in April, 1993 following a United Nations-backed referendum in which Eritreans voted to break away from Ethiopia. Eritrea's pro-independence leaders fought a guerrilla war against Ethiopia that ended in May, 1991. Relations between landlocked Ethiopia and Eritrea, which has a Red Sea coastline, have since remained tense, with both countries' armies occasionally clashing over an undefined common border. From May, 1998 to June, 2000, the neighbors fought a costly and bloody war over a disputed border territory. Both countries continue to accuse eachother of supporting armed groups across the border.

POPULATION: Roughly the size of Pennsylvania, Eritrea has a population of at least 6 million people. About 69 percent of them are poor, the school enrollment rate stands at 47 percent and annual per- capita income was $403 in 2010, according to the World Bank. The country has faced chronic drought over the years, fueled in part by the government's restrictive economic policies, according to the Central Intelligence Agency's World Factbook. Nine ethnic groups are recognized in the country, including the dominant Tigrinya (Kabassa).

LEADERSHIP: Issaias Affeworki, a former guerrilla fighter who became the leader of Eritrea's war of independence, has been president since April, 1993 after being the country's de facto leader since May, 1991. He is said to rule with a firm hand, brooking no opposition to his authority, according to rights groups that depict him as a tyrant. At least 10,000 political prisoners have been held by Affeworki's administration over the last two decades, Amnesty International said in a report released earlier this year. "With no known exception, not a single political prisoner has ever been charged with a crime or tried, had access to a lawyer or been brought before a judge or a judicial officer to assess the legality and necessity of the detention," the rights group said in the May report. In January more than 100 dissident soldiers were reported to storm the headquarters of the Ministry of Information in the capital, Asmara, where they read a statement on state TV urging constitutional rule and freedom for political prisoners. That incident was interpreted by some analysts as an attempted power grab that never succeeded, although details of it remain unclear. Elections have not been held in Eritrea since independence.

HUMAN RIGHTS: Rights groups, which often lack access to the country, have called Eritrea an oppressive state where the rights of civilians are frequently violated. Human Rights Watch, which once described Eritrea as "a giant prison," reports that "torture, arbitrary detention, and severe restrictions on freedom of expression, association, and religious freedom remain routine" in the country. The group says in its global report for 2013 that "political parties are not allowed" in Eritrea and there are "no institutional constraints on" Afworki. "Eritreans are routinely subject to imprisonment without explanation, trial, or any form of due process.

Incarceration often lasts indefinitely," the report says. Amnesty International says it has "received many reports of deaths in detention" from torture, appalling conditions or suicide. Citing the accounts from those who have fled, the group reports that conditions in Eritrea's detention facilities are abysmal, with prisoners "held in underground cells and shipping containers, subject to boiling and freezing temperatures."

WHY MANY FLEE? More than 1,500 Eritreans, including unaccompanied minors, flee the country monthly despite shoot-to-kill orders to border guards and immense dangers along escape routes, according to Human Rights Watch. Eritreans face compulsory national military service that "keeps most young Eritreans in perpetual bondage," the rights group says, accusing the government of prolonging military service indefinitely despite a decree limiting it to 18 months. People are "desperate to escape" a military in which conditions are said to be "dreadful," making conscription into the armed forces one of the main reasons young Eritreans flee, said Andrew Weir, deputy editor of a Britain-based publication called Africa Confidential. Eritrea is austere and highly repressive, according to Weir. A well-known route for some migrants from Africa is via the Red Sea and Sinai, where people fall victim to human trafficking, he said. More than 250 migrants were killed in the Lampedusa boat disaster and most victims are believed to be from Eritrea and Somalia, another troubled Horn of Africa nation, according to the office of U.N. High Commissioner for Human Rights. The large number of unaccompanied children among those fleeing Eritrea showed "the scale of despair they are facing" back home, said Sheila B. Keetharuth, the U.N. special rapporteur on Eritrea. "The alarming human rights situation in Eritrea is triggering a constant stream of refugees to neighboring countries and far beyond. People continue to flee despite the extreme dangers along escape routes," Keetharuth said in a statement released Monday. Some Eritrean athletes have not returned home after competing in sports events abroad; some went missing at the London-2012 Olympic Games.

THE PRESS: Many journalists have been imprisoned in Eritrea while others have fled the country, according to the Committee to Protect Journalists (CPJ), which says Eritrea and neighboring Ethiopia were Africa's "top jailers" of journalists in 2012. The watchdog group says since 2008 it has assisted 30 Eritrean journalists who now live in exile. Eritrean authorities have shut down all independent media outlets in a widespread government crackdown that started in Sept. 2001, it says.

ALLEGED TERROR LINKS: Eritrea has long been accused of fomenting violence in Somalia in part to keep its archrival Ethiopia, which shares a long border with Somalia, concerned about conditions there. Increasingly isolated, Eritrea is under sanctions imposed by the African Union and the U.N. In late 2011 the U.N. Security Council expanded an arms embargo against Afworki's regime. Earlier this year the Obama administration blacklisted Eritrea's intelligence chief and a senior military official for their alleged roles in providing financial and logistical support to the al-Qaida linked Somali Islamic extremist group al-Shabab. Eritrea’s government denies the charge.

October 11, 2013: Another boat full of African migrants capsizes off Italy'

ROME (AP) -- A boat carrying an estimated 200 migrants capsized Friday off the Sicilian island of Lampedusa where a shipwreck last week left more than 300 dead. Rescue crews reported seeing bodies in the water. The capsizing occurred some 65 miles (105 kilometers) southeast of Lampedusa but in waters where Malta has search and rescue responsibilities. Malta requested Italy's help, and the coast guard immediately sent a patrol boat to the area, said Italian coast guard spokesman Marco Di Milla.

A Maltese armed forces aircraft spotted the wreckage and a Maltese patrol boat was the first on scene, a Malta government spokesman said on customary condition of anonymity. Maltese rescue crews reported spotting bodies in the water. Last week, a ship carrying some 500 people capsized off Lampedusa, killing more than 300 people. Only 155 survived. The deaths prompted calls for the European Union to do more to better patrol the southern Mediterranean and prevent such tragedies. Lampedusa, a tiny speck of an island closer to Africa than the Italian mainland, is the destination of choice of smugglers ferrying migrants from Libya or Tunisia to Europe. They usually charge more than 1,000 euro ($1,355) a head and cram the migrants onto boats that routinely run into trouble and require rescue.

October 12, 2013: The Economist: Eritrea and its emigrants – Why they leave?

NAIROBI - ANALYSIS by the print edition: - A DAY of national mourning was held on October 4th after as many as 300 people drowned in the Mediterranean's worst recent shipwreck, just off Lampedusa. Candles were lit and flags flew at half-mast. But this was not in Eritrea, where most of the dead came from, but in Italy, the country they lost their lives trying to reach. Some 30,000 people reached Italy illegally in boats in the first nine months of 2013, three times as many as in the whole of 2012, according to Frontex, the European Union's border agency. Many hail from Syria, Afghanistan and Somalia, three countries in varying stages of civil strife. But the largest batch came from Eritrea, a country that has supposedly been at peace for the past 13 years. The Italian island of Lampedusa, which lies south of Sicily in what officials call the "central Mediterranean corridor", is not on the Eritreans' main escape route. Most make their way overland. Some 40,000 have sought refuge in Israel, 87,000 in Ethiopia and 125,000 in Sudan. On the face of things, this is odd. Though its GDP per person is still only $500, the former Italian colony, which was recognised as independent in de-jure from Ethiopia in April, 1993, is enjoying modest growth on the back of a boom in mining. The main reason for the mass flight is that a growing number of Eritreans feel they are living in a prison camp, rivalled—some say—only by North Korea. All males up to the age of 50 have to do national service on starvation wages in an army whose senior ranks are brutal and corrupt. Up to the age of 65 men must continue to serve for periods every year in the “popular army”, even though life expectancy hovers at only 61. Eritreans are taking to the seas because of worsening conditions at home. Issaias Affewerki, Eritrea’s president, who has run the country since independence, now acts as a “one-man state”, says the International Crisis Group, a Brussels-based think-tank. For two decades he has been head of state, commander-in-chief of the armed forces and chairman of the ruling party, which itself emerged out of a guerrilla force. Freedom of movement, speech, religion and assembly have all steadily withered. One survivor in Lampedusa, who gave his name as Awet, aged 27, said he had fled after eight years in the army, knowing no date for his release.

October 14, 2013: Italy to step up patrols in hope of saving migrants from shipwreck’

Reuters: Italy is to step up naval and air patrols in the southern Mediterranean to try to prevent repeats of the shipwrecks which have drowned hundreds of African migrants in two separate disasters in little more than a week. Prime Minister Enrico Letta said late on Saturday an “air and naval package” would be put in place south of Sicily, where tens of thousands of migrants in flimsy, overcrowded boats have made the crossing from Africa so far this year. At least 34 people drowned on Friday when their boat overturned, according to the Italian navy, but with many unaccounted for, the true total could be as high as 200 or more. In a separate shipwreck on October 3, more than 350 died. Survivors of Friday’s wreck reported their vessel had been fired on as they left Libya, said Barbara Molinario, spokeswoman for the United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees.

EAN - Why people flee Eritrea and Somalia?

Eritrea—UN says 3, 000 people try to flee each month. Human rights groups say the country is becoming a giant jail, with some 10,000 political prisoners. Young people conscripted to army - sometimes until age of 40

Somalia - Much of the country controlled by al-Shabab Islamist militants. Country ravaged by two decades of war.

October 20, 2013: Eritrea teetering on the brink’

Analysis by Chamara Sumanapala: With a coastline of 600 miles, Eritrea occupies an important place in the Red Sea. It even takes its name from the Latin term for Red Sea, Mare Erythraeum. After a three decade long war of independence with Ethiopia, Eritrea overwhelmingly voted for independence in April, 1993. After just over 20 years, some analysts fear that Eritrea is on the verge of collapse. Eritrea is a nation of six million people belonging to nine officially recognized ethnic groups. Roughly half the population is Sunni Muslim and the other half belongs to several Christian denominations. The long struggle for independence gave a sense of national unity and in 1993 there was a strong belief in Eritrea’s success. However, today it is one of the largest sources of refugees in Africa. It is reported that around 4,000 people are leaving the country every month. Since many of these refugees are young males, Eritrea is facing a shortage of valuable labor. This adds further strain to the economy which is already in ruins. One major obstacle for economic development in Eritrea is the military.

Eritrea is perhaps one of the most militarized societies in the world. The defense budget of this small country is estimated to be one fifths of its GDP. Its army is now one of the largest on the continent, and has the highest number of military personnel per capita in the world next to North Korea. Eritrea has had a border conflict with Ethiopia from 1998 and has had several conflicts with other neighbors as well. Eritrea had fought briefly with Yemen over the Hanish Islands in 1995 and with Djibouti over a border dispute in 2008. Meanwhile, there are claims that Eritrea supported the religious fanatic rebel groups in Somalia. These clashes and claims have made Eritrea an isolated country even regionally. Its continuously abrasive tone has increased the isolation in the world. As in most militarized societies, the ruling elite are using the military to hang on to power. Eritrea has known only one president during its entire 20 year history after independence.

In April, 1993, the Eritrean People's Liberation Front (EPLF) leader Issaias Affewerki became the president of the country. The EPLF was renamed as People's Front for Democracy and Justice (PFDJ) in 1994. Elections were planned for 1997 and an unimplemented constitution allowed for multi party politics. Afewerki used the conflict with Ethiopia as a pretext to crush all opposition and postpone elections. However an opposition is growing even within the military and in January 2013 there was a military revolt led by a colonel and members of his brigade. They occupied the Information Ministry and forced the director of the national TV station to read their demands for political reform on air. This exposed the emerging cracks within Afewerki's regime. A much more embarrassing issue has been the case of defections among military and other high ranking officials. These include former Information Minister Ali abdu, once one of the closest allies of president Afewerki. Thousands of soldiers had sought for sanctuary in Ethiopia and Sudan over the past years. The most embarrassing event was the case of two pilots who escaped to Saudi Arabia with the president's official airplane. Rubbing salt into the president's wound, a third pilot who was sent to retrieve the plane also chose to stay in Saudi Arabia.

In some instances, the situation in Eritrea appears to be similar to that of the situation in Somalia during the latter part of the government of the former dictator Mohamed Siad Barre. The Siad Barre regime was also weakened by an ongoing struggle with Ethiopia, and was finally forced out of power by several militant groups who forced him out of Mogadishu in early 1991. However, the militant groups each fought among themselves and anarchy engulfed much of the country. Somalia was one of the largest humanitarian crises in 20th century Africa and is still an ongoing conflict. The possible collapse of the Eritrean state will have grave consequences to the region and the world. A refugee crisis of much greater proportions than today, resurgence of piracy and fears of rising religious fanaticism in the region are the most likely results of increasing anarchy. Eritrea lies in a vital trade route and if the state falls, the implications would be huge.

Meanwhile, Eritrea's poor Muslim communities are increasingly vulnerable to fanaticism even now. While Affewerki, now 67, stays in power, Eritrea will have some control of its internal situation. However, if the cracks widen in the military, there is no insurance against a repeat of what happened in Somalia.

OCTOBER 24, 2013: 3,000 Eritreans flee every month due to human rights abuses, UN'

(AP) — Alarming human rights abuses in Eritrea are spurring between 2,000 and 3,000 people to flee the east African nation every month, despite a "shoot-to-kill policy" targeting those attempting to leave, a U.N. investigator said. Sheila Keetharuth, the U.N. special rapporteur on human rights in Eritrea, said the U.N. refugee agency was concerned about 305,723 Eritreans who have fled over the past decade.

October 24, 2013: Eritrea – Africans stranded in Italy, desperate refugees dream of Europe'

(AFP ROME) - A towering squat on the outskirts of Rome with an ever swelling population of hundreds of refugees has become the squalid emblem of a failing system that is haunting this week's EU summit. Residents of the seven-floor block—a former university building dubbed "Salaam Palace"—come from war-torn, poverty-stricken corners of Africa: Eritrea, Ethiopia, Somalia and Sudan. "We were only looking for peace," said Mahad, 27, who fled from Somalia to Italy seven years ago. He is part of a group of squatters who try to keep the peace among the desperate souls who long to be able to move to other parts of Europe. "Living here is no home. There are problems with alcohol, fights. Some here have gone mad," he said. Fiore, a 29-year-old Eritrean woman with a son 16 months old, described it as "a nightmare from which you can't shake free." Refugees rustle up plates of African staples in their rooms, where curtains separate mattresses and blankets become prized goods as winter falls. "They don't know where else to go. They are victims of the system," said Lorenzo Chialastri from Catholic charity Caritas. He said the building, which houses 240 women and 60 children among its 1,250 residents, was "a no-man's land." Two shipwrecks that saw over 400 refugees drown this month near the Italian island of Lampedusa as they tried to reach Europe have drawn global attention to what Prime Minister Enrico Letta has described as an "immigration emergency", which has turned the Mediterranean into a "sea of death". Survivors of the October 3 shipwreck, many of whom lost family members when their boat caught fire and sank, are now forced to sleep in unsanitary conditions at Lampedusa's overcrowded centre, where 800 migrants fight over 250 beds. Some of the 4,000 migrants at the Mineo centre in Sicily, dubbed "Solidarity Village", rioted this week over the snail-pace examination of asylum requests, burning mattresses, throwing rocks at passing cars and clashing with police. Italy has asked the European Asylum Support Office (EASO) for help in upgrading its centres, training staff and implementing the Dublin regulation, which state that asylum applicants in Europe must stay in their first country of entry.

Lives are at stake: Italy and the European Union have pledged millions of euros in extra funds and more refugee beds but associations and charities say it is not enough. Around 10,000 people request asylum each year in Italy, but many also try to dodge controls to apply for asylum in other parts of Europe. A bloated system means those lucky enough to be granted protective status are forced to give up their bed to incoming asylum seekers and end up on the streets, looking for shelter and work. “Many of these people are traumatised from events in their home countries. The police escort them out of the centres and from then on they are on their own,” said Chialastri, who runs Caritas’ migrant counselling centre in the Italian capital. “Refugees need to know what will become of them, they need concrete support. Lives are at stake.” A fierce recession in Italy means finding employment is near impossible and many attempt to travel to northern Europe, lured by the prospects of a roof over their heads, a stronger labour market and a better social assistance system. Those registered on entry to Italy are routinely sent back—unless the conditions and lack of assistance are seen to violate their human rights. Courts in Germany have ruled against the practice because of “the danger of being exposed to inhumane or degrading treatment”, fears echoed in a recent report by the Swiss Refugee Council.

Its very dangerous: Eighteen-year-old Adam from Eritrea arrived at “Salaam Palace” just six months ago after a gruelling two-year journey through Sudan, Libya and across the Mediterranean to Lampedusa. He said he was too scared to try to travel elsewhere in Europe. “Its very dangerous, but here there is no job,” he said, smoking in a tracksuit and sandals on the steps outside. “Living here is very difficult, we have nothing,” said Ahmed from Somalia, 27, who attempted to start a new life in Norway and Sweden but was sent back twice. He now cares for a one-year-old daughter born in the ramshackle squat. “Life was better when I lived in Libya under Kadhafi than it is in Italy now,” said Ahmed, who has an occasional job unloading goods. “If I lose this job I’m thinking of becoming a pirate in Somalia, at least they make money and can provide a home for their family,” he said.

October 25, 2013: Situation In Eritrea ‘Desperately Bleak’

(Newsroom America) – Updates: A United Nations expert has urged the international community to focus on the human rights situation in Eritrea which she said is extremely concerning with up to 3,000 people fleeing every month, many of them unaccompanied children. “The current human rights picture is desperately bleak. People feel trapped in a long hopeless situation as they see no end to it to the point that they take the irreversible decision to flee, forcing them on the road to exile,” the UN Special Rapporteur on Eritrea, Sheila B. Keetharuth, told journalists in

New York. Earlier today, she had briefed the UN General Assembly's main social, humanitarian and cultural body (Third Committee), which hears directly from special rapporteurs and other human rights mechanisms. In her briefing to the Committee, the first since she took up the post on 1 November 2012, Ms Keetharuth described an alarming situation on the ground pieced from interviews with Eritreans residing outside the country who have been victims of abuse, as well as with representatives in Djibouti and Ethiopia where Ms Keetharuth was able to have official visits. She detailed cases of extrajudicial killing, enforced disappearance and incommunicado detention, arbitrary arrest and detention, torture, inhumane prison conditions, indefinite national service, and lack of freedom of expression and opinion, assembly, association, religious belief and movement.

A full version of the report was submitted this past summer to the Geneva-based UN Human Rights Council, which appointed Ms Keetharuth to examine and report back, in an unpaid capacity, on specific human rights themes. In particular, the Special Rapporteur highlighted the excessive militarization affecting the very fabric of Eritrean society and the family, with men and women conscripted for unlimited periods of time instead of the prior 18 months of service with the National Service. She told journalists about one teacher with whom she spoke who told her he wanted to put down the gun forced onto him, "I want to hold a pen in one hand and a book in the other." Ms Keetharuth also raised the issue of incommunicado detentions which "appears to be the norm and not the exception." These and other human rights violations are "triggering a constant stream of refugees to neighbouring countries," the independent expert said.

According to the UN Refugee Agency (UNHCR), 305,723 people last [decade] fled Eritrea, with between 2,000 and 3,000 leaving the country every month, among them a large number of children unaccompanied by parents or guardians. "All Eritreans should be able to claim and enjoy their human rights, be it civil and political or economic, social and cultural," she said. "This will require innovative ideas to address those issues perceived by Eritrea as hostile and constructive engagement with Eritrea and neighbouring countries to improve the situation of human rights in the country." The desperation of the people in Eritrea, despite a shoot-to-kill policy targeting those attempting to flee, is further apparent in the two successive boat tragedies off the coasts of Italy and Malta earlier in October, during which more than 350 refugees lost their lives, including many Eritreans, she said. She called on the international community to focus on the human rights situation in Eritrea and increase efforts to protect refugees. The Special Rapporteur also reiterated her call on the Eritrean Government to cooperate with her mandate which offers a "frank and open dialogue" on the theme of human rights.

October 26, 2013: Europe stuck on migrant question'

Commentary by Lara Vergnaud: Four days after Italian authorities bungled a memorial service for the mostly Eritrean refugee victims of the October 3 Lampedusa shipwreck, hundreds of Eritreans staged a symbolic funeral before Italy's parliament in remembrance of their compatriots and in protest of Monday's service, which excluded shipwreck survivors. Friday's demonstration coincides with U.N. allegations of widespread human rights abuses in Eritrea. Namely a "shoot-to-kill policy" to stop fleeing Eritreans, extrajudicial killings, torture, and lack of freedom of expression, religion, assembly, and movement. Ruled with a firm grip by president Isaias Afewerki, Eritrea hasn't held national elections since gaining independence in 1993. The U.N.'s special rapporteur on human rights in the east African nation, Sheila Keetharuth, cited Eritrea's compulsory and indefinite military service, which applies to all Eritreans between ages of 18 and 50, as a main factor driving citizens, including many children, to flee.

Despite denials from Affewerki's administration, the consequences of Eritrea's restrictive, highly militarized society are evident. Several hundred thousand Eritreans have fled the country in the last decade; 40,000 of those sought refuge in Israel, where they have received a less than enthusiastic welcome. According to the U.N., approximately 3,000 Eritreans flee to neighboring Sudan and Ethiopia every month. And despite the dangers of sea voyages, often undertaken in overcrowded, precarious vessels, 7,500 migrants from Eritrea – a country supposedly at peace – made the journey to Italy this year, mirroring the number of refugees making the same trip from war-torn Syria.

The exodus has Europe grappling to strike the right note over illegal migration, as fatal migrant shipwrecks and Roma controversies in Greece, Ireland, and France made headlines this month. Human rights groups have accused the E.U. of using recent migrant deaths as a pretext to tighten border controls. Despite plaintive requests from southern European countries, including Italy, Spain, Greece and Malta, that the European bloc share the demographic burden – refugees are required to apply for asylum in the first E.U. country they enter – or at least the financial one, an E.U summit on Friday failed to yield a concrete solution. Instead, the debate over a harmonized European migration policy was largely eclipsed by new revelations about the extent of U.S. spying. Now, the bloc is set to revisit the migration question at a June 2014 summit. Not that the influx will wait. Experts predict that as Eritrea's instability continues, and the war in Syria intensifies, the refugee flow in Europe will only accelerate. On Friday, as E.U. policy makers in Brussels discussed migrant deaths and NSA spying, Italian naval forces rescued some 700 migrants near the island of Lampedusa.

October 28, 2013: Eritrea - The Government arrests 150 Christians found praying together'

IndepthAfrica: Release Eritrea, a UK based charity, has learnt that Eritrean security forces, raided a prayer meeting and arrested 150

Christians found praying together in Maitemenai, a suburb to the north of Asmara. It is thought that the believers had gathered to pray about the escalating refugee crisis and the trouble in the country that has been of concern to many Eritreans in recent days. The gathering is said to have been under the auspices of an underground fellowship known locally as 'Hiyaw Amlak' (Living God). The fellowship is part of a wide network of underground fellowships that have been in operation throughout the country since 2002, when the Eritrean government shut all churches not belonging to the officially sanctioned religious groups. Although no details of the whereabouts of all the prisoners have been disclosed officially, friends and families of the detained believe at least some of them are held at the 4th Police Station near an area known as Edaga Hamus in the adjoining district, from where the raid and arrests occurred. The arrest has alarmed underground church leaders, who fear that this may be a sign of things to come.

Endnotes:

1) Eritrea is one of the biggest violators on religious rights, churches not belonging to the Orthodox, Catholic and Lutheran groups are banned their leaders have been under arrest since 2002. Those groups that are sanctioned by the government operate under severe restriction and also suffer from persecution against outspoken leaders. The Patriarch of the orthodox Church disappeared in 2005.

2) It is believed that upto 2,000 Christians are being detained and harassed on the count of their faith, and many leave the country following arrests or harassment.

3) Release Eritrea is a UK based human rights charity working with the underground church in Eritrea and with refugee communities across the region.

Report from Eritrea Part I'

IndepthAfrica: (October 29, 2013): As far as the average man on the streets is concerned, things remain as they were before and there are no new developments after the Lampedusa incident. Even though the people are feeling bad about this tragic event, they still remain paralyzed in their fear. However even the silence has been disquieting to the regime. The fear of the regime too is palpable: (a)The police have been extra-vigilant, especially in checking the public bulletin boards, tear any funeral announcement they see there. (b) Almost all ministers and key personalities are banned from travel outside the nation.

AVIATION: The current state of Eritrean Airlines:

Following the defection of Mr. Kibrom Dafla, the then general manager of Eritrean Airlines, in 2009, the airlines was run by Pakistani management group directed by a Packistani named Mr. Shaki ,from 2010 to 2012. This guy had previously worked in United Arab Emirates, in Dubai, as a simple travel agent. Mr. Shaki and his management group worked as a management team running the Eritrean airlines; and throughout his stay in Eritrea, Mr. Shaki was in direct contact with Issaias Affewerki. The flights to Lahore, Pakistan, where neither trade nor transpiration of nationals exist, created suspicious of about what Isaias is up to. It is feared that the airline was mainly used for smuggling purposes. Speculation of what the cargo could be ranges from gold to armaments. After two years of probable smuggling operation, by end of 2012 Mr. Shaki and his staff left Eritrea for good and now Mr. Shaki is residing in Lahor. It is believed that Mr Shaki embezzled millions of dollars from the account of the eritrean airlines, and attempts to recover the money has been futile to date. Further efforts to resusicate the airlines under Eritrean management has so far failed to bring any result.

Military leaders in key positions:

a) Majour-General Philipos Weldeyohaness: is now in charge of all prisons around Asmara. The prisons in Adiabeto, Maisrwa, Ala, Basit , Adinfas and Eraero are under his control, where so many people are tortured and killed.

b) Colonel nicknamed Wedi-Memhir: the one who conducted the shooting of disabled war veterans (Akale-sinkulan) at Maihabar in 1993, is now in charge of arming people in entire Eritrea, known as Hizbawi Serawit (popular army), from the ages of 18 up to 75.

c) Colonel Wedi-lique similarly to Wedi-Memhir: has been in charge of arming and terrorizing people

d) Colonel Teame Mekele: is still in charge of coordinating and arming various terrorist groups from Eritrea, especially from Massawa and Assab. It is to be remembered and he is in the black list of UN Security Council for this very act in the past.

e) Wedi-Fitawrari: is another top security guy, who was previously stationed in Sudan spying on Eritreans; Now he is stationed in Massawa. He is believed to have taken over the navy position of Commander Humed Himid Karikare, and he is now busy kidnapping and disappearing people.

f) Brigadier-General Abraha Kassa: as usual, is putting innocent Eritreans in prison in Asmara in Criminal Investigation known as ‘Wenjel-Mirmera.’

g) Colonel Simon Guebredingel, another known criminal in the security department, is known for killing people secretly by silencer and disposing their bodies in inaccessible places.

h) Brigadier-general Wedi-Libsu: who was previously a judge in the special court (Fuluy Bet-firdi), has been transferred to Sawa training center.

i) Colonel Tesfalidet: the main security man in Issaias' office, is also in the business of kidnapping and disappearing people.

j) Hagos Guebrehiwet (Wadi-kisha) and Issias's relation is very strained after the defection of Hagos' vice who is believed to be in one of the Scandinavian counties.

k) Majour-General Teklai Habteslasse: is now spending most of his days in Massawa. After the defection of the personal pilots to Saudi Arabia, two foreign (white) pilots have been assigned to that task. Occasionally, it is believed that these pilots take the president to Saudi Arabia or Gulf States for medical attention, potentially for his chronic liver ailment. And insiders believe that if the situation in Eritrea gets real bad, this would be the route Isaias may take to escape from the country, In addition to the above mentioned criminals, there are many other colonels and military and security officials who who are active kidnapping and disappearing people across the country, As a result, Eritrea has by now turned into a huge cemetery. People are losing family members not only in Shegeraib Sudan by Rashaida, in the Sinai by Beduin, in Sahara and Libya and in Mediterranean Sea, but also in the hundreds of detention centers in Eritrea. In fact the deaths in these prisons by far outstrips those dying outside the country.

ERITREA: The health condition of higher officials:

General Sibhat Ephraim: has been having a serious migraine problem, and he has been absent from his job on many occasions.

a) Majour-General Samuel, nicknamed China: has been having serious eye problem and is now using heavy eyeglasses.

b) Majour-General Guerezgiher Amde Mariam (Wuchu): is almost out of job because of alcoholism.

c) PFDJ's general-secretary Alamin Mohammed Said: is also critically ill. He is irrelevant in the PFDJ circles.

d) Majour-General Umer Hassan Tawil: is under house arrest and is deeply depressed.

Report from Eritrea part II'

(October 29, 2013) Tensions mount in Eritrea: thousands of young people detained and air travel is curtailed. The regime in Eritrea has been conducting mass raids and arrests (giffa) detaining thousands of people of 'military age' (18-50) and sending them to military training centres in Sawa, Wea and Barentu. The raids that were carried out over three days starting Friday had the biggest impact in Asmara, Mendeffera, Dekmehare and Segeneyti as well as Keren Massawa and Gindae. It is estimated that up to 1,500 young people may have been detained in Asmara alone, and sent to Sawa and Wea. The soldiers who were carrying on these raids in Asmara were predominantly from the Tigray People's Democratic Movement (TPDM), an Ethiopian opposition group based in Eritrea. Meanwhile in Massawa, the raids were carried out by new Special Forces (division called 61) selected from the rank and file of the fighters belonging to TPDM and other Ethiopian opposition groups being trained and supported by the regime in Eritrea, and this is not the first time that they have been deployed to duties inside Eritrea, in the wake of the January 2013 attempted coup, they were dispatched to the streets of the capital to quell spread of the uprising. Over the months since then all key security tasks, including presidential guards, were transferred from the Eritrean in favour of TPDM soldiers. In a separate news, air travel in and out of Asmara is suffering severe restrictions with Nas Air's flights having stopped some three months back. Nas Air was privately owned by Mr Nesredin Ibrahim and used to fly to: Juba , Jeddah, Dubai and Nairobi.

National Service Recruits. Commentators estimate that there are between 9,000 to 10,000

Eritrea – The Refugee saga is the cost of tyranny - Report from Eritrea'

IndepthAfrica Analysis: (October 30, 2013) Tensions mount in Eritrea: thousands of young people detained and air travel is curtailed. The regime in Eritrea has been conducting mass raids and arrests (giffa) detaining thousands of people of 'military age' (18-50) and sending them to military training centres in Sawa, Wea and Barentu. The raids that were carried out over three days starting Friday had the biggest impact in Asmara, Mendefera, Dekehare and Segeneyti as well as Keren Massawa and Gindae. It is estimated that up to 1,500 young people may have been detained in Asmara alone, and sent to Sawa and Wea. The soldiers who were carrying on these raids in Asmara were predominantly from the Tigray People's Democratic Movement (TPDM), an Ethiopian opposition group based in Eritrea. Meanwhile in Massawa, the raids were carried out by new Special Forces (division called 61) selected from the rank and file of the National Service Recruits. Commentators estimate that there are between 9,000 to 10,000 fighters belonging to TPDM and other Ethiopian opposition groups being trained and supported by the regime in Eritrea, and this is not the first time that they have been deployed to duties inside Eritrea, in the wake of the January 2013 attempted coup, they were dispatched to the streets of the capital to quell spread of the uprising. Over the months since then all key security tasks, including presidential guards, were transferred from the Eritrean in favour of TPDM soldiers. In a separate news, air travel in and out of Asmara is suffering severe restrictions with Nas Air's flights having stopped some three months back. Nas Air was privately owned by Mr Nesredin Ibrahim and used to fly to: Juba , Jeddah, Dubai and Nairobi. This afternoon it was, also confirmed that Lufthansa seized operations and it is anticipated that the Eritrean Carrier leased from a Bulgarian company will stop operations on the 23rd of November 2013. The troubled Eritrean Airline is infact a project blighted by incompetence and interference from the government as documented by its previous director, Mr Kiflom Dafla. Currently the operation is managed by Mr. Teklemariam Tedla previously.

October 30, 2013: Eritrea's human rights record comes under fire at United Nations'

(AP) East African nation strongly denies ‘shoot-to-kill’ policy as general assembly hears over 300,000 have fled in past decade Human rights abuses in Eritrea are forcing 2,000-3,000 people to flee the east African nation every month despite a "shoot-to-kill policy" targeting those attempting to leave, a UN investigator said on Thursday. Sheila Keetharuth, the UN special rapporteur on human rights in Eritrea, said the UN refugee agency was concerned about 305,723 Eritreans who have fled over the past decade. The most serious human rights violations are being committed in Eritrea, Keetharuth said, including extrajudicial killings, enforced disappearances, extended incommunicado detention, torture, indefinite national service, and lack of freedom of expression, assembly, religious belief and movement. She told the general assembly's human rights committee that "excessive militarisation" in the country and indefinite national service for all Eritreans aged 18-50, often without adequate remuneration, "causes countless Eritreans to desert from their positions and flee the country".

October 30, 2013: German Airlines Lufthansa stops flights to Eritrea'

FRANKFURT (Reuters) - German airline Lufthansa has stopped flights to Asmara, capital of Eritrea, pending the signing of a new air traffic agreement between Germany and the African state, a spokesman for the airline said on Tuesday. Lufthansa previously flew to Asmara three times a week from Frankfurt via Jedda but cancelled its flights from last weekend. Reservations have been cancelled and flights rebooked via Cairo through Lufthansa's partner Egypt Air, the spokesman added. Eritrean officials were not immediately available to comment. Lufthansa has also decided to drop from December two other African destinations, Libreville in Gabon and Pointe Noire in the Congo Republic. "We stopped flying to those two cities for commercial reasons. They were not profitable," the spokesman said.

The number of Ethio-Eritreans crossing the Shabia administration area is on the rise'

PERSPECTIVE (November 1, 2013) : Ethiopia is one of the oldest and independent countries in Africa. As far as most Ethiopians agreed Eritrea is part of Ethiopia even though the EPRDF and Shabiya ruling members divided the Eritrean state based on their desert agreement without the consent of the Ethiopian people. Eritreans were forced to give their vote based on the wrong perceptions of "freedom or slavery". Reference to making a choice between slavery and freedom was found in two sources. The first was in a story published in The Observer on 28 March 1993. The author reports: The local radio in Asmara describes the referendum choice simply as: 'Do you choose freedom or slavery?' Because of the high level of illiteracy, the ballot papers are coloured. Blue is for YES, red is for NO. Or, as the local radio helpfully puts it, 'Red is for blood.' (Observer 28 March 1993). In an Addis Tribune opinion piece, Dr. Yacob Haile-Mariam wrote: When Eritreans voted in favor of the bizarre referendum question 'do you want to be free?' as if anybody in his right mind would want to be a slave, they voted for a concept known as Eritrea and not for a definite geographic entity (Addis Tribune 3 Dec. 1999). At the end of the day, Eritrean People Libration Front (EPLF), later to be known as Peoples Front for Demcracy and Justice (PFDJ) led by Issaias Affewerki with the support of the Tigray People Liberation Front-TPLF (Hizbawi Woyane) led by the late Prime Minister Meles Zenawi isolated the Eritrean state and its people from Ethiopia which somehow creates hatred among the two people whos some one can clearly understand the drama of the two ruling parties. Finally this creates chaos in the two sides in the pretext of border conflict which lasts for over two years that costs more than 80,000 lives in the two sides.

Having said I want to go back to the main agenda of this paper title. Currently the number of ethio-eritrean crossing the Shabia administration area is more than doubled over the past two years. As per Liya Nuru sources and according to Nur-Hussein Mohammed, Program Coordination Office for Northern Eritrean Office head, the number of Eritreans crossing the border into Ethiopia daily has more than doubled over the past two years taking the total number of Eritrean refugees in Ethiopia to over 82 thousand. A fourth and new camp has been opened at a place called 'Hitsats' in an effort to accommodate the influx. More than five thousand Eritrean refugees have already been received since the opening of the camp some five months back. Of the Eritrean refugees in Ethiopia, over 80 percent are youngsters; 40 percent are ex-soldiers; the remaining are civil servants who have completed national military service. Mandatory national military service, human rights violations and high cost of living are the major factors forcing Eritreans to migrate, some of the refugees have said. With the same token all Ethiopian people are prisoner of conscience since the weyanna/EPRDF administration came to power more than ever. This shows there is a need of cooperation between the Ethiopian and Eritrean to free ourselves from those cruel regimes and bring a democratic Ethiopia. Don't forget the number of peoples who lost and lose their life when they try to evacuate from these dictatorship in the hope of getting a better future and freedom. We are in prison in the free world. We need to stand in unison to free ourselves. "We are in prison in the free world"

November 10, 2013: Italy shipwreck migrants raped, tortured: Police' Rome (AFP) - Dozens of asylum-seekers on a boat that sank near the Italian coast last month with the loss of 366 lives were raped and tortured in Libya before starting their journey, the police said on Friday. A group of 130 migrants from Eritrea were held for ransom in the desert, according to testimony from survivors that led to the arrest of a Somali man in Italy accused of being one of the traffickers. The Somali, Libyan militiamen and Sudanese traffickers all took part in the alleged assaults in a detention centre in Sabha—an oasis in the desert in southwest Libya—that prosecutor Maurizio Scalia likened to "a concentration camp". "They forced us to watch our men being tortured with various methods including batons, electric shocks to the feet. Whoever rebelled was tied up," read the testimony of a 17-year-old Eritrean girl in the investigation, La Repubblica daily reported. The migrants were forced to pay up to $3,500 (2,600 euros) for their freedom and their onward journey to the Libyan coast and a boat to Italy. “The women who could not pay were assaulted,” the girl was quoted as saying in her criminal charge. She also described in horrific detail her own sexual assault, saying that the Somali man—named by police as 34-year-old Elmi Mouhamud Muhidin—was one of the three men who raped her. “They threw me on the ground, held me down and poured fuel on my head. It burnt my hair, then my face, then my eyes. Then the three of them raped me without protection. After a quarter of an hour I was beaten and taken back to the house.” Migrants from Eritrea and Somalia frequently speak of abuses along their journeys to Europe, particularly in an increasingly lawless Libya following the fall of dictator Muammar Kadhafi. Their allegations are rarely investigated, however, and migrant rights groups complain that more international action should be taken to ease their plight in the countries they transit through. The Somali was arrested this week on the remote Italian island of Lampedusa where the October 3 shipwreck happened and has now been flown to Sicily where he faces up to 30 years in prison. The man arrived on the island on October 25 and had been staying in the local migrant centre, pretending to be one of the refugees, investigators said. The police said they had not yet worked out why the man had come to Italy but added that he “may have been looking for criminal contacts”. But he was spotted by some of the survivors who remembered him from their incarceration and risked being lynched by them inside the refugee centre. “He was one of the leaders of the trafficking organisation,” a police spokeswoman told AFP. Another man, the boat’s 35-year-old Tunisian captain Khaled Bensalam, was detained immediately after the tragedy on charges of manslaughter. He was one of the 155 survivors of the tragedy, almost all of whom are still on Lampedusa pending the investigation. Only four minors among the group have been transferred to foster families. A third man, 47-year-old Palestinian Attour Abdalmonem, has also been arrested on people trafficking charges in a separate investigation for allegedly organising a boat of Syrian migrants that also arrived on Lampedusa, the police said. Italian authorities have vowed to crack down on the people trafficking rings that have been behind the influx of more than 35,000 asylum-seekers so far this year to the country’s coasts. Most of them come from Eritrea, Somalia and Syria and Italy has asked for the European Union to step up assistance in dealing with the arrivals and countering the criminal networks behind them.

November 12, 2013: Three Eritrean officers defect to Saudi Arabia – website’

DUBAI REUTERS: Three Eritrean military officers have asked for political asylum in Saudi Arabia after Saudi air force jets forced their aircraft to land in the southern part of the kingdom, the local news website Sabq reported on Tuesday. Sabq quoted Yassin bin Ahmed al-Qassem, a spokesman for the Jazan Emirate, as saying that F-15 planes were deployed when the Eritrean aircraft entered Saudi airspace without permission. “The aircraft forced to land in the King Abdullah bin Abdulaziz airport was carrying three Eritrean officers seeking political asylum,” Sabq quoted Yassin as saying. The Eritraen aircraft were military but used to carry equipment and not fighters, Yassin added. Eritrea, which split from Ethiopia in May, 1991, is one of Africa’s most secretive states and dissent is dealt with harshly. Located on the opposite side of the Red Sea to Saudi Arabia, it has long been at odds with the United States and is accused of human rights abuses by international monitors. In January, dissident soldiers backed by tanks briefly took over the Information Ministry in Asmara, demanding all political prisoners be freed. Calm soon returned to the capital but Eritrean opposition activists in neighbouring Ethiopia cite growing dissent within the army over economic hardships. With a population of about 5.5 million, mass defections have become more common in recent years. In February,18 Eritreans who disappeared from their hotel during a football tournament in Kampala were granted political asylum by Uganda. In April, Saudi media said an Eritrean military pilot sent by Asmara to reclaim a jet stolen by two fellow officers when sought asylum in the kingdom had herself defected. The U.N. refugee agency says more than 250,000 Eritrean refugees and nearly 15,000 asylum seekers live across the Horn of Africa.

November 27, 2013: Eritreans flee en masse their poor and isolated nation – Reuters’

(Reuters) - Ten years ago, Eritrean migrant Habtu hunkered down on the vomit-stained deck of a creaking trawler on the Mediterranean Sea, making the final stage of his perilous bid to reach Europe. It is a trip thousands of Eritreans attempt each year, fleeing one of Africa’s poorest and most isolated nations, a place where army conscription with pitiful pay can last years. Many die on the trek. Probably all of the more than 360 migrants who drowned in a shipwreck off Italy’s coast of Lampeduza in October were Eritreans, though many are still unidentified. So the computer science graduate felt fortunate when his journey across a quarter of Africa via the scorching Sahara brought him to Malta - even if he had hoped to reach Italy, a former colonial power in the Horn of Africa. But his luck ran out when his asylum request was rejected and he was sent home. Now 32, Habtu remains undeterred and wants to make the treacherous trip again, rejoining the flow of often well-educated Africans dreaming of a new life in Europe. “Your only choice is to fight, and one way to fight is to make such journeys,” Habtu told Reuters in Mai-Aini, one of six refugee camps in Ethiopia housing 79,000 Eritreans. “You can’t continue this way.”

Officials say about 40 or 50 Eritreans cross into Ethiopia a day, using camps as way stations on their longer journey north. Camp officials asked that only first names of refugees be used to protect families back in Eritrea, where rights groups say freedoms are trampled on by the state. Asmara denies this. Yet, even if Habtu makes it on his second attempt, he may still face disappointment in Europe. Activists there say those who survive the dangerous trek often end up in badly paid and illegal work, scraping by as house helps or hawking on streets. For some, it can be worse than back home. “Europe is a mirage,” said Kossi Komla-Ebri, 59, a doctor who immigrated to Italy from Togo in the 1970s and who now works with the Afro-Italian community. “People are drawn to Europe with a positive image in their heads. Its a fatal attraction. They don’t realize they will be eating scraps under the table,” he said. But Habtu’s case highlights the difficulty in stopping the illegal migrants, even when they have first hand experience of the dangers. Others have also not been deterred, even as news of the October shipwreck off Italy’s Lampedusa island filters back.

IN TRANSIT: Many Eritreans who spoke to Reuters in Mai-Aini said quietly they still planned to make the journey to Europe from the camp, which lies perched amid craggy hills about 1,200 km (750 miles) north of the Ethiopian capital Addis Ababa. “We need to do everything possible to stop this risky adventure,” said Moses Okello, who is the representative for the U.N. refugee agency UNHCR in Ethiopia, which manages the camps with their rows of cement block huts. “However, no amount of positive intervention in the camps can stop those refugees who come with the intention to use Ethiopia as a transit point,” he said. Many like Habtu have fled from compulsory military service, a requirement for everyone aged 18 to 50. It can run indefinitely. Habtu described a life of virtual servitude in the army, saying he earned a meager $20 a month. Most Eritreans live in poverty. The country’s annual gross national income per capita in 2012 was $450, far below the $1,345 figure for sub-Saharan Africa, World Bank figures show.

Eritrea’s fiercely self-reliant government has turned down aid from the United States, saying such handouts will breed dependency in the nation of 6.1 million people, one of the least developed in the world with an economy based on agriculture. Abdulkadir spent 10 years in Eritrea’s military, including serving in trenches on the frontline of a 1998-2000 war with Ethiopia. He said he was not paid enough to feed himself so he started an illegal trade in food to make ends meet. He was caught and locked up in a makeshift cell - a metal shipping container in the searing heat of Eritrea’s Red Sea coast. Released after a year, he fled the country and reached Egypt. He was shot when trying to cross to neighboring Israel. “We suffered a lot,” Abdulkadir said, rolling up his trousers to show a wound that means he now walks with a cane. “We were also regularly beaten by the traffickers and the women among us were raped,” he said, describing treatment at the hands of Sinai Bedouins who had initially promised to help him and others across. He was then shot at the border and later sent back to Ethiopia where he had been registered as a refugee. The route through Egypt to Israel was until a few years ago a common one for Eritrean migrants, but rising insecurity in Egypt’s Sinai which borders the Jewish state and a new Israeli fence with more patrols mean many now head westwards to Libya.

ESCAPING: From there, traffickers offer berths that can cost more than $1,000 each on barely seaworthy vessels to Europe. Most migrants aim for Italy, though tiny Malta is where many also end up. Of more than 32,000 migrants to reach southern Italy by boat this year, about a third are Eritrean, the United Nations says. The final sea journey can be the most dangerous stage as the Lampedusa sinking highlighted last month. Habtu was on his boat for 34 hours being buffeted by waves before making it to Malta. Eritreans blame their government for the tragedies. "It is well known that the only person responsible for the shipwreck is the Eritrean dictator," said Magda, 20, a political science student in Rome and daughter of two Eritrean immigrants. "If there weren't a dictatorship in Eritrea, 16-year-olds would not be escaping," she said during a protest in Italy. Eritrea dismisses charges of rights abuses. It says it has indefinite military service due to the festering border dispute with Ethiopia. It says conscripts also do development work. After the Lampedusa sinking, Eritrea said the United States encouraged human traffickers to undermine the country. "The prime responsibility for the gross loss of human life, as verified by concrete evidences, squarely rests on the U.S. Administration," Eritrea's Information Ministry said. Washington, which has accepted 5,547 Eritrean refugees from the Ethiopian camps since 2009, rejects the charge. "I think that's nonsense," Anne Richards, U.S. Assistant Secretary for Population, Refugees and Migration, told Reuters at the Mai-Aini. "This problem that prompts them to leave is completely the doing of the Eritrean government."

December 1, 2013: Two Eritrean footballers go missing in Kenya' Two players from Eritrea have gone missing from the CECAFA Senior Challenge Cup 2013 in Kenya ahead of Monday's 2nd December 2013 match against Uganda, according to local news reports coming out of Kenya. Kenyan official in charge of the team Albert Shamola informed futaa.com, a local football news website, of the mysterious disappearance. "The two of the players are nowhere to be seen after yesterday's match where we all attended, at halftime, a section went to relieve themselves and came back for the final half but on our way to the bus, we realized two were missing", Shamola said. "We informed the federation who are in the process of tracing their whereabouts though their identity is still to be known." Other reports state that the CECAFA organizing committee has been briefed Sunday morning about the news of the disappearance of the duo at Nyayo.

"The CECAFA senior challenge cup central organizing committee sitting at Nyayo Stadium has this Sunday morning been briefed of the mysterious disappearance of two Eritrean players from their camp here in Nairobi," read part of the statement released by Cecafa. The matter has since been handed to the relevant security agencies in Kenya that will handle the issues help from the Football Kenya Federation (FKF), an Ugandan news report reads. This is not the first incident of its kind and Eritrean football supporters are used to defecting players. It is the 8th incident where Eritrean players have chosen to defect and leave their team behind during international tournaments. In 2009 twelve members of the national team disappeared in Kenya and sought asylum there during a regional tournament. After being knocked out in the first round of CECAFA against Rwanda in November 2011, the Red Sea Camels did not return home from Tanzania. What must have been by then the B or C team was beaten in the 2012 CECAFA Cup twice (against Malawi and Rwanda) by a draw against non FIFA-Member Zansibar and never made it back home from Uganda. The Red Sea Camels are pooled in Group C alongside defending champions Uganda, Rwanda and Sudan.

December 4, 2013: Up to 30,000 Eritreans 'abducted in Sinai for ransom – BBC'

Eritrean ambassador Tesfamichael Gerahtu: It is a sheer lie

BBC: Up to 30,000 Eritreans have been abducted since 2007 and taken to Egypt's Sinai to suffer torture and ransom demands, new research says. The study, presented to the European parliament, says Eritrean and Sudanese security officers are colluding with the kidnap gangs. At least $600m (£366m) has been extorted from families in ransom payments, it says. Victims are kidnapped in Ethiopia, Sudan and Eritrea and taken to Sinai. Eritrea has denied its officials are involved in the kidnappings. Tens of thousands have been held captive in the mostly lawless Sinai desert Chained together: Most of those targeted are Eritrean refugees fleeing the country, says the report – The Human Trafficking Cycle: Sinai and Beyond. "Their captors are opportunistic criminals looking to profit from their vulnerability," the report says. "[The victims] are then taken to the Sinai and sold, sometimes more than once, to Bedouin groups living in the Sinai." The report was authored by Meron Estefanos, an Eritrean human rights activist in Sweden, and Prof Mirjam van Reisen and Dr Conny Rijken of Tilburg University in the Netherlands. The report says Eritrea's Border Surveillance Unit (BSU) and Sudanese security officials are among the "actors" colluding with the gangs that hold people hostage in the the largely lawless Sinai. "[The hostages] are chained together without toilets or washing facilities and dehydrated, starved and deprived of sleep," the report says.

"They are subject to threats of death and organ harvesting… Those who attempt to escape are severely tortured." Ms Meron told the BBC's Focus on Africa radio programme that one of her cousins was freed after a ransom of $37,000 was paid. The cousin was abducted in Sudan, before being taken to Sinai where her captors tortured and raped her, Ms Meron said. "Almost every Eritrean knows somebody who has been held hostage. Its a very common thing," she told the BBC. The report said the trafficking would have been impossible without the direct involvement of Eritrean security officials, given the "restrictions on movement within the country, the requirement of exit visas at the border and the shoot-to-kill policy for illegal border crossings". However, Eritrea's UK ambassador, Tesfamichael Gerahtu, said Eritrea was a “victim of human trafficking”. The government was “working hard” to arrest and bring to justice criminal gangs operating along its border, he told Focus on Africa. The UN estimates that 3,000 Eritreans fled their repressive and impoverished country each month last year. Many headed for the swollen refugee camps of neighbouring eastern Sudan, now home to more than 90,000 people.

December 4, 2013: Eritrean Military Trafficking Youngsters?

EAN: Eritrean youths are being kidnapped by senior military officers, smuggled into Sudan and held to ransom, according to a report by Dutch and Swedish researchers, the guardian.com has reported. The captives are threatened with being sold to traffickers if they do not raise tens of thousands of dollars. Some are freed if they raise the ransoms, while others are sold off to Bedouin traffickers in Sinai–where they are reportedly tortured to extract further cash from their relatives. Basing their findings on interviews with 230 Eritreans who suffered this fate, the researchers conclude that between 2007 and 2012, some 25,000 to 30,000 people were trafficked. The report, by Meron Estefanos, a Swedish human rights activist, and Professor Mirjam van Reisen and Dr Conny Rijken of Tilburg University in the Netherlands, estimates that $600m has been extracted in this way. In the report, The Human Trafficking Cycle: Sinai and Beyond, published on Wednesday, researchers accuse Eritrea’s Border Surveillance Unit, under the command of General Teklai Kifle (alias Manjus), of being at the heart of these operations. The UN has named the general and several of his senior officers, as being involved in human trafficking, but this is the first time accounts from victims have been published. The Eritrean government requires every pupil to complete their final year of high school by serving in Sawa Military Camp, in the desolate, semi-desert region of eastern Eritrea. This means that most 16- and 17-year old children go there to complete their studies.

The study interviewed an Eritrean woman living in Sweden who told them her son was abducted from the camp. He and six other children were forced into a car by a high-ranking Sawa military officer and driven into Sudan. Once there, they were made to call their parents, who were given three days to pay $ 7,500 or they would be sold to traffickers. Eritreans know what such a fate holds in store: imprisonment in underground cells and systematic torture while their screams are played to relatives on mobile phones. Girls are regularly raped, sometimes repeatedly and in public. Until they can pay up, there is little hope of escape. The unidentified Eritrean woman revealed that upon paying the ransom, the children were freed in the Sudanese capital, Khartoum. The researchers believe this was not an isolated incident. They quote several reports dated October 2013 indicating that 211 children were kidnapped from the camp and a ransom of $10,000 demanded for each of their release. “Some Eritreans are keen to be smuggled out of the country,” Van Reisen told the Guardian, “but some of those who are abducted had no intention of leaving Eritrea.” She cites the example of a mother of three who explained how she was kidnapped in the Eritrean capital, Asmara. The woman, who cannot be named, says she went to a meeting with a business partner in the city. The next thing she remembers was waking up in the Sudanese border town of Kassala. She, and three other captives, were told that if they didn't pay $10,000 each within a few days, they would be sold to Bedouin traffickers in Sinai.

The families of the woman and three men paid the ransom demanded, but instead of being released they were taken to the Sinai, where a further $35,000 was demanded. Eventually some of the hostages were freed, only to be arrested by Egyptian troops. The woman is now reported to be staying in a house in Sinai, waiting to travel to Cairo. Van Reisen and her colleagues say that many Eritreans do not survive the trafficking and the torture. They estimate that between 5,000 and 10,000 of the hostages died or were killed in captivity. In some groups as many as half lost their lives. Children as young as two or three years old are reported to be among the victims. Even after they escape the clutches of the traffickers, Eritreans are not safe. In 2012 the Israeli government adopted an anti-infiltration law – using a term normally reserved for Palestinians attempting to enter the country. This definition has been extended to African migrants, and since July 2012 refugees and asylum seekers entering Israel have been detained. A new fence has been built along the Israel-Egyptian border in Sinai, and groups of Eritrean survivors of torture huddle against it, unable to proceed.

December 7, 2013: Eritrea/Ethiopia: Sudan's secret peace talks - Sudan mediates indirect peace talks between the two' Top News: Mohammed Amin, a journalist based in Khartoum, reports Eritrea and Ethiopia are in 'secret talks' mediated by Sudanese President, Omar Hassan al-Bashir. The report says Bashir initiated the indirect talks between leaders of both countries with the view of discussing border and political issues. "We started some efforts to normalize the relations between Ethiopia and Eritrea," President al-Bashir said, in a joint statement with Ethiopian Prime Minister, Hailemariam Desalegn. Sudan, which sees itself as a having friendly relations with both countries, wants to open discussions between both governments.. "I will call the two presidents to hold a summit in Khartoum in the [near future]," Bashir said. Last year, South Sudan, which is tangled in its own border dispute with Sudan, said it planned to start shuttle diplomacy between Eritrea and Ethiopia that have yet to materialize.

Ethiopia and Eritrea: Brothers at war no more'

New internal and external dynamics are shaping the relations between the two countries.

Commentary By Kjetil Tronvoll & Goitom Guebre Leul (December 8, 2013)

The fighting was brought to an end with the signing of the Algiers Peace Agreement and establishment of the Ethiopia-Eritrea Border Commission (EEBC) in 2000. However, Ethiopia's refusal to implement the rulings of the EEBC prior to negotiations and Eritrea's insistence on an unconditional and immediate demarcation of the border have locked the two governments in an intractable stalemate. Despite the official cessation of hostilities, Ethiopia and Eritrea continued their war through proxies by supporting various rebel-movements throughout the Horn of Africa. In this way, they have been fuelling conflict and instability in each other's countries as well as the wider region. 13 years after the Algiers Peace Agreement, domestic conditions in both states and the regional geopolitical equation have undergone substantial changes. Ethiopia lost its long-time strongman,

The relationship between Eritrea and Ethiopia is arguably the most important and volatile in East Africa. The fall-out between the former brothers-in-arms initiated a two-year-long border war in 1998, which claimed around 100,000 causalities, cost billions of dollars, and continues to serve as the main source of regional instability in the Horn of Africa. The fighting was brought to an end with the signing of the Algiers Peace Agreement and establishment of the Ethiopia-Eritrea Border Commission (EEBC) in 2000. However, Ethiopia's refusal to implement the rulings of the EEBC prior to negotiations and Eritrea's insistence on an unconditional and immediate demarcation of the border, have locked the two governments in an intractable stalemate.

Despite the official cessation of hostilities in 2000, Ethiopia and Eritrea continued their war through proxies by supporting various rebel movements throughout the Horn of Africa. In this way, they have been fuelling conflict and instability in each other's countries as well as the wider region. Thirteen years after the Algiers Peace Agreement, domestic conditions in both states and the regional geopolitical equation have undergone substantial changes. Ethiopia lost its long-time strongman, Meles Zenawi, in 2012. There are strong indications that Eritrea is also very likely to see the departure of its own leader, President Isaias Afwerki, in the near future. Moreover, Ethiopia has been experiencing robust economic growth and political stability over the last decade, a development that has also coincided with a significant weakening of its regional adversaries.

The political standoff between Ethiopia and Eritrea has very much been tied to the role, interests and historical experiences of particular individuals and circles that hail from one generation - the Marxist-Leninist student movements turned guerrilla fighters in the 1960s and 1970s. With the political and generational changes that are taking place in both countries, a normalisation of relations between these two states might take place in the not so distant future.

A new chapter: In Addis Ababa, the discourse on Eritrea has evolved from initially being considered a significant military threat next door to that of concerns over state collapse, civil war and its security implications. Ethiopia's ruling EPRDF (Ethiopian People's Revolutionary Democratic Front) government faced, as recently as 2007, the tactical alliance of Eritrea, Ethiopian armed rebels and factions in Somalia (such as the Islamic Courts Union - ICU). To many observers the security equation seemed at that time to be in favour of this alliance.

In a significant turn of developments, Eritrea underwent a process of rapid economic, political and humanitarian decline - a clear indicator of which is its emergence as one of the top refugee producing countries in the world.
In Somalia the ICU has been eliminated, and its successor al-Shabab has also been dealt a blow that it is unlikely to recover from.

Armed Ethiopian insurgent groups, such as the Oromo Liberation Front and Ogaden National Liberation Front, have largely declined, due to, among other things, their inability to remain cohesive. In addition to this, the Ethiopian economy - and consequently its military power - has undergone sustained growth over the last decade.

Asmara's support for Somali-based rebel groups made it an international pariah and target of a regime under UN sanctions. Although Eritrea is not the only actor to engage in such actions (Ethiopia harbours a dozen Eritrean rebel-groups), the consequences have been particularly severe for Eritrea. This is mainly due to its choice of allies in Somalia, which happened to be at loggerheads with much of the regional and international community. President Isaias Afwerki's inability to play the diplomatic game and persuade the international community to support, or at least understand his viewpoint, created conducive conditions for the late PM Zenawi - who succeeded where Afwerki failed. The main concern for policy-makers in Addis Ababa is no longer Asmara's military capacity, but rather the possibility of Eritrea plunging into chaos. This fear is apparently so daunting to Ethiopia that it may prefer a reformed Eritrean government led by People's Front for Democracy and Justice (PFDJ), rather than the insecurities of a violent power transition next door. On two occasions this year the current Ethiopian PM Hailemariam Desalegn has signalled his government's interest in dialogue and his willingness to go to Asmara at anytime for peace talks without any pre-conditions.

The delicate issue of Badme: At the heart of the stalemate are symbolic politics and domestic constraints on both sides - of which the contested border-town of Bademe is an embodiment. It is very possible that the EPRDF will hand over the symbolic town of Bademe to Eritrea - which was awarded to the latter by the EEBC - but it can only get away with such a move domestically by selling it as a necessary sacrifice for a comprehensive and durable peace. The fact that the individuals leading the current Ethiopian government did not take part in the decision-making processes of the border war and subsequent peace agreement means that they are less constrained by the commitments of their predecessors. For President Affewerki, on the other hand, the stakes are much higher. In fact, resolving the stalemate is likely to create more challenges than benefits to his personal power base. The suspension of the parliament and the constitution, the universal and indefinite military conscription policy, and in general the system of one-man rule have all been justified by the need to counter the "Ethiopian threat". A settlement of the border issue would eliminate the rationale for maintaining this system and would undoubtedly lead to new domestic demands for addressing the nation's many political and humanitarian problems.

'Brothers at war' Sentimental notions of brotherhood, betrayal, and ethnic-stereotypes have shaped the manner in which Ethiopia's EPRDF and Eritrea's PFDJ ruling parties have been relating to each other since the days of the guerrilla struggle. The cultural and political intimacy and sense of fraternity that developed during their time as rebel movements led both parties to delay institutionalising the relationship between their newly established regimes in 1993 - and thus made possible the border war. These sentimental aspects also played an important role in making the conflict prolonged and eventually intractable. This sense of "intimacy" has also had some positive implications. One such effect is the preferential treatment given to Eritrean refugees in Ethiopia - who now number around 100,000 people. Eritrean refugees - provided that they satisfy certain criteria - are given residency and work permits and the opportunity to study in Ethiopian universities (as opposed to refugees from other neighbouring countries). Around 1,200 university scholarships have so far been offered to Eritrean refugees. However, the passing of time has brought with it substantial changes, and the more than a decade-long political and physical barriers led to an increasing cultural disconnectedness even among the people that live along the border. In Addis Ababa and other urban centres, it is even more challenging to arouse interest for Eritrean affairs among the average Ethiopian.

Post-Zenawi and post-Affewerki: A refugee crisis, high-level defections, and a recent mutiny in the army, are some of many indications that Affewerki's regime is facing an existential threat that may lead to its demise in the near future. Afwerki is now on "survival mode" and may engage in new and desperate gestures to prolong his time in power, such as opening up to the international community for dialogue and humanitarian aid. However, if his past behaviour is anything to go by, such moves are only likely to be tactical survival manoeuvres that will not reverse the current political trajectory. It is now time to think about what the relationship between these two states will look like without the two omnipresent strongmen that have heavily shaped their histories. In Ethiopia this process of change has already begun, and the time when both countries will be led by a generation without the historical and political baggage inherited from the liberation war, the border war and subsequent peace settlement might not be far ahead in time. Free from these constraints, the post-Affewerki and post-Zenawi Eritrea-Ethiopia relations will most likely, not only be normalised, but also much more institutionalised. Kjetil Tronvoll is a professor of peace and conflict studies at Bjorknes College, and Senior Partner at the International Law and Policy Institute. He has written Brothers at War: Making Sense of the Ethiopian-Eritrean War and The Lasting

Struggle for Freedom in Eritrea: Human Rights and Political Development, 1991-2009. Goitom

Guebre Leul is an advisor at the International Law and Policy Institute. He has previously worked for the Norwegian government (Norad) and taught foreign policy studies at Mekelle University, Ethiopia.

December 9, 2013: Eritrea's Soccer Coach, and 8 Players Defect During CECAFA Cup'

NAIROBI, KENYA: The coach of the Eritrean national football team Omer Ahmed and eight of his players have disappeared in Kenya in order to defect, IBTimes UK can exclusively report. The defection follows last week's disappearance of two members of the national team. The Red Sea Camels are in Kenya for the Cecafa Cup. The players went into hiding in an undisclosed location in Kenya and are now seeking UNHR protection. "We are hiding because police from the Eritrean embassy are hunting us," one unnamed player told IBTimes UK. "The reason why we are fleeing is obvious and doesn't need to be repeated." It is not the first time players from the national squad have defected abroad. Last December, 17 players and the team doctor claimed asylum in Uganda. In 2009, a dozen members of the national team disappeared in Kenya. "Our main concern is safety, that's why we are seeking UN protection," the player told IBTimes UK.

"Once we are protected and safe, we can go to a democratic and safe country." The men also fear backlash back at home, where they have left family and children. "We are really scared and anything scares us at the moment. We want people to know and sympathise with us," he said. Eritrea is considered one of the continent's most opaque countries. National elections have not been held since it gained independence in 1993. The country is governed by the one-party authoritarian rule of President Isaias Afewerki, who has been in power for 20 years. Torture, arbitrary detention and severe restrictions on freedom of expression are routine. Mandatory military service imposed on all men and women between 18 and 55 is one of the main causes of flight from the country. It has been calculated that 4,000 Eritreans leave the country every month and, according to a 2008 estimate, 40,000 Eritreans live in Britain. A recent study stated that between 2007 and 2012, some 25,000 to 30,000 Eritrean migrants were trafficked by Eritrean and Sudanese security officers, who collude with Bedouin gangs in the Sinai.

ERITREA/ETHIOPIA: DEBATE - Time to Bring Eritrea in From the Cold' By Herman Hank Cohen (December 16, 2013)

ANALYSIS: After being part of Ethiopia for forty years, the people of Eritrea held a referendum in April 1993 and decided to establish an independent state. The referendum took place in the aftermath of a thirty-year insurgency against two successive Ethiopian regimes waged by the Eritrean Peoples Liberation Front (EPLF). At the same time, an allied insurgent group, the Tigrean Peoples Liberation Front (TPLF), took over power in the Ethiopian capital, Addis Ababa, after the military collapse of the Soviet-supported regime headed by President Mengistu Haile Mariam.

Between 1993 and 1998, the two “brother” governments of Eritrea and Ethiopia, headed by the EPLF and TPLF, enjoyed excellent relations. They maintained a common economic system that allowed landlocked Ethiopia full access to the Eritrean Red Sea ports of Asab and Masawa, including control of their own handling facilities for the transit of cargo. The relationship started to cool in 1997 when the Eritreans created their own currency, the Nakfa. They did this without arranging to establish a system of daily settlements for cross border trade between their currency and the Ethiopian Birrh. This could have been done through a facility provided by the International Monetary Fund. Without such a facility in place, the Ethiopian Government announced that all cross border trade had to be settled in US Dollars. This resulted in a financial setback for Eritrea because of its limited access to hard currencies.

In 1998, the Eritrean Government complained that Ethiopian government representatives, including police, were beginning to encroach on Eritrean territory near the border town of Badme in southwest Eritrea. According to Eritrean sources, four of their police officers who went to Badme to investigate turned up dead. Again, the Eritreans said that they had no choice but to retaliate with military force against the alleged Ethiopian encroachments and murder of their policemen. The Ethiopian Government denied all of the Eritrean allegations about encroachments and the killing of Eritrean policemen, claiming that the Eritrean military attack was totally unjustified. Instead of negotiations, the Eritrean action triggered a massive Ethiopian armed response, unleashing a major bilateral war that lasted two years, and that caused approximately 100,000 dead and wounded on both sides. Under Algerian Government mediation, a cease-fire was accomplished in 2000. In view of the border as the ostensible main issue in contention, the Algerians established the Ethiopia-Eritrea Border Commission (EEBC) to arbitrate the exact boundary line. While the EEBC was doing its work, the long border remained heavily armed on both sides. The results of the EEBC arbitration upheld Eritrea’s main claims on the border delineation. The Ethiopian Government made a public statement agreeing to the arbitration result, but insisted that it would not proceed to delineate the final border settlement until they could have bilateral discussions with Eritrea. The Government of Eritrea declared that it was open to discussions without any preconditions, but insisted that Ethiopia first had to delineate the border pursuant to the arbitration decision. This total stalemate in the bilateral relationship has continued until the present, with both governments holding to their inflexible positions.

Because of the stalemate, the border has remained heavily armed on both sides. This situation has caused particular hardship to Eritrea. Because of the country’s small population, young men conscripted into the armed forces to patrol the long border have had to serve for indefinite periods without knowing when they would be demobilized and returned to their families. As a result, over the past decade thousands of young Eritrean have ‘illegally’ left their country to seek asylum in the other countries, including Ethiopia, Egypt, Israel, the Emirates and southern Europe. In addition to the expensive armed camps on both sides of the border, the situation of 'no peace – no war' has resulted in a total stoppage of cross border trade, and the loss to Ethiopia of Eritrea's convenient nearby ports for Ethiopia's exports and imports. Ethiopia's only access to the ocean since the war began has been via the 900 mile antiquated railway from Addis Abeba to the port of the neighboring country of Djibouti at the entrance to the Indian Ocean from the Red Sea. In addition to the long distance between Djibouti and Addis Abeba, port fees in Djibouti are excessively high. To make matters worse, both Ethiopia and Eritrea have become ensnarled in the chaos of Somalia since that government collapsed in 1991. The rise of the Islamist group Al Shabab, with abundant assistance from al-Qaeda in the Arabian Peninsula caused Ethiopia to send troops to Somalia at various points from 2006 to the present day. Between 2006 and 2010, the security crisis in Somalia has caused relations between Eritrea and the United States to deteriorate badly. In 2008, the George W. Bush Administration declared Eritrea to be a "state sponsor of terrorism", thereby triggering US trade, investment, and travel sanctions against Eritrea and its leaders.

The reason was the identification of Somali Islamist extremists attending a Somali political dialogue meeting in Eritrea. Indeed, this caused the US Government to become so enraged that the American Assistant Secretary of State for Africa expressed to desire to reopen the EEBC arbitration decision in order to favor the Ethiopian border claims. This request was not adopted. The Obama administration accused the Eritrean Government of allowing the transit of arms to Al-Shabab – the reason for this alleged support being that Eritrea wanted to help an enemy of Ethiopia, thereby putting pressure on its neighbour to implement the arbitration decision. In 2009, Senior Etritrean officials met in Rome with the American Permanent Representative to the UN, Susan Rice, and the US Assistant Secretary of State for Africa, Ambassador Johnny Carson. The American delegation was apparently not satisfied with the Eritrean rebuttal of the allegations about their allowing the transit of arms to al Shabab. There were also accusations of Eritrean support to insurgents opposing the Ethiopian regime from within. As a result, Ambassador Susan Rice introduced a resolution in the UN Security Council calling for sanctions against Eritrea.

The resolution, UNSC 1907, was enacted in a watered down version of the original harsh US draft, but nevertheless caused Eritrea to become something of an international pariah. This situation continues. However, as far as external support for Shabaab is concerned, all available intelligence indicates that Eritrea has not had any contact since 2009. Earlier intelligence reports, denied by Eritrea as fabricated, indicated Eritrean facilitating the transfer of funds to Shabaab – nothing of that sort has been reported since 2009 by any source. Those of us who know Eritrea well understand that the Eritrean leadership fears Islamic militancy as much as any other country in the Horn of Africa region. In recent months, positive signals have been coming from both countries. Eritrean

President Isaias Afewerke has been quoted as saying that Eritrea cannot fulfill its destiny without Ethiopia. The Prime Minister of Ethiopia, Hailemariam Desalegn, has said that he is willing to go to Eritrea to engage in dialogue. In short, the wartime tensions of 1998-2000 no longer have a logical basis for continuing to exist. Normalization of Ethiopian-Eritrean relations promises a win-win future for both nations. In view of the absence of any intelligence, real or fabricated, linking Eritrea with Shabaab for over four years, the UN Security Council should terminate sanctions imposed in 2009 by UNSC resolution 1907.

Since European Union governments have maintained normal relations with Eritrea since the country's independence, one of the European members of the UN Security Council should propose a resolution to end the sanctions.
The US should agree to abstain rather than veto such a resolution. To break the stalemate between Eritrea and Ethiopia over the implementation of the EEBC boundary decision, there needs to be a mutually face-saving solution. I propose that Ethiopia offer to accept a symbolic initial takeover by Eritrea of territory awarded by the EEBC, followed by the same day opening of dialogue with a totally open agenda. This dialogue could have the benefit of a neutral mediator, or not, depending on the wishes of the two governments. Here again, one of the neutral Europeans should have the ability to inspire confidence in both sides.A normalization of relations, following the end of UN sanctions against Eritrea, would have immediate benefits for both countries. A resumption of Ethiopian use of Eritrean ports would provide economic benefits to both countries with trade resuming in both directions. Both sides would also be able to demobilise the border with important cost savings. Both countries, of course, continue to have important human rights issues. Normalization of bilateral relations would make it easier for the US and the international community to encourage political and governance reforms. Finally, the normalization of relations between the United States and Eritrea would open the door to military-to-military cooperation of the type that would enlist Eritrea in the war against Islamic terrorism in the Horn coming from across the Red Sea. Yes, the time has come to bring Eritrea in from the cold. Herman J. Hank Cohen is Former Assistant Secretary of State for Africa.

December 19, 2013: The entire Eritrean football team missing in Kenya, more players go missing'

Nairobi (IANS) A dozen members of the Eritrean team for the regional CECAFA Senior Challenge Cup that went missing in Kenya cannot be traced as the regional football governing body is set to discuss the next course of action against the act. CECAFA (Council for East and Central Africa Football Associations) secretary general, Nicholas Musonye and Nairobi police boss, Benson Kibui, confirmed Wednesday that the 12, including the head coach, Omer Ahmed and captain Haile Goitom who abandoned their team are yet to be found, reports Xinhua.

“We will discuss the situation with Eritrea at our next general assembly since we cannot let them use CECAFA to run away from their country,” Musonye stated.Among measures set to be taken against Eritrea are banning the team from the competition altogether. He was, however, non committal when pressed why security was not tightened around the squad when initially, two players left the team ahead of their second Group B match Nov 31 despite assurances that measures would be implemented.

“That is now a police case and we are waiting for the conclusion of the investigations. After two disappeared, another nine players and the coach joined them when their tournament ended (at the group stage),” Musonye added. On his part, Kibui once again claimed his office was yet to receive a formal report from CECAFA but investigations were ongoing. “I will follow it up with department of immigration and find out where they are,” the police chief added. In total, 24 Eritrean nationals have vanished on Kenyan soil during the regional event, with a dozen going missing in 2009 to match those who fled this year. In what is becoming a ritual, a batch of seven also abandoned the team in Kampala last year having skipped the 2010 and 2011 editions.

December 23, 2013: ERITREA - Prison Census 211 journalists jailed worldwide -CPJ’

Saleh Idris Gama, Eri-TV
Tesfalidet Kidane Tesfazghi, Eri-TV
Imprisoned: December 2006

Tesfalidet, a producer for Eritrea’s state broadcaster Eri-TV, and Saleh, a cameraman, were arrested in late 2006 on the Kenya-Somalia border during Ethiopia’s invasion of southern Somalia.

The Ethiopian Foreign Ministry first disclosed the detention of the journalists in April 2007, and presented them on state television as part of a group of 41 captured terrorism suspects, according to CPJ research. Though Eritrea often conscripted journalists into military service, the video did not present any evidence linking the journalists to military activity.

The Ethiopian ministry pledged to subject some of the suspects to military trials but did not identify them by name. In a September 2011 press conference with exiled Eritrean journalists in Addis Ababa, the late Prime Minister Meles Zenawi said Saleh and Tesfalidet would be freed if investigations determined they were not involved in espionage, according to news reports and journalists who participated in the press conference.

But Tesfalidet and Saleh had not been tried by late 2013, and authorities disclosed no information about legal proceedings against them, according to local journalists. Authorities also did not disclose any information about their health or whereabouts.

December 31, 2013: 233 Migrants Rescued from 33-foot Boat in Rough Seas off Italy’

ROME – The Italian navy has rescued 233 migrants from an overcrowded smugglers' boat in rough seas south of Sicily. The navy said one of its frigates was bringing the migrants — who were from Pakistan, Eritrea, Nigeria, Somalia, Zambia and Mali — into a Sicilian port. They were initially rescued by another naval vessel on some 80 miles south of the tiny Italian island of Lampedusa. Officials said the migrants had been spotted in a 33-foot boat without any life vests. In one of the worst disasters of Europe's immigration crisis, over 300 migrants from various countries mainly from Eritrea were killed in a shipwreck off Lampedusa last October. Each year, thousands of African, Asian or Middle Eastern migrants attempt risky voyages across the Mediterranean Sea in unseaworthy boats, and hundreds die en route. Unless they are eligible for asylum or have families or jobs in Europe, they risk expulsion by Italy.

December 31, 2013 ERITREA- Hirgigo plant to supply mines'

AEI - According to sources, the second stage of the Hirgigo thermal power plant in Eritrea, which will increase output from 88 MW to 132 MW thanks to the Shanghai Corporation for Foreign Economic and Technological Cooperation (SCFETC), is expected to be completed early in the new year.

ERITRO/ETHIOPIA Leaders of Ethiopia and Eritrea are more willing to end their conflict'

This is not a rejoinder to Hank Cohen's piece - Time to Bring Eritrea in from the Cold - published by African Arguments on 16 December 2013. It is rather an analysis of the same issue with the added suggestion that it will be exceedingly difficult to achieve the laudable goals identified by Ambassador Cohen. I agree with Cohen that it is long past time to end the stalemate between Ethiopia and Eritrea. It is also time for the United States to try again to improve relations with Eritrea. I accept there is no solid evidence that Eritrea is continuing its support for the al-Shabaab terrorist organization in Somalia, thus removing this argument from the list of reasons that obstruct better relations. Finally, there is some evidence that both the leaders of Ethiopia and Eritrea are more willing to see an end to their conflict. President Isaias Afewerki's silence following the death in 2012 of Prime Minister Meles Zenawi was also helpful.

But it is important to take into account the complicated background that led to this conflict. The movement of Eritrean troops into Ethiopia in May 1998 represented the culmination of a long list of grievances on both sides of the Ethiopia-Eritrea border. With the benefit of hindsight, there were many warning signs that no one seemed to appreciate at the time. While the Tigrayan People's Liberation Front (TPLF) of Meles Zenawi and the Eritrean People's Liberation Front (EPLF) of Isaias Afewerki often cooperated in their battle to remove the Derg regime from Ethiopia, they also periodically had tactical and strategic differences. In the post-Derg euphoria, these earlier disagreements were usually overlooked by outsiders.

More importantly, the very systems of government established in Ethiopia and Eritrea after the fall of the Derg were significantly different and not much appreciated in each other's capital. Isaias especially thought Meles' concept of ethnic federalism was misguided. There was and perhaps still is a negative psychological element to the relationship, at least for Ethiopia's Tigrayans who live on the other side of the Eritrean border. Many Tigrayans believed that the more highly educated Eritreans with their experience of Italian colonialism looked down on Tigrayans. Some Ethiopians perceived that Eritreans saw them as fodder for filling low level positions in an Eritrea that would become the industrial center of the region. Ethiopia would be the source of cheap labor and Eritrea would reap the developmental advantage. It is not important if this perception was accurate; perception becomes reality. Ethiopia had every intention of creating its own industrial sector, which was already in progress.

Eritrea created its own currency, the Nakfa, to replace its use of the Ethiopian Birr. This was not a surprise and, in fact, in an interview with an Eritrean publication in May 1997 Prime Minister Meles said it is "necessary" that Eritrea have its own currency and issuance of the Nakfa "will not affect the relationship of the two countries." But the handling of this issue did become one of many reasons for the breakdown in trust between Addis Ababa and Asmara. Eritrea announced in July 1997 that the Nakfa and the Birr would circulate on both sides of the border and it would retain its stock of Birr for use as it desired. Ethiopia saw this arrangement as unfair, announced a trade policy based on hard currency and letters of credit, and immediately issued new Birr so that Eritrea's Birr holdings would be worthless. Since the overthrow of the Derg, Ethiopia had obtained much of its refined petroleum from an antiquated Eritrean refinery in Assab. Eritrea asked Ethiopia to increase the share it obtained from the refinery and demanded additional payment in hard currency.

Ethiopia balked at this arrangement and by the summer of 1997 began to import refined petroleum products elsewhere rather than rely on the Assab refinery. It also shifted more of its imports to Djibouti. Once Ethiopia terminated use of the Assab refinery, the facility became uneconomical and Eritrea closed it down. This also forced Eritrea to import its fuel needs in hard currency and at higher cost. There were several small border incidents preceding the May 1998 conflict that were never made a major public issue by either Ethiopia or Eritrea. The most serious one occurred in July 1997 at Adi Murug in the Bada area of Eritrea. Eritrea claimed publicly after the outbreak of conflict in 1998 that two battalions of the Ethiopian army came to Adi Murug, declared it Ethiopian territory and appointed an Ethiopian administrative committee. Ethiopia claimed that it only briefly entered Eritrea in hot pursuit of remnants of the Afar opposition and then returned to Ethiopia.

Then there was the appearance of the map prepared by the Ethiopian Central Statistical Office for the 1994 census that indicated Ethiopia claimed areas to the west of the diagonal border (the Badme area) separating southwest Eritrea and western Tigray between the Mereb and Setit Rivers. The map also suggested Ethiopia claimed additional small pieces of territory that virtually all other maps show as part of Eritrea. In 1997, the issue returned when the regional government in Tigray issued a similar map. Ethiopia never provided a convincing response as to why these maps appeared. All of these issues, including some other lesser ones, provided the backdrop for the outbreak of conflict in 1998. Following several minor, alleged incursions by Eritrean forces into territory administered by Ethiopia, there was an incident in the vicinity of Badme on 6 May 1998 involving Eritrean regular forces and hardened TPLF local militia.

According to a well-informed Ethiopian account, there were eight deaths on the Eritrean side and none on the Ethiopian side, suggesting the likelihood of an ambush. Eritrea sent a negotiating team to Addis Ababa to resolve the matter. That team unexpectedly returned to Asmara on 10 May and within 24 hours, Eritrea invaded the Badme region, which had been administered by Ethiopia, with a large military force. Thus began a conventional type war on 12 May in which an estimated 100,000 soldiers on both sides perished in the next two years. Time does tend to heal wounds, but both the Ethiopians and Eritreans have long memories and it is not clear how much of this baggage they can put aside.

Much of the discussion since the outbreak of conflict in 1998 has focused on Badme, which is only symbolic of greater differences. Ethiopians and Eritreans must conclude it is in their mutual interest to normalize relations and then begin to solve these political, economic, social, and geographical disputes. Ethiopia needs to approach the problem with the understanding that it probably has to give up control over Badme. In effect, it has already acknowledged this possibility. Eritrea needs to be more flexible on the sequencing of issues. It would be helpful to drop its demand that Badme be turned over first so that negotiations on other issues can begin. Both sides must also understand that small, mutually agreeable changes need to be made along other sections of the disputed border.

It is important that all of the economic differences be on the table, including future long-term access to the port of Assab by land-locked Ethiopia. Trade, open borders, telephone links, and air travel need to return to normal. Eritreans and Ethiopians should be able to move across the border without difficulty and, following the laws in each country, work there. All of this is hard and will take many months to sort out, but Ambassador Cohen is correct that it is time to make the effort. As for the improvement of relations between the United States and Eritrea, I also agree this would be a positive development. The United States does have a small embassy in Asmara headed by a charge d’affairs. On several occasions in recent years, Washington has explored the possibility of improving relations with Asmara. They have come to nothing and not just because of U.S. concerns about earlier Eritrean support for al-Shabaab in Somalia.

Even if it is now possible to put this concern aside, it is not clear that President Isaias is truly interested in improving relations with the United States.There is not much point in assigning an ambassador to Asmara if he/she does not have regular access to the senior levels of the Eritrean government. This is not an excuse for Washington to do nothing, but it is important to understand that the reluctance is not necessarily confined to one side. Whatever Washington does in the coming months, its relationship with Addis Ababa is more important than the one with Asmara. Although the United States might decide to try again to improve relations with Eritrea, it will not do so at the expense of its ties with Ethiopia. Ideally, the United States, Ethiopia and Eritrea will collectively decide the time has come to normalize/improve relations so that Eritrea can come in from the cold. David Shinn was the U.S. ambassador to Ethiopia from 1996 to 1999. He blogs at: http://davidshinn.blogspot.co.uk/ This article is part of an ongoing series examining the current state of relations between Ethiopia and Eritrea.

ERITREA/ETHIOPIA: DEBATE - Bringing Eritrea in From the Cold - We Need to UN-Break the U.S.-Ethiopia-Eritrea Triangle' Analysis (January 17, 2014) - Eritrea which lies at the border of Sudan to the west, Ethiopia in the south, and Djibouti in the east. In a span of a month, three towering figures - if retired - in American foreign policy establishment on Africa publicly called for an end to the Eritrean-Ethiopian conflict and the rapprochement between the United States and Eritrea.

In mid-December 2013, former Assistant Secretary of State for African Affairs Herman Cohen argued that bringing "Eritrea in from the cold" was overdue. On January 13th, onetime US Ambassador to Ethiopia David Shinn concurred and offered a critical analysis of the context leading up to and sustaining the Eritrean-Ethiopian deadlock, which deteriorated US relations with its former Horn of Africa ally, Eritrea. The next day, Ambassador Princeton Lyman, who recently spearheaded US diplomatic initiatives on Sudan and South Sudan, also welcomed Cohen's call for an US-Eritrean rapprochement but opined that the estrangement persisted not for lack of trying to break it.

While Cohen did not say anything that implies the process would be easy, Shinn and Lyman are right to point out the difficulty - past and future.

All these are welcome signs of - or at least invitations for - the much needed thawing of relations between the United States and Eritrea, which have shared, albeit underappreciated, strategic interests in the Red Sea basin.

Moreover, such critical interjections bid well for a resolution to the Eritrean-Ethiopian impasse and an improvement of their relations, critical for regional stability and international security. Some points deserve to be regurgitated and a few others demand added emphasis to draw the sober attention of all concerned.

The United States is not an innocent bystander in its estrangement with Eritrea nor has it by any measure been a neutral broker in the broken relations between its former allies, Eritrea and Ethiopia.

US-Eritrean relations deteriorated first because Washington betrayed its role as a guarantor of the June 2000 Algiers Agreement and tolerated - if not encouraged - Addis Ababa to renege on the binding ruling of the international court that in 2002 awarded to Eritrea the flash point of the border dispute.

Against the advice of seasoned career diplomats, political appointees of the George W. Bush Administration were brazen in their search for alternatives to what had by then entered the books of international law.

Eritrea's refusal to budge, its insistence on the implementation of the EEBC ruling first, and its pursuit of what its leaders call an independent foreign policy did not sit well with the powers that be.

When the Obama Administration took over, the figures who had helped negotiate the difficult peace agreement came back full force.

But, while leftover personal ill feelings cannot be discounted, eight years of misguided US policies and Eritrean vitriol limited their options.

Instead of being flexible and creative within the little room that they had left, the new foreign policy team lazily maintained the entrenched eight-year old policy: upping the pressure on Eritrea and pushing it further into the corner until it is cowed into line.

In 2009, Washington crafted a United Nations Security Council resolution to punish Asmara on the basis of some unverified and some unverifiable claims, and other utter fabrications of the Somalia Eritrea Monitoring Group.

In maintaining the sanctions, American foreign policy architects were so adamant that in late December 2011 they created a dangerous precedent of denying the head of state of a UN member, and a defendant in a serious case at that, a hearing at the Security Council.

The methodical denial of Eritrea's right took place in three steps: The Security Council Presidency procrastinated to acknowledge and grant the request of President Isaias Afwerki to address the world body during its debate on the motion to renew the sanctions against Eritrea.

Once that hurdle was overcome, the United States Embassy in Asmara delayed issuing the Eritrean president a US visa to enable him to travel to New York.

And finally, the Security Council President, Ambassador Nelson Messone of Gabon (also an U.S. citizen), suddenly put the motion in 'blue', i.e. on an expedited track, for no good reason.

The long laundry list of Washington's consequential malice against little Eritrea during the short decade comes on the heels of an even longer-established, far more devastating American hostility toward the existence of an independent Eritrea, a baggage that Eritreans are quick to point to.

While seemingly impossible, however, it is not inconceivable for US-Eritrea relations to start afresh from a cleaner slate in spite, and not because, of their history.

That will first and foremost require US appreciation of its strategic interests with and in a stable Eritrean state and that it should endeavor to make the latter sustainable; an acknowledgment by both Eritrean and American policy makers that the US is not the custodian of resuming relations between Asmara and Addis Ababa; and a recognition that there may be other actors working to restore relations between the two countries (or, for that matter, to spoil them even further).

In late 2008, the then Ethiopia PM Meles Zenawi confided in an individual intermediary that he was prepared to pull Ethiopian troops out of Eritrean territory if President Isaias Afwerki provided credible assurances that he would allow the normalization of relations between the two countries - which the latter did. That promising initiative faltered because of unwarranted aggressive external intrusion.

Were Ethiopian leaders to reaffirm their unconditional acceptance of the EEBC ruling and give similar assurances to unilaterally withdraw their forces from all occupied Eritrean territories, it may be worthwhile for Eritrea of its own volition to consider an alternative to the sequencing of issues.

The least evil of the available choices - and one that may not have been considered before - may be for a neutral international force acceptable to Asmara (Sudan, Qatar, Turkey, India, Pakistan) to step in the place of the withdrawing Ethiopian forces for a limited agreed up on time (and ideally not exceeding 30 days).

The two countries would commit that, once Ethiopian withdrawals are completed, they would take meaningful steps during the specified timeframe to normalize relations and lay substantive parameters of physically demarcating their borders on the ground.

But pushing for such a creative compromise and asking Eritrea to make such a hefty concession will require adequate understanding of and preparation for the fact that, in the absence of the intellectually formidable, diplomatically savvy and politically domineering Meles Zenawi, dealing with Ethiopia is not quite the same.

There now are at least half a dozen powerful personalities running Ethiopia (Prime Minister Hailemariam is but one of them).

They lack consensus, and the strength and tact of their departed leader to chart a new approach toward Eritrea.

The only consensus they have so far forged - notwithstanding the prime minister’s public relations stunt of being ready to travel to Asmara to negotiate with his Eritrean counterpart - seems to be staying the course on Eritrea and preserving what they call "the Meles legacy."

Dissimulating anxiety at Eritrea becoming another failed state on their border, these two approaches are meant to weaken Eritrea.

It bids well for future US-Eritrean and Eritrean-Ethiopian relations for Washington to help disabuse Addis Ababa of these contradictions and persuade Ethiopian leaders to abide by international law.

Legal and responsible resolution of Eritrean-Ethiopian disputes and their cooperation in pursuit of palpable common interests would be of greatest service to international security, regional stability, and to US-Eritrean relations.

Rapprochement between Eritrea and the United States is not mutually exclusive with the existing US-Ethiopian relations; they are complimentary to one another.

Legal resolution of the current Eritrean-Ethiopian stalemate, the two countries' recognition of their shared strategic interests, and their transparent and forward looking cooperation would make it easier for the United States to pursue balanced bilateral as well as trilateral partnerships with the two countries.

I would be remiss of my duties as a citizen to conclude without calling on the Government of Eritrea to seize on every opportunity that could lead to the end of the Eritrean-Ethiopian conflict and the start of rapprochement with the United States.

This would in turn allow Eritreans to focus on and address the long-stalled political process inside the country through inclusive and integrated processes of national reconciliation and political transition. Dr. Awet T. Weldemichael is the author of Third World Colonialism and Strategies of Liberation: Eritrea and East Timor Compared. He teaches history at the University of Kentucky. The views expressed here are the author's own, and do not represent the views of any institution or group that the author is affiliated with.

ERITREA/ETHIOPIA – DEBATE: Calls for International Rapprochement'

TesfaNews Analysis: There has been a series of open letters in recent weeks from prominent members of the US foreign policy establishment, including the US ambassador to Ethiopia in the late 1990s, David Shinn, and a former ambassador to Nigeria and South Africa, Princeton Lyman. All advocate a thaw in relations between the US and Eritrea and for Eritrea and Ethiopia to commence moves towards normalising their relation. Talk of a possible easing of Eritrea's international political isolation was initiated in mid-December 2013, when a former US assistant secretary of state for African affairs, Herman Cohen, wrote an article arguing for an end to UN sanctions that would "bring Eritrea in from the cold", leading ultimately to a normalisation of Ethiopian-

Eritrean relations, and promising a “win-win future for both nations“ Eritrea has frequently stated that its only condition to enter into dialogue is for Ethiopia to remove its troops from border territory awarded to Eritrea by the UN-backed Eritrean-Ethiopian Boundary Commission, including the town of Badme, the original flashpoint of the war between Eritrea and Ethiopia in 1998-2000. The US is one of the few countries that has enough influence to have a chance of cajoling Ethiopia into making such a move.

Any initiative to ease the long-standing tensions between Ethiopia and Eritrea will be widely welcomed in the international community, with important implications for peace and security across the entire Horn of Africa region. Reducing Eritrea's general mistrust of the international community politically will inevitably be a protracted process, but it would narrow the gap between political isolation on the one hand and Eritrea's increasing economic linkages via mining. The buoyancy of Eritrea's mining sector was demonstrated on January 13th when a UK-based exploration and development company, Ortac Resources, announced an arrangement to acquire up to 42.2% of shares in UK-based Andiamo Exploration, which has a portfolio of advanced-stage high-grade copper and gold projects in Eritrea. The deal follows an announcement in December by China-based Sichuan Road and Bridge Group (SRBG) that it had entered into a long-term agreement with the government-owned Eritrean National Mining Corporation (ENAMCO) to develop and explore an area between the existing Bisha and Zara gold mining projects.

Impact on the Forecast: There is a reasonable chance over the forecast period of Eritrean officials meeting their counterparts from Ethiopia to begin discussions of the two countries' long-running border dispute, which we will factor into our forecasts.

ERITREA/ETHIOPIA: TIGRAY PEOPLES LIBERATION FRONT - The Dog Can no longer Bark'

Analysis By Amanuel Biedemariam - On January 15, 2014, ESAT reported that the Ethiopian People's Revolutionary Front (EPRDF) conducted organizational evaluation and quoted Bereket Simon, former Ethiopia's Information Minister and new advisor to Prime Minister Hailemariam Desalgen, on how he characterized the differences amongst the EPRDF leaders during their deliberations. He said, "Before we replaced Revolutionary Democracy with Developmental Democracy, the Front has been divided into three groups. One group of the leadership had argued that our problem was internal and that we need to first check that, while the other group held that our problem was Shabia/Eritrea and that we need to fight them first, but the third position which said that after fighting Shabia/Eritrea, we should then look at our internal problems had become the winning idea."

According to the statement, the EPRDF is no longer a Revolutionary Democracy. It is now Developmental Democracy (whatever that means). In order to come up to that determination however, the group was divided to three camps but the final outcome was a decision to fight "Shaebia/Eritrea" as a primary focus and address their issues later.

The irony, one prerequisite to development or any progress for any nation is peace. When a nation ensures relative peace then there is a foundation for progress. The decision by the EPRDF to "Fight Shaebia/Eritrea" as a prerequisite to their developmental democracy is simply absurd, laughable and dangerous at the same time.

After a 15 year period that started with a border war and morphed into the current so called No-War No- Peace strategy; the Tigrayan People's Liberation Front (TPLF/EPRDF) decided to continue on the same path albeit with a dressed-up name. The question is, at what cost? Who paid for it initially? Who is responsible for the last 15 years? The TPLF evaluation did not entertain peace with Eritrea; does that mean they have no intention to make peace with Eritrea ever? Furthermore, on what grounds does Ethiopia's current regime, the TPLF/EPRDF is trying to continue the path of hostility? What is the ultimate goal? How will Eritrea deal with the intransigent TPLF? And ultimately, what constituency of Ethiopia will support this intransigence?

Moreover, how did Ethiopia do without peace with Eritrea? Could it have done better? How have the people of Ethiopia and Eritrea fared? Is the past 15 years a model by which two neighboring countries should conduct their affairs for the future? Who pays for all these? Who paid for the past?

The key question, why did Bereket Simon come-out now and made these absurd statements? Moreover, why now, when many particularly the US, for the first time in over 15 years is talking peace did Bereket Simon roll-out this war agenda? The questions are endless.

The answer to all these questions are found on a statement one astute Eritrean political figure made a while back. When asked to respond about outrageous repeated statements by the TPLF against Eritrea, he answered, "When a dog barks uncontrollably disturbing peace, the best option is to talk to the owners of the dog."

There are three key reasons why Bereket Simon decided to come out and declared the continuation of the hostilities.

1) The current chatter that the US is on the verge reestablishing ties with Eritrea is a concern and they are crying for some attention. They want to make sure that the US does not abandon them. Ambassador David Shinn's comment that we will not have relations with Eritrea at the expense of our important ally Ethiopia is designed to do just that; allay concerns. That however, is not working because the reaction to Ambassador Shinn has been very harsh.

2) Improved Eritrea US relations are a serious concern for the pocket books of the minority regime. Ethiopia has provided boots for the West that funds its military. In turn the TPLF controls its army with the billions in funding received from the West specifically the US by using it as incentive. Those who are loyal are rewarded by assignments on peacekeeping missions for lucrative pay. That means there is a security dimension to it as well because the funds pacify multi ethnic military that could turn on them.

3) Peace is the greatest threat to the very existence of the TPLF/EPRDF. Therefore, they must perpetuate these conflicts particularly with Eritrea. The TPLF is using the border issue to control the people of Ethiopia by misleading them as if the border is a negotiating ploy hence continues the declared No-Peace No-War agenda indefinitely.

Time the enemy

The TPLF/EPRDF has run out of time. There has been tremendous regional and global changes that lead to change of attitude and approach in dealing with the countries of the region. Their strategy to subdue Eritrea failed. To the contrary all economic signals indicate that Eritrea is forging ahead independently. The US waited for over a decade and half to bring regime change in Eritrea using Ethiopia and failed.

China's influence in the region is forcing changes on US Africa policy. The changes on Western global Geo-Strategic shift away from Middle East to Asia plays a factor. Military and other budget cuts in the US will certainly affect changes. In addition, the death of Meles Zenawi and, the power transition that ensued has created a precarious power- sharing leadership arrangement that generated a great deal of uncertainty. Moreover, countries in the region are working for their interests diligently. Recent activities by countries in the region particularly Egypt, Sudan and Eritrea are something to pay attention to for many reasons.

To Conclude

The US holds the key to Eritrea Ethiopia future relations simply because Ethiopia as a client state and dependent on US for political, diplomatic, economic, food and military support/aid is amenable to US demands. Thus, when and if the US decides it is on the best interest of the US for the TPLF to create peace with Eritrea then there will be no choice left but to acquiesce to US demands. That is the reality.

The question however remains, after paying dear lives of over 20,000 Eritrean souls, thousands more wounded; after having millions displaced; after decades of hostility that impacted families negatively in many ways; in short, after Eritrea paid the price with dear blood why on earth will the people of Eritrea throw a lifeline to the TPLF? Will they?

That simply means the neck of the TPLF is on the table. The US is at a critical point where they have to make a choice whether to save Ethiopia or the TPLF. When an organization with no constituency and according to Bereket Simon not clear about the future-direction of the nation decide to place their fate on hostilities with a neighboring country Eritrea; the US has a lot to worry about.

When the perception remains Bereket Simon is the key figure rendering Prime Minister Hailmariam Desalegne as a figurehead, the US has a lot to worry about. Is TPLF/EPRDF Ethiopia? These are some sticky points. Ambassador David Shinn tried to address these conundrum but no takers. He said,

"Although the United States might decide to try again to improve relations with Eritrea, it will not do so at the expense of its ties with Ethiopia."

The statement above said Ethiopia, not TPLF/EPRDF. The US is cognizant of these complexities. The US at this stage is desperate to save Ethiopia because the current states of affairs are unsustainable.

Ambassador Hank Cohen's approach is therefore commendable as he is trying to thread a thin line to save a nation from embedded ethnic-political-system that can spell disaster with long term consequences for the region and US long term interests. Eritrea therefore holds the key.

ERITREA/ETHIOPIA: 8 Business Benefits of Resuming Economic Relations b/n Ethiopia and Eritrea'

By Tony Carol African Arguments (February 1, 2014) - Ethiopia and Eritrea ceased business relations upon the commencement of the border war in 1998. While a small amount of barter trade still exists, it is fair to say that trade relations between the two countries are non-existent - this is very much to the detriment of the private sectors in both countries (and across the region).

Since the closure of the border, the economic fortunes of Ethiopia and Eritrea could hardly have been more divergent. While both remain poor countries in terms of per capita wealth, Ethiopia has been among the fastest and growing countries in the world averaging a steady 10% per annum growth for the past nine years. Conversely, as per the chart below, Eritrea has suffered vast fluctuations in its economic growth from a low of - 9% in 2008 to the 2012 level of + 7.5%.

Ethiopia has also been a leader in Africa in terms of infrastructure development, especially in the construction of roads, power infrastructure and water supply. Eritrea has endeavoured to rebuild its transportation infrastructure after the border war but progress has been slowed by inaccessibility of finance. In terms of education, Ethiopia has built dozens of institutions of higher education in the past 10 years and has begun to develop a work force that is increasingly in demand by manufacturers from Turkey, China and India. Despite promising signs of self reliance immediately after Independence, Eritrea continues to find its work force diminished due to emigration and military service.

Last, Ethiopia is rapidly modernizing its domestic and export agriculture whereas as Eritrea still relies on subsistence methods of production - albeit while eschewing food aid.

As a business consultant who has worked on investment in both countries, I am confident that a comprehensive settlement of disputes that underlie the 1998-

2000 border war and normalization of economic relations will create myriad benefits, including:

Increase in road, rail and port infrastructure in Eritrea. With assistance from the Chinese, Ethiopia has expended billions on building its transportation corridor to Djibouti. However, for many regions in Ethiopia, Eritrean ports are closer.

Increase in power infrastructure and opening of export markets. By combining their respective sources of power, hydroelectric, wind and geothermal, Eritrean and Ethiopian consumers would benefit from lower costs and greater reliability of supply.

Reduced power and transport costs would increase manufacturing investment in both Ethiopia and Eritrea. Although Ethiopia remains one of the world's most expensive countries in terms of road transportation costs, there have been a swath of new manufacturing ventures in textiles, apparel and leather goods, driven by low labour costs and increased skill training.

With its port access, Eritrea could also become a manufacturing hub, perhaps even adding strategic value to raw or semi-processed materials coming from Ethiopia.

Renewed access to the US market under the Africa Growth and Opportunity Act (AGOA). In 2004, Eritrea was deemed ineligible for market access benefits offered and while the impact was minimal at the time, Ethiopia has been able to substantially grow its exports to the US in the past five years. The normalization of political and economic relations with its neighbour would not in itself restore AGOA eligibility, but it would demonstrate progress toward that end.

Increased convertibility of currencies. Normalization of economic relations would allow the establishment of banking relations, now non-existent between the two countries. The Nakfa is among the world's least convertible currencies and an open and transparent exchange with the Ethiopian birr could lower transaction costs for all businesses and consumers.

Return of the commercial sector. As a result of the border war, Ethiopian businesses were expelled from Eritrea and vice versa. This bar has constrained companies from both countries to achieve scale. Moreover, among the most dynamic business communities in Ethiopia for generations were those of Eritrean origin.

Fostering regional integration. Africa is striving to integrate its markets and Ethiopia has been leading in this process by establishing agreements with its neighbours for power and transportation corridors. There has been speculation that Ethiopia seeks membership of the East Africa Community. EAC membership would also provide benefits to Eritrea.

As reported by my friends Ambassadors Cohen, Shinn and Lyman, this appears to be a moment of inflection in the relationship between Eritrea and Ethiopia. Certainly the implementation of the border agreement and the resumption of commercial relations will not be an easy process.

However, the economic benefits that would accrue to both countries could be substantial and should motivate leadership in both to expedite the process. Tony Carroll is Vice President of Manchester Trade and Director of Acorus Capital.

ERITREA: “At least if I died, it wouldn’t go on” – Yonathan Habte, trafficking survivor’

By IRIN (February 13, 2014) Editor’s Note - The following is a heart-wrenching story of one young Eritrean man who was tortured in the Sinai Desert. As more and more young Eritreans and Ethiopians flee their countries in search of freedom, paying heavy prices.

JOHANNESBURG, February 12, 2014 (IRIN) - In March 2012, Yonathan Habte*, then 26, decided to flee Eritrea where he had evaded military service and was facing jail. With a background in computer engineering, he was confident he could make a life in another African country. Instead, he was kidnapped near the Sudanese border and trafficked to Egypt, where he barely survived three months in two different camps in the lawless Sinai region, near the Israeli border. He talked to IRIN over the phone from Sweden.

“My plan was just to leave Eritrea as fast as possible. After you finish college, you’re supposed to go to the military but I refused. I was working in the capital illegally because I didn’t have a pass. A few friends of mine had disappeared and I thought I’d be next. The plan was just to get out of there, regardless of where, but since I was born in Sudan and could speak the language, I decided to go there.

“I knew about the risk of kidnapping, that’s why I didn’t use a smuggler and chose to rely on myself and some of my friends. When we got near Kassala [in eastern Sudan], some Rashaida (local tribesmen) tried to take us, but there were six of us and we fought back. From Kassala, they [the authorities] took us to Shagarab refugee camp.

“Security there was non-existent. The Rashaida could come and leave as they pleased, and the security guards were corrupt and even collaborated with them. After three weeks, I was collecting firewood with my roommates one morning when they [the Rashaida] raided the camp.

“They came in with three vehicles and they managed to get me and two other guys. They beat us up, of course, and took us somewhere north of Kassala, where we were joined by other Eritreans that had been kidnapped.

“Then they moved us further north where we were joined by more Eritreans. After a few days they had enough people to be called a ‘batch’, and they sent us on our way. They said they were sending us to Israel.

“Along with about 30 other people they sent me to Sinai. At the border, they handed us over to some Egyptians who used a small boat to get us across the Nile to a city called Aswan. Then they used a big poultry truck to transport us across the Suez Canal. As soon as we crossed over to Sinai, we were divided up among the smugglers and I was taken with 12 others to a torture camp where they demanded US$3,500 [for my release].

“They made us call home to our families two or three times a day and every time they beat us up so our families heard us screaming. Some friends and relatives pitched in to pay the $3,500. As soon as the wire transfers were done, they put us in a car and sold us to another smuggler and this guy demanded $30,000. He said he paid a lot of money to get us and he expected a return.

“The second camp was worse. They don’t give you much to eat, just a single piece of bread for the whole day and you’re very weak and they keep beating you all day; they took turns. It intensified when you called home, but it was constant. There were three women with us and one of them was pregnant, and they still kept beating her.

“They whip you and hang you from your feet upside down, or your wrists; they dripped molten plastic on your body. After about a week, one of the people I was kidnapped with died. I myself was in a very bad situation. In the first camp, they had broken my wrist and they tied the chain to my ankle so tightly that it was buried into my flesh. My sight was very poor and I could hardly stand up.

“Since the Israeli [cell phone] signal still works in Sinai region, they would make you call any Eritrean in Israel you knew to send you [cell phone] credit to call internationally. Once you had credit, they would make you call home all day, to [friends and family in] Europe, the US, they didn’t care where, they just cared about getting their money.

“I didn’t expect my family to come up with $30,000 so I was giving up hope. I tried to commit suicide by cutting my jugular with a wire, but it was too old and rusty so it didn’t work. One of the translators was an Eritrean and I asked him to get me any kind of poison that would help me die, but he refused. I just kept imagining my mum receiving these calls and not having the money to pay, and not knowing what to do. At least, if I died it wouldn’t go on and on for months.

“I’d been there three months and I was so weak at that point that I was unconscious most of the time, delirious even. That’s actually when my friends and relatives were pitching in to come up with this $30,000. I warned them that they shouldn’t pay a single cent unless they heard my voice because I expected to die any day. But finally they came up with the money and wired it.

“I was too weak to walk. Both my hands were damaged by this time because they’d hung me up for too long by my wrists. I’d lost feeling in them and the flesh was starting to fall from my bones on both hands. They gave me to another Bedouin guy who was responsible for the crossing from Egypt to Israel.

“He wasn’t as cruel as the others; he even tried to help me and advised me to stay in Sinai a few weeks to regain my strength before crossing the border, but I refused. So he sent me along with about 150 other refugees, mostly Eritreans and some Sudanese. I tried to walk but after a few metres I collapsed and the others carried me the rest of the way.

“We managed to get to Israel and as soon as we got into contact with some soldiers, they sent me to a hospital where I stayed for three months. I contacted my family and told them I was alive, but I didn’t tell them about the injury to my hands. I lost most of my fingers and those left I can’t move much, so they’re pretty useless. I was informed they did what they could, but that I needed more advanced surgery.

“They sent me to a shelter in Petah-Tikva [east of Tel Aviv] and I stayed there for a year and a few months. I was feeling horrible. Even though I was glad I was alive, in a way I felt like maybe I would have been better off dying, because now I was just dependent on others. I’ve always relied on myself and hated to ask others for help, and to be in this position. It was the torture in Sinai all over again.

“In Israel, they considered people like me infiltrators, regardless how many times I spoke of what had happened to me. By the time I got in, we didn’t have a chance to apply for asylum, and this anti-infiltration law allowed government to detain anyone for up to three years. That’s what really depressed me, because after all I was a victim of, they treated me like a criminal.

“I wanted to leave but I didn’t have a passport, and I couldn’t go to the Eritrean embassy because I had opposed the government by deserting. Also, I didn’t have any money. My family are still in huge debt; they could barely survive, let alone help me.

“I was talking to many journalists about what had happened to me, and that’s how I met some activists who came to Israel with a delegation in 2013. They invited me to talk in the European Parliament and I said, ‘Fine’. So my friend and I came to Brussels in December [2013].

“We decided to come to Sweden, and now we’re in the midst of the asylum seeking process. It feels like a new chapter of my life. I want to get surgery for my hands. In a way I was blessed, because even when I was in Israel, I met some individuals who wanted to help me, so they’re trying to raise $200,000 [for the surgery]. I have some donors in Germany. I thought I could seek asylum here first and then go and have my surgeries either in Germany or the States.”

*Not his real name
No easy way out for Eritreans in Israeli desert detention’

By Allyn Fisher-Ilan (February 14, 2014) HOLOT, Israel (Reuters) - A compound of one-storey buildings deep in the southern Israeli desert is now home to some 400 African migrants who face the prospect of being held in custody indefinitely. The detainees in what the authorities call an “open” detention centre are allowed to leave for a few hours each day, but given its remote location near the Egyptian frontier, travel is impractical.

Israel opened the Holot complex in December after its Supreme Court stopped the practice of jailing illegal migrants for up to three years in regular prisons. But in what the migrants call a cruel twist and rights groups say is a rights violation, a law passed the same month allows the migrants to be detained indefinitely, pending the resolution of their requests to stay in Israel. “I went to renew my visa, and suddenly I wound up here. This is terrible,” said Eritrean Hagos Fdwi, 30, who worked in a restaurant in Tel Aviv.

More than 50,000 Africans - mainly Sudanese and Eritreans - have crossed into Israel surreptitiously through a once-porous, and now fenced, Egyptian border in the past eight years. Many say they seek asylum from war-torn homelands, but Israel dismisses most as illegal job seekers although some have been granted limited visas. Authorities complain of heightened social tensions in more impoverished parts of Tel Aviv where Africans settle. Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu has said the influx threatens Israel’s Jewish character and wants the majority of migrants removed. But rather than conduct outright deportations, Israel is trying to coax migrants to return home voluntarily - including offering a cash incentive - or persuade third countries to accept them.

So far, relatively few have taken the money, though Israeli officials say 2,000 left in 2013, up from a reported 400 or so in 2012. No third-country safe havens have been established. Daniel Solomon, an Interior Ministry legal adviser, said Holot was established to get migrants off the streets and out of the job market. “Legally people can be held at the open facility indefinitely, but the idea is for it to be a transit (point) for migrants before they go back home or to a third country,” he told reporters in January.

Journalists have not been permitted to enter the compound, but Reuters was able to interview a dozen or so detainees who ventured outside its gates. Some said they were bused from Tel Aviv or surrounding areas after visiting the visa office, arriving at the centre with just the clothing on their backs.

Many said they do not take the opportunity to leave the facility each day. The closest town, Beersheba, is about an hour’s drive away, and detainees are required to check in every few hours. Failure to do so could mean transfer to a conventional prison. There were few complaints about accommodations, said to include television and three meals a day, with 10 men sleeping in an amply sized room. No women or children are being held.

FRUSTRATION

Holot has a capacity to hold more than 3,000 inmates and human rights groups say at least 2,000 more migrants have received summonses to report there by next month. The rights groups argue that many of the migrants are worthy of political asylum, citing unrest and oppression in their homelands, and have petitioned the Supreme Court against the law.

The UN High Commissioner for Refugees representative in Israel, Walpurga Englbrecht, said unlimited incarceration at Holot did not "comply with international human rights norms." "What is more disturbing is there are no release grounds from Holot, the only way to get out is signing up for voluntary departure," Englbrecht told Reuters. Anger over the facility has triggered a series of protests by migrants in the past month, including a march to Israel's parliament and crowded vigils in Tel Aviv.

When a Reuters TV crew showed up outside the facility recently, some of the detainees held up signs calling for asylum. Three detainees walking down the road crossed their wrists over their heads as if they were handcuffed. Detainees spoke to Reuters mainly of boredom and frustration at seeing no quick way out of their predicament. Two said they had been separated from their wives and children, although Israel said it avoids sending men with families to the facility.

Solomon Hagos, 25, said he has been in detention in Israel since he entered illegally 18 months ago. He said he fled an Eritrean military prison in 2012 and was gang-raped over several days by three men who held him captive in Egypt's Sinai desert before he crossed into Israel. "My life is nothing but a prison," said Hagos, whose asylum petition was rejected last month. Robel Yohannes, 23, of Eritrea, was more hopeful than most of the detainees, however. "I'm just going to sit patiently and wait for them to change the law, again," he said.

Over 300 Eritreans, Somalis cross the Moroccan border-What You See Is Not Always What You Get BBC (February 26, 2014) - At least 300 African migrants have stormed a border fence in an attempt to cross into the Spanish territory of Melilla from Morocco, officials say. Morocco security forces clashed with the migrants, leaving 27 people wounded, they added. Ninety-six migrants were arrested, while about 100 managed to cross over, the officials said. Melilla is a major crossing point for sub-Saharan Africans seeking work or asylum in Europe. Together with a second Spanish enclave, Ceuta, it is the European Union's only land border with Africa.

Many of those making the dangerous journey come from Eritrea and Somalia. The Moroccan interior ministry said the migrants hurled rocks at the security forces as they stormed the six-metre (20-foot) high double barbed wire fence on Monday. Thirteen security force members and 14 migrants were wounded in the clashes, it added in a statement.

A Spanish government spokeswoman said the migrants were "very violent" and had targeted two different sections of the border fence, the AFP news agency reports. About 150 African migrants made it into Melilla after a similar assault on the border fence on 17 February. At least 14 migrants drowned in Moroccan waters on 6 February while trying to enter Ceuta by sea. Spain’s interior ministry confirmed on Friday that police fired rubber bullets as the migrants swam into Spanish territory, but denied the shooting contributed to the drowning.

OBITUARY: Eritrea's Army Chief of Staff Dies'

K. O. Peppeh — (March 7, 2014) The Eritrean Ministry of Information has announced the death of the chief of staff of the nation's armed forces. Major General Guebregziabher Amdemariam, alias 'Wuchu', reportedly passed on in Asmara, where he had been undergoing medical care. The cause of his death is currently unknown. Majour-General Amdemariam is a veteran of the defence force and was notably involved in the fight to separate the province of Eritrea from Ethiopia between 1961 – 1993. Yemane Ghebreab, an advisor to the Eritrean President, has described the late chief of staff as a 'legend', 'patriot' and a 'brave commander', according to a report by Tesfa News. Eritreans on social media continue to pay tribute to the major in their numbers. But many commentators have highlighted the slow pace at which the news of his death reached the world as evidence of the negative effects of the government's tight control of the media. Since 2001, the government of Eritrea has reportedly prohibited the operation of private media outlets. Currently, all the media houses are operated by the state. The country is ranked to have one of the poorest human rights record in the region, with arbitrary arrests and frequent disappearances. The government has justified its authoritarian control of the state as necessitated by the nation's war with rebels, who are reportedly sponsored by the Ethiopian government.

South Sudan a new battleground for Ethiopia and Eritrea?

Analysis By Martin Plaut (March 8, 2014) - The conflict between Ethiopia and Eritrea, that can be traced back at least as far as their unresolved border war of May 1998 to June 2000, has taken many forms. In the past Somalia was the battleground in which this was played out. Is the civil war now underway between the forces of President Salva Kiir Myardit and Riek Machar the latest site of this deadly contest? There is no definitive answer to this question, but here is the evidence.

Somalia: It is clear that Eritrea gave succor to the Islamic Courts Union (ICU) after they were forced to flee from the Somali capital, Mogadishu, by Ethiopian forces in January 2007. Some of the ICU established themselves in Asmara. Others decided to remain in Somalia – becoming the backbone of al-Shabaab and later an affiliate of al-Qaeda. The United Nations imposed sanctions on Eritrea in 2009 because of its support for al-Shabaab. UN Security Council Resolution 1907 accused Eritrea of: "…providing support to the armed groups engaged in destabilization activities in Somalia…"

Reports from UN Monitors have documented over a number of years how Eritrea provided weapons and other assistance to al-Shabaab. In its latest report (S 2013/440 of 25 July 2013) the Monitors noted Eritrea's attempts to improve relations with Somali President Hassan Sheikh Mohamud. The report went on: “However, Eritrea’s strengthening of relations with Mogadishu seems to be driven by tactical decisions in Asmara that continue to contribute to regional destabilization. In particular, the Government of Eritrea maintains close links to a network of warlords and other spoilers in Somalia, which includes at least two leaders of Al-Shabaab."

It is worth noting that the same UN report talked of Eritrean involvement in South Sudan and Uganda: "The Monitoring Group has obtained information about Eritrean military intelligence and financial operations in Kampala and Juba. Eritrean and intelligence sources in both Kampala and Juba confirm that Eritrea's ruling PFDJ party have fronted a number of business operations, from restaurants and hotels in Kampala and Juba, to water distribution and food and beverage imports in Juba, often working closely with Ugandan and South Sudanese businessmen as silent partners."

South Sudan: Allegations of Eritrean involvement

Is the conflict between Kiir and Machar that erupted on the evening of 15 December 2013 the latest stage for Eritrea – Ethiopian rivalry? John Prendergast of the US lobby group Enough clearly thinks this is possible. On the 26th of February he gave evidence before the US Congress's Sub-committee on Africa.

This is what he said: "South Sudan's eruption has threatened to regionalize the war in ways not seen since the 1990s. On the one hand, Uganda has overtly intervened militarily in support of Juba's government. On the other hand, allegations are increasing that both Eritrea and Sudan are covertly providing support to the South Sudanese opposition forces, though firm evidence has yet to emerge. Sudan's history of supporting some of the ringleaders of South Sudan's armed opposition is deep, and South Sudan supported Sudanese rebels are alleged to be siding militarily with Juba's forces in areas near the border of the two countries. Both countries still remain deeply interconnected and in many ways interdependent, and neither can be at peace if its neighbor is at war. Ethiopia has strongly warned Uganda to pull out its forces, with an unknown "or else" attached."

Prendergast went on to describe the possibility of a regional conflict as a "nightmare scenario." He concluded: "Currently, Eritrea is covered by sanctions for its support for armed elements inside Somalia. A credible investigation should be initiated to determine whether Eritrea is providing resupply support to South Sudanese rebels as has been alleged. If evidence corroborates these reports, those sanctions should be expanded from Somalia to South Sudan. Such an investigation should also attempt to determine if Sudan is providing similar support as has been alleged."

The context: As Prendergast states, these are allegations and not evidence of Eritrean involvement. He does not disclose why he believes the allegations are worth investigating or where they came from. So what is the context?

Sudan (also allegedly backing their former ally Riek Machar) held talks with Eritrea in January this year. President Omer Al-Bashir and his Eritrean counterpart Issaias Affewerki met on the 25th of January in Asmara. The visit is reported to have been much more than a swift trip: it lasted three days. The two presidents are reported to have offered their support to South Sudan and President Salva Kiir, but did they also discuss covert support for Machar and his rebels? There is no way of knowing, but at least for the present Asmara and Khartoum appear to be on the same wavelength as far as South Sudan is concerned. Salva Kiir despatched an envoy to Eritrea this week, and apparently received assurances of President Afewerki's support.

There has been growing pressure from some senior American ex-diplomats for sanctions against Eritrea to be relaxed, as a way of bringing the country back from the cold and ending the Eritrea-Ethiopia dispute. Among them is the former US Former Assistant Secretary of State for Africa, Hank Cohen. Cohen argued recently that the time had come to act and that this was in Washington's best interests: "…the normalization of relations between the United States and Eritrea would open the door to military-to-military cooperation of the type that would enlist Eritrea in the war against Islamic terrorism in the Horn coming from across the Red Sea. Yes, the time has come to bring Eritrea in from the cold." This argument was supported by another former US diplomat Ambassador David Shinn.

Ethiopia has strongly resisted lifting sanctions against Eritrea. It has argued that: "…recent talk of mending Ethio-Eritrean relations, the subject of discussion by some sympathizers of Eritrea, also seems detached from reality. It is based on false assumptions about the regime in Asmara which, in reality, has repeatedly made it very clear it is opposed to any form of dialogue. The call for the lifting of sanctions is out of synchronization with any reality on the ground…All the evidence shows that Eritrea is continuing to negate regional peace efforts, consistently making alliances with spoiler groups in Somalia and elsewhere."

At the same time, a report appeared on a website accusing Eritrea of continuing to ship arms to Somalia. "the Ethiopian military in Central Somalia intercepted an Eritrean attempt to smuggle powerful rockets to the Southern Somalia as well as Somali territory in Ethiopia on a Yemeni commercial small boat off the coast of Puntland and Galmudug regional States of Somalia." The source of this report was said to be Ethiopian military intelligence.

Conclusion: So is Eritrea arming Riek Machar and taking its fight against Ethiopia into South Sudan? The answer would appear to be inconclusive. John Prendergast has yet to provide evidence for his allegation before Congress. Eritrea clearly has "form" – having armed Al-Shabaab as well as rebel groups active inside Ethiopia. The Ethiopians – for their part – are clearly deeply concerned that Eritrea might escape the UN sanctions net, as suggested by Cohen and Shinn. Ethiopian military intelligence is stepping up the pressure by providing reports of continued arms shipments to Somalia. At the same time President Isaias Affewerki is co-ordinating his Sudan strategy with Khartoum – something that is of sufficient concern for Salva Kiir to send an envoy to Asmara with an unknown message. Perhaps all one can say for sure is that it is a murky old world: Ethiopian and Eritrean involvement in South Sudan will need careful scrutiny.

ERITREA/ETHIOPIA: Natives of Eritrea and Ethiopia unite in NYC Evangelic Church‘

Somalilandsun (March 16, 2014) – This past Sunday the 9th of March, evangelical Christians from Ethiopia and Eritrea once again united in worship as a rare show of love between two people whose countries are in war footing back home in Africa.

Located at the corner of West 105th Street and Amsterdam Avenue, the small Eritrean Bethlehem evangelical church in New York City welcomed dozens of Ethiopians from another evangelical church at 12st & 5th ave downtown.

This new project is bridging gaps and creating a foundation for peace between the people, said many congregants. Since last year, the two churches have been trading preachers, exchanging gospel materials and attending the church of one another every three months. Similar projects are also starting in Addis Ababa, where a large Eritrean evangelical and pentecostal population has grown in recent years due to persecution back home. Since independence, most evangelical churches have been banned in Eritrea, forcing many to flee to Ethiopia.

While politics is rarely mentioned, some members quietly say such peace projects exemplify how easily the two countries can fix relations. If the two economies unite, small contested lands like Badme become insignificant, and wasted resources on military could be diverted toward development, churchgoers claim. Ethiopia could also get much cheaper use of Asab port and Eritrea could get port revenues and cheap electricity from Addis Ababa, some hope. One faithful from the Eritrean Bethel church wondered, “We are one people. But Wouldn’t it be nice to have two voices in the UN that always support and back each other the same way like US and Canada or US and Britain do?”

But for now, they would have to settle with worshipping together thousands of miles away from their native countries. Using a healthy mixture of the two related languages during sermons (Amharic and Tigrinya) Pastor Mesfinn and Pastor Girmay has brought the two churches together. With some hope and prayers, many believe these initiatives are early signs of many good things to come for the two people.

DIARIES: Eritrean generals killed in car accident

Ethiomedia News (March 21, 2014) ADDIS ABABA - Two Eritrean army generals and a civilian were killed on Thursday in a car accident outside of the Eritrean capital, Eritrean TV announced today. Brig. Gen. Mebrahtu Tekleab (aka Vaynak), Brig. General. Amanuel Haile (aka Hanjema), and Mr. Desu Tesfatsion were on their way to a military event when they ended up in the deadly crash. On March 8, Eritrea buried its army chief of staff, General Guebregzabher Andemariam (aka Wuchu), who died after a long illness. Eritrea boasts of having over 200,000 fighters in its army, and the government of President Isaias Afewerki uses the rhetoric of war to deter political and social reforms indefinitely.

Africa Cup of Nations-2015: Eritrea withdraw from qualifiers'

BBC SPORT FOOTBALL: (March 31, 2014): Eritrea have pulled out of the qualifiers for the 2015 Africa Cup of Nations in Morocco, the Confederation of African Football has confirmed. They had been due to face South Sudan in the first round of the preliminary phase over two legs in April. South Sudan, entering the competition for the first time, will now go though to the preliminary phase second round. No reason has been given for Eritrea's withdrawal, but recent defections by players may have led to the decision. Seventeen players from the Eritrean squad, plus the team doctor, absconded at the 2012 East and Central Africa Senior Challenge Cup in Uganda.

In 2011,13 Eritrean players sought asylum in Tanzania after the same tournament, while 12 members of the Eritrea squad disappeared and sought asylum in Kenya during the regional tournament in 2009. Four Eritrean athletes also left their base and sought political asylum in Britain after the London Olympics in 2012. Between 2,000 and 3,000 Eritreans flee the small east African country every month, a United Nations report said last year. South Sudan will find out who they will play in the second round when the draw is made on Sunday, 27 April in Cairo.

April 12, 2014: Eritreans are at Risk to protest against Israel's hard line immigration'

Tel Aviv (HAN) – Eritrean refugees are one of the main groups in this protest against Israel's hard line on immigration, Tel Aviv, - This article is a joint publication of TheNation.com and Foreign Policy In Focus. Hundreds of thousands of Eritreans have fled a repressive dictatorship since 2001. Their small northeast African country, which has a population of four to five million and was once touted as part of an African "renaissance," is one of the largest per capita producers of asylum seekers in the world. Many languish in desert camps. Some have been kidnapped, tortured and ransomed—or killed—in the Sinai. Others have been left to die in the Sahara or drowned in the Mediterranean. Still others have been attacked as foreigners in South Africa, threatened with mass detention in Israel or refused entry to the United States and Canada under post-9/11 "terrorism bars" based on their past association with an armed liberation movement—the one they are now fleeing.

Its not easy being Eritrean: The most horrifying of their misfortunes—the kidnapping, torture and ransoming in Sinai—has generated attention in the media and among human rights organizations, as did the tragic shipwreck off Lampedusa Island in the Mediterranean. But the public response, like that to famine or natural disaster, tends to be emotive and ephemeral, turning the refugees into objects of pity or charity with little grasp of who they are, why they take such risks or what can be done to halt the hemorrhaging.

This is abetted by the Eritrean government, which masks the political origins of these flows by insisting they are "migrants," not refugees, and no different from those of other poor countries like Eritrea's neighbor and archenemy, Ethiopia. This fiction is convenient for destination countries struggling with rising ultra-nationalist movements and eager for a rationale to turn Eritreans (and others) away. But this is not a human—or political—crisis amenable to simplistic solutions. Nor is it going away any time soon.

The Source: Eritrea's history has been marked by conflict and controversy from the time its borders were determined on the battlefield between Italian and Abyssinian forces in the 1890s. A decade of British rule was followed by federation with and then annexation by Ethiopia. Finally in the 1990s, after a thirty-year war that pitted the nationalists, themselves divided among competing factions, against successive US- and Soviet-backed Ethiopian regimes, Eritrea gained recognition as a state.

Since then Eritrea has clashed with all of its neighbors, climaxing in an all-out border war with Ethiopia in 1998-2000 that triggered a rapid slide into repression and autocracy. The government has survived by conscripting the country's youth into both military service and forced labor on state-controlled projects and businesses, while relying on its diaspora for financial support, even as it has produced a disproportionate share of the region's refugees. This paradox underlines the strength of Eritrean identity, even among those who flee.

Eritrea is dominated by a single strong personality: former rebel commander, and now president, Isaias Afwerki. He has surrounded himself with weak institutions, and there is no viable successor in sight, though there are persistent rumors of a committee-in-waiting due to his failing health. Meanwhile, the three branches of government—nominally headed by a cabinet, a National Assembly and a High Court—provide a façade of institutional governance, though power is exercised through informal networks that shift and change at the president's discretion. There is no organizational chart, nor is there a published national budget. Every important decision is made in secret.

The ruling People's Front for Democracy and Justice (PFDJ), a retooled version of the liberation army, functions as a mechanism for mobilizing and controlling the population. No other parties are permitted. Nor are non-governmental organizations—no independent trade unions, media, women's organizations, student unions, charities, cultural associations, nothing. All but four religious denominations have been banned, and those that are permitted have had their leaderships compromised.

Refugees cite this lack of freedom—and fear of arrest should they question it—as one of the main reasons for their flight. But the camps in Ethiopia and Sudan reflect a highly unusual demographic: Most such populations are comprised of women, children and elderly men, but officials of the UN's High Commissioner for Refugees (UNHCR) in Ethiopia and Sudan say that among those registering in the camps there, close to half in recent years have been women and men under the age of 25. The common denominator among them is their refusal to accept an undefined, open-ended national service. This, more than any other single factor, is propelling the exodus.

The UNHCR has registered more than 300,000 Eritreans as refugees over the past decade, and many more have passed through Ethiopia and Sudan without being counted. The UNHCR representative in Sudan, Kai Lielsen, told me last year that he thought seventy to eighty percent of those who crossed into Sudan didn't register and didn't stay. Thus, a conservative estimate would put the total close to a million. For a country of only four to five million people, this is remarkable. And it is the combination of their vulnerability and their desperation that makes them easy marks.

The Trafficking: For years, the main refugee route ran through the Sahara to Libya and thence to Europe. When that was blocked by a pact between Libya and Italy in 2006, it shifted east to Egypt and Israel. Smugglers from the Arab tribe of Rashaida in northeastern Sudan worked with Sinai Bedouin to facilitate the transit, charging ever-higher fees until some realized they could make far more by ransoming those who were fleeing.

The smugglers-turned-traffickers eventually demanded as much as $40,000-$50,000, forcing families to sell property, exhaust life savings and tap relatives living abroad. As the voluntary flow dried up, they paid to have refugees kidnapped from UN-run camps after identifying those from urban, mostly Christian backgrounds (those most likely to have relatives in Europe and North America).

I spoke with one survivor in Israel last year whose story was typical. Philmon, a 28-year-old computer engineer, fled Eritrea in March 2012 after getting a tip he might be arrested for public statements critical of the country's national service. Several weeks later, he was kidnapped from Sudan's Shagara camp, taken with a truckload of others to a Bedouin outpost in the Sinai and ordered to call relatives to raise $3,500 for his release. "The beatings started the first day to make us pay faster," he told me.

Philmon's sister, who lived in Eritrea, paid the ransom, but he was sold to another smuggler and ransomed again, this time for $30,000. "The first was like an appetizer. This was the main course," he said. Over the next month, he was repeatedly beaten, often while hung by his hands from the ceiling. Convinced he could never raise the full amount, he attempted suicide. “I dreamed of grabbing a pistol and taking as many of them as possible, saving one bullet for myself.”

Early on they broke one of his wrists. During many of his forced calls home to beg for money they dripped molten plastic on his hands and back. After his family sold virtually everything they had to raise the $30,000, he was released. But his hands were so damaged he could no longer grip anything. He couldn’t walk and had to be carried into Israel. Because he was a torture victim, he was sent to a shelter in Tel Aviv for medical care. In this regard, he was one of the lucky ones.

For some 35,000 Eritreans who have come to Israel since 2006, each day is suffused with uncertainty, as an anti-immigrant backlash builds. The government calls them “infiltrators,” not refugees, and threatens them with indefinite detention or—what many fear most—deportation to Eritrea. Philmon has moved on to Sweden, where the reception was more welcoming, though there, too, a virulent anti-immigrant movement is growing.

Last year, the Sinai operation began to contract due to a confluence of factors: increased refugee awareness of the risks, the effective sealing of Israel’s border to keep them out and Egyptian efforts to suppress a simmering Sinai insurgency among Bedouin Islamists. But this didn’t stop the trafficking—it just rerouted it.

What I found in eastern Sudan last summer was that Rashaida tribesmen were paying bounties to corrupt officials and local residents to capture potential ransom victims along the Sudan-Eritrea border—and even within Eritrea and Ethiopia—and were holding them within well-defended Rashaida communities there. Such captives would not be counted by government or agency monitors and would not show up at all were it not for the testimony of escapees and relatives.

Last fall, Lampedusa survivors revealed that Libya is becoming another site for ransoming and kidnapping, illustrating that as one door closes, new opportunities arise across a region of weak states and post–Arab Uprising instability. What Sudan and Libya have in common is not the predators but the prey. And the practice is expanding as word spreads of the profits to be had, much as with the drug trade elsewhere. And it will continue to expand as long as there’s a large-scale migration of vulnerable people with access to funds and no coordinated international response to stop it.

Eritrean refugee flows today run in all directions. They’re facilitated by smugglers with regional and, in some cases, global reach. The gangs behind this engage in a range of criminal activities, within which human trafficking is just a lucrative new line of business. Some have ties to global cartels and syndicates. Some have political agendas and fund them through such enterprises. Most are heavily armed.

Under such conditions, a narrowly conceived security response could quickly spin out of control and escalate into a major counterinsurgency, as in the Sinai in Egypt. For weaker states across the Sahel, the risks of ill-thought-out action are infinitely greater.

What Needs to Happen: An effective approach to this crisis would start with education and empowerment of the target population and involve efforts to identify and protect refugees throughout their flight. A key step is the early, uncoerced determination of status according to international standards. This could be coupled with an expansion of incentives to deter onward migration, including education, training, employment and, where appropriate, integration into host communities. But none of this can work without refugee engagement in the process itself.

Then, and only then, would a security operation targeted at the smuggling and trafficking have a chance of success. But it, too, needs to be multidimensional in substance and regional in scope. Each state in this network is acting independently of the others. Sudan has arrested individuals implicated in trafficking, including one police officer, but has not cracked down on corrupt officials or gone into Rashaida communities to take down the ringleaders. Ethiopia has instituted security measures within the refugee camps on its northern border but is not working with Sudan on cross-border movement. Egypt has launched military operations in the Sinai where the torture camps are situated, but the announced aim is to break up the Islamist insurgency—the government denies trafficking is taking place. A coordinated initiative would start with a conference of affected states, and it would have to be supported by donor states and appropriate agencies (Interpol among them), not only in terms of aid but also intelligence, logistics, coordination and communication.

But if the trafficking operations are truly to be rolled up, the marginalized populations from which they arise and on which they depend need to be offered sufficient incentives to withdraw support for the criminals. This means access to resources, economic alternatives to off-the-books trading, involvement in the local political process, education for their children and more. These people need to be made stakeholders in the states where they live, which is not the case today for the Sinai Bedouin or the Sudan-based Rashaida or most of the other groups involved in trans-Sahel smuggling.

Meanwhile, to dry up this particular supply of prey, political change is needed at the source, in Eritrea. That means, at a minimum, opening up the political system and the economy, limiting (not necessarily ending) national service, releasing political prisoners, implementing the long-stalled constitution and ending controls on travel so those who do want to go abroad as migrant workers can do so without illegally crossing borders and going through illicit smuggling networks.

The most important thing the United States can do to facilitate this process is convince Ethiopia to back off the border dispute that centers on a frontier town, Badme, and accept in practice—not just rhetorically— the 2002 Border Commission ruling that went in Eritrea's favor.

Ethiopia's intransigence on this issue—and US inaction—has long been the Asmara regime's most powerful argument for keeping the lid on all forms of dissent. Eritreans will simply not trust Washington—or Addis Ababa— until they see some evidence of good faith.

ERITREA/ETHIOPIA: Briefing the Final Report, Beyond the Impasse'

Khartoum (HAN) By Jason Mosley (April 10, 2014)

Weekly Regional Security and Defence Update and Analysis'

Jason Mosley is briefing the final report about the assumptions underlying much analysis about the conflict between Eritrea and Ethiopia, saying it was wrong to consider President Isaias acted irrationally or against the interests of the Eritrean state in relation to the findings of the Boundary Commission. Mr Mosley said his strategy might be poor, but not without logic. Mr Mosley said Eritrea's fear was that by entering into talks over the implementation of the Commission's findings the country would put in jeopardy the ruling itself. Eritreans worry that if they negotiate with Ethiopia, as Addis Ababa requests, they will negate the Commission's ruling." This they would not do, which meant that Ethiopia would need to open discussions while guaranteeing the adjudication.

The Final Report (April, 2014) - The author is grateful for the support and insights of many scholars, researchers, diplomats, activists and citizens of the Horn of Africa during the past several years that have informed and enriched his understanding of the region and its challenges. These individuals remain anonymous due to the sensitivity of the subject matter. The author expects some will disagree (perhaps strongly) with the conclusions drawn. Any errors remain his responsibility. For their support and participation during this project, thanks to the UK Foreign and Commonwealth Office, the Ethiopian mission in London, and the Eritrean mission in London. IGAD2020 With the Editor, Nur Kafi and Commentary (Text ends)

HUMAN RIGHTS CONCERN: UN urges Eritrea to free prisoners'

UN News (May 7, 2014) - The Government of Eritrea needs to put an immediate end to the widespread practices of arbitrary arrest, ill-treatment and persecution, says an independent expert appointed by the UN Human Rights Council to look into the situation in the country. "I urge the Eritrean authorities to immediately release, or charge and bring before a court of law, all detainees, including the members of the 'G-15', the journalists arrested in 2001, as well as those arrested for their opinions or religious beliefs," said Sheila B. Keetharuth, UN Special Rapporteur on the situation of human rights in Eritrea.

Ms. Keetharuth welcomed the reported release of eight detainees in Eritrea, which took place in April 2014, but which has not been publicly acknowledged by the Eritrean authorities. "Their release is a positive development, which I hope will be followed by more systematic releases," she said, expressing the hope that "Eritrea will abide by its obligations under international human rights law more consistently." Since her appointment in November 2012, the Special Rapporteur has made several requests to visit Eritrea, which have so far not been granted. She has repeatedly urged the Eritrean authorities to collaborate with her mandate with a view to addressing its human rights challenges.

Ms. Keetharuth, travelled to Germany and Switzerland from 17 to 28 March 2014 to collect first-hand information from Eritrean refugees and migrants on the human rights situation in Eritrea. The Special Rapporteur will submit her second report on the human rights situation in Eritrea to the Human Rights Council in June 2014. Independent experts or special rapporteurs are appointed by the Geneva-based UN Human Rights Council to examine and report back on a country situation or a specific human rights theme. The positions are honorary and the experts are not UN staff, nor are they paid for their work. Ms Keetharuth expressed concern about the unknown number of Eritreans who continue to be held in the country's secret detention centres. Thousands are believed to be detained incommunicado at unknown locations, without charge or trial.

"Those detained incommunicado and in undisclosed locations are at high risk of being tortured or submitted to other forms of ill-treatment," she said. "I call on the authorities to disclose the whereabouts of all detainees held incommunicado and provide immediate access to their families, medical doctors and legal representatives." Most of those men reportedly released had been arrested in 2005-2006 in Keren, 90 kilometres north-west of the capital, Asmara. Among them were several government officials and two medical doctors. It is unclear whether reasons have been provided for their arrest in the first place, or for their release. None of them has ever been brought before a court of law to review the legality of their detention. (Text ends)

May 9, 2014: Sudan deports 30 Eritreans, including refugees' By

Abdelmoneim Abu Idris Ali, AFP

Khartoum (AFP) - Sudan has deported 30 Eritreans, including at least six registered as refugees, back to their homeland where they risk detention and abuse, Human Rights Watch (HRW) said on Thursday. Sudan's ministry of foreign affairs could not immediately comment, and a source at the country's refugee commission had no information. The HRW statement came the same day that Eritrea's President Issaias Afeworki landed in Khartoum for a three-day official visit.

The Eritrean group of 30 was arrested near the Libyan border in early February and held for three months without charge and without access to the United Nations refugee agency (UNHCR), HRW said. "On May 1, 2014, Sudanese authorities in eastern Sudan handed 30 Eritreans over to Eritrean security forces," the group said, citing information from two advocates who were in telephone contact with the group. Opposition activists from Eritrea say the number deported was 45.

“Sudan is forcibly returning Eritreans to serious risk of detention and abuse at the hands of a brutal government,” said Gerry Simpson, senior refugee researcher at Human Rights Watch. The watchdog said international law forbids countries from deporting asylum seekers without first allowing them to apply for asylum and considering their cases. International law also prohibits deportation to places where they would face a risk of death or ill-treatment, HRW added.

According to the UNHCR, an average of 600 refugees from Eritrea make their way to neighbouring Sudan each month. Many Eritreans who enter Sudan travel on to Israel or try to reach Europe, often with the help of smugglers. Sudanese officials said last week that troops from Sudan and Libya had rescued hundreds of illegal migrants in the scorching desert border region between the two countries where traffickers had dumped them.

Ten migrants died, according to Sudanese authorities. Troops escorted the survivors, some of them in ill health, to the northern Sudanese town of Dongola. A source familiar with the situation told AFP on Thursday that the death toll was higher than 10, and that there had been an exchange of fire between Sudanese troops and the smugglers. Troops initially found about 300 hungry and thirsty victims. They later came across even more, bringing the total number rescued to 600, the military said.

An AFP journalist said most of the migrants who reached Dongola appeared to be Ethiopian or Eritrean, but there were some Sudanese as well. HRW, citing information from two Eritreans in the Dongola group, said a court in the town convicted the migrants of immigration offences. This puts them too at risk of deportation, HRW said. A UNHCR spokesman could not be immediately reached for comment on Thursday.

UNHCR does not currently have access to the northwest border region, the agency’s Sudan representative, Mohammed Adar, told AFP last week. But he said the Sudanese government “has been relatively respectful of our non-return advisory to Eritrea and deportations to Eritrea have been rare.” Adar added that UNHCR did not expect Eritreans among the newly-rescued group to be sent back. (Text ends)

Eritrea: The Cuba of Africa

Posted by Alexandra Valiente on May 20, 2014

By Thomas C. Mountain

The Cuban experience with the next-door imperial power bears similarities to the treatment Eritrea has been subjected to by the U.S. and its proxies in Africa.

“Sanctions aimed at crippling their economies and hurting their people have hit both countries hard.”

"Pax Americana finds it's role as the only superpower increasingly challenged the role models Cuba and Eritrea."

The Cuba of Africa? Authentic journalist Andre Vltchek was the first person I heard using the expression and it started me thinking about the small east African country of Eritrea that he was refering to.

The similarities are striking. Both Cuba and Eritrea are small, independent, socialist and revolutionary. Both are suffering under sanctions by the USA and both have been maliciously accused of supporting "terrorism" by the enforcers of Pax Americana.

Cuba and Eritrea have been hit hard by western industrialization precipitated climate change with Cuba being increasingly hammered by hurricanes and Eritrea, lying at the eastern end of Africa's Sahel, plagued by record breaking droughts.

Both countries have a strong committment to their peoples health and education with Cuba's public health system the envy of its neighbors and Eritrea leading the way in preventing malaria mortality and HIV/Aids in Africa.

Cuba and Eritrea are both unique to their geographic regions in their refusal to accept demands to impose western style "democracy" on their people. Cuba is the only country in Central and South America that doesn't hold "elections" and Eritrea is the only country in Africa not to do so.

But what is probably the most important similarity is that the governments of both country's came to power through the armed struggle, through "the barrel of a gun". This puts both in the ranks of a mere handful of such countries that successfully liberated their country's in the 20th century.

"Both are suffering under sanctions by the USA and both have been maliciously accused of supporting "terrorism" by the enforcers of Pax Americana."

Many tried but few succeeded, starting with the victory of what became the Soviet Union in the Russian civil war. This was followed two decades later by the Chinese revolution under the "Peoples War" strategy of Mao Tse Tung. Next came Vietnam, following the same "Peoples War" doctrine under the leadership of Ho Chi Minn. Then came the Cuban Revolution under the leadership of Fidel Castro in "Peoples War" short version.

The last successful armed struggle for national liberation in the 20th century was the Eritrean people's 30-year independence war that saw Africa's first military defeat of a colonialist power resulting in independence.

Today both Cuba and Eritrea are faced with very serious challenges, both military and economic. Sanctions aimed at crippling their economies and hurting their people have hit both countries hard. Both countries are facing military threats either directly by the USA or via is proxies.

And especially important, both countries are lead by an aging leadership and are struggling to come up with a strategy that will see the next generation of leaders keeping their countries on the path of development that will lead to what the Eritrean President described as "a rich Eritrea without rich Eritreans".

Cuba has been liberated for over half a century and Eritrea this week will celebrate is 23rd year of independence. As Pax Americana finds it's role as the only superpower increasingly challenged the role models Cuba and Eritrea represent are becoming more and more of an ideological threat to the "paper tiger" that might describe how the USA is being viewed more and more in today's world.

If the planet is to survive the climate change catastrophe we are facing it would seem that a radical, revolutionary change is needed. Maybe its time to start examining just what can be learned from two small countries that have been at the forefront of resisting the growing threat of the global warming juggernaut the world is facing.

Thomas C. Mountain is a life long revolutionary activist and educator, living and writing from Eritrea since 2006. He can be reached at thomascmountain_at_gmail_dot_com.

Related:
Human Rights Watch on a Dogged Mission of Defamation Against Eritrea Amnesty International in Eritrea: Infamous Tool of Conspiracies Human Trafficking and the Human Rights Agenda Against Eritrea Eritrea: Behind the Crisis PBS Documentary Eritrea: A Nation in Isolation
Eritrea's Independent Path
AFRICOM and the Truth About Libya, Eritrea, Somalia, Sudan Eritrea: US Intervention and Militarization of Africa Eritrea on Libya 360°
Everything You Are Not Supposed To Know About Eritrea – Part I Everything You Are Not Supposed To Know About

Eritrea – Part II Everything You Are Not Supposed To Know About Eritrea – Part III

ERITREA: Trafficking and torturing Eritrean refugees’

By Graham Peebles (May 20, 2014) Life in Eritrea is brutal and shrouded in secrecy. The world is indifferent. The regime trusts nobody – even the United Nation's special rapporteur on Eritrea, Sheila Keetharuth, has been denied a visa.

Poverty, repression and injustice

Last year Keetharuth said: "Basic tenets of the rule of law are not respected." Following this, the UN Security Council "strongly condemned" Eritrea's "continued widespread and systematic violations of human rights and fundamental freedoms." Violations include forced and child labour, "arbitrary detention, and severe restrictions on freedoms of expression, association and religion" as well as violence against women, gender inequality, gender-based violence, female genital mutilation and economic discrimination.

Eritrea is beset by fundamental problems, yet President Isaias Afwerki blindly rejects all foreign intervention, including urgent food aid. Eritrea was ranked 77th (out of 78) in the 2013 Global Hunger Index, and over 60 per cent of its population is malnourished. In a report by risk analysis firm Maplecroft, it was identified as the country where child labour is most rampant. Children as young as 15 are routinely conscripted into the military where, according to Human Rights Watch, they are "subject to violence and ill-treatment. Beatings, torture, and prolonged incarcerations are common."

Military service is compulsory and, although it is officially 18 months long, many men, women and children spend their entire working lives in uniform, and are used as forced labour on essentially civilian jobs. Women recruits are victims of rape and sexual violence by officers. There is no constitution, functioning legislature or independent judiciary – thousands are arrested and detained without trial, denied access to lawyers and their families, and have no appeal against sweeping judgments. According to Human Rights Watch, "Death in captivity is not unusual. Many prisoners disappear, their whereabouts and health unknown. Former prisoners describe being confined in vastly overcrowded underground cells or shipping containers, with no space to lie down, little or no light, oppressive heat or cold, and vermin."

In 2001 all independent media outlets were closed and journalists arrested. There is no free press, radio or television. Non-Governmental Organizations (NGOs) are banned, telecommunications and the internet are monitored and restricted, and parliamentary/presidential elections remain a dream. All power is concentrated in the hands of Afwerki who with the help of the military has held office since independence from Ethiopia in 1991. As the Guardian newspaper says, all "promises of democracy, the foundation stone of the independence struggle, went out of the window… a gap was quickly created between ex-fighters and civilians, the diaspora were systematically prohibited from returning, and draconian measures were taken against the educated and those who voiced complaints".

The economy is in tatters – GDP per capita is around USD 560, the state has destroyed the private sector and poured funds into military mobilization. Eritrea has fought two border wars with Ethiopia, with whom relations remain hostile following Ethiopia's failure to abide by the findings of an international boundary commission. Since independence, militarized politics has fashioned foreign policy and, despite nationwide poverty, the junta has found the means to engage in armed conflict with Yemen and Djibouti and has enmeshed itself in military mayhem in eastern Sudan, Darfur and Somalia.

Seeking sanctuary

Grinding poverty and the regime's widespread violations of human rights are forcing tens of thousands of Eritreans – mostly young, poorly educated women – to flee the country annually. According to the UN High Commissioner for Refugees (UNHCR), over 305,000 (more than 5 per cent of the six million population) left during the past decade. Last year every month 3,000 people headed for Egypt, Israel and the Gulf States, via Sudan and the Sinai Peninsula. To facilitate passage, many turn to criminal smugglers who charge extortionate "fees of between USD 1,000 and 5,000 USD", and large numbers fall victim to traffickers operating in Eritrea, Ethiopia, Sudan and Egypt.

Exploitation of the vulnerable is the name of the trafficking game. The Eritrean military exploit citizens' desperation to escape conscription and forced labour by charging high fees to smuggle them out of the country; corrupt officials in Egypt and Sudan – specifically security personnel stationed on the border checkpoints – facilitate refugees' passage in exchange for bribes. A small number of asylum seekers end up in Ethiopia, but the vast majority find themselves in one of the overcrowded Shagarab refugee camps (covering three sites) in east Sudan. The UNHCR estimates there are approximately 89,000 refugees in east Sudan most of whom are Eritrean. Approximately 30,000 live in Shagarab. It says it is "seeing rising incidents of abductions and disappearances of mainly Eritrean refugees, allegedly involving border tribes, in eastern Sudan. This is occurring in and around refugee camps."…

The Sinai, Israel and xenophobia

After the 1978 Camp David peace accords between Israel and Egypt, the Sinai Peninsula was returned to Egypt. It is a lawless wilderness that has for years served as a transit route for people escaping persecution, political turmoil, hunger and poverty from the Horn of Africa. As Amnesty International reports, refugees and asylum seekers are transported through the desert region in overcrowded "trucks and other vehicles, often with poor ventilation". They receive little or no food and water, and some die en-route.

In Sinai "they are subjected to torture, forced marriage, rape or bonded labour", held captive with the aim of extorting money from their relatives or communities. According to the UNHCR, "Many former victims have recounted horrific tales of being held for months and repeatedly raped, of having plastic melted over their back and legs, and of being electrocuted and burned. Many have died at the hands of their tormentors.”Others report being urinated on and having fingernails pulled out. Rape of both men and women is apparently commonplace. “Some have allegedly been murdered because their families were unable to pay the ransom,” Amnesty International says, and even if ransoms are paid to secure their release, some still get sold on to other traffickers.

The fortunate one show are released pass over the Egyptian border into Israel, where, traumatized and in need of support, they are unwelcome. Israeli Prime Minister Binyamin Netanyahu described refugees and asylum-seekers as “infiltrators” who “threaten the Jewish character of Israel”. These victims of brutality and criminal torture are treated like criminals and herded into detention centres, albeit with a daytime open-door policy. They are not regarded as refugees by the Israeli authorities but, as Netanyahu puts it, as “people who are breaking the law and whom we will deal with to the fullest extent of the law”. Comments by Eli Yishai, Israel’s former interior minister, reveal a pervasive xenophobic attitude. He urged the government “to put every single one of the infiltrators in detention facilities, take their work permits, put them on aeroplanes and send them packing to their countries or a third country”.

As a signatory to the 1951 UN Convention Relating to the Status of Refugees, Israel is obliged to investigate asylum applications on an individual basis, yet it ignores such duties and, far from examining individual claims, responds to all African refugees in the same dismissive manner. Asylum seekers cannot legally be deported if they face danger in their country of origin, so the Israelis have set up a “monetary incentive system” whereby asylum seekers from Africa are offered USD 3,500 to leave. Most of those taking up the “incentive” are Sudanese.

This January tens of thousands of Eritrean and Sudanese asylum seekers demonstrated in Tel-Aviv, calling for the Israeli government to grant them refugee status and to change its policy of detaining them in the Holot detention facility in the Negev. The UNHCR supports the people’s legitimate demands, and their representative in Israel, Walpurga Englbrecht, “has publicly stated that the process of indefinite detention in Holot does not comply with the norms of international human rights. ”Eritreans make up an estimated 60 per cent of the 60,000 illegal African migrants estimated to be in Israel, and yet to date only two Eritreans have been granted refugee status with its benefits of citizenship.

Abused and suppressed at home, the vulnerable are exploited from the beginning of their journey to the detained ignoble end in what the UNHCR says, is one of the most unreported humanitarian crises in the world. Pressure needs to be put on Israel to act with compassion and in accordance with its international obligations, and Egypt must act to root out traffickers operating in Sinai. Human Rights Watch states that when the Egyptian military were active there in September-October last year, abductions dropped. Security personnel withdrew and the ransom phones resumed ringing. Despite overwhelming evidence of horrific abuses taking place within their jurisdiction, Egyptian forces have "taken no steps to end them", says Human Rights Watch.

The siege state

Life in Eritrea, though, is the poisonous root of the refugees' agonies, and all steps need to be taken to prevent it from becoming yet another failed state. In a positive sign last year, the UN agreed a four-year USD 188 million "cooperation framework".

"The UN will provide USD 50 million and attempt to raise the remaining USD 138 million from donor countries for capacity building, food security, environmental improvements and social services." However, without regime involvement, providing assistance presents "acute coordination challenges", because of "access restrictions on international staff" and the "absence of up-to-date information" from the government, according to Human Rights Watch.

Eritrea has become what the International Crisis Group describes as "a siege state", whose "government is suspicious of its own population, neighbours and the wider world". Engagement by the international community; assessment of need, cooperation, dialogue and support is urgently needed; enforcement of the border ruling between Eritrea and Ethiopia would go a long way to building trust with foreign powers – an essential requirement in assessing and delivering aid and establishing relations. (Text ends)

May 22, 2014: ERITREA: Refugees vow to join armed struggle' Sudan

Tribune By Tesfa-Alem Tekle

ADDIS ABABA – Thousands of Eritrean refugees in Ethiopia on Wednesday vowed to take up arms and join opposition forces in the struggle to remove the government in Asmara. The decision by the Eritrean refugees comes as Eritrea celebrates its 23rd independence day. The Red Sea nation gained its independence from Ethiopia in 1991 after 30 years of struggle.

President Issaias Afeworki who has lead the country since independence turned the country into a one-party state which is considered as one of the most repressive regimes in the world. In a joint communiqué extended to Sudan Tribune, the Eritrean refugees said the regime in Asmara has failed to bring democracy, human rights and freedom to its people and they don't want to see the regime prolonging its grip on power. Despite gaining independence, the refugees said the younger generation in Eritrea has during the past 23 years become the victim of executions, imprisonment, disappearances, harassment and intimidation.

"Eritrea was liberated but not its people" reads part of the statement adding that "tyrannical Eritrean regime is committed to further crimes and atrocities against innocent Eritreans” and it was time to take collective military action. They said some hundreds of refugee at camps in Ethiopia have decided to join the armed struggle rather than remain as refugees in Ethiopia for an indefinite period of time. “We don’t want to wait and see here for a miracle to happen that would bring a democratic system of governance in Eritrea.” Over the last ten years hundreds of thousands of Eritreans including members of the army and navy have fled their country to neighbouring countries, including Ethiopia, Sudan, Djibouti and Yemen.

In Ethiopia alone, there are 92,460 Eritrean refugees at end of April, Kisut Gebregzabiher a United Nations refugee agency (UNHCR) representative in Addis Ababa told Sudan Tribune on Wednesday. Gebregzabiher said that an average of 2,000 Eritreans cross into Ethiopia every month fleeing political repression or to escape military service which is mandatory to all citizens aged between 18 and 50 and can last a lifetime.

International human rights organisations say that Eritrea stands amongst world’s top worst human rights and press freedom records. The regime is also accused of turning the country into a “giant prison”. Reports indicate that there are up to 10,000 political prisoners languishing in the country’s harsh and secret detention centers, which are sometimes shipping containers.

The Eritrean refugees in Ethiopia further called up on those forces of change within the Eritrean ruling party, including the army to join them in the struggle to topple the regime so that democratic change is achieved. (Text ends)

ERITREA: Scores of Eritrean refugees enter Ethiopia daily: UNHCR’

World Bulletin/News Desk (May 25, 2014)

The U.N. refugee agency (UNHCR) said on Wednesday that around 70 Eritrean refugees were currently entering Ethiopia on a daily basis. “Eritrean refugees came to Ethiopia and continue to do so fleeing oppression and forced military service,” Kisut Gebre Egziabher, a spokesman for the UNHCR’s Ethiopia office, told Anadolu Agency on Thursday. “As of the end of April, the total number of Eritrean refugees in Ethiopia reached 93,000,” he added.

Eritrea and Ethiopia used to be a single country, but a 1993 referendum saw Eritreans vote for independence. Tension between Addis Ababa and Asmara and has persisted since a bloody two-year border war, in which tens of thousands were killed, ended in 2000. Due to the historical relationship between the peoples of Ethiopia and Eritrea, Egziabher said, refugees from the latter were free to live outside the camp with their Ethiopian relatives.

According to Egziabher, the UNHCR has a way of making the lives of Eritrean refugees in Ethiopia more permanent, because they can’t return to their homeland due to safety concerns. “Wherever refugees can return safely to their countries of origin, the UNHCR prefers reintegrating them – which is not the case concerning Eritrean refugees,” he said. “UNHCR thus has a special out-of-camp policy for Eritrean refugees that includes scholarships locally or third-country relocation that allows for asylum in Europe or in America," he added. "This depends, however, on the willingness of the recipient countries," he went on to say. "Since 2006, most of the 6000 Eritrean refugees sheltered at Kebribeyah camp have left for the U.S. under an asylum privilege provided by that country."

Different: Egziabher pointed out that refugees arriving from Eritrea were different from those coming from Somalia or South Sudan, where conflicts have forced thousands of refugees into neighboring Ethiopia. "Unlike refugees coming to Ethiopia from other countries, most Eritrean refugees are able-bodied young men," he explained. "They are educated as well." "Refugees coming from other countries are mostly women and children," he said. There are four refugee camps in northern Ethiopia's Tigray Regional State that cater to Eritrean refugees: Shimelba (set up in 2004), May Ayni (2008), Adiharush (2010) and Hitsats (2013). Eritrean refugees have also sought shelter at two camps in the northeastern Afar Regional State: the Berhaile Camp and the Aysaitta Camp. There are also Eritrean refugees living in small villages in Ethiopia.

Meanwhile, Egziabher puts the number of Somali refugees in Ethiopian refugee camps at some 240,300. "They flee conflict and drought in their country at various times," he said. There are currently eight refugee camps for Somali refugees in Ethiopia, the oldest being the 23-year-old Kebribeyah Camp, which accommodates refugees who fled strongman Siad Barre's rule. The Awbere and Sheder refugee camps are also relatively old, having been set up in 2007 and 2008 respectively. The Bekolmanya, Melkadida, Kobe, Hilawein and Buramino refugee camps, meanwhile, were all established in 2009. They accommodate refugees who fled the rules of the Council of Islamic Courts and Al-Shabaab and the intermittent droughts that have occurred in the region, said Egziabher. (Text ends)

Eritreans fleeing from forced labor draft: U.N. report'
By Tom Miles, Reuters (May 28, 2014)

GENEVA (Reuters) - Eritrea is running a forced labor program that is spawning human rights violations and fuelling a refugee exodus, according to a report that will be debated next month at the U.N. Human Rights Council.

Sheila B. Keetharuth, an independent investigator who is the U.N. "special rapporteur" on human rights in Eritrea, wrote that torture, sexual violence and extra-judicial killings "continue unabated" in the Horn of Africa country.

Her report said that fear and experience of national service - an indefinite conscription that amounts to forced labor - were prompting many people to flee the country.

"The military police carries out routine conscription round-ups, known as 'giffas', in homes, workplaces, the street or other public places, with the aim of rounding up persons considered fit to serve, draft evaders and those who escaped from national service; including minors," the report said.

"Opposing such a round-up can lead to on-the-spot execution, as deadly force is permitted against those resisting or attempting to flee," it added. The Human Rights Council will debate the findings in Geneva on June 16.

The U.N. refugee agency UNHCR estimates that 2,000 people of Eritrea's 6 million population are fleeing every month, the report said, and their relatives are forced to pay fines of 50,000 nafka (about $3,350) for each family member who has left.

Most Eritreans cannot afford such a sum, so a family member may be detained until the money is paid, or business licenses or property may be confiscated, the report said.

Eritreans are the most numerous among those attempting the risky crossing from North Africa to Europe by boat, a trip that has killed hundreds so far this year.

The government began its program of national service in 1995 but it has turned into an indefinite conscription, the report said. Many people are put to work in reforestation, soil and water conservation and reconstruction.

Eritrea dismisses charges of rights abuses and says it has indefinite military service due to a festering border dispute with Ethiopia.

Keetharuth's report said draft evaders and deserters "face heavy punishment, including lengthy periods of detention, torture and other forms of inhumane treatment." Many women who are drafted are raped by army commanders, or punished for resisting.

Keetharuth asked to visit Eritrea for her investigation, but was refused entry. She collected evidence from Eritrean refugees in four countries and plans to visit three more. (Text ends)

ERITREA: Catholic bishops criticise 'desolate' nation'

By Ashraf Shazly, AFP (June 10, 2014) - Four Eritrean [Catholic] bishops have issued a rare criticism damning the situation in the authoritarian Red Sea state, according to a copy of their letter released on an opposition website. The letter highlighted the plight of tens of thousands of Eritreans who have fled across the heavily guarded border into neighboring nations, running away from open-ended conscription and the iron-grip rule of President Issaias Afeworki. Such outspoken views are rarely heard from inside Eritrea, ranked worst in the world for press freedom by the rights group Reporters Without Borders.

"There is no reason to search for a country of honey if you are in one," the letter in Eritrea's Tigrinya language read, according to a translation from the opposition website Awate.com. Eritrea's youth were leaving in search of “peaceful countries, to countries of justice, of work, where one expresses himself loudly, a country where one works and earns,” the letter added, signed by four bishops from the country's influential Catholic Church.

The UN estimates as many as 3,000 Eritreans flood into Sudan and Ethiopia every month, from a country of some five million people and about the size of England. "On top of the crisis of people leaving their country, the family unit is fragmented because members are scattered in (national) service, army, rehabilitation centres, prisons," the lengthy letter read. "Aged parents are left with no one to care for them, and have been spiritually damaged. And all that combined is making the country desolate," it added. There was no immediate response from Eritrea's Ministry of Information.

The four bishops, from Eritrea's Christian Catholic churches are Mengsteab Tesfamariam, bishop of the capital Asmara, as well as Tomas Osman of Barentu, Kidane Yeabio of Keren and Feqremariam Hagos of Segeneti. Rights groups say scores of political prisoners are held in brutal desert camps without trial. "All those who are arrested should first be handled humanely and sympathetically, and then, based on the accusations against them, they should be presented to a court," the letter added. The letter was issued last month for Eritrea's 23rd anniversary of independence from arch-foe Ethiopia, but was only released on the Awate.com site this month. (Text ends)

Eritrea's National Soccer Team, the world leader in defections' By

Caroline Winter (June 15, 2014)

With the World Cup set to kick off in Brazil, soccer officials in Eritrea are trying to build a national team from scratch. Its a process that takes place almost every year, because players from the tiny East African nation keep running away en masse. More than 50 member of the Eritrean soccer team have defected in the past five years alone.

A dozen players disappeared during a tournament in Kenya in 2009, only to turn up later at the U.N. High Commission for Refugees in Nairobi. After returning home down without several stars, the coach attempted to present the loss as an opportunity. "Maybe some of the players are very childish to make the disappearance like that, but we have many players," he is quoted as saying in the book Thirty-One-Nil.

Two years later, another 13 Eritrean players absconded in Tanzania after reaching the quarter-final round of a regional tournament. Several won asylum in the U.S. and moved to Houston. The following year's mass defection came in Uganda, when 17 top players and the team's doctor vanished and resurfaced 18 months later in the Dutch town of Gorimchen, after spending time in two refugee camps. "It is a bit surreal; we are small town and suddenly you get a complete national team turn up," Ronald Tukker, a local soccer club's spokesman, told the New York Times.

The coach joined the Eritrean soccer exodus last year, disappearing in Kenya along with 11 more members of the national team.

Most of the escaped players won't speak with the press because they fear for their families back home, and rightly so. Eritrea has a reputation as the North Korea of Africa, with a record as one of the world's worst abusers of human rights. Imprisonment and torture are common, and there is no freedom of the press. Reporters Without Borders called the country "a vast open prison for its people." As many as 4,000 Eritreans who aren't on the national soccer team attempt to flee every month despite the grave risks. Many are kidnapped for ransom in Sudan, and dozens drown on ships headed for Europe.

It makes sense that soccer players permitted to travel internationally would make a dash. Star athletes from repressive countries have a long history of defecting while abroad. Several have vanished during Olympic games dating back as far as 1948, most from Eastern Bloc countries. A stunning 117 defected during the 1972 Olympics in Munich. Cuban athletes regularly run off, and its well known that a multimillion-dollar market exists around smuggling talented Cuban baseball players into the U.S. Some, such as Los Angeles Dodgers outfielder Yasiel Puig, are now superstars. Story: Will World Cup Sponsors Get Kicked, Too?

While Eritrean soccer refugees also go on to play soccer in their new home countries, none has become especially famous. And Eritrea's national team continues to struggle with as its talent flees. According to FIFA, the country ranks 201 internationally. (Text ends)

UN: Spike in Eritreans fleeing human rights abuses'

AP (June 19, 2014) GENEVA — A United Nations human rights investigator said Thursday that 4,000 Eritreans desperate to escape its government's rights abuses are fleeing the country every month — almost double from just a year ago.

Sheila Keetharuth, the U.N. special rapporteur for the small Horn of Africa nation, said many Eritreans are running from a government that forces men and women to serve for an indefinite number of years in the army. She said the government also arbitrarily detains people and punishes them with impunity in secret detention centers. "The situation leaves a desolate landscape of people fleeing, young people who don't want to be in this situation," she told reporters in Geneva. "My analysis is that the national service equals forced labor."

Advocacy groups such as Human Rights Watch call Eritrea one of the most closed countries in the world since the country gained independence in 1993, following a U.N.-backed referendum in which Eritreans voted to break away from Ethiopia. Keetharuth told the U.N.'s 47-nation Human Rights Council that the rights situation appears to be further deteriorating in Eritrea, despite government claims of progress toward six of the U.N.'s eight anti-poverty goals.

“What is shocking also is that people know those risks,” she said of the Eritreans fleeing across deserts and seas into Ethiopia and Sudan, which each receive about 2,000 refugees a month. In last year’s report, she put the number of total refugees each month at 2,000 to 3,000. “People know those risks — they take them because there are no other choices.” Somalia has tabled a resolution at the council’s session this month that would extend Keetharuth’s mandate and authorize a commission of inquiry into the alleged violations she has outlined.

Eritrea collecting ‘money for the dictator’ from expats in Canada’ CBC News (June 20, 2014) - In a modest Edmonton apartment, WegahtaTesfamariam draws her slim hand across her cheek and explains how her native country is trying to make her a victim of a tax scam Canada thought it shut down a year ago. The 28-year-old is a permanent resident of Canada, not yet a citizen, and had to renew her Eritrean passport back in February.

She was in for a nasty surprise. As she told CBC News, Eritrea demanded a share of her annual income in a levy some liken to extortion. “There is a representative of the government in Edmonton. He asked me first I should pay two per cent. “I was like, surprised. I know that paying two per cent stopped in Canada last year. He said, ‘If you need any service from Eritrean government, that’s what you have to do.’ I clearly told him I don’t want to pay that.”

And no wonder. Tesfamariam’s bill would come to roughly $1,200, a lot of money for a newcomer to Canada just a few years into the workforce. Although as a trained drafting technologist, she’s in a better economic place than many Eritreans who work here at the bottom of the skills ladder. Other countries also tax their nationals living abroad, but Eritrea’s has brought about a special degree of global condemnation because of the surreptitious way it goes about collecting the money, and because it is a repressive regime that has been under UN-imposed economic sanctions since 2009 for financing insurgent movements in the Horn of Africa.

Canada subscribes to those UN sanctions, which gives them the force of law in this country, and Ottawa went a step further in May 2013, after CBC News revealed how Eritrea’s Toronto-based consulate was orchestrating the so-called tax, sometimes adding in an additional defence fee controversially earmarked for the military.

At the time, Canada expelled Eritrea’s senior diplomat in this country—its Consul-General—for activities inconsistent with the role of a diplomat, Foreign Minister John Baird said in a carefully worded statement. It was one of the strictest diplomatic actions taken against Eritrea by any of the several countries where this controversial tax has been exposed, most recently in Australia. And it held out some hope the tax collections might stop.

Yet 10 months later, when Tesfamariam got in touch with an official in the Toronto consulate, it was as if nothing Canada had done really mattered. As she later wrote to Citizenship and Immigration Canada: “He told [me] that I’ve to pay two per cent tax for the Eritrean government in Eritrea from the date I enter Canada to present, and he also asked me to mail my income tax papers from Revenue Canada to consular office in Toronto for him to calculate the amount I should be paying, and only then I can ask about [passport] renewal." She was disgusted. "An embassy or a consulate should be representative of a people and a government," she said. "They should be here working for us, not for the government. They don't care what kind of service they give. They're just here to collect money for the dictator in Eritrea." Tesfamariam is not alone in objecting to being treated like a cash cow by her consulate.

An Eritrean activist who used to live in England and asked to remain anonymous invited CBC News to listen as he telephoned the number of Ahmed Iman, the senior Eritrean consulate official in Toronto. The man inquired about obtaining papers for a power of attorney. The Eritrean official immediately raised the matter of money. "Did you fulfill all the other said things?" he asked, using a euphemism for payment. "What shall I fulfill?" the man asked.

"This two from a hundred and things," replied Iman.
"Two per cent?"
"Yes," Iman said.
"How can I calculate it?" asked the activist.
"We write to those in England, and they will tell us he is paying this and this," Iman said.
The conversation then turned to the change in payment tactics.
"Everything is paid in Eritrea," said the official. "It is almost stopped here. It has been two years."
"How am I going to pay it in Eritrea?" asked the activist.
"It is not necessary for you to go, but through someone, or if there are people you know."

Eritrea has never been apologetic about collecting the cash, believing it to be the right of a sovereign state. And it does have loyalists in Canada and around the world who publicly support the tax, and lobby against Canada's opposition to Eritreans here paying it. As recently as June 3, the Eritrean website Madote reported that the Coalition of Eritrean-Canadian Communities and Organisations appeared before the parliamentary sub-committee on human rights in Ottawa to say.

"We are being prevented from effectively exercising our dual citizenship rights, by paying the two per cent rehabilitation tax we voluntary remit to Eritrea each year. "This tax is what allows us to contribute to the development of the country and allows us to benefit from access to important services and property rights in Eritrea." When CBC News contacted Ahmed Iman, the senior consulate official at the Eritrean consulate in Toronto, he confirmed that Eritreans in Canada still have to pay the levy. The big difference is, they don't pay the Consulate directly anymore. They pay in Eritrea. "They have to pay the two per cent, too. But they don’t pay it in here,” Iman said. “We are not collecting the two per cent in Canada or at our office, our consulate-general. But we give them [Eritreans in Canada] the information." Asked how counselling people how to pay is any different from soliciting, he said "No, no. We not soliciting. We are giving information."

A year ago, before Canada cracked down on the practice, there were bureaucratic forms to fill out, and funds were wired from branches of the Toronto Dominion Bank in Canada to the Deutsche Zentral-Genossenschaftsbank of Frankfurt. From there, documents showed the funds were sent to the Housing and Commerce Bank of Eritrea, majority owned by the ruling regime, the People's Front for Democracy and Justice (PFDJ). But these days, no forms, and no banks.

Eritreans living here are instructed to have the money hand-delivered to government offices in the capital city of Asmara. And because its strapped for hard currency, the government wants it in cash, in Canadian dollars in Waghata Tesfamariam's case. That requirement just makes things worse for someone like her. Even if she could go to Eritrea with the money, she wouldn't, describing it as a society that echoes apartheid-era South Africa. "Well, you're always hunted. You can't go town to town. You need a permit. I would not be able to go anywhere. Sometimes they suddenly come and ask for papers in the streets."

Known in some quarters as the North Korea of Africa, Eritrea has a bad reputation, with human rights organizations reporting that thousands of citizens have been imprisoned without cause. Eritrea put Tesfamariam behind bars the first time she tried to flee the country, and pressed her into two years of unpaid national service.

She doesn't want to risk that again, and doesn't know anyone there who could pay or take the money in on her behalf. So with her passport about to expire, and no prospect of getting a new one, she's about to go into an almost stateless limbo. In the view of Winnipeg human rights lawyer David Matas, who represents Eritrean activists in Canada, this new payment process is just as illegal as the old one.

"Its not papered. You don't get letters any more. You don't get instructions about what bank to send it to. Its done verbally now, but its the same violation. "I would say they are more guilty, because not only are they violating the law, they are also being dishonest about it, which they weren't before."

Tesfamariam's letter to Citizenship and Immigration Canada suggests the Canadian government has been made aware that the controversial tax is still being collected by a different means. But she found the CIC reply unhelpful.

"If ... a request for the renewal of your passport ... is refused, the letter of refusal should be forwarded to this office in order that your application for a Certificate of Identity can be reviewed," says the reply, dated May 6, 2014. In other words, go back to the Eritrean consulate that won't give you any information—let alone a passport—without a cash contribution, and ask it for a letter of refusal. Tesfamariam is pretty sure she'll never get any letter, especially now that she has gone public with her case. “I am talking today because I want to encourage Eritrean people to speak out,” she says.

As a strategy, it is not without risk. The UN reports that families of activists overseas are often singled out for persecution back in Eritrea, which has informants in Canada. “If I talk on TV [here], the Eritrean government won’t know, but the agents will and they will transfer my case. Some of them came as a refugee, but are still servants of the government. “Eritrean people don’t feel free, even though they’re living in a free country” she says, alluding to the fact that those who fled repression in Eritrea are still living in its shadow here. (Text ends)

4 Eritreans named among individuals who funded the Iraqi ISIS’

Article translated from Arabic to English using Google Translator

ST Report (June 21, 2014) - A report documents U.S. for (131) name for the academics, activists and clerics belonging to the (31) state from around the world, providing support legitimate “jihadist movements and groups Armed Among these, as indicated by the documents, (12) Personal Iraqi political and religious, most notably (6) businessmen influential in the Iraqi market, issued a U.S. State Department report, earlier this month, stating that private donations from the Gulf States remained the main source of financing of terrorist groups The documents reveal that support legitimate “jihadist movements consists of (7) forms, the most important financial support through charity donations and zakat, after stirring the passion and fervor among Muslims,” preceded by the support legitimate to improve the image of armed jihad recruitment and call him. ” and included documents names (28) Personal Saudi Arabia for supporting the so-called jihad “and (12) Iraqi figure, most notably (6) influential businessmen in the Iraqi market, and (10), Pakistanis, and (8) of Algeria, and (6) the Palestinians, and (6) Moroccan, and (6) characters from Senegal, and (6) Indonesians, 5 figures Kuwaiti, and 4 of Eritrea, and 3 from Turkey, and (4) people from Egypt, Lebanon, and (2) of Britain, as well as personalities from Ghana , Sudan, Jordan, Yemen, Qatar, Bahrain, Comoros, Kenya, Somalia, Mauritania, Nigeria, Nepal, Sri Lanka, Thailand, Bangladesh, and other residents in Sweden, the Netherlands and Australia.

showed documents: that the types of support also includes providing the necessary support for the holding of conferences and seminars to expand relations between the leaders of the armed factions or on behalf of the coordinate and expand their operations Jihadi and ways of financing and determine the cost of “support numerous classifications according to the documents, includes the allocation of adequate funds for the development of websites factions and jihadist movements, as well as to support the publication of books, letters and other publications.” and financiers Iraqis, according to the documents, that most of them were enriched at the expense of its relationship to the system Previously, running now businesses in the Iraqi market is agencies, commercial companies and remittances, banks and civil, as well as investment in the field of industry and business variety. ”

According to the documents, that the funding primarily basically go to the Mujahideen Army and the Brigades and Hamas of Iraq and the Islamic Army, which is the largest armed faction in the country. ” the documents say, that one of the leading politicians, businessmen, who has custody of Wi-News “on anonymity, depends on the Army of the Mujahideen and he considers his strike in the event of exposure to any problems.” Based on security reports precedent: the size of the fund operations jihadist in Iraq reached two million dollars a month, all come from the outside. ”

In spite of the conditions imposed by the U.S. State Department with the assistance of the Treasury on the banks and the sources and destinations of remittances in the world, but that the money donors deployed in various Islamic countries are still an important source movements Aljhadihotnzim Qaeda in Iraq, the traditional ways of funding sources, and adopted the taxation of businesses and industries in the areas it controls. while in Syria, was the oil more non-traditional sources to fund the activities of armed jihadist movements, which dominated the front victory beginning at oil refineries and wells in areas Many, Mrs. Mubarak Deir ez-Zor and Al-Hasakah and proceeded to extract oil and sell it, saving her from financial income (about 2.4) million days, or about 72 million per month, which helped to finance the activities of armed, and the names of the financiers of terrorist movements (jihadist) and al-Qaeda in Alacherq East, Iraq, and Syria in particular, according to the documents: Sheikh Hussein Moussa Hussein, Cleric/Eritrea, Sheikh Ramadan Mohammed Nur, Cleric/Eritrea, Mr. Saleh Ali Saleh, an Islamic preacher/Eritrea, Sheikh Mahmoud Idris addicted, Cleric/Eritrea. (Text ends)

June 24, 2014: HOUSTON POLICE NEWS: Drunk Eritrean Driver runs red light, kills 4 in crash’

(ST Accident News) Prosecutors say 31-year-old Million Zeghergis was legally intoxicated when he ran a red light and struck a car carrying elderly people on their way home from religious services. Four were pronounced dead at the scene of the accident. The lone survivor, Shanumati Bhatt, is in stable condition at Memorial Hermann Hospital. Her husband was one of those killed. Bhatt’s granddaughter said the couple and three friends were on their way home from a Hindu temple at around 10 p.m. Sunday night when the Honda Civic they were riding in was struck by Zeghergis’ van in the intersection of Beechnut Street, and Synott Road. At a magistrate’s hearing this afternoon, prosecutors said Zerhergis’ blood alcohol level was measured at .107. The legal limit is .08. He is charged with four counts of intoxication manslaughter.

Zeghergis is an Eritrean immigrant who was issued a Houston Cab Driver's license last May. He was behind the wheel of a 2009 Dodge van bearing the phone number and logo of the Champion Town Car company. A man who answered the phone there Monday said the company was not aware of the crash or that a company vehicle was involved. Deputies identified the driver of the Honda as Devendraprasad Patel. He was killed along with three backseat passengers, Kokila Patel, Ansuyaben Patel and Jayanthilal Bhatt. All of the victims in the crash were between 60 and 80 years old. Zeghergis wasn't injured. He failed a field sobriety test at the scene according to accident investigators. Results of a blood test are pending. With our e-mail alerts, you will get everything from breaking news about.

June 28, 2014 : U.N. Agrees to launch human rights inquiry into Eritrea'

GENEVA (Reuters) - The U.N. Human Rights Council agreed on Friday to set up a year-long inquiry into human rights in Eritrea, similar to previous high-level investigations into Syria, North Korea and Sri Lanka. It condemned what it said were "widespread and systematic" violations by Eritrea's government, from arbitrary executions to restrictions on religion, detention of journalists and a shoot-to-kill policy for citizens trying to cross the border. "The human rights crisis in Eritrea has been forgotten for too long and the scale of the violations is unparalleled, putting the country amongst the worst human rights situations worldwide," said Ambassador Yusuf Mohamed Ismail of Somalia, which had initiated the call for an inquiry.

The 47-state forum decided to set up the inquiry without a vote, but China, Pakistan, Venezuela and Russia indicated that they had reservations but did not try to block the inquiry. The three-strong inquiry will include Sheila B. Keetharuth, the U.N. special rapporteur on human rights in Eritrea, and one expert apiece from Africa and Europe, Mohamed Ismail said. Keetharuth has said conscription in Eritrea amounts to indefinite forced labor. People who resist can be shot on the spot, she said in a report to the council. [ID:nL6N0OD34I] Enforced drafting into the security services is fuelling an exodus from the Horn of Africa country, and Eritreans now make up the single largest nationality among people fleeing to Europe across the Mediterranean, often in unseaworthy boats.

The U.N. refugee agency says 313,000 people have fled Eritrea, about 6 percent of a population that Keetharuth said was estimated at 5 million. Eritrea has refused to cooperate with Keetharuth and denies it has committed any human rights violations. Its representative at the meeting said Keetharuth's report was "biased and unfounded" and Eritrea "totally rejected" the call to set up an inquiry. The Eritrean diplomat said the fabricated image of Eritrea had become the basis of a "fake crisis" and laid the blame on its neighbor Ethiopia.

"While it is to be noted that Eritrea has become a target of U.S. hostilities, it has become apparent that this draft resolution is also part of Ethiopia's strenuous effort to maintain the U.N. sanction imposed on Eritrea," he said. Leaked documents sent by Ethiopia to its embassies had stressed the need to lobby for members of the Human Rights Council to put more pressure on Eritrea, he said.

No one from Ethiopia's U.N. delegation in Geneva was immediately available to comment. (Text ends)

Eritrean immigrants in Israel protest near Egypt border'

AFP (June 28, 2014) - Nearly 1,000 illegal African immigrants in Israel on Friday staged a march towards the southern border with Egypt to protest against living conditions in their internment camp, public radio reported. Israeli soldiers stopped the demonstrators, most from Eritrea and Sudan, nearly 300 metres (yards) from the border, it added.

The protesters, who are allowed out during the day, said in a statement that their march was in protest against their "inhuman and unlimited" detention in the Holot camp. Holot houses some 2,300 immigrants. The demonstrators were demanding to be able to leave Israel, and called on the UN refugee agency and the international community to take charge of their cases so they can immigrate to a third country. The Israeli authorities require illegal immigrants who have been in Israel for more than five years to live in Holot. One demonstrator said the authorities present it as an "open facility", but it was "actually a prison".

Under legislation passed in December 2013, authorities can detain illegal immigrants for up to a year without trial. In February, Haaretz newspaper reported that Israel had started flying illegal immigrants to Uganda with the authorisation of that country's authorities. The Israeli population and immigration office said that in late 2013 there were 53,646 African immigrants in Israel, 35,987 of whom were Eritrean, 13,249 Sudanese and the remainder from other countries. Israel's construction of an electric fence along its border with Egypt has reduced the number of immigrants arriving illegally through the Sinai Peninsula to almost none. Thousands of African immigrants rallied last year against the authorities' refusal to grant them refugee status. (Text ends)

Yemen Detained Ethiopian Opposition Ginbot-7 Secretary'
Daniel Berhane, HornAffairs (June 30, 2014)

VIEW POINT: Second-in-command of Ginbot 7 (designated as terrorist group by Ethiopian government), is in detention in Yemen. The group threatened to retaliate "in any way and at any place". Ginbot-7 has been described as a group aiming at a violent regime-change in Ethiopia by the US state department. It is designated as terrorist by Addis Ababa and the regional inter-governmental body, IGAD. Andargachew Tsegie, second-in-command of the organization, is in detention in Yemen, according to the statement on the organization's official website. Yemeni security officials detained Andaregachew Tsegie on Monday June 23 when his flight arrived at Sana'a international airport on transit. It was not immediately clear where Andargachew Tsegie was heading. The group's statement indicated that Andargachew Tsigie was travelling by Yemenia Airways, but didn't disclose the origin or destination of the flight.

In a recording of Ginbot 7′s internal meeting, leaked last June 2013, the group's leader Berhanu Nega was heard speaking of a half a million US dollar financial aid he received from the Eritrean government. Some speculate that the source of that money was Qatar, which is one of the few remaining allies of the Eritrean regime and also infamous for financing spoilers in the mid-east and Africa. And, that Andargachew Tsigie might have been en route from Asmara, the Eritrean capital, to Doha, Qatar. However, others dismissed it, citing the recent rapprochement between Addis Ababa and Doha. It is not clear whether Ethiopia and Yemen have an extradition treaty.

However, the two nations signed, last May, "a number of agreements and protocols of bilateral cooperation in trade, investment, higher education and standards and specifications", according to media reports. The event was taken as a signal of a resumption of the long-standing bonds established by Ethiopia's late Prime Minister Meles Zenawi and Yemeni former President Salah. Yemeni officials also hope to import electricity from Ethiopia. Ginbot 7 disclosed that its week-long effort to get Andargachew Tsegie released bore no fruit. The group's statement also threatened that there will be consequences if Yemen extradites Andargchew Tsegie to Ethiopia. The group said: "We will retaliate in any way and at anyplace for any harm on the body, sprit and life of Andargachew Tsigie". (Text ends)

Eritrea threatened to suspend Yemeni Airways Flights to/from its Territory' ER (July 2, 2014) Eritrean government threatened to cancel the right of Yemeni airlines to land in Eritrea unless it can issue assurances for the safety of passengers destined to Eritrea. If Yemeni airlines can not issue positive response for this request, it will suffer from loss of revenue as a result of suspension of services to Eritrea. Yemeni airlines has been earning substantial business from Eritrean diaspora after the cancellation of services by Lufthansa.

The action of Yemeni security organs in abducting an Ethiopian opposition figure holding British citizenship is also believed that it might put strains on Eritrea- Yemeni relations unless Yemeni authorities reverse their intent to extradite the abducted Ethiopian opposition figure to Ethiopia.The issue will have far reaching ramification as the abducted person is a british citizen. Have Yemeni security agents acquired a green light from British Inteligence Service(SIS) to carry out the abduction? The Ethiopian opposition figure who was using his british passport to travel to and from Eritrea is immune from any Yemeni-Ethiopian bi-lateral security agreement!

According to Eritrean regime opponents, Eritrea the land of migrant laborors of gulf Arab states that owns no single transport airplane of its own how it suspends the Yemeni Airways? Yemen has nothing to lose because the route to Asmara is not profitable. The number of Eritreans visit Asmara have been long been dwindled even during the Summer holiday seasons. No visitor seek to visit Eritrea anymore where there is no tap water for shower nor electric power to watch descent TV program or light a mere 40 watt flashbulb. (Text ends)

04/07/2014Eritrean government celebrations in Bologna, Italy met with protests'

Martin Plaut (July 4, 2014) Plans by Eritrea's ruling party – the PFDJ – to celebrate the regime's achievements – have been met with protests. The annual festival in Bologna, now in its fortieth year, has drawn Eritreans from across Europe. But many have come to protest against what the government of President Isaias has done to the country. They have also recalled the suffering that has resulted in thousands of young Eritreans taking their lives in their hands to flee the country. Eritrea, with a population of five million and a size about the same as Britain, is one of the most isolated and secretive countries in the world. According to the United Nations, 4,000 Eritreans flee the country every year to escape ruthless repression, including unlimited forced labour for the government.

Ethiopian opposition Ginbot 7 leader facing death penalty 'extradited from Yemen'

(July 4, 2014) Eritrea based Ethiopian opposition leader, who was sentenced to death while in exile for plotting a coup, has been extradited from Yemen to Ethiopia, his group says. Andargachew Tsege, who is also a British national, is secretary-general of the banned Ginbot 7 movement. The Ethiopian government allegedly requested his extradition after he was arrested in Yemen last month. European MEP Ana Gomes told the BBC the UK needed to use its political leverage to ensure his release. The Ethiopian government has not commented on the alleged extradition.

'Deep concerns' US-based Ginbot 7 spokesman Ephrem Madebo told the BBC's Focus on Africa radio programme that Mr Andargachew had been on his way from the United Arab Emirates to Eritrea when he was detained during a stopover at Sanaa airport. Mr Ephrem said that he had spoken to Mr Andargachew's family who had been contacted by the UK Foreign and Commonwealth Office on Thursday. British officials told the family that the Yemeni ambassador to the UK had informed them that Mr Andargachew had been handed over to Ethiopia, Mr Ephrem said.

In a statement the UK Foreign Office said it was aware that Mr Andargachew had been missing in Yemen since 24 June. "Since then UK officials have pressed the Yemeni authorities at senior levels to establish his whereabouts, including meeting with the Yemeni ambassador in London this week," a Foreign Office spokesman said in a statement. "We are aware of reports that he may now be in Ethiopia and we are urgently seeking confirmation from the relevant authorities given our deep concerns about the case. We are continuing to provide consular assistance to his family."

'Major donor': Ms Gomes, who led the European Union observer mission to Ethiopia during the 2005 elections, said she had written to UK Foreign Secretary William Hague about the case. "If the British government is not complicit with this kidnapping and this rendition of Mr Andargachew Tsigue to the Ethiopian regime - [which] will obviously torture him, accuse him of all sorts of things and eventually kill him - then the British government has to get immediately the release of Mr Andargachew," she told BBC Focus on Africa.

"If there is a country that is extremely influential in Ethiopia, it is Britain - its a major donor and its a major political backer of the regime in Ethiopia." Mr Ephrem said that the UK government should have intervened in the case earlier. "The UK government looks like a collaborator because the UK government never acted," he said, adding that it was ridiculous to consider Mr Andergachew a terrorist. "To the Ethiopian government even bloggers are terrorists [and] journalists are terrorists," he said.

Ginbot 7 (15 May) was named after the date of the 2005 elections, which were marred by protests over alleged fraud that led to the deaths of about 200 people. In 2009, the year before the last elections, Mr Andergachew was among a group of Ginbot 7 leaders sentenced to death in absentia for planning to assassinate government officials; they denied the charges. (Text ends)

ERITREA: Issaias Affeworki and other Eritrean Officials to be charged' PRESS (July 7, 2014) A legal institution in Sweden is to charge Eritrean president Issaias Affeworki and other Eritrean officials on human rights abuse cases: Ethiochannel newspaper writes. The legal institution claimed to have an authority from the Sweden government to charge individuals of any country who committed human rights abuses. The institution said that it resolved to charge the Eritrean president and other Eritrean officials for the crimes they have committed on their citizens. The institution said that it has gathered lots of evidences on the crimes committed by the Eritrean officials.

July 30, 2014: 15 suspected Eritrean illegal immigrants arrested at Reading, UK'

(Get Reading) Police arrested 10 men and two women, and three males believed to be minors were taken into social services care A group of 15 suspected illegal immigrants from the African nation of Eritrea were arrested at the M4 services near Reading. Police arrested 10 men and two women, aged between 22 and 29, at the services on Friday, July 25.

Four of the men and both women remain in custody pending questioning by immigration officers. The other six men have been placed on immigration bail while their cases are progressed. Three males, believed to be minors, were taken into social services care after being age assessed.

A Home Office spokesman said: "We work closely with police to tackle illegal immigration. "Where someone is found to have no legal right to remain in the UK we will take action to remove them." Eritrea is located on the horn of Africa, north of Ethiopia and south west of the Red Sea, with a population of around 5.6 million.

BREAKING NEWS: WAR AGAINST ERITREA IS EMINENT

(August 1, 2014) Addis Ababa applies pressure on Asmara...

Ethiopian military high command gathered a meeting of Eritrean opponents to push them into being more active against Eritrean President Issayas Affeworki. General Mohamed-Nur Yunus known as Samora, the Ethiopian army general chief of staff and a member of the Tigrayan Muslim minority, convened a meeting of Eritrean opposition leaders at Mekele (Tigray Regional State) on 18 July.

This is the first such meeting since 2005. It was led by retired General Mesfin Amare who heads both the Ethiopian foreign affairs ministry's Liaison office for Eritrean matters and the Sana'a Forum. According to sources, the meeting had a particularly important point on its agenda: ousting Eritrean President Issayas Affeworki. The Ethiopian officers reproached the Eritrean opponents for lacking coordination and they firmly advised them to devise a coherent and realistic strategy to overthrow the Eritrean government.

The Eritrean opposition's eight armed factions, which have been in fruitless negotiations since 2009 to form a joint military front against Afeworki, were represented at the meeting. Namely, the Red Sea Afar Democratic Organization (RSADO) which lost one of its leaders on 7 July, Abdul Karim Qadr, killed by Eritrean border guards, the Democratic Movement for the Liberation of the Eritrean Kunama (DMLEK), the Eritrean National Salvation Front (ENSF), Eslah, the Democratic Movement of Eritrean Saho (DMES), the Eritrean Movement for Democracy and Justice (EMDJ), the Eritrean Democratic Unity Front (EDUF) and the Eritrean Liberation Front (ELF).

DIASPORA: British Eritrean jihadi fighting with ISIS in Syria and Iraq, pose with a dead body and weapons'

Shocking moment British jihadi fighting with Isis in Syria and Iraq stands in front of beheaded man and boasts 'its what people want to see' Abu Abdullah Al-Habashi fled the UK for the Middle East nine months ago. Series of photos appear to show him posing with a dead body and weapons. He says: 'I feel no sympathy for them because they are all enemies of Allah' Al-Habashi, a Briton of Eritrean descent, also the face of ISIS Sharia law film

By MARTIN ROBINSON (August 9, 2014)

A British ISIS fighter poses gleefully in front of a decapitated soldier strung up and murdered in Syria. Abu Abdullah Al-Habashi, 20, who fled the UK for the Middle East nine months ago, has 'no sympathy' for the executed man and said 'people love to see heads on spikes'. The Muslim convert is among the hundreds of people who have fled to UK to fight in ISIS and says 'there is no going back'. Up to 500 British Muslims are believed to be in the region with as many as half joining forces with ISIS, a group known for its extreme violence, including crucifying and beheading its enemies.

Justifying the gruesome photo the British citizen originally from Eritrea told BBC's Newsnight: 'People love to see heads on spikes. I feel no sympathy for them because they are all enemies of Allah. 'Isis treats its enemies in the same way they treat us'. Photographs posted on social media of Al-Habashi clutching a machine gun appear to show him across the border in Ramadi, Iraq, where he says he has been on the front line. He said: 'It is the best fighting and the hardest. You are in a city of concrete and everything is blowing up'. Al-Habashi says his family know where he is and have told him: 'Come back – you are crazy'. He has told them: 'This is for the sake of Allah. I'm free. Why would I come back to (go to) prison?'.

The Muslim convert has also urged others from the UK to fight in the Middle East and has the become the face of ISIS in its latest recruitment video. Over the weekend a new film was released where he described how wonderful it was to live in the new Islamic Caliphate stretching across Syria and northern Iraq. It features fighters from the UK, Finland and America. He says in a strong British accent: 'You're not living under oppression. You're not living under rule. 'As Muslims, that's what we want and that's what we need. We don't need any democracy, we don't need any communism, we don't need anything like that.'

Ethiopia pushes the Affars to dislodge Issaias Affeworki'

Ethiopia's armed forces chief of staff, General Mohamed-Nur Yunus, aka Samora, played a key role for the 4th conference of the Red Sea Afar community held in Samara (Ethiopia) from 9 to 11 August by the Eritrean Red Sea Afar Democratic Organization (RSADO, opposition). The conference was attended by Ismael Ali Sirro, the president of the Ethiopian Afar Regional State, as well as a number of other Eritr...ean opposition organisations. Its final declaration agreed to draft a new constitution for Eritrea, to set up a federal system of government.

Taking the lead from the meeting of Eritrean opposition organisations on 18 July in Mekele (ION 1385), the Ethiopian chief of army staff showed the groups present in Samara that they constituted an important link in Addis Ababa's strategy against Asmara. They were sent a clear message: the time has come for military fight against the Eritrean regime of president Issayas Afeworki. For his part, the Ethiopian promised that his country's logistic support of these groups would be strengthened.

Meanwhile, on 9 August, THE Ethiopian PM Hailemariam Desalegn, declared on Tsenat Radio, a pro-Ethiopian government station broadcasting from Washington, that the "neither war nor peace" situation with Eritrea had done its time. He also argued that war was necessary against Eritrea because it supports Ethiopian opposition groups like Ginbot 7 led by Berhanu Nega and the Ethiopian People's Patriotic Front (EPPF). He said Ethiopia will "take defensive measures". However, an attack against Eritrea would not seem to be on the cards, as Ethiopia is keen for stability to ensure its disturbed economic condition.

Is Eritrean government taking the latest threat seriously?

Relatives in Keren and Asmara have told me that the Eritrean military is on the move. Large convoys of military vehicles have been observed in southern and western Eritrea over the past few days. Automatic rifles are also being distributed to the population. Actually this started about two years ago, but now it is being done now with more urgency.

Hailemariam Desalegn's threat and reaction of Eritreans on the social media::

Ethiopian PM Haile-Meles Desalegn: Our Strategy of No War No Peace with Eritrea has Changed "Removing Shaebia is the only solution to Ethiopia" The TPLF led Ethiopian Ashangulit Prime Minister Haile-Meles Desalegn said today in an interview with the government controlled radio station from Washington, "If the Eritrea government tries once more to send its 'foot soldier' [Ginbot 7], we will remove the Eritrea government." He added the strategy has changed meaning the no war no peace strategy has expired.

Report: Eritrea Faces Youth Drain'

By Joe DeCapua, VOA (August 14, 2014) Many young Africans are leaving the continent hoping to find jobs and opportunities elsewhere. But the International Crisis Group said the youth exodus from Eritrea is acute. It said the Eritrean government's demand to "sacrifice individual ambition for the greater good of the nation" is causing people to leave.

Dr. Cedric Barnes, ICG's Horn of Africa Project Director, said, "The primary driver at the moment seems to be because people are fed-up with the national service, where people are required to either join the army or work for the government in various capacities for very little money and with no prospect of being released. We are seeing people voting with their feet, as it were, to avoid these demands."

Many risk their lives doing so. "Well, that's clear that that's happening at various stages of the journey – even at the end stages in terms of the overloaded boats that seem to be arriving on the southern shores of Europe, especially Malta and Italy, where boats are overloaded. And these vessels are sinking, often drowning many of their occupants," he said. But their lives are in danger even before they get on the boats. They have to travel through lawless and dangerous parts of Sudan and Libya, for example. Barnes said for a time Eritrean forces prevented border crossings by lethal force if necessary.

Initially the government tried to crackdown on the migration. Then, Barnes says, it saw an economic opportunity through remittances and a two-percent tax imposed on the migrants. But Barnes said that's not forestalling long-term issues.

“They’re losing their working population. They are losing the relatively scarce human capital that Eritrea has. This is affecting from the army to the national services, as well as families, especially the farms and other productive activities that need man and woman power." The International Crisis Group recommended that Eritrea re-set its relationship with the outside world by becoming more engaged diplomatically. It also recommends that Eritrea gradually demobilize its national service – and ease border tensions with Ethiopia.

Barnes said, "The kind of isolationist position that Eritrea has found itself in is preventing a society where people's individual social / economic freedoms can be pursued – which is encouraging people to leave and look for better alternatives." The ICG also said that Eritrea should seek assistance from the European Union and the U.N. to help restructure the country's economy to create more jobs for young people.

Once Again the TPLF Hoodlums Are Banging the Drums of War Against Eritrea'

Drs. Tsegezab Gebregergis, London, August 15, 2014

Introduction: One of the most disturbing and bizarre political events in the annals of Ethiopian history is the advent of the absolutist rule of the TPLF/EPRDF in Ethiopia in May 1991. It is disturbing because since then Ethiopia has been ruled by a politically paranoid tyrannical minority group that suffers from an acute inferiority complex; a minority group that considers and treats all the legitimately organised, independent and alternative political groups/voices in Ethiopia as enemies who must be humiliated and targeted under various pretexts. One of the common ways of terrorising legitimate Ethiopian opposition groups, journalists, bloggers and political and human rights activists and their foreign sympathisers is the so-called anti-terrorism legislation introduced in the country in 2009. This nasty piece of legislation is a direct copy-and-paste of the British and American governments' anti-terrorism laws. There is therefore nothing Ethiopian in this legislation to justify its enactment and application against the lawful political opponents of the TPLF regime. In short, there are no terrorists in Ethiopia; there is only a terrorist regime terrorising the Ethiopian people into total submission. Thus, frankly speaking, there is no rational ground that warrants the introduction of anti-terrorism law in Ethiopia today.

It therefore goes without saying that political groups such as the TPLF rulers of Ethiopia , who suffer from an inferiority complex and are politically paranoid, are the most unstable and dangerous groups for the well-being, stability and security of Ethiopia and its neighbours. Politically unstable minority groups such as the one ruling Ethiopia today are dangerous because they are always in search of enemies, and if real enemies do not exist, they create themselves bogus enemies. Such is the fascist nature of the TPLF junta.

However, to complicate matters, there are certain western powers that have vested interests in the Horn of Africa and therefore falsely portray the

TPLF/EPRDF-led government of Ethiopia as a strong and stable government. In reality, however, TPLF-ruled Ethiopia is riddled and plagued by political upheaval and is internally a very troubled and unstable country.

Consequently, the existence of a federal democratic government in name but a highly centralised and tightly controlled one-party state in reality, that is even worse than the one-party state varieties which existed in former communist countries, has disturbed and ruined the lives of many Ethiopian people and communities, and is continuously threatening the security and stability of the peace-loving people living in independent Eritrea.

It is important to mention in passing here that centralisation and the tight control of society using the one-party state as an instrument of control/oppression, as is practised in Ethiopia under TPLF rule, are the hallmarks of a fascist totalitarian state.

False Terrorism Charges Are the Order of the Day under TPLF Rule: As already mentioned, one of the pretexts commonly used by the TPLF/EPRDF government to silence, humiliate and destroy its political opponents is false and vague terrorism charges. It must be clearly understood that the TPLF's so-called terrorism act was developed and enacted into law in order to unjustly stifle lawful and peaceful dissent in Ethiopia. Most of those who have been imprisoned since 2009 due to the deeply flawed anti-terrorism law are well-known leaders of legitimate political parties and groups opposed to TPLF/EPRDF rule, as well as political and freedom activists, bloggers and journalists. The latest victim of the law is the legendary Andargachew Tsige, the Secretary General of the G7. He was abducted in Saana, Yemen, on June 23, 2014 and has been described by the TPLF junta prime minister as a "Trojan horse for the Eritrean government to destabilise Ethiopia". He is now in the torture chambers of the TPLF, suffering from the inhuman interrogation methods the TPLF uses to humiliate its political opponents without any respite.To date so many brave and proud Ethiopian democrats with an indomitable spirit to fight for democracy and human rights have been humiliated under this so-called anti-terrorism law. In the concrete situation prevailing in Ethiopia today, this so-called anti-terrorism law is nothing but the law of the jungle. Thus, it must be repealed immediately.

TPLF Reaction to the Abduction of Andargachew: As could be expected, only a few days after the arrest and imprisonment of Andargachew Tsige, the TPLF hoodlums have been banging the drums of war against Eritrea. They have been also busy arresting political activists and journalists with highly politicised terrorism charges. What is more, instead of addressing the legitimate demands and grievances of the politically oppressed Ethiopian people and inviting all of their political opponents to join a dialogue, the paranoid TPLF rulers of Ethiopia are claiming that Eritrea sponsors terrorism in Ethiopia and are mobilising their army to start a war against Eritrea. Thus, a war against Eritrea initiated by the TPLF rulers of Ethiopia would not be ignited by border issues; it is being concocted solely to punish Eritrea for allegedly supporting the Ethiopian freedom fighters operating from their bases in the country.

Indeed, according to an article posted on Tigrai Online on 10 August 2014, the puppet TPLF Prime Minister Haile Mariam Desalegn has unambiguously declared that TPLF Ethiopia has made preparations for war and is poised to invade independent Eritrea in order to topple the PFDJ regime. It therefore appears that war is now imminent between the Tigrian rulers of Ethiopia and the PFDJ rulers of Eritrea.

The Political Objectives of the TPLF's War Against Eritrea: At this important juncture of Eritrean history, it is of the utmost importance for every Eritrean patriot to clearly understand that the TPLF hoodlums ruling Ethiopia are not only the enemies of the PFDJ government of Eritrea: they are first and foremost the mortal enemies of independent Eritrea and its people, and those who have paid an incalculable price to make Eritrean independence a reality.It is therefore high time that Eritrean patriots and Ethiopians should ask the question: what do the TPLF political gangs want to achieve by once again igniting war against independent Eritrea?

In my opinion, if successful, the ultimate political objective of the blatant TPLF invasion of Eritrea would be to tear apart Eritrean unity, kill the indomitable spirit of the Eritrean people and destroy Eritrean independence, appoint the chieftains of the puppet Eritrean groups to administer Eritrea on behalf of their TPLF mentors, and arrest and obliterate once and for all the Ethiopian opposition groups based in Eritrea. In my opinion, these are the pipe dreams which the TPLF political gangs are entertaining; but they will remain only pipe dreams, just as landing on the moon is a pipe dream for many people.

Concluding Remarks: In concluding this article, I think it is vitally important that readers be aware of the fact that what the TPLF junta says in the daytime for reasons of public consumption, and what they actually do at night, are always at loggerheads. For this very reason, I tend to believe that the TPLF rulers of Ethiopia and their generals are not really poised to start a fresh war against Eritrea. It seems that it is all part of a psychological war, and a bluff to keep Eritrea and Eritreans worrying and losing sleep. The fact of the matter is, Eritreans are already used to sleeping with one eye open.

I say it is all a bluff because the TPLF rulers of Ethiopia knows only too well that waris and has always been adouble-edged sword. They know only too well that an action or decision that the political leaders of a country undertake at certain point in the hope that it will help to promote their cause can also turn against them and hasten their own demise. In other words, they know very well that war hurts you if you start it, and it equally hurts if others start it against you. That is exactly what the 1998-2000 Eritrean-Ethiopian war taught the TPLF generals, who openly cried and wept with their entire staff when the war against Shabea miserably failed to achieve the plans they had outlined.

Referring to the military debacle of the TPLF army and its generals in the 1998-2000 Eritrean-Ethiopian war, Tesfaye Gebreab, author of the book 'Yederasiw Mastawesha' (the author's memoirs) has this to say on page 252: "After the one-week battle plan failed miserably and concluded with great military losses, the General who was in charge of the war, Tsadkan Gebretensae,called a meeting at Infara, the place that was serving as the Command and Control Center.General Tsadkan tried to call the meeting to order but he could not hide his emotions and broke down crying. He wept. All of the meeting participants cried with him.Infara became like a funeral home. Once he regained his composure, he tried to comfort the meeting participants. Everyone was crying. General Tsadkan said the following to the meeting participants: 'I have led many battles in my career. I have fought in many wars. I have seen a lot. I have never experienced this kind of utter failure. It is bad.'" Do we need any confessions other than the vivid testimony given by General Tsadkan to understand what war is all about? I don't think so.

In any case, for the valid reasons I have already outlined above, I tend to believe that we will not see the horrors of war again between Eritrea and Ethiopia. However, if the TPLF rulers and their generals are foolish enough to start a war against Eritrea again, this time it will definitely hasten their own inevitable demise in both Eritrea and Ethiopia.It is important also to note here that if war breaks out between Ethiopia and Eritrea, the initiators of such a criminal and destructive act will unmistakably be the Tigrian rulers of Ethiopia. As such, they will also be directly responsible for whatever happens as a result of their irresponsible decision. In the meantime, Eritreans must remain ever vigilant; and should war be imposed on Eritrea, Eritreans must firmly and loyally stand with the freedom-loving Eritrean people and its defence forces. (Text ends)

ERITREA: President Issaias was excluded from the US-Africa Summit: What lessons for Eritrea?

By Michael Abraha (August 29, 2014)

(Foreign Policy Journal) Washington's decision not to let President Isaias Afewerki join over forty other African heads of government for the US-Africa summit in D.C. early this month was a huge blow to the regime but a monumental victory for Eritreans fighting for freedom and democracy. Like Issaias, Sudan's Al-Bashir and Zimbabwe's Mugabe were also uninvited for committing genocidal atrocities against their own people. The barely known interim leader of the war-torn Central African Republic Catherine Samba-Panza was also not invited. To be consistent, the US should also have excluded other repressive dictators, among them, Equatorial Guinea's Nguema and Uganda's Museveni.

Keeping aside its inconsistencies, the US saw no purpose in inviting Isaias who is widely seen as Africa's worst violator of fundamental human and democratic rights. His government has not only been committing atrocities against Eritreans, but as the UN Somalia and Eritrea Monitoring Group has concluded, it has also supported international terrorism by aiding and abetting the deadly Al-Qaeda linked Al-Shabab group which has slaughtered thousands of civilians in Somalia and beyond.

It would have been a terrible setback for the exiled pro-democracy Eritrean movement had Isaias been invited as a guest in Washington, where he would be lecturing on his impractical "self-reliance" philosophy and where he would be denying that thousands have been sent to jail for their political or religious convictions as reported by human rights agencies. Then to add salt to injury, there are the misinformed worshipers of the president who would be welcoming and cheering him. Ironically, most of these misguided followers fled the homeland because they themselves were unsafe and impoverished under Issaias or Mengistu Hailemariam before him. Lack of Democratic Institutions Obama says no person wants to live in a society where the rule of law gives way to the rule of brutality and corruption. Visiting Africa in 2009, he emphasized that "Africa did not need strong men, but strong institutions."

He was referring to democratic institutions where there is no trace of them in Eritrea. By excluding the Eritrean leader from the august Washington summit, the US President was sending the message that there is no peace or prosperity without political participation of the people. Eritrea has come a long way since Isaias staged a disturbing "coup" against the people on September 18, 2001 when the press and dissenting voices were buried alive. He ordered the imprisonment of almost all of government ministers including the vice president as well as almost all journalists with privately owned newspapers. They have been languishing in unknown prisons since. For several years following this fateful event, it was hard for exiled Eritrean journalists and activists to get the attention and support from the West let alone from a US President who now tells the Eritrean leader that he is not qualified to take part in talks pertaining to Africa's future unless he first respects the will of his own people.

More Isolation: There was yet another embarrassing moment for the Isaias regime when in 2009 the 54-member African Union unanimously adopted a resolution to ask the UN Security Council to slap the Eritrean government with sanctions for posing a threat to the peace and security of the East and Horn of Africa Region. Two years later, the Security Council imposed yet more stringent economic and military sanctions on the Asmara government for failing to abide by the 2009 sanction resolutions.

In mid-December last year, Isaias was in Nairobi along with most of East and Horn of African leaders who had in the past condemned his siding with the Islamist radicals in Somalia, who have been threatening the stability of the region. He was among 20 heads of state attending Kenya's 50th independence anniversary. President Uhuru Kenyatta is an ICC suspect for crimes against humanity and he needs any UN member state on his side. Apart from the fact that both leaders are in trouble, Uhuru and Isaias have nothing in common.

Although hyped by Eri-TV as an important three day Kenya trip, there were no reports of Uhuru-Isaias meetings in the State House or on the sidelines of the celebrations to discuss any investment or trade deals.
During the festivities Isaias was many times seen next to former Kenya President Mwai Kibaki who is most unhappy with the Eritrean leader for his reported support of Al-Shabab. In 2011, the then-President Kibaki dispatched thousands of troops to Somalia after Al-Shabab attacked tourist sites and hotels in Kenya. Issaias could not have been thrilled with having Kibaki's company in the anniversary programs given the huge rift between the two. Issaias however found consolation and relief when he was warmly welcomed in an event organized by the Eritrean Community of refugees and immigrants in Nairobi many of whom were in need of visas and passports from the government in exchange for payment of the notorious 2% "diaspora income tax" banned under UN sanctions.

Squandering Public Trust: The Eritrean government lost almost all of its friends in Africa because of its alleged destabilizing role in the region and partly because of its poor foreign policy, thus leading to most damaging sanctions unprecedented in recent African history. At the UN, it could not garner the support of Russia or China when sanctions were debated in 2009 and again in 2011. In any case China or Russia could not do much to help unless regional blocs like IGAD-East Africa or the African Union were willing to cooperate.

Issaias and his advisors have repeatedly squandered the good-will and trust of African and western governments, and above all that of his own people claiming that the country was facing "unique" survival problems. For many years after the 1998-2000 war with Ethiopia, many Eritreans, young and old, wanted to sacrifice individual interests for the sake of the nation.

Western establishments were ok with this even though Isaias was openly becoming a full-fledged authoritarian trampling on democratic and human rights and defying US and UN warnings against his government's reported association with Al-Shabab.

Contrary to Washington's strongly held position, former US Under-Secretary for African Affairs Herman Cohen says Eritrea has had no contacts with Al-Shabab since 2009 and stresses that "Eritrean leadership fears Islamic militancy as much as any other country in the Horn of Africa region".

Moving Forward: Cohen and some International Crisis Group experts believe that ending the UN sanctions on Eritrea and resolving its border conflict with Ethiopia would automatically bring about change in domestic policy. Vital as such achievements would be in themselves, they cannot guarantee establishment of rule of law, and respect for rights and freedoms of the people. The government itself says it is ruling without a constitution, elections and enforcing endless national services because of external pressures.

The situation calls for change and neither the sanctions nor the “Ethiopia threat” can prevent the government to end repression and allow freedom of speech and start working with the people in building a democratic, prosperous country.

The next step would be to reestablish friendly relations with neighbors, beginning with Ethiopia. The president has reportedly said that Eritrea’s future is tied to that of Ethiopia. And Premier Hailemariam Desalegn of Ethiopia says he is ready to go to Asmara if it meant normalizing relations with Eritrea.

Such a move is bound to encourage him to normalize relations with Ethiopia as the best strategy to get rid of the excruciating sanctions. The US will not vote to have these sanctions lifted without the agreement from Ethiopia and other concerned East African governments. (Text ends)

September 14, 2014: News: State Department updates travel warning for Eritrea.

The U.S. Department of State warns U.S. citizens of the risks of travel to Eritrea and strongly recommends U.S. citizens not travel to the country since there is increasing possibility U.S. citizens will not receive the requisite exit permit from Eritrean authorities, according to the latest State Department release. The new travel warning for Eritrea replaces the warning of November 18, 2013 to remind U.S. citizens of ongoing security concerns in Eritrea, the State Department says.

As many as 700 migrants including East Africans feared drowned in Mediterranean’

Reuters (September 16, 2014)

GENEVA (Reuters) - More than 700 people fleeing Africa and the Middle East may have drowned in the latest shipwrecks in the Mediterranean, bringing the death toll this year to almost 3,000, the International Organization for Migration said on Monday. In the worst incident, as many as 500 migrants are believed to have died after traffickers rammed their ship off Malta’s coast last week, an event that only came to light this weekend in testimony from two of the nine survivors.

The survivors said the traffickers ordered the migrants to change vessels in the middle of the Mediterranean. The migrants refused, leading to a confrontation that ended when traffickers rammed the ship carrying the migrants, IOM spokeswoman Christiane Berthiaume told Reuters in Geneva. “Some 500 people were on board - Syrians, Palestinians, Egyptians and Sudanese. They were trying to reach Europe,” Berthiaume said. “That means that 700 people perished at sea these last days in the Mediterranean, the deadliest incidents in the space of a few days,” she said.

The vessel had set off on Saturday, Sept 6 from Damiette, Egypt, and sank off Malta's coast on Sept 10th, she said. The U.N. refugee agency also learned of the shipwreck, but said its information was the wreck occurred on Friday. “In all, nine people survived and were picked up boats,” Berthiaume said. IOM officials interviewed two Palestinian survivors who were taken to Sicily, Italy, while other survivors were taken to Malta and to Crete, Greece, Berthiaume said. Four days later, another ship packed with up to 250 African emigrants sank off the Libyan coast, and most of them are feared dead, a spokesman for the Libyan navy said late on Sunday. Some 26 people survived.

The U.N. refugee agency UNHCR said the situation in the Mediterranean was unclear and it was trying to get confirmation of five shipwrecks in all. “At least 500 people have died or are missing in the last three days”, UNHCR spokesman Francis Markus said in an email. “It was without any doubt the deadliest weekend ever in the Mediterranean,” Carlotta Sami of the UNHCR said. Some 130,000 people have arrived in Europe by sea so far this year, compared with 60,000 last year, according to the UNHCR. Italy has received more than 118,000, most of them rescued at sea under its naval operation Mare Nostrum.

U.N. High Commissioner for Refugees Antonio Guterres and UNHCR special envoy Angelina Jolie visited the naval rescue headquarters in Malta on Sunday, meeting survivors, the agency said in a statement issued on Monday. “Amidst concerns about the sustainability of the Italian Mare Nostrum operation, they also called for increased efforts by European nations to contribute to rescue efforts and reduce deaths at sea,” the UNHCR said. Half of those arriving in Europe by boat are refugees from Syria and Eritrea, according to the agency.

“We all need to wake up to the scale of this crisis. There is a direct link between the conflicts in Syria and elsewhere and the rise in deaths at sea in the Mediterranean. We have to understand what drives people to take the fearful step of risking their children’s lives on crowded, unsafe vessels; it is the overwhelming desire to find refuge,” Jolie said. “It is also part of a bigger problem - the soaring numbers of people displaced by conflicts around the world today, which now stands at over 51 million. Unless we address the root causes of these conflicts, the numbers of refugees dying or unable to find protection will continue to rise,” she said. (Text ends)

NEWS UPDATES: Traffickers ‘laughed’ as they capsized boat to drown refugees’

Rome (AFP) (September 17, 2014) - Survivors of Europe’s most deadly migrant shipwreck in years have described the horrifying moment traffickers capsized their boat and left them to drown, as the EU cried murder and vowed to step up the fight against people smugglers. Fresh witness testimony confirmed around 500 people drowned after their boat sank off Malta on Wednesday, including up to 100 children who had been making the treacherous journey from Egypt to Italy, the International Organisation for Migration (IOM) said on Tuesday. “After they hit our boat they waited to make sure that it had sunk completely before leaving. They were laughing," one survivor told the Geneva-based organisation.

According to the UN's refugee agency (UNHCR), over 2,500 people have drowned or gone missing attempting the crossing in 2014, and in several separate incidents survivors have spoken of traffickers overfilling rickety boats or locking people below decks to suffocate. "These are not accidents but murders. We'll increase and intensify our efforts to fight human trafficking," said Michele Cercone, spokesman for EU Home Affairs Commissioner Cecilia Malmstrom. "This latest tragedy shows that despite the efforts put in place we'll witness these kind of problems as long as the pitiless smugglers who are the real criminals behind this are free to act," he said. Malmstrom said the European Commission was "already working on a EU plan to tackle migrant smuggling," but insisted member states must be "willing... to create more legal ways to Europe, such as accepting more resettled refugees."

 'Forced into the water' -

In the incident off Malta, just 10 people survived. Two Palestinians were taken to Italy, two to Malta, while the other six, including a two year-old Syrian girl, were taken to hospital in Crete. The toddler remains in a critical condition. The Palestinians, aged 27 and 33, told IOM their boat had been intentionally sunk by the people smugglers after the migrants refused to change to a smaller, less seaworthy vessel—a story corroborated by the survivors in Crete. "A violent argument ensued. The 10 smugglers, said to be Palestinian and Egyptian, began yelling," the IOM said, citing the latest testimony from Greece. The enraged traffickers "rammed" the boat which "began to sink immediately, while the smugglers stayed in the area until they were certain that the migrant's vessel had sunk," it said. Those who had managed to jump to safety into the smaller boat were "forced into the water" by their assailants.

"When the boat was first struck, one of the passengers killed himself in despair by hanging," one of the survivors said. The Greek coast guard said the toddler's parents had passed her in the water to a 19-year-old Syrian woman because she was wearing a lifejacket, while they went to search for another of their children. The woman and child survived, the parents did not. IOM said the Palestinians were rescued on Thursday, while the rest were not picked up until Friday—after two days in the water. "The mounting death toll is a blight on the reputation of the EU and its member states who must urgently act together, now, to ensure that no more men, women and children lose their lives," said John Dalhuisen, Europe and Central Asia Director at Amnesty International. "With hundreds of thousands fleeing war and poverty across the Middle East and Africa, the priority must be to protect lives rather than creating an impenetrable fortress," he said.

 'Trapped below deck' -

The Syrian, Palestinian, Egyptian and Sudanese migrants had set out from Damietta in Egypt on September 6. Four bus loads of migrants were loaded onto the boat, which was between 15 and 18 metres (50 to 60 feet) long, until there were some 300 people crammed below deck and 200 on top—including up to 100 children, the IOM said based on the survivors' reports. "The 300 people who were in the lower deck were trapped and drowned immediately. The survivors say they watched as those thrown in the water clung to each other trying to stay alive," it said. The two Palestinian survivors, who have requested asylum in Italy, said they paid a "travel office" in Gaza $2,000 (1,544 euros) each for the trip, with the money coming from grants they had been given to rebuild their homes. While the EU said it was keen to prosecute traffickers, Cercone pointed out that their operational bases were outside European Union territory, "making it very difficult to track them and crack down on them." He urged greater partnerships with North African countries in the fight against people smugglers, but acknowledged that with countries like Libya mired in unrest and political chaos, the task is no easy one.

November 3, 2011: Egyptian Human Trafficking Gang 'Took Organs as Payment from Eritrean migrants.

Bedouin smugglers involved in people trafficking are also believed to be stealing organs from Eritrean refugees who are unable to pay their demands for large amounts of cash to take them into Israel.

Mediterranean Migrants Boat Incident'

Human Smugglers 'Were Laughing' as They Drowned 100 Children'

IBT (September 17, 2014)

Human smugglers were apparently laughing as they deliberately sank a boat packed with asylum seekers in the Mediterranean killing hundreds of people, including women and children, survivors have said. Two Palestinian migrants, who were rescued by a freighter after spending more than two days in the water, confirmed to the International Organization for Migration (IOM) initial reports that up to 500 people died in what appears to be a bloody criminal act.

They told IOM investigators that the 10 traffickers, believed to be Palestinian and Egyptian, turned against the migrants as they refused to switch to a smaller, unseaworthy boat on the way to Europe. At first, smugglers threatened to return everyone to the port of origin in Egypt. When this failed to convince the would-be-refugees, who had already switched boat three times since they had left the port of Damietta few days earlier, the traffickers started yelling and throwing sticks at them, the survivors said. Finally they rammed their vessel into the other boat causing hundreds to drown.

"After they hit our boat they waited to make sure that it had sunk completely before leaving. They were laughing" one of the survivors told IOM. "When the boat was first struck, one of the passengers killed himself in despair by hanging," he added. The incident happened at the end of last week, about 300 miles southeast of Malta. "If survivors' reports are confirmed, this will be the worst shipwreck of migrants in years, not an accidental tragedy, but the apparent deliberate drowning of migrants by criminal gangs who extort money for their desperate journeys. Their actions are as callous as they are evil," said IOM spokesperson Leonard Doyle.

The two survivors said they managed to stay afloat for two days, as others around them disappeared under the water. They were later picked up by a UK-flagged vessel along with other seven people, including a two year-old girl and flown by a Greek military helicopter to hospital in Crete. One of them has since died and a girl remains in critical condition, IOM said.

The two Palestinians said their tragic journey began in a "travel" office in Gaza where it was planned they would cross to Egypt and from there embark on a ship to Italy for a price of $2,000 each (£1,230). They said there were up to 500 Syrians, Palestinians, Egyptians and Sudanese aboard about including 100 children. Their account corroborated that of another two Palestinians from Gaza who were separately rescued and taken to Italy. The IOM said almost 3,000 people have drowned in the Mediterranean trying to reach Europe this year only. (Text ends)

Sinai Migrants: Human Trafficking Gang in Egypt 'Took Organs as Payment'

IBT (September 18, 2014)

A gang of human traffickers accepted migrants' organs as payment for smuggling them to Europe in a perilous journey from northern Africa, an Italian police investigation has revealed. The gang, composed by Libyans and Eritreans, allegedly demanded that asylum seekers pay €1,500 (£1,200) up front to board one of the many run-down boats that leave from the Tripoli area for Italy's southernmost island of Lampedusa every week.

Those who could not immediately afford the price were given the possibility to pay at a later stage, according to court documents seen by Corriere della Sera newspaper. Upon their arrival on European soil, the gang decided whether to "use them as manpower or organ donors," according to documents ordering pre-trial detention for five gang-members. Judge Tiziana Coccoluto wrote that the condition of migrants who had to pay off their debt was akin to that of slaves, noting that the gang could also sell them off to other criminal groups.

The group's 'treasurer' Michael Brhane, who operated in Rome, was arrested earlier this year along with four other men - Haile Seifu, Russom Gebremichael Henok, and Tesfay Bahta - who allegedly worked as money collectors across the Italian peninsula. They are facing charges of being members of a criminal organisation aimed at smuggling migrants. Police suspect that the gang was linked to human smugglers responsible for a migrant boat that sank off

Lampedusa in October last year, killing 336 people. This year, more than 100,000 asylum seekers have arrived in Italy, while almost 3,000 have drowned on the way to Europe, according to the International Organization for Migration. (Text ends)

October 10, 2014: Former Eritrean information minister Ali Abdu presents his case to the media'

Ali Abdu Ahmed, of C04/415 Brunswick Road, Brunswick West, in the state of Victoria, Australia, ex-Minister for Information in Eritrea, make the following declaration under the Statutory Declaration Act 1959; He claims until very recently "I was the Minister of Information, the official Spokesperson of my country, and a special advisor to the President of the State of Eritrea. I joined the Ministry in 2000, and prior to that I was the Ambassador to Germany and also the Vatican, Austria and Belgium in 1999. I was also the Vice-President of the National Union of Eritrean Youth and Students from 1995 until 1999. My political differences with the Eritrean regime date back to the year 2007 and they are centered around its policy towards Somalia; its endless conscription of Eritrean youth into a form of modern slavery; its creation of a two-tier system of privileged and dispossessed citizens; its arming of civilians including elderly men and women; the illegal extortion of 2% tax on Eritrean Diaspora; and the fact that I was being told by the Eritrean people, particularly those young Eritreans, that I was the "next in line", the "next President of Eritrea" – this aroused deep suspicion of me in the mind of the President."

European court slams Italy over boat migrants' LOCAL
ITALY'S NEWS IN ENGLISH (October 21, 2014)

Italy put boat migrants at risk by sending them to Greece, from where they could have been returned to their dangerous home countries, the European Court of Human Rights ruled on Tuesday.

Italy was wrong to turn away the 32 Afghans, two Sudanese and one Eritrean boat migrants who were smuggled into the country in 2008 and 2009, the Strasbourg-based court ruled. The migrants arrived in the Italian ports of Bari, Ancona and Venice, after boarding boats in Patras, but were immediately sent back to Greece by Italian border police. "By returning these applicants to Greece, [Italy] had exposed them to the risks arising from the shortcomings in that country's asylum procedure," the court said in its judgement. From Greece the Afghans risked being returned to their home country, "where they were likely to be subjected to ill-treatment," the court said.

'Life in Italy is not how I thought it would be'

Since being sent back to Greece at least one of the group has been returned to Afghanistan, while a number of others have successfully travelled to other EU countries and at least one has been granted refugee status in Italy. In its ruling the European court also slammed the Italian authorities for failing to grant those arriving in Ancona access to the asylum procedure. In the majority of cases Italy instead passed boat migrants to ferry captains headed for Greece, depriving the potential asylum-seekers “of any procedural and substantive rights”. Under European law asylum-seekers should be returned to the country of arrival in the EU, but the court on Tuesday said this could not be used as a justification for depriving people of their rights. (Text ends)

Intense Anxiety Engulfing Eritrea - Eritrean military deteriorates'

Written by Gedab News (October 23, 2014)

Since last spring, when the army started to instruct conscripts returning to their units to stay at home until further notice, the Eritrean government has been facing difficulties in maintaining a properly manned army.

A conscript who has escaped Eritrea informed Gedab News, "the government can't feed the army, so they told us to stay at home to mend for ourselves."

The conscript had stayed in his village for five months with his parents before escaping to Sudan and is now planning the second leg of his journey to make it to Europe. He said, "I can't stay with my ailing parents who depend on a small farm to feed themselves … hardly enough to feed them, my handicapped brother, and my widowed aunt."

Several units of the Eritrean army are hallow and exist only in name, and often, "you find a squad guarding the installations of a camp that used to house a battalion." Many conscripts have taken advantage of the extended leave and left the country; the army is now facing difficulties in recalling them.

In what appears as an attempt to control the situation, the Eritrean immigration department has suspended the issuing of exit visas, but that hasn't stopped the flocking of people who are crossing the borders of the country.

Insiders say, "the regime thought it could simply declare them AWOL and like the old times sweep the streets to forcefully return every missing conscript."

Only a little over a third of the twenty-thousand senior-year high school students who were supposed to report for the last round of training in the Sawa military camp did so. The rest simply ignored the call and either left the country or went into hiding.

Around the country, some youngsters have resorted to brigandage and several mugging incidents by "youth holding sticks" were reported in Asmara. Residents in poorly lighted neighborhoods with narrow alleys "are so terrified of the situation they do not move alone at night."

In order to ameliorate the shortage of soldiers, and keep order, the government has been trying to assemble the militia who were supposed to report to several localities, but the calls to report for "training" were largely ignored.

In urban centers, "very few militia reported, particularly in towns like Keren, Adi Kieh and Ghindae … only one person reported from Edaga Hamus" neighborhood of Asmara. It is worse in the countryside where citizens in many villages defiantly refused to report. In many places the dateline for reporting has been postponed for a second time. Reports indicate that Ethiopia has deployed its forces on the South and Southwest of the Eritrean borders and its reconnaissance scouts are monitoring the region.

A teacher from southern Eritrean told Gedab News, “The regime is acting as if these are signs of an imminent Ethiopian incursion into Eritrea, and this has added to the anxiety of the population.”

Adding to the already building tension, on October 16, 2014, Sendek, an Ethiopian Amharic newspaper quoting official sources stated that the federal prosecutor has charged six residents of the Beni Shangul-Gumuz region for receiving political and military training in Eritrea. One of the charges is an attempt to disrupt the Ethiopian renaissance dam.

In March, 2012 Ethiopian forces attacked the camps of Ethiopian rebels group trained and hosted by the Eritrean government. The attack was believed to be a retaliation for “terrorist acts the groups carried out in Ethiopia.”

Ethiopia has a long standing policy, which was repeated by its Prime Minister in New York recently, that it will retaliate if it ever catches any of its Eritrean based opposition conducting “an act of terrorism in Ethiopia.” (Text ends)

Outrage over politician’s ironic host a migrant ad LOCAL
ITALY’S NEWS IN ENGLISH (October 23, 2014)

A Northern League politician has sparked controversy after saying migrants could just be “fed bread and water” in a video mocking a proposal to pay Italians €900 a month to host a migrant in their home.

In the video advert below, intended to attract activists to a protest in Milan last Saturday against the “invasion” of migrants in Italy, Umberto Bosco, the party’s councillor candidate for the Emilia-Romagna region, asks viewers: “Having difficulty paying the rent? Then take Abdullah home and Alfano [Angelino Alfano, Italy’s Interior Minister] will give you €900 a month.”

The video was made weeks after Domenico Manzione, undersecretary at the Interior Ministry, put forward the proposal to pay Italians €30 to host a migrant. “Having trouble paying your mortgage? Then put Fatima up on the sofa,” Bosto went on to say, as a woman in a headscarf appears on the screen. “She’s pregnant, so the payment will soon double.”

He then addresses the concern people might have with “spending all the €900 on the migrant”. “Just put them in a cellar and give them bread, water and a bucket for their needs.” At the end, he says: “Until yesterday, the immigration business was reserved for smugglers and exploiters, but thanks to Renzi’s government, you too can make money from the African continent.”

The video was soon shared by thousands of extremists, and branded "racist" by those on the left, the website, ilrestodelcarlino.it reporter. Bosco argued that the video was "ironic" and intended to reflect "the absurdity of the proposal from Renzi's government". "It doesn't take a genius to work out that such a proposal (which was withdrawn) would trigger a system of systematic exploitation of new arrivals."

The demonstration last Saturday also called on Italy to stop Mare Nostrum, the sea rescue operation launched after hundreds of migrants died in two shipwrecks last October. The number of people making the treacherous crossing to Italy from north Africa so far this year has reached some 118,000, triple the number last year, while more than 2,500 people have drowned or gone missing attempting the crossing. (Text ends)

Italy mulls end to boat migrant rescue mission'

LOCAL ITALY'S NEWS IN ENGLISH (October 28, 2014) The EU will launch a patrol mission in the Mediterranean on Saturday amid warnings the number of boat migrant deaths could rise with Italy mulling pulling the plug on its own rescue mission.

To complicate matters further, Britain said on Tuesday it won't support the planned EU search and rescue operation, arguing it will create an unintended "pull factor" for more migrants to attempt the dangerous sea crossings, The combined efforts of the Italian navy and coast guard have saved over 150,000 men, women and children attempting the perilous crossing from the coasts of North Africa this year so far.

But with the introduction of EU border agency Frontex's "Triton" mission, it is not clear whether Italy's "Mare Nostrum" rescue mission - a large-scale deployment launched a year ago after two deadly shipwrecks - will be scaled back or closed down entirely. "Mare Nostrum is being wound up. There will be a formal decision during one of the next cabinet meetings," Deputy Prime Minister and Interior Minister Angelino Alfano said recently.

But Alfano has also insisted the two operations are "totally distinct", as Triton will remain within European territorial waters, while Mare Nostrum rescues people in floundering boats and overcrowded dinghies from the Strait of Sicily to the coast of Libya. Interior Ministry Undersecretary Domenico Manzione this month said Mare Nostrum "will continue until further notice. For now, nothing changes." Aid agencies have warned the number of deaths in the Mediterranean - which have topped 3,300 so far this year - may rise if Italy cuts the chord.

A total of 32 boats have taken part in the Mare Nostrum mission, supported by two submarines as well as planes and helicopters, according to navy figures.On average, a total of 900 men and women are manning the decks daily and pick up an average of 400 people every 24 hours - tripling the number of arrivals in 2013. Their work has also led to the arrest of 351 human traffickers since the mission began. Half of those rescued are asylum seekers from Syria and Eritrea, the rest come from Gambia, Ghana, Mali, Nigeria, the Palestinian territories or Somalia.

Shifting the burden

Despite winning high praise from the UN's refugee agency, Mare Nostrum has drawn criticism both at home and in Europe from those who say it is ferrying in immigrants rather than dissuading them from coming.

The planned EU operation will do the same thing, creating "an unintended pull factor, encouraging more migrants to attempt the dangerous sea crossing and thereby leading to more tragic and unnecessary deaths," according to British foreign office minister Joyce Anelay.

London's position is to focus on "countries of origin and transit" and tackle people smugglers instead, she added. Policing the coast also comes at a monetary cost and the Italian government, struggling to stave off a third recession in six years, is increasingly unwilling to shell out the €9.0 million ($11.4 million) a month needed.

Triton's budget is more modest, coming in at €3.0 million a month, with eight European Union countries pledging planes and boats for the operation. Other countries will send teams to help Italy with the new arrivals - in particular with registering fingerprints, amid concerns Italy is letting too many migrants slip through the net and make it to other countries, shifting the burden to other national asylum seeker systems.

The majority of would-be refugees do not want to stay in Italy. The country registered 26,620 requests for asylum in 2013 - just 6.0 percent of the number of requests made across the European Union. In the same period, 125,000 requests were made in Germany, 65,000 in France and 55,000 in Sweden.

Catholic charity Caritas, Save the Children and the UNHCR have all insisted that, with a lack of commitment in Europe to finding legal ways for asylum seekers to escape their homelands, Italy cannot simply stop saving boat migrants. In a bid to reassure critics, on October 16th Alfano said that "even after Mare Nostrum winds up, Italy will continue search and rescue missions at sea." (Text ends)

A year of Mare Nostrum: Italy's 'proud' rescuers

(October 29, 2014) As Italy mulls ending its "Mare Nostrum" sea operation, Italians recount their experiences on the front lines of the battle to save tens of thousands of boat migrants. The memory of terrified parents and children being tossed out of their boat to drown in a nighttime storm haunts Captain Giuseppe Maggio, one of the men and women tasked with saving shipwrecked migrants in the Mediterranean.

"We've seen things I cannot describe. The hardest moment was one shipwreck when we managed to rescue 250 people...but with rough seas, at night, we weren't able to save everyone," the coast guard captain told AFP in Palermo port after yet another exhausting operation at sea. His crew is one of dozens that have rescued thousands of asylum seekers attempting the perilous crossing from northern Africa as part of "Mare Nostrum" ("Our Sea"), a large-scale deployment launched by Italy after two deadly shipwrecks last year.

And with the number of deaths in the Med topping 3,300 so far this year they have no intention of stopping, despite Italy's threat to wind up its search and rescue mission. "It does take a toll. Many of us have families, I'm a father of two and its sometimes hard to reconcile your home life with what you have to do," he said, describing nights spent recovering bodies or searching for shipwreck survivors. Despite the strain, Maggio says "the emotional reward is far greater than the effort and sacrifices made."

The main challenge of his 32-man crew is keeping migrants calm while transferring them quickly from unseaworthy boats to the rescue vessels. "Timing is everything. You need to hold your nerve and make sure they know everything's going to be ok," Maggio said as 261 people from Syria, Mali and Ghana, rescued the day before, disembark from the "Fiorillo" coast guard boat.

"We're dealing with people who often cannot swim, don't speak our language and are exhausted from days in the sun. The key is to prevent panic," he said. Social assistant Angela Puccio, who works for Palermo's city council, is on hand at the port to help with any unaccompanied minors brought in and often deals with teenagers "who have suffered physical and psychological violence."

'Bewilderment and fear'

Rushing from one makeshift tent to another, as the Red Cross and Caritas Catholic charity give new shoes, water and food packages to families waiting to be identified by police, she said the youngsters are sometimes difficult to control. "We hear terrible stories of what they've been through, which we then carry home with us. But you can't get too wrapped up in them or you wouldn't be able to carry on," she said.

Back out at sea, navy frigate Captain Francesco Laghezza and the crew of the "San Giorgio" are scouring the area for others who may be in trouble. The navy's long landing platform dock spends four months at a time on the front line of Mare Nostrum and has picked up over 18,000 people so far.

"The first time we saved migrants was an incredible experience, and the feeling remains the same with each new mission," said Laghezza, 41, the ship's second in command, who regularly dons a white hazmat suit to pluck migrants from their battered boats. "The migrants have the same look in their eyes of bewilderment and fear, and I have the same sense of pride in helping rescue them," he said by satellite telephone from the ship.

Ottavia Balbi, doctor on the "San Giorgio", said she not only treats the sick but also listens to horror tales of desert journeys and devastated homelands, noting psychological traumas to flag up to charity workers who take over care of the new arrivals on the portside.

“The most difficult thing is keeping a clear head, especially while dealing with sick children. But when those we’ve bonded with wave goodbye to us as they disembark, it brings us huge satisfaction,” the 27-year old sublieutenant said. Despite the possible end to Mare Nostrum, Laghezza said he and the rest of the crew would “continue to save lives, regardless of the name of the mission or the flag we fly under.” “I am proud to do so. What could be nobler than rescuing men, women and children who are fleeing war and persecution?” he added. (Text ends)

Eritrean resistance steps up pressure on President Isaias Afewerki By

Martin Plaut, The Guardian (October 30, 2014)

Eritrea is the most closed and repressive country in Africa, routinely denying access to the international media. No foreign journalists are based in the country and there is no independent local press. However, in a rare and courageous breach of the wall of silence, members of the internal opposition spoke to the Guardian and Radio France International last weekend.

Since independence from Ethiopia in 1993 Eritrea has been ruled by as a one-party state by President Isaias Afewerki, who brooks no opposition. Two members of the Eritrean resistance, speaking via a secure connection, described conditions inside the country. “Essentials like water, electricity or petrol have disappeared,” they said. Food is so expensive that even middle-class families find it difficult to find enough to eat.

They said tension in the capital, Asmara, is high, with reports of trucks filled with Ethiopian “mercenaries” – from the Tigray People’s Democratic Movement (TPDM), known locally as Demhit, which Eritrea supports – ringing the city. The last round of compulsory military service failed, with only around 50 of the expected 400 conscripts reporting for duty. “We think it is highly likely that Demhit will carry out a door to door sweep to round up recruits,” said Sami (not his real name). The TPDM, drawn from the ethnic group that now rules Ethiopia, has been given sanctuary, arms and training by Afewerki. Eritrea and Ethiopia have a long-standing border dispute, which has resulted in tens of thousands of troops confronting one another in the bleak, mountainous border region. Supporting Demhit is Eritrea’s means of maintaining pressure on the Ethiopian government.

A UN report published this month estimated that some 20,000 TPDM fighters are based in Eritrea, bolstering the president’s security. The report described them as having “a dual function as an Ethiopian armed opposition group and a protector of the Afewerki regime. Its fighters, who are from the same ethnic group as Afewerki, are seen to be personally loyal to him, unlike the defence forces whose loyalties have been questioned by the president in recent years."

Since a failed army mutiny against the Eritrean regime in January 2013, the TPDM has become central to Afewerki's survival. This reliance on foreign forces is deeply resented by the Eritrean population. "They demanded the identity documents of a friend of mine and I," Sami said. "When this happened earlier this year there was a riot. People really hate them." Despite the intense security, the resistance is finding new ways of getting its message across. The group, which began over two years ago, started by helping organise phone calls from the diaspora abroad to Eritreans back home.

The resistance told the Guardian how it evaded tight security to put up posters protesting against conscription. "We lay on the streets, pretending to be homeless people," said Sami. "It was freezing cold, but the security officials walked right over us. When they had gone we could put up our posters.

A smuggled video of "Freedom Friday", now on YouTube, shows people in Asmara crowding round to read the posters.

Sami described the growing contempt for the regime. "In coffee bars you hear people talking – even high-ranking officials complain openly about the regime." The government led the struggle for Eritrean independence, and for years relied on its legitimacy to demand the population's support. "The movement was treated like a religion then, like the Bible or the Koran, and followed unquestioningly," said Sami's colleague, Temasgen. "Slowly, this has fallen away – and now it is gone." Both men know the risk they are taking in speaking to the international media. "I am willing to pay with my life," Sami declared. "In history I would rather be remembered as someone who made the ultimate sacrifice rather than just sit and complain to my neighbours." They appealed for international pressure to be maintained on Afewerki: "Listen to our agony. We thank you for giving shelter to Eritrean refugees abroad, but if you are a decision-maker we beg you to keep up the pressure on the Eritrean regime."

The opposition's growing confidence and the fragility of the regime comes at a time when discussions are taking place about relaxing the sanctions against the Eritrean government. There are suggestions that the European Union is thinking about a new approach towards Asmara, and offering aid worth €200m (£158m) as a carrot for improved human rights. Previous attempts by the former EU development commissioner Louis Michel to negotiate the release of the Swedish journalist Dawit Isaak in return for aid resulted in empty promises. Neither Dawit nor other political prisoners were freed. Instead, repression intensified, resulting in an exodus of refugees, who find their way across the Sahara and the Mediterranean to arrive at Calais in their hundreds. (Text ends)

UN fears for migrants as Italy ends rescue mission
LOCAL ITALY'S NEWS IN ENGLISH (October 30, 2014)

UPDATES: Italy on Friday confirmed the end of its search and rescue operation "Mare Nostrum", which has saved the lives of tens of thousands of boat migrants in the Mediterranean. "From tomorrow a new operation called 'Triton' begins," deputy prime minister and interior minister Angelino Alfano told journalists at a press conference, referring to a much more limited mission led by the EU border agency Frontex. "Mare Nostrum ends. Italy has done its duty," he said, adding that the government had spent some €114 million on the massive naval operation since two deadly shipwrecks in October last year left over 400 people dead. "There will be a phase in which Mare Nostrum will accompany Triton, which will last two months," he said. Although the rescue mission is being shelved, the country will continue to abide by "the laws of the sea" under which ships which spot migrants in trouble are obliged to rescue them. Italy's determination to shut down the costly operation has been denounced by aid agencies, with the UN's refugee agency saying on Friday it was "very worried about the ending of Mare Nostrum." "A proper search and rescue effort needs to be maintained, otherwise people will continue to die," UNHCR spokesman William Spindler told reporters in Geneva, adding that the UN body did not think "Triton" - which will involve patrols limited to EU waters - was enough.

Italy boat rescues 'were not migrant pull-factor' LOCAL
ITALY'S NEWS IN ENGLISH (October 31, 2014)

The International Organization for Migration rejected on Friday allegations that an Italian operation to rescue migrants in the Mediterranean had inspired a surge in the numbers attempting the perilous journey to Europe.

"Boat arrivals to Europe are a result of the complex humanitarian crisis near Europe's external borders, not of the humanitarian life-saving policies that try to assist those in need," IOM chief William Lacy Swing insisted. His comment came after Britain earlier this week charged that Italy's Mare Nostrum operation, which has rescued some 150,000 migrants in the Mediterranean in the past year, had created "an unintended 'pull factor'".

Immigration Minister James Brokenshire warned Thursday that the operation - a large-scale deployment launched a year ago after two deadly shipwrecks - had encouraged traffickers to place "more vulnerable people in unseaworthy boats on the basis that they will be rescued and taken to Italy." He claimed that the operation, which is now ending, had had the "unintended consequence of placing more lives at risk". But Swing insisted the rescue operations in the Mediterranean were a life-saving necessity.

"This is not a crisis of a so-called excess of migrants overburdening the continent, but an emergency of more people needing protection, aid and safe migration channels," he said. The United Nations refugee agency agreed, with UNHCR spokesman William Spindler pointing out on Friday that the surge in migrant numbers had begun before Mare Nostrum was launched last year.

“You can’t say that the increase in numbers of people is a consequence of Mare Nostrum. In fact its the opposite. Mare Nostrum came as a response to the dangerous conditions in which people were travelling across the Mediterranean,” he told in reporters in Geneva. An estimated 3,200 people have died so far this year trying to cross the Mediterranean, many of them “victims of ruthless criminal gangs seeking to profit from the misery of men, women and children fleeing conflict and oppression,” IOM said.

The EU is set to launch a patrol mission in the Mediterranean on Saturday. But it will not be a rescue operation that ventures beyond European territorial waters, giving rise to fears that many migrants will be left to drown after Italy pulls the plug on Mare Nostrum. Lacy urged the EU to support further sea rescue missions. “At a time when countries in North Africa, the Middle East and East Africa are hosting millions of displaced persons, compared to a few hundred thousand in all of Europe, the European reaction should be balanced and compassionate,” he said.(Text ends)

November 8, 2014: Protest pamphlets flood Asmara.

(ANONIMOUS) Asmara, the capital of Eritrea, was flooded with anti-government pamphlets over the past few days, according to my relatives there. The security forces did not make any attempt to collect the pamphlets, fueling the rumor that the Isaias regime is unraveling. Today a large part of Asmara was without electricity and the bread lines are backed up several city blocks. Young Eritreans continue to flee the country in massive numbers.

Refugees moved as violence mounts in Rome
LOCAL ITALY’S NEWS IN ENGLISH (November 14, 2014)

Italian authorities have accelerated the transfer of refugees from a centre in the outskirts of Rome, amid escalating violence as residents called for foreigners to be driven out of the area.

Dozens of unaccompanied children were moved from the centre in Tor Sapienza to safer facilities on Thursday, as locals hurled stones and bottles on a fourth day of violence, Ansa reported. Riot police were dispatched to the deprived eastern Rome suburb on Tuesday as tensions mounted, with the latest attacks reportedly sparked after a bar refused to let a group of migrants in. “We are scared. We are trying to find a compromise with the residents,” Francesco Amato, a centre official, told the Associated Press news agency.

The Italian saving boat migrants’
LOCAL ITALY’S NEWS IN ENGLISH (November 14, 2014)
The way she tells it, Regina Catrambone is just a regular Italian Catholic.

“I go to church, I pray, but I’m not a religious freak,” says the joint founder of Moas, a unique humanitarian venture that owes its existence to a combination of Pope Francis’s inspirational turn of phrase and a chance encounter with a winter coat separated from its owner in tragic circumstances. Moas stands for Migrant Offshore Aid Station. Essentially, it is a boat, albeit a pretty sophsticated one. The 40-metre Phoenix I boasts a helipad designed to accommodate camcorder drones capable of surveying 600 square kilometres of ocean in a six-hour flight as well as a multinational crew of sailors, security experts, a doctor, some paramedics and a cook. Moas may not be the biggest enterprise in the world but its human balance sheet is firmly in the black.

Since the end of August, the Malta-based NGO has rescued nearly 3,000 migrants who might otherwise have perished trying to cross the Mediterranean on overcrowded, barely sea-worthy vessels. For now however, Moas’s search-and-rescue operations in waters that have claimed the lives of more than 3,300 migrants this year alone are suspended pending the outcome of a fund-raising operation that Catrambone and her American husband Christopher hope will enable the Phoenix to resume its mission in the Spring. “Chris and Regina’s idea when they set up Moas was to show what could be achieved when there is a will,” said the charitable foundation’s director, Martin Xuereb, a former Chief of Staff at Malta’s Ministry of Defence. “They bought the boat, they paid for it to be equipped and they have funded this year’s operations. “But at nearly $450,000 [€360,000] a month operational costs, that is not something they can keep doing indefinitely.” (Text ends)

Globalisation of indifference

The Catrambones run an insurance and services business for workers in global hotspots. They were happy to dig deep into their savings after being brought face-to-face with the Mediterranean’s darker side while on holiday last year. “We had rented a boat and we were travelling to Tunisia when I saw this winter jacket floating in the sea,” Regina recalled.

“It was an odd sight in the middle of summer so I asked the captain where it might have come from. He told me that, almost certainly, it had belonged to someone who had passed away. “It was a reality check: here we were relaxing and enjoying ourselves in the same sea that people were dying in, trying to find a new life.” The experience planted an idea that grew stronger after the Pope’s visit to the Italian island of Lampedusa in July 2013.

On his first trip out of Rome, the new pontiff railed against the serial drownings on Europe’s southern shores and the “globalization of indifference” that had allowed them to happen. “What we heard from Papa Francesco made us want to follow his lead,” Regina said. “He is so simple and approachable. He gets down off his pedestal. Everyone should be like him.” Three months after the Pope’s visit, more than 360 Africans died on a sinking, burning ship off Lampedusa in a disaster that catapulted the Mediterranean’s migrant crisis onto front pages.

Bitter infighting

Italy reacted with Mare Nostrum, a naval search-and-rescue operation that saved tens of thousands of lives before being abruptly ended at the end of last month after Rome's European Union partners baulked at helping to fund the €9 million per month it cost to run. Against a backdrop of further infighting over whether MN was actually making the problem worse, the Italian operation has been replaced by a scaled-down EU mission called Triton whose mandate is restricted to waters within 50km of the bloc's southern coastline.

"Effectively we have gone back to the situation that existed before the Lampedusa disasters and no one knows what will happen next year," said Xuereb.The Moas director dismisses the idea, advanced by some EU governments, that operations like his increase the 'pull' factor drawing migrants towards Europe by reducing the risk involved in the final leg of their perilous journeys.

"That rationale is flawed," the retired brigadier said. "There are now more displaced people in the world than there were at the end of World War II. Desperation is the biggest 'push' factor there is and that is what we have to focus on. "But we don't want to get involved in any finger-pointing - these are world problems, not just Europe's. We are just trying to solve our little bit of the puzzle." (Text ends)

ERITREA: Back to the Dark Ages'
By Martin Plaut (November 17, 2014)

This information comes from sources with direct contact with people living in Eritrea. It gives a unique picture of life under a regime that tolerates no independent media coverage – national or international. Note: the unofficial exchange rate is 70 – 75 Nakfa to the £.

Life in Asmara today: It has been almost two weeks since there has been any electricity supply in Asmara and those who have no access to generators are in the dark.

Their mobile phones are dead too…

Scarcity of petrol and diesel means public transport is difficult. Horse drawn carts and wheel-burrows have returned to the streets.

People use their carts to transport water. In many areas of the city taps have run dry.

People queue for hours to get water, filling jerrycans and barrels and carting them off.

There is also a scarcity of domestic fuel for cooking. Kerosine is supplied once or twice a year in the government shops.

Every family gets 5-10 liters. When that runs out people use coal. Real hardship Bread is so scares and is only supplied intermittently.

Each person gets one loaf. When it is available the bread is good quality and cheap so people are happy when there is a bread delivery.

Every month 5 liters of cooking oil is provided per family.

The only cereal supplied is sorghum which people use as a staple in place of wheat and taff.

Sorghum is supplied every other month and a family of three gets about 15kg.

Additionally a packet of teabags and 3 kg of sugar is also sold every month. but sometimes the tea bags are not available.

Fresh produce is sold in open markets but the prices are so high a single meal can cost an national service recruits his or her entire salary, of 450 nakfa.

1kg of Potatoes cost 50 nakfa, tomatoes cost 40 and onions 25. Meat is a luxury that many only dream about - it costs 250 nakfa per kg.

A medium sized chicken costs 400 nakfa, a goat will set you back 600 nakfa.

The people who are suffering the most are the educated middle classes who may earn 1,500-2,000 nakfas.

Most are expected to support not only their immediate families but their extended families as well. Many single young men are fleeing the country to avoid this fate.

An email from a relative: “Please send me any cloths that your children don’t need anymore. We use all our money on food and rent (my mum now lives with us as my two brothers are in Juba, South Sudan now). My three children are literally running around in rags.”

Please note: If you believe that any of this information is inaccurate, please let me know. If you have any further anecdotes about life in Eritrea, please sent it to me.

Updates: I have received these responses since the item was posted.

1. Hospitals are suffering because of shortage of electricity. A blood laboratory result could take more than 10 days. Means if ur sickness is critical ur family will accept the result paper days after ur funeral.

2. I am writing this from Asmara. The statements you wrote about electricity, mobile phones etc are fake. How come I was able to charge my phone of there was no electricity in Asmara for 3 days?

3. Do not believe in those who say those are lies. They are all regime supporters. The government gave just 2hours electricity in the last two days. All u wrote is the dramatic truth!

4. "….a goat will set you back 600 nakfa" I am sure this is wrong. When I left Eritrea 3-4 yrs ago, lamb cost 3000-6000 nakfa.

5. All is true. Also, the authorities do not inform (even unofficially) citizens why power is out. They never do. The fact that this is normal practice tells you how oppressed the people are and how much they don't know about how their country is run.

6. By the way, power has been going out most of the day for the past months, It only got worst the last two weeks with 0 to 2 hours of electric power per day. (Text ends)

Italy boat migrants top 2,500 in one weekend'
LOCAL ITALY'S NEWS IN ENGLISH (November 17, 2014)

The Italian navy and merchant ships picked up more than 2,500 migrants from the Mediterranean over the weekend as the flow of refugees seeking to reach Europe rose again. More than 860 migrants, mostly Syrian families, were taken to the Sicilian port of Pozzallo Sunday, showing that many people are still ready to risk the perilous crossing from north Africa in search of a new life.

And on Sunday evening, the Italian coastguard reported it had picked up a total of 320 people off the island of Lampedusa - 240 on one boat and 80 crowded onto a dinghy. The Italian navy rescued 150,000 people in just over a year before its Mare Nostrum search-and-rescue mission ended on November 1st after other EU governments refused to help Italy meet operational costs that Rome estimated at €9 million ($11.25 million) a month. The mostly Syrian refugees landed in Pozzallo on Sunday included an unusually high proportion of children, the Italian news agency Ansa reported. Around 100 of the migrants were from Morocco, a country not usually represented among the people landing in Italy.

On Saturday a total of 477 migrants were delivered to Porto Empedocle on Sicily's southern coast by Panamanian tanker the Gaz Concord and a navy patrol boat put 354 ashore at Pozzallo. Greek oil tanker Byzantion picked up 230 people from their distressed boat on Friday evening and another 80 were taken ashore off the heel of Italy after the yacht in which they had travelled from Turkey was intercepted by coastguards. Another navy boat, the Vega, was due in the mainland port of Reggio Calabria on Monday morning with a load of 230 migrants. (Text ends)

Italy registers surge in asylum applications

LOCAL ITALY'S NEWS IN ENGLISH (November 18, 2014)

Italy received nearly as many asylum applications in the first half of this year as it did in the whole of 2013, figures published on Monday revealed.

In a reflection of the dramatic surge in the numbers of migrants reaching Italy's shores from North Africa, there were 25,401 applications for refugee status between January and June, compared with 26,520 in the previous 12 months, according to a report produced by NGOs including Caritas in collaboration with the UN refugee agency (UNHCR). More than 150,000 migrants have landed in Italy this year. Many of them were rescued from the Mediterranean by the Italian navy after their own overcrowded barely seaworthy vessels got into difficulty. And there is no sign of a let-up in an influx which is becoming an increasingly controversial issue in Italian politics. The navy reported over 2,500 new arrivals in ports in Sicily and the southern mainland over the weekend.

Italy boat migrants top 2,500 in one weekend

Aid organizations say the bulk of those arriving in Italy have a genuine claim to refuge having fled conflict or persecution in places like Iraq, the Palestinian territories, Syria, Eritrea or unbearable poverty and bonded labour in parts of Africa and South Asia. Experts in the field say a relatively small proportion of new arrivals in Italy apply for asylum because many prefer to continue their journeys, clandestinely, to northern Europe.

More than half of this year's arrivals in Italy have come from war-wracked Syria or Eritrea, a former Italian colony. But the biggest number of asylum applications came from nationals of Mali, which has been destabilized by a three-way conflict involving Islamists, Tuareg groups and government forces backed by former colonial power France. Some 93 percent of asylum applicants are still men, despite the latest boats arriving often including higher proportions of women and children than ever seen before.

Italy ends up allowing just over 60 percent of applicants to stay in the country. Of 24,000 cases processed in 2013, only 13 percent resulted in the applicant getting full refugee status. But 24 percent were given temporary protection and another 24 percent were granted leave to remain on humanitarian grounds. Although nearly all migrants land in southern Italy, they are quickly redistributed around the country and municipal authorities in a number of towns and cities are beginning to say that their ability to cope has reached breaking point. Rome, which receives about a fifth of the asylum seekers, has demanded a review of the system following violent clashes last week in which residents of a city neighbourhood housing three centres for migrants laid siege to one of them in a bid to force the removal of the inhabitants.(Text ends)

Mafia 'cashes in' on Sicily's migrant influx
THE LOCAL ITALY'S NEWS IN ENGLISH (November 19, 2014)

Asylum seekers washing up by the thousands in recession-hit Sicily are boosting the local economy as hotels transform into immigrant centres, with help from state subsidies said to have caught the mafia's eye. Sofas and widescreen televisions in once opulent suites of the Villa Mokarta hotel in Salemi have been replaced with beds for up to eight migrants a room, their only possessions tatty rucksacks, trainers and the odd Bible or Koran. "Tourist reservations had dropped way under 50 percent so we decided to give housing immigrants a go instead," manager Salvatore Cascia told AFP.

Since February he has been in charge of the welfare of some 140 asylum seekers, for the most part from West Africa and Bangladesh. The government gives Villa Mokarta and hundreds of structures like it across Italy €30 a day per migrant, €2.50 euros in pocket money and the rest earmarked for bed, board and services such as Italian lessons, psychological care and legal assistance with applying for asylum.

This new hospitality business, which currently houses over 32,300 migrants according to the interior ministry, is worth close to €1 million a day. "Here we eat, do some sport and free our minds," Ebou Cham from Gambia told AFP as he lifted weights with a sports instructor in a make-shift gym in the hotel, which also boasts table football, Sky television, free wifi and a vegetable lot run by the immigrants.

The daily workout "helps to forget about many things we leave behind, the things that make us come here," said the 21-year old, who washed up on Italy's shores in January after a harrowing three-month journey across desert and sea. The villa is one of 32 beachside or hill-top hotels, holiday resorts, former schools and old people's homes which have been transformed over the past 12 months into immigrant centres in the Trapani region in western Sicily.

Hotel manager Cascia, 56, said the venture was bringing "much-needed oxygen" to the local economy in the south, which is suffering its worst recession since the Second World War, according to the economic research centre Fondazione Curella. But in Sicily as in many other Italian regions, there is growing resentment over the presence of immigrants. Minors housed in a centre on the outskirts of Rome had to be moved to safety last week after local residents attacked their centre. And with over 150,000 people landing on Italy so far in 2014 - and more boats incoming - other structures are expected to open.

'A river of money'

Aid organizations such as the Catholic charity Caritas have warned that crime groups in the poverty-stricken mafia heartland may be exploiting the system to pocket much of the funds. "There's a river of money, millions of euros, handed out without tenders and without checking whether the structures have anti-mafia certificates," said Mario Michele Giarrusso, a Sicilian senator from the Five Star Movement (M5S) political party.

“Its an enormous scandal and in a land like Sicily, an incredible risk,” he said, adding that police investigations had been launched into centres found to be keeping migrants in cramped spaces on dirty beds and giving them only white rice to eat. Don Sergio, head of Caritas in Palermo, said not only were “many trying to make money off these poor devils,” but they were cutting corners on services like psychological care, essential for those fleeing war zones and persecution.

“These are people who have been exploited, raped - and not just women. They have come to Italy for a better future, but if you don’t help them they can get agitated and it can end in violence,” he said. Psychologist Ambra Lumia said mentally ill, traumatized or suicidal asylum seekers needed “specialized care which they often don’t receive” in centres run for profits alone.

Italy has repeatedly been found to lack sufficient guarantees concerning facilities for asylum seekers, with the European Court of Human Rights joining the UN’s refugee agency and Council of Europe in voicing concerns this month. One of the biggest complaints is the lengthy wait to have asylum requests examined and permits granted, a problem Italy blames on a paperwork backlog.

Figures published this week show Rome received 25,401 applications between January and June - nearly as many as it did in the whole of 2013. “I’ve been here for nine months, and its really tiring eating, sleeping, eating, sleeping. I owe the Italian people, they rescued me from the sea, I want to work and contribute,” said Lamin Colley, 22, a Villa Mokarta resident.

Giarrusso says the issue is more complicated than red tape alone. He points the finger at a local mafia boss - born in the Trapani region and a fugitive on Italy’s most wanted list - saying he is behind centres which “spring up from morning to night”. “The interest is to open as many as possible and keep the migrants there. The longer they keep them, the more money they bring in,” he said, adding that there were reports of volunteers at some centres being stalked and threatened if they tried to blow the whistle on corruption. “Its a business all right. These migrants die in the Strait of Sicily just to bring millions of euros to the mafia,” he said.

Migrants ‘exploited’ in Italian tomato industry
LOCAL ITALY’S NEWS IN ENGLIISH (November 20, 2014)

An investigative report by a Danish watchdog has revealed that illegal migrants in Italy who are hired to pick tomatoes, which are then exported to Denmark, are “grossly exploited” and work under “harsh conditions”.

According to the report from DanWatch, cited on The Local Denmark, two out of every three imported cans of tomatoes sold in Denmark come from Italy, where illegal migrants work long hours with no contract and very low pay. Some 400,000 migrant workers – primarily young men who come to southern Europe from north and west African countries – pluck tomatoes in Italy without a contract. They receive an average hourly wage of just €3 compared to an average wage of €8.20 for legally-employed workers, while many of them are recruited by gang leaders and live in constant fear of their employers.

"They are very scared and won't talk about it with anyone. They live in sheds and barracks and shantytowns that exist solely of immigrants," Louise Voller, the co-author of DanWatch's 'The backside of the tomato can: Gross exploitation and illegal manpower in Danish canned tomatoes', told the Danish broadcaster, DR.

Migrant workers told DanWatch that they can only find work through gang leaders known as 'Caporali', who they must pay in exchange for being delivered to Italian farmers. Canned tomatoes from Italy bring in 130 million kroner (€17.4 million) a year in Denmark, but the sales may violate UN laws.

"The UN has defined guidelines for human rights and for trade, so when these kinds of conditions are discovered, the supermarkets have a responsibility [...] when they find that the working conditions in Italy negatively impact migrant workers' rights in relation to rest, free time and salary," Sune Skadegaard Thorsen, the head of consulting firm Global CSR, told DR.

After the release of DanWatch's report, two major supermarket companies – Coop and Dansk Supermarked, who between them operate nearly all of the major supermarkets in Denmark – said they would bring up the workers' conditions with their Italian suppliers. "We will take it up with our suppliers and will stress the importance of all tomatoes coming from responsible producers," Mads Hvitved Grand, a spokesman for Dansk Supermarked, told DR.

Dansk Supermarked operates the supermarket chains Netto, Bilka and Føtex. Its main competitor Coop, which operates the Kvickly, Super Brugsen, Irma and Fakta chains, also said it would push its Italian partners. "Its a long, long haul for us. But that doesn't mean that we won't try. Quite the contrary," company spokeswoman Ulla Riber told DR. Thorsen said the Danish companies need to get tough with the Italians. "At the end of the day, the chains need to say: 'If we cannot sell tomatoes that are produced under acceptable conditions, then we will pull out.' They have a responsibility to deliver a product that was made under proper conditions," he said. (Text ends)

Eritrea blames UN refugee agency for thousands fleeing'
AFP, Nairobi (November 21, 2014)

Eritrea said today the reason thousands of its youth are fleeing the hardline regime is because the UN refugee agency and countries with "sinister" motives are tempting them to leave. Tens of thousands have now run away from the autocratic Horn of Africa country, escaping open-ended conscription and the iron-grip rule of President Issaias Afeworki, with many continuing northwards to brave the often harrowing journey towards Europe.

Asmara's Ministry of Foreign Affairs said the youth were fleeing the county because of "deliberate policies of certain governments and agencies" who have chosen to "encourage for sinister political purpose the youth to defect from the national military service through various inducements." Eritreans are second only to Syria as the largest number of asylum seekers in Europe this year, totalling some 37,000 so far in 2014, according to UNHCR, a three-fold rise from 2013. The vast majority are aged between 18 and 24. But Eritrea said UNHCR was "part of the problem" for automatically granting asylum to those who survived the escape out the country, and dismissed its warnings of rising numbers as "crocodile tears."

It said the reports that over 6,200 had arrived in Ethiopia in the past six weeks were part of a "smear campaign". Hundreds cross the heavily fortified and dangerous border into arch-foe Ethiopia daily, with reports by rights groups saying people are struggling under Asmara's repressive government. The entire national football team has defected twice.

Asmara said the labelling of its conscription that stretches for years as "slave or forced labour" was "slanderous". It said the officially 18-month long service is "prolonged only because of Ethiopia's occupation of sovereign Eritrea territories and its continued belligerence in breach of international law."

Eritrea won independence from Ethiopia in 1991 after three decades of war, but returned to battle in 1998-2000. They remain bitter enemies, with their troops still eyeing each other along the fortified frontier. The two countries remain at odds over the flashpoint town of Badme, awarded to Eritrea by a UN-backed boundary commission but still controlled by Ethiopia. Eritrea, about the size of England, has a population of some five million people. Sudan hosts over 1,09,000 Eritrean refugees while Ethiopia hosts over 1,06,000, with thousands more arriving each month. In the past Issaias has said those fleeing are only going for "picnic" and would return. (Text ends)

Migrants dice with death to reach Europe'
LOCAL ITALY'S NEWS IN ENGLISH (November 21, 2014)

Italy has taken in a new batch of nearly 2,400 people rescued off its shores, the coastguard and navy said on Thursday amid signs would-be immigrants are taking increasingly high risks to reach Europe.

The high number of migrants landed in Sicily and the southern Italian mainland between early Wednesday and Thursday afternoon followed the arrival of just over 2,500 over the weekend. The numbers reflect a pattern of boats timing their departures, mostly from Libya, to coincide with lulls in the often adverse weather conditions at this time of year, experts said.

Over the summer, there was a steadier flow of migrants arriving in Italian waters with more than 150,000 having been picked up by the navy or coastguard in the last year.

The latest figures have doused expectations that the numbers would fall off with the approach of winter and as a result of Italy's suspension of its naval search-and-rescue operation, Mare Nostrum, which some critics had argued was encouraging migrants to take the risk of setting off in what are almost invariably overcrowded and unsafe vessels. "We always see a slowdown when the weather is inclement but as soon as the conditions are appropriate they leave in bulk," said Martin Xuereb, a former chief of defence staff in Malta who is now director of Moas, a private rescue operation based on the island. "That is what happened over the weekend - there was a window of opportunity and 2,500 left at one go," he added.

An added danger

"From now until February we will see this - people leaving in bulk and that makes it even more dangerous. Rather than dealing with two boats at a time, there is a possibility of having to deal with 12 to 15 boats at once. "The weather in the Mediterranean in the winter can change very, very quickly. People think 'its not the Atlantic' but the Mediterranean at this time of year can be very, very unforgiving.

"We have some terrible disasters in the last year and I think it is possible that we could see something even worse because of the risk of having multiple distressed boats all at one time and the available (rescue) assets will be spread very thinly," he said. "That really is an added danger because of the suspension of Mare Nostrum," he added. The latest arrivals reflected recent trends with the biggest contingents coming from Syria and Eritrea, followed by Afghanistan.

Many boats are abandoned by their crew of people smugglers before being accompanied to port or evacuated by the coastguard. In one case on Thursday three suspected traffickers were arrested. Unusually, they were Ukrainian nationals. Xuereb said the new pattern showed that the European Union, which has replaced Mare Nostrum with a much more limited operation mandated to patrol waters up to 30 nautical miles off its southern coastline, needs to change policy.

"People are going to keep coming. The war in Syria is ongoing and the problems of Eritrea are not going away," he told AFP. "Tankers and other merchant ships will help (with rescues). They have a legal obligation to and most of them are happy to do that. But they are not equipped for saving lives," he said. "Whatever is in place should be designed to mitigate against the loss of life at sea across the whole Mediterranean." (Text ends)

Nearly 800 migrants rescued off Italy

THE LOCAL ITALY'S NEWS IN ENGLISH (November 23, 2014)

A total 796 people were rescued from boats in distress in the Mediterranean in the last 48 hours, Italian and Libyan officials said Saturday, as unprecedented numbers of would be immigrants head for Italy's shores.

The Italian coastguard said it helped pluck 520 people from five boats in trouble in Libyan waters overnight Thursday to Friday after a communications centre in Rome traced distress calls sent by cellphone from the boats heading towards Sicily. The coastguard then sailed to waters north of Tripoli, the Libyan capital, to help two merchant vessels which had picked up more distress signals. Two groups of 78 and 93 people were also saved. There were no details on their nationalities. Libya's navy announced that on Friday it had rescued 105 migrants from a boat that broke down off the coast of Garabulli, which is around 50 kilometres (31 miles) east of Tripoli. Despite the onset of autumn, which usually brings a slowdown in migrant numbers, Italian authorities this week alone rescued several thousand people. The coastguard and navy say migrants are taking increasingly high risks. Last year saw almost 8,000 people arrive in the first six months, followed by 35,000 in the second half of the year. Around 65,000 people landed in the first half of this year, with the total now at more than 150,000 or an average 400 per day. Greek port authorities meanwhile said 16 people had been rescued but four were missing when a boat carrying mostly Syrian refugees capsized off Mytilene. An Uzbek national was detained on suspicion of human trafficking.

Eritrean ISIS fighter Al-Habashi Killed in Syria'
Asmara (HAN) (November 24, 2014)

Public diplomacy and Regional Security and safety news. According to Johnlee for ibtimes, the dead ISIS fighter from Britain have been identified as Abu Abdullah al-Habashi. The two dead African origin ISIS fighters from Britain have been identified as Abu-Abdullah Al-Habashi (Ethiopian) and Abu-Dharda (Somali). Their deaths were reported on ISIS affiliate accounts in Syria. The Foreign and Commonwealth Office has also affirmed the report stating that it was aware about the reports of the death of two British nationals in Syria.

However, the FCO spokesperson told The Guardian that since the country "does not have any representation in Syria, it is extremely difficult to get any confirmation of deaths or injuries and our options for supporting British nationals there are extremely limited." Al-Habashi, who also goes by the name of name of Abu Abdullah Al-Britani, was brought up in in north London in a Christian Eritrean family (In Ethiopia before 1995 Eritrean separation). He converted to Islam when he was 16.

Al-Habashi has made appearances in at least two ISIS propaganda videos posted online by the extremist group. Al Habashi reportedly told the BBC in August that he was at the "forefront" of fighting and said that he one of the few jihadists from Britain who had the 'honour' of fighting for ISIS both in Iraq and Syria. His family also reportedly had tried to convince him to return home, but he told them off saying that "He had to stay back to fight for Allah."

Earlier last month, Al-Habashi made headlines after he featured in an ISIS propaganda video alongside a German and a French jihadi fighters in Syria. The video titled 'Wait. We are also waiting,' had given out some strong threats to the West. "We are waiting for you in Dabiq. We are waiting for you in Iraq. So bring your coalition of unbelievers because unbelievers will not help you. We will take their weaponry as booty and these people will die."

He then went on to add: "We will chop off the heads of the Americans. We will chop off the heads of the French, chop of the heads of whoever you may bring." He even promised that the black flag of the Islamic State will eventually be on the White House."The second ISIS recruit from UK, Dharda, is a British-Somali who grew up in west London.

According to the British intelligence, Dharda was believed to have been questioned by counter-terrorism police at a British airport as he traveled towards Syria back in 2013. However, he was allowed to continue his journey as the officers were satisfied with the explanation he gave for the purpose of his trip. Johnlee is a Senior Correspondent for IBT India. (Text ends)

November 24, 2014: Russia to Build Eritrea's Military Capability-Ambassador Petros Tsegai, appointed by Eritrean President Isayas Afwerki as Ambassador to the Russian Federation, presented his credentials to President Putin. Geeskaafrika reports that President Putin noted that Eritrea and Russia share similar views on regional and international issues. Putin, said Geeskaafrika, further indicated readiness to strengthen relations in trade, build military capability and economic development and to create a navy Russian fleet in the Red Sea to protect its interests.

November 24, 2014: NEWS: Eritrea discusses security co-operation with Yemen'

SAAN'A (Saba) Interior Minister Jalal al-Rowaishan met separately on Tuesday with ambassadors of Pakistan and Eritrea to Yemen. The minister discussed with the ambassadors the areas of co-operation and ways of strengthening them between Yemen and each country of them, especially in the security area. The Eritrean ambassador valued the support provided by the Interior Ministry to the Eritrean community in Yemen. (Text ends)

Eritrea: courageous people, sadly led by a spineless dictator'

PERSPECTIVE By WS. Asfaw (November 29, 2014)

"To have the arts of peace, but not the arts of war is to lack courage. To have the arts of war, but not the art of peace is to lack wisdom." [1] It is neither right nor fair to compare and contrast Ethiopia and Eritrea in terms of political, social, and economic achievements. Juxtaposing the two entities, however, shows that Ethiopia has an energetic and vibrant society, while Eritrea is unstable and spiraling fast into self destruction due to self inflicted problems.

Following the ousting of the military regime of Mengistu Hailemariam in 1991 by the combined forces of EPRDF, EPLF and the Ethiopian peoples, after a long protracted civil war, it appeared that a new dawn was setting in for the people of Ethiopia and Eritrea. However, whilst Ethiopia followed a democratic path, Isaias's regime pursued a direction contrary to the objectives the people of Eritrea fought for. Under Isaias's PJDF the Eritrean government had emaciated reasons to wage wars of aggression against near and far countries of the Horn of Africa. Thus, it followed a policy contrary to commonsense, of attacking first and trying to negotiate with the "enemy" under submission later. The Eritrean people have shown the world that they are courageous in both peace and war times. They are endowed like any other society, the resilience to be tolerant as well as spirited fighters when they need it. The ruling elites are however, out of this world and out of their depth.

Ethiopia with over 80 million people has been with full vigour engaged in peaceful and vivacious transformation through economic growth, to once and for good, wither away the age old social evils namely, pestilence, disease, and ignorance, from every corner of society. Ethiopia is totally engaged in changing the archaic habits and lethargic way of life of the old and replacing them by a healthy, harmonious and forward looking culture of "we can do it" spirit. With minimum help from outside and immense self belief, it has restructured and ignited itself to regain its prominence among equals. Nonetheless, the last twenty years were not without shortcomings. There were noticeable glitches; despite Ethiopia's stride from strength to strength in its effort to qualitatively change itself.

Unfortunately it was forced to engage in a number of wars of self-defence. In 1998 it was invaded by Eritrea and suffered an unwanted diversion from fighting poverty. Similarly, in 2007/8 Ethiopia had to send in troops to Somalia following an invitation by the then international recognised Transitional Government of Somalia and in self-defence to counter the immediate threat posed by the then Union of Islamist Courts which was led by among others, by a listed terrorist by the name of Sheikh Hassan Dahir Aweys who was the leader of al-Itihaad al-Islamiya which Ethiopia had to fight in the 1990s.

The military involvement of Ethiopia in the failed state of Somalia was purely for self defence against the belligerent Union of Islamist courts who came to power by brute and horror. This unavoidable event, as it was unprovoked aggression was instigated by foreign powers spear-headed by Union of Islamist Courts who later become to be known as Al-Shabaab terrorists. One of the positive by-products of Ethiopia's defensive war was many patriotic Somalis gained momentum to participate in rebuilding their state from scratch. The military involvement also helped many Somalis to appreciate that Ethiopia was never their enemy as Said Barre told them. Many also realized that Said Barre single handed led the country from independence (1960) to its destruction (1991), and become a failed state for over 20 years.

Politically, Isaias has robustly believed in himself that Eritrea is his private entity while the people are his sole subjects who can be cowed at will. The people are slowly but surely, showing him that he is dead wrong. The first and last time Eritrean people took part in an election was when they were forced to choose between "Independence or slavery". The ruling cliques steered the people to "decide" for independence. Consequently, it was reported that 99.83% Eritreans voted for independence. The fact became evident when the population was led sleep-walking to real slavery through the passage of "independence". This was also done to gratify the enemies of Ethiopia at the expense of all the benefits the Eritrean population would have enjoyed by arranging their livelihood amicably with the rest of the Ethiopian people. Isaias and his disciples besieged Ethiopia to be their principal enemy and Tigray become the buffer zone for Isaias's machinations and blatant aggression. Isaias's prime target to strangulate Ethiopia by depriving it access to the sea fell flat on its face. Ethiopia, after all, did arrange other alternative entree points to facilitate need of the booming economy. The inflated value of the port indicated that the cost was far greater than the benefit it provides. It ended up becoming a waterhole for Afar camels and hiding place for Somali pirates and terrorists. The model given to Isaias by his masters to delude, entrap and incarcerate Ethiopia with cyclical wars that cause instability and underdevelopment, was flawed from its inception. The adversaries did not discern the dogged determination, and collective indomitable spirit of Ethiopians to free themselves from age old man-made and natural calamities.

In the absence of any semblance of democratic governance in Eritrea where checks and balances are unknown, public dissatisfaction are muzzled by a simple dictate "Tem Bel" (be quiet).The youth, as well as, 60 and 70 year old men and women are forcefully subjected to the endless national military service. Eritreans are muffled not to seek alternative solution to the inherent problems of their society. Some Eritreans have already concluded that the "independence" they have is pungent than the "slavery" of Ethiopia. They also articulate that Eritrea is in the worst state of servitude now than ever before. Some are yet nostalgically remembering even the cruel days of Derg. It is incredibly sad to compare two dictators' time and choose one from the other. However, they say during Derg's era, at least basic food was available to feed their children unlike the starvation they are facing today. There is no morality or legal obligation that is going to stop the few criminal elements from destroying whatever was won in the previous decades of struggle.

From the start, it was reprehensible and absurd to categorize Ethiopia as an enslaving (colonizing) society. There was neither economic nor political justification for this hyphenated idea. Nevertheless, as reality show, Eritrea would not have been enslaved by Ethiopia for Ethiopia was itself chained by all sorts of clutches of the ancien regime. The infantile debate of Ethiopia colonizing Eritrea had its roots in the Arab world. The concept of independence originated in Cairo, not because the Eritrean people required it but foreign powers prescribed it for their own interest. Through a cocktail of intense propaganda from the Eritrean fronts and previous degenerate regimes of Ethiopia, independence of Eritrea, appeared to be more plausible for the ordinary citizen, although there was no reasonable debate on the issue.

In retrospect, Eritrea would have had a vibrant economy, a forward looking, and cohesive society, like all nations and nationalities of Ethiopia. In short, Ethiopia is forging ahead registering qualitative changes on scale undreamt of before. While Eritrean leaders, under the dictatorship of one man and one party, have become cocooned, xenophobic and self-destructive. If the trend of poverty and political oppression continues, it seems Eritrea is bound to implode. The warning signs are posted all over.

Few Eritreans backed the Isaias's economic fantasy of attaining fast growth like "Singapore", out of fear and/ or desperation. The route of achieving this wishful "economic miracle" was, planned through manipulative tactics rather than any proven or viable economic model. Tackling the chronic problems of underdevelopment through dubious model was a non-starter. The Isaias's unorthodox economic model (greed) through illegal and conniving practices included raiding raw materials from the surrounding neighbouring countries, banking fraud, tax evasion, counterfeiting, activities in smuggled goods (contraband trade) and other organized criminal activities by well trained henchmen, was lased in an indiscriminate noxious hatred of Ethiopians. Eventually the overall scheme was to make Ethiopia dependent on Eritrea by hook or by crook. Some of them were even hallucinating that Ethiopia's raw materials ought to be processed in Asmara and shipped back to Ethiopia at a greater margin of profit. For instance, with such manipulative activities, Eritrea became a major coffee exporting country without growing a single coffee tree in its backyard. Obviously, this did not last long.

The ruling elites follow divide and rule policy similar to what the Italians used to exercise in their heyday in Eritrea. Bigotry as a weapon was initially adapted in Eritrea by the Italians to foster friction and bitterness among neighbourly people of similar origins. Isaias's crumbling regime uses hate-mongering within Eritrea against each other and against Ethiopians wherever they are to promote ill-filling among peoples of the region that lived harmoniously for centuries. Fostering hostilities among neighbouring peoples is Isaias's prime divisive implement for over staying in power.

Today, as a result of Isaias's economic model, Eritreans are fleeing their country in their thousands despite the shoot to kill policy of the regime and being slaughtered in the Sinai desert by Arab Bedouins for their organs and extortion. Thousands of vulnerable Eritreans are forced to give up their organs including kidney, liver and whatever spare parts the Arabs want to replace. Of course, the immediate beneficiaries of the sale are the, local generals, the traffickers, Arab mafias and the Arabs who are getting the new organs. The helpless Eritrean, after losing her/his organ/s, is not yet free to spare his/her life in spite of losing organ/s. In addition, she/he has to pay $30,000-$40-000 for his/her release. The question is was independence meant to be sustained by commercializing human organs in the Arab commodity exchange? Or do all Eritreans have to be sacrificial lamb to the political and economic failure of Isaias?

Thousands of young Eritreans, who became disgruntled by the aimless military concentration camps of Sawa and Kiloma, are running away from the land of real slavery to all corners of the world, apparently including to Ethiopia. An Israeli news paper reported that there are over 40,000 Eritreans in Israel. (7/10/12 HAARETZ) Sadly, many do not make the journey. Countless are eaten by Mediterranean and Red Sea sharks. Many more are executed by the "shot to kill" policy of the regime. The Eritrean regime is left with a bitterly dissatisfied population, who are regretting for being bullied into voting for independence. Consequently, political stagnation is fermenting social discontent in Eritrea and has reached a point of no return. The stage seems to be getting ready for change. Contrary to the reality on the ground, American politicians Mr. Cohn & Mr. Shinn are, against all odds, attempting to resuscitate the most dangerous tyrant of the Horn of Africa.

I recently met a journalist who went to Eritrea to interview the Head of State.[2] His observation of serious short-comings started the day he arrived in his hotel. He said he ordered Omelette for breakfast, but the waiter kindly informed him that they do not have eggs. The journalist, stunned asked the waiter why don't you have eggs? The waiter replied, "We do not have money to buy eggs". The Journalist went to the nearest shop and bought a dozen eggs. The Chef prepared it and they all ate their breakfast. The journalist told me that he met a number of officials as well as private individuals' discretely all pleading for help.

Of course, he suspected that some of them were government agents. The journalist said, "They all told me that going for independence and cutting the umbilical cord with Ethiopia was the biggest blunder they all made." They told him that, "Eritrea has no future without Ethiopia". Armed with hard facts and after several delays, the journalist interviewed Isaias. One of his unanticipated questions was, "The economic crises is hurting every Eritrean, unemployment is high despite the forced military recruitment of tens of thousands of young Eritreans, Your people are suffering an economic crises unseen in other parts of Africa. Many are saying the problem could be solved if you could initiate to talk with neighbouring countries particularly with Ethiopia. So why don't you?" "Why are the Iranian Military in Aseb?" Isaias started sweating and could not face the interviewer and his questions. Due to "recurring migraine"

Isaias walked out of the interview. The journalist was told to go without concluding the interview.

According to Gunter Schroeder a specialist on the Horn of Africa Refugees, the increasing number of refugees fleeing Eritrea indicates that the regime in Asmara is about to disintegrate.[3] He said, “It is inevitable that after Isaias’s demise, there will be a prolonged instability in Eritrea for at least ten years. The instability will certainly lead to further exodus of refugees in waves of hundreds of thousands.” The recent arrivals to Ethiopia are estimated to be nearly half a million. When the dictator is either peacefully or otherwise removed from power, ensuing power struggle may accelerate further exodus of Eritrean refugees to the neighbouring countries. A friend once said, if you bring 300 highlanders into a meeting, every individual would want to create his/her organization. There is no trust among each other but mutual suspicion and this delays the creation of a common front against their common enemy. However, it seems Isaias has done his homework of disuniting his real and potential enemies by all means. Sadly, in this respect, Isaias’s achievement is successful. As it stands, there is no viable organization that can be counted as a care taker of a small community, let alone a complex society with a lot of foreign imperceptible vested interests. If the Eritrean elites cannot see the looming colossal problem, i.e., the very existence of Eritrea which they worked hard to create for decades, will inevitably be lost altogether. Time is running out and the responsibility is mounting. Eritreans should attempt to sort out, both the petty and complex problems they have even if it is too late. Whenever the dictator is dethroned, there will be unimaginable chaos engulfing the Horn of Africa. There is no Mubarak to redirect the agony into another prolonged catastrophe, and certainly no Gaddafi to fund such senseless sentiment. Saudi will only be interested if Wahabism is left to expand further into the interior and create more havoc under Eritrean Al-shabaab Mark II.

It is a gigantic dilemma. However, it is not a question of ‘independence’ and/or ‘slavery’. Certainly it is a matter of survival of 4/5 million Eritreans. The political economy of Eritrea would not function without the active backing of neighbouring countries. The instability of Eritrea ought to be a concern for all neighbouring countries. Another failed state in the Horn will certainly affect everyone in the region. The entire population, except the ruling elites, is it seems, pleading for help. But then again, it seem the elite is not in a hurry, to either initiate the discourse on how to save the state, or to ascertain their position to steer the society into a different direction from the ruined society by other means. I hope they are still cogitating which way to rescue their debilitating society.

Once again history is glaringly showing us that dictators never see for tomorrow but only for today. The dictator’s survival is anchored on alternating, covertly eliminating opponents, as well as, overtly confusing the innocent public with repetitive propaganda. Said Barre, never stopped his intrigue of divided and rule until the time he was deposed [1991]. Somalia was a game board where he played and shuffled his knights as he desired at will. The very existence of Somalia was not his concern, but only his power. Like Said Barre, Isaias's least worry is the existence of Eritrea. His main apprehension is, like all dictators, losing his omnipotence. Isaias's role will, therefore be to escort Eritrea from "slavery" to independence and then to destruction at any cost.

All the indicators mentioned above are reasons for any society to implode. Even more so, the Eritrean social fault line is widening. In the absence of peace, democratic participation, hope and economic development, militarization will not solve the ills of Eritrean society be it today or tomorrow. Derg had one of the largest army in Africa but did not help him to bring solutions to the ever rising social problems. In Eritrea, every citizen is forced to receive military training. Thus everyone has the know-how of using the gun and the government has armed most of them. This implies that the gun owning person is as potent as his/her neighbour. The conduit from this nightmare would only be through democratic process before the fragile state disintegrates and become another failed state. The consequences of a failed state are too complex to comprehend for anybody. Nevertheless, no one can be complacent of such eventualities.

Conclusion: The downfall of the Derg in 1991 fractured Ethiopia into two entities. Eritrea opted out for independence with an economic dream of over powering the Horn of Africa and by emulating Singapore to become an economic miracle state. The new Ethiopia, without Eritrea, on the other hand inherited a fragile society with empty coffers, malfunctioning state structure, and an accumulated dept of billions. Michael Jones said,"Mengistu enjoyed, from 1977 until his recent departure, some $10 billion in Soviet military Aid."[14] When Eritrea uniquely started from a favourable condition, Ethiopia with a greater population and land mass had to finish the war economy of the previous regime and start from negative budget.

Both states, (Ethiopia in 1991 & Eritrea in 1993) had to choose as to which way to move forward. Fortunately, Ethiopia decided to go the democratic path. However, establishing democratic institutions in a fragile state was not uncomplicated. Emerging from an era of dictatorship to a new democratic system, were certainly, a momentous occasion and a breakthrough for a new beginning in a multi-ethnic society. Today, it is slowly but surely moving forward on an assured democratic path by enhancing public participation on relevant issues and bonding all the nations and nationalities of Ethiopia further to create a cohesive truly multinational state. Diversity is becoming a source of wealth, strength and unity.

On the other hand, the Eritrean regime opted out for tyranny and prolonged the dictatorship contrary to the demand of the Eritrean people and the objectives that they fought for the three decades. In the absence of justice, respect of human rights and in general good governance, Eritrea is continuously veering towards a failed state status. The decision whether to remain as a pariah state or join the Horn of African fraternity and the international community at large will remain a unilateral choice of Eritreans. Isaias cannot change his dictatorial nature and be a rehabilitated to be a democrat over night. Eritrea and the surrounding areas need an ever lasting solution to the problems created by one tyrannical administration. However, the preliminary steps for long lasting solution to the Eritrean problem have to start from introducing inalienable rights enshrined in the UN Charter. Respect of Press Freedom, freedom of speech, Human rights, release of political and religious prisoners, freedom of movement etc., are some of the fundamental rights that Isaias should have acted upon when declaring independence. These have to be reckoned while starting to negotiate the long term destiny of Eritrea with a tyrant whose days in power are numbered. On the one hand, any patch-up work with a dictator will not last long. On the other hand, it is certainly obvious that Ethiopia should invest on lasting solutions that will bring long-term peace and stability in the region. Thus, the prerequisite to the durable peace is nothing but ingraining democracy where it is scarce and in existent.

Those who advocate of bringing Isaias "from the cold", it seems, have an agenda of their own which directly challenges the interest of Ethiopia. Above and beyond giving a breezing space to a desperate tyrant who does not understand peace, is not a solution to the prevailing crisis of the region that he singularly created. While the long term problem of peace in the region and democratic governance in Eritrea requires long term solution, rehabilitating Isaias betrays the basic quest of the Eritrean people for peace and democracy. Likewise, it denigrates the life of thousands of Ethiopians who died for their country. (Text ends)

Italian police bust human smuggling ring operated by Eritreans

AFP News: (December 5, 2014) Italian police said on Wednesday they had busted an Eritrean trafficking ring accused of smuggling migrants into Europe on perilous Mediterranean boat crossings, including one in which 244 people died. Police arrested ten Eritreans after an investigation uncovered "existence of a transnational organization, operating in Italy, Libya, Eritrea, and other North-African states," according to a statement released by police in Catania, Sicily, where the investigation was launched in May.

The group organized boat departures from Libya to Italy, with "footsoldiers" in the Lazio and Lombardy regions who provided "logistical support to migrants and smugglers...to help them from Sicily to Italy, then on to other countries in Europe," Antontio Salvago of Catania police told AFP.

Nine of those taken into custody were arrested on November 25th in Italy, while the tenth - named as Measho Tesfamariam and accused of being one of the ringleaders - was arrested on Tuesday in Germany. The group is accused of organizing 23 trips from Libya to Italy between May and September, while Tesfamariam is alleged to have personally overseen in Libya the departure of an overcrowded vessel which sank off the North African coast between June 27th and 28th, killing all 224 people on board. During a raid in Catania, police also arrested an 11th Eritrean accused of harbouring nine Somalians, eight of whom were minors, in a small locked room. (Text ends)

ERITREA: Appeal made to Southern African states to grant asylum to Eritreans who are escaping repression in their country' NEWS ANALYSIS (December 11, 2014)

Stop Eritreans from dying on the high seas and grant them political asylum. This was the call by the Southern African Development Community Council of Nongovernmental Organisations (SADC-CNGOs) that met with representatives from Eritrea in Johannesburg last week. Figures show that Eritreans make up the highest number of Africans who die while trying to cross the Mediterranean Sea in fateful attempts to flee the repressive regime in their county.

A study by the International Organisation for Migration, titled "Fatal Journeys: Tracking lives lost during migration", estimates that more than 3 000 people have died this year trying to cross over the Mediterranean Sea to Europe. Eritreans are the biggest group from Africa and second only to Syrians as a percentage of the total number of migrants dying in the sea. Speaking at the end of a two-day workshop with representatives of the Eritrean diaspora, Abie Dithlake, executive director of the SADC-CNGOs, said countries in Southern Africa should reach out to support those suffering elsewhere on the continent.

Well-documented repression: SADC member states such as South Africa, which plays an important role in the African Union (AU), should also put pressure on the AU to adhere to sanctions against the Asmara regime. Repression in the Horn of Africa country has been well documented in numerous United Nations reports and those from human rights organisations. Human Rights Watch, for example, states that "torture, arbitrary detention and severe restrictions on freedom of expression, association and religious freedom remain routine in Eritrea".

Eritrea has ranked last in the Reporters Without Borders press freedom index for the past seven years. "We are aware of resolutions by the AU, but leaders are not making the necessary efforts to enforce them," said Dithlake. He said NGOs should put pressure on governments to grant political asylum to Eritreans to enable them to organise in countries like South Africa. Kuluberhan Abraham, a member of the Eritrean Movement for Democracy and Human Rights, who lives in South Africa, says there are between 5 000 and 6 000 Eritreans living in South Africa, but only a small percentage of them have managed to obtain refugee status.

According to figures from the UN High Commission for Refugees, 821 Eritreans were granted refugees status in South Africa last year. This is compared with up to 24 000 Somalis with refugee status and 15 000 from the Democratic Republic of the Congo, according to the estimated figures. Activists at the SADC-CNGOs meeting said Eritreans are increasingly being considered as “economic refugees” in the same category as those from poor African countries, but whose lives aren’t necessarily in danger back home. This is especially true in Europe where Eritreans have been arriving in large numbers.

Not economic refugees: Andebrhan Giorgis, a former Eritrean ambassador who now lives in Belgium and heads an NGO called Revival Africa Initiative, says this is a wrong perception of Eritreans. “They are not economic refugees but political refugees. As soon as the situation improves they will return home.” One of the main issues that drives young Eritrean males out of the country is compulsory military service, which was initially restricted to 18 months, but has been gradually prolonged and “amounts to indentured labour”, says Giorgis.

Boys from the age of 15 and 16 are called up for this military duty and the final school year, grade 12, is completed in the military camps, according to a statement by the Eritrean Movement for Democracy and Human Rights. The organisation says there are many documented cases of Eritrean refugees who have fled to other countries but were sent back home from places such as Malta, Sudan or Libya. Upon their return they were held in harsh detention centres and mistreated. Source: http://mg.co.za/article/2014-12-10-call ... -eritreans. (Text ends)

Eritrean rebels kill 7 intelligence agents
By Tesfa-Alem Tekle, Sudan Tribune (December 24, 2014)

ADDIS ABABA — Two Eritrean rebel groups on Monday said they have killed 7 Eritrean intelligence agents in an attack they jointly carried out on a military camp in the southern part of the country. The rebel groups - the Red Sea Afar Democratic Organization (RSADO) and the Democratic Front for Eritrean Unity (DFEU) - said the coordinated attack was carried out in the early hours of Monday at a military barrack of an intelligence unit based at Adi-Kala zone of Maigini locality.

“The joint fighters carried out the attacks at 5 am Monday morning...at least 7 Eritrean military intelligence officers were killed and more than 15 others wounded,” RSADO leader Ibrahim Haron, told Sudan Tribune. After the attack remaining Eritrean soldiers who he said were members of the 53rd sub-division went in disarray. “A number of weapons and military intelligence were also seized,” he said adding the fighters have safely returned to their base. There was no immediate comment from the government in Asmara and the attack claims could not independently be verified.

Asmara has in the past repeatedly denied such reports of attacks. Haron said the latest ambush was in retaliation to killings by Eritrean government against innocent citizens particularly against ethnic Afar minorities. The two rebel groups further vowed to intensify joint attacks in the year 2015 and called on all other opposition forces to join the armed struggle to overthrow president Isaias Afwerki’s regime.

RSADO and DFEU are members a larger opposition coalition known as Eritrean Democratic Alliance (EDA). Based in neighboring Ethiopia, EDA is an umbrella of 12 Eritrean opposition political organisations. (Text ends)

DIGITALISED ID CARDS

The Eritrean government has recently announced that nation is preparing to issue new citizenship identification cards for what the red sea nation says was to improve national security. Eritrean government alleges thousands of African migrants, mostly Ethiopians, are using forged identification cards pretending to be Eritreans in order to secure asylum in western countries.

Eritrean authorities say the new digitalised identification cards aim to stop such forging; however, rebels say the move was politically motivated.

"The government is issuing new ID cards only to its supporters. The plan is to deny issuing the new ID cards to those citizens suspected to be opponents or opposition supporters and thereby subject them to prosecution by falsely accusing them as illegal aliens or spies," said Haron. He added the new plan was also designed to systematically force citizens to exile and turn the nation in to a home of only pro-government citizens.

FOREIGN COMPANY

The Eritrean rebel groups have also called on South Boulder Mines Ltd., an Australian mining company, to stop its operation inside the country. The mines company is currently undergoing a feasibility study over 400 sq. km at Colluli area in the Danakil Depression, South East part of the Red Sea nation. Colluli potash deposit is estimated to have more than one billion tones of potassium sulfate deposits that would enable production of potash fertilizers. (Text ends)

Switzerland's oldest monastery opened its doors to Eritrean asylum seekers.

(BBC - December 26, 2014) - Einsiedeln Abbey, Switzerland's oldest and most famous monastery, has opened its doors to asylum seekers. The abbey was founded in the 10th Century; for over 1,000 years it has been a place of pilgrimage. For the Benedictine monks who live there, the daily routine, bounded by prayer, has changed little during that time. But Abbot Urban Federer, who has been in the top job at the abbey for less than a year, wants to create new roles for Einsiedeln that reflect the challenges confronting 21st Century Switzerland. Switzerland has a population which is now almost 25% foreign, with most immigrants coming from the European Union. Like other European countries, it is facing an increase in applications from asylum seekers, particularly Eritreans and Syrians. Swiss voters have gone to the ballot box twice this year to vote on measures aimed at limiting immigration, but the country retains a relatively generous policy towards asylum seekers. "As everywhere in Europe, there are more and more people coming from other countries, from other continents," Abbot Federer says. "And I thought we should do something too, as a church, as a monastery." Coincidentally, the local authorities approached the abbey, asking if it could house asylum seekers while their requests were being processed. Former army barracks and even underground civil protection bunkers are being used as authorities struggle to respond. (Text ends)

Italian navy rescues 1300 migrants at sea
AFP (December 27, 2014)

The Italian Navy rescued some 1,300 migrants in several operations late on Christmas Day, among them a Nigerian woman who gave birth on board one of the rescue vessels, local media said Friday. The majority of the migrants were on boats adrift off the coast of Sicily and were expected to be brought ashore later Friday.

Italian media said one man was found dead on board one of the boats. At least another 1,000 migrants were also rescued by the Italian Navy on Christmas Eve.

Italy has been struggling to cope this year with a massive jump in the number of migrants trying to cross the Mediterranean Sea to Europe, the majority of them from war-wracked Syria or Eritrea. According to the Interior Ministry, 167,462 migrants have arrived in Italy by sea since the start of the year through to December 17. (Text ends)

SIX ERITREAN JOURNALISTS RELEASED AFTER NEARLY SIX YEARS IN PRISON

Reporters Without Borders is happy to learn of the release on bail of six Eritrean journalists who had been held since a wave of arrests in February 2009.

News Feature: They are Bereket Misghina, Yirgalem Fisseha Mebrahtu and Basilios Zemo of Radio Bana, Meles Negusse Kiflu, who worked for Radio Bana and Radio Zara, Girmay Abraham of Radio Dimtsi Hafash and Petros Teferi. "We are delighted to learn of the release of these six journalists, which is an exceptional development in the terrible conditions prevailing in Eritrea, said Cléa Kahn-Sriber, the head of the Reporters Without Borders Africa desk. At this point, we don't have additional information about the circumstances of their release or their state of health. We will obviously follow the situation closely." At least seven other journalists who were rounded up in February 2009 – Mohammed Said Mohammed, Biniam Ghirmay, Esmail Abd-el-Kader, Araya Defoch, Mohammed Dafla, Simon Elias and Yemane Hagos – were released on bail in March 2013. The most dramatic event in the February 2009 wave of arrests was a raid on Radio Bana, a small radio station in the centre of the capital that broadcast educational programmes sponsored by the education ministry. All of its staff – about 50 journalists – were taken to Dobozito detention centre on the outskirts of the capital without any explanation being given. According to the figures compiled by Reporters Without Borders, 16 other journalists, including Dawit Isaak and Seyoum Tsehaye, continue to be detained in Eritrea. Eritrea is ranked last in the Reporters Without Borders press freedom index for the seventh year running. (Source: n.rsf.org)

ERITREA: Take me to prison - They have food By Dan Connell, Mail & Guardian (March 6, 2015)

Binyam, a refugee, lives in Kenya now, closing a circle that began with his birth. He's making a new start with the help of relatives after escaping from Eritrea last year, just as his mother had to do three decades ago.

She eventually went home. Binyam hopes that one day he can, too.

His mother fled Ethiopian repression during Eritrea's 30-year war for independence. Binyam fled Eritrean repression carried out in the name of national security and says Eritrea has become one of the most repressive states in Africa.

Binyam is the youngest of eight children. He was born in Nairobi after his father, an underground member of the Eritrean People's Liberation Front (EPLF), smuggled the family into Kenya in the 1980s when the Ethiopian authorities became suspicious of his activities. One of Binyam's sisters was born in an Addis Ababa prison after his mother, also an activist, was arrested.

Binyam's father had been running 12 clandestine cells, whose members gathered intelligence on Ethiopian operations and spread nationalist propaganda. He is still with the Eritrean government – the country achieved independence in 1991 – whose repressive rule his own son has now fled. This reflects how divided some families have become over post-liberation politics.

The family returned to Asmara, the capital of the newly independent Eritrea, in 1992. Binyam was a student when a border war broke out with Ethiopia in 1998. He was taken out of school for military training in 2000, but didn't see combat. In 2003, after completing his 11th year of secondary school, he was called to the Sawa Defence Training Centre for his 12th, as has been the case for all who came of age since a truce that left both countries in a face-off that has yet to end.

Some within the liberation front's leadership criticised how the war was conducted and the president refused to honour a Constitution that had been ratified before it began. This led to a massive crackdown in 2001 during which some leaders were imprisoned and private media outlets were shut down. Since then, all dissent has been labelled "treason" and thousands have been jailed.

Asylum seekers
As many as 300 000 people have fled the country over the past decade, making Eritrea, with a population of about six million, one of the largest per capita producers of asylum seekers in the world. Many are national service conscripts fleeing a programme initially set up for 18 months but extended indefinitely after the conflict with Ethiopia and now requiring up to 20 years at bare subsistence wages for a generation of soldiers, teachers, labourers and low-level administrators.

Binyam's national service cohort was the 17th round – each "class" of conscripts is known by its place in the sequence since it was launched in 1994 with a term of 18 months –and it followed a particularly rebellious intake, so its members were kept at Sawa longer than usual, though neither Binyam nor his peers caused any problems.

"It was very tough, but we accepted it," he said. He had expected that, once the training phase was done, he would go to college, get a good education and do well in life. He now knows how naive that was.

In 2004, he was sent to a new technical institute at Mai Nefhi, set up two years earlier when the University of Asmara, the scene of vigorous student protests, was broken up into smaller colleges dispersed around the country during a wide-ranging crackdown on dissent.

Military college

"They turned it into a military college," he said, describing a garrison surrounded by barbed wire that students could not leave without permission from the uniformed soldiers in charge of the campus.

"Mai Nefhi was a joke," he went on.

The teachers, mostly young Indians imported for the task, were unfamiliar with Eritrea and not qualified in the subjects they were teaching; the administrators were disorganised and untrained. He said he had no Eritrean teachers during his two years and learned very little. But he was not prepared for what would come next: teaching mostly illiterate EPLF veterans in a small village outside the town of Mendefera.

Binyam had been studying fine art when school officials told him they couldn't find his records, so he would have to take time off while they searched. This village is where they "parked" him under a ministry of defence programme staffed by national service conscripts.

For the next 10 months, he struggled to do the best he could, teaching two 45-minute classes each day. The classroom time was extremely stressful, he said, because he wasn't sure what he was doing, but the hardest part was the downtime when he had nothing to do: "You lose your mind there."

When he showed up at Mai Nefhi again at the end of 2008, he was told his grades had been lost so he would have to repeat a year, but he convinced his superiors to test him instead. When he passed, he was sent back to Mendefera to teach again, this time under the ministry of education.

"It was kids this time," he said, "but I was still unqualified to teach." No one was qualified, he added.

The national service teachers were paid 700 nakfa a month (roughly $12). Binyam rented a four-by-four-metre room with no furniture and no toilet for 400 nakfa a month. He, like most conscripts, had to rely on money from his parents for basic living costs.

The day he arrived in Mendefera he had to sleep on the street because he hadn't been given proper identification documents and no hotel would take him. Nor did the school have quarters for teachers. The next day, the director placed him in a classroom and walked out without an explanation.

This time he had classes throughout the day attended by 70 fourth- or fifth-graders at a time, most of whom he was unable to control. Other instructors used abuse to get them in line, he said, but that was not his way, so he strove to get the pupils' attention through patient dialogue. (Text ends)

Dysfunctional education system

But the education system was structurally dysfunctional, according to Binyam. He said everyone under 18 was required to attend school, giving the country a high statistical enrolment figure that belied the fact that little actual education took place. The curricula were inappropriate, teaching was done by rote and the faculty and staff were poorly motivated and untrained – and were nearly all national service draftees. The result was chaos.

Many teachers failed to show up for classes once the semester was under way, but there was no attempt to reel them in or punish them because this would likely result in the teacher's flight or arrest, leaving a classroom permanently empty. The upshot was untended classes in which the children went wild.

Binyam said that 12 of his pupils left for Ethiopia during this time. When one was caught, released and sent back, Binyam asked why he had fled. "If I stay here, I'm just going to turn out like you," the youngster told him. "That was a blow to the face," said Binyam.

After a while, the stress got to him. When he began to have fainting spells, he sought help. "It was a total breakdown," he said.

Things got worse when food rations ran short and teachers turned up at school hungry. Finally, he said, he told the authorities he could no longer teach and started staying at home. When others joined him, he was accused of fomenting an uprising and threatened with prison.

"I told them to take me to prison," he said. "They have food there. Here I am a slave."

But the next day the school director, demoralised but determined to fulfil his nearly impossible mission, came with cooking fuel and food of his own so they could eat. From that day onward, said Binyam, it felt like "we started working for him, not the government".

Nevertheless, by 2013, still under heavy stress and seeing no way out, Binyam went to Asmara to secure a sick leave pass. In the end he got one, but only after bribing a health worker with 2?000 nakfa. They, too, were conscripts earning between 700 and 1 000 nakfa per month.

He was released from national service that May, but it took him another 10 months to pay the bribes for an exit visa – 200 000 nakfa. Once he had it, he bought the first ticket to Nairobi and left Eritrea. “I was afraid to wait,” he said.

Today, Binyam is a first-year student at a Nairobi university studying computer technology and neuropsychology. “Its a new start,” he said with a shrug. He said he would go back to Eritrea, as his mother had done more than 20 years ago, but only if the government changed. *Not his real name Dan Connell, a visiting scholar at Boston University’s African Studies Centre, has covered events in Eritrea for more than 35 years. Visit his website danconnell.net

Inside the secretive state of Eritrea:

By Yalda Hakim of the BBC News, Asmara (March 15, 2015)

Eritrea is considered one of the most repressive and secretive states on earth. The UN says forced labour and detention without trial are common.

There have been no elections in the country since independence in 1993 and President Isaias Afewerki has been in power for almost 22 years.

Political opponents and journalists have been imprisoned for voicing dissent.

BBC News hasn’t been allowed to film in the country for around a decade. But now, my team and I have been allowed in to look at improvements in Eritrea’s healthcare.

It may be one of the poorest countries on earth but the nation of roughly six million people is on track to meet three of its Millennium Development Goals - targets set by the United Nations in 2000 to tackle poverty.

Healthcare turnaround
Under-five mortality has dropped by two-thirds, deaths in childbirth have decreased to a quarter of what they were 30 years ago and levels of HIV/Aids and malaria have plummeted.

Getting into Eritrea wasn’t easy. It took months of negotiation with the central government. After a 10-hour flight, via Turkey and Saudi Arabia, we arrived in the capital, Asmara at 04:00 bleary-eyed.

A government official was there to meet us and cheerfully told us to be ready in four hours because they had prepared a busy schedule for us.

It is difficult to ignore the beauty of Eritrea’s capital city, with its leafy boulevards and Modernist buildings, a reminder of its Italian colonial past. But beneath the elegance, lies something more sinister.

Eritrea is still recovering from 30 years of war with its far larger southern neighbour, Ethiopia. The fighting ended in 1991 and it became an independent nation two years later.

But that peace didn't last and, after another war, the two countries are in a state of "no war, no peace". There is a strong sense that the struggle needs to continue and all Eritreans need to do what it takes not only to protect their country but also to rebuild it.

Accompanying us on our journey was a government minder. He was with us everywhere we went, listening and taking notes during all our interviews. About a half-hour drive outside the capital is the Embaderho health clinic.

Social workers from here go into villages and people's homes to train and advise pregnant women and new mothers on what's best for them and their babies' health.

Our minder watched over us as one health worker told me: "Mothers were dying from unsafe delivery helped by local neighbours but now mothers are giving birth in hospitals.

"Because of the raised awareness, children have started to receive vaccinations on time and that is saving them from dying of chickenpox and other diseases. Really, we have seen a big change."

'Value for money'

They told me that this investment, at grassroots level, is one of the reasons they are succeeding in reducing maternal and infant mortality.

We were taken to clinic after clinic to hear about the success stories and were shown the best of the country's healthcare.

Yemane Ghebreab, friend and political adviser to the president, says it is all about priorities, telling me that "as a small country with limited resources, we can only thrive and compete if we can build our human resources".

Though the UN has criticised Eritrea's human rights record, it has commended its health achievements.

Christine Umutoni, the Eritrean representative for the UN Development Programme, says the lack of corruption around healthcare has helped the country reach its development targets. "We've seen value for money and accountability. You know, you invest a little and you get a lot," she says.

We were taken to hospitals where we were introduced to women needing surgery who, we were told, were allowed to stay for as long as they needed - weeks or even months - at no cost.

But the question always on our minds was: If things are so good, why does the UN estimate up to 4,000 people leave Eritrea every month?

Eritreans are the second-largest nationality seeking asylum in Europe after Syrians, many risking their lives to cross the Mediterranean Sea in rickety boats supplied by people-traffickers.

Locked in shipping container

In the UK, I met one man who had fled. He did not want to be identified, fearing for the safety of his family who still live in Eritrea. He says he escaped after being imprisoned for two years without charge or trial. First he was held underground in total darkness, then kept in a shipping container with a dozen other men.

He told me that he was imprisoned for appearing to question indefinite national service. When he began to do national service at 18, he thought it would be for 18 months, instead it lasted 10 years.

National service is compulsory for those aged 18. The UN has described indefinite conscription for little or no pay as forced labour. They say it is one of the main reasons many flee the country.

Mr Yemane, who is also the head of political affairs at the country's ruling - and only - political party, didn't deny that some people are made to work, without pay, for an extended period.

However, he said it was because of the on-going dispute with Ethiopia. "To defend ourselves, we have to depend on our people. That means young people have been compelled to be in national service for longer periods of time and its difficult for them." Mr Yemane told us the government wants to end indefinite service, but he seemed less sure about giving his people democracy.

When asked when the country might have elections, he replied: "When the time comes we will do it, but this fixation on elections is wrong and I think its creating problems for Africa."

It seems clear the government isn't about to loosen its grip. It is state control which has forced through improvements in healthcare.

But every night, as the centre of Asmara came alive with young and old spending time in the many bars and cafes, I was aware that at that moment dozens, maybe hundreds, of others were risking their lives to leave the country. (Text ends)

Canadian mine targeted in Eritrea: African media reports' (MINING.com Editor March 22, 2015) Media reports from East Africa on Saturday claimed that a gold mine partly owned by Canadian company Nevsun Resources (NYSE:NSU, TSX:NSU) was hit by Ethiopian fighter jets.

At least two media outlets confirmed the report, including Tigrai Online, an Ethiopian daily news site which stated that the Bisha mine, located 150 kilometres from Asmara, Eritrea, was a target of two bombing raids conducted on Friday. The other target was the military depot at Mai Edaga Tikul.

An attempt to contact Nevsun at their Vancouver office on Sunday, seeking the veracity of the media reports, was unsuccessful.

However in an operational update on Sunday, the company stated that "While there was an act of vandalism at the Bisha plant late last week, there was no significant impact to operations and no personnel were harmed.”:

The Bisha Mine experienced an act of vandalism on March 20 during the nightshift in which minor damages were sustained to the base of the tailings thickener, resulting in the release of water into the plant area. The required repairs and cleanup from the incident were minor and are incorporated into the plant re-start later this week. Additional safeguards have been adopted to ensure site and personnel safety and security while the Eritrean and mine security forces undertake an investigation.

Eritrea is widely considered to be a state sponsor of terrorism, including planned attacks on its neighbours. The tiny Red Sea State won independence from Ethiopia in 1993. In 2012 the U.S. Treasury Department placed sanctions on several Eritrean government officials and froze their assets for supporting al-Shabaab, Al-Qaeda’s branch in Somalia. The Bisha mine is 60-percent owned by Nevsun and 40 percent by the government of Eritrea. (Text ends)

Italy: those seeking asylum are seeking help from you’
Rome, April 24, 2015 – The number of asylum applications in Italy increased by 143 percent in 2014, reaching a new record of 64,886, according to the Jesuit Refugee Service (JRS) Italy annual report. While great strides have been made to accommodate refugees and asylum seekers, more needs to be done by the Italian and European authorities to welcome and integrate the newcomers. During the presentation of the report in Rome yesterday, JRS called for a cultural shift in Europe towards hospitality and solidarity.

In light of the capsizing of two boats crossing the Mediterranean last week killing 700 people, the theme of hospitality remains an urgent issue. Camillo Ripamonti SJ, director of JRS Italy, known locally as Centro Astalli, made an emotional plea to the EU to take concrete measures to save the many innocent lives attempting to reach safety in Europe. This plea comes at an appropriate time, as Council of Ministers in Europe met in Brussels yesterday to discuss a plan regarding the tragically common theme of massacre at sea.

The issue is not an Italian one, but a European one, Fr Camillo added. Although 170,757 arrived to Italy by sea last year, many of the 34,000 refugees passing through the Centro Astalli health clinics, reception centres, soup kitchens and other programmes were ‘in transit’, staying in Italy only a few weeks in temporary shelters before moving on to northern Europe.

Growing numbers
In response to the record number of arrivals last year, the state expanded the capacity of the reception (SPRAR) system to 20,000 places, and capacity is expected to reach 40,000 by the end of 2015.

Integration, however, remains the unanswered problem. Although job training, foreseen under the SPRAR system and offered at Centro Astalli and other centres, makes a difference in the lives of individual refugees, nothing has been done to change the system as a whole. Most refugees, even those who are employed, rely on informal housing.

A change in attitude

Europe must change its attitude of fear of the other, said Centro Astalli Programme Director, Berardino Guarino.

“Difficult situations internationally, constant warnings in the media, economic crises and worsening social tensions risk feeding prejudices, superficial judgments and unjustified weariness about forced migration, leading to very real discrimination against foreigners, Muslims in particular”.

“We should not be concerned with our fear, but theirs; the fear of entering a place that will provide them no protection,” said Enzo Bianchi, founder and Prior of the Bose Monastic Community.

Centro Astalli works to promote greater awareness and a deeper understanding among Italians and migrants. For example, in 2014 more than 24,000 students across Italy were involved in educational projects regarding asylum rights and interreligious dialogue.

Furthermore, in May last year, more than 100 people participated in a training course, Impossible protection – access to asylum rights in Europe, a three-lesson course about European asylum policies and the need to create humanitarian channels to allow those fleeing war and persecution to arrive safely in Europe.

Everyone’s obligation

Refugees, especially families and victims of torture, violence or international abuse, are those at risk of falling through the cracks in Italy, said Mr Guarino. “Even after they leave reception centres, insecurity remains a constant threat”.

Following the visit to JRS Italy in September 2013 by Pope Francis, in which he called on Catholics and all people of good will to “to live with generosity and courage”, Centro Astalli was happy to report that 15 religious orders in Rome opened up their empty convents to accommodate and accompany refugees in ‘hospitable communities’.

Last year, Centro Astalli participated in a national campaign ‘Those seeking asylum are seeking it from you’, urging Europeans to fulfil their personal obligations to transform society through concrete gestures, and thanked those 446 people who volunteered at its centres last year. JRS urged more individuals, states and the EU to follow this example and welcome refugees into Europe.

The conference opened with introductory words by Marino Sinibaldi, president of the Teatro di Roma, which graciously hosted the event, and was moderated by the national journalist, Paolo Fallai. Jacquelyn Pavilon, Jesuit Refugee Service International Communications Assistant

Heightened Refugee Flow Signals Quiet Catastrophe in Eritrea By

Frida Ghitis (May 4, 2015)

Throughout history, one way the world has learned about severe political and humanitarian crises in remote locations is from unexpectedly large flows of refugees. When massive numbers of people decide to take enormous risks to escape the country of their birth, leaving their possessions and their loved ones behind, it is a sign of crisis—and often a portent of worse things to come.

That's why the recent tragedies in the Mediterranean Sea, where thousands of would-be refugees have drowned seeking to reach Europe's shores, are calling urgent attention to a seldom-mentioned crisis: the quiet catastrophe in Eritrea.

The most shocking moment came on April 18, when a boat cramped with 1,000 desperate people left the lawless coast of Libya. About 900 of them drowned when the ship capsized. It was no surprise that many of those on board came from Syria, where a civil war provides more than enough reason to flee. But a large number of the dead came from Eritrea, a small country in East Africa that is neither at war nor suffering from a natural disaster.

In fact, people are fleeing Eritrea, with a population of just 6 million, at a greater rate than almost any other country. In 2014, more Eritreans sought refuge in Europe than people from any other state besides Syria, and the numbers are growing. U.N. figures showed the number of Eritrean asylum-seekers tripled last year from 2013. And so far this year, there is no sign that the tragic death toll in Mediterranean waters is persuading Eritreans that they should stay home.

Eritrea is an example of a once-promising story that turned disastrous. And its people, by their decision to flee, are giving an urgent warning to an international community whose ability to respond to crises is already overloaded.

As in several other African nations, what started as a successful war of independence—in Eritrea's case from neighboring Ethiopia in 1993—degenerated into a one-man dictatorship whose increasingly oppressive ways are pushing the population to seek an escape.

The hero of the 30-year guerrilla war with Ethiopia, Isaias Afwerki, took power after independence and was chosen as president by the national assembly following the country's last election in 1993. Since then, he has consolidated power and suppressed any form of opposition.

Affewerki is hardly the only man leading a one-party government in an impoverished country. That alone would not be sufficient to explain why Eritreans are risking their lives at such high rates to flee.

Eritrea's level of repression is uniquely extreme.

Incredibly, Eritrea has been singled out as a “success story” by the U.N. Development Program for its supposed progress in reaching development goals, such as reducing maternal and infant mortality rates. Whether or not the statistics to back those claims are true, it is a travesty to call Afwerki’s fiefdom a success.

A report released this week by the Committee to Protect Journalists names Eritrea as the most censored country in the world, ranking above second-place North Korea. And there is much else that is wrong with the country, although, in fairness, many of the problems involving poverty and lack of political rights are not unique to Eritrea.

But there is one aspect of the Afwerki dictatorship that explains Eritreans urge to flee better than any other: its universal conscription practice.

It all started with an innocent-sounding plan to have all citizens serve the country. The “National Service” law enacted in 1995 required all Eritreans, men and women, to spend 18 months doing military service and development tasks. The 18-month term gradually started stretching until, in 2002, the period of service was officially made indefinite. In essence, the National Service has become an institutionalized system of almost perpetual servitude to the government.

While the recent surge of refugees is the result of worsening conditions at home and the new availability of passage to Europe resulting from the chaos in North Africa, it is the system of mandatory, universal, potentially lifelong conscription that explains why so many Eritreans want to leave.

Conscripts are generally members of the army, and the government justifies the forced conscription as a security measure for a country that could face war again. But the “soldiers” work in all manner of activities, including infrastructure construction, mining, and farming and, in the case of women, domestic service for government officials.

Recruits are brutally mistreated. The U.N. rapporteur has described “punishment amounting to torture, inhuman or degrading treatment, as well as detention in inhumane conditions,” saying those practices are not unusual but rather “appear to be the norm, even for trivial cases.” For women, sexual violence is routine, and those who resist face even worse punishment. According to U.N. investigators, “many conscripts serve in the military for most of their lives for a paltry salary,” and those who try to escape as deserters face horrific punishment.

Meanwhile, detainees, whether for desertion or other, often minimal infractions, face grim justice. Arrested and tried without due process, they are held, according to the U.N. report, “in underground prisons or in metal shipping containers, in extreme weather conditions.” They are subjected to torture in a system where human rights groups say there is a complete “absence of any semblance of rule of law.”

For those who manage to see an end to their military service, there are few prospects for a better life. The military dominates the economy, and the private sector barely exists.

Eritrea has largely escaped the headlines and the international community's wrath. International organizations have not completely ignored Eritrea's abuses. The U.N. Security Council has enacted two separate sanctions resolutions, and the U.N. human rights body appointed a dedicated rapporteur. But the country has ranked low on the list of priorities for diplomats and human rights activists.

Eritrea brought attention to itself with reports that it provided support to Somalia's al-Shabab militias, something the regime denies. But the swelling numbers of refugees are forcing the international community, and Europe in particular, to pay more attention to what is happening within the country's borders.

The destitute, desperate would-be refugees are pushing the deeds of a ruthless and dangerous dictator higher on the list of global concerns. Europe, in particular, will find it increasingly difficult to ignore the plight of the Eritrean people and the ruthlessness of a government willing to go to such extremes to hold on to power. Frida Ghitis is an independent commentator on world affairs and a World Politics Review contributing editor. Her weekly WPR column, World Citizen, appears every Thursday. Follow her on Twitter at @fridaghitis.

A Saudi war fought with Eritrean troops?
By Mohammad Abu Fares (May 8, 2015)

Analysis: Saudi Arabia has been cosying up to Eritrea, leading to reports the African nation will join Senegal in offering troops for the war in Yemen, says Mohammad Abu Fares.

Eritrea could be the second non-Arab African nation to contribute troops to the Saudi-led alliance against Houthi rebels in Yemen. Eritrea's president Isaias Afwerki visited Riyadh last week to meet King Salman and other leading Saudi officials. This has led many to believe that Eritrea could follow Senegal's lead - the West African nation announced earlier this week that it would send 2,100 soldiers to join the Saudi alliance.

Sources in Asmara revealed to al-Araby al-Jadeed that talks between Eritrean and Saudi officials has brought them to a common understandings on a number of strategic and security related issues. Sources expect an announcement on military cooperation between the two states, which would allow the alliance to use Eritrean airspace and seas. It is also being said that Saudi is hoping to capitalise on the capabilities of the Eritrean armed forces.

Strategically important
Eritrea occupies an important geographically location on the Horn of Africa. It lies just over the water from Yemen, looking over one of the most strategically important sea corridors in the world - where the Red Sea leads to the Suez Canal. Eritrea would be an obvious launchpad for amphibious attacks if Saudi Arabia wanted to being a ground war. Saudi Arabia has built good relations with three other Red Sea states share maritime borders with Yemen - Djibouti, Somalia and Ethiopia. Eritrea was the fourth piece in the jigsaw and has hosted foreign troops before. Israel and Iran have military bases in Eritrea, but as the tide turns against the Tehran-backed Houthi militias in Yemen, Asmara appears to be cutting ties with these countries. "Afwerki's controversial relations have continued to be a source of angst for Saudi Arabia, which is just a strip of sea away from Eritrea," said one Arab diplomat who wanted to remain anonymous. Eritrea was said to be, secretly at least, on the side of ally Iran and the Houthis. "Saudi Arabia worries when Eritrean-Israeli relations progressed, which led to... the presence of Israeli bases in Dahlak and other Eritrean islands just off the Saudi coast. Relations between the two countries hit their lowest level." Eritrea was said to be, secretly at least, on the side of ally Iran and the Houthis during the Saudi-led assault on Yemen.

However, observers believe that Afwerki's visit to Riyadh has turned the tables and that Eritrea might be sending signals to the US that it is eager to be friends. Influential groups in Eritrea have been suspected of supporting Somalia's al-Qaeda-linked al-Shabaab. Some African diplomats were not surprised by the turnaround. Gulf nations were said to have been heavily involved in negotiations with African countries allied to Asmara in the build up to the visit. Qatar has been effective in leading talks between Eritrea and some of its hostile neighbours.

The diplomats believe that the talks with Saudi Arabia is an attempt by Asmara to break its international isolation. This has been enforced through UN resolution 1907, which imposed sanctions on Eritrea over its role in Somalia and refusal to pull its troops out of Djibouti. With 200,000 soldiers and 12,000 naval personnel, and commanders experienced from Eritrea's war with Ethiopia, the country could provide the backbone of a coalition invasion force. The fact that they are ruled by an absolute dictator and dissent in the country has been crushed, then Eritrea would not be faced with a repeat of the Pakistani parliament's refusal to engage in Saudi's war in Yemen. Source: Alaraby

Saudi Arabia beheaded an Eritrean and 4 others foreigners – Newsweek

By amharicdrama on May 10, 2015

Saudi Arabia on Monday beheaded five foreigners for murder and robbery, an unusually high number that adds to what Amnesty International has called a "macabre spike" in the kingdom's executions.

Two Yemenis, a Chadian, an Eritrean and a Sudanese were put to death in the Red Sea city of Jeddah, the interior ministry said in a statement carried by the Saudi Press Agency. It identified them as Yemenis Khaled Fetini and Ibrahim Nasser, Hassan Omar from Chad, Eritrean Salem Idriss and Abdel Wahhab Abdel Maeen from Sudan.

They were all convicted of killing an Indian guard at a business and stealing money from the safe. Their beheadings bring to 78 the number of locals and foreigners executed in Saudi Arabia this year, compared with 87 for all of last year, according to AFP tallies. Normally one or two people are executed at a time.

London-based Amnesty ranked Saudi Arabia among the world's top three executioners of 2014. Drug trafficking, rape, murder, apostasy and armed robbery are all punishable by death under the Gulf nation's version of sharia law. The interior ministry has cited deterrence as a reason for carrying out the punishment. Source: http://newsweekpakistan.com/five-foreig … di-arabia/

Eritrean diplomat seeks asylum in Ethiopia
By Aaron Maasho (May 14, 2015)

ADDIS ABABA (Reuters) - An Eritrean diplomat from the Red Sea state's mission to the African Union is seeking asylum in Ethiopia, state-run media said, citing rights abuses at home.

Mohammed Idris, a member of the ruling People's Front for Democracy and Justice (PFDJ), had served with Eritrea's diplomatic mission in Addis Ababa for the past five years, the Ethiopian Broadcasting Corporation (EBC) said in a report.

"A people that for a long time fought for justice and freedom are now being subjected to injustice," Mohammed told the outlet on Tuesday. "This forced me to take this decision."

Rights groups and critics accuse Eritrea of rights abuses, including imposing indefinite military service with poor pay. Many of those fleeing the country, which won independence from Ethiopia in April 1993 in-dejure after a 30-year war, say they are escaping conscription.

Eritrean officials could not immediately be reached to comment on the case of Idris. But the government in Asmara routinely denies charges of rights abuses and has in the past blamed lengthy military service on an unresolved border dispute with Ethiopia.

In February, an interim report of a U.N. inquiry said Eritrea was ignoring human rights laws and exerting pervasive state control and ruthless repression on its population.

Humanitarian groups say Eritreans make up the second-largest group of migrants to reach Italy by boat after Syrians, often braving the perilous crossing of the Mediterranean on rickety, overcrowded boats that claimed around 3,000 lives last year.

The war between Ethiopia and Eritrea from 1998 to 2000 killed more than 70,000, analysts say. Eritrea wants Ethiopia to pull its troops out from disputed territory before normalizing ties, citing a decision by a Hague-based boundary commission which awarded the village of Badme to Eritrea in 2002. Ethiopia says the row over border demarcation can only be resolved through a negotiated settlement. (Editing by Edith Honan and Edmund Blair)

Eritrea's president slams US 'subterfuges'

AFP (June 5, 2015) Addis Ababa (AFP) - Eritrea's president lashed out at foreign powers, including the US, during recent independence day celebrations, according to a transcript released Thursday by the country's mission to the African Union. The speech, delivered in the capital Asmara on May 24, criticised the "vain subterfuges" and "relentless provocations" of foreign powers seeking to undermine Eritrea as it celebrated the 24th anniversary of its independence and of President Isaias Afwerki's iron-fisted rule.

"Certain powers prompted by greed and domination and spearheaded by the United States continue to harass us and derail our efforts of nation-building in a serene and stable environment," Afwerki told a stadium full of people. He went on to blame the US for decades of conflicts in a host of countries including Egypt, Libya and Yemen, for "instigating tensions in the Nile Basin for hidden agendas" and for "incubating and deploying terrorist organisations with different labels to add chaos and destruction to chaos and destruction".

Afwerki concluded his speech with a rousing call of, "Glory to our Martyrs who made independence a reality! Victory to the Masses!" The isolationist Red Sea dictatorship languishes at the bottom of world freedom indices and is one of the largest contributors to the exodus of migrants crossing the Mediterranean Sea to Europe. It is a crisis Eritrea has in the past blamed on a CIA conspiracy and human rights activists.

Tens of thousands of young Eritreans brave razor wire, minefields and armed border guards to sneak out of the country every year in order to escape repression and avoid conscripted military service that goes on for years. Eritrea broke away from Ethiopia in May 1991 after a brutal 30-year independence struggle and has since maintained a war footing, wary of the enemies it sees on all sides. (Text ends)

Why Isaias? Why? Eritrea human rights abuses may be crimes against humanity -UN
By Sam James, Guardian (June 8, 2015)

UN report accuses government of extrajudicial executions, torture, national service and forced labor that create a climate of repression driving many to flee

The Eritrean government's systematic use of extrajudicial killing, torture, rape, indefinite national service and forced labor may amount to crimes against humanity, according to an excoriating UN report.

The 500-page investigation by the UN commission of inquiry on human rights in Eritrea catalogues a litany of human rights violations by the “totalitarian” regime of President Isaias Afwerki “on a scope and scale seldom witnessed elsewhere”.

It also accuses the government of using a program of imprisonment, forced disappearance, surveillance and censorship to create a culture of permanent fear and crush all dissent.

The year-long study, which was carried out without the co-operation of the Eritrean government, is based on first-hand testimony gathered through 550 confidential interviews with witnesses in third countries and 160 written submissions.

Escaping Eritrea: 'If I die at sea, it's not a problem – at least I won't be tortured'

The report finds gross human rights violations are widespread throughout the state apparatus, and identifies the main perpetrators as Afwerki, his office, the ruling and only party – the People's Front for Democracy and Justice (PFDJ) – the Eritrean defence forces, the national security office, the police, and the ministries of defence, justice and information.

It says that while the struggle for Eritrean independence from Ethiopia has gone down in history as a "major feat of a people's fight for self-determination", the fight has long since lapsed into relentless political self-interest and terror.

The report says: "The commission finds that the current situation of human rights in Eritrea is the tragic product of an initial desire to protect and ensure the survival of the young state that very quickly degenerated into the use of totalitarian practices aimed at perpetuating the power of the Eritrean People's Liberation Front and its successor, the People's Front for Democracy and Justice."

The report says: "The commission finds that the current situation of human rights in Eritrea is the tragic product of an initial desire to protect and ensure the survival of the young state that very quickly degenerated into the use of totalitarian practices aimed at perpetuating the power of the Eritrean People's Liberation Front and its successor, the People's Front for Democracy and Justice."

The report says that state spying and surveillance are conducted to such a degree in the country that Eritreans live in constant fear of arbitrary arrest, detention, torture, disappearance or death. That culture has given rise to a poisonous climate of self-censorship and mistrust that permeates communities and families.

"Information gathered through the pervasive control system is used in absolute arbitrariness to keep the population in a state of permanent anxiety," it says. "It is not law that rules Eritreans – it is fear."

One witness told the commission: "When I am in Eritrea, I feel that I cannot even think because I am afraid that people can read my thoughts and I am scared.” When I am in Eritrea, I feel I cannot even think because I am afraid that people can read my thoughts

Witness to the commission

The report also notes the lengths to which the state will go to stop people fleeing.

“Eritreans who attempt to leave the country are seen as traitors,” it says. “For a considerable period of time, the government has implemented a shoot-to-kill policy in border areas to prevent people from fleeing.”

Equally feared is the government’s policy of conscription, which can leave young people trapped in indefinite national service. Some interviewees told the commission they had decided to flee the country after spending 17 years as conscripts.

Conditions in military training camps – which lack adequate food, water, hygiene facilities, accommodation and medical facilities – are further compounded by abuse and ill-treatment of both men and women.

“Sexual violence against women and girls is widespread and indeed notorious in military training camps,” says the report. “Furthermore, the enforced domestic service of women and girls who are also sexually abused in these camps amounts to sexual slavery. The commission considers that these violations of the rights of women and girls also amount to torture.”

It accuses Eritrean officials of using beatings and rapes as a way to inflict severe physical and psychological pain, adding: “The purpose of these acts is to extract confessions and information, and to punish, intimidate and coerce detainees and conscripts.”

In addition to draconian limits on freedom of speech, media, movement and assembly, says the report, only four religious denominations – the Eritrean Orthodox church, the Catholic church, the Lutheran church and Sunni Islam – are tolerated. All other religious communities are restricted or attacked by the government.

Its publication comes as the international community struggles to find a way to deal with the growing number of Eritreans who are fleeing their homeland and crossing the Mediterranean in search of a better life.

Last November, the UN High Commissioner for Refugees (UNHCR) reported that the number of Eritreans seeking asylum in Europe had nearly tripled over the first 10 months of the year, rising from 13,000 over the same period in 2013 to nearly 37,000 in 2014.

It found that after Syrians, Eritreans were the most common nationality to arrive on European shores, comprising 22% of all people entering Italy by boat last year. The report expresses little surprise at the exodus.

“Faced with a seemingly hopeless situation they feel powerless to change, hundreds of thousands of Eritreans are fleeing their country,” it says. “In desperation, they resort to deadly escape routes through deserts and neighbouring war-torn countries and across dangerous seas in search of safety. They risk capture, torture and death at the hands of ruthless human traffickers.”

It adds: “To ascribe their decision to leave solely to economic reasons is to ignore the dire situation of human rights in Eritrea and the very real suffering of its people. Eritreans are fleeing severe human rights violations in their country and are in need of international protection.”

As well as making dozens of recommendations on how Eritrea can address its human rights violations, the report makes a blunt appeal to Afwerki for engagement with the international community and proper political and social reform.

“I sincerely regret that in spite of repeated calls for access and for information related to the human rights situation, your government decided not to engage with us and not to provide any cooperation,” writes Mike Smith, the chair of the commission of inquiry.

“We are still ready to engage with you and your government, should you wish to invite us to visit Eritrea and discuss the outcome of our investigation with you and your collaborators.”

After collecting evidence from more than 700 testimonies, says Smith, the commission has concluded that “systematic, widespread and gross human rights violations have been and are being committed in Eritrea under the authority of your government”.

He adds: “The commission also finds that the violations in the areas of extrajudicial executions, torture (including sexual torture), national service and forced labour may constitute crimes against humanity. The commission emphasises that its present findings should not be interpreted as a conclusion that international crimes have not occurred in other areas.”

On Sunday, the British Prime Minister, David Cameron, said more needed to be done to stop people leaving their homelands and crossing the Mediterranean, adding that the UK could use its aid budget to try to stem the flow.

Speaking as he arrived at the G7 summit in Germany and as a British warship picked up at least 500 migrants found in four boats off the coast of Libya, Cameron described Britain as a country with a conscience. “Britain is a country that doesn’t walk on by,” he said.

“But we also need to do more to stop these people leaving their countries in the first place. That’s what we are using our aid budget for, that’s why we will be talking here at the G7 about how we try and put a Libyan government together. “We need to deal with the causes of this migration, not simply with its consequences,” he said. (Text ends)

Eritrea president slams US ‘subterfuges’

AFP updates (June 5, 2015) ADDIS ABABA - Eritrea’s president lashed out at foreign powers, including the US, during recent independence day celebrations, according to a transcript released Thursday by the country’s mission to the African Union.

The speech, delivered in the capital Asmara on May 24, criticised the “vain subterfuges” and “relentless provocations” of foreign powers seeking to undermine Eritrea as it celebrated the 24th anniversary of its independence and of President Isaias Afwerki’s iron-fisted rule.

“Certain powers prompted by greed and domination and spearheaded by the United States continue to harass us and derail our efforts of nation-building in a serene and stable environment,” Afwerki told a stadium full of people.

He went on to blame the US for decades of conflicts in a host of countries including Egypt, Libya and Yemen, for “instigating tensions in the Nile Basin for hidden agendas” and for “incubating and deploying terrorist organisations with different labels to add chaos and destruction to chaos and destruction”. Afwerki concluded his speech with a rousing call of, “Glory to our Martyrs who made independence a reality! Victory to the Masses!”

North Korea—another secretive, militarised and autocratic country to which Eritrea is commonly compared—was listed among the countries that offered anniversary congratulations, alongside the Vatican and others. The isolationist Red Sea dictatorship languishes at the bottom of world freedom indices and is one of the largest contributors to the exodus of migrants crossing the Mediterranean Sea to Europe.

It is a crisis Eritrea has in the past blamed on a CIA conspiracy and human rights activists.

Tens of thousands of young Eritreans brave razor wire, minefields and armed border guards to sneak out of the country every year in order to escape repression and avoid conscripted military service that goes on for years. Eritrea broke away from Ethiopia in 1991 after a brutal 30-year independence struggle and has since maintained a war footing, wary of the enemies it sees on all sides. (Text ends)

Eritrea calls U.N. human rights findings “indecent hyperbole”

By Reuters June 10, 2015 NAIROBI (Reuters)

NAIROBI (Reuters) - Eritrea on Tuesday dismissed what it called “indecent hyperbole” in a U.N. human rights report that described alleged extrajudicial killings, torture and sexual slavery in the secretive Horn of Africa state.

Suggestions the Asmara government had committed gross human rights violations against its own people was “totally unfounded and without merit,” the foreign ministry said in a statement.

“Clearly, the resort to extreme charges and indecent hyperbole, including cynical and unwarranted reference to ‘possible crimes against humanity,’ is intended to forestall a sober reflection on the realities in Eritrea,” it said.

The statement did not address the specific allegations made in Monday’s U.N. Human Rights Commission report, which followed a year-long investigation. The report concluded that slavery-like practices are routine in Eritrea and torture is so widespread that it was likely the government's policy was to encourage its use. It further said Eritrea effectively enslaves people by a system known as "national service" that involves "arbitrary detention, torture, sexual torture, forced labour, absence of leave."

National service is supposed to last 18 months, but the U.N. commission said it interviewed one Eritrean who had fled after 17 years in effective detention. Witnesses reported people being executed for trying to avoid being drafted into service as recently as 2013, according to the report.

The commission said it had asked Eritrea for access and information, but "received no response".

