tragic love story has ended up diminishing the importance and validity ofthe others. However, given the timing and originality of the other works,they should have had more attention, like for instance the book on ‘education’, on ‘why is Ethiopia not liberated from dire poverty’, or ‘whatkind of government does Ethiopia need?’

In these works, a number of visionary proposals have been made, whilegoing deep in the analysis of the facts on the ground, supported by the author’s rich experience and exposure to other cultures/systems. His exposure to education sector, his high position in government and his posting as diplomatic envoy had enriched his intellect, creating the occasions to ponder at length.

Describing his life and thoughts, career and achievements, the academicswho participated at the celebrations of the author's posthumous birthday,paid tribute to the modest personality Haddis was endowed with. They said throughout his long life, Haddis Alemayehu had lived a very active and productive life. Born in the former Governorate-General of Gojjam, (today the Amhara National Regional State) in a small village called Endodam Kidane Mihret in 1909, the young Haddis was brought up in a relatively well off family, blessed with all the attention a child of his age would need, including the exceptional attention of a grandfather, (as his father was away in the far south on a mission). He was conferred with high level traditional education, (in Ge'ez, the origin of Amharic language,and clerical education, Kenie (ቅኔ), poetry, ዝማሬ (hymns), etc) that was tobe the background and launching pad to an outstanding literary personality. Until his early adolescence, he learned everything that was available at that level in that area, and growing bigger, his educational ambition grew correspondingly, eventually leading him to Addis. Here, hewas fortunate enough to attend a Swedish Mission and then the illustriousTafari Makonnen School.
In these two modern institutions, much of his early mind was shaped. Hispassion for literature was evident. In fact, it was here that he wrote his first play where the Emperor himself, along with his entire entourage came to watch, showering him with admiration. He later served as a teacher, and when the Fascist invasion of Ethiopia disrupted every beginning of the positive activities in the country, Haddis' educational life and career likewise had to suffer an abrupt halt. Like many of his friends and colleagues, he as well had to join the then Resistance Movement, symbol of Ethiopians' fight for independence and sovereignty. Everyone had to combat against the Fascist occupation of Ethiopia by Mussolini's troops. It was in this struggle that the young Haddis was subjected to cruel deportation into an island in southern Italy, along with two of his peers, Ras Imiru Haile Selassie and Lij Yilma Deressa, both of whom were close relatives of the Emperor, and destined to be protagonists in the post-occupation Ethiopian political scenario.

When the Fascist forces were finally driven out of Ethiopia, after five years, Haddis was still in prison in Panza and Lipari islands, in Italy, and itwas with the efforts of the Emperor that he and his two friends were freedbefore joining the new Ethiopian establishment. Soon, Haddis was to be recruited in the Ministry of Information and later on in the Foreign Ministry, serving at progressively higher and higher positions. In the diplomatic world, Haddis is recalled for his remarkable contributions, including the bringing about the seat of the Economic Commission for Africa to Addis, (despite the resistance of several hierarchies of the Ethiopian government who hated the closeness of foreigners in their land).He also served as Ethiopian ambassador in the US and Britain, served as Consul and First Secretary in Israel

(where he met and married his spouse, W/ro Kibebe-Tsehai Belay), and Washington DC, as a long time Ethiopian envoy and representative (where he conceived ‘ፍቅር እስከ መቃብር).
Back in Ethiopia, among others, he served as Governor of his original home region, Gojjam, and Minister of Posts, and State Minister of ForeignAffairs in Aklilu Habte Wolde’s cabinet, before retiring as Senator.

During his decades long services, Haddis was always praised for his humbleness, integrity and sincerity, posing as an epitome for others. Overall, his modesty and far sight were unsurpassed. And he always longed for better administration, for changes that could bring Ethiopia intothe modern era. But he did not opt for the total uprooting of the Ethiopiantraditional culture, because he envisioned a system that could accommodate both, the modern and traditional with a balance of the positive from each. He thought Ethiopians should not be thought only Western culture, but first and foremost theirs, and then proceed to the modern one, to the extent compatible. Ethiopians should not see themselves from the stand point of the West, he argued. That was a mistake. They should rather prospect internal solutions for their problems without negating the advances of science and technology. Education, he wrote in “Education and the Significance of Schools”, should be imparted to children very carefully, especially at the earliest stages, with compatibility of our values by stages: the family, schools, and the societyat large. And in all his works, speeches and interviews, Haddis advocatedopenly innovative thoughts. He was a thinker, first and foremost. He cherished a free and united Ethiopia for eternity. Certainly, his works will remain a valid testimony to his mind, and Ethiopians will always remember him for that. And that is what academics such as Dr. Fekade Azeze of AAU, Dr Yonas Admassu and Ato Asfaw Damte did underline during the memorabilia of Haddis.

The scholars pointed that the kind of attention given to our literary giants leaves a lot to be desired, let alone cherish the hope to value and encourage the smaller talents. We need to recognize and support our authors and writers, valuing our stories, our plays, and our dramas. We need to give them the deserved place in our life, in our society, because they are not creations out of the blue, but a reflection of our society. Theyserve us as a mirror to observe and assess ourselves. As echoes, as reflections, they measure our society, our growth, our development, shortcomings and strengths, level of education, maturity. Hence, they need focus and encouragement, support.

The excessive attention being given to foreign culture, music, films, books, art, paintings etc and our consuming, inhaling of these diminishes,if not denigrate, in the long run, our own values. It finally ends up by creating a sort of vacuum in our identity, engulfing us, overwhelming us. Identifying ourselves totally with alien cultures and mores, kills our own, swamping it. This is obviously something absolutely unacceptable. A people without identity, without culture would not be a people at all, and there can be no corresponding country without people. That is why the words of Professor Haile Gerima, director and producer of films are unforgettable:

"We need to make our own films, we need to narrate our own stories, weneed to value our own culture and identity, without denigrating that of others. Everyone can live glorifying one's identity, but without impacting negatively on others. There could be a spirit of interchangeability of culture, mutual tolerance and understanding, and not imposition of one onothers. And in a society such as ours, where there are a plethora of ethnicities, cultures, languages and creeds, such mutual exchange and acceptance is fundamental for our need to build a common and solid country."

Haile's words are indeed true. Similarly, Haddis was a true Ethiopianist, and advocated for positive, forward looking change. He had lived long enough outside Ethiopia, especially in the advanced world, but was never tempted to barter his fundamental identity for an alien one. He just longedfor the betterment of his land without denying his fundamental local culture and values. That is what can be considered as the legacy of HaddisAlemayehu, a true teacher, a thinker, a patriot, diplomat, administrator and literary giant all in one. Celebrating the works and ideas of Haddis, weneed to look with one eye at the future of our current generation of writers, authors and literary talents, while with the other, work and try to change for the advancement of Ethiopian values, culture and tradition.
Building monuments or just observing yearly anniversaries can not sufficeto contribute to the growth of our home made authors or literature. To add to such efforts and contributions, as has done the late Haddis Alemayehu, to capitalize on them can pave one extra step towards our cherished goal of societal development. (text ends)

What do you know about "Woubit Ethiopia" of the ETC tourismpromotion poster?

Her image was taken sometime in the late seventies by Ethiopia's TourismCommission (ETC) board. Not much is known About the woman subject ofthe photo. Her name is Almaz Amensisa. Hailing from Ethiopia's former Wollega Region, she lived in Addis Ababa with her husband and four Children. Unlike what is widely believed, Almaz is neither a Model nor an actress. Her husband, an employee at the National Tourism Agency managed to convince her to take up a Photo shoot opportunity at a time when the national tourism Commission was collecting images to serve for promotional purposes, according to Cuban Ethiopian historian Eduardo Byrono. But her image became an international sensation. As Her daughter Deborah explained to us, Almaz never asked for compensation for the photo and only wished that the income serve Ethiopia's tourism industry. In 2007, Almaz came to the USA to get treatment for an Undisclosed illness. Sadly, in November of 2008, woubit health had declined and she passed away in the USA. Although every Ethiopian is familiar with the class, elegance and natural beauty she exhibits in thisimage.

HISTORIC ETHIOPIA

Abebe Bikila of Ethiopia runs through streets of Tokyo

October 24, 1964: Abebe Bikila of Ethiopia runs through the streets of Tokyo, on his way to winning the marathon at the 1964 Olympic Games inTokyo. In 1960 in Rome, barely known outside his country, he ran barefoot to become the first black African to win an Olympic title.

Four years later, he wore shoes and won by an even greater margin, justfive weeks after having his appendix removed and losing eleven days training in his final preparation. Sadly he was badly injured in a car crashfive years laterand died prematurely at the age of 41.

In 1972, Bikila was invited to the Munich Olympic Games as a special guest. Sitting in his wheelchair, he watched American Frank Shorter win the marathon. Shorter received his medal, then went to Bikila to shake hishand. According to Raymond Krise and Bill Squires in Fast Tracks: The History of Distance Running, Bikila talked about his automobile accident.
He said, "Men of success meet with tragedy. It was the will of God that I won the Olympics, and it was the will of God that I met with my accident.I accepted those victories as I accept this tragedy. I have to accept both circumstances as facts of life and live happily."

In 1973, Bikila died from a brain hemorrhage. He was 41 years old and left a wife and four children. His career included fifteen marathon races, with twelve victories. After his death, Haile Selassie proclaimed a nationalday of mourning; 65,000 people attended the funeral. Under a bursary scheme provided by the IOC, his two children completed their education at Loughborough College in Britain. The last public Appearance of AbebeBikila is Munich Olympics in 1972....

Great Ethiopian royal & noble houses were very ethnically mixed This was encouraged as much as possible to strengthen ties between ethnic and regional groups. If regional nobles were Orthodox Christians orconverted to the faith, marriage ties to the Imperial family could be expected. Princess Mahezente's elder half-brother (they had different mothers) was Dejazmatch Fikre Selassie Hapte Mariam who was also Governor of Wellega. He was married to Crown Prince Asfaw Wossen's eldest daughter Princess Edjigayehu Asfaw Wossen (by his first wife Princess Wolette Israel Seyoum Mengesha). Their six children carry the royal blood of both the Shewa and Tigrean lines of the Solomonic dynastyin addition to the Oromo royal line of Leqa-Lekemt. When you look acrossthe families of the old nobility you will find that the blood ties go across the country. It was a deliberate policy to encourage unity. Princess Mahitsente Habte Mariam is Prince Ermias Sahle Selassie's mother by Price Sahle Selassie Haile Selassie. Royal Princess Mahtsente is fromOromo high nobility. She is from the Lekemt line of Oromo, and her grandfather was Dejazmatch Gebregziabiher Moreda (known as Kumsa Moreda before he converted to Christianity) who was the ruler of Lequa Lekemt. Emperor Menelik II authorized him to use a red ceremonial umbrella which was allowed only for royalty. His son Dejazmatch Hapte Mariam, her late father was a long time governor of Wollega.

Lij Endalkachew Makonnen, the last Imperial Ethiopian premier

Lij Endalkachew Makonnen (1927 – November 23, 1974) was an Ethiopianpolitician. Lij Endalkatchew Makonnen, son of a nobleman, an educated and reform minded diplomat, whose father the late Betwadad Makonnen Endalkatchew, the 1st post Italian occupation Prime Minister of Ethiopia inoffice from 14 May 1942 to 1 November 1957.

Born in Addis Ababa, his father, Ras Betwoded Makonnen Endelkachew served as the third Prime Minister of... post Italian occupation in Ethiopia Endalkachew Makonnen was a member of the aristocratic Addisge clan that were very influential in the later Ethiopianmonarchy.

Lij Endelkachew had previously served in a variety of diplomatic and political posts. He was Ethiopian Ambassador to Britain, and later Permanent Representative to the United Nations, and was one of the people under consideration for the post of UN Secretary General in 1972,before Kurt Waldheim was appointed. He had also served earlier as Minister for Postal, Telegraph & Telecommunications (PoTeTe), and had served as the International President of the Young Men's Christianity Association (YMCA). He would be the last Imperial prime minister appointed by the Emperor Haile Selassie I. Endalkachew Makonnen, whosfather Ras Betwadad Makonnen Endalkachew served as post-Italian occupation prime minister of Ethiopia in the 1950s.

The Oxford University graduate Endelkachew Makonnen served as Prime Minister from February 28 to late July (July 22, 1974) until he detained ..During this period, the Imperial government was under assault by protesting students and striking workers who demanded investigation of corruption in the highest levels of government, reforms in land tenure, and political reforms as well. Endalkachew Makonnen attempted to address these demands by presenting reforms that began to change the very nature of the Ethiopian monarchy.

The Emperor also agreed to some of these proposals, which included the drafting of a new constitution to replace the one adopted in 1955, and having the Prime Minister be responsible to the elected Lower House of Parliament rather than to the Emperor. The new Premier attempted to address the many demands being put forward by the proponents of reform, and Ethiopia seemed to be on the verge of transforming itself intoa democracy and a modern constitutional monarchy. He would be the lastImperial Prime Minister appointed by Emperor Haile Selassie until he detained by the military co-ordinaitng & steering committee in July of thesame year.

The late Endalkachew was a step-son of Her Royal Princess YeshasheworkYilma, Emperor Haile Selassie's only niece. Princess Yeshashwork's father,Dejazmatch Yilma Makonnen the eldest son of Ras Makonnen Wolde Michael and the only sibling of Emperor Haile Selassie. He died in in 1907.

MAMMO WOLDE DEGAGA, the Mexico Olympic Legend

Mamo Wolde-(June 12, 1932 – May 26, 2002) was an Ethiopian long distance runner who competed in track and road running events. He was also the winner of the marathon at the 1968 Summer Olympics @ Mexicocity. Mammo Wolde was born in Diri Jille to an Oromo family. In 1951, hemoved to Addis Ababa and joined the Imperial Bodyguard. Wolde later served as a peacekeeper in Korea war from 1953 to 1955. At his first Olympic appearance in 1956 in Melbourne, Australia, Wolde competed in the 800 m, 1,500 m and the 4x400 relay. He didn't compete in the 1960 Summer Olympics in Rome, when Abebe Bikila became the first Ethiopianto win a gold medal. Wolde claimed his absence was due to the government's desire to send him on a peacekeeping mission to the Congoin Africa during the Congo Crisis. According to him, in the government's ensuing conflict with the Ethiopian Olympic Committee, who wanted him to compete, he didn't get sent to either event. However, athlete Said Moussa Osman, who represented Ethiopia in the 800 m at the 1960 Olympics, stated that Wolde lost at the trials and didn't make it on the team.

LEGEND PEOPLE: Hakim (dr) Warqenah Eshete

Warqenah Eshete was an Ethiopian statesman, diplomat and intellectual. He was the first Ethiopian educated as a modern medical doctor. In fact he was born in northern Ethiopia in the 1860s to Ethiopian nobility, and spent his infancy in imprisonment with his family at the court of emperor Tewodros. It's believed he was accidently abandoned by his parents on the field of battle in the face of the British assault on Tewodros' strongholdin 1868, he was picked up by a British officer and taken to India. The boy was shifted from guardian to guardian, ending up in schooling in colonial India. His name was changed to Charles Martin and brought up as an English gentleman. He attended medical school and later became a surgeon in Scotland. He later worked as a district officer in Burma for the British colonial administration. As soon as the news of Adwa victory reached him. He decided to make his way to Ethiopia, so as to assist Emperor Menelik and his mother country.

EOTC LEGEND

Patriarch Abune Teklehaimanot" Father of the People The third Patriarch of Ethiopian Orthodox Tewahedo Church NB: Abune Teklehaimanot's Birth Name Mekuria Wolde Michael.
And When he was sixteen years old he left for Sidamo Province and settled in Wolayta District at Sodo (Southern Ethiopia). There he met avirtuous hermit monk called Desta at the Wolayta Sodo Debre MenkiratTekleHaimanot monastery. Before Mekuria's arrival, this monk had prophesied to the monks that a great hermit would soon come to the monastery.

At this time Mekuria changed his name to Melaku because he did not wantto be discovered by his relatives, who might try to bring him back to his village. At the monastery, he started to help Hermit Desta by bringing himwater and dry food to keep him alive. Abba Melaku arrived in Addis Ababaon the day of his appointment to see Patriarch Tewoflos. :--Abba Melaku went into the office of the president of this nomination committee & gave him the traditional greeting of respect. As a director & president of the board of the Ethiopian Orthodox Church office, Dr. Kinfe Regib, who was earnestly seeking a hermit monk as a nominee for the election of the nextPatriarch, was very happy to see Abba Melaku walk into his office as if driven by God. Dr. Kinfe asked if he was willing to answer a few questionsabout himself, his job and his responsibilities. Abba Melaku agreed & gavehim the details he wanted. When he asked where he was born, he answered: "For a monk, is there any particular place? Any spot of Ethiopiawhere I live is my country."

He refused to identify his birthplace out of principle. Dr Kinfe Regib, amazed by the divine providence that had brought him there, took notes on him & put them in an envelope. He then asked Abba Melaku to take theenvelop to the main nomination committee secretariat office. So Abba Melaku obediently took the envelop & delivered it to secretariat office but he had no clue what was going on at the time. The next morning Abba Melaku returned to the main office hoping to meet with the Patriarch only to discover that he was no longer in charge & had been detained by the government. Shocked, he immediately returned to Wolayta. On the day ofthe election, Abba Melaku was elected Patriarch by a very high number of voters, up until that day, he had followed his routine lifestyle of Praying, Fasting, Serving the Church, & Teaching his followers. Suddenly, he was ordered by the government of Wolayta to go to Addis Ababa & report to the main church headquarters office. He left immediately not knowing what the rush was. Upon his arrival, without even having a change of clothes & or any shoes on his feet, he was taken to the Menbere Tsebaot Kidist Sillassie (መንበረ ፀባኦት ቅድስት ሥላሴ) Cathedral, where all the bishops & many thousands of Ethiopians were waiting for him. He wore a brown hand-sewn khaki robe over a wide pair of trousers & over that he had a folded bed-sheet as a shawl (ሽማ) & on top he had a hand-treated goat skin. This was his habit since he had become a hermit. When he arrived, everyone honored him with respectful applause & great shouts of joy known as Elelta & Hotta. (እልልታ እና ሆታ) After a short introductory speech byDr. Kinfe Regib, it was announced that Abba Melaku Welde Michael (አባ ሜልዕኩ ወልደ ሚካኤል) had been elected Patriarch of the Ethiopian Tewahdo Orthodox Church. Shocked, Abba Melaku's eyes filled with tears & he cried. He made a short speech on the election & said: " How can this be ?what strength do I have to fulfill the responsibility ?

However, if it is the will of the God of Daniel, who took him out of the pitof lions, what else can I do ?" This took place in July & August of 1976, &until the final day of celebration, Abba Melaku spent his time in prayer with others praying for him as well in Holy Mary Church. They tried to persuade him to change his clothes & wear shoes but he absolutely refused. Later on, his hermit monk friends, persuaded him to change. Hefinally agreed to wear a cotton cloth dyed yellow with a proper shemma (ሽማ) over it & a pair of sandals.

LEGEND PEOPLE: Who Is Ammanuel Abraham?

Ammanuel was born on March 17, 1913 at Benti Adere, in the Babbo areaof Ghimbi District of Wellega in the house of his grandfather Malimo Gama. His father was Ato Abraham Tato and his mother Woizero Qanatu Malimo. His parents were both Christians and he was their fourth child, the first three (two girls and a baby boy) having died in infancy.

His father Abraham was converted through the ministry of the Swedish Evangelical Mission which sent evangelists to Wellega after they first established themselves in Eritrea. After his conversion, Abraham--whose name was Soresso before he became a Christian--prayed diligently with his wife so as to avoid the grief of losing another child. God answered their prayer by giving Abraham a dream in which he was told he would have a son who was to be named Emmanuel and that a man by the nameof Boru Simma should be his godfather.

When Emmanuel was born, Abraham had to travel ten hours on foot to take his son to Boru Simma where he had him baptized according to the Orthodox tradition. The priest who baptized the child refused to give him the name Emmanuel as that name was too sacred to be given to a humanbeing. But Abraham believed that his son was an answer to prayer and insisted on the name. The priest called him Welde Emmanuel, which means "the son of Emmanuel." But the father did not change his mind about calling him Emmanuel. His grandfather called him Abdissa, meaning"his hope."

At age five, Emmanuel attended a school run by an Ethiopian evangelist from the Swedish Evangelical Mission in Boji. Here he learned both Amharic and English, which were the mediums of instruction. He thus learned Bible stories at an early age and became a competent student. Asa result his father wanted his son to attend the Swedish Evangelical School in Addis Ababa and asked a friend to take him there. But the mandropped Emmanuel off in Nekemt and went on to Addis Ababa. AlthoughAbraham was disappointed, he did not lose heart.

The government decided to provide education for certain specially chosen young people all over Ethiopia. At that time, although the government did not choose Emmanuel, he was able to go in place of another student whose mother would not permit him to go. This way, Emmanuel had the opportunity of receiving a better education that would change his future. So he enrolled in the Teferi Mekonnen School in Addis Ababa where he became an outstanding student. He received several awards for excellenceand in 1939 he finished his six-year educational program after only five years. His teachers recommended him to the minister of education a couple of times to be sent abroad for higher studies. But since the Italiansoccupied Ethiopia at that time, the minister could not do anything about itbecause of the Italians' interference. In addition, Emmanuel received a letter from his father who instructed him to return to Wellega to get a job and take over the responsibility for his family. His education was thus abruptly interrupted at grade six when he had to get a job.

Emmanuel's first job was in Asbe Teferi School (1931-1935), Chercher County, Harer Province, where he worked as headmaster and teacher. Hisadministration was so successful that enrollment grew year after year andhe opened evening classes which government employees attended to further their education in view of getting promoted. When their country needed them most, the youth that had survived the Italian fascist regime took over the country's positions of responsibility, becoming ambassadors,generals, colonels, secretaries, section leaders, and teachers after this training.

At a crucial time when the Italians wanted to invade Ethiopia, Emperor Haile Sellassie I saw the need to send trustworthy messengers to Europeto tell the world how Italy was violating international law. He selected Azazj Workneh, governor of Chercher, as his Envoy Extraordinary and Minister Plenipotentiary to London. Workneh was allowed to choose anyone he wanted to accompany him on his mission to London and he decided to take along Emmanuel as his secretary. Workneh asked Emmanuel if he would work without pay in exchange for food and clothing. Emmanuel agreed and went with him as secretary of legislationand secretary for government affairs in London (1935 to 1943).

However, soon after Emmanuel started his functions as secretary, the Italians invaded Ethiopia in October 1935, and Emperor Haile Sellassie was exiled to London. Workneh wanted to leave for India and the emperorgranted his request in 1939. As a result, the full burden of the position fellon Emmanuel's shoulders as he began to work under the direct orders of the emperor. At this point, a family had promised to sponsor further education for him when he finished his assignment with Workneh. But as he felt he could not refuse this assignment and leave his emperor at this time of great need for selfish reasons, he accepted the job of secretary forgovernment affairs.

After the work began, an organization in London called the "United Societyfor Christian Literature" invited both the emperor and Emmanuel to their annual meeting and Emmanuel was invited to speak. The emperor gave his consent and Emmanuel made a wonderful speech about which the emperor commented: "You have made Us proud today." That day Emmanuel's integrity and competency were tested and confirmed by the emperor.

During his stay in London up to April 1943, Emmanuel matured in his spiritual life because of the fellowship he had with Christian friends. Whenthe emperor was restored to the throne five years after the Italian invasion, Emmanuel continued sending reports to the emperor about the United Society for Christian Literature including the annual meetings of the society because the emperor had an ongoing interest in the work of this society. The emperor reminded Emmanuel by letter that he still remembered his speech when they had attended that meeting together and that he benefitted from Emmanuel's reports because they encouragedhim spiritually. He also encouraged Emmanuel to continue to develop in character and not be satisfied with his present achievements. Thus Emmanuel had to trust his emperor and give his dedicated service until 1974, when the Dergue Regime brought down the imperial rule in Ethiopia.

In April 1943, the emperor allowed Emmanuel to return home. When he arrived, he immediately became a member of the Addis Ababa Mekane Yesus Church. Very soon he was elected elder and began serving in different positions. On January 25, 1963, he was elected president of Ethiopian Evangelical Church Mekane Yesus (EECMY) and he served in thatposition for twenty-two years until January 25, 1985. On several occasionshe attended the All-Africa Lutheran Conference as Ethiopia's delegate fromhis church. He also served on the executive committee of the Lutheran World Federation (LWF) for twenty-seven years (1957 to 1984) as the EECMY delegate.

At the same time, he was appointed director general of the Ministry of Education in Addis Ababa (1950 to 1955). Thanks to his diligent service and his friendship with the emperor his ministry grew fast although some of his contemporaries became jealous of him. After several failed attemptsto have the emperor remove him from office, his enemies began to propose that initiatives to develop education quickly in the country would be dangerous to the state and the Orthodox Church. The emperor finally responded to their pressure by replacing Emmanuel by another official on June 6, 1947. At that time Emmanuel showed his loyalty to the emperor by waiting patiently for two years until the emperor gave him anotherposition.

On January 12, 1947, a few months before leaving office, Emmanuel married Elleni Alemayehu. The couple was blessed with twin daughtersRuth and Sara, born on October 9, 1948.

Being without a government appointment, he used the time to translate an English book entitled Diplomacy into Amharic. He had translated otherbooks during other such intervals between appointments. But soon after he left office, the emperor sent Emmanuel to New York as one of the delegates for the second General Assembly meeting of the United Nationsheld in September 1947.

Upon his return, the emperor appointed him Envoy Extraordinary and Minister Plenipotentiary to New Delhi, India from 1949 to 1951 when he was forced to return home because of his wife's ill health. Three months after returning from India, he was appointed Ambassador Plenipotentiary to Rome (1952 to 1955) then to London (1955 to 1959). He contributed tothe establishment of the Organization of African Unity at that time and came back to Ethiopia for good, his diplomatic career finished.

He then became chief of political affairs in His Majesty's private cabinet with a ministerial position (1959 to 1961), then minister of posts, telegraphs, and telephones (1961 to 1966), minister of communications (1966 to 1969), and minister of mines (1969 to 1974). In 1974 he was placed in military detention by the Dergue Regime for one year while theyinvestigated government corruption. He was finally released on January 7,1975 with all the other government employees who were proven innocentof corruption during their years of service.

He was served his church until 1985 as president of the EECMY when someone else took over that position. He spent his later years working onhis autobiography, Reminiscences of My Life (Oslo, 1995).

The cable car (Ferro Via) Asmara to Massawa (Batse)

The cable car Massawa-Asmara was a cable car line tricable, used to transport goods, which connected the city of Asmara, the capital of the governorate of Eritrea, with the port of Massawa. About 75 km long, wasbuilt in the time of the longest ropeway in the world. Begun in 1935, it was completed in March 1937, but was closed a few years later, in 1941,because of the damage of World War II .. (Wikipedia)

HISTORIC ETHIOPIANS:

Prince Merid Azmatch Asfaw Wossen Haile Selassie, heir apparet to the throne of the Emperor of Ethiopia

Leul Merid Azmatch Asfaw Wossen Haile Selassie, Ye-Ityopia NiguseNegest Mengist Alga Worash. Crown Prince Asfaw Wossen was a man whose life would prove to beextremely eventful almost from the day of his birth.

Prince Asfaw Wossen was born on July 27, 1916 in the City of Harrar to his parents, the then Dejazmatch Tafari Makonnen and Woizero Menen Asfaw and was immediately pitched into the middle of a great Imperial drama. Just days before his birth, his father had been urgently summonedfrom Harrar to Addis Ababa by Lij Iyasu. Upon arriving at the palace in obedience to the summons, Dejazmatch Tafari was stunned to learn that Lij Iyasu had departed for Harrar. He was told that he was stripped of his governorship of Harrarge which would now be directly administered by Lij Iyasu, and he would instead be posted to Sidamo. He was to be restrictedto his home in Addis until his departure for Sidamo. Upon arriving in Harrar, Lij Iyasu went to stay at the home of one of his Harrari friends, but ordered Woizero Menen to immediately vacate the governors residence along with her children and to go join her husband in Addis.

Kegnazmatch (later Leul Ras) Imiru pleaded with Lij Iyasu to allow Woizero Menen to properly recover from childbirth and at least have the baby boy baptized before forcing her to travel. After Lij Iyasu's favorite sister Woizero Sehin (Woizero Menen's mother) also pleaded with him, he relented. Little Asfaw Wossen was baptized 40 days after his birth as Amha Selassie, before his mother took him and her toddler daughter Tenagnework out of Harrar. A rumor had reached her that Lij Iyasu was planning to force her to divorce Dejazmatch Taffari and marry her to one of his allies, so Kegnazmatch Imiru smuggled the future Empress and her children out of Harrar disguised as a Somali family, got them to Dire Dawaand put them on the Train to Addis. It was these events that definitively shattered the ties between Lij Iyasu and Dej. Tafari and led to the later turning his support to the nobles planning to depose Lij Iyasu. Just two months after his birth, Asfaw Wossen Tafari's father was made a Ras, proclaimed Crown Prince, and Regent of Ethiopia. On November 2, 1930, upon his father being crowned Emperor of Ethiopia, he was anointed as heir to the throne (Alga Worash) and made an oath of loyalty.

Crown Prince Asfaw Wossen was married twice. His first wife was PrincessWolete Israel Seyoum, daughter of Leul Ras Seyoum Mengesha, and great-granddaughter of Emperor Yohannes IV. They would have one daughter, Princess Edjigayehu Asfaw Wossen. After his divorce the Prince went on to marry Princess Medferiashwork Abebe, daughter of DejazmatchAbebe Damtew. On her mother's side Princess Medferiashwork was the granddaughter of Ras Mengesha Atikem of Damot and Agew Midir, Enderase of Gojjam for a time and a hero of Adwa. By her Crown Prince Asfaw Wossen had four children, Princesses Mariam Senna, Sehin, and Sifrash Bizu, as well as a son Prince Zera Yacob.

During the course of his life, Crown Prince Asfaw Wossen was proclaimed monarch of Ethiopia three times. First, in December 1960, General Mengistu Neway and his brother Girmame attempted a coup d'état againstEmperor Haile Selassie. They proclaimed Crown Prince Asfaw Wossen Emperor in his father's place and the Prince made a radio broadcast saying he would be restricted to a salary and that a more equitable and democratic constitutional monarchy would be set up. The coup failed though, and whether or not the Prince was a willing participant would always be a point of discussion. Then in September 1974, while the Princewas receiving medical care for his debilitating stroke, he was again proclaimed monarch, this time by the Derg. Upon deposing Emperor Haile Selassie, the Derg declared that upon his return to Ethiopia after the completion of his treatment, Prince Asfaw Wossen would be crowned King (not Emperor) of Ethiopia, and that the titles Lion of Judah and Elect of God would be abolished. The international press gathered outside the home the Crown Prince and his family were staying at in Geneva to get hisreaction at becoming Ethiopia's new monarch. A spokesperson came out and told the reporters that "His Imperial Highness" had not received any official communications from Addis Ababa, and that he was concerned about the safety of his family who were under detention. By using the term "His Imperial Highness" rather than "His Majesty", the spokesman was revealing that Asfaw Wossen still regarded himself as Crown Prince and not King, and that he did not accept the dethroning of his father. The monarchy was formally abolished by the Derg in early 1975 by proclamation. Finally, after repeated urging by elements of Ethiopian political movements outside Ethiopia, Crown Prince Asfaw Wossen was proclaimed Emperor of Ethiopia in exile in April 1989, at his home in London. He announced that his reign name would be his baptism name, and was to be called Emperor Amha Selassie I.

After the fall of the Derg in May 1991, he set up a monarchist movement known as "Moa Anbessa" that campaigned for the restoration of a strictly ceremonial monarchy as a symbol of national unity and legal and historic legitimacy and continuity. After the Ethiopian government exhumed Emperor Haile Selassie's remains, Amha Selassie prepared to return to Ethiopia to preside at a planned state funeral. Former President Nixon andSenator Ted Kennedy, as well as members of European and Asian Imperialand Royal families were expected to attend. However, the government refused to allow a state funeral and stated that they would not be responsible for the security of foreign guests who attended. The funeral was this indefinitely postponed, and would not take place until after AmhaSelassie himself had died.

Crown Prince Asfaw Wossen Haile Selassie (Emperor in Exile Amha Selassie I) died in the Virginia suburbs of Washington DC on February 17,1997. His body was returned to Addis Ababa and was buried among members of his family in the crypt of Holy Trinity Cathedral. His funeral was presided over by the Patriarch Abune Paulos and all the hierarchy of the Ethiopian Orthodox Church, and most of the diplomatic community inAddis Ababa. The government did not allow state honors, but his death was announced on state television. The announcement recognized his titles as Crown Prince and referred to him as Leul Merid Azmatch, but made no reference to his claimed title as Emperor.

THE HISTORY OF STUDENT MOVEMENT IN ETHIOPIA

Wallelign Mekonnen Kassa - A student movement activist & Marxist theoretician (March 22, 1945 - December 10, 1972) Wallelign Mekonnen was a lead student activist, Marxist theoretician in theEthiopian Student Movement from the mid-1960s to his death in December 1972. Wallelign was the author of the highly influential but contentious article ‘On the Question of Nationalities in Ethiopia’ published in 1969.

Wallelign’s most famous article ‘On the Question of Nationalities in Ethiopia’ was published in the student movement’s journal Struggle in November 196...9. In this article Wallelign analyzed national oppression inImperial Ethiopia and argued that as Ethiopia was not one nation, but rather a collection of different nations and nationalities, whose struggle forself-determination should be supported by the student movement as long as they are committed to Socialism. This was a highly contentious area which divided the student movement at the time, but Wallelign’s views eventually came to dominate the student movement as well as the political parties that it spawned.

As a result of the publication a police harassment and media campaign was unleashed against the student movement and Struggle's publicationwas suspended. The following month, Tilahun Gizaw, president of the University Students' Union of Addis Ababa, was asassinated by what is presumed to be agents of the state. Wallelign was arrested again in December 1969 and imprisoned until May 1971.

At the end of the Ethiopian Civil War the rebel Ethiopian People’s Revolutionary Democratic Front named its Wollo offensive Operation underthe name “Wallelign” in honour of the fallen activist. Wallelign's views are embedded in the current Constitution of the Federal Democratic Republic of Ethiopia which recognizes the unconditional right of "every Nation, Nationality and People in Ethiopia... to self-determination, including the right to secession". The ongoing debate on this constitution bears witnessof how controversial his views remain. Source: https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Wallelign_Mekonnen

The Provisional Military Administrative Council (PMAC), commonly known as “the Duerg” Vs Lt. General Aman Mikael Andom aka "TheDesert Fox"

Lt. General Aman Mikael born in Tseaazega of Hammassien sub-region informer Italian daughter colony of Eritrea. He was the First Eritrean origin general to become symbolic military head of state of Ethiopia. He was killed in an exchange of fire at his home because of a speech he phrased for the public in Asmara Queen of Sheeba Stadium. The speech quoted assaid it, “Victory to Eritrea, Victory to Ethiopia.”

To get more background and biographical information on the history behind his death, you can read more about Lt. WILDLIFE RESEARCH:

A New, Genetically Distinct Lion Population is Found(Addis Aaba, Ethiopia November 30, 2012)

In a twist on the Lion King's "Circle of Life," a group of researchers identified a population of genetically distinct lions—in a zoo. The findingcame after an Addis Ababa zoo asked researchers in its sister city of Leipzig to help prove that their lions not only looked unusual, but were genetically unique. The finding would help the struggling zoo to obtain funding to continue breeding the lions and to improve their living conditions.

The Addis Ababa zoo lions have dark manes and small bodies, unlike otherAfrican lions. But life in captivity can sometimes influence appearance. A team of researchers, led by the Max Planck Institute for Evolutionary Anthropology in Germany and the University of York in the UK, checked tosee if the lions really are different by comparing DNA samples of 15 lions from the zoo to six populations of wild lions.

Their genetic analysis revealed that the gene sequence of all fifteen lions were unique and showed little sign of inbreeding. The study was recentlypublished in the European Journal of Wildlife Research. The zoo's lions belonged to Ethiopia's deceased emperor, Haile Selassie, who establishedthe zoo in 1948. But their origins are unknown. One theory is that the seven founder lions—five males and two females—came from southwestern Ethiopia. Wild lions that look like this may no longer live there because their strikingly dark mane proved too alluring to hunters.

"Since the wild source population is unknown, we cannot be sure whetherit still exists," says lead author Susann Bruche. "Lions with similar appearance have been largely diminished mainly due to hunting for their mane." Bruche says that according to the Ethiopian authorities, lions thatresemble the zoo lions still exist in the east and northeast of the country,in the Babille Elephant Sanctuary and in a wildlife rescue facility in Ensessakotteh. This isn't the first lion population to survive only in zoos. Two significant lion populations, the North African Barbary lions and the South African Cape lions, have already become extinct in the wild. As Ethiopia's population of lions declines, "Every effort should be made to maintain thispopulation to keep the genetic heritage alive," says Bruche.

Construction work is currently underway in the Addis Ababa zoo to createa facility modeled on the lions' natural environment. The zoo will continueto breed the lions to keep the population alive.

Dr. Gregory Stanton, President of the Genocide Watch

"The Tigrean regime is attempting to colonize the rest of Ethiopia. One of the big worries we have, I say this with real sincerity, because this is an effective...ly Tigrean takeover of the whole country, do you know who willeventually pay for this? The Tigreans. The Tigreans will become hated in the country. I lived in Rwanda and in Burundi. I saw what happened whenan elite basically took control of the country. In both of those countries, the Tutsi elite basically ran the countries. And so they were very much resented by the Hutus. What was the result? Genocide. I am worried not just for the ordinary people who are Oromo or Amharas or Ogadani or others, I am worried for the Tigreans. Tigreans could become victims of genocides themselves if others turn against them and try to kill them. Thename of our organization is Genocide Watch. We are very worried about these kind of forces because they are natural human forces. You can see them develop."

Fresh violence in north Gondar claims lives injuries

APA December 16, 2015

Fresh violence has erupted in Ethiopia’s north Gondar zone in the Amhara Regional State that has claimed the lives of dozens and wounded many others. Chief Administrator of the regional state Gedu Andargachew said, adding however that the security problem has been brought under control.

The Chief Administrator said the state deeply regretted the loss of life anddamage to property caused by the instability which occurred in some kebeles (districts) in Metema and Chilga woredas of the zone. “Following the joint efforts of the security forces and the community, the situation isnow under control,” Gedu said.

The Chief Administrator commended the role of the public in the efforts tobring the situation under control. He said the government will take necessary measures on the “anti-peace forces” who he said attempted to disrupt the peace, urging the residents to also help to safeguard the peacein the region as usual.

Ethiopia's government is set to abandon plans to expand the boundaries of the capital, Addis Ababa, which have caused months of deadly protests.Demonstrations by people from the Oromo ethnic group have been sparked by fears that Oromo farmers could be displaced. Human rights groups have estimated that at least 140 people were killed by security forces during the protests.

City Life Meets Losers and Winners!

Ruling OPDO announced full rollback on Addis Ababa ‘master plan’ after deadly protests. The ruling party of Ethiopia’s largest region, Oromia, announced full roll back on the proposed master plan of Addis Ababa and its surrounding towns. The announcement came after weeks long proteststhat left dozens dead.

The draft integrated development plan for Addis Ababa and nearby Oromia districts [see Amharic version here] triggered protests in mid-November in western and central Oromia towns. The draftplan, commonly known as ‘the master plan’, was also the cause of the deadly 2014 protests as it is perceived as an annexation of Oromia territory and facilitator of massive displacement of Oromo farmers with meager compensations. The draft plan was put on hold subsequently.
Activists suspect, however, it was being implemented covertly. Last October’s legislation on urban administration, enacted by the regional council, is considered part of such covert move. Students and locals took part in the protests which covered the past eight weeks at different scale.

News Updates: The central and western parts of the region had been theepicenter of the protests which reached its peaked in mid-December.
Sporadic protests continued at several areas and schools making it the longest uprising in two decades. The Oromo People Democratic Organization (OPDO) which governs the region and part of the national ruling party EPRDF, have been holding a series of public consultations aswell as cadre meetings in the past weeks in a bid to contain the crisis.

The three-day summit of the 63-member OPDO Central Committee, concluded yesterday evening in Adama city, decided a full rollback on the matter. In its press statement, the party announced the ‘master plan’ would be scrapped and the contentious sections of the urban legislation will be revised. It also pledged to seek immediate implementation of the Constitutionally stipulated special interests of Oromia on Addis Ababa. Theleadership further pledged to ensure rehabilitation for those affected by the protests. Activists claim the weeks long protests left 140 people dead.Government officials dispute the figure but have yet to release their own report. (Text ends)

Oromo protest updates:

Shed Light On Ethiopia's Long-Standing Ethnic Tensions PERSPECTIVE BY SORCHA AMY THOMSON & MACARENA ESPINAR
LÓPEZ (December 28, 2015)

Why is Ethiopia's largest ethnic group also one of the most oppressed? Asanti-government demonstrations spread across the Oromia region, and the death toll continues to rise, the Oromo people are asserting their longneglected struggle. Labelled as terrorists and extremists by the government, the diaspora are reaching to the international audience for support.

In Israel, Oromo asylum seekers marched upon the Ethiopian Embassy, asking the compelling question: "UN - where are you?" As part of a wave of similar protests around the world, the demonstration called for intervention in what has been described as Ethiopia's worst civil conflict ina decade. The rally echoed a series of peaceful demonstrations that have spread throughout Ethiopia's Oromia region. As the protests escalate, so too does the government's use of excessive force to crush the dissent.

According to Human Rights Watch around 75 protesters have been killed by Ethiopian security forces since mid-November. Many others have been wounded. Meanwhile, the government reports a starkly contrasting five deaths. Peaceful protests began in schools and universities, but as the government responds with violence, outrage has spread throughout society. The unrest was sparked by a draft Master Plan designed by the Tigrayan-led Ethiopian current government, which aims to expand the territorial scope of Addis Ababa, into 1.5 million hectares of Oromia land. Since the contentious national elections of 2005, Oromos have borne the harsh consequences of thecountry's quest for economic growth. In order to meet the demands of Ethiopia's rapid urbanisation, the government hasfailed to consult with the affected populations about its annexation of landand mass forced evictions.

Matat Admusu, standing outside the Embassy in Tel Aviv, fears the escalation of the current situation. "The Oromo people are resisting by peaceful means. But the government is taking action with the military. As the protests continue they are bringing special military from the border into the region, who do not speak the language of our people. Because thegovernment says we are terrorists, they kill us. But the more they kill our people, the angrier we get. The demonstrations are getting bigger. Now the region is full of the military."

A HISTORY OF POLITICAL REPRESSION

Ethnic Oromos comprise more than 25 million people of the nearly 74 million that constitute the total population of Ethiopia. Despite their number, the ethnic majority are the subjects of state discrimination. Nearly all Oromo cultural organizations are banned, youth unemploymentis severe, and the Oromo language, despite being widely spoken throughout the country, is not an official language of Ethiopia. Employment opportunities in the public sector tend to be highly politicised, as the only successful applicants are the ones with strongconnections to the ruling elite.

These structural concerns were voiced by the protesters in Tel Aviv: “We are competing with those who speak the official language and we are not given the chance to work in the government or other institutions. There isno place for us in our country, even though we are the majority.”

While the recent uprising was sparked by the government's land-grab, itcomes in the context of a long history of Oromo political repression. Theruling regime is led by the Ethiopian People’s Revolutionary Democratic Front (EPRDF), a coalition that has been in power since 1991 and that reflects the long-term domination of the Marxist Tigrayan People’s Liberation Front (TPLF). The leading coalition consists of four political parties, including the Oromo Peoples' Democratic Organization (OPDO).

However, as one of the protesters in Tel Aviv explained, the OPDO does not address the demands of the people they are supposed to stand for: “Itis just symbolic, it is a fake party that is not working for the Oromo. They were born in Oromia but do not represent our plight, and every time thereare demonstrations they do not hesitate to kill our people.”

Lacking genuine representation in government, many Oromos are dedicated supporters of the Oromo Liberation Front (OLF), a nationalist political organization, founded in 1973, whose aim is ‘to exercise the Oromo peoples' inalienable right to national self-determination’. The OLFis labelled as a terrorist group in Ethiopia, which hinders the struggle of Ethiopia’s largest ethnic group.

PEACEFUL PROTESTS OR TERRORISM?

On 16 December the Ethiopian state intelligence services issued a statement claiming that the Oromia protesters were planning to “destabilize the country” and that some of them have a “direct link with a group that has been collaborating with other proven terrorist parties.”

Human rights groups are concerned this anti-terror rhetoric will escalatethe severe crackdown on the Oromo protesters. “Instead of condemningthe unlawful killings by the security forces, […] this statement in effect authorizes the excessive use of force against peaceful protesters,” said Amnesty International. The Ethiopian government’s disregard for human rights attracted international attention when, in July 2015, Barack Obama became the firstsitting US President to visit the country. His visit, highly criticised by Ethiopian activists and international human rights organisations, focused on the country's increasing strategic importance in the fight againstterrorism in the region.

"Ethiopia and the United States share a long friendship," Obama said. He described the nation as an "outstanding partner" for its contribution to thefight against Islamic extremism in East Africa. He went on to declare his support for the current government, elected in May 2015 with a contestedlandslide 100% of the vote: "We are opposed to any group that is promoting the violent overthrow of a government, including the government of Ethiopia that has been democratically elected."

Obama's lip-service to Ethiopia's democracy was the subject of widespread criticism. Bekele Nega, general secretary of the Oromo Federalist Congress,voiced the popular outrage: "I don't know if democracy means robbing people's vote and robbing their election result?They have killed people and they have taken the ballot box with them in organised fraud. [...] Is this the meaning of democracy in America? We are very sorry that Mr Obama's comment on our election is really supporting dictators. We know the US is always looking after its own interests".

APPEAL FOR INTERVENTION

While appealing for external assistance, Matat, one of the protesters in TelAviv, conveyed that the known strategic value of the Ethiopian government to US interests dampens hopes for effective action.

"The international community only work for their own interests. They havean international military vision. In Somalia and in Sudan, they need the Ethiopian military to support them in the fight against terrorism. So they ignore the innocent people being killed. It is the same military who fights for Western interests on the border that are brought to kill the Oromo people. How can this not attract the international media?"

The resounding silence in the international press reflects the complete absence of independent coverage in Ethiopia. "The protests in Ethiopia arenot reported on national television. If you look at Ethiopian media they talk about development, about new hotels and train lines, not about the plight of the Oromo people", says Matut.

In an effort to counteract the negative government rhetoric, the protesters across Oromia are reaching out to social media. The Twitter campaign, with the hashtag #OromoProtests, calls for international intervention against the state violence. Images and videos depicting thebrutality across the region have successfully spread, prompting the authorities to cut mobile phone coverage in some of the key areas.

UNCERTAIN FUTURE

As the demonstrations continue across the region, it remains unclear if the incumbent regime's violent crackdown on ethnic Oromos is prompted by deep-rooted sentiments of ethnic supremacy or rather by an attempt to utilise ethnic divisions to crush any perceived dissent. But there is a fear among the Oromo that the current status quo could develop into further violence, fuelled by ethnic divisions. "It could lead to ethnic conflict. Thereis tension now. The government is not only suppressing Oromos but otherethnic groups [there are more than 80 ethnic groups in Ethiopia]. The situation is increasing. As people continue to be killed, the protests continue to grow, and after time it could spark uncontrollably. We are afraid of that. Everyone should be afraid of that", expressed Fikreselassie,a 28-year-old Oromo asylum seeker in Israel.

The characterisation of the Oromo struggle as a terrorist movement and the strategic importance of Ethiopia in the fight against regional Islamic extremism contribute to the deafening silence within the international community regarding the brutal oppression of the Oromo protesters. TheUN and civil society institutions must call on the Ethiopian government torestrain from the use of excessive force against demonstrators, take measures to de-escalate the growing tensions, and address the root causes of Ethiopia's ethnopolitical conflict.

The Launch of Ethiopic Studies Program at UoT

TADIAS (December 29, 2015)

The Bikila Award organization in Toronto, Canada has launched a campaign to raise funds and support for a future Ethiopic Studies Programat the University of Toronto. The initiative began when Dr. Michael Gervers, Professor of History at the University of Toronto, made an impassioned speech at the 2015 Bikila Awards about the importance of documenting, preserving, and teaching ancient Ethiopic history. ProfessorGervers currently teaches a course entitled ‘Cultural History of Ethiopia,’ and has helped to digitize the contents of over 100,000 ancient Ethiopic manuscripts and books through an initiative called Mäzgäbä Se’elat— treasury of Ethiopian images. Professor Gervers proposed that an endowment be established to fund a Chair and Program in Ethiopic Studies. He also made a generous offer to personally match donations made to the endowment up to $50,000. “The endowment will support courses in Ethiopic Studies for undergraduate and graduate students, witha particular focus on Ge’ez language and the rich cultural and intellectual history of Ethiopia,” states the University of Toronto campaign page. A group of Bikila Award organizers and past recipients began to mobilize theEthiopian community to take up Professor Gervers’ challenge. Both the Centre for Medieval Studies and Department in Near and Middle Eastern Civilizations at the University of Toronto quickly threw their support behind the initiative and facilitated a $50,000 match contribution from theuniversity. They will also help to design and implement the prospective program. With the initial endowment established, the Bikila Award organized a community forum to launch an awareness and fundraising campaign within the Ethiopian community. The forum was held on December 19th, 2015 at the University of Toronto and was attended by over 200 people from across the province.

Guest speakers at the forum included: Dr. Gelila Tilahun, who worked withProfessor Gervers and others to develop statistical dating methods for historical documents; Professor Suzanne Akbari, Director of the Center forMedieval Studies at the University of Toronto; Alpha Abebe, Doctoral Candidate at the University of Oxford; Dr. Fikre Germa, Family Physician at Brantford General Hospital; and Ato Tessema Mulugeta, President of Bikila Award, Inc. The foremost scholar of the Ge’ez language alive today,Professor Getatchew Haile, also joined the panel discussion via Skype.

Several people from the audience shared their enthusiasm and support forthe initiative during the discussion period. There was a jubilant mood in the room, and a wide consensus that this was an exciting opportunity thatthe community wanted to support. Over $20,000 was raised by the Ethiopian community at the forum and through online donations made by people from as far as France. While fundraising efforts will continue in order to achieve the larger vision of a full Ethiopic Studies Program, the university has announced that it will begin by offering a course in Ge'ez this coming academic year.

About the Author: Alpha Abebe is a doctoral candidate in International Development at Oxford University. Her research interests include Africandiaspora, diaspora engagement in development, the sociology of migration, and the politics of race and ethnicity.

ARCHIVE: US shuts down drone operation in Ethiopia

ADDIS ABABA, Ethiopia (AP) — The U.S. government has shut down its drone operation base in southern Ethiopia, an embassy official announced.

A decision has been reached that the base in Arba Minch, 450 kilometers(280 miles) south of Addis Ababa, is no longer necessary, embassy spokesman David Kennedy told The Associated Press by email. "U.S. military personnel are no longer in Arba Minch," Kennedy said. "In our ongoing bilateral discussions on defense cooperation, we reached a mutual decision that our presence in Arba Minch is not required at this time."

Ethiopian media reported about the base when it was set up in 2011 but the U.S. has never publicly confirmed its existence. A security expert in Addis Ababa, who insisted on anonymity for fear of Ethiopian government reprisal, said the base was used to attack Islamic extremists in Somalia. Ethiopia is a staunch U.S. ally in East Africa and has sent hundreds of troops to Somalia to counter the Islamic extremist rebel group. Although Ethiopia has a history of human rights, it is also a key U.S. ally in the fightagainst al-Qaida and other Islamic extremists in the Horn of Africa.

Ethiopia had troops in Somalia between 2006 and 2009 to defeat extremists. Ethiopia redeployed its troops to Somalia in 2011 to combat al-Shabab. Al-Shabab, al-Qaida's East African affiliate, is fighting the internationally-backed Somali government. The rebels were pushed out ofSomalia's capital, Mogadishu, in 2011 with the help of African Union troops. But al-Shabab still carries out numerous guerrilla attacks in Somalia and the countries contributing A.U. troops, including Kenya, Djibouti and Uganda.

In Memory of Mrs. Mignon Lorraine Inniss

She was born on Nov. 19, 1905 in Barbados. In the early twenties, she emigrated to New York City where she studied Business Administration atthe Braithwaite School of Business.

In 1931, after a visit of Ethiopian dignitaries for skilled African-Americansto help in Ethiopia's development, she emigrated to Ethiopia with the firstgroup of repatriates led by Arnold J. Ford, an internationally known scholar and political advocate for the liberation of oppre...ssed peoples throughout the world. Soon thereafter she married Ford and had two children. In 1935, Professor Ford died and was promised by his wife that she would never abandon Ethiopia. She promised to cast her destiny in Ethiopia to either survive or perish with their Ethiopian brothers and sisters.

Mrs. Lorraine Ford and her godmother, Albertha Thomas, founded the firstco-educational boarding school in the country, the Beit Aurieal (House of Light) School. The school was later renamed the Princess Zenebe Worq School by the Imperial order. She designed and successfully implementeda well-rounded curriculum with a strong emphasis on the development of the student's African identities and Ethiopia's proper place in African and world history. Ford also co-founded and served on the Board of Directiors of several Ethiopian organizations. She was the recipient of numerous awards including the Edward Wilmot Blyden award for Education Excellence in African Development from the African Heritage Studies Association (AHSA.)She was later elected as an Elder to the AHSA Board of Directors. She also received an award from the Society of Ethiopian Established in Diaspora (SEED) for Excellence in African Education.

Mrs. Ford was a mother, teacher, sister and friend. She is addressed as Teacher Tilliqua (Great Teacher) within the Ethiopian community. Mrs.Forddied on January 15, 1995 at the Howard University Hospital in Washington, D.C. In accordance with her will, she was buried in AddisAbaba, Ethiopia. The inscription on her tomb reads:

Oh Ethiopia!
To thee she was called by dutyWith thee she toiled for libertyWith thine she cast her destinyIn thee she rests with dignity. Rest In Eternal Peace

Sudanese official says working with TPLF to acquire territoriesfrom Ethiopia (Sudan Tribune of January 18, 2016)
TPLF/EPRDF officials have been saying that there is no Ethiopian land given to Sudan. But according to the following Sudan Tribunereport, Sudan says it is working with TPLF in acquiring territories from Ethiopia.

January 17, 2016 (KHARTOUM) -
The technical committee tasked with redrawing the border between Sudanand Ethiopia said it would complete its work on the ground during this year. In November 2014, Ethiopia's Prime Minister Hailemariam Desalegn and Sudan's President Omer al-Bashir instructed their foreign ministers toset up a date for resuming borders demarcation after it had stopped following the death of Ethiopia's former Prime Minister, Meles Zenawi.

The head of the technical committee Abdalla al-Sadig told the semi-officialSudan Media Center (SMC) that the border demarcation between Sudan and Ethiopia doesn't face any problems. He pointed out that the length of the border with Ethiopia is about 725 km, saying the process of demarcation is proceeding properly. Farmers from two sides of the border between Sudan and Ethiopia used to dispute the ownership of land in the Al-Fashaga area located in the south-eastern part of Sudan's eastern stateof Gedaref. Al-Fashaga covers an area of about 250 square kilometers andit has about 600.000 acres of fertile lands. Also there are river systems flowing across the area including Atbara, Setait and Baslam rivers.

On Saturday, Sudan's foreign minister Ibrahim Ghandour told the Qatar- based Aljazeera TV that Sudan and Ethiopia are working together to curb the activities of Ethiopian gangs inside Sudanese territory. He stressed that Al-Fashaga is a Sudanese territory, saying the government allowed Ethiopia farmers to cultivate its land as part of the cooperation between the two countries. "However, Ethiopia is committed and acknowledges that [Al-Fashaga] is a Sudanese territory," he said. Ghandour pointed to joint meetings between the two countries at the level of the presidency todiscuss borders issues.

Sudan's Gadarif and Blue Nile states border Ethiopia's Amhara region. Theborders between Sudan and Ethiopia were drawn by the British and Italian colonisers in 1908. The two governments have agreed in the past to redraw the borders, and to promote joint projects between people fromboth sides for the benefit of local population. However, the Ethiopian opposition accuses the ruling party of abandoning Ethiopian territory toSudan. (Text ends)

The use of illicit drugs in Ethiopia

A Remark Motivated by the NDAFW Observance in U.S.

By Worku Abebe (PhD) (February 5, 2016)

Illicit drugs are substances that are available through illegal means. In other words, these are drugs that are illegal to produce, sell/supply or use. This categorization is based on scientific, medical and socioeconomicjustifications and has generally universal acceptability. Almost all known illicit drugs are mind-altering substances that do not have any currently accepted medical use. Following consumption, these drugs interact with brain pathways involved in reward and reinforcement responses, producing a sense of pleasure/euphoria, at least initially. Their continued use, in most cases, results in the development tolerance, dependence andaddiction. Cessation of consumption after chronic consumption usually leads to multiple unpleasant withdrawal/abstinence syndromes, and this isone of the driving factors for the continued use of these drugs, irrespective of consequences. In addition to effects in the brain, each of the illicit drugs also causes a number of other harmful effects on other organs of the body (eg., heart, intestine, reproductive organs), sometimeswith fatal consequences. Beyond inducing unwanted effects on individual users, illicit drugs also have considerable negative impacts on other individuals and the society at large. Research has shown that the types and quantities of illicit of drugs used by consumers and the effects they produce can vary from place to place and with time. For instance, the useof the drugs, cannabis/marijuana, heroin, cocaine and ecstasy in the US has been all time high during the past several years, resulting in greater adverse effects relative to previous years. Some authorities believe that this scenario has a share of contribution to the medical, economic and social ills that the country is currently experiencing. That said, what is the situation of illicit drugs in Ethiopia? More specifically, what are the drugs considered illicit, where are they produced, who consume them and is there trafficking issues?

As with many other things, information on illicit drug use and trafficking inEthiopia is generally scanty and largely remains vague. The discussion here is based on the best available estimates and should be interpreted with this shortcoming in mind.

Reports from different sources indicate that drugs that are categorized illicit in most other countries are also found in Ethiopia and these include cannabis, khat, heroin and cocaine. However, while cannabis, heroin andcocaine are also considered illegal in Ethiopia, khat is not. Since there is strong evidence to classify khat as illicit, the lack of this consideration in Ethiopia is puzzling. Many believe that, coupled with the negligent attitude of the TPLF government regarding the well-being of the Ethiopianpeople, this decision is largely politically and economically motivated. Based on available scientific evidence and the overwhelming recognition of khat as an elicit substance by the global community, in thisarticle, the use of khat in Ethiopia is, quite rightly, considered illegal.

Cannabis

In most urban centers of Ethiopia, cannabis is more commonly known as hashish, but this actually refers to marijuana. In some rural or traditionalcommunities, it is also referred to as by the Amarigna/Geez name, etse- faris, a name which is sometimes confused with that of Datura stramonium (Jimson weed). Marijuana is a “preparation” made from the dried leaves, twigs and flower parts of the cannabis plant; it is consumed by inhalation as smoke. Similar to the classification in most other countries with functional regulatory systems in place, marijuana/hashish/cannabis is also considered illegal in Ethiopia.

Accordingly, the Ethiopian federal drug law lists penalties for illegal production, use or sell/supply of cannabis. However, despite this law, thepossession or use of cannabis in present-day Ethiopia seems to be prevalent and widely socially accepted.

The cannabis plant in Ethiopia is reported to grow in many places across awide range of geography. More notably, it is cultivated in Alemaya, Shebendia, Shashemene and Debre Berehan areas. Among all the places,of special interest is the cultivation of cannabis in the Shashemene area which was offered by Emperor Haile Selassie in 1966 to Rasteferians of Jamaican origin. Since then, this area has been recognized for its ties to Rasteferianism and for the production and quality of its cannabis. In mostof these places, however, cannabis is usually cultivated in inaccessible locations where enforcement of laws is difficult to achieve. Such places include those which had never traditionally cultivated the plant. There is also evidence that some cannabis is smuggled into Ethiopia from West Africa by traffickers.

Although most of the cannabis production in Ethiopia is meant for localuse, some of it is trafficked to outside (mainly to UK) by air, the vast majority being sent via the Ethiopian postal service.

Different reports indicate that, cannabis, in the form of marijuana, is used by a wide range of the Ethiopian population for different purposes. The UN Office on Drugs and Crime has reported a prevalence of 2.6% cannabisuse for adult Ethiopians for the year 2008. Other studies also have documented that the recreational use of cannabis by the Ethiopian youth, including students, has dramatically increased in recent years, particularly in urban communities. For a small proportion of the rural population, cannabis is useful as a medicinal and recreational substance. Still for some others, it is a source of extra income because of the increased demands both in the cities and from traffickers operating in the rural areas. In view of the documented ritual use of cannabis by the Coptic Church of Alexandria, it is also believed that elements of this tradition stillexist in the Ethiopian Orthodox Tewahedo Church.

What does cannabis do to the human brain and behavior? Pharmacologically, many authorities classify cannabis as a hallucinogenic substance with mixed effects. The major compound (active ingredient) that enables cannabis to produce effects in the brain is delta-9- tetrahydrocannabionol (THC). The immediate effects include euphoria, a sense of relaxation, mood changes, increased appetite, reduced thinking capacity, suspicion and paranoia, and impairment of motion coordination.With higher doses, cannabis may also cause hallucinations, delusions, agitation and feeling of panic, especially in venerable individuals. Regularuse of cannabis for a prolonged period leads to a lack of motivation and poor performance in school as well as in work place. Individuals with problems of cannabis use usually look tired with no desire to work on a regular basis; they are also less concerned about their appearance or even life. In users with psychosis susceptibility, high doses of cannabis for a long duration may trigger psychotic episodes. Abstinence from cannabis can cause a range of symptoms including sleep disturbances, insomnia, irritability, restlessness, excessive sweating, nausea, diarrhea and lack of appetite, among several others. For most consumers, these unpleasant withdrawal experiences can be a cause for continued use of the substance, whatever the cost may be.

Khat

Khat is a popular stimulant plant widely grown and used in Ethiopia and neighboring countries. It is commonly known as chaat in Amarigna. It is grown, distributed and consumed in Ethiopia without regulatory oversight. The use of khat has deep-rooted cultural and social tradition insome Ethiopian communities, particularly among the Muslim population. Ethiopia, besides being a major khat producer, is believed tobe the pioneer of its consumption. The plant is typically consumed by chewing the leaves and swallowing the juicy product. While the reasons for the use of khat can vary from individual to individual, the plant is generally recognized as a stimulant of the brain, with abuse potentials, and a number of other unwanted effects.

From published research results and general observations, it is clear that the use of khat in Ethiopia has become a growing problem in recent years,especially among the younger generation, including high school and college students. Three major factors are believed to contribute to this observation: (1) absence of regulation of the production, distribution and use of khat, despite its well-documented harmful effects; (2) lack of sufficient awareness of consumers about the harmful effects khat; and (3)push by the TPLF government and its beneficiary collaborators (more notably Dr. Ezekiel Gebissa of Kettering University, who wrote a promotional book on khat some years ago), for increased production and consumption of khat for economic and political self-interest.

Even more alarming is that, beyond the traditionally recognized places, the availability and use of khat have spread out of Ethiopia to other parts of the world due to the recent explosion of migration of young people fromEthiopia and neighboring countries and improved transport systems for khat smuggling. Accordingly, the drug is now more commonly used in North America, Europe and Australia, where it is largely considered illegal. Khat being among the top five exports of Ethiopia, the TPLF government has become a beneficiary of this illegal activity through population displacement. From most of the evidence reviewed thus far, itappears that the policy of the government and its collaborators is a majorfactor for the problem khat in Ethiopia and elsewhere around the world.

The differences in drugs laws implemented for khat regulation in Ethiopiaand in most other parts of the world have created a situation that encourages the illegal trafficking of khat from Ethiopia to prohibited countries in Europe and North America. While engagement in such an illegal practice has become profitable for some, it has caused disastrous outcomes for many others, such as serving jail times, paying huge fins and facing deportations. Even worth, for some khat-related crimes, associations have been implicated with international terrorist organizations.

Khat’s brain stimulating effects come mainly from its constituent compound known as cathinone, which resembles amphetamine. Classifiedas Schedule I drug, cathinone is an illicit substance in the US, and other countries. Shortly after chewing, khat induces euphoria, wakefulness, mydriais and increased energy, primarily as a consequence its action in the brain. With continued use, it also causes reduced appetite, increased body temperature, constipation, paranoia, sleeplessness and aggressiveness. Prolonged consumption further leads to a range of symptoms that include depression, anxiety, irritability, anger, sleep disturbance, fatigue, suspiciousness, hallucinations, panic attacks, and suicidal thoughts. With cessation of consumption after chronic use, like most other psychotropic drugs, khat causes withdrawal effects which are at least associated with depression, sadness, lethargy, reduced social interactions and vivid unpleasant dreams. The appearance of these symptoms is a major factor for persistent consumption of khat by chronic consumers.

Of additional note is that the consumption of khat in Ethiopia is usuallyassociated with the concomitant use of other mind-altering substances, such as alcohol and tobacco smoke. Several research studies have reported a link between the use of khat and sexually transmitted diseases,including HIV, and this is suggested to be more directly linked to the consumption of alcohol that usually follows khat sessions.

Heroin

Heroin is an opiate (a narcotic analgesic) derived from morphine, a drugobtained from the opium poppy plant. It is highly addictive and widely held as one of the most destructive illicit drugs in the world. Presently, the vast majority of the world's heroin originates in the war-ravaged country, Afghanistan, corresponding to the cultivation and harvesting ofopium poppies. Another big player in the global heroin market is Myanmar (formerly Burma) in Asia.

Ethiopia has increasingly become a transit hub for heroin originating in Southwest and Southeast Asia, and destined for Europe. This popularity of the country as a route for drug trafficking is due to its convenient location, suitable air service, limited law enforcement and likely conflict ofinterest.

In addition, limited poppy cultivation has been reported in the southwest part of Ethiopia for local consumption of poppy seeds. There are also reports that at least some of the poppy fields have recently been eradicated by police. Whether or not this approach has significant impacton the overall heroin problem in the country is unclear. Other news sources, such as The UN Office on Drugs and Crime, have also reported the use of opiates/heroin per se in Ethiopia, especially in the Addis Abeba. There is now a concern that opioid consumption in Ethiopia is likely to increase in the future partly because of the country's location on major trafficking routes into Europe and the ineffectiveness of the local regulatory and control systems.

Cocaine

Cocaine is a stimulant derived from the leaves of the coca plant which is widely cultivated in South America. It is one of the most sought-after andfought-over drugs in the world. It was reported to have been used by an estimated 17 million people worldwide in 2009. For cocaine, Ethiopia is also considered a transit hub from West Africa destined for markets in Europe and southern Africa. AS yet, no reports are available suggesting the cultivation on coca (Erythroxylum coca) in Ethiopia.

Other related drugs

The UN Office on Drugs and Crime has reported amphetamine use by adult Ethiopians in 2008 at a prevalence rate of 0.3%. It appears thatthis compound is manufactured elsewhere in Africa and smuggled into Ethiopia. Furthermore, methamphetamine made in West Africa (notablyin Nigeria) usually finds their way to East Africa for marketing. Both of these synthetic drugs are powerful brain stimulants with potencies muchgreater than that of khat. The compounds are highly addictive and theirchronic consumption is usually associated with considerable withdrawal syndromes.

Concluding Remarks

As in many other developing countries, the use of mind-altering substances in Ethiopia is becoming an increasing problem, particularly among the younger generation in urban environments. This includes the consumption of illicit drugs, such as cannabis, khat, heroin and cocaine, among others. The problem is compounded by the cultivation and trafficking of these substances into and out of Ethiopia and by the lack ofeffective regulatory mechanisms and support system from the TPLF government in power and other institutions. The Ethiopian people have no choice but to take more personal responsibilities to protection themselves from the harmful effects of illicit drugs and other similar substances. This can be achieved through education, respecting legitimate drug laws, cooperative efforts, and seeking help from reliable provider(s).

U.S. Department of State increasingly concerned by stifling ofindependent voices in Ethiopia

U.S. Department of State press release

U.S. Department of State logoThe United States is increasingly concerned by the continued stifling of independent voices in Ethiopia, including the detention of Oromo political party leaders. These arrests have a chilling effect on much needed public consultations to resolve legitimate political grievances in Oromia. We support the Government of Ethiopia’s Decembercommitment to public consultation with affected communities. For these consultations to be meaningful, all interested parties must be able to express their views freely. We reaffirm our call on the Ethiopian Government to refrain from silencing dissent and to protect the constitutionally enshrined rights of all citizens, including the right to gather peacefully, to write, and to speak freely as voices of a diverse nation. We call for the release of those imprisoned for exercising their rights, such as political party leaders and journalists.

Historian, journalist and diplomat Zewede Retta passed away

By Arefayné Fantahun Thursday, October 8th, 2015

Outstanding Ethiopia historian, journalist and diplomat Zewede Retta passed away yesterday in London at the age of 81, Ethiopia Observer haslearnt. Zewde who was considered a great historian of modern Ethiopia, and a commentator on social affairs was on vacation in the United Kingdom. He was taken to hospital by ambulance, after he fell down on the street in London. He died at the hospital.

Ethiopian Ambassador to Italy and Tunisia, wrote two important books on the life and times of Haile Selassie and another on the question of Eritrea.Born in Addis Ababa, Young Zewde went to French Lycée Guebre-Mariam, where he completed his primary and secondary education. According to his biography in Amazon, he began his professional career at the Ministry of Information in 1952 and became the youngest news correspondent for Ethiopian radio as well as press correspondent to the Emperor's palace. "He then spent four years at the school of journalism in Paris where he graduated in 1959. Soon after he became editor in chief for the newspaper The Voice of Ethiopia and for Menen magazine," the bio reads. Throughout the 50's and 60's he held numerous positions including deputyinformation minister, chief director of the Ethiopian news agency and President of the Pan African News Agency. In 1969 he was appointed to the foreign office and assigned as minister counselor to the Ethiopian Embassy in Paris, it was stated.

"His diplomatic ability enabled him first to become deputy foreign ministerand later ambassador of Ethiopia to Italy and Tunisia for the Emperor's government. Overall he had a twenty two years career in the government of Emperor Haile Selassie until the military takeover of Ethiopia by Mengistu. The change of government and the uncertainty about Ethiopia'sfuture forced him to stay in exile in Italy where he joined the UN Agency IFAD (International Fund for Agricultural Development), headquartered in Rome, where he served as Chief of Protocol and Secretary for Member State," Amazon posted on its page. In Ethiopia, anger over corruption and farmland development runsdeep

Despite the government ending plans to build on Oromo land around thecapital, clashes continue, as lack of transparency and maladministration fuel dissent

William Davison, (Monnday 18 January)

Two years ago, on the edge of Chitu in Ethiopia's unsettled Oromia region,local officials told Chamara Mamoye his farmland might be developed when the small town expanded. He hasn't heard anything since. "Losing the land would be a big problem for me, but if the government forces us, we can't do anything," the father-of-five says outside his compound. Last month, Chamara, 45, saw the bodies of two protesters lying on the road after demonstrations rocked Chito. The dead were among up to 140 people killed by security forces during region-wide protests triggered by claims of injustice and marginalisation from the nation's largest ethnic group, the Oromo.

Bolstered by US-based social media activists, the protest movement coalesced around opposition to a government plan to integrate the capital,Addis Ababa, with surrounding Oromo towns. After weeks of protests, the ruling coalition in the Oromia region said last week that it wascancelling the planned expansion. Protests, however, go on, and the roots of popularunease and anger in Oromia run much deeper. Dissatisfaction with corruption, mal-administration and inadequate consultations on investments are fuelling dissent. This patchwork of grievances presents a fundamental challenge to an authoritarian government aiming to rapidly transform Ethiopia from an agrarian society to an industrial powerhouse. And the discontent is a national issue.

Urban expansion is causing clashes across the country as investors, officials and farmers protect their interests, says Seyoum Teshome, a lecturer at Ambo University. “The villagers who have been asking for basicservices and infrastructure rush to sell their farmland at market rate before it is expropriated at low rates of compensation,” he says.

As all land is state-owned in Ethiopia, houses are rapidly built on the edgeof towns without official permission, to give plots value, Seyoum says.
Investors may bribe corrupt officials to formalise illegal transfers, causing anger among dispossessed farmers, he adds. Chamara was not among themostly youthful protesters who took to the streets in Chitu, but he shares their concerns about an unresponsive ruling system. He’s frustrated by repeatedly broken official promises to tarmac the main road that runs through Chitu. Although the area has electricity and a mobile-phone signal, he is disappointed with the rate of progress since the government came to power 25 years ago. “There is no big development considering the time they had,” he says. He is also upset by a lack of information and consultation over land policies, as well as concerned by suspicions of corruption – though officials do not flaunt ill-gotten gains. “The corruption is done in a secret way. It’s a silent killer,” he said.

In elections last May, Ethiopia’s ruling coalition and allied parties won all547 seats in the federal parliament and 100% of legislative positions in nine regional councils. Despite the result, the government acknowledgedwidespread dissatisfaction with the quality of public administration and levels of corruption. “In many areas, personnel said to be involved in massive corruption that led to sudden outbursts of anger are being dismissed,” government spokesman Getachew Reda said in an interviewlast week. One of the deadliest incidents last month took place in Wolisotown, about113km south-west of Addis Ababa. Six protesters were killedby security forces after thousands of people from surrounding villages took to the streets to protest over planned expansion of the town.

A group of young Oromo, who had gathered next to the Walga river a fewmiles from Woliso, spoke of community fears of evictions and poor compensation. But nobody seemed to know anything specific about government plans. “The government does not discuss in detail. They do not have consent,” one said. Ethiopia has long been a darling of the international donor community, which has appeared willing to ignore its poor record on human rights because high growth rates over the past decade have delivered some development goals. But the Oromo protests illustrate the vulnerabilities of this strategy.

To the north of Chitu, at Wenchi, which boasts a spectacular crater lake popular with tourists, grievances are almost tangible. Soldiers are still in town and, as elsewhere, the authorities have arrested people suspected ofinvolvement in the protests. While some seem cowed by the crackdown, Rabuma Terefa is not.

His friend was shot in the leg on the edge of Chitu as he marched with other protesters from Wenchi. When an elite military unit told elders the protesters must turn back, the group refused, arguing they had a constitutional right to peacefully demonstrate, said Rabuma. Within minutes, soldiers opened fire, killing people, including Birhanu Dinka, whowas leading the crowd at that moment. “They did not say anything, they just pointed the guns at us. We were begging them not to kill us,” Rabuma, 27, says. While abuses may have occurred, security forces aretold to protect civilian lives, according to Getachew.

It is not only lives at stake: around the time of the protests in Wenchi, theproperty of a Dutch agricultural company, Solagrow, was torched by hundreds of people. Rabuma says the investment angered locals as it fenced off 100 hectares of prime communal grazing land, leased by the government. Solagrow says community relations were healthy and the valley was waterlogged until they drained it.

The project was collateral damage of the political dispute, according to manager Jan van de Haar. “[The protesters] became angry and they saidthere was only one way to continue, and that’s our farm, because we’re the only investment in that place,” he says. The attack destroyed $300,000-worth of machinery and potato seeds. Rabuma had no sympathy for Solagrow, which he says was complicit in the government’soppression of the Oromo. He is instead focused on the struggle ahead.

In Chitu, Chamara speaks for many Oromo as he implores the government to better manage investments and urban sprawl. “No one is opposing the development of the city, but it should not be at the expenseof farmers’ lives,” he says. This article was amended on 18 January 2016to correct the spelling of Chitu.

Why Ethiopia is making a historic ‘master plan’ U-turn
By Mathias Muindi BBC Monitoring 18 January 2016

NEWS ANALYSIS & UPDATES

A controversial plan by the Ethiopian government to expand the capital, Addis Ababa, is set to be scrapped after a key member of the ruling coalition withdrew its support. The expansion plan sparked deadly violencein the central-southern state of Oromia, which surrounds Addis Ababa.

Rights groups say that at least 150 protesters have died and another 5,000 have been arrested by security forces. Similar protests in May 2014left dozens of protesters dead. Prime Minister Hailemariam Desalegn had vowed on 16 December that his government would be "merciless" towardsthe protesters, who he described as "anti-peace forces".

However in a surprising move, the Oromo People's Democratic Organisation (OPDO) said on 12 January that it had resolved to "fully terminate" the plan after a three-day meeting. Rejection of official plansby government members is unprecedented in Ethiopia.

It is also historic, as it could be seen as acknowledging the legitimacy ofthe protests. Any form of development the world over is going to upset someone, and the Ethiopian authorities have always said they would consult communities before bulldozing ahead. But many Oromos, especially in the rural areas, view the expansion as a ploy by other ethnicgroups, especially the Tigray and Amhara, to uproot them from their fertile lands under the guise of development.

The Oromo, who constitute about 40% of Ethiopia's 100 million inhabitants, frequently complain that the government is dominated by theTigray and Amhara who hail from north of the capital. The governing coalition - the Ethiopian People's Revolutionary Democratic Front (EPRDF)
- has not yet issued an official statement on the future of its so-called "master plan" for Addis Ababa's expansion. But the extensive coverage ofthe OPDO statement by the tightly controlled state TV and pro-government websites indicates that the authorities will abandon it.

Ten armed rebellions

It is also surprising that the OPDO publicly expressed its condolences tobereaved families and pledged to assist those who lost property in the protests.

Such promises signal the depth of concern within the OPDO over the long-term impact of the protests. The country's political stability is fragile and itfaces numerous domestic and international disputes.

Ethiopia has up to 10 domestic armed rebellions, mainly in the regions of Oromia, Tigray and Amhara and Gambella to the west. There is also long-standing rebel activity in the south-eastern state of Somali, also known asOgaden. Besides the border dispute with Eritrea, which sparked a 1999- 2000 war, the country shares volatile borders with Somalia and South Sudan. Pacification of the country's largest ethnic group removes one headache for the authorities. Continuing the crackdown might have spurred Oromos to join rebel groups active in their region.

As long ago as 2002, late Prime Minister Meles Zenawi said Oromo students and opposition activists presented the most serious threat to hisgovernment. So in the face of the large Oromo constituency, the OPDO realised that supporting the master plan undermined its grassroots support and influence within the EPRDF.

Political maturity

It is unclear what impact the move will have on the economy, which is oneof the fastest growing in Africa. Part of this growth is fuelled by state investment in large infrastructural projects. Despite the impressive development, Ethiopia is ranked 173 out of the 187 nations surveyed in the last UN Human Development Index and has high poverty indexes, mainly related to the rising population.

This has put immense pressure on Ethiopia's natural resources, includingland, which has become a flashpoint. Most of Ethiopia's population is based in the rural areas and engaged in subsistence farming.

The state owns the land, leaving little incentive for farmers to engage in economically viable farming. Some of the best land has also been leased to foreigners, further fuelling the tensions. While shelving the plan would be a major retreat for the government, it is a sign of political maturity of the EPRDF, which has consistently been accused by rights groups of beingheavy-handed towards dissent since coming to power in 1991.

The step, even if temporary, also removes the rug from under the feet ofits numerous critics and will earn it political goodwill from Ethiopia's international supporters, including Western donors. BBC Monitoring reports and analyses news from TV, radio, web and print media around the world.

LEGEND PEOPLE: Who was Laureate Tsegaye Gebremedhin? Tsegaye Gabre-Medhin Robba Qawessa, from an Oromo family, was born in Boda, near Ambo, western Shoa region of Ethiopia, while still at elementary school he wrote a play called "King Dionysus and the Two Brothers" and saw it staged in the presence, among others, of the Emperor Haile Selassie. Tsegaye later attended the prestigious British Council-supported General Wingate school – named after British officer Colonel Orde Wingate. He subsequently attended the Commercial school in Addis Ababa, where he won a scholarship to Blackstone School of Law in Chicago in 1959. In 1960 he travelled to Europe to study experimental drama at the Royal Court Theatre in London and the Comédie-Française inParis. Upon returning to Ethiopia, he devoted himself to managing and developing the Ethiopian National Theater – which institution staged an impressive memorial for its former director.

CRITICISM

The final days of the evil TPLF (Woyane) (PERSPECTIVE By Yilma Bekele December 16, 2015)
We are entering a new and turbulent phase in Ethiopian politics. This isthe first time our country has gone for long without a ‘strong’ Leader atthe center. Dear old Meles is the last of the ruthless breed that left our country saddled with poverty of mind, education and void of a positive outlook on life. How do we wean ourselves from this dependence to be bossed around and be humiliated by self appointed leaders is a good question.

Today the TPLF core is in disarray. The house of cards they built is crumbling down from the inside. Famine, unemployment, inflation are decimating our people. On many occasions brave Ethiopians have attempted to take matters into their hands. We have sacrificed plenty of beautiful Ethiopians to Woyane killers. Like most us I can recite names and places where our friends, leaders and righteous Ethiopians have fallento Woyane professional killers.We are still working hard to liberate our political prisoners in Woyane dungeons public and private. Again I can recite the names and years my Ethiopian brother and sister are kept inthe dark even not allowed visit by family and friends.

Today I am not lamenting over the thirty years of atrocity by a few criminals that assumed power under murky condition. I have no time to dwell on that. There always is a time and place for everything. I have been watching the deteriorating condition in our motherland. I am both happy and saddened by the news. I am sad because so many of our young people are getting killed by Woyane troops. Our towns and villages are in turmoil affecting the peace of our people. It is a very stressful moment for our family that live from day to day.

I am also empowered when I see the gallant students standing up for the cause they believe and doing it in such a graceful way. Our Oromo brothers and sisters are doing what is expected of a conscious human being – saying no to injustice. Woyane philosophy, Woyane logic, Woyane propaganda has at last hit a brick wall. People hare taking power away from Woyane appointed thugs. In Oromia region of Chelia OPDO cadres and the police have removed their uniform and joined the people. This is just one instance. It is exactly why the Woyane regime is using helicoptersto transport troops because trust with the local officials is no more. May I remind you that the regime did not use any helicopter to transport food and medicine for people in dire situation due to lack of food. This in a nutshell is the character of the Ethiopian dictators.

Woyanes are reduced to house imprisoning their junior partners and confiscating their phones. The Kilil bosses are at a loss. The Oromo and Amhara anointed leaders are squirming like the rat they are. Reminds oneof South Africa during its dying days. The Bantustans were where the fearof retribution was felt the most. It is curious the President of Oromia has nothing to say while his Kilil is burning. What do you expect for a person that owes his position to no other than our billionaire Sheikh. Like the infamous Ugandan dictator Idi Amin I see Muktar in Saudi Arabia when the time comes.

The famine is showing what a farce Woyane TPLF played on the world withtheir hollow elections and phony growth statistics. It is a cruel and inhuman game that was played with the lives of our people. Today Woyane would rather have millions suffer than admit ‘in one of the fastestgrowing economies in the world’ human beings are dying due to lack of food. Famine does not distinguish ethnic afflation. Some like puppet Muktar would like to reduce the current movement into a simple issue of disagreement over the so-called ‘Master Plan.’ That is not true friend Muktar. The “Master Plan’ ignited the deep resentment thatwas boiling and churning all over Ethiopia. Woyane has been stealing landsince they assumed power and much more aggressively since the 2005 Election. So you see it is not just about land. It is about power if you really want me to say it out loud. Who has it, how was it acquired andhow is it used is the fundamental question here.

Right now TPLF has the power, it was acquired illegally by manipulating elections and is being used to take land away and reduce people to second-class citizens in their own land. That is what the Oromos and the rest of Ethiopians are asking – the power to decide for themselves. Today is a beautiful day in Ethiopia. Our people are asking this question in a loudmanner. Our children are dying for asking this question.outside are working together to challenge dictatorship more than ever. Attack on one is considered as attack on all. All Ethiopians are incensed about the use oflethal force on peaceful students and their families. They are marching in protest in all major Metropolitan areas. We have learnt from Gambela, we saw what happened in Gura Fereda and we witnessed Beneshangul. We recognized our silence emboldened the rude regime and we are saying no more.

We are going to ask foreign governments that sell such lethal weapon to the rouge regime to use their influence and stop dictators from using it onour people. We are going to write our representatives in Congress to use the power of foreign aid to curb the blood thirsty regime from using donated weapon, troop carriers and other war stuff on our people.

Right now the Ethiopian people are on the move. We ask their children notto go to Ethiopia this holiday season. We ask our friends, family and supporters to stop feeding Woyane killers' hard currency. The so-called 'Master Plan' is a scheme to take land away from ordinary farmers and sellit to the Diaspora. Buying that land is as criminal as the original robbery. It is a morally bankrupt deed. It is also a fool's decision becausethere is no guarantee it would be there tomorrow. If you really think the poor farmers is going away that easy then you got some reckoning to do not in the distant future.

ARCHIVE: What Is Behind the Oromo Rebellion in Ethiopia?

The Huffingtonpost (December 22, 2015)

By Yohannes Woldemariam (Associate Professor of International Relationsand Environmental Studies at Fort Lewis College)

The Ethiopian government is now faced with unprecedented rebellion fromthe Oromo ethnic group, consisting 35% of the Ethiopia's population, which it disingenuously claims is inspired by terrorism. The immediate pretext is the Addis Ababa Master Plan encroaching and displacing Oromo farmers, but this masks a deeper grievance which has been brewing for atleast two decades under this regime, and for over a century under successive highland Ethiopian rulers. In the following, I will try to provide some context and offer some analysis of the danger Ethiopia and the region are facing.

Background

The late Ethiopian Prime Minster, Meles Zenawi, achieved power in May 1991 as "the first among equals" in a ruling coalition. After the 1998-2000"border war" with Eritrea, he moved to consolidate his power by rewardingloyalists and weakening or imprisoning his rivals. Meles institutionalized one-party rule of the Tigray People's Liberation Front (TPLF) and his Tigrayan inner circle, with the participation of other co-opted ethnic elites who were brought into the ruling alliance under the Ethiopian People's Revolutionary Democratic Front (EPRDF).

The EPRDF consists of four groups: the Oromo Peoples' Democratic Organization (OPDO), the Amhara National Democratic Movement (ANDM), the South Ethiopian Peoples' Democratic Front (SEPDF) and the Tigrayan Peoples' Liberation Front (TPLF). The Oromo Liberation Front (OLF) decided to withdraw from the EPRDF coalition in 1992 and was pushed out after unsuccessfully trying to assert its independence from theTPLF within the coalition. The role of OPDO, ANDM and SEPDF is simply to rubber stamp TPLF's agenda. In North American parlance, one can describe the members of OPDO, ANDM and SEPDF as the uncle Toms of Ethiopian society.

Zenawi's violent crackdown on the 2005 demonstrations protesting the widely believed rigged election was a clear indication of his determinationto hang on to power. In the 2010 elections, the EPRDF won 499 out of 547 parliamentary seats — with all but two others going to EPRDF-allied parties — and all but one of 1,904 council seats in regional elections.

Despite the semblance of parliamentary rule, those elected were irrelevantto the governance of the country, since the TPLF and PM Zenawi maintained near absolute control over the country's politics.

If there was any doubt in 2005, in the 2010 and 2015 elections, it becameclear that this was a one-party rule with a vengeance, ensuring the triumph of repression, the squashing of dissenting voices and the shuttingdown of independent media. Elections in Ethiopia are shenanigans to showcomplete EPRDF control rather than engagement in democracy. There is aclampdown on internet access, and the arrest and sentencing of political opponents and journalists. Even two Swedish journalistsreporting in the Ogaden were imprisoned on terrorism charges.

Succession Not Transition

here was a speculation that Meles's passing in august 2012 could touch off an internal power struggle expected to take place within the ranks of his loyalists. But the succession of a new prime minister turned out to be an uneventful affair and at least outwardly peaceful. The number of Tigrayans in the cabinet decreased, but key posts remain in thehands of aging Tigrayan loyalists. The talk of “generational change” over the past few years was simply a charade.

Among the exceptions is the current PM Hailemariam Desalegn, the relatively unknown ex-Deputy Prime Minister. Desalegn’s ethnicity gives asuperficial semblance of balance and cover for the Tigrayan oligarchy.
Desalegn is a Wolayta, a somewhat marginalized ethnicity in the peripheryof Ethiopian society, and a born-again Christian in a country where the dominant church is Ethiopian Orthodox. He never participated in the armed struggle that brought the various factions of the EPRDF to power.
His status as an outsider was perceived by many to be an asset that gavehim broader legitimacy, insulated him from criticism, and allowed him to present himself as an underdog protected from the historical baggage of the Amhara and Tigrayans.

Yet, in his three years in power, Desalegn has announced few new policies. Some suggest that he is a mere figurehead and that real power isstill within a core TPLF group shadowing him. In any case, party leaders seem lost without Zenawi. They govern on autopilot, following the vision and templates he left behind. In effect, Zenawi is ruling from the grave.
Yet developments like the Oromo uprising expose the limits of ruling fromthe grave. Regime officials seem confused. Different officials say differentthings and contradict each other. They look like deer caught in the headlights. As is often the case, oppressors are blind to what they perpetrate on their victims and surprised when the oppressed rise up defiantly.

Resistance to EPRDF Rule

While opposition and discontent have been growing in Ethiopia, the security apparatus is ever vigilant against them . Rioting Muslims were effectively contained. The TPLF marginalized both the legal and the extra-legal opposition, leaving little option but to protest as in the current Oromo uprising. The few co-opted Oromo elites within the EPRDF have little credibility, and protesters scoff at statements coming from Oromo leaders serving the regime.

Other ethnic groups deeply dissatisfied are the Ogadenis, Gambella andBenishangul-Gumuz. The Ogaden national liberation Front (ONLF) in Ogaden is waging an insurgency exacerbated by forcible relocations to allow oil and gas exploration. Similar insurgency rages in Oromia led bythe Oromo Liberation Front (OLF). Oromia was incorporated into the Ethiopian empire in the 1880s by emperor Menelik IIduring the time theEuropean scramble for Africa was underway.

Resentment to TPLF rule extends even among parts of Tigray, where a part of the population feel left out by the TPLF elites interested only in making money and investing it in the capital or abroad. The EPRDF has unsuccessfully lobbied the U.S. government to label the ONLF and the OLFas terrorist organizations. Nevertheless, the controversial use and abuse of the Anti-Terrorism Law is applied with impunity. The government attributes the ongoing Muslim and Oromo protest to infiltration from SaudiArabia, Eritrea and the opposition Ginbot 7 movement.

Despite a dishonest attempt to externalize the issue, Ethiopian Muslims, who number anywhere from 40% to 50% of the population, and the Oromo have historically been marginalized, and the protest is very muchhomegrown and rooted in a long list of grievances.

Ethiopia, the U.S. and its Western Allies

Ethiopia is a key strategic ally for the War on Terror, which insulates it from any UScondemnation. Ethiopia receives the largest aid in Africa — anaverage $3.3 billionper year. The government abuses aid money to the extent that even government-provided seeds and fertilizer is denied to farmers who are not party members. Regarding the current uprising, the United States has issued a statement of concern. However, the regime itself is noticably unconcerned because it knows these statements by the U.S. are accompanied by little or no action. Even the African Union, withits headquarter in Addis Ababa, while rightly concerned about a potentialgenocide inBurundi, is conspicuously silent on the massacre taking placeagainst the Oromo right on its doorstep.

The late Zenawi had the wit to position himself as an indispensable ally ofthe West in the fight against "terrorism." Ethiopia is seen as a bulwark against extremism and the chaos of Somalia. From the U.S. point of view,Ethiopia is a military bridgehead to contain Al Qaida infiltration in Somaliaand even across the Red Sea in Yemen.

International aid subsidizes about 50 % of Ethiopia's national budget. United Kingdom funding of $4.9billion for a brutal resettlement scheme was only withdrawn this year. Germany continues to aid Ethiopia for "strategic" reasons despite voicing concern about human rights violations.The regime has deepened its economic relationship with China (which is tight-lipped on human rights issues) by utilizing its comparative advantage: capitalizing on the availability of plentiful cheap labor and Chinese subsidies for projects encroaching in Oromia.

The Economy

Zenawi engineered Ethiopia's success in securing aid from the European Union and the U.S.; he was adept at maneuvering and securing money from Western financial institutions that even his detractors acknowledge. He counted among his admirers big names such as Professor Jeffrey Sachsof Harvard as well as Professor Joseph Stiglitz of Columbia University and a recipient of the Nobel Prize in Economics. The country's rulers have perfected the culture of begging and dependency and are now appealing for a $1.4 billion to feed the 10.2 million drought victims even though theyengage in the business of leasing fertile land to foreign investors who export everything they grow. Drought does not have to lead to hunger and famine, if a government plans for it. Poor governments can store grain when there is good harvest in preparation for such emergencies.

Consistent with the notion of state-directed developmentalism espoused by the EPRDF, it aspired to oversee the development of roads, rail, electricity and telecommunications, boasting double-digit growth although the IMF disputes those figures and puts the growth rate at 7.5 per cent . It did succeed in Addis Ababa getting sub-Saharan Africa's first light-rail network. However, the government's claim that its socio-economic policieshave helped the poor is disputed by critics, who point out that the primary beneficiaries are the political elite and that the gap between the elites andthe poor is ever wider. The Oromo uprising is partially resentment over displacement and over environmental damage in the name of development.Corruption is rampant in the country. Theft from state enterprises and participation in the black market, including widespread graft is all too common.

Federalism

Ethiopia under the EPRDF was officially declared a federal state. In states with true federalism, regions enjoy political primacy, as it is they who consciously decide to form the state, unlike centralized states where the constituting units come into being in line with EPRDF administrative requirements from the center. The strong center in Ethiopia never allowedfor the true spirit of federalism to emerge. The country could never rid itself of the lingering grievance of the regions, of not getting their share, commensurate with their resources. There is a whole list of such claims, such as, misuse of river waters and cheaply leasing of indigenous land to foreign capitalists, urbanization (as in Addis Ababa's Master Plan), and increasing Deforestation.

The TPLF military and the future

The Ethiopian military as an institution has acquired unprecedented power. Under any conceivable scenario, the military will continue to be a key and decisive player. Yet, it is not a truly national army; at the officercorps level, it is heavily dominated by Tigreans. Historically, the rank andfile soldiers come mostly from the Oromo nation and have been the cannon fodder in the country's numerous wars under Haile Sellassie, Mengistu Hailemariam, and now under the TPLF dictatorship. There is deep grievance within the army resulting in high profile desertions from the Air Force and other branches.

Control of key economic sectors by the military under the EPRDF have made it difficult to limit its role to a strictly military one. The military's rolehas other consequences of spiraling ethnic conflicts which have reached a boiling point in the current uprising. EPRDF rule has engendered profound hatred and resentments among different groups with Ethiopian society and among the former ruling classes of the Amhara ethnic group.
The Ogadenis have a longstanding group grievance that is part and parcelof their indomitable desire for self-determination, which has never been addressed. The current uprising is a culmination of systematic injustice perpetrated against the Oromo. Resistance in Ethiopia in the absence of political space for cross-ethnic alliances is being channeled along ethnic and religious lines, potentially setting the stage for the balkanization of the country. In the 20th century, highland monarchist absolutism, Stalinistdictatorships and today's make-believe "democratic federalism" may contribute more to fragmentation and dismemberment than nation- building. The legacy of dictatorship, from Menelik II, Haile Selassie, Mengistu Hailemariam to Meles Zenawi has endangered the country.
Ethiopia's future is, therefore, clouded with uncertainties. (Text ends)

OROMO PROTEST UPDATES:
Attempted land grab led to violence Ethiopian security forces kill up to 50 people
Ethiopia security forces kill up to 50 people in crackdown onpeaceful protests Attempted land grab by Ethiopian government has led to violenceagainst ethnic group

Michael Day @michael2day
The violence-torn Horn of Africa is seeing a fresh wave of repression asEthiopian authorities crack down on protests by the country's largest ethnic minority.

Human rights groups say an attempted land grab by the federal government has seen violence flare in the Oromia region, with up to 50protesters killed by security forces so far this month. Campaigners fromthe Oromo ethnic group say they have been labelled "terrorists" by Ethiopian authorities as they fight the government's plan to integrate parts of Oromia into the capital Addis Ababa.

Some Oromo protesters fear that they will be forcibly evicted from their land as part of the rapid expansion of the capital, which they call a federal"master plan". The government has claimed that the protesters are planning to "destabilise the country" and that some of them have a "directlink with a group that has been collaborating with other proven terrorist parties".

International observer groups have condemned the violent crackdown on protest movements, however. "Instead of condemning the unlawful killings by the security forces, which have seen the deaths of more than 40 people in the last three weeks, this statement in effect authorises excessive use of force against peaceful protesters," said Muthoni Wanyeki,Amnesty International's regional director for East Africa, the Horn and theGreat Lakes. "The suggestion that these Oromo – protesting against a real threat to their livelihoods – are aligned to terrorists will have a chillingeffect on freedom of expression for rights activists," he said.

The latest round of protests, now in their third week, has seen the federalgovernment mobilise its Special Paramilitary Police units from other states, as well as army units, against the ethnic Oromo people, Ethiopia'sbiggest ethnic group of about 25 million people out of a population of approximately 74 million.

The protests began last month in Ginci, a small town about 50 miles westof Addis Ababa. Initially, campaigners' demands were limited and concerned the fate of a local stadium and the clearing of nearby forest fordevelopment by foreign investors. The uprising spread quickly, however, to more than 130 towns across Oromia. And gruesome images of protesters wounded, or killed by security forces appeared on social mediasites despite deliberate power blackouts and disruption of internet services.

The Prime Minister, Hailemariam Desalegn, said on state television on Wednesday evening that the government knew that "destructive forces are masterminding the violence from the front and from behind". He saidhe would take "merciless legitimate action against any force bent on destabilising the area". The government said that the outlawed Oromo Liberation Front (OLF) was involved.

Ethiopia's anti-terrorism legislation permits the government to useunrestrained force against suspected terrorists, including pre-trial detention of up to four months.

People that have been subject to pre-trial detention under the anti- terrorism law have reported widespread use of torture and ill-treatment.All claims of torture and ill-treatment should be promptly and independently investigated by the authorities.

"The government should desist from using draconian anti-terrorismmeasures to quell protests and instead protect its citizen's right to freedom of expression and peaceful assembly," said Ms Wanyeki.

Since moving into Ethiopia’s highlands in the 1600s, the Oromos have been discriminated against by the ruling Tigray and Amhara classes, whooften saw them as “uncivilised”, according to the historian John Markakis.Source: http://www.independent.co.uk…

ARCHIVES: US National Security Council Press Statement on Ethiopia: Statement by Spokesperson Ned Price on the Arrest ofJournalists in Ethiopia (December 30, 2015)
Having welcomed developments in Ethiopia earlier this year–including therelease of several detained bloggers–that suggested increased protections for the fundamental right of free expression, we are deeply concerned by the recent arrests of other journalists in Ethiopia. We continue to urge theEthiopian Government to build on earlier developments by strengthening free speech protections and broadening democratic progress, and note that the continued stifling of independent voices will only inhibit such progress as well as development and economic growth.

The United States has consistently applauded Ethiopia for being a model and a voice for development in Africa, but such gains must rest on a foundation of democratic governance and respect for human rights if theyare to be sustainable. We urge the Ethiopian Government to release journalists and all others imprisoned for exercising their right to free expression, to refrain from using its Anti-Terrorism Proclamation as a mechanism to silence dissent, and to protect the rights of journalists, bloggers, and dissidents to write and speak freely as voices of a diverse nation.

HISTORY: TPLF and Sudan Mutual Alliance!

By Dejene Lakew (PhD) December 27, 2015

Leaders protect the safety and well being of their societies and build structures to that end, for now and for the future, while arsonists and treasonous individuals leave societies, a future infested with land mines and perpetual wars within and from without so that future generations should fight and clear and rebuilt what was destroyed. TPLF representingthe later, is doing its highest acts of treason and intermittent arsonist, to the full effects of the words.

As long as TPLF remains in power, its acts should always be scrutinized and questioned by the Ethiopian society as it has an eternal ambition to stay at the helm of political power as long as the ethnically divided groupsare willing to foolishly obey its rule or just leave the divided union of regions in to oblivion and banishing Ethiopia for all time. The strategies TPLF takes to materialize its foolish ambitions are:

[1] Fomenting and ventilating ethnic, religious and any form of divisions ofEthiopians in order people loose cohesion and stay weaker to claim power,that is only possible through unity – this strategy worked to keep them in power to this day utilizing their own brute force of specialized armies of Tigrigna speaking people. We all heard representatives of the government from the nominal Oromo wing this week, because of the crackdown on protesters and the aftermath casualties, asking in their session, where these federal police and agazy army are from? They said, “they do not speak Amharic, they do not speak Oromigna but only Tigrigna “, although TPLF says, ethnic groups rule themselves, but only to pay taxes and obey rules to TPLF, and when it comes to problems of the kind seen last week, it is the job of TPLF only – no army of the locals has to be trusted and should not be treated as a friend but as would be potential danger and should be treated that way until order is established. The same thing we read a couple of weeks ago, that Gondar was infested by soldiers of only Tigrigna speaking people and the other local soldiers were forced in to hiding.

This act is a direct reflection of what rule of people by others who think they do not belong to that society is but above them and that is exactly what TPLF does. The surprising thing is that there are people representing the Amhara, Oromo and other ethnic groups believing as coequals but treated as servants and second level members of the collation of the government in which TPLF is the sole super power in decision making process of consequential matters. Because of this repeated acts of betrayals and treason, the Ethiopian people should not listen and believeindividuals who nominally talk in their languages and say they representthem in the TPLF government, but practically they only represent themselves for their pocket and living as people who sold their brothers and sisters for slavery just for penny – the recent events testify that.

[2] Giving comfort for neighboring countries in order to form a purpose driven comradelier relations of trust and political protection of their frontiers from potential opposition groups who might need temporary stayin respective countries and fight TPLF. This particular relation and comradelier is essential to directly order the detention of individuals in therespective countries that are suspected of dangerous political activities by the other governments or directly move in to their territories and capture the needed individuals in cooperation. This is not an easy ploy that normalgovernments do.

The reason why TPLF fanfares the demarcation of the boundary between Ethiopia and Sudan is motivated from both sides. Sudan thinks TPLF is theleast Ethiopian in nature and non-Ethiopian in desire and deeds to get what it wants. On the other side, TPLF thinks the boundary between Sudan and Ethiopia is a political liability and dangerous gateway next to Eritrea where opposition groups may use to wage wars against it and therefore a political strategy to save them, giving it to Sudan simply givesthe needed protection by Sudanese and takes away that fear.

Colonialism left meaningless decrees and decisions made unilaterally within their colonies and from without for neighboring countries. These political measures did not ask the consensus of all parties which were impacted by those decisions but only made by themselves for only for themselves from the zenith of dominance and power. Few such decisionsfrom the many were the one regarding Abay (Blue Nile), Ethiopia and Egypt. Great Britain occupied Egypt and Sudan as its colonies and duringits rules, it put unilateral decrees that, any upper stream country where the waters of Nile are coming from, should consult Egypt before it makesany plan to utilize the river for its own developments. Fortunately this document was not signed by Ethiopia and even if it was signed, it will be found objectionable and unilaterally be nullified by Ethiopia and remainedas a fallacious and wrong decree issued to keep their utilization at the expense of others. The stand of Egypt on this decree and its implementation was self contradictory and paradoxical, for otherwise it has remain the colony of Britain, if what an old decree of a colonizer is tobe obeyed and respected for all time even after the colonizer left and fought to gain their independence from Britain.
Ethiopia, which was not a signatory of that document and which always stands against colonialism will never be obliged to accept such a political decision that not only represents and serves colonialism and directly hurtsitself by not being able to utilize a natural resource of its own, to its developments and prosperity, just because someone of weapon said so.
After decades of misunderstanding and at times faced off to wage wars against Ethiopia, Egypt today believes that the colonial decrees that gaveEgypt complete ownership of Abay, Ethiopian natural resource by a colonial power was wrong and accepts that Ethiopia has a right to utilize its natural resources with legitimacy, which was not possible to do so in the times of Emperor Haile Selassie and Derg, that Ethiopia to establish several dams across the river to generate electric power for energy, one of the sources of developments but failed to do so by threats from previous Egyptian rulers. This was the very reason Egypt gave radio station to Idris Awate, an outright and socially declared cattle bandit fromlow land Eritrea to preach to start a concocted Eritrean war against Ethiopia that lead to the present state of suffering of the people from Eritrea.

These problems however did not remain only between Egypt and Ethiopia but between Ethiopia and Sudan. Likewise Sudan was a colony of Britain and during that time, a single army officer simply wrote a letter to King Menelik regarding what the boundaries between their colony and Ethiopia should be and king Menelik rejected that proposal by saying that the proposal put several parts of Ethiopia in to British Sudan and that decisionof King Menelik was kept valid during emperor Haile Selassie and Derg as well and nothing of anything happened since then. We heard Colonel Mengistu Haile Mariam, a person who lead Ethiopia for 17 years, saying recently that there was nothing of such kind of talk took place between Ethiopia and Sudan, instead perpetual quarrels and bickering took place between Sudan and Ethiopia as both sides were harboring opposing political groups of the other, and there was no such an agreement made during emperor Haile selassie either.

The boundary between Ethiopia and Sudan are natural which is observed from space and delineated by their people who lived for millenniums and still live there. Ethiopians fought different invaders from that side of Sudan at different times and died and protected that part of the country for centuries, where they live and make a living is where Ethiopia stands. This boundary was attested by successive Ethiopian leaders, starting fromemperors of Gondar, Fasiledes, Tewodros, Yohannes, Menelik, Hailselassieand the Derg. Ethiopians should therefore be remain vigilant to oppose with any means at their disposal, the TPLF shenanigans and false but make belief stories that bends to give away Ethiopian territories to Sudan for the sheer purpose of what I mentioned above. LEGEND PEOPLE

Ethiopia recognizes Colonel John Charles Robins

(Tigrai Online) May 6, 2015 Colonel John Charles Robinson the Aviator was a black American who volunteered to help Ethiopia against fascist Italy's invasion in 1935. When European Imperialists were dividing Africa among themselves in the 19th hundreds, Fascist Italy wanted a piece of Africa. Italy went for the oldest independent country on earth, Ethiopia. Itwasn't the first time the Italians tried to invade Ethiopia. Italy had tried toinvade Ethiopia more than five times from 1887 to 1896 in the battles of Dogali, Amba-Alaje, Mekelle and they were defeated in Adwa in 1896.

Almost 40 years after the humiliating defeat in Adwa the Italians wantedto try one more time in 1935. When news reached Emperor Hailesilassie about Colonel John Charles Robinson's desire to come to Ethiopia to fight the Italians, the Emperor officially invited him to Ethiopia. Colonel John Charles Robinson contributed by directly taking part in missions against the fascist forces, intraining Ethiopian air force pilots, reconnaissance mission, and by transporting soldiers and supplies to the war front. He fought the Italians with great bravery and valor to defend Ethiopian sovereignty and territorial integrity. He was one of the witnesses of the bombardment of the city of Adwa.

Colonel John Charles Robinson was born on 24 February 1903 in Carrabelle, Florida, United States of America. Colonel John Charles Robinson was an African-American who served in the Ethiopian Royal AirForce and defended Ethiopia agianst Fascist Italy.

Colonel John Charles Robinson was badly injured when his plane crashedin Addis Ababa. He was on his way to city of Nazret to deliver blood to another person injured in another plane accident. After 10 days in the hospital he died in April 8, 1954 from his injuries. He was buried at the Gulele Cemetery in Addis Ababa, Ethiopia.

At the 74th anniversary of Ethiopian Patriots Victory Day, Ethiopia and Ethiopians recognized the outstanding service and dedication of ColonelJohn Charles Robinson. As an appreciation to his service to Ethiopia a statue monument was erected at the Holy Trinity Cathedral in Addis Ababa, Ethiopia to commemorate Colonel John Charles Robinson. The commemoration ceremony was attended by the head of state and otherdignitaries. (Text ends)

He agreed to work with the United States against groups and organizations such as Al Qaeda operating out ofthe country.

He was awarded the Rwanda' National Liberation Medal and also the "World Peace Prize" for his contributions to global peace. Zenawi also received the "Yara" prize for carrying out a green revolution in the country. Some other awards he had received included the Africa PoliticalLeadership Award in 2008, and the Good Governance award.

He married Azeb Mesfin, nicknamed gual-Gola during the struggles years who is currently a member of the Ethiopian Parliament. Meles Zenawi diedat the age of 57 years on the 20th of August, 2012. He died from an infection after having an operation due to a brain tumor. But some say that he is food poisoned by his political rivals.

Meles Zenawi Asres his net worth currently stands at $3 billion. He was the former Prime Minister of Ethiopia who presided over the country from 1995 to his death in 2012. He was also the President of Ethiopia from 1991 to 1995. He was one of the most recent literate and forward thinkingleaders of Africa. Zenawi had an MBA from the United Kingdom, and a Masters of science in economics from Netherlands.

LEGEND PEOPLE

Who Is Captain Fikre Selassie Wogderes

Fikre Selassie Wagderes is a low rank officer in the former Ethiopian Airforce whose eventually delegated to be member of the Armed Forces,The Police, and the National Territorial steering and co-ordinating Committee, on the latter commonly known as the Duerg. He was one ofthe key figures in the Duerg regime, and an architecht of 'Yemeserete timihirt Zemecha' a campaign for basic education in the rural Ethiopia.

A committed man for his country, an airforce Captain when the Duerg took over the power from Haileselassie. In his memoir book 'Egna Ena abiyotu' he narrated in detail how the revolution went. To our greatest surprise, though he admits many mistakes of the Duerg regime, he strongly believes what they did was the right thing, and he narrates in a sad way how the people was exploited during the imperial era, he also explain very well the power struggles of all the revolutionary parties at thetime between 1975-79.

Widow of the late prime minister warns protesters on social media December 5, 2015: Azeb Mesfin, wife of Meles Zenawi tells the protesters to back off from questioning the implementation of the debatable Addis Ababa integrated master plan. Yesterday, she appeared on her face bookpage that she left since the death of her husband and said the government has the responsibility to take every action to stop the protesters. She also explains farmers could be affected when the master plan is implemented and that is the nature of such project. “This plan mayhelp you too and should not be against it”, she wrote. Azeb Mesfin, a silent but a powerful hand in the current government circle is criticized in her reputation because of different business ventures she is involved.

Currently, students from different universities of the country are opposingthe implementation of the master plan and the government still continuedtaking forceful action.

LEGEND PEOPLE: Mulatu Astatke the man on top of Ethiopian Music

Mulatu Astatke Born in the western Ethiopian city of Jimma in 1943..... The 16-year-old Astatke had arrived in Britain in 1959, sent from Addis Ababa to North Wales by his wealthy parents, first to Lindisfarne College and then to Bangor University. But music got in the way of those initial career plans, and his gifts took him to Trinity College of Music in London, where he studied piano, clarinet and harmony, and to the Eric Gilder School of Music in Twickenham, whose pupils included the Ghanaian saxophonist Teddy Osei – later to found Osibisa, the pioneering Afro-rock group – and Labi Siffre, the singer-guitarist. He began playing vibraphone and piano inthe clubs of Soho with expatriate African and Caribbean jazz musicians, and in dance halls with the popular Edmundo Ros orchestra. Leaving London in 1963, he enrolled as the first African student at the jazz- oriented Berklee College in Boston, whose alumni include the vibraphonistGary Burton and the pianist Keith Jarrett. Moving to New York, he pursuedhis interests in jazz and Latin music. When he returned home in 1969 it was with the idea of creating a more ambitious musical fusion.

In Addis Ababa he discovered an upsurge of activity in the world of the arts and entertainment, and a booming night-life scene that offered plentyof scope for experiment. He called his new music "Ethio jazz", and his recordings from the period show him using local musicians, steeped in thefour basic pentatonic modes with which they grew up, to impart a new flavour to the structures he had brought with him from America. "There's an obvious influence from people like Duke Ellington," says Alexander Hawkins, the 33-year-old English pianist who has been a member of Astatke's band for the last five years and is featured on his most recent album, Sketches of Ethiopia. "Duke is one of Mulatu's heroes. But it's all filtered through this African rhythmic sensibility – sixes against fours and threes against twos in the music on a deep level – and also the other elements of the Ethiopian sound, in particular the modal language, which is probably the thing that most conspicuously sets it apart from other African traditions. The Ethiopian modes have an almost Arabic feel to them, this strange harmonic minor twist with a flat sixth and a sharp seventh, which gives the music a very unusual tonality."

Astatke worked as an arranger for other artists as well as a bandleader, but the musical elements he imported from America – his own vibraphone; the electric keyboards and the wah-wah pedal for the electricguitar; the use of congas and bongos to articulate Latin rhythms – were only gradually assimilated, sometimes meeting outright resistance from those who resented what they saw as the imposition of alien sounds and techniques on traditional material.

Nevertheless, his reputation grew, thanks in part to a partnership with Amha Eshete, an equally adventurous young man who had started the country's first independent record label. In 1973, Astatke was chosen to perform with Ellington when the American bandleader toured Ethiopia andZambia, sponsored by the state department at a time when the US government saw jazz as a weapon in the propaganda war against communism. The two men became friends and played together – Ellingtonsuffering from lung cancer and with only a few months to live – at a concert in Haile Selassie's presence. The following year Selassie was deposed in a coup that led to 18 years of government by the Derg, a Soviet-backed military junta, a period of repression in which hundreds of thousands were murdered or deported. A strict curfew put an end to Addis's nightlife and many musicians left the country, including several of Eshete's most important artists. Eshete himself opted for exile when he learned, while visiting New York to buy recording equipment, that the singer Tekle Tesfazghi had been imprisoned after expressing support for Eritrean separatists in one of his lyrics. Astatke, however, stayed put and earned a living teaching music. In the first year of the revolution he recorded Yekatit: Ethio Jazz, the first Ethiopian album to be planned as a single entity, rather than being compiled from a collection of singles. "Yekatit" is the Ge'ez word corresponding to February, the month in whichthe revolution took place, suggesting Astatke's support for the regime.

Taking advantage of a warm relationship between the Derg and the Castrogovernment, he visited Havana, deepening his knowledge of Latin music at first hand.

In 1991, following the collapse of the Soviet Union, the Derg disintegratedand the Ethiopian People's Revolutionary Democratic Front took power, establishing a parliamentary republic. Eshete returned, having already been contacted by Francis Falceto, a French record producer with plans to license the recordings made between 1968 and 1974 by Astatke and others. Knowing that his own enthusiasm for this music was matched by that of collectors who had been foraging for the original albums and singles, Falceto had become convinced that there would be a viable audience for a series of compilations. A deal was made, the master tapes were retrieved and Falceto embarked on the process of audio restoration. The initial disc in the Ethiopiques series, released on the Buda Musique label in 1998, was intended to be the first of 10. In 2005, however, the inclusion by the director Jim Jarmusch of half a dozen pieces by Astatke inthe soundtrack to his comedy-drama film Broken Flowers, starring Bill Murray, brought the music to a wider public, and the series is now up to 29 volumes. Like a lot of "world music" picked up by western audiences in recent years, Ethio-jazz appeals because it is simultaneously familiar and foreign. Western instruments – trumpets and saxophones, electric keyboards and bass guitars – are played with a different accent, generated by tuning (some Ethiopian music also makes use of non- tempered scales) and timing. Astatke's early records often meander gentlybut seductively along the apparently endless path of a two-chord vamp,like a laid-back East African cousin of John Coltrane's jazz or JamesBrown's funk.

Astatke's travels had made him thoroughly familiar with the music of boththose giants of American music. But in the case of other Ethiopian musicians who did not receive western training, such as the extraordinary tenor saxophonist Getatchew Mekuria, the connection may be less explicit.Initial exposure to Mekuria's recordings (his classic 1970 album, Negus of African Sax, was reissued as Ethiopiques, Vol 14) invariably persuades western jazz fans they are listening to an improviser whose intense delivery and wild vibrato must have been influenced by such leaders of the 1960s free jazz movement as Coltrane and Albert Ayler. Yet Mekuria, who is now in his late 70s, denies the suggestion. His apprenticeship was served with Addis Ababa's municipality and police bands, after which he made his name with instrumental versions of traditional warriors' songs.

In Hawkins's view, the undoubted similarity of the music of Mekuria and other Ethiopians to the sound of American musicians is a matter of "familyresemblance" rather than direct influence.

Lke Astatke, Mekuria has taken advantage of the recent and unexpected interest of foreign audiences. He toured and recorded with the Ex, a Dutchpunk band, and with Boston's adventurous Either/Orchestra. In 2008, he and Astatke performed together with other Ethiopian musicians at Glastonbury. In 2009 Astatke recorded and toured with the Heliocentrics, the British funk band. The following year saw the release of an album called Mulatu Steps Ahead, on which Astatke used a combination of the Either/Orchestra and British-based musicians while adding Ethiopian instruments to the mix: a bamboo flute called the washint, a kind of lyre called the krar, and the single-string masinko, a relative of the West African n'goni. On Sketches of Ethiopia, recorded by his new band and released last year, those same instruments are integrated into a series of subtly hued arrangements showing the influence of Ellington and Gil Evans filtered through an Ethiopian sensibility.

"Mulatu has that thing the great composers have," Hawkins says, "of coming up with something that can be both really quite odd and completely inevitable. When Thelonious Monk plays a note, for instance,it's at once the sound of surprise and the only note it could ever have been. Mulatu's bassline for 'Yekatit' is deeply weird for all kinds of technical reasons, but it sits perfectly. There's a tune that I love called 'Kasalèfkut Hulu' where the horn line is so counterintuitive and yet feelsgood. With 'Netsanet', the bassline is in six and the drums are in four. Ifyou said that to the people dancing to it, they'd fall over – but if you don't, they're fine."

He describes the experience of playing with Astatke as a reminder ofmusic's functional and spiritual dimensions. "For someone like me, amiddle-class white guy from Oxford, music has never been part of a struggle or a ritual. But this is a first-hand reminder that there are placeswhere music isn't just a beautiful thing that you let happen to you." Astatke is 72 now, but his work is not yet done. According to Hawkins, he makes regular visits to Harvard and MIT, where Unesco funding enables him to work on creating new versions of Ethiopian instruments, using modern materials and technology, expanding their range to encompass the western 12-tone scale. Purists might wince at theidea. But if anyone can make it work, it's probably him.

LEGEND PEOPLE: In Memory of the Tigrigna singer

Tekle Tesfazghi was born in Asmara, in former Eritrea province under Ethiopian administration. His musical inclination begun in his school days but further refined and took shape when he was enrolled in an amateur theatre and cultural group known as mahbere theatre Asmara in Eritrea cultural and theatre group. He took part in the group as a singer, player ofmusical instruments as well as music writer. Having left the group, he wasrecruited by an army orchestra (the second division orchestra) where he worked as a singer. He won fame by the song “saba”, a well known song. When Tekle was still in the service, the black lion band toured Asmara to give a live show to the public and the army. Tekle took the opportunity and introduced to Ayalew Mesfin , the band owner and himself a well known singer. Joining the musikal band Tekle came to Addis. He also served the famous Izra band under then Haile Selasssie I Theatre briefly His engagement with the band as a drummer and vocalist lasted several years which included many tours including neigbouring countries.

Vocalist Tekle was among the first artists who set up the Roha band, thefamous musical group which remained glorious for about 13 years. He served the band as a drummer and also as a lead singer in Tigrigna, Arabic and English languages. He was among the best known singers in the band. Tekle has not released any album because of security reasonsby the time, he just only sings for the audience. However, songs he performed along with the Roha band in several showswhich included “saba”, “Fikrey Telemeni” ,”Mistrawi debdabe”, ”Kemdilaye” ,were recorded by the Ethiopian Radio and Television. Besides his immense individual talent, he had influenced many upcoming Tigrigna singers to venture into modern Tigrigna songs. He had also helped them in composing and music arrangement notable among the beneficiaries was the late kiros Alemayehu, a best known Tigrigna singer.The legacy of artist Tekle also could be seen in the pioneering role he hadin setting up a recording studio thereby positive by benefitting the industry. Until his untimely death in a car accident Tekle took part in several music tours of the Roha Band both in the country and in many cities in neghboring countries added to his already big fame.

LEGEND PEOPLE: The History of Taxi vehicles in Ethiopia

Around 1937, about a year and half through the second invasion of Ethiopia by Italy,a taxi company was operating by an Italian businessman named Sighnore Ferno...ndo. The company opened its doors for service around Georgis Church of Arada as seen in the image. At the time, the taxis were dark brown and served onlyEuropean residents around the city. Ethiopians were not allowed to ride them unlessthey were bandas or servitore አገልጋይ. My other source, which is The Armenian Weekly, has quoted that the first taxi service in Ethiopia began to operate in Addis Abeba by Armenian drivers in the year 1915 not in the year 1937. LEGEND PEOPLE:

In Memory of Qegnazmach Andom Tesfatsion ze-Tsaazega ofHamassien

Qenyazmach Andom Tesfatsion was born in 1892 at Debri in the district of Anseba, Eritrea. He married W/o Sendeq Mengistu (after his death she took a vow and became a Nun 'Itay'). He was, for about 24 years, a 'Shumbash' the highest rank for native askari/officers in the Italian Army; he was an excellent marksman, and fairly educated in his generation. Andom was apprehensive about the colonial oppression the Eritreans were suffering ontheir own land, at the hands of the fas...cist Mussolini. He knew the fascist plan and remained vigilant in their preparation to invade further inland toEthiopia.

Andom saw this as an opportunity to create a united force to defeat a common enemy. Andom deserted from the Italians, taking withhim 500 soldiers and their war equipment after ordered to leave Eritrea. Soon other hundreds and thousands of soldiers followed. (it is also recalled - was a common trait among the fascist sector demeaning Eritreans and often reducing them to a 'bunch-of-flies).

At the time of his dissertation, the Italians under Mussolini invaded Ethiopia burning churches and massacring women and children in violationof international law. He and his fellow men joined the Ethiopian forces in the Tembien district, in the province of Tigray. At the head of his troops he fought the fascist army very bravely. Later, four days before the terrible Battle of Mai-Chew, he met the Emperor Haile Selassie, awarded him the Medal of St. Trinity and a Medal of Honor for war service in recognition of his gallantry. In addition to the medals the Emperor cordially offered him a gift black cape similar to one wore by the Emperor when he addressed the League of Nations in Geneva. At Mai-Chew Andom, as the head of his troops, fought the good fight, against the enemy, with all his energy and capacity. There, as on every battlefield, hisfavorite slogan was "Today is my birthday, it is a good day!". QenyazmachAndom Tesfatsion survived by daughter Tsion (an elite traditional fashion designer), sons Melese (the later career diplomat), and Aman Mikael (the later Ethiopian military senior officer.)

Oromo Protest Updates

Several Killed in Ethiopia Oromia Protests

December 11, 2015:

Clashes between police and protesters in Ethiopia’s Oromia region have left several people dead, according to officials and regional opposition leaders. Oromia has seenthree weeks of protests over a government plan to integrate parts of the region withthe capital, Addis Ababa. Critics say the plan will undermine local rule and cause local farmers to lose their land.

Witnesses say police have used force to contain or shut down protests, including onethat took place Thursday in the town of Bako. “Today in Bako city when the studentscame out to protest, people joined them and they started firing live rounds and hit some students,” a witness told VOA’s Horn of Africa Service. There was no word on whether anyone was killed.

Bloomberg news quotes a prominent opposition leader, Bekele Nega, as saying police have killed 10 students taking part in the ongoing protests. Ethiopia’s communications minister, Getachew Reda, put the number of dead at four, and saidsecurity forces have been exercising restraint in the face of violence.

Widening protests

Oromia is one of Ethiopia's nine ethnically-based states and holds the largest population at more than 27 million. The protests started on November 20 in the Western Oromo region cities of Ambo, Ginchi and Western Welega, and they havesince spread. The tactics used to clamp down on these protests are reminiscent ofthe 2014 protests in the Oromia towns of Ambo, Nekemte and Jimma, according toHuman Rights Watch, where security forces fired live rounds and beat people whowere protesting peacefully.

Speaking to journalists in Ethiopia a few days ago, the police commissioner of the Oromia region, Ibrahim Hajj, blamed misinformation and propaganda for fueling hostilities among some in the Oromo community. "Today the people are ensuring therights and are beneficiaries in all sectors including, social, economic sectors. But there are some who are trying to make it seem as if the rights of the people have been violated and they take advantage of this situation behind the scenes," he said. Felix Horne, an Ethiopia and Eritrea researcher for Human Rights Watch, said the spread of the protests started slowly and gained momentum within schools and othereducational institutions. "Initially it was students in primary schools, secondary schools, some university students and now we are seeing farmers, workers beginning to take part in these protests in different ways — staging protests peacefulmeans, sit-ins to mourn the death of those who've lost their lives. So the protests definitely seem to be gaining momentum," he said.

Horne said that while the government's development for Addis sparked the protests,they are about much larger issues. "Ostensibly these protests are about the Addis Ababa Master Plan but clearly the Oromos have been marginalized by successive governments and so it's kind of an accumulation of different frustrations," he said. "Throughout Oromia, arbitrary detention is common, mistreatment in detention is common and then Oromos just don't have a voice in issues that impact them day-to-day." (Text ends)

Ethiopian actor and producer Haimanot Alemu dies

Saturday, September 20th, 2014

The Ethiopian actor and film producer Haimanot Alemu passed away. He was 68. Haimanot Alemu forged a lengthy acting career in such plays as "Petros at the Hour", "Skeleton in Pages", "lnat Alem Tenu", Tewodros. During the early military period, Haimanot directed and choreographed "Tiglachin" (Our Struggle) which was Ethiopia's entry in the Black Arts Festival in Nigeria. Some seven years ago, Haimanot produced "Girdosh" afeature film based on Sissay Negussu's novel which was poorly received. Since 1991, Haimanot was an Asst. Professor who taught at AAU, andUnity University.

Haimanot fondly recalled his portrayal of Emperor Tewodros, which was atriumph.The historical play, written by Tsegaye Gebre Medhin, the then general manager of the National Theater, featured renowned actors suchas Wegayehu Negatu, Awlachew Dejene, Asnaketch Worku, Tesfaye Sahlu, Debebe Eshetu. “It is considered by many that these few years under Tsegaye were probably the golden years of the theater with exceptionally high-grade productions of plays,” he once told an interviewer.

Ethiopian audiences, however, might remember Haimanot most for hishard talk show ‘Fietlefit’ on Ethiopian TV that presented notable figuressuch as Haddis Alemayehu, Alemayehu Abebe, Zewde Gabre Selassie, Derartu Tulu, a show that earned him a reputation for being egotisticaland self-indulgent.The talk show didn’t even last two years.

Haimanot was born in Addis Ababa but spent his childhood years in Holetta, 29 kms from Addis in the western direction.Introduced to theateras a small child, he did his first acting at the age of nine. He studied at Haile Selassie I Secondary School, before going abroad to join the University of Minnesota to graduate in theater arts.After earning his Master’s Degree from there, he went on to work as a professional actor playing roles in different theaters in Minneapolis including the Tyrone Guthrie theater. In graduate school, he directed Tsegaye Gabre Medhin’s“Oda Oak Oracle” which went on to represent the University at regional theater festivals.He lived in the United States for many years. From timeto time, he would act in a film or theater show or in television commercials. He won the Mary Goldwater Award for outstanding acting talent in Washington D.C. in 1988 and The Ira Aldridge Award for Shakespearean acting in Los Angeles in 1989.

He returned to Ethiopia in 1970’s to run the artistic directing section of theNational Theatre while Tsegaye Gabre Medhin was serving as general manager. Haimanot directed and acted in several of the plays written by Tsegaye and his acting talents enhanced such plays – as “Petros at the Hour”, “Skeleton in Pages”, “lnat Alem Tenu”, (Mother courage), Tewodros, as well as choreographing the first epic dance dramas.

His last appearance on stage was when he was playing the title role of Uncle Vanya with such notable names such as Asnaketch Worku, TesfayeGessesse, Getachew Debalke, Teferi Alemu and Haregeweyn Assefa, a treat of three generation of actors playing together.

Paying tribute, Ethiopian-American writer and director Wondowossen Dikran wrote on his facebook page: One of my childhood heroes, a dear friend, and one of the pioneers of the golden age of Ethiopian Theater hasgone home. Thank you for everything, Gash Haimanot Alemu. You gave more than you will ever know. Rest In Peace.

The film director, playwright, and producer Abate Mekuria commented: “You were a great colleague. I miss you very much, I will always cherish the memories of our days during the time we were rehearsing the performance of the last hour of Meqdela. You were a great practitioner oftheater. I will always miss you very much! May you rest in peace.”

Haimanot inspired harsh criticism, yet most people felt that even his mostunsuccessful works all had some feature, some turn that was memorable.He is survived by a son and two daughters. (text ends)

OROMO PROTESTS

Oromo protests set to continue in Ethiopia

In an interview with DW December 23, 2015, Dr. Merara Gundina, a spokesman of the Ethiopian Federal Democratic Unity Forum accused thegovernment of abusing the country’s constitution with its plans to expandthe capital Addis Ababa.

In an interview with Deutsche Welle (DW), a spokesman of the EthiopianFederal Democratic Unity Forum accused the government of abusing thecountry's constitution with its plans to expand the capital Addis Ababa.

Violence and chaos gripped Ethiopia this week as thousands of demonstrators took to the streets in protest against government plans to expand the capital Addis Ababa. Human Rights Watch said at least 75 people were killed in a bloody crackdown by heavily armed security forces.The demonstrations have spread to several towns since November, when students spoke out against plans to expand the capital into Oromia territory, a move the Oromo people consider a land grab.

DW spoke to Merara Gundina, chairman of the opposition Oromo FederalCongress, in Addis Ababa.

DW: What exactly are you demonstrating against?

Merara Gundina: The Addis Ababa Master Plan is part of a larger land grabby the Ethiopian government around Addis Ababa, which has displaced notless than 200,000 people. Secondly, under federalism all the boundaries are being eroded by the ruling party which is bent on taking the land.

People are very angry with the government and people who wanted to seechange are frustrated.

Under the Ethiopian constitution all land belongs to the state, with peopleliving there legally considered tenants. Doesn't this allow the governmentto carry out any developments that may serve the interests of all Ethiopians?

No, no, the government is misusing it. The constitution says the land belongs to the public so it doesn't allow the government simply to tell thepeople "go away" and it takes the land. No, it says there are bonds of state in the name of the people and there are individuals owning the land.It is the ruling party that is misusing the constitution. In fact, the state itself is privatising the country. We understand you have vowed to continue the demonstrations despite the killings and Prime Minister Hailemariam Desalegn declared on television that the government would act without mercy.

Is it not better to solve these issues through talks?
We continue to support the cause of our people. We continue our peacefulstruggle. We cannot be intimidated as the government has done. We havepopular support, we have millions of people behind us. The government cannot silence us easily. We are following the constitution but we are against the arbitrary misuse of the constitution by the ruling party. Our people will continue.

Is it true that your organization is getting support from outsiders?
The diaspora is far away. It's school kids, high schools and universities and the government is simply accusing the left and the right. Probably thediaspora is very active in the media because the local media are totally controlled by the government. We have no access to the media and the diaspora have some media outlets and they report what is happening in the country. But a diaspora of a few thousand cannot move millions of people.

Local press updates: TPLF & The People power
(By Anonimous on December 11, 2015) TPLF is trying to hoodwink the international community and our people once again. The protest in Oromiais not against development plans or the expansion of Addis Ababa, as theywant us to believe. It is against the Master Plan, which is another word forland grab and massive displacement of poor farmers and urban dwellers.
Ethiopia needs an all-inclusive development, not the kinds of Apartheidplans devised by the TPLF to be the master of our land and destiny.
...TPLF’s ruthless land brokers and merchants have become multi- millionaires by displacing and dispossessing poor farmers across Ethiopia. They have displaced millions of poor urban dwellers and peasant farmers to make way for the plantations and villas that they and their foreign cohorts are building across Ethiopia. They have done it almost everywhereincluding Mekele, where the displaced poor has designated their high end neighborhood “Apartheid village.” The just cause of our Oromo compatriots need to be supported wholeheartedly. We should not succumbto TPLF’s fear mongering. Ethiopians need to stand up together and demand justice for the victims of TPLF’s scorched earth policy.

Ethiopia must be a country for all, not for a handful of exploitative tyrants.We need to demand justice for those killed in cold blood and the release ofour brothers and sisters being tortured in the dungeons of injustice. We need to demand our dignity and freedom. This entrenched tyranny cannotbe defeated by one group of people in one or two regions. It can only be defeated when all Ethiopians across Ethiopia start speaking in one voice, rise up and fall together. The sacrifice of the little kids and their blood spiltin every village and hamlet should not be in vain. It should be the seed of freedom and justice.

At this moment in our history, we should say no to division and bickering.All victims of tyranny, past or present, must unite to claim their common destiny. TPLF must be the last tyranny in Ethiopian history. We need the first government in our history that we can all proudly call ours. We needa servant government. No more tyranny, discrimination, inequality, exploitation, degradation and humiliation. Let us seize the moment! It is now or never!

“The Power of the People Is Greater Than the People in Power.”Wael Ghonim United we stand, divided we fall!

Negotiations in Paris as drought wreaks havoc in Ethiopia

(December 11, 2015)

The outcome of the current climate discussions in Paris will have a hugeimpact on the world's poor, who bear the brunt of disrupted weather patterns caused by global warming. Tens of millions of people across Asia,Africa and Latin America are subject to worsening droughts, floods and storms. This is the best opportunity for such an agreement in over twentyyears of United Nations negotiations, and hopes are high.

Rising temperatures can cause flooding in coastal areas and droughts in arid regions. These negative effects are experienced disproportionately bypoor communities in poor countries – ironically those who suffer the mosthave contributed the least to carbon emissions. These shocks destroy property and assets, disrupt agricultural practices and ultimately force many people back into, or deeper into, poverty. We are already seeing evidence in real time that this is occurring in Ethiopia today.

Ethiopia is currently facing a drought which has put millions of its citizensin need of aid. It is the biggest crisis in the country since the 1980s. The food crisis is a result of failed rains and disrupted weather patterns, compounded by El Niño, causing crops to wither and die. This is a huge cause for concern in Ethiopia, a country so heavily reliant on farming andcrop production. Agriculture accounts for more than 40 per cent of GDP. More than 80 per cent of the population relies on farming for their livelihoods.

8.2 million Ethiopians now need food assistance as a direct result of climate change. The United Nations has projected that this number could swell to 15 million next year as people endure the long wait until the nextharvest. The government of Ethiopia has contributed $192 million for an emergency response to the drought and has been working with farming communities to help them become more resilient to changing weather patterns, by using drought-resistant crops and conserving water.

Concern is doing similar work on resilience, working with 100,000 farminghouseholds to promote climate smart agriculture in some of the poorest areas of Africa. We have found that the promotion of conservation agriculture can lead to doubling of crop yields. In drought-prone areas, wehave found that water harvesting techniques can help to increase soil fertility.

But building community resilience is not enough in the face of such hugeclimate shocks. A bigger, weightier response is needed.

At a national and regional level, farmers will need to adapt to a changingclimate, by embracing climate-smart agriculture techniques.
Internationally, efforts must be ramped up and financed to slow halt thepace of climate change so that the effects felt in Ethiopia are not replicated elsewhere.

It is therefore crucial that support for poor communities affected byclimate change be included in the Paris negotiations. We need these negotiations to put a firm and legally enforceable plan in place to address global warming. At the heart of this is protecting the common good, rather than national or group interests.

Without this commitment, achievement of the Sustainable Development Goals will remain out of reach. Goal 17 calls for 'urgent action to combat climate change and its impacts'. The world leaders meeting this week have the power and remit to put a legal framework in place to make Goal17 a reality. What is needed now is political will and momentum.

A failure to reach a global deal in Paris would be a disaster. Now is the time to begin reversing the decades of harm wreaked by human activity and also to lend our solidarity to those who are most affected by the changing climate. The core belief underscoring all of this is universality: we must work together to ensure that no one is left behind. Kate Corcoranis Concern Worldwide's country director in Ethiopia

News updates: Advise Against All Travels to Ethiopia
The government of United Kingdom released an advice for it's citizens toavoid traveling in some parts of Ethiopian after an explosion at Anwar Mosque in Addis Ababa, Merkato and on going protest in the Oromia region.
(December 11, 2015) The Foreign and Commonwealth Office (FCO) adviseagainst all travel to:

- within 10 km of the border with Eritrea, with the exception of the main road through Axum and Adigrat, and tourist sites close to theroad (e.g. Debre Damo and Yeha)
- areas off the principal roads/towns within 10 km of the borders withSudan and Kenya
- within 10km of the border with South Sudan

- the Nogob (previously Fik), Jarar (previously Degehabur), Shabelle(previously Gode), Korahe and Dollo (previously Warder) zones of the Somali region.
- within 100km of the Ethiopian border with Somalia and Kenya in theAfder and Liben zones of Ethiopia's Somali region
- the Danakil desert area: north of the Mille-Djibouti and Mille-Chifraroads, and east of the towns of Bere-Ale, Shehet, Didigsala and Chifra
- the four woredas (districts) (Akobo, Wantawo, Jikawo and Lare) ofthe Nuer zone and the Jore woreda of the Agnuak zone of the Gambella region

The FCO advise against all but essential travel to

- Jijiga town
- Three woredas of the Agnuak zone of the Gambella region that border on South Sudan (Dima, Goge, and Etang) and the Gambella
  Wildlife Reserve (taking into account the advice against all travel towithin 10km of the border with South Sudan)

There have been protests across the Oromiya Region in recent weeks, including at a number of universities. Some have reported casualties. There are also reports of related demonstrations that have caused severedisruption to roads and traffic. You should avoid large crowds and demonstrations.

There were reports of a shooting incident in the Mago Park in the OmoValley in December 2014. No injuries were reported. Take extra care ifyou're in this region.

There is a high threat from terrorism. There are credible reports that Al Shabaab plan, and have the capability, to attack targets in Ethiopia. On 14October 2014 the US Embassy in Addis Ababa issued a travel warning advising "those in Addis Ababa to avoid areas where both Ethiopians and westerners frequent", and citing threat reports of Al Shabaab's intent to target the Bole area of the city.

You should be vigilant at all times, especially in crowded areas and publicplaces like transport hubs, hotels, restaurants, bars and places of worshipand during major gatherings like religious or sporting events. There is a high threat of kidnapping in Ethiopia's Somali region, particularly in the eastern areas to which the FCO advise against all travel. See Terrorism

Crime levels are low, but you should avoid large gatherings and publicdemonstrations and be alert to the risk of street crime. See Crime

The Ethiopia-Eritrea border remains closed. Several security incidents have taken place along the border. The risk of cross-border tensions remains. There is a threat of kidnapping along the border. See Local travel

Owning ivory is strictly prohibited in Ethiopia. Anyone caught in possession of ivory can expect to be detained by police. See Local lawsand customs

Around 20,000 British nationals visit Ethiopia every year. Most visits aretrouble free.

Oromia comes under 'Emergency law'

In Memory of December 13, 2015: National Day of Remembrance for the December13th Massacre of the Anuak on December 13, 2015:

It was a day of bloodshed, horror, and sorrow no one will forget. Twelve years ago, on December 13, 2003, Anuak in the Diaspora began to receive desperate calls fromfamily members and friends from Gambella, Ethiopia. A massacre was being carried out in Gambella town and the victims were all Anuak. TPLF/EPRDF defense troops with guns, accompanied by militia groups they had armed with machetes and pangas, went marching through Gambella town chanting, "Today is the day for killing Anuak." They used a list, prepared in advance by the government, that included the names of leaders, pastors, students, and some of the most educated and influential Anuak; particularly those who had challenged the TPLF/EPRDF regime's plans for oil exploration without consulting the people and considering the environmental impact on the land and rivers of the Upper Nile. The killing continued for nearly three days with a final death count of 424 Anuak who wereslain.

Homes, crops, water wells, and storage bins were destroyed and schools and health clinics were ransacked and pillaged. Over 10,000 Anuak fled across the border to refugee camps in southern Sudan where a civil war was going on between the north and the south. Multiple human rights investigations that followed, found evidence of acalculated plan, called Operation Sunny Mountain, meant to "teach the Anuak a lesson," which was said to have originated in the top offices of the TPLF in Addis Ababa. "It's has to be remember the high profile meeting on September 24, 2003 in Addis Ababa in the office of the Prime Minister. The Prime Minister Meles Zenawi was there, along with the vice Premier; Addisu Legesse, Sebhat Nega, the TPLF veteran,Information Minister, Bereket Simon, Chief of Gambella Security, Omot Obang Olom,Alemu Alamerew of the federal security; Minister of Federal Affairs; Abay Tsehaye, Chief of Staff of the Ethiopian Armed Forces, Samora (Mohamed) Yunis, Chief of Military Intelligence, Brigadier General, Yohannes Gebre Meskel (Johnny) and the Minister of Defense, Abadula Gemeda." ...

According to testimony obtained in Genocide Watch's two human rights investigations in 2004, the targeting of the Anuak was ordered by the High Commander in Chief of the Ethiopian army in Gambella, Tsegaye Beyene, with the direct authorization of Dr. Gebre-ab Barnabas, an official of the Ethiopian government's Ministry of Federal Affairs. The Chief of Police, Tadesse Haile Selassie, was also involved in carrying out the orders. Oromo Protest updates:

Blood and terror on the streets as protests grip Ethiopia

Wolenkomi, Ethiopia (AFP) - Two lifeless bodies lay on the ground as the terrified crowd, armed only with sticks against gun-toting Ethiopian security forces, fled the fierce crackdown on protesters. Blood seeped through a sheet covering one of the bodies on the road outside Wolenkomi, a town just 60km from the capital Addis Ababa. "That was myonly son," a woman sobbed. "They have killed me." Back at the family home of 20-year-old Kumsa Tafa, his younger sister Ababetch shook as she spoke. "He was a student. No one was violent. I do not understand why he is dead," she said.

Human Rights Watch says at least 75 people have been killed in a bloodycrackdown on protests by the Oromo people, Ethiopia's largest ethnic group. Bekele Gerba, deputy president of the Oromo Federal Congress, puts the toll at more than 80 while the government says only five have been killed. The demonstrations have spread to several towns since November, when students spoke out against plans to expand the capital into Oromia territory, a move the Oromo consider a land grab. The sight of the protesters on the streets of towns like Wolenkomi, shouting "Stop the killings! This isn't democracy!" is rare in a country with little tolerancefor expressions of discontent with the government.

Tree trunks and stones are strewn on the asphalt on the road west from Addis to Shewa zone, in Oromia territory, barricading the route for severalkilometres.
Chaos broke out on a bus on the road when it emerged that the police were again clashing with demonstrators in Wolenkomi. "My husband justcalled me," said a woman clutching her phone, as others screamed and children burst into tears. "He's taking refuge in a church. Police shot at theprotesters," she said.

The man next to her cried in despair: "They're taking our land, killing ourchildren. Why don't they just kill everyone now?" The army raided Wolenkomi again the next day, the rattle of gunfire lasting for more thanan hour. "They grabbed me by the face and they told me, 'Go home! If you come back here, we'll kill you'," said Kafani, a shopkeeper.

Rights groups have repeatedly criticised Ethiopia's use of anti-terrorism legislation to stifle peaceful dissent, with the US expressing concern over the recent crackdown and urging the government to employ restraint. ButPrime Minister Hailemariam Desalegn declared on television that the government would act "without mercy in the fight against forces which aretrying to destabilise the region."

'Land is everything'
Oromo leaders have vowed to keep up their resistance against proposals to extend Addis, and Human Rights Watch has warned of "a rapidly rising risk of greater bloodshed". "The government can continue to send securityforces and act with violence, we will never give up," said Gerba.

Land is at the heart of the problem. Under Ethiopia's constitution, all landbelongs to the state, with owners legally considered tenants, raising fearsamongst the Oromo that a wave of dispossession is on its way. "For farmers in Oromia and elsewhere in the country, their land is everything,"said Felix Horne, a researcher at Human Rights Watch.

"It's critical for their food supply, for their identity, for their culture," he said. "You cannot displace someone from their land with no consultation and then inadequately compensate them and not expect there to be any response," Horne warned. Some Oromos have already seen their lands confiscated. Further west, in the town of Ambo, a woman named Turu wasexpropriated of her two hectares, receiving only $1 900 in compensation. "We had a good life before," she said. Today she struggles to support her four children and her disabled husband with the 30 birr a day ($1.40) she earns working in a factory. With their own language distinct from Ethiopia's official Amharic tongue, the 27 million Oromo make up nearly 30% of the country's population.

"The Oromos are seen as more of a threat by the government in partbecause they are by far the largest ethnic group," said Horne. The proposed expansion of Addis is part of a 25-year development plan toboost the city's infrastructure and attract new investors. It sparked demonstrations last year, but on a smaller scale. A bloody crackdown on protesters in Ethiopia -HRW

The Oromo struggle for Ethiopian freedom! Solidarity with protesting Oromostudents: Other university students break the silence and joined the Oromo compatriots in distress! Other university students also should break the silence and join the Oromo compatriots.

(HRW) Student protests are spreading throughout Ethiopia’s Oromia region, as people demonstrate against the possibility that Oromo farmersand residents living near the capital, Addis Ababa, could be evicted from their lands without appropriate – or possibly any – compensation. Social media is filled with images of bloodied protesters; there are credible reports of injuries and arrests in a number of towns; and local police havepublicly acknowledged that three students have died so far.

The current protests echo the bloody events of April and May 2014, whenfederal forces fired into groups of largely peaceful Oromo protesters, killing dozens. At least hundreds more students were arrested, and manyremain behind bars. Both then and today, the demonstrators are ostensibly protesting the expansion of Addis Ababa's municipal boundary into the surrounding Oromia region, which protesters fear will displace Oromo farmers from their land. But these protests are about much more:Many Oromos have felt marginalized and discriminated against by successive Ethiopian governments and have often felt unable to voice their concerns over government policies.

Of the student protesters detained in 2014, some have been released. Those I spoke with told me about the torture they endured as part of interrogations. But countless others remain in detention. Some have been charged under Ethiopia's draconian counterterrorism law for their role in the protests; others languish without charge in unknown detention centersand military camps throughout Oromia. This week, five students were convicted of terrorism-related offenses for their role in the protests.

There has been no government investigation into the use of live ammunition and excessive force by security personnel last year. Ethiopia's tight restrictions on civil society and media make it difficult to corroborate the current, mounting allegations and the exact details of theongoing protests emerging from towns like Haramaya, Jarso, Walliso, andRobe. The government may think this strategy of silencing bad news is succeeding. But while the fear of threats and harassment means it is oftenmonths before victims and witnesses come forward to reveal what happened in their communities, they eventually do, and the truth will emerge.

The government should ensure that the use of excessive force by its security personnel stops immediately. It should then support an independent and impartial inquiry into the conduct of security forces in the current protests – and last year's as well. Those responsible for serious abuses should be fairly prosecuted. This would be the best way for the Ethiopian government to show its concern about the deaths and injuries inflicted on the students, that it does not condone the use of live ammunition against peaceful protesters, and that those who break the laware appropriately punished.

URBANIZATION: City life meets losers & winners!

Violent clashes in Ethiopia over 'master plan' to expand Addis -theguardian December 11, 2015: By Endalk Chala for Global Voices, part of the Guardian Africa network Extending capital into surrounding farmland is part of ongoing discriminationagainst Oromo people, say protesters. Global Voices reports.

At least 10 students are said to have been killed and hundreds injured during protests against the Ethiopian government's plans to expand the capital city into surrounding farmland. According to Human Rights Watch,the students were killed this week when security forces used excessive force and live ammunition to disperse the crowds.

Analysis 'Ethiopia's media crackdown is bad news for Africa'
Without a free press in Addis Ababa, Africans are being locked out of the important decisions being made in their de facto capital, writes Simon Allison. The students were protesting against a controversial proposal, known as "the master plan", to expand Addis Ababa into surrounding Oromia state, which they say will threaten local farmers with mass evictions. According to the Ethiopian constitution, Oromia is one of the nine politically autonomous regional states in the country, and the region'sOromo people make up the largest ethnic group in Ethiopia.

However, rights groups say the Oromo have been systematically marginalised and persecuted for the last 24 years. By some estimates, there were as many as 20,000 Oromo political prisoners in Ethiopia as of March 2014. It's not the first time the security forces have reacted violently to protests in support of the group. At least nine students were killed in May 2014 while defending the rights of famers in the region whenthe "master plan" was first announced.

In response to the violence, Amnesty International issued a report on government repression last year, noting that "between 2011 and 2014, atleast 5,000 Oromos [were] arrested based on their actual or suspected peaceful opposition to the government."

The human rights organisation found that in numerous cases "actual or suspected [Oromo] dissenters were detained without charge or trial, killedby security services during protests, arrests and in detention." The ruling elite and members of government are mostly from the Tigray region, which is located in the northern part of the country.

Social media
The Ethiopian media has paid little attention to the protests. Demonstrators have been taking to Facebook and Twitter to report the clashes, with additional coverage coming from diaspora media. "The Oromo youth are a powerful political entity capable of shaking mountains," one Facebook user, Aga Teshome, wrote in support of the protesters. "This powerful political entity is hell bent on exposing the [ruling party] EPRDF government’s atrocious human rights record and allround discriminatory practices.”

Desu Tefera echoed the calls for better media coverage: “We call upon themedia to investigate the conditions that these students died trying to expose and resist,” he wrote. “Oromia needs a new kind of reporting by the international media, which gives voice to the voiceless Oromo people, who for a very long time have been killed, mistreated, abused, neglected and repressed in Ethiopia.”

Dubious development

For many Ethiopians, this week’s clashes show that the issue of Oromo rights refuses to go away. Protests against the master plan for expansionfirst began in April last year, when students from outside the capital argued that if the proposal was implemented, it would result in Addis further encroaching into the surrounding territory, allowing the capital tosubsume surrounding towns and leaving informal settlements vulnerableto government redevelopment.

The government rejected the accusation, claiming that the plan was intended only to facilitate the development of infrastructure such as transportation, utilities and recreation centres. The unrest halted the development until now, but in November resentment boiled over againwhen it became clear the government had resumed its plan.

Since the highly contested 2005 national election forceful evictions andurban land grabbing have become frequent in Addis and its environs, opposition groups say. The city’s rapid growth has resulted in increasing pressure to convert rural land for industrial, housing or other urban use. The population of the capital is estimated to have grown at a rate of 3.8%per year since 2007, but the repurposing of land in order to accommodatethe expansion has been a particularly contentious issue.

Ermias Legesse, a high profile government defector, has argued that since2000 the Addis Ababa city municipality, with the support of the federal government, has enacted five different pieces of legislation to “legalise” informal settlements, allowing them to be sold on to private property developers. “Sometimes the informal settlers are given only a few days’ notices before bulldozers arrive on the scene to tear down their shabby houses and lay foundations for new investors,” Legesse said in an interview last week.A version of this article first appeared on Global Voices

PAN-AFRICANISM

Years from the 5th Pan-African Congress (PAC) Now:Why Silence, No Commemoration?!

Excerpted from Network of Ethiopian Scholars Commentary No. 38November,2015 By Mammo Muchie

Inspiration

"It is better to die for an idea that will live, than to live for an idea that willdie." Steve Biko "The enemies of a people are those who keep them in ignorance." Thomas Sankara "Let us all agree to die a little, or even completely so that African unity may not be a vain word" Ahmed Ben Bella"We regard it as the sacred duty of every African state to strive ceaselessly and energetically for the creation of a United States of Africa from Cape to Cairo and Madagascar to Morocco." Robert Sobukwe

"There is no time to waste. We must either unite now or perish." Julius Nyerere" "The People of Africa should be yearning for unity" Anonymous"Africa is the Spiritual Frontier of human kind." W.E.B. DuBois

I. How Many of Us Truly Know the PAC?

I am truly puzzled when I met my strong pan African sisters and brothersand asked them: do you know it is now 70 years when the fifth Pan African Congress was held in Manchester, UK in 1945… I too had to be aware of it from the editor of the THINKER suggesting to me to contributea thought piece on the 70s

PAC. As all my friends all said- really? I too was in the same predicament. This is not good at all.
We all do not remember or if we do know we remain silent about it failingto recognise at least to do a commemoration event… I got very sensitive and start asking all of us we should all have recollected and commemorated it and use the 70 years toreflect uponthe African journey to go beyond the difficultpast inorder to join all Africans globally togetherto make the united and renascent Africa's bright future. I noticed there was only one meeting that was held in Manchester but I tookdiscovered itwhen I looked for if there was anything done at all. (www.crowdfunder.co.uk/70th-anniversary-of-the-5th-pan-african-congress)
We have to keep on reflecting: Do we Africans know where we have been;do we also know where we are now and indeed where we are going? If wewant to know, we should look back and revive our history to draw lessonsto facilitate our journey. Such historical moments provide the opportunity to reflect on how we can re-educate ourselves to move forwards and upwards by avoiding embarking on the wrong journey towards making a free and well-being anchored future.

II. The Different Phases of three Pan-African Congresses (PAC)

The first phase of PAC started until 1944 and 1945 entirely in the Diasporaworld. The fifth Pan-African Congress was held between October 15-21 in 1945 in Manchester by creating a paradigm shift to the pan-African movement (first was expressed as Ethiopianism) that started in 1776, followed by the preparation first as the pan-African association in 1897, later launching the first Pan-African Conference in 1900 in London,.
Subsequently a series of congresses were launched where the first Pan- African Congress was held in 1919 in Paris the 2ndand 3rd Congress in, 1921, and 1923 in London and in 1927 the 4th held in New York and thePan-African federation in Manchester in 1944 lead by Kwame Nkrumah and Jomo Kenyatta.

What makes the fifth Pan-African Congress distinctive and significant is that the pan-African call to use any means necessary to de-colonise Africafully emerged as a manifesto not just in the continent itself for the first time but also globally.The minimum we should have done is to remember the 50, 60, 70, 80, 100 years of this critical historical milestone. It was organised mainly by the Trinidadian George Padmore andKwame Nkrumahwith the presence of Africans bothfrom home and abroad to pursue a global pan-African project.

George Padmore joined the Ghanaian Government after Ghana's independence in 1957 and said that if he had another life, he would havespent it entirely in Africa and for Africa.

The second phase of Pan-African Congress was held after the political independence of the 1960s. After the historic 5th Pan-African Congress, ittook nearly 30 years to re-launch the 6th Pan-African Congress. Why it took so long is a mystery to me. The 6th Pan African Congress took placeinTanzania in1974 and the 7th in Uganda in 1994. Andduring 2013 and 2014 the 8th Pan-African Congress was held in Johannesburg first and later in Accra twice this time on the same year when in the past it took nearly a 30 years gap to do it and now the 70 years is literally missed.
The organisers in Johannesburg did not include Governments where I wasalso a participant. They wanted to anchor Pan-Africanism to diffuse learning and awareness among the people, intellectuals and civil society. The one held in Accra had Governmentrepresentation

Given these varied take on the Pan-African Congress, you can see how critically important it is to have not missed to remember the 70 years of the 5th Pan-African Congress to reach the Global South very much as we all tried to highlight the Diamond Jubilee of the Bandung 1955 Conference (.http://www.zehabesha.com/the-bandung-diamond-jubilee-time-to- rebuild-world-order-based-on-a-new-culture-and-civilisation/).

We need a new third phase of PAC by organising and making it very distinctive, original, essential, relevant, consistent and periodic by doing itwithout fail. The PAC from here on should be linked as part of a comprehensive and unified movement to create African systems, governance and institutions for building African unity and renaissance notto be talked about but to be fully realised by learning constructive lessonsfrom all the efforts of the past..

As the 5th PAC influenced the creation of a post-colonial Africana world, the 70th year commemoration could have highlighted the African unity and renaissance new era based on Africa's principal role to create a new humanity, new history and new civilisation by adding to the post-colonialobjectives also Africa's deep values and the African unity and renaissancefuture that can contribute to a better world for all. That the 5th PAC becomes revitalised and remembered always means also still to this day PAC remains as the most powerful and most relevant inspiration to promote sustainably the global pan-African project that is also a great contribution to create a better world for all… All the relevant stakeholdersneed to be reached, but who amongst them all should anchor this global pan-African project. It must be primarily the people of Africa that must make the African history and future to run

African agenda for unity, renaissance and transformation… The opportunity to re-think and re-engineer this process now must not be missed. Africa unite should never remain a slogan; it can be converted into reality. The third phase of a revitalised Pan-African series of Congresses with structured and agreed time lines and well-thought out plans and outcomes is needed until Africa is fully united and the current fragmented existence is overcome for good.

III. PAC for Realising Africa's Full Agency

What is the potential to re-position the Pan-African Congresses to be one of the key drivers to make Africarealise and achieve a fully post- colonialagency by exercising comprehensive economic and political independence and freedom?The current African states have been good in declaring the need for African unity since 1963 by using the meetings and protocols of the heads of states and the ministers; but there has not been any systematic implementation of at least even in a few areas, such as forexample the creation of African labour mobility boldly rejecting the cynicalcolonial borders that the existing 54 states spend so much to keep alive when these costly divisive schemes should have been removed a long time ago.. Unity should have been an on-going process. The Europeans had the Second World War. The French and the British as allies were at war with the Germans. They decided after post World War II to establish first NATO with the USA. Next they founded the European Union. They managed to create labour mobility, and now inter-European trade is said to havereached nearly 70 %. Africa has more reason to unite than Europe,but it is very far behind in realising its unity project. Substantive commitment requires that action not declarations be taken to implement unity. The people in Africa should have been involved in making African unity. The Pan-African Congress can be a tool to educate for the Pan- African empowerment of the people.

In Europe, the people are invited to vote for membership in EU or not. They even keep doing it now. Britain is going to do another one soon. ThePan-African Congresses should become the means to make African peoplethe change-makers. Both the African unity and renaissance should be made by the people and the people of Africa. African history can only be made by African people. The Pan-African congresses should be the ways to construct the future and not dwell in the past. It is time to move on to bring new Pan-African achievements to make the African future shine withmoral and well-being radiance. We need new innovative initiatives to promote Africa's overall Pan-African development. Some of the initiatives we have taken can fall perfectly within a revitalised grand Pan-African Congress revival. We have started in 2010 the African Unity for renaissance conferences in South Africa. We held it in Soweto this year and if these series of annual conferences rotate across Africa they can strengthen the awareness for launching pan-African congresses to launch them with the significance of the 1945 , 5th Pan-African Congress by linking this education with the African liberation day in the month of May every year. We have produced a series of declarations, the latest being the Soweto Declaration(http://www.forumdesalternatives.org/en/soweto- declaration)

One recent activity we did is the Pan-African Talent initiative (PATI). Its main purpose is to turn Africa as the talent innovation hub of the world. Africa should be the talent destination not as it is reported widely now asthe talent departure zone of the world. Talent retention, talent gain and not drain, talent reverse migration must be promoted and all the stakeholders and particularly the private and corporate world must contribute substantially to raise the funds to promote employable talentedgraduates by participating actively in the training process to avoid the current unacceptable skills mismatch. A PATI Returning Talent Fund (RTF)is established. The first inaugural conference for PATI-RTF was held in Tshwane University of Technology in Pretoria (www.pati-global.com) with the participation of private sector, students, professors, government to create sustainable collaboration to promote talent gain in and for Africa.

We havealso opened also an education platform for African unity and renaissance for anintegrateddevelopment. (https://www.facebook.com/groups/1046983685329854/). The contribution of Africa to the world is rich and platforms to educate Africansand the world using the current e-learning outlets to reach all must be promoted. A new approach to generate positive understanding of Africa by challenging the current dominance of portraying Africa as a passive participant in the creation of knowledge is much needed.Africa has contributed though it is not recognised and appreciated and will no doubt also contribute hugely to the whole world. The knowledge, struggle and spiritual narratives that are negative must be surpassed and the excavation of Africa's rich contributions from the past to the present as the foundation for the future must be done without fail… There is a need to spread education using a variety of e-learning platforms.

IV. Concluding Remarks

It is about time to re-imagine Africa with the capacity to innovate unity and renaissance. No pan-African unity means, no African agency, if there is no unity and agency, there will be no African renaissance for Africans toown their own economy today and even in 2063! African unity is critical torealise the full synergy of political and economic independence. The unity must have been yesterday; but let the failure to unite yesterday be a commitment to stop delaying African unity and renaissance anymore and do it today. Let the 70th year Pan-African Congress is re-positioned like the 5th one to create a new paradigm shift to start a distinctive third phase of PAC by making the African unity and renaissance a reality now not tomorrow!

Finally the 70 years of the Pan-African Congress should be used as a learning resource to reach millions both in Africa and across the world andshould not have been ignored or forgotten. Let us not forget it anymore.

Let us not only remember but also do a great PAC moment to diffuse pan-African education to reach all in the world by using all available avenues and outlets. There is still time. Let us all try to do it and make it the means to re-imagine innovative and renascent united Africa to take place now… E-mail: Mammo.Muchie@gmail.com www. pati-global.com& www.sarchi-steid.org.za

Ethiopian News Politics Economy:

UN Calls for Massive International Funding for Ethiopia's Drought December 9, 2015 The United Nations today stepped up its efforts to mitigate the effects of the worst drought to strike Ethiopia in 30 years, with an appeal from the heads of four UN humanitarian bodies for massiveinternational funding now to pre-empt the high risk of death and large scale suffering later. "We know this is coming. We know how to prevent it.We simply have to act, now," they wrote in an opinion article for the Huffington Post. "So far, donors have provided an additional $200 million in aid, but there are early indications that the amount needed to make sure lives are not lost could be around $1 billion. Ethiopia needs that money now, if we are to avert a second tragedy in 30 years," they added,referring to the catastrophic drought that killed hundreds of thousands from 1983 to 1985.

The four senior officials – UN Under-Secretary-General for Humanitarian Affairs and Emergency Relief Coordinator (OCHA) Stephen O'Brien, UN High Commissioner for Refugees (UNHCR) Antonio Guterres, UN World Food Programme (WFP) Executive Director Ertharin Cousin, and UN Children's Fund (UNICEF) Executive Director Anthony Lake – stressed thatEthiopia is far different from 30 years ago and its Government is now leading the way with decisive action.

“With the leadership of the Government and the support of the international community, Ethiopians can survive this crisis without witnessing a repeat of the devastating famine that claimed hundreds ofthousands of lives 30 years ago,” they wrote, noting that back-to-backdroughts exacerbated by the strongest El Niño phenomenon on record have pit 10 million people in need of Government support.

By early next year, projections indicate that 400,000 children could sufferfrom Severe Acute Malnutrition, a potentially fatal condition that requiresimmediate treatment, with some having massive loss of body fat and muscle that makes them look almost elderly, and others becoming puffy with their hair.

Ethiopian Prime Minister, Hailemariam Desalegn, has told a local private newspaper that Saudi Arabia and the UAE will bear the consequences of Ethiopia’s response if their operation in and around Eritrea’s Port of Assabsupports the ‘Eritrean regime’s destabilization agenda against Ethiopia.’ He made the remarks after a recent United Nations monitoring group report indicates that Saudi Arabiaand the UAE have leased the Port of Assab for 30 years from the Eritreangovernment in their coalition to fight the Houthis in Yemen.

“They have assured us that they would not be engaged in activities that would endanger the peace and security of Ethiopia. They have said this isonly a choice of tactical convenience to their operation in Yemen and thatthey would evacuate the area as soon as the mission is completed,” Hailemariam told The Reporter newspaper. “We have also stressed that they will bear the consequences of our response if their operation in the area supports the Eritrean regime's destabilization agenda against Ethiopia. Although we understand their objective, we were not consultedbefore the countries reached to this agreement."

The Premier also told reporters of the newspaper during his first interview with a local private media outlet that Ethiopia absolves itself of any responsibility in case of disruptions to their operation in the area due to itsproportionate response to any provocations by the Eritrean regime.

"Although we understand their objective, we were not consulted before the countries reached to this agreement. We have a right to protect the sovereignty of our country. And this might depend on the actions of the Eritrean regime," Hailemariam said. The Prime Minister, however, said that there is no evidence Saudi Arabia and the UAE had leased the Port ofAssab from Eritrea for 30 years.

Experts say the relationship between Eritrea and Ethiopia is arguably the most important and volatile in East Africa. The fall-out between the formerbrothers-in-arms initiated a two-year-long border war in 1998, which claimed around 100,000 causalities, and cost billions of dollars. Many say the 'now war, now peace' situation between the two countries continues toserve as the main source of regional instability in the Horn of Africa.

Denouncing the killings of protesters and proposing the only solution. Ethiopian opposition calls for international community to step in and stop government killings. TheEthiopian opposition coalition led by Beyene Petros, President of the Ethiopian Federal Democratic Unity Forum, Merara Merara Gudina, Vice- President of the Ethiopian FederalDemocratic Unity Forum, Gebru Gebre Mariam, General Secretary of the Ethiopian Federal Democratic Unity Forum , told reporters during a press conference in Addis Ababa. December 23, 2015

December 23, 2015 Opposition News Oromo protests set to continue in Ethiopia. In an interview with DW, Dr. Merara Gundina, a spokesman of the Ethiopian Federal Democratic Unity Forum accused the government ofabusing the country's constitution with its plans to expand the capital Addis Ababa.

In an interview with Deutsche Welle (DW), a spokesman of the EthiopianFederal Democratic Unity Forum accused the government of abusing thecountry's constitution with its plans to expand the capital

Addis Ababa.
Violence and chaos gripped Ethiopia this week as thousands of demonstrators took to the streets in protest against government plans to expand the capital Addis Ababa. Human Rights Watch said at least 75 people were killed in a bloody crackdown by heavily armed security forces.The demonstrations have spread to several towns since November, when students spoke out against plans to expand the capital into Oromia territory, a move the Oromo people consider a land grab.

INTERVIEW
DW spoke to Merara Gundina, chairman of the opposition OromoFederal Congress, in Addis Ababa.

DW: What exactly are you demonstrating against?

Merara Gundina: The Addis Ababa Master Plan is part of a larger land grabby the Ethiopian government around Addis Ababa, which has displaced notless than 200,000 people. Secondly, under federalism all the boundaries are being eroded by the ruling party which is bent on taking the land.
People are very angry with the government and people who wanted to seechange are frustrated.

Under the Ethiopian constitution all land belongs to the state, with peopleliving there legally considered tenants. Doesn't this allow the governmentto carry out any developments that may serve the interests of all Ethiopians?

No, no, the government is misusing it. The constitution says the land belongs to the public so it doesn't allow the government simply to tell thepeople "go away" and it takes the land. No, it says there are bonds of state in the name of the people and there are individuals owning the land.It is the ruling party that is misusing the constitution. In fact, the state itself is privatising the country. We understand you have vowed to continue the demonstrations despite the killings and Prime Minister Hailemariam Desalegn declared on television that the government would act without mercy.

Is it not better to solve these issues through talks?
We continue to support the cause of our people. We continue our peacefulstruggle. We cannot be intimidated as the government has done. We havepopular support, we have millions of people behind us. The government cannot silence us easily. We are following the constitution but we are against the arbitrary misuse of the constitution by the ruling party. Our people will continue.

Is it true that your organization is getting support from outsiders?
The diaspora is far away. It's school kids, high schools and universities and the government is simply accusing the left and the right. Probably thediaspora is very active in the media because the local media are totally controlled by the government. We have no access to the media and the diaspora have some media outlets and they report what is happening in the country. But a diaspora of a few thousand cannot move millions of people.

Ethiopian News & Politics:

Unity Day, Ethiopia and Eritrea Richard Lyman

Ethiopia Peace Corps Diaries: From March 31, 2013:

November 18, 1962 was a day of public celebration in Gondar. Our PeaceCorps director, Harris Wofford, arrived from Asmara and accompanied usto the “Unity Day – Ethiopia and Eritrea” celebration on Tukul Hill.

There gathered were many hundreds of local nobles and officials from throughout the province. The Governor and other high officials were sheltered in a large army tent where a crush of men tried to sit as close tothe Governor as possible. The celebration was held in recognition of the Eritrean assembly vote which dissolved the Federation of Eritrea with Ethiopia and allowed Eritrea to be annexed to Ethiopia.

A week after the event I spoke with a Tigryean merchant from Asmara who told me that the Emperor got the approval of the Eritrean Assembly by sending army trucks throughout Eritrea rounding up all the Assembly members and hauling them to Asmara at gun point. He went on to relate that the Ethiopian government would not let any of the American or European Counsels near the Assembly members on the day of the voting. A year later while I was learning more about Ethiopian agriculture during atwo weeks’ stay at Alamaya Agricultural College, a student whose father had been a member of the Eritrean Assembly corroborated what the merchant had reported.

Two menus were offered at the Unity celebration. One. roasted lamb and other cooked wats, was served under a thatched roof tukul (a picnic type shelter) which was constructed on the mountain summit. Today, on the site of the tukul the very nice Ghion Hotel where John and I stayed on ourvisit to Gondar six years ago now stands. We and other foreigners were ushered into the tukul to eat with all the priests of the area. The other menu which was for the hundreds of men seated along the path leading up the mountain consisted of large hunks of raw beef served with lots of talla and teg. The large metal trays of still warm (straight from the cow) beef were carried on the shoulders of dozens of smartly dressed soldiers.

Upon our arrival in Addis, Ethiopia we had been served chopped pieces of raw beef but we never encountered half pound size hunks of raw beef. It was most intriguing to watch the guests holding the hunks of beef in one hand as their other hand cut the beef by slashing downward between theirfingers using very sharp knives. I cringed imagining the potential damage to a hand had the knife slipped. The smaller piece of beef was then dippedinto an extremely spicy pepper sauce before it was eaten.

My interest in eating customs was in part the result of my having read Alan Moorehead's Blue Nile which had just been published in 1962. My mother had sent me a copy which I loved reading because so much of it was drawn from James Bruce's Travels to Discover the Source of the Nile,in the Years 1768….1773. During that time Bruce lived in Gondar and recorded five volumes of observations on life in the Kingdom. Upon the publication of Bruce's Journals in 1790, Moorehead related that there wasskepticism in England about some of the customs like eating raw meat that Bruce reported. Moorehead's account of the British incursion into Ethiopia in the mid 19th century was particularly vivid because our provincial governor still had the shotgun that Emperor Teodros used to take his life rather than be captured by the British.

We avoided eating raw meat because of the prevalence of tapeworms. In my second diary posting "Lalibela and a Mule Journey across Ethiopia" I related our journey to visit the ancient churches of Lalibela and our five day return journey by mule to Gondar. On our last day in Lalibela, after the Easter fast, some men killed a cow. At the time I had a conversation with Kassahun, one of the students who accompanied us to Lalibela, aboutthe hazards of eating raw beef. He ate it anyway and some months later asked me to accompany him to the hospital to get medicine to purge the tapeworm he had acquired.

I so enjoyed Moorehead's book and his frequent references to Bruce's Journals that on my journey home in 1964 I stopped in London and inquired in an antiquarian bookshop about the availability of a set of the Journals. By chance the shop had just acquired a set when they purchasedthe library from an old estate. I remember the bookseller telling me "But, they are in the basement and you won't want them because they have broken bindings." On the spot I bought all five volumes of the 1790 first edition for only $40. They were a delight to read because the set had beenowned by an old empire loyalist who had penciled numerous opinions and comments along the margins.

In rereading Moorehead's Blue Nile I find no reference to the mapmakingof the Italian, Vincenzo Coronelli. In recent years I have been collecting old maps and one that intrigues me was published by Coronelli in 1690 inhis Atlante Veneto. Coronelli's map of the source of the Blue Nile shows asmall river entering the west side of Lake Tana which is south of Gondar and the Blue Nile emerging from the Southeast corner of that vast lake.

Coronelli's sources were several 16th century Portuguese Jesuits whoroamed about present day Ethiopia and whose hand drawn maps andjournals were available to Coronelli

The Coronelli map does not mention Gondar by name. However, it shows a large city in the mountains a short distance northeast of Lake Tana. I find it hard to believe that Bruce did not have access to Coronelli's AtlantaVeneto and its wonderfully detailed map of the Lake Tana/Nile area.
Coronelli's map could have been a "Rand McNally" map for Bruce to follow.Bruce's legacy is his detailed account of the flora and fauna and life in Ethiopia in the mid 18th century. However, despite all his hardships and adventures in making the journey I find it doubtful that he "discovered"anything, let alone the source of the Nile.

ETHIOPIA FEATURED Source: BBC
7 Things You Don't Know About Haile Selassie, Former Emperor of Ethiopia: Who was theRastafarian messiah?

King, God or Redeemer?
Think about Rastafari and you'll immediately conjure images of the charismatic reggae master Bob Marley and his headful of swirling dreadlocks. Marley is certainly a Rastafari icon, but there is another man at the heart of the Jamaican movement. He is Ras Tafari: that was the birth name of Ethiopia's 225th and last emperor, who was born on 23 July1892, and took the regal name Haile Selassie I when he was crowned. ForRastas, he is God (or Jah) incarnate – the redeeming messiah.

Nearly 8,000 miles separate Addis Ababa, the capital of Ethiopia, and Kingston, Jamaica, but a link between them was forged by a number of poor black Jamaicans who believed Ras Tafari's coronation was the fulfillment of a prophecy and that he was their redeemer, the messiah written of in the Bible's Book of Revelation: "King of Kings, Lord of lords".They believed he would arrange for a deliverance, which, as they saw it, involved a miraculous transformation. They would be spirited away from their lives of poverty in the Caribbean and relocated in Africa, the land oftheir ancestors and their spiritual epicentre.

2. From Ras Tafari to Haile Selassie: Emperor Selassie uncovers a statuein his honour at his coronation in Addis Ababa. This video has no sound.

Tafari was a son of a chief adviser to Emperor Menelik III, one of Ethiopia's greatest rulers. Since childhood, his intelligence impressed theEmperor, who facilitated his political career. When in 1930 Menelik II's daughter Empress Zauditu died, Tafari was crowned emperor.

Haile Selassie's coronation was a lavish event attended by royals and representatives from all over the world. The New York Times reported onthe expensive gifts received by the attendees and speculated that the celebrations may have cost more than $3,000,000. Time Magazine dedicated its iconic cover to the Emperor: it was a world sensation.

Soon after his coronation, Haile Selassie gave Ethiopia its first written constitution, which greatly restricted the powers of Parliament. Effectively,he was the Ethiopian government. Succession to the throne was restrictedto his descendants and, the constitution stated, "the person of the Emperor is sacred, his dignity inviolable, and his power indisputable."
But in Jamaica, Haile Selassie was becoming more than the name of apowerful emperor.

3. Marcus Garvey and the vision of Africa

"Look to Africa when a black king shall be crowned, for the day ofdeliverance is near." This was the prophecy that started it all.

The prophecy was Marcus Garvey's. Garvey was a Jamaican activist who campaigned for political and social change on an island that had been animportant centre for slavery. After the slave trade was abolished in 1833and Abraham Lincoln's Emancipation Proclamation freed "all persons heldas slaves", life did not improve dramatically for ex-slaves, their children and successive generations of black people.

It's unclear whether the "black king" Marcus Garvey had referred to was an actual person; more likely, he meant it as a symbolic figure. But, whennews of Haile Selassie's coronation in 1930 reached Jamaica, many of Garvey's followers made what seemed to them a logical link. Ras Tafari was the king, and so the day of deliverance was imminent. That meant they should prepare themselves for an exodus to Africa.

Although Marcus Garvey was never actually a Rastafarian, he is considered to be one of the religion's prophets, as his ideals heavilyshaped the Rastafarian philosophy.

Only a few years after Haile Selassie's coronation, Ethiopia becameinvolved in a terrible war.

4. War in Ethiopia

In 1935, Benito Mussolini's troops invaded Ethiopia and, in 1936, Haile Selassie fled in exile with his family. That year, he delivered a famous speech to the League of Nations in Geneva, appealing for help to fight theinvaders.

Although during that time he tried to raise awareness for the Ethiopian cause in Europe, Selassie spent five years away from his country. He stayed mainly at Bath's Fairfield House, but he also briefly stayed in London – a time that is commemorated by a bust in the city's Cannizaro Park – and in Malvern, in Worcestershire. Marcus Garvey heavily criticisedhim for leaving his own countrymen at the mercy of Italy. Haile Selassie reinstituted his powers as emperor in 1941, with support from Britain.

Visit to Jamaica

On April 21, 1966, Haile Selassie visited Jamaica. This was 36-years afterhis coronation and the enthusiasm of Rastas was undimmed. There was now a new generation of Rastas, many of whom still harboured the visionof an African exodus.

Haile Selassie was overwhelmed by the rapturous reception.

He did nothing to dispel thoughts of his divine status. By this time, Garveyhad died and his criticism of Haile Selassie forgotten in Jamaica. But around the world, the jury was not unanimous. Although he wanted to project the image of a progressive emperor, he faced accusations of beinga greedy dictator.

Among the rapturous crowds who turned out to honour their redeemerwas the wife of a 21-year-old Jamaican musician. He had just formed aband called the Wailers and his name was Robert Nesta Marley.

5. The Rastaman cometh

Bob Marley on stage at Brighton Leisure Centre, 1980

Bob Marley was arguably the most influential Rasta in history. He never claimed to be a prophet, though his songs had a prophetic character; andhe was never a leader, though his many followers treated him as one.

Marley and his band the Wailers, in 1973, released their album Catch a Fire. Two years later the album Natty Dread sold well internationally. Bothrecords were loaded with Rasta symbols and motifs, prompting music fansto ask questions about their meanings. By the time of the release of Rastaman Vibration in 1976, there were Rastas in practically every Britishcity and in many parts of North America.

Young black people had fashioned their hair into the long coiled dreadlocks, as worn by Marley, were carrying what were called prayer sticks (i.e. walking canes) and wearing clothes in the colours of the Ethiopian flag, green, yellow and red, usually with the addition of black.While their parents were, in the main, Christians, young blacks in placeslike London, Birmingham and Manchester, were drawn to a different theology, which incorporated a political critique.

All around them they saw evidence of Babylon, personified in the police,but were guided by an image of deliverance in the form of Africa.

6. I and I

Famine and revolution

Back at home, things took a turn for the worse for Emperor Selassie. In 1973, a terrible famine killed approximately 200,000 Ethiopians, mostly inWollo province.

Only a year later, the Derg, a group of army officers with a Marxist agenda, overthrew Haile Selassie in a military coup. Sick and imprisoned,he died in 1975.

'Lies of Babylon'

Haile Selassie's death was described by his followers as his 'disappearance', since they refused to believe he had passed away. Andwhen the subject came up, the phrase 'lies of Babylon' was frequently used in the Rasta community.

Many Rastas believed the white-dominated structure they called Babylonhad propagated a falsehood in an attempt to undermine the then fast- growing Rastafarian movement. Others discounted the news by pointingout that Jah (the Rasta name for God) had temporarily occupied the earthly body of Haile Selassie. The passing of Haile Selassie's body was merely a sign that Jah was not just a human being but also a spirit.

A third interpretation and the one most Rastas adhere to, concerns the concept I and I: this refers to the essential unity of all humanity; we mayinhabit different human bodies, but we are all spiritually united. Haile Selassie may have gone, but to see him as a single deity misunderstandsthe meaning of Rastafari: his spirit lies in all of us and can't be extinguished. From birth, we are all ephemeral bodies, but our souls live on.

7. How does Haile Selassie live in music?

Many musicians wrote songs inspired by Selassie. Bob Marley's song War,is almost verbatim from his speech before the United Nations in 1963.

Professor Sergew Hable Selassie (PhD)

ሥርግው ሐብለ ሥላሴ (ዶ/ር) 1929 - 2003

The Founder of the History Department of the Haile Selassie I University(known today as Addis Ababa University)....

Sergew Hable Selassie (Dr.) was born in Addis Ababa, Ethiopia on June 15, 1929. His father was Merigeta Hable-Selassie Zewdie and his motherwas Woizero Zewidtu Desta. Keeping with the custom of his time, he learned the Ethiopian alphabet and church scriptures at the feet of monastic fathers at Lideta Debir (Church of Our Lady) in Addis Ababa. Hethen progressed to obtain his elementary school education at Qdist Selassie (Holy Trinity) School in Addis Ababa.

As one of the first students selected by the Ethiopian government for study abroad, Dr. Sergew pursued his secondary school education at the Ecclesiastical School in Corinth, Greece. Upon completing high school in 1953, he stayed in Greece to pursue his university studies at The NationalUniversity in Athens, where he subsequently obtained his Bachelor degreein Theology in 1957. Dr. Sergew continued his quest for higher education by enrolling in Bonn University in Germany. He completed his post- graduate studies after being awarded his PhD in Ancient History in 1960.

Dr. Sergew commenced his service to his country upon his return to Ethiopia from Germany in 1961. He became a founding faculty member of the History Department of the Haile Selassie I University (known today asAddis Ababa University). He lectured on ancient and medieval Ethiopian history and various other courses at the university for 17 years, and contributed significantly to world forums and dialogues on Ethiopia’s rich history. In addition, he also taught theology courses at the Holy Trinity Seminary School.

Dr. Sergew’s scholarly endeavors didn’t end with the completion of his studies. During his tenure as a professor at Haile Selassie I University, he pursued and was awarded several fellowship opportunities with world- renowned academic institutions such as The University of London, HarvardUniversity, Princeton University, Heidelberg University and Leiden University. Dr. Sergew, a giant among Ethiopian scholars, has left a legacy of significant academic works and contributions that chronicle Ethiopia’s place in the annals of history which will forever serve those whopursue knowledge of this ancient land’s history and the history of her Orthodoxy.

A short list of Dr. Sergew’s major works includes:
Bibliography of Ancient and Medieval Ethiopian History, 1969.

Ancient and Medieval Ethiopian History to 1270, 1972 (This publication is widely regarded as the authoritative body of work on the period. It is usedas text at Addis Ababa University even today, and is available as referencematerial in the libraries of many of the world’s most prestigious colleges and universities.)

Biography of Emperor Menelik (in Amharic), 2000.
The Dictionary of The Ethiopian Orthodox Tewahido Church (In Amharic),1990.

Dr. Sergew was well versed in at least eight languages, which played an important role in his ability to conduct extensive research required in thecompilation of his writings. In addition, Dr. Sergew’s vast linguistic knowledge was instrumental in enabling him to author and extensively publish articles on his beloved Ethiopia in journals across several countries. The Making of TPLF's Paramilitary Death Squad: Agazi Murder Inc.

Sunday, January 17, 2016

Jeremy Scahill, founding editor of the Intercept, and National Security Correspondenttestifying before the United States Senate Judiciary Committee on December 9, 2010.

She looks much older than her actual age. One could guess she is sixty oreven older. The truth is that she is only forty-four. "I was born two years before the military took power" she says referencing history. Her wrinkledface, discolored skin, and greying hair tells a story of a women who endured unimaginable tragedy. Living has been hard for her over the lastdecade or so. "I lost my first born 10 years ago, when we the opposition won the election and they refused to relinquish power" she says her sightdisappearing into the horizon as if she is expecting someone to emerge from behind the "How did he die?" I asked following her into the housefrom the cool evening breeze outside where we spent the last fifteen minutes.

"They killed him in a broad day light along with his best friend. They were killed at the same spot the same day in Addis Ababa." She said, tears streaming over her wrinkling face. The depth of her anguish is too strong for words. I got up and sat close to her holding her hands. "who killed them?" I asked. She took a long pause, walked a few steps to close the door and whispered "Agazi, Agazi killed them" and handed me the picturesof her dead boys after kissing them couple of times. They were school graduation pictures. Smiling, aspirational and full of hope. The pictures were wet with her tears. Each drop spreading on the smiling faces of her children as if they were sharing a grief, crying together so to speak. I felt their presence in the room. May be the connection between a mother and child transcendence mortality, I don't know, but their spirits were palpablein the house where they grew up in before their lives were cut short. I took a sheet of tissue paper out of my pocket and wiped both pictures gently. As I looked at them, with an imploring look, I thought they would have been my brothers, nephews, cousins even children. They looked so familiar to me; even if I have never met them. Perhaps, they reminded me of my own youth.

Fearless, committed to and in love with the concept of democracy, freedom and justice. It is unfulfilled dream of my generation, the generation before me, and the current generation. “What a curse.” I murmured to myself. As I stood up to leave, the mourning mother gave me a warm hug and gently asked me to come and visit her again. I promised to return and left fighting my tears. On my way out I couldn’t help but to think of her loneliness, the eerie quite in the house once full ofplayful energy with two handsome boys. I tried to understand and even feel a mother’s sorrow. I can only pretend.

I have heard the name Agazi before, many times in fact. People in Ethiopia talk about Agazi with an understanding of some kind of foreignoccupying army. The actions of the group according to those who encountered or witnessed say Agazi’s “are a killing machine.
Indiscriminate killers who do not distinguish between children and adults,the elderly and the youth, men and women, armed and unarmed. They just kill, and it is fair to say that they appear to be enjoying killing.”

I spoke with one elderly man who was in the resistance against the occupying forces of Benito Mussolini during World War II and he equates Agazi with the Carabinieri of the fascist forces. “They don’t speak our languages, they don’t care for our culture and values. They come anytimethey wish, they sometimes snatch our men and boys; at other times theykill them on the spot. They occupy our villages, towns and cities. You see,that is exactly what the Carabinieri and Italian forces did.” His long white beard, wrinkled forehead and twinkly little eyes appear to be corroborating his story.

“We never had a government in our history with this level of cruelty against its own people. “You know what we did with Carabinieri? He says with a sense of pride and honor tangible in his voice. “With the help of God and our resistance fighters, we kicked them out.” He said. I can clearly hear his fierce patriotic fire. “We will do the same against these Agazi’s. The new generation have our spirit of resistance. It is a matter oftime. Our country will be free.” He said holding firm into his walking stick.It is a tragic irony of historical comparison but this is not the first time I have heard such a comparison. It attests to the unparalleled nature of theregimes violent behaviour.
Whereever there is popular discontent or revolt against the regime in anypart of the country Agazi appears from nowhere to crush it. I have heard numerous general stories in the past, about the group’s brutality and its utter disregard to human life. Having the opportunity to speak with a grieving mother who lost two of her beloved sons to Agazi sniper gave mea different perspective. A sorrowful curiosity. A desire driven by a tragedyto know and expose more about this notorious paramilitary group.

The name Agazi strikes fear and terror in Ethiopia the same way Caravanade la muerte (Caravan of Death) a Chilean Army Death Squad terrorized the country following the 1973 coup lead by Augosto Pinochet. Or GeneralJose Alberto Medrano's Organizacion Democratica Nacionalista (ORDEN)- the first paramilitary death squad in El Salvador involved in kidnaping, assassination, and torture of dissidents. Agazi as it is called, is a shadowy semi- autonomous paramilitary group accountable only to a select few senior echelon members of Tigray People's Liberation Front (TPLF). The group is named after one of the founding members of TPLF called Zeru Gessesse nick named Agazi. The group in real conventional military standard could be categorized as a private army resembling a mercenary group that is hired by war lords to protect their interest. It's operational command and control is outside of even the Tigray ethnic group dominated national defence structure. It's main purpose of existence is to ensure the regimes hold on power remains unchallenged even if it means burning a village, massacring civilians and terrorizing entire communities. The group established in the early days of TPLF have a mask of "fighting terrorism" to appease western donors for resources, training and armament. In reality, most of Agazi's work has been crushing domestic opposition against the regime.

A few investigative journalists have attempted to inquire about Agazi andthe role of foreign countries in the training and arming of this notorious group. Among these investigative reporters Jeremy Scahill is the most prominent and inquisitive in his search to find US's role of training similargroups in Afghanistan, Mali, Somalia and Yemen.

On December, 9, 2010 he testified before Congress and outlined his findings. His testimony covered wide range of issues including drone operations, US engagement with war lords in Somalia among many other related subjects. He questioned the US role in helping and enabling military units in these countries to terrorize their own civilian population under the guise of "fighting terrorism" According to Mr. Scahill "US SpecialOperations teams had long been in Ethiopia training its notorious Agazi Commandos." His investigative work shades light on the dangers of collaborating with regimes such as TPLF and its long term consequences both for the US and the people under the iron rule of authoritarian regimes.

Keeping my promise, I returned to visit the mother of two murdered young boys. It was a misty cool evening. She was puttering around her back yard. "I have to stay busy to keep my mind off from my children. I miss them." She says wiping the dirt from her hands. Her hug has a motherly embrace and warmth. I followed her to the house. "God bless you for coming to visit me." She says walking into the kitchen. "I am going to make you tea" she said. "Thank you!" I replied. In a few minutesshe returned with a cup of tea and a few biscuits on a small handmade basket. Our conversation waded into various subjects. She told me that many mothers these days wear black for their murdered children. She mentioned some by name. “My friends, members of our community, and people in the cities have someone killed in their families, these are dark days.” She said.

I returned to know more about her murdered children and also to see how she is holding up. She looked tired as if she hasn’t slept for days. I askedher if she is getting enough sleep. “Every time I close my eyes I see my boys. Coming back from school, helping me with some chores, or doing their homework.” I can’t sleep. I don’t remember the last time I had a good night sleep” she says. The depth of her pain, layers of the trauma resulting from the cruelty of state violence has taken a toll on her. “Where were they buried?” I inquired. “Oh not far from here it is a short walk. I go there every Sunday to talk to my boys.” “Would you take me today?” I asked “Yes, I’ll take you.” She quickly put her black shawl over her black dress and asked me to follow her “this way” she said, I followedher. We walked for about 15 minutes through a dry grass land with a narrow country side road. From a distance I see a few animals grazing.
After a short walk we reached the church compound. There were a few worshippers praying outside the church and others are just arriving. She kneeled before the main gate and said a few words of prayer. I followed suite. After a few steps she lead me to the graveyard where her two boyslie. As we get closer I can hear a soft voice followed by weeping. “Here” she said.

“They are sleeping here the same way they slept together at home when they were little boys, next to each other, my beautiful boys” said, wiping tears from her face. I tried to comfort her. Fighting my own tears. She told me the youngest only sixteen was shot and killed when he was takingpart in a peaceful protest. “There are many mothers like me in this country, thousands, who lost their children to Agazi bullet.

“I heard they were trained by the American’s. Is it true?” She asks me. There is some sense of forcefulness, even anger in her voice. “Yes, I haveheard the same story” I replied. “Why would they train and arm a group who will kills our children? I thought American’s were good people. Caringpeople.” “It is not the American people; it is the politicians who make these kind of decisions. I said trying to give her rational explanation. It meant a little comfort to her. “May be educated people like you should take our message to the American politicians and ask them to stop helpingthe Agazi kill our children.” I promised her I will make sure her message gets to the US policy makers, the US public and the wider world.

As I got up to leave she looked into my eyes with a plea that says “please let the world know our suffering. Please let those who train and arm Agaziknow that they are training indiscriminate killers. Let them know the sorrow of a mother who lost not just one but two of her children.” “What do you call a childless mother? I am childless because my children were murdered by the Agazi.” she said. I have no answer to all of her questions. I am not even sure she was expecting any answers from me orshe was simply expressing her sorrow out loud. May be both, but the truthis these are questions that I grapple with every day. I know also, that these are questions thousands of mothers across this country are asking. As we drove away, my eyes wondered through the country side, there areno children playing, no farmers on the field, no travellers on the roads.

There is an eerie feeling of life under siege. From a distance I can hear agun fire. Another young man, young women, an elder, who would be thevictim this time? Who would be Agazi’s prey? I wondered.

Lying in bed that night, I struggled to make sense of this brutality, the savagery of industrialized and institutionalized violence against innocent and un armed civilians. My mind roamed from place to place, from a mother’s tears to a father’s anguish. I tried to close my eyes with a hope of getting some sleep, but I couldn’t turn my mind off. I kept hearing “every time I close my eyes I see my boys.” I wondered if my visit made things even much worse for her emotionally. After numerous toss and turns, I gave up on falling asleep and I pulled a folded paper which I keepin my note book.
It was a poem by the Roman lyric poet Gaius Valerius Catullus (C. 84 –54BC) which he wrote for his dead brother.

“By strangers’ coasts and waters,Many days at sea,
I came here for the rites of your unworlding,Bringing for you, the dead,
These last gifts of the living
And my words — vain sounds for the man of dust.Alas, my brother, you have been taken from me. You have been taken from me
And by cold hands turned to shadow and my pain.
Here are the foods of the old ceremony appointed Long ago for the starvelingsunder the earth.
Take them.
Your brother’s tears have made them wet.
And take into eternity my hail and my farewell. ”

I read the poem a few more times in memory of men and women young and old who are murdered by Agazi forces since TPLF came to power. Themore I read it, I wanted to travel across this land, and talk to every singlemother whose child was murdered by Agazi forces. I wanted to somehow feel their pain or at least listen to it. Beyond my emotional upheaval and ambition, the practicality of my desire I realized, is almost impossible.

Given the sheer number of murders carried out by Agazi, I may have to travel for the next few years to reach only a small portion of mothers whowake up every morning with an empty chair at the table. Their children absent from their class rooms, young men and women who will not plan their weeding's and give them grandchildren.
In the end, my mind settled on a rational reasoning while my heart wanted to travel across the country and listen to all the mothers. Perhaps,it has a selfish ulterior motive of my own desire to reconnect with this beautiful land of my ancestors. The time and the place, the date and the season, or the person who fired the gun certainly might be different. The truth is that the story of mothers who lost their children, the degree of their pain, the trauma and the anguish they experience is the same whether they live in and around the northern mountains or near the western tropical forest, the central plains or the southern grassland, the east, the country side or the cities. It is all the same. Profound sorrow andunending pain.

For now, I have decided to tell the story of a mother that I know about. Amother, to whom I have the privilege and a great honor of meeting. A mother who I cannot name for now. Her two boys, their names and images permanently etched in my mind. With every rising sun they besiege and challenge me to continue to be on the side of justice and truth not power and privilege. It is the least I can do. (text ends)

US renews calls to the Ethiopian government to refrain from silencing dissentand respect constitutional rights ESAT News (February 11, 2016)

The US State Department on Tuesday renewed its call to the Ethiopian government to respect the democratic rights of citizens and refrain from silencing dissent. "We reaffirm our call on the Ethiopian Government to refrain from silencing dissent, and toprotect the constitutionally enshrined rights of all citizens – including the right to gather peacefully, to write, to speak freely as voices of a diverse nation," State Department Spokesperson, John Kirby said at a press briefing.

Responding to a question regarding the demonstration on Monday by Ethiopians whodemanded the Obama administration to press the Ethiopian government to open an independent probe into the killing of demonstrators in the Oromia region of Ethiopia, John Kirby, who avoided to answer the question directly, said the US remains "deeplyconcerned about the situation in Oromia, particularly following the recent widespreadprotests, many of which escalated into violent clashes between security forces and protesters. The government's heavy-handed response resulted in the death of numerous protesters and the arrests of many others, including journalists and political party leaders. We've raised our concerns both publicly and privately with the Government of Ethiopia, and there is universal agreement that the loss of life, including police officers and local officials, was unnecessary."
"I think we all understand that these protests are about more issues than just the plan," he said, referring to the integrated master plan to widen the capital city limit to farming communities that faced with serious opposition by the Ethiopians, particularlyby the Oromo community. “We’re concerned by the continuing stifling of independent voices there in Ethiopia and the arrests. They have a chilling effect on a much-needed public consultation to resolve legitimate political grievances there,” the spokesperson said.

Food aid to run out in Ethiopia unless donors step in, says charity

ESAT News (February 11, 2016)

Thomson Reuters Foundation quoted Save the Children as saying on Wednesday that “emergency food aid for 10 million Ethiopians hit by the worst drought in 50 yearswill run out in April unless donors provide more funds by the end of February

"The international community has just three weeks to provide $245 million in emergency food aid to help prevent a potentially catastrophic escalation in severe acute malnutrition (SAM) cases..." Reuters quoted the charity as saying in a statement. "If these emergency funds do not arrive in time, there is no question thatthere will be a critical fracture in the food aid supply pipeline," country director John Graham said in the statement. “The $245 million now being sought is the cost of foodaid for Ethiopia for the three months from May to July,” Graham said.

It can take four months to buy food aid and transport it into landlocked Ethiopia vianeighboring Djibouti's congested port, so the window for action "is rapidly closing,"the charity said. More than 400,000 Ethiopian children under five are predicted to suffer from severe malnutrition this year, and a further 1.7 million under-fives, pregnant women and breast-feeding mothers will need treatment for moderate malnutrition, Reuters reported.

5•አገዛዙ የደረሰበት (በድብቅ ሳያውቅ ያስፈፀሙው)ከባድ ወንጀል መኖር

ለዚህ አጭር ማስታወሻ በመጀመሪያዎቹ ሶስት ነጥቦች ላይ ትዝብቴን ማስፈር እፈልጋለሁ ። 1• "የእውነተኛ ዲሞክራሲን" ትርጉም ያለማወቅ

እንኳን ለሀይሌ የተለያዩ የፓለቲካል ኢኮኖሚ መጽሀፍቶችን ላገላበጡምሁራን የዴሞክራሲ ትርጉም ግልፅ አይደለም። በቃሉ ትርጉም መግባባት ሳይደረስ "ዲሞክራሲ ያስፈልጋል /አያስፈልግም?...አለ ወይስ የለም?

ስለዚህ እንደ አትሌት ሐይሌ ያሉ ሰዎች በትርጉምእና አስፈላጊነት ላይ ተደናግረውብንመለከት ሊገርመን አይገባም። አ ብዛኛውን ጊዜ እነ ሐይሌ አዲስ እውቀት የሚጨምሩት በቃላት ትርጉምላይ ልሂቃን እና ድርጅቶች ተስማምተውተመሳሳይ ንግግር ሲናገሩ ካዳመጡብቻ ነው። ድፍረት ባይሆንብኝ የእነ ሐይሌ የእውቀት መጨበጨስልቱ በአይን የሚታይ የተግባር እንቅስቃሴ እንጂ በንባብ እና ምርመራ የሚገኝ አይደለም ።

በንባብ የሚገኝ ቢሆንማኖሮ አንጋፋውፕሮፌሰር መስፍን "ዴሞክራሲ ወይምስልጣነ ሕዝብ ምንድነው?

”በሚለው ፅሁፋቸው ያሰፈሩትን በመመልከት ብቻ ግንዛቤ መጨበጥ በተቻለ ነበር። ፕሮፌሰር እንዲህ ይላሉ ፣
”ዴሞክራሲ ማለት የስልጣን ባለቤት ሕዝብ የሆነበት ስርአት ማለት ነው። መነሻውእና መድረሻውይህ የህዝብ የሥልጣን ባለቤትነት ነው። የሥልጣን ኮርቻውላይ መውጣትም ሆነ ከዚያ ኮርቻላይ መውረድ የሚቻለው በሕዝብ ፍቃድ ብቻ ነው” በማለት ይገልፁታል።
ፕሮፌሰሩ የዲሞክራሲን ትርጉም ብቻ አልሰጡንም። ዲሞክራሲን በራሳቸው መነጽር ሲመለከቱት ምን እንደሚሰማቸው እንደሚከተለውገልጸዋል ፣
”እኔ ዴሞክራሲን የማየውምንግዜም ደማቅ ብርሐን ያለበት ለጥያለ ሜዳ ላይ እንደተንጣለለና መጨረሻውእንደማይታይ ጥሩ የአስፋልት መንገድ ነው። ቁምነገሩ እዚያ መንገድ ውስጥ መግባቱ ነው። ብርሃኑ ማንኛውንምነገር አጋልጦ የ ሚያሳይ ሲሆን ለጥያለውየአስፓልት መንገድ ደግሞእንደልብ የሚያስጋልብ ነው። ”

Regime forces arrest dozens in Guji, South Ethiopia, as protest continues unabated ESAT News (February 12, 2016) Security forces arrested at least thirty seven peoplein Guji, south Ethiopia in a bid to crackdown on protesters who demanded political and economic justice in the region where poverty runs deep despite the prevalence gold mines and other gems, which are siphoned by the corrupt regime and its close allies. The regime sent its regular army to the region to silence the growing protest against MIDROC Gold, the company with close ties to the corrupt government and which has been mining 4.5 metric tons of gold every year for over 20 years. The locals were furious that they have gotten no benefits whatsoever when cronies of thegovernment amassed so much wealth from their land. They are also demanding for the release of prisoners of conscience and for the formation of a fair administration inthe region.

The army has rounded up people whom it deemed were leaders of the uprising. University students and members of opposition political parties were among those arrested in the latest round of crackdown by the security forces. A protester told thatthey were taking the protest to the rural areas as the towns have become too dangerous as the federal government keeps sending forces to squash protesters.

EBC: “there is no such thing as famine in Ethiopia these days.

17 Feb, 2016 - The ruling party (TPLF) continues to clamp down on all famine reporting in Ethiopia today told a BBC programme about the crisis.... “Three things cannot be long hidden: the sun, the moon, and thetruth.” Graham Peebles, a well known journalist and author reveals that “government duplicity and deceit” play an important role in the catastrophic food crises.

According to Peebles, "the ruling party – a brutal dictatorship, consumed with a distorted national image, despite democratic pretensions – lacks the political will and compassionate honesty to deal with the current situation openly. They have stopped people in Addis Ababa and elsewherecollecting funds for famine victims, and, consistent with past denials."

Former BBC World Service News' Africa editor Martin Plaut in a recent article in News Statesman argued, “Ethiopia’s “biblical” famines of 1973 –74 and 1984 – 85 left hundreds of thousands dead, probably around 200,000 and 400,000 respectively. The first resulted in the overthrow of Emperor Haile Selassie; the second contributed to the end of the Marxist regime of Mengistu Haile Mariam.”

The Famine Early Warning system (FEWS), the leading provider of earlywarning and analysis on food insecurity created by USAID, has been “reporting the figure of 15 million Ethiopians facing dire food shortages since early December 2015.
FEWS described Ethiopia as “the country with the largest acutely foodinsecure population in the world”.

HISTORIC ETHIOPIA

HIM Empress Menen Asfaw

Her message sentout from exile to her native citizens

First of all I would like to thank the Almighty for which our flag is replaced. Our patriots came forward with a victory after staying in the bush for five years. Secondly, any human being may receive great pleasure when he or she joins with his or her native birth place. With thegrace of the Almighty I was eager to see my native birth place of Wollo. Iam very happy as I am with her after 31 years.

Next, I am very grateful for the people who received me with great pleasur...e. All of you know that this naturally gifted, green country, unlike all other African countries, has never been under colony and has only been ruled by its own kings. After many trials Italy made propagandawarfare since she couldn’t manipulate our people. Through this campaign Italy tried to dismiss our unity and divide our people. After this Italy occupied our country, which has never been touched by an enemy, it oppressed our people. Is there anybody who did not miss their relative during the war? Some of our citizens were killed by bombs, weapons or machine gun. The Almighty made it possible for Ethiopia to defeat her enemy quickly.

We, the citizens and children, feel proud when we see our country freedfrom any aggression and we are very thankful unto the Almighty.
Ethiopian people have learned a good lesson from the past experience which enables us to cooperate as on mother’s children love one another. This experience forced every Ethiopian to struggle for their country’s independence and sovereignty. People without the right leader are victims, as this was seen during the five years of aggression. Indeed our people did not hate native rulers as long as they kept the language, custom and tradition of the people. But the Italians tried to rule in a subtleway. During the aggression, even though the enemy killed our people, patriots went to the bush and some went abroad in exile. This situation surprised the world.

My ladies and gentlemen of Wollo, our country has been free for 3000 years. With the fierce struggle of our children and the help of England, wefreed our country from Italy. So in the future we have to love our country,our flag and our King for our common motherland of Ethiopia. We must beone and united.

The crown prince is selected and has come up from you. Our beloved sonPrince Married Azmach Asfaw Wosen is with you. Even though we were physically separated for 31 years it is impossible to say I was living alienated from you, for I as with you spiritually. Our beloved son is your governor. You may service him loyally and kindly, and on the other handhe may share your problems and help you. He may administer you with good justice. Please, give him advice and assist him at any time. Let theAlmighty keep our country fertile and allow our flag to continue flying.”

HISTORIC ETHIOPIA

Emperor Menelik II: The father of modern Ethiopian nation,

Emperor Menelik II said to be a true federalist, a man who show a light to Ethiopia, the most controversial leader. The controversy came from peoplewho actually are more interested to twist history for the sake of their weakness. Menelik's story written by different people, but those who tried to characterize him as a butcher and the black Hitler are either naive or tried to get a profit for their own selves by twisting history in different direction. Luckily he is one of the most documented and photographed leader of Ethiopia, and many independent foreign visitors, historians, military personnels, etc.. wrote their eye witness account of what happened at the time of Menelik. Most writers saw his expeditions, rule, administration, etc. And they wrote the truth. Then why do we get a new generation of false horns who are trying to write a history of dooms day ofMenelik? History can be twisted and written in a false way, but historical records on their own time will embarrass those who lied on it. From my research Menelik II was a man who was a true leader who has colleagues,war lords, soldiers, officials, etc.. from every part of Ethiopia. His expedition was a salvation for many, not like those who propagate hate and massacre. The day will come for many to get embarrassed and for theEthiopians to be proud more than ever by his deeds and achievements.

POWER STRUGGLE

Lt. General Aman Mikael Andom aka "the desert Lion" Vs Majour Mengistu Haile Mariam the de-facto leader of the ruling ProvisionalMilitary Administrative Council (PMAC) commonly known as "the Duerg"

Lt. General Aman Mikael Andom was the FIRST Eritrean origin general tobecome symbolic military head of state of Ethiopia. He was killed in an exchange of fire at his home because of a speech he phrased for the public in Asmara Stadium. The speech was quoted as said "Victory to Eritrea, Victory to Ethiopia."

To get more background and biographical information on the history behind his death, you can read more about Lt. General Aman Andorn, the Duerg, the local term used to call the military co-ordination and steering committee (whose responsible for his assassination) and the Eritrean Liberation Front to give you more of an idea of the socio-political history that led up to these events, as well as the Ethiopian Civil War. The official cause of his death still remains undeclared as it is 'unclear' whether or nothe committed suicide or was killed by low-ranking officers, and non- commissioned members of the Duerg sent out to arrest him, but the braveGeneral refused to surrender.

In the hours around midnight, soldiers kept arriving at the stone-walled Kerchelle prison with truckload after truckload of prisoners. There were repeated bursts of machine-gun fire. Only the next morning did the stunned citizens of Addis Ababa hear the naqtional radio announcement that the ruling Provisional Military Administrative Council (PMAC), after nine months of relative moderation, had summarily executed 59 members of the Imperial regime of deposed Emperor Haile Selassie. "My God," saida Western diplomat in the Ethiopian capital, "they've wiped out the old aristocracy in a single stroke."

CONSPIRACY POLITICS

Mengistu Haile Mariam of Ethiopia Vs Fidel Castro Ruz of Cuba

Both the Cuban leader Fidel Castro Ruz and the Ethiopian miliatry head of state were leaders of their perspective countries. No one can see any war criminal among them here. Though, doyou believe that the Cuban leader Fidel Castro once conspired against the Ethiopian military head of state Lt. Colonel Mengistu Hailemariam and was facilitated a coup against him.

Negede Gobeze then leader of the All Ethiopian Socialist Movement, commonly known as MEISON was the preferred communist intellectual for the eastern block sought to deal with when it came to the Horn of African politics by the time. Negede Gobeze cover got blown as soon as he landed at the Bole international airport with a South Yemeni passport. Then he hasto ran toward the Cuban Embassy in Addis Ababa and negotiated his safe departure from Ethiopia to then South Yemen. At that time the Ethiopian head of state Mengistu Haile Mariam was in a state visit to Cuba expressing his gratitude for the Cuban Armed forces for their military support in the war against Somalia.

ETHIOPIA IN THE WORLD PRESS

Copyright © The New York Times November 7, 1909:

Emperor Menelik II: The father of Modern Ethiopia, a true federalist, a man who show a light to Ethiopia, the most controversial leader. The controversy came from people who actually are more interested to twist history for the sake of their weakness. Menelik's story written by different people, but those who tried to characterize him as a butcher and the blackHitler are either naive or tried to get a profit for their own selves by twisting history in different direction. Luckily he is one of the most documented and photographed leader of Ethiopia, and many independent foreign visitors, historians, military personnels, etc.. wrote their eye witness account of what happened at the time of Menelik.

Most writers saw his expeditions, rule, administration, etc. And they wrotethe truth. Then why do we get a new generation of false horns who are trying to write a history of dooms day of Menelik? History can be twisted and written in a false way, but historical records on their own time will embarrass those who lied on it. From my research Menelik II was a man who was a true leader who has colleagues, war lords, soldiers, officials, etc.. from every part of Ethiopia. His expedition was a salvation for many,not like those who propagate hate and massacre. The day will come for many to get embarrassed and for the Ethiopians to be proud more than ever by his deeds and achievements.

The Protest In Oromia Region In to it's third month February 21, 2016

The protest in the Oromia region of Ethiopia that is well into its third month has gotten even bloodier today as local militia in West Arsi killed 11 members of the Agazi forces (special killsquads of the regime) in retaliation for the killing of two protesters, according to the Oromo Media Network. OMN's report was not verified by other sources but information obtained by ESAT earlier in the day revealed 2 federal police members and 7 protesters with gunshot wounds were admitted to the hospital.

OROMO PROTESTS: About 7 Ethiopian security forces killed, state buildings damaged, in restive Oromia region - minister Mail& Guardian Africa 16 Feb 201613:10

By William Davison Security forces killed as many as 140 people at the "generally peaceful"Oromo protests, New York-based Human Rights Watch said. DEMONSTRATORS in Ethiopia killed seven security officers in Oromia, the country's most populous region that's seen protests over land and political marginalisation since November, CommunicationsMinister Getachew Reda said.

The attack happened Monday in West Arsi district with government buildings also damaged,Getachew said by phone from the capital, Addis Ababa. Authorities don't know the motive for the attack nor the total number of dead and injured, he said. "The information we have is they were ambushed by people carrying guns, apparently on a rampage," he said.

Protests by ethnic Oromo occurred in the area after soldiers shot at a bus carrying weddingguests on Feb. 12, U.S.-based activist Jawar Mohammed said Monday on his Facebook page. Demonstrations since November were mainly against government plans to integrate thedevelopment of Addis Ababa with surrounding areas of Oromia, which participants said would involve the unfair eviction of farmers. Security forces killed as many as 140 people at the "generally peaceful" protests, New York-based Human Rights Watch said Jan. 7. The government, which hasn’t provided a death toll, said last month it was abandoning the integration plan.

COMMEMORATIVE DAY

February 19, 1937 (Yekatit 12,1929 Ethiopian Calendar)

The Day Fascist Italian forces began to carry out a massacre ofinnocent civilians in Addis Ababa and elsewhere

(በሶስት ቀናት ውስጥ ከ 30ሺ በላይ ንፁሃን ኢትዮጵያዊያንን (ህፃናት ፣ ሴት ፣ አረጋውያን ...) በአካፋ ፣ በዶማ ፣ በመሳሪያ ፣ በእሳት ... ያስጨፈጨፈውሩዶልፍ ግራዚያኒ ነው። ለዚህ “የጀብዱ ሥራው ”ከህዝብ ኪስ በተሰበሰበው የጣሊያን ሕዝብገንዘብሐውልት ቆሞለታል። እኛ ግን መቼምየትምአንረሰውም!)

The Crown Prince of Italy, Umberto di Savoia, and his wife Marie Jose of Belgium, had just had a son, Prince Vittorio Emanuele (today the claimantof the Italian throne). To celebrate this event, the Viceroy of "Italian East Africa" Marshal Rudolfo Graziani, ordered a ceremony too take place at the Guenete Leul Pal...ace. He and other Italian officials sat in the portico at the front steps of the palace along with the Coptic Archbishop of the Ethiopian Orthodox Church and collaborating Ethiopian nobility and officials, while alms were handed out to beggars and other poor people who had been summoned. During this ceremony, two young Eritrean bornmen, Abraham Deboch and Moges Asgedom, who had been serving in lowlevel official posts with the Italian administration, tossed hand grenades at the Viceroy and the other officials. The Deacon who carried the Archbishop's umbrella was killed, and Marshal Graziani and several otherswere seriously wounded. In the panic that followed, Italian soldiers killed many Ethiopians in the palace compound including many of the beggars who had come to receive alms.

Graziani was rushed to the hospital where he ordered the Fascist Blackshirt forces to take revenge on Ethiopians. Over the next few days,the Blackshirts led other military and civilian Italians in carrying out a massacre unprecedented in Ethiopia. Men, women, children and the elderly were butchered indiscriminately. Not just guns were used, but knives, axes, spades and hoes were used to kill. Families were burned intheir homes. Ethiopians with a western education and those thought to have a connection to the exiled Emperor were specially sought out for murder. Some lucky people took refuge in the western consulates, but most were not so lucky. The estimates of the number of people killed vary, but most agree that thousands of people were killed.

After Ethiopia was liberated and the Emperor Haile Selassie returned, the square outside the southern gates of the Guenete Leul Palace was named Yekatit 12 Square in honor of the victims of the massacre. This monumentwas raised by the Emperor in honor of those butchered by the Fascists.

Rudolfo Graziani and other Fascist Italian officials accused of war crimes and crimes against humanity never faced trial, unlike German Nazi and Japanese leaders after World War II. God bless the souls of the Yekatit 12Martyrs.

The Annual Co-memorative Day of February 19th,

የ ታ ሪ ካ ዊ ውየ ካ ቲ ት 12 ቀ ን ሲ ዘ ከ ር

Is remembered in Ethiopia as Martyr’s Day. Seventy nine years ago, two young Ethiopians (they were Eritreans but Eritrea was a province of Ethiopia then), Abraham Deboch and Moges Asgedom, who were angeredby racism and colonial occupation, attempted to assassinate Rudolfo Graziani, the commander of the Italian fascist forces that occupied Ethiopia between 1936-1941, inflicting heavy wounds on him and his subordinates, killing few of them. In retaliation, the fascist forces massacred more than 30,000 Addis Abeba residents within three days.

The fascists thought that they could subdue the people by brutal force; however, the plan only backfired on them, and emboldened the resistancemovement. Ethiopian patriots, men and women, were already actively fighting the occupying force in every corner of the country; the massacre in Addis Abeba only strengthened their freedom-loving spirit to fight more in oder to liberate their country from the invading foreigners. And victorywas not too far.
Italy invaded Ethiopia in WWII, using air planes that sprayed the land withcluster bombs and nerve gas, against international law, but failed to occupy the country successfully. This was an attempt to avenge its 1896 humiliating defeat at the battle of Adwa, where traditional African freedomfighters courageously quashed a highly trained and armed European colonizing army. Italy learned once again that it can never erase Adwa from world history. May the souls of the patriotic Martyrs rest in peace! እግዚአብሔር ነፍሳቸውን በአፀደ ገነቱ ያስቀምጥልን

OPINIONS

De-Weyanization of Ethiopia is Imperative for the Horn of AfricaBy Amanuel Biedemariam

Are there any issues that the people of Ethiopia and the region have failedto discuss regarding the minority Tigray People's Liberation Front (TPLF/EPRDF) regime and its crimes, genocides, transgressions, misdeeds,lies, corruption, nepotism etc…?

The people of Ethiopia and the region have collectively raised all pertinentissues ad nauseam and detailed the human rights and other major violations committed by Tigray People's Liberation Front TPLF/EPRDF thataltered the makeup and trajectories of Ethiopia and the region. In 25 years, the Tigrai People's Liberation Front victimized millions and hampered cooperation within the region.

The Horn of Africa is hurting. The economies, traditional ways and cross border connections are lost. The natural cross border trade that sustainedgenerations is halted impacting the lives of all involved negatively and unnecessarily.

If one is to ask, what the TPLF thugs contributed to foster cooperation in order to better the lives of the people in the region, the answer is none. The TPLF blocked trade, the economy and stood on the way of the people.TPLF stopped-cold cross-border-trade-relation between Eritrea and Ethiopia; Ethiopia and Somalia and, hampered trade with Kenya through Southern Ethiopia and Oromia. Due to its aggressive hegemonic stances, conflicts in Gambella and TPLF's negative involvement in South Sudan, opportunities for free trade in the region are impossible. The only open- border and functioning is the Eastern Sudan and Tigray corridor which serves as a life line to TPLF's home front of Tigray.

The TPLF's primary intent is to become the hegemon of the region. The fact that the US allowed Ethiopia to become extension of US interests in the region gave TPLF thugs false sense of empowerment. With US on its side the TPLF believed that it could control the region. To that end it started war with Eritrea and Somalia on zero sum game determined-and-certain to bring regime change in Eritrea and inject a puppet regime in Somalia.

When the TPLF thugs declared war on Eritrea their calculation was that Eritrea will fold in six months. When TPLF failed they enacted No-War-No-Peace agenda, war by other means. This agenda is meant to give chance to the TPLF to annul the EEBC decision and bring puppet regime that can help them enact the Greater (Abay) Tigray agenda.

By declaring war and openly campaigning for regime change, the TPLF gave Eritrea no chance but to respond however possible. However, and fora while, it seemed as though everything was stocked against Eritrea as the TPLF thugs were accorded unprecedented diplomatic, political, economic, PR and military support from the US, EU and their allies.

The War Inside
Parallel to the war with Eritrea the TPLF thugs were also waging a war against the people of Ethiopia. In 2005, the late chief-TPLF-thug Meles Zenawi barbarically mowed innocent Ethiopians after they defeated his reign in a democratic election. At that moment Ethiopians realized that theevil in their midst is entrenched and that it is formidable. Dislodging TPLF democratically became unattainable dream. This was confirmed in subsequent sham elections of 2010 and 2015.

For over 25 years, the US and Europe funded and facilitated TPLF's misadventures to the detriment of Ethiopia's future. Furthermore, whenthe Obama administration elected to endorse TPLF's claim of 100% election-victory as democratic, the people of Ethiopia gave up on the USadministration and international community altogether.

This meant that Ethiopians have no recourse other than to take measureson their hands. The Oromo demonstrations are direct result of the closed political environment sponsored by the West. As it stands, the Oromo uprising is on its third month. Yet, the TPLF has lost control and unable toquell the uprising. Sign of troubles ahead.

Take Two: The Beginning of the End

The US and Europe entrusted the TPLF to ensure decisive victories in order to enable them pursue their agendas in the region and failed. TheNo-War-No-Peace strategy that the TPLF pursued against Eritrea failed and backfired.

To the contrary, despite massive infusion of aid, Ethiopia is in dire existential struggle. Consistent claims of economic growth that Ethiopia is the fastest growing economy in Africa turned out a big lie. The BBC, Reuters and etc…have been feeding the world lies and exaggerated growthfigures to prop the criminal TPLF thugs and got exposed time and again.
In short, agendas that US and EU pursued through EPRDF failed. TPLFfailed the West.

On December of 2015, the EU invited Dr. Berhanu Nega Chairman of Arbegnoch Ginbo7 (AG7), opposition-group fighting the TPLF, to testify onthe current situation in Ethiopia. Subsequently, the EU Parliament adopteda resolution condemning the Ethiopian government for excessive use of force on innocent Oromo's, for rights violations, and suppression of news etc…

The damming resolution is the first of its kind and for the first time the EUsystematically places the legitimacy of the EPRDF in question. The resolution exposed how the minority regime choked the political space as well as the impact of land grub that displaced millions. It states,

"Whereas the most recent general elections were held on 24 May 2015, inwhich the Ethiopian People's Revolutionary Democratic Front (EPRDF) remained the ruling party and won all the seats in the national parliament.Whereas May's federal elections took place in a general atmosphere of intimidation and concerns over the lack of independence of the National Electoral Board; whereas the EPRDF has been in power for 24 years, sincethe overthrow of the military government in 1991."

This statement knocks at the validly of the election results by questioninghow, a 6% minority from Tigray garnered 100% of the votes in a countrycomprised-of, according to CIA fact book, Oromo 34.4%, Amhara 27%, Somali 6.2%, Sidama 4%, Gurage 2.5%, Welaita 2.3%, Hadiya 1.7%, Afar 1.7%, Gamo 1.5%, Gedeo 1.3%, Silte and Kefficho 2.5%, other
10.5% (2007 est.)
EU stated that TPLF won by force and intimidation. The land grab that displaced millions and the fact that the TPLF/EPRDF pointed guns and shotinnocent civilians raised serious questions. If the EPRDF is killing, displacing populations and rigging election then, who is the protector of the people of Ethiopia?
Systemic Alienation of Ethiopia
The Tigray People's Liberation Front EPRDF spent millions and exerted tremendous energy to isolate Eritrea from the international community. Every move that the TPLF made was calculated with Eritrea in mind but failed. With fictitious stories, the TPLF tried to label Eritrea the North Korea (NK) of Africa. As if, North Korea, a country with nuclear capacity, is comparison to any African nation; EPRDF insulted North Korea to attack

Eritrea by exploiting the narratives that the west uses to demonize NK. However, if one is to use the very narrative that the TPLF uses to demonize Eritrea as North Korea, according TPLF, a nation, "isolated fromthe international community and a pariah state," the real North Korea of Africa is Ethiopia.

Over 12 million Ethiopians are starving and in dire need of food aid. The TPLF uses brute force to suppress opposition and have killed countless innocent civilians. Major humanitarian organizations have detailed genocide by Ethiopian soldiers in Gambela, Ogaden and other regions. TheTPLF represents 6% of the population yet it suppresses 94% of the population with brute force. And contrary to its claim that it is the hub of diplomatic activities of Africa, Ethiopia's minority regime is systematically and technically isolated at least regionally. For long the TPLF/EPRDF used the "War on Terror" (WOT) to garner support from the West and used it toplace Ethiopia as a central hub in that endeavor. TPLF used WOT to finance its army, gain political and diplomatic upper-hand over countries on the region and applied unnecessary pressures to regional groupings such as Intergovernmental Authority on Development (IGAD) to acquiesceon agendas that the TPLF pursued even when it is harmful to their long- term interest. Ethiopia, a country that is supposed to be conduit for African diplomacy and for the greater good used Addis Ababa to micro- manage African agendas and as cash-cow to suit its needs by exploiting its status as a host nation.

However, with one diplomatic move, Eritrea turned the table and sidelinedthe TPLF regionally. When Eritrea signed a security agreement with Saudi Arabia and joined the Gulf Cooperation Council (GCC), the move sidelined and killed TPLF's Eritrea agenda completely. The war on terror that the TPLF exploited is now effectively replaced by Saudi Arabia led coalition created partly to fight terrorism. It includes Djibouti, Egypt and Sudan neighbors that are willing to accommodate Saudi interests and it excludes Ethiopia. Furthermore, Ethiopia's Eritrea agenda relied on the internationalcommunity not doing any business with Eritrea. TPLF aimed to kill Eritrea's economy partly by ensuring that the ports of Asab and Massawa are not utilized. The reality however, Eritrea's strategic location is far too important and the TPLF is not in a position to leverage Eritrea's territories,in this case the ports of Asseb and Massawa to use as bargaining chip because the TPLF does not control Eritrea. Furthermore, the resolution that EU adopted and the increased support to Ethiopian opposition groups waging armed resistance signals that the EU is alienating the EPRDF regime. If history is a guide, what the EU does the US follows and vice-versa.

Lo and behold, Dr. Berhanu Nega, Chairman of Arbegnoch Ginbo7 (AG7),a subject that the TPLF raised during Obama's Ethiopia visit in 2015, where the TPLF wanted to label him and his organization terrorist, was inthe US on a working visit. While the nature of his visit was not clear, based on the confidence he displayed on a recent seminar that he conducted in Silver Spring, MD it is clear that the US is keeping its optionsopen indicating shift away from the TPLF. These developments and the fact that the regime is no longer seen as custodian of western interests will make TPLF easy target for regime change. mOne strategy that the TPLF used to stay in power is sell fear to US and EU that the TPLF is the only organization that can ensure peace and stability in Ethiopia and the region. However, recent developments have exposed that the TPLF is the greatest threat to peace and stability not only in Ethiopia but the region.

Internal Isolation

The Tigrayan People's Liberation Front is increasingly isolated within Ethiopia. Ethiopia are actively defying and challenging its authority. Ones feared federal police are no longer. Police in different regions are burning uniforms and joining ever-growing rebellion against the regime. Ethiopiansare burning TPLF's prisons and killing Agazi commandos everywhere.

Weyane is hated by Ethiopians without exception. The Oromo's, Gambella,Amhara, Somalia,Oganden and Debub-Hizboch loath the TPLF.

What concerns human rights activists is the safety of the people of Tigrayas the regime has exploited Ethiopia in the name of Tigray. Dr. Gregory Stanton of Genocide Watch said,

"What I am witnessing in Ethiopia is a great deal of concern for the people of Tigray because the regime is committing these crimes on their names. Tigrayan minority that created its own colonies within the countryrules Ethiopia. The minority Tigrayan regime has created animosities andmistrust amongst the various ethnic groups in Ethiopia in order to divide and rule. In these circumstances a feeling of "Us-against-them" and resentment arises with deadly consequences."

De-Weyanization Now

A nation needs nationalist leadership that can establish institutions to benefit all, a political system that inspires hope. It needs economic programs that meet the needs of a nation, judiciary that ensure legal system and empower the publics; it needs balanced social structures, governance that is representative of the diversity and defense forces thatensure national safety. Weyane failed and betrayed Ethiopia and the region.

One of Weyane's greatest miscalculations is the fact that it failed to createalliance with the people of Ethiopia. TPLF felt safe and invincible as long asthe US and EU remains on its side. Weyane naively miscalculated that they can keep milking US and EU indefinitely in the name partnering in the war against terrorism and failed.

Hence, there is absolutely no possibility that the TPLF can sustain its rulebased on a platform of hate and division that it created in order to divide and rule. Ethiopians have rejected the system completely. Today, the TPLF aka Weyane Harnet Tigrai is isolated more than ever. Dewaynizationis on full-swing in Ethiopia and the likelihood that Weyane can stave off the onslaught is limited to none. According to the Oromo Media Network, "The protest in the Oromia region of Ethiopia that is well into its third month has gotten even bloodier today as local militia in West Arsi killed 11members of the Agazi forces (special kill squads of the regime) in retaliation for the killing of two protesters."

De-Weyanization means cleansing Ethiopia of its filth. These are vile andbrute thieves with nasty agenda that aimed to spill blood indefinitely so they can sit on the throne indefinitely. They have no shame, integrity, morality or mercy. They are deceptive and to confuse the world they created Ethiopian People's Revolutionary, Democratic Front (EPRDF) umbrella organization to appear representative when all the leaders are leaders of TPLF which stands for Tigray People's Liberation Front.

Conclusion

Ethiopia is facing serious and dangerous challenges. These challenges alsopresent the best opportunity for change. To face these challenges head- on, the biggest hurdle is cleansing Ethiopia of Weyane and the ugly agendas of hate and division that they brought forward.

To cleanse Ethiopia and start afresh De-Weyanization must take place. ToDe-Waynize means to dismantle EPRDF and kill its economic base, its tentacles, re-take the mercenary army, kill it diplomatically, kill its political structures and deny it voice by rejecting its voice. Above all a united approach and united voice is what will defeat TPLF. And more thanever, it appears that there is a realization that is the only option.

LEGEND PEOPLE

Ambassadress Yodit Imiru Haile Selassie, the diplomacy legend

The long time Ethiopian Ambassadress to Sweden, and a former ActingForiegn Minister of Imperial Ethiopia, Yodit Imiru Haile Selassie was thefirst woman ambassadress but before her diplomatic career she had served as Minister of State of the Imperial Ministry of Foreign Affairs.

Wozaro Yodit is the daughter of His Royal Highness Ras Imiru Haile Selassie Abayneh and his wife

Princess Tsigie-Mariam. Her father was a first cousin once removed of Emperor Haile Selassie and is the Emperor's companion from early childhood. Yodit Imiru and her siblings were thus raised in close proximity to the Emperor's children and grandchildren, andwere senior members of the Shewan branch of the Imperial dynasty in pre-revolutionary Ethiopia. Her brother Lij Mikael Imiru was the last Imperial Prime Minister of Ethiopia, serving briefly at the very end of the Emperor's reign. Although born into the highest levels of the aristocracy and bearing the title of Woizaro from childhood, Yodit Imiru, like her parents and siblings, very unassuming and down to earth, known for theirsimplicity of manner and lack of airs.

Her late father Ras Imiru Haile Selassie was known to be very left leaning and a person who advocated socialist principles and increased democratization, while remaining a monarchist and a very devout Orthodox Christian. Known as commonly "the Red Ras", Ras Imiru was anadvocate of land reform who destributed his vast land holdings to his tenant farmers, and act that did not endear him to his fellow crown councilors. His children largely shared his leftist views. Ras Imiru remained in Ethiopia as Prince Regent when Emperor Haile Selassie went into exile during the Italian occupation. He led the military campaign against the Italians until he was captured and imprisoned in Italy. WoizaroYodit, her siblings and their mother had gone into exile with the Emperor and remained in Jerusalem for the duration of the Italian occupation. Ras Imiru returned to Ethiopia after being freed by the allies in 1943 rejoining his family in Addis Ababa. Woizaro Yodit Imiru attended school in Jerusalem, and would later complete her education in the United States when her father was posted as ambassador of Ethiopia to the US in Washington D.C. during the Eisenhower addministration. Ras Imiru servedas Ethiopia's ambassador to India, the United States, and finally the Soviet Union, and encouraged his daughter to join the diplomatic service. Woizaro Yodit joined the diplomatic service, and would become the first Ethiopian woman to reach the rank of Ambassadress (generally she prefered to be called "Ambassadress Yodit" over "Woizaro" literally meaning for "Madame".

She served in various capacities at the Ministry of Foriegn affairs both inEthiopia and abroad, and would serve as Ethiopian Ambassadress in Sweden, and was acting minister of Foreign Affairs briefly in 1973. Afterthe fall of the Duerg regime, Woizaro Yodit Imiru and her siblings were active for a time in opposition political circles, becoming devoted supporters of the All Amhara Peoples Organization led by the late Professor Asrat Woldeyes. She and her siblings were highly visible at public rallys of the Organization, and ardently protested against the persecution of the organization's leaders by the government and the arrest of it's esteemed leader Dr. Asrat Woldayas by faithfully attendinghis court appearances and visiting him regularly in prison. Ex- Ambassadress Yodit Imiru, a towering figure of Ethiopia's diplomatic service and a woman whose loyalty to her country and concern for her people was deeply ingraned. She died a year ago.

The concept of Greater Tigray

(By Anonimous February 17, 2016)

In February 1976, the Tigray People's Liberation Front (Woyanne) that iscurrently ruling Ethiopia crafted its Greater Tigray Manifesto. The manifesto called for transforming the northern Ethiopian region of Tigray in to an independent country through expansionist policies. For Greater Tigray to become a reality, Meles Zenawi and his comrades in the armed struggle decided that they have to take control of the central governmentin Ethiopia and systematically dismantle the country. They also appropriated lands from neighboring regions of Gonder and Wollo.

The Greater Tigray agenda suffered a setback when Woyanne went to warwith Eritrea in 1998. Woyanne had to scramble and get Ethiopians to support the war by trying to falsely present itself as an Ethiopian nationalist group.

The TPLF's led government war with Eritrea caused split inside the organization's top leadership, and Meles purged about half of the centralcommittee members, putting the final nail on the coffin of Greater Tigraymanifesto.

Currently, TPLF under Meles Zenawi's leadership is not a cause- or ideology-driven organization any more. It is a business mafia that happens to wield political and military power. As it turns out, Greater Tigray manifesto is having the unintended consequence of diminishingTigrean nationalism:

1. A growing number of Tigreans do not want to be associated with TPLFor Tigrean nationalism any more.
2. Other than Mekelle, the capital city of Tigray, most parts of the region,including Meles Zenawi's hometown, Adwa, are still full of dirt poor and have not yet to receive the dividends for TPLF's political power, despite the enormous wealth the Meles crime family has amassed.
3. Currently, there are over 100,000 non-Tigrean troops in Tigray (a region with a population of 6 million). As a result, about 1 in every 10 child currently born in Tigray doesn't have a Tigrean father. Tigreans arealso migrating toward south in massive numbers.
4. TPLF's investment over the past 20 years has not produced tangible and visible results, other than a few shiny high rise buildings in Mekelle. The reason is that the investment was politically-driven, hence poorly studied and planned. The end result of a government-controlled investment or command economy is always a colossal failure. The formerSoviet Union comes to mind.

In recent days, we are witnessing an encouraging development. The Tigrean elite, the last refuge of Tigrean nationalism, is coming around to finally disowning the Meles dictatorship, although not as fast as we wouldlike it to happen. A lesson that can be learned from the failure of GreaterTigray Manifesto is that it is in the best interest of all Ethiopian ethnic groups to submit their parochial interest to Ethiopian nationalism. Tigray, Oromo, Amhara, and all the other ethnic groups can flourish under astrong and united Ethiopia.

It is time for all Tigreans to wake up and join other Ethiopians in the fightto remove the Meles vampire regime. Source: Ethiopian Review

1. እነዚህ ባለስልጣኖች ቆምንለት ለሚሉትና ለሚሞተው ወገናቸው የመቆርቆር ስሜት ስለሌላቸው ነው?

2. ለህዝብ መብት ሳይሆን ለሆዳቸው ስለቆሙ ነው?

3. ወያኔ ሲወድቅ የሚተካውሃይል ለኦሮሞ ህዝብ የባሰ ጥፋት የሚያመጣ ይሆናል ብለውፈርተው ነው?

4. ወያኔ እንደሚለውግድያውተመጣጣኝ ነው ብለውስለሚያምኑ ነው?
..ወዘተ ጥያቄዎችን ማንሳት ይቻላል።

ETHIOPIAN POLITICS

Armed struggle is the ONLY way to bring TPLF to its knees

The title in the subject line is not intended to take you back to the old days of armed vs peaceful struggle controversy against TPLF. Thank God,those naive days were gone. Now, we have matured and, to its credit, TPLF has given us more than we need to know what to do to kick TPLF's racist ass into the dustbin of history.

Lately, what TPLF is doing in the Oromia region of Ethiopia is proof beyondany reasonable doubt for intensifying the armed struggle against Agazi killers and TPLF's mercenary army. TPLF is mercilessly massacring children, old men and women including pregnant women in this region as well as in other parts of Ethiopia. Confronting TPLF with a language it understands best, armed struggle, is NOT an option. It is a must and a necessary coarse of action all forces of democracy need to consider, if evilhas to be removed from power in Ethiopia.

There are a few armed groups stationed in Eritrea and elsewhere who are waging armed struggle in Ethiopia today including Arbegnoch Ginbot 7, TPDM, Afar resistance movement, the Amhara Democratic Movement and others. Unfortunately, they are not getting the manpower and financial backing they need to intensify their war against TPLF and its machinery. We should all support these armed groups as much as we can and as soonas we can.

If TPLF is not stopped, there is no doubt that TPLF will continue to kill Ethiopian Oromos and other Ethiopians in Gondar and elsewhere in thousands. For us it is freedom, but for TPLF, it is a matter of survival or death. It will do anything in its power to survive. And that is what TPLF is doing in the Oromo and Gondar region of Ethiopia today. Without an intense and determined armed struggle against TPLF, nothing will change.Without a decisive battle against TPLF, the sacrifices of our Oromo brothers and sisters as well as the people in Gondar will be in vain.

Let us rally behind those armed groups who are fighting TPLF today. Let us support the armed groups FINANCIALLY as well as morally to stop TPLF's massacre in Oromia and elsewhere in Ethiopia. Copy and paste thefollowing links into your browser and read.

Dej. Zewde Gabre-Selassie's book on Ethiopian-Eritrean warpublished

Written by Arefayné Fantahun Saturday, August 22nd, 2015

A new Amharic book by Dr. Dejazmatch Zewde Gabre-Selassie on thehistory of the Ethiopian-Eritrean war (1998-2000) published posthumously.

Printed seven years after the author's death, the book has become a best-seller in Addis, selling over 5000 copies in less than a week. Titled "Ethiopia and Eritrea's conflict, Causes and solutions", the 330-page book analyses the causes and context of the war that took the lives of some one hundred thousand people and one that continues to serve as the source of regional instability in the Horn of Africa.

The book is described as one that could only be written by someone who possessed an excellent knowledge of Ethiopian and Eritrean history and ofthe past and present day Ethiopian and Eritrean personalities. DejazmatchZewde, who had been a minister under both the imperial regime and the Derg, has been a witness to some of the important events that he recounted in his book.
His widow Alemtsehay Araya Mamo contributes an introduction, while Dr. Hailu Habtu of the Institute of Ethiopian studies, shares personal memories. Alemtsehay described her late husband as a much-loved familyman, a soft-spoken peacemaker, a humble optimist who lobbied for peaceand virtue. When the war between the two countries broke out, he had a lot of sleepless night worrying about the situation, she wrote. "It was withsuch real feeling and conviction that he decided to pen the book and he completed it and submitted the manuscript to the publisher. I am extremely pleased that the book saw the light of the day even though tardily," she wrote.

Focusing on complex internal and external conditions that produced brutalwar, a "brother's war," which continues to fuel tensions in the region, Dejazmatch Zewde G/Selassie used archives in Ethiopia, Italy, UK and interviews with elders of the two countries. Showing the interlinked history of these two countries and two people who share a common senseof identity, he included one whole chapter that deals with short biographies of Eritreans who played a role in the political, social, economicand cultural life of Ethiopia.

Prof. Shiferaw Bekele stated in the blurb that as most of the books writtenabout the two countries after the independence of Eritrea have largely ignored the Ethiopian point of view, this book has a great significance as itbreaks that tradition. He said it gives great lesson for Ethiopian readers asit shows Eritrea had always been part of Ethiopia from Gubat until the endof the twentieth century.

A great-grandson of the Emperor Yohannes IV and related thorough marriage to the Crown Prince, Dejazmatch Zewde served the Ethiopian government at various capacities. Obtaining his first, second and final degrees from the Oxford University, he started serving his country by talking over Assab and Massawa ports from the British and administratingthem (at a time when Eritrea was being federated to Ethiopia). While he was at this post, he established the Maritime Affairs Department; he initiated the merchant marine company; and founded the naval college.

He headed various offices afterwards. He has been appointed as mayor of Addis Ababa, minister of Works and Communication, minister of Justice, minister of Interior, and finally minister of Foreign Affairs and deputy prime minster. He served in between as Ethiopian ambassador to Somalia,as Ethiopian permanent representative and ambassador in United Nations.As historian he authored the biography of Emperor Yohannes, which has been published by Oxford University Press.

The Ethiopian government likes to be in control – of the economy, of opposition movements, of independent media. Like it or not, the tough approach has worked, atleast in terms of the country reaching its development goals. But repression is a bluntinstrument and the ongoing Oromo protests should force a rethink. The demonstrations began in November 2015. In towns and villages all over Ethiopia's vast Oromia province, people gathered to voice their frustration at the government.

Their grievances?

Specifically, they were unhappy about the unveiling of the Addis Ababa Integrated Development Master Plan, a document that detailed step-by-step how the capital citywould suck more land from the province for minimal compensation. Generally, they were protesting a long history of oppression and marginalisation of the Oromo community. The Oromo, despite being Ethiopia's biggest ethnic group are largely excluded from positions of power and have historically been last to access rights andbenefits from the state.
The scale of these protests – the wide geographical spread, and the sheer numbers ofpeople who turned out – scared the government who responded with force.
Supposed ringleaders were detained; curfews imposed in several towns and security forces were called in to deal with the angry crowds. Things soon got ugly even though protesters were largely peaceful (although not always – several government buildings were stormed and looted). The same cannot be said for the police, however,who reacted with tear gas, grenades and bullets. By the end of the year, an estimated 150 people had been killed. The brutal crackdown was the government's stick. There was also a carrot. In January, in an apparent concession, the government scrapped the Addis Master Plan, saying it had heard and heeded the voice of the people. (February 23, 2015)

OROMO PROTESTS UPDATES

"No longer would Oromo youth accept being ruled by Woyane," a man inShashemene - William Davison

This is an account of a small part of what’s been going on in West Arsi ofOromia last week. It’s very limited as I was unable to spend more than one morning in the area.

On Wednesday in Bulbula, which is south of Ziway around 100 kilometers north of Shashamene, there was a vandalized Coca Cola truck and a torched tanker. There were also Derba Cement bags and smashed glass ina couple of places on the road, suggesting that was where the company’s trucks had been attacked. As with several places where there’d been protests, there wasn’t a heavy visible security presence, and most regularactivity had resumed in the town. As we drove south, a Federal Police truck and pick-ups, followed by armed Oromia police, whizzed north in what looked like an emergency response.

On Wednesday night, part of Langano Lodge was burned to the ground. A couple of people in the area said the culprits were disgruntled locals. For example, a middle-aged guard said the resort was known for employing people from outside the area. Others, like Sabana Beach Resort, had a good reputation with residents, he said. As with other claims, I didn't havea chance to verify these allegations.

Early on Friday morning, Shashamene appeared normal. It wasn't hard tofind people aware of what had been going on. One lady focused on how the Oromo protests in the area had caused problems for other groups, especially the Wolayta. That turned out to be a minority stance with everyone else emphasizing justified Oromo opposition to the governmentas the fundamental issue.

As widely reported, the protests in the area started in Aje a week before after police told a wedding party to stop playing a resistance song and therequest was rejected. That led to a violent confrontation with civilians andpolice dying, although it wasn't clear exactly what happened from the accounts I received. One guy reported that an Oromo Federal Police officer had objected to the security response and shot dead some of his colleagues. From there the discontent spread.

There had been a fracas around Shashamene bus station during the week.It sounded like primarily Oromo and Wolayta had clashed and the police had broken it up by firing in the air. There was no consensus on fatalities and casualties. Rumors abounded, with someone saying 60 houses had been burned down, and others saying that was a lie. It seemed there'd been a fight and police had quickly broken it up, partly by firing in the air.One account said a Tigrayan guy was arrested after he pulled a gun and challenged people to attack him.

On the road to Kofale, which is 27 kilometers east of Shashamene, therewas evidence of roadblocks in many places. Most had been created by chopping down large Eucalyptus trees and laying them across the road. One area was covered with large boulders and a fertilizer store had been ransacked. It was apparent that plenty of communities and people hadbeen involved in these acts of resistance.

One guy said in a matter-of-fact manner that during the unrest Amhara farmers had been intimidated to leave the area. But almost all interviewees – none of whom were youthful firebrands -- stressed that if there were clashes between ethnic groups, they should be treated as a minor diversion, and were not the cause of the discontent. Perhaps evenmore so than in West Shoa a couple of months ago, people were clear that the underlying cause was a desire for a change in government. No longer would Oromo youth accept being ruled by Woyane, a man said.

People didn’t want to be ruled by a dead man’s system, another said. A few refused to give their views, but no one spoke up in defense of the government. One guy said his land had been taken for water facilities and that there was too much tax on everything. A few spoke about a corruptedgovernment that acts only in its interest and not the people’s.

On top of the underlying desire for political change, people also highlighted recent injustices with students killed and arbitrarily detained,and educated leaders arrested, as a major reason for ongoing resistance.One guy repeatedly said that protesters wanted to know where the authorities had taken their children. Nobody thought the situation was going to be resolved anytime soon.

It was said that 7 or 12 people had died in Kofale on Thursday, which wasthe only place to have a few (non-red beret) soldiers stationed visibly on its streets. There wasn’t much other obvious presence of security forces aside from one pick-up full of Federal Police that turned off the main roadinto a village.

More people had died further east in Dodola, including a friend of someoneI spoke to. He said the guy, who didn’t know anything about politics, was taken at night by police and found dead in the morning.

Only the one lady in Shashamene referred to the alleged burning of churches. Everybody else responded that they hadn’t heard anything, orthat it was a deliberate lie.

Despite the unrest, mini bus drivers and traders were traveling up and down the road as usual. There were also plenty of people around on the streets going about routine tasks. In a few places, pragmatic residents had started chopping up the trunks that had been used to block the road.
Rather than a state of emergency, it felt more like active opposition to thegovernment and the accompanying insecurity had become the new normal.

On the way back north, shortly before Arsi Negele, where it was market day, a few drivers panicked and turned around, presumably because theyheard there was trouble ahead. The quickest to do U-turns were a coupleof Dangote Cement truck drivers, but they needn’t had bothered, as it turned out to be a false alarm.

If you are asked to mention ten good and strange habits of Ethiopians thatothers need to know, what would you suggest Allison

A few weeks ago I wrote about 10 Ethiopian Habits that Americans would find totally strange. This time around I want to bring you habits that I find100% enduring and lovable. Most of my days here are filled with stress and “OMG, I’m going to kill someone” moments – but when these habits shine through all the craziness I can’t help but smile.

Admirable Habits

10. Innovation. Ethiopian children are some of the most innovative peopleI have ever seen.
9. Pride. Ethiopians have tremendous pride in their country.
8. They know how to let things go. I can hold a grudge like no other.
7. Community babies! My mom used to tell me in Norway woman would leave her babies outside the supermarket, just chilling in their strollers.
6. Communal eating. To go with gurshas is the communal eating.
5. Gurshas. I mentioned these in a previous post.
4. An infinity of cultures. Okay, not really. But Ethiopia has over 80cultures within the country.
3. When they love you, they really love you. These people love with alltheir hearts.
2. Once a friend, always a friend. Ethiopians are really good at networkingand keeping connections.
1. Hospitality runs deep. Ethiopians welcome you into their homes withopen arms.

Strange Habits

1. Bargaining: Price tags are a foreign concept here. No items have them.
2. Not standing in line: LINES DO NOT EXIST IN ETHIOPIA.
3. Throwing insults: No Ethiopian will be afraid to tell you you're fat, askyou what's wrong with your face, or critique your behavior.
4. Wearing mumus: Or as they're called in my area, "shitties".
5. Coffee breaks: Ethiopians like to say they take shay-bunna (tea-coffee)breaks twice a day.
6. Being late for everything: Okay, this isn't a habit I've picked up at allbut it's worth mentioning.
7. Staying inside when it rains: I come from what seems like the raincapital of America so I am slightly ashamed to admit this one.
8. Inhaling for confirmation: It's a cross between an inhale and a gasp.
9. Shoulder bumps, and kisses, and handshakes, OH MY! I think it's anational law that you have to greet every person you pass on the street.
10. Gurshas: A gursha is when another person uses their hand to put foodin your mouth.

Ethiopia accuses Eritrea of "Kidnapping" Protests -AFP

Mail Online: February 25, 2016

Ethiopia accused arch-rival Eritrea on Thursday of being behind anti- government protests in the Oromia region last year which led to a violent clampdown by the government in Addis Ababa. The two countries fought abloody conflict from 1998-2000, but tensions are never far from the surface and were fuelled by protests which erupted last November. “We have concrete evidence that some of the people... involved and instigatingviolence in these particular localities... have their origins from. As Home tosome 27 million people, Oromia encircles Addis Ababa and stretches over large parts of the rest of the country. It has its own language, Oromo, distinct from Amharic, the language of Ethiopia's government.

Demonstrations erupted last November in Oromia to protest against a government plan to expand the Ethiopian capital. The so-called Master Plan, which was eventually abandoned in January, fuelled land-grab fearsamong Oromo farmers, from the country's biggest ethnic group.

Reda accused Eritrea of working in concert with two Ethiopian movements,the Oromo Liberation Front (OLF) rebel group and the Ginbot 7 opposition group exiled in the United States and categorised as terrorists by Addis Ababa. "The Eritrean government is not only working with OLF’s leftovers in Asmara but also with Ginbot 7, and they want to infiltrate all trouble makers into Ethiopia," Reda said. He added: "The protests that were beingexpressed by the people were based on legitimate concerns. But at a certain point, there were political elements involved in hijacking the process. "What transpired... is an absolutely despicable case of criminal gangs roaming village after village and causing innumerable loss in lives."

There was a brutal crackdown on the protests, which left over 140 peopledead and thousands arrested, according to figures released in January byHuman Rights Watch (HRW).

In a report published Monday, HRW said the crackdown is still ongoing,asserting that killings and arbitrary arrests were still being reported almost daily. Eritrea separated from Ethiopia in 1991 after a 20-year independence war. The two countries have remained on a war footing since the open conflict around the turn of the Millennium, notably over their 1,000 km-long (620- mile) common border.mara," the capital of Eritrea, said government spokesman Getachew Reda. OROMO PROTESTS Updates

State security forces terrorize Ethiopia's largest region -AFP(February 25, 2015)

Addis Ababa (AFP) - Fear is so pervasive in Ethiopia's largest region Oromia, where the government is accused of killing scores in a crackdown,that people don't even like to give their names. Oromia, which surrounds the capital Addis Ababa, is dotted with machine-gun mounted vehicles andEthiopian soldiers who locals say have disrupted daily life with incessant checks, harassment and intimidation.

"If you go out in the evening, the police will arrest you, check your papersand your phones. If you have music or photos linked to the protests, you're in serious trouble," a young man in his twenties said in Ginchi, about 80 kilometres (50 miles) from Addis Ababa. "I am very scared for our children, for our youths. I no longer sleep at night. Our life has become hell and it has no meaning," said a mother of two aged in her forties.

Demonstrations began in Oromia in November due to a government planto expand the boundaries of Addis Ababa into the region, raising fears among the Oromo people that their farms would be expropriated.

Authorities dropped the urban development plan on January 12 and announced the situation in Oromia was largely under control. But the demonstrations continued, along with the brutal response, which HumanRights Watch said has claimed the lives of more than 200 people, according to Ethiopian activists.

The Oromos are the largest ethnic group in the east African country, estimated at 27 million in a total population of some 99 million. Their language, Oromiffa, is distinct from Amharic, spoken by the Amharas andused by the central administration as national and working language.

In Ambo, 40 kilometres to the west of Ginchi, policemen and soldiers patrol the streets. Some shops are open but schools and hospitals have been closed for three months. Three young bank employees, huddled on small paved street, discreetly recount the latest protests that erupted at the end of last week. "There are more policemen in Ambo than there are cobblestones," said one. "We are scared of soldiers. There have been a lotof arrests. Tension has been growing since the start of the protests," added another. At a nearby dimly-lit billiard hall, a dozen-odd students relate their version of last week's events.

Fired live bullets

"One of our professors was arrested and we have had no news of him since. We decided to go to the ministry of education to get some news. The police came and asked us what we wanted. We wanted to explain whywe were there but they fired tear gas," said one. "Then special army commandos arrived and started firing live bullets."

They said a young man, named Elias Ararsa, died of bullet wounds and hissister Nagasse was injured by gunfire. "The soldiers do not speak our language. We cannot communicate with them. Weapons are their only language," said the mother of two.

Human Rights Watch (HRW) said security forces have arrested several thousand people since November and are holding them without charge. "Almost daily accounts of killings and arbitrary arrests have been reportedto Human Rights Watch since 2016 began," said the New York-based non-governmental organisation.

The HRW's Horn of Africa expert Felix Horne told AFP that while the expansion of the capital was the spark that triggered the protests, the Oromo people had been feeling marginalised for a long time. "There is also less and less information coming out from the areas where the protests are happening," he said. "Many individuals who provided updatesand information have either been arrested, have disappeared, or are afraid to provide further information."

Addis-based expert Tadesse O'Barr said the "Oromo people have underlying unanswered cumulative political and socio-cultural questions."Language is the major and oldest question of the Oromo. The government of Ethiopia denied to make it a federal language ... (but) while Addis Ababa is the centre of the Oromia region, the government denied even a single school in Oromo language in the capital. "Oromos often ask for self-rule, language and freedom," he said.

Ethiopia has rejected the criticism as lies and said the recent violence didnot involve protestors but criminals. "Now they are armed gangs who arecommitting crimes; they destroyed bridges, burned down churches. It's nothing like before," Communications Minister Getachew Reda said. "If one thinks these are demonstrations, it's far from the truth." But despitethe overriding fear, the youths say they will press on with their movement. "We are not going to abandon our right to freedom. It's too late for that now."

Ethiopia at the Eleventh Hour of Peaceful Change PERSPECTIVE By Messay Kebede PhD

February 25, 2016 Logically, one would hope that the Oromo uprising and the undeniablegeneral discontent and frustration in the country call for a serious movement toward a reformist dissent within the TPLF and perhaps the army. In whichever way the present situation is analyzed, it cannot avoid the conclusion that the path so far followed is an impasse and that a change of course is a must. In case some TPLFites are confused about the situation, I remind them that the new occurrence is that the Oromo peoplehave finally overcome their fear. History repeatedly shows that people who have defeated fear cannot be stopped, with the added fact that the recovery of courage is a contagious phenomenon. Such a movement can be temporarily blocked, but it cannot be crushed.

I am not talking about reform because I hope that the TPLF can becomedemocratic and more committed to a policy that protects the interests ofEthiopia and its peoples. That ship has sailed a long time ago. Rather, I expect the TPLF to think of its own interests in a consistently selfish manner, which selfishness points out that the best bet in the mounting uncertainties is to admit, albeit reluctantly, the necessity of reform.

Reason advises the following: lose absolute power to keep some of it! Indeed, the situation contains two choices and two choices only. Either you think that you can protect your interests by pursuing the path of absolute power and repression and run the risk of losing everything by generating a situation of generalized uprising, itself made inevitable by the refusal to concede anything, or you make concessions aimed at sharing power, and you compensate your loss with security and assurancethat your interests will be protected. In other words, lose a bit to safeguard what is important, or keep the exclusive control of power and face the danger of losing everything.

Again, be voraciously avid, think only of your interests, and the logic of greed will show you the right way, that is, the way that has a future andprovides guarantee. By contrast, the ill option of blind bravado and repression inspired by arrogance and short-sightedness is actually a disguised fear that can only lead to a lose-lose situation for everybody. Make no mistake about it: nobody will win by triggering a civil war in Ethiopia. What awaits us all is a situation comparable to Syria or Libya. Your stubbornness does no more than activate all the ingredients of terrible conflicts that favor nobody.

I understand that some members of the ruling political class are quite aware of the severe shortcomings and dangers of their present policy. That is why we hear them talk here and there of the need for good governance. Unfortunately, to frame the problem in this term is to engagein the path of illusion and postponement. There is no good governance without power sharing and accountability. What you need is not some administrative measures; what you need is political reforms, for the latterare necessary even to apply administrative decisions. And by power sharing I means nothing but the formation of a transitional government representative of all political parties whose main working motto would be the forging of concessions necessary to move forward.

A piece of history lesson: as a rule, history shows that successful and lasting social changes have been initiated and implemented by elites withreformist agendas. The prospect of losing power as a result of a social uprising, guerrilla insurgencies, or war against a more powerful country has led them to see in reforms the best way to stay in power and protecttheir interests. The other related positive outcome was that their decisionto reform avoided wrecking their societies by radical measures and favored a progressive, step by step advancement.

Opposed to this progressive course are movements led by disgruntled andaspiring elites, usually called revolutions, and whose main characteristic isthat societies must be put upside down for these elites to find a new legitimacy and model their county in accordance with their sectarian interests. Unsurprisingly, such movements end in dictatorial and often partisan rule, by which alone societies can be made conformable to exclusive elites. While established ruling elites reform societies by openingup and welcoming new strata of people, revolutionary elites have to exclude and close up in order to establish their power. In other words, while the one moves toward the opening of the system to receive newcomers, the other is the newcomer that has to exclude to establish itself.

Ethiopia is the perfect illustration of the destructive process cause by new comers. Because Haile Selassie's regime was totally unresponsive to repeated calls for reforms, it was wiped out by a revolutionary movement that ended by instituting the dictatorial rule of a military elite inspired by the sectarian ideology of Leninism. Its own reluctance to reform in the face of military defeats and economic failures strengthened guerrilla insurgencies that resulted in its overthrow. Unsurprisingly, instead of following the path of reform by opening the power system, the new comers closed it even more through an ethnic system of selection favoringa policy of divide-and-rule, by which alone the narrow elite claiming to represent Tigrean interests could have the exclusive control of power.

Both the Oromo uprising and the deep discontent of the country clearly demonstrate the failure of the sectarian system established by the TPLF. The moment of decision has come: is the TPLF committed to making the same mistake as Haile Selassie and Mengistu Haile Mariam or will it finallyrealize that the system is untenable and that reforms are, willy-nilly, necessary for its own survival? Of course, it is never expected that all those who are influential in the decision-making of the TPLF will admit the necessity of reform. Rather, the question is whether those who are awareof the need can prevail over the conservatives.

I admit my pessimism, but with a touch of uncertainty inspired by the long and almost miraculous survival of Ethiopia against all odds, in particular by its power to resurrect each time it faces existential threat. Indeed, nothing applies better to Ethiopia than what the poet Holderlin said: “Where the danger grows, there also grows the power of salvation.”To give some examples from recent history, when the Era of the Princes threatened the very existence of Ethiopia, there rose Tewodros; when colonialism encircled and threated to draw Ethiopia into the scramble for Africa, there rose Yohannes and Menelik. Will the endurance continue so that it will be said when ethnic exclusion threatened, there rose . . . ?

ETHIOPIA IN HISTORY:

The Victory Of Battle of Adwa in 1st March 1896:

Colonial Italy is defeated resoundingly by Ethiopia in one of the greatest battles in the history of Africa. This victory realised at the Battle of Adwa over Italy comes at a time when almost all of Africa is colonised by European powers. Emperor Minilik is credited with rallying his fellow Ethiopians behind him to fight back fiercely enough so as to deliver an unimaginable victory against the so called powerful and mighty forces of aEuropean army.

The Battle of Adwa (also known as Adowa, or sometimes by the Italian name Adua) was fought on 1

March 1896 between the Ethiopian Empire and the Kingdom of Italy near the town of Adwa in northern Ethiopia. It was the climactic battle of the First Italo-Ethiopian War, securing Ethiopiansovereignty.

As the 20th century approached, most of Africa had been carved up among the European powers. The two independent exceptions were the young Republic of Liberia on the west coast of the African continent and the Ethiopian Empire in the strategic Horn of Africa. The newly unified Kingdom of Italy was a relative newcomer to the colonial scramble for Africa. Italy had two recently obtained African territories: Eritrea, a smallcoastal territory located just north of Ethiopia and Italian Somalia. Both were near Ethiopia on the Horn of Africa and both were impoverished.
Italy sought to improve its position in Africa by conquering Ethiopia and joining it with its two occupied territories. Emperor Menelik II was the brilliant Ethiopian leader who pitted Italy against its European rivals whilestockpiling weapons to defend itself against the Italians.

The Italian army was severly defeated by Menelik patriotic army on this day at the Battle of Adwa. A settlement after the battle cancelled the Treaty of Wichale and acknowledged the full sovereignty and independence of Ethiopia. The resounding victory of Emperor Minilik's mighty army over colonial Italy in Adwa has a very special place not only in the history of Ethiopia but also in the history of the African continent forthe defeat of Italy in Ethiopia came at a time when almost all of Africa wascolonized by European powers.

Minilik's leadership at that crucial time was one of the reasons why Ethiopia is the only country in Africa to have never been colonized. AfterAdwa, Minlik's Ethiopia was accepted by the European powers as a real political force. The crushing defeat of a European army greatly enhancedMinlik's international reputation and caused a host of foreign advisers, ambassadors, emissaries and adventurers to seek opportunities to work,travel and live in Ethiopia.

IMPERIAL ETHIOPIA

Royal wedding of Daughter Princess to the son Prince of Tigray There was royal wedding on Hamle 7, 1924 (July 15, 1932), Dejazmatch Haile Selassie Gugsa married Leult Zenebework Haile Selassie , Haile Selassie's second daughter. He was about 46 years old and she was not quite 14 years old. Zenebework Haile Selassie, Menen’s daughter by Emperor Haile Selassie was married in a colorful wedding to Dejazmach Haile Selassie Gugsa, a prince of eastern Tigray Province, a great- grandson of Emperor Yohannes IV. In April 1932, when Ras Gugsa Araya Selassie died, the young prince Haile Selassie Gugsa replaced him as Shum of eastern Tigray with the title of Dejazmatch. On the day of wedding, the bridal couple were seated together next to the Emperor andthe Empress Menen Asfaw. A wedding of Princess Zenebework Haile Selassie to Dejazmach Haile Selassie Gugsa whos later betrayed the Emperor in becoming the first Ethiopian noble to cross over to the Italiansas collaborator.

Dejazmach Haile Selassie Gugsa was the son of Leul Ras Gugsa Araya Selassie. Ras Gugsa Araya Selassie was the Shum of eastern Tigray Province as well as the great grandson of Emperor Yohannes IV. He was about 46 years old and she was not quite 14 years old. Leult Zenebework died in 1934 amid allegations of poor treatment at the hands of her husband. Relations between Emperor Haile Selassie and Dejazmatch HaileSelassie Gugsa became quite cold after this. The strain between them wasespecially apparent when the Emperor insisted on bringing his daughter's body back to Addis Ababa for burial rather than allowing her husband to bury her in the capital of eastern Tigray, Mek'ele. This was a clear sign of Emperor Haile Selassie's unhappiness with his son-in-law. Dejazmach Haile Selassie on his part was very bitter that he was not elevated to the titles of Leul and Ras which had been held by his father before him, and were held by his rival Seyum Mengesha of western Tigray.

HISTORIC ETHIOPIA

Ethiopia: Birth Place of Christianity, Islam and the Coffee Arabica Historically, Ethiopian Islam and Christianity have become, in many respects, expressive of Ethiopia’s multi-ethnicity and trans-ethnicity, of itsunity and identity. Christianity and Islam have forged trans-ethnic social practices and meanings that are now part of the common reference world that Ethiopians inhabit. One finds among Ethiopian Christians and Muslimsshared practices such as recognition of holymen, veneration and supplication of Saints, Muslim and Christian pilgrimages to the same shrines, (e.g., at St Gabriel’s Church in Qulubi in Harrarghe or the Muslimshrine of Faraqasa in former Arussi province), exorcism, and so on.

Consider also the musical sensibilities that of islamic religious “manzumasongs” and “tizita traditional love songs” share. Both originated in Wollo and in Amharic, and both transcend ethnic differences and are sung nowin various Ethiopian languages rythms.

Female scholar and rights advocate, dies in DC.

By Ethiomedia (February 26, 2016)

WASHINGTON, DC - Dr Maigenet Shifferraw, a respected scholar, educatorand rights advocate, died on February 24, 2016. She was 67. Professor Maigenet was a faculty member of the University of the District of Columbia, before becoming more actively involved in the struggle for democracy, justice and the rule of law in her native country, Ethiopia. In 2012, Dr Maigenet was elected chairperson of the civic group Center for the Rights of Ethiopian Women (CREW). Prof. Sulayman Nyang, a colleague, had to say this over the untimely death of Maigenet:

"The life of the children of Adam is precious and wonderful. Maigenet, theloving and caring wife and mother of Dr. Getachew Metaferia"s children isa treasure hailing from the noble land of Ethiopia. Not only did she conduct herself with dignity, grace and moral responsibility, but she also devoted herself to intellectual and scholarly pursuits to leave her finger prints on the pages of American and African history. We mourn a friend, acolleague and a partner in creative imagination and social transformation of our life here in the African Diaspora." Dr Maigenet's funeral will be heldon Monday February 29 in Washington, DC. She is survived by her husband, Prof. Getachew Metaferia, and three children.

PERSPECTIVE

Understanding the current protests in Ethiopia: A rejoinderBy prof. Minga Negash February 25, 2016

On February 23, 2016 in a televised interview Prime Minister Haile Mariam
Dessalegn announced that the three month long public uprising is accompanied by an armed insurrection. Ironically what the Prime Ministerdescribed is the same route that put his regime to power 25 years ago. The Government unsays what it says almost every week and hence one has to wait for the next turn of events. What is clear is that the cost of changing government in present day Ethiopia has become astronomical. University and high school students die and get imprisoned, and peasantsget involved in a sustained protest and yet the ruling party claims a 100%win of the seats of the parliament. Evidently the nature of the political question is different. It is no longer about land dispossessions and the Addis Ababa Master Plan. The message of the students is laude and clear.What they are saying is in both theory and practice a 100% win is unachievable in fairly contested election, and hence the TPLF/EPRDF is illegitimate and therefore it must be civilized and vacate public office.

Interestingly the protest is anchored in the Oromo youth which the rulersclaim to have “liberated”.

Commentary after commentary has been outlining the pros and cons of ethnic based movements, forms of future decentralization, and whether other ethnic groups should join the protests. What has been lacking was the understanding of the behavior of the protesters. The only commentarythat attempted to understand the behavior of the protesters is the one by Professor Seid Hassan. Using the theory of state capture and the resultantownership structure, Professor Seid explained the rationalization for vandalism, a phenomenon that is often observed in most civil disobedience activities. Taking cue from the behaviors of decolonization movements, taking away the properties of colonialists or vandalizing themwas perceived to be a manifestation of patriotism. In other words protesters find it rational to vandalize an asset that is not their own or when they perceive that they do not benefit from its existence, or feel thatit is ill gotten wealth.

Other commentators, such as, for example, Professor Daniel Teferra and Professor Worku Aberra express their fears about ethnic movements. The release of a chilling account of human rights violations against the Amara ethnic group by Moresh must have an added impact to the entrenchment of the fear. In yet another commentary Professor Messay Kebede argued that it is rational for other ethnic groups, more notably for the second largest ethnic group (Amara) to join the ongoing Oromo protest. In this brief note, I remind commentators and readers about differences in perspectives for the understanding of social and political organizations andsocial behavior.

First thing is first. Those who fear ethnic based movements often emphasize on the negative sides of identity politics. Ethnic, tribal, clan andfaith based conflicts are serious and obviously destructive. We see it everyday. On the other hand they are also instruments of decolonization and liberation. This line of argument however is old and provides no new insight in resolving the current crisis. In one of my older commentaries, entitled the “Dual faces of ethnic nationalism in Ethiopia” (Ethiopian Register Volume 5, No. 2 1998), I shared those worries. Unfortunately theseries of elections have gone from bad to worse, and have not served as remedies for the down sides of identity politics. In 2005 the regime got away with murder. It killed hundreds of protesters and imprisoned tens ofthousands including elected parliamentarians. Ten years after the last election crisis the regime surprised the international community as it “improved” its 99% win to 100%. Four months after the formation of the new cabinet, in November 2015, the protests started.

According to human rights organizations over 200 people were killed in the Oromo inhabited areas of the country. Outmigration has reached crisislevel and the country is facing yet another drought and famine where about 18 million people are either in social safety nets or requiring urgentinternational food assistance. What has not yet got the attention of the media is the mountain of domestic and international debt and the foreign currency crisis because of the sharp fall in commodity prices. In short the odds have gathered for a perfect storm, and Ethiopians must brace themselves for another cycle of crisis as the TPLF/EPRDF is finding the country ungovernable and its own institutional structure is unable to resolve the situation. The fact that the crisis is widespread in Oromo inhabited areas is however no surprise as the region is large in both in its geographical area and its population size. Thus understanding the behavior of the current protest, using better perspectives, as Professor Seid has attempted, is important.

Those who fear the exclusionist character of ethnic and faith based movements, perhaps inadvertently, advance a rather utopian paradigm that underpins most individual rights based arguments, and more specifically theories that are meant to explain the workings of markets. They forget that groups show irrationality and herd behavior during timesof crisis even in individualistic societies. For most economists human action gets organized when the individual is induced with reward or facespenalty, evidently under an ethical setting and without duress. For this line of thinking group/social behavior is simply the sum of individual behaviors and much of this line of thought is also observed in Bruno Latour's actor network theory of social science. In other words heterogeneity in self (in the individual), and in groups are not adequatelyexplained under the conventional paradigm of rationality. In this perspective heterogeneity is often interpreted as an anomaly or an irrational behavior or worse a disturbance term in the models.

Evidently the above thought perspective is not shared by institutionalists,organization theorists and critical social scientists. For instance sociologists routinely classify societies. For Bauman, to classify is to set apart, it is to examine whether adjacent entities are similar or opposed toone another. It is a method of finding the world a structure. Hence, social groups and organizations (including clubs, societies and political associations) can be classified based on any of the demographic characteristics, and by the type of political program that they use to play the power game. In other words, political organizations can be seen as anoutcome of the institutionalization of group behavior, and the instrument they create for achieving desired outcomes. Hence, ethnic based movements too have rationale of their own, and may be created for advancing specific interests or serve as a response to collectively perceived or actual grievance(s) or threat to the group. In this respect Ethiopia's ethnic based movements are not unique.

Group behavior can be both similar and dissimilar. We observe this line upin the Ethiopian political landscape. Reading the first paragraphs of new and old political groupings quickly reveals the divide. Attempts to bring together the advocates of individual rights and advocates of group rights have not been easy as the participants of the discourse attempt to win over the other, and often forget power games and the problems of trust.

Heterogeneity in group behavior leads to conflict when one or more of the players elect to play a zero sum game and/or spoil the rules of the game or cheats in the game. Hence the discourse between Ethiopian scholars onboth sides of the divide must change, and try to understand social-politicalgames and understand that Ethiopian ethnic movements are not just mimicking the rationality of other ethnic movements. Understanding the changing institutional logics (rationalization) of organizations (including political and other forms of organizations) across institutional orders, as indicated in the works of Patricia Thorton is thus important. Added to this insight is trying to understand the dynamics of power in the creation of “mono ethnic” states in a region as complex as the Horn of Africa.
Understanding the Oromo and other collective political behavior through amagnifying lens thus provides a better route rather than relying on a wornout theory and focusing on listing the downsides of ethnic movements.

Finally, Ethiopian scholars need to add empirical content to the ideology they are advocating for. The last few decades have created new cultural walls between ethnic groups and the stakes have increasingly become high. Hence, crossing the fault lines could be more difficult than what most people would imagine. In other words the already collectivist culturehas become even more opaque, and the longer this continues, the walls become even bigger. The capture of the Ethiopian state by singular cultural group, has been untenable and sooner or later minority rule has to give way for a more representative and decentralized form of governance. Hence, unity cannot be achieved overnight before the storm subsides, or simply by detesting ethnicity or detesting those whose political platform is ethnicity. When the fear, rational or not, is addressed and mechanisms are put in place so that autocrats and organized groups do not gang up to suppress majorities, then one may be able to begin sensing the institutional logic of ethnic based movements. The legacy of the injury sustained by the Oromo youth, crushed or not as the Prime Minister vows is here to stay, and will sadly remain a wound in the annals of the history of this age old nation. The task of critical social scholarship is searching for healing medicines that also breaks fear as fear in this caseis a social construct. BOOKS:Mission 101: Untold Story of 5 Australian Soldiers'Extraordinary War in Ethiopia

Mission 101-- the Operational Centres: The hidden Australian involvementin Ethiopia--WW2 and the formation of the Special Operations Executive, "SOE". "I fancy the Italians have bitten off more than they can chew..." Inlate 1940 a group of five young Australian soldiers set out on a secret mission: one of the second world war's most daring operations. Leading asmall force of Ethiopian freedom fighters on an epic trek across the harsh African bush from the Sudan, the small incursion force entered Italian- occupied Ethiopia and began waging a guerilla war against the 250,000- strong Italian army. One of these men, Ken Burke, was Duncan McNab's uncle. Using a combination of fascinating research and personal anecodotes, McNab tells the little known story of Mission 101, and how a small group of Australians helped free a nation.

Mission 101 started its days as a covert operation planned by Britain's Military Intelligence community MI(R). The Mission was designed to open a second front in North Africa by inciting rebellion against the Italian occupiers of Ethiopia with the objective of re-installing the Ethiopian Emperor, Haile Sellaisse, onto the Ethiopian throne. Undoubtedly part of the motivation for Mission 101 was the appeasement of a disillusioned British population who had, in general, never accepted the British politicalacquiescence to the Italian invasion of 1935/6. Mission 101 ended its daysas Gideon Force, which was part of the Allied invasion force that eventually entered the Ethiopian Capital, Addis Abebba in May 1941, thereby ending the Italian colonial era.

While Australia's involvement in North Africa and the Middle East duringWW2 is well known, our involvement in East Africa is almost completelyforgotten.

According to one writer on the East African campaign, Michael Glover in An Improvised War, there were nine Australians involved in the campaign.This article will briefly mention the contribution of Australian "Master Spy",Arnold Wienholt (2) and discuss the activities of the five Australians that made up the No. 1 Operational Centre.

The Operational Centres

Mission 101 has an interesting history. It was a military operation conceived by Britain against a sovereign state (Italian Ethiopia) before ithad entered a state of war with that country--Italy not entering the war until 10 June 1940. In May 1939, British and French intelligence officers met secretly in Aden to consider the question of stirring up trouble in Ethiopia. The French (General Le Gentilhomme) were somewhat hesitant about initiating the revolt, but were keen to support one should a revolt break out. The British were keener; they had actually been training Ethiopian guerrillas in the Sudan since the 1935/36 Italian--Ethiopian War,despite their public pronouncements to the contrary. Accordingly they appointed Lt Col Dan Sandford, to commence work on Mission 101. (3) Sanford arrived in Khartoum in October 1939 and immediately started organising the Ethiopian exiles and collecting weapons and ammunition in several stores, within Sudan, along the Ethiopian Border. This was all part of a British Government strategy designed to relieve pressure on the Alliedforces in North Africa. This strategy--named Mission 101--had as its aim the reinstatement of the exiled Ethiopian Emperor, Haile Selassie, onto histhrone by means of a popular uprising inside Ethiopia. (4) To implement this plan, the British War Cabinet appointed Lt. Col Dan Sandford, a former British Consul to Abyssinia, who, in retirement, had stayed on in Abyssinia after he had completed his term of office. Like many Europeans he left the country when the Italians invaded in 1935. Sandford's expert knowledge together with that of Major Robert E. Cheesman (5), another former Consul was the basis on which this high-risk operation was founded. Initially working in London, the two men put together an irregular force of experienced former guerilla war fighters and old Ethiopiahands. A significant number of these were former journalists, hunters, bushmen and adventurers. Arnold Wienholt, a former Queensland Federal Politician and alleged Red Cross worker during the Italian--Ethiopian War (1935-36) was attached to Mission 101 as an Intelligence Officer. Arnold Wienholt had in fact been working for British Military Intelligence since at least 1913.

It appears that Mission 101 was probably the first of the covert operationsthat the Special Operations Executive (SOE) was to run throughout the war. Douglas Dodds-Parker, an SOE Mission Commander, describes how Mission 101 had its gestation in his British Intelligence activities in the Sudan and Ethiopia during the Italian Ethiopian War. Unfortunately many of SOE's records are unavailable. As Dodds-Parker states in 1984;

Few records of SOE's organisation have survived. Instinct and training required minimum records and early destruction when outside the UK. There was little opportunity, even had regulations allowed,to keep diaries.Only Field Marshals and senior officials seemed, from their post war publications, to have been beyond the risk of courts martial.(6)

Foot in his "Official" history of the SOE, confirms that Mission 101 was instigated by MI(R) and then controlled by SOE in London. He also notesthat the RAF operation that flew Wingate into Ethiopia to meet with Sanford on 20 November 1940 was "the RAF's first successful operation for SOE" and that the subsequent pick-up was SOE's "first pick-upoperation." (7)
Allied forces in the Horn of Africa and the Middle East were under the control of General Archibald Wavell who seems to have been the originatorof the scheme. He called Sandford out of retirement in August 1939, promoted him to Colonel and appointed him in charge of the Ethiopian Section within Middle Eastern Intelligence (M12). Sandford put together a team comprising Capt R A Critchley (GSO3) (8), A/Major D H Nott (DAA&QMG), A/Capt T M Foley (Royal Engineers), A/Capt C B Drew (surgeon and medical officer), S/Sgt (later CSM) G S Grey (radio specialist), Maj Count A W D Bentinck (GSO2), 2nd Lt A Wienholt (Intelligence Office), S/Sgt G S Rees and Cpl Frost. Despite detailed planning having begun as early as January 1940, official appointments were delayed, for political reasons until Italy entered the war on the 10 June 1940. (9) Wienholt who was in Aden at the time immediately flew to Karthoum, arriving there on the 20 June to join Mission 101.

The plan called for a number of "Operational Centres" to be set up under British or Australian officers who together with four NCOs and a group of some thirty Ethiopians would infiltrate into Ethiopia. (10) There they would attach themselves to various guerrilla groups operating within that country to act as coordinators and to supply the guerrillas with arms and advice. The Mission's objective being to stir up popular revolts so that theEmperor would be able to return. The first of these Operational Centres, called the No. 1 (Australian) Operational Centre was sent into Ethiopia's Gojjam Province in mid 1940. (11) This unit, sometimes called Brown's No. 1 Intelligence and Operational Centre, was under the command of Lt Allan H. Brown formerly of the 2nd/1st Field Regiment, Division supportedby Sgts W.R. Howell, R.C. Wood, E.M. Body and J.K. Burke. (12)

The Ethiopian component of Brown's No. 1 Operational Centre was madeup from elements of the 1st Ethiopian Battalion, recruited inside the Sudan (13). This Battalion was considered to be of "indifferent quality" and was disbanded, the better elements of it being assigned to Brown.

Brown's Operational Centre was infiltrated into Ethiopia in the vicinity of Dinder. Dodds-Parker was to later note of them that; They were to add distinction to the ANZAC reputation for bravery and endurance, and to return home safely. OFFICIAL RELEASE: Eritrean Ministry of Information,

(By Tesfa News) TPLF Regime’s Repetitive and Insidious Lies cannot Burythe TruthA response by Eritrean government to the wild and hysterical accusations of the desperate and rattled Woyanes brutes to externalize the internal crisis of epic proportions they are faced with throughout Ethiopia in order to divert their heinous crimes being committed on our Oromo people as well as elsewhere in Ethiopia.

(Ministry Zena, February 28, 2016, ASMARA)

In the past few days, the Tigray People’s Liberation Front (TPLF) regime’spropaganda apparatus have resorted to the worn-out cheap patterns of peddling wild accusations and smear campaigns against Eritrea. The purpose of these spurious accusations is to cover up the truth and externalize the spontaneous and growing protests of the Ethiopian peopleagainst the regime.

As it is well-known, the people and government of Eritrea are patiently pursuing and focused on their developmental objectives in spite of the occupation of their sovereign territory and relentless campaigns of subversion and demonization. In this context, they have no appetite to entertain and indulge in acrimonious agendas. That the TPLF regime is in fact the real cause and architect of the ongoing spontaneous protests is also an indelible truth well known to all Eritreans and Ethiopians.

The TPLF regime has been pursuing misguided policies of “dividing the Ethiopian people in order to preserve its rule and to monopolize the economy”. Subservience to powerful allies and “victimization of Eritrea” constitute key pillars of this misguided policy. Furthermore, it has enshrined the “right to secession” in the Ethiopian Constitution as aresidual or contingent option in the event that its efforts of politicaldomination fail.

The TPLF regime has marginalized the Ethiopian people in the past twenty five years to install an economy beset by endemic and unbridled corruption and that is controlled by embezzlers. It is this grim reality, at odds with a spurious and embellishing narrative, that has prompted and underpins the ongoing protests of the Ethiopian people.

In the event, a hysterical campaign to externalize the cause and blame Eritrea or opposition movements cannot suppress the truth. As stated above, the Government of Eritrea has no intention to dwell and waste timeon fruitless acrimonious campaigns. Its current statement is designed to expose the underlying motivations behind the TPLF regime’s repetitive andinsidious lies.

Title: Turning Adwa into a Pan-African Struggle Heritage Global Site!Yekatit 23, 2008 or March 1, 2016

Inspiration*

“After Adowa, Ethiopia became emblematic of African valour and resistance, the bastion of prestige and hope to thousands of Africans who were experiencing the full shock of European conquest, and were beginning to search for an answer to the myth of African inferiority … To articulate West African nationalist intelligentsia of lawyers, merchants, journalists, doctors and clergymen who had since the turn of the century persistently sought to share political power with the colonial ruler, the roleof Ethiopia or Ethiopianism in nationalist thought and politics was great and inspiring … In separate African churches, Africans did and could protest imperial rule and build articulate leadership to oppose the domineering and discriminating actions of the colonial officials.” Taken from S.K.B. Asante, in his study of Ethiopianism in West Africa, “Ethiopia has need of no one. She stretches out her hands to God.”(Emperor Menelik, February, 1897).

”There was never a time when united that Ethiopians lost to an enemy; itis non-existent in history.” (Emperor Menilek II, 1909)

“‘I am a woman. I do not like war. But I would rather die than acceptingyour deal.” Etige Taitu Bitul, Wife of Menelik II

“The focus on modern Ethiopia by people of African descent started duringthe age of segregation and colonialism. In an Africa partitioned by European powers at the Congress of Berlin, where no African representatives were present, independent Ethiopia represented a kingdom and a beacon for idealists who promoted the freedom of Africa and other Blacks around the world. This was emphasized when Ethiopian forces defeated invading Italians at the Battle of Adowa in 1896.”(http://blackexpat.com/new/magazine/black-in-the-day-afro- american-and-afro-caribbean-expats-

1. Introduction

Today on March 1, 2016, it will be 120 years of Adwa's African decisive Victory. In 2015 it was 70s year of the 5th Pan-African Congress and the 60s year of the Bandung Conference. Still very little is known about the rich Africa struggle heritage let alone the need to draw lessons to build a better African future. It is urgent that the constructive and positive heritage of liberation struggles from every part of Africa be studied and resurrected in order to re-educate and wean generations of Africans to know what the struggle heritage entails. The glorious past, particularly of early Africa and resistance to numerous imperial advances, and the stolenlegacy should be recovered. The battle of Adwa in 1896 epitomises the successful resistance against colonialism. It has come to be recognized asone of the most significant African liberation struggles that took place during the time of the European Scramble for Africa. The best highway of African liberation is symbolized by the successful resistance of the 1896 Adwa Victory. It lives on providing enduring lessons that all should pay close attention to always.

Internally in Ethiopia, all the varied groups from Oromo resident areas toEritrea were mobilized and contributed richly to the success of the Adwa victory by all Ethiopians through the depth and breadth of the land.

This was not a victory of the leaders, or one ethnic group. This was a national victory with a wider African and indeed world significance. It was and remains an exemplary episode in demonstrating what a united peoplecan achieve with the support of the African Diaspora and the anti- colonialists in the Global South and even in Italy and the rest of Europe too!Adwa Victory was a major anti-colonialist battle fought by all Ethiopians, under the skillful leadership of Emperor Menelik and Empress Taitu. This victory resonated well beyond the Ethiopian and indeed the African border. It represented the clash between colonialism and liberationon a world-scale. Every year during 'Yekatit' (February) or March Adwa can provide the occasion to appreciate fully the international significance of the Ethiopian victory over the world colonial project in Africa. The failure to put this victory in the context of the wider challenges which confronted Africa before, during and after the nineteenth century needs tobe put right. Adwa Victory highlighted the Ethiopianism's anti-imperial- colonial project significance convincingly. It is a matter of historical recordthat the Adwa victory signaled the beginning of the end of the Scramble for Africa. This victory constitutes a crucial chapter in the record of Africanresistance and liberation. It armed generations of Africans with the confidence of victory to engage in resistance and liberation. It attracted attention as far as the Caribbean and the Americas, not to mention Europeand the rest of Africa. Adwa victory reversed the imperial-colonial project's design to populate Africa with Europeans like they did with America.It deserves to be celebrated both as a significant episode in its own right and as a memory serving well the emerging communities of resistances in the African world never again to surrender to neo-colonial tyranny for the present time. The battle of Adwa is not just a memory of the past. It continues to live on in the eternal river of time as the best expression of Ethiopianism for resisting effectively the world imperial- colonial project.

This event which took place 120 years ago by a relatively small and weakcountry, against Italy- with also support from all the imperial powers thattore to pieces Africa at the Scramble for Africa in Berlin in 1885- which was also in it becoming lately a formidable, highly armed and ambitious new colonial power is still relevant today. It is united and not divided Ethiopians that brought the victory to a full realization. It is the strategic thinking of the leadership that made a big difference. The support of the African Diaspora, and anti-colonial forces across the world was inspirational.

2. Adwa Victory Promoted Ethiopianism on a World-Scale

Period is called " the classical period of Ethiopianism because it was at this time that it exercised its greatest political influenceand was most widely noticed in the European, American and African press"(Shepperson, G., Ethiopianism past and Present in C. Baeta(ed.) Christianity in Tropical Africa, Oxford University Press,1968.p.250).
By the early 20th Century Ethiopianism emerged among African anti- colonial activists as a subtle method of challenging colonial rule by combining Christian and secular nationalist traditions to promote the ideaof Africancapacity for organization-building without European tutelage. "

Although Ethiopianism originated as a religious movement, it was significant in establishing the demand for the emancipation of the peoplesof African descent inside and outside Africa. Ethiopianism asserted that African history, civilisation and culture are sources of pride and fountainhead of European culture. After discussion with those who formed the Ethiopian church "on the wider meaning of the designation Ethiopia, all agreed that according to the propesies it literally refers to all non- European people."(Glenda Kruss, Thesis, 1985).Ethiopianism involved anawareness of the history and vaues of African culture.African history and culture became a source of pride with emphases laid on glorious African kings and empires and on the widely held belief that African culture and civilisation had been the fountainheasd of European culture(Glenda Kruss).The political aspiration of the Ethiopian leadership saw the ideal chance for its own ascent in the eviction of the European and removal ofslavery from the African continent."(Glenda Kruss)

3. The 1829 Ethiopian Manifesto

The Ethiopian Manifesto (1829) was written by Robert Alexander Young, a slave preacher, in defence of Black man's rights in the scale of universal freedom. In the Ethiopian Manifesto (1829), Young addresses both Blackand White people. Young identifies African diaspora as Ethiopians. He tells Ethiopians they only enjoy a few of their birth rights because some are enslaved.

He writes to Ethiopians and all slaves in hopes of making them aware ofhow mistreated they have been. Young questions how his skin colour plays a part in making him eligible for God's gift. Why is the case that white skin is considered more eligible to receive God's gift. He asks for freedom for everyone because it is given to everyone by God and not bymortal men.
When he addresses white men, he accuses them of denying slaves their rights, and lets them know regardless of their mortal riches and social standing, under the eyes of God, they'll pay for their actions in heaven. Heidentifies himself as being descended from Africa, and says there is a connection between all black people from all parts of the world. He says black women, men, and children have the same heritage because of Psalm68:31 which goes on to say princes come out from Egypt and Ethiopia will soon stretch its hands to God.

4.* The 1896 Ethiopian Manifesto

Ethiopianism has been described as a religion from a Manifesto of September 1896, 5 months after the decisive Adwa Great African Victory.
The Ethiopian Manifesto calls for all Africans across the globe
-To unite together Christians of the African race and various denominations in the name of Jesus Christ to solemnly work towards andpray for the day when Africa people shall become an African Christian nation.
-To demand by Christian and lawful methods the equal recognition of the African and allied peoples the rights and privileges accorded to Europeansand to place on record the great wrings inflicted upon the African by the racist people and Governments of Europe and America and to urge upon the Christians who wish to be clear of African blood on the day of God's judgment to make restitution

-To pursue steadily and unswervingly the policy Africa for Africans and look for and hasten by prayer and united effort the forming of the AfricanChristian nation by God's power and in his own time and way.

Ethiopians, in the face of their inequality even after they had appropriatedWestern religious and cultural forms- Christianity and civilisation-were protesting their exclusion on all levels, and without any loss of time that Africans must assert confidently they could be equal to Europeans.

-The African leadership reacted to the erosion of African political power, itseconomic well-being and its social stability by establishing independent bodies exclusively for Africans – Ethiopianism is for Africa is for Africans, Africans are fir humanity andHumanity is for God!

5. Enduring Lessons from the Great Adwa African Victory

The Adwa victory provided practical expression to Ethiopianism: self- worth, dignity, unity, resistance, confidence, self-reliance and freedom from colonialism.Africans unite as humans, not give in to the tribal divide and rule tactics colonialists left behind which still persists as vile ethnicism. Adwa Victory changed the relationship between Ethiopia and Europe. It is remarkable that from 1896-1906, Pan-African intellectuals like the Haitian, Benito Sylvain visited Ethiopia 4 times. During the 1903- 1904- the Cuban-American descent, William H. Ellis visited Ethiopia twice with plans for Ethiopian economic development and the resettlement of African –Americans. Marcus Garvey immortalised Ethiopia by incorporatingthe spirit of resistance of Adwa in his National Black Anthem.In 1904 Haiti's 100th Centenary Independence was celebrated in Addis Ababa, Ethiopiaan honored guard of Ethiopians volunteered and they fired severalrifle rounds andtheir slogan: Long Live Haiti! Long live the Ethiopia of America,Benito Sylvain got the permission from Emperor Menelik for the celebration and he represented both Ethiopia and Haiti in the 1900 Pan- African Congress and Emperor Menelink in a year after 1896 was appointed as hnorary president oth Pan-African Association.
As the spiritual values of Ethiopianism laid the foundation for pan- Africanism to unite all Africans to fight colonialism and apartheid, the same values that Ethiopianism as pan-Africanism has been founded with self-worth dignity, pride, self-worth, agency and freedom are needed also to realize the African renaissance today by enabling Africa to emerge as an independent, strong and proud leader rather than mere follower of former colonial powers in the 21st century. We must all join together and promote that Adwa Victory has to continue by learning through Adwa Victory to remove division and realize fully the benefits of unity. The AdwaVictory must continue highlighting Ethiopianism for Africa, the Global South and oppressed in the world.

All Ethiopians who are currently living in what is known as Ethiopia must appreciate they are privileged to be associated with Ethiopia. They all must know Ethiopia is more than the country it is now .They must cherishthe honour of being Ethiopians forever. The least they can do is unite andlearn the culture of dialogue to make Ethiopia live ever in the eternal riverof time.

6. Commemoration by Making 120 Years of Adwa Victory Specialby Erecting Lasting Heritages

It is not acceptable that the great and historic Adwa African Victory that the European powers that united for three months to split Africa into pierces that still affects Africa's agency described as a " foulcrime" is not celebrated as it should be in Adwa where the battle took place. When they denounced the Great Africa Victory as "a foul crime", there should have been serious effort to educate and wean generations by creating in Adwa, Tigray province, a great historic heritage site. That has not been done. It is never late to do it now and make a mark at the current 120 years moment on March 1, 2016. Let us call for all Africans to unite and establish a great Pan-African Adwa Victory heritage site at this time on the120 years anniversary day on March 1, 2016 or Yekatit 23, 2008.

The Adwa Africa Victory should have been recognised as a UNESCO worldHeritage struggle resources for generations to value and keep learning and knowing about this African struggle victory heritage

There should have been Pan-African education to promote the African Struggle Heritage Adwa Victory represented by establishing a special university. This should have been established at least at the centennial period when Adwa African victory was commemorated. Let all cooperate to establish it and mark 120 years as a distinguished time for remembering the great Adwa African Victory by establishing in Adwa a Pan-African Adwa Victory inspired university open to all in the Global South and the rest of the world for those who wish to work for the unity ofall humanity by learning Pan-Africanism for completing African liberation.
Let there be statues also erected in Adwa of all the key leaders and letthere be a museum detailing how the battle was won decisively. Thereshould be all the records, remembering the way the strategy was designed to create a decisive victory including the key quotes from the leaders by establishing a historic site for an ADWA AFRICAN VICTORY. This will make Adwa to become a learning site for all in the world to visit like Axum, Labella, Gondar and other historic places.

There should be special library both physical and digital in Adwa to recordand show all the African struggle histories, not just Adwa's alone, but inspired by the Great Adwa African victory. Let Adwa inspire all the struggles that we should all remember enabling the Africana world never to surrender to any form of injustice ever again.

We ask the African Union and all the African Governments from Ethiopia toall the AU member states including the Ethiopian-African Diasporas, and all from the Global South to be actively involved and contribute without fail to highlight the 120 Years of the Great African Victory. This can be done by the African Union taking the decision by making March 1 every year a Special Day for the Great African Adwa Victory and urge African states to make the month an educational Month for African unity and Renaissance by learning from Africa's great struggles heritage to advance the African unity and renaissance agency project identity to be fully promoted and realised before 2063! Let all learn how to combine Ethiopianism with Pan-Africanism and the African Renaissance with the struggle heritage of the Great Adwa African Victory Spirit.

Finally, we ourselves have decided to do a contribution with my children tocreate a special Adwa Victory song and edit a book together. Nothing is more important than getting the younger generation to be involved. We are hoping all who are able will contribute. We already have full paper contributions from Professor Habte Cherunet, a truly excellent and well researched paper, Ato Kidane Alemayehu, and a number of other contributors.

I was able to give a keynote in Adwa Great African Victory: Relevance forthe Global South at Jawaharlal Nehru University, in New Delhi in India.

(https://www.facebook.com/AssociationOfAfricanStudentsInIndia)

Let us together build memorable heritage. Let us continue to do so all Africans can create the ability together to deal with and respond to challenges by united voice, rather than making 54 noises that can easilyget ignored, and make action to realise African solutions to African problems by relying on and using Africa's spiritual, knowledge and struggles Heritages,

Finally: The World fears time. Time fears history and History fears Ethiopia. Why? Ethiopia did not provide material help to the oppressed people of the world, it was able to provide spiritual public good (SPG) to the world by her sheer presence resisting successfully all forms of colonialaggressions. This makes Ethiopia go beyond becoming a mere nation; Ethiopia is a civilization, history and humanity combined. It is not just history. It is not just civilization. It is not just philosophy. It is not just humanity. It is a great synthesis of all of them. It gave spirituality- Africafor Africans, Africans for humanity and humanity for God. It is a great inspiration just by sheer sense of its very being becomingrecognized as the provider of liberation resources to all humanity in the world.

Ethiopianism explains philosophically her historical presence as evidenceproviding so much spiritual strength, confidence, independence self-worthand freedom to those who were denied their humanity and their right to worship God as Christians. Ethiopianism remains relevant now also to continue the spiritual inspiration to all the oppressed that continue to suffer from a world that is driven by ideas that are ontologically shallow and epistemologically dry. What Makes the Great Adwa African Victory unique is it reinforced this Ethiopianism across the world.

Let Ethiopia continue to provide this powerful spiritual food to the world aslong as those in Ethiopia who currently live in it can learn to protect this treasure forever by preferring a dialogue culture to any other form of resolving any type of conflict that Ethiopia may go through from now on.

Let us all unite to agree that we treasure Ethiopia to live on in the eternalriver of time continuing to provide spiritual public good forever.

OROMO PROTSESTS UPDATES

Why Ethiopia's Largest Ethnic Group is Demonstrating?

Oromo people mourn a suspected protester who was allegedly shot dead by Ethiopian security forces, Oromia region, Ethiopia, December 17, 2015.Oromos have been protesting against plans to expand the capital Addis Ababa since November 2015.

BY CONOR GAFFEY

Since the Ethiopian government announced plans to expand the territory of the capital Addis Ababa in April 2014, the country's largest region, Oromia, has been racked with protests that have led to hundreds of deaths.

Oromia, which completely surrounds the capital of the Horn of Africa country, is home to the Oromo ethnic group. Oromos constitute thelargest ethnic group in Ethiopia, yet members of the community claim to have suffered systematic discrimination and oppression at the hands of Ethiopia's federal government. Newsweek explains who the Oromo are, why they are protesting and how the Ethiopian government is responding.

Who are the Oromos?More than one in three Ethiopians hails from the Oromo ethnic group: Oromos constituted more than 25 million of the total 74 million populationat the last census in 2007 (the population of Ethiopia has since grown to almost 100 million). The Oromo have their own language and culture distinct from the Amharic language, which is employed as Ethiopia'sofficial dialect.

The Oromo have been subject to human rights violations and discrimination under three successive regimes in Ethiopia, according to a 2009 report by U.S.-based Advocates for Human Rights group: the Abyssinian Empire under Haile Selassie, dissolved in 1974; the Marxist Derg military junta that seized power in 1974 and ruled until 1991; and the Federal Democratic Republic of Ethiopia, established in 1991 and existing until the present.

Oromo language was sidelined and not taught in schools for much of the 20th century and Oromo activists were often tortured or disappeared. A 2009 report by the United Nations Commissioner for Human Rights (OHCHR) stated that 594 extra-judicial killings and 43 disappearances of Oromos were recorded between 2005 and 2008 by an Oromo activist group. The ethnic group have clashed with the ruling Ethiopian People's Revolutionary Democratic Front (EPRDF), in power since 1991; an Amnesty International report in October 2014 stated that at least 5,000 Oromos were arrestedbetween 2011 and 2014 on the basis of oppositionto the government.

Why have Oromos protested against Addis Ababa master plan? According to the Ethiopian government, the Addis Ababa Integrated Master Plan proposed to expand the capital's territory in order to bring better services and greater economic opportunities to the rural areas surrounding Addis. For the Oromos, however, the plan constituted an attempted land grab that could result in the forced eviction of Oromo farmers and the loss of valuable arable land in a country regularly plaguedby drought.

Protests began in Oromia immediately after the plan was announced—at least nine students were killed in April and May 2014, according to the government, although eyewitnesses said the total was at least 47.

The most recent round of protests began in November 2015 and have spread across the entirety of the vast Oromia region. Human Rights Watch (HRW)reported in January that at least140 protesters had been killed in demonstrations after heavy-handed crackdowns by security forces.

The Ethiopian government announced later in January that it was abandoning the Addis expansion plans after the Oromo People'sDemocratic Organization (OPDO)—the ruling party in Oromia and a member of the governing EPRDF coalition—dropped its support for the scheme. Yet despite that, the crackdown has continued: HRW's latest update on February 22 cited claims from activists thatmore than 200 protesters had been killed, with security forces allegedly firing on peacefulprotesters and thousands detained without trial.

How have the government responded to Oromo protests?

The EPRDF has come down hard on protesters, claiming that "destructiveforces"—including groups designated as terrorist organizations by the Ethiopian government—are hijacking the protests for their own means.

Hailemariam Desalegn, the Ethiopian prime minister, said in December 2015 that protesters had burned down government properties and killedsecurity forces, and that "merciless legitimate action" would be taken against those causing disorder.

In a statement sent to Newsweek on February 23, the Ethiopian embassy in London said that the claims made in HRW's February report were basedon "malicious statements, false accusations and unsubstantiated allegations from opposition propaganda materials." The embassy claimed that the Addis expansion plans were dropped after "extensive public consultations" and an investigation into killings and destruction of property was underway.

Are Oromos seeking secession from Ethiopia?

One of the designated terrorist organizations accused of involvement in the protests by the Ethiopian government is the Oromo Liberation Front (OLF). The group was established in 1973 to campaign for the Oromo's right to self-determination. The OLF is now based out of Washington, D.C.and any accusations of its involvement in the Oromo protests is a means of "criminalizing protesters," according to Etana Habte, Ethiopian author and PhD candidate at SOAS University of London. "I don't believe the OLFhas very significant influence on this protest," says Habte. "[Claims the OLF is involved] have not any relevance or grain of truth within itself.

Oromo protests are fundamentally peaceful and it carries a legitimatequestion."

Habte claims that what the Oromo are seeking is self-determination, not secession. Article 39 of Ethiopia's 1994 constitution affords "every nation,nationality or people in Ethiopia" the "unrestricted right to self- determination up to secession." What the Oromo are asking for, says Habte, is a greater say in how their region is governed. "Oromos understand Oromia as their own territory where they have an absolute and constitutional right to self-rule," says Habte. "The Oromo protests don't ask for anything more than [what is provided by] the constitution."(February 28, 2016)

LEGEND PEOPLE

Dejazmach Nasibu Zeamanuel

Nesibu Zeamanuel (1893 – 16 October 1936) was an army commander ofthe Ethiopian Empire. Along with his brother Wasane, historian Bahru Zewde groups Nasibu "among the most colourful of the first-generation intellectuals" of Twentieth-century Ethiopia. His maternal grandfather, Azaz Emmanual Wolde Malakot, whose name both brothers came to adopt, was a notable courtier of Emperor

Post-colonial postscript

If we want to understand African history, we need to understand the Battle of Adwa

The northern Ethiopian town of Adwa is the place my grandfather called home. It's a small market town in the Tigray region, home to several churches where Ethiopian Christians of multiple sects congregate. My grandfather spoke of Adwa with pride and reverence, sometimes slippinginto Tigrigna (one of the languages spoken in Tigray) as he recalled memories. The name "Adwa" always sounded so regal coming from his mouth, at once both strong and comforting.

For much of Ethiopia and its diaspora, Adwa's significance is every bit as political as it is personal. In the bloodstained landscape that is Ethiopian history, Adwa is known primarily as the site at which the decisive final battle in the First Italo-Ethiopian War was fought. The Battle of Adwa, fought Mar. 1, 1896, was a violent clash between Italian imperial forces and the army of Ethiopia (known then as Abyssinia), composed of citizenswho gathered from throughout the country to defend the nation's sovereignty. The Abyssinian forces defeated Italy's troops, ending the firstItalo-Ethiopian War and Italy's chances at formally colonizing what would later come to be called Ethiopia.

Long before the battle itself, both nations began to lay the groundwork foran Italo-Ethiopian conflict. Seven years prior to the events at Adwa, King Menelik II of Ethiopia signed the Treaty of Wichale (sometimes spelled "Wuchale" in transliterated Amharic, or "Ucciale" or "Ucciali" in Italian) with King Umberto I of Italy, essentially ceding the northern territories of Hamasen, Bogos, and Akale-Guzai (modern day Eritrea and northern Tigray).
The controversial 1889 treaty provided Ethiopia's military with advancedEuropean weaponry (namely, muskets and cannons), as well as financialresources, in exchange for control of the aforementioned territories. Thetreaty, signed before the formal start of the European colonial project known as the "Scramble for Africa," was intended to align Ethiopia with Europe, while protecting the nation's power by sacrificing only a handful ofregions under its control. One frequently contested article of the treaty stated, depending on whether it was read in Italian or Amharic, that Ethiopia's government either must or simply could report to Italy when dealing with other foreignpowers. Each country acted in accord with its respective translation, whichnaturally favored its own interests.

By 1890, Menelik had tired of the expectation to report to Italian officials;and he formally denounced the treaty in 1893. His wife, Empress Taitu Betel, is said to have played a tremendous role in refusing to cede sovereignty. Italy's resulting attempt to extend a formal protectorate overEthiopia, by means of force, culminated three years later in this now- famous 1896 defeat at Adwa.

The victory was, by all accounts, a landslide. On Mar. 2, 1896, The New York Times ran a story headlined, "Abyssinians defeat Italians: Both wingsof Baratieri's army enveloped in energetic attack." The following day, the Times followed up with "Italy's terrible defeat: 3,000 men killed, 60 guns,and all provisions lost." The battle was widely reported in international media, stirring reactions in the West, ranging from shock to outrage.

Ethiopia's victory had two fundamentally transformative historical andpolitical consequences: the preservation of the nation's formal sovereignty, and the cementing of Italy's control over the region to be known as Eritrea.

The former consequence has reverberated throughout modern history. That an African nation could successfully repel an attempted European colonizer was not simply newsworthy. To Europeans, it was terrifying— cause to reevaluate military plans and colonial strategies. The purportedinability of African peoples to respond with a sophisticated, machine- powered defense to European imperial encroachment was often in and ofitself a justification for the violence of colonialism; the "white man's burden" was to civilize people who were supposedly unable to civilize themselves.

For Italy, being humiliated on the world stage by "lesser" peoples constituted a serious blow to reputation and rank amid its Western peers.The ensuing conflicts between Italy and Ethiopia stem primarily in Italy's pathological need to avenge its national pride: Mussolini's 1935 invasion and subsequent occupation of Ethiopia was enabled largely by Italy's continued presence to the north, but fueled almost entirely by festering, xenophobic shame.

What Italy did not accomplish, however, was the colonization of Ethiopia,that which is defined by state-level, totalitarian domination, exploitation, and conquering of one party by another. Indeed, at no point has the nation of Ethiopia been considered a "protectorate" or "mandate" of Italy, despite erroneous Western interpretations of history. Rather, Italy's occupation of Ethiopia mirrored a number of violent invasions that occurred within Europe itself over the course of the Second World War— mostly carried out by the Germans, but also the Italians in Albania, southern France, and parts of Greece. Generally, these expansions are notconsidered colonialistic in nature

While Ethiopia's status as an uncolonized entity remains disputed, the lingering, complicated effects of Italy's invasions continue to manifest bothwithin and outside of the country's borders. Ethiopia's victory at Adwa was, like most (anti-)imperial endeavors, fraught. Borne on the backs of the disadvantaged and disenfranchised, it ushered in renewed violence against ethnic minorities throughout East Africa. And yet, the battle, and the greater narrative of Ethiopia's independence, are powerful symbols of African resistance to people of multiple ethnic, cultural, and national groups both on the continent, and off it.

Ethiopia's simultaneous allegiance with and resistance to Europe created acomplex, paradoxical strain of anti-African sentiment within the nation.
Indeed, throughout various points in history, Ethiopians have seen themselves as being both un-African (or non-black) and a fundamentally,characteristically African example of rebellion.
This tension shows up elsewhere in the post-colonial imagination: "Ethiopianism" has often served as a basis for other black and African peoples' visions of political and spiritual liberation from colonial forces, both formal and informal. Rastafarianism centers its religious focus on Emperor Haile Selassie I, the ruler of post-Mussolini Ethiopia and therebya worldwide beacon of black-African hope for freedom from white persecution.

That Haile Selassie also annexed Eritrea is rarely mentioned. The conflict between the now-separate nations is often traced directly to Ethiopia ceding Eritrea to Italian control, the second major consequence of the Italo-Ethiopian conflict. Ethiopian-Eritrean relations continue to be abysmal, characterized by deep mistrust, frequent warfare, and economicsabotage. The Horn of Africa, also home to the beleaguered state of Somalia (the southern portion of which was once another Italian colony), is a hotbed of political violence, which cannot be separated from divides that occurred either under Italy's rule, or as a result of evading it.

But almost 120 years later, Ethiopia's victory at Adwa continues to inspire a unique sense of national pride within both the country and its widespread diaspora. The nation's first hotel, named after Empress Taitu, is still one of Ethiopia's most important historical sites. Mar. 1, the date of the battle, is celebrated internationally by Ethiopians and those invested in Ethiopia's history. Art, photography, and film about the battle continues todocument this powerful story.

To not grapple with Ethiopia's complex relationship to colonialism does a disservice to Ethiopian (and indeed, African) history, as well as broader world-history surrounding it. The nation's sustained fight for independenceis a source of deep pride, shame, and confusion for people on all sides of the demarcation lines. It is, like the history of Europe's own ever-evolving border relations, worthy of attentive study and critical analysis. There are countless lessons to be learned from Adwa and the stories its soil can tell;the measure of our collective knowledge will be our willingness to listen.

NILE REGIONAL DIPLOMACY

President Issaias Affewerki aka “Ajewjew” says GERD is a WhiteElephant

Tigrai Online, January 28, 2016

Issaias Affewerki the Eritrean leader undermines the Grand Ethiopian Renaissance Dam in an interview he gave to the ErTV. President IssaiasAffewerki was interviewed by ErTV as part of his annual mind-numbing speeches addressing his tiny nation. The whole world knows after the Badme war the false myth that was created by the Egyptian mercenaryleaders of Shabiya is cut down to size.

The Eritrean people learned the truth about the Shabiya leaders the hardway that after one quarter of their country was occupied by the gallant Ethiopian defense forces in less than a month at the battle of Badme. Thesad truth is the Eritrean tyrant thinks he is somebody and the world masses are his audience, so year after year he repeats himself like a broken record about issues he has absolutely no idea.

This year the EriTV journalists asked him what he thought about the arguments between Ethiopia, Egypt and Sudan concerning the GERD mega dam. It is unbelievable how this moronic imbecile tried to reduce the GERD in to a personal vendetta of the late Prime Minister Meles Zenawi.

He said when Ethiopia and Eritrea was in good terms in 1993 Prime Minister Meles Zenawi and himself were in Cairo for and OAU meeting andMeles mentioned to him he will bring the Nile issues to the stage, but Issaias advised him not bring it up because it was not the right time. He says at dinner time Meles looked furious, when Issaias asked him what was wrong, allegedly Meles told him when he told some Egyptian official that Ethiopia was bringing the issue of Nile to the stage, the Egyptian government official told him “who are you”. After that Meles threatened punish the Egyptians by saying he will do what the Turkish did to Syria and Iraq.

The truth is the evil tyrant is manufacturing lies to make himself grandeurthan Meles. First of all the Grand Ethiopian Renaissance Dam is Ethiopian and has nothing to do with Eritrea. Second the Blue Nile River is an Ethiopian issue not Eritrean so the moron has no say on it. We know he istrying to do his masters work by labeling the Grand Ethiopian RenaissanceDam as a political tool, but he is not doing a good job of it.

In reality the idea of building a dam on the Nile River was started long time ago not in 1993 as the Eritrean tyrant claimed. Read the following paragraph from an article by by Andrew Carlson in the University Ohio website. In the article Mr. Carlson says: "Emperor Haile Selassie was offended by President Nasser's exclusion of Ethiopia in the Nile Waters Agreement and in planning for building the Aswan Dam. He negotiated the1959 divorce of the Ethiopian Orthodox Church from the Orthodox Church in Alexandria, ending the 1600 years of institutional marriage.
He also began planning for several dams on the Blue Nile and its tributaries, contributing $10 million dollars from the Ethiopian treasurytowards a study by the U.S. Department of Reclamation resulting in a seventeen volume report completed in 1964 and titled Land and WaterResources of the Blue Nile Basin: Ethiopia.
Nasser responded by encouraging Muslims in Eritrea (reunified with Ethiopia after World War II) to secede from Ethiopia. He also encouragedMuslim Somalis to fight for the liberation of Ethiopia's Ogaden region."

His Royal Highness Mengesha Seyoum tells VOA:"Wolkait Tsegede has never been part of Tigre"

By Ethiomedia March 1, 2016

VOA: Prince Mengesha Seyoum says Tekeze River is the boundary between what was Begemedir and Tigre provinces during the Emperor's Time. Counter to TPLF's claim, Prince Mengesha's account puts Wolkait Tsegede in Gonder. TPLF carries out a forced ethnic federalism not to helpdevelop Ethiopia but to weaken and fragment the country as well as inciteethnic hate among the people who have lived in peace and harmony for generations.
Does TPLF really care for Tigrai
For instance, Prince Mengesha said as a passing remark during the VOA interview that Sheshebit and Shelalo, now in Eritrea, were part of Tigrai,but not Wolkait Tsegede, which has been part of Gonder Administration.

Under TPLF, there is no 'misguided' policy but a policy deliberately craftedto drive a wedge between groups of Ethiopians who have in peace and harmony for generations. Some may interpret the annexation of Wolkait Tsegede as if TPLF is ambitious to build 'Greater Tigrai.' This is profoundlywrong. TPLF's deliberate policy is based on pitting one group of Ethiopiansagainst the other so that the ruling party would remain in power indefinitely because the people lack unity to rise up against it. When we say TPLF, it is not the rank-and-file. It is the very few key leaders housedin the so-called TPLF politburo or executive committee. Others are foot soldiers, including the Central Committee members. If TPLF were a truly Tigrian organization, it would have legally demanded the return of Sheshebit & Shelalo, as well as the Red Sea coast, including the Port of Assab back to Ethiopian sovereignty.

Instead, TPLF likes to foment conflict within and among the different Ethiopian ethnic groups. By the way, during the 1998-2000 Ethiopia- Eritrea War, Meles reportedly asked Prince Mengesha Seyoum to providehim with documents that prove Badme and other disputed areas were under Ethiopia's administration when he and his father, Ras Seyoum Mengesha, were the governors of Tigrai from the '40s and '50s onwards.Prince Mengesha supplied Meles with a treasure trove of documents thatwould be prove Badme as part of Ethiopia without a shadow of doubt.
However, Meles burned the evidence, and instead provided The HagueCourt with a map that showed Badme as part of Eritrea.
If the people of Tigrai had a right in the affairs of TPLF, there is no doubt they would have asked TPLF to turn Ethiopia from being landlocked into aRed Sea maritime power. TPLF would laugh at this idea because the leaders are sworn enemies of not only the larger prison Ethiopia but also its cell, Tigrai.

TPLF may threaten Prince Mengesha Seyoum with arrest unless he retracts what he told the Voice of America [that Wolkait Tsegede has never been part of the Tigrai administration]. If the prince appears on anyradio or TV or VOA alleging that his statements have been misinterpreted,the Ethiopians should outrightly condemn the despicable TPLF for coercingPrince Mengesha to testify against himself.

Merera Gudina denies Eritrean role in Ethiopian protestsBy Addis Getachew March 1, 2016)

ADDIS ABABA, Ethiopia – A prominent Ethiopian opposition figure has denied government claims of Eritrean involvement in unrest in an area around capital Addis Ababa earmarked forurban development. “Eritrea has become a mantra the government is quick to cite wherever its moves are met with opposition,” Merera Gudina, leader of the Oromo People’s Congress, toldAnadolu Agency in a telephone interview.

His party estimates 240 demonstrators have been killed by security forces during protests thatsprung up late November after the government proposed expanding the boundaries of Addis Ababa into Oromia regional state, leading to concerns among Oromo farmers about a loss of land. The Oromo are the country’s largest ethnic group.

Journalists, bloggers and opposition members have reportedly been jailed for criticizing thegovernment. Gudina said fresh riots erupted earlier this month in Arsi, a province to the southeast of Addis Ababa after security forces opened fire on a wedding party.

In a news conference on Thursday, Communications Minister Getachew Reda indicated Eritrea was behind the recent unrest. “At a certain point there were other elements involved,”he said. “Of course political elements here and abroad were involved in hijacking the process.”

He added: “Eritrean government from the very outset manifested a sort of precocious talentfor troublemaking in the region. This is a government which has turned destabilizing the region into an art form. And every resource they have is spent on destabilizing the region. Ethiopia for obvious reasons is the primary target.”

Ethiopia fought a border war with Eritrea in the late 1990s that ended with a peace treaty in2000. However, Ethiopia has not accepted the post-conflict borders and maintains troops incontested areas.

Ethiopian runners investigated for doping;

Sweden’s Abeba Aregawi provisionally suspended

(March 1, 2016) Ethiopia is the latest track and field nation to be investigated for doping withthe Ethiopia anti-doping agency general secretary revealing nine of the country’s runners are under investigation. Solomon Meaza said his agency was investigating five athletes he described as high-profile after they returned suspicious results in doping tests.

He said the International Association of Athletics Federations (IAAF) requested contact details for the other four and the world body is investigating them. “There is a real concern when the upcoming investigations arrive,” he said. Solomon declined to name the athletes orgive details of the substances they are suspected of using as investigations are ongoing. The Ethiopian cases will be another blow to the sport following major doping scandals in Russia and Kenya in the build-up to the Olympics in Rio de Janeiro.

Abeba Aregawi tests positive

Meanwhile Sweden’s Ethiopian-born 1500 metres former world champion Abeba Aregawihas tested positive for doping, according to the Swedish Athletics Association (SFIF).

The test for banned substances was conducted by the IAAF and a full investigation will be conducted. “It is with dismay and with extreme disappointment that we report this issue,” SFIF general secretary Stefan Olsson said. “We totally reject all forms of cheating, doping …we have a zero tolerance, and this is totally unacceptable.”

The 25-year-old Aregawi has been provisionally suspended by the SFIF, effective immediately. Aregawi, who competed for Ethiopia at the London 2012 Olympics, was worldchampion in 2013 in Moscow, but finished only sixth in a slow tactical race in Beijing last year.

She has also won the European championships and World Indoors gold over her specialist distance. Aregawi finished fifth at the London Games, again in a slow tactical race, behind Turkey’s Asli Cakir Alptekin, who was later stripped of her Olympic title for a second doping offence. Aregawi switched allegiances to Sweden soon after the Olympics, gaining citizenshipthrough her marriage to a naturalised Swede of Ethiopian origin. AP/AFP

Remembering Menelik II and victory of the Battle of AdwaBy Tsehai Berhane-Selassie

Historically, the Turks, then the Egyptians, later still the Turko-Egyptians, and finally the Italians vied to carve away, or at least to dominate, the territorial boundaries of Ethiopia. Thiswas a saga of enemy encirclement that began around 702 when the Ethiopian navy lost its attempt to assert control of the Hijaz across the Red Sea. Ethiopian monarchs were still working hard centuries later to keep enemies (dina) at bay. These were enemies with whom blood money could not be exchanged and de facto they did not belong in the north-east African region. Down the centuries the monarchs struggled to coordinate internal resources for the purpose of fighting them. Their strategy included lessening regional potentates' competition to control the helm of power. In other words, the monarchs accompanied fightingthe dina with redirecting the energies of those competing for internal power towards sustaining a unitary state. The latest in doing this was Tewodros II (r1855-1868). Yohannes IV (r1872-1889), who followed his example, retained only two negus under him by the mid- 1880's, and Menelik II (r1889-1913) had only one by the 1890's. All three fought effectively to keep out the dina from their borderlands by making sure there was a singular state in Ethiopia.

Of course, the dina had their views of this internal Ethiopian process. The Turks of old, who imagined Ethiopia as one of their outlying provinces, were able to bribe or somehow convincesome to be their stooges on its borderlands (so Haggai Erlich tells us, among others). Power holders in Egypt installed favourite 'rulers' all around the areas controlled by the Ethiopian monarchs in their eagerness to control the trade routes and other resources along the Nile Valley and the Red Sea. Just as these traditional (and historical) enemies had this serious purpose, which still resonates with us with regard to present day international politics, the Ethiopian monarchs also kept their eyes on the bigger prize. They always managed to curb thesuccess of lackeys of Egypt or Turkey from disrupting the Ethiopian state. Despite superior wealth and access to firearms and other weapons, the traditional dina thus failed to succeed in bribing those who vied for internal power. This developed a reputation for Ethiopia: Ethiopians always fight among themselves but unite in the face of external invasion.

Competition to control the Red Sea and the Blue Nile brought European colonialists along theEthiopian borderlands in the second half of the nineteenth century. With superior technology and determination to acquire political, economic and geographical control so as to plant colonies (i.e. bring their own natives to possess new territories and export raw materials), Europeans were not satisfied with exercising control through surrogate rulers. Opening and controlling the Suez Canal, in particular, brought the British into Egypt (1882), a part of Somaliland and later the new country they called the Sudan. The opening of the Suez Canal also brought their rivals, the French, to establish colonies along the Red Sea. Britain and France had been establishing colonies around the world since the sixteenth century. Italy on the other hand had come into existence only in 1861, taking the date they proclaimed Victor Emmanuel as the first king of the newly formed state. It acquired the port of Assab after its treacherous local ruler had sold it to an Italian company. The French and the British urged andhelped Italy to expand from Assab into the highlands of Hamasen in Ethiopia. The Italian leaders also learnt from the British different ways and means of taking and keeping territories in Africa, especially using local differences and exploiting points of competition for power.
They relied on technologically advanced weapons too, of course. Determined to take on Ethiopia since the 1880s, they were encouraging their agents to work on lulling the Ethiopiansinto accepting Italian colonial ambitions.

The Ethiopians knew that the advent of such grabbing Europeans from beyond the seas haileda different type of dina. Those who only heard about European knowledge and the very few who had visited appreciated European advancements. They bought weapons from them and not a few even related openly to European traders and diplomats. It was in this spirit that Menelik signed in 1887the treaty of friendship and commence, known as the Treaty of Wichale, with the Italians. He abrogated it when he discovered that the Italians were using it to claim that Ethiopia was their protectorate. Menelik took the crown of ‘king of kings’ in 1889. However, he was faced by some internal uncertainties. A few armed men, at least two of them aspirants to the throne, defied his authority, and the Italians bribed such competitors for power, and hoped the ones who were keen on European knowledge would prefer to side with them against Menelik. Besides, severe famine, pestilence and cattle disease had depletedthe population and affected morale. These were not unusual, but on top of Italian intervention,they made Menelik’s early days as neguse negest vulnerable.

Menelik had campaigned and succeeded to have internal cohesion. Camping at Were Illu eighteen days later, he sent back Kao Tona of Wolayta, Sultan Aba Jifar of Jima, DejazmachGebre Egziabher of Leqa and Dajazmach Jote of the boder land ‘Shanqela and Arab’, to safeguard the south. Rumours of local disturbances were rife and their presence in the provinces was needed. Dejach Beshah Aboye had to leave part of his forces in Sidamo under Dejazmach Lulseged, and Ras Mekonnen too, who reported in the capital by Meskerem, had to leave most of his troops to guard Hararge, as did Fitawrari Tekle who arrived from Wellegain the west.

Menelik personally dealt with a few dissidents that could injure the campaign at hand. One ofthese, Dejazmach Guangul made his submission, asked pardon and sought permission to participate in ‘the defence of his country and master’. Menelik deployed him to operate underRas Mengesha. Other shifta submitted in Bagemder, and sending Bejirond Balcha Menelik punished a village that was harbouring others in a hideout at an amba called Arara. Another dissident, the ruler of Adal, whose predecessors had been known for their loyalty to Ethiopia,was rumoured to have been liaising with the Italians probably since 1888. The Italians had been bribing him promising him sovereignty. To neutralize dissent on that front, Menelik deployed troops that had arrived late having been delayed by the heavy rains. These easily took Awesa, the town that the sultan deserted on receiving news of the defeat of his men. On 15 December, Menelik reviewed his troops at Wefla, near Ashangie. He displayed forty two cannons that he was to deploy later in the battle of Adewa. Negus Tekle Haymanot of Gojam,the last to report, arrived at Ashangie and joined Menelik on 23 December.
The Ethiopian advance force reached the Italian camp at Amba Alagi, Tigray, in early December. It was commanded by Ras Makonen from Harar, and constituted of Ras Mikael heading the cavalry from Wello, Dejach Wele Betul from Yeju and nearby Bagemder and RasMengasha Yohannes of Tigray. An unexpected attack mounted by Fitawrari Gebeyehu on December 7 1895 forced a fight and the enemy withdrew, leaving the Ethiopian a more defensible position in a matter of a few hours. The rases disciplined Fitawrari Gebeyehu later for attacking without being ordered to do so, and reported their victory to Menelik.

The main army with Menelik arrived on 6 January, 1896, two months after he started from hiscapital. Mobilized by the ‘king of kings’, they were all looking to his overall leadership. His troop deployment kept Ras Makonnen, Ras Mengesha and Ras Mikael as warari in the middle. Negus Tekle Haymanot was in command of the right wing and Ras Alula, the left.
The emperor and the empress were right in the centre. The whole force positioned itself on thehills overlooking the Adwa valley. Menelik’s troops were estimated at 73,000 to 120,000. Thecavalry and infantry were armed only with lances, but a’ significant percentage’ of the soldiers with Menelik were carrying rifles. Women warriors, some responsible for state or personal treasuries, had their retinue. Individuals showed off their skills in horsemanship and daring actions, and their ‘masters’, their leadership qualities, command of social support, networking and coordination. Even grooms and pages looking after war materials, tents and pack animals were hoping to attract attention as fighters. Prepared to sacrifice their lives and resources, all the warriors had brought personal supplies and domestic servants to prepare their food and provide them with personal service.

By late February 1896, wthin a month after they forced Mengesha to evacuate, the Italians had been reportedly running short of supplies. The commander, Baratieri sought to advice hisgovernment in Rome that Menelik’s troops too might run short and go away, but irrespectiveof this, the response prompted him to act. His subordinates in the field supported this command when he called them to a meeting on 29 February, and he had no choice but to arrange an attack at 9 am of the following day. Early in the morning of 1 March, he advancedthree brigades in three parallel formations to the crests of three mountains on the. Albertone on the left was to set the pace in the night. General Dabormida was on the right, while Arimondi was in the centre. Immediately to their rear was the reserve force led by Ellena. Albertone intended to eventually position himself on the summit known as Kidane Mehret, theoretically to command a view of Ethiopian movements along the narrow tracks to Adewa.Contrary to their plan, however, the three columns separated in the night and spread across awide terrain, and by mistake, Albertone advanced directly into the position commanded by Ras Mengesha Yohannes who was on guard of the Ethiopian camp for the night.

Runners brought Menelik the news that the Italians were advancing. Before dawn, therefore, Menelik summoned his commanders and ordered them forward. Arimondi’s forces held theirposition, until they were swamped and dislodged by an additional force of 25,000 more men that Menelik released. At 6:00 am, Ethiopian artillery repulsed Albertone and his askari towards Arimondi’s brigade, and finally captured Albertone himself. Dabormida’s brigade perished when it unknowingly marched into the cavalry troops of Ras Mikael’s men before itcould relieve Albertone. The remaining two brigades under Baratieri himself were outflankedand destroyed piecemeal by the forces of Negus Tekle Haymanot. By noon, the survivors of the Italian army were in full retreat.

Ethiopian losses were estimated around 4,000–5,000 killed and 8,000 wounded while the Italians reportedly lost about 7,000; 1,500 were wounded. Three thousand, including GeneralAlbertone, were taken prisoners, but two hundred of the prisoners died of their wounds later. Around 800 askari suffered amputation of their left legs and right arms as punishment for joining the enemy. As they fled towards Eritrea, the Italians left their artillery of 11,000 riflesand most of their transport. As a direct result of the battle, Italy remained synonymous with the 'enemy', but it signed the Treaty of Addis Ababa which abrogated any claims the new Italian state had on ancient Ethiopia.

This was the first time since the sixteenth century that a united force of 'masters', householdsmembers, and emergent warriors rallied under a neguse negest. They focussed on a single purpose: repel an enemy that was external to the region. Ordinary soldiers and their 'masters'aimed at saving the independence of their country. Their ubiquitous sensitivity to hostile neighbours was a monument to their ever standing on tiptoe to wage defensive wars along their borders. The battle against the Italians was a par excellence example of chewa military confrontation against those it defined as dina. The Ethiopian victory, despite losses and shortage of supplies, remains a monumental record of Ethiopia as an independent nation. Prisoners and the wounded were treated with the respect that Ethiopian victors always show,and a lot has been written about that.

Ordinary soldiers and their spokespeople, the azmari, delighted in exchanging opinion about this remarkable feat of achievement with their monarch. An amusing example from Menelik'scamp is reported by an eye witness who saw a frustrated Italian captive brought to the presence of Menelik and was agitating for attention. The captive's manner was out of place, according to the witness. Noticing this, Menelik, who had been conversing with his nobles, smiled and asked the man: 'I hear you have chicken that lay big eggs in your country.' The man was confused, to say the least, as was the observer. Lacking awareness of Ethiopian battlefields, and master and retainer relationships, both captive and writer from Europe could not work out why such a question would come from the monarch at that sober moment of victory. In hindsight of history, we can assert that Menelik, his court and their public were happily enjoying their victory together. Obviously, the following couplet had already been composed right there and then, and Menelik was referring to it.

ግብሩ እንቁላል ነበር ይሄን ጊዜ ሃበሻ

That does mean,
If Menelik was not born to pick up the shield
Eggs would be the tribute the Habesha would be paying now!

Soon after the war, people world-wide accepted his special place in world affairs. Oppressed black people and officials of mighty governments alike rushed to honour Menelik and his country.. His legacy inspired Ethiopians who fought against vengeful Italians forty years afterthe battle of Adewa. That is, pride in his achievements at the Battle of Adewa sustained a fiveyear guerrilla warfare and heroism during 1935-41. Menelik's sarcastic reference to the couplet quoted above contains a message that still sounds loud and clear even 120 years on though it was then lost on the Italian captive and observer from Europe. Menelik was a humble person who listened to his people. As the poem said, if it were not for his military and political leadership, Ethiopians would have been certainly subjected to the whims of colonizers. We would not have this great history in our background. What a great man Menelik was! (For comments or questions, I can be reached at tsehai2_berhaneselassie@yahoo.com)

Taxis in Addis end strike after directive's implementation postponed
March 1, 2016 VOA/Ethiomedia ADDIS ABABA ETHIOPIA
Taxis on strike bring Addis to a standstill: Taxis in the Ethiopian capital have boycotted services, thus bringing the city of 4 million to a standstill. According to a VOA report, the boycott was sparked by a controversial 'Road Transport Safety' directive taxi drivers fear would put them out of work if fully implemented. Taxi drivers who talked to VOA reporter Tsion Girma said taxi drivers were bearing too much hurdles and yet were facinga grim prospect because of what the government is trying to put into action.

News updates ADDIS ABABA (March 2) - Thousands of taxis that were onboycott in the Ethiopian capital resumed service on Wednesday after theywere informed that the government has decided to postpone a controversial directive. Though many taxi drivers that talked to the Voiceof America (VOA) Amharic Service correspondent Eskinder Frew were skeptical that the government would scrap the directive, they said they were obeying the orders passed by their union leaders.

The Road Traffic Safety Directive was issued five years ago but was held back from implementation for unknown reasons. The EPRDF government,which is facing a stiff opposition in Oromia region, is facing numerous challenges, including violent clashes in Gonder, as well as in eastern and southeastern regions such as in Gambella. When news broke that the taxis were boycotting in Addis, many mistook as the last straw that brokethe camel's back. Taxi drivers have warned that their measure had no political link to any ongoing opposition to the ruling party in power.

Seceding the Oromo from Ethiopia an obsolete notion, Oromouprising paves way for Ethiopian unity -Obbo Leenco Lata

(ESAT News March 03, 2016): Chairman of the Oromo Democratic Front(ODF), Leenco Lata said "seceding the Oromo from Ethiopia an obsoletenotion, Oromo uprising paves way for Ethiopian unity Leenco Lata says seceding the Oromo from Ethiopia an obsolete notion, Oromo uprisingpaves way for Ethiopian unity"

Chairman of the Oromo Democratic Front (ODF), Leenco Lata said on Thursday that the popular uprising in the Oromia region of Ethiopia had proved the unity of the Oromos and paved the way for a genuine unity ofthe people of Ethiopia.

The founder of the Oromo Liberation Front and who was also its General Secretary, Leenco Lata, in his message to the Oromo youth who are at theforefront of the fight against the minority regime, said their struggle was bearing fruit. He said other Ethiopians have shown the readiness to join the struggle alongside the Oromo people.

Leenco said the his party, ODF, would work with other Ethiopian forces to establish a democratic and one Ethiopia and that the notion of seceding the people Oromo from Ethiopia was an obsolete idea that was not in syncwith the present realities.

Leenco, who is on a business trip in the US made a stop at ESAT's DC studio for an interview in Afaan Oromo. ESAT recently began a broadcastin Afaan Oromo, the language of the Oromos, the ethnic majority in Ethiopia.

Leenco recently made an appeal to the Prime Minister of Ethiopia, Hailemariam Desalegn, to sack the Chief of Staff, General MohammedYunus (Samora), and Chief of Intelligence and Security, Ato GetachewAseffa, "for their mishandling of the crisis, [the protest in the Oromia region] and replacing them with professional and impartial officers."

He also called on the Premier to release all political prisoners and establishment of "an independent commission to investigate the killingsand assaults committed against peaceful Oromo demonstrators and to bring the culprits to justice."

A teacher of a teacher

Abba Gorgoryos, an Ethiopian scholar who taught the author, Hiob Ludolf (1624-1704) Amharic after meeting him in Italy. Ludolf went on to publishthe first Amharic grammar. Here Gorgoryos is surrounded by a border bearing inscriptions in Latin and Amharic. He was invited to Germany in 1652 by Ludolf, who at the time was in the service of Ernest I, Duke of Saxe-Gotha. Lodolf and the Duke were interested about Ethiopia and prepared a list of queries whi...ch were presented to the Abba. Abba Gorgoryos worked with Hiob Ludolf in co-authoring the earliest grammar of the Amharic language, as well as an Amharic-Latin dictionary, which became the first African language to be translated to Latin. The Abba also developed a Ge'ez lexicon. On his return to Ethiopia in 1658, he died in ashipwreck off the Turkish city of İskenderun.

Emperor Haile Selassie inaugurates the University College of AddisAbeba on February 27, 1951

When today is being opened this University College, our feeling of joy hastwo motivations, our happiness is of two kinds. These are private and common. Happiness shared with many creates a source of permanent affection and understanding. But private happiness is a temporary matter.

"Our endeavor to expand schools has passed from planning to achievement. Our satisfaction in the field of education is in our days being shared by the Eth...iopian people, and particularly by those who have and are profiting by it. Thus, our saying that this would benefit Ethiopia is nowbeing increased greatly. As has been pointed out by our Vice-Minister, work on the University is progressing rapidly. To make successful the workof those educational institutions of higher education, aid of the students and teachers is needed. We hope that the preparation of students and teachers is nearing completion.

We are proud to see Ethiopian youth thirsting for learning. Although the fruits of education can be applied to evil as well as to good things, you Ethiopian students should avoid having a bad reputation and be eager andenergetic in your studies, be loyal to your country and obedient to your teachers, eschew lies and follow truth, respect good and be heirs of good work. "

Itegue (Empress) Taytu Bitul The Woman Warrior of the Battle ofAdwa

The loyal wife, the commander, the strategist, the practical feminist even way before feminism was a mainstream movement: Empress Taytu—her name literally means Empress Sunshine—was indeed a sunshine for her nation when it fell under the cover of darkness. Perhaps, there would not have been the story of Adwa/Adowa—the March 1, 1896, Ethiopian victoryagainst colonialism, without Empress Taytu, for she inspired it.

Empress Taytu was not only loyal and respectful wife to her husband Emperor Menelik II (she was older than him), but also powerful enough tochallenge his decision-making. She was the one that pushed him to declare war against Italy at the Battle of Adwa—tearing up the Wuchale Treaty between Ethiopia and Italy, a treaty whose article 17 had two different meanings in Amharic and Italian versions: The Amharic version recognized the sovereignty of Ethiopia and its relationship with Italy as just a diplomatic partnership, while the Italian version made Ethiopia Italy's protectorate. The moment that discrepancy was discovered, Empress Taytu was the first to agitate the hesitant Emperor and othermen to stand up for liberty, dignity and against Italian aggression.

Empress Taytu, as a military strategist, facilitated the downfall of Italy at the Battle of Adwa. She had her own brigade that she bravely commandedin the battlefield, fighting in the frontline and motivating any man that wanted to retreat. She also mobilized women, both as fighters and nursesof wounded soldiers. You could say, she was fierce and motherly leader that brilliantly led from behind without taking any credit for it. Here is a nice article for those interested in reading more about her: Empress Taytu.

A quote from the article: "Empress Taytu Bitul was actively involved in Menelik's government. She exemplified the possibility of reform and transformation from within. She was a persistent critic of the nobilities and ministers of Menelik. Born in Wollo from a Christian and Muslim family, Taytu had a comprehensive early training in traditional education.She was fluent in Ge'ez, the classical Ethiopian language.

European papers of her time praised Empress Taytu, comparing her with Joan of Arc, Cleopatra, and other famous women in history. She had inspired so many Ethiopian women warriors that followed her. Still today she inspires many more Ethiopian sunshines. Sadly, after her Emperor husband passed away, she was a victim of conspiracy and power strugglein the palace, forced to spend the rest of her life in solitary.

Here is a wikipedia entry on her last days: When Menelik's health began todecline around 1906, Taytu began to make decisions on his behalf, angering her rivals for power through her appointment of favorites and relatives to most of the positions of power and influence. Widely resented for her alleged Gonderine xenophobia and nepotism, the nobility of Shoa and Tigray, along with the Wollo relatives of the heir-to-the-throne, Lij Iyasu, conspired to remove her from state responsibility. In 1910, she wasforced from power, and a regency under Ras Tessema Nadew aka "Aba Kemaw" took over. Instructed to limit herself to the care of her stricken husband, Taytu faded from the political scene. Taytu and Menelik did not have any children. Menelik died in 1913 and was succeeded by his grandson from a daughter of a previous liaison, Lij Iyasu. Taytu was banished to the old Palace at Entoto, next to the St. Mary's church she had founded years before, and where her husband had been crowned Emperor.

Women's History Month of March Meets The Adwa Victory

In Memory of The Woman Warrior Itegue (Empress) Taytu Bitul When women's history month meets Ethiopia's historical victory over

Italy's colonial ambitions, Empress Taytu comes to mind, the woman whoagitated Emperor Menelik II to act, and led her people to defeat Italian forces on March 01, 1896.

This African victory over European aggression was not only significant forEthiopia, but was also empowering for people of color across the world (without excluding the fact Ethiopia had its own internal feuds). And Empress Taytu was at the forefront of the campaign for national defense and sovereignty.

No wonder the European papers of the time praised the Empress as the"Joan of Arc of Africa," though the comparison was unnecessary, for shewas unique in her own way. Empress Taytu was an astute political observer and a military commander who fought on the front lines and crafted strategies alongside the generals (or Rases) who were all men.

An American historian Raymond Jonas wrote about the Menelik-Taytu relationship: "It was a union of destinies. In Menelik, Taytu saw a vehiclefor her ambitions. In Taytu, Menelik saw wealth, political smarts and connections in a part of the country he would have to win over if he was to rule Ethiopia. If Menelik and Taytu were running for office in an American presidential election, it would be said that Taytu brought geographical balance to the ticket." Her name's meaning: Tsehai meansthe Sun. Taytu (Tsehaitu) means "she is the sun." She was indeed the Sun: bright, warm, and also fiery.

In Memory of The Great Ras Alula Engda aka "Aba Nega"

Aba Nega's newly rebuilt burial chamber inaugurated in his final resting place, the ancient and historical Enda Abba Gerima monastery (EthiopianNews, Tigrai Online March 3, 2016)

Alula Engda, Abaa Nega the first African general burial chamber rebuilt and inaugurated in Enda Aba Gerima Monastery. Even though Ethiopian leaders loved to mention Ras Alula as an example of Ethiopian heroic military general, his body was laying in the monastery for years forgotten.

Alula Engda Equbi also known by his battle field name Alula Aba Nega newly rebuilt burial chamber inaugurated in his final resting place, the ancient and historical Enda Abba Gerima monastery. The historical monastery is located a few kilometers from the town of Adwa. The famousfirst African general is buried in the heart of Tigrai where the battle of Adwa took place in which he was one of the main leaders and heroes of the battle.

Alula was born in 1827 to an assuming farming family in a small village called Menewe, Tmbien in central Tigrai State in northern Ethiopia. Startedfrom a humble beginning he rose fast in the ranks of the Ethiopian militaryserving Emperor Yohannes IV, King of Zion and King of Kings of Ethiopia. Ultimately Raesi Alula Engada Equbi became the most respected by his friends and the most feared by his enemies.

He has successfully defeated the Egyptians in Gundet 1875, Gura 1876, Aylet 1887, Senhit 1880, he defeated the Mahdists of Sudan; in 1885 in Metema. Long before the battle of Adwa Raesi Alula defeated the Italians;in Sahati 1887, Dogali 1887, and Amba-Alaje 1889. As we mentioned above he was the main leader at the battles of Mekelle 1896 and Adwa 1896.

The newly rebuilt burial chamber was financed by Mr. Dawit Gebreigziabiher through one of his NGOs. The inauguration was attendedby invited dignitaries, the clergy from the Enda Abba Gerima monastery, and many local people as well as from all over Ethiopia including Addis Ababa.
Ras Alula Engida (Ge'ez: ራስ አሉላ እንግዳ) (1827 – 1897; also known by his horsename as Abba Nega and by Alula Equbi was a general and Ethiopianpolitician. He was one of the important leaders of the Ethiopian armies ofthe 19th century and was described by Haggai Erlich as the greatest leader whom Abyssinia produced since the death of Emperor Tewodros IIin 1868.He participated in many battles for the independence of Ethiopia,most importantly Dogali and Adwa.

AFRICAN GLOBE:
Saudi Arabia And The GCC Are Expanding To Eritrea.Geopolitical Implications For Ethiopia
AFRICANGLOBE – Recent media reports indicate that Saudi Arabia and theUAE have contracted Eritrea's government for assistance in the War on Yemen, using the East African state as a transit and logistics base for theiroperations, as well as 400 of its troops for cannon fodder in Aden.

Add to it the Qatari soldiers that have already been present on the groundfor a few years to "mediate" the border dispute with Djibouti, and the most important members of the Gulf Cooperation Council (GCC) have unexpectedly converged in what many might think to be among one of themost unlikeliest of places. While it may have been difficult to foresee this happening, in hindsight it actually makes quite a lot of sense, and contrary to the conventional assessment that this is about Yemen, the argument can be made that it's also just as much about Ethiopia as well.
Unbeknownst to many, Qatar is the "ox driving the cart" in this case, and whether they like it or not, the rest of the GCC states will be reluctantly forced to follow its destabilizing lead if Doha decides to throw Ethiopia intochaos.

The research expands on the briefing first laid out by South Front and should be seen as a continuation of their original work. It begins by setting the context for what's been going on along the Horn of Africa latelyand how the GCC's military advances fit into the larger context of recent history. The piece then investigates the levers of influence for how Qatar could destabilize Ethiopia as well as its radical ideological motivations for doing so. Finally, the article concludes with a scenario study of how Qatar could engineer an Unconventional War to bring down Africa's next up-and-coming power.

The Crowded Coast Geostrategy:

The Horn of Africa is one of the most geostrategic regions in the world dueto its location along the Bab-el-Mandeb strait that connects the Gulf of Aden with the Red Sea. In a broader context, one can say that it's one of two maritime chokepoints (the other being the Suez Canals) that link Europe with South, Southeast, and East Asia, and until the Northern Sea Route becomes operable sometime in the next decade, all sea-bound trade between the EU and these corners of Eurasia must transit through its narrow passage. As could be expected, this makes control over the strait a heightened prize for any power or combination thereof, and it's not for naught that most Great Powers scrambled their navies to the region over the past decade ostensibly to "combat piracy".

Come One, Come All:

What was really happening was that the US was trying to militarize the waterway under the auspices of countering "Somali pirates", which it mustbe reminded, were bogeymen that were blown completely out of proportion by the Western mainstream media for premeditated geopolitical ends. The US wanted to create the conditions where the rest of the world would accept the continuous presence of its fleet operating inthese strategic international waters, but precisely because their legal status, it meant that any other fleet could do the same thing on identical grounds, which is exactly what happened. While the UK and French navieswere obviously there to support their American 'big brother', Russia, China, India, and Iran also sailed their ships there too, but for the purposeof both watching the West and symbolically showing that they won't allow NATO to completely control this space.

The Strategic Illusion:

While the "pirate" hype has largely died down and the multilateral naval positioning over the Bab-el-Mandeb has markedly subsided since its frenzied height in the late 00s, the importance of the strait obviously hasn't changed, and the American-initiated competition over its control merely took on another form and amphibiously migrated landward. The US joined its French partners in Djibouti by moving into Camp Lemonnier in 2001 (Paris never left the country after independence), thus giving it anon-land presence from which to project naval power if it chose to do so. Italso opened up "anti-terror" facilities in Yemen during this time as well, but just like with the Djibouti base, these could also achieve the dual purpose of influencing the strait. With both of these power nodes already occupied by the US prior to the “anti-piracy race”, it might seem strange why America started such a game in the first place, but more than likely, it did so as a manifestation of the “exceptional” hubris of the Bush Administration that was also continued during the early reign of his successor.

Thus, while the non-NATO states may have felt they somehow lessened the US’ control over Bab-el-Mandeb by placing and then removing their navies from the Gul f of Aden, it was all just a carefully crafted illusion (one which hopefully resulted in the multipolar states acquiring some degree of useful information about the Western fleets). The US still retained its positions in Djibouti and Yemen, albeit without the ability to directly apply the same amount of force had its naval presence still been there in the same capacity, so nothing really changed in a simple strategicsense. That status of affairs would remain until the Yemeni Revolution finally succeeded in casting off the American- and Saudi-installed government in early 2015, which dramatically led to the US having to evacuate its military personnel from the country. For the first time since the end of the Cold War (when the Soviets had a naval base in Aden), theUS didn’t’ fully control the Bab-el-Mandeb, and the strategic panic that this produced is partly why Saudi Arabia made the fateful and ill-planned decision to invade Yemen.

Bab-el-Mandeb And The War On Yemen:

The Saudis and their lackeys have succeeded in blockading the Yemenicoast and conquering Aden, thus returning most of the unipolar world’s control over their lost ‘real estate’ in this ultra-strategic region, but capitalizing on their unofficial casus belli to make sure that they can indefinitely retain control there, the GCC decided to ‘jump the pond’ to theHorn of Africa, hence its interactions with Eritrea and the contracting of Amara’s ‘services’. In a sense, Eritrea is envisioned as being the Gulf’s “back-up Yemen”, a friendly territory under its proxy influence from whichpunitive measures can be launched against the people of Yemen if they ever do succeed in once more nearly liberating the entirety of their country.

So long as Eritrea is under the GCC’s sway, then from a strategic-logisticalstandpoint, the Yemeni War of Independence will be all the much harder to win because the Saudis’ and their bloc have a ‘rear guard’ base almost directly abutting the country. The GCC’s actions in Eritrea can thus be seen as a type of “double insurance” in making sure that as many of the Yemenis remain under the Gulf boot for as long as possible, with such an unnecessary strategic consideration being seen as coming from a position of fear and weakness on their part, not strength. They fear the Yemeni militias so much that they’re preemptively creating this ‘rear guard’ supplyand logistics facility in Eritrea “just in case” a counter-offensive one day manages to unsuspectingly cripple their occupying forces.

It’s appropriate at this juncture to take stock of all the international military forces currently present along the Horn of Africa. The Saudis and Emiratis now have a naval presence in Eritrea, and as South Front reported (and which was verified separately this summer), the UAE is alsoseeking to open a naval base in Berbera along the northern coast of Somalia in the breakaway Somaliland region. The US and France have an on-ground presence in Djibouti, but they’re also joined by the Japanese, which opened their first military base abroad since World War II in 2011 under the opportunistic ‘justification’ of “anti-piracy”. They might, however, soon be joined by China, if the rumors of Beijing eyeing the country for its first overseas base are true. China could of course call uponthe convenient slogan of “anti-piracy” to justify any possible forthcoming presence, but no matter what its stated grounds for doing so are, such a base would serve the additional purpose of safeguarding the Chinese- financed Djibouti-Addis Ababa railroad to the fastest-growing economy in the world and the headquarter state of the African Union.

Gulf Interests Move Inland

Now’s a good time to elaborate more in-depth about the continental African interests that the Gulf States seek to pursue through their partnership with Eritrea. To be more specific, it’s better to look closely at Qatar’s geopolitical objectives in this case, since the tiny emirate ironicallyleads the regional pack in its preexisting involvement in East Africa.

Eritrean Backgrounder:

This coastal state is one of the world’s newest, having gained its independence from Ethiopia in 1993 after fighting a three-decade-long war to achieve it. Peace came only after the government in Addis Ababa, at that time run by a military entity known as “The Derg”, was dissolved in1987 and its leader Mengistu Haile Mariam was ousted in 1991 by a coalition of ethno-centric rebel groups. Due to the near-continuous fighting that took place on its territory, post-independence Eritrea was a wreck, but President Isais Afwerki helped to achieve stability and elevatedliving conditions, as attested to by journalist Andre Vltchek who visited a year ago. Nevertheless, the economy is in dire straits and Eritrea is largelyisolated from the world community, partly due to the border disputes it has with all of its neighbors, and also because of successful Ethiopian lobbying against it. According to Ethiopia, Eritrea supports a variety of Anti-government rebel groups and even has links to Al Shabaab inSomalia.

The Qatari Connection:

The last point is extremely contentious and has never fully been proven,although to clarify a bit, a Wikileaked US diplomatic cable quoted the Somalian President accusing Qatar in 2009 of using Eritrea as a financialconduit for Al Shabaab. Considering Doha’s support to other terrorist groups such as ISIL, this doesn’t seem implausible, and it might even bethat rerouted Qatari funds channeled through Eritrea (which might have received a modest cut) could be to blame for why Ethiopia would allege that its nemesis was aiding terrorists.

No matter what shape it takes, Eritrea's direct or indirect links to Al Shabaab are one of the reasons why the UNSC initiated an arms embargo on the country in 2009 that was just renewed last month. In this connection it's relevant to remind one of Qatar's role in the region, and it's that it was asked to deploy "peacekeepers" along the Eritrean-Djibouti border by each of their governments in 2010 to assist in "mediating" theirborder dispute. One can cynically suggest that this provided nothing morethan the perfect cover for Qatar to continue supporting Al Shabaab, whichas was mentioned above, it had already been doing for some time. The reason Qatar supports this terrorist group is because it's basically a regional franchise of ISIL, and a faction of Al Shabaab had just pledged allegiance to its Arab "brothers" late last month. These two groups pursuethe same radical Islamic goals that Qatar has been patronizing for years through its sponsorship of the Muslim Brotherhood, and ISIL and Al Shabaab are pretty much the more visibly militant and globally notorious arm of the Brotherhood in this respect.

The Afro-Eurasian Caliphate:

To get a fuller grasp of why Qatar is promoting terrorism in East Africa, one should understand the macro-regional context of Doha's ideological ambitions. The peninsular pipsqueak uses its financial largesse to flex power disproportionate to its tiny size, and it manifests this through support of a hodgepodge of ultra-extreme Islamic groups, all of which areclassified as terrorists by Russia: the Muslim Brotherhood; the Taliban; ISIL in Syria, Iraq, Libya, and Sinai; and Boko Haram. Each of these terrorist groups is active in a certain geographic area, with the only 'missing link' being the southern vector, ergo the ideological/militant 'necessity' of Al Shabaab. Altogether, these terrorist organizations represent the 'foot soldiers' of a transnational caliphate project that Qatarand its US ally would like to see expand all throughout the central pivot ofAfro-Eurasia, the "Greater Middle East" of Central Asia, the 'conventional' Mideast, North Africa, and East Africa. While its current prospects of success have dramatically dimmed ever since Russia's anti-terrorist intervention in Syria, it still remains possible for Qatar and the US to actualize some aspects of this grand strategy in certain corners of their operational theater, which in this context is the Horn of Africa.

Double-Sided Chaos:

The introduction of "managed chaos" to the region via the Qatari- supported Al Shabaab terrorist group serves two main purposes. The firstone is to pressure Ethiopia, which the US may feel more inclined to do if the country moves more solidly in a pro-Chinese direction in the future, and the second is to perversely use the presence of Al Shabaab to deepenits security relationship with Ethiopia by being the arsonist-firefighter thatcreates a problem and then 'helps resolve' it afterwards. It's useful to recall that the US contracted Ethiopia to invade Somalia in 2006 in order to destroy the Islamic Courts Union (ICU), a precursor of Al Shabaab, which thus strengthened the partnership between the two. Also, by keeping Islamic terrorism alive in Somalia, to whatever extent it's presentat a given moment, the US can keep the ‘justification’ open for selectivelyintervening in the country with drone strikes or commando raids, thus entrenching its presence in the region and turning the criminal into the ‘cop’.

The Enemy Of My Enemy:

Rewinding the focus back to Eritrea, Asmara is passively tolerant of Qatar’s Al Shabaab patronage because it could supplement its grand strategic goal of destabilizing Ethiopia. To explain, Ethiopia has previouslyintervened in Somalia against Islamic terrorists before and subsequently occupied the country, and the idea that its forces could continue to do so again in the future, and thus be bunkered down in another potential quagmire and spread thin in critical (and rebellious-prone) interior regions, excites Eritrean strategists. Furthermore, as will be explained more fully in the third section, there’s the potential for Al Shabaab terrorists to become the “freedom fighter” figureheads for the Somali population in Ethiopia’s eastern provinces, formally the Somali Region butalso known as Ogaden. Eritrea’s most important objective is to have ethno-centric regions inside of its former colonizer achieve independence in the same manner that it did – through prolonged and militant struggle against the central government – so that its rival can never be in a position to threaten it again (let alone exist in its current state). If the Somali region just so happens to be the spark needed to set the whole federal haystack alight, then so be it, as Asmara’s reckoning goes, whether its Qatari-supported terrorism that initiates the destructive domino effect that they expect or an indigenous ethno-centric uprising.

The Big Picture:

To bring everything together in a more simple understanding, Qatar hastaken the lead in destabilizing the Horn of Africa out of ideological and unipolar-loyalty reasons, and it’s using its “legal” presence in Eritrea to facilitate this. The War on Yemen provided the other main GCC states of Saudi Arabia and the UAE with a ‘plausible justification’ for also ‘getting in on the action’, knowing just as well as Qatar does that Eritrea is a ‘double-hinged’ state that can be used to simultaneously project maritime and continental influence, with the latter case being against Ethiopia.

Concerning the GCC’s newest geopolitical target, it’s one of the world’s most promising emerging economies, and from a Gulf perspective, it couldalso be useful in satisfying their African-directed agricultural and construction-outsourcing needs. Placing their forces in Eritrea, Ethiopia’s arch-rival and hated foe, is designed to put pressure on the rising, albeit potentially unstable, continental power and thus make it more amenable to whatever their forthcoming grand interests may be. Also, by making Eritrea an integral part of their regional military architecture, the Gulf States are essentially declaring that any aggression against it would also endanger their own interests, thereby blanketing Asmara with a de-facto security guarantee and altering Addis Ababa’s perceived existing strategic balance of power (which it had earlier assumed was relatively even).

By itself and approached from a purely geopolitical standpoint, it's theoretically possible for Saudi Arabia and the UAE to maintain this new status quo between Eritrea and Ethiopia (perhaps even exploit it and eachof those two states to their own advantage if shrewd diplomacy is applied), but the presence of Qatar, the 'loose cannon', means that the entire arrangement is inherently unstable and subject to sudden change. Qatar has proven itself much more prone to impromptu outbursts of rhetorical rage than any of the other Gulf States, and its comparatively younger leader (only 35 years old) is much less versed in the art of statecraft than his peers. Being so hot-headed and already harboring an inferiority complex vis-à-vis his larger and more mature neighbors, QatariEmir Tamim bin Hamad Al Thani is inclined to give the full terrorist 'go- ahead' whenever he feels like it (or if he 'thinks' it would be of strategic use for him), meaning that a Qatari-sponsored Islamic destabilization of Ethiopia cannot at all be discounted, and must be astutely prepared for bythe country's authorities.

Towards The Unconventional War ScenarioGCC Support:

The final section of the research discusses the Unconventional War scenario that Qatar could help engineer alongside Eritrea and Al Shabaab(one of its ideological 'children', it could be argued) to throw Ethiopia intochaos. Once this process begins, Saudi Arabia and the UAE could be expected to assist Qatar and this scenario to some extent, knowing that Doha is much too tiny and inexperienced to ever fully control the larger developments that it helps to unleash (the "Arab Spring" Color Revolutions are a case in point), and they thus want to be in a position togain as much self-benefit from what may turn out to be an irreversible course of events. Correspondingly, with these self-motivated interests in mind, they could act as force multipliers in their own way for advancing the chaos that Qatar created, thereby ushering in a chain reaction that could lend crucial and ultra-destructive force to the scenario that will be discussed.

Consequences:

The full consequences of Ethiopian chaos won't be discussed in the scope of this article, but they can be assumed to have the risk of virally spreading through parts of the North and East African regions (since Ethiopia is of the latter but capable of influencing the former through its border with the rebellious Blue Nile state of Sudan), and would at the veryleast impact the country's 95 million or so citizens to an undetermined extent (to say nothing of the transnational social implications). Also, with China's economy becoming more dependent for growth on trade with Africa, any significant disruption in Ethiopia, Beijing's prized partner nowadays, could directly ripple back to the East Asian giant and negativelyaffect it to a degree, all depending of course on the preexisting level of Chinese-Ethiopian trade. The higher that Ethiopia rises in terms of international significance (be it diplomatic, economic, military, etc.), the harder its fall could be and the further the aftershocks would travel acrossthe globe, thus suggesting that the (US-advised) Qatari destabilization of Ethiopia could be timed to achieve maximum effect depending on its relationship to various actors (in this case, likely China) at the given moment (Text ends)

Geopolitical Implications For Ethiopia

Gulf Cooperation Council's geo-political ambitions in Horn of Africa

By Berhane Kahsay

Tigrai Online updates, February 1, 2015

The precursor to the current conflict in Yemen is the dethronement of President Al Abdullah Saleh in February 2012. Ever since his departure, the country seems to have plunged into a stubborn turmoil and at this stage Sunni Saudi Arabia and Shia Iran have been battling out for the complete control of Yemen resulting in the demise of 6000 civilians according to the United Nations' recent estimates. Iran already has a foot-hold in Iraq, Lebanon (Hezbollah) and Syria. And Saudi Arabia is now going all out, after its failure to dislodge Bashir al-Assad, to prevent Yemen from becoming the fourth domain of the Islamic Republic. To complete the encirclement of Saudi Arabia, Iran would also continue with its efforts to bring Bahrain, which is almost 70% Shia but ruled by Sunni monarchy, into its sphere.

Saudi Arabia's military intervention in Yemen has the support of the United Arab Emirates (UAE), Qatar, Europe and America. It also has secured the participation Sudan, Somalia, Djibouti, Senegal and Eritrea. These African countries have condemned in the strongest possible mannerthe recent attack on Saudi Arabia's embassy in Tehran in protest at the execution of a dissident Saudi Shia cleric, Namir Baqr al-Nimr. The UN Monitoring Group on Somalia and Eritrea has stated that 400 Eritrean mercenaries have been embedded with UAE contingents, and the West African nation, Senegal, has also despatched 2100 legionnaires to fight alongside the Saudi-led coalition.

According to the Egyptian newspaper, Al-Monitor, Saudi Arabia's investment in Sudan has reached $13 billion and in November last year

$1.7 billion was authorised for the construction of dams in the Kajbar, Daland Al-Shiraik which are expected to be completed in five years to serve the agricultural needs of the Kingdom. Egyptian authorities are claiming that Sudan would consume her entire allocation of 18.5 billion cubic meters for this purpose and they are fearful that further Saudi agricultural projects would lead to the reduction of their share violating the Nile Agreement of 1959. By Egyptians standards, this was a muted reaction but when Ethiopia, source of the Nile, announced the construction of theRenaissance Dam, the uproar that reverberated throughout the Arab Republic shattered the Richter scale.

Eritrea, Senegal, Djibouti and Somalia can also expect monetary rewards for being used as cannon fodders for the Saudi-led involvement in Yemen.According to Herman Cohen, the former Assistant Secretary of State for African Affairs, UAE warships have been utilising the port of Assab and thishas been leased to Saudi Arabia for five decades. UAE is also seeking to lease the former naval base in Barbera, Somaliland, as reported by South Front Analysis & Intelligence which is an independent body specialising in international relations and conflicts. It appears that the largest oil producer in the world has full control of the Red Sea corridor and this has enabled her not only to monitor cargo ships sailing in and out of the Suez Canal, but to also curtail Iranian arms shipments to Yemeni Houthis.

Eritrea which was Iran's ally until very recently changed sides as it believed that its strategic interest would be best served by joining the Saudi-led campaign in Yemen. The obvious motive for this move is to generate the desperately needed hard currency by leasing its port and sending its troops to fight against the Iran backed Houthis. But the primary and overriding factor must have been to take advantage of thisgreat opportunity to restore its relationship with the US by being on theside of its strong oil supplying ally in the Middle East. There is no doubt that Saudi Arabia will very soon lobby the US to help lift the punitive UNsanctions (Resolution 1907) imposed on Eritrea for training, arming andfinancing the ISIS affiliated Al-Shebab of Somalia. The US alongside EU may also exert pressure on Ethiopia to accept and implement the recommendations of the Ethio-Eritrea Border Commission.
After all the US is benefiting from the current crisis in Yemen as its ally is massively pumping oil pushing the price to go down below $30 a barrel and the US is certain to reciprocate by being receptive to Saudi Arabia's efforts to bring Eritrea ,its newly acquired lackey ,in from the ''cold.'' And a further reduction in the price of the liquid gold is expected due to Iran's entry into the market after the lifting of US sponsored sanctions imposed on the Persian state for refusing to desist from its efforts to enrich weapon grade Uranium. For sure the US would like the conflict to persist as this would create additional opportunities for American arms manufacturing industries to sell their state of the art weaponry to Saudi Arabia and UAE whose annual defence expenditures presently stand at $49.7 and $15. 7 billion respectively. Ethiopia's entire budget for 2015/2016 fiscal year was $11 billion.

Saudi Arabia's next move would certainly be to resolve border and politicalissues that exist between Eritrea on the one hand and Sudan, Djibouti andSomalia on the other in order to protect and maintain it's newly created sphere of influence in Eastern Africa. In the not too distant future, the Kingdom of Saudi Arabia in conjunction with the other Gulf Cooperation Council (GCC) would be in pole position to hurt Ethiopia by using its satellite states in the Horn coupled with the unrestricted use of the Red Sea and its surroundings giving her the opportunity to control Ethiopia's import and export commodities. And this would very much gratify the Eritrean dictator who has left no stone unturned to make this a reality but nothing to show for his incessant and futile efforts that he started after hisconclusive defeat in the border war that he initiated in 1998. At present Ethiopia has excellent relations with Sudan, Djibouti and Somalia but this could abruptly change at the flick of the Saudi's petro-dollar fingers.

Up until the second half of April 2015, Eritrea was on the side of the Iranians and it allowed the Persian state to use its Red Sea islands to transfer arms to the Yemeni Houthis but the Eritrean leader switched his Allegiance after his visit to Saudi Arabia at the end of April 2015. The Iranians must have been outraged to read the statement realised by Eritrea's Ministry of Information on 5 January 2016 which stated that '' The government of Eritrea reaffirms its strategic neighbourly ties with Saudi Arabia and condemns the violation perpetrated against the embassyof Saudi Arabia in Tehran.'' The Eritrean tyrant must have been plotting topull the Saudi's to his side by using Iran and this is not a mean achievement by any standards.

Eritrea has greatly enhanced her position by allowing GCC member states on its soil. Its efforts to destabilise Ethiopia would now be intensified with the tacit approval of her sponsors and any retaliatory measures by Ethiopia would be viewed as a threat to their interest in the Horn region. Qatar has always been financing Eritrea and Al-Shebab to subvert Ethiopiaand no doubt the other GCC members would now join in with a view to making Ethiopia a client state. Previously Islamic-inspired unrest was fomented from afar but now it would be organised and conducted from very close quarters. Chaos in Ethiopia would seriously affect the economicprogress of the last twenty four years and this would indirectly adversely affect Chinese investments in Ethiopia which would greatly please the Americans who may be encouraging the Gulf States to proceed with their calamitous and short sighted geopolitical objectives behind the scenes.

The presence of GCC States in Eritrea is a serious threat to the security ofEthiopia which is still technically at war with its neighbour. Saudi Arabia launched an offensive against the Houthis because it claimed that its safety and security had been jeopardised by hostile Shia rebels armed andfinanced by its arch religious rival Iran. Yemen has now been reduced to rubbles and there seems to be no end in sight. These two opponents havealso been involved in supporting various factions in Syria for regional hegemony and 250,000 people have been killed and 11 million citizens displaced from their homes since the conflict they have been part of begannearly five years ago.

The dynamics of the Horn region has been altered by the arrival of Saudi Arabia and UAE. Tiny Qatar, an ardent exponent of Muslim Brotherhood was already in the area as a ''mediator'' in the border conflict between Djibouti and Eritrea. Ethiopia was hoping the no war, no peace status would finish off the Eritrean dictator and usher a friendly government in his place. This has not materialised and it appears that his stay in power islikely to be extended as a result of the presence and support of the GCC members.

Ethiopia has now been left with no option but to re-evaluate its position on Eritrea as recent developments in the region have made the current status quo untenable. The country shouldn't have been in such a serious quandary if its leaders had utilised numerous palpable breaks to eject the tyrant without resorting to an all-out war. So what should Ethiopia's next strategy be to forestall GCC's menacing geo-political goals?

To prevent one of the globe's emerging economies from being thrown intochaos, the prevailing political situation in the country has to be made much more inclusive and freer for loyal opposition parties to operate in any part of the nation without any hindrances. Its susceptibility to foreigninterferences could also be substantially minimized by dealing with corruption and bad governance in a systematic and sustained manner before they precipitate serious and widespread unrests as happened in many countries over the years. Equally essential is ensuring that challengers of the ruling party have regular and fair access to state radio and television not just immediately before general elections which has been the case since the establishment of the federal state. This would enable them to express their political views and opinions on government policies without the need to rely on alternative media outlets such as VOA Amharic service, ESAT, Deutsche Welle and other sources which have been used by diaspora extremist couriers to instigate uprisings on several occasions. Focusing on bigger geopolitical picture is far more preferablethan squandering valuable time and resources on minnow political opponents led by Merara Gudena and Beyene Petros who are coming tothe end of their shelf lives.

Addressing issues that affect the Muslim community in general and the youth in particular, and identifying and resolving potential ethnic conflict areas before they turn into bloody clashes would also deny external enemies the opportunity to initiate disarray that could scupper the socio- economic developments which have been in motion since 1991. Stability and harmony coupled with fair distribution of wealth would guarantee a lasting peace which is needed to take the economic prosperity to a higher level by attracting foreign investors. Once our house is in order, we can then move on to take a decisive action to remove the Eritrean despot by inducing internal rebellion that has to be seen through to the end. At present the dictator is not facing stiff challenges from his own people and elsewhere giving him ample time to organise and despatch his surrogate organisations to Ethiopia to create chaos and instability. Forcing him to focus on his own survival would leave him with no opportunity to interferein the internal affairs of a nation with nearly 100,000,000 people.

The measures taken by the Ethiopian government so far have caused the Eritrean economy to plunge into abyss in addition to the irreparable rift created between the tyrant and his people. But the bottom line is that theisolated and despised dictator is still in power orchestrating his destructivestrategies against Ethiopia, and lately, he seems to have manoeuvred himself into a position where he would certainly receive financial and military support from GCC states enabling him to extend his brutal regime.

As Saudi Arabia appears to have become the lease holder of the port of Assab, the Ethiopian government has to convene an urgent meeting with the Arab nation to give assure that the current status would not be affected in the event of the dissolution of the dictator. The Saudis are verylikely to acquiesce to this proposition as they have not fully settled in theirnew domain. Equally important factors that would compel them to grab this proposal include the military stalemates they have encountered in Yemen and Syria costing them huge amount of money as well as the dire state of their economy due to the substantial reduction in oil revenues.

IMF is predicting that Saudi Arabia's budget deficit is set to exceed US

$107 billion this year and the kingdom's officials and civil servants have been told to tighten their belts. The self-inflicted economic down turn wascaused as a result of the overproduction of oil which was intended to hurtIran that came out of a long period of US sponsored UN sanctions in January 2016. Saudi's geopolitical ambitions can also be checkmated by escalating Chinese economic involvements in Ethiopia as the second largest economy in the world would take whatever is necessary to deter foreign threats to her investments in the second most populous Horn nation.

Geopolitical Implications For Ethiopia

Ethiopian News, Tigrai Online, January 28, 2016

Issaias Affewerki the Eritrean leader undermines the Grand Ethiopian Renaissance Dam in an interview he gave to the ErTV. President IssaiasAffewerki was interviewed by his TV station as part of his annual mind- numbing speeches addressing his tiny nation. The whole world knows after the Badme war the false myth that was created by the Egyptian mercenary leaders of Shabiya is cut down to size.

The Eritrean people learned the truth about the Shabiya leaders the hard way that after one quarter of their country was occupied by the gallant Ethiopian defense forces in less than a month at the battle of Badme. Thesad truth is the Eritrean tyrant thinks he is somebody and the world masses are his audience, so year after year he repeats himself like abroken record about issues he has absolutely no idea.

This year the Eri-TV journalists asked him what he thought about the arguments between Ethiopia, Egypt and Sudan concerning the GERD mega dam. It is unbelievable how this moronic imbecile tried to reduce the GERED in to a personal vendetta of the late Prime Minister Meles Zenawi.

He said when Ethiopia and Eritrea was in good terms in 1993 Prime Minister Meles Zenawi and himself were in Cairo for and OAU meeting andMeles mentioned to him he will bring the Nile issues to the stage, but Isaias advised him not bring it up because it was not the right time. He says at dinner time Meles looked furious, when Isaias asked him what waswrong, allegedly Meles told him when he told some Egyptian official that Ethiopia was bringing the issue of Nile to the stage, the Egyptian government official told him "who are you". After that Meles threatened punish the Egyptians by saying he will do what the Turkish did to Syria and Iraq.

The truth is the evil tyrant is manufacturing lies to make himself grandeurthan Meles.

First of all the Grand Ethiopian Renaissance Dam is Ethiopian and has nothing to do with Eritrea. Second the Blue Nile River is an Ethiopian issuenot Eritrean so the moron has no say on it. We know he is trying to do hismasters work by labeling the Grand Ethiopian Renaissance Dam as a political tool, but he is not doing a good job of it.

In reality the idea of building a dam on the Nile River was started longtime ago not in 1993 as the Eritrean tyrant clamed. Read the followingparagraph from an article by by Andrew Carlson in the University Ohio website. In the article Mr. Carlson says: "Emperor Haile Selassie was offended by President Nasser's exclusion of Ethiopia in the Nile Waters Agreement and in planning for building the Aswan Dam. He negotiated the1959 divorce of the Ethiopian Orthodox Church from the Orthodox Churchin Alexandria, ending 1600 years of institutional marriage.

He also began planning for several dams on the Blue Nile and its tributaries, contributing $10 million dollars from the Ethiopian treasurytowards a study by the U.S. Department of Reclamation resulting in a seventeen volume report completed in 1964 and titled Land and WaterResources of the Blue Nile Basin: Ethiopia.

Nasser responded by encouraging Muslims in Eritrea (reunified with Ethiopia after World War II) to secede from Ethiopia. He also encouragedMuslim Somalis to fight for the liberation of Ethiopia's Ogaden region." Source:http://origins.osu.edu/article/who-owns-nile-egypt-sudan-and- ethiopia-s-history-changing-dam

DIPLOMACY

Eritrea opens doors for outside world

By Edmund Blair, Reuters March 1, 2016 Engagement extends to a U.N. rights delegation

* Minister reveals first U.N. jail visit in years
* Eritrea says world has come knocking
* Diplomats see new openness after sanctions isolation
* Asmara denies backing al Shabaab militants in Somalia

ASMARA, Feb 29 (Reuters) - Europe's migration crisis and the conflict inYemen have created opportunities for Eritrea to draw closer to the European Union and Gulf Arab states, offering the poor Horn of Africa nation the chance to end isolation it blames on U.N. sanctions.

In Reuters interviews in the capital Asmara, Eritrean government ministers and senior officials outlined deepening ties with Gulf nations and closer relations with the European Union. The foreign minister also revealed that Asmara had allowed a U.N. human rights team to tour aprison for the first time in years.

Eritrea, which insists it has always been open to improving relations, saysregional and world powers are waking up to the importance of the country's strategic position on busy Red Sea shipping lanes in a volatile region. Western diplomats see a greater readiness to engage by the tiny nation that has long had a "go-it-alone" attitude, born of its solitary 30- year armed struggle for independence from its far bigger neighbour, Ethiopia, a quarter of a century ago.

This comes despite Eritrea's deep resentment of the U.N. sanctions mainlyimposed following accusations it backed Somalia's Islamist al Shabaab militants, a charge Asmara denies. "Over the last year or so, they have been much more open," said one senior Western diplomat in Asmara, whorequested anonymity. "A number of ministers see the isolationist, autarkic(self-sufficient) approach they had was not serving their best interests," he added.

But diplomats say it is not just Asmara which wants better ties. The European Union signed a 200-million-euro package of financial support in January, fretting that an economically fragile Eritrea means more migrantslanding on its shores and believing more employment would discourage youths from fleeing. Gulf states have found a regional partner in their fight with rebels in Yemen, which lies just 40 km across the Red Sea.

The United Arab Emirates now uses Eritrean "logistical facilities", Eritrea'sForeign Minister Osman Saleh Mohammed told Reuters in an interview in his Asmara office. "Eritrea wants to engage, (and) now the world wants toengage." Yet the nation that is one of Africa's poorest and which has in the past rejected foreign aid it felt would create dependence rather than development, says it is not changing tack. "We have never changed our vision," said Yemane Ghebreab, political adviser to President Isaias Afwerki who has ruled since independence in 1991. "We are not very goodat or very keen to play the game that we have been told we need to play."

That is the kind of stance which has given Eritrea its "go-it-alone" reputation, which Western diplomats say often hinders their efforts to soften the approach of their capitals on U.N. sanctions - basically an arms embargo - imposed in 2009. Yet the diplomats in Asmara, who asked not to be identified, say Asmara's growing outreach extends beyond bilateral ties to thorny issues like human rights in a nation that is accused of holding political prisoners, a charge Asmara denies.

JAIL VISIT

In February, a delegation from the U.N. Office of the High Commissioner on Human Rights was allowed to visit Sembel prison, south of the capital,the first time a U.N. mission toured a jail after years of requests. "We areengaging with them," Osman said, giving the first official confirmation of the visit. A U.N. official acknowledged the visit took place without giving details. "That was a big deal," said a diplomat while another said he believed it was the first since about 2008.

Despite the jail visit, Asmara still refuses access to another U.N.- appointed rights team, which it says is biased. The U.N. commission of inquiry issued a report in June that listed abuses, such as arbitrary detention and forced labour under the country's national service programme. It said Eritrea may have committed crimes against humanity.

Sheila Keetharuth, the U.N. special rapporteur on the human rights situation in Eritrea and commissioner on the comission of inquiry who hasnot been allowed to visit, told Reuters that any sign outsiders were seeinginside any prison was positive. But on the Sembel prison visit, she also said: "Was this a kind of PR access? Do we have today or are we going tohave in the near future broader independent assessment and monitoring of prison conditions?"

Eritrea has also blocked visits by a U.N. monitoring group which last yeardeclared it found no evidence Eritrea was backing Somalia's Islamist al Shabaab militants. "There are no grounds for the Security Council to continue sanctions," the foreign minister said, speaking after the latest U.N. Security Council sanctions briefing. He said sanctions were aninternational effort "to go for isolation of Eritrea".

For now, the monitors' assessment is based on research abroad. Westernpowers insist a report will only carry real worth - and so lead to lifting sanctions - when it is based on research inside Eritrea. Asmara says monitors ignored past cooperation so there is no point letting them in. Atthe United Nations, Russia and China lean towards easing sanctions whileBritain, France and the United States do not. After the end of Italian colonial rule, Eritrea was under British control for a decade until the United Nations established Eritrea as a federated region with Ethiopia.

Haile Selassie's annexation of it as a province sparked war.

Asmara has long felt betrayed by world powers, who they say failed to force Ethiopia, now with a population of 97 million, to abide by a boundaryarbitration ruling after the 1998 to 2000 border war. Ethiopia says it wants talks on implementation, which Asmara rejects.

Sanctions on Eritrea, which has an official population of 3.6 million thoughother estimates suggest it could be almost double that, then followed in 2009. "They became introspective. They were rather shocked they had lost so many friends," said Cedric Barnes, Horn of Africa director for the think-tank Crisis Group. "It takes a while to reverse the situation."

NEW DYNAMIC

But the migration and Yemen crises are creating a new dynamic, which diplomats say is spurred on by what they see as a realisation in government that the economy cannot afford to lose more of its educated youths leaving the country in droves. Each month as many as 5,000 people flee Eritrea according to U.N. figures, estimates the Eritrean government disputes. Those who have left usually blame Eritrea's compulsory national service that can last many years with low pay.

Minister Osman said migration had "become a catalyst for improving that relationship with European countries". On Gulf ties, he said: "The Yemeni situation has created a common understanding to deal with terrorists, withextremists and at the same time with piracy." Eritrea was "building up therelationship" with Saudi Arabia and letting UAE use "logistical facilities" like Assab port, he added, without outlining specific UAE activities there.

The minister said Eritrea was not receiving anything in return - an assertion diplomats question. One diplomat suggested a link between deepening Gulf ties and improvements in fuel supplies in a country whichhad faced shortages in early 2005. Osman dismissed any oil transfer buthe said Eritrea, which has few foreign investors outside the nascent mining industry, wanted investment from the Gulf and elsewhere. "This will create employment," he said.

Western diplomats acknowledge a new approach is not just coming fromEritrea, which lies in a turbulent region next to Sudan where an Islamistgovernment is in power, near Yemen where al Qaeda is active and northof Somalia where a Western-backed government is battling the al Shabaab Islamist insurgency. "We want this country to contribute to rather than detract from stability in the Horn of Africa," said the senior Western diplomat. "We don't need another failed state on the shores of the Red Sea."

Eritrea's population is roughly half Christians, mostly living in the highlands, and half Muslims, many of whom live along the Red Sea coast.With Islamist ideas on its doorstep, Western nations want a stable nationthat can avert any seepage of ideologies. As a Gulf ally, Eritrea could alsobe a target for al Qaeda in Yemen. "It's a fairly bad neighbourhood," another diplomat said.

But Eritrea, run by a government with a strongly secular approach, saysconcerns that its citizens could fall prey to extremism are misplaced. "Extremist ideas taking root in Eritrea is very difficult," said presidential adviser Yemane. "It has been attempted over the past 25 years. It has failed miserably." Who will stand for the innocent?

These heart-wrenching photos of the people of Omo valley region of Ethiopia make me feel numb and irritable. It reminds me of the 17th and 18th-century slavery.These pictures show how unfair life really is in Ethiopia under ethnic apartheid regime of the TPLF/EPRDF. These heartbreaking images resonate, reminding us of the absolute physical andemotional devastation that has been committed to the people of Ethiopia.

The people of Ethiopia must stand together and expose the unspeakablecrimes against humanity and condemned the racism against the the people of Omo valley.

IT IS THE RESPONSIBILITY of all Ethiopian people to speak the truth andto expose lies.

Increasing human rights violations and deaths from careless state-ownedsugar plantation in the Omo Valley!

We in the Solidarity Movement for a New Ethiopia (SMNE) sounds an urgent emergency alert regarding the present endangerment of the peopleof the Omo Valley.

These fellow-Ethiopians are being threatened with human rights violationsand atrocities by the TPLF/EPRDF's troops in the region as the regime moves ahead to remove the people from their land in another crony development scheme for a state-owned sugar plantation on245,000 hectares of land with an additional 100,000 or more hectares of some of the most fertile land committed for other agricultural projects. Those whoresist, face state-sponsored human rights crimes.

In all of Ethiopia, the 500,000 people of the Omo Valley may be amongthe most neglected of Ethiopians by the current TPLF/EPRDF regime.

These dark-skinned and marginalized tribes—the Bodi, the Mursi, the Kwego, the Suri, the Hamer, the Karo as well as others—have only been valued in Ethiopia for the tourism business they attracted due to their unique and primitive customs that have remained unchanged for centuries. Now, the TPLF/EPRDF has found a better use for their land andit does not include them.

The previous and present government of Ethiopia never did value themand even now, they do not see them as their own people. In the entireDiaspora of about a million Ethiopians, some experts suggest that only one person from Omo Valley is among them. This is an example of howmarginalized these people are.

Not only have they been intentionally denied access to entering the 21st century—it would negatively impact tourism—they have also been deniedaccess to clean water, education, health care and other opportunities to amuch greater degree than most other marginalized groups.

Now, as their land is being taken away from them, they are also beingdenied their most prized asset, their indigenous land and water.

Just wait, the TPLF/EPRDF regime will suddenly pretend to be forcing the people from their land and into resettlement camps—where they have no means for independent sustenance—in order to "help" bring these people into the 21st century. Do not believe it! It is just an excuse to cover up forillegally stealing their ancestral land and they are ill-prepared to defend themselves!

The people of the Omo Valley are living in a nation set up under the flawed government policy of ethnic federalism. Each ethnic group is supposed to look after people of their own ethnicity, without the expectation that others will care about the rights, interests and well beingof those outside their own groups. Because of this, the people of the OmoValley are more deprived of their rights than many others. Who speaks forthem?

Their land is being taken over by their own government without any consultation. The authorities did not care about them and now the peopleof the Omo Valley have taken matters into their own hands.
Some limited fighting has broken out and as the TPLF/EPRDF sends troopsto silence them through intimidation, human rights crimes and secretive extra-judicial killings, they seem to think they can eliminate these peoplewithout the world knowing.
The people of the Omo Valley are depending on the world not caring aboutthem, but the SMNE has already received information from the people andwe want to warn the ethnic apartheid regime in Ethiopia to stop the human rights abuses against these people and if they do not, they will be found accountable.

We also call on other peace and justice loving Ethiopians to stand up withthe people of the Omo Valley. They are us. The people of the Omo Valleymay be deprived and they may have been used as commodities for tourism in the past, but to God and to us, they are precious, just like everyone else.

The establishment of the SMNE was to educate Ethiopians about the valueof those outside our villages, tribes and regions. One of the SMNE goal was to eradicate this primitive thinking where some devalue the humanityof others and turn away in apathy to their pain and suffering.

This SMNE principle of putting “humanity before ethnicity” and caring about the freedom, justice and well being of others—neighbors near and far—is the basis for healthy societies and cooperative global partnerships.

We in the SMNE will continue investigate and gather evidence to be used for future prosecution so perpetrators of these crimes will face justice andnot get away with these crimes.

The people of Ethiopia will hold them accountable under the rule of lawthat is not simply rhetoric.

If any think that they can commit crimes without being found out, you arewrong as we already have our sources from this remote region of the country. We will continue to monitor what is going on there.

As we stand up for the people of the Omo Valley, let it bring us togetheras one people of Ethiopia who stand up for the freedom, rights and wellbeing of all of us.

Sound message to future generations of Ethiopia.

One of the most interesting historical event we have ever observed, Muslims were praying inside the St. George Church during their Solat time.. Considered a wonderful historical piece that Ethiopia was and is a country of religious tolerance, all living together peacefully and in harmony ... a photograph taken by Martin Rikli in 1935-1936 showed theevent. It's Prof Richard Pankhrust who wrote about this tip. Rememberedthey were all Muslims praying with Orthodox Christians counterparts before marching to the 2nd Ethio-Italian war front.

Sudanese Islamist leader Hassan al-Turabi dies at 84

March 5, 2016 (KHARTOUM) - The leader of Sudan’s Popular CongressParty (PCP) Hassan al-Turabi has died of a heart attack on Saturday inKhartoum at the age of 84.

Turabi was rushed from his office at the PCP premises in the neighborhoodof Al-Manshia to the intensive care unit of Khartoum’s Royal Care hospital after suffering a heart attack in the morning and died there.

In a brief statement Saturday, PCP General Secretariat said that Turabifelt sick at around 11:00 am. (local time) while he was carrying out his daily routine work at the PCP’s headquarters, pointing he was rushed tothe ICU at Royal Care hospital.

Turabi was born in 1932 in Kassala, eastern Sudan. He received an Islamic education before coming to Khartoum in 1951 to study law andjoined the Muslim Brotherhood as a student.

He graduated from Khartoum University School of Law and also studied inLondon and at the Sorbonne in Paris, where he gained a doctorate. He became a leader of the Sudanese Muslim Brotherhood in the early 1960s.

Turabi, who is fluent in English, French, is generally considered to be the mastermind of the June 30th, 1989 coup which was organized by Islamistarmy officers also locally known as “inquaz”, meaning for “salvation” thatbrought army Brigadier General Umer Hassan Al-Bashir to power.

He played a crucial role in designing the new government’s Islamic policies, was elected speaker of the National Assembly in 1996 and in 1998, was elected secretary-general of the ruling National Congress Party(NCP).
However, in 1999, he was ousted from these positions over differenceswith President Bashir and his followers. He and his supporters subsequently founded the PCP.

Turabi had been in the opposition ever since. He was also jailed byBashir’s government on a number of occasions. (ST)

BOOK AUDIENCE: “SABELA”

Sabela: is a very famous fiction book we used to read back then and listento the narration every Monday morning on Ethiopian Radio. East Lynne is the original title and was written by Ellen Wood in 1861 and translated to Amharic by Hailesellasie Mehary.

Plot summary ..... Lady Isabel Carlyle, a beautiful and refined young woman, leaves her hard-working lawyer-husband, Carlyle, and her infant children to elope with an aristocratic suitor, Francis Levison, after wrongfully suspecting and becoming jealous of his friendship with BarbaraHare. However once abroad with Levison she realises he has no intention of marrying her, despite her now having had his child, now illegitimate.

After he deserts her, and she bears their illegitimate child, Lady Isabel is disfigured in a train accident and the child is killed. Following this Isobel isable to take the position of governess in the household of her former husband and his new wife allowing her to be close to her children but which also becomes a source of great misery. The pressure of keeping up a facade and being constantly reminded that her husband has moved on eventually physically weakens her. On her deathbed she tells all to Carlylewho forgives her.

"The new base was located in the area between Dansha and Dejena,to thenorth of the Angereb and to the south of the Tekezze river. The hub of thefront was Dejena, a strategic spot on the edge of the Kaza river in the district of Wogera. It was a well-watered stretch of land with fertile plains ringed by imposing mountains and gigantic ravines. ..The people were wellknown for their dissident culture...The people famously loved guns.It was there for instance ,that the American M-16 assault rifle came to be called "Emiye" or "Mother-16". The region was remote, isolated,and comparatively inaccessible to the military. From both the topographical and cultural point of view it was an area far easier to defend than conquer.. By rallying the rebellious populace, TPLF securely established itsmain command and combat training center.

By occupying Dejena, the TPLF becomes more self-sufficient. With ample rainfed agriculture and rivers like the Tekezze, Angereb, Kaza and Arina and their tributaries, northern Gondar had always been a surplus- producing region, the surplus production will be exported largely to the neighboring Eritrea." Land Grab News:

Omo Valley tribes under attack

Ethiomedia March 7, 2016

SOUTHERN ETHIOPIA - Members of the Surma tribe, one of the most marginalized peoples of Ethiopia tucked in the remote Omo Valley, are subjected to gross human rights violations by government forces after theindigenous people forced evictions from their land.

Pictures reminiscent of the slave trade are appearing on the social media,showing chained Surma men being taken away by Ethiopian government forces. With scant attention on what's going on in the remotest part of Ethiopia, the tribesmen are being cleared of their ancestral lands for sugarplantations.

Over 7,000 hectares of land of the Surma is being taken over by the government without any compensation for the indigenous Surma, who arebeing treated as sub-human by the current government, a source told Ethiomedia by phone.

There was an armed conflict earlier last week between the Surma and government forces, and no known casualties were reported of the Surma, who to this day have been the focus of foreign tourists for their exotic wayof life.

Organizations like Survival International have been alerting the international community that so-called 'development projects' in the OmoValley would lead to the demise of the Surma and other indegenous peoples, calling for solidarity rallies with the victims, the civic group Solidarity Movement for New

Ethiopia (SMNE) said on its Facebook page,

"In all of Ethiopia, the 500,000 people of the Omo Valley may be amongthe most neglected of Ethiopians by the current TPLF/EPRDF regime.
These dark-skinned and marginalized tribes—the Bodi, the Mursi, the Kwego, the Suri, the Hamer, the Karo as well as others—have only been valued in Ethiopia for the tourism business they attracted due to their unique and primitive customs that have remained unchanged for centuries. Now, the TPLF/EPRDF has found a better use for their land andit does not include them."

Sweden Staff at Arlanda airport found the morning a man in afreight container

It’s an aircraft that arrived from Ethiopia. It is found in the container onthe aircraft at the airport. Last edited by MINILIK SALSAWI on 7 March 2016, Staff at Arlanda airport made a very remarkable discovery on Monday afternoon. On one of the aircraft found a man living in a freight container.The plane came from Ethiopia and the man has now applied for asylum.

He's been in a pressure equalized container, so that's why he hassurvived, says Carina Skagerlind, spokesperson Stockholm police.

Staff at Arlanda airport found the morning a man in a freight container -an aircraft that arrived from Ethiopia. The man lives and has now soughtasylum in Sweden, reports the police. He will be born, 1988. He was medtagen when the staff found him, but feeling better now, saysCarina Skagerlind, spokesperson Stockholm police. The plane took off 01:10 (local time) from Addis Ababa, a stopover in Vienna, before it reached its final destination Arlanda, Stockholm at 09:35. Total travel time is thus 10 hours and 25 minutes.

It is not very common this. He has been in a pressure equalized container,so that's why he has survived. Anyone know that this container is worked to be in, says Carina Skagerlind. The man must have found the staff shortly after landing. What was transported in the container and how much is still unknown.

Preliminary investigation commenced

In August 2015 a similar incident occurred with a man from Ethiopia. A 24-year old man flew among bags in a container. The man later explainedthat he was employed at the airport in Addis Ababa and could sneak into the luggage compartment.

It's very unusual to expose themselves to the risk. I know only to thesetwo events, says Johan Live, press officer at Swedavia.

A preliminary investigation of suspected smuggling has started.

Ethiopia is a country ravaged by war and a dictatorship that constantlyviolate human rights. In Sweden, the country became much attention when journalists Martin Schibbye and Johan Persson were imprisoned.

Approximately one percent of asylum seekers in Sweden in 2015 were Ethiopians. So far this year, half of the asylum trials made for Ethiopiannationals granted.

An Urgent Call to Launch a worldwide Protest and Petition Drive toDefend the People in the Omo Valley

By Mesay Mekonnen (March 6, 2016)

We must launch a worldwide protest as well as a petition campaign to expose this level of inhumanity being committed by TPLF on the people of the Omo Valley. The Ethiopian Democratic opposition, freedom forces and those who are involved in Social Media such as Facebook should never overlook and be silent when Ethiopians in the Omo Valley are subjected tothis level of degradation comparable to what the white fascists did to blackAfricans during slavery.

TPLF agents are spreading a false rumor on Facebook claiming the pictureis from South Sudan and not from the Omo Valley. And some of us are falling for this cheap TPLF propaganda. We should ignore the usual TPLF lie and let us become a voice for these voiceless Ethiopians in the Omo Valley. If not, what is the meaning of being Ethiopian? What are we doing when they tie a rope around their neck and blood is oozing through theirmouth and nose?

We need to shake up all TPLF embassies around the world. We must also express our anger at the Western donors who are funding the expulsion ofour farmers from their land to build projects that has no value to the people. We have to conduct an intense and fiery agitation to raise awareness this week. We are so accustomed to oppression and abuse by TPLF, we have finally reached this unimaginable level of degradation and shame. Ethiopian communities in all cities around the Diaspora including the US and Europe should make an urgent call to all Ethiopians.

Editor’s note: Ethiopia is becoming a hell for its ordinary citizens, exceptfor the regime's supporters. Every native citizen is looking for the opportunity to leave the country and escape the humiliation and suffering.As example, the opportunity the man found in the cargo container is to betransported along with baggages to leave the country as option to stow away. The option that Ethiopians under the TPLF rule have either to fight back and get rid of the regime or leave the country for themselves. The government security forces are humiliating the Surmas of the Omo valley.The Government security and police forces are treating these people like wild animals. It is really shocking and embarrassing. Who will be held accountable for such atrocities.

ETHIOPIA DETAINS JOURNALISTS COVERING OROMO PROTESTSBY CONOR GAFFEY ON 3/7/16

A woman and her child await medical attention in Oromia, Ethiopia, January 31. A severe drought and anti-government protests in Oromia have increased restrictions on press freedom in Ethiopia, according to ajournalists' association.

Press freedom in Ethiopia is dwindling in light of recent anti-government protests and the severe drought in the Horn of Africa state, according to ajournalists' association.

Two journalists and a translator were arbitrarily detained for 24 hours on Thursday when reporting on the protests in Oromia, according to a statement issued by the Foreign Correspondents' Association of East Africa(FCAEA) on Monday. Bloomberg correspondent William Davison and freelance journalist Jacey Fortin, along with their translator, were not given any reason for their detention. Their phones and identification cards were taken during the arrest.

Protests among the Oromos, who constitute Ethiopia's largest ethnic group, have been ongoing since November 2015 and were originally directed against plans by the federal government to expand the capital Addis Ababa. At least 140 protesters were killed between November 2015and January, according to Human Rights Watch (HRW). The Addis expansion plans were dropped in January but the protests—which have morphed into a general expression of dissatisfaction with the governmentamong Oromos—have continued and demonstrators are still being subjected to "lethal force," HRW said on February 22. The Ethiopian government has said that "destructive forces" —including some from neighboring Eritrea—have hijacked the protests and would be dealt with decisively.

Davison told Newsweek that the risks of reporting on certain topics in Ethiopia is too high because of the threat of detainment. “It was a shockto be held overnight in a prison cell and not be given any explanation ofwhat we were being held for,” says Davison. The “very heavy and militarized response” to the Oromo protests “raises the chance that reporters are going to be obstructed from doing their work,” he says.

The FCAEA said that the detentions marked “a worrying escalation” in Ethiopia, which already has a poor record for allowing journalists to operate freely. Ethiopia was ranked 142nd out of 180 countries in terms ofpress freedom in 2015 by non-profit organization Reporters Without Borders, which recorded six newspapers closing and more than 30 cases of journalists fleeing abroad in 2014. “Ethiopia is well-known for its tough stance on journalists but this is a worrying spike of arbitrary detention of media workers at a time of increased interest in Ethiopia,” says Ilya Gridneff, chairman of FCAEA. “Journalism is not a crime and those in Ethiopia should not be treated as criminals.”

Newsweek contacted the Ethiopian Embassy in London but was yet toreceive a reply at the time of publication.

Coupled with the Oromo protests, Ethiopia is currently experiencing its worst drought in around 50 years, partly due to the El Nino weather pattern. Up to 15 million people in the country require emergency humanitarian food assistance and the United Nations is appealing for $50million to help the government cope with the crisis.

Ethiopian students demand end to police crackdownsMarch 8, 2016 | BY AARON MAASHO (Reuters)

Dozens of university students protested in Ethiopia’s capital on Tuesday, demanding an endto police crackdowns that followed months of demonstrations over plans to requisition farmland in the country’s Oromiya region late last year.

The government wanted to develop farmland around the capital, Addis Ababa, and its plantriggered some of the worst civil unrest for a decade, with rights groups and U.S.-based dissidents saying as many as 200 people may have been killed. Officials suggest the figure isfar lower but have not given a specific number.

Ethiopia has long been one of the world's poorest nations but has industrialized rapidly in thepast decade and now boasts double-digit growth. However, reallocating land is a thorny issuefor Ethiopians, many of whom are subsistence farmers. Authorities scrapped the land schemein January, but sporadic demonstrations persist and, on Tuesday, students from Addis Ababa University marched in two groups toward the embassy of the United States, a major donor, holding signs that read "We are not terrorists. Stop killing Oromo people."

Such protests are rare in a country where police are feared as heavy-handed and the government is seen as repressive. A government spokesman did not immediately respond torequests for comment. Ethiopia's Prime Minister Hailemariam Desalegn has promised to address grievances in the Oromiya region and says he blames rebel groups for stoking violence.

Opponents blame harsh police tactics.
"The aim was to highlight the abuses carried out in the region," one student told Reuters, saying he did not want to be identified for fear of reprisals. "We waved white cloth to indicatethat we were peaceful protesters. But police started beating us up," he said.

New York-based Human Rights Watch said last month that protesters it spoke to and who hadbeen detained after the outbreak of demonstrations in November had been subjected to severebeatings and never appeared before a judge.

The group said women suffered sexual assaults and mistreatment. It said one 18-year-old student was "given electric shocks to his feet". Officials dismissed the report as not worthy ofcomment.

The Destruction of Addis Ababa By Italians

Many believe the Italians built Ethiopia and its infrastructure during the 5 years occupation.They still say if the Italians stayed longer we would have got much better infrastructure.
However, few argue that the Italians destroyed the country and halt the development the Emperor started. Ethiopia would have been much better if they Italians did not invade, including the cost of the war. See some of the destruction the Italians did on the eve of theinvasion of Addis Ababa.

The first recognized flag with empire precision of Ethiopia

The first known flag with empire precision (formerly called Abyssinia also,perhaps from Arabic abd-as-salib = "[the land of] the servants of the cross"), which still retains a copy. It was probably introduced under European influence, as the concept of foreign flag to the local tradition.

Dates back to 1875 when John IV unified the country joining his reign, theTigray, with that of Menelik, Ras of Shoa. It might be called state flag or, more correctly, imperale penn...ant. From 1881 it is missing, perhaps because the purple, white and amethyst colors were the source tigrina andnot representative of the sovereign of Shoa. The central emblem, from therudimentary design, is the Lion of Judah (the emperor was considered a descendant of the biblical tribe, the same as Jesus), arguing with her rightpole with the Christian cross adorned with ribbons.

Ethiopia's Forgotten Drought

By Gabriella Meltzer On 3/5/16 at 11:01 AM

This article originally appeared on the website of the Council on Foreign Relations.

El Niño was first discovered in the 1600s when fishermen noticed that in some years, water temperatures in the Pacific became warmer than usual.Hence, according to the National Ocean Service, El Niño today refers to “large-scale ocean-atmosphere climate interaction linked to a periodic warming in sea surface temperatures across the central and east-central Equatorial Pacific.” These anomalous weather patterns vary across regions, ranging from heavy rainfall and flooding to severe drought.

The El Niño of 2015-2016 has thus far proven itself to be the worst on record because of its interaction with global climate change, where higheratmospheric temperatures due to greenhouse gas emissions lead to a higher frequency and greater intensity of the extreme weather events characteristic of an El Niño year.

Perhaps no country has felt this more than Ethiopia, which is experiencingits worst drought in roughly half a century. The country has faced three consecutive failed rains, the most intense and recent being in June 2015 with the arrival of El Niño to its doorstep. The primary rainy season from June through September is critical to Ethiopia’s agricultural sector, which contributes 42.3 percent of the country’s GDP and employs roughly 73 percent of its labor force.

Ethiopia has suffered from chronic food insecurity for over thirty years asa result of intense population growth, whose overcultivation of small landholdings has put immense pressure on the soil in an already fragile environment. Yet, the drought occurring now has brought a level of devastation that, according to the United Nations, could rival the major famine in 1984 that killed upwards of 900,000 people. As of February, 75percent of harvests have been lost, one million livestock have died, and 10-15 million people require emergency humanitarian food assistance, with 430,000 children experiencing severe malnutrition.

Between 2004 and 2012, Ethiopia’s economy grew at roughly 11 percent annually, outperforming the 7 percent annual growth required to achieve the first Millennium Development Goal (MDG) of halving poverty by 2015.Ethiopia is frequently touted as a sub-Saharan Africa success story in development circles due to government investments in healthcare, agriculture, education, and infrastructure.

Yet as of February 1, the Ethiopian government and its aid partners haveannounced that they need a total of $1.4 billion in 2016 to address the current drought-induced crisis, and have only received roughly one-thirdof this amount thus far. The World Food Programme has said that $500 million of this request is urgently needed by the end of March to extend aid efforts through April. With the political urgency surrounding the current crisis in Syria, organizations like Save the Children have found it challenging to garner public attention and fiscal support for this equally severe humanitarian situation.

Despite its efforts to present itself to the world as leading sub-Saharan Africa’s economic renaissance, Ethiopia remains desperately poor, with ahuman development index of merely 0.442 (on a scale of 1.0), ranked 174th in the world. The country only reduced poverty by one-third by theclose of the MDGs, and nearly 90 percent of the entire population of 96.5million is living in multidimensional poverty. Despite all of this, the Ethiopian government has still funded 46 percent of its humanitarian requirements.

Through its flooding, record snowfalls, and droughts, El Niño has proven to be a far greater threat than any nation could have anticipated. This is particularly the case for a resource-poor country such as Ethiopia, whose communities rely on subsistence farming for survival. Ethiopia is justified in its pleas for help, and donor countries should act quickly to aid the many potential victims of famine. However, the adverse effects of climatechange will continue to exact an outsized toll on countries like Ethiopia, and in addition to the rapid mobilization of resources in a time of crisis, there needs to be a forward-looking plan to help vulnerable nations build resilience. Gabriella Meltzer is a Research Associate in Global Health for the Council on Foreign Relations Studies program.

OromoProtests updates

Ethiopian students demand end to police crackdowns

March 8, 2016 BY AARON MAASHO (Reuters News)

Dozens of university students protested in Ethiopia’s capital on Tuesday, demanding an endto police crackdowns that followed months of demonstrations over plans to requisition farmland in the country’s Oromiya region late last year.

The government wanted to develop farmland around the capital, Addis Ababa, and its plantriggered some of the worst civil unrest for a decade, with rights groups and U.S.-based dissidents saying as many as 200 people may have been killed.

Officials suggest the figure is far lower but have not given a specific number.

Ethiopia has long been one of the world’s poorest nations but has industrialized rapidly in thepast decade and now boasts double-digit growth. However, reallocating land is a thorny issuefor Ethiopians, many of whom are subsistence farmers.

Authorities scrapped the land scheme in January, but sporadic demonstrations persist and, on Tuesday, students from Addis Ababa University marched in two groups toward the embassy of the United States, a major donor, holding signs that read “We are not terrorists. Stop killingOromo people.” Such protests are rare in a country where police are feared as heavy-handed and the government is seen as repressive.

A government spokesman did not immediately respond to requests for comment.

Ethiopia’s Prime Minister Hailemariam Desalegn has promised to address grievances in theOromiya region and says he blames rebel groups for stoking violence.

Opponents blame harsh police tactics.
“The aim was to highlight the abuses carried out in the region,” one student told Reuters, saying he did not want to be identified for fear of reprisals. “We waved white cloth to indicatethat we were peaceful protesters. But police started beating us up,” he said.

New York-based Human Rights Watch said last month that protesters it spoke to and who hadbeen detained after the outbreak of demonstrations in November had been subjected to severebeatings and never appeared before a judge.
The group said women suffered sexual assaults and mistreatment. It said one 18-year-old student was “given electric shocks to his feet”. Officials dismissed the report as not worthy ofcomment.

Seeks Asylum in Sweden After Surviving 10-Hour Flight FromAddis Ababa
STOCKHOLM (March 8, 2016) - Police in Sweden have revealed that a 27-year-old stowaway was found alive on Monday aboard an Ethiopian Airlines flight from Addis Ababa to Stockholm.

The man, whose identity is yet to be disclosed, was reportedly discoveredin a freight container in the cargo area of an Ethiopian Airlines passenger jet. Baggage handlers reportedly found the Ethiopian man after the flight’s arrival at Stockholm’s Arlanda Airport.

Swedish police spokesperson Lars Bystrom said after the man was discovered, paramedics and police officials were called in. Although the stowaway was tired from the 10-hour long journey, medics say he washealthy and did not require medical treatment. “He was exhausted butalive,” said Albin Naverberg, Stockholm police press spokesperson. “We know that he has travelled in the container from the Ethiopian capital Addis Ababa without any stops. It’s a pretty long journey,” Stockholm police official Carina Skagerlind said.

Reports indicate that the Ethiopian stowaway has submitted an asylum application to Sweden. According to Swedish authorities, the asylumrequest has since been sent to immigration officials.

Sweden has also launched an investigation into the incident. The inquiry will focus on a suspected case of human trafficking. A similar incident occurred in August last year. A stowaway from Ethiopia was found in the cargo hold of a flight heading to Stockholm. The man, an employeeat Addis Ababa's Bole Airport, hid in the airplane's cargo hold. The stowaway, who spoke through an interpreter, also requested for asylum. The number of Ethiopian seeking asylum in Sweden increased dramatically in 2015. The number of Ethiopian asylum applicants in the country rose by 140 percent in the first seven months of 2015.

ITALIAN INVASION EVENT

The Destruction of Addis Ababa by Italians

Many believe the Italians built Ethiopia and its infrastructure during the5 years occupation. They still say if the Italians stayed longer we would have got much better infrastructure. However, few argue that the Italians destroyed the country and halt the development the Emperor started. Ethiopia would have been much better if they Italiansdid not invade, including the cost of the war. See some of the destruction the Italians did on the eve of the invasion of Addis Ababa.

ETV on upgrade

GatesAir Wins Ethiopia TV Transition ProjectBy Michael Balderston, TVTechnology

March 9, 2016 CINCINNATI—In preparation for its national transition to digital television, Ethiopia's national digital TV network has awardeda contract to GatesAir to provide turnkey equipment and services.

GatesAir will design, supply, install, test and commission a DVB-T2 over the air network system for 26 new transmission sites, as well as upgrade systems at 74 existing facilities. GatesAir will also provide a financing system through J.P. Morgan, with support from Export Development Canada. The turnkey package will include two GatesAir Maxiva liquid-cooled UHF transmitters at the 26 new sites, in addition to DVB-T2 headend equipment, satellite uplinks, antennas and towers.According to GatesAir, the system will support delivery of 20 channelsand data services, including electronic program guides, from the Information Network Security Agency. GatesAir reports that it will also train Ethiopian engineers on how to service the transmission system. According to GatesAir, it has previously provided similar support for DTV transitions in Uganda, Rwanda, Tanzania and Togo.

First known flag with empire precision of Ethiopia (formerly called Abyssinia also, perhaps from Arabic abd-as-salib = "[the land of] the servants of the cross"), which still retains a copy.It was probably introduced under European influence, as the concept of foreign flag to the local tradition. Dates back to 1875 when John IV unified the country joining his reign, the Tigray, with that of Menelik, Ras of Shoa. It might be called state flag or, more correctly, imperale penn...ant. From 1881 it is missing, perhaps because the purple, white and amethyst colors were the source tigrina and not representative of the sovereign of Shoa. The central emblem, from the rudimentary design, is the Lion of Judah (the emperor was considered a descendant of the biblical tribe, the same as Jesus), arguing with her right pole with the Christian cross adorned with ribbons.

BBC Africa Commentary

What do Oromo protests mean for Ethiopian unity?BBC Africa March 8, 2016:

As protests in Ethiopia over the rights of the country's Oromo people continue, Addis Ababa-based journalist James Jeffrey considers if they arethreatening the country's unity. The latest round of bloody protests over Oromo rights had a tragically surreal beginning.

A bus filled with a wedding party taking the bride to the groom's home was stopped at a routine checkpoint on 12 February near the southernEthiopian town of Shashamane. Local police told revellers to turn off the nationalistic Oromo music playing. They refused and the bus droveoff.

The situation then rapidly escalated and reports indicate at least one person died and three others were injured after police fired shots. Theexact details of the incident are hard to verify, but what is clear is thatdays of protest followed, including armed local militia clashing with federal police, leaving seven policemen dead, the government says.

Ethiopia has seen a third phase of the recent unrest in the Oromia region which has been unprecedented in its longevity and geographicalspread.

The region is the largest in Ethiopia and the Oromos, who make up a thirdof the population, are the biggest of the country's more than 80 ethnicgroups. Initially the protests were in reaction to a plan to expand the administrative border of the capital, Addis Ababa, which is encircled byOromia. But even after the region's governing party, the Oromo People's Democratic Organisation, which is part of Ethiopia's governingcoalition, shelved the plan in January, protests have continued.

Historical scars

"There is a strong sense of victimhood, extending back 150 years," says Daniel Berhane, a prominent

Addis Ababa-based political blogger, coveringEthiopia for the website Horn Affairs. "People remember the history. The scars are still alive, such as how the Oromo language was suppressed until20 years ago." Despite there being an ethnic basis to these protests, observers say that the deeper issues behind them, frustrations over land ownership, corruption, political and economic marginalisation, are familiar to many disenchanted Ethiopians.

The numbers killed since November following clashes between protesters and security forces given by international rights organisations, activistsand observers range from 80 to 250. The government has dismissed various death tolls as exaggerations, and said that a recent report on the situation by the New York-based Human Rights Watch (HRW) was an "absolute lie". 'Organised gangs'

Ethiopian citizens had a right to question the plan to expand Addis Ababa,but the protests were hijacked by people looking to incite violence, according to government spokesman Getachew Reda.

He says the security forces have faced "organised armed gangs burning down buildings belonging to private citizens, along with government installations". A security analyst who closely watches Ethiopia says "there could be radical elements and factions taking advantage, but you cannot define a movement by isolated events". Despite violent incidents, the protests have been described as "largely peaceful" byHRW and observers in Ethiopia. "There is a perception of lack of competence in governance on the ground," Mr Daniel says. "There were easy remedies to appease initial protests, it was not hard science, but the right actions were not taken."

In its defence, the government says it heeded the call of the people whenit came to concerns over the Addis Ababa plan, and observers say thegovernment deserves credit for withdrawing it. But the same political observers add that the government must allow Ethiopians to exercise their constitutional right to protest, and handle events in a way that does not escalate violence.

The government has said that the protests and information about them have been manipulated by foreign-based opposition groups who are using social media to exaggerate what is going on for their own ends. "The diaspora magnifies news of what is happening, yes, but no matterhow much it agitates, it cannot direct [what's happening] at village level in Ethiopia," says Jawar Mohammed, executive director of one of those accused of fomenting conflict, US-based broadcaster Oromia Media Network (OMN).

"This is about dissatisfaction."

Mr Jawar says the imprisonment of leaders of the Oromo Federalist Congress party, Oromia's largest legally registered opposition political party, along with thousands of other Oromo political prisoners, makesit difficult to negotiate a lasting solution. "Also what is the UK and USdoing? As major donors to Ethiopia they should be taking the lead to get the government to work out an agreement." This is a long way from the heady days of Ethiopia's new federal constitution after the overthrow of the military dictatorship in 1991. That introduced a decentralised system of ethnic federalism, but this jars with the dominance of the governing Ethiopian People's Revolutionary Democratic Front (EPRDF), which, along with its allies, holds every seat in parliament.

Federal tensions

"The ruling government is a victim of its own success," the security analyst says. The constitution it developed made promises and peopletrusted the EPRDF. Now people are demanding those rights and the government is responding with bullets and violence." He adds that thegovernment has expanded basic services and infrastructure, and appears to respect different cultural and ethnic identities, but it cannotreconcile this with its more authoritarian decision-making process. Thegovernment's hitherto successful job of holding together this particularly heterogeneous federation is not about to crumble, according to observers here. But things may get worse before they get better, unless underlying sources of friction and frustration are addressed.

Konso protests draw military rule

Ethiomedia News March 8, 2016

KONSO, Southern Ethiopia - A clash between residents of the southernKonso people and members of the federal army erupted last week when the army arrested a leader of an elders group that was championing the people's demand for self-rule, territorial demarcation,basic facilities as well as the respect of human and political rights, sources have informed Ethiomedia. In an ensuing violence, an elder man, Saitua Gara, died from gunshot wounds and a young man,Tesfaye Mamush, was left with broken legs. Many youths were reportedly beaten, and their whereabouts remained unknown.

A different group of 21 men and one woman also suffered injuries from beatings while being held at a Technical School in Karat, where the army has turned the school into a detention center. All schools in the town are closed while the locals have barricaded the roads to deter federal police reinforcements. Machinegun-mounted trucks have addedto the tense situation among the Konso, who have vowed that their peaceful protest will continue until their demands are met. The Konso protests surfaced on top of the 5-month-old Oromo protests that havebeen rocking the foundations of the ruling TPLF/EPRDF party.

GatesAir Wins Ethiopia TV Transition Project

By Michael Balderston, TVTechnology

March 9, 2016 CINCINNATI—In preparation for its national transition to digital television, Ethiopia’s national digital TV network has awardeda contract to GatesAir to provide turnkey equipment and services.

GatesAir will design, supply, install, test and commission a DVB-T2 over the air network system for 26 new transmission sites, as well as upgrade systems at 74 existing facilities. GatesAir will also provide a financing system through J.P. Morgan, with support from Export Development Canada. The turnkey package will include two GatesAir Maxiva liquid-cooled UHF transmitters at the 26 new sites, in addition to DVB-T2 headend equipment, satellite uplinks, antennas and towers.According to GatesAir, the system will support delivery of 20 channelsand data services, including electronic program guides, from the Information Network Security Agency. GatesAir reports that it will also train Ethiopian engineers on how to service the transmission system.

According to GatesAir, it has previously provided similar support forDTV transitions in Uganda, Rwanda, Tanzania and Togo.

PMHD apologizes for death and destruction in Oromia region

-BBC March 9, 2016

Ethiopia's prime minster has apologised for the death and destructioncaused by protests in the Oromia region. But Hailemariam Desalegn, addressing parliament in the capital, Addis Ababa, said "anti-peace forces" were responsible for the violence.

He said that the government needs to listen to the grievances of the people of Oromia has been hit by months of unrest, in which 200 people have reportedly died - a number disputed by the government. The authorities deny that security forces have been involved in a violent crackdown.

The protests began over government plans to expand the capital's administrative control into the Oromia region, which have since beendropped. The government later dropped the plan, but protesters dismissed the decision as "too little too late".

Oromia is Ethiopia's largest region and the Oromo people, who make up athird of Ethiopia's population, have complained of historic economic and political marginalization. Mr Hailemariam told parliament that "anti-peace forces... in a bid to divert the people's legitimate questions... have inflicted losses on human lives and government and private property". But according to messages on the ministry of foreign affairs Twitter feed, the prime minster admitted the problems in Oromia "are direct results of unresponsiveness and unemployment".

He added that the government recognises the need to address grievancesand said it "unreservedly apologises to our people for what happened".However, the government "will intensify their decisive actions against the anti-peace forces," he said. Source: BBC

HISTORIC ETHIOPIA HERITAGE SITES

Positive Actions Taken to Protect Washa-Mik’ael

By Bruce Strachan October 10, 2011

1) the beginnings of a trench has been dug to relieve the flooding, 2) shrubs have been cut back and 3) a fence has been raised. These measures indicate a positive conscientiousness, but implementation maynot be wholly adequate. Last year it was stressed that removal of penetrating roots was the most urgent matter. Nevertheless only the outgrowth has been attended to thus far. This pruning appears only to have strengthened the invading roots – effectively driving wedges deeperinto the structure's cracks. Eucalyptus roots from the adjoining plantationalso remain unencumbered from damaging the south wall. Current attempt at unblocking the pedestrian tunnel involves a laying of pipe within the tunnel, but this serves questionable purpose as the tunnel is itself effectively a drainpipe by original design. Moreover the new pipe interferes with the site's integrity. Externally (several meters to the west)a separate trench has been commenced. This measure, which also involves the laying of pipe, is positive and will likely prove beneficial whencomplete.

HISTORIC ETHIOPIA: HERITAGE SITES

Ongoing Conservation Efforts Yield Enriched Understanding ofWasha Mik'ael November 26, 2014

As one of Africa's significant heritage sites the Washa-Mik'ael rock-hewnchurch is of tremendous historic, cultural and religious worth. Recent actions taken to concurrently excavate and protect the site are thereforegreeted with enthusiasm. The following points are inconclusive observations only, and the author very much welcomes additional constructive comment to enhance understanding:

Reinforced-concrete foundations of a shelter are being constructed aroundthe site. When complete this structure's purpose would be to protect Washa-Mik'ael from the locality's heavy seasonal rains. The success of thisscheme will be determined by how effectively the structure is able to divert rainfall from the site.

Removal of invasive root systems from structural cracks is a positive development and should protect structure from further damage in nearterm.

Archeological excavation of one meter of soil at eastern edge of structurethat Washa-Mik'ael's architect's intent was to conceive a monolithic structure – not semi-monolithic, as was earlier suspected.

Drainage pipe, placed at the west of the site (just beyond tunnel) may beinadequate to divert anticipated volume of rain accumulation.

Excavation of area immediately surrounding the upright monolithic slab (north west corner of site) is reported by the site's guide* to have uncovered human bone fragments. This information, if confirmed, seemsto support speculation that the object's function may have been to serveas a formal burial site. Best to await the forthcoming official report however as there are many layers of history associated with site. The bones uncovered therefore could have been interred during an informal phase of the church's history. Since the 2011 survey new damage has been found within architecturaldetails of the site.

While this is highly regrettable the extent is limited and the cause isindeterminable.

Findings of incomplete skeletal remains in southwest section of structure may indicate structural collapse during the construction phase. A carbondating examination of these remains is therefore urged, as this would likely yield reliable data as to when collapse occurred. It is furthermore advocated that a proper Orthodox burial also be performed for the remains of the deceased.

The overall assessment of this update/report concludes that conservationprogress at the Washa-Mik'ael site has been positive and should continuewith compulsory caution.

 Until an official authorised report becomes available it should be notedthat while Washa-Mich'ael's guide is an informed individual, he is not a spokesperson for the formal government sponsored excavation/conservation effort. Information provided by him or likewisethis blog, while intended to be educational, is nevertheless strictly unofficial.*

 It is understood that several phases of construction almost certainlyoccurred at the Washa-Mik'ael site over various and prolonged periods.Until carbon dating is performed on the skeletal fragments however it remains unknown from which phase the remains in question derive.*

Bruce Strachan has written extensively about the Washa-Mich'ael church for the Encyclopaedia Aethiopica (Universität Hamburg), The Nation (Kenya), Cornerstone – the Journal of the Society for the Preservation of Ancient Buildings (London), Selamta, The Journal of the Friends of Ethiopian Studies, and the Journal of Medieval African Studies. He has alsolectured on the subject at the Institute of Ethiopian Studies at the University of Addis Ababa. Strachan has also appeared in a 2010 Ethiopian Television documentary citing the site's urgent need for conservation intervention. As u*pdated by Bruce Strachan* – November 26, 2014

Emperor Menelik II & The Abyssinian electric chair

On August 6, 1890, the first electric chair in history was put into use in the death chamber of Auburn Prison in New York. In distant Abyssinia – now called Ethiopia – Emperor Menelik II (1844-1913) heard about it anddecided that this new method of execution should become part of his modernisation plan for his country. Immediately, he put in an order for three electric chairs from the American manufacturer. When the chairs arrived and were unpacked, the emperor was mortified to learn that theywouldn't work – Abyssinia had no electricity. Determined that his investment would not be completely wasted, Emperor Menelik adopted one of the electric chairs for his imperial throne. Unrest In Ethiopia:

The ultimate warning shot?

Analysis by René Lefort 2 February 2016

The culture of power is one of centralisation. But real federalism couldn’tbe beyond reach. Oromia shows that it is becoming an absolute requirement.

The Tigray Peoples Liberation Front (TPLF), the strongest component of the ruling coalition, from the middle of 2014 has faced the highest level ofTigrean popular discontent since its inception 40 years ago. That came first. Now the unrest in the most populated region of Ethiopia has sent to the regime as a whole the most shattering warning shot since its arrival inpower in 1991.

Despite Tigray's marginality in terms of geography, population – 6% of Ethiopians – and its economy, the TPLF had the strength to impose its hegemony after its victory over the Derg military-socialist junta in 1991.This dominance has recently declined, but it remains the driving force of the coalition between the four ethnic forces constituting the near-single party – the Ethiopian People's Revolutionary Democratic Front (EPRDF) –with the Amhara National Democratic Movement (ANDM), the Oromo People's Democratic Organisation (OPDO) and the Southern Ethiopian People's Democratic Movement (SEPDM).

It is also the only party that the population sees as its authentic and legitimate representative. However, since the spring of 2014, it has been shaken by a rising tide of popular discontent. "Give us back our TPLF!" crythe Tigrayans, a Front that is righteous, disinterested, devoted as it was during the armed struggle, ready to listen and to serve, but now accused of having succumbed to an unholy trinity: corruption, bad governance, unaccountability.

"We have acted as if it was pointless to listen to people because we are building roads and opening schools", admits one former TPLF leader off the record. It is the "old guard", sidelined during the second half of the reign of the omnipotent Prime Minister Meles Zenawi, who died in 2012, which sounded the alarm and then led the charge. Meles had promoted a new generation of leaders – the "Melesites". Some young party members,mostly ambitious intellectuals, enraged by the degeneration of the Front, rushed into the breach opened up by the old timers. If it doesn't regain itsold strength, they are convinced, it will not be able to maintain its influence, and the Tigrayans would be exposed to a quasi existential risk of ceasing even to be masters in their own house, thereby losing the mainasset of a 40 year struggle. Their goal: to revitalise the Front through "democratisation" and thereby regain popular support. Their target: the existing leadership, which they see as populated with incompetent "yes- men".

However, the most disturbing warning signal came from Oromya, the region that accounts for 37% of the total population and is the economic heart of the country. Since mid-November, its northern half at least has been in a ferment of dissent. Demonstrations were followed by riots so intense and extensive as to be described as a "slide into a security crisis":the authorities lost control of entire areas abandoned or deserted by the security forces. [1] Half the high schools and universities had to close their doors. [2] In their wake, as always happens in a power vacuum, came looters and vandals. While official government figures continue to strain credulity, other sources report more than a hundred dead. [3] Twomonths on, things have only partially returned to normal.

The trigger was an ordinary land expropriation in favour of private investors in a small town a hundred or so kilometres west of Addis Ababa. However, the focal point of the grievances was the so-called Master Plan for the expansion of Addis Ababa. The city has its own administrative government, but is located far inside Oromya. This territory was conquered by the Northeners at the end of the nineteenth century, and has grown by eating into the surrounding areas, still a trauma for many Oromo. The Plan covered an area 20 times larger than the existing capital,and would impact millions of Oromo. It possessed all the deficiencies of large development operations in Ethiopia: opacity and confusion, with documents of uncertain status released in dribs and drabs, thus a lack of clarity even about the respective roles of Addis Ababa municipality and theOromya authorities in the area concerned; a centralising, top-down approach, with no consultation of the people. Oromo opinion once again rose up against what it perceives as a further drive to truncate its territory, exacerbated by a swathe of ruthless land grabbing, like that already experienced by tens of thousands of Oromo farmers around the capital or elsewhere, to the benefit of investors, whether foreign or Ethiopian, Oromo or otherwise.

The authorities began by reacting reflexively in their usual way: if it moves, hit it. To show their peaceful intentions, the demonstrators raisedcrossed arms or sat with bowed heads. The security forces' disproportionate violence fuelled the protests. "Killing is not an answer toour grievances", was the cry. For the first time on this scale, protest extended outside the "intellectual" milieu – students and teachers – to encompass not just high school and even primary school pupils, but eventhe lower classes, including simple farmers, who constitute three quartersof the population.

The straw that broke the camel's back

The Master Plan was simply the straw that broke the camel's back, the culmination of a much wider and more long-standing conflict. This is evidenced by the protesters' targets: people and property with links - however tenuous - to the authorities, regional and federal. The officials,despite their being almost all Oromo; their symbols, their facilities (offices, cars, prisons, even medical centres and unemployment supportagencies); companies owned by foreigners, non Oromo, and even by Oromo, if they have been imposed despite the peoples wishes.

Even local "model farmers" were targeted, a group who receive specialgovernment support to "modernise" their farms, on condition that theythen show their fellow peasants the path to follow. Too often, they are selected by nepotism, with the result that an informal alliance has formedbetween local government and a new class of "kulaks", accused of exploiting this patronage for underhand purposes, via renting or share cropping on land held by poorer farmers who have fallen into a spiral of debt. Worse still: in some places neighbours were killed, their houses burned, simply for being non Oromo. [4] The target of unrest in Oromya was not just the unholy trinity, as in Tigray, though it is even more devastating there, but also harassment by the security apparatus, with itsthousands of political prisoners, often held for years without trial. "There is no democracy, there is no justice", complained some demonstrators.

The centralisation of power, in contradiction with authentic federalism, isexacerbated by the general perception of Tigrean hegemony and the marginalisation and dispossession of Oromya.

"We want genuine self-rule", ran one of the slogans. The attendant centralisation of development, and its relative liberalisation, initiated at the start of the 2000s, favours an "entrepreneurial" economic elite, covering a range of beneficiaries stretching from the big foreign investor to the rich peasant or Ethiopian businessman, whether Oromo or not. Theascendancy of this elite is consubstantial with the high positions it almostautomatically occupies in the ruling party. Its behaviour is seen as predatory, primarily in respect of land.

"Oromya is not for sale", demonstrators chanted. Their political oppositionthus coincides with, and is reinforced by, an economic and cultural conflictaround the resource that is the most precious, and quasi sacred, to the vast majority, land — which still acts as the cement of the social contract.Between this majority and this heterogeneous elite, but also within a peasantry that had previously remained largely homogeneous since the agrarian reform of 1975, class antagonisms have deepened. Moreover, plans in an increasingly sensitive sphere — the economy — could harden them.

First, there is the hidden aspect of the economy. Mystery surrounds the real situation of whole sectors controlled, directly or indirectly, by the state, i.e. two thirds of the economy outside traditional agriculture, theirprofitability, and above all their indebtedness, the key to their recent growth. One suspects that the alarmist rhetoric around the urgent need for a change of direction owes much to this black hole.

Moreover, the current version of the leading public impulse for economicgrowth — the "developmental state" — is coming to the end of the line. Its objective was to accomplish a shift from agriculture to industry.
However, shares of the economy held by the industrial and manufacturingsectors remain at a similar level as at the end of Haile Selassie's reign: respectively 11% and 5% of GDP then, 13% and 5% today. [5]

Growth on a downward path

"The 10-years perspective is a transition where manufacturing will lead the economy", asserts Arkebe Oqubay, mastermind of this transformation.
[6] Without it, there is no chance of absorbing the 2 to 2.5 million young people arriving on the labour market every year, of becoming competitiveby increasing productivity, thereby reducing a growing trade deficit and turning round an increasingly negative balance of payments — the possibility of a foreign exchange crunch is increasingly raised. [7] — and ultimately no chance of maintaining a high growth rate, the core of the regime's legitimacy. For him, the worst scenario would be the combination of an economic slowdown with bad governance and assertions of nationalist feeling.

This growth rate is on a downward path, officially declining from 12% per annum in 2005 to 8% today. [8] The World Bank suggests that this fall is likely to continue. [9] Public investment, the driver of growth, has reachedits ceiling at a third of GDP. Further growth therefore demands a massive inflow of private capital, mainly from abroad, bringing jobs and higher productivity, and carrying local capital in its wake, initially in subcontracting activities. However, "many of the foreign investors in Ethiopia fail because the environment is difficult", Arkebe judges. [10] "Ethiopia lags behind Sub-Saharan African peers in most reform dimensions". [11] Hence the intention to introduce greater 'liberalisation' in order to give business an attractive, stable and predictable framework, and even to open up new sectors such as banking to foreigners.

These reforms will also need to tackle another blind spot. Moving fromarchaic agriculture to a competitive manufacturing sector requires an army of skilled professionals with free rein to apply their knowledge. Ethiopia's 34 universities hold almost 700,000 students and have issued more than 500,000 degrees in the last five years alone. [12] However, this increase in quantity has been accomplished to the detriment of quality. Above all, the centuries-old codes of power, whatever the domain,remain largely in place: implacable hierarchy, top-down administration, blind obedience. They are even reinforced by the near obligation of party membership in the public sector: party loyalty takes precedence over public service. The professional capacities of this new class of "intellectuals" are therefore held in check.

This lost potential hinders economic growth. Moreover, the gap between this "Internet generation" and the excessively authoritarian, fossilised andinfantilising practice of power, at every level, is generating growing frustration.

While some of the new generation are satisfied with the advantages –legal and illegal – associated with their positions, others want to maketheir voices heard.
Haile Selassie created an intellectual elite to run a state machinery subordinate to his rule alone. Held in subjection, it rebelled, especially when — as today — graduate unemployment exploded. By contrast with the past, however, even the most anti-establishment of the present generation are not looking for a change of regime, but primarily for a rolecommensurate with their qualifications, and then, for some, a genuine application of the constitution, primarily with regard to federalism, particularly in Oromya.

Drought and war

Finally, there are two other challenges. After an exceptional drought, almost 20 million Ethiopians are in need of emergency or long-term food aid. [13] The authorities have responded vigorously, especially as they arehaunted by the correlation between the overthrow of Haile Selassie and then the Derg and the famines that preceded them. But they themselves acknowledge failures in the distribution of aid and that the worst is yet to come.

An end to the state of phony peace with Eritrea is a growing demand in Tigray. Previously, they wanted it so that investors would finally come andrescue the region from its economic stagnation. Now it is demanded on the grounds that the military facilities that Asmara is providing to the Saudi-led coalition show that Eritrea is a bridgehead for an "Arab-Muslim encirclement". For example, one pro-TPLF website writes: "Ethiopia is surrounded by (Arab) strategic enemies… working to disintegrate and dismantle Ethiopia… Most of the Arab countries think Ethiopia is the gate of Africa, if they can convert the Ethiopian Christians to the Muslim faith, they can control Africa and its resources." [14] "As the end justifies the means, Ethiopia has to use everything at its disposal to take a swift military action against Eritrea; get rid of its hostile government; annex Assab". What is not known is how far the leadership of the Front is listening to this demand.

Faced with these challenges, sticking to the "Meles line", as the ruling power has up to now, i.e. maintaining the status quo, has become untenable. However, the structure of power that he left behind is vacillating in its readiness to tackle this. Two power systems are in conflictwith each other, though both managed by almost the same people.

Two institutions have never played their statutory role: the legal system and the legislative assemblies. With the rise of Meles Zenawi in the early2000s, the others became empty shells: the TPLF itself, the three other components of the EPRDF, the cabinet, the regional governments. They were reduced to mere communication channels for orders delivered fromthe top. Pyramidal and interpersonal, this structure of authority had littleregard for institutions. Simultaneously, a constellation of mini-fiefs formed, each at the node of a network built on relationships of different kinds — family, friendship, and fundamentally regional and/or sub- regional, as well as business — all beneficiaries of the "developmental state". After victory over the Derg, the revolutionary elite used its positions in the party-state to monopolise the management of public and para-public companies, and then to launch itself into the private sector onthe back of public contracts. Thus was born an oligarchical constellation formed inside the highest party-state circles, with one foot in these circles, the other in business. These practices spread like lightning down to the lowest levels, hence the sharpness of the tensions generated by corruption, bad governance and unaccountability. But with one fundamental difference compared to essentially predatory regimes: it continued to deliver. Even though the official growth rate is undoubtedly overstated, and its social distribution problematic, progress is unquestionable. With peace and security – until recently – it has been thebasis of the regime's legitimacy.

A crumbling pyramid

When Meles Zenawi died suddenly in August 2012, this pyramid crumbled.It left a system of power that was diffuse — disseminated between multiple centres, whether individual or institutional, and riven with ferocious personal rivalries — and lacking direction. A common front was maintained to settle the succession in terms of individuals, notably with the appointment of Haile Mariam Dessalegn as Prime Minister.

Nevertheless, although their workings remain riddled by these personal networks, "now, institutions start to matter", stresses one well-informed observer: thus, the Executive Committee of the EPRDF, cabinet, starting with the Prime Minister is increasingly assertive, and regional governments follow on through a centrifugal effect. The security forces and army, however, remain a bastion apart, and interrelations between allthese power centres are still vague and unstable. The reconstruction of a solid and consensual system is still on the agenda. At the same time, the situation it faces on all fronts is becoming increasingly problematic. Too many officials remain too rigid, arrogant and disconnected to see the urgency of the situation; too unstable and fragmented. The leadership canhardly agree on the changes needed, let alone implement them.

Questioned about the existence of a "wider consensus within the ruling party" on greater economic openness, Arkebe Oqubay replied evasively: "Icannot say 100%." [15] The opposition is of three kinds: the Ethiopian economic elite is highly disparate, divided between the most powerful groups who hope to be able to piggyback on the influx of foreign investors, and small businesses which consider themselves too weak to withstand international competition. An old "socialistic" ideological current persists. And finally, the nationalistic strain remains strong: no Ethiopian leadership has ever allowed a foreign presence, of whatever kind, to acquire sufficient influence as to potentially escape its control. Yet a massive influx of foreign investors inevitably requires compromises that will one way or another dent that sovereignty.

Moreover, this greater economic openness is likely to exacerbate the antagonisms described above, by fuelling bad governance and corruption,which exploded with the 'liberal' turn of the early 2000s. And the reformscurrently under way or on the drawing board are purely technical.

Indispensable as it is, an alteration in the 'culture of power' is not apriority in the economy.

Gimgema

According to the official media, the combat against the unholy trinity is in full sway. The last TPLF

Congress and its Central Committee saw a swatheof criticism and self-criticism, reviving one of the Font's strongest traditions – the "gimgema" – which had become stripped of its original function in recent years. However, this merely resulted in a compromise between 'reformists' and 'conservatives', between 'urgentists' and 'wait and seers'. In accordance with the traditional practice of 'democratic centralism', the Central Committee overruled the Congress. Two "reformers" joined the Executive Committee, the remaining "Melesites" stayed, including the chairman, Abay Woldu, who was the focus of the critiques. They will be closely monitored by newcomers to the Central Committee. The reforms were approved, but they had already been formulated in virtually the same terms at the previous congress.

Nonetheless, gimgema spread throughout Tigray. The leaders are touring the state, holding public meetings. Local officials are required to account for their behaviour to the inhabitants. In these people's courts, judgementis rapid, the defence insignificant. Hundreds of low and medium ranking officials have been sacked, thousands warned. But we have no way of knowing whether the authorities took into account the voices of the participants before immediately appointing their replacements, or whether — as usual — they simply named them and left it to the people to formallyendorse them.

In contrast, it doesn't appear that the same purge is taking place elsewhere, or at least not with the same intensity, except in Addis Ababa.[16] Not that the unholy trinity is any less rampant, quite the contrary. But the reformist drive emanating from part of the TPLF and a few influential individual allies in the other parties, is having little impactoutside, when it is not met with concealed opposition. ANDM and particularly OPDO, already so fragile when the TPLF launched its reformsand its purges, do not seem capable of handling the shock of such a challenge. The ANDM Congress was a quiet affair, OPDO's was virtually anon-event. The same leadership teams were reappointed with no significant changes.

Above all, the exercise is limited in its very conception. The idea is thatthe party-state should correct itself, without any intervention by an external and independent body. The only involvement eagerly sought isthat of the "public", a fetish word, meaning de facto a fluctuating collection of individuals, by definition unorganised and unstructured. Nothing can or should undermine the monolithism of the ruling power.

The reactions to the events in Oromya reveal shock and confusion. First,in the intensity of the repression, with thousands of arrests, including senior cadres from the Oromo legal opposition parties, journalists, intellectuals. Then in its desire to silence discordant media voices, including the two TV networks run by opponents in the diaspora, to the point that the security forces even wrecked satellite dishes.

And in the cacophony emanating from the leadership. At one extreme, denial of the obvious. "There is a fair power sharing system between the federal government and the regional states which has enabled the regionsto decide by themselves on issues that are specific to them", the government spokesman maintained. "We know the protests are based on false claims." The protesters are demonised, driven by "the conspiracies ofdestructive forces… of evil forces", of "anti-peace elements", including opposition parties which are, for good measure, "the proxies of the Eritrean regime", and "are now organizing armed gangs". [17] At the other extreme, Abadulla Gemada, speaker of the House, a long-standing leader of OPDO but a man with the Prime Minister's ear and one of the fewleaders whose position in the traditional Oromo hierarchy attracts a certain popularity, declared in essence that the Oromos were smart enough not to let themselves be manipulated and to demonstrate for goodreasons. [18] Between the two extremes, a convoluted acknowledgement,even from the Prime Minister, that "the recent question raised by the people of Oromia is a legitimate one", that the Master Plan should have been drawn up in consultation "with the people of Oromia", but also that "merciless legitimate action against any force bent on destabilising the area" is required. [19] Finally, The Plan has been abandoned". [20] For Abay Tsehaye, one of top ideas men and a political adviser to the Prime Minister, the sole culprits are corrupt OPDO officials and shady businessmen who "created all the mess… to capitalize on chaos" so as "to preempt the good governance drive… using the Master Plan as a smokescreen". [21] So the whole problem comes down to black sheep who are manipulating Oromo to escape the punishment they deserve. Only part of the press dared to go further. For example, the Addis Standard, with a front page showing two raised crossed arms in red on ablack background, carried the headline "Why is Ethiopia killing its people again?" subtitled "Oromo protests; not just about the 'Master Plan'… Marking the next Ethiopian Political Chapter". [22] Federalism and hyper-centralised realityThe regime is now paying the price for the accumulatedmistakes of its ethnic policy. Both ANDM and OPDO were created by the TPLF. They have never broken free of its oversight, at least to the extentof being considered legitimate representatives by the Amhara and the Oromo, with the capacity to voice their aspirations and grievances at federal level. This original fault line undermines the whole federal construct. Federalism is at the heart of the constitution and institutions, but the reality is hyper-centralised, the primacy of the Tigryan elite, even if increasingly under stress, undeniable in the political, economic and evenmore so the military and security spheres.

The "national question" boomerangs back on those who claim to have settled it once and for all: constantly emphasising national identities and proclaiming that they now all have the right to assert themselves, equallyand entirely; in reality, keeping them ranked and constrained. Meles Zenawi's iron fist had contained this contradiction. It could not but break loose after his death. In the absence of strong and inclusive political structures to handle it, it inevitably overflowed into the street.

One of the most illuminating evidences of these accumulated mistakes is the vacuity of the OPDO. It won 100% on the seats during the May elections, but it proved incapable of maintaining law and order, incapable of channelling discontent: it disintegrated. Most of its top leadership further discredited themselves by adopting the government line. As for therest of its officials, very many joined the protests, others quite simply faded away. Oromya lives under a de facto state of security/military siege directed from Addis Ababa.

A Copernican revolution?

Would simple reforms resolve all these profoundly interdependent pitfalls,or do they demand a complete overhaul of the regime? Surprisingly as it may seem, part of the TPLF and some high level officials beyond believe this is the case. They have in recent months undergone a Copernican revolution, breaking with everything they have thought and done since their beginnings, 40 years ago now, as with all Ethiopian leaders since thedawn of time: ruling by force.

They underline that throughout the country's history, all regime changes have come through armed conflict. "We want to leave future generations an Ethiopia that is not only prosperous, but also sustainably stable and peaceful", they say. The only solution would be to let the institutions workas the constitution stipulates. In other words, deliberative assemblies thatactually control the executive, from federal level down through the 17,000municipalities; an independent legal system; a recognition of the positive role that the opposition parties and media could play. Sincere conversion or a pragmatic acceptance of reality? For their Tigrayan proponents, giventhe arch-minority status of the Tigreans, the clinching argument is that only genuine federalism could give them the vital long-term guarantee of remaining at least masters in their own homeland.

In the immediate, the management of the unrest in Oromya contradicts these intentions. However, the shock has been too sudden and too violentfor the regime not to be out of its depth and to revert to its traditional repressive habits. But its history also shows that it only changes after a very long period of internal maturation. There is nothing to say that a period of deep reflection has not begun, albeit as ever behind doublelocked doors.

The obstacles are huge: the whole culture of power would be turned upside down, along two axes. This culture is one of centralisation. But realfederalism couldn't be beyond reach. Oromya shows that it is becoming anabsolute requirement. The foreign investment influx requires long term stability. Decentralisation is not conditional on the establishment of the 'rule of law' in every other sphere. In particular, oligarchical power could adapt to, and even prosper alongside genuine decentralisation. However, it would entail at least a full reconstruction of OPDO, and probably ANDM as well. Otherwise, it is to be feared that the inter-nation relationship would become even more critical, with young Oromo activists in particulardeciding that the only choice is armed struggle because nothing could be achieved by political means.

It is also an authoritarian culture. Since the student movement of the 1970s, this authority has been vested in a small self-proclaimed vanguardelite, whose legitimacy is founded on the claim to supreme knowledge. It might adopt the argument of the early Soviet leadership: "We alone knowwhat should be done to make you prosperous and happy, and so we havethe right and the duty to do it if necessary by force and against your will."In essence, therefore, this power is vertical and monolithic: any dissent could only come from misguided individuals or from 'anti-peace' and 'anti-development' elements. Criticism can be accepted only if levelled at failures in the execution of a policy, but not at the policy itself. That is precisely the limitation of the current campaign against the unholy trinity.

Rule of law?

This raises the question of what meaning these 'reformers' give to the 'rule of law': does it include the possibility that the country's vital forces, whether driven by political, economic or social motives, including these new 'intellectuals', could organise themselves and make dissenting voicesheard, not only about the form, but also about the substance of policy?

This would require the end of monolithism, the acceptance of counter-forces, and therefore an end to the obsession with maintaining controlover all organisations, whatever their nature.

It would also require an end to the wait for the supreme saviour, the 'strong man'. Even within the TPLF, and even more so in the population offormer Abyssinia, many are convinced that only such a figure could stabilise and preserve the structure of power, thus bring a lasting stability,as supposedly demonstrated throughout Ethiopian history.

Establishing the rule of law is above all about confronting oligarchical power. During a famous televised discussion about tackling the unholy trinity, attended by a gathering of the leadership and opened by a devastating report into the spread of its depredations right to the top of the party-state, Haile Mariam Dessalegn exclaimed: "Here, we talk, butonce outside, we defend our different networks to ensure that they arenot affected. That is the primary sickness!" [23] A confession of the limitations of self-correction.

The abandonment of the Master Plan is an unprecedented decision, but one that even the legal opposition considers a first step on a very long journey. It is calling for a significant gesture of appeasement, such as the freeing of the recent detainees, as proof that the government is sincerely ready to enter into dialogue with all the stakeholders concerned who possess recognised status, and with respected figures, for a complete rethink. [24] If it accepts, the opposition would have to concede that the process could only be gradual, extremely lengthy, that if the EPRDF agrees not to dictate its outcome, it will nevertheless insist on retaining control throughout the whole process, and that one line in the sand cannotfor the moment be crossed: challenging federalism and the upper hand Tigreans hold over the security services and the army, which it sees for the time being as its ultimate shield.

"Where does all this lead us? To the beginning of the end? Let us hope not", concludes a recent editorial in Addis Fortune. [25] In the absence ofa credible alternative authority, only the existing regime can decide whether it ultimately wishes to change, or is prepared to risk the worst. (text ends)

ETHIOPIA: HISTORICAL HERITAGE SITES

Ongoing Conservation Efforts Yield Enriched Understanding of Washa Mik'ael November 26, 2014

As one of Africa's significant heritage sites the Washa-Mik'ael rock-hewn church is of tremendous historic, cultural and religious worth. Recent actions taken to concurrently excavate and protectthe site are therefore greeted with enthusiasm. The following points are inconclusive observations only, and the author very much welcomes additional constructive comment to enhance understanding:

Reinforced-concrete foundations of a shelter are being constructed aroundthe site. When complete this structure's purpose would be to protect Washa-Mik'ael from the locality's heavy seasonal rains. The success of thisscheme will be determined by how effectively the structure is able to divert rainfall from the site.

Removal of invasive root systems from structural cracks is a positive development and should protect structure from further damage in nearterm.

Archeological excavation of one meter of soil at eastern edge of structurethat Washa-Mik'ael's architect's intent was to conceive a monolithic structure – not semi-monolithic, as was earlier suspected.

Drainage pipe, placed at the west of the site (just beyond tunnel) may beinadequate to divert anticipated volume of rain accumulation.

Excavation of area immediately surrounding the upright monolithic slab (north west corner of site) is reported by the site's guide* to have uncovered human bone fragments. This information, if confirmed, seemsto support speculation that the object's function may have been to serveas a formal burial site. Best to await the forthcoming official report however as there are many layers of history associated with site. The bones uncovered therefore could have been interred during an informal phase of the church's history.

Since the 2011 survey new damage has been found within architectural details of the site. While this is highly regrettable the extent is limited andthe cause is indeterminable. Findings of incomplete skeletal remains in southwest section of structure may indicate structural collapse during the construction phase. A carbon dating examination of these remains is therefore urged, as this would likely yield reliable data as to when collapseoccurred. It is furthermore advocated that a proper Orthodox burial also be performed for the remains of the deceased.

The overall assessment of this update/report concludes that conservationprogress at the Washa-Mik'ael site has been positive and should continuewith compulsory caution.

 Until an official authorised report becomes available it should be notedthat while Washa-Mich'ael's guide is an informed individual, he is not a spokesperson for the formal government sponsored excavation/conservation effort. Information provided by him or likewise this blog, while intended to be educational, is nevertheless strictly unofficial.*

 It is understood that several phases of construction almost certainlyoccurred at the Washa-Mik'ael site over various and prolonged periods.Until carbon dating is performed on the skeletal fragments however it remains unknown from which phase the remains in question derive.*

Bruce Strachan has written extensively about the Washa-Mich'ael church for the Encyclopaedia Aethiopica (Universität Hamburg), The Nation (Kenya), Cornerstone – the Journal of the Society for the Preservation of Ancient Buildings (London), Selamta, The Journal of the Friends of Ethiopian Studies, and the Journal of Medieval African Studies. He has alsolectured on the subject at the Institute of Ethiopian Studies at the University of Addis Ababa. Strachan has also appeared in a 2010 Ethiopian Television documentary citing the site's urgent need for conservation intervention.

LEGENDS:

Amesalu Aklilu (PhD) /the late/ author of English-AmharicDictionary

On December 19, 2013, Ethiopia has lost a son who was so dear and ahighly celebrated an English language scholar who ha...s reached out beyond the limit to make an important history…… Plus who has offered amuch needed contribution in the field of education and selfless pioneer of a generation, like no any other before or after.

Amsalu Aklilu (1930-2013) the author of the very first well organized "English- Amharic Dictionary". The fluent English scholar was perhaps oneof a few Ethiopians who had an impressive ability to master in English language in his time. And the many outstandingly written texts that carried his deeds are now the living headstone of the priceless dedication he left beyond the grave. …Now It has been more than 2 years since the death of the 83 year old renowned English language scholar has taken place. However his spirit will continue to live through his many steadfast contributions in the field of education for a life time to come.

Eritrea Asked to Open its Ports for Ethiopia’s Famine ReliefERITREAN PRESS NEWS by CDE on 12 March, 2016

It is a humanitarian request which Asmara will be glad to help, but the TPLFits WILL reject itonce again, according to commentators.

The severe Ethiopian famine that is just over the horizon will require the use of Eritrean portsto handle the massive arrival of food relief from the international community, said Ambassador Herman Cohen. "The sheer volume of food for 40 million people cannot be processed solely by the port of Djibouti and the railway from Djibouti to Addis Ababa."

The ambassador added, "It is important that Ethiopia and Eritrea start making arrangements immediately for the opening of the Eritrean ports of Assab and Massawa so as to receive the ships carrying the famine relief. These ports have easy access to northern Ethiopia where mostof the need exists."

In 2000, Eritrea had offered the use of its two ports to allow the delivery of international humanitarian assistance to Ethiopia after 8 million people was in need of urgent food assistance in Northern Ethiopia. The ruling regime in Ethiopia rejected Eritrea's good gesture.US President Hussein Obama said, "Ethiopia is in the worst drought in a half century and need all the help it can get from the international community."

According to the UN, 20 million people are starving in Ethiopia with 14 million suffering inthe south and east of the country (source: Sky New). Eritrea expected to offer the use of Massawa and Assab ports based strictly on humanitarian ground.

Then Again Everyone has the Right to Choose his/her Heroes. I think I toohave the Right to say "I Just Wonder!" One can compare apples and oranges.The only similarity between apple and orange is that both are fruits. One has the right to choose his Own Heroes. As to Brahané Mesqel Reda, what he did is well documented. Not by outsiders but by his own friends within the EPRP. Brhané Opened the Gate for Ethiopian Airlines passenger plane highjacking 5 were participating in the highjacking of theplane. Each and everyone of them were organized by the ELF, a scessionist rebel group in former Eritrea under Ethiopian administration.

Note: Read the Generation by Kiflu Tadesse. Read also Andargechew's book. Brhane went to Ertrean Student Conferance in Damscus ,Syria. There ,.in his Speech, he unequivocaly asserted that Eritrea is Ethiopian colony and should be free. Before opening the base in Assimba, he was inEritrea for nearly 2 years. During those 2 years in collaboration with the ELF, he fought the Ethiopian national army. Also one should remember that the day rebel ELF opened a base in Assimba for it’s ally the EPRP it was in Yekatiti 24, 1967 EC. It’s the time of the eve of the Land to the Tiller Proclamation. A very interesting document is the statement BrahanéMesqel gave to his interrogator at Duerg interrogation department (DuergMirimera kifil). It is over 100 pages and still only one somewhere. He alsohand wrote 181 pages of personal letter to Mengistu Haile Mariam disvowing his acts thus far.

KEY NOTE

Ephraim Isaac (prof.) On Ethiopian Ge'ez Calendar

Note well: The renowned Ethiopian born US scholar Prof. Ephraim Isaac, said that the Ethiopian calendar is unique in that it belongs neither to the Julian, nor to the Gregorian calendars. The professor was quoted saying this on the Ethiopian Herald some eight years ago. Historical literature shows that the calendars of the entire world are based on the work ofthe old Egyptian astronomers who discovered, as early as 3000 BC to 4000 BC that the solar or sidereal year lasted slightly less than 365 ¼ days. However, it was left to the astronomers of the Alexandrian school to incorporate this knowledge into some sort of calendar; and it wasthese astronomers who also came up with the idea of leap years.

Subsequently, the Romans under Julius Caesar borrowed their reformed calendar from the Alexandrian science and adopted it to the western world. Then the Copts inherited this scienceas a right and built upon it themselves. In due course, according to the literature, the Copts handed this calendar, together with their method of computing the date of Easter, on to their descendant Church in Ethiopia.

Therefore, the literature further said, the Ethiopian year has something in common with the western year, having been derived from the same source. Prof. Ephraim also said that many people mistakenly assume that Ethiopian calendar is Julian. "The Gregorian calendar isactually the revisions of Julian calendar, which Pop Gregory edited or decided according to certain calculations," he said.

Months in both Julian and Gregorian have 30 and 31 days, and with February or June either 28 or 29 days during the leap year, he explained and said that the two do share similar character in terms of months and 365 days, which is 366 days in each leap year. But, he said, months in the Ethiopian calendar which is based on Metsehafe-Hissab (Book of Calculation), the derivatives of the Alexandrian Jewish calendar, have equal 30 days, and then Pagumen, which is the 13th month of five days and six in each leap year, he said.

In addition to Metsehafe-Hissab, the professor said, there is a very famous book called, Metsehafe-Henok, (The Book of Enoch) which is found only in Ethiopia with chapters that deals with some calculation of the years. As the same time, he said, there is still another book called Abushakir, which came to Ethiopia from Coptic Egyptian of Arab background.

Above all, he said, there are five years difference between the Gregorian calendar and the birth of Jesus Christ while only three between the latter and the Ethiopian calendar. “Accordingly, many scholars including I, believe that the Ethiopian calendar is much closer tothe birth of Jesus Christ. And this is one of the many unique ancient heritages which Ethiopia has contributed to the entire world,” he said.

Besides, a piece from the Ethiopian Orthodox Tewahido Church indicates that the calendar of the Ethiopian church came from Egypt and as to methods and dates agree with the calendar ofthe Coptic Church. But the two calendars differ with regard to the saints’ days and the time of observing them. The year of the Ethiopian calendar contains 365 days to which is added everyfourth year an extra day. Each year in this four-year period is dedicated to one of the four Evangelists who come in the following order: Matthew, Mark, Luke and John. The year of Luke is the Ethiopian Leap year and is the year which precedes the western leap year.

Each year is divided into 12 months of 30 days. The extra five days are placed at the end of the year and known as Pagumen. In the leap year the extra day is added to these five days making the Pagumen of this year a period of six days.

The chronology of the Ethiopian church follows the Era of Incarnation that dates from our Lord’s birth; there is a difference of seven or eight years between the western and Ethiopian systems. Because the Ethiopian Church holds that our Lord was born 5500 years after the creation of the world. This gives the seven or eight years difference between the Gregorian and Ethiopian Chronologies. The Church also uses other systems of chronology. There is the Era of the world which dates from 5493 BC, which also differs from the western chronology by seven or eight years. Then there is a system of chronology called “the years of Mercy or Grace,” a system which follows the great lunar cycle.
According to SELAMTA magazine of the Ethiopian, Ethiopia has its own ancient calendar. The Ethiopian Calendar has more in common with the Coptic Egyptian Calendar. The Ethiopic and Coptic calendars have 13 months, 12 of 30 days each and an intercalary month atthe end of the year of five or 6 days depending whether the year is a leap year or not. The Ethiopian calendar is much influenced by the Ethiopian Orthodox Tewahedo Church, which follows its ancient calendar rules and beliefs. The year starts on 11 September in the Gregorian Calendar or on the 12th in (Gregorian) Leap Years. The Coptic Leap Year follows the same rules as the Gregorian so that the extra month always has six days in a Gregorian Leap Year.

The Ethiopic calendar differs from both the Coptic and the Julian calendars. The difference between the Ethiopic and Coptic is 276 years. In spite of this, the Ethiopic Calendar is closely associated with the rules and the different calculations influenced by the Coptic Church and the Ethiopian Orthodox Tewahido Church. Based upon the ancient Coptic Calendar, the Ethiopian Calendar is seven to eight years behind the Gregorian Calendar, owing to alternate calculations in determining the date of the annunciation of the birth of Jesus.

The Coptic New Year is a holiday in Ethiopia. Christmas falls on the 7th of January as in the Orthodox “old” calendar. Likewise, Epiphany is on the 19th of January. Easter would appear to be calculated according to the Orthodox calendar also. Christmas and Epiphany also do not appear to move by one day during Leap Years as they would if they were being set by the above calendar. Thus, it would seem that Christian feasts are set according to the Orthodox calendar rather than according to the Coptic. An Egyptian Coptic source simply describes the date of Easter as being “the second Sunday after the first full moon in Spring.”

Innovation and Misoneism during the Reign of Emperor Yohannes IV (1872.1889) ByRICHARD PANKHURST

Medicine ..Physician – The second field of traditional innovation in which Yohannes played a prominent role was medicine. He accepted the presence at his court in 1885 to 86 of a Greek physician, Dr. Nicholas Parisis, lent by King George I of the Hellenes. Yohannes was thus thefirst Ethiopian ruler to have his personal physician.

Vaccination – Parisis was, however, more than a mere court physician. He introduced European-style vaccination, based on a serum imported from France, toa moderately widesection of the population. This arrived during the great smallpox epidemic in 1886, and resulted in the vaccination of many prominent figures.

They included Emperor Yohannes himself, the Abun, or head of the church, King Minilik of Shawa, King Takla Haymanot of Gojjam, and Ras Alula, as well as many generals, officials, soldiers, and numerous children. Yohannes was so convinced of the superiority of modern vaccination over traditional Ethiopian variation that he issued a decree forbidding his subjectsfrom practicing the latter. The force of this decree is confirmed by Harrison Smith, who declares that the old practice was declared a heinous. offence; and that great efforts were made to replace it by European-style vaccination.

Clinics – The establishment of clinics in Adwa and Gondar, New medicines were alsoimported in the course of trade, or brought in by foreign travelers.

This resulted in a significant expansion in the use of mercury sulphate preparations in the treatment of syphilis. This cure was by then replacing the older sarsaparilla treatment, and bythe early 1880s was commonly used, Rohlfs says, in much of northern Ethiopia.

In Memory of The Habtewold sons:

The barefoot loyal public servants of Ethiopia

Ato Mekonnen HabteWold, who was the older brother of Prime Minister Aklilou HabteWoldand Ato AkaleWork HabteWold a loyal public servants of the crown of Ethiopia. Ato Mekonnen HabteWold, career as a civil servant span from the era of Menelik II to modern times of Emperor Haile Selassie I. He held several Min...isterial positions and profiles, as Finance Minister, Minster of Information and propaganda, Minster of Interior and Nationalsecurity & Intelligence and Minister of Commerce & Industry.

Prior to the Italian invasion of October, 1935, he was appointed as prime mover of the national mobilization of Hager Fikir Mahiber, to propagate the national sentiment to defend the country and the monarch, where in the process he helped to open the gateway for the development of literary and art works and brew the sentiment of modern times nationalism. After the liberation of Ethiopia, as he helped and encourage domestic business enterprises toflourish this was crucial in times where the Ethiopian business community that was mostly dominated by foreign merchants. He gave incredible incentives to domestic cottage industry,those of you with grace of age upon you, may remember the neon sign on the Development Bank that said ” TITH TIKELU! TITH FITELU” and the cottage industry centre. And their reward in their old ages machine-gunned in cold blood hand!! “The patient is dead. Please come back to the funeral.”

እነዚህን ምስሎች በትህትና ያስረከቡኝን አቶ አምዴ አካለወርቅን እና ታላቅ እህታቸውን ወይዘሮ ትርሲት አካለወርቅን ማመስገን አለብኝ ።

እንዲህ አይነት ምስሎች እና ታሪኮች ከየጓዳው ወጥተው ለእኛ የሚዲያ ሰዎች መሰጠት አለባቸው ብዬ አስባለሁ ። እኛ ደግሞ ለህዝቡ እናቀብላለን። ምስሎቹ ስለ አቶ አክሊሉ ብዙ ይናገራሉ ።የአቶ አክሊሉ የልጅነት መልክ ፤ የባህር ማዶ ቆይታቸው ፣ ከፈረንሳዊት ባለቤታቸው ከማዳም ኮሌት ጋር የተነሱት ፎቶ እንዲያውም ማዳም ኮሌት ምርጥ የሃበሻ ልብስ እንዴት እንደሚያምርባቸው ምስሉን ማየት ይችላሉ ።

በነገራችን ላይ ማዳም ኮሌት በ2003 ከዛሬ 5 አመት ቀደም ብሎ በ95 አመታቸው ነበር ህይወታቸው ያለፈው። ምስሎቹ የአክሊሉን ዘመናዊ ለባሽነት ይመሰክራሉ ።በእርግጥ የፋሽን ሀገር በሆነችው ፈረንሳይ ሀገር ከ17 አመት በላይ ኖረው ዘመናዊ አለባበስ ቢኖራቸው ብዙም አይደንቅም ።

አክሊሉ እና 2000 መጽሃፎቻቸው

2000 መጽሃፎቻቸው አሁን የት ገቡ?መጀመሪያ ያነሳሁት ጥያቄ ነበር ። ደርግ እርሳቸውን ብቻ ሳይሆን መጽሃፎቻቸውንም ቀብሮአል ። ታዲያ አክሊሉ በህይወት በነበሩባቸው ዘመናት እነዚህን መጽሃፎች ከቤታቸው ከሚገኘው ቤተ መጽሃፍት ደርድረው የንባብ ጥማታቸውን ያረኩ ነበር ። ግን እነዚህን መጽሃፎች ያየ ካለ ብናውቅአይከፋም ። አንድ ጠቅላይ ሚኒስትር ምን አይነት መጽሃፎችን ሲያነብ እንደነበር ብናውቅ ጥሩ ይሆን ነበር ።

የጠቅላይ ሚኒስትሩ መኖሪያ ቤቶች

አክሊሉ ጠቅላይ ሚኒስትር ከመሆናቸው አስቀድሞ የውጭጉዳይ ሚኒስትር ሳሉ የመጀመሪያ መኖሪያ ቤታቸው ፣ ቀበናወንዙ ጋር ወይም እንግሊዝ ኤምባሲ ሲሆን ቤቱ የድሮ ፎቅ እና የሚያምር ነበር። አንድ ቀን ሄጄ ማየቴ አይቀርም ፤፤ አክሊሉ ከዚህ ቤት ተዛውረው አሁን ሲዳን ኤምባሲ የሆነውና ሜክሶኮ አካባቢ ከሚገኝ ቤታቸው ነበር ያመሩት ። በመጨረሻው የህይወት ዘመናቸው አክሊሉ በኦልድ ኤርፖርት ነበር መቀመጫቸውን ያደረጉት ።

ባህላዊ ምግብ ፤ ታንጎ ሙዚቃ

አክሊሉ ወጥ ቤት ገብተው ባይሰሩ ለባህላዊ ምግብ ልዩ ፍቅር እንዳላቸው ይወሳል። ፈረንሳይ ሃገር ለአመታት የኖሩ በመሆናቸው ዘመናዊ የፈረንጅ ምግብ መመገብ ያዘወትራሉ። አክሊሉ ለክላሲካል ሙዚቃ እና ለታንጎ እንዲሁም ለቫልስ የተለየ ፍቅር አላቸው ። እንዲያውም ከባለቤታቸው ጋር አብረው ሲደንሱ የተነሱትን ምስል ተመልክቻለሁ ። ብቻ በጥቅል አነጋገር አክሊሉ ቀለል ያሉ ሰውናቸው። ሆሬ ወይም ላንጋኖ ሄዶ መዝናናት ያስደስታቸዋል ፤፤ ለቤት እንስሳ በተለይ ለውሻ ልዩ ፍቅር አላቸው ። አንድ ቀን የአቶ አክሊሉ ሾፈር ውሻ ገደለ ። አክሊሉ የውሻውን መሞት ሲሰሙ ታላቅ ሀዛን ውስጥ ገቡ ።

Zera Yacob the philosopher

This article is about Zera Yacob, the 17th century philosopher.

For the Prince, see Zera Yacob Amha Selassie, Crown Prince of Ethiopia .For the emperor, see Zara Yaqob .

Zera Yacob (Ge'ez : ዘርዕ ያዕቆብ zar'ā yāʿiqōb "Seed of Jacob," modern zer'a yā'iqōb ; also spelled Zärʾä Yaʿqob , Zar'a Ya'aqob , or Zar'a Ya'eqob ; 1599–1692) was a seventeenth- century Ethiopian philosopher . His 1667 treatise, known in the original Ge'ez language as theHatata , has often been compared by a handful of non-traditional scholars to René Descartes ' Discours de la méthode in (1637). His writing came at a period when African philosophical literature was significantly oral in character. He believed in following one's natural reasoning instead of believing what one is told by others.

Biography

Yacob was born into a farmer's family near Aksum in northern Ethiopia, the former capital ofEthiopia under the ancient kingdom of Aksum . Yacob's name means "The Seed of Jacob" ("Zar" is the Ge'ez word for "seed"). Although his father was poor, he supported Yacob's attendance of traditional schools, where he became acquainted with the Psalms of David and educated in the Coptic Christian faith. He was denounced before Emperor Susenyos (r. 1607-1632), who had turned to the Roman Catholic faith and ordered his subjects to follow his ownexample.

Refusing to adopt the Catholic faith, Yacob fled into exile with some gold and the Book of Psalms . On the road to Shewa in the south, he found a cave at the foot of the Tekezé River and lived in it as a hermit for two years, praying and developing his philosophy. He wrote ofhis experience, "I have learnt more while living alone in a cave than when I was living with scholars. What I wrote in this book is very little; but in my cave I have meditated on many other such things."

After the death of the Emperor, Susenyos's son

Fasiledes (r. 1632-1667), a firm adherent of the Ethiopian Orthodox church , took power, expelling the Jesuits, and extirpated the Catholic faith in his kingdom in 1633. Yacob left hiscave and settled in Emfraz . He found a patron, a rich merchant named Habta Egziabher (known as Habtu), and married a maid of the family. He refused to live as a monk and statedthat "the law of Christians which propounds the superiority of monastic life over marriage isfalse and can’t come from God." However, he also rejected polygamy because "the law of creation orders one man to marry one woman."

Yacob became the teacher of Habtu's two sons, and at the request of his patron's son Walda Hawawat, Yacob wrote his famous 1667 Treatise investigating the light of reason. Yacob is most noted for this ethical philosophy surrounding the principle of harmony. He purported that an action's morality is decided by whether it advances or degrades overall harmony in theworld. His philosophy is theistic in nature. While he did believe in a deity, whom he referred to as God, he rejected any set of religious beliefs. Rather than deriving beliefs from any organized religion, Yacob sought the truth in observing the natural world. In Hatata in following in the footsteps of great church fathers, Yacob applied the idea of the first cause to his proof for the existence of God. "If I say that my father and my mother created me, then I must search for the creator of my parents and of the parents of my parents until they arrive at the first who were not created as we [are] but who came into this world in some other way without being generated."

However, the knowability of God does not depend on human intellect, but "Our soul has the power of having the concept of God and of seeing him mentally. God did not give this powerpurposelessly; as he gave the power, so did he give the reality." Little is known of Yacob's later life. However, it is believed that he lived a fulfilled family life in Enfraz, and remained there for the next 25 years until he died in 1692. Yacob's year of death was recorded by Walda Hawariat in an annotation to the Treatise.

Africa’s $700 Billion Problem Waiting to Happen

The Horn of Africa region is central to the world’s maritime trade. It’s also beginning to fallapart. By Alex De Waal March 17, 2016

Back in 2002, Meles Zenawi, then prime minister of Ethiopia, drafted a foreign policy and national security white paper for his country. Before finalizing it, he confided to me a “nightmare scenario” — not included in the published version — that could upend the balanceof power in the Horn of Africa region.

The scenario went like this: Sudan is partitioned into a volatile south and an embittered north.The south becomes a sinkhole of instability, while the north is drawn into the Arab orbit.
Meanwhile, Egypt awakens from its decades-long torpor on African issues and resumes its historical stance of attempting to undermine Ethiopia, with which it has a long-standing dispute over control of the Nile River. It does so by trying to bring Eritrea and Somalia into itssphere of influence, thereby isolating the government in Addis Ababa from its direct neighbors. Finally, Saudi Arabia begins directing its vast financial resources to support Ethiopia's rivals and sponsor Wahhabi groups that challenge the traditionally dominant Sufis in the region, generating conflict and breeding militancy within the Muslim communities.

Fourteen years later, reality has exceeded Zenawi's nightmare scenario; not only has every one of his fears come to pass, but Egyptian President Abdel Fattah al-Sisi and Saudi King Salman bin Saud are working hand-in-glove on regional security issues — notably in Yemen and Libya — which has raised the stakes of the long-running Egypt-Ethiopia rivalry. If the worsening tensions in the Horn of Africa erupt into military conflict, as seems increasingly possible, it wouldn't just be a disaster for the region — it could also be a catastrophe for the global economy. Almost all of the maritime trade between Europe and Asia, about $700 billion each year, passes through the Bab al-Mandab, the narrow straits on the southern entrance to the Red Sea, en route to the Suez Canal. An endless procession of cargo ships andoil tankers passes within sight — and artillery range — of both the Yemeni and African shores of the straits

A crisis in the Horn of Africa has been a long time in the making. The regional rivalries of today date back to 1869, when the Suez Canal was opened to shipping, instantly making the Red Sea one of the British Empire's most important strategic arteries, since almost all of its trade with India passed that way. Then as now, the security of Egypt depended on control of the Nile headwaters, 80 percent of which originate in Ethiopia. Fearful that Ethiopia would dam the river and stop the flow, Egypt and its colonial masters attempted to keep Ethiopia weak and encircled. They did this in part by divvying up rights to the Nile's waters without consulting Addis Ababa. For example, the British-drafted Nile Waters Agreements, signed in1929 and 1959, excluded Ethiopia from any share of the waters. As a result, Egypt and Ethiopia became regional rivals, intensely suspicious of each other.

The Nile remains a high-profile source of tension between the two countries to this day; Sisi'sstate visit last year to Ethiopia failed to achieve much, in large part because of Egypt's uneaseover a huge Ethiopian hydroelectric project on the Blue Nile. But another important source offriction between the two countries has centered for some time on two of Ethiopia's volatile neighbors — Eritrea and Somalia — which Cairo has long viewed as useful partners to secureits interests along the Red Sea littoral. Ethiopia has shown it will resist what it views as Egyptian encroachment near its borders. From 2001 to 2004, for instance, Ethiopia and Egyptbacked rival factions in Somalia, which prolonged that country's destructive civil war.

These fractures in the Horn of Africa have been deepened by Saudi Arabia's reassessment ofits security strategy. Worried that the United States was withdrawing from its role as securityguarantor for the wider region, it resolved to build up its armed forces and project its power into strategic hinterlands and sea lanes to the north and south. In practice, that has meant winning over less powerful countries along the African coast of the Red Sea — Sudan, Eritrea, Djibouti, and Somalia — a region that Ethiopia has sought to place within its sphere of influence.

The Saudi presence along the African Red Sea coast has grown more sharply pronounced since its March 2015 military intervention in Yemen, which drew in Egypt as part of a coalition of Sunni Arab states battling Iran-backed Houthi rebels. The coalition obtained combat units from Sudan and Eritrea, and scrambled to secure the entire African shore of the Red Sea. Then in January of this year — under pressure from Saudi Arabia — Djibouti, Somalia, and Sudan all cut diplomatic ties with Iran. By far the most significant of these was Sudan, which has had long-standing political and military ties with Tehran. For years, Iranianwarships called at Port Sudan, and Iranian clandestine supplies to the Palestinian militant group Hamas passed freely along Sudan's Red Sea coast (occasionally intercepted by Israeli jet fighters). Now Sudan is part of the Saudi-led coalition pummeling the Iran-backed Houthis.

But the most important geopolitical outcome of the Saudi-led Yemen intervention has been the rehabilitation of Eritrea, which capitalized on the war to escape severe political and economic isolation. After it gained independence from Ethiopia in 1993, Eritrea fought warswith each of its three land neighbors — Djibouti, Sudan, and Ethiopia. It also fought a brief war with Yemen over the disputed Hanish Islands in the Red Sea in 1995, after which it declined to reestablish diplomatic relations with Sana'a and instead backed the Houthi rebelsagainst the government.

After the Ethio-Eritrean border war of 1998-2000, Eritrea became a garrison state — with anarmy of 320,000, it has one the highest soldier-to-population ratios in the world — and Ethiopia led an international campaign to isolate it at the African Union, United Nations, andother international bodies. This was made easier by Eritrea's increasingly rogue behavior, including backing al-Shabab militants in Somalia. The imposition of U.N. sanctions in 2009 brought the country to the brink of financial collapse.

But the war in Yemen gave Eritrean President Isaias Afewerki a get-out-of-jail-free card. Heswitched sides in the Yemen conflict and allied himself with Saudi Arabia and its Gulf partners. As a result, the Eritrean president is now publicly praised by the Yemeni government and welcomed in Arab capitals. His government is also reaping handsome if secret financial rewards in exchange for its diplomatic about-face.

But the fact that Eritrea has decisively escaped Ethiopia's trap does not mean it has suddenlybecome a more viable dictatorship. On the contrary, the renewed geostrategic interest in the country and its 750-mile Red Sea coast make the question of who succeeds Afewerki, who has been in power for a quarter century, all the more contentious — especially since Ethiopiahas long sought to hand pick a replacement for the Eritrean president. Already, Ethiopia mounts regular small military sorties on the countries' common border to let Eritrea know who is the regional powerbroker. It would not take much for these tensions to explode into open war.

Saudi Arabia’s revamped security strategy has also meant a sudden influx of Arab funds into Somalia. The Saudis promised $50 million to Mogadishu in exchange for closing the Iranian embassy, for example, while other Arab countries and Turkey have spent lavishly to court theallegiance of Somali politicians. This is partly intra-Sunni competition — Turkish- and Qatar-backed candidates pitted against those funded by the Wahhabi alliance — but it also reflects Somalia’s increasing geopolitical importance. In the country’s national elections scheduled for September, Arab- and Wahhabi-affiliated candidates for parliament could very well sweepthe board.

All of this has made Ethiopia very nervous — as it should. The tremors of the region's shifting tectonic plates may not directly cause a major crisis. The more probable outcome is deeper divisions between Egypt and Ethiopia, which could cause a proliferation or deepeningof proxy disputes elsewhere in the region, such as the two countries' competing efforts to shape the future leadership of Eritrea and Somalia.

Still, it's impossible to rule out the possibility of a dramatic security crisis stemming from theshifting regional balance of power. It could come in the form of renewed fighting over Eritrea's still-disputed land borders, or spinoffs from the war in Yemen, such as the eruption of maritime terrorism. That would lead to a dramatic escalation of the militarization of the region. It would also threaten to entirely close the region's sea lanes — the ones that are so central to global commerce.

Unfortunately, the international community is sorely unprepared for such an outcome. A well-established, multi-country naval coalition patrols the sea lanes off Somalia's coast to combat piracy, but no international political mechanism currently exists to diffuse a regional crisis. Inthe relevant bureaucracies that might be called upon in an emergency — from the United Nations to the U.S. State Department — Africa and the Middle East are handled by separate divisions that tend not to coordinate. The EU's special envoy for the Horn of Africa, Alex Rondos, has taken the lead in developing an integrated strategy for both shores of the Red Sea, but the EU's foreign policy instruments are ill-suited to hard security challenges such as this that span two continents.

For its part, the African Union has developed a sophisticated set of conflict management practices for its region. It has taken a hard line against coups and pioneered the principle of non-indifference in the internal affairs of member states — foreshadowing the doctrine of "responsibility to protect." Its summits serve as gatherings where peer pressure is used for theinformal management of conflicts, with more success than is usually recognized. The Gulf Cooperation Council, the regional alliance of Gulf monarchies that would inevitably be involved in a major regional dispute of this kind, should learn from these African best practices. That would require a dramatic change in the mind-set of Arab royal families, whichassume that their relationship with Africans is one of patron and client. Too often, the Africans reinforce that mind-set by acting as supplicants. For example, when the African Union sent a delegation to the Gulf countries in November, the agenda wasn't strategic dialogue or partnership — it was fundraising.

But to prevent Zenawi's "nightmare scenario" from coming to fruition, the Africans and the Arabs need to recognize the Red Sea as a shared strategic space that demands their coordination. A sensible place to start would be by convening a Red Sea forum composed ofthe GCC and the AU — plus other interested parties such as the United Nations, European Union, and Asian trading partners — to open lines of communication, discuss strategic objectives for peace and security and agree on mechanisms for minimizing risk. The fast- emerging Red Sea security challenge is well suited to that most prosaic of diplomatic initiatives — a talking shop. The problem is, all these actors tend to start talking only after a crisis has already exploded. Here’s a timely warning.

Ethiopia: TPLF members own 98.9 percent of the farmland investment in South Omozone (ESAT News March 18, 2016) — A report compiled by a group of professionals in south Omo Zone in south Ethiopia and sent to ESAT indicate 98.9% of the investment land in southOmo zone has been allocated to members of the Tigray Peoples’ Liberation Front (TPLF), theminority ruling clique in Ethiopia.

Of the 106,997.7 hectares of land allocated for investment 105,914.6 or 98.9% has been takenby members of the TPLF and their close ties. Only 1% of the land was given to the locals, according to the report. Of the 20 investors who took land, 16 were either members of the TPLF or Tigrayan supporters of the Front.

The report also revealed the TPLF businessmen could easily obtain 32 million dollars in loansfrom the Bank using the land as a collateral. Of the estimated amount, only about 250,000 dollars has been invested on the land. The over 31 million dollars has either been used for other types of businesses or been taken off shore by the TPLF businessmen. The report said the TPLF businessmen repeatedly harass the local officials in a bid to obtain more bank loans.

The report said heavy machineries, vehicles, chemicals and other inputs that were importedduty free under the name of the investment have not been seen in Omo. Of the total land allocated, only 800 hectares of land has been used for sugar plantations and the rest of the land was sitting idle.

An international uproar ensued last week after a picture that surfaced on the social media show men from the Omo valley in a chain gang, loaded on a police pickup. They were held bythe regime's forces for protesting the seizure of their land by the government for sugar plantations.

Belay Zeleke The Heroic patriot of Bichena, Gojjam Why the ex-emperor ordered execution of him?

Why the ex-emperor ordered to execute the gallant freedom fighter by hanging. This was to be one of the biggest political mis-deeds in the 20thcentury Ethiopia: It was horrible, anyone can't believe the emperor ordered the killing of this gallant patriot. Dejazmatch Belay Zeleke who bitterly fought the Italian invaders in entire Gojjam. During the the invasion, the Eritrean origin named Lorenzo Taezaz armed Belay Zeleke, and fellow patriots through a secret mission in western Gojjam using the porous Sudan border which that was enough to keep the Italians out of the whole Gojjam, it's true Belay Zeleke was a hero, greater hero probably more than the other heroes in the patriotic war fought against the fascist Italians .....

የኢትዮጵያ ሕዝብ በአለፉት 23ዓመታት በህወሓት ዘረኛ አገዛዝ የደረሰበት ስቃይ እንዲቀንስ፤ ገዢዎቹ ከጨንቃው እንዲወዱ፤ ህወሓትን አውርዶ የሚፈልጋቸው መሪዎችን በነፃነት እንዲመርጥ ሲጠይቅና አቤቱታ ሲያሰማቆይቷል። በ1997 ዓ.ም.የኢትዮጵያ ሕዝብ ምኞት የሚሰካ መስሎየታየ የነበረ ቢሆንምበአገዛዙ አረመኔዓዊ እርምጃ ተሰናክሏል። ከጥቂት ዓመታት ወዲህ "ድምፃችን ይሰማ"የሚሉ አቤታዎች ከተለያዩ የኅብረተሰብ ክፍሎች መምጣት ጀምሯል –"ድምፃችን ይሰማ

ሙስሊሞች”፣ “ድምፃችን ይሰማ ኦርቶዶክሶች”፣ “ድምፃችን ይሰማ መምህራን”፣ “ድምፃችን ይሰማ ተማሪዎች”፣ …ወዘተ። በተለይ ሙስሊም ወገኖቻችን በተደራጀ መንገድ “ድምፃችን ይሰማ”እያሉ ሲወተውቱ ሦስት ተከታታይ ዓመታት አልፈዋል። ወገኖቻችን “ድምፃችን ይሰማ”በማለታቸው ተደብድበዋል፣ ታስረዋል፣ ተገድለዋል።

አቤቱታ የሚሰማጆሮ የሌለውአገዛዝ ሲገጥም ምን ይደረጋል ? ለአቤቱታ አቅራቢውያለውምርጫ ከሁለት አንድ ነው። ወይ አቤቱታን እርግፍ አድርጎ ጥሎ በደልን ተቀብሎ “እህህ !”እያሉ መኖር፤ አሊያም “በቃኝ፣ እንቢ አልገዛም”ማለት፤ ሦስተኛ ምርጫየለም።

አቤቱታ ሰሚ ሲያጣ እና ሕዝብ መሮት “እንቢኝ፣ አልገዛም” ሲል ነው ሕዝባዊ እምቢተኝነት ተቀሰቀሰ የሚባለው። ሕዝባዊ እምቢተኝነት ብዙ መልኮችና ቅርጾች ቢኖሩትም ዋነኛዎቹ መገለጫዎች ሁለት ናቸው። አገዛዙ ሕዝብ እንዲያደርግ የሚፈልገውን አለማድረግ እና/ወይም አገዛዙ ሕዝብ እንዲያደርግ የማይፈልገውን ማድረግ።

ለምሳሌ፣ አገዛዙ ሹማምንቱ እንዲከበሩ፣ ሕዝብ እንዲታዘዝላቸው ይፈልጋል፤ እንቢ ያለ ሕዝብ ግን የአገዛዙን ሹማምንት ይንቃል፣ በየደረሱት ያዋርዳቸዋል፣ “አልታዘዛችሁም” ይላቸዋል። ማንኛውም መንግስት የዳኝነት ሥርዓቱ እንዲከበርለት ይፈልጋል፤ በደል የመረረው ሕዝብ ግን የአምባገነኖች ችሎት ውሳኔ አይቀበልም፤ ዳኞችንም ዳኝነትንም አያከብርም። ሕዝብ የመንግሥትን ግብር በወቅቱ እንዲከፍል የማንኛውም መንግሥት ፍላጎት ነው። በመንግሥት ያመረረ ሕዝብ ግን ግብር አይከፍልም፤ መክፈል ግድ ከሆነበትም አዘግይቶ፣ አስለፍቶ ነው። የመረረው ሕዝብ ምሬቱን መፃፍ በሌለበት ቦታ ይጽፋል። በደል የበዛበት ሕዝብ “ዝምበል” ሲሉት ይናገራል፤ “ተናገር” ሲሉት ዝም ይላል።

አገራችን ኢትዮጵያ ውስጥ የሕዝባዊ እምቢተኝተኝነት እርምጃዎች ጅምሮች እየታዩ ነው። በአማራ ክልል፣ ሕዝብ በሹማምንት ላይ የራሱን እርምጃ መውሰድ ጀምሯል። ሕዝብ ራሱ የፓሊስንም የፍርድ ቤትንም ሥራ ተክቶ እየሠራ ነው። ይህ መበረታታት ያለበት ትልቅ እርምጃ ነው። እንደዚሁም ሁሉ በተለይ ወጣቶች ብሶቶቻቸውን በብር ኖቶች ላይ ጽፈውገበያው እንዲያዘዋውራቸው እያደረጉ ነው። ይህም “የወረቀት ገንዘብን ለተሠራበት ዓላማ ብቻ ተጠቀሙ” የሚለውን ህግ በመጣስ ለቅስቀሳ ሥራ መጠቀም በመሆኑ የሕዝባዊ እምቢተኝነት አካል ነው። በሚቀጥሉት ጥቂት ወራት ውስጥ በርካታ የወረቀት ገንዘቦች በምሬት መግለጫነት ይውላሉ ተብሎ ይገመታል።

Egyptian satellite to monitor construction of Ethiopia's disputed dam

By Ayat Al-Tawy March 17, 2016

A new Egyptian satellite will track the construction of an Ethiopian hydroelectric dam overwhich officials in Cairo and Addis Ababa have been locked in a standoff over fears that theproject will hinder Egypt's access to the Nile river waters.

Launched almost two weeks ago, Egysat will monitor Ethiopia's Grand Renaissance Dam bycapturing high quality photos of the construction site along with other sources of the Nile, said Alaa El-din El-Nahry, vice president of Egypt's National Authority for Remote Sensing and Space Sciences.

The LE300 million satellite – which will come into operation in mid-June after a two-monthtest period – will track the dam's height, storage capacity and water discharge. It will also monitor the Kongo River basin to assess the effectiveness of a proposed project to link the Kongo and Nile rivers.

Egypt's government believes the satellite's findings will bolster its negotiations with Ethiopiaand provide legal ground in case it must resort to international arbitration over any violationsin the dam's stated purpose of electricity generation, El-Nahry said during a seminar in Cairo,according to Al-Ahram's daily Arabic newspaper.

Egypt has been particularly concerned that the dam, now more than 30 percent finished, willhugely impact its share of the Nile, the country's main source of potable water.

Situated near the Sudanese border on the Blue Nile, a Nile tributary, the hydroelectric damwill be the biggest in Africa, capable of producing 6,000 megawatts of energy.

Last week, Ethiopian Prime Minister Hailemariam Desalegn urged Egypt to return to thetripartite discussions with Ethiopia and Sudan in an effort to settle the dispute. The threecountries have been engaged in a series of dialogues since the launch of the project threeyears ago.

Last year, Ethiopia and five other Nile-basin countries – Rwanda, Tanzania, Uganda, Kenya and Burundi – endorsed an accord, the Co-operative Framework Agreement, which replaces a1929 treaty granting Egypt veto power over any project on the Nile in upstream countries.
Sudan, Egypt's immediate downstream country, has backed Ethiopia's plans to build the dam.

POLITICO-ECONOMY: The Fast Growing Economy?
Ethiopian PM is Begging for Food Calls for More Foreign Food Aid Amid Drought.

(AP) — Ethiopia’s leader on Thursday urged the international community to donate moretoward emergency food aid for millions of people amid a drought.

Ethiopia “should not be neglected by any means despite all the other crises that are going onelsewhere in the world," Prime Minister Hailemariam Desalegn told The Associated Press inan interview.

"My country deserves more support because we are also sheltering some 750,000 refugees from neighboring countries that need food aid," he said. "If something goes wrong, it is the international community who has not come in. The aid provided to us so far is very little andit often came very late. I urge organizations like UNICEF to come in if they think this is a worst case scenario. Just talking is not a solution."

Aid agencies and the Ethiopian government say more than 10 million Ethiopians need urgentfood aid and more than $1.4 billion is needed to deal with the crisis, with only half of that secured so far. The U.S. has been the biggest donor, giving more than $532 million in humanitarian assistance to Ethiopia since October 2014. The Ethiopian government has alsospent about $380 million of its own money.

The drought was brought on by the El Nino climate phenomenon that affected seasonal rains,causing crops to fail and killing livestock. Ethiopia was devastated by a drought in the 1980s exacerbated by a civil war that killed hundreds of thousands.

Ras Sibhat was the son of Shum Agame Aregawi and W/ro Silas and was born in Agame, Tigray region of Ethiopia. During the era of Emperor Tewodros II, he was appointed as thegovernor of the Agame province. A few years later, under Emperor Yohannes IV, his province expanded and new areas were added under his jurisdiction that included Adigrat. During Emperor Menelik II, he was given the title of 'Ras'.

As the Italians began the occupation of Eritrea, the border that was the point of separation between Ethiopia and the newly created Eritrea became the province of Agame. Ethiopians were not pleased of their lands becoming the property of foreign troops. The people of the Agame province, under Ras Sibhat, started an uprising against the Italians in Eritrea. Prior tothe Battle of Adwa, the Italians acknowledged that there was a major problem confronting them in Agame: "quella straordinaria atmosfera di tensione" (this was an extraordinary tension of atmosphere) ! ... And as the Italians themselves aptly put it, following Ras Sibhat'sorders, "La rivolta scoppiava nell Agame,"(The rebellion of the people of Agame) swept the area.

The Italians began to inform their comrades and their Eritrean Askari soldiers, that the patriotic Ethiopian land of Agame was the enemy. The Italians used the name 'Agame' over and over as it was a province right outside the Italian colony of Eritrea. Although the term Agame is not a derogatory term, today you will find the ancestors of the Askari have kept theteachings of their former masters and use the term Agame as if it was a demeaning word.

Ras Sibhat Aregawi along with Ras Hagos Teferi of Agame, gathered the brave men and women of the Agame to join Emperor Menelik Il in the fight against Italians and their Eritrean Askari's during the Battle of Adwa. Ras Sibhat Aregawi is srvived by 3 sons and 5daughters:

Who was Sir General Robert Napier who led an expeditionary force to Ethiopia?

.....Sir General Robert Napier led an expeditionary force to Ethiopia in 1867-68 to free some English captives held as hostage including the Consul to Abyssinia. This was also a punitive expedition. The Ethiopians were impressed with the Bengal Lancers who arrived enmasse on horse, special shipments of Walers having been sent to India for the Abyssinia ex...pedition; and showed their military skills in precision riding demonstrations such as the sword display.

Lieutenant-General Sir Robert Napier was a capable and very experienced soldier, he'd campaigned in India and China and had been shot twice (recovered) in action. He was in charge of the nearest army for mobilisation to Ethiopia - the Bombay Army. He divided hisforces for Abyssinia into three brigades. The expedition was accomplished in astonishinglyrapid time, to save the hostages, and in case local Ras' (referred to as Princes by the expedition), for whom bags of gold had been taken, changed from neutrality to enmity. Raswere in effect war lords too, they kept large private armies. This saved the Emperor the expense and kept local autonomy, and armies spread well throughout the vast land, a great detterrent to prospective invaders.....

REGIONAL KINGSHIP

Mohammed Ali, whos baptized and enthroned later as "King Mikaelof Wollo"

He later to become a Ras in the Abyssinyan empire, was an interesting figure that defines thediversity with in Ethiopia and the tolerance within.

He was first known as Mohammed Ali. He was born in Wollo. His father was Oromo-SomaliImam Ali Abba Bula and his mother was Woizero Getie (from Warrahimano). He then was appointed to be the governor of Wollo by Menelik, where his allegiance faltered between Menelik II (his close friend and eventually marrying Menelik's daughter Shoaregga menelik)and Empe ror Yohannes IV (the strong power then) who induced him to submission. And under the Council of Boru Meda held under the Emperor's (Yohannes') direction, he converted to Christianity (as the council's decision was implemented to everyone in office then) and was baptized as "Mikael" and became a Ras, (claims are that he built lots of churches after that, was friends with Arabs who helped in building Ayeteyef Hall and later thePalace in Wollow, where they were given estates as a reward and were allowed to build mosques).

In the 1896 First Italo-Ethiopian war, Mikael fought for Menelik and led the feared Oromocavalry at the Battle of Adowa and defeated one full Italian brigade among other battle victories. His son Lij Iyasu was an air to Menelik's throne and ascended as Iyasu V per Menelik's wishes under Regent Ras Tessema Nadew.

Point being* that we try and learn something from such figures. And see the positive in thingsand the light in our nation's history and its future. Where such stories tell us a lot of how things could falter under our feet or be different from one another (be it in color, physic, religion, culture, ethnicity, views) but learn to leave with it where love, respect and unity being the epitome of being an Ethiopian. And rise together as a Nation where greatness is notdefined by individual power but rather a collective strength, where smart is not defined by being a critical critic but from listening and understanding.

I believe that greatness is not achieved when solely focused on flaws, mistakes and/or wrongdoings, but rather looking on how to improve from it and how to better the wheels. Andchange doesn't start from requiring change it starts from changing within. How many of you read books or listen to other's views that are from another side of the story, completely out of what you want to hear?

CAREER DIPLOMACY

The Hon. Wro. Yodit Imru Haileselassie

/the late ambassadress plenipotentiary to the Scandinavians/

Yodit Imru was the first female Ethiopian Ambassador. Her father was an exceptionaldiplomat and her brother, the late Mechael Imru, served as Prime Minister during the transition from the Imperial until the Duerg came to power. Born in former Harrarghe province, Yodit went on to study higher education in Addis Ababa and Jerusalem, in Israel and later at the American University in Washington DC for her higher education. She then began making waves while working at the Ministry ...of Foreign Affairs in 1953. With the encouragement of her family and the seasoned diplomat, Aklilu Habtewold, she had helped toestablish the United Nations Economic Commission for Africa (UNECA) and the former Organization of African Unity (OAU). As the Ethiopian designate ambassadress to the Scandinavian countries, she mentored young women entering to the field of politics in Ethiopia. Thanks in part to Yodit’s leadership as a trailblazer, there have been 13 other women promoted to the position of ambassadresses and career diplomats in the Ethiopian Foreign Affairs Ministry.

HISTORICIZE

The History of Anbassa City Bus Service Enterprise (ACBSE)

A city bus service is provided in Addis Ababa by the government controlled

Anbassa City Bus Services Enterprise ACBSE. ACBSE was created in July 1994 and was one of three successors to the Ethiopian Public Transport Company PTC (presumably part of the National Road Transport Corporation - General Ethiopian Transport, GET). The other successors were Waliya Inter-city Bus Service Enterprises, providing inter-city bus services, and Abbay Tecnical Enterprises for maintenance and repair services. "ANBASSA" is the Amharic word for "Lion", the former national symbol of the nation. The logo on the buses and tickets is a lion encircledby the word "Anbassa" in Latin script and "Lion" in Amharic script! Bus tickets have amharic and english texts, but the english only said "Addis Ababa City Buses" or "Addis Ababa surrounding".

The folllowing are observations from 1994/1995: No route maps were available in 1994/1995, nor did stop signs provide information. Buses often, but not always, displayed a route number. The price of a single journey within the city limits was 0.15 Birr, the equivalent of 0.03 US$, in1994 and 0.25 Birr in 1995. Prices were higher for suburban trips; a ticketfound said 0.30 Birr. Tickets were torn off a pad and were some 4 by 9 cm. They were in different colors; yellow with red text, blue with red or green with black text, etc. Tickets are sold by a conductor (often a woman) seated in a "cage" just before the most rearward door, which is the entrance door. The center and front doors were used as exits.
Someone can see one conductor selling her tickets through the window ofthe bus to passengers before they could board, apparently to avoid too much pushing inside! Buses carried good numbers of passengers, though overloading with passengers clinging to doors did not occur. A central busstation for city buses could be found in Adiss Ketema, a largeopen marketarea commonly known “markato”.

According to Jane's Urban Transport Systems 1983, there was a network of 34 routes covering 341 kilometers. There were 106 buses, mainly Mercedes Benz O321. In 1994 and 1995, buses of 4 different models wereseen, all painted bright orange-red with yellow window surroundings and roof. The oldest were FIAT 331A with Borsani bodywork. They had three doors, two between the axles and one behind the rear axle. These buses had a definite Italian look about them, but most were in a terrible state, especially the bodywork. Only a dozen or so seemed to be in service, numbered in the 800-series, the ones seen from 836 to 845.

Another old bus was a Mercedes Benz OF, probably also with an Italian bodywork, numbered 877. It ran empty during rush hour and was also ina bad state. The door layout was the same as that of the FIATs.

Somewhat newer was a series of Volvo B7F with Borsani bodywork of largely the same model and door layout as the FIAT buses. Most of the Volvo's had the completely worn out look over them with missing lights, holes in the bodywork and rust everywhere. One, however, had just beenrepainted and looked very neat. The problem really seemed to be the badquality of the Borsani bodywork, which rusted very easily. The Volvo's were numbered in the 200-series, the ones seen from 202 to 248. Some 25 seemed to be in service.

The bulk of the fleet belonged to five (according to license plate series) batches of nice and modern looking Mercedes Benz OF1621 with Belgian Jonckheere bodywork, delivered around the middle of the 1980s. These buses also had three doors, but the front door was placed before the frontaxle. The model was of Jonckheere's standard somewhat squarish export model, with large windows and reminiscent of the belgian standards of thelate seventies and eighties and known as the "Pacific". The five batches were numbered in the 251, 276, 5001, 5061 and 6001-series (seen: 252-275, 276-288, 5002-5056, 5061-5097, 6002-6020). The total number delivered was 160 (135 according to another source).

According to a DAF advertisement, a DAF TB2100-Neoplan Ghana bus wasdelivered to GET for Addis Ababa city services. A bus with folding doors and a front door in front of the first axle. A newspaper of February 2, 1995, announced that 35 German Mercedes buses had arrived and would soon be put into service, bringing the total number of buses to 200. No further information was given and no picture included, the exact model of the buses remains unknown and none were reported in 1998 so this batchmay have been used elsewhere.

The Government of the Netherlands provided DAF TB2100 buses and support twice through a grant. A first batch of 266 buses came between December 1995 and October 1997, a second batch of 150 buses was delivered around 2003. The bodywork of these buses was identical to theMercedes-Benz with Jonckheere bodywork delivered a decade earlier. In 2013 a program to refurbisch these buses started. This includes the installation of a Euro 2 engine coming from Egypt. 40 buses had been done by March 2014. They recieve, in addition to their existing fleet number, a number in the format R-xxx.

Earlier models included Mercedes-Benz O321 and Italian FIAT. Between1975 ad 1978 a total of 106 Ikarus 260 were delivered. Several other models have been identified from pictures, though no other infotmationhas been obtained so far.

Geopolitical developments are refelcted in the latest deloveries, which consist of Chinese built Huanghai buses. These are numbered in the 7000series for standard vehicles nad 8000-series articulated vehicles. The buses are assembled in Ethiopia. (Source: ACBSE)

'They call us crazy': a trip to Ethiopia's first space observatory

Multi-million dollar facility offers excellent views of Orion’s Belt – andopportunities to tackle climate change and famine

By Natasha Stallard in Entoto

Monday 21 March 2016 10.12 GMT Last updated

With its clear skies and closeness to the equator, Ethiopia is an ideal location for space exploration. Yet for a developing country facing its worst drought in 50 years, spending millions of dollars to look at the starsmight, at first, seem frivolous. “They call us crazy because they think we’re [only] exploring outer space and gazing at the stars. But they can’tsee the bigger picture,” says Abinet Ezra of the Ethiopian Space Science Society. Sitting in a roadside café near the Addis Ababa Institute of Technology, Ezra explains that the “bigger picture” means using space research to expand the economy, improve agriculture, fight climate change and create jobs.

The Ethiopian Space Science Society, which has recruited 10,000 members since being launched in 2004 by three aspiring astronomers, hasrecently opened east Africa’s only space observatory on the 3,200-metre summit of Entoto, overlooking Addis Ababa. The multi-million dollar Entoto Observatory and Research Centre has become one of the prime places to view Orion’s Belt – which appears larger and more pronounced here than from other parts of the northern hemisphere. The society wooeda series of government insiders and private donors, including the Saudi- Ethiopian billionaire Sheikh al Amoudi, to fund its research and pay for theobservatory – although the government took over running costs in March.

With 10 million Ethiopians at risk of famine, this might seem extravagant.But government officials and space enthusiasts say the same thing: that space science is essential for the country’s development, whether using earth observation to improve agriculture or lowering the costs of communications through the launch of its own satellites – which it currently rents from other countries for inflated sums. “It was our priorityto convince the government – now they have been convinced,” says Dr Solomon Belay Tessema, director of the Ethiopian Space Science Society and one of its founding members.

IMMIGRATION

Norwegian Organization for Asylum Seekers (NOAS) is defendingEthiopian Asylum Seekers in Norway who are at risk of deportation (March 21, 2016)

EXCERPTED FROM THE INTERVIEW WITH JON OLE M. SENIOR ADVISOR OF NOAS.
The interview focuses on the memorandum of understanding between Norway and Ethiopia to return Ethiopian asylum seekers whom the Norwegian government claims that they have got ‘’final rejection’’ for theirasylum seeking application in Norway. The memorandum of understandingbetween the two countries was signed in 2012.

The following points have been raised to the senior advisor of NOAS, JONOLE M.
1) How strong is your organization and how long has it planned to go to defend Ethiopian asylum seekers who have been strongly criticizing the Ethiopian government and are at a risk of deportation following the agreement between the two countries? 2) Does the memorandum of understanding between the two countries violate international conventions? 3) What’s your comment in regard to the responses of the Norwegian justice department for the 8 questions submitted by Ethio Norway TV and Radio? 4) How could you respond the current political unrest and human rights violation in Ethiopia? 5) Do NOAS and LandInfo have the same view on the existing Ethiopian political situation and human rights violations? 6) What is your advice on to the 800 Ethiopian asylum applicants who are at risk of deportation? 7) How hardships wouldbe for the 60 children whose are among the 800 Ethiopian asylum seekersunder a risk of deportation if they are deported back to Ethiopia?

NOAS’s senior adviser, Jon Ole M. requests the Norwegian appeal board toreconsider its decisions and grant a protection for Ethiopian asylum seekers who have been criticizing Ethiopian government which violates basic human rights at a daily basis. The Norwegian justice department hasalso confirmed that Norway doesn’t deport asylum seekers who deserve protection.

HSI; THE VICTIM & THE VICTOR:

Brief achievements of the last Solomonic dynasty in Ethiopia

Some of the salient achievements of His Imperial Majesty Haile Selassie's reign were - obtaining the Ethiopian Orthodox Church its own Patriarchy; securing Ethiopia’s independence and national integrity; gaining full international recognition and status for Ethiopia; modernizing the government administration; promulgating provincial autonomy; establishing the civil service; restoring Ethiopia’s legitimate access to the sea and returning Eritrea to the motherland; there were new ports new dams to to be opened, granting free education to ...all citizens including university; introducing a modern legal system and codification of the civil,commercial and penal codes; modernizing the police; creating a modern defense force (Army, Airforce and Navy); adopting quinquennial development plans diplomats came with foreign money and foreign aid; with the bankers establishing banking and financial institutions, an airline, telecommunications, a highway authority, shipping lines, ports, a refinery,hydro-electric dams and countless other projects. America trained the emperor’s army; Russia built schools; Israel provided technicians; India supplied teachers;Britain wrote doctors; France offered cultures; Germanysent trade missions to Ethiopia. Haile Selassie’s old empire had become Africa’s showcase and everyone want to do exhibit there.

OromoProtest

Government says Oromia has self-rule but activists vow tocontinue protests By Ludovica Iaccino March 23, 2016

People in Ethiopia's Oromia state already have self-rule and protesters' demands are already in place, an Ethiopian official told IBTimes UK. AbiyBerhane, minister counsellor at the Ethiopian embassy in London, made the comment as activists said they are still on the streets of Oromia calling for self-rule, the release of political prisoners and the end of military presence in the region.

Protests in Oromia began in November 2015 against a government draft plan to expand the boundaries of the capital Addis Ababa. Demonstrators,mainly from the Oromo ethnic group, argued the so-called "Addis Ababa master plan" would lead to forced evictions of Oromo farmers from their lands and would undermine the survival of the Oromo culture and language.

Who are the Oromo people?

The Oromo people are Ethiopia's largest ethnic group and their population amounts to more than 25 million (around 35% of Ethiopia'stotal population).

Oromo people speak Afaan Oromoo, as well as Amharic, Tigrinya, Gurangeand Omotic languages. They are mainly Christian and Muslim, while only 3% still follow the traditional religion based on the worshipping ofthe god, Waaq.

In 1973, Ethiopian Oromo created the Oromo Liberation Front (OLF), which stemmed from the discontent over a perceived marginalisationby the government and to fight the hegemony of the Amhara people,another large ethnic group in Ethiopia.

OLF – still active today – also calls for the self-determination of the Oromo people. It has been deemed as a terror organisation that carried out violent acts against people in Ethiopia, Somalia and Kenya. The group has always denied such allegations, claiming its missionis to terminate "a century of oppression" against the Oromos.

The government scrapped the master plan following increasing agitation which activists claimed led to the death of some 400 people, at least 200 according to a report by Human Rights Watch (HRW), released on 21 February.

The government denied the allegations of violence and claimed the deathtoll was much lower, but did not give a specific figure.

Berhane explained Ethiopian authorities conducted an assessment on theunrest and admitted they took slow steps in addressing people's legitimate grievances. "Had these demands been addressed quickly and effectively, dissident groups would not have been able to infiltratepeaceful protesters and instigate violence," he said.

"The government does not want to see any of its people die, even the death of one person is one is one too many. What the country needs first and foremost is peace. Inciting violence, creating division, comingup with horrific stories and posting those stories on social media does not help in any way."

Earlier in March, Prime Minster Hailemariam Desalegn apologised for thedeaths and destruction for which he blamed "anti-peace forces" thatinfiltrated demonstrations.

Self-rule already in place

Berhane claimed that people are ruling themselves in Oromia, wherethe official language is Oromo, people have their own regional parliament and run their own budget. "Political problems in Oromia and indeed in any other part of Ethiopia have been for the most partresolved. If there are any that are not resolved, the Constitution provides the mechanism for resolving them so there is no need for violent conflicts," he said.

However, Oromo activists who spoke to IBTimes UK denied Oromo people have self-rule in the region, claiming that Oromia's ruling party, OromoPeoples' Democratic Organization (OPDO), is an organisation of "ex- war captives" created by the Tigrayan People's Liberation Front (TPLF),a political party in Ethiopia's Tigray region.

Activists also denied violent people infiltrated protests, and alleged the government is cracking down on peaceful and unarmed demonstrators,including pregnant women and children. They also claimed the government declared martial law in Oromia, which they say is now divided into eight military divisions controlled by "ethnic Tigrean generals".

"It is because of the absence of self-rule that you see millions of farmers evicted and their land given to ruling party officials or foreign companies. The regime downplays the scale of questions raised as wellas the scale of the lethal forces used," Habtamu Dugo, an exiled Oromo journalist and US-based professor, said.

"Oromo are not able to elect their leaders in a free and fair election and the ruling party serves the interests of few ruling elites from the Tigrayregion. Although Afan Oromo is recognized on paper as a regional official language, people are demanding it to be made into one of the federal languages, since it is the most widely spoken language in Ethiopia."

Dugo, also a member of the Board of Directors of the Oromo StudiesAssociation, added that should alleged killings by security forces continue, Oromo people might start calling for secession, a right guaranteed by the Ethiopian constitution.

An Oromia-based activist who spoke to IBTimes UK on conditions of anoymity, denied the government of Oromia rules on its own budget.The source said: "While Oromia contributes 60% of Ethiopia's GDP, OPDO has to accept 70% of its recurrent and capital budget from theTPLF-dominated federal governement."

The source also alleged at least 40,000 Oromo people are currentlyimprisoned and many of them "had to suffer severe torture".

OPDO senior members demand Abay Tsehaye be brought to justice

ESAT News (March 22, 2016)

Senior members of the Oromo Peoples' Democratic Organization (OPDO), a member of the ruling coalition EPRDF, said at the end of a marathon meeting over the weekend that Abay Tsehay a senior member of the ruling TPLF, known for his offensive remarks against the people of Oromo,should be brought to justice. The OPDO members hold Abay Tsehaye responsible for the death of hundreds and the de...tention of thousands inthe protest in the Oromia region.

Notorious for his contempt and a person who never mince his words evenin public appearances, Abay Tsehay was on the record, at the start of the protest in the Oromia region four months ago, when he said that his partywould go ahead with the implementation of the controversial master plan of city expansion and that any oppositions to the plan would be crushed decisively. He said anyone who oppose the plan would be cut down to size.

Some members at the meeting said Abay Tsehaye was the enemy of the Oromo people and held him responsible for the loss of life in the Oromia region. They also held TPLF responsible for not taking corrective measuresagainst Abay and Getachew Reda, the government spokesperson, who also insult in public the people of Oromo who stood to fight for political and economic rights.

The statement by the OPDO members came as surprise to many and was a departure from their customary role of echoing the rhetoric of the rulingTPLF. The OPDO is seen by the people of Oromo as an organization riddledwith corruption and as an instrument for the TPLF's oppression of the Oromo people.

Months of protests are rattling a fragile federation

March 24, 2016

AN OUTBREAK of public protest unprecedented in its duration and spread since the ruling party took power in Ethiopia in 1991 is stirring a rare cocktail of discontent. Demonstrations started in November mainly by members of the Oromo ethnic group, which accounts for about a third of Ethiopia's 97m-plus people, have refused to die down. Indeed, they have spread. The government has dropped its plan, the original cause of the hubbub, to expand the city limits of Addis Ababa, the capital, into Oromia,the largest of the federal republic's subdivisions of nine regional states and two city-states. But the protests have billowed into a much wider expression of outrage. People are complaining about land ownership, corruption, political repression and poverty. Such feelings go beyond just one ethnic group.

Human-rights advocates and independent monitors reckon that at least 80people and perhaps as many as 250, mostly demonstrators, have been killed since the protests began. The government says the true figure is much lower and instead lays stress, as it always does, on terrorist and secessionist threats to the country's stability. It points out that foreign- owned factories have been attacked, churches burnt down and property looted by organized gangs during the protests. Last month seven federal policemen in the south were killed by local militiamen during a particularlyviolent wave of disturbances.

RELIEF EFFORTS

Wheat Destined for Ethiopia's Hungry Stuck in Port Logjams

By William Davison Bloomberg March 24, 2016

Food supplies flowing to Ethiopia during the country's growing hunger crisis are meeting a major challenge: they can't get to people fast enough.

Ethiopia is doubling its wheat purchases after the harshest drought in half a century, causing bottlenecks of ships at the country's main port in neighboring Djibouti. At least 10 vessels are waiting to unload about 450,000 metric tons of wheat, according to information on the port's website and ship-tracking data on Bloomberg. One carrying 50,000 tons ofwheat and sorghum is berthed.

"There's a whole bunch of ships that are lined up," John Graham, the Ethiopia director for Save the Children, said by phone from Dire Dawa onTuesday. "The numbers of berths allocated is not adequate so far."

Ethiopia, sub-Saharan Africa’s biggest wheat consumer, is grappling witha growing food problem as the lack of rain erodes harvests of everythingfrom sorghum to wheat, forcing the country to launch international tenders. Droughts in the country have become more frequent and severein the past decade, and the effects from El Nino weather patterns have wreaked havoc across many parts of Africa.

Congested Ports

It takes about 40 days to unload ships carrying grain, which is used to feed people in Ethiopia’s urban centers, according to Save the Children. Intotal, it can take around 120 days to purchase and transport food into thecountry through Djibouti, the British charity said in a February report.

In Ethiopia, among the world’s poorest countries, the number of people living with hunger has more than doubled since August to more than 10 million, according to the United Nations Food & Agriculture Organization.The number is higher when you add the 7.9 million supported by a government safety-net program. There are expected to be at least 450,000 severely malnourished Ethiopians this year, according to Save the Children.

The nation has historically struggled with hunger, including in the 1980s,when famine and civil war left hundreds of thousands of people dead.

Wheat Imports

In October, Ethiopia sought 1 million tons of wheat, more than it bought last season, according to estimates by the U.S. Department of Agriculture.Another tender for almost 500,000 tons will close on Friday.

"Of course it is congested," Mitiku Kassa, who heads Ethiopia’s disasterrelief agency, said by phone on Tuesday, adding that each berth at theport has the capacity to unload around 3,000 tons of grain a day. "However, fertilizer and wheat have been given due priority."

The Carly Manx vessel, scheduled to arrive at the port on Feb. 22, is onlynow berthed. The Ince Beylerbeyi, initially set to reach the port on Feb.

19, is still waiting to unload 54,250 tons of wheat.

Further purchases in the tender may add to long waiting times at the portof Djibouti, which land-locked Ethiopia uses to bring in supplies. Imports will jump to 2.5 million tons in the season ending in September, up from 900,000 tons a year earlier, the USDA estimates.

The government is adding trucks, and building distribution points and temporary warehouses to meet monthly food delivery targets, Mitiku said.The operation is also being delayed by regular government assessments ofwho the most needy are, Save the Children’s Graham said.
"There has been a slow start to food deliveries this year," Graham said."We still need to prepare for a spike in severe malnutrition."

ETHIOPA:Oromo protests continue amid harsh crackdown

By Simona Foltyn, Al Jazeera March 25, 2016

Addis Ababa, Ethiopia - At first sight, things seem to have returned to normality in the town of Ambo, 120 kilometres west of Ethiopia's capitalAddis Ababa. Few uniformed security forces are visible on the streets. People seem to go about their daily lives as usual.

But speak to almost any resident and a different picture emerges.
"We are living in a violent kind of peace," says an 18-year-old student, who does not want to reveal his name. Like many people interviewed forthis story, he fears he might end up in jail, or worse, for speaking his mind.

Ambo is perhaps best known for two things: Ethiopia's most popular mineral water, and its university, often a hot spot for anti-government demonstrations. Such displays of public dissent earned the town a reputation as the bastion of opposition in a country where the ruling partyand its allies took all 547 parliament seats in last year's election.

When people took to the streets in nearby Ginchi in November last year toobject about plans to requisition public land for an investment, residents in Ambo soon joined in. Demonstrations spread like wildfire across the vast Oromia region, feeding on decade-long frustrations over political andeconomic marginalisation.

As the protests intensified, so did accounts of police brutality amid what regime critics describe as a widespread and systematic government crackdown on opponents. Witnesses recount tales of killings, beatings andarbitrary arrests by an array of armed forces deployed to quell what had spiralled into Ethiopia's worst civil unrest in a decade.

The heavy-handedness of the government has further spurred anger among the Oromo. Earlier in March, students from Addis Ababa Universitymarched in protest towards the US embassy in the capital, demanding the end to police crackdowns.

Details of the crackdowns, mostly reported through social media and byactivists, have been difficult to verify. Restrictions on movement have made independent investigations risky for human rights workers and journalists alike. Two foreign journalists and their translator were recentlyarrested for covering the protests.

The 18-year-old student in Ambo told Al Jazeera that he was shot in his hand when the military opened fire at the protesting crowd. Even though his hand is healing, he hasn't returned to school in fear of intelligence officers, who are allegedly combing classrooms for those who took part in the protests. "They are still looking for people and taking them to prison," he said, trying to conceal the dressing on his hand to avoid attracting the attention of security personnel, who many think are roaming the streets incivilian clothing.

Silenced testimonies

Such testimonies stand in stark contrast from the image the country oftenpresents to the outside world. Ethiopia's state-led development plan has resulted in double-digit growth, improvement of key socio-economic indicators and has helped attract billions in aid. The country is also an important security ally for Western governments in the volatile Horn of Africa.

It's uncertain how many people have died in the clashes. Local observersput the figure at between 80 and above 200, while New York-based Human Rights Watch (HRW) estimates that well over 200 people may have lost their lives since November.

More than a dozen police officers have also been killed in the unrest. Protesters stand accused of attacking public buildings and burning thehouses of government officials.

The government has dismissed HRW's death toll as an exaggeration, but has yet to provide its own estimate. "We are already taking actions, except that we are not in a shouting match with the media or self- appointed human rights activists," said Getachew Reda, Ethiopia's ministerof Information.

The government has accused radical elements of stoking the unrest but asserts that investigations into the heavy use of force are under way. Yetmany Oromo say authorities have failed to take responsibility.

Four families of victims interviewed said no government officials had cometo investigate the deaths of their loved ones.

"The only time any government officials come here is to spy on us," saidWorku Bayi, the father of one of the victims killed in the protests, 22- year-old Aschalew Worku.

After his death, authorities reportedly accused Aschalew of being a member of the Oromo Liberation Front, an exiled opposition movementthat the ruling party has labelled a terrorist organisation.

Witnesses blame security forces for deliberately obstructing medical care for wounded protesters. Fitale Bulti, a resident of Ambo, watched her nephew bleed to death after he was allegedly shot by security forces. "The police wouldn't let us take him to the hospital," said Bulti. "For over an hour we just stood there, watching his blood run down the street." Hernephew, Ulfata Bulti, was only 12 years old.

Just across the street, Degeneh Shugi, 36, says he was stopped and beaten by security forces while on his way to work. Accused of participating in the protests, he was then taken to the police station alongwith 15 others, where he was held for four days. Degeneh's mother, Derebe Yirga, who is a member of the Oromo Federalist Congress opposition party, reportedly remains in police custody.

Rights groups and opposition leaders allege that thousands have been arrested in the most recent crackdowns, a scale that is reminiscent of mass arrests of opposition members during the turbulent aftermath (PDF)of the 2005 elections.

"There are several hundreds that have been detained from our party. Butwe don't know for sure, as we have lost a lot of communication," said Merera Gudina, chairman of the Oromo Federalist Congress opposition party in an interview in Addis Ababa. Gudina named five members of the party's top leadership who have been held or placed under house arrestssince protests began.

Al Jazeera contacted several officials in the Oromia regional government for comment, but was denied interviews amid rumours of internal reshuffling. Analysts and observers believe that the handling of the crisis has created a rift between the ruling TPLF, the lead party within the rulingcollation, and its allied OPDO party, charged with governing Oromia.

The OPDO's decision to halt a controversial "master plan" that governs theexpansion of the capital into Oromia, which is what initially sparked protests, has failed to put an end to the crisis. Many Oromo demand genuine reforms and justice for those killed.

"The government said it would stop the master plan just to calm the people. But what we need is a lasting solution to this crisis," said 23-year-old Gudisa Ragassa, the younger brother of another victim killed in Ambo."If the government can't do that, they shouldn’t be in power."

U.S. and Ethiopia Hold 6th Bilateral Democracy, Governance and HumanRights Working Group in Addis Ababa

Addis Ababa, Ethiopia, March 30, 2016:-

On March 29, the U.S. Ambassador to Ethiopia, Patricia Haslach, and the U.S. Assistant Secretary of State for Democracy, Human Rights, and Labor, Tom Malinowski, joined

State Minister of the Ministry of Foreign Affairs Ambassador Taye Atskeselassie to co-chair the 6th Bilateral Democracy, Governance and Human Rights Working Group. The Working Group provides an opportunity for representatives of the U.S. governmentand the government of Ethiopia to discuss frankly the full range of governance and human rights issues.

The discussion at this Working Group addressed a broad range of issues, including election related issues, the situation in the regions of Oromia and Amhara, the annual U.S. Human Rights Report, the important role of civil society in strengthening good governance, Ginbot 7, opportunities for media engagement and training, and the Extractive IndustriesTransparency Initiative (EITI), among others.

The government of Ethiopia reaffirmed its commitment to strengthen governance and political pluralism in keeping with the principles enshrinedin its constitution. The government of the United States welcomed the frank discussion and committed to support the efforts of Ethiopia’s government and society in meeting these challenges.

At the conclusion of the meeting the two governments agreed to increase the frequency with which this forum and the in depth discussion it enablesis held.

NEWS & OPINION

Open Letter to Supporters of the TPLF!By Hagos Alemayehu March 25, 2016

This is an appeal to all supporters but members of Tigrayan People's Liberation Front (TPLF). As you all know, TPLF is an organization led by very few corrupt, ruthless opportunists and thugs Ethiopia has never seenbefore. Since ascendance to power in 1991, TPLF has been looting public and private money and properties throughout Ethiopia day in and day outfor 9,125 days. These horrendous lootings and crimes have been perpetuated under the trade mark TPLF, which many supporters may think that it fights for their independence from Ethiopia—justifying thelooting and killing of Ethiopians since Ethiopia is not their country.

Do you (supporters of TPLF) really buy this nonsense propaganda that Tigray is not part of Ethiopia? It is true that TPLF is Tigrayan People's Liberation Front. In direct translation into Amharic, it stands for "yetigray hizb netsa awechi ginbar". This naming clearly describes the INTENT and ACTIONs of TPLF since its birth. That is, Hatred to all Ethiopians but Tigrayan people Stealing all types of movable items and shipping them away, or taking the higher share (monopoly in some cases) from immovable resources (e.g., land in Gambela, Omo Valey, Addis Abeba andits surrounding areas, Northern Gondar, etc) Waging war against Eritrea and sacrificing 70,000 precious young Ethiopians for sake of keeping a small village (Badma) which happens to be in Tigray. In contrast, TPLF is in the process of giving away a much larger Ethiopian area (not in Tigray!)to Sudan.

TPLF Controlling the "government apparatus" from A to Z (98% of Military, 100% of police and security leaders , Ethiopian Airlines and communication, … by TPLF members) to facilitate the looting. Killing children, elders, women and peaceful demonstrators (none of them armed) by TPLF, which has been much worse than Derg's killings in the sense that Derg was in fierce fight with armed groups (TPLF, EPLF, EPRP, EDU). Using private homes, offices, storage facilities, and several unknown (to public) places as prisons to jail political dissenters and lettingsome die there—just to show that they're different from Derg who was killing openly—murder is murder, not seen or heard elsewhere except perhaps during Nazis. For any layman in Addis Abeba or rural regions, thename "yetigray hizb netsa awechi ginbar" is easy to understand politically and also connect the dots of the INTENTs and daily ACTIONs of TPLF under the cover of 'government'. It always surprises me that when political oppositions and others refer to yetigray hizb netsa awechi ginbar (TPLF) they use names that are meaningless politically. That is, "Weyane"and "hiwehat" are completely meaningless in describing the INTENT and ACTIONs of TPLF. "Weyane" was used by the former Derg people. Nobodyknows why they used it as it does not replace yetigray hizb netsa awechi ginbar.

Still now, I see some people using it. If the word "Weyane" describes thetrue INTENT and ACTIONs of TPLF, that would have been great! But it does not, unfortunately. Even though slow to come, there is good news. Recently, oppositions have completely dropped EPRDF (another cover foryetigray hizb netsa awechi ginbar) when they refer to the current ruling regime in Ethiopia. That is a great achievement politically since everyoneknows who the real thugs are behind the screen. It is an improvement togo from EPRDF to "hiwehat" to try to call a spade a spade. But, there is aproblem. The name "hiwehat" is still confusing; it does NOT directly describe the INTENT and ACTIONs of TPLF. TPLF people love it because it is another cover for their evil doings! When you use a word (orally or in writing), your intention is to convey an idea or message. Those opposing TPLF, think how "hiwehat" is understood by a farmer (85% farmers in Ethiopia). But, instead of "hi-we-ha-t", the direct translation ye-tigray hizbnetsa-awechi-ginbar is much easier to be understood by ordinary people (who hate any group with an INTENTION of separation or LIBEATION FRONT) and directly get the INTENT and ACTIONs of TPLF. Members of TPLF are afraid of this particular naming (ye-tigray-hizb-netsa-awechi- ginbar) because it exposes them domestically.

But, they love to keep the name TPLF for foreign consumption only. By keeping TPLF as their trade mark, they get support from some countrieswhich do not want the unity and existence of independent Ethiopia. It ishigh time to call TPLF by its domestic name, ye-tigray hizb netsa awechiginbar; just call a spade a spade!

ECONOMIC AFFAIRS

Ethiopian scholar warns country's overstretched economy risks collapse By ANDUALEM SISAY in Addis Ababa, Saturday, March 26 2016

The Ethiopian government's growing reliance on foreign loans is posing a serious risk of economic collapse, a paper presented Friday by a renownedlocal economist says.

"Take for instance China, which has loaned over $17 billion to the Ethiopian government for infrastructure projects. Our total investment is40 per cent of GDP. Our savings rate is between 10-20 per cent of GDP.We import $13 billion and export $3 billion. They (China) are the ones who are filling all these deficit gaps," said Alemayehu Geda, economics professor at Addis Ababa University and London University.

He was presenting a paper in Addis Ababa on Foreign Direct Investment (FDI) to Ethiopia and credit financing. This was at the launching of a two-year series of public dialogues by Forum for Social Studies – a local civil society group partially financed by the United Kingdom's Department for International Development (DfID).

"What will happen if they (China) stopped such funding tomorrow? What iffor instance the Chinese government tomorrow says sell for me Ethio Telecom or sell to me Ethiopian Airlines or give me some share or buy myairplanes or I will stop such credit financing? The country will collapse, I guarantee you," he said.

"About 77 per cent of our imports are strategic imports. Fuel only accounts for a 25 per cent share of the total import bill. As a result, evenif we want to decrease imports, we can't. Ethiopia needs to minimise its strategic vulnerability," Prof Alemayehu said, mentioning as an example how Koreans avoided such dependency risks when they used to source 75per cent of their imports from the United States some decades ago.

Vulnerability

"The Koreans came out of such vulnerability risks after analysing their situation properly, discussing the issue with their intellectuals and settinglong-term plans," he said, advising the Ethiopian government to invest inquality education, quality skilled labour and have in place well-designed policies.

Official estimates show that Ethiopia's economy has been growing by double digits every year for the last decade and has now reached $54billion, but some independent scholars doubt this.

In his paper, Prof Alemayehu indicated that Ethiopia's external loan includes $17.6 billion from China for various infrastructure constructions,around $3 billion from Turkey and close to $1 billion from India.

In addition, he pointed out, from 2012 to 2016 the country had takenloans totalling close to $6 billion from the World Bank.

Last year, Ethiopia also accessed a Eurobond worth $1.5 billion.

Statistics also show that in addition to loans some $3 billion more annuallycomes to the country in the form of donor aid.

Insignificant

When it comes to the FDI coming from China, India and Turkey, close to 71 per cent of their investment in Ethiopia is in the manufacturing sector.

Meanwhile the results in terms of job creation, technology transfer and export contribution is insignificant for Ethiopia, which has over 90 million people dominated by youth with a 16 per cent unemployment (the officialrate), according to Prof Alemayehu.

Between 2003-2012, there were 93 Chinese companies which had reportedly invested $600 million creating around 69,000 permanent and79,000 temporary jobs for Ethiopians, but with very little contribution totechnology transfer and foreign currency generation through exports.

According to the scholar, during the same period Indian investments in Ethiopia created 24,000 permanent and 26,000 temporary jobs while 341Turkish companies operating in Ethiopia created a total of 50,000 jobs.

Though much is talked about Chinese investment growing in Africa, the Chinese have less than 4 per cent of total share of FDI in Africa; out of the total of Africa's $554 billion FDI inflow in 2010, the majority of the investments were from Western companies, claimed, Prof Alemayehu.

Slowing growth

Prime Minister Hailemariam Desalegn this week told local media that Ethiopia's GDP growth will not be expected to grow by double digits thisyear and will likely drop to around 7 per cent. However, his special economic adviser, Dr Arkebe Equbay, reportedly was telling Bloomberg media that the country is expected to grow by 11 per cent this year.

Now the government is faced with the puzzle of why the economy is not performing as well as previous years despite all the generous incentives toinvestors and huge infrastructure investments dependent on local and external loans.

And that is not to mention other priorities that call for attention, like feeding millions in drought-stricken regions as well as dealing with politicalunrest in Oromia region and Gondar in Amhara region. Clearly, Ethiopia is over-stretched.

PERSONAL VIEWS

TPLF rebels went to the bush to liberate their ethnic group notEthiopia Lead Activist Obang Metho March 27, 2016

When the ethnic apartheid rebels of the TPLF went into the bush, they were motivated to do so in order to liberate their own ethnic group andregion. The TPLF did not fight for the interest of Ethiopia, to liberate Ethiopia or for the well being of the Ethiopian people, but only for theirown tribal interests.TPLF officials of the Ethiopian regime.

Their cousins, the Eritrean Peoples' Liberation Front (EPLF), did the same.The EPLF went to fight for the interest of Eritreans who wanted to divide their region from Ethiopia. Many other groups were the same; for example, the Oromo Liberation Front fought for the interests of the Oromo. The same was duplicated by the people of Gambella, the Ogaden,Benishangul, Afar and elsewhere.

When the Dergue fell, had there been a body that represented the national interests of all Ethiopians, these self-appointed TPLF tribal leaderswould have not had such an easy time to take over. The people of Ethiopia missed their opportunity and the tribal interests took over and remain in competition with everyone else.

Over the last 25 years, the TPLF have been promoting their tribal agenda and are not there for the national interests of the Ethiopian people. As a result of their narrow ethnic apartheid policy, they have not only put themselves at great risk of downfall, but in doing so, when they fall, if it isdone in the wrong way, it could jeopardize all of the people of Ethiopia.

This makes it imperative for the people of Ethiopia to come up with the body that cares for the well being of the entire people so we might make away for a different kind of transition. No one ethnic group will be free untilwe all are free.

Right now, Ethiopians have been divided by tribe; people don't talk to each other, but only about each other. As previously mentioned, Ethiopians from all over the world express their fear that Ethiopia could turn into a Rwanda. This is the fruit of the tribal policy—its inevitable conclusion.

May He help us to see the beauty of the God-given humanity in others forthen we will not be limited by our differences.

Aba Dula, Driba Kuma restricted and under surveillance

Ethiomedia By Dimetros Birku March 28, 2016

Speaker of the House of representative, Aba Dula Gemeda, and Addis Ababa mayor Driba Kuma are reportedly restricted in their movement andsubject to surveillance.

Golgul, online Amharic News, published a narrative that Aba Dula andDriba are already dispossessed of their passports – a move that is believed to deter possible travel out of Ethiopia.

Aba Dula Gemeda was in the news criticizing government, to which he is apart, publicly for the massacre of dozens of student protestors against Addis Ababa Master Plan.

Restriction on Driba Kuma is possibly related to same reason. The report by Golgul added that OPDO authorities at the level of zone administrationare also under close surveillance by intelligence operatives of the government.

If the report is true, it may mean clear indication of tension between the dominant Tigray People's Liberation Front (TPLF) and influential members and authorities of Oromo Peoples Democratic Organization (OPDO) which is one of the members of the ruling coalition EPRDF. Greater majority of OPDO membership is said to have opposed the Addis Ababa Master plan. According to Golgul, leadership of OPDO is filled by a generation politicizedwith the ideology of ethnic politics – a factor poised to prove a challenge to TPLF Absolutism within the ruling coalition.

OPDO is reportedly undertaking evaluation of membership and executivesof the party,according to the report. It is not secret that TPLF, the minority political entity in the ruling coalition , wields real power-economic, military and political, and is dominating state apparatus and key government positions.

Golgul hinted that there could be multiples of arrests of high rankingOPDO officials upon completion of evaluation within OPDO.

The Ethio-Norway forced repatriation agreement four years later

By Samson Seifu March 28, 2016

It is to be recalled that Norway (the previous Red-Green coalition government) and the repressive regime in Ethiopia (which is in power forover 25 years) signed a five years bounded memorandum of understanding in January, 2012 with the aim of forcefully repatriating theEthiopian asylum seekers in Norway. This agreement has been met and contested with fierce protests from a number of angles such as among others:

The asylum seekers themselves through their association called ‘’EthiopianAsylum Seekers Association in Norway’’;

The Ethiopian Community in Norway;

The Task Force against Forced Repatriation of Ethiopian Asylum Seekers inNorway;

A court case initiative by Professor Girum Zeleke against the Norwegiangovernment both in Oslo, Norway and the European Court of Human Rights (ECHR) in Strasbourg, France;

The Norwegian Organization for Asylum Seekers (NOAS);Association of January 12;

Amnesty International, Norway;

Norway based Ethiopian oppositions’ support organizations and Ethiopiansall over the world.

These protest voices played a very instrumental role in preventing the implementation of the infamous forced repatriation of the Ethiopian Asylum Seekers to one of the world’s worst repressive regime. As a resultof all these efforts, up to the present time no meaningful implementation of the agreement has been effected.

However; what has become an eye brows raising matter once again is therecent appearance of the Undersecretary of the Ministry of Justice, Mr.

Joran Kallmyr, in one of the country’s TV, Radio and internet broadcasting agency called NRK where the minster pinpointed his successful working visit (9 February 2016) in Ethiopia in connection with the reinstating of thealready signed agreement which has been ineffective so far. As a result of the mutual communique between the two, it has been mentioned that the two sides agreed to begin the forced repatriation.

Honoring Dictatorship and Repression

The new incumbent conservative government which is a coalition of the two far right parties of the blue party (Høyre) & the progressive party (FrP) as its foreign policy considers Ethiopia its focus country for aid- recipient, contrary to its previous promises to focus on the regime's basic human-rights violations. The prime minister's party, i.e. the blue party's representative in 2013 had promised his parties commitment to challengethe human rights abuses of the regime in Ethiopia in a public debate with the then incumbent government's representative where he criticized the unjust practices of the then government when it comes to Ethiopia. But what is being observed and practiced is the opposite of what has been promised that is rewarding the human-rights abuses of the TPLF regime inEthiopia once again by the new government.

Norway needs to reconsider its policy of co-operating with the repressive regime: The regime in Ethiopia employs all forms of brutal means in orderto cling on to power. The ''forced repatriation of Ethiopian asylum seekers'' is one of the means to silence the Ethiopians' opposition to the miseries being committed by the repressive regime. These asylum seekers are very active in exposing the regime's atrocities to the Norwegian public in particular and the world community in general thereby playing a pivotal role by becoming a voice for the voiceless Ethiopians at home who are suffering in the hands of their brutal rulers. The Norwegian government has a moral responsibility and an obligation ofrespecting the international human rights law of not putting the lives of Ethiopian asylum seekers into danger by forcefully surrendering them to aregime which is very well known for its brutal deeds against its opponentsin the last 25 years.

The political Situation in Ethiopia

The TPLF regime after having claimed a 100% victory in the 2015 country-wide parliamentary election, which is an embarrassing improvement from the previous parliamentary election in 2010 where theTPLF regime claimed a 99.6% victory, has completely controlled the country. The regime among a number of other evil doings has:

1. Opened fire and killed peacefully demonstrating people,
2. Incarcerated journalists, bloggers, political activists and religiousactivists on bogus accusations,
3. Closed down all critical free-presses,
4. Prevented the different opposition political organizations fromholding public meetings and peaceful demonstrations,
5. Stifled political opportunities to the people,

The opposition seems to have lost all hopes for a fair political playground and completely abandoned the so called peaceful and legal opposition andopted for other means of struggles like armed resistance.

The Role of the Ethiopian Diaspora in Norway

The TPLF regime is getting it extremely difficult to pursue its diaspora politics to what it calls ‘’the silent majority diaspora Ethiopian community’’due to a strong political opposition from the Ethiopian diaspora. Especiallyin Norway, it has almost been impossible to conduct any fundraising eventby the regime’s operatives thanks to the fierce resistance waged by the Ethiopians residing in Norway in which the Ethiopian asylum seekers are apart and parcel.
The regime’s operatives living in Norway tried two failed fundraisingactivities in 2013 both in Oslo and Stavanger for the so called ‘’Nile renaissance dam project’’.

The task force set up by the ‘’Democratic Change in Ethiopia Support Organization, Norway (DCESON) mobilized Ethiopians and successfully thwarted the planned fundraising events in Oslo and Stavanger (20 and28 April 2013 respectively).

TPLF agents were furious to retaliate the failed fundraising events for ‘’theGrand Millennium Dam Project on the Blue Nile River’’ they planned to organize in Stavanger and Oslo in April 20 and 28, 2013 respectively. Thistime they planned to sabotage the fundraising event organized by the opposition support organizations in Norway to support the armed resistance against the regime in Ethiopia.

The TPLF agents bluffed the Nordberg Church administration by threatening to stage a huge protest demonstration at the church compound if the fundraising event is allowed to be conducted as planned. They also fabricated a false story to a daily newspaper called Vårt Land in order to get it published just a day before the event day with the news of the cancellation of the fundraising event as confirmed by the administratorof the Nordberg church, Olav Lende. The TPLF agents’ website known as "abesha" ’’ published the cancellation of the fundraising event stating and citing the story was covered by Vårt Land internet newspaper. It was the TPLF agents who tipped off the misleading information to the news outlet Vårt Land Avis in the first place.

The Task Force in anticipation of the possible attempt to sabotage and thwart the fundraising event by the TPLF agents and operatives in Norwayhad a second plan (Plan-B) which had been kept secret until the event day i.e. 28 September 2013. The fundraising event was successfully conductedwithout any disruption at a venue envisaged as per Plan-B at Galgeberg Meeting Hall.

The successful accomplishment of the fundraising event was broadcastedto the Ethiopian People both at home and in Diaspora by ESAT Radio andTelevision both in headlines and full reportage. The famous anti- Government Paltalk media ECADEF and Zehabesha.com have also postedabout the fundraising event on their websites.

A Tale of Two Visions Over the Weekend!

Fekade Sewakena (PhD) March 29, 2016

The past weekend in Washington DC has had two remarkable communityevents. The first is the two day conference organized by Vision Ethiopia and ESAT. The second is a play entitled the "Vision of Emperor Thewodros" organized by Taitu Center led by Alemtsehay Wodajo ".

I attended both but I had to miss the last session of Vision Ethiopia's conference to do so. I drove as fast as I could from the conference centerto the theater and made i...t just on time to watch the play. Both were magnificent events but the timing was unfortunate for those of us who want to be at both events. Vision Ethiopia's Conference was a bridge building conference between Oromo and Amhara and other scholars. Bothduring and in between the presentations, discussions were held with openmind and frankness and serious concern for the future of Ethiopia. I saw agood bridge building conference. I am sure the next conference will be bigger and diverse in terms of presenters and attendance. I hope ESAT has the conference on video and they will make it available to the larger public. Don't miss it then.

The play organized by Taytu Center "Thewodros's Vision" was one hell ofan event attended by people who packed the auditorium. I have rarely seen such a big attendance of an event in the past several years. Many were turned at the gate for lack of space. We saw a wonderful play that transported us over a hundred fifty years back into our history. Actors, agood number of whom came direct from Ethiopia, were great and playedthe story beautifully.

I enjoyed every minute of it. Huge applause to Alemtsehay Wodajo, our heroine who made this happen. Our community in North America, particularly those of us in Washington DC should say thank you to her. Iknow what she does is a labor of love. She benefits no material out of it.But it means huge for us. We should support her morally and materially.

US, Ethiopia hold talks on human rights and governance, PatrioticGinbot 7 on the agenda ESAT News (March 31, 2016)

US Assistant Secretary of State for Democrac...y, Human Rights, and Labor Tom Malinowski who traveled to Ethiopia on Tuesday as part of a follow-up on president Obama’s July visit to Addis Ababa had held discussions with Ethiopian government officials on issues of human rightsand governance.

The US Assistant Secretary met with State Minister of Foreign Affairs Ambassador Taye Atskeselassie to co-chair the 6th Bilateral Democracy,Governance and Human Rights Working Group, according to a press release issued by the US Embassy in Addis Ababa.

Details are scanty but on the agenda at the table was also Patriotic Ginbot7, an armed group based in Eritrea, the ongoing protest in the Oromia region and public discontent and uprising in the Amhara region.

A major donor to the Ethiopian government, the US has been under criticism for not using its leverages on the tyrannical regime, one of the world's leading jailers of journalists. An ally of the US against the fundamentalists in the Horn of Africa, the minority government has gottenaway with extrajudicial killings, mass incarceration and attack on the press. Ethiopia opposition say arrests aimed at deterring future protests

By Aaron Maasho: April 4, 2016

An Ethiopian opposition group said on Friday that police had arrested more than 2,600 people in the last three weeks for taking part in landprotests and that the government was thereby aiming to deter future protests.

Plans to requisition farmland in the Oromiya region surrounding the capitalfor development sparked the country's worst unrest in over a decade, withrights groups and U.S.-based dissidents saying as many as 200 people may have been killed.

An opposition coalition said the arrests over protests in the four monthsup to February came despite government assurances of clemency.

Representatives of the government were not immediately available forcomment.

Authorities scrapped the land scheme in January and pledged not to prosecute the demonstrators, while Prime Minister Hailemariam Desalegnissued an apology in parliament last month saying his administration would work to address grievances over governance.

Despite the pledges, the Ethiopian Federal Democratic Unity Forum (MEDREK) said 2,627 people have since been "illegally rounded up" andremain under custody.

"It is an act of reprisal," MEDREK's chairman Beyene Petros told Reuters.

"The whole purpose why they are increasing their witchhunt is to simplystop the public from planning or initiating any future public protest," he added.

The coalition said in a statement that the arrests took place in 12 differentareas of Oromiya, Ethiopia's largest region by size and population.

The second-most populous nation in Africa with 90 million people, Ethiopiahas long been one of the poorest countries in the world per capita, but hasmade strides toward industrialization, recording some of the continent's strongest economic growth rates for a decade.
But reallocating land for new developments is a thorny issue in a countrywhere the vast majority of the population still survives on small farms.

Ethiopian regime has a 25-years-long bloody legacy
April 4, 2016 By Degefe Hailu
The Committee to Protect Journalists says only Syria had a higher numberof journalists forced into exile between 2010 and 2015 than Ethiopia.
“Nations cannot realise the full promise of independence until they fully protect the rights of their people,” Barrack Obama, president of the UnitedStates, said on tour to Kenya and Ethiopia last year. This is ironic, because on that trip he failed to criticise human rights abuses by the Ethiopian government, which he hailed as “democratically elected”.

Ethiopians are very familiar with the government’s attempts to oppress any opposition. The Tigrayan People’s Liberation Front (TPLF) government took power in 1991. All opponents are persecuted as terroristcollaborators.

Today, Ethiopia stands as a nation in contempt of human rights. Accordingto the Committee to Protect Journalists, Ethiopia has the second highest number of journalists forced into exile between 2010 and 2015 after Syria.

Evidence of the denial of freedom of expression includes the arrest and incarceration of Zone 9 bloggers in 2014. Their name is a reference to theeight divisions of the infamous Kaliti Prison — suggesting that Ethiopia as whole is effectively the jail's ninth division. The arrest of the bloggers for publication of news and opinion pieces that were critical of the government and its repressive entourage exposed the country's non- existent due process.

Last June, Andargachew Tsige, the secretary-general of Ginbot 7, a groupbanned for allegedly advocating the armed overthrow of the Ethiopian government, was deported to Ethiopia from Yemen while in transit to Eritrea. This transfer violated international law prohibiting sending someone to a country where they are likely to face torture.

Tsige has been detained without access to family members, legal counselor consular representation, which he is entitled to as a British citizen. Hisdetention location, to date, is unknown.

Terrorising those who publically criticise the government's endeavours, however, is not limited to media outlets. In April 2015, peaceful protestsin Oromia over the government's planned expansion of the Addis Ababa municipal boundary were met with excessive force, including shootings. Many protesters perished, while others continue to be detained without charge.

Protest against displacement from land and family is not new to Ethiopia.
Under the "villagisation program" 1.5 million rural people have been relocated under the guise of improving their access to basic services. Oneexample of this forced displacement is in the Gambella region, for which relocation was accompanied by insufficient compensation and consultations, and violence including beatings and arbitrary arrests. This was just in the first-year of the "villagisation program".

In subsequent years, 200,000 indigenous persons from 240,000 hectaresof land in the lower Omo Valley were displaced without compensation or consultation, due to the government's development of sugar plantations. The clearance of land, sold to foreign interests, year-in year-out has linedthe pockets of the government, without regard for the region, or the Ethiopian people in general.

Inherent in this inculcating of terror, is the need to maintain the status quo. This is evident in the landslide victory in June 2015 of the ruling party and its insipid allies. The Ethiopian People’s Revolutionary Democratic Front, a rebrand of the TPLF, overwhelmingly ejected the onlyopposition parliamentarian from office.

“This result was completely expected, there is no multi-party system in Ethiopia. It’s just fake,” said Taye Negussie, a sociology professor at AddisAbaba University.

President Obama’s visit to Kenya and Ethiopia was to whitewash acontinent.

US collaboration with the TPLF, a party that has expelled all opposition and is dedicated to a reign of pure terror, has a long history — Obama andthree of his predecessors have visited.

The people in the Horn of Africa can live in harmony and in peace, and flourish through the development of a stable region, without the need forforeign interference.
The mission to oust the oppressive regime in Ethiopia, is aimed to stop aculture of fear and suspicion, especially if we want to enter into a seriousproblem-solving dialogue.

We need to be united participants of the political process and not thesubjects of a repressive and terrorising government, to address our problems genuinely and solve them definitively. Source: greenleft

Imperial Ethiopia

The Jubilee renamed National Palace

The Jubilee Palace seen through the main gates. The palace was built to commemorate the Emperor's silver jubilee in 1955. Like the Menelik Palace, it was considered crown property while the Emperor's primary residence at the Guenete Leul Palace was his personal property that he inherited from his father. However following the massacre in the Green Salon of the Genete Leul Palace during the 1960 coup attempt by GeneralMengistu Neway and his brother Girmame Neway, the Emperor decided tomove his residence into the Jubilee Palace. It remained his primary residence after that, as he decided to give the Guenete Leul to the University as its main campuses.

The Jubilee Palace was where the Derg deposed the Emperor, and from where they removed him into imprisonment. The Derg renamed the palace as the National Palace and used the palace for some ceremonial events. When the EPRDF took power and proclaimed the Federal Republicof Ethiopia, the made this palace the official residence of the largely ceremonial President of Ethiopia.

The History of Ethiopian Student Movements

The Student movements of the University College of Addis Ababa and the latter Haile Selassie I University (HSIU) had started their first phase of struggle in the 1950s to ensure freedom for a free press and free trade unions. "The University College Calls" forum and the "News & Views" which made its appearance in 1959 significantly served the role of medium or vehicle to disseminate the students voice. At the campus level,the students struggled against the authoritarian college administration of the Jesuit Fathers. At the national level however, the students decided to flame a popular struggle against the despotic imperial rule. The later struggle took a radical nature since the mid-1960s which continued to contribute toward the imperial debacle in September 1974.

The monopolization of land by the landlords, during the imperial regime, was not radically challenged until the year 1965. This was following the tenancy bill which was, for the first time, presented to the imperial parliament in 1964 and due to the obstruction it faced in in the imperial parliament which dominantly represented by the landlords, the Universitystudents underscored a political act in 1965 under the theme "Land to theTilller" (Meret Larashu), which that implemented later by the Provisional Militay Administratice Council (PMAC), commonly known as the Duerg regime in March 1975.

The legendary saxophonist passed away at 81

Getatchew Mekuria the legendary saxophonist passed away of natural sickness today, the 4th April 2016 at the age of 81. Getatchew Mekuria had a musical career of 68 years. He was a truely unique saxophone player. Born in the countryside of Ethiopia, he heard the saxophone on theradio at the age of 13 and went to Addis Abeba straight away. He wanted to play saxophone! And soon after that he got himself into the MunicipalityBand. Later he played in the Haile Selassie Orchestra's, the National Theatre Orchestra and more.

Since 2004 he played regularly with The Ex. It was his choice after hearing us at one of our festivals. He recognized something in our musicwhich reminded him of the early groups he was in, like the Fetan Band (Speed Band). He loved playing with us and for us it was also an incredible experience. He was always totally himself, full-on intense anddedicated. We played more than 100 concerts and made two beautiful albums together.

The last few years, his health was not very good. He couldn't really go on tour anymore. As a kind of farewell concert for his fans, we organized a big event in the National Theatre in Addis Abeba. He got lots of attention and respect that night: 1500 people in the audience, three TV stations anda legendary concert. Getatchew was playing while sitting on a chair, but his playing was stronger than ever.

His whole life was filled with music. With his unique sound and approachhe leaves behind an eternal inspiration! We will miss him. Getachew Mekuria was one of the great saxophone players of Ethiopia.

ETHIO TELECOM to charge for VoIP apps’

Using Voice over Internet Protocol (VoIP) applications free of charge may no longer be possible as Ethio Telecom is in th...e process of implementing new technology that would charge users for services such as Viber and Whatsapp. (ኢትዮቴሌኮም በቫይበር ዋትሳፕና ሌሎች የኢንተርኔት መገናኛ ዘዴዎችን ሊያቋርጥ እንደሚችል ተነገረ። የኢትዮጵያ ቴሌኮምእነዚህን የኢንተርኔት ኣፕሊኬሽኖች ተጠቃሚዎችን ክፍያ ሊጠይቅነ ው።)

According to Andualem Admassie, CEO of the telecom company, a new technology called Policy Charge and Control system (PCC) will be implemented to control VoIP services that people use via the telecom operator's network. "We are not saying we will ban these services. We willimplement this technology so that we can control the use of these servicesthrough our network," the CEO stated. He also said that the technology would allow the telecom company charge for the VoIP services.

Although the use of VoIP applications is not technically free as it would still require the use of an internet connection provided by the telecom monopoly, Ethio Telecom has stated that it has been losing revenue due to the applications. Services provided by applications such as Viber, WeChat and Whatsapp are popular amongst people as they are a cheaperalternative to connecting with friends and families as compared to a directcall. To curb the inflow of untaxed mobile phone apparatus entering the country illegally, Ethio Telecom is also implementing another technology called Equipment Identity Register (EIR).

"This technology will have the capacity to not only shut down the sim-cardbut also stop the apparatus from working, it will be out of the network system completely. This system is also good because if a person's phone is stolen, the owner can shut the system down so that the stolen phone cannot be used," said Andualem.

The implementation of the technology expected to be in effect as soon aswithin weeks will mean that phones that came into the country without being taxed, may not be able to function. "Once this technology is implemented, shops that sell phone apparatus and distributors that have phones in their possession that have entered the country illegally will become useless because they will not work. With regards to the phones that are already in the hands of our customers, we are discussing if we should buy new mobiles and provide it to them or leave the ones that arealready in use and focus on the new phones entering the country," Andualem also said.

The CEO further underlined that before the technology is implemented, there will be discussions held with stakeholders to make sure the move is understood clearly. Ethio Telecom (et) has targeted to amass 38 billion birr of gross revenue in the current budget year. According to its half-yearperformance, the enterprise has amassed 10.09 billion birr of gross profit,meeting 111 percent of its target.

Aiming to accumulate significantly more revenue than its 21.5 billion intake in the past budget year, the enterprise is expanding the supply of mobile and landline phone apparatus. It also targets to boost mobile network access to 113 million people in the GTP II period, while the actualsubscription is expected to be

Broadband internet data subscription is projected to grow to 39 million bythe end of GTP II, which currently stands at 3.2 million. Comparing with the end of the past year the broadband internet users have significantly increased in the first six months of the current budget year.

Until June 2015 the number of broadband internet subscribers was 1.9 million. Mobile internet data coverage will also reportedly grow from 8.5 million to 16.9 million users, while overall internet data coverage is forecasted to reach 10 percent from 3.3 percentage of the end of last GTP.The technology that would see VoIP service users charged is expected to be implemented within the next couple of months.

In memory of my working visit to India

Majour Dawit Wolde Giorgis on Moraji Desai (the late) of formerprimeminister of India

This is a time when I met the Prime Minster of India (1977-1979), MorajiDesai and the Indian activist who was well known for his disciplined life style. All his life he drank his own urine routinely.

It might seem strange but read the following! I did ask him how I admirehis disciplined life and hoped to learn from him He simply said I will teachyou my son….

'Urine is not a waste. It is an Ultra filtrate of blood plasma. It acts as a feedback mechanism for our body. I started researching about this topicwhen I found that 2 of my grandfather's first cousins who used to drink their own urine lived well till 100 years of age. I read that Urine therapy isan effective scientific (based on Quantum mechanics view of body) treatment for almost all diseases. Current medical science is still based onan obsolete atomic model as explained in the book What Doctors Don't Get To Study At The Medical School." Did Moraji Desai befit from it?
Probably because he lived a healthy 100 years. If you want to know more read at, www.quora.com/Why-did-the-Indian-Prime-Minister-Morarji-Des…

Regional Geo-politics Analysis

The Long Game of the Saudis and Ethiopia

By Medhane Tadesse

The Saudis have been radicalizing the hinterland and are now militarizing the borderlands i.e. the Red Sea and the rest of it. The only difference thistime around is the unambiguous projection of hard power. As is usually the case I was asked to give a presentation on Jihadist movements in Africa. Seeing statements such as the new Saudi threat to Ethiopia or the Horn of Africa by regional observers gave me an abrupt comeback to the same urgings I have been making for more than a decade about what I call as Corporate Radicalization, that is Saudi Arabia and the threat it poses to the region. It also gave me a rush of intense memories and emotions, for it was here that I spent the last fifteen years. So, this presentation, though provoked by a talk I recently gave at a forum provided by Wilton Park and African Leadership Centre might look very personal.

It is both thrilling and discomforting that the same people who used to berate me for outlandish scenarios on the Saudi agenda on Ethiopia and the Horn are now, more than a decade and half later expressing their worries about the same threat.To bring the issue to an end it is suffice tosay that the Saudis have been radicalizing the hinterland with liberty andare now militarizing the borderlands i.e. the Red Sea and the rest of it.
The only difference this time around is the unambiguous projection of hard power. This came as a result of several but interrelated factors. Firstis the new kind of rivalry for regional power order in the Middle East. The Saudi military expansion that took place over the past five years is unprecedented and Riyadh is ready to use most of it in the regional game.
The much talked about Saudi-Egyptian blitz is part of the new regional game which goes beyond the Sunni-Shia rivalry. The dynamic within the Sunni Arab world is a major piece of a new kind of regional competition. In my piece 'Qatar and the Horn' and 'Eastern Africa and the Yemeni CivilWar' I hinted about the emergence of rival Sunni camps and their potential impact in complicating peace and security in the Horn. The Muslim brotherhood movements themselves have become flashpoints of regional rivalry for power and influence.

The penchant for conflict and cooperation between the Riyadh-UAE and Qatar-Turkey Sunni camps should not disguise the intensity of Islamic radicalization in the Horn of Africa. In fact, the semblance of competitiveness has heightened radicalization and violent extremism in the Horn of Africa and beyond; from Somalia to Mali and Libya. It is not by accident that the political and military groups with the strongest balance sheet in today's Somalia are Islamists. The geo-strategic trickledown effect is correspondingly harmful. Many countries around theregion have been pulled into the orbit of Riyadh,due to survival or mundane strategic considerations. Along the way many including Egypt has fast depreciated into acting like the foster child of the Saudis alteringregional alliances including the destruction of the Sa'na Forum.

Radicalization and Violent Extremism in Africa

Radicalization and violent extremism are not new to Africa, but have evolved over the last two decade in more significant ways. This is not justa reflection of jihadist group's recent inventiveness and adaptation, but the culmination of longer-term historical and global trends. It has continued to spread building both on economic decline, moral populism, international connectedness and classic vulnerabilities of the state. Indeed, it is among these variables that the deeper and enduring sourcesof violent extremism and its solutions can be located.

There are vast regions of Africa where regular state administration has been suspended or violently challenged, sometimes for long periods. Many parts of the continent continue to be attractive to international and local jihadist groups, which could become parasitic on local armed conflicts, seizing upon ideological dimensions to local grievances. As much as therehas been an internal fertile ground for radicalization, the ideological roots and financial backing of violent extremist groups lie outside the region. Tothe extent that any policy on radicalization and violent extremism has meant that such problems are overlooked, it is unlikely to achieve its goals and there is a need for a more sophisticated and nuanced approach.

Putting a Tracer on Jihadist movements in Africa.

1. a) Ideological foundations: A dual heritage

Political Islam and the emergence of the Muslim Brotherhood Movements has a peculiar history attached to Hassan al-Banna and Sayyid Qutb . Bothheritages have materialized in many parts of Africa: We have jihadist groups adopting a violent and destructive route and radical Islamic movements without an army currently being supported by Turkey and Qatar on the one hand and Saudi Arabia on the other. Many of them are adopting or switching to less destructive trail to capture the state through electoral politics, but for analogous ends. Theirs is a change of tactics due to the security backlash they have suffered in recent years. The differencebetween the two is like a choice between the bad and awful. A gesture: today's Muslim Brotherhood Movements are more radical than Hassan al- Banna. Clearly until the late 1960s Egyptian Ulamas and universities had amonopoly over Islamist ideology. In the 1970's the Saudi began to take over with destructive consequences

1. b) Operational foundations.

The nadir: the Afghan Jihad of the 1980s. The Saudis aided by the Pakistanis shaped the practicalities primed the ground for the practical foundations; thus began Saudi primacy. It was a test of what was to come. The Saudis will dominate the long game: the ideological and cashflow for radical Islamists at the global level. February 1989: Soviet withdrawal from Afghanistan and the first Sunni Islamic Revolution in Sudan. Ended the legitimacy of a jihad to expel infidel invaders of a Muslim land. The appearance of Jihadi refugees- Turabi's Popular Arab Islamic Conference/PAIC/ invited many of them to come to Sudan.

The collapse of the State in Somalia in 1991, the Gulf War in 1991 and theSomali Humanitarian crisis only made matters easy for the new arrivals.

The presence of US troops in Muslim land only increased the paranoid andconspiratorial view of Islamists and fed into their narrative. Thus, Moral outrage and populism as a major driver of extremism began to take hold in the Horn of Africa. This greatly impacted on Al Qaida, the Egyptian Islamist Group, and Al-Ittihad Al-Islamia in Somalia.

The Saudis worked hard to match the level of outrage with the large scaleexpansion of Wahhabi teachings, a violent and puritanical brand of Islam,throughout the Horn of Africa. The result being the mushrooming of violent radical organizations across the continent.

Drivers of radicalization and violent extremism

Clear and comprehensive understanding of the drivers of radicalizationand violent extremism helps to design strategies to overcome the challenge.

Ideologically or grievance-driven?

1. a) Classic vulnerabilities of the state

Over the course of recent history, violent extremism and terrorism has been consistently tied to the evolving politics and identity of the state, steadily gaining in its capacity to draw power from the Western nation- state and moving from a peripheral nuisance to a central strategic threat.

Radicalization has continued to spread building both on the economic decline, violent conflicts and lack of strong and legitimate states. It happens fast when the entitlements of citizenship are not extended throughout a population or when the state is not the primary actor mobilizing to provide public goods. The central challenge for Africa is tobuild accountable, capable governments that can deliver security and inclusive growth.

Recently, a new type of Jihadist groups has been gathering ranks and momentum in Africa. Violent extremism draws its strength, and even in some sense its guidance and inspiration from the flaws of the contemporary (and broadly from the 20th century nation) African state. Itis a truism that violent extremist groups are pre-modern and post- modern, sub-national and transnational, and transcend the Westphalian state system.

The problems of contemporary African state include:

- The historicity of the state: Its nature, character and composition.
- Deep roots in the social and economic marginalization of a large section.As such the essence of radicalization – and to some extent violent extremism – is political (e.g. Boko Haram).-

- The collapse of the state (Somalia). Central to this is states and territories for organizing security, and governments that lack authority and legitimacy. Meanwhile, in the security vacuum, Islamist groups oncerepressed or marginalized gain traction (e.g. Libya, Mali).
- Conflict and criminality: Susceptibility to international terrorist and criminal networks. The crisis in Libya and in Mali has been three pronged:political failure of the political elite in Bamako, aspirations ofTuaregs and expansionist agendas of the Al-Qaida allied AQIM.
- Ungoverned spaces: There are vast regions in Africa where regular state administration has been suspended or violently challenged, sometimes for long periods. This often intersects with marginalized regions characterized by deep-seated horizontal inequalities, ethnicallyor religiously polarized identities.
- Armaments: the most obvious legacy of former or nearby conflicts isweaponry (the role of the AK 47 in general and the fall of Gadhafi inparticular. An arms bazaar?)

There is similar cause to most radical groups (difficult enough to generalize about) than there is for other forms of political opposition.

Violent extremism, like other forms of political violence, arises out of thebeliefs and aspirations of communities and must be analyzed within a social and political context.

But Grievances are necessary but not sufficient ingredients forradicalization and violent extremism.

1. B) International connectedness

As much as there has been an internal fertile ground for extremism, theideological roots and financial backing of militant Islamic groups lie outside the region. This could be explained in terms of the religious bazaar, ideological mutuality and moral outrage.

The Radicalization bazaar: Egyptian; then Sudanese and lately Saudi Arabia as major sponsors of money and ideas. In late 1980's the NationalIslamic Front/NIF/ in Sudan-which was formerly known as Muslim Brotherhood successfully engineered a military takeover of power, henceforth embarking on a region-wide Islamisation project? This was done through scholarships, money and NGOs on the ground.

Since 2002 I have been warning about the thoughtful and stealth Saudi menace, what I referred to as the Long Game to radical radicalize Africa,particularly the Horn of African region. As much as this is global, it has become lethal in the Horn of Africa due to the existence of an Islamist infrastructure provided by the first Sunni Islamic Revolution in Sudan.
Since the late 1970s Kenya's madrassas have been dominated by wealthyWahhabi charities and foundations. Inadvertently Ethiopia opened its floodgates to Wahhabi's after 1991. By providing social services for the region's poor, establishing madrassas, and evangelizing via firebrand preachers, Wahhabi leaders have galvanized support and converted manyto their cause. This refers to the Wahabbist Puritanism—a form of fundamentalist Islam which originated in Saudi Arabia which attempted to become internationalist Islam. In the first years of this century the Saudihave come closer to alter the age-old religious equilibrium in Ethiopia.
Eritrea was spared due to the heavy handed and timely crackdown on Islamic (Wahhabi) charities but the firebrands from the Gulf have adjustedthemselves to the situation and made a geo-strategic choice to prompt the Eritrean regime from above. Here we are now.

Ideological Mutuality: Political Islam has morphed into number of movements and brands which became blended with the nature of rivalryamong states in the Middle East. However there is a remarkable sense of mutuality among the different sponsors of the various variants of radicalIslam: Egyptian and Sudanese Muslim Brotherhoods, Wahhabist Puritanism, Islamist Social movements such as Al-Islah and al-Tabliq in Somalia and Djibouti. The penchant for conflict and cooperation among the different movements exist.

All intensified the sense of Muslim moral outrage.

Moral outrage: This is concerned with the moral outrage of Muslims and its attendant moral populism. The global context is extremely relevant as exogenous factors are very crucial to understanding the origins as well asresolving the problems of radicalization and violent extremism in many parts of Africa. These include developments in Iraq, Somalia, Afghanistan,and the Israeli-Palestinian conflict.

For many young Muslims, the sense of moral outrage is often the start of a process. The outrage has to fit into the nature of the state, internationalconnectedness, the presence of a radical Islamist infrastructure. For that to happen, the domestic situation must provide the enabling environment(listed above) for radicalization. That is why it becomes more difficult to distinguish between ideologically or grievance-driven.

Countering Violent Extremism: Prospective Solutions:

One cannot expect a solution, immediate, splendid and decisive such asthat obtained in other areas of conflict resolution.

On the State:

Meeting the current threat can best be accomplished by enhancing the capacities of the African state, thereby diminishing its susceptibilities to radicalization and violent non-state actors and reducing the longer-term threat to violent extremism. Radicalization appeals to Muslims because itresonates with their personal experiences of discrimination and economicexclusion.

The struggle first and foremost is about legitimacy. On the religious/radicalization workshop. The ‘Radicalization Central’, SaudiArabia, has managed to outspend everybody on this radicalization workshop. This has to be changed which entails a multi-pronged approach: Diplomatic, political, financial etc.

Africa needs to elevate the Saudi menace to the top of its security agenda and galvanize regional instruments and mechanisms towards disabling thisexistential threat.There is a need to align with global initiatives. It also requires political reform in Saudi Arabia: curbing radical Wahabbism, regulation of Islamic charities etc.

However the real battle involves an offer to challenge Islamic philantropism and secularize social services, including education. African countries with large Muslim populations need to contain the flow of students to Egypt and Saudi Arabia for Islamic education. Providing scholarships to young and disillusioned students has been a major weaponof radicalizations and this need to be discontinued by providing such services and opportunities within national borders. Capacities for this mustbe a priority for bilateral and regional cooperation.

On the classic vulnerabilities of Violent Extremist groups

At the core of the strategy to countering radicalization and violent extremism is an understanding of the nature of its appeal and its classic vulnerabilities, thereby diminishing its adverse impact on the evolution of the state and the international system. In this regard we seem to havereached a learning curve.

At the core is about mobilization and legitimacy. It is also about cautionand complexity. Transition from terrorism to insurgency creates its ownvulnerabilities that can be exploited by states and international organizations/players.

- Avoid sweeping generalizations.
- Focus on transitions and strategic vulnerabilities.
- Don't respond in a foolish way
- Embrace Containment
- Allow them a Sabbatical to govern
- Focus on the violent nature of these groups and avoid doctrinairefights.
- Diminish the moral outrage and reduce moral populism

IMPERIAL ARCHIVES

Public Education In Ethiopia

As well known, a nation like Ethiopia needs educationists, entrepreneurs, doctors, Lawyers, Scientists, its youth, and its women et-al... The basis of education in Ethiopia in the 1940s, 50s, 60s, and the 70 achieved significant results to Ethiopia as a nation to create it's own intelligencia, especially in the post-Italian occupation that consisted of a chain of elementary schools, secondary and higher educational institutions established by the then Imperial Ministry of Education & Fine Arts, and thefollowed governments in the various towns, by giving free education and boarding school courses, even with reasonable amount of pocket money for those helpless students, in English, Amharic, arithmetic, social and nature studies, and hygiene at-al. From there, the most promising students progressed to then University College of Addis Ababa (the latter Haile Selassie I University), Gondar Health Science College, Kotebe Teachers Training College, Alemaya Agricultural University, Bahirdar Polytechnic college, Harrar Military Academy et-al where history, geography, military science, technical work and farming were added to thecurriculum. The boys ages ranged from 13 to 17 were expected to becomethe country’s future teachers, government civil servants, minor officials and administrators. They lived in dormitories similar to English boarding schools like “General Wingate”, and then the secondary school “Medhanealem” in the meantime played football, volley ball, basketball, athletics other games. The College headmaster was an army captain as school-master. Advanced subjects were taught by Americans, Philipinoes, Indians, and French Peace Corps by the time. There were several hundrednative teachers, and trainers whose completed successfully their academiccourses outside to serve back their native country as well.

First U.S.A. Patent for Ethiopic Geez Granted

(News Release April 11, 2016)

Ethiopian Computers & Software of Colorado announced that it was granted a U.S.A. patent number 9,000,957 on April 7, 2015. The patent the CEO of the company, Dr. Aberra Molla, received involves the typing ofthe Ethiopic characters with one and two keystrokes each in computers.

The patented novel Ethiopic character entry method known as ABSHA system is for typing the default characters with one keystroke and the restwith two keystrokes each. It is virtually similar to typing the English alphabet in computers and some other devices (http://patents.com/us- 9000957.html). The invention by the Ethiopian-American scientist is alsosignificant in that the patent application 20090179778 of July 16, 2009, (http://www.google.com/patents/US20090179778) was cited by six new U.S.A. patents for English and other uses by the time it was granted in2015.

Notice to grant an Ethiopian patent for the invention entitled “Ethiopic Character Entry” application patent ET/P/2009/111 was also sent to Dr.Aberra Molla on September 9, 2015.

Ethiopic or Geez is one of the oldest alphabets in the world and has beenin use in Ethiopia for millennia. The phonetic alphabet was written manually until the printing press made it to Ethiopia around 1911. With the advent of the computer technology, Dr. Molla computerized Ethiopic and revolutionized the Geez script when he came up with a method of rendering each glyph with two keystrokes in the 80’s. Since then the character set with about 500 glyphs has been standardized by Unicode, aconsortium that provides a unique number for every character of the world.

What has remained a challenge was how to effectively type all these characters on computers with less keystrokes. In the meantime, desperate attempts to improve on the two-keystroke Ethiopic typing method were made by others. These included entry by mouse clicks, the potential use of three to eight keystrokes to render some letters using English alphabet and learning how to spell them out, the introduction of spaces within words and the utilization of methods that are unable to typesome glyphs and words. Multiple keystrokes came about as a result of some Amharic users trying to type their letters by spelling them out with English alphabet while English spells out words and not letters. The novel invention relieves Ethiopic users from unnecessary methods by eliminatingdistractive waste of time and energy, by replacing them with impartial andefficient scientific technology. Ethiopic is an excellent phonetic syllabary and one advantage of the alphabet is because it is not affected by one type of spelling error of the Latin alphabet as each glyph represents a phoneme (or sound). The new method is simple to use and takes minutes to understand while allowing the typing of the most commonly used syllables with one keystroke each just like English. The invention is an efficient and significant improvement of the default and shifted keyboards as Geez can be rendered from the default keyboard. For instance, it takes the same number of keystrokes to document “The quick brown fox jumps over the lazy dog.” in English and “á‹˜ áŠ²áŠ á‰¥áˆ«á‹• áŠ• á• ŽáŠáˆµáŒ€áˆ• á• •áˆµ áŠ¦á‰¨áˆ á‹˜ áˆŒá‹á‹š á‹áŒ• á• ¢” in Ethiopic because of the invention. On the other hand, the 23 glyphs in six exampleAmharic words, “áˆ• áˆ˜áˆ áŠ‹á‹á‰µ áˆƒá‹• áˆµ áˆ¦áˆµá‰µ á‰‹áŠ•á‰‹ á‰µá‹•áŒ• áˆ¥á‰µ” are rendered with 32 to 34 keystrokes with the ABSHA system as opposed to more than 50 by other Amharic methods. The default keyboard assignment is based on the English keyboard making it simple to type in Ethiopic. Thus it is unscientific and waste of time and energy to type any Ethiopic glyph withthree keystrokes. Unlike English that has patents even for the English typewriter, the computer version is the first patent for Ethiopic.

Ethiopic is used by many Ethiopian languages and the various subsets include Agew, Amharic, Awingi, Bench, Bilen, Dawro, Dizi, Gamo-Gofa, Geez, Gumuz, Guragie, Kayla, Kunful, Meen, Mursi, Oromiffa, Qimant, Quara, Suri, Tigre, Tigrigna and Xamtang languages with their own and overlapping character sets. The inventor has also added new glyphs suchas Ethiopic zero, Birr (Ethiopian currency), penny, stress, copyright, trademark, registration and other Ethiopic signs as well as the signs and symbols of the English keyboard to the set. This is because the companyhas its own English character set to go along with the Geez from the get go.

The company has been selling GeezEdit Version 2 with pending patent notices online at http://www.geezedit.com for computers with Windows XP to Windows 10. A free Amharic online version was given out in 2011 for Windows and Mac computer users. In 2014 Apple opened up its iOS 8 system to third party keyboards for iPhone 6 and iPad and the company released its GeezEdit App for Amharic. The App also works in iPhone 4S and 5 with iOS 8 upgrade. It allows the typing of Amharic glyphs with one and two keystrokes and other languages would beopened up when necessary. The online, Windows and Apple’s App versions all utilizethe same patented and patent pending keystrokes and GeezEdit is the trade name ofthe Geez editor. The App allows the rendering and editing of Amharic in various applications such as Text, Email, Messages, Facebook, Twitter, Notes, Microsoft Word, Office Suite, OpenOffice, Pages, Google, Yahoo, Bing, Wikipedia, WhatsApp, etc. The user can switch between English and Ethiopic in the applications as the App shares the English system with Ethiopic and one can search in more than one language alphabet at the same time as in the Windows versions. The smartphone can be configured to utilize Amharic as a preferred language. Amharic is the most commonly used alphabet of Ethiopia. The GeezEdit App is available at https://itunes.apple.com/us/app/geezedit/id935624754?mt=8. An Android version will be released next month.

Dr. Molla encourages Ethiopians to respect intellectual rights and focus on innovationand be as creative as earlier ancestors while defending their heritage, languages andthe perfect African alphabet. The novel method has given Ethiopic a new power to put down ideas faster in Ethiopic-user languages such as Amharic. Ethiopic is syllabic and renders an idea with clarity utilizing less glyphs and space. With Dr. Molla's digitaization method Ethiopic users typed only six glyphs with two keystrokes from any two keys and his novel invention improved that to 14. Because one can typehundreds of glyphs from a default keyboard, there is no need to spell out the Ethiopic letters as if they are English words or modify the English vowel accent typing methodfor typing Ethiopic. The company has continued with its pioneering scientific work andanother pending patent was recently published,

Ethiopia's growing tensions between central government andmany ethnic populations

Protests sparked by the arrest of Konso leader Kala Gezahegn underlined growing tensions between Ethiopia's central government and many ethnicpopulations.

William Davison in Addis Ababa, Friday 8 April
Nothing seemed amiss when an Ethiopian government vehicle arrived tocollect the traditional leader of the Konso people for a meeting in March.But instead of being taken to discuss his community's requests for moreautonomy, Kala Gezahegn was arrested.

Kala's detention marked a low point in fraught relations between the Konso in southern Ethiopia and the regional authorities in the state capital, Hawassa. Five years ago, the Konso lost their right to self-govern,and growing tensions since then mirror discontent in other parts of Ethiopia.

The 1995 constitution in Africa's second most populous country allows different ethnic groups to self-govern and protects their languages and culture under a system called ethnic federalism. The largest ethnicities –such as the approximately 35 million-strong Oromo – have their own regional states, while some smaller groups administer zones within regions, as the Konso effectively used to do.

Many of Ethiopia's ethnic identities, which number more than 80, were suppressed during the imperial and national-socialist eras that precededthe federal system.

What happened in Konso followed demonstrations and killings by security forces in Oromia, the most populous region. A rights group says 266 people have been killed since mid-November during protests over injusticeand marginalisation.

Demonstrations were sparked by a government plan to integrate the development of Addis Ababa and surrounding areas of Oromia. After fierceopposition from the Oromo, that scheme was shelved in January, but protests have continued, fuelled by anger over alleged killings, beatings and arrests.

In Amhara, a large region north of Addis Ababa, there was violence latelast year related to the Qemant group's almost decade-old claim for recognition as a group with constitutional rights. The fact that the Qemantrejected a territorial offer from the authorities, saying it was too small, may have provoked local Amhara people. In December, federal security forces were dispatched to contain escalating communal violence.

In Konso, after Kala and other leaders were locked up, thousands took tothe streets to protest. During clashes with police on 13 March, three people were killed, and now the dispute seems entrenched.

The crux of the issue is a 2011 decision to include the Konso – which is inthe multi-ethnic Southern Nations, Nationalities and Peoples' Region (SNNPR) and has 250,000 people – in the newly created Segen zone, thereby removing their right to self-rule. That decision was taken withoutconsultation and resulted in worsening public services and unresponsive courts, says Kambiro Aylate, a member of a committee chosen to represent the community's demands.

The budget for Konso's government was reduced by 15%, says Orkissa Orno, another committee member. "The Konso people used their rights toask for a different administrative structure," he says.

In a recent interview, prime minister Hailemariam Desalegn blamed theunrest in Oromia on high youth unemployment and a "lack of good governance", a line echoed by officials in other regions.

Kifle Gebremariam, the deputy president of the SNNPR, said the Konso leaders were arrested on suspicion of maladministration and corruption,issues "completely different" from the political question.

Kifle added that discussions had been held with residents about the statusof the administration. "The regional government, including the president, gave them the right response, but they are not peacefully accepting this."Kala's supporters dispute that account, although there have been signs ofcompromise, with the traditional leader permitted to take part in recent negotiations.

Concerns over the federal system's ability to withstand such strains are not new. For example, southern groups such as the Wolayta were involvedin violent clashes before they were granted their own zone in 2000.

In 2009, the International Crisis Group wrote in a report (pdf): "Ethnic federalism has not dampened conflict, but rather increased competitionamong groups that vie over land and natural resources, as well as administrative boundaries and government budgets."

Officials have argued for decades that the focus on minority rights hasbeen integral to an unprecedented period of peace and development.
Assefa Fiseha, a federalism expert at Addis Ababa University, agrees the system has brought stability to a country threatened with fragmentation inthe early 1990s after ethno-nationalist rebellions overthrew a military regime.

But a lack of democratisation and centralised economic decision-making works against local autonomy and exacerbates grievances, according to Assefa. "The regional states, as agents of the regional people, have to be consulted on whatever development project the federal government wantsto undertake," he says.

In fact, the government appears to have been moving in the opposite direction, as its legitimacy depends on economic growth and improvingsocial services and infrastructure.

National projects – 175,000 hectares (430,000 acres) of state-owned sugar plantations in the ethnically rich south Omo area, for instance – aredesigned, implemented and owned by federal agencies.

The now scrapped integrated Oromia-Addis Ababa plan is another example, as it was developed without scrutiny by "key stakeholders" inthe Oromia government, Addis Ababa city and the federal parliament, Assefa says.

One reason for quick decisions in a devolved federation is that the politicalpositions of Ethiopia's diverse communities are filtered through a rigid ruling coalition.

Along with allied parties, the Ethiopian Peoples' Revolutionary DemocraticFront won every federal and regional legislative seat in May's elections, extending its control of all tiers of government.

The EPRDF has held power for 25 years, partly by building a popular baseof millions of farmers and demanding strict obedience to party doctrine and policy, but some say this is now changing.

The wave of protests, so soon after the landslide election victory, showsthat the "dominant party system is facing problems", Assefa says. "Growing ethno-nationalism, centralised policymaking and the failure to provide space for political dissent combined together make a perfect storm for violence."

Ethiopia’s Smoldering Oromo – IPS

By James JeffreyReprint

The Oromo protests have reportedly resulted in deployment of the maroon-beretedagazi, an elite military force, to support police.

ADDIS ABABA, Ethiopia, Apr 11 2016 (IPS) – The Ethiopian government’smost serious domestic political crisis in more than a decade began over ascruffy football field appropriated by local officials for development.

After students responded by taking to the streets of Ginchi, a small town 80km from the capital, Addis Ababa, their protest was quickly quelled. Buta spark had been lit for what has turned into an outpouring of grievances by the Oromo—Ethiopia’s largest ethnic group, accounting for about a third of the country’s 95 million population.

As protests spread, they ostensibly focused on a plan to expand the Ethiopian capital’s city limits into Oromia—the largest of the federal republic’s nine regional states and two city states—which encircles AddisAbaba.

Land in Ethiopia—all of which is government owned—has become an increasingly contentious issue as Ethiopia has opened up to the world,reflecting a worldwide trend particularly effecting developing countriessuch as Ethiopia.

Globally, investors are increasingly looking to investments not linked to volatile equities and bonds: other countries’ land. And few have attracted as much attention as Ethiopia, with its lowlands watered by the tributariesof the Blue Nile, a particularly bountiful draw.

The Ethiopian government has been on the front foot and quick to respondto such interest, and since around 2009 has leased about 2.5 million hectares to more than 50 foreign investors, from the likes of India, Turkey, Pakistan, China, Sudan and Saudi Arabia.

The so-called Addis Ababa Integrated Development Master Plan was seen as fitting a disturbing trend by the Oromo—many of whom are smallholderfarmers—and they weren't having any more of it.
But even after the Oromo People's Democratic Organisation—the regionalarm of the Ethiopian government—shelved the plan, a government back down described as historic by many, protests continued.

"The widespread, sustained and recurring protests are clear messages of no confidence by a young and restless segment of the population which isdriven by a feeling of marginalization," stated a February editorial in AddisAbaba-based Fortune newspaper.

Many observers in Ethiopia, local and foreigners alike, note that althoughprotests have taken an ethnic-based identity and focused on land, other deeper issues behind them—corruption, unfair elections, political and socioeconomic marginalisation—are familiar to many disenchanted Ethiopian voters.

Numbers of those killed since November given by international rightsorganisations, activists and observers range from 80 to 250-plus.

Some Addis Ababa residents suggest such numbers are preferable to evenhigher numbers if the government lost control of a situation that could, they argue, spiral into anarchy.

For against the narrative of a typically brutal Ethiopian government crackdown that brooks no dissent, there have been reports of looting, andorganised armed gangs attacking foreign-owned factories, and private andgovernmental buildings. Even churches were damaged during a particularly violent flare up in the south in February.

Ethiopian citizens had a right to question the master plan but protests were hijacked by people looking to incite violence, according to GetachewReda, a government spokesperson.

"You shouldn't define a largely peaceful movement by this," says a security analyst who focuses on Ethiopia for an Africa-based researchorganisation.

Despite February's trouble in the south, many observers in Ethiopia saythe majority of protests were peaceful, involving Oromo from across thedemographic spectrum airing widely held grievances.

“It is also about competent government structure,” says Daniel Berhane, aprominent Addis Ababa-based political blogger, covering Ethiopia for the website Horn Affairs. “You have got ministries next door to each other nottalking, and at every level—regional, zone or district—governmental staff arguing about who is responsible while criticising each other.”

“People have a perception of lack of competence in governance on theground,” Daniel adds.
The government heeded the call of the people, according to Getachew, and observers say the government deserves credit for listening about themaster plan.

But, more importantly, these same observers add, the government mustallow Ethiopians to exercise their constitutional right to protest, and handle events in a way that does not escalate.

Protests have often resulted in deployment of military forces to support federal police, both regularly accused of ruthless suppression, with the perceived unaccountability of Ethiopia’s security forces added to the list ofgrievances, the analyst says.

There have even been reports of police taking head shots and shooting people in the back. But such alleged actions by police in remote locations,with backup often hundreds of miles away, defy logic as they would resultin such a ferocious backlash by the local populace, according to a foreign politico in Addis Ababa.

This individual also suggested that some local militia, ostensibly part of state security but who sided with protestors and turned against federal forces, fired from behind women and children at police. Numbers of statesecurity forces killed haven’t been released.

Nevertheless, shooting at protesters, as well as arbitrary arrests, especially of students—who initially formed the body of protests—have along track record in Ethiopia, preceding this government back to during the brutal military dictatorship that ruled between 1974 and 1991.

Many who fled that period now compose part of the large Ethiopian diaspora, with the government claiming foreign-based opposition bolstered by US-based social media activists is manipulating the situationto its own ends.

“The diaspora magnifies news of what is happening, yes, but no matter how much it agitates it cannot direct at village level in Ethiopia—this is about dissatisfaction,” says Jawar Mohammed, executive director of US- based broadcaster Oromia Media Network, strongly criticised by the government and some non-government observers for fomenting conflict.

Imprisonment of leaders of the Oromo Federalist Congress party, Oromia’slargest legally registered political party, along with thousands of other Oromo political prisoners, makes negotiating a lasting solution a tall order,Jawar says.

Governance in today’s Federal Democratic Republic of Ethiopia—to use itsfull title—exhibits an inherent tension.
A decentralised system of ethnic federalism jars with the Ethiopian People’s Revolutionary Democratic Front ruling party’s authoritarian one-party developmental state style of leadership, similar to China’s.

“The political space has increasingly narrowed, becoming uneven, non-competitive and unwelcoming…contrary to the diversity of desires and interests in Ethiopian society,” states the same editorial.

It is a long way from the heady hopeful days of Ethiopia’s new federalconstitution after the overthrow of the military dictatorship in 1991.

“The ruling government is a victim of its own success—the constitution itdeveloped made promises and people trusted the EPRDF,” the analyst says. “Now people are demanding those rights and the government is responding with bullets and violence.”

The analyst acknowledges the government deserves credit for creating aconstitution that is the best fit for an ethnically diverse country like Ethiopia, and for expanding basic services, infrastructure, respecting different cultural and ethnic identities, and better integrating Ethiopia’s large Muslim population.

But, the analyst adds, this federal constitution espouses a liberal philosophy that the government appears unable to reconcile with itsdecision-making processes.

The government’s hitherto successful job of holding together this particularly heterogeneous federation is not about to crumble tomorrow,observers note.

But things may get worse before they get better, unless underlyingsources of friction and frustration are addressed.

The government has since acknowledged there was insufficient consultation with those likely to be effected by the master plan.

And during his latest six-monthly performance report to Parliament in March, Prime Minister Hailemariam Desalegn apologised to those who lostfamily members during protests, while the government has suggested there will be investigations into allegations of police brutality.

What is happening in Ethiopia could be a foretaste of what is to come elsewhere, as forces of global markets—including a growing global urban population in more developed nations that eats more than it farms—clashwith indigenous desires to protect historical homelands.
“A fundamental tenet of the ruling party at its creation was its socialdemocratic focus on farmers, who still make up 80 per cent of the country,” Daniel says. “It cannot suddenly become capitalist.” (End)

GENETICS SCIENCE

The Ethiopian Cosmetic Plant Ensosila (Imaptiens spp[Balsaminaceae])

By Fukadu Fullas, R.Ph., Ph.D. April 12, 2016

Before the advent of modern cosmetics, Ethiopian women used plant products as beautifying agents. For example, Indigofera species are a source of the blue-black dye indigo. Indigofera arrecta may have been used in Ethiopia as a cosmetic. Known by the local names hina, hena, hinna (Amargna [Amar]), Lawsonia inermis (Lythraceae) is also found in most Ethiopian regions and widely grown as a dye plant. The crushed or powered leaves produce a red dye used for coloring the hair, beards and nails, and for making intricate patterns on the hands and feet of married women. Plants are used as cosmetics more often in rural areas. Ensosila isone such commonly used plant for this purpose. Among the various Impatiens spp, Imaptiens ethiopica and I. rothii are known by the vernacular names ensosila and enshoshila (in Amar and Guragegna, respectively). The tubers of the species I. tinctoria have also been reported to produce a red dye. Other local names of ensosila (I. ethiopica)include: bode, bolok, cheferara (Oromiffa [Orom]); gurshit, sasula (Tigrigna [Tigr]); for I. rothii: buri, chafarra, dhangaggoo (Orom); alam, alam'e, alen, gurelile (Tigr); gurshit (Amar and Tigr) halam, hanu (Tigr); hansu-siloca, insoosillaa, naddoo, osille (Orom), etc.

Ensosila is used to dye the hands, palms and face red. Strelcyn (1973) recorded that the tuber of I. tinctoria (which he referred to as "ensosila")is used by girls to dye their hands red during festivities, whereas he associated the name gurshit with the plant Conyza abyssinica, whose roots are used to dye the feet and hands. In the latter case, the color is yellow, and women avoid exposure to sunlight, lest the dye faded. There is some confusion in the botanical names in the literature when the name*ensosila* or alam (vide supra) is used alone. According to Tournerie (2010), alam may refer to both Lawsonia inervis (hena) and I. tinctoria. She further recorded that Aleqa Gebre Selassie of Selale and Aleqa WoldeMedhin of Menz used the color in their paint work. They referred to the plant as “gurshered [sp]’ and the color as “ensosila.’ Elam is described asa root plant for beautifying the hands and legs, especially among Tigrai ladies.

Gurshit is described as being lighter (yellowish) in color than ensosila (of deeper tint). It is interesting to note that girls paint their palms and nails only; whereas, painting the feet indicates non-virginity. Young women andwidows wear it profusely to attract the attention of men for courtship in anticipation of possible marriage proposals. The process of preparing the cosmetic dye involves collecting mature plants and thoroughly washing them. The plant is then cut into pieces and left in a container for at least 12 hours. The chopped ilam or ensosila is heated on fire while it is still in the container. Women dip their hands and feet in it, followed by washing with the diced plant parts for about 30 minutes. Some girls prefer to wrap their hands for the whole night to produce the desired reddish color.

Alternatively, the roots are cut into pieces and exposed to sunlight for a day, possibly for photo-reaction. After that, water is added to the plant, and the mix boiled. The ladies then dip their feet and hands in the container to get the dye affixed to their skin. There is a practice of crushing the roots and putting the pieces on leaves. The leaves containingthe crushed roots are wrapped around the hands using strings for about seven hours to impart the color.

As a side note, in Ethiopian folk medicine the species I. tinctoria (ensosila)and I. rothii (syn I. abyssinica) [gurshit] are both used for treating gout.

The powder of the root of I. abyssinica is also used for hemorrhoidal wounds. Lawsonia inermis (Amar: hina) is used as an aphrodisiac, for biliousness and wound. Ensosila continues to be a common and importantcosmetic plant in rural Ethiopia.

SEA OUTLET

Ethiopia landlocked but not locked out

By Teshome Abebe April 13, 2016

"If you can't explain something simply, you don't really understand it." -Bill Gates

I recently met a young man outside the hall of a conference venue who asked why I had not yet written anything about the economic hardships befalling Ethiopia as a result of the decision to land lock itself following theindependence of Eritrea - its former province.

This article is, therefore, a brief description of what is meant by 'landlocked'; a listing of some of the countries that are 'landlocked'; and ashort survey of the economic consequences of being 'landlocked' as confirmed by the available empirical evidence on the subject.

Landlocked States:

A landlocked state is a sovereign state entirely enclosed by land, or whoseonly coastline lie on closed areas. A detailed study of landlocked countries'human geography by Caitlin Dempsey (see map), lists a total of 48 countries currently landlocked, including partially recognized states. 42 of these are landlocked; two are doubly landlocked; and four are partiallyrecognized states. Only two, Bolivia and Paraguay are from South America, the rest are all in the Afro-Eurasia world.

As might be expected, some are affluent states (Switzerland, Luxemburg,and Liechtenstein); but the majority of these countries are, what economists call, landlocked developing countries (LLDC's). Unsurprisingly,Nine out of twelve or 75% are currently listed as having the lowest HDI (Human Development Index). Of the 48 countries, none are a major power, and 15 are in the continent of Africa. Ethiopia is the most populous landlocked country on the list with a population of approximately 100 million people; followed by Uganda, with40million; Afghanistan, with 33million; and Uzbekistan, with 32million inhabitants. There are bigger countries than Ethiopia on the list in terms of landmass, but with much smaller populations. For instance, Kazakhstan, Mongolia, Chad, Niger, and Mali all have bigger land mass than Ethiopia. The combined population of all the LLDC's is about 475,818,737 or roughly 6.9% of the world's population (C. Dempsey).

Paul Collier (2007) surmised "if you are coastal, you serve the world; if you are landlocked, you serve your neighbors." So then, what happens toyour economic performance if you are landlocked, your neighbors are poor, small, warring and unstable?

Efforts to avoid being landlocked include acquiring land that stretches to the sea, and making arrangements on getting free transport of goods through neighboring countries. In all cases, however, losing access to thesea has enormous implications to a country, including, militarily, politically, and most importantly, with respect to trade and, hence, economic activity and performance.

It was surprising, therefore, when former Prime Minister of Ethiopia, MelesZenawi declared, that Ethiopia could do away with ports, and that the absence of ports would not and could not harm the economy as long as the country was able to garner income from the resources available to

it. To accentuate his assertion, the former Prime Minister even gaveUganda as an example of a country that was landlocked but had performed well!

His statement was surprising because history is replete with nations "largeand small across the world who have striven to gain access to open waters, even at great expense in wealth, bloodshed and political capital". Also surprising because it is generally agreed that, as a rule, being landlocked creates political and economic handicaps that access to thehigh seas avoids.

So, was the former Prime Minister's claims justified based on evidence available at the time and since? What detrimental repercussions did the policy have on the country's external trade performance, if any; and wasthe policy in concert with the long-term interests of the Ethiopian state?

Was the Statement Justified Based on Evidence?

A quick survey of the available evidence from the economics literatureprovides a good basis for answering the question: was the statement justified based on evidence available at the time or since? Economists Friberg & Irwin (2009), did a study of landlocked countries forthe period 1950-2000, and concluded that there is a 'hold up" problem, meaning problems attributed to landlockedness which reduce trade by more than 50%; and that free trade agreements can't overcome the hurdles posed by landlockedness as they have only a weak effect on trade.

Arvis et al. (2007) conducted a study of logistics and cost associated withbeing landlocked, and its impact on supply chain reliability, and concludedthat landlocked countries are affected by high cost of freight services and a high degree of unpredictability of transport systems.

Mockellar et al. (2000) did a study of economic development problems of LLDC's and concluded that the empirical evidence confirms these countriesexperience slower economic growth.

Gallup et al. (1999), did a study of geography and economic development,and concluded that those regions located far from coasts and ocean- navigable rivers have to bear heavy transport costs of international trade. Furthermore, coastal countries have higher incomes than land-locked ones.

Singh (2010), conducted a study of international trade and economic growth, and concluded that the contribution of international trade to growth depends on the volume of economic activity (i.e., it has to be largeenough to make a difference).

Rodrik et al. (2004), conducted a study of the role of institutions vis-à-vis geography, and concluded that the quality of the institutions of a country is most important and significant for its income level. Because institutional quality can be controlled, it has more roles to play in growth than doesgeography, or even trade, which cannot be controlled.

In a study conducted by Collier & Gunning (1999), they concluded that Africa had grown slowly during the 1970s and 1990s, and that was largelydue to policies, which reduced the region's openness to foreign trade.

Furthermore, poor delivery of public services was the main hurdle ofeconomic growth in the region during the period.

Frankel & Romer (1996), conducted a study of trade and growth, and concluded that the countries' geographic characteristics have significanteffect on their trade, and even more effects on income.

All of these studies employed cross-section data, and used econometrictechniques of varying degrees of sophistication.

In yet a highly significant and recent work, R.C. Paudel (2013), conducteda sophisticated study of landlocked countries' performance; and concludedthat landlockedness remains to be a significant problem, and is a specific constraint to export performance and growth. At the same time, he also observed, that LLDC's have opportunity to improve their export performance by: creating a more trade friendly environment through lowering of tariffs; reforming their exchange rates; and involving themselves in regional trade arrangements, among others.

Paudel's study further concluded that the market size of the neighbor has significant impact for a landlocked country, indicating that a one per cent increase in the market size of a neighbor of LLDC impacts its growth by anaverage of about one and half (1½%) percentage points. As a consequence, a landlocked country surrounded by large economies has a more advantageous environment for economic growth than those locked by poor countries.

A sobering implication of the Paudel study includes the finding that governance quality has statistically significant and positive impact on economic growth in landlocked developing countries. It suggests that if the quality of governance improves by an index point, on average, the rate of economic growth increases by at least two and half (2½%) percentage points, holding all other variables constant. Ethiopian policy makers should head this observation, as the country was included in hisstudy sample.

In short, then, and consistent with previous studies, landlockedness hampers economic growth for LDC's in general, and LLDC's in particular.

The magnitude is, of course, different for different countries, depending on the country. What we also know now is that there is evidence that a good governance system and policy initiative of trade reform can help reduce the negative impact of the constraint imposed by landlockedness.

What we can say further is that, in all cases, however, these countries (LLDC's) are still disadvantaged relative to countries with similar policies as openness is positively associated with growth. The moral of the story here is that trade related cost is more crucial to improving export performance in LLDC's than just trade liberalization or reform. To be sure,there are benefits to trade liberalization, but when that is compared to other countries; the benefits are certainly lower.

Was the Policy in Concert with the Long-term Interest of the EthiopianState?

Being landlocked remains a specific constraint for the export performance of Ethiopia. The fact that the country has attempted to gain access to Sudanese ports in the North; securing the continued use of the Djibouti port to the East; and now, negotiating the use of the port facilities at Berbera in Somaliland, is an indication of the stresses Ethiopia is experiencing notwithstanding Meles' claim. There have also been attemptsas well as future plans in the works to use the Mombasa port in Kenya to the South. That there are inconveniences, insecurities as well as delays experienced by business people within the country in terms of logistics and reliability is undeniable. Furthermore, it is generally assumed that 30 to 40% of the cost of goods in the heartland can be associated with transportation costs alone. The question, thus, remains: how much fastercould the country have developed, holding all other variables constant, had it had its own outlet to the high seas?

While it is generally acknowledged that Meles was at his best when warring with Ethiopians, taking on the one state adversary that landlockedhis country was, in the writer's opinion, against everything that defined him. It was against his worldview, against his ideology. Granted, that because distance-related trade costs restrict export performance more in land locked developing countries than in other developing countries, the decision to protect a nation's interests is always a cost/benefit consideration over the long-term. As such, a leader willing to protect the long term interests of the nation would have been willing to sacrifice a great deal and inflict what ever cost it would have required to safeguard that interest. That it did not turn out that way cannot now be considered a"win-win" given the available evidence regarding this matter.

MUSIC LEGENDS

Getatchew Mekurya, the saxophone legend remembered

- New York Times April 14, 2016

Getatchew Mekurya, a saxophonist with an ardent, full-throated style whoworked predominantly in Ethiopia for decades before being embraced by aworldwide audience, died on April 4 in Addis Ababa. He was 81.

The cause was an infection in his legs as a result of diabetes, said Terrie Hessels, a founding member of the Dutch punk band the Ex, which touredand recorded with Mr. Mekurya over the last dozen years, fueling his late-career renaissance.

Mr. Mekurya (his name is pronounced GET-a-chew Me-KUR-ya) had an imposing sound and presence, blowing in declamatory gusts with a fervent, quavering vibrato. He found renown outside his native country after one of his albums from the early 1970s, “Negus of Ethiopian Sax,”was released on CD in 2003 as part of the popular world-music reissue series “Éthiopiques.”

His rediscovery led to collaborations with musicians from far beyond his home turf, including the saxophonist Russ Gershon and his band, the Either/Orchestra, from Cambridge, Mass. The Ex sought out Mr. Mekurya and invited him to a festival in Amsterdam, where they struck an energetic rapport. They released a collaborative album, “Moa Anbessa,” in2006.

That album, which set Mr. Mekurya’s fervent cry against churning guitars and bleating horns, led to a spate of concert bookings in more than a dozen countries. A potent follow-up, “Y’Anbessaw Tezeta,” was released in2012, capturing Mr. Mekurya’s road-tested bond with the Ex and bringing vibrant new life to compositions he had originally recorded 40 years earlier.
Getatchew Mekurya was born on March 14, 1935, in Yifat, Ethiopia. As a child he learned to play traditional folk instruments: the kirar, a six-string lyre, and the masenqo, a single-string bowed lute. By his teens he had switched to saxophone and clarinet, instruments popularized in Ethiopia under the reign of Emperor Haile Selassie, who had a fondness for militarybrass bands.

Mr. Mekurya spent his early career as a member of government- sponsored orchestras in Addis Ababa, starting at age 13 with the Municipality Band and continuing with the house band of the Haile SelassieI Theater. Later, as a member of the elite Police Orchestra, he often backed popular singers like Hirut Beqele and Alemayehu Eshete.

As early as the 1950s, Mr. Mekurya was using his tenor saxophone to emulate the Ethiopian chants known as shellela, traditionally shouted bywarriors going into battle. His quest for an impassioned, expressly vocalquality on the saxophone yielded a startlingly original sound, though it would later elicit comparisons to the 1960s free-jazz maverick Albert Ayler, whom he claimed at the time never to have heard.

Mr. Mekurya stood apart from the appealingly sinuous hybrid known as Ethio-jazz, spearheaded by the vibraphonist, pianist and composer MulatuAstatke. Rather than a cosmopolitan form of jazz with Ethiopian influence,Mr. Mekurya made a music of gruff, earthy incantation, rooted in folkloric custom. He often performed in warrior garb, making the connection explicit.

When “Negus of Ethiopian Sax” was originally released on Philips Ethiopia,it was a showcase for shellela, with Mr. Mekurya’s tenor ululating over electric bass, organ, piano and drums, in hypnotic triplet meter. The music’s brazen assurance still resonated decades later: One track, simply titled “Shellela,” provided the core sample for “I Come Prepared,” a 2009 single by the rapper K’Naan and the singer Damian Marley.

Mr. Mekurya’s survivors include nine children and numerousgrandchildren. His wife, Ayalech, died last year.

Among his memorable public triumphs was a 2008 Lincoln Center Out of Doors concert in New York, featuring the Either/Orchestra and AlemayehuEshete as well as the singer Mahmoud Ahmed. Mr. Mekurya performed with the Ex, but he earned one of the evening's loudest cheers with a vaulting unaccompanied improvisation. Source: http://www.nytimes.com/2016/04/12/arts/ ... at-81.html

ARBA LIJOCH

How Armenian Genocide orphans sparked a revolution in Ethiopianmusic? April 14, 2016
A new documentary called Tezeta (The Ethiopian Armenians) discussesthe Armenian-Ethiopian connection. Directed by Aramazt Kalayjian, thefilm is currently in production, accoding to okayafrica.com.

In 1924, the Prince of Ethiopia, Ras Tafari visited Jerusalem. While walking through the Armenian Quarter with his entourage, he came acrossa marching band of forty children.

Their talent made a profound impression on the young prince.

Upon inquiring about the young musicians, Tafari learned they were orphans of the Armenian genocide and with permission from the ArmenianPatriarchate of Jerusalem, adopted them, bringing the Arba Lijoch (Forty Children in Amharic) as they came to be known, back with him to Addis Ababa. It was to be the beginning of a musical renaissance in Ethiopia that unfolded and developed throughout the next few decades.

Tafari provided the Arba Lijoch a musical education along with stipends and housing. They came to form the Royal Imperial Brass Band, beginninga tradition in modern Ethiopian music of heavily using brass instruments. The Arba Lijoch were trained by musical director Kevork Nalbandian, also an orphan of Armenian descent.

Impressed by their progress and skill, Selassie asked Nalbandian to compose a national anthem for Ethiopia and on the November 2, 1930, coronation day, the anthem, Marsh Teferi was unveiled with the Arba Lijoch performing and Prince Ras Tafari becoming the Emperor of Ethiopia,King of Kings, Haile Selassie I.

Nalbandian and his nephew, Nerses Nalbandian, would go on to lay the foundation of orchestral brass bands into Ethiopia's musical fabric, a sharpturn from traditional stringed instruments like the pentatonic scaled krar. It was from this foundation that artists such as Mulatu Astatke built walls and installed a roof upon, incorporating traditional Ethiopian folk music, religious music, western jazz and funk to create the distinctly Ethiopian sound of Ethio Jazz.

After Haile Selassie was overthrown and the military junta called The Dergcame into power, a curfew was enforced, effectively shuttering the bustling jazz scene in the many night clubs that dotted the capital. Even after The Derg was overthrown in 1991 and the curfew was dismantled, the culture of calling it a night early had stuck with many Ethiopians and has only began to change in recent years.

But music wasn't the only area in which Armenians influenced Ethiopia.

The Ethiopian-Armenian connection runs deep. They have traded with oneanother for centuries. They also both were among the first countries to convert to the then new religion of Christianity and even practice the same branch of orthodoxy. Even their alphabets are similar.

Armenian Ethiopians, although small in number have made significantcontributions to Ethiopian music, culture, art and politics

Defections Worsening in the Ethiopian/TPLF Army

ESat News April 12, 2016

Defections by the army was top on the agenda at a recent high level military conference presided by the Minister of Defense, Sirage Fergessaand the Chief of Staff Samora Yenus.

The Minister told the mid-level officers that the study conducted on the root causes of defections by the army was not satisfactory. The participants agreed the study did not cover the real causes of defectionsbut mainly focused on administrative problems in the army.

There have been reports of defections in the Ethiopian army in recent years, with most of the defectors joining armed resistance groups operating from the country's northern border. Defectors say corruption, nepotism and ethnic favoritism were the reasons for their defections.
Scores of air force pilots have defected just in the last couple of yearsaccusing the regime of ethnic favoritism.

About 90% of Ethiopia's generals and senior officers are from the Tigrayethnic group causing discontent and resentment on the part of the rankand file. Army generals and high level officers are involved in unbridled high level corruption while the rank and file eke out an existence.

Government of UK

The Foreign and Commonwealth Office (FCO) advise against alltravel to Ethiopia

Summary

Still current at:

14 April 2016

Updated:

14 April 2016 Latest update:

Summary – severe floods in parts of Ethiopia including Jijiga, the Jinka road in South Omo, Moyale on the Kenyan border, and parts of the Afarregion; check local reports before you travel

The Foreign and Commonwealth Office (FCO) advise against all travel to:
within 10 km of the border with Eritrea, with the exception of the main road through Axum and Adigrat, and tourist sites close to the road (e.g. Debre Damo and Yeha) areas off the principal roads/towns within 10 km of the borders with Sudan and Kenya within 10 km of the border with South Sudan the Nogob (previously Fik), Jarar (previously Degehabur), Shabelle (previously Gode), Korahe and Dollo (previously Warder) zones of the Somali region within 100 km of the Ethiopian border with Somalia and Kenya in the Afder and Liben zones of Ethiopia’s Somali region the Danakil desert area: north of the Mille-Djibouti and Mille-Chifra roads, andeast of the towns of Bere-Ale, Shehet, Didigsala and Chifra the four woredas (districts) (Akobo, Wantawo, Jikawo and Lare) of the Nuer zone and the Jore woreda of the Agnuak zone of the Gambella region

The FCO advise against all but essential travel to:west and south-west Shewa zones in the Oromia region (this area includes the popular tourist destination of Wenchi Crater) Jijiga town three woredas of the Agnuak zone of the Gambella region that border on South Sudan (Dima, Goge andEtang) and the

Gambella wildlife reserve

In mid-April 2016 there were severe floods in parts of Ethiopia includingJijiga, the Jinka road in South Omo, Moyale on the Kenyan border, and parts of the Afar region. Check local reports for areas you intend to visitbefore travelling.

There were reports of a hand grenade attack in Debre Zeit on Wednesday30 March 2016. Check local reports before travelling to this area.
Widespread protests have occurred across the Oromia region in recent weeks; some have turned violent resulting in casualties and others havecaused disruption to road travel. There is a heightened risk of travel across the region. You should very carefully check the latest security situation on the ground before travelling, and review your plans accordingly.

On Saturday 12 March there were reports of clashes that lead to the Konso authorities blocking the road leading to Yabelo and Jinka regions. Police have advised people not to travel until the issue is resolved and theroad reopened. You should take extra care if you’re planning to travel within this region.

On the weekend of 13 to 14 February, there was a further serious outbreak of violence in the Shashemene and Langano areas, a few hoursdrive south of Addis Ababa. There have been wide spread clashes with local authorities and reports of vehicles being attacked.

In late January and early February 2016, ethnic tensions in Gambella city and surrounding areas have resulted in a number of casualties. Federal authorities have been deployed and a curfew imposed. The FCO already advise against all travel in 4 woredas of the Gambella region and against all but essential travel in a further 3. You should monitor local news mediafor further information before travelling, remain vigilant and take care in crowded areas.

There have been heavy clashes including gunfire between protesters and security forces on 17 December 2015 in Sululta, 20km north of Addis Ababa on the road to Bahir Dar. Localised clashes in the Galabat area resulted in the closure of the Metema-Galabat border post with Sudan on15 and 16 December 2015 and further crossing point closures may occur.

There was an explosion at the Anwar Mosque in the Merkato area ofcentral Addis Ababa on 11 December 2015.
There is a high threat from terrorism. There are credible reports that AlShabaab plan, and have the capability, to attack targets in Ethiopia. In October 2014 the US Embassy in Addis Ababa issued a travel warning advising “those in Addis Ababa to avoid areas where both Ethiopians andwesterners frequent”, and citing threat reports of Al Shabaab’s intent to target the Bole area of the city.

You should be vigilant at all times, especially in crowded areas and publicplaces like transport hubs, hotels, restaurants, bars and places of worshipand during major gatherings like religious or sporting events. There is a high threat of kidnapping in Ethiopia’s Somali region, particularly in the eastern areas to which the FCO advise against all travel. See Terrorism

Crime levels are low, but you should avoid large gatherings and publicdemonstrations and be alert to the risk of street crime. See Crime

The Ethiopia-Eritrea border remains closed. Several security incidents have taken place along the border. The risk of cross-border tensions remains. There is a threat of kidnapping along the border. See Local travel

Owning ivory is strictly prohibited in Ethiopia. Anyone caught in possession of ivory can expect to be detained by police. See Local lawsand customs

Around 20,000 British nationals visit Ethiopia every year. Most visits aretrouble free.

The Overseas Business Risk service offers information and advice for British companies operating overseas on how to manage political, economic, and business security-related risks. Take out comprehensivetravel and medical insurance before you travel.

LEGENDS

Sayyiid Mohammed Abdulle Hassan nicknamed “Mad Mullah” Sayyiid Mohammed Abdulle Hassan (April 7, 1856 – December 21, 1921)The longest colonial war in Africa was fought in Somalia, for over two decades, against three countries. One of the first aerial bombardments inworld history was conducted against the Somalis during the struggle. It was the first aerial bombardement in history to determine military strategy.

Sayyiid Mohammed Abdulle Hassan was a Somali nationalist leader, but some historians say an ethnic-Somali origin from the present Ethiopian Ogaden region, meaning by origin Ogadeni. A poet, military commander who led the longest colonial war in Africa. He... was born in the town of Buuhoodle, northern Somalia, but local historians say within the Ethiopianpart of Ogaden and was fighting three european countries mainly the United Kingdom, Italy and France(+ the abbysinians, mainly Menelik whosided with the europeans so he could expand Abbysinia).

Sayyiid Mohammed or the "Mad Mullah" as the brittish called him was an expert in guerilla warfare. He was fighting against european imperialism for over 24 years. One of the first aerial bombardments in world history was executed by the brittish against him(and his dervish troops). It wouldbe one of the first time in world history were military outcome would be determined by airpower. On 21 December 1921, after two decades of fighting Hassan died of influenza at the age of 64. He is a well known andwell respected historical leader of the Somali people. The statue that you're looking at was in the center of Mogadishu the capital of Somalia. AStatue erected for Sayyiid Mohammed Abdulle Hassan in the Ethiopian Somali town of JigJiga.

CROSS BORDER RAIDS

Ethiopia says South Sudanese gunmen kill 140 civilians in cross-border raid By Aaron Maasho, Reuters April 16, 2016

ADDIS ABABA - Ethiopia said on Saturday that gunmen from South Sudanhad killed 140 people in a raid in its Gambela region, and that Ethiopian troops had crossed the border to pursue the attackers.

The attack took place on Friday in the Jakaya area that straddles the border, in a region that hosts alongside a neighboring province more than 284,000 South Sudanese refugees who fled conflict in the world's youngest nation. "140 civilians died in the attack carried out by bandits that crossed from South Sudan," a statement from the government communications office said. "Ethiopian troops are pursuing the bandits inside South Sudan. 60 of the assailants have been killed so far," it added.

The gunmen had no relation to South Sudanese government troops or rebel forces who fought the government in Juba in a civil war that ended with a peace deal signed last year, the body said. South Sudanese officialswere not immediately available for comment.

Under pressure from the region, the United States, the United Nations andother powers, South Sudan's feuding sides signed an initial peace deal in August and agreed to share out ministerial positions in January.

Fighting broke out in December 2013 months after President Salva Kiir sacked his deputy Riek Machar as vice president, exacerbating a politicaldispute that reopened ethnic rifts between Kiir's Dinka ethnic group and Machar's Nuer.

Machar said last week he would return to the capital Juba on April 18 to form a transitional government with Kiir. Ethiopia's Gambela region has asizeable Nuer population as well. (Reporting by Aaron Maasho; editing byRalph Boulton)

having regard to Rule 123(2) its Rules of procedure

A. whereas over the past two months , Ethiopia's largest region, Oromia,has been hit by a wave of mass protests over the expansion of the municipal boundary of the capital, Addis Ababa which has posed risks forfarmers eviction from their land;

B. whereas security forces used excessive lethal force and killed at least 140 protesters and injured many more, in what may be the biggest crisisto hit Ethiopia since the 2005 election violence;

C. whereas on the 14 January 2016 the government decided to cancel thedisputed large scale urban development plan ; whereas if implemented, the plan will expand the city's boundary by 20 times its current size; whereas Addis Ababa's enlargement has already displaced millions of Oromo farmers and trapped them in poverty;

D. whereas the ethnic Oromos continue to suffer particular discriminationand human rights violations in efforts to suppress potential dissent in theregion;

E. whereas the Ethiopian authorities arbitrarily arrested a number of peaceful protesters, journalists and opposition party leaders in the contextof a brutal crackdown on the protests in the Oromia Region; whereas those arrested are at risk of torture and other ill-treatment;

F. whereas the government's labelled largely peaceful protesters as'terrorists' deploying military forces against them;

G. whereas on December 23, the authorities arrested Bekele Gerba, deputy chairman of the Oromo Federalist Congress (OFC); Oromia's largest legally registered political party; whereas Mr Gerba was being taken in a prison known for torture and other ill-treatment practices and shortly after he was reportedly hospitalized; whereas his whereabouts arenow unknown, raising concerns of an enforced disappearance.

H. whereas other senior OFC leaders have been arbitrarily arrested inrecent weeks or are said to be under virtual house arrest.

I. whereas last December leading activists such as Getachew Shiferaw (Editor-in-Chief: Negere Ethiopia), Yonathan Teressa (an online activist) and Fikadu Mirkana (Oromia Radio and TV) have been arrested arbitrarilythough yet to be charged by the Ethiopian authorities.

J. whereas the current protests echo the bloody events of April and May 2014, when federal forces fired into groups of largely peaceful Oromo protesters, killing dozens; whereas at least hundreds more students werearrested, and many remain behind bars

K. whereas Ethiopia's government has regularly been accusing people whoexpress even mild criticism of government policy of association with terrorism; whereas dozens of journalists, bloggers, protesters, students and activists have been prosecuted under the country's draconian 2009 Anti-Terrorism Proclamation.

L. whereas Ethiopia's government imposes pervasive restrictions on independent civil society and media; whereas according to the Committeefor the Protection of Journalist's (CPJs) 2014 prison census found that Ethiopia was the fourth worst jailer of journalists in the world, with at least 17 journalists behind bars, whereas Ethiopia also ranked fourth on CPJ's 2015 list of the 10 Most Censored Countries

M. whereas the Ethiopian authorities have routinely summoned to courtthe "Zone 9 bloggers" with terrorism charges for their writing over thepast 2 years.

N. whereas numerous prisoners of conscience, imprisoned in previous years based solely on their peaceful exercise of their freedom of expression and opinion, including journalists and opposition political party members, remained in detention.; whereas these included some convictedin unfair trials, some whose trials continued, and some who continued to be detained without charge, among others Eskinder Nega, Temesghen Desalegn, Solomon Kebede, Yesuf Getachew, Woubshet Taye, Saleh Edris,and Tesfalidet Kidane

O. whereas severe restrictions on external funding continue to underminethe work and effectiveness of non-governmental organisations (NGOs) under the 2009 Charities and Societies Proclamation.

P. Whereas Ethiopia rejected recommendations to amend the Charities andSocieties Proclamation and the Anti-Terrorism Proclamation that several countries made during the examination of its rights record under the Human Rights Council Universal Periodic Review in May 2014.

Q. Whereas Andargachew Tsige, a British-Ethiopian citizen and leader of anopposition party living in exile, was arrested in June 2014 while in transit through Yemen's main airport and forcibly removed to Addis Ababa; whereas Tsige had been condemned to death several years earlier in his absence, and has been in death row practically incommunicado since then; whereas Juan Mendez, the UN special rapporteur on torture, has written to the Ethiopian and UK governments saying he is investigating the treatment of Tsige, following claims that Tsige is being deprived of sleep and held in isolation;

R. Whereas the Ethiopian government has de facto imposed a widespreadblockade of the Ogaden region in Ethiopia, rich in oil and gas reserves; whereas attempts to work and report from the region by international media and humanitarian groups are seen as criminal acts, punishable under the anti-terrorist proclamation; whereas there are reports of war crimes and severe human rights violations perpetrated by the Army and government paramilitary forces against the Ogaden population;

S. whereas The Ethiopian People's Revolutionary Democratic Front (EPRDF), the ruling party coalition, won all 547 parliamentary seats in theMay 2015 elections, due in part to the lack of space for critical or dissenting voices in the election process; whereas May's federal elections took place in a general atmosphere of intimidation, and concerns over thelack of independence of the National Electoral Board;

T. Whereas Ethiopia enjoys political support from western donors and mostof its regional neighbours, mostly due to its role as host of the African Union (AU) and its contribution to UN peacekeeping, security and aid partnerships with Western countries;

U. whereas Ethiopia receives more aid than any other African country –close to $3bn per year, or about half the national government budget

V. whereas for decades the government have been authorizing big development projects to foreign investors, which have been leading to severe land grabbing and millions vulnerable people often forcibly evictedand insensitively resettling; whereas often the government does not offerthe local communities any alternative to permanent settlement and had not fully consulted groups before evicting them.

W. whereas some donors, including UK's Department for International Development (DFID) and the World Bank, rechanneled funding from the problematic Protection of Basic Services (PBS) program in 2015 which wasassociated with the abusive "villagization program," a government effort to relocate 1.5 million rural people into permanent villages, ostensibly to improve their access to basic services; whereas some of the relocations inthe first year of the program in Gambella region in 2011 were accompanied by violence, including beatings and arbitrary arrests, and insufficient consultation and compensation

X. whereas Ethiopia is experiencing its worst drought in decades, deepening food insecurity and severe emaciation and unusual livestock deaths; whereas with 640 000 refugees, Ethiopia is the country in Africa with the highest number of refugees; whereas nearly 560 000 people areinternally displaced due to floods , violent clashes over scarce resources and drought

Y. whereas the current political situation in Ethiopia and the brutal repression of dissent put a serious risk the security, development andstability in the country;

1. Strongly condemns the recent use of excessive force by the security forces in Oromia and in all Ethiopian regions, the increased cases of human rights violations and abuses, including violations of people's physical integrity, arbitrary arrests and illegal detentions, the use of torture, and violations of the freedom of the press and of expression, aswell as the prevalence of impunity;

2. Calls for an immediate end to violence, human rights violations andpolitical intimidation and persecution;

3. Urges for the immediate release of all those jailed for exercising theirrights to peaceful assembly and freedom of expression, including students, farmers, opposition politicians, academics, bloggers and journalists ;

4. Calls on the government to carry out a credible, transparent and impartial investigation into the killings of protesters and other alleged human rights violations in connection with the protest movement, and to fairly prosecute those responsible, regardless of rank or position;

5. Welcomes the government's decision to completely halt the Addis Ababa and Oromia special zone master plan, that plans to expand the municipal boundary of Addis Ababa. Calls for an immediate inclusive and transparent political dialogue, including the government, opposition parties, civil society representatives and the local population preventing any further violence or radicalisation of the population; takes the view that such dialogue, conducing to the democratisation of the country, is not possible under the current political conditions;

6. Calls on the Government of Ethiopia to respect the Universal Declarationof Human Rights and the African Union Charter of Human and Peoples' Rights, including the right to peaceful assembly, freedom of expression and association;

7. Urges the government to immediately invite the UN Special Rapporteuron the rights to freedom of association and peaceful assembly and other UN human rights experts to visit Ethiopia to report on the situation;

8. Calls on the government to stop suppressing the free flow of information, including by jamming media broadcasts and harassing media,including through intrusive surveillance programs, and facilitate access throughout Ethiopia for independent journalists and human rights monitors;

9. Calls on the government to include local communities in a dialogue onthe implementation of any large scale development project and ensure equal distribution of future benefits to the population ; to ensure that farmers and pastoralists are adequately compensated, preventing them from any arbitrary or forced displacement without consultation and adequate compensation.

10. Expresses its concerns on the government's forced resettlementprogram, known as "villagization program".

11. States that respect for human rights and the rule of law are crucial tothe EU's policies to promote development in Ethiopia and throughout theHorn of Africa;

12. Call on the EU to effectively monitor programs and policies to ensure that EU development assistance is not contributing to human rights violations in Ethiopia, particularly programs linked to displacement of farmers and pastoralists, and develop strategies to minimize any negativeimpact of displacement within EU funded development projects;

13. Further calls on the EU and Member States to react promptly to the escalation of violence and the deterioration of the human rights situationin the country by publicly and privately condemning the use of excessive force by security forces in Oromia and call on the government to exercise restraint in its response against protests and the exercise of basicfreedoms by the Ethiopian people;

14. Stresses that financial support to Ethiopia from the EU should be measured attending to the country's human rights record and the degreeto which the Ethiopian government promotes reforms towards democratisation, as the only way to ensure stability and sustainable development;

15. Instructs its President to forward this resolution to the Government and the Parliament of Ethiopia, the European Commission, the Council, theVice-President of the Commission/High Representative of the Union for Foreign Affairs and Security Policy, the institutions of the African Union and the Secretary-General of the United Nations. LEGEND ETHIOPIANS

In Memory of Bejrond Tekle Hawariat Tekle Mariyam; the First Ethiopianconstituton writer

Tekle Hawariat Tekle Mariyam (Amharic: ተክለ ሐዋርዓት ተክለ ማርያም; June 1884 – April 1977) was an Ethiopian politician and intellectual of the Japanizer school. He was the primary author of Ethiopia's July 16, 1931 constitution,which was influenced by the Japanese Meiji Constitution.

Life

Bahru Zewde includes Tekle Hawariat in the first generation of Ethiopianssent abroad for his education.

Born in Shewa, after the initial stages of atraditional Ethiopian education at a local church Tekle Hawariat moved toHarar at the age of nine to live with a relative who was a retainer of Ras Makonnen Woldemikael. He accompanied the Ras against the Italians in 1895-6. It was during the First Italo-Ethiopian War that his mentor Ras Makonnen entrusted him to a member of the Russian Red Cross, Count

Nikolai Leontieff, to take him back to Russia and have him educated. He arrived to Saint Petersburg in 1901, where he studied artillery at the SaintPetersburg military academy, achieving the rank of colonel. He was befriended by a number of prominent Russian liberals of the day, includingPrincess Volkonsky, daughter of the famous Decembrist revolutionary Sergei Volkonsky, and spent altogether 17 years in Russia. Once he returned to Ethiopia, however, Tekle Hawariat became famous as provincial governor, agronomist, and for his part in writing Ethiopia's first constitution. Tekle Hawariat was an important government official during the reign of Iyasu V, although he played a part in Iyasu's depostion of 27 September 1916. Despite his support for the new ruler, Empress Zauditu, during her reign he wrote and produced a play, "Fabula: Yawreoch Commedia", which used animal characters to criticize the corruption and backwardness of the Ethiopian court. As a result the Empress banned all further theatre in Ethiopia, an order that was later lifted by Emperor Haile Selassie in 1930.

Under the patronage of Haile Selassie (then the regent Ras Tafari), Tekle Hawariat first was made governor of Jijiga in 1917, and his efforts at this post gave him "a reputation for enlightened administration," according to Bahru Zewde, who goes on to note that "much of the credit for the transformation of Jijjiga from a garrison town to a modern urban centre goes to Takla-Hawaryat". Despite this good work, Tekle Hawariat either quit or was removed from this post: Tekle Hawariat in his unpublished autobiography claims Ras Tafari kept reappointing people he had dismissed for inefficiency. After a few years of idleness, Tekle Hawariat was appointed to another governorship, to the province of Charchar, one of the provinces Tafari was developing as a model of progressive or modern government; however, although he displayed enterprise and a dedication to duty, Tekle Hawariat had an independent character that led him to conflict with the Regent, and despite the demonstration of his skill at governor of Chercher province, because of his early Russian connections due to a Bolshevik panic that had gripped the capital, in 1928Tekle Hawariat, was arrested and kept in jail for some time.

After becoming Emperor, Haile Selassie found another use for Tekle Hawariat: he was given the duty of drafting the first Constitution of Ethiopia. Bahru Zewde comments that Tekle Hawariat "could be said to have been waiting almost all his life for just an occasion"; however, his draft was subjected to close scrutiny by the Emperor and his associates Ras Kasa and Heruy Welde Sellasie, who modified Tekle Hawariat's text "to meet imperial needs." Changes included the legislative powers grantedto the parliament were reduced, and instead of Tekle Hawariat's proposal that the deputies be elected the final draft made them appointed.

Three months after the promulgation of the constitution, Tekle Hawariatwas made Minister of Finance, but he lasted in that office barely more than a year. Bahru Zewde believes the reason for this brief tenure was due to his efforts to make the office efficient and responsible, which led toinevitable conflicts not only with traditional-minded ministers, but with theEmperor himself who did not care to make a distinction between the public purse and the private accounts of the emperor. "Given the acrimonious relations with the palace," notes Bahru Zewde, "it is not muchof a surprise that Takla-Hawaryat next found himself posted as Ethiopian minister to London, Paris, and Geneva."

Tekle Hawariat had been part of the group who accompanied Haile Selassie to Europe in 1924, so although he could have been chosen for these duties because of his qualifications, Bahru Zewde insists "the evidence is too strong for this being more a case of removing from centre stage a character who was too independent and self-willed for the emperor's taste." His most important posting was representing Ethiopia atthe League of Nations for many years, most notably at the sessions duringthe Walwal Incident. However, the uncooperative attitudes of not only theBritish and French delegates frustrated him so much he asked Emperor Haile Selassie to be relieved so he could return to Ethiopia where he couldbe of better use using his military training to organize his country's defenses against the unavoidable conflict.

Tekle Hawariat crossed paths with his Emperor one last time, while the other was leaving Ethiopia to make a personal appeal to the League of Nations. When Haile Selassie and his entourage reached Mieso, he was there with his troops; Tekle Hawariat boarded the train. As John Spencertersely states, "The encounter must have been a bitter one." Spencer happened to be aboard the train five days later which stopped at Afdem, where Tekle Hawariat boarded train and entered Spencer's compartment."Although I must have been for him an almost complete stranger, he lostno time unburdening himself to me of his thoughts about Haile Selassie, whom he denounced as a traitor to Ethiopia, a coward, and one unworthyto bear the title of Emperor after his flight into exile."

Once he reached Djibouti, he sought an agricultural concession, but the local authorities politely refused him. Tekle Hawariat then moved to Aden,where in September 1937 he petitioned the colonial government in Kenyato resettle there. The authorities refused his request, concerned that his presence would encourage unrest against the Italians. According to BahruZewde, Haile Selassie's victorious return to Ethiopia found his one-time ambassador in Madagascar where he prolonged his exile until 1955/56, and upon returning to Ethiopia Tekle Hawariat "retired to the obscurity of a gentleman-farmer's life in Hirna, Hararge." Tekle Hawariat and the Emperor were late in the former's life.

Further details

Paul Henze credits Tekle Hawariat with introducing to Haile Selassie to thethree Habtewold brothers -- Makonnen Habte-Wold, Aklilu Habte-Wold, and Akalework Habte-Wold—who became prominent in Ethiopian politicallife.

The sons of Tekle Hawariat include Germachew Tekle-Hawariat (died 1987). Educated in Switzerland, Germachew served as a diplomat afterHaile Selassie's restoration in 1941, as well as being a noted author, whose works include the novel Araya and a play based on the life of the19th century Ethiopian emperor Tewodros I.

Princess Elena Volkonsky raised Tekle Hawariat, because he was adoptedby her oldest son Colonel Manchanov, who never married. Tekle Hawariatconsidered her his grandmother and has stated this in his biography.
Tekle Hawariat loved Russia and his Russian family. He kept in touch with them even after the Russian Revolution. One of his aunts took refuge in Ethiopia and stayed with the Tekle Hawariat family in Hirna, where he wasGovernor of Chercher. All this information is in his biography that was published in Amahric. Also in this autobiography is the only published eyewitness account of the death of Emperor Haile Selassie's mother, Woizero Yeshimebet Ali, in childbirth. Tekle Hawariat's biography has been published in Amahric by the University of Addis Ababa.

My past Life in Kaffa, the birth place of Coffee Arabica -Dr.JackHerron
In April of 1953 I lived in Jimma Ethiopia with my Father, Mother, and twosisters. Jimma was in Kafa Provence and we were all aware that “ coffee “had been in...troduced to the world from “ The Abyssinian “ highlands! Wewere so proud to live there. Mother was a certified teacher and had taken textbooks for our schooling, It did not take long for Mother to throw the textbooks to the wind. She instructed us to go forth and enjoy and learn from our environment. We were in love with the country and the Ethiopian people. Our experience there was the “experience of a life time“.

In Jimma, Father helped to establish Jimma Agricultural School and Mother taught music. Most importantly we were happy and had greatfriends.

In May of that year we moved to Addis Ababa. I attended French Schoolwith my friend David Davis and his brother Kenny. Rumor had surfaced ,that my Father , Jack Herron Sr., was being promoted to extension director for the country of Eritrea. I made one or two trips with Father toscout the new territory. In July we moved to the beautiful city of Asmara. The U. S . Army Station(Apo 843) was known as Radio Marina when we arrived. In August of 1953 it became Kagnew Station! My Mother was the first Certified Contract teacher at Kagnew Station. We kids attended Asmara American School at Kagnew Station .

Fathers charge as Extension Agent was to work with farmers to developbetter methods to grow wheat and cotton. As a result, we traveled in Ethiopia , Somalia, Sudan, Kenya, and Eritrea. Ethiopia was Federated with Eritrea. While we were there, everyone lived in a peaceful climate.

Most persons ask me to relate my experiences with His Imperial Majesty. (
H. I. M.) Being in his presence, was out of this world. He was kind andvery gentle to myself and those with me. He spoke very good English.

I have a multitude of pictures and I am quite willing to lecture about anddiscuss the politics of Ethiopia.

Aba Hanna Jemma (c.1896 to 1960):

Special assistant to His Majesy the Emperor

Abba Hanna Jemma (circa 1896-December 1960), also known as Abba Hanna, was personal chaplain to Emperor Haile Selassie (q.v.) [reigned1930-74].

The son of Fitawrari Jemma (Abba Gataw) and Wayzaro Essayu, he was born at Gri Qochar in Harrarghe province. He studied first in the town of Jar Sonini, and entered the service of Dajazmach Taffari Makonnen (laterto become Emperor Haile Selassie I) in 1909. In about 1917 he retired toDabra Libanos, the Ethiopian Orthodox church monastery in Shewa, 45 miles (72 km) north of Addis Ababa, and became a monk. On the order from Ras Taffari, he established a house for the poor, known as “Beta- Salihom”, at the monastery.

Shortly after in 1930, Aba Hanna Jemma came to Addis Ababa and took office at the palace, with the special responsibility of distributing vestments and money to various branches of the Ethiopian orthodox churches and monasteries. At the time of the Italian invasion in 1935-36, he accompanied the emperor as far as Yaju in then Wallo province, but was then ordered to Nagalle, in south-east Sidamo, to organize the supplyof provisions for the army of Dejazmatch Dasta Damtaw (q.v.). From there he went to Yergelam, then provincial capital of Sidamo, and then accompanied Princess Tanagna Warq, the eldest child of Haile Selassie, toAddis Ababa. He later exiled with the emperor to Great Britain, returning with him via Khartoum to Addis Ababa in May 1941. He was killed in the attempted coup against the emperor which took place in December 1960, and was buried at Dabra Libanos monastry.

More than 400 people, many of whom Ethiopians, feared dead inthe Mediterranean (ESAT News April 19, 2016) Several media outlets reported that over 400people have drowned in the Mediterranean Sea on Sunday after their boats capsized.

The refugees from Ethiopia, Somalia and Eritrea were travelling from Egypt to Italy when the accident took their lives. Most of the dead wereEthiopians.

Awel Abdulwahib, an Ethiopian who have lost four family members told ESAT on the phone from Egypt that the deceased had left Ethiopia following crackdown by government forces on protesters in the Oromia region. Having heard the bad news, Ethiopians in Egypt have gathered tomourn the dead in keeping with the Ethiopian tradition.

Over 200 of the 400 drowned are said to be Ethiopians, who, according toAwel, have left Ethiopia to save their lives from the brutal crackdown by security forces on protesters in the Oromia region. They were mostly fromBale, Dire Dawa and Harar regions of Ethiopia.

A similar accident last year took the lives of 800 refugees as they tried toreach the European shores over the Mediterranean sea.

A Farmer who claims to be an astonishing 160 years old age

Obbo (Mr.) Dhaqabo Ebba, from Ethiopia’s Oromo region, would be 44 years older than the oldest ever recorded living person. He claims to haveclear memories of Italy's invasion of Ethiopia in 1895, but sadly there is no birth certificate to prove his age. When Italy invaded Ethiopia he had two wives, and his son was old enough to herd cattle. Mr Dhaqabo Ebba has far outlived anyone of his generation, making it difficult to find someo...ne to corroborate his story, but he claims to have the largest extended family of anyone in his region and has seen great-grandchildrengrow up into adulthood. The evidence from what the man can remember is compelling. The Guinness World Records currently recognises, French woman Jeanne Calment as the oldest person to have ever lived. She diedin 1997 at the age of 122.

Fears 400 refugees have drowned in Mediterranean after boatscapsize (Samuel Osborne Monday April 18, 2016)

Reports say the refugees were fleeing to Italy from Somalia, Ethiopia andEritrea

Hundreds of refugees are feared to have drowned in the MediterraneanSea after their boats capsized.

Italy's President, Sergio Mattarella, said there seemed to have been "yetanother tragedy in the Mediterranean".

His comments followed a report by BBC Arabic quoting the Somali ambassador to Europe that 400 people had died crossing from Egypt toEurope.

Reports said the refugees were fleeing to Italy from Somalia, Ethiopia andEritrea in four boats which were ill-equipped for the journey.

"2016, the Mediterranean is a mass grave," Médecins Sans Frontières(MSF) tweeted in response to the news.

The original flurry of reports have, however, yet to be confirmed by eitherEgyptian or Greek officials.

The Italian coastguard has also said it knew nothing about the reporteddisaster.

Médecins Sans Frontières has also been unable to confirm to TheIndependent whether the tragedy has taken place.

Earlier on Monday morning, the Italian coastguard said 108 refugees hadbeen saved and six bodies recovered from a semi-submerged rubber dinghy on Sunday.

Separately, 33 refugees were rescued overnight off eastern coast ofSicily.

A year ago, a fishing boat crowded with refugees sank in theMediterranean with around 800 people trapped inside.

Italy has now vowed to raise the shipwreck from the sea floor, to recoverthe corpses.

Almost 6,000 refugees sailed from Libya to Italy last week, in what appears to be the beginning of a wave of 100,000, the InternationalOrganisation for Migration said.

EU policymakers have been criticised of "killing by neglect" after they cutrescue missions in the Mediterranean.

The scaling back of search and rescue operations "created the conditionsthat led to massive loss of life," according to a report.

Tanya Steele, CEO of Save the Children, said: “The lack of concrete measures to protect children who gamble and lose their lives to reach theperceived safety of Europe should weigh on all our minds. A year on fromone of the greatest migration tragedies in the Mediterranean, safe and legal routes have not been properly implemented.

"Europe continues to see this migration crisis as primarily about safeguarding its own borders. A third of those desperate enough to makethis perilous journey are children. Even though the European Commission has identified children as one of the most vulnerable groups, recommending relocation measures as a priority, in effect, this is only happening on paper.

“This gruesome anniversary must not be purely symbolic. It is an insult tothe thousands of men, women and children who have drowned on Europe’s shores if action is not urgently taken to prevent the further loss of human lives. Europe’s leaders must invest in search and rescue at seaand offer safe and dignified means of applying for asylum, in line with its legal obligations.”

Ethiopian Civic & Political organizations:

A call for the World Health Organization (WHO) to reject thecandidacy of Dr. Tedros Adhanom for the position of DirectorGeneral (ESAT News April 19, 2016) Twenty civic and political organizations wrotea letter to the Chairman of the Executive Board of the World Health Organization (WHO) calling for the rejection of Dr. Tedros Adhanom's candidacy for the position of the Director General of the WHO.

In a letter to Ms. Malebona Precious Matsoso Chairman of the Executive Board of WHO, the 20 Ethiopian organizations said "Dr. Adhanom's nomination as the sole candidate representing Africa is not only an insult to Ethiopia but to all Africans. His candidature must be read in the contextof the political, social and economic policies of the government of Ethiopiathat he represents."

"Dr. Adhanom is a member of the inner circle of a ruling party whose leadership style is antithetical to democracy and respect for the rule of law. Lack of free elections in more than two decades, a fact that has beendocumented by numerous organizations and governments, serves as prima facie evidence of a repressive regime," the letter said.

The letter also recalled Foreign Minister Dr. Tedros Adhanom's failure to handle the cholera outbreak in internationally accepted protocols and mismanagement of funds allocated for AIDS, TB and malaria when he wasthe Minister of Health from 2005 to 2012.

"It is an incontrovertible fact that the Ministry of Health under the under the stewardship of Dr. Tedros Adhanom deliberately failed to contain the crisis and was directly responsible for the death of thousands of Ethiopiancitizens. His action was not only gross incompetence but also outright criminality."

"It defies common sense that such a compromised individual responsible for the tragic and unnecessary loss of so many lives in one country shouldeven be considered as a viable candidate to run the World Health Organization."

According to the letter in 2010, the Office of Inspector General (OIG), a body commissioned to audit and investigate Countries receiving Funds from the Global Fund to Fight AIDS, TB and Malaria (GFATM), conducted an audit of Ethiopia and found "misappropriation of funds and use of donorfunds for unsound and politically motivated programs."

"Dr. Adhanom's record as a member of the ruling party in Ethiopia and specifically his record as Minister of Health does not meet the exceedinglyhigh standards required for a Director General of the WHO," noted the letter.

"It is inconceivable that failure at improving the health outcomes of one country and mismanagement of funds obtained from an organization such as the GFATM should result in one’s candidature for the leading healthorganization of the world,” the letter said.

Ed's Note: Tedros Adhanom is a minister responsible for Ethiopian foreigndiplomacy whose known for his phony phrases "HIV/AIDS is a blessing Hard Currency Ethiopia earns from aids that surpasses the currency it earns from coffee and hides/skins exports"

News Report:

Ethiopian civic and political organizations request WHO rejectionof Tedros Adhanom nomination.

Ethiopian civic and political organizations call on the WHO to reject thecandidacy of Dr. Tedros Adhanom for the position of Director General

Twenty civic and political organizations wrote a letter to the Chairman ofthe Executive Board of the World Health Organization (WHO) calling for the rejection of Dr. Tedros Adhanom's candidacy for the position of the Director General of the WHO.
In a letter to Ms. Malebona Precious Matsoso Chairman of the Executive Board of WHO, the 20 Ethiopian organizations said "Dr. Adhanom's nomination as the sole candidate representing Africa is not only an insult to Ethiopia but to all Africans. His candidature must be read in the contextof the political, social and economic policies of the government of Ethiopiathat he represents."

"Dr. Adhanom is a member of the inner circle of a ruling party whose leadership style is antithetical to democracy and respect for the rule of law. Lack of free elections in more than two decades, a fact that has beendocumented by numerous organizations and governments, serves as prima facie evidence of a repressive regime," the letter said.

The letter also recalled Foreign Minister Dr. Tedros Adhanom's failure to handle the cholera outbreak in internationally accepted protocols and mismanagement of funds allocated for AIDS, TB and malaria when he wasthe Minister of Health from 2005 to 2012.

"It is an incontrovertible fact that the Ministry of Health under the under the stewardship of Dr. Tedros Adhanom deliberately failed to contain the crisis and was directly responsible for the death of thousands of Ethiopiancitizens. His action was not only gross incompetence but also outright criminality."

"It defies common sense that such a compromised individual responsible for the tragic and unnecessary loss of so many lives in one country shouldeven be considered as a viable candidate to run the World Health Organization."

According to the letter in 2010, the Office of Inspector General (OIG), a body commissioned to audit and investigate Countries receiving Funds from the Global Fund to Fight AIDS, TB and Malaria (GFATM), conducted an audit of Ethiopia and found “misappropriation of funds and use of donorfunds for unsound and politically motivated programs.”

“Dr. Adhanom’s record as a member of the ruling party in Ethiopia and specifically his record as Minister of Health does not meet the exceedinglyhigh standards required for a Director General of the WHO,” noted the letter.

“It is inconceivable that failure at improving the health outcomes of one country and mismanagement of funds obtained from an organization suchas the GFATM should result in one’s candidature for the leading health organization of the world,” the letter said.

African leaders must stop holding onto power: -Kofi Annan

Former UN Secretary General Kofi Annan says African leaders must let goof power when the time comes.

The former UN Secretary General Kofi

Annan has advised African leaders to stop holding onto power when theirterm in office ends.

Annan was speaking at the 5th Tana High-Level Forum on Security inAfrica held this week in Bahir Dar in Ethopia. Former President ThaboMbeki was one of the delegates who attended the annual forum.

Annan said leaders who stay in power when their tenure had ended, leave their countrymen with no choice, but to forcefully remove them frompower.

12 U.S. Senators Condemn Ethiopia’s Crackdown on Civil Society

By U.S. Senate Committee on Foreign Relation,

Tesfa News updates April 20, 2016

U.S. Senator Ben Cardin (D-Md.), Ranking Member of the Senate ForeignRelations Committee, introduced a resolution with 11 other Senators today condemning the lethal violence used by the government of Ethiopiaagainst protestors, journalists, and others in civil society for exercising their rights under Ethiopia’s constitution.

The resolution calls for the Secretary of State to conduct a review of U.S.security assistance to Ethiopia in light of allegations that Ethiopian security forces have killed civilians. It also calls upon the government of Ethiopia to halt violent crackdowns, conduct a credible investigation into the killing of protesters, and hold perpetrators of such violence accountable.

“I am shocked by the brutal actions of the Ethiopian security forces, and offer condolences to the families of those who have been killed. The Ethiopian constitution affords its citizens the right to peaceful assembly and such actions by Ethiopian government forces are unacceptable,” Senator Cardin said. “The government’s heavy-handed tactics against journalists and use of the 2009 Anti-Terrorism and Charities and SocietiesProclamations to stifle free speech and legitimate political dissent demonstrate a troubling lack of respect for democratic freedoms and human rights."

"Peaceful protestors and activists have been arrested, tortured and killed in Ethiopia for simply exercising their basic rights," Senator Rubio said. "I condemn these abuses and the Ethiopian government's stunning disregardfor the fundamental rights of the Ethiopian people. I urge the Obama Administration to prioritize respect for human rights and political reforms in the U.S. relationship with Ethiopia."

Joining Cardin and Rubio as cosponsors of the resolution are Senators Maria Cantwell (D-Wash.), Christopher Coons (D-Del.), Dick Durbin (D- Ill.), Al Franken (D-Minn.), Amy Klobuchar (D-Minn.), Patrick Leahy (D-Vt.), Edward J. Markey (D-Mass.), Bob Menendez (D-N.J.), Patty Murray(D-Wash.), and Sherrod Brown (D-Ohio).

The United States works closely with Ethiopia on signature Administrationinitiatives including Feed the Future and the African Peacekeeping Rapid Response Partnership. It also provides funding for Ethiopia's participationin the African Union Mission in Somalia.
"Given the challenges posed by the devastating drought and border insecurity, it is more important than ever that the government take actions to unify rather than alienate its people. It is critical that the government of Ethiopia respect fundamental human rights if it is to meetthose challenges," Cardin added.

A Wake-up Call: Degradation of Ethiopian Lives

By Aklog Birara (Dr) April 20, 2016

I join 101 million Ethiopians at home and abroad in expressing utter dismay and disbelief, sorrow and anger at the wanton and brazen violationof our ancestral land's sovereignty and borders; and the massacre of innocent people and children in Gambella. Whoever the power behind and whoever the perpetrators are, this is the first time in the annals of Ethiopia's modern history—post fascism—that any group would do the unthinkable of attacking 200 villages simultaneously, kidnaping children and snatching huge amounts of livestock from Ethiopia. The incident reminds me of the abduction of several hundred Nigerian girls by Boko Haram and the worldwide outrage that followed. The whereabouts of many of these girls is still unknown. At the time, millions of Nigerians protested and demanded the resignation of the country's President.

Why? Nigerians found this act of terrorism to be an affront to their honor and dignity; and felt strongly that their government was inept and incompetent. I can't blame Nigerians. At least, they had the freedom to remove their incompetent government through a free and fair election process. We Ethiopians do not have that same right and privilege; and weshould and we can if we collaborate if not unite!

Ethiopians at home and abroad find it hard to believe that any group would violate the country's sovereignty, cross its borders in day light, go from village to village, kill 208 Ethiopians including children, "kidnap 104"innocent children and take 2,000 heads of cattle from Gambella to South Sudan. Aaron Maasha of Reuters who disclosed the news on April 16 and 18 quoted medical doctors at a local hospital in Gambella that "the hospital was filled beyond capacity" and that hundreds of lives are at stake.

No Ethiopian government in sight

The Tigray People's Liberation Front (TPLF) that dominates the state andgovernment nominally run by the Ethiopian Peoples' Revolutionary Democratic Front (EPRDF) prides itself in establishing an intelligence, security and defense network that is second to none.

I recall during the 2005 Parliamentary Elections a heated conversation about disclosure concerning budget, composition and asset ownership by these TPLF coveted institutions and their personnel. Meles retorted then that "the defense and security establishment" is a national institution andmust be "shielded from public scrutiny." Who would disagree if it was a national institution that is composed of competent and able Ethiopians from all ethnic groups? Ethiopia had an established history of such diversity until the TPLF/EPRDF took power in 1991 and politicized the country's defense the same way it has politicized religion and other aspects of societal life.

According to the CIA's latest World Fact book on Ethiopia, the Oromo constitute 34.4 percent, the Amhara 27 percent (a whopping 61.4 percent) of the country's 101 million people. Tigray constitute 6 percent ofthe population; but staff more than 90 percent of the top leadership in intelligence, security, defense and foreign relations. Ethiopia's largest ethnic groups are not only the least represented; they are also themost marginalized and the most muffled. Amnesty International reported that "more than 5,000 ethnic Oromo were arrested between 2011 and 2014." Almost all of the 200 people murdered by security forces during the 2005 elections were non-Tigrean. More than 200 ethnic-Oromo have also been killed by TPLF/EPRDF security forces over the past few months. No one really knows the number of disappearances in Oromia andWolkait, Northern Gondar. These are the top locations where popular resistance to the dictatorship is intense.

The government's own census reported a few years ago that 2.5 millionethnic-Amhara could not be accounted for. In Gambella more than 400 innocent people were massacred. The government has been accused of"crimes against humanity in the Ogaden" and of ethnic cleansing of Amhara at various locations throughout the country.

In brief, the state and government are therefore capable of inflicting pain and suffering on the vast majority of the population. In light of this reality,the regime's proclivity to give special and coveted status and economic and financial privileges to the top Tigrean brass who manage intelligence, security and defense forces is understandable. The ethnic state and government can't last without the loyalty and support of this establishment.

Ethiopia has more generals today than ever. But, it is not fighting a foreign enemy. These top cadres are among the wealthiest in a country where 15-18 million people starve and where annual per capita income isa third of the Sub-Saharan African average. Where are these well- endowed generals when a "well organized and armed group" massacres innocent civilians and kidnaps more than 100 children?

Ironically, Ethiopia endears itself by availing fighters to UN peacekeepingoperations in South Sudan to restore peace; and to the United States to fight Al- Shabab and other terrorist groups in the Horn. It is the largest African troop contributor to the UN. There is nothing wrong with this involvement in collective security. Ethiopian defense forces served in Korea and the Congo. Regime change should not result in change in globalengagement. But Ethiopia's first priority is to defend its borders and to safeguard its citizens.

The critical question is who within the Ethiopian intelligence, security and defense is accountable and responsible for Ethiopia's vulnerability from foreign attack and for the massacre of innocent citizens and the abductionof more than 100 children? The Washington Post noted on April 19, 2016,that Ethiopian officials had no clue who the perpetrators are. "What we know is that they are heavily armed and well organized, and knew what they were doing….Some of them were wearing military camouflage."
The Prime Minister of Ethiopia "expressed his deepest grief." Ironically, heand other Ethiopian officials were hosting a "high-profile African security conference in the city of Bahir Dar." Whose security might they be talkingabout? We don't really know.

Clearly, Ethiopia's vulnerability from different directions is not given prominence by its own government. Ethiopia's intelligence, security anddefense forces are much more competent and capable of quelling civil unrest in Oromia, Gambella, the Ogaden and Northern Gondar than in anticipating external threats and n thwarting them before they do the greatest damage within the shortest time possible.

Is this crisis precedent-setting? I worry that it might be. What action, if any is the Ethiopian government going to restore public trust and preserveEthiopia's dignity as a sovereign state?

Unfortunately, Ethiopia's external enemies seem to be zeroing in at a pacenot seen since the downfall of the Military regime. For instance, Egyptian think tanks, academics and newspapers keep warning Ethiopia about the adverse consequences of completing and filling the Grand Ethiopian Renaissance Dam (GERD). The Sudanese government continues to assert its rights by claiming large tracts of Ethiopian lands defended by previous regimes and by the people affected.

Increasingly, there are numerous signs that the Red Sea is becoming an Arab Lake. On April 18, the celebrated Jane's Defense Daily reported that the United Arab Emirates is building a "permanent military port in the Portof Assab." This port is part of Ethiopia and should not have been ceded bythe TPLF to Isaias Afewerki and company. Isaias Afewerki is subverting Eritrea's newly acquired independence and undermining Ethiopia's long term national security in the process.

What plausible guarantee is there that a small determined, organized andarmed group financed by Ethiopia's traditional enemies won't use the Gambella precedent and destroy huge infrastructures such as dams andrails?

This is the reason for the title of a "wake-up" call. Ethiopians deserve better. They need to close ranks, establish a unity of purpose and strugglefor a an all-inclusive and democratic government that would represent their interests and the interests of their country. Is it not time to unite?

CROSSBORDER CLAHES

'Unbridled violence' in Gambella leaves Ethiopia searching foranswers

By William Davison, Bloomberg (April 21, 2016)

The South Sudanese attackers arrived on foot before dawn. In the Nuer villages in the grasslands of Gambella in western Ethiopia, people woke tothe sound of gunshots and tried to flee, but armed men stopped them.
Mothers were shot when they tried to stop the raiders taking theirchildren.

Bol Choul, 26, tried to run away but one of the attackers caught him in hishut and they fought. Bol injured his hand but managed to get out. He hadto leave without his wife and children, and his blind father, who was shot but survived.
“I heard my wife’s alive, but one child is taken and one is with her,” Bol said at the main hospital in Gambella region two days after the attacks inthe Lare and Jikawo districts.

More than 200 people were killed in the attacks on more than 20 villages,according to Ethiopia’s government. About 100 children were abducted, and livestock was snatched as well.

Unicef said the attack on children constituted a violation of human rights,and condemned “this horrific act of unbridled violence”.

Described by locals as the worst violence they had seen in two decades,the cross-border attacks pose a new challenge to the Ethiopian government, already grappling with growing tensions between central authorities and ethnic populations.

Ethiopia’s ability to respond is hampered by difficult terrain and the weakness of the state in South Sudan, where a peace deal intended to end years of war hangs in the balance as rebel leader and former deputy president Riek Machar delays his much-heralded return to the capital Juba, originally scheduled for Monday.

The assailants who crossed the border last week were probably Murle, a mainly cattle-herding ethnic group of perhaps 200,000 people thatprimarily live 150-200km from Gambella in the Pibor area of South Sudan’s troubled Jonglei region.

Gambella, a sparsely populated region of dense scrub and swamps bordering South Sudan, has long been marked by sporadic violence.

But the scale, organisation and brutality of last week’s attack had more inkeeping with atrocities committed in South Sudan, where war has turned chronic underdevelopment into a humanitarian crisis. The UN estimates that 5.1 million people need assistance this year out of a population of 12million.

Of the approximately 80 injured people who arrived at Gambella town’shospital, more than 50 were women, said staff. A few Nuer community militia members with guns retaliated, killing some attackers, who wore unmarked military uniforms and carried modern Kalashnikov rifles, according to survivors.

South Sudan's militarisation, maladministration and rampant disorder, combined with recent clashes in Gambella between the Nuer and the Anuak communities, may have contributed to the brutality of the attack.

The massacre marks a new challenge for Ethiopian authorities in Gambellaafter unsuccessful development policies and an influx of Nuer refugees from South Sudan compounded the area's problems.

Previously a majority in the region, the sedentary Anuak feel threatened by the arrival of pastoralist Nuer on what they consider to be their land. Many Anuak were angered by a government resettlement plan that beganin 2010 and clustered them into expanded villages near roads.

While Ethiopian officials said this was done to make public services more efficient, opponents claimed thousands were forced off their land to makeway for agricultural investments.

Anuak discontent was exacerbated by the arrival of more than 250,000Nuer tonew refugee camps, starting after South Sudan's government imploded in December 2013 when the ruling party fractured and up to 70% of the military rebelled.

Tensions between the Anuak and Nuer exploded in February, with dozenskilled and clashes even involving members of the Regional Special Police fighting among themselves, along the same ethnic lines.

Subsequently, all those forces were withdrawn to Ethiopia's capital, Addis Ababa, for training – even from parts of the state, such as the locations oflast week's Murle raid, where they had not clashed, according to an aid worker, victims and a local security official.

Their removal followed disarmament of the Nuer over previous years, saidGatwich Tok, 26, who was in one of the villages attacked last week. "The government of Ethiopia does not allow communities to have guns," he said.

Ethiopia said it is prepared to pursue the raiders into South Sudan andrescue the kidnapped children. But a local security official said bilateralnegotiations were the way forward.

“We cannot cross the border … these people are criminals and we do notdo the same criminal acts as them,” he said, requesting anonymity.

Improving border security through dialogue or a joint military operationwith South Sudan may prove tricky. Before the latest bout of civil war, Jonglei state was already one of the most violent in the country, partly because of clashes linked to cattle raiding.

Further complicating the political situation is a contested October decree by President Salva Kiir to increase the number of states in South Sudan from 10 to 28. That decision has already reportedly led to fresh conflict inMurle areas.

Co-pilot Hailemedhin Abera on court trial:

April 22, 2016

"My client, thinking persecuted in his country had decided to seek politicalasylum in Switzerland and to do what he wanted to land at Geneva"....

His lawyer Mr.Philippe Currat -The judgment will be issued on 9th of May 2016 ....

The defense of the Ethiopian co-pilot Hailemedhin Abera concluded histotal irresponsibility, His lawyer argued the acquittal.

The Ethiopian Copilot Hailemedhin Abera Tegegn, who had hijacked a Boeing 767 from Ethiopian Airlines and landed in Geneva in February 2014is not responsible for his act and must be paid: this is what pleaded Fridaymorning defense Federal Criminal Court (TPF).

The federal prosecutor Marco Renna has it confirmed his indictment and required institutional therapeutic measure. The judgment will be issued on 9 May. Mr. Renna said, after his indictment, that "the risk of recidivism" Ethiopian co-pilot, "is high and can occur in other circumstances of life." By confirming the indictment, the federal prosecutor has sided with the conclusions of the psychiatric assessment ofthe accused who suffers from paranoid schizophrenia. He said that "treatment is possible but through a supported long-term."

The magistrate also required that all court fees - more than 90'000 francs

- to be charged to the accused. It will also pay the compensation soughtby the sixteen passengers of the hijacked plane that as civil parties.

"He was looking for its survival" For the lawyer of the Ethiopian officer, Mr.Philippe Currat there was no impediment to public traffic because "the physical integrity of the passengers at no time been concretely endangered.

"My client, thinking persecuted in his country had decided to seek politicalasylum in Switzerland and to do what he wanted to land at Geneva. So trying to survive and not his death nor the occupants of the aircraft," he defended.

The concept of "dangerousness" of the accused was also rejected by the defense lawyer pointed out that the officer had "wanted to land at best." "If it turned several times over Geneva airport is under instructions from the control tower who wanted to save time given the circumstances (...) The landing maneuver was accomplished without injury to passengers andcondition of the aircraft confirmed " Mr. Currat said.

In line also on the conclusions of the psychiatric report, counsel concludedhis total irresponsibility. "If considered irresponsible, he must be acquitted," he pleaded. While acknowledging that his client should be neat, Mr. Currat asked the TPF renounced any institutional measure. The lawyer asked that the accused be allowed to be supported by his family "that supports and is aware of his condition."

If an institutional measure were to be issued by the TPF, the lawyer wantsit relies on psychiatric assessment and is carried out in one of four specialized institutions for this purpose in Switzerland. Imprisoned in the Tuilière in Lonay (VD), Hailemedhin responds forcible confinement, kidnapping and obstruction of public traffic.

Boma gov't accused of being behind massacre of Ethiopian citizens

April 21, 2016 (JUBA) – A senior army general in South Sudan's government has accused Boma state government of being behind the recent massacre of over 200 ethnic Nuer citizens in Ethiopia when ethnic Murle militia group crossed the borders and attacked villages inside Ethiopia.

Lt. General David Yau Yau, also a member of the Murle ethnic group whichcarried out the brutal attack, revealed that the attackers are an organizedgroup armed by the current governor of the Boma state, Baba Medan.

Yau Yau, a former administrator of the area, and former chairman of a Murle rebel force, the South Sudan Democratic Movement/Army (SSDM/A), in a statement he signed on Wednesday said he has credible information that the attack was carried out by his tribesmen organized thecurrent South Sudan’s governor of the Murle area.

“The information we are gathering from the ground is that those who made attacks were people from Lekangole County, the current Governor’shome County,” said Lt. General David Yau Yau in a statement he releasedfrom Juba.

He named the areas from where the attacks were organized before crossing into Ethiopia last Friday, saying they were directly armed by theSouth Sudanese state governor.

“The people who made these deadly attacks undeniably come from the bomas of Lekuangole such [as] Nyergeny, Manythaka, Wungony, Toltol,Manyathind. The governor had supplied his own people with some weapons and ammunitions when he planned to force his way into Pibor town and the same weapons and ammunitions, which are now used against the Nuer civilians in Ethiopia,” he said.

He denied involvement of his SSDM/A Cobra Faction of another Murle group, saying his forces have been integrated into the South Sudanesearmy (SPLA) and do no longer operate separately.

“We urge the governor to be frank to the public that the attacks were made by his own community of Lekuangole…He must at best talk to thechiefs of his area to collect all the abducted children and cattle to be returned to the rightful owners rather than making unfounded accusations.”

Earlier, Boma state governor, Medan, also a Murle, said he suspected thatthe other ethnic Murle forces commanded by General Yau Yau could have been responsible for the deadly cross-border attacks.

Ethiopia said it has already crossed into South Sudan territories and launched the military offensive into the Murle areas to free over 100 abducted children. They said they have identified the areas where the children are being kept and surrounded it.

Governor of Gambella region, Gatluak Tut Khot, under which jurisdictionthe attacks took place, confirmed that the Ethiopian forces had entered into South Sudan for the operations. (ST)

RASTAFFARIANISM

Emperor Haileselassie's grandson Prince Ermias arrives in Jamaica: Commemorates 50th anniversary of his grandfather’svisit; Hundreds turn out to greet him

JAMAICA OBSERVER April 22, 2016

PRINCE Ermias Sahle Selassie, grandson of Ethiopian Emperor Haile Selassie I, arrived in the island yesterday to much fanfare among the localRastafarian community.

Prince Ermias, who was accompanied by his wife Princess Saba Kebede, ishere on a three-day visit to participate in activities to commemorate the 50th anniversary of his grandfather’s visit.

Hundreds of Rastafarian men, women and children flocked Norman ManleyInternational Airport in Kingston, where the ‘prince’ arrived on a flight from the United States at minutes before noon.

But the Rastafarians, who were beating drums, chanting verses, and smoking marijuana, said the gathering was nothing compared to what wasseen half-a-century ago.

Following a press conference, Prince Ermias — who lives in Washington, DC — emerged from the airport building and walked to the car park accompanied by Minister of Culture Olivia Grange, Transport Minister MikeHenry, and representatives of the Commemoration Committee and the Republic of Ethiopia. He greeted the crowd of Rastafarians and thanked the people of Jamaica for hosting him. He then journeyed to the National Heroes Park where he was greeted by Mayor of Kingston Dr Angella BrownBurke, before placing a wreath at the shrine of national hero Marcus Garvey.

“…We are focusing on making sure that we represent our custom; practiselifestyle, as Rastafarians, to be involved and, I pray that everything worksout. I give thanks to the brethren and the sistren dem who have been focusing on the tradition of Rastafarians over the period,” Bunny Wailer, the only living member of the Wailers singing group, told the Jamaica Observer.

Prince Ermias and his entourage also made stops at the University of Technology, University of the West Indies, The Mico University, and Jamaica College, where he was greeted by former prime minister Bruce Golding, who attended the school.

Golding, who said he remembered vividly Emperor Selassie’s visit in 1966,said the spiritual leader visited at a time of great significance when Rastafarians were oppressed and ostracised by society. He said Emperor Selassie’s visit created a platform on which Rastafarians were able to command the respect that they deserved.

Prince Ermias, in his response, thanked the Jamaica College family for thewarm reception.

“You are the future …very bright people who would become future prime ministers, future scientists; but the important part of education is that youalso have morality that goes with it that distinguishes what is right from what is wrong; what is just and what is unjust. Too many times today ...we turn against what may seem a challenge because it doesn’t seem toresolve anything. What makes the difference and what makes leaders [are] principled commitments and if you work hard there is nothing you can't achieve," Prince Ermias told a group of Jamaica College boys.

Earlier at The Mico University, trainee teachers who shook Prince Ermias'hands declared that there would not be any hand-washing for rest of theday as they wanted to cherish the moment.

"I am very elated to share in such a historical moment. I feel as if I amreliving a moment when Selassie I was here. So, to be a part of the festivity today, I am very proud," declared history major, Rachel Dale. Source: Jamaica Observer

FAMINE IN ETHIOPIA

18 million people in need of aid – Telegraph

Aislinn Laing, sitti zone, ethiopia 23 APRIL 2016 updated at 3:24PM

Every morning Aisha Nor rises at dawn to spend several hours gathering dry twigsfrom the scrubland around her home.

By selling them each week at the local market, she can earn just enough to buy sweet black tea to supplement her children's daily bread ration. And that, in turn, maybe just enough to keep them alive.

With two of her youngsters already dangerously malnourished and the remaining three on the brink, Aisha's plight is typical of hundreds of thousands of families nowfacing Ethiopia's worst drought in 50 years.

Two successive rainy seasons have failed, and with no crops to feed eitherthemselves or their cattle, as many as 18 million people are in need of aid.

To Western eyes, the scenes of hunger are disturbingly reminiscent of the country'sinfamous famine of 1984, which killed one million people and sparked the Live Aid campaign by the pop singer Bob Geldof.

This time, though, it is not civil war or the callous indifference of a communist regimethat is to blame. While the Derg regime of the 1980s used starvation as a weapon, today's Ethiopian government already runs an annual emergency feeding program for 8 million people.

But in trying to shrug off Ethiopia's image as the symbol of African famine and disaster, the government has inadvertently courted disaster again. As the early stages of the drought got progressively worse, the authorities refused to admit they could not cope alone, leading to a crucial delay in the international response.

“If the Ethiopian government says they’ve got a massive food crisis, investors pull out, jobs are lost, it becomes self-fulfilling,” said one aid official, who asked not to benamed.

The aid worker’s desire for anonymity is yet another symptom of the touchiness thatsurrounds the aid issue in Ethiopia. Credible statistics about deaths related to the drought are rarely issued, yet humanitarian workers are notably careful about usingwords such as “famine” or “death”.

This is not just to avoid sensationalism, but because their presence in thecountry is dependent on not ruffling the feathers of the government, which retains an authoritarian streak.

Mindful of how television cameras portrayed Ethiopia three decades ago,officials also keep a close eye on the foreign media, even tracking down one woman who told a BBC reporter that her child had perished becauseof the drought. She later appeared on state television, saying her child had died of illness instead.

In its defence, the Ethiopian government points out that the drought in the rural interior is just one strand of its new national narrative. The economy, by contrast, is a relative success story, and has enjoyed severalyears as one of the fastest growing in the world.

The boom is evident in the cranes dotting the skyline of the capital Addis Ababa, the jean-clad hipsters filling its espresso bars, and the emergenceof its national airline as Africa’s preferred low-cost carrier.

But with growth and relative political stability has come a booming population of more than 90 million, three quarters of whom still depend onagriculture for survival. The drought has killed up to 90 per cent of crops in some areas and at least one million cattle.

While the government insists the conditions for the declaration of a faminehave not been met, it has only recently admitted that it cannot handle thecrisis alone. It has put $360 million into emergency food supplies and medical care, but now says it needs help.

“Donors and partners must now scale-up to give Ethiopia the humanitarian support and attention it deserves,” said Mitiku Kassa, headof the country’s National Disaster Risk Management Coordination Commission, in a January report.

However, the humanitarian crises caused by the Syria, Yemeni and migrant crises have sucked attention and resources away from the West'straditional aid recipients.
An international appeal for $1.4 billion (£900,000) to replenish fast-depleting food rations is still missing $600 million (£400 million).

Aid organisations say emergency food stocks could run out by May, and that a "potentially massive" humanitarian disaster could unfold by Augustunless the shortfall is met.

Even as things stand, the 5kg of wheat currently supplied to each family in the drought zone represents just a third of a human being's nutritionalrequirement. An estimated 430,000 children are expected to fall into malnutrition this year.

Aisha's toddler, Hawa, was diagnosed with Severe Acute Malnutrition lastweekend. At a mobile health clinic in dusty scrubland near the town of Erer, she clung listlessly to her mother and sucked at a sachet of life- saving, vitamin-fortified peanut paste.

The family's cattle died in the drought, and with her husband bedridden and disabled, she is the only bulwark. "To the last minute, I will try my best. Even if I am sick, my condition gets worse, I will try my best for myfamily," she said, fighting back tears.

When asked whether more people are dying because of the drought, emergency response officials parrot the official line that there are alwaysdeaths in Ethiopia – 20,000 children alone from preventable causes eachyear – and that it is impossible to say how many are due to the drought.

But the government itself says that 25,000 children were treated for severe malnutrition in January alone, while aid agencies fear that erratic screening means the actual number of cases could be twice ashigh.

Last week, in a camp for displaced people in Sitti Zone, Somali Region, families told how after their cattle began dying, they walked fordays with their surviving animals in search of water.

On the edge of the group stood 13-year-old Abdi Osman, who wore a Sunderland t-shirt over a concave belly. "If I could just give him milk hewould not be like this," said his mother. "Sometimes even when he eatshe gets pain, he vomits," she said.

A medical worker in the camp said he had treated 12 cases of childmalnutrition, five of whom were severe.

“Sometimes people come and provide support but that support is not enough,” he said. “When I come across cases of severe malnutrition I tryto stop a vehicle on the main road and try to send that child to the nearest town for treatment.”
An elderly man interrupted angrily, saying that it was not just childrensuffering. “Look at our eyes, there is no blood in them,” he said. “You don’t have to ask how we are, you can see. We are sick.”

John Graham, the country director of Save the Children, has worked in Ethiopia since the 1984 famine. He said that while the scale of the droughtwas the same, the response from the wider world had not been as generous.

“The government says if the $600 million is not forthcoming, it will find away. But that means diverting funding from other areas, health and education, and that’s going to lose critical gains they have made that might guard against future crises.”

He warned that if the world waited for images like 1984, it might be too late to prevent catastrophe. “Is it really necessary in 2016 that you haveto see that?” he asked. Source: http://www.telegraph.co.uk

RELIEF EFFORT
ETHIOPIA: Risk of food insecurity
MSF Updates April 25, 2016
In recent months MSF has been conducting nutritional assessments in Ethiopia, principally in Afar, Oromia, Amhara, Somali and Southern Nations, Nationalities, and Peoples' Region(SNNPR): areas viewed as most exposed to malnutrition.

Our teams have not yet observed alarming levels of the most dangerousform of severe acute malnutrition(SAM) across these regions.

However, levels of food insecurity caused by a lack of rains are giving cause for concern. Food insecurity is when people do not have access to sufficient healthy and nutritious food to ensure an active life and normal development. In some areas, there is little or no food available and the inhabitants are totally dependent on food distributions provided by the Ethiopian government, the World Food Programme

(WFP) and the Joint Emergency Operation Plan, which is a coordinated NGO response to the crisis. Whereas, in previous years, these distributions were geared to meet the annual requirements of 7.5 million people, the government estimates this number is now at 10.2 million and there are already reports of population displacements brought on by lack of access to food and/or water.

If there is insufficient rainfall in the coming weeks and months and no increase in food distributions – or if these are discontinued due to lack offunding – the situation may well deteriorate considerably, which could occur as early as the end of April or the beginning of May.
MSF teams have launched nutrition activities and are supporting the Ethiopian health authorities. Support with nutritional surveillance is also under negotiation. Thus, MSF is already on the ground, ready to scale-upand adapt its operations rapidly in the event of a worsening in the situation. This state of preparedness will also facilitate our access to any other areas that may require relief.

As a medical organization MSF primarily addresses the most vulnerable. Inthe regions we work these are principally children under five years of age,who are severely malnourished and mothers who are giving birth or lactating. Where needed, we are also providing some supplementary food assistance to the families of children under five who are enrolled in our nutrition programmes.

MSF’s assessments in Afar and Somali Regions resulted in the opening of outpatient therapeutic programs (Ambulatory therapeutic feeding centers), stabilization and intensive therapeutic feeding centers as well as measles and vaccination campaigns. In SNNPR, MSF supported the nutritional response in two “woredas” (districts), focusing on capacity building.

CROSSBORDER CLASHES

“Ethiopian government is the root cause of the problem inGambella” –Activist Obang Metho April 25, 2016

More violence forecast in Ethiopia’s Gambella as death toll rises

Clashes between different ethnic groups in west Ethiopia left 14 dead thisweekend, while UN and MSF offices were targeted by angry protesters.
Tensions have been rising these past months in Gambella, the region which has a population of 300,000 but has taken in 270,000 mainly Nuerrefugees fleeing the conflict in neighbouring South Sudan.

(RFI) The most recent violence was sparked by an NGO vehicle with an Ethiopian driver running over and killing two children from the Nuer ethnicgroup in a camp for South Sudanese refugees last Friday.

Since late January, what began as a dispute over land rights between the Nuer and Anyuak ethnic groups has spread. The clash is in part a result ofthe influx of thousands of ethnic Nuer who have been displaced in the civilwar in South Sudan and were forced to move into the Gambella region of Ethiopia.

“It’s because of the security vacuum, which is the consequence of the conflict in South Sudan,” Ewan Lawson, a senior research fellow at the Royal United Services Institute in London told RFI. “It’s been a very largepart of local culture for a long long time.”

But a proliferation of small arms has meant more and more serious injuries. “But there’s also growing discontent towards the government andthe lack of response from the international community,” Lawson pointed out.
“The government is just putting the bandage over the clashes because they are the root cause of it,” Obang

Metho, the executive director of the Solidarity Movement for a New Ethiopia, a nonprofit organisation promoting change in the country, told RFI. “The ruling government in Ethiopia are using ethnic apartheid to divide and conquer. And now, if youare someone from the highland part of Ethiopia, at this time now, you cankill and no one will hold you accontable.”

The UN is also part of the problem, according to Metho, because they are“dumping” refugees there. The refugees and the local people do not haveanything in common, there is no peace between them, he said.

“The refugees can come from South Sudan, with guns, at any time. Whenyou take a closer look, the Ethiopian government is part of the problem, the Gambella region is part of the problem, the international community, they left Ethiopia to survive, so thery’re part of the problem, because theydon’t address the real good governing issues. There have been warnings, Ethiopia is heading to the point where it will become a ticking bomb, where ethnic groups will kill each others and by that time it will be too late.” Would the situation change if peace is finally implemented in South Sudan?

First the rebels have to arrive at the South Sudan talks, which has taken longer than expected. “Will the peace process in South Sudan solve the Gambella issues?” asks Christopher Clapham, from the African studies at Cambridge University. “Quite probably the opposite. Gambella has its owninternal conflicts, notably between the Nuer, that’s to say Riek Machar’s group, whose main population is in South Sudan, and the local people, theAnuyak, whose population is almost entirely within Ethiopia. “So this massive level of violence is very likely also to intensify the internal conflictwithin the Gambella region.”

The situation in South Sudan needs to get better so that tensions can diedown in Gambella. But the main question is: will the refugees go back toSouth Sudan? “We hope that peace is going to be established in South Sudan. We believe that with the international community’s support of South Sudan, that will resolve the conflict itself,” Angele Djohossou, the Head of the UNHCR Gambella office, told RFI.

“But there’s also the need to have basic social services in place, becauseconflict is not the only reason of the displacement of thousands, but lackof social and economical opportunities, plus food insecurity; all of that isof concern in South Sudan.”

What the experts all agree on though is the fact that the international community needs to pay more attention to what is going on in this regionbefore it gets out of control, as many on the ground fear.

The First Telephone In Ethiopia

The first telephone was installed in Emperor Menelik's palace in 1889.

The legendary Ethiopian journalist and prolific writer Paulos Gnogno in hisbook, 'Atse Menelik', quotes the story of telephone in Ethiopia.

"The first telephone in Ethiopia was installed in Menelik's palace in 1889 and the news of the displeasure among many clergymen who resented thenew technology reached the Emperor's ears. Eight representatives of the clergy approached the throne of M...enelik and appealed to the Emperor that the telephone in the palace was in fact the work of SeyTan - the Deviland that it should be removed from the palace and destroyed in public.
Emperor Menelik then informed the delegates that their concern was 'legitimate' and he will get back to them the next day. Subsequently, he called up his nobility and the Patriarch and bitterly complained that the clergy is interfering in his vision of growth for his country by claiming thatthe telephone technology is the work of the Devil. He went to say that thepriests are bent on sabotaging his work and are - in the process - forcing him to even consider abandoning the Orthodox faith just to distance himself from the backward clergy. Upon hearing such a shocking declaration from the Emperor, the nobility and the Patriarch rushed to assure the Emperor that they will calm down the priests and begged him to stay with the Orthodox faith."

Such was the resistance that the then technology-hungry and progressivemonarch encountered almost 120 years ago from the backward elementsof our society in his attempt in introducing telephone technology in Ethiopia much ahead of even some European countries.

More Violence Forecast in Gambella As Death Toll Rises

By Clea Broadhurst Issued on April 25, 2016

Clashes between different ethnic groups in west Ethiopia left 14 dead thisweekend, while UN and MSF offices were targeted by angry protesters.

Tensions have been rising these past months in Gambella, the region which has a population of 300,000 but has taken in 270,000 mainly Nuerrefugees fleeing the conflict in neighbouring South Sudan.

Escalation of violence in Gambella needs to be addressed,experts25/04/2016 – by Clea Broadhurst Listen…

The most recent violence was sparked by an NGO vehicle with an Ethiopian driver running over and killing two children from the Nuer ethnicgroup in a camp for South Sudanese refugees last Friday.

Since late January, what began as a dispute over land rights between the Nuer and Anyuak ethnic groups has spread. The clash is in part a result ofthe influx of thousands of ethnic Nuer who have been displaced in the civilwar in South Sudan and were forced to move into the Gambella region of Ethiopia.

“It’s because of the security vacuum, which is the consequence of the conflict in South Sudan,” Ewan Lawson, a senior research fellow at the Royal United Services Institute in London told RFI. “It’s been a very largepart of local culture for a long long time.”

But a proliferation of small arms has meant more and more serious injuries. “But there’s also growing discontent towards the government andthe lack of response from the international community,” Lawson pointed out.

“The government is just putting the bandage over the clashes because they are the root cause of it,” Obang Metho, the executive director of the Solidarity Movement for a New Ethiopia, a nonprofit organisation promoting change in the country, told RFI. “The ruling government in Ethiopia are using ethnic apartheid to divide and conquer. And now, if youare someone from the highland part of Ethiopia, at this time now, you cankill and no one will hold you accontable.”
The UN is also part of the problem, according to Metho, because they are“dumping” refugees there. The refugees and the local people do not haveanything in common, there is no peace between them, he said.

“The refugees can come from South Sudan, with guns, at any time. Whenyou take a closer look, the Ethiopian government is part of the problem, the Gambella region is part of the problem, the international community, they left Ethiopia to survive, so thery’re part of the problem, because theydon’t address the real good governing issues. There have been warnings, Ethiopia is heading to the point where it will become a ticking bomb, where ethnic groups will kill each others and by that time it will be too late.”
Would the situation change if peace is finally implemented in South Sudan?

First the rebels have to arrive at the South Sudan talks, which has taken longer than expected. “Will the peace process in South Sudan solve the Gambella issues?” asks Christopher Clapham, from the African studies at Cambridge University. “Quite probably the opposite. Gambella has its owninternal conflicts, notably between the Nuer, that’s to say Riek Machar’s group, whose main population is in South Sudan, and the local people, theAnuyak, whose population is almost entirely within Ethiopia.

“So this massive level of violence is very likely also to intensify the internal conflict within the Gambella region.” The situation in South Sudanneeds to get better so that tensions can die down in Gambella.

But the main question is: will the refugees go back to South Sudan?

“We hope that peace is going to be established in South Sudan. We believe that with the international community’s support of South Sudan,that will resolve the conflict itself,” Angele Djohossou, the Head of the UNHCR Gambella office, told RFI.

“But there’s also the need to have basic social services in place, becauseconflict is not the only reason of the displacement of thousands, but lackof social and economical opportunities, plus food insecurity; all of that isof concern in South Sudan.”

What the experts all agree on though is the fact that the international community needs to pay more attention to what is going on in this regionbefore it gets out of control, as many on the ground fear.

The Egyptians Versus The Abyssiniyans at the Battle of Gundet On March 1875, the Egyptian and

forces were on the right flank; in the middle and rear were several Rases,one of whom was Ras Welde-Mikael Solomon of Hazega/Hamassien.

The strategy Ethiopians employed at the battle of Gundet is known as 'ox-horn strategy' whereby the enemy is encircled but some space is allowed f...or retreat so that the rearguard or reinforcing regiments could capture the enemy troops in disarray.

The battle of Gundet started at about 9 am and raged till 3 pm in the afternoon. Both sides fought bravely but the Ethiopians had clearly the upper hand, thanks to the "field advantage," knowledge of the topography, their masterful combat tactics, and of course the support ofthe people.

The Egyptian army was virtually annihilated, several hundreds were captured, and others managed to escape. But again, after reorganizing their forces and recuperating from the nightmare of Gundet, they came back on November 1876 and another Ethio-Egyptain confrontation took place at Gura'e. This time, the son of Khedive Ismael, Hassan Pasha, ledthe Egytptian forces.
And this time, Yohannes issued a proclamation, which reads in part: 'An enemy has come to destroy Ethiopian sovereignty, and whose objective isto enslave our people, rape our women, and desecrate our religion.
Hence, soldiers get ready with your weapons and priests pray in all thechurches.'

This time, the Ethiopian forces collectively reached 60,000 combatants who came from all the corners of Tigray, Mereb Millash (Eritrea), Gonder, Gojjam and Shewa. Before the battle of Gura'e started, Emperor Yohannesgave instruction to various Rases as to how to wage the battle, but most importantly he emphasized that they need not underestimate the enemy. He was right! The Egyptian army was formidable indeed; the battle raged for a whole day, from dawn to dusk and till the Ethiopians engaged their enemies in a hand-to-hand combat.

Finally, after thousands of men laid dead on either side, the Ethiopians won the day and Hassan Pasha ran for his life but was later captured andbrought before the Emperor, along with thousands of Egyptian prisoners of war. The Emperor ordered that the POWs be treated with dignity but Hassan's arms were to be embossed (tattooed, in modern parlance) withtwo Ethiopian crosses.

Finally, the Egyptian POWs were let go free via Massawa but Yohannes issaid to have sarcastically commented, “Make sure that you check their shoes so that they don’t take the soil of my country!"

Taytu Betul (c.1851-1918) - The Bad Cop Empress of Ethiopia

If you know anything about Africa’s interactions with Europeans in the 1800s, you know that things didn’t go great for the Africans. Time and time again, a European “ally” nation would just happen to witness some malady befall one of their new African buddies. As a good neighbor, the Europeans would then prescribe their traditional folk remedy: military invasion. And so, time and time again, African armies would go up againstEuropean ones and lose.

But not in Ethiopia.

When its “ally” Italy began invading, Ethiopia defeated them in battle, andin so doing, made Italy collectively lose its mind. And this crushing victory? Due in large part to the foresight, skepticism, and unrelenting sass of one of the toughest women in Ethiopian history: Empress Taytu Betul.

From the get-go, Taytu (Amharic for “sun”) was an odd choice for empress. As one of the Oromo people — a historically-downtrodden ethnicgroup in Ethiopia — Taytu was subjected to female genital mutilation before she was even three months old. This left her unable to bear children, one of the main expectations of any female royal. Moreover,before marrying emperor Menilek II she’d had four husbands and wasover thirty years old (an eternity in Ethiopian marital terms).

But they were a good match. Not only did her lineage give his reign legitimacy (she was linked to the Solomonic dynasties a fact that overrodeany concerns over her Oromo heritage), but she made him a more seriousruler by curtailing his womanizing ways

A popular song of the time played off Taytu’s name and that of Menilek’shated mistress, saying “the sun [Taytu] has dissipated the fog [the mistress].” With Taytu’s help, Menilek gradually united the warring factions of Ethiopia under one banner.

The two settled into a well-polished good cop/bad cop routine. Menilek IIwould regularly straggle and avoid taking unpopular stances by saying “Ishi, nega,” (yes, tomorrow), while Taytu would decisively say “Imbi” (absolutely not). She became a savvy adviser to his every political move,interrupting negotiations “often in a decisive and resolutely hostile way.”She was one of the first to realize Italy’s intentions to make Ethiopia its thrall and bluntly called Italy out on it: “You want other countries to see Ethiopia as your protege, but that will never be.”

By the time Italian-Ethiopian relations broke down in 1891, Italian diplomats came to describe Menilek as "weak, uncertain, and in the handsof his wife." Which is to say, good hands.

"Victory is ours!"

After multiple attempts to sue for peace, Menilek and Taytu settled in to repel Italy's immiment invasion. Taytu joined her husband on the front lines, traveling around with a personal force of 5,000 soldiers who, underher taskmaster guidance, "kept perfect order." Witnessing the professionalism of her troops, a European observer wrote that Taytu "is agreat lady, who perhaps in another milieu would have been a Christina ofSweden or a Catherine the Great."

(White person code for "if she wasn't black.")

Taytu's shining moment in the war came with the 1896 Siege of Mek'ele.Here, the Italians were holed up in a fortress, where they easily repelledEthiopian assaults. Taytu took 900 of her men aside and instructed themto cut off the fort's water supply.

They did so, and after 10 days of increasingly horrific suffering, theItalians surrendered.

A month later, the war ended with the Battle of Adwa, where Italy suffered a humiliating defeat at the hands of a united Ethopia. In multiple (likely exaggerated) histories of the battle, Taytu strode into the fighting herself. After seeing her soldiers beginning to lose heart, she dismounted,removed her veil, and yelled, "Courage! Victory is ours! Strike!" Some tellings even have the middle-aged woman armed to the teeth and plunging headlong into the fray. Which provided much fodder for earlier drafts of the above illustration.

"Who does she think she is? Empress Taytu?"

After the Italian defeat, the European nations, shocked at the Ethiopianvictory, began negotiating in good faith — often with Taytu herself. TheItalians, when negotiating for the release of their prisoners of war, specifically asked to speak to Taytu

The Italian accounts of the time showed a country as divided as the UnitedStates after the Vietnam War, with some clamoring for revenge and others questioning why they'd even gone there in the first place. The Italian press took very polar stances on Taytu herself. While some compared her to Zenobia, Cleopatra, and Joan of Arc, others spun up hoary tales of how she bathed in blood gossiped about her earlier marriages and purported side lovers, and began calling her a modern-dayJezebel.

To be fair, she was a divisive figure even among her people. On the one hand, she was capable of great mercy and societal progress: she personally cooked for prisoners and starving countrymen, inaugurated theEthiopian Red Cross, founded the new capitol of Addis Ababa, and workedto kickstart many national industries, including wine production, candle- making, and more. In the words of one observer, she "applied herself notonly to feminine works, but like quicksilver attended to perplexing business usually done by men, and succeeded at it."

On the other hand, she could be a brutal politician and ruler. She filled thegovernment with nepotistic political appointments in order to solidify her political base, especially as Menilek's health declined. She was linked to a staggering number of poisonings she persecuted those who spread foreignreligions, and she was rude to the point of xenophobic with European envoys – although, given Ethiopia's history with Italy, that last point is a bit more understandable.

Also, in the accounts of many Europeans, she grew fat. Not that it hadanything to do with anything — but they felt the need to mention it. Atlength. Repeatedly.

When Menilek's health took a plunge, Taytu became de facto ruler for a couple years — and it took the a massive conspiracy on the parts of muchof the Ethiopian elite to oust her from power. When Menilek finally died, Taytu stepped down and lived a fairly quiet life until her death.
Her reputation lived on long past her death – both in Ethiopia, where shebecame a national heroine, and in Italy, where she was, for a time at least, the linguistic gold standard for a lofty woman. The once-popular phrase "Chi si crede di essere, la regina Taitù?" translates to "Who does she think she is? Empress Taytu?"

Art Notes
Taytu is here depicted in a tent before the Siege of Mek'ele, playing chess with a European.
She's knocked over both his pieces and his glass of water — a callback to how she cut off thefort's water supply.
The European diplomat is standing up, soaked from having water tossed on him. She is, ofcourse, holding up the queen. She was actually quite a chess player in real life.
In the background, Menilek II is rallying the troops to take on the fort. Throughout, the crowdyou can see tiny red umbrellas – these are parts of Taytu's personal unit, which had a numberof women in it, escorted by men shading them with red parasols.
The man in the background is just a personal bodyguard, no real story there.
The chair, table, tent layout, her clothing, and that of everyone else, is as period accurate as Icould make it.

Scientists just embarked on a world-first expedition to toxic hot springs

By BEC Crew April 28, 2016

If you've ever wondered how weird, deadly, and crazy-yellow Earth couldget, look no further than Ethiopia’s infamous Danakil Depression.

About 600 km north of Ethiopia’s capital Addis Ababa, the Danakil Depression boasts hot springs that creep near boiling point, toxic chlorineand sulphur-rich vapours that will sear your lungs and make everything smell like farts (seriously), and magma-heated brine that transforms the whole thing into a retina-burning nightmare with shades of neon.

It might be one of the most inhospitable places on the planet, but the scientific knowledge we can glean from the Danakil Depression is invaluable, particularly when we consider that the best candidates we have right now for life elsewhere in the Universe aren’t exactly lush withgreenery and pleasantly mild temperatures.

The strange thing is, despite this place looking like a mad scientist's backyard, with more unique geology, chemistry, and what could be the hardiest lifeforms anywhere on the planet, no one's actually managed to study it properly. Until about three weeks ago, of course, when a team ledby Felipe Gómez Gómez from Spain's Centre for Astrobiology led the first ever field expedition into the Danakil Depression.

April 5th to the 7th, Gómez Gómez and his team measured temperatures, humidity, and pH and oxygen levels across several sites in the region’s hotsprings, while collecting samples of bacteria and testing out a new technique for DNA extraction. It might have been brief, but the trip was just the first in a series of planned expeditions that will see these researchers preparing the environment for access by the wider scientific community, which will help us to uncover its many secrets.

"There are very few scientific publications on the site and no biological descriptions, so we are genuinely exploring new ground from a scientific point of view," says Gómez Gómez. "It is an amazing but hostile place - the temperatures were 42 degrees Celsius [107 Fahrenheit] during the day and 30 degrees [86 F] at night, and the chlorine vapour burned our airways. Any microorganisms living here will be extremophilic microbes ofa major interest to astrobiologists."

So… why so yellow? The very specific set of circumstances had to cometogether to create this other-wordly hue, but researchers suspect it’s pretty much down to the blistering hot magma bubbling just below the surface, which is causing the vast salt deposits in the area to colour thelandscape.
"The supersaturated brine emerges through hot springs in the floor of the craters," Hobart King explains at Geology.com. "As the brines evaporate inthe hot arid climate, extensive salt formations are formed on the floor of the craters. These are coloured white, yellow, brown, orange and green bysulphur, dissolved iron, mud and the life activity of halophile algae."

While we wait patiently to find out what the researchers have uncoveredso far, take a tour of what might just be the strangest place on Earth:

Ethnic Politics In Ethiopia: The Nuers of Ethiopia

By Bachak D. Miguel April 28, 2016

First and foremost I would like to send my deepest and sincerest condolences to everyone(Ethiopians and South Sudanese) who lost theirloved ones during these rampages that have befallen the people of Gambella right from the onset of this year up to date.

We all know, it's not unusual for these unfortunate events to take place inthe region. The only thing unique about these consecutive deaths is the brutal murder of Ethiopian workers by refugee in Jewi refugee camp and maybe the number of people that lost their lives during the raid by murle tribesmen from South Sudan. The latter, eventually, got international media's attention.

Following a post that I came across that was shared on Facebook aboutfive "Ethiopian nuers" that were murdered in Gambella town by highlanders as a revenge to what happened in Jewi refugee camp recently, I am compelled to write this in order to shed light on a few things that the writer(a Nuer) failed to acknowledge in his work.

In the article "highlanders killed 5 Nuer Ethiopians in Gambella town", thewriter tries to blame the highlanders for the murder of five Nuers that he claims to be Ethiopians. The Nuers are killed in revenge to Jewi brutal killing of eight highlanders by Nuer refugees.

Sometime it's important to tell the fact the way it appears. The "Nuers of Ethiopia" and Nuers of South Sudan issue is a confusing one. Simply, because the hosts themselves do not let this fact out of their mouth unless or otherwise they are fighting among themselves over something or in a case that involve deaths like what happened in Jewi refugee camp.

This matter could have been dealt and do away with long ago by the Ethiopian government(EPRDF) were it not for the fact that the governmentis more interested in the land rather than inhabitants. The Nuers have been causing problems for years now mainly to the Anywaa(Anuaks)people of Gambella. And whenever a fight erupted between Anywaa and Nuers in areas like Gambella town or Itang, their fellow people in the refugee camps in either Pinyudo or Dimma campstend to support and join the fight.

This makes it very hard to differentiate between Nuers as to who is from where. As far as I know, Nuers don't care which part of the world they belong. As long as they have their people in one place, all of them want tobe considered as part of that area too just because of the general name, NUER. And that's one aspect that makes their population grow at the fastest rate in every place they go to.

That's not all. Nuers tend to be very secretive and protective when it comes to something that benefits their community. It's not strange thatthey do almost everything together. I personally do not believe in the differences between these people when it comes to the international boundaries. They have minimal respect for the international boundariesand non at all for local ones. And that's why there's problem where everNuers set foot on.

Looking at the problems that are happening in South Sudan and Ethiopia,Gamblella region, one can tell who is the main cause for lack of peace between communities in these particular areas.

I am sure that all those people residing in the refugee camps across Gambella are not only South Sudanese Nuers. They are mixed up with those who claim to be Ethiopians. The same case applies to South Sudan. There are a huge number of Nuers who work with the Government of South Sudan(GoSS) as citizens of South Sudan but they were former employees of Gambella regional state government as Ethiopia citizens. Some members of the Nuer community whom I know to be Ethiopians go from western countries all the way to Pagak(SPLA-IO base in Gambella)tooffer support in form of donation of non food items to their fellow Nuers who are fighting SPLA.

We have many youth who join SPLA-IO as fighters and movement officials but are citizens of Gambella by birth. In fact, some officials usedto work for the Gambella regional state government. I do not quite comprehend the implication beneath the complaint of "Ethiopian citizens"paying for a crime committed by refugees.

All these mess would not have occurred if residents of Gambella are awareof the differences, I suppose. We have learnt that even the current governor of Gambella regional state Mr. Tut is a South Sudanese. But, thistruth is buried because of the benefits of Nuers tribe in general.

The influx of Nuer refugee in to Gambella region has led to closure of issuance of regional Identification cards. This is one of the reasons that contradict with what the writer is saying. The government would not havegone that far suppose the Nuers in the government stand with the government and put measures in place that makes it easy to identify whois from where. Unfortunately, this is not the case.

The recent fight between Anywaa and Nuers that started over disputed ownership of piece of land between two citizens featured South Sudanesewhite army members. That is why it reached to a point where hand grenades are involved as well as breaking in to Gambella correctional facility by some Nuer men to kill Anywaa prisoners.

That's not all, the South Sudanese flag was erected on Ethiopian soil as indication that this fight is much more than usual ones that we all know. The killing of highlanders in the camp is not by accident. It's part of the plan of Gambella becoming part of the Republic of South Sudan . We are not too deaf to hear the song that was sang by Nuers that they are going to chase Anywaa out of Gambella all the way to pochalla(South Sudan). That they are going to finish the Anywaa because the Nuers out numberedthe population of Anywaa by far. That they are going to make Gambella one of their states.

The pioneer and designers of this unrealistic plan come from both Ethiopiaand South Sudan. In fact, the governor of Gambella, Gatluak Tut was partof the meeting that was held in Nairobi, Kenya about this matter. Maybe the main objective behind the agenda of South Sudanese Nuers and Ethiopian Nuers coming out now is because the highlanders reacted in away Nuers never expected. I am not sure the writer who can not even spell right the name of the refugee camp "Jewi" is a real son of Gambella.

The Ethiopian government should consider all these events as threat andact accordingly. Because, if these people are not stopped now, it will be too late in the future. Many Nuers of South Sudan have used Ethiopian resources like free education and every other opportunity that they couldcome by. Now, the same people are planning to go against the people ofEthiopia. The writer can be reached at didumobachak@gmail.com

The Politics of Famine:
Ethiopia, Somaliland Sign Accord to Use Berbera Port
By William Davison for Bloomberg,

Ethiopia signed a deal to boost trade through Somaliland’s Berbera port amid congestion at a facility in neighboring Djibouti, officials said. Tariffs have been revised and a committee established to manage joint operations as part of the agreement signed on March 31, Sharmarke Jama, an economy and trade adviser for the foreign ministry in the semi-autonomous Somali region, said on Monday.

The committee will work on the “smooth implementation of the bilateralagreement and for improved facilitation of transit trade along the corridor," he said in an e-mailed response to questions. Landlocked Ethiopia more than doubled its cereal imports in the last 12 moths as a drought left almost one-fifth of its population of around 100 million peopleneeding food aid.

On March 24 there were 10 ships waiting to unload 450,000 tons of wheatat Djibouti. Ethiopia wanted 30 percent of its trade to go via Berbera by July last year, according to a five-year growth plan published in 2010. As much as 97 percent of shipments are still going through Djibouti because of problems with the capacity and condition of Berbera's port, the poor state of roads to Ethiopia and the lack of international recognition for Somaliland's statehood claims, said Ethiopia's Transport Minister WorknehGebeyehu.

Food Aid Destined for Ethiopia's Hungry Stuck in Djibouti Port:
"Now we have really negotiated the issue and decided to go very fast touse Berbera port," he said by phone. "The only thing that is left is the operational issues."

It isn't clear how many ships carrying Ethiopian cargo Berbera will be ableto deal with, although there is a plan for coal imports to go through the port, Workneh said. Port Sudan is already receiving fertilizer for northern areas of Ethiopia, he said.

The Berbera Port Authority held discussions with U.S. Agency for International Development (USAID) officials about aid imports, Jama said.The facility delivered 40,000 metric tons of wheat in February through Berbera for the UN World Food Programme to distribute to Ethiopians, according to the UN.

Somaliland's government has shortlisted Bollore SA, P&O, which is ownedby DP World, MSC Group's Terminal Investment Ltd, and Prime Africa for a Berbera renovation project, Jama said.

LANDGRAB NEWS

Opponent of land-leasing Okello Akway Ochalla, sentenced for 9-yearjail term By Tom Burgis in New York April 28, 2016

An Ethiopian court has handed down a nine-year jail sentence to a leadingdissident from the restive region where the government has leased vast tracts of land to foreign investors.

Okello Akway Ochalla had been in exile for a decade when he was seized by South Sudanese security agents in a hotel in that country's capital twoyears ago during a trip to organise opposition to the Ethiopian government. He was passed to Ethiopian agents and flown to Addis Ababa. There he was charged with plotting against the state. He was convicted this month and sentenced on Wednesday, his supporters told the Financial Times.

The government calls Mr Okello a terrorist, claiming that he conspired witharmed groups plotting attacks. His supporters maintain that he is the latest victim of the authoritarian regime's determination to crush its opponents.

"This does not stop dissent, it creates it," said Anuradha Mittal, a land rights activist at the US-based Oakland Institute, who has taken up MrOkello's cause.

Mr Okello was serving as governor of the marginalised Gambella region in2003 when tensions between locals, including his fellow Anuak, and morepro-government migrants from the highlands boiled over. Some 400 Anuak people and other locals were massacred; many more fled.
According to human rights groups, the armed forces joined in theslaughter.

Mr Okello escaped and reached Norway, where he was granted asylum. Over the years since, his homeland has become a frontier in a global rushto invest in land. A food price shock in 2007 spurred interest in leasing land as a means to secure supplies of food. Then the financial crisis drew attention to land as an asset immune to the vagaries of stocks and bonds.Last year, 17 agriculture or farmland funds raised $3.9bn, up from the $500m raised by five funds in 2009, according to Preqin, a data provider.

Gambella has a blighted history but its soils are rich. The lowland region isthe focus of the Ethiopian government's drive to boost exports through land investment. Progress has been faltering. An attempt by Karuturi Global of Bangalore to cultivate 100,000 hectares descended into acrimony over unmet promises. The government sent notice to the company in December that its lease had been terminated.

The one large project to have made headway is a 14,000 hectare Saudi Star rice farm, owned by the Saudi-Ethiopian billionaire Mohammed al- Amoudi. That venture, conceived with rice-hungry Saudis across the RedSea in mind, reaped its first harvest in November. It is training local farmhands as part of efforts to avoid a repeat of a 2012 attack by unidentified gunmen — a warning that the new landlords have stirred upold grievances in a downtrodden region.

The Ethiopian government did not immediately respond to a request forcomment on Mr Okello's sentence. He has 30 days to appeal, Ms Mittal said.

Ethiopia's government has taken pride in posting some of the Africa'smost impressive growth figures but critics say the cost is growing repression, drawing comparisons with China.
Journalists, bloggers and other critics have been detained under a contentious counter-terrorism law. They include Pastor Omot Agwa, whoworked as a translator for a World Bank inspection team that probed alleged forced evictions in Gambella. The pastor was arrested last year and is awaiting trial.

Mr Okello was originally charged under the terrorism act but his eventualconviction was for charges under different legislation banning acts that imperil the state, Ms Mittal said.

Mr Okello's son, Obok, lives in Washington and has lobbied the US authorities to intervene on his father's behalf. Speaking last month beforethe verdict, a White House official told the FT that the US "will continue tomonitor his case and engage the government of Ethiopia as appropriate".

Norway, where Mr Okello has citizenship, has also been monitoring thecase but says its efforts to do so have at times been frustrated by the Ethiopian authorities. Copyright The Financial Times Limited 2016.

The Politics of Famine In Ethiopia:
Millions starve as Ethiopia rejects Eritrean ports to use
By Thomas C. Mountain
As famine stalks millions of Ethiopians, and aid ships wait forever to unload at Ethiopia's port of Djibouti, offers of free use of Eritrea's Red Seaports fall on deaf ears in Addis Ababa.

According to Oxfam between 50% to 90% of Ethiopia suffered all or majorcrop failure due to the latest, greatest drought (this is just a guess because Oxfam isn't allowed access to most of Ethiopia). Millions upon millions have now exhausted their food stocks and major starvation has begun.

Desperate for food aid to be unloaded, aid agencies are begging the Djibouti port authorities to work faster, but the port of Djibouti is smalland creaky and completely unable to keep up with the desperate need.

Enter Eritrea, home to not one but two ports on the Red Sea, with the southern and larger of the two, Assab, having been given a major upgradeby the Emirates this past year.

All backlog of food aid would be cleared up quickly if Ethiopia will only use the Eritrean ports, an offer repeatedly made in the past during droughts tono avail.

The question has to be asked, what kind of government sits back andallows tens if not hundreds of thousands of its own people to die of starvation because of some political dispute with its neighbor? Only Ethiopia is allowed to get away with deliberately starving its own citizens, for there is supposed to be enough food aid in the pipeline to prevent the worst of the famine and only the shortage of port facilities inDjibouti is preventing its distribution.

Why isn't the USA and its lickspittles in the EU pressuring the Ethiopians,who are supposed to be under UN Article 7 Sanctions for their refusal to accept final and binding peace and border agreements, and entirely dependent on foreign loans to keep running ($11 billion in 2015)?

The politics of famine is what its all about as death from starvation stalksEthiopia, again. Thomas C. Mountain is an independent journalist living and reporting from Eritrea since 2006. He can be reached on Facebook atthomascmountain, on twitter @thomascmountain or thomascmountain@gmail.com

Ethiopia/Eritrea Conference

President Isaias Fought for the Existence of a United Ethiopia: -Ex-Ambassador Kassa Kebede

(By TesfaNews) Ambassador Dr. Kassa Kebede could not be a stranger formany Ethiopians but for Eritreans, only few recall him when he was part ofthe faction of government officials who advised Mengistu Hailemariam in the negotiations with the Eritrean People’s Liberation Front (EPLF) and the Tigray People’s Liberation Front (TPLF) in London.

The abortive London conference of mid 1991 was intended to broker an end to the disastrous war and save Ethiopia from possible disintegration. As a Minister and a civilian high-ranking diplomat, Dr. Kassa Kebede was instrumental in urging Mengistu to compromise with the Eritreans and theTigray Liberation Fronts for the sake of saving Ethiopia from disintegrationduring those numerous closed door negotiations and backdoor meetings inLondon.

Besides that, the conference had given Ambassador Kassa Kebede severalexclusive opportunities to personally meet and do some candid conversations with the then Chairman of the EPLF, Isaias Afwerki and TPLF, Meles Zenawi.

Let alone Eritreans, many Ethiopians do not have the details of those closed door crisis meetings. But when Ambassador Kassa started to spill the beans last year in a Washington Conference, he caught the attention of many Eritreans. On top of his political ingenuity, he is a kind of personthat never backs down from calling a spade a spade. He argued for the first time in public that, believe it or not, "President Isaias has an unbending belief in the existence of a United Ethiopia".

Ambassador Kassa told the audience that even if there are a lot to say about the good, the bad and the ugly out of President Isaias, but when it comes to the struggle for the existence of a united Ethiopia, he believes President Isaias stands out higher than the current TPLF government, andhe said, he is a living witness for that.

This might sound ludicrous to some but if they stop and think for a moment what could possibly stop President Isaias from letting Ethiopiadisintegrate after he liberated Eritrea and helped TPLF freed Tigray? Nothing! except his strong aspiration of seeing a united and peacefulEthiopia as his neighbor than a chaotic one.

As a matter of fact, Isaias only needs to pull a handful of strings at thattime if he had the slightest intention to dismember Ethiopia. It could beendorsing and supporting for the success of the "Greater Tigray" manifesto and at the end giving an automatic recognition for the newly independent Tigray republic. This alone could be enough to bring Ethiopia to its knees as it will send a precedent to the Oromo, Ogaden and other affected ethnic groups to follow suit. Or it could also beby giving unreserved support to article 39 of the Ethiopian constitution. Orby forging peace with the TPLF-led government and lend its utmost support to its policy of "Ethnic Federalism" and the division of Ethiopian people and land along ethnic lines, etc… But he chose none of that.
25 years later, his vision of a peaceful and united Ethiopia co-existing sideby side with a newly independent state of Eritrea still not a total failure since, at least, Ethiopia is saved from the worst even though at a greater expense of Eritrea's hard earned independence, peace and territorial integrity. Some could still argue, had Isaias chose the later option, Eritreawouldn't be stuck in the current problem.

Police arrests Fifteen over mixing Teff Flour with Saw-dust andbake Injera to sell (Capital) Fifteen people in Akaki Woreda 1 were arrested by police suspected of mixing Teff flour with earth, sawdust and other cereals' waste products and baked Injera using unpurified flour. A microenterpriseknown as Belayneh Kinde and His Friends S.C. was associated with the crime.

From the 15 people who are under custody by police, three are shareholders of the company while the remaining are employees. After receiving reports, police and Akakai Trade Bureau members went to the house on April 12 and seized 12 barrels of teff dough which was going to be baked. The sample of the teff flour was sent to Ethiopian Health and Nutrition Research Institute for laboratory test to know the exact nature ofthe mixtures. According to Akaki Trade Bureau, the enterprise had been selling Injera to hotels, restaurants, cafés and residents of condominium houses in Akaki area. Police said the suspects were engaged in the illegal act to gain more profit. It pressed charges against the suspects at Akaki First Instant Court. The hearing is scheduled for next week. Sawdust is commonly used by Injera bakers as a fuel. Inspection and Regulatory Officer at Akakai sub-city Trade Bureau Shifrew Alemu told Capital that a team of officials from Addis Ababa Trade Bureau, Consumers' Protection Authority and other stakeholder institutions that work to combat illegal trade will visit the baking house on Monday, April 25. He said the case is an alarm that points to the need to supervise enterprises that engage in food preparation. Similarly, police had arrested a dozen men in Merkato who were caught red handed for mixing red clay with red pepper, butter with banana, and edible oil with many strange things. Consuming adulterated food stuff can cause health risks by accumulating residues of foreign particles in organs. Sandy/soil particles especially cause kidney and bladder stones. ETHIOPIA/ERITREA: worst journalist jailers in Sub-Sahara

By Tesfa-Alem Tekle (ST) April 29, 2016 ADDIS ABABA

Eritrea and Ethiopia have respectively continue to become Africa's leadingjailers of journalists, according to a new survey released Thursday by an independent watchdog.

A Sudanese journalist covers her mouth with a piece of paper bearing theword 'NO' during a hunger strike held by journalists in Khartoum on November 4, 2009. The US-based Freedom House said governments of the two east African countries continue to show little tolerance to dissent and as a result have the highest number of imprisoned journalists in sub-Saharan Africa.

Despite the release of 10 imprisoned journalists in 2015, the report said Ethiopia continued to repress all independent reporting, and remained thesecond-worst jailer of journalists in sub-Saharan Africa, after Eritrea. Thereport noted for the Journalists in East and Southern Africa suffered from a sharp increase in political pressure and violence in 2015.

In the midst of Burundi's political crisis in May, which stemmed from thepresident's pursuit of a third term, nearly all independent media outlets were closed or destroyed. The loss of these outlets, especially radio stations that had been the main source of information, resulted in a dearth of reporting on critical issues. Extensive intimidation and violenceagainst journalists by the regime of President Pierre Nkurunziza and his supporters drove many into exile.

According to the report for East Africa, the run-up to early 2016 elections in Uganda featured an increase in harassment of journalists attempting tocover opposition politicians. In Kenya, greater government pressure in theform of repressive laws, intimidation, and threats to withdraw state advertising resulted in a reduction in critical reporting on President Uhuru Kenyatta and his cronies.

Ethiopia, Eritrea, Sudan. South Sudan, Somalia and Djibouti were listed amongst the last 20 African countries designated by the group as not freeMedia.

According to the group, Press freedom saw decline to its lowest point in 12years in 2015, as political, criminal, and terrorist forces sought to co-opt or silence the media in their broader struggle for power. Sudan and Egypt were also listed amongst world countries which has suffered biggest decline in press freedom in the year 2015.

The survey showed that only 13% of the world's population (fewer than one in seven people) enjoy a free press where coverage of political newsis robust, the safety of journalists is guaranteed, state intrusion in mediaaffairs is minimal, and the press is not subject to onerous legal or economic pressures. 41% of the world's population has a partly free press, and 46% live in not free media environments.

The varied threats to press freedom around the world are making it harderfor media workers to do their jobs, and the public is increasingly deprived of unbiased information and in-depth reporting. "Steep declines worldwidewere linked to two factors: heightened partisanship and polarization in a country's media environment, and the degree of extralegal intimidation and physical violence faced by journalists" it said. Ghana, previously the only free country on the continent's mainland, suffered a status decline to Partly Free.
Founded in October 1941, Freedom House is a US-based non- governmental organization (NGO) that conducts research and advocacy ondemocracy, political freedom, and human rights.

The group is a US Government funded independent organisation whichconducts surveys on political rights and civil liberties in 195 countries around the globe.

US expresses concern over OFC terrorism charges

April 30, 2016

The United States is deeply concerned by the Government of Ethiopia'srecent decision to file terrorism charges against Oromo Federalist Congress (OFC) First Vice-Chairman Bekele Gerba and others in the Oromia region who were arrested in late 2015.

We again urge the Ethiopian government to discontinue its reliance on theAnti-Terrorism Proclamation law to prosecute journalists, political party members, and activists, as this practice silences independent voices that enhance, rather than hinder, Ethiopia's democratic development.

We commend Ethiopian officials for pledging to address legitimate grievances from their citizens and acknowledging that security forces wereresponsible for some of the violence that took place during the protests in Oromia; however, the government continues to detain an unknown number of people for allegedly taking part in these protests and has not yet held accountable any security forces responsible for alleged abuses.
This undermines the trust and confidence needed to produce lastingsolutions.

We urge the Ethiopian government to respect due process of those detained by investigating allegations of mistreatment, by publicly presenting the evidence it possesses against them, and by distinguishingbetween political opposition to the government and the use or incitementof violence. We reaffirm our call on the government to protect the constitutionally enshrined rights of its citizens, including the right to participate in political parties, and we urge the Government to promptly release those imprisoned for exercising these rights.

The US "deeply concerned" by Ethiopia's decision to chargeopposition members with terrorism

ADDIS STANDARD April 30, 2016

(News updates) The United States on Friday April 29 said it was "deeplyconcerned by the Government of Ethiopia's recent decision to file terrorism charges against Oromo Federalist Congress (OFC) First Vice-Chairman Bekele Gerba and others in the Oromia region."
On April 22 federal prosecutors have charged 22 individuals, including prominent opposition member Bekele Gerba, first secretary general of theopposition Oromo Federalist Congress (OFC), with various articles of Ethiopia's much criticized Anti Terrorism Proclamation (ATP).
Charges against all include alleged membership of the banned Oromo Liberation Front (OLF), public incitement, encouraging violence, as well as causing the death of innocent civilians and property destructions in cities such as Ambo and Adama, 120km west and 100km east of Addis Abeba respectively during the recent #OromoProtests in Ethiopia. To the shock of many, prosecutors have also indicted defendants for participating in therecent #OromoProtests against the implementation of the Addis Abeba Master Plan, the immediate cause for the protests within the Oromia regional state, the largest of the nine regional states that constitute Ethiopia.

“We again urge the Ethiopian government to discontinue its reliance on the Anti-Terrorism Proclamation law to prosecute journalists, political party members, and activists, as this practice silences independent voicesthat enhance, rather than hinder, Ethiopia’s democratic development,” a statement issued by John Kirby, Assistant Secretary and Department Spokesperson, Bureau of Public Affairs, reads.

A widespread protest by the Oromo, the country’s largest ethnic group, that began in November 2015 has resulted in the death of hundreds of protests in the hands of government security forces, the arrest of thousands as well as forced disappearances of hundreds of Oromos in thelast five months. Several hundred university students are also dismissed from their campuses for allegedly organizing student protests.

The federal government, together with the Oromo People’s Democratic Organization (OPDO), the party that governs the region, have claimed tohave cancelled the Addis Abeba master plan, which was the immediate cause of the protests, and staged the dismissal of hundreds of medium and lower lever cadres from the OPDO. “We commend Ethiopian officialsfor pledging to address legitimate grievances from their citizens and acknowledging that security forces were responsible for some of the violence that took place during the protests in Oromia,” said the statement.

But critics lament such measures fall short of decriminalizing dissent as thousands of Oromo protesters who are held in several temporary detention facilities throughout the country remained detained, and those who are brought to the federal court in Addis Abeba are charged with terrorism.

On April 26, sixteen additional individuals, all from the west Shewa zone in Oromia regional state, and were detained at Ethiopia’s notorious torturecenter, Ma’ekelawi, were charged with several articles of the ATP. Lawyer Wondimu Ebbissa, who is representing the previous 22 defendants, told journalists that so far 83 defendants, including Bekele Gerba et al, were held in Qilinto, a federal prison facility on the outskirt of south of Addis Abeba. He also said additional 97 prisoners all detainedin connection with the #OromoProtest are believed to be either at Ma’ekelawi or the Addis Abeba police prison facility near Ma’ekelawi.

John Kirby’s statement admits that “the government continues to detainan unknown number of people for allegedly taking part in these protests and has not yet held accountable any security forces responsible foralleged abuses. This undermines the trust and confidence needed toproduce lasting solutions.”

The US therefore urged the government in Ethiopia to “respect due process of those detained by investigating allegations of mistreatment, bypublicly presenting the evidence it possesses against them, and by distinguishing between political opposition to the government and the useor incitement of violence.” “We reaffirm our call on the government to protect the constitutionally enshrined rights of its citizens, including the right to participate in political parties, and we urge the Government to promptly release those imprisoned for exercising these rights,” the statement said.

EBAC Condemns the Brazen Violation of Ethiopia's Border andKillings of Innocent Citizens EBAC

Press Release May 2, 2016

The Ethiopian Border Affairs Committee (EBAC) has a well-established record in defending the country’s borders and the social, cultural, political,security and economic interests of the Ethiopian people as whole.

EBAC is therefore aghast by the incident in Gambella and by the wantondestruction of villages, homes, families and properties by a “highly organized and armed” group from South Sudan. More important, we areoutraged by the killings of more than 200 Ethiopians, the abduction of more than 100 children and 2,000 heads of cattle in broad day light by those same people to whom, the Ethiopian people have wholeheartedly welcomed, provided sanctuary and harbored thousands of refugees fromSouth Sudan.

EBAC has repeatedly warned that Ethiopia’s borders with North Sudan have been violated numerous times, often with the knowledge and tacit approval of the Tigray People's Liberation Front (TPLF) that is determinedto transfer large tracts of Ethiopian lands to the Sudanese government ofPresident Bashir. We had warned repeatedly that this unprecedented treachery by the ruling party compromises Ethiopia's territorial integrity and sovereignty and the long-term socio-economic and security interestsof millions of Ethiopians. In this regard, we are thankful to the numerousreligious, political, civic and media organizations that have stood with us and signed petitions rejecting illegal transfers of lands to the Bashir government by the TPLF.

EBAC joins 101 million Ethiopians at home and abroad in expressing utter dismay and disbelief, sorrow and anger at the wanton and brazen violationof our ancestral land's sovereignty and borders; and the massacre of innocent people and the abduction of children in Gambella. This is the firsttime in the annals of Ethiopia's modern history that any group would do the unthinkable of attacking 200 villages simultaneously, kidnaping children and snatching huge amounts of livestock from Ethiopia. We find it hard to believe that any group would violate the country's sovereignty, cross its borders in day light, go from village to village, kill 208 Ethiopians including children, "kidnap 104" innocent children and take 2,000 heads ofcattle from Gambella to South Sudan. The TPLF that dominates the state and government nominally run by the Ethiopian Peoples' Revolutionary Democratic Front (EPRDF) prides itself in establishing an intelligence, security and defense network that is second to none. We should like to ask what happened to this formidable defense force at a time of Ethiopia'sgreatest need.

The TPLF-dominated regime's proclivity to give special and coveted statusand economic and financial privileges to the top Tigrean brass who manage intelligence, security and defense forces is understandable. The ethnic state and government can't last without the loyalty and support of this establishment. Ethiopia has more generals today than ever. But, it is not fighting a foreign enemy. These top cadres are among the wealthiest in a country where 17-20 million people starve and where annual per capita income is a third of the Sub-Saharan African average. Where are these well-endowed generals when a "well organized and armed group" massacres innocent civilians and kidnaps more than 100 children?

EBAC is deeply concerned that Ethiopia endears itself by availing fighters to UN peacekeeping operations in South Sudan to restore peace; and to the United States to fight Al- Shabab and other terrorist groups in the Horn. It is the largest African troop contributor to the UN. The critical question is who within the Ethiopian intelligence, security and defense is accountable and responsible for Ethiopia's vulnerability from foreign attackand for the massacre of innocent citizens and the abduction of more than 100 children?

Ethiopia’s vulnerability from different directions is real. However, its intelligence, security and defense forces are much more competent of quelling civil unrest in northern Gondar, Oromia, Gambella than in anticipating external threats and in thwarting them before they do the greatest damage within the shortest time possible. Nevertheless, TPLF isunable to secure the release of those innocent Children and unite them with their beloved families. In light of this, EBAC urges the TPLF- dominated government to secure the safe return of the Children.

EBAC calls on all Ethiopians across the globe to unify their forces and demand the TPLF-dominated government of Ethiopia accountability for thetragedy in Gambella. It also calls on Ethiopia’s defense forces to uphold the country’s noble tradition of preserving Ethiopian territories that the TPLF plans to transfer to the Sudanese government of president Bashir.

When the day comes, the Ethiopian people will bring the perpetrators ofthis heinous crime to justice.

The Coffee arabika bean is believed to have originated in the Ethiopian region of Kaffa, discovered by a goat herder named Kaldi whose goats became energetic after eating the beans. Coffee plays a key role in cultural and social life: around half Ethiopia’s entire crop is consumed domestically, according to the U.S. Department of Agriculture. But it is also an economic lifeline: Coffee is the country’s top export, and it raises up to a third of the country's foreign exchange, the USDA says. Ethiopia iscounting on beefed -up coffee exports to fund projects, including a light- rail system in the capital and a dam on the Nile river.

Ethiopia veterans want Italy apology, compensation

By Alim Tezelden

Ethiopian veterans, who gathered on Tuesday to commemorate comradeswho fell during the Second Italo-Ethiopian War (1936-1940), say Rome should apologize and provide compensation for its use of chemical weapons – namely, mustard gas – during the conflict. "Italy should issue an apology and compensate Ethiopia for all of its war crimes, in particular for the chemical attack against Ethiopians," Daniel Jote Mesfin, head of the Ethiopian Patriots' Association, told The Anadolu Agency. Italy's BenitoMussolini regime tried to invade Ethiopia for the second time in 1936 afterItalian troops were defeated in the Battle of Adwa in 1896.

On May 5 of each year, Ethiopian veterans gather to commemorate Ethiopian Patriots' Victory Day to honor their brothers-in-arms who fell inthe conflict, during which Italy used mustard gas against Ethiopian villages and Red Cross camps.

"Italy used mustard gas to attack Ethiopians despite the Geneva Protocol,a treaty that prohibits the use of such chemicals," Daniel, who fought in the war, said. "The gas killed many people in North Shoa, Addis Ababa and Wollo. The dead bodies of about 100,000 Ethiopians were buried, butmany weren't buried because of the heavy fighting," he added. "The call for justice is growing among Ethiopians abroad and at home," Daniel, theson of well-known Ethiopian veteran Ras Mesfin Sileshi, asserted.

Italy provided some funding for the construction of Ethiopia's Koka Dam, located 75km southeast of Addis Ababa. However, said Daniel, this was not sufficient compensation given the enormity of Italy's wartime crimes. "The current generation [of Ethiopians] is speaking loud, saying Italy should ask Ethiopia's forgiveness and must pay compensation," he asserted. "Italy is building a mausoleum for its general, Rudolfo Graziani, who was the main actor in the war crimes against Ethiopia," he added. "We strongly oppose this, as a genocide criminal does not deserve such anhonor."

Mohamed Habib, a professor of international law at Addis Ababa University, said that, in terms of international law, Italy had committed "asignificant and extraordinary crime." "It invaded a sovereign state [Ethiopia] and attempted to dismantle the country's state system," he said. "This was unacceptable under international law at the time."

“Italian governments that came after Benito Mussolini should admit thecrime, issue an apology and compensate Ethiopians,” said Habib. “An expression of remorse and compensation is necessary,” he added. “TheEthiopian people have the right to request an apology and be compensated.”

-Improved ties-

According to Ethiopian Foreign Ministry documents, the two former enemies “have overcome the problem arising from the era of colonialism and fascism that have affected their relations from time to time.” Relations between the two countries have improved in recent years, the documents read, and Italy had come to be viewed as “one of the most valuable partners for economic cooperation.” Italy contributed substantialfunding for the construction of Ethiopia’s Gilgel Gibe II and III dams.
There are also a number of Italian companies currently working onprojects in Ethiopia.

The construction contract for the multibillion-dollar Grand Ethiopian Renaissance Dam was awarded to Italian construction firm Salini Impregilo. The total trade volume between the two countries stood at $22.7 million in 2011.
Last Friday, Ethiopia’s parliament approved an $8.9-million interest-free loan agreement with Italy, funds from which will be used to expand basicservices.

-Not enough-
However, another veteran who fought in the war said Ethiopia was “unable to forgive Italy” for its use of chemical weapons in the conflict.
“What Italian troops did during the war is unforgivable,” Maj. Dejene Meshesha, 88, told AA. “I know that the Ethiopian government has established relations with Italy,” said Dejene in full military dress sportingvarious medals.
“I cannot oppose these relations, but I will never accept Italy’s friendship,as I saw how it massacred innocent Ethiopians with poisonous gas,” he added. “There are no words to describe the brutality of the Italian troops,”he recalled. “I was 15 at the time and still suffer from the horror of the war; I still feel it.”

Another veteran, 97-year-old Sergeant Demissie Tsegaye, was only 19 when he went to the front with his father, brother and uncle. “All of themwere killed by the Italians,” he said. “Only I survived to continue the fighting alongside other patriots.”

“The Italian attack was accompanied by numerous atrocities, including theuse of mustard gas,” Demissie recalled. “Many of the dead were left unburied, becoming food for vultures and hyenas.” “I still feel pain when Iremember the dead bodies of civilians and patriots left unburied,” he remembers bitterly.

Despite the passage of more than 70 years, he said, “I still suffer frompost-traumatic stress.” (AA)

'Ethiopia is boiling': - Abdirahman Mahdi of ONLF

By Al Jazeera May 7, 2016

Ethiopia, Africa's oldest independent country, is one of the West's closest allies in the Horn of Africa.

Bordering Kenya, South Sudan, Eritrea, Djibouti and Somalia, this vast nation is home to about 80 different ethnicgroups, many with their own languages and customs.

Despite Ethiopia's demographic diversity, the country's power structure inmainly centralised in its capital Addis Ababa, located in the heart of the country. And this is resented by some of Ethiopia's many different ethnic groups. To the far east of the country lies Ethiopia's Somali region. The people there have Ethiopian nationality but identify as Somalis. Many there say that their desperately poor region is starved of resources.

This has led some to rise up and challenge the government.

Self-determination struggle

A movement for self-determination for Ogaden, which is officially known as the Somali region, led by the Ogaden National Liberation Force (ONLF),began in the mid-1980s. ONLF took up arms a decade later.

Their attacks led the Ethiopian government to send in troops and to carryout what many describe as a brutal crackdown on the some five million ethnic Somalis who live in this arid region. Thousands of people have diedin a struggle that few outsiders are allowed to witness. It's an invisible conflict that has cost lives and livelihoods, and despite several rounds of talks in recent years, has no end in sight. After decades of conflict with little or no progress, should ONLF give up their fight? "How long did South Africa [take to] defeat Apartheid? When you are fighting for your rights, time is not an issue," Abdirahman Mahdi, a founding member and the foreign secretary of ONLF, tells Al Jazeera.

"My father was fighting for our rights and my children will fight for our rights. So for us, justice is the only solution - there is no other way." Mahdi denies that ONLF wants to secede from Ethiopia and claims this is"a misconception that's being propagated by the Ethiopian regime".

ONLF's fight, he says, is about seeking the "right to decide our future".

The movement wants the "right to self-determination, including even leaving the country". ONLF "cannot decide what the Somali people want. What we are saying is let them be given their right to decide." He says: "Free choice is not secession; free choice means you can choose the rightto live together in peace and dignity." ONLF's fight is not with federalism nor with ethnicity, Mahdi says. "The issue is when one group wants to dominate the rest of the people in Ethiopia. So we are going to dismantlethat." Madhi speaks of the marginalisation of Ethiopia's Somali region. "[Until] recently, we had only one secondary school after 100 years of Ethiopian occupation, we had one hospital ... Our women have no maternity services."

The region, he says, suffers from a brutal trade and aid embargo and amilitary occupation, which he alleges has resulted in the rape of 30% ofthe region's women and more than 30,000 detentions. "How can you develop people you are raping?" he asks.

Mahdi says ONLF is an Africanist movement, the struggle is expanding andthe group is now working with other ethnic groups in the country by staging "peaceful mass demonstrations". "Our alliance is now expanding," he says. "Like the Arab Spring, we are going to start insurrection all over the place. Ethiopia is now boiling ... The regime is now in disarray; they'redivided. The people of Ethiopia have now risen up. They want their rights. We are tired of one clique dominating the rest of Ethiopia."
On Talk to Al Jazeera, Mahdi discusses the future and vision of ONLF, the criticism that he is out of touch with the needs and situation of the people in Ethiopia's Somali region now that he lives abroad, and he responds to allegations of human rights abuses committed by ONLF and that the groupis armed and trained by Eritrea.

Ethiopia: God's Country

The Epiphany (Timkat) Religious Celebration In Ethiopia

Amharic for baptism, Timket commemorates in the Ethiopian Orthodox Church the baptism of Jesus in the Jordan River. In Bahir Dar, anticipationis tangible. The day before is marked by colorful procession: tattooed mothers with children and umbrellas in hand, unruly teenaged boys tossing lemons to young ladies who catch their eye, and solemn and beautiful clergy leading the pack in ritual rigidity. On the day of Epiphany,priests swathed in snowstorms of white robes stand on stage, microphones in hand, and worn Amharic syllables tumble over their lips and wash over the crowd. So does the holy water. From hoses connected to a hidden source, the blessed liquid sprays forth like T-shirts from a cannon, and the people rush forward eagerly to scrape their hands over their faces and cup it into their mouths. The reprieve on the faces young and old is the money shot, the epiphany — the eureka moment. Everyoneis revitalized by the promise of God in the water.

ETHIOPIA

Where Economic Progress and Human Rights Clash

By Jennifer Keck May 6, 2016

When you think of Ethiopia, images of starving children probably come tomind. But the East African nation has come a long way since the 1984- 1985 famine, which claimed over one million lives. Economic growth has increased around 10 percent annually for the past decade, putting it in line with the government's goal of becoming a "middle-income" nation by2025.

The country's "pro-poor" polices are transforming the nation and creatinga path to prosperity and stability. Western governments—including the United States and Canada—consider Ethiopia an "island of stability" surrounded by the struggling states of Sudan, Somalia, South Sudan, andEritrea. Yet for all its economic success, the Ethiopian government casts along shadow on human rights.

Last year, a violent crackdown on protesters in Oromia resulted in upwards of 200 deaths, according to Human Rights Watch. The anti- government demonstrations, which were set off by plans to expand the capital Addis Ababa into the region, have been fueled by frustrations overpolitical and economic marginalization. Protesters say the military and police responded with public beatings, unlawful arrests, and even killings.

Eyewitness testimonies, mostly reported via social media and by activists,have been difficult to verify. Restrictions on travel have made independentinvestigations next to impossible. Journalists can't travel without permission and are typically assigned a government minder when they do.

Ethiopia's devastating drought has only pushed human rights concerns further to the margins as the country pleads for foreign aid. And even thatnarrative is tightly controlled by the government.

CBC Foreign Correspondent Margaret Evans writes of her visit, “Local officials assigned to accompany us on our recent trip were reluctant toallow us to see any real signs of suffering in the face of the drought.”

Restricting access may be due in part to the government’s desire to project an image of strength after decades of being portrayed as a charitycase. “There appears to be a tendency by some in the international humanitarian system to change the message in such a way that what the rest of the world hears from Ethiopia is a shrill cry of an SOS for immediate intervention,” Ethiopia’s communications minister, Getachew Reda, told CBC.

But government control of the national media is far more problematic.Today, Ethiopia is “one of the leading jailers of journalists on the continent,” according to Human Rights Watch.

Ethiopia deserves to be lauded for its economic progress, but unless it begins protecting human rights, millions will be locked out of participatingin its development. It will take more than a steady growth rate for the nation to truly become the shining star of East Africa.

US State Department Report
Details Widespread Human Rights Abuses in Ethiopia
By The Oakland Institute May 9, 2016
Oakland, CA—The United States Department of State recently released itsannual Country Reports on Human Rights Practices, including an in-depthaccount of the human rights situation in Ethiopia. The report confirmed many of the ongoing human rights violations that the Oakland Institute has detailed in Ethiopia, including: abuses associated with the Government’s villagization program; restrictions on basic freedoms of expression, assembly, association, movement, and religious affairs; restrictions on activities of civil society organizations; and more.

“The US State Department report confirms that countless human rights abuses are being perpetrated by the Ethiopian Government,” said Anuradha Mittal, Executive Director of the Oakland Institute. “It also highlights appalling issues associated with Ethiopia’s criminal system, suchas the use of torture, a weak and politically influenced judiciary, life- threatening prison conditions, and the use of electric shocks and beatings to extract confessions.”

Caught in this horrific system are thousands of journalists, political opposition members, land rights defenders, students, and indigenous andreligious leaders, who have been unlawfully detained and arrested under Ethiopia's draconian Anti-Terrorism Proclamation.

Included in the State Department report are the cases of Ethiopian Muslimleaders, detained and charged under the Anti-Terrorism Proclamation for participating in protests for religious freedom; and of land rights defendersOmot Agway Okwoy, Ashinie Astin, and Jamal Oumar Hojele who were arrested en route to a food security conference in Nairobi and charged under the Anti-Terrorism law.

Countless more stories were not included in the report, including that ofindigenous Anuak leader Okello Akway Ochalla, who was abducted in South Sudan and forcibly taken to Ethiopia, in complete violation of extradition treaties and international law, for speaking out about abusesperpetrated against the people of Gambella, Ethiopia. On April 27, 2016,after more than two years in jail, Mr. Okello was handed a nine year prison sentence.

"Over the past years, countless indigenous communities have been evicted from their land to make way for large-scale land grabs in Ethiopia," commented Mittal. "These displacements are happening without the free, prior, and informed consent of the impacted populations, and when communities resist, they are forcibly removed by means of violence,rape, imprisonment, and the denial of humanitarian assistance, including food aid. To make matters worse, the people who stand up and fight for the rights of those communities – people like Mr. Okello and Pastor Omot − are being jailed. This must stop."
"Ethiopia is the United States' closest ally in Africa and the second largest recipient of US overseas development assistance in Africa," she continued."In these unique roles, the US has both the power and the moral responsibility to ensure that basic human rights and the rule of law are upheld in the country. Through its report, the United States acknowledgesthe widespread human rights violations taking place in Ethiopia. The question is: when will the US finally do something to address this egregious situation?"

Co-Pilot Plane hijacker sentenced to psychiatric care

SwissInfo May 10, 2016

The Federal Criminal Court has sentenced an Ethiopian pilot who hijackedan aeroplane in Geneva to mandatory supervised psychiatric treatment.

He had previously been deemed mentally unsound during the incident. During Monday's sentencing, the judge deemed the defendant's risk of relapse to be high and so sentenced him to undergo therapy while underguard in canton Geneva. The pilot is already receiving treatment for paranoid schizophrenia and was not present at the sentencing hearing.

The defence team had asked that the pilot be set free because he had notendangered the lives of any passengers aboard the aeroplane and the other pilot was able to safely land in Geneva. Lawyers for the 40-year-oldEthiopian reiterated that he had been seeking asylum in Switzerland. As soon as he is financially solvent, the defendant will have to pay fees for the trial totaling CHF3,000 ($3,092) as well as the costs for his defence team. His pilot's license has been revoked.

Plea for asylum

In February 2014, the flight from Addis Ababa to Rome was hijacked bythe co-pilot while the pilot was in the toilet. While over Sudan a distressmessage was sent out. Once the plane was in European airspace, two Italian fighter jets, and then French jets accompanied the aircraft. The incident highlighted that Switzerland does not have round-the-clock fighter jet intervention capability.

The plane, with 202 people on board, was rerouted to Geneva. It took a while to land as the co-pilot was trying to negotiate a claim for political asylum. No guarantees were made and the plane was eventually forced toland due to a lack of fuel. It touched down safely and no one on board was injured.

Upon landing, the co-pilot climbed out of the cockpit window and handedhimself in to authorities.

Psychiatric diagnosis

It was initially thought that the Ethiopian man would be charged with taking hostages, a crime punishable by up to 20 years in prison in Switzerland. However, the Attorney General's office later judged that the man was not capable of making competent decisions at the time and was experiencing paranoia. He was detained in a closed psychiatric ward, whileawaiting a ruling on the therapeutic measures to be prescribed to him.

In March, an Ethiopian court sentenced him to 19 years and six months inprison for hijacking. The Swiss authorities decided not to extradite him toEthiopia in order to try him in Switzerland.

Ethnically fragmented, impoverished Ethiopia teeters on the brink:Excerpts from Dawit Woldegiorgis Listen to his interview with Sisay Agena of ESAT May 11, 2016

Former Ethiopian government official Dawit Wolde Giorgis, who currently heads African Security & Strategic Studies as Executive Director discussesthe current famine in Ethiopia comparing it to the terrible famine of 1984 when he was the commissioner of Relief and Rehabilitation.

He sheds light on the multi-faceted security and stability challenges facingEthiopia under the minority TPLF regime, how the current economic growth does not add up as Ethiopia is still one of the poorest countries. Hepointed out the fact that the country is still at the bottom of the ladder among countries of the world when measured by all indicators. The monopoly of the army, political power and economic resources by a minority group could spell a disaster and could be major factor for future instability and even worse scenarios could possibly emerge in Ethiopia as a result. He also discusses the threat of terrorism, climate change, and other security threats to Ethiopia, the Horn of Africa, and Africa in general.

Dawit was a second course graduate of the elite Harar Military Academy. He was on tour of duty for seven years in Eritrea and was Special Forces trainer and served as operations officer of the 2nd division of the army in Eritrea during the Emperor's time. He then went on to attend and graduated from Addis Ababa University Law School, and Columbia University in the USA before returning to Ethiopia during the revolution where he held high level government positions as Deputy Foreign Minister,Special Representative and Administrator in Eritrea, and Commissioner of Disaster & Relief and other government positions during the WPE/Derg regime. During the 1990s to the present , he worked as consultant for several African governments thru UN sponsored projects.

Dawit reminisces about his troubles and challenges while working as anofficial of the WPE/Derg regime, the failed coup d'etat of 1989 and his relationship with the ring leaders such as Gen. Fanta Belay and other generals, his knowledge of Eritrea and Eritreans, his relationship and encounter with EPLF and Mr. Isaias Afeworki, the current President of Eritrea in the 1980w.

TPLF's General Kinfe Dagnew's Metals and Engineering Corporation (METEC) siphons billions from the Ethiopia's coffers Officials of Sugar Corporation expose.

ESAT News Friday May 13, 2016

The Metals and Engineering Corporation (METEC), a government corporation, but in reality is owned by Ethiopia's oligarchs and run by TPLFgenerals and colonels has reportedly been singled out as the cause of the loss of millions of dollars incurred by a number of government institutions.METEC is awarded all major government contracts since it is also run by the same minority political elites who also happen to run the government.

In an unusual defiance against the established corrupt modes operandi,newly appointed managers of the Ethiopian Sugar Corporation told the Parliament that METEC has been paid way too much for contracts that itnever materialize.

Five years ago, the contract to build 10 sugar factories was awarded to METEC but it has not completed a single factory while receiving 97% of the payment in some cases. METEC was also awarded the contract to supply machinery parts to the old sugar factories but the delay in deliveryand the exorbitant prices was draining off the resources of the Corporation. More often than not, the factories stop production due to delay in delivery of machineries, according to the managers.

"If the old factories were fully operational, the country could have saved the foreign currency it spends on importing sugar," a manager of the Corporation told the Parliament. "The cost of a single machinery part, if we were to import it directly is about 10,000 dollars but METEC charges 30,000 dollars," the managers cited as an example to describe the broadday light robbery by METEC under the auspices of government officials.

Professor of economics at Harper College, Dr. Getachew Begashaw said the corrupt regime has never had a macro economic plan that would benefit the poor people. "The corrupt regime is focusing on building 10 sugar factories but what the country needs is to engage in agriculture toproduce food for the starving people," he said.

"The sugar project was a scheme to loot as much money as they could. It was designed to generate money to the powers that be under the guise ofgovernment contracts," Dr. Getachew told ESAT. "What we have in Ethiopia is a parastatal economy where the oligarchs and their benefactorsloot from the country's coffers," he said.

Ethiopia says foiled Eritrea-backed terror attack

By Tesfa-Alem Tekle, Sudan Tribune May 13, 2016

Patriotic Ginbot 7 claims 20 soldiers killed, over 50 injured in an attack onArba Minch

ADDIS ABABA (MAY 12) — Ethiopia authorities said Thursday that they foiled what they described as a "plot" by Eritrean mercenaries to stage a terror attack in the country. The National Intelligence and Security Serviceand Federal counter-terrorism task force claimed the armed Eritrea's mercenaries were caught by Ethiopian security forces in the country's southern regional state. The heavily armed mercenaries were captured in a jungle at the southern tip of the country and were conspiring to launch a terrorist attack.

According to the task force, they were captured in a surprise military operation carried out by security forces on 6 May 2016. Officials told Sudan Tribune that the Ethiopian intelligence agency had the informationover the planned attack before the armed mercenaries depart from Eritrea.
According to the officials security forces captured most of the terrorists with their armaments however refuse to disclose on their total number. Unspecified number of the armed group who tried to escape were also killed. The terrorists whose travel documents shows to have been prepared by the Eritrean regime traversed Ethiopian borders from Moyalein neighbouring Kenya. "The terrorists first travelled to Uganda, and theymade their way to Kenya before they arrived at their final destination, South Ethiopia" The captured militants were allegedly trained and armed by the regime in Asmara.

Ethiopia repeatedly accuses the Red Sea nation of deploying terrorists to destabilise nation, an allegation Eritrea denies. Eritrea gained independence from Ethiopia in 1993 after a 30-year guerrilla war however the two neighbours fought a war during 1998-2000 over territorial disputes which killed over 70,000 people.

As their border dispute never settled the two countries remain at No war -No peace situation. Both countries routinely trade accusations of arming and supporting one the others' rebel group. Ethiopia has often foiled Eritrea-backed attacks and have captured a number of terrorist groups while trying to sneak into the country

At a press conference with local journalists, Communication ministerGetachew Reda Thursday hinted that the Ethiopian government will consider actions to stop these unfolding Eritrean provocations.

Previously, Ethiopian forces have penetrated deep into Eritrean territoriesand attacked several military bases including those bases used by militants who are given sanctuary by Eritrea to carry out attacks against Ethiopian targets.

UAE takes over Berbera Port of Somaliland

His Highness Sheikh Mohammed bin Rashid Al Maktoum, Vice-President and Prime Minister of UAE and Ruler of Dubai, today received President ofSomaliland, Ahmed Mohamed Mohamoud Silanyo and his high-profile ministerial delegation.

President Silanyo signs a historic agreement with UAE officials that focuses on wide range of areas that the UAE will support Somaliland.Somaliland president on behalf of SL people presented a gift on Somaliland flag to the UAE Vice President.

It is official now that president Silanyo has authorized the privatization ofBerbera port and from now on Dubai Ports World will soon assume the takeover of running the port, a strategic port in the hostile region in the Horn of Africa.

President Ahmed Silanyo of Somaliland has put the pen to paper by officially signing a deal with DPW. Details of the deal is still unknown to Somaliland concerned citizens. The Memorandum of Understanding (MOU)signed between Somaliland government officials and the Dubai Ports World. Sultan Ahmed Bin Suleiman, DPW chairperson signed the agreement while Somaliland minister for foreign affairs, Dr. Sa’ad Ali Shirehas signed on behalf of Somaliland.

DPW will invest hugely by modernizing and expanding the port in order tocompete with other ports in the region.

The UAE will also invest in the realization of Berbera Corridor road thatlinks Somaliland to Ethiopia. Other agreements include the support of agriculture, energy, electricity and tourism. The UAE will build the five-star hotel in one of the resorts in Berbera. UAE will play a huge role in training SL government employees in order to reach the aim of good governance.

HISTORICIZE

In Memory of Lij Seifu Mikael (ልጅ ሰይፉ ሚካኤል)

Lij Seifu Mikael ልጅ ሰይፉ ሚካኤል was an Ethiopian noble belonging to thearistocratic family from Shewa branch of the Solomonic dynasty by his maternal grandfather Dejazmach Mekuria Tesfaye. A public figure, educated in Paris at Sorbonne; one of the first few nobles who started paying salaries to their household servants advocating freedom of slaves and an avid supporter of Ras Tafari in his bid to become an emperor of Ethiopia but later grew to be an outspoken critic of Haile Selassie's rule after the liberation.

He was also one of the Ethiopian POWs during the Second Italo-Ethiopian War at Asinara. Pursuant to his written accounts, he in the beginning likedand admired Ras Tafari, the future emperor Haile Selassie, during his regency for his zeal and progressive moves but later grew to scold his ruleafter Ras Tafari became emperor citing partisanship, disdain towards the old officials of Menelik II and Empress Zauditu, contempt to criticisms andperceived isolation of early educated Ethiopians whom he wasn't responsible for their education; as a result, Seifu as one of the earliest educated Ethiopians who didn't owe his education to Ras Tafari, believed, the roles he played in shaping modern Ethiopian institutions, especially the foreign affairs bureau he helped organize as well as his struggles during the Italo-Ethiopian war and the fascists occupation have been undermined.

Seifu expressed these opinions through his surviving poems he wrote during his imprisonment by the fascists at Asinara Island and later in his life as administrator of the Ethiopian Orthodox Tewahedo Church. In one of his diaries, he expressed his grief over the knowledge of how Lij Iyasu was treated during his years of captivation and his subsequent eliminationafter Emperor Haile Selassie's decision to leave the country for exile in Europe. He blamed some of the Emperor's backward advisers with the exception of Ras Kassa who, he wrote, was too religious to decide on the life of Lij Eyasu.

Wold Meskel Kostre Ethiopia's Legendary Athletics Coach Dies at69' (May 16, 2016)

Ethiopia's legendary long distance coach Dr. Woldemeskel Kostre has diedon Monday at the age of 69. The exact cause of his death has not been revealed. Kostre, who guided Ethiopia to claim 28 of its 38 Olympic medals, had reportedly been sick for a long time.

"We have lost Dr. Kostre but he had been ill for a long time. Dr. Kostre was a very strict man but he showed me how to behave. He gave discipline a top priority," Ethiopian long distance legend Haile Gebrselassiesaid. Kostre has been credited as the force behind Ethiopia's success on the tracks since the 1980s when he became the country's athletics head coach.

He coached some of the country's most reputed athletics stars including Birhane Adere, Derartu Tulu, Haile Gebrselassie, Kenenisa Bekele and theDibaba sisters (Tirunesh Dibaba and Ejigayehu Dibaba). Ethiopia has won 38 Olympic medals (18 Gold, 6 Silver and 14 Bronze) since the 1960 Rome Olympics. Under his tenure, Ethiopian athletes won 28 medals (13Gold, 5 Silver and 10 Bronze).

Kostre is said to have been a promising athlete in his younger years, buthe gave up running to study. He was reportedly scheduled to represent Ethiopia in the 1964 Tokyo Olympic Games. However, he declined after receiving a scholarship offer to study sports science in a Hungarian university. Dr. Kostre was named Coach of the Year by the InternationalAmateur Athletics Federation (IAAF) in 2006.

The Port of Berbera & DP World:

DP WORLD Leases The Port of Berbera for 30 years;

Ed's Note: The port of Berbera in Somaliland that lies across from Aden inYemen has stirred the lust of France's Bollore and Dubai-based DP World.The two groups are strongly lobbying Somaliland president Ahmed Mohamed Mahamoud, a k a Silanyo, for a contract to manage the port.

Silanyo has deliberately strung the two along and plays on the strategicimportance of Berbera in his dealings with both Mogadishu and his Western partners. The latter are about to freeze their financial aid to Somaliland, reproaching Silanyo for his lack of involvement in the fight against the radical Islamist movement Al Shabaab and the two year extension he added on to his term as the country's leader.

Opening 2nd door for landlocked Ethiopia

By Tesfa Mogessie, Addis Fortune May 20, 2016

DP World's landmark deal with authorities in Somaliland to jointly developthe Port of Berbera is a welcome development for Ethiopia, according to asenior Ethiopian government official.

The Dubai-based company has signed an agreement with the Governmentof Somaliland, a self-declared breakaway republic of Somalia, to co-invest442 million dollars in the Port, to manage it under concession for 30 years. The deal was made early last week in Hargessa, the capital of Somaliland, between its Foreign Minister, Saad Sli Shire (PhD), and SultanAhmed Bin Sulayem, chief executive of DP World, one of the world's largest port operators.

The company first came to the region in the early 2000s, after signing a 20-year concession to run the Port of Djibouti, Ethiopia's lone outlet to thesea. Since then, DP World has invested hundreds of millions of dollars developing brand new oil and container terminals in Doraleh, 13Km south of the Port of Djibouti. Eventually, relations between the company and authorities in Djibouti soared, thus prompting Dubai to search for an alternative destination in which to invest.

The businessman who persuaded Dubai to invest in Djibouti, the dissidentAbdurahiman Boreh, is believed to be behind last week's deal, brokering it with Somaliland officials, according to a person knowledgeable of theprocess. Boreh's hand in the process is marked by his presence in Hargessa at the signing on May 9, 2016.

Located 937Km east of Addis Abeba, the Port of Berbera is seen by Addis Abeba as the second nearest port to serve its growing volume of cargo which has now congested Djibouti, following massive imports of food aid and fertilizer shipments. Nearly 98pc of Ethiopia's import and export cargois shuttled via the ports in Djibouti. Less than two per cent of this cargo, largely of food aid, come through Berbera, with only five berths, comparedto Doraleh's 15 and Djibouti's 18.

The Port of Berbera was first established by the Soviet Union in 1968 and expanded by the Americans in 1984. It now operates 10 mobile cranes forcargo handling, with a capacity of 70tn and two forklifts of 32tn. Its warehouse area covers 5,760sqm with a storage capacity of up to 120,000tn and open storage area covering 64,000sqm with an additional container storage yard. Two years ago, the port had the capacity to accommodate 35,000tn of cargo, a far cry from Djibouti's mammoth capability.

"Port Berbera operates low cargo shuttling cost to these areas than fromPort of Djibouti," said Mekonne Abera, general director of Ethiopia's Maritime Affairs Authority. "The engagement of DP World in Berbera willhelp us have access to modern services."

It is this view of Ethiopia which led a senior Administration official to travelto the United Arab Emirates (UAE), in October 2015, to meet Dubai's rulers and deliver words of encouragement that his country is positive of DP World's prospects in Somaliland, sources told Fortune. It is a policy informed by geopolitical development in the region where the UAE is putting resources in Assab, in its bid to help its engagement across the sea in Yemen.

"We're better off having the UAE investing in Somaliland than in Eritrea,"said an official of the administration with foreign affairs involvement. "Wehave also informed our Djiboutian friends of our dual-track policy."

Beyond geopolitical considerations, though, those in charge of the nation'slogistics had aspired to see a jump in Ethiopia's cargo transiting through Berbera to 20pc. The two sides signed a Memorandum of Understanding four years ago to cooperate in improving the corridor and agreeing on tariffs. Nonetheless, poor road infrastructure linking mainland Ethiopia to Berbera remains a bottleneck. "We hope to benefit from modern facilities that come with Dubai," Werqneh Gebeyehu, minister of Transport, told Fortune. "We welcome the agreement DP World has now signed."
This is not lost on Dubai. "[The Port] will provide an additional gateway forEthiopia that is needed for its growth," DP World said in its official statement, released last week.

Founded in 1972, DP World has a portfolio of 77 operating marine and inland terminals across six continents. In 2015, it handled 61.7 million 20ft containers and currently its gross capacity of handling stand at 79.6million TEU, the unit of the capacity of a container ship. The capacity is expected to rise to more than 100 million units by 2020.

Freight forwarders who have been heard lamenting about the congested services in Djibouti are teased by the deal. “Ports in Djibouti are no longersufficient especially now as the volume of goods we transport has been increasing,” Mulugeta Assefa, president of the Ethiopian Freight Forwarders & Shipping Association, told Fortune. “Certainly, we need alternative ports other than those in Djibouti.”

Mulugeta sees DP World a force behind the modernization of Djibouti’s Doraleh container and oil terminals and hopes to see it doing as much in Berbera. “If we get better services, it could be reasonable to pay more, ifthey demand,” he said.

Canada’s response to political turmoil in Ethiopia

By Ecadforum May 20, 2016

(CBC Radio)— Canada remains one of the largest humanitarian aid contributors to Ethiopia. According to the Canadian government, our bilateral relationship is designed, in part, to facilitate democracy and human rights in a country that has known decades of war, dictatorship,and starvation. However, some question Canada’s relationship to the country as Ethiopian politics take a dark turn.

Human rights researcher Felix Horne predicts hundreds of protesters havebeen killed, and hundreds of thousands have been detained, in a recent government crackdown — but it’s impossible to get concrete numbers withrampant media censorship in Ethiopia. On The Current, Horne describes what we know about the political situation in the country, and explains why Canada needs to be more vocal if it’s to effect change in Ethiopia.

HISTORICIZE

In Memory of Mohammed Abdullahi Ogsadey:

“A good name is far better than a good deal of money” –M.A.Ogsadey

Mohammed Abdullahi Ogsadey(b.1920s-2006) a Somali man, born in a northern town of Somalia called Gabiley, in the 1920's. He had a poor upbringing but that didn't stop him from achieving his goals. Ogsadey established the first African corporation to export coffee. He was based inEthiopia, where he established M.A.O. Harar Horse, in 1942. His companyand vision, resulted in coffee becoming Ethiopia's main exp...ort and its main source of revenue. Ogsadey's import and export coffee empire is believed to be one of the largest in East Africa, going back almost six decades and he eventually stretched his business to three continents. He was also believed to be one of the largest land owners in Ethiopia, thoughthe previous regime of Mengistu Hailemariam had confiscated vast amounts of lands that could easily be worth millions of Ethiopian Birr today.

Ogsadey had 20 children and numerous nieces, nephews, and grandchildren, who were either closely involved in his vast empire or studying abroad. A man who made sure anyone related to him was taken care of and the less fortunate were employed. He would often attribute hislove of family as the principal reason behind his success. At one point in the 1980s, he was the richest person in Ethiopia, a position that would later be occupied by the billionaire Mohammed Al-Amoudi. Ogsadey has given generously for the past 60 years to make a difference in Ethiopia.

Building schools, hospitals, and mosques in every city he has stayed in Province 5. He even sponsored cycle and football clubs to compete over- seas for Ethiopia. He always lived amongst his country men rather than abroad only leaving once a year for check-ups to America. His last charitable work before his death was donating $254,000 USD to Dil ChoraHospital in Dire Dawa over the next coming 5 years. It would open its doors in 2007 by his family in his honor to serve the poor. May his soul rest in peace.

Japan Tobacco Makes $510 Million Top Bid for Ethiopia's TobaccoMonopoly By William Davison

Offer is double British American Tobacco's 2nd-highest bid as Ethiopia hadthe world's lowest rate of male smoking in 2012

Japan Tobacco Inc., the seller of Camel and Winston cigarettes outside theU.S., made the highest bid to acquire 40 percent of Ethiopia's monopoly tobacco company, according to the government. The $510 million offer to buy a stake in National Tobacco Enterprise was more than double the nexthighest bid of $230 million by British American Tobacco Plc, said Wondefrash Assefa, a spokesman for the Public Enterprises Ministry.

A decision is expected in the "coming weeks" followed by 120 days to negotiate, according to Eva Hoeffelman, media relations director for Tokyo-based Japan Tobacco. The company's bid is in line with its strategyof building up a presence in Africa and other emerging markets, she said in an e-mailed response on Monday.

"We believe in the value of NTE and its future profitability and we are confident that, if we are confirmed to have had the winning bid, we canreplicate our successes in other African countries such as Tanzania andSudan," said Hoeffelman.

Outside Investment

While hefty public investment has helped drive economic growth of morethan 8 percent over the past five years in Ethiopia, economists and the International Monetary Fund have said the government should encouragemore private-sector investment to keep the expansion going. State-run enterprises and "political ruling-party owned entities" still dominate the economic landscape, though many seek joint venture or equity partners.

NTE is the only company allowed to trade, manufacture or sell tobacco products in Ethiopia, which is Africa's second-most populous nation withabout 100 million people. It owns a factory in the capital, Addis Ababa, and four farms, according to its website.
In 2012, only 9 percent of Ethiopian men smoked, the lowest proportion inthe world, compared to 49 percent in China, 26 percent in neighboring Kenya, and 21 percent in the U.S., according to World Bank data. A smoking ban in public places is being implemented in Ethiopia after legislation was passed in 2014, which could impact local tobacco sales.

The public enterprise established in 1942 started selling shares to investors in 1999, according to its website. NTE recorded sales of $17.4million in the third quarter of the fiscal year that ended July 7, 2015, it said, without providing further information.

The government owns 71 percent of the company and Yemeni-owned Sheba Investment Group is the other major shareholder, Wondefrash saidby phone from the capital on Monday.

Get rich or end up in jail; the tale of an Ethiopian intel

By Hindessa AbdulMay 25, 2016

Convicting an intel

After almost three years of proceedings, former head of domestic intelligence at the Ethiopian National Intelligence and Security Service (NISS), Woldeselassie Woldemichael, has finally been convicted and sentenced to ten years in prison just the other week. Doubts linger as tothe real motives of the charges. A falling out with colleagues cannot entirely be ruled out. After all, nobody out of the tight-knit band of brothers could have known about the misdeeds. It has all the signs of a domestic affair situation.

For reasons unknown, the stories of the trial for the large part were covered by ruling party owned and affiliated media: Walta Information Center(WIC), Fana Broadcasting Corporate(FBC)and the Reporter. In the good old days Walta was addressing the accused as "senior researcher onpeace and security" occasionally quoting his "words of wisdom" in terror related stories.

We've heard that before

Woldeselassie, along with two of his siblings (if it rings a bell, you got it!),was charged with grand corruption,namely,using public office for personal gains and accumulating wealth beyond his means. If you think about it, owning expensive properties in the posh suburbs of the capital; hoarding prime lands; opening multiple accounts under various names byofficials and the army top brass is a stuff of legend. One charge brought by the Federal Ethics and Anti-corruption Commission(FEAC) is particularly interesting: misleading a top official (currently minister of state) into printing his work entitled Terrorism in Ethiopian andHorn of Africa. Little did we know the security chief had the calibre to takeon such global issues in the absence of information about his academic or professional credentials. To add salt to the wound, he also forced scores ofenterprises to buy hundreds and thousands of books taking cash in advance and never delivering the products In the most anecdotal fashion, Et Fruit, a public enterprise responsible for the most mundane task of distributing fruit and vegetables is among the major sponsors of the publication!

Indications are Beyene Gebremeskel, former director general of Privatization and Public Enterprises Supervising Agency (PPESA), seems tohave cowered in the face of the mighty security official. Not only did he give a green light for the production in at least three of the printing houses he oversees, but also according to the charging documents, might have been involved in editing the manuscripts. No charges were brought against him.

Handle with care

After the court passed a guilty verdict, the consideration of mitigating factors clearly shows how some citizens are handled with special care. Thedefendant didn't let the opportunity slip without mentioning his involvement in the “struggle” to topple the Marxist regime gone a quarter of a century ago. The judge bought it! Translation: being a member of Tigray People's Liberation Front (TPLF) can help reduce prison terms!
Paradoxically, the publication which is at the center of the crime has alsohelped lesson the gravity of the sentence as the court concurred with thedefense the work has created awareness about terrorism in the society.

The roots

Publishing books and squeezing companies to buy them has helped some ardent party hacks make quick money. Almost all who wrote the story of Meles had no difficulty disposing of the books to schools, various institutions and local government offices. One most notorious example is aColonel Eyasu Mengesha who cobbled together a "biography" of the dictator launched in a pompous ceremony at the Sheraton Addis in the presence of the then head of state. A couple of others followed suit making good fortune in the process. The late head of Ethiopian International Institute for Peace and Development (EIIPD) had a knack forchurning out volumes and twisting the arms of government agencies into buying them. In that regard, it is hardly surprising that another TPLF official comes up to claim his share of the pie.

Woldeselassie's actions are typical instances of abuse of power and lack ofaccountability at the highest level. The war against corruption is hopelessly lost. FEAC which is in its last legs,happily so, after a series of legislation took their prosecutorial power away from them, may take creditfor successfully bringing a criminal to book. However, without risking to sound cynic, it is the squabbling rather than the actions of the dormant government watchdogs that eventually will bring the corrupt officials down. The writer can be reached at ab.media@yahoo.com

What messed up the Ethiopian Sugar Corporation?

The corporation ,now running 77 billion birr, has not completed the construction of one among the seven sugar factory projects. Time toconsider making accountable those who fail public responsibility.

Federal Metals And Engineering Corporation is blamed to be the reason forthe corporation failure. Among the first growth and transformation plans having 10 more sugar factories to get a profit of 1.2 billion birr in 2007

E.C. N...ever the less the project was revised again and to build only seven including Tendaho and kuraz 2. in which government borrowed 2billion birr from different countries and a large amount of money from local banks for that to happen.

The corporation executive committee reported to the house of people’s representatives that taking more than 90% the of payment, the local company in charge of constructing was supposed to finalize and submit in2005; however it is still on infant stage. The Reporter marked that the corporation is expected to barely pay 13 billion birr of the borrowed money following next year. Source:The Reporter newspaper and Dire Tubelinks.

20 soldiers killed, over 50 injured: ESAT

Ethiomedia - Twenty soldiers were killed and over 50 injured when rebelsinfiltrated the southern Ethiopian city of Arba Minch on May 7-8 and launched an attack, the satellite TV ESAT reported on Thursday.

Patriotic Ginbot 7, which claimed responsibility, said the attack was an indication that such attacks would be launched from all directions, and notnecessarily from northern Ethiopia, according to a report emailed to Ethiomedia on Thursday.

Patriotic Ginbot 7 is based in Eritrea, and carrying out guerrila attacks in southern Ethiopia could be an indication that it has widened its combat operation zone. The governent referred to the Ethiopian rebels as 'Eritreanmercenaries.'

MEDIA LEGENDS

Ellene Mocria - the Distinguished Lady of Ethiopian Radio and TV

Ethiomedia By Arefayné Fantahun May 27, 2016

Recently, I have had the chance to interview the venerable journalist Ellene Mocria whom I have known for some years. We met at Sidra International Hotel located close to her home twice, on each occasion the interview run for hours. During our meetings, Ellene was charming, open,direct, and communicative all the time.

Ellene is a major force in the history of Ethiopian journalism-one of the pioneers in radio and television broadcasting in the country. She broke new ground for female journalists with a number of admirable achievements. She was the first female news caster and producer whenthe Voice of Ethiopia, as it was then known; begun daily English broadcasts to Europe and West Africa in 1962, and added another broadcasting milestone to her career when she became the first woman television journalist in Ethiopia. “When Ethiopian Television begun broadcasting, before Emperor Haile Selassie delivered his inaugural speech, he had to be introduced by the Director General of ETV- SamuelFerenji. However, someone had to introduce the DG and summarize thefirst ETV program,” she recalls. She was that person and that made her not only the first female TV announcer, both in English and Amharic, but also the first person to appear on the screen. She is a deadline-driven journalist at her core, having paid her dues as a cub reporter, foreign correspondent, general assignment presenter. Friends and colleagues say she loves journalism and always engaged in getting the story right and telling it. The late Paul Henze, a former diplomat and expert on Ethiopian politics, described her as “a delightful traveling companion” after they travelled together from Addis Ababa to Wellega in the spring of 1988 along with other press people. “She was interested in everything, ready tojump out to explore a village or a market, talk to people or admire scenery. And she never hesitated to express her opinion of anything she saw,” Paul Henze wrote. A founder of the Ethiopian Media Women Association, Ellene continues in her retirement to be an activist for womenand an author.

Ellene was born on October 10, 1941 to her mother Suzi Workneh and herfather Mocria Wolde Selassie in Addis Ababa. Her father, Mocria Wolde Selassie, was an important figure, a hardworking agriculturalist and agronom jometra, earning an Italian title. He was one of the first studentsof Menelik II Secondary School where he was educated in French. He laterbecame proficient in Italian. Educated in Italy before the war, he was one of the personalities who founded agricultural schools of Ambo, Jimma andAlemaya, after having worked with the Ministry of Agriculture and been incharge of Awash Valley Authority. He had also authored a number of books about coffee farm.

Ellene’s mother, Woizero Susie Workneh, came from large family and was one of the thirteenth children of Hakim Workneh Eshete (also known as Dr. Charles Martin), the renowned statesman, diplomat and Ethiopia’s firstwestern trained physician. Immediately following the attempt on the life ofthe Fascist Viceroy Rodolfo Graziani, Susie was arrested along with her mother Woizero Ketselawork Tullu and her sisters and was sent to Italy to the island of Asinara and moved to Ponza where she stayed for three years as prisoner. After returning to Ethiopia, she was married to Mocria Wolde Selassie and they had four, one adopted, daughters. Not only that but they also brought up four boys and lived for 58 years together. Though she spoke and wrote and read English well, Susie did not have a formal education. However, she encouraged her daughter's academic progress and lived to see all her triumphs until she was 82 years old. Shewas the official representative of all her family members and all handled all issues including court cases etc.

The young Ellene went to the Sanford English School where she was academically distinguished, becoming member of a girl's scout, monitor and member of the theatrical group. She enjoyed a carefree, tomboyish life riding horses, playing tennis. When her mother was out of town attending to farming issues, she and her sister had to walk to school thus,she recalls "It was me who interfered whenever the unruly boys approached my sister," she jokes. Ellene recalls that she used to be theonly Ethiopian in the ladies horse race which was held regularly at the Racing Club, in front of Menelik Hospital in the 60's and won various times. "However, because the horse I raced on belonged to an Italian man, he was the one who received all the trophies," she says.
After graduating from Sanford, she was given a scholarship and sent to Lebanon to study nursing at the American University of Beirut along with two other young ladies. "I stayed there for a year. It was a boarding school. I used to teach dancing and sports to my classmates." When Ellene gave a wrong prescription to a patient, she quickly informed her teacher. Thus, the school director informed her that one more instance of this sort would mean expulsion. Unfortunately, the drug error was repeated and not heading her friends who told her not to tell, Ellene went to the director and confessed. The director told her that she had too manyinterests and was too active to be a nurse. Hence, she was expelled and never completed the course.

Once back in Ethiopia, Ellene decided to join Addis Ababa University and prepare to go to social work. "I had no ambition to be a journalist. I wanted to be a social worker. I applied at the Addis Ababa University to pursue my dream but never had a response," she recalls. In the meantimeresponding to a job advertisement for an English radio announcer and newscaster, for the just established External Service of Radio Ethiopia (which broadcasted to different parts of Africa and Europe), Ellene's dream for further studies was put to an end. She passed the written and voice test and was hired as program producer and news caster in English at the Ministry of Information's External Service on September 2, 1962. "That was how I came into media. It became my forte. I took some training on the job but it was my command of the English language that empowered me to become successful." she recalls. Besides presenting thenews live regularly, she also produced and presented various music programs; the most famous of these were "Music to Remember" and "Lie Back and Listen." She found the job very interesting and having to spend a lot of time in the music library, she begun to organize and catalogue thecollections. Eventually, she was given a course in transcription librarianship and started to add more collections of her own and those of her friends and extended family. Eventually, she was promoted to head the Transcription Library as well as continuing to produce her various programs and the news.

During that period, she recorded music by the then existing bands and orchestras, and also built the library with a collection of well over a hundred 78 rpm records produced by the Italians during the occupation, almost from the inception of musical recording, she said. (Ellene had forgotten these precious discs at the ministry but some years after her retirement, she was reminded about them and they were sent back to her. Francis Falceto having heard of her collections, asked to borrow these historical records which she graciously lent him and he has digitalized and presented a few selections as CDs for his series ethiopiques collection. A few years ago, she presented these collections to the Institute of EthiopianStudies, and was officially thanked by the then director, Prof. Richard Pankhurst. Unfortunately, she recently found out that they were being kept in very bad conditionthere.)

Beyond her up-for-anything style, of course, is a dogged determination to blend in, to try something new. In the 1964, when the Ethiopian Television started its operation, Ellene along with Samuel Ferenji became one of the first television journalists in the country. At the same time, she was still working in radio productions and presented the news live, as wellas two programs a week on television. Eventually, though not of her wish,she was transferred to ETV where she presented various programs and read the news live. TV Mag was one of her popular presentations. She alsoconducted interviews with well-known personalities in her program, “Guest of the Week” on ETV. As busy as she was, she still found time to organize the film library.

Her keen interest in social work has proved to be important to her subsequent work. A little before the dawn of the revolution, Ellene would quit TV and joined the Young Women Christian Association as Coordinatorof the Vocational Schools, which included a dress making school for girls who have reached grade 7 but could not continue and a nursery aid school, for about a year. After the overthrow of Emperor Haile Selassie, lots of folks were arrested and the whole educational centre was suffering for lack of finances. Ellene then went around raising money from every corner so that the trainees would graduate – which they did. Eventually, the YWCA was nationalized and the schools closed down. Ellene took a low profile during those times, taking a break from media work. Then a friend who came from abroad persuaded her to apply to the Radio Voice of the Gospel (RVOG). Although Ellene handed in a late application, her reputation secured her a post. Owned by the Lutheran World Federation, seventy per cent of the RVOG’s programs were religious while the rest was secular. RVOG provided a world-wide service in several languages and was later nationalized after the revolution and rechristened as the Voice of Revolutionary Ethiopia. Thus, she was back where she started under the Ministry of Information. Obviously, a lot of changes were made to the station. “The first thing we had to do was to heap insults on the previous government and glorify communism. Then we were allowed to start our programs.” Ellene used to present the news and host three programs per week, Guest of the Week, Introducing Ethiopia and Kaleidoscope.

Four years after Meles and his EPRDF rebels arrived in Addis Ababa, she was told that her voice would not be heard over the radio. This made hervery sad. However, a week later, she was promoted to Head of the PublicRelations Office of the External Service of Radio Ethiopia. She was pensioned a year later, which Ellene counted as a “firing.” “They probably thought I was a member of the party of the Derg (the Military Junta) because I was a member of Shengo (parliament). Not because I chose to,nor was I a party member. Because I spoke English well, they wanted meto be with them when they travelled. In fact, I was imprisoned for a day because I refused to be a party member. Anyway, I got a chance to go toRussia and London as a delegate,” she says.

A year before she left her job, Ellene teamed up with friends and like- minded colleagues to form a company called SELMA. It was a share company comprised of professional women to act as consultancy and communication service, heralding women as foundation of development.Ellene served as a chairperson for a number of years.

Ellene holds a number of journalists in high regard, speaking of their integrity and adherence to the professional standards including the first female journalist and author the late Romanworq Kassahun. Ellene particularly remembers Woizero Alemseged Herouy who passed away in 2014. “I’ve known her for many years. We were more or less hired together for the External Service of Radio Ethiopia: her in the French service and me for the English. She also worked as an Anglophone journalist. She was the only trained trainer of journalists and went all overAfrica to train. She was very knowledgeable and professional in every aspect of life. Alem as she was known was a very careful and caring individual,” Ellene says.

One of the most cherished experiences in journalism was the time Ellenespent working as BBC correspondent after her retirements from the Ethiopian Ministry of Information. During her seven years as correspondent, she reported on several colourful and thought-provokingstories including lack of fair trade for Ethiopian coffee growers; cleaning Addis project; and the horrible experience of female circumcision, or genital mutilation. With insight and thoroughness, she brought news of the good, the bad with unwavering fairness.

Her journalism at times proved dangerous when even she was trying to report even about innocent looking subject as fast food in the streets of Addis Ababa. While on assignment for the BBC trying to talk to people engaged in fast food production in Mercato area, “A soldier came to me and asked about my intentions. I showed him my license which was givento me by the Ministry of Information and explained to him about the program I was doing. He was reluctant to listen to me and he called for assistance and a police car came over and they drove me to a police station. My daughter was with me and drove following us. She was so scared and tears streaming down her face. It was so ridiculous. I was toldto sit and listened to him as he was telephoning here and there trying to justify himself till finally one official, who was in the other line, must haveasked him the reason for my arrest. His answer, to my great surprise was“You know, she is broadcasting about our county’s economy”. The official told the security person that I had a right and ordered him to let me go,”Ellene recalls. Of course, by then it was too late to file interviews she hadcollected, hence it was never aired.

Throughout her career, Ellene produced and narrated films and video productions on Ethiopia and other topics for government and non- governmental organizations. She presented fashion shows for charity organizations i.e. Ethiopian Women’s Welfare Association; The International Women’s Club and others and acted as Master of Ceremonies for charity organizations voluntarily. She has regularly beenEnglish language presenter of live folk musical shows at the National Theatre, during special performances for visiting head of states and dignitaries.

In 2001, when the British Council gave a training of trainer course to journalists and Ellene was one of those personalities included in the training. After the course was over, she gave training to journalists on thejob, also sponsored by the Council.

Beginning January 2002, for one year, she was the announcer in English of programs and also the coordinator for the United Nations Mission to Ethiopia and Eritrea (UNMEE) known as Radio UNMEE. This included broadcasts in English and in three other local languages, Amharic, Afaan Oromo and Tigrigna. The Amharic was presented by the famous radio andtheatre personality, Debebe Eshetu.

Ellene was previously member of, to name a few the now extinct ones: Ethiopian Women’s Welfare Association, Social Service Society of Ethiopia;National Literacy Campaign of Ethiopia; and for many years as board member & treasurer of the Family Guidance Association of Ethiopia (FGAE). Still active ones the Horticulture Society of Ethiopia; InternationalWomen’s Club, the Society of Friends of the Institute of Ethiopian Studies of the Addis Ababa University, the YWCA and Fund Raising member of the Network of Ethiopian Women's Association(NEWA). Ellene is also program committee member of the Philatelic Association of Ethiopia. Ever since foundation, she has been the Chairperson and member of the African Village Financial Service (AVFS) a micro finance institute particularly focusing on the improvement of the lives of poor women. Regarding mediaand journalism, she is a founding member of the Ethiopian Media Women Association (EMWA) and is still active as board member. She was the only Ethiopian member of the following: International Association of Women in Radio and Television (IAWRAT) and the African Women Media Committee (AWMA) as Advisory Committee member and others.

She was also a member of the African Child Policy Forum (ACPF) as a Senior Media Consultant having been employed in early May 2004, to assist with the International Conference on 'The African Child and TheFamily' which was held at African Union (AU) during May 21-22, 2004.
Over the course of her long career, she was honoured with various decorations and awards, and she was the subject of many newspaper andmagazine articles. Even as a 23-year-old novice journalist, Ellene made itto the cover the Ethiopia Mirror magazine, with a rewarding article writtenby Tegegne Yeteshawork, vividly portraying her youthful eagerness. She also made it to the cover of Italian language magazine Sestante, a semi- annual magazine edited by Mr. Mania Enrico and sponsored by the Ethiopian Ministry of Information. In recent years, she received an award from the UNHCR for a story she did about refugees. Another was for her major role in Channel Four documentary film, produced for Umbrella Pictures by Gill Barnes, about early marriages and their devastating effecton the girls in Ethiopia called Child Brides.currently retired, Ellene is still very active recording narrations for documentary films for different NGOs,researching on various subjects, particularly on women, enjoying her hobbies which include music, photography, gardening, stamp & coins collections etc. "Trees For Life" is a book she had published by Shama Books in which many photos of unusual uses of tree are displayed and includes 100 names of trees in Amharic and English and poems and sayings etc. about trees.

Married to her teenage boyfriend Engineer Seyfu Lemma, for 50 years now, she is the mother of four girls (one adopted) and seven grandchildren. At present, she is also the assistant director of Telsem Media & Communications plc. The writer, Arefayne Fantahun, is editor ofEthiopia Observer, and shares his articles with Ethiomedia.com.

STRATEGIC ISSUE

Why Getting Assab Port Back Matters to Ethiopia?

By Eidmon Tesfaye May 30, 2016

According to the United Nations Human Development Report of 2013, Ethiopia is one of the eight countries in the world with the lowest human development index (HDI) and one of the two countries, Niger being the other, with the highest multidimensional poverty index (MPI). Despite themuch publicised double-digit economic growth over the last 12 years, Ethiopia has one of the lowest per capital gross domestic product (GDP) inthe world, just a little ahead of Burundi, Niger and Central African Republic (CAR), based on the 2012 World Economic Outlook Database of the International Monetary Fund (IMF). Further, compared to its immediate coastal neighbors, it has the lowest per capita GDP, less than those of Somalia and Eritrea; the highest MPI; and the lowest HDI, excepting Eritrea.

The country is also one of the most populous in the league of landlocked countries, with a population size fast approaching above 90 million. It wasofficially rendered landlocked by a dubious and ignominious decision of thegovernment in power and its international backers.

Since most of the country’s import-export trade is conducted through sea transport, and because Massawa and Assab are no longer viable options, Ethiopia is forced to rely on the ports of neighboring countries, especially Djibouti, Kenya, Sudan and occasionally, Somalia. However, the costs of transportation to most of the destination ports are very prohibitive in viewof the long distances and poor land transport facilities.

About 90pc of the country’s import-export trade is now conducted throughthe port of Djibouti. Reports show that even the Ethiopian Ministry of Transport (MoTr) acknowledges relying on a single port has become a bottleneck for the development of import-export trade.

In the mid of the year 2008, the cost of using the port of Djibouti increased alarmingly. Until the 2008 fee increase, Ethiopia used to pay more than 850 million dollars to DP World Djibouti in port fees, annually.

The port is administered by DP World Djibouti, a part of DP World, formedin September of 2005 with the integration of the terminal operations of the Dubai Ports Authority (DPA).

According to July 6, 2008 edition of Sudan Tribune, the sudden and unexpected new rates involved an increase of up to 25pc in marine charges, cargo port dues and storage charges, and a 15pc increase in the cost of container stevedoring. This added an additional cost of at least 210million dollars for the use of the port by Ethiopia.

To put this all in context, a 2010 report by the United Nations Conferenceon Trade & Development (UNCTAD) has shown that the amount landlocked countries spent for the payment of transport and insurance services was more than twice the average spent by developing countries,and more than three times the average for developed economies.

Paul Collier (Prof.), a renowned development economist, argues that whilethe majority of the five billion people in the “developing world” are gettingricher at an unprecedented rate, a group of countries (mostly in Africa andCentral Asia) are stuck with some sort of development traps and suggeststhat development assistance should be focused heavily on them.

According to Collier, these countries typically suffer from one or more development traps: conflict; natural resources; bad governance and landlocked with bad neighbors. Poor landlocked countries with bad neighbors find it almost impossible to tap into world economic growth.

Collier explains that countries with coastline trade with the world, while landlocked countries only trade with their neighbors. Landlocked countrieswith poor infrastructure connections to their neighbors will necessarily have a limited market for their goods.

Thirty two of the forty-five landlocked countries belong to what is calledthe Land-Locked Developing Countries (LLDCs), with Africa contributing half of them. Thesethirty-two LLDCs collectively account for only two of the world’s GDP, while occupying 12.5pc of the world’s total land surface area.

Economic and other disadvantages experienced by these LLDCs make themajority of the landlocked countries Least Developed Countries (LDCs) and their inhabitants occupy the bottom billion tier of the world’s population in terms of poverty. The sea-borne trade of the landlocked countries largely depends on transit through other countries.

Additional border crossings and long distances from the market substantially increase the total expenses for the transport services. Therefore, the economic performance of landlocked countries reflects the direct and indirect impact of geographical situation on their key-economicvariables.

For example, based on the 2012 World Economic Outlook Database, the average GDP per capita for the world is about 15,000 dollars. Of the forty-five world's landlocked countries, only eight have GDP per capita that is higher than this average; and all of these eight countries are in Europe.

The average of all landlocked countries is only about 13,000 dollars. It may be noted that even this average is further distorted by the inclusion of countries like Switzerland, Luxemburg and Lichtenstein, which have percapita GDP as high as 118,000 dollars. Excepting Hungary and Kazakhstanthat have 12,736 dollars and 11,774 dollars, respectively, all of the other landlocked countries have much smaller GDP per capita ranging between Burundi's 282 dollars and Botswana's 9,893 dollars.

Some researchers even argue that landlocked countries experience weaker growth than oceanside countries. More specifically, controlling forthe effects of other factors, being landlocked reduces average growth by about 1.5pc, and on average, landlocked countries have dependence on foreign assistance much longer than coastal countries.

Further, similar studies have reported that, other factors remaining constant, landlocked countries that rely on transoceanic trade tend to incur a cost of trade that is twice the amount incurred by their maritime neighbors, and experience six percent less economic growth compared totheir non-landlocked neighboring countries.

Over all, the landlocked countries do worse than their maritime neighborsin each component of the HDI. The average GDP per capita of landlockedcountries is approximately 57pc less that of their seaside neighbors. Life expectancy index scores are 0.3 lower on average, equivalent to 3.5 years, and education index scores are 0.36 lower.

Progress in many landlocked developing countries has also been slow. In the Human Development Report, twenty out of twenty-seven landlocked countries with adequate data are considered 'top priority' or 'high priority'due to their lack of progress towards the internationally agreed-upon Millennium Development Goals (MDGs).

Brining it all closer, according to the aforementioned Sudan Tribune report, the Port of Djibouti is used not only as a gateway for Ethiopian transit cargo, but also as a point of destination. The volume of Ethiopia's import and export cargo has risen from 3.9 million tons in 2006/07 to 4.6million tons in 2007/08.

With the volume of this import-export projected to grow by 20pc in 2009/10, the total annual fee would was then projected to be in excess of 1.2 billion dollars – a very huge and unsustainable expense for a resource-constrained country like Ethiopia.

It is thus clear that Ethiopia's trade flow, as a function of both the cost of using alternative sea ports of other countries and distance traveled, wouldstifle any genuine policy of economic development. The huge fees paid outannually to the coastal countries for port services are drain the economy of the country, which is a net importer.

This is, of course, money that could instead be invested internally for portservice improvement, infrastructure development and other related transportation projects. The latter in turn could immensely improve the trade balance and flow of the country by reducing the cost of exports andimports, and could increase the aggregate demand for domestic goods and services related to the infrastructure development and port services.

The prudent investment of the money paid as port fees could also necessitate increased employment of labor and other resources to meet the accompanying increased demand. With a very conservative estimate of 95pc increased consumption spending (which entails a 0.95 marginal propensities to consume) for any amount of additional income Ethiopiansget on the average, one would have a corresponding large spending multiplier of 20.

This implies that the total fees lost in the form of direct payment for theuse of the port of Djibouti could add billions of dollars to the GDP of Ethiopia annually. Evidently, the unnecessary leakage in the national revenue reduces the value of export, and increases the cost of imports,thereby shrinking the volume of the GDP and depressing the economic growth and development prospects of Ethiopia for years to come.

In addition, the landlockedness imposed on the country has deprived the people of other economic opportunities. Most notably, the loss of access tothe sea was accompanied by the loss of maritime resources, including fisheries, as means of food security, and revenues from tourism. In a country like

Ethiopia that has experienced vicious cycles of famine and drought, it is hard to overestimate the significance of healthy fish stock asa critical alternative for food security and for sustaining economic prosperity and social and cultural well-being.

In the backdrop of these unfavorable economic realities, to a degree resulting from the landlockedness of the country, the ruling party in Ethiopia does not appear to be poised to seek a framework that will address effectively the loss of the country's legitimate access to the sea.Tragically, our beloved country still ranked as one of the poorest nationsin the world by almost all measures of economic development.
The deplorable economic condition of the country is expected to continue in this hapless path as long as it remains landlocked and a meaningful andbalanced policy of economic development cannot be implemented throughgood governance. Therefore, it is of paramount importance to revisit the adverse impact of being landlocked on the economy of Ethiopia.

There is mounting evidence that the bogus international treaties that the people of Ethiopia have been forced to accept have no binding force from a legal, historical or economic standpoint. It is, therefore, incumbent uponthe international community and the peoples of the concerned countries toseek a lasting solution to the problem that has been an impediment to peace and prosperity in that part of Africa.

In the search for a viable solution, I believe, it is critical that the pros and cons of all available options be explored, taking into account the historical,socioeconomic and national security imperatives in the region. Such a methodical and unbiased approach to the issue is guaranteed to lead to anincontrovertible solution that will affirm the unconditional and rightful return of the port of Assab to Ethiopia, thereby heralding a new era of peace, stability and prosperity for the brotherly peoples of Ethiopia and Eritrea whose common heritage is much more deep-rooted than the shortsighted machinations of politicians that purport to divide them.

EDUCATION IN ETHIOPIA

Oromo protesters 'force suspension of Ethiopia university exams'

BBC News May 31, 2016

Ethiopia's university entrance exams, due to start yesterday, have been cancelled because one of the papers has been leaked online, reports the government-affiliated Fana Broadcasting Corporate. Pictures of the Englishexam have been widely shared on social media. Minister of Education Shiferaw Shigute is quoted as saying: "After a cross check, we decided to terminate the whole exam since we had no evidence that the other examswere safe." People supporting the protests for greater rights for Ethiopia's Oromo people are saying that they are responsible for the leaks.

Photographs of some of the exam papers have been posted on one activist's Facebook page: The activists said they wanted Oromo studentsto have more time to study for the entrance exams after their high schools had been closed for several months during a wave of protests at the end of last year and the beginning of this year. Ethiopia's education ministry has said that a plan for new exams will be announced soon.

UK Foreign Secretary assigns lawyer for British citizen detained inEthiopia
News Analysis June 5, 2016

The Foreign Secretary secured assurances from the Ethiopian Governmentthat Andargachew Tsege will be granted access to a lawyer.

During his visit, the Foreign Secretary despatched a senior Foreign Office Director to meet Mr. Tsege in prison, on his behalf, on Wednesday to seekfurther assurances about his welfare.

This is the tenth visit by British Embassy staff and follows a visit by theBritish Ambassador in May.

Speaking from Ethiopia after his meetings on Wednesday, Philip Hammond said: raised the case of Andargachew Tsege in my meeting withthe Prime Minister, making it clear that while progress has been made, with regular consular access now in place and a transfer to a federal prison, further steps are required. I have now received a commitment from the Prime Minister that Mr Tsege will be allowed access to independent legal advice to allow him to discuss options under the Ethiopian legal system.

Britain does not interfere in the legal systems of other countries, anymore than we would accept interference in our judicial system. Our consular role is to ensure well-being and access to legal advice.

At my request, a senior Foreign Office official travelling with me, was given access to Mr Tsege in prison today. Following that visit, I am satisfied that he is not being ill-treated and that he is receiving regular visits from family members in Ethiopia.

The Foreign Secretary has repeatedly raised Mr Tsege’s case and PrimeMinister David Cameron has also written to the Ethiopian Prime Ministeron two separate occasions.

Following the British Government's intervention, access to Mr. Tsege hasimproved and he was transferred to a regular prison. The Foreign Secretary has met Mr. Tsege's partner and the British Government will continue to support Mr. Tsege and his family. Source: Gov.uk

The Assosa (Wellega) EPLF/OLF massacre of peasant settlers,January, 1990 (The following is extracted from Dr. Aleme Eshete's paper)

Ethiomedia June 5, 2016:

In January 1990 EPLF or Shaabia, then a close military ally of Woyane) had in collaboration with the OLF and the Sudanese army invaded Assosain Western Ethiopia. On that date Shaabia was all-powerful since its victory of Afabet in 1988 and the destruction of the famous Nadew division. Following its victory of Shire in February 1989, the TPLF had onits part liberated the whole of Tigrai in 1989 without any resistance fromSergeant Legesse Asfaw who took the road to Addis Ababa… We were inthe last days of the Cold War under the Glasnost of Gorbaciov. While the U.S imperialism multiplied its support to theShaabia-Woyane, the collapsing Soviet Union of Gorbaciov had abandoned Menghistu..The EPLFand TPLF were now full of arms and confidence counting the days when they will occupy Asmara and Addis Ababa respectively.

It was in that context that the EPLF had marched accompanied by the army and tanks of another former ally -the Sudan- as well as a few members of the Oromo Liberation Front (OLF) to occupy Assosa, capital ofthe Beni Shangul Awraja, and inhabited by the Nilotic Berta, a largely Arabic speaking largely Muslim group, (but also by the Sese, the Mao etc),whom the LF, as former Welega Galla aristocracy, considered an inferior race whom they called "black Galla!" claimed as Galla territory.1 We remember the claim of the Jote brothers who were among the Galla princes descendants of the Galla monarchies established at the end of the Galla invasion (1520's to 1855) taking the place of the Gada system: The primitive Galla communal Gada system of the pastoralist nomadic Borana had given place to a settled society with a hereditary aristocracy followingthe introduction of private land property and a ruling class, exploiting not only peasant gebaro labor but also gold mines of the region and controlling the Sudan-Ethiopia caravan trade including a lucrative gold andslave trade. Upon Fascist occupation of Ethiopia (1936), the Jote brothers were among the rival Galla princes who subdivided and governed the Leqemt-Gore region paying tribute to Addis Ababa since the recon quest of the region by Menelik. There were as yet no clear-cut provinces of Welega and Ilubabor. Assosa was being governed since the days of Menelik as an autonomous region by its local ruler, Sheikh Hojele, paying tribute to Addis Ababa, which warded off the Galla threat.

Upon Fascist occupation, the Jote brothers will exploit the occasion to claim anew the rich caravan trade link of Assosa and subsequently end Assosa autonomy with a brutal military invasion forcing Berta native chiefSheik Hojele into exile. (See Amharic letter of the Jote brothers to the Fascist Italian governor - Italian State Archives)

The objective of January 1990 EPLF-OLF march and invasion of Assosa was therefore, other than the robbery of banks and other infrastructure installations in the area, was to chase out the highland "Amhara " peasantvictims of famine or otherwise poor peasants who had following the millenary south-north, north south movement of peoples and the contact between Gojam, Gondar and the countries south of the Abbai, pre- and post-Galla, mainly Welega, crossing the Abbai to try their fortune in tradeand agriculture. The official resettlement programme of famine stricken highland peasants to the sparsely populated hot western lowlands had started under Haile Selassie's government and amplified, as we know, under the military Derg. At the end of the 1980's. There were said to befifty settlement villages in Assosa, largely Derg improvised and imposedcollectivized villegized settlements, counting some 80,000 settlers.

The other EPLF-OLF objective was to chase out the 42000 thousands ofSudanese refugees the border town of Assosa who were being cared forby the United Nations High Commission for Refugees. The Khartoum government accused these refugees of serving as the source of militaryrecruitment for the SPLA. And hence the collaboration of the Khartoum government in the invasion of Ethiopian territory.

So upon arrival in Assosa the EPLF and OLF fighters had divided the population of Assosa by ethnic and linguistic identity. The Tigrigna speaking settlers were separated from the rest to be taken back to Tigrai, which, in retrospect, makes one strongly suspect the presence among thearmed invaders of the Tigrai Peoples Liberation Front (TPLF) – another offspring of the EPLF strategy for the tribal dismemberment of Ethiopia, which EPLF armed and organised since TPLF inception in 1975 The Amharic speaking peasants of "Gojam Sefer" were separated and toldto leave the country in five days These poor peasants included some who have settled there for generations. They were told that they had come to liberate Assosa as a Galla territory. The peasants had naturally respondedthis was their country where they have lived some for decades, where they have toiled to earn what ever they have earned as farmers or as small traders, and that they had nowhere to go. They had particularly targeted the Amharic speakers of "Gojam sefer" ("Gojam town") the area inhabited mainly by the Gojamese who were treated as "neftegna" armedcolonizers.

Following this, early on Tuesday (15 Tir or January 1990) the EPLF/OLF armed men had called on every tucul in Gojam Sefer inviting all – men, women and children, to an urgent assembly. When the people arrived, they took them to a school building and divided them into two classrooms.here were among the invited peasants pregnant women, mothers with newly born babies, as well as children and men and women in ad vanced ages. Then the EPLF/OLF and certainly also TPLF forces ordered the doors of the class rooms closed and those inside were brutally massacred by hand bombs and launchers, following which the school building was put onfire. Thos who managed to run away were searched and gunned down.
Among the estimated 300 dead were men, women children, and newly born babies. Many others had survived with heavy wounds and mutilations. It was the tale as told by these videotaped survivors that the world has come to know about the Assosa massacre.

The other victims of the EPLF-OLF invasion were the southern Sudaneserefugees in Ethiopia who were gunned and terrorized to flight in the direction of the Sudan where they were received by the Khartoum government's armed killers. The UNHCR was well aware of all that happened in Assosa. And yet in the UN in the West complete silence.

The EPLF itself had confirmed its Assosa massacre through no other but itsleader Issayas Afework:
"Within the framework of our co-operation with the Oromo Liberation Front The situation created by the destruction of communication installations, State mines Surveying installations, witnesses a political and military development that cannot be underestimated."

See also Radio Broadcast reports, Africa ME/0733 B/2, Voice of the BroadMasses of Eritrea in Amharic 1630 GMT 3 April 1990)
"The offensive of Assosa was launched by the OLF and EPLF units. This isnot the first time we have operated in the area. Our relations and co- operation with the OLF and various other forces are known to everyone. Due to the joint offensive launched, it was possible to bring the area under the control of the OLF."3

The OLF gave further details on the Assosa massacre. In its communiquéof January 10, 1990 the OLF said that their forces for the liberation of "western Oromia" (mark the total exclusion of Berta and other Nilo-Saharan Ethiopian inhabitants of Beni Shangul) had won victory over thegovernment forces of the Derg in the Assosa region between January 3 and 7 killing 500 soldiers. OLF claimed to have taken complete control ofAssosa, through a report of January 11. Eventually Assosa was reconquered (26 tir, February 3 1990) by the Derg and the EPLF-OLF forces had taken to flight;

Let me quote some basic declaration of OLF extracted from its media finance by EPLF and I will finalize my comments shortly. The OLF says ”However democratic it is, no alien will give independence to the Oromopeople. It is foolishness to hope for that;

If we heard this from its radio broadcast, why do some people believe OLFwill abandon its agenda and trust the opposition groups? It clearly is telling us quoted above “how democratic it is no alien will give independence to the Oromo people..” Is not the Ethiopian Opposition groups considered alien by OLF? It also have arrogant, silly and unchangeable agenda which describe its own agenda in a clear way through the EPLF financed Radio of Oromo broadcast telling us from its past broadcast and present broadcast as the following “One can only liberate oneself. Like all other peoples, only the Oromos will liberate themselves and establish their own system of rule”. Now, I ask Dr.
Gelawdewos Araya to explain us how OLF can work together with Ethiopians with such a stand? Let me also bring some remaining issue about the OLF stand and some tribal parties included in the opposition parties and elsewhere in the Ethiopian struggle with Dr. Aleme Eshete ’view on tribal parties and other issue and I will conclude saying hope I am not violating my Dear teacher, leader prof.Aleme Eshete’s copy Wright. I only did this to educate and debate. Please read the following how OLF, TPLF, EPLF and other tribal parties definition of oppressed tribe and the oppressive tribe in Ethiopian politics.(text ends)

The writing is on the wall: Ethiopia is teetering on the brink

By Engidu Woldie June 8, 2016

This short piece is a reflection and also a rejoinder to the observations made by expert panelists on issues relating to the security situation in Ethiopia at the recent panel discussion held at the Brookings Institute under the theme “the security situation in Ethiopia and how it relates tothe broader region.”
The discussion was hosted by the Africa Security Initiative at Brookings and the panelists were Abye Assefa, Associate Professor, St. Lawrence University and Terrence Lyons, Associate Professor, School for Conflict Analysis and Resolution, George Mason University. Michael O’Hanlon, co-director of the Center for 21st Century Security and Intelligence moderated the discussion.

Panelists seem to agree that the federal form of government is working fine in Ethiopia and the country needs a “strong handed” government like the one in power to sustain peace and security. “Personally, for Ethiopia, Iwould rather have a strong handed government that provide peace than aso called democratic government that is likely to be summoned to the international tribunal,” says Assefa, referring to the leaders of some African countries.

It was puzzling, to say the least, to hear that what Ethiopia needs is a “strong handed” and single party government; deliberately ignoring the fact that what the country actually needs is to form a democratic system of government where all nationalities are to be fairly represented, especially if one is serious about bringing Ethiopia out of its current political quagmire. The status quo is a complete domination by a minority clique representing only about 6% of the population. All aspects of the politics and the economy is tightly controlled by a handful of oligarchs whounashamedly argue that they deserve to be in control of everything as they were the ones who sacrificed the most to topple the preceding military regime.

“From the US point of view, Ethiopia’s stability is seen as a contribution tostability in Africa, something the US supports,” Lyons said at the panel.
Assefa is of the belief that Ethiopia’s federal system of government has made the country, and the region in general, peaceful. “The ethnic federalpolicy that the Ethiopian government has implemented is a very importantfactor, more so than the government’s ability, in making the country relatively peaceful,” says Assefa.

I don’t know which Ethiopia Lyons and Assefa had in mind when they talked about “peace and stability” but the Ethiopia we have today is engulfed with protest and uprising against the minority rule in all directions of the country. Suffice to mention the ongoing Oromo uprising against deliberate political and economic marginalization by the minority regime; the unrelenting struggle by the people of Wokait and Telemt against a false identity forcefully imposed on them by the Tigayan regime in an apparent move to incorporate vast fertile land into the Tigray region;the demand by the people of Konso in the south for self-administration that led to protest and confrontation with regime’s forces and the arrest ofhundreds of people deemed to have dissented against the regime (Some of those arrested had recently broken out of prison) etc. etc. This is the Ethiopia that the panelists tried to portray as “stable and peaceful.”
Assefa had actually downplayed the protest in the Oromo region saying the “Oromo uprising is a crises within the OPDO……it is a crises within theruling party rather than to overthrow the ruling party.”

Didn’t the Oromo people in their six month protest say enough is enough to the minority regime? Haven’t high ranking members of the OPDO expressed their rage in the way the TPLF forces handled the protest in theOromo region? Aren’t a considerable number of members of the OPDO in support of the protesters? Isn’t the protest by the Oromo people against economic and political marginalization perpetrated by the minority regime?

Lyons actually told the truth few years ago when he assessed the risks to stability in Ethiopia. He wrote in 2011 that “what appears to be a strong authoritarian regime may in fact be fragile and collapse quickly, with considerable potential for violence and uncertainty.” Lyons wrote at lengthon the multiple potential fracture lines, instability and potential violence due to the narrowing political space and absence of independent press andcivil society. At the panel, however, Lyons opted to just say nothing when his co panelist downplayed the role of civil society in promoting a democratic culture in a society.

It is also worth mentioning that the speakers forgot to mention the unbridled and high level corruption that has drained the coffers of the country, leaving the regime unable to sustain and feed its people even forfew weeks without the financial assistance form the US and other donor countries. Greed and theft by the powers that be could be one factor of instability and a threat to the security of a nation that’s also plagued by manmade hunger. Would a “strong handed” government stop food riots that could potentially develop into violent protests and ultimately leads tothe demise of a regime? The answer is too obvious.
On the issue of land, Assefa echoed Ethiopia’s former Prime Minister, Meles Zenawi’s argument. Assefa said, “I really understand the logic why land should not be privatized because the haves would come and disposesthe have nots.”

Meles, asked by the former Assistant Secretary of State for African Affairs,Herman Cohen, as to why he would not allow land to be privatized, repliedthat if he allow land to be sold to individuals, “the Amharas would buy the land and become dominant again with the land in their possession.”

The current agricultural land tenure system in which the farmer works ona tiny plot of land has clearly failed to make the country self-sufficient in food despite the false claims and public pronouncements by the Prime Minister and others that Ethiopia has achieved food self-sufficiency. Suchpublic statements are not old but made just a year or so ago. On top of this, natural calamity is hitting the country every 10 years resulting in drought. The farmer, even at the best of times, is barely able to feed his family let alone produce surplus for the market.

The Ethiopian military was also one of the issues discussed at the panel. Both panelists agreed that the minority government in Addis Ababa has “astrong military.” But the fact is, about 90% of the generals and other highbrass officers in the army hail from one region – Tigray, which only represent 6% of the Ethiopian population. Second, it is a public knowledgethat the generals and high ranking officers are involved in high level corruption and are plundering the nation’s resources as they are in competition against each other as to who has the most wealth. They are building multi-million dollar real estates under the names of their family members and other alias. The Ethiopian army, plagued with corruption at the top level, is nowhere near to be called a “strong army”. There has alsobeen an increase in defections from the army as the rank and file is marginalized and alienated by the higher Tigrayan officers who control every aspect of the military. A strong army requires a strong discipline, which the current Ethiopian army is in a serious deficit.

Ethiopia is perhaps the only country that is still dealing with questions of nationalities and over inflated issues of ethnicity with some political actorsstill harboring cessation from the country as a solution to the conundrums.Corruption at higher level; capital flights in billions of dollars every year; protest and uprising against the minority oligarchic system that controls every aspect of the life of the people; resistance movements by a coalitionof armed opposition groups and other vigilante like groups; the growing resentment by the alienated majority of the rank and file in the army; the struggle by the Ethiopian Muslim community to free their religion from government interference; government interference in all religious affairs and institutions; the burden on the lives of ordinary Ethiopians due to the ever skyrocketing prices of staple foods etc. etc. are all too obvious to ignore and are the writing on the wall in the present Ethiopia.
The regime is sustaining its existence with the life support hooked to it bythe US and other power players that are after their own geopolitical interest. The simmering discontent by the people is a tinderbox waiting toexplode. The writer can be reached at engiduw@gmail.com

Ethiopia's New Legislation
Cybercrime Law Allows for More Efficient and SystematicProsecution of Online Speech June 10, 2016:
The Ethiopian government has passed a dangerous cybercrime law that criminalizes an array of substantive computer activities including the distribution of defamatory speech, spam, and pornography online among others offenses. The law, dubbed the "Computer Crime Proclamation," waspassed, the government says, in an effort to more accurately attune the country's laws to technological advances and provide the government better mechanisms and procedures to "prevent, control, investigate, and prosecute the suspects of computer crimes."

While the law aims to facilitate and accelerate the way in which the country penalizes computer crimes, it criminalizes legitimate forms of online speech. Based on the law's exhaustive list of offenses and penaltiesthat are grossly disproportionate to the outlined crimes, it will undoubtedly have a chilling effect and could serve as a tool for silencing political opposition, which relies heavily on online publishing since the government has cracked down on traditional media.

EFF is all too familiar with Ethiopia's track record of silencing bloggers, human rights defenders, political dissenters, journalists, and activists. Endalk Chala, a founding member of the Zone9 blogging collective, formerEFF Google Policy fellow, and Global Voices contributor has firsthand knowledge of the Ethiopian government's M.O. in exerting control over its people online.

The Ethiopian government considers access to Internet an exclusive rightof a chosen few—the people who are running the government and their friends. The new computer crime law is the latest legal mechanism set tobe used to limit access to Internet services for the majority. The government is attempting to make blogging, content sharing, and even liking critical comments on social media all crimes.

Take, for example, the particularly egregious article 13, related to CrimesAgainst Liberty and Reputation of Persons. Those convicted of disseminating defamatory content, as defined by the law, face up to 10 years in prison.

The law also targets service providers; if they fail to remove or disableaccess to illegal content data that has been disseminated through their computer systems by third parties they will be held criminally liable. Thelaw requires service providers to report any knowledge of the commissionof any of the crimes stipulated in the law. Protection for intermediaries inthe US (under CDA 230) has been essential to the growth of social mediaand blogging platforms. If Ethiopian intermediaries lack that protection, itwill have a strong chilling effect on free speech—few intermediaries will risk hosting content the government may find controversial.

Ethiopia's prosecutors have long demonized legitimate uses of technology,claiming in court that the use of encryption, and knowledge of privacy- protecting tools is a sign of support for terrorists. Ethiopia's new cybercrime law takes that a step further. By criminalizing everyday actionsit ensures that anyone who speaks online, or supports online free expression, might one day be targeted by the law. This regulation doesn't bring Ethiopian law up-to-date with the latest technology: instead, it will intimidate ordinary Ethiopian citizens into staying offline, and further alienate Ethiopia's technological progress from its African neighbors and the rest of the world.

Eritrea's Invasion of Ethiopia, in retaliation to recent UN report

Pro- government Awramba Times reported Addis Ababa June 12, 2016 Last updated at 9:00 pm

The isolated regime in Eritrea has launched a full-scale attack in northernEthiopia last night, following the recent report by UN Commission of Inquiry, in which it says the regime has committed crimes against humanity, reliable sources confirmed to Awramba times.

According to our sources, heavy fighting is taking place in two separate fronts, Tsorena and Zalanbesa. Residents of both towns whom Awrambatimes spoke to have confirmed that the fighting is continuing in and around these border areas.

Getachew Reda, Ethiopia's communications minister told Bloomberg newsagency from Frankfurt that the incident could be an effort by the Eritreangovernment to distract attention from a June 8 United Nations report thatsaid its leaders committed crimes against humanity, by phone .

Two days ago, the United Nations Commission of Inquiry on Eritrea had suggested that the international community should now take steps, including using the international criminal court, national courts and otheravailable mechanisms, to ensure there is accountability for the atrocitiesbeing committed in Eritrea.

Issais Affeworki, who is now isolated both politically and diplomatically from the international community, has now chosen full-scale war out offrustration.
Updates: Addis Ababa June 12, 2016 Last updated at 9:12 pm A heavy fighting is going on the Tsorena front of Ethiopian Eritrean border, multiple sources confirmed to HornAffairs. Fighting in the Tsorena area ofthe border started since 5 am at dawn and it is still ongoing. The sound ofheavy artilleries is heard as far as Zalambesa to the east, locals confirmed.

Updates Reports indicating heavy fire exchange in Tsorena & Aiga (Northern Tigray) areas between Ethiopia and Eritrea troops. Sources indicate the fire exchange involves heavy artilleries and tanks from both sides. According to Awramba Times Eritrea has launched a full-scale attack in northern Ethiopia last night, following the recent report by UN Commission of Inquiry, in which it says the regime has committed crimesagainst humanity.

The United Nations Commission of Inquiry on Human Rights in Eritrea reported that officials in Eritrea have committed crimes against humanity,including enslavement, rape and torture, across the country over the past25 years. The group suggested that the international community should now take steps, including using the international criminal court, national courts and other available mechanisms, to ensure there is accountability for the atrocities being committed in Eritrea.

Ethiopia-Eritrea War rages along 4 fronts

MEKELLE, Ethiopia (June 12) - An all-out war between Eritrea and Ethiopiabroke out on June 11 following Eritrea's provocative, low-level military attacks that began one week ago, an Ethiomedia reporter in this capital ofTigrai region has reported.

Ethiopian forces have launched a counter-offensive and fighting is ragingalong Humera, Tserona, Zalambessa and Badme, the source said. The four cited areas are prominent war fronts, though Badme was the flashpoint of the 1998-2000 Ethiopia-Eritrea War for which over over 70,000 soldiers were killed on the Ethiopia side alone.

The latest flare-up of war is attributable to Eritrea's anger over the latestUN accusation that Eritrean leaders be tried for crimes against humanityfor which Asmara believes Ethiopia is the author behind the punitive UN measures.

Despite the ongoing fighting, both Asmara and Addis have remainedsilent, and no one knows where the latest war will lead to.

Observers approached by Ethiomedia have asked questions:

1) Will Ethiopia use its military superiority, crush the regime in Asmara,and reverse Ethiopia's 1991 political blunder that made the country the largest landlocked nation in the world, and retain part of the 1200km RedSea coast?

2) Will Ethiopia free the tens of thousands of Ethiopian prisoners of warthat Eritrea has kept for decades as slaves working on its farms and roads?

3) Will the war lead to those Ethiopians deported from Eritrea both in 1991 and 1998 to regain their confiscated property (since Eritreans in thesame position have repossessed property they lost during the 1998 deportation)?

The sources said Ethiopia's war with Eritrea will achieve the support of theEthiopian people if, among others, the government made the three pointsabove the objectives of the war.

By invoking how the late Prime Minister Meles Zenawi aborted the 1998-2000 military victory in favor of Eritrea, skeptics dismiss the idea that there will be a change in outcome to the latest war.

Meles and other leading TPLF leaders used the "Tigrian" as cover and entirely fought for Eritrean sovereignty, they themselves had set the UN agenda that made Ethiopia landlocked. Though Zenawi is dead, there areTigrian/Eritrean individuals in key positions who would defend Eritrean sovereignty at the cost of Ethiopia whatsoever.

Unless such elements are removed from TPLF and EPRDF, the war will beeither short-lived, or if prolonged, still no different from the last major war.

At the start of 1998 unprovoked war of aggression by Eritrea, a call madeby Diaspora-based Ethiopians to remove Meles Zenawi and a few other anti-Ethiopia mercenaries in the ruling party fell on dear ears, leading to the costly loss of Ethiopia in The Hague Court still set up by none other than Meles himself.

Eritrea confirms raging war with Ethiopia
Ethiomedia June 13, 2016

UPDATES - Eritrea on Sunday confirmed war with Ethiopia along theTsorena front.

In a press statement posted on Shabait, a government website, Eritreasaid: "The TPLF regime has today, Sunday 12 June 2016, unleashed anattack against Eritrea on the Tsorena Central Front. The purpose and ramifications of this attack are not clear. The Government of Eritrea willissue further statements on the unfolding situation."
Counter to the statement by Eritrea, Asmara launched low-level, provocative military attacks one week ago along four fronts, and Ethiopianforces launched counter-offensive on Saturday June 11. Details follow:

Eritrea accuses Ethiopia of attacking its territory
Reuters June 13, 2016

ADDIS ABABA (Reuters updates) - Eritrea's government has accusedEthiopia of launching an attack on its territory, but the extent of the assault was still unclear and there was no immediate response from Ethiopia.

Eritrea, which won independence from Ethiopia in 1991, fought a bloodyborder war with its larger neighbor between 1998 and 2000. Tensions between the Horn of Africa nations persist.

"The TPLF regime has today, Sunday 12 June 2016, unleashed an attackagainst Eritrea on the Tsorona Central Front," the Information Ministry said in a statement around midnight.

TPLF refers to Ethiopia's Tigrayan People's Liberation Front, one of thefour parties making up the ruling coalition.

"The purpose and ramifications of this attack are not clear," the Eritreanstatement said.

Eritrean Information Minister Yemane Ghebremeskel had no immediateadditional comment when asked about casualties or other details aboutthe attack.

Ethiopian government officials were not immediately reachable forcomment.

Tsorona Central Front is close to the border and saw intense fightingduring the border war that killed about 70,000 people.

Eritrea, which is under U.N. sanctions, says world powers have failed to push Ethiopia to accept an international arbitration ruling demarcating theboundary. Ethiopia's government has said it wants talks on implementation.

Eritrea and Ethiopia routinely accuse each other of backing rebels trying todestabilize and topple the other's government, a legacy from the two-yearwar. (Reporting by Aaron Maasho; Writing by George Obulutsa and Edmund Blair; Editing by Paul Tait and Andrew Heavens)

Ethiopia and Eritrea blame each other for border clash

BBC News June 13, 2016

Ethiopia and Eritrea have exchanged accusations over who startedSunday's fighting at their disputed border.

Ethiopia's Information Minister Getachew Reda described the clashes inthe Tsorona area as "an Eritrean initiative".

Earlier, the Eritrean government said that Ethiopia had "unleashed" theattack.

A peace deal in 2000 ended the countries' two-year war border war but ithas not been fully implemented.

Ever since, the countries have been in a state of "neither war nor peace",says the BBC's Ethiopia correspondent Emmanuel Igunza.

Residents on the Ethiopian side of the border reported hearing gunfire andseeing a large movement of troops and artillery towards the frontier on Sunday.

There were reports that clashes continued into Monday morning butneither side has mentioned if there have been any casualties.

It's not clear why the fighting has erupted now.

But in recent months both sides have upped the rhetoric with the latestverbal salvo coming from Eritrea's President Isaias Afwerki during celebrations to mark 25 years of the country's independence.

He accused Ethiopia of being hostile to Eritrea's sovereignty.

Earlier this year, Ethiopia's Prime Minister Hailemariam Desalegn said hiscountry was ready to take "proportionate military action against Eritrea" for what he described as "continuous acts of provocation and destabilisation of Ethiopia".

Eritrea says the tense relations with Ethiopia are why it has nationalconscription, which can last for decades.

The 1998-2000 conflict, over the exact location of the border led to thedeaths of an estimated 80,000 people.

Two versions

Mr Getachew told BBC Focus on Africa radio that the Eritrean action "wasmet by an overwhelming force".

"Fighting was heavy enough to result in significant damage to Eritreanforces... which will hopefully make it think twice about its dangerous moves," he added.

In a short statement issued on Sunday night, the Eritrean government said Ethiopia had "unleashed an attack against Eritrea on the Tsorona Central Front. The purpose and ramifications of this attack are not clear."

- 1991 - Eritrea gains independence from Ethiopia after long civil war
- 1998-2000 - border war leaves an estimated 80,000 dead
- 2002 - boundary commission draws border and puts hotly-disputedBadme in Eritrea
- 2004 - Ethiopia accepts border ruling "in principle" but calls fordialogue with Eritrea
- 2006 - boundary commission gives the countries a year toimplement ruling
- 2008 - UN ends peacekeeping mission without border demarcated
- 2012 - Ethiopia attacks positions inside Eritrea targeting "subversivegroups"
- 2016 - Ethiopia and Eritrea blame each other for border clash

As part of the Algiers peace agreement signed in 2000 both countries agreed to accept the ruling of an independent boundary commission overthe location of the frontier as "final and binding".

But after the commission ruled that the disputed town of Badme, where the conflict began, was in Eritrea. Ethiopia at first refused to agree to theborder demarcation and then called for dialogue before it would implement the decision.

This was rejected by Eritrea and there has been an impasse ever since,although clashes have been rare.

Border Clashes Between Ethiopia and Eritrea Heighten Fears of War

By JEFFREY GETTLEMAN June 13, 2016

NAIROBI, Kenya — The Eritrean Embassy in Kenya sent a text messagealert Monday morning: The Ethiopians had attacked. Fighting on the border. Situation unfolding.

The jagged line separating Eritrea from its former ruler, Ethiopia, has beenone of Africa's most combustible flash points. Tens of thousands of soldiers died from 1998 to 2000 in a war that had been called as pointless as two bald men fighting over a comb.

As the news of renewed clashes in the rocky, barren frontier began tospread on Monday, many Ethiopians and Eritreans feared the worst.
Witnesses said both sides were rushing troops to the Tsorona border area,and heavy artillery was apparently fired from both sides. On the Eritrean side, several people were reported to have been killed. The reports of fighting and the lack of solid information raised fears that the two countries could be sliding once again toward all-out war.

But by Monday afternoon, the extent of the fighting was unclear. The Ethiopian government said Eritrea started it. Getting more information outof Eritrea is like trying to see into a pitch-dark room: The government is one of the most secretive, isolated and repressive nations in the world.

Just last week, a United Nations panel accused Eritrea's leaders ofcommitting crimes against humanity, including murder, rape and enslavement.

According to Meron Estefanos, a journalist and activist from Eritrea livingin Sweden who maintains a large network of contacts in Africa, anger at the government is steadily rising within Eritrea, and the shelling acrossthe border may have been started by Eritrea as a distraction.

"There is no reason for Ethiopia to start a war right now," Ms. Estefanossaid. "It just doesn't add up when everything is going their way."

"But," she added, "if there is a war, or the rumor of a war, it could be away for the Eritrean government to get support and divert attention."

Eritrea is a tiny country, with about one-sixteenth the population of Ethiopia, against which it won a celebrated war of liberation in the early 1990s. Since then, the government's isolationist policies have created direeconomic conditions, with shortages of electricity, water, gas and bread.
Many young people in Eritrea have said they are virtually imprisoned in a national program that requires them to serve indefinitely in the military orother branches of government.

Each year, thousands of young Eritreans try to flee to Europe; in recent months, hundreds have drowned in the Mediterranean Sea, adding to theanti-government feelings, Ms. Estefanos said.

Recent talk of another border war against Ethiopia has opened anationalistic vein.

"Here in Asmara, it's peaceful despite #EthiopianAttacks against #Eritreaon the Tsorona front," one Eritrean-American, using the handle Red Sea Fisher, wrote on Twitter on Monday, referring to Asmara, the Eritrean capital. "And you wonder why there's national service?"

A ruling by an international commission, which both Eritrea and Ethiopia agreed to respect, awarded a piece of the disputed territory near the border to Eritrea. But Ethiopian troops still occupy that territory more than10 years after the ruling was issued, and Eritrea has complained that the international community — especially the United States and Britain — has exerted little pressure to get the Ethiopians to leave.

Eritrea has used the dispute over the border to justify its war footing andthe suspension of many civil liberties.

Analysts have said the discontent in Eritrea could erupt at any time.

Mutinous soldiers staged a coup attempt in 2013, which was quickly crushed. In that case, like the border clashes in the past two days, little isknown about what really happened.

Eritrea, Ethiopia trade blame for border clashes

By Aaron Maasho, Reuters updates June 13, 2016

Eritrea and Ethiopia accused each other of starting clashes on Sunday between their soldiers in a border region, highlighting persistent tensionover a boundary dispute that triggered war in 1998-2000.

Ethiopia said the situation was calm on Monday, after a resident on theEthiopian side reported the sound of explosions all day on Sunday and lasting into the early morning of Monday.

Eritrea, a Horn of Africa country that won independence from Ethiopia in 1991, fought border wars with its larger neighbor in 1998-2000 that killedabout 70,000 people.

Eritrea's Information Ministry said in a statement late on Sunday night that the Ethiopian government had "unleashed an attack against Eritreaon the Tsorona Central Front."

Tsorona is a town south of the Eritrean capital Asmara and close to thefrontier. The area saw intense fighting during the earlier border war.

"The purpose and ramifications of this attack are not clear," the Eritreanstatement said.

Ethiopia disputed this account, saying Eritrea started the fight. "Their forces were promptly repulsed. They were given a proper response," government spokesman Getachew Reda said, adding that the situationwas quiet on Monday.

Eritrea and Ethiopia routinely accuse each other of backing rebels trying todestabilize and topple the other's government, a legacy from the earlier war.

A resident in the Ethiopian town of Zalambessa, across the border fromTsorona, told Reuters by telephone that he had heard the sound of shelling on Sunday and into the night.

"It did not stop until this morning around 9 a.m. (2.00 a.m. ET)," he said,asking not to be identified. He added that he had seen Ethiopian military vehicles and troops moving along the central stretch of the militarized border.

Eritrean Information Minister Yemane Ghebremeskel had no immediateadditional comment when asked about casualties or other details of theattack. Ethiopian government officials also did not say if there were anycasualties.
Charlotte King, senior Africa analyst at the Economist Intelligence Unit,said it was unusual for Eritrea to comment on flare-ups but said the statement may have been prompted by U.N. criticism Eritrea has faced over its prolonged national service.

The U.N. accuses Eritrea of rights abuses for indefinite national service,where Eritreans can spend many years in low-paid work under conscription. Asmara says an ongoing threat from Ethiopia makes extended national service essential.

Eritrea's "critics will argue that it is trying to divert international attention away from the alleged crimes against humanity, and justifying its need foran enormous military and compulsory conscription," King said in a brief commentary.

Eritrea, which is under U.N. sanctions, says world powers have failed to push Ethiopia to accept an international arbitration ruling demarcating theboundary. Ethiopia's government has said it wants talks on implementation. (Writing by George Obulutsa and Edmund Blair; Editing by Mark Heinrich)

'Significant' casualities in Eritrea and Ethiopia border battle

AFP News updates June 14, 2016

Arch-rivals Ethiopia and Eritrea traded blame Monday for a border battlein which "significant" casualties were reported, one of the worst clashes since the end of a 1998-2000 border war.

"There were significant casualties on both sides, but more on the Eritreanside," Ethiopian government spokesman Getachew Reda told AFP.

He said the battle that began Sunday was one of the most serious in recent years, noting that while the two sides had exchanged gun fire in the past, this clash was on a far larger scale. The fighting had reportedly calmed on Monday.

"We used to take precautionary measures against this regime, but this time was much more important in terms of magnitude than the measuresthat were taken so far," Getachew added.

Both sides blamed the other.

Ethiopia on Sunday "unleashed an attack against Eritrea on the TsoronaCentral Front," Eritrea's ministry of information said in a statement.

Getachew instead claimed the fighting started when Eritrean artillery firedshells across the border. "Eritrean forces started shelling our positions, including civilian ambulances, and we responded," said Getachew, who had initially claimedno knowledge of the fighting.

Eritrea won independence from Ethiopia in 1991 after three decades ofwar, but returned to battle in 1998-

- Fortified frontier -

The two remain bitter enemies, with their troops still eyeing each otheralong the fortified frontier. Tensions are never far from the surface.

"The purpose and ramifications of this attack are not clear," Eritrea said,adding it "will issue further statements on the unfolding situation."

Eritrea and Ethiopia have long traded accusations of attacks and ofbacking rebels to needle each other.

In March 2012, Ethiopia attacked an Eritrean military base, accusing thecountry of supporting "terrorist activities" on its territory.

In February, Ethiopia accused Eritrea of being behind anti-government protests in the Oromia region last year which led to a violent clampdownby the government in Addis Ababa.

The two countries remain at odds over the flashpoint town of Badme, awarded to Eritrea by a United Nations-backed boundary commission butstill controlled by Ethiopia.

It was not immediately possible to verify independently the scale of theclashes and exact reason they started.

Eritrea's media is ranked below North Korea as worst in the world forpress freedom by Reporters Without Borders.

However, opposition Eritrean websites, run from abroad but with contactsinside the country, reported there were clashes along the border.

"Each side appears to be calling up reinforcement," Awate.com websitereported.

The Asmarino website carried a statement from opposition campaignersappealing for calm.

"The prospect of another war is inconceivable," the statement read.

Thousands of Eritreans risk their lives to flee the hardline regime everymonth according to the UN, fleeing across the border into Sudan and Ethiopia despite a shoot-to-kill policy along the frontier.

Those who escape describe crawling under razor wire, tiptoeing across minefields or sneaking past armed border guards in their bid for freedom.

Last week the United Nations Commission of Inquiry (COI) on humanrights said the government of President Isaias Afwerki, in power since1991, was guilty of systematic enslavement, forcible conscription andother abuses. Eritrea rejected the findings as "laughable."

Skeptics Have Their Doubts
By invoking how the late Prime Minister Meles Zenawi aborted the 1998-2000 military victory in favor of Eritrea, skeptics dismiss the idea that there will be a change in outcome to the latest war.

Meles and other leading TPLF leaders used the "Tigrian" card as cover andentirely fought for Eritrean sovereignty, they themselves had set the UN agenda that made Ethiopia landlocked. Though Zenawi is dead, there are Tigrian/Eritrean individuals in key positions who would defend Eritrean sovereignty at the cost of Ethiopia whatsoever. Unless such elements are removed from TPLF and EPRDF, the war will be either short-lived, or if prolonged, result in more casualties and yet meaningless.

At the start of 1998 unprovoked war of aggression by Eritrea, a call madeby Diaspora-based Ethiopians to remove Meles Zenawi and a few other anti-Ethiopia mercenaries in the ruling party fell on dear ears, leading to acostly loss for Ethiopia.

The jagged line separating Eritrea from its former ruler, Ethiopia, has beenone of Africa's most combustible flash points. Tens of thousands of soldiers died from 1998 to 2000 in a war that had been called as pointless as two bald men fighting over a comb.

As the news of renewed clashes in the rocky, barren frontier began tospread Monday, many Ethiopians and Eritreans feared the worst.

Witnesses said both sides were rushing troops to the Tsorona border area,and heavy artillery was apparently fired from both sides. On the Eritrean side, several people were reported to have been killed. The reports of fighting and the lack of solid information raised fears that the twocountries could be sliding once again toward all-out war.

But by Monday afternoon, the extent of the fighting was unclear. The Ethiopian government said Eritrea started it. Getting more information outof Eritrea is like trying to see into a pitch-dark room: The government is one of the most secretive, isolated and repressive nations in the world.

Just last week, a UN panel accused Eritrea's leaders of committing crimesagainst humanity, including murder, rape and enslavement.
According to Meron Estefanos, a journalist and activist from Eritrea livingin Sweden who maintains a large network of contacts in Africa, anger at the government is steadily rising within Eritrea, and the shelling across the border may have been started by Eritrea as a distraction.

"There is no reason for Ethiopia to start a war right now," Estefanos said. "It just doesn't add up when everything is going their way." "But," she added, "if there is a war, or the rumour of a war, it could be a way for theEritrean government to get support and divert attention". New York Times

Ed’s Note:
Observers approached by Ethiomedia have a shared opinion over the war,however. The government in Ethiopia will, despite its dismal record over democracy and human rights violations, get the support of the Ethiopian people if and only if its war objective is clear, and that is to reclaim part ofthe Red Sea, including the Port of Assab, that the late Prime Minister Meles Zenawi, signed away to Eritrea in 1991.

Sebhat Nega once told: "We fought for Eritrean independence from the colonial rule of Ethiopia. TPLF has paid a sacrifice for Eritrea greater thanthe combined sacrifice of the two Eritrean organizations - ELF and EPLF. Even if today Eritrea is attacked, EPRDF will jump into Eritrea, join the Eritrean people and engage the enemy." - Sebhat Nega on Radio Woyane(May 28, 2007).

Sebhat is an influential member of the ruling TPLF party, and is known forpromoting an anti-Ethiopia agenda. How is a war committee that includes Sebhat-like individuals to lead Ethiopia to victory over the Eritrean regime? So, the latest war with Eritrea could be another exercise in futilityfor battered Ethiopia.

Ethiopia at Risk - TPLF has since its inception been controlled by mercenary elements that considered Ethiopia as their enemy. The groupthat terrorized Tigrians into total servitude is still in power. If Ethiopia isturned into a failed, landlocked state, it is with a purpose. - Asgede Gebreselassie, author of Gahdi 1 and Gahdi 2. Asgede was one of the 11 who founded TPLF in 1975 but left the organization in 1993 after he knewthe group in power was profoundly anti-Ethiopian.

In unprecedented move Ethiopia is prepared to demand the President IsaiasAfeworki to leave Eritrea (Aigaforum) June 15, 2016

With patience running thin the Ethiopian government is almost at a decision point to demand the removal of Isaias Afeworki from power. Sources familiar with the issue told Aigaforum the government has floated the idea to key western nations as a comprehensive plan for thehorn of africa region. The Ethiopian government has informed many western nations that if Isaias Afewroki is not removed from power therewill be war and Ethiopia will defend vigorously.

The issue of Isaias Afewroki's removal from power gained momentum overthe last few weeks with Al-Shabaab deadly attempt to overrun Ethiopia's AMISOM military camp in Somalia. However, our sources told us the recent clash between Eritrea and Ethiopia in Tserona Northern Tigrai region may have given the proposal more ammunition.

It is unclear if western nations will support the idea but the EPRDF government is not new to such diplomatic undertaking. The once strong military man Col Mengstu Hailemariam was removed from power and sent to Zimbabwe when the then rebel EPRDF fighters encircled Addis Ababa. The late PM Meles Zenawi who was chairman of the EPRDF negotiated Mengsitu departure in London. Our sources told us it is highlypossible the American and British government will support the plan to avoid bloodshed. The sooner Isaias Afeworki packs and leaves Eritrea theless casualty on the Eritrean people.

If war breaks out, Ethiopia is on the record, that it will make sure this willbe the last war. Our sources told us this means the war will be a war of attrition and it is such scenario Ethiopia is trying to avoid and convince key western nations to go along with the plan. Recently President Abay Woldu from Tigrai the region that is mostly affected by the no war no peace policy of the Ethiopian government said to residents of Adwa town,that Ethiopia is planning to bring to an end the conflict with Eritrea soon. He said either peacefully or otherwise this conflict will come to an end sooner than many think.

It is not clear if Isaias Afeworki will accept such demand but our sources told us even if he does not accept such demand it will have a huge impacton the Eritreans and its defense forces. Many in the government of Ethiopia are convinced the Eritrean army may rebel against Isaias Afeworki and if they are convinced about Ethiopia's disinterest of overrunning Eritrea then they may reform and establish a government of their own that is willing to live in peace with its neighbors.

In Memory of Tafari Wossen of the “Wagshum races”

Funeral service held for the veteran journalist!

By Arefayne Fantahun June 18, 2016

The funeral of renowned Ethiopian journalist, editor, film producer and a communication consultant, Tafari Wossen has taken place at the Holy Trinity Cathedral Church in Addis Ababa on Saturday, June 18, 2016 in thepresence of patriarch of the Ethiopian Orthodox Church, Abune Matthias, Minister of Federal Affairs, Kassa Tekeleberhan and government spokesperson Getachew Reda.

Tafari, a journalist and film producer with 40 years of experience, died inWashington D.C on June 10 and his corpse arrived in Addis Ababa this morning. He was 76 years old. He had apparently been ill for some time.

Tafari was born in Sekota, the capital of Wag province on May 9, 1940 tohis father Wag Shum Wossen Hailu, and mother, Woizero Jemberwork Biru. His father Wag Shum, or Ruler of Wag, had been the last Wagshum,who claimed direct descent from the Zagwe rulers and bore the only hereditary title in Ethiopia. He served as President of the Chamber of Deputies in Emperor Haile Selassie's post-war Parliament and was later made Ambassador to Greece. Tafari's great uncle the famous resistance leader Dejazmatch Hailu Kebede was posthumously appointed lieutenant general by Emperor Haile Selassie.

In an article My Feudal Childhood published in Rift Valley Institute website, Tafari wrote that by age of three, in accordance with his positionin the feudal hierarchy, he was made a Mislene, or viceroy. "This was a position that my grandfather and his father before him had occupied. I had a monthly salary of 30 birr. There was a person who acted as my guardian and ran the day-to-day affairs and for that, he took half of the salary."

His father also arranged for him to be introduced to modern life and the world outside Sekota. This was the task of an Italian named Romano Gino,who his father had rescued from death at the hands of the patriots of Waag during the Italian occupation. "During my childhood in Sekota, I lived with Romano Gino in a building that belonged to my father after itwas taken from the Italians. It had been a pharmacy during the Italian occupation of Waag," he wrote.

"And I had the run of the old supply depot of the Italian army across the street. It had almost everything: exercise books, pencils–and guns. Therewas a bicycle left behind by the Italians. Strangest of all, there were hundreds of boxes of condoms. I used to make balloons out of them. No one told me not to. I think no one in Sekota knew what they were for, except Romano Gino," he recalled.

Young Tafari came to Addis Ababa and begun school at Tafari Mekonen School. When he was eleven, he was sent to England to join a British private school. In 1962 he returned to Ethiopia and he embarked on a career in public relations and journalism with the Ministry of Information,working his way through various desks in the newsroom, including producing the popular Listener's Choice and Parade programs in the English service of Radio Ethiopia.

However, it was Tafari's lifelong interest in film that made him his name, and his knowledge was reflected in his involvement in the filming of Shaftin Africa, in the organisation of OAU summits, and the Ethiopian pavilion at Expo '67. In 1973 he was associated with the British journalist Jonathan Dimbleby in the making of the BBC film 'The Hidden Hunger'.
The film revealed the extent of the famine in northern Ethiopia and theImperial government's attempt to cover it up. This, at the end, contributed as one factor to the downfall of Emperor Haile Selassie.

In 1976, he was among the key figures who established the Ethiopian FilmCorporation under the Ministry of Culture and he has been a head for a number of years. In 1985, he became head of public Relations for the Relief and Rehabilitation Commission (RRC). During those years, he accompanied the late Mohamed Amin to the famine hit areas of Wollo to film the tragedy and the work brought together the world under the emotional banner “We are the World”. Dawit Wolde Giorgis, who was headof RRC, wrote that, “He did this at great risk to his life because the regimedid not want the famine to be exposed in a way that it did eventually.
Because of this and his relentless selfless effort of follow up with passion,with talent and gift of communication, the international community responded generously and we were able to save millions from death by starvation. He spent evenings and overnights in the office trying to figureout how to approach the international community, writing and reaching out. The passion to save lives overcame all his fears and risks and he wasable to witness millions being saved.”

Briefly, Tafari worked at the American embassy as public relation officerand in 1993 he established a media company called Waag Communications, one of the first private communication enterprises.

Under this company, he stared his own publications, the daily bulletin called Information Digest and the weekly news digest, Seven Days Updatethat serviced the expatriate community.

He was involved in the making of different documentaries for various organizations and he also produced the successful Dewel Radio program,in cooperation with the Forum for Social Studies, which run for thirteen years on FM.

Paying tribute fellow journalist said: “Tafari was at once nationalist andcosmopolitan. His thirst for knowledge was boundless. He always held unweathering conviction. He had an ability to converse with anyone.”

Tafari is survived by his wife, Tabotu Welde-Mikael (A long serving information assistant at the U.S.Embassy in Addis Ababa), whom he married for forty one years; their son, Sawrawork Tafari; the daughterWinta Tafari, eight brothers and sisters.

HISORY & The History Makers

How suffragette Sylvia Pankhurst became an 'honorary Ethiopian?

By James Jeffrey, BBC News June 18, 2016

Just inside the entrance of the Addis Ababa home of British historianRichard Pankhurst hangs a black and white photo of his suffragette mother, Sylvia Pankhurst.

She is pictured wearing a long and elaborate Edwardian dress with sleevesto her wrists, beneath a heading: "Votes for Women."

She was one of the women whose campaigns, which included going on hunger-strike, led to British women being allowed to vote in the early 20thCentury.
In the nearby sitting room, a tapestry hanging on a wall testifies to a lesswell known side of his mother.

It depicts Ms Pankhurst in June 1935 walking down a gravel path througha garden in the English city of Bath, accompanied by Ethiopian Emperor Haile Selassie.

The image comes from a photo taken during his exile in England after Ethiopia was subsumed into the short-lived African empire of fascist Italy,Africa Orientale Italiana.

In previous years, Ms Pankhurst had gone to study art in Venice, whereshe witnessed the brutality of the fascist regime. Afterwards in the later1920s and 30s she had become a vocal pacifist, anti-fascist and anti-colonialist activist.
So when Italy began building up its military presence in East Africa sheproved to be one of Ethiopia's most vocal supporters, writing to newspapers in defence of its sovereignty.

Surrounded by exiles
The eventual invasion in 1935 and failure of the League of Nations tointercede only spurred her on, as witnessed by her then teenage son.

"I grew up in London surrounded by Ethiopian exiles visiting my mother,who was always busy organising meetings and fundraising for the Ethiopian cause," says Richard Pankhurst, now 88.

When Ms Pankhurst felt media and readers were losing interest in Ethiopia's plight, she took matters into her own hands and founded anewspaper.

The New Times and Ethiopia News was based in Woodford, London, where the family livedand where, following the war and the African country's liberation, many Ethiopian students found their way to the Pankhurst family home, becoming Richard's friends.

Climate Change: El Niño and Drought

By James Jeffrey, IRIN June 19, 2016

(BORAMA, SOMALIA) — Sitting on parched ground pummelled by the sun, a camel lookson majestically as pastoralists mill around it in a whirl of activity. Loaded onto its back are sacks of grains and pulses, yellow jerry cans, bottles of cooking oil, bits of fabric and plasticto make rough bivouac structures, and more.

After a final check of ropes, a woman makes a loud purring noise while gesturing upwards. The camel jerkily stands up, emitting a loud groan. Leading it by a rope, the family rejoins other pastoralists trekking throughthe Awdal Region abutting Somaliland's northwestern border with Ethiopia: home for those on the move.

Faced with desiccated pastures in Ethiopia's Somali Region last November,these pastoralists and many others responded to rumors of rains and goodpasture hundreds of kilometers away on the coast of Somaliland, an internationally unrecognized but de facto sovereign nation separate from Somalia.

But, when they got there, there wasn't enough rain or pasture for thenumbers that descended. Thousands of goats, sheep, cows, and evendrought-hardy camels died, buried in mass graves to prevent disease spreading. (It still broke out, killing further livestock). Now, the pastoralists are returning to Ethiopia, or trying to do so.
Only one of Abdulahi Amir's three camels has survived this far, but it might not last long either. "We're stuck here. My sick camel can't carry anything," the 70-year-old tells IRIN, his possessions strewn all around him on the ground. Amir has four family members with him. Five others stayed behind in Sitti, (one of the nine zones in Ethiopia's Somali Region),where he is trying to get back to. What's the plan now? "We will wait," hesays.

Bad – but it could be worse
Ethiopia's current drought is the worst the country has seen in 50 years,according to many estimates. The tribulations of the pastoralists notwithstanding, there are no scenes reminiscent of 1984, when drought contributed to more than one million Ethiopians dying.

Crop production in Ethiopia's northern Tigray and Afar regions has dropped by between 50 and 90 percent in some parts, and failed completely in others. In the country's Somali region, more than half a million livestock are estimated to have died and a joint government andhumanitarian partners' report estimates 1.5 million people—27% of theregion's population—need food assistance.

"I've never come across anything like this," says 65-year-old Eltise MuseBah in the remote village of Fedeto, in the Sitti Zone. "We’ve named thisdrought mulia, which means, 'that which erases everything on the ground'."

The severity of the drought stems from the ocean-warming El Niño effectthat has disrupted weather patterns around the globe. Ethiopia has about 10.2 million people needing food aid, out of a population of around 100million, according to the UN. In the north of neighboring Somalia, an estimated 4.6 million people—nearly 40% of the population—need humanitarian assistance.

Initially, the government tried to manage the situation itself, using an extensive food security network developed over the decades since imagesof the 1984 famine came to stigmatise Ethiopia.

The Productive Safety Net Programme is a welfare-for-work initiative enabling about seven million people to work on public infrastructure projects in return for food or cash. There is also a national food reserve and early warning systems based on the woredas, the administrative districts. Ethiopia even managed to open early a new railway line to bringfood supplies from the port at Djibouti on the Horn of Africa coast.

Ethiopia's political commitment to an effective emergency responseappears for now to have prevented disaster.

Outside help unavoidable

But Ethiopia hasn’t tackled this drought alone. It's a fact the government conceded in October 2015, when the estimated numbers of those affectedshot up, resulting in a call for outside assistance.

Some criticized the government for not requesting aid sooner, as it strained to protect the narrative of Ethiopia's economic renaissance. "Thegovernment is very proud. They don't want to be the poster child for drought in Africa," says John Graham, Ethiopia country director for Save the Children.

About 53% of the $1.5 billion of humanitarian aid needed has beenprovided by Ethiopia and international partners, leaving a worryingshortfall, according to aid agencies.

Furthermore, relief efforts have been hit by the continuing effects of El Niño. The arrival in April of unusually intense Belg spring rains—these are usually lighter, with the main longer rainy season starting around late June—have resulted in deaths from flash floods, and turned dry dirt tracksinto impassable quagmires, hampering efforts to dispense aid.

The rains have also proved too much for many livestock. Weakened by thedrought, they have died of exposure, further depleting what remains of people's precious herds.

Somaliland has been similarly affected. In April, seven people died afterbeing washed away by flash floods around Dilla village in Awdal.

As the Ethiopian pastoralists in Awdal broke camp with the first spring rains to make the long trek home, they left behind piles of dead goats thathad succumbed to the wet and cold.

Tough questions need asking

Despite the incongruity of risks from flooding and hypothermia, lack of rains in this scorched part of the world remains the overarching problemfor those living here.

And in the face of climate change and increasingly frequent, severedroughts assailing the Horn of Africa, lifestyle change may be unavoidable.

"We must start to think differently about how to reduce this vulnerability through economic shifts in these more marginal areas," Graham says. "Inareas affected by climate change, with decreasing rains, you just can't have the same numbers of people surviving in those conditions—it'sbeyond the control of the people or the government."
Even pastoralists, known for their tenacious and independently mindedways, recognise something may have to give.

"If we get a restocking programme from the government we might have achance," says 50-year-old Osman Kaire, waiting with a group of men in Sitti's Gad village for the authorities to deliver bags of animal fodder.

"The other option is for a government resettlement program in morereliable areas where we can be agro-pastoralists. We are ready to consider."

FAITH: Atheism In Ethiopia

By Leo Igwe, Marawi Post June 19, 2016

A recent survey by the Pew Research Center has revealed that Ethiopia is the world's most religious nation. According to this survey, nine-eight percent of Ethiopians thinks that religion is the most important part of their life. This development should not surpriseanyone because Christianity and Islam are the dominant faiths in Ethiopia, and the Ethiopian Orthodox Christianity accounts for most of the Christian population.

Though belief in God is pervasive, atheists, agnostics or freethinkers existin Ethiopia and they are beginning to organize under different umbrella groups. Some of the atheist groups are visible online and they have face book pages, with hundreds and thousands of members, where they express themselves and socialize with people of like minds.

Recently I corresponded with two Ethiopian atheists, Yohannes and Girum,and they gave insights into the challenges and prospects of atheism in their country. Yohannes is an active member of one of the online groups. He told me that his becoming an atheist was a gradual process:

"It was rather an evolution over a couple of years. I didn't identify as anatheist at first, nor did I know what I was becoming, lacking belief in gods, was called atheism. The main drive for my unbelief was the bible itself. I found it to be misogynist, racist, homophobic and backward".

Girum, another atheist activist, embraced atheism after reading some books on philosophy: "Yes I'm an atheist, l became an agnostic in my teens mostly through common sense and by reading Amharic translationsof different philosophical books and then after some time l began identifying myself as an atheist. I never told my parents about my disbelief in God but they knew that I had never been to Church for years and suspected that I was becoming skeptical. Yes I tell my friends about my atheism and they have no problem with it".

Girum asserts that the deep religiosity in Ethiopia poses a big challenge tothe cause of reason and free thought: "Yes, Ethiopia is a very religious nation with a large illiterate population. There is almost no space for reason and science. There is a tiny minority of atheists in the country".

One major reason for the minority status of atheism in Ethiopia and in other African countries is because many atheists are in the closets and fear persecution by the theistic public if they go open and public with theiratheism.

So, the challenge is not necessarily embracing atheism but coming out tofriends and family members. Yohannes told me that he was a bit fortunate. “I guess I have been lucky with my beloved ones, they didn’t find it so much distressing. But I’ve lost some friends when I started to express my disbelief in their god or gods”. He notes that reactions to atheism vary according to family: “It depends on the particular family setup and even religious background I would say. For me, it was easy as mybeloved ones are educated and accommodating. I have noticed Christian and Muslim parents and friends would react unfavorably as opposed to traditional religious people”.

Due to the socialist legacy in Ethiopia, the people are a bit more tolerantof atheism and do not find the outlook so offensive. Younger generationsof Ethiopians are abandoning religion and if the trend continues, there would be a major shift in the country’s religious and theistic demographyin the years ahead.

Yohannes stated that atheism could benefit Ethiopia in so many ways particularly in tackling superstition and religious extremism: “Atheism, a lack of belief in gods, could simply help the young people not to waste their energy on superstition and do something meaningful for a country riddled with poverty. Hatred amongst religious factions would diminish asmany people would become irreligious”.
On that positive note, one may say that, though the present day Ethiopiamay be designated as the world’s most religious nation, there are clear signs that with the flow of information, some renaissance is imminent in the country and the atheistic outlook has a great and promising future inthe Horn of Africa.

Authorities Detain Journalists In Ethiopia and Take TV Station Off Air

Dalsan Radio News (Mogadishu) June 23, 2016

Ethiopian authorities have detained five Journalists on Monday. The Journalists were invited to false press conference in Wajale town in Ethiopia situated on the border of Somaliland and Ethiopia and laterarrested and taken to the capital of Somali regional state in EthiopiaJijjiga.

Four of the Journalists were later released but Horn Cable TV staff Mukhtar Nuh still remains in Ethiopian government custody. Horn CableTV satellite in the area was also taken off air.

It is not immediately clear the main reason behind the arrest of the Journalists. Somaliland Journalists Association (SOLJA) has confirmed thearrest Radio Dalsan.

Somaliland and Ethiopia are known for their collaboration in arrestingJournalists. There is already ongoing case for Somali Journalists in Hargeisa and others in jail in Ethiopia.

National Union for Somali Journalists (NUSOJ), Somaliland Journalists Association (SOLJA) and Somali Independent Media Houses Association (SIMHA) have condemned the press freedom violations and called for theimmediate release of the HCTV journalist.

Amha Eshete: Pioneer of Ethiopia's music industryArefayne Fantahun

In his book Abyssinia Swing: A Pictorial History of Modern Ethiopian Music (2001), Francis Falceto notes that audiences tend to remember the names of great singers or soloists rather than those of their producers. In Africa, perhaps even more than elsewhere, producers are often the forgotten lot. InEthiopia, however, one man's ingenious defiance of authority ensured that Ethiopian tunes were heard the world over. That man is Amha Eshete, the founder of Ethiopia's first independent recording label, Amha Records.

Addis Ababa in the 1960s was about to become a hotbed of musical creativity as Western blues began to catch on in the city. Urban sophistication started to create an appetite for modern music and the burgeoning sounds of American blues, soul and rock 'n' roll were filtering onto Addis Ababa radio. But it was not always easy to get hold of the records for youngsters of the city. During those times, the people who wereengaged in importing and distributing music records were foreigners. "Central was one of the music stores at the time. Located right in front of Trianon Bar in the centre of Piazza, the shop was owned by an elderly Italian man whose musical choice was not in tune with the emerging trendsof the day and he was not open-minded," remembers Amha Eshete. He was 24 years old at the time, and like many young Ethiopians was a musicfan. The ambitious Amha seized the initiative to open a new shop and began importing the latest western popular music, which took Addis by storm.

Now in his 70s, the once energetic Amha is weighed down by the Guillain- Barré syndrome (a rare auto-immune disorder that causes paralysis), whichhe was diagnosed with some ten years ago. His body won't cooperate and he relies on support to get around. Despite his illness, Amha still has a remarkable clarity of mind when recalling the evens that led to him startinghis own store. "The kind of music imported wasn't to my taste," he says witha buoyant rise in his voice. "After completing high school, I was seeking ways in which I could get albums that appealed to me and my friends.

There were three other music shops, run by either Armenians or Greeks.The music business at the time was dominated by foreigners, leaving Ethiopians feeling excluded."

To satisfy their musical needs, most Ethiopians had to listen to the Voice ofAmerica (VOA), although Amha notes that the reception left much to be desired. Later on he got an opportunity to go to Eritrea for a mapping mission with Americans, deepening his musical curiousity. At the Americanbase was the Kagnew Station, which played the latest American music. "I used to spend hours lost in the rhythms booming from the radio. It was the best it could be; the DJs were so sharp. It was a far cry from the music played on the radio in Addis Ababa. In terms of American music's availability, Eritrea's capital city Asmara was far ahead of Addis Ababa," herecalls.

To bridge the gap, Amha explored ways to make the music he heard available to Ethiopians. "I was inspired and started doing more research onimporting music, but the business looked beyond our reach," he says. He soon learnt that it was possible to import music directly from the US, so hefound a space where he could set up a shop in Arada, one of Addis's subcities. "A generous tailor allowed me to share his space. I only had 500birr in savings. When my first order arrived, I needed money to pay for the records and customs. Even though I had relatives who were well off, they could not lend me the capital I needed. To them the music business was not as lucrative as the coffee trade," Amha says with a chuckle. A friend believed in him, however, and that's how his music shop, Harambee, emerged as one of the small businesses that lent colour and texture to lifein the city.

His first shipment was a success. Immediately after the records hit the shelves, young and middle-aged people started flocking to the music shop.By midday on the first day of business, half the merchandise had already been sold. "People were thirsty for the hottest acts – James Brown, Jim Reeves, Otis Redding, Wilson Pickett and others. Word of mouth led to bigger clients. Amha paid off his debts and ordered more records. He was now in business. When the sales kept coming, he decided to expand his business to a second shop at Piazza. He also opened shops in other townssuch as Nazareth and had agents in Asmara and Dire Dawa.

The formation of Amha Records

With time, young Amha widened his network and the business grew beyondanything he had envisioned. He imported music from Kenya, Sudan, West Africa as well as India. "Sudanese music was getting very popular, particularly Mohamed Wordi's. I was well off financially from the sales," he says. But a question kept popping into his mind: what about Ethiopian music? The idea of producing local music had been fermenting in his mind. "In parallel with my work of importing and distributing, I decided to involve myself in this project: producing Ethiopian music."

This wasn't easy, however. Amha came to learn that there was a 1948 Imperial edict that granted a monopoly in music publishing and distribution to Hager Fikir Theatre. The Emperor, after his return from exile, gave the right to this association because it had not received any government subsidy. Even with the monopoly as Ethiopia's only music publisher, Amha learnt that the theatre had not produced anything in 20 years, other than theEmperor's 25th anniversary jubilee!

Venturing into music publishing therefore meant risking opposition from authorities. "Looking back, it now sounds foolhardy that I even thought ofdoing that. Officials who worked at Hager Fikir Theatre and the National Theatre had done their best to talk me out of the project." Determined, Amha believed he could break the rules with impunity. Holding out againstall odds, he started looking for partners and approached many singers.

Understandably, most were reluctant, except for one: Alemayehu Eshete,who was willing to take up Amha's offer. They immediately hit it off.

Amha Records' breakthrough recording was a 45rpm single featuring Alemayehu Eshete's 'Timarkiyalehs' and 'Ya Tara' (intended for Sudanese listeners) on the B-side. Released in 1969, the single was manufactured in India and distributed by Harambee Music shop. A second single, containing Alemayehu's 'Lib Tatefalech' with 'Honey Baby' on the B-side, was releasedlater that same year. When the pair played it on a loudspeaker from Amha'sshop, young people began dancing on the street, stopping traffic. "The streets were basically blocked," recalls Amha. "This was a miracle!"

Beyond his ability to develop talent and give exposure to artists, Amha possessed a keen eye for executive talent, grooming scores of young agents over the course of his career and playing a pivotal role in the growthof the Ethiopian music scene. He recorded 103 singles and 12 LPs by Ethiopian artists between 1969 and 1975. His flair for promotion helped some of the greatest talents of the era get a headstart in the industry. Besides Alemayehu Eshete, legends like Mulatu Astatke, Girma Bèyènè, Tesfamariam Kidane, Teshome Mitiku, Getachew Kassa, Seifu Yohanneswere among those who benefited.

Most of the music sold well during that time. The biggest seller was Getachew Kassa's Tizita, which sold close to 5 000 copies. Motivated by this success, numerous local recording companies started to emerge, paving the way for the birth of Ethiopia's recording industry. For many, Amha's early productions made him part of a small group that changed thecourse Ethiopian music history. Falceto highlights other independent producers such as Kassahoun Eshete (Philips Ethiopia) and Ali Tango (Kaifa Records) as those who carried on the work started by Amha. "Theirproductions constitute nothing less than the memory of an era – and an admirable legacy left for posterity," he writes.

Amha himself is reluctant to make such claims, but he freely discusses howmuch those times meant to him, particularly the friendships he nurtured withmany musicians. To this day, Alemayehu, Mahmoud Ahmed and many others remain close friends. "One of the best-selling artists of the time was Alemayehu Eshete. He was my first client. He and I are musical and artistic comrades. Our connection was fraternal. Since we have the same surname, people think that we are bothers, but all we shared was mutual dreams,

Amha says he was pleased when in 2007 Mahmoud Ahmed was honouredwith a BBC Radio 3 Award for World Music. He is also proud of his role in helping to increase the pay for musicians. For example he remembers paying Ahmed 2000 Birr for a single recording in 1974 – a far cry from theconvention at a time then payment for most musicians was meagre. The average pay even for established singers then was around 200 Birr per month. Amha's generosity made Ahmed the highest-paid performer in Ethiopian music at the time.

Amha successes are not without some regrets, however. He says one of his biggest regrets was not producing for famed female vocalist Bizunesh Bekele, regarded as the 'Aretha Franklin of Ethiopia'. "We were close friends," remembers Amha. "I really admired her voice and character. Shewas phenomenally talented; the type of singer who would just hum for youin the middle of conversation. We had planned to do her records but I feelsad that the project did not come to be." Bekele passed away in 1990.
Already a successful music producer and importer, Amha entered the live entertainment realm in 1968 when he formed the Soul Ekos band, comprised of vocalists Alemayehu Eshete and Teshome Mitiku along with Alula Yohannes (lead guitar), Tamirat Ferenji (trumpet), Messele Gessesse (drums), Tekie Adhanom (guitar) and Tewdros Mitiku (saxophone). The group was a big success, putting out hits like Seifu Yohannes's 'Ebo Lala'and Teshome Mitiku's 'Gara Sire New Betish'. The band was in constant demand for various occasions, such as weddings and the opening of the Hilton Hotel in Addis Ababa.

"The most important thing was that musicians got the freedom to be themselves," remembers Amha. "They had their own salary. I rented a villa where they would rehearse. We had a booking office near the Tea Room inPiazza. We were invited to other towns, such as Wonji and Asmara."
Amha recalls one of the band's members, Seifu Yohannes, who died at barely 30 years of age. "That was one promising artist. He was destined todo great things. He had a gorgeous voice, even without a microphone. Hisvocals were impeccable. I wish he had more years to record music for Ethiopians."

Life in exile

The events of 1974 could not have prepared Amha for what was to come. The political winds of change – the civil war that followed the coup by the Derg regime – dashed the hopes of Ethiopia's music industry that had steadly been making headway. Amha did not suspect his label and his bandwould be the victim of a revolution that had promised better times. "We actually thought that something good was coming," he recalls. "We never thought things could get worse. I was one of those people who gave a bouquet of flowers to the newly arrived soldiers, thinking that they liberated us from the repressive regime."

Like many others, Amha was driven into exile. "I headed to Greece the yearthe Emperor was deposed to record Tilahun Gessesse, Tekele Tesfageize, Alemayehu Eshete and Muluken Melesse. When I sent the records home, even though censorship had been approved in advance, Tekele's Tigrinya lyrics were rejected at customs for political reasons. It was considered to beso serious an offense in the eyes of the regime that the official in no time put the singer, the soundman and my father by proxy under arrest! I was informed about it and advised to stay there, which I did." The first few months alone took a toll on his marriage, which ended in divorce. Little did he know at the time that this exile would stretch to 19 years.

During his years in exile in the USA, Amha retained some semblance of sanity by running a club and restaurant. For two decades the Blue Nile clubreigned supreme as one of Washington DC's most popular nightspots, a platform for many exiled artists. He also founded Ibex, a triple-storey nightclub that showcased Ethiopian as well as American artists. "The first floor was for Ethiopian musicians. The second floor was for live music andjazz. The third floor was a discotheque with a famous DJ," he explains.

In 1981, Amha arranged for a full band that included Mahmoud Ahmed, Getachew Kassa and Girma Bèyènè to tour the US, giving the group of Ethiopian stars their first American exposure at a time Ethiopian's militaryregime was strongly condemning American imperialism. The group's first performance was at Washington DC's famous Warner Theatre. "It was anexpensive venture and a logistical feat," recalls Amha.

One of Amha's most rewarding moments came when some of his original vinyl releases were included on the Ethiopiques series compiled by FrancisFalceto, who took it upon himself to track Amha down in the USA in the hopes of convincing him to reissue his collection, the master tapes of whichwere located in Greece. "I can't tire of talking about him," says Amha. "No one else has done what he has been able to accomplish to enrich our understanding of Ethiopian music. I could go on talking about him for hourson end. He put a lot of dedication into the project. As there was no internet when he started, we did the bulk of communication through telefaxes. At times I was tired of getting his memos and faxes, but all the interviews he gave was with the aim of promoting Ethiopian music. Given the intensity with which he devoted himself to his cause, I knew what we wanted to achieve would one day come to fruition."

Amha's legacy

With five decades of experience in the music industry, Amha has left an indelible mark on Ethiopian music – as a retailer, producer, publisher, distributor, promoter and mentor. After years of struggle, Amha knows he isfortunate. “I didn’t know anything about this business; I learned the trade bytrial and error. I never took it for granted. I just took it a day at a time.”

Girma Bèyènè, Amha’s long-time musical associate, has nothing but praise for the man who opened up Ethiopia’s recording industry. “Amha and I werefirst introduced to each other in 1969 in Addis Ababa by Alemayehu Eshete,” he says. “I was struck by his youth yet how committed he was. Ourfirst opportunity to work together was when we did Alemayehu’s tracks.
Later we became good friends. Actually he was my boss, I still regard himas such.”

Girma’s four early tracks – ‘Yebekagnale’, ‘Seit Alamenem’, ‘Enken Yelelebesh’ and ‘Ene Negne Bay Manesh’ – were recorded by Amha in 1969. They paved the way to a successful career, as Amha did for countless other Ethiopian artists. Although the sixth Ethiopian Music Festival, staged in 2007 by the Alliance Ethio-Française, was dedicated to Amha, Girma feels that this giant of Ethiopian music has still not been giventhe recognition he truly deserves. Menelik Wossenachew’s Tizita

By Arafayne Fantahun

Menelik Wossenachew (1940-2008) was one of Ethiopia’s leading musicians, along with Tilahun Gessese, Mahamoud Ahmed, Girma Beyene,and Alemayehu Eshete. He was remembered for his opera like golden voice. Menelik was born in 1940 in Addis Ababa and grew up in a busy andlively area called Tekle Haymanot. He first attended church school and later Alliance Ethio-Francaise. As his love for music got stronger, he dropped out of high school and he was hired at Kedamawi Haile Selassie Theater (today’s Ethiopian National Theater) in 1958. There he got a chance to work with talented musicians like Fikere Maryam Ayele who the young Menelik emulated much. Over the next two years, he performed and recorded with the National Theatre band, making his hits “Almaze Eyasebkush” and “Fikir lemin yeker.” His unrivalled vocal power made himone of the top protagonists of the swinging Addis. Other than working for the National Theatre, Menelik played in the Ras Band and later establishedhis own band. He wrote his own lyrics like “Ye Harerua wetat” and “Se le Wubetua Sadenk” and “Tizita”, which you could listen here.

Merawi Sitot celebrates 80th birthday

AREFAYNE FANTAHUN

The legendary Ethiopian musician Merawi Sitot celebrated his 80th birthday on September 22. At an event held at Harmony Hotel in Addis Ababa, fans and friends paid tribute to the veteran musician in connection with the birthday. The Jazzamba band members Yared Tefera, Abegaz Kibrework, Girum Mezmur presented a tribute to Merawi with a re-creationof his works. Businessman Abinet Gebre Meskel handed over a 50 thousand birr cheque to the veteran singer to cover his medical expenses.Poet Getnet Enyew recited a poem entitled “Dink” (Wonderful).

Merawi was born in the rural Ethiopian region of Wollo Ambassel 80 years ago. An orchestra that came to town one day had such a profound impact on him that at age 14 he moved to Addis Ababa to pursue a musical career. Merawi helped set up the Ethiopian National Theatre and managedthe National Theatre’s Music Orchestra for 27 years. Through a long and versatile career, he worked across three successive governments as a sax and clarinet player and arranger for more than 43 years, writing and composing music that he toured around the world with fellow musicians including the acclaimed Tilahun Gesesse. Together with other artists of thegolden era of Ethiopian music, they helped raise awareness and opened up enjoyment of African music to a global audience. We salute MerawiSitot and wish him an amazing birthday.

ETHIOPIAN MUSIC:Celebrating Mahmoud Ahmed at 75

Arefayne Fantahun

One of Ethiopia’s most famous and most influential performers, Mahmoud Ahmed turns 75 on May 08, 2016. To celebrate this milestone, a photo exhibition is being held in Addis Ababa at Marriot Hotel starting from Tuesday, May 3 till May 9. The exhibit documents Mohammed’s musical career from early days to becoming the leading voice of the country’s ‘Golden Age’ in the ’60s and ’70s, and his incredible body of work with 75 photos taken by different photographers.Taken from his archives, the exhibition shows Mohamed’s photographic exploration of his self as a young man, as well as shots of the singer as a cultural icon. A bona fide Guraghe man, Mahmoud had a life time’s worth of odd jobs before rising to stardom, including an injera seller, a shoe shine boy, night club bouncer, and handyman at Arizona Club. It was at this club that Mahmouddeveloped an early avid interest in music. Most of the popular Ethiopian singers used to perform in this club and one day he was given a chance toshow his talent on stage and was immediately hired by the Imperial Body Guard Band until he joined the Ibex Band at Ras Hotel in the early 70s.

Mahmoud’s star ascended and this fateful opportunity led to a long term engagement until 1980. Between his record store and constant demand for his performances, he played mainly in his home country. His fame grew abroad as Ethiopians migrated around the world and some of his early recordings were re-released. Over the course of his singular career,he won a panoply of awards –including certificates from the Ethiopian Musicians Association and Gemini Health Care Group, honorary degree from the Gondar University, and prestigious BBC World Music Award.

Mahmoud who just returned from the US tour for the birthday celebrationsaid still working and giving pleasure to those who followed him so long isa great privilege. “I’ve lost many friends and colleagues along the way. I thank God for giving me health and strength to this day,” he said.

Mahmoud said he has no intention of retiring from music anytime soon, even though admitting these performances require extraordinary mental and physical fortitude. He said that he is working on a new studio album, which could out some time next year. Talking about the next generation ofaspiring artists, Mahmoud said there are lots of new talents out there. “I listen to some of the current musicians, I am hearing some good music.

The new generation is producing fast and good music. Conditions aresmoother than in our time for the music production,” Mahmoud said.

CULTURE & TRADITION

Traditional Ethiopian tattoos decline in modern world

Arefayne Fantahun

Tesfa Mogessie for News FultonCounty

ADDIS ABABA, Ethiopia – Ethiopia’s traditional art of tattooing is fading asfast as some of the designs inked on adherents’ skin. Tattoos were introduced to Ethiopia in the 4th Century, when Christianity spread to the Horn of Africa. But traditional designs, which are as diverse as Ethiopian society and usually indicate the bearer’s cultural, religious and ethnic background, are rapidly falling out of fashion to be replaced by designs that would not look out of place on the streets of London or New York.

Like many traditions that date back centuries, the tattoos that modern Ethiopians’ ancestors carried are increasingly seen as a sign of backwardness and ignorance. "As urbanization expanded, the standards of beauty changed making it irrelevant for people to want to cling to traditional tattoos to look good,” Solomon Tessema, an expert on traditional practices at Addis Ababa University, said.

According to Tessema, trinkets and jewelry increasingly took over as forms of outward display, replacing tattoos, while cosmetics became amore popular beauty substitute.

Improved education on the dangers associated with tattooing, which isusually carried out by unregulated practitioners, also discouraged the tradition. The procedure is often painful and carries a risk of infection.

Traditional tattoos have many forms — from rows of blue or black lines from chin to chest, dots on the forehead to crucifixes or crescents on theback of the hand and gum tattoos designed to darken pinkish gums.

The experience of 28-year-old Almaz Tafa, who carries a row of tattoos onher neck, is typical of most young carriers of traditional tattoos. “I had difficulties while getting a tattoo print,” she told Anadolu Agency. “I got it willingly for the sake of beauty. My mother advised me to get tattooed as she believes it will add to my beauty.” However, when she moved to AddisAbaba, Tafa found her markings carried a different meaning for her new neighbors than for her friends and family in the rural community where she grew up. “That was when I wanted to scrub it off my body,” she said.

Tattooing was introduced to Ethiopia in 4th century as Christianity arrived via the ancient Aksumite kingdom of northern Ethiopia, Tessema said. Fivecenturies later, crescent designs introduced alongside Islam became popular in eastern Ethiopia. “Though tattoos have long been a symbol of ethnic and religious identity, there were also cultural teachings that insisted they protected attractive-looking people from evil eyes and addedto human beauty,” Tessema added. The ubiquity of modern tattoos around the world has also hit Ethiopia, particularly in urban areas.
Tattoo artist Simegn Abebe, who lives and works in the Bole neighborhoodof downtown Addis Ababa, uses a sterilized needle to imprint designs, many of which, such as the crucifix, are a modern interpretation of traditional designs. “Many people come with the design they want or we show them custom models,” the 39-year-old said. “I love a job as a tattooartist. My customers said that they feel happy wearing tattoos.” It seems the explosion of modern tattoos could sound the death knell for Ethiopia’s traditional designs.

Why the Ethiopia-Eritrea skirmishes won't spiral into full-scale war

By Seyoum Tesfay June 24, 201

International attention has once again been drawn to the fraught relationship between Ethiopia and Eritrea, with both sides admitting thatthe recent flare-up of armed conflict on their shared border resulted in “significant casualties”.

The border between the two countries remains heavily militarised, with a no-man’s land between the two armies. However, reconnaissance units from both sides – as well as refugees and deserters from the Eritrean side − often cross this “no-go” area. It is possible that the 12 June fighting wastriggered by any of these movements, though it seems the Ethiopian military acted in an unusually robust way. Either way, the incident has since been followed up by strong words on both sides.

When these two countries went to war between 1998 and 2000, tens ofthousands from both sides died. Could this latest skirmish spiral into another full-fledged war?

A difficult history

Ethiopia and Eritrea have profound historical and cultural ties. But theyalso have separate histories – which the political classes of the two countries play up or down depending on their political aspirations – particularly around the fact that Ethiopia remained independent while Eritrea was colonised by Italy from 1891-1941 and was subsequently under British rule from 1941-1952.

In December 1950, the United Nations General Assembly voted in favour of granting Eritrea autonomous federal status under the sovereignty of theEthiopian Crown. This was in line with the aspirations of a segment of the Eritrean population, but another section of society was vehemently opposed. Eritreans were not given the opportunity to vote on the issue, however, so it is difficult to determine which side had greater popular support.

Nevertheless, the ongoing federal arrangement proved unsatisfactory to both unionist and separatist segments, and it was abolished in 1962 whenthe Eritrean parliament voted for total union with Ethiopia.

This decision went directly against the desires of the pro-independenceEritrean elite, who claim the vote was the result of interference from Emperor Haile Selassie. In the aftermath of the decision, a “liberation struggle” was launched. This turned into a liberation war which − combined with the civil war waged by various Ethiopian groups to unseat the military government in Addis Ababa – brought untold misery tothe people of both countries.

Challenges of disentanglement

These wars ended in May 1991 when the Eritrean People’s Liberation Fronttook control of Eritrea and Addis Ababa fell to the Ethiopian People’s Revolutionary Democratic Front, which has been in power ever since.

The two rebel forces agreed that the Eritrean question for independence would be settled by a referendum to be organised within two years. But important terms of cessation were neither discussed nor agreed before thevote. These included issues such as commodity trade, use of Eritrean ports by Ethiopia, the question of citizenship of people of Eritrean origin inEthiopia, and the precise border between the two countries. When the referendum was held in April 1993, the terms of the divorce had thus yet to be agreed.

Nevertheless, Eritreans voted overwhelmingly in favour of independence,which Ethiopia recognised immediately. Eritrea now had de jure independence, but continued to use the Ethiopian currency the birr, and the two economies remained closely interlinked. However, there wasno clear official articulation or even exchange of ideas on a host of issuessuch as how to resolve problems resulting from differences in national economic plans, questions over exchange rates, and harmonisation of external customs.

As a result, the political and business class in each country felt that the relationship was lopsided in favour of the other side. In the midst of this state of mutual bitterness, Eritrea issued its own currency, the nakfa. Butagain, the two sides had not agreed on how to handle the implications ofthis on the economies of each country. Tensions rose to a new high.

Haphazard solution to the 1998-2000 war

This is the climate in which Eritrea invaded Ethiopian territory in 1998,sparking war. To the Eritrean government, it appeared that the ruling party in Ethiopia was in a vulnerable position. It ran a poor, vast, diversecountry with a history of strife along various cleavages.

The 1998-2000 conflict was lazily framed as a border war ” by the international community and media. But whatever one calls it, it took thelives and limbs of tens of thousands of people from both countries.

The war finally ended with the Algiers Peace Treaty. This was signed after Ethiopia had regained all the contested territories and penetrated deep into Eritrean territory, but unfortunately the parties and mediators that facilitated this agreement took a purely legalistic approach to resolving theconflict. The real underlying causes of the conflict were swept under the carpet, and the focus was on determination of the boundary between the two states – the most superficial of the causes of the conflict. Each side won and lost some territory.

Significantly, Badme, the flashpoint for the war, was awarded to Eritrea,yet Ethiopia still holds the town and its environs.

The situation now

Better explanations of the conflict today refer to the complete absence oftrust between the protagonists, a fear of accountability, and the lack of vision and resolve to move forwards.

Additionally, some point out that the defence of Eritrea’s sovereignty seems to be the only claim to legitimacy left to the ruling party. Its interest seems to be in perpetuating the status quo. And in any case, itseems the goverments in both Eritrea and Ethiopia have settled for outliving the other side as the only solution.

That implies each side has to work assiduously to shorten the lease on power of the other. But that said, neither side has any interest in startinga full-fledged war. The Ethiopian government does not want a war that could potentially reverse the country’s economic gains. Meanwhile, the Eritrean government knows it is in a much weaker political, economic anddiplomatic position than it was during the last war.

Hence, the choice for the Eritrean government is to sponsor every groupbattling the Ethiopian government, while Ethiopia mainly relies on diplomatic and economic isolation of Eritrea.

This is not a good outcome for either side, but it is highly unlikely that therecent incidents will spiral into a large scale military confrontation. Neitherside believes it would gain if they did. Seyoum Y. Tesfay is an Assistant Professorat Addis Ababa University.

Isaias Afewerki during the Eritrean Referendum

By Abraha Belai, Ethiomedia Editor-In-Chief June 24, 2016

I was one of the Ethiopian journalists who covered the 1993 Eritrean Referendum in Asmara. The other journalists I remember were AdanechFessehaye (VOA) and Negash Mohammed (DW).

For Eritreans, it was an historic moment: An era of war and destruction had ended and an era of peace and tranquility set in. People expressed joyby dancing in the streets 24 hours a day for several days nonstop.

Beyond the triumphant Eritrean Liberation People's Front (EPLF) leaders, and notably the towering Isaias Afewerki, the behind-the-scene host to the ongoing Eritrean festival was the equally triumphant Meles Zenawi, leader of the Tigray People's Liberation Front (TPLF), a fighting machine run by a group of men bent on ensuring the independence of Eritrea fromno-man's land Ethiopia.

The Eritrean people were given two cards: Blue and Red. They were openly told Red represents war, death, and destruction. Blue representspeace and the concomitant dividends of peace that would boost Eritreanpride. So, the people were invited to choose between war and peace. Ofcourse no healthy mind casts a vote for war, death and destruction. So,the UN-supervised Referendum was a done deal: independence withoutconsidering remaining with Ethiopia as an option.

The Ethiopian delegation was led by Dr Negasso Gidada, then Informationminister, who was the first to stand on top of a UN SUV in the city to inform a crowd of reporters and international observers that his government has recognized Eritrea as an independent, sovereign nation.

Meles, who was acting like a mother overseeing her daughter's lavish wedding party, had also fielded two "neutral" observers from the Ethiopianside: Professor Ephraim Isaac and Professor Endreas Eshete. I remember when the two gentlemen, with Professor Ephraim Issac clad in the traditional white Ethiopain costume, strolling along the palm-lined streets of Asmara together with Marc Baas, the US ambassador to Ethiopia in the mid-'90s. It would be years for the public to know that the two gentelmen were indeed the "yes-men" of Mr. Meles Zenawi.

As in Dickens' The Tale of Two Cities, it was the best of times and the worst of times for Eritrea. It was the best of times that a bloody war had ended and people were having the joy of their lifetime; it was the worst oftimes that Eritrea would resort back to war and tyranny though Meles hadheld Ethiopia up for grabs.

As a midwife of Eritrea's birth, EPRDF had deployed three helicopter loadsof journalists that would deafen the Ethiopian people with the shouts of freedom, freedom, freedom, freedom for Eritrea. The propaganda was toomuch it seemed the Ethiopian people were telling the journalists, "Keep the job of killing the country to yourselves, and please leave us alone."

For two weeks, we drove the UN-owned SUVs out of Asmara to nearby Mendefera, Dekemhare or to the port city of Massawa, where in the latter's case Eritrean officials showed visitors the bombed-out remains of aonce-elegant palace they said was built by the Ottoman Turks in the 16th Century, and had been a winter retreat for Emperor Haileselassie.

We would once again find ourselves in our base, Asmara.

I was senior editor of The Ethiopian Herald before I became deputy editorin chief of the Ethiopian News Agency (ENA) during the referendum. Lackof reporters was also forcing me to double as a correspondent for the English Section of the Ethiopian TV.

Before we headed home to Addis, we met the man of the time, PresidentIsaias Afewerki of Eritrea, in his office.

To cut a long story short, we shot our million-dollar question to Isaias: "Now the Derg is gone. The guns have fallen silent. There is peace in Ethiopia and Eritrea. And the two of you - Meles and Isaias - are comradesin arms. Will you pave the way to federate Eritrea with Ethiopia?"

Oh, Lord!

Rolling his piercing eyes, and slowly sucking his lips as if ready to devoura prey, Isaias posed for what seemed to be an eternity, and said, "Why Ethiopia? Why are you Ethiopians obsessed with federation? Is it becausethere are many Eritreans living in Ethiopia? Don't get it wrong. There arean equal number of Eritreans in the Sudan as well. But Sudan never torments us with the idea of federation. It is an Ethiopian obsession."

Clearly, Isaias took our question as insult.

We returned to Ethiopia... a country that two Eritrean groups skillfully turned into the largest landlocked nation that would keep on fragmentingalong ethnic lines.

ETHIOPIA: The infamous 2003 “Gambella massacre” survivors inthe US Ecadforum June 24, 2016

The Ethiopian (TPLF) military has committed widespread murder, rape and torture against the Anuak population in the remote southwestern region of Gambella, in 2003 alone 400 Anuaks were killed by the TPLF regime forces. “She was like, ‘I thank God for whatthe government of the United States did for me, to bring my children here,” said her son, Oballa Oman Oballa.

It was Dec. 13, 2003 … the day Okello and her children fled their home in Gambella, Ethiopia during a massacre that claimed 424 lives, including thelife of her brother. Her family spent most of the next decade in a refugee camp in Kenya, until finally…

“In the year 2013, in December, God opened the way and we reached theUnited States,” Oballa explained. “The government of the United States has been so wonderful to everyone, all who are suffering,” he said, interpreting for his mother.

Now, it’s time to say ‘thank you.’ “The reason why I made these things is to give appreciation to the government,” Okello said through her son. Thegifts include a belt for President Obama. “She made it with all the beads on it, and then she sewn it with a needle,” Oballa explained.

She also made a matching tie, and a gift for the First Lady. “This is like bracelet for Michelle Obama,” Oballa said, displaying his mother’s handiwork. But the greatest gift could be what she’s given the rest of us.

“It’s really easy for us as a society because we live a very comfortable, normally very safe life to not really understand the atrocities going on around the world,” said the Austin Human Rights Commission’s Richard Lemons. “I think for me at least, putting a human face on it and seeing areal person changes my perspective.” She also reminds us of something we often forget. “When I reached the United States, it was like this is theland of opportunity,” Oballa said.

Ma’ekelawi

Why is Ethiopia still running a ‘Torture Chamber’ from the past?

ADDIS STANDARD By Kalkidan Yibeltal & Tesfalem Waldyes June 28, 2016

In Piassa, an area many consider to be the heart of Addis Abeba, rests theEthiopian Federal Police Force Central Bureau of Criminal Investigation, otherwise known by its Amharic name, Ma’ekelawi (Amharic for central).

Notorious for the sever torture detainees are subjected to inside its enclosures, Ma’ekelawi is a time defying institution which has been in usefor more than half a century in Ethiopia, sadly for the same purpose.

During the dark days of the Marxist Derg regime between 1974 and 1991,Ma’ekelawi served as a place where thousands of dissenters were exposedto cruelties including disquieting torture and arbitrary killings. More than three decades down the line many of those who survived Ma’ekelawi live alife overshadowed by what happened when they were incarcerated, struggling to fully overcome the experience as they carry the burden of the darkest chapters in their lives.

Today nowhere is that history of horror visibly displayed than at the RedTerror Martyr’s Museum around Mesqel Square in central Addis Abeba.

The Museum’s motto, “Never Ever Again”, speaks volumes about the atrocities committed inside Ma’ekelawi throughout the 17 years in powerof the Derg regime.

The Red Terror Martyr’s Museum was built by the current regime in Ethiopia in honor of the people who perished during its predecessor’s infamous Red Terror campaign of 1977-1978. An estimated number of more than half a million Ethiopians were killed during that brutal campaign; and many of the victims have gone through the terrible experience of life at Ma’ekelawi.

For the survivors of the campaign, the Red Terror Martyr’s Museum is a place where solace and comfort can be sought. Some survivors who were approached by this magazine found talking about the horrendous experience they had gone through inside the fortress of Ma’ekelawi toomuch to bear, rendering our attempts to get their stories futile.

Fast forward, decades later and a completely different government that has ‘democratic’ written all over it, and that waged a civil war against a regime which partially depended on what happened inside

Ma'ekelawi toextend its grip on power, the story of Ma'ekelawi remained intact.

'Chambers of horror'

Other than its frightening name, a great number of present-day Ethiopiansknow little about either the physical structure or the torture techniques applied inside Ma'ekelawi. But a 2013 Human Rights Watch (HRW) report titled: "They Want a Confession: Torture and Ill treatment in Ethiopia's Ma'ekelawi Police Station," revealed a chilling account. It documented in detail the scale of human rights abuses, unlawful investigation tactics, anddetention conditions practiced between the years of 2010 and 2013. It accuses investigators of using coercive methods including several ways of torture to extract confessions, statements, and other information from detainees. Depending on their compliances with the demands of investigators, the report said, detainees are punished or rewarded with denial or access to water, food, light, and other basic needs.They are also subjected to sever physical tortures involving beatings and punishments by stressful positions such as hanging them with their wrists tied to ceilings, or being made to stand with their hands tied above their heads for several hours.

The US State Department's annual Human Right Report on Ethiopia, whichwas released in April this year, also admits that "there were credible reports police investigators used physical and psychological abuse to extract confessions in Ma'ekelawi. Interrogators reportedly administered beatings and electric shocks to extract information and confessions from detainees."

Both reports have been corroborated by several detainees (past and present) who were interviewed by Addis Standard for this story. (Seeselected stories here and here).

Many of them refer to Ma'ekelawi as "chambers of horror."

Inside the 'Chambers of horror'

Ma'ekelawi has three different blocks with conditions significantly differingamongst them. Based on the locations and the facilities inside; the three blocks are known as Siberia, Tawla Bet & Sheraton.

'Siberia'

The worst of the three blocks is called Siberia for none other than the cells' freezing temperature. Siberia alone has between seven and 10 cellsat a time, all ranging from 16 to 25 square meters in size. (The number ofthe cells can go up and down depending on the number of detainees received at a time. And when detainees overwhelm the block, the management converts rooms that serve as storage places or communal rooms into detention centers).

One of the cells in Siberia, cell number 8, is partitioned into four separatecells and is used to keep detainees in solitary confinement. The rooms arejust big enough to accommodate a mattress to sleep and a bucket to urinate on. They have no window and no light inside, which is why they are called "Chelema Bet" (Amharic for Dark House).

The rest of the Siberia block hosts communal cells, which are lined up along a long corridor facing one another. They do share similar features with "Chelema Bet": the rooms are naturally dark except for a dim fluorescent light hanging on a barred, small window near each ceiling. Themetal doors have small peepholes, often covered on cardboard, and are kept locked for 24 hours. Detainees inside these communal cells are allowed to have just 10 minutes of access to daylight per day. The only other stuffs in each communal cell are mattresses, a bucket and a few food bowls. Up to 20 detainees (sometimes more) are forced to share each of the communal cells, which are not more than 4X5 square meters in size.
At one end of the corridor there are five filthy toilets and a shower locatedadjacent the toilets, all for communal use. While showering is allowed once a week, accessing the toilet is restricted to 15 minutes at a time, twice a day; and as if that is not enough discomfort the toilets don't have doors to give detainees the privacy they need.

'Tawla Bet'

Tawla Bet (Amharic for wooden house), is where those who are coerced totestify against fellow detainees are kept as prosecutors' key witnesses. Formany of the detainees Tawla Bet is a place of heartache, guilt and moral dilemma; many of them are brought into a point of mental breakdown to testify against fellow detainees under sever duress.

Tawla Bet is also where female detainees are kept. Although most of theregulations are similar with Siberia, the doors in Tawla Bet cells can stayopen during daytime, allowing detainees to sit at their doorstep and sometimes move from one cell to the other, a precious asset inside the two blocks.

'Sheraton'
